leged limitation of the authority of said W. H. DeWolf as agent of said ship on her last voyage, and to the effect that the said W. H. DeWolf would not pledge the credit of said owners and defendants; and here refer to the rulings of the court and remarks at the time. Because the court allowed a bill of lading of the copper, (the subject matter of the suit,) produced and made out by the defendants or their agents, and not made out by the plaintiffs or by any one authorized by them to pass to the jury, being objected to by the plaintiffs and once rejected by the court, as evidence of a personal credit to W. H. DeWolf, the same being made out to him. Because since the trial of said action new and other material testimony for the plaintiff has been discovered, and which they could not have known before, the same being first by plaintiffs known from the cross-examination of one of the witnesses produced by the defendants in the action Fearing v. DeWolf [Case No. 4,711], tried at the same term of said court, viz: That W. H. DeWolf had been for a great number of years agent for the ship Corinthian, and held himself out to the public, and acted in fitting said ship in the voyage for which said copper was furnished, in the same manner that he had done for three or four previous voyages, and with the knowledge of the other defendants. And also, that they have since discovered, as aforesaid, that said defendants had entered into an agreement to appoint, and did authorize, said W. H. DeWolf to act as agent for said ship and said defendants, on said last voyage. And also, because the court in said case charged the jury that the defendants said and proved, adverting to (and meaning) the testimony of Gov. Dimon as to the private conversation between said defendants, when plaintiffs were not present, and never brought to knowledge of plaintiffs, and then objected to by plaintiffs—that the contract among and between the defendants was that each should fit his shares for himself, and that this copper was bought by DeWolf himself, and went to furnish and fit his shares, which was erroneous. Because said verdict was against the weight of the evidence as proved on the trial, and against the law and evidence, and unjust and erroneous. Wherefore they ask the honorable court to set aside said verdict and judgment, and grant a new trial thereon. By their attornies, Greene & Potter."

"It is agreed on the part of the defendants that the above may be modified and amended according to the facts. I. R. Bullock, of counsel for the defendants."

"Rhode Island District, ss. Clerk's Office, Circuit Court, at Providence, November 17, 1846. I hereby certify that the above and foregoing four pages contain a true copy of the 'Motion for new trial in case of Josiah Macy & Sons v. William H. DeWolf et al.,' now on file in this office, duly examined and compared by me. John T. Pitman, Clerk Circuit Court, R. I. District."

This motion was argued at the last November term, by—

Greene & Potter, for plaintiffs.

Blake, Bullock & Whipple, for defendants.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. This motion relates to causes for a new trial; some happening since the verdict, and some before. Those assigned for what occurred before, will first be attended to. They do not possess much difficulty, except that one in respect to the competency of the witness, Dimon. One is that the verdict is against evidence. But the principles just laid down in the case of Fearing v. DeWolf [Case No. 4,711], show that this is not one of the class of verdicts which this court feels justified to set aside on the ground that it is against the weight of evidence. For although it is not very probable that if the court had been in the place of the jury, its finding would have been the same way; yet on a review of the whole testimony put in, it is certain that the balance of it was, in fact, so doubtful, as to cause one disagreement of a jury, and some hesitancy in another pannel, at the first trial. The material facts were not without difficulty, as (1) whether the credit was not actually given to DeWolf alone, in the first instance; or (2) if not so, whether the plaintiffs did not actually receive his note alone, afterwards, in payment for the copper; or (3) if otherwise, whether they made him in any way their agent for this voyage so as to be bound by him in that capacity; or (4) whether the plaintiffs did not give to DeWolf a receipt in payment, and permit him to use it in a settlement with the other owners, and wait so long before a resort was had to them, as in justice to exonerate them, if before liable.

The testimony, and the circumstances bearing on these various matters, were in several respects conflicting. There were contradictions among the witnesses and the probabilities of the case, which it was necessary a jury should weigh, and one on which they might fairly come to a conclusion for the respondents, especially as the burthen of proof devolved on the other side; and they might do this without being clearly guilty either of mistake or abuse of power.

Their verdict in this case, therefore, cannot be set aside as against the weight of evidence, but on the contrary, accords rather with the conclusions formed by the court itself on the particular evidence in this case. Nor do I find that the instructions given as to the law connected with these points were erroneous, or that the finding of the jury was counter to any of them. They were as follows: Part owners of vessels are prima facie liable for supplies furnished to their vessels, as they get the benefit of them. Abb. Shipp. 105, 143; The Nestor [Case No. 10,126]; Story, Partn. 591–598; Rich v. Coe, Cowp. 636; Harrington v. Fry, 1 Car. & P. 289. But if credit was actually given at first to one of them, as contended here to W. H. DeWolf alone, the rest of the owners were not to be made liable for such supplies. Jennings v. Griffiths, Ryan & M. 42; 11 Mass. 40, 41; Curling v. Robertson, 8 Scott, N. R. 12; 13 Law J. (N. S.) 137; 7 Man. & G. 336; 6 Pick. 120; 9 Johns. 470. So, if the credit was not given to him alone, but his note alone was, in truth and design, afterwards taken in payment, and especially if renewed or indulged with extended credit. Abb. Shipp. 134; Reed v. White, 5 Esp. 122; Story, Ag. 441, 457. Cases of doubt, whether a note was so taken in fact, do not impair this principle. Leland v. The Medora [Case No. 8,237]; The Chusan [Id. 2,717]; and The Nestor [supra]. Because a note does not merge the debt without such an agreement, except in two or three states. Abb. Shipp. 134, note; 2 Johns. 311; 1 Conn. 290; 24 Pick. 20; 12 Johns. 411; 10 Mass. 47; 18 Me. 249. See cases last cited. If the note be signed by one part owner, without stating he is agent for the others, it is presumed to be signed in his own behalf alone. Stackpole v. Arnold, 11 Mass. 29. But this may probably be rebutted by other testimony conclusive as to his agency. Nor are the owners liable, if a note has been taken of one alone, and the amount receipted to him, and time elapses without a call on the owners, and thereupon they adjust the concern between themselves, as if the note was deemed a payment. James v. Bixby, 11 Mass. 40; 5 Eq. Cas. 152; Wyatt v. Hertford, 3 East, 147; Cheever v. Smith, 15 Johns. 276; 1 Greenl, Ev.; Story, Ag. §§ 431-435; Abb. Shipp. 136, note.

Again, another ground assigned for a new trial, because conversations between the owners as to fitting out, not in the presence of the plaintiffs, were allowed to be proved, is untenable, if we look a moment to the character of the case. Parol evidence by Dimon or any other witness ruled to be competent, was proper to show that the owners contracted with each other not to have DeWolf for an agent any longer, nor permit him to pledge their credit for supplies. This does not impugn the maxim, "res inter alias actae alteri nocere non debet," (Broom, Leg. Max. 432). This was one step, and a proper one, in their defence against his purchases, made in order, as they alleged, to furnish his own share in value of the supplies. But the jury were instructed that this would not exonerate them, if they had before empowered him to make purchases on their behalf and did not give notice that his agency had been terminated. Or unless in these voyages it was the usage to have a person, when agent, act only for one voyage without a new appointment. If the latter was the case, then the burthen devolved on the plaintiffs to show that DeWolf had been appointed as agent for this voyage in order to charge the other owners for his purchases, made in truth, on his own private account; and it was pertinent and competent evidence for them or any of them, to rebut any inferences or proof against them as to his agency, by showing that they had decided, on deliberation before hand, not to constitute him their agent. So, the other objection as to the bill of lading of the copper being admitted as evidence, though made out by the forwarding house, is not to be sustained. Because it was admitted and so expressed at the time, only to show as a part of the res gestae in forwarding the copper, to whom it was done, or how it was done, and understood at the time by those engaged in it; but not to bind the plaintiffs unless believed to be brought home or known to them.

Let us recur, then, to the only remaining objection to the verdict on account of any ruling at the trial,—the incompetency of Dimon as a witness, on the ground of interest in the result of this action. His interest, if existing, arises from the fact that DeWolf mortgaged to him his share in the Corinthian, and his interest in her cargo, with much other property, in order to secure him as endorser on several demands for DeWolf. One mortgage deed was given as early as December, 1842, and the other executed before this controversy, in July, A. D. 1843. Neither of them were shown to have been released or discharged at the time of this suit, though the witness testified that he considered the other property assigned to him at the same time as sufficient for his indemnity without DeWolf's share in this vessel. Firstly, what is his interest in the result of this action, in respect to the vessel—as the attention of counsel seems chiefly to have been directed to that? If the owners of the vessel at the time of the purchase of this copper are held to be liable for it, as already shown that primâ facie they are, this does not, of course, make the share of one of them in the vessel itself liable to the plaintiffs, and much less impose a lien on it in rem for contribution in favor of the other part owners. 6 Pick. 120. They had no remedy against the vessel in the first instance, she not being a foreign vessel, in and supplied in New York by the plaintiffs. Leland v. The Medora [Case No. 8,237], Abb. Shipp. 153. She was at Bristol, in Rhode Island, when and where the copper was wanted for her, and where all the owners lived; and no proceeding in rem could have been instituted against her in New York, though she, in some sense, and for some purposes, might be deemed foreign as to New York. Thus, had she been actually there and supplied there, when owned in Rhode Island, she might, perhaps, have been treated for this purpose as foreign. [The General Smith] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438; [The St. Jago De Cuba] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 409, 416; The Nestor [Case No. 10,126]. But she was not there; away from home, without means, in a distant country, or nobody with her who was an owner; and hence does not come within the principle of the lien as a foreign vessel supplied in a foreign port.

Pritchard v. The Lady Horatio [Id. 11,438].

The special laws of Rhode Island, like those of some states in the Union, and in France, might have made her liable even for domestic supplies, but unless they do it expressly, the rule is the other way. [The General Smith] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438; The Nestor [supra]; The Marion [Case No. 9,087]; Read v. Hull of a New Brig [Id. 11,609]; Harper v. New Brig [Id. 6,090]; 14 Conn. 404; Abb. Shipp. (last Ed.) 142, note. There were other positions assumed, also, such as the subsequent taking of DeWolf's note as payment, that it would exonerate the vessel from any lien to the plaintiffs, if it ever existed; and these positions were believed by the jury to have been well sustained, so far as regards the facts. But, as the lien on the ship itself never existed in favor of the plaintiffs, it is unnecessary to examine them under this head.

It is next contended that if a claim of a creditor for supplies does not exist in rem in this case, the vessel itself is liable to each part owner for contribution, if subjected to pay more than his ratio; or in other words, that the shares owned by each are chargeable with their proportion of what may be recovered and collected from each owner, over his proportion, in an action like this, for supplies to the vessel. If this be so, then Dimon, as specially interested in DeWolf's shares, might feel interested to protect them from this charge. And though he has other security deemed sufficient, his special legal interest still remains in these shares, and if he did not wish to retain them as additional security, he should have released his interest in them or assigned it to other creditors of DeWolf before testifying. But is the share itself in the vessel under a lien in law to pay a part owner for his extra advances? It is clear that one part owner of a vessel, paying or being subjected to pay, as he is in solido, sometimes more than his ratio of the supplies, has a remedy against the others, in personam, for the excess. Helme v. Smith, 7 Bing. 709; 5 Moore & P. 744; Davis v. Johnston, 4 Sim. 539. But when they have no common agent in whom the title of all is fully vested, it is difficult to see how they could enforce such remedy against the shares in rem more than against any other property of each owner. They can attach them in a suit, if not in the meantime conveyed to others. But on the ground of principle it seems certain that such shares themselves, if in the meantime sold or mortgaged for a bonâ fide debt or liability, cannot be followed. In this instance, perhaps, there has been no such change of possession under the mortgage, as to dissolve the lien on that account, provided a lien ever existed; the vessel seems to have been still in the same hands and control after the mortgage as before, till the voyage was completed; and the proceeds of her last voyage, for aught yet shown, remain unsettled. Principle, then, being against such a lien, how does this point stand on precedents?

It seems settled that part owners of a ship are tenants in common, and not joint owners. 2 Ves. & B. 242; 4 Johns. Ch. 522. Hence they may sue each other. It is also settled, generally, that there is no lien by one on the share of another for outfits and supplies. Ex parte Young, 2 Ves. & B. 242; Merrill v. Bartlett, 6 Pick. 47; and Thorndike v. DeWolf, Id. 120; 14 Ves. 393; Id. 120; Braden v. Gardner, 4 Pick. 456; Patton v. The Randolph [Case No. 10,837]; Smith v. De Silva, Cowp. 469; Story, Partn. §§ 419, 497; 5 Ves. 469; 2 Rose, 79; 1 Mont. Partn. 102; Id. 89, note 88. These more modern cases seem to overrule Doddington v. Hallet, 1 Ves. Sr. 497, as understood by some, and so far as regards the general principle. They make part owners not partners, nor subject to the principles of copartnership, unless under special contracts or usages, changing the general character of the transaction. 20 Johns. 611. And so far as 1 Ves. Sr. 497, goes beyond this, it is not now considered sound law. The principle that part owners are not partners, is also the general principle on this subject, and hence it is the legal presumption; and whoever avers that these owners are partners in a particular case, must go forward and show it as an exception. 1 East, 20; 8 Barn. & C. 12; 3 Kent, Comm. 154. It is true that previous partners may together own shares in vessels, and then they may hold these shares as partners, and on principles of partnership, and subject first for partnership debts. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 490; Hoxie v. Carr [Case No. 6,802]; Ex parte Jones, 4 Maule & S. 450; Mumford v. Nicoll, 20 Johns. 611; 6 Mass. 279; 9 Mass. 490. So, when they agree to be partners, or when it is the usage to be so for the voyage. Doddington v. Hallet, 1 Ves. Sr. 497. In these ways it is admitted that there may be joint owners of a vessel, yet this is not the case when each proprietor, as here, merely owns an undivided share, since they then become tenants in common as before stated. To hold part owners to be partners, without an express contract to that effect, would not only violate the legal principles which govern other tenancies in common, but enable one part owner,—though of only one-hundredth part,—to sell the whole ship or whole property owned in common, which is neither in conformity to usage or the fitness of things in such adventures. 3 Kent, Comm. 151, 152; 8 Taunt. 774.

It seems, after much difference of opinion, to have been held in New York, that the owners of a ship, in shares, may be under special circumstances, quasi partners; and the property is then liable for all demands by third persons, before going to satisfy the private debts of any one partner to third persons. But that is not the case ordinarily, as before shown, the part owners being usually tenants in common and not partners. Story, Partn. 649; Mumford v. Nicoll, 20 Johns. 611; 4 Johns. Ch. 532, 3 Kent, Comm. 152–154. The vessel here, then, not having been owned as partnership property among its part owners, the result of a lien as in case of partnerships, does not follow; and Dimon's right to it as mortgagee of one owner, is not affected by this verdict or any claim over by the other owners hereafter, for any excess collected from them for supplies. That claim extends only to De Wolf in personam, and any property in the ship not sold or mortgaged, or any residuary interest like an equity of redemption not conveyed. In respect to this interest in the cargo, that may be different, and will soon be examined. The ownership in a vessel is one thing, and stands by itself; and in the absence of any special contract, it is governed by the general principles of law, to which I have adverted,—no lien on it belongs to a creditor who furnishes supplies to a vessel when at home, without a special statute, nor belongs to a part owner for contribution; but usually whoever first attaches or first obtains a mortgage of the property of a part owner in a vessel holds it. Post v. Kimberly, 9 Johns. 470; Thorndike v. DeWolf, 6 Pick. 124, 125.

Having thus disposed of the objection to testimony on account of the shares in the vessel, the more doubtful question remains, as to the cargo and proceeds. It seems that they also were mortgaged to Dimon. But what the particular contract was in this case in respect to them, if any existed, was not shown at the trial, nor exhibited in the motion filed in this case for a new trial. Nor has it since been agreed to be made a part of the case, and examined by the court, as if a part of the original motion. In the absence of any proof at the trial what the special contract was, by the owners of the Corinthian, as to the cargo, or even whether there was any, the court must leap in the dark, or consider the case as if no special contract whatever was made. The part owners would then stand, as to the cargo, as they do in respect to the vessel, and their interest in both be those of tenants in common and not joint tenants or partners. Each owner, and the mortgagee of each, would then hold his share subject to no lien; but each owner and each mortgager be liable in personam only for contribution. This view is forced on the court by compulsion, from the absence of other evidence. And if it should be otherwise, after proving all the facts, it is the misfortune of the plaintiffs not to have put in evidence all the appropriate facts at the trial, to raise the question which would exist had the whole then been made a part of the case. The result, however, now may not be different from what it would be if another trial was had, and Dimon was made clearly a competent witness, under a release by him as to the cargo. The result now, too, does not seem to vary from the apparent justice of the case, after so much evidence as there was here, that DeWolf was either treated originally alone, or his note taken in payment afterwards, and unusual time given without a call on the owners, till he settled with the owners its amount, as if it had been advanced and accepted by the plaintiffs from him alone. This fact has been testified to in other cases, by other witnesses, and not by Dimon alone. It is customary under such circumstances, not to disturb a verdict, but only when injustice seems manifest, or some ruling or instruction in law was clearly wrong, and on a material point. 5 Ham. 109; Id. 117, 1 Chip. 304; 5 Ham. 509; U. S. v. Duval [Case No. 15,015]; 5 Mass. 547; 18 Pick. 13.

Under these views the court cannot, without travelling out of the record, say whether Dimon might not be technically an incompetent witness, in respect to his interest in the cargo, if there was a special contract between the owners and crew. I can conceive of such special contracts as would create such a lien, and render a part owner of the cargo, or his mortgagee, technically incompetent, and such an one as would not do this. It must exist,—be made a part of the case, and carefully examined before it can be decided on. The whole title of the cargo may be vested in the managing owners; and then they are trustees for the shareholders, including the owners, crew and seamen, to pay over the due portion to each, after deducting all expenses. See Joy v. Allen [Case No. 7,552]; Mumford v. Nicoll, 20 Johns. 611. This depends entirely on the agreement in each case. Story, Partn. § 427. The ship is one thing, and owned by one class of persons, in a whaling voyage; while the cargo is another, and may be owned, in part, by another class, the officers and crew in connection with owners; and owned often under agreed conditions and liabilities peculiar to that branch of business, and usually embodied in a special written contract. There are some analogies both ways, which may be adverted to, but as to which no decision is given. The seamen may sue in admiralty for their share, as wages, in such voyages, under some special contracts, after the cargo is sold, and are not driven to a suit at law on the special contract. Coffin v. Jenkins [Case No. 2,948], and cases there cited. Yet this arose, perhaps, from indulgence to the seamen for expedition, and does not show that, till the sale and readiness to account, but rather confirm that till then the whole legal title to the cargo is in the owners, under the special contract, when, as before described, it is made subject to all just charges on it before those interested in equity can prosecute for any separate share as wages, or otherwise. Sometimes, however, the owners and officers and crew, as to the cargo, become only quasi partners, and not actual partners. 8 Barn. & C. 612; Joy v. Allen [supra]. Till then, as between the owners, whether this be called a copartnership in equity as regards their interest, or a trust in which each has a pro rata interest, the directors or owners of the ship are often specially made agents and trustees to sell and dispose of the cargo by the very terms and spirit of what is often an ordinary whaling contract. The legal title is in them, in such case. And where the master has, by usage, a lien on the lays (shares) of seamen for supplies furnished to them, as is often the case, it is not lost by delivering the oil to the owners for this special purpose of selling it in behalf of all interested. Barney v. Coffin, 3 Pick. 115. So, the ship's husband, if making advances in such a case, has a lien on the share of each in the cargo. Abb. Shipp. 138; Holderness v. Shackels, 8 Barn. & C. 612; Story, Partn. § 433. In such a case, also, if one part owner becomes bankrupt, the others may deduct from the profits of the voyage, enough to pay his share in the outfits. Cases just cited; Abb. Shipp. 140, 142; Story, Partn. §§ 408, 441, 444–448; Patton v. The Randolph [Case No. 10,837]. Of course, then, anything which is a new charge on these funds, such as a payment of the plaintiffs' claim out of it, instead of collecting it of DeWolf alone, would seem to tend to diminish the amount of interest of each part owner in them, and consequently of the interest of the mortgagee of the share of any in these funds. All just debts, advances and expenses, must be paid before a mortgagee or private and separate creditor can receive any balance. 20 Johns. 627; 1 Ves. Sr. 239; 4 Ves. 396; 17 Ves. 193; Camp. 445. As at present advised, though it might be different on examination, when such a whaling contract of this special kind between the owners and the crew shall make a part of any case, it looks very doubtful, whether a mortgagee of such a share is competent as a witness in a suit, the damages in which may legally become a charge on that share.

There is another reply urged by the respondents against setting aside the verdict, on account of Dimon's interest, viz: that the other testimony made out a case for them strongly enough without him. But I do not think that the case was, in all respects, made out so fully without Dimon's testimony as with it. Indeed, one point, the settlement among the owners on the faith that DeWolf had been accepted by the plaintiffs as alone responsible for the copper, was proved by him alone at this trial, and may be the very ground on which the jury found a verdict for the defendants. It may be said, further, that Dimon is interested to increase DeWolf's estate,—a debtor to him, though as mortgagee of a part owner, there is no lien on his share in this particular vessel, to be affected by the result. But such a general interest does not disable a creditor from being a competent witness for his debtor. It is too remote and contingent. Seaver v. Bradley, 6 Greenl. 60. But if he has a claim on specific property of the debtor as his assets, being a bankrupt he cannot be a witness to increase their amount. 1 Greenl. Ev. 436, 437; 5 Johns. 422; 2 Pick. 240; 9 Pick. 322. It is on this ground that a witness who is a legatee cannot testify as to the estate, to increase it. Greenl. Ev. 437. Nor can a person be a witness where he could use the verdict, or it could be used against him. 1 Greenl. Ev. 477; 10 La. 124. If, therefore, this case showed that this verdict could be used for or against Dimon, or that a lien existed on the share mortgaged to him, whether in the vessel or cargo, then it is quite manifest that his testimony ought to be excluded. But when facts have not been introduced which show such a specific lien, his general interest under the mortgage, in the property, does not appear to be necessarily increased or diminished by the result.

Lastly, under this head has been urged Dimon's interest, because liable merely as mortgagee of the share, and not because any specific lien exists on it in favor of creditors of the mortgager and other owners. But it is a general rule that a mortgager in possession as DeWolf was in this case, is still to be considered as owner for most purposes, except as between the parties to the mortgage. See the cases collected in Shapley v. Rangeley [Case No. 12,707]; Fiedler v. Carpenter [Id. 4,759]; 11 N. H. 40; 12 N. H. 558. The suit then here by the plaintiffs against the owners, is properly against DeWolf, the mortgager, as one of them, and the remedy over by any of the defendants for what is collected of them beyond their proportion, is against DeWolf, the mortgager in possession when the supplies were furnished, and not against Dimon, the mortgagee out of possession.

Another ground, and the last one urged for a new trial, is in relation to matter happening since the verdict. It is alleged to be the discovery of new and material evidence. That is certainly one legal ground for a new trial, if well supported. But in order to do that, firstly, the party must not have known the existence of such evidence before, nor had the means of easily discovering it. 2 Bin. 582; 2 Fair. [11 Me.] 218; Williams v. Baldwin, 18 Johns. 489. One case exists of a new trial granted for the discovery of such evidence, though it had been actually in the possession of the party's attorney. Broadhead v. Marshall, 2 W. Bl. 955; 2 Root, 454. But if actually known by the party, at any time before the jury retired, or even before a verdict is rendered, no new trial can be allowed on account of it. Ames v. Howard [Case No. 326]; 7 Cow. 269. The matter, considered new and important evidence in this case, it is true, was since developed, though it came from a witness by the name of Dearth, who had been on the stand in some former trials. But he is not shown to have disclosed then what is now regarded as new. There seems, however, to have been some inattention or neglect in not questioning him more fully on former trials, as he being clerk of DeWolf, was likely to know all the facts connected with the case.

The next requisite is that such new evidence must be material. Tuttle v. Cooper, 5 Pick. 414; Marshall v. Union Ins. Co. [Case No. 9,134]; 5 Serg. & R. 41. As detailed here in the affidavit of Marcy, a son of the plaintiff, which is the only affidavit about it put in the case on the part of the plaintiffs, it would be material. But the counter affidavit of Mr. Blake, on file, denies the truth of the most important points in the newly discovered evidence named by Marcy. And on examination it will be found that Marcy does not swear, of his own knowledge, to any of the new evidence, but merely to what the counsel for the plaintiffs have informed him from their minutes. This is quite too loose. Again, if the statement was in the main correct, it all relates to what Dearth, a witness on the stand for the respondents, is supposed to have disclosed at a subsequent trial about supplies furnished to the ship Corinthian, by Fearing and others. Now, though Dearth there may have sworn to the owners allowing DeWolf to pledge their credit in some cases and not in others, it would not affect, directly, the present case of these plaintiffs, unless they allowed it as to them. And if Dearth testified to a written agreement having once existed as to fitting out the Corinthian, it is not produced, nor its contents given so as to enable the court to judge if it be material. And the probability is from the other facts in the case, that it related to the circumstance with whom of the partners a willingness existed to fit out the vessel at all; because it is conceded that only a part of them agreed to do it, and they gave a bond of indemnity to the other owners; and there was some written stipulation concerning it among them.

Again, it seems to be settled that no uncertainty or doubt must exist as to what the newly discovered testimony really is, so that the court may see what is the effect of it, and whether a new trial on account of it is required in order to be substantial justice. 4 Ham. 5; 5 Halst. [10 N. J. Law] 250; 1 Caines, 24; 1 A. K. Marsh. 188. For this reason the statement of it must be by other affidavits than those of the party, or one interested; and it must be by the new witnesses themselves, if they are procurable. Webber v. Ives, 1 Tyler, 441; Chambers v. Brown, Cooke, 292; [Scott v. Wilson] Id. 315. If it be said that Dearth is a witness for the defendants and may not be willing to give his affidavit, the plaintiffs could at least apply to him for it and for the paper referred to, and ought to do it. Another difficulty here is that Dearth, as the witness for the other side, has in the other trial been attempted to be discredited, and represented as unworthy of full belief; and it is well settled that the newly discovered testimony must not come from a person unworthy of credit. Williams v. Baldwin, 18 Johns. 489; Pomeroy v. Columbian Ins. Co., 2 Caines, 260.

In the next place, the newly discovered evidence must not be merely cumulative evidence. 8 Johns. 84; 15 Johns. 210; 2 Caines, 129; 6 Pick. 114, 116; 10 Pick. 16; Alsop v. Commercial Ins. Co. [Case No. 262.] It must not be, as here, to old points, and of the like kind before adduced at the trial, but of a new description or to new points. Guyott v. Butts, 4 Wend. 579; 3 A. K. Marsh. 104.

Upon the whole, the inclination in my mind, in this as in the other case, is also not to disturb what the jury have settled, unless a very strong and clear ground is made out; and especially where another trial of this case would probably be so doubtful and speculative in its result, as well as in its equities,—looking to the experience which the court has already had in the long litigation about the supplies to the ship Corinthian.

It interests the republic that there should be an end to litigation as soon as may be. It saves enormous expenses and social strifes, and the temptation to a host of perjuries. If a proper case was made out here for a new trial, on the ground of newly discovered evidence, it could be only on the condition that all the costs of the former trials be first paid by the plaintiffs. So far as regards that, the expense and cost already incurred are justly chargeable upon the party making the motion for a new trial, on this ground, as it is he who asks the favor, and it is he who has thus far failed to obtain and offer evidence sufficient to sustain his case. Boswell v. Jones, 1 Wash. [Va.] 322; 3 Rand. [Va.] 52; Weak v. Callaway, 7 Price, 677. A new trial, then, would probably cost more than it is really worth, considering the difficulties and doubts and contradictions which have surrounded this controversy from the start. Sometimes there may be a new trial as to a particular fact,—separately, and not affecting other matter,—where the ruling was wrong as to some of the evidence, or if the newly discovered evidence relates to a single distinct matter. Robbins v. Townsend, 20 Pick. 351; 12 Pick. 287. (See Morris v. State, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 37. The whole trial must be on the whole case.) But nothing of that kind is here feasible, if a case was well made out in relation to either ground.

As this whole case is surrounded, and has been from the start, with difficulties, both as to facts and the law, and as the verdict seems to accord with the apparent justice of the case, and there is no objection in law clearly made out against it, I am unwilling to disturb it. Possibly there may have been an error, and possibly some facts exist which are not in the case now; but as these, if put into it, would not on another trial be likely, materially, to change the aspect of it, let there be entered judgment on the verdict.

MADDEN (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 15,705.

MADDEN (WELD v.). See Case No. 17,373.

Case No. 8,933a.

MADDING v. PEYTON.

[Hempst. 192.] [1]

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. July, 1832.

WRIT—JUSTICE OF PEACE—PROOF—VARIANCE.

Where the summons of the justice of the peace describes the cause of action as a "note of hand," a "bond" or "writing obligatory" cannot be received in evidence, for it is variant from the summons.

Appeal from circuit court, Hot Springs county.

[This was an action by Absalom Madding against John Peyton for breach of contract.]

Before ESKRIDGE and CROSS, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This suit was commenced before a justice of the peace for Hot Springs county, upon the following writ: "Territory of Arkansas, County of Hot Springs, Hunter Township, United States of America, to the Constable of Hunter Township, Greeting: Summons John Peyton to appear before me, justice of the peace, on the thirty-first day of the present month, at my dwelling-house in said township, between the hours of ten in the forenoon and three o'clock in the afternoon of the said day, to answer unto Absalom Madding in an action on a note of hand. Given under my hand and seal this 23d day of August, 1831. (Signed) John Williams, J. P." (Seal.) On the 31st of August, the parties appeared, and after hearing the evidence, the justice rendered a judgment against the defendant Peyton, in favor of the plaintiff Madding, for $14.75; from which the defendant prayed an appeal. At the July term of the Hot Springs circuit court, the parties appeared by their attorneys, and neither party requiring a jury, the cause was submitted to the court. On the trial in the circuit court, the plaintiff having offered in evidence, in support of his action, the following writing obligatory, to wit: "Washington, Nov., 1831. On or before the first day of December next, I promise to pay A. Madding fourteen dollars and seventy-five cents, which may be discharged in good merchantable seed cotton, delivered in Barkman's or Collins' gin, for value received. Witness my hand and seal. (Signed) John Peyton." (Seal.) The defendant, by his counsel, moved the court to exclude the said writing obligatory from being given in evidence, which motion the court sustained, and thereupon rendered a judgment for the defendant; to which opinion the plaintiff excepted, and filed his bill of exceptions. The only question for the consideration of this court is, whether the circuit court erred in excluding the writing obligatory from being given in evidence. This will depend upon a fair construction of the statute regulating the collection of "small debts." The first section of the small debt law provides, that the summons shall set forth the true cause of action, whether founded on bond, bill, note, book account, or promise. The summons, in the case before the court, describes the cause of action to be a note. A note is the evidence of debt in writing, not under seal. The instrument of writing excluded from being given in evidence by the circuit court, is a bond, or writing obligatory,—an evidence of debt in writing under seal. The object of requiring the true cause of action to be set forth in the summons is, to apprise the defendant of the charge which he is called upon to answer, in order that he may be prepared to make his defence. The writing offered in evidence, in the circuit court, being in legal acceptation and operation totally different from that described in the summons, and constituting an altogether different ground of action, was very properly excluded from being given in evidence. This court is disposed to sustain, whenever it is possible, proceedings had before a justice of the peace, knowing the great inconvenience which would result to the country from requiring formal correctness in their proceedings. Judgment affirmed.

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

MADDOX (HOLMEAD v.). See Case No. 6,629.

MADDOX (NEVITT v.). See Case No. 10,139.

Case No. 8,934.

MADDOX v. STEWART.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 523.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1824.

COURTS—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT—CREDIT TO REDUCE—ASSENT PRESUMED—JUSTICE OF PEACE—APPEAL FROM.

1. If a creditor gives a credit upon his account so as to bring it within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, and if the debtor does not object to the credit before the justice, his assent to the credit will be presumed.

2. No appeal lies from the judgment of a justice of the peace rendered upon the verdict of a jury.

Appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace, upon the verdict of a jury.

[This was a suit by W. R. Maddox against Archibald Stewart.]

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra) dismissed the appeal, upon the ground that a fact once tried by a jury cannot be reëxamined otherwise than according to the rules of the common law. (See the seventh amendment to the constitution of the United States.) And that a second trial by jury in another court is not according to the rules of the common law.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

J. Dunlop, for appellant, contended that it appeared, by the account on which the judgment was rendered, that the appellee had given a credit "by gift, &c. &c." so as to leave a balance of $50, and bring his claim within the jurisdiction of the justice; which he had no right to do.

Mr. Key, contra. That was done before application was made to the justice for the warrant, and the appellant at the trial did not object to it, except that it was for too small a sum. Mr. Key cited the case of Porter v. Rapine [Case No. 11,288], in this court, at June term, 1812, in which it appeared that Rapine had released $6.85 of his claim so as to give jurisdiction to the magistrate, who gave judgment for $20; and this court affirmed the judgment, as it did not appear that the appellant had objected to the credit before the justice.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, mentioned the case of Cazenove v. Darrell [Id. 2,539], in Alexandria, in which the creditor had given a credit in order to bring his claim within the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace. The debtors objected to the credit before the justice; and this court decided that the creditor could not, without the consent of the debtor, release a part of the debt for that purpose.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion that as the appellant, in the present case, did not object to the credit before the justice, his assent may now be presumed; and that therefore the justice had jurisdiction of the cause.

Case No. 8,935.

MADDOX v. THORNTON.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 260.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1821.

CONSIDERATION—IMMORAL—TRAINING RACE-HORSE.

The feeding and training a race-horse is not an immoral consideration, and will support an assumpsit to pay for the same.

Mr. Law, for defendant, contended that the feeding and training the defendant's race-horse, for the worth of which this action was brought, was an immoral consideration, and within the reason of the decision of this court in the case of Holmead v. Maddox [Case No. 6,629], at December term, 1818.

Mr. Jones, contra.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting) said that this case did not come up to that. The horse might be training for a private race; or no race might be run, &c.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 8,936.

MADDUX v. USHER.

[2 Hask. 261.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1878.

SALE—ORDER—FOR CASH—CONDITION PRECEDENT—FORWARDING GOODS—ATTACHED—TITLE—AVERMENT OF CITIZENSHIP—AMENDMENT.

1. An order, "Please ship me at once 25 bbls. same whiskey I had before," is an order for a cash sale.

2. A reply, "Please find enclosed our invoice for 25 pkgs., shipped you this day as ordered, also our draft for amount of invoice which please accept and return," is not an acceptance of such order, but a proposed sale, upon condition that the draft be first accepted; and the person giving the order, after notice of the condition imposed, can acquire no title to the goods afterwards received, unless the proposed condition is complied with.

3. The fact of forwarding the goods before compliance with the terms of sale by the purchaser is not necessarily a waiver of the conditions of sale.

4. It is a question of fact for the jury to say under all the circumstances, whether the vendor so conducted as to waive conditions of sale, that he may have imposed.

5. A vendor may replevy his goods from a United States marshal who attached them as the property of a supposed purchaser, when he has not complied with the conditions of such sale, and they have not been waived.

6. A defective averment of the citizenship of parties may be amended after verdict.

Replevin, by [William B. Maddux and others] citizens of Ohio against [Roland G. Usher] the United States marshal for the district of Massachusetts, to recover goods that he had attached as the property of a merchant in Boston, who claimed to have purchased the same of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs alleged the proposed sale by them to have been upon condition precedent that had neither been complied with nor waived, and that they had not parted with their title to the goods. The verdict was for the plaintiffs, whereupon the defendant filed a motion for a new trial for misdirection, and because the verdict was against law and evidence.

Morse, Stone & Greenough, for plaintiffs.

Avery & Hobbs, for defendant.

Before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and FOX, District Judge.

FOX, District Judge. In January, 1875, J. M. Demarest was a wholesale liquor dealer, in Boston; he had purchased from an agent of the plaintiffs, who resided in Cincinnati, a quantity of whiskey, and, on the sixteenth of January, wrote to the plaintiffs, "Please ship me at once twenty-five barrels same whiskey I had before. I have not seen your Mr. Montgomery lately, or would have ordered through him." To this the plaintiffs replied, "Cincinnati, January 21, 1875: Mr. J. M. Demarest: With this you will please find enclosed our invoice, at lowest rate, for twenty-five packages shipped to you this day as ordered in your favor of sixteenth; also, find enclosed our draft for amount of invoice, which please accept and return. Thanking you for the order, &c." The whiskey reached Boston some days after the receipt of this letter by Demarest; he never accepted the draft, but did take possession of the whiskey, which, with the exception of one or two barrels, was shortly after attached by defendant, the marshal of this district, on a writ against Demarest, returnable to this court, and the present action of replevin was instituted for its recovery. On the trial, the jury were instructed that, upon the written documents, the sale of the twenty-five barrels of whiskey to Demarest by plaintiffs was upon the condition of his payment therefor by his acceptance of the draft. To this instruction the defendant's counsel excepts.

[1] [Reported by Thomas Hawes Haskell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Demarest's order was for a cash sale, and if it had been accepted as written, and the goods forwarded in compliance therewith, the sale would have been for cash, and he would not have been entitled to any credit; but it is manifest that the plaintiffs did not accept and act upon this offer of Demarest; but, instead thereof, for reasons best known to themselves, they declined to sell for cash, and forwarded him a sixty days' draft enclosed with the same letter with the invoice and other documents, which draft they requested him to accept and return. Demarest's proposal was not accepted, and the goods were not delivered to the railroad in compliance with his offer; but the plaintiffs substituted entirely new and different terms of sale, which, of course, they were fully authorized to do. It is said the language of the letter of the plaintiffs does not, in express terms impose, as a condition of the sale, the return of the draft accepted by Demarest; but considering the brevity and conciseness of the correspondence, we are of opinion its legal signification was to impose upon the sale this condition. After informing Demarest that they had that day shipped the goods, they enclose invoice and draft in the letter, and state therein, "find enclosed our draft for amount, which please accept and return." This surely was not a sale for cash; but on the contrary, it is manifest that, while in other respects they accepted the proposal of Demarest, they, instead of cash, required an acceptance in payment; and when we remember the informal manner in which mercantile correspondence is conducted, we think it a reasonable construction of the language here used, to hold that both parties must have understood that the contract required that the payment for the merchandise should be made by a return of the draft duly accepted. While the plaintiffs might, in precise terms, have informed Demarest that they declined his offer, and would not sell the merchandise to him except on condition of his acceptance of the draft, such formal language is hardly to be expected in business transactions; and their sending him the draft and other documents on the same day they shipped the whiskey may well, in connection with the letter, be considered as equivalent to a direct assertion that the sale would depend upon such condition being performed.

It is said that the merchandise was delivered to the railroad before the plaintiffs wrote their letter to Demarest of January twenty-first, and that such delivery was, in law, a delivery to Demarest, and cannot afterwards be controlled by subsequent acts of the plaintiffs; but in our view, the plaintiffs not having accepted Demarest's proposal for a cash sale, the action of the plaintiffs in shipping the merchandise must be examined entirely independent of Demarest's previous offer, and in no way to be influenced thereby. Conceding that that offer was declined, so far as the plaintiffs' rights are involved, it is as though it had never been made. They might, if they chose, send goods of that description to Demarest on just such conditions as they thought most for their interest; and if Demarest received the goods after he was informed of the conditions upon which the plaintiffs had forwarded them, he must be held to have agreed to those conditions, and could acquire no title without compliance therewith.

The argument of defendant's counsel proceeds upon the theory that plaintiffs, having first accepted Demarest's offer, and placed the goods on the cars to be forwarded to Demarest, afterwards, on the same day, changed their purpose; but the conclusive answer to this is, that there is no evidence that plaintiffs ever accepted Demarest's proposal; on the contrary, it is clear, beyond question, that they never accepted his offer, but substituted terms essentially different, upon which they forwarded the goods to him, taking care to advise him, before the reception of the goods, of these terms, and leaving it to his option whether he would or not, on those terms, complete the purchase. All that took place in Cincinnati on January twenty-first were parts of one transaction, carrying out a proposed sale by the plaintiffs to Demarest; and the court would not be justified in selecting a single act of the parties, and hold them concluded thereby in manifest contravention of the intent of the plaintiffs, as fully communicated to the purchaser.

The language of Lord Westbury in Shepherd v. Harrison, L. R. 5 H. L. 116, is quite applicable to the present case. In that case, a bill of lading for goods and a bill of exchange to be accepted in payment were forwarded to a party, and, as in the present instance, he received the goods under the bill of lading, but refused to accept the bill of exchange. The learned judge there says, on page 130: "I think the truth of the case was this; that the two documents were originally intended to be dependent, the one on the other, and that they were sent together, under the conviction and in the confidence that the bill of exchange would be accepted and returned to the sender in consideration of the bill of lading. That, however, was not done, and therefore I take it that the bill of lading acquired in that manner gave no right of property to the appellant." Lord Cairns, in the same case, page 133, says: "I, therefore, think that, when one merchant in this country sends to another, under circumstances like the present, a bill of lading and a bill of exchange, it is not at all necessary for him to say in words, we require you to take notice that our object in enclosing these bills of lading and bills of exchange is, that before you use the bills of lading you shall accept the bills of exchange. Merchants know perfectly well what they mean when they express themselves, not in the language of lawyers, but in the language of courteous mercantile communication; and I do not think that any merchant in England, receiving a bill of lading and a bill of exchange under these circumstances, when he came to reflect on the matter, would feel any doubt that he could not retain the one without accepting the other. * * I believe that * * what took place in Liverpool did not vest the property in him (the plaintiff), but the property remained in the shippers."

When the sale is on condition that the purchaser should send his notes in payment, and the condition is not performed, no title vests in the purchaser. Coggill v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co., 3 Gray, 545; Hirschorn v. Canney, 98 Mass. 149.

A distinction is attempted to be drawn between a delivery of goods to a railroad and receiving therefor the common railroad receipt, and a delivery on board of a vessel, to be carried, and a bill of lading taken therefor. If it is admitted that such a distinction exists when the ship is not a common carrier, it is not applicable to the present case, as the delivery to the railroad was conditional and not absolute; the delivery, being only one act in the consummation of the sale on the twenty-first, is not to control the other branches of the contract, by one of which, this condition of payment by the acceptance was imposed on the purchaser.

The question whether there was any waiver of the condition by the delivery to the carrier was submitted to the jury, under the instructions, "that ordinarily, if a party makes a sale upon condition, and delivers the property without any understanding in reference to the continuance of the condition, this would be construed as a waiver of the condition, and it would be a presumption of law, that, if he delivered the article without any understanding between him and the buyer that the condition should continue, he intended to waive the condition. If the delivery is unaccompanied by any act, word, or circumstance, to indicate that it is qualified, or made subject to the condition, the purchaser has a right to understand that the condition is waived. The fact that the goods were actually forwarded or delivered to the purchaser, before a compliance with the terms of sale, is not necessarily a waiver of the conditions of sale. It is enough to enable the sender to retain his title to the goods, if it appears that it was the understanding of the parties, at the time of the delivery, that the condition of payment or security was not waived, though there was no express declaration to that effect at the time. The question of waiver is, therefore, a question of fact for the jury, and may be proved by declarations, acts and circumstances attending the delivery. Did the plaintiffs so deal with the property that they must be held to have waived the payment by acceptance of their draft? And had Demarest the right to understand, from what they did, that they waived this condition, and that the title to the property, by its being forwarded as it was, became Demarest's absolutely, without his acceptance of the draft?"

These instructions were substantially extracts from opinions found in the later Massachusetts decisions, and no objection is made thereto; but it is suggested in argument that upon the documentary evidence it was for the court to determine the question of waiver, as a matter of law. The answer to this suggestion is, that there was other testimony upon this point besides the documents, especially that given by one of the plaintiffs as a witness, which was not in all respects consistent, some portions tending to establish a waiver, whilst in other portions, this was strongly denied.

It is claimed that the plaintiffs have mistaken their remedy; that replevin can not be maintained against the marshal; and reference is made to Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 450, in support of this objection. The cases are essentially different. In Freeman v. Howe, the defendant, as marshal of this district, had in his possession, under legal process, the property which the plaintiff undertook by process issued from the state court to replevin from his possession; and it was decided that the state courts could not take from the marshal property in his custody under the authority of the circuit court; there could not be a conflict of jurisdiction. In the present controversy between citizens of different states, which confers upon the circuit court jurisdiction, the plaintiffs have replevined in this court, the property held by the marshal of the court, under attachment on a writ returnable to, and pending in the same court. Instead of any conflict of different tribunals therefor, the plaintiffs appeal to the same tribunal which has directed the attachment, and invoke its assistance in determining the validity of the attachment and the plaintiffs' title to the property thus seized by the marshal on his precept from this court.

Such had been the practice prior to Freeman v. Howe [supra], as in Harris v. De Wolf, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 147, the supreme court of the United States sustained a judgment in replevin against the marshal of the Massachusetts district, recovered in the circuit court, for property attached by him on a writ returnable before the circuit court. The case is in all these points identical with the present. Freeman v. Howe proceeds throughout upon the principle that the courts of the United States, having authorized an attachment, alone are to determine whether the possession acquired by the marshal is valid and shall remain, and declares that other tribunals cannot be allowed to disturb the possession thus acquired, and take from him the property; but it is most clearly affirmed in the same opinion, that it is the duty of the federal courts to afford to the real owners of the property, so attached, complete and appropriate remedies, and to direct a restoration to the true owner of that to which he shall be entitled. The court so authorizing an attachment is not restricted to a single remedy; but the aggrieved party may well avail himself of any remedy known to the law, which will more effectually protect his rights, and by which the federal courts may, according to well-established principles, determine the legal rights of the respective parties.

In Freeman v. Howe, it is said that a bill might be filed on the equity side of the court, to prevent injustice or an inequitable advantage under mesne or final process, it not being an original suit, but auxiliary and dependent, and could be maintained without reference to the citizenship or residence of the parties. In that case, such a remedy could alone be resorted to, as an action at common law could not be maintained in the circuit court, on account of the parties being both citizens of Massachusetts, a difficulty not presented in the present case. A right to redress being thus acknowledged by the supreme court, and Mr. Justice Nelson, having in his opinion pointed out the remedy which the party in that case might avail himself of, we hold that, when the case is different, and one in which the common law has for hundreds of years provided a remedy, a party may well avail himself of it, provided he seeks his remedy before the tribunal having the custody of his property.

In Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 334, it was held that an action of trespass might be sustained in a state court against the marshal for an attachment made on a writ returnable to the circuit court, recognizing the authority of the state tribunals to hold the marshal accountable for the value of the property he may have wrongfully attached, provided his possession is not disturbed by process from the state tribunals. In Buck v. Colbath, [supra], Mr. Justice Miller, referring to the suggestion found in Freeman v. Howe that the owner could resort to a bill in equity, on page 345, says: "The proceeding here alluded to is one unusual in any court, and is only to be resorted to in the federal courts in extraordinary cases where it is essential to prevent injustice by an abuse of the process of the court, which cannot otherwise be remedied." The remedy in this tribunal which the common law afforded the plaintiffs, prevents all necessity for any resort to the unusual proceeding suggested by the learned justice. See Matthews v. Densmore, 109 U. S. 216, 3 Sup. Ct. 126.

Replevin has always been maintained in the state courts against the sheriff for property attached by him on writs from state tribunals. Scores of instances can be found in the digests of decisions in every one of the states; and we discern no valid reason why the same practice should not be sanctioned in the federal courts against their officers, if they have wrongfully attached another's property.

It is urged that the citizenship of the parties is not properly averred in the writ. It appears that they are citizens of different states, and in a number of similar instances at the present term, the court has allowed amendments to be made conformable to the truth, so that the citizenship may properly appear on the record, and the proposed amendment, filed June nineteenth, is allowed.

Motion overruled. Judgment on the verdict.

MADEGAN (LARRIVIERE v.). See Case No. 8,096.

MADEIRA, The. See Case No. 501.

MADISON (NELSON v.). See Case No. 10,110.

Case No. 8,937.

MADISON MUT. INS. CO. v. ECKER et al.

[3 Chi. Leg. News, 233; 13 Int. Rev. Rec. 135.]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. March, 1871.

INSURANCE COMPANY—STATE REGULATIONS—BOND OF AGENT—PREMIUMS—ACTION FOR.

1. Held, where the agent of a foreign insurance company had given a bond that he would faithfully account and pay over to the said company all moneys that should be paid to him belonging to said company, and in all things honestly discharge the duties of an agent of said company, that an action could not be sustained on said bond against the sureties to recover money collected by said agent for premiums, after the company had failed to comply with the state law by obtaining a renewal of their certificate.

2. After the company had failed to comply with the state law, a note given for premiums could not be enforced against the maker unless, perhaps, it was in the hands of a bona fide holder for value.

[This was an action by the Madison Mutual Insurance Company against George A. Ecker and others.]

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The plaintiff, a foreign insurance company, has sued to recover damages for a breach of the bond executed by the defendant, Ecker, at the time of his appointment as agent of the company in this state. The jury returned a special verdict.

The condition of the bond is, "that Ecker shall faithfully account to and pay to the said company all moneys that shall be paid to him, belonging to said company, and shall in all things honestly discharge the duties of an agent of the said company." There is no doubt about the breach of the condition of the bond, and the only defense relied upon by the sureties to defeat a recovery for the larger amount found by the jury is, that the receipt of money premiums and notes by Ecker, and the issuing of policies was in violation of title 6, c. 34, Rev. St. Minn. This statute in terms declares (section 114), "That it shall not be lawful for any agent of any insurance company, incorporated by any other state than the state of Minnesota, directly or indirectly, to take any risks, or transact any business of fire insurance in this state without such company has first obtained a certificate of authority from the state treasurer, and before obtaining such certificate, such fire insurance company shall furnish said treasurer with a statement," etc. Section 121 requires that this statement shall be renewed annually in the month of January of each year, and applies all the restrictions of the previous section upon the transaction of business by the company. Section 125 affixes imprisonment and fine as a penalty for a violation of the act.

The plaintiff had complied with the law previous to January, 1867, but had transacted business through this agent until June following, without obtaining any renewal of the certificate in accordance with the law. The sureties urge that they are not responsible for any delinquencies of Ecker while illegally transacting business. It is not doubted that any transaction of the business of fire insurance after January, 1867, was unlawful, and the participation of the agent in such business was a fraudulent act, but it is urged that there is nothing in the statute declaring that the contracts of insurance are void. The counsel for the plaintiff claims that the policies issued are valid and binding undertakings—the moneys received by the agent belonged to his principal, and a conversion of them to his own use or failure to pay them over, created a breach of the bond which would fix the liability of the parties thereto. Ecker could not excuse his failure by setting up the illegality of his acts in taking applications for insurance, procuring the policies, delivering them to the insured and receiving the premiums. Nor can his sureties avail themselves of this defense, inasmuch as the conversion by Ecker is in no manner connected with the illegal act of transacting the insurance business.

These propositions are urged with great force, but in our opinion are not applicable upon a fair construction of the act regulating foreign insurance companies. It will be observed that this statute required the company to do certain things as a condition precedent of transacting business in the state, and is not merely directory. This condition the state had a right to impose, and the plaintiff was bound to conform to the law in all its provisions. Not having done so, sound public policy would seem to require that the wrong doer should not, as against the sureties of the agent, recover. They undertook to answer for the acts of the agent within the legitimate scope of his authority, and their engagement was not intended to embrace any acts done by him contrary to law.

The contract of insurance being prohibited by the statute, it would be a legal conclusion that any note given for premiums could not be enforced against the maker unless, perhaps, it was in the hands of a bona fide holder for value. See 11 Wis. 394; 3 Gray, 215, 500. Clearly, therefore, in this case the plaintiff could not have been injured by a failure to turn over the premium notes, notwithstanding the rule adopted by the company holding the agent responsible for the face of all premium notes not delivered to them within a specified time. The case of Daniel v. Barney, 22 Ind. 207, in many particulars resembles this case, and the reasoning of the learned judge commends itself to our judgment.

The plaintiff will have a judgment for the amount received by Ecker previous to January, 1867.

Case No. 8,938.

MADISON & P. R. CO. v. WISCONSIN et al.[1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Wisconsin. Oct. 28, 1879.

RAILROAD LAND GRANTS—CONTINUITY OF LINE—SELECTION OF INDEMNITY LANDS—COTERMINOUS PRINCIPLE—ESTOPPEL AND FORFEITURE—OVERLAPPING GRANTS.

[1. By the act of June 3, 1856 (11 Stat. 20), lands (defined in the usual manner by grant and indemnity limits) were granted to the state of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a railroad "from Madison or Columbus, by way of Portage City to the St. Croix river or lake, between townships 25 and 31, and from thence to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield." Prior to May 5, 1864, the entire line was located, but none of it was constructed except the part between Portage and Tomah, a distance of 61 miles. On the latter date congress passed another act, which, in the first section, granted lands to aid in the construction of a railroad "from a point on the St. Croix river or lake, between townships 25 and 31, to the west end of Lake Superior," and from some point on that line to Bayfield. In the second section a grant was made for a railroad "from Tomah to the St. Croix river or lake, between townships 25 and 31. Held, that while the first act was probably intended to create one continuous road from Madison to the west end of Lake Superior and Bayfield, the later act unquestionably operated to break the continuity of this line at the St. Croix river, and create two separate roads; and hence that no deficiencies of lands within the grant limits of one road could be made up by selections from the indemnity limits of the other, unless a vested right thereto had accrued prior to the act of 1864.]

[1] [Not previously reported.]

[2. The act of 1856 provided, in the fourth section, that in disposing of the lands there should be sold in the beginning a quantity not exceeding 120 sections, to be included within a continuous length of 20 miles; and that when 20 continuous miles of road was completed, a like quantity might be sold. The act of 1864, however, provided, in section 7, that when 20 continuous miles of road were completed, patents might issue for the lands earned "on each side of the road, as far as completed, and coterminous with said completed section, not exceeding the amount" prescribed by the act. Held, that whatever might be the construction of the act of 1856, it was beyond question that, under the act of 1864, the selections of lieu lands must be made on the coterminous principle, and that a company constructing any given 20 miles of road could not supply deficiencies by selections from the indemnity limits along some other part constructed by a different company.]

[3. By the act of 1856, the "place" or "grant" limits were fixed at 6 miles on each side of the road, and the "indemnity" limits at 15 miles. Under the act of 1864, however, the place limits were 10 miles and the indemnity limits 12 miles, but from the lands thus granted there was to be "deducted" all the lands granted by the act of 1856, and no selections were to be made in lieu of lands granted by that act. The grant was to be "upon the same terms and conditions as are contained" in the act of 1856. Held, that the act of 1864 did not recognize and require the enforcement of the provisions of the act of 1856, as to all lands granted thereby, but rather it made a new grant, which included the lands to which no vested right had yet accrued under the previous act, together with enough additional lands to extend the place and indemnity limits to 10 and 20 miles, respectively, and then applied the coterminous principle to the whole.]

[4. A company which accepted from the state a grant of lands for the construction of the road from Tomah to the St. Croix river, upon the same conditions and restrictions as were imposed by the act of 1864, and also accepted from congress the benefit of a subsequent joint resolution extending the time allowed by that act for the completion of the road, as well as certificates from the governor showing the completion of two sections of the road, was, by these repeated recognitions of the act of 1864, estopped from claiming lands except upon the coterminous principle, and hence could assert no right to make up deficiencies by selecting lands beyond its terminal points, and within the limits granted to other companies, which had already commenced the work of construction under the act of 1864.]

[5. A company which accepted from the state a grant for the construction of part of the line upon condition that the same should be completed within a given time, but failed to fulfill the condition, for which reason a forfeiture was declared by the legislature, could not, merely by doing certain grading, have acquired any vested rights in the land such as would prevent the operation of the forfeiture.]

[6. The acceptance by the state of the grant made by the act of congress of 1864, with its condition requiring the lands to be disposed of upon the coterminous principle, operated of itself, and without any formal act of forfeiture, to cut off any claim to lands beyond the terminus of its own road made by a company which, prior to the act of 1864, had violated the conditions upon which the state had granted lands to it.]

[7. Under the acts of congress the grants were of sections of land in place, as they existed on the ground, so that if any of these sections were fractional, the state could not make up the deficiency from lands in the indemnity limits, because, as to the lands in place, the acts operate directly by specific description. But, where there were not lands in place to meet the calls of the grants, whether the deficiency were more or less, it was competent to supply it by sections from the indemnity limits; or, if there were parts of sections of the lands in place excluded from the grant by the terms of the acts, it was competent to supply the deficiency from the indemnity limits by a similar legal subdivision of land.]

[8. It seems that where contemporaneous grants are made to different companies, whose roads approach each other so that the grants overlap, such companies are to be regarded as tenants in common, without regard to which company first constructs its road.]

[This was a bill by the Madison and Portage Railroad Company against the treasurer of the state of Wisconsin, the West Wisconsin Railway Company, the Wisconsin Railroad Farm Mortgage Land Company, the North Wisconsin Railway Company, the Chicago, Portage & Superior Railway Company, and the Wisconsin Central Railway Company. Cross bills were filed by various defendants. The purpose of the litigation was to determine the conflicting claims of the various parties to certain lands granted by congress to the state of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in that state.]

HARLAN, Circuit Justice. By the first section of the act of congress, approved June 3, 1856, granting public lands to aid in the construction of railroads in the state of Wisconsin, there was granted to that state, "for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from Madison or Columbus, by way of Portage City, to the St. Croix river or lake, between townships 25 and 31, and from thence to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield, and also from Fond du Lac, on Lake Winnebago, northerly to the state line, every alternate section of land, designated by odd numbers, for six sections in width, on each side of said roads respectively." "But," the act declares, "in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the lines or routes of said roads are definitely fixed, sold any sections or parts thereof granted as aforesaid, or that the right of pre-emption has attached to the same, then it shall be lawful for any agent or agents, to be appointed by the governor of said state, to select, subject to the approval of the secretary of the interior, from the lands of the United States nearest to the tier of sections above specified, as much land in alternate sections or parts of sections as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of pre-emption has attached as aforesaid, which lands (thus selected in lieu of those sold and to which pre-emption has attached as aforesaid, together with the sections or parts of sections designated by odd numbers as aforesaid and appropriated as aforesaid) shall be held by the state of Wisconsin for the use and purpose aforesaid; provided, that the lands to be so located shall in no case be further than fifteen miles from the line of the roads in each case, and selected for and on account of said roads; provided, further, that the lands hereby granted shall be exclusively applied in the construction of that road for which it was granted and selected and shall be disposed of only as the work progresses, and the same shall be applied to no other purpose whatsoever; and provided further, that any and all lands reserved to the United States by any act of congress, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or in any manner for any purpose whatsoever, be, and the same are hereby reserved to the United States from the operation of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the route of said railroads through said reserved lands, in which case the right of way only shall be granted, subject to the approval of the president of the United States." The second section provides that the sections and parts of sections of land which, by such grant, remained to the United States, within six miles on each side of said roads, should not be sold for less than double the minimum price of the public lands when sold, nor should they become subject to private entry until the same had been offered at public sale at the increased price. By the fourth section it is declared that the lands granted should not be disposed of by the state, except in the following manner: That a quantity of land not exceeding 120 sections, and included within a continuous length of 20 miles of roads, respectively, might be sold; and when the governor of the state should certify to the secretary of the interior that any 20 consecutive miles of either of said roads were completed, "then another like quantity of land" thereby granted might be sold, and so from time to time until the roads are completed. If the roads were not completed within ten years, the act provided that no further sales should be made, and the unsold lands should revert to the United States. The lands, rights and privileges thus granted were, on 8th October, 1856, formally accepted by the state upon the terms, conditions, and restrictions contained in the act of congress, and the state assumed and undertook the trust thereby created.

On 11th October, 1856, the state, by an act on that day approved [Gen. Acts Wis. p. 217], authorized the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company, a corporation created by the laws of Wisconsin, to construct and operate the roads described in the act of congress from Madison and Columbus, via Portage City, to St. Croix river and lake, and from thence to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield; and for the purpose of aiding such construction the state granted to that company all its interest and estate, present and prospective, in or to the lands granted by the act of June 3, 1856, for the construction of the railroad between the points and along the routes just named, together with all the rights, privileges, and immunities conferred or intended to be conferred by the act of congress. Prior to May 5, 1864, no portion of the entire route from Madison, via Portage City and St. Croix river or lake, to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield, had been completed, except the line between Portage and Tomah, a distance of 61 miles; that part of the line was constructed in the years 1857 and 1858, and ever since April, 1858, has been in use for freight and passenger trains.

On May 5, 1864 [13 Stat. 66], congress passed an act "granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the state of Wisconsin." Since the rights of parties to this litigation depend chiefly, if not altogether, upon the construction and effect which may be given to that act, it is necessary to refer at some length to its provisions. By the first section it is declared "that there be and is hereby granted to the state of Wisconsin, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from a point on the St. Croix river or lake, between townships 25 and 31 to the west end of Lake Superior, and from some point on the line of said road, to be selected by said state, to Bayfield, every alternate section of public land designated by odd numbers, for ten sections in width on each side of said road, deducting any and all lands that may have been granted to the state of Wisconsin for the same purpose by the act of congress of June 3d, 1856, upon the same terms and conditions as are contained in the act granting lands to the state of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said state, approved June 3d, 1856." "But," the act provides, "in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line or route of said road is definitely fixed, sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of any sections or parts thereof, granted as aforesaid, or that the right of pre-emption or homestead has attached to the same, then it shall be lawful for any agent or agents, to be appointed by said company to select, subject to the approval of the secretary of the interior, from the public lands of the United States nearest to the tier of sections above specified, as much land in alternate sections or parts of sections as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of pre-emption or homestead has attached as aforesaid, which lands (thus selected in lieu of those sold, and to which pre-emption or homestead right has attached as aforesaid, together with sections and parts of sections designated by odd numbers as aforesaid, and appropriated as aforesaid) shall be held by said state for the use and purpose aforesaid; provided that the lands to be so located shall in no case be further than 20 miles from the line of the said roads, nor shall such selection or location be made in lieu of lands received under the said grant of June 3d, 1856, but such selection and location may be made for the benefit of said state, and for the purpose aforesaid, to supply any deficiency under the said grant of June 3d, 1856." By the second section of the act, a grant in similar terms, and upon like conditions as to the selection of lands in lieu of sections or parts of sections appearing, when the line or route of the road shall have been definitely fixed, to have been sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of, was made to the state for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from Tomah to the St. Croix river or lake, between sections 25 and 31, of "every alternate section of public land designated by odd numbers, for ten sections in width on each side of said roads, deducting any and all lands that may have been granted to the state of Wisconsin, for the same purpose by the act of congress granting lands to said state to aid in the construction of certain railroads, approved June 3, 1856, upon the same terms and conditions as are contained in the said act of June 3, 1856." By the third section of the act, and upon like conditions as to the selection of lieu lands (except that no reference was made to deductions of lands granted by or received under the act of June 3, 1856), there was granted to the state, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Portage City, Berlin, Doty's Island, or Fond du Lac, as the state might determine, to Bayfield, and thence to Superior, on Lake Superior, "every alternate section of public land, designated by odd numbers, for ten sections in width on each side of said road, upon the same terms and conditions as are contained in the act granting lands to said state to aid in the construction of railroads in said state, approved June 3, 1856." Section 4 declares that the sections and parts of sections of land remaining to the United States, within 10 miles on each side of said roads, shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of the public lands when sold; nor should any of the said reserved lands become subject to private entry until the same shall have been first offered at public sale at the increased price. By section 5 it is provided that the time fixed and limited for the completion of the roads in the act of June 3, 1856, was extended to a period of five years from and after May 5, 1864. Section 6 is similar to the last proviso of section 1 of the act of June 3, 1856. By section 7 it was declared that, whenever there was "completed 20 consecutive miles of any portion of said railroads, supplied with all necessary drains, culverts, viaducts, crossings, sidings, bridges, turnouts, watering places, depots, equipments, furniture, and all other appurtenances of a first-class railroad, patents shall issue conveying the right and title to said lands to the said company entitled thereto, on each side of the road, as far as the same is completed and coterminous with said completed section, not exceeding the amount aforesaid, and patents shall in like manner issue as each 20 miles of said road is completed; provided, however, that no patents shall issue for any of said lands unless there shall be presented to the secretary of the interior a statement, verified on oath or affirmation by the president of said company, and certified by the governor of the state of Wisconsin, that such 20 miles have been completed in the manner required by this act, and setting forth with certainty the points where such 20 miles begin and where the same end; which oath shall be taken before a judge of a court of record of the United States." The eighth section declares that the lands granted by that act shall, when patented as provided in the seventh section, be subject to disposal, for the purposes stated in the act, and for no other, and the railroads should be and remain public highways for the use of the government of the United States, free from all toll or other charge, for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States. The ninth and only remaining section provides that, if the road mentioned in the third section is not completed within 10 years from the passage of the act, as provided therein, no further patents should be issued to the company for such lands, no further sales should be made, and the lands unsold should revert to the United States.

On the 20th March, 1865, the lands granted by the act of May 5, 1864, were accepted by the state, "subject however, to all the conditions of said act of congress," and the state consented "to execute the said trust, created by the aforesaid act of congress, pursuant in all things, to the terms, limitations, and conditions of said act." The secretary of state of Wisconsin was required to transmit a certified copy of the resolution, showing such acceptance, to the secretary of the interior.

Recurring to the provisions of the act of June 3, 1856, it seems to be reasonably clear, that that act contemplated, or at any rate rendered possible, the construction, by one company, of a single continuous railroad from Madison or Columbus, via Portage City and St. Croix river or lake, to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield. But the continuity of such line was destroyed, and in my opinion was intended to be destroyed, by the act of May 5, 1864. Instead of making an additional or increased grant for one entire line, as described in the act of June 3, 1856, from Madison or Columbus to Lake Superior, congress, in one section of the act of 1864, made a distinct grant for a railroad from a point on the St. Croix river or lake, between townships 25 and 31, to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield; in another section, a distinct grant to aid in the construction of another railroad from Tomah to St. Croix river or lake, between townships 25 and 31; and, in a third section, a distinct grant for another and distinct railroad from Portage City, Berlin, Doty's Island or Fond du Lac, to Bayfield, thence to Superior. If congress had intended to give additional lands for the benefit of the same or a single and continuous line from Madison or Columbus, via St. Croix river or lake, to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield, as described in the act of June 3, 1856, that result could have been effected by an amendment of that act, simply extending, for the benefit of the line therein described, and which had then been formally located, the place limits to 10 miles and the indemnity limits to 20 miles. But, instead of adopting that course, it made a specific grant, in separate sections, for distinct roads between designated terminal points, without requiring the parties or companies constructing those several lines to adopt the line or route which may have been located under or by virtue of the act of June 3, 1856. This course was, perhaps, suggested by the fact, of which we may presume congress had knowledge, that nearly eight years had elapsed after the state's acceptance of the act of June 3, 1856, without anything whatever being done upon the line, west and north of Tomah, beyond the mere location of the route from Tomah, via St. Croix river or lake, to Lake Superior. But, whatever considerations may have influenced congress we are satisfied that the purpose of the act of May 5, 1864, was to break the continuity of the original line from Tomah, via St. Croix river or lake, to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield, and devote to the construction of separate and distinct portions of that line an increased quantity of lands beyond the amount granted by, or which could have been made available under the act of 1856.

An important question arising upon the construction of the acts of 1856 and 1864 is, whether the act of 1864 provides for the disposal of the granted lands upon a principle or by a rule different from that prescribed in the act of 1856, and, further, whether that of 1864 has not practically, and without violating any of the rights of the parties to this cause, superseded the essential portions of the act of 1856. Touching the act of June 3, 1856, some of the counsel insist that the lands, which by that act were allowed to be selected in lieu of lands appearing to have been previously sold or otherwise appropriated by the government, or the lands earned by the construction of each 20 continuous miles, could have been located anywhere along the entire line from Madison, via Portage and St. Croix river or lake, to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield, and that the selection of such lands was not by that act limited to the public lands coterminous with any completed section of 20 miles and within 15 miles of the line of road. Without stopping now to inquire how far that construction of the act of June 3, 1856, is maintained by some of the adjudged cases, or by the action of any department of the government, it is quite certain that the act of May 5, 1864, admits of the disposal of the lands therein granted only upon the coterminous principle. Upon the completion of 20 consecutive miles in the manner required for a first class railroad, and upon the fact of such completion being certified by the governor, and sustained by affidavits, presented to the secretary of the interior, patents could issue for the lands earned in the construction of such twenty continuous miles. But the statute, in language too explicit to admit of doubt, or to require construction, declares that the patents shall convey the right and title to such earned lands to the companies entitled thereto, "on each side of the road, as far as the same is completed, and coterminous with said completed section, not exceeding the amount" prescribed in the act. According to the act of 1864, patents for lands earned in pursuance of its provisions could issue only to the companies constructing the roads described in the act, or to the companies to whom the benefit of the grant might be transferred.

It is, however, contended with much earnestness that the act of 1864, so far from repealing or modifying the act of 1856, recognizes and requires the enforcement of its provisions as to all lands covered by the grant therein contained. But, in my opinion, this position is unauthorized by anything contained in the act of May 5, 1864, and is inconsistent with the evident intention of congress in making distinct grants for the several roads designated in that act. The grant is of "every alternate section of public land designated by odd numbers for ten sections in width on each side of said road, deducting any and all lands that may have been granted to the state of Wisconsin for the same purpose by the act of congress of June 3, 1856, upon the same terms and conditions as are contained in the act granting lands to the state of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said state, approved June 3, 1856." It certainly was not the intention of congress, by the act of May 5, 1864, to grant to the state every alternate odd section "for ten sections in width on each side of said road," in addition to the alternate odd sections "for six sections in width on each side" of the roads, granted by the act of June 3, 1856. The purpose of the act of May 5, 1864, was, as to the several roads therein described, to grant the alternate odd sections for 10 sections in width in place of odd alternate sections for six sections in width granted by the act of June 3, 1856; and instead of indemnity limits for 15 miles, as provided in the last named act, to allow selections of lands within 20 miles of the located line. If, within the place limits, as established and rendered certain under the act of 1864, either by the location of a new route or by the partial adoption of the route located under the act of 1856, there should be found lands within the place limits, as established under the act of 1856, the title to which had not been earned or become vested, it was intended that such lands be taken as a part of the place limits under the act of 1864, and not in addition to the alternate sections for 10 sections in width granted by the act of 1864. That is manifestly what was meant by the requirement that the lands granted by the act of 1856 should be deducted from the alternate odd sections for 10 sections in width granted by the act of 1864. This construction is fortified by the first proviso of section 1 of the act of 1864, which declares that the lands to be located in lieu of lands which had been sold or appropriated by the government, and which, therefore, could not be used to aid in constructing the railroad, should not be made "in lieu of lands received under the said grant of June 3, 1856," but that such location might be made to supply any "deficiency" under the grant of June 3, 1856. That is to say, lands granted by the act of 1856, if found, upon the definite location of the respective roads under the act of 1864, to be within the place limits defined by the latter act, were not to be regarded as having been previously appropriated by congress, so as to entitle the company constructing the road under the act of 1864, to claim other lands in lieu thereof, but they were to be taken as a part of the "ten sections in width" granted by the act of 1864. It was, therefore, to be deducted from the affirmative grant of 10 sections in width, made in 1864. The word "deducting" was not, perhaps, the very best one to express the intention of congress, but that congress intended what I have indicated is reasonably clear.

If we are correct in our construction of the act of May 5, 1864, it follows that the lands coterminous with each completed section of 20 consecutive miles of the respective roads, described in and granted by that act, were exclusively for the benefit of the respective companies who should, under the provisions of that act, construct each completed section of 20 miles, and that no one of the companies constructing a road under that act could, for any deficiency of lands coterminous with its own line, supply such deficiency out of lands coterminous with other lines constructed by other companies under the same act. In other words, congress intended that all the lands granted by and earned under the act of May 5, 1864, by means of constructed road, should be disposed of according to the coterminous principle.

It results, also, from what has been said, that its acceptance of the grant of May 5, 1864, subject to all the conditions prescribed in the act of congress, and its agreement to execute the trust therein created by congress, "pursuant in all things to the terms, limitations, and conditions in said act," binds the state to an administration of the grant upon the coterminous theory, unless rights had previously accrued under and by virtue of the act of June 3, 1856, which congress could not, even with the consent of the state, ignore or violate, or unless, subsequent to the passage and acceptance of the act of 1864, the state, with the consent of congress or in harmony with its legislation, recognized in some binding form the rights growing out of the act of June 3, 1856. Whether any of the parties to this litigation have any such rights, or whether any of them can object to the administration of the grant upon the principles enumerated in the act of May 5, 1864, we now proceed to inquire.

Before considering the exact status at the time of the passage of the act of May 5, 1864, of the several parties to this litigation, it is necessary to state somewhat in detail all that had been accomplished between the date of the passage of the act of June 3, 1856, and prior to the passage of the act of May 5, 1864. We have already referred to the act of October 11, 1856, whereby the state conferred the grant of June 3, 1856, upon the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company. From the act of October 11, 1856, it appears that the title to the lands granted by the act of June 3, 1856, was not to vest or be subject to disposal except upon the completion of each section of 20 consecutive miles, and that the company was prohibited from making sales exceeding six sections of land for every mile of road completed; that the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company agreed to complete the entire road from Madison and from Columbus, via Portage City, to the St. Croix river or lake, between townships 25 and 31, and from thence to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield, within 10 years from June 3, 1856, and to complete those portions between Madison and Portage City, and between Columbus and Portage City, simultaneously, as nearly as practicable, and by December 31, 1858; that in case the company should violate the provisions of the act of October 11, 1856, the legislature of Wisconsin might repeal that act, and might revoke the rights and franchises therein conferred, so far as the same had not been performed and fulfilled, and so far as the rights and privileges thereby granted had not become complete and absolute. The La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company promptly accepted the grant, lands, rights, and privileges conferred by the act of October 11, 1856, upon the terms, conditions, and restrictions therein contained. On 31st December, 1856, the company executed to Bronson and others, as trustees, a deed of trust or mortgage, containing the usual provisions, covering all the property which then constituted, or might thereafter constitute or be a part of the road of the grantor from Madison, by way of Portage, to St. Croix river or lake, between townships 25 and 31, and from Portage to La Crosse, to secure bonds amounting to $10,000,000 proposed to be issued for the construction of said roads, including all lands granted or intended to be granted to that company, so far as the same pertained or were applicable to the construction of the road from Madison, by way of Portage, to the St. Croix river or lake, and also all the property which the company might thereafter acquire, as fully and amply as the same might or could be conveyed if the roads had then been fully constructed and completed, and also the particular lands granted by the acts of June 3, 1856, and October 11, 1856, so far as the same were applicable to the construction of the road from Madison to St. Croix river or lake. Subsequently, on March 6, 1857, the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company was authorized by an act of the legislature of Wisconsin [Priv. & Loc. Laws Wis. p. 780] to transfer and convey to the St. Croix & Lake Superior Railroad Company all its right, title, and interest in the lands theretofore granted to it by the state which lie north of a point of intersection with St. Croix river or lake, upon the making of which conveyance the grantee should possess all the rights, powers, and privileges in regard to the construction of the road from such point of intersection to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield, and in regard to the application and disposal of such lands, which had been conferred upon the grantor company by said act of October 11, 1856, and the grantor company, from the date of such conveyance, should be exonerated from all liability or duty as to the construction of that portion of the original line north of the St. Croix river or lake. On 10th March, 1857, the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company executed to the St. Croix & Lake Superior Railroad Company the conveyance authorized by the act to which reference has just been made. It contained, however, this clause: "But it is hereby expressly understood between the parties hereto that the said La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company possesses and does not surrender or release the right of selecting any lands within 15 miles of and more than 6 miles from the route of the said road or roads between the St. Croix river or lake and the west end of Lake Superior, and also between the said route and Bayfield, for the purpose of making up any deficiency which does or may exist in the quantity of lands to which the said La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company is or may be entitled upon that point (part) of its line extending from Madison to the St. Croix river or lake." By the same instrument the St. Croix & Lake Superior Railroad undertake to construct the designated roads, north of St. Croix river or lake, to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield, within 10 years after June 3, 1856.

Following chronologically as far as possible, the history of the events as they transpired and were connected with the proposed lines of road, we find that on 2d August, 1858, there was certified to the governor of Wisconsin the completion, by the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company, of 20 additional miles westward from Portage City, making 61 continuous miles from that city westwardly to Tomah, in the direction of St. Croix river or lake, so as to admit of the running of regular trains, both freight and passenger. But on 23d July, 1858, the governor refused to certify the same to the secretary of the interior, placing his refusal upon the ground that the conditions upon which the grant was made by the state to the company had not been complied with, in that the company had not built any road from Madison and from Columbus to Portage, simultaneously or at all, while both of such roads—from Madison to Portage, and from Columbus to Portage—were to have been completed by December 31, 1858. After the location of the line from Madison to Portage in June, 1857, and prior to 1861, the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company partially graded portions thereof, expending from $50,000 to $75,000.

By an act of the legislature of Wisconsin approved April 12, 1861 [Priv. & Loc. Laws Wis. 1861, p. 333], the Sugar River Valley Railroad Company was authorized to build and operate a railroad from Madison and the village of Columbus, on the most direct and feasible routes, to Portage,—both roads to be completed simultaneously, as near as practicable, and to be completed by December 31, 1863. For the purpose of aiding in the construction of such roads, there was granted to that company all the interest and estate, then present and prospective, of the state, in and to so much of the lands granted by the United States to Wisconsin by the act of June 3, 1856, as was or could be made applicable to the construction of that part of the railroad described in said last-named act, lying between Madison and Portage, together with all the rights, privileges, and immunities conferred or intended to be conferred by the act of congress, as to so much of said grant of land. The act provided for the acquisition of title to the land by the company, in the same mode and upon the same conditions substantially as prescribed in the act of October 11, 1856, in relation to the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company. That act provides also that, in case the Sugar Valley Railroad Company should construct their road, or any part of it, upon or over any route upon or over which any other railroad company was authorized to construct a railroad, or upon or over which it had, prior to that date, actually surveyed or located its line of railroad, then it should be the duty of the Sugar Valley Railroad Company to settle with such railroad company, upon principles of justice and equity, for all the property and rights of property which it should take, injure, or destroy, and pay therefor whatever it should be reasonably worth; that in case the company should fail to expend at least $50,000 in the construction of said road within one year, or should fail to complete the road from Madison to Portage, so as to admit of the running of regular trains upon the same by December 31, 1863, or should otherwise violate the provisions of said act of April 12, 1861, the legislature might repeal the same, and revoke and annul all the rights and franchises therein conferred upon said company, so far as the same had not been performed and fulfilled, and so far as the rights and privileges granted had not become complete, absolute, or vested; that so much of the act of October 11, 1856, and so much of the grant of lands thereby granted to the said La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company as were or could be made applicable to the construction of a railroad from Madison to Portage, and from Columbus to Portage, and all the rights, privileges, and franchises thereby conferred, granted, and conveyed to and upon the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company, so far as the roads from Madison to Portage, and from Columbus to Portage, and the lands granted to aid in the construction of the same were concerned, were thereby repealed, revoked, annulled, and declared void. In January, 1862, a decree of foreclosure and sale was rendered in the district court of the United States for the district of Wisconsin, of the trust deed executed by the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company to Bronson and others. The sale under this decree took place April 5, 1863, the purchasers being William Wallace and William H. White. On the 20th January, 1863, the Sugar Valley Railroad Company failed, suspended payment, and practically closed all operations on the line between Madison and Portage, but prior to that date it had expended for grading and in acquiring the right of way about $40,000.

By an act approved 1st April, 1863 [Supp. Loc. & Priv. Laws Wis. 1863, p. 47], the Tomah & Lake St. Croix Railroad Company was incorporated, with authority to build and operate, on such route or from such point as the directors should determine in Tomah, on the track of the Milwaukee & La Crosse Railroad, or any other railroad running out of Tomah (that being the point westward of Portage City to which the 61 miles of road from Portage City, constructed in 1857 and 1858 by the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company extended), by way of Black River Falls, thence by the most feasible route to such point on Lake St. Croix, between townships 25 and 31, as the directors should determine. For the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad there was granted to that company all the interest and estate, then present and prospective, of Wisconsin in and to so much of the lands granted by the United States by the act of June 3, 1856, as was or could be made applicable to the construction of that part of said railroad lying between the village of Tomah and Lake St. Croix, together with the rights, privileges, and immunities conferred or intended to be conferred by said act of June 3, 1856, as to so much of said grant, the title to the lands thus granted to vest in the same mode and upon the same conditions, substantially, as those prescribed in reference to the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company by the act of October 11, 1856. The act further provided that so much of the act of October 11, 1856, and so much of the grant thereby of lands to the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company as was or could be made applicable to the construction of a railroad from Tomah to Lake St. Croix, and all the rights, privileges, and franchises thereby conferred, granted, and conveyed to the said La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company, so far as the road from Tomah to St. Croix, and the lands therein granted to aid in the construction of the same, were concerned, were thereby repealed, revoked, annulled, and declared void. On the 5th May, 1863, Wallace and White received a deed from the marshal, and upon the same day organized a corporation under the name of Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, to which was conveyed, by the decretal purchasers, among other things, the lands granted or intended to be granted to the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company by virtue of the acts of June 3, 1856, and October 11, 1856, so far as lands pertained or were applicable to the construction of the roads from Madison, by way of Portage, to the St. Croix river or lake. By an act approved March 31, 1864 [Gen. Laws Wis. 1864, p. 349], the St. Croix & Lake Superior Railroad Company was authorized and empowered to preserve and protect the timber growing or being upon any of the lands theretofore granted by congress to the state of Wisconsin by the act of June 3, 1856, and "which are situated within fifteen miles of the located line of such company's railroad."

We have now stated, so far as we have been able to collect them from the immense mass of papers before us, the important facts in connection with the lines of railroad between Madison, via Portage and St. Croix river, to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield, which transpired between the passage of the act of June 3, 1856, and the acceptance by the state of the act of 5th May, 1864. At the date last named, as we have shown, no part of the line between Madison and Portage had been constructed. Nothing had been done, except to locate and partially grade the lines between those points. The company charged with the duty of completing the road from Madison to Portage by December 31, 1863, had, prior to May 5, 1864, failed and suspended operations, and was in suspension at the last-named date. Between Tomah and St. Croix lake, and between St. Croix lake and the west end of Lake Superior and Bayfield, nothing whatever had been done in the way of construction prior to May 5, 1864. The respective companies seeking or claiming the benefit of, or operating under, the grant of June 3, 1856, had done substantially nothing between Tomah and Lake Superior beyond locating their lines on the designated routes.

Returning to the inquiry whether the acceptance by the state of the provisions of the act of May 5, 1864, was inconsistent with any rights which then belonged to the predecessors in interest of the parties to this cause, let us first examine the case as to

The West Wisconsin Railroad Company,

Formerly the Tomah & Lake St. Croix Railway Company. It seems to be clear that that company, at least, is not in any position to object to the administration of the congressional grant upon the coterminous principle. It would seem to be estopped, upon every principle of equity, from asserting any claim to supply its deficiency of land, if any such exists, out of lands beyond its line and along the road constructed and to be constructed by other companies north of its line and between St. Croix river or lake and Lake Superior. The state, by an act approved March 29, 1865, conferred upon that company the benefit of the increased grant, and, among other things, all and singular the rights, privileges, and interests conferred and bestowed upon the state by the act of May 5, 1864, including the privilege given by that act as to the extension of time for building the road from Tomah to St. Croix river or lake between townships 25 and 31. The company accepted the grant upon the same conditions and restrictions as were imposed by congress upon the state in the act of 1864. Besides, it accepted from congress, by joint resolution approved July 13, 1868, a further extension of three years for the completion of its road beyond the time limited by the act of 1864. It accepted and caused to be filed with the secretary of the interior a certificate from the governor of the state, dated September 10, 1870, showing that the first 80 miles constructed by it had been built and completed in the manner required by the act of May 5, 1864. It accepted and caused to be filed a similar certificate as to another section of 20 continuous miles. After these repeated recognitions of the act of May 5, 1864, after accepting the benefits, the extension of time, and all the privileges given by that act and by the act of 1868, it should not be heard to claim lands beyond its terminal points and within the limits granted to other companies who have entered upon the work of construction under the authority and upon the faith of the act of May 5, 1864. If, as claimed, the North Wisconsin Railroad Company, which is engaged in constructing the road from St. Croix lake or river to Bayfield, has received grants of land in violation of the coterminous principle prescribed in the act of May 5, 1864, that is a matter between the state or the United States and that company, of which the West Wisconsin Railroad Company may not complain. And so if the West Wisconsin Railroad Company has, as urged, received lands along or opposite to its line which it had no lawful right to receive under the act of 1864, that is not a matter to be corrected in this litigation, or of which other companies can complain under the present issues, provided such other companies were not themselves entitled to the lands thus alleged to have been illegally appropriated and received by the West Wisconsin Railroad Company. As to whether it has, in fact, received patents for lands to which it was not entitled, the court expresses no opinion. Its decision upon the claim of the West Wisconsin Railway Company is restricted to the single point that it cannot supply its alleged deficiency out of the lands north of St. Croix river or lake, and beyond its own terminal points, whether such lands are claimed by the North Wisconsin Railway Company, the Chicago, Portage & Superior Railway Company, or the Wisconsin Central Railway Company.

Madison & Portage Railway Company.

Our next inquiry relates to the claim of the Madison & Portage Railway Company to supply its alleged deficiency from lands north of St. Croix river or lake. We have already seen that the rights, privileges, and franchises conferred in 1856 upon the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company, so far as the roads from Madison to Portage, and from Columbus to Portage, and the lands granted to aid in the construction of the same, were concerned, were, in the year 1861, revoked, annulled, and declared void by the state. The right of the state to make such revocation cannot well be disputed in view of the reservations in the act of October 11, 1856, and the failure of the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company to complete such roads by the time stipulated in that act, viz. December 31, 1858. What the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company may have previously done upon the line between Madison and Portage, in the way merely of grading, did not create any rights in its favor against the state or against the United States, certainly no rights that were complete or absolute, or which prevented the state, in 1861, from recalling its grant to that company. We have also seen that, in the statute of 1861, declaring such revocation, the right to construct the road from Madison to Portage was conferred upon the Sugar Valley Railroad Company, together with the lands, privileges, and immunities, as to that part of the original line, which had been previously conferred upon and granted to the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company. But the Sugar Valley Railroad Company (the predecessor of the Madison & Portage Railroad Company) did not comply with the terms of the said act of 1861. It did not, as it expressly agreed to do, expend upon its road, within one year from the passage of the act, the sum of $50,000; nor did it, by December 31, 1863, complete the road from Madison to Portage so as to admit of the running of regular trains upon the same, or at all. On the contrary, as early as January 26, 1863, it failed, suspended payment, and practically closed all operations on its road. It had not resumed operations when the act of May 5, 1864, was passed, or when its provisions were accepted by the state. It had not, at either date, acquired any right which was "complete, absolute, or vested." It was in a position where the state, by virtue of the reservations of power contained in the act of 1861, could revoke all the authority conferred upon it, including the right to earn lands as compensation or bounty for constructed road. Its violation of the act of 1861, in the particulars named, authorized the state, at the time of its acceptance of the act of May 5th, 1864, to repeal the act of 1861, and revoke the grant thereby made. The state did not, so far as I can find in the record, formally exercise such right of repeal and of revocation, but it did, on 20th March, 1865, as it might lawfully have done, that which was practically equivalent to a revocation of the rights granted in the act of 1861; that is to say, it agreed with the United States to execute the trust, created by the act of 1864, pursuant, in all things, to the terms, limitations, and conditions of that act—an agreement which, we have seen, required the disposal, according to the coterminous principle, of all the lands granted by the act of 1864 among the several companies constructing, under the sanction of its authority, each continuous 20 miles. That agreement embraced all the lands beyond or northwest of Tomah, and as far north as Lake Superior, and was inconsistent with any right in the Sugar Valley Railroad Company thereafter to earn and appropriate lands beyond its own line and within the limits, terminal and lateral, prescribed by the act of May 5, 1864. If it was competent for the state, on March 20, 1865, as it unquestionably was, to revoke the grant of 1861 to the Sugar Valley Railroad Company, it was equally competent, without a formal revocation of such grant, to stipulate with the United States that it would dispose of the lands granted and received under the act of 1864 according to the terms therein prescribed. If we are correct in this view, it results that no action of the state, subsequent to March 20, 1865, continuing in force the grant of 1861 to the Sugar Valley Railroad Company, or substituting the Madison & Portage Railroad Company to the enjoyment of the rights originally conferred upon the Sugar Valley Railroad Company, could affect its obligation to the United States to respect and execute the provisions of the act of May 5, 1864. It is enough for the disposition of the claim of the Madison & Portage Company that the Sugar Valley Railroad Company had no substantial right, on March 20, 1865, which prevented the state from agreeing to execute the trust created by the act of May 5, 1864, pursuant, in all things, to its provisions, including the provision which declared the coterminous principle. The effect of the act of May 5, 1864, and of its acceptance by the state, so far as the Sugar Valley Railroad Company or its successor was concerned, was to protect or withdraw the lands described in that act from any claim of that company on account of deficiency lands to which they might become entitled by actual construction of road, at a subsequent date, under the grant of June 3, 1856.

Wisconsin Railroad Farm Mortgage Land Company.

We will now consider the case of the Wisconsin Railroad Farm Mortgage Land Company, which claims to be the successor of the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company as to all rights accruing upon the construction of the 61 miles of road between Portage and Tomah in the years 1857 and 1858. It will be remembered that the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company, on the 10th March, 1857, under authority conferred by the state, transferred to the St. Croix & Lake Superior Railroad Company the right to construct the original line north of St. Croix lake or river, and such benefits and privileges as were connected with the grant contained in the act of June 3, 1856. The indenture between the parties contained, as has been seen, an acknowledgment that the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company then possessed and did not surrender or release the right to select lands within 15 miles of, and more than six miles from, the route of the roads north of St. Croix river or lake to supply any deficiency which then existed or might thereafter exist in the quantity of lands to which the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company was or might be entitled upon that part of its line extending from Madison to the St. Croix river or lake. It does not appear that the state previously assented to or contemplated such an arrangement between the parties. But, waiving any consideration of its validity because of the absence of such assent, it is clear that the state, after its acceptance of the act of 1864, and before the date of its grants to the North Wisconsin Railroad Company, the Chicago & Northern Pacific Air Line Railway Company, and Wisconsin Central Railway Company, conferred upon the Wisconsin Railroad Farm Mortgage Land Company the benefit of the reservation contained in the contract and indenture of March 10, 1857. The purchasers at the decretal sale of the rights and interests conveyed by the mortgage to Bronson and others, by apt and sufficient words, conveyed and transferred to the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company before the passage of the act of May 5, 1864. Although that company necessarily took subject to the right of appeal and revocation reserved to the state in the charter of the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company, and was, therefore, for the reasons already stated, in no position to object to the state's accepting and agreeing to execute the provisions of the act of May 5, 1864,—the state not having previously assented to the contract and reservation contained in the indenture of March 10, 1857,—we find that, as early as the year 1868, the state agreed that the farm mortgagors might have the benefit of any claim to the lands donated by congress which the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company had acquired, as the successor of the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company, on account of the construction of the road from Portage to Tomah. If, without the consent of congress, no such claim was maintainable under the act of June 3, 1856, nevertheless in 1868 congress authorized the legislature to dispose of the lands granted, and which might have accrued and been certified to the state, under the act of June 3, 1856, to aid in the construction of the road from Madison or Columbus, via Portage, to St. Croix river or lake, for the benefit of the Wisconsin Railroad Farm Mortgage Land Company. We find also that the legislature of Wisconsin, by an act approved March 23, 1872, declared the Wisconsin Railroad Farm Mortgage Land Company to be the legal successor (as to the rights acquired and conferred in and to a portion of the lands granted by congress to the state of Wisconsin by an act approved June 3, 1856) of the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company, as fixed and reserved in and by the contract entered into by and between the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company and the St. Croix & Lake Superior Railroad Company, executed March 10, 1857, and duly filed in the office of the secretary of state of Wisconsin. The act directed the governor to carry out the provisions of that contract, and conveyed to the Wisconsin Railroad Farm Mortgage Land Company, out of the lands granted by the act of June 3, 1856, such quantity of lands as had been or thereafter might be made applicable thereto, as should make, together with the lands theretofore conveyed to that company, the exact number of 6 sections for each mile of the railroad constructed by the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company from Portage to Tomah, a distance of 61 miles. At the same time, or on the day previous, the acts conferring the grants of June 3, 1856, and May 5, 1864, upon the St. Croix & Lake Superior Railroad Company were repealed, but with the proviso that nothing therein should be construed to impair the rights of the Wisconsin Railroad Farm Mortgage Land Company to the grant of June 3, 1856. Congress and the state seem to have concurred in desiring to provide full compensation in lands to the Farm Mortgage Company for the 61 miles of road constructed and in use long prior to 1864. Such was the unfulfilled engagement of the state to that company when, in 1874, to the North Wisconsin Railway Company and the Chicago & Northern Pacific Air Line Railway Company was granted the right, title and interest which the state then had or might thereafter acquire in the lands granted by the acts of June 3, 1856, and May 5, 1864, to aid in the construction of the roads north of St. Croix river or lake. The two companies, it is clear, took their grants with the knowledge that the state had, by a previous act, directed the governor to execute the contract of March 10, 1857, which expressly recognized the right of the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company to supply any deficiency south of St. Croix river or lake out of lands north of that river or lake. It seems to me, therefore, that, recognizing the right of the state to accept the grant of May 5, 1864, without doing violence to the then existing rights of any of these companies, or of their predecessors, it yet became bound by its subsequent ratification of the contract of March 10, 1857, before the date of the grants to the North Wisconsin Railroad Company and the Chicago & Northern Pacific Air Line Railway Company, to grant to the Wisconsin Railroad Farm Mortgage Land Company, out of the lands north of St. Croix river or lake, a quantity sufficient to satisfy its claim for the construction by its recognized predecessor of the 61 miles of road between Portage and Tomah. The claim of the Wisconsin Railroad Farm Mortgage Land Company related to road constructed south of Tomah, and neither that company nor its predecessor was required to accept the provisions of the act of 1864. That part of the line described in the original act was not embraced by or referred to in that act, for the reason, doubtless, that it had in fact been constructed before its passage. It was, therefore, left under the operation of the act of June 3, 1856. And even if that act did not require deficiency lands to be selected upon the coterminous principle, it was competent for the state, in view of the action of congress, after accepting the act of 1864, and before conferring the grant therein contained upon the North Wisconsin and Chicago & Northern Pacific Air Line Railway Company, to allow the Farm Mortgage Land Company to select the deficiency lands earned by its predecessor for constructed road out of such of the lands north of St. Croix lake or river as were embraced in the indemnity limits prescribed by the act of June 3, 1856. This it did by an express approval in 1872 of the contract of May 10, 1857, and by requiring the governor to carry it into effect. I am of opinion that the right thus recognized by the state should be enforced; but in giving effect to the claim of the Wisconsin Railroad Farm Mortgage Land Company it is not necessary, I think, to disturb the location of lands already made by the North Wisconsin Railroad Company. Upon this particular point, however, no final decision is now made. The Farm Mortgage Company was not entitled to any specific sections of land, and its claim can doubtless be satisfied without disregarding the selection or location of lands by the North Wisconsin Railroad Company for road constructed. But in this respect the rights of those two companies can be more satisfactorily determined after a report by the master, to be hereafter made; and, until the coming in of that report, the court also reserves for determination the right of the several parties other than the West Wisconsin Railroad Company and the Madison & Portage Railroad Company in the fund spoken of in argument as the trespass fund.

Some question has been made as to the precise extent of the grant under the two acts of congress. We understand that it covers 6 sections in width on each side of the line in the one case, and 10 sections in the other, of lands in place as they existed on the ground, so that if any of these sections were fractional, or from any cause were not full sections, the state could not make up the deficiency from lands in the indemnity limits, because as to the lands in place the act operates directly by specific description, but, when there was not land in place to meet the call of the grants, whether the deficiency was more or less, it was competent to supply it by sections from the indemnity limits; or if, as might happen, there were parts of sections of the lands in place excluded from the grants by the terms of the acts, it was competent to supply the deficiency from the indemnity limits by a similar legal subdivision of the land. It would seem to be impracticable to administer the trust on any other basis. In supplying deficiencies it must be by sections, whether full or fractional, and by legal subdivisions. Deficiencies in place limits, caused by sales or preemptions previous to the location of routes, whether before or after the passage of the acts, may be supplied from the indemnity limits.

Although the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company has filed no cross bill, and has only presented its claims by answer, it may not be improper for us to express an opinion upon the effect of the grant by the act of 1864, when there is a conflict or overlapping of lands granted to the different railroads as they approach Lake Superior, large quantities of land being thus granted by the act to different roads. These grants are made by the same law operating on the lands granted at the same time. The Wisconsin Central Railroad has completed its road to Ashland, on Lake Superior, a point not named in the act, but up to the present time no road has been finished to Bayfield or to the west end of Lake Superior, and, without foreclosing the parties upon this question, we should be inclined to think that the different companies, as to all lands overlapping in the respective grants, must be considered tenants in common, without regard to priority of construction.

I am not sure that I have touched upon every point in this complicated cause which is essential to the determination of the rights of parties, nor am I quite sure that the recital of facts contained in this opinion is in all respects full and accurate. It would have been gratifying to me to have had more time than has transpired since the conclusion of the oral argument for the examination of the record and the consideration of the many difficult questions suggested by counsel. But the interests of parties seem to require an early disposition of the cause, and I have not felt at liberty to postpone an announcement of my conclusions to such a time as would give me all the opportunity for careful deliberation which the large interests involved seemed to demand. I have been the more willing to pursue this course since counsel concurred in stating that the cause, however decided in this court, would be taken to the supreme court of the United States for final determination. Upon the filing of this opinion in court, counsel will prepare an order dismissing the bill of complainant and the cross bill of the West Wisconsin Railroad Company, and referring the cause to the special master with such directions as are consistent with this opinion, and as will facilitate the final determination of all the remaining issues.

[An appeal was taken in this case to the supreme court of the United States, but was dismissed by stipulation of counsel on April 8, 1864.]

MADRE, The VERONICA. See Case No. 16,923.

MAD RIVER R. CO. (SIMPSON v.). See Case No. 12,885.

Case No. 8,939.

MAENHAUT et al. v. NEW ORLEANS et al.

[2 Woods, 108.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1875.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — LEGISLATIVE ACT — CONTRACT — BONDS — TAXES — MONEY COLLECTED — TRUST FUND.

1. An act of the legislature, which provided for the issue of bonds by a municipal corporation, and prescribed the manner in which the tax to pay the interest thereon should be levied, and enacted safeguards to secure its levy and collection, on the faith of which legislation the bonds were sold, constitutes a contract with the bondholder, the substantial performance of which he is entitled to exact.

[Cited in Maenhaut v. New Orleans, Case No. 8,940.]

2. Money collected to pay the interest on said bonds, levied, collected and set apart, according to the provisions of said act, is a trust fund for that purpose, and the municipal corporation may be enjoined from using it for any other purpose without the consent of the bondholders.

[Followed in Ranger v. New Orleans, Case No. 11,564. Cited in Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 530; Garrett v. City of Memphis, 5 Fed. 869; Chaffraix v. Board of Liquidation, 11 Fed. 641; Fazende v. City of Houston, 34 Fed. 97.]

3. The act of the legislature of Louisiana of Feb. 23, 1852, establishing the charter of the city of New Orleans, which declares that the rate per cent. of the tax (to pay interest on the consolidated debt) in each municipality shall be in proportion to the indebtedness of each, is not in conflict with article 127 of the constitution of 1845, which declares that "taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state."

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[Followed in Ranger v. New Orleans, Case No. 11,564.]

In equity. This cause was heard upon the motion of complainants [Rosalie Maenhaut and others] for a preliminary injunction, and for the appointment of a receiver. It was submitted upon the bill, supplemental bill, answer, affidavits, and arguments of counsel.

John A. Campbell and E. Bermudez, for motion.

B. F. Jonas, City Atty., T. J. Semmes, W. W. Howe, John Finney, and E. W. Huntington, contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The facts as they appear from the pleadings and affidavits are substantially as follows: Previous to the 23d of February, 1852, the city of New Orleans was composed of one general municipal organization, which comprised municipalities, each of which had a government of its own, and each of which, as well as the general municipal body, had contracted debts for which they were respectively liable. At the date named, an act of the general assembly of Louisiana was approved, which established a municipal corporation to be called the city of New Orleans, to be composed of the several municipalities, and to be governed by a mayor and common council. [Acts La. 1852, p. 53.] The act declared that the estate and title of the several municipalities in lands, bridges, ferries, streets, roads, wharves, markets, stalls, landing places, buildings and other property, should be vested in the city of New Orleans. Section 37 of this act, provided that the debt of the general sinking fund, commonly called the old city debt, and the debts of the three municipalities should be assumed and paid by the city of New Orleans, and the city was declared liable therefor. Five officers of the city, including the mayor, were constituted commissioners of the consolidated debt of New Orleans, and they were authorized to issue the bonds of the city, having not more than forty years to run, with interest payable semiannually. The commissioners were authorized to exchange these bonds for any bonds, obligations or debts of the old corporation, or any of the municipalities, or to sell the same, and with the proceeds pay off said debts. It was provided that the bonds thus issued should form a stock to be called the consolidated debt of New Orleans. It was further provided as follows: "The common council shall annually, in the month of January, pass an ordinance to raise the sum of $600,000, by a special tax on real estate and slaves, to be called the consolidated loan tax, and the rate per cent. of said tax in each municipality shall be in proportion to the debt of each. All ordinances, resolutions or other acts passed by said council after the first day of January in each year, shall be null and void, unless the ordinance imposing the consolidation loan tax shall have been previously passed. At the end of each and every year, any surplus of the consolidated loan tax remaining in the treasury, after the payment of all the interest, shall be applied to the purchase, from the lowest bidder, of such bonds issued under this act as have the shortest period to run." The section further provides: "Nor shall any loan be contracted unless the same be authorized by a vote of a majority of the qualified voters of said city, and no ordinance creating a debt or loan shall be valid unless for some single object or work distinctly specified therein, and unless such ordinance shall provide ways and means for the punctual payment of running interest during the whole time for which said debt or loan shall be contracted." By an act passed on the same day as the act just mentioned, the amount to be levied in January of each year to pay the principal and interest on said bonds was increased to $650,000.

Under authority of these acts, and upon the faith thereof, about ten millions of bonds were issued, which were negotiated above par, and sold in the money markets of Europe and the United States. It further appears that, beginning with the year 1869, the city of New Orleans had issued several series of bonds in violation of the restrictions imposed by the act of 1852. At the extra session of 1870, an act was passed changing the form of the city government, and repealing the act of 1852, retaining in force, however, some of its clauses and sections. In 1874 Act No. 53 was passed, which postponed the levy and collection of any tax for the sinking fund for the purchase of the bonds of the city, until December, 1876. There are now outstanding about $4,142,000 of the consolidated bonds. It appears further, by the averments of the supplemental bill, that on the 14th of July, 1875, the city of New Orleans adopted an ordinance, No. 3190, whereby it was provided that the commissioners of the consolidated debt were authorized to pay, with a delay not exceeding ten days, fifty per cent. of the certain past due interest coupons, and that such pro rata payments be continued out of all interest collections up to January, 1876, provided that the holders of such coupons shall indicate their acceptance of this arrangement by their respective signatures at the time of payment. The said coupons were to be stamped thus: "Half paid." The following are the coupons referred to: Consolidated 1852, due July, 1875. Railroad, up to July, 1875. Pontchartrain Railroad, due July, 1875, etc. The paper to be signed by the bondholders under this ordinance is as follows: "We, the undersigned, holders of city bonds, hereby acquiesce in and approve Ordinance No. 3190 of the city council, providing for the payment of fifty per cent. of the interest collected and to be collected up to the 1st of January, 1876, the balance to be used for the general relief of the city government, reserving our right to be hereafter paid by the city the balance due on said coupons." The supplemental bill charges that the city council, since the passage of the ordinance aforesaid, has allowed no bondholder to participate in the payments of interest who did not consent to the ordinance, and that it has excluded a number, among whom were complainants, because they would not do so. The complainants are the holders of seven of the consolidated bonds of the city. There has been deposited by the city in the Louisiana National Bank, to the credit of the consolidated loan, during the six months ending July 30, 1875, the sum of $174,409.90, and there is now on deposit in the bank to the credit of that fund, a sum nearly, if not quite, sufficient to pay the interest due on the consolidated bonds. There are many other averments and admissions of the pleadings and matters of fact set forth in the affidavits, which for the purposes of the present motion it is unnecessary to notice. Although the prayer of the bill of complaint is very broad, the purpose of the present motion is very narrow. It is that an injunction may issue against the city and against the Louisiana National Bank, to restrain them from paying out the said funds collected for the interest on the consolidated bonds, for any other purpose than that for which said fund was collected, or in any other manner than in accordance with the laws and ordinances previously existing, and that should there be any further default, the complainants may be allowed to renew their motion for the appointment of a receiver.

Counsel for defendant, not being advised within what narrow limits the relief sought by this motion was confined, have argued many questions which it is not now necessary to pass upon or notice. The only question is, Shall the injunction go as moved for? There can be no serious question that so much of the twenty-ninth section of the act of 1852, as provides for the manner in which the tax to pay the consolidated bonds is to be levied, and the safeguards for the levy and collection of the tax, constitutes a contract with the bondholder, the substantial performance of which he is entitled to exact. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 41; Woodruff v. Trapnall, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 190; Curran v. Arkansas, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 304; Van Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 535; Furman v. Nichol, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 44; People v. Woods, 7 Cal. 579; People v. Bond, 10 Cal. 563; Brooklyn Park Co. v. Armstrong, 45 N. Y. 234. For the purposes of this motion, it is immaterial whether the contract is a contract with the state of Louisiana or with the city of New Orleans. In the case of Van Hoffman v. City of Quincy, supra, it was held, however, by the supreme court of the United States, that under like circumstances, both the state and the corporation were bound. It is also unnecessary to consider whether or not some of the relief prayed for by the bill must be sought by mandamus after judgment, and not by bill in equity.

The only question which the court is now called on to decide, is this: The city of New Orleans having collected and set apart, as required by the act of 1852, a fund to pay the interest on the consolidated bonds, can the city be enjoined from appropriating the fund to any other purpose, without the consent of the bondholders? In my judgment, there is no doubt that the city can be thus enjoined. The money specially collected to pay this interest is deposited in bank to the credit of the fund for that purpose. This money, being the fruits of a contract between the bondholders and the state and city, and having been specially collected under authority of law to pay this interest, and deposited in bank to the credit of a fund set apart for such payment, it is held by the city in a fiduciary capacity, and the trust is imposed upon the city to apply the funds to the object for which they were collected. See authorities cited below. This is a trust which equity can enforce.

Dillon, in his learned work on Municipal Corporations, says, in section 729: "In respect of property held by municipal corporations in trust or clothed with public duties, equity has always asserted its jurisdiction to see that the trusts were performed and the public duties discharged. The jurisdiction of chancery over such municipal corporations is forcibly asserted by the house of lords in an interesting and important case, in which the corporation of Dublin, under act of parliament was the trustee of funds raised from water rates to supply the city with water, and where the bill charging the corporation with breaches of trust and mismanagement was filed by the attorney general on behalf of the inhabitants of Dublin paying water rates." This was the case of Attorney General v. Mayor, etc., of Dublin, 1 Bligh (N. S.) 312. In the case of People v. Ingersoll, 58 N. Y. 35, it was held that if the public corporation, having power to act in a corporate capacity, has by its officers so acted under the laws as to become bound by its obligations, the debt has become a corporate and county charge, and the moneys, the fruits and proceeds of the obligation are trust funds, subject to the control of the governing body of the corporation under the general laws of the state. So it was held in the case of Attorney General v. Corporation of Lichfield, 11 Beav. 120, that the borough fund created under the municipal corporation act is a trust fund, and the court of chancery has authority and jurisdiction to compel the parties who receive and apply the fund to account for the sums they receive and the application of them, and, that the court has jurisdiction if it be expedient and the case require it, to restrain the application of money collected by rates to costs, debts and expenses incurred prior to making the rates. The case of Trevillian v. Mayor, etc., of Exeter, 5 De Gex, M. & G. 828, was this: A corporation raised money under an act of parliament on mortgages of the tolls and additional works of a canal, and acting on what the court of appeal (differing from the court below) decided to be an erroneous construction of the act, applied part of the money so raised in paying off old mortgages affecting other property of the corporation. On the tolls and additional works being an insufficient security, held that the new mortgagees were entitled to follow their money so far as it had been erroneously applied, and to stand in place of the old paid off mortgagees as against the other property of the corporation. So in Attorney General v. Mayor, etc., of Dublin, supra, it was held that where there is any fund created for the purpose of being applied to some public purpose, which fund is vested in a corporation, the court of chancery has, by its original inherent jurisdiction, a right to see to the due application of the fund. The court of chancery will always lay hold of any breach of trust in relation to the administration of property, let the party guilty of it be either in a public or private capacity. Charitable Corporation v. Sutton, 2 Atk. 406. See, also, Attorney General v. Eastlake, 21 Eng. Law & Eq. 43; Sturge v. Eastern Union Ry. Co., 7 De Gex, M. & G. 158.

On these and many other authorities that might be cited, I feel justified in holding that the tax collected and deposited under the act of 1852, to pay the interest on the consolidated bonds, is a trust fund in the hands of the city authorities to be applied to that purpose and no other, and that, if there is any danger that the fund will be diverted to other purposes, the complainants are entitled to their injunction to restrain such diversion. On consideration of the pleadings and affidavits in this case, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that there is danger of the application of this fund to purposes other than that for which the law authorized it to be collected. It seems, however, that some of the holders of the consolidated bonds have consented to receive half the interest on their bonds, and to allow the city to use the other half for other purposes. It is their right to make this agreement, and the court will not interfere with it. The city ought to be restrained only from diverting so much of the fund as may be necessary to pay the interest on the bonds, the holders of which do not consent to the terms of Ordinance No. 3190, administration series. A preliminary injunction must issue accordingly. It will be also ordered that should there be any further default, the complainants may renew their motion for a receiver.

In the argument upon the motion for injunction, it was claimed by counsel for the city that the act of 1852 was in violation of the constitution of 1845, which was in force when that act was passed, and which declared (article 127), "that taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state." The provision of this act of 1852, which is deemed to contravene this constitutional requirement, is this: "The rate per cent. of said tax (tax to pay interest on consolidated debt) in each municipality shall be in proportion to the indebtedness of each." I cannot see any conflict between the law and the constitution. As at present advised, I do not think the objection to the law well founded.

[This cause was subsequently heard at the same term, for final decree. The preliminary injunction was made perpetual, but the other relief asked for in the bill was denied. Case No. 8,940.]

Case No. 8,940.

MAENHAUT v. NEW ORLEANS.

[3 Woods, 1.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1876.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—LEGISLATIVE ACT—BONDS—CONTRACT—REMEDY—PRIORITY OF PAYMENT.

1. The act of the legislature of Louisiana, approved Feb. 23, 1852 [Acts La. 1852, p. 53], by authority of which the consolidated bonds of the city of New Orleans were issued, and which declared that a special tax should be annually levied on real estate and slaves, to raise the sum of $650,000 to be applied to the payment of the principal and interest of said bonds, is a contract with the bondholders, and remains unaffected by any subsequent legislation which seeks to impair or repeal its provisions.

2. The remedy of the bondholders for the enforcement of the contract contained in said act is at law.

3. Under the provisions of said act the holders of consolidated bonds are not entitled to priority of payment over other bondholders out of all taxes raised on real estate.

4. The bare fact that the consolidated bonds were older than bonds subsequently issued gives their holders no advantage over the holders of the bonds of later date.

[This was a bill in equity by Rosalie Maenhaut against the city of New Orleans for a preliminary injunction, and for the appointment of a receiver. The injunction was granted, restraining the city from diverting to other purposes the tax levied and collected for the purpose of paying interest on city bonds. Case No. 8,939. The case is now heard for final decree.]

John A. Campbell and E. Bermudez, for complainants.

B. F. Jonas, City Atty., and H. C. Miller, for defendant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The complainants are holders of bonds issued by the city of New

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Orleans by authority of the 37th section of the act of the legislature, approved Feb. 23, 1852. The bonds issued represent what is designated as the consolidated debt of New Orleans. The act declares that "the common council shall annually in the month of January pass an ordinance to raise the sum of six hundred thousand dollars" (this sum was increased by an act approved the same day to the sum of $650,000), "by a special tax on real estate and slaves, to be called the consolidated loan tax. * * * At the end of each and every year any surplus of the consolidated loan tax remaining in the treasury after the payment of all the interest and the expenses of the management of the debt, shall be applied to the purchase from the lowest bidder of such bonds issued under this act as have the shortest time to run." The act further provided that all ordinances, resolutions or other acts passed by the city council after the first day of January in each year should be null and void, unless the ordinance imposing the consolidation loan tax should have been previously passed. The act further provided that, after its passage, no obligation or evidence of debt of any description whatever except those thus authorized should be issued by the city of New Orleans, or under its authority, nor should any loan be contracted unless the same should be authorized by a vote of a majority of the qualified voters of said city. About $10,000,000 in bonds were issued under authority of the act, of which there are still outstanding over $4,142,000, and the complainants hold a part of this issue of bonds. The bill charged that there had been collected by the city authorities and deposited to the credit of the consolidated loan, the sum of $174,000, and asked for an injunction restraining the city from diverting this fund to any other purpose than the payment of the interest on the consolidated loan. It appears, from the report of the master, that for a long period after the passage of the act of 1852 collections of taxes were made and applied with regularity under the provisions of the 37th section of the act; that subsequently, for a number of years, there was no attempt to levy and collect the tax required by said section; that large sums collected under the act were misapplied and used by the city for other purposes than those prescribed by the act; that in 1872 the legislature passed an act to postpone the levy and collection of the tax for the sinking fund to pay the principal of the consolidated bonds, but provided for the payment of the interest; and finally, that in 1876 the legislature passed an act authorizing what was called the premium bond plan for paying the city debt, and repealing all laws for the levy and collection of the tax authorized and required by the act of 1852

On a former hearing an injunction was allowed, as prayed in the bill, forbidding the city from diverting to any other object the taxes collected by virtue of the act of 1852 for the payment of the interest on the consolidated loan, and the fund so collected has been applied as required by law and the rights of the complainants. On this, the final hearing, it is moved that the court decree that complainants are entitled (1) to a specific performance of their contract with the city contained in section 37 of the act of 1852; (2) to the levy, collection and exclusive application to the payment of the principal and interest of their bonds, of the sum of $650,000, to be levied upon the real estate of the city; (3) to a priority of payment out of the taxes raised by the city upon its real estate, to the extent of $650,000; and (4) to an injunction restraining the city from applying any of its revenues raised or hereafter to be raised by levy on real estate, to the payment of any other debt or demand, until complainants' claims as bondholders have been fully provided for and satisfied.

So far as the first two of these demands of the complainant is concerned, I am of opinion that the act of 1852 above mentioned contains a contract valid and binding on the city, and that the bondholders are entitled to exact the substantial performance of the contract. I have so held upon the former hearing of his case: Maenhaut v. New Orleans [Case No. 8,939]. The 37th section of the act of 1852, constituting as it does a contract between the city and the bondholders, stands unaffected by any subsequent legislation that seeks to impair or repeal its provisions. But the remedy of the complainants to enforce their contract is clearly not in equity, but at law, by the recovery of a judgment on their coupons and bonds, and by the writ of mandamus commanding the levy and collection of the tax required by law. The relief at law is plain, adequate and complete, and equity can not be resorted to. Heine v. Levee Commissioners, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 655.

The claim that the complainants are entitled to priority of payment out of all taxes raised on real estate, and to an injunction forbidding the application of taxes so raised to any purpose whatever until their claims are satisfied, cannot be sustained. The contract between the city and the bondholders contained in section 37 of the act of 1852 does not give the bondholders any priority of payment over other bondholders out of the taxes on the real estate of the city. The contract entitles these bondholders to have levied on the real estate of the city and paid them annually the sum of $650,000, and it entitles them to nothing more. The city may levy on real estate other sums to pay its current expenses or to pay its other debts. These bondholders derive no advantage from the fact that their bonds may be older than those held by other persons. If the city should levy and collect annually $650,000, to apply to the principal and interest of the issue of bonds held by complainants, and should so apply it, the contract of the city would be fully performed. The complainants would have no right to say that the city could not levy other taxes on its real estate or pay such taxes in any order it chose. The questions presented by this part of the prayer for relief were discussed in the case of Ranger v. New Orleans [Case No. 11,564], and a result reached adverse to granting the relief prayed. The injunction allowed pendente lite will be made perpetual. All other relief prayed for must be refused.

MAFFET (CAMBIOSO v.). See Case No. 2,330.

MAGAURAN (COWAN v.). See Case No. 3,292.

McGAVICK (PICKETT v.). See Case No. 11,126.

MAGDALENE, The. See Case No. 2,056.

Case No. 8,941.

In re MAGEE.

[1 Wkly. Notes Cas. 21.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 7, 1874.

BANKRUPTCY—PRACTICE—APPLICATION TO ANNUL ADJUDICATION.

Application [by George R. Magee] to annul adjudication, all known creditors having assented thereto in writing, and no warrant having issued.

THE COURT ordered the vacation of the order of adjudication, upon proof of assent of all known creditors, and publication of the notice of the application for annulment.

Case No. 8,942.

MAGEE v. CALLAN et al.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 251.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1832.

BAIL—CIVIL ACTION—JOINT AND SEPARATE—BAIL FOR ONE—AFFIDAVIT.

1. Upon attachment of the goods and effects of both and each of two joint debtors, bail must be given for both, to release the joint and separate effects.

2. Bail will not be received for one only to discharge his separate goods.

3. The court will not, upon affidavit, decide whether the effects attached are the joint or several property of the defendants.

This was an action at law by Peter Magee against James Callan and Andrew Clements.] Attachment on warrant, under the Maryland act of 1795, c. 56, of the joint and separate effects of the defendants, for a joint debt; laid in the hands of the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Company as garnishees.

Mr. Marbury, for Clements, one of the defendants, offered bail and an appearance for him, to discharge his separate effects.

C. Cox demanded bail for both defendants; for bail for one would discharge the joint as well as separate property attached.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contrà, or at least doubting,) refused to permit one of the defendants to appear and give bail, unless bail and appearance be entered for both. The joint effects are attached to compel the appearance of both; and ought not to be given up without the appearance of both; and the defendants cannot be permitted to appear without good bail.

On the next day, Mr. Marbury offered an ex parte affidavit of Mr. J. P. Ingle, the clerk of the canal company, that the company had no joint effects of the defendants in their hands, but had the separate effects of each; and moved again to appear and give bail for Clements alone, so as to discharge his separate effects, and contended that he had a right, in this manner, to show that no joint effects were attached; and that, in an attachment against a partner for his separate debt, his share or interest in the joint effects may be attached. Campbell v. Morris, 3 Har. & McH. 553, and Wallace v. Patterson, 2 Har. & McH. 463.

THE COURT, however (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent), said that the affidavit of Mr. Ingle could not be received as sufficient evidence to the court, in this stage of the cause, that the effects in the hands of the canal company are not joint effects. The plaintiff had a right to have that question tried, either upon interrogatories, or by a jury, upon the issue of nulla bona; and this court could not, in this manner, deprive him of that right.

Bail was then given for both, and the attachment dissolved.

Case No. 8,943.

MAGEE v. DENTON et al.

[5 Blatchf. 130.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Jan. 7, 1863.

TAXATION—INCOME—DIVIDENDS—ILLEGAL ASSESSMENT—REMEDY.

1. Under the internal revenue act of July 1st, 1862 (12 Stat. 432), when a dividend has been declared by an incorporated company, and become payable, its amount is to be regarded as forming part of the taxable income of the stockholders of the company, even though they do not call for and receive the dividend.

2. If an assessment of income tax under that act is not made in legal form, the remedy of the person aggrieved is at law, and not in equity.

3. If such assessment is made in legal form, the party aggrieved must pursue the remedy provided by section 93 of the act, before he can resort to a court of equity for relief.

This was an application for a provisional injunction, to restrain the defendant [Seymour F.] Denton, as a collector of internal revenue, from collecting $1,500 of the income tax assessed against the plaintiff [John Magee] under the internal revenue act of July 1st, 1862 (12 Stat. 433). The bill showed, that the plaintiff made, in due form, a particular statement of his income for the year 1862, and verified the same by his oath; that the statement was then delivered to the proper assistant assessor, who increased the taxable income shown by that statement, by the addition to it of $30,000, on the assumed ground that the plaintiff's share of the profits of a mining company in which he was the principal stockholder, amounted to that sum, and had not been included in the statement; that the plaintiff objected to this increase, and offered to show, by his oath, that he had received no profits or dividends from the company, and that it was an incorporated company, and had expended all its profits for the year in the improvement of its property, by opening a mine, &c.; that the assistant assessor persisted in maintaining the propriety of such increase, and the assessor, on the question being presented to him, also refused to strike the increase from the assessment; that the assessor consented to submit the matter to the commissioner of internal revenue, and the case was presented to him, in an argument, by the counsel for the plaintiff, the question before both the assessor and the commissioner having been understood to be, whether a stockholder of an incorporated company, which had made profits during the year 1862, and had expended such profits in repairs or improvements, or in the purchase of stock or other property, instead of making dividends to its stockholders, could be taxed for his share of such profits, as part of his income for that year; and that the commissioner decided the question in the affirmative, and the assessor refused to strike the increase made by the assistant assessor from the assessment, but returned the original assessment to the collector without modification. The bill was filed against the collector, the assessor, and the assistant assessor.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

HALL, District Judge. In the view I take of this case, the motion for an injunction must be denied, without reaching the question of the original liability of the plaintiff to be assessed for such profits of the company as had not been embraced in any dividend declared by it. If the plaintiff's counsel is correct in the position that the profits of an incorporated company, itself an artificial person, are not, in the contemplation of the act of congress, a portion of the gains, profits, or income of the stockholders, until they are distributed as dividends, or embraced in a dividend declared by the managers of the corporation, I think it quite clear that, when a dividend has been declared and has become payable, the mere omission of the stockholder to obtain or receive the dividend subject to his call, would not excuse him from embracing the amount of such dividend in his statement of his taxable income for the year. The bill does not show that no dividend had been declared; and that fact should have been directly and explicitly stated, in order to entitle the plaintiff to an injunction. The bill, in regard to this point, only states that the plaintiff, during the year 1862, never received anything from said incorporated company by way of dividends on his shares, or otherwise. This statement is not necessarily untrue, even if the dividends actually declared on the plaintiff's stock during that year amounted to the sum of $30,000.

Another objection is, that the plaintiff had a perfect remedy under the statute, and failed to avail himself of that remedy, and that no reason for such failure, of a character to give a court of equity jurisdiction to relieve him, appears on the face of the bill. The wrongful act, if any, of which the plaintiff complains, is the addition of $30,000 made to his income statement by the assistant assessor. If this has not been made in such form and mode as to give the legal right to levy and collect the tax therefor, that objection must be urged in a court of law and not in a court of equity. If made in legal form, the act of congress gives the right of appealing to the assessor, and provides, in substance (section 93), that if the list or return of any party shall have been increased by the assistant assessor, he or she may be permitted to declare, under oath or affirmation, in the form and manner to be prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue, the amount of his or her annual income liable to be assessed under the act, and that the same so declared shall be the sum upon which duties are to be assessed and collected. In the view that the plaintiff's counsel takes of this case, the plaintiff could have made the oath thus required, or rather which the law thus permitted him to make, and, if the assessor had refused to strike the wrongful increase from the assessment, the plaintiff could have had his remedy. As the assessor had no discretion, and would have been bound, on the presentation of such an oath, to strike the addition from the assessment, it is probable that the plaintiff might have had a remedy at law by mandamus, if the assessor had refused to perform the duty; and it is certain that, if he would have had no remedy at law, he would have had one in equity. The right to make this oath, and thus to become entitled to have the assessment corrected, must be fatal to the plaintiff's prayer for relief in this suit, unless his neglect to make such oath be excused by some allegation of fraud, accident, or mistake, giving jurisdiction to a court of equity. It is like the case of a defendant in a suit at law, who has neglected to appear and establish a legal defence in that suit, when he had an opportunity to do so, and has then resorted to a court of equity to set aside the judgment.

It was suggested, on the argument, that the making of the oath prescribed by the 93d section would not have changed the aspect of the case, because the making of it would have been but the reiteration of the oath already taken and furnished to the assistant assessor, and because, on the ground assumed by the assessor and by the commissioner of internal revenue, the assessor would still have refused to strike the increase made by the assistant assessor from the assessment against the plaintiff. It is true, that the plaintiff's oath, verifying the statement first delivered by him to the assistant assessor, contained nearly, if not precisely, the oath prescribed by the 93d section; but the oath then made and delivered was, it is said, not required by the statute, and, if so, perjury could not have been assigned upon it, even if it had been wilfully false; but, whether that be so or not, as the act of congress requires this oath after the increase has been made by the assistant assessor, and after the attention of the party has been called to such increase, and he has had an opportunity to inquire upon what grounds such increase was made, it is clear that the oath previously taken cannot be made available for the purposes for which the oath prescribed in section 93 is to be made.

The grounds above stated are fatal to the application for an injunction; for an injunction ought not to be granted, in a case of this kind, unless the plaintiff's right is quite clear, and the granting of the injunction is necessary to protect and secure that right.

MAGEE (McNEIL v.). See Case No. 8,915.

Case No. 8,944.

MAGEE et al. v. The MOSS.

[Gilp. 219.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Nov. 12, 1831; Dec. 31, 1831.

SEAMEN'S WAGES — FORFEITURE — DESERTION — SHIPPING ARTICLES — CERTAINTY OF VOYAGE — ENTRY IN LOG BOOK — MASTER'S CRUELTY — IMPRISONMENT IN FOREIGN PORT.

1. The shipping articles must declare explicitly the ports at which the voyage is to commence and terminate.

[Cited in The Brutus, Case No. 2,060.]

2. Where shipping articles declare the voyage to be "from Philadelphia to South America, or any other port or ports, backwards and forwards, when and where required, and back to Philadelphia," it is no violation of the contract with the seamen, for the master to proceed from South America to Europe, and affords no justification to them for leaving the vessel.

[Disapproved in Snow v. Wope, Case No. 13,149.]

3. To subject a seaman to the forfeiture of his wages for desertion, according to the provisions of the act of 20th July, 1790, [1 Stat. 131], the prescribed entry in the log book is indispensable.

[Cited in Spencer v. Eustis, 21 Me. 521.]

4. Where the departure of the seamen from a vessel, before the termination of the voyage, is involuntary on their part, or with reasonable cause, or with the apparent assent of the master, they do not forfeit their wages.

[Followed in Jansen v. The Theodor Heinrich, Case No. 7,215. Quoted in The Lilian M. Vigus, Id. 8,346.]

[See The Balize, Case No. 809.]

5. To justify seamen for leaving a vessel, before the termination of the voyage, on account of the cruelty of the master, it must be apparent that they could not remain without extreme danger to their personal safety.

6. Where a seaman is imprisoned by the authorities of a foreign country for a violation of its laws, the costs and charges may be deducted from his wages; but not so when he is imprisoned at the instance of the master of the vessel.

[Cited in The David Pratt, Case No. 3,597.]

7. The imprisonment of a seaman in a foreign gaol, at the instance of the master of a vessel, is only to be justified by extreme necessity.

[Cited in Jordan v. Williams, Case No. 7,528.]

[Quoted in Buddington v. Smith, 13 Conn. 336.]

The libellants [John Magee, Alexander Ware, John Dunderfield, and William Pitt] were seamen on board the ship Moss. They shipped at Philadelphia, as appeared by the articles, on the 2d January, 1830, on board the ship Moss, at the wages of fifteen dollars a month, "on a voyage from Philadelphia to South America, or any other port or ports, backwards and forwards, when and where required, and back to Philadelphia, unless sooner discharged." The vessel sailed on the 3d January, for Buenos Ayres, where they arrived about the 5th March. All the persons on board were put on an allowance of three quarts of water each per day, from the 22d February until they made the land. They sailed from Buenos Ayres, on the 27th June, for Havanna, where they arrived on the 3d September. All the persons on board were put on an allowance of one pound of bread each per day, from the 8th July until they reached the Havanna, but there was plenty of potatoes, vegetables and meat given them. The vessel remained at Havanna until the 30th December, 1830, when she proceeded to Marseilles, thence to Pernambuco, and thence back to Philadelphia, where she arrived on the 10th October, 1831. On the 19th December, 1830, the libellants left the vessel at the Havanna, having first made known their intention so to do to the American consul, without having received the wages then due to them, and without any assistance from the captain to enable them to return to the United States. The libellants declare that during the time they remained on board the vessel, they were not allowed a sufficient quantity of provisions, and were treated with extreme cruelty; during the time they were at the Havanna, Ware and Dunderfield, two of the libellants, were confined in gaol, at the instance of the captain; and they finally left the vessel, because they discovered that the captain was about to carry them from the Havanna to an European port, contrary to the contract as contained in the shipping articles, and also because of the ill treatment they had experienced.

[1] [Reported by John R. Gilpin, Esq.]

The respondent, Edmund Fennell, who was the master of the vessel, denies in his answer that the libellants were obliged to leave her in consequence of ill treatment or abuse, or because the provisions were insufficient or bad. He alleges that when the two seamen, Ware and Dunderfield, were confined in prison at his instance, it was done with the assent of the American consul, on account of their drunkenness and improper conduct, and on one occasion, when he found that Ware had been put in gaol by the Havanna police, he obtained his discharge and paid the costs, together with the expense of medical attendance which he afterwards required. He further alleges that Magee, Ware and Dunderfield deserted from the vessel; that their desertion was regularly entered in the log book; and that other seamen were hired in their places at higher wages. The account annexed to the libel claims full wages from the time of shipment until the libellants left the vessel; additional wages for the time they were on short allowance; and their expenses from the day they left the vessel till they reached Philadelphia. The respondent, besides alleging an entire forfeiture on the ground of desertion, claims allowance for various sums advanced, for the excess of additional wages paid to seamen shipped in their places after they left the vessel, and for the expenses of their several imprisonments at the Havanna. The libellants were severally examined for each other, to support the allegations of the libel. On the other side, for the respondent, the supercargo of the vessel from Havanna, and the first mate of the ship, who also joined her at Havanna, and other witnesses were produced; their testimony contradicted, or greatly weakened the evidence of the libellants, especially on the subject of the provisions. There was rice on board, which was occasionally served out, also potatoes, and generally the stores of the ship were good, indeed of a superior quality. The accounts also of the severity of the captain were softened and modified.

C. Ingersoll, for libellants.

There has been such a deviation from the voyage contracted for as discharges the seamen from the contract. The words "other port or ports, backwards and forwards," intend only ports in South America. The voyage was "to South America, or, (not 'and,') any other ports." Having gone to Buenos Ayres was a full performance of the articles. "Backwards and forwards," means between South America and Philadelphia. "Any other port or ports," is as general as "elsewhere;" they mean the same thing. By the first section of the act of congress of 20th July, 1790, the articles must declare the voyage and terms of shipment. This was to prevent uncertain and indefinite contracts, or terms of service; to guard and protect seamen against their own heedlessness in signing articles. Can seamen, under the general description of port or ports, be kept indefinitely, and carried to any part of the world? There is no limitation here even of time. Nor is a voyage to Marseilles either subordinate to, or consistent with, the voyage described in the articles. 1 Story, Laws, 102 [1 Stat. 131]; Anonymous [Case No. 449]; Brown v. Jones [Id. 2,017]; The Brutus [Id. 2,060]; Wood v. The Nimrod [Id. 17,959].

Was there a consent or acquiescence on the part of Captain Fennell that these men might leave the vessel? When a forfeiture of wages is insisted on, a clear case must be made out against the seamen. The seventh section of the act of congress of 20th July, 1790, invests the master with certain powers. He is bound to use these and all the means afforded by the law to recover and retain the seamen, before he can resort to forfeiture. The answer of the captain to the mate, when asked if he was about to discharge the seamen, shows either that he was conscious they had a right to go on account of the change of the voyage, or that he was willing to part with them. They did not consider themselves as deserters; neither did the captain so consider them. Will the court then so consider them? They applied to a lawyer for counsel; they appealed to the court of the place where they were, being willing to meet the captain, to have their right discussed and decided; they were sent by the court to the master of the port, and by him to the consul, who gave them a letter to take on board the ship. The captain adopted no measures to bring them back to the ship; he never even asked them to return, although he frequently saw them. They went about at large, making no attempt at flight or concealment. All this was acquiescence in their departure; they might well so consider it. If this was not acquiescence, still there can be no forfeiture unless the captain had done all in his power to compel their return; that is a part of his duty. These men remained constantly within the sight and recall of the captain, without an effort, or even request on his part for their return. Seamen may leave the ship if a voyage is changed. Abb. Shipp. 147, 464; Ordinances of France, bk. 2, tit. 3, art. 4; Thorne v. White [Case No. 13,989]; Crammer v. The Fair American [Id. 3,347]; Hindman v. Shaw [Id. 6,514]; Moran v. Baudin [Id. 9,785].

J. S. Smith, for respondent.

Had these seamen a right to leave the ship at Havanna; had not the captain a right to insist on their going to Marseilles?

The forfeiture of wages does not rest on the act of congress only, but on the principles of the commercial and general maritime law. The act of congress provides penalties for two acts of a seaman. 1. Not rendering himself on board. 2. Absence without leave for more or less than forty-eight hours. If a seaman dies immediately after the vessel sails, his representatives may recover for the whole voyage, on the ground of its entirety. In the case of Sims v. Jackson [Case No. 12,890], it is said, "he would have forfeited the whole, if he had left the vessel." This was not under the provision of the act of congress, but by the maritime law.

The act of congress applies to all the libellants except Pitt; as to the rest its directions were strictly complied with. The excuses set up for leaving the ship are now all abandoned, except two. 1. That the ship was going to Europe, which was not authorised by the articles. 2. That the captain acquiesced in their departure.

I. As to the construction of the articles; are they such as the act of congress requires? The contract must declare the voyage, not describe it. It must be declared, that the seamen may know where they have a right to be discharged, and when. The terminus a quo and ad quem must be stated, but not the intermediate ports. This voyage was from Philadelphia to South America, and back to Philadelphia, omitting the intermediate ports. The words or "any other port or ports" must mean ports not in South America, which was already mentioned. Between South America and the other ports they are to go backwards and forwards, where and when required. The voyage ends on their return "back to Philadelphia," the port of final discharge. The voyage performed was in exact conformity with the articles. The ship went from Philadelphia to Buenos Ayres, in South America, thence to Havanna, a port not in South America, and thence to Marseilles, another port not in South America, thence back to South America, and thence to Philadelphia. 3 Kent, Comm. 178; Abb. Shipp. 463, 468.

II. As to the acquiescence of the captain, it rests only on the fact that he saw them on shore and did not order them on board; this too rests only on the evidence of the men themselves. It does not, besides, apply at all to Pitt. The consul certainly ordered them on board; they refused to go. Suppose the captain did acquiesce; that he used no force to bring them back; was he under any obligation to do so? The deserting seaman must come himself and offer to make amends, and to go on board. The captain is not then bound to receive him if he has hired another in his place. It does not appear whether the captain saw these men on shore before or after he had hired others. Ware was put into prison by the police. Abb. Shipp. 136; 3 Hopk. Works, 206; Whitton v. The Commerce [Case No. 17,604].

C. Ingersoll, in reply.

You cannot strike out "or," and put in "and," which is necessary for the respondent's construction of the article. The men were bound to go to South America, "or" any other ports, not "and" any other ports. All after South America is illegal and void for uncertainty. As to the necessity of an entry in the log book, the act of congress fixes the time of absence which shall be deemed to be a desertion and incur a forfeiture. The maritime law has no such limitation. The act also directs the particular mode of proof of such absence; it must be by the entry in the log book.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. The libellants have presented three claims for the decision of the court. 1. For having been put on short allowance. 2. For wages up to the time they left the ship. 3. For additional pay to bring them back to the United States. The respondent rebuts these claims; the first by the denial of the charge; the second and third by charging the libellants with a desertion from the ship and their duty, by which they have forfeited their wages, and of course every claim to an extra allowance. The fact being admitted that they did leave the vessel at Havanna, it is incumbent on them to show a good cause for doing so, or some legal justification to avoid the penalty which otherwise the law will impose upon them. As to Pitt, besides the justification he relies on, in common with the other libellants, he has a further defence against the penalty of forfeiture, in the omission to note his absence in the log book. This has been repeatedly decided to be necessary; and it must be considered to be settled, when a forfeiture of wages is insisted upon, under the provisions of our act of congress. The same law which gives the forfeiture for the absence of seamen, prescribes an evidence by which that absence shall be proved; and the owner who claims the penalty, must conform himself to the proof required of him, by the same authority which gives the penalty.

The general defence which the libellants have to avoid this penalty, is in the allegation, that the ship was going from Havanna to Marseilles, in Europe; that this was a voyage not within the contract; and that they were not bound to go with her. That the breach of the contract was on the part of the captain in taking the ship to a place not within the terms of the articles. The validity of this defence depends upon the construction of the articles, and the obligation entered into by the libellants when they executed them. The voyage described in the articles is "from Philadelphia to South America, or any other port or ports, backwards and forwards, when and where required, and back to Philadelphia, unless sooner discharged." This is certainly a very awkward description of a voyage. South America is spoken of as a port to which they are to go,

"or" to any other port or ports, without any designation of them, whether in Europe or America; but they are to go backwards and forwards, where and when required. It will not do to tie down these contracts, made sometimes in a counting house, and sometimes in the cabin of a ship, to the strict rules of composition. We must endeavour to come at the true meaning of the parties, and to give the contract a reasonable construction; to take care to put upon general words a just and reasonable limitation; but not lightly to destroy and avoid the whole contract because the generality or breadth of the expressions may be in a degree uncertain, or might be used to impose an oppressive service. The court will take care that this shall not be done, and will avoid the whole if they cannot so limit it. In the present case I can see nothing unreasonable or oppressive in the construction the captain has put upon these articles. He took the ship to Buenos Ayres; he then went to Havanna, and from thence to Marseilles; he came again to a port in South America, and then terminated the voyage by returning to Philadelphia. This voyage or these voyages were strictly within the terms of the contract, and, in my opinion, no unjust or oppressive use has been made of the awkward manner in which the contract is expressed.

In the case of Wood v. The Nimrod [Case No. 17,959], I adopted this principle, and I consider it to be in full accordance with the opinion of Judge Winchester, adopted by Judge Story, in the case of Brown v. Jones [Id. 2,017]. In the case in which the opinion of Judge Winchester is given, Anonymous [Id. 449], the articles specified a voyage from Baltimore "to Curracoa and elsewhere," and the respondent contended he had a right to go to St. Domingo without going to Curracoa. There he claimed to go in direct violation of a clear specification or designation of a port named in the contract, and he made the claim under the general words "and elsewhere." It is also on the face of that contract, that although the voyage commenced at Baltimore, it had no ascertained or declared termination, either as to time or place. We have the "a quo" but not the "ad quem." In such a case, where, besides all this, the respondent had rested his defence on his own deception and breach of faith, the learned judge says "the term 'voyage' is a technical phrase, and always imports a definite commencement and end." In our case, this description of a voyage is fully answered; the uncertainty, such as it is, is about the intermediate ports to which the vessel might go. But even in such a case as that which the judge had before him, he would not absolutely reject the terms "and elsewhere," or destroy the whole contract for their uncertainty. He would give them a reasonable meaning and construction consistent with the contract. "They must be construed" he says, "as subordinate to the voyage specified, and can only authorise the pursuing such a course as may be necessary to accomplish the principal voyage." The judge explicitly says, that he would not be understood "to give any opinion that it is essential to the validity of seamen's articles, that there should be an insertion of the name of every port, to which a vessel may proceed, in the course of trade; but there must be some equivalent specification, such as to a port or ports, island or islands in the West Indies." In the present case, the person who shipped these men, swears that the articles were read to them, and they perfectly understood them, and that he has frequently shipped men to go to "port or ports" without mentioning what part of the world they were in.

The libellants have set up another justification for leaving the ship, to wit, the cruelty and barbarity of the captain to them. Some strong evidence has been produced by the seamen in support of this part of the defence. On the other hand there is evidence which softens, but does not remove this charge against the captain. The ill treatment of sailors, by the officers under whose command they are placed, has so frequently been a subject of complaint, that courts have taken pains to explain the law so as to secure full protection and justice to the seamen on the one side, and to discourage unreasonable complaints on the other. Masters and mates of vessels are often coarse and rough men, with very little control over their tempers, and fond of using their power to its utmost. Seamen are also as often insolent, obstinate, and negligent of their duty, and require a strict hand of discipline. Both have the property of others entrusted to them, and it is the object of the law to give as much security as possible to all these interests. The seamen must submit to a reasonable discipline, and to such privations and punishments as are necessary to enforce a faithful performance of their duties, but they must, nevertheless, be treated as men, with the feelings of men, always entitled to the rights of humanity and the protection of the law. To justify the men in leaving their ship in a foreign port, or abandoning their duty at the hazard of loss or ruin to their owners, they must make out a very strong case indeed. Before they resort to this extreme remedy, the necessity for it ought to be extreme, or so pressing that a moderate and reasonable man could not resist it. They should bear much and trust for satisfaction and redress from the law, when they return home, and not, for every excess of punishment, become their own judges and avengers at the heavy expense of the innocent owners, who pay them for their service, and have trusted to their fidelity. The cases on which the courts have justified the seamen, on a plea of cruelty by the captain, in leaving the service and terminating their contract, have been where it was apparent that they could not remain with him without danger and damage to their personal safety, such as to make a dissolution of the contract necessary. No man can be bound to serve another at the peril of his life.

In the case of Rice v. The Polly and Kitty [Case No. 11,754], there was not only a most wanton and excessive cruelty or beating of the men, but the most dangerous threats of personal injury if they continued on board. They were obliged to leave the ship at Lisbon, in the midst of the voyage and return in another vessel. The question was, whether they had forfeited their wages. The judge said: "When mariners enter into articles for a voyage, they do not thereby put themselves out of the protection of the laws, or subject their limbs or lives to the capricious passions of a master or his mate." There is no doubt much power given by the law to the master, but the law also watches the use he makes of it, and corrects any abuse of it. In that case the libellants had been cruelly beaten and abused; it was necessary to have a surgeon to cure one of them of his wounds and bruises. The captain and the mate were combined, and supporting each other in their barbarity to the men. The master once declared that "he would make them glad to jump overboard before they got to America." The whole crew left the vessel, but did not secrete themselves on shore; they demanded their wages and clothes and applied for process against the captain and mate, who promised to pay them their wages, and recorded the process. The judge did not, it is true, rely on the promise in giving his judgment, but said: "The libellants have not voluntarily deserted, but have been forced from a service in which neither the rights of humanity nor personal safety could be depended upon or even expected."

To forfeit wages there must be a voluntary departure, without reasonable cause. Abb. Shipp. 464. In the case of Limland v. Stephens, 3 Esp. 269, which was one of seamen's wages, Lord Kenyon says: "There are reciprocal duties between masters and servants. Desertion is a forfeiture of wages; but if the captain conducts himself in such a way as puts the sailor into that situation that he cannot, without damage to his personal safety, continue in his service, human nature speaks the language—a servant is justified in providing for that safety. After the plaintiff had been with the consul, he communicated to the defendant the wish of the consul to see him. The captain said, he would go when it suited him. Being pressed by the plaintiff to go, he beat him very severely, and threw a log of wood which hurt his foot. The plaintiff left the ship, and defendant was heard to say, that if he returned he would chain him to the mast, and bring him to Sweden." In reply to an observation made by the counsel of the defendant, Lord Kenyon said: "Is a man bound to serve at the peril of his life? Desertion is an answer to the seaman's claim for wages; but that must be a voluntary act of the seaman's, and not caused by any act of the captain. In this case, the act of the captain has made the dissolution of the contract necessary, and, in my opinion, justifiable on the part of the sailor." This case was decided in 1801. The case of The Polly and Kitty [supra], in which the same principles were adopted, was decided in 1789, by Judge Hopkinson, then judge of the admiralty in this district.

I have quoted these cases so much at large, to show that the cruelty must be extreme and dangerous to justify a sailor in leaving his ship and throwing up his contract. In both the cases cited, there was not only barbarous abuse of the persons of the sailors, but threats of future ill usage of a dangerous violence, which there was good reason to believe would be fully executed. The case of the present libellants has no such features; the captain was a harsh, severe man, but by no means of so brutal a character as those we have alluded to. I do not think his conduct justified the libellants in leaving the ship, or made a dissolution of their contract necessary.

The libellants having failed to justify their leaving the ship, either on account of the alleged change of the voyage described in the articles, or the ill treatment of them by the captain, they have incurred a forfeiture of their wages, unless their remaining ground of defence shall avail them, to wit, the consent or acquiescence of the captain in their departure. The forfeiture of wages earned by a hard and perilous service is a severe penalty, and should be exacted only on a clear legal cause. So it has been considered by the courts, and those who claim this penalty have always been required to show themselves to be clearly entitled to it by the performance, on their part, of all the requisitions of the law. The master of the vessel must throw the fault on the offending seamen; he must deal with them fairly, and honestly, and in good faith. He should neither endeavor to drive them from their duty, nor deceive and entrap these rash and ignorant men into a course of conduct, which he sees may draw upon them the loss of their wages, while they have no such suspicion. If they are really and truly acting under a mistaken opinion of their rights, and not from a dishonest or rebellious disposition, they shall be undeceived, their error should be explained, or at least they should not be drawn or permitted, by an insidious silence or an inattention to their proceedings, to involve themselves in the crime of desertion with its ruinous consequences. A practice of this sort upon sailors, may well be considered as a fraud, and the contriver ought not to gain by it. How were the facts of this case? The libellants left the ship under a belief that they had a right to do so; that the intention to take them to Europe was a breach of the contract, and discharged them from it. They also thought that the treatment they had received from the captain dissolved their contract. They were mistaken in both points; it was a mistake of the law of their case, and not a mutinous resolution to disregard their contract, and the law which bound them to it. Their conduct shows that they had a sincere confidence in their opinion, and were willing to bring it to a fair test. They make no flight, they seek no concealment, they walk openly about the city, they go to the wharf, they meet the captain without apprehension, they demand their wages of him, they apply to the courts of the country for redress, and in every thing they conduct themselves like men confident in their right. What was the conduct of the captain? He passed them again and again; he took none of the measures the law put in his power to bring them back to the ship and their duty; he did not even order them to go on board. In his conversation with the mate he expressed himself doubtfully as to his intention of taking these men with him, and finally sailed away leaving them to shift for themselves.

In the case of Dixon v. The Cyrus [Case No. 3,930], circumstances by no means as decided as these, were considered as strong evidence of consent on the part of the master to the departure of the seamen. The question of good faith is one hardly capable of direct, explicit testimony. It is an impression, an opinion derived from the whole conduct of the party. The conduct of Captain Fennell in his severe treatment of these men while they were under his authority, and his extraordinary abstinence from every attempt, even the most mild, to bring them back after they had left him, present him to my mind as a man of a violent and severe temper, and wanting in frankness and fair dealing. It seems to me that he was dissatisfied with these men, for they had certainly misbehaved themselves, and was quite willing they should leave the ship; but while he endeavoured to compel them to do so by his severity, and would lull them into security by his entire inattention to their absence, he was indulging himself in the anticipation that he would deprive them each of eleven months' wages. He was not open even to his mate. In a case in which the conduct of the captain was so calculated to deceive and mislead the men, and to induce them to believe he had no desire for them to return to the ship, but acquiesced in their opinion that he had no claim upon them to go with him to Europe; where, too, it is at least doubtful whether he did not design to mislead them for the very purpose of forfeiting their wages on a charge of desertion, I will not deprive them of their reward for services faithfully rendered for the space of eleven months. The owners of this ship have, in these services, received full value for the money demanded of them, and I see no just cause for withholding it.

There is a subordinate question in this case which must also be disposed of. The respondent claims a credit for certain prison fees paid at Havanna for the libellants, or some of them. It appears that, except in the case of Ware, the men were imprisoned by, or at the instance of the captain; but Ware was put in gaol, by the police officers of the city, for some misconduct or offence against the laws of the country. For the money paid by the captain to obtain his liberation from imprisonment he is justly chargeable, and the respondent must be credited with the amount. But no such credit will be allowed against the men imprisoned by the captain for his grievances or complaint. I have declared that I will not countenance the practice of thrusting our seamen into foreign gaols by the captain, through the influence he may have with our consuls or the officers in a foreign port. It is always a most severe punishment, and in some climates dangerous to health and life. The punishments which the law authorises the master to inflict on board of his vessel, by personal correction, by confinement and other privations, are generally sufficient for all the purposes of discipline. It should be only in a case of some pressing necessity, of some danger to the vessel, or her master or crew, that the men should be imprisoned on shore.

Decree: It is ordered and decreed, that the libellants shall recover and have from the respondent, the wages severally due to them, from the time they respectively shipped and entered on board of the said ship Moss, until the time when they respectively left the said ship, and ceased to perform any service or duty on board of her, deducting therefrom all payments made to the said libellants respectively, and all credits to which the respondent is entitled for advances of money or goods; and also deducting from the wages severally due to the libellants, the amount paid by the respondent beyond the amount stipulated to be paid to the libellants, to the hands employed in their places for the remainder of the voyage after the libellants had left the ship. And it is further ordered and decreed. that there be deducted from the wages due to Alexander Ware. the money paid by the respondent to obtain his release from the prison at Havanna, in which he had been confined by the authority of that city for offences against its laws and police; but no deduction shall be made from any of the libellants for or on account of any prison fees, or other costs and charges, induced by or in consequence of their imprisonment by the captain of the ship, or the American consul at his instance. And it is further ordered and decreed, that the several accounts of the libellants be adjusted and paid on these principles, and in case of any disagreement between the parties, be reported and referred to the court for final adjudication.

The several claims of the libellants for short allowance are dismissed, and also their claim of two months' pay to keep them at Havanna and bring them home to Philadelphia.

On the 31st December, 1831, the parties having reported their adjustment of the accounts of the several libellants to the court for a final adjudication, it was ordered and decreed that there be paid by the respondent to the libellants severally, the following sums, to wit, to Alexander Ware one hundred and nineteen dollars and nine cents; to John Dunderfield one hundred and forty-three dollars and thirty-two cents; to John Magee one hundred and forty-nine dollars and two cents; and to William Pitt eighty-four dollars and ninety-seven cents.

Case No. 8,945.

MAGEE v. UNION PAC. R. CO.

[2 Sawy. 447.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Nevada. Aug. 4, 1873.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—PETITION—UNDER LAW OF UNITED STATES—MOTION TO REMAND —WHEN MADE.

1. A suit removed from a state court into the circuit court, upon a petition stating that the defendant has a defense arising under a law of the United States, will be remanded when it appears by the defendant's answer that no such defense is claimed or made.

2. The fact that the corporation is one organized under a law of the United States is not, of itself, enough to give the circuit court jurisdiction.

3. Motion to remand may be made before trial whenever there are no disputed facts, and it clearly appears from the record, as well as the admissions of counsel, that the corporation has no defense arising under a law of the United States.

This action was brought in the state court [by John Magee] to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been received by plaintiff's wife, while traveling on defendant's railroad, in the territory of Utah, and was removed to this court by defendant, the petition for removal stating generally, that the defendant had a defense to the action arising under a law of the United States. The defendant is a corporation organized under a law of the United States. The cause having been entered here the defendant filed its answer, alleging that the injuries, if any, were received by plaintiff's wife in Utah; that that territory has competent courts to try the action; that its principal place of business was and is in Boston, Massachusetts, and that, therefore, this court has no jurisdiction. Beyond this the answer contains only apt words to deny negligence and unskillfulness, and to aver the exercise of due care. The act of congress, under which the cause was removed, provides that "any corporation * * other than a banking corporation organized under a law of the United States, and against which an action at law * * may be commenced * * for any alleged liability of such corporation, may have such suit removed * * to the proper circuit court of the United States upon filing a petition therefor, * * * stating that they have a defense arising under or by virtue of the constitution of the United States, or any treaty or law of the United States, and offering good and sufficient surety," etc. 15 Stat. 227. In this state of the law and the record, the plaintiff moved to remand the cause to the state court, upon the ground that it sufficiently appears that the defendant has no defense arising under a law of the United States, it having pleaded none. To this the defendant replied that, being created by and organized under a law of the United States, every defense it may have is one arising under the law which creates it and gives it all its powers.

Mesick & Wood, for plaintiff.

E. Wakeley and Williams & Bixler, for defendant.

Before SAWYER, Circuit Judge, and HILLYER, District Judge.

HILLYER, District Judge. In Mayor v. Cooper, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 247, it was said by the supreme court, that "two things are necessary to create jurisdiction, whether original or appellate. The constitution must have given to the court the capacity to take it, and an act of congress must have supplied it." The defendant being a United States corporation, the constitution has given this court the capacity to take jurisdiction of actions to which it is a party. Osborne v. United States Bank, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 738. But it rests with congress to supply it and prescribe the conditions of its exercise. To entitle the defendant to remove a suit, congress has said, in the law now in question, that it shall not only be a corporation organized under a law of the United States, but shall state in its petition that it has a defense arising under or by virtue of a law of the United States. Unless it has such a defense, this case is not properly here. It was said in Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 264, that a case in law or equity may truly be said to arise under the constitution, or a law of the United States, when its correct decision depends on the construction of either. Following this language, it may be truly said that a defense arises under a law of the United States, when a correct decision upon the merits of the defense depends upon the construction of that law. But it appears in this case, by the admission of counsel, as well as by the record that the defense involves the construction of no law of the United States. A correct decision upon its merits depends entirely upon common law principles, wholly independent of any statute law.

The jurisdiction of this court depends upon the character of the defense, as well as upon the character of the party, and as the defendant has no defense arising under or by virtue of a law of the United States, there is a failure of jurisdiction, and the cause must be remanded to the state court. It was suggested that there was a doubt as to this being the proper stage in the case to determine this question upon motion. There are no disputed facts, and it clearly appears from the admissions of counsel and the record—the answer filed—that this corporation has no defense, as we construe the law, arising under a law of the United States. As the question can never be presented more satisfactorily than now, it would only cause unnecessary delay to postpone the decision of the matter until the trial.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The motion is granted, and an order will be entered, remanding the cause to the court whence it was removed.

MAGEE, The SALLY. See Cases Nos. 12,259–12,261.

Case No. 8,946.

The MAGENTA.

[2 Abb. U. S. 495.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1870.

COLLISION—CUSTOM ON RIVER—LOCATION OF LOOKOUT—BOTH IN FAULT—DAMAGES.

1. The custom of steamboats navigating the Mississippi river, in respect to directing their course when meeting each other,—explained.

2. Neglect on the part of a pilot of a river steamboat to lay her course, when approaching another boat, in conformity to the well settled custom of boats plying upon that river; or the failure to keep a proper lookout,—e. g., when (especially at night) the man on the lookout is stationed in the pilot-house behind the steamer's chimneys, instead of on the hurricane deck, in front of them,—is a fault in navigation which exposes the steamboat to liability for a collision occurring in consequence.

3. Where both of the colliding vessels are in fault for the collision, the aggregate damages sustained by the two should be shared equally between them.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.]

E. C. Billings and A. De B. Hughes, for libelant.

R. H. Marr, for claimant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. About nine o'clock of the night of November 11, 1865, the steamers Brazil and Magenta collided near Bonnet Carre Point, on the Mississippi river, about thirty-eight or thirty-nine miles above the city of New Orleans. The result of the collision was the sinking and loss of the steamer Brazil and cargo. This suit is brought by the owner of the Brazil against the steamer Magenta to recover for the damage sustained.

There is much conflict of testimony in the case; but the following facts are not disputed, or are clearly established by the evidence. The Magenta was ascending and the Brazil descending the river. The Magenta being the ascending boat gave the first signal, to wit, two whistles, indicating her purpose to pass to her own left or port side. This was responded to by the Brazil with two whistles, indicating that she understood the signal of the Magenta, that she assented to it, and her own purpose to pass to her own left or port side. So that, had the signals been observed, each boat in passing the other would have presented to her her starboard side. It is also in proof and undisputed, that the custom or common law of the river is, for ascending boats to run the points, and for the descending to run the bends. In other words, the ascending boat takes her course from the point on one side of the river to the nearest point on the other side, thus enabling her to avoid the obstacle of the current to some extent, and sail in the eddy water near the banks and under the point; the descending boat follows the main channel current, or what is known in the law as the "line" of the stream, following the bends, and thus uses the force of the current as well as her steam power to propel her on her course. It is also established that when the steamers first came in sight of each other the Brazil was in the middle of the river rounding Bonnet Carre Point, which is on right bank of the river, and the Magenta was passing Thirty-Five Mile Point, a mile and a half or two miles below, on the left or east bank. It also appears that the bow of the Brazil collided with the starboard side of the Magenta forward of the wheel; that her bow for a distance of four or five feet on the larboard side and fifteen or twenty feet on her starboard side was knocked off; and that she sunk on the bar on the right bank of the river from one hundred and fifty to two hundred and fifty feet yards from shore.

As to what part of the river the collision occurred at, there is a conflict of testimony between the libelants and claimants. The libelants say it was about the middle of the river, and the claimants that it was near the right bank, and as close to the bar in the right bank as it was safe for the Magenta to run. The weight of the direct evidence upon this point is about equally balanced, but when the probabilities af the two versions, that of the libelants and that of the claimants, are considered, we think the libelants have the advantage. The pilot of the Brazil is not shown to be non compos mentis, and it seems no person, unless insane, piloting a steamer of two hundred tons burden, after assenting to a signal to pass to the larboard, would port his helm and direct his course to the starboard across the river and run into a steamer of one thousand two hundred or one thousand three hundred tons burden. I am forced to the conclusion, therefore, that the collision took place near the middle of the river, and that the Brazil did not change her course.

[1] [Reported by Benjamin Vaughan Abbott, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

And here is where her fault lies. Her pilot knew or ought to have known the custom of the river, that ascending boats ran the points. The signal of the Magenta indicating that she intended to keep to the left was notice to the Brazil that the Magenta proposed to cross from Thirty-Five Mile Point, and run up the bank along and under Bonnet Carre Point, and it was his duty, instead of stopping his boat, to put his helm a-starboard and direct his course close in on the left bank of the river. If, when the signals were exchanged, he had done this, a collision would have been impossible.

It is very clear from the testimony, that both the captain and the pilot of the Brazil were inexperienced and unfit to have charge of a boat. With skill and prudence on the part of these officers, I have no doubt that a collision might have been avoided.

But it is just as clear that there was fault on the part of the Magenta. When signals were exchanged between the two boats, the officers of the Magenta must have known, or should have known, that a collision was possible; they intended to cross the river and run up under Bonnet Carre Point; they knew that the Brazil was coming down the current of the river, running the bends according to the custom of descending boats, and it was their duty to have a lookout stationed in such a position, on the boat, as to keep the Brazil in view, and give warning of impending danger. According to the testimony of claimants themselves, this was not done.

Carter, the pilot of the Magenta, testifies: "A few moments after exchanging signals, the lights of the descending boat were hidden from witness by the chimneys of the Magenta; this time was probably half a minute, not more than a minute. When I next saw the lights, I discovered that the Brazil, the descending boat, was running directly across the river, square across our bow."

Captain Leathers, of the Magenta, testifies that he and both the pilots were in the pilot-house at the time of the collision. If the chimneys of the Magenta hid the lights of the Brazil from the pilot, Carter, they hid them also from the other pilot and the captain. The proper and usual place for the lookout was on the hurricane deck, in front of the chimneys. No testimony is offered on the part of the claimants to show that a man on the lookout was stationed there, and it is fair to presume that there was none or we should have the fact in the testimony. The pilot-house, behind the chimneys, is not the place for the man on watch, when passing other steamers in the night. If a proper lookout had been maintained on the Magenta, the impending danger of a collision might have been seen, and by good seamanship avoided.

I find, therefore, that both steamers were at fault; that by the exercise of proper watchfulness and skill on the part of either, the collision might have been avoided. In such a case, according to the rules laid down by the supreme court in The Catherine v. Dickinson, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 170, the loss must be divided.

The damage to the Magenta was, according to Captain Leathers, from three to five hundred dollars; and he is the only witness that speaks to the point. I put the damages, therefore, at three hundred dollars.

The testimony as to the damage occasioned by the loss of the Brazil is very conflicting; but after a careful review of the testimony, I am satisfied the court below fixed the damage very near the correct amount, namely, twelve thousand dollars. From one-half this amount, to wit, six thousand dollars, should be deducted the one-half of the estimated damage suffered by the Magenta, namely, one hundred and fifty dollars, leaving the sum of five thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars as the amount of the decree in favor of libelant against the Magenta. Let a decree be entered accordingly, each party to pay his own costs. Decree accordingly.

Case No. 8,947.

The MAGGIE JONES.

[1 Flip. 635;[1] 5 Cent. Law J. 263.]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. March 12, 1877.

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY—AMENDMENT—COLLATERAL SECURITY—STAY—DISCHARGE OF SURETY.

1. If a libel is amended by adding a co-libellant, this does not discharge the surety on the stipulation.

[Cited in U. S. v. Mosely, 8 Fed. 691.]

2. After commencement of suit and seizure and bonding of the vessel libellants took notes and mortgages of the owners, payable at different times within six months, as collateral security: held, that this did not operate to arrest or stay the suit, nor was the surety discharged.

[Cited in The Theodore Perry, Case No. 13,879.

Libel for towage by the tug E. M. Peck, which boat libellants owned. John P. Clark, the respondent, was surety upon the stipulation to answer judgment. The original libel was filed in one name only and the stipulation of surety was given to answer this libel, and "to abide the result of said cause." After seizure of the schooner libellants received from the owner of the schooner promissory notes covering the claim as, also, other claims against her, the payment of which was secured by a mortgage upon the schooner. The notes and mortgage were given as collateral security only for the claims and not in payment or extinguishment, it being understood that the lien upon the schooner should remain in full force. The draft which was the basis of the libel was not surrendered. Respondent knew nothing of this last transaction. The first note was paid, the others were not. In May, 1875, the schooner was seized under the mortgage but was released with the knowledge of, and without objection from, respondent. At the same time a bill of sale of the schooner was made to respondent to secure him, amongst other things, against this liability on the stipulation, and the schooner went into his possession. The stipulation of respondent covered other claims besides this; he had paid all decrees against him in all cases against the schooner except this one; had been subrogated to the rights of these libellants, and had an execution issued under which the schooner was seized. The bill of sale was given to effect her release, as well as upon that under the mortgage. The seizure under the execution was prior to the seizure under the mortgage. The vessel in twenty days thereafter was libelled in Buffalo and sold, and respondent lost all security he might have had under his bill of sale.

[1] [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

E. E. Kane, for libellant.
H. C. Wisner, for respondent.

BROWN, District Judge. After the stipulation in this case was filed, the libel was amended by adding the name of Bradley as co-libellant, he having been part owner of the tug at the time the services were performed. It is insisted that this discharged the surety upon the stipulation. This position is untenable. I regard it as settled by the case of Newell v. Norton, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 257, that the undertaking of the surety is practically co-extensive with the liability of the vessel in that particular action, and subject to any amendment which the court has power to make. This power is, however, so far limited that the name of one sole libellant can not be changed for that of another, however the cause of action might remain unchanged, as where a mistake had been made in the name of the owner of a tug. The Detroit [Case No. 3,832]. Still more clearly would the amendment be beyond the power of the court, where a new cause of action was introduced. It was upon this ground that it was held by the supreme court of this state, in Evers v. Sager, 28 Mich. 47, that the sureties upon the appeal were discharged. Regarding this, the court observe (page 52): "If the court had possessed the power to order or allow such an amendment, irrespective of the stipulations of the parties, the sureties would have been bound by its action, because their obligations must be understood as contemplating a possible exercise of such power." See, also, The Harmony [Case No. 6,081]. The addition of a new party, or indeed any other amendment which the court has power to make in the original action, has usually been held not to affect the undertaking of a surety. King v. Holland, 4 Term R. 457; Merrick v. Greely, 10 Mo. 106; Miller v. Clark, 8 Pick. 412; Ball v. Claflin, 5 Pick. 306; Seeley v. Brown, 14 Pick. 177. In the case of Fullerton v. Campbell, 25 Pa. St. 345, where additional plaintiffs were added after an appeal by defendant from an award of arbitrators, and a scire facias was sued out on the recognizance, reciting a suit in the names of the plaintiff, including those added after the appeal, it was held fatal to a recovery. This was an action of trespass vi et armis at common law, and it may be well said that the surety, while responding for the trespass of one, might not have been willing to answer for that of three. The particular character of the trespass does not appear in the report, and hence it is impossible to say whether the cause of action was in fact changed by the amendment; if it were a mere correction of a mistake (as in the present case the failure to name all the owners of the tug), the case is in conflict with a great weight of authority; if it were practically the introduction of a new cause of action, it is inconsistent with none of the cases above cited. In the light of these opinions, I do not regard it as controlling the determination of the question of the case under consideration.

Were the question an original one, I should feel strongly inclined to hold that the taking of the notes and mortgage of the owner of the vessel, even as collateral security, operated to extend the time for payment of the claim; but I find the rule to be too well settled the other way to be now disturbed. There is a distinction taken in the books, between the cases where the notes are received as conditional payment and those where they are taken as collateral security. In the former, the note clearly operates as an extension of time for the payment of the original debt; in the latter, it is regarded as strictly collateral, as much so as if the security were taken upon the property of a third party, and for an entirely different consideration. The leading case upon this point is that of U. S. v. Hodge, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 282, which was an action brought against the sureties on a bond given to secure the faithful performance of the duties of paymaster. The paymaster, being in arrears, executed a mortgage to the United States, of real and personal estate, to secure the payment of such sum, not exceeding $65,000, as should be found due him on settlement, the payment to be made after the expiration of six months from the giving of the mortgage. The court held that though the mortgage could not be enforced until after six months from its date, yet its acceptance by the government had no effect upon the liability of the sureties upon the bond, inasmuch as it was a collateral security; that, there being no provision in the mortgage that it should suspend the legal remedy on the bond, it could not be successfully contended that it could have this effect; that, to discharge a surety, the giving of time must act upon the instrument indorsed by him, and that no suspension of remedy upon the bond can be implied from the time limited in the collateral security for the payment of the sum found due.

All the earlier authorities upon this point are reviewed and criticised in the case of Austin v. Curtis, 31 Vt. 64, in which, in a very elaborate opinion, the court held, overruling two prior cases in the same state, that no agreement to delay the collection of an overdue debt is implied from a receipt by the creditor from the principal debtor of a note or other obligation not yet due, merely as collateral therefor. Pring v. Clarkson, 1 Barn. & C. 14; Twopenny v. Young, 3 Barn. & C. 208; Elwood v. Deifendorf, 5 Barb. 405; Day v. Leal, 14 Johns. 404; Emes v. Widdowson, 4 Car. & P. 151.

While, without explanation, I should be strongly inclined to hold, in view of the ordinary course of business upon the lakes, that the taking of a note for a claim of this kind was conditional payment, I am precluded from that conclusion here by the express terms of the stipulation. As the taking of these notes then did not suspend the prosecution of the original suit, and as the mere failure to press the suit with expedition can not be pleaded by the surety in discharge of his obligation, it results that this defense can not be sustained. Irrespective of this, it is at least doubtful whether the taking of a bill of sale after the vessel had been seized upon this mortgage, to secure him for signing the stipulation, would not be such a ratification of the extension as to continue the liability of the surety. A decree will be entered for the libellants for the amount of their claim and interest.

Case No. 8,948.

MAGIC RUFFLE CO. v. DOUGLAS et al.

[2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 330; Merw. Pat. Inv. 91.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1863.

PATENTS — THEORY OF GRANT — INFRINGEMENT — BURDEN OF PROOF — ORNAMENT — MACHINE FOR MAKING — INVENTION REQUIRED — RUFFLE PATENT.

1. The public who, through the law, secure to the inventor the exclusive property in his invention for a limited period, receive in return either new, more valuable, or cheaper productions during the lifetime of the patent, and, from its expiration, the free enjoyment of any benefits which may flow from it, forever thereafter.

2. The plaintiff's "ruffle patent" is for a new article of manufacture, and the burden of proof is on the defendants to show, to the satisfaction of the jury, that this article was made before the patentee made it. It is not enough that they raise a doubt in the minds of the jury on that point: they must satisfy them of the fact.

3. The word "ruffle," as used in this patent, means "plaited linen, lace, or muslin, used as an ornament, as for the neck, breast, or wrist," or, as a wider sense, "fine cloth ruffled," that is, ornamentally ruffled.

4. The superior beauty of an ornament, and the rapid sale of the article, are important tests of its utility.

5. If the patentee has so described his new article that it can be made without invention, and has then, bona fide, attempted to describe the best machine for making it, and has failed to describe a practical device, such failure does not avoid the patent unless it be the result of fraudulent intent.

6. A subject-matter to be patentable must require invention, but it is not necessarily the result of long and painful study, or embodied alone in complex mechanism. A single flash of thought may reveal to the mind of the inventor the new idea, and a frail and simple contrivance may embody it.

7. The jury requested to find a special verdict.

This was an action in the case [by the Magic Ruffle Company against Alexander Douglas and Samuel S. Sherwood], tried before Judge Shipman and a jury to recover damages for the infringement of three letters patent. The first, for an "improvement in the manufacture of ruffles," was granted to George B. Arnold, May 8, 1860 [No. 28,244], and assigned to plaintiffs. The claim of this patent was as follows: "The ruffle described, as a new article of manufacture, the gathered cloth A, being secured to the binding B by the single series of stitchers C, which perform the double duty of confining the gathers and of securing the gathered cloth to the binding, substantially as set forth." The second patent, for an "improvement in sewing machines," was granted to George B. Arnold, May 8, 1860 [No. 28,139]. The claim of this patent was as follows: "First. A gathering and feeding mechanism in two distinct parts, so constructed and operated that the gatherer takes hold and moves the cloth up to the needle, leaving it immediately after the stitch is formed, or at the point where it is formed, and the feeder, properly so called, takes hold of and feeds the cloth after the seam is made. Second. I claim the combination of the part E J with the part B G, or their equivalents, operating together substantially as described, and for the purpose specified. Third. I claim regulating the fullness of the gathers by varying the relative throw of the feeding devices substantially as described." The third patent, for an "improvement in sewing machines," was granted to George B. Arnold and Alfred Arnold, September 25, 1860 [No. 30,112], and assigned to plaintiffs. The claim of this patent was as follows: "First. In a sewing machine, the employment of the separator C, or its equivalent for the purpose of separating two pieces of cloth E and F, and thereby protecting F from the action of the gathering mechanism, substantially as set forth. Second. Gathering cloth and stitching or fastening the gathers on a sewing machine by the combined action of the single feeding device A, presser foot B, and separator C, or their equivalents, substantially in the manner described. Third.

[1] [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. Merw. Pat. Inv. 91, contains only a condensed report.]

Regulating the length of the stitches in the production, of a gathered fabric, by changing the position of the separator C or of C, and the pressure foot B, relatively to the extremity of the path traversed by the feeder A, substantially as set forth."

Glover & Darling and E. W. Stoughton, for plaintiffs.

George Gifford, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge (charging jury). This suit is brought by the plaintiffs to recover damages for an alleged infringement of certain letters patent, issued in conformity with the act of congress [5 Stat. 117], and purporting to secure to the original patentees the exclusive use of the inventions therein described. The suit embraces three distinct patents, which are easily distinguished by the several names of "Separator," "Double Feed," and "Ruffle" patents. The first named two are for machines, or improvements on machines. The last is for a new article of manufacture, or for an improvement in an article of manufacture. Although the patents were issued to the Messrs. Arnold in the first instance, they subsequently passed into the hands of the present plaintiffs by valid assignments, and whatever rights were originally granted to the patentees now belong to these plaintiffs; and they are entitled to the same redress as the patentees would have been had they still continued to own the patents, and brought the suit themselves.

As I have already stated, the three patents are all embraced in the suit; no doubt, out of abundant caution on the part of the plaintiffs, in order to meet any evidence of infringement of each and all that might be developed on the trial. It appears, however, from the evidence, and is conceded by the plaintiffs, that but two of the patents have been infringed, viz: the separator patent and the ruffle patent. That these two have been infringed by the defendants, there can be no reasonable doubt on the evidence. In other words, there can be no reasonable doubt, on the evidence before you, that the defendants have used a machine, or mechanical contrivance, substantially like that described in the separator patent, the exclusive use to which purports to be granted to George B. and Alfred Arnold, which grant, by assignment, belongs to the plaintiffs in this suit. It is equally clear that they have extensively manufactured ruffles substantially like those described in the ruffle patent, the exclusive right to manufacture which purports to have been granted to George B. Arnold, and which grant belongs, by assignment, to these plaintiffs. You will therefore not be perplexed with what is often a difficult question in patent cases, viz: whether there has been an infringement or not. The great question, then, for the court and jury is, whether or not these patents are valid grants of right? This is the great question, stated as a whole, but a proper examination of the case requires that we should address our attention to several distinct and separate inquiries. I will now point out these several inquiries, and dispose of such of them as properly belong to the court to decide, and submit to the jury such as belong to them to decide.

We will first look at the ruffle patent. The object of every patent is to secure to the patentee, his heirs and assigns, the exclusive property in the invention set forth in the specification, free from all control or invasion by others. The patent is granted upon inquiry, according to the forms of law, and assumes the patentee to be the original and first inventor, and therefore gives him the exclusive property in his invention, for the benign and just object of rewarding him for his creative labors and ingenuity, and stimulating the inventive genius of others. The exclusive property in his invention is secured to him only for a limited period, subject, on certain conditions, to a limited renewal. After that, his invention becomes the property of the public. The public who thus, through the law, secure to the inventor the exclusive property in his invention for a limited period, receive in return either new, more valuable, or cheaper productions during the lifetime of the patent, and from its expiration the free enjoyment of any benefits which may flow from it forever thereafter.

Now let us examine this ruffle patent, and see what it purports to grant. This is a question of law, to dispose of which belongs to the court, and not to the jury. This patent is simple, and I can not better describe the invention than to adopt the language of the claim, and say, that it purports to grant the exclusive right to manufacture and sell "the ruffle therein described, as a new article of manufacture, the gathered cloth A (the ruffled strip) being secured to the binding B (the band), by the single series of stitches C, which perform the double duty of securing the gathered cloth to the binding substantially as therein set forth." The distinguishing features of this article, by which it is materially different from all other ruffles known before, are the single series of stitches, and the unvarying regularity of the plaits, or gathers—thus dispensing with the gathering thread, avoiding the injurious process of whipping or scratching the fabric with a sharp needle, and the perforations in the ruffled piece which the needle and thread make in gathering, before sewing on the band, and by pulling out the thread after it was sewed on, or in case the thread was left in, by dispensing with its presence. I repeat, the ruffle patented differs from those that existed before, by the uniformity of the plaits, and by the absence of all whipping or scratching with the needle, with all perforations, except those made by the permanent stitches, and by the absence of an appendage in the shape of a useless thread, in the ruffle after it was finished. The regularity of the plaits, it is obvious, improved the beauty of the finished article, and the employment of only one series of stitches, one stitch of the series being struck through each plait at the instant of its formation, dispensed with the effect of the whipping process, with the perforations made by the needle in running the old gathering thread, and effectually dismissed the thread from the finished article, wherever it was formerly left in. It is the exclusive right to manufacture this article that this patent purports to grant to Mr. Arnold.

The patent is prima facie evidence that he was the original and first inventor of this article. The defendants deny this, and allege that the same article was made before the plaintiffs or the patentee made it. The burden of proof is on the defendants to show to your satisfaction that this article was made before the patentee made it. It is not enough that they raise a doubt in your minds on that point: they must satisfy you of the fact. The evidence which they offer relates to three kinds of ruffles, viz: old ones made by hand, those made by Chittenden at New Haven, and the bustle tops on Union skirts made by the defendants.

As to the old style of ruffles made by hand, it is difficult to discover from the evidence how they could have been made, except by the slowest process, without the gathering thread, and the perforations of the needle consequent upon its use, or how any approach to uniformity of plaits could have been obtained without whipping or scratching the ruffled piece. You have heard all the evidence on this point, and it is for you to determine whether satisfactory evidence has been submitted to you, that hand-made ruffles were like those which I have stated to you this patent describes.

As to the ruffles alleged to have been made by Chittenden on his machine, and by him given to his wife. Precisely what the character of those ruffles was, if they were made before this "magic ruffle," may be somewhat difficult for you to determine. No specimen of them has been shown to you. How—that is, in what precise form—they were made, does not appear. Whatever was done, appears to have been the result of a casual experiment on a machine; and it is for you to say, whether the evidence satisfies you that an article substantially like that described in this patent, was then produced. As I have already stated, the burden of proof is on the defendants, and it is not enough that they raise a doubt in your minds; they must prove the fact to your satisfaction.

As to the tops of the Union skirts made by the defendants. It is alleged that they are ruffles—substantially like the article described in the plaintiff's patent. Mr. Renwick, a very intelligent gentleman, and an expert in mechanics, has stated that he should call them ruffles. That they are ruffles in a certain sense, there can be no doubt, as one part of them is ruffled or gathered cloth on one side, leaving the other side free; so is a lady's skirt ruffled, in a certain sense; or even an umbrella or parasol, when it is closed—for it is ruffled cloth gathered at one end or side, and the other left free when the instrument is closed, except as the whalebones keep it extended in one direction.

This term "ruffle," like many others, is often used in a latitudinarian, and often in a purely metaphorical sense. It is applied some times to the disarrangement of flexible surfaces, as to the wrinkling of a once smooth garment, or piece of cloth, sometimes to the agitation or disturbance of the temper. Lord Bacon once said, on a memorable occasion: "They would ruffle the jurors."

But there is a restricted sense in which the term "ruffle" is used, and it is clear that it was used in this patent substantially in that restricted sense. The best definition of the word in this sense which I can find, is that given by an eminent lexicographer: "Plaited linen, lace, or muslin, used as an ornament, as for the neck, breast, or wrist;" and he adds, as a wider sense, "fine cloth ruffled"—that is, ornamentally ruffled. And the author gives a literary example of this meaning of the term, by quoting from Goldsmith the couplet—

"Such dainties to them, their health it might hurt, It's like sending them ruffles when wanting a shirt."

Now, gentlemen, in view of this definition, which I understand to be the sense in which the term is used in the patent, and illustrated by the article produced in court by the plaintiff, it is for you, in the exercise of plain good sense, to say whether those skirt bustles of the defendants are fairly embraced within it—whether those bustles, though in a certain sense "ruffled," are the articles secured by this patent, and thus antedate this invention. I think you can have no difficulty on this point.

If you find this "magic ruffle" in the old hand-made ruffles, or in the ruffle Chittenden made, or in this skirt bustle, then, of course, the patent is good for nothing. But if you do not find in these, or in either of them, this "magic ruffle," which the patentee claims he first made, and which, upon the evidence, he undoubtedly first introduced into the general market, and to the notice of the trade, then the plaintiffs are entitled to a verdict—provided that it is useful. Of its utility, in the legal sense, you can have no doubt. The superior beauty, and rapid sale of the article, is shown on all sides. The beauty of an ornament is one great test of its utility.

A point of law has been raised as to the validity of this ruffle patent, which I will briefly notice, but it need not trouble the jury. It is claimed that the patent (or specification) must point out a way in which they could be made; and furthermore, that it was the duty of the patentee to point out the best mode known to him, or his patent is void in its present form. It is conceded that he could cure this defect by a reissue. Now, the rule of law on this subject is this: the inventor is bound so to describe his invention that the article can be made by one skilled in the art, and it is his duty to describe the best mode which he knows. He has carefully described the article; so he claims that one moderately skilled in the use of the needle, and especially one skilled in the art of making ruffles, can not fail to know precisely what is done, and with sufficient care and time could not fail to make the article. I think I could make one myself; and I am sure Mr. Brennan (one of the jurors) who is skilled in the use of the needle, could—give him time. The thing—the "magic ruffle"—is minutely described in all its parts, and the only thing it would seem left for the maker to do, is to fold or plait the cloth evenly, hold it in its place, and stitch it to the band. I grant that this work could not be done rapidly, without the use of some mechanism, but that it could be done with care, operative skill, and time, without invention, there can, I think, be no doubt. Now, the patentee did not intend that it should be done without the use of his improved mechanism, and, as was his duty, he described what he regarded as the best mode, viz: by the use of his double-feed machine or mechanism. It is claimed by the defendants that he has failed in the description of his machine as a practical device. Now, for the purpose of deciding this question, I assume that he has thus failed. What effect does this failure have on his patent? Does it make it void? I answer no, unless he has done it fraudulently, and there is no evidence of fraudulent intent. His attempt to describe his double-feed machine must be deemed, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, to have been made in good faith; otherwise, we must suppose that he intended to make his double-feed patent void by his own act. He having, therefore, so described his ruffle that it can be made without invention, and bona fide attempted to describe the best mode, and failed, does not avoid his patent. Therefore the jury need not trouble themselves with this question. To restate the question for the jury, then, touching this patent for the ruffle, they will inquire: was this magic ruffle a new article of manufacture, or an improved article of manufacture (it is immaterial which we call it), and was the patentee the first to produce it? If it is a new article, and he was the first to produce it, and it was useful, then the plaintiffs are entitled to a verdict irrespective of any question touching the machines, and to such damages as they have actually sustained by the manufacture of the article by the defendants. If you are agreed on this point, of the novelty, usefulness, and first invention by Arnold, of this "magic ruffle," I repeat the plaintiffs are entitled to a verdict, whatever your opinion may be with regard to the priority of the invention of the separator improvements to the sewing machines. If, however, you should find that the patentee was not the first inventor of this "magic ruffle," then it will be necessary for you to find that he was the first inventor of the separator arrangement before you can give the plaintiffs a verdict; and I think you had better pass upon this question, if you can agree upon it, even if you agree for the plaintiffs on the ruffle patent: and if you bring in your verdict for the plaintiffs, I will inquire of you, how you find on this question of the prior invention of the separator? But whether you can agree or not, on this point, still the plaintiffs will be entitled to a verdict at your hands, provided you find on the ruffle patent in their favor.

I need not describe the invention, as set forth in the separator patent. It has been shown to you, operated in your presence, and fully explained; whosesoever it was, it was a simple but happy conception, which, when reduced to practice, produced surprising results, both in the quality of the article manufactured and the rapidity with which it was turned out. A subject-matter to be patentable must require invention, but is not necessarily the result of long and painful study, or embodied alone in complex mechanism. A single flash of thought may reveal to the mind of the inventor the new idea, and a frail and simple contrivance may embody it. Some inventions are the result of long and weary years of study and labor, pursued in the face of abortive experiments and baffled attempts, and finally reached after the severest struggles, while others are the fruit of a single happy thought. All that can be said on the score of invention against this separator device is, that it belongs to the latter class. But that it was an invention within the meaning of the law, there can be no doubt. The only question is: whose invention was it? Was it Douglas'? or was it Chittenden's? or was it the Arnolds'?

The patent is prima facie evidence that it was the Arnolds' invention, and their joint invention, as the patent is issued to them jointly, inasmuch as there has been no proof inconsistent with the idea that it was their joint product. The burden of proof is on the defendants to show you satisfactorily that it was the invention of some other person. Now I intend to allude only briefly, and in general terms, to the evidence on these points. The defendants claim that they have shown by direct evidence that Douglas first invented and used the separator. You remember the witnesses and the comments of counsel.

The plaintiffs claim that they have proved by direct evidence facts entirely inconsistent with any such conclusion; and they insist especially, that the fact that there was concealment of the defendants' names as the makers, that they screened themselves behind Oakley, and that Douglas took out a patent for his binding gauge, after, he alleges, he had invented the separator, and had used it in connection with the gauge, with an immense saving of labor, and omitted all mention of it in his patent, and all attempts to patent it separately, are utterly inconsistent with the idea that it was his invention. On the bearing and force of all the evidence upon this point, you must decide.

Did Chittenden first invent and use the separator? Chittenden's device is not claimed to have been invented before the summer of 1859. Arnold and Mrs. Price state explicitly that the separator was applied to her machine by Arnold in the summer of 1858, before they went to Coleman for the purpose of having a model made, in order to apply for a patent, which was in August, 1858. It is for the jury to say whether they state the truth. They state in detail the character of the device and its surprising effects. Now, if they state truly, and the jury find that the conception of this invention was complete, and its success demonstrated at that time, as stated by them, they can have no difficulty in fixing the date of Arnold's invention prior to that of Chittenden's, assuming this to have been made in the summer of 1859, which he and Mr. Winchester fixed as the date of his. The reason why a delay was made in taking out the patents they allege was the erroneous information obtained from Coleman.

It is for you to determine upon the whole evidence on this point whether the defendants have shown you satisfactorily that either Douglas or Chittenden antedated this invention. If they have not satisfied you, then the plaintiffs are entitled to a verdict on this patent. But if you are satisfied that the Arnolds were not the first inventors of the separator, and you are satisfied that George B. Arnold was the first inventor of the magic ruffle, the plaintiffs will still be entitled to a verdict.

The only remaining question is that of damages. The rule and amount of damages in this case must be the same whether you find for the plaintiffs on one or both of the patents (separator and ruffle patents), and that is, the damage actually sustained by the plaintiffs. It is generally somewhat difficult to ascertain precisely how much the owner of a patent has been damaged by the infringement of another, and I shall endeavor to simplify the inquiry in this case at some risk of doing injustice to the plaintiffs. The jury will have as a basis to start upon, the quantity sold by the defendants according to their own admission, 1,244 boxes; and they will inquire whether or not they are satisfied that the plaintiffs were prevented from selling that number of boxes by those sales of the defendants. If they were, then the plaintiffs have a right to recover the amount of profits of which they were deprived by the defendants' sales. They insist they were thus deprived of selling these 1,244 boxes, and that the profits which they thus lost were equivalent to $$2^{15}/_{100}$ per box. The jury must decide. If they lost, in round numbers, $2 per box in 1,244 boxes, this would give them the right to recover $2,488. But the plaintiffs claim that from the whole evidence the jury ought to find that the defendants made larger sales, and thus damaged the plaintiffs in a still larger amount. The jury are to determine this; but they should proceed with caution in this part of the case, and give no more damages than they think the proof warrants them in concluding that the plaintiffs have actually sustained.

This is an important case to the parties, but requires for its proper disposition only unbending impartiality and straightforward good sense. Every person may be compelled, at some time in his life, to struggle in a court of justice for his rights, and no higher felicity attends human action than that which flows from the upright and just discharge of the duty of triers.

Mr. Gifford: I deem it my duty to call the attention of the court to two points. One is a point in which I think the court has overlooked the evidence. Mr. Chittenden made ruffling upon the machine in the presence of the jury. That was intended as a specimen of the ruffle he made upon the same kind of machine in the summer of 1859.

The other point respects the construction of the ruffle patent. I ask your honor to charge the jury that the claim of the ruffle patent is not limited to regularity of plaits in the ruffle produced, but includes ruffles with irregular as well as regular plaits. And further, I will ask your honor to charge that the gathering thread in the old ruffle was only a means of making the article, and when made and taken out formed no part of the manufactured article.

THE COURT: I called it a "useless thread."

Gentlemen (to the jury): The counsel for the defendants has called my attention to that portion of my remarks in which I stated that it might be difficult from the evidence to determine how the ruffle was made by Mr. Chittenden; and he has called my attention to the fact, that Mr. Chittenden has experimented upon the machine here. That you are to take into consideration, as it appears in the evidence, to show what the character of the ruffling was. I call your attention, therefore, to that fact in connection with the remarks I have already made.

[For other cases involving this patent, see Magic Ruffle Co. v. Elm City Co., Cases Nos. 8,949 and 8,950.]

Case No. 8,949.

MAGIC RUFFLE CO. v. ELM CITY CO.

[13 Blatchf. 151; 2 Ban. & A. 152; 8 O. G. 773.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Oct. 20, 1875.

PATENTS — LICENSE — AGREEMENT — VIOLATION — VALIDITY OF PATENT—DISCOVERY—ESTOPPEL.

1. Letters patent granted to George B. Arnold, May 8th, 1860, for an "improvement in ruffles," and three other patents, were owned by the plaintiffs, a corporation of New York. They had recovered a verdict in a suit for an infringement of the Arnold patent. The defendants, a corporation of Connecticut, had been infringing that patent. On the 21st of February, 1863, an agreement of license was made between the two corporations, whereby the plaintiffs agreed to license the defendants, under the four patents, to manufacture and sell under such license, exclusively, the ruffle then manufactured and sold by the defendants, and known as "the double ruffle," and to use the patented machines in the manufacture only of the said double ruffle, and whereby, in consideration of said license, the defendants expressly recognized the validity of each of said patents, and agreed to receive licenses as aforesaid under each of them, and expressly agreed that they would manufacture and sell only the said double ruffle, and that the said double ruffle should not be divided by them, and whereby they agreed to submit, at all times, their manufactory to inspection, so that the plaintiffs should be advised of the kind of ruffles which were being manufactured, and to pay counsel in the suit above named, and to retain and pay counsel thereafter in suits relating to and in support of said patents, and to pay one-half of the other expenses of sustaining said patents, and whereby each party agreed to assist the other in suits which might be instituted by either for the purpose of maintaining its rights under either of said patents. The bill in this suit alleged, that, after the agreement of license was made, the defendants continued to make and sell the double ruffle of the kind referred to in the agreement, and also made and sold, in violation of the agreement and of the Arnold patent, quantities of single ruffles, each of which contained the invention described and claimed in said patent, and prayed for a disclosure by the defendants of their profits and of the number of yards of single ruffle containing said improvement which they had made and sold, and for the payment of such profits and of the damages sustained by the plaintiffs. The answer, besides denying the infringement, denied the novelty of the invention covered by the Arnold patent, and alleged that the defendants had, ever since the agreement was executed, been engaged, to the knowledge of the plaintiffs, in the sale of ruffles which were not claimed by them, until about the time of the commencement of this suit, to violate said patent, and that this suit was brought on a stale claim, and one unfounded in equity: Held, that the defendants were estopped, by their covenants in the agreement, from denying the validity of the patent.

[Distinguished in National Manuf'g Co. v. Meyers, 7 Fed. 357.]

2. The contract was not merely an agreement for a license, but was an executed license.

3. The plaintiffs could sue for either an infringement of the patent or a breach of the agreement, and the bill in this case could be regarded as a bill in either aspect.

[Cited in McKay v. Smith, 29 Fed. 296; American Box Mach. Co. v. Crosman, 57 Fed. 1025.]

4. As a bill founded on the agreement, although no royalties were payable, and although the patent had expired, the bill is not open to the objection that there is a complete and adequate remedy at law, because an account and a discovery are necessary to ascertain the facts from which the damages to the plaintiffs can be computed, and this bill is a bill for an account and a discovery.

[Distinguished in Washburn & Moen Manuf'g Co. v. Cincinnati Barbed Wire Fence Co., 42 Fed. 677.]

5. The contract having become executed, and the defendants having enjoyed its benefits, they cannot, in the absence of fraud on the part of the plaintiffs, deny the truth of their admission of the validity of the patent.

6. The invention in the Arnold patent consists in confining the tucks and gathers in place and securing them to a binding or ungathered piece of cloth, by one and the same series of stitches, or, in other words, causing one series of stitches to perform the double duty of confining the plaits and attaching them to the binding or other material. The claim, namely, the ruffle "as a new article of manufacture, the gathered cloth A (the ruffled strip) being secured to the binding B (the band) by the single series of stitches C, which perform the double duty of confining the gathers and of securing the gathered cloth to the binding, substantially as herein set forth," is infringed by the defendants' ruffle, which is a plaited strip combined with a band, a single row of stitches performing the office of securing the gathers and uniting the gathered cloth to the band, although it has, in addition, a second row of stitches in the band, not securing the band to the gathered cloth, and although it is a finished article, having a band with an even and finished edge, and is designed to be worn as a neck ruffle.

7. The defendants' ruffle is not a double ruffle, and so within the license, because, if it is divided between the two rows of stitches, one part will be a ruffle, and the other will be a useless strip of stitched cloth, not a ruffle, in any proper sense of the word.

8. The defence, that the agreement in regard to the manufacture of ruffles other than the double ruffle was subsequently abandoned by the plaintiffs, is not sustained.

9. Nor is the defence sustained, that the claim has become stale, by reason of the laches of the plaintiffs in vindicating their rights, and in acquiescing in the assertion of adverse rights by the defendants.

In equity.

Clarence A. Seward and William D. Shipman, for plaintiffs.

Charles R. Ingersoll and Edwin W. Stoughton, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The parties in this case are corporations. The complainants were created under the laws of the state of New York, and the defendants were incorporated under the laws of the state of Connecticut, and are established at New Haven, in this district. The bill alleges, that the complainants are and have been since September 18th, 1860, the owners of letters patent number 28,244, granted to George B. Arnold, on May 8th, 1860, for a new and useful "improvement in ruffles," and were also, in the month of February, 1863, the owners of three other patents, theretofore issued to George B. Arnold and Alfred Arnold, for other improvements in machinery for making ruffles, and in ruffles, which improvements were generally known as the "double feed," "separator," and "ruffle without a band;" that prior to the month of February, 1863, upon a suit of the complainants against Douglas and Sherwood, in the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York, a verdict was rendered by which patent number 28 244 was sustained; that the defendants had at that time been engaged in manufacturing and selling ruffles containing the improvement described in said letters patent; and that, in order to avoid further litigation, and for peace sake, and for the purpose of harmonizing the business conducted by the two corporations, an agreement, dated February 21st, 1863, was entered into, and was thereafter an executed agreement of license, and no legal proceedings against the defendants were commenced. The material portions of this agreement are as follows: "The Magic Ruffle Company hereby agree to license the said Elm City Company under the four several patents granted to George B. Arnold, and George B. and Alfred Arnold, to wit, the double feed. the separator and its combinations, the ruffle with a band, and the ruffle without a band, to manufacture and sell under said license, exclusively, the ruffle now manufactured and sold by the said Elm City Company, at their manufactory in New Haven, Connecticut, and known as the double ruffle, and to use the machines patented to the said George B. Arnold, and George B. and Alfred Arnold, in the manufacture only of the said double ruffle. In consideration of the said license, the said Elm City Company do hereby expressly recognize the validity of each of said patents, and hereby agree to receive licenses as aforesaid under each of them, and hereby expressly agree that they will manufacture and sell only the said double ruffle, and that the said double ruffle shall not be divided by the said party of the second part." The Elm City Company also agreed to submit, at all times, their manufactory to inspection, so that the Magic Ruffle Company should be advised of the kind of ruffles which were being manufactured, and to pay counsel in the suit of Douglas and Sherwood, and to retain and pay counsel thereafter in suits relating to and in support of said patents, and to pay one-half of the other expenses of sustaining said patents. It was mutually agreed, that each party was to assist the other in suits which might be instituted by either party for the purpose of maintaining its rights under either of said patents. The bill also alleges, that, thereafter, the defendants continued to manufacture and sell the double ruffle of the kind referred to in the agreement. and that, after February 21st, 1863, they made and sold, in violation of said agreement and of said letters patent, many thousand yards of single ruffles, each of which contained the invention described and claimed in the said letters patent, and prays that the defendants may be required to make a disclosure of all their gains and profits, and of the precise number of yards of single ruffle containing the said improvement, which they have made and sold, and to account for and pay over such gains and profits as have arisen to them, and also all damages which the complainants have sustained by reason of the premises.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge; reprinted in 2 Ban. & A. 152; and here republished by permission.]

The answer denies that the defendants have made and sold any ruffles in violation of letters patent No. 28,244, alleges that the ruffles which they have made were made by the aid of machinery which was invented by and patented unto Crosby and Kellogg, and that, at and prior to said agreement, they were manufacturing, by the use of said machinery, as they lawfully might, double ruffles of a peculiar kind, which were afterwards divided so as to form single ruffles of a form and arrangement some of which somewhat resembled the ruffles manufactured by the complainants, and, to avoid any possible controversy with said complainants, the said defendants agreed not so to manufacture single ruffles thereafter, but that said agreement was intended only to prevent the manufacture of that particular kind of single ruffle; and that the defendants have not, since the date of said agreement, made or sold a gathered ruffle having a single series of stitches, which is the only kind of ruffle claimed in patent No. 28,244. The answer denies the novelty of the alleged improvement described in said patent, and alleges that the defendants have, ever since the execution of said agreement, been engaged, to the knowledge of the complainants, in the sale of ruffles which were not claimed by them, until about the time of the commencement of this suit, to be in violation of said patent, and that this action is brought upon a stale claim, and one which is unfounded in equity.

(1.) The first question in this case is—are the defendants estopped, by their covenants in the agreement, from denying the validity of the complainants' patent? The defendants contend, that the suit is against them simply as infringers, for a violation of the complainants' patent rights, and that the covenant which is claimed to be an estoppel, being contained in an instrument collateral to the patent, cannot operate as an estoppel in a suit which is not founded upon the agreement but upon the patent, and that no bill in equity can be sustained upon the agreement, inasmuch as for a breach of that contract the complainants have a full and adequate remedy at law.

The contract is not merely an agreement for a license, but is an executed license. Such was the intention of the parties, as it is to be collected from the whole of the instrument. Buell v. Cook, 4 Conn. 242. By the agreement, the defendants were licensed to manufacture and sell the double ruffle only. If they manufactured and sold any other ruffle which was protected by either of the patents, they became, as to such ruffle so improperly manufactured, infringers, and the complainants could resort to an action at law or in equity, to obtain redress for this violation of their exclusive patent rights. If the licensee "uses the patented invention beyond the limits of the license or grant, or in a way not authorized by the license or grant, then there has been a violation of a right secured to the patentee under a law of the United States giving to him the exclusive right to use the thing patented, although such licensee performs, according to their terms, all the covenants entered into by him." Goodyear v. Union India Rubber Co. [Case No. 5,586]; Wood v. Wells [Id. 17,967]. And, if the licensees have also expressly covenanted, in their agreement of license, that they will do or will not do a particular act, or will not use the invention for a particular purpose, a violation of such covenant is also a breach of contract, not arising under the laws of the United States, but for which remedy may be sought in the circuit courts of the United States, provided the citizenship of the parties gives jurisdiction to such court. Goodyear v. Union India Rubber Co., cited supra; Goodyear v. Congress Rubber Co. [Id. 5,565]; Wilson v. Sanford, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 99. In this case, it was competent for the complainants to take either one of the two remedies for the alleged injury, which have been mentioned. They could bring a bill alleging an injury to their exclusive rights under the laws of the United States, or, as the residence of the parties gave this court jurisdiction, could bring a proper suit, setting up the breach of the contract as the gravamen of their action. The averments of their bill are sufficient to justify a court in holding, if necessary, that it is a bill for an injury to their patent rights, but, it is manifest, from an examination of the stating part of the bill, that the pleader intended to make the alleged breach of the agreement the foundation of the action, and that he is seeking to recover damages for an injury to the complainants arising out of the violation of the contract.

But the defendants insist that a bill in equity, based upon the contract, cannot be sustained, because, for a breach of the contract, there is a complete and adequate remedy at law. There is, undoubtedly, a remedy at law for the alleged injury. The only question is, whether it is complete and adequate. If the complainants were seeking to recover royalties which the defendants had agreed to pay, inasmuch as the account is particularly within the knowledge of the defendants, or, if the patent was still in existence, and the preventive remedy by injunction against future injuries could be administered, there would be no question that a bill in equity would be a proper remedy. Eureka Co. v. Bailey Co., 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 488; Goodyear v. Congress Rubber Co. [supra]; Rich v. Hotchkiss, 16 Conn. 409. In this case, the defendants had not agreed to pay royalties, and an injunction cannot be granted, inasmuch as the patent has expired. It is alleged that the defendants have violated the contract of license by manufacturing and selling a ruffle which they were not authorized to make, and which they had agreed not to make. By this violation the complainants say that they have been injured, and the redress which they ultimately seek is the payment of damages. Although the suit is upon the contract, the damage to the complainants, if any, is the damage which they have sustained from the injury to their patent rights. The ascertainment of the facts from which such damages can be estimated, is, in cases of injury to property in letters patent, peculiarly within the province of a court of equity, because, the facts from which damages are to be computed can only be ascertained by an account and a discovery of the number and amount of articles which have been sold by the defendants—facts which are exclusively within their knowledge. They alone have the evidence which can enable the complainants to recover, either at law or in equity. It is true, that damages are not ordinarily assessed by a court of equity (Livingston v. Woodworth, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 546); and, prior to the act of 1870 [16 Stat. 198], authorizing the circuit court, as a court of equity, to decree the payment of damages in patent cases, damages were not recoverable in equity suits. A bill in equity proceeded, prior to that act, upon the theory that the infringer was equitably bound, as a trustee, to pay to the patentee the profits which had been made by an unlawful use of the invention. Cowing v. Rumsey [Case No. 3,296]. But, this bill is a bill for an account and a discovery. It avers that the complainants do not know, and cannot set forth, the number of yards of ruffle which have been made in violation of the patent and of the agreement, and prays for a disclosure of the quantity which has been made and sold. Whether, having obtained jurisdiction of the case, the court will proceed to grant further and complete relief, and to exercise a power which courts of equity have, in certain cases, heretofore exercised (Russell v. Clark's Ex'rs, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 69; Pratt v. Law, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 456; Insurance Co. v. Colt, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 560), and what relief will be granted, are questions which can be determined more properly after the report of the master shall have been received.

It is well settled, that, where the suit is upon a license, or upon a contract, which license or contract contains covenants on the part of the defendants, by which they admit the validity of the plaintiffs' patent, and agree to maintain it by suits or legal proceedings, and there has been an enjoyment of the license by the defendants, they are estopped from denying the truth of their admissions, unless it shall be averred, by cross-bill, or answer, that such agreement was obtained by fraud, surprise or imposition. Eureka Co. v. Bailey

Co., 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 488; Crossley v. Dixon, 10 H. L. Cas. 293. It is evident, from an inspection of this agreement, and from the answer, that there had been litigation in regard to the validity of the patents, between the plaintiffs and Douglas and Sherwood, and that the parties to the agreement entered into it in order to avoid similar litigation between themselves, and to prevent future violation of the patents by others. "The agreement was manifestly intended to adjust conflicting rights," and it cannot be permitted, in the absence of fraud on the part of the plaintiffs, that the defendants should deny the truth of their careful and deliberate admissions, especially since the contract has become executed, and they have enjoyed its benefits.

(2.) Is the ruffle which has been manufactured and sold by the defendants, and which is styled the "Princess ruffle," an infringement of patent No. 28,244? The specification of the patent states, that the nature of the invention "consists in confining the tucks or gathers in place, and securing them to a binding or ungathered piece of cloth, by one and the same series of stitches; or, in other words, causing one series of stitches to perform the double duty of confining the plaits and attaching them to the binding or other material." The claim is for the ruffle "as a new article of manufacture, the gathered cloth A (the ruffled strip), being secured to the binding B (the band), by the single series of stitches C, which perform the double duty of confining the gathers and of securing the gathered cloth to the binding, substantially as herein set forth." The article is a plaited or gathered piece of cloth, the gathers of which are confined in their place by a row of stitches, which, also, at the same time, secures the gathered cloth to a band, and this band is an unhemmed strip of cloth, which is to be attached by the purchaser to whatever garment the ruffle is to ornament. "The distinguishing features of this article, by which it is materially different from all ruffles known before," have been declared to be, in the case of Magic Ruffle Co. v. Douglas [Case No. 8,948], "the single series of stitches, and the unvarying regularity of the plaits or gathers, thus dispensing with the gathering thread, avoiding the injurious process of whipping or scratching the fabric with a sharp needle, and the perforations in the ruffled piece which the needle and thread make in gathering." The defendants' ruffle is a plaited strip, combined with a band, a single row of stitches performing the office of securing the gathers, and uniting the gathered cloth to the band, but it has, in addition, a second row of stitches in the band, not securing the band to the gathered cloth. The ruffle can be cut in two, between the two rows of stiches. One part would be a ruffle, and the other a strip of stitched cloth. The Magic ruffle of the plaintiffs is an unfinished article, to be attached by the band to ladies' or children's undergarments. The Princess ruffle is a finished article, having a band with an even and finished edge, and is designed to be worn as a neck ruffle. Still, the distinguishing characteristic of the Magic ruffle is found in the Princess ruffle, which contains the row of stitches performing the double office of confining the gathers and attaching the ruffled cloth to the band; and, although the Princess ruffle has a second series of stitches, and is a completed article, different in appearance, and used for a different purpose, from the Magic ruffle, yet, in its patentable characteristics, it contains the single feature which had been previously patented by the plaintiffs' grantor. It has other and additional features which render it a different article from the Magic ruffle in the eye of the trade and of the purchaser, but these additional features do not vary the one peculiarity in which it resembles the Magic ruffle. If that peculiarity is a patentable one, it follows that the defendants' ruffle is an infringement of the plaintiffs' patent.

An attempt was made to claim that the Princess ruffle was a double ruffle, and so within the license to the defendants, but it is obvious that, if the Princess ruffle is divided, the narrow strip which remains after the ruffle proper has been cut off, is a useless strip of stitched cloth, and is not, in any proper sense of the word, a ruffle.

The answer further alleges, that, after the execution of the agreement, the defendants discovered the existence of letters patent to Isaac M. Singer, dated on or about March 18th, 1856, and that the complainants, believing that this invention substantially contained that described in patent 28,244, desired to join with the defendant in purchasing the same; that it was purchased by both parties about April 2d, 1863, and, since that time, the complainants have made no attempt to enforce their patent, but have regarded the same as substantially inoperative and worthless; and that, by reason of said Singer patent, the patent numbered 28,244 is void. Whether the Singer patent does or does not anticipate the patent of the complainants is not material, inasmuch as the validity of the latter patent is not here in issue. This part of the answer is material only upon the question of the laches of the complainants in the vindication of their alleged rights. The only evidence in regard to the reasons for the purchase of Mr. Singer's patent, or the opinions of the complainants in regard to the effect of the Singer invention upon the validity of their own patent, is contained in the testimony of the defendants' treasurer, who says, that "the defendants discovered the existence of the Singer patent, and, thinking that, if left in the hands of other parties, it might possibly be used for purposes of litigation and annoyance, causing expense and trouble, they thought best to secure it, and the Magic Ruffle Company, regarding it in anticipation of their patent, wished to unite with us in securing it, and, as that would save one-half of the expense, and, as we thought, answer our purpose, we consented to do so, and it was bought jointly by them and the defendants." This does not maintain the position of the defendants, that the agreement in regard to the manufacture of ruffles other than the double ruffle was substantially abandoned in consequence of the purchase of the Singer patent. This purchase seems to have had no material influence upon the relations of the parties, or upon this agreement.

The most important point of the defendants is, that they have been manufacturing the Princess ruffle ever since the date of the agreement, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the complainants, and were not notified that such manufacture and sale were regarded by the complainants as a violation of the agreement, or of the patent, until after it had expired, and about the time of the commencement of this suit, and that this claim, if it ever had any validity, had become stale, and should not be favored by courts of equity, by reason of the laches of the complainants in the vindication of their rights, and their acquiescence in the assertion of adverse rights. If I was satisfied, from the evidence, that the defendants had manufactured and sold the Princess ruffle since 1862, in such quantities that the attention of the plaintiffs must have been early called to the infringement, or that they actually knew of the violation of the agreement ever since the year 1862, I should be of opinion that their delay in making known their claims was such as to prevent them from now receiving the aid of a court of equity to the extent of its powers. The testimony of the treasurer of the defendant corporation upon this part of the case is guarded, as will be seen by the following quotation: "Question. Subsequent to the date of that agreement, and up to the time of the commencement of this suit, have the defendants manufactured and sold ruffles like exhibit Barney, No. 3? Answer. Yes; more or less. Question. Has the same been sold in New York. If so, name a few of the houses to whom it has been sold? Answer. Yes; Calhoun & Robbins, J. B. Spelman & Son, L. H. Mandelbaum & Co., and a number of others, whom I could not positively swear to know by name. Question. It has been in the market to a considerable extent, has it not, and under what name? Answer. It has, under the name of Princess." The testimony in the case, as it now stands, does not show that the Princess ruffle has been in the market to any large extent, and that the complainants must necessarily have known that the defendants were manufacturing and selling this ruffle, and thus show that the complainants were negligent in the enforcement of their rights, or were wilfully permitting the defendants to continue the manufacture, under the supposition that their conduct was not open to criticism.

As I have said, I am not now called upon to decide as to the measure of damages. The only decree which can now be made is, to order an accounting and a disclosure, and a reference to a master to ascertain the number of yards of Princess ruffle which have been manufactured and sold, and the amount of such sales during each year, and to ascertain the profits which have accrued to the defendants from such manufacture, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the complainants' damages. Other questions in regard to damages will be determined upon the hearing after the accounting shall have taken place.

Let a decree be entered for a reference and an account.

[For the hearing on exceptions to the master's report and for a final decree, see Case No. 8,950.

[For another case involving this patent. see Magic Ruffle Co. v. Douglas, Case No. 8,948.]

Case No. 8,950.

MAGIC RUFFLE CO. v. ELM CITY CO.

[14 Blatchf. 109; 2 Ban. & A. 506; 11 O. G. 501.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Jan. 27, 1877.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY — ACTION AT LAW — INADEQUACY — BILL FOR DISCOVERY — ACCOUNT — DAMAGES — PATENTS — INFRINGEMENT.

1. Where a bill is brought for a discovery and for other equitable relief within the appropriate jurisdiction of a court of equity, and the ultimate object of the plaintiff is to obtain damages, the court, having granted a discovery, will proceed and give the proper relief in damages, and not compel the plaintiff to undergo the delays and expenses of a suit at law.

2. Where a bill is brought for a discovery, in a case which is not the proper subject of an action or bill for an account, the fact that the plaintiff is entitled to a discovery does not necessarily entitle him also to an account.

3. But if the relief to be ultimately rendered is the payment of damages, and a discovery is needed, and the ascertainment of damages is complicated and intricate, and the action at law cannot be adequately tried without great difficulty, then, although the case is not one of trusteeship or agency, a court of equity will assume jurisdiction of the whole case and proceed to a final decree on the merits.

4. The rule of damages for the infringement of a patent considered.

5. If a master's report, made under an interlocutory decree, discloses facts properly heard by him, which, in the opinion of the court, should be further investigated, it is competent for the court to direct such an investigation.

In equity.

Clarence A. Seward, for plaintiffs.

Charles R. Ingersoll and Edward W. Stoughton, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The bill of complaint herein alleged, in substance, that the plaintiffs were the owners of letters patent granted to George B. Arnold, on May

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge; reprinted in 2 Ban. & A. 506; and here republished by permission.]

8th, 1860, for a new and useful "improvement in ruffles," and that an executed agreement of license, dated February 21st, 1863, was entered into between the plaintiffs and defendants, by which the former licensed the latter to manufacture and sell the ruffle then manufactured by them, and known as the double ruffle, and the latter agreed to manufacture only said ruffle, and admitted the validity of said patent. The bill also alleged, that, after the date of said agreement, the defendants, in violation thereof and of said letters patent, made and sold many thousand yards of single ruffles, each of which contained the invention described and claimed in said letters patent, and prayed for a disclosure of all their gains and profits, and of the number of yards so made and sold, and that they account for and pay over such gains and profits, and also all damages which the plaintiffs had sustained by reason of the premises. The patent had expired before the bill was brought. The court was of opinion, that, while the averments of the bill were sufficient to justify a court in holding, if necessary, that it was a bill for an injury to patent rights, yet it was manifest that the pleader intended to make the alleged breach of agreement the foundation of the action, and that he sought to recover damages for an injury to the plaintiffs arising out of the violation of the contract. In reply to the objection that a bill in equity, based upon the contract, could not be sustained, because for a breach of contract there was a complete and adequate remedy at law, the court held that it properly had jurisdiction of the case, inasmuch as the proper averments of the bill made it a bill for a discovery, and that the ascertainment of the facts from which damages are to be estimated, in case of injury to property in letters patent, is peculiarly within the province of a court of equity, and whether, having jurisdiction, it would proceed to grant further and more complete relief, and what relief would be granted, were questions which could be determined after the master's report had been made. The court also found, that the agreement had been broken, and that the defendants had made and sold ruffles in violation of said agreement, and which ruffles contained the improvement described and claimed in said letters patent. An interlocutory decree was passed, in which it was adjudged that the plaintiffs were entitled to a discovery from the defendants of facts from which damages for the violation of said contract could be computed and ascertained, and that an account be taken by a master to ascertain and report the number of yards of ruffles made and sold by the defendants during each year between February 21st, 1863, and May 8th, 1874, which contained the improvement claimed in said letters patent, and to ascertain the gains and profits which had been made by the defendants during the period aforesaid, from said manufacture and sale. The opinion of the court, detailing the pleadings and the facts in the case, at length, is to be found in [Case No. 8,949].

The master's report states, that, after a number of hearings and adjournments, the parties "agreed upon the number of yards of ruffling manufactured and sold by the defendants, and that the gains and profits on the whole of the goods so manufactured and sold, amounted to the sum of thirty thousand dollars, the agreement being made upon the basis of the facts proved in the examination of the business transacted in the years 1863 and 1864." The whole number of yards is 2,363,080, and the number of yards of each article, and the profits upon each, are stated in an exhibit attached to the report. The plaintiffs now ask for a final decree for the amount which has been reported by the master. The defendants insist, that, inasmuch as the court has held that the violation of the agreement was the foundation of the action, and jurisdiction was obtained merely for purposes of discovery, and as the relief which is desired is simply the payment of damages for a breach of contract, the court has not jurisdiction to grant further relief. They claim that the jurisdiction which has been exercised in ordering a discovery is exhausted, and cannot empower the court to retain the case for the relief prayed for.

When a bill is brought for a discovery and for other equitable relief within the appropriate jurisdiction of a court of equity, and the ultimate object of the plaintiff is to obtain damages, in such case the court, having granted a discovery, will proceed and give the proper relief in damages, and not compel the plaintiff to undergo the delays and expenses of a suit at law. "The jurisdiction having once rightfully attached, it shall be made effectual for the purposes of complete relief." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. (8th Ed.) § 64k. This rule is expressed in 1 Fonbl. Eq. (book 1, c. 1, § 3), as follows: "The court having acquired cognizance of the suit for purposes of discovery, will entertain it for the purpose of relief, in most cases of fraud, account, accident and mistake," all of which are subjects of equitable jurisdiction. In some cases, courts have laid down the principle more broadly, and have apparently held, that, when jurisdiction once attaches for discovery in any case, the court will entertain a bill for relief, although no equitable relief is or could be sought, and where the only relief that can be granted is in damages. The cases of Parker v. Dee, 2 Ch. Cas. 200; Ryle v. Haggie, 1 Jac. & W. 234; Armstrong v. Gilchrist, 2 Johns. Cas. 424; King v. Baldwin, 17 Johns. 384,—assert this doctrine, and the language of Chief Justice Marshall, in Russell v. Clark, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 69, if interpreted literally, and not in connection with the facts of the case, justifies the assertion. Other courts have disclaimed this extensive jurisdiction, and have held that, where a party comes into equity for discovery merely, and this is the only ground upon which a court of equity obtains jurisdiction, and no other equitable relief is or can be sought, the case will not be retained for purposes of assessing damages, but the parties will be remitted to an action at law. In Middletown Bank v. Russ, 3 Conn. 135, Chief Justice Hosmer says: "This brings me to consider whether a court of chancery, having taken jurisdiction for enforcing a discovery, will universally assume cognizance of the cause, settle every question which may arise, and grant ultimate relief. I have no hesitation in giving a negative to this question." The cases of Hipp v. Babin, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 271, and Insurance Co. v. Bailey, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 616, are illustrations of the indisposition of courts of equity to entertain jurisdiction of suits which are merely for the enforcement of a legal demand. It may be regarded as generally true, that a court of equity ought not to sustain a bill which, although it may contain matter which can give the court jurisdiction, is merely for the assessment of damages for a breach of contract (Hatch v. Cobb, 4 Johns. Ch. 559; Kempshall v. Stone, 5 Johns. Ch. 193; Milkman v. Ordway, 106 Mass. 232); and that, where a bill is brought for discovery, in a case which is not the proper subject of an action or bill for an account, the fact that the plaintiff is entitled to a discovery does not necessarily entitle him also to an account (Foley v. Hill, 2 H. L. Cas. 28; Frietas v. Dos Santos, 1 Younge & J. 574). There is, however, a class of cases in which the relief to be ultimately rendered is the payment of damages alone, and where the party seeking such relief needs the aid of a court of equity for discovery, in a case which is not of trusteeship or agency, but where the ascertainment of damages is complicated and intricate, and the action at law cannot be adequately tried without great difficulty, resulting from the nature of the accounts or from other circumstances. In such cases, a court of equity assumes jurisdiction of the whole case, and proceeds to a final decree upon the merits. In Foley v. Hill, cited supra, a case in which a debt against a banker for a deposit in his bank was sought to be recovered, the lord chancellor says: "It is not because you are entitled to a discovery, that therefore you are entitled to an account. That is entirely a fallacy, that would, if carried to the extent to which it would be carried, according to the argument at the bar, make it appear that every case is matter of equitable jurisdiction, and that, where a plaintiff is entitled to a demand, he may come to a court of equity for discovery. But the rule is, that, where a case is so complicated, or where, from other circumstances, the remedy at law will not give adequate relief, there the court of equity assumes jurisdiction." To the same effect are Corporation of Carlisle v. Wilson, 13 Ves. 276, and O'Connor v. Spaight, 1 Schoales & L. 305, and the principle is fully recognized in Fowle v. Lawrason, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 495.

In my opinion, this case comes fully within the rule which has been considered. A discovery was certainly necessary, for the facts which are embodied in the master's report required an expenditure of much time, labor and painstaking by the defendants' treasurer before they could be stated, and it would have been impracticable to obtain them in the ordinary method of trial by jury. These facts having been thus obtained, the court is now asked to leave the parties to the remedy at law, where the main question must be, in fact, the ascertainment of damages for an injury to the patent rights of the plaintiffs, oftentimes one of the most complex and difficult questions of patent law, one which demands careful study, reflection and experience upon the part of the master, and which can often be very inadequately solved in a jury trial. The careful and accurate computation of damages in this case is a matter which will require time and labor, for, as will be seen hereafter, I do not think that all the elements from which damages are to be computed have been ascertained by the agreement of the parties.

There is another reason which induces me not to remit the parties now to an action at law. It is disclosed in the testimony taken before the master, that, since the commencement of this suit, the defendants have gone into insolvency, and their estate is now being administered upon in the probate court, under the insolvent system of this state. This creates no bar to an action at law against the defendants, but, as their estate is entirely in the custody of a court for the benefit of their creditors, and a dividend can only be expected, it is for the advantage of all the parties and the creditors, that the dividend should not be diminished by protracted and expensive litigation and a multiplicity of suits.

It is next claimed by the plaintiffs, that the report of the master discloses all the facts from which damages can be ascertained, and that, it having been agreed that the profits of the defendants upon the ruffles manufactured and sold by them were the sum of $30,000, such sum is the measure and rule of damages. I do not understand that, in all cases and invariably, the amount of profits upon the manufactured article is the rule of damages for an infringement. Cowing v. Rumsey [Case No. 3,296]; Bell v. Daniels [Id. 1,247]. In this case, as was stated in the former opinion, "the Magic ruffle of the plaintiffs is an unfinished article, to be attached by the band to ladies' or children's undergarments. The Princess ruffle is a finished article, having a band with an even and finished edge, and is designed to be worn as a neck ruffle. Still, the distinguishing character of the Magic ruffle is found in the Princess ruffle." The defendants' ruffles contain the patented improvement which is embodied in the Magic ruffle, but the ruffles of the two parties are different in the eye of the trade and of the purchaser. The endeavor of the court should be to ascertain the damages which resulted to the plaintiffs from the unauthorized use of their improvement, how much the plaintiffs have lost in consequence of the violation of this contract by the manufacture and sale of the twenty-two kinds of ruffles which are mentioned in the report; and the fact that, upon the entire ruffles of the character which the defendants manufactured, they made a profit, is not sufficient to enable a court to determine that the plaintiffs suffered that amount of damages from the use of their patented improvement. Mowry v. Whitney, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 620; Littlefield v. Perry, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 205.

There should, therefore, be a reference to a master, to ascertain the amount of damages which the plaintiffs have suffered in each year, from the year 1863 to 1874, from the breach of the contract by the use of the patented improvement in the manufacture of the ruffles which it has already been found were manufactured and sold by the defendants during said years.

The defendants made the point, upon the former hearing, that they had been manufacturing the Princess ruffle ever since the date of the agreement, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the plaintiffs, and were not notified that such manufacture and sale were regarded by the plaintiffs as a violation of the agreement or of the patent, until after it had expired, and about the time of the commencement of this suit; and that this claim had become stale, and should not be favored by courts of equity, by reason of the laches of the complainants in the vindication of their rights, and their acquiescence in the assertion of adverse rights. It was said in the opinion, that, "if I was satisfied, from the evidence, that the defendants had manufactured and sold the Princess ruffle since 1862, in such quantities that the attention of the plaintiffs must have been early called to the infringement, or that they actually knew of the violation of the agreement ever since the year 1862, I should be of opinion, that their delay in making known their claim was such as to prevent them from now receiving the aid of a court of equity to the extent of its powers." "This doctrine is found in the very nature and character of the jurisdiction exercised by courts of equity on this and other analogous subjects." Wyeth v. Stone [Case No. 18,107]. There was at that time no adequate evidence of laches on the part of the plaintiffs. It now appears, from the report of the master, that 2,359,074 yards of infringing ruffles were sold by the defendants from 1863 to 1874, in which amount is included 1,055,246 yards of the Princess ruffle, the one which was the principal subject of discussion upon the former hearing. The defendants renew their claim, from these facts, that there must have been laches on the part of the plaintiffs, who properly say that they have had no opportunity to introduce any testimony upon their part, because they did not know that the question of laches was to be made an issue before the master. Enough is brought to the attention of the court, from the evidence properly received by the master, to show that the evidence in regard to laches was not exhausted in the proofs which were taken before the interlocutory decree. The order which has been heretofore passed being only interlocutory, if the master's report discloses facts, properly heard by him upon the order of reference, which, in the opinion of the court should be further investigated, it is competent for the court to direct such an investigation. Interlocutory orders and decrees are subject to revision until a final decree is made. Perkins v. Fourniquet, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 206. The decree should also provide that the master should take proofs as to whether the plaintiffs have had knowledge of the manufacture and sale of said ruffles which have been manufactured and sold by the defendants in violation of said agreement, and during what period of time the plaintiffs have had such knowledge, and whether the defendants have manufactured and sold said ruffles since 1862, in such quantities that it must have come to the attention and knowledge of the plaintiffs, or that they actually knew of such manufacture during said period.

The second exception to the master's report, in regard to the admission of patents subsequent to the plaintiffs' patent, is sustained. The master's report is confirmed, with said exception.

Let a decree be passed in conformity with this opinion.

[For another case involving this patent see Magic Ruffle Co. v. Douglas, Case No. 8,948.]

Case No. 8,951.

In re MAGIE.

[2 Ben. 369; 1 N. B. R. 522 (Quarto, 138); 1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 122.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. April 28, 1868.

BANKRUPTCY—JURISDICTION—PLACE OF RESIDENCE—DOING BUSINESS.

Where a bankrupt filed a petition in bankruptcy in this district, not averring any place of residence, and, on his examination, it appeared that he resided with his father, in New Jersey, and had done so since he came from Chicago, four years previous, that he had been engaged in looking after a private matter, with a view to returning to Chicago, and that, for about six months back, he had been keeping books for a firm in New York City, and thereupon, the register declined to make an adjudication of bankruptcy, as having no jurisdiction of the case: Held, that the register's decision was correct.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 122, gives only a partial report.]

[Distinguished in Re Baily, Case No. 753. Cited in Fogarty v. Gerrity, Id. 4,895.]

In this case, a petition in bankruptcy was filed by the bankrupt on March 3d, 1868, which was referred to a register. It stated that he had been "a general agent and clerk for twelve months next immediately preceding the filing of the petition, at New York City." The register examined the petitioner on oath, and he deposed that he resided with his father, in New Jersey, and had done so since he came from Chicago, Illinois, about four years before, where he had been in business; that he had been engaged in looking after a personal matter since he came from Chicago, with the intent of returning there; and that, since about the middle of October, 1867, he had been engaged in keeping books with a firm in New York City, but had not been engaged with any other persons in New York City, nor had any business connection save as thus stated, nor been engaged in business otherwise for himself. The register thereupon declined to make an adjudication of bankruptcy, on the ground that this court had no jurisdiction of the case, inasmuch as the petition was not "addressed to the judge of the judicial district in which such debtor has resided, or carried on business for the six months next immediately preceding the time of filing such petition." On request of the bankrupt, the question was certified to the court.

[2] [Register JAMES F. DWIGHT, certified that in the course of the proceedings in said cause before him, the following question arose pertinent to the said proceedings. Facts: On the 3d day of March, 1868, William H. Magie filed his petition for adjudication in bankruptcy, &c., with schedules A and B attached, in the clerk's office of this district, and the matter was duly referred to me as register to take such proceedings as are required by the act. It appearing by the petition, duplicate copy of which was (with the schedules) filed with me on the 3d of April, that the petitioner respectfully represents that he has been a general agent and clerk for twelve months next immediately preceding the filing of this petition, at New York City, within this judicial district. I examined the petitioner under oath, on the 9th of April, touching the matter of his residence or business to the end of deciding if this court has jurisdiction of his case. The petitioner deposed that he resided with his father at Elizabeth, New Jersey, and has done so since he came from Chicago, Illinois, about four years ago. That he was formerly in business for himself at Chicago; that he had been engaged in looking after a personal matter since he came from Chicago, with the intent of returning there. That he has been engaged as a bookkeeper for a firm in William street, New York City, since January 1, 1868. That previous to January 1, 1868, and since about the middle of October, he had been engaged in keeping books with a firm in Wall street, New York City. That he had not been engaged with any other persons in New York City, nor had any business connections save as thus stated, nor been engaged in business otherwise for himself. That he was unmarried. The petition did not aver place of residence. There are only three creditors.

[Upon this state of facts I declined to make adjudication in bankruptcy of the petitioner, on the ground that the district court for the Southern district of New York had no jurisdiction of the case, inasmuch as the petition was not "addressed to the judge of the judicial district in which such debtor has resided or carried on business for the six months next immediately preceding the time of filing his petition," &c. To which decision and refusal the bankrupt excepts, and through his attorney prays that the question may be certified to the judge, as to whether, upon these facts, this court has jurisdiction of the petition, and whether adjudication shall be had. Which is granted, and this certificate forwarded to the judge for his decision and opinion on the point raised.

[BY THE REGISTER. In my opinion the law intended to confer jurisdiction in these courts only, where the petitioner would be known publicly as a resident and citizen; or where he had such business relations with the public generally as would equally cause him to be known. And it could scarcely be said that a person whose business was only that of a book-keeper or clerk in a place where his name did not appear in public, "carried on business" in a way that would give any publicity to his occupation or person. The object of this provision as to jurisdiction would seem to be to prevent imposition upon creditors and fraudulent discharges; and there is no hardship worked to petitioners, for, if having no regular business by which they are known, they may apply in the district where they reside.

[Which facts and opinion are submitted for the opinion of the judge.] [2]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I think the register was correct in his decision. The principles laid down by this court, in Re Kinsman [Case No. 7,832], in reference to a kindred provision in the bankruptcy act of 1841 [5 Stat. 440], make it improper for this court to assume jurisdiction in this case.

[2] [From 1 N. B. R. 522 (Quarto, 138).]

[2] [From 1 N. B. R. 522 (Quarto, 138).]

Case No. 8,952.

MAGILL v. BROWN.

[Brightly, N. P. 346; 14 Haz. Reg. Pa. 305.]

Circuit Court, E. D Pennsylvania. April Term, 1833.

CORPORATIONS—STATUTES OF MORTMAIN — PENNSYLVANIA LAW—CHARITABLE USES — POWER TO TAKE — SOCIETIES OF FRIENDS — CHARTER BY PRESCRIPTION — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — RIGHTS OF CITIZENS—ENJOYMENT OF PROPERTY—CHARITABLE USES — COMMON LAW — ADOPTION IN PENNSYLVANIA — JURISDICTION OF CHANCERY—WHAT ARE — CONSTRUCTION OF DEVISE OR BEQUEST.

[1. The English statutes of mortmain and superstitious uses were never adopted by the colony or state of Pennsylvania, but its policy was always favorable to corporations and religious bodies.]

[2. Under the constitution and laws of Pennsylvania, persons associated for religious, literary, or charitable purposes have power to take property by devise or bequest for pious or charitable uses, whether or not such bodies are actually incorporated, and without a license from the state.]

[Cited in Burr v. Smith, 7 Vt. 259.]

[3. The societies of Friends, though never formally incorporated, are capable, under the constitution and laws of Pennsylvania, of taking property by devise or bequest for the purposes of their organization.]

[4. The yearly meeting of Friends in Philadelphia is a body politic or corporate by prescription, and its rights of taking and enjoying property cannot be impaired by inquiry into the separate capacity of its component members.]

[5. One of the privileges secured in every state to the citizens of the several states by article 4, § 2 of the constitution of the United States, is that of exemption from the law of alienage and the consequent right of enjoying property in the several states; and accordingly a devise or bequest cannot be defeated on the ground that the beneficiary is a citizen or a corporation of another state than the testator.]

[6. Though the English statute of charitable uses (43 Eliz. c. 4) was not adopted by the colony or state of Pennsylvania, the principles of the common law relative to such uses, which were restored in England by that statute, were adopted, as well as the principles of equity in the administration of such trusts.]

[7. The whole course of the common law of England, except as modified, for special purposes of policy, by the statutes of mortmain and superstitious uses, was favorable to charities and the jurisdiction of chancery over charitable uses and gifts therefor has been exercised from the beginning of the existence of the court, and does not depend on the statute of 43 Eliz.]

[Cited in Burr v. Smith, 7 Vt. 259.]

[8. The following are good charitable uses: (a) An annual subscription to the stock of a religious society, which is applied to the printing and dissemination of books and writings approved by such society. (b) A gift to a religious society for the relief of the poor members thereof. (c) A gift to the treasurer of a society, organized for the civilization and improvement of certain Indian tribes, for the benefit of such Indians. (d) A gift to a religious society for the relief of the poor thereof, and toward enlarging and improving its meetinghouse. (e) A gift to a town for a fire engine and hose.]

[9. A devise or bequest to a society, with whose constitution and purposes the testator is familiar, for the purposes of such society, such purposes being proper objects of charitable uses, is a good devise or bequest for such charitable uses.]

The subject of bequests for pious and charitable uses was very fully considered by the circuit court of the United States for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, at the April term, 1833, in the case of Magill v. Brown, which involved the construction of the will of Sarah Zane, deceased. The following sections of the will are those reviewed in the opinion of the court:

"9. I give to the yearly meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia, of which I am a member, eight acres of meadow land, situate on Greenwich Point road, being part of thirty acres belonging to my dear father, with the flats thereunto belonging, to be kept by the yearly meeting aforesaid for the purpose of a fund, the income of which, after keeping it in good order, to be paid as an annual subscription into the yearly meeting's stock.

"10. I give most affectionately to the five monthly meetings of Women Friends held in Philadelphia, viz., Philadelphia monthly meeting, monthly meeting for the northern district, monthly meeting for the southern district, monthly meeting for the western district, and Green street monthly meeting—to each of the above said monthly meetings two hundred dollars, making in the whole one thousand dollars, to purchase ground rents; the income whereof I request to be received annually in the monthly meeting's collections towards the relief of the poor members belonging thereto.

"11. Whereas, about the year seventeen hundred and fifty-nine, Captain Newcastle, an Indian chief or messenger, ordered thirty pounds, Pennsylvania currency, to be paid to my dear father, for the use of his two cousins, a boy and a girl. The boy soon after died. The girl, named Betty, received a part of the above thirty pounds at different times, by Thomas King, an Indian chief; but as no information could be obtained of said Betty for forty years; and the residue of the thirty pounds is now in my possession, I am desirous that the full sum of thirty pounds principal, with the interest from the year seventeen hundred and fifty-nine until the time it is paid, which I desire to be into faithful hands; therefore I will and direct my executor to pay to the treasurer of the committee of the yearly meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia, appointed to relieve the Indians, for the benefit of said Indians, according to their best judgment in justice and equity.

"12. I give to my executors a legacy or sum of three hundred dollars, to be paid by them to the treasurer of the committee of the yearly meeting of friends held in Philadelphia, appointed to relieve the Indians, to the benefit of said Indians."

"17. I give to my executors the sum of one thousand dollars, to pay to the treasurer of the committee appointed by the yearly meeting of Friends held in Baltimore, for the transactions of the relief and benefit of the Indians, that the said yearly meeting, with the yearly meeting of Friends held at Mount Pleasant, in the state of Ohio, hath under their care, towards civilization, having the tribe of Tuscaroras first in view, if it be found within two years.

"18. I give affectionately to Friends composing the Baltimore yearly meeting five hundred dollars, to be realized in that city, so that the interest or income thereof be annually paid into their collection toward their yearly meeting, stock, if one exists; if not, I will, if it be the mind of Friends belonging thereto, the encouragement to establish one.

"19. I give affectionately to Friends composing the yearly meeting held at Mount Pleasant, state of Ohio, five hundred dollars, to be realized so that the interest or income thereof be annually paid into their collection towards their yearly meeting stock, if one exists; if not, I will, if it is the mind, and agreeable to the Friends belonging thereto, the encouragement to establish one.

"20. I give to the select members belonging to the monthly meeting of Women Friends held at Hopewell, Frederick county, Virginia, five hundred dollars, to be realized in the town of Winchester, in the same county, the interest or income issuing therefrom to be annually paid into the treasury of the above said monthly meeting's stock, towards the relief of the poor belonging thereto.

"21. I give to my dear friends composing Centre preparative meeting, belonging to Hopewell monthly meeting, the sum of five hundred dollars towards enlarging Friends' monthly meeting-house in Winchester, if that meeting think it expedient, and to assist building a stone wall, so as to enclose the whole lot whereon the said meeting-house is erected.

"22. I give to the citizens of Winchester above said one thousand dollars to purchase a fire-engine and hose to be kept in best repair, with my affection and gratitude.

"31. Whereas, the heir of the late Elizabeth Roberts, daughter of Joseph Galloway, formerly of Philadelphia, hath deposited a bond of one hundred pounds, Pennsylvania currency, in the hands of Wm. Rawle and Joseph Jenks, agents for the estate of Elizabeth Roberts' daughter, now in Great Britain, I believing the above said bond to be given by my brother Isaac Zane, of Virginia, a number of years since—the bond for many years out of reach; the interest hath not, that it appears, been paid: I will and direct my executors to pay the said one hundred pounds principal, and the legal interest thereon from the day of its date till paid in full.

"Lastly. I do nominate and appoint my respected friends Samuel Coates and ——, of Philadelphia, and Jacob Rinker, of Virginia, executors of this, my last will and testament; giving them, my above-named executors, full power to sell by private sale my house in Chestnut street, to meet the payments herein directed; and if that be insufficient, to sell Marlbro' estate, in Virginia, belonging to my late brother, Isaac Zane: hereby revoking all former and other wills by me heretofore made, and declaring this to be my last will and testament. In witness whereof, I hereunto set my hand and affix my seal, in Philadelphia, this twenty-fourth day of the third month, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nineteen."

The following elaborate and learned opinion was delivered by

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice. This case arises on the will of Sarah Zane, a member of the Society of Friends, who in the body thereof describes herself as of the city of Philadelphia. She died in Virginia, but, as it has not been questioned, we shall assume this to have been the place of her domicil at the time of her death. The law of the state must therefore govern her disposition of her personal property, as well as of her real estate situated here. 1 Bin. 336, 344; 3 Rawle, 318; 3 Pen. & W. 187, 188.

The questions which have been made in the argument, and those which necessarily arise in the case, are of the most interesting kind; involving the capacity of the Quaker societies of this and other states to take real or personal estate by devise, without a charter of incorporation; their right to enjoy it for their own use, as a body united for the purposes of religion, charity, and education; and what now are, by the law of the land, pious and charitable uses, for which valid donations can be made by deed or will. In referring to the history of the settlement of this state, the principles of its first settlers, the character of its founder, his systems and institutions, it would seem not a little surprising that such questions could have remained open till this time. If there are any subjects on which the law could be supposed to be settled, it would be the rights of religious societies and charitable establishments. If there was any part of the law of England which could be congenial to the spirit and policy of the colony, and likely to be adopted by a society of men who sought an asylum from persecution for religious opinion, it would be that which would afford the best protection in the enjoyment of their rights, privileges, immunities and estates as a religious society. If there were any laws which they would be disposed to leave behind them, they would be those which grew out of feudal tenures, a spirit of persecution, or an established religion. The last laws which they would introduce would be those which created a forfeiture of all land conveyed to a society incorporated for the purposes of charity and religious worship, according to their own consciences, without regard to the mode of celebrating divine service as prescribed by law, or which prevent a donation for such uses from taking effect without a special license by charter or act of assembly. Such would be the natural conclusion from the known and practical principles of civil and religious liberty which have distinguished the policy and jurisprudence of this state through all time as founded on a system of "free and unlimited Catholicism" in matters of religion, of expanded benevolence in matters of charity, and equality of rights in the enjoyment of property.

These leading features are so strongly impressed on the written laws, and enter so deeply into the customs and common law of the state, as to make it impossible to mistake the character and tendency of the system in the details of its legislation, by colonial authority, or the adoption of the statutes or common law of England. It is not conceivable that the Quaker settlers of this province should have introduced those laws of the mother country, which would incapacitate them as individuals or a religious society from taking, holding or enjoying property as a matter of right without a charter; or expose to a forfeiture to the proprietor or mesne landlord lands conveyed to them for the purposes of sepulture, religious worship, or charity; and above all that William Penn should have adopted the statutes of Henry VIII., declaring the celebration of divine service according to the rites of the Catholic church to be superstitious, and conveyances for its use illegal and void; and the statutes of mortmain, which make the enjoyment of property by a religious body dependent on the pleasure and permission of the lord of the fee; while at the same time he excludes the statute of 43 Eliz. and the mild and beneficent principles of the common law which that statute has been held to have restored.

The history of the Society of Quakers presents no instance of an incorporation. Did they adopt any rule of law, making one necessary to give them a legal capacity to purchase property? They have enjoyed it from the earliest time without a license in mortmain. Is it liable to be now seized by the state as forfeited by the purchaser? They have their own modes of worship and system of charities. Are donations for their support to be regulated by the prohibitory statutes of a foreign country, or confined to the uses specified in its laws? 2 Ves. Sr. 475. They have kindred societies in other states—do the laws of these invalidate a bequest of money to them for purposes of piety and charity? These are questions which have been made by the counsel in their objections to the devise of the lot of ground to the yearly meeting of Philadelphia, and the pecuniary bequests to the several meetings of Friends in this place and in Maryland, Virginia, and Ohio. The objections to the validity of the dispositions of this will are not founded on any statutory law of Pennsylvania, but on the English statutes of mortmain, superstitious uses, and wills, alleged to be in force in this state by usage, though not adopted by any act of assembly. The principles of the common law have also been relied on as supporting the objection to the capacity of the parties to take, for the want of an incorporation as well as of an act of assembly, containing enabling provisions, analagous to the 43 Eliz., validating dispositions for religious, literary and charitable purposes, and giving jurisdiction to the courts to carry them into effect, as they can do in England.

The field of investigation is from its nature a broad one, and from the confined course which has been taken in discussing the law of charities in the various cases which have arisen is, in a great measure, a new one. Though there are several statutes on the subject in England, prior to the 43 Eliz., no treatise or opinion contains a condensed or comparative view of the system of charities, which has grown out of them, so as to enable us by any authority of precedent or adjudication to ascertain the definite source of the various principles which have from time to time become embodied into the general course of the law of England. Nor have the courts of the United States or of this state brought into contrast or comparison either the policy of the government of England and this country in relation to the religious establishments and rights of conscience, the general course of legislation pursued in either, or the principles of the common law independent of the statutes alluded to.

Proceeding on the assumption that the 43 Eliz. was the only foundation on which charities could be supported, in opposition to prior statutes, and that statute not being considered in force here unless re-enacted, the courts in this country have laid down principles which, resting solely on such assumption, cannot be considered as authoritative in their conclusions, if on a more thorough examination the premises on which they depend should appear to be erroneous. We trust that a review of the course of their adjudication on charities will show that it has not become so settled as to be sanctioned by the maxim of "communis error facit jus," or that in endeavoring to extract the rules which must govern the law of charities from the constitution of the Union and this state, its statutes and usages, and the statutes and common law of England, we violate the respect due to the decisions of courts of high authority.

It is at all times proper to discriminate between the question directly presented for the deliberate consideration of a court, on which they exercise their judgment, by a solemn adjudication, and those observations which are made by way of illustration, or mere declarations of what the law is on any particular subject. The one is binding as authority, the other to be respected only as a mere opinion or argument, which must have its influence, but cannot be enforced on our judgment. If the supreme judicial tribunal of the state or the Union have judicially considered the statutes of mortmain to be in force, this court is bound to take the law as settled; but if they have merely declared them to be so, without making such opinion the basis of their judgment, or have in doing so omitted to refer to the supreme law of the land which bears on the question, this court may and ought to do what a higher one would do, notwithstanding any preconceived or expressed opinion—compare the constitution with the statutes, and be governed by the result.

The 3d section of the 3d article of the constitution of the United States prohibits a "forfeiture for treason except during the life of the person attainted." The constitution of Pennsylvania extends the prohibition to all forfeitures by attainder, or felos de se, or death by casualties. It is at least worth the inquiry whether a forfeiture in fee is incurred by an alienation in mortmain, against which no prohibition is to be found in any law of the state; in a word, whether a penal law of England has an effect which the whole power of the federal and state government is incompetent to give to a conviction for the highest crimes known to their laws. 9 Serg. & R. 343. This inquiry necessarily leads to an investigation of the common law, so as to find out whether these statutes are in affirmance or derogatory of its principles which have been made the common law of the state, so far as adopted or applicable to its policy. If they are of the latter character, then how have they become in force in Pennsylvania, and what is the evidence of their adoption by legislation or usage? As these statutes impose a forfeiture of the whole estate conveyed, the proposition that they are in force here ought to be considered as an affirmative one to be made out by those who assent, that an act lawful by the common law is prohibited by a statute. The penal laws of England have been presumed not to be in force here. The burden of proof has always been held to be on those who allege a forfeiture, by an act punishable only by statute; and it ought to be clear and conclusive, especially on subjects which affect the rights to the transmission and enjoyment of property. If there was any one subject on which the founder, the legislature, and the people of the colony, from its first settlement, were governed by a settled, unyielding course of policy, it was to facilitate the transmission of estates, to secure their enjoyment, and disincumber them of all restraints attendant on feudal tenures, the forms of conveyance, the ceremonies of investiture, and most emphatically to protect them from the operation of all laws growing out of an established religion, which at all interfered with the rights of conscience or the perfect freedom of religious worship. Lyle v. Richards, 9 Serg. & R. 326, 334, 359.

The charter of privileges of 1701, the colonial laws, both the constitutions of 1776 and 1790, and the laws of the state, are in the same spirit which induced the people, in their first acts of assuming independence and establishing government by their own authority, to prescribe the following oath to the members of the convention who formed their first constitution: "That I will oppose any measure that shall or may in the least interfere with or obstruct the religious principle or practice of any of the good people of this province, as heretofore enjoyed." Conv. Pa. 39. The constitution was in the spirit of this oath, and declared the rights of religious societies and corporate bodies held according to the usage of the colony to be inviolable. We have, therefore, a plain rule of decision by the supreme law of the state, if the nature and extent of such usage can be judicially ascertained. The enjoyment of real estate in perpetuity by any body incorporated by a written charter, or one presumed by law from evidence of long possession and exercise of corporate franchises, is mortmain per se. If on a review of the legislation and custom of the colony before, and of the state after the Revolution, it shall appear, that their rights have been the subject of the most continued favor, and their protection is provided for in the most explicit manner, it must be deemed conclusive evidence of the general policy of the state at least, if it does not establish the utter incompatibility of any incapacity in any body of men not only to take, but to enjoy, an estate to their own use, with the whole scope and tenor both of its written and common law.

The strong constitutional position which has been assumed by the senior counsel of the respondent in this case has induced us to examine it with a degree of attention equally called for by the magnitude of the questions involved, and by the conclusions which we have felt ourselves bound to adopt; in some respects at variance with the views of the judges of the supreme court of the United States as to the necessity of an actual incorporation to give the capacity to take; and of those of this state, to enable a corporation to enjoy an estate. We think, however, that it will be found to accord with all the great leading principles and rules which have been too firmly established by themselves to be now shaken, and that their minds would have come to the same conclusion as ours have done if the same materials for investigation had been presented to them. In reviewing the judicial history of this state, it is believed that there will be found no decision that an incorporation is necessary to give to any association of individuals the capacity of taking and enjoying an estate in perpetuity, either by the assumed name of the society, or by trustees for their use. If such a rule exists, it is only by the common law as adopted here. Neither is there any adjudged case turning on the statutes of mortmain, by which any estate has ever been vested in the commonwealth by a forfeiture incurred in consequence of an alienation to a corporate body without license, charter or law; or any evidence that such license was ever granted by the proprietary or governor, or any public grant made with a clause of non obstante statuto, in any patent, charter, or act of assembly, under the colonial or state government; nor does the word "mortmain" appear on the statute book for one hundred and fifty years from the date of the charter to Penn. This unbroken silence would have been taken as conclusive evidence that the British statutes were deemed wholly inapplicable to the fixed policy of the colony and state, its usage and fundamental laws, if the contrary opinion had not been expressed by the judges of the supreme court of the state, and adopted by the legislature at the present session. Hence arises the importance, as well as delicacy, of the questions involved in this cause. To consider them open after the declared opinion of both departments of the government, may seem to indicate a want of respect to their authority, but when we feel convinced that there is a law of higher obligation which must guide our judgment, we are bound to follow it.

The view which we feel constrained to take of the constitutions of 1701, 1776, and 1790, all of which remain in force so far as respects the rights of property, conscience, and religious worship, is this: that all bodies united for religious, charitable or literary purposes, though without a written charter or law, are to be considered as corporations by prescription or the usage and common law of the state, with all the attributes and incidents of such corporations by the principles of the common law, and entitled to all rights which are conformable to the customs of the province. From this view it results that if the statutes of mortmain apply to bodies whose charters are in existence they apply equally to those whose charters are presumed from prescription. A brief summary of these provisions will show that they embrace all corporations of either kind. The 9 Hen. III. c. 36, declared gifts made to any religious house to be void, and that the land given should enure to the lord of the fee. The 7 Edw. I. prohibited all alienations in mortmain under a like forfeiture. These statutes were evaded by fictitious recoveries, till the 13 Edw. I. took away their effect. A new mode of evasion was then invented by conveyances in trust for uses in mortmain, so that the profits went to religious persons. The 15 Rich. II. extended the former statutes to such uses, and to all guilds, fraternities, towns, and cities which have perpetual community, and all others which have offices perpetual, though not people of religion. Keb. St. 5, 33, 46, 181; 1 Ruffh. St. 9, 32. 100, 401, 402. The 23 Hen. VIII. c. 10, prohibited conveyances to any bodies not incorporated, for the use of churches, &c., to have obits perpetual or the continual service of a priest forever, and declared them void, but there was an express saving of the right of devising in mortmain by the custom of cities and towns corporate. Keb. St. 403, 404; 2 Ruffh. St. 171, 172. The statute of wills of 34 & 35 Hen. VIII. contained an express exception of devices to corporations. Keb. St. 562; Ruffh. St. 333, 334.

Such is the substance of the English statutes, which have been considered as the clogs upon dispositions to pious and charitable uses, which have been removed by the 43 Eliz. in England. If the question of their application to the state of things in this colony was a new one, we should deem it apparent that they were never practically extended to it. "It is the true principle of colonization that the emigrants from the mother country carry with them such laws as are useful in their new situation, and none other." 3 Bin. 596. That the law of charities as it rests on the 43 Eliz. is not only useful, but peculiarly adapted to the policy of the state, is unquestioned. It is therefore difficult to account for the prevalence of the opinion that it is not in force, or that any statutes repugnant to its provisions, should have been considered as practically adopted. Yet such is undoubtedly the apparent tendency of judicial opinion for the last twenty-five years.

In 1808, the judges of the supreme court made a report to the legislature pursuant to a resolution calling on them to state what English statutes were in force, in which they declare "conveyances to superstitious uses absolutely void by these statutes, and conveyances to corporations, unless sanctioned by charter or act of assembly, to be so far void that they have no capacity to hold the estates for their own benefit, but subject to the right of the commonwealth, who may appropriate them at their own pleasure; in other words, that such conveyances have no validity for the purpose of enabling the corporation to hold in mortmain." They consider them as standing on the same footing as conveyances to aliens. 3 Bin. 626; Leazure v. Hillegas, 7 Serg. & R. 319, 322. In M'Girr v. Aaron they declared a devise to an officiating priest and his successors, not being a corporation sole, was against the policy of the law, and void, as tending to a perpetuity. 1 Pen. & W. 51. In the case of Methodist Church v. Remington, 1 Watts, 218, they say: "The statutes of mortmain, too, which deprive corporations of the capacity to hold," &c., and consider the legislature as evincing "an evident jealousy of clerical monopoly," though they refer to no act in which it had been expressed. They also decided, that a conveyance for a religious society composed of members a majority of whom resided out of the state was not good under the law of 1730; and that the trust not being sanctioned by any legislative recognition, they would not lend their aid to carry it into effect. In Witman v. Lex they seem to take for granted that at common law an incorporation was necessary to give a capacity to take and hold in perpetuity (17 Serg. & R. 91), though it was dispensed with by the custom of the province. We should have felt bound by these opinions, if the court had taken a view of the constitution and legislation of the state on the subjects to which they relate, and given them a deliberate construction; but as they have not been called upon to declare the meaning of any but the act of 1730, or of the provisions of any of the constitutions, it cannot be expected that the law can be considered as settled until their provisions had been brought under judicial notice. In the case of Baptist Association v. Hart's Ex'rs, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 28, the supreme court of the United States have decided that a bequest of personal property to the plaintiffs as trustees was not valid for want of an incorporation, at the time of the devise; and the decision was approved in the case of Inglis v. Trustees of Sailor's Snug Harbor, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 114. This case was ruled according to the law of Virginia, in which state the 43 Eliz. had been repealed. We may therefore consider it as a case settling a question of a local rather than of a general nature. It has not, at any rate, such an application to the law of Pennsylvania as to control this case, if it should appear to be embraced in the provisions of any act of assembly or constitution of the state, or to rest on its known and recognized usage.

So far as these opinions of both courts rest on general principles affecting this case, they are also open to all rules which have been laid down in other cases by the same authority, to which it is thought best to refer before entering on a review of the general course of the law of England or of this state. The last case which has arisen in the supreme court of the state is Methodist Church v. Remington [supra]. In giving their opinion, the chief justice uses this strong language: "The decision in Witman v. Lex is full to the point that a trust in favor of an incorporated religious or charitable society is an available one." As the statute 15 Rich. II. expressly applied to conveyances in trust, or for the use of religious persons, in mortmain, we may consider this statute as not in force in this state; so that the objections growing out of the statutes of mortmain will be confined to those of Hen. III. and Edw. I. In relation to superstitious uses, the court observe: "The present is not a superstitious use, and indeed it is not easy to see how there can be such a thing here, at least in the acceptation of the word by the British courts, who seem to have extended it to all uses which are not subordinate to the interest and will of the established church;" so that an inquiry into this subject is not closed. In M'Girr v. Aaron there were no trustees, and, though the court held the devise to an officiating priest void because he was not a corporation, yet they declared it good in case of the congregation, though not incorporated (1 Pen. & W. 51, 52), on the principle that "a gift to a charitable use shall not fail for want of a trustee, but vest as soon as the charity has acquired a capacity to take." As the bequest in the case of the Baptist Association failed only for the want of a trustee capable at the time of the devise, though there was an incorporation afterwards, we cannot consider it as authority in this state, where a different principle is established. The bequest would have been good according to M'Girr v. Aaron.

In examining the decisions of the supreme court of the United States which precede and follow the Baptist Case, it appears that they have established a different principle as to devises of real estate for charitable uses, or for the use of religious societies which are not incorporated; so as to leave that case applicable only to a bequest of money or personal property, even in Virginia. In Terrett v. Taylor, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 43, 53, land in or near Alexandria was conveyed to two persons, the church-wardens of the parish for the time being, and their successors in office for the use and benefit of the church in said parish. The deed was held to operate by way of estoppel to confirm to the church and its privies the perpetual and beneficial estate in the land, though it was not incorporated, and church-wardens were not capable of holding an inheritance in land by succession. [Mason v. Muncaster] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 455, 464. The court remark: "And in our judgment it would make no difference whether the Episcopal Church were a voluntary society or clothed with corporate powers, for in equity, as to objects which the laws cannot but recognise as useful and meritorious, the same reason would exist for relief in the one case as the other. Laws enacted for religious purposes evidently presuppose the existence of the Episcopal Church, with its general rights and authorities growing out of the common law." The church was capable of receiving endowments of land, and that the minister of the parish was during the incumbency seized of the freehold of its inheritable property as emphatically persona ecclesiae, and capable as a sole corporation of transmitting the inheritance to his successors. [Terrett v. Taylor] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 45, 46, 329; [Mason v. Muncaster] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 455, 464. In Town of Paulet v. Clark, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 329, they say: "The property was in fact and in law generally purchased by the parishioners, or acquired by the benefactions of pious donors. The title thereto was indefeasibly vested in the churches, or rather in their legal agents—[Terrett v. Taylor] Id. 49—or representatives entitled to take the donation—[Town of Paulet v. Clark] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 329." "The true legal notion of a parish church is a consecrated place, having attached to it the right of burial, and the administration of the sacraments. Every such church, of common right, ought to have manse and glebe as a suitable endowment; and when there is a church actually in existence, a grant to it is in effect a grant to the parson and his successors, as an endowment to be held jure ecclesiae." [Town of Paulet v. Clark] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 329; [Mason v. Muncaster] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 464. The parson has a qualified fee, but the land becomes the perpetual inheritance of the church. [Terrett v. Taylor] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 47, 53; [Town of Paulet v. Clark] Id. 329; Co. Litt. 341 a. b.; 2 Mass. 500.

In Beatty v. Kurtz, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 580, 583, 585, the court decided that the laying out and marking a lot in the plan of a town "for the Lutheran Church" was a good and valid disposition—though it was not then organized, and was never incorporated as a religious society, but was a voluntary association, acting in its general arrangement by committees and trustees chosen from time to time; or any church actually in existence, or any grantee capable of taking. It was supported as a dedication of the lot to public and pious uses, and the enjoyment decreed to the committee of the society. The court take a ground which applies with great force to the law and constitution of Pennsylvania, as will appear hereafter. "The bill of rights of Maryland gives validity to any sale, gift, lease or devise of any quantity of land, not exceeding two acres, for a church, meeting, or other house of worship, and for a burying ground, which shall be used, improved and enjoyed only for such purposes. To this extent it recognizes the doctrines of the statute of Elizabeth for charitable uses, under which, it is well known, that such uses would be upheld, although there was no specific trustee or grantee." In the Case of the Town of Paulet they laid down the principle that they considered appropriations or dedications of property to particular or religious uses as an exception to the general rule, requiring a particular grantee, and, like the dedication of a highway to the public. [Town of Paulet v. Clark] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 331; s. p. [Beatty v. Kurtz] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 583. In M'Connell v. Lexington, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 582, they considered that the immemorial use of a spring by the people of the town, as public property, was evidence of its original dedication, and decisive against a private claim to its exclusive use. In Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 436, 437, the principle of these cases was affirmed to its fullest extent, and the court add—what is very important in the consideration of this case—that "the case of Beatty v. Kurtz [supra] did not turn on the bill of rights of Maryland or the statute of Elizabeth, but rested on more general principles of law." [Cincinnati v. White, supra.]

To trace these principles to their source in the early statutes and common law of England is therefore in perfect accordance with the decisions of the tribunal to whose revision our opinion is subject. It is the more necessary in this case, as the general course of the law of England as to the transmission and enjoyment of property formed the law of the colony at its first settlement, and continued in force till repealed or altered by colonial authority. In ascertaining what these general principles are, it is our duty to adopt the rules of construction which have been established by the supreme court in relation to charities under the 43 Eliz., and to apply them to the laws and constitution of this state, and the other English statutes which are analogous in their provisions and subject-matter to that statute, in doing which we shall start upon premises which must lead to correct results.

The legislation of Pennsylvania will be first considered according to the rules of expounding statutes laid down in Baptist Association v. Hart [4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 1], and those which are the principles of the common law. It is not to be denied that if any gifts are enumerated in this statute which were not previously valid, or for which no previous remedy existed, the statute makes them valid, and furnishes a remedy. That there were such gifts, and that the statute has given them validity, has been repeatedly determined. The books are full of cases where conveyances to charitable uses which were void by the statutes of mortmain, or were in other respects so defective that on general principles nothing passed, have been sustained under this statute. If this statute restores to its original capacity a conveyance rendered void by an act of the legislature, it will, of course, operate with equal effect on any legal objection to the gift which originates in any other manner, and which a statute can remove. The authorities to this point are numerous. [Baptist Ass'n v. Hart] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 31; 1 Sugd. Powers, 267; 4 Vin. Abr. 479, 483; Gilb. Ch. 45; 1 P. Wms. 248; [Inglis v. Trustees of Sailor's Snug Harbor] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 141; 4 Ch. R. 40.

"Statutes providing remedy for the maintenance of religion, the advancement of learning, and the relief of the poor, shall be extended according to equity, right and reason in their favor, and never against them," or be so construed as to permit the mischief to remain and suppress the remedy. The duty of judges is to advance the remedy and suppress the mischief—to advance the public and suppress the private object. 11 Coke, 70–73b; Hob. 97, 157; 5 Coke, 14b. Statutes authorizing gifts in mortmain, and all laws in favor of public institutions, shall be favorably and benignly construed. 11 Coke, 76a; Hob. 122; Co. Litt. 99a; [Town of Paulet v. Clark] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 331; [Inglis v. Sailor's Snug Harbor] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 140, 480; 1 Lev. 66; Dyer, 225. So of charters of the king for pious and charitable works. 10 Coke, 28a. And in all acts for the confirmation of grants by persons having power over the land the deed shall be established though it wants some circumstance necessary to give it effect, according to its tenor and purport. 11 Coke, 78a. The statutes of superstition were intended to advance and continue good and charitable uses, and affect none which are not derived out of superstitious uses, or to be distributed by superstitious persons. Moore, 129, pl. 277; 4 Coke, 105, 11, 13, 14; where the same deed contains a disposition partly superstitious, and pious and charitable in other parts, the latter are good, if not dependent on and capable of being separated from the former. 4 Coke, 104–116, and cases cited; Anders. 95-100; Cro. Eliz. 449; Wing. Max. 497; Co. Litt. 342a. Though hospitals are named in the statutes, they apply only to such as are religious or ecclesiastical, or the funds are to be devoted to purposes of superstition as specially defined and plainly prohibited. It shall not be made superstitious by construction or intendment—it must be plain, and not imaginary, and no general words shall take away good and charitable gifts allowed by parliament, which are favored in the law. Co. Litt. 342a; Hob. 120–124; Moore, 865, pl. 1194; 11 Coke, 70b 71a; Wing. Max. 497. An affirmative statute does not take away a right existing by common law or custom, as the statute of wills, which did not affect the previous right to devise. Co. Litt. 111b, 115a; 3 Coke, 35a.

A custom saved and preserved by a statute is good against a statute. Thus lands can be held in mortmain in London without license, because there is such a custom (Cro. Eliz. 455); and the customs of London are saved by acts of parliament and Magna Charta (2 Co. Inst. 201; 4 Co. Inst. 250, 253; 5 Day, Com. Dig. 20; Cro. Eliz. 248, 455; W. Jones, 251, 387). A statute authorizing an act to be done repeals a law prohibiting it; otherwise it would be a dead letter, in opposition to an established maxim that such construction shall be made of all acts, "ut res magis valeat, quam pereat," and reverse another unquestioned one, "leges posteriores priores contraria abrogant." [Greene v. Neal] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 299. A grant by the king or an act of parliament is an authority to hold the thing granted, and operates as a license dispensing with the performance of any other act required by any law against which the king may grant a license or dispensation; though none is given in terms, it per se creates an incorporation, confers suggestion, and grants a rent; so if done by a private person under the authority of an act of parliament, as the erection of an hospital. 10 Coke, 30, 25a; Plowd. 502. A clause of non obstante statuto is not necessary to save a forfeiture by the statutes of mortmain. It is inferred from the act of the king or the legislature in order to give it effect. 8 Coke, 56. Its only use is to show the king is not deceived. 4 Coke, 36a. Hence it has always been held that the statutes did not apply to grants made by the king. 15 Vin. Abr. 479, a, 2. "He shall not be intended to be misconusant, and when he licenses expressly to alien to an abbot, &c., which is in mortmain, he need not make any non obstante of the statute of mortmain, for it is apparent to be granted in mortmain, the license of the king or mediate lords operates to two intents, as a dispensation from the statute of quia emptores, and of mortmain, because their deeds shall be taken most strongly against them, and the king shall not be presumed to make a void grant." Co. Litt. 98b, 99a; Plowd. 502; 8 Coke, 56.

Where land is held immediately of the king, he may grant a license to alien in mortmain; if held mediately, it might be made by the mesne lord, or with his consent. 34 Edw. I. c. 3; Keb. St. 71; Ruffh. St. 155. Since the 7 & 8 Wm. III., he can do it without their consent. 2 Day's Com. Dig. 298. As tenures in chivalry had been abolished by the statute 12 Car. II., the forfeiture accruing by alienation in mortmain accrued only to the king, who may renounce by his license a right conferred on the crown. Co. Litt. 98, 99; Vaughan, 332. The effect of a license in mortmain is not to give a capacity to a corporation to take or hold in mortmain. Conveyances in mortmain were good at common law. Co. Litt. 98, 99; Vaughan, 356. A grant in frank-almoigne placed the lands in the hands of bodies which never died. The estate became dead as to the king or mesne lords, of whom they were holden, yielding neither escheats, wardships, reliefs, or other benefits. Such grants were always good by deeds of private persons before the statutes, or by title of prescription, and are now good by the grant of the king. Litt. §§ 141, 142; Co. Litt. 98, 99; Co. Litt. 2b; Terms of the Law, 294; Plowd. 293; 6 Coke, 17a. Notwithstanding the statutes, the estate vests by the conveyance. 7 Serg. & R. 320. They are founded on the capacity of the grantee to take, so that wherever they apply the conveyance would enable a corporation to hold at common law for its own use; for if the estate did not vest, it would remain in the hands of the grantor or his heirs, as in the case of a conveyance to superstitious uses, which are merely void without incurring any forfeiture by the statutes of Hen. VIII. and Edw. VI. The license therefore is only an exemption from the penalty of the statutes. Co. Litt. 52b. It restores an interest. 1 Freem. 117. It is an authority coupled with an interest, enabling the grantees to acquire and enjoy an inheritance to their own use, without incurring the forfeiture, and by a renunciation of the rights given by the statutes, leaves the estate in their hands as if they had never been passed (2 Day's Com. Dig. 297, b, 3; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 222, 495, 500; 4 Co. Inst. 135; Co. Litt. 99a; Vaughan, 333, 356); and operates in favor of a society or body not incorporated by a charter (Vaughan, 351, 352; 7 Coke, 35b), which is conclusive to show its previous capacity to take. All that can be required, then, to give the same capacity to hold as to take, and make the right to enjoy as perfect as to take an estate, is any act of the party to whom the forfeiture accrues, which is in terms, or by its legal operation, a renunciation of a right conferred by law, which binds him and protects the estate from the assertion of his claim under the statutes; according to the established principle that subsequent laws abrogate prior ones, inconsistent with them, without any repealing clause, and will produce the same effect as a license in mortmain. It is admitted that the king is bound by all acts of parliament in which he is named, so that he can exercise no power by statute, prerogative, or tenure, in derogation of any right protected or authority conferred by the statute; but, generally speaking, he is not bound unless its provisions extend to him, subject to these exceptions. All statutes which provide profitable remedy for the maintenance of religion, the advancement of good literature, and the relief of the poor (11 Coke, 71b; 5 Coke, 14a, 14b), which suppress wrong and provide a remedy for a right (2 Co. Inst. 142, 69, 359, 681), or tend to perform the will of a donor or founder (11 Coke, 72a; 5 Coke, 14, 15; Plowd. 246; 3 Atk. 147), bind the king, though not named. His claims to lands by escheat, forfeiture or wardship are subject to all rights existing before they came to his hands. The law gives him a better remedy, but no better right, than the subject from whom the land came to his hands (2 Co. Inst. 573; 2 Ves. Sr. 296, 297; Hardr. 69, 469); and the appropriate courts were authorized by the statute—33 Hen. VIII. c. 39; Keb. St. 555; 2 Ruffh. St. 324—to decide on the rights of a subject, in a controversy between him and the king, according to equity and good conscience, as between subject and subject (7 Coke, 19b; Hardr. 27, 176, 230, 502; 4 Co. Inst. 190).

These are the principles which have given to the 43 Eliz. its powerful effect; though it contains no repealing clause, license or non obstante statuto, yet, by universal consent, it has been held to repeal the statutes of mortmain, the exceptions of corporations in the statute of wills, and to restore the common law in all cases embraced in its provisions, or which can be brought within them by the most liberal and benign construction. 1 P. Wms. 248; Finch, Prec. 16; Gilb. Eq. 137; 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 191; [Inglis v. Trustees of Sailor's Snug Harbor] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 141. These principles are admirably condensed by the supreme court in [Baptist Association v. Hart] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 31, and are those by which we must consider the legislation of Pennsylvania on the same subjects. We must hold its law to bind the state, and to dispense with the forfeiture accruing to it by an alienation in mortmain, if a similar law in England would bind the king. The prerogative of a republican state cannot be deemed, in a court of justice, more sacred than the jewels of a crown; or the rights of its citizens, individually or collectively, to the enjoyment of property, to be placed on a less permanent foundation than those of the subjects of a monarchy. Nor can corporations be subject to disabilities here from which they are exempted by the general course of the law of England, between the spirit and policy of which, and that of Pennsylvania, there will be found a most marked difference in this respect.

In England there has always been a jealousy of their rights to hold property; here they will be found to have been favored and protected by express provisions in the constitution and laws, while there is an entire absence of any restriction on their capacity to take or enjoy estates. There the effect of statutes has been to remove disabilities interposed by former statutes, which abrogated common law rights; here laws have been passed in affirmance of its principles, and they have been embodied in a supreme law. There courts have gone to the extent of their power, to rescue charities from the intolerant spirit of the times; here their duty is to further the benevolent policy of the people and legislature as evidenced in all their acts. From the first settlement of the province, we find that the uniform tenor of its laws has been to encourage all alienations of property, and to confirm its disposition, in every mode known to the law. The act of 1705 confirmed all sales of land made under the laws of the province, and declared that no deed, grant or assurance should be held defective on account of any want of form, of livery of seisin, attornment, misnomer or misrecital, but shall be good and effectual. 1 Dall. Laws, 51, 53; 1 Smith Laws, 31. This law has always been in force. The act of 1711 confirmed all grants from the proprietor to any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, to hold the same for such estates and uses as they had been sold or disposed of, notwithstanding any defects therein, and shall be expounded most beneficially for the grantees, according to the words, tenor and true meaning thereof. 1 Dall. Laws, Append. 39, 40. This law was repealed in council in 1713, but its principles have ever been respected. The law of 1705 declared that all wills whereby any lands were devised should be good and available in law for granting, conveying, and assuring the lands devised and chattels bequeathed. 1 Dall. Laws, 53; 1 Smith, Laws, 33; 1 Dall. Laws, Append. 26, 36. The law of 1742 gives a remedy for the recovery "of any legacy or bequest of any sum of money" to any person or persons. Miller, Laws, 156; 1 Dall. Laws, 449, 631. Neither of these laws contain any exception of corporations. The rights of conscience were declared inviolable by the charter of privileges of 1701, granted by William Penn to the people of the colony. No person who lived quietly under the government and acknowledged one God, should be in any case molested, or prejudiced in his estate, because of his conscientious persuasion (1 Dall. Laws, Append. 8, 10); and liberty of conscience was secured by a law approved in council (1 Dall. Laws, 43, 44). In 1712 an act was passed empowering all religious societies of Protestants within the province to purchase and hold lands for burying grounds, houses of worship, schools and hospitals; and, by trustees or otherwise, as they shall think fit to receive and take grants and conveyances for the same, for any estate whatever for the uses aforesaid. All sales, gifts or grants to such societies, or any persons in trust for them, were ratified and confirmed according to their tenor and meaning, and of the parties concerned. Gifts to the poor of these societies, or for their use, shall be employed only for the charitable uses for which they were given, according to what may be collected to be the true meaning of the donors or grantors, notwithstanding any failure in these gifts, grants or bequests. Bradf. Laws, 160. This law was repealed in council, twice enacted, and as often repealed. In 1710 the judges of the county court were made a court of equity, authorized to proceed according to the rules and practice of the high court of chancery of Great Britain, and an appeal was given to the supreme court, with power to decree as may be agreeable to equity and justice. Bradf. Laws, 103, 120. Though this law was repealed in 1713, and courts of chancery discontinued in 1736, the rules and principles of equity have always formed part of the common law of the state.

The sixth article of the charter to Penn provided, that the laws for regulating and governing property within the province, as well as for the descent and enjoyment of lands and goods and chattels, should be and continue the same as they should be for the time being, by the general course of the law of England, till the same should be altered. 1 Dall. Laws, Append. 3. The preamble to the act of 1718 recites that it is a settled point, that as the common law is the birthright of English subjects, so it ought to be the rule in British colonies. But acts of parliament have been adjudged not to extend to these plantations, unless they are particularly named in such acts (1 Dall. Laws, 129, 133); or, as has often been declared by the supreme court of the state, unless they are convenient, adapted to the circumstances of the colony, or have been in force by adoption, usage or long-continued practice, in courts of justice. [Morris v. Vanderen] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 67; [Respublica v. Mesca] Id. 74; 3 Bin. 596, 597; 1 Dall. Laws, 722. After repeated attempts to pass a law in favor of religious societies which would accord with the spirit of the colony, one was finally approved in council. The act of 1730–31 confirmed all sales, gifts and grants of land to any persons in trust for the use of any protestant religious society, for sites of churches, houses of religious worship, schools, almshouses and burying-grounds, made before the law. It also contained a provision which made it lawful in future, for any such society within the province to purchase, take, receive by gift, grant or otherwise, for the above specified uses and purposes, and for any estate whatsoever, and to hold the same for the said uses in fee, provided, that they should not take land for their maintenance or support, or for any other uses than those specified. 1 Dall. Laws, 270–273.

The constitution of 1776 declared, in the first section of the bill of rights, "That all men have an equal right to acquire, possess and protect property;" and in the eighth, "That every member of society hath a right to be protected in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property." 2. "That all men have a natural and unalienable right to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience and understanding." 3. "Nor can any man, who acknowledges the being of a God, be justly deprived or abridged of his civil rights as a citizen, on account of his religious sentiments, or peculiar mode of religious worship, and that no authority is or ought to be vested in any power whatever, that shall in any case interfere with, or in any manner control the rights of conscience in the free exercise of religious worship." In the frame of government (section 45): "And all religious societies or bodies of men, heretofore united or incorporated for the advancement of religion or learning, or for other pious and charitable purposes, shall be encouraged and protected in the enjoyment of the privileges, immunities and estates which they were accustomed to enjoy, or could of right have enjoyed under the laws or former constitution of the state." Section 46. "The declaration of rights is hereby declared to be a part of the constitution of this commonwealth, and ought never to be violated on any pretence whatever." 1 Dall. Laws, Append. 55, 60; Conv. Pa. 55, 64.

The first law passed, on the change of government, declared the province laws in force till altered or repealed; also the common law, and such parts of the statute laws of England as had been before in force,—"And so much of any law or act of assembly as declares, orders, directs or commands any matter or thing repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the constitution, is hereby declared not to be revived, but shall be null and void, and of no force or effect." 1 Dall. Laws, 722. The constitution of 1790, in article 7, § 1, provides, "That the legislature shall, as soon as may be, provide by law for the establishment of schools throughout the state, in such manner that the poor may be taught gratis." Section 2. "The arts and sciences shall be promoted in one or more seminaries of learning." The 44th section of the old constitution contained similar provisions, though not so full. Section 3. "The rights, privileges, immunities and estates of religious societies and bodies corporate, shall remain as if the constitution of the state had not been altered or amended." The first three sections of the bill of rights are, in substance, the same as in the old one. The third concludes—"and that no preference shall ever be given by law to any religious establishment or modes of worship." Section 26. "To guard against the transgression of the high powers which we have delegated, we declare that every thing in this article is excepted out of the several powers of government, and shall for ever remain inviolate." In the first clause of the schedule it is ordained, "That all laws of this commonwealth in force at the time of making the said alterations and amendments in the said constitution, and not inconsistent therewith, and all rights, actions, prosecutions, claims and contracts, as well of individuals as of bodies politic, shall continue as if the said alterations and amendments had not been made." 3 Dall. Laws, 32, 36. These provisions, and the law which immediately followed the adoption of the constitution, are a direct negative on the existence of any spirit of policy adverse to corporations.

In 1791, the act was passed "to confer on certain associations of the citizens of this commonwealth, the powers and immunities of corporations, or bodies politic in law." The preamble recites the reasons to be the saving time to the legislature in enacting laws to incorporate private associations, and the convenience of individuals desirous of incorporation—and the law provides: "That when any number of persons, citizens of the state, are associated, or mean to associate for any literary, charitable or religious purpose, they are empowered to obtain a charter of incorporation, subject only to the following conditions: To state in writing the objects, articles and conditions of their associations, and if the attorney general and the supreme court shall certify their opinion that they are lawful, the governor shall order it to be enrolled; and the persons associated become an incorporated body in law and in fact; to have continuance by their corporate name and title. They are authorized to execute the usual corporate powers, and to make by-laws and ordinances, provided they are not repugnant to the constitution and laws of the United States, of this state, or to the instrument on which the corporation was established. The corporations and their successors shall be able and capable in law, according to the terms and conditions of the instrument on which they are established, to take and hold lands, money, goods and chattels given them, according to the articles and by-laws, or the will of the donor, provided the clear income does not exceed five hundred pounds yearly." "And, whereas, bequests and legacies may be made to public institutions of which they may not derive the benefit intended, from a want of information," it is directed, that "when a will is brought to the register's office, to be recorded, which shall contain a bequest or legacy to a public incorporate body, he shall give them notice within six months, of the nature and amount of the legacy, and the name of the executor." 3 Dall. Laws, 40, 43. The law of 1818 enacts that where any lands are holden in trust for any religious society, or for any number of persons for the purpose of public worship or schools, or to be used as a burying-ground, or for charitable purposes; or where any estate of a personal nature, is or may be vested in any person or persons, to be applied by them to any religious, literary or charitable use or uses, and the trustee or trustees neglect or abuse such trust or trusts, the supreme court, or court of common pleas, on complaint made, may call on the trustees to answer; and if, on hearing, the court is satisfied that the trust has been neglected or abused, may and shall remove the trustees, and appoint others in their place, who shall be vested with the rights and powers of the former trustees, and give such security as is required. Section 2. The court shall have the power and jurisdiction of compelling the trustees to account before the court or auditors. Purd. Dig. 167; 7 Smith, Laws, 43, 44. This law was followed by the act of 1825, "To prevent the failure of trusts." The supreme court is authorized to grant relief in equity in all cases of trusts, so far as regards the appointment of trustees, either in consequence of the death, infancy, lunacy or other inability, or where a trustee renounces or refuses to act, or one or more dies, or becomes non compos, and a joint action is requisite, and to compel a conveyance of the legal estate, when the trust has expired. On the application of any person interested in the execution of the trust, the court may appoint a trustee, having regard to the objects of the trust as fully as a court of equity can do, and the rights of the former trustee shall vest in him; on the application of trustees, the court may remove them and appoint others. The act of 1828 confers the same powers on the courts of common pleas, district and circuit courts. Purd. Dig. 858–860.

From this summary of the legislation of Pennsylvania, it appears to have partaken of the spirit of its successive constitutions, and to have been constantly progressive, in the completion and perfection of the system of its founder, each succeeding law being more liberal in its principles, and more expanded in its provisions. The principles of the charter of Penn continued in force and protected all religious societies in the enjoyment of their rights of worship and property, in their houses of devotion, after the repeal of the act of 1712 by the council, and the passage of the act of 1730, as before. In 1733–34, Governor Gordon informed the council that a house had been erected in Walnut street for the exercise of the Roman Catholic religion, in which mass was openly celebrated, contrary to the laws of England, particularly to the statute of 12 Wm. III., which extended to the colonies. The council were of a different opinion, and declared that the Catholics were protected by the charter of privileges and the law concerning liberty of conscience; but they referred the subject to the governor, that he might consult his superiors at home. No other proceedings however took place. Gord. 216. This opinion of the council accords with the declaration of William Penn to the members of the assembly, in 1701, "That he had justly given privileges the precedency of property as the bulwark to secure the other." 2 Clarkson's Life of Penn, 203. It was a rule of property, and the basis of the usage and common law of the state. The opinion of the council was the practical exposition of the charter, as understood and acknowledged, of which there cannot be a stronger case than the one that occurred. The 11 & 12 Wm. III. c. 4, prohibited the celebration of mass in any of the dominions of England, under a penalty of perpetual imprisonment. 4 Ruffh. St. 41. If this statute included the colonies, it was repealed by the charter; if it did not, there was no law professing or attempting to interfere with it as a fundamental law of the colony.

The list of laws rejected by the king in council shows the constant struggle between the policy of the colony and mother country (Hall & Sellers' L. 21, 57, 67, 99, 125, 193, 199, 276; Miller's L. 16, 74, 158), which ended only with the Revolution. The usage continued, in despite of the efforts of the king and council to prevent it from having the sanction of the law, and the provisions of the constitution were as broad as the usage. Its phraseology is adapted to the inconveniences which existed, and its provisions afford a remedy commensurate with the mischief arising from the want of a legal sanction to rights indispensable to the enjoyment of practical liberty of conscience, as a bulwark to property. In the Case of Cedar Springs Congregation, the trust did not depend on the enabling provisions of the statute, but on the custom of the province, as stated in Witman v. Lex [supra]; Methodist Church v. Remington, 6 Bin. 59 [1 Watts, 218]. The evidence of this custom appears in all the acts for granting charters, and in the law of 1791, in relation to the lots held by the Quaker societies in Front street, and at the corner of Fourth and Arch streets. 3 Dall. Laws, 46, 47. The proceeding before the council in 1734 is unequivocal evidence of the claim of right by the Catholic societies, according to the usage under the charter of 1701; so that we have from the most authentic sources full evidence of the existence of a custom and usage, expressly saved and preserved by the constitution of 1776, which operates not only prospectively, but refers by express terms to the former constitution of 1701, so as to make the usage of the same force from that time, as it would have had, if the state had been then independent of the mother country, as she was in 1776. Being saved by the supreme law, the custom had the same force as the law itself, and stood on the same basis as customs saved by Magna Charta, according to the rules of law before laid down.

The constitution of 1776, then puts the rights which could be enjoyed by the previous custom of the province, on the same footing as if they had been defined in detail in the 45th section, and the present constitution makes them perpetual. If any additional sanction could be given to them by human authority, it will be found in the first amendment to the constitution of the United States. "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." This extends to the judicial as well as legislative departments of the government, and annuls all jurisdiction over the subject matter, past or future. [Marbury v. Madison] 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 174–179; [Bingham v. Cabot] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 382. If the rights of a religious or literary society are derived from a contract or grant, no state law can impair their obligation, and the supreme court have placed them under the same constitutional protection as those of individuals. [Terrett v. Taylor] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 45; [Mason v. Muncaster] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 454; [Society v. Town of New Haven] 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 480; [Dartmouth College v. Woodward] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 624. To deny to bodies united without a charter any rights of property which could be enjoyed by a corporate body, would be in direct opposition to both the constitutions of the state and union, and the custom of the province. "Incorporations were almost unknown; yet to all sorts of pious and charitable associations, in every part of the province, valuable bequests were made by those who were ignorant of the niceties of expression necessary to accomplish the object at common law. Nothing was more frequent than bequests to unincorporated congregations, without the intervention of trustees; and even when there was a corporation, it frequently happened that the corporate designation was mistaken, or the trust vaguely defined. Notwithstanding which, the testator's bounty was uniformly applied to the object." Surely a usage of such early origin and extensive application, may claim the sanction of a law, resting, as it does on the basis of all our laws of domestic origin, the legislation of common consent. 17 Serg. & R. 91, 92. The same principle is adopted in all governments. A usage or custom is presumed to have had its origin in a law once in existence, and lost in the lapse of time, the evidence whereof being by prescription, that supplies the place of the written law, which is taken to have been as broad as the usage. The law presumed from a custom, has the same force as one appearing on the rolls of parliament—the only difference is in the mode of proof; and the rule that a custom shall not prevail against an act of parliament unless it is saved and preserved by a statute. 3 Dow, Parl. Cas. 112; Austruther 614; 1 Dow, Parl. Cas. 322. The supreme law of England and the states of this Union which have no written constitutions of government, is proved only by legislative usage, which is the evidence of their constitution and supreme law. [Calder v. Bull] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 400; [Wilkinson v. Leland] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 656, 657; [U. S. v. Arredondo] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 714, 715. On whatever subject a known and recognized usage exists, it forms the law of the case, and controls all affirmative statutes, and the rules of the common law—as a general or local law, according to its nature. [U. S. v. Arredondo] Id. 715, and cases cited. The reason is obvious—it is founded on a law presumed from the prescription. This presumption is not that such a law ever, in fact, existed, but "it is adopted as a general principle, to take the place of individual or specific belief." 12 Ves. 265, 266; 10 Johns. 380; [Prevost v. Gratz] 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 504. Though the party claiming by prescription produces his title, and it is worth nothing, the court will direct the jury to presume another grant subsequently. All shall be presumed to be done, which shall make the ancient appropriation good, and the right shall be presumed from the prescription, if it could have had a legal beginning. 12 Coke, 5; Cowp. 109, 110. The same rule applies to the franchises of a corporation (4 Mod. 55; 1 Saund. 345; 1 Rolle, Abr. 512), "for whatever may commence by grant, is good by prescription." Where possession has been long held under a claim of right, to the exclusive enjoyment of the lands of the crown, a patent, charter, or grant of the king will be presumed. 1 Dow, P. C. 322. The same rule is applied in this country,—14 Mass. 534,—though the possession was taken and held under a defective title,—[Society v. Town of Pawlet] 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 506, 507; [Jackson v. Huntington] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 439, 440. The principle has been applied in Pennsylvania to a religious society, which has been long in possession of a piece of ground, on which they had erected a church, used it for public worship, and occupied an adjoining piece for a burial-ground, and another piece for the free passage of the congregation, and the accommodation of horses and carriages, according to what the supreme court declared the common usage. This possession was held to be sufficient to enable the society "to recover in ejectment, and sufficient for a presumption, that the commonwealth had granted the land to the predecessors of the plaintiffs, or made a promise of a grant which would establish a right of pre-emption." Mather v. Ministers of Trinity Church, 3 Serg. & R. 510, 511.

Either presumption is sufficient for all the purposes of this case. The only difference between a grant and a pre-emption is the payment of the purchase money, which must precede the formal consummation by patent; but when paid, the right to a patent, and the enjoyment of the estate against the commonwealth is complete. We may now assume these principles to be settled, that usage and customs have the force of laws—that those which are saved and preserved by the constitution of this state are its supreme law—and that rights declared in the constitution, or which have been, or could be enjoyed according to customs or usage, saved and preserved, neither depend on legislative discretion, nor can be impaired, much less forfeited, by legislative power. It follows, that no charter can be requisite to give a capacity already existing by usage, or asserted in the bill of rights or constitution, or a dispensation from a forfeiture, which no law was competent to enforce or prescribe. Hence, the course of the legislature has been, in granting special acts of incorporation to religious, literary and charitable societies, strictly in the spirit of the constitution, to superadd to their constitutional rights, the privileges, franchises and immunities of corporations, to confer the powers of corporate bodies, "to further their objects and charitable designs," to put all religious societies on the same footing, as to the encouragement and protection afforded by the constitution (Bradf. Laws, 11, 23, 52, 89; Laws 1790, p. 285) by imparting to them such powers as would enable them to manage their corporate concerns, and enjoy their corporate property by their own by-laws and officers, and to assert their rights in their corporate capacity; not to give the capacity to take property, nor to release it from the forfeiture of mortmain. Charters were given to Catholic societies, "to enable them to manage the temporalities of the church, as fully as any other religious society could do." Laws 1789, pp. 456, 532; [Terrett v. Taylor] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 49; [Town of Pawlet v. Clark] Id. 326, 327. A lottery was granted for the benefit of the Hebrew congregation, in order to save their property from sale by execution. The preamble contained this recital—"And whereas, it is just and proper that all religious societies should be protected, so far as is consistent with the principles of the constitution." Laws 1790, p. 310; 2 Dall. Laws, 817.

In most of the laws granting charters, there is a recital to this effect, "that it is just and right, agreeably to the true spirit of the constitution, that the prayer be granted;" or, "that this house is disposed to exercise their powers for the encouragement of all pious and charitable uses." Bradf. Laws, 37, 223, 407; Laws 1789, pp. 189, 198, 225, 285. They are retrospective to the property held by the society, before the incorporation, in some cases by deeds in trust for their use; in others, to the society by their name of association only, of which there are more than thirty instances in Bradford's Laws, which fully establish the fact of the universal usage throughout the state, for all religious societies to enjoy estates without actual incorporation. What expresses the sense of the legislature most unequivocally is, the law of 1789, which, after reciting the 45th section of the constitution, declared so much of the law of 1779, relating to the college and charitable school of Philadelphia, as was repugnant to the charter from the proprietor, to be void, on the ground "that the charter gave them rights which were entitled to encouragement and protection in the free enjoyment and exercise thereof, in conformity to the will of the donor, in the same manner as it could have of right occupied and enjoyed the same under the former laws and constitution," and that the law was "repugnant to justice, a violation of the constitution, and dangerous in its precedent to all incorporated bodies, and the rights and franchises thereof." 2 Dall. Laws, 650, 651. When such is the fact of the constitution, it certainly could not be the law of the state, that bodies united or incorporated, needed any other protection for their rights, privileges or estates. They could be submitted to no other test than usage; and though the legislature could not be coerced to grant an incorporation, they could not infringe any right which could be enjoyed under the constitution. They might refuse them the franchises necessary to transmit property by mere succession, and to govern the society by corporate officers and by-laws; but as all the individual members were capable in law of acquiring it, no power could take it from them.

The inhabitants of a town may take in succession by a grant to their singular heirs, a private person may build and endow a house for a school, an hospital, a church, or abiding houses for the poor, without incorporation: but he could not, by his own grant, give it corporate franchise of succession. 10 Coke, 26, 27; 2 Co. Inst. 202; [Town of Pawlet v. Clark] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 329. The rule of the common law is recognized and well illustrated in the preamble to the 39 Eliz. c. 5, for the erection of hospitals, &c., by private persons,—the reason for which is declared to be, "understanding and finding that such good law has not taken such good effect as was intended, by reason that no person can erect or incorporate any hospital," &c., "but her majesty, or by her highness' special license, by letters patent in that behalf to be obtained." The act then authorized the creation of incorporations by the deed of the founder enrolled in chancery, without any act of the crown, with full corporate powers and franchises and to make any by-laws not repugnant to the laws of the kingdom. Keb. St. 921; 2 Ruffh. 687, 688. This statute was evidently the pattern for the act of 1791, as appears by the title, the preamble, and the enacting clauses. Neither contain any restrictions on any unincorporated societies or bodies; their provisions are remedial, in order to facilitate the enjoyment of charitable donations, and the furtherance of charitable objects, by corporate franchises; to enable an individual to do what he could not do without a law;—to give a private deed the effect of a public grant, in order to complete the pious and charitable work by the charter of the donor or founder, without a special application to the crown or assembly. 10 Coke, 25–34; [Terrett v. Taylor] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 49. Both laws are founded on an existing right to make the donation; and if the right of property had not been understood to have been fixed and settled, the legislature would never have interfered to secure its enjoyment in perpetuity by succession, as a continuing corporate franchise with no other limitation to the power of making by-laws, than the laws of the land, the will of the donor or founder, and the articles of association; placing the incorporation on the authority of parliament, in England, and in this state making it a contract or legislative grant, the obligation of which cannot be impaired by the state.

All the analogous legislation of England is bottomed on the right of private persons, singly or associated, to take and hold estates of inheritance by apt words of grant to themselves and their heirs, which is a common law right of all subjects who are under no legal incapacity. In this respect the law of both countries is the same; the only difference between them consists in two particulars:—1. In England, those persons who have devoted themselves to religion, withdrawn from the world, and entered into holy orders, are not deemed in law to have any civil existence until they have acquired the capacity of natural persons by the removal of the disabilities arising from their profession and the restoration of their original right. In this state, there is no such disability. The bill of rights declares it to be the natural and inherent right of all men to acquire, possess and enjoy property, and the constitution protects all members of society in their persons and estates. No common law disability, therefore, can obstruct the vesting of a constitutional right, and as no law can take it away, no charter is necessary to confer it, or to restore what has not been relinquished or lost. 2. In England, there are statutory disabilities on corporations, whereby they are less favored than individuals or bodies not incorporated; but, in this state, they are subject to no restraints, and in the constitution are placed on the same footing of protection as private persons or bodies united without a charter—there is of course no necessity of any law to repeal a statutory disability, or of a license by any subordinate authority, to perfect a right conferred by a supreme law. If an act of parliament had contained the same provisions as the constitution of this state, and the statute of 34 & 35 Hen. VIII. had contained no exception for corporations, there could have been no doubt that any religious society could have taken an estate in fee without a charter, and enjoyed it in mortmain without a license. There can be no clearer evidence of the common law right, than the enactment of statutes to take it away, nor is any rule better established, than that an exception of a particular case is an admission that the case would have been embraced in the law or constitution, if no exception had been made. [Gibbons v. Ogden] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 207; [Brown v. State of Maryland] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 436–438.

The application of this rule to the jurisprudence of this state will furnish a solution of all the difficulties which have attended the investigation of the law of charities, and lead to results which cannot be erroneous. The reason of the law is the law itself, and we have only to look to the reasons which call for an incorporation in England for the want of an act of parliament removing the disabilities of religious persons, and to bear in mind that the effect of the constitution must necessarily be that here ecclesiastics or persons in holy orders have a capacity to purchase, which is denied to them by the policy of the common law. Hence arises the necessity of an incorporation by charter or prescription, to give them the capacity of natural persons, by removing the disability arising from their being professed men of religion, as monks, friars and canons, who are deemed dead persons in law; but when one of them becomes a bishop, an abbot, &c., he is the head or sovereign of the house, having a secular capacity to purchase and hold land, through whom the monks or the convent become as natural persons, and remain so while there is a sovereign or head. A grant to an abbot and his monks, or to the abbot and convent, is good, and vests the title in perpetuity. If the grant is made while there is a vacancy in the head or sovereignty, the fee remains in abeyance, but vests whenever the vacancy is filled. Perk. §§ 3, 51, 55; Litt. §§ 443, 655; Co. Litt. 263, 346b; [Terrett v. Taylor] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 47; [Town of Pawlet v. Clark], Id. 329; [Beatty v. Kurtz], 2 Pet. 27 U. S.] 580. The reason why a grant to monks or to a convent, who have never had a head or sovereign by charter or prescription, is bad, is "that when a man taketh lands or tenements by purchase he ought to be of ability to take the same when it falleth to him by purchase." Perk. § 505. Monks have not this capacity, because they are all dead persons in law; but the abbot, who is the sovereign, &c., and this by reason of the sovereignty, for otherwise he should be but as one of the other monks of the convent. Co. Litt. § 655; Id. 345b. And the grant cannot take effect, though a corporation was made afterwards. 2 Coke 51b; Hob. 33; 8 Vin. Abr. 56, H; Perk. §§ 3, 4; Co. Litt. 2a, 3a. The reason of this rule shows that it is confined to grants to persons who have no personal capacity or civil existence. It cannot apply to natural persons, who have a common law right, guarantied in this state, and declared inviolable, as to whom a charter could have no effect except to confer some corporate franchise which was not of right by law. There is no rule of the English law which requires a charter to enable a society or body of capable persons to take and hold property in fee by proper and apt words of inheritance. Any opinion to the contrary must be founded on the misapplication of the foregoing rule, as is evident from the cases referred to by the counsel in the argument of the case [Baptist Association v. Hart] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 1; and in not discriminating between the right of holding an estate of inheritance with and without proper words to convey it, and between the effects of a deed which transmits from ancestor to heir, or a charter which passes it from predecessor to successor. A grant to the commonalty, parishioners, inhabitants or good men of a place (Co. Litt. 3a), the commoners of a waste (Shep. Touch. 236, 237), the people of the county of O., or to associates, being a settlement of Friends at S., does not enable them to hold an inheritable estate without a charter (Perk. § 510), if they could take any estate or privilege it would be only for the lives of the then existing inhabitants (2 Johns. Cas. 323; 9 Johns. 75), as in case of a grant to a single person, omitting "and his heirs." They are capable of taking the fee by proper words of grant to themselves and their heirs, or to another in trust for their use (8 Johns. 388; Shep. Touch. 337), but some person or body politic must be named who can take by force of the grant, as a mayor and commonalty (Perk. § 64), or the church-wardens of such a church (Perk. § 55), in ancient time (Co. Litt. 3a), and now by custom (Cro. Eliz. 145, 179). The parishioners, inhabitants or good men of Dale are capable to purchase goods by such name. Co. Litt. 3a. The only reason why they cannot purchase in fee by that name is that they are not a permanent (Hob. 86), continuing body having succession. Any estate conveyed to them in fee must descend to their singular heirs, unless they have no charter or prescription, the franchise of a body politic, which is the only thing required to enable them to hold in perpetuity by succession.

These considerations lead to the object and effect of an incorporation in England, first, to give to ecclesiastical persons the same civil capacity to purchase as other natural persons have by right; and, secondly, to confer the franchise of succession. In this state, the first object is effected by the constitution, and the incorporation is necessary only for the second. The only difficulty then is to distinguish between the natural rights of all the members of the society which constitutes the state a body politic, and those which are conferred by charter or law on a body of men who are the members of a society united for particular purposes. The common law requires no charter to enable a body of men in any place to purchase chattels or receive donations of money, a chattel interest, or an estate for the lives of the grantees, in land, by their name, as a body, without other words. If one is necessary, it can be only to give them some privilege, immunity or exemption from the rigor of the common law, so as to make them as a natural person capable of enjoying an estate in fee without words of inheritance. A corporation is a permanent thing, that may have succession, an assembly of many into one body (Terms of Law, 123), an artificial body constituted of several members, united by its franchises and liberties, which form its ligaments and are its frame and essence (Lil. Pr. Reg. 459), which never dies, and exists only in its political capacity (1 Bl. Comm. 468–470), which unites and knits them together as a natural person (Id. 272); or a person who is made by policy and fiction of law a body politic, with the capacity of succession in perpetuity, but which exists in both a natural and political capacity (Wood. Inst. 109; 1 Bl. Comm. 468–470). The corporation aggregate, which never dies, and can take only in one capacity, holds in perpetuity by a grant to itself without words of succession; but a corporation sole, existing in both capacities, takes only for life, unless the word "successors" is added, so as to denote the intention to convey to him in his politic capacity of succession. Co. Litt. 8, 9, 94a, 96b, 250; Perk. § 240; Plowd. 496; Wood. Inst. Eng. Law, 111; Terms of Law, 124; Cro. Jac. 532. Succession is a corporate franchise, by which property passes from predecessor to successor, as it does from ancestor to heir, by inheritance. Terms of Law, 123; 4 Coke, 65a. Succession is not a word of inheritance. A grant to a private person and his successors carries only a life estate. Succession must be granted by a charter from the crown, or a law making the grantees a corporation, so that their rights devolve on their successors by virtue of the franchise. The object and effect of the incorporation is to create the artificial person with the same capacity as the natural person. Whenever it exists as a perpetual body, in the exercise of this franchise, its uninterrupted enjoyment is evidence of a charter presumed to be lost, and it is a corporation in fact and in law. Perk. § 34; Co. Litt. 132b; 2 Day's Com. Dig. 300; 1 Saund. 345; 1 Mod. 55. The word "successors" is not in all cases indispensable to vest an interest by a grant or an obligation in the successor of a sole corporation; as where a grant is made to an abbot and his convent, to hold in frank-almoigne the tenure imports succession, and as the celebration of divine service and free alms are continuing objects, the estate is in perpetuity, as in case of a gift in frank-marriage. Litt. § 133; Co. Litt. 93b, 94a; s. p. [Inglis v. Trustees of Sailors' Snug Harbor] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 146, 147. So where, by a local custom, the right passes to the successor, though not named, as the chamberlains of London (Terms of Law, 124; 1 Lil. Pr. Reg. 383, 384; 4 Coke, 65a; Cro. Eliz. 464, 682; Hob. 247; 5 Day's Com. Dig. 17); so, of church-wardens who are a corporation by prescription throughout the kingdom, with capacity to take and hold money and chattels for the church, but not lands, yet they may hold lands by special custom in succession as a corporation (March, 67, pl. 104; Cro. Eliz. 145, 179; Cro. Jac. 532; Cro. Car. 455; [Terrett v. Taylor] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 45, 53; [Town of Pawlet v. Clark] Id. 328; 17 Serg. & R. 92). Neither are any particular words necessary to create the corporation; a public grant of corporate privileges is, per se, an incorporation to give the capacity of enjoyment according to the grant; as to the inhabitants of a town, to have guildam mercatoriam, which unites them by the franchise, and makes them as a natural person for the purpose. 10 Coke, 30a; 1 Rolle, Abr. 513; 1 Bl. Comm. 474. And as the only thing for which a charter is necessary is, to grant the franchise of succession, its actual enjoyment and exercise is, per se, evidence that it was by lawful and competent authority. 1 Bac. Abr. 500; 10 Coke, 28a; 1 Bl. Comm. 475–479; 1 Lil. Pr. Reg. 459. London itself is only a corporation by prescription. 5 Day's Com. Dig. 17, H. If then the religious, literary and charitable societies which have existed in this state had no other foundation for their rights of property, than the principles of the common law and long usage, they could not be disturbed for want of an actual incorporation by charter or law; and when we add to these rights, those expressly secured to them by the constitutions of the state and Union, we cannot doubt that they are as inviolable as a charter could make them. To decide that any one was necessary to enable a religious society to enjoy the sites and buildings for worship, for charity, for education and sepulture, and funds for the maintenance and support of poor, would be a declaration that the rights of conscience and worship could be made dependent on the discretion of the legislature. And, if a charter could be withheld from any society, united for religious purposes, so as to impair their rights of property, then a preference could be given to modes of worship; there would be a virtual prohibition of the free exercise of religion, and the sect favored by the legislature would be, in substance, a religious establishment.

Connecting with the whole course of the legislation of Pennsylvania, the well known fact which appears in the record in this cause, that the societies of Quakers have never been incorporated, it is not credible, that their right to hold their places of worship and charity, and to enjoy donations of land and money, is a mere shadow, without a charter in fact. In our opinion, they have had from 1701, and yet have, a charter more firm than any patent or law can create, the great charter of Penn, which was the basis of the usage and custom of the province, and by its incorporation into the supreme law of the state, is the rule and standard of right by which our judgment must be guided. The law of 1777 repeals all laws inconsistent with its provisions, whether those of the mother country or the colony; and declares that laws not inconsistent with it shall remain in force, as well as such statutes and common law in England as have been heretofore adopted. The laws of 1705 in relation to deeds and wills, which have no exception of corporations, the law of 1730–31, which actually amortises the sites of houses of worship and burial grounds, then in possession of religious societies, devoted or erected for the purposes of religion or charity, were also a direct license to all Protestant religious societies to take and hold in mortmain by future grants and gifts. The law of usage which, being saved by the constitution, became a supreme law, gave the same right to all societies united or incorporated for these purposes, whether Protestant or not. As the custom of the province was in accordance with the rejected laws of 1710, in relation to the powers and duties of courts of equity, to the law of 1711, for the confirmation of public grants, and of 1712, in relation to religious societies, and the various acts concerning liberty of conscience and the privileges of freemen, and as this custom is the law of the state, according to which lands have been held in mortmain from its first settlement, we are bound to give it the same effect as is given to the custom of London by all the rules and principles of law in relation to the construction of statutes. We must apply those which have been adopted on the 43 Eliz., as laid down by the supreme court, to the constitution and laws of the state, and construe them most favorably and benignly, for the promotion of all objects connected with the maintenance of religion, the advancement of learning, the relief of the poor, and public utility; so that the rights, privileges, immunities and estates thus guarantied, shall be enjoyed unimpaired here, at least as far as they are in England, by this statute. No one can compare its provisions with the legislation of the state, and hesitate, for a moment, in saying that they fall far short of the protection given by our own laws to donations for pious and charitable uses. If the 43 Eliz. has by universal consent been considered as pro tanto a repeal of the statutes of mortmain, of superstitious uses, and restraints on corporations by the statutes of wills, they cannot be in force in this state, unless we reverse the whole course of the law, in the exposition of statutes, by construing them liberally in favour of forfeitures, and strictly against charities, so as to abrogate common law rights by equity, and defeat the remedy provided by statutes for their protection.

It must be remembered, that these are mere statutes of policy in contravention of the common law. The old statutes of mortmain were passed to prevent the king and mesne lords from being deprived of their seignioral and feudal rights accruing by prerogative and tenure. The statutes of Hen. VIII. and Edw. VI. were aimed avowedly against the rights of the Catholic religion. Its suppression being their great object, donations for its support were declared "to be superstitious uses, mala in se, and destructive to our constitution and government under the Protestant religion; therefore the law prohibits them, but it is not so with charities, which have always been favored." The true foundation of the statute of mortmain of 9 Geo. II. was, that enough of lands had got into the hands of corporations that were indissoluble; and even now charities may be established in the lifetime of a person, but shall not be done in his last moments. 3 Atk. 148, by Lord Hardwicke. The history of the times gives another reason for this statute: It was passed in the session of 1735–36, during a period of high excitement against the Catholics, and when the church was deemed to be in such danger that a bill for the relief of the Quakers from severe disabilities was thrown out in the house of lords after passing the commons. 5 Hume, 617, 618; 3 Rapin, 225, 226. It is not congenial to the policy of this state to incorporate such principles into its system, nor would it be creditable to the character of its legislation to expound it unfavorably to those rights and institutions which were favored, protected and spared by the laws of a king who spared little besides. If any statutes were suited to the policy of the state, they are the 43 Eliz. and the 7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 37, an act for the encouragement of charitable gifts and dispositions, which in favor of learning, charity and other good and public uses, authorized the king to grant licenses to any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, their heirs and successors, to purchase and alien land, in mortmain, in perpetuity or otherwise, without being subject to forfeiture. 3 Ruffh. 636. It may well be presumed, that the emigrants from England brought with them these principles for adoption, and engrafted them into their system of religious toleration and charities; but that they ever adopted any law which created a forfeiture for an alienation of property to any religious, literary or charitable society or corporation or prohibited donations for the uses of worship, according to the ritual of the Catholic church, is utterly inconsistent with the established usage, and every law of the state or colony from the earliest to the present time.

The law must be settled beyond all doubt before we can feel justified in deciding that the rights of religious societies and of charitable and literary institutions, in Pennsylvania, are less firmly established than they were in the mother country. As to the statutes of superstitious uses, it suffices to say that where there can be no religious establishment, no restraint on the free exercise of religion, and no preference of modes of worship, the celebration of divine service according to the rites of any church or society worshiping the Supreme Being, cannot be deemed unlawful or superstitious; nor can an actual incorporation or express license be necessary to give to any society or body of men the capacity of enjoying any right in accordance with a custom or usage, incorporated into the constitution, in order to save a forfeiture, by an alienation in mortmain, where none is in a like case imposed by the law of England. The Revolution devolved on the state all the transcendent power of parliament, and the prerogative of the crown,—[Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 651,—and gave their acts the same force and effect; consequently, a grant, charter or law made by its authority is, by the principles of the common law, equally binding on the state, as a patent or act of parliament is on the king. The state can take no estate by forfeiture when the alienation is expressly authorized by its laws, and the enjoyment of the estate secured to the grantee by constitutional provisions, which except the subject matter from all the powers of government.

It would be a remarkable feature in the legislation of the state, if, while its successive constitutions have made the rights of bodies united or incorporated its especial favorites, and its laws give the right of self-incorporation to all religious, literary and charitable associations, and so far depart from the jealous policy of the state against chancery jurisdiction as to provide special remedies for the execution of trusts in their favor, both as to real and personal property, they should be still considered as reprobates, outlawed by the statutes of mortmain, and their estates forfeited by the very act of a conveyance to a corporation directly, or to trustees for their use. If any, the least respect is paid to the constitutions, they must be considered as placing corporations on the same footing at least, if not a better, than in England; yet if the judicial dicta which we find in the cases are the law of the state, the statutes of mortmain are in full force, while those which have softened their rigour have not been adopted, and the supreme law of the state is a very nullity, incompetent to protect charities, even to the extent of the 43 Eliz. or the 7 & 8 Wm. III. There is no escape from this conclusion, if we take these dicta as the settled law of the state. If the statutes of mortmain are a part of the jurisprudence of the state, they have been so from its first settlement; and as they have been in no way modified or altered, they must be taken to have been adopted to their full extent, so as to cover the mischief they were intended to remedy, by creating the forfeiture, and giving the state the right to seize the lands aliened, or the mesne landlord to enter, as the land may have been held under the one or the other. 7 Serg. & R. 320. As the tenures of Pennsylvania are free and common socage, there were no seigniorial rights accruing by tenure, which could be defeated by an alienation in mortmain, except in case of a person seised of lands, dying intestate, and without known kindred, when the land escheated to the immediate landlord of whom it was holden, or to the proprietary, if he held immediately from him; according to the colonial law of 1705 (1 Dall. Laws, Append. 45, § 12), which remained in force till 1787, when the escheat was declared to be to the state (2 Dall. Laws, 553). The mesne landlord, then, was till that time, entitled to the benefit of the forfeiture, and the license of the king or proprietary was no dispensation without the consent of the party to whom it accrued; the king could renounce his own right, but not the right of a subject; before the statute of Wm. III. it could be done only by the power of parliament. Vaughan, 333-343, 356; Co. Litt. 99a. By the law of England, the license of the king and mesne lords is not alone sufficient; there must be a writ of ad quod damnum, to ascertain what damage it would be to any other person, to alien in mortmain. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. tit. "Writ of Ad Quod Damnum" (222), 493, etc. It follows, that a patent, license or charter from the proprietary, under the colonial government, or from the president of the council, before 1787, would not have saved the forfeiture to the immediate landlord, without his consent, and the writ of ad quod damnum; for if the statutes were in force, either by adoption or as "the general course of the law of England," or the common law, they remained in force till they were altered or repealed, as declared in the acts of 1718 and 1777, as fully as if they had been re-enacted; and a license can have no greater effect here than it had in England before the statute of 7 & 8 Wm. III. which was passed in 1695, thirteen years after the charter to Penn. "With respect to English statutes enacted since the settlement of Pennsylvania, it has been assumed as a principle, that they do not extend here, unless they have been recognised by our acts of assembly, or adopted by long-continued practice in courts of justice." 3 Bin. 597. As there is not a spark of evidence of such recognition or adoption, we have no legislative or judicial authority for saying that it is now in force; consequently, no license would save the forfeiture before 1787.

The supreme court has declared it to be a point conceded, that the 43 Eliz. has not been extended to this country. "But we consider the principles which chancery has adopted in the application of its principles to particular cases, as obtaining here, not indeed by the force of the statute, but as part of our common law, and where the object is defined, and we are not restrained by the inadequacy of the instrument which we are compelled to employ, nearly if not altogether, we give relief to that extent that chancery does in England." 17 Serg. & R. 91. Assuming this position of the court to be correct, the inevitable conclusion is, that we have not adopted the great operative principles, by which it has been held in courts of law, as well as in equity, to be a repeal of the statutes of mortmain, de donis conditionalibus, and of the restriction on corporations by the statute of wills. 3 Atk. 150. This is the effect produced, which has given to that statute its importance: those statutes interposed barriers to the vesting and enjoyment of property for pious and charitable uses, which the 43 Eliz. removed, so that they became opened for the exercise of the equity powers of courts of chancery as completely as if no previous disability by statute had ever existed; and this is the reason why it has ever been considered in England as the Magna Charta of charities, that, being an enabling statute, it repealed all disabling ones. If we assume that this leading feature. this vital spirit of the statute, has not been adopted here, we should be bound to consider the prohibitory statutes which it repealed, as in force here in all their rigor; if we follow the report of the judges made in 1808, as explained and adopted by the declaration which they made in subsequent cases, in connection with the opinion in Witman v. Lex, above quoted, we must declare the law of mortmain to apply to all donations of land to corporations, for pious and charitable uses, without the benefits of the statutes of Eliz., or Wm. III., to mitigate their severity or save the forfeiture. Strange as this result may be, it is unavoidable, if the protection which these statutes throw around charities in England does not exist here, or has been taken away by the statute, common law or usage of the state. They operate equally on all societies, whether incorporated by prescription, by special act of assembly, or the charter of the proprietary; so that the enjoyment of their estates depends on legislative discretion, in granting a dispensation of the forfeiture, accruing by an alienation to bodies, and for purposes not only valid, but favored, encouraged and protected in England, without license, under the 43 Eliz., or by the license of the king under the 7 & 8 Wm. III. This latter statute was passed shortly after the first settlement of this colony; its words show the policy of the times to be favorable to all charitable institutions, and connected with the political history of England, its passage is a striking illustration of the disposition of parliament to make them its peculiar favorites.

One of the great principles of the Revolution of 1688, was a denial to the king of the power of dispensing with, or suspending of laws, or the execution thereof. It was the first item of abdication of the crown by James II. as set forth by the lords and commons in convention, that he had exercised it without consent of parliament; and a declaration that it was illegal, was the first and second items of the bill of rights (3 Ruffh. St. 440, 441), which was made a fundamental law of the kingdom. There could therefore be no stronger indication of the spirit of the times in favor of charities, than by authorizing the king to dispense with the statute of mortmain in their favor, making it an exception to a great rule and principle of government; and we deem it incredible that a less liberal spirit could have entered into the legislation of the colony: yet, if the statutes of mortmain have been adopted, there can be no power to dispense with their forfeiture, but by the legislature. The principle of the Revolution of 1688 has been carried into all the American constitutions: no governor can exempt a corporation from the forfeiture of mortmain by his license or charter, with a clause of non obstante statuto; and no act of assembly before or since the Revolution has exempted charities from the effects of mortmain. There are, therefore, but two alternatives for us to adopt; the first, that the statutes of mortmain have been in force from the first settlement of the province, that the statutes which, in England, have mitigated their rigor, and made them in some measure conformable to our usage and condition, the laws and constitution, have not been adopted, and that there has never been any power to dispense with the forfeiture, unless in the party to whom it accrued. Or, that they never were introduced by our ancestors, as any part of their code. In the choice of these alternatives, we cannot hesitate—we cannot look at one item of legislation upon the subject, whether of supreme or subordinate authority, or into the ancient customs and unbroken usage of the state, without at once perceiving the total repugnance between the whole policy of the state, and the existence of British statutes, which would compel us to declare that every house of worship erected in the colony from the time of William Penn, stands upon ground forfeited by a conveyance to a religious society or corporation. It was due to the weight of judicial authority which bore on these questions, to examine them through the details of the law of England, as well as of the state, before we would venture to dissent from it; it was due especially to the high legislative authority which has declared what in its view was the policy and law of the state, as to the disabilities of corporations. The thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 92] makes it our duty to make state laws the rule of our decision, unless they are repugnant to the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States. The preamble to the act of 6th April last, contains a plain declaration, that "no incorporation, though lawfully incorporated or constituted, can, in any case, purchase lands within this state, either in its corporate name, or names of any person or persons whomsoever, for its use, directly or indirectly, without incurring the forfeiture of said lands to this commonwealth, unless said purchase be sanctioned and authorized by an act of the legislature thereof; but every such corporation, its feoffee or feoffees, hold and retain the same, subject to be divested or dispossessed at any time by the commonwealth, according to due course of law." P. L. 467, 468. On the other hand, we have the supreme law of the state in two constitutions, declaring—one, that the declaration of rights is hereby declared to be a part of the constitution of the commonwealth, and ought never to be violated on any pretext whatever; the other, that every thing contained in the bill of rights is excepted from the general powers of government, and shall forever remain inviolate: among these rights are enumerated those of "all religious societies, or bodies of men heretofore united or incorporated for the advancement of religion and learning, or for other pious and charitable purposes, which shall be encouraged and protected in the enjoyment of the privileges, immunities and estates," &c., in the constitution of 1776; and "the rights, privileges, immunities and estates of religious societies and corporate bodies," are, by that of 1790, declared to remain as if the constitution had not been altered, and the first article of the schedule expressly saves the rights of incorporations.

We have felt it our duty to consider the law of the state to be as thus declared and we have been unable to bring our minds to any other conclusion than that any English statute which impairs the right of any corporation to enjoy an estate for its own use, is entirely inconsistent with the usage and constitution of the state, and could never have been in force by adoption, without deranging the whole system of policy, built up by a uniform course of the common law, and legislation of the state for a century and a half. If, however, we have not succeeded to that extent, we apprehend there can be little doubt that these propositions may be considered as established: 1. That, construing the legislation of the state by the rules which have been applied to the 43 Eliz., the statutes which would prevent the effectuation of any objects declared lawful, and by any disposition made valid and confirmed by law, must be considered as repealed so far as they embrace these objects and dispositions. 2. That conveyances and devises of land for religious, charitable, literary and public purposes, must be taken to be, within the meaning of the act of the 6th April, 1833, a purchase "sanctioned and authorized by an act of the legislature." 3. The constitution is an act of the supreme legislature of the state, which authorizes all societies or bodies of men, united or incorporated, to hold and enjoy to themselves, and in their own names and right; and the acts of 1730, 1818 and 1825, are legislative sanctions of their right to hold and enjoy lands, money and chattels for all these purposes.

We should have rested satisfied with results so satisfactory to our minds as these, if they had not been in some respects at variance with the understanding of the supreme court of the state, as to the law of mortmain, and the decision of the court in Baptist Association v. Hart [4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 31]. Opposed to such authority, it would have been our duty to have surrendered our own judgment, unless we had found it supported by the constitutions of the state, and the United States. Bound to decide on the laws of a state, as the courts of a state do, we must look to that which is supreme, as the only rule of our decision, where its language is plain; in its application to this case, it cannot be mistaken, nor can we overlook the first amendment to the constitution of the United States, which, in our opinion, wholly prohibits the action of the legislative or judicial power of the Union on the subject matter of a religious establishment, or any restraint on the free exercise of religion. We know of nothing which would so directly tend to infringe this prohibition as a law to declare that no religious society should be capable of enjoying land for the purposes of sepulture, worship or charity, without a license from the state; if the legislature can seize it as forfeited, they may impose the most effectual restraint on religious worship, by taking from the society the ground whereon, and the building in which they celebrate it; and no preference of modes of worship can be so repugnant to the rights of conscience and equality of religious right, as to license one society to do what they prohibit to another. With such rules for our guide, we could follow no other.

The objection to the devise of the eight acre lot is thus narrowed to the want of residence of some of the members of the yearly meeting in the state. This is founded on the act of 1730, which is confined to religious societies within the province. In the case of Methodist Church v. Remington, 1 Watts, 218, the supreme court say, "If the trust before them is to be sustained only by the enabling provisions of the law of 1730, it must fall: on the other hand, it is fair to say, that, though it derives no support from the statute, it is not necessarily prohibited by it; for it is an undoubted rule of construction, that an affirmative statute such as this, does not take away the common law, and there was certainly no absolute prohibition of such a trust by the common law, or any previous statute." The objection is therefore not sustained by this decision, still less by the opinion in the case of Baptist Association v. Hart, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 27–29, where the court declared that a devise in Virginia to a charity in Pennsylvania would have been good if the plaintiffs had been capable of taking; and it is in direct opposition to the common law in relation to bequests of personal property for charitable purposes, to be expended in Ireland (1 Brown, Ch. 274); Scotland (1 Brown, Ch. 571; Amb. 236; 14 Ves. 537; 16 Ves. 337); or for the support of a bishop in America (1 Brown, Ch. 444), all of which have been held to be good. 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 500–502, Append. The yearly meeting of Philadelphia is a Protestant religious society, which has existed from the settlement of the colony, with known and recognized capacity of taking and enjoying property, according to the law and usage of the province and state, as well as the principles of the common law. They must be considered as a body politic or corporate by prescription, possessing and enjoying the franchise of succession, with the same rights of property as a natural person does by inheritance. We cannot impair the rights of the body united by their franchises, by inquiring into the separate capacity of its component members. They might be in part persons who could not hold for their separate use; but that would not change the character of the society, nor affect their constitutional rights as a body united for the purposes of religion and charity, located within the state; and, as such, they would come within the equity, if not the words, of the law of 1730. Be that as it may, they cannot be excluded from the protection of the constitution and usage, in the absence of any law requiring the residence of all its members within the state, or any rule of the common law, which imposes any disability upon the citizens of one state holding property in any other state, as its own citizens may do. The objection to the bequests of money to the Quaker societies in Maryland, Virginia, Ohio, and to the citizens of Winchester, assumes a different shape. Their alleged incapacity arises from their being composed wholly of the residents of other states, which must be tested by the law of the domicil of the testatrix. There is none which denies to the citizens of other states any rights of property which can be enjoyed by the citizens of this state under its constitution and laws, which declare them inherent in all persons. The laws for the enforcing the execution of trusts extend to all "personal property vested in any person or persons, to be applied by them to any religious, literary or charitable use or uses," and the cestui que trust, or other person interested in the execution of the trust may apply to the courts of the state to compel the trustees to account, or to prevent the failure of the trust.

The constitution of the United States declares, that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states;" this instrument was adopted by the same power which established the constitutions of the several states, and is a part of the supreme law of each, as fully as if it was incorporated in its body. We must take it therefore as a grant by the people of the state in convention, to the citizens of all the other states of the Union, of the privileges and immunities of the citizens of this state; no law of the state has given it any construction which in any way restricts its operation, and it is not the duty of any federal court to so expound the constitution as to weaken the bond existing between the states which have established a "general government of the Union," a federal government of these states, by restraining the grants of rights or powers within limits narrower than the tenor and purport of the words used, according to their common acceptation. "It cannot be presumed that any clause in the constitution is intended to be without effect, and therefore such a construction is inadmissible, unless the words require it." [Marbury v. Madison] 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 174–176. This clause is copied from the fourth article of the old confederation, and is one of the most important in the whole instrument; it becomes senseless if it is not applied to the rights of property. The political rights of the citizens depend on the laws of the respective states (article 1, § 2, cl. 1, Const. U. S.), rights accruing by contract cannot be impaired in their obligation by state laws (article 1, § 10), and personal rights are protected by the 2d and 3d clauses of section 9, art. 1, of the constitution, and the 9th amendment; leaving no subject on which this clause can operate except property. The words "privileges and immunities" relate to the rights of persons, place or property; a privilege is a peculiar right, a private law, conceded to particular persons or places (7 Day, Com. Dig. 113, tit. "Privilege," A), whereby a particular man, or a particular corporation, is exempted from the rigor of the common law (Cow. Inst. tit. "Privileges"), as converting aliens into denizens, whereby some very considerable privileges of natural born subjects are conferred upon them, or erecting corporations, whereby a number of private persons are united and knit together, and enjoy many liberties, powers and immunities in their political capacity, which they were utterly incapable of in their natural (1 Bl. Comm. 272). Among the privileges of the citizens of every state, is that of exemption from the law of alienage, though not born in the state; and every body of private persons united or incorporated have the franchise and immunity of enjoying estates in succession in this state; these are exemptions from the rigor of the common law, which the citizens of other states may enjoy in this, as fully as the citizens of this state can. We can therefore make no distinction between these bequests and those to societies located in the state; the disability of alienage cannot be applied to the citizens, societies or corporations of other states, and they may enjoy property as it can be enjoyed of right by those which are within the state.

The next questions that arise on this will, are the uses for which the various dispositions are made. As the supreme court have declared it a settled point, that the 43 Eliz.

is not in force, we must endeavor to ascertain from other sources, what uses are pious and charitable, as distinguished from those which are deemed superstitious or otherwise invalid. The general course of the law of England, as to the transmission of property, was declared, in the charter to Penn, to be the rule in the colonies, till altered or repealed, and the common law was recognized by the acts of 1718 and 1777 as in force, as well as such statutes as had been adopted. It is also a conceded principle, "that the colonists take with them such laws of the mother country as are useful and suited to their condition." 1 Jour. Cong. 27. It will be necessary, therefore, to trace the law of charities through the English statutes which preceded the 43 Eliz. as well as the common law, so as to determine what was its general course, how far it has been adopted in the written law of this state, or has been the basis of its usage independently of the enabling or enacting provisions of the 43 Eliz. and 7 & 8 Wm. III., assuming them not in force as adopted statutes. The following statutes on the subject come strictly within the description of the supreme court of the United States, in [Baptist Association v. Hart] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 31; they embrace cases within the statutes of mortmain, and gifts to corporations, and are analogous to the 43 Eliz. in all their features; so that there can be no reason for not giving them the same effect and construction as have been given to that statute.

The following are uses declared to be pious and charitable, by a series of statutes commencing in 1285, and affirmative of the common law: The statute 13 Edw. I. c. 41, enumerates the maintenance of a chantry, lights in a church, divine service and alms. Keb. St. 49; 1 Ruffh. St. 106; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 465; 2 Co. Inst. 467. The statute 17 Edw. II., divine service, the defence of Christians and the church, liberal alms-giving, relief of the poor, hospitalities, and all other offices and services before due, by whatever name they are called. Keb. St. 36, 37. The statute 15 Rich. II. c. 6, the poor parishioners of the churches, the endowment of a vicar to do divine service, inform the people and keep hospitalities. Keb. St. 181; 1 Ruffh. St. 402; S. P. 4 Hen. IV. c. 12; Keb. St. 198. The statute 2 Hen. V. c. 1, the sustenance of impotent men and women, lazars, men out of their wits, and poor women with child; the nourishing, relieving and refreshing other poor people. Keb. St. 212; 1 Ruffh. St. 486. The statute 23 Hen. VII. c. 10, obits, masses and lights, to be kept not more than twenty years; the discharge of tolls and customs in a city in case of the poor, and the cleansing of the streets. Keb. St. 403, 404; 1 Ruffh. St. 171, 172. The statute 37 Hen. VIII. c. 4, § 5, alms to the poor, and other good, virtuous and charitable deeds. Keb. St. 608. The statute 1 Edw. VI. c. 14, erecting grammar schools to the education of youth in virtue and godliness; the augmentation of the universities; better provisions for the poor and needy; the support of a schoolmaster, preacher, priest, vicar; the maintenance of pier walls and banks; and the relief of poor men being students or otherwise. Keb. St. 636-644; 2 Ruffh. St. 397, etc. The repairing of bridges and highways, and setting poor people to work. 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 5; Keb. St. 651; 2 Ruffh. St. 412; 18 Eliz. c. 20; Keb. St. 903, 904; 2 Ruffh. St. 623. The relief of the poor of every parish. 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 2; Keb. St. 676; 2 Ruffh. St. 639. The resuscitation of alms, prayer and example of good life in the realm. Keb. St. 730; 2 Ruffh. St. 481. The relief of prisoners. 14 Eliz. c. 5; Keb. St. 847; 2 Ruffh. St. 606. The repair of churches. 13 Eliz. c. 10; Keb. St. 839; 2 Ruffh. St. 595. The maintenance and relief of the poor in houses of correction, impotent and maimed soldiers (29 Eliz. c. 6, § 7; Keb. St. 894; 2 Ruffh. St. 656; 35 Eliz. c. 1; Keb. St. 907; 2 Ruffh. St. 672), and hurt and maimed soldiers and mariners (Keb. St. 911; 2 Ruffh. St. 676). The maintenance of houses of correction, abiding houses, and stocks and stores therefor. 35 Eliz. c. 7; Keb. St. 913; 2 Ruffh. St. 678. The founding and erecting hospitals and houses of correction, for the relief and sustenance of poor, maimed, needy or impotent people. 13 Eliz. c. 5; Keb. St. 921; 2 Ruffh. St. 687; 2 Co. Inst. 120. Donations to hospitals, colleges and other places, founded, ordained, for the relief of poor, aged and impotent people, and maimed soldiers. 39 Eliz. c. 6. Schools of learning; orphans, or such other good, lawful and charitable intents and purposes; reparation of high-ways and sea banks; the maintenance of free schools and poor scholars; orphans and fatherless children; and such like good and lawful charities. 4 Co. Inst. 166, 167. To which may be added the cases not enumerated or recognised by the words of the statutes, but which are within their equity, by adjudged cases. The erection of chapels of ease, as members of parochial churches (Hob. 123, 124); or cathedral churches (Swinb. 66). Gifts for the advancement of religion, learning, piety and public utility. 11 Coke, 70b, 73b; 10 Coke, 26; 8 Coke, 130b. Poor men decayed by misfortune or the visitation of God. Moore, 129. Persons imprisoned for conscience sake. Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman), 131. A bell for a church; pulpit cushion and cloth, and building a session-house. Poph. 139. To maintain scholars who should use holy orders. Toth. 61, 62. The marriage of poor maidens. 1 Coke, 26. Making a stock for poor laborers in husbandry, and poor apprentices. 1 Coke, 26a; Keb. St. 1040; Ruffh. St. 74; preamble to 7 Jac. I. c. 3. Such things as concur in decency and order with the intent of the founder. Duke, Char. Uses (by Brigman), 155. The 43 Eliz. c. 4, enumerates twenty-one cases as classed by Lord Coke, in 2 Co. Inst. 711, which were all comprehended in preceding statutes or the cases above referred to, either in express or general terms.

This review exhibits a striking coincidence between the general course of the laws of England and Pennsylvania, in the designation by both of what are deemed and recognised to be the uses and purposes of piety and charity, protected and encouraged during the most intolerant times. The same coincidence will appear in tracing to their origin in the British statutes, and decisions of their courts, the rules and principles upon which donations for such uses have been construed and governed, as well as the remedies provided for their enforcement. The statute 17 Edw. II (De Terris Templarium), established and ordained as law forever, that lands which had been given and enjoyed for pious and charitable uses, should not escheat to the king or mesne lords of whom they were holden, on the extinction of the order of Templars, by whom they were holden for such uses. That they should be given to other men of holy religion, to the end that they may be charitably disposed of to godly uses. "So always that the godly and worthy will of the givers be observed, performed and always religiously executed." Keb. St. 86, 87; 8 Coke, 131b; 10 Coke, 34b; Co. Inst. 431, 432; 3 Coke, 3b; 7 Coke, 13a. The 37 Hen. VIII. c. 4, and 1 Edw. VI. c. 14, directed and empowered the king to dispose to the good, virtuous and godly uses specified in those acts, such parts of the suppressed lands, or their rents and profits, as had before been given to such purposes and misapplied. Also to dispose, change and alter donations given for superstition, to pious and godly uses, or to direct it to be done by the commissioners. The commissioners were directed to inquire what property had been given by deed or will to poor persons intended to have continuance forever out of the chantry lands, and to make such assignment thereof, that the money should be paid to them according to the conveyance or will of the donor, and that all charges on those lands for charitable or pious uses, should be paid by the king's receiver. Sections 12, 13. The commissioners were directed to execute their commission favorably and beneficially towards such uses and purposes, and their acts so made were declared as valid as if done by an express act of parliament. Keb. St. 636–644. The proviso in the fifth section of 39 Eliz. c. 5, prohibited the diversion of the funds of any hospital to any other purposes than those appointed, and declared that such construction should be put upon the act as should be most favorable to the maintenance of the poor, and repressing all evasions of the act. 2 Co. Inst. 721, 722. The commissioners were directed to make such orders and decrees as the said good and charitable uses may be fully observed in most full, ample and liberal sort, which not being contrary to the orders, decrees and statutes of the donors or founders, shall stand good according to their tenor and purport. 39 Eliz. c. 6; 4 Co. Inst. 167. The laws for confirming patents and grants from the crown, declared them to be good and available according to their tenor and effect, their words and purport, and to be expounded most beneficially for the patentee, without license, confirmation or toleration; any misnomer, misrecital or misdescription of the premises, or a corporation, or any lack of attornment, livery of seisin, or misnaming any person or body politic, to the contrary notwithstanding. 18 Eliz. c. 2; 43 Eliz. c. 1; Keb. St. 852, 935; 2 Ruffh. St. 612, 702.

These statutes were evidently the models from which the colonial acts of 1705, for confirming deeds, wills, and sales under acts of assembly, and the law of 1711, confirming patents, were drawn: the rejected law of 1712, in relation to religious societies, contains a most admirable summary of the effect of the general course of the statutes of England, as they had been construed by courts of equity; and the powers conferred on the colonial courts by the acts of 1700 and 1710, show the intention of the legislature, that they should be exercised to the same extent and in the same manner as they were by the high court of chancery in England. It is, indeed, impossible to compare the laws of the two countries on the subject of charities, without being struck with the strong analogy between them; the substance of the statute and common law of England was adopted in the early colonial laws, entered into the custom of the province, and will be found condensed in a few words in the 45th section of the constitution of 1776, with this marked difference, that what the 43 Eliz. has done by implication and the construction given by courts, the constitution has done by a direct affirmative declaration of rights. What was left imperfect was finished by the law of 1777, by expressly restoring the common law, repealing all laws inconsistent with the rights declared in the constitution, and declaring all colonial laws then in force and consistent with it to remain in force; this was going farther than the words of the 43 Eliz., which contained no repealing clause. The law of 1791, giving the powers of self-incorporation to all religious, literary and charitable societies, was an improvement upon the pattern of 39 Eliz. c. 5; and the laws for the execution of trusts was an adoption of the whole course of chancery, in administering trusts for the use of charities; so that we may safely conclude that the English system of charities, as it was at the settlement of the colony, has become naturalized here, not only as to the principles of equity applied to the 43 Eliz., but the substance and effect of the enabling provisions of all the statutes, including those of Elizabeth, by which the common law as to charities was restored in England, and brought here by the colonists unincumbered with restrictions.

The course of the law of England providing remedies for the enforcement and suppressing the abuses of charities, are next to be considered. The statute 13 Edw. I. c. 41, gave the following remedies where the lands were aliened: If the king is the founder, he shall seize and hold the lands, and the purchaser shall lose his money; if a private person is the founder, he or his heir shall have his writ to recover the same land in demesne; if the lands are not aliened, but the alms withdrawn for two years, he shall have an action by writ of cessavit. Keb. St. 49; 1 Ruffh. St. 106; Keb. St. 30, 31; 1 Ruffh. St. 66; Co. Litt. § 136, pp. 95, 96. By the 2 Hen. V. c. 1, hospitals were placed under the correction and reformation of the ordinary, by the ecclesiastical law. Keb. St. 212; 1 Ruffh. St. 486. When the king was founder, the chancellor was visitor. Co. Litt. 95b, 95a. By the 37 Hen. VIII. all lands held by hospitals, chapels, &c., which came within the purview of the laws for the suppressions of the church lands, were placed under the supervision of the court of augmentations, who decided exclusively all cases concerning them, as well as charities charged upon them, where the king was concerned or could be prejudiced; but all controversies between subjects were to be decided by the courts of common law. Keb. St. 608, 609; 2 Ruffh. St. 371. All copyheld lands, and all lands held by the license, assent, grant or confirmation of the king, were excepted from the operation of the law. By the 39 Eliz. c. 4, the chancellor was directed to appoint commissioners, to examine into the donations made for certain charitable uses, and correct their misemployment. Keb. St. 920; 2 Ruffh. St. 687. The 39 Eliz. c. 6, directed commissioners to be appointed, to inquire of land and goods given to any charitable uses, which had been misemployed, and to reform and correct their abuses. The party deeming himself aggrieved, may complain to the chancellor, who shall judge thereon according to equity. 4 Co. Inst. 167. This act was repealed by the 43 Eliz. c. 9, but the proceedings under it were confirmed (Keb. St. 648), the adoption of the 43 Eliz. c. 4, as a substitute for it, having made it inoperative. These statutes formed the law of charities in England before the 43 Eliz., and made a system which has received but little improvement, either by that or any subsequent statutes; the rules of their construction adopted by all the courts of England, have ever been of the most liberal tendency, to establish charities and correct the abuse or diversion of the funds devoted to their support.

The course of the common law on charitable and pious donations is in accordance with the spirit of the statutes before recited, and the rules established for their construction. It is an admitted principle, that the personal property of decedents was disposable to pious uses, for the good of the soul of the deceased; the children and kindred had claims upon the trustees, but came in under the title of charity; the distribution was made by the ordinary at his discretion, to charitable uses in particular, or for the good of the soul of the deceased, according to the circumstances of the estate. 2 Bl. Comm. 494; 2 Forrest, 190; 4 Co. Inst. 336; 7 Day's Com. Dig. 612, note 13; Moore, p. 822, pl. 1111; 7 Ves. 69. The executor held the surplus to account to pious uses. Carey, 28, 29. A feme covert executrix, may give the goods of the testator for the good of his soul. Perk. § 7, cites 13 Edw. III. Any person who has power and capacity to make a grant or devise, may do it for pious and charitable uses. 7 Day's Com. Dig. 612; Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 132. A testator by will, directed lands which were devisable by custom, to be sold by his executor, and the money to be distributed for the good of his soul; the executor held the land for two years without a sale, which the court held to be a breach of the intention of the testator, and they construed the will so as to make a condition, as such appeared to be the intention, the heir entered for the breach and recovered. 38 Ass. pl. 3; Lib. Ass. 221; Plowd. 345, 523. The king gives land to the good men of D. which was no corporation before, rendering a certain rent, and the residue to repair a bridge, the king released the rent, which being the cause of their corporation, would seem to have determined it, yet for the preservation of the charitable use, they should continue a corporation for that purpose only. Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 134, cites 40 Ass. 26. A gift to a parish for a charitable use by deed, is void, but a devise by good will is good, and the church-wardens and overseers shall take in succession. Id. Land was devised in the church of St. Andrew in Holborn, which was not capable of taking and holding in mortmain, but the court on an ex gravi querela brought by the parson to execute the devise (Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 441, L), awarded it to him, considering it to be the intent of the will, that the parson should have it, and not the church, and construed the words so as to preserve the intent; and not to destroy it; decided 21 Rich. II.; Perk. § 509; Plowd. 523; acc., 17 Serg & R. 92; [Terrett v. Taylor] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 43; [Town of Pawlet v. Clark] Id. 328; 1 Atk. 437; [Inglis v. Trustees of Sailors' Snug Harbor] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 119, 146, 147.

A declaration by will, that a feoffee shall stand seized to the use of C., is a good devise of the land by intention, it being that C. should have the land. Dyer, 323, pl. 29; 1 Leon. 313; 15 Eliz. A gift of chattels to parishioners who are no corporation is good, and the church-wardens shall take in succession, for the gift is to the use of the church. 37 Hen. VI. p. 30; 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 328; 17 Serg. & R. 92; S. P., 1 Penn. Rep. 49, 51. Courts will labor to support the act of the party, by the art or act of the law. Hob. 123–125; S. P. [Inglis v. Trustees of Sailors' Snug Harbor] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 119. In 4 & 5 Phil. & M., a devise was made of lands to Trinity College and their successors for ever, for founding grammar schools for poor scholars, and held good by the equity of 1 & 2 Phil. & M. c. 8, which suspended the statutes of mortmain for twenty years. Dyer, 255b, pl. 7; 1 Coke, 25, 26, decided in 8 & 9 Eliz. C. B. Lands devised to employ the profits to find a priest to celebrate mass for the good of the soul of the testator, and other souls, as long as the laws of the land would suffer it; and if the laws prohibited it, then to the use of all the poorest people in six parishes, with power to the devisees to dispose of the profits at their pleasure to any of these purposes—the devise was held good, and not to be within any of the statutes. And. 43; Cro. Car. 108; 2 Ch. Cas. 18a, decided 3 Eliz. So of a devise to sustain poor men decayed by misfortune or under the visitation of God (Moore, 129, pl. 277, decided 24 & 25 Eliz.); or to relieve such as were imprisoned for conscience sake (Duke, Char. Uses, by Bridgman, 131, adj. 41 Eliz.) A devise to an idiot for a charitable use, though inoperative in his life time, takes effect when the land comes to the hands of his heir. Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 134. A gift to find a chaplain ad divina celebranda is not for a superstitious use, and, though not within the 43 Eliz., is good. Carey, 39; Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 154, adj. 18 Jac. I. acc. So for finding a bell for a church, a pulpit cushion and cloth—for the support of the poor, or building a session house—these are good acts of piety, charity and justice. Poph. 139. So where land was devised to divers persons and their heirs, in trust and confidence in them, out of the profits to erect a free school and to pay so much to the master yearly, and so much to the usher, and £20 per annum to five poor men. Martidale v. Martin, Cro. Eliz. 288, adj. 34 & 35 Eliz. K. B. The same will contained another devise in trust—that a preacher shall be found forever to preach the word of God in the church of St. Mary, in Thetford, four times a year, at ten shillings a sermon. Both clauses of the will were adjudged good, by the barons of the exchequer and the judges of the K. B. who, after "often argument, agreed, that the 23 Hen. VIII. c. 10, was to be taken to extend only to superstitious uses, by the words of it, in the very body of the act, and at the beginning, as by the time it was made—for at this time they began to have respect to the ruin of the authority of the pope and the dissolution of the abbeys, chauntries and the like." Gibbons v. Maltyard, Poph. 6–8, adj. 34 & 35 Eliz. So of a devise for a free school, and the support of a master thereof, and certain alms-men and alms-women forever; the devise was held to be valid, though it did not take effect, owing to the breach of the condition on which it was made to depend. Porter's Case, 1 Coke, 22–25, 34 & 35 Eliz. in exchequer. In the case of Mayor, etc., of Reading v. Lane, a devise was made to the poor people maintained in the hospital of St. Leonard's, in Reading; the objection to the devise was, that the poor not being incorporated, were not capable of holding lands, but it was decreed, that as the plaintiffs were a corporation capable of holding lands in mortmain and governed the hospital, the land should be assured to them for the use declared in the will. Toth. 7; 42 Eliz. lib. A, fol. 706; Toth. 32; Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 134b, 361.

Charities have always been favored in the law, by excepting them, when fastened on lands, from ordinary rules; where they are charged with services for the advancement of religion or justice, works of devotion, piety or charity, although the lord purchases parcel, yet the entire services remain. 6 Coke, 2a, 36 Eliz., in the court of wards. As, to make a bridge or beacon, repair a highway (6 Coke, 1b, 2a), to marry poor virgins, to find a preacher in a church, or the ornaments of a church (6 Coke, 2a), or to bind a poor boy an apprentice, or to feed a poor man. Co. Litt. 149a. The law was considered so well settled that Lord Coke, in 34 & 35 Eliz., states, unqualifiedly, that any man at this day may give lands in trust for any charitable use, to any person or persons and their heirs. 1 Coke, 26b; Sheph. Abr. 1066. They are prohibited by no statute, and none were ever intended to overthrow works of charity, but to prohibit their abuse. Co. Litt. 342a. The statutes of superstition did not extend to corporations, which were not both religious and ecclesiastical. 2 Coke, 48, 49. Gifts to lay hospitals remained valid; bishops, deans and chapters, parsons, vicars, abbots, churchwardens, &c., could hold lands notwithstanding the statutes of mortmain, as they were not dead persons in law, but had a capacity to grant or to hold land, to sue and be sued. 1 Bl. Comm. 472–475; 2 Bl. Comm. 109. Though they were religious persons, they were also secular, in which capacity, they were considered as natural persons, or bodies politic, and could purchase and hold lands (Co. Litt. 94a, b; Perk. §§ 31, 35, 55, 51), before the statutes of mortmain, and can now hold them in all cases where other corporations can. The capacity existed at common law and was not taken away by the statutes of mortmain, where the uses and purposes were declared good by the statutes providing a remedy, or correcting abuses, which in the language of the supreme court, removed all obstructions and disabilities which in any way prevented the donation from taking effect, and restored them to their common law capacity. [Baptist Association v. Hart] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 31. Charities were thus left free for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the respective courts, who in all cases gave effect to the disposition of a testator, whenever his intention was expressed, or could be collected from the will, notwithstanding any defect in form, or the want of naming or designating an object to take; they would give it locality, and application to those persons or bodies who were capable, if they could by any reasonable intendment be brought within the devise. As, in the Church of Holborn Case, they shifted the devise from the church to the parson, because the church could not hold in mortmain, but as the endowment of a vicar or parson was good by 15 Rich. II., and divine service by 13 Edw. I. and by 17 Edw. II. it was awarded to him, and he held an inheritance in right of the church as a capable person, the church in effect holding for his use; so, in the Reading Case, they shifted the devise from the poor of the hospital, to the corporation which governed it.

The law looks to the substance of the gift, and, in favor of religion, vests it in the party capable of taking it,—[Town of Pawlet v. Clark] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 329,—but without the right to alien it. Wing. Max. 341, pl. 26. This consists in the enjoyment of the thing given according to the intent of the donor. Courts of common law and equity, were astute in devising means of giving it application and effect; whenever the instrument would pass the legal estate, either to the trustee or cestui que trust or use, they supported the charity; the mode of establishment, or the distribution, was a circumstance in which they would relieve, according to their respective powers, against any defects in the disposition by will or deed. Their action on charities was not, by any authority assumed from the necessity of the case, but the positive directions of the statutes, to execute and religiously observe the will of the donor, in the most ample and liberal sort, notwithstanding any defects or failures therein; the same rules were prescribed to the special tribunals and courts under whose governance charities were placed, and were applied as liberally in favor of a subject against the king, as between private persons. A donation to a charity, therefore, could only fail for want of a capable object, where there was neither a devisee to use, nor in trust, nor a cestui que use, capable of holding; they took effect whenever a trust was created and vested in any body or person who was named, described or could be brought within the scope of the will, and was capable of holding either as cestui que trust or trustee. The cases in which these principles were established, were decided before the 43 Eliz., on prior statutes, or the rules of the common law; they have been approved and acted on by the supreme court of this state, in 17 Serg. & R. 91; 1 Penn. 51; and by the supreme court of the United States, in [Terrett v. Taylor] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 43, 53; [Town of Pawlet v. Clark] Id. 328; [Mason v. Muncaster] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 455–464; [Beatty v. Kurtz] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 582; [Inglis v. Trustees of Sailors' Snug Harbor] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 119; [City of Cincinnati v. White] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 437; and the practical rules of construing the statutes of charities, as laid down in [Trustees of Philadelphia Baptist Ass'n v. Hart] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 31, are those which are to be found in cases not affected by the 43 Eliz., as well as those within it.

The remedies for evasions of the statutes and the abuse or misemployment of charitable donations, were administered with the same liberality by courts of law before as after that statute; the equitable powers conferred on the courts which were to decide on claims for charitable uses out of the king's lands or revenues, evinces the favorable disposition of the king and parliament in their favor. The benign principles of the common law were never displayed in brighter colors than in the course of the courts in the expositions of the statutes of Hen. VIII. and Edw. VI. for the suppression of superstitious uses and religious houses; if any want of liberality has appeared in later times to have entered into the jurisprudence of England on charities, it has risen from overlooking the provisions, or disregarding the principles, of their ancient statutes, which contain all that is valuable in the system, or adapted to the institutions of this country. The statutes of mortmain, of superstitious uses, and the restraints on corporations, are exceptions from the general course of the law of England; legal excrescences which were forced into it by the policy of the times, during the existence of tenures in chivalry, the persecution of the Catholic church, and latterly, since the statute 9 Geo. II., by a spirit of hostility to charitable donations by will, all of which are utterly repugnant to the spirit which pervades the common, the statute and the constitutional law of this state. There is no case reported as adjudged by courts of common law against a gift to charity, where words of inheritance were used in a devise to private persons in trust, or for a use, or to any body or society, which had a head known to the law, as being capable of holding for any other use, by statute, charter or usage, local custom or prescription. Perk. § 510, refers to a case decided in 26 Edw. III., of a devise of a remainder to the brotherhood of Whiteacres in London, to find a chaplain to pray for the soul of the testator; the brotherhood was not incorporated or enabled to purchase, and the remainder was held void. Perkins thus introduces this case: "But the commonalty of a company which is not incorporated by the king's charter to purchase, &c., cannot take by devise." He states the case and concludes: "And know, that the chief and supreme officers of the fraternity, corporation or guild are taken in law for the best men," &c. These remarks lead to the ground of the decision. The devise was of a remainder, which could not vest without words of inheritance to private persons, or to a corporation by succession; in this case there being neither, the devise failed on the ground that the commonalty or brotherhood, having no politic capacity by means of a head or chief officer, could not hold an estate by succession, and no words of inheritance being used, the remainder in fee continued in the heirs of the devisor, according to the rules before laid down from Sheph. Touch. 235–237, etc. There was no franchise in the commonalty, from which a corporation could be presumed, as in the case from Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 134, decided in 40 Edw. III.; the statute of Rich. II., authorizing the endowment of a vicar or priest, had not been passed, and by the words of the devise, there was no ground to infer the intention to be that any church or parish should take or hold it, by a parson, overseer or church-warden; so that there was no circumstance on which the court could lay hold to take the estate from the heir at law and give effect to the devisees as in the cases referred to in [Town of Pawlet v. Clark] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 328, &c. A learned judge considers this to have been a case which could have been aided by the royal prerogative exercised by the court of chancery. [Inglis v. Trustees of Sailors' Snug Harbor] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 142. But it appears to have been one where the king had no interest or claim by statute, prerogative or tenure; the devise not taking effect, the estate remained in the heir of the devisor. The charity was not extinct as in cases under the statute of Templars; it never existed, because there was no devisee in whom the remainder could vest; the king therefore could not make a new appointment by his sign manual (7 Coke, 36a), nor could a court of chancery disturb the course of the common law, on any ground of equity; such a devise would not be aided in equity under the 43 Eliz., unless the brotherhood could be considered as a corporation by prescription, by some franchise or right to unite them. This case therefore cannot be considered as at all in opposition to those which have been referred to.

So far as the common law could be settled by the repeated solemn adjudications of the courts of Westminster Hall, we thus find it established from the time of Edw. III., without any clashing decision. It only remained to add the sanction of parliament to these principles of the law of charity by a declaratory act to make them irrevocable. That was done in the Case of the Thetford School Devise, which had been held valid in the two preceding cases, in 34 & 35 Eliz., Cro. Eliz. 288, and Poph. 6–8. This devise was made in 9 Eliz., when the annual value of the land was £35 per annum; it afterwards rose to £100; a private bill was exhibited in parliament (7 Jac. I.) for the erection of the school, &c., according to the will, on which two questions were moved: 1. Whether the preacher, school-master, usher and poor should have only the said certain sums appointed to them by the founder, or that the revenue and profit of the land should be employed to the increase of their stipend, &c. 2. If any surplusage remained, how it should be employed. The case was referred to the judges, and it was resolved, that the whole profits and revenue should be employed to the increase of the stipends, and if any surplusage remained it should be expended for the maintenance of a greater number of poor, and nothing should be directed to the use of the devisees, executors or heirs, or any private use, it appearing to be the intention of the testator to employ the whole in works of piety, charity, the maintenance and increase thereof; and the bill was passed accordingly. This was in accordance with the rule established in the statute de templarium, quoted by Lord Coke at the end of the case; so always that the godly and worthy will of the donors, &c. (8 Coke, 130b, 131b), which was not a new rule introduced into the law by the act passed for the Thetford school, but as declared by all the judges in the case of Sutton's Hospital, in 10 Jac. I., was declaratory and explanatory of the common law. 10 Coke, 30b, 34a. The right to take and hold the land devised for charitable uses with their increased revenues and profits being thus definitely settled by both the legislative and judicial power of the kingdom, it has never been questioned since the Case of the Thetford School, on which the statute 43 Eliz. had no bearing, and is not even referred to in the report of the proceedings in parliament, or the opinions of the judges, on the law of the case, as previously settled in Cro. Eliz. 288; Poph. 6–8.

The spirit of equity which pervaded the law of charities having been extended so as to bring within its protection not only the specific bequests of a testator, but the entire fund on which they were charged, it was not necessary for courts of equity to usurp any of the powers of a court of law, in order to effectuate a charitable donation, or to establish any rules or principles different from those on which the common law courts had acted with the sanction of parliament. Chancery had its appropriate jurisdiction over cases of fraud, accident and breach of trust, arising out of dispositions of property to purposes unconnected with charity; if the party had a right known to the law, but had no legal remedy, he could resort to the extraordinary powers of the court of chancery for relief, according to its usage and settled principles, which applied to charities as well as other subject matters of its cognizance. To have refused the same relief in the one case as the other, would have placed charities under the ban of the law of equity, though they were the favorites of the statute and common law: if there was anything in the nature of charities, which would call for or justify the withholding equitable relief for matters not cognizable at law, without special authority by statute, it would have appeared in the course of the law for more than three hundred years before the 43 Eliz. Its history exhibits no feature of the kind; on the contrary, it exhibits the most convincing evidence, that it was peculiarly the duty of courts of equity to obey the injunctions of the statutes, to execute the intention of the donors and founders of charities, and not to suffer their donations to fail of effect or to be abused when their intention could be ascertained. The proceedings of courts of equity are very imperfectly reported prior to the Restoration; some few cases are interspersed among the common law reports, but they are mostly referred to in the short notes of Carey and Tothill, which do not give the reasons of the court for their decisions; we are therefore left to infer the principles which governed them from their acts, thus briefly noted, and the elementary writers in or near the time, who have given the results in general terms. Enough, however, can be collected to show, satisfactorily, that the general course of equity before the 43 Eliz., in all cases of charities, was according to rules and principles as well settled and defined as on any other subjects, and was the basis on which the law now stands on the construction of that statute.

The jurisdiction of chancery over trusts was never questioned by the most strenuous advocates of the common law. 2 Bacon, Abr. 22; Harg. Law Tracts, 431; Treat. Eq. 523; 2 Day's Com. Dig. 764. It was coeval with their existence, and its exercise was indispensable in cases where the feoffor, having parted with his whole estate, had no control over it at law; but being made in trust and on confidence, the powers of a court of equity were necessary to deal with the corrupt conscience of the feoffee who refused to execute the trust. The cases of its exercise from the time of Hen. VI. are numerous. 4 Co. Inst. 84; Gilb. Ch. 19, 259; Bohun, C. C. 6; 1 Hu, Ab. 400; Lil. Pr. Reg. 57, 58; 1 Rolle, Abr. 374; Mitf. Pl. 120, 121. The equity and use of the land being to go according to conscience, the subpoena for relief herein in this court is given accordingly. Sheph. Abr. 201, pl. 13, 199. Chancery would not only compel the performance of the trusts specified, but compel the feoffee to do any other acts for the benefit of the feoffor or cestui que use in a deed or obligation. Brown, Conscience, 5, 9, 27, fol. 162-3. Carey, 13, 20, cites cases from the time of Hen. VI. and Edw. IV. It also remedied grievances arising from acts done which were prohibited by statute, but for which there was no remedy by the common law, as waste in certain cases. Car. 26; Moore, p. 554, pl. 748; Fonbl. Eq. 32.

All cases of covin and fraud were cognizable in equity, from the earliest times. Toth. 62; Car. 20, 25, 26; 4 Vin. Abr. 487; Brown, Conscience, 8; Moore, 620, pl. 846. The performance of verbal promises in temporal matters. Brown, Conscience, 14, fol. 163; Fonbl. Eq. 45. The specific performance of contracts made by competent parties, on good consideration, were also decreed against the party, his heir, and those claiming under him with notice. Toth. 3, 4, 62, 69, 70, 92, 123, 106; Cro. Car. 110; Fonbl. Eq. 5; 2 Day's Com. Dig. 772. "Equity will aid the perfecting of things well meant and on good consideration," and "will reform in conscience that which is badly done," by supplying defects. Car. 23, cites 9 Hen. VIII.; Max. Eq. 57; 10 Hen. VII. 201, pl. 13. It will prevent a contract from failing for want of a circumstance or ceremony (Carey 24, 25), as livery of seisin, attornment, surrender of a copyhold, enrolment of a deed, a misrecital (Toth. 62; 12 Eliz. 79; 38 Eliz.), or a misnomer of a corporation (Toth. 131, 32 Eliz.; Car. 24, 44; Bohun, C. C. 7; Max. Eq. 57; Toth. 27, 33 Eliz.; Sheph. Abr. 194, 195; Hob. 124; Cro. Eliz. 106). Though an estate cannot be created by covenant by law, it shall be made good in chancery. Toth. 84, 40 Eliz. So of a lease made to commence during the existence of a former one which would make it void at law. Toth. 127, 25 Eliz.; S. P., 128, 40 Eliz. So where an exception was intended to be made, but it was omitted by mistake, chancery supplied it. Toth. 131, 37 Eliz. So where a devise was void at law, by misrecital of a grant and by reason of an attornment (Toth. 79, 38 Eliz.), or a copyhold surrendered at a court held out of the manor where the land lay (25 Eliz., Toth. 45), or a conveyance sought to be avoided for want of livery (Toth. 42, 41 Eliz.), chancery will relieve, though the defect would be fatal at law. Where courts of equity act upon instruments to take effect in the lifetime of the party who makes an agreement for a valuable consideration, they will make it as effectual for the purposes intended as the party had power to do. Sugd. Pow. 361. And in dispositions by will, they will help against all defects which the testator had power to remedy. 1 Mad. Ch. 47, 49. The principle on which they act is, that where the parties interested intended to contract a perfect obligation, though by mistake or accident, they omit the set forms of words, so that there is no legal remedy, yet they are bound in natural justice to stand to their agreement, and "where there is substance, the law will apply the words to the intent, though they sound differently" (Tr. 14; 1 Fonbl. Eq. 147; Plowd. 140, 141), the imperfect execution of the contract not affecting the equity raised by the agreement (1 Fonbl. Eq. 37, 40, 41). Equity, therefore, will supply any defects of circumstances in conveyances (1 Fonbl. Eq. 38), where there is an intent to make a better assurance (Carey, 44).

It has never been pretended that the course of equity on these subjects was regulated or in any way affected by the 43 Eliz.; it was founded on principles which were the origin and foundation of its jurisdiction, and became gradually developed according to the exigency of the times. There is no reason which would prevent their application to charities in all cases between subjects, before the 43 Eliz. in the same manner as after; nor is there to be found in any decision or authority, other than the late dicta denying it: so far as any traces of its jurisdiction over charities are to be found in the books, it seems to have been under the three heads of fraud, trust and accident, and exercised without any doubt of the power in all cases where either circumstance existed. In Toth. 58, a case is reported as having been decided in 36 & 37 Hen. VIII. in which the court of chancery decreed lands to the mayor and burgesses of Gloucester, to whom they had been devised for the use of a school and other purposes. When a donor appointed lands or goods to be sold to maintain a charitable use, and did not appoint by whom the sale should be made, it was decreed to be made by persons named by the commissioners, and the money employed to maintain a charitable use according to the donor's intent. Toth. 30; Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 360, 41 Eliz. In Francis Moore's reading on the 43 Eliz., various cases are referred to which show clearly that charities stood upon the same footing in equity before the statute as they have done since. If a man devise that the executors of his wife shall pay money to be lent to young tradesmen, it is void, because he cannot charge the executors of his wife; but assets belonging to the husband were decreed to be liable to the charitable use. Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 136, 40 Eliz. Land sold in confidence to perform a charitable use, which the bargainer declared by his will, the bargain was never enrolled, yet the lord chancellor decreed the heirs should sell the land, to be disposed according to the use. This decree was made 24 Eliz., before the statute of charitable uses, and "was made upon ordinary judicial equity in chancery, and therefore it seems the commissioners upon this statute may decree as much in the like case." If a reversion be granted to a charitable use, the particular tenant shall be bound to attorn by the decree of the commissioners, and it was said there are precedents in chancery where the lord chancellor had decreed and compelled the tenant to attorn. Sir Thomas Bromly decreed and compelled the terre tenant to give seisin of a rent seck to the intent the party may bring an assize. Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 163.

From these cases, and the remarks of Sir Francis Moore, it seems that the course of the commissioners and the chancellor, under the statute, was taken from the previous rules of judicial equity, which were settled long before its adoption. It was penned by him by order of the house of commons (Duke, Char. Uses, by Bridgman, 122), which gives great weight to any opinion expressed by him, and to cases which he adopts as law. He says, no use shall be taken by equity to be a charitable use, within the meaning of the statute, if it be not within the meaning and words of the statute; but the words may be construed by equity, as the repairs of churches extend to all convenient ornaments, and conveniens for the administration of divine service. A gift of lands "to maintain a chaplain or minister to celebrate divine service, is neither within the letter nor meaning of this statute, for it was of purpose omitted in the penning of the act, lest the gifts intended to be employed upon purposes grounded upon charity might, in change of times, contrary to the minds of givers, be confiscated into the king's treasury; for religion being variable, according to the pleasure of succeeding princes, that which at one time is held for orthodox, may, at another, be accounted superstitious, and then such lands are confiscated, as appears by the statute of charities" (1 Edw. VI. c. 14). The effect of this omission is not to make the devise void, but to except such cases from the jurisdiction conferred on the commissioners by the statute. It is the same as a proviso which declares that nothing in the act shall be construed to extend to colleges, &c., which is only to exempt them from being reformed by commission. Hob. 136. So a gift for the maintenance of a chaplain or priest for divine service will be a charitable use, and in the direction of chancery, though not within the power of the commissioners. 7 Day's Com. Dig. N. 10, p. 609, and cases cited. As the statute gives to the chancellor no judicial power, except by appeal from the decree of the commissioners, it follows, that wherever he exercises any jurisdiction over cases not within the statute, or excepted from the power of the commissioners, it is independent of the statute; yet the uniform course of equity in such cases has been to give relief by the same rules and principles as if the case had been included in its enumeration. The lord keeper and the judge decreed that money given to maintain a preaching minister was a charitable use, notwithstanding it is not warranted by the statute, and that the same shall be paid by the executor to such maintenance. Pember v. Inhabitants of Kingston, Toth. 34; 15 Car. I.; Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman), 381; Pensterd v. Pavier, Toth. 34. Where an endowment was made for a vicar, but was void at law, by reason of some defects arising from the ignorance of the donor, it was decreed good in chancery. "For in cases of charitable uses, the charity is not to be set aside for want of every circumstance appointed by the donor,—if it should, a great many charities would fail." Joyce v. Osborne, Nel. Ch. 40, 41; 15 Car. I. So, where by will a certain sum was charged upon land for a weekly sermon and lecture, it was objected, that the devise was void, "because the case was not in the statute," because "no person was named,"—"part of the land was held per autre vie, and not devisable,"—and, "as the sermons had been discontinued, therefore the annuity ought to cease;" but the chancellor held them to be good. 2 Ch. Cas. 18, 19; S. P. 32. This principle has been followed up by various cases, in which devises to chaplains, ministers, preachers, vicars, &c., have been held good (1 Vin. Abr. 249; 2 Vern. 105; 3 P. Wms. 344; Swinb. 71) and chancery has decreed the execution of trusts in their favor, without any other authority than that on which they, through all time, acted on matters within their appropriate jurisdiction. 2 Fonbl. Eq. 210. It was strongly illustrated in a case decided immediately after the statute. In 11 Hen. VI. land was given with intent to find a chaplain to celebrate divine service, until the feoffor should procure a foundation, but was not so employed. The commissioners, under 39 Eliz., decreed the lands to the use,—the chancellor reversed their decree, because the use was not inquirable by them under the statute, but by his chancery authority he did decree the land according to the original use. Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 154; Carey, 39; 3 Jac. I. A decree was made for the heir at law, against certain feoffees who had lands conveyed to them to maintain scholars who should use holy orders. Crofts v. Evetts, Toth. 61, 62, 3 Jac. I.,—though this case is not within the statute.

The general principle adopted in chancery, that the performance of a charitable use is equally if not more favored than the payment of debts (Duke, Char. Uses, by Bridgman, 138, from Moore's Reading on the Statute, referred to as laid down in 42 Eliz.,) shows the reason of these decisions to be founded in general rules, to carry the intention of the party into effect, for all lawful objects, especially favored ones, as is forcibly expressed in a note in Tothill, of a case decided in 38 & 39 Eliz. "The law of God speaks for him, equity and good conscience speak for him, and the law of the land speaketh not against him." Toth. 126. This is the basis of equity jurisdiction; and as there is no subject to which the rule would apply with more force than to charities, so it will be found, that it has been the uniform course of equity to support charitable donations in all cases where they are not prohibited by law;—the inquiry has been, not what uses were authorized, but only what forbidden. Courts of original jurisdiction have taken cognizance of cases excluded from the power of special tribunals, without any statutory authority, and have not considered charities to be excluded from the protection of the law of equity, because they were not made subject to the power of the commissioners under the 43 Eliz. It contains no provision which enlarges the jurisdiction of the chancellor, as a court of equity, or as acting in place of the king by his prerogative or personal jurisdiction; in the appointment of commissioners, he acts as a special officer, selected to perform the duty imposed by the statute; in sustaining appeals from the commissioners, he acts by the rules of equity and good conscience, and these are the only functions which he is to perform under the statute. Keb. St. 943, 944; 2 Ruffh. St. 708, 709. It is wholly silent as to a proceeding by original bill, between private parties, or by information of the attorney general, where the king is in any way concerned, or where the chancellor can act only by the sign manual of the king. It enumerates only twenty-one charitable uses, as classed by Lord Coke, in 2 Inst. 710, and prescribes only one rule to the commissioners in making their decrees: "So as the lands and money may be duly and faithfully employed to and for such of the charitable uses and intents before rehearsed respectively, for which they were given, limited, assigned or appointed, by the donors and founders thereof;"—"which decrees not being contrary to the orders, statutes or decrees of the donors or founders, shall, by the authority of the present parliament, stand firm and good, according to the tenor and purport thereof, and shall be executed accordingly, until the same shall be undone or altered by the lord chancellor," &c. 2 Co. Inst. 710. This is the substance of the recital and remedial part of this statute; and if the law of charity could be traced to no other source, the system must have remained not only very defective, but would have been extremely illiberal and contracted, if it had rested on the enacting or remedial provisions it contains, or its operation and effect had been confined to the enumerated cases. By recurring to the statutes heretofore noticed, and the decisions of courts of law and equity, before this statute, it will be found, that they comprehend forty-six specifications of pious and charitable uses, which were recognized as within the protection of the law, in which were embraced all that were enumerated in the 43 Eliz. The statutes of Hen. VIII. and Edw. VI., for the suppression of superstition, protected more cases of charity, and prescribed more liberal rules for their establishment and maintenance, than 43 Eliz. The rules they prescribed to the commissioners, and the courts under which they were placed, are more definite and explicit in favor of charities, even where their establishment would prejudice the rights of the king, than this statute directs in cases between individuals.[1]

The same remark applies to the statutes of 39 Eliz., and if a detailed comparison was made, exhibiting the system of charities by the general course of the law of England, as it stood before the 43 Eliz., and as it would appear from that statute taken alone, no jurist would hesitate in preferring the former as the most perfect and liberal. The contrast would be striking indeed, if we expunge from the latter all which it adopts from former statutes and the common law; or if we take from the rules and principles which have governed its construction, as they are stated in the books to have been founded on its provisions, those which appear to have been finally settled and established previously;—this statute and the great system which has been supposed to have been built upon it, would lose its importance in the view of the profession. That branch of the personal or prerogative jurisdiction of the chancellor, which is exercised on the information of the attorney-general, by appointing a charitable donation to new objects, on the extinction of those to which it was originally devoted, will be found to be derived from the fundamental law of charities, established by the statutes of Templars (17 Edw. II.).

[1] The following summary list of uses declared by statute and adjudged cases to be valid, as pious and charitable, for which property could be held prior to the 43 Eliz. will fully sustain this position: (1) Gifts for the exercise and celebration of divine service, to find a chaplain, a taper to burn before an image, prayers for souls, the defence of the church, obits, or service of a priest. St. 13 Edw. I.; 17 Edw. II.; 2 Hen. V.; 23 Hen. VIII.; 15 Rich. II. (2) Free alms, lib-

The altering and disposing to good and pious uses, donations originally made for purposes of superstition, is a provision of the 1 Edw. VI. The appointment of general and vague charities to definite objects results from the general direction of the statutes, prior to the 43 Eliz., to make such appointments, "so that the will of the giver shall in all things always be faithfully observed and religiously executed" (17 Edw. II.); and that the decrees "shall be most beneficial in favor of the charities specified" (1 Edw. VI.); so that the said charitable uses may be observed in the most liberal and ample sort (39 Eliz.). General charities are embraced in the 37 Hen. VIII. as "good, virtuous and charitable deeds;" and in 1 & 2 Phil. & M., "the resuscitation of alms, prayer and example of good life;" and in 39 Eliz. c. 6, "other good, lawful and charitable purposes and intents;"—they were also under the superintendence of the king, as parens patriae. So that in all these cases, the 43 Eliz. has no direct or indirect effect in giving any jurisdiction to the chancellor. The appropriation of the increased profits and revenues of land charged with a specific sum to charities, to the same objects as those specified; and the eral alms-giving and relief of the poor. 13 Edw. I.; 17 Edw. II.; 37 Hen. VIII.; 1 Edw. VI.; these were gifts in frankalmoigne, and were good at common law. Co. Litt. § 133; pp. 93b, 94a, &c.; 6 Coke, 17; Carey, 39; Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 154; Poph. 6; 8 Coke, 130; And. 43; Hob. 124; Plowd. 523; Perk. § 7. (3) Hospitalities. 17 Edw. II.; 15 Rich. II. (4) All other offices and services before time due, by whatever name. 17 Edw. II. (5) The employment of a vicar to inform the people, &c. 15 Rich. II. (6) Lazars in hospitals. 2 Hen. V. (7) Men out of their wits. 2 Hen. V. (8) Poor women with child, nourishing, relieving and refreshing other poor people. 2 Hen. V.; 1 Coke, 26a. (9) The discharge of tolls and tollages to be levied to relieve the poor. 23 Hen. VIII.; 1 Coke, 26a. (10) The cleansing of streets. 23 Hen. VIII. (11) Good, virtuous and charitable deeds. 37 Hen. VIII. (12) Erecting grammar schools, and the maintenance of schoolmasters (1 Edw. VI.; Dyer, 225; 1 Coke, 25) and ushers (Poph. 8; 8 Coke, 130b). (13) The further augmentation of the universities. 1 Edw. VI. (14) The support of preachers, priests and vicars (1 Edw. VI.) and parsons (Plowd. 523; 1 Coke, 26). (15) The maintenance of pier walls and sea banks. 1 Edw. VI. (16) The relief of poor men, being students or otherwise. 1 Edw. VI. (17) Repairing bridges and walls. 2 & 3 Edw. VI.; 1 Coke, 26a. (18) Setting poor people at work. 5 & 6 Edw. VI.; 1 Coke, 26a. (19) The resuscitation of alms, prayer, and example of good life. 1 & 2 Phil. & M. (20) The relief of prisoners. 14 Eliz.; Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 131. (21) The repair of churches. 13 Eliz.; Cro. Eliz. 449; 1 Coke, 26a. (22) The maintenance of poor in houses of correction. 29 Eliz. (23) For impotent and maimed soldiers. 29 Eliz.; 35 Eliz. c. 1. (24) For hurt and maimed mariners. 35 Eliz. c. 1; Moore, 889, pl. 1252. (25) The maintenance of houses of correction and abiding houses. 35 Eliz. c. 7; 39 Eliz. c. 5. (26) For stocks and stores for them, and the use of the poor. 39 Eliz. c. 4; 1 Coke, 26a. (27) To erect and found hospitals. 39 Eliz. c. 5; Co. Litt. 342a; 10 Coke, 25, &c.; Hob. 123; Toth. 32; Moore, 865, pl. 1194. (28) School of learning, colleges and hospitals, for the relief of the poor. 39 Eliz. c. 6. (29) For the relief of orphans and fatherless children. 39 Eliz. c. 6; Swinb. 66. (30) And such like good and lawful charities. 39 Eliz. c. 6. (31) Repairing bridges and roads (39 Eliz. c. 6); making bridges and beacons (6 Coke, 1, 2). (32) Maintenance of free schools and poor scholars. 39 Eliz. c. 6. (33) Or such other good, lawful and charitable purposes and intents. 39 Eliz. c. 6. (34) The true labor and exercise of husbandry (7 Jac. I. c. 3, preamble; Keb. St. 1040; 3 Ruffh. St. 74) recited as profitable to the commonwealth and pleasing to God. (35) The bringing up of apprentices of both sexes in trades and manual occupations. 7 Jac. I. c. 3. (36) The making of stock for poor laborers' husbandry—poor apprentices, and to set them at work. 1 Coke, 26a. (37) For chapels of ease, erected as members of parochial churches. Hob. 123, 124. (38) For erecting cathedrals—of money for their support. Swinb. 66. (39) For the advancement of religion and learning, and the maintenance of the poor. 11 Coke, 70b. (40) For public benefit. 11 Coke, 73b. (41) Works of piety and charity, or any other charitable use. 1 Coke, 26a; 8 Coke, 130b. (42) Poor men decayed by misfortune, or the visitation of God. Moore, 129, pl. 277. (43) Persons imprisoned for conscience sake. Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 131. (44) A bell for a church, pulpit cushion and cloth, for a session house, or for the ornament of a church, or vestments for service. Poph. 139; 6 Coke, 1, 2. (45) The marriage of poor maidens. 1 Coke, 26a; 6 Coke, 1b, 2a. (46) For any charitable use (1 Coke, 26a; Shep. Abr. 1066); and such uses as concur in decency and good order with the intent of the founder (Duke, Char. Uses, by Bridgman, 155).

---

The twenty-one cases enumerated in the statute 43 Eliz. are the following: (1) The relief of aged, poor and impotent people. (2) The maintenance of sick and maimed soldiers and mariners. (3) Schools of learning. (4) Free schools. (5) Scholars in universities. (6) Houses of correction. (7) Repairs of bridges. (8) Of ports or havens. (9) Of cawsies. (10) Churches. (11) Of sea banks. (12) Of highways. (13) For education and preferment of orphans. (14) For marriage of poor maidens. (15) For supportation, aid and help of young tradesmen. (16) Of handicraft-men. (17) Of persons decayed. (18) For redemption or relief of prisoners or captives. (19) For ease and aid of any poor inhabitants concerning payment of fifteenths. (20) Fitting out soldiers. (21) And other taxes.

rule which prevents their going to the heir, or any other use than the charity, is founded on the statute of Templars, and the common law, as declared in 8 Coke, 131; 10 Coke, 30. The words "given," "limited," "appointed," "assigned," were taken from the 1 Edw. VI. c. 14, and 37 Hen. VIII. c. 4 (2 Ch. Cas. 18). These are the words on which the effect of the statute has been mainly founded, and courts have extended them very far (P. C. 271); but their meaning is the same in all the statutes. An assignment of the suppressed lands to charitable uses by commissioners, under the statute 1 Edw. VI. c. 14, § 13, had the same effect as an act of parliament, and the final decree of the court of augmentations of the revenue, the court of wards, or exchequer, establishing a charity on the lands or revenues of the king, was conclusive on his rights, let them accrue from whatever source: it followed that such appointment, assignment or decree, by the authority of parliament, had all the effect of a charter, license, and non obstante statuto, or special incorporation.

Independent of any statutory jurisdiction, charities belonged to the king as parens patriae, and fell under the care of chancery by the same authority which they exercised over infants, idiots, lunatics and wards of the king, before the erection of the other courts to whom the powers of the chancellor were transferred. 2 Vern. 342; 2 P. Wms. 103–118; 1 Bl. Comm. 90–92; 2 Bl. Comm. 328; Gilb. Eq. 172. The erection of new courts, or the authority conferred on commissioners to do what had before belonged to the chancellor, virtute officii, or by sign manual, was therefore only a devolution of his powers on the other tribunals; not the creating of a new power not before in existence, nor was the effect of their acts any greater by their special authority than the decrees of the chancellor, in virtue of his inherent or prerogative jurisdiction. The law on this subject was so well settled that in the 43 Eliz. the attorney general, Coke, and the two chief justices, Popham, Sir Francis Moore, and Anderson, by command of Sir Thomas Egerton, keeper of the seal, reported the following resolutions, on divers points on the 39 Eliz. c. 6, directing commissioners to redress frauds and breaches of trust of lands and goods given to charitable uses. If the commissioners decree a lease or feoffment to be void, it is void in interest and estate. If the chancellor decrees it good, it is again good interest, but they thought that the chancellor could make no decree, unless the decree of the commissioners was against equity. That the commissioners could decree the payment of mesne profits received and misemployed, as well as make orders for the future profits. That the word "given," in the proviso excepting hospitals and towns corporate, extends to gifts after the statute, as well as to gifts before. That they could not by a decree, establish a corporation of churchwardens, or others, to take for a charitable use, but they could decree land to a capable body politic, without danger of mortmain, whether the land was held in capite or not, because the king is bound by the statute in that point. That they could appoint lands to natural persons, and their heirs to hold in continuance for charitable uses. That they had power to reform abuses in such corporations as were out of towns corporate, to add land to them, or make orders for them which should have the same effect, as parliament, by private acts of incorporation for charitable uses, gave, as to all things in which the law does not prescribe any special cause of favor. Moore, 559, 560, pl. 762; Moore, Abr. 158, pl. 727. There can be no danger or error in taking the resolution of these common law lawyers as the settled rule by which charities were administered up to this time. There certainly is none in following the statutes which are yet in force, and the adjudications of courts which are recognized as law to this day, as the "general course of the law of England." In thus divesting the 43 Eliz. of its borrowed words, uses and provisions, it will be found that there remains but one important office which it has performed by its exclusive operation in aid of donations to charities—that is, to remove the disability imposed on corporations by the statute of wills. In other respects, it can be considered only as an item in the legislature of England, which, taken in connection with the decisions of the courts, framed the general course of the law on the subject of charities, which had become well defined and systematized; so much so, that we find much less litigation on charities before the 43 Eliz. than immediately afterwards. This was the consequence of the repeal of the 39 Eliz. c. 6, and the very limited enumeration of uses in 43 Eliz., which compelled the courts virtually to re-enact it by construction. In addition to the preceding view of the jurisdiction of chancery over charities, there is a general principle of the law of England peculiarly applicable to this subject.

It is provided by an old statute, that no man shall go from the king's courts without remedy for his right (13 Edw. I., c. 50; Keb. St. 52; 1 Ruffh. St. 111, 112); and was declared as a rule of equity by the chancellor in 4 Hen. VII. fol. 5; Bohun, Ch. Cas. 3; 2 Co. Inst. 405–408, 485; 12 Coke, 114b; Hob. 63; 3 Bl. Comm. 52; 2 Day, Com. Dig. 340–368, 370; 1 Ch. App. 20, 48. The whole judicial power of the kingdom is vested in the different courts (4 Co. Inst. 7071) and there can be no failure of justice by defects of courts, for when particular courts fail of justice, the general courts shall give remedy. 4 Co. Inst. 213; 1 Bac. Abr. 554, 555; 12 Coke, 114. They are supreme within their respective jurisdictions, and that of equity extends to all rights recognized by the law for which there is no legal remedy, the cognizance of which has not been transferred to some other court. 4 Co. Inst. 84. The jurisdiction of chancery, according to equity and good conscience, extends to all cases cognizable in equity, and the party objecting to its exercise must show that some other court of equity has cognizance of the case. 4 Co. Inst. 82; 1 Bac. Abr. 560; Mitf. Pl. 183; Beames, 57, 91; 2 Vern. 483; 1 Vern. 59; 1 Ves. 204; 1 Dickens, 129. Its course is governed by usage, without any statutory restraint as to persons or the subject matter—except cases affecting the rights or prerogative of the crown, to which it is extended either by statutes or warrant from the king; but is not exercised in virtue of the equity powers of the court (4 Co. Inst. 79, 82; Bohun, Ch. Cas. 56; Hob. 63; 2 Atk. 553; 3 Atk. 635); or the 43 Eliz.; 2 Co. Inst. 552. In acting on cases between subjects the jurisdiction exercised is that which is inherent in chancery as a court of equity, depending on its usage, and co-existent with its existence, by the same rules as are prescribed to the chancellor on an appeal from a decree of the commissioners under the 10th section of the 43 Eliz., which adopted its old principles. It is the same jurisdiction which the constitution confers on the courts of the United States by the words "cases in equity," and which the laws of this state of 1825 and 1828 confer on the state courts in cases of trust, "according to the powers and rules of a court of equity," which this court can exercise to the same extent as in England; subject only to the restriction of the 16th section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 82], where there is a remedy at law. Baker v. Biddle [Case No. 764; Parsons v. Bedford] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 446, 447; [Bank of Hamilton v. Dudley] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 525, 526. It is therefore clear, that the extraordinary jurisdiction of chancery was always applicable to charities in England; whenever there was a right to hold property for a charitable use, there was a remedy in the appropriate court, according to their respective jurisdiction, to be administered by its ordinary rules and principles without the aid of any new statute. It is also clear, that the personal or prerogative jurisdiction of the chancellor existed before the erection of the court of wards (2 Atk. 553), and that the court of chancery exercised its jurisdiction at large on cases of charitable uses before the statute, and that there may be a bill by information in that court founded on its general jurisdiction. 2 Ves. 327–329.

There is no case reported or referred to, wherein chancery has refused to sustain a bill or information for the establishment of a charity for the want of jurisdiction. There could be no failure of equitable relief in a proper case, either between a subject and the king, or subject and subject, for before the erection of the court of augmentations and wards the chancellor was invested with all the powers which were given to those courts which were most ample for all purposes of charities. The case of Reg. v. Porter, in 1 Coke, 22, has been considered as opposed to this position, and the importance given to it by the supreme court of the United States, in [Baptist Association v. Hart] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 33, 34, makes it necessary to bestow some attention upon it. The case is too familiar to the profession to be stated, but one historical fact is stated by the lord chancellor, in 3 Ves. 726, which fully accounts for the course of proceeding—the devisee "instead of performing the will made a long lease, and the mode taken to effectuate the charity was this—they found the heir at law, and he having entered, conveyed to the queen, by which means she had it in her power to establish the charity." The attorney general filed an information of intrusion in the exchequer against Porter, who was in possession under the devisee, on which there was a judgment in favor of the queen, which is equivalent to a recovery or possession, as the defendant in such cases is subject to a fine which he can avoid only by making terms. It only remained for the queen to grant a charter to effectuate the charity as she had the legal estate by deed from the heir, and possession of the land on which it was charged; and it was the most direct mode of doing it. In any other way the difficulty would have been great. There had been an adverse possession from the death of the testator, in 32 Hen. VIII. till the 34 Eliz., so that the heir could not have recovered possession by any other proceeding than a writ of right. If successful, he could establish the charity by his own deed, only in the grantees and their heirs, or in trustees for their use. To make a corporation, it would be necessary to apply to parliament, as in the case of the Thetford school, or to the queen for letters patents for at this time there was no power in commissioners by any statute to establish charities on any lands except those in the king's hands under the government of special courts. If the heir had refused, the interference of chancery would have been necessary to give relief to the parties interested in the charity, if the difficulty of obtaining possession at law had been removed. By the special verdict, it appears that the testator had edified "divers meases, mansions and places convenient for a free school," &c., (1 Coke, 19b,) and the devise of the wharf and house was for "the maintenance of the premises in manner and form, as the said N. G. have kept and maintained the same, and as the same is now kept and maintained without any diminution in any wise." There was then a vested interest, a trust created and cestui que trust in existence, and the charity was fastened on the land into whosesoever hands it came. It was binding on the heir who entered for the condition broken—"he shall perform the use because he comes in upon confidence, and the condition was compulsory to perform the use." Moore, Char. Uses; Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 137, 138, 159–161.

If the powerful reasoning of the judges in the case of Inglis v. Trustees of Sailor's Snug Harbor, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 119, 140, 145, 154, is applied to Porter's Case [supra], it is apprehended that there could be little doubt that the devise would have been carried into effect in a court of law, if the cestui que use of the charity had been in possession of the wharf and house; as the court of exchequer held the devise to be valid in law, and as the donor had an undoubted power over the estate, every principle and rule of equity would have induced a court of equity to compel the heir at law to have carried his intention into effect, by the exercise of its acknowledged jurisdiction over trusts. The queen by her purchase acquired only the right of the heir, she held it subject to the trust, and as the condition which created the trust appeared on the face of her title, the cestuis que trust could have had their remedy in the exchequer, by a bill or information in nature of a monstrans de droit, as fully as in the case of a charity charged upon the abbey lands by the 33 Hen. VIII. But no further proceeding was required after the adverse claim was removed; as the object was the establishment of the charity, no interference became necessary, as the power of the queen was competent to do every act in order to carry the devise into complete effect; by the mode adopted all circuity was avoided, and the object completely effected, as soon as the queen obtained possession by removing the intruder. Plow. 561; Hardr. 460; 7 Day, Com. Dig. 83. The presumption of the want of any equitable remedy to establish and protect the charity, which has been drawn from the lapse of time from the death of the devisor till the filing of the information, is not warranted by any thing which appears in the report of the case, and it is not to be expected that the collateral circumstances attending it can now be traced with accuracy; the one referred to in 3 Ves. 726, is satisfactory, and appears in the whole course of the argument by the counsel of the queen, to have been the only object of her interference. But whatever ground there may have been for such presumption, arising from the particular circumstances of Porter's Case, without referring to the general course of the courts of law and equity, or of the special courts or tribunals instituted by statutes prior to its decision; there certainly is the most abundant evidence that there was in some court a competent power to effectuate all lawful charities according to the intent of the donor. The statutes and adjudications referred to are conclusive to this point, and no presumption can be permitted to overthrow their authority, unless modern doubts shall be more respected than the ancient principles of the law which governed charities before the 43 Eliz., and which have continued to this day the rules by which courts of equity have proceeded in their administration in cases not within the words or equity of that statute, as well as those expressly excluded from its operations by provisos and exceptions, as to which there can be no pretence that the statute either gave any new, or enlarged any old jurisdiction.[2]

There is a large class of cases expressly excepted from the jurisdiction of the commissioners by the 43 Eliz., by declaring "that this act, or anything in it, shall not extend to any city, town corporate," or land in them, given to the uses specified, or to "colleges, hospitals or free-schools," who have special governors or visitors to govern them, to "colleges in the universities of Westminster, Eton or Winchester." 7 Day, Com. Dig. 616, note 19.

The 39 Eliz. embraced all "colleges, hospitals, schools of learning and other places founded or ordained for charitable purposes," but it was repealed by the 43 Eliz. c. 9; 4 Co. Inst. 167; 7 Day, Com. Dig. 614. Yet notwithstanding the repeal of this law, and the proviso in the 43 Eliz. c. 4, chancery has since, as they had done before, exercised a jurisdiction over them, which continues to this day, without any statutory authority, resting on its ancient basis. 2 Fonbl. Eq. 208. Though the 2 Hen. V. placed hospitals under the supervision of the ordinary, yet where the "king or any of his progenitors were founders," the ordinary was not allowed to visit them; "but the chancellor of England is appointed by law to be their visitor." Co. Litt. 96a. The king may have a prohibition to the ordinary that "he shall not visit them, because the chancellor ought to do it and no other," "so shall a private founder, if the ordinary will visit or cite any of the poor to appear before him or remove them." Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 42, 93; Reg. Brev. 40; 1 Lil. Reg. 379. The remedy, must of course, be in the temporal courts. If a resort is had to those of equity powers, it must be by ordinary process of a bill at the suit of a subject against subject, or by information in case the king is party, according to its ancient usages and rules, that wherever property is holden by one in trust and confidence, chancery has jurisdiction to correct fraud, accident and breach of trust. This power is exercised over the governors and visitors of colleges, hospitals and corporations, whenever they are trustees. 3 Atk. 108, 164; 2 P. Wms. 325. Though the jurisdiction of the ordinary is expressly saved by the statute, chancery exercises the same powers over executors and administrators who hold money for charitable uses, as other trustees. It is the existence of a trust which is executory that gives jurisdiction to chancery, and not the existence of a charity recognized by a statute; a statute has a different office to perform, to remove disabilities or incapacities, imposed by statute or common law, so as to bring charities back to their original capacity, and place them within the cognizance of the appropriate courts, as if they had never been affected by any change introduced by statutes, which had embarrassed donations for uses of charity, piety and education. When that office is performed, and the case becomes disencumbered of statutory restraints, the powers of the courts are brought to act on them, as the highly favored objects of the law. Chancery especially will protect them to the extent of its judicial power as a court of equity; and, by the personal jurisdiction of the chancellor, (which he exercises in right of the crown by prerogative, under the sign manual of the king, as parens patriae,) do what the king in equity and conscience ought to do. This is done in cases of charities for purposes so undefined, as not to come within the statute, or general charities, with which the commissioners have nothing to do, but must be determined by the king in chancery, on an information by the attorney general. In a leading case on this subject, the decree of the commissioners was reversed as to a general charity, but affirmed where the objects were defined with reasonable certainty (2 Lev. 167), so as to come within the statute. In these three classes of cases not embraced in the statute, therefore, viz.—1, where the objects are wholly vague; 2, cases excepted; 3, cases within the jurisdiction of the ordinary, as all cases provided for by the 17 Edw. II., or 1 Edw. VI., the jurisdiction of chancery is wholly independent of its provisions, and is exercised as if it had never passed; as is strikingly exemplified in the cases of hospitals placed under the power of the commissioners by the 39th, but excluded by the 43 Eliz. There was no ground on which chancery could take their supervision as to the execution of trusts, but by its extraordinary or personal jurisdiction existing before the 43 Eliz. It has been supposed that the latter must have been derived from the statutes, from the circumstance of there being no reported cases of its exercise antecedently: if there is any weight in this supposition, it applies with the same force for sixty years afterwards, for there is no reported proceeding in chancery on charities where the king is a party till after the restoration of Charles II.; but this circumstance is satisfactorily accounted for, by referring to former statutes.

[2] The law of charitable uses has always formed a part of the Civil Code of Pennsylvania. The statute of 43 Eliz., as a statute, has never been adopted in this state; but its conservative provisions have been in force here, by common usage and constitutional provision. Not only so, but the more extensive range of charitable uses which chancery sustained before the statute of Elizabeth, and even beyond it. The statute of 9 Geo. II. never was in force in Pennsylvania, and consequently the law of charitable uses here stands unaffected by it. The courts of equity in this state will not hesitate in supplying any formal defect in the execution of a power by will in favor of a charity. Pepper's Will, 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 436.

All the land of the abbeys, monasteries, &c., which were suppressed by the statutes of Hen. VIII. and Edw. VI. were placed in the hands of the commissioners appointed by the king, under the order and governance of the court of augmentation of the king's revenue, which had also the exclusive cognizance of all claims for charities, charged on, or accruing from the suppressed lands, by which the king could be in any way prejudiced or affected. Keb. St. 608; 4 Co. Inst. 121; Gilb. Ex'ns, 159; 2 Ruffh. St. 226. On the abolition of this court, its powers devolved on the exchequer, without any act of parliament (Dyer, 216a, pl. 55; Skin. 612; 1 Bac. Abr. 597) which had the control of the king's lands and revenues (4 Co. Inst. 194) before the erection of the court of augmentation in 27 Hen. VIII. c. 27; 4 Co. Inst. 121, 122. The king's demesne and purchased lands, with those which accrued by forfeiture and escheat, together with all matters affecting them, were under the supervision of the exchequer, which was a court of original jurisdiction, both in law and equity, by ancient statute and usage, in all cases affecting these lands, or any claims upon them, or his revenues or profits issuing therefrom, in which the proceedings were by bill, information, monstrans de droit, petition of right, or the transverse of inquisitions, as the case may be. 3 Bl. Comm. 44; 2 Co. Inst. 23, 553; 4 Co. Inst. 108; 1 Bac. Abr. 597; Hob. 63; Hardr. 50; 2 Lev. 34; Dyer, 303; 3 Day, Com. Dig. 312.

The court of wards and liveries was erected by the 32 Hen. VIII. c. 46; it was a court of record and equity, in which the proceeding on the part of the king was by information in the name of the attorney general, and on the part of a subject, by the usual mode of proceeding appropriate to the jurisdiction of the court, which extends to all wardships of the king by statute, tenure or prerogative, in any lands or their issues and profits, as well as the estates of idiots and natural fools, and charities charged on the lands of his wards or tenants, which were in his wardship. 4 Co. Inst. 188, 202; Bohun, Ch. Cas. 468; Hob. 136. The jurisdiction of the exchequer was taken away from all cases cognizable by the court of wards and liveries (4 Co. Inst. 189), and the statute 33 Hen. VIII. c. 39, declared the jurisdiction of all these courts to be exclusive over the subject matter within their respective cognizance. Keb. St. 555; 2 Ruffh. St. 324. The courts of augmentation, and surveyors of the king's revenues—of exchequer, and wards, and liveries, had all the powers of a court of equity, in the exercise of which they proceeded by information, petition, traverse of inquisition, or English bill, and decreed for or against the king, according to the equity and conscience of the case as between subject and subject. 7 Coke, 19b; Hardr. 27, 176, 230, 502; 4 Co. Inst. 19; Hob. 136. A reference to matters placed under the supervision of these courts will show conclusively that during their existence the chancellor could in no capacity act upon charities in any case to which the king was a party in interest, or where he came into court by the attorney general; if a charity was charged upon his lands, or those he held in ward, its orders and governance belonged to some of these courts exclusively, and, as parens patriae, all lands so given to charities as to require his interposition by sign manual, came directly within his wardship—as in the case of infants, idiots and lunatics. 2 P. Wms. 103–118. Hence all jurisdiction over charities which were too vague and general to vest according to the ordinary rules of equity—all charities charged upon lands which would have escheated to the king or mesne lords but for the provisions of the statute of Templars—all charities charged on the suppressed lands for superstitious uses, which would have been seized by the king under the statutes of chauntries, but for the direction of the statute 1 Edw. VI.—and all charities charged on lands belonging to the king's wards, was devolved on the court of wards and liveries.

The powers of this court were derived from the 32 & 33 Hen. VIII. and not from the 43 Eliz., which makes no mention of it. Yet we find from Flood's Case, Hob. 136, the authority of which is admitted, that that court decreed the establishment of a charity out of lands in wardship of the king, Flood being his tenant. The decree was made by the ordinary power of the court, and in a case not only not within the 43 Eliz., but expressly exempted by it, as one of the colleges of Oxford. The only effect of this statute was to remove the disability on corporations imposed by the statute of wills. While the power of this court continued, that of chancery over the subject was necessarily suspended, as the king could not proceed in it by his sign manual appointing charities, or the chancellor as his substitute; but as these charities were originally cognizable by the chancellor, and his jurisdiction ceased by being transferred to another court, and not for any want of a competent power to effectuate all its objects, it would revert to it on its abolition, as was the case of the exchequer on the abolition of the court of augmentations. The court of wards was abolished with tenures in chivalry, first by Cromwell's parliament and afterwards by 12 Car. II. (Keb. St. 1147; 3 Ruffh. St. 192), but the statute contained no provision for devolving its powers on other courts. That portion of its jurisdiction which grew out of feudal tenures was of course extinct, that which was founded on the prerogative of the king in the supervision of charities, the care of lunatics, infants and idiots having been before the erection of the court of wards within the cognizance of the chancellor, returned to him as an original jurisdiction which had been merely suspended. Fonbl. Eq. 207; 2 Vern. 342; 3 Bl. Comm. 427, 428; 2 Atk. 553; 3 Atk. 635; Mitf. Pl. 29.

When the chancellor resumed this branch of his jurisdiction the proceedings were conducted as they had originally been, and as followed by the court of wards, according to the usual course of equity in all courts, by modes of proceeding appropriate to the case, and according to the principles which had been settled by long and uniform usage in the exercise of its powers; by an authority neither conferred nor enlarged by the 43 Eliz. nor assumed from the necessity of the case on the subject of charities, more than any others to which their unquestioned jurisdiction extended. The personal or prerogative jurisdiction of the chancellor has been and continues to be the subject of great diversity of opinion in England and this country; but the radical difference between the two governments precludes the necessity of examining the question in this case. Here the executive of the state or Union has no prerogative powers or authority; his sign manual can confer none on a court of chancery; the chancellor is not the keeper of his conscience, or the attorney general his representative in courts of law or equity; the rights and prerogative of the crown devolved on the several states by their declaration of independence, and the assumption of the powers of self-government. The general supervision of infants, idiots, lunatics and charities, which thus devolved on them, can be exercised only by the authority of the legislature. A state cannot be made a party to a suit, without its consent expressed by a law or resolution, and no judicial proceeding or process by or against the attorney general, unless by the authority of the state, can prejudice its rights. He can have no control over the fund which may belong to the state by escheat, on the extinction of all the objects for which it was created, and a failure of the heirs of the donor, or which comes to the prerogative wardship of the state over persons under legal disabilities; neither can be disposed of without an act of the legislature, who are the keepers of their own conscience, as fully in relation to their prerogative rights over the property of others, as the original public domain of the state.

It suffices for the purposes of this case, to have ascertained that the original inherent powers of chancery proceeding as a court of equity, according to equity and good conscience, can be exercised by this court to the full extent of the emergency of this case, independently of the 43 Eliz., either by its enactments, or any new rules or principles of the law of equity supposed to have been developed in its exposition. Having given our views of the equity jurisdiction of the federal courts, in the case of Baker v. Biddle [supra], we deem it unnecessary to review them, as we are fully satisfied of the correctness of the opinion there delivered. Its application to this case will be found to cover all the questions of jurisdiction which can arise.

Having disposed of the objections to the capacity of the meetings of Friends in this and other states, to take by deed or will for charitable purposes, the next subject of inquiry is as to the particular uses specified in the will—in the contested items which are, —No. 9. The eight acre lot is devised to the yearly meeting as a fund, the income of which is to be paid as an annual subscription into their stock—the application of which has been to the printing and dissemination of books and writings that have been approved of by the society. 10. The bequest of the one thousand dollars to the five monthly meetings of Woman Friends, is for the relief of the poor members thereof. These meetings having a common stock and treasurer, and it is applied to the support of the poor, and teaching poor girls trades. 11. This is a bequest of £30, and interest from the year 1759, for the use of certain Indians. This sum appears to have been received by the father of the testatrix, from one Captain Newcastle, an Indian, for the use of his cousins, but a small part of it only was paid —the will directs this sum to be put into faithful hands, and was devised to the treasurer of the yearly meeting, for the relief and benefit of said Indians, for whose use it had been received by her father, and was evidently intended as the payment of a debt which she assumed by her will. 12. This was a legacy to the treasurer of the yearly meeting in Philadelphia, appointed to relieve the Indians, to the benefit of said Indians. The objects of the meeting are the civilization and improvement of the Indians of the Seneca and Tuscora tribes in New York, to supply them with articles of husbandry, oxen, and iron for mills. 17. Is a like bequest to the treasurer of the Baltimore yearly meeting, for the relief, benefit, and civilization of the Indians under their care, who live in the state of Ohio. No money appears to have been expended for this object for some years past, but the committee are ready to carry them into effect, if they can be found. 18. This is to Friends composing the Baltimore yearly meeting, towards their "stock," if they have one, if not, to one when it is their pleasure to establish it. It appears that this meeting had a stock at the death of the testatrix, which was applied to the printing of books of a religious character, or on business of the society, the expenses of members attending the legislature, and the keeping of Friends horses during the meeting. 19. This is a legacy to the yearly meeting at Mount Pleasant, in Ohio, for their stock, as in the preceding clause; there is no doubt they have a stock for the same purposes as other yearly meetings. 20 & 21. Are legacies to Quaker meetings in Virginia for the relief of the poor thereof—towards the enlarging their meeting house, and the erection of a stone wall to enclose the lot on which it is built —both meetings having a stock and treasurer, and all yearly meetings have a stock. 22. Is a legacy to the citizens of Winchester, in Virginia, (which is an incorporated town,) for a fire engine and hose.

It would be a waste of time to examine into the validity of these uses. As objects of charity, benevolence or liberality, by the common or statute laws of England or Pennsylvania, they are good and valid by both. [Baptist Association v. Hart] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 45; 17 Serg. & R. 93. Even the statute 9 Geo. II., does not apply to bequests of money or personalty, and the testator has specified purposes, charitable in their nature. 2 Rop. Leg. 105, 106; 9 Ves. 406. There appears no adjudication as to a bequest for a fire engine or hose, but there needs no argument to prove it as much an object of public utility, as a session house (Poph. 139), a town house (7 Johns. Ch. 294), or of charity, as cleansing streets (23 Hen. VIII. c. 10), the repairing bridges, &c. (1 Edw. VI.; 43 Eliz.) or in case of taxes and assessments for the preservation of the property of the citizens. We should administer the law of charity in this state, with little regard to its principles, in excluding from its protection so laudable an object as this.

As to the bequests for the benefit of the Indians, there can be no doubt of their being proper objects of charitable donations, as coming within what Swinburne defines, "poor miserable persons," calling for the aid of the charitable and benevolent. Swinb. 66. They have been so recognised by the legislature of the state in the Laws of 1788, incorporating a society for their relief and improvement, as a pious and charitable purpose (Laws 1788, p. 40). In this particular, both judges fully concur. Though there is a difference of opinion on some matters connected with this bequest, which were much dwelt on in the argument on both sides, there is none as to their being proper objects of charity, and that the uses and purposes to which the donations of the Quaker meetings are applied, are not only lawful, but in the highest degree deserving encouragement and protection. We have thus come to the conclusion that the devise of the eight acre lot, and all the bequests in the will of Sarah Zane, which have been contested, are for pious and charitable uses and purposes, sanctioned by law.

The next inquiry is, are they so limited or appointed as to take effect for the objects intended. It must be observed, that except the 22d,—the devises are all in trust for the objects of the charities; the only interest which any of the Quaker societies have in the bequests, is in aid of their contributions for their stock, which appears to be made up by assessments on the different subordinate meetings, but they take in no other way for any individual or collective use or benefit. The organization of these meetings is very regular, though none of them are incorporated. Their gradation is,—preparative, monthly, quarterly and yearly meetings—the latter having the control of all the subordinate ones, but all composed of the same members, and each meeting has its stock and treasurer, its application being directed, by the respective meeting, to agreed, approved and definite objects. The testatrix was a member of the Philadelphia yearly meeting, and appears to have been connected, in a friendly manner with the meetings in Baltimore, Frederick county, in Virginia, where she died; and with the meeting of Mount Pleasant, a branch from the meeting of Maryland. We must therefore presume her to be familiar with the organization and discipline of all the meetings, in all their details, as is evident from the provisions of the will. When she devotes part of her property to the stock of a particular meeting, it is most certainly her intention that it shall be applied according to its discipline and usage, as well known and understood by herself. It follows that a contribution to such stock is of the same legal effect as if the objects of its application had been specified in the will, as in the case of a devise to an hospital, or any known institution; it is for the uses and purposes intended by the founder; so a devise by way of contribution to a fund devoted to specific objects, by a society who make it up, is in law a devise to such purposes and such only, it can be directed to no other by the trustees, or a court, though the object may not be clearly defined. 1 Vern. 43, 55; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 99; 1 Atk. 356; 3 Mer. 400.

It will be ascertained by usage, by the situation and circumstances of the testator, to discover what he meant when the will gave no explanation (2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 366, &c; 3 P. Wms. 145), as if he was a refugee, and devises generally to the poor, it shall be intended poor refugees of the same nation as himself (Amb. 422; Duke, Char. Uses, by Bridgman, 494; 2 Rop. Leg. 147; S. P., Swinb. 316, 480); or "to the charity school," and there were two in the place, evidence was received to show that the testator was fond of the children in one of the schools, and declared he would leave them something at his death. 1 P. Wms. 674, 675; S. P. [Powell v. Biddle] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 70–72; 2 P. Wms. 141. That a devise to the poor of any particular parish or church is good, has been often decided (2 Rop. Leg. 147, 148; Toth. 30). In this case they are more definite, being to the poor of particular meetings, which, by reference, makes the designation complete, when we advert to the master's report, finding, that, at the death of the testatrix, and before, there were meetings of the kind referred to at each place designated by her in the will. Finch, 184, 245; 2 Lev. 167, 168; 1 P. Wms. 425.

The devises for the benefit of the Indians are likewise made specific by the evidence reported by the master, specifying the tribes of Indians, and the particular relief afforded by the committee during thirty years, by the expenditure of large sums of money, from time to time, under the direction of the meeting. The intention to apply the bequests in the same manner is too apparent for any court to entertain a doubt. If any could exist, or should hereafter arise, before a final decree, it is within our unquestioned powers to direct further evidence to ascertain and carry it into execution, if no other objections exist than the want of certainty in the will itself. In [Baptist Association v. Hart] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 1, the devise was to "The Baptist Association that for ordinary meets at Philadelphia, annually," which "I allow to be a perpetual fund for the education of youths of the Baptist denomination, who shall appear promising for the ministry, always giving a preference to the descendants of my father's family." The court declared the association to be described with sufficient accuracy (page 26,) and that such a legacy would be sustained in England, (page 29;) so that there was no doubt of the validity of the devise, had the trustees been capable of taking for the objects intended. In Witman v. Lex, the devise was "To St. Michael and Zion churches, to be laid out in bread for the poor of the Lutheran congregation, of which the testator was a member, and towards the education of young students of that congregation, under the direction of the vestrymen of the first named churches," and held good. 17 Serg. & R. 90–93. So of land appropriated by deed for public uses for the benefit of the inhabitants of a town, as a majority may order and direct. 6 Serg. & R. 211. So of a lot marked in the plan of a town "for the Lutheran church," for religious purposes. [Beatty v. Kurtz] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 578. This was held good without further description of either the donees or uses, and to take effect when the church should be erected. The court took into consideration the use to which the lot had been appropriated from the time of the donation, which was for a meeting house and burying-ground, and though the house had fallen down from decay, and no new one had been erected, they decreed it to be enjoyed according to the former use.

A legacy to the town of New Rochelle, to erect a town-house to transact public business in, has been held a sufficient description of the charity. 7 Johns. Ch. 294; S. P., 1 Ch. Cas. 134. Courts of chancery act under an obligation to effectuate charitable donations by all the means in their power (2 Freem. 261, 330; 3 Mer. 391), more liberally than in private cases, without regarding the form or prayer of the bill. 1 Atk. 356; 1 Brown, Ch. 12; 2 Ves. Sr. 426; 1 Ves. Sr. 418; 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 198; 11 Ves. 365; 1 Ves. Sr. 468–475. It is enough that the testator expresses his general intention to establish a charity by making a donation to any object deemed charitable in law, or by using the word "charity." 2 Ves. Sr. 399; 10 Ves. 535; 17 Serg. & R. 93; [Baptist Association v. White] 4 Wheat. 45. Wherever a trust is created for charitable purposes, the mode by which it is to be effected, or the specific objects of its application, are not material to its validity. 2 Rop. Leg. 140, and cases cited; [Inglis v. Trustees of Sailors' Snug Harbor] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 119; 1 Atk. 469; 3 Brown, Ch. 528; 7 Ves. 69, 86. They are put on the footing of dedications of property to public benefit, requiring no particular grantee or trustee capable of taking. Though the object is not in esse at the time of the devise,—[Town of Pawlet v. Clark] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 331, 332; [Beatty v. Kurtz] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 582, 583; [City of Cincinnati v. White] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 437,—the land remains charged with the charity in the hands of the heir until the object comes into existence—2 Vent. 349; [Inglis v. Trustees of Sailor's Snug Harbor] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 114–119; Duke, Char. Uses (by Bridgman) 534. So of money in the hands of a trustee, the profits accumulate for the benefit of the fund. 3 Atk. 238.

Chancery will establish the charity on the application of any person who has any interest in the fund in his own right, or as an inhabitant, or a parish officer (1 Ch. Cas. 134), a member of a society having a common benefit from the donation, or a committee of a voluntary association without charter, though they could sustain no action at law,—[Beatty v. Kurtz] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 584, 585;—"according to what may be collected to be the true meaning and intent of the donor, notwithstanding any failure or defect in the bequests, gifts or grants," as is correctly expressed in the rejected law of 1712. The courts of this country have gone pari passu with those of England, in aiding defective descriptions or designations of the places, objects or purposes of a charity, wherever they could, by the terms of the instrument, connected with extrinsic circumstances, give locality and application to the fund according to the intent of the donor as near as may be. [Inglis v. Trustees of Sailor's Snug Harbor] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 117. Words will be construed in their most liberal and expanded meaning, in order to make out the substance of a charity capable of being aided on equitable principles, or the existence of a trust in the heir at law, devisee or executor, in the execution of which any individual or society has an interest which can be enjoyed by them, or held for their use, consistently with the terms of the donation by an equitable right; chancery will draw to it the legal interest, and give it full effect by a plan to be drawn up under the direction of the court by a master, or the trustee. [3]

An inscription on a tombstone has been held sufficient (Duke, Char. Uses, by Bridgman, 349–366,) or any direction by any writing, which can be deemed to be a limitation, disposition, assignment or an appointment, or gift of property to a charitable use—it will be enforced against parties and privies, except purchasers for valuable consideration of money or land, without notice of the trust—not regarding the form of the instrument. Moore, 888; Comyns, 250; Finch, Prec. 471; Sugd. Pow. 222, 223. A direction by a nuncupative will, was held to be an appointment or limitation before the statute of wills. Dyer, 72, pl. 2; Swinb. 56, 68; Toth. 31. Chancery acts whenever there is a trust, (3 Atk. 108; 2 P. Wms. 326,) which never fails for want of a trustee, (1 Pa. St. 51, 52,) though he dies before the testator, (2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 293; 1 Brown, Ch. 15; Amb. 571; 3 Brown, Ch. 528,) refuses to act or abuses his trust, (2 Ch. Cas. 131; 7 Day, Com. Dig. 772,) chancery will remove him and appoint another, (Ch. Rep. 78, 79; 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 194,) or compel him to assign it. Finch, 269. These are the principles of equity which the supreme court, in 17 Serg. & R. 91, 92, declare to be the common law of the state, which have been uniformly applied as far as the powers of the courts could be extended to the exercise of chancery jurisdiction. Since the acts of 1818, 1825 and 1828, they can be applied to all trusts as fully as they can be in England, by the common law of equity or the provisions or construction of any statute. They cover all the ground of equity which it is necessary to assume for the decision of this case; the defendant is a trustee for the purposes of the will; the bequests are to trustees either named or designated, who are capable of holding and distributing the funds intrusted to their management, the cestuis que trust are either sufficiently described or easily ascertained by intrinsic circumstances, and the uses for which the dispositions are made are not only valid, but favored and protected by the law, which can effectuate without the exercise of any personal or prerogative jurisdiction.

We shall direct the administrator de bonis non, cum testamento annexo, to pay the respective bequests to the persons appointed to receive and distribute them. They will be considered as trustees, acting under the supervision of this court, as a court of chancery, with the same powers over trusts, as courts of equity in England, and the courts of this state, possess and exercise. Though our original cognizance of the case depends on the residence of the parties to the suit, yet when the fund is under our control, we can proceed in its final distribution among the different claimants in the same manner as if each was a party competent to become an original complainant, by original bill. Baker v. Biddle [Case No. 764]. When the fund shall be so ascertained as to be capable of a final distribution, it will be directed to be applied exclusively to the objects designated in the will, as they existed at the time of her death, and shall continue till a final decree; if any shall then appear to have become extinct, the portion bequeathed to such object must fall into the residuary fund as a lapsed legacy. Its appointment to other purposes, or cestuis que trust, than those which can, by equitable construction, be brought within the intention of the will or donor, is an exercise of that branch of the jurisdiction of the chancellor of England, which has been conferred on this court by no law, and cannot be exercised, virtute officii, under our forms of government. As the amount of the personal estate is evidently far short of the legacies made payable by the will, there must be a failure or abatement, unless the necessary amount can be raised out of the real estate not specifically devised. The testator having authorized the executor to sell the house in Chestnut street, and the Marlborough estate in Virginia, his powers devolve on the administrator d. b. n. c. t. a., by the acts of assembly of this state, (3 Smith, Laws, 433, 434; 6 Smith, Laws, 102;) and as he is a party before us, we can compel their execution, if the laws of Virginia recognise them as competent. But he has no power over any other portions of the real-estate, nor are the heirs at law, or residuary devisees, parties to the suit; so that no decree which we could make would bind them, or the land situated in another state. Our jurisdiction being both limited and local, we cannot compel parties who reside out of the state to appear on our process, and a sale of land in Virginia, under the authority of the court alone, would pass no title to the purchaser.

[3] Though the objects of a charity are uncertain, a devise will not fail for want of a trustee capable of taking, if a discretionary power of selecting is vested anywhere. And such power may be vested in an unincorporated religious association. Thus a devise of real and personal estate to the monthly meeting of Friends, at Philadelphia, for the northern district, (being an unincorporated religious association) to be applied as a fund for the distribution of good books among poor people in the back part of Pennsylvania, or to the support of an institution or free school, in or near Philadelphia, was established in a court of equity, against the heirs and representatives of the testator, on a bill by certain members of the meeting, on behalf of themselves and other members. Pickering v. Shotwell, 10 Barr [10 Pa. St.] 23. And see Beaver v. Filson, 8 Barr [8 Pa. St.] 327; Wright v. Linn, 9 Barr [9 Pa. St.] 433.

It is an acknowledged principle that the title and disposition of real property is exclusively subject to the laws of the country where it is situated, which can alone prescribe the mode by which a title can pass from one person to another,—[U. S. v. Crosby] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 116; [Clark v. Graham] 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 579; [Kerr v. Moon] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 571; [M'Cormick v. Sullivant] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 202,—to which may be added the case of Hunter v. Bryant, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 32, to which we have been referred, as authorizing the sale of the Virginia lands, now asked to be directed. That was a suit originating in this court, affecting land in Kentucky; but as only five-sixths of the land were represented by the parties to the suit, the court confined their decree of sale to the interest of the five parties before them; the sixth party, in interest resided in Virginia, as to whom the supreme court declared, "That the complainant must pursue his remedy, unless her representatives shall have the prudence voluntarily to join in the sales of any land that may be made under this decree." [Baptist Association v. Hart] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 34, 44, 45. We are therefore following all these decisions of the supreme court, in refusing to make any further order of sale of real estate, other than the two parts thereof embraced in the power given by the will.

The decisions of the supreme court of the state, and of the high court of errors, which bear on the residuary devise in this will, may derange some of the specific devises. If the legacies are a charge on the real estate specifically devised, they might affect not only the devise of the eight acre lot, given to the yearly meeting, but other devises to persons not parties to the suit, who must be heard before we can make any decree, touching such parts of the real estate. The application of the rule laid down in Tucker v. Hassenclever, 3 Yeates, 294–299; 2 Bin. 525–531; Nichols v. Postlethwaite, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 131; Witman v. Norton, 6 Bin. 396; and Com. v. Shelby, 13 Serg. & R. 348,—would absorb much of the real estate to pay the legacies; but if they should be considered as a charge only on the residuary fund, according to Shaw v. M'Cameron, 11 Serg. & R. 252, they will not affect the devised lands. On this point we have formed no opinion.

It remains only to apply the foregoing view of the law of Pennsylvania to the dispositions of the will in question.

1. To the devise of the eight acre lot to the yearly meeting. We know historically that this has been a religious society from the settlement of the province. We know, from the acts of the legislature, that they have held real estate, and yet hold it, under deeds from the proprietor, from individuals, and by the laws of the state, guarantied by all its constitutions, have a perfect right and capacity to take, hold and enjoy property without incorporation, or tenure in mortmain.

2. The bequest to the monthly meetings of Women Friends, is for a charitable use, which is good and lawful, and they are capable of taking and distributing the charity, according to the will of the donor, in the most liberal and ample sort.

3. The bequest of the thirty pounds received by the father of the testatrix from Captain Newcastle, and the interest we consider to be intended as the payment of a debt which she considered herself to be morally and equitably bound to pay, and therefore direct it to be paid by the executor, as a debt of the estate, to such Indians as are the relations of the said Newcastle, if to be found; if not to be found, to remain subject to the future order of the court.

4. As to the devises to the Indians, our opinion is, that they are good and valid.

That the treasurer of the societies or meetings, or their committees for the time being, are capable of taking and distributing the fund as a trustee under their direction, and that Indians are proper objects of charitable bequests. But they are to be applied to the relief of such Indians as have heretofore been under the care and supervision of the yearly meetings, or their committees respectively, and to be distributed only for such objects and purposes as were customary in the lifetime of the testatrix, such being her manifest intention.

5. As to all the devises to or for the benefit of the different meetings of Friends in Baltimore, Virginia and Ohio, we are clearly of opinion that they are good and valid in law, and decree accordingly.

6. As to the bequest to the citizens of Winchester, to purchase a fire engine, we consider it good as a charitable use, or one tending to public profit and the safety of property, and in ease of taxes and burdens on the citizens. This is the substance and intent of the bequest, and, being given for a good and meritorious object, it is not material by what name it is given; whether to the corporation, or the citizens who compose it, it must take effect, notwithstanding any misnomer or other defects of name, form or circumstance.[4]

7. The bond of Isaac Zane appearing to us to have been assumed by the testatrix as honestly due by one of her near relations, ought to be considered in equity as a debt due, and be paid by the executor out of her estate, as such was evidently her intention, and from the evidence reported by the master we think the party now before the court entitled to receive it, and decree accordingly.

8. We order and decree that the administrator de bonis non make sale of the house and lot in Chestnut street at such time and place as the court may hereafter direct, or private sale, at his discretion.

9. Also to make sale of the Marlborough estate in Virginia, in the same manner, if such sale is authorized by the law of Virginia. If such sale is not authorized, then we order and direct the administrator to make application for such authority to the legislature or such judicial tribunal as by the law of that state is competent to authorize such sale, according to the will of the testatrix, or the order of this court.

[4] A voluntary association of individuals, who have contributed funds for a public purpose, will be regarded as a charity, and a court of equity in this state has jurisdiction over the parties. Funds supplied by the gift of the crown, or from the legislature, or from private gift, for legal, general or public purposes, are charitable funds, to be administered by a court of equity. Therefore, where money is given by will, gift, or voluntary contribution of individuals, to a voluntary, unincorporated hose company, or fire association, formed for general and public usefulness, without individual emolument or advantage, it is a charity over which a court of equity will exercise control. Thomas v. Ellmaker, 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 98.

We have been asked to go farther, and decree a sale of all the undevised estate of the testatrix, as necessary to provide a fund to meet the various legacies and bequests; the counsel who made the application considering that the residuary clause in the will was to be so construed that nothing should pass under it till all the former dispositions were satisfied. As the residuary devisees are not before the court, and would not be bound by its decree, we have not considered, and shall express no opinion on that subject—having no power to affect real property in another state, but through the parties in interest, or those having power over it, we must confine our order for the sale of the estate to such parts of it as are in the hands, or within the control of the administrator under the authority of the will. We have full power to see that the will be faithfully and religiously observed and executed, but none to order a sale not directed to be made by any of its provisions.

MAGILL (BANK OF UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 929.

MAGILL (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 15,706.

Case No. 8,953.

The MAGNA CHARTA.

[2 Lowell, 136.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. June, 1872.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—LAW OF THE FLAG—LEFT IN FOREIGN PORT—RATE OF WAGES.

1. The rights of seamen in respect to wages depend on the law of the flag, without regard to the nationality of the seamen themselves.

2. It appears to be the law of Great Britain, that when a seaman is hurt in the service of the ship, and left behind for that cause in a foreign port, and the cause is duly certified by the consul, the ship is responsible for his care and subsistence, but the wages stop.

[Cited in The W. L. White, 25 Fed. 505.]

3. Where such a seaman was so left behind, and the ship afterwards, on the same voyage, came back to the port and took the seaman on board again, and he served to the port of final discharge, and no new contract in writing was made with him, held, the presumption was that he was to have the rate of wages originally agreed on, though the market rate was lower at the foreign port.

4. But it would not be presumed that the seaman was to have wages for the whole voyage, including the time he was away from the ship.

5. So far as the wages only are concerned, it seems to be immaterial by the British law whether a seaman necessarily left behind at a foreign port for injuries received on board, was hurt in the service of the ship, or by his own fault. In either case the wages stop.

The libellant was shipped at New York for a voyage thence to Cette, in France, thence to Russia, and back to a port of discharge in the United States or British provinces, term not to exceed twelve months, at twenty-five dollars a month and received a month's advance. The vessel was registered as British, and the legal title was in a person living in Halifax, Nova Scotia, and the form of the articles was such as is required for such vessels. The voyage began 29th March, 1871; the vessel reached Cette in about thirty-five days, and lay there until 26th June, 1871. On the last-mentioned day, while the bark was still in port, the libellant fell from the cross-trees of the mizzen-mast while performing ship's duty, and was seriously hurt. He was sent to the hospital, where he remained for about seven months, and was wholly cured. The bark returned to Cette in January, 1872, and the libellant was taken on board again by the master, and served until the voyage ended at Boston, 28th May, 1872. The master tendered $71.50 in full for wages due the libellant, which he refused. Two certificates of the British consul at Cette were indorsed on the shipping articles: one, dated 26th June, 1871, that the seaman was left behind for sickness, not being able to go with the ship, and that the master had deposited certain sums for his wages and for hospital expenses; the second, under date 29th January, 1872, recited that the master refused to pay the remainder of the expenses, which was considerable. The answer of the master alleged that the seaman was drunk and unfit for duty, and was forbidden to go aloft, but insisted, and was injured by his own negligence; and that the reshipment at Cette was for fifteen dollars a month, a less rate of wages than the original hiring. There was conflicting evidence on both these points. Whether the ship was equitably owned by American citizens was likewise disputed.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

C. G. Thomas, for libellant, contended that the libellant was to have full wages for the whole time of the voyage.

J. Nickerson, for claimant.

LOWELL, District Judge. If American citizens transfer the legal title of their ship to a subject of Great Britain, and she is sailed under a British register, and the shipping articles conform to the change, I know of no law that authorizes me to apply our statutes to such a contract. The law of the flag must control in all such matters. In this case, indeed, there is no sufficient evidence that either the libellant or any owner of the vessel is one of our citizens; and the contract is clearly and wholly British. I must apply, therefore, as well as I may, the foreign law, which governs the rights of these parties. See The Pawashick [Case No. 10,851].

It seems to me that the merchant shipping act of 1854 [Pub. Gen. St. (17 & 18 Vict.) 663], §§ 185, 207, 209, have materially changed the maritime rule that seamen are not only to be cured at the expense of the ship, but to be paid wages until the end of the voyage. The first of these sections enacts that where the service of any seaman terminates before the period contemplated in the agreement, "by reason of his being left on shore at any place abroad, under a certificate of his unfitness or inability to proceed on the voyage, granted as hereinafter mentioned, such seaman shall be entitled to wages for the time of service prior to such termination as aforesaid, but not for any further period." What the certificate is appears by section 207, which makes it a misdemeanor for any master to leave behind any seaman, without obtaining the certificate of a consular officer, in writing, indorsed on the agreement, stating the fact, and the cause thereof; section 228 makes the owners responsible for the expenses and subsistence of a seaman, who receives any hurt or injury in the service of the ship, but does not say any thing about continuing his wages if he is obliged to leave the ship; and section 229 speaks of expenses in respect of the illness, injury, or hurt of any seaman whose wages are not accounted for to the consular officer, as before provided.

As I understand this law, the ship is liable for the expenses and subsistence of seamen who are hurt, but not for their wages, if they are left behind. All the parties to this controversy and the consul appear to have understood the law in this way. The master left with the consul the wages and a certain sum for expenses, and the consul certified to the fact and cause of the leaving behind. When the bark came back to Cette, the libellant did not demand, as of right, to be brought back, but asked the master whether he had filled his place. There appears to have been a dispute at this time between the master and the consul; for we find the latter certifying on the articles that the master refused to pay the full expenses of recovery and subsistence, though the man was injured in the service of the ship; and there is still a third certificate, not indorsed on the agreement, in which he says the master has paid one hundred and seventy-five francs for these expenses, though he had in fact paid only sixty-nine francs. The remainder must have been appropriated, by the master's consent, out of the money which he originally left for the wages of the seaman, and I understood the master to testify that the money was so obtained by the consul, though I do not know that he said it was done with his consent; but as he produces the certificate, and seems to have kept it for a voucher, his assent may be inferred. Here, then, we find evidence of a compromise, by which the master undertakes to bring home the man, and to have the whole sum left with the consul applied to the hospital expenses, which, after all, were only half satisfied. That this was the real purpose is evident; because the master, on his arrival here, tendered much more than was due for the home voyage, on his own theory of the contract, and says he did this to make up the loss of the wages which he says the consul had improperly retained.

Counsel have furnished me with no evidence of the construction of the merchant shipping act, and I have not succeeded in finding any adjudged cases; but the text-writers understand the law to be, that if the seaman is unable to proceed, and due certificate is made, the wages stop. This being so, it is not material to this case to inquire whether any fault of the libellant contributed to the injury, because that question only affects the liability for expenses and subsistence; and it is neither pleaded nor proved in this case that the master desires to recoup from the wages the sums spent for these expenses, but he himself voluntarily undertook to pay them. So far as mere wages are concerned, it is admitted by the pleadings, and by the conduct of the master throughout, that the libellant is entitled to his wages for the time he actually served; and the only dispute is, whether he is to have fifteen dollars or twenty-five dollars for the home voyage from Cette to Boston. In the uncertainty which arises from the direct contradiction between the only two witnesses who know any thing about the contract, the seaman must prevail, because section 160 of the statute requires the master to make his contract in writing before the consul, and declares that if he does not do so, the burden of proving the agreement shall be upon him; and the only prominent and clear fact being that he took the man on board again, and the consul so certifying in the paper produced by the master, I infer that he took him upon the old terms, which would be a reasonable and just contract under the circumstances, even although wages were a little lower at Cette than at New York. Indeed, I do not know that it would not be a presumption of law, in the absence of any new contract, that the old one was either revived or treated as having been only suspended.

Wages to be made up at $25 a month, deducting the time of libellant's absence from the vessel, and deducting all sums heretofore paid him. If this exceeds the sum tendered, he will have costs.

Case No. 8,954.

MAGNER v. JOHNSTON.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 249.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1827.

SALE—TIME OF PAYMENT—SUIT BROUGHT—ASSUMPSIT.

The plaintiff, in October, 1826, sold a horse to the defendant for his bill on the postmaster-general, payable on the 1st of January following. The defendant gave the bill, but countermanded it the next day; and acceptance was refused; held, that the plaintiff had no right of action of indebitatus assumpsit for the price of the horse, before the 1st of January.

Indebitatus assumpsit for $60, for a horse sold and delivered by the plaintiff [Thomas Magner] to the defendant [James W. Johnston]. The defendant offered evidence, that the original agreement was, that the plaintiff should sell the horse to the defendant for the plaintiff's draft or bill on the postmaster-general for $60, payable on the 1st of January, 1827. The sale was accordingly so made, on the 19th of October, 1826. The defendant drew the bill, and delivered it to the plaintiff, who delivered the horse to the defendant. The plaintiff, on the next day countermanded the bill; and acceptance was refused; and the plaintiff on the same day, (October 20,) brought this action of indebitatus assumpsit, for the price of the horse.

Mr. Wallach, for defendant, contended, that the plaintiff had brought his action too soon; he should have waited till after the 1st of January. Dutton v. Solomonson, 3 Bos. & P. 582.

Mr. Morfit, contrà, cited Chit. Bills, 128, note c; Puckford v. Maxwell, 6 Term R. 52; Stedman v. Gooch, 1 Esp. 5.

THE COURT, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) at the request of the defendant's counsel, instructed the jury, that if they should be satisfied by the evidence, that it was part of the original contract of sale, and a condition thereof, that the plaintiff should take the defendant's draft on the postmaster-general, payable on the 1st of January, the plaintiff cannot recover in this action of indebitatus assumpsit for the price of the horse, the plaintiff having commenced his action before the 1st of January, although the defendant himself was the cause of the non-acceptance of the draft.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 8,955.

The MAGNET.

[Brown, Adm. 547.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. Feb., 1875.

SEAMEN'S WAGES — FORFEITURE FOR DESERTION AND MISCONDUCT.

1. Where a seaman employed upon a steamboat by the month left before the expiration of the month he was then serving, held, his entire unpaid wages were forfeited.

[See The Almatia, Case No. 254; The Balize, Id. 809.]

2. Where the second engineer is employed by the first engineer, the latter has a right to discharge him for good cause, without, and even against, the consent of the master.

3. Where an engineer wilfully deranged his engine, in order to compel the boat to stop at a certain port at which he desired to leave, it was held such misconduct as worked a forfeiture of wages.

The libel was filed by John B. Howard for a balance due him as wages for services as first engineer on the steamer during a portion of the navigation season of 1871. The balance claimed to be due was $175. The defense was desertion and improper conduct.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry B. Brown, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

H. B. Brown, for libellant.
W. A. Moore, for claimant.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The law of this case was determined by this court in the case of The John Martin [Case No. 7,357]. It only remains to determine whether, under the law, the proofs make out a case of desertion and forfeiture of wages. That libellant left without the consent of the master, and with the intention not to return, was fully proven, and was not disputed. The only questions therefore are, whether he had the right to leave when he did, under his contract; and if not, then whether he had just cause for leaving. At the hearing there was some dispute whether the hiring of libellant was expressly for the entire season of navigation, or by the month simply, without any express understanding as to the term of service. I think the latter is sustained by the proofs; but it is of no great importance which it was, because it was clearly proven and was undisputed that libellant left before the expiration of the month upon which he had then entered. This, as was decided by this court in the case of The John Martin, supra, was a leaving before the term of service agreed on had expired. Libellant, therefore, had no right to leave when he did, under his contract. Had libellant just cause for leaving? The only cause urged or pretended was that he was dissatisfied with his second engineer on account, as alleged, of his habitual drunkenness, and that the master refused to discharge him. The proofs show that libellant as first engineer, had the right to employ his second, and that he actually exercised that right in the employment of the second engineer, in regard to whom the above mentioned complaint was made. This carried with it and vested in libellant the right to discharge the second engineer for good cause, without, and even against, the consent of the master; and habitual drunkenness would be a good cause, if such was the fact. There was, however, a preponderance of evidence that such was not the fact, but that libellant, having made up his mind to leave, the complaint as to the second engineer's habits was a mere excuse for leaving. I think, therefore, for both reasons, there was no just cause for libellant's leaving. Libellant so left during a voyage, after the steamer had left her home port, and at a place where it was difficult to supply his place, causing considerable delay in the prosecution of the voyage, and thus resulting in damages to the owners to an amount much larger than the balance of wages then due. Under all these circumstances it must be held that libellant's leaving was a desertion, within the meaning of the maritime law, and that the same worked an entire forfeiture of the balance of his wages then due. There was, however, still another cause of forfeiture independent of the desertion. By a preponderance of evidence it appeared that on the way from Detroit to Port Huron, where libellant left, he wilfully, and for the purpose of compelling the steamer to stop at Port Huron, deranged the engine. It was conceded at the hearing, and as is no doubt the law, that if so found by the court, this fact alone would be sufficient cause of forfeiture of wages. Libel dismissed.

Case No. 8,956.

MAGNIAC et al. v. THOMPSON.

[Baldw. 344.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1831.[2]

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—DECLARATIONS OF DEBTOR—FUTURE MARRIAGE—SETTLEMENT—PRIOR DEBTS—EXTRAVAGANCE—RECORDATION.

1. To make a contract void under the 13th Eliz., for fraud against creditors, both parties must concur in the fraud.[2]

[Cited in Ashby v. Steere, Case No. 576.]

2. The declarations of the debtor are not evidence to defeat the title of the grantor, under a conveyance alleged to be fraudulent.

3. A contract or conveyance, in consideration of a future marriage, is within the sixth section of the statute of 13 Eliz., if bona fide and without notice of fraud, &c.[2]

[Cited in brief in Appeal of Madeira (Pa. Sup.) 4 Atl. 910.]

4. Marriage is a consideration as valuable as money, if bona fide, &c.[2]

5. If a marriage contract is executed, the wife is a purchaser, and the contract is valid though the husband was in debt at the time.[2]

6. If the contract is executory, she is a creditor till it is performed. If part executed, she is pro tanto a purchaser, and a creditor for the residue.

7. The husband has the same right to prefer his wife in completing a settlement pursuant to articles before marriage as he has to prefer any other creditor.[2]

8. Whether her position is as a purchaser or creditor, her rights are the same as purchasers for money, or creditors by bond. Her trustee is the purchaser or creditor at law, and she in equity.

9. If a contract before marriage could be enforced at law or in equity, the voluntary performance by the husband is as valid as if done under a judgment or decree, and is good against creditors who have no lien.[2]

10. The consideration of marriage being deemed valuable, a court of law will not estimate it in comparison with the settlement, equity may do it.

11. After the marriage, the marriage articles will not be presumed to have been abandoned by any delay or negligence of the trustee in their execution.

12. A covenant in the marriage articles by the father of the intended wife, to stand seised to her use, after marriage, of a piece of real estate, does not operate after marriage, to pass the legal estate by the statute of uses (27 Hen. VIII.), the use remains executory in the trustee and his heir at law.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry Baldwin, Circuit Justice.]

[2] [Affirmed in 7 Pet. (32 U. S.) 348.]

13. Where by the marriage articles the husband was to erect a house and furnish it as he thought fit, an indiscreet expenditure for furniture is not, per se, fraudulent against creditors, unless it is so extravagant as at first blush to indicate a fraudulent motive, the creditors of the husband may take the excess.

14. Where the sum stipulated by articles before marriage has not been made up, the husband may do it afterwards on the eve of a judgment against him, if done in performance of the articles, or so accepted by the trustee.

15. Marriage articles are not affected by not being recorded within the time prescribed by the laws of New Jersey.[2]

This case was tried on a feigned issue made up by agreement of parties, for the purpose of ascertaining whether John R. Thompson, the defendant, had any means wherewith to pay a debt claimed by the plaintiffs, or means by the property in his marriage settlement, or otherwise, of satisfying a certain judgment in their favour against him. The agreement was made the 3d of June, 1830. On the 27th of November, 1827, the plaintiffs obtained a judgment in this court against the defendant for 22,191 dollars, an action of debt was brought upon it to April, 1829, in the circuit court of New Jersey, and judgment confessed the 1st of October, 1829 for 24,652 dollars, an alias capias ad satisfaciendum was issued on the judgment to April, 1830, on which the defendant was committed, of this judgment about 12,000 dollars remained due at the time of the agreement. The debt to the plaintiffs was contracted under the following circumstances. The defendant had resided some years at Canton, he left it in March, 1825 to return to the United States, leaving Mr. Rodney Fisher his agent, with full powers to transact business for him, having previously been introduced to the plaintiffs, merchants residing in Canton, by the defendant, as his agent. In November, 1825, Edward Thompson, the father of defendant, had two ships in Canton, for which he could not procure cargoes for the want of funds or credit, Mr. Fisher, as agent for defendant, made up an invoice of goods to the amount of 42,000 dollars, on which he took up from the plaintiffs 30,000 dollars on the 22d of November, 1825; on the 2d of December, 1825 he made up another invoice of 44,000 dollars, on which plaintiff advanced 33,000 dollars, the goods were pledged to the plaintiffs, and shipped on board of the vessels of Edward Thompson, the defendant had no interest in the transaction except his commissions. The goods arrived at this place, and were sold at a loss of 46,000 dollars on the invoice. The judgment of the plaintiffs was for the balance of their advances on the two invoices. The defendant returned to this place in June, 1825, shortly after which he paid his addresses to Miss Stockton, in July an engagement of marriage took place between them, and between that and September proposals of a settlement on her were made by him, and before the agreement was put in writing, had begun to erect a house on the lot therein mentioned. On the 19th of December, 1825, articles of agreement and covenant were made between the defendant, Miss Stockton, and her father Richard Stockton, reciting the intended marriage, and the previous promise of Mr. Stockton to give his daughter a lot of four or five acres near Princeton, "on which lot the said J. R. Thompson has begun to build a house." It was then stipulated, that from and after the marriage, Mr. Stockton should stand seised of the lot and all buildings to be erected thereon, in trust, to permit the parties during their joint lives to reside thereon if they think proper, if not, then the rents to be paid to his daughter during their joint lives. If Thompson should survive her and have issue, he to occupy the lot and house, or to receive the rents for the maintenance and support of himself and family; after his death, in trust for the children of the marriage as tenants in common, if there should be no children then, on the death of either party, in trust for the survivor. Thompson stipulated that if the marriage took effect, and in consideration thereof, he would, with convenient speed, build and furnish said house in a suitable manner as he shall judge fit and proper, which, with all erections, improvements, furniture and additions shall be subject to said trusts, so far as they are applicable to each species of property, and will, in one year after the marriage, place out on good security 40,000 dollars, and hand over and assign the evidences thereof to Mr. Stockton, who shall hold the same in trust; to receive the interest for her use during their joint lives, and her receipt to be good; if she dies leaving issue, to pay the same to Thompson for his and their support without account, and after his death to the children in equal parts; if she survives and has issue, then on the same trusts for her; if either dies without issue, then in trust for the survivor. Thompson had permission to act as the agent, and to change the securities from time to time. It was mutually agreed that the trustee should not be held guilty of a breach of trust for not acting, unless expressly requested to do so by one of the parties, and not to be held answerable as trustee, unless for acts of wilful neglect or misconduct. Vide [Magniac v. Thompson] 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 349. The marriage took place the 28th of December, 1825. Thompson proceeded to finish the house, which cost about 13,000 dollars, and furnished it, which cost about 5000 dollars, but made no investments on security, or other provision for the 40,000 dollars, during the life of Mr. Stockton, who appears to have taken no measures to compel the completion of the settlement. After his death, Thompson, on the 29th of September, 1829, indorsed to Captain Stockton, as trustee for Mrs. Thompson, on account of the 40,000 dollars, one note for 5000 dollars, which was good, and another of one Morris for 4500 dollars, which was considered doubtful, nothing more was paid on that account. The agreement was proved the 5th of April, 1830, and recorded the 22d of May, 1830. It appears that on his return from Canton, Mr. Thompson was worth about 90,000 dollars, and owed but a small amount of debts; he was under heavy responsibilities for his father, by whom he lost a very large sum. From the statements produced and verified at the trial, the amount of what Mr. Thompson was worth in 1825, was accounted for, and no proof was given that he had concealed, secreted, or kept any thing for his own use, he appeared to be in possession of no property, real or personal, or to have any control over any. The cause turned on the validity and effect of the marriage contract, the conduct of the parties to it, and the mode of its execution. The insolvency of Edward Thompson was publicly known on the 19th of November, 1825. On the 19th of December, 1825, previous to the drawing up of the articles, Thompson made a written statement directed to Mr. Stockton, in substance as follows: "I have no personal debts except to a small amount in common course of business and living. I am surety for my father to S. & L. in a respondentia bond for 200,000 dollars, if the goods sell reasonably well there can be no loss, the freight premiums on dollars and commissions tend to enhance the security, &c., there can therefore be no demand on me. On no fair principle can the loss be more than 20,000 dollars and I consider myself worth that amount, if not more, in addition to the sum proposed to be settled." Signed "J. R. T., December 19th, 1825." Indorsed: "Statement made to the trustee by J. R. T. as the basis of the settlement, and upon which it was made. R. Stockton." Id. 353.

[2] [Affirmed in 7 Pet. (32 U. S.) 348.]

Joseph R. Ingersoll, for plaintiff.

The plaintiff is a meritorious creditor, as to whom the marriage settlement is void for fraud, on account of its having been concealed till after the judgment in New Jersey, and not having been carried into effect substantially. Any conveyance or gift after marriage is void per se, if the husband was indebted at the time (3 Johns. Ch. 492); as to subsequent debts the presumption is in favour of the settlement, (Id. 502); subsequent creditors may avoid it by showing debts existing before, due to other creditors (12 Serg. & R. 448). An ante-nuptial settlement may be good if it is fair, and the bulk of the husband's property is subject to his debts, his mere indebtedness will not invalidate it, and if there is no fraud (1 Rop. Prop. 298), it will be enforced in equity, so far as it is consistent with the policy and principles of law (2 Kent, Comm. 144), provided it be reasonable and not extravagant (Reeve, Dom. Rel. 176). A man in debt may make a valid sale of his property, if it is fair and for good and adequate consideration bona fide and not to withdraw it from his creditors. So he may settle it before marriage, but if the settlement is disproportionate to his means, it is suspicious, and may be held fraudulent as to creditors. 12 Serg. & R. 456; [Sexton v. Wheaton] 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 238; 2 Kent, Comm. 146. At the time of this settlement Thompson was in fact worth nothing, the failure of his father was known, and he then estimated his loss at 20,000 dollars, leaving himself worth 60,000 dollars, the settlement required 58,000 dollars, which presents strong ground of suspicion of a design to defraud his creditors. Vide 17 Ves. 263; 1 Rop. Prop. 296, 298. Thompson was to have the control of the fund, to appear as the owner with a power of substituting and changing the investment, equivalent to a power of revocation, which is a strong badge of fraud. He had begun to erect the house before the articles were executed, and with the permission of Mr. Stockton, which would give the creditors a right to take it as Thompson's, on the same principle that permitting a party to make improvements, shall prevent the owner from disturbing him in their enjoyment (2 Atk. 83; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 326, pl. 10; 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 532, pl. 3), or the acceptance of rent which binds the party to confirm a lease (3 Atk. 692). The settlement was never acknowledged, it was proved but not recorded till two days before the capias ad satisfaciendum issued against Thompson; on this account it was void by the laws of New Jersey, which declares all deeds and conveyances to be void as against subsequent judgment creditors unless acknowledged and recorded in fifteen days after their execution. R. L. N. J. 747. As the contract was not a gift, it operated as a deed to Thompson as a purchaser of the lot, investing him with the title so as to make it liable to his creditors if the contract was not recorded so as to give notice of the trust. This principle is settled in 1 Desaus. Eq. 401, 2 Desaus. Eq. 254, in which cases, the debt was contracted after the settlement was recorded, yet having been recorded after the time required by law, the property settled was held to be subject to the debt. In this case the settlement seems to have been abandoned, it remained pocketed till Thompson was arrested on a capias ad satisfaciendum, he remained in possession of the house as apparent owner, no application was made to him to make any investment of the 40,000 dollars or any part, and he did not offer to make any till the 29th of September, 1829, the day before the judgment, when he delivered over the two notes which he had till then retained. The contract, though in form calling for a settlement, has never been treated by the parties as having any substantial efficacy as between the parties, and their conduct has precluded them from now setting it up against the plaintiffs. Every thing that has been done towards its execution has been since the marriage and the pressure of the plaintiffs' debt; so that in effect and substance it is a post-nuptial contract, which is not good if the consideration does not have a reasonable proportion to the settlement. 2 Kent, Comm. 145, 146. It is under these circumstances a voluntary settlement after marriage, which is void against previous creditors. Ridgeway v. Underwood [Case No. 11,815]. To complete it, required more than Thompson was worth at the time; his father's insolvency was well known, and it was as well known that the settlement could not be completed but at the expense and with the funds of his creditors. A party claiming under such an agreement, which necessarily withdraws property of a debtor from his creditors, ought to be held to all the forms and rules of law in carrying it into execution; it was to have been completed in one year from the marriage, but was abandoned, when Thompson's affairs were wound up and found desperate. The parties could not revive it in 1829, if the delivery of the notes was intended to apply to it, it was, however, as a mere colour, for the agreement was not recorded till seven months afterwards. Though ante-nuptial contracts are highly favoured in courts of law and equity, they ought not to be so at the expense of creditors, especially when, as in this case, it was evident that it could not be completed by Thompson's own means. It must have been ascertained before the house was finished and furnished, that the 40,000 dollars could not be invested for the purposes of the trust; the expenditure of 18,000 dollars for the establishment, without any income to support it, was incompatible with the situation of Thompson, it was extravagant, and indicated an intention not consistent with good faith towards creditors. As Thompson was by the agreement to have the use of the house and furniture, the expenditure of 5000 dollars on the latter was, per se, a fraud on creditors; an insolvent man will not be permitted to apply the money of his creditors for the purposes of useless ostentation, or to gratify the pride of his family.

Joseph P. Norris and Mr. Binney, for defendant.

The burthen of proving fraud is on the plaintiffs. If there was any fraud, the parties interested in this suit are not implicated in it, the settlement was agreed on when Mr. Thompson believed he was worth 90,000 dollars, there has been no concealment of property, or any conduct of his which indicates any actual or intended fraud at that time, but the contrary appears by a reference to the facts honestly believed at that time to exist. The settlement is not contrary to law, it was a covenant to stand seised to uses, which is completely binding on its execution without recording [Carver v. Jackson] 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 82; and not a conveyance at common law. The time of investing the portion was not of the essence of the contract, it was good whenever made to carry the contract into effect. An ante-nuptial contract is good against husband and creditors (1 Rop. Prop. 297); where the consideration of marriage intervenes, the obligation is perfect and binding (2 Rop. Prop. 33; 17 Ves. 262); though the party is in debt, it is good against creditors, if there is no legal or actual fraud, and made as a bona fide performance of a moral obligation, its specific performance will be decreed in equity (3 Johns. Ch. 494, and cases cited; 2 Kent, Comm. 145; 3 Johns. Ch. 554; 2 Desaus. Eq. 264); who will go further to protect the wife than the husband (2 P. Wms. 700); it will not be avoided by a subsequent act of bankruptcy (Ath. Mar. Sett. 373; 1 Atk. 158, 189; 2 Atk. 445; Cro. Jac. 158); nor will fraud be presumed without manifest proof (2 Com. Dig. [Day's Ed.] 616; 2 Ch. Cas. 85, 114). The title was in Mr. Stockton, who was not bound to convey, but was to hold the property for the purposes of the marriage, on a trust not executed by the statute of uses, but which remained executory from its nature. 1 Vent. 194. If the settlement was not good, the title to the lot did not revert to Thompson, it was good between the parties, the plaintiffs might have levied on it, as well as on the house and furniture under the judgment in New Jersey, or might have proceeded in chancery. In the latter case, the defendant would have had the benefit of his oath, in this suit he cannot be heard, and therefore the plaintiff ought to be held to clear proof of fraud in fact. From the terms of the marriage articles, taken with reference to the then situation of Mr. Thompson, no fraud is imputable in law, he had no knowledge of debts contracted in Canton only a month before; he was not about embarking in any hazardous speculation, as in the case of Thomson v. Dougherty, 12 Serg. & R. 448, &c., but was about to retire from business on a competency, his responsibility on the inchoate agreement for a settlement, and the engagement of marriage attached three months before his agent contracted a debt to plaintiffs. The bona fides of that contract cannot be questioned, for though he had means then in his hands, he did not apply them to the investment of the 40,000 dollars, but suffered them to go to his father's debts. That there was a verbal contract previous to the written one, is evident from his having begun the erection of a house before it was signed. While Mr. Stockton had no security for the 40,000 dollars, the plaintiff had on an advance of 63,000 dollars a pledge of invoices amounting to 86,000, and of the money advanced to Mr. Fisher, Thompson received nothing. Under such circumstances there is no legal presumption or evidence of fraud intended by him, still less by Mr. and Miss Stockton; it is indeed a singular imputation of a design to defraud creditors, when none of the parties had a knowledge that there were creditors. When Thompson promised to make the settlement, in the summer of 1825, he was not in debt, such promises were binding before the statute of frauds, though not in writing, and equity would have decreed a specific performance, such agreements are always made before they are reduced to writing, the good faith of which is shown by giving time to complete the settlement. Vide [Sexton v. Wheaton] 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 238, &c. Marriage is a consideration higher than any other known to the law. 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 585. It cannot be measured, nothing in exchange for it is excessive or extravagant (unless so gross as to be evidence of fraud), because it cannot be restored or compensation made. The man becomes a debtor to the trustee of his intended wife and to her, either of whom may apply to equity to enforce the contract, without any reference to the proportion between the wife's portion and the sum to be settled. This may be necessary in post-nuptial contracts, but though the wife is to bring no portion, an antenuptial contract is good, per se, against purchasers and creditors, or if made after marriage, in pursuance of an agreement before, whether the purchaser had notice or not, unless he has the legal estate (Ath. Mar. Sett. 125, 128, 149, 151; 1 P. Wms. 277), or the creditor had a lien. Where a father held land on a secret trust, and conveyed it to his daughter on her marriage, the husband, having no notice of the trust before marriage, held it discharged therefrom (2 Rolle, 105); marriage is a purchase of the most favoured kind (1 Vent. 194; 1 Ch. Cas. 99); not on account of the wife's portion, but the marriage (1 Atk. 158, 190); contracts in consideration of marriage are equally protected (2 Ves. Sr. 304, 308; Amb. 121; 5 Ves. 878); no instance is known where a settlement in consideration of marriage has been set aside, unless the intended wife was a party to the fraud (2 Dick. 504, 506; 17 Ves. 263, 268); marriage is a sufficient consideration on which to set aside a former voluntary settlement, or deed (Cowp. 712; 6 Ves. 752). Claims of creditors, unless by judgment, are no objection to the execution of a marriage contract or articles, for though voluntary in their creation, they are the inducement to the marriage, and good against antecedent creditors, unless the wife knew that bounty to her was a fraud on them. Finch, Prec. 377, 402, 405, and cases cited. Wherever the husband can make a valid sale, he can make a valid settlement without any money consideration (1 Swanst. 319), and where the contract is executory, she is the most favoured creditor, and will be preferred unless she has done something to postpone herself. No act of the trustee in neglecting to have the settlement completed could affect her, as equity would protect her rights; if the trustee should abandon or surrender the fund agreed to be settled, equity would make the person who held it a trustee for the wife, or if she should consent to it, equity would protect it for the issue of the marriage, who are deemed parties to the contract as purchasers under it. In this case there could be no abandonment by the husband, the trustee or the wife, there was no necessity of recording the articles because no one could purchase without notice, while Thompson and wife were in possession, which is notice of title. If the omission to record had any effect, it was not to vest the property in Thompson, so as to make it liable to his debts, but to expose it to the creditors of Mr. Stockton, who held the legal title. Thompson was not made the agent to manage the fund by the agreement, he could act as such only by the permission and under the control of the trustee. In marriage settlements, the possession of the property settled must be joint, if consistent with their terms, such possession is no badge of fraud. He was a debtor under the marriage contract, and had a right to make payment in any manner agreed upon to comply with it; the house was to be suitably furnished, so as he might deem fit, the want of an inventory did not make it fraudulent (Ath. Mar. Sett. 173; 6 East, 281; 17 Ves. 272); the articles were executory, the use never was executed; they are considered as instructions by which to draw the formal settlement, and may be executed cy pres (Ath. Mar. Sett. 92, 106). On a covenant to stand seised to the uses of a marriage, they are executory till the uses are well raised by a deed. The amount expended on furniture does not affect the contract on the ground of fraud, if it is extravagant, the surplus is liable to execution by creditors. As the contract remained executory till the settlement was executed, Thompson might make the investments at any time on account of the 40,000 dollars in payment of the debt he had contracted, his transfer of the securities in 1829, was in part execution of the contract, which was no fraud on creditors, because he had a right to pay the debt due on the marriage contract in preference to the debt to the plaintiff. There is no evidence that these securities were transferred collusively or colourably, with any fraudulent purpose.

C. J. Ingersoll, for plaintiffs.

The defendant stands in the position of an applicant for the benefit of the insolvent laws, who must be able to take the oath required by the act of congress. 1 Story's Laws, 715 [2 Stat. 4]. From the nature of the issue in this case, he is bound to prove affirmatively that he has no property, by accounting for all the property which has been traced to his hands, which he has not done, and he cannot honestly take the oath prescribed by that law. He stands here on a presumption of fraud which he must rebut, the plaintiffs complain of fraud by the concealment and abstraction of property which they may prove by circumstances or negatives pregnant. It is admitted that Thompson has applied 27,500 dollars to the marriage contract, of which he has the use, which is equal to an income to the amount of the interest of that sum; the meaning and effect of the settlement, so far as executed is, that his property has been given to his wife's trustee to keep for him, and prevent the plaintiffs from recovering their debt, under cover of the agreement which had been abandoned. Admitting marriage to be a consideration however high, the contract may be impeached for fraud on a prior creditor, as the plaintiff was in this case, and the adequacy of the settlement will be inquired into; in the case cited from 1 P. Wms. 277, the judgment was after the articles, and the chancellor said that the consideration paid must be somewhat adequate to the thing purchased, or a judgment between the articles and the deed would be let in. Id. 282, 283. A purchase by marriage is in all respects on the same footing as for money, so is a creditor by marriage articles; marriage is but a civil contract between the parties, and where third persons are concerned, is examined and construed like other contracts, and will not be suffered to be available to withdraw a debtor's property from the reach of his creditors, or to defeat a trust under which he holds the property of others. The case cited from 2 Rolle, 105, was not finally decided; it was adjourned (Id. 116); in the case from 1 Vent. 194, and 1 Ch. Cas. 99, no question concerning creditors arose, the conveyances in consideration of marriage were held not to be voluntary and so fraudulent; the case in 1 Ves. Sr. 304, goes no further than to put a settlement after marriage, in consideration of a portion paid, on the same footing as if made before; so of the cases referred to by Ath. Mar. Sett. 28, 31, 39, 81, 160, 301; but the case in 6 East, 257, 280, shows that the consideration of a post-nuptial settlement will be compared with the sum paid by the wife, and if the latter was inadequate, would be set aside on account of abstracting the husband's property from his creditors, and a new trial was directed for the purpose of ascertaining the state of the husband's debts. Id. 282, 283. The law is settled in this state, that though a deed is for a good and valuable consideration between the parties, it is fraudulent in law against existing creditors. 1 Rawle, 353. The law respecting marriage settlements is the same here as in England; yet where a husband entered into articles with trustees to secure to his wife a legacy left her by her grandmother, which he received, but did not execute a mortgage till he was insolvent, and soon after declared a bankrupt; the mortgage was held void, though the husband was solvent when he made the articles. Rundle v. Murgatroyd, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 304. Indebtedness at the time is the true criterion of legal fraud, where the settlement is voluntary or for an inadequate consideration [Sexton v. Wheaton] 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 242; and the cases referred to are full to the point, that no settlement on a family is good against previous creditors. [Hinde v. Longworth], 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 213, 214. The supreme court lay down the law to be, that valuable must also be an adequate consideration. Sexton v. Wheaton, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 507. In this case the inadequacy is apparent, the completion of the settlement would require more than Thompson was worth, according to his own statement previous to the articles; he said he was worth 20,000 dollars more than the sum to be settled, if his losses did not exceed 20,000 dollars. Now the sum to be settled was 40,000 dollars, the house cost 13,000 dollars, the furniture 5,000 dollars, absorbing his whole surplus excepting 2,000 dollars, according to the statement which was the basis of the settlement; besides, there was notice of Thompson being surety for an insolvent to the amount of 200,000, this was clear proof that it was intended to settle his whole estate, and as the fact turned out, the settlement, as partially made, has absorbed his whole property. This taints the contract strongly with actual fraud, but as a badge of fraud in law, it is inherent in the contract itself as matter of law; the fact that a debtor conveys or settles his whole estate, makes it fraudulent, per se, against creditors; so are all the authorities in law and equity, from Twyne's Case, 3 Coke, 80, to Cathcart v. Robinson, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 281, however valuable the consideration may be if the purchaser knows of the existence of the debt. It was not material whether Richard Stockton was a party to the fraud, all the parties knew of the failure of Edward Thompson before the contract, and the consequent insolvency of defendant; yet by the terms of this agreement, he was at liberty to build such a house and to furnish it as he pleased, to be the agent of the trustee, with uncontrolled power to change the securities at his pleasure, which are all strong badges of fraud. The legal effect of the covenant of Richard Stockton, to stand seised to the uses of the agreement, was a conveyance of the house, lot and furniture to Thompson and wife, as a use executed on the marriage by the statute of uses. 27 Hen. VIII.; 2 Ruff. 227. The extravagant expenditure for furniture is, in itself, a fraud on creditors, it was not suited to Thompson's condition, and was made after his known insolvency and inability to complete the settlement. The marriage contract was a mere cover under which to conceal the property of Thompson, the first attempt to make any provision for an investment was the delivery of the securities to Captain Stockton, on the day before the confession of the judgment in New Jersey, which was a fraud, per se, on the plaintiffs. There was no delivery of the agreement, which never took effect in law, no act of the parties to give it notoriety; it was a secret conveyance, and void (Twyne's Case, 3 Coke, 81); there was no recognition of its existence as a binding contract in the lifetime of the original trustee, and no act of the parties by which the public could judge of their true situation. I am aware that courts in England have gone great lengths in supporting marriage settlements, they have indeed adopted principles which protect concubines as well as wives against creditors; but they have grown out of the corruption of manners there, and have not been sanctioned here. The rules which protect creditors against the fraudulent acts of their debtors, have been broken down, and men in debt have been permitted to provide for their families by nuptial contracts, made under circumstances which would invalidate a conveyance for any other consideration. But these decisions are not founded on the principles of the common law, and the affirmative statutes of 13 & 27 Eliz., as adopted in this country, which repudiate a contract like the present, and treated as it has been by the parties, as fraudulent in fact and by the policy of the law.

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The real parties to this suit are the plaintiffs and Mrs. Thompson, and the real question between them is, whether the marriage contract was valid, if it was, then Mr. Thompson had a right to apply his property towards its fulfilment, and it is lawfully held by the trustees of Mrs. Thompson. If the contract is not valid, then Mr. Thompson is in law deemed to be the legal owner in trust for his creditors, not because the marriage contract is not binding on him, but because his indebtedness at the time put it out of his power to divest himself of property to the injury of his creditors. It appears that the plaintiffs are the only creditors of Mr. Thompson, the existence of the debt is proved by Mr. Fisher, and the judgments confessed by Thompson, which are conclusive against him as to its existence and amount; they are also legal evidence to affect the settlement by showing the indebtedness of Mr. Thompson at the time. Hinde v. Longworth, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 210. No evidence has been offered to impeach the fairness of the debt, and you will take it as proved. The case must turn on the validity of the marriage contract, which is good as between the parties and as to all the world, unless it is liable to impeachment for fraud in fact or fraud in law. As to creditors, fraud in fact, or actual fraud, consists in an intention to injure, defraud, delay or prevent them from recovering their just debts, by any contract, gift, deed, settlement or agreement, withdrawing or attempting to withdraw the property of a debtor from the reach of his creditors. The English statute of 13 Eliz. c. 5, declares all such acts null and void as to creditors, this statute is in affirmance of the common law, is in force in this state and New Jersey, and you will consider it as binding as a law of the state. Proof of fraud need not be express, it may be inferred from circumstances, but ought not to be presumed without either, a jury ought to be satisfied from facts that there was a dishonest intention, and not to infer fraud merely because they have doubts of the fairness of the transaction. From the conduct and situation of the parties, and the effects intended to be produced by the act, something should be made to appear inconsistent with integrity, so as to admit no reasonable interpretation but meditated fraud. [Conard v. Nicoll] 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 295, 297. Both parties to the alleged act of fraud must concur in the illegal design, the debtor may lawfully sell his property, or prefer one creditor to another, with the direct intention of defrauding other creditors, but unless the purchaser or preferred creditor receives the property with the same fraudulent design, the contract is valid [Sexton v. Wheaton] 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 238, &c., against other creditors or purchasers who may be injured by the transaction. The admissions or declarations of the debtor, as to the object intended to be effected, are evidence to contradict his answer to a bill brought to annul the act as fraudulent, but not to affect the parties claiming under it, or to have a bearing on the whole case [Venable v. Bank of U. S.] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 119, 120; 2 Hals [7 N. J. Law] 173, 174; you must therefore have evidence to affect Mrs. Thompson and her trustee Mr. Richard Stockton with fraud, in participating and concurring in the fraudulent intention, before you can pronounce this marriage contract void for actual fraud.

The facts of this case, which are not complicated, are for your consideration, they seem more satisfactory than are usual in such cases, and we think proper to say, that in our opinion an inference of intention as fraud, would be a very severe comment on the conduct of the parties; it is however for you to decide, and if you think there was intentional fraud in both parties, you will find for plaintiffs. You are to decide another matter of fact, whether Mr. Thompson has concealed or has in his possession any part of the property he owned in 1825, other than what has been invested in the house and furniture and the securities in the hands of Captain Stockton, in doing which, you will discriminate between the deliberate design to defraud by secreting property for his own use, and losses incurred by casualties and want of prudence or discretion. This question depends on what he has in his actual possession or control, not what he ought to have had, what he has disposed of for any other use than his own, or what has been applied to the marriage contract, which is a subject of distinct consideration. The next and most important question is, whether the marriage contract is fraudulent in law, and for that reason void as against the plaintiff, that is, though the intention of the parties was honest, the policy of the law forbids the execution of the contract, and takes from it all legal efficacy as to the creditors of Thompson. By the sixth section of the statute of 13 Eliz., it is provided, that it shall not extend to any interest in land or goods and chattels, made on good consideration, bona fide, lawfully conveyed or assured to any person, not having at the time of such conveyance or assurance to them made, any manner of notice or knowledge of such fraud, covin or collusion. The words of the law require that both parties must concur in the fraud, so it has been held for two hundred and sixty years. There are in law two kinds of consideration, "good," which is natural love and affection, and "valuable," which is money or marriage; the word "good" in the sixth section has always been held both in courts of law and equity to mean a valuable consideration.

Hence the law has been expounded to embrace three kinds of conveyances: (1) Those made with a fraudulent intent in both parties, which are declared void as well by the enacting part of the law as by the exemption from the saving in the sixth section, without regard to the consideration. (2) Voluntary conveyances made for good consideration, without fraud in fact, but as they tend to defraud creditors if they vest the property, the policy of the law makes them void for legal fraud, which it imputes to them on account of their tendency, which is deemed equivalent to actual fraud. (3) Conveyances for valuable consideration, bona fide, without notice of any fraud or covin by the person receiving the conveyance, which are excepted out of the statute, are valid at common law to pass the property conveyed, and entitle the purchasers to the protection of all courts. If you should find that this contract does not come within the first class, it cannot come within the second, for if made in contemplation of marriage, the intended wife is on the footing of a creditor or a purchaser for money, and not of a voluntary grantee for the mere consideration of love and affection, or as a volunteer. There is a marked difference between a provision for a wife and children before and after marriage, where there is no portion or money paid as the consideration; in the first, the consideration is as valuable as the debt due a creditor, or the money paid by a purchaser, in the latter it is merely voluntary. There is indeed a moral obligation to provide for the support and comfort of a family, but it must yield to the higher legal obligation towards those who have claims on the property of their debtors. As between creditors and volunteers a man must be just before he is generous. But where conflicting claims arise between creditor and creditor, purchaser and purchaser, or purchaser and creditor, the first inquiry is, whether the party claiming the debt or the property purchased has such a right as is recognized by a court of law; the next is whether such right has been acquired under such circumstances as will annul or modify it in a court of chancery by the established principles of equity. As between debtor and creditor the latter has a right to as much of the debtor's property as will pay his debt, but the debtor may prefer one creditor to another, or give all his property to one, and it is neither fraud in fact or law without covin or collusion. He may make a sale of his whole estate, turn it into money, and distribute it at pleasure among his creditors, and the bona fide purchaser will hold it against all creditors who have not previous liens. [Sexton v. Wheaton] 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 242; [Hinde v. Longworth] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 213, 214. These principles cannot be shaken.

A contract in consideration of a future marriage creates a legal and equitable obligation to perform it in good faith; if the contract is executed, the parties become purchasers, if it remains executory till after marriage, they become creditors after its consummation, or assume pro tanto the character and rights of both, if executed only in part, entitled to the protection of all courts in enjoying what is granted, and their aid in enforcing performance of what remains to be done. And if either party voluntarily perform what a court would compel to be done, it would be as valid as if done by its judgment or decree, or as if the execution had been completed on the date of the contract. The law is express in referring to the time of the conveyance and assurance, and embraces not only perfect grants and gifts but "any estate or interest in lands, goods and chattels, made, conveyed or assured." On these principles it is the opinion of the court that the evidence brings the marriage contract within the sixth section of the statute, unless you shall find it not made in good faith, or with notice of fraud in Thompson brought home to his intended wife, and that Thompson actually entered into it with a fraudulent, covinous or collusive intention. If you do not so find it, then Mr. Richard Stockton is considered, at law, a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice so far as the contract has been executed by Thompson, and his creditor for what is executory. Mrs. Thompson has the same character in equity, and Captain Stockton is now standing in all respects in the situation of his father. The case then is a contest between Captain Stockton, the legal, and Mrs. Thompson the equitable purchaser of the house, furniture and securities, by the contract and the marriage, of the lot as her marriage portion, and the plaintiff the sole creditor of Mr. Thompson. Thus they stood at the commencement of the suit, and as creditors at the time of the contract and confirmation of the marriage, Mr. Stockton and Mrs. Thompson having performed their stipulations had a perfect right to call on Thompson at law and in equity to perform his. As a purchaser Mrs. Thompson is one of the most favoured class, the consideration she has given is as valuable as money, it need not be considered as more so; as a money purchaser of property, a conveyance before marriage by her intended husband would be as valid though he was in debt as if he was not. If he held the legal title the interest would vest by his deed, though he held it in trust for others, as fully and completely as if Thompson had a right as perfect in equity as at law, provided she had no notice of the trust. This is an universal rule, a principle never questioned, and protects all bona fide purchasers for valuable consideration without notice before the money paid or the condition of the grant performed; it applies to Mrs. Thompson not as a privileged purchaser, but as a purchaser from one who has the legal title, subject to an unknown trust for the use of a third person. Placing the plaintiff in the situation of a cestui que trust, and he cannot be placed in a better one, it is a strong one against him; the debt to him was contracted but a few days before the date of the marriage articles, and in a part of the world so remote as to exclude the possibility of notice to any of the parties, which differs this from the common cases of a trustee conveying the legal estate to the injury of cestui que trust, where the trust is necessarily known to the trustee, and he is guilty of direct fraud. Hard as the application of this principle may be, it is not relaxed even in favour of the widow or orphan who has been defrauded by their trustee selling what is not his own; a loss must fall on one of two innocent sufferers whose claims may be supposed equal in justice and equity, in such case the law leaves the property with the one, who has acquired the legal title by fair purchase, in good faith and without notice. A creditor of a fraudulent debtor who settles on his intended wife property which he is bound to apply to the payment of his debts, is entitled to no more favour, than any other person whose property is unjustly conveyed by his trustee to pay his own debts, to rob one family to save another, or secure a provision for an expected one of his own. The creditor can be no where more favoured than the infant, the ward, the widow, or the orphan, whose property is held in trust without lien or security, and subject to a sale by the trustee. The creditors of a deceased debtor have the same rights as those of a living one, yet if the executor sells the personal property to pay his own debt, a purchaser without notice or collusion will hold it even in equity. This is as much a violation of moral honesty and breach of faith, as to settle it on an intended wife, to whom he was under as high an obligation to pay the consideration of the marriage contract, as a bond given for money lent, or property purchased. Vide [Vattier v. Hinde] 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 268.

The consideration of this contract is both marriage and property, the value of the first cannot be, and of the last has not been ascertained in dollars; but at law, the mere inadequacy of consideration is no ground for declaring a conveyance of real or personal property void, if there is any consideration, the conveyance is valid at law; the amount cannot be inquired into as respects the grantor, his creditors or subsequent purchasers, in the absence of actual and legal fraud in the grantor or notice of it to the grantee. The only resort of parties who complain of equitable fraud, or other circumstances which would invalidate it in equity, is to those courts; they only can decide upon the adequacy of a pecuniary fund, or the equality of marriage to a given sum of money or value of property, under the circumstances of the case. Cases may exist where equity would compare and estimate them for the relief of a creditor, a purchaser, or perhaps the party, in a strong and clear case of injustice; but we know of no instance where it has set aside a purchase for valuable consideration on a marriage contract, when made bona fide and without notice of fraud or defect of title. Those claiming under them have ever been the peculiar favourites of courts of equity, and their rights can never be disturbed unless in extreme cases, none have yet arisen, when they do arise they will be exceptions to a rule which is as yet without any, and growing out of the necessity of the case.

In the present case we perceive nothing which gives it any unusual features. From the evidence it appears, that at the time of the contract of marriage, Mr. Thompson was abundantly able to make the stipulated settlement and pay all his debts. His inability has been accounted for by heavy and unexpected losses on investments made by his agent in good faith; without any ground for the imputation of dishonesty or imprudence in Thompson, his situation is such, that his wife must lose 30,000 dollars of her settlement, or his only creditor lose 12,000 dollars of his debt. Admitting their equities to be equal, she has a legal advantage which no court can take from her; unless her conduct can be impeached for fraud, actual or legal, it would be as unjust as illegal and inequitable, to visit alone on her the consequences of her husband's misfortunes.

Considering Mrs. Thompson therefore as a purchaser under the marriage articles, we are decidedly of opinion, that there is no legal fraud attending the transaction which would invalidate it in a court of law, or any matter given in evidence which would impair its obligation in a court of equity. If she cannot be viewed as the purchaser of the property contracted to be invested for her use, she is certainly a fair and honest creditor from the time of executing the contract, if not from the time of the proposed settlement in August preceding, and after the engagement of marriage was made. If however she was a creditor on the 19th of December,

Thompson had a right to prefer her in preference to any other creditor, to the extent of his whole property whenever he could realize or reduce it to possession. The mere priority of plaintiffs' debt, in point of time, could not affect such preference from being effectual, nor could the previous authority to Mr. Fisher to contract the debt, affect the inchoate rights of Mrs. Thompson by the engagement and proposed settlement in the summer of 1825, which you may fairly infer from the agreement was in a course of execution, by Thompson having begun to build on the lot, of which Mr. Stockton was to stand seised in trust, before the date of the articles. If the settlement had taken Thompson's whole estate, and the certain consequences of its execution, or the intention of the parties had been to exclude the plaintiff from the payment of his debt under cover of the agreement, we would give him relief on the equity side of the court, but the present state of things has not resulted from the effect of the agreement, or the intention of the parties, unexpected losses alone have led to it, the consequences of which are these. The plaintiffs' debt was 63,000 dollars, of which there is now due of principal and interest 12,000 dollars; the debt of Mrs. Thompson estimating the house and furniture at 18,000 dollars was 58,000, of which there is now due 35,000 dollars if Morris's debt is not good, or if good, 30,500 with interest from December, 1825. Though this inequality of loss would be of no importance at law, it would be a powerful circumstance in equity, on an application by the plaintiff for relief, and the present case would be very different if the whole 40,000 dollars had been invested. This view of the merits of the case suffices for the decision of the points directly at issue, without adverting to others which have been made as to contracts for settlements made after marriage; the nature of the issue required us to so view the case. It has been urged by the plaintiffs' counsel, that there has been no delivery of the contract in the present case, but the evidence is sufficient in law to prove it, the building and furnishing the house tend strongly to prove it satisfactorily; the contract is also said to have been abandoned, this is not to be presumed, and we think the facts in evidence do not amount to proof of abandonment by Mrs. Thompson, or any acts done by her which could impair her rights. The omission of the trustee to enforce the payment of the money, and to record the deed, is no waiver by her, and any acts done by him inconsistent with the agreement, would not impair the legal validity of her rights; the acts of a parent are never so construed, unless clearly intended to be so; the law as to these objections is well settled in Carver v. Astor, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 28, 82, 93–99.

We have been requested to charge you, that in point of law the covenant on the part of Mr. Richard Stockton to stand seised to uses, operated as an immediate conveyance to his daughter before marriage, and that by the marriage, Thompson became the owner of the furniture in his own right, and had the exclusive use of the house and lot unincumbered with the trusts of the agreement. But inasmuch as by the covenant contained in that agreement, Mr. Stockton was not to stand seised to the use of his daughter till after marriage, the court instruct you as matter of law, that the marriage articles do not operate by the statute of uses (27 Hen. VIII.), to pass the legal estate to the lot, or any other property referred to them to Mrs. Thompson. That it remained in Mr. Richard Stockton during his lifetime, devolved by his death on his heir at law, Captain Stockton, and now remains in him on a trust executory, it never was and is not now one executed by that statute.

We have also been requested to charge you on three other points of law: (1) That the expenditure of 5,000 dollars, in furnishing the house is, per se, fraudulent on creditors. We think not. Furniture is a part of the marriage contract, to be provided by Thompson as he should think fit. He had a reasonable discretion which he might exercise according to their station and associations in life, proportioned to the kind of house and extent of income. The trustee could not at law, or the wife in equity, compel Thompson to furnish it extravagantly, or at useless or wanton expense; if he had done it voluntarily, it would not be within the true spirit and meaning of the marriage articles, and might be deemed a legal fraud on creditors as to the excess. But before we could say that it is a fraud in law, to expend 5000 dollars in furnishing a house costing 13,000, and the establishment to be supported by the income of 40,000 dollars invested, we must be satisfied that it is extravagant and unwarranted at the first blush, and to an extent indicating some fraudulent or other motive, unconnected with the fair execution of the contract. Not being so satisfied, or that there has been a clear abuse of the discretion confided to Mr. Thompson by the contract, we cannot charge you as requested. (2) That the delivery of the notes to Captain Stockton in 1829 was a fraud per se. We instruct you that this was no fraud, if it was done in order to comply in part with the agreement; if it was colourable, made with the intention of covering and concealing so much, under pretence of the marriage contract for Thompson's use, and so received by the trustee, it was legally fraudulent as to creditors; but though delivered with such intention by Thompson, if not so accepted by Captain Stockton, then he might apply them to the trust fund, and was bound to do so. Being done to carry the agreement of December 1825 into execution, its having been done on the eve of the judgment confessed in New Jersey, makes no difference; had it been to make a new settlement after marriage, if it was in consideration of a portion or property, it would not have been fraudulent per se. The time which intervenes between making provision for a wife, and the contracting the debt or obtaining a judgment against the husband, is not a matter which makes it per se a fraud, it may or may not be suspicious, and connected with other circumstances deemed evidence of it. [Wheaton v. Sexton] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 506, 507; [Sexton v. Wheaton] 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 238; 3 Johns. Ch. 485, 494. (3) That the marriage agreement is void because not recorded within the time required by the law of New Jersey for recording deeds. The covenant to stand seised to the uses declared, would come within this law if the uses were executed by the statute, so as to make it an actual conveyance or deed passing the legal estate; but being executory, it is only a covenant giving an equitable estate to those for whom the trust was created and continues, and not a deed. But considering it as a deed, the want of recording does not make it void between the parties, though it would become void as to the creditors (perhaps), and purchasers from Richard Stockton without notice, but the omission to record this agreement is no fraud on the plaintiffs, and cannot affect them. Not being void between the parties, it gives Thompson no other estate or interest but such as arises from the trust; he can have none incompatible with it, our instruction therefore is that the marriage contract is not void for want of being recorded in time. The possession and occupation of the house by Thompson is consistent with and a part of the agreement, his use of it and the furniture is a necessary consequence of the marriage, and if the contract is valid, such possession is no evidence or badge of fraud. You will apply these principles of law to the evidence and find according to your opinion of the facts.

The jury found for defendant; judgment was rendered on the verdict and affirmed by the supreme court on a writ of error. 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 348.

Case No. 8,957.

MAGNIAC v. THOMSON.

[2 Wall. Jr. 209.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1852.[2]

EQUITABLE RELIEF — EFFECT OF DEMURRER IN EQUITY—UNCONTROLLABLE EFFECT OF A LIBERATION ON CA. SA.—RELIEF AGAINST MISTAKE OF LAW.

1. Where a bill sets forth such leading facts as do not, when analyzed, show a case of fraud or mistake—allegations or averments in the bill that there was fraud or mistake, and the expressions "fraudulently," "deceitfully," "by mistake," &c., interspersed throughout it, will not bring the case within equitable jurisdiction, even on a demurrer to the bill.[2]

[Cited in Voorhees v. Bonesteel, 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 29.]

2. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that the allegation of a mistake of the law would give jurisdiction to a court of equity in a common case, and be a ground for relief; yet the court will not listen to the allegation that a member of the bar has made such a mistake. It can hardly be successfully averred even by the party whose counsel, he would confess, has made it.

3. Where one, having arrested his debtor defendant on a ca. sa., sets him at liberty on certain terms, at his instance, it being "expressly acknowledged" by the defendant that this is done "for his accommodation, without any prejudice whatever to arise to the plaintiff's right by the enlargement" as aforesaid, "or otherwise howsoever;" the debt is paid at law. No further execution of any sort can be issued there. And the agreement having been drawn and signed by the plaintiff's own attorney, a learned and able counsellor at law, a court of equity will not interpose to enjoin the defendant from pleading this discharge as payment, by allegations in a bill demurred to, that there was either a mistake common to both parties as to the effect of the agreement; or else that the plaintiff not knowing its effect, while the defendant did know it, it would be a fraud in the defendant now to profit of the plaintiff's misconception or ignorance of what he was doing; and set up at law the payment by his liberation on the ca. sa.[2]

On the 19th of December, 1825, John R. Thomson, now a senator of the United States from the state of New Jersey, previously to a marriage then contemplated with a daughter of the late Honourable Richard Stockton, Esquire, of that state, agreed with her father to make a settlement upon that lady of a considerable estate upon this, as a final, among several other previously mentioned trusts, st. that if there should be no issue of their marriage, then the said estate should, on the death of either party, go to the survivor. From a really insolvent condition of Mr. Thomson's affairs at that date, arising from a large foreign suretyship, contracted by his agent abroad, and from other circumstances confessedly not known to Mr. Stockton or his daughter, it appeared afterwards to be a matter of doubt whether this settlement could be supported as against creditors. And Mr. Thomson having been arrested soon after the settlement on a ca. sa. by these same persons who are now here complainants, Magniac & Co., and who were then creditors by judgment for about $22,000, in a common law suit in this court, he made on the 8th April, 1830, the following agreement, an opulent relative being a guaranty for its performance, and Charles Jared Ingersoll, Esquire, the attorney of the plaintiffs, Magniac & Co., who himself drew the agreement, consenting by writing to the "defendant's enlargement on the terms stated" in it. The agreement—referring to the original case, in this court, of No. 18, October term, 1826,—being, as already stated, in Mr. Ingersoll's handwriting, was filed among the court papers of the case, and was in these words: "Defendant having been taken by ca. sa. in this suit, at his instance, it is agreed that he be set at liberty on giving security to abide the event of an issue to be formed for ascertaining, by judicial decision, whether he has the means, by the property in his marriage settlement, or otherwise, of satisfying the judgment. Both parties hereby consenting to try such issue at the ensuing session of the circuit court of the United States, on the merits, without regard to form. It being expressly acknowledged by the defendant that this agreement is made for his accommodation, without any prejudice whatever to arise to the plaintiffs' right by the defendant's enlargement on security as aforesaid or otherwise howsoever." The marshal accordingly returned to his ca. sa. "c. c. and enlarged by agreement of plaintiffs' attorney." With a view to carry out the agreement, Mr. Ingersoll, for his clients, Magniac & Co., and J. P. Norris, Esquire, as attorney for Mr. Thomson, on the 3rd of June, 1830, made this second agreement: "Whereas, a feigned issue has been agreed upon by the parties in this case, for the purpose of ascertaining, by law, whether the defendant, J. R. Thomson, has the means, by the property of his marriage settlement, or otherwise, of satisfying the judgment recovered against him in this court, to October Sess. 1826, No. 18,—now, it is hereby agreed to be the understanding of the parties to the suit, if the plaintiff recovers, that the liability of the security for said defendant shall be to the extent of the property actually settled by said defendant on his intended wife, by virtue of a marriage settlement, dated the 19th day of December, 1825. And if judgment shall be for the defendant, that the said property contained in said settlement, shall be entirely discharged," and the security entered as above stated, entirely at an end, &c.

[1] [Reported by John William Wallace, Jr., Esq.]

[2] [Affirmed in 15 How. (56 U. S.) 281.]

[2] [Affirmed in 15 How. (56 U. S.) 281.]

The validity of the marriage settlement was tried in this court at April term, 1831, in the case, well remembered in this circuit, of Magniac v. Thomson [Case No. 8,956], where after a vigorous assault upon it by J. R. and C. J. Ingersoll, the settlement was powerfully and successfully defended by Mr. Binney, and under a strong charge of the late Mr. Justice Baldwin, sustained by a verdict of a jury. From this court the case was taken, in 1833, to the supreme court at Washington, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 348, where the principles of Judge Baldwin's charge were the subject of another sharp attack, but where it was the unanimous opinion of the court, that the judgment of the circuit court ought to be affirmed. The marriage settlement therefore could never be disturbed. There was no issue of the marriage, and Mr. Thomson having survived his wife, he became of course entitled under the terms of the settlement to the whole of the property himself. The complainants now filed this their bill in chancery for an account of that property, and its profits since the expiration of the trust; and an application of both to the payment of the judgment; and an injunction against parting with them, so far as they might be liable to the judgment, and against setting up at law as a defence, (a matter which it was averred the defendant threatened,) that the debt had been discharged or affected; and that the validity of the judgment on the law side of the court might be declared by this court to be fully established: and the marshal's return to the ca. sa. regarded as an 'inexistence,' so far as it might be used to violate the obligations of the original agreement of 8th April, 1830.

The bill was a good deal argumentative, under a form apparently narrative. It went back to, and coloured highly the circumstances of the marriage settlement, so far as Mr. Thomson was concerned with them. Reciting the original ca. sa. and the arrest of Mr. Thomson, it set forth that he must have either always remained in close confinement, or have obtained his discharge, by proceedings under the Pennsylvania acts for the relief of insolvent debtors; his proceedings under which, if successful, would have driven him to make a deed of assignment to his creditors, of all his estate and property whatsoever, including the right of survivorship and reversion in the settled property upon his wife's death without issue, and have conferred upon him, in return, only an immunity against liability to further bodily restraint or confinement for the non-payment of such of his debts, as were at the date of such proceedings in insolvency, due by him; and any petition for the benefit of which acts could have been filed by him, only after lying three months in custody and confinement under the said writ of ca. sa.: that thereupon the defendant, being so arrested at the suit of the complainants, it was agreed in writing between them and the defendant, that they should, without prejudice to their rights and remedies against the said defendant, permit the said defendant forthwith to be enlarged from custody, &c. The bill averred that by this agreement, &c., the defendant obtained no further advantage than that of "a present discharge from close custody, and a judgment that he had then no means of satisfying; the judgment, the said agreement and proceedings under it being a substitute for proceedings in insolvency; by which substitute, the said defendant, if he did not acquire the same extent of immunity which an insolvent discharge would have bestowed, at least obtained whatever immunity he did acquire by means less painful than an insolvency." It set forth the entire acquiescence of the complainants in the validity of the marriage settlement as adjudged on technical grounds merely, so far as Mr. Thomson was concerned: and that the said trial having resulted unfavourably to the complainants, they were content to abide thereby until the defendant, if it should so turn out in the course of time, acquired wherewithal to satisfy the judgment. And having patiently awaited the return of his solvency, and his ability to meet his obligations, and he having become once more restored in his circumstances, and a man of wealth, the complainants had recently called upon him to pay, in the expectation that, in consideration of the extreme hardship of their case, (in which the payment of a judgment arising out of a cash loan had been disappointed by a settlement of a debtor upon his wife, although insolvent when he made the settlement,) he would meet the call upon him, not according to the letter only of the agreement, but in the spirit of his own professions of obligation to the complainants for the same, and of their forbearance toward him in his adversity, when, to their astonishment, they were answered by him—not that he was unable to pay or that he would be even 'inconvenienced' by paying off the amount of the judgment, but—that inasmuch as according to law a party discharged by the plaintiffs' consent, after being taken on a ca. sa., was released from the debt, even though he had pledged himself to his creditors not to plead such discharge,—he, the defendant, proposed to set up this said or supposed rule of law, and the said discharge for his protection against his own agreements and pledges, and against any further proceedings by the complainants under their judgment, and that he, the said defendant, then actually regarded and should to the court insist that the said judgment,—his agreement to the contrary notwithstanding,—was cancelled, and himself no debtor at all.

The bill represented that the complainants were prevented from proceeding at law by the said rule of law so set up. The use of or any resort to which they averred would be contrary to equity; because the defendant having pledged himself that he would not resort to the said rule of law,—by agreeing that the taking of the said defendant into and discharging him from custody should not prejudice the rights and remedies of the then plaintiffs,—it would be in direct fraud of his agreement, should he now resort to it, to the prejudice of those rights and remedies. And because the agreement that the defendant should be discharged from custody, was obtained by means, which were inequitable and fraudulent, namely, by a stipulation on the defendant's part—now offered to be violated by him—that the discharge should be without prejudice to the complainants; which means were further inequitable and fraudulent, in this, that the consideration for the discharge was illusory, fraudulent and unreal; and was a stipulation, that the discharge should be without prejudice to the complainant; a stipulation which the defendant could keep or break at his pleasure, and which supposed consideration for the discharge—namely, that the same should be without prejudice,—was not a consideration sufficient to support the said agreement for the discharge. And because the said mutual contract that the defendant should be discharged from custody, but withal, that such discharge should not prejudice the complainants' rights or remedies, was either a contract entered into by the common error of both parties in this, that they both erred in supposing that the contract could be carried into effect, when, in fact, it could not be, (of which said common error the defendant now sought to take advantage,) or it was a contract entered into, the complainants alone being in error, in supposing that the contract could be carried into effect, when, in fact, it could not be, the defendant, at the same time well knowing, and fraudulently availing himself of the error, and entering into the contract for the purpose, and with the fraudulent intent of taking advantage of the error, and intending that he should, by he contract, obtain all the benefit and advantage of a discharge from the ca. sa., and that the complainants should not obtain the benefit of the corresponding stipulation, that the discharge should be without prejudice to their rights and remedies, of which fraud the defendant now sought to take advantage. The complainants then averred that when they accepted the stipulation at the hands of the defendant, that the discharge should be without prejudice to them, they did actually and firmly believe that it was capable of being enforced at law, as well as in equity, according to its terms, and were wholly unaware that the defendant could or would use, or resort to any rule of law whatever, whereby to escape its force and effect.

They set forth that the marriage settlement having been made to secure the property to the wife and children, and on the wife's death childless, to pass it in gross to the husband, had now done its office, and could go no further, and that it would be inequitable that the issue formed under the agreement, and in the framing and on the trial of which, it was assumed by the court, and admitted by the defendant, that the settled estate was liable to the judgment, but for the protection afforded by the settlement, should be construed to have for its effect and consequence, that which was not contemplated by the parties, and was not sanctioned by the court, and which, in itself, was wholly contrary to justice, namely, the discharging from just liability the estate which, in consequence of the defendant's reversion and survivorship, had now come back to him, as completely as he ever did or could own it or any other property.

To this bill, the defendant now demurred, setting forth for cause, that "if the taking into custody, &c., under the ca. sa. was a legal discharge of the alleged debt, the complainants are not relievable in equity from the effect thereof for or by reason of any act, matter or anything alleged in the bill; and if the said taking into custody was not such a legal discharge, then the complainants have full, adequate and complete relief at law." And the case was accordingly heard on the bill and demurrer.

Charles Ingersoll, in support of the bill.

I. Construction of the agreement of 8th of April, 1830. If this paper meant less than the plaintiff insists, its last sentence beginning "it being expressly acknowledged," would have been omitted altogether. That sentence is not merely without purpose or sense, but is directly in the teeth of the meaning of the parties to the contract, if not intended to bind the defendant by a promise to stand by the judgment after the discharge as much as before. The words "or otherwise howsoever" in the case of extremely formal papers, in which the meaning of the parties is expressed at great length, might perhaps have little force, but in a brief stipulation such as this, drawn up in haste probably, and in order to an immediate and pressing object, they ought to have their full force and popular construction. They should be interpreted to signify that if by the words which precede them the plaintiffs' interest under the judgment are not fully guarded, the defendant shall give them protection "otherwise howsoever." They amount to a covenant for further assurance. The agreement interpreted in any other way leads to the absurd conclusion that the plaintiff perilled his whole debt without a motive, while the defendant obtained his enlargement from custody, giving no equivalent whatever therefor.

If the plaintiff had refused all arrangement, and simply permitted the defendant to remain in custody, he would have resorted to the insolvent law of Pennsylvania, or of the United States. In the former case there would have been a trial of the question whether the defendant was possessed of property more advantageous to the plaintiff than the trial in the federal court. In the latter case, of an application by the defendant under the United States insolvent law of 1800 [2 Stat. 19], the plaintiff, had he succeeded in breaking the trust, would have got the whole trust property, and whether he failed or succeeded would have had security of the most binding sort, in the custody of the defendant's person. The plaintiff therefore gained nothing by the agreement, for it is not pretended on the other side that he got anything by it, if he did not get security of a superior character for his debt, or a better trial of the question upon which it turned. He simply, as expressed by the agreement, set the defendant at liberty at the defendant's instance. He did an act of kindness, upon the defendant's agreement that it should be without prejudice. The defendant, on the other hand, acquired first his immediate liberty, which he could get only by agreement; and second, a trial of the question of property in the federal court; a better trial for him than one in the common pleas, and much better than under the insolvent law of 1800, because that would have detained him in custody during the time the cause was pending which, as appears by the statement, was about three years. To give any other interpretation to the agreement would be to stultify the plaintiff, who dealt with the defendant liberally enough, but did not go the length of giving away his debt.

Assuming then our construction of the agreement to be the true one, the next question is:

II. Whether the case is one for equitable relief? The principles and cases found under the equitable heads of fraud and mistake, are applicable to the facts before the court.

1. Fraud. If it were a case of mere breach of contract, it would not be cognizable in equity. Nor if it were a case of fraudulent breach of contract, and not more, for even fraud is cognizable at law unless there be in the case something to oust the jurisdiction. But here is a case where there can be no relief at law, because (we assume for the sake of argument) the courts of law have declared that a judgment is paid when the defendant is taken under a ca. sa.. and that even the defendant's own agreement to the contrary shall not change the rule; that a defendant's conduct in entering into such an agreement and then violating it, is "very scandalous," as the courts have termed it (per Grose, J., Blackburn v. Stupart, 2 East, 243), but that there is no remedy at law. The fraud is palpable. The defendant is in custody. He says to the plaintiff, the rule of law is that if you discharge me, the judgment is satisfied; but I pledge myself that as between you and me there shall be no such rule, and that if you will let me go, your judgment shall stand exactly as it did before your ca. sa. was issued. This agreement, the defendant, having had the benefit of it, utterly violates. He declares the judgment to be good for nothing, and the agreement good for nothing, and when the plaintiff takes proceedings at law he sets them at defiance. That is, having trepanned the plaintiff into the bargain by means of a promise that he will not exact the penalty of the position, he turns round and insists upon it. The plaintiff then comes into equity. This case is like that of a man who, holding a note five years and eleven months old, is told by the drawer to wait six weeks longer before he sues, and that the note shall be as good at six years old as it was before, and then being refused payment, and having gone into court, the defendant pleads the statute of limitation against him; like that of a plaintiff in a judgment who enters satisfaction in order that the defendant may be able to make title to a certain portion of the real estate bound by the judgment, the defendant having agreed in writing that the satisfaction should be cancelled, and the lien of the judgment restored as to the rest of his real estate, immediately after his sale was effected, and then is told by the defendant, your judgment is gone, and you will never get another; like that of one who, having given his receipt in full, but without value, to a debtor, in order that he might settle with a third person, is turned upon by the debtor and told that his debt is paid, and here is the receipt for it; like that of an obligee who, having released one of two co-obligors for the mutual purposes of obligee and obligors, and with the agreement that the discharge should be without prejudice as to the remaining obligor, is informed by him, after the object of the discharge has been accomplished and the advantages from it attained, that he does not mean to hold himself liable after the release of his co-obligor.

These are cases not distinguishable from that before the court, and they are obviously for relief in equity. They are all cases in which a party has gained a fraudulent advantage of another, which not being relievable at law, will be relieved in equity, unless something can be shown to the contrary.

It will be pretended by the defendant that to relieve under this agreement of 8th April, 1830, would be to run counter to that policy which, favouring liberty of the person, has refused to permit a second ca. sa. for the same debt. To this the answers are: (a) There are two cases to the point that this rule concerning the liberty of the person, yields before proof of the defendant's fraud, in procuring his discharge. Baker v. Ridgway, 2 Bing. 41, 9 Moore, 114, and Holbrook v. Champlin, 1 Hoff. Ch. 148. (b) On principle it would be strange indeed if that policy of law and equity and of all society which sets its face against fraud should give way before the co-called policy here invoked, which amounts to nothing at all since arrest for debt has been abolished, and which never did amount to more than a train of unfortunate decisions, which if they could be recalled, would never be made again.

2. Mistake. It is averred in the bill as follows: "And your orators aver that when they accepted the said stipulation at the hands of the said defendant, namely, that the said discharge from custody of the said defendant should be without prejudice to your orators, they did actually and firmly believe that the said stipulation was capable of being enforced by your orators at law as well as in equity, according to the terms of the said agreement, and were wholly unaware that the said defendant could or would use or resort to any rule of law whatever whereby to escape the force and effect of the said stipulation so contained in the said agreement." The plaintiff here avers that he mistook the law, and that the defendant availed himself of his mistake to get a discharge from custody, which, if the construction of the agreement above submitted be the true one, he obtained at the expense to the plaintiff of his entire debt, for which he received under the agreement no manner of consideration or compensation. The general rule is admitted, that a mistake of law affords no ground of relief. But when the mistake of one party is so great, and is so grossly taken advantage of by the other, that the bargain becomes not "do ut des" but "do ut non des," not money paid or a thing done for a consideration but money paid or a thing done for less than nothing, the precedents are that relief will be granted without distinction between ignorance of law and ignorance of fact. Champlin v. Laytin, 1 Edw. Ch. 472.

The rule "ignorantia legis neminem excusat" pushed to extremes would cover fraud, and the averment of the bill here is in truth averment of fraud. To avail one's self of the ignorance of the other party of the law may be fair, or it may be fraudulent. If the grantor understand the covenant of warranty contained in his deed, and the grantee do not, the grantee cannot therefore come into equity and be relieved from the effects of such ignorance. But if the grantor be aware that by law he has no title to the estate which he conveys and the grantee in paying his money for it receives only so much moonshine, the grantee is relievable; for the grantor defrauds him if he pushes his advantage over him to such lengths, though that advantage be but in knowing the law when the other does not. And if here the plaintiff in his ignorance of the law just gave away his debt and the defendant got a receipt in full for nothing; if the plaintiff sold his judgment of $22,000 for a right which was no right, then the defendant has overreached him, he has availed himself of the plaintiff's mistake of law with a vengeance. It is a case of fraud and equity will make him whole. The cases on this head are numerous and go very far. Lansdown v. Lansdown, Mos. 364; Bingham v. Bingham, 1 Ves. Sr. 126; Pusey v. Desbouvrie, 3 P. Wms. 315–321; Evans v. Llewellyn, 2 Brown, Ch. 150; Farewell v. Coker, cited in Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 Mer. 352; Cann v. Cann, 1 P. Wms. 727; Acton v. Peirce, 2 Vern. 480; Cannel v. Buckle, 2 P. Wms. 243; Naylor v. Winch, 1 Sim. & S. 564; Hunt v. Rousmanier, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 1; Lowndes v. Chisholm, 2 McCord, Eq. 463; Lammot v. Bowly, 6 Har. & J. 500; Evants v. Strode, 11 Ohio, 481; Drew v. Clarke, Cooke, 374–380.

It is not necessary, to entitle the plaintiffs to come into equity with this bill, that they should be absolutely without relief at law. Equity has jurisdiction when relief at law is doubtful or difficult. Weymouth v. Boyer, 1 Ves. Jr. 424; Bynum v. Sledge, 1 Stew. & P. 138; Ludlow v. Simond, 2 Caines, Cas. 39; Livingston v. Livingston, 4 Johns. Ch. 287. "It is not of course to be taken as an answer to a bill praying relief, that the matter might be taken advantage of at law." Campbell v. French, 2 Cox, Ch. 367. The averment of the bill is, that plaintiffs are prevented from proceeding at law.

III. How stands the question at law? The defendant contends that issuing and executing a writ of ca. sa. at law, discharges the debt at law, and satisfies the judgment, and this although the defendant expressly agrees that it shall not have such affect. The plaintiffs submit the rule on this subject to be, that issuing and executing an execution presumes a satisfaction. To this extent, and no further, has the law gone in regard to any kind of execution; and a careful examination will show that it has never fairly gone further in this regard as to a ca. sa. than as to any other writ of execution, and that the two English cases (and certain New York cases which were decided on their authority) were hastily decided, and without support from principle, reason or authority.

It was originally questioned whether a judgment could have more than one execution, and it was held accordingly, that any writ of execution being once issued, the judgment was functus. But the rule was after established otherwise, that is, that no execution issued is a satisfaction, or prevents an alias, unless satisfaction appear by the return. See the old cases quoted by Lord Hobart, in Foster v. Jackson, Hob. 57. No rule of law can be established so inimical to liberty or so severe upon debtors, as that which would say, that the creditor shall in no way deal with his debtor for his liberation from imprisonment, without discharging the debt and satisfying the judgment. See Jackson v. Knight, 4 Watts & S. 412. A fi. fa. executed presumes a satisfaction; there can no other execution be issued till by the return of the first it be shown that there has not been satisfaction. Slie v. Finch, 2 Rolle, 57; Miller v. Parnell, 6 Taunt. 370. A ca. sa. executed does no more, it presumes a satisfaction.

Many cases, both English and American, may be found, and will be cited by the defendant, where it has been said, and some where it has been held, that "plaintiff receives a satisfaction in law by having his debtor in execution." Hobart, C. J., reasons himself to this in Foster v. Jackson, already cited. This is said in many other cases. Tanner v. Hague, 7 Term R. 420; Ransom v. Keyes, 9 Cow. 138; Crary v. Turner, 6 Johns. 51; Yates v. Van Rensselaer, 5 Johns. 364; Little v. Bank, 14 Mass. 443; Freeman v. Ruston, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 214. If this be true, or if there be such a principle in the law, then it is a reason, and a sufficient reason, why the plaintiff may not by any agreement with the defendant, relieve him from imprisonment, and yet preserve the debt and to the judgment its efficacy at law. If this reason be not sound, or if there is no such principle in the law, then no other reason can be given, and none other is in any of the cases given, why the law should not regard and protect such agreement, or why the law should assume for itself the anomalous and discreditable position into which Grose, J., puts it in Blackburn v. Stupart, 2 East, 243, where he says that though the conduct of the defendant may have been "very scandalous," there is for the plaintiff no relief.

That there is any such principle or rule in English law, as that plaintiff receives satisfaction by having his debtor in execution, is contradicted by Lord Coke, in Blumfield's Case, 5 Coke, 86a.[3]

By all the decisions holding that if the defendant after escape, the judgment is good (Basset v. Salter, 2 Mod. 136); for if the judgment is functus by executing the writ, nothing after can restore it. By the decisions holding that executing a ca. sa. on a privileged person, who is after discharged, does not make void the judgment. Merchant v. Frankis, 2 Gale & D. 473. By the statute of 21 Jac. I., that if defendant die in execution, the judgment shall be still effective. By the decisions that an after insolvent's discharge, leaves the judgment effective. Nadin v. Battie, 5 East, 147. By the cases holding that the new writ is in no case void, but voidable. only on cause shown. 1 Scott, 404.

The class of English cases, where it was held that a plaintiff having a judgment against several defendants, could not release one from execution, without entirely losing his debt as to the others, is easily intelligible. and is the law of fi. fa. as well as ca. sa., and is even the law of original liability, for there is no way by which one of several partners can be discharged from an original liability without discharging the others. And this principle explains various cases. Denton v. Godfrey, 11 Jur. 800; Herring v. Dorrell, 4 Jur. 800; Ballam v. Price, 2 Moore, 235. So, too, the class of cases where the plaintiff took, in satisfaction of his judgment, a new agreement, and it was held that this judgment was gone, and he must resort to suit on his new agreement, are clear in principle and reason. Jaques v. Withy, 1 Term. R. 557; Birch v. Sharland, Id. 715; Vigers v. Aldrich, 4 Burrows, 2482; Goodman v. Chase, 1 Barn. & Ald. 297; Da Costa v. Davis, 1 Bos. & P. 242.

The only two English cases going the length that defendant asks in this case, and holding the judgment satisfied, and that plaintiff can have no further remedy in his then suit, whatever defendant's agreement may have been, are Clark v. Clement, in 6 Term R. 525, and Blackburn v. Stupart, in 2 East, 243. In Thompson v. Bristow, reported by Barnes, Notes Cas. 205, the report is in a line, and the question seems to have been one of continuance on the roll. The reporter, at best, is not the most satisfactory.

The two former cases drive the law to the position assumed for it by Grose, J., in Blackburn v. Stupart, that however "scandalous" the conduct of the defendant may have been, the law can give the plaintiff no relief against his fraud. Their authority is much shaken, and in some cases contradicted, by later English decisions: as in Baker v. Ridgway, 9 Moore, 114, 2 Bing. 41, which was the case of voluntary discharge by plaintiff from arrest, and is authority for the position that if plaintiff were induced to the discharge by the defendant's fraud, it shall not avail him, but the judgment shall be held effective. In Atkinson v. Bayntun, 1 Scott, 404, Sergeant Wilde in argument, doubts the soundness of the principle established by Blackburn v. Stupart and Clark v. Clement; and Tindal, C. J., plainly thought with him. Parke, J., says, that in Jaques v. Withy, Ashurst, J., spoke too broadly, and that Buller disagreed; and quotes Baker v. Ridgway, that if there were fraud in defendant's procurement of discharge, he may be re-arrested.

[3] Lord Coke says expressly "The execution of the body is no satisfaction, * * * but a gage for the debt," and he calls on his readers to note "good differences between execution not valuable, as of the body of the defendant, and execution valuable, as of lands," &c.

The law of ca. sa. in this regard, is refused to be extended to cases of attachment for not complying with award, and Holroyd, J. says, "Indeed those cases (meaning Clark v. Clement and Blackburn v. Stupart) were considered so strong that the legislature interposed. Good v. Wilks, 6 Maule & S. 413.

But be the English law what it may, the Pennsylvania courts hold as we ask this court to hold. In Sharpe v. Speckenagle, 3 Serg. & R. 464, it was held by the supreme court of Pennsylvania on general principles, that a discharge under an insolvent act, of one arrested on a ca. sa., did not discharge his surety for stay of execution. Chief Justice Tilghman says: "I take the law to stand thus: If the plaintiff takes the body of the defendant in execution, he can never have against him while in jail, any other execution; but if he dies in jail, he may have execution against his lands or goods, by virtue of the statute 21 Jac. I. c. 24. I think, too, that in case of death, the better opinion is, that the plaintiff might have had execution against the defendant's lands or goods at common law. The statute 21 Jac. recites, that it had been greatly doubted, &c. It certainly had been doubted, although the decision reported in Blumfield's Case, 5 Coke, 86, was expressly in favour of the execution, and for reasons not easily answered: because the plaintiff having secured his legal remedy, was in no default, and therefore ought not to be injured by the act of God, which works wrong to no man: and it would be most unjust, if in such case, the goods of the defendant should not be liable, &c. In the case of Foster v. Jackson, Hob. 52, decided in the reign of James I., the law was indeed held contrary to Blumfield's Case, but in my opinion, for reasons more technical and artificial, but less substantial and satisfactory. In that case, however, although, &c. . . . . yet it was laid down, that the taking on the ca. sa., 'was not the perfect satisfaction in nature to all purposes, and against all persons.' On the contrary, 'that it was clearly no satisfaction, so as to bar the plaintiff to seek satisfaction against another for the same debt.' This principle the court held 'decisive' of the case before them, as the discharge 'was effected by the act of law, which, like the act of God, injures no man." There was, indeed, in the Pennsylvania act an express provision, that no other person should be acquitted by the principal debtor's discharge, which the court say they could call in aid, if necessary; but it is not called in aid, the case being decided on common law principles. The case of Jackson v. Knight, 4 Watts & S. 412, in the same court, is much stronger and absolutely in point. By agreement in writing, endorsed on the writ, and signed by the counsel, the defendant's body was to be released 'without prejudice to his future liability for the debt and interest of the judgment, which is to remain in full force and unimpaired.' The court held that the agreement prevented a discharge of the judgment against him, which remained a lien on his lands, and so encumbered them as to make an encumbered and unmarketable title. And the court manifestly approves of the charge of the court below, that 'such a discharge is for the benefit of the defendant: it comports with humanity, justice and common sense:' and of the position that the principle which the defendant here seeks to maintain, 'has been carried to an unreasonable and oppressive length, and often to the great injury of unfortunate debtors;' and that no case precisely like the one before them, had been shown."

Reverting to the language of Chief Justice Tilghman, who says, that neither the act of the law, nor the act of God, ought to work an injury to the plaintiff, we ask, where shall the act of the defendant himself—or the act of the plaintiff, done for his benefit and at his request,—which is tantamount to the act of the defendant himself—work any injury either?

J. M. Read, Mr. Cadwalader, and W. A. Jackson, in support of the demurrer.

The thorough view which we propose to take of this case at law, will very much settle the question of equitable aid; for it will show how pervading the rule at law is. The creditor, by issuing a ca. sa., chooses the body of the debtor in preference to his lands or goods, as the source of his satisfaction. By making an arrest, he secures to himself the satisfaction he has chosen, and is thereby estopped from resorting to any other mode of execution. As long as he holds the body, he is in the possession of a continuing satisfaction, and when, with his consent, the body is released, he confesses that his satisfaction is complete; and if the release is accompanied by any agreement with the debtor, or third parties acting for him, such agreement (whatever may be its terms) is a new and original contract, which can in no way affect the completeness of the satisfaction previously received. This is the English law.

From a series of decisions upon these points, covering four centuries, only a single case (Blumfield's Case (1596) 5 Coke, 87), can be cited in conflict with the rule thus stated. The statement of facts in Blumfield's Case by Lord Coke is this: "Two men were bound jointly and severally in a bond, one was sued, condemned, and taken in execution, and afterwards the other was sued, condemned, and taken in execution, and afterwards the first escaped and thereupon the other brought audita querela." Judgment was given against the payer. The decision is law, and in harmony with the principles above laid down. Lord Coke, however, in his annotation cites the Case of Jones and Williams (elsewhere unreported), "where two men were condemned in debt, and one was taken and died in execution, yet the taking of the other was lawful." This case may also be law, but makes nothing against the present appellee. Lord Coke proceeds, "and then" (in Jones and Williams) "it was resolved by the whole court that if the defendant in debt dies in execution, the plaintiff may have a new execution by elegit or fi. fa. for divers reasons," which he goes on to enumerate. It is for this passage that the case has been often heretofore and is now cited, the value of the authority being merely this: that Lord Coke in reporting a principal case, which is entirely with us, refers to an unreported case which is also with us, but in which there is a dictum against us of which he appears to approve. But whatever may have been its original authority, this dictum has been repeatedly declared not to be law. Blumfield's Case was argued in 39 Eliz., and published in 3 Jac., and must consequently have been well known in 4 Jac., when the case of Williams v. Cutteris (1607) Cro. Jac. 136, also cited as Cutter v. Lamb, was decided. Yet in the last-mentioned case the defendant having died in execution, the court held that the plaintiff had no further remedy. In Foster v. Jackson (1613) Hob. 52, 57, where the same point arose, Chief Justice Hobart makes the same decision, and in the course of an elaborate opinion approves the Cases of Blumfield, and Jones and Williams, but condemns the dictum which accompanies them. Since then, in Sir Edward Coke's Case (1624) Godb. 294, and in Cave v. Fleetwood (1630) Litt. 325, it was pronounced "not to be law," and in Taylor v. Waters (1816) 5 Maule & S. 103, where a similar point arose and counsel urged its authority, it was wholly disregarded by the Court. From that time up to the present, though similar questions have frequently arisen, it is believed that this citation has never been offered to the consideration of an English tribunal.

Having disposed of this dictum, we will proceed to examine, first, those cases in which it has been held that the release of a debtor in execution by the plaintiff's consent, is a satisfaction of the judgment and execution, and also an extinguishment of the debt.

In Whiteacres v. Hamkinson (1627) Cro. Car. 75, one of two co-obligors pleaded that the other, being in custody in a suit upon the same bond, the sheriff permitted him to go at large, and upon demurrer, it was adjudged for the plaintiff; but, say the court, "if he had pleaded that the sheriff suffered him to go at large by the license or command of the plaintiff, it had been a discharge, and might have been pleaded in bar."

In Walker v. Alder (1649) Style, 117, the plaintiff consented to an interview with the defendant beyond the prison bounds, but having failed to come to an agreement, recommitted him. The court held that "the execution was discharged by the prisoner's going at large."

In Price v. Goodrick (1653) Style, 387, Chief Justice Rolle held that in a judgment against three, if one be taken and discharged with plaintiff's consent, the other two cannot be taken upon the same judgment.

In Basset v. Salter (1677) 2 Mod. 136, the decision in Walker v. Alder first above cited, is affirmed, and the court say, "He (the defendant), could never after be in execution at his suit for the same matter."

In Thompson v. Bristow (1743) Barnes, Notes Cas. 205, "the defendant was taken in execution, and was afterwards discharged by plaintiff's consent, and a written agreement was entered into by the parties, that the judgment should stand revived for twelve months. After more than a year from the last ca. sa., plaintiff caused defendant to be again taken in execution, without continuance on the rolls, relying on the written agreement. The court held the agreement to be null and void, and made the rule absolute to set aside the last ca. sa., and discharge the defendant out of custody."

In Vigers v. Aldrich (1769) 4 Burrows, 2482, the defendant was released on binding himself to pay the debt by instalments. Upon default, an action of debt was brought upon the judgment. "The court held this to be an absolute consent in the plaintiff to discharge the defendant out of execution, in consideration of a new agreement then entered into, whereby he was to receive several sums of money, instead of the person of the defendant (which was all that he could have had if he had kept the defendant in gaol,) and that he could not bring an action upon the judgment after the defendant had been taken in execution and discharged by the plaintiff's own consent, but ought to have brought a new action upon the case founded upon this new agreement." Yates, J., added, that he could not declare on the old judgment since it was necessary to allege that "it remained altogether unsatisfied."

In the leading case of Jaques v. Withy (1787) 1 Term R. 557, defendant was released upon giving a bond with warrant of attorney for the debt. A technical error was committed in naming the court where judgment was to be confessed. The original judgment was attempted to be used as a set-off in another suit. Ashurst, J., ... "I know of but one case where a debtor in execution, who obtains his liberty, may afterward be taken for the same debt, and that is where he has escaped; but the reason of that is, because he was not legally out of custody. But where a prisoner obtains his discharge with the consent of the party who put him in execution, he cannot be retaken." Buller, J., ... "The case of Vigers v. Aldrich, 4 Burrows, 2482, goes to the whole length of this. For it shows that if a defendant has been once discharged out of execution, upon terms which are not afterwards complied with, the plaintiff cannot resort to the judgment again or charge the defendant's person in execution."

In Da Costa v. Davis (1798) 1 Bos. & P. 242, a bond was given conditioned to surrender the defendant, who had been discharged by consent of plaintiff, or pay the debt. The court held the first alternative of the bond was void, being to render a prisoner in execution who had once been discharged.

In Clark v. Clement (1796) 6 Term R. 525, there was a judgment and ca. sa. against Clement and English. English was arrested and afterwards discharged upon agreement with the plaintiff by which he bound himself to surrender, if the debt were not paid within a certain time. Clement then moved to quash the ca. sa. and enter satisfaction on the roll. Rule granted so far as to protect Clement from any arrest under the judgment. Upon non-payment, English being re-arrested, moved to quash the ca. sa. and enter satisfaction; citing the above cited cases of Thompson v. Bristow, Vigers v. Aldrich, Jaques v. Withy. Rule made absolute.

In Tanner v. Hague (1797) 7 Term R. 420, the defendant was released upon agreeing to pay the debt at a future day. On non-payment fi. fa. issued, which the court set aside because "the plaintiff received a satisfaction in law by having his debtor once in custody on execution."

In Blackburn v. Stupart (1802) 2 East, 243, the defendant was released upon agreeing to pay the debt at a future day or consent to execution issuing against his person or estate. Upon non-payment he was arrested, and paid the debt to procure his discharge. This was a rule to set aside the execution, and that the money in the sheriff's hands should be refunded. The court made the rule absolute, and Grose, J., said, "a person cannot be taken in execution twice on the same judgment, whether he had so agreed or not."

In Goodman v. Chase (1818) 1 Barn. & Ald. 303, the defendant agreed to pay the debt and costs, provided his son then in execution for them should be discharged. The case turned upon the question, whether this promise of Chase, Sr., was within the statute of frauds. Lord Ellenborough, C. J.: "By the discharge of Chase, Jr., with the plaintiff's consent, the debt as between those two persons was satisfied. No case can be cited in which such a discharge has not been held sufficient. Then if so, the promise by the defendant here is not a collateral, but an original promise, for which the consideration is the discharge of the debt as between the plaintiff and Chase, Jr."

In the case of Ballam v. Price (1818) 2 Moore, 235, it was held to be "quite clear that the discharge of one operated as the release of both the defendants." And to the same effect is Eales v. Fraser (1843) 6 Man. & G., 755.

In Herring v. Dorrell (1840) 4 Jur. 800, where two were in prison, and one was discharged by the plaintiff's consent, Coleridge, J., held that the other was entitled to his discharge as of course, and there was no consideration for a promise made by him in order to procure it.

In Denton v. Godfrey (1847) 11 Jur. 800, the facts were similar to those in Clark v. Clement, and on application made, the same rule was made absolute as to the defendants not arrested.

This branch of the case may be satisfactorily summed up by a citation from the First Report of the common law commissioners (1851) Law Com'rs Report, p. 48, at the head of whom was the present Lord Chief Justice Jervis. After recommending that authority be given the plaintiff's attorney to consent to the discharge of a defendant in execution, they proceed to say (15 Law Mag. pp. 132, 133), "but as a discharge by the creditor's authority from custody on a writ of execution, is a satisfaction of the debt, we think the authority should only be binding, so far as the sheriff is concerned, leaving it to the parties to contest the right of the attorney to give the discharge." Such an incidental recognition of the law, coming from so high an authority, proves in the most conclusive way, how thoroughly it is established in England. It remains,

II. To examine into the effect of an arrest and imprisonment upon a ca. sa. generally; the position of the defendant being, that such an arrest and imprisonment, if regular, constitute a perfect satisfaction, so long as the imprisonment continues, and that the nature of the satisfaction can only be impaired by an interruption of the imprisonment through the tortious act of the defendant himself, or the operation of the law in invitum, as against the plaintiff.

In Y. B. 33 Hen. VI. (1455) p. 48, it is said by Davers: "Suppose a man recover against me and take my body in execution, he shall have neither elegit nor fi. fa., nor any other execution, because this amounts in law to satisfaction." So in Y. B. 13 Hen. VII. (1498) p. 1, it is said by Keble: "If on a ca. sa. the sheriff return cepi corpus, the plaintiff shall never have another ca. sa., for he learns from the return of the sheriff that he was in execution, and then he had the object of his suit."

The most carefully considered case on this whole subject is Foster v. Jackson (1613) Hob. 52, where the defendant died in execution, and the plaintiff brought scire facias against his executors. After examining Blumfield's Case and reviewing the whole subject at length, Chief Justice Hobart says: "But now singly out of the very point, I hold that a capias ad satisfaciendum is against that party as not only an execution, but a full satisfaction by force and act and judgment of law, so as against him he can have no other nor against his heirs or executors, for these make but one person at law." And in concluding he lays down the broad principle on which many of the decisions already referred to are based, especially those where an agreement to surrender has been held to be void, "that the body of a freeman cannot be made subject to distress or imprisonment by contract, but only by judgment."

The law as thus laid, governed all subsequent cases of death in execution until parliament interfered, and by the statute of 21 Jac. I. c. 24, gave the creditor a further remedy against the estate of the deceased.

In Burnaby's Case (1726) 1 Strange, 653, the plaintiffs having the defendant in execution, afterwards petitioned as creditors for a commission of bankruptcy, but the lord chancellor held, "that the body of the debtor being in execution, it was a satisfaction of the debt in point of law, so that they were not creditors who could petition."

And in Horn v. Horn (1749) 1 Amb. 79, Lord Hardwicke, distinguishing between law and equity, says: "The body being detained is not in this court a satisfaction; the reason is because he is detained for the contempt; but at law the detaining the body is a satisfaction, and you cannot afterwards take his goods."

Taylor v. Waters (1816) 5 Maule & S. 103, was assumpsit by one in prison; a set-off was pleaded, and it was replied that the debt so pleaded, was the same for which the plaintiff was still in custody. Lord Ellenborough held that "the taking of the body in execution does not extinguish the debt, but it bars the remedy against the debtor, and in like manner precludes a set-off against him." Here the defendant being still in custody, the debt is not yet extinguished, but the plaintiff has no other remedy, since he is in the actual receipt of satisfaction, and has the means in his control of continuing that satisfaction till it becomes complete.

In Ex parte Knowell (1806) 13 Ves. 193, after a commission of bankruptcy issued, the plaintiffs committed defendant on ca. sa. The chancellor refused to allow them to prove under the commission, since their act "operated as a discharge." This is a peculiarly strong case because the arrest was made at the request of the assignees to compel the debtor to make certain conveyances.

In Franklyn v. Thomas (1817) 3 Mer. 225, in consequence of delay in filing a bill for a common injunction to stay proceedings at law, the plaintiff at law was enabled by demurring to the bill to gain time enough to take the defendant (Franklyn) in execution. The demurrer being subsequently overruled, Franklyn demanded to be put in the same position he would have occupied, if there had been no demurrer. Lord Eldon says (Id. 233): "It is true that when goods have been taken in execution, that may be easily set right. But here the taking in execution is a discharge of the debt." And on a subsequent day he says (Id. p. 234): "The order therefore to be made in this should be, that he shall be discharged on undertaking to again confess judgment, so that he may not afterwards say, the existing judgment and debt has been satisfied by the execution, from which he is now discharged." Accordingly, the order, which is reported at length (Id. p. 235), was prepared with evident solicitude to avoid on the one hand any implication of a continuing liability upon the old judgment, which was discharged by the release, and on the other to secure to the plaintiff at law, a new and original contract of equal value, accompanied by a warrant of attorney authorizing the confession of a new judgment in the same amount as the former.

A similar question recently arose in the case of Money v. Jorden, 20 Law J. Ch. 174, 15 Jur. 49, 13 Beav. 229, 1 Eng. Law & Eq. 146 (1850), and Lord Langdale relied on the case of Franklyn v. Thomas, and directed the same order to be made.

In Beaven v. Robins (1826) 8 Dowl. & R. 42, a plaintiff who was in execution for the costs of a former suit, brought a second action for the same cause, and the court refused to stay proceedings in the second until the costs of the first were paid. The imprisonment was sufficient.

The above cases not only sustain the position to which they are cited, but they also prove that it is not merely a sharp point of law, adhered to out of respect for ancient authority, but that it has been treated at all times, both by the judges at law and by chancellors, as a well-founded principle, to which a controlling force should be given in every case where it is either directly or collaterally involved. The original debt has uniformly and for all purposes for which it has ever been attempted to be used—whether as a set-off, the foundation of an assumpsit, or of a claim in bankruptcy—been held to be satisfied and the judgment to be valueless.

So far as the examination of the English law is concerned, it only remains,

III. To examine some particular cases, which are considered by the other side as exceptions to the general rule, but which in reality go far to illustrate and strengthen it.

1. Cases of escape. By the oldest authorities (Brooke, Execution, pl. 79; Y. B. 33 Hen.

VI. p. 47), an escape was considered as effectual a discharge of the debt as a release, and Blumfield's Case is the first decision to the contrary. The opposite doctrine was finally established in Whiteacres v. Hamkinson (1627) Cro. Car. 75; and the reason of it was given by Ashurst, J., in Jaques v. Withy (1787) 1 Term R. 557: "I know of only one case where a debtor in execution who obtains his liberty may afterwards be taken again for the same debt, and that is where he has escaped; and the reason of that is because he was not legally out of custody." The result of these cases then is, that where the prisoner has escaped of his own wrong, although the satisfaction which the plaintiff was receiving is temporarily interrupted in fact, yet in intendment of law the defendant is still in custody and may be retaken.

2. Cases of rescue, which depend upon the same principle as those of an escape. Jaques v. Withy; Lark's Case (anno 1430) 1 Hats. Prec. p. 17; Atwyll's Case (anno 1478) Id. p. 48; May, Prac. Parl. p. 107; 1 Hats. pp. 153–157; May, Prac. Parl. (anno 1603) pp. 113, 114. The defendant was never, in contemplation of law, out of custody.

3. Arrest of privileged defendants. The arrest of a member of parliament has from the earliest times been held irregular; and it was occasionally doubted whether such an arrest, followed, as it necessarily was, by a discharge, either upon writ of privilege or without it, did not operate like a release by consent as a total discharge of the debt. Thus, in the celebrated Case of Sir Thomas Shirley, Hatsell says: "It appears that the principal difficulty attending the release of Sir Thomas Shirley was the same that had occurred in the former cases of this nature, viz., 'That the warden would have been liable to an action of escape, and the creditor would have lost his right to an execution.' Nor was it in the power of the house of commons alone to give any security upon either of these points; it therefore became necessary in this case, as in the instances of Lark, Atwyll, &c., to make a particular law 'to secure the debt of the creditor, and to save harmless the warden of the fleet,' and in order to avoid this difficulty for the future, it was thought expedient to pass the general law of the first of Jac. I. c. 13." This act, after reciting that "doubt hath been made, if any person being arrested in execution and by privilege of either of the houses of parliament, set at liberty, whether the party at whose suit execution was pursued, was for ever after barred and disabled to sue forth a new writ of execution in that case," enacts, that after the expiration of the privilege, the party may sue out another writ of execution with the same effect as if the first had never issued.

The material question here is, to determine upon what grounds a second ca. sa. was in any case of privilege allowed to issue. In the case of Cassidy v. Steuart (1841) 2 Man. & G. 437, where the whole subject was examined with great research, the judges were all of opinion that the first ca. sa. was irregular and illegal. Bosanquet, J., says: "The arrest, therefore, of a member of Parliament would clearly be an illegal act. Page 471. But if the thing ordered to be done be illegal, the order must also be illegal." In the earlier privilege case of M'Cormick v. Melton (1834) 1 Cromp. M. & R. 525, 5 Tyrw. 147, 3 Dowl. (House of Lords) 215, Lord Lyndhurst, speaking of the effect of such a ca. sa. as between the parties, plaintiff and defendant, uses the strong language that "a writ set aside for irregularity is a nullity and void, and is no satisfaction of the judgment." Collins v. Beaumont, 10 Adol. & E. 225; Towers v. Newton, 1 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 319; Barrack v. Newton, Id. 525; Merchant v. Frankis, 2 Gale & D. 473. And this is the generally received law as between the parties, although the apparent regularity of the writ may be a sufficient protection to the officer serving it.

The case of privilege then as affecting the service of a ca. sa. is simply this: A plaintiff in possession of a valid judgment undertakes to enforce it by issuing an irregular and illegal execution, which, in the words of Lord Lyndhurst, is a mere nullity, and upon this writ the defendant is arrested, and of course discharged. It is evident that the first ingredient of satisfaction is wanting. The case is exactly the converse of an escape, for as in the one, the defendant, in the words of Ashurst, J., was never legally out of custody, so here he was never legally in custody. A good judgment cannot be satisfied, nor a valid debt extinguished, by serving an irregular, illegal, and void execution. This ruling is by no means peculiar to the case of privilege. As early as the case of Sir William Fish v. Wiseman (1627) Godb. 371, Dodderidge, J., stated the general principle in language quite as strong as Lord Lyndhurst's. "If the execution be lawful, and upon lawful process, and the party be delivered out of execution, then he shall not be taken again in execution. But if he be taken in execution upon an erroneous process, if he be delivered out, he may be taken again in execution; for the first execution is erroneous, and is no record, being reversed."

4. Cases of discharge from imprisonment by the Lord's act, &c. The discharge in these cases has always been held to be the act of the law, and not to imply any consent on the part of the plaintiff. In compliance therefore with the old maxim, the courts have taken care that this act of law shall in no way injuriously affect the plaintiff's rights. Thus in Nadin v. Battie (1804) 5 East, 147, where two were in prison, and one was discharged because of the plaintiff's refusal to pay the prison charges, Lord Ellenborough, on an application to discharge the other, decided that "the discharge cannot be said to have been with the plaintiff's assent, because he did not choose to detain the party in prison at his own expense. Nor can the law, which works detriment to no man, in consequence of having directed the discharge of one defendant, so far implicate the plaintiff's consent against the fact, as to operate as a discharge of the other." The same, as will be seen hereafter, has been the ruling of the American courts, and for the same reasons here assigned.

5. Cases of debts payable by instalments. Davis v. Gompertz (1833) 2 Nev. & Man. 607. Where the judgment is to be satisfied by instalments, and execution is to issue upon non-payment of any of the instalments, it is held that a release from imprisonment upon one instalment with the plaintiff's consent, will not affect the remedy or bar the execution upon a second instalment. This is expressly upon the ground that the two executions are not for the same debt. Such was the principle that governed the case of Atkinson v. Bayntun (1835) 1 Bing. N. C. 444, which has been relied upon as an authority against the appellee. The defendants were in execution on one instalment, and a third party agreed upon consideration of their release, to be responsible for their appearance, should they become liable to a second execution. Such second execution having issued and the defendants not appearing, this action was brought upon the agreement. It was contended that the agreement was void at law; but per Tindal, C. J., * * * "There is no statement here from which we can infer that the debtor was to be charged a second time, in respect of the same sum for which he had already been in custody. On the contrary, by pursuing the calculation suggested by the agreement, it appears that the second execution was for a sum and a subject-matter different from the original one." Park, J. "It was the duty of the defendant to make it clear that the second execution was for the same sum, as much as if there had been an actual recaption, and the defendant had come before the judge to be discharged on account of a second arrest. Not having done so, it appears to me clear that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment." Vaughan, J. "It is clear that the second execution was not in respect of the same sum as the first." Bosanquet, J. "It was incumbent on the defendant, in order to raise any appearance of an answer to the plaintiff's claim, to show that the two sums were the same. Not having done that, and it being compatible with the whole of his statement that the sums should be different, our judgment must be for the plaintiff."

6. It may be proper, in this connexion, to notice the case of Baker v. Ridgway, 2 Bing. 41, 9 Moore, 114, which has also been cited on the other side. The defendant was in custody under a ca. sa.; a commission of bankruptcy was issued against him; the plaintiffs were compelled, by the St. 49 Geo. III. c. 121, to discharge him out of custody, before they could be admitted to prove their debt under the commission; the commission was afterwards superseded on the ground of irregularity; and the defendant was again arrested. Affidavits were submitted by the plaintiffs, and relied on by the court, tending to prove that the irregularity by which the commission had been avoided, was the result of fraudulent collusion between the debtor and a portion of his creditors. This was a motion to discharge the defendant, and enter satisfaction upon the judgment. The rule was discharged. Such being the facts, it does not seem that the case differs materially from that of an escape. It was, in reality, an escape effected by an abuse of the forms of law, and the same may be said of it, as Ashurst, J., said of Jaques v. Withy: "The defendant was never legally out of custody." At any rate, he was never discharged by the consent of the plaintiff. That these were the grounds of the court's opinion, may be seen from many of the remarks reported by Bingham—thus Best, C. J. (page 46): "If this discharge has been obtained by a fraudulent commission, and the plaintiff has afterwards been cheated by a supersedeas out of the benefit sought by the proof of his debt, the defendant may be taken again, because the fraud has avoided the whole transaction, and the defendant has never been legally out of custody." Burrough, J. (page 48): "With a view to the privileges secured by that act (Sir Samuel Romilly's), a commission superseded, is equivalent to no commission. The plaintiffs who proved, have been induced by a force on their minds, to discharge the defendant." Whatever may be thought, however, of the grounds upon which the rule was discharged, the value of the decision as an authority, is seriously weakened by the manner in which it was extorted from the court. Best, C. J., himself says (page 46): "However, I consider myself no more bound by a decision delivered in the present summary mode of treating the question, than I should be by an opinion delivered at nisi prius."

From all the cases, then, we draw the conclusion that the English law is, and has been for more than four centuries, that the writ of ca. sa. is the highest sort of execution known; that it is capable of affording the plaintiff complete and absolute satisfaction, and that its execution will satisfy the judgment and extinguish the debt, unless this its regular legal effect be avoided by some after contingency. The only after contingencies, whether existing at common law or provided for by statute, which are allowed to have this effect, are an escape by the defendant's own wrong or effected by his actual fraud; a rescue; an avoidance of the writ for irregularity; an enlargement of the prisoner by act of law; or (since 21 Jac. I.) his death in execution. Upon the happening of any of these contingencies, the plaintiff having been deprived, without his own default, of the complete satisfaction to which his writ entitled him, the law will supply him with other means of enforcing it. Archb. Com. Law Prac. (Ed. 1853) p. 257; Sewell, Sher. p. 198. If, however, after the execution of the writ, the plaintiff voluntarily consent to the discharge of the defendant from custody, while by such execution and discharge the judgment is satisfied and the debt extinguished at law, so the plaintiff's consent operates further as a confession of such satisfaction, and if properly presented to the court, will be entered of record on the roll. The policy of the law, moreover, prohibits the defendant from entering into any agreement by which the judgment or debt, upon which he is in custody, shall, for any purpose whatever, be made to survive his release, and pronounces all such agreements null and void. Nevertheless the discharge of the defendant shall be a good consideration for an original and independent contract, which, if afterwards violated, may be enforced by new proceedings. This last rule avoids the hardship to which creditors might otherwise, even against their inclination, be compelled to subject their imprisoned debtors, who are unable to liquidate their debt by actual payment, but can give satisfactory security in consideration of a discharge.

We have next to ascertain whether the American courts have adhered to the doctrines of the common law as expounded in England. The precise question as to the effect of the voluntary discharge of the debtor from custody, has, it is believed, never been decided by this court. But in two cases, the nature of the writ of ca. sa. has been incidentally discussed in the supreme court of the United States, so far as it bore collaterally upon points then before it. It was only necessary, therefore, to enter into this subject, and to press the conclusions far enough to meet the particular question presented. Thus, in U. S. v. Stansbury (1828) 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 573, the question before Chief Justice Marshall was, whether the rights of a particular debtor were to be governed by the common law or by an act of congress. Having decided in favour of the latter position, he waives all argument upon the common law, and introduces his opinion by stating it in a form that was unquestioned on either side: "It is not denied, that at common law, the release of a debtor whose person is in execution, is a release of the judgment itself. Yet the body is not satisfaction in reality, but is held as the surest means of coercing satisfaction. The law will not permit a man to proceed at the same time against the person and estate of his debtor; and when the creditor has elected to take the person, it presumes satisfaction, if the person be voluntarily released. The release of the judgment is therefore the legal consequence of the voluntary discharge of the person by the creditor."

So, in the late case of Snead v. M'Coull (1851) 12 How. [53 U. S.] 407, the question was, whether a creditor's lien upon the lands of his debtor could survive the execution of a ca. sa. upon his person. Judge Daniel, delivering the opinion of the court, after showing that no lien on lands can be of superior binding force to that of an elegit, the capacity to issue which never survives a fully executed ca. sa., incidentally alludes to the nature of this latter writ, and the effect of a plaintiff's voluntarily releasing a defendant who is in custody under it. In so doing, he cites at length the strong language of the lord chancellor in Ex parte Knowell, and refers to the leading English cases of Vigers v. Aldrich, Tanner v. Hague, and Blackburn v. Stupart, already cited by us.

But, in U. S. v. Watkins [Case No. 16,650], the subject was fairly brought before the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and Chief Judge Cranch, in an opinion, in which almost every English authority is examined, sustains all the positions taken by us as to the English law, and recognises them as forming part of the law of Maryland, and therefore binding in the District of Columbia.

Since this decision, the case of Harden v. Campbell (1846) 4 Gill, 29, has been adjudicated in Maryland, and Chief Justice Martin sustains the conclusions arrived at by Chief Judge Cranch.

The case of Snead v. M'Coull, 12 How. [53 U. S.] was decided upon the law of Virginia, and the authorities of that state will be found peculiarly strong. Thus, in Windrum v. Parker (1830) 2 Leigh, 361, Carr, J., says (page 367): "That the levy on a ca. sa., and the release of the debtor from execution by the plaintiff or his agent, is an extinguishment of the debt, I have considered to be as well settled as any point can be, by an unbroken series of decisions." And in Noyes v. Cooper (1834) 5 Leigh, 186, Brockenbrough, J., says: "It has undoubtedly been established by a series of decisions, that where a defendant in execution under a ca. sa., has been discharged from his imprisonment by the direction or with the consent of the plaintiff, no action will ever again lie on the judgment, on which the execution is founded. Nor can any new execution ever issue on that judgment, even though the defendant was discharged on an express understanding on his part, that he should be liable again to be taken in execution, on his failure to comply with the terms on which the discharge took place."

In Massachusetts, Chief Justice Parsons, in the early case of Forster v. Fuller (1809) 6 Mass. 58, decided that a plaintiff who discharges his prisoner, "has no remedy on his judgment." So in King v. Goodwin (1819) 16 Mass. 63, the court were all of opinion, "that the debtor being committed to prison in execution, and liberated therefrom by the creditor, the judgment was satisfied, and a pluries execution upon which the levy on the land was made, was void." The same doctrine is affirmed in general terms in Dodge v.

Doane (1849) 3 Cush. 463, and in the last case (Coburn v. Palmer (1853) 15 Law Rep. 629), upon this subject, the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, through that sound and discriminating judge and writer, Metcalf, C. J., use the following language: "But a commitment in execution is a discharge of the judgment, when the creditor consents to the debtor being released from prison, though the consent be given on terms that are not afterwards complied with; or upon the debtor's giving new security, which afterwards proves to be worthless; or, though the release from imprisonment be upon the debtor's express agreement that he shall be liable to be taken again on execution, if he fail to fulfil the terms on which he is released. In none of these cases can the creditor (unless circumvented by fraud) maintain an action on the judgment, or lawfully take out a new execution. Nor can he set off the judgment in an action maintained against him by the debtor."

In Vermont the law was early established in the case of Bailey v. Kimbal (1813) 1 D. Chip. 151, where one of two prisoners was released by consent, and the other escaped. Judge Hubbard states the rule very forcibly: "Where a debtor in prison is discharged from his imprisonment by the creditor, he cannot be retaken; it is a discharge of the debt itself. It is therefore immaterial to determine whether the escape of Jesse happened before or after the discharge of Stephen. The discharge of Stephen from his imprisonment being a discharge of the debt, must be good for him, and being so, it must be a discharge of all the defendants."

The same is the law in Rhode Island as is shown by M'Crillis v. Sisson (1840) 1 R. I. 143.

In New York the law has always been perfectly clear. In the early case of Yates v. Van Rensselaer (1810) 5 Johns. 364, the plaintiff agreed to enlarge the jail bounds, and afterwards the defendant escaped. The court held that the agreement was in effect a release from custody and the defendant could not be retaken. So in Cooper v. Bigalow (1823) 1 Cow. 56, where the defendant was discharged by consent, and the plaintiff attempted to use the judgment as a set-off. But the court held, that "the bodies of the defendants being in execution, this is in judgment of law, a satisfaction of the debt." And in Lathrop v. Briggs, 8 Cow. 171, and Ransom v. Keyes (1828) 9 Cow. 128, Judge Woodworth decides, in the clearest terms, that the release by the plaintiff's consent, either of the only defendant, or of one of several, is a discharge both of the judgment and the debt.

The law is the same in New Jersey, as shown by the cases of Miller v. Miller (1819) 2 South. [5 N. J. Law] 508; Strong v. Linn (1820) Id. 799; and Allen v. Craig (1833) 2 J. S. Green [14 N. J. Law] 102. In the latest of these cases, the court, where one of two defendants had been discharged with the plaintiff's consent, ordered the other to be discharged on motion, and satisfaction to be entered on the record, on condition that the said defendant would stipulate to bring no action on account of his imprisonment.

So, in Bowrell v. Zigler (1850) 19 Ohio, 362, the latest Ohio case on the subject, and which, under similar circumstances, was decided upon the same principle as the English case of Nadin v. Battie, Chief Justice Hitchcock says: "We suppose where a creditor causes his debtor to be imprisoned on execution, while the imprisonment continues it is a satisfaction. Or if the debtor is discharged with the assent of the creditor, it will operate as a satisfaction."

In Indiana, in the case of Prentiss v. Hinton (1841) 6 Blackf. 35, which is also similar to Nadin v. Battie, Sullivan, J., says: "The common law principle is that if a debtor, who is in custody under a ca. sa., be discharged with the plaintiff's consent, it operates as a discharge of the judgment."

So, also, in South Carolina, in the case of Eggart v. Barnstine (1825) 3 M'Cord, 165, Johnson, J., says: "By the common law, the discharge of a defendant, arrested on a ca. sa., was a satisfaction of the judgment."

The law of Pennsylvania in 1830 on this subject was the common law of England, and of the other American states, as laid down in the authorities we have already cited. In Freeman v. Ruston (1800) 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 214, 217, the court said: "The law is settled in England that a ca. sa. operates as a satisfaction of the debt, as an extinguishment of the lien of the judgment. We have no other rule prescribed to us in Pennsylvania, nor can we conceive that there would be any policy or justice in departing from it. Sharpe v. Speckenagle (1817) 3 Serg. & R. 463, where the question arose as to the effect of a discharge under the insolvent laws of Pennsylvania, of a person in execution under a ca. sa. Chief Justice Tilghman said, "that the arrest on a capias ad satisfaciendum is in itself a satisfaction of the debt, is a position not to be maintained unless the plaintiff consented to the discharge; then indeed the debt is gone." The statute of 16th June, 1836, § 31, enacts, that "a judgment shall not be deemed to be satisfied by the arrest or imprisonment of the defendant upon a capias ad satisfaciendum, if such defendant die in prison, or escape, or be discharged therefrom by reason of any privilege, "or at his own request;" but the party entitled to the benefit of the judgment may have such remedies at law for the recovery thereof as he would have been entitled to if such capias ad satisfaciendum had not been issued, &c. And the case of Jackson v. Knight, 4 Watts & S. 412, so much relied on by the other side, was decided in 1842, and was governed by this act. The agreement to discharge the defendant from imprisonment was dated 10th October, 1840, and on the argument the counsel for the plaintiff in error cited the section above quoted.

II. There is no fraud nor any such mistake in the case as equity will relieve against. If there was a fraud, it was one practised by the plaintiff on himself. His own attorney drew this agreement exactly as he saw fit. He was not bound to draw it at all. He did it advisedly, of course. It is not only signed by him, but in his handwriting. To impute the successful perpetration of a fraud or a palpable ignorance of the rudimental principles of law and practice in the case of counsel so advised, so practised and so eminent, is what we should be slow to do ourselves, and what we will not suffer the other side so greatly to underrate the ability of our older and very able bar—as to do, even where they are without any other resort of argument.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The bill is undoubtedly drawn with much ingenuity, and in view of the difficulties in which the learned pleader saw it to be encompassed. He has, therefore, by allegations of fraud and mistake, endeavoured to draw the case within those well known heads of chancery jurisdiction. But the facts and circumstances stated in the bill, show that there was neither fraud nor mistake in the case.

If a man, ignorant of the law that the release of one joint debtor is a release of the other, should give such a release, equity will not interefere to protect him against the legal consequences of his act. Hunt v. Rousmaniere, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 1. And even if the mere allegation of a mistake of the law would give jurisdiction to courts of equity, and be a sufficient ground for relief, the documents connected with this transaction, being executed by most able and learned counsel, leave not the slightest room for any pretence of a mistake of the law. On the contrary, it will appear (as we shall show) that they were fully aware of the legal effect and consequences of the voluntary discharge of the defendant from imprisonment, and obtained all that they expected to obtain by his arrest.

Assuming, for the purposes of this case, that if the defendant had obtained his discharge from the arrest by fraud and deceit practised on the plaintiff, equity would interfere and annul the discharge so obtained, as to all its legal effects prejudicial to the defrauded party; yet the facts stated in the plaintiffs' bill do not allege such a case. Thomson made no false representations in order to obtain his discharge; he made no concealment of his property; he gave security to pay the value of the property settled on his wife, if it should be determined that the property was liable to the payment of such debts; he fulfilled his contract in good faith. These facts are all admitted by the bill which sets forth the agreement. But the imputation of fraud, which it is supposed will justify the interference of a court of equity, is the fact that the defendant and plaintiff differ in their construction of the intention and legal effect of that agreement. And the bill prays that the defendant may be enjoined from setting up his construction of it in a court of law, by way of defence to the plaintiffs' claim. Much as this bill has been seasoned with the phrases "fraudulently, deceitfully," &c.; this is, in fact, all the fraud imputed to the defendant. A court of equity, when examining a bill of complaint to find a grievance which will justify its interposition, looks to the substantive facts averred in it, not to the adjectives or adverbs which may be added to qualify them.

The case presented by the bill, stripped of all unnecessary epithets, is, in short this: The complainants obtained a judgment against the defendant some twenty-five years ago. The only property in possession of the defendant, from which the judgment could in whole or in part be satisfied, was that contained in his marriage settlement, and conveyed for the trusts of that settlement. Whether this settlement was fraudulent or void as against creditors, and this property liable to be taken in execution, was a doubtful question. No bankrupt law was then in existence, by which the defendant could be compelled to assign for the use of his creditors, and thus have the question tried. The plaintiffs, therefore, arrest his body on a ca. sa.; the defendant proposes to give them security for the value of all the property contained in the marriage settlement, and all other of which he was possessed, if they will release him; and if, on the trial of an issue for that purpose, the court shall decide that this settlement was void, as against creditors, then the whole amount to be applied to the satisfaction of the plaintiffs' judgment.

By this contract the plaintiffs obtained a greater advantage than they could have expected from any general insolvent assignment. For if they had continued to hold the defendant's body, he might have made an assignment with preferences, and afterwards obtained his discharge under the laws of the United States. But by this contract they obtained all, even if that all turned out to be nothing. The chance of setting aside the marriage settlement was considered a good one, and well worthy of pursuit; while the expectancy dependent on the chances of his surviving his wife, and failure of issue, was held of no account.

We can see nothing in this transaction tending to show, either that the plaintiffs were not fully aware of the legal effect of the arrest and voluntary discharge of the defendant, or that, after having obtained from defendant an assignment with security to deliver all his property to the sole use of the plaintiffs' execution, they ever calculated on the probability or possibility that Thomson might thereafter acquire property, and be subject to future executions; or intended that this judgment should, notwithstanding his arrest and assignment, remain as an incubus upon all his future struggles to amend his fortunes. Content with the surrender of all the property within the power and control of the defendant, they did not covenant for his future earnings or possible acquisitions, nor for the renewed imprisonment of his body at their discretion. It is not usual to exact such hard bargains. It was a case of actual mercantile bankruptcy, without a technical discharge under a bankrupt law; and we see no reason to believe that either party, at the time of the contract, had any intention that there should be any future recourse to the judgment. They took good security for the performance of the agreement which was the consideration of defendant's release, knowing that such a release would operate as a legal satisfaction of their judgment. The transaction was bona fide, without any suspicion of deceit, misrepresentation, or fraud, on the part of defendant. Why, then, should equity interfere, if the judgment stands satisfied at law?

When a plaintiff has a valid legal judgment, equity may interfere as ancillary to a court of law, to enable the plaintiff to reach means of actual satisfaction, which were beyond the grasp of an execution. But where a judgment is satisfied at law, equity will not interfere, unless where this satisfaction has been obtained by fraud or deceit, or made under some mistake of fact. As the facts exhibited by this bill, when severed from the epithets and adjectives used in framing it, show a transaction of which these qualities cannot be predicated; the defendant seems to have supported the first proposition of the hypothesis stated in their demurrer, viz., that if the arrest and discharge of defendant has operated as a legal satisfaction of the judgment, the plaintiffs have shown no sufficient ground for the interference of a court of equity. The second proposition, that if the arrest and discharge had no such operation in law, then plaintiffs have full and adequate relief at law, is one which needs no argument; and, as a necessary corollary, this bill would have to be dismissed.

But as the question as to the legal effect of this arrest and discharge will recur to us immediately, on the law side of the court, and as its decision cannot be avoided by leaving it to another tribunal; and, moreover, as it has been fully and ably argued by the learned counsel, it will be proper to notice it and state our conclusions.

The doctrines of law as laid down by Chief Justice Hobart, in Foster v. Jackson, Hob. 60, seem to have been sanctioned by the subsequent decisions in England and this country. Blumfield's Case, 5 Coke, 86b, reported by Lord Coke, which preceded it, is noticed in that decision. The difference of opinion between the learned judges, Coke and Hobart, as expressed in these cases, seems to have caused the statute of 21 Jac. I. c. 24, which gives an execution against a defendant's lands and goods, who has been arrested and died in prison. The question in Blumfield's Case arose, where the plaintiff had several judgments against joint and several debtors for the same debt. It was decided that the arrest and discharge of the defendant in one judgment was not actual satisfaction of the debt so as to bar an execution on the other judgment. The distinction between actual satisfaction as regards other parties bound for the same debt, and the legal and quasi satisfaction as between the parties, by an arrest and discharge of the defendant, is admitted in the case of Foster v. Jackson. To this extent Blumfield's Case has always been held as good law; but the other dicta and speculations of the learned reporter of that case cannot be received to affect the authority of the subsequent cases.

Without attempting to notice all the cases which are to be found in the more modern books of reports, the following may be stated as containing principles which have been universally admitted to be correct law, both in England and this country. They all proceed on the admitted axiom, that as between the parties, plaintiff and defendant, in the judgments, the arrest of the body of the defendant is legal satisfaction of the judgment, unless the party has been discharged by the act of God, or the act of law, without the plaintiff's consent.

Thus, in Vigers v. Aldrich, 4 Burrows, 2483, and Jaques v. Withy, 1 Term R. 557, it is decided, that if a defendant has been taken in execution and discharged on an agreement, the judgment is satisfied, and the action must be on the agreement. Clark v. Clement, 6 Term R. 525, and Tanner v. Hague, 7 Term R. 420, confirm the same doctrine. In Blackburn v. Stupart, 2 East, 243, reported by East, where the defendant was discharged on his agreement that he should be liable to be taken in execution again, it was held that the defendant could not be twice held in execution on the same judgment.

The question in the Pennsylvania case of Sharpe v. Speckenagle, 3 Serg. & R. 463, was, whether a discharge of the principal under the bread act, operated such a satisfaction of the judgment as could be pleaded by the bail in an action on his recognisance; and it was decided that it did not, on two grounds: 1st. Because the surety in a collateral suit could only set up actual satisfaction; and 2dly. The act of assembly permitting the discharge of the principal, provided that it should not acquit any other person bound for the debt.

This decision does not in the least deny the doctrine of the English case, Blackburn v. Stupart, already referred to and reported by East, but rather admits and affirms it. The other case, Jackson v. Knight, would, as a statement of common law doctrines, be somewhat anomalous; but this decision was after the common law had been changed by statute, which allows another execution where the "defendant is discharged at his own request." The necessity for such a provision in the statute, is evidence of the state of the law antecedently.

If the plaintiffs in this case had exacted from the defendant, as the price of his discharge, not only an assignment of all his property, but also a covenant and agreement that the judgment should be considered as unsatisfied, and that his property and his body should be liable at any time thereafter to be seized in execution, we think it clear that this latter agreement would be treated at law as altogether void. The common law, while it gave the power to the creditor of seizing the body of his debtor in execution, discouraged the use of a power so liable to abuse. It treated such an arrest as the ultima ratio, the end of all executions on that judgment, and legal satisfaction of it; and while it left the imprisoned debtor capable of making any contract for future payment, as a consideration for his discharge by the creditor, it gave such creditor no further remedy than he could obtain by an action on such contract. An agreement made by the debtor, under duress of imprisonment, by which he should be again liable to imprisonment on the same judgment, was contrary to the policy of the law, and void. He was not permitted, when once in duress, to bargain away his liberty.

It is very evident, also, that an executory agreement which may be made the consideration of the discharge, even though indorsed on the execution, or filed in the court, can neither be treated as a judgment nor recognisance, or as matter of record of any description; and if it be not under seal, the action on it will be as liable to be defeated by a plea of the statute of limitations, as it would be on any other simple contract.

Now, the argument for the plaintiffs in this case assumes that the agreement was intended to give the plaintiffs a right to issue further executions on this judgment; and, as we have seen, if such were its literal tenor, it would be void. But we think it due to the plaintiffs to say, that a proper construction of this contract will vindicate them from the charge of exacting so hard a bargain from a debtor under duress of imprisonment, and more especially when the debt is one of suretyship only. Among mercantile men, if a debtor, and more especially a surety, surrenders all his present property to his creditors, it is not usual to exact a lien on his future acquisitions. This agreement, while it very properly demands, as the price of defendant's discharge, an assignment of all his property, and security for its delivery, in case the issue as to the validity of the marriage settlement should be adjudged in favour of plaintiffs, does not contain, in direct terms, any covenant that the arrest and discharge should not operate as satisfaction of the judgment, or that future executions might be issued on it. It merely states, in general terms, (what was no doubt a fact) that the agreement to release the defendant, was for his accommodation, and covenants that no "prejudice whatever should arise to the plaintiffs' right by the defendant's enlargement, or otherwise howsoever."

Now, the very learned counsel for plaintiffs, who dictated this instrument, well knew that this arrest and voluntary discharge of the defendant operated as a legal discharge of the judgment; and he knew, also, that a court of law would not regard any agreement for future execution made by a prisoner, as binding. He cannot, therefore, be presumed, by this very vague and indefinite language, to have intended what he was unwilling to express in plain terms, to wit, that the defendant having given good security for the delivery of all his property to plaintiff, as the price of his discharge, should nevertheless be liable to imprisonment the next day, or at any time thereafter. Yet such is the construction which it is now contended should be given to this language, a construction which makes the plaintiff take, and the defendant give, every thing for nothing.

What, then, may be supposed to have been intended by these words, "prejudice to the plaintiffs' rights?" When lawyers covenant about judgments and executions, they do not usually seek out such ambiguous and general phrases to express their meaning. What were the plaintiffs' "rights" which were the subject-matter of the contract? For to these must we look to ascertain the meaning of this clause. The right they contracted for, and for which they got security, was the application of all the property of defendant to their debt. Whether that all was much or little, cannot affect the case. They considered the marriage settlement as void; the chance of setting it aside valuable; and the chance. from the possibility of Thomson's survivorship, without children of the marriage, as nothing. They accordingly agreed, that if the issue should be decided against them, the "property should be entirely discharged." Knowing that the discharge of defendant operated as satisfaction of the judgment, they were anxious that the "rights" obtained by the contract as a consideration for it, should not be affected. The language used plainly indicates some uncertainty in the mind of the scrivener, whether the discharge might not be possibly set up as actual satisfaction of the debt, and not merely as technical satisfaction of the judgment. To guard against any such attempt to affect or injure the "rights" which were the subject of the contract, and guaranteed to plaintiffs by it ex majore cautelâ, was this language inserted in it. The words "otherwise, however," mean anything or nothing, and only tend to show that there was some vague notion of a possible legal advantage which might be taken, and which the learned counsel could not foresee clearly, and thought might be excluded by these comprehensive terms.

The intelligent and honourable men who executed this agreement cannot be supposed incapable of expressing clearly their intention. Nor can we presume any intention to coerce the defendant into so hard a bargain, or conceal it under vague and ambiguous generalities, as a different construction of this agreement would import.

We are of opinion therefore: 1st. That the judgment against the defendant was legally satisfied by his arrest in execution and voluntary discharge. 2d. That this effect of his discharge was not affected nor intended so to be, by any thing contained in the agreement made on that occasion. 3d. That the bill shows no reason for setting aside this contract on the ground of fraud or mistake. 4th. That it is no part of the functions of a court of equity to enjoin a defendant from setting up a legal and just defence in a court of law, under the allegation that it is a fraud for him to differ with the plaintiffs in their construction of his contract. The defendant has as good a right to impute fraud to the plaintiffs for the construction they put upon it. The court imputes it to neither party, but dismisses the bill with costs. Decree accordingly.

[On appeal to the supreme court, the decree of this court was affirmed. 15 How. (56 U. S.) 281.]

MAGNIN (JURGENSEN v.). See Case No. 7,586.

Case No. 8,958.

The MAGNOLIA.

SHUTE v. GOSLEE (two suits).

[3 Am. Law Reg. 465.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Louisiana. Nov., 1854.[1]

COLLISION—MISSISSIPPI RIVER NAVIGATION — ASCENDING BOAT—UNCERTAINTY—CARE—LOOKOUT.

1. Duties of steamers in the navigation of the Mississippi.[1]

[See Bates v. The Natchez, Case No. 1,102.]

2. A steamer leaving the ordinary and usual track of vessels under the circumstances, is bound to show some palpable necessity for the deviation.[1]

3. An ascending boat, running at great speed in a dark night, at a time when a descending boat is visible, of whose course she is doubtful, takes the risk of a collision: she ought to ease or stop her engines, till she is assured of the course of the other.[1]

4. A steamer is responsible for a collision which a better lookout than she had might have prevented.[1]

5. Where a collision is produced by the fault of one boat, she cannot complain that the other had not used extraordinary measures of precaution before, or the clearest judgment in the selection of the method of extrication after, the collision became imminent.

[1] [Affirmed in 18 How. (59 U. S.) 463.]

In admiralty.

CAMPBELL, Circuit Justice. These are cross appeals from a decree of the district court, pronouncing a division of the damages sustained by the respective parties in a case of collision. In February, 1851, the steamboat Autocrat, (of the largest class,) bound on a voyage up the Mississippi river, had a collision with the steamboat Magnolia, (of the same class,) near Butler's plantation, in the parish of Iberville, and was sunk, occasioning the death of several persons and the loss of the boat. The libel charges that the Magnolia was seen rounding out from Robertson's wood-yard, on the east bank of the river, and going apparently square across. That the pilot of the Autocrat tapped her alarm bell, to signify her intention to go to the right, and proceeded towards the east bank; and then the Magnolia tapped her bell, signifying her intention also to go towards the east bank, and did so accordingly;—thus the boats were brought into collision by this unskillful or reckless procedure. The Magnolia answers, that she was rounding out from Robertson's wood-yard, on the starboard wheel only, and had reached to near the middle of the river, and was nearly stationary, her head pointing down, when the Autocrat, with a full head of steam and with great rapidity, "came upon her"—that the Autocrat left her usual and proper track without any necessity, to come upon the proper track of the Magnolia, and in disregard of the signal bell, which she rang upon the first perception of this movement. This abandonment of the proper track of the Autocrat, and this neglect of the signal bell, are pleaded as the causes of the great calamity. The officers of the respective boats who were on duty at the time, have been examined, and to them we are indebted for an account of what took place. I conclude from that testimony, that the collision took place a short distance above Butler's house, about one hundred miles from New Orleans, and near the middle of the river; that when the Magnolia left Robertson's Landing the Autocrat was crossing from the head of Bayou Goula bar to the western bank of the river, with the view of prosecuting her voyage along that bank, aiming to come close to it, near Butler's house, and was, when first seen, nearly two miles from the Magnolia; that when the Magnolia commenced her movement this purpose of the Autocrat was discovered, and that her officers acted upon that conclusion, and that the fact that the Magnolia was a descending boat, was ascertained by those aboard of the Autocrat when she was a mile distant; that the course of the Autocrat was about midway between the west bank and the middle of the stream until the signal bell referred to in the libel was rung, and that her velocity was fully ten miles an hour. In reference to the signal bells, in comparing the different accounts, my conclusion is that the bells were rung almost simultaneously, the Autocrat ringing hers first, but that the signal of the Magnolia was not rung as a reply, but that it was an anxious, convulsive movement, to warn the Autocrat of the imminent risk and peril of the course she was taking, and to admonish her to desist, rather than a response. I cannot understand the evidence of the officers of the Magnolia to bear any other interpretation. The pilot of the Autocrat furnishes the following explanation of his conduct: "They were pretty nearly a mile apart, when he made up nis mind she (Magnolia) was a descending boat, from the way she was worked. It was then witness varied his course from the line leading to X, (a point on the map near Butler's and near the west bank,) and straightened the Autocrat up stream so as to give the descending boat room to pass on the right shore. If witness had not varied his course under this impression, and with the desire to give more room to the Magnolia, but had continued on to the letter X, he thinks the collision would not have taken place, as the Magnolia continued rounding out into the middle of the stream. But if he had gone to letter X, and she had continued down the river and kept the shore, as I supposed she would do, we would most inevitably have come together, and it was to avoid this that I diverted from the course to the letter X." We have here an explanation of the conditions in which the Autocrat was placed, the motives which they originated with her pilot, and the conduct which resulted. The testimony proves that the pilot misconceived the design of those who managed the Magnolia. This is shown by his own statement. He says "up to the time he rang the signal bell he thought the Magnolia was going into the right shore, but perceiving from her bow that she was leaving the bend, or the west bank, I rang the signal bell." He was also mistaken as to the mode in which the Magnolia was managed, and her rate of speed—for he "judges that both boats were running at the same rate of speed." These misconceptions require me to examine into the condition of the boat in reference to watches and assistance available to the pilot. The captain of the Autocrat was not on duty. The mate who supplied his place, "was sitting behind the chimneys," and was only aroused by the tapping of the bell of the Magnolia. He then came forward, but so little did the pilot profit by his presence, that he testifies the mate went below at this critical moment. There was a watchman in the pilot-house, but he seems to have said nothing. The mate and watchman, however, testify they had observed the Magnolia was moving on one wheel, and the engineer had no doubt, from her movements, that she was a descending boat. The inquiry will arise, whether the Autocrat, "which does not answer her wheel readily," was sufficiently supplied with efficient and active officers and men at this time. For the present, we will consider the facts contained in the statement I have quoted from this testimony. The course from which the pilot departed was certainly the correct one. He says, "the line witness has marked on the map, terminating at X, he would have run if the river had been entirely clear and he had no boats descending. That is the usual course for ascending boats of the Autocrat's size at the then stage of the water." The pilot, Paris, also of the Autocrat, says: "In running the river at the stage of the water at the time of collision, witness has been in the habit of holding a straight course from the head of Bayou Goula bar to the point above Butler's house, falling in to the left shore, ascending, about Butler's house, and this is the usual manner of running the river at that point at low stage of water."

These opinions are sustained, and the evidence of the practice supported, by the mass of the pilots who have been examined. This narrows the inquiry to an examination of the causes for the deviation in the circumstances of the particular case. The Magnolia had an equal right to pursue her voyage, and was subject to the same conditions as the Autocrat, to adopt the ordinary and reasonable precautions, which skill and experience had ascertained, to avoid disasters. When her officers came to the deck to arrange for their departure from Robertson's, they were to consider whether the necessary evolution of bringing her out and around, could be performed without crossing the track of the Autocrat, and without awakening a well-grounded apprehension of such a peril. The Autocrat was within sight, and had indicated her character as an ascending vessel. It is a favorable circumstance in the case of the Magnolia, that both her pilots were now on deck, and her movements were conducted at first under the observation of both, and also, that the captain was at his place and attentive to his duty. No doubt seems to have been felt by either of these experienced men, that they could bring their vessel to its proper place without peril; and the result shows that she performed her circuit and was in the middle of the stream when the collision occurred, and was nearly abreast of the point X, on the west bank, to which the Autocrat had been directed. In this connection the statements of the protest of the officers of the Autocrat and of the witnesses, to the place of collision, are important. There is, too, the confession of the pilot, that but for his deviation there would have been no collision. Was the movement of the Magnolia proper, and properly performed? It is a fact to be noticed, that neither in the protest, nor in the libel, nor in the testimony of the pilot of the Autocrat, who was on duty, is there any complaint of the departure of the Magnolia from the landing in the manner and at the time it was performed. The attention of the pilot at the wheel was brought directly to the point, and his answers are clear and exculpatory. He says: "Witness would have done as the pilot of the Magnolia did to get her head down stream, from leaving the wood-yard." He describes the manoeuvre he would have executed, corresponding to that performed by the Magnolia. The pilot, Robb, of the Magnolia, says: "From what I saw of the collision, I believe the Magnolia was managed as well as she could have been. In descending the river at that point, boats keep in the middle of the river; the ascending boat, at that stage, crosses over into the bend, just above Bayou Goula, and runs the right shore for four or five miles. In saying everything was done that was proper, by the Magnolia, to avoid the collision, I say the engine was stopped ready to back, and the boat was in her right place in the middle of the river, and on her right course." The pilot, Duffey, examined for the libellants, says: "The proper course for an ascending boat, at Butler's, and for a mile above, is close in to the left shore, ascending; at Butler's, the descending boat should be about the third of the river from the Butler shore, with her head pointing about one hundred yards above Bayou Goula bar." The pilot, Scott, says: "The descending boat, about Robertson's wood-yard, ought to be in the middle of the river." Captain Thomasson, of the Magnolia, says: "The Magnolia was in about the middle of the river at the time of the collision, if anything slightly nearer the Butler shore, just in the position she would have been, as a descending boat, if she had not made a stoppage, except her head was pointing, &c., &c." The weight of the testimony is, that under ordinary circumstances, the middle of the river is the proper place for the descending boat at this place. But it sometimes happens that the descending boat, for business objects, or to take the bend below, crosses to the western bank, and in the present case a recollection of this influenced the pilot of the Autocrat. The allegation of the libel is, that the Magnolia was apparently going square across the river. The officers of the Magnolia disprove this allegation, and say there was no design to cross the river; that she moved with one engine, her larboard engine being at rest, and that they came around as quickly as possible, "rounding all the time," and were ready to go ahead when the diverging movement of the Autocrat was discovered, and then orders were given to stop the engines, which were promptly obeyed. The evidence is not clear as to the length of the circuit described by the Magnolia, nor as to the space required for this evolution; but there is reason to conclude that within two-thirds of the distance across the river it could be performed with facility, and was so on this occasion. Without any headway of consequence from the time the Autocrat took the alarm, we find the Magnolia, at the time of the collision, in the middle of the stream—her range to the west of that line could not have been a wide one.

Before proceeding to the complaint presented in the libel, I will notice the testimony of the pilots examined by the parties, and especially those by the libellants, relative to the management of boats and the customs of the river. I select the testimony of Capt. Swan, with the view of collecting about it the mass of concurring opinion that these depositions afford. 1st. He says: "If a steamboat upon a descending trip were at a wood-yard at night, and another boat should be coming up, and so near that a meeting would take place by the time the descending boat could make her rounding, it would be imprudent for the descending boat to start out or leave the shore. 2d. That he has frequently rounded out when there was an ascending boat in sight below him, but not when such boat was very near. 3d. Thinks, if a boat was within a mile of him, of a dark night, it would not be safe to round out. 4th. If a boat were more than a mile below, there ought not to be more danger from rounding out than from meeting a boat in a dark night. 5th. If a descending boat was rounding out, and had her head down stream, and a collision were to occur between her and an ascending boat, in a part of the river where the descending boat was in her proper place, and the ascending boat out of her proper place, witness does not think the fact of collision would be evidence of imprudence in the descending boat rounding out."

This testimony was given in the direct and cross-examination, and applies to the case I have examined. The witnesses generally lay down the first proposition as it is found in the foregoing statement. The imprudence of leaving the shore is ascertained by the test, "whether the boat would cross the line of the ascending boat's course;" and some of the witnesses used these words, (Allen and Clements.) Duffey says, "she ought not to leave unless she had time to round out, get across the river, and straighten down under headway, before meeting the ascending boat." A number of the witnesses, looking to the facts that the river at this place is wide, straight, and deep, with ample room for either boat to move in her appropriate track, without interference, find no reason for any restriction when a descending boat, under the circumstances, and say there is none in the daily management and conduct of boats. Without declaring any judgment upon this, my opinion is that the Magnolia did not fall under any of the restrictions found in the testimony of this witness, and those who agree with him. Upon his re-examination, the same witness (Swan) says, "he thinks it would be more proper in an ascending boat, seeing a descending boat leaving and rounding out from Robertson's, to make for that shore, and for the descending boat to make for the other shore, and thus a collision would be avoided. This would be proper, no matter what, under ordinary circumstances, was the proper track of an ascending boat. 2d. But, if he were dropping in to the left bank, ascending, and he were to see a descending boat rounding out from the opposite bank, and so far round that her bow was pointing down in the direction of the ascending boat, but still rounding out, witness's boat being nearer the left shore than the right, he thinks the proper course for the ascending boat to avoid the collision would be to keep to the left shore."

These opinions are received with more hesitation by the body of pilots, and the weight of the opinion is, that the ascending boat would hardly be justified in leaving her appropriate shore, by the single fact of seeing a boat coming out. But if the ascending boat were to promptly pass to the shore left by the other, before the other came round, the chance of collision would probably be avoided. With this qualification, the opinion seems unobjectionable. The Autocrat did not cross to the shore left by the Magnolia. Her pilot, assuming that the Magnolia designed to cross the river at a point above him, made a provision for that contingency, but made none for the more probable contingency of her descent in the ordinary and usual manner. On the contrary, he took the measures which brought about the collision, when the contingency occurred. His testimony is, "the reason he indicated his intention to go to starboard was, that the Magnolia was at the time closer to the right bank, descending, than the Autocrat was, and he could not go to that shore without crossing her bows. When the Magnolia gave her signal, he does not think she was more than from three to five hundred yards distant. The Magnolia was coming round, when she rung her signal, and so continued until she struck the Autocrat. He did not know whether she was on one wheel or two, but he knows she never stopped." On his cross-examination he says: "Up to the time he rung the signal bell, he thought the Magnolia was going in to the right shore, (western,) but perceiving from her bow that she was leaving the bend or the right bank, he rung his bell, &c." At this time the Autocrat could not have been more than one-third, or perhaps fourth, of the width of the river from the western bank. The Magnolia was then rounding, and upon a single wheel, with but little headway, and, upon the sight of the Autocrat's movement, immediately suspended the action of her engine. The course of the Autocrat was direct to the opposite bank, and her velocity was great, yet she encountered the Magnolia in the middle of the stream. The Magnolia could not, within the time, have materially altered her position with respect to the opposite shores. The testimony of the captain, mate, pilots, watchman, steward, and one passenger of the Magnolia, is, that they saw the approach of the Autocrat from the western bank. The pilot says: "When the Magnolia had got nearly round, and when deponent, who was at the wheel, had slacked her up, and was about to go ahead with the larboard engine, he perceived the Autocrat leaving the right bank, and coming towards the Magnolia. Deponent then, instead of going ahead, on the larboard engine, stopped the starboard, and rang both bells to back. The Autocrat was then heading towards the wood-pile we had left, and we were heading down stream. It was not more than a minute after deponent rung the engine bells to back, before the collision took place." The captain says, "that seeing this movement of the Autocrat, he exclaimed to the pilot to stop the engines and to back the boat, and that he rung the signal bell, and that the second tap of his bell, and the single tap of the bell of the Autocrat, were simultaneous." The statements of these officers are sustained by the evidence of witnesses on their respective boats.

I do not look for concordance in the statements of witnesses in these cases. Discrepancies must arise, in consequence of the excitement and alarm under which witnesses receive their impressions. Especially must we look with hesitation upon all statements in regard to time and distance, and in this case, the exact solution of the questions of fact materially depends upon evidence in regard to time and distance. This exhibition of the evidence is sufficient to enable me to declare the opinion I have formed upon the whole case. I am forced to the conclusion that an important cause which operated to produce this melancholy catastrophe, in which life and property were sacrificed, is that the Autocrat had not on duty a complement of efficient and attentive officers and men at this time. The character of the pilot is good, his testimony in the case is clear and frank, and, with competent aid, seems to have been adequate to the duties of his place. For any practical purpose, he was the only person in charge of the boat. The mate was where he could see nothing—the watchman said nothing—the captain was asleep in his room. The pilot having thus a large boat, running with great speed, not easy of management, commits a series of mistakes which have led to fatal consequences. When he ascertained the Magnolia was a descending boat, he supposed she was moving square across the river. He did not discover that she was moving only on a single engine; and at the last, when she was a sluggish mass, nearly stationary, supposes she was running with the speed of the Autocrat. I cannot but think that if he had obtained the information which an intelligent and responsible officer, stationed in front of the vessel,—[St. John v. Paine] 10 How. [51 U. S.] 557,—would have given, this calamity might not have taken place. In the important case of The Mellona, 5 Notes Cas. 450, the judge of the admiralty court says: "With respect to the second proposition, I worded it very carefully, I asked the masters whether, if there had been a good lookout, there was a possibility that the collision might have been avoided; and the answer was, that such a possibility did exist; and I am of opinion, in point of law, that if there had been previous negligence, in not keeping a good lookout, then that party is responsible for all the consequences which might by possibility have been prevented. If, indeed, a party is to blame, but by no possibility whatever could injurious consequences have resulted from that culpability, then the court might not hold him responsible; but if a party is to blame in the manner in which it is now satisfactorily established this party was to blame, I hold that he is liable for the consequences, which by possibility, he might have prevented." The cases of The Iron Duke, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 378, and The Europa, 2 Eng. Law & Eq. 557, are to the same effect.

The supreme court of the United States—12 How. [53 U. S.] 443—employs, in the case of The Genesee Chief, a line of argument and a force of expression which are applicable to the circumstances of this, and the case of St. John v. Paine, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 557, has an important bearing upon it. In the navigation of the Autocrat there were two capital errors, which materially contributed to produce this disaster, and its fatal consequences. This boat was run in a dark night, at great speed, (some rating it as high as twelve and fourteen miles an hour,) at a time when a descending boat was visible, and the pilot at her wheel doubtful of the course she was taking. This pilot, testifying under the belief that the speed of the two boats was alike, says: "If the Magnolia had stopped, the collision would not have taken place." But the Magnolia was nearly stationary, and it was to the excessive celerity of the Autocrat that we must charge this misadventure, which left no time for prudential calculations, or for measures of evasion or escape. It is certainly true, that commerce has greatly profited from the energy and daring that are displayed in the steam navigation of the United States. But the convenience and profit of commercial men must be held subordinate to the security of life and property, and no prospect of commercial advantage can justify or excuse those who employ this great power in exposing incautiously to peril the lives and property confided to them. Under the circumstances, the pilot should have eased his engines or stopped his boat, until he was assured there would be no collision. 3 W. Rob. Adm. 75; 2 W. Rob. Adm. 202. Nor was the Autocrat justified in attempting to cross the river at the time her signal bell was rung. This manoeuvre was commenced when the circuitous movement of the Magnolia was apparent, and her direction to the middle of the stream ascertained. The pilot (who seems to have discovered this after the engineer and watchman) then left the ordinary and usual track of vessels of this class, and in doing so, encountered a descending boat at her proper place in the river. There may be circumstances which suspend the rules and usages of navigation, and make a rule for the particular case; but the circumstances must be controlling. A pilot cannot depart from a rule upon a surmise, conjecture, or a speculation on probabilities. He assumes, in every case of a departure, to show a palpable necessity. If this were not so, there could be no confidence in navigation, no assurance to pilotage—perils would be increased, and security correspondingly diminished. The Flint, 6 Notes Cas. 271; The Gazelle, 5 Notes Cas. 101; 1 W. Rob. Adm. 471. The Magnolia, from the time her officers discovered the Autocrat to be an ascending boat, to the time the signal bells were rung, was managed with reference to the fact that the Autocrat had a track defined by the usages of the river navigation, which they were not to encroach upon. That this was not done, is apparent from the evidence already quoted. In the circumstances attending the use of the signal bells, which formed the gravamen of the complaint of the libellant, I can find no ground for a decree against the Magnolia. It is probable that the conduct of the officers at the time was injudicious; but conceding that a responsive affirmative of the signal of the Autocrat would have been preferable, in the facts of this case, the responsibility would not have been changed by this failure. The circumstances of peril were then imminent, creating apprehension and confusion of mind. The inquiry must be, whose fault was it that such conditions existed? A party who has involved himself and others in peril, cannot be heard to complain of their want of the clearest judgment in the selection of the modes of extrication.

Upon a careful examination of the testimony, I do not find the charges of ignorance, recklessness, or neglect of the rules of river navigation, made against the officers of the Magnolia, sustained. By remaining at the landing place, by the free use of signals and other measures of strict caution, which are always praiseworthy, the Magnolia might have avoided the catastrophe. She would thus, by extraordinary care, have been secured against the faults I have exposed in the management of the Autocrat. But it would be unjust to give a sentence of condemnation for her failure to provide for remote and contingent dangers, arising from the errors of those who require the indemnity. The importance of this case, the sacrifices of life and property which so often occur in cases of this description, have led me to sift the questions of law and fact, which arise upon the record, and to expound at length the doctrine of the court applicable to them. A firm and impartial enforcement of these doctrines will serve to promote order and security in this vast department of the social economy, and give stability to the interests embraced within it. Decree of reversal; libel dismissed, with costs.

[On appeal to the supreme court the decree of this court was affirmed. 18 How. (59 U. S.) 463.]

MAGNOLIA, The (THURSTON v.). See Case No. 14,017.

MAGOON (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 15,707.

MAGOUN, The (FURNISS v.). See Case No. 5,163.

Case No. 8,959.

MAGOUN et al. v. FIFTEEN THOUSAND DOLLARS.

[N. Y. Times, Oct. 2, 1852.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. 1852.

SALVAGE—AMOUNT OF—PER CENTUM.

Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice.

Claim for salvage service. Decree of the court below reversed, so far as salvage on the $15,000 is denied, and salvage to the amount of 1½ per cent. allowed.

Case No. 8,960.

MAGOUN v. NEW ENGLAND GLASS CO.

[3 Ban. & A. 114.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1877.

PATENTS—INFRINGEMENT—SPECIAL LICENSE.

Where the infringing articles were constructed and used with the knowledge of the complainant, and with his consent, and were constructed by him or under his direction, and put into defendant's factories at its expense while in its employment, and were used under his direction before and up to the date of his application for a patent: Held, that such a state of facts operates as a special license to use such specific articles.

[Cited in American Tube-Works v. Bridgewater Iron Co., 26 Fed. 336; Jencks v. Langdon Mills, 27 Fed. 624.]

[This was a bill in equity by Joseph Magoun against the New England Glass Company, alleging the infringement of a patent which was granted to complainant September 10, 1867.]

Geo. E. Betton, for complainant.

Geo. L. Roberts & Bros., for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The defendants are not proved to have used any moulds of the construction set forth in complainant's patent, No. 68,633, except such as were constructed and used with the knowledge of the complainant, and with his consent, and were constructed by the complainant or under his direction, and put into defendant's factories and used under his direction before and up to the date of his application for the patent. Such construction of the moulds at defendant's expense while complainant was in their employment, operates as a special license to continue to use those specific moulds. No infringement being proved, the bill is dismissed with costs.

[1] [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 8,961.

MAGOUN v. NEW ENGLAND MARINE INS. CO.

[1 Story, 157; [1] 3 Law Rep. 127.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1840.

MARINE INSURANCE—CAUSA PROXIMA—CONDEMNATION—PROHIBITED TRADE—SENTENCE OF FOREIGN COURT—LIABILITY.

1. The maxim, "Causa proxima, non remota, spectatur," does not exclude incidental losses following as a natural, or legal consequence of peril, insured against and properly attributable thereto. Thus, in case of a capture, if, before the vessel is delivered from that peril, she is lost by fire or accident or negligence of the captors, the whole loss is attributable to the capture.

[Cited in Dole v. New England Mut. Marine Ins. Co., Case No. 3,966.]

[Cited in McCargo v. New Orleans Ins. Co., 10 Rob. (La.) 202; Dole v. Merchants' Mut. Marine Ins. Co., 51 Me. 473; De Rothschilds v. Auditor, 22 Grat. 48; Brown v. St. Nicholas Ins. Co., 61 N. Y. 340.]

2. It is not necessary, that there should be a justifiable cause of condemnation, but only a probable cause of seizure, to bring a case within the exception in the Boston policies, with regard to seizure on account of illicit or prohibited trade.

3. The sentence of acquittal of a foreign court acting in rem, in cases of revenue, seizure, and prize, is conclusive, except in cases of fraud. Concealment of facts affords no ground to avoid the sentence of a foreign court, acting in rem, whether it be a sentence of acquittal or of condemnation.

[Cited in Allen v. Blunt, Case No. 217; Cushing v. Laird, 107 U. S. 80, 2 Sup. Ct. 204.]

4. Quaere. Whether such a sentence would be open to a reëxamination, upon the ground of false swearing in the case by the agents of the interested parties.

5. A vessel was seized in a foreign port by the custom house officers, for an alleged violation of the revenue laws, and upon trial the court affirmed, that there was no justifiable ground for the seizure, and the vessel was restored. But from long exposure, in consequence of these proceedings, it was found, that she could not perform her voyage home without great repairs, amounting to more than her value. She was accordingly abandoned to the underwriters, and in an action against them, it was held, that the abandonment was good, and the underwriters were liable for a total loss.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

This was the case of a policy of insurance, underwritten by the defendants, on the 20th of March, 1838, whereby they insured the plaintiff [David C. Magoun], for whom it concerns, payment to him, four thousand dollars on the schooner Yankee, and on her freight, at and from St. Thomas to Rio de la Hache, and at and from thence to New York, viz. $3200 on the schooner and $800 on the freight, against the usual risks in the Boston policies. The declaration alleged a total loss by the arrest and detainment by the authorities of the Republic of New Grenada, and also a total loss by the peril of the seas. The parties agreed to a statement of the substantial facts, which was as follows: The schooner proceeded from St. Thomas to Rio de la Hache, in ballast, under a charter party, to take on board a cargo of hides and logwood at the latter port, to be carried to New York, for the freight of which $600 was to be paid. A cargo was accordingly taken on board at Rio de la Hache, about the 7th of March, 1838, and the schooner, being then ready for sea, the master applied for a clearance, which was refused, and he was arrested and imprisoned, and his vessel was seized and forcibly taken possession of by the local authorities. The asserted ground of the arrest of the master and the seizure of the vessel was, on account of a supposed illicit and prohibited trade. It appears, that about the time, when the vessel was about to sail, six bags of beans were supposed to have been landed in a canoe from the schooner, without a permit, they being of the value of about $25. The beans were seized on shore by the custom house officers; and afterwards, on searching the schooner, they found certain bags of beans of her stores were missing; and thereupon they arrested the master, and seized the schooner as forfeited, presuming that the missing beans were those illegally landed. Proceedings were duly had against the vessel, in the proper tribunal of the district of Magdalena; and on the 23d of May, 1838, a sentence was pronounced, confiscating the beans seized and the canoe, condemning the master to pay $25, the value of the beans found missing from his vessel, and the costs of suit, but acquitting the vessel. Up to the time of this decree, the master was held in imprisonment. From this sentence an appeal was taken to the superior tribunal of the republic, at Carthagena, where a sentence was pronounced on the 25th of July, 1838, by which the sentence of the court below, as to the acquittal of the vessel and the condemnation of the beans, was affirmed; but was reversed as to the canoe, on account of the value of the beans not being sufficient to justify the confiscation thereof. The sentence then proceeded to declare, that the master was guilty of a fraud in allowing the landing of five bags of beans from the schooner without a permit; but that the fraud not being to the value of fifty dollars, the vessel was not subject to any forfeiture therefor; and it then directed, that the master should pay the value of the five bags of beans landed, viz. $25, and condemned the judge below to the payment of costs. The vessel was accordingly restored; but when restored, it was found, from her long exposure to the weather in a hot climate, in an open roadstead, that her hull and sails and rigging were so much injured, that she could not, without very great repairs, be enabled to perform the voyage; that the repairs could not be made at Rio de la Hache, or at any other port, to which the vessel could proceed; and that the repairs would cost more than the vessel was worth; that the hides belonging to the cargo had become rotten, and were thrown overboard; and that no other vessel could be found at the port to carry the residue of the cargo to New York. Under these circumstances, the master refused to receive back the vessel without indemnity, and abandoned her. On the 8th of October, the plaintiff, as soon as he received information of the facts, abandoned the vessel and freight to the underwriters, who refused to accept the abandonment.

The cause was argued upon this statement, and the written evidence and documents referred to in the case, by F. C. Loring, for the plaintiff, and by S. Hubbard, for the defendants.

The argument for the plaintiff was, in substance, as follows:

The facts in evidence prove, 1st. A seizure and detention. 2d. That such seizure, though under color of law, was without justifiable cause. 3d. That upon the release of the vessel, she was destroyed in value so that it was impracticable to repair her; that part of her cargo was destroyed; and that there were no means of forwarding the remainder. 4th. That an abandonment was made in due season. About these facts, there can be no dispute, unless it be about the second proposition. On this, the decree of the supreme court, reversing the decree of the inferior court and condemning the judge in costs, is conclusive; as it distinctly finds; 1st. That there was no real cause for the seizure; and 2d. That there was no probable cause; because the reason assigned for the seizure did not by law authorize it. There being no imputation of fraud, or irregularity in the proceedings of the court, and the proceedings being in rem, the facts found by the court are conclusive on all the world. Bradstreet v. Neptune Ins. Co. [Case No. 1,793]; Carrington v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 495. These facts show a total loss; but the defendants say, that the vessel was released, and that her destruction is attributable immediately to the effects of climate, a peril not insured against, and only remotely to the seizure. The distinction between the proximate and remote cause of a loss, does not seem to be well settled, and the authorities do not agree. The rule, most agreeable to the true principles of the law of insurance, seems to be, that where the damage is a direct and unavoidable consequence of the occurrence of a peril insured against, the insurers are liable, though the immediate agent was not such a peril. In the present case, the heat of the climate and worms operated upon and destroyed the vessel. The liability of the vessel to this destruction, however, was owing to an illegal seizure and detention, and that was the immediate cause of, though not the active agent, in the destruction. Barker v. Blakes, 9 East, 294; Hagedorn v. Whitmore, 1 Starkie, 157; Savage v. Pleasants, 5 Bin. 403; Shieffelin v. New York Ins. Co., 9 Johns. 21; Patrick v. Commercial Ins. Co., 11 Johns. 9.

2d. The facts show a total loss of the voyage, caused by an illegal seizure, and this constitutes a total loss of the vessel. If the voyage is retarded by the operation of a peril insured against, until the ship becomes incapable of prosecuting it, there is a total loss, for which insurers are liable. Peele v. Merchants' Ins. Co. [Case No. 10,905]; Goss v. Withers, 2 Burrows, 683; Miles v. Fletcher, 1 Doug. 231; Idle v. Royal Exchange Assur. Co., 3 Moore, 155; Marine Ins. Co. v. Tucker, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 357; Barker v. Blakes, 9 East, 294; Smith v. Universal Ins. Co., 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 176; Bradlee v. Maryland Ins. Co., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 400. See, also, Williams v. Smith, 2 Caines, 1. In this case, the voyage was retarded by a peril insured against. This retardation rendered the ship incapable of performing the voyage, because, when it ceased to operate, she was unseaworthy, and could neither be repaired where she was, nor carried elsewhere. The voyage was utterly destroyed, and it was impossible to accomplish the adventure, in consequence of the operation of a peril insured against. The master was bound, in duty to the owners, to claim and prosecute an appeal from the decree of the inferior court. Otherwise they could have sustained no claim for indemnity, as the facts, as stated in that decree, would have given them no legal claim, and it would not have been competent for the owners to disprove them. But if he had committed an error in judgment in so doing, that would not have exempted the insurers from liability for this loss, if caused by a peril insured against. If, as is well settled, insurers are liable for losses by perils insured against, when attributable remotely to the negligence or misconduct of the master or crew, a fortiori they would be liable where there was only an error in judgment.

The argument for the defendants was, in substance, as follows:

The plaintiff states his loss to be by arrest and detainment, and by the perils of the seas. It cannot, however, have arisen from both causes. That it did not grow out of the arrest and detainment, appears from the fact, that the vessel and cargo were released. Nor was it occasioned by a peril of the sea, because destruction by worms is not covered by the policy; and the injury to the sails and rigging arose either from neglect, or after the acquittal in May. Even if there has been a loss, for which the defendants are answerable, it has not been a total loss; because the captain might have received a very considerable salvage, if not a total indemnity, if he had not refused or neglected to obtain it. The defendants contend, that they are not liable for the loss, because, 1st. It was occasioned by a seizure and detention on account of illicit trade, or, 2d. By the barratry of the master. The sentence of the court of appeals does not seem to preclude the proof of collateral facts, not inconsistent with the facts therein stated, though they may go to affect the character and force of that sentence, and even render it nugatory. Such facts, for example, as go to prove, that the seizure was not malicious, nor without probable cause of suspicion; or such as prove, that the party was guilty of fraud and falsehood in relation to the facts supposed to be proved by such sentence. Again, the clause in the contract seems to allow the parties to go into the question of fact, as to whether there were articles contraband of war on board, or whether, or not, there was any attempt to carry on an illicit trade. Supposing, for a moment, that we cannot go behind the decree, and admitting also, that, by the decree itself, it appears, that there was no justifiable cause for the condemnation of the vessel; yet, that decree does not as clearly prove, that the original seizure was neither malicious, lawless, nor wantonly made under a false pretext. Bradstreet v. Neptune Ins. Co. [Case No. 1,793]. There was a well founded suspicion of illicit trade, and the detention and subsequent seizure, on that account, were the cause of the loss. This brings the case within the very exception in the policy. The conclusion is, that if there had been no illicit trade, there would have been no seizure, no detention, and no loss. The master having been guilty of fraud and falsehood in relation to the facts supposed to be established by the sentence, and the general acquittal being founded on his perseverance in his false statements, he is guilty of barratry. His barratry was, in fact, the actual cause of the seizure and consequent loss; and we are, therefore, absolved from all liability.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The first question, which arises in the present case, is, whether there has been a total loss in the sense of the law of insurance. It is clear, that there has been no loss by the perils of the seas. But there has been a restraint and detainment of the government within the words of the policy. Has there been a total loss by reason of that restraint and detainment? I think there has been. The argument is, that the injury to the vessel, by the long delay and exposure to the climate, was the immediate cause of the loss, and the seizure and detainment the remote cause only; and that, therefore, the rule applies, "Causa proxima, non remota, spectatur," and the underwriters are not liable for injury by mere wear and tear, or by delays in the voyage, or by worms, or by exposure to the climate. But it appears to me, that this is not a correct exposition of the rule. All the consequences naturally flowing from the peril insured against, or incident thereto, are properly attributable to the peril itself. If there be a capture, and before the vessel is delivered from that peril, she is afterwards lost by fire, or accident or negligence of the captors, I take it to be clear, that the whole loss is properly attributable to the capture. It would be an over-refinement and metaphysical subtlety to hold otherwise; and would shake the confidence of the commercial world in the supposed indemnity held out by policies against the common perils. The decision of the supreme court of the United States in Peters v. Warren Ins. Co. (at the last term) 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 99, is directly in point; and in my judgment fully settles, that the restraint and detainment under the seizure are to be treated as the proximate cause of the loss in the sense of the rule. The vessel was never delivered from that peril, until she was virtually destroyed and incapable to perform the voyage. But, if it were possible to get over this point, as I think it is not, the loss of the voyage arising from the total incapacity of the vessel to perform it would, under the circumstances, it being by a peril insured against, be decisive upon this point.

In the next place, as to the sentence of the court of appeals. The policy contains a clause, "that the assurers shall not be answerable for any charge, damage or loss, which may arise in consequence of seizure or detention for or on account of illicit, or prohibited trade, or trade in articles contraband of war." The true construction of this clause of the policy was finally settled by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Carrington v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 495. It was there held, that it was not necessary to bring the case within the clause, that there should be a justifiable cause of condemnation; but only, that there should be a justifiable cause of seizure, or in other words, a probable cause of seizure. If the seizure be tortious, and without such cause, it is treated as not bonâ fide done, as an act of lawless violence, or of arbitrary power, or of gross fraud, or at all events of unjustifiable force, according to circumstances.

The question then arises, whether the seizure in this case was justifiable, or founded upon probable cause. Now, the sentence of the appellate court expressly affirms, that there was no justifiable ground for the seizure of the schooner; that the very act of illegality in landing the six bags of beans, asserted in the libel or proceeding in rem, supposing it to be true, furnished by law no ground for the seizure of the schooner, because the value was only $25, and no penalty could attach upon the vessel by law, unless the goods illegally landed from the vessel were of the value of fifty dollars. Now, this is an adjudication upon the very point in controversy, as to probable cause; and it negatives the existence of it.

Then, is this sentence conclusive, or are the parties at liberty to go behind it, and to prove aliunde the existence of a probable cause of the seizure. It appears to me, that, independently of fraud, (a point, which will be presently considered,) the sentence is conclusive. This is the established doctrine of the supreme court of the United States, which was fully examined and considered by this court in the recent case of Bradstreet v. Neptune Ins. Co. [Case No. 1,793], and, therefore, it need not be here further discussed. But, then, it is said, that here the sentence was founded in fraud. It is not pretended, that there was any fraud, or participation in any fraud, on the part of the court; and certainly, if contended for, there are in the case no proofs to support it. The only ground, asserted for the imputed fraud, is, that the master of the schooner swore falsely, in relation to the matters in controversy before the court, upon the trial of the seizure, and thereby procured the sentence of reversal of the appellate court; and that it is apparent from the other evidence now produced, that there was probable cause of the seizure. Now, in the first place, I do not know, that it any where appears, that the master was a witness, or what in fact he did swear to, if a witness, at the time of the hearing of the trial of the cause; for it is not stated in the transcript of the proceedings, nor does it appear, what effect, if any, the evidence given by him had, or could have upon the ultimate decree, pronounced by the court below, or by the appellate court. What the master said, if he was a witness, might have had no influence upon the decision, for aught that the record directly states or discloses. The most, that can be said, is, that the master concealed the fact, that eleven bags of beans had been illegally landed from the schooner instead of six; and that thereby both courts were misled in their decrees. But concealment of facts would be a new head of the law, upon which to avoid a sentence of condemnation or acquittal in case of a seizure and proceedings in rem. Nor do I know, (but I give no opinion on the point) that it has ever been judicially held, that a sentence of a foreign court, acting in rem, as in cases of revenue seizures and cases of prize, has ever been held to be reëxaminable, as to its validity, either in cases of condemnation or of acquittal, upon the mere ground, that there had been false swearing in the case by the agents of some of the parties in interest. That would be a very broad ground, and open a wide door to impeach the validity and conclusiveness of such sentences. If such evidence be admissible at all, it is equally admissible to disprove and vacate a sentence of condemnation, as well as a sentence of acquittal. It seems to me, that if evidence of false swearing in such cases be admissible to disprove the sentence, and establish fraud in it (on which I give no opinion), it ought to be clearly shown, that it was the real, substantial, and efficient cause of the sentence, and not, that it might have formed an ingredient in it.

In the present case, it is far from being clear, that eleven bags of beans were illegally landed from the schooner. There is considerable confusion in the evidence on this point. But it is unnecessary to consider it, since it is plain, upon the very face of the proceedings, that the only asserted ground of forfeiture was the illegal landing of six bags of beans. No other matter was, or could be brought into controversy in the suit. The seizure was for that act, and for that alone. It is wholly immaterial, what other causes might have existed to justify a seizure. The only question is, what in fact was the positive cause of the seizure, not what might have been a good cause. From what has been already stated, the professed cause of the seizure was an act, which, by law, could not induce any forfeiture, and consequently could furnish no justifiable or probable cause for the seizure. By our law,—Act 1799, c. 128, § 50 [1 Story's Laws, 617; 1 Stat. 665, c. 22],—the landing of goods of the value of four hundred dollars from a vessel without a permit will subject the vessel to forfeiture. But, if a vessel were seized for landing goods of the acknowledged value of not more than fifty dollars, it would be impossible for the court to hold, that there was any justifiable or probable cause for the seizure of the vessel. In truth, therefore, whether there was any false swearing or not, or any fraudulent concealment, or not, by the master, it is clear, that the appellate court proceeded in its sentence upon the fact, that the illegal landing of six bags of beans was the sole cause of the seizure; and that, consequently, it was without any justifiable or probable cause in law or in fact.

This view of the matter disposes of the whole merits of the defence; and it is unnecessary to discuss the other points, incidentally suggested at the argument. Upon the whole, my opinion is, that the loss is clearly a total loss within the policy; and that the case does not fall within the clause exempting the underwriters from losses and charges and damages occasioned by seizure or detention, on account of illicit or prohibited trade.

Case No. 8,962.

MAGRUDER'S CASE.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 626.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1823.

ADMINISTRATORS — NOTES TAKEN PERSONALLY — DECEASE—ACTION—ENTRY OF JUDGMENT.

If the administratrix of her deceased husband sell the goods and take notes payable to herself personally, bring suit on one of the notes, and die, and her administrator enter his appearance in the suit and obtain judgment, the court will not order the judgment to be entered upon the docket for the use of the administrator de bonis non of her husband, unless he can show that the sureties of the administratrix are insolvent, and that the balance of her administration account is against her.

Mary Ann Magruder, administratrix of Thomas Magruder, sold the goods of her intestate and took notes payable to herself personally. She brought suit upon one of the notes and died before judgment. Her administrator entered his appearance in the suit and obtained judgment. The administrator de bonis non on her husband's estate moved the court to order the judgment to be entered upon the docket for his use.

Mr. Key, contra. She has given an administration bond with sureties who are liable for this money. She may have paid debts upon the faith of these notes. She is liable upon her bonds only for the balance of funds which comes to her hands. It is better for her husband's estate because her sureties are directly and immediately liable for the money, whether it be recovered from the defendant or not.

Mr. Jones, for the administrator de bonis non. The administrator de bonis non has shown his title in equity to this money. To rebut this the administrator of Mrs. Magruder must show that she has paid debts to this amount, or that she has fully administered all that came to her hands. If the debtor be insolvent and she has used due diligence, she would not be liable for this fund.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) said they would not deprive the legal plaintiff (the administrator of Mrs. Magruder) of his legal right, unless the administrator de bonis non could show that the sureties of Mrs. Magruder were insolvent, and that the balance of her administration account was against her.

MAGRUDER (ALLEN v.). See Case No. 230.

Case No. 8,963.

MAGRUDER v. BANK OF WASHINGTON.

[Cited in Brent v. Coyle, Case No. 1,837. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 8,964.

MAGRUDER v. BOWIE et al.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 577.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1825.

SHIPPING — PART OWNERS — PARTNERS — SHIP'S HUSBAND — ACTION FOR FREIGHT.

Part owners of a ship are not joint partners. Each may maintain a separate action against the ship's husband for his proportion of the freight, and it is no objection that the ship's husband is one of the part owners.

Assumpsit for one-fourth part of the freight earned by the ship Alleghany, of which Magruder owned one-fourth, Thomas Peter one-eighth, George Peter one-eighth, and the defendants [Bowie and Kurtz] one-half.

Mr. Marbury, for defendants, contends that this is a partnership, and that one partner cannot sue another at law. The reasons applicable to general partnerships apply to this case as between these parties.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), stopped Mr. Key and Mr. Dunlop, in reply, and said that part owners of a ship are not joint partners, each may maintain a separate action against the ship's husband for his proportion of the freight, and that it was no objection that the ship's husband was one of the part owners, as their interests were separate, and not joint.

Verdict for the plaintiff, $929.58, with interest from 1821.

MAGRUDER (HOBBS v.). See Case No. 6,551.

MAGRUDER (McCORMICK v.). See Case No. 8,723.

Case No. 8,965.

MAGRUDER v. McDONALD.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 299.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1828.[2]

NOTES — INDORSERS — ACCOMMODATION — ACTION INTER SE.

If two persons, without any communication or agreement between them, severally indorse a note for the accommodation of the maker, and the first indorser is obliged to take up the note, he may recover one half from his indorsee.[2]

Indebitatus assumpsit, for money paid, laid out, and expended by the plaintiff, for the use of the defendant, at his request, and upon an insimul computasset. At the trial a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff by consent, subject to the opinion of the court upon the following case agreed:

In this case it is agreed that the plaintiff produced in evidence a promissory note, in these words and figures, to wit: "$950. George Town, November 25th, 1823. Sixty days after date, I promise to pay George B. Magruder, or order, nine hundred and fifty dollars, at the office of discount and deposit, Washington, for value received. Sam'l. Turner, Jr." Which note was written and signed by the said Samuel Turner, and indorsed by the plaintiff, the said George B. Magruder, and by the defendant, the said John G. McDonald. That the said note was so drawn and indorsed, with the understanding of all the said parties thereto, that it should be discounted in the said office of discount and deposit, for the sole use and accommodation of the maker, the said Samuel Turner, no value being received by either of the said indorsers. That it was so discounted, and the proceeds thereof applied to the credit of the said Turner in the said office. That long before the making of the said note, viz., in the year 1819, the said Turner had two notes discounted for his use and accommodation in the said office, namely, one for $270 indorsed by the said George B. Magruder and by the said John G. McDonald; and one for $710 indorsed by the said George B. Magruder and one Samuel Hambleton; which last-mentioned note was continued by renewal with the indorsement of the said Magruder and Hambleton until September, 1820, when, in consequence of the said Hambleton's absence, it was protested; after which the said office permitted the accommodation to be renewed, upon condition that the said Turner should get another good indorser in the place of the said Hambleton; whereupon the said John G. McDonald, at the solicitation of the said Turner, indorsed a note for the said sum of $710, which was brought to him already indorsed by the said George B. Magruder. That in March, 1821, a small part of the money having been paid, the two notes were consolidated and renewed by one note for $950, drawn by the said Turner, and indorsed by the said Magruder, and by the said McDonald, which was, from time to time, renewed by notes similarly drawn and indorsed, the last of which is the aforesaid note so produced in evidence by the plaintiff. That neither at the time of indorsing the said notes respectively, nor at any other time, was there any communication between the said Magruder and the said McDonald upon the subject of such indorsement. Both of them, however, knew, at the time of indorsement, that the said notes were intended to be discounted for the accommodation of the said Turner; and in every instance the said Magruder was the first indorser. That the said note so as aforesaid produced in evidence by the plaintiff, not having been paid when due, was duly protested, and the payment thereof having been duly demanded, and due notice of such demand and of non-payment having been given to the said indorsers, judgments at law were obtained against both, by the Bank of the United States; and the whole amount having been paid by the said Magruder, he brought this suit to recover, from the said McDonald, one half of the amount so paid by the said Magruder.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reversed in 3 Pet. (28 U. S.) 470.]

By consent of the parties in this suit, a verdict is rendered for the plaintiff for one half of the amount so paid by the said Magruder, as aforesaid, in satisfaction of the judgment against him, subject to the opinion of the court upon this case agreed; and if, upon this case agreed, the court should be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, then judgment shall be entered according to the said verdict; but if the court should be of opinion that, upon the said case agreed, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, then the said verdict shall be set aside, and judgment of nonsuit shall be entered for the defendant.

Mr. Wallach, for defendant, cited Robertson v. Williams, 5 Munf. 381; Hixon v. Reed, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 174; Brown v. Mott, 7 Johns. 361; Morgan v. Reintzel, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 273.

Mr. Key and Mr. Dunlop, for plaintiff, cited Wood v. Repold, 3 Har. & J. 125.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge (CRANCH, Chief Judge, dissenting). This action was brought to recover of McDonald one half of a sum of money, which the plaintiff has been compelled to pay to the Bank of the United States, as indorser for Samuel Turner. This was the case. In the year 1819 the bank discounted two promissory notes, for the sole accommodation of Turner: one indorsed by George B. Magruder and John G. McDonald, for $270; the other indorsed by George B. Magruder and Samuel Hambleton, for $710. On the 20th of September, 1820, the last-mentioned note was renewed, and McDonald received as indorser, in lieu of Samuel Hambleton. In March, 1821, the two notes were consolidated; some small sum of curtail having been paid. Magruder was the first indorser in each instance. This note of $950 is a renewal and continuance of other notes, similarly drawn and discounted for the said Turner's sole accommodation. At length, Turner failing to pay, it was duly protested; and the bank recovered several judgments against Magruder and McDonald, as indorsers. Turner obtained the indorsement of Magruder, with the understanding that another accommodation indorser was to come on the note. The note, with Magruder's indorsement, was taken to McDonald, by Turner, who presented it to him for his indorsement merely, and McDonald, as soon as he had indorsed it, returned it to Turner, who offered it to the bank, and for whom it was discounted. McDonald, at the time he received and indorsed it, knew that it was for the sole accommodation of Turner, and for that purpose was indorsed by Magruder. McDonald indorsed it at the instance and request of Turner, and for his like sole accommodation, and without having paid any consideration for the note.

The substance of the argument against the recovery, as I have understood it, is, that this cannot be considered as a case of co-securities (sureties); that the indorsements are separate, made at different times, and not joint, and without any understanding between them that they were so; and, from the nature of the instrument, the indorsement is evidence of a sufficient consideration, and amounts to an agreement, on the part of the first indorser with the second, that, in the event of non-payment by the drawer, the first indorser was to pay the full amount. Several adjudged cases were cited and relied on, to support the defendant's objections. The one which seems to me most like the case before the court, was that of Wood v. Repold, in the court of appeals in Maryland; though in that case there was the absence of a fact which exists in this, and which might have been thought material. In that case Wood did not look to the case of any subsequent accommodation indorser coming on the note. In this case it was otherwise with Magruder. But, supposing the cases alike, let us examine its principles, to show in what cases persons are to be considered as securities, (sureties,) where they will be equally bound to each other to pay one half of the debt of their principal, and the principle of law by which they are so bound. The very familiar case of a joint bond is put. It is, however, conceded, that the bond need not be executed by the sureties at the same time; and there is no necessity that there should be any previous express agreement or understanding between them; and that it is not even necessary that the first-signing surety should know who, or that any one is to come after him, as surety in the bond; yet, by operation of law, they are co-securities, and either, who pays the whole, may call upon the other for his contribution.

Now what is here meant by the operation of law, creating or imposing upon them a joint liability? or, by operation of law they would be bound to contribute? Is it meant that there is any express or implied contract contained in the bond, between the securities? We are all too familiar with the terms of a joint bond to entertain a moment's doubt that there is not, from beginning to ending of it, one single stipulation between the securities, either express, or from which the law can imply any such obligation. Therefore, if any such obligation is created between them by operation of law, it is upon other principles; which principles we shall endeavor to show are not peculiar to the form of a joint bond. It is said, with a view to show a difference in principle between indorsers and co-securities in a bond, "that consideration is always presumed in the case of indorsers, inter se, and never in that of securities in a bond." We shall endeavor to show that, without an actual real consideration, there is no difference in the cases. Other reasons are assigned, for the purpose of showing that the indorsers, in that case, were not to be considered as cosureties, and not bound by the operation of the same principle of law as in the case of a bond. It is objected that their indorsement is several, and not joint; at different times, and without any understanding between them to that effect. But I understand it to be conceded that, in the case of a bond, they would be equally bound if it were a joint and several bond, and although it were signed at different times, and without any knowledge, by the first signer, who or whether any other was to sign it as such.

The other part of the opinion is taken up in showing that want of consideration could not be available as a defence in that action. It proceeds: "The bill in question, though drawn and indorsed for the accommodation of the drawer, to enable him to raise money upon it, must be considered as if it had been made in the ordinary course of business, subject to all the law and incidents attending bills of exchange, indorsed and passed in the regular course of negotiation. The same principles of law, and the same rules of evidence, equally apply to both; and, when so considered, the objection that Wood received no money consideration at the time of his indorsement, appears to me to have no weight." "The want of consideration" "extends to all bills of exchange, whether for accommodation or otherwise. But that principle, when tested by the established practice and settled forms of proceedings in actions on bills of exchange, will, I think, be found applicable only to the particular stage of the negotiation in which the bill has stopped in the hands of the party suing, who, having never passed it away, has, consequently, been obliged to pay nothing upon it, nor has created any liability on himself to pay; and, therefore, can only recover in virtue of a consideration passed by him to the party from whom he received it; and, in such case, it is that consideration alone which gives him a right of action. And although the law supposes a consideration, and the plaintiff is under no necessity to prove one, yet, if none did pass, it was a naked undertaking, of which the defendant may discharge himself at the trial, by showing a want of consideration, or that it was an illegal one. But the same principle does not apply to this, or any case of an indorser or intermediate indorsee, who, under his liability on his indorsement, has been obliged to pay or take up the bill. If it did," (exist in such a case, or could apply in such a case,) "there never could be a recovery on a bill of exchange, by an indorser, or intermediate indorsee, against the drawer or immediate indorser; for every indorser, by his indorsement, discharges the preceding parties, as to himself, and constitutes his indorsee the payee. No consideration, therefore, which he may have originally paid for the bill can afford him a ground of action; for, having parted with all his interest in it, he is presumed in law to have received a valuable consideration for it, and can have no right to the money a second time. He cannot, then, recover, in consideration of what he may have originally given for the bill; nor could he have an action on the bill, in consideration of payment by him in virtue of his indorsement; as such payment is not a consideration originally given for the bill, but must be subsequent, which is contrary to every day's experience; for no action is more common than that by an indorser against the drawer, or an intermediate indorsee against his indorser, in which the plaintiff can only recover on the proof of payment by him to the bona fide holder of the bill, which payment gives him a new title to receive the money from the antecedent party, and is the very foundation of the suit; and the consideration-money between them, as immediate parties to the bill, is never made a subject of inquiry, and, if proved, could not aid the plaintiff."

The judge then draws his conclusion: "And this shows that the principle, that, as between immediate parties to a bill of exchange, the want of consideration is a sufficient defence, is only applicable where a payee or indorsee has never parted with the bill;" "and that it does not apply to any party to a bill, who, on its being protested, has been obliged to take it up; in which case it is not the consideration originally moving from him which entitles him to recover, but it is the subsequent payment alone on which the law raises the promise, and gives him a new cause of action; and he sues in the capacity in which he paid, and not in that in which he received it."

In answer to the principles and reasoning in that part of the case just stated, I hold the law to be, that where a person merely indorses a bill for the purpose of assisting another in raising money, he is only a surety for that other, and he has no demand till the payment of the money. See Evans, Bills, p. 149. And if there were many, instead of one, they would be all equally sureties.

On the subject of the right to go into the consideration of the equitable circumstances attending the transaction, I understand the law to be, that it is not owing to the form of a bill of exchange, or note, nor the circumstance of its being in writing, that the law gives it the effect of carrying with it the same presumption of a consideration as a bond, or other specialty, when in the hands of a third person; but it is in order to facilitate and strengthen that commercial intercourse, which is carried on through the medium of this species of security. Therefore, in an action brought against the party, by the person with whom he was immediately concerned in the negotiation of the instrument, or by the person who has given no value for it, in such regular commercial intercourse, he will be at liberty to prove, either that the consideration was an unlawful one, or none at all, or what it was, with all the circumstances. Where a bill is not taken in the usual course of trade, it is subject to all the equities that subsisted between the original parties. Evans v. Smith, 4 Bin. 366.

A bill or note, therefore, does not become clothed or protected by the presumptions or incidents of real commercial negotiable paper, (the consideration whereof shall not be impeached,) until it gets into the hands of a bonâ fide holder before the bill or note falls due, and without notice. It is true that there are cases in which the equitable circumstances may be gone into, and where the want of consideration would not be an available defence, and this is sometimes the case of indorsements for the accommodation of the drawer; but it is in those cases only where the indorsee, or holder, has paid a valuable consideration for it at the time he receives it. If it has been paid to the drawer, for whose accommodation the note was drawn and indorsed, it is considered, in law, as being also for the benefit of the indorser, or indorsers; and so the following cases will show it has been adjudged. "If the indorsee knew that the bill was an accommodation bill, he can recover no more against the indorser than the value he has paid; but if the bill was made on a good consideration, he may recover the whole; and if he has not paid full value for it, he is a trustee for the indorser in respect of the surplus." Starkie, pt. 4, p. 282, o. "Whenever the holder has given full value for the bill before it is due, the defendant will not be at liberty to show that he had received none, although the plaintiff knew that circumstance at the time he became the holder, unless he also knew that the party from whom he received it was acting fraudulently." Chit. Bills, 84, 86.

A plaintiff cannot, in general, maintain his action against the person from whom he received the bill, unless he gave him a valuable consideration for it. 7 Term R. 350, 378, 571. But it is said, "these principles will be found applicable only to the particular stage of the negotiation at which the bill has stopped in the hands of the party suing, who, having never passed it away, has consequently, been obliged to pay nothing upon it," &c. It really has been my most sincere desire rightly to understand, and duly appreciate this part of the opinion; but I doubt yet whether I have succeeded. That we may not be carried away by the mere sound of words, let the reasons assigned be taken. "Because, having never passed it away, he has, consequently, been obliged to pay nothing upon it, nor has created any liability upon himself to pay." Is this position correct? The case put is of immediate parties; such as the drawer and acceptor, the indorser and indorsee. Let us take the very case put, of an intermediate indorsee (or indorser). Such an indorser has paid to his immediate indorser, one half of the amount of the bill only, or has paid no value at all for it, or the consideration between them has been an unlawful one, or such, his next antecedent, indorser has passed (it) to him for his own accommodation, and he indorses to another for a full consideration received of such other, and that other indorses it for like consideration. When the bill falls due, it being unpaid by any of the other parties, this intermediate indorsee is obliged to take it up, or pay the amount to the last indorsee; can he recover any thing more from his next immediate indorser than he paid him for it, —suppose one half? Or, suppose he has received it from such immediate indorser without paying him any thing for it, but for his own accommodation; the books abound with authorities which support the position that he could not. The very case just cited by me, Starkie, pt. 4, p. 282, proves this; see, also, Chit. Bills, 91.

The next reason, "for every indorser by his indorsement, discharges the preceding parties as to himself, and constitutes his indorsee the payee. No consideration," &c. Suppose it to be the case. How could that be a reason to prevent the party sued from showing want of consideration, &c. But is it the case? By his indorsement or assignment, it is true, whilst the bill remains in the hands of the assignee or indorsee, his rights and remedies upon the bill are suspended, but the moment he is obliged to pay the holder and receives back the bill, do not all the rights revive, and he become just as much entitled to recover upon the bill against the antecedent parties, as he ever was; and upon what consideration? Upon the new consideration, as it is stated, which is given him by thus having been obliged to pay it and take it up? Not at all so; it is upon the old consideration and none other; and to this effect is the case of Dugan v. U. S., 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 182, 183. The words of the judge are: "After an examination of the cases on this subject, which cannot be all of them reconciled, the court is of opinion that if any person who indorses a bill of exchange to another for value, or for the purpose of collection, shall come to the possession thereof again, he shall be regarded (unless the contrary appear in evidence) as the bonâ fide holder and proprietor; and shall be entitled to recover notwithstanding there may have been one or more indorsements in full, subsequent to the one to him, without producing any receipt, or indorsement back from either of such indorsers, whose names he may strike from the bill, or not, as he may think proper." This case then, surely answers all the reasons with respect to the want of consideration, &c. being applicable only to the cases where the bill or note was stopped in the hands of the last indorsee. The Kentucky case of Hixon v. Reed rests upon the authority of the New York case of Brown v. Mott. That case differs essentially from the one before the court. The second indorser did not indorse it solely for the accommodation of the drawer. He was as real a party as the last indorsee. He was to have, for his own use, one half of the amount of the bill, $250. In that case the court say, "If there had been any fraud in this case, or the plaintiff had not made any advance upon the note, the taking it under the knowledge stated in the case," (that is, of the first indorser's indorsing it for the accommodation of the drawer,) would have let in a defence."

From the best consideration I have been able to give to the case before the court, I think it is not so much a matter of consequence what the particular form of the instrument is, as what is the nature of the undertaking and engagement of the parties relatively considered to Turner the drawer. Is it a fair, proper case of contribution between the parties? To make it a case of that kind, and to be decided upon such principles, it is wholly immaterial what is the form of the instrument, which signs first, whether joint or several, with an understanding between the parties or not, whether signed at one time, or at different times, or whether it be by one instrument or several. The principle by which they are obliged is not founded in the written contract, either express or implied inter se, at all. The only material matter required is, has the undertaking, entered into by them, been in the same character? Are both of them bound as sureties for the same person, in the same sum? Are they in æquali jure, common in interest, common in burden? To this effect see Poth. Obl. pp. 68, 69, and 2 Bos. & P. 268, 270–272, in which last case it is thus stated by the court. "The point remains to be proved that contribution is founded on contract. If a view is taken of the cases, it will appear that the bottom of contribution is a fixed principle of justice, and is not founded in contract." Again, in another part of the same case, the court say, "In the particular case of sureties, it is admitted that one surety may compel another to contribute to the debt for which they are jointly bound. On what principle? Can it be because they are jointly bound? What if they are jointly and severally bound? What if severally bound by the same or different instruments. In every one of those cases, sureties have a common interest, and a common burden. They are bound as effectually quoad contribution as if bound in one instrument," &c.

Upon the whole, therefore, I think the verdict for the plaintiff is right, and ought to stand.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, concurred.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, dissented, and delivered the following opinion:

The counsel for the defendant cited the following cases:

1. Robertson v. Williams, 5 Munf. 381, which was a joint action of debt in Virginia, against the maker, Williams, and the first indorser, Smith, of Williams's promissory note which had also been indorsed by Lockhead and the plaintiffs, and discounted by a broker, and the proceeds received by Lockhead. The plaintiffs took it up, after protest, and recovered judgment against Williams and Smith who never received any consideration for the note, the same having been fraudulently negotiated by Lockhead, but the plaintiffs were ignorant of the fraud. The court of appeals gave no reason for their judgment. But Leigh and Wickham, in arguing, said, 1st. "The risk which the plaintiffs ran by indorsing, was a sufficient consideration to vest the property in them by relation back to the time of the indorsements, if they were afterwards made liable for the contents, and, 2d. The plaintiffs did actually pay the full contents of the note as a consideration for it when they retired it from the bank; and this consideration has relation to the time of their indorsement." "Suppose the first indorser, Smith, had been the sufferer, could he not have recovered of Williams? yet he gave no consideration for it at the time. Suppose an ordinary accommodation note protested for non-payment, as to the maker, taken up by the indorser; cannot such indorser recover of the maker? yet in no case of that kind, does such indorser pay a consideration for the note at the time of indorsement." These may be presumed to be the reasons for the judgment.

2. The next case cited is Hixon v. Reed, 2 Litt. [Ky.] 174, in the court of appeals of Kentucky. Ward made his note to Reed, who indorsed it to Hixon, who indorsed it to the bank, who discounted it for the accommodation of Ward, the maker, who became insolvent. The note was duly protested so as to charge both indorsers, neither of whom received any consideration for his indorsement. The note was taken up by Reed, the payee and first indorser, who brought his action against Hixon, the second indorser, for one moiety of the money paid to the bank, and recovered in the court below. But that judgment was reversed in the court of appeals. The court cited the case of Brown v. Mott, 7 Johns. 361, with approbation, and said that if the plaintiff in error, the second indorser, had discharged the whole of the note to the bank, he could have recovered the full amount against the defendant, and consequently the defendant in error having first paid it, cannot be entitled to recover any part from the plaintiff.

3. The next case cited, is Brown v. Mott, 7 Johns. 361. Dean made his promissory note payable to the order of Mott, who indorsed it for the accommodation of the maker (Dean); but the person applied to, to discount the note, refused without another indorser. The plaintiff offered to indorse it for the maker, if he would pay him, out of the money to be obtained, $250 which he owned him; which he agreed to do. The plaintiff then indorsed the note and received the $250. The note never was in the possession of the defendant, and no consideration passed between him and the maker, or the plaintiff who knew that the defendant had indorsed the note solely for the accommodation of the maker. The note was duly protested, so as to charge the defendant. Verdict for the plaintiff, subject to opinion of the court on a case stating the above facts. The court said: "The defence is that the defendant indorsed the note for the mere accommodation of the maker, and that this fact was known to the plaintiff when he subsequently indorsed the note. This, however, is not, of itself, a defence. The indorser cannot set up that he indorsed the note without consideration, because by sending the note into circulation, by a general indorsement, and making it thereby a negotiable bill, a consideration is implied by the law merchant, and an inquiry into that fact is precluded. If there had been any fraud in the case, or the plaintiff had not made any advance upon the note, the taking it, under the knowledge stated in the case, would let in a defence; or if he had purchased it or taken it up at a reduced price, it would seem that he could recover only the amount paid. Wiffen v. Roberts, 1 Esp. 261; Braman v. Hess, 13 Johns. 52. But as the drawer" (maker) "originally raised the money upon the note, with the indorsement of the present parties, the note must have been returned to the plaintiff by the subsequent holder, and he must have taken it up for the full value. He has, then, as good a right to resort to the defendant as a prior indorser, as if he had originally received it for its value. An indorser, for the accommodation of the maker, is entitled to all the privileges of an indorser, by being fixed in due season, (2 Caines, 243; [French v. Bank of Columbia] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 141; Smith v. Becket, 13 East, 187; Brown v. Maffey, 15 East, 216); and he must be equally chargeable, as indorser, to the persons standing after him on the note." Yeaton v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 49; Violett v. Patton, Id. 142. "The cases of Smith v. Knox, 3 Esp. 46, and Charles v. Marsden, 1 Taunt. 224, show that the principles of the commercial law are settled, that where there is no fraud in the case, and the indorsee has given full value for the bill, he shall recover of the acceptor, notwithstanding the bill was accepted without consideration, and for the accommodation of the drawer, and that fact was known to the indorsee when he took the bill, and though he even took the bill after it was due. It is impossible to distinguish this case in principle from those last mentioned, and the plaintiff is entitled to judgment." When the court, in the above case of Brown v. Mott, said, "or the plaintiff had not made any advance on the note," they evidently alluded to the fact that the maker of the note was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $250, and gave the note in payment, to that extent; so that as to so much of the note there was a good and valuable consideration as between the maker and the plaintiff; so that the latter was a bona fide holder for a valuable consideration to that extent; and therefore the defendant who had indorsed the note generally, to give credit to the note, and had put it in circulation as a negotiable bill, could not defend himself by the want of a consideration. It is not necessary that the indorser should have received any thing; it is sufficient if the plaintiff has parted with any thing in consequence of the credit of the defendant's name upon the note. This I take to be the argument of the court upon that point. But the point in the opinion of the court in that case which relates to the present case of Magruder v. McDonald, is, that the plaintiff, having taken up the note, had as good a right to resort to the defendant as if he had originally received it for its value.

4. The next case cited is Wood v. Repold, 3 Har. & J. 125. Brown's bill of exchange on Gould indorsed by Wood and by Repold for Brown's accommodation, and discounted by a bank in Baltimore, was taken up by Repold, the last indorser, who, by the judgment of the court of appeals of Maryland, (Buchanan, Polk, and Gantt, JJ., against Chase, C. J., and Earle, J.,) recovered the whole from Wood, the second indorser, there having been no communication between the indorsers at or before the time of indorsing. Two grounds of defence were taken:—1st. That they were co-sureties; and, 2d. That there was no consideration between them. Buchanan, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "There is no doubt that two or more may jointly indorse a bill of exchange, and in such case each would be bound to contribute his just proportion of the amount; but then the indorsement itself must be joint, and not several and distinct; or, at least, to create, between two successive indorsers, a liability to contribution, there must be a correspondent understanding between them." "Every man, who signs an instrument of writing, is considered as understanding the nature of the obligation or contract into which he enters; and, by his signature, subjects himself to the operation of the law governing such instruments." After stating that co-sureties in a bond, whether they sign at the same or at different times, are liable to contribution, says: "But not so with respect to the indorsers of a bill of exchange. Every indorser is considered, in law, as a several and collateral security, and is as a drawer to his indorsee. An indorsement presupposes a consideration passing from the indorsee to the indorser, and of necessity precludes the presumption of a joint undertaking. For the law is consistent, and both presumptions cannot stand together." "I cannot, therefore, entertain the first objection; but think that the indorsements of Wood and Repold must be considered as several and successive; to be operated upon by the law regulating such transactions." With regard to the second objection, the want of consideration between Wood and Repold, after observing that the want of consideration between immediate parties to a bill of exchange, whether for accommodation or not, is a good defence, says:—"But that principle, when tested by the established practice and settled forms of proceedings in actions on bills of exchange, will, I think, be found applicable only to that particular stage of the negotiation at which the bill is stopped in the hands of the party suing, who having never passed it away, has, consequently, been obliged to pay nothing upon it, nor has created any liability on himself to pay, and therefore can only recover, in virtue of a consideration passed by him to the party from whom he received it; and in such case, it is that consideration alone which gives him a right of action. It does not apply to any party to a bill who, on its being protested, has been obliged to take it up; in which case it is not the consideration originally moving from him which entitles him to recover; but it is the subsequent payment alone on which the law raises the promise, and gives him a new cause of action; and he sues in the capacity in which he paid the bill, and not in that in which he received it."

These cases satisfy me that this court was wrong in refusing a new trial, at December term, 1825, in the case of McDonald v. Magruder [Case No. 8,761], where the jury gave damages to the plaintiff for only one half of the note; the circumstances in that case being substantially the same as those in this, excepting that in that case McDonald had paid the whole, and being the last indorser, brought his action as indorsee against Magruder, his immediate indorser; whereas the present suit is by the indorser against his indorsee. The form of the instrument is very material in determining the nature of the contract. The parties have adopted a form which, according to the law applicable to such instruments, makes the parties severally and successively, and not jointly liable, and which gives the holder a right to resort to all the preceding parties on the note. Prima facie the indorsee has a right to recover the whole amount of the note from a prior indorser, and the burden of proof is on the defendant to show a different contract, and to rebut the evidence arising from the form of the instrument. The facts in this case do not show a different contract, and do not rebut the presumption. The circumstance that both parties are accommodation indorsers is not evidence of a different contract. It is now settled that the rights of all the parties upon accommodation paper are the same as on transaction paper; with this single exception, that the person for whose accommodation the paper was issued cannot defend himself by the want of demand and notice. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment upon the case stated ought to be rendered for the defendant. But the other judges being of a different opinion, the judgment must be entered upon the verdict for the plaintiff.

[This cause was subsequently taken on writ of error to the supreme court, where the judgment of the court below was reversed. 3 Pet. (28 U. S.) 470.]

MAGRUDER (McDONALD v.). See Case No. 8,761.

MAGRUDER (RIGGS v.). See Case No. 11,828.

MAGRUDER (THOMAS v.). See Case No. 13,904.

MAGRUDER (UNION BANK OF GEORGETOWN v.). See Case No. 14,360.

MAGUIRE (DALY v.). See Case No. 3,551.

MAGUIRE v. MARTINETTI. See Case No. 9,173.

MAGUIRE (TRASK v.). See Case No. 14,145.

MAGUIRE (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 15,708.

MAHER v. The ACORN. See Case No. 10,252.

MAHER (GREENLEAF v.). See Cases Nos. 5,779 and 5,780.

Case No. 8,966.

MAHN v. HARWOOD et al.

[3 Ban. & A. 515;[1] 14 O. G. 859; Merw. Pat. Inv. 462.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. 9, 1878.[2]

PATENTS—BASE-BALL COVERING—PATENTABLE INVENTION.

Where a patentee claimed: "The covering of a base-ball consisting of an outer and an inner covering, each of which is composed of two pieces of leather, and applied to the ball independently of each other, substantially as and for the purpose specified:" Held, that although the patentee was the first to combine the double leather cover (which was well known on certain kinds of balls), and apply it to a ball of a harder kind equally well known, but which before had been used with a single leather cover or with none, the change would not constitute a patentable invention.[2]

[Cited in Alcott v. Young, Case No. 149.]

[This was a suit by Louis H. Mahn against Harrison Harwood and others to restrain the infringement of a certain patent.]

Joseph C. Fraley and P. J. Flatley, for complainant.

J. E. Maynadier, for defendants.

Before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and LOWELL, District Judge.

LOWELL, District Judge. This suit is brought for the infringement of James H. Osgood's patent, issued May 21st, 1872, No. 127,098, as reissued April 11th, 1876, reissue No. 7,046. The description is substantially similar in both patents, but the general statement of the invention in the opening, and the claims at the close are different. The invention relates to the coverings for base-balls and other similar articles, but the claims make no mention of other articles beside base-balls. The patentee describes coverings of leather cut in a hemispherical shape, and how they are to be fitted and sewed, with a peculiar stitch, which is the subject of claims not now in controversy. After one leather cover has been put on, and has become dry, another similar cover is fitted and sewed in like manner above the first. The third claim, which is alleged to be infringed, is: "The covering of a base-ball consisting of an outer and an inner covering, each of which is composed of two pieces of leather, and applied to the ball independently of each other, substantially as and for the purpose specified."

[1] [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in 112 U. S. 354, 5 Sup. Ct. 174, and 6 Sup. Ct. 451.]

By reference to the specification, the purpose of the second cover is to enable the ball to bear severe usage better than it could with a single cover. The defendant makes a ball with leather covers, each of which is composed of two pieces, and is, therefore, within the third claim, unless that claim shall be confined to the hemispherical form described in the patent. His ball has a certain amount of yarn wound round the inner cover or binder before the outer cover is put on.

In a suit by this complainant against another defendant in the third circuit, this form of ball was held to infringe the patent, and we see no reason to dissent from that decision. Our information concerning the decision above mentioned is derived from certain admissions and other oral testimony contained in this record, with copies of some of the depositions used in that case, from which it would appear that the novelty of the invention was decided on a very different state of facts from that which is before us.

It is proved in this record, and admitted in argument, that long before 1872, balls made of twine, wound on a core, with a single cover of leather, were old and well known; and that balls made in other modes, such as by winding yarn or twine round a bunch or bundle of scraps of cloth, or other similar substance, or by winding yarn loosely round a core of lead or a small bag of shot, were covered with two covers of leather in substantially the mode of the patent. It is admitted in this case, though it was not in the case in Pennsylvania, that this double cover was used by the defendant years before the date of the patent, and that this use was known to the patentee.

In this state of facts the plaintiff cannot hold a patent for a double covering for balls generally; and he contends that the term "base-balls," in his third claim, means only the balls used by a certain association of persons who regulate the games of the clubs, which are made of yarn, wound on a small core of cork or India-rubber to a certain size and of a given weight. These are much harder, and will bear, and are required to bear, much more severe usage than the balls used some years ago. The regulations were substantially what they now are, when the patent was issued. On the other hand, the defendant contends that the claim cannot be thus contracted, and that if it were, it is still void for want of novelty.

It is quite within the decisions, to construe a word in the patent, such as "base-ball," in a way to save the patent, if that is one of its meanings, though not the only or even the most common one; provided that, by such a construction, the patentee will receive exactly what he has invented, and every one else can use all that is old. We are, therefore, disposed to say that the third claim may be limited, and that upon this record it may be held that the patentee was the first to combine the double leather cover (which was well known on balls made of "gimpings," with yarn wound round them, and on other forms of ball), to a ball of a harder kind, equally well known, but which before had been used with single leather cover or with none.

But we are of opinion that such a combination is not patentable. It is not claimed in the patent, and does not appear to be true, that any new or different effect is sought or obtained, unless, perhaps, in degree, by the double cover as applied to the one ball rather than the other. A changed mode of playing the game required a harder ball, and one of well-known form was adopted, and to it was added the second cover, which was also well known, and often used in the softer balls. This is a change of form which appears, in view of the state of the art, to be within the line of ordinary mechanical adaptation, and nothing more. Bill dismissed.

[On appeal to the supreme court the decree of the circuit court was affirmed. 112 U. S. 354, 5 Sup. Ct. 174, and 6 Sup. Ct. 451.]

Case No. 8,967.

MAHON v. GRACE'S EX'RS.

[Cited in Bond v. Grace, Case No. 1,622. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

MAHONEY (STEWART v.). See Case No. 13,434.

MAHONEY MIN. CO. (ANGLO-CALIFORNIAN BANK v.). See Case No. 392.

Case No. 8,968.

MAHONEY MIN. CO. v. BENNETT.

[4 Sawy. 289;[1] 1 San Fran. Law J. 33.]

Circuit Court, D. California. Aug. 20, 1877.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — PROVISIONAL REMEDIES — JURISDICTION AFTER REMOVAL.

1. Where proceedings have been perfected for removing a cause from a state court to the circuit court of the United States, under the act of congress of 1875 (18 Stat. 470), the circuit court, upon petition and notice to the adverse party, will grant leave to file a copy of the record in said court before the first day of the next succeeding term thereafter, for the purpose of administering without delay any of the provisional remedies to which the petitioning party may be entitled.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[Cited in Delbanco v. Singletary, 40 Fed. 180; Pelzer Manuf'g Co. v. St. Paul & Marine Ins. Co., Id. 186.]

2. The circuit court, upon such petition and notice, has jurisdiction to grant leave to file the record before the day appointed by statute; and, after the filing of the record in pursuance of such leave, to proceed to grant any provisional relief to which the party may be entitled.

[Followed in Commercial & Sav. Bank v. Corbett, Case No. 3,057. Cited in Re Barnesville & M. Ry. Co., 4 Fed. 13; New Orleans City R. Co. v. Crescent City R. Co., 5 Fed. 161; Portland v. Oregonian Ry. Co., 6 Fed. 323; Texas & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Rust, 17 Fed. 280; Kansas City & T. Ry. Co. v. Interstate Lumber Co., 36 Fed. 11; Delbanco v. Singletary, 40 Fed. 180.]

[This was an action by the Mahoney Mining Company against Samuel Bennett.] Motion for leave to file record in a case transferred from the state court before the time appointed by law, and for a preliminary restraining order.

Wm. M. Stewart, for motion.

Wm. H. Sharp, contra.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. On July 16, 1877, the complainant filed its bill in the state district court of the Nineteenth judicial district, among other things, praying an injunction against the sale and working of the mine claimed by the complainant. At the same time it gave defendant notice of an application for a preliminary injunction. On August 6, the defendant gave notice of his appearance, and of a petition to remove the case to the United States circuit court, on the ground that the defendant is a citizen of Prussia, the complainant being a domestic corporation; which motion was granted on August 14, before the application for a preliminary injunction had been heard by the court. The first day of the next succeeding term of the said circuit court would be the fourth Monday in November, nearly four months distant. The complainant thereupon immediately gave defendant notice of an application to the circuit court for leave to file a copy of the record of the case in said court; and that upon leave being granted it would apply for a preliminary injunction upon the same grounds as stated in the application for an injunction in the state court before the making of the order of removal. The defendant objects to the hearing of the application for leave to file the copy of the record, as well as the further motion for an injunction, on the ground that, under the statute, he has till the first day of the next term to file the record; and that, until that day, this court can have no jurisdiction over the cause. It is true, as urged by defendant, that the statute makes no provision for filing the copy of the record before the first day of the next succeeding term, or by any other person than the party removing the cause. But it is also true that there is nothing prohibiting the filing of the record at an earlier day, or by any party interested, other than the one removing the cause. Where a sufficient petition is filed in a proper case for removal, and a sufficient bond given, the proceedings being all regular and sufficient, the state court can take no further proceedings in the case without usurping jurisdiction. 18 Stat. 471, § 3; Insurance Co. v. Dunn, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 224. If, after completing the proceedings for a removal, so far as to deprive the state court from taking any further action, there is no means by which the circuit court can get hold of the case till the first day of the next succeeding term, there will be a case pending, in some cases for many months, in which no court has jurisdiction to take any action whatever. An attachment may have been obtained, which ought to be dissolved, and which it would be ruinous to the defendant to continue; so an injunction, or the appointment of a receiver may be imperatively required to protect the interest of the complainant pending the action, which no court has power to grant until too late; or an injunction, or a preliminary restraining order may be improperly granted, and the removal made before the injured party can be relieved. In case of a removal pending a motion for an injunction, or application for a receiver, a party might be obstructed in obtaining a provisional remedy to which he is entitled, at a ruinous sacrifice. He could not move in that case, because it is suspended between two courts, neither of which can act; and he could not even dismiss his action and commence a new one in the national courts, wherein the court would have jurisdiction to afford him provisional relief, because, if neither court has authority to take action, it has no authority to enter an order of dismissal of the action once pending, until the statutory time for filing the copy of the record in the national courts has elapsed and the record has been filed. The injured party would, therefore, be remediless. If such be the law, causes will doubtless often be transferred for the purpose of accomplishing these results, thereby defeating the ends of justice. From the moment that the proceedings for removal are perfected, the circuit court, in my judgment, is in a position to take jurisdiction for the purposes indicated; and it only needs the record to enable it to proceed. Under sections 7 and 8 the court is expressly given authority to take the means prescribed to obtain the record, where the state court, or its officers, refuse to furnish a copy. For some purposes, at least, the circuit court may take action before the record is filed. The only obstacle to proceeding is the want of the record. After a careful consideration of the act of congress, I have reached the conclusion that, where the necessary proceedings have been taken in a proper case, to remove a cause from a state to a national court, and the facts are made to appear in a petition filed in the court to which the cause is removed, this forms a sufficient basis upon which such court has jurisdiction to act, after due notice to the adverse party, and upon which leave to file the record may be granted; and, after the record has been filed in pursuance of such leave, that the court has jurisdiction, in its discretion, to proceed and administer all provisional remedies applicable to the case. Any other construction would work intolerable inconvenience and remediless injury to the parties, and could not have been contemplated by congress. It was intended to put the burden of making the transfer of the record upon the party availing himself of the right given; and it was only to secure this end that he is mentioned in the act in this connection and means provided for securing his action within a reasonable time. As no duty was imposed upon the other party, there was no necessity for naming him in connection with these provisions. I think, however, the act should be amended, authorizing either party, at any time, to file the record upon giving notice to the adverse party, and expressly authorizing the circuit court to thereupon proceed with the case, as otherwise great delay may often result from a removal. Mr. Circuit Judge Dillon, also, seems to be of the opinion that the circuit court may take jurisdiction, upon due notice, for the purposes of administering provisional remedies. Dill. Rem. Causes, p. 71. Let leave to file a copy of the record be granted.

The record having been filed, and the defendant not being ready to respond to the motion for an injunction, the court, upon ex parte application at chambers, upon security being given, granted a restraining order till the application could be heard.

[See Case No. 8,969.]

Case No. 8,969.

MAHONY MIN. CO. v. BENNETT.

[5 Sawy. 141; 6 Reporter, 99.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. April 22, 1878.

CORPORATIONS—BOARD OF DIRECTORS—FRAUDULENT LEASE OF A MINE.

Where a board of directors of a mining corporation makes a nominal lease of the mine owned by the corporation, to a party really acting in the interests of a minority of the stockholders, not in the ordinary course of the business of the corporation, but for the purpose of withdrawing the mine from the control of a board of directors about to be elected at an approaching meeting of the stockholders, and thereby perpetuating the control of the minority, a court of equity will cancel the lease on a bill filed by the corporation for that purpose.

Bill in equity [by Mahony Mining Company against Samuel Bennett] to set aside a lease on the ground of fraud. [For a former hearing on a motion for leave to file record in the case and for a preliminary restraining order, see Case No. 8,968.]

McAllisters & Bergin and Stewart, Van Clief & Herrin, for complainants.

S. Heydenfeldt and Wm. H. Sharp, for defendant.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. This case was argued very thoroughly, and the testimony was very fully read on the hearing. It is a bill in chancery to set aside a lease of a mine for three years, with an option to purchase at the price of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars within that period. The ground alleged is that this lease was made, not in the due and proper course of the business of the corporation, but by a conspiracy, in fraud of the rights of the majority, and in the interest of the minority, of the stockholders. The bill is filed to cancel the lease on that ground.

Testimony has been introduced and arguments have been made with reference to the irregularity of the election of both the boards of directors claiming to represent the corporation; but I do not find it necessary, in the view I take of the case, to decide as to the ultimate validity of those elections; and I shall assume, for the purposes of the decision, that the election of the first board of directors, by whom the lease was made, was valid. The result of that election is only important, in the view I take, so far as it bears upon the question as to the purpose for which this lease was made. There are certainly some irregularities in it, and some extraordinary circumstances connected with that transaction. Nevertheless, I shall consider those in this case only as indicating the motives of the actors, and their bearing upon the validity, or legal propriety, of this lease.

The mine seems to have been worked without any difficulty up to a certain time in April, 1877. The two principal stockholders owned fifty-two hundred shares each, and there were sixteen hundred shares outstanding, belonging to Sharon, Bell, Sunderland and Flood & O'Brien. One of the directors—the director who, as I understand it, represented the interests of Sharon, Bell, Sunderland and Flood & O'Brien—resigned; and the remaining directors called a meeting of the stockholders for the purpose of electing a new board of directors. This meeting was called apparently in the interests of the Seligmans—one of the two large stockholders. The other large stockholder, Stewart, owning an equal number of shares with the Seligmans, was at the time temporarily absent on business in New York, and was not notified of the calling of the meeting of the stockholders. A thousand shares of the stock of the company, owned by Sharon, Bell and Flood & O'Brien, stood in the name of one Bush, as trustee, and were voted at that meeting by him without the knowledge or consent of the owners, who were in the city at the time; and neither Sharon nor Bell was aware that his stock had ever been issued, and neither had notice of the calling of the meeting. These shares were required to constitute a majority of the stock.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 6 Reporter, 99, gives only a partial report.]

At that meeting a new board of directors was elected, most of them, apparently, being merely nominal owners of stock, holding a few shares in order to qualify them to act as directors. The meeting seems to have been organized, and the new directors elected, under the management of Benjamin, acting in the interest of the Seligmans; at all events these directors were elected to control the corporation; and, for the purposes of this decision, I shall assume that they had authority to act as directors in the usual business of the corporation.

When Stewart returned to the city within a few days after, and ascertained what had been done, there was dissatisfaction, and some discussion over the matter. Previous to this time there had been no meeting of the stockholders or election of directors since the first board was elected, three or four years before; and, as the by-laws of the corporation contained no provision for the calling of an annual meeting, the statute provides that, in such a case, the time of meeting shall be the first Tuesday in June. Civ. Code, § 302. In case no meeting is called by the board at the time appointed by law, one half of the stockholders are authorized to call one. Id. §§ 310, 314. The extraordinary meeting was held on May 1, a few days only over a month prior to the time appointed by the statute for the annual meeting. Stewart, upon ascertaining the condition of things—that the one thousand shares of Sharon and Bell and others had been voted without their knowledge and consent—bought up these outstanding shares before the first of June, and immediately notified all the stockholders and the directors of the calling of a stockholders' meeting in June, in the mode designated by the statute. Immediately on receiving that notice, the directors elected on the first of May met, on the first of June, and, without having previously had any consultation in regard to the matter, Benjamin, representing the Seligmans, being the active party, it was proposed to make a lease of the property to one Bennett, a brother-in-law of Benjamin; and the board passed a resolution authorizing the making of the lease, and the lease was thereupon made, the lease in question here. All this was accomplished before and on the fifth of June.

Now the question is as to the purpose of that lease. It is claimed on the one side that it was made in good faith, in the interest of all the stockholders; and on the other side it is claimed that it is a mere sham, gotten up for the purpose of keeping the control of the mine from passing into the hands of the majority of the stockholders in case they should elect a new board of directors at the meeting called in June. It is admitted by the principal witnesses, and by the ones particularly active in the matter, that that was one of the purposes of the lease. It is so stated in their testimony, and I think no one can read that testimony without being satisfied that that was the moving and controlling purpose of this lease. It is very manifest, to my mind, that Bennett was not the real lessee, but was a mere instrument in the hands of Benjamin, acting in the interest of the minority of the stockholders at that time. Bennett was a man not likely to take such a lease, having no sufficient means with which to carry on such an undertaking, and not being a man of experience in mining, or a person whom business men of ordinary judgment and prudence would be likely to entrust with such an enterprise. From the testimony, it appears manifest to my mind that the money paid out by him, after assuming control of the mine, was furnished by other parties, and not by Bennett; that Benjamin was still the active and controlling man as before. It is impossible, it seems to me, after reading the testimony in the case, to come to the conclusion that the transaction was really a bona fide lease to Bennett, for his own purposes. Bennett was but the instrument, the shadow of the real parties seeking to withdraw the control of the mine from the board of directors about to be elected by the majority of the stockholders.

Now, it may well be, that, in making such a lease, the parties, representing the minority, may have believed that the interest of all the stockholders was advanced; but in this case, where this lease is given with an option to purchase the mine for two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, it is certainly a remarkable fact that the man who was active in the matter should have been Benjamin, both before and after the lease. Manifestly, the controlling purpose was to circumvent the other stockholders, who were seeking, at the proper time and in the mode appointed by the statute, to elect a new board of directors, and to put the mine beyond their reach and control, in order that the Seligmans might control it according to their own ideas of what was right and proper. Whether or not this was, as the complainant insists, intended as a fraud, the manifest operation of the proceeding, if consummated, would be to work a fraud upon the rights of a majority of the stockholders. Upon that ground I think the lease was not made in the due and regular course of business of the corporation, or for any legitimate purpose. It was made for the purpose of diverting the mine into the control of the minority of the stockholders, against the opposition of the majority, without any representation on the part of the majority, in case the majority should succeed in establishing their control of the corporation—should elect a new board of directors at the coming meeting.

It is said that this new election was void, and that the acts of the new board of directors are not the acts of the corporation. The new board was elected by a majority of the stockholders at a meeting held at a time and in the manner authorized by law, and a state court has decided that election to be valid; and, although there is an appeal pending, that judgment is still unreversed. At all events, the new board is in active control, and, as I understand it, in possession of the books, etc., of the corporation; and its members are now, and were at the time, de facto, acting as directors.

As to the management of the mine, we have nothing to do with that here. Upon the vacation of the lease the mine, as it should be, will be subject to the control of the legal board of directors, whoever they may be. The new members were doubtless all elected in the interest of those opposed to the Seligmans, as the old ones were in their favor. But we have nothing to do with that in this suit. I have disposed of the only question involved in the case in determining that this lease was made for an unlawful purpose—for the purpose of taking the mine out of the control of those who were to succeed in the management of the mine, should an election be lawfully held, in pursuance of notice already given: a purpose which, in my judgment, renders the lease an unlawful exercise of the powers assumed and exercised by those parties by whom it was made, and therefore that it should be canceled.

Let a decree be entered canceling the lease, in pursuance of the prayer of the bill, and making the preliminary injunction issued perpetual.

Case No. 8,970.

MAHOON et al v. The GLOCESTER.

[Bee, 395;[1] 2 Pet. Adm. 403.]

Admiralty Court, Pennsylvania. 1780.

PRIZE—SEAMEN'S SHARES—HOW FOUNDED—VOYAGE BEGUN—PUT ON SHORE.

1. Admiralty has jurisdiction in cases of claims made by seamen to shares of prizes.

2. The right of a seaman to wages is not founded in the articles, but in the service.

[Cited in Worth v. The Lioness No. 2, 3 Fed. 925.]

3. The captain of a vessel, without giving any reason for his conduct, forces some of his crew on shore after a voyage is begun. They shall be entitled to share in the prizes taken.

[Cited in Emerson v. Howland, Case No. 4,441; Pratt v. Thomas, Id. 11,377.]

The brig Glocester had been captured by Roger Kean in the privateer Holker, and condemned as prize to the captors. The marshal being about to make distribution of the booty amongst the crew, according to the list handed in by Captain Kean, was notified to stay in his hands twenty-five shares of the said prize, claimed by Patrick Mahoon, and others, as being a part of the crew belonging to, and concerned in the said privateer Holker. Notwithstanding that their names were not to be found in the captain's return; the libel, now before the court, is for these twenty-five shares.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. The circumstances of this case appear, by the testimony exhibited, to be as follows: The printed articles of the privateer Holker were set up at a common house of rendezvous for the enlistment of privateer's men, according to custom. The libellants, in common with many others, signed these articles, and made the necessary preparations for the cruize. When the Holker was ready to sail, the libellants, with the rest of the crew, repaired on board by order of the captain, and the vessel set sail. When they arrived at Chester on the Delaware (fifteen miles below Philadelphia) Captain Kean mustered his crew upon deck, called over their names as subscribed to the articles, and then, without giving any reason for his conduct, selected Patrick Mahoon and twenty-four others, and ordered them on shore; refusing to let them proceed on the cruize, and when they earnestly solicited to be continued on board he forcibly drove them away, and the captain proceeded on his voyage, leaving the libellants behind. A few days after Kean again called his crew together and produced to them another printed copy of articles, which he urged them to sign. Some objected, observing that they had already signed, and did not understand signing two sets of articles for the same cruize; but the captain enforced them with threats and even blows, to sign the new articles; declaring at the same time, that his view was to exclude those men whom he had left behind from having any share of the prizes they might take. The brig Glocester was captured during this cruize.

The respondents have rested their cause principally on a plea to the jurisdiction of this court; alleging that the injury, if any, was exclusively of common law cognizance; because the libellants' claim was founded in articles executed on shore, within the body of a county: that although the admiralty could determine the question of prize or no prize; yet it could not determine to whose use, having no jurisdiction in disputes between owner and owner, owner and captain, or captain and mariner, except only in the case of a mariner's wages, which is allowed out of special favour, and not of right, further than as communis error facit jus.

The facts being fully ascertained, and not controverted, no difficulty arises from that quarter. It is in proof that Captain Kean forced the libellants on shore after the voyage was begun, and compelled the remainder of the crew to sign the new articles, with a view to exclude the libellants from any advantage they might claim under the former; and it is contended that this court cannot redress the injury, because the suit respects damages, which the common law alone can ascertain. The truth, however, is, that the parties do not sue for redress of an injury; but for their shares of a prize legally condemned to the use of the owners, officers, and crew, and of all persons belonging to, or concerned in the privateer Holker: of which crew, they say, they are a part. The articles of enlistment, executed on shore, is no bar to the jurisdiction of the admiralty. Mariners are generally engaged on shore, and always sue for their wages in this court. In the one case the mariners are paid by monthly wages, or by the run, in the other by a share of the booty taken. There is the same reason in both cases. But I am of opinion that the articles are not the true foundation of a seaman's claim. If one or more mariners should enter on board a vessel, with the knowledge and consent of the master, should receive his orders and perform the duties of the station, they would be entitled to customary wages, or a proportion of the booty taken in common with the rest of the crew, although they had signed no articles at all: the right is not founded in the articles, but in the service.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Thomas Bee, District Judge.]

It has been said, that this court can only determine the question prize or no prize, but cannot adjudge to whose use. Broom's Case, Carth. 399; Id. 475,—is express in point to the contrary. The admiralty not only decreed lawful prize, but also to whose use, viz. to the king's; and Broom having converted the property to his own use, was sued in the admiralty by the king's proctor for the value. Broom applied for a prohibition, which was denied; because the court of admiralty, having determined the property to be prize to the king, this second suit was deemed to be only a continuation of the original process. Moreover, it cannot be supposed but that during the many maritime wars in which England hath been engaged, contests about the rights of seamen to shares of prizes must have frequently occurred. If then such claims were only triable at common law, they would doubtless appear in some of the books of reports. But no actions of this kind can be found in those books, nor even prohibitions prayed for in such cases. The inference is, that such suits were allowed to be exclusively of admiralty jurisdiction. If Captain Kean had any reasonable objections against the libellants, he should have made those objections before he received them on board, or at least before the vessel had weighed anchor and commenced her voyage. As the libellants were in fact forced from the service, I do not see why this wrong, on the part of the captain, should deprive them of the right they had obtained in this cruize by the enlistment, and by the captain's confirmation of that enlistment when he received them into his service.

I adjudge that the libellants have and receive their respective shares of the prize brig Glocester, and her cargo, in common with the rest of the Holker's crew.

The respondents appealed from this decree; but the court of appeals confirmed the sentence. [See Case No. 7,632.]

MAIDEN, The (BROWER v.). See Case No. 1,970.

Case No. 8,971.

MAILLARD et al. v. LAWRENCE.

[1 Blatchf. 504; [1] 12 Law Rep. 354.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1849.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—SHAWLS—WEARING APPAREL.

1. Shawls or scarfs, manufactured on looms, and in strips or pieces containing several, the place of separation indicated by threads which form, when cut, the fringe, and the articles being actually separated before importation, and being, in the state in which they are imported, suitable and adapted to be worn by women and children as articles of dress, and, at the time of importation, usually so worn, and imported for that purpose, come within the description of wearing apparel, under Schedule C of the tariff act of July 30th, 1846 (9 Stat. 45), and are chargeable with a duty of 30 per cent.

2. By the use of the words "wearing apparel" in the act of 1846, congress intended to make the purpose, adaptation, and use of an article, and not its commercial designation, the test of its dutiable description.

[Cited in U. S. v. Washington Mills, Case No. 16,647; U. S. v. Oppenheimer, 61 Fed. 284.]

This was an action [by Thirion Maillard and others] against [Cornelius W. Lawrence] the collector of the port of New-York, to recover back an excess of duties paid upon shawls and scarfs, composed some of worsted alone, some of silk alone, some of silk and worsted, and some of worsted and cotton. It was tried before Mr. Justice Nelson, in April, 1848. A duty of thirty per cent. was charged upon the articles, as "wearing apparel of every description, of whatever material composed, made up or manufactured wholly or in part by the tailor, sempstress, or manufacturer," under Schedule C of the act of July 30th, 1846. 9 Stat. 45. The plaintiffs claimed that a duty of only twenty-five per cent. should have been charged on the articles, as "manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component material, not otherwise provided for," and "manufactures of worsted, or of which worsted shall be a component material, not otherwise provided for," under Schedule D of the same act. Id. 46. It appeared in evidence that the shawls and scarfs were manufactured on looms, and in strips or pieces containing several shawls or scarfs, the place of separation being indicated by threads, which formed, when cut, the fringe, and the articles being actually separated before importation, and being, in the state in which they were imported, suitable and adapted to be worn on the person by women and children, as articles of dress, and, at the time of importation, usually so worn, and imported for that purpose. There was much evidence given for the purpose of showing that the articles were not known in trade and commerce as "wearing apparel." The court charged the jury that the articles in question were not "wearing apparel" under Schedule C of the act, but were manufactures of worsted, cotton, and silk under Schedule D of the act, and were, therefore, chargeable with a duty of only twenty-five per cent. A verdict was found for the plaintiffs, and the defendant now moved for a new trial, on a bill of exceptions.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Benjamin F. Butler, for defendant.
Francis B. Cutting, for plaintiffs.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. We are of opinion that the shawls and scarfs in question come within the description of "wearing apparel" under Schedule C of the tariff act of July 30th, 1846, and were properly charged with a duty of thirty per cent. This phraseology for the purpose of describing a dutiable article, was used for the first time in the act of 1846, and was introduced for the purpose of describing a class of articles, not as known in trade and commerce by any particular appellation, but by the actual use for which they were designed, and to which they were adapted, taken in connection with the fact that they were made up or manufactured wholly or in part by the tailor, sempstress, or manufacturer. Congress intended to depart from the commercial designation as the test to determine the description within which the duty should or should not be charged, and to leave such determination to the test of the actual use of the article. Hence, the purpose for which it was made, its fitness and adaptation as an article of dress, and the actual use of it, are the proper subjects of inquiry in determining whether it comes within the clause in question; not the name or description by which it may be known to the manufacturer, or importer, or others dealing in the article. Is the article wearing apparel in point of fact, made up or manufactured by the tailor, sempstress, or manufacturer? That is the question to be determined for the purpose of ascertaining the rate of duty. The words are used in their natural and ordinary sense, and are to be so interpreted by the court. A new trial must be granted, with costs to abide the event.

[Upon the new trial there was a verdict for the defendant. The case was then taken to the supreme court upon error where the judgment was affirmed 16 How. (57 U. S.) 251.]

Case No. 8,972.

MAILLARD et al. v. LAWRENCE.

[3 Blatchf. 378.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 30, 1855.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—VALUE OF GOODS—TIME OF PURCHASE—OF EXPORTATION—PENALTY—PROTEST.

1. Where goods were invoiced and entered at their market value at the time of their purchase, and their value had increased between that time and the time of their exportation, and, under instructions from the treasury department, they were appraised at their value at the time of their exportation, and duties were assessed on that valuation, and also an additional duty of 50 per cent., under section 17 of the act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 564), and were paid under a protest "against the demand of the duties charged upon the merchandise specified in the within entry," which said: "The difference between the sum so charged and what ought to have been levied upon the prices mentioned in the invoice, we shall claim to recover back, and we also protest against the penalty of 50 per cent. in addition to the duties charged, because the invoice was fair, and the said last mentioned sum is levied without the due process of law:" Held, that, under such protest, it could not be objected that the collector did not, under section 17 of said act of August 30, 1842, order a reappraisement, or that one of the examiners was partial and hostile to the importer.

[See Bangs v. Maxwell, Case No. 841.]

2. As the treasury instructions were given to the appraisers by the collector, to govern them in making the valuation as of the time of exportation, this fact, in connection with the protest, made the protest sufficient, under the act of February 26, 1845 (5 Stat. 727), to raise the objection that the goods were erroneously valued by the appraisers as of the time of their exportation, instead of as of the time of their purchase.

3. Under the said act of August 30, 1842, the valuation of the goods as of the time of their exportation, instead of as of the time of their purchase, was illegal.

4. The 50 per cent. penalty could be recovered back, as there was a protest against its exaction; and such protest was necessary, under said act of 1845, because such penalty was only an increase of duties.

This was an action [by Thirion Maillard and others] against [Cornelius W. Lawrence] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back an excess of duties and a penalty. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court on a case.

John S. McCulloh, for plaintiffs.
J. Prescott Hall, for defendant.

BETTS, District Judge. The goods in question were invoiced in France, March 19th, 1845, at their actual market value and price at the time and place of their purchase, and were entered at the custom-house in New York, July 5th, 1845, at the invoice prices. Between the period of purchase and the period of exportation, the goods had largely increased in value. They were appraised at the custom-house, under the instructions of the secretary of the treasury, according to their value at the time of exportation, and the defendant collected duties on that valuation, and also imposed an additional duty of 50 per cent., under the 17th section of the act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 564).

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

It is not contended by the defendant that the duties were rightfully assessed. He admits that the time of purchase should have been the period taken for the valuation. But he insists that the protest does not entitle the plaintiffs to maintain this action. The protest is as follows: "We protest against the demand of the duties charged by the collector upon the merchandise specified in the within entry. The difference between the sum so charged and what ought to have been levied upon the prices mentioned in the invoice, we shall claim to recover back, and make the present payment under protest. We also protest against the penalty of 50 per cent. in addition to the duties charged, because the invoice was fair, and the said last-mentioned sum is levied against our will, without due process of law." The act prescribing the character of the protest to be made by importers, was passed in the February preceding this entry and protest (Act Feb. 26, 1845; 5 Stat. 727); and, although, anterior to that enactment, the form of protest in question might have been accepted, as giving the collector amply sufficient notice, different requisites are now demanded, and the protest must possess those exacted by the existing law, to enable the importer to call in question the legality of the proceedings of the collector.

The plaintiffs now claim, that the appraisement was not a legal basis for duties, because the defendant did not order a reappraisement, according to the provisions of the 17th section of the act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 564). But it is to be observed, that it is not proved that the plaintiffs gave written notice to the collector of their dissatisfaction with the official appraisement. The collector is not authorized to call in a merchant appraiser, except upon such notice, and the first appraisal, accordingly, stands as fixed, under the provisions of the 16th section of the act of 1842.

Nor can the evidence given by the plaintiffs, proving the partiality of one of the examiners and his avowed hostility to the plaintiffs, and thus laying a foundation for the inference that his valuation was maliciously wrongful and extortionate towards them, be of any avail, because their protest does not allege notice to the defendant of those facts, so that he might have rectified the error, if he believed that any was produced thereby.

The plaintiffs proved, by one of the assistant appraisers, that the valuation of the goods was made under direction of the treasury department, as of the time of their exportation; and there is attached to the proofs the circular of the secretary of the treasury to collectors, bearing date May 15th, 1845, which orders appraisements of merchandise to be made at the market value at the period of exportation. The direction in the present case to the appraisers could only come through the collector to whom the circular was addressed. It emanated from the treasury department less than two months previous to this appraisement, and was given by the defendant to the appraisers, as the rule governing the valuation of the goods at their market price when exported, and not when purchased. We think that these facts, connected with the protest, bring sufficiently home to the defendant notice that the valuation and appraisement in question were, for that cause, not authorized by law. The defendant made his instructions the ground of his action, and estimated the entry, accordingly, at the period of exportation. The protest notified him that the price was beyond the market value of the goods, and that the true value was the invoice price, which plainly imported that the value was to be determined by the state of the market at the period of purchase. The evidence on the trial established the fact that the market value of the goods at the time of purchase was not more than the invoice prices. In view of the fact that the treasury circular was in the hands of the defendant, and was used by his officers as the rule governing their valuation of the goods, we think that the protest is to be regarded as an objection to that rule, and as an adequate compliance with the act of February 26, 1845, and that it set forth, with all necessary distinctness, the grounds of objection to the amount of duties assessed.

We have frequently decided that the act of August 30, 1842, required the duties to be assessed on the value of imports at the time of their purchase. Therefore, the adoption of a different period of valuation in this case was illegal; and, on the proofs given at the trial, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the difference between the duties levied on the appraisement and those chargeable on the invoice, together with 50 per cent. thereon, collected as additional duties, together with interest on both sums.

We do not accede to the proposition of the plaintiffs, that the 50 per cent. added to the regular duties may be recovered by them without protest, on the ground that it is a penalty. We regard it as an increase, on the contingency specified, of the duties chargeable on the imports, and, accordingly, are of opinion, that the importer must pursue the same course, in respect to that incident, as to the principal, and cannot recover it as a separate demand and cause of action, but only upon protest, as required by the act of 1845. The chief duties, however, not having been rightfully assessed in this case, the incident or consequent increase charged upon the goods was unlawfully exacted, and must be repaid. Judgment for plaintiffs.

MAILLARD (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 15,709.

MAINE (CALDWELL v.). See Case No. 2,304.

Case No. 8,973.

MAIN et al. v. GLEN.

[7 Biss. 86.] [1]

District Court, W. D. Wisconsin. Dec., 1875.

BANKRUPTCY — FRAUDULENT SALE — IGNORANCE OF INTENTION — JURISDICTION.

1. A sale by a retail dealer of his entire stock at once is presumably fraudulent, and the presumption of fraud arising from the unusual nature of such a sale can only be overcome by proof on the part of the buyer, that he used all reasonable means to ascertain that the sale was an honest one.

[See Babbitt v. Walbrun, Case No. 694.]

2. It is not enough to show that the buyer did not know that the seller's intentions were to defraud his creditors.

3. A suit to set aside a contract upon grounds created and established by the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], is one over which the federal courts have jurisdiction, and these courts will entertain jurisdiction to prevent their officers being placed in unreasonable jeopardy.

This is a suit in chancery [by W. S. Main and others, assignees] to set aside a pretended sale of the bankrupt's property and effects to the defendant [John Barr Glen] made on the 28th day of January, 1874. The bankrupt, Siegrist, was at the time a merchant at Wausau, doing a general retail business. The defendant was his clerk. The stock of goods invoiced at about $16,000, and the accounts amounted to from $8,000 to $9,000. The bill shows that the bankrupt was largely indebted, and was being pushed for payment before that time, and as early as the beginning of December, 1873; that he went to New York, about the 10th of December, to settle with his creditors, leaving the defendant in charge of his store; that he remained away until the 27th day of January, when he returned to Wausau about noon, and on that day negotiated, and on the morning of the 28th completed a sale to defendant of his entire stock of goods and accounts, and left before noon, without paying any of his debts, and has never returned. It is set up that defendant claims to have paid $13,000 for the goods and accounts, but the bill denies that any such amount was paid. The bill charges that defendant knew of the bankrupt's insolvency, and of his purpose to abscond and defraud his creditors, and that defendant conspired with and aided him in the execution of such purpose. It also shows that on the 30th day of January, some of the creditors disregarding the sale, commenced suits in the state courts, and caused the goods to be seized upon attachments by the sheriff of the county of Marathon; that others of the creditors at once instituted proceedings in bankruptcy against Siegrist, and that this court, sitting in bankruptcy, issued a provisional warrant to the marshal to seize and hold the property of the debtor, and that the marshal presented his warrant to the sheriff and that thereupon he voluntarily surrendered the possession of the goods and store to the marshal, who took and held them until after adjudication of bankruptcy, when provisional assignees were appointed who received them from him and to whom he surrendered them, and that they were sold by the provisional assignees under an order of this court, and the proceeds were ordered to be deposited in the registry of this court to abide the result of the claim of the defendant thereto; and that afterwards this defendant sued the marshal in the state court for wrongfully taking the goods, which suit was still pending, and a part of the relief sought by the bill is an injunction restraining the defendant from prosecuting that suit or any suit for the recovery of said goods or their value, and further providing for an accounting and decree for such portions of the goods as defendant had sold, and for such portions of the accounts as he had collected. The defendant answered denying all fraud or knowledge of insolvency or knowledge of any fraudulent intent by the bankrupt, and denying the authority of this court to restrain the defendant from prosecuting his suit against the marshal in the state court, and setting up that he purchased and paid for the goods and accounts the sum of thirteen thousand dollars in cash, and that the purchase was in good faith and without any intent on his part, or knowledge of any intent on the part of the bankrupt, to defraud his creditors.

William F. Vilas, for complainants.
Gregory & Pinney, for defendant.

HOPKINS, District Judge. The testimony read on the hearing shows beyond a question the insolvency of the bankrupt, and that he intended by the sale to defraud his creditors. This was not disputed by defendant's counsel, but the purchase was sought to be maintained upon the ground that defendant had paid a fair price for the goods, and bought without any knowledge of the bankrupt's circumstances, and without reasonable cause to believe him to be insolvent, and without any knowledge or belief or reason to believe that he was intending to defraud his creditors.

The bankrupt law, section 5130, Rev. St., makes a sale of debtors' property "not made in the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor, prima facie evidence of fraud." The ordinary course of business of the debtor here, was to sell at retail, and a sale of the whole stock, including accounts and other effects, was clearly outside of his ordinary business, consequently presumptively fraudulent.

A case involving such a sale was before the supreme court of the United States, Wal-

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

brun v. Babbitt, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 577, and it was there held that the sale of a retail dealer of his entire stock at once was out of the ordinary course of business of such dealer, and fraudulent, and that the presumption of fraud arising from the unusual nature of such a sale could only be overcome by proof on the part of the buyer that he used all reasonable means to ascertain the pecuniary condition of the seller before making such purchase.

The law casts upon a person purchasing an entire stock of a retail trader the obligation of investigating his condition and motives for such a sale. It pronounces such a sale fraudulent prima facie, and the purchaser must be prepared to overcome that presumption by showing it to have been honest, or that upon vigilant inquiry no reason appeared to doubt its honesty. It is not enough to show that he did not know that the debtor's intentions were to defraud his creditors. The law told him they were, and he should have investigated and ascertained as a fact that they were not. As I have before said, in this case there was no controversy but that the bankrupt made the sale to defraud his creditors, just what the law presumed he did it for, and I do not see, therefore, how the sale can be sustained; the prima facie case is not overthrown, but on the contrary, is fortified by the evidence that the defendant's counsel on the hearing did not attempt to deny that the debtor intended just what the law presumed from the character of the sale, to-wit: to defraud his creditors.

The ignorance of the defendant of the condition and purposes of the bankrupt in making such sale does not defeat this presumption, even if that was established. He should have shown either that the sale was honest in fact, or that from a thorough examination of the seller's affairs he had reasonable cause to believe it to be so, which he wholly failed to do.

But I do not wish to rest my decision alone upon the legal presumption. The evidence supports the charge that the sale was made with intent to defraud the bankrupt's creditors. I do not believe the testimony that the defendant paid $13,000 in cash at that time. The evidence of the defendant and the McDonalds on that question is incredible, and cannot be true.

The transaction as stated by defendant was substantially this: Siegrist on the 10th of December went to New York to see about making some arrangement about his debts, leaving the defendant in charge of his business at Wausau. He wrote to defendant once while there to send him money to pay his expenses; that he returned on the 27th of January following about noon, and that before tea-time of that day the agreement to sell his entire stock of goods, together with his accounts and all other effects at the price of $13,000 was made; that defendant had $5,000 in cash in his possession at that time, $1,500 of which had been paid to him that day by Mr. Siegrist for gold sold to him while in New York; that before tea he went out and found two young men by the name of McDonald, and borrowed of them $7,000—$4,000 of one and $3,000 of the other; that he also borrowed $1,000 of one Kemp, and that the money was placed in the safe for Siegrist that night.

The defendant was a saloon keeper, and his wife kept a small millinery and dress making shop. He, in company with another party bought the saloon of the McDonald boys in July previous, for $1,500, and paid down $600 and got time for the balance by giving a chattel mortgage on property as security. He claims that he had then in his possession $5,000, among which there were three $1,000 bills. He says he got in the money borrowed from the McDonald boys, four more $1,000 bills, and that he paid Siegrist seven $1,000 bills, that on the morning of the 28th he had a formal bill of sale prepared by his attorney, and that the parties and his attorney went to another attorney's office where it was executed and witnessed, and the money was handed over in a package said to contain $13,000, but not counted then by any one, in the presence of this attorney who was used as a witness of the execution of the paper and the passing over the package; that this was before the parties had breakfasted; that the defendant engaged the evening before, at the livery stable, a team to take Siegrist to the railroad at Stevens Point in the morning; that after getting the money Siegrist went away, claiming that he was going to Milwaukee and Chicago to settle his debts, but never returned; that he was owing his clerks and various parties, including his banker, quite a large sum, which he did not pay, and thereupon defendant took possession of the goods; that he did not give the McDonalds any security for the $7,000, nor Kemp for the $1,000, but gave Kemp notes for about $700 against customers and paid him $270 in money the next day, and took up his own note.

Now this story is so strange and unusual, not to say absurd, as to effectually refute itself. The idea that he had such an amount by him, is negatived by his whole life and conduct. There were two responsible banking houses in Wausau, and although he resided there about eighteen months, he had never kept a bank account, but had, as he says, his money in a trunk in his room in the hotel, where he boarded, before his marriage, and after that in his house. If he had that money, why did he get time in purchasing the saloon of the McDonalds in July previous, and why did they then require a chattel mortgage to secure the balance of the purchase price, $900, when they let him have $7,000 on the day of the sale, without any security but his note? Men with money do not do business in that way, and I cannot credit such evidence. He refused on his examination to divulge his business or his whereabouts during several years of his life, and I think hereafter he should class this transaction and his testimony here among the list of unmentionable acts. The shallow trick of going before an attorney ignorant of the facts and circumstances of the trade, to get him to witness the very formal bill of sale prepared by his own counsel, is an additional circumstance of the fraudulent nature of the whole matter. Such artifices are often employed to give character to a dishonest act, but it is very seldom they do any injury to any one except the party resorting to such practice.

If this sale was made to raise money to pay debts, as he claims he thought it was, why did they go to the office of another attorney to get him to witness the bill of sale and see the money paid over, instead of having their own attorney who prepared the papers and who would naturally be supposed to know something about the affair, sign it and witness the transaction? This part of the affair seems farcical. It seems strange that parties should think that courts could be deceived by such weak inventions. It is unnecessary to consider his testimony further. The transaction was wickedly corrupt and all the parties connected with it were guilty of a most flagrant attempt to defraud the creditors and parties who had confided in Siegrist's integrity, and sold him these very goods on credit.

It is true that the McDonalds corroborated the story of their lending the money. They made out that they loaned him $1,000 more than he wanted, but their characters and business do not warrant a court in giving their story credit. They had been saloon keepers, and sold out to defendant, and had a chattel mortgage to secure them. They were river pilots, and as they themselves swear, quite extensively engaged in gambling, and, in short, they do not account for their having any such amount of money in their possession, and I don't believe it. They probably had some money, but I think if they had had much, they would have loaned it, as the evidence showed they had some time before to the wealthy lumber-men residing there, or have placed it in one of the banks. The story is not such as to receive credit. It is too unreasonable and unnatural. They may have let defendant have some money, and probably did. Siegrist came back knowing he could not pay. He had been sued, and over $1,000 of his debts were past due. He had doubtless made up his mind to abandon the whole concern, and get what he could and flee the country, and the defendant and the McDonalds were just the kind of characters to embark in such a scheme; and I presume they got together what they could and paid over to him, and thought they could cheat the creditors out of their pay. The nature of the transaction and circumstances of the men, convince me that such was the case and object of the parties. It was a bold, wicked fraud, and has been sought to be maintained by what I cannot but regard as false and corrupt swearing.

I direct that the pretended sale be set aside and declared void, and that the defendant must account for any property he sold or converted, and for all debts that he collected during the time he was in possession under such fraudulent purchase. He must also be enjoined from further prosecuting his suit against the marshal, or any other party for the recovery of said goods or accounts, or any part of them, or from commencing any other or further suits for such purpose.

An objection was taken to the jurisdiction of this court to enjoin the prosecution of the suit against the marshal in the state court. It was argued that it was like the case of Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 334, but I do not think it falls within the doctrine of that case. Here the marshal seized the property and delivered it to assignees, and the assignees, by the order of the court, sold it and placed the proceeds in the registry of the court to abide the result of the claimants' rights therein before the suit was commenced in the state court. This court had therefore taken the property, and it alone should have the right to determine the question as to whom it belonged. This is a suit to set aside a contract, upon grounds created and established by an act of congress—the bankrupt law—and doubts have been intimated by the supreme court of this state, of the jurisdiction or duty of the state courts to grant the relief authorized by that law. Brigham v. Claflin, 31 Wis. 607. Such a suit is a suit arising under the laws of the United States, and this court has jurisdiction. The federal courts are the appropriate tribunals for the trial and hearing of such cases, and as the rights of the parties rest upon the provisions of the laws of the United States, the parties have the right to the decision of the supreme court of the United States upon them. After they shall have litigated the case all through the state tribunal, the unsuccessful party may have writ of error from the state court to the United States supreme court. It is not, therefore, an unwarrantable interference with the jurisdiction of the state courts.

This suit has a broader purpose than the suit in the state court. It is to protect the fund in the registry, and to settle the rights of the creditors and defendant to it, so that when these are settled it may be either paid over to the defendant or distributed without further delay among the creditors.

The case of Kellogg v. Russell [Case No. 7,666] was a case like this, and Judge Woodruff held the suit was maintainable. The case of Marsh v. Armstrong [20 Minn. 81 (Gil. 66)] decided by the supreme court of Minnesota, was held to be substantially like the case of Buck v. Colbath, supra. It did not appear in that case that the United States district court had taken any control of the property, only that the marshal had seized it by virtue of a warrant which directed him to take the bankrupt's property, like an ordinary execution. But in this case, before the case in the state court was commenced, the marshal had delivered the property to the assignees and the court had taken possession of it and expressly held the proceeds to await the issue of the defendant's claim of ownership. Under such circumstances I think the question of title to the avails was pending in this court when that suit was commenced, and the state court had not jurisdiction of the question. Under such circumstances this court cannot surrender its jurisdiction. This circumstance distinguishes this case from the one decided in Minnesota.

The prosecution of suits against officers of the federal courts in this state, who can alone defend under the provisions of the bankrupt act, when the state courts refuse to enforce those provisions, is placing such officers in unreasonable jeopardy; and when they institute proceedings to test their titles in courts, decided by this state to be the appropriate courts to settle them, to be met with the objection that suits are pending in the state courts, is ungracious, to say the least, and I do not think the objection maintainable. I think this is the appropriate tribunal to determine the controversy, and that it is not an unwarrantable interference with the jurisdiction of the state courts, but a proper and eminently just, if not absolutely necessary, exercise of jurisdiction in this state, in view of the law as settled by the state courts in such matters.

The objection to the jurisdiction is overruled, and a decree is ordered for complainants, as before directed, and that it be referred to a master to take an account of the property converted and accounts collected and not paid over by defendant.

NOTE. To set aside a mortgage as a preference, void under the bankrupt act, it is not necessary to find that the mortgagees knew the condition of the bankrupt and his intentions. It is sufficient if they had reasonable cause to believe him insolvent, and if they had notice of facts sufficient to put them on inquiry they are chargeable with knowledge which an investigation of the bankrupt's condition would have developed. Burpee v. First National Bank of Janesville [Case No. 2,185].

Case No. 8,974.

MAIN v. MILLS.

[6 Biss. 98.] [1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Wisconsin. May, 1874.[2]

BANKS—CAPITAL STOCK—UNLAWFUL DIVIDENDS—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—BANKRUPTCY—STATUS OF ASSIGNEE.

1. The capital stock of a moneyed corporation constitutes a trust fund for the payment of its debts, and its officers have no right to make a dividend unless there are actual profits over and above all losses.

[Cited in McCann v. First Nat. Bank, 112 Ind. 360, 14 N. E. 255.]

2. An officer of the corporation is bound to know the condition of its affairs, and has no right to receive a dividend unless legitimately earned; if he does, it may be recovered by the assignee in bankruptcy.

3. In deciding whether a dividend was rightfully made, the transaction must be viewed from the stand-point of that time, and not in the light of subsequent events. Notes or overdrafts by persons then considered abundantly good should not be counted as losses, because they afterwards proved such.

[Cited in McCann v. First Nat. Bank, 112 Ind. 360, 14 N. E. 255.]

4. Statute of limitations does not begin to run, in such a case, until the fraud is discovered by the assignee.

5. The general statute of limitations of Wisconsin does not apply to such a case, but it is controlled by section 35, c. 138, Rev. St. 1858.

6. The assignee, for the purpose of this suit, stands precisely in the position of the corporation itself, and has no greater rights, nor does it make any difference whether there were but two stockholders or a larger number.

This was an action by W. S. Main, assignee of the Bank of Madison, to recover dividends claimed to have been wrongfully received by the defendant [Simeon Mills], while the bank was actually in an insolvent condition.

W. F. Vilas and H. S. Orton, for plaintiff.

Geo. B. Smith and P. L. Spooner, for defendant.

BLODGETT, District Judge (charging jury). The controverted questions of fact to be passed upon by you are comparatively few. It is conceded that on or about the 16th of April, 1860, defendant Mills and one James L. Hill united under the general banking law of this state in the organization of a bank by the corporate name of the Bank of Madison, with a capital stock of $25,000, of which each held one-half; that said bank commenced the transaction of the usual classes of business carried on in this city by banking corporations and bankers, and continued in said business until the 7th day of October, 1873, when it was adjudicated bankrupt in this court on its own petition; that up to about the middle of January, 1869, defendant continued to hold half the stock of said bank and acted as its president; that during the time aforesaid, said bank paid the defendant dividends on his stock as follows: January 1, 1865, $6,084.66; January 1, 1866, $1,630.37; July 1, 1866, $1,740.28; January 1, 1867, $3,003.65; July 1, 1867, $815.55; January 1, 1868, $2,088.14; July 1, 1868, $1,565.57; January 1, 1869, $1,014.91; and that dividends to the same amount were declared and paid to said Hill, who held the other half of the stock at the same time. It was also admitted that about the middle of January, 1869, defendant sold to said Hill his stock and interest in said bank at a price much below par. But I think it may be taken as an admitted fact that the stock was treated between the parties to this transaction, Hill and Mills, as of little intrinsic value at that time; that the defendant retained the presidency of the bank until January, 1871, although the evidence tends to show that his connection with it was merely nominal after he sold his stock.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Reversed in part by the circuit court (case unreported).]

It is also admitted that during the time the bank continued in business, regular reports of its financial condition were made as required by law to the bank comptroller of this state, and filed in the office of the secretary of state, and that these reports are mostly, if not all, signed, and purport to be sworn to, by the defendant as president.

The plaintiff has also given evidence tending to show that at the time these dividends were paid the capital stock of the bank had become so impaired by losses from bad debts and mismanagement that no actual profits were made from the business of the bank; that at the time when each of these dividends was paid the current losses of the bank by hopelessly bad and suspended debts were such as to have absorbed and sunk all the profits of the business, so that in fact no dividend was really earned and payable to stockholders.

Upon the facts thus admitted to be true or claimed to be proven, plaintiff insists that he is entitled to recover from defendant the dividends which he has from time to time received from January 1, 1865, to January 1, 1869, inclusive. To this the defendant interposes by way of defense: (1) A general denial of the plaintiff's right under the law to recover upon the facts set forth in the complaint; (2) a denial of those facts, which puts the plaintiff upon proof of such as have not been admitted on the trial; (3) that as to part of said dividends the right of action accrued more than six years before the commencement of the suit, and is therefore barred by the statute of limitations.

It is the province of the court to instruct you upon some of these questions of law which arise upon the facts which you may find in the case. There is, perhaps, at this day no better established rule of law than that the capital stock of a moneyed corporation, whether it be a banking, insurance, mining or manufacturing company, is to be treated and deemed as a trust fund for the purpose of securing the payment of the debts of the corporation. In banks the capital stock stands as a guaranty to the extent of its amount, for the payment of the creditors of the bank. Theoretically under your law this stock and a certain degree of personal liability of the stockholders is pledged, first to secure the payment of the circulating notes of the bank, and after that to the general creditors. But it being admitted that there is no circulation in this case, the general creditors may be said to be the parties directly interested in this fund.

The officers of such a corporation have no right to make dividends to stockholders unless there are profits to be divided, over and above all losses, because the necessary result of so doing is to deplete the capital fund. The capital stock being, as I said, a trust fund, the first duty of the officers of the bank is to keep this fund intact and unimpaired. If there are gains and losses, the gains should be set off against the losses so far as may be necessary to keep the capital fund whole. All net profits above what are requisite for that purpose, may, as a general rule, be rightfully divided to stockholders. And while it is not necessary for me to say in this case how far in my opinion a stockholder who is not an officer might be protected in the receipt of dividends, I will say that officers, who know and are bound to know the condition of the affairs of the bank, have no right to take dividends unless legitimately earned and on hand.

Applying these general principles to the case before us, you see that it becomes an important inquiry for you, and really the only material and important issue of fact for you to determine in this case, whether the bank had gains or profits which it rightfully could divide to its stockholders at the time the dividends in question were made.

You have heard the testimony bearing upon this branch of the case. The plaintiff has put in proof, which as he claims, shows that at the time each of these dividends was declared the losses, or suspended debts which ultimately proved to be losses, greatly exceeded the gains then on hand, and he therefore insists that those dividends were wrongfully made to the defendant and should be returned by him, because he, being an officer of the bank, was bound to know that these debts were either hopelessly lost, or so precarious and uncertain of collection that the bank had no right to consider them as part of its living available assets.

The defendant, on the contrary, insists that at the time these dividends were paid no serious losses had been sustained; that while some paper was suspended or overdue, and some accounts overdrawn, yet the debtors were all substantially solvent and good for their indebtedness to the bank. And it is for you to say whether the proof satisfies you that at the time any or all these dividends were paid the bank had made or had not made gains over and above its losses which authorized the making of the dividends.

If you are satisfied from the evidence that at the time these several dividends, from January 1, 1865, to January 1, 1869, were made, or either of them, the losses of the bank did at the time exceed the gains, so that in fact there were no profits over and above losses, then you should find for the plaintiff as to such of said dividends as you are satisfied from the evidence were made when there were no profits over and above losses to divide.

But in passing upon this testimony you must view it as far as possible from the standpoint of the transaction itself, and not in the light of subsequent revelations. The proper inquiry is, would a sagacious, prudent banker, in the light of all the facts disclosed to you in the evidence, have considered Darwin, Parkins, and the other persons whose names appear in the testimony as debtors of the bank, as solvent, and the debts of the bank against them as good and collectible at the time these dividends were made?

From the nature of the business the assets of a bank must all the time be represented by what is due to it from its debtors. The officers of a bank cannot collect in all its bills receivable on some special day, and then say, Now we will make a dividend. We know we have no bad debts because no body owes us, and therefore we have a right to divide our surplus. This rule would be impracticable, and if acted upon would prevent any dividends being paid. But there is a constant demand for the exercise of sound judgment and sagacity as to the standing and value of its paper. The bank officer is not only bound to be honest, but he is bound to possess the requisite ability for the ordinary exigencies of the business he undertakes. He is not expected to be infallible, nor to make no mistakes, but he must use the caution of an ordinarily prudent man engaged in such business. Your own good sense and experience in life will teach you that it does not necessarily follow, because a man has overdrawn his account at a bank or has not paid his note at maturity, that the debt is therefore bad and should be charged up to profit and loss. It may be the overdraft is allowed because the bank officer knows, or thinks he knows, that the drawer is abundantly good, although it is probable that a banker who habitually, to any considerable extent, allowed overdrafts and overdue papers to remain unadjusted would soon lose his reputation as a safe and competent man in the business, and deservedly lose the confidence of the community. As I said before, you must as nearly as possible put yourselves in the place of the managers of this bank at the time these dividends were paid, and decide as well as the proof will enable you whether these debts now claimed to have been losses then, ought to have been so considered at that time by this bank officer and stockholder. Ought these debts to have been classed as doubtful or desperate at the time? If they ought, common prudence would have dictated the withholding of a dividend at such times. And if made at such times an officer of the bank occupying the responsible position in its affairs which was occupied by the defendant, would have no right to excuse payment of a dividend, because he is bound to know all the facts about its affairs which are disclosed by its books and records, or can be ascertained on close inquiry. He cannot be heard in a court of justice to say he did not know these things, because it is his duty to know them, and the law will conclusively presume he did know them. From what I have said as to the facts you must find, in order to sustain the plaintiff's case, you will readily infer that unless those facts are found by you from the proof the defendant is not liable.

I come now for a moment to speak of the defense of the statute of limitations urged by the defendant. And upon this point I instruct you that the statute pleaded is a valid bar to the recovery in this case of all dividends which were paid more than six years before this suit was commenced.

This relieves you from the consideration of the circumstances surrounding the payment of all the dividends paid prior to January 1, 1868, but the rules I have laid down seemed equally necessary to the proper understanding of the rights of the parties as to those paid subsequent to that time, and I have therefore reserved the consideration of this branch of the defense to this time.

The bank, as a corporation, is bound to keep its capital stock intact, and the banking law has many provisions intended to secure that result. If there is any reduction of the capital funds, the bank can bring suit to recover back such funds, from those who have appropriated them wrongfully, and in case the bank refuses or neglects to do so, a creditor or person aggrieved may bring such suit, but the cause of action accrues to the bank and the statute begins to run when the misappropriation is made.

For the purposes of this suit the plaintiff, as assignee of the bank, stands just where the bank would have stood if it had brought the suit. His rights are no greater and no less. The bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] has clothed him with no special powers in regard to this claim. It originated, if at all, long before any act of bankruptcy was committed, and it is undoubtedly true, as a practical fact, that while the management of the bank remained in the hands of those officers who had declared and received the dividends in question, it is equally true that the right of action accrued to the bank as a corporation on the wrongful receipt of each dividend shown in the proof to have been taken by the defendant when there were no profits. This right of suit accrued to the bank as a corporate entity, because of the reduction of its capital stock, which it was bound to keep whole, and the plaintiff in this case has, in my opinion, only succeeded to whatever right of action the bank itself had, and therefore the statute applies in this case.

The fact that Mills and Hill were the only stockholders and only officers in this bank, does not change the legal aspect of the questions raised in this case. A bank corporation is just as much an artificial body, and has the same rights and duties, with two stockholders, as though it had a hundred stockholders. The ownership of the stock in a bank, under the law of this state, is a fact of which any person can, by due inquiry, obtain information. The law requires lists of stockholders to be filed semi-annually in the office of the state bank comptroller and in the office of the register of deeds of the county where the bank is situate, so that all depositors can ascertain, not only who the stockholders were, but how many there were. The reports were only admissible to show the act of defendant in representing the stock as remaining intact, and also as tending to show the extent to which he participated in the actual management of the bank affairs.

Much testimony has been admitted on the trial of this case which, perhaps, was not necessary to elucidate the issues on which you are to pass. I have already called your attention to these issues, and it is enough to say that you ought not to consider in this case any testimony which does not tend to prove those issues.

Verdict for amount of dividends paid out after January 1, 1868, with interest.

NOTE. On error to the circuit court (Drummond, J.), this case was partially reversed on two grounds, no written opinion being given: 1. It was a fraud on the depositors of the bank, for Mills and Hill the sole stockholders and managers to divide between themselves, under the name of profits, money belonging to the capital or to the depositors, when no profits were in fact made. The fraud was not discovered until the failure of the bank and the appointment of an assignee, but was concealed from the depositors by Mills and Hill. The statute of limitations did not begin to run till the fraud was discovered by the assignee, and this on general principles of law. 2. The "six years" statute of Wisconsin did not apply to the case, but the 36th section of chapter 138 (2 Tayl. Rev. St. 1871, p. 1628), which declares that "the title" shall not affect actions against directors or stockholders of a moneyed corporation or banking association, to recover a penalty or forfeiture imposed, or to enforce a liability created by law, but such actions must be brought within six years after the discovery by the aggrieved party, if the facts upon which the penalty or forfeiture attached, or the liability was created. Judge Drummond held that it was not material how the liability was created, whether by statute or by the general principles and usages of law. The point first decided was afterwards affirmed by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Bailey v. Glover, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 342. See the case of Gratz v. Redd, 4 B. Mon. 178, as to dividends wrongfully paid. The charge of Judge Blodgett was not otherwise disapproved, and the case was remanded for computation of the full amount of the dividends thus unlawfully received, judgment to be entered accordingly. See further, that payments of dividends out of capital are not legal unless specially authorized by the statute. Painesville & Hudson R. R. Co. v. King, 17 Ohio St. 534; Pittsburg & C. R. Co. v. Allegheny County, 63 Pa. St. 126. For a discussion of the point that the capital stock is a trust fund for the creditors, see Ang. & A. Corp. (2d Ed.) 475; Scammon v. Kimball [Case No. 12,435].

Case No. 8,975.

MAIN v. MURRAY.

[Cited in Corbet v. Johnson, Case No. 3,218. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 8,976.

MAIN v. SECOND NAT. BANK.

[6 Biss. 26; [1] 1 Thomp. Nat. Bank Cas. 200; 6 Chi. Leg. News, 359; 10 Alb. Law J. 204; 1 Am. Law T. Rep. 471; 20 Int. Rev. Rec. 122; 1 Cent. Law J. 232; 31 Leg. Int. 278; 21 Pittsb. Leg. J. 205.]

District Court, W. D. Wisconsin. March, 1874.

FEDERAL COURTS—JURISDICTION—PRACTICE ACT OF JUNE 1, 1872.

1. A national bank cannot be sued in the federal courts outside of the district where it is located. Service on the cashier when found within another district does not give jurisdiction.

[Cited in Fonda v. British-American Assur. Co., Case No. 4,904; Hughes v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 18 Fed. 111.]

2. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Baack [Case No. 9,052], approved.

3. The practice act of June 1, 1872 [17 Stat. 197], does not change this rule nor enlarge the jurisdiction of the federal courts.

[Cited in Howard v. American Dairy, etc., Co., Case No. 6,753.]

[This was a suit in bankruptcy by W. S. Main, assignee, against the Second National Bank of Chicago.]

Motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, the defendant being a national bank, located and doing business in the city of Chicago, state of Illinois, and service having been had upon John P. McGregor, the cashier, who was found within the district.

Tenneys, Flower & Abercrombie, for the motion, cited Crocker v. Marine Nat. Bank of New York, 101 Mass. 240; Cooke v. State Nat. Bank of Boston, 50 Barb. 339.

H. S. Orton and W. F. Vilas, contra.

HOPKINS, District Judge. In the argument filed in support of the motion, it is claimed that a national bank cannot be sued in any court out of the judicial district where it is "located" or "established." I do not think that the general banking law admits of such an interpretation. The eighth section of the act of June 3, 1864 (13 Stat. 101), provides that such corporations may sue and be sued in any court of law and equity as fully as natural persons.

I do not think that the provision in the 57th section of the act restrictive of this general authority, but that it was intended rather to enlarge the operation of the 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 73, 78), and to confer upon such organizations the right to sue and be sued in the federal courts in the district where located, by a citizen of the same district; and I fully concur with Judge Blatchford's views expressed in his opinion in Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Baack [Case No. 9,052], that the banks organized under the general banking act of congress are to be deemed residents or inhabitants of the state and district where they are "located" and "established." The provisions of the act referred to by him are sufficient to warrant that conclusion, and if this were the only point I should have no hesitancy in overruling the motion.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

But there is a question arising under the provision of the 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789, which, as interpreted by numerous decisions of the federal courts, seems to me to constitute an insuperable objection to the plaintiff's right to prosecute this defendant in this court. That section provides that "no civil suit shall be brought before either of the courts (circuit or district) against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ."

That the defendant was not an "inhabitant" of this district when this suit was commenced, is too plain for discussion. The remaining question is, was the defendant found "here at that time?"

The defendant, as before stated, was "located" at Chicago; that was its habitation, which does not move around with the person of its officers. The corporation is not migratory. It could not, of its own will and without authority of the law, change its location to this state. Therefore, I must hold that this court has no jurisdiction over this defendant; that it was not "found" here, within the meaning of the statute. In the case of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 519, the court say, in speaking of locality of corporation: "It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty." This, it is true, was said of a state bank, but the same may with equal propriety be said of a national bank. They have a local habitation, an office, and place of business within a state or district, as well as a state bank. Justice Nelson, in Day v. Newark India-Rubber Manuf'g Co. [Case No. 3,685], and in Pomeroy v. New York & N. H. R. Co. [Id. 11,261], examined this question very fully, and arrived at the conclusion in both cases, notwithstanding there was a statute of the state of New York authorizing service to be made upon officers of such foreign company within the state, which would give the state courts jurisdiction of the corporations, that the corporations were not "inhabitants" of the state, and were not "found" there because their officers and agents resided or came into that district; that the officers were not the corporations, and the corporations were not therefore found within the district. This is a jurisdictional question, and "state laws can confer no authority on this court in the exercise of its jurisdiction, by the use of state process, to reach either persons or property which it could not reach within the meaning of the law creating it." Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 328.

I do not think the practice act of June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 197; Rev. St. 173), changes the rule. That relates to the practice and proceedings in suits against parties who may be prosecuted in the federal courts, but does not profess to enlarge their jurisdiction or to extend it over persons or cases not before within the cognizance of the court. As said in Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 330, "the acts of congress adopting the state process, adopt the form and modes of service only so far as the persons are rightfully within the reach of such process, and did not intend to enlarge the sphere of the jurisdiction of the circuit courts."

I think the same construction should be given to the act of 1872 above-mentioned, and so construed it does not relieve the case of the question of the habitat of this defendant being without the district, and therefore not subject to the process of this court.

The motion is therefore granted, and this suit dismissed.

Since the above decision the jurisdiction of the United States circuit courts has been changed under the act of March 3d, 1875 [18 Stat. 470], and the clause in the 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789, above described, now reads "or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states."

Case No. 8,977.

MAINE v. HALEY.

[2 Hask. 354.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May, 1879.

TROVER—HOW CONVERSION PROVED — WRONGFUL POSSESSION—OWNER'S RIGHT.

To establish a conversion of chattels, there must be proof of wrongful possession, or of exclusion of the owner's right, or of unauthorized and injurious use, or of wrongful detention after demand.

Trover for the conversion of logs. Plea, not guilty. The cause was tried before the court without a jury. The only question in dispute was that of conversion.

Albert W. Paine, for plaintiff.
Bion Bradbury, for defendant.

FOX, District Judge. This is an action of trover for a parcel of pine and spruce logs, cut in 1874–75 upon township No. 8, R. 5, W. E. L. S. by C. W. Clayton, under a permit from the land agent dated November 11, 1874. This permit is in the usual form, the state thereby "reserving and retaining full and complete ownership and control of all lumber cut upon the premises, wherever and however it may be situated, until the stumpage shall be fully paid, &c." The case was transferred under the act of congress [18 Stat. 470] to this court from the supreme court for the county of Penobscot, and is submitted to the presiding justice for decision without the intervention of a jury.

It appears in evidence that supplies for logging operations for the winter 1874–75 were furnished to Clayton, by Messrs. Jewett Bros., mill men at St. John, under an agreement that they were to receive the lumber from Clayton at their mills near St. John, paying therefor the fair market price.

[1] [Reported by Thomas Hawes Haskell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

This firm of Jewett Bros. was composed of Edward L. Jewett, N. M. Jewett and F. H. Pitcher; at the same time another firm of E. D. Jewett & Co., composed of E. D. Jewett and George K. Jewett, was carrying on business at St. John in purchasing timber lands and operating on the same, and in buying and selling logs, but not in their manufacture. These two firms were entirely independent of each other, neither having any interest in the other's business. Two of the sons of George K. Jewett were members of the firm of Jewett Bros.

Clayton's logs were marked III W III; were put into a tributary of the Aroostook and driven out of that river into the St. John. All that could be were boomed and rafted at Frederickton, but large quantities passed by the boom and were caught and rafted below by the boom company; these were mixed rafts, an account being taken of the precise quantity of each mark in the raft; those boomed at Frederickton and those rafted were sailed and rafted separately by their respective marks.

Clayton had lumbered upon the St. John waters for many years, always using this mark, which was well known by all persons upon the river as his special mark. E. D. Jewett & Co. had furnished him with supplies for some years, and had received his logs during the early part of his lumbering; but, for four or five years prior to 1874, Jewett Bros. had received from him all his timber under the same arrangement that existed in 1874–75.

The logs now in question came down the St. John river, and, in the month of October 1875, were in various places on the shores of that river near St. John and the mills of Jewett Bros., and were in the charge of James F. Ellis, as agent of Jewett Bros. E. D. Jewett & Co. had about eighteen millions of logs in the same condition, which were also under Ellis' charge. E. D. Jewett & Co., having become embarrassed, insolvency proceedings were instituted against them and a warrant of attachment to the official assignee issued against their property October 15, 1875, upon which were seized, not only the eighteen millions of logs then in the St. John river belonging to that firm, but all the other logs in the river, amounting in all to forty millions, without regard to marks and ownership, and among other logs those now in question.

All these logs were afterwards frozen up in the ice and were placed by the assignee under the charge of Joseph Horncastle and McLellan and Holly. The official assignee, Ezekiel McLeod, was afterwards chosen assignee of the creditors, and an arrangement was subsequently made between him and the defendant, John J. Haley of Boston, by which, in consideration of $100,000 paid said McLeod by said Haley, he sold to Haley all the copartnership effects and estate of E. D. Jewett & Co. in the province of Canada; and, on January 29, 1876, made and executed a deed by which he conveyed to said Haley, "all and singular, the joint estate and effects both real and personal, of every name and kind whatsoever of the said insolvents, Edward D. Jewett and George K. Jewett, being the joint estate within the dominion of Canada which came into the possession of said Ezekiel McLeod, assignee as aforesaid, subject to all subsisting liens upon any part of said estate, for stumpage, boomage, tonnage, rafting or otherwise." It is proved most conclusively that E. D. Jewett & Co. never claimed to have and never did have any right, title or interest whatever in this lot of logs, and that Haley never acquired any interest in them by the deed of the assignee of that firm. It is also established that Jewett Bros. were to become the owners of the logs under Clayton; that they were in possession of them at the time of their seizure by the process in insolvency, and that they never surrendered their possession voluntarily to any one, and resumed through their former agent their possession as soon as the assignee had sold to Haley the logs belonging to the insolvent estate, and that they never, in any way, made any transfer of their interest in these logs to Haley. It also appears that Haley never saw any of the logs, or in any way personally exercised any control or acts of ownership over them, or attempted to dispose of the same.

It is claimed, however, that by an order given by Haley on the 29th day of January and by proceedings under said order, he was guilty of a conversion of this property, and has thereby rendered himself accountable to the state for its claims for the stumpage.

This order is as follows: "St. John, N. B., January 29, 1876. Messrs. Holly & McLellan, Indian Farm, N. B. Gentlemen.—Having purchased of E. McLeod, Esq., assignee of the estate of E. D. Jewett & Co., all spruce and pine logs, timber and other lumber belonging to that estate, marked, L P C, C X C ✻, I V ✻, X F X, III W III, ✻ X, with other marks, situated at Drury Cove, Kennebecasis river, Fairy Cove, South Bay or other points in the river St. John, whereever they may be situated or found, you will please take notice, Mr. E. G. Dunn is my appointed agent in charge of this property. He will take full charge forthwith, and assume all care and risks, requiring no action whatever from any party formerly having them in charge. John M. Smart, John J. Haley."

A like order, with the omission merely of the words, "belonging to that estate," was at the same time drawn, addressed to Joseph Horncastle, and the orders were handed to these parties the same day. E. G. Dunn, the party named as the agent of the defendant in these orders, never in any manner meddled with the property or took any charge or direction of it, and does not appear to have been informed that his name was mentioned in the instrument. These papers were drawn at the office of E. D. Jewett & Co. in St. John by a friend, who was a ready penman, and it does not distinctly appear from whom he learned the names of the various marks of logs. The principal object in giving these orders was to stop the expenses of the persons in whose possession they were, and which were somewhat burdensome, and Dunn's name was inserted, merely nominally, with no intention that he should so act in the matter.

Ellis, in fact, immediately took charge of the property, and, when the river opened, delivered to Jewett Bros., under their instructions, all of the logs in question, and the same were sold by them, or sawed at their mills, and the lumber manufactured sold by them and applied to their own benefit. The eighteen millions which formerly belonged to E. D. Jewett & Co. were sold by defendant's agents to Sutton, and the remainder of the forty millions was subsequently claimed and received by those who were entitled to it.

The logs marked III W III, having been mentioned specifically in their orders, if Dunn had acted under the orders and claimed this mark of logs and, by his interference as agent of the defendant, deprived the state of its property, it might well be that Haley would be accountable to the state for the consequences resulting from the acts of his agent; but the fact is, that Dunn never did in any respect act as agent of the defendant. He was the only person to whom Horncastle and the others named in the orders were authorized to surrender the property. Nothing was ever done under these orders directly, and, as they of themselves confer no authority upon any other party than Dunn to act in behalf of the defendant, and as Dunn never did so act, it cannot fairly be said that these orders and the action of any one under them can render the defendant accountable for converting the property.

The whole effect of these orders was to induce Horncastle and McLellan & Holly to surrender their possession, which, by directions from McLeod, February 8, 1876, they were authorized to do. These directions were as follows: "February 8, 1876. Jos. Horncastle, Esq. Dear Sir:—You will please deliver over the logs and lumber now in your possession and held by your firm, to Mr. John J. Haley, or to Messrs. E. D. Jewett & Co., for him, having sold the same to Mr. Haley. Yours. E. McLeod."

McLeod never sold or pretended to sell to Haley any other timber than that which belonged to E. D. Jewett & Co., and Dunn never made any claim to the possession of any portion of the property; but Ellis, by directions from Haley and E. D. Jewett & Co., took charge of all that he had purchased from the assignee of E. D. Jewett & Co., and nothing more; and at the same time Ellis, by directions of Jewett Bros. and as their agent, secured them possession of that portion in which they were interested. Haley in no way ever made any claim upon the logs in dispute, either personally or by any authorized agent or attorney; he received and disposed of only the logs he bought, and, having by his purchase exonerated the property of E. D. Jewett & Co. from the insolvency proceedings, the residue of the property was, without any interference by Haley, claimed, received and disposed of by the parties in whose possession it was when insolvency proceedings were instituted.

The state has lost nothing by the doings of Haley; those in whose hands the property in dispute rightfully was have again received it without burden or incumbrance; it has never for an instant been in the possession of Haley or any party acting in relation to it in his behalf, and there is nothing to establish a conversion by him of the property.

It is said that McLeod paid the boomage and expenses of towage on these logs to the Fredericton Boom Company, and that they were repaid to him by Haley; they were in fact paid by McLeod out of the $100,000 he received from Haley, and were subsequently so paid by Jewett Bros., and the court fails to find anything in this transaction which affords any support to the plaintiff's claim to hold the defendant chargeable.

What constitutes a conversion was very fully examined by Judge Shepley in Fernald v. Chase, 37 Me. 289; and it was there held that, to make a conversion, there must be proof of a wrongful possession, or of the exercise of a dominion in exclusion or defiance of the owner's right, or of an unauthorized and injurious use, or of a wrongful detention of the property.

The defendant was never in possession of this property, never used it or detained it from the plaintiff or exercised any dominion over it. In all that Ellis did with these logs, he was acting as the agent and by the authority of Jewett Bros. and not as agent for Haley; and the case fails to show that the defendant did either of the acts which, according to the opinion in Fernald v. Chase, are necessary to effect a conversion.

The learned counsel for the plaintiff in his argument, as the basis of his claim, asserts that Haley took a bill of sale of this property from Mr. McLeod; but such is not the fact, as that bill of sale or deed as before recited was expressly limited to the joint property of E. D. Jewett & Co.; and the defendant thereby never acquired title to any other logs than such as formerly belonged to that firm, who never were the owners or in possession of the logs here in dispute.

The counsel also insists that these logs were taken and disposed of by Ellis as agent of E. D. Jewett & Co., and by their authority; in this assumption he is also laboring under an important error. Ellis testifies that the logs which came down the river were in his keeping as agent for Jewett Bros. before they were taken by the sheriff, and that, the next spring, he had orders from Edw. L. Jewett, one of the firm of Jewett Bros., to resume his possession and take care of this particular mark of logs as usual, and that he did so, and delivered them to Jewett Bros.' mills. Whatever Ellis did in and about this lot of logs, therefore, was done by him in his capacity of agent for Jewett Bros. and by their order and direction; and in no respect does it appear that he received any directions from E. D. Jewett & Co. as to this property, or acted in regard to it for their benefit, or for the defendant. Ellis, being the agent of E. D. Jewett & Co. who were acting for the defendant, and also agent for Jewett Bros., was acting in both capacities, taking the charge and control of the logs which belonged to his respective principals, obeying their orders and directions as to his disposal of their logs, but never receiving any instructions from the defendant or E. D. Jewett & Co., as to the logs cut by Clayton.

A large number of cases have been cited, both from the English and American reports, by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, all of which have been examined, and none of them afford any support to the claim of the plaintiff. The one most relied on is Hollins v. Fowler, L. R. 7 H. L. 757, in which it was held "that any person, who, however innocently, obtains possession of the goods of a person who has been fraudulently deprived of them, and disposes of them, whether for his own benefit or that of any other person, is guilty of a conversion;" as this defendant never had possession of these goods, and never disposed of them, the plaintiff cannot derive much advantage from this decision of the house of lords, as his case fails in two essential particulars which were there requisite to constitute a conversion.

In Polley v. Lenox Iron Works, 2 Allen, 182, one of the cases in brief of plaintiff's counsel, Judge Metcalf, on page 183, says: "Conversion, ex vi termini, imparts a wrongful act, and is the assuming upon one's self the property and right of disposing of another's goods, either by a wrongful taking of them, or by some other illegal assumption of ownership, or by illegally using or misusing them, or by wrongfully detaining them"; neither of which requirements, to effect a conversion, are shown to have been committed by the defendant.

Reference is also made to Savary v. Germania Bank [Case No. 12,387]. In that case, the defendant delivered over the plaintiff's notes to a person not entitled to them, assuming the right to deal with the notes in disregard of the plaintiff's title, and this was held to be a conversion, the court saying: "A wrongful intent is not an essential element of a conversion; it suffices that the rightful owner has been deprived of his property by some unauthorized act of another, who assumed dominion or control over it." As the state has not been deprived of its property by any act of the defendant, as in fact the defendant has never been in possession of this property, or in any way done anything with it, he cannot be made accountable for the loss which the state may have sustained from the proceedings of Jewett Bros., or those acting in their behalf in disposing of these logs. Judgment for defendant with costs.

MAINE STEAMSHIP CO. (WELLS v.). See Case No. 17,401.

Case No. 8,978.

MAISONNAIRE et al. v. KEATING.

[2 Gall. 325.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1815.

PRIZE—BILL GIVEN FOR RANSOM—QUESTION OF PRIZE—HOW DECIDED—CONTRABAND GOODS—PROPERTY OF NEUTRAL.

1. A bill of exchange, expressed to be for the ransom of a vessel, and given as collateral security for the payment of the ransom bill, was held to be a contract, on which an action may be sustained in a court of common law—the plaintiff and payee being an alien friend.

[Cited in Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. (46 U. S.) 500.]

2. In an action upon such a bill of exchange, the capture must be taken to be justifiable, and the ransom regular.

3. A court of common law cannot, even incidentally, decide a question of prize.

[Cited in U. S. v. New Bedford Bridge, Case No. 15,867; Brown v. Noyes, Id. 2,023; Studley v. Boker, Id. 13,559.]

4. It seems, that provisions, when destined to a port of naval equipment of the enemy, and a fortiori, if destined for the supply of his army, become contraband, and subject the vessel and cargo to confiscation by the other belligerent—more especially, if the country of the captured vessel be at war with the country, to which she is destined.

See The Commercen [Case No. 3,055].

5. Of the probable cause, which justifies capture by a friendly belligerent.

6. Duress, arising from threats of destruction of the vessel and cargo, cannot be admitted to avoid a contract of ransom, where the capture was justified by probable cause.

7. It is competent for a friendly belligerent to ransom the property of a neutral after capture.

8. Of the foundation and nature of ransom.

See Abb. Shipp. pt. 4, c. 4, § 2, note 2; Story's Ed. 1829, pt. 4, c. 3, § 2; also, pt. 4, c. 10, p. 477, 7th Lond. Ed. of the same book, by Sergeant Shee.

[1] [Reported by John Gallison, Esq.]

9. The admiralty has exclusive jurisdiction to entertain suits on ransom bills.

[Cited in Knox v. The Ninetta, Case No. 7,912; Leland v. The Medora, Id. 8,237; Jackson v. The Magnolia, 20 How. (61 U. S.) 328.]

Assumpsit on a bill of exchange in the following words: "At sea, in the longitude of 27° west from Paris, and in the latitude of 37° 39′ north, on board the privateer Invincible, French, of Bayonne, ninety days after sight this my first of exchange, second of the same tenor and date unpaid, I promise to pay to Messrs. Michael Maisonnaire and Derouet, merchants, Bayonne, five thousand dollars, for the ransom of brig Nancy & Mary and cargo, to be paid at Boston. April 3, 1813. Richard Keating." Upon the trial of the cause under the general issue, it appeared that the bill was presented for acceptance on the 29th of March, 1814, and protested for non-payment on the 30th of June of the same year. It further appeared, that the defendant was master of the brig, at the time of her capture by the Invincible; that she was an American vessel, and sailed, on the 7th of March, 1814, from Wilmington, N. C. bound to Lisbon, having on board a cargo of corn and rice of the value of $15,000, and a protection and license for the voyage from the British government, commonly called a Sidmouth license; that, after the capture, the captain of the Invincible threatened to burn and destroy the brig and her cargo, and actually made preparation for that purpose, and that thereupon the defendant agreed to ransom the same for $5000, and accordingly executed a ransom bill in the form prescribed by the French ordinances, and, as a collateral security, or in the language of the ransom bill, as a hostage,[2] gave the bill of exchange in controversy. Upon the execution and delivery of these papers, the vessel was released, and safely pursued her voyage to Lisbon, and had since returned to the United States. Upon this evidence, a verdict was, by consent, taken for the plaintiffs, for the amount of the bill of exchange and interest, subject to the opinion of the court upon the questions of law arising in the case. The defendants moved for a new trial, upon the grounds, which will appear in the argument and opinion of the court.

Mr. Prescott and Mr. Blake, Dist. Atty. for defendants.

1. In this case a common law court has no jurisdiction. The act of the cruiser was either a marine trespass, or it was a capture as prize. If the former, then the promise was without consideration and void. But the facts show, that it was a taking as prize. The transacton was intended as a ransom, which may be defined, "a restoration of property captured, for the use of the owner, for a stipulated price." The contract of ransom grows out of the capture as prize, and is founded on it. The capture is the principal thing, and the ransom but an accessory. This then is not a mere maritime question. It is not like the case of seamen's wages, arising partly on land and partly on the sea, and therefore of doubtful jurisdiction; but it is one depending solely on national law—on the jus belli. To determine, whether there was a consideration, it becomes necessary to inquire, whether the capturing vessel was commissioned, and whether there was probable cause for the capture. These are not questions to be submitted to a jury. As they grow out of capture, they belong exclusively to the admiralty, and from the exclusive cognizance of that court there results a general benefit, in the uniformity of decisions in different countries. The weight even of common law authorities is with the defendants. In the case of Ricord v. Bettenham, 3 Burrows, 1734, 1 W. Bl. 563, the question was, what effect the death of the hostage should have; and the question of jurisdiction was waived by the counsel. In Cornu v. Blackburne, Doug. 641, the point of jurisdiction was not considered, and the principal subject of discussion was, whether by a capture of the ransom bill the contract was dissolved. In Anthon v. Fisher, Id. 649, note, two judges were against the jurisdiction, but the case was finally decided on another point. See Cond. Marsh. 504.

2. It is not competent for a belligerent to ransom the property of a citizen of a friendly nation. This appears from the nature and form of the contract. It is called a repurchase, and the property is supposed to have been first devested. But the property of neutrals does not vest in the captors until condemnation. The property of an enemy is, by the law of war, devested immediately on the capture; but that of a friend can be forfeited only by some misconduct, which must be made judicially to appear. The cruiser has no authority to pardon. It is essential to a ransom-bill, that it should protect the property ransomed to its port of destination. 2 Valin, Comm. 286, lib. 3, tit. 9, art. 19; 1 Emer. 477; Le Guidon, c. 6, arts. 3, 7, 9. But the usual cause for the seizure of vessels of friendly powers being the carrying of contraband goods, the cruiser cannot grant a safe-conduct to the port of destination. The owners of a neutral ship provide her with proper documents, and take upon themselves the risk of their being legal. They give no authority to the master to compromise. The French law requires that a hostage be given together with the ransom-bill. No hostage can be given by a friendly power. 2 Valin, Comm. 282, lib. 3, tit. 9, art. 19; 1 Code des Prises, 278.

3. There was no legal cause of capture. If the cruiser have a right to ransom the property of a friend, it can only be, when it is lawfully captured. If the capture be unlawful, then the promise was extorted by violence and is not binding. This court has a right to inquire into the cause of the capture, and the legality of the ransom. It is not denied that the courts of the captor have this right. But in ransoming, the captor agrees to transfer the right to the court of the captured, in which, it is known, the contract of ransom must be enforced. It is incident to every tribunal, that has original jurisdiction, to inquire into the consideration and the manner of obtaining the contract. It would be a mockery, in such a case, to compel the captured to pay the ransom, and then to look to a court of the captors for damages. What circumstances, then, were there in the present case, which could make the property good prize to the belligerent? It was American, regularly documented, and bound on a lawful voyage. There is no pretence of contraband. The British license, however it might be a cause of forfeiture to our government, could not be so to any other. The reasons for inflicting this penalty are, that the act of sailing under a license of the enemy involves a breach of the duty of the citizen; that it leads to a commercial intercourse, which, in time of war, is dangerous; that the citizen thereby creates a neutrality for himself; and that it shows a connexion with the enemy. With the conduct of our citizens, in any of these respects, a nation in amity with us can have no concern. It would have been lawful, in time of peace, to take such a certificate, and our rights are not altered by a war. Suppose that our government had permitted its citizens to take licenses of this description; could a friendly power interfere? It is to be recollected, that we were not allies of France. The cargo was not for the use of the British, but was going to our own consul. There was, therefore, nothing which could justify a condemnation. When the vessel was captured, the only question was, whether she was an enemy, or had forfeited her neutrality. The ransom shows, that the captor knew her to be an American. The neutral character was not forfeited by merely having a British license on board. But even if the circumstances were such as to justify sending in, this would not authorize the master to ransom.[3]

[2] The bill of exchange was recited in the ransom-bill, and there said to be received "instead of hostage."

D. Davis and Mr. Sohier, for plaintiffs.

Two questions arise out of the facts, as they have been stated. 1. Has the court jurisdiction? 2. Was there a legal consideration for the contract?

In regard to the first question, it is to be observed, that the case is within the express words of the statute. The jurisdiction of the court over the parties is unquestionable, the plaintiff being an alien, and the defendant a citizen of the United States. The subject matter, too, or the contract, is one, which is every day enforced in courts of common law. It is a bill of exchange, and intended by the parties to be governed by the rules of the common law. But even if the laws of nations are to be taken into view, there would seem to be no reason, why these should not be noticed by a common law court, as well as the maritime or the ecclesiastical law. This, then, being a contract between persons who were able to contract, and who were not subjects of hostile states, and being, in its nature, such as is usually enforced in courts of common law, the right of the plaintiffs, and the jurisdiction of the court are established, unless some of the objections, urged by the defendant, should prevail.

It is said, that a question of prize is involved in the case, which makes it exclusively cognizable by the admiralty. But the contract, upon the face of it, does not necessarily involve a question of prize. The words in the bill of exchange, "for the ransom," &c. express the consideration for which it was given. It does not, from these words, appear, that the contract grew out of a capture as prize. A ransom bill may be given under such circumstances, that no legal question of prize or no prize can result. It is difficult to imagine, whence the doubts arose in the minds of the judges in the case of Anthon v. Fisher, Doug. 649, note. They are completely answered by the argument of Dr. Wynne in reply to Dr. Scott. This action is not founded on a ransom bill, and, in that respect, it is stronger than the case of Ricord v. Bettenham, 3 Burrows, 1734, which is the only one, in which the question of jurisdiction has been decided.

Another important distinction, which differs this case from any arising in Europe, is, that by the statute creating this court and defining its jurisdiction, the right of a common law remedy is expressly reserved to the citizen, in all cases where it may be had. The common law jurisdiction is uniformly preferred by the laws and constitution of our country. There is, therefore, every motive to induce the court to adopt that construction, which favors the common law jurisdiction. The reason that, in England, actions upon contracts, and for torts, which depends upon the laws of nations, are held to belong exclusively to the court of admiralty, is, that they are such, as must be governed by the municipal law entirely, if at all. 4 Bl. Comm. 67. Such are marine assaults, forcible abduction of property on the high seas, &c. Here the whole subject matter is either out of the jurisdiction of the common law court, or within it. But the principle now contended for is, that where the court has jurisdiction of the principal question, it has also jurisdiction of the question of prize or no prize, if incidentally arising. A contract made on the land to be executed at sea, is cognizable in the common law courts. Hoare v. Unton, 4 Inst. 139. It is believed to be equally true, that a contract made at sea to be executed on the land, is cognizable at common law. Personal contracts have no situs; they are to be governed by the law of the place, where they are to be performed. By enforcing this contract in a court of common law, the defendant is not deprived of any right, which he would have in the admiralty. In that court, the very giving of the ransom bill would be held an implied hypothecation of the ship. The general authority of the master would be sufficient for this purpose; but, in this case, the master was also an owner. Wilson v. Bird, 1 Ld. Raym. 22; Tranter v. Watson, 2 Ld. Raym. 931. The owners are bound, by the law of nations and the law merchant, to accept a bill of exchange drawn by the master of the ship for ransom. Marsh. Ins. 432; 1 Emer. 472. In the case of Ricord v. Bettenham, 3 Burrows, 1734, but better reported 1 W. Bl. 560, this question was expressly decided. Great interest was then excited by it, and the most eminent lawyers were engaged. Blackstone, after examining authorities and consulting foreign lawyers, declined to argue for the defendant. Lord Mansfield said, he was in favor of the jurisdiction upon principle, but doubted, principally, because it was confidently stated by counsel, that in other countries, an action would not be sustained on such a contract. A question of prize, arising incidentally in a case of insurance, may be entertained and decided upon. Berens v. Rucker [1 W. Bl. 313] Marsh. Ins. 430; Bingham v. Cabot, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 19.

[3] Yates v. Hall, 1 Term. R. 73, and Helly v. Grant, there cited, and Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 260, were cited by defendant's counsel. In the course of the argument, Story, J., inquired of the defendant's counsel, if they supposed the form of the contract to be of any importance? Prescott.—If the ransom did not conform to the law of France, it could afford no protection against a subsequent capture, and so, not having the effect, which was contemplated by the parties, the ransom-bill ought not to be enforced. Story, J.—I have no doubt, that the law of France, as to the form of the contract, cannot affect its validity here. It is no more to be regarded, than the statute of frauds would be in France, in reference to a contract for lands made in this state. Prescott said, it was not his intention to urge this point.

It is contended, that the legality of the capture is admitted by the bill of exchange; but if the court should be of a different opinion, the plaintiff is prepared to show that the vessel was, to all intents and purposes, prize of war.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This question is open only in consequence of your consenting, that the evidence should go to the jury, and having been open at the trial, it must be so here. I was prepared to rule against the admission of the evidence.

Mr. Davis. From the facts, as reported, it is evident, that had the vessel been captured by an American cruiser and brought in, she would have been liable to condemnation by the law of nations.

STORY, Circuit Justice. In the case of The Julia [Case No. 7,575]; Id., 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 181,—the ground of decision expressly was, that the taking of a license impressed upon the ship a hostile character.

Mr. Davis. It is upon that ground, that the plaintiffs rely. And further, the license has all the effect of a British convoy. It is impossible to contend, after the principles that have been adopted in the cases decided, that this ship would not have been condemned, if carried into France.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The case was thought stronger, at the argument of The Julia, with regard to a neutral than an American. Had a French vessel been going, with a British license, to supply the British armies, it would have been an unneutral act.

Mr. Davis. Every reason that can apply to a neutral, applies with still greater force to a co-belligerent.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Three points have been argued in behalf of the defendant. First. That this is a question of prize, over which this court, sitting in its common law capacity, has no jurisdiction. Secondly, That it is not competent for a friendly belligerent to demand or take a ransom, for restoring the property of a neutral after capture. Thirdly, That there was no legal cause for the capture, and consequently no valid consideration for the contract of ransom. Each of these points involves important considerations of national law, and deserves a separate examination. For convenience, however, they will be discussed in an order, the reverse of that adopted in the argument.

And, in the first place, was the capture legal? Assuming for a moment, that it is competent for a court of common law to entertain such an inquiry, this question must be answered by reference to the law of nations, and the prize regulations of France. For the legality of the conduct of the captors may under circumstances, exclusively depend upon the ordinances of their own government. If, for instance, the sovereign should, by a special order, authorize the capture of neutral property for a cause manifestly unfounded in the law of nations, there can be no doubt, that it would afford a complete justification of the captors in all tribunals of prize. The acts of subjects, lawfully done under the orders of their sovereign, are not cognizable by foreign courts. If such acts be a violation of neutral rights, the only remedy lies by an appeal to the sovereign, or by a resort to arms. A capture, therefore, under the Berlin and Milan decrees, or the celebrated orders in council, although they might be violations of neutral rights, must still have been deemed, as to the captors, a rightful capture, and have authorized the exercise of all the usual rights of war. It is quite another question, whether a neutral tribunal of prize would lend its aid, to enforce such captures, though, perhaps, in the strictness of national law, it would be bound to abstain from all obstruction of the captors.

Under circumstances, therefore, it might have become material to the plaintiffs, to institute an inquiry into the law of prize, as regulated and administered in the tribunals of France. But, upon the facts of the present case, such an inquiry may well be waived. It is clear, beyond any reasonable doubt, that by the law of nations, the vessel and cargo were confiscable. Here was a cargo of provisions destined for the principal port of military and naval equipment of an enemy of France, and, as the British license obviously implied, for the use of the allied British and Portuguese armies acting against France. Admitting that provisions are not, in general, contraband of war, it is clear that they become so, when destined to a port of naval equipment of an enemy, and a fortiori, when destined for the supply of his army. Nor is this all. The carrier vessel, and master were American, and open hostilities existed between the United States and Great Britain, at the very moment when the voyage was undertaken. It has been already settled in our own courts, that the acceptance of, and sailing under, a license of the British government, is such an act of illegality in an American citizen, as rightfully subjects the property to forfeiture. The ground of this determination is, that the act is utterly inconsistent with the duties, which a belligerent citizen owes to his own government, and is such an incorporation into the objects and interests of the enemy, as stamps the party with a completely hostile character. It is certainly not competent, in general, for a friendly belligerent to enforce by confiscation the mere municipal regulations of a foreign government, or to punish foreigners for a mere breach of allegiance or duty towards their own government. But, it will be difficult to show that an act, which, by the law of nations, is held to impress a hostile character on the party with reference to his own government, shall not have precisely the same effect as to all other belligerents, against whom the act may be directed. The case of The Clarissa, cited 5 C. Rob. Adm. 4, has been supposed to indicate a different doctrine; but it certainly will not support it, and, after the answer given to that case in The Julia [Case No. 7,575], Id., 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 181, it is unnecessary to give it a further consideration. Upon either ground, therefore, that the cargo was contraband of war, or that the whole adventure was tainted with hostile interests and connextions, the property would have been justly condemnable as prize of war. It is not, however, necessary to assume this ground, incontestible as it seems to be. It is sufficient to justify the conduct of the captors, if there is probable cause for the capture. See The Invincible [Case No. 7,054]. In the present case, it is quite impossible to doubt on this point. The very presence of a British license, on board of an enemy's vessel laden with a cargo of provisions, afforded a violent presumption of concealed British interests, or of subserviency to British policy. The capture was strictly legal, and although this unfavorable presumption would not justify the destruction of the vessel and cargo on the high seas, yet it would have authorized a carrying of them in for adjudication, if not for condemnation. But even if the captors had proceeded to destroy the vessel and cargo, the only remedy for this wanton and unjust excess of authority would have been in the courts of the sovereign of the captors. The commission of the sovereign, although abused, would still exonerate the parties from the imputation of piracy. And this leads us to the consideration of the argument, urged by the defendant, that the ransom bill was extorted by duress. There is no pretence, that it was procured by personal duress, or maltreatment. The only duress pretended is, the threat to burn and destroy the vessel and cargo; and the ransom bill was given to save them. Threats of this sort cannot, either by the common or the maritime law, be admitted to avoid a solemn contract of ransom, where the capture was justified by probable cause; and a fortiori, where condemnation must have ensued the regular prize proceedings. The first ground of defence cannot be supported.

The second question is, whether it be competent for a friendly belligerent to demand, or take, a ransom for restoring the property of a neutral after capture. It is argued by the defendant, that every ransom supposes a vested right in the captors; that this does not exist in respect to neutrals, for the captors have only a right to bring in for adjudication; that neutral property is liable to condemnation, only in case of delinquency; and that captors have no right to remit, in behalf of their sovereign, a forfeiture for violation of neutral duties. It is not true, however, that the right to take a ransom is founded in a vested title in the captors to the captured property. For, whether the property vest after twenty-four hours' possession, or after bringing infra praesidia, as seems the doctrine of civilians; or after condemnation, as is the doctrine of Great Britain; it is clear, that the right to take a ransom exists from the moment of capture. And, by the general practice of the maritime world, a decree of condemnation is deemed necessary to ascertain and confirm the inchoate title of the captors, at least in respect to the sovereign and subjects of their own country. Nor is a ransom, strictly speaking, a repurchase of the captured property. It is rather a repurchase of the actual right of the captors at the time, be it what it may; or, more properly, it is a relinquishment of all the interest and benefit, which the captors might acquire or consummate in the property by the regular adjudications of a prize tribunal, whether it be an interest in rem, a lien, or a mere title to expenses. In this respect, there seems to be no legal difference between the case of a ransom of the property of an enemy, and of a neutral. For if the property be neutral, and yet there be probable cause of capture, or if the delinquency be such, that the penalty of confiscation might be justly applied; there can be no intrinsic difficulty in supporting a contract, by which the captors agree to waive their rights in consideration of a sum of money voluntarily paid, or agreed to be paid, by the captured. Indeed, the case stands upon a stronger ground, than that of a ransom between enemies; for the latter have not, in general, a capacity to enter into contracts. The very law of war prohibits all commercial intercourse, and suspends all existing contracts between enemies; and the case of ransoms is almost the only exception, which has been admitted, from the general rule. If, then, neither the subject matter, nor the nature of the title or consideration, nor the capacity of the parties, presents any serious objection to the contract, as between a friendly belligerent and a neutral, it remains to consider, if there be any thing in the objection, that it is a remitter of the right of forfeiture, which belongs exclusively to the sovereign. The commission of the sovereign, in general, authorises only captures of enemies' property. But without any express clause, this commission clearly extends to the capture of all neutral property seized in violating neutral duties, for in such case the property is deemed quasi enemies' property. And, for the same reason, it authorises the bringing in of property, under neutral passports and papers, for adjudication, where there is probable cause to suspect its real character; for, until adjudication, it cannot be ascertained, whether it be entitled to the protection of the neutral character. If, therefore, the commission gives hostile property to the captors, and enables them to deliver it up on ransom, it also enables them to do the same in respect to neutral property, which has acquired a hostile taint; and the ransom is not, in the one case, any more an exercise of the sovereign's prerogative to remit a forfeiture, than it is in the other. In both instances, it is considered, by the law of nations, as a mere remitter of the rights of the captors acquired jure belli; and every prohibition of its exercise must expressly depend upon the municipal regulations of the particular country. Upon principle, therefore, the distinction of the counsel for the defendant, as to the incompetency of a belligerent to deliver neutral property on ransom, is unsupported; and there is not a scintillation of authority in its favor.

The next and most important question is, whether this is a case within the jurisdiction of a court of common law. It has been truly said by the plaintiffs' counsel, that the plaintiffs, being alien friends, are entitled to sue in this court; and, that a bill of exchange is a contract clearly cognizable at the common law. There is nothing, therefore, in the character of the parties, or of the contract, which should induce the court to decline jurisdiction. It is the consideration of the contract, which purports on its face to have been given for a ransom, and was in fact given as collateral security for a ransom bill, that creates the difficulty of entertaining jurisdiction. It is argued, that the legality of the consideration of a bill of exchange may always be inquired into, and that, as the legality of a ransom bill involves the question of prize or no prize, a court of common law is not competent incidentally to decide such a question. It exclusively belongs to the admiralty to adjudicate on questions of prize, and by parity of reason also on questions of ransom. Primarily, all questions of prize belong to the tribunals of the capturing power; and foreign tribunals will not interfere, unless where their territorial jurisdiction or rights have been violated. And ransoms, taken upon captures, belong to the same jurisdiction, and may be there enforced or set aside. It is however competent for the captors, if they so choose, to change the forum in cases of ransom, and to apply for redress in any country, where the person or property can be found. And, in such case, the proper tribunal undoubtedly is, a court sitting to administer the law of nations. Whether a foreign court is bound to enforce such a ransom without inquiring into the legitimacy of its origin, upon the principle of comity; or whether it will remit the parties to their own forum, to ascertain and settle that point; or will of itself examine and decide it; it is not now necessary to consider. On a proper occasion, it will be fit to give the subject a very liberal and dispassionate consideration. At all events, there can be no doubt, that a ransom is a subject within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. It is taken for granted in the discussions of the courts of common law, and has been asserted without contradiction by the admiralty. Is this jurisdiction exclusively vested in the admiralty? On this point the parties are at issue; and the same authorities have been pressed into service on both sides. Three cases have been relied upon, viz. Ricord v. Bettenham, 3 Burrows, 1734, 1 W. Bl. 563; Cornu v. Blackburne, Doug. 641; and Anthon v. Fisher, Id. 649, note 1. In all these cases, the action was brought directly on the ransom bill in a court of common law. In the first, the point of jurisdiction was expressly waived by counsel, although stated in the report to be greatly relied upon by civilians. In the second, the point was not started. In the last, the exception was taken by Doctor (now Sir William) Scott on the argument in the king's bench, when Lord Mansfield declared his opinion in favor of the plaintiff; Willes, J., and Buller, J., thought that the courts of common law had no jurisdiction, and that the objection might be taken, although not particularly pleaded; Ashhurst, J., expressed doubts on that point, and judgment was given pro forma for the plaintiff. This judgment was afterwards reversed in the exchequer chamber upon another point, so that the question of jurisdiction never came to a solemn decision. It remains therefore to be determined in the case at bar. And I have no hesitation to pronounce, that the cognizance of ransom bills exclusively belongs to the admiralty. They necessarily involve the question of prize or no prize, of the legality of the capture, and of the regularity of the commission and conduct of the captors. They also may involve questions as to the prize ordinances of foreign governments, the practice and regulations of courts of prize, and the rights and duties of neutrals. Of most of these questions, it cannot be pretended, that courts of common law have cognizance, and all of them seem more fit for the investigation and determination of a court of the law of nations. Every reason urged in the case of Le Caux v. Eden, Doug. 594, against the jurisdiction as to prize, applies with equal force as to ransoms. Indeed, it might be correctly declared, with greater force; for the rights of foreign captors, a subject of a very delicate and national character, necessarily come into discussion; and these rest upon the great doctrines of the jus belli.

It is very clear, that, in this case, no action for damages could be maintained at common law, even if the capture had been tortious; for it was a taking as prize. Admitting that trespass will lie, at common law, for a marine tort on the high seas (a doctrine somewhat difficult to sustain upon principle, although not upon authority), it is otherwise, if the supposed trespass be a seizure as prize. And it is immaterial, whether the objection be presented directly on the record, or arise at the trial, for if the decision of prize or no prize be involved, it exclusively belongs to the admiralty. And this leads us to the argument of the plaintiffs' counsel, that where the principal matter is cognizable at common law, every incident of prize may be there also tried. I should pause a great while, before I should admit the soundness of this doctrine, in the latitude, in which it is stated. If a question of prize be necessarily involved in the foundation of an action, whether it be as a principal or as an incident, I shall be glad to learn, how the common law can draw it ad aliud examen than the prize jurisdiction. Suppose a question as to the right to prize proceeds should arise; could a court of common law, in an action for money had and received, incidentally entertain the question, as to who are the actual or constructive captors? Such a jurisdiction has never yet been asserted. Camden v. Home, 4 Term R. 382; Duckworth v. Tucker, 2 Taunt. 6. Suppose a marine assault and battery were the subject of a suit, could the common law sustain an inquiry into the nature and propriety of the supposed trespass, when it appeared to have been an incident to a capture? Such a pretension has been expressly over-ruled. Le Caux v. Eden, Doug. 594. It is said, however, that in an action on a policy of insurance, the question of prize has been and may be legally entertained and decided. The cases cited do not come up to the position. Wherever any remarks, touching the legality of captures, have fallen from the court, they have been made with reference to the conduct of the captured, or to the effect of sentences of condemnation and acquittal in matters of prize. In no instance has the court undertaken to decide a question of prize, forming a necessary incident in such a cause. And it is extremely difficult to conceive how it could so do. For if the admiralty has, as it is conceded on all sides it has, jurisdiction over the incidents, as well as the principal matter of prize, it must be just as much exclusive in the first case, as in the last. And it would be strange, if the admiralty might decide an incident of prize one way, and a court of common law might collaterally overrule the sentence.

Upon the mere footing of general reasoning, it appears to me difficult to resist the impression, that the cognizance of ransoms belongs exclusively to the admiralty. And, taking into consideration the clear opinion of civilians, and the judgment of Mr. J. Buller and Mr. J. Willes, in Anthon v. Fisher, after a very elaborate argument, the weight of authority is on the same side. If, therefore, this were an action upon a ransom bill, I should be prepared to deny the jurisdiction of a court of common law. Can the case of a bill of exchange, given as collateral security for the payment of a ransom bill, be distinguished in principle? This question presents the turning point of the cause, and is not unattended with difficulties. On the one hand, if the legality of the consideration be, under all circumstances, inquirable into, then the same questions of prize may arise, as on the ransom bill itself. On the other hand, the contract of exchange is clearly cognizable at common law, and it is not easy to see, how the collateral origin of the consideration should defeat the jurisdiction. It never was imagined, that an action upon a policy of insurance could be defeated, at common law, by the circumstance that the loss claimed was a ransom after capture; and as little can it be imagined, that, in such an action, it is competent for the court to settle the question, whether the property be good prize or not. Suppose a mortgage of land had been given as collateral security for the ransom, would the admiralty have entertained jurisdiction, to give possession to the captors, or to foreclose the equity of redemption? No person would pretend to assert such a doctrine. Suppose, on the other hand, a stipulation, and a mortgage as collateral security, on the bailment of captured property, would a court of common law entertain an inquiry as to the legality of the capture, before it could enforce it?

On the whole, on this point I have come to the conclusion, although not without diffidence, that the present action may be sustained in this court. I consider the bill of exchange, as the parties have considered it, as merely collateral to the ransom. The consideration of it, involving matter of prize, is not inquirable into at common law. It must here be taken, that the capture was justifiable, and the ransom regular. If it were otherwise, a remedy lies in the admiralty courts of France, and perhaps of the United States, to set aside the ransom bill, and restore the parties to their rights. If an action were brought, at common law, upon a collateral security like the present, under circumstances calling for inquiry, the court might suspend its judgment, or a court of equity might grant an injunction, until the parties should have ascertained, in the proper prize tribunal, the validity of the ransom bill, or of the original capture. I have the less hesitation in adopting this conclusion, because the facts of the case abundantly show, that the capture was rightful, and that of course the ransom was valid. It would, therefore, be turning round the parties to another jurisdiction without a hope of benefit. I will only add, that if I had thought the case not cognizable at common law, the circumstance, that the objection was not pleaded in abatement, would have had no weight with me. Where the subject matter is not within the jurisdiction of the court, the exception may be taken under the general issue. Let judgment be entered on the verdict for the plaintiffs.

Case No. 8,979.

The MAITLAND.

[2 Biss. 201;[1] 2 Chi. Leg. News, 113; 17 Pittsb. Leg. J. 18.]

District Court, D. Wisconsin. Dec. Term, 1869.

MARITIME LIENS—REPAIRS—CONTRACT OF OWNER—CLAIM OF LIEN.

1. Repairs upon a vessel in winter quarters in a foreign port, done by contract with the owner, there being no express claim at the time of a lien upon the vessel, and no immediate necessity for such repairs, do not constitute a maritime lien.

2. The power of the owner and master in binding the vessel considered.

3. Various cases distinguished and commented upon.

In admiralty.

Libel for repairs [by William H. Wolf and others against the schooner Maitland]. It is alleged in the libel that on the 15th of February, 1869, while this vessel was at the port of Milwaukee, her owner or agent represented to libellants that she stood in need of repairs in order to make her sea-worthy, and competent to proceed on her intended voyage, and requested them to furnish such materials and supplies; they were supplied by libellants on the credit of the vessel, the said owner or agent not having either money or credit to purchase said materials and supplies, which were suitable, proper and necessary to enable the vessel to depart in safety upon her intended voyage; [and the value thereof is, by maritime law, a lien upon said vessel, her boats, tackle, apparel and furniture, and that a balance of $1,474.71 remains unpaid, although these libellants have often requested the said owner or agent to pay the same.][2] The vessel's home port was Buffalo. John H. Moore, of Buffalo, claimed the vessel, as owner, subject to a mortgage of $10,000, the mortgagee having power to take possession of her at any time. He alleges that before the time the repairs were done by libellants, the vessel had been stripped, and was laid up in winter quarters in the port of Milwaukee, without any intention or possibility of her being employed until navigation should open in the ensuing spring; that after the close of navigation in the fall of 1868, and after the vessel was laid up in winter quarters, claimant, believing that certain repairs would improve her condition for the next season of navigation, and raise her rate, entered into correspondence with libellants as to the price of such repairs, and in January, 1869, received from libellants a proposition in writing to make such repairs. The proposal was required to be accepted by claimant within ten days. Claimant answered in writing: "I accept your offer, and will give five hundred and fifty dollars to do the following work on barque Maitland," (describing the work to be done, &c.) Claimant denied that the repairs were made on the credit of the vessel alone, as propounded in the libel, or that they were necessary to enable her to proceed on her voyage; and he alleged that they were furnished by libellants on his own credit, and that he had money and credit to procure the same. [He denies that the repairs were necessary to enable the vessel to depart in safety upon her intended voyage, and alleges that she could have been employed in navigation with safety during the ensuing season without repairs, and that such repairs were made not for the purpose of rendering the vessel seaworthy or safe for navigation, but to put her in better condition and in a higher class.][2]

Emmons & Van Dyke, for libellants.

Finches, Lynde & Miller, for respondents.

MILLER, District Judge. As the issue here raised is one of admiralty jurisdiction, I omit all reference to the portions of the answer and evidence, which relate to the amount of the bill of repairs and the manner of the work.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [From 17 Pittsb. Leg. J. 18.]

Further correspondence took place between these parties in the month of January, 1869, respecting additional repairs to the vessel. In a letter of January 23d claimant wrote to libellants: "Enclosed please find my acceptance of your proposition. I understand you make no objection to my former terms, and suppose you accept them, as you say nothing to the contrary. But I don't expect to keep you out of the pay any longer than you wish to. I will not be able to go up now, and will depend on your doing me a good job. I shall ask Mr. Vance to step around and consult when you get the deck off. Please take care of the ropes in the hold. The other work to be done may remain until the captain goes up, except such of the beams as need repairing."

In a letter dated Buffalo, July 16, 1869, claimant wrote to libellants: "Your valued favor of the 13th inst. is received, which is accepted." He then directs as to the work, and then proceeds: "You will have to take acceptances, or some way wait for pay until the vessel makes one trip, unless I can conveniently pay you. I have money that is promised, ample, but I may be disappointed, yet I hope not; but I will strain every point to pay you when you want it. But should I not be able to collect, then I will want the time." Libellants then did the work on the vessel in the port of Milwaukee.

By rule No. 12 of practice in admiralty and maritime jurisdiction it is provided that, "in all suits by material men for supplies, or repairs, or other necessaries, for a foreign ship, or a ship in a foreign port, the libellants may proceed against the ship and freight in rem, or against the master or owner alone in personam. The home port of this vessel being Buffalo, she was foreign, in the sense of this rule, to the port of Milwaukee.

The season of navigation being ended, the vessel was laid up at Milwaukee for the winter. The repairs may have been necessary for putting the vessel in a sea-worthy condition, as a grain-bearing vessel, for the ensuing season. The vessel was not then on a voyage, bearing a cargo, or intending at the time to proceed on a voyage, or trip from Milwaukee to Buffalo or any other port. There was no intention of putting her in employment before the opening of navigation the ensuing spring. Present necessity for the repairs did not exist when ordered or when made. The master did not order the repairs from pressing necessity, nor did he order them at all, but the owner, and that, too, at a time when the vessel was not actually in employment. She might probably as well have been returned to her home port and repaired there as in the port of Milwaukee.

The rule of the admiralty is of ancient date, that a master of a vessel has power to create a lien for repairs and supplies obtained in a foreign port in a case of necessity. The case of Thomas v. Osborn, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 22, and the cases cited in the opinion conclusively establish this rule, without further references. And this power of the master extends to a case where he is charterer and special owner pro hac vice. Here the master is entirely unknown to the libellants as such. The whole negotiation and contracts were between the owner and the libellants. The master had returned to his home in Buffalo before the repairs were contracted for or performed. In the case of Pratt v. Reed, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 359, the steamboat Sultana was owned in Buffalo and employed in trade between that port and other ports of the upper lakes. She was supplied with coal from time to time at the port of Erie, her owner being the master, and present; and of such ownership, Reed, the libellant, had knowledge when he supplied the coal. There was no representation of the necessity of the supplies, other than that they were directed by the master at the times when furnished. When the owner was not present the coal was furnished at the request of the person in command. The bill rendered by the libellant contained a running account of debit and credit through a period of nearly two years, and there did not appear to be any doubt of the necessity of the supplies when furnished.

The court considered it essential for libellant to prove not merely a necessity for the supplies, but also a necessity at the time of procuring them, for a credit upon the vessel. This proof is as essential as that of the necessity of the article itself. The court says: "The supplies having been furnished at a fixed place, according to the account current, and apparently under some general understanding and arrangement, the presumption is that there could be no necessity for the implied hypothecation of the vessel; there could be no unexpected or unforeseen exigency to require it. For aught that appears, the supplies could have been procured on the personal credit of the master, and in this more especially as he was the owner. We do not say that the mere fact of the master being owner, of itself excludes the possibility of a case of necessity that would justify an implied hypothecation; but it is undoubtedly a circumstance that should be attended to in ascertaining whether any such necessity existed in the particular case. The Sophie, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 309. It must appear that the supplies could only be procured on the credit of the vessel." The same position is reiterated by Justice Nelson, who wrote the opinion in one of the above cases and approved the other, in The James Guy [Case No. 7,196], where it is decided, "to sustain a libel in rem against a vessel owned in New York for repairs done upon her at Baltimore, at the instance of the master, the necessity of the repairs, and for a lien upon the vessel to enable the master to procure them, must be shown." And the court says that, "the necessity for the repairs and for the lien must depend upon the facts and circumstances of the case."

In the case of The Neversink [Case No. 10,133], the court again declares that in the cases of Thomas v. Osborn, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 22, and Pratt v. Reed [supra], the rule which requires evidence of an apparent necessity existing at the time for supplying on the credit of a vessel, supplies furnished to her in a foreign port in order to create a lien upon her in favor of a material-man, was not extended beyond its ancient strictness as to the degree of proof required. And in that case it is decided that where the master of a steamer has no funds to pay for coal, and her charterers who owned her pro hac vice resided in a foreign jurisdiction, and the coal was a necessary supply, and it was obtained by the master, and credit was in fact given to the vessel and her charterers; it was held that a lien was given on the vessel.

It was also held that when the material-man resided at the home port of the vessel, and furnished coal at a foreign port, through an agent there, the supplies were considered as furnished by the agent at the foreign port, the same as if the principal resided there.

It evidently is the duty of material-men furnishing supplies at foreign ports to vessels, at the instance of the master, who is agent of the owner, to ascertain the necessity of the supplies and also of the inability of the master or owners of the vessel to pay for them, before the vessel can be subjected to a maritime lien. Such, also, is the duty of material-men in dealing directly with the owners of a vessel, as in this case. It does not appear that libellants required direct hypothecation of the vessel, or that such was agreed upon or promised by the owner. Nor does it appear that the libellants made inquiry into incumbrances on the vessel, or questioned the pecuniary ability of the owner. The supplies were furnished at the instance and on the credit of the owner, without the aid of any facts upon which a presumption can arise of a legal hypothecation of the vessel.

In the case of The St. Lawrence, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 522, the evidence showed that the supplies being furnished, the amount and value being ascertained to the satisfaction of claimant's proctor, the owner of the vessel at the time gave his notes for the amount of the libellants' demand, under the express stipulation between him and libellants that their lien against the vessel should not be discharged or released unless the notes were paid. The notes were afterwards surrendered. It was held that the lien was not waived by the acceptance of the notes. That was an express hypothecation of the vessel. In the case in hand, the owner accepts the proposal of libellants to furnish supplies, and promised individually to pay a certain price, and again he agrees personally for additional repairs, libellants not at any time claiming a lien upon the vessel, even after notice from claimant that they might not be paid when the repairs were completed, but at a subsequent time.

It is contended that this libel should be sustained by reason of the remark of the justice in delivering the opinion in the case of The Belfast, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 624, that "material-men who furnish materials or supplies for a vessel in a foreign port, or in a port other than in the state where the vessel belongs, have a maritime lien on the vessel as a security for the payment of the price of all such materials and supplies. They have such a lien, because, upon the principles of the maritime law, such materials and supplies are presumed to be furnished on the credit of the vessel," referring to cases anterior to those cited above. This remark of the judge in an opinion in a case involving the question of exclusive jurisdiction of the district courts on libels on contracts of affreightment, and not in any manner touching the lien of material-men for supplies, cannot be taken to overrule the cases of Thomas v. Osborn and Pratt v. Reed [supra].

The court cannot step aside from the contract between the parties, because it appears in the answer of the claimant that the vessel is incumbered by a mortgage to the amount of $10,000. The claimant, for aught we know, may be abundantly able to pay all that libellants can or may recover, irrespective of his interest in the vessel. The fact of the mortgage is no evidence of his inability to pay this debt. Libellants should have satisfied themselves of claimant's pecuniary circumstances before furnishing the supplies and making the repairs, and if they had doubt of his ability to meet his contract, they should have required a lien upon the vessel, or notified him that the supplies would only be furnished on the credit of the vessel. I am satisfied that libellants have no maritime lien on the vessel, and that the libel must be dismissed.

NOTE. For a full discussion of liens for repairs, see 2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. and authorities there cited. Consult The Eclipse [Case No. 4,268], 1871, and The Selt [Id. 12,649], 1872, and cases there cited. Also The Lady Franklin [Id. 7,982]; The Celestine [Id. 2,541]. For a discussion of the lien of material-men under the maritime and state law, and the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts, especially since the amendment of May 6, 1872, to the 12th rule in admiralty, examine two recent decisions for May, 1873. The Cicassian [Id. 2,720a]; In re Kirkland [Id. 7,842].

Case No. 8,980.

MAITLAND et al. v. The ATLANTIC.

[Newb. 514; [1] 3 Am. Law Reg. 477.]

District Court, E. D. Louisiana. May, 1855.

BOTTOMRY—MORTGAGE—LIEN—SIMPLE LOAN—BILL TAKEN WITH BOND.

1. Where A., the master of a brig, puts into a foreign port by reason of a leak, and there borrows money from B., and draws a bill of exchange upon C., which bill is unpaid at maturity, and at the same time that the bill is drawn, he also executes a mortgage or hypothecation, in which there is a special stipulation that B. is not to take the usual marine risks in cases of bottomry and hypothecation, neither instrument establishes a lien upon the brig, which can be enforced in the admiralty, for want of jurisdiction.

[1] [Reported by John S. Newberry, Esq.]

[Cited in The J. R. Hoyle, Case No. 7,557; The Edward Albro, Id. 4,290.]

2. The essential difference between a bottomry bond and a simple loan is, that on the latter, the money is at the risk of the borrower, and must be paid at all events; in the former, it is at the risk of the lender during the voyage, and the right to demand payment depends on the safe arrival of the vessel.

[Cited in The Edward Albro, Case No. 4,290.]

3. Admiralty cannot enforce a claim for money which has been advanced on the personal credit of the vessel, owner or master, in a suit in rem.

[Cited in The J. R. Hoyle, Case No. 7,557.]

4. Where a bill is drawn, and a bottomry bond taken for the same sum, the bill must share the fate of the bond.

[This was a libel in rem by R. L. Maitland & Co. against the brig Atlantic, to enforce the payment of money advanced upon the hypothecation of the vessel. The case is heard upon an exception to the jurisdiction of the court.]

Mr. Semmes, for libelants.

Mr. Gaither, for respondent.

McCALEB, District Judge. The libel in this case alleges that prior to the 12th of December, 1853, the brig Atlantic, while on a voyage from Philadelphia to New Orleans, with a cargo of coal, sprung a leak, and went into the port of Key West for repairs, to enable her to complete her voyage. That the master, Henry C. King, being a stranger in Key West, and being in want of money to pay for the necessary repairs, and having no other means of procuring the same, borrowed of the commercial firm of H. H. Wall & Co., at Key West, the sum of eight hundred and thirteen dollars and twenty-one cents, upon the hypothecation and mortgage of the brig, her cargo and freight. It is further alleged that, in consideration of the said advance, the master drew his draft or bill of exchange for the sum of eight hundred and sixty-two dollars, which sum included the loan for repairs, and six per cent. thereon for interest and commission. The draft was drawn upon Henry Simpson & Co., of Philadelphia, payable one day after sight; and in order to secure the payment thereof, the master by a certain instrument of writing, dated 12th December, 1853, and executed before a notary public at Key West, hypothecated and mortgaged the brig, her cargo, freight, apparel and furniture, unto the said Wall & Co. The draft was duly assigned by Wall & Co. to the libelants, who, after due diligence, not being able to find the drawees, caused it to be protested for non-acceptance and non-payment, and gave notice thereof to the drawer. This action is now instituted to hold the brig liable for the payment of the amount of the draft. Both the draft and instrument of hypothecation and mortgage are annexed to the libel as part thereof. The latter, after the usual terms of hypothecation and pledge, concludes with the following stipulation: "It is expressly understood and agreed, that the said Wall & Co. do not take upon themselves the marine risks usual in cases of bottomry and hypothecation." To the libel an exception had been filed by the claimants, to the effect that this court, as a court of admiralty, has no jurisdiction to enforce the payment of the sum demanded. It is evident that an extravagant rate of interest has been exacted by the house of Wall & Co., and it is this fact, coupled with the stipulation in the instrument of hypothecation, to which reference has just been made, which forms the basis of this exception. Although the lender of the money seems to have intended to secure the payment of the draft, by exacting both a mortgage on the ship, and a pledge of the merchandise laden on board also, the instrument cannot be properly regarded either as a bottomry bond or as a security in the nature of respondentia. That the master had a right, in this instance, in a port of a state other than that of the residence of the owner, to raise money for the payment of the necessary repairs done upon the brig, by pledging the ship, cannot be denied. And if the court could regard the instrument before it in the light of a bottomry bond, with the usual stipulations, it would feel itself compelled to exercise jurisdiction to grant the party relief. There would be a clear and well established lien upon the vessel, which, according to the principles of the maritime law, could be enforced in the admiralty.

Contracts of bottomry are so called, because the bottom or keel of the vessel is figuratively used to express the whole body thereof; sometimes, also, but inaccurately, money lent in this manner is said to run at respondentia—for that word properly applies to the loan of money upon merchandise laden on board a ship, the repayment whereof is made to depend upon the safe arrival of the merchandise at the destined port. In like manner, the repayment of money lent on bottomry does in general depend upon the prosperous conclusion of the voyage; and as the lender sustains the hazard of the voyage, he receives, upon its happy termination, a greater price or premium for his money than the rate of interest allowed by law in ordinary cases. The premium paid on these occasions depends wholly on the contract of the parties, and consequently varies according to the nature of the adventure. Abb. Shipp. 150, 151. The high rate of interest exacted by the lenders in this case, would, therefore, be no valid objection to the libelants' recovery, if it appeared from the act of hypothecation that the usual maritime risks had been incurred; but, so far from this being the case, the clause in the act of hypothecation, to which reference has been made, expressly declares that no such risk was to be assumed. The essential difference between a bottomry bond and a simple loan is, that in the latter the money is at the risk of the borrower, and must be paid at all events; in the former, it is at the risk of the lender during the voyage, and the right to demand payment depends on the safe arrival of the vessel. And if the lender of money on a bottomry or respondentia bond be willing to stake the money upon the safe arrival of the ship or cargo, and to take upon himself, like an insurer, the risk of sea perils, it is lawful, reasonable and just, that he should be authorized to demand and receive an extraordinary interest, to be agreed on, and which the lender shall deem commensurate to the hazard he runs. But a bond executed as an hypothecation, but not upon the principles which govern such securities, is not a bottomry bond, capable of being enforced in a court of admiralty, but must be proceeded on as at common law. It is absolutely necessary that the liability of the lender to the sea risks should appear or be fairly collected from the instrument; otherwise, the reservation of maritime interest will render the security void on the ground of usury, not only as a charge upon the ship, but also against the person of the borrower. And where an instrument, called a bottomry bond, contained an express clause that the sum secured should be paid within thirty days after intelligence of the loss, Lord Stowell doubted his jurisdiction to entertain the suit at all, and dismissed it on the ground that the very essence of bottomry, which alone could give jurisdiction to the admiralty, was wanting. From this sentence an appeal was prosecuted to the delegates, and that court, after directing a search for precedents, decided that as the maritime interest was reserved, and maritime risk was excluded from the bond, it was void. 1 Hagg. Adm. 55; 2 Hagg. Adm. 57.

It is contended by the proctor for the libelants, that the hypothecation in this case, though bad in part, may, by a court of admiralty, be regarded as good in part, and as such, still be considered as a legitimate contract for the exercise of its jurisdiction. If, by assuming this position, the proctor would maintain that the clause in the hypothecation by which the libelants refused to assume maritime risks, may be rejected by the court, and the instrument be enforced as a valid hypothecation independently of this clause, he is widely mistaken. As the parties have chosen to bind themselves, so shall they be bound, and the court has no authority whatever to vary the stipulations of their contract, simply for the purpose of administering equitable relief, as a court of admiralty. It is perfectly true that a bottomry bond may be bad in part and good in part, and that as to the good, it is competent for a court of admiralty to exercise jurisdiction to grant relief. But I apprehend that this well recognized principle was never applied to a case like the present. It has sometimes happened that advances have been made for repairs in foreign ports, partly upon the personal credit of the owners, and partly upon the credit or security of the ship; and the whole amount of advances so made, has been included in one bottomry bond. In such cases, it has been uniformly held that as to the particular sum advanced on the personal credit of the owners, the bond was bad; but as to the sum advanced on the security of the vessel, it was good, and that as to the latter amount, a court of admiralty would exercise jurisdiction to enforce its payment. Such was the principle recognized by Lord Stowell in the case of The Augusta, 1 Dod. 287. "It is quite clear," said the court, "that the bill of exchange was founded on considerations of personal responsibility only, and that a bond of hypothecation was not at that time in the contemplation either of the borrower or lender. I have therefore no hesitation in saying that with respect to the £600, the bond is not effective; but with respect to the other part of the money, I am of a different opinion. For it is evident that no other security was held out than the ship and the freight, and it is therefore so far indisputably, a bottomry transaction. The foreign merchant, it is true, wished to extend the same species of security to the whole of his debt, and I see nothing dishonest or dishonorable in his attempt to do so; but, at the same time, this court cannot lend its assistance by enforcing the bond beyond the extent of its legal validity. It cannot permit the party to say the master had no other resource for procuring supplies except bottomry, when he himself had been content to advance the money on the personal responsibility of the owner. As far, then as it relates to the £600, I think the bond is invalid; but for the rest, I think it ought to be enforced. It is not necessary here, that a bond should be either good or bad, in toto: in the equitable proceedings of this court, it may be good in part and bad in part." The case of The Hero, 2 Dod. 139, and that of The Hunter [Case No. 6,904], will be found to correspond with the one just cited, and the decisions of the courts are in strict conformity with the rules here laid down. It is true that in the case of The Hunter, Judge Ware held that although there was a fatal objection to the instrument as a bond securing marine interest, it was not perhaps quite certain that the creditor could have no remedy upon it in a court of admiralty for the principal sum advanced, with land interest. In that case an amendment to the libel was allowed, and upon a new allegation that the libelant had a right to be paid upon general principles of the maritime law, the amount which it was shown had been originally advanced upon the personal credit of the owner, was decreed to be paid with land interest only.

Without undertaking to question the correctness of the course adopted by the learned judge of the district court of Maine, in giving a remedy in rem for a sum which he previously declared had been advanced upon the personal credit of the owners, it will be sufficient to show that the case now under consideration differs materially from that in which the amendment was allowed. In the latter case, there was the usual assumption of maritime risks, whereas the libelants here, as we have already seen, expressly refused to take any such risks. The claim of the lenders should have been made to depend upon the safe arrival of the vessel. This was necessary to justify the court in granting them now a remedy in rem. It is perfectly true, as the proctor contends, that the very fact that advances had been made to defray the expenses of repairs, would create a lien upon the vessel, if such advances had been made upon the credit of the vessel, and that such a lien would exist if there were no special act of hypothecation or mortgage. It would indeed exist by operation of law. But if instead of relying upon the general principles of the maritime law, the lender of the money chooses to exact of the master a special hypothecation of the vessel and cargo, and causes to be inserted in the instrument, clauses which operate as a waiver of his lien, or as a forfeiture of his right to proceed in rem, how can a court of admiralty grant him relief? If, as in the case now under consideration, he exacts maritime interest upon his loan, and at the same time expressly refused to assume maritime risks, is it not clear that the very instrument upon which he relies for his security is, by the well recognized principles of the maritime law, an abandonment of all claim against the vessel? It is well settled that if a material man gives personal credit, even in the case of materials furnished to a foreign ship, he loses his lien so far as to exclude him from a suit in rem. Zane v. The President [Case No. 18,201]. This rule is doubtless subject to the qualification that an express contract for a stipulated sum is not of itself a waiver of the lien, unless the contract contains some stipulations inconsistent with the continuance of the lien. [Peyroux v. Howard] 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324. The drawing of the bill of exchange does not, in my judgment, help the case of the libelants. In the case of The Augusta, already referred to, Lord Stowell considered that the taking of a bill of exchange by the holder of a bottomry bond, was a strong circumstance to show that the advances were made on the personal credit of the owners, and not on the credit of the vessel, and he held the bond void for the amount of the bill, and good for the advances made after the bill was drawn. It is, however, the usual practice to draw bills of exchange; and there is no inconsistency in taking this collateral security, nor has it ever been held to exclude the bond, nor diminish its solidity. So it was distinctly held in the case of The Jane, 1 Dod. 466. But it is well settled, that when a bill is drawn, and a bottomry bond taken, with maritime interest, for the same sum, the bill must share the fate of the bond. Until the vessel arrives in safety at the end of the voyage, the loan is at the risk of the lender, and if she is lost, nothing is due upon the bill more than upon the bond. When a bill is therefore drawn, and a bottomry bond given for the same consideration, the owner is not bound to honor the bill; at least not before the safe arrival of the vessel and the end of the risk. For it does not appear that anything will ever be due until the happening of the event on which the bond becomes payable, and then the payment of one security extinguishes both. The Hunter [supra].

It is further contended by the proctor of the libelants, that it is altogether premature, upon a trial of this exception to the jurisdiction, to regard the interest charged by the lender as usurious; that it is competent for the party upon the trial of the case upon its merits, to show that under the charge of interest and commission, there is no usury; that the interest is one thing and the commission another, and that there is nothing to prevent the court from considering the one as separate and distinct from the other. When the question of jurisdiction was first presented to the consideration of the court, I certainly did not understand the proctor to deny that maritime interest had been charged in the bill of exchange and the instrument of hypothecation, and I cannot upon an examination of that instrument, resist the conclusion that usury lurks under this apparently harmless name of commission. The aggregate amount borrowed by the master was $813. This was loaned at the rate of what is specifically denominated six per cent. commission, and the advance and commission amount to $862. For this, a draft is drawn, payable one day after sight, on the owner, residing in the city of Philadelphia. Here, then, is the sum of $49 commission, charged upon a loan of $813 for the space of perhaps ten days—allowing this time for the bill to be sent to the residence of the owner, from Key West. To use the expressive language of Lord Stowell, in the case of The Gratitudine, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 277, "I know that the word commission sounds sweet in a merchant's ear; but whether it is a proper charge or not on this occasion, I will not take upon myself to determine without a reference to the registrar properly assisted." I entertain but little doubt that maritime interest has been stipulated to be paid, and I have as little doubt that it is fully within my power, sitting in a court of admiralty, to reduce the rate of interest, where it is manifestly exorbitant, that is to say, in a case coming within my jurisdiction. The power possessed will, however, be exercised with great care and caution. The Zodiac, 1 Hagg. Adm. 326. But I do not pretend to assert the doctrine, that to justify this court, as a court of admiralty, to exercise jurisdiction over a bottomry transaction, it is indispensably necessary that maritime interest should be charged. This would, in my judgment, be altogether unreasonable. The lender of money on a bottomry bond certainly has a right to relinquish a portion of the profits he would be entitled to realize; and the owner of a vessel would come with a bad grace to contest the validity of a bottomry security, upon the ground that the lender of the money had charged the master less than he was authorized to exact under the maritime law.

Conceding then, that in the case before us, maritime interest was not demanded, and that the charges under the name of commissions will not amount to usury, can this court, as a court of admiralty, exercise jurisdiction of the case, when it is perfectly ap parent that no maritime risks were incurred? I am clearly of opinion that it cannot. In the language of Sir Stephen Lushington, in the case of The Emancipation, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 128, "I must look to the bond itself, without referring to extrinsic evidence at all; and unless I can come to the conclusion, from the words of the bond, that any maritime risk is to be directly or indirectly inferred, I must hold that I have no authority to pronounce in favor of its validity." Again, that eminent civilian says, in the same opinion: "I am perfectly satisfied that whatever might have been the intention of the contracting parties to the bond, both upon the face of the bond itself, and according to legal inference, the payment of the money advanced does not depend upon the safe arrival of the ship. I must, therefore, pronounce against the bond."

Upon mature consideration, therefore, I am of opinion that, as the pleadings now stand, I have no jurisdiction of the case, and that the libel must be dismissed, with costs.

MAITLAND, The (WOLF v.). See Case No. 8,979.

MAJESTIC, The. See Cases Nos. 17,005 and 17,006.

Case No. 8,981.

In re MAJOR.

Ex parte CARTER'S EX'R.

Ex parte MOORE.

[2 Hughes (1877) 215.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Virginia.[2]

BANKRUPTCY — ENCUMBERED PROPERTY — SALE WITHOUT NOTICE—PETITION TO SET ASIDE—EXECUTORS—FUND COLLECTED—PROPER COURT TO PASS UPON DISTRIBUTION.

1. Where lands bound by liens are sold by a bankruptcy court free of incumbrances, without notice to lien creditors, the same court may at any time thereafter, on proper petition and notice to the purchasers, set aside such sale as null and void as to lien creditors without notice.

[See Ex parte Bryan, Case No. 2,061.]

2. Where the executor of an estate, who is the officer of a state court, in respect to the estate is a lien creditor of an estate in bankruptcy, and recovers from that court the debt due him, the state court of which the executor is an officer is the proper tribunal to control and pass upon his distribution of the fund received by him from the bankruptcy court.

In bankruptcy.

HUGHES, District Judge. Samuel B. Major filed his petition in bankruptcy on the 1st of September, 1868, and was duly adjudicated as a bankrupt. He surrendered personal estate, and between six and seven hundred acres of real estate capable of being sold in separate tracts. There were judgments against him as principal and surety binding as liens upon his real estate to the amount of more than ten thousand dollars, due to some ten or twelve lien creditors. He had made, in May, 1868, a deed of trust for the general benefit of his creditors conveying to a trustee all his estate, worth not more than six thousand dollars. In due course of proceedings Walter W. Wood was chosen his assignee, but gave no bond as such. Elisha Barksdale was at the time and continued to be the law partner of W. W. Wood, and acted as counsel for the assignee in the progress of the cause. On the 12th of January, 1869, this assignee filed a petition in this court setting forth that certain judgments had been obtained against the bankrupt, some of them at dates longer than four months before the petition in bankruptcy, others within the period of four months, making no mention of judgments which had been taken against the bankrupt as surety, and setting forth the execution of the deed of trust of May, 1868, by the bankrupt. He prayed that as this deed had been executed within four months before the bankruptcy, and as certain judgments had been also obtained within that period, the same might be declared null and void; that E. B. Jeffries, the trustee in the said deed, be required to convey to himself, the assignee, the property covered by the said trust deed, and that he might have an order of court for the sale of the real estate of the bankrupt free of all incumbrances. On the same day on which this petition was filed, without notice to the trustee, Jeffries, or to any or either of the lien creditors, the then judge of this court signed an order directing Jeffries, the trustee, to convey to the assignee the property embraced in the trust deed, and directing the assignee to make sale of the real estate thus implicated, free of liens and of all incumbrances except the contingent right of dower of the bankrupt's wife. No account of liens or incumbrances had been taken or of their priorities at that time. The assignee in pursuance of this decree, on April 7th, 1869, sold all the real estate in question, and his counsel, E. Barksdale, bought three hundred and one acres of this real estate, which is the tract now in question, at the price of $1565.20. The order of sale was made on the 12th day of January, 1869. The sale, thus uncertain as to its real date, was not reported to the court, nor the report of it filed in the record, until the 22d of September, 1869, and on that same day, without opportunity being allowed for exceptions, and without notice to any human being, the sale was confirmed by the then judge of this court, and deeds ordered to be made to the purchasers on payment. On the 29th of December, 1869, this assignee conveyed the three hundred and one acres which have been named, by deed to the said E. Barksdale, before any money was paid him by said Barksdale as the purchase-money for the property. Some time afterwards, however, Barksdale claimed before a commissioner that he subsequently became entitled to credits from the estate (including a fee as counsel for this assignee) to an amount approximating the price he had bid for the land.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed by circuit court (case unreported).]

There were various proceedings from time to time in after years against the assignee, charging and implying default or misapplication as to funds in his hands, and especially as to the purchase-money of the land he had sold. These proceedings resulted in the removal of Wood as assignee, and the substitution of W. H. Allderdice in his stead. On the 10th of March, 1873, the new assignee, Allderdice, filed his petition alleging that although four years had elapsed, the purchasers of the several tracts of real estate from Wood, his predecessor, had not paid the purchase-money due by them and had all the time remained in possession of the land they had claimed to purchase without paying rent, and asking authority to resell. These allegations were afterwards shown not to be true as to one of the purchasers, J. M. Carrington, of one of the tracts. On the same day on which this petition of Allderdice for a resale was filed, its prayer was granted, and a resale ordered without notice to any one. Confining the remainder of this recital of facts to the three hundred and one acres which had been purchased by Barksdale: A resale was not made under this order. On the 12th of November, 1873, on the "application" of J. J. Hill, by attorney, and of C. H. Cabaniss, executor of Samuel Carter, whose judgment liens had priority of others in the funds arising from the sale of the bankrupt's lands, another order was made for resale. No notice or rule had been served upon other lien creditors, or upon purchasers under the order of 12th January, 1869, and under the sale of 7th April, 1869, of this "application," which must have been made orally to the court. Under this order, made on the 12th November, 1873, the assignee, Allderdice, made sale, on the 12th December, 1873, of three hundred and one acres in question, and made report of the sale on the 18th February, 1874. But this report, filed on the day last named, embraced a note by the assignee, which stated that although this land had been cried out to W. V. B. Moore, yet that Moore having failed to comply with the terms of the resale, one M. Palmer had agreed to take the land at Moore's bid, and that the assignee therefore had contracted with him, and he now reported his sale as having been made to M. Palmer. On the 3d of December, 1873, an order was obtained from Judge Underwood, by E. Barksdale, setting aside the order "entered on the 11th day of November, 1873," meaning doubtless the order made on the 12th of November, 1873. This last-named order was made in advance of the sale made by Allderdice on the 12th December, 1873. It is in the handwriting of E. Barksdale, was signed "John C. Underwood," and must have been personally held by E. Barksdale, as it was not filed in the record of this cause until the 20th of January, 1874, until which filing it had no validity; and, of course, the sale made by the assignee on the 12th December, 1873, was made in ignorance of its existence. Judge Underwood died in the latter part of December, 1873, and this cause came before the present judge of this court with the record showing the first assignee to have been removed for having been largely in default, and incumbered with the illegal and futile orders and reports of sale which have been described. The matter of the 301 acre tract of land had been further complicated by the first purchaser, E. Barksdale, having delivered possession of the tract, under what they believed to be a purchase from him, to two of his nieces, and by one of the nieces having intermarried with W. V. B. Moore. It seems that the judgment of J. J. Hill, one of the lien creditors, was settled in part out of the sale which had been made of another part of the bankrupt's land to J. M. Carrington. But neither from the sale to Barksdale, nor from that to Palmer, was the judgment lien in favor of Carter's estate satisfied, in whole or part.

Such being the position of affairs, the present judge of this court, on the 12th of March, 1874, made an order, on motion of Allderdice, the assignee, consented to by E. Barksdale, purchaser under the illegal sale of 7th April, 1869, and by M. Palmer, purchaser under the illegal sale of 12th December, 1873, and by C. H. Cabaniss, the representative of Carter's estate, for a resale of the 301 acre tract of land. By this order W. R. Barksdale was, at the suggestion of E. Barksdale, who was his father, appointed a commissioner to make the sale. Commissioner Barksdale made the sale on the 25th July, 1874, at which Andrew Easly and others became purchasers at the price of $2580.60, and reported his sale on the 5th August following. By supplemental reports, the last of which was filed on the 6th of April, 1876, he reported all the deferred payments for the land to have been made, and after paying off all liens prior to that of Carter's estate, he held in his hands a balance to the amount of $1725.73. The judgment lien in favor of Samuel Carter's estate more than equals this amount, and there are liens following that of Carter's estate in priority to the amount of several thousand dollars. To this sale made by Commissioner Barksdale there was no exception, and it was duly confirmed. On the 20th of November, 1874, and on the 17th of December, 1875, orders were made referring to R. W. Watkins as commissioner sundry matters connected with these sales of the 301 acre tract of land. He was directed, among other things, to report all liens resting upon the land and their priorities; what amount E. Barksdale had paid on his purchase of January, 1869; what amount was due upon the judgment in favor of Carter's estate; who was entitled to the benefit of this judgment in the event that it had been sold by the distributees of Carter's estate; what amount had been paid for it if so sold; whether the judgment was obtained against Major, the bankrupt, as principal or surety; whether, if as surety, the principal obligor was not responsible, and whether this judgment could not be enforced against the principal obligor's estate; whether, if so, Carter's representative was seeking to enforce the claim against the principal obligor's estate, etc., etc. This commissioner made reports dated respectively on the 9th August, 1875, and April 1st, 1876, responsive to these orders of reference, which showed a balance still due to Carter's estate from the bankrupt's estate of $1857.27; and that the lien of Carter's estate for this amount was the first lien in priority now binding the fund of $1725.73 in the hands of Commissioner W. R. Barksdale. One of these reports of Commissioner Watkins further showed that this judgment in favor of Carter's estate was due by Major as surety, and that suit was going on against the estate of the principal obligor, which latter was probably responsible for the debt. One of the reports further showed that half of the judgment of Carter's estate against Major's estate had been purchased by C. H. Cabaniss, executor of Carter's estate; and it further showed that the other half had been purchased by E. Barksdale, and paid for by W. R. Barksdale during the period when the latter held in his hands the balance of $1725.73 due from him as commissioner of this court. A petition has been presented by W. V. B. Moore, husband of one of the Misses Barksdale, in behalf of his wife and her sister, complaining of the hardship of their case, stating that they were in danger of being thrown out of a home which they had innocently purchased and paid for, and praying the protection of the court, etc.

From the extraordinary mass of matter, a great deal of it irrelevant, which incumbers the record of this case, I have eliminated the foregoing statement of such facts as control me in my decision on the questions presented. There may be some inaccuracies of detail in the statement, but none that can affect the judgment I am required to give on the leading facts thus evolved and set forth. It is useless to say what must appear self-evident, that the sale to Barksdale of January, 1869, was wholly illegal, null, and void, as to all the parties to the order of court under which it was made. As to lien creditors without notice the order of court by which the sale was directed was illegal, null, and void, not only in authorizing the sale itself, but as to most of its other provisions. It cannot be countenanced for a moment in a court of justice in bar of, or in any manner to prejudice, the rights of lien creditors without notice. As against such lien creditors the purchaser under the sale, E. Barksdale, has no title under it whatever, not even an equitable title; because he was in fiduciary relations as counsel of the assignee, Wood, to the trust with which the assignee was clothed. Nor is the case of the Misses Barksdale any better, however much they may really suffer by the sale being treated as null and void. The evidence shows that they actually paid E. Barksdale no money, but that he sought to pass off this land to them for a debt he had previously owed them. This debt, whatever it might have been, remains due from him to them now as fully as on the day on which they entered upon the land. On losing the land they are placed precisely where they stood before. Their claim against E. Barksdale is just where it was, and they have no right, either legal or equitable, to call upon the court to make good a debt due to them from E. Barksdale with land or its proceeds to which E. Barksdale has neither a legal nor an equitable right, and which the court itself has no power to divert from those to whom the land or its proceeds is legally and equitably due.

The sale to M. Palmer of 12th of December, 1873, was equally illegal, null, and void, as to all but the representatives of the liens of Hill and of Carter's estate. The former purchaser had no notice of the order under which it had been made, nor had any other lien creditor of the bankrupt. It is true that inasmuch as the judgment in favor of Carter's estate consumes all the proceeds of sale, it is not likely that any creditor later in priority would be disposed to impeach the sale; but non constat, that some subsequent creditor might have bid enough at the sale to afford him a surplus if he had had notice, and the court would on motion of any such creditor have set aside the sale because made without notice to him. E. Barksdale, too, having been a purchaser under an order of sale made by the court, and having had no notice of the "application" on which the sale of the 12th December, 1873, to Palmer was made, had a right to an order setting aside the sale on his mere motion, though the order which he did obtain for that purpose not having been put in the record was futile. It is therefore my decision that the sales of January, 1869, and December, 1873, were illegal, null, and void, as to lien creditors without notice. Any lien creditor aggrieved by them would have been heard to impeach them, and they would have been at any time set aside by me on motion and notice. This was done in the proceedings which resulted in the consent order of the 12th of March, 1874. That order was the first and only one under which a valid sale has been made of the land now in controversy. If that order did not in terms rescind the previous orders of sale, it did so by necessary implication. As against the liens which still bound the real estate of the bankrupt on the 12th of March, 1874, it was by necessary implication, being by consent implying notice to all parties actually interested, a rescission of the former orders on the subject-matter to which it related, and was so understood to be by the court, and must have been so understood to be by all those who were parties consenting to it. The sale of the 25th of July, 1874, to Andrew Easly and others is the only sale that has been made of the tract of land in question, which is valid as to the judgment liens of Hill and Carter's estate. The whole proceeds of that sale, so far as they were appropriated in pursuance of the consent given in the order of the 12th of March, 1874, must go to discharge the liens binding upon the land. E. Barksdale's claim to the surplus of purchase-money paid by Easly under the last sale, over and above that bid by himself at the first sale cannot be entertained. In the consent order of 12th March, 1874, the representatives of Carter's estate agreed to allow on the purchase-money of the 301 acre tract of land any payment that might be proved to have been made by E. Barksdale on the liens existing on the said lands, and impliedly consented to allow any payments that might have been made by the said Barksdale on the purchase-money of the land he had bought after being charged with the rents and profits of the land for the period during which he had held possession since January, 1869. I say there was an implied consent that these latter payments should be allowed, though the decree only directed an account of these payments and of these rents and profits to be taken; for the subsequent proceedings which have been taken in the case connected with those matters all implied that such consent had been given, and would not have been taken if such consent had not been virtually given. Proceeding on the assumption that this consent had been given, the orders in reference to Commissioner Watkins were entered by the court and the case was heard on the reports of that commissioner, and on the various exceptions that were filed to these reports.

Upon a full and careful consideration of the evidence, notes of argument, reports of commissioners, and exceptions to the latter, which were submitted to me in November last, I made up the decree which was entered in this cause on the 19th of December. Upon as careful consideration of the case now, and of the papers subsequently filed, the evidence subsequently taken, and the notes of argument and oral arguments since submitted, I see no cause except in one particular to vary that decree in any material respect, and will not do so. As to the claim of Barksdale that Carter's executor can make his debt out of some other estate, that was the excuse made by W. W. Wood some six years ago when he was first called upon to account for moneys in his hands by this executor. It cannot be denied that where a creditor has two sources from which to recover a debt, he may elect the one from which to receive his debt. In this case it seems that the other recourse has produced nothing for six years; and this court can safely concede to this executor the right to make his money here. If hereafter the other resource should yield the fund, the assignee here may justly claim to be subrogated there to the rights of Carter's executor, and will be instructed to do so by this court. I do not think that this court should be required to pass upon the respective rights of persons to whom the distributees of Carter's estate may have assigned their interests in the judgment against Major's estate, and itself distribute this fund among them. That is more properly within the jurisdiction of the probate court, of which Carter's executor is an officer. But as it seems pretty clear that half that judgment belongs to E. Barksdale, who has deposited $1000 of the $1725.73 in his son's hands in bank to the credit of this court, in that respect and that alone I will modify the order of 19th December, 1876. As to whether the purchase of one-half of this judgment by Cabaniss, the executor of Carter's estate, and the purchase of the other half by E. Barksdale, were transactions which this court should or should not condemn, it will be time enough for it to pass its judgment when some one of the distributees, who would be the persons really aggrieved by those transactions, shall appeal to it for redress. I will sign an order dismissing the petition for review; and as to the petition filed on the 22d of December, 1876, revoking the order of that date, but discharging Commissioner W. R. Barksdale for the present from the duty of depositing to the credit of the court the $725.73 remaining in his hands, provided that security in some form be given by him that it will be held subject to any future requisition of the court.

Affirmed by the chief justice, on petition for revision.

MAJOR, In re. See Case No. 2,061.

Case No. 8,982.

MAJOR v. HANSEN.

[2 Biss. 195.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Nov., 1869.

NOTES—ALTERATION—NOT MATERIAL—BONA FIDE HOLDER.

1. A bona fide holder of a promissory note from which the place where it was payable has been erased by an unauthorized person and without his knowledge can recover against the maker.

2. The alteration is not material, and enlarges but does not limit the rights of the maker.

Assumpsit upon a promissory note for $1,500 in gold "payable at the Commercial Bank of Canada." These words were erased, and the proof showed that this had been done after the note left the maker's hands, and without his knowledge or consent, but there was nothing to connect the plaintiff with the alteration, and he was a bona fide holder for value.

Beckwith, Ayer & Kales, for plaintiff.

Scoville, Bailey & Brawley, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. There is no material alteration of this note. The effect of the words "payable at the Commercial Bank of Canada" was to give the defendant the right to discharge his obligation by tendering the money at the place designated, and the only effect of erasing them was to give him the additional right of tendering the money wherever he might find the plaintiff. The rights of defendant are thereby enlarged, and in no respect limited, and he cannot complain unless he can in some manner connect the plaintiff with the alteration, or can show that he tendered the money at the place stated and has been damnified. If these words had been added the case would have been different for that would have been a material alteration—a limitation of the rights of defendants.

In this case the maker has shown no injury to himself from the erasure of these words, and the note being negotiable the responsibility rests upon him to prove his equities. Judgment for plaintiff.

For general doctrine of alteration of instruments, consult 2 Pars. Cont. 716-724.

Case No. 8,983.

The MAJOR BARBOUR.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 167.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. May 28, 1862.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—NECESSITY—ENEMY PROPERTY.

1. A clear necessity will justify an entrance into a blockaded port, but satisfactory evidence will be required of the reality and urgency of the necessity.

2. Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy property, and for an attempt to violate the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The libel of information avers that the vessel and cargo were captured as lawful prize, January 28, 1862, at the mouth of the Grand Caillou bayou, on the coast of Louisiana, by the United States steamship De Soto. The prize was sent in charge of a prize-master and crew to this port, and was delivered to the prize commissioners here, February 21, 1862. The firm of Prooss & Oliveros intervene and answer the libel, and claim portions of the cargo, as subjects of the queen of Spain, and residents of Havana, in Cuba. .No other claim is filed. No regular bill of sale, or registry, or other original document, verifying the title or true ownership of the vessel, was produced from the vessel, or on the trial. The only papers relating thereto, found on board of her at the time of her capture, were a certificate of the British consul at New Orleans, dated June 6, 1861, stating that the vessel was built in New Jersey, in the United States, and registered at the port of New Orleans, September 20, 1856; that J. Roberts is her master, and that John Bronasses, of the city of New Orleans, has purchased all the shares in the vessel. That certificate was indorsed at Havana, by the British consul, June 26, 1861. Its effect is continued, by a subsequent indorsement to December 6, 1861, and is again continued by an indorsement made under the previous one, by the British consul at Havana, until March 6, 1862, by which time, as it states, "the vessel must proceed to a British port, to be registered." This last entry was dated January 17, 1862, and was made about a week previous to the seizure of the vessel.

The only further documentary evidence found on the schooner, respecting her nationality or individual proprietorship, consists of two "agreements for foreign-going ships," or shipping articles, in the names of the master and crew of the vessel, on the outward and return voyage in question. The first one is a printed form, filled up, in manuscript, with the names of the master and crew, and the date of its execution, and a description of the intended voyage. It purports to have been executed at New Orleans, December 3, 1861, by James Roberts, captain, two mates, five seamen, a cook and a steward, and to be for "a voyage from New Orleans to Havana, and any other port or ports where freight or cargo may offer, at the discretion of the master, and back to a final port of discharge in one of the British colonies, for a time not to exceed six calendar months." The other agreement is drawn up in manuscript and is substantially of the tenor of the printed one, containing the same complement of men, but with a change of four names. It purports to have been executed at Havana, January 10, 1862, and is for a voyage from that "port to Matamoras, and from thence to a port of discharge in the West Indies." The capture of the vessel and cargo took place in the vicinity of the mouth of the Mississippi, eighteen days thereafter.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

An account of the voyage was given on the preparatory examination, February 27 and 28, by the master and mate of the vessel, one seaman, and two passengers. They were present at the capture. The master and seaman have resided in New Orleans twelve or thirteen years, and are British subjects. The mate is unmarried, is a native of the state of New York, and has no particular residence. The two passengers are Spanish subjects. One, Morey, has resided eleven years in New Orleans, and is married; the other, Prats, is a single man, who lives in Havana. One of the passengers, Prats, for himself and firm, claims a portion of the cargo. No claimants have intervened for the residue of the cargo. The other witnesses testify that they had no interest in the vessel and cargo. They concur in stating that the capture was made February 27, or 28, a short distance off the western coast of Louisiana; that the vessel belonged to John Bronasses, of New Orleans, who appointed the master; that she had been carrying all kinds of cargo generally between New Orleans and Havana; and that her last clearing port before her capture was Havana. The captain says that a Spanish house in Havana were the ship agents there, and obtained the cargo, consisting of coffee, cigars, salt, cases of merchandise and boxes of powder, and other boxes, barrels and bales, the contents of which he does not know; that he does not know that they have any interest in the cargo; and that he thinks that the owners of the cargo reside in Matamoras. The vessel, after leaving Havana, touched at no other port before her capture. She sailed under the British flag. The captain says that he knew of the blockade of the Southern ports before he left New Orleans, but did not know that Grand Caillou, where he was trying to put in, was blockaded. No warning or notice of such blockade had been given him. He says that he was going into Grand Caillou because he was in a leaking condition, in consequence of a heavy gale which had been raging for about forty-eight hours; and that, for that reason, the vessel, before and at that time, was sailing wide of Matamoras, and was going into Caillou, which was the nearest port. The mate says that the vessel had always carried general cargoes, similar to her present one, and has generally delivered them at the same place, about twenty-five miles up the Caillou river; that he knew, and supposed the captain did, that Louisiana was at war with the United States, and that New Orleans was blockaded by United States vessels; and that he did not know of the blockade of the mouth of the Caillou, where the vessel was attempting to enter, and had never been warned off or had notice of such blockade. He says that the voyage was a round voyage, commenced at Caillou river on or about the 11th of December. The statement by the mate, of the course run by the vessel on her voyage, varies materially from that asserted by the master. The captain says: "The course, at all times when the weather would permit, was directed for Matamoras. The reason I was going into Grand Caillou was, because I was in a leaking condition. The vessel was sailing wide for Matamoras, and we were going into Caillou for that reason. It was the nearest port." The answer of the mate to the same interrogatory is: "Her course was not, at all times when the weather would permit, and was not at the time of her capture directed to Matamoras, where she was destined by the ship's papers. We were upwards of 300 miles from Matamoras. Her course was altered for Caillou river on the morning of the day we were captured, I suppose for the purpose of entering that river and making a landing. It may have been for the purpose of discharging cargo, or for some other reason; I cannot say."

The question, whether the vessel was off her due course when arrested because of stress of weather, or other necessity compelling or justifying it, or whether she made a deviation intentionally, and under circumstances importing culpability on her part, is of moment on the issue between the parties. The master and mate differ broadly in their testimony on the point, and they speak positively upon a personal knowledge of the facts. The seaman adopts essentially the representations given by the master of the occurrence set forth in answer to the 36th interrogatory, but qualifies the force of his statement most essentially, by adding: "I only answer this question on information and belief, having no personal knowledge of the matters inquired of." The log of Saturday, January 25th, Sunday, the 26th, and Monday, the 27th, notes the weather each day, to the hour of capture on the 27th, as being generally clear, the sails all drawing. It remarks on Saturday that the middle of the day was partly squally, with light rain showers and baffling wind, and the latter part fresh breezes, but set the square sail; on Sunday, that the square sail and topsail were taken in—not certain of position of ship; sounded in 18 fathoms, and jibed ship—strong breezes; that Monday came in clear, and at 3:30 struck on shoal of Bay Caillou, and at 3:51 was boarded by the United States ship-of-war and taken in charge. Her log was kept in an exceedingly loose and unseamanlike manner. These facts, however, appear distinctly enough upon it: that the vessel left on this voyage, and commenced keeping sea time at 2 p. m. on Saturday, the 18th of January, 1862, though it omits entering her port of destination or departure. The latter, it is to be implied, was Havana, because the preceding entry ends with the arrival of the vessel there, December 23, 1861. On Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday the vessel encountered heavy weather, amounting, on Thursday, to what was noted as a gale. She was hove to, and furled her sails, and made some water. No mention is made of her touching ground, or becoming leaky, during that period. The two passengers give no clear information as to the condition of the vessel or her navigation. They both of them avow their ignorance of the coast and of nautical matters, and their alarm in the storm, and anxiety that the master should put back or make a harbor. But it is evident, from the log and the testimony of the mate, that the storm or leaking of the ship in no way compelled him to seek shelter in Caillou bay. The gale had ceased and moderate weather had prevailed for more than two days prior to her attempt to do so; and the antecedents of the vessel and the character of her lading supply strong suspicions against the integrity of her movements. There is more weighing against them than the suspicions ordinarily recognized in prize courts, as violent presumptions affecting the innocency of a bottom unquestionably neutral in its character, which claims to be excused for seeking a blockaded port for necessary repairs, supplies, or shelter. An act done clearly from necessity, and fairly and with good faith, in entering a blockaded port, will be excused: but such allegations are regarded with distrust, and satisfactory evidence is demanded of the reality and urgency of the necessity. The Arthur, Edw. Adm. 202; The Fortuna, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 27; The Christianburg, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 376. In this case, the evidence shows that the attempt to enter the blockaded port was not compelled by any suffering or peril of the vessel or cargo. It was made in calm weather, two days after the cessation of any dangerous wind, or any evidence, from the pumps of the vessel, or otherwise, that she had sustained any positive injury in the gale; and the peril seems to have been unnoticed and unknown by the mate and seaman, or any one else having the management of the vessel. The alarms of the two passengers rested upon no facts, and were founded on their ignorance and timidity alone; and the testimony of the master, as to the state of the vessel, and the cause of her proximity to the blockaded coast, affords no satisfactory justification for her efforts to that harbor.

Extrinsic facts and circumstances aggravate the suspicions as to the integrity of the doings and statements of the master. The latitude of Havana, noted at the foot of the log, was, by observation, 23° 58′ north, and the longitude about 84° 40′ west, which corresponds substantially with the ordinary maps and geographical descriptions. The mouth of the Rio Grande, and alleged port of destination, is laid down on the charts at about latitude 26° north, and longitude 98° west. The vessel was arrested on the Louisiana coast, a few miles from the Mississippi, which, from the last previous entry on the log, would probably be about latitude 29° north, and longitude 89° 58′ west. The daily distances run are not given in the log, and the courses are stated obscurely and imperfectly. The port of departure, Havana, and the alleged port of destination, Matamoras, approximate to nearly the same parallel of latitude, and are separated by several degrees of longitude, and by the entries on the log, the vessel was captured about nine days out, several degrees north of her declared destination. No adequate cause is proved for such deviation. It is not attempted now to fix, with mathematical exactness, the position of the points mentioned, because, without such minuteness of correspondence, the bearings of the facts is sufficiently indicated by showing that the vessel was actually running on a line terminating more than 300 miles from her destination, her course being about the same length as the distance between Havana and Matamoras, with no cause assigned therefor on the log, or by the testimony of the master, or of any of the ship's company. Nor is any reason intimated, in the proofs, for navigating several hundred of miles contiguous to the low and dangerous shores of Louisiana and Texas to reach a port lying southerly of those states and directly in front of Havana, and open to the sea. The master and mate state in their testimony that the vessel was steering a course wide of Matamoras when she was captured, and before she discovered the capturing vessel. Looking at the prominent facts in proof—that the vessel was owned by a New Orleans merchant, and commanded by an enemy master; that she had been during the blockade engaged in other voyages from and to New Orleans; that she had evaded the blockade in leaving and entering that port under the same master and owner; that she had also before entered and sailed from Caillou bay; that she was attempting, in this instance, to take in a cargo chiefly, if not wholly, the produce of the outward one, and adapted to the urgent necessities of the enemy; that the purpose was manifested in the preparation and conduct of the voyage of running the blockade at that place with full knowledge of its existence and efficiency; and, moreover, that no satisfactory evidence is produced, or is found in the preparatory examination, or the ship's papers, that a necessity existed for the vessel to make a port to obtain repairs or relief, being in distress, or that she deviated from the general course pursued by her during the voyage until the same morning, and immediately before her arrest,—I am satisfied, first, that the vessel and all the cargo not included within the claim of the claimants are enemy property; and second, that the vessel and her entire cargo are guilty of knowingly attempting to violate the blockade alleged in the suit; and that, for these causes, the vessel and cargo are lawful prize of war, and must be condemned to be forfeited.

[After final decree, a motion to reopen the question of costs and the distribution of the proceeds of the prize property was denied. Case No. 8,984.]

Case No. 8,984.

The MAJOR BARBOUR.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 310.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1863.

PRIZE—FINAL DECREE—PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY—MOTION TO REOPEN—COSTS.

1. The question of the allowance by the court of costs and fees to counsel and officers in prize cases discussed.

2. The court having at a previous term made a final decree distributing the proceeds of sale in the case, and awarding costs to various parties, a motion to reopen the question of costs was denied.

3. After the lapse of the term in which a decree is rendered in a prize case, the authority of the court to revoke or alter it is extinct.

4. The act and joint resolution of July 17, 1862 [12 Stat. 600, 627], in respect to prize cases, discussed.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel and cargo were captured as prize, January 28, 1862, off the coast of Louisiana, by the United States war steamship De Soto, and sent to this port for adjudication. She was here libelled, March 18, 1862, in the name of the United States, and the capturing ship De Soto, and process of attachment and monition was on the same day issued thereon to the marshal against the prize, and was returned by him April 1 thereafter, duly served. In the intermediate time (March 28, 1862), an intervention was made, by claim and answer, in behalf of affreighters of the cargo, for the voyage on which the vessel was arrested, and the litigation was prosecuted upon that issue between the libellants and claimants to the final decision of the cause in this court. The suit was noticed for trial and brought to hearing April 28, 1862. Two days were fully occupied with the oral discussion of the case, and the counsel also reserved the privilege of laying before the court written arguments for the respective parties. Those supplementary arguments were received, and the whole case was considered by this court, and on the 28th of May the final decision on the merits was rendered [Case No. 8,983], but it was not presented by the United States attorney to the judge, in form, for signature, until July 29, 1862. On the 13th of April Mr. Upton gave in a petition of the master, for himself and crew, to intervene in the suit as captors of the prize, and to share in the distribution of its proceeds. On bringing in the report of the prize commissioners upon the order of reference to them, a decree designating the vessels entitled to share in that distribution was signed October 13, 1862. On the 12th of September the prize commissioners had their bill of costs for services rendered in the suit taxed by the judge; Mr. Upton his, as counsel for the captors, on the 27th of September; the district attorney his, August 2; the marshal his, December 15; and the clerk his, December 9, 1862. The counsel for the schooner Kittatinny presented no bill of costs in their behalf for taxation.

The venditioni exponas had been issued on the condemnation decree April 21, returnable the first Tuesday of June, and $800 of the proceeds of the vessel were paid into the registry of the court on the process, July 3. The residue, $43,767.76, appears, by the clerk's entries, to have been paid by the marshal directly into the treasury December 10, 1862. Previous notices of the time of the taxation of costs in the suit were given reciprocally by all the officers, except the counsel for the schooner Kittatinny, to the district attorney, and by the district attorney, as to his costs, to Mr. Upton, counsel for the captors. The commanding officers of the captor-vessels must be named in the libel. Stated Prize Rule 47. It was those captors named in the libel for whom alone the notice of appearance was given by the counsel (Mr. Upton), as far as was officially known to the court; although, undoubtedly, all other vessels participating in the capture were entitled, on their application, to be made co-parties as captors in the suit. After entering the decree of condemnation of the prize property before mentioned, proofs were brought before the prize commissioners, upon an order of reference to them, to determine what vessels were entitled to share in the distribution of the proceeds of the prize property; and upon the coming in of the report of such proofs by the prize commissioners, October 13, 1862, the court admitted the Kittatinny as one of the capturing vessels, and on the same day the decree of distribution conformably thereto was made and signed by the judge.

It appeared from the report of the commissioners that E. C. Benedict, appeared before them as counsel for the officers and crew of the Kittatinny, and conducted the proceedings in support of their interests, and had also appeared in court on their behalf, upon the hearing on the merits, but took no part in the oral discussion of the case in court. Upon representation to the court by E. C. Benedict, on the part of the firm of Benedict, Burr & Benedict, proctors, that the other officers of the court concerned in the suit before named had obtained a taxation of their costs for services rendered in the suit, and that their firm had received no notice from either of them, or from the court, of the time or place of such taxation, and that allowances of costs to such officers were made, on such taxation, to the prejudice of the parties they represent, and that the whole proceeds of the condemned property adjudicated upon in this suit are about to be disbursed to the captors, after deduction therefrom of the allowances taxed as aforesaid, and without any compensation being reserved to those proctors for their services in the suit, he moved the court for an order rescinding such former taxations, and that such taxations shall be opened for review and rectification, and that the costs justly due and allowable to their firm in the cause be also taxed and adjusted by the court, and be deducted from the gross proceeds of the prize, before they are paid over to the libellants.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

Several considerations of weight, both of practice and legal rights, are involved in this application. It is, under all circumstances, a most irksome and perplexing service imposed upon courts of justice, to measure and determine the rate of compensation to be allowed their officers, especially if not fixed by law, or if left in any degree to the unrestricted discretion of the court. The struggle between the demands for large allowances on the part of officers, and for severe restrictions and limitations to rates of compensation by those to be charged with the payment, are always embarrassing and vexatious, when no other rule is prescribed by law than the judge's appreciation of the character and value of the claims to be assessed and adopted; and most essentially so if the charges are constructive in character, and are claimed for services not rendered in the presence of the court. In prize cases, there is superadded a difficulty rarely presented in other instances—that the compensation of the officer is to be provided by assessing annually on each suit its individual proportion of the yearly allowance or salary payable to the officer for services rendered within the same year the suit was pending; that is, all the suits in prosecution during the year must each be taxed upon the amount recovered in it a common proportion of the costs (limited compensation to all but to counsel for captors) earned by the officers during the year. So that, by the laws as they stand, the district attorney, the marshal, the clerk and the prize commissioners, are prohibited receiving beyond fixed sums to each for a full year's service, and no rate or rule of taxation in respect to costs to counsel for captors is given; and, by other statutory provisions, the proceeds recovered in prize cases, after the deduction of costs, are alloted to the pension fund for seamen and to the captors. The counsel for prize captors are entitled to receive costs, together with the officers above specified, out of such proceeds recovered. The secretary of the navy has, under the law of July 17, 1862 (section 12), employed F. H. Upton, Esq., as counsel to act for captors in all prize cases in this district, when the captors do not appoint counsel, to assist the district attorney and protect the interests of captors, with such compensation as he may think is just and reasonable.

In this case, it appears that the copartnership of Benedict, Burr & Benedict were appointed proctors by the officers and crew of the schooner Kittatinny, and acted in that capacity, with the district attorney and the general counsel for the capturing ship named in the libel, in conducting the legal proceedings in the cause, up to the coming into court of the report of the prize commissioners, upon which it was decreed that the vessel was co-operating with the De Soto in the capture of the schooner Major Barbour. It also appears that no notice was directly given to the Messrs. Benedict by the district attorney, or to any other of the officers of court claiming costs in this suit, of the time and place of the taxation of their own costs in the case, or that the Messrs. Benedict should produce and have taxed their own therein, and that the costs of the other officers were taxed by the judge, and that the Messrs. Benedict have just acquired knowledge of the fact, and that the marshal, after paying such taxed costs, has remitted the residue of the proceeds in his hands to the United States treasury. The Messrs. Benedict, on notice to the other officers whose costs were taxed, as above stated, apply now for an order, that the costs taxed to the prize commissioners, the district attorney, the marshal, and Mr. Upton, the other counsel for the captors in this cause, be rescinded, and that all the costs heretofore taxed be re-examined and re-taxed by the court, and also that costs to them as proctors for the ship's company of the schooner Kittatinny be taxed in their behalf, and be ordered to be paid out of the proceeds of said prize in the treasury.

This motion is resisted, on the part of the district attorney and the counsel for the other captors, because the matter is now out of the authority of the court, the proceedings being terminated in this court, and the moneys raised in this suit having been paid over by the marshal, and being no longer subject to the control of the court. No objection is made by the counsel for the other officers that a re-examination and re-taxation of all the costs awarded them in the case should be made, provided the court now possess any power over the funds. No costs were allowed on the taxation by the court, except upon the express assent of the counsel representing the libellants, and no item forbidden by law was sanctioned by the court; but it is palpable that the aggregate amount is large, and that many charges were allowed upon evidence which the captors, represented by Messrs. Benedict, would be rightfully entitled to discredit, by cross-examination or other testimony, had application been made in time therefor. But it appears to me that the present motion must be denied, inasmuch as all judicial power over the matter by this court is determined, and no effectual relief can be afforded the promovents, unless by revoking the final decrees rendered in this cause, the last of which was signed and recorded in October last. Those decrees have definitely passed upon the question of costs recoverable upon the evidence then before the court. Although the prize court is virtually open every day, yet its course of practice, its regular terms for returns of process, and its other judicial action are all in conformity with procedures in the court of admiralty proper, and, after the lapse of the term in which a decree is rendered, all authority to revoke or alter it is extinct in the court which rendered it. The Martha [Case No. 9,144]; U. S. v. The Glamorgan [Id. 15,214]. The power of the court in the case ceases with the term in which its decree is made. U. S. v. Certain Hogsheads of Molasses [Id. 14,766]. Courts of law and equity are governed by the same doctrine (Hudson v. Guestier, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 1; Whiting v. Bank of U. S., 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 6, 13; Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 424; Bank of U. S. v. Moss, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 31); and in admiralty, the power of the court to set aside defaults is restricted, even during the sitting of the same term, to 10 days after the decree (Supreme Court Rule 40).

The final action of the court in this suit having been perfected in October term last, and, in respect to the allowance of the costs referred to, in terms prior to the present one, the decision cannot be disturbed or reviewed here in the present term of January. The counsel is no doubt entitled to have his costs taxed against his own clients in case he shall pursue his remedy at law against them personally; but I possess no judicial competency to issue any compulsory order which will have effect upon the treasury department, other than such as may go with the final decrees already rendered in this suit. It is proper, however, to observe that the counsel who were joint co-actors with the district attorney and the counsel for the capturing ship named in the libel must necessarily be deemed cognizant of the proceedings common to all parties in progress before the court up to the final termination thereof, and of the legal necessity of having their own costs taxed and embraced within the decree of the court, and also of opposing all improper allowances to other parties previous to the rendition of such decree, and that, accordingly, no error or irregularity was committed, by the court in signing the final decrees without including within them the costs which such counsel could legally charge and claim in their own behalf, or which they might have prevented being allowed to other parties, had they appeared and opposed the sanction of them before the authority of the court in the case had terminated. Had that degree of vigilance been exercised, no doubt the court would have required, in relation to the costs of all parties, that there should have been the fullest practicable opportunity given to all interested in the suit, to secure, on the taxation of costs, the enforcement of every proper allowance, and the exclusion of any not clearly sanctioned by law and justice. But it is not to be overlooked that, since the act and joint resolution passed by congress July 17, 1862, the court has no longer the function of taking charge of prize proceeds or disbursing them, nor affixing the sum of costs payable out of them, except in the special instance of the counsel for the captors, but that, on the contrary, the proceeds go in gross into the treasury, and the costs to the marshal, the district attorney, and the prize commissioners are paid from the treasury under the restriction that these officers shall obtain no more from the entire proceeds for a year's service than the fixed sums therein specified; and no rule is furnished or intimation given by the law by which the court can determine what proportion of the sum of prize proceeds paid into the treasury in the suit ($44,167.76) shall be assigned towards the yearly allowances of the district attorney, marshal, and prize commissioners, or the other expenses of the suit, nor but that the whole amount of proceeds may be required to satisfy such liens for costs.

Enough has been stated in the preceding suggestions to show that the application made on the part of the promovents cannot prevail. The motion to open the decrees of the court and re-tax the costs in this suit, and to tax and enforce the costs of the movers against the fund in the treasury, is accordingly denied.

MAJOR, The LIZZIE. See Case No. 8,422.

MAKEEVER (BARTH v.). See Case No. 1,069.

MAKINS (U. S. v.). See Case No. 15,710.

Case No. 8,985.

The MALAGA.

LOVETT et al. v. BISPHAM.

[2 Amer. Law J. (U. S.) 97; 4 Pa. Law J. Rep. 339.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. 1849.

ADMIRALTY — LIBEL FOR DAMAGES — UNLAWFUL SEIZURE—PROBABLE CAUSE—DEFENCE—RESTITUTION AND ACCEPTANCE.

1. The ordinary practice of the admiralty court is to entertain the question of damages as well as costs at the same time with the principal question of the legality of the arrest; revenue laws form an exception, however.

2. A certificate of probable cause cannot be granted where there has been neither claim nor trial, nor decree, nor anything to which an appeal could lie, because there is nothing to inform the conscience of the judge as to the propriety of giving or withholding the certificate.

3. Probable cause defined and explained. If there is reasonable ground for a seizure, and this is a question of fact, it is a defence to a libel for damages.

4. An act of restitution and acceptance, as was the case here, is a mutual release, and bars the libelants' claim, had it been never so meritorious.

[This was a libel by Charles J. Lovett, Josiah Lovett, Jr., Elliott Woodbury, and Seward Lee, captain and owners of the brig Malaga, against John E. Bispham, commander of the United States brig Boxer, to recover damages for an alleged unlawful detention of libellants' brig.]

J. Williams Biddle and Mr. Williams, for libellants.

Mr. Hazelhurst and Mr. Pettit, for respondents.

KANE, District Judge. By the act of congress of March 3, 1819 (3 Stat. 532), the president of the United States is authorized, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to cause any of the armed vessels of the United States to cruise on the coast of Africa and elsewhere, with orders to seize, take, and bring into port all American ships which have taken on board, or which may be intended for the purpose of taking on board, slaves, in violation of the acts of congress prohibiting the slave trade; and by the same act it is made the duty of the commanders of public ships so employed, whenever they shall have "made any capture" of an American vessel contravening those acts, to bring her for adjudication into the state to which the "vessel so captured" belongs. Among the acts thus referred to are that of March 22, 1794 (1 Stat. 347), which denounces the penalty of forfeiture against every ship or vessel sailing from any port of the United States for the purpose of carrying on any trade or traffic in slaves, or of procuring slaves to be transported to any foreign country; that of May 10, 1800 (2 Stat. 70), which subjects to forfeiture the interest of every citizen or resident of the United States in any vessel employed or made use of "in the transportation of slaves from one foreign country to another;" that of April 21, 1818 (3 Stat. 450), the second section of which is almost identical with the provision I have referred to in the act of 1794; and that of May 15, 1840 (3 Stat. 600), which denounces as piracy the crime of seizing a free negro in any foreign country, or decoying, bringing, carrying, or receiving him on board a ship, with intent to make him a slave, or to confine or detain him on board with such intent, or to offer or attempt to sell him as such, or land him with intent to make such a sale, or after such a sale has been made. These acts were followed by the treaty of Washington August, 1842; (8 Stat. 576), by which it was stipulated between the United States and Great Britain "that each nation should prepare, equip, and maintain in service on the coast of Africa a suitable and adequate squadron or naval force, to carry in all not less than eighty guns, to enforce separately and respectively the laws, rights and obligations of each of the two countries for the suppression of the slave trade."

In accordance with the first cited of these acts of congress, and in compliance with the treaty stipulation, the president of the United States, on the 20th December, 1844, ordered Commodore Skinner to proceed with a squadron to the coast of Africa, to cruise there for the suppression of this traffic. In the instructions of the secretary of the navy to this officer, he was told: "The cunning of the slave trader is constantly framing new disguises to elude detection and escape the consequences of his crime. To some of these devices it may be useful to call your attention. It is not to be supposed that the vessels destined for the slave trade will exhibit any of the usual arrangements for that traffic. They take especial care to put on the appearance of honest traders, and to be always prepared as if in pursuit of lawful commerce. It is their practice to run into some river or inlet, where they have reason to believe that slaves may be obtained, make their bargain with the slave factor, deposit their handcuffs and other things calculated to betray them, and then sail on an ostensible trading voyage to some neighboring port. At the appointed time they return, and, as the slaves are then ready to be shipped, they are taken on board without delay, and the vessel proceeds on her voyage. Thus the slavers do not carry within themselves any positive proof of their guilt, except before they reach the coast, and after they leave it with the slaves on board. Nevertheless, there is a variety of signs and indications by which their true character may at all times be conjectured." The secretary then points out some of the marks by which a slaver may be recognized, and some of the artifices by which he generally seeks to mask his character. He adds: "These are a few only of the devices to which the slave trader resorts. In calling your attention to them, I have only in view to impress you with a deep sense of the artful character of the adversaries with whom you will have to deal, and of their reckless disregard of all truth and honor, as well as of law and humanity. Nothing but the utmost vigilance and caution will enable you to detect them. I have no doubt that your own observation and sagacity will soon discover other contrivances for deceiving and escaping you, and I have as little doubt that you will apply promptly and effectually the requisite means of defeating all such attempts."

Lieut. Bispham commanded the brig Boxer, one of the squadron under Commodore Skinner, and was directed to cruise in the vicinity of Kabenda, "where," said his orders, "our flag, it is believed, is frequently employed to cover the designs of slavers." Immediately on his arrival off that port, and before anchoring, Lieut. Bispham was informed by the commander of a British frigate that an American vessel was lying in Kabenda Bay, under suspicious circumstances, and on the following day, the 13th April, 1846, he directed her to be boarded in consequence. On producing her papers at the call of the boarding officers, she proved to be the American brig Malaga, of Beverly, Massachusetts, with a cargo of farina, rice, rum, gunpowder, &c., from Rio Janeiro bound to Kabenda and St. Thomas, and back to Rio. Her consignee at Kabenda was a noted slave factor, named Da Cuntra; the port was one devoted exclusively to the slave trade and its tributaries; and the cargo was entirely suited to the exigencies of that traffic. A part of her cargo and a number of her passengers (foreigners) had been already landed. Lieut. Bispham, having seized her, called for her charter party; and this, being then presented for the first time, showed that she was under charter to Manuel Pinto de Fonseca, whose name, as the great employer of American vessels in the Brazilian slave trade, is familiar to our political and judicial records. The charter party itself was similar in all respects to that which is ordinarily used to cover these frauds upon our flag; it left the port or ports of destination to be indicated by the charterer's agents; it stipulated for the conveyance of passengers, not negroes; and the rate of charter (1800 milreas, about 1400 dollars a month, paid for the first month in advance, the vessel being of less than 184 tons) implied that the voyage was one of peculiar hazards. The vessel, moreover, when leaving the United States for Rio, had laid in a stock of provisions for a year; her crew had been shipped for 18 months, the voyages beyond Rio to be such as the captain might direct, among which the deposition of one of the crew shows that a voyage to the coast of Africa, though not named, was understood to be included. In addition to all this, the answer, which is not contradicted under oath (as it should have been, unless the facts set forth in it are to be regarded as admitted), avers that in conversations of the captain with the captors "it was not alleged by him that it was his intention to barter her coast goods on shore, or to carry back a return cargo to Rio de Janeiro; but he admitted that the cargo on board was to be exchanged for slaves, and used in that traffic." And this is confirmed by the testimony of Purser Hartwell: "I remarked to Captain Lovett, 'You must know the character of the cargo was such as is generally used on the coast in the slave trade;' and his reply in substance was, that he was not bound to know anything about it, and if that was the only business carried on at Kabenda, it was not necessary for him to be acquainted with it, nor for what purposes his cargo was to be applied."

The Malaga, having arrived in the United States in charge of a prize crew, was libelled by the district attorney of the United States for the district of Massachusetts on the 16th of June, 1846. The libel was of two counts, the first charging that, being the property of American citizens, she was employed in transporting slaves from one foreign country to another; the second, that she was fitted out, &c., and caused to sail from the United States, for the purpose of procuring negroes to be transported from Africa to some port or place, for the purpose of their being sold as slaves; the first count being founded apparently on the act of congress of 1800, and the second on those of 1794 and 1818 (supra). The process was returned on the 3d of July, and appearance was noted on the docket by a proctor of the court, a stipulation was entered into for costs preliminary to a claim by the owners, and depositions were taken before a commissioner, the proctor for the claimants or owners attending him. Subsequently, on motion of the district attorney, it was ordered by the court that "said libel be discontinued, and said brig Malaga be delivered to Charles J. Lovett, captain thereof;" and a warrant of delivery, having issued, was returned by the marshal on the 17th July, that he had "caused to be delivered to C. J. Lovett, and had taken his receipt therefor," which is verified by the receipt itself: "July 17, 1846, received from the U. S. Marshal, in and for the district of Mass., the within named brig Malaga and appurtenances, in the same state as when seized and detained by him. Charles J. Lovett, Master Brig Malaga." No formal claim was ever made of record, and no answer was filed. In June, 1847, Lieut. Bispham returned from the coast invalided; and the 17th July succeeding this proceeding was instituted against him by a monition issued at the instance of the owners and captain of the Malaga. The libel asks damages for the unlawful detention of the vessel, for the use of her stores while under detention, certain injuries done to her sails, rigging, and other appurtenances, and the personal duress of the captain. The answer refers to the instructions of Lieut. Bispham from his commanding officer, admits the seizure and detention of the vessel and the use of the stores by the prize crew, but denies that the vessel or her appurtenances sustained damage, and alleges that the seizure was made in consequence of a reasonable suspicion that the vessel had violated the laws against the slave trade, the grounds of which suspicion it sets forth.

The proofs in the case are few and by no means full. From the libellant in this court I have the register, the charter party, the record of the proceedings in the district court of Massachusetts, the deposition of the mate, taken in February last under a rule of court, and two brief depositions, or, as I would rather term them, affidavits, from seamen, made under the act of congress, without cross-examination or notice. There are wanting the bills of lading, the passenger list, the crew roll, the consular certificate, and, generally, the papers with which the vessel sailed from Rio for the coast. The respondent has presented only the depositions of three officers of the Boxer, taken before a commissioner more than two years after the transaction. According to the view of the libellants, however, much even of the proof that is before me might have been spared. They contend that the inquiry cannot now be entertained, whether there was reasonable ground for the arrest, or not, inasmuch as the district court of Massachusetts has ordered restitution, without granting a certificate of probable cause. If this be so, the function of this court expends itself in the simple duty of auditing the amount of the libellants' damages. The question, therefore, must be disposed of at the threshold.

In the first place, then, I remark, that, except in cases under the revenue and navigation acts, I have not found either in the English books, or our own, that the certificate of probable cause has ever been given or asked for in the admiralty. By the ordinary practice in instance, as well as prize, causes, the court entertains the question of damages, as well as costs, at the same time with the principal question of the legality of the arrest. The process issues in rem; the claimant comes in, asserts his right, and asks damages, if he deems himself entitled to them; and the court then, upon a full view of the ground, the cause, and the circumstances of the seizure, determines between the parties, each being for the time the actor.

Cases under the revenue laws form the exception in both countries,—in England by force of several statutes, 4 Geo. III. c. 15, p. 46, among the rest; and in the United States, by the provisions of the acts of congress of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 696], and February 24, 1807 [2 Stat. 422]. Nothing therefore is to be inferred against the respondent from the absence of such a certificate in the proceedings before the district court of Boston. But were this otherwise, I cannot, upon inspecting the record of that proceeding, perceive that the question of a certificate was, or could have been, brought before that honorable court. There was, in fact, no hearing of the cause, and there could have been nothing, therefore, to inform the conscience of the judge, as to the propriety of giving or withholding the certificate. According to the acts of congress, both of 1799 (1 Stat. 696) and 1807 (2 Stat. 422), there must have been a claim, a trial, and a decree for the claimants, to authorize the making of the certificate. The question whether it shall be given or not arises out of the decree of acquittal; and it is decided by the judge who tried the cause, on the evidence which was before him on the trial. Further evidence is not admitted. Stew. 112. An appeal from the decree carries with it the application for the certificate. Canter v. American Ins. Co., 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 307, and the other cases. And if on the appeal, the question of forfeiture is decided against the claimant, there is an end to all controversy about probable cause. The officer cannot be held liable for a seizure as tortious after its propriety has been established by a final decree condemning the property. But here there was neither claim, nor trial, nor decree,—nothing to which an appeal could lie. It is a simple discontinuance, which, considered as an act in the cause, terminated it, but did not preclude the institution of new proceedings by the same captors and for the same cause. How can it be said that the captor is estopped by his discontinuance from alleging that he had probable cause for the seizure when that discontinuance left him at full liberty to reassert his title under the forfeiture, and to renew the seizure, if need be, for the purpose of enforcing it.

But it was argued that, independent of these acts of congress, the officer who has made a tortious seizure, has no escape from a decree of compensatory damages. But I need scarcely say that this has never been the law of the admiralty, either in instance or prize cases. The books are full of cases in which the arrest on the high seas has been held unlawful, but the court has refused to allow the claimant his damages or even his costs. I may refer to The Louis, 2 Dod. 210; Shattuck v. Maley [Case No. 12,714], and The Marianna Flora, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 1, as among the marked cases in which this course of adjudication has been pursued. "The common-law doctrine," says Judge Washington in Shattuck v. Maley [supra], "as to torts committed by officers acting under authority of law, is certainly very rigid. They act at their peril; and if they by mistake act wrong, there are but few cases in which they can be excused. But a reason may exist for this severity in cases happening on land, which does not exist where similar cases occur at sea. In the former, the means of obtaining correct information are more within the power of the officer; and the officer may, in most cases, if he doubts as to the fact, insist upon being indemnified by the party. But at sea this cannot be done." "To hold the officer," he adds, "responsible according to the event would be to render the law nugatory, since few men would be found bold enough to ensure the eventual solidity of their judgment, however strong they might suppose the ground of it to be. But to excuse the officer from damages if he should, in the execution of this limited authority, violate the rights of others, he must show such reasons as were sufficient to warrant a prudent, intelligent, and cautious man in drawing the same conclusion. This is what is called probable cause."

"It is a different thing" said Judge Story, delivering the opinion of the supreme court in The Marianna Flora [supra], "to sit in judgment on this case, after full legal investigations, aided by the regular evidence of all parties, and to draw conclusions at sea, with very imperfect means of ascertaining facts and principles, which ought to direct the judgment. It would be a harsh judgment to declare that an officer, charged with high and responsible duties on the part of his government, should exercise the discretion entrusted to him at the peril of damages, because a court of law might ultimately decide that he might well have exercised that discretion another way. Even in maritime torts, independent of prize, courts of admiralty," he added, "are in the habit of giving or withholding damages upon enlarged principles of justice and equity, and have not circumscribed themselves within the positive boundaries of municipal law. They have exercised a conscientious discretion on the subject."

I am, therefore, not precluded by the action in the district court of Massachusetts from entertaining the question whether there was reasonable ground for the seizure of the Malaga, and if there was such reasonable ground, it is a defence to the present libel. In discussing this question, which is altogether one of fact, I feel very sensibly the imperfection of the proofs before me. I should be well pleased to examine the bills of lading, and shipping roll, appertaining to the voyage from Beverly to Rio, and the letters of instructions under which the captain felt himself authorized to charter her to Fonseca. I need, too, the manifest, the log book, the list of passengers from Rio to the coast, the crew list, the bills of lading, and all the other papers which were or should have been on board of her when she was arrested. These, if produced, might go to relieve my mind of the dark suspicions which now press upon it. If they were ever in the possession of the captors, they were restored with the vessel, and the libellants should have produced them here. In their absence, I can only say that I am by no means satisfied of the innocence of this vessel, and that I think her owners may be well content with her release without asking more. Among the circumstances already adverted to in the narrative part of this opinion, there is one, which standing by itself unexplained, would go far to justify the arrest of the Malaga. According to the mate, "she had on board some three or four hundred bags of farina and rice." The former of these articles is a coarse flour, used almost exclusively for the diet of slaves on the passage to Brazil. It is the cheapest substitute for the African cassada, which is the food of the natives along the coast, and resembles it much. By the British act for the suppression of the slave trade (2 and 3 Vict. c. 73, § 4), it is expressly provided, that "an extraordinary quantity of rice, or of the flour of Brazil, commonly called farina, beyond what might probably be requisite for the use of the crew, found on board of a vessel, and not entered on the manifest as part of the cargo for trade, shall be considered as prima facie evidence of the actual employment of the vessel in the transportation of negroes for the purpose of consigning them to slavery," and as such, shall render her liable to condemnation. The three or four hundred bags of rice and farina, which were on board of the Malaga, were obviously not for the use of the crew, since the vessel was otherwise provisioned fully. If they were entered upon the manifest, the presumption which they raise would be rebutted; but the manifest, as I have already said, is not produced. It would be a severe judgment against an American officer, charged to give effect to the treaty stipulations between his country and Great Britain, to hold that circumstance inadequate as a ground of reasonable suspicion, which in an English court would condemn the ship.

But, independent of this fact, the whole case is pregnant with suspicion. There is scarcely a circumstance wanting, except the final consummation of a guilty purpose, to place it at the side of the Pons [case unreported], whose fate is upon the records of this court, and her associates, the Enterprise and the Kentucky [unreported], as they stand out in the documents of Mr. Wise, that accompanied the president's message of the 3d of March last,—the same charter party, scarcely varied, and the same Messrs. De Fonseca, and Da Cunha figuring as principal and subordinate. Whether she was intended to be used in the actual transport of slaves, or to serve as the tender and accomplice of the slave ship, carrying out the foreign crews, which were to navigate to Rio under the Brazilian flag, and bringing back the American, which had navigated from Rio under that of the United States; whether she merely carried to the coast the goods which were to purchase slaves, and the farina which was to feed them, or whether, after landing part of her supplies at Kabenda, she was, in the words of the secretary of the navy, to "sail on an ostensible trading voyage to some neighboring port, returning when the slaves were ready to be shipped,—and then taking them on board without delay," I need not form an opinion. Nor need I inquire, in the absence of all the appropriate proofs, whether the sailing from Beverly for Rio was altogether free from dishonoring circumstances. It is enough for me to be convinced,—and of that I am convinced most fully,—that Lieut. Bispham acted with intelligent and honorable discretion in arresting the Malaga, and sending her to this country for adjudication. It is wholly immaterial for this defence whether all, or how many, of these circumstances of suspicion were present to his mind at the time of the arrest. If the vessel was guilty, he is excused for bringing her in, even if he mistook her crime. I adopt the language of Judge Story on this point, (La Jeune Eugenie,) [Case No. 15,551]: "In truth, the law looks not to niceties of this sort. If for any cause, precedent or subsequent, known at the beginning or known at the end, the property is condemned, the party is justified; and retroactively, for all purposes, the capture, or seizure, or forcible possession, call it what you may, is deemed rightful and bona fide."

I have thus far followed the learned counsel, in the arguments they have presented to me, and should be excused perhaps for dismissing the cause without further remark. But there is one view of the closing act in the proceedings, at Boston, which I cannot pass over. That act, it seems to me, was an act of restitution and acceptance, unqualified, unconditional, without reserve or protest on either side. The action of the court was invoked only because the property had passed into its custody, and could not be released except by judicial order. The act was the act of parties, solemnized by record. Such an act of restitution and acceptance is a mutual release, and bars the libellant's claim, had it been never so meritorious.

A case, closely analogous to the present, came before Sir William Scott, in the Maria Powlona, (6 C. Rob. Adm. 236.) The vessel had been captured, and was restored before final adjudication. The owners afterwards presented a demand in the admiralty against the captors, for damages, and they urged that the captain's acceptance of the property was not intended as a waiver of damages,—that it had no other object than to expedite justice, and that it had, moreover, occurred without any consultation with his principals, the owners, and without any opportunity for such consultation. Sir William Scott said: "On the papers being brought in, a proposal was made to the master that he might proceed on his voyage, and it must be understood to have been an absolute and unqualified proposal, and meant as a general acquittal on both sides." If there had been an intention to prosecute a demand for damages, arising from the seizure, the offer should have been accepted sub modo. Instead of that, the restitution was accepted in the manner in which it was proposed, and, as such, must be understood to include an act of amnesty on both sides. It is not for the parties, then, to come again before the court, after all the papers have been withdrawn, and charge the captors with an unjustifiable seizure, when they have, in consequence of the restitution, lost the opportunity of defending themselves. The claimant must take the inconvenience with the convenience of restitution. I am of opinion that the claimant has put himself out of the court, and that the offer of restitution being accepted as it has been, must be considered as a discharge. I need not advert again to the circumstances in the case before me, which give emphasis to Sir William Scott's argument. The libel must be dismissed, with full costs.

Case No. 8,986.

In re MALCOM.

[4 Law Rep. 488.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1842.

BANKRUPTCY — INFORMALITIES IN PETITION— SIGNATURE—ERASURES—SCHEDULE NOT DEFINITE.

In this case, the application of [Robert] Malcom for a decree of bankruptcy was opposed on the ground of informality in his petition: 1. Because the name of the petitioner was not signed in full. 2. Because there were erasures and interlineations in the petition. 3. Because the schedule was not sufficiently definite.

BETTS, District Judge, said that, by the rule of the court, the petition should be free from erasures, etc., and the name of the petitioner signed in full. If wanting in conformity to these rules, the papers would be sent back. It was not contemplated by the rule to destroy the merits of an application, unless the sense of the paper was ruined by such erasures and interlineations, or if the papers were grossly imperfect. It is intended to have the papers neatly made out, so that they can readily be read over. In this case, he thought the objections not founded in fact. The petitioner first wrote his name with the ordinary abbreviation of "Rob't," and that was erased and the name written in full. So with the interlineations in the papers. They were not such as affected the sense of the document, but in some instances rendered it more definite. The court did not think it an infringement of the rule, that one or two small words were interlined in the body of a paper. Another objection is, that the schedule is not sufficiently definite. The party sets out family stores. It is not necessary that the petitioner should set forth a perfect and complete exhibit of every article. But it must be so explicit that the assignee or his agent may be enabled to find the property if necessary. And so with wearing apparel. It is not necessary that every article of clothing should be set out, only it should be so set forth that the assignee may be enabled to ascertain whether he can claim it or not.

MALEBRAN (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 15,711.

Case No. 8,987.

The M. A. LENNOX.

[4 Ben. 190.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. May, 1870.

NEGLIGENCE—TOW BOAT AND TOW—DELAY IN CASTING OFF HAWSER.

1. Where a steamtug was employed to tow out a ship, which was lying stern out at pier 37, East river, and, having attached a hawser to her stern, towed her out stern foremost into the river, and then cast off the hawser, and attempted to come alongside and take another hawser from the ship's starboard bow, and the hands on board the ship failed to promptly catch the heaving-lines, and before the hawser could be properly attached, the ship drifted stern foremost against a pier on the opposite side of the river, and received injury, held, that the injury was occasioned by negligence on the part of the tug, in towing the ship so far out into the river, before casting off the hawser. It should have been cast off as soon as the ship had fairly cleared the New York piers.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[Cited in The Merrimac, Case No. 9,478.]

2. The tug was liable for the damages.

In admiralty.

J. T. McGowan, for libellant.

Goodrich & Wheeler, for respondents.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action brought to recover of the propeller M. A. Lennox the damages alleged to have arisen from her negligence in transporting the ship Corsica in the East river, on the 11th of December, 1849.

The facts proved, so far as they are necessary to disclose what I consider to be the controlling feature of the case, are these: The Corsica was a large ship, lying at pier 37, on the New York side of the East river, with her stern out, and was desirous of being transported thence to Greenpoint. At a proper time of tide, and when there was little or no wind, fog, or other impediment, the propeller M. A. Lennox undertook the transportation of the ship. She accordingly made fast to a hawser, which was put out from the ship's quarter, and so hauled the ship out of the slip stern foremost. The ship was then towed a certain distance out into the river, stern foremost, and then the tug stopped, cast off the hawser, and attempted to get alongside of the ship, to take a second hawser from her starboard bow, in order to tow her upon a hawser to her place of destination. The sternway of the ship, and her distance out in the river at the time the hawser was cast off by the tug, proved to be such that, before the tug got hold of the ship by the second hawser, and acquired headway, the tide, which runs up past the Brooklyn piers at that time and place, carried the ship upon one of the Brooklyn piers, known as Wetmore's dock, whereby her rudder was injured, and the damages sued for sustained.

It is manifest from this statement, that, whatever other negligence there might have been on this occasion, it was negligence to take this large ship so far out into the river with the stern hawser, and that this negligence was a cause of the disaster which followed. Evidence has been introduced to show that the failure of the hands on the ship to promptly catch the heaving-lines which were thrown from the tug after the stern hawser was dropped, by means of which the second hawser was to be taken on board the tug, prevented the tug from getting hold of the ship by the bow hawser, in time to keep her off the piers; but if this be so, still it was negligence to take the ship so near to the Brooklyn side that a failure to catch the heaving-line at the first or second throw would result in her striking the piers. The safety of such a ship should not have been made dependent upon the chance of catching a heaving-line when thrown.

In this view of the case, its determination must depend upon the question whether the tug is responsible for the distance which the ship was towed upon the stern line before it was cast off; and my opinion is that, under the circumstances the tug is so responsible. The manoeuvre which this tug undertook to perform was, to start the ship out by a stern line, and then drop it and make fast to a bow line, and get headway on the ship before she would run across the river. It was a manoeuvre not unattended with risk, but which could have been accomplished by the exercise of care and skill, and it manifestly required for its successful accomplishment that the stern hawser should be cast off at the earliest possible moment. But, instead of dropping the hawser as soon as the ship was clear of the New York piers, the tug kept towing until the ship was two-thirds of the way over to Brooklyn, and where the ordinary mishap of failing to catch a heaving-line resulted in placing her upon the Brooklyn piers. It was the duty of the master of the tug to determine the distance he would require for his manoeuvre, i. e., to stop, drop the stern hawser, turn his boat, and make fast to the bow line.

Ordinary prudence required the hawser to be dropped at the earliest moment after the ship had fairly cleared the New York piers; and I find nothing in the evidence which justifies the tug in holding on, as she did, until the ship was in a position of danger; for a ship cannot be considered as otherwise than in danger when she is drifting towards piers, and so near as to require not only great diligence but good fortune to prevent her from striking. I hold the tug, therefore, to be responsible for lack of proper care in taking the ship so far out into the stream before she dropped the hawser. In arriving at this conclusion, I have not overlooked the defence which has been sought to be rested upon evidence tending to show that the ship was being transported under the direction of her own master, and that, in point of fact, the master of the tug acted under the direction of the master of the ship in determining the distance out to which the ship was taken. A careful consideration of the testimony given by the various witnesses has convinced me that there was nothing in the action of the master of the ship, on this occasion, which can absolve the master of the tug from the responsibility of a negligent performance of the manoeuvre which he undertook. It is true that the master of the ship was on board the ship, and gave some orders in regard to the hauling of the ship, as she was coming out of the dock, but I am satisfied of the correctness of the master's statement, that he told the tug to drop the hawser as soon as the ship was clear of the New York piers, and nothing occurred which would warrant the captain of the tug in supposing that the master of the ship had undertaken to say how far out the tug should go before turning to take the bow line, or had in any way made himself responsible for the nearness of his ship to the Brooklyn piers at the time the tug stopped towing. The manoeuvre of shifting the position of the tug from that of towing by the stern hawser to that of towing ahead was a manoeuvre which the master of the tug knew he would be obliged to perform when he took hold of the stern line. If not responsible for the mode of taking the ship out upon such a line, which was clearly improper, he is certainly responsible for any want of due care and skill displayed in making the necesssary change of his position, and such want of care is shown in his taking the ship so far out into the stream before he stopped towing. The decree must, accordingly, be for the libellant, with an order of reference, to ascertain the damages.

MALEY (SHATTUCK v.). See Case No. 12,714.

MALL (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 15,712.

MALLEC (GOODYEAR v.). See Case No. 5,575.

Case No. 8,988.

MALLETT et al. v. DEXTER.

[1 Curt. 178.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1852.

COURTS—FIRST TO TAKE JURISDICTION—ADMINISTRATOR—ACCOUNT—FRAUD.

1. When an administrator is in the process of accounting before a probate court, he cannot be compelled to account in this court, by a bill in equity.

[Cited in Board of Foreign Missions of Presbyterian Church v. McMaster, Case No. 1,586.]

2. The circuit court has concurrent jurisdiction with the probate court, to decree an account in favor of distributees.

[Cited in Chapman v. Borer, 1 Fed. 275.]

3. When two courts have concurrent jurisdiction, the one which first has possession of the subject must adjudicate; and neither of the parties can be forced into another court.

[Cited in Riggs v. Johnson Co., 6 Wall. (73 U. S.) 197; Haines v. Carpenter, Case No. 5,905; Blake v. Alabama & C. R. Co., Id. 1,493; Young v. Montgomery & E. R. Co., Id. 18,166; Providence & N. Y. S. S. Co. v. Hill Manuf'g Co., 109 U. S. 578, 3 Sup. Ct. 379, 619; Andrews v. Smith, 5 Fed. 841; Latham v. Chafee, 7 Fed. 524; Pulliam v. Pulliam, 10 Fed. 29; Bruce v. Manchester & K. R. R., 19 Fed. 344; Reinach v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co., 58 Fed. 44.]

[Cited in brief in Blake v. Butler, 10 R. I. 134; Corey v. Ripley, 57 Me. 70. Cited in Chapin v. James, 11 R. I. 89; Bank of Bellows Falls v. Rutland & B. R. Co., 28 Vt. 478; Hill Manuf'g Co. v. Providence & N. Y. S. S. Co., 113 Mass. 500; Du Vivier v. Hopkins, 116 Mass. 128.]

4. An account of an administrator, though settled by a judicial decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, may be opened for fraud.

[Cited in Griswold v. Central Vermont R. Co., 9 Fed. 800.]

[Cited in Williams v. Herrick (R. I.) 25 Atl. 1100.]

[This was a bill filed by Edward J. Mallett and others against Samuel Dexter, administrator.]

Carpenter & Jenckes, for complainants.

Mr. Ames, for defendant.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is a bill in equity, filed by the next of kin and distributees, according to the law of Rhode Island, against the defendant, as administrator of the intestate estate of the late James Fenner. The cause came on to be heard on the pleadings and evidence; and it appears that the scope of the bill is, to open certain administration accounts which have been settled in the probate court, upon the ground of fraud, and also to require an account of the residue of the administration not embraced in those settled accounts. These are distinct subjects, and must be separately considered. And first, as to so much of the bill as seeks for an account of the residue of the defendant's administration not embraced in the settled accounts. It appears that this bill was filed on the twenty-third day of September, 1850, and that in the month of August preceding, the defendant had filed an account in the municipal court for the city of Providence, which, by the law of Rhode Island, has jurisdiction of the probate of wills, the grant of administrations, and the accounts of executors and administrators; and that all persons interested, including the complainants, had been cited to appear and object to the said account, if they saw fit, on the twenty-fourth day of September, the next day after the bill was filed. That the state court thus had possession of the subject-matter, and complete jurisdiction over it, cannot be doubted. It is certainly competent for each state, under whose laws administration is taken, to confer on either of its tribunals, jurisdiction over the accounts of administrators, and to provide for their being rendered, stated, and settled, judicially, in any court of the state. Vaughn v. Northup, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 1 The law of Rhode Island made it the duty of the defendant to render the accounts of his administration to the municipal court; and when he had rendered an account there, and that court had cited the complainants to appear, not merely the items of that account, but every thing which ought justly to be included in it, and consequently the whole unsettled residue of the administration, so far as it was then a subject of account, was regularly pending for judicial examination and settlement before that court. It is true, this court, as a court of equity, has a concurrent jurisdiction over the accounts of executors and administrators, in behalf of distributees as well as creditors, as was held by Mr. Justice Story in Pratt v. Northam [Case No. 11,376]. But no principle is better settled, than that in all cases of concurrent jurisdiction, the court which first has possession of the subject must adjudicate upon it. Smith v. McIver, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 532; Wallace v. McConnell, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 136; Shelby v. Bacon, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 56. And neither of the parties can be forced into another concurrent jurisdiction. It follows, that the concurrent jurisdiction of this court cannot be exercised upon this bill, in respect to the unsettled residue of this administration, because that subject-matter was regularly pending between the same parties, before another tribunal, when this bill was filed. It is true that the complainants, some of whom are aliens, and others citizens of states other than Rhode Island, are thus deprived of their resort to the jurisdiction of this court; but so would all such persons have been, when sued in a state court, had not the judiciary act enabled them to remove suits from the state courts to the circuit courts of the United States; and that provision does not include proceedings of this character.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

The case of Shelby v. Bacon, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 56, on examination, will be found consistent with the result at which I have arrived. In that case, the complainant had a clear right to come into a court of the United States, to establish his claim as a creditor, and to compel the trustees to pay to him his distributive share of the assets of the bank. The state court had not obtained jurisdiction over either of these subjects; but the court do not decide, that if the plea had contained proper averments to show the state court in possession of jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the accounts of the trustees, with authority to act in rem, the complainant could compel the trustees to come into another jurisdiction to settle the same accounts. Besides, whatever may be the effect of that particular statute of Pennsylvania respecting the accounts of assignees under a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, I should feel great difficulty in holding, that an administrator, who has filed his account in the proper state court, pursuant to the laws from which he derives his authority, and in compliance with his official bond, can be drawn away to another jurisdiction, and proceed to settle the same account there. In Vaughn v. Northup, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 1, the supreme court say, the administrator is exclusively bound to account for all the assets he receives, under and by virtue of his administration, to the proper tribunals of the government under which he derives his authority. And although I do not understand the court to mean to exclude altogether the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, but only the jurisdiction of the courts of other states, yet their language expresses strongly the capacity of the appropriate state tribunal to possess and exercise jurisdiction over this particular subject-matter, and shows the irregularity of attempting to withdraw it from that jurisdiction, when it has once passed under it. If an administrator neglects or refuses to account, I should hold him to do so upon a bill in equity in behalf of distributees, being aliens, or citizens of another state. But if he is in the process of accounting, before the appropriate tribunal, having the parties before it, I am of opinion this court should not compel him also to account here.

The other branch of the case is that part of the bill which seeks to open settled accounts, on the ground of fraud. The only subject necessary to be examined under this head, is the charge contained in the amended bill concerning the money paid to Burrington Anthony. The other matters stated in the bill are either not alleged to be fraudulent, but only as false charges and credits, or the proof is entirely insufficient to support the allegation of fraud, which, wherever it is made in those instances, is met and denied by the answer. The charge respecting the money paid to Anthony is, in substance, that the estate was indebted to him, as assignee of an insolvent debtor, in the sum of nine hundred and thirty-one dollars and fifty cents; and that the defendant agreed with Anthony to pay him eight hundred dollars, and take his receipt for the whole debt, for the purpose of charging the estate as if he had paid the whole, Anthony agreeing to keep it secret. That the receipt was accordingly given; and upon that, as a voucher, supported by the defendant's oath, the whole sum was allowed to the defendant, in an account settled by him in the municipal court, March 13, 1848, the complainants being then ignorant of the facts.

The first question is, whether this matter also was not pending before the municipal court when this amendment was made to the bill, on March 24, 1851. It does not appear that at that time any administration account was pending before the court; though one was filed on May 9, 1851. And if there had been an account then pending, a charge of fraud in a previous account, with a view to obtain a decree to open it, is so far a distinct subject-matter, that I should hesitate to say it was before the municipal court, and within its jurisdiction, because it had another account pending before it. It has been argued, that the municipal court has not jurisdiction to open a settled account on the ground of fraud, because the statute law of Rhode Island (Digest, p. 247, § 31) contains a provision, that "the settlement of the accounts of any executor, administrator, or guardian, by the court of probate, or in case of appeal by the supreme court, shall be final and conclusive on all parties concerned therein, and shall not be subject to reëxamination in any way or manner whatsoever." But in Northam v. Pratt [Case No. 11,376], Mr. Justice Story had under consideration this same statute, and decided that it was not intended to give validity to the settlement of an account obtained by fraud. Such a settlement is a nullity, and there would seem to be no reason why a court of probate should not treat it so, and cite the administrator to settle anew. In Massachusetts, at a time when, though there was no positive provision of statute law, there was the principle which makes a judicial decree final, it was repeatedly decided, that the settlement, even of a final probate account, could be opened by a court of probate for fraud; and that a court of equity would not interpose. Jenison v. Hapgood, 7 Pick. 7; Davis v. Cowdin, 20 Pick. 510. I do not proceed, therefore, on the ground that the municipal court has not jurisdiction to open a settled account for fraud, but upon the other ground, that, when the amended bill was filed, it was not in possession of the subject matter, and that this court, having concurrent jurisdiction, and having been appealed to, must adjudicate. And this compels me to examine the merits of this charge. It is certainly a very grave one, being nothing less than a charge of a conspiracy to cheat the estate, by the production of a false voucher, and the execution of that design by means of perjury.

The answer of the defendant to this charge is as follows: "And this defendant, further answering, saith, that the amount due from estate to said Anthony, amounted, with the interest, to the sum of $931.50, in April, 1848; that the consideration in the deed, drawn by said Potter, was $900, conveying said building to said heirs, and was dated on the 5th day of April, 1848. That by an examination of the defendant's personal cash books, that on the 10th day of said April, in the presence of said Anthony, and for the purpose of paying him said sum of $931.50, he obtained a check from his agent for $1,000; that, on the 15th of April, afterwards, he received an instrument of writing, signed by the heirs, authorizing the payment thereof; and on the 21st of said April, he procures the receipt of said Anthony, wherein and whereby he acknowledges himself to have received $931.50, in conformity with said instrument of writing, and on the same day charged by the administrator, in his account with the estate. And this defendant further answering saith, that at the time said Anthony applied to him to pay said sum of money, he offered to make a discount, if this defendant would advance him the money out of his own private funds, which this defendant refused to receive, and told him if he paid him any thing, he would pay him his whole debt. And this defendant verily believes that he did pay said Anthony the sum of $931.50, and not $800 only, as the plaintiffs allege in their said bill of complaint; and that said Anthony's receipt is a true, and not a false, receipt. And this defendant further answering saith, that he was induced to pay said Anthony, out of his private funds, because his wife was owner of one half the property, and owed half the debt, and he did not wish to be further importuned by said Anthony." It was stated, in argument, that this answer was drawn by the defendant himself, without the aid of counsel. Its structure and style render this highly probable. It is certainly less direct, pointed, and explicit, in responding to this charge, than might reasonably have been expected. In answering as to accounts, dates and the like, belief is ordinarily sufficient. 1 Vern. 170; 4 Beav. 41. But in answering a charge of meditated fraud, to be effected by a false voucher, supported by perjury, belief that the sum shown by the voucher was paid, is, to say the least, a feeble response. I do not allow the suggestion, that the defendant drew his own answer, to have any weight. It would be dangerous to permit it to operate at all, to excuse any want of directness in meeting a charge of fraud. If parties, either from false economy or self-conceit, choose to undertake what they cannot perform, in a court of justice, they must suffer the consequences. If they act for themselves, instead of employing others, in order to find shelter for any obliquity under the allowance for their shortcomings, which they presume upon, they will be likely to be disappointed. I take this answer as it stands; and I do not hesitate to say, that if it was met by one witness, whose testimony was open to no exception, I should hold the charge proved. But the difficulty in the complainant's case is, that his witness comes to testify to his own turpitude. He says, in substance, that he was an accomplice in a conspiracy to cheat the estate. An agreement with a trustee, to receive a less sum for a greater, and give a receipt for the greater sum, in order to have it used as a voucher that such greater sum was paid, accompanied by an express promise to keep the real transaction secret, is a matter which no man can testify to, without seriously impairing his credit as a witness. He may tell the truth; but we have not such security in his doing so, as to render it fit to rest a judicial decree on his evidence alone. There is no rule of law which forbids the court to credit the testimony of a particeps criminis; but prudence and sound reason dictate great caution in weighing such evidence, and, in my judgment, it is not sufficient to prove a charge like this. For, whatever may be said of the want of explicitness and force in the answer, it does declare the defendant's belief that he paid the whole sum due, a belief which it would seem he could not entertain if he had been guilty of this fraud. And it is not to be lost sight of, that the bill itself charges that this item was allowed by the court, on the production of the voucher, supported by the oath of the defendant. Considering that this is an attempt to open an account settled by a judicial decree, after notice to all parties; that the account was supported by the oath of the administrator; that the answer declares the defendant's belief that he paid the whole sum; that the witness comes to testify against his own receipt, in writing, given at the time; and by his testimony shows, that if there was a fraud, he so far participated in it, that the court cannot know how far to rely upon him, I am of opinion the charge is not made out, so as to induce the court to open the account; and the bill must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs. But I think it proper, under the circumstances, that this should be without prejudice, except as to the particular charges of fraud here adjudicated on. As to all items not adjudicated upon, specifically, in some former account, this remedy will be complete, and ought to remain open to the complainants. And as to any other matter embraced in this bill, and not adjudicated on, the complainants should be left at liberty to proceed, in that tribunal, or elsewhere, as they may be advised.

Case No. 8,989.

MALLETT v. FOXCROFT.

[1 Story, 474.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1841.[2]

WRIT OF RIGHT—JUDGMENT ON PARTITION — RES JUDICATA—UPON THE POINT—BY INFERENCE.

1. It is no bar to a writ of right, that there has been a judgment on a petition for partition between the same parties, in favor of the tenant, upon an issue joined therein on the sole seisin of the demandant.

2. Judgment in a possessory action (and a petition on a writ of partition is but a possessory action) is no bar to a writ of right. The issue, in the latter, is upon the mere right; in the former, it merely binds the right of possession; it does not draw in question the mere right.

3. A verdict, to be a bar or estoppel, must be direct upon the very point of the issue; and not merely so by argument or inference.

4. A verdict in favor of the petitioner in a petition for partition, where the issue is upon the sole seisin of the respondent, establishes only, that he had not a sole seisin at the time of the filing of the petition. Consistently with such a finding, he may have had a sole seisin within the last twenty years, before that time, that is, within the statute limitation of writs of right.

Writ of right for two lots of land (No. 11 in the fourth range, and No. 11 in the fifth range) in Lee, Penobscot county, Maine. The count was on the demandant's own seisin within twenty years. Plea, the general issue. At the trial, it appeared, that the real question between the parties was merely one of title; both parties claiming under an original grant of the commonwealth of Massachusetts to Williams College of a tract of land of 23,040 acres, of which the demanded premises were parcel.

At the trial, Mr. Paine, for the demandant [David Mallett], made out a regular deraignment of title from Williams College of a part of this tract, comprehending the lots now in controversy, through intermediate purchasers to Samuel T. Mallett, who conveyed the lots in controversy to the demandant (his son) on the 12th of August, 1829.

Fessenden & Deblois, for the tenant, claimed title from Williams College, under a mortgage dated the 5th of June, 1827, and made to the college, of 6,000 acres of the original tract of 23,040 acres, by Samuel T. Mallett; upon which mortgage the college recovered a judgment, in October, 1838, which included the demanded premises, and which was duly consummated by a writ of habere facias possessionem in June, 1839. In July, 1839, [Joseph F.] Foxcroft (the tenant) and one Webber filed a petition for partition of these 6,000 acres, before the state court. Upon that petition, the demandant appeared as respondent, and pleaded, that he was sole seised of the two lots. The jury found a verdict upon the petition for the petitioners, and judgment passed accordingly.

Upon this proof, Fessenden & Deblois, for the tenant, contended, as a preliminary ground, that the demandant was estopped by this judgment to re-try the question of seisin, which had been already decided in the suit for partition, and that it was a bar to the present suit. And they cited the statute of Maine, 1820 (chapter 62) and the case upon the partition reported in 4 Shep. [16 Me.] 89.

STORY, Circuit Justice. We are of opinion, that the objection is unmaintainable in point of law. The present suit is a writ of right, and no judgment in a writ or petition for partition will constitute any bar to the maintenance of a writ of right between the same parties. A writ of partition, or a petition for partition, which is but a substitute for the former, is a mere possessory action; and, at most, a judgment in a possessory action, can bar only an action of as high a nature, that is, a possessory action; for the judgment only establishes the right of possession. But a writ of right is in no just sense a possessory action. It is founded upon the mere right, and not upon the possession; and the general issue or mise is but a trial of the mere right. The plea of the demandant of a sole seisin, to the petition of partition, even if it were found against him, would only disprove his sole seisin at the time when the petition was filed. It would not prove, that he was not so seised at any prior time within the last twenty years, which is the statute limitation of writs of right. It could not be pleaded as a bar to a writ of right, or as an estoppel thereof; since it did not, and could not try the same question, who had the better mere right. The most, that can be said, is, that it is admissible as evidence between the same parties. But of what is it evidence? Certainly only of the very fact of sole seisin put in issue by the pleadings; and that can properly apply only to sole seisin at the time when the partition was filed.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

[2] [Affirmed in 4 How. (45 U. S.) 353.]

But, in truth, the proceedings upon this petition for partition do not present, when closely examined, any such verdict of the jury, upon the issue joined by the parties, as the argument has supposed. It is wholly irregular and incorrect. The duty of the jury was to find the very point of sole seisin or not, as alleged by the respondent (the present demandant). They have done no such thing. But, instead thereof, they have found a collateral fact, bearing indirectly upon the issue, to wit, that the deed of Samuel T. Mallett to the demandant (his son) was fraudulent. Now, this fact might have been important to be established upon the trial of the issue; nay, might have justified a verdict for the petitioner. But it was by no means necessarily decisive of the merits of the case; or, if it was, it was merely by argument and inference, and not as a matter of direct finding of the issue. And no bar or estoppel can be taken by way of inference or argument.

In truth, it now appears, and is admitted at the bar, that the real question in controversy between the parties in the present suit is (as it probably was upon the petition for partition,) whether the Settlers' Lots, so called (the lots in controversy,) were excepted from the mortgage to Williams College, or not. If they were excepted, then the demandant is entitled to maintain his writ of right. If not excepted, then the tenant is entitled to a verdict on the general issue. In either view, it is wholly immaterial, whether the deed of Samuel T. Mallett to the demandant was merely colorable and fraudulent between the parties, or not; for if the lots were not included in the mortgage, the tenant is a mere stranger, and is not entitled to contest the validity of the deed, since he does not claim under it; and it may be good and binding between the grantor and the grantee, notwithstanding it is but a colorable conveyance meditated by them. If, on the other hand, the mortgage did include the lots, then it is equally plain, that the deed of Samuel T. Mallett to the demandant, even if made bona fide, could convey no title against the tenant, who claims under the paramount title of the mortgage; and he, therefore, would thus have the better right to hold the demanded premises. Therefore, "quâncunque viâ data est," the question of fraud seems not properly before this court upon the present pleadings.

MEMORANDUM. Upon this intimation of the opinion of the court, the tenant moved for a continuance, which was granted by the court.

[A writ of error was sued out in the supreme court, where the judgment of the court below was affirmed. 4 How. (45 U. S.) 353.]

Case No. 8,990.

In re MALLORY.

[4 N. B. R. 153 (Quarto, 38).] [1]

District Court, D. Nevada. 1870.

BANKRUPTCY — ASSIGNEE — MISMANAGEMENT — FRAUDS—MOTION TO REMOVE—GOOD FAITH—COSTS.

Where an assignee, who is clerk of the bankrupt's attorney, is charged with mismanagement of the estate, and that he sold the property for less than its value, and had been guilty of gross frauds, and his removal is asked by the creditors who are unwilling to intrust the exposition of those frauds to such assignee, and a committee is named to conduct the proceedings on the part of the creditors, held, it is expedient that there should be another assignee substituted for the present one. At the same time such order will be made as to fully protect the present assignee against the cost of this proceeding, for it appears from the testimony that he has acted throughout with entire good faith and energy. The costs of this proceeding must be paid out of the estate.

[Cited in Re Blodget, Case No. 1,552; Catlin v. Hoffman, Id. 2,521; Citizens' Bank v. Ober, Id. 2,731; Re Wetmore, Id. 17,466.]

In bankruptcy.

HILLYER, District Judge. The petition charges that the assignee has mismanaged the estate; that by connivance with others he has sold property for less than its value; that he has failed to make reasonable efforts to recover the property of the estate; that the present assignee is the confidential clerk of the attorney of the bankrupt; that he favors the bankrupt and his attorney; and that the bankrupt has been guilty of gross frauds, and the creditors petitioning are unwilling to intrust the exposition of those frauds to the present assignee. The petition is signed by three creditors, who, it is alleged, are a committee representing a majority in number and value of the creditors. The answer of the assignee denies specifically all the allegations of the petition except that he is clerk of the bankrupt's attorney. All the charges of fraud on the part of the assignee; or connivance with the bankrupt in the concealment of property, have been most successfully met, and were, as a ground for removal, abandoned on the argument.

Something was alleged in the pleading, and more was said on the argument, imputing unprofessional conduct and bad motives to the counsel for the assignee on one side and of the creditors on the other. I can see no shadow of foundation for this on either side, and I regret that either should have felt it necessary to vindicate his conduct in the proceeding by language so bitter and personal as was employed. The character and ability of both gentlemen are too well established to require any vindication from this court.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

and in the conclusion to which I have come, I have laid aside all consideration of these charges, which are entirely unsupported by proof sufficient to found a suspicion upon. There has been more said about fraud in this matter and less proved than in any case I have ever heard.

I shall proceed to decide only such questions as seem to be properly involved in the case. It is admitted by the assignee that he solicited from creditors his appointment; that he has done so in other cases, and makes it in some sort a business to procure his election as assignee in bankruptcy. He claims that it is right and proper to do so. The fact of such solicitation has been held to be good ground upon which to withhold the judge's approval of an assignee's election. The creditors should be left free and unbiased in their choice. Such is the policy of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 57)]. It might lead to abuses if assignees were permitted to do this. In re Doe [Case No. 3,957]. Whether there has been such an influence exercised by the assignee or not, as to invalidate his election, must be left to depend upon the circumstances of each case. There might be some solicitation on the part of the assignee which would in no way influence the choice of the creditors. The creditors having knowledge of the action of the assignee in soliciting his own election, and permitting him to qualify and act for six months, as in this case, without objection, it is too late to ask his removal on that ground alone. Some little evidence was given tending to show that one of the attorneys of the bankrupt interested himself in procuring the election of this assignee, and voted by proxy a large portion of the votes given for him. Neither the bankrupt nor his solicitors can be permitted to make the proceedings in bankruptcy his proceedings. Ex parte Arrowsmith, 14 Ves. 209.

It is clearly wrong to allow the bankrupt to select his assignee. Such an assignee might favor the bankrupt at the expense of the creditors' interests. In re Bliss [Case No. 1,543]; Eden, Bankr. Law, 221. That the assignee is the confidential clerk of the bankrupt's attorney might be a good reason for withholding the approval of the choice, if objections were made by the creditors before approval, but such objection should be made, if the facts are known to the creditors, immediately after election; and if, with full knowledge of the facts, the assignee is allowed to go on and exercise his duties, something more ought to be shown—some misconduct, or that the relation existing is in some way prejudicial to the rights or interests of the creditors. A relative of the bankrupt has been rejected, in Re Powell [Case No. 11,354], and the reason for disapproving the creditors' choice in that case seems to apply with some force to the clerk of the bankrupt's attorney. But there is no restriction upon the choice of the creditors, in the bankrupt law, except that the assignee shall not be a creditor who has received a preference, and if creditors, without any undue influence, and with knowledge of the facts, choose such an assignee and the judge approves without objection, it is too late to object. The creditors argue that the assignee should have recovered for the benefit of the estate certain property which lawfully belongs thereto. On the eve of bankruptcy the bankrupt mortgaged to the attorney employed to prepare his petition and schedule, a six-mule team as security for a fee of one thousand dollars for such services. The team was afterward sold by the assignee, subject to the mortgage, and not bringing one thousand dollars, the proceeds of the sale were paid to the attorneys of the bankrupt. No question is made as to the good faith of the assignee in this matter. He has done what he thought to be right—if he has erred. This court does not deem it necessary or proper to decide upon the validity of this mortgage in this proceeding. When it is decided, the parties interested in upholding the mortgage will be heard. Judge Duval, in Re Evans [Id. 4,552], held that such a mortgage was clearly invalid, and that the attorneys must prove their debt with other unsecured creditors, but, from the opinion, the point does not seem to have been much discussed, the real question determined appearing to be whether, under the 39th section, the attorneys would even be allowed to prove their debt.

Evidence was introduced in regard to a team transferred to one Hagerman a short time before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. It seems to be manifestly improper to decide now that this was or was not a valid transfer under the bankrupt law. Mr. Hagerman, the party interested, has not been heard, and this court may be called upon to decide the question upon a fuller hearing, and more complete evidence. The assignee went so far as to ascertain that Mallory was justly indebted to Hagerman, in an amount equal to the value of the team, and there rested. This might all be; and there might be an entire absence of anything like actual fraud, and yet the assignee be entitled to the property as trustee of the creditors, if the transaction came within the provisions of section 35. But the assignee must be allowed some discretion, and if he believe the expense of a suit to recover property will be greater than the benefit to be derived from the suit, if successful, he ought not to proceed. The assignee, in this case, has employed the attorney of the bankrupt as his attorney in some of the proceedings, and the propriety of doing this has been discussed. So far as my research has gone, the courts uniformly disapprove of the same person acting as attorney for the bankrupt and the assignee, not because the duties always are conflicting and adverse, but because they may be so. The assignee's attorney is a minister of the court, and his duty is to attend to the estate, even to the prejudice of his own claims; and it is considered inconsistent with his duties if he act also as attorney for the bankrupt. Eldon, Bankr. Law, 214. Lord Eldon once said: "It is astonishing that solicitors of great name will engage themselves as solicitors for assignees, the creditors, and the bankrupts also." Ex parte Arrowsmith, 14 Ves. 209. Again he says: "This case is an instance of the mischief arising from the practice of the assignees and the bankrupt acting by the same solicitor. The adverse duties resulting from those conflicting characters cannot be properly sustained by the same person." Ex parte Vaughan, Id. 514.

It was said on the argument that no attorney of respectability would ever aid the bankrupt in concealing a fraud. Every lawyer knows how, almost unconsciously, he identifies his client with himself, and it is not necessary to assert that he would cover up a fraud knowingly; but he would be less apt than the opposing party to believe that his client had done a wrong. Besides, while an attorney would be as culpable as his client, or worse, if he assisted him in the perpetration of a fraud, still this is a very different thing from defending the client for acts past. Every one has a right to make such defense, and to have the aid of counsel. And to my mind the conduct of the attorney would be as praiseworthy in the latter case as unjustifiable in the former.

A document was introduced in evidence, signed by a majority in number and value of the creditors, as claimed by the petitioners, which is an agreement of the creditors with each other to give twenty per cent. of their dividends for the purpose of opposing the bankrupt's discharge, and recovering property asserted by them to have been fraudulently disposed of by the bankrupt. The assignee denies that this document is signed by a majority in number or value of the creditors. A committee of three is also named in the agreement to conduct the proceedings on the part of the creditors. Rosebury, who procured the signatures, says, that he told those who signed that the first step would be an application for the removal of the present assignee, and it appears that at a meeting of these creditors, it was also resolved to petition for the assignee's removal. Section 18 of the bankrupt act gives the court power to remove an assignee for any cause which, in its judgment, renders such removal necessary or expedient. The removal of the assignee is a matter left to the discretion of the court.

In my judgment, it is expedient that there should be another assignee substituted for the present one. At the same time such order will be made as to fully protect the present assignee against the cost of this proceeding, for it appears from the testimony, that he has acted throughout with entire good faith and energy. But there is, unfortunately, an irreconcilable disagreement between the present assignee and a large portion of the creditors, whose interests and wishes the court is bound to regard while protecting the assignee from any injustice. The assignee is a trustee of each and every creditor. He receives a compensation for his services, and is held to strict diligence in watching the interest of creditors. The creditors are the beneficiaries, and have a direct pecuniary interest in the bankruptcy proceedings. Courts of equity sometimes decree a substitution of trustees where there has been no fault on the part of the trustee. Substitution has been made where the trustees would not act together. Here are some of the points of difference between the petitioning creditors and the present assignee: The assignee believes that Mallory has acted honestly—the creditors that he has been guilty of fraud. The assignee is satisfied that Hagerman is entitled to keep the team—the creditors that it belongs to the estate. The assignee considers the mortgage to bankrupt's attorney valid—the creditors desire to test the question. The creditors think there is property which can be recovered to the estate, in Owen's Valley—the assignee thinks not. Creditors think the bankrupt drew a large amount of money from the bank in January, 1870, and paid to John James, and that this was a fraudulent preference—the assignee is of a contrary opinion. The assignee says that he should employ the attorney of the bankrupt as his legal adviser, and the creditors desire some other attorney. The assignee would change his attorney if directed to do so by the court. The assignee is sincere in his opinions, and an equal sincerity must be accorded to the creditors.

It was said on the argument, that the assignee would proceed in any manner directed by the court. But it would seem to be manifestly wrong for the court to constitute itself the legal adviser of the assignee. He has a right to choose his own counsel, and must proceed with his duties according to his best judgment, the court holding him to no more than a just and reasonable accountability. Should the court undertake to direct him when to proceed in a suit, it would find that it had practically decided questions ex parte which ought to have been decided only on a hearing of both parties interested. Upon the questions of cost, I shall allow the assignee to tax his costs against the estate; that is, the cost of this proceeding must be paid out of the estate. Had it not been for the charge of fraud made against the assignee by the creditors, a charge wholly unfounded and abandoned on the argument, the expense of this proceeding would have been comparatively light. But an assignee could not rest under such a charge, feeling himself innocent, and was fully justified in bringing all the witnesses necessary to rebut the charge and vindicate himself. It is just that the estate should bear these costs.

Upon the whole case it is ordered, that the said R. V. Dey be removed from the trust of the assignee of the estate of said bankrupt, and that the costs of the proceedings for removal be paid out of the estate of said bankrupt subject to prior charges.

[NOTE. The case was subsequently heard upon petition of Henry Vansickle, a judgment creditor of the bankrupt, praying that an injunction, granted upon petition of the bankrupt against the sheriff of Douglas county, who had levied upon property of bankrupt to satisfy execution in favor of Vansickle, the sale of which property was thereby enjoined, be dissolved. The petition was dismissed. Case No. 8,991.]

Case No. 8,991.

In re MALLORY.

[1 Sawy. 88;[1] 6 N. B. R. 22.]

District Court, D. Nevada. April 10, 1871.

BANKRUPTCY — JUDGMENT IN STATE COURT — INJUNCTION TO SHERIFF—UNLAWFUL PREFERENCE—HOW LIQUIDATED.

1. The district courts of the United States, sitting in bankruptcy, have power to restrain, by injunction, the sheriff of a state court from proceeding to sell the property of a voluntary bankrupt, under an execution issued out of a state court upon a judgment obtained before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy.

[Cited in Re Brinkman, Case No. 1,884; Re Ulrich, Id. 14,328; Re Hufnagel, Id. 6,837.]

2. It has also the power to declare the lien of a judgment of a state court void, as against the general creditors, if such lien is an unlawful preference under the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)].

[Cited in Phelps v. Sellick, Case No. 11,079; Catlin v. Hoffman, Id. 2,521.]

3. The lien of a judgment, like other liens, is to be ascertained and liquidated in the bankruptcy court.

4. Section 1 of the bankrupt act of 1867 construed.

Motion to dissolve injunction restraining the sheriff from selling property of the bankrupt [E. Mallory], under judgment obtained in the state court, before the institution of proceedings in bankruptcy.

[This case was previously heard upon petition of creditors asking for the removal of R. V. Dey, assignee. The prayer of the petition was granted. Case No. 8,990.]

R. M. Clarke, for the motion.

R. S. Mesick, for respondent.

HILLYER, District Judge. On the twenty-third day of October, A. D., 1869, Henry Vansickle obtained a judgment, by confession, against the bankrupt, in the state district court for the county of Douglas. Execution was issued thereon, levied on certain property of the bankrupt, and the sheriff of Douglas county had advertised the property for sale, when, on the fifth day of February, A. D., 1870, Mallory was adjudged a bankrupt in this court, on his own petition. On the same day the bankrupt petitioned this court for an injunction restraining the said sheriff from selling the property levied on, which was granted.

Vansickle now files a petition praying that the injunction may be dissolved. Mallory's assignee answers, alleging that the judgment is not a valid lien, was procured in fraud of the bankrupt act, and prays that the same be declared to be no lien upon the property, and that the property be ordered to be sold by the assignee free from any lien of the said judgment. As a matter of practice, it may be stated that it was unnecessary to file a petition in this case. A motion to dissolve the injunction would have been the correct way of proceeding.

The main question argued was as to the power of this court, sitting in bankruptcy, to enjoin the sheriff of a state court or parties litigant therein, from proceeding to sell property levied upon by virtue of a writ of execution issued out of the state court, upon a judgment obtained therein before the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, with the understanding that the injunction should remain in force if the court should be of opinion that such power existed, leaving the question as to the validity of the lien of the judgment to be determined hereafter, in some other proceeding.

The question is one of the utmost importance, involving the propriety of the exercise of a power by a federal court, the effect of which is to restrain proceedings in a state court, and I feel that its decision imposes upon this court a great responsibility.

In September last, this same question was brought before me in the Case of Lady Bryan Min. Co. [Case No. 7,980], and a motion to dissolve the injunction was denied; but as in that case there was no question raised as to the validity of the judgment liens, and the lien of the judgment creditors was transferred to the proceeds of the property, the point was not so fully argued as it has been now, and I was in this case not only willing, but desirous of hearing further argument from the learned counsel who represent the present parties.

Upon this argument, the sections of the bankrupt act relating in any way to this question, have been read and commented on by counsel, for the purpose of ascertaining the policy and object of the act, and the extent of the power conferred to carry out the policy and effect the object; a great mass of authorities was cited and read on the hearing, and the whole, together with a careful examination on my part of the entire subject, has resulted in more firmly confirming me in the correctness of the opinion expressed in the Lady Bryan Case.

Congress, in the enactment of laws upon the subject of bankruptcies, has complete and plenary power, unrestricted save as to uniformity. It has, in legislating upon this subject, power to take from state courts the administration of remedies for the enforcement of liens. The passage by it of a bankrupt law ipso facto abrogates all state insolvent laws. The bankrupt law is then the supreme law of the land, binding alike upon federal and state tribunals, and wherever by express words or by necessary implication it affects state laws, the power of state courts or the remedies of suitors therein, it is paramount.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in matters of bankruptcy is derived from, and its extent must be determined by reference to the language of the bankrupt act; and before those courts restrain parties litigant in, or officers of state courts from prosecuting their remedies therein, or executing the process of those courts, the power to do so ought to be found either in the express language of the act, or it must result as a necessary means for effecting the powers expressly conferred.

Section 1 of the bankrupt act, constitutes the several district courts of the United States courts of bankruptcy, and gives them original jurisdiction in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy. This jurisdiction is declared to extend: To all cases and controversies arising between the bankrupt and any creditor or creditors who shall claim any debt or demand under the bankruptcy; to the collection of all the assets of the bankrupt; to the ascertainment and liquidation of the liens and other specific claims thereon; to the adjustment of the various priorities and conflicting interests of all parties; to the marshaling and disposition of the different funds and assets; and to all acts, matters, and things to be done under, and in virtue of the bankruptcy, until the final distribution and settlement of the estate of the bankrupt, and the close of the proceedings in bankruptcy.

As reference will be made to the bankrupt act of 1841, I quote that portion of it conferring jurisdiction. It is declared to "extend to all cases and controversies in bankruptcy arising between the bankrupt and any creditor or creditors who shall claim any debt or demand under the bankruptcy; to all cases and controversies between such creditor or creditors, and the assignee of the estate, whether in office or removed; to all cases and controversies between such assignee and the bankrupt, and to all acts, matters and things to be done under, and in virtue of the bankruptcy, until the final distribution and settlement of the estate of the bankrupt, and the close of proceedings in bankruptcy." 5 Stat. 415, § 6. Under this section of the act of 1841, there was much diversity of opinion among courts and lawyers, as to the existence of power to control by injunction upon the parties, the proceedings in state courts. The changes made by the act of 1867, are very noticeable and important. The present law, unlike that of 1841, extends the jurisdiction in plain terms, to the collection of all assets of the bankrupt, the ascertainment and liquidation of liens and other specific claims upon those assets, and to the adjustment of priorities and marshaling of assets so as to secure the rights of all parties, and this jurisdiction is original and exclusive. Now, when congress delegated to the district courts, this equitable jurisdiction in bankruptcy, it must follow, by necessary implication, that it also delegated at the same time the power to administer such remedies known to the law as were absolutely indispensable to the complete exercise of the jurisdiction expressly conferred. One power directly given, is the collection of all the assets. The means by which this result is to be reached are not enumerated, but power to accomplish the result is given, and the right to employ the proper legal process for effecting the result must follow by necessary implication.

The property levied on in this case is part of the assets of the bankrupt. It may be subject to a lien, but the legal title to the property was in the bankrupt when the petition was filed and passed to the assignee. The judgment of Vansickle, if a valid lien by the laws of this state, and not impeachable under the bankrupt law, as a fraud against it, is to be respected and protected by the bankruptcy court. But this statutory lien is neither a right in or to the thing, but is simply a charge thereon.

How now, I ask, could the assets in this case have been collected by the assignee without restraining the sheriff from selling them under his execution? It certainly would complicate the case exceedingly, if the sheriff, after the legal title, by virtue of the bankruptcy, had passed out of Mallory to the assignee, had sold the property as the property of Mallory.

Closely connected with this power of collecting the assets, is that of ascertaining and liquidating the liens, which may be claimed to exist upon those assets.

If the validity of any lien upon the assets of the bankrupt is denied or questioned, in what court is the question to be tried, the validity or invalidity of the lien ascertained, and, if found valid, liquidated? The answer is, that by the express terms of the act, this jurisdiction is given to the bankruptcy court.

Here, as in collecting the assets, a specific result is to be attained, and can it be doubted that the means by which it is to be attained are also given.

The lien is to be ascertained and liquidated in the bankruptcy court, and this would be an idle proceeding if that court has not power to preserve the property, by restraining its sale until the lien is ascertained to be good, or to be void, and of what use is it to say that this court shall liquidate liens, if it cannot restrain parties from liquidating their liens without its intervention. The bankrupt law is highly remedial, and it ought to have a liberal construction, for the purpose of effecting its aim and policy. The expediency and policy of bringing all the assets into the bankruptcy court, and ascertaining and liquidating there all liens and specific claims thereon, is undeniable.

And while neither the expediency of exercising this power nor the inconvenience of not exercising it, can justify its employment if not found in the statute in direct or necessarily implied terms, these considerations may be, and ought to be looked at in construing the law and arriving at the intention of the law-makers. Let us suppose that two persons each have, or claim to have, a lien by judgment in the state courts, upon the property of the bankrupt at the time of bankruptcy, and that there is a dispute between them as to the priority of their liens or the validity of one of the judgments. One creditor comes into the bankruptcy court, proves his claim and asks to have his lien liquidated. The other proceeds in the state court. If neither court can restrain or control parties before the other, here will be a direct conflict of jurisdiction; decisions as to priorities or validity of the liens may be conflicting, and each court proceeding to take possession of the property through its process and officers, and satisfy the lien of the party before it. Such a state of things would be very much to be deprecated if the bankrupt law were so lame and impotent as to have left the case unprovided for. But the law is not, I conceive, so defective. It gives the bankruptcy court an original and exclusive jurisdiction over all the parties to the bankruptcy proceedings, all the assets and all the liens thereon. Again, a lien may be good by the law of the state and void under the bankrupt law; thus, a lien by attachment is avoided, and the state law creating it is so far abrogated, if the attachment was made within four months next preceding the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy; so a judgment lien may be void under the bankrupt law, as an unlawful preference to the judgment creditor. Hence, while the judgment might stand in the state court, the lien of that judgment might be avoided in the bankruptcy court; and so it was held under the law of 1841, and that the creditor was liable to refund to the assignee the proceeds of a sale made under the judgment; such creditor having notice of the proceedings in bankruptcy. Shawhan v. Wherritt, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 626.

Let us see now how this question stands upon authority. Where judgment had been obtained in a state court, execution issued and returned unsatisfied, and an order made on proceedings supplementary to execution for the examination of the judgment debtor, Judge Blatchford ordered a stay of all proceedings on the said order until the question of the discharge of the bankrupt should be determined by the bankruptcy court. In re Reed [Case No. 11,637].

In an involuntary proceeding before the same judge, he, under the 40th section of the bankrupt act, enjoined the sheriff of a state court from proceeding to sell property of the alleged bankrupt, and on motion refused to dissolve it until the question whether or not the debtor was to be adjudged a bankrupt was decided. In re Devlin [Case No. 3,841]. The fortieth section of the act gives the district court power by injunction to "restrain the debtor and any other person" from making any transfer or disposition of any part of the debtor's property until the return of the order to show cause why the debtor should not be adjudged a bankrupt. On the hearing it was argued that the express grant of power to enjoin in proceedings in invitum was a denial of any such power in voluntary proceedings upon the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius. But it is to be observed that under section 14 it is "in virtue of the adjudication of bankruptcy and the appointment of an assignee" that the property vests in the assignee.

Now, in voluntary cases, the filing of the petition is an act of bankruptcy, and the debtor at the same time surrenders all his estate and effects for the benefit of his creditors and is forthwith adjudged a bankrupt. The district court is thus clothed at once in voluntary cases with jurisdiction over the debtor and his property. But where the proceeding is involuntary the debtor is not adjudged a bankrupt until the return and hearing of the order to show cause, and may not be then if he have a sufficient defense.

There is, therefore, good reason for giving the court power to enjoin between the time of filing the creditor's petition and the return of the order to show cause, as there is in these cases no voluntary surrender of the property and the title cannot vest in the assignee until after adjudication. If the argument of the petitioner is sound the court would have power to enjoin in involuntary cases before adjudication, but must dissolve it immediately after, because the statute in express terms only provides for an injunction until the return of the order to show cause. So that the court might enjoin before it was certain the property of the bankrupt would ever come into its possession, and might not after the property was fully within its jurisdiction.

A bankrupt held under arrest by the sheriff of the city and county of New York, under orders of arrest from the state court, was discharged from arrest and proceedings on actions against the bankrupt in the supreme court of the state were stayed. In re Jacoby [Case No. 7,165].

In a case before Judge Benedict (E. D. New York), where judgment was obtained, execution issued and levied on property of the bankrupt prior to the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, that judge enjoined the creditors from enforcing the levy. On motion to dissolve, which was denied, although this question of power was not discussed, the judge said that the power seemed to be fairly included in the power to collect all the assets, to ascertain and liquidate liens and to adjust priorities. In re Schnepf [Case No. 12,471].

In a voluntary proceeding upon a bill filed to enjoin a sheriff from selling property of the bankrupt under an execution from a state court, Judge Hill, of the Mississippi district, held that the bankrupt himself had a right to file the bill before an assignee was appointed; that if the sheriff had actually levied before the bankruptcy, he would be allowed to proceed without a showing that the sale would be injurious to the general creditors or to some one having a prior lien; that the 20th section, in connection with the 1st and 25th, gave the court jurisdiction of the subject matter; that the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy transferred to the district court jurisdiction over the bankrupt, his estate, and all parties and questions connected therewith, and operated as a supersedeas of the process in the hands of the sheriff and an injunction against all other proceedings than such as might thereupon be had by authority of the bankruptcy court. Jones v. Leach [Case No. 7,475]. A sheriff was restrained from selling goods under execution by the same judge, in Pennington v. Sale [Id. 10,939].

After judgment in a state court, execution, levy and advertisement for sale, the sheriff was restrained. In re Bernstein [Case No. 1,350]. The jurisdiction of a district court of the United States is superior and exclusive in all matters arising under the statute, and extends to a suspension of proceedings taken for the purpose of subjecting portions of the estate surrendered to a sale under state process. Until a sale is made a bankrupt is not divested of his interest in the property under seizure. In re Barrow [Id. 1,057]. A preliminary injunction was issued restraining the plaintiff in an execution upon a judgment confessed in a state court, and he moved to dissolve it. The question was argued before two judges, Grier and Cadwalader, and the jurisdiction maintained, the court refusing to dissolve the injunction. Irving v. Hughes [Id. 7,076]. Where judgments were rendered after the bankruptcy, Judge Deady held the jurisdiction to restrain the enforcement of the judgments was undoubted. In re Wallace [Id. 17,094]. Parties proceeding, after the bankruptcy, to foreclose a mortgage on the property of the bankrupt, in the state court, were enjoined. In re Kerosene Oil Co. [Id. 7,725]. A landlord was enjoined from distraining the bankrupt's property for rent. Brock v. Terrell [Id. 1,914]. In a case where the bankrupt himself filed a petition to restrain certain persons, who had obtained judgments against him prior to the filing of his petition, from proceeding by execution, Judge Giles, of the Maryland district, in answer to an objection that the district court had no jurisdiction, but that the proceeding must be by bill and in the circuit court, said: "I am clearly of the opinion that the petition was properly filed in this court, and that this court has, by virtue of the 1st section of the bankrupt act, full and adequate jurisdiction over all matters relating to the settlement of the bankrupt's estate, either at law or in equity, by way of petition or bill; and that whenever the relief sought is necessary to the protection of the general creditors, such relief will be granted;" but as in the case before him there was no suggestion of fraud, and the judgments were admitted to be valid liens, he held that the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy courts was not exclusive, and permitted the judgment creditors to proceed in the state court. In re Bowie [Id. 1,728]. Upon the application of parties interested, the district court has jurisdiction to ascertain and liquidate a judgment lien, and while so doing to enjoin the judgment creditor from enforcing the same by execution out of the state court. In re Fuller [Id. 5,148]. If creditors who assert a claim against the bankrupt are not barred by the discharge, are allowed to commence suit in the state court for the purpose of saving the statute of limitations or securing testimony, the suit, after this object is attained, can be stayed to await the decision of the question of the debtor's discharge. In re Ghirardelli [Id. 5,376]. After the bankruptcy, creditors of the bankrupt, having a lien by mortgage, were proceeding to foreclose in a territorial court. The supreme court held, that all the property, choses in action, effects, interests and equities of the bankrupt must be brought into the bankruptcy court for settlement and distribution, and enjoined the creditors from proceeding in the foreclosure suit. In re Snedaker, 3 N. B. R. 155. Judgment was obtained in the state court, execution levied and property advertised for sale before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. The sheriff was restrained from proceeding with the sale. Beattie v. Gardner [Case No. 1,195]. Under the law of 1841 an injunction was ordered against the assignee, appointed under the state laws, to stop his interference with the property of the bankrupt, and also to prevent certain creditors from proceeding with an execution. Ex parte Eames [Case No. 4,237].

For an instructive statement of the nature and extent of the equitable jurisdiction of courts of bankruptcy, see Ex parte Foster [Case No. 4,960].

In Re Campbell [Case No. 2,349], after property had been sold and the proceeds were in the hands of the sheriff, an injunction to restrain the state courts and their officers from proceeding, for the purpose of bringing the proceeds of the sale into the bankruptcy courts for distribution, was refused. Judge McCandless based his refusal upon the ground that the courts of the United States have no power to enjoin proceedings in the state courts, either directly or by restraining the officers of such courts, or parties litigant therein.

This is the only opinion, so far as I can discover, directly denying this jurisdiction.

Upon my own convictions as to the proper construction of the bankrupt act, and upon the weight of authority, I hold that the court had jurisdiction to issue the writ. The prayer of the petition is therefore denied with costs.

The decision of the district court in this case was affirmed by the circuit court, on petition for review in the following opinion:

FIELD, Circuit Justice. When counsel closed their argument on the petition of Vansickle, for a review of the order of the district judge, I had no doubt of the correctness of that order, but I thought the case was one of sufficient importance to justify a written opinion, giving at length the views of the court upon the questions raised.. I, therefore, took the papers and reserved my decision. Since then, I have read with care the opinion delivered by the district judge, when the matter was before him on the application of the petitioner to dissolve the injunction, and I find that it covers every question in the case, and presents the law in a very clear and satisfactory manner. It renders any opinion from me entirely unnecessary. I could not add to it nor improve it. I concur both in its reasoning and conclusion. Petition denied.

MALLORY (COOK v.). See Case No. 3,163.

MALLORY (RAFFERTY v.). See Case No. 11,526.

Case No. 8,992.

MALLORY et al. v. RAHMER.

[8 Blatchf. 556, note.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 3, 1871.

PATENTS—MEN'S HATS—METAL FRAME—INFRINGEMENT.

[This was a suit in the same court, by the same plaintiffs, George Mallory and the Mallory Manufacturing Company, against Charles L. Rahmer, on final hearing, on pleadings and proofs, as in Case No. 8,993. The same decree was accordingly entered in the two cases.]

George Gifford and Solomon J. Gordon, for plaintiffs.

Horace Barnard, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I have carefully reviewed the proofs and arguments on which this case was heard, and see no reason to change the views which I expressed in the case of the same plaintiffs against George W. White, on the same patent, or to refrain from giving effect to the stipulation of the parties, of May 13th, 1870. Let a decree be entered for the plaintiffs, to the like effect as in the case against White.

[In 8 Blatchf. 556, this case is published as a note to Mallory v. White, Case No. 8,993.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

MALLORY (RUSSELL & ERWIN MANUF'G CO. v.). See Case No. 12,166.

MALLORY (TARLETON v.). See Case No. 13,753.

Case No. 8,993.

MALLORY et al. v. WHITE.

[8 Blatchf. 552; 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 628.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Aug. 30, 1871.

PATENTS—MEN'S HATS—METAL FRAME—INFRINGEMENT.

1. The latters patent granted to Thomas W. Adams and Charles H. Slicer, December 24th, 1861, for an "improvement in men's hats," are valid.

2. The claims of such patent—(1.) In the construction of men's hats, when the brims are of flexible or yielding material, giving the front and side curves to the brim by means of a frame of cane, metal, or other material, confined within, or attached to, the brim at or near its circumference, substantially as and for the purposes set forth. (2.) In combination with a hat brim constructed as claimed in the preceding clause, the head band o, for the purpose of preserving the symmetry of the body of the hat, substantially as described—are infringed by a hat which has the features specified in the claims, although the frame in it is a continuous piece of metal, the ends of which are joined by soldering, while, in the specification of the patent, the frame is described as being inserted in a sleeve, tube or ferrule, and although draw-strings are used in it, in connection with the case for the frame, to effect a result in addition to the result attained by the patented construction.

[This was a bill in equity, filed [by George Mallory and the Mallory Manufacturing Company] to restrain the defendant [George W. White] from infringing letters patent [No. 34,043] for "improvement in men's hats," granted to Thomas W. Adams and Charles H. Slicer, December 24, 1861, as assignees of said Adams, which letters patent were assigned to complainants.

[The claim was as follows:

["What I claim, etc., in the construction of men's hats, when the brims are of flexible or yielding material is, giving the front and side curves to the brim by means of a frame of cane, metal, or other material, confined within or attached to the brim, at or near its circumference, substantially as and for the purposes set forth. In combination with a hat brim constructed as claimed in the preceding clause, I claim the head-band o, for the purpose of preserving the symmetry of the body of the hat, substantially as described."] [2]

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission. The syllabus and opinion are from 8 Blatchf. 552; and the statement is from 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 628.]

Solomon J. Gordon, for plaintiffs.
The defendant, in pro. per.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This bill is brought by the plaintiffs as the owners of letters patent of the United States granted to Thomas W. Adams and Charles H. Slicer, December 24th, 1861, on the invention of said Adams, for an "improvement in men's hats." The specification says: "The nature of my improvement in the manufacture of hats consists in giving such an excess in the length of a reed or other non-extensible flexible article, over that of the outer edge of the brim of the hat formed of an extensible material, that, when said reed is inserted and forced in a case on said outer edge, it shall give not only firmness to the brim, but also a rising curvature thereto, of any desirable configuration. By virtue of this invention or discovery of extra length of reed confined in the fabric of the hat, I am enabled to make them of the lightest material that shall retain their shape, at an inconsiderable cost. Those hats also admit of being folded up in a small space, by simply twisting the reed in the brim into the shape of an 8, making them peculiarly portable, without damage to the shape. In the course of continuous experiments, occupying much time and attention, I have discovered and applied successfully the principle, that each portion of the arch forming the edge of the brim has its chord formed of the breadth of the brim of the hat. Furthermore, I have found that, by employing a band sewed to the lower edge of the body and inner edge of the brim, in conjunction with my reed, I prevent stretching the body and throwing the hat out of shape. As a simple means of joining the reed ends in the reed case, I have employed a short tube or sleeve, which allows the swivelling of the cane reed, in folding the hat, and it also prevents injury to the fabric composing it, in the removal or return of the reed, in washing or doing up the hat. My improvement is applicable to any shape of hat or cap in which a continuous spring or flexible reed can be inserted." The specification then proceeds to give general directions how to make hats or caps on such improved principle, remarking, that there will necessarily be slight changes in different patterns, that will suggest themselves to an intelligent operative. The hat brim is cut on an oval block pattern board, out of any woven or felted material, the former being preferable, as it is cheap and allows the drawing or tension of the reed. The body is cut arched or rising over the ears, having its edges parallel or nearly so. The tip or crown is cut oval or round, as desirable. A bag hat, in which fullness is given to the body, is cut in sections. The crown is sewed to the body, the head band having been sewed or basted thereto. Then the lower edge thereof is joined to the inner edge of the brim. The outer edge of the brim may either have the reed case formed by turning over the edge of the material, or it may be formed of wide binding, forming thus a case. The hat is now ready for the insertion of the spring reed, or its substitute, into the reed case. A small metal tube or ferrule is confined half its length on the end of the reed, the other end of the reed being forced and strained in the remaining half of said ferrule, such an extra length having been given to the reed, as to effect the stretching of the width of the brim, and giving any desirable configuration thereto. The claim is in these words: "What I claim as my invention and desire to secure by letters patent, in the construction of men's hats, when the brims are of flexible or yielding material, is, giving the front and side curves to the brim by means of a frame of cane, metal or other material, confined within, or attached to, the brim at or near its circumference, substantially as and for the purposes set forth. In combination with a hat brim constructed as claimed in the preceding clause, I claim the head band o, for the purpose of preserving the symmetry of the body of the hat, substantially as described."

The bill alleges, that the defendant has infringed the patent, by making and selling hats containing the patented improvements. The defences are non-infringement, and want of novelty in the improvements claimed.

The hat put in evidence as an infringement is the one marked Exhibit G. The record contains an admission by the defendant, that, in the year 1869, and prior to the filing of the bill, he made and sold ten hats like Exhibit G. There can be no doubt that that hat is an infringement of both of the claims of the patent. It has a brim of flexible woven material. A frame of metal is confined in the brim near its outer circumference, the outer edge of the brim being turned over, so as to form a case for the frame. The frame not only strains the brim, but gives to it its front and side curves. The frame effects this result because it has the excess in length over the length of the case in the outer edge of the brim, into which it is inserted, which the specification speaks of as the main feature of the first claim of the patent, and which, it says, not only gives firmness to the brim, but gives a rising curvature thereto. Such rising curvature exists in Exhibit G, and is caused by such extra length of the frame. Such extra length, in Exhibit G, is, by measurement, over an inch, and makes it necessary to insert the frame into its case by forcing, straining, or springing it in. It is true, that, in Exhibit G, the frame is a continuous piece of metal, its ends being joined by soldering, and that, in the specification, the ends of the frame are joined by being inserted in a sleeve, tube, or ferrule. But this is an immaterial point, not of the essence of the invention. The one mode of joining the ends is the equivalent of the other, so far as the improvements covered by the claims of the patent are concerned. So, too, the fact, that, in Exhibit G, there are draw strings used in connection with the case for the frame, makes no difference. The draw strings are used to effect a result in addition to the result attained by the plaintiffs' construction; but Exhibit G embodies none the less the plaintiffs' improvements, because it has the draw strings in addition. Exhibit G also has, in combination with such brim and frame, a head band, substantially such as that described in the plaintiffs' specification, and used for the same purpose.

[2] [From 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 628.]

On the question of novelty, the inventor, Adams, is shown to have filed in the patent office, on the 4th of September, 1857, an application for a patent, on a specification, drawings, and model fully showing the improvements covered by the patent sued on. The model was a hat in all respects constructed like the hat described in the specification of the patent sued on. That application was rejected by the commissioner, and by the board of examiners, on appeal. There can be no doubt on the evidence, that Adams invented, as early as September, 1857, the improvements covered by the plaintiffs' patent. The defendant has failed to show that such improvements existed previously. The testimony of Mealio, Knox, and Rahmer does not carry back to a date earlier than 1860, the hats which they knew containing the patented improvements. As to the hats of Rosenswig, the evidence is satisfactory that their date was not earlier than 1858 or 1859. As to the Davis hats, the proof shows that they were made as copies of the hat deposited in the patent office by Adams, in connection with his application of September, 1857, such hat having been used as a pattern from which some hats were made, from one of which Davis made his hats.

Adams, in 1861, assigned to Slicer a half interest in the improvements, and then a new application for a patent was made by Adams and Slicer. No defence is set up that the improvements were in public use or on sale, with the consent and allowance of Adams, for more than two years prior to the application of 1861; and there is no evidence that Adams knew there had been any public use or sale of his hat before such application of 1861.

There must be a decree for the plaintiffs, for a perpetual injunction, and an account of profits, with costs.

MALLORY, The ELIZA. See Case No. 4,365.

Case No. 8,994.

MALONE v. BELL et al.

[1 Pet. Adm. 139.] [1]

District Court, D. Pennsylvania. 1805.

SEAMEN—WAGES — PROOF OF BEING ON BOARD—LOG BOOK—LEFT SICK IN FOREIGN PORT.

1. A seaman left sick in a foreign port, and ordered to stay until the ship returned; but left the port. Ship returned and found he had sailed in another vessel. [In a libel for wages it was held that the] ship's articles [were] prima facie, evidence of the seaman having been on board.

2. By the act of congress [of 1790 (1 Stat. 133)] the log-book entry is made proof of the time of entry on board, &c. Misnomer in the entry in log-book.

3. Receiving a seaman on board after he has neglected to render himself at the time appointed, does not remit the penalty.

4. In cases of desertion the entry on the log-book is necessary, but not incontrovertible.

[Cited in Douglass v. Eyre, Case No. 4,032; The Martha, Id. 9,144; Knagg v. Goldsmith, Id. 7,872; The Sarah Jane, Id. 12,348.]

5. Captain [was made] a party in the libel, but no process [issued] against him. Offered as a witness, and refused.

[Questioned in The Trial, Case No. 14,170. Cited in The William Harris, Id. 17,695; The Fortitude, Id. 4,953.]

This case was heard on a libel [by Andrew Malone against William Bell, owner, and John Daly, master of the brig Mary] for wages during a voyage. The seaman was left, in the Havanna, sick in a hospital, where he was ordered, as the respondent alleged, to stay until the return of the brig Mary from a short voyage, to that port, where she intended to obtain part of her home cargo. The sailor did not stay; but came home in the brig Smilax, which sailed for Philadelphia, previous to the return of the Mary to the Havanna. He claimed wages for the voyage.

In this case several points arose.

1. It was insisted by the respondent that the articles which were produced, with the signature of the sailor by the name of Malone were not sufficient proof that he was actually on board.

THE COURT was of opinion that the articles are prima facie evidence of the fact, and must be taken as such till the contrary appears.

2. A charge of one day's pay for absence each hour, after that appointed at the foot of the articles for rendering on board, was made by the respondent. It appeared that the sailor (whose having gone by different names, was offered to be proved) was entered in the log-book by the name of Miller, as coming on board two days after that in which the hour for rendering was designated. The libellant's counsel contended, that although the act of congress is imperative on the keeper of the log-book, to make an entry of the absence and coming on board of a seaman, yet the fact ought, in addition to the entry, to be proved by other testimony. The copulative "and" shews that it is only part of the proof.

---

[1] [Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

THE COURT was of opinion that the entry in the log-book is made by the act of congress, legal evidence of the time of coming on board, and of the absence occasioning the mulct, on the delinquent seaman, of one day's pay for every hour's omission to render himself on board. He said that it would be highly embarrassing to masters and owners, if this fact required supplementary proof. The compulsion upon the mate, or keeper of the log, to make the entry, was introduced to control the general rule of law, that receiving a seaman on board who had committed an offence, amounts to a release or pardon. This case must be an exception to that general rule: for if the receiving on board is to be construed as a release, the penalty could in no case be exacted. The law would, on that construction, be rendered nugatory. The entry in the log-book is therefore necessary, to shew that no release was intended, as well as to ascertain the fact with greater accuracy. In the case of desertion he said he had always considered the entry in the log-book evidence of the fact; but not conclusive, though indispensably necessary. In this case before me, as well as in that, testimony had been admitted to prove permission to enter on board at an hour or time different from that mentioned at the foot of the articles; and in the other case, leave of absence proved, has controlled the charge of desertion, prima facie proved by the entry. In a penal law strict compliance is required. He thought the entry in the log-book, by the name of Miller, was entitled to further consideration.

3. The captain (who was made a party in the libel, but no process had issued against him) was offered as a witness to prove the facts alleged in the respondent's defence.

THE COURT said that in these cases, he had constantly refused to admit the captain. He is liable for the wages, at the will of the mariner, who has several remedies, though he can have but one satisfaction. Protests had been entered against this opinion; but they had never been prosecuted before the superior court. It was his wish, that the point should be put in a shape, to be determined by the circuit court. The master he conceived was interested in the result; though not immediately. If a decree passes against the seamen in a procedure in rem, or against the owner, it may be given in evidence to repel a suit against the master. The master was rejected as a witness.

The parties in this case compromised, and no final decision was given.

Case No. 8,995.

MALONE et al. v. The PEDRO.[1]

District Court, S. D. Florida. Aug. 1878.

SALVAGE—MASTER — INTENT TO WRECK—REASONABLE PRECAUTIONS—CORRUPT AGREEMENT—BAR TO RECOVERY.

[1. In a salvage case a master's neglect of reasonable precautions to prevent wreck, and of reasonable efforts to remedy the same without help, is evidence that the ship was willfully wrecked by him.]

[2. In a salvage case facts tending to show that the master willfully caused the wreck may be considered, although not introduced by either party, and brought to the court's notice by accident.]

[3. The wrongful act of a master in wrecking his ship does not bar the claim of a salvor not in collusion with him.]

[4. Associates of a salvor with whom a master corruptly agrees to wreck his ship cannot recover salvage.]

[This was a libel for salvage by Samuel Malone and others against the American brig Pedro (S. J. Moulton, claimant). E. M. Stoddard intervened and contested the claim.]

L. W. Bethel, for libelant.

W. C. Maloney, Jr., for respondent.

G. Bowne Patterson, Jr., for intervener.

LOCKE, District Judge. This vessel, bound on a voyage from Nassau, N. P., to Falmouth, went ashore near Sandy Key to the westward of Grand Bahama, at about 20 minutes past 1 on the morning of the 14th of July last, and at daylight was boarded by the libelants; but, as the tide was rising, their services were not accepted, and she soon floated off. A pilot was then employed to pilot her into deep water. The next morning, while being piloted out, at about high water she again struck. The libelant came alongside with his vessel, the Fearless, took out 69 hogsheads and 15 barrels of sugar, carried out an anchor, and got her afloat, and came to Key West with her. So far the case is that of simple salvage service, and, was there nothing else alleged, would require but a few words to dispose of it. But another view of the case has been presented which demands a more thorough and careful examination of the relations existing between the master and Malone, the principal libelant. An intervening petition has been filed, alleging that the running ashore of said brig was in accordance with a corrupt and collusive understanding entered into between them, and, in behalf of parties interested in the cargo, praying that all salvage be denied. This collusion is positively denied by both masters, but the petitioner has been admitted as amicus curiae under a rule of court, and heard.

This view of the case can only be examined through the medium of the connection and relation of circumstances, and is, as admitted by the petitioner, at best but a case of circumstantial evidence. Let us examine briefly, but carefully, the circumstances, and see what conclusion we reach. The brig Pedro was lying in the port of Nassau; also, the schooner Fearless. The master of each vessel knew the other by sight, and his position and occupation. The master of the schooner is shown to have been on board the brig twice, at least; apparently at one time examining some lumber that was to be sold, and again at the sale. At one time he met the master of the brig, and went into the cabin, as he says, to get a drink of water. He is also seen in the vicinity of the brig on the dock. On Wednesday morning at about 8 or 9 o'clock, the schooner sailed, ostensibly bound on a freight voyage to Key West, intending to call and get freight at Grand Bahama, as she was cleared for Bimini via Grand Bahama. That was, as the master says, anywhere along the Bahamas that he wished to stop to get freight. She reached Stirrup Key, a distance of about 50 miles, that afternoon, and her master says, the weather being squally, he went into Great Harbor, and anchored. The next morning he went to the lighthouse, and was advised by the light keeper to secure his vessel, as the weather was threatening. This he did, and remained at anchor Thursday, Friday, and Saturday morning. It does not appear that he took any freight at this place. In the meantime the brig Pedro had sailed from Nassau, at about 5 o'clock Friday, p. m., and passed Stirrup Key at a short distance that Saturday morning, at about half past 1. Between 5 and 6 the schooner got under way, and proceeded in the wake of the brig toward Settlement Point, the most westerly point of Grand Bahama, and the nearest to her destination. The vessels sailed within sight of each other during the afternoon and until evening, when the schooner came to anchor at Settlement Point. The brig kept on her course until 10 minutes past 10, when she rounded the point and stood up N. N. W. Captain Moulton, master of the brig, says that at 10 minutes past 10 this point bore due east, distant about 8 miles. Lunn, the first mate, introduced for petitioner, whose watch it was on deck, says it was but four miles distant.

[1] [Not previously reported.]

This is the only essential point in the case upon which the testimony of the witnesses does not agree, and in determining the propriety of the course subsequently steered, it becomes a question of some importance. Distances, especially at sea, as well as space of time, unless accurately noted, are very liable to be mistaken and misstated in testimony, even by those the most truthfully disposed, and if there are any well-established circumstances which can be taken as a starting point to assist us in determining the truth, they should be examined. At 5 o'clock Saturday, p. m., before approaching Settlement Point, while running on a N. W. course, the brig was kept off a half point. This is a fact shown by the testimony of the mate and the entries of the logbook, and one which no one could have any object in misstating. The brig was running N. W. with a N. E. wind, bound around Settlement Point, and every mile which could be safely made to the northward and eastward would be so much saved. I am satisfied that only one thing could have induced Capt. Moulton to keep off at this time, especially against an easterly current, as there then was, according to Malone's testimony, and that was a fear of approaching too near the shore. The brig must have been, therefore, at that time, 5 o'clock, approaching the coast of Grand Bahama nearer than he deemed prudent, and kept off, but, if his statement that, at about 10, Settlement Point was 8 miles distant is correct, he must have been running the course she was, with a reasonable allowance for leeway, 6 or 8 miles from the shore, which his changing his course disproves. Again, instead of examining his past course, to see what his position was, let us see what the result shows it to have been. At 20 minutes past 1 the brig struck, about 12 miles to the northward of the point, and, admitting the master's statement to be correct, more than 8 miles to the eastward of the course steered, and this with a northeast wind, which would show she had drifted 8 miles against the wind while making 12 miles headway with a fair breeze, as it appears there was that night. This is unreasonable, even allowing for a strong current setting in over the reef.

Both of these examinations show that the position given by the mate is without doubt correct, and the brig was not far from 4 miles west of Settlement Point when she was put upon a N. N. W. course. This course was as nearly parallel with the trend of the reef as could have been selected, and running on it in 3 hours and 10 minutes she struck. The course steered, together with the force of the current, was undoubtedly the cause of going ashore. The master admits, or rather claims, this, stating that it was the force of the current that put him ashore, and that he knew nothing about the currents but was guided by the charts. Accidents in navigation will constantly happen, and no man can be held accountable for ignorance of facts unless it is shown that he has been criminally negligent in not informing himself of them; and the question as to whether the stranding has been accidental or intentional depends upon, and can only be examined through, the knowledge the master is known to have had of the actual condition of the locality, currents, and winds. If a master has had his vessel swept ashore accidentally, by a current of which he was ignorant, or of which there is no reason to believe him informed, although the result is the same, the presumption is in favor of his innocence; but if the circumstances are such that the presumption is of his knowledge, it is equally so of his guilt.

At the trial of this case, the master presented, as the chart by which he had been governed at the time of going ashore, a new chart, having no indications, by arrows or otherwise, of the currents; but accidentally a chart, having designated upon it plainly and distinctly a strong current flowing directly on to the reef where this vessel struck, came to the notice of the court, and, upon inquiry, was admitted by Capt. Moulton to be his property, by which he had been sailing previously, but not the one by which he had been sailing that day. This information came to the court incidentally, and the question whether it could properly be considered in this case has been duly weighed. It is true it was not introduced by either party, but it was important in the case, as showing conclusively that the master had in his possession the means of being well-informed of the current which had driven him ashore, and of which he had stated his ignorance. The matter was brought out during the trial, while all parties were present, and Capt. Moulton permitted to make any denial or explanation he saw fit. There is no doubt in my mind of the propriety of accepting the fact thus shown, and giving it due weight. It is probably true that it was not the chart that had been used that day, but the new chart which had been used, only extended to the vicinity of Stirrup Key, and this one must have been in use since leaving Nassau. To any one carefully examining this question there must be a very strong presumption that the master was informed of the currents as shown on that chart. Can it be possible that a capable and intelligent master, as I believe Capt. Moulton to be, a seaman and navigator of experience, could have been ignorant of the currents on a dangerous reef along which his voyage was leading him, when he must have had in use for weeks a chart upon which they were as plainly shown as flying arrows on a chart could portray a current?

The well-known course of the Gulf Stream, a current so generally known among seafaring men, by being shown on all charts, even the one introduced at the trial of this case as having been in use by the master of that day, would have demanded the attention of any careful man, and raised the question whether there was not a current setting in over the banks along whose edge he was sailing. I must again say that the presumption that the master of the brig was informed of this current is so strong as to preclude even a reasonable doubt. But the fact that the master was aware of a current does not necessarily show that he was not deceived in its directions or force, the strength of the wind, or speed of his vessel, and innocent of any intentional wrong in permitting his vessel to run aground. Let us examine his conduct further. At 20 minutes past 1 his vessel struck, with the shoal water to the windward. The wind was favorable. The vessel had been going but about five knots, and the master found that it was about low water. There was a full moon that night, and high tide. The sea was smooth, there being a light breeze from the eastward, and the master had a boat sufficient to carry out an anchor. The mate, who had served in a surveying vessel in the vicinity, and was well acquainted with the locality, says an anchor could have been carried out and she got off into deep water by going half her length. He asked if he should not carry one out, but the master replied, "No," that he did not want to hurt his boat. The sails even, were not used in attempting to float her as the tide rose. What would have been the course of a master sincerely regretting the disaster, and anxious to remedy it at once with the least expense to those whose property was confided to his custody? What could have prevented the carrying out of an anchor, and how promising must have been the prospect of success? No excuse has been offered; no denial of the reply made to the inquiry of the mate. Nothing was done toward relieving the vessel from the bottom. All such idea seems to have been at once abandoned, and the idea that she could not be floated without discharging accepted, as the master told his crew they might all turn in, as probably they would have to discharge the cargo on the next day. Under the circumstances, the fact that the master, instead of making some effort to relieve his vessel, caused signals to be displayed, by putting burning rags dipped in oil in the crosstrees, and accepted the idea that his cargo must be taken out, argues either gross inefficiency or willful neglect of duty. The next morning, as the tide rose, it appeared that the brig would float off without assistance, and nothing was done either to relieve her or control the direction of her coming off. So she was permitted to drift over the shoal upon which she had struck into a position from which the master considered the services of a pilot necessary to extricate her. In the meantime the look out on board of libelant's vessel, the Fearless, lying at anchor 11 or 12 miles distant, saw the signal light, very soon, if not immediately, after it was made, and reported it to Malone. He at once took on board 11 extra men from the shore, got under way, and was at the brig, ready to render assistance, the first thing in the morning; but the vessel was nearly afloat before his arrival, and his services were not accepted. It has been argued that the refusal of Capt. Moulton to employ Malone, or permit him to assist his vessel at this time, is a conclusive answer to the charge of collusion. Had he used every power of his own to rescue his vessel, and taken such precautions as had prevented a further disaster, this would, I grant, have been so; but he did neither, and the result was apparently much more favorable to Malone, than had his services been accepted in the first instance. The vessel was about floating, and shortly after she drifted off by the force of the current. There was at that time no opportunity to discharge cargo, carry out an anchor, or render any apparently valuable service, so as to deceive the most simple as to its necessity.

A man will seldom if ever commit a crime without a motive. In the present instance what motive, if any, could have actuated Capt. Moulton to have entered into a collusive arrangement for the procuring of an opportunity to assist his vessel but a chance to make money for himself? And this could have been accomplished only by a division of salvage with the master of the vessel assisting him. Had assistance been rendered the first time ashore, no court or board of arbitrators could have given any considerable amount of salvage, and the service would have been as nothing compared with what a subsequent opportunity offered. The result shows that if there was at that time a collusive understanding with Capt. Moulton, the very course was taken to not only enable him to share more largely, but at the same time relieve him in a great degree from responsibility of the disaster by having his vessel in charge of a pilot. After his vessel had been permitted to drift over the shoal upon which she had struck into difficult navigation, Capt. Moulton brought her to anchor and inquired for a pilot, and one Hanna, belonging to another wrecking schooner which had arrived, presented himself, with good recommendations, and was accepted. with the understanding, as Moulton says, that if he got the brig out clear he was to receive $200. The master of the Fearless testifies in the main case that he left the brig just after she floated, and started on his Key West trip, and, in speaking of Hanna, selected as pilot, disclaimed any acquaintance with him, speaking of him contemptuously as if he would scorn the idea of any intimacy; yet we find, upon a further examination of the case, that, after Hanna had been employed as pilot Malone took him on board his vessel, the Fearless, where they remained from an hour to an hour and a half, and upon coming back to the brig both went aft and had a conversation with Capt. Moulton and that, instead of starting on his Key West trip, he remained on board the brig nearly all day, and, upon leaving, anchored his vessel for the night but about four miles from her. Lunn, the mate, states that, while lying at anchor that day, upon his asking the pilot if he thought he could get her out, he pushed up against him and, in reply, asked: "Why; do you want her to come out?" This remark, in view of the surrounding circumstances, convinces me that there was in the mind of the pilot the idea that there were some who did not want her to come out, and that that idea had come to him in such a manner that he had no fear in mentioning it to even the chief mate of the vessel. Had the vessel finally come out safely, we might look upon this as a meaningless remark, but as the result shows she did not come out, it becomes one of no small significance.

It is intimated by the claimant that there may have been collusion between the libelant, the pilot, and the mate. Everything tends to disprove the mate's complicity, and nothing to support it. He could have had nothing to do with first running the vessel ashore, and was the most ready in suggesting means to get her afloat. It is beyond his power to influence the employment of assistance, and there was no need of his aid, or motive for him to engage in such a scheme. Such idea is too unsupported to require a moment's consideration. But is it at all probable that the pilot would have suggested this idea of some one's not wanting the brig to come off to the mate, unless he had reason to believe some one beside Malone and himself were in the plot? This remark of the pilot explains what followed. The next morning the brig got under way with a light, fair wind, she heading N. W. with a S. W. wind. The water was so clear that, as Malone says, you could see anything on the bottom distinctly, and he found no necessity for sounding to ascertain the depth when wanting to carry out an anchor soon afterward. She was drawing less than 10 feet, in charge of a pilot whose home was in the immediate vicinity, and to whom the bottom must have been as familiar as his own dooryard. It was high water. Yet, notwithstanding all these favorable circumstances, no sooner had the tide commenced to fall than she struck again. Libelant Malone, whose vessel was still at anchor, waiting apparently until wanted, was soon on hand ready to assist, and his crew was employed to discharge cargo, carry out an anchor. and get her afloat. This they did during the day, and brought her to anchor for the night. Capt. Moulton's course toward the pilot Hanna, after his vessel is again afloat, appears open to severe criticism, and adds materially to the accumulated presumption of bad faith. Although Hanna had, after his employment as pilot, been on intimate terms with Malone, and, after undertaking to pilot the brig out, had got her aground without, as I can see, the least extenuating circumstances, and given him an opportunity to earn a large salvage, yet Capt. Moulton appears to have had no suspicions of him, but on the contrary says that as he had not then got out from among the shoals he still wanted his assistance. He kept him on board his vessel, and brought him to Key West, a distance of nearly 300 miles. He had come but a short distance from home for an apparently temporary service; had been employed conditionally, and failed in his undertaking, forfeited all compensation, and not only that, but given Capt. Moulton a right to have any feeling but a kindly one towards him; yet, notwithstanding this, he sets him to taking account of cargo, and permits him to remain on board and do duty in place of his first mate, who had sprained his wrist. In explanation, Capt. Moulton says: "When we passed Settlement Point, where the pilot belonged, we were some 6 or 8 miles distant, and the pilot said it would cost him something for a boat to get ashore. He wanted to go to Key West to see some friends, and asked me if I would take him, which I consented to do, telling him he might have to work, as my mate had sprained his wrist."

Now let us see how this explanation agrees with the facts of the case. Both Capt. Moulton and Malone say they first started for Nassau, until the wind came ahead. Now, if bound towards Nassau, with the current of the Gulf Stream sweeping rapidly to the northward, why was Capt. Moulton 6 or 8 miles distant when passing Settlement Point when the Fearless had anchored within 800 or 900 feet of the same shore? Again, the Fearless had on board 11 men, whom she landed at the Point, and the brig was in company and exchanged passengers, showing conclusively that, while there, there was communication both between the Fearless and the shore and the brig and the Fearless, which offered every opportunity for the pilot's going ashore. If the brig was shorthanded, the Fearless had an overbundant crew, whose interest in her not only permitted but demanded that they should furnish help to work her into port. If the pilot was anxious about the amount he says it would cost him to get ashore from the brig Pedro, how did he contemplate returning from Key West, unless he had such a claim on Malone as would authorize him to demand a gratuitous passage, or he was expecting to receive compensation for some service? Notwithstanding the fact that he had run a vessel ashore with no possible excuse, and lost the $200 he was to have earned, he takes the matter so coolly as to immediately plan a visit to some friends at a distance, and had the audacity to ask a passage for nine days' voyage from the man he had so recently injured. Can it be believed that he considered he had lost his $200, or greatly offended Capt. Moulton? The presumption that his object in coming to Key West was rather to look after interests that he had in the hands of Capt. Moulton or Malone is too strong to be easily overcome. The coming to Key West, a distance of 270 miles, the greater part of the way directly against the current of the Gulf Stream, instead of going to Nassau, but 150 miles, with a favorable current, which is said was on account of head winds, although of but slight importance, yet favors the hypothesis of collusion rather than otherwise, as in all such cases it is desirable to remove the place of examination and settlement as far as possible from the place of agreement, where personal association and intimate relations might be more easily proven, and suspicious circumstances more readily remembered. The same may be said of the discharge of the brig's crew. Yet these are not inconsistent with an hypothesis of innocence, and were it not that they add to the presumption, already so strong, I should not mention them at all.

Reviewing at a glance the entire case, we find that the schooner left Nassau, waited two days and a half at Stirrup Key until the brig had come out and passed her, when she got under way, passed the brig, and is again passed by her, while at anchor at Settlement Point. The brig, while in sight a few miles beyond, is driven ashore by a current shown distinctly on a chart which had been in use by her master within 36 hours, at the furthest, before. Every circumstance promised an easy relief from the difficulty, but not an effort was made, but instead a signal light was displayed, and the crew told they might turn in, with the remark that they would have to discharge cargo the next day. This satisfies me that the master was willing she should remain there until discharged, and that, had he not been willing for her to go ashore, he would not have been so willing for her to remain; that in this he must have had some motive, and that motive must necessarily argue an understanding and agreement with some one by whose assistance money was to be made. The facts of the association of Malone with the pilot Hanna, and the subsequent running ashore of the brig, and that these awoke no suspicion in Capt. Moulton's mind, as well as the fact that the pilot was possessed of the idea that some interested parties were willing that she should not come out, satisfy me that the second grounding was neither accidental nor unintentional.

Wreckers are not responsible for the misconduct of masters in intentionally stranding their vessels, if innocent themselves of any collusion. The fact that Capt. Moulton ran his vessel ashore intentionally, or permitted her to go ashore through criminal neglect does not prove that Malone, by assisting him in relieving her, became a participant in his guilt. The guilt or innocence of Capt. Moulton has nothing to do with the question on trial, unless Malone is shown to have been implicated. Let us see how far he had been connected with the brig before his assisting her, and what will be a reasonable conclusion as to his knowledge of Capt. Moulton's intentions. He was in company with Capt. Moulton in Nassau. He came out, and although bound on a freighting voyage to Key West, stopped at Stirrup Key, where no freight offered, until the brig had passed in plain sight, then steered to the last port nearest his destination and came to anchor, although he had taken in no freight, but had cleared with the declared intention of stopping at the several ports of the Bahamas for cargo. The signal of the brig was seen almost immediately upon its being made, and so confident was he that there would be something to do that, although he had then a crew of 12 men, coming to anchor as he did about quarter past 8 in the evening, and getting under way at about 2 in the morning, he procured in the meantime 11 men from ashore. His was the first boat at the brig. He was in communication with the pilot and took him on board his vessel. He spent the greater part of the day on board the brig, and he and the pilot were aft in conversation with the master by themselves. He anchored his vessel that night where the brig could be easily reached. There was sufficient wind for the brig to get under way in the morning, but the Fearless, with her extra crew, remained until again needed, and was the first ready to render assistance. If it was the intention of Malone, at the time of clearing from Nassau, to stop at but one point, and he was willing that that should be known, it would naturally be presumed that he would clear for Bimini via Settlement Point; but if he intended to stop at other points, why do we find him leaving all such behind him for the sake of being at Settlement Point at a certain time? The moment we conclude that Capt. Moulton intended to permit his vessel to go ashore, we must also conclude that he had a partner in the arrangement. Nothing could be made without a division of earnings, and he was not going to risk the consequences with no prospect of compensation. The idea of a co-conspirator can point to no one but Malone.

It is not necessary to show the character or extent of the collusion, or whether they entered into any particular agreement in relation to the part which each was to act, or the proportion of the spoils each was to share. It is sufficient to show such a state of facts as induces a reasonable presumption that they understood each other, and understood that the property was to be put in jeopardy, and something could be made by assisting it. I am not unmindful of the importance of the conclusions reached to the parties interested, but I have not arrived at them without a critical examination of the facts in their every bearing, and until satisfied that the circumstances are utterly inconsistent with the idea of innocence. These circumstances, each one perhaps trivial in itself, when united and examined together, form in my mind proof of collusion as nearly positive as the ordinary connection between known and inferred facts may ever permit. No party associated in any way with libelant Malone can receive anything, and the libel must be dismissed.

[NOTE. At a subsequent date, F. Englehard & Co., filed a libel, in this court, against the Pedro, for damages to cargo. In the meantime the vessel had been sold under a decree entered in this cause, and the proceeds brought into court. The damages proven by Englehardt & Co. far exceeded the whole proceeds from the sale of the vessel. So at this hearing it was decreed that the libelant should receive the whole proceeds of the sale, after the payment of all costs, expenses, taxes, wages of the crew, and the costs of the suit then before the court. Case No. 4,489.]

MALONE (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 15,713.

Case No. 8,996.

MALONE v. WESTERN TRANSP. CO.

[5 Biss. 315.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. June, 1873.

MASTER AND SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—PLEADING NEGLIGENCE—DUTY OF SERVANT—OF SHIP OWNER—FELLOW SERVANTS.

1. In an action by an employe against a corporation for injuries received in falling through a hatchway, it is not a sufficient allegation that the master and mates were negligent in leaving the hatchway open and not placing proper lights or guards around it.

2. As a corporation can only act through agents, the only proper charge of negligence in such case is that the boat was improperly constructed and that the accident happened by reason of such defective construction while the plaintiff was exercising due care.

3. A person employed on a boat to assist in unloading must be presumed to possess the usual knowledge in regard to the construction of the vessel, and unless the hatch was located in an unusual place he is bound to know its location, and it is as much his duty to see that the hatch is closed or properly protected as it is the duty of the captain or mates.

4. A ship owner who provides a sea-worthy vessel, properly equipped, and commanded by competent officers, has discharged his duty towards the subordinates, and cannot be held liable for mere neglect of the officers.

5. Subordinates must be deemed to have entered upon the service with the understanding that they took their chances of negligence or carelessness on the part of others engaged in the common employment.

[Cited in Couillard v. The Victoria, 4 Fed. 160; The Egyptian Monarch, 36 Fed. 776, 777.]

This was an action on the case to recover damages for injuries received by plaintiff [Thomas Malone] in falling through a hatchway while in the employ of defendant. The declaration alleges that defendant was on the 14th of August, 1870, owner of the propeller Chicago, then lying in Chicago river, in this city; that plaintiff was employed as a laborer on board of said propeller to assist in the discharge of a cargo; that it became and was the duty of the master and mates of said vessel to use due care and diligence for the protection of plaintiff from accident or injury, while so employed; that said propeller was removed from her dock, near State-street bridge, in the night-time, to the dock of the Chicago Dock Company, on the South branch, when plaintiff, about four o'clock, a. m., on the 15th of August, while it was yet dark, was ordered to remove certain platforms for threshing machines, which stood in the middle gangway on the starboard side of the boat, to the larboard side of the boat for the purpose of making room to get at some freight to be landed on said dock; that there was a hatchway known as the "middle hatch" in said gangway, which was carelessly and negligently by defendant and the master and mates of said boat left open without any guard or signal-lights around the same, and while engaged in removing said platforms as directed by the officers of said boat, and in the exercise of due care and diligence, plaintiff, by reason of said hatchway being left open and unprotected and without proper lights, fell through said hatchway into the hold of the same, and was greatly injured. Defendant filed a general demurrer.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

H. Cummings, for plaintiff, cited the following authorities: Dixon v. Ranken, 1 Am. Ry. Cas. 569; Farwell v. Boston & W. Railroad, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 49; Gallagher v. Piper, cited in Lovegrove v. London, B. & S. C. Ry. Co., 16 C. B. (N. S.) 669; Snow v. Housatonic Railroad, 8 Allen, 441; Curley v. Harris, 11 Allen, 112; Chamberlain v. Milwaukee & M. Railroad, 11 Wis. 238, 252; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Swett, 45 Ill. 197; Perry v. Marsh, 25 Ala. 659; Walker v. Bolling, 22 Ala. 294.

Miller & Frost, for defendant, cited the following authorities: Farwell v. Boston & W. Railroad, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 49; Albro v. Agawam Canal Co., 6 Cush. 75; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Cox, 21 Ill. 20; Honner v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 15 Ill. 550; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Keefe, 47 Ill. 108; Saund. Neg. 128, 144, and cases there cited; Morgan v. Vale of Neath Ry. Co., 5 Best & S. 570; Gallagher v. Piper, cited in Lovegrove v. London, B. & S. C. Ry. Co., 16 C. B. (N. S.) 669; 1 Redf. Rys. 521.

BLODGETT, District Judge. The only question is whether there is a sufficient cause of action set out in the declaration. Defendant, being a corporation, can only act through agents, and as there is no allegation that the boat was improperly constructed and so made dangerous to plaintiff, or that the accident in question happened by reason of such defective construction while plaintiff was exercising due care, I cannot see that the allegations of negligence by defendant directly are of any weight, and the case must be considered as standing solely on the allegations as to the negligence of the master and mates.

The master, mates and crew of the vessel were all employes of defendant, each with different duties, but all engaged in a common employment, which at this particular time was that of unloading this boat. But the plaintiff claims that he was acting in an inferior capacity and under the orders of the officers of the boat.

I am aware that there are adjudged cases making the distinction insisted upon by plaintiff. Little Miami R. Co. v. Stevens, 20 Ohio, 415; Gillenwater v. Madison & I. R. Co., 5 Ind. 340; Chamberlain v. Milwaukee & M. Railroad, 11 Wis. 238, 252. But the rule is undoubtedly well settled in this state and England, that an employer is not liable to a servant for injuries occasioned by the negligence of a fellow servant. Honner v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 15 Ill. 550; Farwell v. Boston & W. Railroad, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 49; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Cox, 21 Ill. 20; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Keefe, 47 Ill. 108. I am aware that there is a class of cases in this state holding that a railroad company is liable to an employé for not furnishing safe cars or roadway. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Swett, 45 Ill. 197; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Jewell, 46 Ill. 99.

And the same rule, I think, was adopted in this court in the case of Daniel v. C. & R. I. R. R. Co.[2] by Judges Davis and Drummond. But this case contains no substantive allegation of negligence on the part of defendant itself in not providing a safe boat or one constructed in the usual manner, and, as I said before, no such allegations of negligence are made against defendant as bring the case within the rule in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Swett, supra, and the class to which it belongs. The declaration in substance charges that the accident to plaintiff happened by reason of the negligence of the master and mates in leaving the hatch open and not placing proper lights or guards around it.

Plaintiff must be presumed to possess the usual knowledge in regard to the construction of steamboats, and as there is no allegation that this hatch was in an unusual place, he certainly ought to have known that there was a hatch there. His own senses would tell him it was dark, and admonish him to use care. He was passing from one side of the boat to the other, where he should have known, and, I think, must be presumed to have known, there was a hatchway. It was as much his duty to see that the hatch was closed, or properly protected if open, as it was the captain's or mate's. No one, I presume, will claim that it was the duty of the master or mate to close the hatch or hang up a light. They had the general supervision of the boat, and it was their duty to see that each one employed in the work of managing the boat performed the work allotted to him. This is the utmost of their duty, but if they neglected that duty, and the plaintiff was injured by reason of the negligence of a deck hand who should have closed the hatch, or a porter who should have hung up a light, it is but the negligence of a fellow servant, in and about a common business. There is no charge of incompetency on the part of the officers. And it seems to me the ship-owner cannot be held liable for mere neglect of officers to perform their duty. If he provides a seaworthy ship, properly equipped, and commanded by competent officers, he has discharged his duty toward the subordinates. They must be deemed to have entered upon the service with the understanding that they take the chances of the neglect or carelessness of any or all others who are engaged in the common employment and occupation of loading, unloading or running the boat. Demurrer sustained.

[2] [Case unreported.]

NOTE. It is the doctrine of the Illinois supreme court that the employer is not responsible to the employé for injuries occasioned by the negligence of his fellow servant engaged in the same line of employment. Honner v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 15 Ill. 550; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Cox, 21 Ill. 20; Moss v. Johnson, 22 Ill. 633; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Murphy, 53 Ill. 336; Same v. Keefe, 47 Ill. 108.

But it is nevertheless the duty of the employer to provide safe structures and apparatus, competent employés and all appliances necessary to the safety of the employed. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. George, 19 Ill. 510; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Swett, 45 Ill. 197; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Jewell, 46 Ill. 99; The Norway v. Jensen, 52 Ill. 373; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Jackson, 55 Ill. 492; Perry v. Ricketts, Id. 234; and the recent case of Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Taylor [69 Ill. 461].

See, however, an employé of a railroad company may recover damages for personal injuries due to the neglect of agents of the company, whose duty it was to keep engines in proper repair, even though the directors and superintendent had no reason to susupect negligence or incompetency on the part of such agents. Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co., 110 Mass. 240. Nor is he barred from recovering for injuries sustained by a boiler explosion, by the fact that he was acting in intentional violation of the rules of the company, unless the accident was due to such violation; nor by a rule of the company providing that he must be responsible for the condition of his engine. Id.

Case No. 8,997.

MALONEY v. BUTTERLY et al.

[N. Y. Times, April 16, 1864.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1864.

AFFREIGHTMENT — BILL OF LADING — RECEIPT BY CONSIGNEE—REPRESENTATIONS.

[A bill of lading stating, according to representations by the shipper, the weight of cargo shipped without weighing, binds the consignee, after receipt without weighing, to pay freight for the stated weight.]

This was a libel for freight [by James Maloney against Peter Butterly and others].

The libelant, who was owner of the barge John Maloney, took on board her at Philadelphia a cargo of coal, to be carried to New York. The coal was put on board by the vendor, consigned to the respondents. It was not laden on board by weight, but was received by the libelant on the representation of the shipper, and the libelant signed a bill of lading on those representations, acknowledging the receipt of 209 tons of coal on board, and agreeing to deliver it to the respondents at New York. The vessel arrived in New York, and the assignees of the bill of lading received the coal. They did not exact a measurement or weight of it as delivered from the boat, but carried it across the city to their own yard, where it was weighed, without the supervision of the carrier; and they then declared that it was six tons short, and declined to pay freight on that amount.

Mr. Donovan and Judge Whiting, for libelant.

Mr. Brown, for respondents.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

HELD BY THE COURT: That a rule of greater stringency may prevail as to a purchase and sale of property than is exacted in relation to a mere bailment of it for carriage. That the vendor of the coal acted as agent or factor of the purchaser, and is reasonably bound to satisfy the carriage price to the carrier, if the consignee does not accept the consignment, and pay the agreed price at the place of destination. That the respondents are concluded from taking the defence of short weight. They are to be regarded as the factors of the consignor as well as consignees, and in that capacity to have virtually admitted and liquidated the quantity of the cargo, in relation to the freight payable to the carrier. A difference of quantity on the adjustment of the transaction between consignor and consignee must be adjusted between them. They are both to be regarded as having assented through their acts and acquiescences to the rightfulness of the libelant's demand as an agreed compensation for the services rendered.

Decree for the libelant for his claim, with interest.

MALONEY v. SEARS. See Case No. 7,494.

Case No. 8,998.

MALTBY et al. v. BOBO.

[14 Blatchf. 53; 2 Ban. & A. 459.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 18, 1876.

PATENTS—INFRINGEMENT—INJUNCTION—NO INTEREST.

The fact that a defendant who has sold an article which infringes on a patent, sold it on behalf of its owner, and had no interest in it, or in its sale, is no ground for refusing to grant an injunction against him.

[Cited in Steiger v. Heidelberger, 4 Fed. 458; Estes v. Worthington, 30 Fed. 465; Armstrong v. Savannah Soap Works, 53 Fed. 126.]

[This was a bill by Douglass F. Maltby and others against Angus L. Bobo for an injunction to restrain certain infringements.]

Francis Forbes, for plaintiffs.

Andrew J. Todd, for defendant.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The plaintiffs' bill of complaint contains all the averments of fact to make out their right and the infringement thereof by the defendant. The facts are verified by the usual oath. The right of the plaintiffs is further supported by affidavit, showing that the plaintiffs have obtained against another defendant, in this court, an interlocutory injunction, and that, after some litigation, defendant submitted to a decree. Upon this state of the case an injunction is moved for. The defendant presents no denial of any of the alleged facts, by affidavit or otherwise, but only alleges, by way of plea, that, in selling the nail pullers mentioned in the bill, he was acting as salesman for one Dickerman, the owner of the nail-pullers, and that he had no interest in the nail-pullers, or in the sale of them, except as the employee of Dickerman, to dispose of the same. The plea has been set down for argument, but has not yet been heard; but I do not understand, that any absolute rule of practice prevents the granting of an injunction in such a case. It is, of course, necessary to look at the sufficiency of the plea, which I regard as presenting no defence to the bill. A wrong-doer cannot set up that he is doing wrong on account of a third person, as a bar to his own responsibility. The principal, also, may be liable, if the injured party elects to look to him; but the person who is actually doing the wrong cannot escape liability. Inasmuch, therefore, as the case made by the bill is wholly undefended, and as the plea states the fact which is, in law, an infringement, an injunction must be granted.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge; reprinted in 2 Ban. & A. 459; and here republished by permission.]

Case No. 8,999.

MALTBY v. CONVERSE.

[Cited in Maltby v. Graham, 35 Fed. 206, 37 Fed. 691. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 9,000.

MALTBY v. STEAM DERRICK BOAT.

[3 Hughes, 477.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Virginia. March 29, 1879.

SALVAGE—RAISED FROM BOTTOM OF CHANNEL—DERRICK-BOAT.

A derrick-boat raised from the bottom of the channel of a public navigable river may be the subject of a libel for salvage in admiralty.

[Cited in Cope v. Vallette Dry-Dock Co., 16 Fed. 926; Aitcheson v. Endless Chain Dredge, 40 Fed. 254.]

[This was a libel by E. O. Maltby against a steam derrick-boat for salvage.]

R. M. Hughes, for libellants.

W. B. Martin, for Albemarle & C. Canal Co., intervener and claimant.

HUGHES, District Judge. This is a libel in rem for salvage in raising a sunken steam derrick-boat from the channel of the Blackwater river, near Franklin, Virginia. The libellants sent around from Norfolk to the wreck for the purpose, by way of Currituck and Albemarle sound, a wrecking schooner, furnished with chains, pumps, two divers, and a crew of two or three other men. The work of raising consumed about four days; but the schooner remained somewhat longer by the side of the derrick-boat until the hole in her bottom was made entirely safe and stanch. The schooner was gone from Norfolk in making the trip to and fro, and in executing the job, about fifteen days. The derrick-boat had been in the employment of the United States, on a hire of $250 a month, in removing obstructions to navigation from the channel, when it sprung aleak and sunk in ten feet water. It was owned by the Albemarle & Chesapeake Canal Company, of which Marshall Parks is president. The salving was undertaken by the libellant at the request both of Mr. Parks and of the United States officer in charge of the derrick-boat. The boat had no machinery for propulsion, or sails. It was a boat of two decks, with a mast for hoisting purposes, and a steam-engine and machinery. The United States continued to use the derrick-boat after it was raised from the channel by the libellants, and returned it in good condition to the Albemarle & Chesapeake Canal Company, after having had it in possession, in all, about four months. The vessel was libelled in this cause after its restoration to the possession of the company. The company intervenes in this suit by answer, and objects to the amount of salvage claimed, and also to the jurisdiction of the admiralty court over the case, on the ground that the derrick-boat was not designed for navigation or commerce.

I shall consider in this opinion only the latter objection. It is contended in argument that a derrick-boat is not the subject of this jurisdiction, because it is not used in commerce and navigation. This might be a valid objection if the libel were for contract of affreightment, or for tort by collision, or such cause of action; but it is not a valid objection to a libel for salvage. It has long been held that property, whether it has been an actual instrument or subject of commerce or not, may be the subject of salvage.

In the case of The Emulous [Case No. 4,480], Judge Story held, in 1832, that salvage service extended to all property "saved on the sea or wrecked on the coast of the sea." In the case of The Emblem [Id. 4,434], Judge Ware, one of the most learned and soundest admiralty lawyers, awarded salvage from saving the trunks of a passenger containing silver coin. The coin was property forming no part of the cargo of the vessel. In the case of Hennessey v. The Versailles [Id. 6,365], Mr. Justice Curtis said: "The relief of property from an impending peril of the sea, by the voluntary exertions of those who are under no legal obligations, etc., constituted a technical case of salvage." In the two cases of A Raft of Spars [Cases Nos. 11,528, 11,529], Judge Betts decided in the latter case that such property was a proper subject for a libel for salvage, and in the former case refused to order the salvage suit to be set aside or to be stayed because there was a replevin suit pending in a court of common law for the salvaged property. In Taber v. Jenney [Case No. 13,720], a libel in admiralty was sustained by Judge Sprague to recover the value of the carcass of a whale which had been found floating in whaling waters by the defendants, and taken and converted to their own use. In the case of The Union Express [Id. 11,363], Judge Longyear held that a barge found adrift in Lake St. Clair was subject of salvage. In the case of Fifty Thousand Feet of Timber [Id. 4,783], Judge Lowell held, notwithstanding two or three adverse decisions, hereafter mentioned, which he cited and reviewed, that a raft of timber was a proper subject of a libel for salvage, and defined the law to be that "a salvage service is performed when goods are saved from the peril of the sea, or on other navigable waters; or cast upon the shores thereof." The same judge held the same view in a valuable and learned judgment in the case of The Louisa Jane [Id. 8,532], where he held that a specific "contract for saving property on the sea or in a harbor, did not oust the admiralty court's jurisdiction of a proceeding in rem or in personam, brought by the contractor himself." There is no judge whose decisions carry greater authority with the profession than those of Judge Lowell. In the case of Cheesman v. Two Ferry-boats [Id. 2,633], Judge Leavitt held that two new and never-used ferry-boats, which had been brought down to Cincinnati for the purpose of being put upon one of the ferries there, and moored at high-water mark above the city, on the Ohio side, which had broken loose during a great flood and been saved, not by landsmen on shore, but by a steamboat which encountered perils of the flood by doing so, many miles below on the Ohio river, were the proper subjects of a libel for salvage. There is also the case of The Senator [Id. 12,664], which was that of a scow, loaded with lumber, water-logged and abandoned on Lake Erie, and saved, in which Judge Longyear held that a libel for salvage was proper. I know of but two American admiralty cases which are decidedly adverse to the rulings which have been thus cited. One of them is the case of The Hendrik Hudson [Id. 6,355],—an old steamboat fitted up as a floating hotel,—which is directly against them; and the other is the case of Tome v. Cribs of Lumber [Id. 14,083]. This latter case, however, is not directly adverse. The rafts of lumber were saved on the shore of the Chesapeake bay, below the mouth of the Susquehanna river, where they had been moored, and had broken loose in a high freshet. They were saved by farmers and landsmen, who had incurred no risk and exercised no peculiar skill in saving them; but who had merely taken possession of them when they floated near the shore, and fastened them to trees on the shore. The service was wholly destitute of commercial or maritime attributes. These are the only American cases of which I know where the character of the property saved was made the objection to the admiralty jurisdiction in cases of salvage, and where the decision was adverse and based upon the non-commercial character of the property saved. The weight of the American authorities is, therefore, heavily against these two decisions, and I am constrained to disregard them, and to hold that any valuable property may be the subject of a libel for salvage in admiralty, provided that it shall have been saved under conditions which of themselves give the admiralty jurisdiction.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

In the case at bar the saving was done by persons engaged in wrecking service, and furnished with and using a wrecking schooner and other wrecking appliances; and the principal and pivotal question is, was the saving done within the territorial theatre of the admiralty jurisdiction? The property saved was such as could be the subject of a libel for salvage; was the place where it was saved within that jurisdiction? The derrick-boat was sunk in the channel of a navigable river—navigable from the sea. The government of the United States was using the boat at the time in clearing away obstructions to the navigation.

It was formerly held that the admiralty jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, like that of the English courts, extended only to tide-waters. But, since the decision of the supreme court of the United States in The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 449 (a decision which has been followed by a series of like decisions, more and more liberal on this point), the test of the admiralty jurisdiction, as to locality, has been the inquiry, was the water in question a public navigable water? And, therefore, the law of those cases which hold that property "saved on the sea or wrecked on the coast of the sea" must be read with the additional words, "or on the public navigable rivers and waters of the United States." The cases to which I have just referred are the following: The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 449; Fretz v. Bull, Id. 446; The Magnolia, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 296; The Commerce, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 574; The Hine, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 555; The Belfast, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 624, and other cases.

Before these cases arose there had been a period in the history of the American law in which our courts had made their rulings in accordance with the rulings of the English courts, which English decisions had been made during a period when, through the jealousy of the high common-law courts, the jurisdiction of the admiralty in England had been much trammelled. But our courts have felt, and acted upon, the necessity of emancipating themselves from these English influences for many years, so that early English precedents on the subject of the admiralty jurisdiction are not regarded in this country. Indeed, they have ceased to be law even in England, where in May, 1861, parliament interfered, and, by special act in regard to the jurisdiction of the admiralty, struck off the shackles which had bound it for centuries, and gave to admiralty courts in England the broad and liberal jurisdiction which they possess in the world at large. It was during the period of the original rulings of our American admiralty courts, and the subsequent transition period of opinion as to the character of the waters in which the jurisdiction of admiralty could be exercised, that some decisions were rendered by our courts tending to throw doubt on the question of the character of the property which was the subject of libel for salvage in admiralty. But I think the test as to what is the subject of salvage is no longer, whether it is a vessel engaged in commerce or its cargo or furniture, but whether the thing saved is a movable thing, possessing the attributes of property, susceptible of being lost and saved in places within the local jurisdiction of the admiralty. There are cases in the books in which the courts have denied salvage where property other than vessels of navigation or their furniture or cargoes has been saved; but these will nearly all be found to have turned on questions of place, or questions not affecting the character of the thing saved. The Ann Arbor [Case No. 408], decided in 1858, was that of a canal-boat libelled on a contract of affreightment made in Rochester at the west end of the Erie canal, in which it was held that such a contract by a canal-boat made far inland was not within the admiralty jurisdiction, though process of arrest was executed on the Hudson river. But this was not a case of libel for salvage. In Jones v. Coal Barges [Id. 7,458], decided in 1855, the libel was for a collision just below a lock in the Monongahela river in the mountains of Pennsylvania; and the court decided that the case depended upon the act of congress of February, 1845 [5 Stat. 726], giving admiralty jurisdiction upon the great lakes "and the rivers and waters connecting" them. The Monongahela was not such a river, and the court on that ground denied the jurisdiction of the admiralty to entertain a libel for that collision in such a stream. It is plain that that case did not decide that coal-boats were not proper subjects of a libel for salvage. There are several cases in which libels have been filed for injuries to flat-boats and their cargoes, inflicted by steamboats on our Western rivers, which have gone up by appeals to the supreme court of the United States. In none of these cases has a doubt been intimated by the supreme court that they were properly cases within the admiralty cognizance. In the case of Fretz v. Bull, before cited, damages were allowed against the owners of a steamboat for running into and sinking a flat-boat. This was a case of collision, in which the jurisdiction is much more doubtful as to the property concerned than in cases for salvage. The cases of Culbertson v. Shaw, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 585, and Nelson v. Leland, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 48, were of collisions by steamers with flat-boats or barges. Surely if such boats as these could be made the subject of admiralty jurisdiction by libels for collision, a derrick-boat may be held to be a proper subject for a libel for salvage. I so hold in the present case.

As to the merits, the facts seem to be these: the libellant proves an expenditure of money, $600 in cash, in the work of raising the derrick-boat, and that his wrecking schooner was engaged in and about the job some two weeks, which must have been worth $10 a day, at the least, or $150. The derrick-boat, I think from all the evidence in the case, must have been worth, when raised, not less than $2000 or $2500. A decree may be taken for $750 and costs.

Case No. 9,001.

MALTBY v. TOOL CO.

[Cited in Maltby v. Graham, 35 Fed. 206, 37 Fed. 691. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 9,002.

MALTZ et al. v. AMERICAN EXP. CO.

[1 Flip. 611;[1] 3 Cent. Law J. 784.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Michigan. Nov., 1876.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — JOINT STOCK ASSOCIATION —CITIZENSHIP.

Where a joint stock association was organized under the laws of New York, having the privilege of perpetual succession and the right of making contracts in the name of such association, and of suing and of being sued in the name of its president or treasurer, it is to be deemed a citizen of that state, at least so far that an action can be maintained against it by a citizen of another state in a federal court, without regard to the citizenship of the individual members composing such association.

[Cited in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Adams Exp. Co., 22 Fed. 408; Imperial Refining Co. v. Wyman, 38 Fed. 579.]

This was a motion to remand a case removed from the superior court of Detroit. Petition stated that plaintiffs were citizens of Michigan, and that "the defendant was, at the time said suit was commenced, a joint stock association, organized and existing under the laws of the state of New York, having its principal office in that state, and is within the meaning of the acts of congress, a citizen of the said state of New York." The motion was based upon the ground that the case was not removable, and accordingly this court had no jurisdiction of the parties or matter in suit.

Alfred Russell, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Speed, for defendant.

[1] [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

BROWN, District Judge. The earlier construction of the constitution, which regarded the citizenship of a corporation as depending upon that of its individual corporators, was fully overthrown in the case of Louisville R. Co. v. Letson, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 497, and the modern rule there declared, "that a corporation created by, and doing business in, a particular state, is to be deemed, to all intents and purposes as a person, though an artificial person, an inhabitant of the same state, for the purposes of its incorporation, capable of being treated as a citizen of that state, as much as a natural person."

This doctrine has since been strictly adhered to, though the question has been repeatedly called to the attention of the court. Marshall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 16 How. [57 U. S.] 314; Covington Drawbridge Co. v. Shepard, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 233; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 297; Cowles v. Mercer Co., 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 118. Indeed, in delivering the opinion in the case of Letson, Mr Justice Swayne, speaking of the early decisions, observes: "By none was the correctness of them more questioned than by the late chief justice, who gave them. It is within the knowledge of several of us, that he repeatedly expressed regret that those decisions had been made, adding, whenever the subject was mentioned, that if the question of jurisdiction was an original one, the conclusion would be different. We think we may safely assert that a majority of the members of this court have at all times partaken of the same regret, and that, whenever a case has occurred on the circuit, involving an application of the case of Bank of U. S. v. Deveaux [5 Cranch (9 U. S.) 61], it was yielded to because the decision had been made, and not because it was thought to be right." The right of a corporation to sue as a citizen of the state creating it is no longer susceptible of argument.

In the present case, the petition avers that the defendant was, at the time suit was commenced, "a joint stock association, organized and existing under the laws of the state of New York, having its principal office in said state, and is, within the meaning of the acts of congress, a citizen of said state of New York." Taking judicial notice, as this court is bound to do, of the laws of the state of New York, I find that joint stock associations are recognized by statute, and endowed with the following attributes of corporations:

1st—They may sue and be sued in the name of their president or treasurer. 3 Rev. St. (Ed. 1875) p. 762. For this purpose the officer is regarded as a corporation sole; he is a representative of the company, distinguished from the individuals composing it, and a suit may be brought against him by other shareholders in the company. Westcott v. Fargo, 61 N. Y. 542; Cross v. Jackson, 5 Hill, 478. No such suit abates by reason of the death, removal or resignation of the officer so sued, but may be continued against his successor. 3 Rev. St. p. 763. The officer so sued is not personally liable. Id.

2d—Its capital is represented by certificates of stock. Id. p. 764.

3d—Neither the death of a stockholder, nor the assignment of his stock, works a dissolution of the company; in other words, they are endowed with perpetual succession, or, as it is termed, the immortality of corporations. Id.

4th—They may take, hold and convey real estate in the name of their president, and in perpetual succession. 2 Rev. St. p. 402; Waterbury v. Merchants' Union Exp. Co., 50 Barb. 160.

Partnerships have none of these attributes. Indeed, except in the want of a common seal, these associations are corporations without the name. The definition of a corporation is quite broad enough to include associations of this character. In the work of Angell & Ames, it is defined as "a body, created by law, composed of individuals united under a common name, the members of which succeed each other, so that the body continues the same, notwithstanding the change of individuals who compose it, and is for certain purposes considered as a natural person."

Though the acts of New York, above cited, provide that joint stock companies shall not have the rights and privileges of corporations, they are expressly endowed with inherent qualities as such; and the constitution of the state (article 8, § 3) provides that the term corporations, as used in this article, shall "be construed to include all associations and joint stock companies having any of the powers or privileges of corporations not possessed by individuals or partnerships. And all corporations shall have a right to sue, and shall be subject to be sued, in all courts, in like cases as natural persons." It is true that stockholders are liable individually for the debts of the association. But this liability attaches only after an exhaustion of remedies against the joint property. 3 Rev. St. p. 763. As observed by the supreme court, this individual liability is by no means incompatible with the corporate idea. Liverpool Ins. Co. v. Massachusetts, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 566. Indeed, such liability is frequently imposed in favor of creditors of banks and claims for personal labor.

By the constitution of this state, the stockholders of all corporations and joint stock associations are placed upon the same footing, and are individually liable for all labor performed. Article 15, § 7. Nor is it material that its suits are brought in the name of its president, instead of the artificial name by which it contracts. "If it can contract in the artificial name, and sue and be sued in the name of its officers, on those contracts, it is in effect the same, for process would have to be served on some such officer, even if the suit were in the artificial name." Liverpool Ins. Co. v. Massachusetts, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.]

575. But whether a corporation or not, a joint stock association is a distinct legal entity, and so long as this fact exists, and it possesses the attributes of perpetual succession and the capacity of suing and being sued, it is a juridical person, a proper party in this court, and must be regarded as a citizen of the state which created it. I deem it wholly immaterial whether it be termed a corporation, joint stock association or guild.

Though the question here involved has never been decided by the court of last resort, it was held in the case of Liverpool Ins. Co. v. Massachusetts, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 566, that a joint stock association, endowed with privileges precisely similar to those possessed by the American Express Company, was a corporation within the meaning of an act of Massachusetts, imposing a tax upon insurance companies incorporated or associated under the laws of a foreign country, doing business in that state, notwithstanding parliament had provided that the act creating it should not be construed to incorporate the company or relieve its members from individual liability. The case of Pennsylvania v. Quicksilver Co., Id. 553, has no bearing upon the question at issue here. It was there held that the corporation was insufficiently described as "a body politic in the law of, and doing business in the state of, California," and the case turned solely upon the form of this allegation. As observed by the court, "it may mean that the defendant is a corporation doing business in that state by its agent; but not that it had been incorporated by the laws of the state. * * * Indeed, it was admitted in the argument that the defendant was a Pennsylvania corporation, and the jurisdiction sought to be sustained by a suit against this agency."

I find more difficulty in reconciling the views here expressed with the opinion of the court in Dinsmore v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. [Case No. 3,921]. Notwithstanding there are expressions in the opinion which would seem to indicate that the case turned upon the form of the allegation, the reasoning of the court is certainly susceptible of the construction that it regarded a joint stock association as incapable of suing in the federal court. I regret my inability to concur in this view. It is not intended to decide here whether this action is properly brought against the defendant by the name of the American Express Co.

The motion to remand must be denied.

Case No. 9,002a.

MAN v. CHEESEMAN.

[Bank Mag. (3d Series) 556, Jan., 1875.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 23, 1874.

NATIONAL BANKS — TRANSFER OF STOCK — PURCHASE BY BANK—RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF STOCKHOLDERS.

[1. A national bank cannot purchase its own stock.]

[2. To relieve a holder of national bank stock from the obligations imposed by the statute, a transfer by him must be made on the books of the bank to some person capable of succeeding to his obligations; the ordinary method of signing the power of attorney thereon is insufficient.]

[3. Stockholders of an insolvent national bank are bound by the action of the comptroller of the currency in making an assessment against them, and have no right to examine the accounts of the receiver as to the assets or debts of the bank.]

[This was an action by Albon P. Man, receiver of the Eighth National Bank, against G. H. Cheeseman to recover the amount of an assessment made by the comptroller of the currency, from the defendant as a stockholder therein.]

The case against Dr. Cheeseman was a peculiar one. He became an original subscriber in 1865 for 50 shares of stock in the Eighth National Bank. In May, 1867, at a time when the bank was in excellent credit, having a considerable surplus, and when its stock stood at par in the market, he determined to part with his 50 shares. He accidentally mentioned his purpose to the cashier of the bank, and that officer volunteered to dispose of them for him. Shortly after he informed Dr. Cheeseman that he had found a purchaser, and directed him to transfer the certificates by signing the ordinary power of attorney on them in blank. Dr. Cheeseman did so, and gave the certificates to the cashier, who credited his account with the par value of the stock. The cashier was the proper transfer officer of the bank, and Dr. Cheeseman followed his directions as to the manner of transfer. He heard no more of the matter until December, 1871, after the failure of the bank, when he was informed, by the receiver, that his name stood upon the shareholders' list, and that he was liable for his proportionate share of the bank's indebtedness. This suit was brought to enforce that liability. Upon the trial it was shown that this stock was actually purchased by the bank. The shares remained in possession of the bank, which collected all subsequent dividends upon them, and after its failure the shares were turned over to the receiver with the other assets.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge, held, that Dr. Cheeseman was liable for the assessment of 54 per cent. ordered by the comptroller, although he had parted with the shares four years before, on the ground that in order to escape liability a shareholder must see that his stock is transferred upon the books of the bank to some person capable of succeeding to his obligations, and that the bank was not such a person, being prohibited by law from purchasing its own stock. It follows from this that the ordinary method of transfer by signing the blank power of attorney will not protect the shareholder, and that in all cases of sales of such bank stock he remains liable until the transfer is made on the bank's books to his successor.

The measure of liability is also very severe. Two points were made by Dr. Cheeseman's counsel, as follows: First, that the liability was only for the deficiency, and could not be enforced until all the assets of the bank had been converted and applied by the receiver to the payment of the debts; and, second, that the shareholders liable for the deficiency are entitled to notice, and to some opportunity of ascertaining what the deficiency may be which they are called upon to make up. Both these points were overruled, the court holding that the shareholder was absolutely bound by the action of the comptroller in making the assessment, and that when such assessment had once been made the shareholder could interpose no defense against it. Thus shareholders are cut off from any examination of the accounts of the receiver or of the debts allowed against the bank.

Case No. 9,003.

In re MANAHAN.

[19 N. B. R. 65.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. July 3, 1878.

BANKRUPTCY — ASSIGNMENT — PROCEEDINGS IN STATE COURT — WARRANT OF POSSESSION TO MARSHAL—MOTION TO VACATE WARRANT.

Prior to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, the bankrupt made a voluntary assignment for creditors to one R., who thereupon took possession, but failed to give the bond required by the statute. By virtue of a provisional warrant granted in the bankruptcy proceedings, the marshal took possession of the property which had been transferred to R. by the voluntary assignment. Upon proper proceedings subsequently had in the state court, R. was removed, and a new trustee appointed. On motion by the trustee to vacate the warrant, and for an order directing the marshal to deliver the property to him, held, that the provisional warrant did not authorize the marshal to take possession of the property the title to which had passed by the state assignment to the voluntary assignee; that pending the question of adjudication and the appointment of an assignee, the court should not allow its process to interfere with the possession by the state assignee of the property; but since the trustee appeals to the bankrupt court for aid, reasonable conditions on granting the relief may be imposed, such as that he shall release the marshal from all damages for taking and keeping the property, pay his fees, and receive said property subject to the condition that he shall not dispose of any part thereof until a reasonable time after the appointment of an assignee, or the termination of the proceedings, except with the approval of the bankrupt court.

[In the matter of Thomas Manahan, a bankrupt.]

G. W. Lockwood, for motion.

P. W. Ostrander, contra.

CHOATE, District Judge. On April 17, 1878, these proceedings were commenced by creditors' petition, and on the 2nd of May, on proof by affidavit that the debtor was endeavoring to conceal his property, a provisional warrant issued. March 14, 1878, the debtor made a voluntary assignment under the state law for the benefit of his creditors to one Robertson, who failed to give the bonds required by the statute of New York. On the 20th of June, upon proper proceedings in the state court, Robertson was removed, and a new trustee was appointed in his place. The trustee moves this court to vacate the provisional warrant and for an order directing the marshal to deliver to him all the property transferred under the voluntary assignment, which it is alleged the marshal has taken possession of under the provisional warrant. There has been no adjudication, the allegations of the petitioning creditors having been put in issue, and the matter is now on trial upon a reference to the clerk. The provisional warrant did not authorize the marshal to take possession of property the title to which passed by the state assignment to the voluntary assignee. Although the petitioning creditors insist that the voluntary assignment gave the assignee no right to hold the property because of the failure to give bond, yet it now appears by their own affidavit that prior to the commencement of these proceedings the state assignee had actually taken possession of the property. The proper course to dispute his title, or that of the trustee appointed in his place, is by a suit in equity to set aside the assignment.

Pending the question of the adjudication and the appointment of an assignee in bankruptcy, who may bring such suit, this court should not allow its process to interfere with the possession by the state assignee of the property, which at least is in his possession under claim of title. But since the trustee appeals to this court for aid, reasonable conditions may be imposed on granting the relief prayed for.

The marshal appears to have acted in good faith. He should not therefore be subjected to damages for taking and keeping the property. And until an assignee is able to bring suit to recover the property, no disposition should be made thereof which will prevent its ultimate distribution under the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], subject, of course, to the lawful charges of the state assignee if the state assignment shall be set aside. Let an order be entered directing the marshal to deliver the property to the trustee upon payment of his proper fees, provided the said trustee shall release the marshal for all damages for taking and keeping the property, and shall receive the said property subject to the condition that no disposition thereof or of any part thereof shall be made until five days after the appointment of an assignee in bankruptcy, or the termination of these proceedings, except with the approval of this court, and in that case let the warrant be vacated. Otherwise, motion denied.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

MANCHESTER (BORDEN v.). See Case No. 1,656.

MANCHESTER (ERICSSON v.). See Case No. 4,511.

Case No. 9,004.

MANCHESTER et al. v. HOTCHKISS.

[13 Int. Rev. Rec. 125; 10 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 379.]

District Court, D. Rhode Island. April 17, 1871.

PLEADING IN ADMIRALTY — PERSONAL PRIVILEGE —WAIVER— LIBEL IN PERSONAM—CIVIL SUIT—JUDICIARY ACT.

[1. A respondent to a suit in personam, whose vessel is attached because personal service cannot be made in the district, does not waive his right to plead to the jurisdiction by filing a stipulation to secure the release of his vessel.]

[2. A libel in personam is not a "civil suit," within the meaning of the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 78), requiring the defendant to be a resident of the district within which suit is brought. Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Case No. 600, followed. New England Ins. Co. v. Detroit & C. Nav. Co., Id. 10,154, disapproved.]

In admiralty. Heard April 10, upon plea to jurisdiction.

Browne & Vanslyck, for libellants.

A. Payne and J. C. Pegram, for respondent.

KNOWLES, District Judge. The two questions submitted to the court I would now dispose of at as little expense of time or labor as may be, consistently with approved judicial usage.

The cause is one of contract, civil and maritime, instituted in personam by Manchester, Hopkins & Co., of Providence, in the district of Rhode Island, against George Hotchkiss, of New Haven, in the district of Connecticut. The libellants allege damage to the value of two thousand dollars from a breach of contract to transmit a quantity of coal from Roundout, in the district of New York, to Providence, in July, 1867. The writ prayed for was granted on the 8th of March, 1871, returnable at a special court, to be holden on the 22d day of March, and was served by the marshal as shown by his return, in these words: "R. I. District. Providence, March 8, 1871. For want of the body of the within named George Hotchkiss to be by me found within this district, I have this day, at four o'clock in the afternoon, attached all the right, title, and interest that the said George Hotchkiss had in and to the schooner George Hotchkiss, her tackle, apparel, and furniture. Lyman Upham, Deputy U. S. Marshal."

On the 10th of March, the respondent filed in the clerk's office his claim in these words: "And now, on this 10th day of March, 1871, comes George Hotchkiss, and claims the schooner George Hotchkiss, attached by the marshal upon a warrant of arrest and attachment, as the property of the said respondent, as the owner thereof. George Hotchkiss." On the same day he also filed a stipulation for costs, together with a stipulation in conformity with the fourth rule in admiralty, whereupon the schooner was surrendered to him, and the attachment dissolved by operation of law. On the return day of the warrant (March 22), neither the respondent nor his counsel being present, with consent of the counsel for the libellants the respondent was allowed until the 28th of March to file his answer. Accordingly on the 28th, the respondent's "plea and answer" was filed, to which the libellants replied on the 1st of April, and upon these pleadings arise the questions now submitted to the court.

The respondent in his plea and answer, in the first place avers and insists that the court has no jurisdiction of the cause, because the defendant is not, nor was he at the filing of the libel, a citizen or resident of the district of Rhode Island, and the only service ever made of said libel was by attaching the goods and chattels of the defendant within the district of Rhode Island, the paragraph closing with these words: "Saving and reserving all benefit and advantage from said plea, and if overruled, the said defendant makes answer to said libel, and alleges and articulately propounds," etc. To this the libellants reply, "that the respondent's plea to the jurisdiction of the court ought not to be received and accredited, because, before the offering of said plea, said defendant had submitted himself and the cause to the jurisdiction of the court, by entering into and filing in the clerk's office of the court his stipulation to abide by and perform all the decrees of the court in said cause and had submitted himself and his cause to the jurisdiction of the court by filing an answer in said cause to the merits thereof." And to this the libellants, further replying, add that the plea is bad and insufficient in law.

In passing upon one of the two questions here presented, it seems necessary to say but little. Conceding that a defendant may waive a personal privilege, and estop himself from denying the jurisdiction of a court of admiralty, it still is incumbent on a libellant to show satisfactorily that a waiver was made by the defendant. This is not shown in this case. The filing of a stipulation, in order to release the vessel from attachment, I cannot regard as a waiver of any right or ground of defence to the suit; and as in this "answer and plea," filed on the return day of the writ, the day when and not prior to which he was entitled and bound to appear in court and answer, he sets forth his objections to the jurisdiction, I am constrained to adjudge that objection seasonably presented. The Bee [Case No. 1,219]. In neither text book nor reported case do I find aught inconsistent with this ruling. In regard to the other of the two questions, though much might properly be said were it now for the first time presented for judicial action, little, as it seems to me, need be said in this connection. That question, it must be agreed, in its last analysis, is simply this: Is a libel suit in personam in admiralty a "civil suit," within the meaning of the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789? 1 Stat. 78.

Now, to this question distinctly raised, a negative answer was given in 1867, in an elaborate and exhaustive opinion of Judge Benedict of the Eastern. district of New York, Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co. [Case No. 600]; and an affirmative answer was given in 1870–71 by Judge Sherman of the Northern district of Ohio, in an opinion not less elaborate,—New England Ins. Co. v. Detroit & C. Nav. Co. [Id. 10,154]. There is reason to believe, too, that by the late Justice McLean of Ohio, by Judge Hoffman of California, by Judge Shipman of Connecticut, and by Judge Woodruff of the Second circuit, overruling Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co. [supra], opinions in harmony with that of Justice Sherman have been delivered within the twenty years past. Of these six opinions, however, I have as yet been able to find only those of Judges Benedict and Sherman; but in these, I incline to believe, will be found embodied all the leading arguments and suggestions which give countenance to the conclusions to which, after full argument and deliberation, they respectively arrived. The weight of authority, numerically considered, it is seen, is in favor of the affirmative conclusion. But this, it is contended on behalf of the libellant, is not to be allowed to control my judgment. There are, it is argued, other facts to be considered: 1. That the admiralty rules, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, framed by the supreme court, are consistent only with the rulings of Judge Benedict, and are, "without law and against law," if his construction of the statute of 1789 be not sound. 2. That in all the text-books and manuals of admiralty practice now in daily use by the profession, a service of a writ in admiralty by attachment of goods and chattels merely, irrespective of the residence or presence of the defendant, is treated and prescribed as a legal and sufficient service. 3. That throughout the United States, save in the districts of California, Ohio, Connecticut, and New York, a service by attachment only (irrespective of a defendant's residence) is held to be valid and effectual. 4. That from 1789 down to 1852, so far as can be learned, not even an intimation that such a service was objectionable or questionable, was ever heard from bench or bar; that as early as 1841—Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. [Case No. 2,859]—Justice Story, in his opinion in a Rhode Island cause, said, in ruling upon a cognate question: "Neither has it been doubted that the process of attachment well lies in an admiralty suit against the property of private persons, whose property is found within the district, although their persons may not be found therein, as well to enforce their appearance to the suit, as to apply it in satisfaction of the decree rendered in the suit. Ever since the elaborate examination (in 1825) of the whole subject in the case of Monroe v. Almeida, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 473, this question has been deemed entirely at rest." And that in harmony with this dictum of Justice Story, as a declaration of settled law, has ever been the practice and usage throughout the circuit, whoever at the bar, whoever upon the bench. To the force of the libellant's reasoning on this point, I am constrained to yield. No decision of the supreme court or of the circuit judge of this district, in support of the defendant's plea to jurisdiction is produced, while dicta (if such merely it be), both from 10 Wheat. and Clarke v. New Jersey, etc., Co. [supra], are produced, impliedly overruling such a plea I find a practice and usage established in this district, in harmony with the dicta of judges to whose opinions I should be bound to defer, and in harmony with rules ordained by the supreme court, to which the force of statutes is universally conceded. If this practice and usage is to be abandoned as grounded on a misconception on the part of practitioners, text-writers, and judges, of a statute enacted in 1789, and still in force, I prefer that the decree to that effect shall issue from the supreme or the circuit court rather than from this.

A sufficient ground for a judgment overruling the defendant's "exceptive plea" is found in the usage and practice in this circuit from 1799 downward, and in the acts and declarations of its judges under the rules in admiralty to which I have referred, framed by the supreme court in 1812, and yet in full force. Such a ground, moreover, I do not hesitate to add, is found in the opinion of Judge Benedict in the case cited. That opinion, it is said, has been overruled by the learned judge of the Second circuit (Woodruff) and as we have seen, in certain districts, the adverse doctrine has been promulgated from the bench; but until better informed than I at present am as to the reasons assigned for dissenting from the conclusions of Judge Benedict, I am inclined to concur in and adopt those conclusions—especially these: Says Judge Benedict: "When the district courts were constituted courts of admiralty, they acquired the right to those methods and modes of proceeding which are the life of the admiralty, and among which has from the first been the power to seize property of defendants who cannot be found and to compel an appearance. This power is recognized by the admiralty rules as existing in these courts; it has never been conferred upon any other tribunal, and any intention to place it in abeyance, or to limit its exercise, when entertained by the law-making power, will, it may well be supposed, be clearly expressed, and not left to be inferred from the use of a general and indefinite phrase. . . . If either form changes in the habits of commerce, or from modifications which are found necessary and become fixed in the practice of admiralty courts of other countries, or from changes in the spirit of our institutions, a limitation of the mode of exercising this power shall become necessary or proper, it is not to be doubted that the supreme court, as the high appellate court of admiralty, and as empowered by the act of 1842 [5 Stat. 516], will effect a change in this particular, as it most properly did in regard to the power of imprisonment."

The defendants' "exceptive allegation or plea" to the jurisdiction of the court is overruled, and the case will stand for hearing upon its merits.

Case No. 9,005.

MANCHESTER v. HOUGH et al.

[5 Mason, 67.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1828.

REAL PROPERTY — MARRIED WOMAN'S ESTATE — DEED—ACKNOWLEDGMENT—RHODE ISLAND STATUTE OF CONVEYANCES.

1. By the statute of Rhode Island respecting conveyances of real estate, no deed of the wife's estate by the husband and wife, conveys any title but that of the husband, unless the same deed be duly acknowledged by the wife, before a magistrate, in the manner prescribed by the statute.

2. By the customary and ancient law of Rhode Island, a feme covert may pass her estate by a deed, in which her husband is joined, which is duly executed and acknowledged.

Ejectment for certain lands in Providence. Plea, the general issue. The town of Providence, under whom the defendants [John B. Hough and others] claimed, took upon themselves the defence. The facts, as they appeared at the trial, were as follows:—On the 30th of September, 1797, Isaac Manchester (since deceased) and Mary Manchester, his wife (the present plaintiff,) were seized in fee simple, in her right, of the demanded premises. On the same day, they conveyed, by their deed of that date, to Samuel Nightingale, the treasurer of the town of Providence, for the use of the town, one portion of the lands in controversy, to hold to him and his successors in the office forever. This deed was, on the same day, acknowledged by the grantors to be their voluntary deed, before G. T., a justice of peace of the same town. On the 4th of May, 1799, the said Isaac and Mary made a conveyance by deed of that date, of the residue of the demanded premises to the same treasurer, in like manner for the use of the town of Providence; which deed was acknowledged in the same manner. At the time of executing the first deed, there was no statute in Rhode Island authorizing a feme covert to convey her lands by deed, joining her husband therein. The question was, whether the deed of 1797 operated as a legal conveyance of the wife's estate. The acknowledgment of the deed of 1799 was admitted not to be according to the provisions of the statute of Rhode Island of 1798 on this subject.

[The town of Providence filed a bill in equity against the plaintiff to enjoin proceedings in this suit, and for general relief against the plaintiff's assertion of title. The bill was dismissed. Case No. 11,450.]

Richmond & Crapo, for plaintiff.
Bridgham & Searle, for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This case depends upon the validity of the conveyances made of the wife's estate by herself and her late husband, by the deeds of 1797 and 1799. It is admitted, that the latter deed cannot bind the wife according to the statute of Rhode Island of 1798, § 7 (Dig. 1798, p. 267), because she has not been examined privily and apart from her husband, and made an acknowledgment, that the deed was her voluntary act, and that she did not wish to retract the same, before the magistrate taking the acknowledgment. Without a compliance with these requisites, the statute declares, that the deed shall not operate to convey any greater estate in the premises, than what belongs to the husband. The validity of the other conveyance in 1797 turns upon the question, whether, by the common or customary law of Rhode Island, a feme covert can convey her real estate by deed, her husband joining in the deed. It is not denied, that this was in Rhode Island the usual mode of conveying her estate antecedently to the statute of 1798; and that it had prevailed without objection and without question for a great length of time; and that this is the first time, in which it has been judicially brought into controversy. Conveyances by fine or common recovery of the estates of femes covert may have sometimes been resorted to by very cautious persons; but the general practice in Rhode Island has been, as I have stated. Many titles have passed, and many titles are now held exclusively under such conveyances. And to shake their validity would at this period be productive of incalculable mischiefs. If there ever was a case, in which the doctrine might be fairly applied, that communis error facit jus, the present is that case. In truth, from an early period in the history of New England, the right of a feme covert to convey her real estate by deed with the assent of her husband was recognized, and has been constantly enforced by courts of law. It now constitutes a part of the common law of New England. See Fowler v. Shearer, 7 Mass. 14; Dudley v. Sumner, 5 Mass. 463; Colcord v. Swan, 7 Mass. 291. It probably originated in the necessities of the country at an early period of its settlement, when fines and recoveries were little known; or if known, courts were rarely held, and understood little of the proper mode of proceeding. The same necessity has produced a similar result in other parts of the Union. See Lessee of Lloyd v. Taylor, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 17; Davy v. Turner, Id. 11. The act of 1798 can be justly considered in no other light, than as a legislative sanction and recognition of the right and the practice. My opinion accordingly is, that the deed of 1797 is sufficient to pass the estate of the feme covert to the premises described therein.

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

Verdict accordingly.

Case No. 9,006.

MANCHESTER v. MILNE.

[Abb. Adm. 115.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1848.

SHIPPING — DEED OF ASSIGNMENT — PROOF — AFFREIGHTMENT—VARIANCE—MODE OF ASCERTAINING QUANTITY.

1. A deed of assignment executed in another state, and attested by two subscribing witnesses, was offered in evidence, accompanied by proof of the signatures of one of the witnesses, and of both the assignors. Held, that the witnesses were presumed to reside at the place of execution and to be without the jurisdiction of the court.

2. The proof of the assignors' signatures was admissible as secondary evidence of the execution.

3. A variance between the amount of a cargo of coal as stated in the bill of lading, and the amount of such cargo as ascertained on delivery at the port of consignment, may be explained by showing that the mode of ascertaining the quantity is such that similar variations are necessarily of frequent occurrence.

[Cited in The Wellington, Case No. 17,384.]

[Compare Manning v. Hoover, Case No. 9,044.]

This was a libel in personam, by Cyrus B. Manchester against George Milne, to recover for freight and primage on a cargo of coal, shipped from Liverpool to New York, on board the ship American. On the hearing, the libellant proved the shipment of the coal, September 30, 1846, at which time the vessel was owned by the Messrs. Arnold. He put in evidence the bill of lading, which was for 200 tons of Orrell coal, at the rate of six shillings sterling per ton freight, and five per cent. primage. To show his right to maintain the action, he also put in evidence an assignment of the vessel and her freight, made November 21, 1846, by the then owners of the ship, to the libellant. The assignment was under seal, and executed in Providence, R. I., having been also acknowledged and there recorded. It was attested by two subscribing witnesses. The libellant proved the signature of one of these witnesses, and that such witness resided in Providence, and also proved the signatures of the assignors; but the residence of the other subscribing witness was not shown, nor his absence accounted for. The respondent objected that the proof of the execution of the assignment was insufficient, the absent witness not being shown to be dead, or to be out of the juristion of the court. The libellant contended that the acknowledgment of the instrument in the place where it was executed, being by the local law competent proof of its due execution, was also sufficient evidence here. The court ruled this point against him, but decided that the proof given established the due execution of the instrument, and that the libellant was entitled upon it to maintain the action. The respondent then gave evidence in defence, tending to show that the vessel made short delivery of the cargo; that out of the two hundred tons mentioned in the bill of lading, less than one hundred and eighty-five were delivered at the port of consignment.

BETTS, District Judge. Where an instrument under seal, attested by a subscribing witness, is to be proved, and the production of the witness himself is excused, the technical rule of evidence requires proof of his signature, even though the execution by the principal party be proved by his most solemn admission out of court. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 569; 1 Phil. Ev. 473. This rule is arbitrary and formal, as it dispenses with direct proof of the identity of the principal party, the essential particular in the question whether the deed is actually his, and admits proof of the handwriting of an absent subscribing witness to the deed to establish that fact; and countenances the further implication that the witness was present and saw the signature, the sealing, and delivery of the deed which he attested.

Where none of the subscribing witnesses to an instrument are capable of being examined, it is only necessary to prove the handwriting of one of them. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 575; 1 Phil. Ev. 473. Where a deed, executed in a foreign state, is offered in evidence, it is to be presumed that the attesting witnesses resided at the place of execution, and secondary proof is admissible. 3 Phil. Ev. (Cow. & H. Notes) 1297. Proof of the handwriting of the assignor is at least equivalent, in the identification of the assignor or grantor, to the secondary evidence of the handwriting of a subscribing witness, if it be not competent as primary and direct. The objection to the admissibility of the assignment, upon the proof given, was therefore correctly overruled.

The contest upon the merits of the case relates to the question whether there was a short delivery of cargo. The proof of the quantity delivered is not very precise or satisfactory. The estimate of the quantity was arrived at by weighing five separate tubs of the coal, and ascertaining the average weight per tub, and the number of tubs which make up by measure a chaldron, and thus from a computation of chaldrons determining the quantity of coal delivered. This method of ascertaining quantities of Liverpool coal is proved to be the established usage of the trade in this port. That species of coal is purchased and shipped abroad by weight, and is unladen and sold in this market by the chaldron. There is also clear evidence to show that the computed weight so ascertained is almost invariably short of that stated in the invoices and bills of lading. This variance being so common, is no doubt provided for in the original purchases; but as a means of determining with certainty whether the weight shipped holds out on delivery, this method of measurement cannot be made the basis of any positive or sure determination. It affords an approximation which ordinarily will be found, it would seem, on the proofs, to come within two or three per cent. of uniformity. The state of the weather, whether dry or wet, when the coal is weighed and laden on board, and the quality of the coal, whether coarse or fine, are particulars essentially varying the result, when the cargo comes to be unladen by measure, often reducing the invoice weight from four to nine per cent.

[1] [Reported by Abbott Brothers.]

In the present case, the difference was nearly eight per cent. There is evidence that a small quantity was used by the ship during the voyage, but this was done with the knowledge and assent of the agent of the respondent, and was but to a very inconsiderable amount, by no means sufficient to account for the disparity between the bill of lading and the weighmaster's return here. I think the evidence in respect to the waste is not sufficient to subject the vessel to any charge or responsibility for such use; and I am further of opinion that the decided weight of evidence, direct and presumptive, is, that the delivery made acquitted the ship of her liability under the bill of lading.

The decree must accordingly be in favor of the libellant, it being referred to a commissioner to compute the amount of freight due.

[The case was afterwards heard upon an appeal from the clerk's taxation of costs. Case No. 9,007.]

Case No. 9,007.

MANCHESTER v. MILNE.

[Abb. Adm. 158.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1848.

COSTS—ADMIRALTY—TAXATION BY CLERK—PROCTOR'S FEES—MOTIONS TO POSTPONE—WRITTEN ARGUMENTS—FINAL DECREE.

1. Since the adoption of the circuit court rules of 1845, rule 96 of the district court of 1838, refusing to a proctor in a suit fees as advocate, is abrogated, in respect to all fees other than those specifically introduced and appointed by the district court; and fees for services as proctor and as advocate are taxable to the same person.

2. In what cases costs may be taxed for motions to postpone the hearing of a cause called in its order on the calendar.

3. Costs are not taxable for the preparation of written arguments, except upon a stipulation in writing, to that effect.

4. In what cases costs may be taxed upon motions to enlarge time to answer, upon motions for final decree, motions for costs, for a reference, &c.

This was a libel in personam, by Cyrus B. Manchester against George Milne, to recover freight upon a cargo of coal. The cause was before the court upon the merits in 1848, when a decree was rendered in favor of the libellant. The proceedings upon that hearing are reported [Case No. 9,006]. The cause now came up upon appeal from a taxation of costs.

BETTS, District Judge. Both parties appeal from the taxation of costs made by the deputy clerk in this case; but the principal exceptions, in number and amount, are taken by the respondent. Two legal points of general application are raised, which are of sufficient importance to demand a formal consideration, and the reasons assigned for this decision will have relation chiefly to those propositions.

The bill rendered and taxed embraces separate charges for advocate's and proctor's fees, the pleadings being signed by Messrs. Burr and Benedict as proctors, and by Mr. Beebe as advocate. The respondent has put in his affidavit, stating that those three gentlemen are copartners in the practice of law in this city, and that, as is generally understood, they practice in copartnership in all the state and United States courts; and he objects to the charge of advocate's fees at all, contending that all the partners in effect act as proctors in the cause.

Mr. Beebe, by affidavit, states that the connection between himself and Messrs. Burr and Benedict, in the admiralty business conducted in their office, is not a copartnership; that he acts as advocate solely, and takes to himself the taxable fees as advocate for his compensation, and has no share of or interest in the fees of the proctors, which belong exclusively to the other two gentlemen.

I do not, however, consider this fact, whichever way it may be, as varying essentially the question; because, in my opinion, the rule of allowance is definitely fixed by law in respect to the greater part of the items in contestation. The rules of the circuit court, adopted June 28, 1845, which also govern the practice and costs of this court, change rule 96 of this court, and regulate the costs of parties, their attorneys, solicitors, and counsel, in private actions, conformably to the grant by the act of congress of May 18, 1842 [5 Stat. 475], of costs to the United States attorneys within this state; and when services are rendered pursuant to the course of practice of this court, for which no fees are specifically appointed under the act, the usages of this court and the United States supreme court are to determine the rate of allowance.

[1] [Reported by Abbott Brothers.]

The provision in the act of congress limits the fees receivable by the United States attorneys to the fees and compensation allowed by the laws of the state of New York, for like services, according to the nature of the proceedings. These rules accordingly render the statute law of New York in relation to costs, in force May 18, 1842, the rule of taxation in this court, when no specific fee is appointed by congress. The state act of May 14, 1840 (section 4), provides, that when a fee is allowed to an attorney or counsellor, it shall be taxed only for one counsel or attorney, and the same person may be allowed fees both as attorney and counsel in the same cause.

It would accordingly make no difference if the advocate and proctors in this cause were in full partnership in every branch of their business, sharing in common all costs taxable in the cause; for it is plain that a fee appointed to a proctor for a service, and another to an advocate for the same service, would, under those provisions, be both taxable to the same person.

The act of congress comprehends all classes of costs taxable in favor of district attorneys and clerks in this state, within whatever jurisdiction their services are rendered, and the rules of the circuit court have force in respect to private suitors, coextensively with the provisions of the statute relating to those official fees. In my opinion the provisions of the state law so adopted by congress, must be held to supersede all regulations previously in force under the rules or practice of this court or of the circuit court conflicting with the state law; and that the restriction in the tariff of costs, established by this court in 1838, which denies to a proctor the allowance of the same fee taxed to him as advocate, is abrogated.

I accordingly hold that the objection to the taxation of advocate fees in the cause must be overruled. The next objection of a general bearing is that taken to the charges for attendance, for briefs and opposing motions, and for temporary delays asked for and allowed in term, in respect to the trial of the cause.

It seems that when the cause was called in its place on the calendar, excuses were offered on the part of the respondent, and a request was made that the hearing might be postponed to an after day, which was objected to at the time on the part of the libellant. No notice of motion was given, and no proofs were introduced which were the subject of discussion.

I think the party has no right to the fees charged for that proceeding. A formal motion or affidavit to put off a cause for the term stands on a different footing, and the party against whom it is made may rightfully ask to have its hearing deferred until he is prepared to meet it, and if he waives that right, and consents to debate or meet the motion instanter, there would be a reasonable color for allowing him the usual costs attached to the resistance of special motions made on notice given. It is otherwise in incidental, and, as it were, colloquial applications, where from some casualty a party asks that his case may be deferred to a particular day, or be temporarily passed on the calendar. All the costs which would naturally appertain to such arrangement of the business would be the expense of witnesses for the day, and perhaps, on a liberal construction of the fee-bill, the attendance fee of the advocate and proctor in court for the time.

I shall allow charges for opposing motions made on notices given to put the cause off for the term, and disallow them in all cases where the application was without notice, and only to defer the hearing to another day in the same session.

No appointment of a fee in the state law, or under the practice of the United States courts, is shown for written arguments. They are furnished by mutual consent, and for the purpose of expediting the decision of a cause not likely to be heard orally. Neither party can therefore cast upon the other the expense of that mode of proceeding. If the counsel will not waive their right to taxable fees for arguing a cause, they must mutually stipulate in writing, that a written argument shall be regarded, in the taxation of costs, the same as an oral one in court.

It is stated in the bill of costs, that the judge ordered the cause to be submitted in writing. This is undoubtedly a misapprehension. Such direction is never given in our practice. If one party insists on an immediate hearing, and to avoid the delay asked by the other, offers to submit the case on written argument, the court may refuse the delay asked except on condition of furnishing a written argument. This is only to preserve to the diligent and prepared party all his rights and the advantage of a prompt disposition of the case. But that in no way rests on the authority to prescribe to parties this particular method of debating the case. Those charges in this bill must be rejected.

Various items of charge are claimed for attending court, and on motions made in writing, merely formal as for time, to the defendant to answer it, &c. This is mere chamber business. In some of the instances specified, the extension of time was assented to by the libellant, and no special attendance was necessary or required on his part. Where the continuance was allowed on return day of process, the libellant must, according to the due order of practice, be in attendance to receive that return, and is allowed a fee therefor, and he cannot duplicate that fee, because of another step then taken, entirely incidental to the return. So, also, it was needless for him to attend in court at the day allowed the defendant to answer.

He was entitled on return of process to a default nisi, and if the defendant failed to comply with the terms of his indulgence, the decree on that default would become final.

Merely supposititious motions cannot be charged, such as motion for final decree, motion for costs, motion for reference, &c., when the object of the supposed motions are embraced in the decretal order of the court; though there may be foundation for similar charges when they are based upon specific application to the court for the modification, reversal, or enlargement of the final decree as to any of those particulars.

The taxed bill must be rectified according to the directions here given.

MANCHESTER (PROVIDENCE v.). See Case No. 11,450.

MANCHESTER PRINT WORKS (AIKEN v.). See Case No. 113.

MANCIETTE (NORMAN v.). See Case No. 10,300.

MANDELBAUM (KING v.). See Case No. 7,799.

Case No. 9,008.

MANDELL v. PIERCE.

[3 Cliff. 134; 1 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 123; 7 Int. Rev. Rec. 193; 2 Am. Law Rev. 774.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1868.

TAXATION — INCOME TAX — EXECUTOR — DEBT AGAINST ESTATE—RETURN.

1. On May 1, 1866, a tax was assessed upon the income of the plaintiff's testatrix, from the 1st of January, 1865, to July 2, 1865, the day of the testatrix's decease. The amount of the tax was paid under protest, by the plaintiff, as executor, to prevent the distraint of property, and brought suit to recover the amount. Held, that the tax was legally assessed against, and collectible from, the plaintiff as executor.

[Cited in U. S. v. Schlesinger, 14 Fed. 684.]

2. The liability in this case accrued in the lifetime of the recipient of the income, at whose death it passes over to the executor or administrator, as a debt against the estate.

3. When the recipient dies within the year, the return must be made by the excutor or administrator.

4. The tax is imposed upon the income of the property of the decedent, and the liability is not discharged because the decease occurs before the time appointed by law for making the return upon which the tax is predicated.

Assumpsit to recover the amount of an internal-revenue tax, paid under protest. Facts agreed. Sylvia Ann Howland, of New Bedford, single woman, died July 2, 1865, and the plaintiff [Thomas Mandell], also of New Bedford, was during said year duly appointed executor of her last will, and was at the time of the suit such executor. The plaintiff, as such executor, was required by the assistant assessor of internal revenue for the First collection district of Massachusetts, in which New Bedford is situate, to make return of the income received by said Sylvia Ann Howland, during that portion of the year 1865, in which said Slyvia Ann was in life, and did make such return under written protest indorsed thereon, not conceding any liability to taxation thereon, and protesting against the same. On May 1, 1866, the assistant assessor assessed a tax on the income of said Sylvia Ann Howland from and including the 1st of January, 1865, up to July 2, 1865, the day of her decease, of $4,512.36, and the plaintiff appealed to the assessor, who sustained and affirmed the taxation, and the plaintiff subsequently appealed to the commissioner of internal revenue, who affirmed the taxation and dismissed the appeal. The tax was transmitted and certified to the collector of internal revenue for said district for collection, and the defendant [Ebenezer W. Pierce], having been appointed collector of internal revenue for said district, passed into his hands, as such collector, for collection; and the defendant, under color of his office, as such collector, through his deputy, demanded of the plaintiff, as such executor, the payment of said tax; the plaintiff declined to pay the same, whereupon the defendant, as collector as aforesaid, through his deputy, threatened to collect said tax by distraint of property, and was proceeding so to collect it by force, when the plaintiff, in order to avoid a distraint of property, on the 6th of September, 1866, paid the defendant said tax of $4,512.36, under written protest.

T. D. Elliot and T. M. Stetson, for plaintiff.

The income-tax law does not authorize the tax in this case. Sylvia Howland died in no default as to taxation, and before any return could be required of her or income tax could be assessed upon her. No debt or liability of hers passed to the plaintiff, and the estate was then in his hands subject only to the laws taxing estates. Ex parte Cooke, 15 Pick. 237. And there is no statute providing such tax as the defendant has collected. The case constantly arises under the state law of Massachusetts, and it was never supposed that an income duty could be assessed unless the party was in life at the date, May 1. No apportionments of income tax are authorized by the statute. The year is the taxable unit.

An income is the result of the transactions of a period. A man may gain one day and lose the next. Some period must be determined by law which shall give the just mean and exhibit of real loss or real gain. Otherwise the government, by a system of comminution, might derive taxes from profitable months or weeks, and not repaying for the unprofitable ones, might gain large income taxes where the citizen had in fact no income. The unit is by the statute the calendar year.

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 2 Am. Law Rev. 774, contains only a partial report.]

Act 1864, June 30, § 116, relates to "annual gains, profit, or income," and "income for the year ending December 31, 1865." And it allows deduction "for state, county, or municipal taxes paid within the year." And this last allowance cannot be effected unless the calendar year is for purposes of income tax regarded as one and indivisible. Indeed, in Massachusetts, the assessment of state, county, and municipal taxes is not completed, so that demand or payment can be had, till much later in the year than the date of S. A. Howland's decease. Section 117 instructs how to estimate such "annual income," income "for each year," by instructions entirely inapplicable to lesser periods of time. Section 116 shows who are liable to income tax, and that is only "persons," and of such only "those residing in the United States, or citizens of the United States residing abroad." Which description does not include the dead or the estates formerly theirs. The deduction of $600 is provided to come out of a year's income, and no arrangement exists for apportioning it among the parts of a year, either by time or by actual receipts.

Throughout the statute no "estate" is spoken of in connection with income tax. Section 116 speaks of real-estate purchases and sales, and expressly provides a "year" as the period of realization for the purposes of income tax. Section 117. Deductions also of repairs to an extent not greater than the average of five years is permitted. It is manifest that such a deduction cannot come out of any single day's, but from the balance of a year's fortune. Section 118 is very significant. The income tax is based on a return required, not of deceased people, but "of all persons of lawful age," and who else? Here would be the place to provide for the case of an estate. Such return precedes the assessment and liability which falls on May 1, and therefore if a person is dead before such return, there could be no return, and a fortiori no liability. Besides persons of lawful age, "guardians and trustees are required to make return of the income of the minor or cestui que trust," and no provision whatever requires an executor, as such, to make return of the income received by his principal during any period of his life. The "guardians or trustees" must make return of the income of those for whom they act as guardian or trustee. And if it were possible in a loose sense to style an executor a "trustee," it would still be impossible to style him a trustee for the deceased testatrix. The omission to require a return from executors or administrators is the more marked in section 118, because the section does mention the words "executors and administrators," and does require a return from them, so far as they are guardians or trustees, of the amount of the income of the cestuis que trust, i. e. the heir or legatee. This refers to the frequent case where an executor has, in addition to his proper duties as executor, certain trust duties imposed by a will. Miller v. Congdon, 14 Gray, 114.

A collector of internal revenue is liable to suit if he collects an illegal tax by force; i. e. he cannot justify his tort under the laws. So if he still proceeds after being told in writing of the error and illegality, and the refusal to pay and purpose to recover back. For in such last case he is fully warned, goes on at his choice and peril, and can require indemnity of his principal before paying over. Elliott v. Swartwout, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 153.

The above principles are those of common law. Elliott v. Swartwout, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 153; Bend v. Hoyt, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 263; Curtis's Adm'x v. Fiedler, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 461.

G. S. Hilliard, U. S. Atty., and W. A. Field, Asst. U. S. Atty., for defendant.

The recent statutes of the United States and the sections of the same relating to taxes on income are the following: Sections 49–51, c. 45, 1861 (12 Stat. 309); sections 89–93, c. 119, 1862 (12 Stat. 473); section 1, containing amendment to section 93, ubi supra, and section 11 of chapter 74, 1863 (12 Stat. 718, 723); sections 116–119, c. 173, 1864 (13 Stat. 281); section 1, c. 78, 1865 (13 Stat. 479, 480); section 9, c. 184, 1866 (14 Stat. 138); section 13, c. 169, 1867 (14 Stat. 477–479). The statutes in force at the time of the decease of said Sylvia Ann Howland and of the assessment of the tax in question, are chapter 173, 1864, §§ 116–119; chapter 78, 1865, § 9, containing amendments to sections 116–119, ubi supra. In the statutes of the commonwealth of Massachusetts express provision is made for the assessment of taxes upon the real and personal estate of persons who decease before the 1st of May. Gen. St. Mass. pp 75, 76, c. 11, §§ 10–12, pars. 5, 7.

The construction contended for by the plaintiff must be either that the person upon whose income the tax is levied must be alive on the 1st of May of the succeeding year and on the day on which the tax is actually levied, or that the tax upon incomes can never be levied for a fraction of a year. The provisions of sections 124–150, c. 173, 1864, relating to taxes upon legacies and distributive shares of personal property, and on succession to real estate on the decease of any person, have no special application to this case. The estates of all persons who die are liable to these last-mentioned taxes, without regard to the day of their decease. The question is also to be distinguished from a tax levied upon an executor for income received by him as executor.

There is no legal reason why congress could not, and no legislative reason why congress should not, impose a tax upon the actual income received by any person who dies before the levy; the only point in dispute is, has congress so enacted? It is not pretended that the tax becomes a debt for the satisfaction of which a suit can be brought or a distraint made until the tax has been actually assessed or levied, but it is contended that on May 1, 1866, the estate of said Sylvia Ann Howland, or the defendant, as the executor of her last will, was liable to the assessment of this tax, and after this assessment the tax was legally collectible out of the estate. Section 116, as amended is, substantially, that the tax shall be levied annually upon the annual income of every person residing in the United States or of any citizens of the United States residing abroad. In terms it purports to be a tax to be levied, not upon a person, but upon the income, to be assessed annually and for the whole calendar year. When a person dies his property is not derelict. On the probate of the will and appointment of the executor, or on the appointment of an administrator, the legal title to the personal property vests by relation, from the time of decease, in the executor or administrator, and these personal representatives continue to receive the income until the estate is administered upon.

If the income received by said Sylvia Ann Howland up to July 2 should have been added to the income received by the defendant, as her executor, up to January 1, 1866, and one tax assessed for the whole year, that only proves that too small a tax has been assessed, and does not render the tax invalid. The facts find that the amount of the tax is correct, if the tax can be assessed at all. The proper deductions have been made. The $600 is not strictly a deduction; the tax is upon the excess of income over $600, and the whole $600 is to be taken out when the tax is for fractions of a year. The deduction of $117 can as well be taken out for fractions of a year as for a whole year, the language being in general, either that certain things shall not be included, or certain amounts actually paid by the person whose income is taxed shall be deducted. Section 118 makes it the duty of all persons of lawful age to render a list, etc., but the tax can be levied even if no list is rendered; besides, the legal representatives must be compellable to perform the duties the law imposes upon the deceased person they represent, if the tax be leviable at all. In section 118 the word "trustee" is meant to include all persons who receive income in any fiduciary capacity, and expressly mentions executors and administrators. All incomes received by any person, the beneficial interest in which belongs to any other person, must be taxed under the section 118. This section means that estates shall pay an income tax.

This income tax is really a tax upon things, to wit, upon income to be paid by persons, but it is independent of the life of any particular person.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Annual gains, profits, and income of persons residing in the United States or of citizens of the United States residing abroad, whether derived from property, rents, interests, dividends, or salaries, or from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, carried on in the United States or elsewhere, or from any other source whatever, were subject annually, by the act of the 30th of June, 1864, to a duty of five per centum, on the excess over $600, and not exceeding $5,000; and by the amendatory act of the 3d of March, 1865, it was provided that such annual gains, profits, and income are subject annually to a duty of ten per centum, on the excess over $5,000. 13 Stat. 281–479.

Rules are therein enacted prescribing the mode to be adopted in ascertaining the income of any person liable to an income tax. Such of those rules as are material to the present investigation may be stated as follows: 1. That the duty should be assessed, collected, and paid upon the gains, profits, and income for the year ending the 31st of December next preceding the time for levying, collecting, and paying the same. 2. Duties on incomes as therein imposed are required to be levied on the 1st of May in each year, and they were therein declared to be due and payable on or before the 30th of June in the same year. 13 Stat. 283. 3. Incomes received from institutions whose officers are required by law to withhold a per centum of their dividends, and pay the same to the commissioner or other officer authorized to receive the same, and income derived from notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, and also all premiums on gold and coupons, were required to be included in the estimate; but the provision was, that the amount so withheld by such institutions should be deducted from the tax which would otherwise be assessed. 13 Stat. 479. 4. One deduction only of the $600 could be made from the aggregate income of all members of any family composed of parents and minor children or husband and wife. 5. Net profits realized by sales of real estate purchased within that period were required to be deducted from the income of that year, [and were chargeable as income, but losses on sales of real estate purchased within that period were required to be deducted from the income of such year.] [2] 6. Taxes paid within the year, whether state, national, county, or municipal, were required from the gains, profits, or income of the person paying the same, whether owner, tenant, or mortgagor.

Other deductions were also required to be made as specified in the substitute for the 117th section, as enacted the succeeding year. 13 Stat. 479.

Plaintiff's testatrix died on the 2d of July, 1865, and the agreed statement shows that the plaintiff was duly appointed the executor of her last will and testament.

The residence of the decedent, during the year preceding her death, was at New Bedford, which is included in the First district in this state for the collection of internal revenue. Pursuant to the requirement of the assistant assessor for that district, the plaintiff made return of the income made by his testatrix during that portion of the year which had elapsed at the time of her decease; but he denied the power of the officer to require any such return, and made it under protest. Despite the objections and protest of the plaintiff, the assistant assessor, on the 1st of May, 1866, assessed a tax on the gains, profits, or income of the decedent, as returned for that portion of the year preceding her death, of $4,512.36. Appeals were regularly taken by the plaintiff, first to the assessor of the district, and subsequently to the commissioner, and those officers respectively affirmed the taxation. Payment was subsequently demanded by the collector, and the plaintiff, on the 6th of September, 1866, paid the amount, under a written protest, to avoid a distraint of his property.

[2] [From 7 Int. Rev. Rec. 193.]

Technical forms are waived by the parties on both sides, as appears by the agreed statement. They agree that if the income received by the decedent for that portion of the year prior to her death was liable to taxation as income, under the internal-revenue laws, then the tax was legally assessed, and that the amount is correct, and that the defendant acted in accordance with law. On the other hand, it is also agreed that the appeals and protests were sufficient in matter and form, and that the suit was seasonably brought, after due demand.

Viewed in the light of those admissions, doubt could not be entertained as to the liability of the income of the decedent to taxation, under the internal-revenue laws, if she had lived through the entire income year, and had been in life when the tax was assessed. Assessment, in that event, undoubtedly would have been made for the gains, profits, and income for the entire year; but it is equally certain that the amount received prior to the 2d of July would have been equally liable to taxation, at the time appointed by law for the assessment, even if it appeared that she had ceased on that day to be the owner of any property, and had never afterwards, during the remainder of that income year, received any gains, profits, or income. Beyond question, her liability to taxation would have been the same in that event, except as to amount, as if she had continued to be the owner of property, and the recipient of gains, profits, and income, during the remainder of the income year. Equal distribution of the gains, profits, and income over every portion of the income year is not a condition precedent to the liability to taxation, under the internal-revenue laws.

On the contrary, gains, profits, and income received within the income year are annual gains, profits, and income within the meaning of those laws, although the whole amount of the same in a given case may be received within the first month or the last month of the year. Such liability attaches to all gains, profits, and income received within the income year, although the property from which such gains, profits, or income are derived is acquired within the year or is conveyed away before the year closes; and the same rule will apply, although it appears that the gains, profits, or income were derived from a business or avocation which from its nature could not be pursued, or was not pursued, only for a part of the income year.

Great inequality would flow from the opposite rule of construction, as all persons who changed their business within the income year, and all those engaged in avocations which from their nature cannot be pursued throughout the year, would escape all such taxation. Obviously such a construction would defeat, instead of carrying into effect, the intention of congress, and therefore it cannot be admitted. When ascertained as required by law, the intention of congress was, that gains, profits, and income received within the income year, from the sources therein defined, should be subject to the prescribed taxation, whether such gains, profits, or income were derived from any kind of property, rents, interest, dividends, salaries, or from any trade, profession, employment, vocation, owned, collected, pursued, or followed for the whole or any part of the income year.

All such gains, profits, or income received within that year prior to the 2d of July were liable to taxation, under the internal-revenue laws, subject to the deductions which those laws allowed in ascertaining the aggregate amount as the basis for the computation of the tax. In ascertaining the aggregate amount of the gains, profits, or income liable to such taxation, the same deductions were required to be made, as would have been if the testatrix, instead of having deceased, had ceased on that day to be the owner of any property, and for the residue of the income year had received nothing as gains, profits, or income within the meaning of those laws.

Argument is unnecessary to show that all the gains, profits, or income received by the decedent, within that income year, are those which accrued prior to July 2, and that it would be absurd to suppose that she continued to own property after that day, or that she sustained any subsequent loss, within the meaning of those laws. The principal objection to this theory is, that the death of the testatrix occurred before the time appointed for making the required return; and the argument is, that in that state of the case no return can be required by her legal representatives. All guardians and trustees, whether as executors, administrators, or in any other fiduciary capacity, are required under the law then in force to make and render a list or return, in such form and manner as the commissioner should prescribe, to the assistant assessor of their district, of the amount of gains, profits, or income of any minor or person for whom they acted as guardian or trustee. 13 Stat. 480.

Taxes or duties on incomes thereby imposed are required to be levied on the 1st of May, and the provision is, as before explained, that they shall be due or payable on or before the 30th of June in each year. 13 Stat. 283. Guardians are required to make return for their wards, trustees for their cestuis que trust, and executors or administrators for whom they act. Suggestion is made that the testatrix, after her decease, was not a person residing in the United States, but the suggestion is quite too technical to be entitled to weight, as the executor in the case of a will is the legal representative of the deceased, and by virtue of his appointment, and the probate of the will, is bound to execute the trust reposed in him, by the terms of the will and the testamentary laws of the state.

He is bound to collect all debts which are due, or which fall due to the decedent, and to pay all debts due from the decedent, or which fall due after his decease, unless the assets of the estate are insufficient. Such taxes as accrued before the decease of the testator or testatrix are a debt against the estate, and as such must be paid by the executor out of the assets of the estate. Liability to taxation arises, and in some sense it may be said that the taxes accrue, at the time the gains, profits, and income pass into the hands of the recipient. Return is required in every case before the day of levy, so that it is clear that the tax is due, that is, the recipient of the gains, profits, and income is liable for it before it is assessed, as the return is only to ascertain whether the liability exists, and its extent. 13 Stat. 225.

Evidently such liability, in a case like the present, accrues in the lifetime of the recipient of the gains, profits, and income, and at his or her decease it passes over to the executor or administrator as a debt against the estate. Where the recipient dies within the year, he or she cannot make any return, and the duty of making it in that event devolves on the executor or administrator, as the legal representative of the deceased. The requirement of the law is, that the return shall be made in the collection district where the person resides upon whom the duty of making it is imposed; and it seems but a reasonable construction of that provision, to hold that in cases like the present, it may include the executor or administrator, as no return can be made by the actual recipient of the gains, profits, or income. Concede that an executor or administrator under that provision may be regarded as a trustee, still the argument is, that it is impossible to regard him as the trustee for the decedent, which perhaps is a sound proposition as a technical rule; but he is the legal representative of the deceased, and as such is bound to collect the dues and pay the debts, and administer the estate, which is a sufficient answer to the proposition as applied to the case before the court. Internal-revenue taxes are also levied on persons having in charge or trust as executors, administrators, or trustees any legacies or distributive shares arising from personal property, where the whole amount shall exceed $1,000 in actual value; and the argument is, that those taxes in case of deceased persons, dying within the income year, are a substitute for the income taxes required to be paid by persons in full life; but it is impossible to adopt the proposition, as the legacy and succession taxes are entirely distinct from the taxes on gains, profits, and incomes. 13 Stat. 287.

Income taxes accrue on gains, profits, or income received by the testator or intestate in his lifetime; but legacy and succession taxes accrue subsequent to the death of such testator or intestate. A suit may be maintained against a collector of internal revenue, to recover back taxes illegally exacted, if the payment was made under written protest to prevent a distraint of the plaintiff's property; but the taxes in this case, under the agreement of the parties, were in judgment of law legally assessed against the plaintiff as executor of Sylvia Ann Howland, deceased.

Judgment for the defendant for the costs of suit.

MANDELL (ROBINSON v.). See Case No. 11,959.

MANDEVILLE (ALEXANDRIA v.). See Case No. 184.

MANDEVILLE (AULD v.). See Case No. 653.

MANDEVILLE (BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v.). See Cases Nos. 850 and 851.

MANDEVILLE (BAYARD v.). See Case No. 1,132.

Case No. 9,009.

MANDEVILLE et al. v. COOKENDERFER.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 257.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1827.

SLAVERY—ACTION FOR ESCAPE—PRESUMPTION AS TO NEGRO — PRIMA FACIE CASE — GENERAL VERDICT — JUDGMENT ARRESTED — VENIRE DE NOVO.

1. The keeper of a stage-office is liable to the owner of a colored slave, for damages sustained by the running away of the slave, if he suffers him to take passage and depart in the stage-coach, without the consent of the owner.

2. Color is prima facie evidence of slavery.

3. Every person, who undertakes a business in which the public is concerned, is bound by the general law of the land, to conduct that business with reasonable care; and if, for want of such care in such business, another person suffer damage, the conductor of such business is liable to make good such damage.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[Cited in Lowe v. Stockton, Case No. 8,567.]

4. Every negro is, by a rule of evidence well established in this part of the country, prima facie, to be considered as a slave, and the property of somebody; and he who acts, in respect to him, as if he were a free man, acts at his peril; and the burden of proof is on him to show that the negro is not a slave; or at least to show such circumstances as will rebut the presumption arising from color.

5. If the keeper of a public stage-office send a negro away in the stage-coach, it is prima facie evidence of carelessness.

6. In such a case it is not necessary to aver in the declaration, any special law or custom, to raise a duty in the office-keeper, not to send away a negro slave without the leave of his master or owner.

7. Where it is necessary to set forth the duty, the averment must relate to the time of doing the act which is supposed to be a violation of that duty.

8. The words "wrongfully and improperly" are not alone sufficient to show, that the act to which they are applied, was unlawful or actionable; but the facts and circumstances, which make the act unlawful or actionable, must be set forth.

9. If there be a general verdict for the plaintiff, and one of the counts in the declaration be bad, the judgment must be arrested; but, if there be a good count in the declaration, a venire facias de novo, may be awarded.

This was an action upon the case against [Thomas Cookenderfer] the keeper of a public stage-office in Washington, for suffering the plaintiffs' slave to take passage in the stage-coach from Washington to Baltimore, whereby the slave escaped; and the plaintiffs [Mandeville and Larmour] were put to great trouble and expense in recovering him. At the trial, in May term, 1827, THE COURT (nem. con.) at the prayer of the plaintiffs, instructed the jury in effect, that color was prima facie evidence of slavery; and that if they should be satisfied by the evidence that the plaintiffs' slave was a colored man; and that the defendant, without authority of the plaintiffs, suffered him to take a seat in the stage-coach for Baltimore, and that he went off in the coach, and thereby escaped, the defendant is liable to the plaintiffs in this action for the damages which the plaintiffs may have sustained by reason of such escape. The jury found a general verdict for the plaintiffs for $200 damages.

The defendant's counsel moved in arrest of judgment, and contended that the second count was bad.

1. The first count states that the plaintiffs were owners of a negro man, a slave for life, called Richard Bunbury; and that the defendant, on the 28th of September, 1825, was the "keeper and superintendent, and had the management and control of a stage-office, for the entry of lawful passengers, traveling from the city of Washington, in the said county, to Baltimore," &c., "and whereas by the law and the custom of the county aforesaid, superintendents, keepers, and managers of stage-offices, are bound not to take any slave for life, belonging to any citizen or citizens of said county, out of the same, or to take any such slave or slaves, out of the district aforesaid, in any stage, carriage, or other vehicle, or in any wise to suffer or permit, or aid in suffering or permitting any such slave or slaves, to have passage or conveyance in any line of stages, coach, stage or other conveyance under their or his control, management or superintendence, by or through which any such slave or slaves, may be carried out of the district aforesaid, without proper permission or authority from the owner of such slave or slaves; yet the said Thomas Cookenderfer," (the defendant) "not regarding his duty in that behalf," &c. "took so little and such bad care of, and conducted himself so carelessly and improperly in the management of the said line" "of stages," "and the office of such stage line, in the said county, that the said" "slave" was by and through the carelessness, misdirection, mismanagement, and improper conduct of said defendant, permitted, suffered, and allowed, and by him unjustly authorized and enabled to take a seat and passage in the said line of stages, or one of the stages of the said line on the 28th of September, in the year 1825, at the county aforesaid, and the said "slave" "to be therein and thereby carried, and taken out of, and beyond the county and district of Columbia, aforesaid, and out of, and from the control of the said plaintiffs, and thereby caused the said plaintiffs to pay" &c., a large sum of money, namely, $500, for recovering him, and to lose his services, &c.

2. The second count, "and whereas the said defendant Thomas Cookenderfer, was, on the 28th day of September, in the year 1825, at the county aforesaid, the keeper of the stage-office, for the line of stages which runs to and between, and on the route to and between, the city of Baltimore in the state of Maryland, from the city of Washington, in the county of Washington, and had, on the day and year aforesaid, and at the county aforesaid, the control and management of the same, and the superintendence of passages taken and entered on the books and way-bill, for and in the said line, route, and stages, from said city of Washington, and it is his duty as such superintendent, not to permit or suffer, or in any wise aid any slave for life, owned by any citizen or citizens, in said county and district, or any such slave owned by any citizen or citizens within said district, to make and effect his escape from the ownership, control of, or servitude to his lawful master or masters, by means of, or through the said stage-line, or stage-office, or by, or in any manner or mode of conveyance under and within his control, as superintendent of such line of stages, or stage, belonging or connected to, or with the said line or route, or office. Nevertheless the said Thomas not regarding his duty aforesaid, wrongfully and improperly, did, on the 28th day of September, in the year 1825, at the county of Washington aforesaid, suffer and allow, and give permission to, and aid the said negro slave, Richard Bunbury, the property, before and at that time, of said plaintiffs, to take passage and conveyance in the said line or route of stages, or one of the stages of the said line or route, from Washington city, in the county of Washington, to, or on the route to Baltimore, in the state of Maryland, and to be therein conveyed and carried out of the district and county aforesaid, and out of the reach and control of said plaintiffs, whereby the said plaintiffs lost, and were deprived of the use, labor, services, and profits of the said slave," &c., "and also caused the said plaintiffs to pay" &c., "money for the recovery of said slave," &c.

Morfit & Swann, for plaintiffs.
Mr. Key, for defendant.

CRANCH, Chief Judge (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent). It is moved in arrest of judgment, that one, if not both counts of the declaration are bad; and as the verdict is general, if either count be bad, the judgment must be arrested.

The first count sets forth the law and custom of the county of Washington, in relation only to the slaves of citizens of that county; and as the count does not aver the plaintiffs to be citizens of that county, the case is not within the law and custom set forth; and therefore the plaintiffs' case derives no support from that allegation. But the averment of the law and custom of the county may be considered as surplusage; and if, without that averment, there be enough left in the count to make the defendant liable, the count may be good.

The count avers that the defendant was, at the time, &c., the keeper, and had the management and control of the stage-office of a line of stages for passengers passing in such stages from Washington to Baltimore; that the defendant, not regarding his duty in that behalf, took so little care of, and conducted himself so carelessly and improperly in the management of his said office that the plaintiffs' negro slave, the property of the plaintiffs, was by the carelessness, misdirection, and mismanagement of the defendant, permitted, suffered, and allowed, and unlawfully and unjustly authorized, and enabled to take a seat in one of the stages of that line, and to be thereby carried and taken out of the District of Columbia, and out of the control of the plaintiffs, whereby they sustained damage.

Every person who undertakes a business, in which the public is concerned, is bound, by the general law of the land, to conduct that business with reasonable care; and if, for want of such care in such business, another person suffer damage, the conductor of such business is liable to make good such damage. If the keeper of a stage-office carelessly send away my goods, without my authority, or send them in a wrong direction, so that I suffer damage through his carelessness, he is liable to make compensation for my loss, although he did not know the goods to be my property. Every negro is, by a rule of evidence well established in this part of the country, primâ facie to be considered as a slave, and the property of somebody; and he, who acts in regard to him as if he were a free man, acts at his peril, and the burden of proof is upon him, to show that the negro is not a slave, or, at least, to show such circumstances as will rebut the presumption arising from color. If the keeper of a stage-office, therefore, send a negro away in the stage-coach, it is primâ facie evidence of carelessness. In such a case, I do not think it necessary that the plaintiff should, in his declaration, aver any special law or custom, to raise a duty in the office-keeper not to send away a negro slave, without the leave of his master or owner. After striking out of the present count, the averment of the special law and custom of the county of Washington, I think there is enough left in the count to maintain the action.

In the second count, the duty of the defendant, the violation of which is the subject of complaint, is averred to be a duty existing at the time of the complaint, not at the time of the act of sending away the slave. The plaintiffs' case is, therefore, not aided by that averment; and if there be not enough left in the count to show a duty on the part of the defendant, the plaintiffs cannot recover on that count. If that averment be stricken out, the substance of the count is. That the defendant was, on the 28th of September, 1825, the keeper of the stage-office, &c., and had the control and management of the same, and of the passages taken, &c. Nevertheless, the said Thomas Cookenderfer (the defendant) wrongfully and improperly did, on the 28th of September, 1825, at, &c., "suffer and allow, and give permission to, and aid the said negro slave, Richard Bunbury, the property, before and at that time, of the plaintiffs, to take passage in one of the stages," &c., "and to be therein conveyed and carried out of the district aforesaid, and out of the reach and control of the plaintiffs, whereby the plaintiffs lost the service of the said slave," &c., "and sustained damage," &c.

This count does not aver negligence, or carelessness of the defendant, in his office or business; nor that the aid given to the slave, was knowingly, or unlawfully given, nor without the consent of the owners; nor does it show any cause of action, unless the words "wrongfully and improperly" can be considered as a sufficient averment of the wrong. But these epithets have never been considered of themselves as sufficient to show an act to be unlawful, or actionable, which would not appear to be so without those epithets. All the circumstances must be shown, that cause the act to be unlawful, so that the court may judge whether it be unlawful or not.

I am therefore of opinion, that the 2d count is bad, and not aided by the verdict; and, therefore, that the judgment must be arrested.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, concurred.

After this opinion was given, Mr. Morfit, for plaintiffs, as there was one good count, moved for a venire de novo. Mr. Key objected, and questioned the power of the court to grant it after judgment arrested. If it be a matter of discretion, the court will not grant it in so hard a case. The suit ought to have been brought against the stage-owners, not against their office-keeper.

Mr. Morfit cited the case of Semmes v. Sherburne [Case No. 12,655], in this court, at December term, 1824, and December term, 1825 [Id. 12,656], and Turner v. Foxall [Id. 14,255], in this court at June term, 1819, in which cases, he says, this court ordered a venire facias de novo; but it does not appear in the report. Mr. Morfit also cited Eddowes v. Hopkins, 1 Doug. 376, and Grant v. Astle, 2 Doug. 730, 2 Tidd, Prac. 831, and Harwood v. Goodright, Cowp. 89. But see Trevor v. Wall, 1 Term R. 151; a court of error cannot award a venire de novo; Holt v. Scholefield, 6 Term R. 694, 695, where the court refused a venire de novo, in slander, and Lawrence, J., said "that the plaintiff ought not to be at liberty to award by this judge's notes in the case, because the evidence applied as well to the bad as to the good counts." Harrison v. King, 1 Barn. & Ald. 161; Holloway v. Bennet, 3 Term R. 448; Lee v. Muggeridge, 5 Taunt. 36; 1 Archb. K. B. Prac. 195; Anger v. Wilkins, Barnes, Notes Cas. 478; Smith v. Haward, Id. 480; Williams v. Breedon, 1 Bos. & P. 329; Spencer v. Goter, 1 H. Bl. 78.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The judgment in this case having been arrested because one of the counts was bad, and the jury rendered a general verdict for the plaintiffs for $200 damages, Mr. Morfit moved for a venire de novo; evidence having been offered upon both counts, and cited Eddowes v. Hopkins, 1 Doug. 376, and Grant v. Astle, 2 Doug. 722, 730.

Mr. Key, contra, cited Chit. Pl. 394; 2 Saund. 171b; Starkie, Sland. & L. 418, 419; Hopkins v. Beedle, 1 Caines, 347; Lyle v. Clason, Id. 581; Livingston v. Rogers, Id. 588; Queen v. Corporation of Helston, 10 Mod. 202, 203; Bebee v. Bank of New York, 1 Johns. 535, 555, 576; Morgan v. Bliss, 2 Mass. 112; and contended, that the general rule is, that a venire de novo cannot be granted on account of a general verdict for the plaintiff, where some counts are good, and others bad; and that the case of slander is an exception to that general rule.

Chitty, in the page cited (namely volume 1, p. 394), says that in such a case, "the judgment will be arrested in toto, and no venire de novo awarded;" and for this he cites Onslow v. Horne, 3 Wils. 185; 2 Saund. 171d; and Grant v. Astle, Doug. 722, 730.

In the case of Onslow v. Horne, which was an action of slander, no question was made respecting a venire de novo; and the court expressly waived the question whether either of the counts was good. The only question was, whether one of the two counts upon which the verdict was given, was a bad count; for if so, it was admitted that the judgment must be arrested. The court, being of opinion that one of the counts was bad, arrested the judgment. No motion was made for a venire de novo. Why it was not made does not appear; perhaps it was because the counsel for the plaintiff doubted whether either event was good; or it might be, that, with Mr. Starkie, he thought the action of slander was an exception to the general rule that where judgment is arrested because the verdict is general, and some counts are bad, and some good, and evidence has been given upon any of the good counts, a venire facias de novo will be awarded. The case however is not authority to show that in such case the general principle is, that a venire facias de novo cannot be awarded in any form of action. It may be observed, however, that Mr. Chitty does not say that the court cannot, but that it will not, grant a venire de novo in such a case; evidently alluding to the will or discretion of the court, and not to its power.

The next authority to which Mr. Chitty refers is 2 Wms. Saund. 171b, in the notes, where Sergeant Williams says, that in such case the judgment shall be arrested and no venire de novo awarded; for which he cites Trevor v. Wall, 1 Term R. 151; Hancock v. Haywood, 3 Term R. 435; and Holt v. Scholefield, 6 Term R. 691. He admits, however, that where evidence has been given only on the good counts, the court has permitted the verdict to be amended by the judge's notes; for which he cites Eddowes v. Hopkins, 1 Doug. 376; Williams v. Breedon, 1 Bos. & P. 329; and Spencer v. Goter, 1 H. Bl. 78.

The case of Trevor v. Wall, 1 Term R. 151, was error on a judgment of an inferior court, in Shropshire, in an action of assumpsit. The judgment was reversed because one of the counts, (namely, for money had and received,) did not state that the money was had and received within the jurisdiction of that court. The defendant in error contended, that if the judgment should be reversed for that error, the court would award a venire de novo; but the court said, there is no instance of a court of error granting a venire de novo, when the proceedings originated in an inferior court; and the reason for that decision is very strong; for the judgment was reversed, because it did not appear that the court had jurisdiction of one of the causes of action for which the damages were given; and it would be absurd to direct the court below to try again a cause of which they had not jurisdiction. However that may be, the reason given for refusing it, shows that the case was an exception to the general rule, and that if it had not been a judgment of an inferior court, a venire de novo might have been granted. So far is that case from supporting the principle which it is adduced to support, that it is a strong case in opposition to it.

The case of Hancock v. Haywood, 3 Term R. 435, was an action of assumpsit, and is cited by Mr. Chitty, only for the dictum of Judge Buller, that, "on a writ of error, where one count appears bad, and the verdict is entered generally on all the counts, the court must reverse the judgment in toto, since they cannot see on which of the counts the damages were given." No question was made as to a venire de novo. The case of Holt v. Scholefield, 6 Term R. 691, was an action of slander, and does not fix any general principle, unless it be that in actions of slander, the court has a discretion to grant or refuse a venire de novo where one count is bad, and the verdict for the plaintiff is general. The words of the reporter are, "The court were of opinion that there should not be a venire de novo; and that, as the damages were entire, the judgment must be arrested in toto." And the reason stated by Lawrence, J., why the plaintiff was not permitted to amend the verdict by the judge's notes, was, that the evidence applied as well to the bad counts, as to the good counts. If this case is to be considered as deciding that the court cannot grant a venire de novo in an action of slander, where there is a bad count, and a general verdict for the plaintiff, still it does not establish a general principle, but an exception to a general principle. If it is to be considered only as a particular instance of the exercise of the discretion of the court, it is an admission of the power of the court to grant the writ in such a case.

The case of Eddowes v. Hopkins, 1 Doug. 376, was an action of assumpsit, and is cited by Mr. Chitty, to show that the verdict may be amended by the judge's notes, where some of the counts are bad, or inconsistent, and the verdict for the plaintiff has been general. In that case, Buller, J., said, there was this distinction: that if there was evidence, at the trial, upon such of the counts as were good and consistent, a general verdict might be altered from the notes of the judge, and entered only on those counts; but that if there was any evidence which applied to the other bad or inconsistent counts (as, for instance, in an action for words, where some actionable words are laid, and some not actionable, and evidence given of both sets of words, and a general verdict,) there the postea could not be amended because it would be impossible for the judge to say on which of the counts the jury had found the damages, or how they had apportioned them: That in such a case the only remedy is by awarding a venire de novo. He mentioned a case where Sir Fletcher Norton had moved for and obtained a venire de novo in a case of that sort. "The rule for amending the verdict was made absolute, and the rule to arrest judgment was discharged."

The report refers to the case of Anger v. Wilkins, Barnes, Notes Cas. 478, in which a venire de novo was granted, "according to an ancient rule of court," "that plaintiff might sever his damages." The same point was also decided in the next year, in the case of Smith v. Haward, Id. 480.

The case of Williams v. Breedon, 1 Bos. & P. 329, was an action of trespass. A general verdict was given for the plaintiff upon two counts, one of which was bad; but the verdict was amended by the judge's notes, it appearing that the damages were calculated upon the evidence applicable only to the good count, although some evidence was given on the bad count.

The case of Spencer v. Goter, 1 H. Bl. 79, was an action for slander. The court said they could not alter a verdict unless it clearly appeared upon the face of it, that the alteration would be agreeable to the intention of the jury, and that the proper remedy in that case was a new trial. The verdict in that case was contrary to the instruction of the judge.

These are all the cases cited by Sergeant Williams, in support of the position, that "no venire de novo will be awarded."

Mr. Chitty also refers to the case of Grant v. Astle, 2 Doug. 722, which was error from the common pleas, on a judgment in an action of assumpsit. Lord Mansfield, after lamenting the rule that judgment must be arrested upon a general verdict for the plaintiff, if one of the counts be bad, said, "But in civil cases, the rule is now settled, and we have gone as far as we can, by allowing verdicts in such cases, to be amended by the judge's notes. That might have been done, in this instance, in an earlier stage of the proceeding, but cannot now after judgment." Buller, J.: "The court may grant a venire de novo; a good cause of action is shown in the first count, and that it is true, appears by the verdict; but the plaintiff has also had damages assessed to him on a count in which he has not shown any cause of action. The court, under these circumstances, may send the case back to have damages assessed only on that count on which, in point of law, he is entitled to recover." "The court there said, there was no doubt but a venire de novo might be granted by a court of error; that it had been done by the house of lords, and was not a new practice; for upon inquiry made by this court, in a late case from Ireland, a great many instances had been found." A venire de novo was awarded.

These are all the cases cited by Mr. Chitty, in support of the position that a venire de novo shall not be granted where the verdict for the plaintiff is general, and one of the counts is bad and the others are good.

The next authority cited by Mr. Key is Starkie on Slander and Libel (sections 418, 419), where, after having stated that judgment will be arrested upon a general verdict for the plaintiff, in an action of slander, if there be one bad count, he says:—"It is said to be the practice in the court of common pleas, to award a venire de novo where judgment is arrested in such a case, upon payment of costs, in order that the plaintiff may sever his damages. But in the case of Holt v. Scholefield, in the king's bench, a venire de novo was refused. In the case of Beavor v. Hides, 2 Wils. 300, Bathurst, J., expressed an opinion, that where the words in one count were not actionable, yet the postea might be amended, and a verdict, as to those words, entered for the defendant, upon the judge's certificate that no evidence was given of them at the trial. But Lord Camden said it would be very dangerous, after a verdict of twelve men recorded by the court, to refer to the judge's notes in order to alter it; and he thought there was no precedent of such a case, and that the verdict could not be varied. The general practice, however, is where general damages have been given, and it appears that the plaintiff is entitled to recover upon one count, though not upon others, either to amend the postea, which is done where it clearly appears that no evidence was given upon the defective counts, or by awarding a venire facias de novo where such evidence has been given, in order that the plaintiff may ascertain to what damages he is entitled, for so much of his cause of complaint as will support damages. It does not distinctly appear upon what principle actions for slander form an exception to the general rule."

The counsel for the defendant, in the present case, has supposed that the general rule, to which actions for slander form an exception in the opinion of Mr. Starkie, is, that a venire de novo will not be awarded where judgment is arrested upon a general verdict for the plaintiff, where one of the counts is bad and others are good. But it is impossible that that should be the general rule alluded to by Mr. Starkie; because the only case in which a venire de novo has been refused, under such circumstances, is a case of slander, namely, the case of Holt v. Scholefield, 6 Term R. 691. If that case established a general rule, it was that a venire de novo should not be awarded in actions of slander; it is impossible, therefore, that actions of slander should form an exception to that rule. But the rule, to which Mr. Starkie thought actions of slander formed an exception, was the "general practice" which he had just mentioned in the preceding sentence, namely, to amend the postea, or to award a venire de novo. The word "however," in the first line of that sentence, shows that what he is about to say is in opposition to what he had just before related, which was the dictum of Lord Camden, that it would be dangerous to alter verdicts by the judge's notes; and the case of Holt v. Scholefield, in which a new venire was refused in an action of slander, which case, it is clear, Mr. Starkie thought excepted actions of slander from the general rule, notwithstanding the practice which, in such cases of slander, prevailed in the common pleas, as stated in the two cases cited from Barnes's Notes, 478, 480. The authority of Starkie, therefore, does not support the doctrine of the defendant's counsel, but is very strong against it.

The cases of Hopkins v. Beedle, 1 Caines, 347, Lyle v. Clason, Id. 583, and Livingston v. Rogers, Id. 588, were also cited by the defendant's counsel, to show that the rule for granting a new venire is confined to cases of slander; but there is nothing in those cases to justify such an inference. The two first, it is true, were cases of slander; but the third was an action upon assumpsit, in which Judge Kent, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:—"As there is one good count in the declaration, the plaintiff may, if he choose, on the first ground sue out a venire de novo." In neither of the cases is there the least intimation that the rule is confined to actions for slander.

The cases of Queen v. Corporation of Helston, 10 Mod. 202, Bebee v. Bank of New York, 1 Johns. 535, 555, 576, and Morgan v. Bliss, 2 Mass. 112, were cited by the counsel of the defendant, to show that a new trial will not be granted for mistake of counsel. But it does not appear to be a mistake of counsel in this case, but an error of the jury, in giving a general verdict. This they had a right to do; and it was not in the power of the plaintiff's counsel to prevent it, unless by withdrawing the bad count, or entering a nolle prosequi upon it. A motion for a venire de novo is a motion for a new trial upon matter appearing in the record, and was anciently the only form of moving for a new trial. It is a motion to the discretion of the court, who will not grant it unless they see that the plaintiff has a good cause of action upon the record, and supported by evidence at the trial.

Upon consideration of all the cases cited, we think the general practice is, (as stated by Mr. Starkie,) in all the forms of action, (not excepting the action for slander,) "that where general damages have been given, and it appears that the plaintiff is entitled to recover upon one count though not upon others, either to amend the postea, where no evidence was given on the defective counts, or by awarding a venire facias de novo where such evidence has been given." In all the cases the motion is to the discretion of the court, and we see no reason for excluding the action of slander from that discretion; but upon this point it is not necessary, in the present case, to decide.

It has been said in argument that this is a hard case, because brought against the office-keeper, and not against the owners of the coach, who received the benefit of the fare; and therefore the court, in its discretion, ought not to award a new venire. But if the suit had been brought against the owners, and judgment recovered against them, they might bring their action against the office-keeper, by whose negligence the damage arose; so that a judgment in the present case may prevent circuity of action.

The court, therefore, will award a new venire, upon payment of all costs up to this time. Venire de novo awarded.

[Upon the new trial the jury awarded $200 damages to the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court whether the action would lie against the office-keeper, the agent of the coach owners. The court decided that the action would not lie, and directed the entry of a non pros. Case No. 9,010.]

Case No. 9,010.

MANDEVILLE et al. v. COOKENDORFER.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 397.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1828.[2]

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — ACTION FOR DAMAGES FROM NEGLIGENCE—WHO LIABLE—SLAVERY—ESCAPE.

1. For negligence of an agent, his principal only is liable.

2. It is negligence in a stage-office keeper to suffer a slave to go off in the coach by means of a false certificate of freedom; and the stage owners only are liable for the damages.

Action on the case, for negligence of a stage-office keeper, in suffering the plaintiff's slave to escape, by permitting him to go in the stage coach to Baltimore under a false pass. This cause having been tried upon the new venire issued by order of the court at December term, 1827 [Case No. 9,009], the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, with $200 damages, subject to the opinion of the court, whether the action would lie against the office-keeper, the agent of the owners of the coach.

Mr. Swann, for plaintiffs.
Mr. Key, for defendant.

CRANCH, Chief Judge (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, dissenting). The declaration consists of two counts. The first count charges that the plaintiffs were owners of the slave Richard Bunbury; that the defendant was "the keeper and superintendent, and had the management and control of a stage-office for the entry of lawful passengers traveling from the city of Washington to Baltimore," "and had the management, superintendence, and direction of that part of said line of stages which leaves Washington city for and on the route to said Baltimore; and the said Cookendorfer, not regarding his duty in that behalf, took so little and such bad care of, and conducted himself so negligently, carelessly, improperly, and unlawfully, in the management of the said line, or part of line, of stages, and the office for such stages, line, or part of line of stages, in the said county, that the said" slave, the property of the plaintiffs, "was by and through the carelessness, misdirection, mismanagement, negligence, and unlawful conduct of said defendant, permitted, suffered, and allowed, and by him unlawfully, carelessly, and negligently authorized and enabled to take a seat and passage in the said line of stages, or one of the stages of the said line," "and to be therein and thereby carried and taken out of and beyond the county and District of Columbia aforesaid, and out of and from the control of the said plaintiffs, and thereby caused" them to expend a large sum of money in recovering him, and to lose his services for eighteen months, &c. The second count charges that the defendant was "the keeper of the stage-office for the line of stages which runs to and between and on the route to and between the city of Baltimore in the state of Maryland, from the city of Washington in the said county of Washington," "and had the control and management of the same, and the superintendence of all passages taken and entered on the books and way-bill for and in the said line and route of stages for said city of Washington; and it was then and there his duty as such superintendent, not to furnish or suffer, or in anywise aid any slave for life to make and effect his escape from the ownership, control of, or servitude to his lawful master or masters, by means of, or through the said stage-line, or stage-office, or by, or in any manner or mode of conveyance under or within his control, as superintendent of such line of stages or stage, belonging or connected to or with the said line or route or office. Nevertheless, the said Thomas Cookendorfer, not regarding his duty aforesaid, wrongfully, negligently, carelessly, and unlawfully, did, on the 28th of September, in the year 1825, at," &c., "without the consent of the plaintiffs, or either of them, suffer, allow, and give permission to and aid the said negro, and carelessly, negligently, and unlawfully permitted and aided him, the said negro R. B., the property of said plaintiffs, to take passage and conveyance in the said line or route of stages, or one of the stages of the said line or route from Washington city to, and on the route to Baltimore," "and to be therein conveyed and carried out of the county and district aforesaid, and out of the reach and control of the said plaintiffs," whereby they lost his services, &c., and were forced to expend a large sum of money in recovering him, &c.

The case stated is, that the said slave eloped from the plaintiff's service in Alexandria and went to Washington City, and there called himself Seymore Cunningham; and showed a certificate from a notary-public, which had been granted to Seymore Cunningham, stating that he, the said S. C., was a free man of color; and that the said slave,

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Affirmed by supreme court, case not reported.]

Richard Bunbury, stated that he was, in fact, the said Seymore Cunningham. Evidence was offered to prove that "the person described in the said certificate did not correspond with the person of the said R. B.; that he was taller than the person described in the certificate, and was a very bright mulatto, whereas Cunningham, the person described in the certificate, was a dark mulatto," and "that the least attention on the part of the defendant would have detected the difference, as the witnesses thought." That the slave went to the stage-office in Washington City, which office was of the line of stages mentioned in the declaration, kept and managed by the defendant, and represented himself to the defendant as Seymore Cunningham, and showed his said certificate of freedom; and the defendant thereupon permitted him to take his seat in the book of the said stage-office, kept and managed as aforesaid by the defendant, and permitted him to take passage in the stage of the said stage-line mentioned in the declaration, and the said slave went off in the said stage to Baltimore, and from thence to Boston. That the instructions given by the stage-line owners to the clerks in the said stage-office, and the practice and usage in relation to allowing seats to be taken in the stages of the said line, by colored persons, were these:—"That the clerks were to allow free persons of color to take seats, and not slaves, except with their owner's permission; and that, in order to determine whether the persons of color, offering to take seats, were free or slaves, the said clerks were required to demand that they should produce certificates of freedom; and upon so producing such certificates, purporting to prove the freedom of the persons presenting themselves, they were to permit such persons to take seats as free persons, and were not required to ascertain in any other way than by production of such certificates, whether the said colored persons were free or slaves."

The declaration charges the defendant, as keeper and superintendent of a stage-office. These expressions imply an agency, not an ownership; and the case stated admits that there were owners of the stage-line, other than the keeper of the office. The defendant, therefore, is to be considered as the agent of the owners of the stage-line; and the question arises whether the defendant, who, it appears by the statement of facts, obeyed the instructions of his superiors, is liable to the plaintiffs in an action upon the case for negligence. The negligence upon which the action is founded consisted in not sufficiently examining the certificate of freedom produced, and comparing the description it contained with the person of the slave who brought it.

The authorities cited by the plaintiff's counsel, to show that the action for negligence will lie against the agent, or servant, are Bush v. Steinman, 1 Bos. & P. 404; Stone v. Cartwright, 6 Term R. 411; Stephens v. Elwall, 4 Maule & S. 259; Little v. Barreme, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 179; and 1 Chit. Pl. 67. The case of Bush v. Steinman, was an action against the master; and the question did not arise, whether the servant was liable for laying the lime in the road, by which the plaintiff's carriage was overturned. But Mr. Justice Rook said: "The plaintiff may bring his action either against the person from whom the authority flows, and for whose benefit the work is carried on, or against the person by whom the injury was actually committed." This is but a dictum, and it is evident that the judge was not contemplating the distinction between actions for negligence and actions for misfeasance, and the case before him was rather a case of misfeasance than of negligence; the laying of the lime in the highway being in itself a nuisance. That dictum, therefore, may and ought to be considered as applicable only to the case of misfeasance. The next case cited is Stone v. Cartwright, 6 Term R. 411. That was an action against a "middle-man." It was neither against the person by whom the injury was actually committed, nor the person from whom the authority flowed, and for whose benefit the work was carried on. But Lord Kenyon said: "In all these cases I have ever understood that the action must either be brought against the hand committing the injury, or against the owner, for whom the act was done." The act complained of in that case was the digging under the plaintiff's house, in a mine or coal-pit, so negligently as to injure the building. The reporter states that, at the trial, "Lord Kenyon was of opinion that the action could not be maintained against the defendant, who was the middle-man, but that it ought to have been brought either against the person who actually committed the trespass, or concurred therein; or against the superior, the owner of the colliery, for whose benefit the work was carried on." In this case the attention of the judge was not drawn to the distinction between cases of negligence and cases of misfeasance; but it is evident that he was contemplating the case of misfeasance. The next case is Stephens v. Elwall, 4 Maule & S. 259. That was a case of trover for the plaintiff's goods, received and disposed of by the defendant, for the benefit of his master. The court held it to be a conversion, and the defendant to be a tortfeasor, a wrongdoer. This, therefore, was not a case of negligence, but of misfeasance. So, also, was the case of Little v. Barreme, cited from 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 179, in which C. J. Marshall says: "The instructions cannot change the nature of the transaction, or legalize an act, which, without those instructions, would have been a plain trespass." Chit. Pl. in page 67, only says, that all natural persons are liable to be sued for their own tortious acts. None of the authorities cited supports the doctrine, that the servant is personally liable to a third person for his negligence, in transacting the business of his master; and that he is not so liable is clearly shown by the following authorities. 1 Chitty on Pleading (volume 1, p. 75) says: "A servant or deputy cannot, in general, be sued for a mere nonfeasance; but the action must be against the principal. But, for misfeasance or malfeasance, an action may, in some cases, be supported against a servant or deputy"; and cites 12 Mod. 483; Cowp. 403. The same principle is cited by Paley on Agency (page 313, c. 6, § 2), who says: "Servants are responsible for tortious acts, whether done by authority of their masters or not; but for mere nonfeasance, or non-performance of duty, servants are not liable to third persons, but only to their masters. For there is no privity of consideration between the servant and the person who employs his master; and nonfeasance alone will not support an action, without consideration, though misfeasance will."

We find the principle thus stated by Lord C. J. Holt, 12 Mod. 488: "A servant or deputy, as such, cannot be charged for neglect, but the principal only shall be charged for it; but, for misfeasance, an action will lie against a servant or deputy, but not as a deputy or servant, but as a wrongdoer." This doctrine has been repeated and ratified in a subsequent case, Sayer, 41. "The case of masters of ships, who, though in some respects servants of the ship-owners, are liable to the owners of goods put on board, for negligence, rather admits than contradicts the principle of this rule; for, in the case which decided that point (Morse v. Slue, 1 Vent. 190, 238), to the objection that the master was but a servant to the owner, it was answered, that the law takes notice of him as more than a servant. He may impawn the ship, and sell bona peritura; he is rather an officer than a servant." So in the case of Rowning v. Goodchild ([2 W. Bl. 907;] cited in 5 Burrows, 2716), a deputy-postmaster, the same general principle is admitted; and that case is taken out of it, by saying that postmasters "are subsisting, substantial officers, and answerable for their own misfeasances and nonfeasances. They have original offices under the postmaster-general." So Blackstone, in his Commentaries (Book 1, p. 431), says: "If a servant, by his negligence, does any damage to a stranger, the master shall answer for his neglect; if a smith's servant lames a horse while he is shoeing him, an action lies against the master and not against the servant." And Chitty, in his note to this passage of Blackstone, says: "A servant cannot, in general, be sued by a third person for any neglect or nonfeasance which he is guilty of, when it is committed in behalf of, and under the express or implied authority of his master." So also Starkie on Evidence (part 4, p. 332) says: "An action for negligence of this nature must be brought against the principal, and not against the agent, although the loss has resulted from the negligence of the latter." Other cases might be cited to the same effect; but these are deemed sufficient to establish the principle, that the servant is not liable for the injury done to a third person, by his negligence in his master's employment. This principle, coincides with the maxim, respondeat superior, and is reasonable in itself; for the servant could not, to an action by the injured person against him, plead the orders of his master in justification; nor could the servant maintain an action against his master for indemnity, even if what he did was in obedience to his master's orders. But if the injured person recover against the master, and he brings his action against his servant, the latter could plead his master's orders in bar of the action. If, then, the principle be established, that the servant is not liable for his negligence or nonfeasance, but is liable for his misfeasance, the next question is, whether the case stated be a case of misfeasance or of negligence.

The case, as I understand it, is, that the defendant was imposed upon by the slave, who produced a false pass. If the defendant had been more cautious, he might not have been deceived. The fault of the defendant was his negligence. But, according to the facts stated, he was not bound, by his orders, to be more vigilant than he was. By those orders, he was to permit every colored person to pass who could produce a certificate purporting to prove the freedom of the person presenting it. The negligence, therefore, was not so much the negligence of the defendant as of his employers, in not giving orders for a stricter examination. There is no tortious act of the defendant's stated in the case. His suffering a man to take a seat in the stage-coach was a lawful act if he was a free man; and his certificate was prima facie evidence of his freedom. Negligence, therefore, is the only ground upon which the action could be sustained. But, for such negligence, we find that the defendant is not liable; and are, therefore, of opinion that the verdict should be set aside, and judgment of non-pros entered.

When this court, in a prior stage of this cause, decided that one of the counts was good, the fact did not appear, (or was not relied upon,) that the defendant was only an agent, or servant; and the attention of the court was not drawn to the distinction between the liability of a servant, in cases of negligence and in cases of misfeasance. If, upon the motion in arrest of judgment, that fact had clearly appeared upon the face of the count, and the attention of the court had been drawn to it, it must have adjudged that count to be bad also.

Affirmed by supreme court of United States, February 26, 1830, but not reported. (See the mandate No. 317, trial-docket of this court, at May term, 1830.)

MANDEVILLE (DADE v.). See Case No. 3,533.

Case No. 9,011.

MANDEVILLE v. JAMESSON.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 509.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1808.

INSOLVENCY—BENEFIT OF ACT—PETITION OF CREDITOR.

Upon the petition of a creditor of an insolvent debtor to deprive him of the benefit of the insolvent act [2 Stat. 239], the defendant may show that the petitioner is not his creditor.

This was a petition to deprive the defendant of the benefit of the insolvent law, filed under the seventh section, upon an allegation that the defendant had given a preference to one of his creditors in a deed to La Mar, in trust to pay a debt due Margaret Jamesson in Ireland.

Mr. Jones, for defendant. Upon the insolvency of the defendant, this property was all given up to his trustee. If the deed be void, there was no preference given. An abortive attempt to give a preference is not within the meaning of the law. The words are, "assigned or conveyed any part of his property to give a preference to any creditor or creditors;" "or of having given any preference as aforesaid." 2 Stat. 239. There must be a disposition, or lessening of his property. A conveyance means a legal and valid conveyance, whereby the property passes.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, suggested a doubt whether the defendant should be permitted to go into proof that the petitioner is not a creditor, supposing it to be a matter to be decided ex parte at the time of the insolvent's application, and that prima facie evidence is sufficient.

THE COURT, however, (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent,) went into an examination of the evidence, and was of opinion that the petitioner was a creditor, and that the deed was made with intent to give a preference.

But THE COURT, by the consent of the parties, continued the cause to the next term.

MANDEVILLE (JANNEY v.). See Case No. 7,213.

MANDEVILLE (LEWIS v.). See Case No. 8,326.

Case No. 9,012.

MANDEVILLE v. LOVE.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 249.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1821.

JUDGMENT—SUPERSEDEAS—SURETIES.

A judgment of the circuit court cannot be superseded without two sureties.

[Cited in Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Co. v. Bancroft, Case No. 2,644.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Wallach, for defendant, moved the court to quash an execution which had issued upon a supersedeas of a judgment of this court, acknowledged by the original defendant and one surety only; whereas the act of Maryland of 1791, c. 67, requires two.

Mr. Lear, for plaintiff.

THE COURT (nem. con.) quashed the execution.

Case No. 9,013.

MANDEVILLE v. McDONALD et al.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 631.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1829.

JUDGMENT — DECEASE OF DEFENDANT — SCIRE FACIAS AGAINST TERRE-TENANTS — DEFECTIVE RETURN — MOTION TO QUASH RETURN—PLEA OF OTHER TERRE-TENANTS.

1. The remedy for a defective return of a scire facias against terre-tenants is not a plea in abatement, nor a motion by the defendants to quash the writ, but a motion to quash the return; but the return may be amended. The defendants may lay a rule on the plaintiff to declare; and the marshal's return of the scire facias will make part of the declaration, and the defendants will have time to plead.

2. The terre-tenants warned may plead, in delay of execution, that there are other terre-tenants, in the same county, not summoned.

Scire facias against the administrator, trustees, and terre-tenants of S. Eliot, deceased.

After stating that a judgment, in favor of the plaintiff, was rendered against the said S. Eliot on the 25th of January, 1820, it commanded the marshal: "That you make known to the heirs of the said S. Eliot, deceased, and the terre-tenant or terre-tenants of all the lands, lots, squares, and tenements in your bailiwick, whereof the said S. Eliot on the 25th of January, 1820, (on which day the judgment aforesaid was rendered.) or ever afterwards was seized, and to William Brent, John G. McDonald, and Frederick May, trustees, and to John G. McDonald, administrator of the said S. Eliot, that they and all of them be and appear," &c., "to show cause, if any they have, why the damages, costs, and charges aforesaid ought not to be levied on those lots, squares, lands, and tenements, and paid to the said James Mandeville, according to the force, form, and effect of the recovery aforesaid, if he the said James Mandeville shall think fit," &c.

The return of the marshal is as follows: "Scire feci William Brent, one of the trustees, November 13, 1827, in presence of J. H. B. and E. M., of the lots below mentioned; scire feci John G. McDonald, one of the trustees and administrator of the same lots, November 19th, 1827, in presence of J. H. B. and E. M. Also scire feci Catharine Mary Eliot, terre-tenant and heir of said lots, and Wallace Eliot, terre-tenant and heir of said lots, November 19, 1827, in presence of R. B. and A. S. W. Also scire feci William Henry Eliot, another terre-tenant and heir, November 19, 1827, in presence of H. M. M. and S. L. D. Also scire feci Johnson Eliot, another terre-tenant and heir of said lots and squares, November 19, 1827, in presence of R. K. and Z. D. B. Also scire feci, November 20, 1827, Frederick May, trustee, in presence of S. M. and H. C., lots 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, in square 299 in the city of Washington, all square 354," (&c., &c., designating 110 lots and 10 whole squares,) "all the above lots and squares lying in the city of Washington; also scire feci James Greenleaf and William A. Bradley, terre-tenants of square 473, lying in the said city—James Greenleaf, November 19, 1827, in presence of J. H. B. and E. M., and William A. Bradley in presence of A. B. T. and J. H. B. Tench Ringgold, Marshal."

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

The above return was afterwards amended by adding these words: "The above named persons being all the terre-tenants in my bailiwick."

Mr. Bradley, for defendants, moved to quash the scire facias. 1st. Because it does not state that the land was the property of Mr. Eliot. 2d. Because the return does not state that the terre-tenants summoned were all the terre-tenants of the lands. 3d. Because there ought to have been a previous scire facias against the personal representatives of Eliot; and cited 1 Strange, 401; Carth. 105, 107; 2 Saund. 72r; Tidd, Prac. Append. 337, No. 71; 2 Saund. 7, notes 7, 8, 10; Tidd, Prac. 1037; 1 Salk. 52; 2 Salk. 601, and 2 Saund. 9, 23. Tidd, Prac. 1043, and 2 Har. Ent. 534, and Baker v. French [Case No. 767], in this court, December term, 1824, were cited for the plaintiff by Mr. Morfit, who contended that the defendants should have pleaded in abatement.

Mr. Bradley, in reply, observed that the case of Baker v. French [supra], was a special scire facias, naming the terre-tenants in the writ, whereas the present scire facias was general.

CRANCH, Chief Judge (nem. con.). The question is, whether the motion to quash the scire facias is the proper remedy. After looking at all the cases cited, and many more, I think it is not. The only case which seemed to justify that course is Hillier v. Frost, 1 Strange, 401, but that case has been misunderstood. It was not a rule to amend the sheriff's return of the writ, but to amend the writ of scire facias itself, by making it returnable on Saturday instead of Friday, which was the feast of St. Martin. The motion was made by the plaintiff; but Sir John Strange, who was the plaintiff's counsel, remarks that "he had little to say for it," "so it was discharged; and he moved to quash the writ, which was ordered accordingly." I have seen no case in which a scire facias has been quashed, on motion of the defendant, for a defective return of the sheriff, there being no fault in the writ itself. The defendants may lay a rule on the plaintiff to declare. The marshal's return will make part of the declaration, and the defendants will have time to plead such pleas as they may be advised to plead.

The other judges assented.

In this cause, at the last term, the court decided that W. A. Bradley, one of the tenants summoned, had a right to plead in delay of execution, that there were other terre-tenants, of other lands, not summoned; and that the plea offered by him, when put into proper form, should be received.

At the present term, Mr. Morfit, for plaintiff, moved for judgment by default against all the terre-tenants summoned, and against "John G. McDonald, one of the trustees, and administrator of the same lots," and against "Wm. Brent, one of the trustees," and against "Frederick May, one of the trustees."

W. A. Bradley now offered his amended plea; and W. Brent, F. May, and John G. McDonald offered to plead.

After considering the cases and authorities cited in the note below, THE COURT received the plea offered by Mr. Bradley, and permitted the defendants to plead, and overruled the motion of Mr. Morfit for judgment by default.

The cause was then continued, to make up the issues, and was continued from term to term until ——— term, when it was placed by consent upon what is called the "stet" docket, where it has remained ever since.[2]

[2] The plea of Mr. Bradley, it is understood, was in this form: And the said Wm. A. Bradley by ———, his attorney, comes and prays a hearing of the writ of scire facias aforesaid and of the return thereof, and they are read to him in these words, namely, (here insert them,) which being read and heard, the said William A. Bradley saith that he ought not now to be put to answer the declaration of the said James Mandeville, nor to the writ and return aforesaid; because he says that there were, at the time of the said return of the said writ of scire facias, and yet are, other tenants of certain lots, squares, pieces, and parcels, lying and being in the city of Washington, in the county of Washington aforesaid, who are not named in the said writ, or in the said return, and who have not been returned summoned; of which said lots, squares, pieces, and parcels of land the said Samuel Eliot was seized on his demesne as of fee, on and after the time of the rendition of the said judgment against him as aforesaid, that is to say—that the president, directors, and company of the Bank of Washington, were at the said time of the said return, and now are, tenants of the lots numbered ——— in the said city, of which said lots the said Samuel Eliot was seized in his demesne as of fee at the time of the said rendition of the said judgment. And that one Anthony Preston was, and yet is, tenant of lot ——— in the said city, of which said lot the said Samuel Eliot was seized in his demesne as of fee, at the said time of the said rendition of the said judgment. And that one Peter Lenox was and is tenant of, &c. And that one Lewis H. Machem was and is, &c. And that one William Douglass was and is, &c. And that one Tobias Simpson was and is, &c. And the said Wm. A. Bradley further says that no writ of scire facias, issued out of this court, has been served upon the said president, directors, and company of the Bank of Washington, nor upon the said Anthony Preston, nor upon

Upon the subject of scire facias against terre-tenants, and the lien of a judgment upon the lands of the debtor, see the following cases and authorities: Hillier v. Frost, 1 Strange, 401; Panton v. Terre-tenants of Hall, Carth. 105; Reg. Jud. 57; Bricknold v. Owen, 2 Dyer, 207b, case 15; Smarte v. Edsun, 1 Lev. 30; Adams v. Terre-tenants of Savage, 2 Salk. 601; 6 Mod. 199, 226; Tidd, Prac. 1032; 2 Saund. 7, note 4; Berisford v. Cole, Comb. 282; Jeffreson v. Morton, 2 Saund. 7; Gwin v. Lloyd, 1 Keb. 54, 351; Michel v. Croft, Cro. Jac. 506; Phelps v. Lewis, 2 Saund. 210e, note 1; Harbert's Case, 3 Coke, 14b; Dyer, 331b, pls. 23, 24; Clerk v. Hardwick, Moore, 524; 2 Har. Entries, 174, 257, 444, 496, 534, 583, 749, 763, 765; Co. Entries, 619–624; St. 5 Geo. II. c. 7; Chancellor Kilty's Report on the English Statutes, 29 Car. II. p. 241, c. 3, § 16, and 5 Geo. II. p. 249, c. 7, § 4; Ridgely v. Gartrell, 3 Har. & McH. 449; 2 Inst. 396; Palmer's Case, 4 Coke, 74; Heath, Max. 3; 2 Hawk. pp. 153, 253, §§ 119, 123, 126; Barnes, Notes Cas. 207, 210, 213, 214, 218, 221; Cro. Jac. 119; Dyer, 208; Nicholson v. Sligh, 1 Har. & McH. 434; Arnott v. Nicholls, 1 Har. & J. 471, 473; Hindman v. Ringgold, Id. note a; McElderry v. Smith, 2 Har. & J. 72; Tidd, Prac. 1046; Eyres v. Taunton, Cro. Car. 295, 312; Baker v. French [Case No. 767], in this court, December term, 1824; 2 Saund. 8, note 10; Tidd, Prac. 1003, 1021; Tidd, App. 437; Steph. Pl. 63, 126, 128, 239, 430; Owings v. Norwood, 2 Har. & J. 101; Beatty v. Chapline, Id. 26.

---

the said Peter Lenox, nor upon the said Lewis H. Machem, nor upon the said William Douglass, nor upon the said Tobias Simpson, to show cause why the damages, costs, and charges, so as aforesaid recovered against the said Samuel Eliot, should not be levied on the said several lots, squares, pieces, and parcels of land, of which the said president, directors, and company of the Bank of Washington, and the said Anthony Preston, Peter Lenox, Lewis H. Machem, William Douglass, and Tobias Simpson were and are, respectively, tenants as aforesaid. And this the said Wm. A. Bradley is ready to verify; wherefore he prays judgment whether he shall be put to answer to the said declaration of the said plaintiff, or to the said writ and return, until the said president, directors, and company of the Bank of Washington, and the said Anthony Preston, and the said Peter Lenox, and the said Lewis H. Machem, and the said William Douglass, and the said Tobias Simpson, respectively, tenants as aforesaid, shall have been warned to show cause as aforesaid.

The defendants W. Brent, F. May, and J. G. McDonald, after oyer of the writ of scire facias and the return thereof, say, that the said writ of scire facias, and the said return thereof, and the declaration of the said James Mandeville thereupon, are not sufficient in law for the said James to have execution of the said damages, costs, and charges in the said writ and declaration mentioned against them, the said W. Brent, F. May, and J. G. McDonald, of or upon the aforesaid lots, parcels, and squares of land set forth in the said return, or of any part thereof to be levied; and that the said W. B., F. M., and J. G. McD. are not bound by the law of the land to answer thereunto, and this they are ready to verify; wherefore, for that the same are insufficient in law as aforesaid they pray judgment, and that the said James may be precluded from having his execution aforesaid against them in manner and form as in and by his said declaration he has prayed.

And for cause of demurrer in this behalf they show the following, to wit:

1. That they ought not to be impleaded jointly with the heirs, administrator, and terre-tenants of the said Eliot.

2. That it does not appear by the said writ of scire facias or return, or by the declaration thereupon, that any writ of scire facias against the administrator of the goods, chattels, rights, and credits of the said Eliot had been previously issued at the suit of the said James. Tidd, Prac. 1032.

3. That the said W. B., F. M., and J. G. McD. are not liable, in any manner, as trustees, to contribute with the heirs and terre-tenants of the said Eliot, in the payment of the damages, costs, and charges, in the said writ mentioned; nor are liable in any manner to the execution therefor, they not being returned as terre-tenants.

4. That in and by the said writ of scire facias, the said W. Brent, F. May, and J. G. McDonald are only permitted to show cause, &c., "if the said James Mandeville shall think fit."

5. That it is not stated in the said writ that they, the said W. B., F. M., and J. G. McD. are trustees of, or in any manner interested in, any part of the lands of which the said S. Eliot was seized in fee, at the time of, or at any time after the rendition of the said judgment.

6. That the said marshal, in his said return, has not stated that any of the lots, parcels, or squares therein mentioned, were or are lots, parcels, or squares of land or lands and tenements of which the said S. Eliot was seized in fee at the time of the rendition of the said judgment, or at any time thereafter.

Case No. 9,014.

MANDEVILLE et al. v. MACKENZIE.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 23.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1801.

NOTES—INDORSER—SUIT AGAINST MAKER — INEFFECTUAL RETURN.

In order to charge an indorser in Virginia, it is necessary for the plaintiff to show that he instituted his suit against the maker in due time, and prosecuted it diligently to an ineffectual execution.

Assumpsit by the indorsee against the indorser of a promissory note made by John McIver, payable to the defendant [Alexander Mackenzie], and by him indorsed to the plaintiffs [Mandeville & Jamieson]. The note was payable on the 19th of February, 1797, and protested for non-payment on the 20th. The jury found a special verdict in these words, namely: "We find the note in the declaration mentioned in these words, namely: We find the indorsement, &c. We find that the plaintiffs instituted a suit in the court of hustings in the town of Alexandria, against the said John McIver, and obtained a judgment thereon against him. We find that the said judgment has not been paid, or any way satisfied. We find, that before the commencement of this suit, the said John McIver became insolvent, and took the oath of an insolvent debtor, according to law. We find, that after the protest of the said note, and before the plaintiffs commenced suit against the said McIver, the plaintiffs received from said McIver, in part payment of said note, the following sums, namely: March 9th, 1797, $100; March 10th, $73.34; June 30th, $30. If the law be for the plaintiffs, we find for the plaintiffs $82.13 damages; if the law be for the defendant, we find for the defendant."

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

CRANCH, Circuit Judge. The contract of the assignor is to this effect, that he will repay the money to the assignee if the assignee cannot obtain the money from the promissor, having used due diligence therefor. The plaintiff, to entitle himself to recover, must make out his case; that is, he must show that he has not obtained the money from the maker of the note, and that he has used due diligence. It is admitted that a suit, prosecuted to judgment and execution, is, in Virginia, a necessary part of that diligence, (unless, perhaps, it can be shown that the maker was insolvent, or had run away,) but it is not the whole of due diligence. The plaintiff must show further that he prosecuted his suit in a reasonable time, that the execution has been delivered to the proper officer to be served, and that it has been ineffectual. This I take to be as necessary a part of the plaintiff's case, as it is to show that he brought a suit; for the defendant's engagement is only conditional, and the condition is precedent. The jury have not found at what time the suit was brought against McIver, but they have found that it was not brought before the 30th June, 1797. They have not found that any execution was taken out upon that judgment, nor have they stated whether McIver became insolvent before or after the judgment was rendered against him. They have only found that he became insolvent before the suit was brought against the present defendant, McKenzie.

The fact of due diligence must have been necessarily in issue, as part of the plaintiff's cause of action, and the jury not having expressly found that due diligence was used, and not having found facts enough for the court to decide whether such diligence was used or not, I think a venire facias de novo ought to be awarded.

KILTY, Chief Judge, and MARSHALL, Circuit Judge, assented.

The authorities cited were, Lee v. Love, MS. (since reported in 1 Call, 497); Kyd, 208; Strange, 745; 1 Wils. 48; 1 Term R. 167; 1 Salk. 132; Mackie v. Davis, 2 Wash. [Va.] 219; 2 Ld. Raym. 758; 3 Burrows, 1522; Kyd, 165; Bull. N. P. 271; 2 Strange, 1145.

MANDEVILLE (MUNROE v.). See Case No. 9,929.

MANDEVILLE (OLIVE v.). See Case No. 10,488.

MANDEVILLE (RIDDLE v.). See Case No. 11,807.

Case No. 9,015.

MANDEVILLE v. RINGGOLD.

[Cited in Addison v. Duckett Case No. 77. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 9,016.

MANDEVILLE v. RUMNEY.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 424.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1829.

NOTES—DAYS OF GRACE—PROTEST—SUIT BROUGHT.

If Sunday be the last day of grace, the demand, protest, and notice may be on Saturday, and if the protest be after bank hours on Saturday, the suit may be brought the same evening.

Debt, against the maker of a promissory note. Sunday was the third day of grace, payment was demanded, and the note protested on Saturday after bank hours. The suit was brought the same evening, after protest.

Verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court whether the suit was not brought too soon.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, doubting), was of opinion, that it was not. See Story, Chit. Bills, and the cases cited there in the notes.

THE COURT was of the same opinion, in the action of the same plaintiff against Runels, the indorser of the same note.

MANDEVILLE (SHEEHY v.). See Case No. 12,740.

MANDEVILLE (SUTTON v.). See Cases Nos. 13,648–13,651.

Case No. 9,017.

MANDEVILLE et al. v. WASHINGTON.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 4.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1801.

PRACTICE AT LAW — WRIT OF INQUIRY — PLAINTIFFS' OATH.

On a writ of inquiry the plaintiff's oath may be given in evidence of the amount of his claim.

On writ of inquiry. [Suit by Mandeville & Jamieson against Nathaniel Washington.]

THE COURT admitted an account supported by the plaintiffs' affidavit to be given in evidence to the jury, it having been stated by some of the bar and admitted by all, that such has been the practice in the district courts of the commonwealth of Virginia.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

MANDEVILLE (WELCH v.). See Cases Nos. 17,370 and 17,371.

MANDEVILLE (WILSON v.). See Cases Nos. 17,820 and 17,821.

MANDEVILLE (YOUNG v.). See Case No. 18,161.

Case No. 9,018.

M. & M. NATIONAL BANK OF PITTSBURGH v. BRADY'S BEND IRON CO.

[5 N. B. R. 491;[1] 19 Pittsb. Leg. J. 5; 3 Chi. Leg. News, 402; 28 Leg. Int. 317; 4 Am. Law T. 168; 8 Phila. 171; 3 Pittsb. Rep. 326; 1 Leg. Op. 202; 1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 272.]

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. 1871.

BANKRUPTCY — PROVISIONAL ASSIGNEE — BENEFIT TO CREDITORS—REMOVAL OF GOODS—FRAUD.

1. A provisional assignee should not be appointed unless the court is satisfied that it is necessary for the protection of the property, and that it will enure to the benefit of all the creditors.

[Cited in Re Carrier, 47 Fed. 441.]

2. The removal of a debtor's goods in fulfillment of an existing contract made long before the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings, is not fraudulent within the meaning of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], and not sufficient grounds for the appointment of a provisional assignee.

In bankruptcy.

C. B. M. Smith, Mr. Veech, and David Watson, for creditors.

Mr. Golden, for respondents.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. The M. & M. National Bank of Pittsburgh present their petition to this court, praying that the Brady's Bend Iron Co. may be declared bankrupts. To this an answer has been filed denying the acts of bankruptcy charged, and demanding a trial by jury, which has been ordered. They also allege that the company is removing its goods and chattels, the produce of its works, from its place of business at Brady's Bend; that such disposition of its property is fraudulent, and intended to defeat the provisions of the bankrupt law; and they pray the court to issue their warrant to the marshal, commanding him to take possession, provisionally, of all the property of the company. To this a sworn denial has been filed, and assigning grave reasons why the prayer of the petition should not be granted.

The exercise of this power—appointing a provisional assignee—is one of great delicacy, and should not be called into action unless the court is satisfied that it is necessary for the protection of the property, and that it will enure to the benefit of the creditors. It is discretionary, but it is a legal discretion, to be used with the best lights before us. We must be satisfied that the disposition of the property is fraudulent, with the design to remove the same to the prejudice of the general creditors, and to defeat the provisions of the bankrupt law. It is not charged, in the adversary petition, that the stoppage of payment of the commercial paper was fraudulent; but in the application for the appointment of a provisional assignee, the removal of the railroad iron, in fulfillment of a contract long since made, is declared to be so. Fraudulently means knowingly and without just excuse, as applicable to the paper itself. If a man or a corporation declines to pay, because he is not liable to pay, or because he has a valid claim against the paper, or a set off, that is not a stoppage or suspension within the bankrupt law. In re Sutherland [Case No. 13,639]; Bump, 500.

Take the case of a forgery. An honest defence to the particular paper unpaid would take the case out of the statute. If this be so, how can the removal of the goods of the debtor in the performance of an existing contract be deemed fraudulent. It is but the exercise of the legitimate functions of the corporation in carrying on their business, and for all the goods shipped they receive an equivalent in bills of exchange or money, which is for the benefit of all the creditors. To appoint a provisional assignee, pending the issue to be tried by a jury, would be to arrest the operation of the machinery, stop these extensive and valuable works, and throw hundreds of workmen out of employment. For we cannot order the marshal to do more than to take possession of and guard the property of the corporation until the trial by jury is had, or until the further order of the court. This would be ruinous to both debtor and creditor, and would impair the security which the latter has for the payment of his debt.

It is proper to add, that since the argument I have conferred with my Brother McKENNAN, and we concur in the principles upon which this case should be decided.

The rule is discharged, and the appointment of a provisional assignee is refused.

[1] [Reprinted from 5 N. B. R. 491, by permission.]

Case No. 9,019.

The MANHASSET.

The HIRAM PERRY.

[6 Ben. 301.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1873.

COLLISION — EAST RIVER — TUG-BOAT AND TOW — STEAMERS CROSSING—WILFUL TORT—JOINT NEGLIGENCE.

1. A tug, having several boats in tow, coming down the East river, on an ebb tide, rounded to to pick up another boat on the New York side, just above the Fulton ferry slip. A Fulton ferry-boat, coming out of that slip, came in collision with the stern boat on the port side. The ferry-boat claimed that, when she came out of the slip, the tug was going down the river, and that, after the ferry-boat got headed up the river against the tide, the tug turned around across her course. Her pilot stated that, as soon as he saw her sheer, he rang a bell to slow the engine, and then to stop and back; and the engineer testified that he made four or five turns of the engine ahead, under the bell to slow, before he stopped and backed. The speed of the ferry-boat was nearly done at the collision, and she struck the boat about twenty-five feet from her stern. The owner of the boat filed a libel against both the tug and the ferry-boat, but the tug was not seized under the process. On the trial, a motion was made, on behalf of the ferry-boat, that the libellant be compelled to bring in the tug, or the libel be dismissed. The motion was denied, but the libel was directed to be amended by striking out the prayer for process against the tug. On the trial, one of the libellant's witnesses testified, that it looked to him as if the ferry-boat hit the boat intentionally. The owners of the ferry-boat claimed that she was not liable for the wilful tort of her pilot: Held, that, on the story of the ferry-boat, when the tug had turned so as to be heading across the river, the courses were crossing, and the ferry-boat, having the tug on her starboard hand, was bound to avoid her and her tow, and when the tug had turned so as to head up the river, the ferry-boat was the following boat, and was still bound to avoid them.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. The ferry-boat was in fault in not stopping and backing at once, as soon as her pilot saw the tug turn, instead of keeping on under a slow bell.

3. The act of the pilot of the ferry-boat was not wilful, in such sense as to relieve the ferry-boat from liability for the result of it.

4. Although the libel was filed against both tug and ferry-boat, the libellant could recover against the ferry-boat alone, because there was independent fault on her part, and any fault in the tug in sheering was not a fault which contributed to the collision.

In admiralty.

Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for libellant.

B. D. Silliman, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The libellant, as owner of an empty coal barge or chunker, which was in tow of the steam-tug Hiram Perry, on the 13th of January, 1869, seeks to recover, in this suit, the damages sustained by him, by means of a collision which took place, about noon on that day, between the ferry-boat Manhasset, then on a trip from her slip at the foot of Catherine street, in New York, to her slip at the foot of Main street, in Brooklyn. The tug had six boats in tow, namely, two on each side of her, alongside, and two astern, the libellant's boat being one of the two astern, and being tailed on to the stern of the boat which was next to the tug on the port side of the latter. This chunker was a boat in two parts, divided crosswise. The stem of the ferry-boat struck the port side of the after half of the chunker, at about the middle of its length, and it soon afterwards sank. The tug, with her tows, was bound from the Wallabout, in Brooklyn, to South Amboy, and was about to pick up another empty boat, on the New York shore, at a point above the New York slip of the ferry-boat. The tide was strong ebb.

The story of the libel is, that the tug, when nearing the point where she desired to pick up the additional boat, rounded towards the New York shore, with the view of heading up to the tide; that, while she was heading in towards the New York shore, and gradually turning towards the east, the boats following in her wake, the ferry-boat came out of her slip, and, as she came out, gradually turned, so as to head to the east, and, keeping on, struck the chunker; that the approach of the ferry-boat was not noticed by those on the tug, until just as she was striking the chunker; that the collision was caused by the joint negligence of the two steam vessels, the ferry-boat being in fault in not going under the stern of the chunker, and the tug in not keeping a look-out; and that the chunker was entirely helpless and without fault. The libel prays for process against both the ferry-boat and the tug, and that they may both be condemned. Process was issued against both vessels, but was not served on the tug, and she has not appeared or answered. The ferry-boat was served with process, and appeared and answered. At the trial, a motion was made on the part of the ferry-boat, that the libellant be compelled to bring in the tug, or the libel be dismissed. The motion was denied, except so far as to direct the libel to be amended by striking out the prayer for process against the tug.

The answer of the ferry-boat denies the allegation of the libel, that the tug is within this district. It sets up, that, on the coming out of the ferry-boat from her slip into the river, her pilot saw the tug and her tows in the middle of the river, heading down; that there was nothing to indicate any intended change in their course; that their position and the rate of the tide were such, that the ferry-boat could not have crossed the river in front of them without great danger of collision with them, and could not have made her proper and necessary course, at that state of the tide, if she had crossed in front of them; that, therefore, and thereupon, she was headed up the river, against the tide, in order that she might safely pass between them and the New York shore, as prudence and good navigation required her to do, and as was the obvious and proper and usual course, under such circumstances, and as there was plenty of room for her to do; that the course on which the ferry-boat was thus placed was such, that, but for the misconduct of the tug, or the tug and chunker, or the tow, or those managing and having charge of the same, she would easily have gone clear of the tow and of the chunker, and between the same and the New York shore; that, while the ferry-boat was thus proceeding on her course, and on a line widely clear of, and parallel to, the line on which the tow, including the tug, was moving, the tug and tow suddenly sheered in rankly towards the New York shore, across the course and track of the ferry-boat; that, perceiving that such action of the tug and tow would render a collision probable, the ferry-boat at once stopped her engines, and reversed her wheels, and backed, and did everything in her power to avoid collision with the tug, or her tow, or any part thereof, but, as the tug sheered across the tide, and changed her heading against it, the chunker was swung down, by the strong ebb tide, upon and against the bow of the ferry-boat; that, at the time of the collision, the ferry-boat had no headway whatever, and did not run into, or against, the chunker; that the approach of the ferry-boat was not noticed by those on the tug until just at the time of the collision; that the tug had no lookout at the time; that, if the chunker had been properly managed at the time, the collision might have been avoided; that it resulted, in part, from such mismanagement of the tug, and also from the omission of the chunker seasonably to shift her lines, and to be so steered as to aid the ferry-boat in avoiding the collision; that the ferry-boat, during the whole of her trip, was navigated with skill, care and caution, and everything that could be done to avoid the collision, or to lessen its violence, when it became inevitable, was done by those in charge of the ferry-boat; and that the collision was caused wholly by the carelessness, negligence, and want of skill and prudence, and bad management, and bad and improper navigation, of the tug, or of the chunker, or of both, and of the persons then in charge of the same, or some of them.

Three witnesses have been examined on behalf of each party—the libellant himself, on his own behalf; and, on his part, the master of the tug, and her pilot. The libellant was on his own boat, at the time of the collision. The master of the tug was in her pilot house, steering her. Her pilot was on one of the boats on her starboard side. The witnesses for the ferry-boat are three persons from her—her pilot, who was in her pilot house, steering; a deck hand, who was standing at the king post, on her port side, at her bow; and her engineer, who was in her engine room, below deck.

It is impossible to conceive of stories more diametrically opposite than those which these witnesses tell. The libellant, and Conlon, the pilot of the tug, assert that the tug had turned and got headed pretty well around towards up the river, and angling upwards towards the New York shore, before the ferry-boat left her slip. Both of them say that they saw the ferry-boat as she was coming out of her slip. Parisen, the master of the tug, says that he did not see the ferry-boat leave her slip; that she had not left her slip when he began to round; that he did not see her until he had got headed about two-thirds up the river; and that, when he first saw her, she was about thirty or forty feet off from the chunker.

Kershaw, the pilot of the ferry-boat, says, that, as he started to go out of his slip, he saw the tug heading down the river; that she was so heading when he went out of the slip; that he headed up the river, and would have passed one hundred feet or more to the New York side of her, but, after he got straightened up the river, the tug changed her course, and turned short across the bow of the ferry-boat, without making any signal before sheering; that he rang to slow, stop and back, when the tug sheered; that the tug went one hundred feet clear of the ferry-boat, across her bow, but the strong tide swept the chunker down against the ferry-boat; and that the tug was heading very nearly straight up the river, the same way with the ferry-boat, at the time of the blow. Boyd, the deck hand on the ferry-boat, says, that, as the ferry-boat went out of the slip, he saw the tug heading down the river; that the ferry-boat turned up, and, after she got straightened up, the tug, without making any signal, rounded to across the bow of the ferry-boat; and that, at the collision, the tug was the length of two boats away, and headed up the river about the same way with the ferry-boat.

Although positively testified to by the witnesses for the ferry-boat, it requires great faith to believe it possible that in the short space of time which elapsed between the time the ferry-boat left her slip and the collision, the tug could have left a straight course down the river and rounded to and described a complete half circle, and come to head directly up the river, the same way with the ferry-boat. The story on the part of the libellant is much the more probable one, in view of all the circumstances surrounding the occurrence. But it is not necessary to solve this question, for, even assuming that the tug did not begin to turn till after the ferry-boat was coming out of her slip, the evidence on the part of the ferry-boat shows that she ought to have avoided the collision, and might have done so. From the time the tug, in turning, got so far around as to head so towards the New York shore, that her course was crossing that of the ferry-boat, the ferry-boat, having her on the starboard side, was bound to avoid her and her tow. So, from the time the tug, in turning, got so far around that the ferry-boat became the following boat, the ferry-boat was bound to avoid the tug and her tow. The pilot of the ferry-boat says, that he rang his bell to slow when the tug sheered, as soon as he saw her sheer; that he then immediately rang the bells to stop and back; and that the way of his boat was about done, when the collision took place. The engineer of the ferry-boat says, that, on starting from the slip, he received one bell, to go ahead; that, while running under that bell he received another bell; and that, on receiving this last bell, he shut his engine off. That was a bell to slow. To shut off, is to slow, not to stop. The bell to slow was the bell which the pilot says he rang as soon as he saw the tug sheer. The engineer says, that he made four or five turns ahead, while so running slowed down, and then received two bells to back; that he had made about four or five turns back before he felt the blow of the collision; and that, with such a strong ebb tide as there then was, four or five turns back would pretty much kill the headway of the boat. As it was, the ferry-boat almost avoided the collision. She did not strike a point further forward on the chunker than twenty-five feet forward from the extreme rear. I cannot resist the conclusion that, if the ferry-boat, instead of continuing to run ahead four or five turns, under the slow bell, had stopped and backed sooner than she did, the collision would have been avoided, and she would have passed under the stern of the chunker. The pilot of the ferry-boat says, that the way of his boat was about done when she struck the chunker. If this was so, and if the four or five turns back effected that result, more turns back, instead of the four or five turns ahead, under the slow bell, would, undoubtedly, with the strong ebb tide, as the tug was going ahead, have enabled the ferry-boat to clear the tow.

One of the witnesses for the libellant stated, in his testimony, that, in his judgment, the ferry-boat did not try to avoid the chunker; and that it looked to him as if the ferry-boat hit her intentionally. The claimants, assuming this as a fact proved, urge, that the ferry-boat is not liable for a collision caused by the wilful fault of her pilot. But, the wilful character of the act is not set up in the libel, nor is it averred in the answer, and it is very far from being established by the above-mentioned remark of the witness. There is nothing to show that the act was wilful, in the sense of being malicious, or that the ferry-boat ran against the chunker because of an intention to do so on the part of her pilot. The act was wilful in one sense, because the acts of the pilot were the voluntary emanations of his will, but there is nothing to show that his intention was to cause a collision.

It is also urged, for the claimants, that, as the libel alleges joint negligence in the tug and the ferry-boat, as the cause of the collision, the tug ought to have been brought in by process, she having been made a party by the libel. But this point is disposed of by the amendment referred to. The suit stands, and was tried, as one against the ferry-boat alone. The only question is, as to whether the ferry-boat was guilty of independent fault or negligence which caused the collision. The chunker was helpless, and did nothing to cause the collision. The fact that the tug may also have been in fault, in some particular, is of no consequence, as respects fault on the part of the ferry-boat, provided the fault of the ferry-boat is one distinct from, and independent of, any alleged fault on the part of the tug. The only fault set up, on the part of the ferry-boat, as a fault in the tug, is, that the tug suddenly sheered across the course of the ferry-boat. But notwithstanding the tug may have sheered, to turn, after the ferry-boat left her slip, there was the separate and independent fault, on the part of the ferry-boat, which has been pointed out. The allegation of her answer, that she at once stopped her engines and reversed her wheels and backed, on perceiving the sheer of the tug and tow, and that it would render a collision probable, is disproved by the testimony of her engineer. For the fault of the ferry-boat, the libellant is entitled to recover his full damages against the ferry-boat alone, because, in the view I take of the case, any fault there may have been on the part of the tug, in sheering, was not a fault which contributed to the collision which the fault of the ferry-boat caused. The ferry-boat ought to have, and could have, avoided the chunker, in the actual predicament, whether the chunker was brought to her position by a sheer before, or a sheer after, the ferry-boat left her slip.

There must be a decree for the libellant, with costs, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the damages sustained by the libellant.

MANHASSET, The (EDWARDS v.). See Case No. 4,295.

Case No. 9,020.

The MANHATTAN.

[2 Ben. 88;[1] 7 Int. Rev. Rec. 28; 1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 11.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1868.[2]

SHIPPING—PASSENGER ACT—STEAMSHIPS.

The provisions of the second section of the passenger act of March 3d, 1855 (10 Stat. 715), do not apply to steamships.

[Cited in The Devonshire, 13 Fed. 41; U. S. v. The Strathairly, 124 U. S. 577, 8 Sup. Ct. 615.]

At law.

T. Simons, Ass't U. S. Atty., for libellants.

T. C. T. Buckley, S. P. Nash, and J. Larocque, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel filed by the United States against the steamship Manhattan, a foreign vessel, owned in Great Britain, founded on the act passed March 3d, 1855, entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels." 10 Stat. 715. The libel alleges, in substance, that the steamship heretofore took on board, at Liverpool, in England, sundry passengers, with the intent to bring them to the United States, and left Liverpool, and brought such passengers to the port of New York, and within the jurisdiction of the United States. It then charges that the vessel, on such voyage, did not have the berths for her passengers constructed, arranged, and occupied as required by the second section of the act, and avers violations of various provisions of that section, and claims that thereby the master of the vessel forfeited five dollars for each passenger on board on the voyage, and the owners of the vessel also forfeited five dollars for each passenger on board on the voyage, and that an action has accrued to the United States to recover such penalties, and that a lien on the vessel exists for the amount of them.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 15,715.]

The first section of the act provides, that no master of any vessel, owned in whole or in part by a citizen of the United States, or by a citizen of any foreign country, shall take on board such vessel, at any foreign port other than foreign contiguous territory to the United States, a greater number of passengers than in the proportion of certain specified numbers to the tonnage of the vessel; that the "spaces appropriated for the use of such passengers, and which shall not be occupied by stores or other goods not the personal baggage of such passengers," shall be in certain specified proportions, namely, so many passengers to so many clear superficial feet of deck; that, if it is necessary, for safety or convenience, to store any articles "in any of the decks, cabins, or other places appropriated to the use of passengers," such places of storage shall not "be deemed to be a part of the space allowable for the use of passengers, but the same shall be deducted therefrom;" and that one hundred superficial feet of deck for a hospital "may be included in the space allowable for passengers."

The second section provides, that "no such vessel" shall have more than two tiers of berths, and prescribes what interval there shall be between the lowest part thereof and the deck, and that the berths shall be well constructed, parallel with the sides of the vessel, and be separated from each other in a certain manner, and be of such length and such width, and be occupied each by no more than one passenger, with a provision for larger berths, and for their occupation, under certain circumstances. The section then provides, that, if there shall be any violation of it in any of its provisions, the master of the vessel and the owners thereof shall severally forfeit and pay the sum of five dollars for each passenger on board of said vessel on such voyage, to be recovered by the United States in any port where such vessel may arrive.

The fifteenth section of the act provides, that "the amount of the several penalties imposed by the foregoing provisions regulating the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels, shall be liens on the vessel or vessels violating those provisions, and such vessel or vessels shall be libelled therefor in any circuit or district court of the United States where such vessel or vessels shall arrive."

Relying on the provisions thus found in the first, second, and fifteenth sections of the act, the United States have filed this libel. The libel does not allege any violation of the first section of the act, or any overcrowding of passengers, or any carrying of a disproportionate and unlawful number of passengers, or any improper occupation of the space required to be appropriated to the use of passengers, but alleges only violations of provisions of the second section of the act.

The claimants have filed eleven exceptions to the libel, only one of which, the third, is important to be considered, in the view I take of the statute. The other exceptions involve important questions relating to the admiralty jurisdiction of the court in the suit, and to the power of congress to impose on a foreign vessel a lien for the penalties prescribed by the second section of the act, and to other matters, some of substance and some of form. The third exception sets up that the requirements of the second section of the act do not apply to steamships, and that, therefore, the Manhattan is not liable for the penalties claimed in the libel.

The first, second, and fifteenth sections of the act employ only the word "vessel," without limiting the description of vessel to a merchant vessel, or a sailing vessel, or a steam vessel. The provisions of those sections would, therefore, be broad enough, were there nothing else in the act, to include a steam vessel under the words "any vessel," for, a steam vessel is none the less a vessel, in respect to her being water-borne, because she is propelled in whole or in part by steam. But the tenth section of the act provides as follows: "The provisions, requisitions, penalties, and liens of this act relating to the space in vessels appropriated to the use of passengers, are hereby extended and made applicable to all spaces appropriated to the use of steerage passengers in vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and navigating from, to, and between the ports, and in manner as in this act named, and to such vessels and to the masters thereof; and so much of the act entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved August thirtieth, eighteen hundred and fifty-two,' as conflicts with this act, is hereby repealed; and the space appropriated to the use of steerage passengers, in vessels so as above propelled and navigated, is hereby made subject to the supervision and inspection of the collector of the customs at any port of the United States at which any such vessel shall arrive, and the same shall be examined and reported in the same manner and by the same officers by the next preceding section directed to examine and report." The "next preceding section," the ninth, provides as follows: "The collector of customs at any port of the United States at which any vessel so employed shall arrive, shall appoint and direct one or more of the inspectors of the customs for such port to examine such vessel, and report in writing to such collector whether the requirements of law have been complied with in respect to such vessel; and if such report shall state such compliance, and shall be approved by such collector, it shall be deemed and held as primâ facie evidence thereof."

If the provisions of the first section, relating to the space appropriated to the use of passengers, apply to steam vessels, under the designation, in the first section, of "any vessel," then the provision of the tenth section, extending such provisions, with the penalties and liens arising therefrom, "to all spaces appropriated to the use of steerage passengers in vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam," is useless and of no effect. So, also, if the provision of the ninth section relating to the inspection of "any vessel," with a view to see "whether the requirements of law have been complied with in respect to such vessel," applies to the inspection of steam vessels, then the provision of the tenth section, subjecting "the space appropriated to the use of steerage passengers" in steam vessels to like inspection, is utterly nugatory. All the affirmative and substantial provisions of the tenth section must be held to be meaningless, if the first and ninth sections are held to apply to steam vessels. And, if the first section does not apply to steam vessels, the second does not, for, the only designation, in the second section, of any vessel to which its provisions are to apply, is by the description, "such vessel,"—that is, such a vessel, and such a vessel only, as the first section applies to and designates.

But there is something more. The first section relates solely to the space appropriated to the use of passengers. The tenth section extends the provisions, requisitions, and penalties found in the first section, and the liens which arise therefrom by virtue of the fifteenth section, and makes them applicable to something to which, by virtue merely of the first and fifteenth sections, and but for the tenth section, they would not extend and be applicable. This must be the meaning of the tenth section, or there is no force in language. If those provisions, requisitions, penalties, and liens extend and apply without the tenth section, just as far and as widely as they do with and by means of the tenth section, then the tenth section may be obliterated from the act. But the proper rule of construction in regard to statutes is, that they must be so construed as to give force and effect and meaning and consistency to all their provisions. By construing the first and ninth sections as not applying to steam vessels, the tenth section has a meaning and operation in all its parts. It extends and applies the first and fifteenth sections, so far as they relate to the space in vessels appropriated to the use of passengers, "to all spaces appropriated to the use of steerage passengers in vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and navigating from, to, and between the ports, and in manner as in this act named, and to such vessels and to the masters thereof;" and it extends and applies the inspection provided for by the ninth section to the space appropriated to the use of steerage passengers in the steam vessels named in the tenth section. But the tenth section is very limited in its provisions. It extends to steam vessels only those provisions of the act which relate to the space "appropriated to the use of passengers." Those provisions are found in the first section, and nowhere else. The first section contains in various places the words, "the spaces appropriated for the use of such passengers," "the space aforesaid," "places appropriated to the use of passengers," "space allowable for the use of passengers," "spaces appropriated to passengers," "space allowable for passengers." Similar expressions are not found in any other section of the act except the tenth; and the first section is wholly taken up with prescribing the superficial deck space to be appropriated to each passenger of the number which, by its tonnage, the vessel is authorized by the first section to carry. Again, these provisions of the first section in regard to such space are, by the tenth section, extended and made applicable only to the spaces appropriated to the use of steerage passengers in steam vessels. The tenth section draws a clear distinction between the vessels referred to in the first section, navigating between the ports named in the first section, and steam vessels navigating between the same ports, and indicates, in a manner not to be mistaken, that, as the vessels over which, in certain respects, the tenth section causes the provisions of the first section to be extended, are steam vessels, the vessels to which the first section applies proprio vigore do not include steam vessels. Nor do the vessels to which the second section applies include steam vessels; and the tenth section does not extend the second section to steam vessels. In no proper sense can the provisions of the second section be said to relate to the space appropriated to the use of passengers. That "space" means the superficies of clear and unobstructed deck-room to which each passenger is entitled by the first section. The second section relates wholly to the arrangement of the sleeping accommodations.

It was urged, on the part of the government, that the fact that the tenth section repeals so much of the act of August 30th, 1852 (10 Stat. 61), as conflicts with the act of 1855, taken in connection with the fact that certain provisions of the act of 1852 related substantially to the space appropriated to the use of passengers in vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and were materially different from those found in the act of 1855, shows that the act of 1855, while substituting, by the tenth section, the provisions of the act of 1855, relating to such space, for those of the act of 1852, so far as concerns steamships, was not intended to exempt steamships from the other provisions of the act of 1855. There would be force in this argument if there were found in the tenth section only an isolated clause repealing so much of the act of 1852 as conflicts with the act of 1855. Then the argument would be a good one, that the word "vessel," in the first and second sections, includes steamships, because otherwise there could be nothing in the act of 1852, which relates exclusively to steamships, in conflict with anything in the act of 1855. But this argument fails in view of the other clauses found in the tenth section. That section alone, in the act of 1855, relates to steamships, and as there might be something in the provisions which the tenth section applies to the spaces appropriated to the use of steerage passengers in steam vessels, which would conflict with provisions in the act of 1852, it was proper to repeal the earlier conflicting provisions.

It is well known that the mischiefs which congress was endeavoring to correct when this law was enacted, were those which had arisen in sailing vessels. But, whether this were so or not, congress has, by the statute, drawn a plain distinction in respect to steamships, and has made only certain specified and limited provisions, not including those of the second section, applicable to steamships.

This libel cannot be sustained without obliterating the tenth section from the act. I therefore allow the third exception, and dismiss the libel, without passing on any of the other exceptions in the case.

This decision was affirmed by the circuit court, in October, 1868. [Case No. 15,715.]

MANHATTAN, The (UNITED STATES v.). See Cases Nos. 15,714 and 15,715.

MANHATTAN BRASS CO (UNITED NICKEL CO. v.). See Cases Nos. 14,409, and 14,410.

MANHATTAN ELEVATOR & GRAIN-DRYING CO. (SYKES v.). See Case No. 13,710.

Case No. 9,021.

MANHATTAN FIRE INS. CO. v. The C. L. BREED.

[1 Flip. 655;[1] 9 Chi. Leg. News, 385; 2 Cin. Law Bul. 190.]

District Court, N. D. Ohio. April, 1877.

ADMIRALTY—PROCEEDINGS IN REM—UNDIVIDED INTEREST.

Proceedings in rem in admiralty, cannot be instituted by a party against an undivided interest of an owner in a vessel.

In admiralty.

H. D. Goulder, for libellant.
Willey, Terrell & Sherman, for defendant.

WELKER, District Judge. This is a libel filed by the Manhattan Insurance Company to recover a premium note for an insurance upon five-sixteenths of the schooner C. L. Breed, obtained by the owner of that interest in the schooner. An exception was filed by the defendant, which raises the question whether proceedings in rem in admiralty can be instituted by a party against an undivided interest of an owner in a vessel. There is no controversy at all, but that the Manhattan Fire Insurance Company might proceed in personam against the party who had taken out the insurance, and after obtaining a judgment, might levy upon his interest and sell it for the payment of the decree of this court, founded upon the premium note, or the unpaid premium of the insurance.

But the difficulty in this case arises as to the operation of the machinery that is required in admiralty courts to proceed in rem against vessels. A proceeding in rem always requires that the seizure shall be under the process of the court. The marshal must get possession of the vessel (of the res) before an admiralty court gets jurisdiction in rem; and the difficulty about this sort of a case is, that there is no process by which the marshal has the right, at the instance of this Fire Insurance Company, having a claim against five-sixteenths of the vessel, to seize the whole vessel.

The fact is, that in this case, the marshal did not seize the vessel, but it is agreed by counsel for the purpose of having a decision in relation to this matter, that the proceedings may be treated as though the marshal had seized the vessel. In the first place, I can find no case in which any admiralty court has held, for a hundred years, in the practice of admiralty in this country, that an undivided interest in a vessel might be seized in rem for the satisfaction of a claim against the owner of that interest.

It is replied by counsel on the other side, that that is no reason why the case might not come up as a new question. The fact that in the extensive admiralty practice by so many lawyers, that seems to have prevailed in all the courts of the United States, such a case has never before been attempted, is a strong argument to show that no such law or authority exists.

The process of seizing a vessel and bonding her is entirely different from that of levying an execution upon an undivided interest in real estate or personal property. I am cited by counsel to authorities, which justify and authorize a levy on a joint interest in property to pay a judgment against a joint owner. That is a very common process in all the courts, but the case is not analogous to that of a seizure of a vessel; for where an execution is levied upon a joint interest, the owners of the balance of the interest in the property may give a bond to re-deliver the property at the day of sale, and the sale can go on, and in the meantime the property will be in the hands of the other owners, and be used for its particular purposes, and when the day of sale comes around, to deliver it to the purchaser in any necessary form that may be required in order to make a valid sale; but when a vessel is seized by the marshal, it can only be released upon the claimants of the vessel making a stipulation that they will pay the amount of the decree that may be rendered in the proceedings in rem against the vessel. There is no process for the return of the vessel. The proceeding would have to be against the stipulator in the stipulation, and it is not against the vessel at all after it is bonded. This view of the matter makes a levy on a judgment entirely different from the seizure of a vessel itself.

[1] [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

In the next place, if these joint owners would enter into a stipulation to pay the amount of the decree, they would be compelled to pay the debt of the other joint owners, and in every view that can be taken of the machinery which is necessary to be used in proceedings in rem against vessels it will be found that it cannot be put into operation practically, so as to work out right and justice between the joint owners. That is the reason, no doubt, that in all the law and practice of admiralty, no such case has ever occurred in which a joint owner's interest of this kind was seized in rem.

For these reasons I am clearly of the opinion that these proceedings are not authorized in the admiralty law.

The exceptions will be sustained and the bill will be dismissed.

Case No. 9,022.

MANHATTAN FIRE INS. CO. v. WEILL.

[See 28 Grat. 389.]

Case No. 9,023.

MANHATTAN GAS-LIGHT CO. v. MAXWELL.

[2 Blatchf. 405.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. July 1, 1852.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — APPRAISEMENT — EXCESS OF QUANTITY—PENALTY—FEES OF WEIGHER.

1. A quantity of coal was invoiced and entered at a certain weight and price per ton. On appraisement, the price per ton was reported to be correct, but the quantity was reported as so much greater as to make the entire valuation greater by 10 per cent. than the entry valuation. The collector exacted a penalty of 20 per cent., under section 8 of the act of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 43). Held, that this was illegal.

2. The importer was not liable, in such case, under section 4 of the act of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 43), to pay the fees of the weigher and measurer.

This suit was commenced in the supreme court of New York, and removed by certiorari, on the petition of the defendant [Hugh Maxwell], into this court, under the provisions of the 3d section of the act of congress of March 2, 1833 (4 Stat. 633). The plaintiffs imported from Liverpool a quantity of cannel coal, invoiced and entered as of the weight of 150 tons. It was measured by the custom-house measurers, who returned the quantity to be 167 tons. No appeal was taken by the plaintiffs from that return, and duty was accordingly imposed on 167 tons, and was paid by the importers. The value of the increased quantity of the coal was greater, by more than ten per cent., than the entry valuation, and a penalty of 20 per cent., amounting to $99.60, was imposed by the collector because of such undervaluation. The measurers' fees, $49.50, were also charged to the plaintiffs. Payment of the two last mentioned sums was exacted by the collector, and was made by the plaintiffs under protest. To recover these amounts, $149.10, with interest, this action was brought. The plaintiffs endorsed on the entry a protest in writing "against the payment of the within named penalty of $99.60, and of $49.50 for measuring, as being both illegal and contrary to the former practice in this collection district."

The case was tried in November, 1851, before BETTS, J., and the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs for $150, subject to the opinion of the court on a case to be made and to adjustment or correction at the custom-house.

John S. McCulloh, for plaintiffs.

J. Prescott Hall, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

BETTS, District Judge. The defendant takes no exception to the sufficiency of the protest in this case, and the decision must turn on the points whether the undervaluation reported by the appraisers in respect to the coal subjects it to the penalty of 20 per cent. imposed, and whether the importers were liable to pay the measurers' fees charged against them.

The price per ton of the coal, as stated in the invoice, was reported to be correct. The difference between the valuation in the entry and that reported by the appraisers arose from the greater weight returned by the custom-house weighers.

Cannel coal is sold in England by actual weight, the weight being taken with great care. In the United States, it is delivered from the ship, and sold by the chaldron, and the custom house method of determining the weight of a cargo is to reduce the measured chaldron to tons and pounds, by taking the average weight of two or three tubs full, and multiplying that average by the number of tubs composing a chaldron. The evidence in this case proves that this mode of weighing, or rather measuring, leads to inaccuracy and error, and generally gives, as a result, a nominal weight beyond the real weight of the coal. The official weight must, however, be taken in this case to be the true dutiable weight.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The claim to the penalty exacted is not placed upon any culpable conduct in the importers, nor does their innocence of blame exonerate them from liability to pay the penalty, if the collector brings the case within the provisions of the act. The authority invoked for imposing the penalty is given by the last proviso to the 17th section of the act of August 30th, 1842 (5 Stat. 564), which is in these words: "Provided, also, that in all cases where the actual value to be appraised, estimated and ascertained, as hereinbefore stated, of any goods, wares and merchandise imported into the United States, and subject to any ad valorem duty, or whenever the duty is regulated by or directed to be imposed or levied on the value of the square yard, or other parcel or quantity thereof, shall exceed, by ten per centum or more, the invoice value, then, in addition to the duty imposed by law on the same, there shall be levied and collected on the same goods, wares and merchandise fifty per centum of the duty imposed on the same when fairly invoiced:" and by the eighth section of the act of July 30th, 1846 (9 Stat. 43), which alters the penalty to twenty per cent. ad valorem on the appraised value, in case the goods have been actually purchased, and their invoice value has been raised by the importer to what he deems to be their market value in the country from which they were exported.

The argument for the United States is, that quantity is a component part of the value of this importation, and that, as the amount of the entry or the invoice lies in the quantity and price, a mis-statement of quantity on the invoice and the entry, exhibiting the gross amount (consisting of price and weight) at ten per cent. below the appraisement, becomes necessarily a reason for imposing the penalty, because the dutiable sum is thus entered at more than ten per cent. less than the sum on which the United States are entitled to charge duties.

Two considerations, in our judgment, countervail this argument. The language of the statute makes the value of the goods entered the subject of comparison with the appraisement, and the term "value" is used in the revenue laws to express the "price" of the dutiable goods—that is, their cost price or market price abroad, increased by the addition of specified charges. 5 Stat. pp. 563, 564, §§ 16, 17. The custom-house officers can, therefore, only look at the relative valuations of the commodity upon the invoice and the appraisal, in determining whether the latter exceeds the former by more than ten per cent. The ad valorem to which the tariff acts have reference, is the price or market worth of a dutiable article and its charges, in whatever way it is the subject of purchase and sale, whether the price is estimated on the square yard or other parcel or quantity. An aggregation of parcels (tons, in this instance) does not affect the value or price of a particular ton. It is only a repetition of that price as many times as the parcel or quantity is named. The general summation, therefore, being no more than the footing up of the specific values reiterated, cannot be regarded as the valuation which is called for by the statute, and which is the subject of appraisement and of penal duties.

That this interpretation of the revenue laws is correct, is manifest from the powers conferred on appraisers and the duties they are required to perform in determining the dutiable value of imported goods. An examination of the duty acts from 1799 to 1846, shows that appraisers are called upon solely to fix the price or value of the imported commodity by gauge, yard, weight or measure, by the denomination or description usually applied to it on purchase and sale. Officers other than appraisers ascertain what is the measure or weight of goods entered. Their report furnishes the multiple by which the particular valuation of the appraisers may be brought to the dutiable amount of the importation.

Upon this view of the subject, it is manifest that congress has not imposed the increased duty of twenty or fifty per cent. upon a misstatement in the invoice of the quantity of articles imported, but upon an undervaluation of prices. Because, such increase or penalty depends upon and follows the judgment of the appraisers, and their office is limited to fixing the wholesale price or market value, and in no way extends to ascertaining the amount, in weight, gauge or measure, of imported goods.

We think that the defendant committed an error, after the appraisers had reported the invoice price of the coal to be correct, in imposing twenty per cent. additional duty because the weighers or measurers returned a greater quantity than was invoiced. The appraisement must be restricted to determining the price or value of the parcel or quantity by which the purchase and sale of the article are made, and has rightfully no reference to the totality of the purchase. Marriott v. Brune, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 619.

The remaining question is as to whether the importers, in this case, are chargeable with the fees of the weighers and measurers. The directions of the acts of congress prior to 1846 are not explicit as to the cases in which it shall be the duty of the collector to have imported goods weighed or measured, unless when they are stored for want of an invoice or entry, or have been detained for inspection under circumstances of suspicion. The matter appears to have been left to his discretion. The weighers and gaugers were paid for their services by the collector, out of moneys in the custom-house, and the payment was charged to the treasury (Act March 2, 1799, § 2; 1 Stat. 707), the amount of the compensation being limited by various acts. These officers were not directed, in the forms of returns prescribed by statute, to make any return of fees. Act March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. p. 678, § 72).

We have not deemed it important to search through the tariff acts, to ascertain whether any authority was given to the collector, prior to 1846, to charge fees for weighing and measuring, against the importer or the goods, or whether they were estimated and collected as duties, because we consider the whole subject to be definitively regulated by the 4th section of the act of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 43), which enacts, "that in all cases in which the invoice or entry shall not contain the weight or quantity or measure of goods, wares or merchandize now weighed or measured or gauged, the same shall be weighed, gauged or measured at the expense of the owner, agent or consignee."

In the present case, the invoice did contain a specific statement of the weight of the coal, and, admitting that coal was before subject to weight or measure at the custom-house, this act necessarily imports that the owner, in a case like this, shall not be subject to the cost of re-weighing it. The right to weigh at the expense of the owner depends upon the omission to give the weight in the invoice, and that omission affords the only justification for exacting costs and fees from the owner for weighing it.

We do not take into consideration the interpretation put upon this section of the act by the secretary of the treasury, in his circular of December 31st, 1849, nor decide whether the cases enumerated by him are those which justify the exaction of fees from importers, because no one of them contemplates or is based upon the state of facts presented by this case.

In our opinion, the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment, the amount of which is to be adjusted in the manner named in the verdict.

MANHATTAN LIFE INS. CO. (AMES v.). See Case No. 328.

Case No. 9,024.

MANHATTAN LIFE INS. CO. v. FARMERS' & CITIZENS' NAT. BANK et al.

[10 Blatchf. 344.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Jan. 6, 1873.

BANKS—STOCKS—SECURITY—REISSUE—INSOLVENCY OF BANK—FRAUD—RIGHT TO SHARE IN PROCEEDS.

B., the president of a bank, borrowed money of M., for his own use, on the security of 550 shares in the capital stock of the bank. At the time, B. stood on the books of the bank as the owner of more than 550 of its shares, certificates for which, issued to him, were outstanding, but had been passed away by him to bona fide holders. In anticipation of, but without, their surrender, B. caused to be issued to himself certificates for 550 shares, and gave them, with power of attorney to transfer, to M., as security for the loan. They were signed by B., as president, and by R., as cashier, they being the transfer officers. R. knew, as well as B., of the irregularity in their issue. At the time, B. held certificates for 535 shares of the stock of the bank, and the bank had certificates, unissued, for other shares, which had been subscribed for, but were not yet paid for. The certificates given to M. were intended to represent only the shares represented by the certificates the surrender of which was anticipated. M. made the loan in a check, on the faith of the certificates. B. passed the check to the bank, without consideration, and the bank collected it, and placed the money among its assets, B. and R. knowing all the facts. The outstanding certificates were not surrendered or cancelled, nor was any stock transferred on the books. The bank failed and a receiver of it was appointed. M. demanded back his money, and tendered the certificates for surrender, which was refused. The receiver being about to exclude M. from sharing, as a creditor, in the distribution of the assets of the bank, M. brought suit to restrain the receiver from doing so: Held, that a fraud was committed by B. on M.; that M. was entitled, on discovering the fraud, to rescind the contract; that the bank received the money to the use of M. and was liable for it to M.; and that M., on surrendering the certificates, was entitled to share, as a creditor of the bank, in the distribution of its assets.

Bill in equity by the Manhattan Life Insurance Company against the Farmers' & Citizens' National Bank, of Brooklyn, and Frederick A. Platt, receiver.]

Richard C. Fellows, for plaintiffs.
Tracy, Catlin & Van Cott, for defendants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a suit in equity brought to obtain a decree declaring the plaintiffs entitled to share, as creditors, in the distribution of the assets of an insolvent national bank, and enjoining any distribution of such assets otherwise than pro rata between the other creditors, and the plaintiffs as creditors to the amount of $10,000 and interest.

The facts upon which the claim to this relief is based appear in the evidence as follows: On the 8th of August, 1867, one Beach, the president of the Farmers' & Citizens' National Bank, a corporation then, to all appearances, solvent, borrowed of the plaintiffs, for his own use, the sum of $10,000, upon the security of 550 shares in the capital stock of the bank. This bank had formerly been a state bank, with a capital of $160,000; but it had been changed into a national bank, as authorized by the national banking act, and its capital increased, or supposed to have been increased, to $300,000. The stock of the state bank held by each stockholder therein had been changed into stock in the national bank, to an equal amount, and the outstanding certificates of stock in the state bank were treated by all as representing the same shares in the national bank, until surrender and other certificates issued in their place. At the time Beach effected the loan in question, he stood on the books of the Farmers' & Citizens' National Bank as the owner of shares of its stock exceeding 550 in number, which were formerly shares in the state bank, now shares in the national bank. Certificates in the usual form, representing these shares, had, prior to the change to a national bank, been given to one Crawford, and were still outstanding, held by bona fide holders, as security for loans. These certificates, Beach says, he anticipated were to be surrendered by Crawford, on the 8th of August, 1867, and, in anticipation of such a surrender during the day, as he says, he, on that day, caused to be issued and delivered to himself certificates representing 550 of these shares of the stock of the bank, no surrender of the outstanding certificates having been made. The certificates so issued, with a power of attorney to transfer and sell, he, on the same day, gave to the plaintiffs, as security for their loan to him. The certificates so passed to the plaintiffs were in the ordinary form, and certified that Beach was entitled to 550 shares in the capital stock of the Farmers' & Citizens' National Bank, transferable only on the books of the company, in person, or by attorney, on the surrender of the certificates. They were signed by Beach, as president, and Redfield, as cashier, and these officers were the transfer officers of the bank. The certificates were, in all respects, regular upon their face, but Redfield, the cashier, as well as Beach, the president, of the bank, knew that they were irregularly issued, because certificates for the same stock were then outstanding in the hands of bona fide holders, and beyond the control of the bank or of Beach. At the same time Beach did hold certificates for 535 shares of the capital stock of the bank, and there were, also, in the possession of the bank, certificates duly made out and executed for a much larger number of shares of stock, which had been subscribed for as part of increased capital of the bank, for which notes had been taken, and to which the subscribers named in the certificates, and who stood on the books of the bank as stockholders to the amount, were entitled, upon payment of the notes; but, as the evidence shows, the certificates for 550 shares, issued on the 8th of August, 1867, and delivered to the plaintiffs, were not intended to represent any of these other shares, but represented 550 of the shares certificates for which had been given to Crawford, and the return whereof was then anticipated. Upon the faith of the certificates so issued on August 8th, Beach obtained of the plaintiffs their check for $10,000, and this check he at once passed into the possession of the bank, without any consideration, apparently with the intention of retiring the new certificates in case the old ones given to Crawford were not surrendered and cancelled. The bank collected the check, the president and the cashier both knowing the circumstances under which it had been obtained from the plaintiffs, and the money of the plaintiffs thus passed into the assets of the bank. None of the certificates given to Crawford were ever surrendered or cancelled, nor was any transfer of the stock upon the books of the bank attempted, either by Crawford, or by the plaintiffs, or by any other person, and such transfer, doubtless, became impossible when, shortly after, the bank failed and its affairs passed into the hands of the defendant Platt, as receiver, appointed by the comptroller, under the national banking act [13 Stat. 99]. Upon ascertaining, after the failure of the bank, the character of the certificates delivered to them, the plaintiffs at once offered to surrender them and demanded back their money, which being refused, and the receiver announcing his intention to exclude them from sharing, as creditors, in the distribution of the assets of the bank, this action was brought.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

It will be seen, from the facts above stated, that the transaction of the 8th of August, on the part of the bank officers, was a duplication of certificates for 550 shares of actual and valid stock of the bank then, as now, standing in the name of Beach, the president, upon the transfer books of the bank, but of which Beach was not then the owner, he having already passed away his title.

The main question in the case then arises—whether a fraud upon the plaintiffs was committed by Beach, when he passed to them, as regular and valid, such certificates as those of August 8th. Clearly, there was fraud. By necessary implication, Beach, when he delivered the certificates to the plaintiffs, represented that he was then the owner of the stock referred to therein; that no other person than the holder of those certificates was entitled to that stock; and that the stock could not be transferred upon the books of the bank except upon a surrender of those certificates. Whereas, Beach was not the owner of the stock, the holder of other certificates for the same shares was entitled, upon a surrender thereof, to become the stockholder thereof on the books of the bank, and, although a transfer of the shares, if actually made by the bank, upon a surrender of these certificates, would cut off the equitable rights of other parties to the shares, still, such a transfer would be rendered impossible by a prior surrender of the old certificates and a transfer of the shares to the holders thereof, and could not be compelled, as against such holders, theirs being the prior of two equal equities. Herein lay the fraud upon the plaintiffs, and, by reason of that fraud, the plaintiffs became entitled, upon discovering it, to rescind the contract, give up the certificates, and demand their money. This they elected to do, and their demand is good against the bank, because of the conceded fact, that their check, obtained by fraud, was delivered to the bank without consideration, and with full notice of the circumstances under which it was obtained, not only through Beach, its president, but through Redfield, its cashier, who received it; and the bank, after such notice, collected the check and now has the money. Money so collected is money had and received to the use of the plaintiffs.

It is no answer to this view of the case, to say, that the certificates of August 8th were valid to give the plaintiffs a right of action against the bank in the event of a failure to obtain a transfer of the shares represented thereby. Whether the certificates, passed to the plaintiffs, were or were not sufficient security, is immaterial. They were not the kind of security that was agreed for, but of a different character; and the false representation of their character, which Beach, by necessary implication, made, when he signed and delivered them to the plaintiffs, gave the plaintiffs the right, on discovering that fact, to reject them and sue for their money.

It has been contended, on the part of the defendants, that the act of Beach, in issuing the certificates of August 8th, in legal effect, cancelled the certificates of the shares of stock which he then had, and thereby rendered the certificates given to the plaintiffs regular and valid. But, the testimony is plain, that the certificates of August 8th were not intended to represent any of the shares certificates for which Beach then had. Beach expressly says, that he told Redfield, that those certificates were not to be cancelled, nor those shares transferred. None of those certificates ever were cancelled or surrendered, nor was any of that stock transferred. Besides, Beach had only 535 shares, and some of those were not in his name, while the certificates passed to the plaintiffs call for 550 shares standing in his name.

Equally unavailing is the suggestion, that the bank itself, when the certificates of August 8th were issued, owned a large number of its shares, being those of new subscribers, held as above described, and that these are to be deemed represented by the certificates issued to the plaintiffs, thus rendering them valid. As I understand the evidence, the bank had no shares whatever applicable to such a purpose; but, if it had the power so to deal with the shares referred to, none of them were ever placed in the name of Beach upon the books. The bank never authorized a transfer of any of them to Beach or to the plaintiffs, and it was never intended that the certificates of August 8th should represent any of those shares, but only shares the certificates of which had been given to Crawford, and were then outstanding. The fact, that the bank, in case of a surrender by the plaintiffs of the certificates of August 8th, might be able, if then so minded, either by the appropriation of Beach's shares, or by a resort to shares of its own, to place in the name of the plaintiffs some other 550 shares would not constitute the certificates of August 8th lawful instruments, valid to enable the plaintiffs, at their option, to be placed on the books of the bank, as owners of the shares of stock which the certificates represented, nor would it make true the representation that Beach owned those shares, and that they were transferable upon a surrender of those certificates, and not otherwise; and it would have no effect to impair the right of the plaintiffs to reject those certificates because of the fraud, and to demand back their money.

My opinion, therefore, is, that, upon the view of this case above expressed, the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief demanded. I am, also, of the further opinion, that, when the bank took and, without consideration, applied to its own use the money obtained by its president by means of the certificates of August 8th, and with full knowledge, not only through Beach, its president, but Redfield, its cashier, that the money had been obtained upon the faith of duplicate certificates of stock issued by the bank to a person not then the owner of the stock, the bank became directly liable to the plaintiffs for the money, as the borrower thereof, and cannot be permitted to say that Beach was not authorized so to obtain the money for the bank.

My conclusion, therefore, is, that, upon surrendering, for cancellation, the certificates of August 8th, according to the tender made, the plaintiffs are entitled to be treated as creditors of the Farmers' & Citizens' National Bank, to the amount of $10,000, with interest from August 9th, 1867, and that any distribution of the assets of that bank, otherwise than pro rata, among the other creditors and the plaintiffs, as such creditors, must be enjoined.

Case No. 9,025.

MANHATTAN LIFE INS. CO. v. HOELZLE.

[7 Reporter, 484.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. 1879.

LIFE INSURANCE—DIVIDEND SCRIP IN PAYMENT OF PREMIUMS.

The dividend due a policy-holder, which is sufficient to pay a premium due, should be applied to the payment of such premium upon the request of the policy-holder, where the practice of the company has been to apply dividend scrip either to secure a bonus policy or to reduce the amount of premiums payable at any given time, upon the request of the policy-holder.

Action on a life policy of insurance. The premiums were payable one half by note, the other half in instalments in July and October. The premiums were so paid until

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

July, 1873, when the insured requested that the dividend which had been allotted should be applied to the portion of the premium then due, which was refused. No other premiums were paid, and in November following the insured died. There was judgment for plaintiff for the full amount of the policy. The case was brought to the United States supreme court, which affirmed the judgment by a divided vote (October term, 1877), no opinion being written. The material parts of the charge on the trial below are here given:

TREAT, District Judge. Under the charter of the defendant, its board of directors had the power to regulate the amount of premium, and the mode and manner of payment of the same. By other provisions of its charter, dividend scrip was issuable to policy-holders, after certain requirements had been complied with, annually, for the profits of each year. It appears from the testimony that annual issues of scrip were made after 1866, and, therefore, by the terms of the charter the dividend scrip for 1872 was issuable on the 1st day of January, 1873, or within 30 days thereafter. If the practice of the company was to apply such dividend scrip, at the election of the policy-holder, to a bonus policy, or toward the payment of premiums and interest on premium notes outstanding; and if on the policy in question the premiums were paid by him during the latter part of its existence, quarterly, or for a less period than a year, and application was made at the agency here in St. Louis, in July, 1873, the same having been the custom with respect to this policy, to make a quarter-yearly payment by applying thereto the dividend scrip to which the policy-holder was entitled as early as the previous February, and the amount of said dividend scrip was sought to be applied to the payment of the required premium, and the agent of the defendant refused to receive the premium by such application of dividend scrip, then the defendant cannot set up as a defense the non-payment of the July premium. But whether such are the facts the jury must determine for themselves from the evidence. The jury will also consider whether dividend scrip issued could be applied by the policy-holder at his election, either to secure a bonus policy or to reduce the amount of premiums payable at any given time. Hence if the custom of the company was to apply the dividend scrip, if the policy-holder so requested, to the payment of the next premium, and in this case such application was made and refused, then the failure to pay the premium in dispute is no defence to the right of recovery.

MANHATTAN LIFE INS. CO. (RINKER v.). See Case No. 11,851.

MANHATTAN LIFE INS. CO. (SCHUMACHER v.). See Case No. 12,490.

Case No. 9,026.

MANHATTAN MEDICINE CO. v. WOOD et al.

[4 Cliff. 461; 14 O. G. 519; Cox, Manual Trade-Mark Cas. 359.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Sept. 21, 1878.[2]

TRADE-MARKS—ENTIRETY — SPURIOUS ARTICLE—LACHES — TERRITORIAL LIMITS — RELINQUISHMENT — RESEMBLANCE — FUTURE INFRINGEMENT.

1. Trade-marks are an entirety, and are incapable of exclusive use at different places by more than one independent proprietor; for, in seeking redress, in order to establish an exclusive right to the mark, the party must show an exclusive right to the commodity to which it is attached.

2. Rights to a trade-mark may be forfeited if the mark is deceptively used to designate a spurious article, and a party thus affected can convey no valid title in the mark to another.

3. Equity will not decree for an account of past gains and profits where there has been laches in bringing suit and long acquiescence in the adverse use of the mark by others.

4. Disregard of territorial limits allotted by license of proprietor and misuse of the trade-mark, are a forfeiture of right, and a defeat to any valid conveyance by the wrong-doers.

5. Voluntary relinquishment of the original mark of the proprietor for another, devised by the grantees themselves, is a forfeiture of right to the old mark no less than its misuse to designate a spurious article.

6. Equity gives relief for the infringement of a trade-mark, upon the ground that one man is not allowed to offer his goods for sale, representing the goods to be the manufacture of another in the same commodity.

7. Two trade-marks are substantially the same, in legal contemplation, if the resemblance is such as to deceive ordinary purchasers, giving such attention to the same as purchasers usually give, and to cause them to purchase the one manufacture supposing it to be the other.

8. Cases arise where the title is complete, when a party, though not entitled to a decree for an account, may still be entitled to a decree to prevent future infringements. But if the defendant has the genuine article, and manufactures it, and it is not protected by a patent, and the complainant has no exclusive right to the trade-mark, then the complainant can have no relief.

9. If several alleged owners of a trade-mark, whose rights are determined by territorial limits, for years disregard each other's rights, and mutually violate each other's territorial privileges, and make no efforts to uphold the same, they cannot set up as valid what they themselves have destroyed, nor assign any exclusive valid claim therein to others.

This was a bill in equity [by the Manhattan Medicine Company] praying for an account and an injunction against the respondents [Nathan Wood and John S. Wood] for the violation of the complainants' right of property in alleged trade-mark on Atwood's Vegetable Physical Jaundice Bitters. It was claimed that the complainants derived title through mesne assignments from one Atwood, who had adopted and used the designation on the article named, of which he was the inventor and at one time proprietor. There was no patent on the compound, and no registry or patent of the trade-mark.

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. Cox, Manual Trade-Mark Cas. 359, contains only a partial report.]

[2] [Affirmed in 108 U. S. 218, 2 Sup. Ct. 436.]

Chase, Bestow & Holt, for complainants.

Brief of Philo Chase.

Some forty years ago, one Moses Atwood, then of Georgetown, Mass., first prepared and sold the plaintiffs' bitters under the name of "Atwood's Vegetable Physical Jaundice Bitters." About the year 1852, Atwood sold an interest in his said business to Carter & Dodge of said Georgetown, a firm composed of Moses Carter and Benjamin F. Dodge. Thereafter Atwood carried on said business in conjunction with said Carter & Dodge until 1855, when he sold out to them his remaining interest in the business, including his stock on hand, debts due, the right to use his name in the manufacture and sale of said medicines, all the labels, trade-marks, good-will, and all the other rights pertaining to said business, for which Dodge & Carter paid him some four or five thousand dollars. About this time, Charles L. Carter, a son of Moses Carter, was taken into the firm of Carter & Dodge, constituting the new firm of Carter, Dodge & Co. This new firm, having succeeded to all the rights of Carter & Dodge in said business, carried on the same for some three years, using Atwood's name, recipes, trade-marks, &c., as theretofore done by Atwood and Carter & Dodge. Then the firm of Carter, Dodge & Co. was dissolved by mutual consent and agreement that the several partners should thereafter own and use the Atwood recipes, trade-marks, &c., in common, each selling on certain prescribed territory. After the dissolution of the partnership of Carter, Dodge & Co., the business was carried on in accordance with the terms of the dissolution agreement as to the common use of the Atwood name, recipes, labels, trade-marks, &c., by the several parties in interest. Then the Carter branch of the business was carried on for about five years by Moses Carter and his son, Charles L., under the style of Carter & Son; then Charles sold out his interest, and his brothers, Luther F. and Moses F., took his place in the firm, it then becoming M. Carter & Sons. Then Moses Carter died, his interest going to his two sons and partners, Luther and Moses. Thereafter, Luther F. Carter carried on the business until the sale of the Carter interest to the plaintiffs. Dodge carried on his branch of the business for some time after the dissolution of Carter, Dodge & Co., and then sold his interest to Noyes & Manning and Will. B. Dorman; Noyes & Manning and Dorman then carried on the Dodge branch of the business until their conveyance thereof to the plaintiffs. Lewis H. Bateman, of Georgetown, also had or claimed to have an interest in Atwood's medicine business, by virtue of some partnership or other relation with Atwood. Carter, Dodge & Co. at first denied his claim, and attempted to stop him by a suit, but failed to prosecute it to a successful issue; and thereafter Bateman used the Moses Atwood name, label, and the fluted bottle in common with Carter, Dodge & Co. and their successors until his decease. Thus the plaintiffs acquired the entire ownership of the Atwood medicine business, together with all of its accompanying rights of trade-marks, good-will, &c. From abundant caution rather than from any necessity, the plaintiffs also took conveyances from all of the Carter heirs, and from Dodge, of all their respective right, title and interest in said business, trade-marks, &c. From the time Moses Atwood first put up and sold said bitters, about forty years ago, he and all of his successors have always used the same name and label for their said bitters.

Moses Atwood having first adopted and used the name, label, &c., in question, to distinguish his article of bitters, acquired the exclusive right to the same. Amoskeag Manuf'g Co. v. Spear, 2 Sandf. 599, Cox, Trade-Mark Cas. 87; Davis v. Kendall, 2 R. I. 566; Williams v. Johnson, 2 Bosw. 1; Boardman v. Meriden Britannia Co., 35 Conn. 402; Chappell v. Sheard, 2 Kay & J. 117; Upton, Trade-Marks, 47; Curtis v. Bryan, 36 How. Prac. 33; Filley v. Fassett, 44 Mo. 168. "Every person who uses a trade-mark, be it the label on a bottle, or the name or title of a periodical or magazine, by his appropriation and use of the name, acquires a property in that name, and has a right to restrain any other person from using the same name in such a manner as would lead, or be calculated to lead the public to believe that they are purchasing one thing when in truth they are purchasing another." Bradbury v. Beeton, 39 Law J. Ch. (N. S.) 57.

The name "Atwood's Vegetable Physical Jaundice Bitters" was first devised, adopted, and used by Moses Atwood to designate and distinguish his bitters; it was used by him for that purpose for about fifteen years, until he sold out his business to Carter, Dodge & Co. in 1855; it served to distinguish his bitters from all other bitters. Generally, the use of the two words "Atwood's Bitters" is sufficient to distinguish them, and the words "Atwood's Jaundice Bitters" are always sufficient. The name and label of the article were its distinguishing marks; the marks by which it became known to the public; the marks by which it was bought and sold; the marks by which it achieved its high reputation. These, as marks for this make of bitters, were exceedingly valuable. Moses Atwood had made the marks valuable by his skill, industry, and enterprise in making and selling an article the public was glad to purchase. These marks constituted the principal value of the article, because, it being known to the public by these marks, it could not be sold without them. As such marks in connection with such use, they constituted valuable property: this property belonged to Moses Atwood; he had created it. The marks, when he first adopted them, had no more value than various other marks he might have chosen instead; but by their long use to designate and distinguish his article they had become endowed with value. The plainest justice demands that a person having so created such value should be protected in the enjoyment of it, and reap the reward of his merit. The highest public policy also demands such protection, because the hope of such reward is the encouragement of labor, integrity, and excellence. By such protection, the maker and seller is stimulated to make and sell an article which by its goodness shall commend itself to public favor; and the public are correspondently benefited by knowing where to purchase a good article.

The courts of every civilized state in the world have long recognized trade-marks as property, and given them the fullest protection as such. Amoskeag Manuf'g Co. v. Spear, supra.

Atwood's trade-marks, &c., in connection with the business of making or selling the article to which they belonged, were transferable. Eden, Inj. (1st Am. Ed.) 226; Edelsten v. Vick, 11 Hare, 78; Walton v. Crowley [Case No. 17,133]; Joseph Dixon Crucible Co. v. Guggenheim, 2 Brewst. 321; Gillis v. Hall, Id. 342; Congress & Empire Spring Co. v. High Rock Congress Spring Co., 45 N. Y. 291; Filkins v. Blackman [Case No. 4,786]; Winsor v. Clyde, 9 Phila. 513; Upton, Trade-Marks, 52,—where the author says: "Property in trade-marks may be obtained from him who has made the primary acquisition."

Moses Atwood, by his transfer to Carter & Dodge, and Carter, Dodge & Co., vested this property in them. Carter, Dodge & Co., being the owners of the trade-marks, &c., could hold or own them jointly or in common. As long as the partnership lasted, they held them in joint ownership; but after the dissolution of the partnership they held them in common. There was nothing to prevent this. Each party had the recipe; one could make the article as well as the other. Whichever party made it, the public was supplied with the genuine article. The name and label indicated the genuine article, whether it was made by one of the Carters or by Dodge, just the same as they did when it was made by Carter, Dodge & Co. as a firm, or when made by Atwood himself. It is well settled that trade-marks, like other property, may be owned in common by different parties. Dent v. Turpin, 7 Jur. (N. S.) 673; Cod. Trade-Marks, 269, and cases.

On the dissolution of a partnership, each partner is, in the absence of any special agreement, entitled to trade under the name, or style of the old firm. Banks v. Gibson, 34 Beav. 566. Luther E. Carter succeeded to all the rights of Moses Carter and Charles L. Carter. It will be remembered that the two latter were members of the firm of Carter, Dodge & Co.; that, upon the dissolution of Carter, Dodge & Co., the Carter branch of the business was carried on by the two Carters, under the name of Carter & Son; that Charles L. sold out his interest in Carter & Son to his brothers, Luther F. and Moses F., and the Carter firm became Carter & Sons, which continued up to the time of the eldest Carter's decease, in 1870; and that Luther F. and Moses F. succeeded to the business of Carter & Sons. They would so succeed as surviving partners; besides, Moses Atwood devised to them his interest in the business, and Luther F. Carter then purchased the interest of his partner, Moses F., and thus became the sole owner of the Carter interest.

Trade-marks being property, and transferable like other property, and ownable jointly or in common, a legal title to an interest in the business, trade-marks, labels, &c., passed to Luther F. Carter. Cases supra.

Trade-marks pass by operation of law. Hine v. Lart, 10 Jur. 106. The Dodge interest in the business, trade-marks, &c., were legally transferable to Dorman and Noyes & Manning, according to the principles before stated. The interest of Dorman, and Noyes & Manning, and Carter, and Bateman were likewise transferable to the plaintiffs.

The rule is that the court will enjoin any imitation calculated to deceive ordinary purchasers. Cases supra; Crawshay v. Thompson, 4 Man. & G. 385; Davis v. Kendall, 2 R. I. 566; Holmes v. Holmes, Booth & Atwood Manuf'g Co., 37 Conn. 278; Wotherspoon v. Currie, 22 Law T. (N. S.) 260; Hookham v. Pottage, 26 Law T. (N. S.) 755. To be enjoinable, it is not necessary that the imitation should be complete; the imitation may be limited and partial, and still enjoinable. Lockwood v. Bostwick, 2 Daly, 521; Franks v. Weaver, 10 Beav. 297; Coffeen v. Brunton [Case No. 2,946]; Amoskeag Manuf'g Co. v. Spear, supra; Shrimpton v. Laight, 18 Beav. 164; Walton v. Crowley, supra; Clark v. Clark, 25 Barb. 76; Brooklyn White Lead Co. v. Masury, Id. 416; Hostetter v. Vowinkle [Case No. 6,714]. To be enjoinable, it is not requisite that the imitation should be intentionally deceptive. Millington v. Fox, 3 Mylne & C. 338; Dale v. Smithson, 12 Abb. Prac. 237.

It is no defence that the imitator informs purchasers of the imitation. It is no answer for the defendants to say that they sold the bitters as theirs. Coats v. Holbrook, 2 Sandf. Ch. 586; Chappell v. Davidson, 2 Kay & J. 123. It is sufficient, to establish a case for relief, to show that the imitation has led or is likely to lead to mistakes. Clement v. Maddick, 5 Jur. (N. S.) 592. It is proved, as before shown, by the leading druggists and medicine men of New York and Boston, that purchasers are likely to be deceived into purchasing the defendant's round-bottle style for plaintiffs'. The plaintiff, in trade-mark cases, is entitled to relief, though the respondent did not know that the mark used was a trade-mark. Kinahan v. Bolton, 15 Ir. Ch. 75; Harrison v. Taylor, 11 Jur. (N. S.) 408; Hall v. Barrows, 10 Jur. (N. S.) 55; Ainsworth v. Walmsley, 12 Jur. (N. S.) 205. But the defendants must have known that they were using trade-marks which belonged to the successors of Moses Atwood. The Moses Atwood's Bitters was a well-known article in the medicine trade. It is well known by its name and labels, which constitute its trade-marks—goodwill marks they might be called.

The defendants' position, that plaintiffs' trade-marks have become common property by common use, is not tenable. The fact that the trade-marks were used in common by the common owners thereof did not make them common property as to all the world. But if other parties had, in fact, infringed the plaintiffs' trade-marks, that is no excuse for the defendants' infringement. Taylor v. Carpenter [Case No. 13,784]; Coats v. Holbrook, supra. There never was any abandonment of plaintiffs' trade-marks. For more than forty years they have been constantly used by Moses Atwood and his successors, who have always openly and notoriously claimed to be the exclusive owners thereof. A party claiming property against the real owner, on the ground of the latter's abandonment thereof, must establish the fact of abandonment by the strongest proof. There is no proof in this case of any abandonment of the trade-marks by their owners. The proof is all to the contrary. The use of a trade-mark by different parties will not operate as an abandonment by the rightful owner. Sohl v. Geisendorf, Wils. (Ind.) 60.

There has been no such consent or acquiescence as to deprive the plaintiff of protection against continuing infringement. Neither Moses Atwood nor any of his successors ever consented to the defendants' use of their trade-marks, expressly or impliedly. There were no dealings between them, or other circumstances from which a consent could be implied. All the circumstances of the case negative all inference of any such consent. There is no evidence in the case that the owners of the trade-marks ever had the legal evidence to establish a case of infringement against the defendants. The defendants were out of the jurisdiction of the courts of the state in which the trade-mark owners resided. Were they obliged to go into a foreign jurisdiction to prosecute the defendants, in order to prevent an implied acquiescence in the use of their trade-marks by the defendants? Besides, if there had been any such consent or acquiescence, it was merely gratuitous, and revocable at the pleasure of the owners. Amoskeag Manuf'g Co. v. Spear, 2 Sandf. 599; McCardel v. Peck, 28 How. Prac. 120; Gillott v. Esterbrook, 47 Barb. 455.

Laches cannot be imputed to the owners. There is no case where relief has been refused on the ground of laches under circumstances like those in this case. Wherever relief has been refused on the ground of laches, the circumstances have been such as made it a case of great hardship for the party to be enjoined, as where the right to the trade-marks has been in great doubt, or the dealings and relations between the parties have been such as to show consent of the one and good faith of the other, and probable loss to an innocent party. No statute of limitations bars the plaintiffs of protection of their trade-marks. Taylor v. Carpenter [Case No. 13,784]. Such a defence is an abhorrent one, even in an action at law. Taylor v. Carpenter [Id. 13,785].

The plaintiffs seek protection against future wrong, as well as indemnity for past wrong. The defendants persist in selling their imitation, and threaten to continue such imitation in future unless they are restrained therefrom. There is no pretence that the defendants mean to desist from using their trade-marks unless restrained. No question of statute of limitations can arise as to such protection in the future. As to the past, each infringement has been a separate trespass. Possibly, the plaintiffs may not have the right to recover damages for infringements committed more than six years before the commencement of the action.

It cannot be said that the defendants have acquired any prescriptive title. The unlawful use of a trade-mark for twenty years held no bar. Gillott v. Esterbrook, 48 N. Y. 374. Ten years held no bar in Wolfe v. Barnett, 24 La. Ann. 97. Nine years held no bar in Lazenby v. White, 41 Law J. Ch. (N. S.) 354. The fact that Luther F. Carter for a while made his bitters of less than the usual strength is no defence to the plaintiffs' relief against the defendants' imitation. These bitters were precisely the same as the full-strength bitters, except in the matter of strength; the medical ingredients were the same; the only difference was in the quantity of water; to produce as much and the same effect it was only necessary to increase the dose. But this is wholly an immaterial fact. The selling of an article inferior in some respects to its accustomed goodness does not destroy its trade-marks, though it may affect their value by diminishing the reputation of the article. Besides, the plaintiffs are not selling, and have never sold, the weakened bitters. How then can its trade-mark rights be affected by the fact that Luther F. Carter sold an inferior article? Did that fact destroy the trademarks, not as to himself, not also as to his co-owners? There is no such rule of law as that.

A party is sometimes denied relief on the ground of his misrepresentation of his article, and consequent deception of the public. If Luther F. Carter was the plaintiff seeking protection for his article, and it appeared that it was a fraud, the court would not protect it, as the court will not protect fraud. But that is not the case. Plaintiffs are not asking the court to protect a fraudulent article. There is no pretence that the plaintiffs' article is a fraudulent one. There is no misrepresentation or deception by plaintiffs' labels in respect to the actual manufacture. The words, "manufactured by Moses Atwood, Georgetown, Mass.," &c., is a part of the old label as originally adopted. The label has never been changed. It is important that the labels of an article should not be changed, as a change produces doubt and confusion as to the genuineness. Medicine proprietors never change their labels when they can possibly avoid it. The name of the original maker is retained on the label or appears upon the article. Take, for instance, the article of "Day & Martin's Blacking," or "Rodgers & Sons' Cutlery," "Wade & Butcher's Razors," and many others. It is like retaining the business name of an old firm long after such firm has ceased to exist. People go to such a house, not because they expect to meet the old firm, but from habit and good will, and the old name indicates the old place. So of an article of medicine, or any other,—people buy it because they have been accustomed to and because they like it. They do not suppose that the original maker, whose name appears on it, is still the maker, but that his name is a mark of genuineness merely.

But in this case, if it were a matter of any importance, it has always been known to the public who were the actual makers of the article in question. When Carter, Dodge & Co. made it, they advertised and sold it as the makers; so of all the successors. The plaintiffs are accustomed to enclose each bottle of their bitters in a printed wrapper, showing that they are prepared and sold by the plaintiffs at the city of New York. There is no misrepresentation or concealment on the part of the plaintiffs. But this is a matter of no consequence. The bitters sold by the plaintiffs are compounded according to the same recipe as the bitters sold by Moses Atwood. Purchasers buy the plaintiffs' bitters because they suppose they are the same; they get just what they intend to buy, so there is no deception. But such a defense comes with poor grace from fraudulent imitators like the defendants.

Nathan Webb and W. H. Clifford, for respondents.

Brief of W. H. Clifford.

The complainants claim title through certain assignments, and allege, as to the origin of the property in the said trade-mark, as follows: "That your orator is informed and believes, and alleges that said medicine was first invented and put up for sale, about twenty-five years ago, by one Dr. Moses Atwood, formerly of Georgetown, Massachusetts, by whom, his assigns and successors, the same has been ever since made and sold, by the name, in the manner, and with the trade-marks, labels, and description, the same or substantially the same as aforesaid." The "assigns and successors" of Moses Atwood sold the right, whatever it was, to the complainants. What did the "assigns and successors" of Moses Atwood really take from him, and were in consequence able to grant these complainants? The "assigns and successors" are, in the first place and degree, L. H. Bateman and his heirs, Moses Carter and his heirs and successors and assigns.

On page 43 of the printed record is found the deed to the Manhattan Medicine Company from the heirs of L. H. Bateman. Now this deed claims no right at all as derived from Moses Atwood, and makes no mention of any such right. It seems, from the deed itself, to be a right which began and ended with the Bateman family. This piece of documentary evidence has no tendency to support any allegation of the bill, but flatly contradicts it. This contradicts the fundamental allegation of the bill; viz., the one showing the title of the complainants to the alleged property. If Moses Atwood had the exclusive right to this trade-mark at the outset, and never transferred a right to Bateman, then Bateman's right must have been derived from some other man, or else obtained by trespass upon, and in violation of, Moses Atwood's rights. The right of property in a trade-mark is an exclusive right. If such right is assumed by another, and the assumption acquiesced in, the exclusive right of the original owner is necessarily gone. If that be so, then no after-coming person can claim the exclusive right to the alleged trade-mark, both from the person who first had it, and the person who destroyed it, and used it by virtue of having destroyed the legal rights of the first owner.

The contract of September 29, 1852, states, "Said Carter and Dodge are to have the right to use said Atwood's name on the labels and circulars, and to manufacture and sell the following medicines, viz., Atwood's Vegetable Jaundice Bitters, Atwood's Compound Extract of Sarsaparilla, Atwood's Dysentery Drops, Atwood's Rheumatic and Spinal Elixir," &c. Extracts from the testimony will show that the proposition of the respondents is correct, viz., that no trade-mark at all was ever sold by Moses Atwood to anybody.

The complainants allege in their bill that Moses Atwood was the originator of a certain trade-mark that he assigned to certain others, and that they, the complainants, bought of those assignees of Atwood. All the evidence they have introduced on this point is an effort to sustain that allegation. But the evidence fails to show that Atwood had any fixed and established trade-mark for his medicine. It fails to show that his successors put up the medicine in the same manner as he did, and it not only fails to show that the complainants have acquired whatever bottle, label, &c., that Atwood used, but shows clearly that they acquired something quite different, if they acquired anything. The deed from Atwood was simply of the right to use his name. What was this right thus to use his name? It could not be a license to publish the falsehood which they did,—"prepared by Moses Atwood, Georgetown, Mass.,"—for that would have been a contract wholly invalid. It meant simply that they should be called Atwood's medicines, as recited in the contract. The contract could not and did not contemplate that they should say that Moses Atwood prepared the bitters, when he did not. The contract merely said that those new manufacturers should advertise to the world that the medicines were Atwood medicines, prepared according to his recipes, which he sold to these men.

Upon this point the cases are clear. "Whenever the question arises whether any particular name or mark, can be appropriated as property, or rather whether one who adopts such name, &c., is entitled to the protection of the law in its exclusive use . . . the answer must depend upon the determination of the question, whether such name, &c., is used to designate and does in fact designate the article to which it is affixed as the production of the manufacturer who has adopted it, . . . to furnish to the public the assurance of origin and ownership of the article, &c." Upton, Trade-Marks, p. 98. "All who use trade-marks indicating that the articles were originally manufactured or owned by others are practising an imposition on the public. Every assignee and purchaser who has the trade-mark of the original proprietor, without indicating that he is the assignee or purchaser, is in this position." Sherwood v. Andrews, 5 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 588; Partridge v. Menck, 1 How. Cas. 547.

If any celebrity had attached to the particular medicine in question, it had so attached by reason of the name of Atwood. It could not be by reason of the word "bitters," for that is a common word. It could not be by virtue of the words "vegetable, physical, jaundice," for they are descriptive words and cannot form a trade-mark or part of the same. Amoskeag Manuf'g Co. v. Spear, 2 Sandf. 599; Stokes v. Landgraff, 17 Barb. 608; Bininger v. Wattles, 28 How. Prac. 206. Therefore the only title or trade-mark which could be attached to these bitters was the words "Atwood's Bitters," or "Moses Atwood's Bitters." Such a trade-mark the assignors of the plaintiffs could not lawfully use without adding thereto the statement that they were the successors of Moses Atwood, Georgetown, Mass., and as such were making the bitters. Here the allegation of the bill is that they have prepared these bitters, and asserted on the labels that they were made by Moses Atwood. Not only this, but while representing them as made at Georgetown, Mass., where they were originally made, and where they acquired their reputation, they are now admitted to be put up in New York City.

Misrepresentation by the user of the trade-mark invalidates it. Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co., 11 Jur. (N. S.) 513, Cox, Trade Mark Cas. 699; Palmer v. Harris, 60 Pa. St. 156. By all complainants' testimony it is admitted that nothing passed as a trade-mark but Atwood's name. For twenty years before the assignment, in 1875, to the Manhattan Medicine Co., the assignors of the complainants had been making and selling this article, and all representing that the bitters were prepared by Moses Atwood, Georgetown, Mass., when it is in evidence that Atwood sold out to Carter & Dodge in 1855, and went to the state of Iowa, where he has ever since lived. Now all the sales of these bitters made since 1852 have been made to the public upon the false representation that they were "manufactured by Moses Atwood," with some exceptions to be named hereafter in connection with another point. I apply to this, and the continued sales of the bitters by the present complainants, the rule that "assignees of trade-marks have no special privileges of sailing under false colors, and if they will persist in so doing, prudence would dictate that they give courts of equity a wide berth." Sherwood v. Andrews, before cited. Thus Moses Atwood could not assign to the assignors of the complainants what they claim to have owned, nor could said "successors and assigns" assign the same to the present complainants.

A trade-mark upon an article of manufacture is to, and must, denote the origin and manufacture of the article. It is upon this that the public relies when purchasing. The reputation of the manufacture is what gives assurance of the quality of the goods. Therefore no purchaser of the secret of that manufacture can use the name of the original proprietor without at the same time giving notice on the label, or circular, or trade-mark, that he is a successor of the originator whose name constitutes part, and the essential part, of the trade-mark. Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co., 11 Jur. (N. S.) 513, Cox, Trade Mark Cas. 699. The right obtained by Carter & Dodge was a limited territorial one, and did not include the state of Maine, or New Hampshire. The first requisite of an exclusive property in a trade-mark is the exclusive right to manufacture or sell the specific article to which it applies. Upton, Trade-Marks, 23; Canham v. Jones, 2 Ves. & B. 218. It is plain that no such right exists in this case, for the grantor, Moses Atwood, reserved certain territory to himself, and excepted Maine (where the respondents do business) and New Hampshire. Now, under these circumstances, it is plain that no exclusive right to the use of the words "Atwood's Bitters" could be claimed by Carter & Dodge, and consequently none could be assigned to the complainants. Not having the exclusive right to the medicine, neither the complainants nor their assignors can have an exclusive right to the name of the same. There is no such thing as the sale of a trade-mark, or indeed the existence of one in the abstract, unconnected with a specific property or article of merchandise to which it is affixed. Upton, Trade-Marks, 22; Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co., Cox, Trade Mark Cas. 698. Thus the right to the trade-mark of an article is dependent upon and follows the nature and extent of the ownership of such article.

The allegation of the bill, of the exclusive ownership of the alleged trade-mark, is, therefore, not sustained. But the rights of the assignors of the complainants, if any, were forfeited long before the attempted transfer: 1. By the use of the alleged trade-mark as a means of misrepresentation and deception upon the public, in the sale of a spurious article under the same. 2. By laches, and long acquiescence in the use of the alleged trade-mark by the respondents and by others. 3. By a disregard, among themselves, of their several allotted rights under the said trade-mark, and of the limitations put upon the same, and the grant of the same by Moses Atwood. 4. By the voluntary relinquishment of the bottle, label, &c., as used by Moses Atwood, and conveyed to Carter & Dodge, in 1852, and the adoption of new trade-marks of their own invention.

Under the original label a deceit was practised upon the public. While Carter's agents were only sent out with his new label and genuine manufacture, great quantities were secretly by him put upon the market, of an article which would not keep, which fermented and soured, and which could not stand exposure to the sun. These were often returned to dealers on account of their imperfection. The question upon this point is, could Carter himself have maintained his right to the exclusive use of a trade-mark which he had prostituted to such uses? Had he not forfeited any right of property in it by these practices?

A trade-mark, as has been shown, is only recognized by a court of equity when connected with some article of merchandise to which the skill and enterprise of the manufacturer or seller has given a reputation. It is then, and then only, property. It is a source of profit to the proprietor, and a guaranty to the public of the good quality of the article to which it is affixed. But if used as a means of misrepresentation or deceit, it is property no longer, and he who uses it for such purpose can claim no property rights under it. Upon this point the authorities are numerous and clear. Hobbs v. Francais, 19 How. Prac. 567; Phalon v. Wright, Cox, Trade Mark Cas. 311; Pidding v. How, Id. 640; Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 66; Upton, Trade-Marks, 30, 31. "When a person seeks, by representations which are untrue, to mislead the public into the belief that his commodities . . . are compounded or produced in a manner not in accordance with the truth, . . . he places himself beyond the pale of the protection of the law, and, acquiring no exclusive right in the trade-mark he uses, is entitled to no relief against any one who may see fit to appropriate it." Carter & Dodge both say they never acknowledged Bateman's claim of right. From this we can only conclude that Bateman disputed their right to the bottle and label, and maintained his position in the courts. From 1861 to 1875, after this, Bateman continued to use the bottle and label, his right to which the assignors of the complainants never conceded, but simply acquiesced in. In 1875, the complainants step in and buy up both these opposing rights, Bateman's and the Carters'. This might do if it were to quiet title to a piece of real estate. But with respect to this class of property,—trade-marks,—the law is different. A man can buy up all the conflicting titles to real estate, and so obtain a valid ownership. But in the case of property in trade-marks, the adverse claim of any one, if successfully maintained, as Bateman's was, destroys that exclusiveness which is the essential quality to the preventing of others from using the same mark on the same goods.

Where long acquiescence in the usurpations of another party is proved, still an injunction will be granted when the party resumes his original right. Here no resumption was pretended, but continued acquiescence is shown from the fact that Bateman's right was bought by the complainants, thereby acknowledging it. McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245; Amoskeag Manuf'g Co. v. Garner, 55 Barb. 151; Beard v. Turner, 13 Law T. [N. S.] 747. This case was different from those of acquiescence usually found in the reports. Simple acquiescence may affect the question of costs or damages, but will not, on a resumption by the person originally entitled to the trade-mark, work any forfeiture. Here, however, was an ineffectual attempt to enforce the rights of the assignors of the complainants and a judgment of a court of equity adverse to them, and a dismissal of an action at law, and then an acquiescence of nearly fifteen years, and no attempt, either by the complainants or their assignors, to resume the right.

The right to the exclusive use of the bottle and label was also forfeited by the assignors of the complainants, before the assignment, by a division of the right among themselves, by a disregard by all of them of the territorial limits assigned to each in the division, and of the limits set to all of their united territorial rights, by Moses Atwood, the original grantor. This presents a question of a peculiar character. Here were three or four persons or firms who at some time had had territorial grants of rights under a supposed trade-mark on a certain manufacture. After a time they divide up that territory among themselves. Then shortly they each and all deliberately go to work to trample down and violate each other's rights under their division, and wholly disregard the trade-mark privileges of each other. Not only this, but they all also transgress the territorial limits fixed upon all their rights put together, and wholly disregard the original grant from the first grantor, and all trespass on territory which he had reserved to others. This state of things continued for fourteen or fifteen years. They were separate, distinct, and competing firms. They had no common business interests, and they were all concerned in disregarding each other's rights, if any, under this trade-mark, set up by these complainants, and in violating the rights of other assignees. The firms thus continued down to the very moment of the assignments to the complainants, and were the sole assignors (including Bateman, who was also selling anywhere he pleased all the time) of the complainants. Previous to the assignment to the complainants, could these parties, Dodge, Carter, Noyes & Manning, and Bateman, have successfully set up any right in a court of equity, founded upon an alleged trade-mark in the disregard and violation of which they had been engaged for years; not only as against each other, but also as against all persons; could they say that that was valid which they, the owners, had been proving was worthless and invalid; could they thus disregard and violate a right inter sese, and as to others, and then claim relief under it at the same time? If the assignors could not, how could their assignees, who take the alleged right in the midst of these violations of it at the hands of its owners? The trade-mark right, if any, was given up and others substituted for it by its owners, and so, never having been resumed, was forfeited and lost. Each manufacturer designated his goods by his own name. The words Atwood's Bitters was thereafter simply and only a genuine term denoting simply a class of goods, not an especial manufacture by any one person or firm. Browne, Trade-Mark, §§ 131–137, 180, 181; Singleton v. Bolton, 3 Doug. 293. Precisely the same result was produced with Carter.

Mr. Webb argued orally, but filed no brief.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Equity gives relief for the infringement of a trade-mark, upon the ground that one man is not allowed to offer his goods for sale, representing the goods to be the manufacture of another in the same commodity. Seixo v. Provezende, 1 Ch. App. 195. What degree of resemblance is necessary to constitute an infringement is incapable of exact definition; but the rule is, that no trader can adopt a trade-mark so resembling that of another as that ordinary purchasers, buying with ordinary caution, are likely to be misled. McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245. Two trade-marks are substantially the same in legal contemplation if the resemblance is such as to deceive ordinary purchasers, giving such attention to the same as such purchasers usually give, and to cause them to purchase the one manufacture, supposing it to be the other. Gorham Co. v. White, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 528.

Relief is claimed in this case upon the special grounds set forth in the bill of complaint. They are, in substance and effect, as follows:

1. That the corporation complainants for a long time have been and now are the manufacturers and vendors of an article of medicine called and known as "Atwood's Vegetable Physical Jaundice Bitters," taken internally, for the cure of jaundice and other diseases; that during all the time they have been engaged in making and selling the article, it has been put up and sold in the same manner, and with the same trade-marks, labels, and wrappers affixed thereto, in glass bottles, with twelve panel-shaped sides, having on five of the sides the raised words and letters, "Atwood's Genuine Physical Jaundice Bitters, Georgetown, Mass.," blown in the glass on each bottle, each bottle containing about a pint of the medicine in liquid form, labelled with a light-yellow printed label, pasted on the outside, as fully set forth in the bill of complaint.

2. That the said medicine was first invented and put up for sale about twenty-five years ago by one Dr. Moses Atwood, formerly of Georgetown, Mass., by whom, his assigns and successors, the same has been ever since made and sold by the same name, in the same manner, and with the same trade-marks and description.

3. That the complainants, long prior to the alleged infringement, became the lawful, sole, and exclusive owners of the formula or recipe for making said medicine, and of the sole and exclusive right to use said name or designation therefor, together with all said trade-marks, labels, and goodwill of the business of making and selling said medicine.

4. That the respondents, prior to the filing of the bill of complaint, at Portland, and at divers other places unknown to the complainants, have manufactured and sold, and are still manufacturing and selling, large quantities of medicine, of an inferior quality, in imitation of the article manufactured and sold by the complainants, and without their consent.

5. That during all that time the respondents have made, put up, and sold, and still make, put up, and sell their said imitation and counterfeit article as and for the genuine article of the complainants, so put up, marked, and labelled, that it is very difficult to be distinguished from the complainants' genuine article.

6. Based on these allegations, the complainants pray for an account and for an injunction, restraining the respondents from affixing or applying to any article of medicine manufactured, sold, shipped or supplied by them, or to the bottles or packages in which the same is put up, the complainants' trade-mark words, to wit, "Atwood's Vegetable Physical Jaundice Bitters," or either of said words, or any imitation thereof.

Service was made, and the respondents appeared and filed an answer, setting up several defences to the following effect:

1. They admit that complainants purchased all the right, which the parties named in the answer owned, to prepare the Atwood Bitters, but they deny that those parties held or possessed the exclusive right to manufacture the same, or any exclusive right whatever to the same, or any exclusive right to any trade-mark, label, or wrapper, consisting of a glass bottle with panel-shaped sides, and with the raised words and letters, "Atwoods's Genuine Physical Jaundice Bitters, Georgetown, Mass.," blown in the glass; nor did they possess any exclusive right to the preparation of the medicine in a liquid form, or to the light-yellow printed label pasted to said bottle, upon which were the words, "Atwood's Vegetable Physical Jaundice Bitters." Nor did they possess any exclusive right to the residue of what is printed upon the label, and set forth in the bill of complaint.

2. That the twelve-panel bottle, the yellow label, the words "Atwood's Bitters," together with the other words alleged to be printed on said label, were in public and common use by a large number of manufacturers.

3. That the complainants did not purchase and do not now own the exclusive right, nor the entire right, to said bottle, label, and words, or either of them, as alleged, because their said assignors were not the exclusive proprietors of the same, and therefore could not sell and dispose of what they did not own.

4. They deny that Moses Atwood first invented and put up the said medicine for sale, and allege that it was first put up by Moses F. Atwood, of Georgetown, Mass., in connection with L. H. Bateman, not in a panelled bottle, but in a smooth, round bottle, without panels; that the round bottle used by Bateman had no words blown in the glass, and that the bottles which contained words blown in the glass were rectangular in form and without panels, and that Moses Atwood first used a white label and a round bottle having no panels or blown letters.

5. That Moses F. Atwood, and not Moses Atwood, first obtained the formula for the medicine from some physician to these respondents unknown, and prepared the same according to the formula, and not according to any invention of himself or of said Moses Atwood; and that, subsequently thereto, the medicine put up by him and Bateman began to be called "Atwood's Bitters."

6. That the respondent first named, in May, 1861, purchased the recipe for the medicine, and the right of using the bottle and label, that he has a right to use the same, and that no person has ever pretended to interrupt him in such use prior to the present suit.

7. That L. F. Atwood, the brother of Moses Atwood, also had a right to use the said label and bottle, and that he sold such a right to H. H. Hay, of Portland, who uses the same on the bottles containing the medicine.

8. That they have been in the practice of preparing the medicine, under the recipe bought of Moses F. Atwood, for the period of fourteen years, and that they have spent large sums of money in advertising the medicine, and in creating a market for the same.

Proofs were taken on both sides, and the evidence is voluminous and somewhat conflicting. Any discussion of the legal questions arising in the case would not be of much advantage until the facts are ascertained, which will be best accomplished by distinct findings.

Pursuant to that view, the court finds as follows:

1. That Moses Atwood, Georgetown, Mass., commenced preparing the medicine in question nearly forty years ago; that for a time the formula of the ingredients was a secret, and that he soon began to designate the preparation as his medicine more frequently than otherwise, designating it as Moses Atwood's Bitters or as Moses Atwood's Jaundice Bitters, and sometimes as Atwood's Vegetable Jaundice Bitters. There is no direct proof that he ever adopted any distinct trade-mark, but the evidence of use is such as to warrant the conclusion that he considered the latter designation as representing the article which he manufactured and put up for sale. For a time no other person had any interest in the business, and throughout all that period he put the article up in round, smooth bottles without panels or raised words or letters of any kind. Others subsequently acquired an interest in the business with him, among whom were his brother and L. H. Bateman, and the person who subsequently joined with him in the conveyance to Carter and Dodge. His son, Moses F. Atwood, had worked with him and Bateman at Georgetown in preparing the medicine under the recipe, and knew the ingredients of which it was compounded. He, the son, went to work with Bateman in 1860, and he states that they used a fluted bottle containing the name of the medicine and that of his father, and his place of residence blown into it.

2. That large rights in respect to the business remained in Moses Atwood, notwithstanding the interest in the same acquired by others; that Jan. 1, 1848, he entered into a written contract with Moses Carter, by which he sold to the latter bills against local agents in many places in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut and New York, and the right to sell the medicine in those places, under the terms and conditions following: that he, the manufacturer, should not sell the medicine in those places so long as the other party supplied customers there; that he, the proprietor, agreed to make the bitters during ten years for seventeen dollars per barrel, to be delivered in the state where the same were made, three-quarters of the money to be advanced by the other contracting party.

3. Carter and Benjamin S. Dodge, Feb. 2, 1852, formed a copartnership, which, of course, consisted of two parts; but they subsequently took into the firm C. L. Carter, and by interlineations made the articles consist of three parts. They formed the copartnership for making and vending Atwood's vegetable medicines and essences. Enough appears to afford an inference that a prior agreement between Moses Carter and Dodge of the one part. and Moses Atwood of the other, had been made, as the record shows that Atwood and Bingham and Carter and Dodge, Sept. 29, 1852, entered into a contract to settle doubts and supply omissions in the supposed antecedent agreement, which was not introduced in evidence.

4. By the contract introduced, Moses Atwood and his partner conveyed to Carter & Dodge the right to use said Atwood's name on the labels and circulars, and to manufacture and sell "Atwood's Vegetable Jaundice Bitters," and certain other articles, on the ground hereinafter described, and not to sell by themselves or their agents in any other portion of the world, or sell to others to sell, except on the ground hereinafter described. Massachusetts is named, with numerous excepted towns and parts of towns. Towns and places are also excepted from New York. Seven towns are also excepted from New Hampshire; and all of the state of Maine, except the towns of Kittery, South Berwick and Lebanon. Other exceptions are made in the same instrument, not necessary to be noticed in this investigation. Attempt was made to prove by parol the prior agreement referred to in the contract, and with that view reference was made in argument to the cross-examination of Luther F. Carter, who states that there were papers executed to Carter & Dodge, giving them the right to manufacture the bitters, using Moses Atwood's name, but that he knew nothing about the bottle. When asked if those papers came into his possession he answered that he didn't know that they ever did. He was then asked, "If they were ever in your hands, to whom did you deliver them?" and his answer was, "If they were ever in my hands I delivered them to Eli B. Johnson," the record showing that the person named was the agent of the complainants. Taken as a whole, the court is of the opinion that the evidence was not sufficient to admit parol testimony of the contents of the instrument, nor would it benefit the complainants if the rule was otherwise, as the witness states that he does not know that the paper or papers conveyed any thing more to Carter & Dodge than the right to put up the medicine and use Atwood's name; nor does the record contain any evidence tending to show that the original proprietor ever gave them the right to sell the medicines in any of the places excepted out of the contract introduced in evidence.

5. That parol evidence was introduced, tending to show that Carter & Dodge owned, at the time of their dissolution of copartnership, all the right in Atwood's Bitters to manufacture and sell the same, except what Atwood had reserved; but there is no evidence that he ever conveyed to them any right to put up or sell the same in the places reserved, nor is there any evidence tending to show how, if ever, he acquired the interest in the same at one time held by his brother and Bateman.

6. Suggestions were made in argument that Moses Atwood, in the year 1855, conveyed to Carter & Dodge, or Carter, Dodge & Co., his entire interest in the business, except his right to sell the medicine beyond Illinois. What a party does not own of course he cannot sell and that is a sufficient answer to the proposition, so far as respects the interests which had become vested in others; but the supposed sale might apply to some of the excepted places, not to all, as the same witness admits that Carter & Dodge did not own what Mr. Atwood had reserved, but he says that he once saw the agreement last referred to, and, when asked if he had made search for it, stated that he had made diligent search for it among his father's old papers. It was about the time that Carter, Dodge, & Co. brought the suit against Bateman that he saw the paper, and he says he has not seen it since that time. According to his statement the paper was from Moses Atwood to Carter, Dodge, & Co. Carter & Dodge sued Bateman for putting up and selling the medicine and using the trade-mark, and he prevailed in the suit; and yet no search was made among the papers of Mr. Dodge. For aught that appears to the contrary, it may be among his papers, or in the hands of the attorneys in that suit, or in the files of the clerk's office.

Two objections are taken to the evidence, both of which may be sustained: First. That sufficient search is not shown to admit it. Second. That, if it is admitted, it has no tendency to show that the conveyance included Maine, or any other of the excepted places; nor does it appear that the grantor reacquired the interests previously vested in other persons. Localities almost without number were excepted out of the general grant, and the uncontradicted proof is that the original proprietor made reservations in favor of his father, Levi Atwood, and his brother, Levi

F. Atwood, of Maine and part of New Hampshire.

7. Viewed in the light of these suggestions, the court finds that Carter & Dodge never acquired the right to put up and sell the medicine in Maine, or in any of the places excepted out of the grant from the original proprietor, nor did they ever acquire the right or title to any of the same reservations in favor of other parties. Trade-marks are an entirety, and are incapable of exclusive use at different places by more than one independent proprietor, for the reason that the party seeking redress, in order to establish an exclusive right to the trade-mark, must show that he had an exclusive right in the commodity to which it is attached. Upton, Trade-Marks, 24; Canham v. Jones, 2 Ves. & B. 218. Throughout the largest portion of the period since 1842, Bateman, or his son, who succeeded him, put up and sold Atwood's Bitters in the same town with the original proprietor, and the proofs show that he put the medicine up in half pint glass bottles, with the words, "Atwood's Jaundice Bitters, Moses Atwood, Georgetown, Mass.," blown upon the bottles; that when the proprietor removed, in 1855, he left with Bateman his original recipe for the manufacture of Atwood's Bitters, with all the medicines which he manufactured and sold. Little or nothing was made in the business during the lifetime of Bateman; and when he died, his son succeeded to and continued in the business until the heirs transferred the same to the complainants. For a few years, Carter & Dodge put up and sold the medicine, in accordance with the course pursued by the original proprietor, when they took into the firm the son of the senior partner, C. L. Carter, and continued to transact the business under the name of Carter, Dodge & Co, two or three years longer. When they dissolved and Dodge went out, the new firm, called Carter & Son, consisting of Moses Carter and C. L. Carter, took control of the business, and they continued the same for about five years. Subsequently, another son of the senior partner joined the firm, and they continued the business for two or three years under the firm name of Carter & Sons. Lastly, the father and the elder son went out, and Luther F. Carter took the firm name of Carter & Son, and continued the business until he sold to the complainants. After Carter & Dodge dissolved in 1855, Dodge went to Rowley, and put up and sold the medicine there for five years, using the Atwood labels. On the 4th of September, 1867, he sold and conveyed the right to manufacture and sell Atwood's Bitters to William B. Dorman for the term of five years from the date of the agreement, with the right to use the trade-marks he had previously used in the sale of the same. Before that period expired, the same party sold the same right to Noyes & Manning, now of Mystic, Conn., with authority to use the same labels.

8. That Carter & Son had two kinds of labels used on the bottles which they put up for sale. On the top of one of the labels the words "Carter's are the only genuine" were printed, and below the directions, the words "Manufactured by M. Carter & Son, successors to Moses Atwood, Georgetown, Mass.," were also printed. At the bottom of the label were also printed the words "Caution.—Observe that our name is blown in the bottle and on the revenue stamp. None others are genuine." The label also bore the words "Atwood's Vegetable Physical Jaundice Bitters." Two kinds of bitters were put up at their place. One kind, under the label described, which was the genuine "Atwood's Vegetable Physical Jaundice Bitters," sold in the market, at wholesale, for twenty-seven dollars per gross; the other kind was an inferior article, an imitation of the genuine, sold in the market at fifteen dollars per gross, bearing the genuine original label of Atwood's Bitters, with the "e" left out in the word "the" preceding the words United States. Carter's traveling agents never sold any but the genuine article, the imitation being disposed of by Carter alone. In most instances the two kinds were retailed at the same price; but when both kinds were known, the genuine brought a higher price.

9. That Bateman had the original recipe, and that Moses F. Atwood, the son of the original proprietor, when in the employment of Bateman as a selling agent, sold the recipe for compounding and preparing the Atwood Bitters in the state of Maine to Nathan Wood, in 1861. When asked whether the conveyance was in writing, he said it was, and that each party had a copy, and that he sold to the respondent the right to manufacture the bitters and sell the same in the state of Maine and elsewhere. Proof that the grantor had authority from the actual proprietor to execute the conveyance is not shown in the record; but it is shown that the purchaser, with his partner, has continued to prepare, put up, and sell the medicine, from the date of the purchase of the recipe to the date of the bill of complaint, without hindrance or interruption, with the exception of the two instances mentioned in the second answer, since the organization of the complainant corporation. None of the grantors of the complainants ever disputed their right to compound, put up, and sell the bitters in question, nor is there any evidence tending to show that the bitters which they sold were not the genuine Atwood Bitters. Their grantor possessed the genuine recipe, and the proofs are full to the point that it was the genuine recipe which he sold to the respondent, Nathan Wood. Beyond all doubt the respondent, Nathan Wood, acquired the recipe, which, not being the subject of a patent, might lawfully be used by any one who possessed the secret; and it is equally certain that he supposed that he had acquired the right to use the labels, as he purchased the right to use the same of the son of the original proprietor, and of the selling agent of Bateman, whose title to put up the medicine and use the labels was subsequently established by judicial determination.

10. Unlike what is usual in controversies respecting trade-marks the complainants in this case, instead of using a trade-mark of their own adoption, allege and attempt to prove that the trade-mark in question was adopted by the original proprietor of the medicine, and that they have acquired the title to the same by certain mesne conveyances set forth in the record, and the court finds upon that subject as follows: 1. That they, or their predecessors, Jan. 1, 1875, acquired, by assignment, whatever right in the same belonged to the heirs and representatives of L. H. Bateman. 2. Also, March 18, in the same year, whatever right belonged to the firm of Noyes & Manning. 3. Also, March 30, in the same year, whatever right belonged to Benjamin C. Dodge. 4. Also, March 30, in the same year, whatever right belonged to William B. Dorman. 5. Also, April 12 and 19, in the same year, whatever right belonged to the Carters in the said trade-mark.

None of these instruments of conveyance, however, convey, or profess to convey, any greater rights to the complainants than those which were previously held by Carter & Dodge; and it is clear that Carter & Dodge never acquired from the original proprietor any right to put up or sell the medicine in Maine, or to use the labels of the original proprietor in that state, out of the three towns specified in the written agreement, which constitutes the evidence of their title.

Nothing remains to be done in the case of much importance, except to state the conclusions of law and fact resulting from the findings of the court:

1. Examined in the light of the findings, as the case must be, it is clear to a demonstration that the complainants have no exclusive right to put up and sell the medicine, nor any exclusive right or title to the labels, which belonged to the original proprietor.

2. That all they claim in respect either to the medicine or the labels is the right to the same which was held by Carter & Dodge, who never possessed the right to put up the medicine or to use the labels in any part of Maine, except the three towns named in the said written agreement.

3. That the rights of certain of the assignors of the complainants, if any they ever had, were forfeited long before the supposed transfer under which the complainants claim, by the use of the trade-mark as a means of misrepresentation and deception to the public, by putting up a spurious article, and using the genuine trade-mark to promote the sale of the spurious article. Misrepresentation and deceit of the kind divest the guilty party of all title to the same, and it follows that a party who has forfeited his property in the same cannot convey any title to another. Phalon v. Wright, Cox, Trade Mark Cas. 311, 5 Phila. 464; Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 66; Pidding v. How, 8 Sim. 477; Hobbs v. Francais, 19 How. Prac. 567; Partridge v. Menck, 1 How. Cas. 547; Fetridge v. Wells, 4 Abb. Prac. 144; Flavell v. Harrison, 19 Eng. Law & Eq. 15. Equity will not decree for an account of past gains and profits where there has been laches in bringing the suit and long acquiescence in the use of the trade-mark by others, and especially not where the acquiescence covers a period of fourteen years. McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245; Harrison v. Taylor, 11 Jur. (N. S.) 408; Moet v. Couston, 10 Law T. (N. S.) 395; Edelsten v. Edelsten, 1 De Gex, J. & S. 185; Estcourt v. Estcourt Hop Essence Co., 10 Ch. App. 276; [Molt v. Couston, 33 Beav. 580.] [3]

4. That the assignors of the complainants forfeited all their property, if any, in the trade-mark belonging to the original proprietor, by a disregard, among themselves, of their several allotted districts, after the grant or license from the original proprietor, by trespassing upon each other, and misuse of the trade-mark.

5. That the grantees or licensees of the original proprietor, and their successors, forfeited the right to the original trade-mark of their grantor or licensor by the voluntary relinquishment of the bottle, label, and directions, which he used before the transfer, and by the adoption of new and different labels, &c., of their own substitution, one or more of whom put up and sold a spurious article of medicine under the genuine label, and used a different label of his own invention on bottles containing the genuine medicine. Cases arise where the title is complete, when a party, though not entitled to a decree for an account, may still be entitled to a decree to prevent future infringements; but the difficulty in the way of the complainants in this case is incurable, as the evidence shows that the respondents have the genuine recipe, which is not protected by any patent, and the complainants have not any exclusive right to the use of the label, and no right at all to the use of it in the state of Maine.

Bill of complaint dismissed, with costs.

[The case was taken by the complainants, on appeal, to the supreme court, where, Justice Field delivering the opinion, the decree of the circuit court dismissing the bill was affirmed. 108 U. S. 213, 2 Sup. Ct. 436.]

MANHEIM, In re. See Case No. 9,038.

MANIERRE (MOHR v.). See Case No. 9,695.

MANIN (POMEROY v.). See Case No. 11,260.

[3] [From 14 O. G. 519.]

Case No. 9,027.

The MANISTEE.

[5 Biss. 381;[1] 6 Chi. Leg. News, 126; 3 Ins. Law J. 153.]

District Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Aug., 1873.[2]

COLLISION—LIBEL BY INSURER — LOSS NOT ACTUALLY PAID—POLICY ISSUED IN DISREGARD OF STATUTORY REQUIREMENTS.

1. In case of a total loss of a cargo by collision, a libel may be brought by the insurer against the colliding vessel, after notice and proof of the loss and demand of payment, though without actual payment.

2. The insured having been fully satisfied for the loss, and not intervening or opposing the prosecution of the libel of the insurer, the carrier can not be permitted to raise the objection of non-payment of the loss before libel brought.

3. Where the statutes of a state require foreign insurance companies to comply with certain requirements, and declare penalties for doing business in disregard of these requirements, in case of a loss on a policy issued in disregard of such requirements, a carrier can not be permitted to make this a defense to a libel, the loss having been paid by the company.

[Cited in Amazon Ins. Co. v. The Iron Mountain, Case No. 270.]

This was a libel by the Traders' Insurance Company of Chicago and the Orient Mutual Insurance Company of New York, against the propeller Manistee, to recover the amount of $10,700 insurance paid by them on the cargo of the schooner S. Robinson, which was sunk by collision with the Manistee.

Emmons & Markham, for libellants.

Finches, Lynde & Miller, for respondent.

MILLER, District Judge. On the 23d of May, 1872, at Chicago, there was shipped on board the schooner S. Robinson sixteen thousand and five bushels of corn, of the value of ten thousand and seven hundred dollars, to be transported on board of said schooner to Kingston, Canada. The Traders' Insurance Company made and delivered to the shipper a policy on said cargo, in the sum of five thousand seven hundred dollars, and the Orient Mutual Insurance Company in the sum of five thousand dollars, against the risks of collision and of the perils of the lakes.

The schooner, while on her trip down the lakes with the cargo on board, was damaged by collision with the propeller Manistee, on the 24th of May, 1872, so that she sunk, and her cargo became a total loss, rendering thereby the libellants liable to pay therefor.

Proof of loss was made May 28, 1872. May 30, notice of the loss was given these insurance companies, and of an abandonment to them, with claim for a total loss. This libel was filed and monition issued May 31. June 12, 1872, the Orient Mutual Insurance Company paid five thousand dollars, the amount of their policy. In case of loss, by a condition of the policy issued by this company, the loss is payable in thirty days after proof of interest in the property insured.

The libel alleges that payment of the loss had been made by these libellants, which is a mistake as to the Orient Mutual Insurance Company, but it had been made by this company within thirty days after the loss, according to the proofs in support of the libel. The policy of the Orient Mutual Insurance Company was issued by an agent in Chicago. There is no evidence that the agent of this company who issued the policy had authority to do the business under the laws of the state of Illinois.

It was contended by counsel at the hearing that the policy is void for having been issued in disregard of the requirements of the laws of that state. The statute laws of Illinois on this subject were read at the argument, from pages 595–599, 1 Stat. 1858 (Cook Ed.). These laws require that insurance companies incorporated and located in states other than the state of Illinois, produce certain statements respecting their liability and condition, and procure from the auditor of the state authority to transact business within the state. And it is further declared that it shall be unlawful for an agent to do business without having first complied with those laws. And upon conviction for violating these requirements, punishment by fine or imprisonment, or both, may be imposed.

Those statute laws do not declare void policies issued by foreign companies through a local agent in disregard or violation of them. The object of these statutes was for the security of citizens doing business with such companies, by bringing them as near as possible to local corporations, and also as a provision for revenue. Where a statute prohibits or annexes a penalty to its commission, the act is made unlawful, but it does not follow that the unlawfulness of the act was meant by the legislature to avoid a contract made in contravention of it. Where a statute is silent, and contains nothing from which the contrary can properly be inferred, a contract in contravention of it is void. But the whole statute must be examined in order to decide whether or not it does contain anything from which the contrary can be properly inferred. Harris v. Runnels, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 79; Ocean Ins. Co. v. Polleys, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 157. There is no penalty pronounced against a person for obtaining a policy from, or doing business with, the company that has not complied with the requirements of those statutes. The insured in this case obtained the policy upon the payment of the premium, and has received from this company full satisfaction for the loss.

If the owner of the cargo had not taken a policy from the agent of this company, but had shipped without insurance, he would be entitled to recover of the carrier for the loss, the value of the cargo. In my opinion, the carrier should not be permitted to make this defense. The shipper might have brought a libel for the use of the company, and if the use were not expressed in the record, the court would protect the company, even after a decree in favor of the libellant.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 9,028.]

This brings me to the consideration of the second objection to a decree for the Orient Mutual Insurance Company in this libel. The point presented is the non-payment of the loss prior to bringing the libel. Notice of a total loss of the cargo insured was given by the insured to the insurance company prior to the bringing of the libel, and demand of payment made. Where there is a total loss there is no necessity for a formal instrument of abandonment. A total loss, with notice and demand of payment, is equivalent to an abandonment and acceptance. The insured renounces and yields up to the insurers all the right, title and claim to what may be saved. The insurer then stands in the place of the insured, and becomes legally entitled to all that can be rescued from destruction. "Where the thing insured, and every part of it, is completely gone out of the power of the insured, it is just and proper that he should receive at once as for a total loss, and leave the jus recuperandi to the insurer." Marsh. Ins. B. I. A. 14.

"The insured has a right to call upon the underwriter for a total loss, and of course to abandon as soon as he hears of such a calamity having happened. his claim to an indemnity not being at all suspended by the chance of a future recovery of part of the property, but because of the abandonment that chance belongs to the underwriters." Park, Ins. 9; Comegys v. Vasse, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 193.

The payment of a total loss by the insurers, or their liability to pay such a loss, in consequence of an abandonment, gives them an equitable right to the property, or what remains of it, so far as it was covered by the policy. And the abandonment, considered as an assignment of property, must have reference to the time of the loss. 2 Phil. Ins. § 1707.

It is a universal rule that all rights, claims and interests which are indispensably connected with the property insured, pass to the insurer by an abandonment of the property, so far as the same belonged to the insured, and to the extent of the interest covered by the policy; as a right to contribution for general average, all claims for negligence or any misconduct causing injury to the property, as for collision or for injury to goods, or for an indemnity from a foreign government. Arnould, Ins. (4th Ed., by Maclachlan) 863.

Under the 34th admiralty rule, an insurer who has accepted an abandonment, which divests the original claimant of all interest, may be admitted to intervene, and become the dominus litis. The Ann C. Pratt [Case No. 409]: In this case it does not appear that the insurance company had satisfied the insured for the loss. "And the insurer may be allowed to intervene and become the dominus litis, when he can show an abandonment which divests the original claimant of all interest. But with this the respondent has no concern, nor can he defend himself by setting up these equities of others, unless he can show that he has made satisfaction to the party justly entitled to receive the damages." The Monticello v. Mollison, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 152, 156; Rogers v. Holly, 18 Wend. 349.

The owner and insurer in respect to the property and the risks incident thereto may be considered as one person, having the beneficial right to indemnity from the carrier. The notice of the total loss, with demand of payment according to the terms of the policy, vested in the insurance company the exclusive title to the insured property, and fixed the liability of the insurer to pay the amount of the policy within thirty days. And upon the equitable principles of admiralty, the insurer being considered in the nature of a surety should not be required to satisfy the insured prior to instituting a libel against the carrier, when the insured does not object, nor intervene for his interest. In this case the insured was fully satisfied for the loss, and the carrier should not be permitted to oppose the prosecution of this libel on the part of the Orient Mutual Insurance Company.

Decree for libellants.

[This decree was affirmed by the circuit court. Case No. 9,028.]

Case No. 9,028.

The MANISTEE.

[7 Biss. 35.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Jan., 1874.[2]

COLLISION — RUNNING IN A FOG — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—PAYMENT BY INSURER BEFORE FILING LIBEL.

1. When a steamer is running in a fog surrounded by sail vessels, and in close proximity to them, she ought to materially decrease her usual rate of speed. Seven miles an hour is entirely too fast under such circumstances.

[Cited in The Leland, 19 Fed. 775; Clare v. Providence & S. S. Co., 20 Fed. 536, 538.]

2. In a collision where a fault is charged against one vessel, in relation to which the testimony is doubtful, and it appears by undisputed testimony that the fault of another is flagrant, the latter only will be held responsible, and the doctrine of contributory negligence will not apply.

3. Where a libel is brought by the underwriters for the loss of a vessel, they having paid the loss and claiming to be subrogated to the rights of the insured it is not material whether or no the money has actually been paid by them before the filing of the libel, if it was the bona fide intention of the owner to abandon.

In admiralty.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirming Case No. 9,027.]

H. H. & G. C. Markham, for libellants.
Finches, Lynde & Miller, for claimant.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. In this case I shall affirm the decree of the district court [Case No. 9,027]. The circumstances connected with the collision which gave rise to this case are briefly: That the propeller Manistee was coming across the lake on the morning of the 24th of May, 1872, bound for Milwaukee, and the schooner S. Robinson was bound down the lake. The morning was very foggy, with a light wind from the south and west. It was so foggy that a vessel could be seen but a short distance. The Robinson had her port tacks aboard and was going free on her course, one point east of north. The vessels did not see each other until they were so near that a collision was very difficult to avoid; at any rate it could not be avoided I think, by the schooner. Whether or not it might have been prevented by the propeller after the Robinson was seen admits perhaps of more question.

The district judge thought it could have been, but I do not think it is so clear. The propeller blew her whistle from time to time as she kept on her course. The evidence is quite satisfactory I think also that there was a horn blown on board the schooner. It is denied by those on board of the propeller that the proper blasts of the horn were heard, namely, three blasts of the horn, indicating what course the Robinson was on. There was a slight breeze, the schooner not going more than three or four miles an hour, three and a half, perhaps. What indicates how much the propeller is in fault is the fact that the fog was very thick; so thick that a vessel could be seen but a very short distance, perhaps not over one or two hundred feet. Although some of those on board of the propeller say it was not so, more of them say they saw the schooner a quarter of a mile. I doubt whether that is true. Of course, if it is true, the obligation on the part of the propeller to avoid the schooner was absolute. Now, admitting that they saw the schooner a quarter of a mile off, they necessarily admit that they were in fault by running afoul of her, and it would have the effect to relieve the schooner of all responsibility. But I think that they did not see the schooner a quarter of a mile off. The fog being so thick, and the inability to see vessels except when they came very close together, fog horns being heard from various vessels in the immediate vicinity, it was a flagrant fault for the steamer to keep on her course as she did without abating her speed and without checking it until the collision was probably unavoidable.

Now without laying down any absolute rule as to the speed at which a steamer should run in a fog on these lakes, there can be no question but that when a steamer is running in the fog, surrounded by sail vessels, as this steamer knew that she was, and in close proximity, that to run at the rate of speed that this propeller was running was a gross wrong, a great risk which she had no right to incur to the sailing vessels that were near.

I know what steamboat-men say; that they must make their time; that they must run in the fog. But they cannot be permitted to run with their usual speed in a fog, surrounded by sail vessels, against which they are liable to collide at any moment.

The district judge thought the speed of this propeller was seven miles an hour. I think perhaps that the weight of evidence is that she was running faster than that. But, suppose it was only seven miles an hour; it was too great a speed under the circumstances. They knowing, as they ought to have known, that they were surrounded by vessels, they should have checked up so as to have had only reasonable steerage-way upon the propeller.

Then as to the fault of the schooner: I cannot see that there was any fault on the part of the schooner that contributed to this collision. The weight of the evidence is that she kept her course, as she had a right to do. After seeing the propeller it was impossible to avoid a collision—impossible at any rate on the part of the schooner. If there was a fault then, there was no fault on the part of the schooner that contributed to the collision. And where there is charged a fault against a vessel, as there is in this case by the defense, in relation to which the testimony leaves it doubtful whether it exists or not, and it appears by the undisputed testimony that the fault of the propeller is flagrant, a court will not find the other party in fault upon doubtful evidence when it can lay its hand upon a flagrant wrong and say that that, at any rate, was mainly the cause of the injury sustained.

Now as to the blowing of the horns; the lookout; or the manner in which the schooner was steered: The testimony certainly is not satisfactory that there was a fault in any of those particulars, or any other, which contributed to the collision. Steamers must learn that they cannot rush through a fleet of sail vessels, on a public highway much frequented, in a dense fog, and in excuse say: "We must make our time; they must keep out of our way." They must not say that and expect if they sink a vessel as this propeller sunk this vessel, to escape paying for the loss. It is as clear a case as I have ever had before me. The schooner that was sunk was loaded with 16,000 bushels of corn, and it was lost. She was stove almost right through amidships, and the men on board had hardly time or opportunity to escape, and in fact they lost a large part of their effects, clothing, &c. The underwriters paid the loss on this corn, and they have come in and asked that they shall be repaid and subrogated for the owners in all their rights.

An objection is made to the libel. One of the underwriters paid for the loss which had been sustained a few days after the libel was filed, and it is claimed that the rights of the parties must have been consummated at the time the libel was filed. The only question is whether, if there was an abandonment on the part of the owner of the corn to the underwriter, it was in such a way as to indicate that he intended to clothe the underwriter with all his rights. It is not material, I think, whether or not the money had been actually paid. And the proof is abundant, in this case, that it was the intention of the owner of the corn to abandon all his rights and interests to the company, and it within a few days paid the loss, thus removing all doubt upon the subject as to the intention of the parties. I decide the case therefore upon the ground that, the owner having made an absolute abandonment, under circumstances showing that he did not intend to make any claim for the corn in any way, that it was absolute; that it was not necessary in order to file a libel that the money should be actually paid. Of course, there need not have been an abandonment in the strict sense of the term here, because the thing abandoned was in the bottom of the lake and never recovered. And that illustrates the view which the court has taken; so that the libel, which is a libel by the underwriters, was properly sustained by the district court, and the decree will be affirmed.

The cross libel filed by the owners of the propeller for the damages sustained by it because of the collision, was properly dismissed by the district court, there being no cause for filing a libel against the Robinson or its owners. The district court seemed to think the schooner was seen a sufficient distance off to have avoided the collision if the proper precautions had been taken. I doubt that. I think the weight of the evidence is that the schooner loomed up all at once before the propeller so that neither could really have avoided the collision.

Decree for libellants.

Case No. 9,029.

The MANITOBA.

[2 Flip. 241;[1] 11 Chi. Leg. News, 25; 3 Cin. Law Bul. 809.]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. Oct., 1878.[2]

COLLISION—DUE DILIGENCE—MEETING END ON—SPEED.

1. The collision act of 1864 [13 Stat. 58] provides that when steamers are meeting end on or nearly end on, they shall port—each one—and go to the right, but this applies to cases in which each steamer is, at night, in such position as to see both of the colored lights of the other. Where the red light is opposite the red light of the other it does not apply, and if the green light of one of the steamers is opposite the green light of the other, or if in any case each vessel shows to the other a single colored light directly ahead, or where both lights are anywhere but ahead, the rule does not apply.

[Cited in The M. M. Chase, Case No. 9,684; The New York, 53 Fed. 559; The Decatur H. Miller, 10 C. C. A. 284, 62 Fed. 95.]

2. There is no general obligation to slacken speed, although two steamers are found approaching each other in such a way as that it is necessary to change the helm in order to avoid a collision, yet such an obligation arises in case of continuous approach or when the approaching light is found to be closing in instead of opening out.

[Cited in The Jay Gould, 19 Fed. 769.]

3. If the question be whether there was promptness in giving and executing orders upon a steamer immediately before a collision, the fact that the master left the deck after the lights of the approaching vessel had been seen, and did not return until after a collision had become inevitable, may be looked to, as also the further fact that the engineer for two or three times left his post to observe the approaching lights. The court may properly consider such facts as indicating a want of due diligence.

The Comet was bound from Grand Island, Lake Superior, to Cleveland. Having rounded Whitefish Point at about 8 p. m. she saw the red light of the Manitoba when about one-fourth to one-half a point upon her port bow. The Comet immediately ported her wheel half a point and steadied. After running on a short time and finding that the Manitoba failed to open out, she ported again half a point, blew her whistle, which was not answered, and failing to shake off the Manitoba, which seemed to be swinging under her starboard wheel, the Comet again was put hard a-port, the Manitoba now shutting in her red and opening her green light. Then the engines of the Comet were stopped and reversed, but it was too late. She was struck on the port bow by the Manitoba and cut nearly in two, and sunk in less than two minutes. Eleven on board were lost. The Manitoba was charged with having brought about the result, because of starboarding her wheel instead of porting as she ought to have done, as the vessels meeting were end on, or nearly end on. The Manitoba claimed that, having passed St. Mary's canal, she made the bright light of the Comet when about half way between Round Island and Iroquois Point—that the Comet was coming on from the direction of Whitefish Point, and, if not heading on a course almost parallel opposite to that held by the Manitoba, was nearly doing so. The steamer, running at a moderate speed, was going about N. W. ½ N., and as the Comet was approaching she showed her bright and green light, which bore from one-half to three-fourths of a point upon the starboard bow of the Manitoba; that the latter vessel endeavored, if possible, to avoid collision and to that end starboarded half a point and steadied, but the propeller still came on, now exhibiting her green and white lights, and as though she would fairly pass to the starboard of the Manitoba. In fact she seemed to be off a little, but on a sudden she swung to starboard and across the bows of the Manitoba as though she were under a port wheel. The Manitoba at once was put hard a-starboard, the engines were stopped and reversed, but the propeller had approached so near that the collision was inevitable. The Comet, it was averred, had committed a fault in not starboarding instead of porting. The question raised and argued was: Whether these vessels on approaching each other had exhibited to each other a green or red light.

[1] [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed by circuit court; case unreported. Decree of circuit court affirmed by supreme court in 122 U. S. 97, 7 Sup. Ct. 1158.]

H. L. Tyrrell, for libellants.

W. A. Moore and F. H. Canfield, for claimants.

BROWN, District Judge. Before entering upon a discussion of the testimony, there is a legal proposition, to which the attention of the court was challenged at the outset of the argument, and which libellants claim is decisive of the case. Admitting the theory of the Manitoba to be true, that she made first the bright and then the green light of the Comet, three-quarters of a point on her starboard bow, it was insisted that the steamers were still meeting "nearly end on" within the 13th article, and that it was incumbent upon the Manitoba to port, instead of starboarding, as she did. The words "nearly end on" used in the 13th article, are susceptible of two entirely distinct interpretations. On behalf of the Comet, it is urged, that if vessels are approaching so nearly end on, that prudence will suggest a change of the helm to avoid a misapprehension or chance of collision, such change should always be made by porting, notwithstanding the approaching vessel may exhibit a green light upon the starboard bow. Under the other definition, if the two vessels are each exhibiting to the other lights of the same color, there is no risk of collision within the meaning of the article, and each vessel is bound to keep its own side and may pursue its course with unabated speed, or, as formulated in the lines of Mr. Gray: "Green to green or red to red, perfect safety, go ahead."

The earlier decisions, both English and American, no doubt go far to sustain the position of the libellants upon this point. The merchant shipping act, which in England preceded the present law, under which the vessels of all civilized nations are now navigated, provided that: "Whenever any ship, whether a steam or sailing ship, proceeding in one direction, meets any other ship, whether a steam or sailing ship, proceeding in another direction, so that if both ships were to continue their respective courses they would pass so near as to involve any risk of a collision, the helms of both ships shall be put to port, so as to pass on the port side of the other" (14 & 15 Vict. c. 79)—a rule substantially like the 13th article, except that it imposes upon the sailing vessel an obligation to port when meeting a steamer. In construing this rule in the case of The Mangerton, Swab. 120, a ship which was running free was held to be in fault, because seeing a steamer's green or starboard light three or four points on her starboard bow, she held on her course, the master believing that, if the steamer did likewise, the vessel would have gone clear. He ought, it was said, to have expected that the steamer, on seeing his light, would have followed the rule and have ported; and should, therefore, have ported his own helm. See, also, The Admiral Boxer, Id. 193. In The Cleopatra, Id. 135, a steamer was condemned for having starboarded on making the bright and green lights of an approaching vessel three points on her starboard bow, distant about three miles. So, too, in the case of The Stork, Holt, Adm. Cas. 151, decided after the present law had taken effect, Dr. Lushington held, that in order to excuse the Stork from porting, "it must be quite clear there were three points difference and not less, for surely it would never do to contend, where they were so nearly meeting end on, that if the evidence should be it was one or two points only in the direction they were meeting, that that would be sufficient to dispense with the observance of this rule." On appeal to the privy council, the court refused to adopt the language of Dr. Lushington, but observed it was not necessary to lay down any rule if it were competent for them to do so. "It is sufficient to say, that, whether the vessels were in such a relative position as to involve the risk of a collision, must be always a question of fact to be determined upon the circumstances." The court, however, found that the vessels were in such a relative position that their course, if pursued, would have involved risk of a collision, and dismissed the appeal. In the case of The City of Paris, Id. 21, the question was put to the assessors: "When the steamer first saw the steam tug moving toward her, and two points on her starboard bow, taking into consideration these vessels being on opposite courses, was there danger of their meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve a risk of collision?" and they answered, "that the vessels were coming nearly end on, and the duty of each was to have ported." In the case of The Fingal, Id. 160, the court considered that if vessels were within two points of meeting end on, they would fall within the latter part of the statement, "nearly end on." In the case of The Artemas, Id. 75, a difference of two points was held not to exempt the vessels from the regulation of the 11th article. See, also, The Mexican, Id. 130. A similar want of definiteness is apparent in the American authorities. See The Milwaukee [Case No. 9,626]; The Nichols, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 656.

These varying constructions of the act naturally led to a want of uniformity in the practice, ship masters as well as courts disagreeing among themselves as to how great a variance from dead ahead would still meet the requirements of nearly end on. There was a further difficulty involved in the fact that the exhibition of a green light or green and white lights directly ahead, or on the starboard bow is consistent not only with vessels approaching upon a parallel course, but upon a course across that of the other vessel, in which case porting the helm would bring about the very disaster it was designed to avoid; in other words, the light may be dead ahead or nearly dead ahead, and yet the two ships may not be meeting end on. To justify porting under article 13, not only must the ship carrying the light be end on, but the two ships must be meeting each other in that position, and the exhibition of a single colored light directly ahead by no means justifies that inference.

To put an end to this uncertainty, and to define with the utmost practicable exactness the meaning of the words "nearly end on," on the 30th of July, 1868, an order in council was issued to the following effect: "The said two articles, numbered 11 and 13 respectively, only apply to cases where ships are meeting end on or nearly end on, in such a manner as to involve risk of collision. They consequently do not apply to two ships which must, if both keep on their respective courses, pass clear of each other. The only cases in which the said two articles apply are when each of the two ships is end on or nearly end on to the other; in other words, to cases in which, by day, each ship sees the mast of the other in a line or nearly in a line with her own, and, by night, to cases where each ship is in such a condition as to see both of the side lights of the other. The said two articles do not apply by day to cases in which the ship sees another ahead crossing her own course or, by night, to cases where the red light of one ship is opposed to the red light of the other, or where the green light of one ship is opposed to the green light of the other, or where a red light without a green light or a green light without a red light is seen ahead, or where both red and green lights are seen anywhere but ahead." While this order has never been formally accepted by the supreme court as the correct interpretation of the 13th article, it has received the sanction of the district courts for the Southern and Eastern districts of New York, and has not, so far as I can gather, been repudiated anywhere. It was adopted verbatim by Judge Blatchford in the case of The America [Case No. 281], and was approved by Judge Benedict in The Sylvester Hale [Id. 13,712]. By an imperial decree promulgated May 26, 1869, it was incorporated in the law of France (De Fresquet, Des Abordages, p. 107). It appears also to have been adopted by Hamburg, Russia and Sweden, in 1868. While in some cases, where a colored light is made very nearly dead ahead, it may lead vessels to approach each other in a dangerous proximity, it is quite evident that so long as each exhibits to the other a light of the same color, there can be no collision, and any liability to error or confusion can be obviated by porting from a red, or starboarding from a green light. As it is very desirable that the construction given to this law should be as uniform as the law itself is general, particularly upon waters where British and American vessels are constantly meeting each other, I deem it the safer and better plan to adopt the order in council as the law of this court, at least until overruled by a higher authority. I hold, therefore, that under her theory of the facts, the Manitoba was not in fault for starboarding as she did.

What the exact facts of the collision are it is certainly difficult to determine. Not only is the testimony upon either side in direct and irreconcilable conflict with that upon the other, but the witnesses upon one, if not upon both sides, swear to appearances utterly inconsistent with the movements of their own vessels as stated by them. The theory of the Comet that she made the red light of the Manitoba and kept it constantly on her port bow is not only sworn to directly by her master, her second mate, and her wheelsman, but it is claimed to be verified, and in fact demonstrated, by two subordinate circumstances, proved by uncontradicted testimony.

First. That the Comet, in rounding Whitefish Point, hugged as close to land as possible, expecting heavy seas, and, hence, when she straightened up on her course to Point Iroquois, she was further to the westward than the usual course of vessels intending to round that point would take them; while the Manitoba, intending to make Michipicoten, on the northeast shore, would naturally have been further to the eastward than the usual course of vessels rounding the point would take them.

The testimony of the Comet's crew does tend to show that she passed a little nearer to the point than usual, although there was a heavy wind from the southeast blowing on to the point, and it is a little difficult to see why she should wish to hug it so close; but in that regard, it appears to be contracted by that of the master and mate of the Havana, a steamer bound up, which passed the Comet a short distance below Whitefish Point and some seven or eight hundred feet upon her port side. These witnesses swear they passed Whitefish Point themselves at the usual distance of a mile or a mile and a quarter, indicating that the Comet was probably about a mile out from the Point when she passed it. In this connection, they also swear they saw the Manitoba's light astern and upon their port quarter. While it is true the Manitoba was intending to stop at Michipicoten, the direct course to which would lead her a considerable distance off Whitefish Point, yet as her crew unite in swearing that they were steering for the light upon the Point, keeping it a little off their port bow, and intending to pass it at the usual distance, I do not feel at liberty to say that they are not to be believed in this particular.

Second. Shortly after rounding Whitefish Point, the Comet made the lights of the barge Havana, a little to port, and to give her an easy berth she ported half a point and ran from five to fifteen minutes under this port wheel, before resuming her southeast course down the lake. Whatever weight is given to this testimony is counterbalanced by the fact, that the general course of the Comet down to the lake was half a point further to the eastward than it would have been if she had been sailing in a course directly opposite to that of the Manitoba. The course of the Manitoba was northwest half north, while that of the Comet was directly southeast. The tendency of this divergence would be, assuming that the compasses of each were exactly alike, to display the green light of the Comet to the Manitoba. A change of half a point from a course parallel to that of the Manitoba, would, in a distance of six miles, carry the Comet about half a mile to the eastward of the Manitoba's course, assuming that the Manitoba was pursuing the usual course from Point Iroquois to Whitefish Point. While there is nothing showing that the Comet did deviate to that extent, it seems to me to offset any inference, which might be derived from the fact of the Comet porting to pass the Havana, that she was westward of the Manitoba's course.

Third. It is claimed to be a physical impossibility that these vessels should have collided as they did, from the positions in which the evidence of the Manitoba places them, at the time the Comet's wheel was put hard a-port, and the Manitoba's hard a-starboard. At the time the Comet put her wheel hard a-port, and exhibited her red light, the witnesses on board the Manitoba claim that she was from 350 to 400 feet ahead of her, and about the same distance to starboard. The speed of the Manitoba being considerably greater than that of the Comet, it would seem to follow that if the helm of the Manitoba had been put to starboard at the same time that that of the Comet was put to port, the Manitoba would have passed the point of intersection first; and hence, the inference is, that the relative positions were not as stated by the Manitoba, but that the Comet was to the port instead of to the starboard.

Assuming that the helms of both vessels were put hard over at the same moment, and adding to this the fact that the Manitoba was the faster vessel, it would necessarily follow that she would have passed the point of intersection first. But the theory of the Manitoba is not inconsistent with a sudden prior porting on the part of the Comet, and a failure on the part of the Manitoba to swing as rapidly to starboard as the Comet did to port. If the Comet ported her wheel before the Manitoba starboarded (and this is the Manitoba's theory) she would have the advantage of the Manitoba, and might pass the point of intersection first; it would naturally take some little time for the Manitoba to get her wheel hard over, and to deviate from her course. There is another inference, however, to be deduced from this theory of the Manitoba, to which allusion will be made hereafter.

The case made by the Comet is manifestly inconsistent with itself and untrue. If she made the Manitoba's red light on her port bow, and ported half a point and again another half point, and still she could not open out the approaching vessel, it shows conclusively they must have been approaching on converging lines, and the Manitoba must have displayed a green and not a red light. I am more inclined to think, however, that she made the red light of the Manitoba on her starboard bow; that her first porting brought her on a course exactly parallel to that of the Manitoba, and that her green light was displayed at a considerable greater distance than the Comet's testimony would seem to indicate, and that the collision was brought about by a persistent effort to apply the 13th rule, and to pass the Manitoba under a port helm. This is corroborated to a certain extent by the statement of Rafferty, the wheelsman, on cross-examination, that he judged the Manitoba was half a mile off when she showed her green light. I feel compelled to say, too, that considerable doubt is thrown upon the Comet's case by the testimony of Mr. Hathaway, the reporter of the Free Press, who swears that Captain Dugot told him that he had been on deck about half an hour, and leaving the boat in charge of the mate went below, but was not gone more than five minutes before returning. Hathaway being entirely disinterested, I am disposed to credit his testimony, notwithstanding Dugot's denial.

The case of the Manitoba is supported by the testimony of her master, mate, wheelsman, engineer and cabin boy, whose statements are also corroborated by those of four passengers. While in an ordinary collision case, the court will pay very little regard to a mere superiority in the number of the crew sworn, and will seek to determine the question of fault by the uncontradicted testimony, and by the probabilities of the case, I do not feel at liberty to treat so lightly the testimony of disinterested and intelligent passengers, provided they are so located as to be able to observe the bearing and color of approaching lights. The testimony of the Manitoba's passengers has aided me greatly in solving the difficult problem of the relative bearing of these vessels.

George Bisset, a merchant of Kinkarden, who was standing forward on the promenade deck, for twenty minutes before the collision, noticed the Manitoba steering between the white light of the Comet and the light upon Whitefish Point. Captain Symes came back and spoke to him; showed him the green light, and said: "We have to pass on the green side with our green side, and if a red light was shown we have to pass on the red side;" was then standing right at the center of the promenade deck; stood there until four or five minutes before the collision, then going for a moment into the cabin to light a cigar, returned to the deck and stood leaning against the railing on the starboard side, about twenty feet from the stern. The Comet was still displaying a green light; looked over his left shoulder to see her pass, and not seeing her, looked ahead and saw her cross the bows of the Manitoba. George W. Barry, a druggist and insurance agent of Lucknow, was standing on the bow of the boat on the promenade deck, fifteen minutes before the collision; saw the bright light of the Comet on the starboard bow, and Whitefish light on the port bow, but did not notice the colored light. Noticed Bisset and Captain Symes talking together; saw the sudden sheer of the Comet across the bow. John S. Tenant, a physician of Lucknow, was standing on the promenade deck, at the foot of the ladder to the right of the pilot house; saw the white and green lights of the Comet on the starboard bow; the Manitoba seemed to be steering between the Comet and Whitefish Point light; suddenly saw her sheer and show a red light so near that he thought he could throw a stone aboard of her. Angus Bethune, paymaster on the railroad, from Fort William to Red river, had been to Ottawa on government business, and was returning on the Manitoba. Was sitting at the door of the engine room, taking a smoke; got up and walked to the forward right hand gangway of the steamer to look for Whitefish Point light; saw a steamer ahead; called the engineer and remained there, and soon discovered the steamer was coming towards us; said to him, there was a steamer coming, and that she was on the wrong side. The engineer came up and said there was plenty of room to pass on that side. Soon saw the Comet down upon us, her broadside crossing our bow. The engineer looked and ran back to his engine. She would have passed on our right hand side if she kept her course; seemed to be a couple of lengths or more off when she changed her course.

Now conceding, what unfortunately is too often true of sailors, that they place a higher value on fidelity to their vessel than upon fidelity to truth, and esteem their allegiance more sacred than their oath, I cannot assume that mere passengers are actuated by any such motives. These four men have sworn to a state of facts entirely inconsistent with the theory of the Comet, and strongly corroborative of that of the Manitoba. They were in a position to see, and they can hardly have been mistaken. They have sworn to the truth, or they have been guilty of a perjury which has not even the excuse of self-interest to palliate its heinousness.

I do not overlook in this connection the statements said to have been made by the master and engineer of the Manitoba after the collision. They are sworn to by the master and second mate of the Comet, and denied by the parties who are said to have made them. As the witnesses on both sides are equally interested, and the words are very likely to have been misunderstood, I must hold that they are not proven.

Upon careful perusal of this testimony, I am forced to the conclusion that these vessels were mutually displaying their green lights, and that the collision was brought about primarily by the unauthorized porting of the Comet.

It only remains to consider whether the Manitoba be not also in fault for not slackening speed. The testimony is uncontradicted that the engineer did not receive the order to stop and back until just as the vessels came together. That there is no general obligation to slacken speed, notwithstanding two steamers are approaching each other in such a manner that a change of helm is necessary to avoid risk of collision, is undisputed. The Earl of Elgin, L. R. 4 P. C. 8; The Free State, 91 U. S. 200.

It is equally clear that this obligation does arise, whenever there is any uncertainty as to the position or movements of the approaching vessel, or when she appears to be violating the rules of navigation. In the case of The Earl of Elgin, an exception is made of cases of a "continuous approach" by which we are to understand, not merely where the two colored lights continue to be visible, but a single light appears to be closing in in such a manner as to indicate that the courses of the two vessels are converging. So in the case of The Scotia, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 181, the court remarked, "We have already said that she was not bound to take any steps to avoid a collision until danger of collision should have been apprehended, and we think there was no reason for apprehension until the ship light was seen closing in upon her." [Case No. 12,513.] See, also, The Mary Sanford [Id. 9,225].

In the case of Dyer v. National Steam Nav. Co. [Case No. 4,224], the steamer was condemned for not slackening speed under similar circumstances. The court observed, "It was the duty of the steamer, as soon as it was noticed that she was not shaking off the light by porting her helm, to have slackened her speed, and ascertained the direction in which the ship was sailing, and acted accordingly; instead of which she kept up her full speed until the collision was inevitable."

I see no reason to doubt that the Comet continued to show her green light until within a short distance of the Manitoba. Her course diverged a half point to the eastward of the Manitoba, consequently her first porting brought her upon an exactly parallel course, and as she was to the starboard of the Manitoba she would continue to display her green light, and as the Manitoba starboarded and opened out this light, she might port another half point without shutting it in or showing the red; but approaching the Comet so nearly end on as she did, she was bound to watch her lights with the utmost vigilance, and to ease her engines the moment she perceived the Comet was failing in her duty. There could be no collision so long as the Comet continued to exhibit a green light, but there might be such an approach of this light as to show that the Comet had ported, a manoeuvre which, if persisted in, would inevitably throw her across the path of the Manitoba, and bring about a collision. That such continuous approach took place and was observed, is evident from the testimony of the master and mate. Captain Symes says that he made the green light three-fourths of a point on his starboard bow; that he remained on deck five or six minutes, and the green light then bore at least half a point on his starboard bow, showing, at least, that he was not opening it out. The mate, who remained in charge of the Manitoba up to the moment of the collision, says, that when they were one and a half or two miles apart, the green light bore three-fourths of a point on his starboard bow; that he then starboarded half a point, making the green light one and a fourth points off his starboard bow, but that when the Comet began to swing, the lights had closed in, so that it was not more than half a point or a point off. This shows that from the time the Manitoba starboarded, the Comet was steadily drawing in under a port wheel. If the two steamers were approaching upon an exactly parallel course, the light of the Comet would naturally open out, and the starboarding of the Manitoba would increase this tendency, so that if the Comet had kept her course, the angle of the green light with the course of the Manitoba would constantly approximate to a right angle. Instead of that, the light kept steadily closing in. There could be but one inference from this—the Comet had ported. This was manifest some time before she shut in her green light and displayed her red light, and the Manitoba should at least have eased her engines or blown a whistle, as required by the universal custom upon the lakes.

Nor am I satisfied that the order to stop and reverse was given as promptly as it should have been. According to the Manitoba's theory, the Comet was from 350 to 400 feet to the starboard, and about the same distance ahead of her before her change of light was observed. The entire testimony on the part of the Manitoba tends to show that the Comet would have passed from 300 to 400 feet from her if she had kept her course. Admitting that distances are deceptive, and that the Comet might have been much further ahead of the Manitoba than 400 feet, yet it seems to me, if the engines of the Manitoba had been promptly stopped and reversed, a collision might have been avoided. Obviously, this was the first and instant duty of the Manitoba, upon discovering the change of lights. A change of wheel was a matter of secondary consideration, but the obligation to stop and reverse was imperative. In this respect the case is much like that of The Comet [Case No. 3,051], where the injured vessel in this case was libelled for sinking the steamer Silver Spray in Lake Huron. The observations of Judge Woodruff in that case are pertinent here. He condemned the Silver Spray, not only for starboarding, but for failure to slacken speed after the red light was disclosed upon her starboard bow. While I make no criticism upon the action of the Manitoba here in putting her helm hard a-starboard, although I think this was an error, I am of the opinion that she should have stopped and reversed. If she had ported or slowed and backed, and perhaps if she had done nothing, the collision would not have taken place. After a collision has become imminent, almost any error on the part of the steamer will be pardonable except that of not stopping and reversing; and for this error, which is rendered more probable by the fact that the engineer left his post and ran to the starboard gangway, after the Comet put her helm hard a-port, I think the Manitoba must be condemned. The Great Republic, 23 Wall. [90 U. S.] 20. I think, too, the conduct of the master in leaving the deck after the Comet's light had been visible for some time, and not returning till the collision had become inevitable, is open to criticism. Such changes in command are likely to lead to confusion, and are looked upon with great disfavor by the courts. Hazlett v. Conrad [Case No. 6,288].

A decree will be entered apportioning the damages and referring it to a commissioner to ascertain and compute the same.

[NOTE. On March 15, 1882, the commissioner's report as to the amount of damages was confirmed by the district court. The owners of the Manitoba then appealed to the circuit court from so much of the final decree of the district court as adjudged the Manitoba to be in fault. The circuit court heard the case on pleadings and proofs, and affirmed the decree of the court below (case unreported).

[The claimants of the Manitoba then took the case, on appeal, to the supreme court. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion, affirming the decree of the circuit court. 122 U. S 97, 7 Sup. Ct. 1158.]

MANITOWOC COUNTY (GOEDGEN v.). See Case No. 5,501.

MANITOWOC DOCK CO. v. The CHRISTOPHER NORTH. See Case No. 2,707.

Case No. 9,030.

MANKIN v. CHANDLER et al.

[2 Brock. 125.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. Nov. Term, 1823.

JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA—ESTOPPEL—ATTACHMENT—NONRESIDENT DEBTOR.

Where process is to be served on the thing itself which is the subject of controversy, and where the mere possession of the thing itself by the service of that process, and making proclamation, authorizes the court to decide upon it without notice to any individual whatever, it is a proceeding in rem, to which all the world are parties, and in every such case, the decree is conclusive evidence against all parties interested, though not brought before the court by process. But a foreign attachment (under the law of Virginia, see Rev. Code 1819, c. 123, p. 474), is not a proceeding in rem. It is a suit by a plaintiff against defendants, and a decree in such a case is conclusive evidence only against parties and privies. Thus, C. being indebted to W., gave his note for the amount, and W. assigned the note to M., and W. afterwards left the country. R., a creditor of W., attached the effects of W. in the hands of C. C. had notice of the assignment of his note to M. A decree was rendered in favour of R. M. subsequently brought suit upon the note against C., but the decree was satisfied before service of the process in the second suit. C. pleaded the decree in favour of R., in bar of M.'s right of action, and to this plea, M. demurred. The court sustained the demurrer, on the ground, that a decree rendered in a suit between two parties, is not admissible evidence in a suit between one of those parties and a third party. But the court held, that if M. had been a party to the first suit, the decree would have operated a bar, and the demurrer would have been overruled.

[1] [Reported by John W. Brockenbrough, Esq.]

[Cited in Cole v. Brandt, Case No. 2,978; Smith v. Miln, Id. 13,081; Miller v. U. S., 11 Wall. (78 U. S.) 328; Alabama & C. R. Co. v. Jones, Case No. 127; Michaels v. Post, 21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 428.]

[Cited in Smith v. Blatchford, 2 Ind. 186, 52 Am. Dec. 506; Bruff v. Thompson (W. Va.) 6 S. E. 359; Street v. Augusta Ins. & B. Co., 12 Rich. Law, 13; 75 Am. Dec. 715. Cited in brief in Burtners v. Keran, 24 Grat. 51. Cited in Holly River Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 503, 15 S. E. 218; Brown v. Smart, 69 Md. 333, 14 Atl. 472, and 17 Atl. 1101; Rigney v. Rigney, 127 N. Y. 412, 28 N. E. 406.]

At law.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. This is an action of debt, brought by the plaintiff, as assignee of —— Walsh, on a note given by the defendants to Walsh on the 10th of October, 1818. The defendants plead in bar, a decree made by the county court of Westmoreland, sitting in chancery, in a suit brought by Thomas Rowand, a creditor of the said Walsh, against the said Walsh and the defendant John Chandler, to attach the effects of the said Walsh in the hands of the said Chandler, and subject them to the payment of the debt due from Walsh to Rowand. The record of the proceedings in that suit, forms a part of the plea, and shows that the note was assigned anterior to the answer of the defendant, and that he had notice of the assignment. The decree directs the defendant, John Chandler, to pay to Thomas Rowand, out of the note given by John Chandler & Co. to Walsh, the sum which was shown to be due from Walsh to Rowand; and the decree was enforced before the service of process in this cause.

To this plea the plaintiff has demurred, and the defendants have joined in demurrer.

It is admitted that the decree of the county court of Westmoreland is erroneous, and would, unquestionably, be reversed if carried before a superior tribunal. But this court can take no notice of its errors. While it remains in force, it binds the subject as conclusively as it would do, had it been affirmed in the highest court in the country. The question is, can it affect the rights of the plaintiff in this cause? for if it can, it concludes them.

In support of the demurrer, it is argued, that this decree cannot be given in evidence in this cause, as the plaintiff is neither a party nor a privy, it not being alleged that the assignment, or notice of it, was subsequent to the attachment.

The rule relied on by the plaintiff is familiar to every gentleman of the profession, and has not been controverted; but the defendant's counsel insists that this is a case to which that rule does not apply, because it is not within the ordinary jurisdiction of a court of chancery, but a case of which that court takes cognizance, by virtue of a statute, and is, in its nature, a proceeding in rem, and not in personam. It is, he says, a sentence on the thing itself, and not a decree against the person, and that in all cases of this description, the subject matter is bound by the sentence, and the title of those who are not particularly before the court, is as entirely decided, as the title of those who are. In support of this rule, he referred to the effect of decisions in the courts of admiralty, and in the court of exchequer, in England, which courts entertain suits in rem, to which all the world are said to be parties.

The principle on which the defendant relies, is as little to be questioned as that asserted by the plaintiff. The whole inquiry is, to which class of cases does that under consideration belong? What is the nature of a proceeding in rem? And in what does its specific difference from an ordinary action consist? Is every action in which a specific article is demanded a proceeding in rem? If it were, a writ of right which demands lands, of detinue which demands a personal chattel, would be a proceeding in rem, to which all the world would be parties, and by which the rights of all the world would be bound. But this, all know, is not the law. What, then, is the rule by which cases of this description are to be ascertained?

I have always understood that where the process is to be served on the thing itself, and where the mere possession of the thing itself, by the service of the process and making proclamation, authorizes the court to decide upon it without notice to any individual whatever, it is a proceeding in rem, to which all the world are parties. The rule is one of convenience and of necessity. In cases to which it applies, it would often be impossible to ascertain the person whose property is proceeded against, and it is presumable that the person whose property is seized, is either himself attentive to it, or has placed it in the care of some person who has the power, and whose duty it is, to represent him and assert his claim. Such claim may be asserted; but the jurisdiction of the court does not depend on its assertion. The claimant is a party, whether he speaks or is silent; whether he asserts his claim or abandons it.

Thus, in the case of Scott v. Shearman, 2 W. Bl. 977, which was an action of trespass against the officer who had seized goods which were condemned in the court of exchequer, Judge Blackstone says, "the sentence of condemnation is conclusive evidence in a case in which no notice was given to the owner in person, who was not a party to the suit, because the seizure itself is notice to the owner, who is presumed to know whatever becomes of his own goods. He knew they were seized by a revenue officer. He knew they were carried to the king's warehouse. He knew, or might have known, that by the course of law, the validity of that seizure would come on to be examined in the court of exchequer, and could be examined nowhere else. He had notice by the two proclamations, according to the course of that court. He had notice by the writ of appraisement, which must be publicly executed on the spot where the goods were detained. And having neglected this opportunity of putting in his claim and trying the point of forfeiture, it was his own laches, and he shall for ever be concluded by it." But in every case where parties are necessary to give the court cognizance of the cause, the decree, the judgment, or the sentence, binds those only (with some few exceptions standing on particular principles), who are parties or privies to it. If a party is necessary, it follows that the party should be one who has the real interest; and to secure this, the interest of persons who are not parties cannot be affected. This is understood to be as true with respect to cases in the courts of admiralty and of the exchequer, as in courts of common law and chancery. If a case be cognizable in either of those courts, in consequence of the seizure which vests the possession, and of a general proclamation of that fact, every person is a party to the proceeding, and his interest is bound by the sentence; but in a case in which the law requires that parties should be brought before the court, the sentence binds those only who are parties.

If this be the rule, it remains only to examine the act of assembly which gives this remedy, in order to ascertain its character. The law enacts,[2] that "if in any case which hath been or shall hereafter be commenced, for relief in equity in any superior court of chancery, or in any other court, against any defendant or defendants, who are out of this country and others within the same, having in their hands effects of, or otherwise indebted to, such absent defendant or defendants, or against any such absent defendant or defendants, having lands or tenements within the commonwealth, and the appearance of such absentees be not entered, &c.," "in all such cases the court may make any order, &c." The act then proceeds to make publication equivalent to service of the process, so far as is necessary to enable the court to decree in the cause.

The process, then, given by the act of assembly in the particular case, is not against the thing, but the person. It is in a suit brought against a defendant not residing in the country, and having effects within it, that this proceeding is allowed; and of course, the foreign defendant must be named in the subpoena and in the bill. The questions to be decided by the court in every such case are—is the foreign defendant indebted to the plaintiff, and are the attached effects his property? The plaintiff must establish both of these facts, and the defendants may controvert them. It is, then, a case which, by the very words of the law, is a suit between parties by which the rights of the individuals before the court are to be examined and determined. The law substitutes publication for service of process on the absent defendant, which shall give the court jurisdiction over the cause, and enable it to make a decree for the payment of the debt, which is chargeable on his effects in the hands of the garnishee. No reason can be assigned why this decree should bind a person who is not a party nor privy to it, which does not apply to every case. No reason can be given for the rule which does not apply to this case.

It is, we are told, excessive oppression that a court of justice should decree a man to pay a sum of money, and after enforcing its decree, compel him to pay the money a second time to another person. This is admitted; but it is also oppression to decree the money of A. to B.; every illegal and unrighteous judgment of a court is oppression. The law presumes no such judgment to be given; but if it be given, the law deems it more reasonable that the loss should fall on a person who was a party to the suit, who could assert his rights and controvert the decision, than on him who was not a party to it, and who had no opportunity of controverting it. Had Mankin been a party to the suit in Westmoreland county court, the decree would have bound him, had it been as iniquitous as it now appears to be; but not being a party, the rule of law protects him from its operation.

It has been truly said, that our law respecting foreign attachments, is founded on the same proceeding in London, which is established by custom. Some inconsiderable difference exists as to the manner of proceeding against the absent defendants, which has no bearing on the question arising in this case; as to that question, the law is the same. The case of M'Daniel v. Hughes, 3 East, 367, goes fully into the law on this subject; in that case, as in this, a decree of the court was pleaded in bar to an action brought by the foreign defendant himself against his debtor, and in that case, too, a demurrer was filed to the plea. It was contended in argument, "that three parties are necessary in a foreign attachment—the plaintiff, the defendant, and a garnishee. The plaintiff must prove his debt, the defendant must have due notice of the process against him, and the garnishee must be in actual possession of the defendant's property which is to be attached." The law, as laid down for the plaintiff, was not controverted; but it was insisted that, according to the custom, the return of nihil authorized the attachment; and of this opinion was the court, and for this reason the demurrer was overruled. The person who claimed the property was in that case a party to the suit, and such proceedings were had against him as, according to the custom, authorized the court to pronounce judgment in the case. He was precisely in the same situation as the plaintiff in this case would have been, had he been named as a defendant in the subpoena, and been included in the publication. Had this essential circumstance been wanting in the case of M'Daniel v. Hughes, it is apparent from the whole report, that the demurrer must have been sustained.

[2] See Rev. Code Va. 1819, c. 123, p. 474.

Upon the best examination I have been able to make of the cases which have been cited, as well as upon principle, I am perfectly satisfied. that a foreign attachment is not to be considered as a proceeding in rem, but as a suit by the plaintiff against defendants, and that a decree in such cases is within the general rule of being conclusive evidence only against parties and privies. The demurrer, therefore, is sustained.

NOTE. In Kelso v. Blackburn, 3 Leigh, 306, Carr, J., said, that "the proceeding by foreign attachment, against absentees, was an innovation upon the common law; a proceeding in rem founded on the necessity of the case, lest there should be an absolute failure of justice, and like all ex parte proceedings, it was liable to great abuse, unless carefully watched and strictly confined to the ground covered by the law. It was not under their general jurisdiction that courts of equity took cognizance of those cases, but under particular statutes; and these, it would be found, had, with special care, marked out the extent and described the manner of the proceeding." It is very apparent, from an examination of the case of Kelso v. Blackburn, that Judge Carr did not intend to say, that the proceeding by foreign attachment, in Virginia, was, in the strictest sense of the term, and to all intents, a proceeding in rem, but simply that it was in the nature of a proceeding in rem. The question in that case was, whether the essential circumstance of the non-residence of the debtor was set forth with sufficient distinctness in the complainant's bill, the foundation of the jurisdiction of the court being the non-residence of the debtor, and his having effects in Virginia. If, because cognizance of the proceeding in foreign attachment was not taken by courts of equity, by virtue of their "general jurisdiction," but under "particular statutes," and because it was "liable to great abuse," the proceeding should be "carefully watched and strictly confined to the ground covered by the law," it is clear that the judge did not intend to lay down the general proposition in a sense which would abolish the familiar rule of evidence, that judgments or decrees are only evidence against parties and privies, in a sense which would give a decree in a proceeding by foreign attachment, a more extended operation against third persons than an ordinary decree of a court of equity. It is most obvious, that the learned judge, in speaking of the liability to abuse, in the proceedings by foreign attachment under an act of assembly, "like all other ex parte proceedings," had reference to the absent defendant himself (and to none other), against whom, from the very necessity of the case, the law was compelled to substitute the formal and constructive notice by publication, for the actual service of process required in the case of home defendants.

Case No. 9,031.

In re MANLY.

[2 Bond, 261;[1] 3 N. B. R. 291 (Quarto, 75); 2 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 89.]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. April Term, 1869.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE—STOCK IN TRADE—POSSESSION BY MORTGAGOR—IDENTIFICATION—BANKRUPTCY—RIGHTS OF MORTGAGEE.

1. Where a chattel mortgage was given, to secure the payment of a promissory note, payable one day after date, and the mortgaged property, being books, stationery, etc., remains in possession of the mortgagor, who carries on his business, as a retail bookseller, as before the mortgage, selling the stock mortgaged, and replacing it by the purchase of other stock, until there can be no identification of the articles specified in the mortgage, and the mortgagee assents, for years, to this course, such mortgagee, when proceedings in bankruptcy are commenced against the mortgagor, has no right, under the mortgage, to the possession of the stock in his possession at the time of the bankruptcy.

[Cited in Catlin v. Currier, Case No. 2,518; Robinson v. Elliott, 22 Wall. (89 U. S.) 526; Johnson v. Patterson, Case No. 7,403.]

2. Under the facts stated, the mortgagee has no lien on the stock, and can only share, pro rata, with other creditors, in the proceeds of the sale of the stock.

In bankruptcy.

H. C. Whitman, for petitioner.

O. H. Temple and Woodruff, Tilden & Maxwell, for creditors.

LEAVITT, District Judge. The question before the court is on a motion, by the counsel of Ellen M. Manly, for an order to the marshal to deliver to her a lot of books, stationery, etc., seized by the marshal as the property of the said Thomas M. Manly, against whom there has been an adjudication of bankruptcy, on the petition of Stanage, Saunders & Co., creditors of the said Thomas M. Manly. The property in dispute is claimed by Ellen M. Manly, the sister of the bankrupt, under a chattel mortgage given to secure a debt due her from her brother. The question to be decided on this motion is, whether this mortgage vested a title to the property in Ellen M. Manly, or whether it was the property of the bankrupt, subject to the claim of his creditor and passed to the assignee of said Thomas M. Manly.

[1] [Reported by Lewis H. Bond, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The facts necessary to notice are briefly these: The said Thomas M. Manly, under the name of Thomas M. Manly & Co., had been in business for some years, in Cincinnati, as a retail bookseller and stationer, prior to the institution of the proceedings in bankruptcy. His sister, the said Ellen M. Manly, had, from time to time, advanced money to assist her brother in his business, until October 16, 1868, when these advances amounted to $1,500, and on that day Thomas M. Manly gave his note to his sister for that sum, payable one day after date, and at the same time executed the chattel mortgage to secure the payment of the note, including all his stock in trade and the furniture and fixtures pertaining to his place of business. The mortgage was duly filed in the office of the recorder of Hamilton county, pursuant to the statute of Ohio. On February 12, 1869, the firm of Stanage, Saunders & Co. filed their petition in bankruptcy against Thomas M. Manly, praying, for the cause assigned, that a decree of bankruptcy might be entered; and such proceedings were had that a decree in bankruptcy was entered in this court, on the 19th day of February, in the year aforesaid. A warrant issued to the marshal, requiring him to take possession of the property of the bankrupt pursuant to the requirement of the statute. A restraining order, prohibiting Manly and all others from interfering with or disposing of the property, had been issued on the 15th of February, and was duly served and returned. After the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, but before the service of the restraining order, and before the decree in bankruptcy—that is to say, between the 15th and 19th days of February—Ellen Manly proceeded to the store of Thomas M. Manly and demanded payment of the note for $1,500, which was refused. She then demanded possession of the goods or merchandise included in her mortgage, and goods and merchandise valued at $1,100 were delivered to her and she caused them to be removed from the store, and they were taken to, and deposited at, another place in the city. Subsequently, upon the application of the petitioning creditors, the marshal was ordered to take possession of the property thus removed, and now holds it in custody. As before stated, the object of the pending motion is, that this property may be restored to Ellen M. Manly, as the owner, under the mortgage executed on October 16, 1868.

This motion has been argued at great length by counsel, and is now submitted for the decision of the court. The only question is, whether Ellen M. Manly has the legal title to the property in controversy, under the chattel mortgage which has been referred to. No question arises as to the validity or invalidity of the sale or transfer of the property, under section 35 or any other provision of the bankrupt statute [of 1867 (14 Stat. 534)]. From the facts before the court, presented by the affidavits and other proofs, it does not appear that Thomas M. Manly was insolvent on October 16, 1868, when he executed the mortgage to his sister, or that she had reasonable cause to believe her brother was then in a state of insolvency or contemplated bankruptcy. The question, therefore, as to the validity of the chattel mortgage, and the title or claim of Ellen M. Manly to the property included in it, must depend on the general principles of law applicable to such mortgages and to the facts in connection with it. I regret that the pressure of other duties will not allow me to attempt, at length, to investigate this question and refer to and analyze the various authorities cited by counsel. I am relieved, in some measure, from the necessity of doing so by the consideration that the decision of the question, in this summary way upon the pending motion, will not be conclusive upon the parties or bar them from pursuing other proceedings to test the legal title to the property in controversy. I will state, therefore, very briefly, the conclusions which I have reached in the consideration of the question. And I may remark, in the first place, that from the facts before the court, there is no reason to doubt that at the date of the execution of the mortgage Thomas M. Manly was justly indebted to his sister, the mortgagee, in the sum named in the mortgage, and for which the note was given. The transaction may have been in good faith, as between the brother and the sister, but that consideration will not give validity to the mortgage if the after-conduct of the parties was such as that, upon principles of public policy and settled law, the rights of other creditors must be deemed paramount to the claim asserted under the mortgage.

There is no controversy as to the legal principle that any sale or conveyance of chattel property, with a provision expressed or clearly implied, that the vendee or mortgagee, as the case may be, is to continue in possession, with the right to sell or exercise other acts of ownership over it, is, prima facie, fraudulent and void, as against the creditors of the vendor or mortgagor. The doctrine in England and in this country was, until a comparatively late period, that such a sale or transfer was per se fraudulent and void. But it has been modified by the decision of the courts, so that now it is presumptive only of fraud, and such presumption may be rebutted and overcome by explanatory proof that there was neither actual nor constructive fraud in the transaction. But I am not aware that it ever has been held that where the sale or transfer has been made, without any change of possession or apparent change of ownership, and the vendor or mortgagor has held himself out to the world as the owner, and obtains credit as such owner, that any state of facts can be made out of sufficient force to repel the inference of fraud. And it seems to the court that a stronger case, warranting the legal presumption of fraud, could not be more clearly made out than in the case of the mortgage in question. Manly was a retail dealer in books and stationery. On October 16, 1868, he executed the mortgage to his sister. It covered his entire stock in trade, including the furniture of his store. It was given to secure the payment of a note due one day after date. He was permitted to hold the possession of the mortgaged property and carry on business precisely as before the mortgage was given; and it is proved that he not only sold articles mortgaged, but that he made purchases of additional stock. This was done, with the knowledge and consent of Miss Manly, from October until the following month of February. And it was not till after the petition in bankruptcy was filed against her brother that she made any claim to the possession of the property. When claimed, without any inventory being made, and without any effort to identify the specific articles covered by the mortgage, the books were, in a very loose and hurried manner, taken from the store of her brother and transferred to another place in the city. It is true, in reference to the mortgage, that it contained no express provision that the mortgagor should continue in possession, with the right to dispose of the mortgaged property. But the understanding and intent of the parties are to be inferred from their acts. It is in evidence that the mortgagor was permitted to retain possession. It is so set forth in the affidavit of Miss Manly; and, by the clearest implication, there was a power in the mortgagor to sell or dispose of the property. The mortgagor so understood it, and continued to make sales until the store was closed in February, 1869. As a necessary result, it was impossible that the identical property mortgaged could be restored to the mortgagee. As there was no provision in the mortgage that articles sold might be replaced by others of the same description, the identification of the mortgaged articles was an impossibility. It could not operate, therefore, as a lien on the specific property mortgaged; and, in the language of the supreme court of Ohio, in the case of Collins v. Myers, 16 Ohio, 547, could have no other effect than to "ward off creditors."

I have looked into the cases, especially the Ohio cases, which have been cited by the counsel on both sides. As I understand these cases, there is not one that sustains the principle that a chattel mortgage, with the right in the mortgagor to retain possession of the mortgaged property, and to sell or dispose of the same, is not fraudulent as to creditors. It is strenuously insisted, that under the law of Ohio requiring chattel mortgages to be filed in the office of the county recorder, when so filed there is notice to the world of the lien created on the mortgaged property, and every one deals with the mortgagor at his peril. I do not propose to make any comment upon this statute or analyze its provisions. It is most obvious that the construction insisted on by the counsel would most seriously embarrass commercial operations. If a dealer, knowing that another is carrying on his business in his own name, with every outward indication that he is the owner of the property of which he is in possession, and apparently prospering in business, is obliged to search the files of the recorder's office to ascertain if there is a mortgage on the property thus held out to the world as his own, it would be a serious drawback to all trading operations. In regard especially to dealers in distant cities or places, of whom credit was asked by an Ohio merchant, it would be exceedingly embarrassing if, before he could respond to the request for credit, he were obliged to search the files of chattel mortgages to ascertain whether he could safely give credit to the party requiring it. I can not suppose such was the intention of the law, and do not feel called on to give it a construction leading to such results. In deciding that Miss Manly has no title to the property in question, under her chattel mortgage, paramount to that of other creditors of Thomas M. Manly, I think I am fully sustained by the following authorities: Collins v. Myers, 16 Ohio, 547; Freeman v. Rawson, 5 Ohio St. 1; Harman v. Abbey, 7 Ohio St. 219.

The counsel for Miss Manly has eloquently referred to the great hardship which she will suffer if her claim to the property in question is set aside. The answer is, if she is a sufferer it is her own fault. She had a perfect right, under her mortgage, to take full possession of the mortgaged property when her brother's note, payable one day after date, became due. The note not being paid then, the forfeiture under the mortgage could have been enforced, and her debt secured. If, from a desire to aid him, or a misplaced confidence in the pecuniary ability of her brother, she permitted him to retain possession of the property, and carry on business as before, whereby honest dealers were induced to give him credit, she has no just grounds for complaint. She stands upon the same ground as other creditors of Manly, and must be content to share a pro rata dividend with them of the proceeds of his property.

Motion is therefore denied.

Case No. 9,032.

Ex parte MANN.

[3 App. Com'r Pat. 367.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. 1860.

PATENTS—HOOP-SKIRTS—PROCESS—MACHINE—USED FOR OTHER PURPOSES.

[A new and useful process for the making of hoop-skirts is patentable, although effected by the use of a "former" previously known and used for other purposes.]

Appeal from the commissioner of patents.

[Application by Robert J. Mann for letters patent for an improved method of making hoop-skirts. A patent was refused by the commissioner. Applicant appeals.]

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. He states his claim thus: "What I claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent is the method of forming hoop-skirts by applying the hoops and tapes, or their equivalents, to each other, while they are supported in the relative positions which they are to occupy in the finished skirt, substantially as set forth in my specification." He says: "The object of my invention is to avoid the marking (which had been before necessary, as particularly stated) and at the same time to afford a convenient means for supporting the hoops at the time the connection between the hoops and tapes is being effected, and it consists in applying the tapes to the hoops, while the number of each series is supported in the relative positions which they are to occupy with respect to the other members of both series in the finished skirt." He then describes the form particularly, and afterwards further says: "By the method of forming skirts above described, the labor of marking the tapes and hoops is dispensed with, and the frame supports the hoops and tapes in convenient position for the connection of the two. By it moreover a symmetrical form in the skirt, and the uniformity of the size and shape of a multitude of skirts made by different operatives, is ensured. It is of course necessary to provide a former for each shape of skirt, but the same former will answer for skirts of the same shape with different numbers of hoops."

The decision of the commissioner is dated the 31st of December, 1859, and adopts the report of a majority of the board of directors dated the 28th of December, 1859, the substance of which is, after reciting the examiner's opinion, that, "as formers for a great variety of purposes have long been in common use, it is not patentable to adapt a former to the especial purpose of making hooped skirts and to exemplify," etc. The commissioner says: "In other words, the examiner assumes, as we understand him, that there is no invention, in the sense in which the patent laws use the word, in such an adaptation, although it might result in very greatly cheapening the manufacture of the article, the result alone being insufficient, under our statute, to authorize the grant of a patent in the absence of any novelty in the means to produce it."

Against this reasoning the counsel for applicant urges, etc, and cites adjudications for his position. The commissioner, in his notice of these authorities, says: "These English adjudications, to the extent, probably, of deciding that the result alone, where the effects produced are shown to be more economical, useful, and beneficial to the public, in the manufacture of a better article, are of themselves conclusive tests of the invention and novelty. On the other hand, the preponderance of American authorities is to the effect that the result alone will not be sufficient for that purpose, but that it must also appear that the result was produced by some new process, device, mode, or by some new machinery, and that a patent can in no case be granted for an effect only. But," says the commissioner, "we need not go into an extended or detailed examination of the authorities, either English or American, which counsel has cited, with a view of determining whether his legal proposition be correctly taken or not, because, if, upon enquiry, in point of fact, applicant claims the 'former,' his application is concluded by a prior report of ours in a case presenting substantially the same invention he presents."

Is the "former" the thing claimed? The proposition that it is not amounts, when subjected to analysis, to the assertion that, because all formers are embraced by the claim, when used under certain conditions of formation, therefore no former is claimed. The idea involves a metaphysical distinction quite too refined and subtle, as we think, to bear the test of a rigid examination. To our minds, insomuch as the method which is claimed necessarily involves the use of a former to carry it into execution, the claim practically goes to the former itself, whenever it assumes the specific conditions of formation or construction presented, and is made susceptible of use in the manufacture of skeleton skirts. Any other interpretation involves the glaring absurdity of an interdiction of the use by the public of something which is not claimed. In the event of a patent going out, we shall therefore give this interpretation to it, and regard it as really being a claim to the use of formers for the specified purpose of making hoop-skirts. And inasmuch as the case, to which we have alluded as having been acted upon heretofore by us, presented, we may say, the identical invention, and the claim in that case being substantially the same also as that presented by applicant, construed as we construe it, to this report is appended the decision and reasons of the board in the case of Datus E. Rugg, which the board thinks shows the claim in this case to be inadmissible.

This decision is dated October 13, 1859, rejecting the claim for want of patentability. The description given of the claim by the board has some resemblance to that of the appellants as to the former, and the references appear to be of the same character with those in the present report. But there are depositions filed in this case and laid before the commissioner to show that the claim of appellants was for an invention of a prior date. A learned dissenting opinion, written by one of the board of appeal, with references to a number of pertinent decisions, is also appended.

The appellant filed three reasons of appeal: 1st. Because the applicant's invention is an improvement on an art, viz.: a new method of making ladies' hoop-skirts, and the commissioner in said decision has not distinguished between an improvement in an art and an improvement in a machine used in practicing an art. 2nd. Because it has not been shown by the commissioner that the same invention or discovery had been invented or discovered by any other person in this country prior to the alleged discovery thereof by the applicant, or that it had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, or had been in public use or on sale with the applicant's consent or allowance two years prior to the application for a patent. 3rd. Because the statute of 1836 [5 Stat. 117] authorizes the grant of a patent for any new and useful improvement in any art, and it is not denied that the invention of the applicant is a new and useful improvement in the art of making ladies' hoop-skirts, as distinguished from other useful arts.

In this state of the case all the original papers, documents, and references, with the opinion and report of the commissioner and reasons of appeal, were laid before me, according to previous notice, duly given, of the time and place of hearing this appeal, when the appellant appeared by his counsel and filed a written argument and submitted the case. Before entering upon the investigation of the merits of the questions presented it will be necessary to ascertain what really is the invention claimed. The substance of it, as contended for by the appellant, is: "A new and useful improvement in the art of making ladies' hoop-skirts." The commissioner says it is practically for "the former," and that it is identical with the claim of Datus E. Rugg, which is for a patent for a block or frame on which to construct skeleton skirts, decided on by the office October 13, 1859. In other words, as above stated, that the present is a claim for an improvement of "the former," in as much as the method as claimed necessarily involves the use of a former to carry it into execution. The appellant denies claiming an invention for a former.

To understand, then, what the claim precisely is, and its object and purpose, the specification must be resorted to, the whole of which may be taken together. In the petition part, appellant states: "That he has invented a new and useful method of manufacturing ladies' hoop-skirts which he verily believes has not been known or used prior to the invention thereof by him. He therefore prays that letters patent may be granted to him therefor, vesting in him and his legal representatives the exclusive right to the same," etc. It is true that in the summary, as before recited, and in the part to which he refers, the new method or process consists in producing the skirt by a series of operations effected by the aid of a frame called a former, having a special adaptation to the purpose in view; but he claims it and its equivalents merely as incidental to the attainment of the object and purpose of his invention,—that of saving much labor and expense, and the result a much cheaper article to the public than that produced before by the old method.

To the aforegoing effect is the rule laid down in Burt. Pat. § 229, that, "whenever the real subject covered by the patent is the application of a principle in arts or manufactures, * * * the question on infringement will be as to the substantial identity of the principle, and of the application of the principle; and consequently the means, machinery, forms, or modifications of matter made use of will be material only so far as they affect the identity of the application." The case shows that all the prerequisites of the statute have been complied with, and it is in proof that by the new method pursued in this case, the separate measuring of the hoops and tapes necessary in practicing the old method is dispensed with, and a great saving of hard labor is the useful result of the applicant's method, the hand labor in the two methods being in the proportion of 36 to 3 on plain skirts and 36 to 2 on trail skirts. On comparison, it appears that the two are substantially different in the mechanical operations involved in each, and in the means used for performing those mechanical operations. The statement of Mr. Examiner Toll, who was the examiner in the first instance in this case, proves that the appellant was the first who devised this method of proceeding, or practical application of the principle, as described by the appellant. He also says, "that it is not known that a frame such as is described in the appellant's specification, and called a 'former,' fitted with proper appliances for determining the relative positions of the hoops and tapes of a skirt was made before the date of the invention of the appellant for any purpose whatever," and it is conceded that a skirt was never made so before. Thus it seems to me to be a strong case upon the facts as presented. How is it as to the application of the law upon the subject?

The report of a majority of the board states that the examiner refused to allow this claim on the ground that, inasmuch as formers for a great variety of purposes have long been in common use, it is not patentable to adapt a former to the especial purpose of making hoop-skirts, etc. This certainly was laying down the principle of patent laws much broader than has been done by any decision I have ever seen, and for that reason, perhaps, the board, in the following part of the report, modifies it thus: "In other words, the examiner assumes, as we understand him, that there is no invention, in the sense in which the patent laws use the word, in such an adaptation, although it results in very greatly cheapening the manufacture of the article; the result alone not being sufficient, under our statute, to authorize the grant of a patent, in the absence of any novelty in the means to produce it." But even with this modification if intended to be applied to this case, I cannot agree. The learned research and judicious application of the true principles of the law on this subject by the dissenting member of the board are so full and clear, to show the incorrect view of the majority, that scarcely anything is left for me to say.

With a view, however, to show that the American decisions are in strict accordance with the English, I will state a little more fully the case of Boulton v. Bull, 2 H. Bl. 463–500. Among other things it is stated by Tindal, C. J., on delivering the judgment of the court, after stating the facts, thus: "We are of the opinion that, if the result produced by such a combination is either a new article, or a cheaper article to the public, than that produced before by the old method, such combination or manufacture was intended by the statute, and may well become the subject of a patent." He then cites the opinion of Abbat, C. J., that a patent may be had for a new process, to be carried on by known implements or elements, acting upon known substances, ultimately producing some other known substances, or producing it in a cheaper or more expeditious manner, or more useful kind. And the decision of Lord Eldon that there may be a valid patent for a useful combination of materials previously in use for the same purpose, or even for a useful method of applying such materials and continues: "There are numerous instances of patents which have been granted where the invention consisted of no more than in the use of things already known, and acting with them in a manner already known, and producing effects already known, but producing those effects so as to be more economical or beneficially enjoyed by the public."

American authorities: Kneass v. Schuylkill Bank [Case No. 7,875], Judge Washington: "Is this a discovery of an art, machine, &c., or of an improvement in any art, machine, &c.? If it be either, it is the subject of a patent by the express words of the act of congress." Gray v. James [Id. 5,718], by the same judge: "The patent is supposed to be for the machine, which is composed of parts that long have been public property. This is not the fact. The patent is for an improvement in the art of making nails by means of a machine which cuts and heads nails at one operation. It is therefore not the grant of an abstract principle, nor is it the grant of the different parts of any machine, but of an improvement applied to a practical use effected by a combination of various mechanical powers to produce a new result." So in the case Kneass v. Schuylkill Bank [supra]: The art of printing with both letter-press and copper-plate was not the invention of the plaintiff. He made use of old materials and processes in a new manner for the purpose of producing a new effect, namely a new security against counterfeiting. His patent, therefore, was for the new application of the process of printing by copper plate and letter press, by printing on both sides of the note, &c., held to be an art within the terms of the statute.

And such, so far as I can ascertain, have been the rulings in all the federal courts in which the subject has been brought before the court. I shall only particularly mention one other case, Le Roy v. Tatham decided in Judge Nelson's circuit court and brought up by appeal, and to be found in [Le Roy v. Tatham] 14 How. [55 U. S.] 156. The court charged the jury that "the result is a new manufacture, and even if the mere combination of machinery, in the abstract, is not new, still, if used and applied in the connection of a practical development of a principle newly discovered, producing a new and useful result, the subject is patentable." In his further charge to the jury, he says that "it was not material whether the mere combinations of machinery referred to were similar to the combination used by the Hansons, because the originality was not considered in the novelty of the machinery, but in bringing a newly-discovered principle into practical application, by which a useful article of manufacture is produced, and wrought pipe made as distinguished from cast pipe."

It is true the supreme court reversed this case, but it was upon the ground that the specification was not sufficiently precise. The court says: "It would seem that where a patent is obtained without a claim to the invention of the machinery through which a valuable result is produced, a precise specification is required, and the test of infringement is whether the defendants have used substantially the same process to produce the same result." And, further, the supreme court says: "The other rulings of the court (circuit court) are substantially correct." Now the decision of the circuit court was principally based upon the English authority reported in H. Blackstone (Boulton v. Bull, 2 H. Bl. 13, 31, 463, 496, 493, 495, and 213, & Ald 340, 350; Webst. Pat. Cas. 147, 342, 377, 310, 683, 684, 698, 717). I think therefore, that it must appear clearly to any one who will give himself the trouble carefully to examine, that there is the strictest harmony between the American and English authorities on this subject. That although the appellant disclaims the apparatus as a part of his invention, he has a right to claim the use of it as incidental and subsidiary to the practical purpose of the new and leading idea constituting the invention. What is claimed is that it never had been before applied or used in the way and for the purpose he has used it and applied it, namely, as a very great labor-saving, expeditious, less expensive, and much cheaper method of producing the article. It would, therefore, be immaterial, even if it were proved that the apparatus were old. It is not claimed as a merely abstract principle or result, but as being clothed as pointed out in a concrete device. This distinction, not properly understood, seems to be the ground of confusion indicated in the reasons stated in the decision.

I have carefully considered the case, and am satisfied that there is error in the commissioner's decision, and therefore do hereby reverse and annul the same, and do hereby direct that a patent be issued as prayed.

Case No. 9,033.

In re MANN.

[13 Blatchf. 401;[1] 14 N. B. R. 572.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June 7, 1876.

BANKRUPTCY — REQUISITE NUMBER OF CREDITORS —PETITION—BELIEF —OATH.

1. In a petition in involuntary bankruptcy, under section 39 of the act of March 2d, 1867 (14 Stat. 536), as amended by section 12 of the act of June 22d, 1874 (18 Stat. 180), it is sufficient to state upon belief, without averring either knowledge or information, that the petitioning creditors constitute the required number, and that their debts constitute the required amount.

[Cited in Re Roberts, 71 Me. 392.]

2. Where the petition is in such form, the oath to it is not insufficient, if it is the form of oath prescribed in form No. 54 of the forms in bankruptcy, although such form of oath purports to cover only matters which are stated on knowledge and matters which are stated on information and belief.

[In review of the action of the district court for the Northern district of New York.]

[In the matter of Henry A. Mann, an alleged bankrupt.]

E. F. Bullard, for petitioners.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The petition of review brings up for consideration the decision of the district judge upon a demurrer to a petition in involuntary bankruptcy. The alleged defect in the petition consists in this, that the creditor's petition states upon belief, without alleging either knowledge or information, that she constitutes one-fourth in number of the creditors of the alleged bankrupt whose demands exceed $250 and are provable; and that her demand constitutes one-third of the provable debts, under the act.

The 32d of the general orders in bankruptcy, adopted by the supreme court, April 12th, 1875, ordains, that the several forms specified in the schedules annexed to the former general orders, for the several purposes therein stated, shall be observed and used, with such alterations as may be necessary to suit the circumstances of any particular case. Among the forms thus sanctioned was that of a creditor's petition, No. 54, in which is contained the allegation of the petitioning creditor, that he "believes" that said debtor "owes debts to an amount exceeding the sum of three hundred dollars." Now, that circumstance is as essential as any other to make out a case for involuntary bankruptcy under the statute. It is sufficiently averred, as matter of pleading, by the averment that the petitioner so believes. If we look to the reason of it, belief upon such a subject is all that, in the nature of things, a stranger can have. Information is important only as leading to belief, unless the sources of information, and the details obtained, are to be set forth, and the court is to judge as to the greater or less probability of truth of the information obtained. But, as pleading, this is quite irrelevant. In pleading, the party is to make his allegations, upon subjects that lie within his personal knowledge, positively, but, upon other points, belief, equally with information and belief, suffices to present an issue. The facts stated on belief in this case, which have been before adverted to, relating to the question whether a sufficient proportion, in number and amount, of creditors have united in the petition, are of the same general character as that fact which the supreme court has directed to be stated on belief. It is, at least, as easy for a petitioning creditor to know, or to be informed, that the debtor owes more than $300, as it is that he should know, or be informed, that one-fourth in number and one-third in amount of creditors have united in the petition; and the same reason which makes the former sufficient ought to cover the latter.

The special provision of the statute, enabling the debtor to controvert this particular allegation, and the court in that case to require of him a complete list of his creditors, and the further provision, that, in case a sufficient number and amount of creditors have not joined, a reasonable time shall be granted for other creditors to unite in the petition, seem to me to show that no substantial purpose would be served in holding that an averment on belief is not sufficient.

There is no novelty in holding, that, as matter of pleading, an allegation upon belief is sufficient. Such was the established rule in respect to sworn pleadings in the court of chancery in New York, where the matters stated, charged, averred, admitted or denied, were required to be stated positively, or upon information or belief only, according to the fact (N. Y. Ch. Rules, No. 18, Ed. 1839); and either mode of statement was sufficient as a pleading.

In re Joliet Iron & Steel Co. [Case No. 7,436]; In re Scammon [Id. 12,430]; In re Scull [Id. 12,568]; and In re Keeler [Id. 7,638],—are not inconsistent with the views before expressed. None of them go further than to hold that an allegation on information and belief is sufficient, but none of them declares an allegation on belief alone to be insufficient.

In respect to the form of the verification, if that question arises on demurrer (In re

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Simmons [Id. 12,864]), it is that prescribed by the supreme court in the form before referred to; and any criticism in respect to the facts stated on belief alone in this case, as not covered by the form of the verification, would be alike applicable to the form sanctioned by the general orders in bankruptcy.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that the learned district judge ought not to have allowed the demurrer; that his order thereupon ought to be reversed; that the allegations of the petition in that behalf should be deemed sufficient; and that the proceedings should be remitted to the district court, to be proceeded in according to law.

Case No. 9,034.

MANN v. BAYLISS.

[10 O. G. 789, 113;[1] Merw. Pat. Inv. 356; 9 Chi. Leg. News, 18.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. April Term, 1876.

PATENT—CLAIM—STATE OF ART—INVENTION—DISCLAIMER.

1. The claims in a patent should be liberally construed, but must be limited by the state of the art, showing the degree of improvement effected.

2. Combining a curved metal receiver with an elevated, instead of a horizontal, delivery involves no invention, and is not patentable.

3. A disclaimer made by an attorney in the prosecution of an application does not necessarily estop the patentee from maintaining that his claim embraces the matter so referred to.

In this cause, complainant's bill recites that he is owner of letters patent of the United States, dated February 28, 1871, being a reissue and extension of letters patent No. 15,044, dated June 3, 1856, said reissued letters patent being numbered 4,281, for an improvement in harvesters, complainant having been one of the original patentees, and having acquired the interest of his co-patentee, Jacob J. Mann, by an assignment from said Jacob's administrator. The improvement consists, in brief terms, in having an elevated side delivery of the cut grain in the straw, by means of an endless apron, whereby the grain is discharged into a stationary receiver, of concave form, from whence, by means of a revolving rake, the teeth of which describe a circle nearly coincident with the circle of which the concave receiver forms a segment, the grain is gathered into gavels of suitable size for binding into sheaves or bundles, and discharged upon the ground. The bill prays answer, account of profits and damages, and injunction in the usual form. The answer denies originality and novelty of the invention, as also infringement, in that whereas by complainant's device the grain is discharged into a receiver which is "concave" in form, the machines constructed by defendant discharge their grain by a slightly-inclined chute from the elevating-apron onto a receiver which is "flat and horizontal," from which it is taken by the binder without the use of the revolving rake.

On the hearing, the question turned mainly upon the fourth claim of complainant's patent, which is in these words: The stationary concave receiver I, having a continuous surface, arranged as described at the side of a harvesting machine, having an elevated side delivery so as to receive the cut grain from the elevating and delivery apparatus, and collect the same into gavels preparatory to their being discharged from the machine.

Geo. H. Christy and Wm. Bakewell, for complainant.

S. A. Goodwin, for defendant.

Before EMMONS, Circuit Judge.

The following are the conclusions arrived at by the court in this case. The notes of the short-hand reporter were so imperfect as to render anything like a literal reproduction of the judgment impossible. This outline is sanctioned by the court as correct.

Judge EMMONS, at the close of the argument in the afternoon, announced at some length what he termed the strong inclination of his mind, but said as there was an hour or two before adjournment, and no other business would be taken up, he invited the learned counsel for the complainant to discuss the case further in reference to the objections which the court had presented to the injunction asked for. Counsel occupied the time in replying to the suggestions of the judge.

The following morning the court announced judgment substantially as follows:

His honor said that after the very full conversational interchange of opinion during the argument, it was mere matter of form to add anything now. Nothing new would be communicated. A strong sympathy was expressed with those canons of construction which so interpret a claim as to protect what a meritorious invention had created. He was just as much entitled to his right of property as a farmer to his wheat, or the fat which he put upon his animals. If the invention be trivial, and no important change be wrought in the department of labor into which the device was introduced, a less liberal construction of claims should be indulged in, and a less liberal application of the doctrine of mechanical equivalents should be extended.

The fourth claim is alone in controversy here, and its interpretation the only question necessarily to be decided. The answer insists that when properly interpreted the defendant does not infringe, and that if construed so as to include defendant's device, it is antedated by similar receivers before existing. We hold the fourth claim to include the conditions in which this curved metallic receiver could alone be used in the originally patented device. To construe it otherwise, and make it include, as plaintiff's counsel contend, every kind of barrier between the apparatus of an elevated delivery and the binding-table upon a harvesting-machine, save a perpendicular one, would, upon principles too familiar to be argued at length, render it void. Substantially, it would include all modes, which, in the patent law, is impossible. No man of ordinary intelligence, desiring to annex a table to a harvester, would fail to insert some obstruction between the one and the other, to prevent the grain being carried by the wind into the moving machinery. It would be an equal lack of intelligence to make it perpendicular; and this prior patent of Mann's was by no means necessary to instruct him to make it oblique, and carry it so far forward upon the table as to bring the fallen grain within the reach of the binders. The defendants, in annexing their new and useful binding-table to an old and familiar device, have adopted the only possible mode of conducting the grain from one to the other. Learned counsel were repeatedly asked to conceive of any other. They were unable to state any. To construe this fourth claim so as to include what defendant has actually done, would impute to the patent law the folly of granting to one citizen the right to divorce, during fourteen years, this useful addition from the machine it was intended to improve, and where their union required no device or contrivance which an ordinary citizen, without any mechanical knowledge whatever, would not readily adopt. This consequence is demonstrative that the patent office could not have intended it. It patented the receiver with the rake and accompanying conditions. We read this fourth claim so as to include them. Thus construed, the defendant's device is conceded not to infringe it. We place some confidence in the fact that as often as learned counsel for the complainant were asked to state the leading features of this device and what distinguished it from what preceded it, they invariably pointed to the accompanying conditions which the court include in this fourth claim, and none of which are employed by this defendant. If this claim is to include only a piece of curved metal fastened to the side of the harvester so as to receive the fallen grain, then his honor thought it was antedated by several other devices given in evidence. It was answered, he said, that none of them had been found in combination with an elevated delivery. He thought, however, it would not be a good combination claim to take such a device from a horizontal delivery and combine it with an elevated one. He could not impute to the officers an intention of granting a patent for such a combination. There was no invention in taking it from one and placing it upon the other. It was the other features of the combination which secured the grant, and which incidentally could be used only with an elevated delivery. Take away these features and there was nothing like a patentable combination growing out of the union of an elevated delivery with the piece of curved metal.

[1] [10 O. G. 113 gives only a partial report.]

The position that defendants infringed, even though the claim was construed to include a receiver with an outer edge so as to collect the grain into gavels that it may be discharged by revolving a rake, was considered at some length. Answering the arguments of complainant's counsel, among other things, Judge EMMONS said the broad level surface of the table was no mechanical equivalent for the narrow basin and turned-up outside edge of the receiver. The one collected the grain into gavels, the other did not. The one was intended to perform the particular function of arranging the grain so as to permit the action of a rake to sweep the straw in suitable parcels to the ground. The other required no such function, and could by no possibility perform it. The position was pronounced wholly untenable that the bodies of the men in the man-holes, and their arms and fingers, when in action, were the mechanical equivalents of the outer edge of the receiver and the action of the rake.

His honor said, while he did not assent to the argument of the learned counsel for the defendant that the complainant was estopped by the declaration of his pleader in the patent office, that this curvilinear receiver was old, and that, therefore, he did not claim it, still in cases of this character such a deliberate assertion was not without its influence. He felt some relief, in denying this injunction, that he was not compelled to go outside of complainant's own record for a plain declaration that he was right in the construction of this claim. He should be unwilling to have it thought the concession found in these papers constituted a very influential element in the reasons which induced his judgment. But when the whole history of this case was looked at, and it is remembered that this is a reissue seeking to claim something thought of originally only to be disclaimed, this matter may be well mentioned as a provocation to pretty close scrutiny of the extraordinary claim now insisted upon—one which declares to every citizen that he shall not insert between a novel device and an old one, to neither of which complainant has any right, a thing so simple, so utterly destitute of everything like invention, as the oblique board or common "chute" down which the grain falls upon the binding table, in the case before us.

Judge EMMONS said, in conclusion, that although he could give no reason for any doubt in this case, and the decision seemed to him plainly right, yet compelled as he was to dispose of them upon the moment, having no more time elsewhere than here to examine them, it would do the court great injustice not to suppose it recognized fully the great liability to error in such conditions. He had in this instance given, as in all similar instances he gave, to counsel the opportunity of meeting and overcoming the objections of the court. It was a satisfaction to him to know that the complainant in this instance had been represented by counsel as experienced, learned, and able as they had been zealous, and, as he might say, enthusiastic in argument. The usual decree dismissing the bill will be entered.

MANN (FLAGG v.). See Cases Nos. 4,847 and 4,848.

MANN (HAWES v.). See Case No. 6,239.

MANN (McCARTY v.). See Case No. 8,685.

Case No. 9,035.

MANN v. SACKS.

[Bee, 202.] [1]

District Court, D. South Carolina. April 21, 1804.

DAMAGES—TORTS—NEUTRAL VESSEL — FALSE PAPERS.

False papers divest a neutral vessel of all right to redress, under treaties, or the law of nations.

This is a suit for damages. The defendant on the 25th of December last, captured on the high seas, and carried into the island of Cuba, the schooner Ann, with a cargo of slaves. [Henry Maurice] Sacks at that time commanded a French national brig called La Sophie, and was duly commissioned to cruize. When he boarded and took possession of the Ann, she was under the command of one Ogden, who called himself a Danish subject, and was reputed owner, to cover the property which, in fact belonged to [Spencer] Mann and Foltz of this town. The vessel was sailing under a Danish flag; her register, and all the papers on board were Danish; and when Sacks boarded, Ogden asked him if the French were at war with the Danes.

BY THE COURT. It was contended for the actors, that this court, as an instance court, may take cognizance of all maritime causes, and cases have been cited to this effect. In all suits hitherto sustained by me, one or other of the following circumstances existed: 1st. The illegal equipment in our ports of the capturing vessel, contrary to act of congress of 5th June, 1794. 2d. Disregard of sea-letters produced, as required by the treaty with France; as in Delcol and Arnold. 3d. Capture within a marine league of this coast.

It is true that the question of prize or no prize has sometimes been implicated with matters that concerned the sovereignty of the United States, or a violation of her treaties.

According to our present treaty with France, certain papers therein specified shall suffice to fix the national character of the vessels of both powers. If such are produced without due effect, and if the captured vessel be brought infrà praesidia of her own courts, those courts will, without hesitation, interfere. But if American citizens will, for the sake of gain, divest themselves of their neutral character, and send their vessels to sea under foreign or masked papers, they do so at their peril. They forfeit all right to the protection of this court and of the treaties intended for the benefit of those who bring themselves fairly within their provisions. It appears clearly from a variety of evidence, including two policies of insurance, that this vessel had no claim to be considered as American. If the French vessel of war had brought her into this port, the treaty would have justified her in carrying her out again, as a Danish bottom; nor can the captain be now made answerable personally. He has pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court: he has a right to do so; and the libel must be dismissed with costs.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Thomas Bee, District Judge.]

MANN (UNITED STATES v.). See Cases Nos. 15,716, 15,717, and 15,718.

Case No. 9,036.

MANN et al. v. WILKINSON et al.

[2 Sumn. 273.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1835.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY—AFTER DECREE—RETAINED FOR FUTURE PROCEEDINGS—MILL DAM.

1. A bill of equity, after a decree, in certain cases may be retained for further future proceedings; but, in the case of an alleged violation of a water privilege, it will not be retained, in order to give the plaintiffs an opportunity, by new trials and proofs, to establish the fact, that a further lowering of the dam of the mill of the defendants is necessary to the protection of their rights.

[Cited in Ronayne v. Loranger, 66 Mich. 375, 33 N. W. 841.]

2. Quaere: Whether, under the mill act of Rhode Island, a mill-owner may raise his dam, so as to affect any water privilege or dam already on the stream, and above his own mill.

This was a bill in equity [by Samuel F. Mann and others] for an abatement of a nuisance to the cotton mills of the plaintiff, situate on the Blackstone river, by the defendants [George Wilkinson and others], by raising the dam of a mill, called the "Albion Mill," lower down on the stream, and thereby flowing back the water upon the plaintiff's mill-wheel. At a former hearing the court made an interlocutory decree, by which the cause was referred to a master. The master made his report at the last June term of the court; to which exceptions were taken by both parties. The cause was afterwards argued upon the exceptions.

[1] [Reported by Charles Sumner, Esq.]

R. W. Greene and D. Webster, for plaintiffs.
Pratt & Whipple, for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. On full consideration of all the exceptions taken by the parties, we are of opinion, that they ought all to be overruled, and the report of the master ought to be confirmed. We do not propose to give an elaborate opinion upon all the matters of the exceptions, as they would not be very intelligible without going at large into all the various topics asserted in the arguments at the bar, which would occupy too much time. It is sufficient to say, that we have most deliberately weighed them all; and are satisfied, that no one of them, with reference to the pleadings, and the actual posture of the case, is maintainable.

There are two points, however, upon which a few words may be proper to be said, in order to explain the final decree of the court. We think, that the proof stated by the master conclusively establishes the fact, that the dam of the Albion mill ought to be lowered two feet, in order to restore the plaintiffs to their rights as riparian and mill proprietors. The plaintiffs have asked, that the bill might be retained; so that the dam might be still further lowered, if upon future trials and proofs they can establish the fact, that there is a necessity of so doing, to protect and sustain their existing rights. But if the bill should be so retained, there must be a reciprocity on the other side. And the defendants ought to be let in to establish, by future trials and proofs, that the dam has been directed to be lowered beyond what the plaintiffs' rights required. What would this be, but to try the whole cause de novo on both sides, upon new proofs after publication? Such a course is, in our judgment, incompatible with the known course of practice and principles of courts of equity; and would open a door to interminable litigation. The very object of courts of equity, to put an end to controversies, would be defeated. We entertain no doubt, that in suitable cases, bills of equity may be retained after a decree for further future proceedings. But the present is not one of that sort.

One argument of the defendants is founded upon the existence of the old Eel dam, as an obstruction to the plaintiffs' rights; and it is said, that the defendants are entitled to the benefit of such obstruction, to its full extent, in flowing back the water upon the plaintiffs' mills; that is to say, to the extent of six inches, as it is intermediate in the stream between the Albion mill dam and the plaintiffs' mills. The effect of this would be to require the Albion dam to be lowered only eighteen inches instead of two feet. The court are of opinion, that the state of the pleadings does not raise the question, whether that Eel dam is to be treated as pro tanto a permanent obstruction of the plaintiffs' rights, as mill proprietors, or as a mere obstruction at the sufferance of the plaintiffs and the other riparian proprietors. The defendants have not asserted, that they have acquired any title to the Eel dam by any conveyance or transfer of the proprietors thereof. Nor have they averred, that they have acquired any right to the same by operation of law, by a flowage of the same under the mill act of Rhode Island. And the decree of the court ought to be founded upon the allegata, as well as the probata. These points, not being put in issue, are of course not properly matters in proof. If it had been averred in the pleadings, and established in proof, that the plaintiffs set up such a right to the Eel dam by flowage, under the mill act of Rhode Island, then a very important question might have arisen, whether, under that act, it was competent for any mill owner to raise his dam so as to flow back upon and affect any water privilege, or dam, already in existence across the stream above his mill; or whether the right of flowage is confined to cases, where no dam is erected, or in the course of erection, and the only flowage is to mere land. Upon this question we give no opinion; because the pleadings do not raise it; and as the defendants set up no title to the Eel dam, they cannot protect themselves under it, as an obstruction, in aid of the rights of the Albion mill proprietors.

Another point arises: The master's statement in the close of his report is, that flash-boards might, at certain seasons of the year, be erected on the Albion dam, sixteen inches and one half inch, without injury to the plaintiffs' rights. We are of opinion, that this is not a matter before us upon the present bill; and we shall, in framing the final decree, reserve to the parties all their rights respectively upon this point. If the master's report were confirmed in this particular, it might give rise to the suggestion, that the court had conferred a right on the defendants to raise such flash-boards in such seasons. If, on the contrary, the court disaffirmed this part of the master's report, it might be conclusive against the defendants. The decree will be so framed as to escape both of these inconveniences; and will leave the parties to the assertion of their rights respectively, in regard to flash-boards, hereafter, as they may be advised.

These are all the explanations, which the court deem it necessary to make upon the present occasion. The master's report is to stand confirmed, and the decree of an abatement of the Albion dam two feet, and a perpetual injunction will be consequent thereon.

This cause came on again to be heard upon the master's report, and the exceptions taken thereto by the parties respectively, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof it is ordered, adjudged and decreed by THE COURT, that the exceptions of the said parties respectively be, and the same are hereby overruled, and that the said report do stand in all matters confirmed except as hereinafter stated. And it not appearing by the answers of the defendants, that they assert any right or title to the Eel dam, in the said answers stated, under the owners thereof, by operation of law or otherwise, nor what the true nature and extent of the right and title of the said owners of said Eel dam was, and is;—it is, thereupon, further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the said Albion dam in the said pleadings mentioned, ought to be reduced from its height at the time of the filing of the plaintiffs' bill, the space of twenty-four inches from the top thereof, as a nuisance to the privileges and mills of the plaintiffs in the same bill mentioned, and in violation of their rights thereto; and the said defendants are hereby ordered to abate and reduce the same Albion dam the said twenty-four inches accordingly, within forty days from the entering of this decree. And it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the said defendants, their heirs and assigns be, and they hereby are, perpetually enjoined, after the same Albion dam is so abated and reduced as aforesaid, never thereafter to raise the same dam above the level, to which the same shall be so abated and reduced as aforesaid. And it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that a writ of injunction do issue forthwith against the defendants, commanding them to comply with all and singular the premises so enjoined upon them. And inasmuch as it appears from the master's report, that in low states of the river, when it is not obstructed by snow and ice, the defendants might, without injury to the plaintiffs, put flash-boards on their dam sixteen inches and one half wide, and the same keep up, until the water in the river flows over the top of them with their present mill gates drawn, and it is not the intent of the court, in any manner, to act upon this part of the said report, but to leave the parties respectively to their respective rights in regard thereof in the same manner, as if the same were not stated in the same report. It is further ordered and declared, that no part of this decree is to be construed in any manner to affirm or deny the right of the defendants to put up such flash-boards; but the parties are left to their respective rights in the premises, as if the same were not stated in the report. And it is further ordered and decreed, that the plaintiffs do recover their costs in the premises.

MANN (WOOD v.). See Cases Nos. 17,951, 17,952, 17,953, and 17,954.

Case No. 9,037.

MANNERING v. HOON.

[Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 9,038.

In re MANNHEIM.

[6 Ben. 270; 7 West. Jur. 72; 7 N. B. R. 342; 5 Chi. Leg. News. 149; 5 Pac. Law Rep. 106; 4 Leg. Op. 529; 7 Alb. Law J. 13.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1872.

BANKRUPTCY—SUSPENSION OF COMMERCIAL PAPER—BONA FIDE DEFENCE.

M., who was a man of large property, refused to pay a note which he had made, being advised by counsel, and believing, that he had a valid defence against it. A suit was thereupon brought against him, in a state court, by the holder of the note; and, while that suit was pending, the holder of the note filed a petition against M. in involuntary bankruptcy, alleging that he had suspended payment of the note for fourteen days. Held, that the case was not a proper one for an adjudication of bankruptcy, and that the petition must be dismissed.

[In the matter of William Mannheim, an alleged bankrupt.]

S. D. Sewards, for petitioner.
J. D. Reymert, for debtor.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I do not think this is a proper case for an adjudication. The sole act of bankruptcy alleged is the suspension of payment, for fourteen days, of the promissory note held by the petitioner. It is shown that the alleged bankrupt is a man of large property; that he has not suspended payment of his debts and his commercial paper generally; that he is engaged in prosecuting a regular business wholly unconnected with the transactions in respect to which the note was given; that he failed to pay the note because he was advised by counsel, and believed, that he had a good defence to it, on the ground that he had never received any consideration for it, and that it was passed away by the payee in violation of the agreement under which it was given, and that the petitioner was not a bona fide holder of it for a valuable consideration without notice; and that a suit is now pending in the supreme court of New York against him, brought on the note, by the petitioner, before this proceeding was instituted, which suit is defended on the above grounds, and is at issue and ready for trial. Under these circumstances, the debtor cannot be said to have suspended payment of his commercial paper, within the meaning of the statute. It was not intended that such a person should be put into bankruptcy. It is not for this court to try the question of the actual liability of the debtor on the note, and adjudge that there was a suspension of payment of his commercial paper, if such liability existed. The proper forum for the determination of the question as to such liability is the court in which the suit on the note is pending. The petition is dismissed, with costs.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 7 Alb. Law J. 13, contains only a partial report.]

Case No. 9,039.

MANNIE et al. v. EVERETT et al.[1]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. July 15, 1879.

PATENTS—NOVELTY—SUBSTITUTION—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—ACQUIESCENCE—AGREEMENT—VALIDITY.

[1. A prior decree sustaining a patent if entered by default is not enough to warrant a preliminary injunction in a subsequent suit.]

[2. In a suit upon letters patent only recently issued very strong evidence of acquiescence on the part of the community is required to justify a preliminary injunction.]

[3. A mere mercantile agreement not to deal in certain patented machines therein named is not an estoppel to deny the validity of the patent.]

[4. In a suit for infringement the foundation of a preliminary injunction is that the patent should be to all present appearances valid.]

[5. The substitution of wood for paper in the construction of a box of peculiar pattern does not amount to novelty.]

[These were bills in equity by George A. Mannie and William H. Bogart against Sidney J. Everett and Archibald S. Van Orden for infringement of letters patent. Heard on motions for preliminary injunction.]

F. J. Mather, for complainants.

Foster, Wentworth & Foster (James P. Foster and Philo Chase, of counsel), for defendants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. These two cases come before the court upon motions for preliminary injunction. The motions have been argued together and will be disposed of together.

The first bill, filed January 3rd, 1879, sets forth letters patent issued May 8th, 1866, to James Shepard and Benjamin B. Lewis, for an improvement in the art of constructing boxes for fruit and other articles, a surrender and re-issue thereof on the 7th of December, 1877, to said Shepard, and an assignment thereof to the plaintiffs on the 25th day of February, 1878. This bill also sets forth letters patent issued on the 25th day of June, 1878, to the plaintiffs for an invention relating to boxes or receptacles made from thin splints or veneer of wood which have a grain, and then charges an infringement of both patents by the defendants.

There is also set forth a decree of this court in favor of the plaintiffs, against one Hugo G. Adam and Henry P. Hildreth, composing the firm of Adam & Hildreth, for an infringement of the same patents, and avers that but for the infringement by the defendants the plaintiffs would be in undisturbed possession, use and enjoyment of the exclusive privileges secured by the said letters patent.

The second bill was filed on the 14th day of March, 1879. It sets forth letters patent No. 55,709, issued on the 19th day of June, 1866, to one Charles Reese, for an improvement in the manufacture of fruit boxes, a surrender and re-issue thereof to said Reese on the 25th day of February, 1879, and an assignment thereof to the plaintiffs. Infringement by the defendants of this patent also is there charged. Both the bills pray a decree for an account and an injunction but neither of them pray for an injunction during the pendency of the suit.

Upon these two bills and various affidavits the plaintiffs now move for preliminary injunctions during the pendency of these suits.

In opposition to these motions the defendants have presented affidavits denying the validity of the patents sued on, on the ground of want of utility or invention, and they charge each of the re-issued patents set forth to be void because for a different invention from that described in the original, and aver that the plaintiffs' claim to the exclusive right as set forth in the bills has never been sustained by the adjudication of any court or acquiesced in by the public. In addition to these answers to the merits the defendants object to the granting of the plaintiffs' motion on the ground of want of regularity of the proceedings and the insufficiency of the moving papers, such as that the drawings, forming part of the patents sued on and without which the patents are unintelligible, are not exhibited in the moving papers; that certified copies of the patents sued on have not been produced upon the hearing; also, that the bills afford no ground for the motions because they contain no prayer for a preliminary injunction, as required by equity rule No. 21. Also that the language used in the bills in regard to infringement does not show an infringement of the re-issued letters patent set forth. Also that upon the papers, title in the complainants is not shown. Also that the plaintiffs have failed to show a cause of action because the boxes produced in support of the charge of infringement as having been sold by the defendants are not claimed to have been bought until after the filing of the bill, and the sale thereof by the defendants even at that time has been disproved.

In disposing of these motions I do not intend to rest my decision upon any of the irregularities that have been pointed out by the defendants, although it is manifest that some of these are of a character not to be disregarded when insisted on; I shall treat the motions as a single motion regularly made in a case presenting the three patents set forth in both bills, and as presenting satisfactory evidence of a prior sale by the defendants of the boxes that are claimed to be an infringement upon the rights supposed to be secured by the three patents which the plaintiffs say they own.

[1] [Not previously reported.]

So considering these motions, I remark, first, no prior adjudication, within the sense of the rule applicable in cases of this description, has been shown. The decree of this court in the case of Adam & Hildreth [unreported], although shown to have been obtained in good faith without collusion, was entered by default, and proves nothing but a single case of individual acquiescence by the two persons there sued in the plaintiffs' claim under the Shepard and Lewis and the Mannie patent.

There has been no judicial determination of any of the questions that arise in these suits that can in any way affect the action of this court upon these motions.

In the next place, no considerable uninterrupted use by the patentees of the invention described, or a general acquiescence on the part of the trade in the claim to such inventions, has been shown. The re-issue of the Shepard and Lewis patent was made in December, 1877, the Mannie patent was first issued June 25, 1878, and the Reese patent was re-issued in February, 1879, subsequent to the filing of the first of the bills under consideration in January, 1879. At the filing of the bill the patents sued on had been in existence, one a few days longer than one year, one some seven months, and one less than one month. Under such circumstances it would require much stronger evidence than the plaintiffs have been able to produce to show an acquiescence on the part of the community that would warrant the inference that the plaintiffs' claim under the patents could not be successfully denied. Upon the affidavits it cannot be held that a general acquiescence in the plaintiffs' claims of an exclusive right has been shown.

There is, however, a circumstance which bears strongly upon the question of acquiescence so far as the defendants are concerned, and that is the agreement signed by the defendant Everett on July 30, 1878. It appears by the affidavits that, on complaint being made that the defendants were infringing the plaintiff's patent, an agreement was entered into by defendant Everett in the following terms:

We, Everett & Van Orden, agree in consideration that George A. Mannie & Co. shall not proceed against us for infringement heretofore, and not make us account for past royalty to and with George A. Mannie & Co., that we will not, after August 10, 1878, make or sell any more wooden veneer butter boxes having metallic bindings like that described in Mannie's patent, or sewed on the ends as described in the Munger patent, or infringing any patent owned by Geo. A. Mannie & Co. Sidney J. Everett. July 30, 1878.

This agreement the other defendant, Van Orden, refused to sign and declined to be bound thereby, but it is shown that subsequently thereto the plaintiffs purchased of the defendants all their stock of boxes, and the defendants thereafter sold boxes made by the plaintiffs and stamped: "Manufactured for Everett & Van Orden by Geo. A. Mannie & Co."

This evidence affords room for the plaintiffs to contend that the defendant Van Orden assented to the agreement made by his partner. But it is to be observed in regard to this agreement that it is not set up in the bill. These suits are in no way founded upon the agreement. The bills not only are not brought to enforce the agreement, or for an injunction in support of the agreement, but they do not put forth the agreement as acquiescence on the part of the defendants in the plaintiffs' claims under the patents in question.

At most, therefore, upon this motion, this agreement can have no effect except as evidence to show a temporary acquiescence on the part of the defendants in the plaintiffs' claim of exclusive right under such patents as were then known to the defendants to belong to the plaintiffs. Acquiescence on the part of any person in a claim of exclusive right under a patent is a material part in an action upon the patent and may be given in evidence by the patentee as an admission or as evidence pro tanto of general acquiescence, but is always capable of explanation, and if shown to be part of a simple, mercantile agreement, affords little support for an inference in favor of the validity of the patent. Such appears to be the character of the agreement under consideration; and it neither estops the defendant from denying the validity of the plaintiffs' patent, nor does it compel the inference that the defendants have no good ground on which to contest the plaintiffs' claim under the patents mentioned therein.

If no serious doubt had been raised in regard to the novelty of the invention claimed, it might be possible to find ground for granting a preliminary injunction in this agreement, coupled with the shown insolvency of the defendants, taken in connection with the evident attempt on their part to misrepresent their financial ability, and the further fact that it is doubtful whether any real injury would result to the defendants from such an injunction if issued; but in the state of the evidence as it stands upon this motion, the doubt as to the validity of either of the plaintiffs' patents is too serious to permit of an injunction prior to a final hearing of the cause.

The claim of the Shepard and Lewis patent as re-issued is an follows: "In the art of constructing boxes for fruit and other articles from blanks of a single thickness bending the blank obliquely with the grain of thin wood or veneer substantially as and for the purpose herein specified."

Assuming the patent to be either for a product, viz.: a box made of a blank of a single thickness by bending the blank obliquely with the grain, or for a process of making a box out of a single blank by bending the blank obliquely to the grain, there is much room to dispute the novelty of the invention. This same idea applied in the same way to accomplish the same result appears in the boxes produced by the defendants under the affidavit made by John T. Brown, and also in the old boxes constructed of a single piece of birch bark by bending the bark obliquely to the grain.

The claim of the Mannie patent is for a combination, the elements of which are (1) "a veneer box having its sides prolonged to form flaps lapping over upon its end; and (2) a bent metal strip covering substantially the entire upper edge of the end, and securing the end to the flaps."

The elements of this combination are old. Their combination produces no new result, nor does it appear that invention was required to apply an ordinary metal binding to the edge of a veneer box for the purpose of preventing the veneer from splitting and to confine the ends of the flaps. It is simply the case of a mechanical adaption of an ordinary mechanical device to produce a simple and well-known result. The use of a similar binding to produce a similar result is common.

The remaining patent is the one issued to Reese, which forms the subject of the second bill. This re-issue was granted subsequent to the filing of the first bill, and within a month of the time of commencing suit upon it. The claim of this patent is "a box or receptacle made of a single piece of wood, veneer, or other similar material, bent up to form the sides and ends thereof, and having surplus material at the corners consisting of prolonged parallel projections made to overlap and reinforce the adjacent sides or ends, and which projections are secured to said sides or ends by eyelets or their equivalents, substantially as described." This patent as it stands is shown to be anticipated in several of the boxes that have been produced by the defendants. The substitute of wood for paper in the construction of a box does not constitute novelty, and besides the Reese patent is broad enough to cover not only boxes of wood, but similar boxes made of paper, which are old. Among the defendants' exhibits are several boxes prior in date to the Reese patent, in which are to be found laps and flaps similar to those described in the Reese patent, and similarly applied.

If these views in regard to the novelty of the plaintiffs' invention are correct it is manifestly impossible for the plaintiffs to obtain an injunction against the defendants until their patents shall have been sustained upon the final hearing. The very foundation of an injunction in a case of this description is a patent to all present appearances valid, and such foundation is here wanting. The motion for preliminary injunction must therefore be denied.

Case No. 9,040.

In re MANNING.

[5 Biss. 497.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Dec., 1873.

BANKRUPTCY—NOTE—GUARANTOR—PARTNER.

Where partners, in compromise with their creditors, gave their note in settlement, guaranteed by the attorney, such guarantor cannot be made a party to bankruptcy proceedings against the partners, even though, after the settlement, he became a partner.

[In review of the action of the district court of the United States for the Northern district of Illinois.]

Petition of review filed by William J. Manning, against whom adjudication of bankruptcy had been entered as partner with Edmund Shanahan and James West.

Tenneys, Flower & Abercrombie, for petitioning creditors.

T. M. Manning, for petitioner in review.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. The only question I have considered it necessary to decide is as to the effect of the signature of Manning to the notes that were offered in evidence, which, it was contended, showed that there was a suspension of the payment of commercial paper, and a continuance of such suspension for more than fourteen days.

The petition in bankruptcy was originally filed against Shanahan and West. Afterwards William J. Manning was made a party. It was as amended filed against them all, as partners; and the question is whether the promissory notes offered in evidence showed as to Manning that it was a suspension by him as a partner of West and Shanahan and so continued for more than fourteen days, within the meaning of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]; and I have come to the conclusion that it was not.

Shanahan and West were partners. They got into trouble, and proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced against them. A compromise was made which was negotiated by Manning, a lawyer of this city. It was proposed that they should pay a certain percentage on their indebtedness and that time should be given them. They were unable to find the security required, and finally Manning became security; and in consequence of that arrangement a partnership was entered into between Manning, and Shanahan and West. The notes offered in evidence were the notes of Shanahan and West guaranteed by Manning, and, except one of the notes, secured by him on real estate. The notes ran in this form: "Five months after date for value received we promise to pay to the order of L. M. Bates & Co. thirteen hundred and ninety-five dollars and ninety-four cents, at the First National Bank. Shanahan & West." On the back of the note was written: "For value received I hereby guarantee the payment of the within note at maturity. William J. Manning." Now the question under the contract which Manning made with Shanahan and West, by which he became a partner and assumed and indorsed these notes, is whether this was his commercial paper, for which a suspension of payment, and non-resumption for fourteen days authorized a proceeding in bankruptcy against him. It may be a question of some nicety, but I think that it is not fairly within the true construction of the bankrupt law; that it was not such commercial paper given by him as a partner, for which as against him proceedings in bankruptcy could be commenced. He was simply an indorser or guarantor. He had nothing to do with the original consideration for which the paper was given, and there may be great doubt whether Manning, as to the notes guaranteed by him, assumed the character of a merchant, though he did as to the future by his contract of partnership. I make no decision upon any other point. I think the decree of the district court as to Manning, was wrong. The adjudication of bankruptcy as to Manning must be set aside and proceedings dismissed as to him.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[Subsequently Manning filed a petition in the district court asking to have the bankrupt's assets paid over to him as a solvent member of the bankrupt firm. The petition was denied. Case No. 12,701.]

MANNING (ALSTON v.). See Case No. 266.

Case No. 9,041.

MANNING et al. v. CAPE ANN ISINGLASS & GLUE CO. et al.

[4 Ban. & A. 612; 9 Reporter, 337.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Nov., 1879.[2]

PATENTS—MAKING ISINGLASS—PUBLIC USE.

1. The question of "public use," discussed.[2]

[Cited in Perkins v. Nashua C. & G. P. Co., 2 Fed. 453.]

2. Letters patent No. 134,690, granted to James Manning, January 7th, 1873, for an improvement in the manufacture of isinglass, held invalid.

[This was a bill in equity by John J. Manning and Caleb J. Norwood against the Cape Ann Isinglass & Glue Company and others, to restrain the infringement of certain letters patent.]

T. W. Clarke, for complainants.

Geo. L. Roberts & Bros., for defendants.

LOWELL, Circuit Judge. Ribbon isinglass is made by passing the macerated bladders of fish, especially of hake, through several sets of rollers which squeeze the substance first into a sheet somewhat like dough, and then into the translucent ribbons which are sold in the market. Heat makes the substance sticky and difficult to work in the earlier stages, and it is important that the first set of rollers, called "mumming rolls," should be kept cool. Ebenezer Rowe, in 1848, patented a mode of keeping these rollers supplied on the inside with cold water, and this method has not been superseded. James Manning, assignor of the plaintiffs, took out the patent in suit January 7th, 1873, No. 134,690, for an improvement in this art, or its machinery, by the addition of a stationary knife, or scraper, attached so near to each of the rollers as to clean it for its whole length at each revolution. He describes a machine like Rowe's, with his addition, and claims the described "method of converting isinglass into sheets of any desired thickness by running it between hollow rolls into which cold water is thrown to cool the compressing surfaces, such rolls being preferably made adjustable to graduate the degree of compression, and the adhering sheets being removed from the rolls by stationary scrapers or clearers and returned to the hopper, as required."

James Manning had been a manufacturer of isinglass, at Ipswich, for many years in partnership with one Norwood. In 1859 or 1860, scrapers were added to the rollers in that factory, and were used there by Manning & Norwood until 1867, when the firm was dissolved and this machinery was left with Norwood, and was used by him and his son until his death in 1871. James Manning built a factory at Rockport for his two sons, and they used similar machinery from 1867 or 1868 onwards.

The defendants have pleaded and proved the foregoing facts as showing a public use for more than two years before the application of James Manning for a patent, which was in December, 1872.

It has always been a prerequisite or condition precedent to the grant of a valid patent, that the thing patented shall not have been in use. By the English law, and formerly by ours, a use before the date of the patent, or of the application, destroyed the novelty of the invention. But for the last forty years we have permitted a use not exceeding two years before the application. Obvious reasons of policy and justice require that an inventor should not monopolize what he has neglected to patent for a considerable time, if, in the meantime, the public have acquired the knowledge of it, whether through him or from an independent source. Before 1870 it was generally understood that two years' use would not destroy the patent, unless it was had with the "consent and allowance" of the inventor. Those words are not found in the Statute of 1870, nor in the Revised Statutes; and Judge Blatchford has lately decided that they are no part even of the law of 1839 [5 Stat. 353]. Egbert v. Lippmann [Case No.

[1] [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 9 Reporter, 337, contains only a condensed report.]

[2] [Affirmed in 108 U. S. 462, 2 Sup. Ct. 860.]

4,306]. The point is not material here, because whatever was done with this invention was with James Manning's consent.

Our law has the expression "public use," and "public" has been added to the statute of monopolies by the courts of England. The governing idea is, that public knowledge makes public right, and, therefore, in England, a description of the invention in a written or printed book which is published by circulation, or in the specification of a patent which is public in its very nature, is the equivalent of public use, though there is nothing in the statute concerning knowledge. In this respect our statutes follow the decisions.

Public use means not only a use by the public but a use in public, that is to say, one which is not secret, and, therefore, one from which, so far as the inventor is concerned, the public may, by any of the chances of life, acquire the knowledge. A remarkable case is that of the lady who wore an improved pair of corsets given her by the inventor more than two years before he applied for a patent upon the article, which was held a public use. Egbert v. Lippmann [supra]. In a case like the present, the use of a machine by the inventor himself "in the ordinary way of the public use of a machine," which I understand to mean without special secrecy, will be a public use. Pitts v. Hall [Case No. 11,192]; Bevin v. East Hampton Bell Co. [Id. 1,379]; M'Millin v. Barclay [Id. 8,902]; Re Adamson's Patent, 6 De Gex, M. & G. 420; Heath v. Smith, 3 El. & Bl. 256. The nonexistence of public use being a condition precedent to the validity of the grant, the intent of the inventor not to abandon the invention, or his reasons for not applying for a patent, though of a most potent character, such as illness, are immaterial. See Pennock v. Dialogue, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 1, and the remarks of Marshall, C. J., on that case in Grant v. Raymond, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 218, 248; McClurg v. Kingsland, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 202, 208, per Baldwin, J.; Sisson v. Gilbert [Case No. 12,912]; Egbert v. Lippmann [supra]. Evidence that any one has copied the invention which is thus brought, presumptively, to the knowledge of mankind, is not necessary to the success of his defence. Such a fact would often be difficult to prove or disprove, and the use itself in any of the modes above explained, works a forfeiture, without more.

There is some evidence in the record tending to show that the use of this invention was either secret or experimental, or both; and evidence to oppose this. I have read the case with care, and am of opinion that the use at the factories in Ipswich and Rockport was a public use in the sense of the law, and was not for the purposes of experiment; and that the use was of the same improvement which is patented. As bearing upon this last point there was contradictory testimony as to whether the scrapers were made adjustable until within two years before the application. I think it probable that they were so made; but whether so or not, the adjustability of the rollers or the scrapers is not of the essence of the invention as described and claimed by the patentee, or in fact.

Bill dismissed with costs.

[NOTE. The cause was taken on appeal, by the complainants, to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed, on the ground that the patent was void, for the reason that the invention had been in public use more than two years prior to the time application was made for a patent. 108 U. S. 462, 2 Sup. Ct. 860.]

Case No. 9,042.

MANNING v. COX.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 693.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1836.

ASSUMPSIT—SERVICES RENDERED—VOLUNTARY.

The defendant's male slave, being, by consent of the plaintiff and defendant, at the plaintiff's house, upon a visit to his wife, who was the slave of the plaintiff, was taken suddenly ill of the smallpox, and, after being nursed three weeks by the plaintiff, died at her house. The defendant, as soon as he knew of the sickness of his slave, offered to remove him to his own house, but the plaintiff would not consent to the removal. Upon this evidence, the court instructed the jury that the plaintiff could not recover.

The plaintiff's original declaration contained three counts, namely, 1. Indebitatus assumpsit for $100 for work, and labor, &c., in nursing the defendant's slave, at the defendant's request, while sick of the smallpox, at the plaintiff's house. 2. For money paid, laid out, and expended, at the defendant's request, for the like purpose. 3. Insimul computassent.

The plaintiff [Martha Manning] afterward filed an amended declaration, with four counts. The first charged that the defendant's slave, being, by the order and direction of the defendant [Florentius Cox], on a visit at the plaintiff's house, was suddenly taken sick with the smallpox, and after lingering a long time, died at the plaintiff's house, and the plaintiff, during that time, nursed the said slave, &c. 2. That the plaintiff, at the special instance and request of the defendant, permitted the slave to visit and sojourn at the plaintiff's house, and while there he was taken sick of the smallpox; and after lingering a long time died at the plaintiff's house; during which time the plaintiff nursed him, &c. 3. The third count stated, that, while the slave was visiting and being in the plaintiff's house, with the privity and consent of the defendant, he was suddenly taken sick, &c. 4. The fourth count stated that the defendant, as owner of the slave, "was bound, by law, to make all necessary provision for said slave, when he should be taken sick, and him to nurse and attend, or procure to be nursed and attended." That, while the defendant's slave was at the plaintiff's house, he was taken so suddenly ill with smallpox that he could not leave the plaintiff's house without great danger to his life; of which disease he lingered a long time, to wit, six months, and then died; so that, during the whole time of his sickness, the plaintiff was "necessitated" to nurse and attend him, and administer diet to him to keep him from dying for want of attention. "And the plaintiff avers that the case of the said slave was so pressing, and of such a character, that she was compelled to render services without a previous application to, or employment of, the said defendant. Nevertheless, the said defendant has wholly neglected and failed to compensate the plaintiff for her services and trouble in that behalf rendered, as he was bound to do, by law. Of all which matters the defendant had notice, &c. By means of which said several premises, the plaintiff hath sustained great loss by being compelled to send her children out of her house, &c., &c."

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

The evidence was, that the wife of the defendant's slave, was the slave of the plaintiff, and that he was permitted from time to time, to visit his wife, with the consent of the plaintiff and defendant. That on one of these visits, he was taken sick, and after lingering three weeks, died at the plaintiff's house. That the defendant, as soon as he heard of his slave's illness, offered to remove him to his own house, but the defendant would not consent to it.

R. J. Brent, for plaintiff, contended that an action will lie upon any breach of duty by the defendant; and that it was his duty to compensate the plaintiff for her services and trouble in nursing the defendant's slave. 1 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 337, 338, 413; 1 Evans' Harr.; 1 Wheat. Selw. N. P. 36.

Z. C. Lee, for defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that the evidence did not support the declaration.

And THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, contra), gave the instruction as prayed.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, observing that if the whole evidence was believed by the jury, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, said, that to support the plaintiff's action upon this declaration, she must satisfy the jury that there was a duty on the part of the defendant to be violated by not compensating the plaintiff for the services stated in the declaration. But there was no such duty, unless the services were performed at the request of the defendant, either express or implied; and that if they were rendered upon a sudden emergency, and were beneficial to the defendant, his assent might be presumed, unless the contrary appeared in evidence.

Case No. 9,042a.

MANNING v. The GRACE FEE.

[Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 9,043.

MANNING v. HAYDEN.

[5 Sawy. 360; 7 Reporter, 423, 424; 13 West. Jur. 317, 318; 8 Am. Law Rec. 38; 1 San Fran. Law J. 85.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Jan. 20, 1879.[2]

TRUSTS — AGENT — REAL PROPERTY—STATUTE OF FRAUDS—STATUTE OF LIMITATION—ATTORNEY AND CLIENT.

1. Where a person acquires the legal estate in real property as the agent of another, or upon a trust and confidence that he will acquire it for the benefit of such other, equity will imply a trust in favor of the latter, and compel the purchaser to account to him accordingly.

[Cited in Gest v. Packwood, 39 Fed. 537.]

2. Such a transaction is not within the statute of frauds, and, therefore, the trust need not be manifested by a writing, the law implying it from the circumstances of the case.

[Cited in brief in Vallette v. Tedens, 14 N. E. 53, 122 Ill. 609.]

3. Cases of constructive trust being purely of equitable cognizance, lapse of time is no absolute bar to a suit for relief thereon; but each case depends upon its own nature and circumstances—the court taking the statute as a guide or suggestion, rather than a command.

[Cited in Stevens v. Sharp, Case No. 13,410; Traver v. Tribou, 15 Fed. 28; Hickox v. Elliott, 22 Fed. 18; Lakin v. Sierra Buttes Gold Min. Co., 25 Fed. 344; Allen v. O'Donald, 28 Fed. 24; Powell v. Oregonian Ry. Co., 38 Fed. 191; Gest v. Packwood, 39 Fed. 535; U. S. v. Wallamet V. & C. M. Wagon Road Co., 42 Fed. 358; Id., 44 Fed. 241.]

4. Where an attorney is employed by the defendant in a suit to enforce the lien of a mortgage, the relation of attorney and client continues until the final determination of the matter by the confirmation of the sale, unless the attorney's employment was expressly otherwise limited, or he was discharged in the meantime with the consent of his client, or by the order of the court.

5. An attorney who purchases for himself his client's property at a judicial sale, thereby acquires an interest contrary to his duty as attorney, and, therefore, the purchase will be held void, or the attorney a trustee for the client, at the option of the latter, unless it satisfactorily appears that he was in no wise injured or prejudiced thereby.

This suit is brought by the plaintiff [Charles Manning], a citizen of California, against the defendant [Benjamin Hayden], a citizen of Oregon, to compel a conveyance of certain premises situated in Polk county, containing three hundred and nineteen acres, and known as the south half of the Bethuel and Rachel Dove donation, the same being parts of sections 2 and 3, in township S south, of range 4 west, of the Willamette meridian. Substantially the bill alleges that the premises in controversy were the property of said Rachel, the wife of said Bethuel, the same being her half of the donation aforesaid, which was made by the United States to said Bethuel and Rachel, in consideration of the occupation of the same by the former, as a settler under section 4 of the donation act of September 27, 1850 (9 Stat. 497), from and after December 1, 1848; that on March 2, 1859, said Bethuel borrowed one thousand five hundred and fifty dollars from the county aforesaid to pay the balance of a debt then due one William Griswold, and upon the same date said Rachel and her husband executed a mortgage of the premises to secure the payment of said loan; that at the date of the said mortgage the defendant was a practicing attorney, and was the attorney and confidential advisor of said Bethuel and Rachel in the matter of said loan and mortgage and otherwise; that the defendant, for the purpose of enabling himself to cheat and defraud said Rachel out of her donation, solicited her to execute said mortgage, and assured her that he would mortgage his own home-farm before she should thereby lose her property; and that by means of such solicitations and assurances she was induced to execute said mortgage; that on October 23, 1863, suit was brought to enforce the lien of said mortgage, in which the defendant, as the attorney of the mortgagors, appeared and made a defense thereto, notwithstanding which, on November 18, 1863, a decree was given in said suit to the effect that said premises should be sold as upon execution to satisfy the sum then due upon said loan—two thousand and fifty dollars and seventy-three cents in currency—together with the costs of suit, and that thereupon said premises were advertised for sale; that prior to the date of such sale the defendant informed said Rachel that he would see that the property was bid off for her benefit, and would protect her rights therein, and that in consequence of such information, and relying upon the honesty and integrity of said defendant, she did not attend such sale, and took no steps to secure her interest in said property; that said premises at the sale thereof were worth four thousand dollars in gold coin, while the defendant bid in the same in his own name for the sum of one thousand two hundred and twenty-five dollars in currency, then not worth more than six hundred and twelve dollars and fifty cents in gold coin, and afterwards stated and caused said Rachel to believe that said premises "had been bid off in her name, and for her benefit, and that the amount necessary for her to pay to redeem the same was the said sum of six hundred and twelve dollars and fifty cents;" that relying upon such statements and the honesty of the defendant as aforesaid, said Rachel, in July, 1864, paid defendant two hundred dollars in gold coin upon said bid, which he received with the understanding it should be so applied; that said Rachel and her husband continued in the possession of said premises as owners, and intending to redeem the same as aforesaid, until about August, 1865, when the defendant, intending and contriving to disseise the said Rachel, fraudulently procured her tenant, one O. H. Smith, to surrender the possession thereof to him, and has ever since retained the same, and received the rents and profits thereof to the value of four hundred dollars a year; that but for the promises and representations of the defendant as aforesaid, said Rachel could and would have made other arrangements, and secured the redemption of the property for her benefit; that the defendant afterwards obtained a deed to said premises, as the purchaser thereof, from the sheriff making the sale, and claims to be the owner of the same in his own right, and refuses to convey the same to the said Rachel, or account to her for the rents and profits thereof; that on April 7, 1865, said Rachel being aged and infirm, and unable to prosecute her claim to the premises, for a valuable consideration, conveyed the same and all her claim for rents and profits to the complainant; and that at the date of such conveyance, the rents and profits then received by the defendant had more than paid the balance due him, and the premises were in equity the property of said Rachel, and she was entitled to a conveyance of the same from the defendant.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 7 Reporter, 423, 424, and 3 West. Jur. 317, 318, contain only partial reports.]

[2] [Reversed in 106 U. S. 586, 1 Sup. Ct. 617.]

The defendant demurred to the bill for divers causes, but upon the argument only insisted upon two: (1) That the alleged trust not being in writing, is void; and, (2) that at the date of the conveyance aforesaid to the complainant, his grantors had no interest in the premises, and nothing to assign, except a mere right of suit, which is not assignable.

The court overruled the demurrer, saying: "Upon the facts stated in the bill I think that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief sought. After a careful consideration of the argument and authorities submitted for the defendant, my impression is, that this is not a case of mere agreement within the statute of frauds, but one of a fraud practiced by an agent or attorney upon his principal or client, whereby the former was enabled to acquire the legal title to the premises, to the prejudice and wrong of the latter. In such cases equity will redress the wrong by raising or implying a trust in favor of the injured party. The wrong-doer is held to be a trustee ex maleficio. 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 708; Baker v. Whiting [Case No. 787]; Ryan v. Dox, 34 N. Y. 307. If my impression is correct upon this point, then the demurrer is not well taken upon the second one. If, notwithstanding the deed from the sheriff to the defendant, he is only the trustee of the estate, Rachel Dove was the owner of the premises in equity, and could convey the trust estate—the beneficial interest—to the complainant. Baker v. Whiting, supra. And such a conveyance passes an interest in the property, and not a mere right of suit.

The defendant had leave to answer, the court saying: "It is to be understood that this opinion is expressed subject to correction on the final hearing, when the questions argued upon this demurrer may be considered in the light of the pleadings and proofs in the case."

The answer of the defendant admits that he was attorney for Bethuel Dove prior to the execution of the mortgage, but denies that he acted as such attorney in the matter of this loan and mortgage, or that he advised the same, or had any knowledge or information concerning the same until long after they were made. It denies that the defendant was employed by Bethuel and Rachel Dove to defend the suit, to enforce the lien of the mortgage, but admits that he was so employed by Bethuel, and that to gain time for him he interposed a demurrer to the bill which was overruled. It denies that the defendant informed or promised Rachel Dove that he would bid in the premises for her at the sheriff's sale, or that there was any understanding to that effect, but alleges that the Doves admitted their inability to hold the land, and asked him to buy for himself. It denies that the premises were worth four thousand dollars in gold coin, and alleges that they were not worth more than one thousand two hundred and twenty-five dollars, without stating in what kind of money. It alleges that the sale of the premises was made on March 5, 1864, after being twice delayed for want of bidders, and that the sheriff's deed to the defendant was executed on April 26, 1864. It denies any information as to the value of currency at the date of the sale, but alleges that Bethuel and Rachel Dove thereby obtained a credit on their debt to the county of one thousand one hundred and seventy-seven dollars and fifty cents, that being the amount for which the property was sold, less the costs. It denies that the defendant ever gave Rachel Dove to understand that she could redeem the land by the payment of six hundred and twelve dollars and fifty cents in gold coin, or that she paid him two hundred dollars in pursuance thereof, but admits that in the summer of 1864, at the request of Bethuel Dove, he agreed with him that if he would repay the defendant the purchase-money, with interest, within a year from the date of the sheriff's sale, he would sell said Dove the premises upon those terms, and thereupon said Dove paid him two hundred dollars in gold coin upon said bargain, it being then and there further agreed between the parties, that in case the balance of said purchase-money was not paid within the time specified, that the said two hundred dollars was to be applied as rent money for the use of said land; that within the first year said Dove occupied the premises, under said agreement, he cut and sold therefrom four hundred dollars worth of timber, and because defendant remonstrated with him for so doing, he left the place and rented the same to O. H. Smith, aforesaid, but retained the possession of thirty acres thereof, which he "cropped the second year," against the remonstrance of the defendant. It denies that the defendant procured Smith to surrender the possession of the premises to him, but alleges that he received such possession from Moses Clark, the sub-tenant of Smith, on October 31, 1865; and also that said Rachel ever demanded the possession of the premises from the defendant, or an account of the rents and profits thereof. It denies that said Rachel ever conveyed her interest in the premises to the complainant for "a valuable, or any consideration," or that the complainant is, in good faith, the lawful owner thereof, or that since said sheriff's sale, she was ever the owner in equity or otherwise, of said land, or any part thereof. It alleges that in 1864, the premises were worth two hundred dollars a year, but that since 1865, the defendant has expended four hundred and eighty dollars in clearing and breaking one hundred and fifty acres thereof, five hundred and forty dollars for posts and plank fence, and four hundred dollars for other fencing thereon, and three hundred dollars for building a barn and repairing a dwelling thereon, since when the value of the premises has been three hundred dollars a year, and that he has paid taxes upon the property to the amount of two hundred dollars; that the contract aforesaid for the sale of the premises to Bethuel Dove was not in writing, and, therefore, void, and that more than six years have elapsed since the expiration of said agreement.

A general replication was filed in the answer. The evidence of a number of witnesses, including that of the defendant and Bethuel and Rachel Dove, was taken before the examiner, and read on the hearing.

George W. Lawson, H. Y. Thompson, and Claude Thayer, for complainant.

E. C. Bronnaugh and William H. Effinger, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. Upon the evidence, including the answer of the defendant, the following facts are satisfactorily established: That on September 18, 1874, the register and receiver of the proper land-office issued a certificate, under section 7 of the act of September 27, 1850, aforesaid, from which it appears that the premises in controversy are the wife's half of the donation of Bethuel and Rachel Dove, granted to them by section 4 of the act aforesaid, on account of the husband's settlement and occupation thereon, commencing on December 1, 1868; that some time prior to 1858, and up to 1865, the defendant was the general attorney and trusted adviser of Bethuel Dove and his wife; that in 1858, one William Griswold, after serious litigation, obtained a judgment against Bethuel Dove for over eight thousand dollars, in which litigation the defendant acted as the attorney of said Dove, and as such, procured one J. B. V. Butler, also a friend and client of his, to sign an undertaking for an appeal from the judgment of said district court to the supreme court of the territory, by which undertaking the parties thereto became bound to pay said judgment, if affirmed, whereas said Butler, at the time of signing said undertaking, understood from the defendant that it was for the costs of the appeal only; that said judgment was affirmed, and all the property of said Dove liable to execution, consisting of the north half of said donation and other lands, were sold to satisfy the same, and that in March, 1859, there was still due upon said judgment the sum of about four thousand dollars, for which said Butler was liable as a defendant therein, but which was afterwards paid by said Bethuel; that on March 2, 1859, said Bethuel and Rachel executed a mortgage upon the premises in controversy to the treasurer of Polk county, to secure the payment of the sum of one thousand five hundred and fifty dollars, then borrowed by said Bethuel from the school fund of said county, and payable three years thereafter, with interest at one per centum per month, to apply upon said judgment, and so far relieve said Butler from his liability thereon; and that the defendant advised said loan and mortgage, and was instrumental in procuring the former, and inducing said Rachel to execute said mortgage, and received some one thousand dollars thereof from said Bethuel and Rachel to apply upon said judgment; that after said debt became due, suit was commenced by the treasurer of said county, in the circuit court thereof, to recover the same, and enforce the lien of said mortgage, to which suit said Bethuel and Rachel were parties defendant, and the defendant appeared therein as their attorney, and made a defense thereto by demurrer, and on November 18, 1863, a decree was made therein, that the plaintiff recover two thousand and fifty-two dollars and seventy-five cents and costs, and that the premises in controversy be sold as upon an execution at law to satisfy the same; that upon March 5, 1864, the said premises were sold, and bid in by the defendant, for the sum of one thousand one hundred and twenty-five dollars, in currency, the sale having been twice postponed in the meantime, "for want of bidders, and other sufficient causes," which sale was confirmed by said court on April 26, 1864, and a deed of the premises executed by the sheriff to the defendant on the same day; that at the date of such sale, the defendant was the attorney of said Bethuel and Rachel in said matter, and, moreover, in making such purchase and receiving said conveyance, was acting on behalf of said Doves, in pursuance of an understanding between himself and them, whereby the defendant was to bid in said premises at the sale, in case they went low enough, as was expected, for the benefit of said Rachel, who was to redeem the same as soon as she could, in a reasonable time, and thereby secure a home for herself and husband in their poverty and old age, and that said Bethuel and Rachel relied upon said understanding, and, therefore, took no other steps or means to secure the property, or redeem it within the time allowed by statute, as they might, and would have otherwise, done; and that on July 26, 1864, said Bethuel, in pursuance of said understanding, paid the defendant, for said Rachel, two hundred dollars in gold coin, for which he gave the following acknowledgment in writing: "Received of B. Dove, two hundred dollars, to be applied on purchase of land purchased by me at sheriff's sale. The land known as Mrs. Dove's half of donation land claim, July 26, 1864. (Signed) B. Hayden;" but that the defendant afterwards, by prohibiting said Bethuel from cutting and selling saw-logs from the premises, and by procuring the tenant of the Doves—O. H. Smith, to whom the farm was rented in the fall of 1864, when Mr. Dove took up a homestead upon an island near by, where he has since lived—to pay him the rent due them; and finally, in the fall of 1865, to surrender the premises to him, hindered and prevented said Bethuel and Rachel from obtaining and acquiring the money wherewith to complete said redemption as per the agreement and understanding aforesaid; that said Bethuel and Rachel are illiterate persons, not being able to read or write, and ever since the loss of the premises have been poor and without means to prosecute a suit for the same, while the defendant, by his position and influence in the county, has made it difficult, if not impossible, for them to assert their rights in the local tribunals with effect; that in September, 1874, said Rachel commenced a suit against the defendant, in the circuit court of Polk county, to recover the premises, but the same was afterwards dismissed by her, and the premises, on April 7, 1875, as aforesaid, conveyed to the plaintiff, her son-in-law, for a valuable consideration, with the expectation and understanding that the plaintiff would bring a suit in this court to recover the premises; and such plaintiff thereby became, and now is, the owner of whatever right and interest therein the Doves then had; that at the date of the purchase of the premises by the defendant—March 5, 1864—the currency, or United States legal tenders, paid by him, was only worth, in gold coin, sixty-five cents on the dollar—seven hundred and ninety-six dollars and twenty-five cents—and that the premises were then worth not less than two thousand dollars in gold coin, and probably three thousand dollars, and are now worth, exclusive of improvements, not less than ten thousand dollars; that the defendant was allowed to purchase the property for a sum so far below its real value, because he was well known in the community as the attorney and friend of the Doves, and was very naturally understood to be acting in their behalf; and that the sum due to the defendant, in coin, on account of this transaction, on January 1, 1879, is as follows: Paid on land March 5, 1864, seven hundred and ninety-six dollars and twenty-five cents; interest thereon at ten per centum for fourteen years, nine months and twenty-five days, eleven hundred and seventy-nine dollars and ninety-seven cents; taxes paid on land, two hundred dollars; present value of permanent improvements placed thereon, one thousand dollars; total, three thousand one hundred and seventy-six dollars and twenty-two cents; and that he is chargeable thereon as follows: Rent of premises from January 1, 1866, to January 1, 1879, thirteen years, at two hundred and fifty dollars a year, three thousand two hundred and fifty dollars; interest thereon at rate aforesaid, one thousand nine hundred and fifty dollars; cash received, July 26, 1864, two hundred dollars; interest on the same at the rate aforesaid, for fourteen years and five months, two hundred and eighty dollars and thirty-three cents; total, five thousand six hundred and eighty dollars and thirty-three cents; balance against defendant, two thousand five hundred and four dollars and eleven cents; from all of which it appears that the defendant has been long since repaid the money advanced to the Doves, and also his subsequent expenses in connection with his occupation of the premises.

The evidence is conflicting concerning some of these conclusions of fact but the truth is generally apparent, notwithstanding. I do not propose to discuss it in detail, but there are one or two points that justify some special attention. As to the circumstances concerning the preparation and execution of the mortgage there is a direct conflict between the testimony of the Doves and that of the defendant and his witness, Reason R. Boothby. The contradiction can hardly be explained upon the theory of a failure of memory or an unintentional mistake, and therefore it almost necessarily involves willful falsehood.

At the date of the transaction the defendant was living on his donation claim a few miles north of the Doves while Boothby lived at Eola, about half way between them. The Doves swear unqualifiedly that Hayden came to their house and prepared the mortgage there, using Ford's notes of the claim survey which they had, in describing the premises, and left it with them, saying he would send Boothby—a justice of the peace—down to take their acknowledgment; that Boothby came down the next day or two, when they executed and acknowledged the instrument.

On the contrary Hayden swears both in his answer and testimony that he never wrote a line of the mortgage and don't know who did—that he never advised it or knew anything about it until some time after the execution. Boothby testifies that he wrote the mortgage including the names of the mortgagors thereto—Bethuel and Rachel Dove—in short, that he wrote every word of the instrument, except the names of the attesting witnesses—George Bolter and Theodore Ingalls.

The Doves, although not parties in interest, are not disinterested witnesses by any means, while the defendant is deeply interested in the result in both property and character. Boothby does not appear to be a person of any particular character or standing. During the past twenty years he appears to have lived from place to place in Oregon and Washington, for the most part east of the Cascades, and is a painter by trade.

A very satisfactory solution of this problem is furnished by an inspection and comparison of the writings on the mortgage with one another and with that on the receipt of July 26, 1864; and also the signatures of the defendant and said Boothby to their evidence given before the examiner in this cause.

The mortgage bears upon its face indubitable evidence that Boothby's story is untrue—that he never wrote a word of the mortgage except the certificate of acknowledgment and his signature thereto, as an attesting witness. In the first place, Boothby's story and that of the defendant do not agree, for while the latter says he knew nothing about the making of the mortgage, the former said he went to Dove's to attend to his business at the request of the defendant who then furnished him with a blank form upon which to write the mortgage and a prepared description of the premises.

The mortgage is upon a printed form of a deed of bargain and sale. The body of it contains twenty-two lines, which are written or mostly in writing, and the certificate six such lines, beside the signature of Boothby. The handwriting of the body of the instrument and the certificate are both unskillful, but quite uniform and marked in character and radically different. It is safe to say, they were never written by the same person. The difference in the capital Rs, Bs, Ds, Ps and figure 9s is very noticeable. But this is not all. In the body of the instrument the name Rachel is incorrectly spelled with an "ae" in the last syllable, while in the certificate it is spelled in such syllable with an "a" only. Bethuel is spelled correctly in the body of the instrument, but in the certificate it is spelled without an "e" in the first syllable. It is also apparent that this name was first written in the certificate as "B-huel" and then before completion corrected into "B-thuel," by making the loop of an "h" upon the m stroke or lower part of the first "h," and thus converting the latter into a "t." But the loop of the second "h" did not come down directly upon the m stroke of the first one, but at an angle, on the outside, thus leaving the process of emendation quite apparent.

The signatures of Bethuel and Rachel Dove to the mortgage were evidently written by the subscribing witness, George Bolter, who wrote a plain, bold, round hand, as unlike that in the body of the instrument or the certificate as light and darkness.

Again, the words in the condition of the mortgage—"according to the tenor and effect of a certain promissory note," and the words "and fifty" in the premises of the deed immediately following the words "fifteen hundred," and the word "their" in the concluding clause are in a very different writing from the rest of the instrument. They are written in a skilled hand with different ink, and upon comparison with the indorsement in red ink on the back of the instrument, showing when and where it was recorded, appear to be the writing of Mr. Lucien Heath, the then recorder of Polk county and secretary of state elect.

The second and third of these insertions merely supply manifest omissions, while the first only formally expresses what would otherwise be implied from what was already expressed. Before this interlineation, the condition read: "This conveyance is intended as a mortgage to secure the payment of the sum of fifteen hundred and fifty dollars," all but the words in italics being printed, and continued thus: "The note executed by Bethuel Dove," etc., putting "the note" in apposition with "the sum of fifteen hundred and fifty dollars," which is represented. The interlineation "according to the tenor," etc, was placed between the words "dollars" and "note" aforesaid, and the pen drawn through the "The" before the word "note."

As it does not appear that Mr. Heath was present when the mortgage was executed, it is probable that these interlineations were made by him at the county seat, Dallas, when the instrument was taken there by Dove, or other person, to obtain the money from the county treasurer, and was delivered to him for record.

Attention is called to these interlineations and insertions after the execution of the instrument, not to suggest that any wrong was committed or intended thereby, but to show the incorrectness of Boothby's testimony, who deliberately and repeatedly swore that he wrote every written word in the instrument except the signatures of Bolter and Ingalls, the subscribing witnesses.

Neither is this all. Boothby swears in effect that he took a clean blank with him to Dove's on March, 1859, upon which he then and there wrote this mortgage, and it is very certain that this is not so. The mortgage reads: "This indenture, made this second day of March, A. D. 1859," the words "second" and "March," and the figure "9" being in writing. But upon examination it plainly appears that in place of these words there was first written "twenty-sixth" and "February," the latter words being partially erased, and the former written over and in place of them. Neither were the words "second" and "March" written by Boothby, but probably by Bolter, who appears to have been the best penman that made a mark upon the paper, unless it was Heath, while the words "twenty-sixth" and "February" appear to have been written by the person who wrote the body of the instrument. The coincidences are most convincing, but one is almost demonstrative. The letter "x" in "twenty-sixth" is formed by two perpendicular curved lines with their convex sides approaching and connected by a hyphen or horizontal line, thus)-(. According to my observation it is a very singular formation of the letter, and an almost certain mark of identification. The only other written "x" in the instrument is found in the body of it, in the word "executed," and that is made in precisely the same way.

But the fact of the alteration of the date is a very significant one. It not only tends to prove that Boothby did not write the instrument as alleged, but also that it was drafted, as the Doves testify, by some one other than Boothby before the day of its execution, only the time was four days instead of one or two as they remember it.

The instrument having been drafted on February 26, when the parties came to execute and acknowledge it before Boothby, on March 2, it would naturally occur to some one that the date ought to be corrected, and so the words "twenty-sixth" and "February" were changed to "second" and "March," but not so as to prevent the paper from revealing to the microscope, and even the naked eye, the truth of the transaction.

From these facts, and the striking similarity between the writing in the body of the mortgage and that in the receipt of July 26, which is admitted to be the defendant's, as well as his signature to the examination, it is morally certain that the defendant wrote the mortgage as the Doves testify. The receipt is more than five years later in time than the mortgage; but making some allowance for the careless way in which the former is written, as compared with the latter—it being necessary to write somewhat closely and small to get the matter in the spaces left in the blank—and for some freedom of hand acquired in the meantime, as well as the difference in pen, ink and paper, the writings are very like. All the peculiarities of style—and they are many and marked—observable in the one are apparent in the other. The capital Rs, Bs, Ps and Ds are very notable instances. The terminal ds are uniformly made with an upward and outward curl from the o, instead of a stem, while the middle ones are just as constantly made with a stem, which is well detached from the body of the o—the latter being open. The figure 8 in the two writings is very singular, and "they are like as two black-eyed peas." The s, the ps, the words "Dove," "hundred," "land," "claim"—in short, the whole face and expression of the one is exhibited in the other.

In this connection it may be also mentioned that at the taking of the evidence before the examiner, this receipt was mislaid and supposed to be lost, and counsel for the plaintiff put in a paper which he testified was a true copy. The defendant being examined afterwards in his own behalf, and while it was thought the original was lost, swore unqualifiedly that it did not contain the final words, "the land known as Mrs. Dove's half of donation land claim;" and that it was for two hundred dollars, "to be applied on land purchased by me at sheriff sale," omitting the words in italic, "to be applied on purchase of land purchased by me," etc. Subsequently the receipt was found and produced and read on the hearing.

Next, as to the agreement or understanding between the defendant and the Doves concerning the purchase and redemption of the premises. All the circumstances, and particularly the payment of the two hundred dollars, and the receipt therefor, tend strongly to show that the defendant bid in the property at the sheriff's sale, as the attorney and friend, and for the benefit of the Doves, and that they were to remain in possession and have the benefit of the use and occupation of the place to enable them to repay him the purchase-money with interest; and also that the defendant after a time conceived the design—lucri causa—to ignore his relation and understanding with the Doves, and claim the property as his own. The apparent excuse for this breach of faith was, that these poor, old, unfortunate people would never be able to repay him, and to make sure of this, he did what he could to prevent them from so doing, by depriving them in the meantime of the use and possession of the property.

The defendant pretends that the agreement to redeem was made at the date of the receipt, and not before; and that he did not believe, at the time, that the Doves would be able to perform it, and therefore he made the further conditions that if the redemption was not completed within a year from the date, that is, by March 5 next following, the agreement should be at an end, and the two hundred dollars then paid on it be retained by him as rent of the premises for such year. But with this statement the known and undisputed facts of the case are at variance. The receipt itself is directly opposed to it. If such was the agreement, why does it not appear in this writing? and especially, why does it not contain some reference to the alleged conditions, that the redemption was to be made within eight months from that date, and if not, that the two hundred dollars then paid should be retained by the defendant as rent? The defendant is an attorney, and a person of shrewdness and experience. These provisions are altogether in his favor, and it was his interest to preserve the evidence of them. While he was writing the memorandum, a few words, more or less, would have expressed them. The Doves, according to his statement, had no rights in the premises as against him, and so far as terms are concerned, were at his mercy. But the language actually used in the writing is also contradictory of the defendant's statement. The receipt is not simply for two hundred dollars received by the defendant on account of land then sold the Doves, or then purchased back by them from him. On the contrary, it is in terms and effect for two hundred dollars, to be applied on purchase of Mrs. Dove's land theretofore purchased by the defendant at sheriff's sale. To be applied on what purchase? Why, manifestly, the purchase made at the sheriff's sale, thus suggesting distinctly what the Doves assert, that the land, though purchased at such sale by the defendant in his own name, was, in fact, purchased for them, and was in equity and good conscience, their purchase. Upon no other theory of the facts can effect be given to this word "purchase" in the receipt, or its use therein satisfactorily accounted for. Indeed, some such view of the matter must have suggested itself to the mind of the defendant, for he could not remember, when it was thought the receipt was lost, that it stated that the money was to be applied on the purchase of Mrs. Dove's land-claim, and swore to the best of his recollection that these words were not in the receipt; and by way of giving emphasis and weight to his testimony in this respect, swore that he had seen the receipt, and scrutinized it closely, since this matter was placed in the hands of counsel.

As to the value of currency at the date of the sheriff's sale, I have consulted the contemporaneous quotations of the price of gold and find that legal tenders were then worth, in Portland, sixty-five cents on the dollar, which makes the amount advanced by the defendant, in gold, seven hundred and ninety-six dollars and twenty-five cents. The only testimony upon this point was that of the defendant and Dove, the former stating that they were worth about seventy-five cents and the latter fifty cents; but he also states, what he was more likely to remember, that the amount to be repaid the defendant was about seven hundred dollars in coin.

As to the value of the property in 1864, the testimony is very conflicting, the opinions varying from seven hundred dollars to four thousand dollars in coin. Much of it is unsatisfactory, and some of it utterly incredible; as for instance, that it was not worth more than two dollars per acre. In a country where land is the foundation of society, and agriculture the chief occupation of the people, a certain amount of knowledge upon this subject is common to most persons, and in considering this question it cannot be overlooked that this property is the half of a donation claim selected in 1848, and therefore probably choice land and favorably situated; that it lies very near the Willamette river, within a few miles of the capital of the state; that with any kind of cultivation, much of it will produce at least twenty bushels of wheat and forty bushels of oats to an acre, one year with another, and that probably it has not, since 1851, been held at a less value than ten dollars per acre, and under favorable circumstances, might have been sold for that at most any time since. In arriving at this conclusion, weight has been given to the fact that in 1859 the property was accepted by the county treasurer of Polk county, as sufficient security for one thousand five hundred and fifty dollars, in coin, payable within three years, with twelve per centum interest. From this fact it must have been valued at about three thousand dollars; and I have no doubt but that was what it was then generally considered worth. And this shows that the inadequacy of the consideration advanced by the defendant, was very marked, it being at most a little over one third its real value, an inadequacy "so gross and manifest as to shock the conscience."

It has been suggested that the price paid, one thousand two hundred and twenty-five dollars, in currency, was credited on the decree against the Doves at par, and therefore the defendant ought to be considered as having advanced that much for them in coin or its equivalent.

So far as Rachel Dove is concerned, a sufficient answer to this suggestion is found in the fact that the decree against her, so far as it was in personam and for money, was void. She was not indebted to the county. She did not join with her husband in the note for the loan; and if she had, being a married woman, the act would have been a nullity. Norton v. Meader [Case No. 10,351]; Dick v. Hamilton [Id. 3,890]. By the mortgage she pledged her property for her husband's debt, and by its sale on the decree it was discharged from the lien.

The parties seem to have acted upon the theory that the husband had no interest in the wife's land. But this was a mistake. Bethuel Dove was seised of an estate for his life in the donation of his wife by virtue of the marriage. Starr v. Hamilton [Id. 13,314]; Wythe v. Smith [Id. 18,122]. But even as to the husband, if the defendant acted for him in making the purchase, the advantage, if any, accrued to the former and not the latter. Between them, the question is, not what effect did the payment of the currency have upon the decree, but what did it cost the defendant? What did he advance? McDowell v. Milroy, 69 Ill. 500.

Upon this state of facts, and leaving out of view, for the present, that the defendant was also the attorney of the Doves at the date of this transaction, the law implies a trust between the defendant and them. His conduct being inequitable and unjust, and involving a gross breach of the special trust and confidence reposed in him by the Doves to their serious injury and his corresponding advantage, equity will treat him as a trustee of the property thus wrongfully acquired, and hold him liable accordingly. 1 Perry, Trusts, §§ 166, 168; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1254, 1261, 1265; 3 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 139; Gaines v. Chew, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 649. This is a case of constructive trust, a trust arising out of the misconduct of the defendant, and does not depend upon the existence of a writing. It is without the statute of frauds, and the facts constituting it may be shown by parol. 1 Perry, Trusts, § 85; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1531; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 266; Jenkins v. Eldridge [Case No. 7,266]. This being so, there is no doubt but that the Doves had an interest in the premises at the date of their conveyance to the plaintiff. In addition to the authority cited on the hearing of the demurrer upon this point, reference is made to Perry on Trusts (section 227) where it is said: "The right of a party who has been defrauded of the title to his land, is not a mere right of action to set the deed aside, but it is an equitable estate in the land itself, which may be sold, assigned, conveyed and devised. In the view of a court of equity, he is still the owner of the estate, subject to repay whatever money or other property he may have received from the fraudulent grantee."

But it is contended for the defendant, that this suit is barred by the lapse of time. That the plaintiff or those under whom he claims have been guilty of laches—have slept upon their rights.

In the consideration of purely equitable rights and titles, courts of equity act in analogy to the statute of limitations, but are not bound by it. As was said in this court in Hall v. Russell [Case No. 5,943]: "When an action upon a legal title to land would be barred by the statute, courts of equity will apply a like limitation to suits founded upon equitable rights to the same property. So, in cases of implied or constructive trusts, when it is sought for the purpose of maintaining the remedy, to force upon the defendant the character of a trustee, courts will apply the same limitation as provided for actions at law." Citing Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 176; Miller v. McIntyre, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 66; Beaubien v. Beaubien, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 207; to which may be added Wisner v. Ogden [Case No. 17,914]; Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. 110; and Michoud v. Girod, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 560. Apply this rule to this case, and this suit may be maintained at any time within twenty years from the fall of 1865, the time when the defendant finally repudiated the arrangement with the Doves and wrongfully took possession of the premises, that being the period limited by statute for the commencement of an action at law therefor.

But where the trust is constructive and also arises out of the fraud of the defendant, there does not appear to be any fixed rule upon the subject. The matter is left to the equitable discretion of the court to be decided in each case according to its nature and circumstances, subject to the qualification that diligence must be used to establish a trust by implication, and that equity will not aid a party to enforce such a trust when the demand is stale or where there has been long acquiescence in the wrong. 1 Perry, Trusts, § 228.

Periods ranging from fifty to seventeen years have been held to be a bar, and under other circumstances a delay of from eleven to eighteen years has been held to be no bar. Perry, Trusts, § 229. In Michoud v. Girod, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 561, where the matter was thoroughly examined, Mr. Justice Wayne says: "Within what time a constructive trust will be barred, must depend upon the circumstances of the case. Boone v. Chiles, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 178. There is no rule in equity which excludes the consideration of circumstances, and, in a case of actual fraud, we believe no case can be found in the books in which a court of equity has refused to give relief within the life-time of either of the parties upon whom the fraud is proven, or within thirty years after it has been discovered or becomes known to the party whose rights are affected by it."

This suit was commenced within eleven years, and the one in Polk county within nine years from the time the defendant took possession of the premises and disavowed the understanding and obligation under which he acquired the legal title, so that in any view of the matter there is no ground on which to rest a claim that this suit is barred by lapse of time, or that the demand is stale, or the wrong long acquiesced in. Indeed, considering the circumstances of the case, and the unequal condition of the parties, the court would not be justified in refusing relief upon the case made, if twenty years had elapsed from the commission of the wrong.

But the decision of this case can be put upon higher and safer ground than the contracts and understandings of the parties, which are liable to both misrepresentation and misapprehension.

If the defendant was the attorney of the Doves at the time he bid in this property, he must be considered as acting for them, and he is liable to them therefor as their trustee, unless he can show satisfactorily that he has purchased for himself with his clients' consent, and that the transaction was in every respect fair, and not to their disadvantage. The presumption is against him, and the burden of proof is upon him; and if his interest as a purchaser may conflict with his duty as an attorney, the sale will be held void, or the attorney charged as a trustee, at the option of the client. This rule is alike necessary to preserve the dignity and integrity of the legal profession, and to protect the interests of a dependent and confiding clientage; and in the enforcement of it courts will not hesitate, because the injury to the client does not fully appear, or a positive intention on the part of the attorney to gain an advantage is not shown. This statement of the law will be found fully supported by the following authorities, some of which go even beyond it, and hold that a purchase by an attorney of the subject of litigation cannot be maintained against the client under any circumstances. 1 Perry, Trusts, § 166; Case v. Carroll, 35 N. Y. 388; Harper v. Perry, 28 Iowa, 60; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 312, 313; Berrien v. McLane, 1 Hoff. Ch. 428; Cutts v. Salmon, 5 Eng. Law & Eq. 95, 12 Eng. Law & Eq. 317; Ward v. Carttar, L. R. 1 Eq. 29; De Rose v. Fay, 3 Edw. Ch. 389, 4 Edw. Ch. 44; Trotter v. Smith, 59 Ill. 244; Howell v. Baker, 4 Johns. Ch. 120; Hess v. Voss, 52 Ill. 481; Wade v. Pettibone, 11 Ohio, 60; Nesbit v. Lockman, 34 N. Y. 169; McDowell v. Milroy, 69 Ill. 500; Hawley v. Cramer, 4 Cow. 730; 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 203; Evans v. Ellis, 5 Denio, 643; Weeks, Attys. at Law, §§ 273 et seq.

The already great length of this opinion precludes any citation from these authorities, but the following paragraph from Case v. Carroll, supra, is so exactly in point and so sound in doctrine and clear in expression that it may be cited notwithstanding:

"It is a settled principle of equity, that no person, who is placed in the situation of trust or confidence in reference to the subject of the sale, can be a purchaser of the property on his own account. And this principle is not confined to a particular class of persons, such as guardians, trustees or solicitors, but it is a rule of universal application to all persons coming within its principle, which is, that no party can be permitted to purchase an interest when he has a duty to perform inconsistent with the character of a purchaser."

But it is contended that the defendant was not the attorney of the Doves at the time of the purchase. It is admitted, however, that he was the general attorney of the husband, and it is not seriously contended that he was not such attorney for the wife also, through the agency of the husband, so far as she needed one. It is also admitted that he was the husband's attorney in the foreclosure suit; and finally upon the hearing the quibble that he was not the wife's attorney also in such suit, was frankly abandoned. And this accords with the record, which states unequivocally that he appeared for both, though the demurrer filed by him, or the transcript of it, states that "the above-named defendant"—in the singular—comes by B. Hayden, etc. But who is "the above-named defendant?" The reference is to the title of the cause in the beginning of the demurrer, and that reads, "J. Emmens, Treas. of Polk County v. Bethuel and Rachel Dove, Defts.," so that if there is any ground for saying that this demurrer was made by the defendant, for either of them rather than both, it is the wife who is expressly named in full, and who was the principal party in interest. But the omission of the s from the word defendant, in the body of the demurrer, is undoubtedly a mere clerical misprision and unworthy of serious contention or further consideration.

But it is claimed that the defendant ceased to be the attorney of the Doves from and after the date of the decree of sale in the foreclosure suit, or at most at the expiration of sixty days thereafter—the time then allowed for an appeal to the supreme court.

This sale, being made in a suit in equity, was a judicial one, and so in effect are all sales made upon execution in this state—that is, it was not made absolutely, but subject to the approval of the court which might upon the objection of the defendant set it aside, if it apeared that there were "substantial irregularities in the proceedings" concerning the same, to his probable loss or injury. Civ. Code Or. §§ 293, 413. If, then, the relation between the defendant and the Doves, of attorney and client, had not ceased before this sale, the defendant could not become a purchaser thereat on his own account, without raising a conflict between his duty and his interest. It was his duty to examine the circumstances of this sale and if he found good cause, to object to its confirmation. The property was sold for not more than one third its value. There is satisfactory testimony in the case that a neighbor intended to make the property bring at least the amount of the decree and costs, but learning that the defendant was going to bid for Mrs. Dove, and having sympathy for her, he generously forebore. But this was an irregularity which ought to have avoided the sale. The loss was a direct injury to Dove, who was left personally liable for so much of the decree as the sale of property ought to have satisfied, but did not. But the defendant, as he was situated, could not or would not bring this matter before the court, because, if he purchased for Dove, as was the understanding, his clients were satisfied, while if he purchased for himself, as he now claims, his interest would prevent it.

How or why the defendant ceased to be the attorney of the Doves before this sale is not shown, nor can it be. It is not claimed that there was any change of attorney or any agreement or understanding that his services were to stop short of the final determination of the matter, which was not the mere entry of the order of sale, but the final confirmation.

By the law of this state an attorney has authority to bind his client in any of the proceedings in a suit by an agreement. Civ. Code, § 1007. And he may be changed before the final determination thereof by consent, of record, or the order of the court. Id. § 1010.

As has been shown, the final determination of the proceeding in question was the order confirming the sale. It is not pretended that there was any change of attorney between the order and confirmation of sale, as provided by statute or anywise.

Still it is insisted that in some undefined and occult way the defendant dropped out of the case before the sale, and was thereafter a stranger to the proceeding. Suppose the defendant had not purchased and had signed a stipulation consenting to a re-sale, or had appeared in court and objected to the sale, would it have been necessary to enter his appearance anew as upon a first retainer, or would the court or opposing counsel have presumed or thought of asking for his authority to appear in the proceeding for his confirmation of the sale, in the suit in which he had appeared and acted as the defendant's attorney, in the preparation and hearing of the cause?

It seems to me that the matter is too plain for argument. The defendant was the attorney of the Doves when he made the purchase, and in so doing, if he purchased for himself, as he now claims, he put his duty to them in conflict with his interest as such purchaser, to the manifest injury of his clients, and therefore they have a right to treat the sale as void, or to hold him to account, as their trustee. If, on the other hand, he purchased it for them, as I find from the evidence he did, then of course he is their agent and trustee and bound to account to them as such.

The conclusions here stated, have not been lightly or hastily reached. But they are the result of a thorough examination of the case, and a full and careful consideration of the questions involved in it, after able and instructive arguments by the learned counsel, who appeared for the parties, particularly for the defendant. I now announce them with reasonable confidence in their conformity to the law and justice of the case, and with the comfortable assurance that if they are otherwise the defendant can appeal to so exalted a tribunal as the supreme court of the United States for their correction.

The decree of the court will be, that the defendant, within sixty days, convey the premises to the plaintiff by a good and sufficient deed, with proper covenants against his own acts, to be prepared and settled before the master of this court, and at the same time deliver possession of the premises, and that defendant within the same time pay the plaintiff his costs in this suit expended, and that in default thereof, execution issue therefor.

[NOTE. The defendant took the case, on appeal, to the supreme court where the decree of the court below was reversed and the case remanded, with a direction that the bill should be dismissed for want of jurisdiction and without prejudice to any other action in a proper court. 106 U. S. 586, 1 Sup. Ct. 617.]

Case No. 9,044.

MANNING v. HOOVER.

[Abb. Adm. 188; [1] 12 Betts, D. C. MS. 5.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1848.

CARRIERS — SHORTAGE — NO BILL OF LADING — AMOUNT SHIPPED—MODE OF ASCERTAINING QUANTITY.

1. A shipper of a cargo of grain who takes no bill of lading from the carrier, is bound, in an action brought to recover for short delivery, to prove the amount delivered by him to the carrier to be transported.

[Cited in The Pietro G., 38 Fed. 149.]

2. A variance between the amount of a cargo of grain as stated in the measurer's bill in lading it on board, and the amount of such cargo as ascertained on delivery at the port of consignment, may be explained by showing that the mode of ascertaining the quantity is such that similar variations are necessarily of frequent occurrence.

Compare Manchester v. Milne [Case No. 9,007].

This was a libel in personam, by Still Manning against Norman C. Hoover, owner of the sloop Cornet, to recover damages for nonperformance of a contract of affreightment. It appeared, in this case, that the libellant was the owner of 1857 bushels of corn, and 76 bushels of wheat, stored at the city of Brooklyn. The defendant contracted to carry the grain in his sloop to the city of New York, at a specified price per bushel. He received the corn on board his vessel, and was paid freight for the whole quantity; but the quantity actually delivered by him at New York, as there measured by weight, was only 1759 bushels, 24 lbs., thus leaving a deficiency of 97 bushels; to recover for which this action was brought. The defence was, that under the circumstances of the case, the loss was to be attributed, not to any default on the part of the vessel, but to inaccuracy of measurement, and to waste necessarily incidental to the lading and unlading of such a cargo. The evidence upon this point is fully stated in the opinion.

D. McMahon, Jr., for libellant.

I. It is unnecessary for the libellant to show negligence on the part of the carrier. It is sufficient to show the shipment of a certain quantity, and it is for the carrier to show either a complete delivery or an excuse by vis major. He is liable for all thefts, robberies, and embezzlements by any of the crew, or by any other person, although he may have exercised every possible vigilance to prevent the loss. Story, Bailm. 528. And the mere fact that the owner or his servants go with the goods, if the other circumstances of the case do not exclude the custody of the carrier, will not of itself exempt him from responsibility. Id. 533.

II. The master and owners of a ship are responsible for the goods which they have undertaken to carry, if stolen or embezzled by the crew, or any other person, though no fault or negligence may be imputable to them. Schieffelin v. Harvey, 6 Johns. 170.

III. The master and owners of vessels who undertake to carry goods for hire are liable as common carriers, whether the transportation be from port to port within the state, or beyond sea, at home or abroad; and they are answerable as well by the marine law as the common law, for all loss not arising from inevitable accident, or such as could not be foreseen or prevented. Elliott v. Rossell, 10 Johns. 1; Kemp v. Coughtry, 11 Johns. 107; McArthur v. Sears, 21 Wend. 190.

IV. Where the goods are embezzled or lost during the voyage, the master is bound to answer for the value of the goods missing, according to the clear net value of goods of like kind and quantity at the port of delivery. Watkinson v. Laughton, 8 Johns. 213.

V. If freight be paid in advance, and the goods be not carried by reason of any event not imputable to the shipper, it may be recovered back. Watson v. Duykinck, 3 Johns. 335.

VI. In an action for the non-delivery of goods, pursuant to a contract of affreightment, the measure of damages is the value of the goods at the port of destination, but without interest, unless there has been fraud or misconduct on the part of the defendant. Amory v. McGregor, 15 Johns. 24, 38.

BETTS, District Judge. Assuming the subject-matter of this action to be within the cognizance of this court, the question upon the merits is whether the respondent is chargeable for the quantity of grain represented in the bill of measurement to have been delivered on board his vessel for transportation. The evidence shows that the respondent had no agency in measuring or weighing the grain when put on board, or at its unlading and delivery. The libellant employed his own agents to transact that business at each end of the voyage. The owners of the store where the grain was on storage would not permit the measurer employed by the libellant to make the weight or measure of the corn; their clerk measured it and kept his own tally, and by his certificate or return of weight and measure it appeared that there was put on board the lighter the quantity in bushels claimed by the libellant.

The statute of this state fixes the legal capacity of the bushel by measurement (1 Rev. St., 2d Ed., c. 621, § 19), and the weight of corn which shall constitute a bushel at fifty-six pounds. Id. § 40. The contract for the carriage of this cargo was by the bushel. No bill of lading appears to have been executed, but the certificate or account rendered by the warehouseman of the quantity of corn delivered to the vessel was accepted and acted upon as accurate by the parties, in paying and receiving the freight for its transportation.

[1] [Reported by Abbott Brothers.]

The method commonly pursued in this port by dealers in grain for ascertaining the quantity, (and which was adopted substantially in this case,) is to measure it in a half-bushel by tale, tallying at each count of five measures, and to weigh one measure out of ten tallies, or one bushel out of every hundred measured, or other assumed proportion. The multiplication of the sum of the tales by fifty-six is assumed to show the quantity of bushels contained in the mass. The warehouseman refused in this case to permit the corn to be measured and weighed by any person except his own weighers. The libellant employed a measurer of grain to attend for him at the warehouse where this grain was stored and see to its delivery. He was present, and overlooked the tallies of the measures and weights as they were taken from the measurers and entered by the clerk of the warehouse, during the delivery of four or five hundred bushels, and saw that they were correctly stated by him. The residue of the delivery was made by the warehouseman alone.

The cargo was also unladen at New York, from the lighter, under the superintendence of the libellant's agents only.

It is fully proved that this compound method of measurement never works out a perfect concurrence in the two results. There is invariably a difference between the quantity given by the tales of measurement and the product in weight so obtained, at times amounting to an important per centage, but more usually not exceeding about five per cent. The evidence discloses several cases of that difference. The grain is shovelled into the measure by laborers, and then a measurer strikes or evens the measure. When the grain is thrown in heavily by the shoveller, or is shaken strongly or evened loosely by the measurer in striking, the weight of the full measure will be augmented, as will the measured dimension of the mass be diminished, and consequently, the tale line of the return will be reduced, as it may be unduly increased by an opposite irregularity in filling the measure. A difference of but one pound weight to a bushel, by either mode of manipulation, would create a variance in the computation of 1800 bushels, charged as delivered, of over thirty bushels in actual quantity, not participated in mutually by vendor and vendee, but operating exclusively to the advantage of one alone. These differences are usually made to harmonize by pound allowances or estimates, and that method may be fair enough where both parties have been present at the weighing and measuring; but it is governed by no rules or data capable of securing certainty, so as to constitute it a safe law to be enforced against a stranger to the process.

The enumeration of bushels in this case was obtained by compounding the hand-measure in half bushels of the whole bulk, with the weight of the several individual measures, and the sum in pounds, so produced, determined the quantity of bushels in the cargo. This method of determining the quantity was acted upon by both parties in fixing the amount of freight, but is not conclusive between them on the question whether the lighterman delivered to the shipper the whole quantity of grain received on board the vessel; for not only the circumstances stated necessarily lead to uncertainty and variations as to quantity in every measurement made, but moreover, a cargo loaded and discharged in the manner adopted in this case is subject to other causes of wastage and diminution.

After being weighed in the loft of the store, it was, on a windy day, run down to the hold of the sloop in an open pipe or trough exposed to the air. The evidence proves that by thus fanning out the chaff and light matter, a considerable diminution of bulk necessarily ensues, and by reason of this, and of the waste in shovelling and measuring adverted to, there would almost unavoidably be found on delivery a difference between the amount returned as taken on board and the one discharged, even when the same mode of ascertaining the quantity is employed in both instances, and that difference is augmented if the measure alone is used in one case and weight in the other. Some of the witnesses attempted to make out average computations of loss or gain on these heads; but it is obvious that estimates so formed can afford no satisfactory exactness in a given instance; it must be purely matter of conjecture whether under or over five per cent. would be lost.

The respondent proved, by the two men in charge of his vessel, that one of them remained constantly on board the vessel while the grain was there, and that none of it was removed by them or with their knowledge, except by the libellant's agents; and they testify that they do not believe it would have been possible for any to have been taken out of the vessel without their knowledge.

Conceding to the libellant the case in the strongest form in which he places it, that the respondent, as lighterer, stood in the character and assumed the liability of a common carrier, and was responsible for the whole quantity of grain put in his charge, the position must be taken also with the qualification, that he must prove the quantity placed on board, and that less than that quantity was delivered out to him. Both the acts of lading and unlading were his own, to the exclusion of the respondent, and he must prove, beyond reasonable question, that he did not receive from the defendant all the grain delivered on board of his vessel. The evidence on his part may be prima facie sufficient to lay a foundation for the presumption that such is the fact, and that the deficiency arose either from loss in the transportation of the cargo, or from its embezzlement by those in charge of the vessel, or from its unlawful abstraction by others. For losses of that character the respondent would be liable.

The testimony, however, which has been produced by the respondent, removes all the essential grounds for either presumption, and places the case upon the question of the accuracy of the measurement in lading and unlading the cargo. [For it would be most unreasonable to charge the owner for the purloining or embezzling of the grain upon a mere presumption against the positive evidence of those in charge of it as to their own acts, and the equally strong presumptions against its having been taken by others arising from the facts proved by them.] [2]

The case then stands thus: On the supposed quantity of 1857 bushels of corn, charged against the respondent, the defendant has sustained a loss of about 97 bushels, or over five per cent. of deficiency. The measurer employed by the libellant supposes that ordinarily in loading grain by weight, and delivering it by measure, the difference in quantity found would be very slight, and if there were any, it would be ordinarily rather in favor of the carrier. The excess, he thinks, would be about five bushels to the thousand. But he says that shovelling by hand, for the purpose of measurement, will sometimes make a difference against the carrier of about four ounces to the bushel, which a little exceeds five per cent. In this case he found a difference, on delivery, of five bushels, between weight and measure. Another witness, a weigher and measurer by occupation, supposes that 1800 or 1900 bushels of corn, shipped by weight, would usually deliver a less amount by 30 bushels, the quantity being determined in the same manner. If the grain is loaded in a high wind, the blowing out of chaff, he thinks, would lessen the measure considerably. He has never found the same quantity on remeasurement as on the first trial; there would always be some excess or deficiency. As a general rule, he should expect that one thousand bushels loaded by weight would deliver twelve bushels more by measure. According to his experience, the mode of shovelling may easily make a difference of one pound or more to the bushel. A third witness, Mr. Verplanck, proves that the amount put on board was determined by weighing it in lots of twenty-five bushels each. It was weighed by his clerk, without his personal superintendence. It also appears that freight was charged and paid, according to the statement of the quantity made by the weigher.

I think that upon all the proofs, the inference is just as direct and satisfactory that less than the named amount of corn was laden on board the vessel, as that the defendant delivered less than he actually received. In order to charge him with a supposed deficiency, the preponderance of evidence must be decidedly in favor of the libellant, that more grain was laden on his vessel than she delivered on her discharge.

The amount of deficiency being only about five per cent., would hardly justify an inference of misconduct or negligence against the parties sought to be charged therewith; when it may be assumed, upon presumptions equally cogent, that the difference arose from mistakes in computation of weight or measure, in the combined operations of making up the calculation of quantity, or in actual wastage in the process of loading and discharging.

I shall dispose of the case upon this view of the facts, without reference to the question raised as to the jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter. Admitting the jurisdiction of the court, there is not sufficient evidence, in my opinion, to charge the defendant with any loss of corn while on its carriage from Brooklyn to its delivery in New York, and the libel is accordingly dismissed.

The libellant has shown a fair prima facie case on his proofs in the first instance, and I therefore impose no costs upon him. Libel dismissed without costs to either party.

[2] [From 12 Betts, D. C. MS. 5.]

Case No. 9,045.

MANNING v. JAMESSON et al.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 285.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1806.

CONTINUANCE—AFFIDAVITS—COUNTER-AFFIDAVITS.

Counter-affidavits cannot be read on a motion for a continuance of the cause.

[This was a suit by Manning against Jamesson & Young.]

Mr. Taylor, made an affidavit for a continuance. A counter-affidavit was read, but THE COURT said they would not consider the reading of it as a precedent.

Case No. 9,046.

MANNING v. LOWDERMILK.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 282.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1805.

CONTRACTS—TO SHARE COMMISSIONS—EVIDENCE—PROOF OF RECEIPT.

Delivery of the cargo to the owners, by the supercargo, is evidence of his receipt of his commissions in an action against him by a third person, who is entitled to a share of those commissions.

Money had and received. The evidence was a verbal agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant to share the commissions on the sales of a cargo in the West Indies, the plaintiff being master, and the defendant supercargo. There was no special agreement stated in the declaration; and there was no evidence that the defendant had actually received the commissions.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Key, for defendant. The plaintiff must prove money actually received by the defendant, or must give in evidence such an instrument as the law makes evidence of money had and received.

Mr. Morsell, for plaintiff. The defendant had a lien on the goods or the money for his commissions; and if he relinquished that lien without the assent of the plaintiff, he ought to be liable.

Mr. Mason, on the same side. Actual receipt of money, in numero, is not absolutely necessary. If I sell another man's horse and receive corn in payment, he may bring and support this action. If I sell the horse for cash on credit, and receive payment in corn, it lies. The receipt of the purchase-money for the flour, was a receipt of his commissions. The motion is to instruct the jury that the plaintiff cannot recover in this form of action, unless the money was actually received, or such evidence is produced as will prevent the defendant from denying the receipt of the money.

The opinion of THE COURT was, that the jury must be satisfied that the defendant received the money, but that the delivery of the inward cargo to the owners, without the consent of the plaintiff, is evidence of the defendant's receipt of his commissions, which the defendant in this case ought not to be permitted to deny.

KILTY, Chief Judge, absent.

Case No. 9,047.

MANNY v. DUNLAP.

[Woolw. 372;[1] 3 West. Jur. 329; 17 Pittsb. Leg. J. 11.]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. May Term, 1869.

AGENCY TO PROCURE INSURANCE — VERBAL CONTRACT—LIABILITY—NEGLIGENCE—SUBROGATION.

1. A direction by a principal to his agent to procure a policy of insurance is not satisfied by a verbal contract for insurance.

2. If an agent has undertaken to procure insurance, but has done it so negligently that a loss which occurs is not covered by the policy, he is liable to his principal.

[Cited in Marquardt v. French, 53 Fed. 606.]

3. If an agent to procure a policy of insurance merely makes a verbal contract for insurance, and a loss occurs, his principal cannot be put to uncertain and expensive resource of a suit on such contract against the insurer, but the agent must make good the loss.

4. If he have a valid verbal contract, he must pay his principal, when he will be entitled to an assignment of it, or may sue on it in the name of his principal.

This was a motion for a new trial.

[1] [Reported by James M. Woolworth, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

MILLER, Circuit Justice. This is a motion for a new trial, founded on alleged erroneous instructions to the jury. The plaintiff, who was the owner of certain reaping and mowing machines, directed her agent by letter to procure a policy of insurance on them, with specific instructions as to the amount to be insured on each machine, and the time for which the insurance should run. No policy was executed, but the agent, who is defendant in this action, had some conversation with the agent of an insurance company, which, taken in connection with certain arrangements between them concerning money on deposit by one with the other, is claimed by the defendant to constitute a valid contract of insurance.

From the testimony, these facts are quite clear, that after the defendant received orders to insure, and before the machines were burned, about twenty-five days elapsed; that the defendant had available means of plaintiff's with which to pay the premium; and that, at any time during these twenty-five days, if he had called at the office of the insurance agent, and insisted on it, he could have received a policy which would have covered the loss.

The machines having been destroyed by fire, the insurance agent denied that he had made any insurance on them, and, if his testimony in the case is to be credited, he had not. The present action was brought to recover the value of the goods destroyed, and is founded on the neglect of the defendant to effect the insurance which he had been ordered to obtain. The jury were instructed, that if the defendant had money of the plaintiff's with which to pay the premiums, and if he could have done so by the use of reasonable diligence, it was his duty to have insurance made by a written policy of insurance; and that such duty was not performed by a verbal agreement or understanding for insurance between the defendant and the insurance agent. And the court refused to leave it to the jury to say whether a valid verbal contract of insurance had been made, or to consider that question further.

If these rulings are sound, the verdict must stand; if they are erroneous, it should be set aside. In this discussion, I would premise that the defendant received express instructions in writing to procure a "policy of insurance," a form of expression which is not satisfied by any verbal contract, though such contract may possibly be a valid one. I am not inclined to believe that this fact is material, otherwise than as showing that the defendant was without excuse in anything in the language of his instructions. I think that a direction by the owner of property to his agent to insure, would require an insurance by written policy, because that is the usual mode among prudent persons of doing the thing ordered. And I am further of opinion that a court is bound to know judicially that no prudent and ordinarily careful man would for twenty-five days rely upon a verbal agreement for insurance, when, on any day of the twenty-five, he could without trouble or difficulty have received a policy.

The duties of agents are well understood. Those of an agent to procure insurance have been often considered by the courts, and are rigidly enforced. It has been decided in general terms that when an agent has undertaken, or it has become his duty, to insure, and without good reason he has neglected to do so, he is liable for all loss which may occur, that would have been covered by the policy. To this effect, among many other cases, are the following: Wilkinson v. Coverdale, 1 Esp. 75; Morris v. Summerl [Case No. 9,837]; [Ela v. French, 11 N. H. 356].[2]

Again, if the agent has undertaken to effect insurance, and has done it in a manner so negligent or unskilful that a loss which occurs is not covered by the policy, the agent is liable therefor. Story, Ag. § 218; Mallough v. Barber, 4 Camp. 150. In Wilkinson v. Coverdale, above cited, the ground of action was, that defendant having sold plaintiff certain premises, had promised to have his policy renewed for the benefit of his vendee. He did have it renewed, but neglected to have such indorsement made thereon as was necessary to enable the plaintiff to avail himself of it in case of loss. Lord Kenyon was of opinion that there was negligence sufficient to have made the defendant liable, if he had in fact promised to renew for plaintiff's benefit; but no such promise could be shown in proof, and there was a nonsuit. The case, however, shows his lordship's sense of the strict diligence required of one undertaking to procure insurance for another. In Callander v. Oelrichs, 5 Bing. N. C. 58, it appeared that defendants were agents for shipping plaintiff's corn, and undertook to use, and did use, their endeavors to effect insurance according to the instructions of plaintiff. Their efforts were unsuccessful, but they never informed plaintiff of their failure. The wheat was lost, and it was held that the agents were liable to plaintiff for their neglect to notify him of the failure to obtain insurance.

In the case under consideration, plaintiff had a right to insurance effected in the usual safe and secure manner, the more especially as he had instructed his agent to effect it in that manner. When a loss has occurred, the agent cannot be heard to say, "I did not do what you directed, nor as a prudent and cautious man under similar circumstances would do for himself. I departed from your instructions for my own convenience. But I have effected a valid insurance for you, and though its enforcement is uncertain, difficult, and costly, and though the contract is denied by the other party, and I have no other proof than my own oath, I insist on your accepting this as a discharge of my duty, and looking to the insurance company, instead of to me, for indemnity." The plaintiff cannot be thrown upon this uncertain and expensive resource. He had a right to a written contract, which would surely bind the company; and if he has failed to obtain this through the negligence of defendant, the latter must make good the loss. If he has any such valid contract as he alleges, let him pay plaintiff, and he will be entitled to an assignment of it, or to sue on it in plaintiff's name for his own benefit. The result of such a suit will be, as it ought to be, at the risk of defendant.

These views are fully sustained by what was said by Mr. Justice Washington, in the case of De Tastett v. Cronsillat [Case No. 3,828]. "The law," he remarks, "is clear, that if a foreign merchant, who is in the habit of insuring for his correspondent here, receives an order for making an insurance, and neglects to do so, or does so differently from his orders, or in an insufficient manner, he is answerable, not for damages merely, but as if he were himself the underwriter, and he is of course entitled to the premium." The motion for a new trial is overruled, and judgment must be entered on the verdict.

[2] [From 3 West. Jur. 329.]

MANNY (McCORMICK v.). See Case No. 8,724.

MANRO (BALDERSTON v.). See Case No. 793.

MANSANITO, The (SMITH v.). See Case No. 13,075.

Case No. 9,048.

In re MANSFIELD et al.

[6 Ben. 284.][1]

District Court, E. D. New York. Dec., 1872.

BANKRUPTCY—COUNSEL FEES — SERVICES BEFORE ADJUDICATION.

1. A petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed against a firm, an injunction preventing them from parting with any of their property was issued, and a warrant of arrest under the 40th section of the act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 536)] was issued against one of the firm. The bankrupts employed attorneys, who applied for a discharge of the arrest, and attended on a reference to ascertain the facts, which resulted in the discharge of the warrant. An adjudication being had, the attorneys prepared the schedule and inventory required by the 41st section. Thereafter they applied by petition to be paid for such services out of the estate. Held, that, under the circumstances, a moderate compensation for such services would be allowed them.

2. The proper practice, in such a case, is for the bankrupts to apply to the court in the first instance for leave to employ counsel.

In bankruptcy.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The petitioners in this case pray for an allowance out of the bankrupt's estate of the amount of a bill for professional services rendered under the following circumstances: An involuntary petition was filed in this court to have John Mansfield and Nathan K. Mansfield declared bankrupts, and their property administered under the bankrupt act. At the same time an injunction was issued, preventing the bankrupts from parting with any of their property, and also a warrant of arrest under section 10, against Nathan K. Mansfield. These being served, the bankrupts employed the petitioners as attorneys at law, who applied to the court for a discharge of the warrant of arrest, and attended at a reference which was ordered to ascertain the facts, and resulted in the discharge of the warrant after the bankrupt had submitted to an examination touching his property. The petitioners, also, upon the adjudication of bankruptcy being made, prepared the schedule of creditors and inventory of the estate, which is required by section 41, and for these services the attorneys now ask to be paid out of the bankrupts' estate. I incline to the opinion that services performed in preparing the schedules and inventory required by section 41 may be considered as having been rendered for the benefit of the estate, in a case like the present, where the employment of counsel was unquestionably necessary. As to the services made necessary by reason of the arrest of the bankrupt, I think they can also be compensated out of the fund in such a case as this is stated to be. The court was entitled to be aided by counsel on the part of the bankrupt in the examination as to the foundation for the warrant of arrest and its continuance, and the amount of bail to be required. The injunction having deprived the bankrupt of the means to employ counsel, such services may, without injustice, be considered a part of the bankrupt proceedings. They were made necessary by the action of the creditors, and could only be obtained by a resort to the fund. It would have been more proper for the bankrupt to have applied to the court in the first instance for leave to employ counsel, and such previous application should be insisted on, as a general rule. Here it may be dispensed with, the mode of proceeding being unsettled and no question made as to the propriety and necessity of the services in question. But I must require that it be made to appear that the bankrupt is now without means, and that there is no reason to doubt that he has surrendered all his property to the assignee. It must also be shown that the efforts of the counsel were not directed towards obtaining delay or hindering the bankruptcy proceedings. This being made to appear, I shall feel inclined to allow a moderate compensation for services rendered in preparing the schedules and inventory, and those made necessary by reason of the warrant of arrest.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

If not desired otherwise by the assignee, in order to save expense, the facts may be made to appear by affidavits, and the extent and value of the services shown in the same way; but if asked for by the assignee, a reference will be ordered to take proof of the facts.

Case No. 9,049.

In re MANSFIELD.

[6 N. B. R. 388.] [1]

District Court, D. Louisiana. 1872.

BANKRUPTCY — DISCHARGE — DEBT PROVABLE — ELECTION—ASSIGNMENT—RES JUDICATA.

A gave his bond to the United States as security for a certain claim against a vessel. The cause was tried and a decision adverse to the United States rendered. Additional evidence was produced in the circuit court, on appeal, and the decision of the district court was reversed, and a decree of condemnation rendered on the twenty-seventh of May, eighteen hundred and seventy. While proceedings were pending in the circuit court, A. filed his petition in bankruptcy, and was, on the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, discharged from all his debts dischargeable under the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat 517)]. On the eighth of June, eighteen hundred and seventy, the circuit court overruled A's plea of discharge in bar of the claim, and gave judgment against him on the release bond. On the twenty-first of April, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, the secretary of the treasury, for a valuable consideration, transferred the judgment to B., who, on the twenty-seventh of May, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, filed a petition to set aside A's discharge. Held, that when the United States elected to take judgment upon the bond they parted with all right to prove it as a debt due and payable from the bankrupt at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, and as a debt to be proved against the estate; that it is res judicata that this debt is not affected by the discharge, as the judgment is subsisting and operative. Exception sustained and the petition dismissed.

[Cited in Bourne v. Maybin, Case No. 1,700.]

[Cited in Boynton v. Ball, 105 Ill. 630. Cited in brief in Bowen v. Eichel, 91 Ind. 26.]

In bankruptcy.

J. S. Whittaker, for petitioner.

R. De Gray and J. A. Campbell, for Mansfield.

DURELL, District Judge. On the twenty-third day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, a suit entitled "U. S. v. The Rob Roy" [Case No. 16,179,] was instituted in the then United States district court for the Eastern district of Louisiana, wherein it was sought to forfeit said steamboat and cargo of one thousand one hundred and forty bales of cotton as enemies' property, because said property had been sought for, obtained, and brought on board said steamboat from within territory held in occupation by armed enemies of the United States, "declared to be in a state of insurrection." The boat and cargo were seized, and subsequently released on bond to one A. S. Mansfield, the claimant thereof. The cause was tried in this court, and a decision rendered therein adverse to the United States. Additional evidence having been produced in the circuit court, on appeal, the decision of the district court was reversed, and a decree of condemnation rendered on the twenty-seventh day of May, eighteen hundred and seventy. In the meantime, and while said proceedings were being had in the circuit court, to wit: on or about the first of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, said Mansfield filed his petition in this court, praying to be adjudged a bankrupt, and was so adjudged on the ninth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight. On the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, said Mansfield was, in due course of law, discharged from all debts dischargeable under the bankrupt act. On the third day of May, eighteen hundred and seventy, said Mansfield filed in the circuit court the following plea, in bar to the suit of U. S. v. The Rob Roy [supra], then pending in said court, to wit: "And the said A. S. Mansfield, by his attorneys, avers that, on the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, a discharge was granted him in the words and figures set forth in the duly certified copy of the decree hereto annexed, and made part hereof; and he pleads said discharge as a full and complete bar to this suit wherefore he prays judgment, if the said United States ought to have or maintain the aforesaid action against him."

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

On the twenty-seventh day of May, eighteen hundred and seventy, the judgment of the district court was reversed, the libel sustained, and the Rob Roy and cargo condemned as forfeited to the United States. This judgment fixed the liability of Mansfield under the release bond. On the eighth day of June, eighteen hundred and seventy, the circuit court overruled Mansfield's plea in bar, and gave judgment against him upon the release bond for the sum of two hundred and four thousand nine hundred and eighty-two dollars and twenty-nine cents, with five per cent. interest thereon from the twenty-fourth of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, till paid, and cost of suit. On the twenty-first day of April, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, George S. Boutwell, secretary of the treasury of the United States, for and in consideration of the sum of twenty thousand dollars paid into the treasury of the United States, transferred this second judgment in favor of the United States to Stewart Q. Cochrane, who, by motion, entered and filed in the circuit court, on the twenty-seventh day of May, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, caused himself to be subrogated to all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to said judgment. On the same twenty-seventh of May, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, Cochrane filed a petition in this court in the matter of Asahiel S. Mansfield, a bankrupt, to set aside Mansfield's discharge.

It is not necessary to enumerate the many allegations made and contained in said petition, nor to notice the exceptions taken and answers filed by Mansfield in avoidance of and responsive thereto, except as to the one question: Was the debt set forth in the petition of S. Q. Cochrane provable in the bankruptcy of A. S. Mansfield? Section thirty-four of the bankrupt act provides, "that any creditor or creditors of said bankrupt, whose debt was proved or provable against the estate in bankruptcy, who shall see fit to contest the validity of said discharge on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained, may, at any time within two years after the date thereof, apply to the court which granted it to set aside and annul the same." Under this section Cochrane's petition was filed. Section nineteen provides, "that all debts due and payable from the bankrupt at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, and all debts then existing, but not payable until a future day, a rebate of interest being made, where no interest is payable by the terms of the contract, may be proved against the estate of the bankrupt."

Mansfield was adjudicated a bankrupt on the ninth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight. A decree was entered granting him his discharge on the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine. During all this time, the suit of "the United States against the Rob Roy and her cargo," was pending in the circuit court. It is to be remembered that judgment was rendered in the district court against the United States and in favor of Mansfield, the claimant restoring to him the property libelled, and that said judgment was reversed in the appellate court, on the production of evidence not produced in the lower court. Certainly, during the pendency of the appeal in the circuit court, and until the Rob Roy and cargo were adjudged forfeited to the United States, on the twenty-seventh day of May, eighteen hundred and seventy, there was no semblance of any indebtedness due from Mansfield to the United States, which could have been proved against Mansfield's estate, on the ninth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, the day on which he was adjudicated a bankrupt. Further, the judgment rendered on the twenty-seventh day of May, eighteen hundred and seventy, was not a personal judgment against Mansfield, condemning him to pay any certain sum of money, but a judgment against the Rob Roy and cargo, as forfeited to the United States. In order to obtain a judgment against Mansfield, further proceedings were to be had; and, accordingly, the conditions of the release bond not being complied with, further proceedings were taken upon the bond, which proceedings ripened into a judgment rendered against Mansfield and his sureties in favor of the United States, on the eighth day of June, eighteen hundred and seventy, for two hundred and four thousand nine hundred and eighty-two dollars and twenty cents. It is this judgment which the petitioner, S. Q. Cochrane, holds by assignment from the United States, and which he alleges to be a debt provable in bankruptcy against the estate of A. S. Mansfield, on the ninth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight. It will be seen that Cochrane is not the assignee of the release bond given by Mansfield to the United States, but the assignee of the judgment rendered thereon in favor of the United States, which are two very different things. The nineteenth section of the statute says: "If the bankrupt shall be bound as drawer, indorser, surety, bail, or guarantor upon any bill, bond, note, or any other specialty or contract, or for any debt of another person, and his liability shall not have become absolute until after the adjudication of bankruptcy, the creditor may prove the same, after such liability shall have become fixed, and before final dividend shall have been declared." Now, if we concede that under this clause of the nineteenth section of the statute the liability of Mansfield, as the maker of the release bond, became fixed on the rendition of the judgment of condemnation and forfeiture of the Rob Roy and her cargo, and the noncompliance with the conditions of the release bond, and that the United States might have proved the same against the estate of the bankrupt, yet such concession does not involve the application of the same proposition to the subsequent judgment obtained upon the bond, on the eighth of June, eighteen hundred and seventy, and now held by the petitioner, Cochrane.

Mansfield filed in the circuit court, on the eight of May, eighteen hundred and seventy, a plea in bar founded upon his certificate of discharge. The court, for reasons orally given, overruled the same. Certainly the plea was not a good one if it was intended to bar the right of the United States, under the clause cited from the nineteenth section of the statute, to fix Mansfield's liability upon the release bond given by him March twenty-fourth, eighteen hundred and sixty-five. Neither was the plea in bar a good plea in bar of a judgment sought to be obtained upon the bond, where the creditor elects not to proceed under the clause cited from the nineteenth section of the statute, but to enforce his claim against the bankrupt personally as a debt due upon a liability, which has become fixed long after the bankrupt's surrender and adjudication thereon. The United States elected to pursue the latter course. Let us now see what are the legal consequences of such election:

"When a creditor obtains from his debtor a security of a higher nature than he had before, the original debt is merged in the higher security, and can no longer be made the foundation of any action or suit, or of proof in bankruptcy or insolvency." Lindl. Partn. 368; 10 C. B. 561; Wells & Leovy, 3 McM. & G. 378.

This doctrine has been repeatedly held in Louisiana. In Oakey v. Murphy, 1 La. Ann. 372, the court said: "In this case, which is an action by the holder of a promissory note against the maker, the plaintiff filed a supplemental petition, in which he alleged that a judgment had been rendered in his favor, at the time of the institution of his suit, on the note sued on in the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of Mississippi. On a judgment by default being taken, it was confirmed on the evidence of this judgment rendered in Mississippi. So far from this judgment proving the right of the party to recover on the note, it establishes the reverse, inasmuch as it is a merger of the note. The plaintiff has lost his right of action on the note, and he has no right to amend his petition by an allegation which extinguishes it." The court refers to 9 La. Ann. 419; 2 Mart. (N. S.) 599; and 3 Bl. Comm. 398. See, also, 7 La. Ann. 334; 12 La. Ann. 738.

In Re Williams [Case No. 17,705], the learned judge for the district of Connecticut held, "that a debt, upon which a judgment of law is founded, is merged in the judgment and extinguished by it," citing 27 Me. 441; 32 Me. 418; 2 Cush. 173; 2 Denio, 17, 72; and 11 Cush. 25; 17 Conn. 580. The authorities cited sustain the learned judge in the conclusion to which he arrives. See, also, 6 Hill, 255, where the court says: "The defendant has been discharged, under the bankrupt law, from all debts which he owed at the time he presented his petition. Subsequent to that time the cognovit was given, and the judgment recovered. The original debt has been merged and extinguished by the judgment. The judgment is a new debt, which is not affected by the discharge." Bacon says: "If a bond creditor obtains a judgment on the bond, or has judgment acknowledged to him, he cannot afterward bring an action on the bond, for the debt is drowned in the judgment, which is a security of higher nature than the bond." Extinguishment (D), citing 6 Coke, 40. The authority cited is Higgins' Case, wherein Lord Coke says: "It was objected that if a man recovers debt on a bond, or rent on a lease for years, it is at the plaintiff's election to sue execution on that judgment, or to have a new action." But it was resolved "that so long as the judgment remains in force he cannot have a new action on the same bond, for, as he who has a debt by simple contract, and takes a bond for the same, or any part of it, the contract is determined, so when a man has a debt on a bond, and by ordinary course of law has judgment thereon, the contract, by specialty, which is of an inferior nature, is by judgment of law changed into a matter of record, which is of a higher nature." The latest authority of the highest court of our country is to be found in 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 234, in the case of Mason v. Eldred. Field, J., the organ of the court, there says: "If the note in suit was merged in the judgment, then the judgment is a bar to the action, and an exemplification of its record is admissible, for it has long been established that, under the plea of the general issue in assumpsit, evidence may be received to show, not merely that the alleged cause of action never existed, but also to show that it did not subsist at the commencement of the suit." And again, at page 238: "The general doctrine maintained in England and the United States may be briefly stated. A judgment against one upon a joint contract of several persons bars an action against the other, though the latter were dormant partners of the defendant in the original action and this fact was unknown to the plaintiff when that action was commenced. When the contract is joint, and not joint and several, the original cause of action is merged in the judgment. The joint liability of those not sued with those against whom judgment is recovered being extinguished, their entire liability is gone." Indeed, the whole opinion there reported is an able review of the decisions of the state and United States courts upon this most interesting question of doctrine of the law. Counsel for the petitioner, Cochrane, has cited in his brief, opinions adverse to the conclusion at which I have arrived. Opinions to be found in Re Brown [Case No. 1,975]; Re Vickery [Id. 16,930].

But however great may be my respect for my Brothers of the Eastern and Western districts of Michigan and of the Southern district of New York, I cannot readily yield a doctrine which is supported by a long line of decisions, commencing with the year books cited by Lord Coke, and coming down to this day. When, therefore, on the eight day of June, eighteen hundred and seventy, the United States elected to take judgment upon the bond, they parted with all right to prove the bond as a debt due and payable from the bankrupt at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, and as a debt to be proved against the estate of the bankrupt. Cochrane, the petitioner, and assignee of the judgment, cannot be held to be conditioned otherwise than was his assignor with regard to the same. It is res judicata that his debt is not affected by the discharge. It has been pleaded, and the decision made in his favor. This judgment is subsisting and operative. What title, then, has he to impeach an act of the court in which he was no wise concerned, and by which he is in no manner injured. The exception must be sustained and the petition dismissed.

MANSFIELD (MASON v.). See Case No. 9,243.

MANSFIELD, C. & L. M. R. CO. (SCOTT v.). See Case No. 12,541.

MANSON (CLARKSON v.). See Case No. 2,867.

MANTON (LANSING v.). See Case No. 8,077.

MANTON, The HERBERT. See Cases Nos. 6,399 and 7,319.

MANTOR (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 15,719.

Case No. 9,050.

MANUFACTURERS' & FARMERS' BANK v. BAYLESS.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 8;[1] 1 West. Law Month. 356.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. Jan. Term, 1859.

STATE EXEMPTION LAWS — HOMESTEAD — EXECUTION—HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION LAWS.

1. State exemption laws apply to process issued from the federal courts. The homestead of the head of a family is exempt from sale on a judgment rendered by a court of the United States in the same manner as upon a judgment of a state court.

2. Where a portion of the defendant's lands, on which is situated a dwelling-house far exceeding the value of the homestead entitled to exemption, is subject to a mortgage nearly equal to the value of that portion of his lands, and the defendant has another parcel, on which is a dwelling occupied by part of his family, of a value within the limits of the statute exemption, he is entitled, upon his request, to have the latter set off and exempted from sale on execution.

In equity.

S. J. Andrews, for the motion.

Paine & Wade, opposed.

WILLSON, District Judge. A motion is made to set aside the appraisal in this case, and the reason assigned is that the defendant, at the time of the levy and appraisal of the land described in the marshal's return upon the execution, was the head of a family, and that he and his family then resided upon the upper tract of land included in said appraisal, and which was and is known as the "Millville Farm." That the defendant, prior to the making of said appraisement, demanded of the deputy marshal under whose direction said levy and appraisal were made, to set off and assign to said defendant a homestead in the said Millville farm, which the said deputy marshal refused to do, but caused said appraisal to be made without reference to the homestead exemption claimed by said defendant.

This motion presents two questions for our consideration:—(1) Upon an execution issued from the United States circuit court in Ohio, and where the marshal, in executing the writ, levies upon land, has the defendant the right to the homestead exemption, provided for by the Ohio statute of 23d March, 1850? And, (2) If the state law in this particular is applicable, then, is the defendant in this case entitled to its benefits?

The first section of the state law of March 23, 1850, provides that from and after the 4th day of July, 1850, the homestead of each head of a family shall be exempt from sale on any judgment or decree rendered on any cause of action after the taking effect of the act; provided, that such homestead shall not exceed five hundred dollars in value. Swan's St. 511. The third section of the act of congress of May 10, 1828, declares "that writs of execution and other final process issued on judgments and decrees rendered in any of the courts of the United States, and the proceedings thereupon, shall be the same, except their style, in each state, respectively, as are now used in the courts of such state, saving to the courts of the United States in those states, in which there are no courts of equity, with the ordinary equity jurisdiction —the power of prescribing the mode of executing their decrees in equity by rules of court; provided, however, that it shall be in the power of the courts, if they see fit in their discretion, by rules of court, so far to alter final process in said courts, as to conform the same to any change which may be adopted by the legislatures of the respective states for the state courts." 4 Stat. 281. The first section of this act expressly adopts the mesne process and modes of proceeding in suits at common law, then existing in the highest state court, under the state laws, which it has been held included all the regulations of the state laws as to bail, and exemptions of the party from arrest and imprisonment. In regard, also, to writs of execution and other final process and proceedings thereupon, the third section declares they shall be the same as were then used in the courts of the state. There can be no question that the provisions contained in this section relating merely to executions and modes of proceeding after judgment are exceptions to the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 92], which enjoins upon the federal courts the adoption of state laws as rules of decision in certain cases. They are exceptions, because nothing is left for implication, as congress has legislated directly upon the subject-matter. The law is express that executions and the proceedings thereupon shall be the same as were used in each state on the 10th of May, 1828, conferring, however, upon the federal courts the power, in their discretion, by rules, to so alter final process in said courts as to conform the same to any change which might be adopted by the legislatures of the respective states for the state courts.

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

It has accordingly been urged with some plausibility, that inasmuch as there was no homestead exemption law in force in Ohio, on the 10th of May, 1828, the subsequent enactment could have no binding obligation in the execution of process from the federal courts, unless those courts should by rule adopt such law; and that as this court has adopted no rule upon the subject, the defendant cannot claim its benefits. This is not a question upon the mode of proceeding upon an execution. It does not involve the inquiry how the levy upon real estate should be made, and the duties of the marshal as to the mode of appraisal, advertisement, and sale. But the question here goes directly to a rule of property. It relates not to the proceeding, but to the property proceeded against. As an incident to sovereignty, the state of Ohio, through its legislature, has not only the power to declare what shall constitute a valid title to real property, but also the mode of alienation of such property. It certainly has power to change a rule in the common law in the matter of divesting title, as was done by the act of February 28, 1846, in relation to the interest of husbands in the estates of their wives. It can, by a law of limitation, determine when a judgment shall cease to have any legal effect, and by a like law it can deny to the lawful owner the right to recover the possession of his land. And so it can exempt from legal process to the head of a family, a homestead, as provided in the act of March 28, 1850. This law of exemption has a direct operation upon property, and has as much force as the law which gives effect to a title in fee simple when obtained by deed. It confers a right which it is not in the power of congress by legislation, nor within the province of the federal courts, by rules, to divest. This question comes clearly within the principle of the case of Ross v. Duval, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 45, where it was held by the supreme court of the United States that the act of the legislature of Virginia in 1792, to regulate proceedings in judgment, was substantially and technically a limitation on judgments, and was not, therefore, an act to regulate process. It was declared to be a limitation law, establishing a rule of property, and under the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act, affording a rule of decision for the courts of the United States. This was but a reaffirmance of the principle established by the supreme court in the case of Green v. Lessee of Neal, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 291. But were this a question of practice merely, we should incline to recognize the provisions of the state law, even in the absence of a rule of court upon the subject. It is far preferable to yield to than encroach upon state laws, especially in enforcing remedies upon contracts entered into with reference to these laws. And it is administering justice in the true spirit of the constitution and laws of the United States to conform, as nearly as practicable, to the administration of justice in the courts of the states. We therefore hold, on principles of law as well as upon considerations of comity, that on execution issuing from this court the party whose land is seized is entitled to the benefits of the homestead exemption, in the manner and to the same extent that is secured to the judgment debtor under the law of the state.

It only remains to consider the evidence touching the defendant's right to a homestead exemption in the property levied upon by the marshal in this case. All the testimony submitted is comprised in three affidavits, to wit, that of J. M. Rickey (the deputy marshal who made the levy), of J. B. Bayles (the defendant), and of Jefferson Stringer (one of the appraisers). It appears from this testimony that at the time of the levy and appraisal of the "Millville Farm," so called, the defendant demanded a homestead therein to be exempted and set off to him for that purpose, and that this demand was refused by the marshal. It further appears that the defendant was carrying on the farm himself, and a part of his family, with his household furniture, was in the occupation of the house sought to be discharged from appraisal and sale. His other real estate, as the evidence shows, was mortgaged for about its full value, and the mortgage was executed by himself and wife; and that the dwelling-house upon encumbered land was far too valuable to constitute the homestead allowed by the statute. This evidence clearly shows the defendant to be entitled to a homestead exemption in the land levied upon, and which was appraised without recognition of his right under the local law. The appraisal is accordingly set aside.

MANUFACTURERS' INS. CO. (BILSON v.). See Case No. 1,410.

MANUFACTURERS' INS. CO. (CLARK v.). See Case No. 2,829.

MANUFACTURERS' INS. CO. (GLIDDEN v.). See Case No. 5,482.

Case No. 9,051.

In re MANUFACTURERS' NAT. BANK.

[5 Biss. 499; 19 Int. Rev. Rec. 20; 1 Thomp. Nat. Bankr. Cas. 192; 6 Chi. Leg. News, 118; 8 Am. Law Rev. 614; 1 Cent. Law J. 19; 21 Pittsb. Leg. J. 80, 116; 6 Leg. Gaz. 21.] [1]

District Court, N. D. Illinois. Dec. 30, 1873.

NATIONAL BANKS — AMENABLE TO THE BANKRUPT ACT—CURRENCY ACT—REPEALED — SUPERSEDED —CURRENCY ACTS—CUMULATIVE ACTS — REMEDIES—WHEN EXCLUSIVE.

1. A national bank is not liable to be proceeded against in bankruptcy.

2. The bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] does not repeal or supersede the provisions of the national currency act [13 Stat. 99] for winding up insolvent national banks.

3. Nor can the two acts exist together, as furnishing concurrent or co-ordinate remedies. The remedies prescribed in such case under the bankrupt act are not so ample and complete as those under the currency act, and the fact that creditors can not of their own motion institute proceedings under the currency act does not change the construction of the acts.

4. Nor did congress intend to inject the provisions of the bankrupt act, so that creditors could apply the remedies of the one, and the comptroller the remedies of the other. Such a construction would inevitably produce confusion.

5. When the legislature creates a corporation, it can also prescribe what remedies shall be had against it, and such remedies then become exclusive.

[Cited in Ryan v. Ray, 105 Ind. 106.]

This was an application by R. J. Smith & Co., of Chicago, for a rule on the Manufacturers' National Bank of Chicago to show cause why it should not be adjudged a bankrupt. The petitioners were creditors of the bank for money deposited in the ordinary course of business prior to its suspension of payment on the 17th day of October, 1873, and the petition was in the ordinary form, alleging suspension of payment of its commercial paper for a period of over 14 days, and preferential payments made to other of its creditors.

Harding, McCoy & Pratt and T. C. Whiteside, for petitioners.

Lawrence, Winston, Campbell & Lawrence and Ayer & Kales, for the bank.

[2][Extracts from argument of Harding, McCoy & Pratt:

[If this proceeding in bankruptcy can be maintained in no conceivable state of case against a national bank, then it is not true that it can be sued as natural persons; it is not true that proceedings may be brought against it in this court as in similar cases against others; it is not true that the provisions of the bankrupt act apply to all monеyed, business, or commercial corporations and joint-stock companies; and it is true that our lawmakers, when they used these clear and explicit terms, putting a national bank in the courts on the same footing with every other natural person, with every other like corporation, did not mean what they have so plainly said, but meant, instead, to confer a privilege, and an exemption from the most speedy and effectual weapon of the law, upon the class of corporations who need such exemption least,—who pretend and profess to take and keep in charge the moneys of others as trust funds, and to be ever ready to pay them on demand. Modern courts have long since denied to themselves the privilege of making laws by foisting interpretations upon statutes, by construction; but the books may be searched in vain for a case resembling this, where the explicit terms of statutes are to be overruled, not from motives of an acknowledged public policy, not to correct mistakes or omissions of legislators, but in order to defeat that expressed policy,—a policy which is the spirit of our institutions, a policy of equity and equality before the law, for one of privilege and exemption from common duties and liabilities. The decision which we ask from your honor will repudiate this unjust distinction, and will be regarded with gratification by every sound bank. It will vindicate them from odium which would attach to such a privilege, which they need less than any other institutions,—which they have never needed in their history.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 8 Am. Law Rev. 614, contains only a partial report.]

[2] [From 6 Chi. Leg. News, 118.]

[The national banking system is new and untried; it has had but a brief existence, of less than ten years; it is now called upon, for the first time, to go through a panic, and undergo a strain. But now it is to be tested; and nothing could be more cowardly than for the custodians of the money of others to lie down in the possession of the means of life,—of the reserves and active means of others,—and while others, their depositors, are subjected to severe and swift remedies of the law, of bankruptcy, to set up an exemption and the privilege to get the time which they, in the very nature of their indebtedness, have pledged themselves never to take. What reason can be suggested why the wise policy of the bankrupt act should not extend to these powerful institutions? It is inconceivable that congress, which, in the bank act itself, puts these banks on the same level, subject to the same proceedings and suits as all other persons and corporations, should change this, which is, in this particular, their acknowledged and unquestioned spirit and policy touching these banks. What color is there for this pretended discovery of a contrary spirit which shall overrule the very letter of the law? It is inconceivable that, if congress meant to change this policy, that they should neglect and fail to say so; that they should have left their meaning to inference, to interpretation,—to subtle inference, to be drawn from an unexpressed spirit which is not found in the bank act, or sudden intention conceived to create a distinction, where they had before repudiated distinctions and differences in creating the banks. This is simply, in its essence, a claim of a privilege said to be granted by the bank act; and "the uniform language of the English and American law is that all grants of privilege are to be liberally construed in favor of the public, and, as against the grantees of the monopoly, franchise, or charter, to be strictly interpreted. Whatever is not unequivocally granted in such acts is taken to have been withheld." Sedg. St. & Const. Law, p. 339. This doctrine has been repeatedly declared in cases where the corporation has contended for implied immunities, such as an exemption from taxation; and the supreme court of the United States, in Beatty v. Lessee of Knowles, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 152, lay down this doctrine and say, "This privilege can only be granted by express words." In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Canal Commissioners, 21 Pa. St. 9, this doctrine is thus laid down: "No privilege is granted unless it be expressed in plain and unequivocal words, testifying the intention of the legislature in a manner too plain to be misunderstood, and every resolution which springs from doubt is to be against the corporation."

[The question here raised may be stated thus: How does the provision of the 50th section, providing for proceedings by the comptroller to take away the franchise of a bank, and dissolve it, forbid the remedy given by the 8th and 37th sections, viz. to sue and be sued, proceed and be proceeded against, in bankruptcy or otherwise, as natural persons in similar cases? These are distinct and cumulative remedies given, it may be (they are not in fact), for the enforcement of the same rights, but not given in the same statute. What has the law, touching the distinct rights given in different statutes, to do with this? The doctrine as to a new remedy is the reverse of that as to a new right. Remedies may be inconsistent, may be unlike; but the only consequence is that the injured party must make choice of which he will avail himself. But it is not true in fact that the bank act contains the supposed complete "scheme of bankruptcy." This is a strange scheme of insolvency—of bankruptcy—seen in the bankruptcy act by the lynx eyes of my brethren, who appear for this bank; a scheme which does not recognize or provide for insolvency at all.

[The provisions for a receiver are for nonpayment of a circulating note, for improperly certifying a check, for not making good the reserve, for not keeping good the surplus, for not keeping the stock to its minimum! Not one for insolvency! Not one for an act of insolvency! All for breaches of regulations required by good banking. Each and all of these breaches might be the act of a solvent bank! What connection between insolvency, and certifying a check without having the money deposited! These are sound rules, the observance of which will tend to keep a bank solvent. This proceeding is a statutory remedy to enforce statutory penalties. What parallel proceeding for the same acts is found in the bankrupt act? None, parallel or otherwise, save that for nonpayment of the circulating note. It is no act of bankruptcy to let your reserve run down, to let your surplus run down, to let your stock remain in quantity below its minimum amount, to certify a check for one who has not on deposit the funds to meet it! Suppose it were true that the provisions for a receiver are provisions for insolvency, are there not in the 8th and 57th sections also provisions for insolvency—provision for the action of the courts—for the power of a court of chancery, for the power of a court of bankruptcy, for receiver and assignee? What then? Here are simply concurrent remedies in the same act! Say this remedy stood upon the terms alone of the bankrupt act, as our opponents, without any show of argument or reason, claim, and then, what if the proceedings by the comptroller are inconsistent or unlike those of the bankrupt court? So are, or may be, the proceedings in chancery, in admiralty, in law; so certainly will those be in independent courts; but this furnishes no reason to deny that the law provides for them—to assert that provisions for one forbid the operation of provisions for the other? But counsel see possible collusion, in case the comptroller has the right to act. It ought to be enough to answer that it does not appear, and that it should first be made to appear that he has the right to act, that there are circulating notes; that they are, or may be, protested. This, by all means, as there are banks which have no circulation. As it is the first act of a bank to redeem, if it can, its notes, and it may have been done by this bank, by the consent of the comptroller, and to put it in funds by the surplus value of its bonds, it ought to be enough to answer, that it is no reason to ask the court to stay its hand, because the comptroller, or even another court, has the right also to act. The rule applying is, first in time first in right. But it is easy, also, to answer that it is inconceivable that the comptroller should desire to act where the same court would act and control his receiver; where the same rule of distribution, so far as the circulating notes go, is preserved, the lien of government being protected in bankruptcy. That is still more inconceivable when, as now, the circulating notes are known to be worth far less, at their par value, than the bonds at their present premium. "But the whole proceeding is different!" Of course it is. Its source, its cause of institution, and its progress differ at each step. The result and effect of the proceedings are just as different; the one closes up and dissolves the bank; the other simply distributes its property among its creditors. But, to the injury to government; do they differ materially, and to a complication? Certainly not. The same court controls. The same law, the same rules control. The officer who acts under the comptroller is called a receiver; but he is under the control of this court, and must ask its advice and seek its aid at every important step. The money is paid over to the comptroller,—to the treasurer! Of course. But for what? For distribution. It is of no advantage for the government, is it, to assume the duty of custodian? Is there danger of loss in the hands of the assignee? So there is in the hands of the receiver. All the money belonging to the government is by the assignee paid over to the United States treasury; the receiver does the same. Here the security and interests of the government are at least balanced. The moneys of other people are paid over to them; and here there is less danger of loss to the government, as it takes no risks. But the comptroller might come in and take the property from the hands of the assignee! Indeed! That is as good a reason why any suit or other proceeding could not go on, could not be effectual, why property would be sacrificed upon sale upon execution! The comptroller could not appoint a receiver, and receiver seize it! This is thus seen to be a chimera. It is not and cannot be true, for it proves too much. It would defeat all suits against the bank. Should the comptroller wish to appoint a receiver for mere malice, mere exercise of power, all the rights and interests of the government protected, he would be answered, it is too late. Or if not, his action would simply supplement that of this court; his receiver would be the quondam assignee, or could take his place, and no friction could occur, as the machinery is all under control of the same court. In Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 429, all that is decided is that a suit cannot be brought by the receiver against the stockholders until the comptroller has directed him to bring it. All that is said in that case relates to a proceeding commenced by the comptroller under the 50th section of the act of June 3, 1864. It was not meant that the liability of stockholders could only be enforced by the comptroller, and under this section; but only that, in a proceeding under that section, certain action on the part of the comptroller was indispensable, whenever the personal liability of the stockholders is sought to be enforced.] [2]

BLODGETT, District Judge. On the 15th day of November last Messrs. R. J. Smith & Co. filed in this court their petition setting forth that they are creditors of the Manufacturers' National Bank, of this city, for money deposited with said bank in due course of business, and alleging that the said bank had suspended payment on its commercial paper for over fourteen days, and had, when insolvent, made preferential payments, for which acts they prayed that the bank be adjudged bankrupt.

Being aware that grave doubts had been expressed by many lawyers and business men as to the application of the bankrupt law to national banks, I directed notice of the application for a rule to show cause to be served on the officers of the bank, and have heard arguments for and against the application.

The law now in force for the organization and government of national banks was enacted on the 3d of June, 1864 (13 Stat. 99), and has been amended by the act of February 4, 1868 (15 Stat. 34), the act of February 19, 1869 (Id. 270), the act of July 12, 1870 (16 Stat. 251), and the act of March 3, 1873 (17 Stat. 603). Embodied in the original act, are very full and ample provisions for winding up and settling the affairs of these banking associations, mainly through the federal courts. The fundamental purpose of the act and its amendments was to provide a national currency and insure its prompt redemption, and, incidentally, to provide banking or fiscal agencies through which the ordinary financial business of the country could be safely transacted.

The leading features of the system were: 1. The security of the circulating notes of those banks by the pledge of government bonds in the hands of the treasurer of the United States, and in case of the failure of the bank to redeem its notes, then redemption of those notes by the government, for which it is to be reimbursed by the proceeds of the bonds deposited and a first lien on all the assets of the bank. 2. The responsibility of the stockholders of the bank to the extent of the par value of the stock held by them respectively, in addition to the amount invested in their shares. 3. The whole system to be under the surveillance of the comptroller of the currency, with full powers to examine into the affairs of each bank, and in cases of non compliance with the provisions of the law, to appoint a receiver to administer and wind up their affairs.

[2] [From 6 Chi. Leg. News, 118.]

On the 2d day of March, 1867, congress passed an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; and by the thirty-seventh section of said act it is declared "that the provisions of this act shall apply to all moneyed, business, or commercial corporations and joint-stock companies," and by the third clause of the same section it is declared that "all payments, conveyances, and assignments declared fraudulent and void by this act, when made by a debtor, shall in like manner and to the like extent and with like remedies be fraudulent and void when made by a corporation or company."

The forty-eighth section declares that the word "person" when used in this act, shall be held to include and mean "corporation," and by the ninth clause of the thirty-ninth section it is made an act of bankruptcy for any "banker" to suspend payment of his commercial paper for fourteen days. The bankrupt law is the latest expression of the legislative will, and its general terms and provisions must be held to repeal all previous statutes necessarily incompatible with it. The question then is, does the bankrupt law repeal and supersede the provisions in the currency act for winding up the affairs of insolvent national banks? or can its provisions be applied to those corporations and leave intact the provisions of the currency act on the same subject? There is no doubt of the soundness of the general rule of interpretation cited by the counsel for the respondent: That a statute, although so general in its terms that its letter would comprehend all classes of persons and things to which it can relate, will nevertheless be construed by the courts as not applying to a particular class which has been specially provided for and regulated by another statute relating solely to such class, if there is no language in the general statute, repealing the former statute or in any manner referring to it. Hume v. Gossett, 43 Ill. 297; People v. Miner, 46 Ill. 384.

A thing which is in the letter of a statute is not within the statute, unless it be within the intention of the makers. Bac. Abr. tit. "Statutes," 385. "Where the intention of the legislature is not apparent to that purpose, the general words of another and later statute shall not repeal the particular provisions of a former one." Dwarris, St. 117, quoted from Coke. The rule is thus stated in Sedgwick on the Construction of Statutory and Constitutional Law (page 97; 2d Ed.): "In regard to the mode in which laws may be repealed by subsequent legislation, it is laid down as a rule, that a general statute without negative words will not repeal the particular provisions of a former one, unless the two acts are irreconcilably inconsistent. * * * * The reason and philosophy of the rule is, that when the mind of the legislator has been turned to the details of a subject, and he has acted upon it, a subsequent statute in general terms, or treating the subject in a general manner, and not expressly contradicting the original act, shall not be considered as intended to affect the more particular or positive previous provisions, unless it is absolutely necessary to give the later act such a construction, in order that its words shall have any meaning at all."

The currency act provides for the appointment of a receiver to wind up the affairs of a national bank in the following cases: 1. For not keeping good a surplus—12th section. 2. For not keeping stock at minimum—15th section. 3. For not keeping good its reserve—31st section. 4. For not selecting a place for the redemption of its notes—32d section. 5. For holding its own stock over six months—35th section. 6. For non-payment of its circulating notes—50th section. 7. For improperly certifying a check—section 1, act March 3, 1869. 8. For failure to pay up capital stock, and for allowing same to become and remain impaired by losses—section 1, act March 3, 1873.

Upon the happening of either of these contingencies the comptroller may appoint a receiver to take possession of all the books, records and assets of the corporation, who shall proceed to convert the assets into money under the direction of a court of competent jurisdiction. And the money so realized shall be paid over to the treasury of the United States, subject to the order of the comptroller, who, after deducting in full whatever amount shall be due to the United States, shall distribute the balance ratably among the creditors of the bank; the claims of creditors to be proven before the comptroller, or adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction.

By the 52d section the "application of its assets in the manner prescribed by this act, with a view to the preference of one creditor to another, except in payment of its circulating notes, shall be utterly null and void." And by the 48th section it is made unlawful for any such bank, after suffering a protest of its circulating notes, and after notice from the comptroller, to in any manner prosecute the business of banking, except to receive and safely keep its money and deliver special deposits. And by the 53d section, any violation of the provisions of the currency act, done knowingly, by either a bank, or its officers or agents, works a forfeiture of all its rights and franchises, to be adjudged by a federal court at the suit of the comptroller. The 8th section provides that said corporations, i. e., national banks, may sue and be sued, complain and defend, in any court of law and equity as fully as natural persons. And by the 57th section it is declared, that "suits, actions and proceedings against any association under this act may be had in any circuit, district or territorial court of the United States, held within the district in which such association may be established, or in any state, county, or municipal court in the county or city in which such association is located, having jurisdiction in similar cases." And by the amendment to this section, made by the act of March 3, 1873, it is further provided that "no attachment, injunction or execution shall be issued against such association or its property before final judgment."

I am not aware that any adjudication has yet been made, determining what is an "act of insolvency" within the intent and meaning of the 52d section, but it seems to me to be an act which shows the bank to be insolvent; such as non-payment of its circulating notes, bills of exchange, or certificates of deposit; failure to make good the impairment of capital, or to keep good its surplus or reserve; in fact, any act which shows that the bank is unable to meet its liabilities as they mature, or to perform those duties which the law imposes for the purpose of sustaining its credit.

It will thus be seen that while the currency act does not specify in detail, and provide for all the specific acts of bankruptcy enumerated in the bankrupt law, it yet does furnish, through the functions of an important public officer—the comptroller of the currency—a very complete and detailed scheme or plan for administering the affairs of an insolvent national bank. It is true there is no provision for an individual creditor's putting this machinery in motion. But the presumption is that congress deemed it wiser to leave this duty to an impartial public officer rather than entrust it to the hasty, inconsiderate, and perhaps selfish action of one or more creditors. It was probably thought that the necessity of maintaining the public confidence in the system was such as would compel the comptroller to act in all cases when a bank had become derelict or discredited, and that this consideration, together with the clear obligations of duty, thrown upon the officer, would be sufficient to insure his action in all cases where he acquired the right to do so. At all events, the law as it was enacted contained ample and specific provisions for creating and managing these corporations, and for administering their affairs when they became unable or refused to perform their public functions.

The system has been in operation nearly ten years. Over two thousand banks have been organized under it. Of these, twenty-one have been wound up through the agency of the comptroller and a receiver—the great part of them since the enactment of the bankrupt law. All the legislation of congress has looked toward the perfecting and perpetuation of the system, and ought we now to say that congress, by the enactment of the general bankrupt law, intended to place these corporations under the provisions of that law, and to repeal the elaborate plan which it had specially furnished for winding up their affairs when they became insolvent or incapable of transacting banking business?

That it did not intend to repeal them, is conclusively evidenced by the fact that in two of the important amendatory acts, those of March 3, 1869 (15 Stat. 326), and March 3, 1873, especial reference is made to those winding-up provisions of the original act, and they are treated as being in full force. So, too, in several cases which have been before the supreme court since the enactment of the bankrupt law, reference has been made to these winding-up powers as still in force.

It being clear, then, that congress did not intend to repeal the winding-up clauses of the currency act, the question arises, did it intend that the two remedies, that is, the one given by the currency act and the one given by the bankrupt act, should exist as co-ordinate or concurrent remedies, and the affairs of an insolvent national bank be administered by that tribunal which first acquired control.

This construction might be admitted if the two were entirely compatible with each other, or if each was equally as complete as the other,—that is, if each could reach and administer upon all the assets of the debtor bank so as to leave nothing to be done by the other.

But we find upon examination that the important duty of paying the holders of circulating notes, and distributing the proceeds of the bonds deposited to secure them or the surplus of those bonds, and of enforcing the liability of stock-holders, is left with the comptroller, and can only be enforced by or through him. This latter point was fully discussed and decided by the supreme court, Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 498, where it was expressly held that the comptroller alone could enforce the personal liability clause. The court says: "The receiver is the instrument of the comptroller. He is appointed by the comptroller, and the power of appointment carries with it the power of removal. It is for the comptroller to decide when it is necessary to institute proceedings against stock-holders to enforce their personal liability, and whether the whole or a part, and, if a part, how much, shall be collected. These questions are referred to his judgment and discretion, and his determination is conclusive. The stockholders can not controvert it.

"It is not to be questioned in the litigation that may ensue. He may make it at such times as he shall deem proper, and upon such data as shall be satisfactory to him. This action on his part is indispensable, when the personal liability of the stockholders is sought to be enforced, and must precede the institution of a suit by a receiver. * * * The claims of creditors may be proved before the comptroller or established by suit against the association. Creditors must seek their remedy through the comptroller in the manner prescribed by statute."

Much stress was laid by the attorneys for petitioners upon the inadequacy of the security for creditors under the currency act, mainly because creditors could not of their own motion initiate winding-up proceedings, but how much more inadequate would the bankrupt court be to the same end if it cannot reach or distribute assets and perhaps must pay what it gets over to a government officer for distribution.

I do not say that an assignee would be obliged to pay over to the treasurer, but that there is grave ground for a claim that he should do so, and that collision might grow out of such claim. The relief which could be afforded to the creditors of a national bank, then, being so incomplete, I cannot think it was the intention of congress to clothe bankrupt courts with jurisdiction over this class of corporations. I have already cited the evidence which shows to my mind that congress did not intend to repeal the winding-up provisions of the currency act by the passage of the bankrupt law, and a comparison of the provisions of the two acts shows with equal clearness to my mind that it did not intend to inject the provisions of the bankrupt act into the currency act, so that creditors could apply the remedies of the bankrupt act, and the comptroller the remedies of the currency act; because such a construction would inevitably produce collisions and conflicts of jurisdiction, and the remedies given by the bankrupt act would be so far unavailing in regard to important assets as to make it evident that there was no intention to apply such a remedy. Suppose this court were to adjudge this respondent bankrupt to-day, and send its messenger and assignee to take possession of the assets, the officer of the court could in no event enforce the personal liability clause, or obtain possession of the government bonds deposited to secure the circulation, or any surplus of those bonds after fully redeeming the circulation. Those assets are beyond the reach of this court or its officers, and can only be approached by the way of the comptroller and his receiver. Then why should this court take cognizance of a case that it cannot administer?

Why not, rather, say that congress has acted upon the subject matter of insolvent national banks and made specific provisions for administering their affairs, and, inasmuch as the general bankrupt law has not expressly repealed these specific provisions nor necessarily suspended them, the courts will presume it was the intention of congress to except this class of corporations from the operation of the later statute? Such conclusion seems to me consistent with authority, and is, in fact, the only conclusion that will not lead to inextricable complication and conflict.

But it is urged that the currency act makes these corporations liable to all suits and actions which might be brought against natural persons, and that they can therefore be proceeded against in bankruptcy. A sufficient answer to this might be found in the fact that when the currency act was passed there was no bankrupt law in force, and therefore the general language must be held subject to this limitation. But I take it there is no doubt that the legislative power which creates an artificial person or corporation can also prescribe what remedies shall be had against it, and that such remedies would be held to be exclusive, and that the provisions of the general bankrupt law would not be held to apply to corporations at all but for the express terms of the act. Should they, then, be held to apply to a class of corporations which have, as it seems, a bankrupt law of their own ingrained into their own constitution and part of their organic law, by the same authority which enacted the bankrupt law? I think not. Nor does it seem to me that there is any necessary hardship in denying the remedies of the bankrupt law to the creditors of this corporation. There is no evidence that either this petitioning creditor, or any other creditor, has applied to the comptroller to take possession and administer the assets. Additional force is also given to this consideration from the fact that in the very latest amendment to the currency act it is expressly provided that no attachment, injunction, or execution, shall issue against a bank until judgment is obtained.

It is well known that in many of the states proceedings by attachment may be taken by a creditor in the first instance, and as a matter of course, and in nearly or quite all the states, attachments can issue upon affidavits showing the existence of certain facts, while injunctions are almost universally issued before judgment or decree in equity cases when a case is made for one. And yet these corporations are, probably for reasons of public policy, exempted from liability to all this class of summary proceedings. Here we have a restriction upon the powers of the bankrupt court, almost, if not wholly, incompatible with the jurisdiction. For of what use would it be to proceed in bankruptcy against a debtor, in a large number of cases, unless he could be enjoined and his property seized by process of the court. Before adjudication or judgment could be obtained, the property of the debtor might be wasted or spirited away, so that the adjudication would be barren of results.

I do not say that the prohibition to enjoin, or attach property necessarily implies want of jurisdiction, but only that it goes far to show that it was never the intention of congress to clothe a bankrupt court with jurisdiction as against these corporations. I am therefore of the opinion that the rule to show cause should be denied, and the petition dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Case No. 9,052.

MANUFACTURERS' NAT. BANK v. BAACK et al.

[8 Blatchf. 137; 2 Abb. U. S. 232; 4 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 24; 13 Int. Rev. Rec. 35, 101; 40 How. Pr. 409; 1 Thomp. Nat. Bank Cas. 161; 3 Chi. Leg. News, 169; 5 Am. Law Rev. 567.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 10, 1871.

FEDERAL COURTS—JURISDICTION—CITIZENSHIP—NATIONAL BANK—PRESUMPTION.

1. A banking corporation, incorporated under the act of June 3, 1864 (13 Stat. 101), and "located," under the provisions of that act, at Chicago, Illinois, can sue, in this court, a defendant who is a citizen of New York.

2. An allegation in a bill in a suit in equity brought in this court by such corporation, as plaintiff, that it is "a citizen of the state of Illinois, and located and residing and doing business in the city of Chicago, in said state," and that the defendant is a citizen of New York, is sufficient, under the 11th section of the act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 78), to give this court jurisdiction of the suit.

[Cited in Cadle v. Tracy, Case No. 2,279. Approved in Main v. Second Nat. Bank, Id. 8,976. Cited in St. Louis Nat. Bank v. Allen, 5 Fed. 555; Orange Nat. Bank v. Traver, 7 Fed. 149; Hughes v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 18 Fed. 111.]

[Cited in brief in Cooke v. State Nat. Bank, 52 N. Y. 111.]

[This was a bill in equity by the Manufacturers' National Bank of Chicago against Edward Baack and Edward Baack, Jr. Heard on an application for an injunction and receiver.]

Francis C. Barlow, for plaintiffs.

Clarence A. Seward and Pierre C. Talman, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The bill in this case describes the plaintiffs as "The Manufacturers' National Bank, of Chicago, Illinois, a banking corporation, incorporated and existing under and by virtue of an act of the congress of the United States, entitled 'An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof,' approved June 3, 1864, and having capacity to sue by the above title, and a citizen of the state of Illinois, and located and residing and doing business in the city of Chicago, in said state." It describes the defendants as citizens of the state of New York. The allegations of the bill as to the incorporation and location of the plaintiffs are admitted by stipulation. The plaintiffs move for an injunction and the appointment of a receiver in the case, and the question arises, whether, on the allegations of the bill, thus admitted, with the fact that the allegation of the bill as to the citizenship of the defendants is not denied by the answers, this court has jurisdiction of the suit.

The 8th section of the act of June 3, 1864 (13 Stat. 101), under which the plaintiffs are incorporated, provides, that every association formed pursuant to the provisions of the act shall be a body corporate, and may have a corporate seal, and shall have succession by the name designated in its organization certificate, and may, by such name, "sue and be sued, complain and defend, in any court of law and equity, as fully as natural persons." The effect of this provision is not to give to the corporation the right to sue, or the capacity to be sued, in every court within the United States, whether state or federal, or to give to every such court jurisdiction over every suit which may be brought in it, wherein the corporation is plaintiff or defendant. Its only proper effect is, to provide that the corporation, when it has come, or been brought, as a suitor, into a court which has jurisdiction of the suit, shall stand in court, in all respects, in the same position, as regards its own rights or the rights of others against it, as to the subject matter of the suit, in which a natural person, who is a suitor in such court, can stand. The question, as to the proper court in which the suit is to be brought, in respect of jurisdiction, is left to be determined by other provisions of law. If a natural person had brought this suit, in this court, against the defendants, as citizens of New York, he would have been obliged to aver himself to be a citizen of some state other than New York, the bill being what is known as a "creditor's bill," founded on a judgment at law, and praying for equitable relief. Therefore, so far as the provisions of section 8 of the act are concerned, the plaintiffs must show, by the averments of their bill, jurisdiction of this suit by this court, by showing proper citizenship in the parties.

There is no other provision of the act, which can be cited as giving to this court jurisdiction of this suit. The 57th section, even if, under the dictum of Mr. Justice Swayne, in Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 498, 506, it be held to refer to suits by national banks as well as to suits against them, relates only to suits to be brought in courts of the United States held within the district in which the bank is established, and does not affect the question of the jurisdiction of this court in this suit. Such jurisdiction, in order to be sustained, must, therefore, appear, by the averments of the bill, to be brought within that provision of the 11th section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 78), which gives to this court original cognizance of all suits of a civil nature, in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and the suit is between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought and a citizen of another state.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and by Benjamin Vaughan Abbott, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 5 Am. Law Rev. 567, contains only a partial report.]

The averment in the bill, that the plaintiff corporation is a citizen of the state of Illinois, is, in and of itself, not sufficient to show jurisdiction, as a corporation cannot be a citizen of a state, in the sense in which that word is used in the constitution of the United States. Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 404; Covington Drawbridge Co. v. Shepherd, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 227, 233, 234. The substance of the averments in the bill in regard to the status of the plaintiffs is, that they are a banking corporation, incorporated under the act of congress named; that their members are authorized to sue by the title given to the corporation; that the corporation is located and does business at Chicago, in the state of Illinois; and that, therefore, the real plaintiffs, the members of the corporation, must be regarded, on such averments, as citizens of the state of Illinois.

The various decisions of the supreme court in cases of suits in the federal courts by and against corporations created by the laws of the states, where the jurisdiction depended on the citizenship of the parties to the suit, are reviewed in the opinion given by that court in the case of Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 1 Black. [66 U. S.] 286. The law is there stated to be settled, that, where a corporation is created by the laws of a state, the legal presumption is, that its members are citizens of such state; that a suit by or against such corporation in its corporate name must be presumed to be a suit by or against citizens of the state which created the corporation; and that no averment or evidence to the contrary is admissible, for the purpose of withdrawing the suit from the jurisdiction of a court of the United States. In the case of Cowles v. Mercer Co., 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 118, 121, the rule is thus stated: "A corporation created by the laws of a state, and having its place of business within that state, must, for the purposes of suit, be regarded as a citizen, within the meaning of the constitution giving jurisdiction founded upon citizenship." This rule, however, does not, ex vi termini, cover the case of a corporation created by an act of congress.

The argument urged against a jurisdiction in this case drawn from citizenship is, that, as the corporation is created by the United States, the only legal presumption that can be drawn is, that its members are citizens of the United States; and that there is no presumption that they are citizens of the state in which the corporation is located.

With a view to the consideration of the question raised, it will be necessary to examine the statutory provisions in respect to the location of banking associations. The 6th section of the act of 1864, provides, that the organization certificate of every association for carrying on the business of banking, formed under the act, (and which, by the execution of such certificate, becomes, under the 8th section, a body corporate,) shall specify the place where the operations of discount and deposit of the association are to be carried on, designating the state, territory, or district, and also the particular county and city, town or village. The 44th section, provides, that any bank incorporated or organized under a law of a state may, by authority of such act of congress, become a national association, under the provisions of such act, by the name prescribed in an organization certificate, such as is required by such act, to be executed by a majority of its directors, the certificate declaring that the owners of two-thirds of the capital stock have authorized the directors to make such certificate, and "to change and convert the said bank or banking institution into a national association under this act;" and that, on a compliance with certain provisions prescribed in that section, the association shall be held and regarded as an association under the act. There is, therefore, no difference, in regard to its status, between an association formed under the act and one converted into a national association under the act. In each case, it must be regarded as holding its corporate existence under and by virtue of the act.

What, then, are the consequences of the fixing of place provided for in the 6th section? The 8th section provides, that the usual business of the association shall be transacted at an office or banking house "located" at the place specified in its organization certificate. The 9th section, provides, that at least three-fourths of the directors shall have resided in the state in which the association is "located," one year next preceding their election as directors, and be residents of the same during their continuance in office. The 10th, 15th, 18th, and 42d sections, speak of the association as being "located" in a city, town or county. The 30th section, speaks of the laws of the state where the bank is "located." The 34th section, speaks of the place where the association is "established." The 41st section speaks of taxes imposed "by or under state authority at the place where such bank is located." The word "place," in this 41st section, is declared, by the act of February 10, 1868 (15 Stat. 34), to mean, "the state within which the bank is located." This act of 1868, also provides, that the legislature of each state may determine and direct the manner and place of taxing all the shares of national banks "located" within said state, and that the shares of any national bank owned by non-residents of any state shall be taxed in the city or town where such bank is "located." The 50th section of the act of 1864 provides, that an association may apply to the "nearest" circuit, or district or territorial court of the United States, in certain cases, to enjoin the comptroller of the currency. The 57th section, provides, that suits, actions and proceedings against any association under the act may be had in any circuit, district or territorial court of the United States held within the district in which the association may be "established," or in any state, county or municipal court in the county or city in which the association is "located," having jurisdiction in similar cases, provided that all proceedings to enjoin the comptroller under the act shall be had in a circuit, district or territorial court of the United States held in the district in which the association is "located."

The 21st section of the act of 1864, as amended by the act of March 3, 1865 (13 Stat. 498), provides, that, of the three hundred millions of dollars of circulating notes authorized to be issued, one hundred and fifty millions of dollars shall be apportioned to associations in the states, in the District of Columbia, and in the territories, according to representative population; and that the remainder shall be apportioned by the secretary of the treasury among associations formed in the several states, in the District of Columbia and in the territories, having due regard to the existing banking capital, resources and business of such states, districts and territories. The act of July 12, 1870 (16 Stat. 251), provides (section 1), that fifty four millions of dollars in notes for circulation may be issued to national banking associations, in addition to the three hundred millions of dollars, and shall be furnished to banking associations organized or to be organized in those states and territories having less than their proportion under the apportionment contemplated by the act of 1865, before referred to, and that a new apportionment of such increased circulation shall be made as soon as practicable, based upon the census of 1870. The 6th section of the act of 1870, provides for "a more equitable distribution" of the national banking currency, by withdrawing circulating notes from banking associations organized in states having a circulation exceeding that provided for by the act of 1865, and issuing a like amount of notes to banking associations organized in states and territories having less than their proportion, the intention being, as declared by the section, that "the circulation so withdrawn shall be distributed among the states and territories having less than their proportion, so as to equalize the same." The 7th section of the act of 1870, provides, that, after the 12th of January, 1871, any banking association "located" in any state having more than its proportion of circulation may be removed to any state having less than its proportion of circulation, under such rules and regulations as the comptroller of the currency, with the approval of the secretary of the treasury may require.

It is quite apparent, from all these statutory provisions, that congress regards a national banking association as being "located" at the place specified in its organization certificate. If such place is a place in a state, the association is located in the state. It is, indeed, located at but one place in the state, but, when it is so located, it is regarded as located in the state. The requirement, that at least three fourths of the directors of the association shall be residents, during their continuance in office, in the state in which the association is located, especially indicates an intention on the part of congress to regard the association as belonging to such state. Three-fourths of the legal representatives of the unknown associates forming the corporation, with which representatives any person dealing with the corporation must deal, are required to reside in the state where the corporation is "located." The reasons so forcibly stated in the opinion of the court in the case of Marshall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 21 How. [62 U. S.] 314, 326-329, why a grant of power by competent authority to certain associated persons to act by representatives and to sue and be sued in a collective or corporate name, should not be allowed to prejudice any right of those dealing with such persons, apply as fully to the case of a bank created by federal authority and located in a particular state, as to one created by state authority and located in the state which created it. The view taken by the court in that case was, that the persons using the corporate name of a corporation created by a state may be justly presumed to be resident in the state which is the necessary habitat of the corporation; that the presumption arising from the habitat of a corporation created by a state in the place of its creation, is conclusive as to the residence or citizenship of those who use the corporate name, and exercise the faculties conferred by it; that the right of choosing an impartial tribunal is a privilege of no small practical importance, and more especially in cases where a distant plaintiff has to contend with the power and influence of great numbers, and the combined wealth wielded by corporations in almost every state; and that it is of importance, also, to corporations themselves, that they should enjoy the same privileges in other states, where local prejudices or jealousy might injuriously affect them. The principle has been settled ever since the case of Louisville R. Co. v. Letson, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 497, that, where a corporation is created by the laws of a state, the legal presumption is that its members are citizens of such state. Where a corporation is created by competent authority—authority as competent, within a given state, to create such corporation and to locate it in such state, as is the state itself—and a location and habitat within such state, and not elsewhere, is given by the creating authority, to such corporation, there is no reason why the legal presumption should not be that the members of such corporation are citizens of such state, within the meaning of the 2d section of the 3d article of the constitution, and of the 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789. The presumption, in the case of a corporation created by a state, is only arrived at by presuming the members of the corporation to be citizens of the United States, and to be residents in the state, and, therefore, under the decision in Gassies v. Ballon, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 761, citizens of the state. The members of a corporation created by the United States, and located in a particular state, in the manner and to the extent in which national banking associations are located in particular states, may as properly be presumed to be citizens of the United States and residents in the state where the corporation is located, so as thereby to be citizens of such state, as the members of a corporation created by a state may be presumed to be citizens of the United States, and residents in the state creating it, and in which it is located, and, therefore, citizens of such state.

But, it is urged that the legislation of congress shows an intention not to confer upon national banking associations the right to sue in the federal courts. The first national banking law was passed February 25, 1863 (12 Stat. 665), and was repealed by the 62d section of the act of June 3, 1864. The 59th section of the act of 1863, provided, that "suits, actions and proceedings by and against any association under this act may be had in any circuit, district or territorial court of the United States, held within the district in which such association may be established." The corresponding section, the 57th, of the act of 1864, provides, that "suits, actions and proceedings against any association under this act may be had in any circuit, district or territorial court of the United States, held within the district in which such association may be established, or in any state, county or municipal court in the county or city in which said association is located, having jurisdiction in similar cases." It is urged that this legislation indicates an intention that national banking associations shall not come into the federal courts as plaintiffs, although they may be brought into those courts as defendants. But, independently of the view taken of the 57th section of the act of 1864, in the opinion given by Mr. Justice Swayne in the case of Kennedy v. Gibson, before cited, it may well be said, that the object of that section is to enable a suit to be brought against a bank in any federal court held in the district where the bank is established, without reference to the citizenship of the plaintiff in the suit. Under the decision in the case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 738, such a suit is a case arising under a law of the United States, within the meaning of the constitution, the bank being incorporated by a law of the United States, and it is competent for congress to confer jurisdiction over it on the federal courts. But, the jurisdiction is expressly confined, by the 57th section, to suits brought in a federal court held in the district where the bank is established. Under it, however, these plaintiffs, a national bank, could bring a suit in this court against a national bank established in this district. The section embraces any plaintiff who has capacity to sue at all in any court. If these plaintiffs can sue another national bank in this court, it is difficult to see why they should not be allowed to sue in this court defendants who are citizens of New York. I can perceive no evidence, in the legislation referred to, that congress intended that this court should not assume the jurisdiction invoked in this suit.

So, too, the provision in the 2d section of the act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 227), withholding from banking corporations organized under a law of the United States, the privilege conferred by that act on other corporations organized under a law of the United States, of removing into a federal court certain suits brought against it, cannot be regarded as affecting the question of original jurisdiction involved in this case.

I am, therefore, satisfied, that the averments of the bill are sufficient to show jurisdiction, and that this court has jurisdiction of this suit. On the merits, the plaintiffs are entitled to the receiverships and the injunction asked for in their notice of motion, so far as concerns the property specified in the first and second clauses of such notice; but, inasmuch as such property exceeds the amount of the plaintiffs' claim, the receiverships and injunction will be discharged on the furnishing to the plaintiffs of satisfactory security for the payment of their claim, if they shall recover in the suit. An order will be settled, on notice, embodying proper provisions.

MANUFACTURERS' NAT. BANK (IRONS v.). See Case No. 7,068.

MANUFACTURERS' NAT. BANK (SMITH v.). See Case No. 9,051.

MANUFACTURING CO. (BLANK v.). See Case No. 1,532.

MANUFACTURING CO. (THOMPSON v.). See Case No. 13,967.

MANWARING (L'ARINA v.). See Case No. 8,089.

Case No. 9,053.

In re MANY et al.

[9 Ben. 160; [1] 17 N. B. R. 429.]

District Court, S. D. New York. June 26, 1877.

BANKRUPTCY—ADDITIONAL ALLOWANCES TO ASSIGNEES.

Considerations stated which govern additional allowances to assignees in bankruptcy, under general order No. 30, as amended.

[In the matter of Francis Many and James Marshall, bankrupts. For prior proceedings in this litigation, see Case No. 9,054.]

Carter & Eaton, for assignee.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. A recent amendment to general order No. 30, in bankruptcy, provides as follows: "It being found, that, in certain special cases, requiring great care and exertion on the part of assignees in bankruptcy, the fees and allowances now provided are insufficient, it is, therefore, hereby ordered, that, in such cases as are above mentioned, the district judge be and is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and concurrence of the circuit justice or judge, to make such additional allowance to the assignee or trustee, or to both or either of them, if there be more than one, as in his judgment shall be a fair and just compensation for his or their services, having regard to the amount of assets, the amount of labor required, and the special circumstances of the case, and that so much of general order thirty as conflicts herewith be repealed." Under general order No. 30, as it stood before this amendment, all allowance to an assignee, as compensation for his services, was forbidden, except that he could have the commissions provided for by section 5,100 of the Revised Statutes, on moneys received and paid, and certain items of fees provided for by general order No. 30, for specific services.

In the present case the assets are, in money, in the hands of the assignee, $11,298.57. The assignee's fees and allowances, including commissions, would be $377.73. The assignee asks for an additional allowance. The register reports, that, in his opinion, having regard to the amount of assets, the amount of labor required and the special circumstances of the case, the assignee is entitled to receive an allowance of $850, in addition to his commissions and fees allowed by law, and that such allowance is, in his judgment, a fair and just compensation for the services of the assignee. This report of the register is based on certain testimony annexed to it, and the register reports that he finds, from that testimony and from his own knowledge of the case, that the assignee has been obliged to perform and has performed unusual services in the administration of the estate, that this is a case which has required great and unusual care and attention on his part, and that he is entitled to an additional allowance for his services herein.

The total compensation to the assignee, if he should receive the $850 and the $377.73, would be $1227.73. This would be over 10.86 per cent on the assets, and there is, undoubtedly, a bill, paid or unpaid, for the services of counsel and attorneys to the assignee, as he is a professional accountant, and not a lawyer, and a portion of the services in respect of which the assignee asks for additional compensation were rendered in regard to matters in suit and in litigation.

The register reports that the services of the assignee were "unusual," but it is not stated wherein, nor does the testimony show wherein. Nor does the report state, nor the evidence show, wherein the care and attention on the part of the assignee have been great and unusual.

The assets consisted of a stock of hardware in a store and of open accounts and notes. The assignee states, that, from the time he took possession of the assets, he attended at the store 25 days, making sales at private sale, posting books, examining accounts and investigating facts about them, conferring with the bankrupts and creditors, and making an inventory of the hardware. There is nothing in all this that is unusual or that required "great care and exertion," and it is only in such a case that an additional allowance can be made. General order No. 30 allows a specific fee of one dollar for each hour necessarily employed in making an inventory, and also 20 cents for each folio of inventory. The assignee charges $90 for 90 hours making the inventory, and $25 for 125 folios of inventory, and also asks for $10 a day for each of the 25 days above mentioned, being $250.

The assignee also states, that, during 150 other days he was employed a part of every day, and during 50 of those 150 days the greater part of every day, in collecting 213 accounts, examining into the merits of each, making out statements of each, corresponding with most of the debtors, and communicating either personally or by letter with all of them. He also states, that he gave his personal attention to the conduct of five suits which were necessary to be brought, and were brought, by him, as assignee, in all of which he obtained judgments; and that he realized for the estate, from the accounts and suits, over $6,000. For collecting that amount he considers himself entitled to $500. There is nothing in all this that is unusual, unless it be unusual for an assignee to attend to the duties of his trust for the compensation fixed by law and known to him when he accepts the trust. Nor does the above statement show a special case involving great care and exertion.

The assignee also states, that he gave a great deal of time and labor to a controversy respecting goods valued at $5,000, held by the bankrupts as security for advances to a party who claimed the goods; and that the matter required him to make a difficult and laborious investigation of the facts, adjustment of complicated accounts, attendances on the taking of testimony, and consultations with attorneys and other persons, covering a period of about 7 months, including the 150 days above named and excluding the 25 days above named. He considers his services in this matter worth $250. The above general statement does not show a special case requiring great care and exertion. It does not state facts on which the district judge can arrive at the judicial conclusion that this was a special case and required great care and exertion, nor facts from which the judge can see what amount of labor was required or what were the special circumstances of the case. It does not amount to more than the conclusions and opinions of the assignee.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The same remarks apply to the next charge. The assignee states that he attended to the matter of contesting invalid claims against the estate, which resulted in expunging proofs to the amount of $20,000; that he investigated facts and adjusted accounts, and had consultations and interviews, and examined memoranda, and attended on the taking of testimony, such services covering 260 days, including the 7 months above named, during which time he was occupied in the matter a portion of each day, and on many occasions the whole of each day, to the exclusion of all other business. For these services he asks $250.

The total sum he claims is $1250. One of the bankrupts testifies that the assignee ought to have that amount, and the assignee's partner in business, as a professional accountant and collection agent, testifies to the same effect. This is all the testimony.

So far as the deposition of the assignee in this case discloses facts to make out a special case requiring great care and exertion on his part, it is difficult to see why any case involving trouble could not be represented by an ill paid assignee in very much the same terms employed by the assignee in his deposition in this case. If the present case, as disclosed in that deposition, is not only a special case requiring great care and exertion, but one of a class spoken of, in the amendment, as "certain special cases requiring great care and exertion on the part of assignees in bankruptcy," almost all cases in which anything is done by an assignee will become such special cases. The purpose of the amendment was not to reform the rate of compensation to assignees in all cases nor in any large proportion of cases. Undoubtedly, the compensation of assignees may often be properly called insufficient, but the supreme court did not, by the amendment, intend to alter it. It intended only to provide for a small class of cases, where a special inadequacy of compensation appears, and great care and exertion are shown. In the present state of the papers in this case I cannot adjudge that a case is made out falling within the amendment.

Case No. 9,054.

In re MANY et al.

[17 N. B. R. 514.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. March 29, 1877.

BANKRUPTCY—BUSINESS PAPER—ACCOMMODATION PAPER—USURY—REPRESENTATION OF CHARACTER OF PAPER TO PURCHASER—ADVANCES BY FACTORS.

1. Where an assignee in bankruptcy moves to expunge a claim on the ground of usury, alleging that a promissory note on which the claim is founded was made or endorsed by the bankrupt for the accommodation of another person and took its inception in the hands of the present holder, who obtained the same at a discount of more than the lawful rate of interest, held, that the assignee must show clearly that the note was accommodation paper.

2. Where it appeared that the bankrupts were factors for a corporation, and received goods on consignment for sale on commission, and were in the habit of giving their notes to the order of the corporation by way of advances on consignments; and it appeared that some of the notes on which this claim was founded were of that description, and were purchased by the present holder from one of the bankrupts, who was also treasurer of the corporation, at a discount of 18 per cent. per annum; but it did not appear whether these particular notes, or any of them, were given for an excess over the value of goods consigned, held, that the assignee had not shown these notes to be accommodation paper.

3. It seems that notes given by factors, by way of advances to their principals, on the credit of goods consigned, are business paper and not accommodation paper.

4. Where one member of a firm makes representations to the purchaser of commercial paper bearing the firm name, to the effect that it is business paper, the firm or their assignee in bankruptcy is estopped from setting up that it is accommodation paper and void for usury.

5. An endorser of a note is in any event liable to his endorsee only for the amount actually paid by the endorsee, with lawful interest thereon, and not for the face value of the note.

Motion by the assignee in bankruptcy of the firm of Many & Marshall, to expunge or reduce a proof of debt by one Joshua A. Clark upon certain notes. The bankrupts [Francis Many and James Marshall], composing the firm of Many & Marshall, prior to their failure, had been hardware dealers in New York. The notes in question had all been either made or endorsed in the firm name, by Francis Many, one of the bankrupts. The assignee claimed that the notes in question were made or endorsed by Many for accommodation of the other parties to the paper; that they had taken their inception in the hands of Clark (the claimant), and as he had purchased them at a greater rate of discount than 7 per cent. per annum, they were void for usury. The assignee also claimed that, on such notes as Many & Marshall were liable upon as endorsers, the claimant could in no event prove for more than he had actually paid for the notes. Part of the notes were drawn by Francis Many, one of the bankrupts, in the name of Many & Marshall as makers, payable to the order of the Trenton Lock Company. The Trenton Lock Company was a New Jersey corporation, doing business as manufacturers of locks at Trenton. Francis Many was treasurer of this corporation. He endorsed these notes in the corporate name, and transferred them to Clark at a discount of 18 per cent. per annum. There was evidence to the effect that Many had represented to Clark, at the time of the transfer of the notes, that they were business paper. It appeared that Many & Marshall had acted for some time as factors for the Trenton Lock Company, receiving goods from the company for sale on commission. The firm had been in the habit of advancing money to the company from time to time, by notes similar to those in suit. There was evidence going to show that at the time the notes were given the firm had already issued notes to the order of the Trenton Lock Company, to an amount greatly in excess of the value of the goods held by the firm under consignment from the Trenton Lock Company.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

William B. Hornblower, for assignee.
William G. Choate, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I am of opinion, on the evidence, that the five notes made to the order of the Trenton Lock Company were business paper in the hands of the payees, and not accommodation paper. If they or any of them were given for an excess over the value of goods consigned, it is for the assignee in bankruptcy to show that clearly, and this is not done.

In addition, as to those five notes, I think the evidence shows that Mr. Clark purchased them on the representation by Many that they were business paper, and not accommodation paper.

In so representing, Many must be held to have acted for his firm. If his representation was untrue, he was committing a fraud on Mr. Clark.

His representation bound his firm. Story, Partn. § 108, and cases cited in note 2; Griswold v. Haven, 25 N. Y. 595.

It having been represented by the firm that the five notes were business paper, and not accommodation paper, and Mr. Clark having parted with his money on the faith of such representation, the assignee in bankruptcy of the firm cannot now deny the truth of such representation, so as to work an injury to Mr. Clark.

I therefore decide that Mr. Clark is entitled to prove on the notes A, D, M, N, and P. As to notes C and F, it is for the assignee to show that they were accommodation notes in the hands of Many & Marshall. This has not been done. Mr. Clark is therefore entitled to prove on those notes. As to note E, I think the evidence shows that it was purchased by Mr. Clark on the representation by Mr. Many that it was business paper, and that Mr. Clark is entitled to prove on it. It is contended that Mr. Clark cannot prove upon notes C, E, and F, above mentioned, or upon notes B, G, H, I, J, K, L, and O, all being notes on which Many & Marshall as a firm, if liable, are liable only as endorsers, for more than the amount he actually paid for the notes respectively, he having taken more than lawful interest in each instance. I think that is the law. Cram v. Hendricks, 7 Wend. 569; Judd v. Seaver, 8 Paige, 548.

[For subsequent proceedings in this litigation in reference to allowance to assignee, see Case No. 9,053.]

Case No. 9,055.

MANY v. JAGGER et al.

[1 Blatchf. 372; [1] Merw. Pat. Inv. 650; 1 Fish. Pat. Rep. 222.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct., 1848.

PATENTS—ASSIGNMENT — DECLARATIONS AND ADMISSIONS OF ASSIGNOR—INFRINGEMENT — PRIOR KNOWLEDGE — CLAIM FOR ENTIRETY — CAR WHEELS—ABORTIVE EXPERIMENT.

1. The declarations and admissions of an assignor of personal property, made after he has parted with his interest in it, are inadmissible either to show a want of title in him, or to affect the quality of the article, or to impair the right of the purchaser in any respect.

2. In an action for the infringement of a patent, the defendant offered to show that the patentee, after he had assigned all his interest in the patent, had declared that the patented article had been abandoned and had failed and was worthless: Held, that the evidence was inadmissible.

[Cited in Woodward v. Boston Lasting Mach. Co., 8 C. C. A. 622, 60 Fed. 284.]

3. The patentee having been previously examined as a witness for the plaintiff, and not having been interrogated as to any such declaration, the evidence offered was not admissible by way of contradicting him.

4. Under section 15 of the patent act of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 123), a notice of defence gave the name of B. as having had prior knowledge of the invention. On the trial, F. was called as a witness to prove the prior knowledge by B., the notice, however, not making any mention of F.: Held, that the evidence was admissible.

[Cited in Woodbury Pat. Planing-Mach. Co. v. Keith, 101 U. S. 493.]

5. Where the claim of a patent was "the manner of constructing wheels for rail-road cars, with double convex plates, one convex outwards and the other inwards, and an undivided hub, the whole cast in one piece, as herein fully set forth," held, that the claim was not for the mode of constructing the wheel, as distinct from the wheel itself, but was for the car wheel after it was constructed.

6. The claim was not for any part of the wheel taken separately, as the plates or the hub, but for the entire wheel as constructed.

[Applied in Andrews v. Carmen, Case No. 371.]

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

7. The plates being described in the specification as "parallel or nearly parallel," and as being "convex on one side and concave on the other," and the specification also setting forth that in consequence of the curvature of the plates they contracted in cooling without danger of fracture, held, that the peculiar form of the plates was not claimed as essential except as respected a form that would allow of their contraction in cooling without fracture.

8. The specification held sufficient against the objection that it did not describe the old article on which the improvement was made, and that a mechanic could not, from reading it, distinguish between the old thing and the improvement.

9. To maintain a patent, as regards the utility of the thing invented, it is not necessary that it should be the very best article for the use to which it is applied, but if it be at all valuable, if its use for the purpose for which it is constructed is practicable, that is sufficient to sustain it as a useful invention.

[Cited in Stimpson v. Woodman, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 125; Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. (78 U. S.) 549.]

[Cited in Tod v. Wick, 36 Ohio St. 393.]

10. Where a prior invention is set up to defeat a patent, the idea of it must not merely have been conceived, but it must have been reduced to practical use. Nor is an abortive or abandoned experiment sufficient.

[Cited in Ellithorp v. Robertson, Case No. 4,408.]

11. Where a prior invention was claimed to be the same in substance as a subsequent one, the jury were instructed to take into consideration, in passing upon the question, the fact that the prior invention was known to persons who experimented to produce the subsequent invention but failed to do so.

12. The question as to the identity or difference between two rail-road car wheels is, whether one embodies in its mechanical construction, mind and ingenuity not found in the other, by which the result is produced.

This was an action on the case, to recover damages for the infringement of letters patent [No. 640], issued to Samuel Truscott, George Wolf, and James Dougherty, of Columbia, Pennsylvania, on the 17th of March, 1838, for "a new and useful improvement in the mode of making cast iron wheels to be used on rail-roads and applicable to other purposes." The plaintiff was assignee of the entire interest in the patent, (which was commonly called the Wolf patent,) for the whole United States. The defendants were iron founders and workers in iron at Albany, New York, and the infringement alleged was the making of rail-road car wheels substantially like the patented wheel in principle. The defendants claimed on the trial that the wheel for making which they were sued was no infringement of the Wolf patent, but was an entirely different wheel from the Wolf wheel in principle, and was an invention of William B. Treadwell one of the defendants, for which he had applied for a patent. They also claimed that the patentees of the Wolf wheel were not the first inventors of the thing patented by them, and that the patent was void on various other grounds.

The specification annexed to the patent was in these words: "To all whom it may concern: Be it known, that we Samuel Truscott, George Wolf, and James Dougherty, of the borough of Columbia, in the county of Lancaster, and state of Pennsylvania, have invented a new and improved mode of constructing cast iron wheels for rail-road cars and for other purposes; and we do hereby declare, that the following is a full and exact description thereof: We denominate our wheel 'The Double Plate Car Wheel,' because we use two plates instead of the spokes or arms usually employed, which plates are cast with the rim, and form one substance therewith. We give to the rim of our wheels the same form in all respects as is now given to the rims of car wheels; but, instead of arms, we cast our wheels with two parallel or nearly parallel plates, which plates are convex on one side and concave on the other. The hub or nave which is to receive the axle, is cast in the centre of these plates, extending from one of them to the other. The accompanying drawing gives a sectional view of one of our wheels; a a being the rim; b b the front and back plates, convex on one side and concave on the other; c c being the hollow or void space between them; and d d the nave or hub. The hollow c c between the two plates, is formed by a core in the process of casting, which core is supported in the flask by leaving suitable holes in the plates for that purpose, which holes serve also for the removal of the sand of which the core is formed. We cast our rim in a chill, in the usual manner, and, in consequence of the particular form given to the plates, they contract in cooling without danger of fracture, and without it being necessary to divide the hub, as is done when car wheels are cast with spokes or arms. The only effect of contraction is to flatten the two plates in a slight degree, operating in this respect like the curved arms of many cast iron wheels. We are aware that car wheels have been made with plates as a substitute for arms, but such plates have been made separate from the wheels and united together by screwed bolts, embracing the hub in a distinct piece between them. The difference between such wheels and those constructed by us is so obvious as not to need pointing out. What we claim as our invention and wish to secure by letters patent, is the manner of constructing wheels for rail-road cars, or for other purposes to which they may be applied, with double convex plates, one convex outwards and the other inwards, and an undivided hub, the whole cast in one piece as herein fully set forth."

The wheel made by the defendants was cast all in one piece, and had a rim chilled in the usual manner, and a solid hub constructed in the usual manner. Next inwards from the inner circumference of the chilled rim, and starting from its centre, there was a concentric solid ring of metal, next a concentric hollow ring of metal, next another concentric solid ring of metal, and next the half of another concentric hollow ring of metal, a transverse section of which resembled an acute or lancet-shaped arch, its vertex joining the last named solid ring, and its abutments resting one on each end of the hub and enclosing an annular semi-cylindrical space around the hub, the whole so arranged that a plane extending from the centre of the hub to the centre of the inner circumference of the rim or tread of the wheel divided all the annular parts and the enclosed spaces into two equal parts.

In the course of the trial, the defendants offered evidence for the purpose of showing that the Wolf wheel was not a useful wheel, and, among other things, they offered to prove by a witness, Elias Johnson, that in April, 1847, he went to Columbia, to negotiate for the purchase of the Wolf patent, and that Truscott, one of the patentees, then told him that the wheel had been abandoned and had failed and was worthless. Truscott had assigned all his interest in the patent to Frederick Baugher and George Wolf on the 3d of August, 1839, reserving to himself, however, one manufacturing right not to be located within one hundred miles of Columbia. He assigned his reserved right on the 26th of May, 1847. The plaintiff did not become interested in the patent till the 11th of June, 1847. Truscott had been examined by deposition as a witness for the plaintiff on the trial, but had not been interrogated by the defendants as to any conversation between him and the witness Johnson. The plaintiff's counsel objected to the evidence offered on the ground that it was hearsay evidence; that at the time specified Truscott had no interest in the patent; that the matter sought to be proved could only be proved by Truscott himself; that he had been examined as a witness and should have been enquired about then as to the matter; that he had assigned to Baugher and Wolf in August, 1839, and had nothing in April, 1847, but a reserved shop-right that was nothing till located; that he could not be called to impeach the patent in any greater proportion than he was the owner of it at the time, because it was only as being an owner that his declaration was sought to be proved; that the fact that the patent was not profitable or useful could not be proved by hearsay; and that that was all there was of the proof offered. The defendants' counsel urged that Truscott had an interest in the patent in April, 1847, because he had a right to establish a foundry to make the wheels not within one hundred miles of Columbia; that the amount of his interest was of no consequence; and that the evidence was admissible as a part of the res gestae. The court held the evidence to be inadmissible, and remarked that the declarations and admissions of an assignor after he had parted with his interest in personal property were inadmissible either to show a want of title in him, or to affect the quality of the article, or to impair the right of the purchaser in any respect; that this case came clearly within that doctrine; and, besides, that the evidence was not offered to contradict Truscott, and, if it was, he should have been first interrogated as to the matter. During the trial, the defendants called as a witness one Robert T. Fry, and proposed to prove by him that one Matthias W. Baldwin, prior to the invention of the Wolf wheel by the patentees, invented and had knowledge of a wheel identical with the Wolf wheel. The defendants, in their notice of special matter under section 15 of the patent act of July 4th, 1836 (5 Stat. 125), had given notice of Baldwin as having had such prior knowledge, but had given no notice of the name of Fry. The plaintiff's counsel objected that the witness could not show that Baldwin knew of the invention, because that would be showing that the witness knew of it himself, and that the witness could not show that he knew of it himself because his name was not in the notice. The court overruled the objection and admitted the evidence.

William H. Seward, Samuel Stevens and Samuel Blatchford, for plaintiff.

Seth P. Staples, Azor Taber and Rodman L. Joice, for defendants.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and CONKLING, District Judge.

NELSON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The first branch of the case which it is necessary to examine and settle, is the improvement which the plaintiff claims that his patentees have discovered. For this purpose we must call your attention to the specification. That contains a description of the invention by the patentees in their own language, and affords the highest evidence of the thing or instrument which they claim to have discovered. They begin by stating, in very general terms, that they have discovered a new and improved mode of constructing cast iron wheels for railroad cars. They denominate the wheel they have discovered, the double plate wheel, because, as they say, they use two plates instead of spokes or arms as usually employed before in constructing the rail-road wheel, the two plates being cast with the rim and hub and forming one piece with them. The patentees then describe the mode of constructing their wheel. The rim, they say, is cast as usual. They claim nothing new in this respect, but that, instead of spokes or arms, they cast their wheel with parallel plates, which are convex on one side and concave on the other. The hub which is to receive the axle is cast in the centre of these plates, extending from one plate to the other. They then explain the reason why they can cast an iron rail-road wheel with double plates and a solid hub and still retain the chilled rim. This is owing to the form which they give to the plates, which allows for the expansion by heat and the contraction by cooling in the plates in chilling the rim. This fact or process in constructing the rail-road wheel, by which they avoid this effect of expansion and contraction, and, of course, the breaking of the iron by the contraction, has been explained, illustrated and confirmed by all the witnesses whose attention has been called to the subject. There is no pretence or evidence in the case that this was new. On the contrary, it is admitted by the patentees in their specification, that this mode of avoiding the effect of the contraction of iron was known before. Curved arms, they say, were used in casting the spoke wheel with a chilled rim.

The patentees then state, that they are aware that car wheels had been made with plates as a substitute for arms before their discovery, but that such plates were made separate from the rim and hub and united together with screws or bolts, embracing the hub between them. Then they state their claim, which is the most material part of the specification. The claim is the attempt on the part of an inventor, to describe the very thing which he supposes he has invented and for which he asks the patent. The claim of the patentees here is the manner of constructing a wheel for rail-road cars, with double convex plates, one convex outwards and the other inwards, and an undivided hub, the whole cast in one piece. That is the claim; and, on comparing it with the model of the wheel, it is found to be a perfect description and one that cannot well be mistaken.

It was supposed by one of the counsel for the defendants, that the claim here was for the method or mode of constructing the wheel, as distinct from the instrument itself; not for the rail-road wheel as constructed, but for the mode or process of producing it. But, on examining the language used, it will be found that the good sense of the claim embraces a wheel constructed in the manner set forth in the specification. That is the thing which the patentees were aiming at. It was the car wheel for practical use in running rail-road cars, and a description of the mode or process of constructing the wheel, was essential for the purpose of explaining the thing which they believed they had invented. It was the instrument after it was made which they claimed to have discovered, and which was new and of general utility.

We do not understand, either, that the patentees set up any claim to the parts of this wheel taken separately; that is, the plates, the rim or the hub, when regarded separately and distinct from the perfect wheel. But we understand that they claim the entire wheel as they have constructed it, and which embodies the new idea in the mind of the inventor. This is claimed as a new manufacture, and as the subject of a patent.

They do not claim the solid hub. There is nothing in the specification indicating an intention to claim that as a thing they have discovered and which was never before in public use. Nor do they claim the chilled rim, nor, in terms, the plates separately. The plates taken separately are as old almost as any other form of matter. There could be no novelty in the parts when taken separately; indeed, many and perhaps all of the separate parts which go to constitute this new manufacture, taken detached from the wheel and according to the names given to them, will be found to have existed in most of the wheels theretofore constructed. A rim and a hub are probably essential to constitute a wheel of any description, and the use of plates, as a substitute for spokes, was doubtless common and well known, particularly in the construction of wooden wheels. All that part of the case may be laid entirely out of view, for the patentees claim that they have manufactured a cast iron wheel, with double plates, a solid hub, and a chilled rim, all cast in one piece, and that such a wheel had never before been produced. For that instrument they asked a patent, and for that the patent was granted. The plates were made convex, one inward and one outward, but this peculiar form given we do not understand as essential, or claimed to be essential, any further than as respects a form that will allow for the contraction of the plates in cooling, the allowance being made for the purpose of procuring a chilled rim. This particular form is given as one which affords an allowance for that particular principle in iron. Undoubtedly, if the form of the plate could be regarded with reference simply to the great desideratum—strength—in the construction of a rail-road wheel, it would be made on a plane. The plates would be made straight, because all the experts who have been examined on the subject say, that strength is the quality desirable in a rail-road wheel, and that the plane or straight plate would afford to a wheel the greatest possible strength. That form would be adopted were it not necessary to make an allowance for contraction in cooling, and avoid breaking in chilling the rim; and any form that will make the proper allowance for that principle of iron, is all that is essential, so far as regards the form of the plate, except that it is essential the form should approach as nearly to a straight plate as practicable, and allow, at the same time, for this principle of expansion and contraction.

It was objected by one of the counsel for the defendants to the description of the plaintiff's wheel in the specification, that it is not sufficiently particular and specific to distinguish the improved wheel from the old article on which it is claimed the improvement was made; and the law has been very properly referred to, for the purpose of showing that it is necessary that the patentee should so describe his improvement as to distinguish it from the old structure on which it is claimed to be an improvement. We think the description is sufficiently particular and specific. Indeed, so far as regarded the improvement itself, the objection was not very strongly urged; but the principal objection was, that the old instrument or thing on which the improvement was made was not described, and that therefore a mechanic would not, on the perusal of the description, be able to distinguish between the old thing and the improvement.

But, as we understand this part of the specification, this improvement was made on the old cast iron spoke wheel, and when the patentees refer in general terms to this old instrument as a cast iron spoke wheel, that affords all the information which is necessary to a person skilled in that department. They say they have substituted the double plates for the spokes. That is the essence of their improvement; a substitution, in the mode they have pointed out. A strong illustration of the soundness of this view is found in the testimony of James Dougherty, who states that the first wheel the patentees cast was cast from a pattern that had been made for casting a spoke wheel, by substituting a core for the spokes.

This being the new manufacture of the patentees, the next question you have to settle is as to its originality, and whether they were the first inventors of the article, because it is insisted on the part of the defendants that they were not. The patent was issued on the 17th of March, 1838. The application for it was made on the 13th of January, 1838. The first wheel was cast at Wolf's foundry, in Columbia, in the fall of 1837, from the pattern of a spoke wheel. That is the date of the invention. The idea seems to have occurred to the patentees early in the fall of 1837, and late in the fall the invention was complete by the casting of the wheel. These wheels went into use immediately on the Philadelphia and Columbia rail-road, and on the Baltimore and Susquehanna rail-road. Many were cast in 1838, 1839, and 1840, also in 1841, 1842, and 1843. This is stated by Wolf, who was the owner of the foundry, and by Smedly, who was concerned in casting the wheels. Smedly says, that during this time, from eight hundred to one thousand of these wheels were put into use on those two roads, and that many of the wheels now in use on the Columbia rail-road, are wheels he cast in that foundry in 1838.

A point is made on the part of the defendants that, conceding this wheel to have been an original production of the patentees, there is no utility in it. But, it will be seen that one thousand were cast and went into general use, and were valuable for the purposes for which they were manufactured. It is not necessary, to maintain a patent, or the right of the inventor, that the thing invented should be the very best article for the use to which it can be applied. Indeed, the objection generally comes with bad grace from a person charged with an infringement, because, if the invention is of no utility, then he ought not to use it, and the very fact of his using it, if he is using it, shows that his practice and his professions, as regards the utility of the instrument, are very much at variance. On the evidence in the case, although the jury should find that the plaintiff's wheel is not the best wheel, yet if it is at all valuable, if its use for the purpose for which it is constructed is practicable, that is sufficient to sustain it as a useful invention.

It is said that three wheels had been constructed and were in use prior to the improvement claimed by the patentees; one a wheel of Baldwin, of Philadelphia; one a wheel of Tiers, also of Philadelphia; and one a wheel of James, of New-York. It is claimed that each of these wheels was substantially identical with the plaintiff's.

Baldwin's wheel, the only one of his wheels relied on in this branch of the case, is a cast iron rail-road wheel, from a pattern which is before you. That pattern was made and the wheel was cast from it sometime in 1835. The time is fixed by Robert T. Fry, who was at the head of Baldwin's establishment at the time. Baldwin himself is unable to fix the time. He says that it was before 1838, as nearly as he can define it. Fry fixes the time. He says the pattern was made and the wheel cast in the old shop, and that they moved from the old shop to the new one in the fall of 1835. This was before the date of the Wolf patent. Baldwin is unable to say how many were cast. Fry is unwilling to say that any number beyond four were cast. The pattern of this wheel of Baldwin's has been critically examined by the experts in your presence. Most of the experts, indeed all of them, concede that the compensating principle for the expansion and contraction of iron is not to be found in the shape there given to the plates of the wheel; that the plate is not a curved plate, but is a straight conical plate, and is not better than if it had been a horizontal plate so far as regards the principle of contraction.

But this is not the most material part of the evidence. It is admitted that the four wheels cast were cast by way of experiment, and that the experiment was abandoned. Baldwin's testimony is as follows: "That none of the wheels cast from the pattern are extant; that he cannot tell how many of them he cast; that he has no data by which he can tell how many; that he cannot tell what became of them; that the success of that experiment was like the others; that they were all very much alike in the result; that that result was," and this is the material part, "breaking in the casting and soft in the tread; that they ascertained these defects sometimes on breaking them up; that, in a word, they were deficient in strength." They were therefore abandoned, and it was an abortive experiment beyond all doubt.

It is not enough, gentlemen, to conceive the idea of a new manufacture, or of a new and useful instrument. That alone is of no benefit to mankind, and is not worthy of the patronage of government. The new idea must be reduced to some practical use before it can become the subject of a patent, or be set up and relied on to defeat a patent.

It here appears from the person himself who is set up as the inventor, Baldwin, that all the wheels made from the pattern failed and were abandoned, and it appears from the evidence in the case that there were but four cast, and those by way of experiment. We shall not trouble you further on the subject of this wheel of Baldwin's, except to say that the practical result in casting that wheel goes to confirm the opinion of the experts, that it did not contain the principle which is essential to cast the double plate rail-road wheel with a solid hub and a chilled rim.

The next wheel is the Tiers wheel, of which a model is before you. It has double plates resting on spokes or arms, both on the inner and the outer side. The same objection, founded on the testimony of the experts, is made to this wheel, that was made to the wheel of Baldwin. No allowance is made for the expansion and contraction of the plates. The expansion and contraction are prevented by the arms on which the plates rest, and the wheel is, in principle, the same as the cast iron wheel with straight plates or straight spokes. This wheel was made in December, 1835, or in the spring of 1836. Tiers says, that he took out a patent for a spoke wheel in December, 1835, and that soon after, or about that time, he made some wheels with double plates and spokes inside. But it was early enough, if the experiment was successful, to defeat the invention of the plaintiff's patentees. Tiers says, that from half a dozen to a dozen wheels were cast after the pattern of the wheel of which this is a model; that they were all cast by way of experiment, that the experiment was not satisfactory, for the reason that they cracked around the rim, and that they were abandoned. I will refer you to his testimony in regard to this wheel, he speaking himself as the inventor, of his own knowledge and with the best opportunity of any witness. He says on his cross-examination, "that all the wheels that deponent made, of the kind not patented, were made with arms in the middle, like the models thereof shown him on his direct examination; that they were all made as an experiment; that he relinquished the experiment after making the number mentioned in his direct examination; that they were all made about the same time; that they were not satisfactory to him, for the reason that they appeared to be cracked around the rim in a few days after they were made, a circumstance which often happens in castings; that the castings, when they came out, would appear all right, and, after a short time, would be cracked for want of the proper proportions." This is the account he gives of his wheel cast in the spring of 1836. He abandoned it while it was in process of experiment, because it failed and cracked. It thus stands on the same footing as the wheel cast shortly before by Baldwin in the same city, and it failed undoubtedly for want of the compensating principle, if we can believe the testimony of the experts. No perfect wheel, according to Tiers' evidence, was cast by him. He does not give us to understand that he succeeded in perfecting his wheel so as to bring it into any public use, and therefore he abandoned it.

The next wheel is the James wheel. These two models represent his wheel. It is a single plate wheel, with a solid hub and chilled rim. In one of them is the improvement he made of strengthening the rim by a ring on the inside of the wheel. This wheel was cast in the city of New-York, in 1834, at Mr. James' establishment, in Eldridge street. The wheels were immediately put in use on the New-York and Harlem railroad, and they were also put in use on the New-Jersey railroad. Mr. James says, from a reference to his books, that the wheel was cast as early as 1834.

It is insisted that this wheel embodies the same invention as the double plate wheel of the plaintiff, and it is probably the only wheel produced on the part of the defendants that will require your examination. On the part of the plaintiff it is claimed that his patentees have constructed an entirely different instrument, not only different in form, (which of itself would in general amount to nothing,) having double plates and being hollow, but a wheel of greater strength and security, embodying in its production mechanical contrivance and ingenuity that are not found in the James wheel, and involving a new invention beyond anything to be found in that wheel. It is alleged that the plates of the plaintiff's wheel support both ends of the solid hub, one plate supporting one end of it, and the other plate the other end, and that the rim is supported by the two plates, one on either edge of the rim, and that in this respect the wheel is different from the James wheel, not only in mechanical contrivance, but in producing a new and useful result. Mr. Dunham, an exceedingly intelligent mechanist, said, that so far as regarded the effect of vertical pressure on the two wheels, he did not think that the plaintiff's wheel had the advantage, but he admitted that as respected lateral pressure its construction was the better one. Experts on both sides have been examined at large, and, as usual, they differ in opinion. Some consider the James wheel quite as good as the plaintiff's wheel. Some think it superior, and say that it embodies every thing claimed as new in the plaintiff's wheel. Other experts take a different view, and give reasons in detail why they regard the plaintiff's wheel not only as a different manufacture from the James wheel, but as a better article, of greater strength and of greater practical utility.

It is a question of fact which the jury must determine, whether there was anything substantially new in the mechanical construction of the plaintiff's wheel. But there is one fact to which we will call your attention, that is entitled to some consideration on this branch of the case, although it is not decisive. The James wheel was in general use on the Harlem rail-road in 1834, and, to some extent, on the New-Jersey rail-road. Baldwin, in Philadelphia, in 1835, and Tiers in the same city, in 1836, one of them a year after, and the other a year and a half after the James wheel was in common use on those two roads, made trials to cast the double plate wheel, and we think, on the evidence in the case, it is fair to infer that they made their experiments with full knowledge of the James wheel. That wheel was in use the year before the experiments were made, in an adjoining state, on the New-Jersey rail-road, and publicly on the Harlem rail-road in New-York, and it is natural to conclude that persons bringing their minds to bear on the production of a valuable rail-road wheel, would take an interest in understanding the character of the wheels at that time and before in general use. If this inference be a fair one, and it is for the jury to say whether it is or not, then, with the James wheel before them, Baldwin and Tiers both failed to make a double plate wheel. They had the idea of such a wheel in their minds, but were unable to perfect it. The conclusion would seem to follow, that the James wheel and the double plate wheel were not necessarily identical, or that the former would naturally lead to the making of the latter, without any ingenuity other than ordinary mechanical skill.

There is one more question left. It is, whether the defendants' wheel is in substance identical with the plaintiff's wheel. The question is one of fact. There must be a substantial difference between the two wheels in their mechanical construction; and not only a difference in that, but the defendants' wheel must involve something that required mind and ingenuity over and beyond that of the plaintiff's patentees. It must embody a different principle from that found in the plaintiff's wheel. A change of form will not do, inasmuch as a different form might answer all the purposes of the first invention. There are instruments invented, in which the particular form is a material part of the discovery, and then a departure from the form would be a substantial departure, because the form is essential to the invention. But there are many new manufactures, where the particular form of the thing is not essential to its utility, and there may be a departure from that form and still a valuable instrument be constructed. Take the plaintiff's wheel for an illustration. The curved form is given to the plates to allow for the expansion and contraction of the plates in casting the chilled rim. But, for the purpose of making allowance for contraction, any other form involving the principle of that allowance may be used, and there would obviously be no substantial change in the thing manufactured, because the particular form given by the first inventors is not essential to the production of the instrument. If the form is a part of the thing invented and is essential to its value, then a change from the form is a substantial change, and may be the means of producing a new manufacture. Take the Blanchard machine as an illustration. It is one of the most ingenious machines of the day, and is constructed to turn irregular forms after a pattern, such as gun-stocks, lasts, and spokes for carriage wheels. Blanchard, in his machine, cuts the block, whether for a last or a gun-stock or a spoke, after a pattern, by means of rotating cutters. A modification of this machine was made and set up as a new machine, and claimed not to be an infringement. Instead of rotating cutters, the cutters were made stationary, and the block rotated. It was claimed that this was an entirely different principle from Blanchard's, and that the party making the change had not violated his patent. Now, any person of common understanding would see that the thing could be done in that way. It was a mere difference in the mechanical contrivance, and a change of form, in which there was no skill and no ingenuity. This illustrates the difference between a change of form, and a substantial change involving mind, ingenuity and invention.

Applying these principles to the two wheels, you are to say whether the defendants' wheel involves, in the substantial parts of it, anything different from the double plate wheel of the plaintiff. If it does, then it is not an infringement of the plaintiff's patent. If it does not, then it is, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover the sum of $150, the amount agreed on.

The jury were discharged, being unable to agree upon a verdict.

The construction given by the court in this case to the Wolf patent was substantially affirmed by the supreme court in the case of Sizer v. Many, on writ of error from the circuit court for the Massachusetts district, decided at the December term, 1851. See [16 How. (57 U. S.) 98].

[For other cases involving this patent see Many v. Sizer, Cases Nos. 9,056 and 9,057.]

Case No. 9,056.

MANY v. SIZER et al.

[1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 17.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Jan., 1849.

PATENTS—PRIORITY—EXPERIMENT—COMBINATION OF KNOWN PARTS — AMOUNT OF LABOR INVOLVED—GREATER UTILITY—CAR WHEELS.

1. Experiment, alone, is not sufficient to constitute priority of invention; the article must be completed for public use.

2. The conception of the idea and an attempt to produce it, ending in unsuccessful experiment, can not defeat a subsequent patent.

3. If the patentee borrowed the idea of the different parts which go to constitute his invention, and for the first time brought them together into one whole, which is materially different from any whole that existed before, he is the original and first inventor.

4. It is of no consequence how much or how little labor, study or thought the invention cost, if it is to be really a new and useful invention.

5. Superior utility in the defendant's is evidence that some new principle, or mechanical power, or new mode of operation, producing a new kind of result has been introduced, and the greater such utility, the stronger such evidence.

6. But this utility must be derived from the changes introduced, not from the use of better material or greater skill or care in the manufacture.

This was an action on the case, tried before Judge Sprague and a jury, for the infringement of letters patent [No. 640] granted to Trescott, Wolf, and Dougherty, March 17, 1848, and assigned to plaintiff [William V. Many], for a new and improved mode of constructing cast-iron wheels for railroad cars. The defendants [George W. Sizer and Henry Sizer] denied the validity of the patent, and the infringement; denying the validity of the patent because the invention was neither new nor useful. Upon these issues a large amount of testimony was introduced, the material portions of which are referred to in the charge of the court.

The specification accompanying the letters patent is as follows: "Be it known, that we, Samuel Trescott, George Wolf, and James Dougherty, of the borough of Columbia, in the county of Lancaster, and state of Pennsylvania, have invented a new and improved mode of constructing cast-iron wheels, for railroad cars, and for other purposes; and we do hereby declare that the following is a full and exact description thereof: We denominate our wheel the "double-plate car-wheel," because we use two plates instead of the spokes, or arms, usually employed, which plates are cast with the rim, and form one substance therewith; we give to the rim of our wheels the same form, in all respects, as is now given to the rim of car-wheels; but instead of arms, we cast our wheels with two parallel—or nearly parallel—plates, which plates are convex on one side and concave on the other; the hub, or nave which is to receive the axle, is cast in the center of these plates, extending from one of them to the other; the accompanying drawing gives a sectional view of one of our wheels, "a a" being the rim, "b b" the front and back plates, convex on one side, and concave on the other; "c c" being the hollow or void space between them, and "d d" the nave or hub; the hollow, "c c," between the two plates, is formed by a core, in the process of casting, which core is supported in the flask by leaving suitable holes in the plates for that purpose, which holes serve for the removal of the sand of which the core is formed. We cast our rim in a chill, in the usual manner; and, in consequence of the particular form given to the plates, they contract in cooling; without danger of fracture, and without it being necessary to divide the hub, as is done when car-wheels are cast with spokes, or arms. The only effect of contraction is to flatten the two plates in a slight degree, operating, in this respect, like the curved arms of many cast-iron wheels. We are aware that car-wheels have been made with plates as a substitute for arms, but such plates have been made separate from the wheels, and united together by screwed bolts, embracing the hub in a distinct piece between them. The difference between such wheels and those constructed by us, is so obvious as not to need pointing out. What we claim as our invention, and wish to secure by letters patent, is the manner of constructing wheels for railroad cars, or for other purposes to which they may be applied, with double-curved plates, one convex outward, the other inward, and an undivided hub, the whole cast in one piece, as herein fully set forth. Samuel Trescott, George Wolf, James Dougherty."

B. R. Curtis, for plaintiff.

A. McArthur and R. Choate, for defendants.

SPRAGUE, District Judge (charging jury). There are several things required by the patent laws of the United States to entitle an inventor to a patent. He must be the original and first inventor, and the thing patented must be useful. The letters patent are prima facie evidence of both these points, and are sufficient, in the first instance, to entitle the party holding them to maintain a suit for an infringement. Then, if the validity of the patent be contested, the burden of proof is on the defendant. In this instance, the defendants allege two grounds on which they say the plaintiff's patent is invalid. First, that the original patentees were not the first inventors; that though they might have been original, they were not the first. They must be the first, as well as original inventors; for if the thing they produce existed before, though they might have been ignorant of it, they can not take and hold any exclusive right to what before was public property.

The first question, then, is one of priority of invention. Several wheels have been produced and exhibited to you by the defendants, and it is for you to say whether any of them is substantially the same in principal as the plaintiff's, and if so, whether it existed before his patent. And here comes the question, what is the plaintiff's patent? He claims a thing, as a whole; it is made up of several things, or parts, but the claim, after all, is for a whole. In that whole are embraced the several things of which you have heard so much during the trial—the chilled rim, the solid hub, the two curved plates, all cast at once, and forming one substance, one thing, one manufacture, for one use; it is to be taken as a whole, and if you find that as a whole it existed before, then his claim is not valid.

[1] [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Now, it is necessary to look at the various wheels put in evidence. First, the Elgar wheel, which is a patented article. It is not alleged that in substance this is the same as the plaintiff's, but it has been introduced to show that it has some of its features, and that he has borrowed from it some of his ideas. It has two plates, not of cast-iron, but of wrought-iron, which were screwed or bolted to the rim and hub. In these respects there is a difference between it and the plaintiff's wheel, and this difference is adverted to in the specification of the plaintiff himself.

But I ought, before going any farther, to say to you, that when I state the peculiarities of these different wheels, or any other matter of fact, you are not to take the statement of fact from me; it is your exclusive privilege and duty to judge of all questions of fact.

Then, second, there is the Dunham wheel. Mr. Dunham himself has been on the stand before you. In his wheel, he had double plates to a certain extent; but they did not reach from the rim to the hub; instead of continuous plates, he employed them only for a portion of the distance, and used spokes for the rest; if that does not constitute two plates, connecting the hub and the rim, then it is not substantially the same as the plaintiff's.

Another wheel is that by Baldwin. That, you will recollect, was a double-plate cast-iron wheel; you will also remember, from the statements of the witnesses, that two only of them were cast, and then the manufacture was abandoned, because this wheel did not prove to be a good article. If, with respect to this wheel, you believe the evidence of the witness, Mr. Baldwin's foreman, who superintended the casting, that the plates were not curved so as to embrace the principle of compensation, that is, if they had not such a form given to them as to allow of contraction, without fracture, in the process of cooling—if that was wanting in the Baldwin wheel, then it is not substantially the same as the plaintiff's.

Then, again, there is the Tiers wheel. The deposition of Mr. Tiers has been produced, and he states that his wheel had spokes, or arms, between his plates, and he says that, after trying experiments, he abandoned the manufacture; now experiment, alone, is not sufficient to constitute priority of invention. The article must be completed for public use, and the result must be known, although it is not necessary that it should be actually used by the public; the question is, whether the thing patented was before known? The conception of the idea, and the attempt to produce it, ending in unsuccessful experiment, is not sufficient to defeat a subsequent patent.

Now, there is still another wheel offered in evidence—the James wheel. You will recollect that it has one convex plate, with nothing to prevent a sufficient contraction in cooling. The question is, does that wheel, with its single convex plate, contain all the material parts of the Wolf wheel? The plaintiff alleges that he has introduced a second plate; if the second plate introduced by the plaintiff operates as a brace or truss to support the rim and hub, and thus introduces a new principle, or mechanical power, then the plaintiff's is not substantially the same as the James wheel.

These are all the single and separate wheels introduced by the defendants. I have adverted to them briefly; but you will remember, doubtless, all the peculiarities of their construction and principle.

But then comes this second question: If neither of these wheels, taken separately, will defeat the plaintiff's patent, will they all together? It is contended by the defendants, that all the parts going to constitute the plaintiff's wheel, were known before, and developed in prior wheels.

But if the patentee borrowed the idea of the different parts which go to constitute his wheel, and for the first time brought them together, into one whole, and that whole is materially different from any whole that existed before, then he is the original and first inventor, and is entitled to a patent therefor.

I have been requested to instruct you that it is of no consequence, as to the validity of a patent, how much, or how little labor, study, or thought the invention cost. And, gentlemen, this is so, if it be really a new and useful invention. The degree of labor and thought may be sometimes evidence to the jury, upon the question of invention; but although the invention be accidental, or a sudden flash of thought, the party is entitled to the benefit of his discovery.

I have also been requested to state, that it makes no difference as to the validity of a patent, if the same article or production was known before, whether such prior production or article was patented or not; and such undoubtedly is the law, as you must have seen from the directions already given you.

The next question that arises is that of utility; the statute requires the invention to be useful. The law does not say that it must be highly useful, or more useful than others; it must have some degree of utility, and that is all that is required. I have been requested to instruct you that an article can not be considered useful if it endangers human life, or is so expensive that manufacturers would not be induced to make it. Those may be very important considerations for you to take into view, but they are not necessarily conclusive; and you will determine, from a consideration of all the evidence, whether the invention is, upon the whole, a useful one.

Another question is: Whether the description given in the patentee's specification is sufficient to enable a skillful artisan to make the wheel from it? The description must be such as to enable a person skilled in the art to which the invention pertains, to make the thing patented in such a manner that it will be useful.

I next proceed to another, and perhaps I may say, the great question in this case, which has been argued very ably by the counsel on both sides. It is: Whether the defendants have infringed the plaintiff's patent? Now, the defendant himself has a patent for his wheel, and that patent is prima facie evidence that the wheel is his invention; that it is new and original in him, and the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to satisfy you that the defendant has infringed his patent. The defendant's patent being subsequent, can not operate to defeat the plaintiff's, if it be for substantially the same thing. The question is: Whether the article actually made by the defendants is substantially the same as that patented by the plaintiff? There is no dispute as to what is actually made by the one party and by the other. The things and productions of both the plaintiff and defendants are before you, as they have been actually constructed. You have the means of comparing them. The burden of proof, as I have said, in this respect, is on the plaintiff. He must prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendants have infringed his right. And the question is: Whether the article made by the defendants is substantially the same as that of the plaintiff? This is a matter of fact, and exclusively for your determination.

But here it becomes necessary to ascertain, with more precision, what is claimed and secured by the plaintiff's patent.

It is insisted, on the part of the defendant, that the plaintiff is restricted to the degree of curvature described in the drawing annexed to his specification. But the drawing is only an illustration, and the patentee is not limited to the degree of curvature therein represented. The plates are described, in the plaintiff's patent, as convex: and the question is: Whether they must be curved as wholes—that is, from rim to rim—or whether the curvature may be between hub and rim? It is contended by the plaintiff, that the drawing shows that the inner plate is struck from two centers, making some degree of curvature between hub and rim, subordinate to the general convexity. If this be so, and the curvature of the arms of some cast-iron wheels was previously well known to be between hub and rim, then I instruct you that the plaintiff is not confined to curvature between rim and rim, but that curvature between hub and rim is within his patent.

Another question relates to the arrangement of the plates. In the plaintiff's specification they are described as parallel, or nearly so, and the summing up states them to be: one convex outward, and the other inward; and it is insisted by the defendant, that the plaintiff is confined to that arrangement. But I feel bound to instruct you that such is not the law, and that the plaintiff is not restricted to plates that are curved or convexed in the same direction, but that his patent may cover plates, both curved inward or both curved outward, as well as those which are parallel, or nearly so.

Taking these views of the plaintiff's patent, you will come to the examination of the wheel made by the defendant, and see whether it is substantially the same. If the defendants have omitted any one material part found in the plaintiff's wheel, then their wheel is not the plaintiff's, and is not an infringement. They allege that they omit altogether the plates of plaintiff, and substitute others, materially different, and that is the question for you to examine and decide.

It is contended by the defendants, that if a person of competent skill could not, from the description given by the plaintiff, make a wheel like the defendants', then the plaintiff cannot prevail in this action. And this proposition is true, when properly understood. It is not necessary that one skilled in the art should be able, from the plaintiff's description, to make a wheel in the form of the defendants', but it is necessary that he should be able to make one substantially like the defendants'. For, if he could not, it would follow, either that the thing patented could not, from the description given by the patentee, be made by a person of competent skill, or that, when made, it would be substantially different from the defendants', and in such case, the plaintiff could not maintain this action. But this still brings us back to the question, whether the defendants' wheel is substantially the same as the plaintiff's. The defendants have introduced certain changes in the plates and their arrangement. If these are only changes of form and proportions of the thing patented—as described and set forth in the patent, without introducing any new principle or mechanical power, or new mode of operation producing a new kind of result—the defendants' wheel would, notwithstanding these changes, be an infringement of the plain-tiff's patent. But, if by such changes of form and arrangement, the defendant has introduced any new principle, or mechanical power, or has introduced a new mode of operation, producing a new kind of result, he has not infringed the plaintiff's patent.

If the changes made by the defendant have rendered his wheel one of greater utility than the plaintiff's, such utility is evidence that some new principle, or mechanical power, or new mode of operation, producing a new kind of result, has been introduced. And the greater such utility, the stronger is such evidence. And if a manifest and very high degree of utility is obtained by such changes, it becomes full proof and conclusive, that a new principle or mechanical power, or new mode of operation, producing a new kind of result, has been introduced, and that the defendants' wheel is no infringement.

There has been much evidence before you upon these points. You have the opinions of gentlemen of science and skill, of experts conversant with this particular art, upon this question, and also many detailed facts from those acquainted with the operation of the two wheels. You are to decide upon all this matter by exercising your own judgment upon the facts and reasonings submitted to you. You have another kind of evidence upon which you are also to pass, and that is the proof of the effect of both these productions when put to practical use.

Now, gentlemen, the opinion of experts—contrary to the general principle of law, which excludes opinions from going to a jury as evidence—is admissible in cases like this; cases involving questions of science and artistical skill, in which it is presumable that the jury are not versed, and with regard to which, therefore, they may desire the aid of other persons, skillful and versed in the art or science in question. Hence it is, that the results which such skillful and accomplished persons have arrived at, in their own minds, are suffered to go to the jury as matters of evidence. But they are not to be held as conclusive. They are to be judged of by you, and weighed by you, in the same manner as all the other evidence in the case.

And with regard to this matter, the plaintiff insists that the weight of evidence from the experts is on his side. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that it is clearly on theirs. It is for you to examine the testimony, and consider which side is entitled to be regarded as having the preponderance.

It is insisted, also, by the defendants, that the plaintiff's experts have given an explanation to the meaning they attach to the term "principle," which destroys the force of the opinion they have given as to the defendants' wheel being the same in principle with the plaintiff's; because, they say, it might require skill, ingenuity, thought, and experiment to arrive at the defendants' wheel from the plaintiff's description. Now, it may be that thought and experiment would arrive at something substantially different from the plaintiff's, and it may be that they would produce an article substantially the same, though formally different; and, it may be again, that much ingenuity, thought, experiment, and study may be employed to prevent a similitude in form, although the principle be the same, and so evade the patent.

Besides the opinions of the experts, you have the reasons given by them for such opinions, and the theories and deductions urged by the counsel. All agree that in casting a wheel in a chill, the first effect is a contraction of the rim, diminishing the circumference of the wheel, and thus producing a pressure upon the plates, which, in their heated state, causes them to yield, so as, in the first instance, to increase the curvature, and afterward, by the cooling of the interior, the curvature is reduced so as to be somewhat nearer a straight line than it was originally. The defendants contend that, by the contraction of the rim in the chill, the hub of the plaintiff's wheel rises; and that in the defendants' does not, and that this constitutes a material difference between them. The plaintiff insists that the hub of the defendants' wheel also rises, by the contraction of the rim in casting, and that if it were otherwise, still that would constitute no difference of principle. That the hub, or center of the plaintiff's plates rises, in the first instance, in the process of casting, there is no doubt, although at first it was controverted. Is it the same with the defendants'?

To this point you have the testimony of persons who have cast the wheel, and of others who have made the experiment for the purpose of determining this question; and models prepared with screws, for the purpose of illustrating the effect of the first contraction in casting the two wheels; and also the testimony and reasoning as to the necessary effect of the pressure by such contraction, upon the plates of the form used by the defendants.

It is urged by the plaintiff, that, although most of the curvature in the defendant's wheel is between hub and rim, yet there is what may be denominated a general curvature between rim and rim, and that this last curvature is in the same direction in both plates; so that when the contraction of the rim presses upon the mass of metal constituting the plates, such pressure is not in a straight line between rim and rim, and therefore the center of both plates is necessarily pressed upward, in a greater or less degree, although a part of such pressure may be exhausted upon the subordinate curves between hub and rim. The defendant, on the other hand, insists that there is no such general curvature, and the only effect of the contraction of the rim is to increase the curvature between hub and rim. It is for you to determine, upon all the evidence, whether there be a difference in this respect between the two wheels, and if so, whether it be material.

The curvature of the plates is also necessary, and perhaps even more important, to obviate the danger arising from the contraction of the interior portions of the wheel in cooling, which diminishes the curves, and eventually renders them somewhat less than they were as originally molded. There is no doubt that in this process the hub, or center of the plaintiff's plates, is depressed; but it is controverted whether such is the effect upon the defendants' plates. And upon this point, as well as upon the question of its materiality, you have the same evidence as upon the effect of the first contraction by chilling the rim.

Then, gentlemen, there is another question. It is said that the defendant obtains a distinct advantage, to which, indeed, his patent particularly adverts, by relieving the core in casting so that it need not be removed until the metal is cold. There is no evidence that the core of the plaintiff's wheel was, in fact, ever removed until it was cold, or that its remaining in has proved injurious. But it is urged by the defendant that some injury must have necessarily resulted, because, from the form of the plaintiff's wheel, the whole space between the two plates is at first filled by the core; and that this space being diminished by contraction in cooling, causes an injurious pressure; whereas, the effect of the same contraction upon the defendants' plates would be to increase the space between them, and thus relieve the core. This is denied by the plaintiff, who insists that the first contraction diminishes the space between the defendants' plates much more than any part of the process does the space between the plaintiff's.

There is another distinct species of evidence worthy of your deliberate consideration, and that is the practical effect produced by the changes introduced by the defendant. If the effect is a wheel of greater utility, that is evidence tending to show that some new principle, or mechanical power, or mode of operation, producing a new kind of result, has been introduced; and the higher the degree of utility, the stronger is such evidence. And it may arise to so high a degree as to become conclusive. From our inability to penetrate the secrets of nature, we may not be able to detect the new principle, or power, otherwise than by its effects. But this utility must be derived from the changes introduced—not from the use of better material, or greater skill or care in the manufacture.

Under this head, your first inquiry will be, whether the defendants' wheel is, in fact, superior to the plaintiff's? And if you find that it is, you will next consider whether such superiority is attributable to the changes introduced by the defendant, or to better material, and greater care and skill, or partly to one and partly to the other, and how much to each.

It is in evidence that about eleven hundred wheels were made by the patentees, from the date of their patent in 1838 to the year 1843, which were put upon the Pennsylvania railroads, and that some two hundred of them still continue in use.

And the plaintiff, moreover, insists that railroads, as they were constructed ten years ago, gave a more severe trial to wheels than they do as now built. It is further urged by him, that if any wheel has stood the test of every use, that fact should satisfy you that the article is a good one. And it is maintained, if one wheel can be made from a particular pattern, to stand the test of severe use, another wheel, or any number, can be made from the same pattern, equally good, with sufficient care and skill.

On the other side, it is insisted, that the Wolf wheels, as they were constructed, were bad; that they broke, and were, in fact, a worthless article, and that no one ever made a second purchase of them, but that the old spoke wheels were always substituted for those that failed; and that, with respect to the two wheels exhibited to you as having been run for several years, nobody knows to what use they were put, nor to what trial they were subjected. And again, it is added, that the patentees abandoned the manufacture of the Wolf wheel, and went back to the old cast-iron spoke wheel. This, the defendants contend, is of itself evidence which should satisfy you that the Wolf wheel is worthless. On the other hand, you have the deposition of Mr. Wolf himself, stating that the only reason why he abandoned the manufacture of his wheel was, that he could not procure the proper kind and quality of iron.

With regard to the second period of this wheel, as the counsel have designated it for convenience, it appears that in 1847 the plaintiff himself, at Albany, employed Messrs. Jagger, Treadwell and Perry to manufacture his wheel under his own supervision. The defendant contends that the attempt was a failure. The plaintiff contends that it was successful. One party says that the manufacture was given up because it was not successful, and because the wheel was not useful. The other maintains that that was not the reason for discontinuing the manufacture, but the reason was the want of suitable material. You have had the testimony from both sides before you upon this point. On the one hand, it is insisted that the most perfect opportunity was afforded for a successful production of the plaintiff's wheel; that the utmost care and skill were used in making it, and that the very best material was employed, and that this too, was frequently under the personal inspection of the plaintiff. But the other side contends that the testimony of the witnesses to these things should be taken with much allowance, especially so with regard to the evidence of Mr. Treadwell, who occupies an antagonistic position to the plaintiff.

Mr. Treadwell is the defendant, at Albany, in a suit brought for the infringement of this very patent. And standing in that position, it is urged that he has such an interest in the question, although not in this suit, that he must be biased. Mr. Kibbee, too, being in his employment, it is said, must be also under a bias. But then, on the other hand, it is stated that the plaintiff complained to the manufacturers of the quality of iron used, and it was changed, at his request. As to the quality of the iron, gentlemen, and the allegation that Treadwell & Co. did not use a proper material, you have the testimony of several witnesses, who state that, in the wheels made in 1847, or at least in that specimen of them which you have seen in the entry of the court-room, the iron was not of a suitable quality for railroad wheels.

You will satisfy yourselves, in the first place, whether the plaintiff manufactured a good wheel or not; and, in the second place, whether, if the manufacture did not turn out to be good, the fault was owing to the form of the plates, or to the inferiority of the material employed. And you are to judge in the same way concerning the defendants' production. You are to look at the tests by which it has been tried, the use to which it has been subjected, the number called for and made, and the various other circumstances in the case, which it is not necessary here to recapitulate. The witnesses from Springfield, produced by the defendant, have testified that some two thousand Sizer wheels were manufactured and sold, for use upon railroads, and that they have not known any of them to be returned. On the other hand, it is contended by the plaintiff, that with the present improved mode of constructing railroads, the strain, or test, or car-wheels is now not nearly so severe as it formerly was; and moreover, in fact, that several of the Sizer wheels upon the Old Colony road have failed. All this is a matter for your consideration.

I have been requested by the defendants to instruct you that the plaintiff's specification and description must be so clear and intelligible as to enable an artisan to make the patented wheel without any new invention or exercise of inventive power. This is so. But you must understand that it is only required of an inventor so to describe the article for which he seeks a patent, as that a person skilled in the particular art relating to it, can construct the fabric from the description, by the exercise of his skill as an artisan—not that it must be so described that a person unacquainted with, or unskilled in the art, may be enabled to produce it.

The only other question, gentlemen, in this case, is that of damages. If your verdict should be in favor of the defendants, this question will not arise. But if you should be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict, then you will have to determine the amount, which should be such as would indemnify the plaintiff for the injury he has sustained from the defendants' violation of his patent. The number of wheels which the defendant has made, and the amount of profit he has realized from them, have been presented to you by the plaintiff, as grounds of damages. They are proper to be taken into consideration, but are not conclusive as to the extent of the injury, which may be either greater or less than the profits realized by the defendants. A plaintiff may be manufacturing his patented article himself, and making it to a profit, while another man may make it to a disadvantage, and yet the spurious article carried into the market may displace the original. In such case, the injury to the patentee would be greater than any profit upon the spurious production. On the other hand, a defendant's article may not displace the original, and in that case the injury would be less. And again, it may be that a plaintiff may derive a profit from licensing other parties to construct his invention; and any piracy upon it, by depriving him of a portion of the profits of such licenses, would be an injury to be taken into account by a jury.

If your verdict should be for the plaintiff, he is entitled to damages to the full extent of the injury he has sustained from the wrongful acts of the defendants.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

[NOTE. The judgment against the defendant was entered as follows: "It is thereupon considered by the court that the said William V. Many recover against the said George W. & Henry Sizer, the sum of $1,733.75 damages, and costs of suit taxed at ———." Subsequently the defendants sued out a writ of error from the supreme court, for the purpose of having the above judgment revised. The judgment of the circuit court was affirmed December, 1851; case unreported. Upon the receipt of the mandate issued by the supreme court, commanding such execution and proceedings be had in the cause as ought to be had, it was presented to the circuit court, and leave applied for to have the costs in the action taxed and inserted in the blank left in the original record of the judgment. This motion was refused, and plaintiff thereupon applied to the supreme court for a mandamus to direct the circuit court to tax and allow his costs in the original action, amounting to $1,811.59. The motion was overruled for want of jurisdiction. 14 How. (55 U. S.) 24. Judgment having been entered on the original verdict, the case was carried by writ of error to the supreme court, where it was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. 16 How. (57 U. S.) 98.

[This cause was heard on a motion for a provisional injunction in June, 1849, founded upon the verdict in this case. The injunction was refused. Case No. 9,057.

[For another case involving this patent see Many v. Jagger, Case No. 9,055.]

Case No. 9,057.

MANY v. SIZER et al.

[1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 31.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. June, 1849.

FEDERAL COURTS — COMITY—WHEN NOT APPLICABLE—EFFECT OF VERDICT—CONSTRUCTION OF PATENT—INJUNCTION.

1. The rule of comity which requires judges of the federal courts to conform to the opinions of each other, if any have been given, has no application either by its terms, or the reason on which it is founded, to motions for injunctions where error may be followed by irremediable mischief.

2. The rendition of a verdict in a patent case in favor of a plaintiff is not conclusive, upon the right of such party to an injunction.

3. The question is not, what might have been done, but what has been done by the patentees. And although the court will endeavor, ut res valeat, so to construe the patent as to make it coextensive with the invention, yet the language used may be too clear to be controlled by any extrinsic evidence.

[This was a suit by William V. Many against George W. Sizer and Henry Sizer to enjoin the infringement of letters patent No. 640 granted to Trescott, Wolf, and Dougherty, March 17, 1848. The cause is heard on a motion for a provisional injunction founded upon the verdict of the jury in an action of trespass on the case between the same parties. Case No. 9,056.]

B. R. Curtis, for complainant.

A. McArthur and Rufus Choate, for defendants.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. This application is founded upon the result of the recent trial between the same parties. Exceptions having been allowed in that case, the numerous questions of law which arose in it are yet to be decided by the supreme court. In the mean time the plaintiff prays for an injunction. On the one hand, if the right be in him, although he may have an action for damages, that remedy may be inadequate. On the other hand, if the defendants should be prohibited from carrying on the manufacture in which they are now engaged, and the right should ultimately be decided to be in them, they would have no remedy for the loss sustained by arresting their business. Is the plaintiff's right so clear, and the presumptions in his favor so strong, as to entitle him to the interposition which he now asks? This requires an examination of the questions raised by the exceptions. The first and most important is that which relates to the construction of the plaintiff's patent. At the trial the plaintiff's counsel presented an authenticated report of a trial upon the same patent before the United States circuit court, at Albany, in October last, and insisted that the rulings therein had not only all the weight which the learning and ability of the judges would have given them under any circumstances, but became obligatory by virtue of the rule laid down in Washburn v. Gould [Case No. 17,214], where it is said, "the rule of comity always observed by the justices of the supreme court, in cases which admit of being carried before the whole court, was to conform to the opinions of each other, if any had been given." And Judge Story accordingly adopted a previous ruling made by Mr. Justice McLean. That case was also an action upon a patent, and precisely applicable to the question before me, and I felt bound to conform to a rule established by all the judges of the supreme court. Having thus concluded to adopt the construction of the patent given in the circuit court at Albany, the plaintiff was entitled to the full benefit thereof, and I did not deem it proper to weaken its force by arguments against it, but contented myself with indicating to counsel that it was the result of authority rather than of my own judgment. The above rule of comity has no application either by its terms, or the reason on which it is founded, to motions for injunctions where error may be followed by irremediable mischief. And I am now compelled to consider the true interpretation of the plaintiff's patent without the relief of any previous binding exposition.

At the close of their claim, the patentees state their claim in the following words: "What we claim as our invention, and wish to secure by letters patent, is the manner of constructing wheels for railroad cars, or for other purposes to which they may be applied, with double convex plates, one convex outward and the other inward, and an undivided hub, the whole cast in one piece, as herein fully set forth." The plaintiff, by his counsel, contends that his patent is not for an organized machine, nor for a combination, but for a unit or whole, to the making of which, however, he says certain ingredients or parts are essential, which are a drilled rim, solid hub, two plates connecting the rim and hub, and so far apart as to operate as a brace, the one for the other, all cast at one time, so as to constitute one substance, and the plates curved to such a degree that, in the process of casting, they would first yield to the pressure of the circumference in chilling the rim, and afterward contract in the process of cooling, without fracture. And further, that this claim is not limited to any one kind of curvature, or any particular location of it, or any arrangement of the plates, that the curvature may be wholly between the center and circumference, and the plates may be both convex inward or both convex outward. By the plaintiff's construction, his claim is not merely for the result—the article—the wheel, after it has been made, possessing certain mechanical powers or properties, as two plates connecting the rim and hub, and supporting both, placed far enough apart to act as a brace, the one for the other—for the pre-existing Elgar wheel had all these properties. The plates of that, however, were wrought and fastened to the rim and hub with bolts and screws.

[1] [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The plaintiff therefore proceeds further, and claims a wheel made by the process of casting, nor does he stop there, because the Baldwin wheel, if indeed that did not end in mere experiment, which would be a question of fact for the jury, was a double-plate wheel, cast all at one time, and the plates far enough apart to support the rim and hub, and to brace each other. But the plates were not so curved as to obviate the difficulty of contraction in cooling, and the plaintiffs proceed still further, and claim that their patent introduces that compensating principle as it has been called. The defendant insists that in his plates the curvature is wholly between the center and circumference, and that all the convexity is inward. The plaintiff contends that by the true construction of his claim, which has been above quoted, the words "double convex plates" and "an undivided hub, the whole cast in one piece," are to be operative and essential, but that the words, "one convex outward and the other inward" are to be inoperative.

It is to be observed, that the language which indicates that the plates are to be curved is "double convex plates." The question arises whether a plate, as a whole, may be said to be convex, by reason of wrinkles or minor curvatures between the center and the circumference, leaving the center still in in the plane of the circumference. This question is not unimportant, and some light may be thrown upon it by extrinsic evidence hereafter to be adverted to. Without pausing upon it here, let us proceed to the inquiry whether the words "one convex outward and the other inward" are to be rejected as inoperative. These words are as clear and imperative as any part of the summing up. If it be said that they relate to form, so does the word convex which immediately precedes them and is essential to the plaintiff's claim. Shall then the words "with double convex plates" be retained, and the words which immediately follow, qualifying them and prescribing the kind of arrangement of convex plates, be rejected? Shall a single sentence of this prescribed form be thus dissevered, and thereby give to the plaintiff the right to double convex plates generally, instead of such double convex plates as he has specified?

The patentees commence their summing up by saying that what they claim as their invention, and wish to secure by letters patent, is the manner of constructing wheels, etc., and close it by words "as herein set forth," referring to the preceding specification, which is to be carefully examined, and the whole instrument construed together. The specification is as follows: The patentees begin by saying that their invention is a new and improved mode of constructing cast-iron wheels, etc., and then proceed to give a full description of such mode, in which it is said that the wheel is to be cast with two parallel, or nearly parallel plates, which plates are convex on one side and concave on the other. Here again the plates are to be convex, but instead of saying the one is to convex outward and the other inward, they are required to be "parallel, or nearly so," which can not be unless they are bent in the same direction, that is one convex outward and the other inward. The language as imperatively requires that they shall be parallel, or nearly so, as that they shall be convex. The illustration by the drawing also represents them as parallel.

Thus far the specification seems to be in exact conformity with the summing up, but it has been urged that the subsequent reference to the curved arms of cast-iron wheels suggests the idea that the curvature of the plates may be the same as had previously been known in such arm. If this were so it might affect the question, whether the convexity was to be of the plate as a whole, that is between rim and rim, or might be a curvature between rim and hub only, but would not reach the question of the parallelism of the plates. But let us see what is the real force of this reference. It reads thus: "In consequence of the particular form given to the plates, they contract in cooling, without danger of fracture, and without its being necessary to divide the hub as is done when car wheels are cast with spokes or arms. The only effect of contraction is to flatten the two plates in a slight degree, operating in this respect like the curved arms of many cast-iron wheels." Here is nothing waiving or varying the form previously prescribed, but only an explanation of the effect of that particular form, namely, that it allows of contraction, and then states the result of that contraction, viz., the flattening of the plates, and as an illustration refers to the curved arms of cast-iron wheels. It does not say that they adopt the form of such arms, but only that the particular form which they have previously described will, in one respect, viz., that of flattening the plates, operate like such curved arms.

The language of the summing up, so far from being inconsistent with the preceding specification, seems to be fully sustained by it.

Let us now advert to the extrinsic evidence, and see what aid we can derive from the history and condition of the art at the time the patent was granted, and read it by the light of surrounding circumstances. It is urged with much force by the plaintiff's counsel that the only form of the plates, which is essential, is such curvature as will allow the metal to contract in cooling without danger of fracture, and that any particular form and arrangement of the plates beyond this, being unnecessary, should not be deemed an indispensable part of the patent. But was it known at the time that this patent was obtained, that a particular arrangement of the plates was not necessary; or was the method of introducing a second plate, so as to obviate contraction, an essential part of plaintiff's invention?

Has not the fact now relied upon—viz: that that mode is not essential—been of recent discovery? It must be borne in mind that the question is not, what might have been done, but what has been done by the patentees. We must endeavor, therefore, to ascertain, in the first place, what their invention really was, and in the next, how it is described by the patent. The patentees may have claimed either more or less than their real invention. And, although the court will endeavor ut res valeat, so to construe the patent as to make it coextensive with the invention, yet the language used may be too clear to be controlled by any extrinsic evidence, and the statute itself contemplates that errors of description may exist beyond the power of the court to correct, and provides a remedy by a surrender of the patent.

What, then, is the extent of the plaintiff's invention? What was the defect which they undertook to remedy, and in what manner did they do it? Wheels with chilled rims, solid hubs, double plates supporting both edges of the rim and both ends of the hub, and operating as a brace one to the other, were previously known.

Such was the Elgar wheel before mentioned; but the plates were wrought and expensive, and it was desirable that the wheels should be made by casting, and to this a difficulty was presented by the contraction of the metal in cooling. Baldwin had made by casting a double-plate car-wheel, but the plates were not curved so as to obviate the difficulty in cooling, and it is a question whether his attempts did not end in experiment only. Cast-iron wheels with curved arms connecting the rim and hub, and made in that form to allow contraction in cooling, were well known. James made and introduced into successful use a car-wheel with a chilled rim, solid hub, single plate connecting the rim and hub, and convex on one side and concave on the other, so as to allow contraction in cooling, and all cast at one time. Now it is insisted on behalf of the defendants, that as double-plate wheels, having all the mechanical properties of the patentees', namely, supporting the rim and hub, and acting as a brace before mentioned, had been made by Elgar, and were well known, and the idea of making them by casting had been conceived by Baldwin, who failed of carrying it into successful effect only for want of curvature, and such curvature had been actually introduced by James into his one plate wheel, that all the plaintiff did was to introduce into the James wheel a second plate exactly like the first. And it is further insisted, that in this there is not a sufficiency of invention to support a patent. Let us see what difficulties presented themselves, and how the patentees overcame them. All the experts agree that it is necessary that the tread of the wheel should be hardened, and for this purpose must be cast in a chill, that is, that the part of the mold which comes in contact with the exterior surface of the rim should be made of some good conductor of caloric, while all other parts are made of some non-conductor. The rim being thus suddenly cooled is thereby made to contract, and the circumference is diminished, producing a pressure upon the whole mass of interior metal, while it is yet in a highly heated and flexible state. The effect in this first contraction would be in the James wheel to increase the convexity of the plate, causing the central portion or hub to rise, and then by the subsequent cooling of the interior the convexity would be diminished and the hub or center would fall, and to such extent that the plate would at last be somewhat more flattened than it was as originally molded.

If a second plate were introduced and placed in such relation to the first that both would be convex outward, and they were not connected at the center but only at the rim, then both plates would readily yield to the first contraction of the circumference, both rising and receding from each other at the center, and by their subsequent contraction both falling and approaching each other at the center. But if the plates were connected by a solid hub this would counteract the effects of both the first and second contraction, and prevent the plates from receding from each other at the center in the first place, or approaching each other afterward. If the two plates were made both convex inward and not connected at the hub, they would approach each other at the center by the first contraction, and recede by the second; but if connected by a solid hub, both these operations would thereby be prevented. A solid hub was essential, and the plan adopted by the patentees was to place the second plate parallel to the first, one being convex outward and the other inward. The effect of the first contraction would be to increase the convexity of both equally, and as the center of both would rise in the same direction, the solid hub would present no obstruction. So also both would fall together by the subsequent cooling of the plates, and their parallelism be preserved throughout. And thus the principle of compensation by curvature to allow of contraction in cooling, without fracture, would, notwithstanding the solid hub, have free operation according to the extent or degree of the convexity. This is the mode adopted by the patentees as set forth in their specification, illustrated by their drawings, and claimed in their summing up. This is the mode the patentees always adopted in practice. They manufactured their wheel more or less from the date of their patent in 1838 to the year 1843 inclusive, making in all about eight hundred. In some of them, the plates instead of being convex from rim to rim were conical, that is, the line from rim to hub was straight, and the center was not in the plane of the circumference. Both were conical in the same direction, and their parallelism preserved, and the effect of the successive contractions was to raise and depress the hub or center of both just as in the parallel convex plates. The manufacture was discontinued in 1843, and not resumed until after the plaintiff had become the purchaser of the patent in 1847, when about eleven hundred were made under the plaintiff's direction, all by the same method as that pursued by the original patentees.

The defendants contend that in 1848, by their own skill and labor, they found out a new method of constructing the plates by placing the curvature in both wholly between the hub and rim, leaving the center in the plane of the circumference, and the curvature of both being inward, and that this, by allowing a greater degree of curvature, gives more beneficial operation to the principle of compensation, and causes the plates to brace each other more effectually against one kind of lateral pressure, and that they have thus produced a wheel of greater practical utility, while they insist that the plaintiff's is not superior to the old spoke wheel.

Now if this be so, and there was certainly evidence tending to prove it proper for the consideration of a jury, why should not they have the benefit of the method of constructing the plates which they have introduced, leaving to the plaintiff the exclusive benefit of the method set forth in the patent? Why should the plaintiff's claim be so extended as to embrace a new and more useful method of construction, which the patentee had never described or acted upon? The plaintiff's counsel have made a forcible argument upon that part of the instruction which stated that if the defendants' was in any material part substantially different from the plaintiff's invention, as described in his letters patent, there was no infringement. This taken alone might at first view seem to be sufficiently favorable to the defendants. But it does not stand alone—the jury were not left at liberty to form their own judgment of what was a substantial difference. They were peremptorily instructed that any changes of form or arrangement of plates, even if thereby the plates were both convex inward or both convex outward, and the curvature placed wholly between hub and rim, and producing thereby a result more useful, would not constitute a substantial difference, but that there must be also the introduction of some new principle or mechanical power, or new mode of operation producing a new kind of result. And it was not until this direction had been emphatically repeated to the jury, after they had been deliberating more than twenty hours, that they finally agreed upon a verdict. The jury were, indeed, instructed that increased utility would be evidence tending to prove such new principle, power, or mode of operation, and the greater the utility the stronger would be such evidence, and that a manifest and very high degree of utility would be conclusive evidence thereof. The jury may have deemed the defendants' wheel more useful than the plaintiff's to any extent short of what they might consider a manifest and very high degree of utility.

As I understood the ruling of the circuit court at Albany, and the authority in Washburn v. Gould [supra], I felt constrained to instruct the jury, as before stated, as to the necessity of some new principle or mechanical power, etc., being introduced by the defendants. Should not the instructions have been more favorable to them? If it should be thought that the case of Davis v. Palmer [Case No. 3,645], decided by Marshall, C. J., presents too rigid an adherence to form to be a guide for the present, ought not the court to have followed the decision of the supreme court in Prouty v. Ruggles, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 336, and held the plaintiff to the particular instrumentality which he had specified and claimed, whether the defendants' article was more useful or not? Or even if this high authority should be deemed too rigorous, and a more liberal doctrine in favor of patentees should be adopted, ought not the jury at least to have been told that if the defendants, by the method or the changes introduced by them, had carried the principle of compensation and the mechanical power of the brace into more full and complete effect, and had thus conferred a benefit upon the public by making a better and safer wheel, and that these changes and increased utility might be well termed considerable—it was no infringement, although no new principle or power was introduced, and the new mode of operation had produced a beneficial effect, new only in degree and not in kind?

In the case just referred to [Davis v. Palmer], the patentee claimed an improvement in the mole-board of a plow. In his specification, there was first a general and then a more particular description of the form of his mole-board. The plaintiff contended that he was not restricted to the latter and more particular description. Chief Justice Marshall held otherwise.

The case of Prouty v. Ruggles, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 336, bears so strongly upon the question now before the court, as to require a particular examination. The patent was for a combination of three things in the construction of a plow, and the whole cause turned upon the question whether the patentee was confined to the particular manner of constructing the top of the standard which he had described in his specification, which was as follows. After describing the other two particulars of the combination, he says: "The top of the standard through which the bolt passes to secure the beam, is transversely parallel to the plane of the share, and extends back from the bolt to such distance as to form a brace to the beam when the after part is pressed down by lifting at the fore part, the share being fast under a rock or other obstruction. The after part of this extension is squared in such manner that, being jogged into the beam, it relieves the bolt in heavy draft."

In summing up, the patentees say they claim a combination of three particulars. After describing the first and second, they proceed as follows: "3d. The forming the top of the standard for brace and draft. We do not intend to confine our claim to any particular form or construction, excepting such form of the top of the standard as shall serve for brace and draft, but have given such form as we deem to be most convenient, which may be varied as is obvious." The utility of the invention and the validity of the patent were admitted. It appeared that the defendants had made plows embracing the first two elements of the combination, and also having the top of the standard so formed as to serve both for brace and draft, but it was not jogged into the beam, and did not extend so far back upon the beam. It was decided by Judge Story at the trial, and afterward by the whole supreme court, that the patentees were to be held to the mode of forming the top of the standard described in the specification.

The chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, holds this language: "The use of any two of these parts, only, or of two combined with a third which is substantially different in form, or in the manner of its arrangement and connection with others, is therefore not the thing patented." Compare this decision for a moment with the case at bar. In the former, the specification describes the mode of forming the top of a standard for brace and draft, to be by extending it and jogging it into the beam. In the latter, it describes the mode of constructing the wheels to be by convex plates placed parallel to each other, or nearly so. Thus far they are similar. But when we come to the summing up, we find that the former claims, as one part of the combination, the forming of the top of the standard for brace and draft, without repeating how it is to be formed for that purpose, but on the contrary, expressly saying, "We do not intend to confine our claim to any particular form or construction, excepting such form of the top of the standard as shall serve for brace and draft, but have given such form as we deem to be most convenient, which may be varied as is obvious."

In the case now before us, the summing up claims, as part of the manner of constructing the wheels, "with double convex plates, one convex outward, and the other inward," thus repeating the requisition of the convexity and parallelism of the plates, without any suggestion that either can be dispensed with. In the former case, the mode of forming the top of the standard seems to be of little importance, while in the latter, the mode or manner of introducing the second plate, if not of the essence of the invention, is a very material part of it. Again, in the former, the defendants had made no improvement. The change introduced by them had produced no effect, even in degree. They had not increased the utility of the instrument, nor conferred any benefit upon the public, while in the latter, the defendants contend (and for the purpose of applying the law, we must take it to be true) that they have, by their changes, produced an effect new, at least, in degree of practical utility, and conferring a substantial benefit on the public.

Will it be said that the former was a patent for a combination, and the latter for a unit or whole? Admit this change of names, yet it is conceded that the convex plates are an essential part or ingredient in this whole, without which, indeed, the patent could not stand for a moment. Why, then, should not the mode of forming them, so imperatively prescribed throughout, be deemed as essential as the mode of forming the top of the standard for brace and draft, described only in the specification, and dropped, if not disclaimed in the summing up.

That case was much stronger for the plaintiffs than is the one at bar, and might be overruled and yet leave abundant ground for the defendants to stand upon.

The plaintiff became the purchaser of the patent now in controversy in 1847. He may be presumed to have known that the manufacture of the patented article had been wholly discontinued for four years, and that the only mode by which it had ever been made was by parallel plates, convex or conical from rim to rim, and that this was the only mode described in the patent which he purchased. Would any injustice be done to him if he should not now be permitted so to extend his claim as to appropriate to himself the more beneficial mode of locating the curvature and arranging the plates introduced by the skill and labor of the defendants, ten years after the patent was granted?

On the whole, had it not been for the rule laid down in Washburn v. Gould [Case No. 17,214], I do not think I should have adopted the instructions that were given to the jury. For, notwithstanding the unfeigned respect and deference which I feel for every ruling of the circuit court at Albany, even in the haste of a jury trial, I can not say that I am satisfied with those instructions; and as they would not have been given but with a view to a revision by the supreme court, which the defendants have not had time to obtain, the injunction must be refused.

[For another case involving this patent, see Many v. Jagger, Case No. 9,055.]

MANY (WOOLCOCKS v.). See Case No. 18,024.

MAQUILLAN (FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST CO. v.). See Case No. 4,668.

MAR, The HELEN. See Case No. 10,543.

Case No. 9,058.

The MARATHON.

PACKER et al. v. The MARATHON.

[5 Adm. Rec. 88, 89.]

District Court, S. D. Florida. July 29, 1853.

SALVAGE—SMALL SKILL—NO GREAT DANGER—MERIT.

[Salvage services rendered, without uncommon skill or exertions, to a ship in no great danger of loss, are of small merit.]

[Libel for salvage by James Packer and others against the ship Marathon and cargo.]

S. R. Mallory, for libellants.

Thos. F. King, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. This ship, laden with a valuable cargo, supposed to be worth between $60,000 and $80,000, from New Orleans, bound to New York, in the afternoon of the thirtieth of June, ran ashore upon the southwest point of the quicksands, where she remained about sixty eight hours. The master carried out a kedge astern, and commenced to lighten the ship by heaving overboard cargo, and endeavoured to heave the ship off. Night coming on, he dropped his starboard anchor to hold the ship where she was until the next morning. The next morning he discovered that the best water was ahead of the ship, and he carried out a kedge in that direction, and commenced again to heave overboard cargo. He hove overboard, in all, —— bales of cotton, —— hogsheads of sugar, 160 hides, and a lot of staves. The next morning the libellant Packer, in the sloop Mystic, with seven men, arrived at the ship, and was employed to lighten the ship, and aid in getting her off. He received on board his sloop one hundred and sixty-three bales of cotton, and then dispatched her to Key West. At about one o'clock the next day, the wind and tide being favorable, and all sails set, the ship gradually worked off the shoal. The bottom on which the ship lay is called a "quicksand," the precise nature of which is probably not well understood. There is no evidence, however, that it is a dangerous bottom.

The libel represents the services of the salvors in general, but strong, language, yet it is very difficult to discover from the facts themselves that the case is one of more than ordinary merit. I do not think that the ship was in much danger of total loss, nor that any uncommon skill or exertions were employed by the libellants in getting her afloat. The services consisted in the taking on board the Mystic the one hundred and sixty-three bales of cotton, and in Packer's remaining on board the ship after the Mystic was dispatched to Key West, to aid the master with his advice, in case it should be needed. The ship and cargo are, however, valuable, and a liberal compensation may be properly made for the service rendered, and I think that twenty-five hundred dollars is liberal and reasonable. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the libellants have and recover, in full compensation for their services rendered the said ship Marathon and cargo, the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars. It is further ordered that the costs and expenses of this suit, the wharfage, storage, bills for labor, notary public's fees, commissions, and all other charges upon the property incurred by the ship's coming into this port, be brought into court, to be examined and allowed or disallowed, and that upon the payment of the aforesaid salvage, costs, expenses and charges, the marshal restore said ship and cargo to the master thereof, for and on account of whom it may concern.

Case No. 9,059.

MARBLE v. FULTON et al.

[1 Hask. 462.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. Dec., 1872. Jan., 1873.

BANKRUPTCY—BOND TO APPEAR—BREACH OF CONDITION—ACTUAL DAMAGE—ABSCONDING BANKRUPT.

1. An action of debt lies upon a bond given by a bankrupt conditioned for his appearance in court from day to day agreeable to its order.

2. The avoidance of a principal, after being adjudged a bankrupt upon his creditors' petition, is a breach of the condition of his bond authorized by section 40 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 536)], taken to secure his attendance in court until decision upon that "petition or the further order" of court.

3. Upon breach of the condition of such bond, the plaintiff may recover the actual damages sustained.

4. Upon a bond of defeasance there can be but one suit and one assessment of damages.

5. In the assessment of damages, the pleadings are not regarded, and damages may be assessed for all existing breaches, whether specified in the pleadings or not.

6. The absconding of a bankrupt with assets greater than the penalty of his bail bond is a direct loss to the bankrupt estate, recoverable upon the bond to the amount of its penalty with interest from the date of the writ.

Debt [by Sebastian S. Marble against James E. Fulton, and others] for the penalty of a bail bond. Upon oyer it disclosed a condition for the appearance of the principal in court to answer to a creditor's petition in bankruptcy against him, and for his appearance from time to time as required by the court until decision upon the petition or until further order of court.

Plea. Omnia performavit.

Replication. Avoidance of the principal by not appearing and furnishing schedules in bankruptcy in obedience to order of the court.

[1] [Reported by Thomas Hawes Haskell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Rejoinder. No order of court so to do within the time stipulated by the condition of the bond. Issue taken.

William L. Putnam, for plaintiff.

Henry B. Cleaves, Nathan Cleaves, and Joseph Howard, for defendant.

FOX, District Judge. This is an action of debt on a bond given by a bankrupt, upon his arrest, under the provisions of the 40th section of the bankrupt act, and is prosecuted in the name of the marshal for the benefit of the assignee in bankruptcy. It appears that on the 19th of February, 1872, Locke, Twitchell & Co. filed their petition in the district court of Maine against Fulton & Ricker, praying that they might be adjudged bankrupts, and an order of notice was issued thereon returnable March 4th. On the 19th of February another petition was filed by the same creditors praying for the arrest of Fulton & Ricker under the provision of the 40th section of the act, and upon probable cause being shown to the court, they were ordered to be held to bail in the sum of $2,000.

Upon his arrest on February 27, Fulton gave bond in that amount with Elijah Fulton and John D. Spiller as sureties, conditioned "that if the above bounden James E. Fulton shall appear and answer to the said Locke, Twitchell & Co., petitioners as aforesaid, as by said order provided, and shall thereafterwards appear from time to time as required by said court until the decision of said court upon said petition, or the further order of said court, then the above written obligation shall be null and void, otherwise in full force." On the return day of the order of notice, Fulton & Ricker appeared, but the hearing was postponed from time to time until the 6th day of May when they were adjudged bankrupts, and the usual decree of bankruptcy was then entered against them with an order to furnish schedules of their assets and liabilities within five days as provided in form No. 58, General Rules and Orders, which order not being complied with, on the fifth day of June a petition was presented by their assignee in bankruptcy that the said James E. Fulton might be required by order of court to appear on a day certain and file such schedules. Upon this petition it was ordered that he appear on June 17th, which order was served on the said Fulton by leaving a copy of the same at his usual place of abode, and the same was also duly served on the sureties on his bond, and no appearance being then had, said James E. Fulton and his sureties were on said 17th day of June defaulted, and their default was duly entered on the docket.

The first objection taken is, that an action of debt upon this bond cannot be maintained in this court, but that the only remedy in the federal courts in Maine is by scire facias. It is clear that in the courts of this state scire facias is the only remedy against bail, as it was thus decided in Packard v. Brewster, 59 Me. 404, and the act of congress approved June 1, 1872, c. 255, § 5 [17 Stat. 195], requires "that the practice, pleadings, forms and modes of proceeding, in other than equity and admiralty causes in the circuit and district courts, shall conform as near as may be to the practice, &c., existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the state within which such circuit or district courts are held." If this obligation were a common bail bond, in accordance with the law of the state, it might be the duty of the court to restrict the remedy thereon to an action of scire facias.

But in this state it is prescribed by law, that a bail bond shall be returned to the court by the sheriff and filed with the writ, and if judgment is rendered thereon, the clerk is required to enter on the margin of the execution the names of the bail and their abode, and demand must be made upon the bail personally by the officer holding the execution fifteen days at least before the return day, certifying that he cannot find the principal or property to satisfy it; all of which must appear by his return on the execution, and thereupon scire facias issues. In the present case, few if any of such provisions are applicable. The proceeding in which the bail is required, instead of being an action at common law for the recovery of a claim, is in the nature of a proceeding in equity, and there is nothing to be found in the act requiring the marshal to return the bond to court and file it with his warrant; no fixed amount is recovered by a judgment, and no execution issues to the marshal upon which a return of "not found" can be made, as is done by the sheriff on the state process. Under the state practice, all the proceedings from the inception are required to appear upon the files of the court, and become substantially a part of the record, while nothing of that kind is required by any of the provisions of the bankrupt act. The practice of the state courts in such matters is so entirely different from the course to be adopted in bankruptcy proceedings, that the court is of opinion, that the requirements of the act of 1872 cannot be held applicable in the present instance, but that the common law may be appealed to for a remedy, which it is not disputed authorizes an action of debt in such a case.

The defendants plead performance, and the plaintiff replies, a breach by the principal's not appearing and producing his schedules in obedience to the order of the court. The condition of the obligation being in the very words of the statute, what is its legal effect? It is claimed that its operation is limited to the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, and should not extend beyond that period; that if the bankrupt complied with all orders of the court made prior to the adjudication, and appeared from time to time as he may have been required by the court, that any order subsequent to the adjudication is not within the condition, so as by its disobedience to constitute a breach. At first this objection would seem to be of considerable force, but upon reflection and an examination of the entire section and looking at the purpose to be accomplished, it appears to me, that such a construction is too restricted, and if adopted would to a great extent defeat the intended purpose. The section authorizes the arrest when probable cause is shown for believing that the debtor is about to leave the district, or to remove or conceal his property, or make any fraudulent disposal thereof. The presence of the party and control of his estate, if he shall be decreed bankrupt, are the objects to be reached by his arrest, and not that the court may be enabled to render a decree against him. This the court could accomplish without his personal presence, as the same section authorizes service of the petition by delivering to him a copy personally, or by leaving the same at his last or usual place of abode, and if he cannot be found or his place of residence ascertained, service shall be made by publication in such manner as the judge may direct. The court therefore, without an arrest of the party, it will be seen, can thus obtain jurisdiction over him, so as to authorize a decree of bankruptcy.

If the operation of the condition of the bond terminates by the decree of bankruptcy, the arrest will accomplish little or nothing, as it is not until after the adjudication that the personal presence of the bankrupt is ordinarily required, or the assignee is authorized to assume the possession and control of his property. In most instances, nothing whatever is required to be done by the bankrupt before his bankruptcy is established, and it is after that time that the law requires his aid and assistance in a full exposition of his condition, and of his assets and liabilities, and in reaching his estate for the benefit of his creditors. When the statute authorized the arrest it was that he might thus be compelled to render his personal assistance in the adjustment and investigation of his affairs, and any construction of the law which would tend to defeat this object, the court ought not to adopt unless absolutely compelled so to do by the language of the act. The act declares, "that he shall give bail for his appearance from time to time until the decision of the court upon the petition, or the further order of the court."

Two distinct periods are here designated in which the debtor may be required to appear. One, until the adjudication, the other, on the further order of the court. When then must this further order be made to become obligatory on the bail? It would certainly seem that it does not contemplate an order made prior to the adjudication of bankruptcy, because such is fully provided for by the preceding words in the same clause, which in terms require the appearance from time to time as required prior to the adjudication. These words "on the further order of the court" must, if they have any effect, be construed as referring to orders for his appearance subsequent to the adjudication, and by so doing they become effective and not mere surplusage, and they assist most materially in accomplishing the purpose of the arrest; but if they are stricken from the act by any judicial construction, and it should be held that by the condition of the bond the attendance of the principal was not requisite after the adjudication, the purpose of the arrest would in most instances be defeated. "Or" is sometimes construed as "and" when it is necessary to give effect to some legislative provision and in the construction of wills, and this rule has been heretofore adopted in the construction of one of the original provisions of the bankrupt law.

By the 39th section of the act as passed, it was declared that the assignee might recover back the money or other property conveyed contrary to law, provided the person receiving the payment or conveyance had reasonable cause to believe that a fraud on the act was intended or that the debtor was insolvent. In Wadsworth v. Tyler [Case No. 17,032], the word "or" in this provision was construed "and," and this interpretation was sustained by congress by an act affirmed July 27, 1868 [15 Stat. 227], substituting "and" for "or." The failure of the principal to appear and file his schedules in obedience to the order of the court, although made subsequent to the adjudication of bankruptcy, was in my view a breach of the condition of the obligation within the meaning of the act.

It is shown that the penal sum named in the bond, together with the entire assets which can be realized from the estate, would not be sufficient to satisfy the debts proved against the estate, and the plaintiff therefore claims that he is entitled to recover as damages the full amount of the penalty, but this, in my opinion, cannot be adopted as the rule of damages.

It is said, that this obligation is a bail bond with the ordinary usual effect of such bonds; that it runs to the marshal, and the bail may be exonerated by a surrender of the principal before judgment, and that unless they are thus discharged, bail are held accountable for the full amount of the original demand and costs, and cannot relieve themselves by proof of the inability of their principal. Such is probably the result attending bail at common law, and the sureties are held accountable for the debt. But in such case, the arrest is made on process for the recovery of a fixed definite amount, which is determined by the judgment, while in the present instance, the amount of the penalty is wholly in the discretion of the judge, determined entirely without reference to the amount of the debtor's liabilities, but only in such sum as will be likely to secure his attendance and compliance with the orders of the court. No judgment is ever rendered by the court in the proceeding upon which an execution could issue and the liability of bail thereon be fixed. The only indebtedness of the bankrupt, which is shown to the court at the time of the order of the arrest, is the amount due to the petitioning creditors, which in the present case was about $1,400 only. The analogy therefore, between bail at common law being held accountable for the amount of the execution which may be recovered and the amount of the bankrupt's indebtedness to all of his creditors, does not appear to me to be so strong as to require me to give judgment and execution for the penal sum in the bond. The act of 1789 (1 Stat. p. 87, § 26) requires, "that in all causes brought before either of the courts of the United States to recover the forfeiture annexed to * * * any bond or other specialty, when the forfeiture, breach or non-performance shall appear by the default or confession of the defendant or upon demurrer, the court before whom the action is brought shall render judgment therein for the plaintiff to recover so much as is due according to equity. And when the sum for which judgment should be rendered is uncertain, the same shall, if either of the parties request it, be assessed by a jury." The present hearing is not brought strictly within this provision, as the case is not presented for a decision on default, confession or demurrer, but is submitted on the pleadings and evidence to the judge for decision of law and fact; but it seems to the court that this provision is declaratory of the true rule as to the damage to be recovered upon a breach being shown of such an obligation, that is, the plaintiff should recover only the amount equitably due and no more. Such is the ordinary practice in a hearing in damages on such instruments. Forrar v. U. S., 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 375; Ives v. Merchants' Bank, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 159.

It is claimed that this construction should not be adopted as it is impossible to determine the damages occasioned by the breach; but the uncertainty attending the computation of the damages cannot affect the rule of law as to the right of recovery. The plaintiff is bound to satisfy the court or jury as to the damages he has suffered from the breach, otherwise he is entitled only to a nominal sum (Gowen v. Nowell, 2 Me. 13); and this rule cannot be modified by reason of the difficulty of proof.

In Greely v. U. S., 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 257, and in U. S. v. Hatch [Case No. 15,325], the penalty of each bond was fixed by congress, and that amount must have been understood to be the sum which was established by law to be paid in case of a breach of the conditions by violation of a positive provision of the law which the bond was given to enforce. In bonds given under process of ne exeat, the arrest is made by order in chancery; but the action on the bond, if broken, is before the courts of common law, who render judgment for the penalty which is paid into the chancery court, and by the order of that court disposed of and applied according to the rights of the parties, which in many respects, is applying the chancery practice to the disposal of this sum. The plaintiff, therefore, can only recover for such damages as he may satisfy the court he has sustained by a breach of the obligation by the principal.

FOX, District Judge. The court having decided that the principal has broken the condition of the bond by his non-appearance on the 17th of June and not filing his schedules in compliance with the order of court, the question of damages is now submitted for determination on a hearing in chancery. The obligation not being one for the performance of covenants or agreements, there can be but one suit and one assessment of damages for which execution shall issue. This principle is very fully discussed in the learned opinion of Davis, J., in Philbrook v. Burgess, 52 Me. 271, and is fully sustained by that authority. The breach assigned in the present case is of a double character, first, by the principal's non-appearance on the 17th of June, and secondly, by his not filing his schedules in bankruptcy on that day as required by the order of the court. Similar breaches are shown to have been committed on a previous day, as by the order of reference to the register, the bankrupts were required "on or before the third day of June to file with the register a duplicate copy of the petition and the schedules of creditors, and an inventory of their estate individually and as co-partners, and to attend before said register on said day, and thenceforth as said register may direct to submit to such orders as may be made by said register or by this court relating to the said bankruptcy."

It is in proof that but a short time prior to the institution of the proceedings in bankruptcy against Fulton & Ricker, said Fulton converted into money or notes a large amount of the assets of the firm by disposing of property and collecting from the debtors of the firm considerable sums. It is not shown that the amounts so received by him were applied in discharge of firm liabilities, and upon all the evidence, I find that at the time said Fulton absconded, he had in his possession or under his control more than $2,000 of the assets of the firm, which with reasonable diligence the assignee has not been able to recover for the benefit of the estate, and in this amount, I have not included any portion of the sums received by James E. Fulton from Elijah Fulton subsequent to January 1, 1872. The plaintiff claims, he is entitled to recover as damages the amount thus abstracted by Fulton and withdrawn by him beyond the reach of the process of the court in bankruptcy; while the defendants insist that this is not brought within any breach of the condition of the bond, and is not recoverable in this suit. The rule as stated in Hatch v. Attleborough, 97 Mass. 538, is: "The hearing to ascertain for what amount execution shall be awarded is an assessment of damages according to equitable principles, and no pleadings on either side are required, nor can any defect or admission in the previous pleadings deprive either party of the right to a complete adjustment of all the claims secured by the bond." The plaintiff therefore is entitled to recover all his damages sustained from any breach of the bond, whether such breach is or is not assigned in the pleadings; but it is only the damages occasioned by existing breaches, and not such as may hereafter arise from any future breach of its conditions, which are recoverable. The only breaches shown by the testimony are the principal's non-appearance at court on the several occasions when ordered so to do by the court, and his failure to comply with the orders to file his schedules of liabilities and assets, for the non-compliance with the first of which orders, he was adjudged in contempt, and a warrant for his arrest was in the hands of the marshal at the time he was ordered a second time to appear in court.

In determining whether the plaintiff should recover under these breaches the amount thus abstracted by the principal, he must ascertain whether the loss of this sum to the estate is or not an immediate direct result of his refusal to appear in court in obedience to its command, for if it is, the plaintiff should recover the full amount.

The argument for the defendants is, that if the principal had appeared in court and filed his schedules, he would have obeyed the order and prevented any breach of the obligation, and that a further order of the court, commanding him to refund to the assignee the amount in his hands, would have been required, service of which he could have avoided by immediate flight if he so desired; but such I apprehend would not have been the result if he had appeared before the court on the 17th of June, as on his appearance in the court on that day, it would have been the duty of the court to have ordered him at once into the custody of the marshal to answer for his contempt, and he, beyond all question, would for some time at least have been in such a situation that the marshal would have had no difficulty in notifying him of any further requirements of the court.

The question here is, not what would have been the effect of his obedience to the order of the court, and what further proceedings would then have been requisite on the part of the assignee to obtain from the possession of the bankrupt this property; but it rather is, what are the consequences of his non-compliance with the order, and of his continued avoidance; and it is clear that the result of his non-appearance is that he continues beyond the process of the court of bankruptcy with this amount of property belonging to the estate, which most certainly he would have been compelled to restore to the assignee if he had obeyed the authority and command of the court; and the necessary consequence of his disobedience and avoidance is, to deprive the estate of that amount of assets by holding them beyond control of the assignee or of the authority of the court in bankruptcy. If he had been present in court June 17, that amount would have been saved and obtained for the estate, which by his absence he is enabled to withhold. His presence or absence therefore resulted directly in a gain or loss to the estate of the sum then in his possession and which belonged to the estate.

I therefore award as damages the full amount of two thousand dollars and interest from the date of the writ.

MARBURY (LINGAN v.). See Case No. 8,371.

MARCELLA, The (TAYLOR v.). See Case No. 13,797.

MARCELLUS, The (CAMP v.). See Case No. 2,347.

Case No. 9,060.

In re MARCER.

[6 N. B. R. 351;[1] 29 Leg. Int. 76.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Feb. 29, 1872.

BANKRUPTCY — PETITIONING CREDITOR — RECEIPT OF PART OF CLAIM.

The receipt by a creditor of part of his claim does not preclude him from petitioning to have his debtor adjudged a bankrupt if the creditor offers to bring this payment into the registry of the court.

[In the matter of the petition of the creditors of J. F. Marcer, a bankrupt.]

George D. Budd, W. J. McElroy, and C. H. T. Collis, City Sol., for city of Philadelphia.

David W. Sellers, for bankrupt.

CADWALADER, District Judge. The thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 536)] enacts, not only that a payment or transfer by an insolvent person to a creditor, with intent to give a preference, shall be an act of bankruptcy, but also that a payment, gift or transfer, made by the insolvent with such intent, to any person or persons liable for him as sureties, shall be an act of bankruptcy. Therefore, if any other creditor than the city of Philadelphia had been the petitioner, the payment or transfer made by this debtor to the persons who were sureties on his bond to the city, would unquestionably have constituted an act of bankruptcy. The fund which was the subject of this preference was paid in money to the city by the sureties with other money of their own, in discharge of their liability on the bond. The whole sum thus paid, being the amount of the penalty of the bond, was not more than, say one-fourth, of the alleged bankrupt's debt to the city. The question is, whether such receipt of the part of the debt secured by the bond precludes the city from suing here as the petitioning creditor.

[1] [Reprinted from 6 N. B. R. 351, by permission.]

If the city had actively promoted the payment and appropriation of the fund in question to the indemnification of the sureties, in order that this very fund might become a specific part of what should be received from the sureties in discharge of the bond, or if the sureties had paid the whole amount of their liability on the express condition that this fund should be received as part of such payment and it had been so accepted, there would in either case have been such an election as to preclude the city. But nothing of the kind is alleged. Whether the city or its officers knew of the source from which the payment was, in part, derived, is immaterial to the question of election. To constitute an election it is not enough that the party to be precluded shall know the fact on which the question of election depends. He must also be made to understand that the question has arisen and that he is put to his election. 11 H. L. Cas. 588, 602, 603, 611–613. The money, as it was offered in this case, could not have been refused. The payment has discharged the bond at law, leaving open all equities under questions of preference and of election. But the fund in question having found its way into the possession of the city, the petition, as originally framed, was not sustainable, because it contained no offer to bring this fund into the registry of the court, or otherwise make it a part of the estate in bankruptcy. This difficulty has been removed by the averment and offer contained in the amendment of the petition. If there should be no other creditor than the city, and a bill in equity at the suit of the assignee in bankruptcy should be hereafter sustainable against the sureties, they will be entitled to a deduction or credit equal to what would have been their dividend of the fund in question.

What might have been the course of procedure if the city had not been a creditor to an amount exceeding that of the bond, or if the excess had not been so great as to make the question one of mere deduction or credit, need not be considered. For the present, the rule that a party asking equity must do equity, or offer to do it, has been complied with.

The debtor is adjudged a bankrupt. The usual bond of the petitioning creditor is dispensed with.

Case No. 9,061.

MARCH v. HEATON et al.

[1 Lowell, 278; [1] 2 N. B. R. 180 (Quarto, 66).]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1868.

BANKRUPTCY — DETERIORATING STOCK — SALE BY MARSHAL—PURCHASE BY BANKRUPT—PRICE.

1. A voluntary bankrupt is entrusted with the care of his estate before an assignee is chosen, as a sort of trustee. He has no right to buy of the marshal the stock of goods which the court has ordered to be sold as likely to deteriorate.

[Cited in Lansing v. Manton, Case No. 8,077; Re Jessup, 19 Fed. 95.]

[Cited in Williams v. Merritt, 103 Mass. 187.]

2. Such a sale will be set aside on complaint by the assignee without proof that the price was inadequate, or that there was any fraud in fact intended.

Bill in equity [by George N. March against Samuel W. Heaton and Hubbard] to set aside the sale of a stock of goods. The bankrupts applied for the benefit of the act in the month of August, and there was some delay in the appointment of an assignee. In the mean time certain creditors petitioned the court to order the stock of goods to be sold, on the ground that they were liable to deteriorate and depreciate. An order was passed authorizing the marshal to sell the goods at a price to be ascertained by the appraisement of three disinterested persons. The marshal made sale of the goods at the precise sum at which they were valued, though he was told that another purchaser would give more. They were bought by Heaton, one of the bankrupts, for the account of a friend of his, one Hubbard of Pittsburg; and Heaton had ever since remained in possession of the goods as agent of Hubbard, and was selling them out in the usual course of business. The bill alleged fraud in the appraisement and in the purchase. A hearing was had on the application for a preliminary injunction.

B. F. Brooks and G. Z. Adams, for complainants.

A. W. Boardman, for defendants.

LOWELL, District Judge. In the view I take of this case it will not be necessary to consider the affidavits bearing upon fraud in fact, though I ought to say that I do not find that the bankrupt Heaton, or any one else, intended any wrong. Still I cannot but see that Heaton misunderstood entirely his position and duties. The statute has seen fit to entrust the bankrupt himself in voluntary cases with the care and custody of his estate until an assignee is appointed. It guards the rights of creditors by making it a crime punishable by imprisonment, with or without hard labor as the court may adjudge, for the bankrupt to withhold any property from his assignee, or to destroy or mutilate any book, deed, or writing relating thereto; and by refusing his discharge if he shall be negligent in the care and custody of his estate and in delivering it to his assignee. All this may be said to be, and doubtless is, less efficient than the simple rule which obtains in proceedings in invitum, giving the marshal as messenger custody of these effects from the moment of adjudication. There appears to be no solid reason for this difference, unless we can safely assume that all voluntary bankrupts are to be trusted with property in which they no longer have any personal interest.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Be this as it may, voluntary bankrupts are bound to take every care of their assets for the benefit of their creditors. They are the assignees until the creditors have chosen others; and I hold it to be as illegal for a bankrupt to purchase his own stock in trade before he has an assignee to deal with, as it would be for the assignee to do so afterwards. Now, in this case, it seems to be made out by the evidence that the petition to sell and all the proceedings were arranged by and for the benefit of Mr. Heaton. It was he who discovered the importance of an immediate sale and pressed it to a conclusion, and became the purchaser for a friend who was willing to advance him the money. I must assume him to be the owner subject to repayment of his friend's advances.

The careful and experienced deputy of the marshal misunderstood my order, which, of course, intended the appraisement to establish a minimum and not a maximum price; and the defendants, by means of this mistake, may probably have got the goods for somewhat less than another purchaser was willing to give. But I do not rely upon that. My judgment is placed upon the simple ground that the bankrupt had no right to buy, and that the assignee has a right to overrule the sale. Whether he will succeed in getting more for the goods is no part of the question for me; that was for him to consider before he brought his bill. I shall not enter upon that inquiry. Injunction ordered.

MARCHANT (HAWES v.). See Case No. 6,240.

Case No. 9,062.

The MARCIA TRIBOU.

[2 Spr. 17.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb., 1858.

COLLISION—NO LOOKOUT—ANCHORED AT IMPROPER PLACE—BOTH IN FAULT—DAMAGES AND COSTS.

1. A schooner, going out of a harbor in the daytime, came into collision with a sloop at anchor in the channel outside the harbor-master's line. Both vessels were held in fault; the schooner for not keeping a look-out stationed forward, and the sloop for being anchored in an improper place.

[Cited in The Clover, Case No. 2,908; The Columbia, Id. 3,035; Vanderbilt v. Reynolds, Id. 16,839.]

[Cited in Lambert v. Staten Island R. Co., 70 N. Y. 108.]

2. In collision cases, if both vessels are in fault, the damages and costs are borne in equal proportions.

3. It seems that in the daytime a vessel at anchor out of the channel and inside the harbor-master's line need not keep an anchor-watch, if her crew consists of but two men.

This was a libel in admiralty to recover damages to the sloop Diploma, arising from a collision in Boston harbor, in October, 1856, between that vessel and the schooner Marcia Tribou. The facts were as follows: The sloop, with a load of stones and gravel, beat up the harbor till she arrived at a point between Bird Island and East Boston, where, owing to the strength of the tide and the decrease of the wind, she came to anchor in the channel, to await the turn of the tide. The precise part of the channel where she anchored was disputed, and evidence was introduced by the libellant to show that the place of anchorage was on the north side of the channel and within the harbor-master's line; while evidence to the contrary, and that she was anchored nearer mid-channel and outside of the said line, was introduced by the claimants. After she had been at anchor for about three-quarters of an hour, and while her crew, consisting of a man and boy, were in the cabin at dinner, she was run into by the schooner which was bound out, and was damaged. The schooner received no injury. It was urged on the part of the claimants that the Massachusetts act of 1848, c. 314 [Laws Mass. 1868, p. 800], rendered it obligatory upon all vessels not only to anchor within such lines as should be established by the harbor-master, but while at anchor to keep an anchor-watch on deck; and that if the court should be satisfied that the sloop was not within these lines, and kept no watch on deck, the libellant was thereby deprived of all remedy against the schooner, notwithstanding that she may have been also guilty of negligence which contributed to the collision. The libellant controverted this position, and cited The New York v. Rea, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 223.

C. P. Curtis, Jr., for libellant.

R. H. Dana, Jr., for claimant.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The position of the sloop is one of the most material points in this case; and upon the evidence which has been introduced, I am of opinion that she was anchored in the channel outside of the harbor-master's line, in an improper place, and must be held to have been guilty of negligence in so doing. I am further of opinion that the schooner was also in fault in not avoiding the sloop, notwithstanding that she was anchored in an improper place.

[1] [Reported by John Lathrop, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The weather was fine, and the evidence shows that all the crew of the schooner, except the captain, were occupied in preparing to bend a sail, and that no look-out was kept. The captain was at the wheel, but the square sail on the foremast came down so low, that he could not see ahead of his vessel without stooping. If a proper look-out had been kept forward, which is always requisite in going out of a harbor where other vessels are generally lying at anchor, the sloop might have been easily seen and avoided. In regard to there having been no watch kept on the sloop, I may say, that if she had been anchored well out of the way, inside of the harbor-master's line, and inside of other vessels at anchor, it would perhaps be too strict to require her to keep a constant watch on deck, especially when her crew consisted of but two persons. But as she was not anchored within the line, it becomes unnecessary farther to consider this question. Both parties having been in fault, by the rule of admiralty law, the damages and costs are to be borne by each in equal proportions.

Case No. 9,062a.

MARCUS v. UNITED STATES.

[2 Hayw. & H. 347.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. 17, 1860.

INDICTMENT FOR KEEPING A FARO BANK.

An indictment under the act of congress of March 2, 1831, c. 37 [4 Stat. 448], which enacts that whosoever shall be convicted of keeping a faro bank or other common gaming table, shall be sentenced, &c. The following count was held good, which charged that the traverser, "on the 10th of Nov., 1859, and on divers other days, and between that day and the taking out this inquisition with force and arms, at the county aforesaid, a certain faro bank there situate, for their lucre and gain, unlawfully and injuriously did keep and maintain against," etc.

Error to the criminal court.

The indictment contained two counts: 1st. That Wm. H. Marcus, on the 10th of Nov., 1859, and on divers other days and times, between that day and the day of the taking of this inquisition with force and arms, at the county aforesaid, a certain faro bank there situate, for their lucre and gain, unlawfully and injuriously did keep and maintain against, &c. 2d. That Wm. H. Marcus, &c., a certain gaming table there situate, for their lucre and gain, unlawfully and injuriously did keep and maintain against, &c. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty on the first count and not guilty on the second.

Before the jury withdrew from the bar the prisoner, through his attorney, prayed the court to instruct the jury as follows, viz.: "That unless the jury from the whole evidence shall find that the defendant, within two years next before the finding of the said indictment, did keep a faro bank, he is entitled to a verdict of acquittal, and that to keep a faro bank means that he must have continuously, for a series or succession of days or times, kept such bank, and the keeping one for one day, or occasionally within the two years, is not within the meaning of the statute; and such keeping alone will not be sufficient to warrant a conviction. The word 'keep' necessarily implies duration, and not a casual or occasional incidental act." And THE COURT gave the instructions as follows, viz: "Granted with the remarks that keeping applies to all concerned in managing the faro bank, whether the proprietor or the dealer employed by him, or a person employed to lift money won, or to pay money lost, or to give tokens to play with in exchange for money, are engaged in keeping are punishable under the law of 1831. Keeping means a series of transgressions, having a faro bank for play by those the keeper chooses to admit; but not to play at cards daily or frequently is not keeping in the sense of the law, though the keeping need not be continuous from day to day. There may be intervals and still the party guilty, but there must be a succession of acts against the law."

The defendant moves the court to arrest the judgment on the verdict found in this case because: 1st. There is no criminal offence charged in the indictment. Motion in arrest of judgment overruled, and writ of error granted.

Before MERRICK and MORSELL, Circuit Judges.

MERRICK, Circuit Judge. The only question presented for the consideration of the court is whether the criminal court erred in holding good the 1st count in an indictment, which charges that the traverser, "on the 10th of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine, and on divers other days, and between that day and the day of the taking out this inquisition with force and arms, at the county aforesaid, a certain faro bank there situate, for their lucre and gain, unlawfully and injuriously did keep and maintain against the form of the statute," &c. This indictment is framed upon the act of March 2, 1831, c. 37, which enacts that whosoever shall be convicted "of keeping a faro bank, or other common gaming table," shall be sentenced to suffer punishment in the penitentiary for not less than one or more than five years. The general principles by which we are to test this indictment admit of no dispute. They are found in all the text books, and with their reasons are most succinctly stated by the supreme court in U. S. v. Mills, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 142, as follows, viz: "The general rule is, that in indictments for misdemeanors created by statute it is sufficient to charge the offence in the words of the statute. There is not that technical nicety required as to form, which seems to have been adopted and sanctioned by long practice in cases of felony, and with respect to some crimes where particular words must be used, and no other words, however synonymous they may seem can be substituted. But in all cases the offence must be set forth with clearness, and all necessary certainty to apprise the accused of the crime with which he stands charged." That the crime laid to the traverser's charge in the present instance is a statutory and not a common law offence, and that we are therefore to resort only to the statute, and not to the common law; for its definition and description would hardly seem to admit of doubt after the many instances in which the offence has been brought under the consideration of this court. See the cases collected in U. S. v. Ringgold [Case No. 16,167], in all of which it has been treated as a statutory offence.

[1] [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazelton, Esq.]

