McCUE v. WASHINGTON.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 639.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June 23, 1829.

LOTTERY—MANAGERS—ISSUING TICKETS—BOND OF MANAGERS—HOLDER OF PART TICKET — PLEADING AT LAW — GENERAL DEMURRER — BAR TO PLEA OF LIMITATIONS.

1. The managers of "The Lottery for Building Lancastrian School-houses, a Penitentiary, and City Hall, in Washington City," had no authority to sell quarters of tickets, so as to multiply causes of action against the corporation.

2. The holder of a prize ticket cannot, without the consent of the corporation, maintain an action against the managers upon their bond to the corporation; who may order the suit to be dismissed.

3. Upon a general demurrer, the judgment must be against him who commits the first substantial fault in the pleadings.

4. A special demurrer operates as a general demurrer, as to all the pleadings of the party demurring.

5. A rejoinder is bad, which avers several distinct answers to the replication, or puts in issue to the jury matter of law.

6. The fact that the plaintiff brought an action, in the name of the corporation of Washington, against the managers, upon their bond, to recover one fourth part of the prize drawn upon or by the ticket No. 1037, which action was dismissed by the corporation, after it had been pending three years in court, is no bar to the plea of the act of limitations.

7. The corporation of Washington were not liable to the holder of a quarter of a ticket, suing alone.

8. A general demurrer to the declaration must be overruled if it contain one good count, although it contain also three bad counts.

Assumpsit, for one fourth part of the prize of $10,000, drawn upon ticket No. 1037, in the first class of a lottery called "The National Lottery."

The declaration contained four counts: 1. The first count sets forth the amended charter of the city of Washington, of May 4, 1812; the by-law of July 24, 1815; the managers' bonds; the scheme of the lottery, first class, 19th December, 1817. That the managers issued and exposed to sale the ticket No. 1037, by which the defendants promised to pay to the possessor thereof such prize as might be drawn to the said number, if demanded within twelve months, &c., subject to a deduction of fifteen per cent. &c. That the plaintiff, on the 1st of July, 1818, "for a full and valuable consideration paid by him, became the purchaser and lawful possessor of one fourth part, or quarter share, of the said last mentioned ticket." That the drawing of the said lottery was finished July 21, 1819, and that the said ticket, No. 1037, was drawn to a prize of $10,000; "by means whereof the plaintiff became entitled to have and demand of the said defendants the one fourth part of the said $10,000, subject," &c.; "and the plaintiff, being so entitled, on the 1st of October, 1819, demanded of the defendants payment of the said quarter share, or fourth part of the said prize; by means whereof the defendants became liable and bound to pay to the plaintiff the said quarter part of the said $10,000, subject," &c., "according to the tenor and effect of the said ticket; and, being so liable, in consideration thereof, afterwards," &c., "undertook and promised the plaintiff to pay him the said last-mentioned sum of money," &c. 2. The second count was like the first, except that it did not set forth the charter and by-law at large, and did not mention the bonds of the managers. 3. The third count, after stating the lottery, and that the defendants, by their managers, issued and offered for sale the ticket No. 1037, says that the plaintiff, on the 1st of July, 1818, became the lawful owner and possessor of one fourth part, or quarter share of the said ticket, No. 1037, which, in the course of the drawing, which terminated on the 21st of July, 1819, drew $10,000; and, on the 1st of October, 1819, the plaintiff demanded of the defendants payment of the said fourth part of the said prize, "by means whereof the defendants became liable," &c. &c. 4. The fourth count is for money had and received.

To this declaration the defendants pleaded: 1. Non assumpserunt. 2. Non assumpserunt infra tres annos. 3. Actio non accrevit infra tres annos.

Upon the first plea, the issue was joined. To the pleas of limitation, the plaintiff, in his replication, says that he ought not to be precluded from having his action, because he says, "That the defendants standing in the relation of trustees for the benefit of the fortunate adventurers in the said lottery, and for the purpose of insuring the payment of such prizes as they should draw therein, took bonds from the said managers respectively, each in the penal sum of $10,000, to be paid to the said defendants, if the said managers should not diligently and impartially exercise and perform the duties and authority vested in them by the said ordinance of the 24th of July, 1815; and that afterwards, when the said lottery had been fully drawn, and the said plaintiff had demanded of the said managers the payment of the said prize so as aforesaid drawn by him, and the said managers had refused to pay the same, or any part thereof; and when the plaintiff had obtained from the register of the said corporation of the city of Washington, who had the lawful custody thereof, copies of the said bonds taken as aforesaid from the said managers, and instituted suits thereon in the name of the said defendants, for the use of the said plaintiff against the said managers (without any objection made thereto by the said defendants) for the recovery of his share of the said prize so as aforesaid drawn; and when the said plaintiff had prosecuted the said suit in the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and for the county of Washington, and in the supreme court of the United States by writ of error; and when, by mandate from the said supreme court to the said circuit court, the said plaintiff was about to receive the benefit of the said suit by obtaining a judgment against the said managers for his share of the said prize, they, the said defendants, in violation of their duty, and in utter disregard of the trust so reposed in them by every law of decent morality, and by the fair intendment of the said act of congress, did then, that is to say, on the 1st of January, 1825, at the county aforesaid, by virtue of their authority, as plaintiffs at law (the suit being in their name as plaintiffs) cause the said suits to be dismissed, whereby the said plaintiff was unjustly and oppressively deprived of all benefit derivable from the said suits; and this the said plaintiff is ready to verify, whereupon he prays judgment." &c.

To this replication the defendants rejoined as follows: "And the said defendants pray oyer of the copy of the bond and condition thereof, in the said replication mentioned; and it is read to them as follows, to wit," &c. They also "pray oyer of the record and process of the said suit in this court; and of the said mandate from the said supreme court in the said replication mentioned, and the same are read to them as follows," &c. "All which being read and heard, the defendants say, that the plaintiff ought not to have or maintain his action aforesaid against them, by reason of any thing by him above pleaded or alleged by way of replication to the second and third pleas of the said defendants," because they say that they did not take the "said bonds as trustees for the said plaintiff, or other of the fortunate adventurers in the said replication mentioned; nor was the said suit in the said replication mentioned, commenced or prosecuted by the said defendants, or with their assent or authority, for the use of the said plaintiff against the said managers; nor was the plaintiff about to recover any judgment in the said suit, against the said managers in virtue of the said mandate or otherwise; nor did the defendants, in fraud or violation of their said pretended trust, cause the said suit to be dismissed; nor did the defendants, at any time, within three years next before the commencement of this suit, make any such promise or assumption as in the said declaration is alleged; nor did the plaintiff's cause of action aforesaid arise, or in any manner accrue at any time within the said three years, in manner and form as the plaintiff, in his said replication to the said second and third pleas of the defendants, has above pleaded and alleged, and of this he puts himself upon the country." To this rejoinder the plaintiff demurred; and stated for cause of demurrer, that the defendants have thereby tendered an issue to the country; which issue is not responsive to the said replication; and is an immaterial issue.

Ashton & Key, for plaintiff.
Wallach & Jones, for defendants.

CRANCH, Chief Judge (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, not sitting in this cause). Upon a general demurrer the judgment must be against the party who commits the first substantial fault in pleading. The demurrer, in this case, is special only so far as regards the rejoinder, which avers so many distinct answers to the replication, involving several negatives pregnant, and putting in issue to the jury, matters of law mingled with allegations not responsive to the replication, as to make it a bad rejoinder. But the replication itself is not a sufficient legal justification for not bringing the suit within three years. It confesses and attempts to avoid the plea of the statute of limitations, by showing that the plaintiff instituted suits in the name of the defendants, (without any objection by them,) against the managers, whereby the three years were expended, when the defendants, by virtue of their authority as legal plaintiffs, dismissed the suits. This is certainly no legal bar to the operation of the act of limitations. The supreme court of the United States, in the case of Corporation of Washington v. Young, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 406, upon the same ticket No. 1037, decided that the holders of the ticket had no right to use the name of the corporation, and sue upon the managers' bond, without the consent of the corporation, and that no consent appeared to be given in that case; and it was upon the return of that cause to this court, by mandate, after having reversed the judgment and set aside all the pleadings up to the declaration that the plaintiffs in that cause (the now defendants) caused the suits to be dismissed as mentioned in the replication. The replication, therefore, cannot be maintained.

The pleas are good; but the first three counts of the declaration are not sufficient to support the action, because they do not state of whom the one fourth of the ticket was purchased; and because the defendants are not liable for a quarter ticket, suing alone; the only obligation of the corporation being upon the contract contained in the whole ticket, signed by their managers, as was decided in this court, in Shankland v. Washington [Case No. 12,703], at May term, 1828. The fourth count, however, for money had and received, is a good count, and, therefore, the judgment upon the demurrer cannot be for the defendant, although the first three counts are insufficient, because the plaintiff's special demurrer to the defendant's rejoinder, is special as to that rejoinder only, but operates as a general demurrer to the whole declaration; and upon a general demurrer to the whole declaration, if there be one good count, the demurrer must be overruled. But the plaintiff's replication to the second and third pleas, being insufficient to support his action, the judgment upon this demurrer must be for the defendants.

It was stated by the plaintiff's counsel, in the course of the argument in this cause, that it was the wish of the parties, that the court should decide the merits of the case upon this demurrer; and that they would ask leave to amend the declaration if the court should be of opinion that, by any such amendment as could be made consistently with the facts which appeared on the trial of the former cases, namely, Washington v. Young [Case No. 17,241]; Clark v. Washington [Id. 2,839]; and Shankland v. Washington [supra],—the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. The court has looked into those cases, and finds that although Davis, who sold to the plaintiff this quarter of a ticket, and Gillespie, who sold the ticket to Clark, must, under the decision of the supreme court in Clark's case, be considered as the agents of the corporation for the sale of tickets, yet, that they had no right to sell less than a whole ticket, or to sell a fractional part of a ticket, so as to multiply the causes of action against the corporation at their pleasure. In the plaintiff's printed statement of the case for the supreme court in the case of Corporation of Washington v. Young [supra], it is said that the original ticket, No. 1037, was never in the possession of the parties for whose use the suit was brought; but was retained by Gideon Davis, who sold four quarters of the said ticket, each quarter being in the terms following: "By authority of congress, $30,000 highest prize, quarter of No. 1037, in the lottery for building Lancastrian school-houses, a penitentiary, and city hall, in Washington city, payable sixty days after the completion of the drawing. Gideon Davis, 4th." And it is stated "that the said Gideon Davis, since the completion of the drawing of the said lottery, and before the bringing of this suit, delivered to the said managers the said original ticket, No. 1037, towards the securing and paying of the money stipulated to be paid by him, under the contract recited and set forth in the said condition," that is, of Davis's bond to the managers. The ticket had been sold and delivered by the managers to the said Davis, under that contract. It will be perceived that the certificate given by Davis for the quarter of the ticket, appears to be his own individual act. It does not name the managers, nor allude, in any manner, to the authority or responsibility of the corporation of Washington. We think, therefore, that it must be considered as his personal engagement only, and that it cannot, in any manner, bind the corporation. The judgment upon this demurrer must, therefore, be for the defendants.

Case No. 8,736.

McCULLOCH v. DEBUTTS.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 285.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March, 1806.

PRACTICE AT LAW—CONTINUANCE—COSTS.

When the writ of inquiry is set aside by the defendant, the plaintiff may have the cause continued at the defendant's costs.

Mr. Youngs, for defendant, set aside the office judgment, and pleaded not guilty.

E. J. Lee, for plaintiff, elected a continuance, and said it was the practice in such cases that the continuance should be at the costs of the defendant, although the defendant offered ready.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT inquired of the clerk, who said such was the practice.

McCULLOCH (DEBUTTS v.). See Case No. 3,718.

M'CULLOCH v. GIRARD.

[4 Wash. C. C. 289.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1822.

CONTRACTS — WRITTEN INSTRUMENT — WHETHER WHOLE OR PART OF CONTRACT—PAROL EVIDENCE TO VARY—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

1. Explanation of the rule that parol evidence shall not be given to explain or vary the written contract.

2. The question is, is this written instrument the contract, or merely a part performance of the parol agreement. It has elsewhere been decided, that in cases not within the statute of frauds, evidence may be given to contradict a written simple contract, by showing that the whole of it was not reduced to writing. It may be well doubted, nevertheless, whether the safest rule is not to apply the policy and reason of the statute of frauds to all cases of written contracts.

[Cited in Barker v. Bradley, 42 N. Y. 320.]

This was an action to recover the quarter interest payable the 1st of October, 1816, on $125,000, six per cent. funded stock of the [Bank of the] United States, with interest from the 2d of October, 1816, when it was received by the defendant. The declaration contained two counts, one upon a special agreement, which was fully proved by Mr. Jones, and the other for money had and received to plaintiff's use.

Mr. Jones, who was one of the five commissioners for receiving subscriptions to the Bank of the United States in Philadelphia, was examined as a witness, who stated, that he, after the 20th of July, 1816 (when, as it afterwards appeared by a return of the commissioners from other parts of the United States, that the twenty-eight millions to be subscribed by individuals had not been taken, by about thirty thousand shares), was authorized by sundry persons to subscribe for them to the amount of about ten thousand shares, including the plaintiff; for whom, and his associates, he was to subscribe for five thousand shares, being furnished by the plaintiff with the specie and certificates, accompanied by a power of attorney, to pay the first instalment. The specie part, $25,000, he deposited in the bank of the defendant. The power of attorney was to himself, to transfer the stock, $125,000, to the commissioners. That after divers conversations with the defendant, a verbal agreement was entered into between the defendant and the witness, as the agent of the plaintiff and others, previous to the 27th of August, 1816, on which day a final arrangement was made in writing, and which was given in execution of the agreement. The paper alluded to was as follows: "For value received, I promise to transfer to J. W. M'Culloch or order five thousand shares of the Bank of the United States, on which the first instalment has been paid, as soon as the books for that purpose shall be opened by the said bank." Signed by the defendant. The whole of this paper is printed, except the date, the name of the person to whom the transfer was to be made, the number of shares and the signature.

The counsel for the defendant objected to any evidence being given by the witness of a parol agreement with the defendant variant from the above instrument, which they contended was the final agreement between the parties. They cited 1 Phil. Ev. 494, 496; 3 Camp. 426; [Grant v. Naylor] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 229; 12 East, 6; 3 Wils. 275; 4 Brown, Ch. 515.

On the other side, it was contended that the paper of the 27th of August was not the agreement, but was merely intended as a part performance of the parol agreement, so far as it could be performed, until the books of the bank should be opened for making transfers.

Chauncey & Sergeant, for plaintiff.

Mr. Binney and J. R. Ingersoll, for defendant.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. We admit the general rule of law, that parol evidence to vary or explain a written contract, except in the case of a latent ambiguity, is inadmissible. But the question is, whether the paper which has been given in evidence be the contract between these parties, or was given merely as a certificate of the number of shares to which the plaintiff was entitled under the parol contract, and in part performance of that agreement, so far as it could be performed before the bank was organized, and had opened its books for transfers? The court is of opinion, in the present stage of the cause, that the instrument under consideration was given for the purpose of executing the parol agreement as far as it could then be executed; and that if it should turn not that it formed a part of that agreement, that such a paper should be given, or that a paper of that description was, in the ordinary course of the defendant's business, in respect to transactions of this nature, given by him; evidence of the parol contract will be proper, and will not violate any of the rules of law upon this subject.

The witness then proceeded to state that, having ascertained in his conversations with the defendant that he intended to take the unsubscribed shares, he informed the defendant that he was authorized to subscribe five thousand shares in the name of the plaintiff, and also for other persons, whom he named, a certain number for each, and that he had a right, and intended to do so. But not wishing that any collision should take place between the commissioners (the defendant being one), he was willing not to exercise his right, if the defendant would engage that the plaintiff, and the other persons by whom he was employed, should participate with the defendant in his subscription, to the extent of the shares he was authorized to subscribe for them severally, and stand in all respects in the same situation as they would stand in case they were actually subscribers. To this proposition the defendant assented, in consequence of which the witness did not subscribe for those persons, but immediately gave them notice of the arrangement he had made with the defendant. The witness, at the same time, informed the defendant that he was provided with the specie and certificates of funded stock to pay the first instalment on the number of shares which he was empowered to subscribe. On the 26th of August he gave the defendant a check for the $25,000 specie, lying in his bank, the specie instalment for the five thousand shares for the plaintiff; and, in consequence of the arrangement made with the defendant, he returned to the plaintiff the power of attorney for transferring the $125,000 of funded stock to the commissioners, that another might be forwarded to the witness to transfer that stock to the defendant. This he received soon after, which, as also the certificates, he delivered to the defendant. On the 26th of August the defendant took the unsubscribed shares. On the 27th of August he delivered the above instrument of that date to the witness. The witness understood from the plaintiff that Mr. Donnell of Baltimore, and some others, were concerned with him in the five thousand shares, but to what extent he knew not. The stock transferred to the defendant stood in Mr. Donnell's name, and was accompanied by a power from him to transfer it. But the certificates and power were put into his hands by the plaintiff, and he knew no other person in the transaction but the plaintiff. When the contract was made with the defendant, he did not contemplate the subject of the present controversy.

It appeared by the books of the loan office, that the $125,000 of six per cent. funded stock delivered to the defendant by the plaintiff, were transferred to the defendant on the 16th of September, the day before the books closed for that quarter; and that, on the 2d of October, the interest on that stock being $1875, for the quarter due on the 1st, was paid to the defendant. It also appeared by the books of the commissioners of the bank, that on the 5th of November 1816, the day after the board was organized, certain resolutions were introduced by Mr. Sergeant, asserting a right to all the interest due the 1st of October on the funded stock transferred to the commissioners, and providing that no transfers of shares in the bank should be permitted by any subscriber, until that interest was paid to the bank. On the 7th of that month the board agreed to reconsider these resolutions, and the same were referred to a committee, who, on the 25th of the same month, reported a substitute, which was rejected, and Mr. Sergeant's resolutions were then rescinded. It was further proved, that, on the 29th of November, immediately or soon after the books were opened, the defendant transferred five thousand shares to the plaintiff, who, on the same day, transferred four thousand five hundred of them to other persons, amongst whom was Mr. Donnell. The defendant also produced a book belonging to the defendant, containing a number of printed promissory notes, similar to that given to the plaintiff on the 27th of August, of which a certain number had been filled up, and having been complied with, had been returned to the defendant. The material parts of the arguments of the counsel are noticed in the charge.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). Great talents and ingenuity have been displayed by the learned counsel on both sides, in the argument of this cause. But after all, it lies within a very narrow compass; the only question as to which any difficulty is perceived by the court, being, what was the real contract between these parties? Or, to render it more intelligible, which was the contract between them?—the parol agreement, as proved by Mr. Jones, or the promise contained in the paper of the 27th of August? When the objection was made to the introduction of evidence, to prove the parol agreement, the court could have but an imperfect glimpse of the question to be decided, the terms of that contract being, at that stage of the cause, unknown to the court. But as far as the case had been disclosed, we thought the evidence ought to be admitted; and in coming to this conclusion, we were in no small degree influenced by the form and character of the instrument which, by the defendant's counsel, has been considered as the real contract between these parties; but which seemed to us to be rather intended to give effect to the parol agreement, so far as it could be available for that purpose before the bank was organized, and the books were opened; than as reducing the parol contract to writing. The court was nevertheless of opinion that such evidence would, generally speaking, be improper, unless it should appear that the parties had agreed that a written contract should be given as evidence in part, or in part performance of the parol agreement; or unless it was to be given by some usage or practice, either general or special, in relation to the party giving the promise, so as to be at least evidence of such an agreement, or that such was the understanding of the parties. I know that it has been elsewhere decided, and that too by very learned judges, that, in cases not within the statutes of frauds, evidence may be given to contradict a written simple contract, by showing that the whole of it was not reduced to writing. It may be well doubted, nevertheless, whether the safest rule is not to apply the policy and reason of the statute of frauds to all cases of written contracts. Without, however, giving any opinion on this point, we are clearly of opinion that, under the restrictions laid down by the court in admitting the parol evidence in this case, the rule is a safe one. The parol agreement having been fully laid before the jury, together with other circumstances which attended it, it is for them to decide, whether the paper of the 27th of August contains the real contract between the parties on that day, or whether it was merely intended to give effect to the parol contract, as far as it could be done prior to the opening of the books of the bank to receive transfers? When this question is settled, there can be no difficulty in deciding whether the contract has been broken or not. To prove that the parties could not have intended to change the terms of the parol agreement by reducing it to the mere form of a promise to transfer so many shares, the character in which Mr. Jones acted, and the nature of his authority, have been strongly pressed by the plaintiff's counsel upon the attention of the jury. He was a mere agent, authorized to subscribe for the plaintiff five thousand shares, and was furnished with the means to make good the subscription. Strictly speaking, he was bound to comply literally with his instructions by subscribing. But supposing that the contract with the defendant was a substantial compliance with his authority, and most undoubtedly it was, if fulfilled; he forbore to exercise his right of subscribing for the plaintiff in consequence of the solemn assurances of the defendant that, if he would so act, the plaintiff should participate in the defendant's subscription to the extent of five thousand shares, and stand in the same situation as if he had actually subscribed. Of this contract Mr. Jones gave immediate notice to the plaintiff, with which, it would seem, he was satisfied. Now the argument founded on these facts is, that after a substantial performance of his instructions, and that communicated to his constituents, it is against all probability that Mr. Jones would enter into a new and different agreement; or that he and the defendant should so have intended.

Another argument of still more weight is drawn from the character and form of the instrument of the 27th of August. The whole of it is printed except the date, name of transferee, number of shares, and the signature. No blank is left in which five words of a special contract could be inserted. This is not the case with printed forms of conveyances, charter parties, policies of insurance, and other instruments intended to admit the introduction of special contracts, for which sufficient blank spaces are always left: and so purely formal are the printed parts of a policy of insurance considered, that if there be any discrepancy between them and the written parts, the latter is always considered as containing the real contract of the parties. The form of the paper under consideration was strictly adapted to a sale by the defendant of his shares, previous to the opening of the books of the bank; and yet we find that it was made use of as evidence of the number of shares to be transferred, in cases where no sales were made, but where a special contract subsisted. It also appears that the defendant kept a book of these printed documents, with a duplicate of each, many of which had been issued, and being fulfilled, were returned to the defendant, and deposited in the book. From these circumstances, it would seem that these instruments were considered as merely formal; used by the defendant as such in the ordinary course of his business, in negotiations of this kind. The conclusion drawn by the plaintiff's counsel from these facts and circumstances is, that the paper of the 27th of August was understood by the parties as evidence merely of the number of shares which were to be transferred under the parol contract, and not as evidence of the contract itself.

On the part of the defendant, it has been contended, that since the parties, at the time the contract was entered into, did not contemplate the subject of interest to become due on the first of October, but must, in common with others, have considered that as belonging to the bank (as no doubt it did;) and as a relinquishment of her right to such interest could not have been expected, the parties had no motive to adhere to the strict letter of the parol agreement, the written contract embracing every object which could by the parties have been deemed material, or worth incorporating into it; that the premature transfer to the defendant by the plaintiff, of the funded stock, on the 16th of September, which he need not have made until the bank was organized, and his acceptance of a transfer of the bank shares on the 29th of November, and delivering up the defendant's engagement of the 27th of August, prove that the whole contract was considered as fully satisfied, those acts amounting to a waiver of the parol agreement, even if it was not absorbed and extinguished by the written contract. To all this it is answered, that the circumstances relied upon prove nothing in relation to the question, which was the real contract between the parties? for if the parties did not contemplate any casual or unexpected consequences to grow out of the precise terms of the parol contract, and had therefore no motive to adhere to that contract, they were equally without a motive to change or to waive it, and therefore it was left unaffected by the written contract. That, whether the one contract or the other was considered as the subsisting one, still the transfer of the stock to the defendant, and of the bank shares to the plaintiff, were necessary acts to be performed in fulfillment of either of them; and that as to the time when the former act was performed, it was quite unimportant to the plaintiff; since if the parol contract was regarded by the parties as the subsisting one, then the October interest would be received by the defendant as trustee for the plaintiff, and for his use.

After this examination of the arguments of the counsel on each side, we return to the question, which was the real contract between the parties? If the written one, then it is admitted that it was fulfilled according to its terms. If the parol agreement, then the question will be, has that been fulfilled? To enable you to give an answer to this question, you will have to inquire what would have been the rights of the plaintiff in relation to the subject in controversy, if on the 26th of August Mr. Jones had subscribed for five thousand shares in the name of the plaintiff? since, by the agreement with the defendant, he was to stand precisely in the same predicament as if he had subscribed those shares. The plaintiff contends that he would have been entitled to the October interest. The defendant's counsel deny this, and insist that the bank was, and still is, entitled to that interest, and that, having never relinquished her right, she may yet recover it from the subscribers. That if the bank is not entitled, then the interest belongs to Mr. Donnell, who was the owner of the stock paid on account of the first instalment. Let us examine these pretensions. And first, as to that set up for the bank. We have no doubt but that the bank had at least an equitable right to the October interest on all the stock which constituted the first instalment, although the transfer to the bank was not, and could not be made previous to its being organized. It stood, nevertheless, to the credit of the owner of the stock on the 1st of October, to whom it was legally payable. But whatever her rights were, they were perfectly known to the board. Her claim was asserted by Mr. Sergeant's resolutions, as well as by a reference of them to a committee, and were finally retracted and given up by the resolution of the 25th of November, rescinding Mr. Sergeant's resolutions. The October interest having been received by the subscribers, the bank has acquiesced from that time to the present, and the question is, whether, if the bank were now the plaintiff, she could, under all the circumstances of the case, and the absence of every pretence of fraud, ignorance, or mistake, maintain the action? We think she could not. As to the right set up for Mr. Donnell, it stands upon ground still less tenable. In the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, he was no party, and was altogether unknown. The plaintiff was to transfer to the defendant $125,000 of stock, and to the latter it is quite immaterial whose stock he transferred. He had certificates of stock in the name of Donnell, with a regular power to transfer it, and he did accordingly transfer it to the defendant, who thus became the legal owner of the stock. The plaintiff therefore treated this stock as his own, and was possessed of all the power of an owner of it, under an authority derived from Mr. Donnell, who, during more than six years, has never asserted a right to the interest received by the defendant. To whom then can the defendant be liable for that interest, if liable at all, but to the plaintiff? If indeed he is not entitled to retain the money after he shall have received it from the defendant, in consequence of some agreement between him and Donnell, that is a matter between them with which the defendant has nothing to do. There is not a possibility of his being twice called upon for the sum in dispute. The question then is, what are the plaintiff's rights under the parol contract, should you be of opinion that that is the real subsisting contract between the parties? The answer is a plain one. To the interest due on the 1st of October, which was received by the defendant, with interest from the time of the receipt.

The jury found accordingly.

M'Culloch had shipped on board the Lethe in time of war, for a certain voyage from Philadelphia to Bourdeaux, and back again, at the wages of £18 per month. The ship was detained long at Bourdeaux, and whilst she was there, peace took place. The libellant performed the voyage, but was refused the wages on account of the peace, on a sug-

McCULLOCH et al. v. TAYLOR et al.

[1 Wkly. Notes Cas. 391.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April 22, 1875.

BILLS—ACCEPTOR — LETTER OF CREDIT—ISSUER—OFFSET.

The acceptor of bills drawn under the usual forms of commercial letters of credit can compel the holder of the letter to furnish funds to meet the acceptances; and a debt due by the issuer of the letter to the holder cannot be set off against this obligation.

In equity. This case was heard on bill, answer, and proofs. The bill averred the existence, prior to 18th September, 1873, of two firms, viz., Jay Cooke & Co., and Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., doing business as bankers in Philadelphia and London respectively. The firms were in no way connected, except that a number of persons (not including the plaintiffs) were members of both firms. The plaintiffs were the only members of the firm of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. who were not also members of the other firm. During 1873 Jay Cooke & Co. issued to the defendants N. & G. Taylor Co. several commercial letters of credit for £10,000 each, drawn on Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. The letters of credit were in the following form: "No. ——. Philadelphia, ——, 187—. Sir: We hereby authorize you or such parties as you may direct to value on Messrs. Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. of London, in drafts at four months to the extent of ten thousand pounds (£10,000) for account of N. & G. Taylor, drafts to be drawn in within six months from this date for the costs of tin plates to be exported to an Atlantic port in the United States, and advice thereof to be given to Messrs. Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., accompanied by certified invoices, consul's certificates, policies of insurance, and bills of lading to order of Jay Cooke & Co. We hereby agree with the drawers, endorsers and bona fide holders of bills drawn under and in compliance with the terms of this credit that the same shall be duly honored upon presentation at the counting house of Messrs. Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. in London. Very truly yours, ——————." Accompanying each of these documents was a receipt, in the following form: "New York, ——, 187—. Received from Messrs. Jay Cooke & Co. the letter of credit of which annexed is a copy, in consideration whereof we hereby agree to provide them with sufficient and satisfactory funds to meet the payment of all bills drawn under it twenty days before the maturity of the same in London, respectively, either in cash at their drawing rate, or in bankers' bills payable at not exceeding sixty days sight in London, endorsed by us and approved by them, it being understood that they may decline any bills, however good, at their discretion. We also agree to give security for the same at any time if required by the said Jay Cooke & Co.; and further, that all property purchased under the said credit, and the proceeds thereof, together with the policies of insurance thereon (which we agree to effect) and the bills of lading are hereby pledged and hypothecated to Jay Cooke & Co., and Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., as collateral security for the fulfilment of this contract, and are held subject to their order, with authority to take possession and dispose of the same at discretion for account of whom it may concern, charging all expenses, including commission for sale and guarantee, and applying the proceeds for their security or reimbursement. And we further pledge, as security for any other indebtedness of our firm to Jay Cooke & Co. or Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. any surplus that may remain either in the property or the proceeds thereof after providing for the acceptances under said credit. On all drafts drawn under said credit we agree to pay one per cent. commission, and interest at five per cent., or the Bank of England rate if higher. We further authorize you to cancel the said credit at any time to the extent it shall not have been acted upon when notice of revocation is received by the user. This obligation is to continue in force notwithstanding any changes in the individuals composing either of the firms parties to this contract, or in that of the user of the credit."

These receipts were signed by the defendants. Under these letters goods were purchased and bills drawn on Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., which were accepted and paid at maturity by them. On 18th September, 1873, Jay Cooke & Co. stopped payment, and were on 26th November, 1873, adjudicated bankrupts. Up to that time N. & G. Taylor Co. had made payments to Jay Cooke & Co. pursuant to their engagement to meet the bills drawn under the letters of credit. On the day of the suspension of Jay Cooke & Co. there was outstanding a letter of credit, under which bills had been drawn and accepted by Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., and together amounting to £22,678 19s. 7d. sterling, over and above the amounts that had before that date been paid to Jay Cooke & Co. by N. & G. Taylor Co.; there was also due for commissions £226 15s. 10d. sterling, and £9 17s. for stamps. For the sum of £22,678 19s. 7d., Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. had made themselves liable by accepting bills drawn under the letters of credit, and N. & G. Taylor Co. had not paid Jay Cooke & Co., or Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., anything on account of the same. After the suspension of Jay Cooke & Co., and in anticipation of the bankruptcy that ensued, that firm, believing that the equitable right to be paid for the amount advanced under the letters of credit was in Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., who had agreed to make the advances, and who alone were competent to carry out their contract, and who ultimately did so by paying their acceptances, consented, at the instance of the agent of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., to hand over the documents to Drexel & Co., as agents of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., to collect the balance due or to become due from N. & G. Taylor Co. under their contracts above set forth. In September, 1873, after the suspension of Jay Cooke & Co., two of the consignments of goods purchased under the letters of credit arrived. The goods were consigned, according to the agreement, to Jay Cooke & Co., as collateral security for the performance by N. & G. Taylor Co. of their contract to provide funds. These bills of lading were handed over to the Messrs. Taylor Co. upon their signing a contract in this form, one on the 24th, and the other on the 29th of September, 1873: "Philadelphia, Sept. 29, 1873. Received from Hugh McCulloch, Philadelphia, the merchandise specified in the bill of lading, per Pennsylvania, dated 10th of Sept., 1873: * * * 1207 boxes tin plates * * * And in consideration thereof we hereby agree to hold said goods in trust, with liberty to sell the same, and in case of sale, to hand the avails, as soon as received, to Hugh McCulloch, as security for due provision for the acceptance of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., of London, on our account noted at foot; and we further pledge to them said goods, and proceeds thereof, as security for the payment of any other indebtedness of ourselves to Hugh McCulloch, or Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. We further agree to keep said property insured against fire, payable in case of loss, to Hugh McCulloch, with the understanding that they are not to be chargeable with any expenses incurred thereon, the intention of this arrangement being to protect and preserve, unimpaired, the lien of Hugh McCulloch, and Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., on said property. N. & G. Taylor Co."

After the delivery to them of these goods, as above, N. & G. Taylor Co. continued to make payments to Drexel & Co., as agents of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., of the amounts they were bound to pay on their contracts, and these were all made after the adjudication of Jay Cooke & Co. as bankrupts. The proceeds of the goods received were more than enough to pay the claims of plaintiffs. The bill prayed for discovery, and that a decree should be made ascertaining plaintiffs' rights to receive the amount due by defendants as against any claim by the assignee in bankruptcy of Jay Cooke & Co. The material facts alleged in the answer were as follows: They had been in the habit of transacting business which required the payment of large sums annually in England and Scotland. When the exact amount of these payments was known to defendants, they purchased sight drafts from Jay Cooke & Co. on Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., paying for them as received. But where they did not know the exact amount required, they bought of Jay Cooke & Co. the right of drawing on Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. any amount which they might require, and this was done through the medium of the open letters of credit alluded to in the bill. Defendants drew drafts on Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. by virtue of these open letters, having, at the time of purchasing the latter, agreed to pay Jay Cooke & Co., at Philadelphia, in U. S. currency, the equivalent of each draft drawn, twenty days before maturity thereof in London, with one per cent. commission.

When Jay Cooke & Co. stopped payment, defendants did not know that there existed any probability of insolvency. Defendants denied that Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. were either alone competent to carry out their contracts in regard to the drafts in question, or that they actually did so by paying their acceptances, except to the extent of £2761 13s. 4d. The acceptances were paid through Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. by defendants, who supplied the funds in each case a short time before the acceptance became due. On 18 September, 1873, there was out a sight draft of Jay Cooke & Co. on Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. for £2264 7s. 11d., for which defendants had paid Jay Cooke & Co. in full; and there were three open letters of credit, as aforesaid, each for £10,000, for which they had agreed to pay Jay Cooke & Co., in Philadelphia, twenty days before the maturity in London of each draft drawn thereunder. On receiving the bills of lading for each lot of merchandise, defendants had signed to Jay Cooke & Co. a printed receipt, identical with the one set forth above, under date of 29 Sept., 1873, except that the name of Jay Cooke & Co. was printed therein, wherever the name of Hugh McCulloch occurs in the above receipt. On arrival of the Pennsylvania, 23 September, 1873, defendants, for their own protection, called on Jay Cooke & Co. for the purpose of stopping in transitu such merchandise as had been consigned to Jay Cooke & Co. for them. They were informed that Jay Cooke & Co. were solvent; that the bills of lading had been transferred to Hugh McCulloch, and were held for him by Drexel & Co.; that all acceptances would be paid by Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., by which firm the draft for £2264 7s. 11d. would be also accepted and paid. As the indebtedness of defendants on the drafts drawn on Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. matured (after the 18th of September, 1873), defendants bought drafts of Drexel & Co., and sent them to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. to be applied to the payment of the particular acceptances about to mature, describing them specifically. Defendants understood when sending them that said drafts were so indorsed that they could not be used except to pay the specific acceptances then becoming due. The said draft for £2264 7s. 11d. was actually protested for non-payment on the 23 September, 1873. It remains still unpaid. Defendants had paid for all drafts drawn on Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. before the same matured, including commissions, etc., excepting the sum of £2761 13s. 4d. on the last draft drawn by them, from which amount they claimed that they had a right to deduct the amount of the draft of Jay Cooke & Co., aforesaid, for which they had paid Jay Cooke & Co. They admitted that they would be liable to the latter £2761 13s. 4d., provided the last-mentioned draft had been paid.

Sydney Biddle and Mr. McMurtrie, for plaintiff.

This transaction is simply an agreement by one firm (Jay Cooke & Co.) that another firm (Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co.) shall accept drafts drawn on them by the defendants, for a profit of one per cent. to be divided between the firms. Defendants agree to supply funds to meet the acceptances before they become due. The agency of Jay Cooke & Co. in the matter was merely to pledge themselves for the reliability of the defendants. The contract was this: The English firm agreed to accept drafts for defendants, provided they were assured of the latter's credit. The American firm assumed the responsibility of assuring the credit of defendants, and the latter agreed to supply the English firm with the necessary funds to meet the acceptances before they matured. It is merely a loan of their credit by the two banking firms to defendants, who are liable to the English firm for the amount of their drafts. The latter can resort either to them or to the American firm. As the firms are entirely distinct, there is no set-off possible. The American firm, in receiving funds from defendants to meet the latter's drafts, were the agents of the English firm.

Mr. Fallon, contra.

This was a contract made entirely between defendants and Jay Cooke & Co. They knew Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. in the transaction solely as agents of the former. The letter of credit was the basis of the whole transaction. That was purchased from defendants Jay Cooke & Co. exclusively. Jay Cooke & Co. contracted that they should be supplied with certain credit, for which they were to pay Jay Cooke & Co. Defendants would have been liable on a breach of their contract to the Philadelphia firm, not the London firm, and vice versa. They were, therefore, entitled to deduct the amount of the Philadelphia firm's indebtedness to them on the unpaid draft from their debt to the latter. As for the commissions, plaintiffs could in no case claim commissions from defendants, and would have been entitled to but half thereof from Jay Cooke & Co.

Mr. McMurtrie, in reply, was restricted to the question of commissions.

Before McKENNAN, Circuit Judge, and CADWALADER, District Judge.

CADWALADER, District Judge (to defendants' counsel): Do you deny that the drafts have been paid by the English firm?

Fallon: Yes. The drafts were paid by the defendants through the English firm, to whom defendants' other drafts were specially endorsed, payable to the particular drafts in question.

PER CURIAM: But as to the balance?

Fallon: As to that we have a set-off, as our contract to furnish funds is with Jay Cooke & Co. alone.

CADWALADER, District Judge: "McCulloch possesses proof of payment in holding the drafts, and could recover in an action of assumpsit for money paid for defendants. If he had not paid the drafts, he could recover on the ground of his liability thereon for having accepted them."

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge: "This is a very simple question. It was merely a loan by Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. of their credit to defendants for a commission. Defendants cannot set off their claims against Jay Cooke & Co. I think plaintiffs are only entitled to half-commissions."

Decree accordingly.

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan. Term, 1858.

SHIPPING — AFFREIGHTMENT — DAMAGE TO CARGO BY SWEATING—MASTER'S CONTRACT — HELD UNDER CHARTER PARTY — ANSWER TO LIBEL — AMENDMENT.

[1. The vessel is not liable for damage to the cargo caused by the sweating of the vessel.]

[2. A ship is liable in rem upon the master's contract of affreightment, though it is let to him by charter party, where the shipper is ignorant of that fact.]

[3. An answer in an action on a bill of lading, which fails to allege that the damages claimed accrued from the sweating of the vessel, is amendable.]

[This was a libel in rem by Jethro J. McCullough and others against the steam propeller Echo (James G. Wilson, claimant) for failure to deliver goods under the terms and conditions of a bill of lading.]

BETTS, District Judge. This action claims $3000 damages for the non-delivery at this port of three several parcels of galvanized iron shipped by the libellants at Wilmington on board the propeller Echo, September 11, 1856, to be delivered in good order (the dangers of the seas only excepted) to Phelps, Dodge & Co. and others, or assignees, in New York, according to the undertaking of the master of said vessel in three several bills of lading of that date. The libel charges that the parcels of iron were respectively laden on board the propeller in good order according to the statement in the respective bills of lading, and that the vessel sailed from Wilmington with the iron on board, and arrived at the port of New York September 19, 1856, but her master failed to deliver the same according to the undertaking in the bills of lading; and owing to negligence and want of care and proper management in the transportation of said cargo the iron was found on its arrival here greatly damaged by rust, &c., not arising from dangers of the seas, &c. The answer controverts those allegations of the libel, and further denies the responsibility of the vessel for those damages, however they may have occurred, because she was chartered by the master, and the contract with the libellants for the affreightment in question was upon the personal responsibility of the master alone. The further defence was attempted to be made on the trial, by proof that the iron was stowed and dunnaged in lading it on board according to the express directions of the libellants, and if it was injured on the voyage by wetting, other than by means of dangers of the seas, that damage was caused by such stowage of the libellants made by their agents or by occasion of the sweating of the vessel, for neither of which could the vessel be held answerable to the libellants. The latter point as a proposition of law would supply an adequate defence if sustained by testimony, as the injury would be an accident of navigation, and not the result of negligence or misfeasance on the part of the ship (Clark v. Banerall, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 272), and a vessel wholly demised by charter is under like liabilities when sailed by the charterer as by her owner (9 Stat. 636, § 5). The objection that the ship was under charter to the master would not, if properly pleaded and proved, exempt her from liability in rem upon his contract of affreightment. Under the maritime law the ship is specifically liable for breach of the bill of lading, although let by charter party, and the shipper is ignorant of that fact. The Phebe [Case No. 11,064]; The Waldo [Id. 17,056]; The Casco [Id. 2,486].

The defect of pleading in not alleging in the answer that the damages to the iron accrued from the sweating of the vessel, and that she was not answerable for such accident of navigation, would be remedied to the claimants by allowing them to amend their answer in that respect, had they established that fact by proof, but in my opinion the evidence is against them on that point, and the case will accordingly be disposed of upon the pleadings and proofs as they stood on trial.

A close scrutiny of the facts was made on the trial by the examination of ten witnesses to the condition of the iron when shipped and that of the vessel when it was received on board; the manner of stowage; the state of the weather during the voyage, and the condition of the iron when unladen in New York. It seems to me upon the whole proofs there is no sound foundation for the hypothesis that the injury which the iron sustained from wetting was caused by the sweating of the vessel; nor, if the evidence of the engineer of the vessel is to be credited, that the bottom of the hold was damp when the iron was put on board and that the fact was known to the shipper and the iron was stowed under his direction and approval in a way to avoid injury to it from that cause, is there reason for imputing the wet or rusting from the damp state of the bottom of the ship, because it is clearly proved that water was standing upon the iron and was between the places so as to drip out of the bundles in unlading and carting them from the vessel. The direct and strong proof in the case is that the cargo was exposed to rain in its transportation, and on board the vessel before delivery to the consignee thereof, and that the damages thereby sustained are at the responsibility of the vessel.

The decree in the cause must therefore be that the libellants recover in this action the damages they have sustained in this behalf, and that an order be entered referring the matter to a commissioner to ascertain and report the amount of such damages unless the same be agreed between the parties.

[4 Dill. 563.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. 1877.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — ACT MARCH 3, 1875—TIME WHEN APPLICATION MUST BE MADE.

1. An action at law in the state court was commenced by attachment, but no process was issued or served. At the next term the defendant, by consent, entered an appearance, and, by consent, also, the cause was continued, and leave given to the defendant until the second day of the next term, to answer; all of which was contained in the same journal entry. The Code of Iowa, provides that such actions "shall be tried at the first term after legal and timely service." Section 2744. At the term to which the cause was thus continued, a petition, under the act of March 3, 1875 [18 Stat. 470], for the removal of the cause to the circuit court of the United States was filed: Held, under the circumstances, that the application for the removal was in time.

[Cited in Wheeler v. Liverpool, London & Globe Ins. Co., 8 Fed. 198.]

2. If the entry of an appearance by the defendant had been general and unconditional, and at a term prior to the order for continuance, a different question would have been presented.

On motion to remand. The defendant, an Illinois corporation, removed this cause to this court under the act of March 3, 1875, the plaintiff being a citizen of Iowa. The plaintiff moves to remand the suit because the petition for the removal was not made and filed in time. The suit in the state court, which was an action at law, was commenced by attachment in December, 1876. No original notice (which, under the Iowa statute, takes the place of a writ of summons) was issued or served on the defendant. The next term of the state court was in January, 1877. At that term the defendant, by consent, entered an appearance, and at the same time, and likewise by consent, the cause was continued, and leave given to the defendant until the second day of the next term, to answer. The defendant's appearance, the continuance, and the order to answer at the next term, were contemporaneous, and are contained in the same journal entry. At the next term the defendant filed an answer and counter-claim; the plaintiff demurred thereto, which was not disposed of, and the plaintiff amended his petition; and thereupon, on the next day, and at the same term, the defendant filed its petition and bond in due form, to remove the cause to this court, and the removal thereof was ordered.

Mr. Blake, for the motion.

Mr. Tracy, contra.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and LOVE, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The mode of making and the effect of an appearance by the defendant in an action, are regulated by the Code of Iowa of 1873 (section 2626). This was an action at law, and the Code (section 2744) provides that such an action "shall be tried at the first term after legal and timely service has been made." This case was not triable at the January term, 1877, because process had not been served. The defendant may, however, enter a voluntary appearance, and such an appearance, if absolute and unconditional, has the same effect as to the power and jurisdiction of the court to proceed with the cause and the trial thereof, unless it shall order otherwise, as if original process had been served in time. But, as we construe the record of the state court, the appearance in this case was not general and unconditional, but it was the result of an agreement with the plaintiff's counsel to this effect: The defendant said to the plaintiff, "I will enter an appearance now, and thus save the expense of issuing and serving process, if you will consent that the cause shall go over to the next term, and that the answer shall be then filed;" to which the plaintiff agreed. Accordingly, the record of the state court shows that the defendant's appearance and the continuance of the cause were made at the same time and embodied in the same entry, which states that this was by consent of the parties. If the entry of appearance had been general, and at a prior time to the order for continuance, a different question would be presented. It is to be observed that, as the plaintiff had not served the defendant with process, he could not have forced the defendant to a trial, and the cause could not have been tried at the January term, except by the act or consent of the defendant, and the defendant did no act, and gave no consent, which made it legally possible to have tried the suit at that term. The action could not have been tried until the succeeding term, and at that term, and before the issues were finally completed, the application for the removal was made. Under these circumstances, it is our judgment that removal was in time. Motion denied.

[3 Cent. Law J. 635.]

DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT—MISSOURI STATUTE—GRANDCHILDREN.

In this case the court was called upon to construe section 22, c. 43, p. 519, Wag. St., relative to the right to recover damages for the death of a person through the wrongful act of another. This section allows a certain amount to be sued for and recovered. "First, by the husband or wife of the deceased; or, second, if there be no husband or wife, or he or she fails to sue within six months after such death, then by the minor child or children of the deceased, etc." It was sought to extend this right of action to orphan children, living with their grandmother, for her death through the alleged wrongful act of the defendant railway.

DILLON, Circuit Judge, held that the statute must be construed strictly, and that no action was given under it to the grandchildren, in the case before him.

Habeas corpus, to Andrew Jamieson to bring the body of McCutchin, whom he claims as an apprentice. The return showed an indenture between the overseers of the poor and Andrew Jamieson, under their seals, in which they state that the boy is nine years old in July, 1794, (the date of the indenture,) and bind him until he shall be twenty-one years old. Andrew Jamieson, wished to show, by parol evidence, that the boy was only seven years old when bound, and of course had two more years to serve.

THE COURT was of opinion that Andrew Jamieson could not, by parol, contradict his seal, and was at law estopped to deny the age. And in equity he had no claim to the further services of the boy, because he saw the boy at the time he took him, and agreed to his age, and expected only twelve years' service from him.

THE COURT discharged the boy.

PRACTICE AT LAW—REINSTATEMENT OF ACTION—NON PROS.—ACTION ON REPLEVIN BOND—MITIGATION OF DAMAGES—MERITS OF CASE.

1. The court will not, at a subsequent term, reinstate an action of replevin which had been non-prossed at a preceding term, upon a rule to declare.

2. In an action upon a replevin-bond, it seems that the defendant may, in mitigation of damages, give evidence of fraud, by which the defendant was cheated by the plaintiff and others, in playing at cards, whereby the plaintiff won the mare of the defendant, which was the subject of the replevin.

[This was an action at law by McDaniel, for the use of James Semmes, against Francis Fish and others.]

Debt on replevin-bond. The breach assigned was that the plaintiff in replevin did not prosecute the replevin to effect.

Mr. Jones, for defendants in the present action, moved the court for leave to reinstate the replevin, and bring it forward on the docket, it having been non-prossed at December term, 1816, on the imparlance docket, upon a rule to declare, on the ground that the plaintiff in replevin, was an ignorant man, and did not know that he was to appear in court to prosecute his suit, and did not employ an attorney. The motion was supported by the affidavits of Fish himself, and several witnesses tending to show a gross cheating of Fish, by James Birch, ——— Burgerson, and James Semmes, in playing at cards and winning Fish's mare, which was the subject of the replevin. Fish had never entered his appearance in the replevin, either in proper person or by attorney. At the return term of the writ the defendant appeared and laid a rule on the plaintiff to declare by the rule-day, upon which rule the replevin was non-prossed at the subsequent term. No judgment was ever entered for a return.

THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to reinstate the cause, on account of the wide door it would open to motions of this kind, and because the merits of the case might be given in evidence in mitigation of the damages in the present action upon the replevin-bond.

Case No. 8,744a.

McDANIEL v. MILAM.

[Hempst. 274.] [1]

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. July, 1835.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—LAPSE OF TIME—EVIDENCE OF RESIDENCE.

Appeal from Hempstead circuit court.

[This was an action at law by George McDaniel against Benjamin R. Milam to enforce the payment of a note. From a decree of the court below in favor of defendant, plaintiff appealed.]

Before JOHNSON and YELL, JJ.

YELL, J. On the 24th day of December, 1819, the defendant executed his note to plaintiff for the sum of one hundred dollars, due and payable in all the month of April next after the date of said note, at Natchitoches, in Louisiana, and on the 20th of August, 1833, a summons was sued out on said obligation, and at the October term, 1833, it was returned not executed, and an alias summons was ordered and returned executed on the third day of January, 1834. The defendant, among other things, relied on the statute of limitations of five years, which was plead. The plaintiff replied that the defendant, by his removal out of the United States, to parts unknown, defeated the bringing of the action in five years after the cause of action accrued; to which the defendant replied that he did not defeat the bringing of the action aforesaid, in five years, as the plaintiff has alleged, upon which the plaintiff joined issue. Neither party requiring a jury, the cause was submitted to the court upon the testimony as appeared in the bill of exceptions.

E. S. Williams, a witness, stated in substance that he became acquainted with defendant Milam in June, 1820, in New Orleans. Defendant remained there until January, 1821, and then went to Mexico, remained there about two years, and returned again to New Orleans and remained a few days, and then went to Kentucky on a visit and remained there about two months, and again returned to New Orleans, where he remained a few days, and went again to Mexico and remained there several months, and again returned to the United States, and has since then been in Louisiana, frequently passing back and forth from there to Arkansas and Texas. He stated that the defendant could not have been esteemed a citizen particularly of any place. At the time the witness first knew him, he stayed most of his time in New Orleans, and lived at a boarding-house. He believed defendant did not reside at Natchitoches. Had heard him, Milam, say he went to New Orleans in 1819, and traded from thence to the West Indies. The defendant first settled in Arkansas eight years ago last fall. Witness further stated that Milam was in Natchitoches every year after his return from Mexico, as often as once or twice a year.

Upon this evidence the court rendered a judgment in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff appealed to this court.

Without going at large into the grounds upon which this judgment was rendered for the defendant, which admits of ample vindication, we are of opinion that the lapse of time, in the present case, is a bar to the plaintiff's recovery. We therefore affirm the judgment of the court below. Judgment affirmed.

McDANIEL v. RIGGS.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 167.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1827.

JUDGMENTS—SURETY—SUBROGATION — EXECUTION QUASHED—RIGHT OF SURETY TO RECOVER MONEY PAID.

Judgment was rendered in Virginia, in favor of Shepherd, for the use of Riggs against Dixon, and McDaniel, his bail. McDaniel paid the money to Riggs, upon the execution, and took an assignment of the execution against Dixon. The execution against McDaniel, the bail, was quashed by the court in Virginia; and he brought suit in this court against Riggs for money had and received, to get back his money. Held, that he was entitled to recover, although he still held the assigned execution against Dixon.

This was submitted to the court, upon the following case agreed: In 1818, in the superior court of Loudoun county, in Virginia, one Shepherd, for the use of Riggs, brought an action of debt against Jacob Dixon, for whom, McDaniel, the present plaintiff, became appearance-bail. At November rules 1818, there was an office-judgment against Dixon and McDaniel, his appearance-bail, nisi, which was confirmed at December rules, 1818. On the 6th of April, 1819, McDaniel came into court, and entered himself special bail for Dixon. On the 10th of the same April, 1819, judgment was again rendered by default against Dixon, and McDaniel, his "common bail." On the 9th of April 1823, upon an execution issued on the 16th of April, 1819, agreeably to an office judgment rendered on the —— day of April, 1819, upon motion of McDaniel, it appearing to the court that special bail was entered on the 6th of April, 1819, the execution was quashed as to him, McDaniel. On the 6th of April, 1824, upon an execution issued on the 16th of April, 1819, agreeably to an office-judgment entered at the rules on the 10th of April, 1819, on the motion of McDaniel, and it appearing that special bail was entered on the 6th of April, 1819, it was ordered that the judgment as to McDaniel be set aside, and that execution as to him, be quashed; and a writ of restitution was awarded to the said McDaniel, he having before paid the money on the execution, to Riggs, upon receiving an assignment of the execution against Dixon; which execution was returned by the sheriff, at the return term, (August, 1819,) with the indorsement of the assignment thereon; but without any other return written thereon. Riggs was never a resident in Virginia; and a writ of restitution could never have been served upon him, if such could have issued, or had issued against him. It did not appear, by the record, whether the writ of restitution was awarded against Shepherd, the legal and nominal plaintiff in the action, or against Riggs, for whose use the suit was originally brought, as appeared by the record, and who actually received the money; although this fact, the receipt of the money by Riggs, did not appear in the transcript of the record. The question submitted to the court was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover, in this action, upon that state of facts.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, contrà) was of opinion, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, thought that as this was an action for money had and received, which is an equitable action, the plaintiff must show that ex aequo et bono, he was entitled to get back the money; but as he had received an assignment of the judgment at the time of paying the money to Riggs, (which was a valuable consideration,) and still held that assignment, Riggs, who had lawfully received the money, had a right to retain it; especially as McDaniel was still bound as special bail.

2. An unfounded claim for lien dismissed without costs, the owners of the vessel having profited by the claimant's services,—which constituted a personal demand,—under circumstances not quite honourable.

M'Dermott claimed a lien for labour and services as a stevedore in loading and storing the cargo of the vessel S. G. Owens, while lying at one of the wharves of Philadelphia, previous to proceeding on a voyage to California; and the question was whether, admitting the vessel to be a foreign vessel, he had such a lien under the general maritime law. As a domestick vessel, it was admitted he had no lien. The case was a hard one upon the stevedore. The persons who employed him had become insolvent, and had transferred the ship and cargo, all ready for sea, to the present owners, who took it with knowledge of this and similar claims, but without making any provision for paying them.

Mr. Vandyke, in favour of the lien, contended that the duties of the stevedore were essentially maritime, being done on the ship and essential to her carrying freight. That, formerly, the mariners performed this service of loading and unloading vessels, and had a lien for their wages whether earned in port or at sea; and that, it being now found more convenient to have this service performed by labourers on shore, before the mariners come on board or after they are discharged, the stevedore,, who is substituted for the sailor, is entitled to the same lien.

Mr. Kennedy and G. M. Wharton, for owners.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The argument of the libellant's counsel is ingenious, but it wants the support of authority. No decision or dictum has been brought to the notice of the court which would justify them in treating this as a maritime service. It does not follow because sailors once performed these duties now better executed by landsmen, that therefore they should have the mariner's lien on the vessel. "The services are performed on a contract, which is neither made at sea nor for a service to be performed at sea; both were in the port of Philadelphia, and within the county of Philadelphia. The ship was safely moored at the wharf, and was in the actual possession of the owners; the service had no agency in bringing her in; she was not earning freight." For these reasons, which I quote from the opinion of the court in Phillips v. The Thomas Scattergood [Case No. 11,106], with others there mentioned, that court decided that a seaman whose wages have been paid up to the termination of the voyage, but who afterwards remains on board the vessel moored at the wharf, has no claim for services which a court of admiralty will enforce. The stevedores are usually employed by the owner, consignee, or master, on their personal credit. The service performed is in no sense maritime, being completed before the voyage is begun or after it is ended; and they are no more entitled to a lien on the vessel than the draymen and other labourers who perform services in loading and discharging vessels. Judgment must be therefore entered for the owners, but without costs, as the court cannot approve of the transaction by which they became the owners of this vessel, without any provision being made for the payment of those persons whose property and labour was expended in fitting her for sea, and which has been appropriated by the owners to their exclusive benefit. Decree accordingly.

McDERMOTT v. YEATMAN.

[5 Pittsb. Leg. J. (O. S.) 29.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. 1857.

CHATTEL DEED OF TRUST—SUBSTITUTION OF PROPERTY.

The case here referred to was McDermott v. Yeatman. This case first came up at the last term of the court. It appeared that McDermott was a trustee in a deed given on two horses, which deed had a clause providing that other horses might be substituted. Some time after the deed was made the horses mentioned therein were, by the consent of the parties interested in the deed, traded off for other horses, in accordance with the clause of substitution. The defendant, Yeatman, levied, under a magistrate's judgment, on the horses thus substituted, and McDermott replevied.

Mr. Morgan, for defendant, asked the court to instruct the jury that if the jury, from the evidence, were satisfied that the horses levied on by defendant were not the identical horses described in the deed of trust, they must find for defendant, except they should further find that there was a formal act of delivery of the horses, for the purpose of the trust, by the grantor in the deed to the trustee before the levy by Yeatman.

THE COURT gave the instruction, and the jury found for the defendant. A motion was then made for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection of the court, but the court, at the present term, has overruled the motion, and affirmed their previous decision. This decision also applies to deeds on stock in trade.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The alleged act of bankruptcy in this case is, that the company, a corporation, on the 10th of March, 1869, being a merchant and trader, fraudulently stopped or suspended and did not resume payment of its commercial paper within a period of fourteen days. Such paper consists of two instruments. One is a promissory note, dated November 12th, 1868, and signed by the president and secretary of the company, and reading as follows: "On demand, after date, we, the McDermott Pat. Bolt Mfg. Co. promise to pay to the order of John E. Walsh, three hundred dollars, at the office of Co. Value received." The other is a receipt or due bill, signed by the treasurer of the company, and in the words following: "Received, New York, Nov. 7, '68, from Mr. J. C. Brinck, two hundred doll. for the McDermott Pat. Bolt Manufg. Co. as a loan for their use, the same to be returned, due on demand." I do not think that, on the facts proved in this case, either of these instruments can be regarded as "commercial paper," within the meaning of those words in the 39th section of the bankruptcy act. The consideration of each of them was a loan of money made to the company by the payee named therein. The consideration was unconnected with merchandise, trade or commerce, or with any mercantile, trading or commercial transaction. The object to which the money borrowed by the company was applied by it, cannot affect the character of the instruments given as evidences of the indebtedness, even though it was previously known to the lenders that the money would be applied to such object. Both of the instruments are payable on demand. The one to Brinck has no feature of negotiability on its face; and, although the note to Walsh is payable to his order, yet, in view of the fact that it is made payable on demand, and of the actual consideration for it, its negotiable form is not sufficient to make it commercial paper, within the 39th section. That section requires that the debtor must be a merchant or trader, and must have fraudulently stopped or suspended payment of his commercial paper. This I understand to mean a fraudulent stoppage or suspension of payment of commercial paper given by him in his character as a merchant or trader. The note to Walsh and the due-bill to Brinck were not thus given. The petition must be dismissed, with costs to be paid by the petitioning creditors.

[In the matter of Emmet McDonald.]

TREAT, District Judge. Since the adjournment, as thorough an examination of authorities as practicable has been made, with the view of arriving at a correct conclusion upon the jurisdictional question presented. Every authority cited by the learned counsel, and their able arguments, have been carefully considered. The question, though one of pure law, involves an inquiry into the United States constitution and statutes, the organization of the United States courts, the power vested in United States judges, and the sources of American jurisprudence. In the hasty preparation of an opinion taking so wide a range, it is not to be expected that much labor has been bestowed upon logical order or method, or mere forms of expression. The important consideration is to reach a correct conclusion. The undivided attention of the court, therefore, has been fixed upon the single proposition submitted. With other points or issues, which may or may not be reached in the further prosecution of this cause, the court, at this time, has nothing to do.

The case stands, at present, on a demurrer to the return. The counsel for the respondent has suggested a question of jurisdiction; and, as that question always lies in limine, it is right and proper that it should be first considered. As a preliminary step, then, it must be determined whether the court has jurisdiction—whether it can proceed any further in the matter before it; for, most certainly, when asked to pass upon the authority of others, official or otherwise, it should be scrupulously careful not to exceed its own legal powers. The duty to decide what the law is, in each case before it, and to enforce its decisions for the maintenance of constitutional and legal authority in whomever vested, for the time being, is no less imperative than to protect the humblest rights of persons and property. Every officer of the government, and every private citizen, is alike entitled to the full measure of protection furnished by law, and is alike responsible to it for every violation of its mandates. In its administration, there is no inequality—all stand before it on the same level. Has a United States district judge, or a United States district court, jurisdiction to issue the writ of habeas corpus and hear the case, when the petitioner is held under illegal restraint without any formal or technical "commitment?" Is it not essential to such jurisdiction that the petitioner should be in jail, or imprisoned by virtue of some judgment, warrant, order, rule, or process, judicial or otherwise—or, at least, be so held "under restraint?" Or, on the other hand, is it sufficient that he is illegally restrained of his liberty "under or by color of the authority of the United States," irrespective of the fact whether there has been a technical "commitment" or not? In short, is this case one of federal or exclusively state jurisdiction?

The petition, on which the writ was issued, avers substantially, that the petitioner is now, and has been since the 10th inst., held in unlawful confinement within the United States arsenal in this city, a military post under the command of the respondent; that he is so held under no writ, process, judgment, decree, committal, or order of any state court, or state officer, or by virtue of any state law, proceeding, or power, civil or military; that, "on the contrary, his said illegal confinement is under or by color of the authority of the United States;" and that said unlawful confinement is by no order, judgment, decree, or committal of any judicial tribunal of the United States, nor in virtue of any writ or process issuing therefrom. The petition then sets out the facts and circumstances connected with his caption, which are unimportant at this stage of the case, inasmuch as they do not qualify, in any manner, the direct averments above mentioned. Hence the jurisdictional question is free from all technicalities pertaining to careless use of language, for the averments are full and precise. It becomes a fundamental question, then, in the case, and must be directly and fairly met at the very threshold. Nothing has, in many cases, been more perplexing to American jurists than a correct definition of the exact limits, or the ascertainment of the true boundaries, between federal and state jurisdiction. In some classes of cases, federal jurisdiction is exclusive; in some, state jurisdiction; whilst in others the federal and state judiciary have concurrent authority. The dividing line is not always to be readily ascertained.

The whole power vested by the United States constitution in the federal judiciary has never yet been called into potential or full force and activity; nor have the necessary statutes been passed to give vital and practical energy to all of the grants of power concerning any of the three great departments of the government. The courts are, therefore, compelled to pass upon each case separately, as it arises, limiting their decisions to the particular facts before them. In the organization of the United States district courts, congress has defined the portion of judicial power with which they are entrusted. Turner v. Bank of North America, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 8. Beyond that limit they cannot pass. 1 Kent. Comm. 294. It is not whether congress could not have vested in them larger powers; but simply what authority has actually been entrusted to them. Hence, in each instance, recurrence must be had to the United States statutes; and, if those statutes are within the grants of the constitution, the means are at hand for settling the controversy. No actual or apprehended conflict between the state and federal authority exists in this case; yet the inquiry is just as appropriate concerning the extent of power really vested in this tribunal. Every public officer —whether executive, ministerial, or legislative—has to decide for himself, in the first instance, the true extent of his authority, subject always, in free governments, to a lawful revision of his acts in every case which may involve their validity. So is it, most unquestionably, with judicial officers and courts. Hence acts of congress have been solemnly pronounced unconstitutional and void; executive mandates condemned as in contravention, or without authority of law; ministerial proceedings, supposed legal for a time, finally adjudged trespasses; and judicial decisions overruled and annulled by superior judicial tribunals. Yet there is no instability in all this; it is merely an assertion of the fundamental principle of free government, viz. the supremacy of law. A thorough knowledge of the law, applicable to each case, and implicitly followed, would render all conflict of legal authority almost an impossibility. It is only necessary, therefore, to avoid conflicts, for citizens, whether acting in their private or official capacity, to understand correctly their legal rights and duties—to comprehend fully that, in all the varied and shifting exigencies of public and private affairs, law is still supreme—the source of all legitimate authority, the only power no one can disobey with impunity, to which all are subject, and which all have an equal right to invoke for the maintenance of their lives, liberties, and property. No one in this land is so exalted as to be above its restraining force, and none so humble as to be beneath its protecting care. Were it otherwise, lawlessness would dominate, anarchy follow, and liberty itself be impossible, for "there can be no liberty save in the harness of the law." "When the law ceases to be the test of right and remedy—when individuals undertake to be its administrators by rules of their own adoption—the bonds of society are broken. The first duty of citizens in a government of laws is obedience to its ordinances." Johnson v. Tompkins [Case No. 5,416]. Foremost of all should be the tribunals of law, to keep strictly within legal limits. Whilst fearless in the exercise of lawful power, they should be scrupulously vigilant not to exceed the legal boundaries set to their action. They minister at a sacred altar, and with religious fidelity must they be true to their trust. They can yield nothing, and must assume nothing. Like the supreme court of the United States, they "must grasp at nothing—shrink from nothing." In this spirit the courts should always act, and in modern times have generally acted. Hence it is that jurisdictional questions occupy so large a portion of judicial inquiry; and well is it that such has been the fact, for the conclusions thus reached enable others to recur to the past for its calm solution of propositions, which excitements of a subsequent hour might distort or color with passion or prejudice.

The language of Judge Cranch (U. S. v. Bollman [Case No. 14,622]), is especially instructive, because, in the very case in which he gave utterance to such correct thoughts, he was overruled by his colleagues, but sustained, on review, by the United States supreme court: "In times like these, when the public mind is agitated—when wars and rumors of wars, plots, conspiracies and treasons excite alarm—it is the duty of a court to be peculiarly watchful, lest the public feeling should reach the seat of justice, and thereby precedents be established which may become the ready tools of faction in times more disastrous. The worst of precedents may be established from the best of motives. We ought to be upon our guard, lest our zeal for the public interest lead us to overstep the bounds of the law and the constitution; for, although we may thereby bring one criminal to punishment, we may furnish the means by which a hundred innocent persons may suffer. The constitution was made for times of commotion. In the calm of peace and prosperity, there is seldom great injustice. Dangerous precedents occur in dangerous times. It then becomes the duty of the judiciary calmly to poise the scales of justice, unmoved by the arm of power, undisturbed by the clamor of the multitude. Whenever an application is made to us in our judicial character, we are bound, not only by the nature of our office, but by our solemn oaths, to administer justice according to the laws and constitution of the United States. No political motives, no reasons of state, can justify a disregard of that solemn injunction. In cases of emergency, it is for the executive department of the government to act upon its own responsibility, and to rely upon the necessity of the case for its justification; but this court is bound by the law and the constitution in all events. When, therefore, the constitution declares that 'the right of the people to be secure in their persons' 'against unreasonable seizures,' 'shall not be violated,' and that 'no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation,' this court is as much bound as any individual magistrate to obey its command."

These truths, though elementary, are too apt to be overlooked. No apology is necessary for recurring to them at this time.

First. As to the right and duty of every court to decide upon the extent of its own jurisdiction, and the duty of every party upon whom process is served to appear in obedience thereto: "Every day and in every court, writs issue at the instance of parties asserting a grievance, and very often when, in truth, no grievance has been sustained. The party assailed comes before the court in obedience to its process. He perhaps questions the jurisdiction of the court. Perhaps he denies the fact charged. Perhaps he explains that the fact, as charged, was by reason of circumstances a lawful one. The judge is not presumed to know beforehand, all the merits of the thousand and one causes that come before him; he decides when he has heard. But the first duty of a defendant, in all cases, is obedience to the writ which calls him into court. Till he has rendered this, the judge cannot hear the cause, still less pass upon its merits." U. S. v. Williamson [Case No. 16,726]. Opinion of Judge Kane. "There are some proceedings in which the want of jurisdiction would be seen at the first blush, but there are others in which the court must inquire into all the facts, before it can possibly know whether it has jurisdiction or not. Any one who obstructs or baffles a judicial investigation for that purpose, is unquestionably guilty of a crime, for which he may and ought to be tried, convicted and punished. Suppose a local action to be brought in the wrong county, this is a defence to the action, but a defence which must be made out like any other. While it is pending, neither a party, nor an officer, nor any other person, can safely insult the court, or resist its order. The court may not have power to decide upon the merits of the case, but it has undoubted power to try whether the wrong was done within its jurisdiction or not. Suppose Mr. Williamson to be called before the circuit court of the United States, as a witness, in a trial for murder alleged to be committed on the high seas, can he refuse to be sworn, and at his trial for contempt justify himself on the ground that the murder was in fact committed within the limits of a state, and therefore triable only in a state court? If he can, he can justify perjury for the same reason. But such a defence for either crime has never been heard of, since the beginning of the world. * * * The duty of the court to inquire into the facts on which its jurisdiction depends. is as plain as its duty not to exceed it when it is ascertained." 26 Pa. St. 21.

Second. As this court must determine its own jurisdiction, the next inquiry is as to the mode of ascertaining it. Here it is better that the views of this court should be expressed in the language of Chief Justice Marshall, speaking the authoritative conclusions of the United States supreme court; authority which a United States district court, if so disposed, cannot properly disregard. The doctrine, as asserted by him, no American court or jurist can justly question. It is a correct and clear exposition of the law: "Courts which originate in the common law, possess a jurisdiction which must be regulated by the common law, until some statute shall change their established principles; but courts which are created by written law, and whose jurisdiction is defined by written law, cannot transcend that jurisdiction. It is unnecessary to state the reasoning on which this opinion is founded, because it has been repeatedly given by this court, and with the decisions heretofore rendered on this point, no member of the bench has ever for an instant been dissatisfied. The reasoning from the bar in relation to it, may be answered by the single observation that for the meaning of the term 'habeas corpus' resort may unquestionably be had to the common law, but the power to award the writ by any of the courts of the United States must be given by written law. This opinion is not to be considered as abridging the power of courts over their own officers, or to protect themselves and their members from being disturbed in the exercise of their functions; it extends only to the power of taking cognizance of any question between individuals, or between the government and individuals. To enable the court to decide on such question, the power to determine it must be given by written law." Ex parte Bollman, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 93.

Third. That written law is found in the act of 24th September, 1789, § 14 (1 Stat. 81), commonly known as the "Judiciary Act," and in the act of 2d March, 1833, § 7 (4 Stat. 634), usually denominated the "Force Bill." The history of each of those statutes is familiar to all, and suggestive of profound thought. The section in the act of 1833, conferring upon United States judges increased power to proceed by habeas corpus, was not by the terms of that act made temporary, whilst many of its other provisions were expressly limited in their operation to the end of the next session of congress then ensuing. The grave questions which have arisen within the last ten years, as to the scope of the powers granted to the United States judges by that act, will be alluded to in another part of this opinion. It is sufficient now, to consider, first, the act of 1789. Before analyzing this act and ascertaining its true construction, it may be well to remark that the case of U. S. v. French [Case No. 15,165], cited by counsel, decides nothing more than was afterwards directly held by the United States supreme court in Ex parte Dorr, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 103, viz.: That when a "commitment" is known to be under state authority, the United States courts and judges have no power to issue the writ of habeas corpus, and hear the cause. In the case of Wilson v. Izard [Case No. 17,810], the United States court took jurisdiction where the petitioner was restrained by authority of his enlistment in the United States service; and similar cases occur each year. In none of those cases is there, it is apprehended, any technical commitment; yet in the many acts of congress upon the subject of enlistment, there may be, in addition to the act of 3d March, 1799 [1 Stat. 749], similar provisions of a special character, conferring jurisdiction upon United States district and state judges, to hear applications for this writ in such matters, or in cases arising under such statutes. As time has not permitted an examination of all those acts, to ascertain what are still in force with reference to the discharge of soldiers from enlistment in the regular army, and as the judiciary act seems perfectly clear, it is not necessary, for the case before the court, to pursue that collateral inquiry. If there be no such special statutes, and Wilson v. Izard [supra], was decided by the United States circuit court for New York, by virtue of the authority granted in the act of 1789, then that case is directly in point. The act of 1789 seems sufficiently explicit, of itself. When the history of this writ, and the views of those who framed the United States constitution and the act of 1789, are considered, there is scarcely room for doubt. The legal controversy leading to the American Revolution, and the persistent demand of the colonists that they were entitled to the privileges of Englishmen, among which they claimed that of the habeas corpus as inestimable in value—"the inheritance of the free born subject"—would induce the belief, that among the first acts passed by those patriotic statesmen would be one securing those privileges to as full an extent, at least, as they had insisted upon them whilst subjects of England. And so they did. In the constitution they inserted a direct prohibition against the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, "unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it"—being careful to use the very words they had employed during their ante-revolutionary struggle with England—the privilege of the writ, and not merely the writ itself. They struck deeper than the form, and insisted upon the substance—the underlying principle—the privileges for the vindication of which that writ had been immemorially used. The history of the American colonies, as well as of England, furnishes the amplest commentaries upon the part that writ has performed in every struggle for freedom. The act of 1789 has received the deserved encomiums of all eminent American jurists for its perspicuity and comprehensiveness—second only in those respects to the precise language of the constitution itself. It would be, indeed strange, if in the organization of judicial tribunals, the members of the first congress had overlooked the importance of that writ, or had virtually suspended it, or fatally impaired the privileges it secures in the many and essential cases where arbitrary authority might act without warrant, or "due process of law." And still stranger would it appear when it is remembered, that at its first session that very congress proposed for adoption the first ten amendments to the constitution, the fifth of which declares that "no person * * * shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law"—words which Justice Curtis, delivering the opinion of the United States supreme court in Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Co., 18 How. [59 U. S.] 276, said "were undoubtedly intended to convey the same meaning as the words 'by the law of the land' in Magna Charta." Still, if the act of 1789, by omission or otherwise, is as narrow in its limitations as contended for, no degree of surprise thereat can supply its omissions or change its terms. It must be taken as it is written, and fairly construed. The 14th section is as follows: "And be it further enacted, That all the before-mentioned courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law. And that either of the justices of the supreme court, as well as judges of the district courts, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus, for the purpose of an inquiry into the cause of commitment. Provided, that writs of habeas corpus shall in no case extend to prisoners in gaol, unless where they are in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States, or are committed for trial before some court of the same, or are necessary to be brought into court to testify." 1 Stat. 81.

If there had never been a judicial exposition of that act, the student of legal history could hardly mistake its force and effect. The first sentence gives to the courts all the power they possess; and the second vests in the United States judges all the authority they have over the writ. It is well known how earnestly it was once contended that the United States courts, or at least the United States supreme court, had no authority to issue the writ, "except when necessary for the exercise of its jurisdiction" in some case actually pending before it. And as the supreme court, by the terms of the constitution, has no original jurisdiction except in "cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party;" and as the writ of liberty—the habeas corpus ad subjiciendum—can scarcely be applicable to the exercise of its jurisdiction in any case already before it, on appeal; and as it has no appellate power given in criminal cases, it would have followed inevitably from that narrow construction, that it could deliver from unlawful restraint foreign ambassadors, ministers and consuls, but no American citizen. And still worse, upon that construction, the United States circuit or district courts could never use the writ for the great remedial purposes for which it had always existed—no federal court would have the needed power. Having thus construed away the power of the United States courts as to the most beneficial purposes of the writ, the judges of those courts would be left at chambers with an authority which the courts could never exercise, but an authority more limited than any British judge ever had at common law from the days of King John—even under the worst of the Tudors or Stuarts. But the language of the first sentence is not so narrow. The restriction has no application to the writs of habeas corpus and scire facias, but merely to "the other writs" referred to. The power granted to the United States courts by that act is as broad as if it read: they "shall have power to issue the writs of scire facias and habeas corpus agreeable to the principles and usages of law"—principles and usages as well understood as the meaning of the words "due process of law" in the fifth amendment to the constitution. And so on the Trial of Burr [Case No. 14,693], Chief Justice Marshall held: "The principles and usages of law mean those general principles and usages which are to be found, not in the legislative acts of any particular state, but in that generally recognized and long established law which forms the substratum of all the laws of every state."

But is there no limit to the powers of the United States courts? May they override all state process, judgments and decrees, and virtually discharge prisoners in custody for violation of state laws? If there were no provision on the subject in the act of 1789, still the reasonable construction would necessarily be, that the United States courts can take no jurisdiction beyond the range of federal authority—that they must confine their action within the purview of federal jurisdiction, and not interfere with cases belonging exclusively to the states. But the proviso to the second section has always been held, and with manifest correctness, to limit the courts as well as the judges at chambers. That proviso was for the express purpose of preventing conflicts between federal and state authority — of confining the United States courts and judges within their appropriate spheres. On any other construction, we should have the strange anomaly of a statute conferring upon an individual judge at chambers, a power which congress was unwilling to entrust even to the supreme court of the United States, or to a circuit court. A district court, held by the district judge alone, in open term, could not do what the same judge by stepping down from the bench, could quietly do at chambers, and that, too, in a matter involving the liberties of the American people, within the purview of the United States authority. Any fair construction of the act of 1789, whilst extending the proviso of the second sentence to the whole section, and forbidding federal courts as well as judges from interfering with the legitimate authority of state tribunals, gives to both courts and judges power to inquire into every "cause or commitment under or by color of the authority of the United States;" not narrowing them down to cases of technical or formal arrests by judicial process and leaving them powerless when arbitrary will, assuming to act in the name of the United States, chooses to trample upon every constitutional guaranty for the protection of individual liberty. If process issued from a judicial officer of the United States government, the citizen would have at least the assurance that such officer could not, without the grossest and most palpable violation of his sworn duty, proceed except by "due process of law," yet if he is left remediless where his liberties are trodden down without any legal process whatsoever, he would be delivered over to the tender mercies of every federal officer who chooses to outrage his constitutional rights—his "inheritance as a free-born subject."

Reference was made by counsel to contemporaneous history for aid in construing this act. Such reference is always legitimate where there is any obscurity in the terms employed; and so is the other rule, also invoked, that the use of a technical term in a statute is supposed to carry with it its technical meaning and application. If the act of 1789 is tested by these rules the same result, already indicated, is just as clearly reached. The ante-revolutionary controversies of a legal character, together with the debates in the British parliament upon those questions, furnish ample light to illuminate our pathway. It is not to be supposed that the American statesmen of the Revolution, who drafted the constitution and the act of 1789, were ignorant of the controversy which had just taken place in the British parliament with respect to this writ and its privileges; particularly as they had petitioned and remonstrated from time to time upon the same subject. The following compendious history of that parliamentary struggle, if resort is had to contemporaneous events, will most probably furnish the best guide to what was in the minds of the first congress when the judiciary act was passed: "In the year 1757, the above act of the 31 Car. II. c. 2 (habeas corpus act) came under discussion, in both houses of parliament upon the following occasion. A gentleman having been impressed before the commissioners under a pressing act passed in the preceding session, and confined in the Savoy, his friends made application for a writ of habeas corpus, which produced some hesitation and difficulty, for according to the above statute, the privilege relates only to persons committed for criminal, or supposed criminal matters, and this gentleman did not stand in that predicament. Before the question could be determined, he was discharged, in consequence of an application to the secretary of war. But the nature of the case seeming to point out a defect in the act, a bill for giving a more speedy remedy to the subject upon the writ of habeas corpus was prepared, and presented to the house of commons. It imported that the several provisions made in the above act (31 Car. II.) for the awarding of writs of habeas corpus in cases of commitment, or detainer for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, should in like manner extend to all cases, where any person, not being committed or detained for any criminal or supposed criminal matter should be confined, or restrained of his or their liberty under any color or pretence whatsoever, that upon oath made by such person so confined, or restrained, or by any other person on his behalf, of any actual confinement or restraint, to the best of the knowledge and belief of the person so applying, was not by virtue of any commitment, or detainer for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, an habeas corpus, directed to the person or persons so confining or restraining the party, should be granted in the same manner as is directed, and under the same penalties as are provided by the said act in the case of persons committed or detained for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, that the person before whom the party should be brought, by virtue of an habeas corpus, granted in the vacation time, under the authority of this act, might and should, within three days after the return made, proceed to examine into the facts contained in such return, and into the cause of such confinement and restraint, and thereupon either discharge, or bail, or remand the party so brought, as the case should require, and as to justice should appertain. The rest of the bill related to the return of the writ in three days, and the penalties upon those who should neglect or refuse to make the return, or to comply with any other claim of this regulation. See the bill and the arguments for and against it, in the appendix to 7, Debrett's Debates, 1743–1774. The bill was soon passed by the commons, but in the house of lords it was thrown out at the second reading, and the judges were ordered to prepare a bill to extend the power of granting writs of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum in vacation time, in cases not within the statute of 31 Car. II. c. 2, to all the judges of his majesty's courts at Westminster, and to provide for the issuing of process in vacation time to compel obedience to such writs, and that in preparing such bill, they take into consideration whether in any and in what cases it may be proper to make provision that the truth of the facts contained in the return to a writ of habeas corpus may be controverted by affidavits of traverse, and so far as it shall appear to be proper, that clauses be inserted for that purpose, and that they lay such bill before the house, in the beginning of the next session of parliament." 3 Bac. Abr. Append. to Habeas Corpus.

It should be carefully observed that what thus occurred was almost coeval with the American struggle for independence. The bill which passed the house of commons was at first delayed in the house of lords until the opinions of all the judges at Westminster hall could be had in answer to the celebrated interrogatories propounded to them. Those answers were subsequently made. Upon the strength of the judicial opinions thus given, Lord Mansfield caused the defeat of the bill in the house of lords, upon the ground that everything proposed in the bill was already the law just as indisputably and clearly as if that bill had ripened into an act upon the statute books of the realm. It was thus settled, in the opinion of the British judges and of the house of lords, just prior to the American Revolution, that "the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus agreeably to the principles and usages of law" "extended to all cases where persons not being committed or detained, &c., should be confined or restrained of his or their liberties under any color or pretence whatever." But American courts are no longer left merely to such modes of interpretation. The opinion of the United States supreme court was given upon the fourteenth section of the act of 1789 as early as 1807 by Chief Justice Marshall. Although the main point before that court had reference to its own character as an appellate court, except in the few cases already named; yet from that day to the present, the general views then expressed seem to have been recognized by all courts and judges as putting at rest every dispute about the extent of the power of the United States courts and judges, in cases of original jurisdiction, to issue the writ and inquire into the causes of illegal restraint where said restraint is "under or by color of the authority of the United States." To understand distinctly the views expressed by Chief Justice Marshall, it is necessary to keep constantly before the mind, the fact that the supreme court was considering in what cases that tribunal, as an appellate tribunal, and not a court of original jurisdiction, could issue the writ. As the constitution defined and limited its powers in original cases, manifestly no act of congress could enlarge them; yet the act of 1789 was, in terms, broad enough to give to that court the same powers over this writ as to the circuit or district courts, which possessed a more enlarged original jurisdiction. So anxious were the framers of the act of 1789 not to restrict the privileges of this writ, that they had seemingly given to an appellate court original jurisdiction. Hence the supreme court, defining its own powers under the restrictions of the constitution and not under the act of 1789, limits itself to cases pending in or decided by those courts over which it has appellate or revisory power. It claimed a right to revise—a revisionary jurisdiction—over tribunals inferior to itself, or from whose decisions an appeal might ultimately be to the supreme court. In other cases of commitment—that is where the petitioner was imprisoned by other than United States district or circuit courts, it could not have jurisdiction because it had no appellate or revisory power. It followed logically that it could not issue the writ where there was no commitment by any court; for there would then be no action of a court over which it had appellate jurisdiction, which could come before it for revision. Hence its decisions in the cases of Dorr, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 103, of Barry, in 2 How. [43 U. S.] 65, of Barry v. Mercien, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 103, and Ex parte Metzger, in Id. 176, and In re Kaine, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 103. But in [Ex parte Bollman] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 93, and [Ex parte Watkins] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 201, that court states with sufficient distinctness its views of the case in which United States courts of original jurisdiction, and United States judges, have power to act, and also the scope of authority they possess. As the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 93, is full and demonstrative, the principal portion of it is quoted; with a repetition of the remark that the distinction between courts of appellate and original jurisdiction must be borne constantly in mind whilst considering it:

The only doubt of which this section (14th section of judiciary act) can be susceptible, is whether the restrictive words of the first sentence limit the power to the award of such writs of habeas corpus, as are necessary to enable the courts of the United States to exercise their respective jurisdictions, in some causes, which they are capable of finally deciding. It has been urged that, in strict grammatical construction, these words refer to the last antecedent, which is "all other writs not specially provided for by statute." The criticism may be correct, and is not entirely without its influence; but the sound construction which the court thinks it safer to adopt, is, that the true sense of the words is to be determined by the nature of the provision, and by the context. It may be worthy of remark, that this act was passed by the first congress of the United States, sitting under a constitution which had declared "that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus should not be suspended, unless when, in case of rebellion or invasion, the public safety might require it." Acting under the immediate influence of this injunction they must have felt, with peculiar force, the obligation of providing efficient means by which this great constitutional privilege should receive life and activity; for, if the means be not in existence, the privilege itself would be lost, although no law for its suspension should be enacted. Under the impression of this obligation, they give to all the courts the power of awarding writs of habeas corpus. It has been truly said that this is a generic term, and includes every species of that writ. To this it may be added, that when used singly—when we say the writ of habeas corpus without addition, we most generally mean that great writ which is now applied for; and in that sense it is used in the constitution. The section proceeds to say, that, "either of the justices of the supreme court, as well as judges of the district court, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus for the purpose of an inquiry into the cause of commitment." It has been argued that congress could never intend to give a power of this kind to the judges of this court, which is refused to all of them when assembled. There is certainly much force in this argument, and it receives additional strength from the consideration, that if the power be denied to this court, it is denied to every other court of the United States. The right to grant this important writ is given in this sentence to every judge of the circuit or district court, but can neither be exercised by the circuit nor district court. It would be strange if the judge sitting on the bench should be unable to hear a motion for this writ where it might be openly made and openly discussed, and might yet retire to his chamber, and, in private, receive and decide upon the motion. This is not consistent with the genius of our legislation, nor with the course of our judicial proceedings. It would be much more consonant with both that the power of the judge at his chambers should be suspended during his term, (hence, in this case, the adjournment from the judge at chambers to the court in term,) than that it should be exercised only in secret. Whatever motives might induce the legislature to withhold from the supreme court the power to award the great writ of habeas corpus, there could be none which would induce them to withhold it from every court in the United States, and as it is granted to all in the same sentence and by the same words, the sound construction would seem to be, that the first sentence vests this power in all the courts of the United States; but as those courts are not always in session, the second sentence vests it in every justice or judge of the United States. The doubt which has been raised on this subject may be further explained by examining the character of the various writs of habeas corpus, and selecting those to which this general grant of power must be restricted if taken in the limited sense of being merely used to enable the court to exercise its jurisdiction in causes which it is enabled to decide finally. * * * "

After a masterly analysis of various forms of the writ, he proceeds:

Fourth and last, common writ, ad faciendum et recipiendum "which issues out of any of the courts of Westminister hall, when a person is sued in some inferior jurisdiction, and is desirous to remove the action into the superior court, commanding the inferior judges to produce the body of the defendant, together with the day and cause of his caption and detainer (whence the writ is frequently denominated a habeas corpus cum causa) to do and receive whatever the king's courts shall consider in that behalf. This writ is grantable of common right, without any motion in court, and it instantly supersedes all proceedings in the court below." Can a solemn grant of power to a court to award a writ be considered as applicable to a case in which that writ, if issuable at all, issues by law, without the leave of the court? It would not be difficult to demonstrate that the writ of habeas corpus cum causa cannot be the particular writ contemplated by the legislature in the section under consideration; but it will be sufficient to observe generally that the same act prescribes a different mode for bringing into the courts of the United States suits brought in a state court, against a person having a right to claim the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. He may, on his first appearance, file his petition, and authenticate the fact, upon which the cause is, ipso facto, removed into the courts of the United States. The only power, then, which on this limited construction would be granted by the section under consideration, would be that of issuing writs of habeas corpus ad testificandum. The section itself proves that this was not the intention of the legislature. It concludes with the following proviso: "That writs of habeas corpus shall in no case extend to prisoners in gaol unless where they are in custody under or by color of authority of the United States, or are committed for trial before some court of the same, or are necessary to be brought into court to testify."

This proviso extends to the whole section. It limits the powers previously granted to the courts, because it specifies a case in which it is particularly applicable to the use of the power by courts—where the person is necessary to be brought into court to testify. That construction cannot be a fair one which would make the legislature except from the operation of a proviso, limiting the express grant of a power, the whole power intended to be granted. From this review of the extent of the power of awarding writs of habeas corpus, if the section be construed in its restricted sense, from a comparison of the nature of the writ which the courts of the United States would, on that view of the subject, be enabled to issue, from a comparison of the power so granted with the other parts of the section, it is apparent that this limited sense of the term cannot be that which was contemplated by the legislature. But the 33d section throws much light upon this question; it contains these words: "And upon all arrests in criminal cases, bail shall be admitted, except where the punishment may be death, in which case it shall not be admitted but by the supreme or a circuit court, or by a justice of the supreme court, or a judge of a district court, who shall exercise their discretion therein regarding the nature and circumstances of the offence, and of the evidence, and of the usages of law." The appropriate process of bringing up a prisoner, not committed by the court itself, to be bailed, is by the writ now applied for. Of consequence, a court possessing the power to bail prisoners not committed by itself, may award a writ of habeas corpus for the exercise of that power. The clause under consideration obviously proceeds on the supposition that this power was previously given, and is explanatory of the 14th section. If by the sound construction of the act of congress the power to award writs of habeas corpus in order to examine into the cause of commitment, is given to this court, it remains to inquire whether this be a case in which the writ ought to be granted. The only objection is, that the commitment has been made by a court having power to commit and to bail. Against this objection, the argument from the bar has been so conclusive that nothing can be added to it. If, then, this were res integra, the court would decide in favor of this motion. But the question is considered as long since decided. The Case of Hamilton, is expressly in point in all its parts; and although the question of jurisdiction was not made at the bar, the case was several days under advisement, and this question could not have escaped the attention of the court. From that decision the court would not lightly depart. U. S. v. Hamilton, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 17. If the act of congress gives this court the power to award a writ of habeas corpus in the present case, it remains to inquire whether that act be compatible with the constitution. (Here the distinction is drawn between courts of appellate and of original jurisdiction.) In the mandamus case, Marbury v. Madison [1 Cranch (5 U. S.) 137], it was decided that this court would not exercise original jurisdiction except so far as that jurisdiction was given by the constitution. But so far as that case has been distinguished between original and appellate jurisdiction, that which the court is now asked to exercise, is clearly appellate. It is the revision of a decision of an inferior court, by which a citizen has been committed to gaol. It has been demonstrated at the bar that the question brought forward on a habeas corpus, is always distinct from that which is involved in the cause itself. The question whether the individual shall be imprisoned is always distinct from the question whether he shall be convicted or acquitted of the charge on which he is to be tried; and, therefore, these questions are separated, and may be decided in different courts. The decision that the individual shall be imprisoned, must always precede the application for a writ of habeas corpus, and this writ must always be for the purpose of revising that decision, and therefore appellate in its nature. But this point also is decided in Hamilton's Case, and in Burford's Case [supra]. If at any time the public safety should require the suspension of the powers vested by this act in the courts of the United States, it is for the legislature to say so. That question depends on political considerations, on which the legislature is to decide. Until the legislative will be expressed, this court can only see its duty, and obey the laws.

Hence the supreme court took jurisdiction of the cause, because the commitment had been made by a United States circuit court, and therefore fell within the appellate or revisory power of the former. It is by not attending carefully to the distinction between appellate and original jurisdiction, that the error is often made, of supposing this decision confines United States district and circuit courts and United States judges, to cases of technical commitments. That this decision, properly understood, goes as far as claimed in favor of issuing the writ where the restraint is under or by color of the United States authority, appears by the following extract from the opinion of the United States supreme court, in the Case of Watkins, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 201, pronounced by Justice Story: "No law of the United States prescribes the cases in which this great writ shall be issued, nor the power of the court over the party brought up by it. The term is issued in the constitution as one which was well understood, and the judicial act authorizes this court and all the courts of the United States, and the judges thereof, to issue the writ for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of commitment. This general reference to a power which we are required to exercise, without any precise definition of that power, imposes on us the necessity of making some inquiries into its use according to that law, which is, in a considerable degree, incorporated into our own. The writ of habeas corpus is a high prerogative writ known to the common law, the great object of which is the liberation of those who may be imprisoned without sufficient cause. It is in the nature of a writ of error, to examine the legality of the commitment. The English judges, being originally under the influence of the crown, neglected to issue this writ where the government entertained suspicions which could not be sustained by evidence; and the writ when issued was sometimes disregarded or evaded, and great individual oppression was suffered in consequence of delays in bringing prisoners to trial. To remedy this evil, the celebrated habeas corpus act of Car. II. was enacted for the purpose of securing the benefits for which the writ was given. This statute may be referred to as describing the cases in which relief is, in England, afforded to a person detained in custody. It enforces the common law. This statute excepts from those who are entitled to its benefit persons committed for felony or treason, plainly expressed in the warrant, as well as persons convicted or in execution." Ex parte Watkins, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 201.

Yet the 33d section of that act provides as follows: "Upon all arrests in criminal cases, bail shall be admitted, except where the punishment may be death; in which cases it shall not be admitted but by the supreme or a circuit court, or by a justice of the supreme court, or a judge of a district court who shall," &c. By virtue of that provision the supreme court, in the Case of Hamilton, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 17, even admitted to bail the petitioner who had been, by a district judge, committed to jail for treason; the highest offence known to the law, and punishable with death. It would appear, therefore, that the privileges of this writ and the powers of the United States courts under it, are greater than were those of English courts and judges under the "habeas corpus act" (31 Car. II.)—as great, in fact, as the British judges and Lord Mansfield contended they were, during the parliamentary struggle already mentioned. It would seem clear that the framers of the act of 1789 had that struggle and its results in mind, and that such was the opinion of Judge Story and of the United States supreme court; for the habeas corpus act is pronounced by that court a mere enforcement of the common law, leaving the privileges of the writ not to depend upon that British statute, but upon rights far above and beyond its provisions. The views of that court seem to be, that in the exercise of original jurisdiction, within the purview of federal authority, the circuit and district courts, as well as judges of the United States, may issue the writ and hear the cause, in all cases where, by common law, it could have been issued in England. In every case that has been before the United States supreme court, where allusion has been made to the subject, that extent of power has been taken for granted, as if beyond all dispute—as if it were a point too well and incontrovertibly settled to be even called in question. Without quoting from all the authorities in favor of that view, from Hamilton's Case, decided in 1795, down to the latest allusion in Howard's Reports, it may suffice to give the remarks of Justice Nelson in Ex parte Kaine, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 146, views from which, so far as this question is concerned, no one of the judges dissented. Justice Nelson thought the supreme court ought to take jurisdiction of the special case then under consideration, contending that a court subject to the revisory power of the former tribunal had given a decision which, in its appellate character, that tribunal could review. Nowhere was the power of United States courts of original jurisdiction doubted. "That case (Hamilton's Case), as understood and expounded in the Case of Bollman, in 1807, which received the most deliberate consideration of the court, and to which the doctrine of Hamilton's Case was applied, held that this great writ was within the cognizance of the court under the fourteenth section of the judiciary act, in all cases where the prisoner was restrained of his liberty, 'under or by color of the authority of the United States,' and no case has held the contrary since that decision, with the exception of that of Ex parte Metzger, decided in 1847, which I have already stated stands alone, but which distinctly admits the power and jurisdiction of the court in the case before us. (The Case of Metzger, turned solely on the question of appellate power.) This writ has always been justly regarded as the stable bulwark of civil liberty, and undoubtedly in the hands of a firm and independent judiciary, no person, be he citizen or alien, can be subjected to illegal restraint or be deprived of his liberty, except according to the law of the land. So essential to the security of the personal rights of the citizen was the uninterrupted operation and effect of this writ regarded by the founders of the republic, that even congress cannot suspend it, except when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it. I cannot, therefore, consent to cripple or limit the authority conferred upon this court by the constitution and laws to issue it, by technical and narrow construction; but on the contrary, prefer to follow the free and enlarged interpretation always given when dealing with it by the courts of England, from which country it has been derived. They expound the exercise of the power benignly and liberally in favor of the deliverance of the subject from all unlawful imprisonment; and when restrained of his liberty, he may appeal to the highest common law court in the kingdom to inquire into the cause of it. So liberally do the courts of England deal with this writ, and so unrestricted is its operation in favor of the security of the personal rights of the subject, that the decision of one court or magistrate upon the return of it, requiring the discharge of the prisoner, is no bar to the issuing of a second, or third, or more, by any other court or magistrate having jurisdiction of the case, and it may remand or discharge according to its judgment, upon the same matters. 13 Mees. & W. 679; 9 Adol. & E. 731; 1 East, 314; 14 East, 91; 2 Salk. 503; 5 Mees. & W. 47. Upon the whole, I am satisfied that the prisoner is in confinement under the treaty and act of congress without any lawful authority. I am of opinion, therefore, that the writ of habeas corpus should issue in the case, to bring up the prisoner."

No question was made as to the power and efficiency of the writ, or as to the jurisdiction of any court not restricted by the constitution to the exercise of appellate power. The only point of difference, it will be observed, was on the appellate question.

Some of the cases cited by counsel have been overruled, and some do not touch the subject under investigation. The case in Paine's Reports [Wilson v. Izard, Case No. 17,810] and the case in 3 Pet. 201, have already been noticed. In no case known and accessible to this court, has it ever been held that United States courts of original jurisdiction cannot issue the writ where a person is held in illegal restraint under or by color of the authority of the United States, whether there has been a technical "commitment" or not. The opinion of Judge Betts, cited by counsel in Barry v. Mercien, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 103, was undoubtedly correct. The legal proposition involved in his decision has long perplexed both federal and state courts. The various branches of that subject have, of late years, undergone elaborate discussion, viz.: Is there in either the federal government or in any state government a power, parens patriae, similar to that existing in England, either to make appointments to charitable uses in certain cases, or to control the custody of children, &c.—and if so in what department of government is the power lodged and to what extent? A very different subject from that now here. The decisions on this jurisdictional question already referred to, though sufficient of themselves, are by no means the most pointed. The case of U. S. v. Green [Case No. 15,256], is passed without especial comment, because the views of Judge Story, then expressed on the principal point considered, were overruled in 3 How. [44 U. S.] 103, although the decision of that eminent jurist on most of the subjects before him, at that time, are still unquestioned law. Ex parte Smith [Case No. 12,968], involved an inquiry into an executive warrant under color of the authority of the United States, and the jurisdiction was upheld by Judge Pope. The doctrines laid down in that case are not wholly inapplicable to the subject before this court; but as more direct decisions are to be found, it is unnecessary to pause for an analysis of that opinion. In Ex parte Jenkins [Id. 7,259]; Ex parte Robinson [Id. 11,935]; U. S. v. Morris [Id. 15,811], and Thomas v. Crossin [5 Clarke [Pa.] 328],—the United States judges or courts not only issued the writ of habeas corpus where there were commitments by state process, but where it did not appear on the face of the warrant that the process was under any color of authority of the United States. That course was held by the learned judges who issued the writs, to be not only permissible under the act of 1833, but to be an imperative duty. They even went behind the terms of those warrants or "commitments," and after proofs, aliunde, decided that as the commitments were illegal and for acts done under the authority of the United States, it was their duty to discharge the prisoners. True, the supreme court of Pennsylvania questioned the jurisdiction of the United States courts in such cases. But as that point is not involved here, it is not necessary to go into any inquiry concerning the scope of the acts of 1833 and 1789 under such circumstances. Suffice it to say, that in each instance where the federal courts have been compelled to act under the law of 1833, so far as is known, they have not failed to exercise and enforce their authority in cases similar to those just mentioned. Judge McLean and Judge Grier, of the supreme court, have given elaborate, convincing and sound decisions upon that subject: the correctness of which Judges Leavitt, Kane, and Miller, of the district courts, have not hesitated to put into practical application, despite local excitement, prejudices and resistance. In the case of U. S. v. Williamson [Case No. 16,725], Judge Kane, of the United States district court for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, issued this writ where the cause of detainer was not alleged to be under or by color of any process whatsoever, or of the authority of the United States. The petitioner's slaves were seized by respondent, or by a mob at his instigation, as was charged, whilst they were passing through Philadelphia; and were so seized without any process, commitment or color of authority. The respondent of his own motion and by his mere arbitrary act, interfered with and detained from their master, his slaves whilst in transit, and as was contended, in violation of petitioner's rights under the constitution and laws of the United States. That pure and able judge did not hesitate about what his official duty demanded. The writ was issued. The respondent made an evasive if not false return, and was imprisoned for contempt. Subsequently he applied to Chief Justice Lewis, of Pennsylvania, for a writ to procure his discharge; one ground of the application being Judge Kane's want of jurisdiction. Chief Justice Lewis refused the writ. At the following term of the supreme court of that state, a similar application was made, fully argued and considered, but that court also refused to grant him any relief. Although the main point before the supreme court of Pennsylvania was as to the conclusiveness of the judgment for contempt, yet it is evident from the opinions given, and the dissenting views of Judge Knox, that the jurisdictional question was also duly weighed and settled. A brief extract from the opinion of the supreme court of that state by Black, J., will give its general views: "It is argued that the court (United States district court) had no jurisdiction because it was not averred that the slaves were fugitives, but merely that they owed service by the laws of Virginia. Conceding for the argument's sake that this was the only ground on which the court could have interfered—conceding, also, that it is not substantially alleged in the petition of Mr. Wheeler—the proceeding was, nevertheless, not void for that reason. The federal tribunals, though courts of limited jurisdiction, are not inferior courts. Their judgments, until reversed by the proper appellate court, are valid and conclusive upon the parties, though the jurisdiction be not alleged in the pleadings nor on any part of the record. [M'Cormick v. Sullivant] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 192. Even if this were not settled and clear law, it would still be certain that the fact on which jurisdiction depends need not be stated in the process. The want of such a statement in the body of the habeas corpus, or in the petition on which it was awarded, did not give Mr. Williamson a right to treat it with contempt. If it did, then the courts of the United States must set out the ground of their jurisdiction, in every subpoena for a witness, and a defective or untrue averment will authorize a witness to be as contumacious as he sees fit." Again: "I say the writ was legal, because the act of congress gives to the courts of the United States the power to 'issue writs of habeas corpus when necessary for the exercise of their jurisdiction, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law.' A part of the jurisdiction of the district court consists in restoring fugitive slaves; and the habeas corpus may be used in aid of it when necessary." 26 Pa. St. 21.

Without stopping to inquire into the correctness of the reasoning used, or indorsing it in all its length and breadth, the opinion indicates how far jurists think the United States courts can go in upholding federal jurisdiction over this great writ. In the act of 1850 [9 Stat. 462] there is no express provision on the subject, and it is well known that one of the principal objections taken to that statute was in consequence of that omission. If either party could come before a court on that writ, then the questions sought to be reached by the objectors might be brought before the courts in some cases, at the place of capture. Hence that statute furnishes no explanation of the course of Judge Kane, nor was his action based upon its provisions. As will be seen hereafter, he placed his jurisdiction on other grounds. The separate opinion of Judge Lowrie, and the points of dissent by Judge Knox (the latter to be found in Williamson's Case [26 Pa. St. 9]), show that the question of Judge Kane's jurisdiction in issuing the writ was fully before the supreme court of Pennsylvania. Judge Knox took this ground: "That where a person is imprisoned by an order of the judge of the district court of the United States for refusing to answer a writ of habeas corpus, he is entitled to be discharged from such imprisonment if the judge of the district court had no authority to issue the writ." Still he was not discharged. It is true, the court put the case mainly on another question—one sufficient to prevent his discharge—yet the jurisdictional proposition was discussed, and by the chief justice upheld in favor of the United States district court, in that very case. In his opinion, the chief justice expressed the following views: "The habeas corpus is a common law writ, and has been used in England from time immemorial, just as it is now. The statute of 31 Car. II. c. 2, made no alteration in the practice of the courts in granting these writs. 3 Barn. & Ald. 420; 2 Chit. 207. It merely provided that the judges in vacation should have the power which the courts had previously exercised in term time (1 Chit. Gen. Prac. 686) and inflicted penalties upon those who should defeat its operation. The common law upon this subject was brought to America by the colonists, and most, if not all, of the states have since enacted laws resembling the English statute of Charles II. in every principal feature. The constitution of the United States declares that "the privilege of a writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." Congress has conferred upon the federal judges the power to issue such writs according to the principles and rules regulating them in other courts. Seeing that the same general principles of common law on this subject prevail in England and America, and seeing also the similarity of the statutory regulation in both countries, the decisions of the English judges, as well as of the American courts, both state and federal, are entitled to our fullest respect, as settling and defining our powers and duties. * * * * * * * The district court of the United States is as independent of us, as we are of it—as independent as the supreme court of the United States is of either. What the law and constitution have forbidden us to do directly on writ of error, we, of course, cannot do indirectly by habeas corpus. But the petitioner's counsel have put his case on the ground that the whole proceeding against him in the district court was coram non judice, null and void. It is certainly true that a void judgment may be regarded as no judgment at all, and every judgment is void which clearly appears on its own face to have been pronounced by a court having no jurisdiction or authority on the subject matter. For instance, if a federal court should convict and sentence a citizen for libel, or if a state court, having no jurisdiction except in civil pleas, should try an indictment for a crime, and convict the party, in these cases the judgments would be wholly void. If the petitioner can bring himself within this principle, then there is no judgment against him; he is wrongfully imprisoned, and we must order him to be brought out and discharged."

This case is by no means relied upon as conclusive, or as settling the question now under consideration. It is referred to mainly for the purpose of indicating the thoroughness with which the subject has been debated, and as introductory to the masterly reasoning of Judge Kane himself, when the whole doctrine again came before him for judicial review. That reasoning and his construction of the act of 1789 seem wholly incorrect, to the extent already stated in this opinion. As to the correctness of its application in the Wheeler Case, it is not necessary to determine here. It is sufficient if there is jurisdiction where the petitioner is under restraint "by color of the authority of the United States," as is averred in McDonald's petition. The views expressed by the United States district court for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, per Kane, J. (U. S. v. Williamson [supra]), are full and conclusive, so far as our present inquiry is concerned; and it is well to give them somewhat at length:

"The writ of habeas corpus is of immemorial antiquity; it is deduced by the standard writers on the English law from the great charter of King John. It is unquestionable, however, that it is substantially of much earlier date; and it may be referred, without improbability, to the period of the Roman invasion. Like the trial by jury, it entered into the institutions of Rome before the Christian era, if not as early as the times of the republic. Through the long series of political struggles which gave form to the British constitution, it was claimed as the birthright of every Englishman, and our ancestors brought it with them as such to this country. At the common law it issued whenever a citizen was denied the exercise of his personal liberty, or was deprived of his rightful control over any member of his household, his wife, his child, his ward, or his servant. It issued from the courts of the sovereign, and, in his name, at the instance of any one who invoked it, either for himself or another. It commanded, almost in the words of the Roman edict, 'de libero homine exhibendo,' that the party under detention should be produced before the court, there to await its decree. It left no discretion with the party to whom it was addressed. He was not to constitute himself the judge of his own rights or of his own conduct, but to bring in the body, and to declare the cause wherefore he had detained it; and the judge was then to determine whether that cause was sufficient in law or not. Such in America, as well as England, was the well-known, universally recognized writ of habeas corpus. When the federal convention was engaged in framing a constitution for the United States, a proposition was submitted to it by one of the members that 'the privileges and benefits of the writ of habeas corpus shall be enjoyed in this government in the most expeditious and ample manner; and shall not be suspended by the legislature except upon the most urgent and pressing occasions.' The committee to whom it was referred for consideration, would seem to have regarded the privilege in question as too definitely implied in the idea of free government to need formal assertion or confirmation; for they struck out that part of the proposed article, in which it was affirmed, and retained only so much as excluded the question of its suspension from the ordinary range of congressional legislation. The convention itself must have concurred in their views, for in the constitution, as digested and finally ratified, and as it stands now, there is neither enactment nor recognition of the privilege of this writ, except as it is implied in the provision that it shall not be suspended. It stands then under the constitution of the United States as it was under the common law of English America, an indefeasible privilege, above the sphere of ordinary legislation. I do not think it necessary to argue from the words of this article that the congress was denied the power of limiting or restricting or qualifying the right, which it was thus forbidden to suspend. I do not, indeed, see that there can be a restriction or limitation of a privilege which may not be essentially a suspension of it, to some extent at least, or under some circumstances, or in reference to some of the parties who might otherwise have enjoyed it. And it has appeared to me, that if congress had undertaken to deny altogether the exercise of this writ by the federal court, or to limit its exercise to the few and rare cases that might peradventure find their way to some one particular court, or to declare that the writ should only issue to this or that class of cases, to the exclusion of others in which it might have issued at the common law, it would be difficult to escape the conclusion that the ancient and venerated privilege of the writ of habeas corpus had not been in some degree suspended, if not annulled. But there has been no legislation or attempted legislation by congress that would call for an expansion of this train of reasoning.

"There was one other writ, which in the more recent contests between the people and the king, had contributed signally to the maintenance of popular right. It was the writ of scire facias which had been employed to vindicate the rights of property, by vacating the monopolies of the crown. Like the writ of habeas corpus, it founded itself on the concessions of Magna Charta; and the two were the proper and natural complements of each other. The first congress so regarded them. The protection of the citizen against arbitrary exaction and unlawful restraint, as it is the essential object of all rightful government, would present itself, as the first great duty of the courts of justice that were about to be constituted. And if, in defining their jurisdiction, it was thought proper to signalize two writs out of the many known to the English law, as within the unqualified competency of the new tribunals, it would seem natural that those two should be selected which boasted their origin from the charter of English liberties, and had been consecrated for ages in the affectionate memories of the people as their safeguard against oppression. This consideration has interpreted for me the terms of the statute, which define my jurisdiction on this subject. Very soon after I had been advanced to the bench I was called upon to issue the writ of habeas corpus, at the instance of a negro, who had been arrested as a fugitive from labor. It was upon the force of the argument, to which I now advert, that I then awarded the process; and from that day to this, often as it has been invoked and awarded in similar cases that have been before me, my authority to award it has never been questioned. The language of the act of congress reflects the history of the constitutional provision. * * * I am aware that it has sometimes been contended or assumed without, as it seems to me, a just regard to the grammatical construction of these words, that in the construction of these words the concluding limitation applies to all the process of the court, the two writs specially named among the rest; and that the federal courts can only issue the writ of habeas corpus, when it has become necessary to the exercise of an otherwise delegated jurisdiction; in other words, that it is subsidiary to some original or pending suit. It is obvious, that if such had been the intention of the law-makers, it was unnecessary to name the writ of habeas corpus at all; for the simpler phrase, 'all writs necessary, &c.,' would in that case have covered their meaning. But there are objections to this reading more important than any that found themselves on grammatical rules. The words that immediately follow in the section, give the power of issuing the writ to every judge for the purpose of inquiring into the causes of a commitment. Now, a commitment pre-supposes judicial action, and this action it is the object of the writ to review. Can it be, that a single judge, sitting as such, can re-examine the causes of a detainer, which has resulted from judicial action, and is therefore prima facie a lawful one; and yet that the court, of which he is a member, cannot inquire into the cause of a detainer, made without judicial sanction, and therefore prima facie unlawful? Besides, if this were the meaning of the act, it might be difficult to find the case to which it should apply. I speak of the writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, the great writ of personal liberty referred to in the constitution; not that modification of it which applies specially to the case of a commitment, nor the less important forms of habeas corpus ad respondendum, ad faciendum, &c., which are foreign to the question. I do not remember to have met a case, either in practice or in the books, where the writ ad subjiciendum could have performed any pertinent office in a pending suit. There may be such, but they do not occur to me; and I incline very strongly to the opinion, that if the power to issue the writ of habeas corpus applies only to cases of statutory jurisdiction, outrages upon the rights of a citizen can never invoke its exercise by a federal court. If such were indeed the law of the United States, I do not see how I could escape the conclusion, that the jealousy of local interests and prejudice, which led to the constitution of federal courts, regarded only disputes about property; and that the liberty of a citizen, when beyond the state of his domicil, was not deemed worthy of equal protection. From an absurdity so gross as this, I relieve myself by repeating the words of Chief Justice Marshall in Ex parte Watkins, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 201: 'No law of the United States prescribes the cases in which this great writ shall be issued, nor the power of the court over the party brought up on it.' Whether, then, I look to the constitution and its history, or to the words or the policy of the act of congress, I believe that it was meant to require of the courts of the United States, that they should dispense the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus to all parties lawfully asserting them, as other courts of similar functions and dignity had immemorially dispensed them at the common law. The congress of 1789 made no definition of the writ, or of its conditions or effects. They left it as the constitution left it, and as it required them to leave it, the birthright of every man within the borders of the States; like the right to air, and water, and motion, and thought; rights imprescriptible and above all legislative discretion or caprice. And so it ought to be. There is no writ so important for good, and so little liable to be abused. At the worst, in the hands of a corrupt and ignorant judge it may release some one from restraint who should justly have remained bound. But it deprives no one of freedom, and divests no right."

The following year (1856) the same subject was considered in the United States circuit court for California, and the opinion given by Judge McAllister. The petition for the writ set out, that the petitioner (Des Rochers) was an alien, that the supreme court of the state consisted of three judges:

that two were essential for the transaction of business; that the petitioner had an important suit pending which his interest demanded should be speedily heard, but that it could not be heard because one of those judges (Heydenfelt) was absent from the state, and because another, the "Hon. David S. Terry is unlawfully restrained of his liberty against his consent, * * * and held by them in unlawful custody, and is not confined in any jail, nor by color of authority of any state, or of any magistrate thereof," &c.; and closed with the usual prayer for the writ, &c. Here it was not even averred that the prisoner was held "under or by color of authority of the United States," nor that there was any technical commitment. It negatived the idea, however, that he was restrained by any state authority. The writ was granted, on the following grounds: "It is an immediate remedy for every illegal imprisonment." 1 Watts, 67. In a word, whenever a person has been deprived of going when, and where he pleases, and restrained of his liberty, he has a right to inquire if that restraint be legal, whether it be by a jailor, constable, or private individual. 2 Ashm. 247, cited in 4 Bac. Abr. 571. * * * This great writ existed for all remedial purposes, not only anterior to the enactment of the habeas corpus act in England, but prior to the time of Magna Charta. In the reign of second Charles, the habeas corpus act was passed, to repel the aggressions of the crown and its minions. Those aggressions clothed themselves in the form of legal proceedings in the name of the crown, and hence the terms of the act were limited to persons confined on criminal process. But the habeas corpus, brought by our ancestors as their birthright, to this country, was the common-law habeas corpus; that great embodiment of a free principle, which, born with the sturdy Roman, preserved by the free Saxon, was so cherished by our immediate sires that they engrafted into our organic law the declaration, "that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, &c. * * * The proposition, then, is established, both by federal and state authority, that in determining upon the nature and character of the habeas corpus mentioned in the constitution and judiciary act of the United States, regard is to be had, not to the limits prescribed by the British statutes, but to the more liberal principles in this particular of the common law by which it is regulated. By those principles it was issued in England to relieve any person from illegal restraint. Its operation in this country should not be less beneficent. It remains to consider to what extent the act of congress, giving to the federal judiciary the power to issue this great writ, has limited and controlled the cases to which at common law it confessedly applies. In doing so, we must bear in mind that we are fixing a construction which is to decide whether the federal courts are to extend to or withhold from persons a great constitutional right, in many cases to which the common law applies. No law, say the supreme court of the United States, prescribes the cases in which this great writ shall be issued, nor the power of the court over the party when brought up by it. The term used in the constitution is one well understood, and the judiciary act authorizes all the courts of the United States and the judges thereof, to issue the writ for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of commitment. While it is evident that the proviso to the fourteenth section limits equally the powers of the courts and judges (admitted to do so by the court in the Williamson Case), it by no means follows that equalizing and restricting their powers as to persons in jail, has denuded them of all power, where they have jurisdiction of the parties, to relieve from illegal restraint, save in cases where the suffering parties are in jail under the authority of the United States. The proviso simply inhibits them from sending the writ to any persons in legal custody in jail, unless there under the authority of the United States. The alien or citizen of another state who is restrained of his liberty by lawless men, who is under no legal restraint, has a right to appeal to the laws of the country for relief. If in jail, or legal custody, not under color of authority of the United States, he is remitted to those laws which placed him there. This is, in my opinion, the true construction of the proviso, in which I am confirmed by the action of Judge Story, and by the opinions of the district judge of the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, and the supreme court of that state. It was in exercise of this jurisdiction that Judge Kane issued the writ in the Williamson Case. * * * These views are as sound law as they are eloquently expressed. In the case at bar, the applicant is an alien resident in this place, is not only interested in the matter to the extent that man concedes to sympathy with the oppressed, but is pecuniarily interested to a large amount. He is not in jail, nor in any custody known to the law, but held in restraint against his will, and in direct violation of those laws. Case of Des Rochers [Case No. 3,824]."

This bases the petitioner's right apparently on the ground that he is an alien, interested in the liberty of the prisoner, and that the latter is held under unlawful restraint without any state authority. Nothing at all is said of a commitment. It is well known that he was held by the mere arbitrary will of a mob organized under the name of a vigilance committee, and without any process, warrant, or any other legal authority. It was not considered necessary to the jurisdiction of that court, that there should have been a technical commitment, nor was it so held in the Williamson Case, nor has it been in any other case where a United States judge acts, or a United States court of original jurisdiction, so far as is known to this court.

Enough has been said, it is hoped, to demonstrate that the question of jurisdiction does not depend, in the slightest degree, upon the fact whether there has been a formal commitment or not, or whether the prisoner is in jail; but the sole inquiry is—whether he is held in unlawful restraint of his liberty "under or by color of the authority of the United States." The petition in this case so avers in express terms, and also negatives by apt words that he is held by any state authority or under any legal process whatever. The case, therefore, comes fully within what is deemed the true rule, and all correct adjudications. Whether the rule was correctly applied by Judge Kane or Judge McAllister, it is not important to discuss; but it is certain, they held it to extend much farther than there is any occasion for, to give this court unquestioned jurisdiction in the case now before it.

Fourth. To remove all shadow of doubt, only one step further need be taken—that is, to determine whether the state courts, (as contended by counsel,) have either exclusive or concurrent jurisdiction. The United States supreme court has settled that point also. It solemnly decided in 1858, that the state courts have no jurisdiction whatsoever where the confinement is under the authority of the United States. The opinion is too clear and important to be omitted. It was pronounced by Chief Justice Taney. The importance of the questions discussed by him, and the force of his reasoning furnish ample justification, for the length of the extract made: "There can be no such thing as judicial authority, unless it is conferred by a government or sovereignty; and if the judges and courts of Wisconsin possess the jurisdiction they claim, they must derive it either from the United States or the state. It certainly has not been conferred on them by the United States, and it is equally clear it was not in the power of the state to confer it, even if it had attempted to do so; for no state can authorize one of its judges or courts to exercise judicial power, by habeas corpus or otherwise, within the jurisdiction of another and independent government. And, although the state of Wisconsin is sovereign within its territorial limits to a certain extent, yet that sovereignty is limited and restricted by the constitution of the United States. And the powers of the general government of the state, although both exist and are exercised within the same territorial limits, are yet separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other, within their respective spheres. And the sphere of action appropriated to the United States, is as far beyond the reach of the judicial process issued by a state judge or a state court, as if the line of division was traced by landmarks and monuments visible to the eye. * * * The constitution was not formed merely to guard the states against danger from foreign nations, but mainly to secure union and harmony at home, for, if this object could be attained, there would be but little danger from abroad; and, to accomplish this purpose, it was felt by the statesmen who framed the constitution, and by the people who adopted it, that it was necessary that many of the rights of sovereignty which the state then possessed, should be ceded to the general government; and that, in the sphere of action assigned to it, it should be supreme and strong enough to execute its own laws by its own tribunals, without interruption from a state or state authorities. And it was evident that everything short of this would be inadequate to the main objects for which the government was established; and that local interests, local passions or prejudices, incited and fostered by individuals for sinister purposes, would lead to acts of aggression and injustice by one state upon the rights of another, which would ultimately terminate in violence and force, unless there was a common arbiter between them, armed with power enough to protect and guard the rights of all, by appropriate laws, to be carried into execution peacefully by its judicial tribunals. * * * We do not question the authority of a state court or judge, who is authorized by the laws of the state to issue the writ of habeas corpus, to issue it in any case where the party is imprisoned within its territorial limits, provided it does not appear, when the application is made, that the person imprisoned is in custody under the authority of the United States. The court or judge has a right to inquire, in this mode of proceeding, for what cause and by what authority the prisoner is confined within the territorial limits of the state sovereignty, and it is the duty of the marshal, or other person having the custody of the prisoner, to make known to the judge or court, by a proper return, the authority by which he holds him in custody. This right to inquire by process of habeas corpus, and the duty of the officer to make a return, grows necessarily out of the complex character of our government, and the existence of two distinct and separate sovereignties within the same territorial space, each of them restricted in its powers, and each within its sphere of action prescribed by the constitution of the United States, independent of the other. But after the return is made, and the state judge or court judicially apprized that the party is in custody under the authority of the United States, they can proceed no further. They then know that the person is within the dominion and jurisdiction of another government, and that neither the writ of habeas corpus nor any other process issued under the state authority can pass over the line of division between the two sovereignties. He is then within the dominion and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. If he has committed an offence against their laws, their tribunals alone can punish him; if he is wrongfully imprisoned, their tribunals can release him and afford him redress. And although, as we have said, it is the duty of the marshal, or other person holding him, to make known, by a proper return, the authority under which he detains him, it is at the same time imperatively his duty to obey the process of the United States to hold the prisoner in custody under it, and to refuse obedience to the mandate or process of any other government, and consequently it is his duty not to take the prisoner, nor suffer him to be taken, before a state judge or court upon a habeas corpus issued under state authority. No state judge or court, after they are judicially informed that the party is imprisoned under the authority of the United States, has any right to interfere with him, or to require him to be brought before them. And if the authority of a state, in the form of judicial process or otherwise, should attempt to control the marshal, or other authorized officer or agent of the United States, in any respect, in the custody of his prisoner, it would be his duty to resist it, and to call to his aid any force that might be necessary to maintain the authority of law against illegal interference. No judicial process, whatever form it may assume, can have any lawful authority outside of the limits of the jurisdiction of the court and judge by whom it is issued; and an attempt to enforce it beyond these boundaries is nothing less than lawless violence. Nor is there anything in this supremacy of the general government, or the jurisdiction of its judicial tribunals, to awaken the jealousy or offend the natural and just pride of state sovereignty. Neither this government nor the powers of which we are speaking were forced upon the states. The constitution of the United States, with all the powers conferred by it on the general government, and surrendered by the states, was the voluntary act of the people of the several states, deliberately done, for their own protection and safety against injustice from one another, and their anxiety to preserve it in full force in all its powers, and to guard against resistance to, or evasion of its authority, on the part of a state, is provided by the clause which requires that the members of the state legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers of the several states, as well as those of the general government, shall be bound, by oath or affirmation, to support this constitution. This is the last and closing clause of the constitution, and inserted when the whole frame of government, with the powers herein-before specified, had been adopted by the convention, and it was in that form, and with these powers, that the constitution was submitted to the people of the several states for their consideration and decision. Now, it certainly can be no humiliation to the citizen of a republic to yield a ready obedience to the laws as administered by the constituted authorities. On the contrary, it is among his first and highest duties as a citizen, because free government cannot exist without it; nor can it be inconsistent with the dignity of a sovereign state to observe faithfully, and in the spirit of sincerity and truth, the compact into which it voluntarily entered when it became a state of this Union. On the contrary, the highest honor of sovereignty is untarnished faith; and certainly no faith could be more deliberately and solemnly pledged than that which every state has plighted to the other states, to support the constitution as it is, in all its provisions, until they shall be altered in the manner which the constitution itself prescribes. In the emphatic language of the pledge required, it is to support this constitution. Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 515."

As then the states have no authority in the cases named, it follows inevitably that, if the United States courts cannot proceed, the liberties of the people are hopelessly at the mercy of all lawlessness and violence, whether exerted by the arbitrary will of one man or many, whenever the oppressor acts under color of the authority of the United States—a condition worse than ever known in England since the days of Magna Charta, and wholly incompatible with the idea of civil or constitutional liberty. So far, however, is it from being true, that such is the deplorable condition of any American citizen, the reverse is the fact. Every one who is illegally restrained of his liberty, under color of United States authority, has the fullest redress in the United States courts. Not only has he a constitutional right to apply for deliverance from illegal restraint, but it is the duty of the court to exhaust all its power to enforce his application.

In whatever light the question is viewed, the conclusion seems, to this court, to be irresistible; and therefore, without a shadow of doubt, it pronounces its jurisdiction in this case to be clear, positive, and ample.

Case No. 8,752.

In re McDONALD.

[1 Lowell, 100.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. July, 1866.

ARMY—ENLISTMENT—MINORS—HABEAS CORPUS—AUTHORITY OF SECRETARY OF WAR—STATEMENT OF AGE NOT SWORN TO—CONSENT OF FATHER.

1. The power given to the secretary of war to discharge minors unlawfully enlisted in the army, does not take away the jurisdiction of the federal courts to inquire on habeas corpus into the validity of the contract, and to discharge a minor who is improperly held in the service.

2. Whether congress could constitutionally vest exclusive jurisdiction in the secretary, quaere?

3. Whether the oath of enlistment is conclusive evidence of age as against the parent petitioning for habeas corpus, or is only intended for the protection of the mustering officer, quaere?

4. Where the statement of age on the enlistment paper was not sworn to, held, it was not an oath of enlistment within the statute of 1862 [12 Stat. 339].

5. Whether a minor under sixteen years old can be lawfully enlisted, even with the consent of his father; and whether one between eighteen and twenty-one years old can be lawfully enlisted without such consent, quaere?

6. Where the minor was less than eighteen at the time of his enlistment, and at the date of the writ, and his father had not consented, and no oath of enlistment was taken, he was ordered to be discharged on his father's returning the advance which the recruit had received.

Habeas corpus to Colonel Wildrick, commanding officer of Fort Independence, in Boston harbor, to test the validity of the enlistment of James McDonald, in the army of the United States. By the return to the writ and the other evidence, it appeared that the boy was enlisted in May, 1866, being then seventeen years and six months old, without the consent of the petitioner, his father. Upon the back of the enlistment paper was a declaration, signed by the boy, declaring his age to be eighteen; there was no jurat, nor was any evidence given that this declaration had been sworn to. The petition was filed about two months and a half after the enlistment, and was the only act or declaration of the petitioner expressing his dissent.

G. W. Searle, for petitioner.

W. A. Field, Asst. Dist. Atty., for respondent.

1. Congress has a constitutional power to enlist minors without the consent of their parents. U. S. v. Bainbridge [Case No. 14,497]; Com. v. Gamble, 11 Serg. & R. 93; Lanahan v. Birge, 30 Conn. 438. 2. The several statutes, construed together, authorize the enlistment of young men eighteen years old or more, without the consent of their parents, and between sixteen and eighteen with consent. (Counsel here cited the acts.) 3. The oath of enlistment conclusively proves that this soldier was eighteen years old. See St. Feb. 13, 1862, § 2 (12 Stat. 339). If not, the father's consent may be inferred from his knowledge and inaction. 4 The only remedy for one who is under the lawful age is by applying to the secretary of war. St. Feb. 24, 1864, § 20 (13 Stat. 10); St. July 4, 1864, § 5 (13 Stat. 380); Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 523; In re Jordan, 2 Am. Law Reg. [N. S.] 749; In re Spangler [11 Mich. 298].

LOWELL, District Judge. A careful examination of the acts of congress regulating enlistments in the army is requisite to the determination of this case; and the more so, because comparatively few decisions are to be found in the books, each case being usually heard in a summary way, before a single judge, whose action is final. The act of March 16, 1802, § 11 (2 Stat. 135), which is the foundation of the whole system, authorizes the enlistment of able-bodied citizens, between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five years; and provides that no one under the age of twenty-one years shall be enlisted or held in the service without the consent of his parent, guardian, or master. During the War of 1812, congress found it necessary to recruit men between eighteen and fifty years old, and to dispense with the consent of parents. St. Dec. 10, 1814 (3 Stat. 146). They took pains to guard against hasty or ill-advised enlistments of minors; for, by section 2, such recruits were to be at liberty to reconsider and withdraw their enlistments at any time within four days after they were made.

On the third of March, 1815 (3 Stat. 224), after the conclusion of peace had become known to congress, an act fixing the military peace establishment of the United States was passed, which repealed that of 1814, for it enacted (section 7) that the several corps should be recruited in the same manner, and with the same limitations, &c., as were authorized by the act of 1802, and one of those limitations was, that only persons between eighteen and thirty-five years old should be enlisted; and another was, that no minor should be either enlisted or held without the consent of his parent. In 1838 a law was passed which repealed so much of the act of 1802 as established a standard of height for enlisted men. St. July 5, 1838, § 30 (5 Stat. 260). The next statute is that of September 28, 1850, § 5 (9 Stat. 507), which makes it the duty of the secretary of war to order the discharge of any soldier who was under twenty-one years at the time of his enlistment, upon evidence that such enlistment was without the consent of his parent or guardian.

Before examining the several acts passed during and since the Rebellion, we may properly review the state of the law up to 1862. It seems clear that the legislation of 1815 adopted or re-enacted the law of 1802, and that congress so understood the case in 1838 and 1850. And yet most respectable authority may be cited to the point, that the consent of parents was unnecessary. 5 Op. Attys. Gen. 313; 6 Op. Attys. Gen. 607; Phelan's Case, 9 Abb. Prac. 286. These opinions, notwithstanding their origin, are of little weight, because the learned attorneys and judges who pronounced them overlooked entirely the act of 1815. They did not construe that statute as not repealing the one of the former year, but merely failed to cite it, and assumed that there was no legislation after December, 1814.

Against this may be put the plain language of the statute of 1815, the practice of the war department, and a great many decisions of the courts, among which are the following: In re Dobbs, 21 How. Prac. 68; U. S. v. Wright [Case No. 16,777]; In re Keeler [Case No. 7,637]; 10 Op. Attys. Gen. 146; In re Kimball, 9 Law Rep. 500; Bamfield v. Abbot [Case No. 832]. Shaw, C. J., in Kimball's Case [supra], after showing that the presumption was that congress would not undertake to enlist minors without the consent of their parents, says: "In December, 1814, during the darkest period of the last war with England, it being necessary to fill the ranks of the army, an act was passed repealing a previous statute which required the consent of parents and guardians; and providing, with great care, that minors might be enlisted without such consent. This law was repealed in March, 1815, having been in force only about four months." See, besides, Opinion of Jackson, J., 1 Car. Law Repos., 47; Com. v. Downes, 24 Pick. 227; Re Higgins, 16 Wis. 351; State v. Dimick, 12 N. H. 194; State v. Brearly, 2 South. [5 N. J. Law] 555; In re Dew, 25 Law Rep. 538.

It is plain, then, that up to 1862 no minor, whose father was living, could be enlisted in the army without the father's consent. Act Feb. 13, 1862, § 2 (12 Stat. 339), is in these words: "That the fifth section of the act of twenty-eight September, eighteen hundred and fifty, providing for the discharge from service of minors enlisted without the consent of their parents or guardians be, and the same hereby is, repealed: provided, that no person under the age of eighteen shall be mustered into the United States service, and the oath of enlistment taken by the recruit shall be conclusive as to his age." It would seem probable that congress overlooked the act of 1802, which forbade the enlisting or holding of minors without consent, for they do not repeal it in terms. And the act of 1862 is so explicit in repealing merely the fifth section of the law of 1850 that it seems very difficult to construe it as an implied repeal of the principal act regulating enlistments. And this was the view of the war department; for by the army regulations of 1863 (Appendix B, § 16, p. 511) officers are instructed that the act of 1862 prohibits the discharge of minors, but does not authorize their enlistment without the consent of their parents, masters, or guardians. I have seen no later regulations, but it is said that the practice has since been changed, and that minors are now enlisted between the ages of sixteen and eighteen years with the consent of their parents, and above eighteen without consent. This practice is said to be founded on the three latest statutes: St. Feb. 24, 1864, § 20 (13 Stat. 10); July 4, 1864, § 5 (13 Stat. 380); and March 3, 1865, §§ 17, etc. (13 Stat. 489, 490). The first of these authorizes, and the second requires, the secretary of war to discharge all persons who at the time of the application are under the age of eighteen years, upon due proof that they are in the service, without the assent, express or implied, of their parents or guardians; and the third punishes with great severity officers who shall enlist or muster persons under sixteen years old in any case, or those between sixteen and eighteen, without the consent of their parents.

This review of the statutes shows us these inconsistencies: the law of 1802 authorizes enlistments of persons between eighteen and thirty-five, with consent, &c., if under twenty-one. This law has not been expressly repealed. The act of 1862 prohibits the mustering in of any one under eighteen, but gives no remedy for a breach, and makes the oath of enlistment conclusive; the laws of 1864 require the secretary to discharge all persons under eighteen who have been enlisted without consent, notwithstanding the oath; the law of 1865 punishes the enlistment of a minor between sixteen and eighteen unless with consent. So that while there is not upon the statute book any law authorizing the enlistment of persons under eighteen in any case, nor between eighteen and twenty-one without consent, yet the laws of 1864 and 1865 imply that between sixteen and eighteen they may be enlisted with consent, and above eighteen without it, because it is only when the consent is wanting that the secretary is to discharge or the officer to be punished in the first case, and there is no discharge or punishment in the second. I must say that it appears to me a very doubtful question whether a lawful enlistment can be made of any one under eighteen years old, or of any minor without the consent of his father, and I do not undertake to pass upon these questions at this time. I need not decide them, because this recruit was less than eighteen years old, and was enlisted without his father's consent. I say he was less than eighteen years old, because assuming that the oath of enlistment would be conclusive upon the courts, when applied to by the father, which I very much doubt, as well as a conclusive protection to the mustering officer, yet in this case no oath was taken, and therefore the statute cannot apply. See U. S. v. Wright [supra]. The enlistment, therefore, was illegal upon any construction of the statutes.

It is argued for the respondent that the courts have no jurisdiction of this question, because congress has established a sufficient tribunal in the secretary of war, who must be presumed to have exclusive authority. I can see no good reason to suppose that this was the intention of congress. It has always been the right and duty of the war department to discharge persons illegally enlisted. In one of the earliest reported cases of this sort, the point was taken that the application should have been made in that quarter; but the learned judge of the Western district of Tennessee said that congress not only had not undertaken to interfere with the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, but that they could not lawfully do so excepting under the circumstances pointed out by the constitution. U. S. v. Anderson [Case No. 14,449]. And a like remark was made in Keeler's Case [supra]; and there seems to be force in the suggestion. The act of 1850 expressly imposed this duty on the secretary, and all the adjudged cases which arose between that time and the date of the president's proclamation, suspending the privilege of the writ during the war of the Rebellion, are authorities against the respondent's contention. If a statute creates a new right and provides a remedy, the procedure pointed out by the statute must be followed; but the rule is otherwise where a new remedy is given for an old right, unless the intent that it should be exclusive is clear. So far is that from being the case here, that the acts, as I have said, are merely declaratory of what the secretary might and ought to do by virtue of his office, unless expressly prohibited by congress. While the privilege of the writ was suspended, as it was when these acts were passed, this was the only remedy, and it still is often the most convenient; but it would be contrary to all precedent to oust the jurisdiction of the courts, in a matter involving the liberty of the citizen, by a mere implication, from the fact that the legislature has given the appropriate executive departments power to act in the premises, and this during a war when there was, for the time, no other remedy. In most of the dealings of the citizen with the government, it is the province of some department to see that justice is done him; but if it should be denied, or if any dispute arises, the courts must finally determine the matter. Here the relator had his choice of remedies. He might have applied to the secretary, who would have had the power and the will to do him justice; but if he finds it more convenient, he has a right to his writ.

I may here confess to a serious doubt whether, upon the true theory and practice of our mixed government, the state courts ought ever to have taken jurisdiction of these cases. Upon this point, Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 506, and other authorities, cited in argument, are instructive. But the practice is now so well established that only the supreme court of the United States can change it.

I must discharge the prisoner; but, following the rule which the statute of 1864 lays down for the secretary of war, and treating the remedies as truly concurrent, I shall order that the father do first return to the United States the clothing supplied by them to the son, which, as I am informed, is all that has been advanced in this instance. Order accordingly.

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 24, 1876.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY — ASSENT TO DISCHARGE OF MAKER OF NOTE — RELEASE OF SURETY — BANKRUPTCY — INTERVENTION BY CREDITORS — CLAIM STRICKEN OUT.

If the holder of a note assents to the discharge of the maker, without the consent of the indorser, this releases the indorser. Creditors will not be allowed to intervene, after the return day, to prosecute specifications filed by a creditor whose claim was stricken out after the filing of such specifications.

[Cited in brief in First Nat. Bank v. Wood, 53 Vt. 493.]

Exceptions to the report of Register Shafer.

KETCHUM, District Judge. J. Sharp McDonald made his note to the order of David A. McDonald, who indorsed it for the accommodation of the maker, and the maker delivered it for value to David Hendrie. J. Sharp McDonald failed to pay the note, and it was regularly protested, and notice given to the indorser, David A. McDonald. J. Sharp McDonald went into bankruptcy, but was not able to pay the required percentum for a discharge. He procured the written consent of the statutory number and value of his creditors, and was discharged. Among those who signed the consent were Hendrie, the holder, and David A. McDonald, the indorser; but without any agreement or consent by the indorser that Hendrie should sign the consent. Hendrie signed the consent before McDonald. David A. McDonald, the indorser, then went into bankruptcy. Hendrie proved the balance of the claim against his estate, and objected to his discharge. David A. McDonald petitions this court to expunge the claim of Hendrie from the list of provable debts.

The register rejects the claim of Hendrie, on the ground that he released the indorser by consenting and contributing to the discharge of J. Sharp McDonald, the maker of the note. Hendrie, the holder, excepts to the report, and, in support of the exception, cites section 5118 of the bankrupt law [Rev. St.] which declares that "no discharge shall release, discharge, or affect any person liable for the same debt, for or with the bankrupt, either as partner, joint contractor, indorser, surety, or otherwise." And he also urges that, because the indorser consented also to the discharge of the maker, he is estopped from setting this up against his liability as indorser.

I think this section of the bankrupt law, only applies to the discharge in bankruptcy merely, and cannot be held to refer to and have in view any act of the parties affecting a release of liabilities at common law or in equity, and therefore does not affect this question. Again, while David A. McDonald's consent contributed to the discharge of J. Sharp McDonald, it did not in any way affect his own liability as indorser to Hendrie, the holder, unless it increased it by leaving him without recourse to the maker. He was under no contract with Hendrie by which he was restrained in law or equity from consenting to J. Sharp McDonald's discharge. But Hendrie, by a well-known principle of law, restraining the holder of the note from doing anything to change the position of the maker, by consenting and contributing to the maker's discharge, ipso facto, released David A. McDonald, the indorser, from all liability on the note. The fact that the claim against the indorser was merged in a judgment regularly obtained makes no difference. The relation of the parties remains the same.

It is objected that the bankrupt, David A. McDonald, is not competent to move to strike off the proof of the debt. He clearly does it in the interest of the creditors, and, in good faith, is bound to see that no debt is paid which is not entitled to payment. He is therefore competent.

The exceptions are overruled and the report of the register confirmed.

PER CURIAM. In re D. A. McDonald, after the decision in the above case, petitions of creditors were filed asking to be allowed to intervene, long after the return day of the rule to show cause why the bankrupt should not be discharged, and to try the specifications of objections filed by D. Hendrie, whose claim to be a creditor was rejected. These petitions, after argument, were dismissed by Judge Ketchum.

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY—COSTS — DISMISSAL FOR WANT OF JURISDICTION—COSTS ON APPEAL.

1. The district court, on dismissing a libel for want of jurisdiction, has no power to award costs against the libellant.

[Cited in The Hendrick Hudson, Case No. 6,355; Wenberg v. Cargo of Mineral Phosphate, 15 Fed. 288; Cooper v. New Haven Steamboat Co., 18 Fed. 588; Pentlarge v. Kirby, 20 Fed. 898.]

2. Where the district court dismissed a libel for want of jurisdiction, and awarded costs against the libellant and this court on an appeal by the libellant from the whole decree, affirmed so much of it as dismissed the libel and reversed so much of it as awarded costs, no costs of this court were allowed to either party.

[Followed in Pentlarge v. Kirby, 20 Fed. 901.]

This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court, by Newell Chamberlain and others against the steamboat McDonald. That court dismissed the libel for want of jurisdiction, and awarded costs to the claimant. [Case No. 11,238.] The libellant appealed to this court from the whole decree. This court affirmed so much of the decree of the district court as dismissed the libel for want of jurisdiction [Id. 11,239], and the question now arose as to what decree should be made by this court in regard to costs, the libellant claiming that he should not be charged with costs either in this court or in the district court, and the claimant maintaining his right to recover costs in both courts.

James N. Platt and Gerard & Buckley, for libellant.

Erastus C. Benedict and Burr & Benedict, for claimant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. It was erroneous in the court below to allow costs on the dismissal of the libel for want of jurisdiction. In such a case, by the settled practice of the supreme court, no costs are allowed. So much of the decree below as awarded costs to the claimant must, therefore, be reversed. As the libellant had a right to come to this court to reverse that part of the decree below which awarded costs against him, I shall not allow costs against him on the appeal, although a part of the decree appealed from is affirmed; and, because he claimed to reverse the whole decree, I shall not allow any costs to him on the appeal.

Benj. F. Butler, for complainant.
Jabez S. Holmes, for defendants.

LOWELL, District Judge. After an interlocutory decree had been entered for the complainant, Judge Shepley entertained a petition for a rehearing, so far as to permit the respondents to file a supplemental answer, setting up a patent which had come to their knowledge after the former hearing, and which they considered important, not only on the state of the art, but as rendering the complainant's patent void. The decree was not set aside, but the fact of the patent, and whatever evidence was necessary in connection with it, were permitted to be introduced into the case.

The hearing now has been on the question of vacating the decree, and rendering one for the respondents. The plaintiff's patent, granted September 29th, 1874, No. 155,534, is for a skirt protector, as a new article of manufacture, bound with or composed of enameled cloth, or other waterproof material.

A skirt protector, in this sense, means a strip of the described material made and sold by itself, and intended to be sewed to the rear part, and on the inside of a skirt which would otherwise touch the ground, and, by extending a little below the edge of the skirt, to protect it from dirt and wet. The patent says, that protectors of "wigan," which is a different material and not so useful as enameled cloth or a waterproof material, were old. Two months after the grant, the patentee disclaimed skirt facings as old.

The patent now introduced was granted to Thomas B. De Forest, January 15th, 1867, for a binding for skirts, presenting an India rubber or similar flexible edge, which is intended to protect the skirt. This binding, like the facing, is a part of the skirt, and while it undoubtedly acts to protect the remainder of the skirt, is specifically different in its operation and its advantages from a separate piece of cloth intended to be attached to a skirt, and, if an old facing did not destroy the patent, I do not see why an old binding should have that effect.

Again, in the original case, the plaintiff testified that she made her invention in 1861 or 1862, and she gave reasons for not applying for a patent until 1873. There was, on the part of the defendants, evidence which, if believed, proved that the plaintiff was not the first inventor, if her application was the true date of her discovery. The defendants argued that the plaintiff was mistaken or untrustworthy in carrying back her invention, and the complainant argued that the witnesses who spoke of the prior use were not to be believed. Unfortunately, Judge Shepley, while holding that the plaintiff was the original inventor, does not say whether he arrives at this conclusion by believing the plaintiff as to the date of her invention, or by disbelieving the witnesses against her who testified to the protectors which they had seen as early as 1864. One or the other he must have done.

The patent, now produced, cannot be disbelieved, and therefore, on this point, I am obliged to decide whether the plaintiff has proved what she undertakes to prove concerning the date of her invention. It is an embarrassing question. Very few persons were likely to know of the plaintiff's alleged protectors, made in 1861–2 because they were used only by herself, and there is no pretence of any public use or sale. It is probably impossible, at this time, to support, or to contradict, the plaintiff's own statement by direct testimony. There is, however, nothing in it which is improbable, and no contradictions or circumstances are proved to bring it into doubt, excepting the time which was permitted to pass before the patent was applied for, and that delay is plausibly explained. I think it more probable that Judge Shepley, in deciding for the plaintiff, considered her evidence on this point to be true, than that he discredited the considerable body of proof tending to show an anticipation by others.

Mr. Leggett, commissioner of patents, expressed the opinion that the plaintiff's invention was made in 1861 (Macdonald v. Chase, 6 O. G. 359); and I am of the same opinion. The DeForest invention, therefore, was later than that of the plaintiff.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. Since the disclaimer, which was filed before the date of the bill in this case, the claim of the complainant is limited to that only which was described in the specification of her patent—viz., "as a new article of manufacture, a skirt-protector, having a fluted or plated border bound with or composed of enameled cloth or other water-proof material." I see no reason to doubt that she was the first and original inventor of this article, as distinguished from a skirt-facing, which is an entirely different article, and from a skirt-protector, which being made of wigan or similar material, was substantially useless for the purpose, as compared with the complainant's invention.

Decree for injunction and account, as prayed for in the bill.

[NOTE. Upon petition of respondents, a rehearing was granted, and they were permitted to file a supplemental answer. The decree was not set aside, but the fact of the patent and the evidence thereto necessary were permitted to be introduced. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—PROCTOR—SUIT FOR FEES—SETTLEMENT BY PARTIES INTER SE.

1. A suit by a proctor in the admiralty for his costs or fees, is a familiar proceeding in the admiralty tribunals both in this country and in England.

2. Where wages due from a master to the seamen, are seized under a process of garnishment from a local court in the hands of the former, at the very time that a suit for a penalty and wages brought by those seamen against the master, is pending in the United States district court sitting as a court of admiralty, it is the duty of the master not to pay over the money before the expiration of the legal delay for the return of the garnishment, without the knowledge of the proctors in the admiralty suit. A payment under such circumstances will render the master responsible for the costs of the opposing proctor, if the latter has thus been prevented from receiving them from his own clients in the ordinary way.

3. Negotiations for the adjustment of a suit in admiralty should be conducted in the presence of the proctors of the parties, as they have a personal and legal weight and a direct responsibility to the court.

In admiralty.

McCALEB, District Judge. The libel in this case was filed on behalf of a portion of the crew of the ship Cabot, claiming from the captain of said ship the penalty which they allege he had incurred, in consequence of putting them on a short allowance of provisions on the voyage from Dieppe and Bordeaux to the port of New Orleans. The amount claimed is $144. Three of the libelants, Alexander Gent, George Coffin and James Frost, also claim the sum of $198 as wages, which they allege to be due. The claim for the penalty for being subjected to a short allowance of provisions, is based upon the provisions of the act of congress of July 20, 1790, § 9 [1 Stat. 135], being an "Act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service." I have attentively examined the testimony taken before the commissioner and introduced in evidence on the trial of the cause, and can find no just grounds for sustaining the first allegation of the libel. The testimony of McDonald, who was examined before the court, shows that on the voyage from Bordeaux to this port the crew were put on a short allowance of meat: that they did not have for a whole day more than enough for one meal; but that they did not trouble themselves to see to the weighing of the meat, and supposes that if they had tried they could have got more: that for eight or ten days before they arrived at the port of New Orleans, they had no meat, because not being able to get enough they did not trouble themselves to get any. This evidence is entirely disproved by the concurrent testimony of the first and second mate and the steward of the ship. They show that the ship had on board an abundance of provisions, more than sufficient for the passengers and crew: that the crew were put on an allowance of meat, but not on short allowance, each man having been allowed a pound and a half per day, which is the usual allowance. I shall, therefore, dismiss without further comment this part of the case, and shall now proceed to the main question at issue. The wages demanded by the libelants, or so much thereof as were really due, have been paid by the master after the libel was filed, out of court, and out of the presence and without the knowledge of the proctor who brought the action. This suit is now prosecuted by that proctor for the recovery of his costs. It is a proceeding familiar to the admiralty tribunals of this country and in England.

In this case, it appears from the evidence, that the wages due from the master to the libelants, were seized in the hands of the former under a garnishment from one of the associate city courts of this city. Immediately on the institution of the suit in that court against the libelants, they confessed judgment. The master, upon receiving the garnishment, acknowledged himself indebted to the seamen for wages. The service of the garnishment was made on the 7th instant. On the afternoon of the 8th instant the money was paid to the deputy marshal of the city court, in the presence and with the approbation of the defendants in the suit, who are also the libelants in the present action. On the 7th instant the libel in the case was filed, and on the morning of the 8th it was served on the master. It was therefore in his hands at the time he paid the money under the garnishment, and he cannot plead ignorance of the fact that the libel was filed; and with a copy of it in his hands, he was not justified in taking for true the representations of the libelants, that they had not libeled the ship. He was not bound to answer the garnishment until two days after he received it; that he was bound to pay the money, will hardly be doubted. The seizure from the city court had created a lien on the amount of wages in his hands which he was bound to satisfy. It was his duty, however, instead of paying the money at the solicitation of the libelants in such unnecessary haste and under circumstances most suspicious, to have communicated the intelligence of the seizure to their proctor to enable him to take such measures against his clients as would save him against an evident attempt to defraud him out of a compensation for his professional services, and to render him liable for the costs of a proceeding which had been instituted at their request and for their benefit. The conduct of this master does not seem to have been characterized by that candor which was due to the court, to say nothing of the proctor of the libelants. Instead of bringing to the notice of the court the fact of the seizure and the payment of the wages under it, a rule is taken by his proctor on the 11th instant (three days after the payment of the money to the libelants, and after they had embarked for a northern port), for them (the libelants) to show cause, on the 13th instant, why they should not furnish security for costs, or have their libel dismissed. This proceeding can be regarded as little less than a mere mockery, when we remember that it was within the knowledge of the master that the means by which the libelants could alone answer the rule had been paid by himself, under an order of court to satisfy a debt or a pretended debt due by them.

I am clearly of the opinion that the settlement of this suit out of the presence and without the knowledge of the proctors, was entirely irregular. It was the opinion of Lord Stowell, expressed in the case of The Frederick, 1 Hagg. Adm. 220, that negotiations for an adjustment of a suit should be conducted in the presence of the proctors for the parties, as they have a personal and legal weight, and a direct responsibility to the court. This principle has been sanctioned by the highest admiralty tribunal in this country, and its maintenance is regarded as indispensably necessary to prevent those deceptions which are commonly practiced upon ignorant seamen, and which they, in turn, are but too apt to practice upon their proctors and upon the officers of court, with the view of avoiding the payment of costs. It is the duty of the court, and it should be the mutual care of the opposing proctors, to preserve the dignity of the profession, by discountenancing everything which is calculated to subject its members to the chance of becoming the dupes of designing litigants. While I have no hesitation in giving them the aid of the principle of law now invoked, to protect them from injury in all cases where proper caution is observed in the institution of suits, which, in their apprehension, are just and proper, I shall feel as little hesitation in making them suffer the consequences of permitting themselves to become the instruments of promoting frivolous litigation, or gratifying a spirit of malignity and oppression. The proctor in this case has proved that he rendered services to the libelants. His compensation for those services has been defeated by the settlement of the case out of court without his knowledge. He has, however, failed to prove the value of those services, and I am unwilling to assume the province of putting an estimate upon them. Instead of referring the case to a commissioner for the purpose of taking proof upon the subject, and thereby subjecting the parties to additional expense and trouble, I will venture to fix a compensation subject to the approval or disapproval of the respondent. Should he object to the amount upon the ground of its being too large, I will order specific proof to be made. I will fix the amount at $25, exclusive of the tax fee allowed by law. This amount, together with the costs of court, I order to be paid by the respondent.

CONTRIBUTION—ACCOMMODATION PAPER—SURETIES.

The indorsers of accommodation paper are to be considered as joint sureties, and liable to contribution.

Assumpsit by the last indorser against his immediate indorser of S. Turner's note, dated 15th October, 1823, for $150 at 60 days, payable to the defendant [George B. Magruder] at the Bank of the Metropolis, where it was discounted for the accommodation of Turner. The plaintiff [John G. McDonald], being the last indorser, put his initials to these words, at one corner of the note, "Credit the drawer." The note not having been paid by the maker, was taken up by the plaintiff, who brought this suit against the first indorser. The plaintiff and the maker of the note were both clerks in the office of the secretary of the senate. The cause was tried at December term, 1825.

The counsel for the defendant contended that, as no consideration passed between these indorsers, the plaintiff could only recover upon the principle that joint sureties were liable to contribution. That the words "credit the drawer" were evidence that the indorsers were to be considered as joint sureties.

Mr. Wallach, for plaintiff, prayed the court to instruct the jury that these words were not evidence that the plaintiff and defendant had jointly agreed to become indorsers for the accommodation of Turner; which instruction THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent) refused to give, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for only half the amount of the note.

Mr. Wallach moved for a new trial, on the ground that the court erred in the refusal of the instruction.

But THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent) refused the new trial. They thought the memorandum was evidence that the plaintiff never paid the defendant any thing for the note, and therefore the plaintiff could recover nothing from the defendant unless upon the ground that the defendant had agreed to become joint surety with the plaintiff; and that the jury did right in finding a verdict for only half of the amount of the note.

VOID CONVEYANCE—GENERAL ASSIGNMENT—LIEN—LEVY—COSTS.

1. On December 28th, 1875, S., being insolvent, made a general assignment of his property to M., in trust to pay creditors without preference. M. took possession of the property, which consisted of a stock of goods. On January 4th, 1876, the firm of M. T. & Co. recovered a judgment in a state court against S., and issued execution to the sheriff, whose deputy, on that day, went to the store where the stock of goods was, and found it locked so that he could not effect an entrance, but, having obtained a ladder, he got up and looked through an open window into the store and saw that there were goods there, and made a memorandum on the back of the execution that he had levied on the stock and fixtures in the store. On January 7th, the sheriff, having received a bond of indemnity, broke into the store and took possession of the goods. On January 5th a petition in bankruptcy was filed against S., on which he was adjudged a bankrupt on the 17th, and, an assignee in bankruptcy having been appointed, a bill in equity was filed by him against S. and M. and M. T. & Co. and the sheriff, to recover the property or its proceeds. In that suit a receiver was appointed, to whom the sheriff delivered the property and who sold it and held the proceeds subject to the decree of the court. M., in his answer, consented to relinquish his trust on being paid his disbursements and expenses. M. T. & Co. insisted upon their right to have the property applied on their execution: Held, that the assignment by S. to M. was made when S. was insolvent and had the necessary result of preventing the property from coming to any assignee in bankruptcy of S. who should be appointed, and must be held to have been made by S. with that view.

[Cited in Platt v. Preston, Case No. 11,219.]

2. M. had reasonable cause to believe that S. was insolvent and must be held to have known that S. made the assignment with such view. The assignment, therefore, must be set aside.

[Cited in Wehl v. Wald, 3 Fed. 93.]

3. The assignment, being declared void from the time when it was made, could not prevent M. T. & Co. from acquiring rights against the property of S. by the proceedings which they took.

4. The judgment and execution of M. T. & Co. were valid, and the acts of the sheriff under the execution constituted an actual levy on the goods,

[This was an action by Robert Macdonald, assignee in bankruptcy of David Solinger, against William T. Moore and others.]

Dunne & Carr, for plaintiff.

A. Blumensteil, for Mayer.

J. S. Smith, for the sheriff.

J. H. Hull, for Moore, Tingue & Co.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the 28th of December, 1875, David Solinger, being insolvent, made a general assignment, under the laws of the state of New York, of all his property, to the defendant Mayer, in trust to pay his creditors, share and share alike. Mayer accepted the trust, and took possession of the property on the said day, and complied with the statute as to filing a bond and an inventory. The property consisted of a stock of dry goods in a retail store in the city of New York. On the 4th of January, 1876, the defendants Moore, Tingue & Co. recovered a judgment in a state court against Solinger for $1,508.38, and on the same day an execution thereon was issued to the sheriff, who is a defendant in this suit, and placed in his hands. On the 5th of January, 1876, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against Solinger, whereon he was adjudged a bankrupt on the 17th of January. The plaintiff was chosen assignee in bankruptcy, and an assignment was made to him by the register on the 16th of February following. The plaintiff in his bill claims that he has a title to the property which was embraced in the assignment to Mayer, superior to the claims of Mayer and of Moore, Tingue & Co. and of the sheriff; that the assignment to Mayer was made in fraud of the bankruptcy act; and that the property or its proceeds ought to go to the plaintiff, as assignee in bankruptcy, free and clear of the claims of all the defendants.

Mayer, in his answer, expresses his willingness to relinquish his trust, in favor of the plaintiff, on being repaid his disbursements for counsel fees and other expenses in administering his trust, and his commissions thereunder. Moore, Tingue & Co., in their answer, insist upon their right to have the property applied on their execution as against Mayer and the plaintiff. The sheriff, in his answer, insists on his claim to the property under a lien acquired by virtue of a levy thereon under said execution.

The assignment to Mayer must be held to have been invalid as against the rights of the plaintiff under the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], although it was an assignment in trust for creditors without preference. It was made when Solinger was insolvent, and it had the necessary result of preventing the property from coming to any assignee in bankruptcy of Solinger who should be appointed, and of preventing such property from being distributed under the bankruptcy act in any proceedings in bankruptcy instituted against Solinger, and, therefore, it must be held to have been made by Solinger with such view, inasmuch as it was made by his affirmative action and could not have been made without such action. Mayer had reasonable cause to believe Solinger to be insolvent, and must be held to have known that Solinger made the assignment with such view, because he must be held to the knowledge that the making of the assignment would have the necessary result above mentioned. The assignment was made within three months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy against Solinger. The question whether a general assignment in trust for creditors, without preferences, under a state law, is void under the bankruptcy act, is elaborately discussed by Judge Emmons in the recent case of Globe Ins. Co. v. Cleveland Ins. Co. [Case No. 5,486], in the circuit court of the United States for the Northern district of Ohio, and the decision is that it is void. That has always been the law in this circuit.

The assignment to Mayer being set aside, the question arises as to whether the property is subject to a lien under the execution in favor of Moore, Tingue & Co., as against the assignee in bankruptcy. There is nothing to impeach the validity of the judgment and execution. Under the law as settled in the case of Wilson v. City Bank, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 473, Vanderhoof v. City Bank of St. Paul [Case No. 16,842],[3] it is not to be inferred from the mere fact that a debtor remains passive and suffers a judgment to be obtained against him and an execution thereon to be levied on his property, that he has any view therein to thereby give a preference to the creditor obtaining the judgment and issuing the execution and causing the property to be taken thereunder. If there be nothing more than such passive non-resistance by the debtor, there is nothing inhibited by the bankruptcy act, however much the creditor may have intended to secure a preference over other creditors in the case of a debtor known to him to be insolvent, and however successful he may have been in securing such preference.

On the same day on which the execution was delivered to the sheriff, the 4th of January, a deputy of the sheriff went with the execution to the store of Solinger, in which was the property which had been assigned to Mayer, and of which Mayer then had possession, and, finding it shut up and locked, endeavored in vain to effect an entrance into it. He then obtained a ladder, and, by the use of that, looked through an open fan window over the door, into the store, there being no person inside, and saw that there were goods there, and then made a memorandum on the back of the execution, in pencil, in these words: "Jan'y 4th, levied upon stock and fixtures at 328 Bleecker St.," that being the store in question. From the 4th of January to the 7th, some one acting for the sheriff watched the store, on the outside, to see that no goods were removed, and, on the 7th, the sheriff, having received a bond of indemnity from the judgment creditors, broke into the store and took possession of the goods.

It is contended, for the plaintiff, that no lien could be or was obtained by Moore, Tingue & Co., under their execution, because the goods had ceased to be the property of Solinger, and the title to them, subject to be defeated under the bankruptcy act, had passed to Mayer, by a valid assignment, before the execution was issued, and that then the proceedings in bankruptcy intervened, so that the execution never became operative against the goods, and that, when the assignment is set aside, the goods must pass to the plaintiff free from any lien or claim under the execution. This view is not sound. When the assignment is set aside, it becomes void from the time it was made, as against all persons who, after the time it was made, took steps to acquire rights against the property embraced in it, as still the property of Solinger, and who, but for the obtainment of the assignment, would have secured and enjoyed such rights free from any obstruction. Such rights arrange themselves in order according to their priorities in point of time. This principle applies equally to rights under the bankruptcy act and to rights under the state laws. Nor is this principle inconsistent with the other principle, that, if the assignment is valid except as made invalid by some provision of the bankruptcy act, all acts done under it in good faith and without notice that proceedings in bankruptcy have been taken, are to be upheld.

As between Moore, Tingue & Co. and Solinger, the execution of the former bound the goods of the latter from the time the execution was placed in the hands of the sheriff. The assignee in bankruptcy acquired no rights, in that respect, as against Moore, Tingue & Co., which Solinger did not possess. The assignee in bankruptcy does not occupy the position of a bona fide purchaser. But, even if he did, I think what was done by the sheriff's deputy on the 4th of January, in respect of the goods, constituted an actual levy on them. As the rights of the assignee in bankruptcy relate back only to the 5th of January, when the petition in bankruptcy was filed, it follows that the goods were subject to the lien of the execution when that petition was filed, and that such lien has precedence of the claim of the plaintiff.

After this suit was brought, a receiver of the goods in question was appointed in it by this court, and the goods were delivered by the sheriff to the receiver, and the receiver, by order of this court, sold them at public auction. The net proceeds, $3,783.93, are now in this court to the credit of this suit.

The sheriff claims to be paid the sum of $246.66 for poundage, levy fees and keeper's fees. This amount does not seem to be objected to by any of the parties, but, if it is, it may be further inquired into. Otherwise it will be allowed, and the sheriff will be allowed his costs of this suit, to be paid out of the fund.

Mayer was in possession of the goods for ten days. Then the sheriff took them from him. Mayer will be allowed the disbursements he made before the sheriff took the goods, $147.50, and the sum of $300 to cover his own services and those of his counsel. As between Mayer and the plaintiff, no costs of this suit are allowed to either as against the other.

The costs of Moore, Tingue & Co. in this suit will be paid out of the fund, and so will the costs of the plaintiff. The amount of the judgment of Moore, Tingue & Co., with interest, will be paid, and the remainder of the fund, after the above-named payments are made, will be paid to the plaintiff, to be held and administered by him as assignee in bankruptcy.

NOTE. This decision was reversed by the circuit court, on appeal, July 1st, 1878, so far as it directed the payment of the judgment of M. T. & Co. and the costs of the sheriff on the execution, and was affirmed in all other respects.

[5 Biss. 183.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Oct., 1870.

PLEADING—DEMURRER — WRITTEN INSTRUMENT—CHANGE BY ORAL TESTIMONY—UNCERTAINTY —GENERAL ISSUE PLEADED.

1. A plea that the written contract set forth in the declaration is not the contract made by the parties, but is a fraud upon the defendant, is bad on demurrer; it is an attempt to change a written contract by oral testimony, and is also bad for uncertainty.

2. Where the general issue has been pleaded, a demurrer to a special plea cannot be carried back to the declaration. Having tendered an issue of fact, the defendant cannot claim the benefit of a demurrer.

Demurrer by plaintiff [Angus McDonald] to the last plea filed by the defendant [Franklin K. Orvis], and setting up, in substance, that the contract, a written one, declared upon was subsequently changed or another contract entered into between the same parties. It reads, "avers that the said last-mentioned contract, as set forth in the declaration, does not set forth the contract as made between the parties, but that the same was drawn up by the plaintiff and is a fraud upon the rights of the defendant."

Waite & Clarke, for plaintiff.
J. B. Bradwell, for defendant.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This plea amounts to an averment that the written contract, or the modification of the original contract, which is set up in plaintiff's declaration, is not the true contract made between the parties, but that it is a fraud upon the defendant.

I cannot conceive that an averment of that kind would allow the introduction of any testimony such as would sustain the averment on a trial of the cause at law. It is, in substance, an attempt to modify or change a written contract by parol testimony. The preceding plea avers that the contract was different from what is set up in the declaration, and concludes with this proposition to offer parol evidence to show wherein it differs. I think the demurrer to the plea is well taken, not only for this cause, but for the cause of want of certainty in the plea itself in not stating wherein it is different. I do not think there is enough certainty in the plea, even if it did not seek to change a written contract by parol evidence.

But it is answered on the part of the defendant that a bad plea is a good and sufficient answer to a bad declaration, which I understand, of course, to refer to a well-known rule of pleading, that a demurrer, when taken to a plea, may be made to reach back to the declaration or pleading where the first defect originated; and under many circumstances that rule is applied, but in this case the declaration contains two counts—a special count on a special promise, and the common counts. The plea purports to answer the entire declaration, and of course if a general demurrer had been introduced to the whole declaration, the demurrer would have to be overruled, because there is one good count in the declaration, the common counts for goods sold and delivered, money lent, &c.

There is also an exception to the rule contended for by the defendant's counsel, which is well recognized, viz.: that a demurrer cannot be carried back to the declaration if the general issue has been pleaded; because if it should, it would enable a party, after having tendered an issue of fact on the declaration, to raise an issue of law by putting in a bad plea. If a party wishes to demur to the declaration, he must do it before he tenders an issue of fact. The proposition is undoubtedly sound where there is not an issue of fact made, but here, inasmuch as the demurrer is general, if carried back, the declaration, as a whole, would be sustained, because it has one good count, and because the defendant has already made an issue of fact on the declaration.

The demurrer must be sustained.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1858.

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY—DEFAULT OF GARNISHEE—COMPULSORY PROCESS—ANSWER.

1. On default of one summoned as garnishee in admiralty, the libellant is not entitled to execution in personam against him. The thirty-seventh rule of the supreme court provides for compulsory process only to compel the garnishee to answer.

2. After such default, the garnishee is not entitled as of right to put in an answer, except to state facts which have occurred since the default.

3. Such answer may be allowed in the discretion of the court, and in this case was so allowed, on condition that the libellant might take issue upon it, and that the garnishee should stipulate with sureties to pay whatever the court should allow.

In admiralty.

C. G. Thomas, for libellant.
Codman & Johnson, for garnishee.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. This suit, and four others of a similar character, were brought against the captain of a ship, and the owner was summoned as garnishee. The garnishee appeared by counsel, but made no answer, and execution was awarded against him in the usual form, on application of the libellant, with affidavits that the garnishee had admitted that he held funds belonging to the respondent. Thereupon the garnishee came and moved a supersedeas, and that he might be permitted to answer and deny his liability as garnishee. The libellant claims that he is entitled to execution in personam against the garnishee, and that the latter cannot, after his default, be allowed to show a want of funds. A stay of execution was awarded, and a hearing has been had on these questions.

1. The garnishee process is not derived from the custom of London, nor from local legislation, but is a remedy in admiralty, standing on its own grounds. The custom of London and the trustee process are somewhat analogous, and so far as the analogy holds, we may derive some aid from the practice under them.

But we must be governed here by the rules of the supreme court of the United States, which are founded on the legislation of congress and the general admiralty law, and it is only where these fail that aid can be sought in other quarters.

There are two rules of the supreme court which refer to this process, the second and the thirty-seventh; the latter of which is alone applicable to the present case. It provides that the garnishee shall be required to answer as to funds of the defendant in his hands, and also to such interrogatories concerning them as the libellant may propound, "and if he shall refuse or neglect to do so, the court may award compulsory process in personam against him." If he admit funds, he shall hold them liable to answer the exigency of the suit. The libellant contends that under this rule he is entitled to execution in personam against the garnishee. I do not think so. The rule only means that compulsory process will issue to compel the garnishee to answer, not to pay the debt, and therefore he is not subject to execution. The libel itself only claims the effects of the respondent in the garnishee's hands, and the libellant can have no more than he claimed.

2. The garnishee's motion to be allowed to answer, is put forward, first, as a matter of right, and second, as addressed to the discretion of the court.

He claims its allowance of right:

(1.) On the ground that execution cannot issue until an answer has been made; because the thirty-seventh rule of the supreme court allows compulsory process to obtain an answer, and this is useless if the libellant can proceed without an answer. For why allow compulsory process to obtain an answer, if execution may be awarded on default? But a default does not necessarily give all the effect of a disclosure. Execution is not usually awarded without some evidence of a debt due the respondent, and cases may be supposed where no debt could be proved without the evidence of the garnishee himself. The existence of such a rule, therefore, is not enough foundation for the doctrine contended for by the garnishee.

(2.) He claims that on his refusal to pay the execution and a summons to show cause, he may of right put in an answer. But I do not think this can be allowed in admiralty, though perhaps it might in the state courts under sci. fa. against a trustee. He has been once ordered to make answer and has refused. He cannot be allowed a second opportunity to state the very same facts. If any facts had occurred since his default, he might show them; but he cannot put in the very same answer which he might have given before. As matter of right, therefore, the garnishee's motion must fail.

But he also addresses it to the discretion of the court. The libellant put in affidavits that the garnishee admitted funds when the suit was begun, and afterwards admitted specific amounts. The garnishee now presents affidavits that no such admissions were made, and that he only said he was uncertain whether he owed the respondent or not. He also offers affidavits that the libellant's counsel told him that the matter could be adjusted without his going into court, and the libellant offers counter affidavits.

Under these circumstances, I shall allow the answer; but with the condition that the libellant may take issue upon it, and that the garnishee shall put in stipulations with sureties to pay whatever the court shall allow.

MACDONALD v. SAGINAW VAL. & ST. L. R. CO.

[2 Am. Law T. Rep. (N. S.) 29.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Michigan. Nov., 1874.

REFERENCE—REPORTING TESTIMONY—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—RAILROAD CONSTRUCTION CONTRACTS—DAMAGES.

[1. The Michigan referee law (Comp. Laws, c. 186) makes no provision for preserving or reporting the testimony, and the only way in which it can be got before the court is by exceptions to its admissibility, or to the finding of facts, and then having it, or so much of it as may be necessary to show the pertinency of the exceptions, embodied in a bill of exceptions, duly settled and certified by the referee. Therefore, testimony merely filed with the report, without any bill of exceptions, cannot be considered, and the exceptions to the report must be determined solely upon the facts as found therein.]

[2. A railroad construction contract provided that, if the constructor failed for 10 days to increase his force after being notified by the company's engineer to do so, the latter might put on a force of its own, or relet the job, and charge the expense, if any, to the contractor. Held that, in case of such failure, the company's only remedy was to pursue the course thus pointed out; and having in fact put on a force of its own, and been allowed the full expense thereof, it had no right to receive additional damages.]

[This was an action at law by MacDonald against the Saginaw Valley & St. Louis Railroad Company to recover for work and labor done and materials furnished under a contract. Heard on exceptions to the report of a referee.]

The declaration consists of the common counts for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered, work and labor done, and materials furnished, and money due on account stated. The defendant's notice of defence under the general issue sets up that the goods, wares, and merchandise, work and labor, materials and money, constituting plaintiff's claim as set up in his declaration, were sold and delivered, done, furnished, and paid out by the plaintiff in part performance by him of an agreement in writing between the parties for the construction by the plaintiff of defendant's railroad, which contract is fully set out in the notice. The defendant then alleges non-performance on the part of the plaintiff in not completing the work by the time specified in the contract, in abandoning the work while a large portion of it remained undone, and in doing what was done in an unworkmanlike, negligent, and imperfect manner, to defendant's damage a specified amount; which damage, in addition to fifteen per cent. of estimates of work, &c., claimed to be provided for in the contract as stipulated damages, the defendant claims to recoup against plaintiff's claim to the amount thereof, and asks for a judgment for the balance in his favor. The notice also alleges several matters by way of set-off. The issue thus joined was referred by consent to Hon. Sanford M. Green, under chapter 186 of the Compiled Laws of Michigan, and the referee has made and filed his report. No exceptions appear to have been taken before the referee, and there is no bill of exceptions accompanying his report. After the filing of the report, however, exceptions to the conclusions of law stated in the report were filed in behalf of defendant. The exceptions appear in the opinion of the court. The referee's conclusions of law stated in the report as deductions from the facts found by him, which are also stated, are: First, that the plaintiff is entitled to have allowed to him as a just claim against the defendant the several items specified, amounting in the aggregate to $54,486.20, subject, however, and subject only, to deductions for several specified items, amounting in the aggregate to $41,638.72, leaving a balance due the plaintiff at the time of the commencement of the suit of $12,874.28, which last mentioned sum, together with $1,236.59 for interest thereon from December 26, 1872, to May 11, 1874, making in all $14,083.87, the plaintiff is entitled to recover of the defendant as his damages in this action; second, that the defendant is not entitled to recoup for or on account of damages for any non-performance on the part of the plaintiff.

Theo. Romeyn, for exceptions.

O. F. Wisner, contra.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. Several of the exceptions appear to be based upon what is claimed to have been the evidence before the referee, aside from and independently of his findings of facts as stated in his report. There appears in the files in the case a mass of writing, indorsed as filed of the same date as the filing of the report, purporting to be testimony of witnesses in this case. It is not signed by the witnesses, nor is it anywhere referred to or mentioned in the report, or in any manner certified or authenticated by the referee, as the testimony upon which he acted; and of course there is no evidence that it is all the testimony adduced before him. But even if all these had been supplied, the returning and filing of the testimony with the report would have been without authority of law, and have constituted no part of the record or foundation upon which the court could base any opinion or action in deciding exceptions to the report. The referee law makes no provision for preserving or reporting the testimony, and the only means by which it can be got before the court in any case is by exceptions before the referee to its admissibility, or to the finding of facts by the referee, and then having it, or so much of it as may be necessary to show the pertinency of the exceptions, embodied in a bill of exceptions duly settled and certified by the referee, and returned by him with his report. The supreme court of Michigan, in People v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 18 Mich. 483, 489, say: "The referee law makes no provision for preserving the testimony. In case a party insists, before a referee, that there is no evidence tending to maintain a case, undoubtedly he raises a question of law, which will enable him to require a report showing what the testimony was, and this would be done by exception." There being no bill of exceptions returned with the referee's report, the court, in deciding the exceptions in this case, must be confined exclusively to the finding of facts by the referee as stated in his report.

The first, second, and third exceptions are to the referee's conclusions of law, that the defendant was not entitled to recoup for damages. The non-performance complained of in the notice, and on account of which a right to recoup was claimed was: First, in not completing the job by the time agreed on; second, in abandoning the job before completion, leaving large portions of the work undone; third, in doing imperfectly what was done.

The facts found by the referee bearing upon these points are: (1) That defendant being unable to furnish the iron for the track until after the time limited in the contract for the completion of the work, it was mutually understood between the parties that the work was not required to be prosecuted with reference to its being completed within such time, and that no specific time was afterwards agreed on. (2) That "said plaintiffs commenced the work under said written contract by or before the middle of September, 1871, and prosecuted the same from that time until some time in November, 1872, when the officers of said company, in its behalf, directed the plaintiff to quit the work, and he did so." (3) The report is silent as to the quality of the work done. Certainly, under such a state of facts, the referee could come to no other conclusion of law than that arrived at by him, that the defendant was not entitled to damages for the causes named in the notice. The time fixed by the contract for its completion was waived; the work was abandoned by plaintiff by defendant's own direction, without its being made to appear that it was on account of any fault on the part of the plaintiff; and it does not appear that the allegation that the work done was imperfect was sustained. The first, second, and third exceptions are overruled.

The fourth exception is to the referee's "omission and refusal" to allow the defendant any damages for plaintiff's failure to increase his force in July and August, 1872, as he was notified and directed to do by defendant's engineer. The contract itself (which is set out in full in the report) makes provision as to what was to be done in such case. The provision is, in substance, that in case of such failure on the part of plaintiff for ten days after such notice, the defendant might put on a force of its own, or relet the job, and charge the expense or loss, if any, to the plaintiff. Plaintiff had ten days in which to comply with the notice, and, of course, no damages could be claimed for non-compliance during that time; and after that time defendant had it in its power to avoid damages by putting on a force of its own or reletting the job, and charging the plaintiff with the expense or loss occasioned thereby; and I am of opinion that this was all the defendant could claim of the plaintiff for a non-compliance by him in that respect. The report shows that defendant did put on a force of its own, and that the referee has allowed the full amount of the expenses thereof. The fourth exception is therefore not well taken, and the same is overruled.

The fifth exception was abandoned at the hearing.

The sixth exception is to the "omission and refusal" of the referee to allow the defendant the fifteen per cent. specified in the contract as liquidated and settled damages. The contract provides for estimates at stated times, of work done and material furnished, and for the retention by defendant of fifteen per cent. of such estimates until full performance of the contract on the part of the plaintiff; and that in case of plaintiff's failure to perform, the said fifteen per cent. should be retained by defendant as liquidated and settled damages; and it is to these provisions that the sixth exception relates. What has been said in answer to the first, second, and third exceptions is fully applicable and constitutes a complete answer to this. The sixth exception is therefore overruled.

The seventh exception is "to the omission and refusal of the referee to adopt the award and decision and estimates of the engineer of the defendant as final and conclusive between the parties, in the absence of any proof of fraud or mistake on his part." The report is silent as to whether the findings of the referee of the amount allowed the plaintiff were or were not based upon estimates by the engineer, and as to whether any such estimates were or were not in fact before him. There is therefore an entire absence of anything in the report to which this exception can be given any application. The seventh exception is therefore overruled.

The eighth and tenth exceptions are based upon what the testimony before the referee is claimed to prove or disprove. For reasons stated in the commencement of this opinion, these exceptions cannot be considered, and they are therefore overruled.

The ninth and only remaining exception is "to the conclusion of the referee that the claim of the plaintiff was subject only to the deductions specified in the report." This exception is but a restatement in general terms of what had been already specifically stated in preceding exceptions concerning defendant's claim for damages; and it has therefore been disposed of adversely in what has been said as to those exceptions, and the same is overruled.

It results that judgment must be entered on the referee's report. At the hearing on the exceptions, plaintiff's attorneys acknowledged the payment of $2,500, June 13, 1874, and asked that in entering judgment the amount so paid be deducted from the amount reported due. Let judgment be entered overruling the exceptions and confirming the referee's report; and for the recovery by plaintiff of the amount reported, with interest from May 11, 1874, the date of the report, abating therefrom the payment of $2,500, of the date of June 13, 1874, and costs of suit.

PATENTS—DRESS PROTECTOR—ESSENTIAL PART OF INVENTION.

Held, that the "fluted or plaited border" of the complainant's dress protector, for which letters patent No. 155,534 were granted to her September 29th, 1874, is not an essential part of the invention.

LOWELL, Circuit Judge. On this motion for an injunction, the plaintiff's evidence of infringement is somewhat vague; but, on looking at the defendants' affidavits, the exact article sold by them is shown. This article is a skirt protector, within the description of the plaintiff's patent, which was sustained by Shepley, J., Macdonald v. Blackmer [Case No. 8,758], and afterwards held by me not to be anticipated by the De Forest patent [Id. 8,757], unless the "fluted or plaited" border is an essential part of the invention, so that a plain or straight border not gathered into plaits will be without the scope of the patent. This question has caused me much doubt, but, upon looking at the evidence and the arguments in the principal case, on both sides, I do not think that anything turned upon that part of the description. I understand that the fluting or plaiting is merely a part of the finish, proper and, perhaps, necessary, when the skirt to be protected is made of a certain shape, unnecessary when it is of another shape. It seems to me that both parties took for granted, in that case, that a skirt protector, not plaited, would defeat the plaintiff's patent, if proved to have been made before the date of her invention. I certainly so understood it in deciding upon the questions raised by the discovery of the De Forest patent.

The other points presented in the motion have been decided in the case above referred to.

MACDONALD v. SIDENBERG et al.

[4 Ban. & A. 586;[1] 18 O. G. 193.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 25, 1879.

PATENTS—SKIRT PROTECTOR—INFRINGEMENT—FLUTED OR PLAITED BORDER.

A patent for a skirt protector, in which the article is described as having a fluted or plaited border bound with or composed of enamelled cloth or other water-proof material, is infringed by a protector which does not have a fluted or plaited border, but is like the patented article in all other respects. The cases of Macdonald v. Blackmer [Case No. 8,757], and Same v. Shepard [Id. 8,767], cited and followed.

[Cited in Day v. Combination Rubber Co., 2 Fed. 571; Macdonald v. Shepard, 4 Fed. 229.]

[This was a motion by Helen Marie Macdonald for an injunction to restrain Gustavus Sidenberg and others from the intringement of a certain patent.]

Helen M. Macdonald, pro se.

E. N. Dickerson, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. In the original case against Blackmer [Case No. 8,758], Judge Shepley held that the plaintiff was the first and original inventor of a skirt-protector having a fluted or plaited border bound with or composed of enamelled cloth or other water-proof material, as distinguished from a skirt-facing (which he remarked, was an entirely different article), and from a skirt-protector made of wiggin or similar material, which was substantially useless for the purpose, as compared with the plaintiff's invention. In the original Blackmer Case, the Mackee patent [No. 45,840], of January 10th, 1865, was introduced to defeat the plaintiff's patent; also, the Mandell patent [No. 151,039], of May 19th, 1874, application filed November 26th, 1873. The plaintiff's patent [No. 155,534] was granted September 29th, 1874, on an application filed May 10th, 1873. The plaintiff carried the making of her invention back, in the original Blackmer suit, to December, 1861. Various unpatented devices were introduced in that suit to anticipate the plaintiff's invention, but none of them were earlier in date than December, 1861. The defendants in the Blackmer suit were then allowed to set up the De Forest patent [No. 61,172] of January 15th, 1867, to defeat the plaintiff's patent, by a supplemental answer, and further proofs were taken. Judge Lowell heard the case, and held, on the evidence, that the plaintiff's invention was made in 1861; that the De Forest invention was later, and that the plaintiff's patent was valid. In the Blackmer Case [supra], the defendant's article had specifically a fluted or plaited border.

Subsequently, the case of Macdonald v. Shepard [Case No. 8,767], came before Judge Lowell, in which the defendant's article, though like the plaintiff's in other respects, did not have a fluted or plaited border. Judge Lowell said that it was within the description of the plaintiff's patent, unless the fluted or plaited border was an essential part of the plaintiff's invention, so that a plain or straight border, not gathered into plaits, would be without the scope of the patent. He further said: "I understand that the fluting or plaited is merely a part of the finish, proper and, perhaps, necessary, when the skirt to be protected is made of a certain shape, unnecessary when it is of another shape. It seems to me that both parties took for granted, in that case" (the Blackmer Case, before Judge Shepley) "that a skirt-protector, not plaited, would defeat the plaintiff's patent, if proved to have been made before the date of her invention. I certainly so understood it in deciding upon the questions raised by the discovery of the De Forest patent." An injunction was granted.

The defendants' article, in the present case, does not have a fluted or plaited border, but it is like the plaintiff's article in all other respects. I concur with Judge Lowell in not regarding the fluted or plaited border as essential, in view of the state of the art prior to the plaintiff's invention in Decmber, 1861. The affidavits presented by the defendants in the present case, do not show any article, anticipating that date, like the plaintiff's invention, whether with or without a fluted or plaited border. T. D. Day gives no date earlier than 1865. The article of 1858, which J. Morrison speaks of, was only a facing.

[1] [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

His entire affidavit is too vague and general. H. Douglass, as to a skirt-protector of enamelled cloth over a facing, gives, as a date, "as early as 1861." This is not sufficient. R. Hood goes back only to 1865.

An injunction is granted.

EXECUTION—WITHIN WHAT TIME MAY ISSUE.

After the year has elapsed, execution cannot issue here upon a judgment in Maryland, without a scire facias, notwithstanding the 13th section of the act of congress of 27th Feb., 1801 [2 Stat. 107].

[Action by McDonald & Holmes against Jane White.]

Motion by Mr. Peacock to quash a ca. sa.

The judgment was rendered in Montgomery county court in Maryland, in March, 1800. No execution issued in Montgomery. The transcript was brought into this court and the ca. sa. issued 29th September, 1803. By the act of congress of 27th February, 1801, § 13 (2 Stat. 107), upon a transcript of the proceedings and judgment in Maryland filed, execution may issue here and shall be proceeded on in the same manner as if the judgment had been rendered here. But an execution, could not issue upon such a judgment obtained here, without a scire facias.

Execution quashed with costs.

LIBEL—PLEADINGS — RESPONSIBILITY OF NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. In an action for libel against the publishers of a newspaper, it is no justification that the article was copied from another paper, and that it showed this fact on its face.

2. Under the common law system of pleading, this fact may, when available, be used in mitigation of damages under the general issue.

[Cited in Upton v. Hume (Or.) 33 Pac. 813.]

3. One proprietor of a newspaper is responsible for the act of his co-proprietor in publishing a libelous article.

4. Libel defined—respective functions of court and jury in the trial of actions for libel—criticism of official conduct and public officers, extent and limitations upon the right—subsequent libelous articles—measure of damages.

[Cited in Erber v. Dun, 12 Fed. 531, 533.]

[This was an action of libel by McDonald against Woodruff and Blocker.]

W. G. Whipple, for plaintiff.

Garland & Nash, English, Gantt & English, and Watkins & Rose, for defendants.

PER CURIAM. In an action against the defendant as the publisher of a newspaper, for the publication of an article, libelous in its nature, concerning the plaintiff, a plea setting up that the article in question was first published in another designated newspaper, and that it was simply copied into the defendant's paper as an item of news, and that the article as copied showed that it was thus copied or taken from the other newspaper, is demurrable; these facts are available under the common law system of pleading, which prevails in this court, in mitigation of damages under the general issue, but in themselves are not pleadable in bar. Such is the weight of authority, and this view seems to us better supported by reason and principle than the opposite one. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 424, and cases cited; Romayne v. Duane [Case No. 12,028].

The cause was subsequently tried before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and CALDWELL, District Judge, and a jury. The plaintiff was the supervisor of internal revenue for the district embracing Missouri, Arkansas, and the Indian Territory. His official conduct in proceedings against tobacco manufacturers in the Indian country (see U. S. v. Tobacco Factory [Id. 16,528]; The Cherokee Tobacco, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 616) called forth an article stated to have been written by Col. Boudinot, reflecting severely upon the plaintiff. This article, first appearing in another newspaper published in or near the Indian country, was copied by the defendants into the Daily Arkansas Gazette, of which they were the proprietors. The article was of considerable length, but in it were expressions referring to the plaintiff as "a self-convicted liar," "a stupid ass," "he is in the pay of the St. Louis tobacco manufacturers." No plea of justification was filed, and on the trial no evidence was offered to show any fraudulent or corrupt official conduct on the part of the plaintiff. The evidence being in, and the argument concluded, the circuit judge, with the concurrence of the district judge, charged the jury, as follows:

DILLON, Circuit Judge. 1. This is an action of libel. The declaration contains two counts. The one charges the alleged libelous article was published by the defendants of the plaintiff as a private citizen. The other charges that the same libel was published of the plaintiff in his public capacity as supervisor of internal revenue. The defendants plead not guilty. This makes it incumbent on the plaintiff to prove the publication as alleged by the defendants of the article or words alleged to be libelous; the fact that the article or words referred to the plaintiff; his official character, so far as damages are asked, in respect to his official character, and the defendants' alleged malicious intention in the publication of the article or publication complained of as libelous. If the defendants were the proprietors of the newspaper named in the declaration, called the Daily Arkansas Gazette, and if the article containing the words alleged in the declaration was published therein while the defendants were such proprietors, the allegation of the publication is established, and one of the proprietors of a paper is liable for what is done by the others in publishing libelous articles upon individuals.

[2] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

2. If you find the fact of the publication by the defendants proved to your satisfaction by the evidence, you will next consider whether the article published related to the plaintiff, and is libelous in its character. At the present day the law in relation to libel is "that the judge is not bound to state to the jury, as a matter of law, whether the publication complained of, and sued for, is a libel or not; but the proper course is for him to define what is a libel in point of law, and leave it to the jury whether the publication falls within that definition, and as incidental to that, whether it is calculated to injure the reputation of the plaintiff." 2 Greenl. Ev. § 411.

Accordingly, it becomes the duty of the court to define what is, in law, a libel. This we do in the language of the supreme court of the United States: "Every publication in print, which charges upon or imputes to any person that which renders him liable to punishment, or is calculated to make him infamous, odious, or ridiculous, is a libel, and implies malice in the author or publisher. Proof of malice in such publications is not required of the plaintiff; justification, excuse, or extenuation, if either can be shown, must proceed from the defendant." [White v. Nicholls] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 291.

It is your duty to determine whether the publication sued for in this action falls within this definition. The plaintiff selects certain parts of the article, and charges it to be libelous. In determining whether the publication was or was not libelous, as above defined, you are to consider the whole publication—take it by the four corners and consider it in all its parts, in order to determine the meaning and purpose, character and effect of the particular words complained of.

3. Malice is essential to make a publication a libel; but in law, every publication which falls within the definition of libel above given, is, in law, presumptively malicious. Malice has, in law, a meaning not exactly the same in all respects with its common signification. Malice, in its common acceptation, means ill-will against a person; but in its legal sense, means a wrongful act done intentionally, or without just cause or excuse. Malice, in law, is not the same thing as malice in fact. Malice, in law, is implied from wrongful and unjustifiable acts, done on purpose or without just or legal excuse.

4. There is a wide difference between publications relating to public and private individuals. Every person and every newspaper may fairly criticise the action or official conduct of public men or public officers; so far there is no liability; but neither a person nor newspaper can make such comments or criticism a vehicle for malice or the indulgence of private spite; nor impute to public men or officers such conduct as disgraces or dishonors them; or make charges against them which have this effect, unless they are able to justify or prove them to be true, and made in good faith and for good ends.

5. If you find that the publication alleged in the declaration was made by the defendants as therein alleged, and that it was libelous in its character, as a libel is before defined, you will have occasion to consider the question of damages; and in its consideration your attention should be directed to all the circumstances of the case. Malice is essential to the action; but malice, as above explained, is of two kinds—legal or implied malice, and actual malice: that is, personal spite or ill-will. The amount of damages (if the plaintiff, in an action for libel, is entitled to recover) depends, where no special damage is shown (and evidence of no special damage has been produced in this case), upon the degree or intensity of the malice, legal or actual. You can derive no aid in assessing damages from the results of other cases, for it is quite impossible, in the nature of things, that any two actions for libel should be exactly alike.

The circumstances and the distinctive character of the case before you are to be considered. It must be evident to you, that if the defendants are liable at all, the amount of their liability is, or may be, very different from what it would have been if they had written the article instead of having copied it (as it is conceded they did) from another journal. Not that a newspaper, even in the way of news, can copy without liability an article that is libelous in its nature upon an individual or public officer, for this cannot be done. So, if an article, libelous in its character, is copied from another paper, there is a liability therefor, but such liability would be greater if it was published by the defendants from actual ill-will or actual malice toward the plaintiff, than if no such ill-will or actual malice existed. Whether there was any actual malice or ill-will is a question of fact for you to decide from all the evidence and all the circumstances before you. Publishing a copied article, if libelous in its character, is not justifiable, but the fact that it is copied may be considered in mitigation of damages. If you find from all the circumstances that there was no malice on the part of the defendants towards the plaintiff, inducing or actuating the publication complained of, then you can give no damages on account of such malice; but if the publication was made, and is libelous, the law presumes malice, and the action cannot be defeated, and the legal malice thus presumed cannot be rebutted by evidence which negatives the existence of any malice in fact.

The court repeats: The amount of damages depends essentially upon the degree of malice, express or implied, but want of actual malice is no defence to an action for the publication of an article which is, in law, a libel. As the amount of damage depends upon the degree or intensity of the malice, you must consider what were the motives which actuated the defendants, or either of them, in the publication of the article and the circumstances under which the publication was made. To throw light upon this, the plaintiff has introduced certain other articles subsequently published by the defendants in their paper concerning him. You must understand that you can give no damages in this action on account of those subsequent publications. You can only consider them in connection with the inquiry as to the motives with which the publication sued for was made, and to show malice, or the degree thereof existing at the time the original article was published.

With these general rules to guide juries in assessing damages the law leaves the amount to their sound judgment, reasonably, fairly, and dispassionately exercised. This it does from necessity. If one man owes another so many dollars, or has taken from him so much property, or has broken a specific contract, there is something to measure (as the law expresses it) the amount of the damages or the recovery. But in an action of this kind the law is unable to furnish you with any definite rule to measure the damages. It confides it to the sound, temperate, deliberate, and reasonable exercise of your functions as jurymen. The law leaves the jury at liberty to find and return such damages as they think right and just, but this is not a wild, unrestrained, communal liberty, to be arbitrarily exercised, but the higher and better kind of liberty, viz: Liberty restrained by reason and moderated by justice.

The jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff, and assess the damage at one dollar."

As subsequent libels constitute distinct and substantive causes of actions, proof thereof cannot be admitted to affect the damages, but only as bearing on the question of malice: Beardsley v. Bridgman, 17 Iowa, 290, 1864.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April 12, 1873.

EXTRADITION—MANDATE FROM EXECUTIVE—COMMISSIONER—WORDS OF TREATY—WARRANT—HABEAS CORPUS—ADJOURNMENTS.

1. Whether a commissioner has jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for the apprehension of an alleged fugitive from the justice of a foreign government, with a view to his extradition under a treaty for that purpose, until a mandate or authority for his apprehension has been granted by the executive department of the government of the United States, quere.

[Cited in Re Kelley, Case No. 7,655; Re Stupp, Id. 13,563; Castro v. De Uriarte, 16 Fed. 96.]

2. The warrant for the arrest of the alleged fugitive, in this case, held sufficient.

[Cited in Ex parte Lane, 6 Fed. 36.]

3. In describing the offence charged, the warrant may follow the words of the treaty.

[Cited in Castro v. De Uriarte, 16 Fed. 95.]

4. It is not necessary that the complaint on which the warrant is issued should set forth the issuing of a mandate by the executive for the arrest of the fugitive.

5. If such mandate is a necessary prerequisite, it is sufficient for it to describe the offence charged, in the very terms of the treaty. The complaint, in this case, held sufficient.

[Cited in Re Adutt, 55 Fed. 378.]

6. It is not proper to resort to a habeas corpus, to review, during the progress of proceedings before the commissioner, decisions on questions as to evidence, made by the commissioner.

7. In extradition cases, the commissioner may, in his discretion, grant reasonable adjournments, in the course of hearing the evidence, to enable testimony to be produced.

[Cited in Re Wadge, 15 Fed. 866; Re Ludwig, 32 Fed. 774.]

On the 2d of April, 1873, a petition was presented to the Honorable LEWIS B. WOODRUFF, circuit judge, on behalf of George Macdonnell, stating that he had been arrested by the marshal of the United States for the Southern district of New York, and was now illegally held and restrained of his liberty; and that his arrest and detention were under color of a warrant issued by Joseph Gutman, Jr., a commissioner appointed by the circuit court for that district, and of certain proceedings pending before such commissioner, touching a charge against the petitioner, of having committed the crime of forgery within the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The petition alleged the illegality of the proceedings, and of the arrest and detention, upon various grounds, which it is not necessary here to state, and it prayed a writ of habeas corpus to be addressed to the marshal, requiring him to produce the body of the petitioner. Another petition was, at the same time, presented, praying that a writ of certiorari be issued, addressed to the said Joseph Gutman, Jr., commissioner, requiring him to return the proceedings had or taken before him, upon which the said warrant of arrest was issued, and which constituted the cause of the imprisonment, with all the testimony taken before him. Thereupon a writ of habeas corpus was issued to the marshal, and a writ of certiorari was issued to the commissioner. The writs were returnable on the 7th of April, 1873, on which day the marshal produced the prisoner before the circuit judge, at his chambers, and made return to the habeas corpus, that he arrested and held the prisoner by virtue of the warrant annexed to his return, issued by Joseph Gutman, Jr., United States circuit court commissioner, and the commitment to the custody of the said marshal, on the adjournment of the proceedings before the commissioner to the 8th of April, 1873. The substance of the warrant is stated in the opinion of the circuit judge. To the writ of certiorari the commissioner made return, the substance of which, together with the mandate of the president of the United States, upon the requisition of the British minister, the complaint made to the commissioner by the British consul general, the warrant of arrest, the proceedings on such arrest, the adjournments, the examination of witnesses, and the testimony taken, are also stated in the opinion, so far as material. To the return of the marshal the prisoner interposed an answer of a somewhat mixed nature, combining demurrer, plea, and traverse, and subsequently added a further supplemental allegation. The averments of the answer were: (1) "That the warrant and commitment are, and each of them is, insufficient in law to authorize and warrant the restraint and custody of the relator, by him, the said respondent" (the marshal). (2) "That the said warrant and commitment are, and each of them is, not sufficient in law to warrant such detention and custody of the relator, for the following reasons, to wit: First. The magistrate had no jurisdiction to issue the warrant, because no sufficient complaint had been presented to him at the time the warrant was issued. Second. The complaint upon which said warrant was issued does not make out a case against the said relator, giving jurisdiction to the commissioner. Third. The said complaint and warrant contain no description of any specific offence alleged to have been committed by the relator, and embraced within the treaty of extradition between the government of the United States and the government of Great Britain. Fourth. The said complaint, upon which said warrant was issued, does not show that any requisition, previous to the making thereof, had been made, under the authority of the British government, and that the authority of the government of the United States had thereupon been obtained for the apprehension and committal of the relator. Fifth. The commitment referred to in the return aforesaid is based upon an insufficient complaint and warrant, issued without jurisdiction by the said commissioner had for that purpose. Sixth. The said complaint, the said warrant, and the said commitment, are informal, illegal and otherwise, as hereinbefore set forth, not sufficient in law to justify the detention and custody of the said relator by the said respondent." The supplemental allegation was, that "the mandate of the president of the United States, upon the requisition of the British government, does not describe the offence alleged in the complaint herein." The return of the commissioner to the writ of certiorari, with the documents and proceedings thereto annexed, were produced and made a part of the proceedings under the habeas corpus.

Charles W. Brooke, for prisoner.

Charles M. Da Costa and Francis F. Marbury, for the British government.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. In announcing my conclusion upon the application for the discharge of the prisoner, I shall not occupy time in a preliminary history of the proceedings before myself, or before the commissioner, as might be proper if I were preparing a report of the matter, or an entire record, in order to give a complete history of the case. The argument, involving a review of every step in the proceedings, and each document and process, is so recent, that counsel are quite familiar with each, and, to some extent, the statement of the reasons for my conclusions will furnish occasion to recite the substance of whatever is important to make those reasons intelligible.

It is not, in the present case, necessary, that I should express an opinion upon the proposition which is at the foundation of the argument on one branch of the claim made in behalf of the prisoner, namely, that a commissioner has no jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for the apprehension of an alleged fugitive, until authority for that purpose has been granted by the executive department of the government of the United States. See the Treaty with Great Britain, of August 9, 1842 (8 Stat. 576, art. 10); Act Cong. Aug. 12, 1848 (9 Stat. 302). Mr. Justice Nelson, in the case of Ex parte Kaine [Case No. 7,597], affirmed the proposition, and made the absence of such authority at the time of the institution of the proceeding one of the grounds upon which he discharged the prisoner, notwithstanding the president, on the report made to him of the facts found by the commissioner, and the evidence thereof, had so far ratified what had been done as to issue his warrant for the surrender of Kaine to the authorities of the British government. In this decision he conformed to the dissenting or minority opinion expressed by him, with the concurrence of Chief Justice Taney and Mr. Justice Daniel, in Re Kaine, in the supreme court. 14 How. [55 U. S.] 103. That opinion stood opposed to the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Catron, with the concurrence of Justices McLean, Wayne and Grier, to the effect, that the commissioner acts, in receiving a complaint, issuing his warrant for the arrest, and taking and certifying the proofs, by a jurisdiction expressly conferred upon him by law, by the treaty, and by the act of congress; that his power and authority, in these particulars, exist independently of any mandate or command of the president, to be obtained in advance of such proceeding; and that, whatever may be the requirement of the acts of the British parliament on that subject, the congress of the United States did not think it necessary to the dignity of the nation, the protection of the accused, or on any other ground, and, especially, in view of the inconvenience which it involved, and the great facility it afforded for the escape of the fugitive, and for defeating the purposes of the treaty, to require that the aid of the president should be invoked until the preliminary inquiry had been made before a magistrate. They go still further, and insist, that to hold the contrary is to permit an interference by the executive with the judiciary, against the intent, principles and legal effect of our system of government, which make the action of the judiciary, in the discharge of all functions properly judicial, independent of executive interference; while, on the other hand, the act of surrender, after, by a judicial inquiry, the facts are ascertained, is confessedly an exercise of political power, to which the president alone is competent. The supreme court of the United States, at that time, consisted of eight judges. The opinion of four of the judges was not sufficient to result in authoritative adjudication. Mr. Justice Nelson's opinion was sustained, on all points, by Chief Justice Taney and Mr. Justice Daniel; and Mr. Justice Curtis declined expressing an opinion upon the merits, on the ground that the supreme court had no jurisdiction of the matter, as it was then before them. The proposition, therefore, stood, at that time, as the opinion of three judges of the supreme court, on the one hand, and four judges on the other, not authoritatively adjudicated. Mr. Justice Nelson, therefore, when the Matter of Kaine was continued, before him, under the writ which he had originally allowed [Case No. 7,597], felt himself at liberty to be governed by the views he had expressed in the supreme court. The Cases of Veremaitre [Id. 16,915], Kaine [Id. 7,598], and cases referred to therein, and Heilbronn [Id. 6,323], and others, reported and unreported, show, that the district judges in this circuit had acted upon, and concurred in, the views of the four judges of the supreme court, above stated; and the practice before commissioners had conformed thereto, down to the decision made by Judge Nelson.

The two cases of Henrich [Id. 6,369], decided by Judge Shipman, and of Farez [Cases Nos. 4,644, 4,645], decided by Judge Blatchford, are placed distinctly on the authority of Judge Nelson's decision in the Case of Kaine [supra], so that it may properly be said, that this claim on behalf of the prisoner rests on that opinion, supported by the concurrence of Chief Justice Taney and Justice Daniel, and disaffirmed by Justices Catron, McLean, Wayne and Grier, and the opinions and practice of the district judges. I advert to these particulars for the purpose of bringing together, in brief, the history of the subject, and of stating the extent of the authority in this circuit, upon which the proposition urged on behalf of the prisoner rests. What has been the ruling or practice, on this subject, in other circuits of the United States, counsel have not advised me by reference to any cases there decided.

The counsel for the British government insist, that the terms of the treaty (8 Stat. 576, art. 10), and, especially, the act of congress of August 12, 1848 (9 Stat. 302), passed to carry the treaty into effect, operate to confer the jurisdiction, and that, at the instance of the proper officer of the British government, the designated magistrate may, and must, upon complaint made, issue his warrant to arrest the alleged fugitive, according to the terms of the statute, which, confessedly, does not expressly suggest that any prior action of the executive is to be invoked; and they further insist, that, in the conflict of opinion above referred to, they have a right to call on me to act upon my own opinion of the true construction of the treaty and of the act of congress, in the particular thus in contest. It is, of course, not doubted, that, before any surrender can take place, the proceedings before the commissioner, with all the proofs taken, must be submitted to the executive, and that the final question, whether the case made is such as to require the surrender, may be considered by the president, without whose warrant no surrender of the fugitive can lawfully be made. I repeat, however, that it is not necessary for me to decide, in this case, to what extent I am bound by the decision made, or the opinion declared, in Kaine's Case, nor that I should express an opinion upon the question itself, for the reason, not only that the mandate of the president was procured, and delivered to the commissioner, before he acted in this matter at all, but also, because, in my judgment, the objections here made to the actual proceedings had by or before the commissioner, may be considered and decided upon a concession, for all the purposes of this case, that such mandate, or other authorization by the president, was necessary.

I. I proceed, therefore, first, to the enquiry: Is the warrant, in virtue whereof the respondent herein made the arrest, sufficient, on its face, to justify him in arresting and detaining the alleged fugitive? On that question I entertain no doubt. It may be conceded, for the purposes of this question, that the commissioner by whom it was issued acted therein in exercise of a special jurisdiction, of such sort, that, to justify the marshal in making the arrest, every fact necessary to the jurisdiction of the commissioner to issue such a warrant must appear upon its face. The warrant distinctly refers to the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, and the act of congress of 1848, for giving effect to that treaty, as the basis of the proceedings before the commissioner. It recites and certifies, that the commissioner is specially appointed to execute the act of congress referred to. It further recites, that, upon the application of the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Great Britain, duly accredited to the government of the United States, made under the 10th article of the said treaty, for the arrest of George Macdonell, otherwise Macdonnell, charged with the crime of forgery, and with the utterance of forged paper, at the city of London, in that part of the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called England, between the 22d day of January and the 28th day of February, 1873, (referring, also, to the recited complaint, for further particulars of the alleged offence,) a mandate was issued by the department of state, on the 13th day of March, 1873, under the seal of the state department, signed by the secretary of state, and directed to any commissioner specially appointed to execute the aforesaid act of congress. It further recites, that, under the said treaty, complaint has been made before him, (the said commissioner,) that one George Macdonell, otherwise Macdonnell, did, heretofore, between the 22d day of January and the 28th day of February, in the year 1873, at the city of London, in that part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called England, and within the jurisdiction of her said Britannic majesty, together with one Edwin Noyes, now in custody, in the said city of London, and Frederick Albert Warren and George Bidwell (now fugitives from justice,) commit the crime of forgery, and the utterance of forged paper, to wit, did feloniously, in said city, and at the time aforesaid, forge and utter, well knowing the same to be forged, two several acceptances of two several bills of exchange, each for the payment of one thousand pounds sterling, lawful money of Great Britain and Ireland aforesaid, with intent thereby to defraud the governor and company of the Bank of England, a corporation duly created by, and existing under, the laws of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland aforesaid, and did conspire together to commit the said offence, with intent to defraud the said governor and company of the Bank of England; and that the said George Macdonell, otherwise Macdonnell, is now seeking an asylum within the territory of the United States. After these recitals the warrant proceeds to command the marshal to arrest the said George Macdonell, otherwise Macdonnell, and bring him before the commissioner, in order that, pursuant to the directions of the said mandate, the evidence of criminality of the said George Macdonell, otherwise Macdonnell, may be heard and considered, and, if found sufficient to sustain the charge, that the same may be certified, together with all the proceedings, to the secretary of state, that a warrant may issue for the surrender of the said George Macdonell, otherwise Macdonnell, pursuant to the said treaty. The warrant is under the hand and seal of the commissioner, who, with his signature, certifies to his special authority to execute the act of congress mentioned.

Passing, for the moment, the suggestion, that neither the complaint nor warrant sufficiently describes an offence within the treaty, the warrant, in the fullest manner, meets every possible requirement of the law. It shows, on its face, every fact which is even here claimed to be requisite to the jurisdiction of the officer, that such jurisdiction has been regularly and formally invoked, for the arrest of the alleged fugitive, and it declares, in terms, the special authority upon which the proceeding is based, to wit, the treaty, the act of congress, and the appointment of the officer to execute the law. It declares the demand of the foreign government, the mandate of our own, and the offence charged. The description of the offence might, in my opinion, for all purposes of insertion in the warrant of arrest, have followed the words of the treaty. The reference to the treaty and the act passed to carry it into effect, identifies the charge with the treaty itself, and makes a charge of the offence of forgery import, per se, a charge of the offence of forgery mentioned in the treaty. This is all that is essential to jurisdiction of the subject-matter. It is not necessary that the particulars required to be proved, in order to establish the offence mentioned in the treaty, should be specified in the warrant; nor is it any part of the province of the warrant to disclose the details, in order that the prisoner may be notified of those details. Forgery is the offence for which the treaty provides, that, it being charged, the magistrate shall proceed. The warrant, reciting the other jurisdictional facts, declares that, "on complaint to the officer, 'forgery' is charged," &c. If there were no other detail or specification, I should hold, that, for all the purposes of the warrant of arrest, this was sufficient.

It follows, that there is no defect in the warrant, and that it is sufficient, on its face, to justify the marshal in arresting and holding the prisoner. Hence, if there be any illegality in the proceeding, or want of jurisdiction in the commissioner to detain the prisoner in custody for taking of proofs, it must be sought in the proceedings brought up by the certiorari.

II. The return to the certiorari shows, that, on the 18th of March, 1873, Edward Mortimer Archibald, Esq., her Britannic majesty's consul-general at the port of New York, presented to the commissioner the mandate issued by the department of state of the United States, annexed to the deturn, and, at the same time, made the complaint, upon oath, which is also annexed.

The mandate is addressed to any justice or judge of the several courts therein named, or to any commissioner specially authorized to execute the acts of congress of August 12, 1848 (9 Stat. 302), and of June 22, 1860 (12 Stat. 84), and recites, that, pursuant to the tenth article of the treaty of the 9th of August, 1842 (8 Stat. 572), between the United States and Great Britain, for the mutual delivery of criminals, fugitives from justice, in certain cases, Sir Edward Thornton, accredited, &c., * * minister plenipotentiary of her Britannic majesty, has made application to the government of the United States, for the arrest of George Macdonell, charged with the crime of forgery on the Bank of England, and alleged to be a fugitive from the justice of Great Britain, and who is believed to be within the jurisdiction of the United States, and that it appears proper, that the said George Macdonell should be apprehended, and the case examined, in the mode provided by the acts of congress aforesaid, and declares, that, to the end that the above-named officers, or any of them, may cause the necessary proceedings to be had in pursuance of said acts, in order that the evidence of the criminality of the said George Macdonell may be heard and considered, and, if deemed sufficient to sustain the charge, that the same may be certified, together with a copy of all the proceedings, to the secretary of state, that a warrant may be issued for his surrender pursuant to said treaty, the secretary of state certifies the facts recited. This mandate is dated March 13th, 1873, is authenticated by the seal of the department of state, and is signed by the secretary.

The mandate having recited the application of the British government for the surrender of George Macdonell for the crime of forgery, under and in pursuance of the treaty, the complaint itself begins by appropriate reference to that application, that is to say, it is entitled, "In the matter of the application for the extradition of George Macdonell, otherwise Macdonnell, under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain;" and thereupon, upon oath, the complaint charges, that one George Macdonell, otherwise Macdonnell, did, heretofore, between the 22d day of January and the 28th day of February, in the year 1873, at the city of London, in that part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called England, and within the jurisdiction of her said Britannic majesty, together with one Edwin Noyes, now in custody, in the said city of London, and Frederick Albert Warren and George Bidwell, (now fugitives from justice,) commit the crime of forgery and the utterance of forged paper, to wit, did feloniously, in said city, and at the time aforesaid, forge and utter, well knowing the same to be forged, two several acceptances of two several bills of exchange, each for the payment of one thousand pounds sterling, lawful money of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, aforesaid, with the intent thereby to defraud the governor and company of the Bank of England, a corporation duly created by, and existing under, the laws of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, aforesaid, and did conspire together to commit the said offence, with the intent to defraud the said governor and company of the Bank of England; that the said George Macdonell, otherwise Macdonnell, is a fugitive from the justice of Great Britain, and did, on the 8th day of March, in the year 1873, sail, on board the steamship Thuringia, bound for the port of New York, for the purpose of seeking an asylum within the territory of the United States; and that the crime of which the said Macdonell, otherwise Macdonnell, has so as aforesaid been guilty, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial for such crime, if the same had been committed within the said Southern district of New York, or within the jurisdiction of the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.

The commissioner further returns, that, upon such mandate and complaint, he issued to the marshal the warrant for the apprehension of the said alleged fugitive, of which warrant he annexes a copy, the substance of which has been above stated; that, on the 20th day of March, 1873, the said George Macdonnell was brought before him, in the custody of the said marshal, and that, on being advised of the charge against him, he desired an adjournment, upon which the commissioner adjourned the examination to the 25th of March, 1873, committing the prisoner, meanwhile, to the custody of the marshal; and that, on the 25th of March, 1873, the said George Macdonnell was brought before the commissioner, was attended by counsel, and proceedings were had, which appear by the record thereof annexed, whereupon the proceedings were adjourned to the 8th of April, 1873, at 12 o'clock, noon, and meanwhile the prisoner was committed to the marshal, to be then produced.

The record of the proceedings shows, that, on the 25th of March, the counsel for the prisoner moved to dismiss the complaint and warrant, upon grounds not materially unlike those urged on the present hearing; that three witnesses were examined, whose testimony is given; and that, in the course of the examination, a document was produced and put in evidence, against the objection of the counsel for the prisoner, which purported to be a warrant issued March 8th, 1873, by the lord mayor of London, for the arrest of George Macdonnell, charged with having forged, in the month of February last, two bills of exchange, for one thousand pounds each, which warrant the counsel for the prosecution claimed to be sufficiently proved to entitle it to be read in evidence. The record states, that, thereupon, the counsel, "Mr. Da Costa, applies, on affidavit, for adjournment, and states that depositions duly certified are en route. Mr. Brooke (counsel for the prisoner) objects to adjournment, and applies for discharge of prisoner. Mr. Da Costa, stating that depositions had been received which had not been duly certified under the act, Mr. Brooke demands names of witnesses whose depositions are under way." "Adjourned, under objection, to April 8, 1873, at 12 m., and defendant remanded to the custody of the marshal." It is proper to add, that the several commitments of the prisoner to the custody of the marshal, to be produced on the days to which the examination was adjourned, appear by the marshal's return to the writ of habeas corpus.

Upon the papers and proceedings thus returned by the commissioner, several objections are now made, on behalf of the prisoner, which, it is claimed, go to the jurisdiction of the commissioner, and point out such defects that the whole proceeding before him is without jurisdiction and void, and, therefore, require me to discharge the prisoner from custody. Without giving the precise language of the several objections, they may be briefly stated as follows: The commissioner had no jurisdiction to issue the warrant, and has no jurisdiction to hold the prisoner for the purpose of taking proofs, because—

First. The complaint made to the commissioner does not show that, prior to the making thereof, any requisition had been made under the authority of the British government, and that the authority of the government of the United States had thereupon been obtained for the apprehension and committal of the relator.

Second. Neither the complaint, nor the mandate which was presented to the commissioner, sufficiently charged the prisoner with any specific offence, within the treaty of extradition, to give to the commisioner jurisdiction.

1st. The first objection, of course, assumes, that the prior authority of the government of the United States was necessary before the commissioner could exercise any jurisdiction in the matter, and it pushes the doctrine of the case holding that proposition one step further, that is to say, that the complaint made to the commissioner, of the offence charged, and to be inquired of, must itself state that such mandate had issued on the application of the foreign government; and that it is not sufficient that the fact exists, that the mandate has issued to the commissioner, upon due application, and has been placed in his hands, but the complaint of the commission of the offence must state that it has issued.

Certainly, nothing in Ex parte Kaine [Case No. 7,597], warrants this claim. So far as it is supposed to be sustained by express prior adjudication, an observation of Mr. Justice Blatchford, in In re Farez [Id. 4,644], is relied upon. The observation is in these terms: "As the proceeding is a special proceeding, I think it is necessary, not only that the complaint made to the commissioner, upon which the warrant is asked, should show that such a requisition has been made upon the government of the United States, and such authority obtained from it, but that those facts should also be set forth on the face of the warrant. As the first warrant contained no such allegation, it is not valid." He was discussing the validity of the warrant, not the sufficiency of the complaint. His proposition was, that, in a special proceeding of this kind, it is necessary to the justification of the marshal that all facts essential to the jurisdiction of the commissioner should appear on the face of the warrant. If the expression used by him must be taken to import that it is equally essential that the requisition and mandate should be averred in the complaint, it was not called for by the point actually decided. I am not at all satisfied that such was the intention. The observation itself and other parts of the case indicate, that all he meant was, that it is not enough that it is found in the complaint; that it must appear in the warrant, that the requisition has been made and the mandate issued; and that its presence in the complaint will not cure the defect in the warrant. If the observation means more than this, I must withhold my concurrence.

The language of the learned counsel for the prisoner, in treating of the indispensable necessity of such requisition and mandate, to give the commissioner jurisdiction, calls such mandate "the commission of the officer," pro hac vice. If that be so, then the point now taken is this: A complainant must set out in his complaint which he presents to the officer, the authority of the officer to receive it. This is not required in ordinary complaints of crimes under state laws or the laws of the United States. It is enough, that the complaint avers a crime, and that such complaint is made to an officer who has legal authority to receive and act upon it. The act of 1848, to give effect to the treaty, in terms declares, that the officers named are severally vested with power, jurisdiction and authority, "upon complaint made, under oath or affirmation, charging any person found within the limits of any state, district, or territory, with having committed, within the jurisdiction of such foreign government, any of the crimes enumerated or provided for by any such treaty or convention, to issue his warrant," &c., &c. The allegations of the complaint are addressed, and may be wholly addressed, to the commission of the offence. That is all that the statute requires. It is all that the reason and good sense of the proceeding requires. The party complaining, having found a proper officer, an officer having actual and legal jurisdiction, may properly address himself to such officer, not averring, but assuming, such jurisdiction. This is in analogy to other proceedings in courts of justice. True, the complainant ought, in some form, to lay before the commissioner all facts necessary to invoke, and warrant the exercise of, the jurisdiction; but, that is all. What the commissioner does, upon complaint of those facts, will depend, for its validity, upon his jurisdiction to act on those facts, and that may become the subject of objection, inquiry and proof. This was manifestly the view of Judge Nelson himself, when he decided the case of Ex parte Kaine [supra], although he did not particularize the forms of procedure. On proof that authority had been given by the president for the arrest of Kaine, he offered to withhold the discharge, and proceed himself to take evidence which might warrant the surrender, clearly showing how that learned judge, in the administration of this law, as in other cases, while tenacious of all that he deemed material either to the right observance of law, or to the preservation of the dignity and honor of the government, or essential to the protection and safety of parties charged, did not allow himself to be carried away by undue and needless regard for the mere forms of proceeding. I infer, from what is stated at the conclusion of his decision in Kaine's Case, that, had counsel been able to show, that, before any proceedings were taken for the arrest of the alleged fugitive, the authority of the president had, in fact, been given, he would have taken the proceeding, as it then stood, on the arrest already made, and received proofs which might result in the surrender of the fugitive.

In the present case, moreover, the proceeding before the commissioner may, properly, be regarded as a single, connected proceeding, of which each of the steps forms a part, and all, together, constitute a complete record of jurisdiction. The mandate of the government of the United States was presented to the commissioner, showing the requisition of the British government for the extradition of George Macdonell, in pursuance of the treaty, and calling upon the commissioner to cause the necessary proceedings to be had in pursuance of the acts of congress referred to, in order that the "evidence of the criminality of the said George Macdonell may be heard and considered, and, if deemed sufficient, may be certified * * * and that a warrant may issue for his surrender, pursuant to said treaty." This, (if, as here claimed, essential to the jurisdiction of the commissioner,) was the very first step in the proceeding, and became a part of the record thereof. The complaint then follows, entitled in the very matter of the requisition and mandate, that is to say, "In the matter of the application for the extradition of George Macdonell, otherwise Macdonnell, under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain." This appropriately connects the complaint with the requisition already shown by the mandate, establishes complete identification, and becomes the next step in the record. The two papers together establish complete jurisdiction. I do not mean to be understood that this reference, in the complaint, in terms, to the requisition and mandate, was indispensable. I have above said the contrary; but it was appropriate and is quite sufficient.

2d. The second objection, as argued, embraces several particulars: (1) That the mandate does not describe, with sufficient particularity, an offence within the treaty; (2) that the complaint, on which the warrant of arrest was issued, does not sufficiently describe such offence; (3) that the descriptions of the offence, as contained in the mandate and complaint, do not, on their face, sufficiently appear to be identical; and (4) that there is a variance between the requisition and mandate, on the one hand, and the complaint and warrant, on the other, in this, that the requisition and mandate describe the offender as "George Macdonell," while the complaint and the warrant describe the offender as "George Macdonell, otherwise Macdonnell," so that, by reason of the variance in this respect, non constat that the prisoner is the person for whom requisition was made, or to whom the mandate relates.

(1) There is no especial form prescribed by law, in which the governement of the United States shall (assuming it to be necessary) give its authority to the commissioner to proceed in the matter. It is enough that the government recognizes the application of the foreign government, and gives authority for institution of proceedings for the ascertainment of the facts alleged to bring the case within the treaty. It is enough that the authority, when given, describes the particular charge to be investigated, in the very terms of the treaty, in aid of the execution whereof the proceeding is directed. Hence, if the government sees fit to describe the subject-matter in general terms, as a charge of "murder," or a charge of "forgery," that is sufficient, designating, of course, the alleged offender and fugitive to be proceeded against. Such language in a mandate which is, in terms, issued in pursuance of the treaty, imports that it is a charge of murder within the treaty, or a charge of forgery within the treaty. The authority it confers is for the investigation of the charge of an offence within the treaty. That the mandate authorizes, and not the investigation of any other or different offence. Whether the proofs, when given, to establish such an offence within the meaning of the treaty, sufficiently warrant a commitment, it is for the commissioner to consider and report to the executive.

(2) The sufficiency of the complaint was discussed on the argument very much as if it were a question of its sufficiency as a pleading; and the reasons assigned for the objection were, mainly, such as are apt to require definiteness, particularity, and the absence of all variance, upon the most technical rules of pleading. Such technical precision is not required in a complaint, for the mere purpose of jurisdiction to proceed thereon. For, be it remembered, that the point under consideration is, that the commissioner had not jurisdiction to proceed, on such a complaint, to the issuing of a warrant; and it is argued, that the present complaint fails to give such jurisdiction, because it does not describe the alleged forged instruments with sufficient particularity as to date, names of the persons whose acceptances were forged, and the times of payment thereof. The complaint does state, that the alleged offender "did, heretofore, between the 22d day of January and the 28th day of February, in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, at the city of London, * * * within the jurisdiction of her said Britannic majesty, * * * commit the crime of forgery and the utterance of forged paper, to wit, did feloniously, in the said city, and at the time aforesaid, forge and utter, well knowing the same to be forged, two several acceptances of two several bills of exchange, each for the payment of one thousand pounds sterling, lawful money of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, * * * with intent thereby to defraud the governor and company of the Bank of England, a corporation duly created by and existing under the laws of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland aforesaid." What follows in regard to conspiracy, I regard as of no importance to the present question. If it does not strengthen the case made against the accused, it may be regarded as surplusage, and certainly does not change or alter the meaning or effect of what I have cited from the complaint. The question is, does what I have thus cited show a case of forgery, within the treaty? Not whether it would constitute an indictment free from special exception. I have no hesitation in saying that it does charge the crime of forgery at the common law, however it may fail to describe it with the particularity required in a formal indictment for the offence.

I do not deem it necessary to question what is said touching the requisites of the complaint in this respect, in Re Henrich [Case No. 6,369], or in Re Farez [Id. 4,644]; but I am of the opinion that the description of the offence here does satisfy the requirement of the act of 1848, which authorizes the officer to issue his warrant "upon a complaint charging any person * * with having committed * * any of the crimes enumerated or provided for by such treaty."

To the suggestion, that it may be true, and may appear, when the specific instrument is produced, that the prisoner had authority to sign the name or names alleged to be forged, it must suffice to say—that is matter of defence—the subject of proof. Enough for the complaint, that it shows a prima facie case of forgery.

So, to the suggestion, that, between the days named there may be a large number of acceptances, each of which would answer the description in this complaint—every possible conjecture on the subject need not be excluded by the terms of the complaint. It would be possible to suggest the same thing, if the complaint named a precise date, with names, and when payable, &c., or even gave a copy of the bills of exchange. Enough, as already said, that the complaint makes a prima facie case; that is to say, this is enough to give jurisdiction to the commissioner. It is in that aspect alone that I am considering it.

That the party should be fairly apprised of the charge made, and with such fullness as is reasonably necessary to enable him to meet the investigation, may be conceded; but that appertains, after jurisdiction is acquired, to the conduct of the proceeding, and there is no danger that, for all the purposes of the inquiry, whether he ought, upon the proofs, to be committed, the investigation will not furnish him with that information, in respect to any detail not contained in the complaint as it now reads. It is the duty of the commissioner to proceed with entire fairness towards the prisoner, in every respect. The presumption is that he will do so. It is sufficient for the question before me, that he has jurisdiction for that purpose.

(3) The mandate and the complaint are in perfect harmony. I have already said, that I deem the mandate sufficient. It is no ground of objection, that the complaint is more specific than the mandate. Upon the assumption that the mandate was necessary, and required the officer to receive the complaint, there arises the legal inference, that the complaint made refers to, and charges, the same offence. Upon the argument submitted, whenever the complaint embodied more details than were given in the mandate, it could be successfully insisted, that they did not appear to be identical, and, therefore, jurisdiction did not appear by the complaint.

(4) As to variance between the mandate and the complaint and warrant, because, in the former, the alleged offender is called "George Macdonell," and, in the latter "George Macdonell, otherwise Macdonnell," I think there is nothing in the objection. The warrant, as already seen, recites the requisition and mandate, and shows, unequivocally, that the warrant is issued in pursuance thereof, and that it directs the arrest of the alleged offender named therein. The suggestion in the nature of an alias, contained therein, does not describe a different person, but seeks to aid in his complete identification. I do not doubt that the alias designation might, if it were of any importance, be regarded as surplusage; but it cannot properly be construed as indicating another person. Identity of name raises the presumption of identity of person.

Like observations are pertinent to the supposed variance in this respect between the mandate and the complaint, which, as already suggested, form parts of the same record.

Finally, I must decline considering the matter not alleged by way of plea or traverse to the return of the marshal, but urged on the argument, namely, that the commissioner has already, in the progress of his proceeding, received in evidence a document which was not legally admissible. If that suggestion were well founded, it would not defeat his jurisdiction. What may be the effect of the reception of the evidence, if it were deemed inadmissible, even whether, in case the facts were otherwise clearly proved, it would have any effect to avoid the finding of the commissioner, it is unnecessary now to say. The decision in Re Farez [Case No. 4,646], is to the effect, that an error of that description does not defeat the jurisdiction of the commissioner, or invalidate the arrest upon the warrant, or entitle the prisoner to be discharged. Besides, it is in no case proper to resort to the writ of habeas corpus, or to a succession of such writs, from day to day, for the purpose of reviewing the interlocutory decisions of the commissioner upon questions of that nature.

To the suggestion, that the commissioner had, when the writ was in this case applied for, granted an adjournment to enable the counsel for the foreign government to produce testimony, and that the commissioner was thus unjustly and unreasonably protracting the investigation, when, in fact, up to that time, there had, as claimed, been no legal evidence produced, I must say, that the conduct of the inquiry is committed to a sworn public officer, and his power to grant adjournments, at the instance of either party, is unquestionable. Often, it is indispensable to a just inquiry, and may often be necessary for the protection of the accused from an unfounded charge. The commissioner must exercise a just and reasonable discretion on that subject. The ends of justice, on the one hand, and the rights of the accused, on the other, cannot otherwise be preserved. Should that discretion be abused, the prisoner can, doubtless, have relief, but no such abuse at present appears. The practice in analogous cases, in the state wherein the proceedings are conducted, is said, in one of the cases referred to, to be a guide to the commissioner in the conduct of the investigation. If this be so, then it is quite pertinent to refer to a familiar practice, sanctioned by the courts of this state, where persons charged as fugitives from justice are sought to be returned to another state. Not only is the arrest made, and the accused held for examination, and time allowed for the purpose, but they are even held for a reasonable time, to enable the complaining parties to procure the necessary requisition for their delivery to the executive of the state from which they have fled; and the practice is also familiar, where persons are charged with crime within the state jurisdiction, and the examination is pending, to adjourn the same from time to time, and, when such persons have been brought up on habeas corpus, they have been remanded, to the end that such examination may be continued to a conclusion. It will, also, be found, that the practice of granting reasonable adjournments has obtained heretofore in all extradition cases; and there is no reason, either of favor to the prisoner, jealousy of the foreign government, or otherwise, why it should not prevail in those cases as well as in cases of crime alleged to have been committed in violation of our own laws.

What I have said seems to me to embrace, either expressly or by implication, all the grounds upon which the discharge of the prisoner is claimed, and I cannot regard them as sufficient. Let the prisoner be remanded to the custody of the marshal, to be held under the warrant of arrest and the commitments of the commissioner, that the proceedings on the inquiry into the criminality of the prisoner may be continued, and let the writs of habeas corpus and certiorari be discharged.

[NOTE. The case was heard by the commissioner on April 24, 1873. and the prisoner discharged for insufficiency of evidence, but he was held by the marshal upon a second warrant of arrest, issued upon a new executive mandate, which had been issued in the meanwhile. Upon this new warrant he was committed, and subsequently a warrant for his surrender to the agents of the British government issued. Thereupon the prisoner sued out a new writ of habeas corpus, which was heard in this court upon June 3, 1873; and the prisoner again remanded. Case No. 8,772.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 3, 1873.

EXTRADITION — SECOND WARRANT OF ARREST — FOREIGN WARRANT AND CERTIFICATE — HABEAS CORPUS — CERTIORARI — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE BEFORE COMMISSIONER.

1. Observations on the power of the court to issue a writ of certiorari, in a case under a treaty providing for the extradition of fugitives, and on the effect of a warrant of surrender, issued by the president, as a supersedeas of such a writ.

2. While the relator was lawfully held in custody, under a valid warrant of arrest, in an extradition case, and the inquiry thereunder was being proceeded with, a second warrant, on a new complaint, for a distinct offence, for his extradition, was issued. Afterwards, he was discharged from the arrest under the first warrant, for want of sufficient evidence to justify his commitment, and he was thereafter arrested under the second warrant: Held, that the latter arrest was not invalid.

3. Under section 2 of the act of August 12, 1848 (9 Stat. 302), as supplemented by the act of June 22, 1860 (12 Stat. 84), copies of depositions taken in London, before the lord mayor of London, and certified under his hand to be copies of the depositions on which he issued a warrant of arrest against the person charged, and further certified by the minister of the United States in Great Britain to be so authenticated as to entitle them to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of Great Britain, are competent evidence in an inquiry under a warrant of arrest, in an extradition case.

4. A court, or a judge, issuing a writ of habeas corpus, in an extradition case, does not sit as an appellate tribunal, to review the proceedings which have taken place before a commissioner, as upon allegation of error.

[Cited in U. S. v. Brawner, 7 Fed. 87; Re Wadge, 15 Fed. 866; Ex parte McCabe, 46 Fed. 366.]

5. If the commissioner acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and of the prisoner, the prisoner may be legally held, although the commissioner, in conducting the inquiry, committed an error in the reception of evidence.

6. The adjudications in this circuit considered, as to the power and duty of the court, on habeas corpus and certiorari, to entertain the question of the sufficiency of the evidence before the commissioner, to warrant the commitment for surrender.

[Cited in Ex parte Perkins, 29 Fed. 908; Re Ezeta, 62 Fed. 982.]

7. No case has held that, because some evidence was introduced which was not legal or competent, or because the court, upon a review of the evidence, was of opinion that it would have come to a different conclusion upon the evidence, therefore the proceedings were illegal, and the prisoner should be discharged.

[Quoted in Re Stupp, Case No. 13,563.]

This case came before the court on the 2d of June, 1873, on writs of habeas corpus and certiorari. The prisoner [George Macdonnell], was produced by the marshal, in obedience to the writ of habeas corpus addressed to him, returnable to this court. By the return to the writ it appeared, that the prisoner was held in custody under a warrant issued by United States Commissioner Gutman, committing him to the custody of the marshal, for surrender to the authorities of Great Britain, pursuant to the treaty of August 9, 1842 (8 Stat. 572), upon a charge of sundry specified forgeries, and the utterance of forged paper; and that, since the issuing of the writ, a warrant from the secretary of state of the United States had been received by the marshal, directing him to surrender the prisoner to the agents of the British government. The said commissioner, to whom the writ of certiorari was addressed, returned a copy of the proceedings had before him, upon which he made the commitment of the prisoner for surrender, and that he had made his report of the proceedings to the executive of the United States, upon which the warrant of the secretary of state had since issued. The prisoner had previously been proceeded against, pursuant to a requisition of the British government, and a mandate of the executive issued thereupon, on the 13th of March, 1873, under a complaint made before the same commissioner, March 18th, 1873, charging the crimes of forgery and the utterance of forged paper, to wit, certain two bills of exchange, for £1,000 each, on which a warrant was issued by him on that day. Under that warrant the prisoner was arrested and held. The proceedings upon that complaint were continued until the 24th of April, 1873. In the meantime the validity of the proceedings had been examined, under writs of habeas corpus and certiorari [Case No. 8,771], before Judge Woodruff, and their validity affirmed, and the prisoner returned to the custody of the marshal. On the 23d of April, 1873, a second warrant of arrest was issued by the same commissioner, founded upon another mandate of the executive, issued on the 8th of April, 1873, and another complaint made to the commissioner by the British consul-general, charging the prisoner with the crimes of forgery and the utterance of forged paper, to wit, with forging and uttering eleven separate bills of exchange, which were particularly described, with date, time, place, amount, &c., &c. Such warrant of arrest was delivered to the marshal on the same day, April 23d, and the prisoner (then in custody under the prior warrant) was notified thereof. On the 24th of April, the counsel conducting the prosecution under the first proceedings announced to the commissioner that they had no further evidence to offer under such previous proceedings, and the commissioner thereupon, deeming the evidence then before him insufficient to justify a commitment, discharged the prisoner from the said prior warrant of arrest. The prisoner was, however, detained by the marshal under and by virtue of such second warrant of arrest, and proofs were thereupon taken, which resulted in the warrant of commitment for surrender under which he was held to await the action of the executive, at the time the present writ of habeas corpus was issued, which warrant of commitment was soon after followed by the warrant for his surrender to the agents of the British government, mentioned in the return to the writ. The prisoner answered the return to the habeas corpus, insisting therein upon the illegality of the proceedings, the discharge from the former arrest, as an acquittal, the errors of the commissioner in admitting incompetent evidence, and the insufficiency of the proof to warrant his commitment, and claiming to be discharged from custody. Some other facts, and the grounds urged by his counsel in support of his claim to be discharged, appear in the observations of the court in announcing the decision.

Before WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge, and BLATCHFORD, District Judge.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge (on the 3d of June, the counsel for the prisoner having been fully heard on the previous day), stated the conclusions of the court, orally, as follows:

The court have given such attention to this case, during the progress of the argument, and in the interval since the adjournment, as seemed to us due to its importance, to the earnestness and zeal with which the claims on behalf of the prisoner have been urged upon our attention, and to the gravity of some of the questions which have been agitated—such as seemed to us to be necessary to a safe and right conclusion upon the questions involved, having due regard, also, to the rights of the citizen, and a proper respect to the foreign government, and the good faith of our own, in the execution of its treaty. The result is, that we do not think it necessary to hear the counsel for the prosecution, upon the questions either of law or of fact, which were raised and discussed herein by the counsel for the prisoner. Nor do we think it necessary, on this occasion, at least, to consider the grounds upon which the court is moved, in behalf of the prosecution, to quash the writ of certiorari. Ex parte Van Orden [Case No. 16,870]; In re Martin [Id. 9,151].

The conclusions which we have reached upon the points urged in behalf of the prisoner, render it unnecessary that we should say anything of the power of the court to issue the writ of certiorari, in a case arising under a treaty providing for the extradition of fugitives, or of the effect of the warrant of the president for the surrender of the prisoner, upon the proceedings, as a supersedeas, if a writ of certiorari has been properly issued. It is, however, proper to say, that the power to issue such a writ, in cases of this description, has been frequently affirmed and exercised; and that the warrant of surrender, issued by the government of the United States, for the delivery of the prisoner to the agents of the demanding government, has not, so far as we can discover, or are advised, been heretofore held a conclusive bar to further inquiry into any questions which may properly be raised upon a return of the whole proceedings. On that subject we go no further, because, assuming that the writ was properly issued, and that the warrant for the surrender of the prisoner should have no effect to preclude further inquiry, and no effect to render valid proceedings which could not otherwise be sustained, our conclusion is, that the grounds upon which the discharge of the prisoner is sought under these writs, ought not to prevail.

Without discussing all the questions that have been raised by counsel, at great length, or attempting to review all the arguments, or seeking to array against them, in any considerable detail, reasons for not giving them the force which they seem to possess in the mind of the counsel by whom they were urged, we shall content ourselves with disposing of the objections substantially in the order in which they were presented.

The first practical question, as expressed by the counsel, in the course of his argument, is, whether the arrest of the prisoner in this proceeding was a legal arrest. The facts out of which that question arises appear, by the return to the certiorari, to be these: A mandate had been issued by the president, directing proceedings against the prisoner, in compliance with a requisition by the government of Great Britain, and a complaint had been made before the same commissioner, at an earlier day, in which the charge of forgery by the prisoner was made, that charge being only particularized by the statement that he had been guilty of forgery, in the making of two certain bills of exchange for one thousand pounds each, with intent to defraud the governor and company of the Bank of England. Upon that complaint a warrant had been issued for the arrest of the prisoner, he had been arrested, and inquiry into the question of his criminality in the matter thus charged had begun. The question whether, in the proceedings had upon that complaint, the commissioner, and the marshal who executed his warrant, acted legally, had been brought under judicial inquiry, and the proceedings and warrant had been pronounced by one of the judges of this court, after full argument, legal.

Still entertaining the views which governed that decision, we are bound now to pronounce that arrest and that detention legal—legal then, and legal always. So that, on the 24th of April, before the discontinuance of the proceedings under that arrest, (or, to use the other form of expression, before the discharge of the prisoner from that arrest,) he was held in legal custody. While he was in that custody, the warrant of arrest now in question was placed in the hands of the marshal; and thereafter, on the following morning, on the suggestion of the prosecuting counsel that they had no further evidence to offer in support of that prior charge, (and, plainly, upon the face of the proceedings, because the evidence produced did not establish that charge sufficiently to warrant any other result,) the commissioner discharged the prisoner from that arrest. It is now argued, that, by some legal retroaction, the discharge of the prisoner from that arrest establishes, and establishes conclusively, that he was, up to that time, held under illegal arrest. That reasoning we cannot affirm. All that that decision affirmed was, that the demanding government, or those who represented the demanding government, in that prosecution, had failed to establish the charge; but, down to the time of that decision, the detention of the prisoner was legal, as had already been pronounced, and as we still affirm. To hold now, that the discharge of the prisoner from arrest under that charge, for want of sufficient evidence to justify his commitment, operated retroactively, to make the precedent holding and arrest illegal, is to hold, if it be extended, as the principle of the argument must extend it, to other and kindred cases, that, whenever a party once charged with crime has been arrested and subsequently discharged, whether for informality, for want of proof, on verdict, or on other legal grounds, ipso facto, all who were actors in the previous arrest were trespassers, and liable to be proceeded against as such, as if the arrest and all prior proceedings were void ab initio. No such result is due to the fact that the prisoner, having been arrested, is discharged from custody. Such a doctrine, we think, would be fruitful of mischief that could not be tolerated. It, therefore, is not true that the arrest on the present warrant was illegal, because the prisoner was, at the time it was issued to the marshal, illegally detained; and, if so, that branch of the argument fails, and must be overruled.

It is, however, suggested, that, the prisoner being in custody under a warrant of arrest, if the view we have just discussed, be not taken, then he was in legal custody; that it was irregular to issue another warrant of arrest, and place it in the hands of the marshal; and that, if proceedings against him, with a view to another or subsequent charge were to be instituted, it ought to have been done by a detainer lodged with the jailer, and not by a warrant of arrest delivered to the marshal. Without entering into the discussion of a mere question of practice, it is enough to say, that we are of opinion that such a technical objection has no place in proceedings for the execution of this treaty, and has no application to this subject. The prisoner had not then been committed to any jail. He was kept in the custody of the marshal, who used such place of safe keeping as was available to him, and the new warrant of arrest must necessarily be delivered to the marshal. Such new warrant operated to make it the duty of the marshal to detain the prisoner to await proceedings under it.

It was insisted, that the decision of this court in a former case involved, as a necessary result, a proposition which, if maintained, rendered the arrest under the present warrant illegal. In the case of In re Farez [Case No. 4,644], before this court, on habeas corpus, the opinion was expressed by the judge, that, while in the custody of the court, by virtue of a writ of habeas corpus, a prisoner was to be protected against arrest upon a new warrant, and, obviously, because it was a direct interference with the power of the court then engaged in inquiring whether there was ground for detaining the prisoner under the subsisting arrest; and that the court owed it to itself, and to its necessary power to exercise its own jurisdiction, to see to it that no prisoner in its custody, held on habeas corpus, was withdrawn from it pending the proceeding. Such a case has no application to the present point. The prisoner was not in the custody of any court. He was held by a ministerial officer, with a view to an inquiry into a charge of crime, and there was nothing inconsistent with the course of that inquiry, that another warrant of arrest, issued by the same commissioner, directing that he be brought before him, should be placed in the hands of the marshal, to the end that an inquiry might be had upon a fresh charge. It was not held, in the Case of Farez, that a new warrant of arrest was invalid, because issued pending the proceedings on habeas corpus, but only, that, while the prisoner was in the custody of the court, it could not be executed, so as to withdraw him from that custody. So, here, the present warrant of arrest was not invalid because issued while the prisoner was held under a prior warrant. In the most favorable view that can be taken, it operated, when he was discharged from the prior warrant, to require the marshal to detain him in custody. No power of any court was invaded. There was no conflict with any requirement or duty of any court to see to it that its jurisdiction was not interfered with. That case, as we think, has no application to the subject before us; and we, therefore, hold, that there was nothing in the circumstances relied upon, which invalidates the arrest and detention under the second warrant.

The discussion of the point last considered was deemed, by the counsel for the prisoner, to involve the question whether, in truth, this second arrest was or was not for the same charge. The counsel hereupon insists, that, upon the same charge for which the prisoner was first arrested, he was not liable to a second arrest, not only for the reasons above referred to, but because the discharge from the first arrest operated as an acquittal, and that, therefore, if we do not sustain the grounds for discharge already considered, the prisoner must, nevertheless, be discharged, unless the second arrest was based upon a charge of a distinct offence. That the second arrest was for the same offence as the first, is claimed by the prisoner's counsel, upon, in substance, this reasoning: Inasmuch as the treaty of extradition (8 Stat. 576, art. 10) provides, that, upon the requisition of the demanding government, setting forth that the alleged fugitive is charged with the offence of forgery, he shall, in the manner pointed out in the treaty, be surrendered to the demanding government, for trial, therefore, if forgery be charged, it, ex vi termini, means all forgeries up to that time committed; and, therefore, although it may be true, that a second application or requisition for surrender proceeds upon an allegation of the forgery of distinct and separate instruments, there is therein, nevertheless, but the charge of forgery, and it is, therefore, the same offence, because forgery was charged in the first requisition. The fallacy of that view of the subject is quite apparent, when it is suggested, that every forgery is an offence; that, as there may be several forgeries, so there may be, and so there are, several offences; and that there may be as many indictments, as many trials, as many convictions, and, we add, as we think is the necessary consequence, as many demands of surrender, and as many proceedings preliminary to surrender, as there are instruments forged, or, in other words, in the view that we take of the subject, as there are offences. It is unnecessary to add, that there need not be so many warrants of surrender, for the obvious reason, that, when the prisoner has been once surrendered, a further warrant of surrender would be useless, and, therefore, the executive need not be called upon to make more than one, unless, perhaps, for some cause, the first warrant of surrender had not been executed. In that case, a second warrant of surrender might be issued.

The requisition, mandate and complaint under which the second warrant of arrest was issued, and under which the proceedings now in question were taken, charge the prisoner with forging and uttering eleven different bills of exchange, each specifically described. The first proceeding related to two bills of exchange, described in such general terms that, while they may answer the description of two of those named in the second proceeding, they are not clearly identical therewith, and the other nine are plainly distinct and separate forgeries. It is, however, insisted, that the discharge from arrest under the first warrant was such an acquittal as precluded another arrest under the second warrant. The reasons which we have given for our view of the other points, in the order in which they were presented by the counsel, lead necessarily to the answer which we give, decidedly, that it has no such legal effect. Not only so; we purposely refrain from even affirming, or admitting, that, if the offence charged had been identical in both complaints, the prior discharge would have operated as a necessary legal bar to a subsequent arrest, commitment and surrender, when the demanding government was able to produce proper evidence to sustain it. Be that as it may, we do hold, that such discharge has no legal operation or effect upon proceedings for the surrender of a fugitive, based upon complaint of a distinct offence. The executive may be called upon to guard against abuse, or against oppressive proceedings. The executive may, perhaps, be justified in saying to the demanding government: "You have had your day. You have had your opportunity. We have, in good faith, given you the benefit of the instrumentalities pointed out in the treaty, in order to effect the surrender of the alleged fugitive whom you demand; but we will see to it that needless or vexatious prosecutions be not indulged in." On the other hand, we unhesitatingly say, that, if the government be satisfied that a failure to procure a surrender in the first instance was due to circumstances explainable, consistently with good faith, and consistently with proper respect to our government, and the case be such as properly appeals to the sense of justice which this government always entertains, a further mandate may be issued on a second requisition, and the proceedings that will follow, conducted by the judicial officers of the government, will be legal. Indeed, on that subject, we apprehend, that the magistrate before whom the prisoner is brought has no right to entertain the question. And, in reference to this point, we add, that there is no necessary legal obligation, on the part of the demanding government, to place in its original requisition all the offences of which it may suppose that the fugitive has been guilty. What may, in fairness and candor, be due between the two governments, and whether the president would grant further and successive mandates, where the proceedings were rendered unnecessarily vexatious, by withholding the information which the demanding government possesses, and so instituting several successive prosecutions, when one is sufficient, is, we think, a question for the executive, and not for the court or the commissioner.

The next point in the order of the discussion was, that, if the proceedings before the commissioner thus far be held to be legal, the prisoner should, nevertheless, be discharged from custody, because the commissioner, in the conduct of the inquiry into the criminality of the fugitive, received incompetent evidence. The supposed illegal evidence consists of depositions of two classes. The first class embraces depositions which are certified to have been taken before the lord mayor of London, before a warrant of arrest, which forms a part of the documents produced on the hearing before the commissioner, was there issued. The other class consists of depositions which were taken successively on two supplemental informations and inquiries, at dates subsequent to the issuing of that warrant of arrest.

In respect to the first class, it seems to us sufficient to refer to the language of the acts of congress under which these proceedings have been conducted, and to state that the necessary construction of those acts involves the correctness of the commissioner's ruling in this respect. We think we might place the decision of that point upon the act of August 12, 1848, alone (9 Stat. 302); but, under that act, as supplemented by the act of June 22, 1860 (12 Stat. 84), it seems to us that there can be no reasonable doubt. Section 2 of the act of 1848 provides, that, "in every case of complaint as aforesaid," (referring to proceedings under a treaty for the extradition of criminals,) "and of a hearing upon the return of the warrant of arrest," (issued by the magistrate), "copies of the depositions upon which an original warrant in any such foreign country may have been granted, certified under the hand of the person or persons issuing such warrant, and attested, upon the oath of the party producing them, to be true copies of the original depositions, may be received in evidence of the criminality of the person so apprehended." It will be seen, that the principle upon which this act proceeds is, that evidence which, in the foreign country, was held sufficient to authorize the arrest of the fugitive, ought to be received as evidence here upon the same charge. But, to identify that evidence and show that the documents produced do contain the evidence received in such foreign country, they must be authenticated as true copies. The authentication which this statute contemplates is a certificate under the hand of the person or persons issuing such warrant, and attestation, upon oath, that they are true copies of the original depositions. That these depositions are certified under the hand of the person issuing the warrant in the case now before us, to wit, the lord mayor of London, is not questioned.

Congress, in 1860, evidently conceiving that exigencies might arise, doubtless knowing that exigencies had arisen, in which there was difficulty in furnishing seasonable oral proof by the oath of the party producing the depositions, provided, in the act of 1860, that such depositions, or copies thereof, if they shall be properly and legally authenticated, so as to entitle them to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of the foreign country from which the accused party shall have escaped, shall be received in evidence. Here, again, congress recognizes the propriety of receiving in evidence here depositions which are so authenticated as to entitle them to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of the foreign country. Such depositions are, in their nature and by express terms, made admissible here. Had the act stopped there, the question arising on the offer of such depositions would not be—are such depositions admissible, but, are they so authenticated that they are entitled to be read in the foreign country for similar purposes? How are the tribunals of this country to be advised of the sufficiency of the authentication? That question might have created embarrassment had the act of congress gone no further. Should oral proof be taken? What official certificates from the foreign tribunals, or government, or officers, would establish it? To relieve all doubt or embarrassment, the act declares what may be taken as proof, and conclusive proof, of such authentication, which the court must recognize, and by which that fact is established, in these words: "The certificate of the principal diplomatic or consular officer of the United States, resident in such foreign country, shall be proof that any paper or other document so offered is authenticated in the manner required by this act." It seems to us, that that removes all doubt from this question. Such certificate is not merely evidence, it is proof of such due authentication. The certificate of our minister at the court of St. James was produced before the commissioner. That certificate is unqualified, in its certification, that the depositions are authenticated in the manner required by the act, to wit, so authenticated as to entitle them to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of the foreign country from which the accused party is alleged to have escaped. It seems to us that that certificate is, in its nature, a judicial act, which neither the commissioner nor this court can disregard or overrule. Moreover, that certificate states, on its face, that it is given and made under and pursuant to the provisions of the act of 1860. It may, therefore, be regarded, by its reference thereto, as incorporating the act itself, so far as the details of its requirements are involved in the certificate. It follows, that, in regard to the first class of depositions, there is no room to hesitate, in affirming the correctness of the ruling of the commissioner in receiving them as evidence.

It is suggested that this construction of the acts of congress involves an interference with the rights of the prisoner, as creating a species of evidence which the treaty did not contemplate. 8 Stat. 576, art. 10. We are aware, that, by the terms of the treaty, the proof which the government of the United States is bound, and which alone it is bound, to respect, as creating an obligation on its part to surrender a fugitive, is such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person charged is found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had been there committed. In the first place, this language has especial reference to the degree, quantum, or weight of the evidence, rather than to the instruments of evidence themselves; and an act of congress prescribing what instruments or vehicles of evidence shall be received, and how they may be authenticated, is in no inconsistency with the treaty. But, more than this—it was just as competent, as a question of power, for the government of the United States, by act of congress, as it was competent in the treaty itself, to say upon what evidence of criminality it would perform the stipulations in the treaty; and, therefore, when congress declared, by their act, for the guidance of judicial officers, what shall be admissible to establish criminality, in the inquiry which, by the terms of the treaty, the government is bound to institute, they made their enactment the law of the place where the prisoner is found, for all the purposes of the proceedings under the treaty. Therefore, it is true—technically and literally true—that the evidence by which the prisoner in the present case has been charged, so far as it conforms to the provisions of the act of congress, was evidence competent, in its nature, to justify any conclusion which is properly deducible therefrom, in the place where the prisoner was found, and where he was apprehended.

As to the supplemental depositions, taken after the warrant was issued, their admissibility depends entirely upon the construction of the act of 1860. There are two grounds upon which we may hold that their admission does not invalidate the proceedings had before the commissioner in this case. If the construction which we have intimated of the act of 1860, namely, that the certificate of the principal diplomatic or consular officer of the United States, resident in the foreign country, is proof, plenary and conclusive, that the documents offered in evidence are so authenticated that they are entitled to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of England, be correct, then, by the terms of the act of 1860, it was the duty of the commissioner to receive them in evidence; and they were competent, because so pronounced by the diplomatic officer to whom that question is referred by the act of congress itself. If it were profitable, we might occupy time in suggesting reasons for the enactment, showing its propriety and its convenience; and we might even go further, (if it were proper for the court to attempt to justify an act of the supreme legislature,) in support of the construction of the act of 1860, above stated. But we do not think that is necessary; and for the further reason, that, without resting the disposition of this case, in any respect, upon the conclusive effect of the certificate of the American minister, we are of opinion, that, even though the second class of depositions were inadmissible, their reception furnishes no ground for the discharge of the prisoner.

The arguments urged upon our attention proceed very much upon an assumption, which is entirely erroneous, to wit, that, in this proceeding, under the writ of habeas corpus, we are sitting as an appellate tribunal. That is not our relation to the commissioner. A judge issuing a writ of habeas corpus, or a court issuing a writ of habeas corpus, in these cases, is exercising an independent and original jurisdiction, with a right to inquire, doubtless, whether the prisoner is legally held. What shall be the scope and extent of that inquiry, has been very much controverted in the courts of this circuit. We say, on that subject, first, that we are not sitting as an appellate tribunal, for the purpose of reviewing the proceedings before the commissioner, as upon allegation of error. This is not a writ of error. The inquiry here is not to be conducted upon the rigid, technical rules applicable to a writ of error, which is in the same proceeding. Sometimes, it is true, a writ of error is called a new suit, but, in its relation to the subject-matter, and in its ultimate result, it is so connected therewith, that it may be properly called a continuation of the same proceeding. It may result in reversing. What then? If the case is one which calls for it, a venire de novo may be had, which reaches back to the point where the error occurred which requires the proceedings to be reversed. If the decision is one of affirmance, it then adds an additional record sanction to what the inferior tribunal has done. This proceeding has no such relation to the proceedings of the commissioner. The question to be determined upon habeas corpus, in these cases is, as we apprehend—is the prisoner rightly held, or is he to be discharged? If the commissioner, having acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and of the prisoner, commits an error in the reception of evidence, it does not follow, by any legal rule, that his proceedings are to be held for naught, and void for error. The prisoner may, nevertheless, be legally held.

Our conclusion in regard to the case, as it stands upon the evidence, calls upon us to say, that, whether the supplementary depositions were or were not admissible, the prisoner is legally held. Without those depositions the proofs justify the conclusion of the commissioner, and his commitment of the prisoner for surrender.

This brings us to notice the questions of fact, in relation to which what we have to say will be very brief. It is claimed, that, even with the evidence that we have last adverted to, a case was not made out justifying the commitment of the prisoner. Before, however, discussing that point, we desire to call attention to the state of the adjudications in this circuit. Three views have been taken of the power and duty of the court, on habeas corpus and certiorari, to entertain the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant the commitment for surrender.

It was held, and held successively for many years (In re Veremaitre [Case No. 16,915]; In re Kaine [Id. 7,598]; In re Heilbronn [Id. 6,323]; Ex parte Van Aernam [Id. 16,824]), that, if it appeared to the judge or to the court issuing the writs, that the commissioner had acquired jurisdiction, by a conformity of the proceeding to the requirements of the treaty and the acts of congress, and that he had not exceeded his jurisdiction, that was an end to inquiry; that, whether the evidence received by him was sufficient or insufficient, was a question to be determined by him; that no tribunal had been provided by the treaty, and no jurisdiction had been given by any act of congress, to any judge, magistrate, or court, to review that decision; that the only review possible was a review by the executive, to whom the proceedings had before the commissioner were to be returned; that the executive had power to examine for himself, and determine whether a case had been made within the treaty, and whether a case had been made which called upon him, as executive of the government of the United States, to surrender the fugutive; and that, as this special jurisdiction in a special proceeding not theretofore within the jurisdiction, original or appellate, of any court or magistrate of the United States, had been conferred by law upon the magistrate acting under the act of congress, and as it was made his duty to certify his conclusions as the basis of executive action, without giving any right of appeal, in any form, to any other magistrate or to any court, there was no appeal and no supervisory authority to be exercised, except by the executive.

The next stage in the history contained an opinion which is supposed to go one step further. We may say, without disrespect to the decision itself, in any wise, that the decision in which the opinion was pronounced (In re Kaine [Id. 7,597]), had other grounds upon which it was deemed to be called for. The decision was, that the commissioner never acquired jurisdiction; but the opinion, nevertheless, went further, and held, that, in the case under consideration, there was no competent evidence before the commissioner, that is to say, there was no legal evidence upon which the commissioner could act, for, if the evidence was not competent, it was not legal; that, if there was no competent evidence before the commissioner, the proceedings before the commissioner were to be treated, whenever presented to any other tribunal, as an arbitrary act of commitment, upon mere complaint; and that the question became, therefore, a question of law, not a question of fact, before the court, on habeas corpus, whether a commissioner could, upon complaint, issue a warrant of arrest, and, upon the appearance of the prisoner before him, commit him for surrender. With that view of the subject, and with the assertion of the right to inquire, upon habeas corpus, whether the proceedings of the commissioner had been, in that sense, legal, or, in other words, whether he had not departed from his jurisdiction, which was a jurisdiction to inquire into and ascertain facts, and not to declare facts without any evidence before him, we are not disposed, at present, to raise any controversy.

The next step in the consideration of this subject elicited the opinion (In re Henrich [Id. 6,369]), that the court, acting in the proceedings instituted by habeas corpus and certiorari, was not confined to the mere inquiry whether there was any evidence; but that, if it could see that there was a substantial defect of evidence, it might and ought, not necessarily to discharge the prisoner, but to hold that the warrant of commitment was illegally granted.

That view of the subject was followed, in its next step, or perhaps, in its consequence, by the holding (In re Farez [Cases Nos. 4,645, 4,646]) that it was not the duty of the court to discharge when an error in rejecting evidence for the prisoner had been committed, but to remand, that the error might be corrected, and the proofs be continued, if it was so desired, to the end that the facts might be ascertained, and that, if the prosecuting government were able, it might yet establish a case against the prisoner. Indeed, in the previous case to which we have referred, to wit, where the judge was of opinion that there was no legal evidence (In re Kaine [supra]), he offered, upon announcing the conclusion that he had reached, to detain the prisoner, to the end that the inquiry might proceed, the defects be supplied, and proper and competent evidence be produced before him.

In no view of the subject, therefore, should we be called upon to discharge the prisoner, upon the idea that the evidence was not sufficient. No case has yet gone so far as to say, that, because some evidence was introduced which was not legal or competent, or because the court, upon a review of the evidence, was of opinion that it would have come to a different conclusion upon the evidence, therefore, the proceedings were illegal and the prisoner should be discharged. The inconveniences and the evils of such a rule, applicable to this subject, are so great, that the assertion and maintenance of that view of the meaning of the treaty might be assailed as evidence of bad faith. It has been deemed settled by the law of England, and the doctrine has been reiterated in this country, that a determination of one judge, or a determination of one court, touching a question of discharge under habeas corpus, is not a bar to the issuing of another writ by another court, or by another magistrate, and that, practically, a person neld in detention may have successive writs of habeas corpus, so long and so often as he may find a judge or a court to whom he may address his petition. That practice, applied to this subject, works this result. If the judge or the court, in these cases where extradition is sought, is at liberty, on habeas corpus, to weigh the evidence before the commissioner, and inquire whether they would have reached the same conclusion, the result is, that the finding of the commissioner, and the findings of successive courts and judges issuing successive writs of habeas corpus, so long as judges can be found, instead of having any force or effect, can be assailed, and assailed again, until, at last, perhaps, some doubting mind may be found, who will say, "I would have reached a different conclusion upon the evidence," and thereupon discharge the prisoner. To that view of the duty of the court, touching the weight of evidence before the commissioner, we cannot subscribe. We are not called upon, by any decision heretofore made, to assert any such rule. We feel conscious, not merely of the inconvenience, but, as we apprehend, of the great injustice, that would result from any such construction of the treaty and the acts of congress. Even in the case most relied upon (the Henrich Case [supra]), notwithstanding what is stated in the previous portion of the opinion, the conclusion of the court leaves this question open to consideration, and, as we think, in the form and manner in which we have stated our views; for, although the power is there asserted to reverse or overrule a proceeding before a commissioner, for the want of sufficient evidence, still it is stated that it is not to be done upon slight grounds.

Assuming, nevertheless, for the purposes of this case, that inquiry into the evidence is open to us, in these proceedings, we are brought finally to the question whether, upon the evidence, a case is made out which would justify the commitment of the prisoner for trial. We have carefully examined the evidence in its details, enlightened by the views urged upon us by the counsel for the prisoner, and we are constrained to conclude, that the commissioner, (even without the testimony in respect to which exception was taken,) would have been derelict in his duty if he had not made the commitment for surrender which he was called upon by the prosecuting parties to make. This is not a trial of the prisoner. Much that was urged upon us, much that was urged touching the admissibility of evidence, much that was urged with regard to the sufficiency of the testimony, proceeded upon the principles which govern a court and a jury when the question of guilt or innocence is finally to be determined. A fugitive is not to be surrendered upon slight grounds. There should be reasonable evidence, reasonable cause to believe, and, in conformity with the case last referred to, we might go further, perhaps, and say, that there should be such prima facie case made by proof. as, being submitted to the jury, and being found by them to sustain the charge, would make it the duty of a court to sustain the verdict. Such testimony, we think, is found in this case. We are, therefore, not called upon to say anything more touching the power or the duty of the court to examine and weigh the evidence. If such be our. duty, we find it sufficient. If, there being some evidence tending to establish the prisoner's criminality, we are not to review the finding of the commissioner upon the weight of the evidence, the result in this case is the same.

The objection has been urged, by the counsel for the prisoner, that it is not sufficiently proved that the lord mayor of London had jurisdiction to issue a warrant of arrest, or to take the depositions in the first instance. (Opinion of four judges of the supreme court, in Ex parte Kaine, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 115.) If what we have said in regard to the provisions of the act of 1860, touching the certificate of our minister plenipotentiary, be adopted as the rule of decision, that disposes of this question; for, in that case, his certificate that the depositions which are offered are so authenticated as to entitle them to be read in the courts of that country, is the conclusive test of the admissibility of the evidence before the commissioner here. But, we are of opinion that the jurisdiction of the lord mayor is sufficiently established. It is not necessary that we should refer to the statute of Edward III., which defined and conferred the powers of justices of the peace in England, or inquire to what extent the tribunals of this country are at liberty, or are bound, to take judicial notice of the existence of such officers, from that period down to the time of our Revolution, or to recognize the existence of their jurisdiction and authority, and to dispense with proof that such officers have jurisdiction to keep the peace, and, as magistrates, to arrest, on charge of crime, and hold to bail, and detain for trial. Much might be said, it seems to us, in support of that view of the subject, and to sustain the jurisdiction of the lord mayor, who appears, by these proceedings, to be a justice of the peace, without any other proof whatever. But, we think, that, if evidence is necessary, evidence was produced competent to prove it. We have, in the testimony, the affirmative fact that he is the chief criminal magistrate of the city of London. That is testified under oath. There was no cross-examination, there was no inquiry into the sources of the witness' knowledge, and nothing offered in impeachment of the verity of what was testified. The certificate of the government of Great Britain, in any form, would have told no other tale. At least, it establishes that he is, in fact, in the exercise of the power and authority of the chief criminal magistrate of the city of London. It might be plausibly suggested, were it not for some things that have been said in former cases, that, when the act of congress of 1848 provided that the depositions on which a warrant had been granted in the foreign country, certified by the person issuing such a warrant, might, when proved to be true copies, be received in evidence, there was no room for inquiry here into the jurisdiction of that person. We do not, however, propose to go so far. We do say, that the proof adduced before the commissioner, in connection with the certificate of the lord mayor, and the authentication or certification, ample and full as it is, by our minister, completes the chain of evidence, and sufficiently establishes the jurisdiction of that officer.

To conclude, we find nothing that will justify our further interference with the custody of the prisoner, under the warrant of commitment by which he is held, subject to the warrant of the executive for his surrender. The prisoner is remanded to the custody from which he was taken, and the writs are discharged.

NOTE. On the 23d of May, 1873, writs of habeas corpus and certiorari, on the relation of Macdonnell, were issued by Mr. Justice Fancher, of the supreme court of New York, directed to the United States marshal and to Commissioner Gutman, returnable at the court of oyer and terminer, June 4th, 1873. On that day, the marshal did not produce the body of the relator, but, through his counsel, made return, that he held the relator under a warrant issued by Commissioner Gutman, pending proceedings for his extradition, on the application of the British government, charged with the crimes of forgery and the utterance of forged paper; that such proceedings had been made the subject of review by the United States circuit court, on writs of habeas corpus and certiorari; and that, after such review, the relator had been remanded by the federal court to the custody of the marshal, to await the issuing of the warrant of the executive for his surrender to the British government. After hearing Charles W. Brooke on behalf of the relator, and James C. Carter on behalf of the marshal, Mr. Justice Davis delivered the decision of the court, orally, as follows: "The application now made is in the nature of a motion to regard the marshal as in contempt for not making the proper return to the writ by producing the prisoner. Although counsel do not put it in that form, it amounts substantially to that; and the question is, whether, upon the proceedings and the return now before the court, it is the duty of the court to issue an attachment, under the statute, to compel the marshal to produce the body of the prisoner. There is no doubt whatever of the power of the state courts, in all cases where persons are deprived of their liberty within their territorial jurisdiction, to issue the writ of habeas corpus, for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of the detention; and that power is applicable to all cases where it does not appear upon the face of the petition for the writ, that the case is one either extra-territorial, or exclusively within the jurisdiction of some other tribunal. I assume that the petition in this case did not show to Mr. Justice Fancher, who issued this writ, any fact clearly establishing that this prisoner was held by a jurisdiction which precluded the state court from investigating the cause of detention. It, therefore, became the duty of the judge to issue the writ, and it became the duty of the marshal so far to obey it as to make known to the court, in proper form, over his official signature, the cause of the detention of the prisoner by himself.

District Court, W. D. Missouri. June Term, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—PREFERENCE—PURCHASE BY CREDITOR—KNOWLEDGE OF INSOLVENCY—EQUAL DISTRIBUTION IN BANKRUPTCY.

1. When a creditor has reasonable cause to believe his debtor insolvent, purchases goods of him, and such debtor makes the sale with a view of giving a preference, the transaction is void, and the assignee in bankruptcy of such insolvent may recover the value of the goods from such creditor.

[Cited in Graham v. Stark, Case No. 5,676; Martin v. Toof, Id. 9,167.]

2. The sale cannot be declared void unless the purchaser had reasonable cause to believe the seller to have been insolvent when he made the sale, and reasonable cause means a state of facts which would put a prudent man upon inquiry as to the condition of the person from whom he purchases.

[Cited in Singer v. Sloan, Case No. 12,899.]

3. Neither local inclinations nor the employment of the process of state courts can longer be successfully employed to thwart or defeat the equal distribution of an insolvent debtor's estate among all his creditors, regardless of their locality.

[In the matter of John R. McDonough, a bankrupt, and of Henry K. White, assignee, against Thomas J. Raftery.]

Woodson, Vineyard & Young, for plaintiff.

Hall & Oliver and W. Judson, for defendant.

KREKEL, District Judge. This is an action brought by the assignee under the first clause of the 35th section of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 534)], to recover property, or the value thereof, alleged to have been conveyed by the bankrupt to defendant Raftery, with a view of giving him, the said Raftery, a preference. The testimony in the case tends to show that Raftery, an old merchant, on the 1st day of July, 1867, sold his stock of general merchandise to McDonough, after inventory taken, at upwards of eight thousand dollars; that he received in payment four thousand dollars, and two notes of equal amounts due in six and twelve months, Lysaght and McGee becoming securities; that McDonough rented the house in which the goods purchased were kept, of Raftery, the owner; that after keeping store until about November 1, 1868, McDonough sold the stock of goods on hand to Raftery in a lump, and without taking an inventory, for the round sum of five thousand dollars, one thousand three hundred and fifty dollars of which was to be paid on balance of the last of the notes given for original purchase-money, which was unpaid and under protest; eight hundred dollars to bank on overdrawn account; five hundred dollars in cash, and balance in short, negotiable paper. Prior to making the purchase, Raftery had incidentally learned that McDonough was owing upwards of one thousand six hundred dollars to the jobbing house of Tootle, Fairleigh & Co., of St. Joseph. Raftery was well acquainted with the business of McDonough, and on intimate terms with both McDonough and Lysaght, the security for McDonough, and who had had at one time charge of McDonough's business while he was sick. McGee, the other security for McDonough, had been released on notice of his liability on note referred to. A number of witnesses testified that McDonough was considered solvent at the time of sale, that he was in good credit, and had no other property than the stock of goods.

The insolvency of McDonough is admitted, and the first question to be decided is, had Raftery any claim against McDonough, or was he under any liability for him? The last of the two notes given in consideration of the original purchase had been assigned by Raftery to a bank, and when it became due Raftery, in order to avoid protest, waived it by appropriate indorsement on the note. This created a liability on the part of Raftery for McDonough. The next inquiry is, had Raftery reasonable cause to believe McDonough insolvent when he made the purchase; for, unless this was the case, the sale cannot be declared void. "Reasonable cause to believe," in this connection, means a state of facts or circumstances which would lead any prudent man to the making of inquiries. Raftery knew of the protested note, and, to indicate his own view as to his liability on it, he secures the payment in the trade. He knew of the indebtedness of one thousand six hundred dollars to Tootle, Fairleigh & Co.; he knew of the overdrawn bank account; he knew that the stock of goods had gone down from eight thousand dollars and upwards to five thousand dollars in sixteen months. These facts were well calculated to put Raftery upon inquiry, and, had he made any whatever, he could not have failed to learn the actual condition of McDonough, for one-half of his creditors reside in St. Joseph. The books of McDonough would at once have disclosed his condition; and is it unreasonable that purchasers, under circumstances such as surrounded this case, should be required to make reasonable efforts to learn the condition of the persons with whom they deal? It will not do to ask protection on account of ignorance, when a very small amount of inquiry would have given all necessary information. Raftery, in the opinion of the court, had reasonable cause to believe McDonough to be insolvent at the time of the transfer under consideration. To make the transaction void, it must also be done by the debtor with a view to give a preference. McDonough certainly knew his own condition of insolvency. His acts of satisfying the Raftery note in the trade, and afterwards distributing portions of the proceeds among his St. Joseph creditors exclusively, too plainly indicate his intention in the matter to admit of doubt.

The court is asked that, should the judgment be unfavorable to defendant, he be allowed, by way of reduction, whatever amount was paid by McDonough out of the proceeds of sale to creditors, or, at least, so much thereof as they ratably would have been entitled to on an equal distribution of the estate. The equitable view underlying this argument cannot be made available in this proceeding, for the direction of the law is that the transfer shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property or the value thereof from the person receiving or to be benefited by it. There is also the further objection that it would permit the debtor to make the distribution of his estate, a matter which the bankrupt law prohibits. The question whether those who have received payments should refund, and to whom, the court does not undertake to decide, it being outside of the case.

It may not be improper here to remark that neither local inclinations nor the employment of the process of state courts are longer successfully to be employed to thwart or defeat the equal distribution of an insolvent debtor's estate among all his creditors, regardless of their locality.

The conclusions the court has arrived at are, that McDonough, at the time of the transfer, was insolvent; that a liability from him to Raftery existed, and that he made the transfer with a view to prefer Raftery; and instead of the provisions of the bankrupt law. The value of the goods is shown by the appraisement of Raftery, and other evidence, to be at least four thousand five hundred and ninety-two dollars and five cents, and judgment will be rendered against him for that amount with costs.

BANKRUPTCY—COMPOSITION MEETING — MISTAKES —SECOND MEETING.

As a general rule a bankrupt should abide by the decision of a composition meeting duly held; but if it clearly appears that the object of the meeting failed by reason of the mistakes or misinstructions of attorneys for creditors, the court may order a second meeting.

McClellan & Hodges, for petitioners.
T. S. McClelland, for respondents.

BLODGETT, District Judge. Upon the application of the debtors, an order was made in this case calling a meeting of their creditors, to be held before one of the registers of the court, on the 26th day of August last, for the purpose of considering and acting upon a proposition for a composition. The register reported that the meeting was duly held; that the debtors were in attendance and submitted their proposition to pay thirty cents on the dollar in full satisfaction and discharge of their debts; that the creditors in attendance, represented by their attorneys, were twelve in number, three of whom voted in favor of accepting said proposition, and nine, by their attorneys, voted against accepting the same. The debtors now apply for another meeting, and state in substance, by their petition, that the attorneys who represented the creditors voting against said proposition at said first meeting, did not understand the wishes of their clients, and had not so fully investigated the affairs of the debtors as to be properly advised in the premises. It also appears from the statements of the attorneys who represented said dissenting creditors at said meeting, that certain members of their respective firms had had the matter of this proposed composition specially in charge and were fully informed of the facts, and had determined to vote in favor of the debtors' proposition, but that said members of the attorneys' firms were out of the city at the time the meeting was held, and the partners who attended and represented said creditors, not finding among their papers any instructions from their clients or absent partners, voted pro forma against the proposition.

As a general rule, I think that when a debtor has had a meeting of his creditors duly called and held, and has had his proposition for a settlement duly considered and passed upon, he should abide by the decision then had, and not be permitted to annoy creditors by requiring their attendance at further meetings. But in this case it clearly appears that the object of the meeting failed, by reason of the failure to properly instruct the attorneys who represented the dissenting creditors, and I shall therefore direct another meeting to be called for the purpose of again considering and acting upon the debtors' offer for a composition.

While, as I said before, I would not allow a practice which would vex creditors with meetings after they had intelligently acted upon a debtor's offer, yet I think the court should afford all proper facilities for correcting mistakes, or enabling the parties most interested to carry out their wishes in the premises. Here both the debtor and the dissenting creditors are willing a second meeting should be called, and I can see no valid reason why it should not be done.

McDOWELL v. BLACKSTONE CANAL CO.

[5 Mason, 11.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1827.

PAYMENT—SEVERAL CONTRACTS — ON ACCOUNT—HOW APPLIED.

Advances made on account generally, for work done under several distinct contracts, some of which have not been completed, must be applied in the first place to the extinguishment of the amounts due on the contracts which have been completed, and not of those which have not been completed.

[Cited in Gass v. Stinson, Case No. 5,262.]
[Cited in Early v. Flannery, 47 Vt. 256.]

Assumpsit on several counts. (1.) On a special agreement for excavating and embanking sections Nos. 11 and 12 of the Blackstone canal, at 10 cents per cubic yard for excavation, &c. &c. (2.) For labour and services generally. (3.) For work and labour by a person as agent of the plaintiff [John McDowell]. There were several other counts, which the plaintiff discontinued before the trial. Plea, the general issue.

At the trial it appeared in evidence, that sundry sums of money had been advanced, from time to time, by the canal company to the plaintiff, for which he had given receipts, acknowledging the same to be advances on account generally. It also appeared in evidence, that the plaintiff had entered into several distinct contracts for the excavation &c. of several sections of the canal, in Nos. 11 and 12, and No. 14. The two former contracts had been completed; but No. 14 had never been completed by the plaintiff. The advances made exceeded the sums due for the contracts for the excavation &c. of Nos. 11 and 12, if they were applied to that purpose. The work on No. 14 was going on in connexion with the other work between December, 1825, and March, 1826, when part of the advances were made. No. 14 however was left by the workmen unfinished, and they abandoned the completion of that contract. The principal question was in what manner the payments by way of advance were to be applied.

Mr. Randall, for plaintiff.
Mr. Whipple, for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. It is the opinion of the court, that the advances being made on general account, and being so stated in the receipts, are to be applied in the first place to extinguish the amounts due upon the contracts which have been completed, and upon which alone the plaintiff has entitled himself to receive payment. They therefore go to discharge the amounts due for the completion of the contracts for the excavation and embankment of sections Nos. 11 and 12. But the work and labour upon section No. 14 was done under an entirely new and distinct contract, and that contract has never been fulfilled by the plaintiff so as to entitle him to any payment. On the contrary, his workmen have abandoned the job and run away. The advances therefore cannot be applied by the plaintiff in part payment of this contract, though made between December, 1825, and March, 1826, while the whole work on all the sections, Nos. 11, 12 and 14, was going on, for the decisive reason, that no man has a right to apply advances to a contract, when he has no claim to any money as earned under that contract. The money advanced is more than sufficient to pay all that is due, under the contracts for sections Nos. 11 and 12; and therefore we think it must be so applied in point of law, and the plaintiff, not having sued on the contract for section No. 14, is not entitled to recover in this action. Indeed it appears, that No. 14 has been since finished by other persons, upon a new contract with the corporation, at an extraordinary expense.

The plaintiff submitted to a discontinuance.

BANKRUPTCY—NOTARIES—ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF CREDITOR.

Notaries public have authority to take the acknowledgment of creditors to their powers of attorney.

Question certified by Mr. Register Fessenden. Can notaries public lawfully take the acknowledgment of creditors to their powers of attorney relative to bankrupt proceedings?

FOX, District Judge. Upon this question there is a conflict of authority, the later opinion being that of Brown, J., in Re Butterfield, [Case No. 2,248], sustaining such an acknowledgment. This opinion meets with my approval; but in order that there shall be an uniformity of practice in the first circuit, I have conferred with Mr. Justice Clifford, and am authorized to say that he concurs with Judge Brown. The power of attorney is accepted and ordered to be filed.

McELHENNY v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF ASHLAND.

[7 Wkly. Notes Cas. 115.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April 26, 1879.

EQUITY—PRACTICE—COSTS OF MASTER—BY WHOM PAID—JURISDICTION — CONFLICT — JUDICIARY—EXECUTION — PAYMENT BEFORE RELIEF GRANTED.

1. The United States circuit court, having appointed a master to investigate the affairs of a national bank, defendant in a creditor's bill in equity filed for discovery and other appropriate relief, upon allegations of fraud by the officers of the corporation, has jurisdiction of the suit after the subsequent appointment of a receiver by the comptroller of the United States government.

2. Master's costs ordered in such a case to be paid by the receiver of the bank, his services having been beneficial to the corporation.

Rule to show cause why the costs of the master should not be paid by the defendants. The facts were these: On the 15th of January, 1878, the complainants filed a bill in equity on behalf of themselves, as well as of other creditors who should come in, against the First National Bank of Ashland, Robert Gorrell and William Torrey, and the directors of the bank, alleging that they were holders of stock in the bank defendant of which Gorrell was president, and Torrey the cashier; that the defendants Gorrell and Torrey had grossly mismanaged the affairs of the bank, had fraudulently appropriated certain of its assets to their own private uses, and were still directing its affairs in an improper and fraudulent manner; that in July, 1877, the bank had gone into voluntary liquidation, and had closed its affairs with the comptroller of the currency, by depositing legal tender notes to the extent of its outstanding circulation and withdrawing the government bonds given to secure the same. The bill also alleged that the bank was still indebted to its depositors alone in about $30,000, and prayed discovery, a receiver, an account, and an injunction restraining the defendants, Torrey and Gorrell, from interfering with, or in any way disposing of the assets. Answers were filed by the defendants, and on a motion for the appointment of a receiver the court (Cadwalader, J.) appointed John P. Hobart, Esq., as master, to investigate the affairs of the bank, and report its condition to the court; to ascertain what, if any, material errors or omissions had occurred in the report of the examiner, already appointed by the comptroller of the currency, and for this purpose directed that he should have access to the books and papers of the bank. Subsequently to the appointment of this special master, a receiver of the bank was appointed by the comptroller of the currency, whereupon he was made by amendment a party defendant to the bill. A lengthy report of the condition of the bank was subsequently filed by the master, and his charges in the matter, including the expenses of an expert accountant employed by him, amounted to several hundred dollars. The bill was still pending, and no relief other than the discovery mentioned had been decreed. A rule was first taken by him upon the plaintiffs to show cause why they should not at that stage of the case, pay his costs. This rule was discharged upon depositions showing the poverty of the plaintiffs, that the master's services had been beneficial to all the stockholders, and that in consequence of the investigation set on foot by this bill, there had been a thorough overhauling of the affairs of the bank by the receiver, appointed by the United States comptroller, which had resulted in the recovery of large sums of money by the receiver. Thereupon the master took this rule upon the defendants to show cause why these costs should not be paid out of the assets of the bank in the hands of the receiver.

A. Sydney Biddle and Hughes & Farquhar, for the rule.

It will be argued that this court has no jurisdiction since the appointment by the comptroller of a receiver, and that the payment of these costs is on that account beyond the control of this court. No objection is made to the amount, but it is said that, as the case is substantially at an end, the plaintiffs are to pay the costs. We admit that no further proceedings are likely, as, though the bill is still pending, the relief sought for is being administered by the receiver, who is, in a proper way, winding up the bank's affairs. But the services were beneficial to him, and the relief we wanted, i. e. discovery, was decreed us. The plaintiffs do not care to take the bank's affairs out of the hands of the present receiver, though the court could doubtless, in its discretion, do so, having obtained jurisdiction of the bank's affairs, through this bill, before that of the government accrued by the appointment of its receiver, which was subsequent to the filing of the bill. See as to this: Bank of Bethel v. Pahquioque Bank, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 383; Case v. Terrell, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 203; Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 505.

THE COURT now called upon George R. Kaercher and Charles M. Swain, contra.

These costs should be paid by the complainant, as it was upon their application that the master was appointed, and he discovered nothing more than what the examiner previously appointed by the comptroller of the currency had already reported. If any of the defendants are to be charged with the costs it should be Torrey and Gorrell, whose acts in the matter made the investigation necessary. The comptroller of the currency has sole jurisdiction of the matter, and when a receiver had been appointed by him, the jurisdiction of the court ceased.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. Do you admit the propriety of the amount of the charge?

Yes, but we are not bound to pay it.

BUTLER, District Judge. Were not these services beneficial to the operation in enabling the receiver to get in the assets with greater ease? Did not the bank directly benefit by them?

We admit that. But this court has no jurisdiction. The compensation is wholly within the receiver's discretion, since his appointment by the executive of the government.

Eo die. Rule absolute.

RAILWAY TARIFF ACT OF MINNESOTA—INSTRUCTIONS TO RECEIVER.

1. Directions of the court to its receiver in possession of and operating the Southern Minnesota Railroad, in respect to conforming to the state statute regulating freight and passenger tariffs.

[Cited in La Crosse Railroad Bridge, Case No. 7,969.]

2. Petition of a shipper, whom the receiver had charged more than the statutory rate, to be allowed to sue the receiver in this court in respect of such excess, granted.

The Southern Minnesota Railroad Company is in the hands of a receiver, appointed by this court, November 7th, 1872, upon the bill of complaint of Samuel B. Ruggles and Albon P. Mann, trustees, to foreclose certain mortgages executed to them in trust to secure the payment of its bonds. The reasons for the appointment of a receiver are given in the opinion of Nelson, J., which will be found reported at length in the Internal Revenue Record for 1873 (page 29), and in the Chicago Legal News, 1872. The bill is still pending in this court. On March 6th, 1871, the legislature of the state of Minnesota passed an act prescribing the maximum rates which railway companies in the state may charge for carrying freights and passengers therein. [Laws Minn. 1871, p. 61.] This act has been held constitutional by the supreme court of the state. At the June term, 1873, the receiver presented a petition to the court, praying, among other things, for instructions in regard to the rates of transportation to be charged, under the act of the legislature of 1871. At the same time a petition was presented from J. C. Easton, a heavy shipper over the company's line of road, asking permission to sue the receiver for over-charges of freight under that act. Affidavits of Mr. Drake and Mr. Thompson, showing the practical effect of the act of 1871, were submitted to the court.

H. J. Horn and Gordon E. Cole, for trustees.
Geo. L. Otis, for receiver
Mr. Heard, for Mr. Easton.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and NELSON, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The Southern Minnesota Railroad Company is in the hands of a receiver, appointed by this court, in a proceeding by the trustees of its bondholders, to foreclose the first and second mortgages for near five million of dollars on the property and franchises of the railroad company.

The suit cannot be determined at this term, and the receiver, two days since, made application to the court for directions as to his duty in operating the road to conform to the statute of the state, of March 6, 1871, regulating the tariff of prices or rates to be charged for the transportation of freight and passengers on all railroads within the state. This statute fixes maximum rates which may be charged, and prohibits, under penalties, the taking of any greater rates. It appears by affidavits on file that none of the railroad companies in the state have obeyed the statute, and that they place their refusal to conform to it on the ground that it is an unconstitutional invasion of their chartered rights. It is contended to be unconstitutional in two respects: 1st. Because it is wholly beyond the legislative power (the right not having been reserved when the charters were granted) to prescribe the compensation which the companies shall charge for the services they render. 2d. Because, if the legislature has the power to prevent discrimination against the public, it has no power unjustly to discriminate against the companies, and require them to render services for an inadequate compensation; and in support of this position affidavits are filed to show that the tariff or schedule of prices fixed by the state statute does discriminate against certain productions and localities in favor of others, and in many instances requires services to be performed at much less than the actual cost to the company.

If Mr. Drake is not mistaken as to the practical effect of the act of March 6, 1871, it would seem that the act was not very carefully considered, but the courts cannot of course overthrow a statute because it may be unreasonable, but only because it is unconstitutional. And in respect to the Southern Minnesota Railroad Company, a showing is made that if the receiver shall conform to the statute throughout it will have the effect to reduce the earnings of the road (which are already insufficient to pay the running expenses and interest on its bonded debt) $150,000 per annum. It is, indeed, stated as the opinion of the receiver, that the receipts, under the tariff fixed by the state, would be insufficient to maintain the road in repair and pay operating expenses.

It is shown to us that quite recently the supreme court of the state has sustained the validity of this state legislation, at least to the extent to which the question of its validity was before it for its decision; and that an appeal from its judgment is being prosecuted without delay to the supreme court of the United States. At the same time that the receiver applied for instructions, one J. C. Easton presented his petition to the court for its permission to sue the receiver to recover freight charges paid in excess of the rates allowed by the statute of 1871.

These two applications are before us for disposition. The petition of Easton for leave to sue the receiver is of easy disposition, and the requisite leave is granted, and the parties advised to make, if possible, an agreed case, so that an early determination can be had. The other petition presents difficulties which have not a little embarrassed us, since what ought to be done by the receiver depends upon the question of the constitutional validity of the railroad tariff statute of the state. The court will hesitate before pursuing or sanctioning a course which will bring it in antagonism to the public policy of the state; and if the only question involved was whether the state legislation infringed some peculiar provision of the constitution of the state, we should regard it our duty freely to accept as correct and final the authoritative determination of the supreme court of the state. But evidently here the main question is whether this legislation infringes rights of the companies which are under the protection of the constitution of the United States.

The federal constitution protects all contracts from legislative or judicial invasion on the part of the states, and legislative charters are contracts within the meaning of the constitution; and the question is whether this legislation does invade chartered rights of the companies. This is a federal question, one whose ultimate solution and final settlement rests, and rests alone, with the supreme court of the United States. Upon such a question the decisions of the state courts have a persuasive or argumentative, but no binding or authoritative, force.

In the short time which has elapsed since that question was presented, the court has had no opportunity for its investigation, nor will it have the requisite time before it adjourns. It does not desire in an informal way to prejudge the momentous question here involved.

It is evident that a direction to the receiver to conform in all things to the statute of the state would very injuriously affect the creditors of this company, which is already insolvent, and from such a direction no appeal would lay, nor could any relief be had if it were erroneous. On the other hand, if no direction is made, and if the receiver shall continue the same course hitherto pursued, all the funds will be in the hands of the court, and the court will be open to allow parties aggrieved by the charges to apply to sue the receiver, or have the excess beyond the statute rate refunded.

For the present, therefore, until the question shall be decided by the supreme court of the United States, or until it shall have been decided by us in the regular way, in the case which we have authorized to be brought against the receiver, or in some other case, or until we shall have had opportunity to investigate the question with the aid of arguments, we make no further order. We decline to order the receiver to disregard the state law, but we do not make, at present, any more peremptory order than the one above indicated. We add that there is always a presumption in favor of the validity of an act of the legislature, and that the receiver would be well justified, until further order, in following the state statute, in all instances where the rates fixed by it were reasonable and fairly compensatory to the company. The receiver will form fair and impartial judgments in this matter, and if, while the subject remains before us for further consideration, he is of opinion that the rates fixed by the statute are unjust, and that they are unreasonably low and will not compensate for the services required, he is at liberty to act in such cases, for the time being, under the direction and advice of the trustees, who are the parties having the most at stake in this matter. It must not be implied that we have any fixed opinion or impression that there is any middle ground between the absolute right of the companies on the one hand to fix their own compensation, and the absolute right, on the other, of the legislature to prescribe their compensation. But fair and just rates while the matter is sub judice will actually injure no one, and as the court has control of the funds in the hands of the receiver, and the power, as it will have the inclination, to restore any moneys which may turn out to have been improperly received, the course above indicated seems to be the best practicable temporary disposition of the receiver's petition. A final determination of the question will not be unnecessarily delayed, and when reached the directions to the receiver will be made to conform to it.

Upon the foregoing announcement being made, the trustees for the bondholders stated that an agreed case was about being made to be submitted at this term, to test the validity of the act of March 6, 1871.

McELRATH v. McINTOSH et al.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 559;[1] 11 Law Rep. 399; 1 Hayw. & H. 348.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. 21, 1848.

GOVERNMENT OFFICERS—POWER OF COURTS TO ENJOIN—MINISTERIAL ACT.

The courts of the United States have no authority to enjoin the officers of the government against performing any merely ministerial act, nor will a mandamus lie to the head of an executive department to compel the performance of an act not merely ministerial, but involving the exercise of judgment.

[Cited in Ex parte Reeside, Case No. 11,656.]

This was a bill for an injunction to prevent Betsey McIntosh from receiving, and the secretary of the treasury and the second comptroller from paying, to her more than one half of her claim of $7,680, awarded to her under the Cherokee treaties of 1817 and 1819. The parties were Hugh D. McElrath, complainant, and Betsey McIntosh, of the Cherokee Nation, residing in the Indian Territory west of the Mississippi, John H. Eaton, of Washington, D. C., and the secretary and second comptroller of the United States treasury department. The bill stated in substance that the respondent, Betsy McIntosh, a white woman, born within the United States, removed to and dwelt in the Cherokee Nation of Indians, where they were residing east of the river Mississippi, and became the head of an Indian family, and thereby became entitled under the treaties of 1817 and 1819, between the United States and the Cherokee Nation of Indians, to a reservation of six hundred and forty acres of land, including her buildings and improvements, by electing to remain in the United States and become a citizen thereof, and by filing her name accordingly in the office of the Cherokee agent of the United States in due form, as required by the eighth article of the said treaty of 1817. And afterwards, under the treaty of the 29th of December, 1835, concluded at New Echota, and the supplementary articles of 1st March, 1836, she removed with the Cherokees to their country west of the river Mississippi, on Arkansas and White rivers, and became entitled to compensation in money for her reservation of six hundred and forty acres of land and improvements, to be adjudicated by commissioners appointed by the United States, according to the seventeenth article of the said treaty of New Echota; whose award in favor of the claimants is, by the said treaty, declared final against the United States, and to be paid to the several and respective claimants, upon the certificate of the commissioners of the amount due to the several claimants. ing which, in January, 1845, she had received nothing for her reservation of six hundred and forty acres of land and improvements thereon, and she then employed the complainant, McElrath, to attend to and prosecute her claim, and engaged to pay him a commission of one half of whatever sum might be awarded to her, and accordingly executed a power of attorney to him on the 9th of January, 1845.

[Whereas by the treaties of 1817 and 1819, made and concluded between the United States and the Cherokee tribe of Indians, a reservation of 640 acres of land was reserved to Betsey McIntosh. Now, to the end that the said right may be prosecuted and ascertained before a proper tribunal, I do hereby authorize and empower H. D. McElrath my attorney in fact, for me and on my behalf, to cause said claim to be fairly prosecuted, whether before the Cherokee commissioners, congress, the judicial tribunals, or other department of government as to my attorney may appear fit and proper, and for him to do in the premises whatever and all things I, if present, could do and perform, intending and hereby giving full ratification to all his acts, without the future right of revocation being reserved or retained, revoking and making void all former powers of attorney by me made; and as compensation herewith attached and connected for the labor and services of my said attorney and expense of engaging suitable legal counsel (such as he may think fit) it is agreed and covenanted that he shall receive and be paid one-half of what may ultimately be recovered. The power, also, of substituting any other attorney in fact by him deemed necessary is fully authorized.

[Witness:. G. W. Morgan, Wm. S. Holt.][2]

This power was duly acknowledged and certified. The bill further stated that the complainant, by virtue of the authority contained in that power to employ an attorney under him to prosecute the claim, employed the defendant, John H. Eaton, and agreed to give him for his services and agency in the matter one half of the compensation which the defendant, Betsey, had stipulated to give to the complainant, and to that end and effect executed and delivered to the defendant, Eaton, a writing and power. The bill further alleged that by the agency of the complainant and the defendant, Eaton, an award was made by the board of commissioners, on the ——— day of May, 1847, in favor of the defendant, Betsey, for the sum of $7,680, and duly certified by the said commissioners, whereby the complainant and said Eaton became entitled to one half of said sum. That when the certificate of the commissioners was first presented for payment, the second comptroller refused to pay, pretending that the appropriations which had been made by congress for carrying into effect the treaty of New Echota did not embrace Betsey McIntosh's case; and therefore the complainant's attorney, J. H. Eaton, applied to congress, who passed the resolution approved 14th March, 1848, in her favor. That upon presentation of the certificate of the commissioners in favor of the defendant, Betsey, her power of attorney and contract therein contained, and the power given by the complainant to Eaton, the second auditor of the treasury, issued a certificate in favor of the said Eaton for $3,840, being one half the award in favor of the defendant, Betsey; but when that was presented to the second comptroller of the treasury he refused to approve and certify it, and yet continues to refuse, under the pretext that a general order made by the secretary of war in October, 1846, (Exhibit B.), inhibits any money being paid under this power of attorney, and so the complainant is obstructed from receiving as the attorney of the defendant, Betsey, either the whole sum due to her, or his part thereof, and the secretary of the treasury refuses to cause the said certificate to be paid, notwithstanding the appropriation for that purpose remains unexpended. That the power of attorney to the complainants was coupled with an interest, and cannot be revoked by the said Betsey, nor abrogated, nor impaired by the executive officers of the government, nor even by the congress of the United States. That Betsey McIntosh is a white woman, a native citizen of the United States, although residing in the Cherokee country, and therefore not within the order of the secretary of war, which contains the following clause: "Should any Indian or Indians, however, notwithstanding the above determination [to discountenance the practice of obtaining powers of attorney from Indians], persist in giving powers of attorney, no part of the sum which may be recovered thereupon will be paid to the persons holding them, except such an amount as, under the circumstances of the case, may appear to the department to be a fair and just compensation for their trouble and expense. The remainder will, in all cases, be remitted to the agent or sub-agent for payment to the Indian claimant in person."

The bill further stated that the secretary of war had thought fit to make his own valuation of the services of the defendant, Eaton, as the agent and attorney of the defendant, Betsey, and upon his valuation of those services had caused to be paid to the defendant, Eaton, as the attorney of the said Betsey, between one and two thousand dollars, which he received, not in full for his services, but only because the department would pay no more, and therefore he was unwillingly compelled to receive a part only. That application had been made to the defendant, Betsey, to renew or re-execute the power of attorney to the complainant, or to execute a power to the complainant to receive at the treasury of the United States his part of the sum contracted to be allowed to him, and now due to him and to the attorney, J. H. Eaton, which the defendant, Betsey, has declined to do. That the power of attorney, and the agreement and stipulations therein, were given by the defendant, Betsey, and received by the complainant with the intention that they should create, and under the belief that they did create, a specific lien, security, and assignment of one half of the demand of the said Betsey, and of one half of the money which should be allowed her by the United States for her reservation of land; and the complainant positively avers that without such security he would not have adventured his time, money, and services for the said Betsey, who resided with the Cherokee Indians in the far West, had but very little property except her said claim, and that property, so in her possession and visible, was not to be reached by any compulsory process from any court, state or federal, of the United States; that it was well understood by the defendant, Betsey, that the complainant would not undertake to prosecute her claim solely upon her personal responsibility for compensation, but required the lien and security by the specific authority to receive the money; that is, half of the money which should be allowed her for her reservation claim.

The bill prayed that Betsey McIntosh, John H. Eaton, Robert J. Walker, secretary of the treasury, and Albion K. Parris, the second comptroller, may be made parties, and that Betsey McIntosh might be enjoined from receiving out of the treasury of the United States any more than one half of the said certificate so allowed by the commissioner appointed under article 17 of the treaty of New Echota, until the matters of the bill shall be finally heard and decreed; and that the secretary of the treasury and second comptroller be enjoined from paying, or causing or allowing to be paid, unto the said Betsey McIntosh, the sum of $3,840, less by the sum which has been paid to the defendant, John H. Eaton, etc.

[3] [Upon filing the bill, Geo. M. Bibb, for complainant, moved for an injunction as prayed in the bill, and contended:

[1st. That the power of attorney from Betsey McIntosh to McElrath, being coupled with an interest, is an assignment of one-half of her claim, and was a contract which the United States ought to recognize. That as to one-half of the claim, it was money received by the United States for the use of the complainant. It was his money held by them in trust for him.

[2d. That it was a specific lien which followed the fund into the hands of the United States.

[3d. That the secretary of war had no authority to make the rule respecting the payment of money to the attorney of Indians, who have a right to appoint their own attorney. That the power was given before the order of October 1, 1846, and could not be controlled by it.

[4th. That Betsey McIntosh is a white woman, not an Indian, and that she is, therefore, not within the terms of the order.

[5th. That this court has jurisdiction to compel an executive officer of the government to perform any act which it is his duty to perform, if it be merely a ministerial act, not an executive act appertaining to the duties of his office as an executive officer; and that the act of paying this money to the complainant is a purely ministerial act which the official character of the defendant will not exempt him from the duty of performing.

[Ransom H. Gillett, solicitor of the treasury, for the defendants, the officers of the government.

[In the case before the court, the question is simply this: the executive branch of the government has decided that the faithful execution of the law requires that the money appropriated for this claim shall be paid directly to Betsey McIntosh and not to the claimant under the power of attorney; and this court is asked to grant an order prohibiting such payment. The power and jurisdiction of the court over the matter are denied in toto.

[1. This court has no jurisdiction beyond what has been conferred upon it by statute. These statutes are the 13th and 14th sections of the judiciary act (1 Stat. 80–82), the 11th section of judiciary act of Feb. 13, 1801 (2 Stat. 98), so far as that section is not repealed; the 1st, 3d and 5th sections of the act of February 27, 1801 (2 Stat. 103, 105, 106), establishing this court. See 1 Kent, Comm. (6th Ed.) *339, and cases there cited; U. S. v. Coolidge [Case No. 14,857]; U. S. v. Worrall [Id. 16,766].

[2. The writs expressly authorized by the judiciary acts are such, and only such, as are necessary to carry out the jurisdiction conferred upon the court by those statutes agreeable to the principles and usages of law. McIntire v. Wood, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 504; Smith v. Jackson [Case No. 13,064]; McClung v. Silliman, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 598; 1 Kent, Comm. 322; Bouv. Law Dict. tit. "Mandamus," and cases there cited.

[3. The writs specified in the judiciary act can only apply to cases in which the court has jurisdiction over the party or the subject matter of the suit, so that the court can punish the party for disobedience, or change the title to the subject matter of the suit by judicial proceedings. This court has no jurisdiction over Betsey McIntosh in the Indian country, nor over the United States as a corporation, nor the money in the treasury, and therefore has no authority to act upon or control either. See, also, Act Feb. 28, 1839, § 1 (5 Stat. 321), where provision is made concerning absent defendants.

[4. There is no authority in law for a plaintiff to make the United States a party defendant in a suit, or to attach or control their moneys in the treasury, either directly or indirectly. Naming an officer of the treasury in the process, and serving it upon him, will not affect the United States nor their money in the treasury. McKim v. Odom, 3 Bland, 420–424; Op. Atty. Gen. pp. 507–510, 1066, 1103, 1303, 1304, 1425.

[5. The common law of Maryland, even if now in force in this district under the act for organizing the District of Columbia (2 Stat. 104), does not extend the jurisdiction of this court over the executive officers of the government as such; for the laws of Maryland in force at the time of the passage of that act did not authorize their courts to issue writs of injunctions or mandamus against an executive officer of that state, or an officer of the general government. No case of that kind has been cited, and none can be found. By the act of July 15th, 1790, the seat of the national government was transferred to this district on the first Monday in December, 1800. By the 1st section of the act the operation of "the laws of the state within said district shall not be affected by this acceptance until the time fixed for the removal thereof, and until congress shall otherwise provide." The laws of Maryland at the time of the acts of July 16, 1790, and February 27, 1801, contained no provision or authority giving any court in that state jurisdiction over the officers of the executive departments of the federal government. If the courts of that state could not then have exercised such jurisdiction, then no court can now do it, the powers of the courts not having increased. If the supreme or other high court of Maryland had the power claimed, it does not follow that such power is delegated to this court, because it is not provided that this court is clothed with the same power. We may as well say that the first section of District of Columbia act transferred her highest courts here, as to affirm that the jurisdiction was transferred to this court when neither is provided.

[6. Even if the courts have jurisdiction over the officer in any case, such jurisdiction only extends to cases of a ministerial, and not to those of an executive character. The acts which the complainant wishes performed are of an executive character, and therefore this court has no jurisdiction. Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 524; McIntyre v. Wood, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 504; McClung v. Silliman, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 598; Decatur v. Paulding, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 497; 1 Bland, 186–189, 584, in note; Bordley v. Lloyd, 1 Har. & McH. 27; Ellicott v. Levy Court, 1 Har. & J. 359; Runkel v. Winemiller, 4 Har. & McH. 429; Howard v. Levy Court, 1 Har. & J. 558; Williamson v. Carman, 1 Gill & J. 184; McKim v. Odom, 3 Bland, 407; Dig. Md. 1847, tit. "Mandamus," 706, 707; Brashears v. Mason, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 92, 100–102. Ministerial acts are those which are specifically directed by a superior power to be performed by an inferior, in relation to which such subordinate ministerial officer is required to exercise no discretion or judgment. He must literally obey the command and perform the act directed. Executive acts are those which involve discretion or judgment in determining whether the duty exists and whether the law and the usual and appropriate forms have been complied with, and these are acts which are performed by public officers in executing the laws in the ordinary routine of the business of the government. Decatur v. Paulding, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 497; Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 524. By the act of July 9, 1832 (4 Stat. 564) § 1, and that of June 30, 1834 (4 Stat. 735), the president is authorized to make rules and regulations for carrying into effect all laws relating to the Indian affairs, including accounts. This power he executed through the war department. Williams v. Howard, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 290; Parker v. U. S., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 296; U. S. v. Eliason, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 291; Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 490; Holc. U. S. Dig. 220–222. The act of August 7, 1789 (1 Stat. 49), ordains that the secretary of war shall conduct the business of the department in such manner as the president shall from time to time order and instruct. On the 11th of November, 1836, the secretary of war adopted a regulation by which the commissioner of Indian affairs was directed to rigidly examine all claims and accounts, and when in the exercise of a sound discretion he should be of the opinion that the claim was just, that it should receive his sanction and to be passed to the second auditor for settlement; and when contrary to the regulations or instructions, or in his opinion improper or unjust, that he should withhold his sanction and state his objection for the consideration of the accounting officers; but, in all cases of difficulty depending on discretion or authority, that he should take the direction of the secretary of war. Report of Commissioner of Indian Affairs to congress of December 1, 1837.][3]

[4] [Before the money can be obtained from the treasury upon this claim, the following steps must be taken: (1). It must undergo an administrative examination by the commissioner of Indian affairs, under Gen. Jackson's regulations of November 11th, 1836. (2). It must then be examined and settled by the second auditor, under the act of March 4, 1817 (3 Stat. 366), and that of February 24, 1819 (3 Stat. 487, §§ 1, 2). (3). It is then to be re-examined by the second comptroller; and if there is a power of attorney involved in the case, he finally passes upon its validity and effect, and certifies the settlement to the secretary of war, under the act of March 3, 1817 (3 Stat. 367, 368, §§ 9, 15). He decides whether, in his opinion, there is an appropriation out of which the sum due can be paid. The sum allowed is credited on the second auditor's books. (4). The secretary of war on this founds his requisition on the secretary of the treasury. He judges whether it is a proper case to pay, and whether there is an appropriation out of which it may be paid. (5). This requisition is countersigned by the second comptroller, and charged to the appropriation account kept in his office. Act March 3, 1809 (2 Stat. 535). (6). It is then sent to the second auditor, (who acts as his register,) where it is recorded or charged against the person to balance his account. Id. (7). The requisition then goes to the secretary of the treasury, who issues his warrant on it; and the amount is charged on his book of appropriations. He sees that there is an appropriation out of which it can lawfully be paid, and judges whether he can spare the money from the treasury, and whether there are or not other demands upon it, to which good policy and justice require him to give a preference. Act March 3, 1809, § 1 (2 Stat. 535); Act May 7, 1822 (3 Stat. 689); Act Sept. 2, 1789 (1 Stat. 65). (8). It is then taken to the first comptroller, who decides whether there is an appropriation out of which it can be paid, and if so, he charges it to such appropriation, and then countersigns it. Act establishing department of treasury, Sept. 11, 1789 (1 Stat. 66); Act March 3, 1809 (2 Stat. 535). (9) It then goes to the register, who makes the same examination, and if he finds there is such appropriation, he charges that appropriation with it, and countersigns the warrant; and then it is sent to the treasurer. Treasury Act, Sept. 2, 1789, § 6 (1 Stat. 67); Act March 3, 1809, § 1 (2 Stat. 535). (10). If the warrant is in due form, and has the proper signatures showing that all the regulations and forms have been complied with, the treasurer then draws a draft on himself, or an assistant treasurer, and the party receipts it on the face of the warrant. The draft, on being indorsed by the payer, is paid in money. The treasurer never pays to any one but the person named in the warrant. He never judges of power of attorney, but the exercise of his discretion or judgment is confined to the examination of the warrant issued by the secretary of the treasury and the ascertaining whether it conforms to the act of March 3, 1809.][4]

[5][All of the acts of the respective officers through whose hands a claim of this nature has to pass are clearly of an executive nature. None of them can be performed and none declined, without the exercise of the distinguishing characteristic of an executive act; judgment or discretion. Executive officers, appointed by the president, can be controlled in the exercise of their duties only by the president. McClung v. Silliman, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 598; Holc. Dig. p. 571, § 43. The president is beyond the power of any other department except in cases of impeachment. Kendall's Case, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 524; Holc. Dig. p. 221. This necessarily results from the power conferred by article 2, § 3, of the constitution, requiring him to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. And if the president can be controlled in the execution of his duties, directly by the judiciary, it is equally clear that he cannot be reached by proceeding against his subordinates. Were the opposite doctrine to prevail, there would no longer be, what was intended by the framers of the constitution, an independent and distinct executive branch of the government; for all acts required of the president in causing the laws to be faithfully executed, are, of necessity, performed through and by his subordinates. The power contended for would enable this court to control the whole machinery of the government. A pension agent could be compelled to pay on a power of attorney to the exclusion of the pensioner in person, even whether such power was made in conformity to the regulations under which the agent was acting or not. The court could direct to whom the money should be paid under our treaty with Mexico. In time of war it might enjoin against supplying the pay, commissary or quartermaster's department, and direct the payment of a debt to the agent of our adversary, to the extent of the entire means in the treasury. This court might even enjoin the salaries of the justices of the supreme court of the United States, or declare that of the president vested in and payable to one of his creditors. It would require officers to perform acts for which it would be the duty of the president to displace them.

[If it is said that there ought to be some control over the executive in the discharge of the various duties committed to that branch of the government, two answers may be given: (1.) The constitution and laws have created no such tribunal. (2.) Judges appointed for life, and not elected by the people, but beyond their reach, are no better qualified for this duty than the executive, who, once in four years submits his acts to the consideration of his constituents.][5]

Before CRANCH, Chief Judge, and MORSELL and DUNLOP, Circuit Judges.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The first question in natural order is that of jurisdiction. It is, therefore, the first which the court will consider. It is understood, as admitted in argument, that if the act intended to be enjoined be not a merely ministerial act, the court has not jurisdiction to enjoin the officers of the treasury against performing it. This doctrine was first promulgated by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 165, where Marshall, C. J., says: "If some acts be examinable and others not, there must be some rule of law to guide the court in the exercise of its jurisdiction." And in page 166 he says: "Where the heads of departments are the political or confidential agents of the executive merely to execute the will of the president, or rather to act in cases in which the executive possesses no constitutional or legal discretion, nothing can be more perfectly clear than that their acts are only politically examinable." And again, in page 170, he says: "The province of the court is solely to decide on the rights of individuals not to inquire how the executive, or executive officers, perform duties in which they have a discretion. Questions in their nature political, or which are by the constitution and laws submitted to the executive, can never be made in this court." The chief justice then proceeds to show that the act required to be done (the delivery of the commission to Mr. Marbury) was purely a ministerial act, in respect to which the executive had no discretion.

In the case of Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 609, Mr. Justice Thompson, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of the United States, says: "Under the first head of inquiry it has been considered by the counsel on the part of the postmaster-general that this is a proceeding against him to enforce the performance of an official duty, and the proceeding has been treated as an infringement upon the executive department of the government, which has led to a very extensive range of argument upon the independence and duties of that department; but which, according to the view taken by the court of the case, is entirely misapplied. We do not think that the proceedings in this case interfere in any respect whatever with the rights or duties of the executive, or that it involves any conflict of powers between the executive and judicial departments of the government. The mandamus does not seek to direct or control the postmaster-general in the discharge of any official duty, partaking in any respect of an executive character; but to enforce the performance of a mere ministerial act, which neither he nor the president had any authority to deny or control." Again he says: "The executive power is vested in a president; and as far as his powers are derived from the constitution, he is beyond the reach of any other department, except in the mode prescribed by the constitution through the impeaching power. But it by no means follows that every officer in every branch of that department is under the exclusive direction of the president. Such a principle, we apprehend, is not and certainly cannot be claimed by the president. There are certain political duties imposed upon many officers of the executive department, the discharge of which is under the direction of the president. But it would be an alarming doctrine that congress cannot impose upon any executive officer any duty they may think proper, which is not repugnant to any rights secured and protected by the constitution; and in such cases the duty and the responsibility grow out of, and are subject to, the control of the law, and not to the direction of the president. And this is emphatically the case where the duty enjoined is of a mere ministerial character. Let us proceed, then," he says, "to an examination of the act required by the mandamus to be performed by the postmaster-general; and his obligation to perform, or his right to resist the performance, must depend upon the act of congress of the 2d of July, 1836. This is a special act for the relief of the relators, Stockton and Stokes, and was passed, as appears on its face, to adjust and settle certain claims which they had for extra services, as contractors for carrying the mail. These claims were, of course, upon the United States, through the postmaster-general. The real parties to the dispute were, therefore, the relators and the United States. The United States could not, of course, be sued, or the claims in any way enforced against the United States, without their consent, obtained through an act of congress, by which they consented to submit these claims to the solicitor of the treasury to inquire into the equity of the claims, and to make such allowance therefor as, upon a full examination of all the evidence, should seem right according to the principles of equity; and the act directs the postmaster-general to credit the relators with whatever sum, if any, the solicitor shall decide to be due to them, for or on account of any such services or contract." Again (page 611), the court say: "Under this law the postmaster-general is vested with no discretion or control over the decisions of the solicitor; nor is any appeal or review of that decision provided for by the act. The terms of the submission was a matter entirely in the discretion of congress, and if they thought proper to vest such a power in any one, and especially as the arbitrator was an officer of the government, it did not rest with the postmaster-general to control congress or the solicitor in that affair." Again (page 613), the court say: "The act required by the law to be done by the postmaster-general is simply to credit the relators with the full amount of the award of the solicitor. This is a precise, definite act, purely ministerial, and about which the postmaster-general had no discretion whatever. The law, upon its face, shows the existence of accounts between the relators and the postoffice department. No money was required to be paid, and none could have been drawn out of the treasury without further legislative provision, if this credit should overbalance the debit standing against the relators. But this was a matter with which the postmaster-general had no concern. He was not called upon to furnish the means of paying such balance, if any should be found. He was simply required to give the credit. This was not an official act in any other sense than being a transaction in the department where the books and accounts were kept; and was an official act in the same sense that an entry in the minutes of a court, pursuant to an order of the court, is an official act. There is no room for the exercise of any discretion, official or otherwise; all that is shut out by the direct and positive command of the law, and the act required to be done is, in any just sense, a mere ministerial act."

But the case now before the circuit court of the District of Columbia is very different from that of Stockton & Stokes. This is an application upon a bill in equity filed for an injunction to inhibit the secretary of the treasury and the second comptroller from paying to Betsy McIntosh the sum of $3,840, less by the sum which has been paid to the defendant, John H. Eaton, so that, including the sum so already paid to him, the one half of the said certificate in favor of Betsey McIntosh may be held subject to the final decree of this court. This application is founded upon the supposition that this court may, by its final decree, order the secretary of the treasury to pay to the complainant, McElrath, half the amount of the said certificate, including what has been paid to the defendant, Eaton; for if this court cannot make such a final decree, the injunction, if granted, will be vain and nugatory. This, then, is a question of jurisdiction, and depends upon the question whether the payment of this claim by the secretary of the treasury is an official, executive act, or is purely a ministerial act, as in the case of Stockton & Stokes.

The difference between ministerial acts and executive official acts is clearly stated by the supreme court in the case of Decatur v. Paulding, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 514, 515. Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "In the case of Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 524, it was decided in this court that the circuit court for Washington county, in the District of Columbia, has the power to issue a mandamus to an officer of the federal government commanding him to do a ministerial act. The first question, therefore, to be considered in this case is whether the duty imposed upon the secretary of the navy by the resolution in favor of Mrs. Decatur was a mere ministerial act. The duty required by the resolution was to be performed by him as the head of one of the executive departments of the government in the ordinary discharge of his official duties. In general, such duties, whether imposed by act of congress or by resolution, are not mere ministerial duties. The head of an executive department of the government in the administration of the various and important concerns of his office is continually required to exercise judgment and discretion. He must exercise his judgment in expounding the laws and resolutions of congress, under which he is from time to time required to act. The court could not entertain an appeal from the decision of one of the secretaries, nor revise his judgment in any case where the law authorized him to exercise discretion or guide and control his judgment or discretion in the matters committed to his care, in the ordinary discharge of his official duties." Again (page 516), he said: "The interference of the courts with the performance of the ordinary duties of the executive departments of the government would be productive of nothing but mischief; and we are quite satisfied that such a power was never intended to be given to them. The doctrines which this court now hold in relation to the executive departments of the government are the same that were distinctly announced in the case of Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 524." Again (page 516), he said: "We have referred to these passages in the opinion of the court in the case of Kendall v. U. S., in order to show more clearly the distinction taken between a mere ministerial act, required to be done by the head of an executive department, and a duty imposed upon him in his official character as the head of an executive department, in which judgment and discretion are to be exercised. There was in that case a difference of opinion in the court in relation to the power of the circuit court to issue a mandamus. But there was no difference of opinion respecting the act to be done. The court was unanimously of opinion that in its character the act was merely ministerial. In the case before us it is clearly otherwise; and the resolution in favor of Mrs. Decatur imposed a duty on the secretary of the navy, which required the exercise of judgment and discretion; and in such a case the circuit court had no right by mandamus to control his judgments, and guide him in the exercise of a discretion which the law had confided to him."

The same doctrines are affirmed by the supreme court in the case of Brashear v. Mason, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 100, where Mr. Justice Nelson, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "We are also of opinion that if the plaintiff has made out a title to his pay as an officer of the United States navy, a mandamus would not lie in the court below to enforce the payment. The constitution provides that no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. Article 1, § 9. And it is declared by act of congress (3 Stat. 689, § 3), that all moneys appropriated for the use of the war and navy departments shall be drawn from the treasury by warrants of the secretary of the treasury, upon requisitions of the secretaries of these departments, countersigned by the second comptroller." And (in page 101) he says: "In the case of Decatur v. Paulding, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 497, it was held by this court that a mandamus would not lie from the circuit court of this district to the secretary of the navy to compel him to pay to the plaintiff a sum of money claimed to be due her as a pension under a resolution of congress. There was no question as to the amount due, if the plaintiff was properly entitled to the pension; and it was made to appear in that case, affirmatively, on the application, that the pension fund was ample to satisfy the claim. The fund, also, was under the control of the secretary, and the money payable on his own warrant. Still, the court refused to inquire into the merits of the claim of Mrs. Decatur to the pension, or to determine whether it was rightfully withheld or not by the secretary, on the ground that the court below had no jurisdiction over the case, and therefore the question was not properly before this court on the writ of error. The court say that the duty required of the secretary by the resolution was to be performed by him as the head of one of the executive departments of the government in the ordinary discharge of his official duties; that, in general, such duties, whether imposed by act of congress or by resolution, are not mere ministerial duties; that the head of the executive department of the government, in the adminstration of the various and important concerns of his office, is continually required to exercise judgment and discretion; and that the court could not by mandamus act directly upon the officer, and guide and control his judgment or discretion in matters committed to his care in the ordinary discharge of his official duties. The court distinguish the case from Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 524, where there was a mandamus to enforce the performance of a mere ministerial act, not involving on the part of the officer the exercise of any judgment or discretion. The principle of the case of Mrs. Decatur is decisive of the present one. The facts here are much stronger to illustrate the inconvenience and unfitness of the remedy. Besides, the duty of inquiring into and ascertaining the rate of compensation that may be due to the officers, under the laws of congress, no payment can be made unless there has been an appropriation for the purpose; and if made, it may have become already exhausted, or prior requisitions may have been issued sufficient to exhaust it. The secretary is obliged to inquire into the condition of the fund, and the claims already charged upon it, in order to ascertain if there is money enough to pay all the accruing demands; and if not enough, how it shall be apportioned among the persons entitled to it. These are important duties, calling for the exercise of judgment and discretion on the part of the officer, and in which the general creditors of the government (to the payment of whose demands the particular fund is applicable) are interested, as well as the government itself. At most, the secretary is but a trustee of the fund for the benefit of all those who have claims chargeable upon it, and like other trustees is bound to administer it with a view to the rights and interests of all concerned. It will not do to say that the result of the proceeding by the mandamus will show the title of the relator to his pay, the amount, and whether there were any moneys in the treasury applicable to the demand; for upon this ground any creditor of the government would be enabled to enforce his claim against it through the head of the proper department by means of this writ; and the proceeding by mandamus would become as common in the enforcement of demands upon the government as the action of assumpsit is to enforce like demands against individuals."

In the case before this court the secretary of the treasury, in executing the resolution of congress of the 14th March, 1848, was called on by the complainant to pay to him, as assignee of Betsey McIntosh, one half the sum appropriated by that resolution, less the sum already paid to the defendant, J. H. Eaton. The validity and construction of the power of attorney and assignment set up by McElrath, and the applicability and construction of the act of congress of the 29th July, 1846 (chapter 66) entitled "An act in relation to the payment of claims," are necessarily involved in the duty required by the secretary of the treasury to execute the resolution aforesaid of March, 1848. It may be observed, also, that the resolution of the 14th of March, 1848, requires the secretary to pay the money to Betsey McIntosh (herself), not to her executors, administrators, or assigns. That the supposed assignment to McElrath, if it be an assignment, purports to be of only a part of the debt due by the United States, and that the power of attorney to McElrath does not expressly authorize him to receive the money, or any part of it, but purports to be only a power to prosecute the claim to allowance, or judgment; so that, upon these points also, it would be necessary that the secretary, before ordering the payment of the money, should decide whether he could lawfully pay the money to any other person than Betsey McIntosh herself, whether it would not be contrary to the policy of the law, especially in the case of an Indian claim, to pay a part only of the claim, and he must also decide whether the power of attorney was duly executed. These are all acts of executive discretion, in which the secretary has sought the advice and opinion of the attorney-general of the United States, and can in no just sense be said to be mere ministerial acts. In the exercise of this discretion, this court has no right to guide or control the executive officer, or to entertain any appeal from his decision.

Upon these authorities and by these reasons, this court is satisfied that the payment of the claim of Betsey McIntosh is not a mere ministerial act, but is a duty appertaining to the office of secretary of the treasury, in the discharge of which he has a discretion which this court has not jurisdiction to control; and being of that opinion the court deems it unnecessary, as it would be unavailing, to give any opinion upon the other questions which have been raised in argument.

The court, therefore, refuses to grant the injunction prayed for against the secretary, and second comptroller of the treasury.

McELROY v. ENGLISH.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 528.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1824.

SUNDAY—BILLS AND NOTES—DAYS OF GRACE.

If Sunday be the last day of grace on a promissory note, demand on Saturday is not too soon, and notice on Monday is not too late.

Assumpsit against the endorser of a promissory note. The parties all resided in Georgetown. Sunday was the last day of grace. Payment was demanded on Saturday, and notice given to the defendant on the Monday following.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), said the demand was not too soon and the notice not too late.

BANKRUPTCY — PARTNERSHIP — JOINT AND SEPARATE ESTATE—ASSETS EXHAUSTED IN COSTS —PAYMENT PARI PASSU.

1. When a debt from one partner to a bankrupt firm was incurred by the consent or privity of the other partners, proof of the joint creditors against the separate estate will not be admitted in a court of bankruptcy.

[Cited in Re Lloyd, 22 Fed. 91.]

2. When all the assets of a bankrupt firm are expended in the payment of costs, and there is no fund to be divided among the firm creditors, the firm and individual creditors must be paid pari passu out of the separate estate of each partner.

[Cited in Re May, Case No. 9,328; Re Slocum, Id. 12,951; Re Hamilton, 1 Fed. 812; Re West, 39 Fed. 203.]

[Cited in Harris v. Peabody, 73 Me. 270.]

3. The fund applicable to and used in the payments of costs does not constitute a joint estate within the fair meaning of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)].

The assignees filed a petition in the interest of the firm creditors, for the purpose of obtaining the instruction of the court upon the respective rights of the firm creditors of McEwen & Sons, and the individual creditors of William McEwen, one of the members of such firm alleging: 1st, that the firm assets would not more than pay the costs of settling the estate in bankruptcy; 2nd, that William McEwen was indebted to the firm, as appeared by charges upon the books, to an amount exceeding three hundred thousand dollars; that the firm debts amounted to over $200,000, and William's individual indebtedness to over $150,000, and that his separate estate was worth over $200,000, and that his sons, who were his partners, had no more property than enough to pay their private debts; and that the only estate in the hands of assignees for distribution among creditors is the private estate of William McEwen. The individual creditors appear in opposition to the petition, and file a demurrer thereto.

Harrison, Hines & Miller, for assignee.

McDonald, Butler & Harrington, for individual creditors.

HOPKINS, District Judge. The question raised and discussed on the hearing was, whether upon the facts stated, the firm creditors were entitled to participate with the individual creditors in the distribution of the separate estate of William McEwen? In the first place, the assignees claim the right to prove the debt due from William to the firm, and in that way obtain a fund for distribution among firm creditors.

The petition does not show when the entries were made on the firm books, nor when the debt was created, nor does it show that William withdrew that amount, or any part of it, to defraud the firm creditors, or the members of the firm; nor does it show that the transaction was concealed from the firm, nor that it was not with the consent of all the members of the co-partnership. Neither fraud nor collusion of any kind is alleged.

Upon these facts does that balance constitute a debt in favor of the firm against that partner which the assignee of the firm can prove against him individually? I think, according to the authorities, it does not. The rule may now be considered as well settled, that when the debt from one partner to the firm was incurred by the consent or privity of the other partners, that proof of the joint creditors against the separate estate will not be admitted in a court of bankruptcy. If the party acted fraudulently or with a view to augment his separate estate at the expense of the joint creditors, a different rule would prevail. Story, Partn. § 391; Gow, Partn. 316; Ex parte Smith, 1 Glyn & J. 74; Ex parte Harris, 2 Ves. & B. 210; In re Lane [Case No. 8,044].

The principle upon which these cases rest is, I apprehend, that there can be no such thing as a debt between partners, or between an individual partner and his firm, in respect to partnership matters, until it is settled by a final winding up of the affairs of the firm; and bankruptcy courts have declined to go into such accounting upon the question of proof of debts in bankruptcy proceedings. So I must hold that neither the assignees of the firm, nor the firm creditors have a right upon this ground to prove this claim against the private estate of William McEwen.

There is something like an allegation in the petition that the partnership between William McEwen and his sons was a sham, and made simply for the benefit of William, and to enable him to carry on his private speculations. It is doubtful whether this question can be raised at this stage of the case. They have been treated as partners and adjudged to be bankrupts, as such partners, on the petition of the joint creditors. I doubt the right of the joint creditors to now turn around and allege that they were not such in fact; but if this is not so, I do not think the allegation to that effect sufficiently direct and positive to warrant the court in holding the fact to be admitted by the demurrer. It seems to be stated, inferentially, as the conclusion of petitioners from the other facts in the case, instead of an allegation of an existing fact.

This brings me to the consideration of the meaning of section thirty-six of the bankrupt act, and this is altogether the most difficult question in the case. The petition alleges that the firm have no assets after paying costs of settlement of estate to distribute or divide among the firm creditors, which is admitted by the demurrer and must be considered on this hearing as true.

If they have no assets, it has been settled, for this circuit at least, that the firm and individual creditors can be paid pari passu out of the separate estate. In re Knight [Case No. 7,880]. The counsel for the individual creditors contended that the allegation in the petition that the firm effects would not more than pay the costs was immaterial; that the question was, were there any firm assets? that if there were, it was unimportant whether they were to be applied to the payment of the costs or distributed among the firm creditors; that in either case the firm creditors would be excluded from participation in the separate estate of William McEwen until after the payment of his individual creditors in full; and that it was not essential that there should be a fund, exclusive of costs, to effect such result. If such is the meaning of the act, the firm creditors are without remedy, and may lose their whole demand, while the individual creditors of that member may get their pay in full.

The question is by no means free from difficulty. But after a thorough examination of the authorities upon the subject, I have arrived at a conclusion different from that contended for on the argument by the learned counsel for the individual creditors. In Re Kahley [Case No. 7,594], I held that the word "estate," as used in certain other sections, included the portion to be used in the payment of costs, as well as that to be divided among creditors. But the language of the portions of the act then under consideration differ materially from the language used in the thirty-sixth section. That section requires the assignee to "keep separate accounts of the joint stock or property of co-partnership, and of the separate estate of each member thereof, and then provides, that after deducting out of the whole amount received by such assignee, the whole of the expenses and disbursements, the net proceeds of the joint stock shall be appropriated to the payment of the creditors of the co-partnership, and the net proceeds of the separate estate of each partner shall be appropriated to the payment of his separate creditors." And it further provides that the residue of either estate, after the payment of the debts in the order above mentioned, should be divided among the creditors, firm or private, as the case might be. I think the expression "net proceeds," shows that congress had reference to the estate to be distributed among the creditors, and only meant to exclude one class in case there were some funds for distribution in the class to which such creditors belonged, so that, when all the assets are expended in the payment of costs and there is no fund to be divided, as in this case, among the firm creditors, the firm and individual creditors are to be paid pari passu out of the separate estate of each partner. It then presents the case in the language of Judge Drummond in Re Knight [Case No. 7,880], "that being the only source to resort to the payment of the debt of the firm, it should be appropriated as well to pay the debts due from the firm as from the individual members." What difference is there as to the firm creditors, between no assets and a case where assets are all used in payment of costs? If there is only property enough to pay expenses, they do not get anything; they have no source of payment except from the separate property.

So I think the just and equitable reading of the statute is that the creditors of a firm are excluded from participation in the separate estate of the members only when there is a fund to be distributed to them, to the exclusion of the individual creditors; that when neither has any advantage in a fund not alike applicable to both, they stand equal, and must be paid pro rata. In Story on Partnership (section 380) it is stated that, "if there is any joint estate, however small it may be, if it is an available joint fund, and not purely a desperate and nominal joint fund, then the joint creditor is excluded; as, for example, if the joint fund is absolutely worthless from the expenses of any attempt to get it in, or if it is pledged beyond its real value, it will be deemed a mere nullity."

I think this language plainly indicates that a joint fund, to exclude the firm creditors, must be beneficial to them. If it costs more than it comes to to get it, it is in no sense an available joint fund within the authorities. [See, also, Colly. Partn. bk. 4, c. 2, § 926.] [2] The lord chancellor in Ex parte Peake, 2 Rose, 54, where the answer to the petition of the firm creditors was that there were joint effects of £1 11s. 6d., said that joint effects to the value of five pounds or five shillings would be an answer to the application, but if the property alleged to exist was in such a situation that any attempt to bring it within the reach of the joint creditors must be deemed a desperate, or in point of expense an unwarrantable attempt, that would authorize a departure from the rule, and allow said creditors to prove notwithstanding such property. And Lord Chancellor Eldon (Ex parte Hill, 2 Bos. & P. [N. R.] 191, note), says, "Joint effects means such as are under the administration of assignees to distribute." In Ex parte Janson, 3 Madd. 229, it is said: "The principle being that while there is any other fund, however small, to resort to, the joint creditors can not prove against the separate estate of one of the parties who has become bankrupt."

These cases were decided under the English bankrupt law, which was similar in the respect under consideration to our own, and, therefore, are important as showing that the English courts recognize the exception to the statute rule in cases where there is no joint fund to resort to, or that is available to the joint creditors, and are very important in settling the proper construction of the section of the bankrupt act under consideration. That section lays down the general rule, as contended for by counsel for individual creditors, but it is to be regarded as subject to the exceptions above stated, and I think the facts alleged in the petition bring this case within the doctrine of these authorities and exceptions.

The counsel for the individual creditors referred to Ex parte Kennedy, 19 Eng. Law & Eq. 150, as laying down a different rule. That case does not appear to be supported by authority. The decision is based upon In re Bridge & Keale, Id., referred to in note. It does not appear that the court in that case decided this question. No opinion is given; simply the order of the court, and it might have been based upon the fact that there was other property besides, to wit: the "brig" therein mentioned, and so not have turned upon the question of costs, as claimed. But without further notice of that case as it is in conflict with the general current of English cases, I cannot adopt its conclusions.

The Case of Marwick [Case No. 9,181], cited to same effect by counsel, does not show that this question was raised, and therefore furnishes no support to this claim. I am also supported in my conclusion by the case of In re Jewett [Id. 7,304]; In re Downing [Id. 4,044]; Bump, Bankr. 188, 189. As before stated, I have assumed the fact that the whole joint estate will be used in payment of the costs of the proceedings in bankruptcy, leaving no joint fund for distribution, nor any funds to be marshaled. I have, as before stated, with considerable hesitation, come to the conclusion that the fund applicable to and used in the payment of the costs of the proceedings does not constitute a joint estate within the fair meaning of the bankrupt act, so as to deprive the firm creditors of participating with the individual creditors in separate estate. To hold that a fund used in payment of necessary costs is to have the same effect upon the joint creditors' rights as if distributed among them, is, in my judgment, a very unjust and unreasonable conclusion, and I cannot adopt it.

I, therefore, overrule the demurrer, with leave to the respondents to put in an answer within twenty days after notice of this decision. If they fail to do so, I direct an order to be entered that the individual creditors of William McEwen, and the firm creditors of McEwen & Sons be paid pari passu out of the separate estate of the bankrupt William McEwen, in the hands of the assignees in this case.

We are inclined to agree with the court below that the proofs are as strong, if not stronger, that the injury to the tow happened through the neglect of the master of the barge in not attending to his helm in season, as to any improper management of the tug. We think there was nothing in that necessarily leading to the collision if the master of the tow had ported his helm in time. Decree of the court below affirmed.

BANKRUPTCY — ASSIGNEE'S BOND — GENERAL — SURETIES—SPECIAL—WIFE AS SURETY.

1. On motion of creditors for an order to have assignee file a new general bond, of which two of the sureties had become bankrupt and the third surety was his wife, conditioned that he would faithfully discharge the duties of the office in every case in which he was or should become assignee, held, that a general bond for such purpose is not authorized by the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], but that an assignee must give special bond in each case where a bond is necessary.

2. By the laws of Texas a wife cannot charge her separate estate by becoming surety on such a bond, and nothing to its worth is added by her execution thereof.

[In the matter of James McFaden, a bankrupt.]

DUVAL, District Judge. The assignee herein, I. K. Williams, and who is also assignee in many other cases in bankruptcy, had not given bond in any special case but had given a bond in ten thousand dollars, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties in all cases in which he might be appointed assignee. Upon this bond the assignee's wife and I. W. and W. Flanigan, were sureties. Subsequently the assignee himself (the principal on the bond) and his sureties, the two Flanigans, went into bankruptcy. Under these circumstances exceptions have been taken by the counsel for certain creditors to the bond in question, and discussed before the register, G. W. Whitmore, Esq. These exceptions, so far as it is necessary to notice them, were:

First. That the bond, being a general one, and applicable to no particular case, was not such as the law requires. This exception was overruled by the register.

Second. That the wife of the principal, as one of the sureties on the bond, was not responsible in law thereon. This exception was also overruled by the register.

Third. That the principal and two of his sureties having gone into bankruptcy, another bond was necessary. This exception was sustained by the register, and the assignee was ordered to give bond anew in the sum of ten thousand dollars, to be held applicable to, and cover his responsibility in all cases in which he might be assignee.

The questions arising upon these exceptions, and upon which the register and the creditors differ in opinion, have been certified to me for my decision. In my opinion the law contemplates that an assignee in bankruptcy should give a separate and distinct bond for each case in which he is appointed or elected, provided a bond be needed at all. My impression, however, at the time the assignee gave the bond in question, was different, and that a general bond, such as he had given, would be sufficient to make him responsible in all cases. This impression was so expressed, I believe, to the register, in reply to his verbal inquiry on the subject. But, from a careful investigation of the matter since, I am satisfied this idea was erroneous, and that the law contemplates the assignee should give bond in each case for which he is appointed. The register, I think, is mistaken in deciding that a wife can make herself or her separate property responsible by becoming a surety on such a bond as this. The decisions of the supreme court of this state have determined that the wife cannot charge her separate estate, except for necessaries, and cannot even convey the same by deed, except in the mode provided, for by the statutes. No security, therefore, is added to the bond by her execution of the same. In so far as the decision of the register requires the assignee to give another bond in this case, the same is approved. In other respects it is overruled as being incorrect.[2]

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY — SUGGESTION BY DISTRICT ATTORNEY—JURISDICTION—PUBLIC ARMED VESSEL OF FOREIGN SOVEREIGN—EXEMPTION.

[1. [2. A public armed vessel in the service of a foreign sovereign was libeled in this country by one claiming title thereto. Held, that neither her service nor character exempted her from the admiralty jurisdiction.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania.]

An armed vessel of war, called the Balaou, No. 5, sailing under flag of Napoleon, emperor of France and king of Italy, commanded by the Sieur Bigon, under a commission from and said to belong to that emperor, and to be in his actual service, arrived in the port of Philadelphia, in the month of —— last. Shortly after her arrival, she was arrested, by process from the district court of the United States, upon a libel filed by the plaintiffs, McFaden & Greetham, the substance of which is stated in the opinion of the court. No claim was put in by or on behalf of any person, but the attorney of the United States for this district, by orders from the executive department of the government, filed a suggestion, which also appears in the opinion of the court, the effect of which was to stay further proceedings on the merits, and to submit to the court the question whether it had jurisdiction of the cause, so as to proceed at all into an investigation of the case. The question, therefore, before the court, was not upon the merits, and whether the vessel belonged to the libellants or to the emperor, but whether the court had a right to investigate the matter at all, and to say to whom she belonged. The opinion of the district judge was against the jurisdiction [case unreported], from which opinion the libellants appealed to the circuit court.

Hopkinson & Binney, for libellants, in support of the jurisdiction.

Mr. Dallas, Dist. Atty., against it.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. This is an appeal from the district court, in a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The libel states that the schooner which constitutes the subject of the suit, called the Exchange, was, on the 27th of October, 1809, the property of the libellants, and was duly registered in their names; that in the same month and year she was fitted out by the libellants, and sailed on a voyage to St. Sebastian, in Spain, and was, in December following, forcibly seized under certain acts of the emperor of France, and, without the sanction of any sentence of condemnation, disposed of in violation of the rights of the libellants and of the law of nations; that the libellants have never transferred their right to the said vessel, and that she is now within the territory and jurisdiction of the United States and the jurisdiction of the court.

To this libel an objection was filed by A. J. Dallas, district attorney of the United States for this district, setting forth that this vessel, which in the suggestion is called the Balaou, No. 5, belonging to the emperor of France and king of Italy, and actually employed in his service, under the command of the Sieur Bigon, upon a voyage from Europe to the Indies, having encountered great stress of weather, had been compelled to enter the port of Philadelphia for repairs, and, having conformed to the law of nations and the United States, was about to depart, when she was arrested by the process of the district court. The suggestion then denies that this vessel had been violently captured from the libellants on the high seas as prize, or otherwise, but asserts that she was seized and the property in her was divested out of the libellants (if they ever had any in her) and vested in his imperial and royal majesty, in a port of his empire, according to the laws of France. Upon the suggestion of these facts, it is then submitted whether the court ought to take cognizance of the cause. The replication, after excepting to the suggestion as not being made by any person claiming the said vessel, supports the allegation of the libel and negatives those set forth in the suggestion. An objection is made to the mode of proceeding in this case. It is contended that no person ought to be admitted to contest the right of the libellants, or to interpose in any manner to prevent a decision upon their rights, but one who claims the property either for himself or on behalf of some other, and that the district attorney has not stated in his suggestion that he claims, or even appears for himself, for the United States, for the French emperor, or any other person.

I understand from the opinion and decree of the judge of the district court that the district attorney, when he filed the suggestion, stated that he did so at the request of the executive department of the general government, to whom an application and representation had been made by the French minister, containing a protest and denial of the allegations of the libel; and further that the suggestion in this case is substantially agreeable to the form usually practiced upon, when the executive department thinks it incumbent on it to give information through the law-officer of the district, to that court, of any matters subject to its judicial cognizance, which come to the knowledge of the executive in the course of its communications with foreign powers or their agents. I do not feel disposed to disturb this practice, being of opinion that the department of our government charged with the care of our foreign relations should be admitted in some way or other to give such information upon subjects which concern the peace of the nation, or which the executive deems essential for the public good to communicate in this way. The proceeding would certainly have been more regular if the reason of filing the suggestion had been stated on the face of it, as the court would certainly not listen to the impertinent and officious suggestions of any person who might think proper to interfere. But the responsible character attached to the public law-officers of the United States courts forbids the supposition that they act without authority when they declare the contrary to the court. In other countries, communications from the government to the courts of admiralty are generally made in the form and with the effect of mandates, which the judge finds himself compelled to obey. Such is not the present condition of any court in the United States, and I trust never will be. If a legal objection to the jurisdiction of the court appears on the face of the record, it will not be denied but that the district attorney, or any other person as an amicus curiae, may properly point it out. But if the objection arises from facts not so appearing, the district attorney, thus intrusted to file a suggestion, must establish the facts by proof, in the same manner as in ordinary cases between private individuals. Accordingly, that officer in the present case proceeded to support the allegations of the suggestion by exhibiting the commission of the officer commanding this vessel, granted by the emperor of France, authenticated by the depositions of the commander himself, and of the French vice consul.

The evidence has been objected to by the appellant's counsel. It is said that the officer found in possession of the vessel ought not to be admitted by his own evidence to justify and maintain that possession, and that the testimony of neither of the witnesses ought to be regarded, because the libellants were denied the privilege of cross-examining them. The objection to the competency of the Sieur Bigon is certainly not a good one, since he claims no interest whatever in the vessel, and no circumstance has appeared to bring his credit into question. There can be no doubt of the right of the libellants to cross-examine these witnesses, and I must presume (even if the presumption were not supported by the declaration of the district judge) that the privilege of cross-examining was not denied by the court; because if it had been, an exception would certainly have been taken to the opinion. But if an error of this sort had been committed by that court, it might have been required at the trial in this court; yet no attempt was made to examine these or any other witnesses.

The facts which I consider as proved by the evidence in the cause are that this vessel, called in the libel the Exchange, is a public armed vessel, claimed by the emperor of France, in the possession of an officer duly commissioned by the emperor, sailing under the flag of that nation, and now lying in the port of Philadelphia, and the question of law is whether the district court of the United States for this district can take cognizance of a libel filed in that court against this vessel, on the part of the original owner, who has never by any act of his parted with his right to her. The case is highly important, and has been argued with great ability on both sides.

The general rule of the law of nations laid down by the counsel for the appellant is that whatever goods and effects lie within the extent of a country, or are found there, whether movable or immovable, are subject to the authority and jurisdiction of the courts of that country. The rule, as a general one, is admitted. It is certainly supported by the most respectable authority, and is contradicted by none. But it is contended on the other side that a public armed vessel, belonging to a foreign prince, which has committed no offence within the jurisdiction of the country where she is found, forms an exception to the rule. This exception is not to be discovered in the writings of any jurists, foreign or domestic, nor does it appear to be founded in the practice of nations, so far as is recollected by the court, or has appeared from the researches of the bar. Bynkershoek (who has been roughly handled by the counsel on one side, and highly eulogized on the other, but whom all must admit to be a respectable writer on the laws of nations), in stating the general rule, and for the purpose of negativing an exception to or on account of any supposed privilege which sovereigns might claim, lays it down in the clearest terms that the goods and effects of a sovereign, whilst they are within a foreign territory, are subject to the laws of that country and to the jurisdiction of its courts. He considers the privilege of the sovereign to be exempted from the jurisdiction of a foreign tribunal, to be merely personal, and not extending to his goods found there. He proceeds to support this doctrine by the practice of the courts of Holland, at that time amongst the most respectable nations of Europe. It is true that in many of the cases which he cites the government arrested the proceedings; but this only proves that such interference was deemed necessary for reasons of state, to prevent the exercise of jurisdiction by the judicial tribunals, which otherwise would have proceeded in its regular and acknowledged channel. It is said that this author, in his efforts to regulate an exception in favor of a foreign prince, is not supported by any other elementary writer, or by a usage founded on the practice of nations. The answer given to this observation is, I think, a fair one. The doctrine is consistent with the general rule and has for near a century been pronounced by this author as forming a part of the law and practice of nations, and is denied by no writer of respectability, nor by any evidence of a contrary usage. But it is not true that this position has not received the sanction of more modern writers on the law of nations. Rutherford is express. He says "that the right of territory extends the authority of such laws to all questions which relate to the use or private ownership of such movable goods as are within the territory of the nation, and of such immovable goods as are confessedly a part of its territory; whether its own members only are concerned in these questions or the collective bodies, or the individual members of other nations." In other parts of this chapter he explains the terms "collective body of the nation" to mean the nation itself, or the sovereign power. But it is still contended that though exemption of the sovereign from the foreign jurisdiction in relation to his private effects may be denied by these authorities, still the public armed vessels of the same sovereign stand upon different ground, and that their exemption is not controverted by those writers. It is true that except in some of the cases stated by Bynkershoek, where public armed vessels were arrested, this distinction between the public armed vessels and the private property of the sovereign is not noticed. The general expressions of these jurists embrace both public and private vessels, and if the former are entitled to exception, those who contend for the exception are bound to prove it supported either by authority or by strong and unquestionable reason. How then does this question stand on the ground of reason? What is there in the character of a public armed vessel to withdraw her from the jurisdiction of a foreign court? It is admitted, and such indubitably is the law, that if such a vessel should, within the foreign jurisdiction, do any act which would expose a private vessel to forfeiture, she would not be protected on account of her public character. Why should she not be protected? The answer given by the counsel who endeavors to maintain the exception, and yet who is compelled to admit this qualification of it, is because the offence is committed within the foreign jurisdiction. Then it follows that the reason for the exemption is not founded on the character of the vessel, but on the place where the offence was committed, because the same reason equally applies to a private vessel of the sovereign or of an individual; and if a private vessel would be forfeited, because the offence which produces the forfeiture was committed within the jurisdiction, and would not be forfeited if it were committed elsewhere, and a public armed vessel would equally be forfeited or not, for the same reason, I should like to know what becomes of the distinction which is attempted between the one vessel and the other? It is true that offences are in their nature local, unless rendered otherwise by express statute; but if that statute makes no distinction between public armed and private vessels, the locality of the offence would no more protect the one than the other from the jurisdiction of the foreign courts, both being found within the territory of that nation. How is it with respect to contracts? It is admitted that the property of a sovereign, found within a foreign territory, is as much subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of that country, in a matter of contract, as if it had belonged to a private individual. The goods of a sovereign, found within a foreign territory, may be made liable for liens to which the laws of that country subject them; and I presume it will scarcely be denied that for repairs done in this state to a public armed vessel of a foreign prince she may be proceeded against in the admiralty by the ship-carpenters and material men in the same manner as if she were a merchant vessel. The reason of this cannot be because the repairs were made within this state, because contracts are in their nature transitory. If, then, public armed vessels, no less than the private property, movable or immovable, of a foreign prince, being within the territories of a foreign country, are subject to the jurisdiction of its courts, not only to answer for offences, but in matter of contract, it would seem to follow that the distinction which has been attempted between the public armed vessels and the private armed vessels of a foreign prince is entirely fanciful. It was said, that to lay the arm of the law upon a public armed vessel of a foreign prince is an act of hostility. If so, then the admitted cases where such a vessel may be arrested and subjected to a judicial sentence cannot be well founded in law; for it never can be allowed to courts of justice to commit acts of hostility against foreign nations. This power, in all countries, belongs to some other department of the government, and although the acts of a court may sometimes be the remote cause of a war, just or unjust, on the part of a foreign nation, yet a power to commit a direct act of hostility can never be properly lodged with that department. If, then, the exemption of a foreign prince from the jurisdiction of the courts of a country within whose territories his property is found, is not to be maintained on the ground of his personal privileges, the character of his property, or the locality of the transaction which becomes the subject of judicial inquiry, I am at a loss for a solid ground for excluding the present case from the jurisdiction of the district court.

I am fully sensible of the delicate nature of the question which is here decided, and I feel cheered by reflecting that the error of my judgment, if I have committed one, can and will be corrected by a superior tribunal; for surely a question of such national importance as this is, ought not, and I hope will not, rest upon the decision of this court. I can at the same time truly declare that if I could be so wicked as to decide this case different from the opinion which I must sincerely entertain respecting it, my humble genius and talents would not enable me to give one single reason which my conscience or judgment could approve. It is therefore adjudged, ordered and decreed that the decision of the district court be reversed, and that the decree be remitted to the district court for further proceedings.

[NOTE. The decision of the circuit court was reversed in the supreme court upon appeal, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivering the opinion of the court. 7 Cranch (11 U. S.) 116.]

Case No. 8,787.

In re MACFARLAN.

[Betts, Scr. Bk. 95.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1842.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—PRIOR FRAUD.

[Fraud consummated under an assignment for benefit of creditors before, and not in contemplation of, the passage of the act, does not bar a discharge.]

[In the matter of William Macfarlan, a bankrupt. Heard on bankrupt's application for a discharge and exceptions thereto.]

BETTS, District Judge. The two material objections to the bankrupt's discharge are that he has concealed property, and has admitted false and fictitious debts against his estate. The bankrupt presents his application in a novel, not to say an awkward, manner, by giving an exhibit of his individual affairs as they were in 1837, and with but a faint and scanty statement of their actual condition at the present time. That is left very much to implication. It is this method of scheduling his assets and liabilities that involves him in the present contest. He appears to have incurred debts in three different situations: First, as a wine merchant, up to February 25th, 1837, when he assigned his property to Hugh Macfarlan, accompanied by a schedule of his debts, in payment of which his assets were to be applied; secondly, as a member of the firm of Macfarlan & Kennedy, of Baltimore, in 1839 and beginning of 1840; and, thirdly, in his individual capacity, when out of employment, from 1840 to the present time. He refers to and sets forth his debts as they existed at the time of his first assignment, in 1837, and his partnership debts as he left them in Baltimore in 1839, alleging that in both instances property or means were assigned to be applied towards the satisfaction of such debts. This representation of his affairs cannot be construed an averment that those debts are now subsisting and outstanding in the same situation as when he made the assignment, and accordingly the proofs that some of these debts have been since fully paid with his knowledge does not contradict his petition. The creditors should have exacted a more specific statement of his condition at the time his petition was filed, and if he had averred all those debts to be then outstanding the testimony would have met and falsified the assertion. Upon the actual form of the petition the issue taken by the creditors and the proofs supporting it would appear immaterial and irrelevant. The bankrupt's petition seems to have been understood as reiterating the representation of his affairs in 1837 as their true state and condition in 1842, but such is not the language of the petition and schedule, and the party would seem accordingly to have been led off to form a false issue. Supposing a debt wholly fictitious in its origin had been paid in full in 1837 by the assignee under the collusive and fraudulent procurement of the bankrupt, such admission of a false debt would not affect his proceedings under the act. It has relation to matters concocted or completed before the statute came into existence. To bar a discharge under the act, the debt must be set up as one not available against any estate the bankrupt may possess. Similar observations apply to the concealment of property. The concealment, if any, is in the transactions of 1837 or 1838, when it is supposed certain property nominally assigned for the benefit of creditors was applied to the use of the bankrupt, or is now held by the assignee to be hereafter transferred to the bankrupt. There is no proof to support this latter suggestion. Clearly, a fraudulent diversion of property anterior to the passage of the act [of August 19, 1841; 5 Stat. 440, c. 9], and without reference to the probability of such a law, cannot affect a bankrupt if he no longer possesses it, and his proceedings have been fair under the statute. The creditors may have been delayed or defrauded by the manner in which the trust was executed by the assignee in 1837, or he may yet have property which ought to go to their benefit; yet these facts supply no ground of opposition to the application of the bankrupt. In order to bar his discharge, it must appear that there is now existing some property or interest belonging to him which he has withheld from his inventory, or that he has now brought forward and sanctioned as a debt, yet in life some fictitious or false claim. I think the testimony falls short of establishing these facts, but that there were circumstances sufficiently doubtful and suspicious to justify the creditors taking this opposition, and that they ought therefore to be exempted from costs. The objections are accordingly overruled without costs.

BANKRUPTCY — PARTNERSHIP — DISSOLUTION — RIGHTS OF CREDITORS—SUBSEQUENT ACTS—PETITION.

1. A partnership dissolved by mutual consent can have no effect upon the rights of creditors then existing, nor upon those who subsequently became creditors, if the members of the firm continued to treat each other in point of fact as partners after the alleged dissolution and to act as such in their business transactions with others.

2. A petition in bankruptcy can still be filed against the members of the firm, as though there had never been any dissolution.

[Cited in Re Gorham, Case No. 5,624.]

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion. The petitioners introduced no testimony to prove Mrs. McFarland a partner.

Robertson & Herndon, for petitioners.
Jones & Henry, for respondents.

DUVAL, District Judge. On the 26th day of February, 1874, Richardson & Co. filed their petition praying that H. C. McFarland & Co., a firm alleged to be composed of H. C. McFarland, F. W. Petty, and Lavissa McFarland, might be adjudged bankrupts. The acts of bankruptcy alleged against the debtors are: First. That they, being merchants, had within six calendar months next preceding the filing of the petition, suspended and had not resumed payment of their commercial paper within a period of fourteen days—which commercial paper is particularly described in the petition. Second. That as such merchants, they removed certain of their property from their store-house to avoid its being taken on legal process; and Third. That H. C. McFarland sold and disposed of goods, etc., appropriating the money therefor to his own use without accounting therefor on the books of the firm. Writs of seizure and injunction were issued in accordance with the prayer of the petitioners. On the 14th day of March, 1874, Lavissa McFarland, wife of H. C. McFarland, answered under oath denying that she was then or ever had been a member of the firm of H. C. McFarland & Co. At the same time a like denial of Mrs. McFarland's being a member of the firm was filed by her husband, H. C. McFarland, who alleged further that Felix W. Petty was not then, and had not been since the ——— day of July, 1872, a member of the firm of H. C. McFarland & Co.; but that on that day they had dissolved their partnership and published notice of the same in the Tyler Reporter, and that thereafter Petty's connection with H. C. McFarland was only that of a clerk with stipulated wages, and that since said dissolution the name and style of the house had been H. C. McFarland & Co., though owned solely by H. C. McFarland. The answer to the merits of the petition was also filed by H. C. McFarland and wife, and also a demurrer to its sufficiency.

It appears from the written evidence before me that on the 19th day of April, 1871, Petty sold his interest in the stock of drugs, etc., to McFarland, and by mutual consent the partnership was dissolved. In consideration of such sale, and the sum of two thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars to be paid by McFarland to Petty on or before January 1st, 1872, McFarland was to assume and pay off all the debts due by the firm, and to retain Petty as clerk at thirty dollars per month, so long as by mutual consent he might act as such. In regard to this transaction, the testimony of Petty and McFarland is directly at variance. The former swears that it was a feigned and sham transaction made and entered into to enable him, Petty, to protect himself from a certain security debt, incurred without any valuable consideration to himself, and that in point of fact the partnership still existed, and was never really dissolved. McFarland, on the other hand, swears that it was a real and genuine transaction, and that there was an actual dissolution of the partnership between him and Petty. Admitting that the testimony of one of these gentlemen weighs equally in the balance with that of the other, and that the written agreement referred to, and the note for two thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, given in pursuance of same, constitutes a transaction binding as between the parties themselves, it can have no effect upon the rights of creditors then existing. Nor can it have any effect upon the rights of those who subsequently became creditors of the firm of H. C. McFarland & Co., provided McFarland & Petty continued to treat each other, in point of fact, as partners, and to act as such in their business transactions with others. That they did so, the evidence is to my mind perfectly conclusive; upon this point, the testimony furnished by the books of the firm, of date subsequent to the 19th of April, 1871, the testimony of Mr. Williams and other witnesses, it seems to me, can leave no doubt whatever. So far as Mrs. Lavissa McFarland is concerned, there is no proof showing that she was ever a partner in the firm; and as she denies it under oath, the proceeding is dismissed as to her. The commission of one, at least, of the acts of bankruptcy charged being clearly proven, I deem it my duty to adjudicate McFarland and Petty, as partners, bankrupts; and it is so ordered and adjudged accordingly.

BANKRUPTCY—HOMESTEAD—DECREE—PRIVITY—ESTOPPEL—DOWER.

1. Where a conveyance of the homestead, executed by a bankrupt and his wife, has been set aside at the suit of the assignee in bankruptcy, the homestead rights remain, and the assignee holds subject to them.

[Cited in Re Detert, Case No. 3,829; Re McKenna, 9 Fed. 36.]

2. A decree declaring such conveyance fraudulent and void, and requiring the defendant to convey to the assignee, does not establish title in the assignee under such defendant, nor any privity between them.

3. The conveyance by the bankrupt and wife works no estoppel in favor of the purchaser from the assignee, and he has no title to support ejectment.

4. Dower and homestead rights are governed by the same rules and principles.

[This was an action at law by Henry J. McFarland against Charles Goodman and others.]

James G. Jenkins, for plaintiff.
Levi Hubbell and Wm. P. Lynde, for defendants.

HOPKINS, District Judge. This is an action of ejectment for the recovery of forty acres of land, which is in the possession of and claimed by Gaius Munger and Celia his wife, as a homestead. The validity of that claim is the principal question, and the result of the case depends upon its determination. Under the issue joined herein, it is necessary for the plaintiff to establish his title and right to possession.

Ejectment is a possessory action to the extent that the right of possession to the premises, on the part of the plaintiff, at the commencement of the suit, is essential to a recovery. Title without right of possession is not enough. It is a maxim of universal application in ejectment, that the plaintiff must succeed upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of his adversary's. So a plaintiff fails unless he shows title in himself, irrespective of the question of the validity of the defendant's title.

The solution of the principal question depends almost wholly upon the effect of the deed of Gaius Munger and wife to Isadore G. Munger, their daughter, bearing date on the 2d day of December, 1869, which was subsequently set aside and vacated, in a suit in equity prosecuted by the assignee of Gaius Munger in bankruptcy, against Isadore, the grantee, on the ground that it was fraudulent as to creditors.

The plaintiff derives title to the land under a deed from the assignee; so, if the bankrupt's homestead right was not cut off by the deed, or if the right to assert it revived and reverted to him and his wife, on setting aside their deed, then his claim of title thereto must fail.

From the evidence, it appeared that the land in question had been occupied by Gaius Munger and his wife as a homestead for over thirty years; that, connected with it, were about four hundred acres more, which had been used as a farm up to the 2d of December, 1869, when they conveyed the whole to their daughter Isadore G., as above stated; that the only money consideration was $100, but it was agreed between them that Gaius and his wife were to continue to occupy the premises as a homestead during their natural lives, and were to be supported by Isadore during their joint lives; that, soon after executing the deed, proceedings in bankruptcy were instituted against Gaius Munger, which resulted in his being declared a bankrupt, and the appointment of an assignee of his estate; that the assignee, soon after his appointment, filed a bill in the district court of this district against Isadore G. Munger, to set the deed aside as fraudulent and void as against the bankrupt's creditors, which resulted in a decree, bearing date on the 5th of February, 1872, declaring said deed to be fraudulent and void as to the creditors of said bankrupt and the complainant, his assignee, and setting aside and wholly vacating it, and declaring that the defendant Isadore, as against the complainant therein, acquired no right or title to, or interest in, the premises, or any part thereof, by virtue of such deed, and declaring that the premises were the property of the complainant as assignee in bankruptcy, and also decreeing that Isadore convey them to the assignee upon demand; but no conveyance had been made by her before the trial of this suit.

There was no question made in that suit upon the homestead question or right of Gaius Munger and his wife, nor was any decision made upon that point therein. After the entry of said decree, an application was made before the district court, sitting in bankruptcy, by Gaius Munger, to have the homestead set off; but it does not appear that any definite decision was ever made upon that application, except that the assignee, in obedience to the instruction of the court, sold the real estate, subject to any legal claim of the said Gaius Munger to a homestead therein; which sale the court confirmed.

The defendant, Gaius Munger, gave notice of his claim to this property, at such sale, as his homestead; and, after the confirmation, the plaintiff, with full knowledge of such claim of Gaius, took the assignee's deed of all the premises conveyed to Isadore, which covered the premises involved in this suit.

The assignee's deed did not contain the reservation or exception as to Gaius Munger's homestead rights, but the counsel for the plaintiff consented on the trial to treat it as containing such exception or reservation. The plaintiff obtained possession of all except the part in controversy here. Gaius and Celia his wife claimed their homestead exemptions under the state laws, and refused to surrender possession of that part.

By the state statute there is exempted to a debtor forty acres of agricultural land, or a quarter-of-an-acre lot in a city or village, owned and occupied by such debtor as a homestead. The owner of such homestead cannot alien it unless his wife join in the deed. The deed of the husband alone is void. Hait v. Houle, 19 Wis. 472 [2 Allen, 203.][2] The separation of the land by a highway running through it, does not defeat the homestead claim, provided it is all in one body. Bunker v. Locke, 15 Wis. 635.

His right to it as a homestead, up to the time of the deed, is not questioned. The possession, after the deed, continued as before. The agreement that he should so enjoy it, was faithfully kept. That deed being set aside and vacated as to the assignee, the question arises as to the extent of the assignee's interest. Had the assignee any greater interest in the land than he would have had if the deed had not been given?

Section 14 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 522)], invests an assignee with the title "to all property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors." Property so conveyed is considered as still belonging to the bankrupt, and passes the same as if the title had not been changed. The assignee takes such property under and by virtue of the bankrupt act, not under or through the grantee; and if he takes title under the bankrupt act, why cannot the bankrupt assert the exemptions and rights secured to him by the act? The 14th section, after providing for an assignment of the property of the bankrupt, declares that there shall be excepted from the operation of the act, such property as is exempt from execution sale "by the laws of the state in which the bankrupt has his domicil," and "that such exceptions shall operate as a limitation upon the conveyance of the property to his assignee." It operates like a general execution, in favor of all creditors, and takes all property subject to levy, and only such as may be made available upon judicial process to the payment of debts of the bankrupt. In re Deckert [Case No. 3,728].

These provisions and restrictions, it seems to me, apply to all property that passes to the assignee under the act, including such as has been transferred to defraud creditors, as well as that where the title is ostensibly in the bankrupt. If so, he takes no greater interest in the one case than in the other. The limitation applies to all he acquires under the bankrupt act, and he cannot be heard to deny the bankrupt's title to property which he receives and claims through and under the operation of the bankrupt law. He cannot deny and affirm the bankrupt's title at the same time. The real estate covered by the annulled deed having been treated as the bankrupt's property, I think it must be considered, as to the plaintiff in this case, as such, and subject to all the rights of the bankrupt and his wife reserved to them by the bankrupt law. This construction gives effect to all the provisions and limitations of section 14, and secures to all parties their rights.

But, in view of the facts of this case, this construction is eminently just, for it was agreed that the grantors, who were old and feeble, should, notwithstanding the deed, occupy this property as their home and be supported there by the grantee during their lives.

The deed, under such circumstances, did not extinguish their homestead rights. Murphy v. Crouch, 24 Wis. 365. That agreement they could enforce, as against their grantee, and a court of equity would set aside the deed in case of her refusal to perform it. So that the equitable right of the bankrupt to this property as a homestead had not been unconditionally surrendered, or placed where he could not enforce it against his grantee, if the deed had not been annulled in the interest of the creditors. But I do not wish to be understood as resting my decision on this ground alone. I think the bankrupt's homestead rights sustainable upon broader and more comprehensive grounds. The deed being set aside, and the creditors restored to their rights as they existed before the deed, upon what principle should the bankrupt be denied his rights, as they were before the deed? In the case of a homestead, there is a peculiar reason for the adoption of this rule. The homestead is exempted for the benefit of the family of the debtor; he cannot deprive them of it without the signature of his wife. To transfer it, requires their joint deed. Her right in it is not simply inchoate, like dower, but present, possessory and indefeasible by her husband. Neither can convey it except by joining with the other in the deed. A defective deed, or deed inoperative and void, as to either, is in my opinion ineffectual and void as to both, and does not convey any title.

It is said that she voluntarily executed this deed with her husband; that she probably knew of his unlawful purpose. Suppose that to be the case, I do not think it alters her rights. The position of a wife is such, and the influence of the husband over her, that she is not held answerable for his frauds.

Homestead laws are now favorably construed by courts, as in the interest of the debtor's family. In support of this proposition, I need only refer to the enlightened decisions of our own state supreme court.

That court has decided that a deed of the homestead cannot be set aside as fraudulent as to creditors; for the reason that, as the creditors had no right to have it applied in payment of their debts while in the possession of the debtor, they could not be defrauded by its conveyance, and could not follow or reach it in the hands of the alleged fraudulent purchaser. Dreutzer v. Bell, 11 Wis. 114; Pike v. Miles, 23 Wis. 164.

If the assignee claimed under this deed, or could claim under it, a different result would follow. But he does not: he acquired the bankrupt's title by operation of law, in hostility to the deed. He has no privity of estate or connection of any kind with the grantee. He cannot maintain it to be both good and bad. The law allows no such paradox. Nor can he enforce the grantee's rights, if she have any, as was contended by the plaintiff's counsel on the trial. I am aware that the decisions of the courts are not entirely in accord on this question; but the conclusion I have reached is not without the support of many well-considered opinions of other courts, federal as well as state. A different rule might apply to personal property, for the wife in this state has no interest in that, or right to prevent its disposition by the husband, so that the same reason for her protection in the use of that, does not exist; but I do not determine upon that question. This action relates to the homestead exemption, and my decision is not intended to go beyond that question.

Judge Dillon, in Cox v. Wilder [Case No. 3,308], examined this question and the kindred one of dower, and decided that a deed executed by husband and wife to defraud creditors did not bar the wife's dower, nor defeat her right to the homestead under the laws of Missouri. The same doctrine substantially is laid down in Woodworth v. Paige, 5 Ohio St. 70; [Robinson v. Bates, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 40; Vogler v. Montgomery, 54 Mo. 577]; [2] and by Judge Withers, in Re Pratt [Case No. 11,370].

This brings me to the consideration of the effect of the decree in the suit of the assignee against Isadore Munger. If Gaius Munger and his wife had been parties to that suit, and such a decree had been entered, they would have been concluded; but not being parties, they are not affected by it. But if they had been joined in that suit, they could have set up their homestead claim; and, if they had, according to decision in Dreutzer v. Bell, et al., supra, the deed as to the homestead portion would not have been declared void; the title to the homestead portion would have been confirmed in their grantee, and, as between her and the bankrupt and his wife, it was to continue to be their homestead during their natural lives. They, in that case, would have had the full benefit of their right under the statute. But the assignee omitted to make them parties, and took a decree annulling the deed as to the whole land embraced in the deed, without reservation.

The decree doubtless estops Isadore and all persons claiming under her, from ever setting up any title to any portion of the premises, under that deed, as against the complainant and those claiming under him. It, as before said, not only declared the deed void and that she acquired no title under it, but it required her to convey to the assignee all her right and title. This clause, except for some others which most emphatically declare that she acquired no title, might be considered as conceding some title in her; but I think such is not the fair construction. It was inserted for greater caution, and only to quiet the title against the deed; not meaning that she was to transfer an independent substantial title. Thus interpreted, it is consistent and not contradictory, and does not establish any title in the assignee under her, nor any privity between her and the assignee. In the case of Winship v. Lamberton [unreported], referred to by Judge Thurman, in Woodworth v. Paige, supra, the decree set aside the deed as fraudulent as to creditors, and required the fraudulent grantee to convey to assignee or receiver, like the one under consideration. The wife joined with her husband in executing the fraudulent deed in that case as in this, but the court held that neither the deed nor decree barred her dower; that the clause in the decree requiring a conveyance was not meant to pass an independent title, but simply to quiet the title against the deed; and the widow was allowed her dower, notwithstanding she had signed the deed, the court holding that the annulled deed could not be interposed to defeat her dower. If such a deed and decree annulling it, do not defeat a widow's right of dower, upon what ground can it be maintained that they estop the widow from asserting her claim to the homestead? There is nothing in the nature of the rights to cause any difference, and I think if she is not estopped as to her dower-right, she is not as to her homestead.

But there is another difficulty in the plaintiff's way, upon the theory contended for. He is neither a party nor privy to this deed; and the rule is well settled that a stranger cannot set up an estoppel, because there is no reciprocity. Estoppel only binds parties and privies; so that, unless he derives title under the deed, he cannot assert the rights of the grantee under it. Pixley v. Bennett, 11 Mass. 298 [1 Washb. Real Prop. 234; Sears v. Hanks, 14 Ohio St. 298.] [2] Again, in Morton v. Noble, 57 Ill. 176, it is said, "We fully recognize the doctrine, that when the deed from the husband and wife becomes inoperative as to the husband's estate, because made in fraud of the rights of the creditors, * * * or by reason of any wrongful act on the part of the husband, the wife is not barred by the deed." [Citing in support of that doctrine 11 Ill. 384; 13 Ill. 483; 16 Ill. 122, and 23 Ill. 634.] [2]

If this is the true doctrine as to the dower right, and there is no distinction between dower and homestead rights, these authorities effectually dispose of the case. They clearly support the claim of the defendants, Gaius Munger and Celia Munger to the property as a homestead, and decide, that as against the assignee, who took in hostility to their deed, they are not estopped by it; but as against him they can maintain their exemptions, and also that the decree against Isadore does not affect them, and that the assignee does not derive any new title as against them therefrom.

Such being the rights of the parties as against the assignee in bankruptcy, the plaintiff who purchased of the assignee, and with full knowledge of the condition of the estate and claims of Gaius Munger, occupies no better position than the assignee. By the deed he succeeded to the rights of the assignee only; and, as I have determined that the defendants are entitled to their homestead exemption as against the assignee, the title of the plaintiff to this property, it being their homestead, has failed, and the plaintiff has failed therefore to show title to the property in controversy.

I therefore find that the plaintiff is not the owner of the premises described in the complaint, nor is he entitled to the possession thereof; and direct judgment in favor of the defendants with costs.

NOTE. The waiver of the homestead right in favor of a particular creditor does not inure to the benefit of the assignee or other creditors. In re Poleman [Case No. 11,247]. Circuit Court, Pennsylvania.[2] April Term, 1826.

COURTS—PRACTICE IN FEDERAL COURTS—FOLLOWING STATE—AT LAW—IN EQUITY.

The doctrine warranted by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, that "the assignee of a bond or mortgage for a valuable consideration, and without notice, stands in no better situation than the assignor, and is exposed to every legal and equitable defence that could be asserted against him," is to be regarded as a rule of decision by this court, under the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 92], in all cases at common law; but the rule in equity is quite otherwise; and in an equity suit, the rule of equity, and not that of the state is to be observed.

[Cited in Washington v. Pollard, 5 Grat. 452.]

[This was a bill for an injunction by McFarlane against Mary Griffith.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. This is a bill to be relieved against a bond and mortgage given by the plaintiff to Putnam Catlin, to secure the purchase money for a tract of land sold and conveyed by the latter to the former. The bill states that on the 17th of April, 1815, the plaintiff was in possession of eighty acres of land under an improvement right; on which he had resided for several years, and made many valuable improvements. That about the time above mentioned, Putnam Catlin alleged that he had purchased the large tract which included the above eighty acres of land, of John B. Wallace, and that he would eject the plaintiff, unless he would agree to pay him a consideration for the land he possessed, averring at the same time, that the title of Wallace was indisputable. That being an illiterate man, and supposing this assertion to be well founded, he was induced, under the terror occasioned by this threat, to agree to pay the said Catlin for his land at the rate of three dollars per acre; and having accepted of a conveyance of the land, he executed a bond and mortgage of the same land to the said Catlin to secure the payment of the purchase money, amounting to the sum of $240. The bill then charges, that at the time of this transaction, the right to this tract of land, if any right thereto other than that of the commonwealth or of the plaintiff did exist, was not in the said Catlin, but in the defendant, to whom Wallace had by some instrument or conveyance previously transferred his pretended right, and for whom the said Catlin then acted as agent. But that in fact the title was, and still is in the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, subject only to the pre-emption right of the plaintiff. That Catlin has assigned the before mentioned bond and mortgage to the defendant, without any consideration, but as her agent, and that she is not a purchaser for valuable consideration, but is affected by the knowledge of facts acquired by her said agent, and of the deception practised by him on the plaintiff. The prayer of the bill is, that the defendant may be decreed to deliver up the bond and mortgage to be cancelled, and that she may be enjoined from further proceeding in an ejectment brought by her in this court on the mortgage deed. The answer admits that Catlin did, on or before the 17th of April, 1815, execute and deliver to the plaintiff the conveyance mentioned in the bill, and that the plaintiff did also execute a bond and mortgage to the said Catlin to secure the purchase money of the said land. But the defendant does not admit that the plaintiff had any right to the land previous to the above conveyance to him; on the contrary, she believes that the title to the same was vested in the said John B. Wallace, who conveyed a large tract of land, of which this was a part, to the said Catlin, for the purpose of enabling him to make conveyances thereof to such persons as might contract with him for the purchase thereof. She denies that at the time of the conveyance to the plaintiff, or at any previous time, the right to the land so conveyed was in the defendant, or that she had any claim thereto, either in law or equity, previous to the assignment of the mortgage to her, or that the said Catlin, or the said Wallace, acted as her agent prior to the said assignment. The answer then avers that on the 20th of December, 1817, the said Wallace was indebted to the defendant in the sum of $13,000 and upwards, for so much money before that time lent and advanced to him by the defendant, and that in consideration thereof, the said Catlin did on that day assign to the defendant the before mentioned bond and mortgage, together with other securities, to the amount of $13,000. She believes that neither Wallace or Catlin had any notice of the pretended right of the plaintiff to the land in question, or that there was any title to the same in the commonwealth. She denies that she ever had notice of any such pretended title in the plaintiff, or in the commonwealth, to this land, or of any of the circumstances alleged in the bill to have taken place prior to the conveyance to the plaintiff. The answer then insists upon the protection afforded her as a bona fide assignee or purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, in like manner as if it were specially pleaded. To this answer, a general replication has been filed, and a number of depositions have been taken, which it is not necessary particularly to notice. The plaintiff's counsel has rested his case upon the following Pennsylvania decisions: [Swift v. Hawkins] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 17; [Wheeler v. Hughes] Id. 23; [Inglis v. Inglis] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 49; 2 Yeates, 23, 464, 543; 5 Bin. 232; 1 Serg. & R. 438; 4 Serg. & R. 177; 10 Serg. & R. 140. The defendant's counsel cited Mitf. Eq. Pl. 122, 162, 215; 2 Ves. Jr. 457; 1 Johns. Ch. 213; 2 Johns. Ch. 519. The ground of equity stated in the bill, and relied upon at the bar is, that John B. Wallace, at the time when his agent Putnam Catlin conveyed his land to the plaintiff, had no title to it, and therefore a failure of the consideration is inferred; which, it is contended, discharges the plaintiff from his obligation to pay the purchase money, and consequently entitles him to the equitable interposition of the court to set aside the securities given therefor, even against an assignee who has purchased them bona fide for a valuable consideration, and without notice of the matters of equity charged in the bill. In support of this argument, the plaintiff's counsel relied altogether upon a long and uniform course of decisions of the supreme court of this state; and it must be admitted, that to a certain extent, it is fully maintained by those decisions. The principle which they lay down is, that the assignee of a bond or mortgage, though for valuable consideration, and without notice, stands in the place of the obligee or mortgagee, and is exposed to every legal or equitable defence which could be asserted against them; and that if there has been a failure of the consideration for which those instruments were given, which the defendant is at liberty to prove; such assignee is not at liberty to recover in an action of debt upon the bond, or of scire facias upon the mortgage. The Pennsylvania cases which support this doctrine, turn upon the construction of two acts of assembly of this state, passed in the year 1705. We consider them therefore as establishing the law of this state upon the subjects to which they apply, and consequently, under the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act of 1789, they are to be regarded by this court as rules of decision in all cases of suits at common law. But this is a case in equity, and must be governed by those rules and principles which prevail in a court of equity; and amongst those there are none better settled than this, that against a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration paid, and without notice of those circumstances which form the basis of the plaintiff's equity, the court will take no step, and grant no relief whatever. The reason of the rule is obvious. The defendant, who has innocently paid his money under a well founded confidence in the goodness of the title which he has purchased, has as much equity to be protected, as the plaintiff can possibly have to be relieved against him, and consequently, the equity being equal, this court can do nothing but leave the parties as they are, and refer the plaintiff to such legal remedy as he may be entitled to. If in this case, the plaintiff has been careful enough to provide by proper covenants the means of indemnity in case of defective title to the land conveyed to him, there is the less reason for the extraordinary interposition of a court of equity in his favour. If he has failed to protect himself by such covenants, his neglect can never be made the foundation of an equity proceeding against a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. In giving this opinion, we do not mean, nor do we in effect controvert the doctrine of the supreme court of this state, which has been referred to. Were this an action at law founded on the bond, we should conform, without hesitation, to the decisions of that court. All we mean to say is, that where the obligor applies to the equity side of this court for relief, it must, upon principles of equity, be denied, if it appear by the plea, or answer of the defendant, that he is a purchaser for valuable consideration paid, without notice of the facts on which the plaintiff's equity is founded. The injunction therefore must be dissolved, and the bill dismissed with costs.

McFERRAN et al. v. WHERRY.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 677.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1840.

ARREST—UNDER ATTACHMENT—BY CAPIAS—PRIVILEGE—SUITOR IN CAUSE.

If an attachment, under the Maryland act of 1795 (chapter 56) and a capias ad respondendum, be both served while the defendant is attending the court as a party in another cause, the attachment will be ordered to be dissolved upon the arrest of the defendant on the capias, and the defendant will be discharged from the arrest, because privileged as a suitor in another cause.

[This was an action by McFerran and Duncan against Wherry.]

An attachment under the Maryland act of 1795 (chapter 56) was laid in the hands of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company on the 24th of December, 1839. The defendant, being a non-resident, was attending this court as a party in another cause. With the attachment a capias ad respondendum was issued on the same day upon which the defendant was taken; and the marshal returned the attachment "laid in the hands of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company," and returned the capias "cepi." The defendant being brought in by the marshal, moved to be discharged, because, as a suitor in this court, in another cause, he was privileged from arrest during the term, &c. And THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent,) discharged him from the arrest, and did not require him to enter his appearance in the suit; and ordered the return of the attachment to be quashed, because the defendant was present when the attachment was served; and the defendant could not be compelled to appear, either by capias, or by means of an attachment of his effects, during the term, and while the defendant was thus privileged from arrest as a party.

R. J. Brent now moved THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) to rescind the order to quash the return of the attachment, and cited several cases to show that the attachment is intended as a means to compel an appearance to the action, and that the attachment cannot be dissolved without special bail.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) refused to rescind the order to quash the return of the attachment; and ordered the attachment to be dissolved. See U. S. v. Stansbury, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 573.

[1 U. S. Law J. 88.]

District Court, S. D. New York. June 29, 1821.

REPEAL OF PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — FORMS OF PROCEDURE—ACT OF 1793.

[The method intended to be provided in the tenth section of the act of 1793 [1 Stat. 323], relating to the repeal of patents is not that by scire facias or process in the nature thereof, according to the forms of the common law, and with the verdict of a jury, but was rather a summary proceeding intended to take the place of an examination into the merits of the invention before the issuance of the patent, and the remedy could only be invoked during the limited time of three years after the date of the patent. A rule to show cause why the patent should not be repealed was issued by the judge upon motion, accompanied by affidavits showing grounds satisfactory to him. If the patentee did not appear, the rule was made absolute and the patent repealed. If he did appear, the case was fully heard upon its merits before the judge alone upon affidavits or oral testimony, and judgment entered for the party found to be entitled thereto upon the evidence produced. Stearns v. Barrett, Case No. 13,337, disapproved.]

[This was an application under the tenth section of the patent act of 1793 for a rule to show cause why the patent granted June 29, 1821, to Thomas Bryan and William Bryan should not be repealed.]

J. A. Emmet, for complainant.

C. G. Haines, for patentee.

VAN NESS, District Judge. That the question I am now to consider involves serious difficulties is admitted. Wherever it has arisen, it has confounded the ingenuity of the bar, and perplexed the gravest deliberations of the bench. The true meaning of the tenth section of the patent law is indeed a great mystery. The profound obscurity in which, like the oracles of old, it is delivered to us, must continue to perplex the minds of men until a wiser generation shall arise to develope the hidden wisdom, and penetrate the dubious intentions of its authors. To be compelled to expound and to administer in some way a law confessedly incomprehensible, is certainly an unpleasant duty. That the exposition I shall give will afford general satisfaction, I have not the confidence to hope. In a case like this the most laborious ratiocination can produce but a poor result. The field is bare and barren, and presents nothing to aid our skill or labor. An approach to demonstration, I am persuaded, is not expected. Something like a rational exposition will be attempted.

The tenth section of the act of 1793 entitled "An act to promote the progress of useful arts, and to repeal the acts heretofore made for that purpose," is in these words: "Upon oath or affirmation being made before the judge of the district court, where the patentee, his executors, administrators or assigns, reside, that any patent, which shall be issued in pursuance of this act, was obtained surreptitiously, or upon false suggestion, and motion made to the said court, within three years after issuing the said patent, but not afterwards, it shall and may be lawful for the judge of the said district court, if the matter alleged shall appear to him to be sufficient, to grant a rule that the patentee, or his executor, administrator, or assigns, show cause, why process should not issue against him to repeal such patent. And if sufficient cause shall not be shown to the contrary, the rule shall be made absolute, and thereupon the said judge shall order process to be issued against such patentee, or his executors, administrators, or assigns with costs of suit. And in case no sufficient cause be shown to the contrary, or if it shall appear that the patentee was not the true inventor or discoverer, judgment shall be rendered by such court for the repeal of such patent; and if the party at whose complaint the process issued, shall have judgment given against him, he shall pay all such costs as the defendant shall be put to, in defending the suit, to be taxed by the court and recovered by due course of law." This is not the first proceeding that has been instituted here, under this act, which for the sake of brevity is commonly denominated "The Patent Law." Several rules have within a year or two been applied for and granted; and in every case it was conceded by all the counsel that the hearing on the rule to show cause was final. That was the impression of the court, and no doubt of its correctness was ever expressed at the bar, until after the rule in this case, or the other now under consideration, was obtained. So far forth, therefore, as uniformity in anterior proceedings, and voluntary acquiescence of the counsel employed in them can produce the effect, it is the established practice of this court that the hearing on the rule to show cause is final and decisive between the parties; and that the process which issues, if the rule be made absolute, is in the nature of an execution to enforce the judgment of the court pronouncing the patent void, and to collect the costs.

In this case, however, the court has been pressed to review the course of practice it has hitherto pursued, and to adopt another. It is now contended that the hearing on the rule is not final, and its effect, if made absolute, nothing more than an order that a scire facias issue. That the words of the law afford some support to this view of the subject is readily conceded for they will admit, without violence, any construction which may suggest itself to the ingenuity of counsel, or may suit the feelings or the fancy of the parties. Unfortunately, we are destitute of all precedent but our own on this occasion, and have no judicial exposition of the tenth section of this act except that which is found in the case of Stearns v. Barrett [Case No. 13,337], determined in the circuit court of the United States for the First circuit. The decisions in that court are certainly entitled to great respect and attention; but I cannot accede to the conclusion of the learned judge in this instance, because it is at variance with the deliberate suggestions of my own mind, and not supported by the general principles applicable to the question, and is, in my conception, in direct conflict with the whole course of his own reasoning.

We are examining a statutory provision for the accomplishment of a given object, and yet we are perpetually referred to common law proceedings as the only mode of effectuating the legal purpose of the legislature. If it could be fairly shown that they were at all necessary to carry into effect the ultimate object of the law, I should resort to them without reluctance. No man venerates the common law, as a body of legal rules and maxims, applied and administered by means of safe and salutary forms, more than I do. But I am unwilling to consider all our legislation as necessarily subservient to the principles or practice of that celebrated code, and its application always dependent upon its formalities, often tedious, intricate or antiquated. In England it is expressly declared by statute that the value of patents shall be tried and determined according to the course of the common law. The second section of the act concerning monopolies, &c. (21 Jac. I, c. 3) provides "that all monopolies, letters patent, &c., and the force and validity of them, and every of them, ought to be, and shall be, forever hereafter, examined, heard, tried, and determined, by and according to the common laws of this realm, and not otherwise." Our act contains no direct reference whatever, to the common law, or its course of proceeding, in cases of this sort: But in consequence of the fundamental difference in the principles of the English and American patent laws, and the still wider difference in the manner of granting these exclusive rights or monopolies, has, as I conceive, very wisely, if not necessarily, established a different mode of investigating and determining the validity of a patent. As patents under our law are issued as a matter of course to all who will apply for them, swear they are inventors, and pay thirty dollars, it was natural, and in a great degree requisite, to protect the public against frauds and impositions, that some expeditious summary mode of investigating their merits and trying their validity should be provided. But the tenth section of our act contains the word "process," to which the acuteness of the bar has ascribed all the significance of the express and verbose enactments of the English statute, and a magic influence, which is triumphantly said to draw after it, and secure by adoption, all the statute and common law of England, applicable to this question. I have a profound veneration for the abilities of the gentlemen who have discoursed so eloquently and so learnedly, on the mysterious signification of this comprehensive term. I have often felt their power to fascinate the senses and bewilder the human intellect; but

I trust the habits inculcated by my occupation will enable me to resist their subtleties, and bring to the examination of the subject something like sedate reflection and plain sense.

In attempting to arrive at a just conclusion in this case, it may be useful to examine how far the mode of granting and obtaining patents in England and in this country is similar; and the difference which will be found to exist will facilitate, I think, our efforts to develop the meaning of the tenth section of the patent law, and to penetrate the true intentions of the legislature. In England, patents are grants of favor emanating from the crown. In the United States, they are on a very different footing. Here they are the creatures of the statute. The right to their enjoyment, and the modes of protection against their infringement, are all prescribed by statute. The proceedings to obtain a patent in England are tedious, complicated and expensive. It is prayed for by petition, addressed to his majesty, and presented with an affidavit to support it, at the office of the secretary of state for the home department. The answer to the petition is a reference thereof to the attorney or solicitor general, to consider it, and report what may properly be done in the premises. The report of the attorney or solicitor general, if favorable, must be taken back to the office of the secretary of state, for the king's warrant. The warrant is directed to the attorney or solicitor, and directs a bill to be prepared, which is done at their patent office. The bill, when prepared, goes to the office of the secretary of state for the royal signature. When this is obtained, it is carried to the signet office to be passed, and there a warrant is prepared, directed to the lord keeper of the privy seal, from whom a warrant goes to the lord chancellor, commanding him to cause the letters to be made patent, under the great seal of Great Britain.

During the progress and execution of all these formalities, two formal hearings, at least, can be obtained in opposition to the patent: 1st. The objections may be submitted to the attorney or solicitor general, before a report is made upon the petition, at the instance of either of the parties; he will assign a day to examine the claims of the petitioner, and the nature of the objections urged in opposition to the patent; and after a full hearing and consideration will decide whether to report in favor of or against the prayer of the petition. 2dly. If the decision of the attorney-general be in favor of granting the patent, the party opposing may have another hearing before the lord chancellor, previous to the sealing of the patent, when a more full and formal investigation may be had of the merits of the application, and the objections urged against its success. It is also said by Bridgman, that the issuing of the patent may be opposed, when it comes to the privy seal, which would be a third hearing upon the merits of the petition; although I have met with no case in which it has been had. The course adopted in another stage of the proceeding, supports and fortifies this authority. Those opportunities to contest the rights of the petitioner are obtained by means unknown to our law. They are privileges secured by entering what are called "caveats," the nature and effect of which seem sometimes to have been misunderstood, even in the country where they are in use. They were at times supposed by inventors to secure the right to a patent, although their inventions might be brought into use before they had obtained it; and then that at least they were sufficient to prevent a patent from being granted to another, for the invention to which they referred. But a caveat has no such operation. Its object, as is manifest from its form, is to obtain information of the intention of any other person to take out a patent for the discovery or invention, which in general terms it describes; and it is merely a request that notice of such an application may be given to the party who has taken the precaution to file the caveat. If the anticipated petition be presented, the notice desired is given, and when a time is assigned to hear the objections that may be argued against the patent. At this hearing upon the caveat, all objections to the patent are open, and "the propriety of it must be sustained in every particular." It is finally granted, or not, as the attorney-general or chancellor shall report.

By referring to the act of 1793, it will be seen that most of these formalities are discarded, and this complicated process is much simplified. No means whatever are provided, or opportunities afforded, to contest the novelty or utility, or general merits, of the patent applied for; and it is known that, practically, patents are granted as matters of course, if the applicant complies with the forms of the law, which are nothing more than presenting a petition to the secretary of state, describing the alleged invention or discovery, swearing that he is the inventor or discoverer, and paying thirty dollars for the fees of office. The letters patent, when prepared, it is true, are to be delivered to the attorney-general, who, however, never inquires into the merits of the subject, but merely takes care that the instrument is in due form. The ninth section provides for the appointment of arbitrators, where two or more persons apply for patents at the same time, for the same alleged invention or discovery; but this has no other use or efficacy, than to dispose of a momentary collision; for the parties, it seems, have nothing to do, but to decline an arbitration, and then successively take out patents, in their own names. This was the fact, and the course pursued by the parties to the very case cited (Stearns v. Barrett [supra]), and proves conclusively that the real merits of the application never are, and never can be, made a subject of inquiry before the patent issues. That it never was intended to be, is evident from the proceedings and discussions upon the provisions of the bill.

It was originally proposed in congress, to vest the power of granting patents, in the district courts, and to connect with it the English system of proceeding upon caveats; thus affording to the public and particular objectors an opportunity of being heard, in opposition to the application, before the letters issued. This was a most important consideration, entitled to great weight and attention, with the view of protecting the community against fraud and imposition, and from the vexation and oppression incident to numerous and frivolous monopolies. The present arrangement was, however, preferred, and with its adoption was swept away all the law and the reason that sustains the proceeding by scire facias to repeal a patent. It presents scarcely a resemblance in any of its parts, to the model originally in the view of the legislature. Nearly all the formalities and solemnities attendant upon the granting of a patent or monopoly by the crown, were abolished, and the provision in the act of James, directing its validity to be tried and determined according to the course of the common law, was omitted in our statute. It was certainly well and proper that after a petitioner for a grant had successfully passed through three solemn and separate investigations of his claims, that his title should derive from the sanctions thus conferred upon it a good degree of security. It was therefore provided by statute in England that it should not be disturbed, but on an inquiry the most deliberate and solemn known to law; and it seems to me equally required by considerations of expediency and public safety that, when all preliminary inquiries are abolished, and monopolies and patents freely and gratuitously given to all who present themselves in the character of inventors or discoverers, there should be some easy and summary mode of investigating their merits and deciding on their validity. In England, as we have seen, this may be done repeatedly and thoroughly, before the patent goes forth; and I cannot believe, that here it was intended to be wholly dispensed with. Every presumption of reason and of law is against the position that under systems so fundamentally unlike, and circumstances so different, the expensive and dilatory forms of the common law were meant to be pursued in investigations of this sort. During their progress, an impostor or pretender might for a long time harass the community, and for a season reap the fruits of his iniquity and fraud. It is a settled principle that in framing one system after another, the parts omitted are not to be drawn into use by inference, but are abolished unless expressly preserved. The omission of the second section of the statute of James, could not have been accidental. It was too important to be overlooked, and must be presumed to have been discarded, as inapplicable to the new system which was recommended. It must be recollected, too, and as a circumstance entitled to great weight in estimating the intention of the legislature, that the execution of the tenth section of our act is confided to a tribunal which does not ordinarily proceed according to the course of the common law; and, as all the members of the committee that reported the bill were professional men, it must have occurred to them that the power it conferred upon the district court would be exercised after the course of its principal jurisdiction, unless otherwise directed and provided by the act. This circumstance, together with the cotemporaneous proceedings in congress, the radical departure from the English system of granting patents, the omission of the second section of the statute of James, and the total absence of any equivalent provision, press irresistibly upon my mind the conclusion that the proceedings under this section were not meant to be according to the course of the common law, but that it was intended to invest the district judge with a plenary supervision over the legality of patents, as a substitute for the English mode of proceeding upon caveats; that it was deemed inconvenient or impracticable to make the proper preliminary inquiries, in the first instance, at the department of state, and more expedient that they should be instituted upon complaint made in a regular manner before the district judge, in whom it had in the first instance been proposed to vest a discretionary power to grant these letters patent. That a summary inquiry into the nature, novelty, utility, and validity of these grants ought to be somewhere provided for and made, must be obvious to the common sense of the world. No community could long endure a system that exposed it to the perpetual ravages of pretenders, or the incessant contributions of impostors, levied upon articles in common use, or to the vending of dangerous and noxious compositions, unless some prompt and summary mode existed to investigate the fraud and abolish it. The construction of the tenth section of the patent law resolves itself then, as I conceive, into a question of vital importance to the value and safety of the whole system; and the exposition I have hitherto given it is sustained by the most direct and urgent expediency.

Against the weight and pressure, however, of all these considerations, whether resulting from legal deductions or drawn from expediency, I am still urged to the conclusion that the word "process" means a scire facias, and draws after it the whole course of the common law proceedings to repeal the patent. The subject therefore must be pursued, and if it shall be shown that a scire facias cannot in this case be issued upon any principles, or in pursuance of any practice known to the common law, I shall hope that the refutation of the argument is accomplished. In England the grants of the crown are consummated by the lord chancellor. They are enrolled in the petty bag office, and remain of record in chancery. They may be repealed or vacated. 1st. When the king has granted two patents for the same thing, the first patentee may have process, in the name of the king, to repeal the second. 2d. When a patent has been granted upon a false suggestion, the king can direct process to issue to vacate his own grant; and 3d. When the patent expresses a grant which by law the king cannot make. The appropriate process to repeal a patent in that country, and under their institutions and laws, is a scire facias. A scire facias is a judicial writ, and must, from its form and nature, be founded on some matter of record. To repeal a patent, it must invariably issue out of chancery, because there is the record of the patent, and from that reason alone it can issue from no other court. I have somewhere seen a loose dictum that it may issue from the king's bench, but that is not law. It cannot issue from any court without a record to sustain it. It may go from some other court, if a forfeiture appears there of office; that is, a record that will support the writ. It is even questionable whether the chancellor can make it returnable into the king's bench. If he should do so, perhaps that court would take jurisdiction, but the regularity of that course would at this day be much doubted. The writ is of course and of right returnable into chancery. The issue is there made up, and sent down to the king's bench to be tried. A scire facias to repeal a patent cannot issue at all without the fiat of the attorney-general; without the permission of the crown, sued for by petition, and thus announced by his principal law officer. It must issue, too, in the name of the king, as the source from which, by virtue of his prerogative, the grant proceeded. It never does, and never can issue in the name of an individual complainant or relator, although, upon the petition of a prior patentee, the right to use the king's name will be conceded.

If, then, we are to go out of the statute, and be governed in the use of a scire facias by the principles of the common law and the practice of its courts, upon what authority, it may now be asked, can a scire facias issue in this case? We have not the record of the patent. That is in the department of state. No inquisition nor forfeiture appears by office found in any of the courts. The United States are not complainants, and their law officer has in no way sanctioned this proceeding. These are indispensible prerequisites in proceeding according to the course of the common law, and the absence of them all proves incontrovertibly that upon its principles, and according to its practice, no scire facias can now go forth. By resorting to the common law, we find, it is true, the form of a scire facias to repeal a patent; but I am unwilling at one moment to appeal to that law to enlighten and direct me, and the next violate all its precepts, and disregard all the rules it prescribes. If we go to the common law for the form of the process, we must go to it to ascertain the occasions that authorize and the principles that regulate its use. Every tyro can turn to his books and give us the form of a sci. fa. to repeal a patent; but to what purpose, unless the circumstances of the case justify its use? What avails it to have the form of a fi. fa. or a ca. sa. before you, unless you have a judgment on record to authorize its execution?

The act establishing this court, it is said, gives its power to issue a scire facias. So it does, "agreeable to the principles and usages of law." And it has been proved that "principles and usages" do not authorize it to send forth this writ, as it is called, without some matter of record to support it. This court derives power from the judiciary act to issue this process upon its own records, upon recognizances to revive judgments, and in all cases in which the courts of common law in England could issue it. That is the authority given by the act, and it goes no farther. The English courts can not issue it to repeal a patent; nor can this, unless the power is clearly and expressly given by statute. We are told, too, that although legally and technically the proposed process should be deemed inadmissible, yet something in the nature of a scire facias may be devised, with a view to procure the trial by jury. But if it cannot be done "agreeable to the principles and usages of law," it can not be done at all. From the judicial act we derive no power or authority to invent, model, or make a new and illegitimate thing, such as never yet was thrown before the profession, and profanely call it a scire facias, according to the forms of the common law. It is alleged that the ninth section of the act of '89 provides for the trial by jury of all issues of fact. It certainly does to the whole extent of the jurisdiction it confers; but no rule of construction can extend the operation of that provision to cases not within the purview of the act. It confers limited jurisdiction, and directs how it should be exercised. The power granted by the patent law, is no part of the ordinary or general jurisdiction of the district court. That act invests it with new authority. To its general powers it superadds new and independent jurisdiction; and for the manner of exercising it we must look to the act which confers it. When the proper occasion shall occur, there will, I trust, be neither doubt nor difficulty as to the construction of the act of '89. It should be recollected, however, that the question before us is whether an issue that can go to a jury shall be formed, and how? When that shall be accomplished, there will be no controversy as to the farther course to be pursued. With all my respect for the wisdom that devised the trial by jury, and all my veneration for the important securities derived from that great and salutary institution, I cannot accede to the suggestion that this is a question peculiarly fit to be submitted to the decision of a jury. The validity and legality of patents are questions that involve important distinctions of law, and are so intimately blended with legal considerations as to render them, in my judgment, generally most proper for the exclusive examination of this court.

After due deliberation, and a careful examination of the act, I can find nothing in the section itself, nor in the context, nor in the report of the proceedings of the congress that enacted the law, leading to the conclusion that a scire facias, or process in the nature of a scire facias, according to the forms of the common law, and the verdict of a jury against the patentee, were anticipated or intended by congress as preliminary steps to the process of repeal, which the section directs the district judge to issue. I remain of the opinion that all the judicial authority intended to be given by the tenth section is vested exclusively in the district judge; that the proceeding under it was meant to be summary, and that no other can be had, without more detailed legislative provision on the subject. For there is now no law of the United States to authorize and regulate it, and no practice in England by which it can be justified. The course pursued here is prompt and efficacious, as is obviously required by the nature of the case. It enables the judge with authority analogous to equity powers to effect all that under a different organization, in conformity with the English system, might have been accomplished by scire facias, caveat, or bill in equity. As to the mode of proceeding, I shall maintain the course pursued by Messrs. Ely, Authon and McCoun, in the first case that came before me, and adopt their reasoning in support of it.

It will be seen, by a reference to the section under consideration, in an early stage of these remarks, that upon oath or affirmation made before the judge, that the patent was obtained "surreptitiously, or upon false suggestion," a motion may be made, within three years after it was issued, for a rule that the patentee "show cause why process should not issue against him to repeal such patent." And if the matter alleged shall appear to the judge to be sufficient, it shall be lawful for him to grant the rule. If, in answer to the rule, sufficient cause shall not be shown, it shall be made absolute, and thereupon he shall order process to be issued with costs of suit.

The first obvious remark to be made here is that the process to be issued is process to repeal the patent, not process commanding or summoning the patentee to show cause why it should not be repealed. The phrase, "a rule to show cause," is technical language, and its meaning is therefore to be ascertained from its common legal acceptation. A rule to show cause why a certain thing should or should not be done in the progress of a suit at law, why a defendant should not be discharged on common bail, why bail should not be mitigated; why proceedings should not be set aside; becomes absolute as a matter of course against the party to whom it is addressed, unless he complies with the exigence of the rule; that is, unless sufficient cause be shown, the defendant will be discharged, or the bail will be mitigated, or the proceedings set aside.

The construction contended for on the other side denies to an absolute rule the character of absoluteness, and converts it into an interlocutory rule, effecting nothing absolutely or definitely, but serving merely as the basis for a writ in the nature of a writ of scire facias. Now, a scire facias, though it may vary somewhat in form, is in fact nothing more than a rule or summons to show cause. So that a rule to show cause is to be an anomaly in our judicial proceedings, and means only that the party defendant is to show cause why another rule to show cause should not be served upon him. It is impossible that a construction leading to conclusions so absurd, should be correct.

The rule to show cause is granted upon evidence sufficient, in the opinion of the judge (unless contradicted), to make the patent void. It seems to me to follow inevitably that unless contradicted, it is made void. The rule is made absolute, and the patent made absolutely void, upon the evidence already produced, because nothing effectual has been shown in opposition to it. The construction I am opposing involves another glaring absurdity. The complainant is not only to swear or affirm that "the patent was obtained surreptitiously or upon false suggestion," but must do more, if required; for "the matter alleged must appear to the judge to be sufficient." He must therefore go into the merits of the case, ex parte, before he grants the motion; and when the defendant appears the judge is bound to examine into the merits of the cause he shows, why his patent should not be repealed. A scire facias, or another rule to show cause, with reference to a jury trial, at this stage of the proceedings, and under such circumstances, would reverse the whole order of judicial administration, and subject the decision of the judge, on a matter upon which he was compelled to decide, to the supervision of a jury summoned to re-examine and re-judge the decision already pronounced by the court. This would be a great novelty, to say the least of it; and to the adoption of it I feel some repugnance. The common sense and true law of the section I apprehend to be this: The affidavits on which the motion is founded should not only state that the patent was obtained "surreptitiously and upon false suggestion," but the particular facts in the case, to which those terms refer, and of which they are predicable. Upon such an application the judge decides whether the matter alleged is sufficient. If it be, he grants a rule to show cause why the patent should not be repealed by process from his court. If the defendant does not appear, the sufficient allegations stand uncontradicted; the rule for a repeal is made absolute, and process of repeal, including authority to levy the costs, is issued. It is equivalent to a judgment by default. If, however, he does appear, the third clause in the section becomes applicable. For what purpose can he appear, except to answer the allegations on which the rule was granted? And how can a scire facias be necessary, commanding him to appear, when he has appeared already? Having appeared, a regular hearing is had upon the merits of the cause shown, which can be no other than whether his title to the patent be good or bad. If it shall appear to the judge that the patentee was not the true inventor or discoverer, or if the cause shown be for any other reason deemed insufficient, then upon this formal hearing a formal judgment shall be rendered by the court for the repeal of the patent; but if the cause shown be sufficient, then judgment shall be given against the complainant for the costs of the defendant.

Upon the appearance of the party, the proceedings should be analogous to those, on other rules of a similar kind. The defendant makes his defence with like weapons, to those brought against him by affidavits. The witnesses may also be openly examined as bail are on a justification. Thus, according to my view, the three clauses of which the section is composed, contains three distinct provisions, and each is made to effectuate a distinct purpose. The first gives the rule to show cause. Under the second, for defects in the cause shown, or the non-appearance of the party, the rule is made absolute, and by reason of his default is declared to be repealed. The third supposes an appearance, and gives a final judgment upon a full hearing in favor of one or other of the parties. This seems to me a plain and regular course of proceeding. I perceive nothing that can throw a doubt over the meaning of the legislature, but the repetition of the word "sufficient," in the second and third clauses of the section. That in the second, it is presumed, was inadvertently inserted. If expunged, the entire section, I think, would be relieved from all doubt. It is certainly worthy of particular observation that, although the act was drawn by three able lawyers, the familiar and well known terms "scire facias" and "trial by jury," do not once occur in the section we have been considering. It is hardly credible that professional men could have avoided their use, if they intended to convey the meaning ascribed to them by the counsel for the patentee. And it is equally preposterous to suppose that they would talk of "showing cause" before a jury, when we all know that this language is technically and professionally appropriated to summary proceedings before the court.

The principles of the former act of 1790 [1 Stat. 109] afford, it is believed, a farther illustration of this subject. The first section of that act directs the petition to be presented to the secretary of state, the secretary for the department of war, and the attorney-general. They, or any two of them, are authorized to cause letters patent to be issued, "if they shall deem the invention or discovery sufficiently useful and important." Thus it was made the duty of these officers to inquire into the utility and importance of the proposed patent before it issued; and the period for instituting a subsequent inquiry, like the present, was limited to one year. The investigations, however, at the departments, necessarily summary, were found inconvenient in practice, and the act now in force abolished them by omitting the words which imposed the duty, but made the patent subject to this mode of examination, for three years after it was granted, as a substitute for the provision in the first act intending, obviously, to preserve the summary character of the inquiry during that period. Why else is the time limited? It could not have been meant to close the door forever after to common law proceedings. No, for three years the inquiry is to be summary, and then the community is left to the other remedies provided by the statute. If this be not the meaning of the legislature, this kind of property is invested with a character and clothed with a sanctity not conceded to any other in the country. The whole course of legislation on the subject has confirmed me in the conviction that it never was intended to abolish all kind of summary inquiry into the validity of these grants, and that the course I have adopted, and the exposition I have given of the tenth section, is in coincidence with the true meaning of the act.

I can but regret that the remarks I have made on this question are unavoidably irregular and desultory. They have been committed to writing during the sitting of the court, and under the embarrassments resulting from the daily pressure of other important business.

M'GEHEE et al. v. HENTZ et al.

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 14, 1879.

BANKRUPTCY — PETITION FILED IN ANOTHER DISTRICT—POWERS AND JURISDICTION — PROCESS — COMPOSITION—BANKRUPT AS CUSTODIAN—RIGHT TO SUE.

1. Every district court in the United States has jurisdiction and authority to make all lawful orders and decrees in bankruptcy, although the original petition in bankruptcy was filed in another district, provided that the relief asked is such as cannot be given by the district court where the original petition was filed, because the persons or property sought to be affected by the order or decree are beyond the reach of its process, and that they are within the reach of the process of the district court whose aid is invoked.

[Cited in Re Tifft, Case No. 14,034.]

2. An order made in a composition proceeding appointing the bankrupts custodians of their property does not put them in the position of an assignee, so that they can maintain a suit under section 4979 [Rev. St.].

[Cited in Re Michel, 6 Fed. 709.]

3. The complainants, who are residents of the state of Louisiana, filed a petition in bankruptcy in that district, and proposed a composition, which was accepted and confirmed, and the complainants appointed custodians of their property, and authorized to protect and collect the same for the purposes of the composition and for the benefit of their creditors. The names and address of the defendants, H. & Co., and the amount of the debt due to them, were entered in the schedule annexed to the petition for composition. Within four months prior to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, the defendants, H. & Co., who were residents of the state of New York, commenced an action against complainants by publication, and attached a debt due to them from M. & Co., also residents of New York, of a less amount than their claim, and subsequently recovered judgment in said action. In a suit brought to obtain an injunction against H. & Co. and the sheriff to restrain their proceedings on the judgment, and for an accounting and payment of the debt by M. & Co., held, that complainants were not entitled to relief in injunction; that, as no assignee has been appointed, the lien of the attachment continues, and is preserved by the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]; and that while H. & Co. are bound by the composition as to their claims in personam against the complainants, their rights in rem against the property attached are not affected or impaired thereby.

Wm. E. Sleger, for complainants.

Chambers, Boughton & Prentiss, for Hentz & Co.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a motion for an injunction in a bill in equity. The complainants [Scott] McGehee, Snowden & Violette, were partners in business, residing and doing business at New Orleans, in the state of Louisiana, and on the 27th of May, 1878, they were adjudicated bankrupts, on their own petition, by the district court for the district of Louisiana. On the same day they filed their petition for a meeting of their creditors, to consider a composition proposed by them. The composition proposed was five cents in one year and ten cents in two years. Regular proceedings on the petition were had, which resulted in an order, made Nov. 23, 1878, confirming the composition and directing it to be recorded. The defendants, Hentz, Eastwood and Seman, all of the city of New York, and partners composing the firm of Henry Hentz & Co., are creditors of the complainants, and the names and address and the amount of their debt, about nine hundred and thirty-six dollars, were entered in the schedule annexed to the petition for composition. Within four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, Hentz & Co. commenced an action against the complainants in the supreme court of the state of New York, and procured an order of attachment therein, under which they attached a debt then due to the complainants from the firm of Macauley & Co., also residents of New York, the amount of said debt being six hundred and thirty dollars and fifty cents. In that action, the defendants being non-residents, service by publication was ordered, and judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs, Hentz & Co., by default, Oct. 11, 1878, and execution issued to the sheriff of New York for one thousand one hundred and fifteen dollars and twenty-six cents. On the 11th of October, 1878, on their own petition, the bankrupt court in Louisiana made an order appointing and confirming the bankrupts as custodians of all their assets, authorizing them to hold, protect, and collect the same for the purpose of the composition and for the benefit of their creditors. The bill is addressed to this court sitting in bankruptcy, and is brought against Hentz & Co. and the sheriff and Macauley & Co., praying an injunction against Hentz & Co. and the sheriff to prevent their further prosecution of their proceedings on the judgment against the attached property, and as against Macauley & Co. an accounting and payment of said debt due the bankrupts.

It is objected by the defendants that this court has no jurisdiction nor any authority to enjoin the enforcement of the judgment and execution; that the complainants' remedy, if any, is in the district court of Louisiana, or, for the purpose of having the attachment dissolved, if entitled to that relief, in the state court where the judgment was recovered. It seems to be settled, however, that every district court in the United States has jurisdiction and authority to make all lawful orders and decrees in bankruptcy, although the original petition in bankruptcy was filed in another district, provided that the relief asked is such as cannot be given by the district court where the petition was originally filed, because the persons or property sought to be affected by the order or decree are beyond the reach of its process, and where they are within the reach of the process of the district court whose aid is thus invoked. Shearman v. Bingham [Case No. 12,762]; Lathrop v. Drake, 91 U. S. 516.

The case is therefore to be judged as if the original petition were filed in this district. Nor is there any doubt of the subject-matter of the action being within the jurisdiction of the court in bankruptcy conferred by Rev. St. § 4972. The suit relates to the ascertainment and liquidation of a lien claimed by a creditor upon the bankrupt's estate. It is a controversy relating to the adjustment of a claim of priority and conflicting interests between a bankrupt and a creditor, and relates to the disposition of the assets. The jurisdiction is clear enough under section 4972, but I cannot accede to the argument of complainants' counsel that the order appointing the bankrupts custodians of their property puts them in the position of an assignee, so that they can maintain a suit in the district or circuit court under section 4979. That section relates to suits by and against assignees only. The order appointing the bankrupts custodians of the assets seems not to be provided for in the bankrupt law. If it has any force, it may be to give them the powers of special receivers; but even then they are not within the provisions of section 4979. The jurisdiction in this case being in a proceeding in bankruptcy, the court has power to enjoin interference with the property of the bankrupts, if a proper case for relief is made out. Rev. St. § 720, does not prohibit such an injunction. Even if the application should have been by petition instead of bill, the bill may be treated as a petition if the complainant is entitled to relief.

On the merits, however, I think the complainants are not entitled to relief on injunction. The attachment which Hentz & Co. procured was, at the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings, a lien on the property against which they are now proceeding by execution. Being within four months of the filing of the petition, it was liable to be dissolved if the case in bankruptcy had proceeded in due course to the appointment of an assignee; but, unless an assignee is so appointed, the lien continues, and is preserved by the bankrupt law. In re Clapp [Case No. 2,785]; In re Irons [Id. 7,067]. The cases cited to the contrary in the state courts have not received the approval of the federal courts. Miller v. Mackenzie [43 Md. 404]; Smith v. Engle [44 Iowa, 265]. Now, in the present case, if the appointment of an assignee were in the due course of the proceedings to be anticipated, the creditor having the voidable attachment would, doubtless, pending the question of such appointment, be restrained from enforcing his lien. But, in the present case, the bankrupts and the creditors have elected, as they have a right to do, an entirely different mode of dealing with the bankrupts' estate, and one which excludes the appointment of an assignee. Even without the order of the court making the bankrupts custodians, the proper meaning of the composition agreement is that the bankrupt is left in the possession and control of his property. The bankrupts certainly are bound by the election thus made by them and by the terms of the composition; both they and their creditors have virtually agreed that the bankrupts should retain their property subject to all existing liens. It is suggested that the resolutions of composition may yet be amended by providing for the appointment of an assignee to take and hold the assets pending the payment of the composition, or that the bankrupts may be unable to pay their composition, and so that an assignee may necessarily be appointed. As to the first suggestion, it is a possibility merely, and cannot affect the present rights of the parties, nor would it be proper for the court, in view of such a bare possibility, to stay the proceedings of the lienor in order to enable the bankrupts and the creditors to do what they may never agree to do, and what is entirely at variance with their intentions as expressed in what they have already done. As to the other suggestion, that the composition may be set aside, I think that it is enough to say that the bankrupts and the creditors, having agreed to an arrangement which preserves this lien upon proceedings which imply deliberate choice of remedies based on a careful consideration of their own best interests and the ability of the bankrupts to carry it out, are not entitled to ask that the secured creditor wait two years before realizing on his security upon the bare possibility that the arrangement may fail. They have taken the risk of the arrangement being successfully carried out, and cannot complain if it is treated by other parties in interest as if it were a final arrangement. I see nothing in the case of In re Bayly [Case No. 1,144], decided by Judge Wood, cited by complainants, which conflicts with the views here expressed. In this case the amount of the security is less than the debt secured by it, and the nature of the collateral security is such that there can be no loss or sacrifice of the property of the bankrupts in the application of the collateral to the debt. There is no ground for injunction, therefore, either because the bankrupts' other creditors have an interest over and above that of the secured creditor in the property attached, nor because the assets held by the secured creditor are likely to be sacrificed as by a ruinous sale. It is unnecessary to consider, therefore, whether in this case, if either of these circumstances appeared, an injunction would be proper.

It is insisted by the complainants that Hentz & Co. are bound by the composition, and that they cannot claim more than the composition percentage. This is true of their claims in personam against the bankrupt, but it does not affect or impair their rights in rem against the property on which they hold security. This suggestion is fully answered in the cases cited above.

The view taken of the case makes it unnecessary to consider whether Hentz & Co.

have acquired any new rights in the property attached by their judgment and execution. Injunction denied, and temporary stay vacated.

McGILL v. JORDAN.

[18 Reporter, 642.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 21, 1884.

ESTOPPEL BY DEED — AFTER-ACQUIRED TITLE — WARRANTY—INTENTION—MORTGAGE—LAND OFFICE TITLE.

1. Where one undertakes by deed to convey an indefeasible estate in fee-simple he will not be allowed to set up against his vendee, or one claiming under him, a subsequently acquired title.

2. This is the case even where there are no covenants of warranty, if the intention of the parties to the deed as gathered from the words thereof appears to be to convey the entire estate and not merely the estate which the grantor has then therein.

3. Where two tenants in common execute a mortgage and afterwards one of them conveys by the deed his share to the other, the words of the two deeds being apt to express a fee, the grantor and mortgagor will not be allowed to set up against one claiming through the mortgage a title obtained from the land office subsequently to the date of the mortgage.

Motion for judgment non obstante veredicto.

Ejectment. On the trial it appeared that the land in controversy was part of a larger tract known as the "Mount Holly Iron Works Estate," which the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank in 1846 conveyed to Kropff, who was the plaintiff's grantor, and Geisse for $21,000; that Kropff and Geisse executed a purchase-money mortgage of the said estate to their vendor; that in 1848 Kropff obtained a warrant from the land office for the part in dispute in the present case, as land "unimproved and unclaimed by any other person;" subsequently, on October 28, 1848, Kropff conveyed "all his estate, right, title, and property in the 'Mount Holly Iron Works Estate,'" derived by the deed from the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank, to Geisse; shortly after this a judgment was obtained on one of the purchase-money bonds secured by the mortgage, and the land sold by the sheriff, to whose vendee the defendants traced their title. The court reserved the question whether the plaintiff were not estopped by the acts of his grantor Kropff from setting up his title, and subject to this reservation there was a verdict for the plaintiff.

John Ryon and Samuel Hepburn, Sr., for plaintiff.

Samuel Hepburn, Jr., and A. Sydney Biddle (with them, J. Rodman Paul), for defendant.

BUTLER, District Judge. The execution of the mortgage and the deed to Geisse are the acts relied upon to invoke the doctrine of estoppel. In Pennsylvania it is well settled that where one undertakes by deed to convey an indefeasible estate in fee-simple, he shall not thereafter be allowed to set up a subsequently acquired interest against his vendee or those claiming under him. The reason upon which this rule rests is obvious. Having induced the vendee to part with his money upon the assurance imported by his act, the vendor should not thereafter be allowed to deny its truth, but should be treated as acquiring the outstanding interest for the vendee's benefit. The rule has its foundation in equity, and does not depend upon covenants contained in the deed. The avoidance of circuity of action has little if anything to do with it; and much of the intricate learning of the common law found in the older cases, respecting estoppel by deed, has become unimportant, if it ever had a place in the jurisprudence of this state. If, by the terms of the conveyance, no matter by what name called, the vendee is justified in believing that the estate conveyed is a fee-simple, indefeasible, common justice requires that the vendor shall not thereafter be allowed to deny that he conveyed such an estate. Chief Justice Tilghman, as early as 1816, in McWilliams v. Nisly, 2 Serg. & R. 514, says: "The case stands thus: James McWilliams sells and conveys land to which he has no title, and afterwards acquires title, can his heirs recover against his grantee? It appears to me that, in such case, they would be estopped by their father's act from denying his title; and if there were occasion for further assurance equity would compel them to make it." The same thing, in effect, is repeated in Brown v. McCormick, 6 Watts, 60. In Tyson v. Passmore, 2 Barr [2 Pa. St.] 124, the doctrine was again applied. Here the purchaser's rights depended upon articles of agreement to convey. Ejectment was brought to enforce specific performance. Of course, no covenants for title were involved. Nevertheless, an after-acquired title to a part of the land, in which the defendant had no interest at the time of contracting, was held to inure to the plaintiff's benefit. Root v. Crock, 7 Barr [7 Pa. St.] 378; Steiner v. Baughman, 2 Jones [12 Pa. St.] 106; Clark v. Martin, 13 Wright [49 Pa. St.] 299, are to the same effect. These cases show that the application of the doctrine of estoppel by the courts of this state depends, not upon covenants in the conveyance, but upon the intention of the parties (as gathered from their language) to convey the entire estate in the land; and further show that no particular form of expression is necessary to indicate this intention. In Smith, Lead. Cas. p. 471, Judge Hare, in treating of the doctrine as understood and applied in this state, says: "In Pennsylvania, where covenants of general warranty are comparatively unknown, a conveyance is held to estop the grantor from setting up any interest which he may subsequently acquire in opposition to his own deed. Hence, while some of the decisions have been based on the idea that a specific covenant or recital is necessary to create an estoppel, there are others which go farther and take the ground that every grant carries with it, prima facie, a presumption that the intention was to confer a good title to the land, and preclude the grantor from relying on an after-acquired title, in derogation of his deed, which must prevail, unless there is something special and restrictive in the words employed, authorizing a narrower interpretation." The same learned author, when considering the doctrine of estoppel, without special reference to its administration by the courts of this state, says: "In a number of the more recent decisions it has been held that the question is one of intention; and while a warranty may be restricted by its own terms, or those of the deed in which it is inserted, a deed without warranty may operate as an estoppel, in order to prevent a failure of the purpose with which it was executed." The fair result of the more recent cases would seem to be that whenever the terms of the deed or of the covenants it contains show that it was meant to convey an absolute and indefeasible title, and not merely the interest which the grantor had at the time, it will pass every estate and interest which may vest in him subsequently, whether the warranty be general or special, or though it may contain no warranty at all. These decisions abandon the technical ground taken in the earlier cases, that the estoppel grows out of warranty, and rest it on the broader basis of giving effect to the intention of the parties as expressed in the deed. This is the doctrine of the federal courts, as well as of the courts of Pennsylvania, in which state the land in question is located. In Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 297, it was held, that "if a deed of conveyance, expressly or by implication, affirms that the grantor has and conveys a fee-simple in the land, his heirs are estopped from denying that he had the estate, and passed it to the grantee, and this may appear by any part of the deed, or by other writings referred to therein." It will be observed that, in this case, a tenant for life, merely, conveyed the land without any express covenants or recitals whatever. In French v. Spencer, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 228, it was decided that where a grantor expressly or impliedly sets forth that he is seised of an estate which he purports to convey, he and all claiming in privity with him are estopped to deny that he was so seised at the time he conveyed. Such we understand to be the doctrine of estoppel, as applicable to the case before us. As we have seen, Kropff and Geisse executed a defeasible deed or mortgage of the tract of land known as the "Mount Holly Iron Works Estate," conveying it to the bank as security for bonds given the latter for purchase-money; and Kropff, two years later, executed a deed conveying his undivided half part of the tract to Geisse. Do these acts estop him from setting up the title subsequently obtained from the state, against the defendant, claiming under the judgment afterwards obtained, and the sale thereon? That the language of the mortgage, and of the subsequent deed to Geisse, aptly describe and purport to convey a fee-simple in the land,—in other words, to convey the entire property, free of all claims or charges of every kind and from every source, is, we believe, clear. The words "grant, bargain, and sell" import the conveyance of a fee-simple, indefeasible, with special warranty. These words are found in the granting clause of each of the instruments referred to, and the language of the habendum in each, "to have and to hold to the grantee, his heirs and assigns forever," is consistent with this import, and inconsistent with any other. That the warranty is special is not important, as we have already stated. There is no implication from a vendee's acceptance of a special warranty that he takes the land subject to defects of title, or incumbrances created by others than his grantor. It is true, that if he fails to discover an existing defect or incumbrance of this description, before payment of the purchase-money, he may be without means of relief. But if the discovery be made before payment, he may set up the defect or incumbrance as failure of consideration, and successfully interpose it to an action for the purchase-money. This is well settled. Steinhauer v. Witman, 1 Serg. & R. 438; Roland v. Miller, 3 Watts & S. 393; Murphy v. Richardson, 4 Casey [28 Pa. St.] 292; Lighty v. Shorb, 3 Pen. & W. 447. It cannot be seriously doubted that the parties to each of the instruments referred to understood that the lands described were conveyed in fee-simple, free from charge or claim of every character. The reference to quit-rents and money due the commonwealth, found in old conveyances of the title, are deemed immaterial. They did not inform, nor tend to inform, the bank or Geisse, or the sheriff's vendee, of the continued existence of such incumbrances. The absence of reference to them in subsequent conveyances was sufficient to justify a conclusion that they had been discharged. Kropff's acts in conveying as he did were an implied declaration that no charges or incumbrances existed. The case of Skinner v. Shannon [unreported], cited by the plaintiff, has no application to the facts of this case. There the land was conveyed expressly subject to an incumbrance; the amount of which, the court says, must be presumed to have been deducted from the purchase-money. The purchaser not only had notice of the incumbrance, but agreed to assume and pay it.

The plaintiff attaches importance to the fact that the sheriff's sale was not in pursuance of scire facias on the mortgage, but was under a judgment recovered on one of the bonds which the mortgage secured. In this, however, we cannot agree with him. Under the laws of this state the proceeding on the bond, and the sale in pursuance of it, discharged the mortgage. It was but another method of foreclosure; and the sale therefore transferred to the purchaser precisely what he would have taken if the creditor had proceeded by scire facias. A different view would deprive the creditor of a valuable part of his security. The purchaser took, therefore, the same estate that he would have taken if the mortgage had been an indefeasible deed, executed directly to him; and the consequences to Kropff are in all respects the same as if he had so executed it. But the result is not different if we look alone to the effect of Kropff's act in conveying the land to Geisse. The title of the sheriff's vendee is, of course, referrible to this deed, as well as to the mortgage. This latter deed, also, as we have seen, contained an implied assurance to Geisse and the sheriff's vendee that Kropff had at the time, and that he transferred, an indefeasible title in fee-simple. Judgment for the defendant, notwithstanding the verdict.

BANKRUPTCY — SALE BY ASSIGNEE — JUDGMENT LIEN — EFFECT OF CONFIRMATION — JUDGMENT CREDITOR AT SALE — PROCEEDINGS BY CREDITOR.

1. Where an assignee petitions to sell real estate of the bankrupt, subject to certain specified liens, and it is so ordered, a sale by the assignee free from all liens does not devest the lien of a previous judgment creditor, no reference having been made in either the petition or order to any liens other than those specified.

[Cited in Re Cooper, Case No. 3,190.]

[Cited in Beall v. Walker, 26 W. Va. 747.]

2. If the report shows a sale free and clear of all incumbrances except those named, a simple confirmation by the court is not equivalent to an authority, and does not discharge such liens. To effect that it must expressly appear that knowledge of this excess of power exercised by the assignee, was brought to the knowledge of the court, or that the report was ratified as such.

3. Presence of judgment creditor at the sale by his counsel, would not estop him, there being no authority to sell free and clear of his judgment.

4. It is competent for the court in bankruptcy to authorize a creditor to proceed in the usual way to collect his debt, if that course seems best for the estate.

[Cited in Phelps v. Sellick, Case No. 11,079.]

This was a revisory petition, under the second section of the bankrupt act, filed by Samuel A. Jewett, a purchaser of real estate at assignee's sale, to set aside an order of the district court, authorizing Robert Corbett, a previous judgment creditor of the bankrupts, to proceed upon his execution, and satisfy his judgment out of the property sold by the assignees to Jewett.

Finches, Lynde & Miller, for petitioner.

By the rules of construction uniformly adopted by the courts, as to contracts, statutes, and orders and decrees, the order of sale in this case was the same in its import and meaning as if it read subject to the incumbrances therein named, and free and clear of all other incumbrances. If it was not intended to sell free and clear of all incumbrances except those named, why were any named? If the assignees were to sell the property subject to incumbrances, they had full authority by virtue of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], without any application to the court. In re McClellan [Case No. 8,694]; In re Mebane [Id. 9,380]; Kelly v. Strange [Id. 7,676]. It was only necessary to apply to the court for an order of sale where it was sought to sell the property free and clear of incumbrance, and it was for this purpose the application was made to the court, and the order of court obtained to sell subject to certain incumbrances. The mention of these incumbrances in the order of sale necessarily negatived all idea that the sale was subject to other incumbrances, upon the familiar maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius." Allen v. Dykers, 3 Hill, 595; Philadelphia, etc., R. Co. v. Howard, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 340; Wait v. Wait, 4 Comst. [4 N. Y.] 101; Morey v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 14 N. Y. 306; Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 259; Sill v. Village of Corning, Id. 306; People v. Draper, Id. 568; Methodist Episcopal Church v. Jaques, 3 Johns. Ch. 110; Atkins v. Bordman, 20 Pick. 304; Com. v. Kneeland, Id. 230; Jordan v. Dennis, 7 Metc. [Mass.] 591. For what purpose were these incumbrances specifically mentioned, unless it was intended that the sale should be subject to those incumbrances alone? It was evidently the intention of the assignees in making their application to the court, that the real estate should be sold subject to the incumbrances named, and none other. They so announced at the sale, and the property was sold with that understanding to the petitioner, who paid full value therefor. It is a general principle that the district court is possessed of the full jurisdiction of a court of equity, over the whole subject-matters which may arise in bankruptcy. In re Foster [Case No. 4,960]. And supposing that the assignees and the purchaser were mistaken as to the construction of the order, the subsequent confirmation of the sale by the court ratified the sale and confirmed the title in the purchaser. The purpose and object of a master in chancery, or commissioner or assignee in bankruptcy, making a report of their sales to the court for confirmation is to inform the court of the terms of the sale, and the manner in which it was made, that the court may ratify it, if correct, and in accordance with the decree or order of court; and, if not, that the court may refuse to order a deed and set the sale aside, and order a resale in accordance with the original decree. The master or trustee is the mere attorney of the court, acting under a specially delegated authority, and in no case is he authorized to do more than to accept an offer or proposal to contract, which is of no validity unless it be accepted, ratified, and confirmed by the court. It is the court itself, for the benefit of all interested, therefore, who is the vendor in such cases. Anderson v. Foulke, 2 Har. & G. 353; Blasson v. Railroad Co., 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 207. When one purchases premises at a master's sale, under the understanding expressed at the time of the sale that he was to have a perfect title under the decree, or a title free from all incumbrances except those stated, and the master's deed will not give him such a title, he may be discharged from the obligation of his purchase. Morris v. Mowatt, 2 Paige, 589; Lawrence v. Cornell, 4 Johns. Ch. 545; Seaman v. Hicks, 8 Paige, 658. Assignees in bankruptcy are as much bound as any other description of vendors to show a good title to any property they offer for sale in the ordinary manner. Cooper v. Denne, 1 Ves. Jr. 565, note; McDonald v. Hanson, 12 Ves. 278. Where they contract to sell an estate generally, they are bound as other persons to make a title to the inheritance free from incumbrances. White v. Foljambe, 11 Ves. 337; Pope v. Simpson, 5 Ves. 145, and note 1; 2 Sugd. Vend. (6 Am. Ed.) 152, 153. These decisions are under the English bankrupt law, where the court has no such power as under our law, to sell free and clear of existing liens, and where the assignee is not regarded as the officer of the court, and the sale is not considered, as with us, a sale by the court. But in this case the sale was made by order of the court, by the assignees, under the direction of the court, and all the facts were reported to the court, and special mention made of the fact that the premises were sold free and clear of all incumbrances, except those specially mentioned. The district judge, in his opinion, says that his attention was not called to this clause. But this was not the fault of the purchaser. A party who invests his money on the faith of an order of court should be protected in his investment, and it is not incumbent on him to prove that the court did what it was its duty to do—know what order it was making. He has a right to presume that the court has done right. Bennett v. Hamill, 2 Schoales & L. 577. The jurisdiction of the district court as a court of bankruptcy extends to the collection of all the assets of the bankrupt, to the ascertainment and liquidation of the liens and other specific claims thereon, and to the adjustment of the various priorities and conflicting interests of all parties. The liens sought to be created against the purchaser are judgments against the bankrupt. A judgment lien on land constitutes no property or right in the land itself. A judgment creditor has no jus in re, but a mere power to make his general lien effectual by following up the steps of the law. Massingill v. Downs, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 767; Becker v. Morton, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 158; Conrad v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 443. In chancery the general lien of a judgment is controlled by equity so as to protect the rights of those who are entitled to an equitable interest in the lands or in the proceeds thereof. Ells v. Tousley, 1 Paige, 280; Buchan v. Sumner, 2 Barb. Ch. 165. The order to sell subject to certain incumbrances is equivalent to an order that the purchaser pay those incumbrances out of the purchase money. The court has, therefore, applied the full value of the property in payment of the prior liens, through the purchaser, who, at least, is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of those lien creditors whose liens have been paid. An incumbrancer has no right to complain when the property on which he has a lien is exhausted in the payment of prior liens. But if the court is of opinion that Corbett is entitled to relief, and should be allowed to sell, it should be upon the condition that he will file an offer to bid the premises up to the full amount of all liens prior to that judgment. The universal rule is that the party applying after confirmation of sale to set the same aside (in the absence of fraud) must offer to increase the bid.

John E. Stillman, for judgment creditor.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. The facts in this case are, that John McGilton and his partners were declared bankrupts by the decree of the district court. Assignees were appointed, and made application to the district court to sell some real estate on which were certain liens and incumbrances. The petition to the district court set forth the character and amount of the incumbrances, and asked that they have leave to sell the real estate, subject thereto. The district court thereupon made an order authorizing the assignees to sell the real estate subject to the incumbrances named. No mention in that petition was made of the judgment of Corbett against the bankrupts, nor any other liens than those described in the petition, nor did Corbett have any notice of the application.

Samuel A. Jewett was the purchaser at the sale. Thereupon a report was made by the assignees to the court, setting forth the application, the incumbrances, sale of the property, and purchase by Mr. Jewett; also declaring in the report that the sale was made "free and clear of all other liens and incumbrances, except those named."

The sale was confirmed by the district court. The particular order by which the sale was confirmed is not set out in the petition. The language of the petition is that the report of sale was confirmed; but in the absence of any evidence of the particular phraseology of the order by which the confirmation was made, the inference must be that it was simply an order confirming the sale.

The proceeds of the sale were distributed under the order of the court, exclusively in defraying the costs and expenses. The incumbrances, it should be borne in mind, upon the property, amounted to quite a large sum—over twenty thousand dollars, as stated in the petition—which of course the purchaser had to pay in order to get a title to the property.

After these proceedings took place in the district court, Robert Corbett made application to the district court to obtain satisfaction of a judgment which he had against the bankrupts, and which he claimed was a lien upon their real estate, and asked that it should be paid out of money in the hands of the assignees, or that he should have satisfaction out of the property of the bankrupts. After hearing this application, upon answer made by the assignees, and by Mr. Jewett, the purchaser at the sale, the district court made an order authorizing Corbett to proceed by execution, and have his judgment satisfied against the property. This judgment had been recovered in a state court, against the bankrupts more than six months before proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced.

It is this order which the petitioner Jewett seeks, under the second section of the bankrupt law, to set aside, on the ground that the sale was made of the property free from all incumbrances, and that the purchaser acquired a good title.

It will be observed from the statement which has been made, that the petition of the assignees to the district court simply requested, and the order of the court directed, that the property should be sold subject to the liens specified. It made no reference whatever to any other liens. It was not asked, nor was it authorized, that the property should be sold free and clear from all incumbrances other than those named.

And when the report was made, it contained what was not in the petition, nor in the order of the court, namely, that it was sold free of all incumbrances, except those named. That was inserted in the report, and, as I think, without authority.

Now, under such circumstances, it is clear, if it be conceded that the district court had the right (as to which I give no opinion) to effect the sale of the property free and clear of all incumbrances, by a simple ratification of the language of the report, then it should explicitly appear in the order of confirmation that the report was confirmed, and that the sale, which it is alleged the assignees made free from all incumbrances except those named, was confirmed as such, so as to show that the court acted upon that part of the report, and confirmed the sale by making it free and clear from all other incumbrances.

That would be indispensably necessary, I think, under the circumstances, in order to make it binding upon the court, because it could be only effectual by a ratification brought home to the knowledge of the court of this clause in the report of the assignees.

They were acting under a power. They were bound to follow the instructions of the power. If it was sought to be enlarged the court ought to have known of that enlargement, and ratified and confirmed it as such. Now, there is nothing to show, except what appears upon the face of the record, that this particular part of the report was brought to the knowledge of the court, and that it ratified that part. On the contrary, it is apparent, from the opinion of the district judge in deciding the question, that it was not done.

It is said in the petition that at the sale Mr. Corbett was present by his counsel, and made no objection. It does not appear what action the court took upon this point, or whether there was any proof heard before the court. In other words, it does not appear that the district court considered the question, or decided that Corbett, by being present through his counsel at the sale, and making no objection, was estopped from setting up a claim under his judgment. And therefore this court cannot consider that as a question properly before it for revision. Concede that were so—that by being present at the sale under certain circumstances, and making no objection, he would be estopped—it is sufficient to say that if he were present at the sale, which is denied by an informal answer put in, all that appears is that he was present with the knowledge of the authority which had been given, to sell, subject to certain judgments; and Corbett's judgment was not named in the list, neither in the petition nor in the order of the court, nor in the report of the assignees, nor in the confirmation in any way. And the district court never had any knowledge, it is fair to presume, of this judgment, until the petition was filed by Corbett. So that if he was present at the sale by his counsel, he was present in contemplation of law only with knowledge of those facts which were stated in the petition of the assignees, and in the order of the court. Whether he would be bound by an unauthorized statement made by the assignees at the sale, might admit of serious question.

We must concede that the bankrupt court had control of the property, because it was a simple lien, and the bankrupts owned the property, subject to the lien, and it passed to the assignees as the property of the bankrupts, subject to the lien. Still, if valid and subsisting, it could not be destroyed so long as the property which was bound by it remained under the control of the assignees, and of the court. Now, in the case as it is presented, the court must presume that this lien was a valid and subsisting lien, that it was not in violation of the bankrupt act, and I have no doubt, therefore, that the judgment of the district court was right—that this party is entitled to have satisfaction out of the property of the bankrupts.

It is to be observed that Corbett could not proceed upon his judgment without the consent of the bankrupt court. It is sometimes the case that creditors, who have judgments, proceed to sell the property covered by the lien of the judgment, where it has passed by law to the assignees; but the courts have uniformly held those sales were invalid, if made without authority of the bankrupt court. If it be admitted the court, where there are liens on real property of the bankrupt, can order it to be sold free from the liens, to marshal the assets and pay off the liens, it is equally competent for the court to authorize the creditor to proceed in the usual way to collect his judgment, if that course seems best for the estate.

The decree, therefore, of the district court will be affirmed, without prejudice to the right of the assignees to contest the judgment which Corbett has obtained, if they are advised that it can be done as being in fraud of the bankrupt act, or otherwise invalid.

Case No. 8,799.

McGINNIS v. CARLTON.

[Abb. Adm. 570.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1849.

ADMIRALTY PRACTICE—SUM LESS THAN FIFTY DOLLARS—COSTS—APPEAL.

1. Although the libellant, in his libel, claims a sum exceeding $50, yet if upon the hearing he admits that an amount less than that sum is all that is due to him, and claims to recover only such lesser sum, he can recover only summary costs on a decree in his favor.

2. The cause would not be appealable to the circuit court in that condition of the demand.

3. This court does not tax plenary costs when the sum in dispute does not exceed $50, although the proceedings are plenary.

This was a libel in personam filed by John McGinnis, against Henry Carlton. The libellant, in his libel, advanced a claim for $55. On the hearing before the commissioner, to whom the cause was referred, the respondent claimed a deduction of $10, the propriety of which was admitted by the libellant. The claim, as litigated before the commissioner, was thus reduced to $45 only. Upon that claim the libellant prevailed. On taxation of costs, however, plenary costs were taxed in his favor, on the ground that the amount of his claim, proceeded upon by the libel, exceeded $50. The respondent now appealed from this taxation.

W. Newton, for appellant.
F. C. Bliss, for respondent.

BETTS, District Judge. I think this case was clearly one of summary character. It was not appealable to the circuit court. Act 1803 (2 Stat. 244). The matter in dispute between the parties was less than $50. Rule 165 must be construed in subordination to the terms of the statute, as its design was to operate on those cases which were not appealable under the act.

The supreme court holds that a plaintiff may appeal or bring error, when his suit is for an amount above the limited sum, whatever may be the recovery. Gordon v. Ogden, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 33. That is justly so, when the court adjudge in invitum against his demand. But it seems to me that all the determinate character of the libel is taken away, if the libellant himself, on the hearing, admits his claim to be less than $50, although he has put it nominally above that sum in his pleading. It would be sanctioning a measureless abuse to permit parties to encumber, with plenary costs, suits for the most trifling sums by alleging a demand exceeding fifty dollars, when the claim he brings before the court as his actual demand is below that sum.

Congress manifestly designed that the decisions of the district court should be final in cases where the disputed matter was only $50, and not to allow appeals on claims exceeding originally that sum, but which the libellant conceded, on the hearing, had been reduced below it by payments before his action was brought. An appeal does not lie when the matter in dispute is not $50.

If the libellant, on the trial, had persisted in the demand in his libel of $55, and the court had allowed the respondent a charge of $10 against the demand, he might, undoubtedly, take the case to the circuit court, by appeal, to have that judgment rectified. But here, all the proceedings in court show that the real demand in dispute was $45 alone, and the court cannot be blinded by a formality in pleading, to give an advantage to the libellant in the matter of costs, which the judgment he asked and received, demonstrates he is not entitled to. Had the cause been allowed, on the technical frame of the libel, to go into the circuit court, it would, undoubtedly, be regarded as cognizable there only to the end of punishing the libellant by the infliction of costs, for intruding into that court a demand only disputable in the court below.

Congress has appointed no tariff of fees for the government of admiralty courts (See note to Simpson v. Caulkins [Case No. 12,880]). Those tribunals regulate that subject at their discretion. This court directed, by rule 165, that proceedings herein for the recovery of matters in dispute, not exceeding $50, may be summary; and by rule 176, that in causes of that character, the proctor and advocate shall not be allowed to tax over $12 costs. This limitation justly applies, although the form of procedure be made plenary, when it is made manifest to the court that the action is rightly a summary one. In this case the libellant made up and claimed a bill of costs for a litigation in a plenary action, and the taxing officer allowed it to him. From that taxation the respondent appeals. I consider the allowance unauthorized in law, and overrule it. The bill must be retaxed at $12, the amount limited in a summary action.

Case No. 8,800.

McGINNIS v. The GRAND TURK.

[9 Pittsb. Leg. J. 257; 4 West. Law Month. 80; 2 Pittsb. Rep. 326.]

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. 1862.

SEAMEN'S WAGES — SHERIFF'S SALE — MINORS — RIGHT OF FATHER TO MAINTAIN ACTION—RENUNCIATION—WATCHMAN—MARITIME LIENS.

1. A sheriff's sale of a steamboat does not discharge the lien of sailors' wages. Otherwise, if the wages are due to the owner of the boat.

2. A father may maintain an action, in admiralty, for the wages of his minor children, but it is a right which may be renounced or forfeited.

3. He may renounce it by voluntarily allowing his child to have the exclusive use of the fruits of his own industry; or he may forfeit his right by neglecting to perform those duties which are the foundation of that right.

4. A watchman, not during the navigation of the vessel, nor when she had cargo on board, but exclusively in a home port, at the Marine Railway, and when she was laid up for repairs, has no lien for his wages.

[Distinguished in Wishart v. The Jos. Nixon, 43 Fed. 928.]

5. This is not maritime service. It is the work of a landsman, rather than a sailor. It is completed before the voyage is begun, or after it is ended. It is, therefore, not a maritime contract, which can be enforced in a court of admiralty.

In admiralty.

Mr. Woods, for libellant.
Mr. Barton, for claimant.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. The libellant, a minor, by his next friend, R. B. Cool, sues for wages as a watchman on board the steamboat "Grand Turk," of which Wm. McGinnis, his father, was the owner. The interest of the father was, by a judicial sale and subsequent conveyance, vested in Geo. W. Coffin, who intervened to resist the payment.

As a general principle, it is not denied, that the lien of a sailors' wages is not discharged by a sheriff's sale,—Gallatin v. The Pilot [Case No. 5,199]; but it is contended, that the son being a minor, the wages were due to the father. If this be so, a sale by the sheriff confers all the title which the defendant in the execution had, and is equivalent to his own deed, with special warranty. The case would then present this bare propcsition: Can a vendor, for a consideration paid, retain a lien against property, which he has thus sold, and delivered, in the hands of his vendee; and that, too, for a debt due by himself to himself? Certainly he cannot, for when a chattel is sold and delivered to the vendee, the vendor has neither jus in re nor ad rem, neither a property in nor a lien on the thing sold. Gallatin v. The Pilot [supra].

In the present case, this all depends upon the relation subsisting between the father and the son. As a general proposition, it is undoubtedly true, that the father is entitled to the earnings of his children during their minority, nor is there any doubt that he may maintain a suit in admiralty for their wages earned in maritime service,—Plummer v. Webb [Case No. 11,233]; but this is not, like the duties of a parent, a right indissolubly attached to the paternal relation. It is a right which may be either renounced by the father or forfeited. He may renounce it, by voluntarily allowing his child to have the exclusive use of the fruits of his own industry, and he may forfeit his right by neglecting to perform those parental duties which are the foundation of that right. The Etna [Id. 4,-542]. The proofs have shown clearly that for two years, the father permitted the son to hire out, receive his own wages, and to have the control of his own actions, and it does not appear that this renunciation of the parental guardianship was attended with any results prejudicial to the minor. If the case depended upon this point, the libellant would be entitled to a decree, for courts of admiralty will always take care of the interests of minors, even against the grasping disposition of their parents.

But there is a bar to a recovery here, which meets us at the very threshold. This is not a maritime contract, which can be enforced in a court of admiralty. The libellant was a watchman, not during the navigation of the boat, or while she had cargo on board, but exclusively in the home port, at the Marine Railway, and when she was laid up for repairs. This was no maritime service. It was the work of a landsman rather than a sailor. It had nothing to do with the navigation of the vessel, no part of the services being rendered while the vessel was in motion. Like the case of McDermott v. The S. G. Owens [Case No. 8,748], decided by my Brother Grier, "the services are performed on a contract which is neither made at sea nor for service to be performed at sea; both (that is the contract and service) were in the port of Philadelphia, and within the county of Philadelphia. The ship was safely moored at the wharf, and was in the actual possession of the owners; the service had no agency in bringing her in; he was not carrying freight." For these reasons (which are quoted from Gil. Ad. Rep. 3), with others, the court decide that a seaman, whose wages have been paid up to the termination of the voyage, but who afterwards remains on board the vessel moored at the wharf, has no claim for services which a court of admiralty will enforce. The service performed here by the defendant as watchman is in no sense maritime. Like that of the "stevedore," "it is completed before the voyage is begun, or after it is ended," and has none of the characteristics of a maritime contract.

The libel is dismissed, with cost.

Case No. 8,801.

McGINNIS v. The PONTIAC.

[5 McLean, 359;[1] Newb. 130; 10 West. Law J. 174.]

District Court, D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1852.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—OHIO RIVER—SALVAGE—TEMPORARY MASTER — PERIL—ESCAPE—CAUSE OF ESCAPE—COMPENSATION.

1. This court has admiralty jurisdiction over the Ohio river.

[Cited in Seven Coal Barges, Case No. 12,677.]

2. Where a steamboat is in actual peril, and one is requested to take charge of her as master, and save her if possible, with no stipulation as to time or wages, the fact of acting as master, not having been so before, will not deprive him of the right to claim salvage.

[Cited in Spencer v. The Charles Avery, Case No. 13,232; The Connemara, 108 U. S. 358, 2 Sup. Ct. 757.]

3. The fact of peril is to be ascertained from the circumstances surrounding the boat at the time when the salvage service commences, and the fact of escape is not to be taken as proof that there was no peril.

4. The fact that the exertions of the salvor did not save the boat, she being saved by the particular manner in which the ice broke up, does not deprive him of the merit of a salvor, if he encountered the danger, and did all that could be done under the circumstances.

5. There is no fixed rule of compensation. It must depend upon the particular circumstances. It may be a per centage upon the property saved, or a fixed sum to be assessed pro rata upon the boat and cargo. In this case the latter course is adopted.

In admiralty.

T. Walker, for libellant.

C. D. Coffin and A. Taft, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. This is a libel in personam for salvage, prosecuted by Michael N. McGinnis, against the owners and freighters of the steamboat Pontiac No. 2. The material facts stated in the libel, on which the claim of salvage is founded are, that on the 30th of January, 1852, the steamboat Pontiac, with a valuable cargo, bound for Cincinnati, in ascending the Ohio river, some distance below Louisville, met with a gorge of ice, and was in a condition of extreme peril; that having been deserted by all her passengers, and many of her officers and crew, the libellant, then a passenger on the steamboat Sparhawk, also attempting to ascend the river, and involved in the same gorge, was requested by A. Warden, the master, and William F. Belser, one of the owners of the Pontiac, to take charge of her, and try to save her, the said master and owner, then being about to leave her; and that the libellant did accordingly take charge of her, and with the assistance of some of the officers and crew, saved her from her imminent peril, and brought the boat and cargo safely to Cincinnati. The libellant also avers, that upon the arrival of the boat at Cincinnati, he consented to the delivery of the freight to its several owners and consignees, but retained possession of the boat as salvor, till the 10th of February, 1852, when he was forcibly expelled from her by one of the owners, who refused to make him any compensation for his services, except his wages as master, for the time he was in command. The libellant claims reasonable salvage for assistance rendered the boat. The answer of the owners of the boat and of the cargo, after setting out the circumstances connected with the stoppage of the boat in the gorge of ice, denies that she was in peril; and avers that the libellant was employed to take charge of the boat as master, in the place of Captain Warden, then disabled by sickness, and not as salvor. The answer also denies that the Pontiac was deserted or abandoned at the time the libellant took charge of her, and alleges that she was well provided with men and the means necessary to preserve and protect her; and, that she sustained no damage, and proceeded on her way to Cincinnati, in charge of the libellant, as master, because of the continued ill health of Captain Warden, and his inability to resume the command; and, that the services of the libellant do not entitle him to compensation as salvor.

It is also set up in the answer, that the case made in the libel is not within the admiralty jurisdiction of this court. The facts requiring notice, preliminary to the consideration of the points arising in the case, as established by the evidence, may be summarily stated as follows: In the afternoon of the 30th of January last, the steamboats Ohio, G. W. Sparhawk, Washington, Pontiac No. 2, Milton, and Col. Dickinson, in the order here named, were attempting to ascend the Ohio river, through a narrow opening or channel made through the ice by two boats ahead of them, when the whole body of the gorged ice on both sides of this channel, before stationary, began to move, and in its progress entirely shut up the passage through which the boats before named were ascending; and they became so involved in the ice as to render it impossible to move by the aid of their machinery either upward or downward. The mass of gorged ice, thus set in motion, moved a distance of two or three hundred yards, when it stopped. By this moving of the ice, the Ohio, being ahead of all the other boats, was forced down for some distance; the Sparhawk, being the next to the Ohio, was driven down against the Washington; and such was the force of the collision, that the latter boat was sunk. The Milton was forced against the Col. Dickinson, materially injuring the latter; and, at the same time, the Pontiac was swung round, and driven stern foremost into a crack or opening in the ice, toward the Indiana shore, where she lay when the ice stopped; her bow quartering a little up the stream, and her stern within twenty or thirty yards of the shore. During this movement of the ice, and from the great danger in which all the boats were involved, there was much alarm and consternation among the passengers and crews, which was increased by the cry that the wrecked boat—the Washington—was on fire. The passengers and some of the officers and crews of all the boats, except the Ohio, from which escape was impossible, from the thinness of the ice surrounding her, left the boats in the ice and sought safety on shore. The gorged ice extended for some distance above and below where the boats lay; and, although the natural thickness of the ice, except near the shores, did not exceed six or eight inches, yet as the result of the stoppage of the mass of descending ice, it was so piled up and crowded together, that in some parts of the gorge, it was, as estimated by the witnesses, ten feet, or even twenty feet thick. After the stoppage of the gorge, leaving the Pontiac in the position before described, by the direction of Captain Warden, she was, as far as practicable, made secure in her place by a line or hawser, passed several times from her stern to the shore; and, by his order also, the ice immediately below the boat was cut away, that she might swing in toward the shore when the gorged mass should again start. The libellant, who had for some years been engaged in steamboat service on the river, both as a pilot and master, was a passenger on the Sparhawk. Some time in the afternoon, subsequently to the stoppage of the gorge, as before noticed, by the request of Captain Warden, and the concurrence of William F. Belser, one of the owners of the Pontiac, and then a passenger on her, the libellant consented to take charge of her as master, without any agreement as to compensation, or the time he was to continue in command. Captain Warden and Mr. Belser then left the Pontiac, and did not come on board again that night. Between six and seven o'clock in the evening, the libellant took the command of the boat, and was on duty till morning, giving throughout the night the necessary orders, and attending to the usual duties of a master. About eleven o'clock in the night, from the cracking of the ice above, it became certain it would again shortly be in motion; and, between three and four in the morning, the gorged mass started and passed down without any injury to the Pontiac. In the morning, after relieving her wheel from the ice which was gorged under and upon it, the boat proceeded on her course upward, in command of the libellant, and arrived at Cincinnati on the 5th of February.

This general view of the evidence will suffice, as opening the way for the consideration of the points arising in the case. It is insisted, in the first place, by the counsel for the respondents, that the libellant, as master of the Pontiac, has no claim for salvage service; having performed no duty that he was not bound to perform in virtue of his official relation to the boat. There is no room to doubt the correctness of the position, as a principle of maritime law, that a master, for any ordinary service in saving his vessel or cargo, cannot assert a claim for salvage. It is well settled, that, "in general, neither the master, nor a passenger, seaman, or pilot, is entitled to compensation in the way of salvage, for the ordinary assistance he may have afforded a vessel in distress, as it is no more than a duty; for, a salvor is a person who, without any particular relation to a ship in distress, proffers useful service, and renders it, without any pre-existing contract, making the service a duty. But a passenger or an officer, acting as such, for extraordinary exertions beyond the line of his duty, has been deemed entitled to liberal compensation as salvage." 3 Kent, Comm. 246; 1 Conk. Adm. 274. In the case before the court, the evidence affords no ground for the conclusion, that the services of the libellant were of such an extraordinary character as to entitle him to salvage, if he is to be viewed merely as the master of the boat, under the usual circumstances of employment as such. But it seems to the court a pertinent inquiry, whether under the peculiar circumstances in which the libellant took charge of the Pontiac, he is within the scope and reason of the rule excluding a master, for ordinary services, from setting up a claim for salvage. The rule is founded on considerations of public policy, and is designed for the protection of the great interests of navigation and commerce. The obvious propriety, not to say necessity, of providing against temptations to place property afloat on the ocean, lakes, or rivers, in a situation of peril, for the fraudulent purpose of asserting a claim of salvage for its protection and safety, led to its adoption. It is a rule, therefore, founded in good sense; and, in all proper cases, should be rigidly observed. But I do not perceive its applicability to the case of this libellant. He was a passenger on another boat, and could have had no agency in bringing the Pontiac into the position of danger in which it is averred she was placed. He was under no obligation to take command of her, or in any way to incur any hazard or render any aid for her protection or safety. He was requested to take charge of the boat, with an injunction to save her if possible, and without any stipulation as to wages or compensation. Do not these circumstances take the case out of the operation of the rule referred to, excluding a master, in ordinary cases, from asserting a claim for salvage service? And may not the libellant be fairly regarded as one who, within the definition before cited, has virtually proffered and rendered useful service to a boat in distress, without any pre-existing contract making the service a duty? So far as motive is concerned, the facts do not allow the presumption that the libellant would voluntarily incur the responsibilities and hazard resulting from his taking command of the boat, for the trifling pecuniary remuneration he would be entitled to as master, at the ordinary rate of wages, for the few days that he would be employed as such. It is therefore consistent with the facts to suppose, that he looked for some compensation for his services beyond the usual pay of a master. In stating, as the result of my examination, that under the circumstances of this case, I do not regard the fact that the libellant was in the position of master at the time the service was rendered, as excluding him from a claim for salvage, it is proper I should say, that I have reached this conclusion, without the aid of any authorities bearing on the point. In looking into the few books on maritime law, which are accessible to me, I have found no case reported, or principle settled, which directly touches the inquiry here involved.

The next point made by the counsel for the respondent is, that the steamboat Pontiac, at the time libellant took charge of her as master, and while he was in command, was not in such a condition of imminent peril as to be a subject of salvage service. It is a well settled principle of maritime law, that "to warrant a claim of salvage, the danger to the property saved must be real and imminent. Mere speculative danger is insufficient; but it need not be such that escape from it by other means was impossible." Talbot v. Seaman, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 1; 1 Pet. Cond. R. 229.

In looking into the evidence, it is impossible to resist the conclusion, that the Pontiac was in great danger, at the time, and after the libellant took charge of her. Her position after the moving of the ice in the afternoon, has been before noticed. She lay with her stern toward shore, in a crack or opening in the ice; her bow out, with a slight angle up stream; her stern being made fast to a rock on shore by lines. Several witnesses—of long experience on the river, and familiar with all its perils—say, they considered it certain the whole mass of ice in the river would be in motion during the night. They also state that there was the strongest probability, amounting, in the opinion of some of them to a certainty, that when the ice did start, all the boats in the gorge would be lost. Some of the witnesses state, that the Pontiac, from her position and her heavy freight, was in the greatest danger.

There was danger—some of the witnesses thought it inevitable—that the heavy shore ice would press down against the upper side of the boat and crush her; or, otherwise, the lines with which she was made fast would be broken, and she would be carried down and wrecked upon Rock Island, a short distance below. It appears, too, from the conduct of the passengers on all the boats, that they thought there was the most imminent danger the boats would be lost during the night. All left the boats and went ashore, although the night was very dark with constant rain; preferring to encounter the discomfort of exposure to the inclemencies of the weather—some without any shelter, and some imperfectly protected by tents—to remaining on the boats. As many of the officers and crews of the boats as were not needed for their management, also went on shore. Mr. Belser, one of the owners of the Pontiac, left her as already stated, with a charge to the libellant, in taking command, to save the boat if possible. Captain Warden also, on account of his feeble health, went ashore; giving, as the reason, that remaining on board, in case of accident to the boat, he might be obliged to take to the water, which would, as he thought, endanger his life, in his then condition of bodily ailment. Several witnesses—some of them officers on the Pontiac—state, that no pecuniary consideration would have induced them to stay on board during the night. The event so confidently anticipated in the evening, actually happened during the night. The whole mass of the gorged ice moved about three o'clock, threatening all the boats with destruction. But one, however, the Dickinson, was seriously injured. That the Pontiac was not lost was owing to the fact that the gorge broke first toward the middle of the river, and did not carry with it all the heavy shore ice above her.

This summary of the facts in this case shows, I think, conclusively, that the danger to which the Pontiac was exposed during the night referred to, was not merely speculative, but real and imminent. It is true, it is not proved that but for the service and assistance of the libellant the boat would not have been saved. Yet there can be no doubt that his taking the command of her, under the circumstances, involved great personal peril to himself; and that without his services, the boat and cargo would have been in much greater danger of being lost. Captain Warden, very justifiably, under the pressure of sickness, left her, as did also Mr. Belser, one of the owners. The presence of a master, for the proper management and security of the boat and cargo during the night, was indispensable. And the libellant, in consenting to take charge of her, in her condition of peril, and doing all that could be done for her safety, it seems to me, is not only entitled to the credit of courageous and meritorious conduct, but to a compensation, as for a salvage service. In 2 U. S. Sup. Dig. 731, I find the doctrine asserted, that, "in all cases where services are rendered in saving property in danger of being lost on the high seas, or when wrecked or stranded on the shore, it is, in the sense of the maritime law, a salvage service." The case referred to in the digest is that of The Centurion [Case No. 2,554]. I have not been able to refer to the reports from which the above citation from the digest purports to have been taken. If the principle is truly stated in the digest, it is certainly broad enough to embrace the present as a proper salvage claim. In reference to the amount of the compensation in salvage cases, there is no fixed rule. It is always to be determined by the sound discretion of the court. In the case of The Adventure, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 221, 3 Pet. Cond. R. 93, Mr. Justice Johnson, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It (the amount to be allowed) must in every case depend upon peculiar circumstances, such as peril incurred, labor sustained, value decreed, etc., all of which must be estimated and weighed by the court that awards the salvage." Again: "As far as our inquiries have extended, when a proportion of the thing saved has been awarded, a half has been the maximum, and an eighth the minimum; below that it is usual to adjudge a compensation in numero." "The reward should be such as not only to afford an ample remuneration to the salvor for the risk of life and property, and for the labor, privations, and hardships encountered, but so liberal as to furnish a sufficient incentive to similar exertions by others." 1 Conk. Adm. 282; The Henry Ewbank [Case No. 6,376]. "If the property saved is of great value, or if it was in a condition apparently hopeless, but for the interposition of the salvors, or if the service was undertaken with alacrity, and executed with a high degree of skill and energy; or if it involved extraordinary peril, or required severe and exhausting labor, the retribution ought to be proportionally liberal. The opposite of either of these circumstances ought, consequently, to produce the opposite effect." 1 Conk. Adm. 285—and the authorities there cited. But this claim of this libellant cannot be viewed as of the highest order of merit, and as entitling him to a high rate of compensation. His conduct was certainly praiseworthy, and such as to give him a fair claim to remuneration beyond the ordinary pay of a master, but there was not the personal risk, exposure, hardship, and labor; nor is there the certainty that the property was saved through his interposition, that will justify a large allowance to him as a salvor. And it may not be improper here to remark, that in salvage claims arising on the western rivers, the precedents of courts administering the admiralty law on the ocean, in regard to the amount of compensation, cannot be safely adopted. In general, the peril of life, in cases of disaster on our rivers, affording a claim for salvage service, is not equal to those resulting from disasters on the ocean.

Upon the whole view of the case, the court adopt the suggestion of Mr. Justice Johnson, in the case before referred to, and award a compensation in numero, to the libellant, instead of any fixed per centage, or proportion of the value of the property. And this amount is fixed at five hundred dollars, to be assessed upon the boat and the cargo, according to their value at the port of Cincinnati. Upon the question of jurisdiction, the court has only to remark, that the opinion of the supreme court at its last session, in the case of The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 443, is regarded as decisive. The decision in that case is authoritative in all the courts of the Union. By it the doctrine is settled, "that the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction granted to the federal government by the constitution of the United States is not limited to tide-waters, but extends to all public navigable lakes and rivers, where commerce is carried on between different states, or with a foreign nation."

McGINNITY v. WHITE et al.

[3 Dill. 350;[1] 1 Cent. Law J. 241.]

Circuit Court, D. Nebraska. May Term, 1874.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE TO FEDERAL COURT — ACT OF JULY 27, 1866 — CITIZENSHIP — AMOUNT — REMOVAL BY PART OF THE DEFENDANTS.

1. Under the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306), as to the removal of suits from a state court into the federal court, it is sufficient, it seems, as respects citizenship, that the defendant applying for the removal is, at the time of filing his petition therefor, a citizen of another state, and the plaintiff a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought.

[Cited in Jackson v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., Case No. 7,141; McLean v. St. Paul & C. Ry. Co., Id. 8,892; Curtin v. Decker, 5 Fed. 387; Glover v. Shepperd, 15 Fed. 835. Disapproved in La Montagne v. T. W. Harvey Lumber Co., 44 Fed. 647.]

2. It is sufficient in such a case that the matter in dispute exceeds $500 besides costs at the time when the right to the removal accrues and is applied for.

3. One of several defendants sued as co-partners may, if the other requisites exist, have the cause removed into the federal court so far as concerns himself.

[Cited in Steinkuhl v. York, Case No. 13,356; Rawle v. Phelps, Id. 11,588; Goodenough v. Warren, Id. 5,534.]

On motion by the plaintiff [John McGinnity] to remand the cause to the state court because it was improperly removed to this court. The removal was ordered by the state court upon the petition of Francis A. White, one of the defendants. The record shows that the plaintiff commenced his suit in the state court, February 28th, 1870, demanding, in his petition, of the defendants, five in number, as co-partners, $1,000 for work and labor. A summons claiming that amount was served. The defendants separately demurred for misjoinder of causes of action and parties defendant. On the 1st day of April, 1870, the demurrers were sustained and leave given to the plaintiff to amend the petition in forty days. On May 12th, 1870, an amended petition was filed against the same persons as co-partners, and claiming of them the "sum of $445, with interest thereon at ten per cent per annum from January 21st, 1870, * * * for work and labor before that date performed by the plaintiff for the said defendants, co-partners in business as aforesaid." The original petition referred to certain written contracts, but the amended petition does not. On July 22d, 1870, Francis A. White answered separately, traversing the petition, and especially denying that he was a co-partner with the other defendants, as alleged therein. One of the other defendants, G. Frederick White, answered separately to the same effect. The cause was continued, and at the December term, 1870, at the instance of the two defendants last named, the venue was changed to another state court, and in that court the cause was continued from time to time by stipulation until the 11th day of April, 1873, when the defendant, Francis A. White, filed his petition for its removal to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, and offering surety, etc. The petition was under the act of July 27th, 1866, and states, inter alia, that "the petitioner, Francis A. White, is now, and since the 19th day of February, 1873, has been a citizen of the state of New Jersey; that the plaintiff is, and was at the time of bringing the suit, a citizen of Nebraska: that the amount in dispute exceeds $500, exclusive of costs; that all the defendants, except David Everest, are citizens of some other state than the state of Nebraska (naming the states); that there can be a final determination of the controversy, so far as concerns the petitioner, without the presence of the other defendants as parties," etc. The petition offers surety, etc., and prays the removal of the suit to this court. The surety was accepted and an order made transferring the cause as prayed. And now in this court the plaintiff moves to remand the same on two grounds: 1. The amount involved does not exceed $500. 2. One of several alleged co-partners made defendants is not entitled to remove the cause, where some of his co-defendants are citizens of the state in which the suit is brought.

Stephenson & Hayward, for plaintiff.

T. M. Marquette, for petitioner for removal.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and DUNDY, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. I. The petition for removal was under the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306). This enactment copies, in many respects, section 12 of the judiciary act as to the removal of causes into the federal courts, but it makes two important changes in that section; first, in authorizing, in certain cases, the removal by part of several defendants if some are citizens of the state where suit is brought, and others are aliens or citizens of some other state; second, in extending the time in which the application for the removal may be made, down to the trial or final hearing. But as respects the amount in controversy, the language of the judiciary act is retained—"the matter in dispute must exceed the sum of $500, exclusive of costs."

In cases like the present the amount in controversy, for the purpose of the removal, is determined by the declaration or petition. In this case a demurrer to the original petition having been sustained, the plaintiff made his case by an amended petition filed May 12th, 1870, in which he claimed to recover $445 with ten per cent interest from January 21st, 1870. This is the only pleading on the record which defendants were bound to answer, and is the one upon which the defendant who subsequently applied to remove the cause, took issue. At the time when this amended petition was filed, and at the time when the petitioner for the removal of the cause took issue upon it, the sum demanded, including interest, did not amount to $500. But by continuances the cause remained pending in the state court until the 14th day of April, 1873. Meanwhile, to wit, on the 19th day of February, 1873, the defendant, Francis A. White, who was served in Nebraska when the suit was originally commenced, became a citizen of New Jersey. At the next term of the state court thereafter, he applied for the removal of the suit, and by this time, if interest on the sum demanded in the amended petition be included, the amount was more than $500.

Under these circumstances the question is, whether "the matter in dispute exceeded $500," within the meaning of act of July 27, 1866. Under the amendatory act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 558), Mr. Justice Miller has determined that a party to a suit who while it is pending becomes a bona fide citizen of another state is entitled, if the other required conditions are met, to have the case removed. Johnson v. Monell [Case No. 7,399]. As both acts give the right to apply for the removal "at any time before the trial or final hearing of the cause," I can see no difference in this respect between the act of 1866 and the act of 1867, and the reasoning in the case cited seems to be applicable here, and to favor the right of removal. Pending the suit in the state court, the defendant has in good faith become a non-resident of the state of Nebraska and a citizen of another state, and it is this which constitutes the substantial ground upon which the right, under the act of 1866, to the removal is based. If, then, the right to removal accrues upon the party becoming bona fide a non-resident citizen, is it not enough that the total amount then claimed against him by his adversary exceeds the sum of $500? The action being ex contractu, the right to interest follows upon establishing the right to the principal sum, and may properly be included in determining the amount of the matter in dispute. I confess to doubts respecting the soundness of the foregoing view, but have adopted it because it seems to be equally consistent with the language of the act and more consistent with the reason and purpose of it than the opposite conclusion, denying the right to the removal on the ground that the amount was insufficient, when, if judgment should then be rendered by the state court, it would be for a sum greater than that which the act adopts as giving the defendant the right to the transfer.

II. This result makes it necessary to consider the other objection made by the plaintiff to the jurisdiction of this court, which is that the suit in its nature is not "one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy," so far as concerns the party applying for the removal, "without the presence of the other defendants as parties to the cause."

The five defendants are sued as co-partners, for work and labor, and the separate answer of the defendant now before us puts in issue two cardinal propositions in the petition: 1st. That he was a partner with his co-defendants; and 2nd. That the plaintiff is entitled to recover of him the amount claimed.

Under the legislation of congress and of the state of Nebraska, the plaintiff could have maintained an action against one or more of the defendants, and it would have been no cause of abatement that all the co-partners were not before the court.

If all the other defendants had failed to answer, the defendant who applied for the removal could have answered, as he did, for himself, and the issues thus raised would have stood for trial. Why can they not be tried, as well in the federal as in the state court? And when tried, is not the controversy finally determined, so far as it concerns him, as effectually as if all the defendants were in the federal court?

If the plaintiff establishes that the defendant was a partner, and that the firm was indebted to him as he alleges, he recovers of the defendant and takes his judgment, and meanwhile his case proceeds as to the other defendants in the state court. And so, if the plaintiff fails, the defendant has judgment in his favor in the federal court, leaving the plaintiff and the other defendants to their litigation in the state court.

This view of the case encounters the objection that it may compel the plaintiff to litigate in two courts, but that objection obtains in every similar case which falls within the act of 1866, for the express purpose of that enactment is to give the non-resident defendant a right to litigate separately in the federal court, in cases where his rights can be finally determined, which of necessity, as well as by the plain letter of the statute, leaves the residue of the litigation in the state tribunal. Motion denied.

McGLINCHY v. UNITED STATES.

[4 Cliff. 312.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Sept. Term, 1875.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—DOMESTIC GOODS BROUGHT BACK — CUSTOM-HOUSE DOCUMENTS — PLEADING — LEAVE TO AMEND — ESTOPPEL — LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—STATE STATUTE.

1. Where goods were withdrawn from a United States bonded warehouse, to avoid the payment of the internal revenue tax thereon, exported from a domestic port, carried beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, and then brought back into a domestic port, they are imported goods, although not actually landed in any foreign port or place.

2. Applications for leave to amend are generally addressed to the discretion of the court, and the ruling thereon is not generally the subject of exception or a writ of error.

3. Documents from the custom-house to prove the withdrawal of goods from a bonded warehouse, and their exportation in a certain vessel, are prima facie sufficient to sustain an allegation in the declaration that such things were done with the goods.

4. Some of the goods removed from the bonded warehouse, and then brought back, were seized by the United States as goods unlawfully imported in a certain ship or vessel without having a manifest on board. Held, the record of that proceeding, when offered in evidence, was not an estoppel to the right of the plaintiffs to recover in this case.

5. A state statute of limitations cannot have the effect to bar a right of action on the part of the United States secured to it by act of congress.

6. After suit brought, the time fixed by the statute of limitations for an action to be brought in, expired, and certain amendments were made to the writ after the time limited in the statute. Held, that this did not bar the right of action by the plaintiffs, where no new cause of action was introduced by the amendments.

[In error to the district court of the United States for the district of Maine.]

This was an action of debt by the United States, to recover penalties and duties for certain goods unlawfully imported into the United States, and bought by the defendant [James McGlinchy], knowing that the same were so imported. The case was tried in the district court, and a verdict rendered for the plaintiffs. [Case unreported.] Exceptions were taken, and a writ of error was sued out, and the cause removed to this court.

Nathan Webb, U. S. Dist. Atty.

W. L. Putnam, for defendant.

Before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and FOX, District Judge.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Persons who receive, conceal, or buy goods, wares, or merchandise, knowing the same to have been illegally imported, if the goods are liable to seizure by virtue of any act in relation to the revenue, shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay a sum double the amount or value of the goods so received, concealed, or purchased. 3 Stat. 781. Distilled spirits were, by section 14 of the act of March 2, 1867, made subject to a tax of $2 upon every proof gallon, to be paid by the distiller, owner, or any person having possession thereof, and the same section makes the tax a lien upon the spirits distilled, and upon the stills, &c., and on the lot or tract of land whereon the distillery is situated. 14 Stat. 480. Goods once exported, of the growth, product or manufacture of the United States, upon which no internal revenue tax has been assessed or paid, are made subject to a duty equal to the tax imposed by the internal revenue laws upon such articles, whenever the same are reimported into the United States. Id. 330, § 12. Warehouses are provided by law for the safe-keeping of distilled spirits, and the provision is that such distilled spirits may be stored in such warehouses, without the payment of the internal revenue tax, upon the terms and conditions specified in the act of congress. Id. 155. Provision is also made that such goods so stored may, in certain cases, be withdrawn for exportation without the payment of any such internal revenue tax; but it is expressly enacted that if the goods are subsequently reimported, they shall pay a duty equal to the tax imposed by the internal revenue laws. Id. 330. Pursuant to the provision authorizing distilled liquors to be warehoused, ninety-eight barrels of such spirits, of the product and manufacture of the United States, and subject to the said internal revenue tax, were deposited in a bonded warehouse without having paid the internal revenue tax; and the charge is, that the spirits so deposited were subsequently withdrawn for exportation without the payment of the internal revenue tax, and that the barrels containing the spirits were laden on board the schooner Adele, at Boston, in the district of Massachusetts, and that the same were duly exported from that port for St. Pierre, Miquelon, which is a foreign port or place, and that the schooner, with the spirits on board, regularly cleared from the port of Boston, and sailed from said port, with the spirits on board, for the said foreign port or place. Nothing irregular is imputed in those proceedings; but the complaint is that the said spirits were afterwards clandestinely imported into the port of Portland, without having paid or secured the payment of the internal revenue tax to which the same were subject, with intent to defraud the revenue of the United States, inasmuch as they were secretly and clandestinely landed in the night-time, without the permission of any authorized officer of the customs, whereby the said spirits became liable to seizure by virtue of the laws in relation to the revenue; and the charge against the defendant is, that he did receive, conceal, and buy the said spirits, then and there well knowing that the same had then and there been clandestinely and illlegally imported as aforesaid, with the design to defraud the revenue, without paying or securing the payment of the internal revenue tax to which the spirits were subject. Service was made, and the defendant appeared and pleaded that he did not owe the plaintiffs in manner and form as they had alleged in their writ and declaration. Issue was joined upon that plea, and the defendant also filed three special defences: 1. That the action is barred by the statute of limitations of the United States. 2. That the action is barred by the statute of limitations of the state. 3. That the plaintiffs are estopped from maintaining the action by the record and judgment in the case of U. S. v. Twenty-one Barrels of Whiskey [Case No. 16,568], previously tried in the district court, which goods were part of those seized in this case as hereinafter referred to.

Subsequently the parties went to trial, and the verdict and judgment were for the plaintiffs. Exceptions were taken by the defendant, and he sued out a writ of error and removed the cause into this court for revision. Testimony was introduced by the plaintiffs, showing that one Stanwood and De Long, who pretended to own one hundred barrels of whiskey of domestic manufacture, and which were then in a bonded warehouse, agreed together to withdraw the same from the warehouse for exportation, and to reland the same within the United States, without paying the internal revenue tax; and that they, in pursuance of that agreement, withdrew from the bonded warehouse ninety-eight barrels of the whiskey so deposited there, without the payment of the said tax or duty, and that those identical barrels, with their contents, were laden on board the schooner Adele, bound from Boston to St. Pierre, Miquelon, being a foreign port or place near the island of Newfoundland, and that the said schooner cleared from that port, and actually sailed from the port of Boston on that voyage, with the said barrels of whiskey on board. None of these allegations are much controverted, and the further charge is, that the schooner, instead of going to the port of St. Pierre, came to Long Island, in Casco Bay, and that she there discharged the barrels containing the whiskey, in the night-time, without any permit, leaving part of the barrels there, and the residue on Portland pier.

Evidence was also introduced by the plaintiffs that Stanwood sold and delivered twenty-three barrels of the whiskey to the defendant, and that the defendant paid the seller for the same, well knowing the whole transaction, as more fully set forth in the declaration and the bill of exceptions. Satisfactory proof was also introduced by the plaintiffs, that the defendant subsequently purchased of the same party twenty-seven barrels more of the said whiskey, and that when he purchased and received the same he well knew that the barrels of whiskey so purchased were part and parcel of the said quantity illegally landed as aforesaid in the night-time, without permit. Seasonable objection was taken by the defendant to the introduction of the evidence of the landing of the barrels of whiskey, on the ground that the whiskey was not shown to have been in any foreign port or place, and that such landing was not an importation within the meaning of the acts of congress; but the court overruled the objection, and the defendant excepted, which is the first error assigned by the present plaintiff.

Objection was also taken by the defendant to the admissibility of the evidence, because the declaration, at that stage of the trial, contained only one count; but leave was asked by the plaintiffs, and was granted by the court, to add the two additional counts shown in the bill of exceptions, and the defendant excepted to the ruling of the court allowing those amendments, which is the second error assigned by the defendant. Certified copies of the withdrawal and exportation entry, with all the certificates on the same, were also offered in evidence by the plaintiffs, to the admission of which the defendant also objected, because no rules nor regulations relative to the withdrawal of merchandise for exportation from bonded warehouses had been proved or read in evidence, and because it had not been proved that the whiskey had been lawfully deposited in a bonded warehouse, or even been in a condition to be withdrawn for exportation; but the court overruled the exception and admitted the evidence, and the defendant excepted, which is the third error he, as plaintiff in error, assigned in this case. Duly authenticated copies of the manifest of the owner, and of the outward foreign manifest, were also offered in evidence by the plaintiffs, to the admission of which the defendant objected; but the court overruled the objection and admitted the evidence, and the defendant excepted, which is the fourth error assigned.

Part of the whiskey delivered in Portland was afterwards seized on due process under the laws of the United States, and was condemned and forfeited; and the defendant offered the record of that proceeding in evidence, and contended that the record estopped the plaintiffs from maintaining the action as set out in his brief statement, but the court ruled otherwise, and instructed the jury that the said record is of no effect as an estoppel in the suit, to which instruction the defendant then and there excepted, which is the fifth error assigned. Widely different views were entertained by the defendant from those assumed by the plaintiffs, and he insisted that, inasmuch as the evidence did not show that the barrels of whiskey had ever been transported to, nor unladen in, a foreign port or place, the facts proved did not show that the same had been illegally imported into the United States, even admitting that the whole theory of fact assumed by the plaintiffs is otherwise correct, and he accordingly requested the court to instruct the jury that there is no evidence that the whiskey was illegally imported into the United States, within the meaning of the act of congress upon that subject. 3 Stat. 782. He also requested the court to instruct the jury that it is incumbent upon the plaintiffs to show that a proper exportation bond was given, and that a regular permit was obtained, before it can be held that merchandise is exported; and that, the plaintiffs not having proved that any such bond or permit was given or obtained, the action, in this case, cannot be maintained; but the court denied both requests, and instructed the jury that the documents from the custom-house, and the parol evidence introduced, if believed, made out a prima facie case that the whiskey had been in a bonded warehouse, and that it was withdrawn for exportation without further proof that an exportation bond and a permit were given or obtained; and that if so withdrawn and transported from the port of Boston in the district of Massachusetts, under a regular clearance for St. Pierre, and the same was conveyed in the schooner directly to Portland, upon the high seas, out of the jurisdiction of the United States, such distilled spirits, on being brought back into Portland, and there landed, became liable to a duty equal to the internal revenue tax unpaid upon the spirits, and, being so liable to duty were illegally imported, if the duty was unpaid; and that the defendant is liable for the double value of the whiskey, if he received, concealed, or bought the same, knowing it to have been illegally imported and liable to seizure, as charged in the declaration. Due exception was taken by the defendant both to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury as requested, and to the instructions given, and those exceptions constitute the sixth error assigned in the record. Evidently the first and sixth errors assigned present substantially the same question, which is, whether such goods exported from a domestic port, even if subsequently brought back and landed in the United States can be regarded for any purpose as imported goods, unless it appears that, subsequently to their exportation, they were actually landed in some foreign port or place.

Cases may arise in which the theory assumed by the defendant would perhaps be correct, as where the vessel containing the exported goods was obliged to put back for repairs in consequence of the unseaworthiness of the vessel, or where she was compelled to return by the death or dangerous sickness of the officers or seamen, or by war or blockade; but where the goods, as in this case, were withdrawn from the bonded warehouse to avoid the payment of the revenue tax to which the same were subject, and were exported with the intent to transport the same back to a domestic port as the means of defrauding the revenue, such a theory cannot be adopted, especially if it appears, as assumed in the instruction given to the jury, that the goods were actually exported, under documents regular in form, out of the jurisdiction of the United States, before the vessel put about, and before the goods were brought back and landed in the domestic port. Such a rule cannot be sanctioned, as it would afford absolute protection to the worst sort of smuggling, and would open the door to innumerable frauds. Fraud is directly imputed in the declaration and the evidence introduced by the plaintiffs warranted the jury in finding that the charge of fraud was fully proved; and in that view of the facts the court is of the opinion that the first and sixth errors assigned must be overruled. 5 Stat. 752, § 9. Application for leave to amend is in general addressed to the discretion of the court, and consequently the ruling of the court is not subject to exceptions or to a writ of error, and the court is of the opinion that the ruling in that respect, in this case, falls within the general rule, which disposes of the second error assigned. Exception was also taken to the admissibility of the documents from the custom-house to prove the withdrawal of the goods from the bonded warehouse, and their exportation in the Adele, as alleged in the declaration; but it is so manifest that the evidence offered was prima facie sufficient to support the allegations of the declaration, that it does not seem necessary to enter into much discussion upon the subject. Transportation bonds are required for the benefit of the government, nor can the defendant be heard to deny that the goods were regularly exported, even in a case where none such was given, if no other error is shown in the proceeding. Belcherral v. Linn, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 517. Such a bond ought to be required in such a case; but if it was omitted, it would not justify the shipper in violating other provisions of the revenue laws. Authenticated copies of the manifest of the owner, and of the outward foreign manifest, were also admitted in evidence; and the court is of the opinion that those documents were properly admitted, which is all that need be said in respect to the fourth error assigned.

Part of the whiskey was seized and condemned, under the laws of the United States, as goods unlawfully imported on a certain ship or vessel, without having a manifest on board, and the bill of exceptions shows that the defendant offered the record of that proceeding in evidence, as an estoppel to the right of the plaintiff to recover in this case; but the district court instructed the jury that the record was of no effect as an estoppel. Attempt is scarcely made to question the correctness of that ruling, and it is so obviously free from error that it will be sufficient to say that the fifth error assigned must also be overruled. Much discussion of the question of limitation is unnecessary, as it does not appear to be controverted that the original action was commenced in season to avoid the bar, even if the court should sustain the construction of the acts of congress in that regard, which is assumed by the defendant. Nothing need be said in reply to the defence that the action is barred by the state statute, as it is too clear for argument that a state statute cannot have the effect to bar a right of action secured to the United States by an act of congress. Suppose the original action was commenced in season to avoid the bar, still it is insisted by the defendant that the bar took effect before the new counts were filed, and he insists that those new counts introduce new causes of action, which, having been barred at the time the counts were filed, cannot be regarded as any part of the record. Even if that rule be conceded, it would not benefit the defendant, as the court is clearly of the opinion that the counts filed under the leave to amend do not introduce new causes of action, and consequently that the rule assumed by the defendant, even if it be correct, which is not admitted, will not entitle the defendant to a new trial. Both of the new counts were such as the court, in its discretion, might allow to be filed as amendments, and, being such, the ruling of the court, in allowing the same, is not the subject of error. Three years next after the penalty or forfeiture was incurred is the limitation originally prescribed by the act of congress. 1 Stat. 696, § 89. By the act of March 26, 1804, it is provided that any person or persons guilty of any crime arising under the revenue laws of the United States, or incurring any fine or forfeiture by breaches of said laws, may be prosecuted, tried, and punished, provided the indictment or information be found at any time within five years after committing the offence, or incurring the fine or forfeiture, any law or provision to the contrary notwithstanding. 2 Stat. 200, § 3. Beyond all doubt the effect of that provision was to repeal the prior limitation, and to extend the right of prosecuting the offender to five years. Exactly the same limitation is fixed by the act of February 28, 1839, provided that the person of the offender, or the property liable for the penalty or forfeiture, shall, within the same period, be found within the United States, so that process may be instituted and served. 5 Stat. 322, § 4. All these several limitations, except that prescribed by the act of Feb. 28, 1839, are expressly repealed by section 14 of the act of March 3, 1863; and it is clear that the repealing act does not enact any substitute provision in their place. 12 Stat. 741, § 13. No such proviso as that found in the act of 1839 is contained in either of the prior acts, and it may well be that congress intended to repeal the prior limitations and leave the one contained in the act of 1839 in full force, as the latter limitations would afford a remedy if the accused or the guilty property was out of the jurisdiction of the court during the whole period of the limitation. Express repeal of the act of 1839 is not pretended, nor is the implication in that regard so strong as to justify that conclusion. Wood v. U. S. 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 342; U. S. v. Walker, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 311. Viewed in any light it is clear that the defence set up in the brief statement that the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations of the United States is not sustained. U. S. v. Shorey [Case No. 16,282]. Successful denial of the following propositions cannot be made: 1. That the spirits in question were subject to an internal revenue tax. 2. That the spirits were deposited in a bonded warehouse without the payment of the internal revenue tax to which they were subject. 3. That the spirits were withdrawn from the bonded warehouse for exportation and without the payment of such tax. 4. That the spirits were exported from the port of Boston for the purpose of fraudulently relanding the same in the United States, as the means of defrauding the public revenue. 5. That the spirits were not only exported from the port of Boston, but were actually transported out of the United States before the schooner, in which the casks containing the spirits were, actually put back for the purpose of relanding the same, as charged in the declaration. Evidence tending to prove these facts was certainly introduced by the United States, and it must be assumed, in considering the errors assigned, that all these facts have been found by the jury, and if so, it follows, in the judgment of the court, that there is no error in the record. Judgment affirmed.

BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNEES—OBJECTION BY BANKRUPT—HOLIDAYS.

1. A bankrupt has a standing in court to object to the confirmation of assignees of his estate.

2. It is not illegal to hold a court of the United States on a day appointed by the president of the United States, and by the governor of the commonwealth, as a day of thanksgiving.

3. Where a register in bankruptcy held a first meeting of creditors on Thanksgiving Day, and no creditor was shown to have been injured thereby, and no one opposed the appointment of the assignee then chosen and qualified, except the bankrupt, and he had neglected to return the warrant to the register for a change of day, which the register had offered to make, the court refused to set aside the proceedings.

Petition by the bankrupt [James McGlynn] to set aside the appointment of assignees, because the first meeting of creditors was held on the day appointed by the governor of Massachusetts, and recommended by the president of the United States, as a day of general thanksgiving, alleging that seventeen creditors were named in the schedules, to whom were owed $3,451, and that only six of the creditors attended the meeting, and the aggregate of debts proved was $2,154.13; that the register was notified before the meeting was held that it had been called for a holiday; and that some creditors failed to attend by reason of the choice of this day. The answer of the assignees admitted that the meeting was held on Thanksgiving Day, but denied that any creditor had failed to attend on that account; and averred that the bankrupt had been notified by the register in due season before the meeting, that, if he would return the warrant for correction, a new appointment should be made; but the bankrupt neglected so to do. At the hearing, there was no evidence that any creditor was dissatisfied with the proceedings, or had failed to attend the meeting by reason of its being held on Thanksgiving Day.

S. Thomson, for bankrupt.

R. M. Morse, Jr., for assignees.

LOWELL, District Judge. It was made a question in argument whether the bankrupt has a standing in court to make this application. I think he has. It is in the power of hostile assignees to oppress and embarrass the bankrupt; and, while the courts have very properly held that persons intimate and friendly with him might be objectionable on that very account, it has not been denied that the confirmation of assignees who are unreasonably hostile might be opposed by the bankrupt himself. He is bound, by the statute, under a severe penalty, to give notice of any false debt that may be offered for proof; he is, besides, personally interested to see that no false debt is proved, because the creditors have a voice in his discharge; he is interested in the assets in the not unprecedented event of a surplus. His connection with the settlement of his estate is so close that he may object to the appointment of an assignee whom he finds unfit, or to have been irregularly chosen.

The petitioner has not proved that the assignees are unfit or incompetent persons, nor that any creditor wishes a change, nor that any one was prevented from attending the meeting. There is nothing which addresses itself to the discretion of the court under section 18 [of the act of 1867 (14 Stat. 525)] to order a new election. The illegality of the meeting is the only point now insisted on. That question appears to be settled by the case of The Tangier, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 28, and same case, Salmon Falls Manuf'g Co. v. The Tangier [Case No. 12,265], in which it was decided that the fast-day appointed in Massachusetts was not a dies non for merchants and ship-owners. I understand that case to decide that a mere holiday, whether established by usage or by statute, is not binding on persons who do not choose to observe it, unless work is actually prohibited by law, as it is on Sundays. I have not found any act of congress, or of the legislature of the state, which makes work illegal or punishable on Thanksgiving Day. The courts of Massachusetts are not to be held on that day, except for the purpose of entering or continuing cases, instructing or discharging a jury, receiving a verdict, or adjourning. Gen. St. c. 122, § 4. This prohibition does not extend, and could not extend, to the courts of the United States, as such, though, by comity, it would be likely to govern the practice of those courts, as it always has governed mine. So the president's proclamation appears to be rather a recommendation than an order. The bankrupt act (section 48) excludes Sunday, Christmas Day, the Fourth of July, and any day appointed by the president as a day of public thanksgiving, from the computation of time within which any act shall be done under that law, but does not of itself make the holding of court on those days illegal. I conclude, from this review of the law, that there was no positive irregularity in the meeting. The appointment was made by mistake, and the fact was first made known to the register by the bankrupt's attorney, after he had issued his warrant and given it to the bankrupt for service; and the register thereupon offered to change the day, if the warrant should be returned to him for that purpose. This was not done; and the only person who now objects to the proceedings is the bankrupt, who is responsible for them. Acquiescence would not make them valid, if they were void; but, as the question becomes one of discretion, and I find no creditor objecting, no person asking for an adjournment at the time, no imputation made in evidence upon the fitness of the assignees, and it seems probable that this application is intended merely to operate in avoidance of a suit which the assignees have brought against the bankrupt and his wife to set aside a conveyance which is alleged to be fraudulent, in which suit I have heretofore refused to inquire, collaterally, into the regularity of the first meeting of creditors. Under these peculiar circumstances, I do not think I ought to set aside the choice. Petition dismissed.

McGOVERN v. HEISSENBUTTEL.

[8 Ben. 46.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. Feb., 1875.

BILL OF LADING—DEMURRAGE—RECONSIGNMENT—USAGE—VARYING CONTRACT.

1. A cargo of coal, shipped at Schuylkill Haven, was brought to New York under a bill of lading, which contained these words: "With shipper's reconsignment option." It provided also for the payment of demurrage "if the cargo be not received within four working days after notice of arrival." On the arrival of the boat at New York, the master gave notice of her arrival to the consignee, who directed him to proceed to New Haven and deliver his cargo. The master denied the right of the consignee to reconsign him to New Haven, and refused to go there; but fifteen days after, he sent the consignee written notice that he was ready to discharge the coal at such place as the shipper should name, according to the bill of lading; whereupon the consignee in writing again directed him to go to New Haven, and sent an order for the towage of the boat. The master accepted this reconsignment, and his boat was towed, at the expense of the consignee, to New Haven and back. At New Haven the master sought, by retaining his cargo, to compel the payment of demurrage for his detention in New York, but finally delivered his cargo. His boat was detained, up to the time of her return to New York, for twenty-six days beyond the four days specified in the bill of lading, and the master brought suit against the consignee to recover demurrage for that time. On the trial the defendant offered evidence that by usage the option mentioned in the bill of lading is exercised by the consignee as well as by the shipper. Held, that such usage would be a varying of the written contract and was not admissible in evidence.

2. The master, by accepting the reconsignment of the consignee, waived his right to object; such option could only be exercised by the shipper.

3. The master therefore could not recover demurrage for the period while he was refusing to go to New Haven, or while going there, or while refusing to deliver his cargo at New Haven, and the libel must be dismissed.

In admiralty.

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for libellant.
Goodrich & Wheeler, for respondent.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action brought by Thomas McGovern, master of the barge Ann Burns, to recover freight and demurrage of the consignee of 165 tons of coal. The bill of lading, dated at Schuylkill Haven, June 24th, 1874, sets forth the shipment by the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Company, on board the Ann Burns, bound for 23d St., East river, N. Y., with shipper's reconsignment option, instructions at New Brunswick or New York, of a cargo of 165 tons of coal, to be delivered in like order and condition as above received (captain to pay no weighing expenses, extra tonnage, or costs of discharging cargo), at the aforesaid port of New York or port of reconsignment, danger of navigation excepted, to John D. Heissenbuttel, or his assigns, upon payment of freight and demurrage as follows: $1.65 per ton freight, together with demurrage as follows: If a proper berth for said vessel be not procured by the consignees of cargo, and cargo be not received from said boat, within four working days after notice of arrival, not counting day of arrival, the consignees for such day or part of a day thereafter (Sundays and legal holidays not excepted), shall pay the sum of eight dollars for each day.

The bill of lading also states that it is expressly understood that all freight in this bill of lading is exclusive of the cost of discharging, which must be done by the consignees without expense to the boat; also, that the captain is to pay no expense for weighing and the extra towage, and that the towage expenses of boats going beyond New York must be paid to and fro, from the Delaware & Raritan Canal Company's towing limit, by the consignee.

Under this bill of lading the coal in question was transported to the port of New York, and upon arrival there was reported to the defendant on the seventh day of July; whereupon the master was directed by the defendant to proceed to New Haven and deliver his cargo there to E. Barnes & Co. The master denied the right of the consignee to re-consign him to New Haven, and refused at first to go there. Afterward, on the 22d day of July, he addressed the defendant a written notice that he was ready to discharge the coal at such place as the shipper may name, according to the terms of the bill of lading. To this notice the defendant replied upon the same day as follows: "In response to your letter I have again sent towage order to the Eastern Transportation Company, to tow you to New Haven, where you were originally ordered. Report to Barnes & Co., New Haven, for unloading."

The master accepted the reconsignment, and allowed his vessel to be towed at the expense of the defendant to New Haven, and having there discharged his cargo, was then towed back to New York at the expense of the consignee, where he arrived on the 6th day of August, having consumed beyond the four days allowed by the bill of lading in the discharge of the cargo, a period of 26 days dating from the day of his arrival in New York.

He now claims to recover demurrage for these days, of the defendant, upon the ground that under the bill of lading the consignee had no right to re-consign the cargo. Upon the part of the defendants testimony is offered to show that, by usage of the trade, the option mentioned in the bill of lading of this cargo is exercised as well by the consignee as by the shipper. I doubt the competency of such evidence. It seems to me to vary the plain language of the bill of lading. The bill of lading gives an option to the shipper, but gives no option to the consignee. To enlarge by parol evidence the language of the bill of lading so as to include the consignee as well as the shipper, would vary the contract in an important particular. But this question becomes unimportant in this case by reason of the fact proved, that the libellant waived his right to object to the reconsignment made by the consignee, by accepting and obeying the instructions of the consignee to deliver the cargo in New Haven. The acceptance of the direction of the defendant to go to New Haven after the notice sent him of July 22nd was a clear abandonment of the position originally taken, and entitled the defendant to suppose that the master intended to acknowledge his right to reconsign the cargo to New Haven.

In view of such an interpretation of the contract put upon it by the parties at the time, it would be unjust now to hold the defendant liable to pay extra compensation, in the way of demurrage, for the carrying of the coal to New Haven, or to pay for the detention of the vessel while her master was in a posture of refusing to acknowledge a right on the part of the defendant which he afterwards admitted.

If bound by this contract to go to New Haven, upon being so directed by the defendant, the libellant should have gone when first directed. If not so bound, his duty was to discharge his cargo at New York, after notice to the consignee, and hold it for his freight. Nor can he recover for the delay which arose in New Haven, for the boat could have been discharged there without any delay if he had not sought by holding his cargo to force payment of the demurrage which he claimed to have been incurred in New York. The libel must accordingly be dismissed with costs.

McGOWAN v. CALDWELL.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 481.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1808.

PLEADING AT LAW—GENERAL PERFORMANCE—REJOINDER — EXCUSE FOR NOT PERFORMING — DECREE A VINCULO MATRIMONII—ARTICLES FOR ALIMONY.

1. After a plea of general performance, a rejoinder stating an excuse for not performing is bad.

2. A decree for a divorce a vinculo, and declaring that the articles entered into previously for alimony should remain in force, is no bar to an action upon a bond given to perform those articles.

[This was an action at law by McGowan against Timothy Caldwell.]

Debt on bond for performance of covenants for separate maintenance of the defendant's wife. Plea, general performance. Replication, non-payment of annuity. Rejoinder, divorce, and decree for alimony in Vermont. General demurrer and joinder.

Mr. Jones and Mr. F. S. Key, for defendant, contended that the bond is made void by the decree, although he admits that the covenants remain in force. When a person gets a security of a higher nature it merges the lower security. It is the same as if a judgment had been recovered on the bond. The court of Vermont has decreed the execution of the articles; but nothing is said of the bond. The divorce a vinculo matrimonii dissolves all the relation of husband and wife, and all the obligations of that relation. It dissolves not only the primary obligations, but all obligations or contracts founded upon such primary obligations. If the court had decreed a less alimony, or that a smaller sum should be allowed, the bond would have been void. So if a larger sum had been allowed. The court in Vermont, decreed that in lieu of all other alimony, the articles should remain in force as if the decree of divorce had not been made.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Law and Mr. Morsell, in reply. The court in Vermont could not annul the bond, and discharge the surety. Smith v. Buchanan, 1 East, 11. McGowan, the trustee, did not get a higher security. It is not a decree enforcing the articles. The covenants are not void; the consideration has not failed; the consideration was not marriage, but separation. The dissolution of the marriage does not dissolve agreements and contracts of the parties grounded not on the marriage but on the separation. The decree says that the covenants should not lose their effect. The court in Vermont, did not intend to discharge the covenants, or the bond given to secure their performance.

THE COURT (nem. con.) adjudged the rejoinder to be bad; not only as a departure from the plea, but as bad in substance, the bond not being affected by the decree.

[4 Am. Law Rec. 559.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. 1876.

LIFE INSURANCE — FORFEITURE BY NON-PAYMENT OF PREMIUMS—WAIVER BY GENERAL AGENT—NOTICE.

[1. The acceptance by a general agent of overdue premiums after the policy has become void for want of timely payment thereof, operates as a waiver of the forfeiture, when the insured has no notice of limitations upon such agent's powers, although in fact they are limited by secret instructions forbidding him to receive such premiums.]

[2. Where the original policy and all renewal certificates thereof have upon them clauses notifying the insured that the agent has no authority to receive past-due premiums, and that an attempt to do so would not be binding upon the company, this operates as notice to the insured; and any payments of overdue premiums will not revive the policy, unless known to, and acquiesced in by, the company.]

[3. Where the agent receives the amount of past-due premiums, and merely holds the money until he can write to the main office and get the renewal certificate with instructions, not accepting or intending to accept the premium as paid until the requirements of the company are complied with, and thereafter, on the failure of the assured to fulfill such requirements, returns the money to him, this will not operate as a waiver, even if the agent has full authority.]

[This was an action by Sarah K. McGowan against the Charter Oak Life Insurance Company to recover the amount of a policy on the life of her deceased husband, William McGowan.]

William McGowan, of Steubenville, Ohio, the husband of the plaintiff, had a policy upon his life in the defendant company to the amount of $2,000, which was taken out in 1866. The premium was payable annually on the first day of June. The premium due June 1st, 1868, was not paid until June 28th, 1868, and upon that date was received by the agent of the defendant, without a health certificate. The premium due June 1st, 1873, was not paid when due, and the general agent of the defendant wrote to McGowan, July 9th, 1873, asking him if he desired to renew his policy. McGowan made no reply until August 28th, 1873, when he mailed to the general agent, who lived at Marietta, Ohio, the amount of his premium by New York draft. The draft arrived at Marietta on September 1st, 1873, during the absence of the general agent from town, but a clerk in his office acknowledged the receipt of the draft by letter of same date, saying he wrote merely to acknowledge the receipt, and that when the general agent returned a proper renewal receipt would be forwarded. The general agent did not return until September 5th, 1873, at which time he took the draft and deposited it to his own private account in bank. Meanwhile, on September 1st, 1873, William McGowan had died. The general agent, not aware of this fact, sent to the home office of the defendant company, to have McGowan's renewal receipt forwarded to him, it having been returned to the home office in July, upon failure of McGowan to pay his premium. The home office forwarded the receipt to the general agent, with instructions not to deliver it till McGowan furnished satisfactory evidence of good health. Thereupon the general agent, still ignorant of the fact of McGowan's death, wrote to McGowan enclosing a health certificate for him to sign and return, when his renewal receipt would be sent him. Hearing nothing from this letter on the 1st of October, 1873, the general agent wrote again to McGowan, enclosing the premium sent by him in August. To this letter the plaintiff replied, refusing to receive back the money, except as a credit upon the amount due under the policy, and demanding payment of the policy, which the defendant refused.

Spencer & McCurdy and Mr. Steubenville, for plaintiff.

Willey, Terrell & Sherman and Mr. Cleveland, for defendants.

WELKER, District Judge, charged the jury: 1st. That the policy of insurance, was the contract between the parties by which their rights were to be governed; and that the policy providing that a failure to pay the premium on the day when it became due would render the policy void, the failure to pay the premium due June 1st, 1873, terminated the policy; but, 2d. That this provision of the policy might be waived by the company; and if waived, and the premium was received after due by one having authority, this would revive the policy; and that, in the absence of any notice to the insured to the contrary, the insured had a right to infer that the general agent of the company had authority to waive non-payment of the premium, and by receiving it after due, to renew the policy, and such act as between the company and the insured would bind the company, notwithstanding the secret instructions to the agent forbade him to exercise such authority; but, 3d. That if at the bottom of the policy, and also on the back thereof, as well as on all renewal receipts given to the insured since his policy began, there were clauses notifying him that the agent of the company had no authority to receive premiums after due, and that an attempt to do so would not be binding upon the company, such clauses were notices to the insured of the limitations of the authority of the agent in respect of receiving premiums, and being notice to the insured, no payment by him of an overdue premium would revive the policy unless known and notified by the company. 4th. That if the agent simply held the amount of the premium until he could write to the home office and get the renewal receipt and instructions, not accepting or intending to accept the premium as paid until the requirements of the company were complied with, and on failure of McGowan to comply with such requirements, the agent returned the premium. This would not be such an acceptance of the premium as would bind the defendant, even had the agent the fullest authority.

Under these instructions the jury returned a verdict for the defendant company.

BANKRUPTCY — RENT OF PREMISES WHILE IN POSSESSION OF MARSHAL.

At the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings, the bankrupts were occupying premises under a lease. The marshal, under the warrant, took possession of the bankrupt's goods on such premises, and they remained there in possession of the marshal till the appointment of the assignee. Held, that, on the facts of the case, the owner of the premises was not entitled to be paid out of the fund, for such occupation.

[Cited in Re Hamburger, Case No. 5,975; In re Ives, Id. 7,116.]

[See Bailey v. Loeb, Case No. 739.]

The bankrupts in this case [William B. McGrath and George B. Hunt] were occupying premises under a lease, at the time of their bankruptcy. When the warrant was issued to the marshal, he took possession, on October 15th, 1870, of the bankrupt's premises and goods, and remained in possession till December 13th, when he surrendered them to the assignee, who removed the goods from the premises, and gave up possession of the premises on the 1st of January, 1871. The landlord thereupon applied to the register for an order that a reasonable sum be allowed to him for the rent of the premises during that period. The testimony of the landlord was as follows: "From the 1st of January, 1871, I let the premises at the rent of $3,500 a year. If I had had possession before, I could have rented the premises. An offer of $3,000 rent was made before the assignee was appointed. If I had had possession of the premises on the 15th of October, I have no doubt I could have rented them for $3,000 within a week. I understand the goods were, very soon after the 15th of October, placed in four or five boxes. These boxes, with a little furniture, was all that was in the premises. They were kept by the marshal to store these boxes and furniture in, up to the time the assignee took possession. At that time I had let the premises at $3,500, possession to be taken on the 1st of January. The possession of the assignee, therefore, from the 13th of December to the 1st of January, did no harm, so far as rent is concerned. Had application been made to me when the marshal took possession, to store these boxes and furniture elsewhere, I should at once have stored them for a nominal sum, or, perhaps, for nothing, for the sake of getting possession of the premises and letting them to other parties."

By I. T. WILLIAMS, Register:

[I, the undersigned register, to whom this case is referred, respectfully certify and report that a claim of Joseph Lee against the said estate has been submitted to me by the respective parties. Upon an application of the said Lee for an order that a reasonable sum be allowed him from said fund for rent of the premises owned by him and heretofore let to and occupied by said bankrupts up to the time of their bankruptcy, to wit: the premises numbered sixty-four and sixty-six Lispenard street, in this city, at a rent of five thousand five hundred dollars per annum. After the bankruptcy, on the fifteenth of October, eighteen hundred and seventy, the marshal took possession of the goods and premises in question, and held them until the fifteenth of December following, when he surrendered to the assignee. It is very clear from the testimony, that the landlord is entitled to rent at and after the rate of three thousand dollars a year, that being the sum at which he could have rented it during these two months during the period the marshal so held it, which rent amounts to about five hundred dollars. I cannot think, under the subjoined testimony, that the estate is liable for that sum. The assignee was present in person and stated that he could not change the facts as sworn to by Mr. Lee, and it was submitted to my decision by both parties. I am unwilling to make the decision indicated above without first submitting the case to the court for instructions as I may do under the decision of Judge Cadwalader, in the case of In re Sherwood [Case No. 12,774]. If the court think my views above expressed are correct,

I shall deny the application of the landlord and leave him to his remedy at law.] [2]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The register is correct in his conclusion. On the testimony, the landlord ought to have applied to this court immediately after the marshal took possession of the goods and premises, to have the goods and furniture removed and the premises vacated by the marshal. Such motion would have been granted. If he had an opportunity to rent the premises, he should so have represented to this court.

M'GRATH v. The CANDALERO.

ADMIRALTY—ILLEGAL SEIZURE—DAMAGES.

Restitution of a vessel and cargo, illegally seized and carried into a French port, was decreed by the admiralty there. This court sustained a suit for consequential damages.

[Cited in The Martha Anne, Case No. 9,146; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. (47 U. S.) 432; Mendell v. The Martin White, Case No. 9,419.]

[This was a libel by M'Grath against the sloop Candalero and Henri Hervieux for damages for the illegal seizure of the schooner Polly and her cargo.]

The claimant in this case has produced no evidence, nor attempted to controvert that of the actor. The latter has proved that he is a native and citizen of the United States, and sole owner of an American schooner called the Polly. That on the 5th day of July last this vessel cleared regularly from this port, with a cargo, bound to the island of Providence, having on board all necessary papers. That the cargo was wholly neutral, and so expressed in the clearance, which enumerated every article; and that there was nothing contraband on board. That the Polly, commanded by Noah Wright, and having the actor on board, passed the bar of Charleston on her intended voyage, in company with a private armed vessel of war called the Narbonnoise, fitted under the authority of the French republic, and commanded by the claimant. That they proceeded together at sea about nine leagues, and then, on the afternoon of the same day, the said privateer took possession of the Polly, took out the owner, captain and crew, except one man, and carried the vessel to Port-de-Paix in St. Domingo, as prize. That the clearance and other necessary documents were produced, but entirely disregarded. Upon their arrival at Port-de-Paix, an examination took place in the office of admiralty, and a decree was passed ordering immediate restitution of the vessel and such parts of the cargo as belonged to M'Grath, and a sale of the rest, (which also belonged to American citizens) with a deposit of the money, until the owners should prove their right to the same.

It appears that before redelivery of the schooner to her owner she had been run ashore in a gale of wind, and received so much damage that she was sold for 600 dollars; much less than her previous value. And, there being no market for the owners' part of the cargo, he left it in the hands of the captors, and brings this suit for compensation for the loss he has sustained: 1st. By being carried to a distant port instead of that to which he was bound, and where his cargo would have sold to great advantage. 2d. By the damage done to his vessel, which he was compelled to sell at a very low rate, for want of funds to repair her. 3d. By spoliation of all his cabin and other stores. 4th. By being taken out of his own vessel, and confined for sixteen days on board the privateer. 5th. By the derangement of his affairs, having been kept out of business since August last.

The claim for damages is founded on the law of nations, and on the 22d, 23d, 24th, 25th, and 27th articles of the treaty with France.

The only justification set up by the claimant is 1st. His right, by virtue of his commission to board and search all vessels at sea. 2d. That an adjudication having taken place in the court of the power to whom the captor belonged, this court cannot inquire into the grounds of such decree, but must give full faith and credit to the same; and that if the party has been injured he must apply for relief to the executive power of these states.

The 27th article of the treaty with France regulates the mode of proceeding of their vessels of war and privateers, which, in the present instance was wholly disregarded. Hervieux first enticed this schooner to follow him to sea by an offer to pilot her over the bar, as she had no pilot on board. As soon as she had proceeded above a marine league from the coast she was pursued by the privateer, and two shots fired at her; the lieutenant then boarded her with five others, all armed, carried the captain and papers on board the privateer, and sent a prizemaster and crew on board the prize. Hervieux, on examining the papers, acknowledged their validity, but said that he would carry the vessel into a French port where provisions were wanted, rather than suffer her to proceed to an English one. This was done without the slightest pretext, and in wanton violation of the treaty; for even if she had had contraband goods on board, more than the captor could have received on board his vessel, the 13th article of that treaty provides that, this being the nearest port, the Polly should have been brought in here, where a proper and speedy remedy would have been afforded.

As to the right of this court to inquire into the adjudication that took place at Port-de-Paix, I am ready to declare that I should not do so with any view to controvert such adjudication; for the sentence of an admiralty court duly constituted must receive full credit in foreign countries. But I am called upon to support that decree. The case from Ld. Raym. 935, is good law, and it is there said by Lord Holt that the sentence of a civil law court in a foreign realm should be executed in England by a court of the same nature, and proceeding according to the same law. Had a suit for damages been dismissed at Port-de-Paix, it might have been a question whether this suit should be sustained. But as the illegality of the seizure was pronounced there, as the action is transitory, and the actor has chosen to seek for compensation in this court, I must say that his suit is properly brought. I think the libel relevant, and fully proved, and shall, therefore, proceed to inquire into the quantum of damages. The principles laid down in Lecaux and Eden (Doug. 575) apply here. Guided by them, and having fully inquired into the loss of time and property, and considered the imprisonment on board the privateer, I adjudge and decree that the claimant pay to the actor 1984 dollars, with costs of suit, and that the privateer remain under attachment till the same be paid.

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY—TORTS—ATTACHMENT IN REM—MOTION TO REVIEW—ERROR ON FACE OF RECORD.

1. Admiralty courts have jurisdiction to proceed by attachment in rem, for torts.

[Cited in The Bremena v. Card, 38 Fed. 145.]

2. Motion to review a decree must fail after writ of error lodged; and if the exceptions to the jurisdiction might have been taken before the decree passed. Otherwise, if error appear on the face of the record, or if new matter be discovered.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Thomas Bee, District Judge.]

[This was a libel by M'Grath against the sloop Candalero and Henri Hervieux for damages for the illegal seizure of the schooner Polly and her cargo. The court decided in favor of libelant (Case No. 8,809), and the cause is now heard on a motion to review and to discharge the property attached.]

BEE, District Judge. Out of this motion two points arise for discussion. 1st. Whether this court has jurisdiction to proceed, by attachment, for torts. 2d. Whether, even if they have not, exceptions to the jurisdiction are not now too late.

By the 9th section of the judiciary act this court has exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty, and maritime jurisdiction. At common law, an action will lie for seizing, stopping or taking a ship upon the high sea. Le Caux and Eden. Our state courts might, therefore, have exercised such jurisdiction; but the act of congress vests it exclusively in this court, in the first instance. If, then, the present motion succeeds, there would be a right without a remedy. It is not denied that attachment will lie in matters of debt or contract. Why not in cases of tort? If an alien sue here for a tort under the law of nations or a treaty of the United States, against a citizen of the United States, the suit will be sustained. Shall it be otherwise, where the alien is the offender, and one of our citizens the party complaining? The object of the attachment is to secure redress out of the property of the party, when you cannot get at his person. If he comes in time, and gives security, his property may be discharged. In short, I can see no reason for granting what is sought by this motion, and many for refusing it. Even if it were a new question, I should think it one of the cases in which a good judge would choose "ampliare jurisdictionem."

The second point is, whether after decree, and writ of error lodged, this application is not too late. I think it is. The parties themselves proposed to lodge this money as security, subject to the order of the court. At any rate it would have been liable, after the decree had passed. Even under the old practice of stipulation, body and goods were included. And if Hervieux were in custody on capias to fulfil the decree, he could have derived no benefit under the state law of insolvency, by which torts are excepted. It is laid down in Vin. Abr. tit. "Chancery" (Z.) par. 18, that "forgetfulness or negligence of parties is no foundation for a bill of review." "Matters which might have been put in issue in the original cause, shall never be examined on bill of review. Bill of review is allowed only on errors apparent upon the face of the record, or on new matter discovered since the decree." Gilb. Eq. 184.

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1803.

MARINE INSURANCE—FREIGHT—CUSTOM—TERMS OF POLICY.

1. The alleged custom, in Philadelphia, to strike off one-third of the gross freight, for charges, and to pay two-thirds only to the assured, in a policy on freight, where a total loss has occurred, is unreasonable, and is in direct opposition to the terms of the policy.

[Cited in Randall v. Smith, 63 Me. 107.]

2. Quere, if such an alleged custom were generally known by those interested in its operation, what would have been its operation?

3. The rules of law in relation to the proof, and nature of customs.

[Cited in Folsom v. Merchants' Mut. Mar. Ins. Co., 38 Me. 421.]

Covenant upon a policy of insurance on 12,000 dollars, for the freight of the Hercules from New-York to Hamburg. She was lost near the port of her destination, and the cargo, except a few articles, totally perished. The insurance company, upon notice of the misfortune, adjusted the loss according to the following account, and offered to pay the balance, which the plaintiff refused.

Statement of the Account.

And for return premium on $3,596 42, over-insured, at 5 per cent...	$ 179 82
½ per cent. as customary	17 98

There will also be a deduction from the above for such proportion of the freight as the insured received on goods saved.

Mr. Levy, for plaintiff, having added the primage to the freight list, demanded the aggregate amount, insisting that provisions for the crew were a charge upon the ship, and that wages were not earned when the ship did not arrive, and consequently could not be charged to the freight.

The defendants' counsel, to justify the statement which they had made, and by which they were willing to settle; called a number of witnesses, who were or had been insurers in Philadelphia, or who had been employed in the adjustment of losses; who stated, the uniform and invariable practice of the offices in Philadelphia, as well as of the private underwriters, had been for many years past, in the case of a total loss of freight insured in an open policy; to strike off from the freight list one-third of the amount, to cover the wages, provisions, and other charges upon the freight, and to add the premium to cover at five per cent. and two per cent.; in other words, that two-thirds of the freight list formed (according to uniform usage in Philadelphia for twenty or thirty years back, and as far back as the witnesses could remember) the nett freight, and was considered as the interest really insurable. The adjusting clerk in the insurance company stated, that where no loss happened, the company would at any time, upon demand, return the premium upon one-third of the freight list, though he recollected but one instance where it was done, or had been demanded. One witness said that he had been concerned in procuring insurances, as well as in underwriting at Lloyd's Coffee-House, in London, for ten years, and that the custom there was the same. The plaintiff lived in New-York, when this policy was effected for him by Mr. Taylor of Philadelphia. Taylor stated, that he never had heard of such a rule being established; that being desired at the office to give his orders for the insurance, he gave them in the words of his principal. Some of the witnesses stated, that they had very frequently advised those who applied to insure, to value their policies instead of having them open.

Mr. Rawle, to show that the construction of policies is controlled by usage, cited Park, Ins. 30, 44, 58, 60. That nett freight is what remains after wages, provisions, and other expenses, are deducted. He cited 1 Abb. Shipp. 228; 1 Magen, Ins. 52; Wesk. Ins. 244; Marsh. Ins. 329, 467, 571, 627.

Mr. Levy contended that the cases cited, are as to the usage of a particular trade, which is not like this case. He cited Park, Ins. 104.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). Customs acquire the force of law, because, as they must be ancient, uniform, and reasonable, they must have been generally received, known, and approved. The custom of merchants is founded on general consent and usage practised amongst merchants; and may or ought to be known by all who enter into negotiations within the influence of this law. The usage of a particular trade, is supposed to be known by those who engage in that trade; it is or ought to be equally well known by the person who insures against the risks incident to that trade, as to the person engaging in it. But that which is called a usage, in this case, is nothing more than a rule established by a particular class of men, to control a contract entered into by them with others, not privy nor consenting to the rule; and who are and can be under no legal obligation to know of its existence. It is a law governing this species of contract, different from the general law upon the subject, and varying the general rules of evidence. I will not say, that if both parties consented, the assured might not bind himself to agree to such a mode of adjustment; or that if the assured knew of the rule, and that it was uniform, he would not be bound by it under an implied consent. But I hold it necessary, that notice to the assured of such a rule should be proved, or the evidence should be such that the jury might fairly presume it. The rule in this case is in direct hostility with the plain meaning of the contract, and is intended to make it speak a language totally different from the obvious import of the words. The policy obliges the company to pay the value of the nett freight, and the rule excuses them from this obligation, upon their paying two-thirds of the gross freight. The face of the contract, so far from leading the assured to make inquiries respecting this rule, is calculated to deceive the party into a contrary belief. The rule is unequal and unreasonable, because the same deduction being made whether the voyage be long or short, the indemnity, in two cases exactly alike, except as to the length of the voyage, might be complete in one case, and fall very short of it in the other. If the assured always knew that the rule of the office was not to insure more than two-thirds of the nett freight, he might make it a valued policy, or cover the residue in some other office. The introduction of a very few words into the policy, would remove all inconvenience, by expressing the interest intended to be covered. That the rule is very little known, even by those who have been insured, is clear from the evidence of the adjusting clerk; who can furnish but one instance of a return premium upon the one-third not covered, where the vessel went safe; and yet it is scarcely to be supposed, that if the rule had been generally known, similar returns would not always have been demanded. Upon the whole, I think the plaintiff is entitled to recover one-third of the nett freight, which the jury would adjust.

In conformity with this charge, the jury found a verdict for 11,804 dollars.

COLLISION—BOAT ASTERN—RIGHT OF WAY—COMPETENT WATCH.

1. A boat astern attempting to pass one that is ahead, is held to stricter vigilance and greater precaution than are required of the latter.

2. The boat ahead is under no obligation to give way or to change her course to facilitate the passage of the boat which is astern, and the latter, having a choice of the time and place to pass, incurs all the risk of the attempt.

3. This principle applies with great force and stringency when the boat making the attempt to pass is lightly laden and easily controlled, and the other is moved with difficulty.

4. To entitle the libellants to indemnity for their loss, they must not only show that their adversary is in fault, but that in the management of their boat there was no material error to which the collision can be charged.

5. The absence of a competent and vigilant watch, constantly employed to assist and advise the pilot in his duty, is prima facie evidence of fault in the boat thus deficient.

[Libel for damages by Robert McGrew and others against the steamboat Melnotte.]

Lincoln, Smith & Warnock, for libellants.

Dodd & Huston, for claimants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a libel in rem against the steamboat Melnotte, in which damages are claimed for a collision with a coal barge in tow of the steamboat Hornet. The libel is in the usual form, averring that the loss and injury sustained were occasioned by the sole fault of the Melnotte. The answer takes issue on this allegation, and charges that the collision was caused wholly by the faulty management of the Hornet. The depositions of a number of witnesses have been taken by the parties to sustain the theory of the collision insisted on by each; and, as usual in such cases, the evidence on some essential points is in direct conflict. I have carefully considered the evidence, but do not propose to analyze it critically in stating my views. While this conflict in the statements of the witnesses unavoidably involves the facts in some uncertainty, the conclusion I have reached seems to be well sustained by the preponderance of the testimony offered by the libellants, as fortified by the fair presumptions and probabilities of the case. The collision took place about eleven o'clock in the night of April 26, 1860, on the Ohio river, just below the village of Newport, on the Ohio side. The Hornet is a stern-wheel steamboat, then employed as a tow-boat in the transportation of coal from Pittsburg to Cincinnati. At the time of the collision she was descending the river with seven heavily laden barges, five of which were near the bow, and two directly in the rear of the five, on either side of the boat. It is not controverted that the Hornet was properly equipped and manned as a tow-boat, and had the proper signal-lights, in good condition, at the time, and also that there was a light placed in the forward part of each of the front or wing barges. The Melnotte is a passenger boat of considerable power and speed, and, at the time of the collision, was also descending the river. A short distance above the village of Newport, she was astern of the Hornet, and attempted to pass that boat, on the Ohio or starboard side, nearly opposite the village. The Hornet, with her barges, being about one hundred feet in width, was descending near the middle of the river, probably a little nearer the Virginia than the Ohio shore, and in the usual place for a down boat. The river at that point is not less than four hundred yards wide, and at the time was in a good stage for navigation, there being at least twelve feet of water in the entire width of the river. It appears that just below Newport there is a projection of rocks on the Virginia side, extending out some twenty-five yards, and nearly opposite these rocks, on the Ohio side, there is a deposit of logs and snags reaching out some thirty or forty yards from the shore, leaving still a navigable width of more than three hundred yards. There appears to have been nothing to hinder the Melnotte from passing down on the larboard or Virginia side of the Hornet, if her pilot had decided to take that side. In passing the Hornet, a little below Newport, and nearly opposite the rocks on the Virginia side, and the logs and snags on the Ohio side, the larboard side of the Melnotte came in contact with the starboard wing barge of the Hornet with such force as to crush in the planks, and cause it to take water rapidly, and, shortly after, to sink. This suit is prosecuted to recover compensation for the injury to the barge, the coal lost as the result of its sinking, and for the delay and expense resulting from the collision.

The theory of the libellants, on which they claim a decree in their favor, is that the Hornet with her cumbrous tow was at the point of the collision, in her right place, near the middle of the river, and pointing straight down the stream; and that the Melnotte, in passing, suddenly veered from a straight course toward the Hornet, and as a consequence of this erroneous movement, was brought in contact with the barge. On the other hand, the respondents set up in their answer, and insist that the evidence proves, that the Melnotte was in her right place, pointed straight down the river, and that the collision was caused by the improper divergence of the Hornet from her line of navigation toward the Ohio shore. It is proper to notice here that this is not the ordinary case of a collision between two boats passing in opposite directions. Both were descending the river. And it was the undoubted right of the Melnotte, being a fast passenger boat, to get ahead of the tow-boat. But the law is well settled, that a boat astern attempting to pass one that is ahead, is held to stricter vigilance and greater precaution than are required of the latter. The boat ahead is under no obligation to give way, or to change her course, to facilitate the passage of the boat which is astern. And the latter, having a choice of the time and place to pass, incurs all the risk of the attempt, and unless the forward boat is guilty of a clear error of navigation, will be responsible for all the consequences of such an attempt. The Governor [Case No. 5,645]. This principle applies with greater force and stringency to a case like the present, where the boat making the attempt to pass is lightly laden, and easily controlled, and the other, from its cumbrous attachments, is moved with difficulty, and requires a good deal of time to effect a change of course. I am not to be understood, in referring to this principle, as asserting or intimating that the Hornet is not responsible for any fault of navigation which may be clearly established by the proofs, leading to the collision which occurred. It is noticed solely as justifying a more rigid rule of accountability as applicable to the Melnotte than applies to the Hornet. For, if from any cause there was difficulty or danger in passing, it was incumbent on the Melnotte to have stopped, and to have waited for a more favorable opportunity to effect her purpose.

I proceed to notice, very briefly, the general bearing and aspect of the evidence on the question, to which of these boats is the fault attributable, by which the libellants have suffered loss. It is a familiar principle of the maritime law, that to entitle them to indemnity for the whole of their loss, they must not only show that their adversary is in fault, but that in the management of their boat there was no material error, to which the collision can be charged. To sustain their claim, the evidence of the master and pilot on watch at the time of the collision, and of one of the crew stationed as a watch on the barges, has been introduced. They swear that the Hornet was in the proper place of a descending boat, pointed straight down the river, and that the Melnotte, just before the collision, veered from her course toward the Hornet, and struck the wing barge, as already noticed. The phase of the occurrence thus presented by these witnesses, leaves no doubt as to which boat was in fault. And, if they are entitled to credit, there can be no hesitation in the conclusion that the respondents' boat was guilty of a palpable error, quite sufficient to charge upon her the responsibility for the damage which has been sustained. But the respondents have introduced the depositions of the pilot and carpenter of the Melnotte, and other persons who were on the boat at the time, to prove that there was no divergence from her proper line of navigation, and that the collision is wholly due to a change in the course of the Hornet, by which she was turned from her straight course downward, to the Ohio shore, and thus her starboard wing barge was brought in contact with the Melnotte.

Upon these contradictory views of the facts, the question for decision is upon the preponderance of the evidence. And, really, I can see no sufficient ground for the rejection of the testimony of the witnesses for the libellants as untrue or incredible. These witnesses were in the most favorable position to know the exact course and position of the Hornet before and when the collision occurred. They are before the court without any impeachment of their moral characters, and so far as the court can know, have testified with fairness and candor. It would require the most satisfactory opposing evidence, to justify the court in repudiating their testimony. Now, it is true, that they are contradicted by the pilot of the Melnotte, and others on that boat. The pilot swears positively that his boat was heading straight down the river when the collision occurred, and the other witnesses for the respondents state it as their belief and opinion that such was her course. It is to be remarked, however, in regard to all these witnesses, that they seem not to have been apprised of the proximity of the two boats, until they were within some twelve or fifteen feet of each other. The collision occurred almost instantaneously after, and it is not strange that, from the darkness of the night, and the excitement of the occasion, they should have mistaken the position of the boats, at the moment of, and immediately after the collision. But if there is any ground for a doubt, arising from the conflicting statements of the witnesses as to the facts connected with the collision, it is removed by the strong probabilities of the case. These directly sustain the theory of the collision, as claimed by the libellants. It is stated both by their witnesses and those testifying for the respondents, that very shortly before the collision, the Hornet was in her proper place, and pointed straight down the river. The respondents insist that she suddenly changed her course, and veered toward the Ohio side, and thus struck the Melnotte. But she could have had no possible object or motive in such a change of course; and it is exceedingly improbable, that with seven coal boats in tow, rendering it difficult to change her position from side to side, she should have diverged from the course she was pursuing. Besides, it is doubtful, if from the time she is conceded to have been in her right course, to the time of the collision, she could have changed her line of navigation so far as to have been in the position described by the respondent's witnesses, when the collision occurred. Such a movement could not have been made but with great difficulty and a considerable lapse of time. The probabilities, I think, are strongly in favor of the conclusion, that from the darkness of the night, or some other cause, the pilot of the Melnotte was apprehensive of running on the logs or snags along the Ohio shore, and to avoid this suddenly turned his boat toward the Virginia side, and thus struck the barge of the Hornet.

There is another fact which may properly be adverted to, as bearing on the question of fault. It is clear from the evidence that the Melnotte had no sufficient lookout, preceding and at the time of the collision. The master, whose watch it was, was sick and not on duty, and there was no one on the deck as a lookout, but the carpenter of the boat. It was no part of his duty to act in that capacity, nor is there any evidence that he was at all qualified for the duty. It has been often held by the supreme court of the United States, that on boats navigating the western waters, a competent and vigilant watch should be constantly employed to assist and advise the pilot in his duties; and that the absence of such a watch is prima facie evidence of fault in the boat thus deficient. [The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh] 12 How. [53 U. S.] 459; [Ward v. Chamberlain] 21 How. [62 U. S.] 570; [Haney v. Baltimore Steam Packet Co.] 23 How. [64 U. S.] 293. If, in the case before the court, the question of fault was left in doubt, by reason of the conflict in the testimony as to the circumstances of the collision, the want of a competent and sufficient watch on the Melnotte furnishes legal presumption that she was in the wrong. I am clear, therefore, in the opinion, that the Melnotte must be held responsible for the injury which has resulted from the collision, and accordingly decree against her for damages. These will embrace the value of the coal lost, the cost of repairing the barge, and the expenses of the steamboat during the time she was delayed, with interest from the time of the collision. The evidence on these points seems to be full and clear, and the decree will be for the sum proved, on the basis indicated.

Case No. 8,813.

In re McGUIRE.

[8 Ben. 452.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1876.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF DEBT—REINSTATING JUDGMENT—SURPLUS OF ESTATE.

1. K. recovered judgment against McG., issued execution and collected the amount of the judgment, McG. being afterwards put into bankruptcy, his assignee brought an action against K. and recovered back from him the amount he had collected under his judgment. K. thereafter filed a proof of debt against the estate in bankruptcy, on the judgment, which was objected to by the assignee. It appeared that the assignee had enough money in his hands to pay all the other creditors in full and leave a surplus. Held, that the proof of debt filed by K. might stand as against the objection of the assignee.

2. The effect of the recovery of the judgment by the assignee against K., was to reinstate K.'s judgment as against McG., and K. would be entitled to the surplus, to the amount of his judgment, after paying all other creditors in full.

[In the matter of James McGuire, a bankrupt.]

In this case the register certified to the court that one Herman Koehler had proved a claim against the bankrupt's estate for $1,487.25, which was, on the petition of the assignee, ordered to be re-examined; that, on such re-examination, he had ordered the parties to form issues to be certified into court; that on behalf of the assignee the following was submitted, viz.: "Whether, the claimant having recovered a judgment in a state court against the bankrupt (before the filing of the petition for adjudication) and having received satisfaction of said judgment on execution, and it having been adjudicated in this court, in an action brought by the assignee against the claimant, that the said claimant, by means of said judgment, had obtained a preference in fraud of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], and the said claimant having paid and satisfied the judgment of this court thereupon, he can now prove a valid claim against the estate of the bankrupt, upon the said judgment recovered by him in the state court." That on behalf of the claimant the following was submitted, viz.: "It further appearing, by the testimony taken before the register, that there is a sum sufficient in the hands of the assignee, with which to pay all the creditors of the bankrupt in full, and that a surplus will then remain to which the bankrupt would be entitled, provided Koehler's claim be not paid; that the judgment recovered by Koehler in the state court has not been paid or satisfied, the amount which was paid by the sheriff upon the execution issued on that judgment having been recovered back by the assignee in the action against Koehler; that there was no actual fraud procured or attempted by Koehler in recovering said judgment against the bankrupt, nor was there any intent on his part, in so doing, to evade or violate the provisions of the bankruptcy act; and that the bankrupt is dead;" and that the question to be determined was, whether, upon these facts, the motion to expunge the claim should be granted.

F. Smyth, for creditor.

W. F. Scott, for assignee.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. As Koehler does not claim to share with the other creditors who have proved their debts, in the bankrupt's estate, but asks only that, after the other debts are paid in full, he may have the surplus of the assets applied on his debt, it is manifest that the other creditors, and the assignee as representing them, have no interest or concern in the question as to whether the proof of debt made by Koehler should be allowed to stand or not. Whether it stands or not, the amount to be received by the other creditors will be the same. There is enough to pay them in full, if Koehler's claim is not to share in so much as will be required to pay them in full. Therefore, as against any objection which those creditors, or the assignee as representing them, have a right to make, the proof of debt ought to stand. As against the surplus which will be left after paying the other creditors in full, and as against the bankrupt, or his representatives, as otherwise entitled to such surplus, the proof of debt ought to be allowed to stand. The effect of the recovery by the assignee against Koehler, and of the payment thereunder by Koehler to the assignee, was to reinstate the judgment in favor of Koehler against the bankrupt, as between Koehler and the bankrupt, and this court ought not to pay over the surplus in its hands to the bankrupt or his representatives, provided the said judgment is still unsatisfied, but it ought to pay such surplus to Koehler. In the suit brought by the assignee against Koehler, the assignee had no right to recover from Koehler more than the amount necessary to pay in full the creditors other than Koehler. The surplus, as between the bankrupt and Koehler, belonged to Koehler, and ought now to be refunded to him.

Case No. 8,813a.

McGUIRE v. BRISCOE.

[2 Hayw. & H. 54.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June 21, 1851.

MOTION FOR COSTS ON OVERRULING A DEMURRER, AND BILL TO SET ASIDE A SALE AT AUCTION.

1. Where a demurrer to the bill is overruled, or is sustained in part, the court declined to allow costs to either party, remarking that this court has no recollection of requiring the payment of five pounds, required by the statute of Maryland.

2. Where one has knowledge of the insolvency of a party, an agreement to pay him a part of the purchase money of property, held by an assignee under the insolvent laws is void as to creditors.

3. That at a sale under a deed of trust the following circumstance, with others mentioned, was considered of sufficient importance to set aside the sale and decree a re-sale of the property. A party interested in the sale, in the hearing of the auctioneer and the persons attending the sale, stated that he had a deed for the property, and that any person purchasing would be subject to a suit at law; that the sale under the trust deed was a mere legal form to perfect his title.

[This was a bill in equity by Edward McGuire against Richard C. Briscoe. Heard on motion for costs on overruling a demurrer.]

See bill, answer and demurrer as given in this opinion and that of the decision of Judge MORSELL, setting aside a sale at auction under a deed of trust.

[1] [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and George C. Hazleton, Esq.]

Before CRANCH, Chief Judge, and MORSELL and DUNLOP, Circuit Judges.

DUNLOP, Circuit Judge. I think that the demurrer should be sustained as to so much of the bill as seeks to discover how much the defendant paid to Wall and Cascer, and to the legal representative of James McCormick, and to the defendant having warranted McCarthy. And to be overruled as to the failure or refusal of the defendant to pay to McCarthy the balance of the purchase money in goods. See as to multifariousness, Story, Eq. Pl. § 284.

Rule by the court that the defendant put in a further answer to the complainant's bill.

The defendant thereupon put in the following further answer to the complainant's bill: The further answer of the defendant to the original bill of complaint: This defendant, saving and reserving to himself the same benefit of exception to the said original bill as by his former answer to the said original bill is saved and reserved, for answer thereto saith: That he, this defendant, hath fully complied with and satisfied the said McCarthy the full sum of $1500, the purchase money of the said leasehold premises in said bill mentioned; that he hath paid and taken up the said judgments and claims of the estate of James McCormick, also the claims held by Ulysses Ward and Wall and Iasser, which he is ready to release and satisfy to said McCarthy, on his being made secure in his said purchase, and the residue thereof he hath fully accounted for and settled with the said McCarthy, partly in dry goods and partly in debts due and owing to him by said McCarthy for dry goods, which he agreed to allow this defendant on said settlement; and the said McCarthy did, in the month of May or June, 1845, declare himself fully satisfied and content therewith, but this defendant does not know that he can show all the particulars of said settlement, yet offers himself ready to prove by indifferent testimony, if the same shall be denied by said McCarthy, that he did in fact in the said month of May or June, 1845, fully pay and satisfy to him the said balance stipulated by this defendant in and by his said agreement, to be paid for the purchase of the said leasehold, &c.

The following exceptions were taken by the complainant to the above insufficient further answer of the said defendant to his said complainant's bill. For that the said defendant hath not, to the best and utmost of his knowledge, remembrance, information and belief, answered and set forth whether he, the said defendant, "hath supplied and allowed said McCarthy to select any goods from the store of the said Clarke & Briscoe. If so to what amount? and what kind of goods? and produce and set forth a bill of the same." In all of which particulars the said complainant, except to the said further answer of the said defendant as evasive, imperfect and insufficient, and humbly prays that the said defendant may be compelled to put in a full and perfect answer thereto. The complainant thereupon moved for costs on overruling the demurrer and for the penalty of £5 under the statute.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The demurrer to the defendant's first answer having been sustained in part and overruled in part, I think each party should sustain his own costs incurred by the demurrer, that is that neither party should recover of the other any costs of demurrer. I have no recollection that this court has ever required the payment of the £5 required by the Maryland statute.[2]

The following is Judge CRANCH'S decision overruling the demurrer to the answer:

1. This is a demurrer to the defendant's further answer, because he says that "he does not now know that he can show all the particulars of said settlement." But he says that he "has fully complied and satisfied the said McCarthy the said full sum of $1500, the purchase money of the leasehold premises, in the bill mentioned," and "offers himself ready to prove by indifferent testimony that he did, in May or June, 1845, pay and satisfy to him the balance," &c. This seems to me to be as full an answer as can reasonably be required. I therefore am inclined to think that this last demurrer should be overruled, but without costs. Is the defendant bound to exhibit a bill of particulars of the goods supplied to McCarthy? I doubt whether he is bound.

Bill to set aside a sale at auction.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The bill in this case was filed by Edward McGuire as trustee under the insolvent law, appointed in the case of John McCarthy, an insolvent debtor, on behalf of the creditors of said McC. against Richard Briscoe. The bill states that McC., on the 17th of Aug., 1836, purchased of Frederick May, since deceased, a leasehold interest in a lot or parcel of ground in the city of W., numbered 29, in square "B." for the term of 99 years, he paying therefore an annual ground rent of one hundred and fourteen dollars and ninety cents, with the privilege at any time during the said term to purchase the fee-simple title in said premises for the sum of $1915, on which premises said McC. erected a two story brick house at the cost of about $2000; that on the 20th of April, 1844, he conveyed all his interest in said leasehold premises to Edward Simmes and Richard E. Simmes, in trust, to secure

[2] That upon any demurrer or plea being overruled upon argument, or otherwise being withdrawn without leave of the chancery court, the party whose demurrer or plea is so overruled or withdrawn shall pay to the opposite party the sum of five pounds current money, and the costs thereof, and be in contempt until the said sum of money and costs are fully discharged and paid. Act Md. 1785, c. 72, § 25.

the payment of three hundred and ninety-three dollars and thirty-four cents to Ulysses Ward, to whom he was then indebted, with power to said trustees in case of failure to pay the same in 12 months from the date of said conveyance, to sell the same at public auction. That on the 4th of June, 1844, he obtained the benefits of the act of congress for the relief of insolvent debtors within the D. C. [2 Stat. 237], that according to the provisions of said act, he did on the said 4th of June, 1844, convey and transfer to said McG., for the benefit of his creditors, all his property, real, personal and mixed, and all his claims, rights and credits. From the insolvent papers, in which case it appears that the premises aforesaid were returned in his schedule as a part of his real property, and by the certificate of said McG. as trustee, that the same were delivered to him on said 4th day of June, 1844; it further appears thereby that said McC. returned, among those which are stated, several other creditors besides the said Ulysses Ward and Wall and Saggar and Jas. McCormick for whose debt he was imprisoned. The bill proceeds in substance to state and charge that afterwards on Feb. the 17th, 1845, Richard G. Briscoe the defendant, knowing the premises, and conniving with said McC. did fraudulently and with the intent to defraud the said McC. and his said McC.'s creditor, make a secret agreement in writing with said McC., wherein the said Briscoe promised to pay the said McC. the sum of $1500, in consideration whereof the said McC. agreed to convey the premises aforesaid unto the said Briscoe, that the said sum of $1500 was agreed to be paid in manner following: 1st. To pay the said debt of $393.35 and interest thereon due to said Ulysses Ward and secured as before mentioned. 2nd. To pay about $250 and interest thereon due Messrs. Wall and Saggar, for which they had obtained a judgment. 3rd. To pay the sum of about $350 and interest thereon due to one Jas. McCormick, for which the said McC. had obtained a judgment, and the balance, which was computed to be about $300, was to be paid by said Briscoe in such goods as the said McC. should think proper to select from time to time out of the stock of merchandise in the store of said Briscoe. There are some variances between the original agreement exhibited in the case, and as it is stated above in the bill, but it is supposed not materially to effect the principles of law, which will be declared in the decision of the case. The bill avers that the defendant, well knowing the fact that said McC. had no legal or equitable right to sell said premises, entered into the contract aforesaid, with the covenous intent of obtaining the same at an unreasonable sacrifice, to the great detriment of the creditors of said McC., and that at various times after said agreement was drawn up said complainant informed said defendant that said McC. was an insolvent debtor; had no right to enter into said agreement, and that any money he, the said Briscoe might pay said McC. on account of said agreement would be thrown away by him, the said Briscoe. That in pursuance of said agreement, said McC., on the 17th of Feb., 1845, did by deed, duly executed, convey said premises, for the consideration aforesaid, to said Briscoe, and therein empowered said trustees, with the assent of said Ulysses Ward, to convey said premises, free and clear from said trust, or to convey the same subject thereto, that well knowing said deed was a nullity, because of said prior deed under the insolvent law. Said Briscoe covenously, and with intent to defraud said McC. and his creditors, advised and agreed with McC. that neither he, the said Briscoe, nor McC. should pay off the said debt so secured, but should fail so to do, and they cause a sale of said premises at public auction by the trustees under said trust deed, at which said sale, he, said Briscoe, should become the highest bidder, and with a view to prevent said premises from bringing a full and fair price at said auction sale, it was arranged between them that not more than $1000 should be offered for the same, that is, that the said Briscoe should bid the said sum of $1000. In compliance with which arrangement said McC. made known to his friends and acquaintances generally, that he had sold said premises by private contract to said Briscoe, and that the public sale by auction, under said trust deed, was a mere legal form to perfect the title of said Briscoe, which arrangement became publicly known prior to and at the time of said auction sale, which took place on the 17th of May, 1845; said McC. designedly absenting himself. In consequence of the common notoriety of said private sale, many persons refrained from attending the said auction, and of the few who did attend, but one made a bid for the said premises. That said Briscoe, to effect his point at the time of said auction, at the premises aforesaid, and in the hearing of the auctioneer and all the persons then and there attending, publicly declared and stated that he, the said Briscoe, had a deed for the property, and also the lease of Dr. May, meaning the lease executed as aforesaid by said Frederick May, deceased, and that any person purchasing would be subject to a suit at law. In consequence whereof, the said premises, at the lowest cash valuation worth $2000, were struck off to said Briscoe as the highest bidder at said auction for the sum of $730, and on the 8th of July, 1845, the trustees aforesaid executed and delivered a valid deed of conveyance (I suppose as to the form of execution) conveying to said Briscoe all their right and title and interest in the premises. Complainant further charges that after the execution of said last mentioned deed, the said Briscoe, believing himself in condition to carry into effect the fraudulent schemes which complainant charges were being plotted by said Briscoe at the time of the execution of the said private contract, paid off, it is true, the entire debt due, and secured as aforesaid to Ulysses Ward, amounting to about $450; but instead of liquidating the entire debt due by said McC. to said Wall & Saggar and to said Jas. McC., the said Briscoe compromised with them at the rate of fifty cents on the dollar, &c., (to this part of the bill the defendant demurred, and the court sustained his demurrer). The bill charges also that he has failed and refused to permit the said McC., according to the terms of the contract, to take out the sum of $300 in goods as aforesaid, &c., except the sum of about $47. The complainant avers and believes that the object of the defendant, at the time of entering into said contract, was by fraudulent means as aforesaid to purchase the said property, at an unconscionable sacrifice, to the detriment of said McC. and his creditors; that at the time of entering into said contract he well knew that said McC. was an insolvent, and had no interest at law or in equity in the premises, by reason of which actings and doings many of the creditors of said McC. have been defrauded of their just dues.

The prayer of the bill is in the alternative. First, that a resale of the premises may be decreed, and an account taken of the rents and profits thereof during the time said premises have been in the possession, or under the control, or vested in said Briscoe, and that the purchase money arising from said resale may be applied, first to the repayment to the said Briscoe of the monies expended by him in liquidating the said debt due to said Ward, and to so much of the said respective judgments as has been actually paid by him, and legal interest thereon, deducting therefrom the amount received, or that might have been received by said Briscoe, but for his willful default or neglect from said premises. And second, that the balance of said purchase money be paid over to said complainant as trustee as aforesaid, to be by him distributed among the unsatisfied creditors of said McC. pro rata, each in proportion to the amount of his claim, or a decree that said Briscoe shall stand seized of the said premises as trustee for the use of said complainant as insolvent trustee as aforesaid, the said trust to extend to the sum of three hundred dollars, contracted by said Briscoe, to be paid to said McC., in goods as aforesaid, and interest thereon, and to pay any sum of money that may be found to be the difference between the full amount of the judgments aforesaid, and interest thereon contracted, to be paid by said Briscoe for said McC., and the sum of money actually paid in liquidation of said judgments by said Briscoe, and that if the said Briscoe shall not satisfy the said trust by paying the said sums of money to said complainant within a certain time, to be limited by decree, that a sale of said premises may be ordered, &c.

The answer admits the leasehold interest as stated in the bill; denies the enhanced value by improvements as stated by complainant; that it is also true as stated with respect to the existence of the debt due to Ulysses Ward, and that there is also due to him the additional amount of $30, which was also meant and intended to be secured on the same property. He admits the insolvency of McC. as stated, and the conveyance of all his property to complainant as trustee for the creditors of McC. under the insolvent law; admits a constructive notice thereof, but denies that he had any notice in fact at the time of the agreement between him and McC., for the purchase of the premises mentioned in the bill, which agreement is marked defendant's exhibit, No. 1. That said McC. was in the actual employment of said premises, and assured this defendant the said premises were, with the exception of the said deed of trust to Ward, entirely free from any incumbrance. That he has reason to believe, and does believe it to be true, that complainant knew that said McC. was negotiating with defendant, yet stood by and did not in any manner interpose or notify him of his claims upon said property until the agreement between McC. and him was consummated. That although, as appears on the back of the schedule, McC. returned a list of his creditors, there is not and has not been on file in the insolvent proceedings a single claim or demand by any one of the said creditors, nor is there anything there except the said list to show that he was in fact indebted to any of the said persons, nor is there anything to show the amounts. That he is ready to prove that if said McC. was indebted to any of said persons at the time of said insolvent's discharge, that either he, said McC., or some other person, other than said insolvent trustee, hath fully settled the said debts, except said Thos. Griffin and said Bradley & Estep; and that as to said Thos. Griffin, said McC. had then an account in bar against his demand, and that he hath been informed by said McC. that he was about to settle with said Bradley & Estep, at or about the time of said contract. He denied that there are any debts now due by said McC., for the payment or satisfaction of which the holders thereof could or can look to the property conveyed by said McC. to said insolvent trustee; this defence he relies on as if pleaded. He denies all connivance with McC. to defraud the said creditors. That there was no secrecy about the agreement, but that it was as open as contracts for sale and purchase of land usually are, states the agreement, as it appears by exhibit No. 1. That the whole purchase money was to be $1500. That he was left free to make the best terms he could with the respective claimants named in the agreement. McC. was to allow them so much money, without any regard to the amount defendant might give for them. The amount of which debts and the arrears of taxes due, exclusive of said $300 to be paid in goods to said McC. on the 15th of February, 1845, was $1305.60, which he hath fully satisfied, and hath received from each an assignment. He denies that complainant gave him the notice of McC.'s insolvency, as stated in the bill, until after said defendant had entered into said agreement, and had, under the same, paid a part and given his obligation for the residue of said claims respectively, and received the assignments of them. He believes, as before stated, that trustee was cognizant of the said treaty for said purchase, and had become liable to said parties, and that said amount paid was less than the claims respectively; that the notice given under the circumstances aforesaid was with a view to cheat and defraud the defendant, and to deprive him of his just gains on said contract. He admits the execution of the deed by McC. to him, and believes it was known to complainant before he gave his said notice; claims it was a nullity with respect to the allegations respecting the agreement between him and McC. not to pay off the said debt to Ward; and respecting the bidding at said sale, he avers that the whole statement thereof is a tissue of falsehoods; that for his protection, and as he was advised, he admits that he purposely delayed the payment of said debt, as there was no other mode to protect himself against loss by the fraudulent collusion between the said complainant and McC., and that the said Ward, at the instance of the said defendant, or as his assignee, did require Messrs. E. & R. Simmes, trustees in said deed named, to sell the said property, and the same was accordingly sold and purchased at said sale by this defendant, at and for the sum of $730; denies that there was any agreement between him and McC. limiting the amount of the bidding, or to control or regulate the same; nor that McC. should make known among his friends and acquaintances generally that he had sold said premises by private contract to said defendant, and that the public sale was a mere legal form to perfect the title of said defendant, though if such had been the case the defendant maintains it would have been perfectly fair; nor does he know that the said McC. designedly absented himself from the said sale; nor does he recollect whether he was there or not, but if he was absent there was no understanding or agreement between them that he should be so. He denies that in consequence of the notoriety of the private sale aforesaid many persons refrained from attending said sale. He avers, and is ready to prove, that there was a good company at said sale, and several bids were offered for the property. He admits that he did, at said sale, in presence and hearing of the auctioneer—and he supposes of all others who were present—publicly declare and state in substance what is alleged in the bill; he will not be positive of the words, they were, as well as he recollects, accurately taken down in writing by the auctioneer. He denies that by any contrivance and threats alleged as employed by him, the premises (at the lowest cash valuation worth $2,000), were struck off at said sale and sold to said defendant for $730. He admits that he was the highest bidder at that sum, and that they were struck off to him at that sum. He says they were not worth anything like $2,000 in cash, and that he would never have bought them at $1,500 but for the mode of payment and the prospect of his being able to buy up the claims at less than their full amount. It is also true that the trustees have conveyed the said property to the defendant; also that he has paid off said debt to said Ward, together with the expenses of sale. The following part is a demurrer, which in part was sustained. The amended answer to the part not sustained states that he, defendant, has fully complied with and satisfied the said McC. the full sum of $1,500, and that McC., in the month of May or June, 1845, acknowledged himself fully satisfied and content therewith. The said $300 to be paid to said McC. he hath fully accounted for and settled with said McC., partly in dry goods and partly in debts due and owing to him by said McC. for dry goods, which he agreed to allow defendant, &c.

The agreement between McC. and the defendant Briscoe, for the purchase and sale of the property mentioned in the bill, was entered into on the 15th of February, 1845. It was a leasehold interest for ninety-nine years, renewal forever, in part of lot No. 29, in square B, in the city of Washington, at an annual ground rent of $114.90, with the privilege at any time during the term to purchase the fee-simple title for the sum of $1915, granted to McC. by Dr. Frederick May, on the 17th of August, 1836, one of the terms of which agreement was that McC. should be paid $300 in goods. The deed for the property from McC. to Briscoe was dated the 17th of February, 1845. McC. had been released under the insolvent law of this district, and the complainant appointed trustee for the benefit of the creditors on the 4th of June, 1844, about eight months before. Some of the creditors returned with his schedule are still unpaid. The terms in the deed to the trustee under the insolvent law are coextensive with those used in the law, which are sufficiently comprehensive to transfer any and every interest which the insolvent could have had. The terms are "all my property, real, personal and mixed, to which I am in any manner entitled, in possession, reversion or remainder, and all my rights, claims and credits, of what nature or kind soever." If, therefore, the party grantor in a deed of bargain and sale can transfer or pass only such interest as he has, what interest in the premises had McC., the grantor, at the time of his agreement and deed to the defendant Briscoe? It has been contended that he had an interest in a resulting trust, which the defendant had a right to think existed at the time, and that he had a right, and did purchase an outstanding incumbrance for the purpose of perfecting his title, and by that means he hath perfected his title; that the creditors so returned by McC. cannot set up or sustain their claim. First, because they have not been made parties to the suit: or second, that their claim to look to the premises for payment has been lost by the laches of the trustee, and the presumption that they were paid.

As to the first objection I think it is sufficiently answered by the 6th section of the insolvent law, which is, "That every trustee may sue for in his own name, any property, or chose in action, assigned to him by virtue of this act." He must be considered as the representative of the creditors, and he has stated in the bill that it is filed on their behalf. See Bank of Washington v. Herbert, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 36. Ch. Justice Marshall, in a case under the insolvent law, where a similar objection was made, says: "In reason there can be no difference between this suit, which asserts the right of the creditors in the mode prescribed by law, and an assertion of that right in their own names, nor does the law distinguish between them."

With respect to the second ground. The absence of notice, in fact of the release under the insolvent law, and the misconduct of the trustee. The circumstances as before stated were: (1) That McC., the insolvent, was permitted to remain in the actual enjoyment of the premises, and that he assured defendant that the premises were, with the exception of said deed of trust to Ward, free from any incumbrance, &c. (2) That trustee knew that said McC. was negotiating with defendant, yet stood by and did not in any manner interpose, or notify him of his claim on said property until the agreement was consummated. (3) That the list of creditors returned does not show any particular amount due, nor have any one of them made or demanded any single claim, and that he will be able to prove that they were all paid, &c.

It cannot be deemed necessary, I think, to sustain the claim of the complainant to recover in this case, to show that notice in fact was given to the defendant before he entered into the contract for the purchase of the premises, that McC. had been released under the insolvent law. The only notice required is that which is directed to be given by the judge's order of the application, to be published in some of the newspapers for such time as he may think proper, &c. This, it appears by the insolvent papers, was done by publication in the National Intelligencer, according to law. If he was a creditor, as the proof states him to have been, and resided at the time in the city of Washington, the presumption is very strong that he had notice in fact, which perhaps had escaped his recollection. Be that as it may, he had all the notice which the law requires, and was as much bound as if he had had notice in fact. With this notice he was bound to know not only of McC.'s insolvency, but of the list of creditors returned on the back of his schedule, and although the amount of the debts were not stated, the list stated as much as the law required, and enough to put the defendant on the enquiry of those who could have given him authentic information; it was therefore his own folly to rely upon what McC. told him. With respect to the supposed ground upon which it might be presumed that the trust was extinct, arising from the acts or negligence of the trustee under the insolvent law, in permitting the insolvent McC. to remain in the enjoyment of the premises, and not interposing or notifying defendant of his claims before he had consummated his purchase and become bound to Ward and others for the payment of the debts due to them, though he knew of the negotiation, &c.

It will be proper to advert to what the facts really were as proved (the premises were occupied by two tenants O'Leary and Barber) from the time of the release under the insolvent law to the date of the agreement for the purchase and sale, was, as has been already stated, little upwards of eight months before the trustee could sell. The law required him to obtain the judge's order, and although perhaps the trustee may be chargeable with some degree of negligence, there is no very unreasonable delay. There is no evidence to show who received the rent, or whether any was actually due in the interval. As to the other circumstances, it is not proved that he did know of the negotiation. It is stated only in answer as of the belief of the defendant. It is admitted that he, defendant, had notice before he had paid the obligations which he had come under on account of said purchase. But if the facts were as stated in the answer, and this, instead of being a case of special and resulting trust, were a case of a trustee having general powers, how would the law be? The rule of law is, that regularly no act of the trustee shall prejudice the cestui que trust, but the trustee must especially in equity make good the trust, and into whomsoevers hands the property comes, in case of a breach of trust, it will be charged with the trust, except in a case where having the legal estate, and being in possession, the trustee aliens and conveys the property for a valuable consideration and without notice, and so also as to the incumbrances. Mortgagees for a valuable consideration, and without notice of the trust, are to be considered as purchasers—a mortgage being a specific lien. See 2 Fonbl. Eq. p. 170, c. 7, § 1, and note (a), and the authorities there cited. According to this view it is supposed the trust could not be considered extinct. It may also be observed, as already stated, that the defendant, having knowledge of the insolvent circumstances of McC., the agreement to pay him a part of the purchase money would make the contract void as to creditors, according to the recent decision of this court.

The next and last point to be considered is what effect is to be given to the sale, by the trustees, under Ward's deed, in trust? It has been contended that the defendant had a right to purchase an outstanding incumbrance to perfect his title, and that the sale by the trustees under said deed, and the purchase at that sale by the defendant has perfected his title. That where the equities are equal, as it respects the claim of two purchasers, the subsequent equitable owner, without notice, is perfectly justifiable in purchasing in the legal title, so as to obtain a superiority, I have no doubt, and having so done a court of equity will never disturb him in his right. But that certainly was not this case, because, according to the principles which I have already endeavored to establish, the defendant had notice, and the insolvent McC. had no present interest that he could pass by a bargain and sale, and because the only legal interest that Ward could convey was subject to the equity of redemption contained on the face of the deed itself, which by operation of law was vested, prior in point of time, in McGuire, the trustee under the insolvent law, for the benefit of the creditors. The right in the equity of redemption being then clearly established in the trustee, for the benefit of said creditors under the insolvent law, it follows that any valid sale and purchase under Ward's deed, either for his own benefit or for that of his assignee, must be something more than a mere formal sale to unite the legal with the equitable interest. Such a sale must have been strictly in compliance with the terms contained in the deed, openly, really and fairly, at public auction to the highest bidder. Was such the character of the sale in the present instance? It was admitted that it was made by the trustees, at the request of the defendant, and that the defendant was to bear the expenses attending the sale; and that neither of the trustees attended the sale, and that they were to have no further trouble with the matter than to sign a deed. The bill states several circumstances of unfairness on the part of the defendant connected with the sale, but which are denied by the answer, and not sufficiently proved. It however charges that Briscoe, to effect his end, at the time of the said auction at the premises aforesaid, and in the hearing of the auctioneer and all the persons then and there attending, publicly declared and stated that he, the said Briscoe, had a deed for the property and also the lease of Dr. May executed as aforesaid by said Frederick May, deceased, and that any person purchasing would be subject to a suit at law. The answer admits the truth of said statement in substance, but as defendant did not positively remember the words, he refers to them as accurately taken down in writing by the auctioneer. The auctioneer states that said Briscoe stated at the time and place aforesaid "that he had a deed for the property, as also the lease of Dr. May, and that the property was sold to perfect his title, and that any person purchasing would be subject to a suit at law." The words above underscored were run through by two black lines on the auctioneer's book. The proof is that there were about ten or a dozen persons present; that no person bid for the property except O'Leary, the tenant, and the defendant Briscoe. One of the witnesses says, "that what Mr. Briscoe said at the sale had such an effect on his mind, that had he been disposed to bid he would have been prevented from doing so, and he has no doubt it had the same effect on others." He states, however, that he was there merely as a spectator, and with no intention of purchasing the property.

These, it is believed, are all the material facts on this point in the case before the court, and it is thought offer an occasion to make a few general remarks on the subject of sales at public auction. The public is supposed to be deeply interested that such sales should be conducted in good faith and entire fairness; that the articles set up for sale will be so disposed of as to bring the highest price from the highest real bidder which can be obtained; that the owner, whether real or nominal, should not be allowed privately to bid, for then, in the language of Lord Mansfield, "there would be no end of that if the owner might privately bid upon his own goods. No fraud or imposition should be practiced by puffers or persons employed in that or a like character to induce persons to bid, or not to bid. Nothing should be done which might prevent honesty and justice from being done to all interested, by false representations or otherwise. It will be found, from a very early period, that the invariably fixed policy of the law, founded on these principles, has been to throw around those guards which would probably secure that important end, hence the inhibiting restraints imposed, disallowing owners, directly or indirectly, trustees and all agents, public and private, in the relations which vendor and vendee stand to each other, from bidding and purchasing at such sales, thereby effectually to secure a faithful discharge of the duty of trustees and others, without the probability of danger from personal conflicting interests." The modern case of Michoud v. Girod, decided by the supreme court in 1846, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 552, 553, recognizes and approves of those early established principles which I have just stated. In the present case the trustees, instead of acting as they ought to have done, according to the well established law on the subject, surrendered up the whole discharge of the trust and the control and management of the sale to the defendant, not even giving the benefit of their presence; and he, the defendant, by acts and declarations which, according to the views I have taken of the law, were falsely at the time of said sale claimed in amount to be the owner, and it appears more particularly by the evidence, that he used language on the occasion calculated to deter the few persons who were present from bidding. One of the witnesses present declares that the effect of such conduct on him was such, that had he been disposed to bid he would have been prevented from so doing. This and the other circumstances alluded to may have been the reason why the property was knocked down to him as the highest bidder at the sacrifice of $730. This, I think, was unfair conduct, and sufficient to set aside the sale.

It is decided in a late case of Fuller v. Abraham, 6 Moore, 318, and 3 Brod. & B. 116, that such conduct is sufficient to set aside a sale. The marginal note states the case correctly, and is in these words: "Held that a purchaser did not acquire any property under a sale by auction at which he and his friends were the only bidders, the rest of the company being deterred from bidding by the purchaser stating to them he had a claim against and had been ill used by the late owner of the article," and Chitty on Contracts (page 299), referring to this case and another of Phippen v. Stickney, 3 Metc. 384, says: "It has been decided in a late case that if a purchaser, by unfair conduct, deter other persons from bidding at the sale, and cause the goods to be knocked down to him, he does not acquire any property in the goods."

The following decree was given in this case: This cause standing ready for hearing, and being submitted, the counsel for the parties were heard, and the proceedings read and considered. It is therefore, this 21st day of June, 1851, ordered, adjudged and decreed that the sale made on the 17th day of May, A. D. 1845, of the premises mentioned in the proceedings, be and the same is hereby annulled and declared to be void, and that the deed executed in consequence thereof on the 8th day of July, A. D. 1845, by the trustees, Edward Simmes and Richard E. Simmes, and mentioned in the proceedings, be and the same is hereby annulled and declared to be totally void. And it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said premises be sold; that Walter D. Davidge, of the city of Washington, D. C., be and hereby is appointed trustee to make such sale, and that the course and manner of his proceeding shall be as follows: He shall first file in the clerk's office of this court his bond to the United States in the penalty of $5000, with surety or sureties to be approved by this court or a judge thereof, conditioned for the faithful performance of the trust reposed in him by this decree, or which may be reposed in him by any further order or decree in this cause. He shall then proceed to make sale of said premises at public auction, having first given at least four weeks previous notice by advertisement in the National Intelligencer, published twice a week for said four weeks, of the time and place and terms of sale, which terms shall be as follows: One fourth of the purchase money to be paid in cash, and the residue in three equal payments at six, nine and twelve months from the day of sale, the said deferred payments to bear interest, and to be secured by the bonds or notes of the purchaser, with surety or sureties to be approved by the trustee. And as soon as may be convenient after said sale, the said trustee shall return to this court a full report of the same, with an affidavit of the truth thereof, and of the fairness of such sale annexed. And on the ratification of said sale, and the payment of the whole purchase money, the said trustee shall convey to the purchaser or purchasers, his or their heirs and assigns, the premises sold, with all the right, title and interest therein of the parties to this cause. And the said trustee shall bring into this court the money arising on such sale to abide its future order.

Case No. 8,814.

McGUIRE v. EAMES.

[15 Blatchf. 312; 3 Ban. & A. 499.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Oct. 23, 1878.

PATENTS—VALIDITY—INFRINGEMENT — LICENSE—MOTION FOR INJUNCTION—NECESSITY FOR.

A motion for a preliminary injunction to restrain the infringement of a patent was made six months after it was issued. The answer put in issue its validity, and set up a license to construct and use the machine complained of, granted by the plaintiff before the patent was issued. It was disputed, on affidavits, whether the defendant's machine was so made with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff, and whether the invention was new, and the defendant was shown to be able to respond in damages: Held, that the motion must be denied.

[This was a bill in equity by Thomas M. McGuire against Harvey A. Eames.]

James Ridgway, for plaintiff.

William H. McDougall, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a motion for a preliminary injunction, to restrain the defendant from using a certain hydraulic power accumulator, upon the ground that it is an infringement upon a patent issued to the plaintiff on the 23d day of April, 1878, and numbered 202,660. The answer filed to the bill puts in issue the validity of the plaintiff's patent, and further sets up a license to construct and use the machine in question, granted by the plaintiff prior to the issuing of the patent upon which he relies. It appears, from the affidavits, that the defendant does not construct machines for the purposes of sale, but did construct the machine complained of, which he is using in the manufacture of hats. The machine was constructed prior to the plaintiff's application for a patent, and from measurements taken for that purpose from the machine upon which the plaintiff thereafter applied for and obtained a patent. Whether the defendant's machine was so constructed with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff, is a fact in dispute, there being two affidavits upon this subject, opposing each other. There are, also, affidavits going to show that the plaintiff's machine was not invented by him, but is similar to a machine in use at No. 13 Adams street, for some seven years before the plaintiff's machine was constructed, and one of these affidavits is that of the workman who constructed the plaintiff's machine, and who states that it is, in all essential particulars, like the machine in use at No. 13 Adams street, and was intended to be exactly similar, save only in regard to the position of the weights upon the piston, and that the difference in this respect is not only unimportant, but was suggested by the deponent, and was not the invention of the plaintiff. To this affidavit is opposed the affidavit of the plaintiff, who contradicts the statement of the workman, whom he shows to have been discharged from his employment, and to be hostile and biased. It is conceded that the defendant is able to respond to any claim of damages that is made by the plaintiff. Upon such affidavits as these, it is impossible to grant the plaintiff's application for a preliminary injunction. The patent is recent, its validity is disputed, and the facts upon which the plaintiff's right to an injunction depend are not so clearly made out as to warrant the interposition of the court in this stage of the proceeding. The motion is denied.

[Upon final hearing the patent was declared invalid, and the bill dismissed. 8 Fed. 761.]

Case No. 8,815.

McGUIRE et al. v. The GOLDEN GATE.

[1 McAll. 104.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. California. July Term, 1856.

ADMIRALTY—TORTS OF MASTER — PASSENGER—LIBEL IN REM—ACTUAL DAMAGES.

1. The owners of a ship are liable for the torts of the master, when they involve a breach of the passenger contract, and are done while acting strictly within the scope of his employment.

[Cited in Taylor v. Brigham, Case No. 13,781.]

2. The rule of damages in such cases, where recovery is sought on the constructive consent of the owner, must be the actual damages incurred; being innocent of any participation in the tort, the damages are not to be made punitive.

[Cited in Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 101, 13 Sup. Ct. 263.]

[3. Cited in The Yankee v. Gallagher, Case No. 18,124, to the point that where no additional testimony is taken, the appellate court will not readily interfere with the amount of damages decreed by the court below.]

[1] [Reported by Cutler McAllister, Esq.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Northern district of California.]

This is a proceeding in rem for a violation of a passenger contract, arising out of the torts of the master and mariners of the ship. Exceptions were taken to the jurisdiction of the district court of the United States for the Northern district of California, where the libel was filed. The exceptions were overruled by that court, a decree rendered against the respondent [case unreported], and an appeal prosecuted to this court.

Manchester & Hodges, for libelants.
Hall McAllister, for respondents.

McALLISTER, Circuit Judge. As to the power of this court to entertain jurisdiction of a proceeding in rem for the torts of a master, I feel considerable doubt. That the owner is civiliter liable for all violations growing out of the crimes of the master or mariners, will not be asserted. Yet, it is difficult to suppose a crime committed upon a passenger by a master or mariner, which will not involve a breach of the passenger contract. There must be some limit to the owner's liability; but it is not easy to fix a uniform one. There is no case which has drawn such line with accuracy; but the owner's responsibility is limited only by general definitions. An inquiry into the authorities will, I think, show that no case has gone to the extent of sustaining a proceeding in rem for the commission of a crime by a master or mariner, on the ground, solely, that it was a violation of the passenger contract. That there has been a gross violation of the contract in this case, is proved by the evidence; that the obligations of that contract are all that Judge Story has described them to be, in Chamberlain v. Chandler [Case No. 2,575], which was a proceeding in personam against the master, is undoubtedly true. But the question is, whether the liability of the owner is commensurate with the crimes of all in his employ on board his ship, which involve a breach of the passenger contract; and, if not, where is the limit? Certain authorities have been cited by the proctors for libelants. The case of Marshall v. Bazin [Id. 9,125], was a proceeding in rem, it is true; but the cause of the action was one purely of contract,—the failure to carry the passenger after having stipulated to do so. The case of Chamberlain v. Chandler [supra], was a proceeding in personam, and does not touch this question. In Sherwood v. Hall [Case No. 12,777], the principle affirmed is, that the owner is liable where the master shipped a mariner who had run away from another vessel under circumstances amounting to notice that the shipment was unauthorized by his father. It is to be observed, in this case, there was no breach of the peace, no indictable offense. The shipment of the minor was an act done in the course of the master's employment, for the benefit of the owner; and hence, the assent of the latter may have been implied. The case next cited is that of the Rebecca [Id. 11,619]. It applies exclusively to the lien which the merchant has on the ship for lost goods. Reference was also made to the case of the Phebe [Id. 11,064]. It merely enunciates the principle that the shipper has a lien on the vessel for the due execution of the contract by bill of lading. The object, doubtless, of citing the two foregoing authorities, was to show the liability for the loss of goods by reason of the torts of the master or mariners and they enunciate sound law. It may be admitted, that the reasons which lie at the foundation of the rule commend to the legislature the propriety of extending, to some extent, to passengers the rules which govern the liabilities of ship-owners as to goods; but to do so is not the province of the courts. The next case is that of Dean v. Angus [Id. 3,702], which affirms the doctrine that the owners of a vessel are liable for the wrongful capture at sea by the master, he acting under an authority from the owners to capture. The next case is that of Dias v. The Revenge [Id. 3,877]. This case would seem to militate against the proposition contended for by libelants. The libel in that case was filed to make the owners liable for damages sustained by the underwriters of certain Spanish and Portuguese vessels, for piratical acts of the officers and crew of the Revenge, and the question arose whether the owners of a commissioned privateer are liable, civilly, for the piratical acts committed by the officers and crew of their vessel. The court held, that where an illegal capture as prize of war was made, the owner is liable civilly; but that he is not liable for the piratical acts of the master and officers. The court say: "The liability of those to whom the libelants owe their wrongs, is admitted; their inability to make retribution, if such should be their situation, is a misfortune for which the tribunals of the country can supply no remedy. Those against whom redress is sought in this instance, did not commit, nor in any manner authorize or countenance the spoliation of which the libelants complain. They are, therefore, equally innocent with the libelants, and are equally entitled to the protection of the court." The last decided case cited by libelants, is that of The New World v. King, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 469, which simply decides that a passenger may recover in rem for injuries received from the explosion of a boiler, the result of gross negligence of those on board the steamer and in control of her. No one of the foregoing authorities (and they are all that have been cited), asserts the principle that by varying the form of suing for a breach of the contract, and not directly for the tort,—that the owner is civilly liable for the crimes of the master or mariners, because the commission of them involves the breach of a contract when committed upon the person of a passenger. The proceeding in this case is a libel against the vessel for the breach of contract arising out of assaults and batteries committed by the master and officers of the ship on two of the passengers. The 16th rule of admiralty prescribes, "that in all suits for an assault and battery on the high seas, or elsewhere within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, the suit shall be in personam only." Mr. Benedict [Ben. Adm.] (section 309), referring to this rule, considers it as applicable only to a case where the action is technically for an assault and battery as a mere tort; but not applying to cases where the action is brought for breach of contract and the assault and battery constitute the gravamen of the action. I cannot consider this construction very satisfactory; but as it has been published for some time, and has received no contradiction from any court or text-writer, I shall act upon it for the present to the extent this case goes. I have commented more fully on the question of jurisdiction, so that, while the power of the court in this case is affirmed, this decision may not be misapprehended, or extended beyond the case at bar. "I desire that nothing which may be said in the course of these remarks shall be extended to embrace any other case." Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441. In this case, the testimony ascertains that the ill-treatment of the two passengers, the libelants, by the captain and his officers was inflicted while in the avowed preservation of the discipline and police of the ship. They were acting directly in the employment of the owners. But acting within its scope they exceeded its limits; and, in analogy to the case of Sherwood v. Hall [Case No. 12,777], where the owner was made liable for the abuse by the master of his authority to enlist,—the owners in this case must be made liable for the abuse and excessive use of the authority confided to them. In that case, the assent of the owner might be implied, as the master was acting at the time for the owner's benefit. It cannot be so in this case, to that extent; but upon the best consideration I can give to this case, and in view of the importance of requiring a strict liability of the owner on the passenger contract, my conclusion is, that the exceptions to the jurisdiction were properly overruled by the district court. I should be pleased if the libelants, who are the only party who can carry this case up, claiming as they do more than $2,000, would appeal it. A decision would, in that case, be obtained from the supreme court, ascertaining authoritatively the liability of ship-owners for the torts of masters amounting to a breach of the peace, where they involve a breach of the passenger contract.

The remaining question is the amount of damages decreed by the district court. I am aware that the district judge is well versed as to the rule by which damages are to be adjusted; but am constrained to believe, that in this case he has taken counsel from the grossness of the abuse by the master of his authority, more than that rule will permit. Ordinarily, this court does not interfere with the amount of damages decreed by the court below. The district judge has the witnesses before him, and therefore has an opportunity of arriving at the truth, not within the grasp of this court, where the testimony is in writing. Where, therefore, no additional testimony is taken, I do not feel inclined to hastily disturb a decree on the point of damages; but where the adjustment of them depends, as in this case, upon the correct enunciation of principles, then the amount loses consideration in the importance of establishing a correct basis on which to rest their adjustment. It is admitted that the owners can only be made liable for such damages as flow directly from the breach of the contract. In an action against the perpetrator of the wrong, the aggrieved party would be entitled to recover not only actual damages but exemplary,—such as would vindicate his wrongs, and teach the tort feasor the necessity of reform. In an action against such, it would, in the language of the district judge, "be the duty of the court to apprise officers of ships that the crews are not on every casual disturbance to be called with capstan-bars to inflict dangerous and indiscriminate blows on unoffending passengers." In such actions, the damages may be inflamed to teach offenders their duty; but not when the proceedings are against the owners for breach of contract, who, in the language of Judge Washington, did not commit or in any manner countenance the wrong, and who, with libelants, are equally entitled to the protection of the law. Such should not be made liable beyond the amount of actual damages, uninfluenced by any considerations of punishing the act of the perpetrator on the ground of breach of contract. Dias v. The Revenge [Id. 3,877]. In the case of the Amiable Nancy, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 558, a libel was filed to recover damages for a marine tort. The court say: "Upon the facts disclosed in the evidence this must be pronounced a case of gross and wanton outrage, without any just provocation or excuse. And if this were a suit against the original wrong-doers, it might be proper to go yet further, and visit upon them in the shape of exemplary damages the proper punishment which belongs to such lawless misconduct. But it is to be considered that this is a suit against the owners of the privateer; upon whom the law has from motives of policy, devolved a responsibility for the conduct of the officers and crew employed by them, and yet, from the nature of the service, they can scarcely ever be able to secure to themselves adequate indemnity in case of loss."

This reasoning is appropriate to the case at bar. The owners are sought to be made liable, by a constructive consent annexed to the contract, for criminal acts of the master and mariners, alleged as the gravamen of the breach of contract done without their knowledge, and of which they are as innocent as the libelants. In an action ex delicto or ex contractu in such a case, the measure of damages should be adjusted to the loss proved to have been actually incurred, uninfluenced by the conduct of the real wrong-doer, who is civilly and criminally liable for his acts to the injured party. In this case, the libelants were steerage passengers on board the Golden Gate. They are represented to be laboring men, without means; and have therefore filed their bill in forma pauperis. In relation to one of them, James McGuire, the district judge says: "He seems to have received a violent blow on his wrist, or that it has been severely strained, which prevents the muscles from being used without considerable pain." The judge proceeds to state, that the physicians assert with considerable confidence that the rigidity of the muscles will be overcome by use, and conclude that for the present he is unable to make much use of it, and that condition must continue under favorable circumstances for a month or two. It is further stated that from the 31st day of May, when the injury was received, until the trial (a period of about three and a half months), the libelant has been practically deprived of the use of his hand; that he was a sea-faring man, and that his last employment was as mate. Now, under the rule I have endeavored to show (this proceeding being against the innocent owner, and not against the original wrong-doer), the actual loss is to be the measure of damages. Apply this rule to the case. Three and a half months intervened between the receipt of the injury and the trial. Add to these, two more months for probable loss of employment by reason of the loss of the use of his hand. We have then, five and a half months; and allowing for loss of wages at $65 per month, we have the aggregate sum of three hundred and fifty-seven dollars and fifty cents. This gives to the libelant wages for the whole period. There is no evidence as to the payment of a doctor's bill, or any other item of expenditure; still, in addition to loss of wages, there are other sources of expense, which, though not directly proved, may be inferred. To meet them, double the amount of wages, add for proctor's fees $250, and we have an aggregate of $965; which will fully cover all actual loss, and amount to compensatory damages. To this libelant, the court below decreed the sum of fifteen hundred dollars.

With regard to the other libelant, Thomas M. Place, it appears from the statement of the district judge "that he received a violent and dangerous blow, without any fault on his part." The blow inflicted no permanent injury, with the exception of a slight scar or indentation on the side of the face. "It must have caused, however (says the judge), much suffering; and he appears to have been obliged to live on liquids for some time, from his inability to chew hard food." It is evident that the wanton act of the officer in striking the libelant, evidenced as it was by the freedom from fault of the latter, must have entered into the estimate made of the loss of libelant, which was fixed at $600. In fact, the decree is preceded by the statement "that it is the duty of the court to apprise officers of ships that the crews are not, on every casual disturbance, to be beaten with capstan-bars," &c. Now, it is most true that such notice should be given in actions brought against officers themselves; but in actions against innocent owners, while the policy of the law holds them liable for actual damages as proved, these cannot be enhanced to admonish the guilty. There was no proof of actual loss by this libelant, and perhaps against the owners he is entitled to nothing. But he received a violent and dangerous blow without any provocation given, and must have been subjected to some suffering. Seeking a money compensation from a party who had no participation in the matter, I consider $250 a sufficient amount. I am aware that his honor the district judge, is familiar with the distinction to which this court has alluded in the adjustment of damages; but it appears to me, on reading his opinion, that he has been unconsciously, and not unnaturally, betrayed into awarding punitive rather than compensatory damages. A decree must be entered in accordance with the foregoing views, and handed for examination and signature to the judge.

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Oct., 1826.

TAXATION—MODE OF COLLECTING—NON-RESIDENTS—FEES IMPROPERLY RECEIVED—TAX COLLECTOR.

1. The act of 1825 concerning taxes, requiring the "inhabitants" of each township to attend at the place of holding elections, at such time as the sheriff shall designate, to pay their taxes to him, does not apply to non-residents of the state or the township, but only to taxable inhabitants of the township.

2. Penalties may be recovered for fees improperly received by a sheriff and collector.

[Action by G. K. and W. G. McGunnegle against Samuel M. Rutherford, sheriff of Pulaski county.]

Before JOHNSON, SCOTT, and TRIMBLE, JJ.

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action of debt brought by the plaintiffs, citizens and residents of the state of Missouri, against the defendant, as sheriff of Pulaski county, to recover the amount of certain penalties imposed by law for demanding and receiving certain fees alleged by the plaintiffs to have been illegally collected from them by the defendant.

The following are the facts, as they appear from the agreed case submitted to the court: The plaintiffs own the north-east quarter of section twelve in township six north, and range eight west, lying in Pulaski county. The defendant, as sheriff of that county, on the 1st day of July, 1826, gave thirty days notice by advertisement, as prescribed by the first section of an act of the general assembly of this territory, entitled "An act supplementary to the several laws regulating the collection of taxes," passed 26th October, 1825, that he would attend at the proper places to receive the taxes due from the "inhabitants." That the plaintiffs, as non-residents of this territory and citizens of Missouri, failed by themselves or agents to attend at the place and time designated in the defendant's advertisement, or to pay the taxes due on their tract of land. On the 1st day of September, 1826, the taxes not being paid, their tract of land was advertised in the Arkansas Gazette for sale, agreeable to the provision of the laws, to which the act passed the 26th of October, 1825 [Laws Ark. p. 27] is a supplement. After the above quarter section had been so advertised, the plaintiffs paid to the defendant the taxes, together with 18¾ cents costs for advertising, and 2½ per cent. commission on the amount of the taxes, it being half commission for receiving and paying out money; also one dollar, for levying execution on their tract of land. The plaintiffs, by way of penalty, claim six dollars for the two and a half per cent. commissions, and six dollars for the one dollar charged and paid for levying the tax list as an execution.

The principal question presented to the court is, whether the provisions of the act of 1825, before recited, are applicable to or embrace the case of a non-resident of the territory, or a non-resident of the county where the land lies. We are clearly of opinion that the law does not embrace either a non-resident of the territory, or of the county where the land lies, but has reference solely to the "inhabitants" of the county. The act provides that, for the purpose of collecting the taxes in the several counties of this territory, it shall be the duty of the several sheriffs to give notice, by advertisement in every township, that they will attend at the place where elections are held, on a named day, for the collection of taxes in such township. Whereupon it shall be the duty of such taxable inhabitants, or their agents, to attend and pay to the sheriff the taxes due from such inhabitants. The language here used is too clear and explicit to leave room for construction. The duty of attending at the place appointed by the sheriff is imposed only on the taxable inhabitants of the township where the land lies, by the very words of the act; and it is not the province of the court to extend it beyond the plain and obvious meaning of the legislature. The second section of the act relates only to those who were required by the first section to attend and pay the taxes due, and in the event of a failure on the part of any of the taxable inhabitants of the township to attend at the place designated in the advertisement of the sheriff, and pay their taxes, the tax list becomes an execution in the hands of the sheriff, who may proceed to make distress on the property of such defaulters. And if he does make an actual levy of the tax list, he is entitled to the same fees as if he had levied an execution, except the allowance of mileage, to which he is not entitled. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiffs are not liable to pay the half commissions, nor the one dollar charged for levying the tax list as an execution; and there must be judgment for plaintiffs.

McGUNNIGLE v. BLAKE.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1826.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—RENT—PARTIAL EVICTION.

In an action for mere use and occupation, not founded on an express contract for an entire rent, eviction of part is not a bar to the whole action.

This was an action of assumpsit [by Ann McGunnigle against Betty H. Blake] for use and occupation. Plea, eviction of part, in bar of the whole action.

Mr. Wallach, for plaintiff, contended that if Mrs. Blake resumed the occupation, it was a waiver of the eviction, and restored the plaintiff to her right of action. 1 Esp. N. P. pp. 2, 72; 4 Starkie, Ev. 1520, 1521; Smith v. Raleigh, 3 Camp. 513; Stokes v. Cooper, Id. 514; Fitchburg C. M. Co. v. Melvin, 15 Mass. 270.

Mr. Morfit, for defendant.

THE COURT said that in an action for mere use and occupation, not founded on an express contract for an entire rent, eviction of part is not a bar to the whole action; because the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for the actual use and occupation; and if the defendant was deprived of the use for a certain part of the time, and afterwards resumed the occupation and use of the premises, the jury will consider that circumstance in estimating the damages.

GAMING—ASSIGNMENT OF CERTIFICATE IN PLAY.

M. obtained a certificate for the payment of money from G., the owner and payee, by gambling, and assigned the same to L. and J. The assignment held void, as being in violation of the provisions of the act of 9 Anne in relation to gambling.

[This was an action at law by Alexander McGunnigle, Lee & Johnson, use of Johnson & Lee, against Edward Simmes.]

Gillespie had obtained from Eaton and Hubley, commissioners under the Cherokee treaty, a certificate of $2,506. On this, $250 had been paid out on Gillespie's order, leaving due on said certificate $2,256. This certificate came, by endorsement of Gillespie and assignment of one Alexander McGunnigle, into the possession of the plaintiffs, who, through their attorney, made application for payment to the department, or the proper officers thereof. An order from the secretary of war was given to the auditor, who passed the account notwithstanding the objection of said Gillespie, who was making effort to stop the payment. When the account came to the second comptroller it was delayed for some purpose or other. At this stage an injunction was prayed by the said Gillespie from the circuit court to stop the payment of the said certificate on the ground that the same had been obtained by McCunnigle by gambling, and that the said assignment was void. On this injunction the usual bond was given by said Gillespie, and sureties in the penalty of $1,000, that he would prosecute his suit with effect, &c. Shortly after he (Gillespie), without the knowledge of the other party, obtained from the department the amount on his certificate, and immediately dismissed his bill in chancery.

THE COURT permitted the defendant to show that the certificate was obtained by McGunnigle from Gillespie by gambling, and that the statute of 9 Anne, c. 14,[2] in relation

McGUNNIGLE v. WASHINGTON.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 460.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1824.

WARRANT—CERTAINTY—VIOLATION OF BY-LAW.

A warrant issued by a justice of the peace for the penalty of a by-law, ought to state all the circumstances required by the by-law to constitute the offence; but the court will disregard all such defects as would be disregarded after verdict in an action of debt or information upon a penal statute.

Four judgments for $20 each were rendered by a justice of the peace against the appellant [Ann McGunnigle], with costs, upon four separate warrants.

1. The first charged that she "did suffer or permit gaming in her house on the 31st of December, 1822, or the 1st of January, 1823, contrary to the act or acts of the said mayor, &c., on that subject made and provided." The second charged that she "did between the 28th of December, 1822, and the 18th of January, 1823, sell spirituous liquor, without having obtained a license from the register, contrary to the act or acts," &c. The third charged that she "did, sometime in the last and present months, suffer gambling in her house, contrary to the act or acts," &c. The fourth charged that she "did, during the present month, sell spirituous liquors by retail without having a license therefor, contrary to the act or acts," &c.

The by-law upon which the two prosecutions for gaming were founded, was that of the 16th of August, 1809, entitled "An act to suppress gaming," by the 2d section of which, it is enacted, "That if any person or persons whatsoever, shall, after the passage of this act, permit any E. O., A. B. C., faro, rolly-bolly, shuffle-board, equality table, or other device, except as aforesaid," (that is, except billiard-tables,) "to be set up, kept, or played, in his, her, or their house, out-house, tavern, or place appertaining thereto, he, she or they shall incur the penalty of $20 for every day or less time that the same is so kept up and maintained, to be recovered before a single magistrate, one half whereof shall go to the informer, and the other for the use of the city council." The by-law upon which the two prosecutions for selling liquor were founded, was that of the 26th of October, 1819, by the 1st section of which it is enacted, that "it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to sell or barter any brandy, rum, gin, whiskey, or other spirituous liquors, mixed or unmixed, wine, cordial, strong beer, or cider, in the city of Washington, without first obtaining a license for that purpose, as required by law, and every person who shall sell or barter as aforesaid, without first having obtained a license therefor, shall forfeit and pay a fine, for each and every offence, of $20; one half thereof for the use of this corporation, and the other half for the use of the informer; provided that nothing, herein contained, shall be so construed as to prevent the brewer, or maker of strong beer, cider, or cordial, from selling the same in quantities not less than five gallons, or to prevent any person from selling spirituous liquors, wines, cordial, strong beer, or cider, in quantities not less than ten gallons." By the 2d section, the mayor (not the register,) is authorized to issue licenses, &c.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) decided that these four warrants were too vague and uncertain to support the judgments; and reversed them with costs. And the court said, that the warrant, in such cases, for a penalty of a by-law ought to state all the circumstances which are required by the by-law to constitute the offence; or, in other words, the warrant must contain the charge of an offence. But the court will disregard all such defects as would be disregarded, after verdict, in an action of debt, or information upon a penal statute.

curities shall be for any money, or other valuable things whatsoever, won by gaming or playing at cards, dice table, tennis, bowls, or other game or games whatsoever, or by betting on the sides or hands of such as do game at any of the games aforesaid, or for the reimbursing or repaying any money knowingly lent or advanced at the time and place of such play to any person or persons so gaming or betting as aforesaid, or that shall, during such play, so play or bett, shall be utterly void, frustrate, and of non effect to all intents and purposes whatsoever, any statute, law or usage to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding. position and the specifications: Held, that the oath of the bankrupt, under that section, ought to be taken anew, after such withdrawal.

[In the matter of John A. Machado, a bankrupt.]

A. W. Speir, for petitioner.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In this case, the oath of the bankrupt required by the 29th section of the act was subscribed and taken on the 3d of December, 1868. Specifications in opposition to his discharge were filed on the 4th of January, 1869, by a creditor, alleging, among other things, wilful false swearing in the affidavits annexed to his petition and schedules, in certain particulars. The case then came before me and was ordered to stand for hearing on the specifications, with leave to take testimony. On the 19th of January, 1869, the creditor withdrew in writing his appearance in opposition and the specifications. No new oath of the bankrupt under section 29 is presented. I think, in view of the fact that the 29th section specifies as a ground for withholding a discharge, that the bankrupt, or some person in his behalf, has procured the assent of a creditor to the discharge, or influenced the action of a creditor, at some stage of the proceedings, by a pecuniary consideration or obligation, and that the same ground is made, by section 34, a ground for setting aside and annulling the discharge after it is granted, that, in this case, and in all cases where specifications such as those in this case are put in and are afterwards withdrawn, the oath of the bankrupt required by section 29 ought to be subscribed and taken after the withdrawal. A decision in this case is, therefore, suspended, to allow the defect to be supplied.

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. Sept., 1870.

ELECTIONS—QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS—THE ENFORCEMENT ACT.

[It was not the purpose of the act of congress of May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 140), to prescribe the qualifications of voters, or even to alter them, as fixed by the state law, except so far as they were founded upon the distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and it is therefore no violation of the law to refuse to register a white applicant on the ground that he is not qualified to vote under the state law because of his adherence to or participation in the late Rebellion.]

[This was a hearing at chambers upon the return of a writ of habeas corpus issued in behalf of the petitioner, John H. McIllwee.]

BOND, Circuit Judge. It appears from the return and the evidence in this case that the petitioner is one of the persons appointed under the laws of the state of West Virginia to register those entitled to vote under the election laws of that state. A certain Winfield Scott Alkire, a white citizen of West Virginia, made application on the fifth day of August last to petitioner to be registered, and his application was refused on the ground that he was not qualified to vote under the laws of the state by reason of his adherence to or participation in the late Rebellion. The petitioner was therefore on the affidavit of said Alkire, arrested and brought before a commissioner of the United States for a supposed violation of the act of congress approved May 31, 1870, and by said commissioner, in default of bail, was committed to answer at the next term of the District court.

It appears to me that this case does not come within the purview of the statute in question. That is was not the intention of congress to abolish the laws of the several states which prescribe the qualifications of voters, or even alter them, except so far as they were founded upon the distinction of race, color or previous condition of servitude, is sufficiently evident from the words of the first section of the statute which declare it to relate to "all citizens of the United States who are or shall be otherwise qualified by law to vote." It cannot be doubted that the meaning of this language is, that these citizens shall be qualified to vote by the law of the state or territory in which they offer to poll. That these persons thus "otherwise qualified" shall vote without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude is the purpose and intent of the statute. It was clearly the duty imposed upon the petitioner to inquire into the qualifications of the applicant for registration under the laws of the state of West Virginia, and if he found him "otherwise qualified" he was to register him without distinction of race or color or previous condition of servitude, under the penalty of this act of congress.

The third section of this act of congress relates to those citizens otherwise qualified, who have not been able by reason of the "wrongful act or omission aforesaid" to do the prerequisite act which entitles the citizen to vote. There is no mention of any "wrongful act or omission" in the third section itself, and every rule of construction requires that reference should be had to the previous sections, where we find the "wrongful act or omission" to be the making among citizens "otherwise qualified," a distinction on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. It is not pretended that the petitioner refused the application of Alkire on this account, and therefore he is not guilty of the "wrongful act or omission" which makes him amenable to the punishment prescribed in these sections. The twenty-second section of the act under consideration relates to the "officers of any election at which any representative or delegate in the congress of the United States shall be voted for." It is not alleged nor was it true, that there was any election of the kind being held, of which election the petitioner was an officer. He was a mere subordinate officer of registration, from whose judgment there was an appeal, by the laws of the state, to a board of registration in review.

The petitioner, in my opinion, must be discharged, because it does not appear that he is guilty of the violation of the act of congress with which he is charged, and for the reason that, for his judgment of the qualification of the applicant for registration under the laws of West Virginia, he is not answerable in the court of the United States. I shall pass an order to that effect.

District Court, S. D. New York. July 19, 1869.

EXAMINATION OF BANKRUPT— FEES OF REGISTER.

1. Where, at the first meeting of a bankrupt's creditors, notice was given on behalf of a creditor, of an application to be made next day for an order for the examination of the petitioner, and the application was made pursuant to notice, whereupon the register proposed to grant the order on payment by the creditor of one dollar as his fee, and on request certified the question to the court whether the creditor must pay any and what fees: Held, that the proposed fee to the register is not provided for by the act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], nor by the general orders in bankruptcy, unless it is covered by the words in rule 30, "For every order made where notice is required to be given, &c."

2. These words apply to cases where previous notice is required to be given to an adverse party of the application for the order, before the order can be made.

3. Under the 26th section of the act, no notice is required to be given of an application to a register by a creditor for the examination of a bankrupt.

4. The examination is not a "meeting" under section 47 of the act, that word in the act always meaning a meeting of creditors.

5. The register is not entitled to the fee of one dollar for making the order in question, nor to any fee for that service.

6. Where a creditor applies for an order for the examination of a bankrupt, he must pay to the register the fees allowed by law for taking the bankrupt's depositions, both on the direct and cross-examination, and the register is not obliged to look in the first instance to the bankrupt, or to the fifty dollars deposited, or to the estate.

[In the matter of James Macintire, a bankrupt.]

In this case a register in bankruptcy certified that the first meeting of creditors was held July 11th, at which notice was given of an application next day for an order to examine the petitioner on behalf of a creditor, and the meeting was duly adjourned to July 12th. On that day, the petitioner attending, a creditor who had filed proof of his claim applied for an order, in pursuance of said notice, for the examination of the petitioner on behalf of the creditor at that time, the petitioner not objecting to the time, but insisting that the creditor must pay the register's fees for the order. The creditor refused to pay any fees, insisting that they must be paid out of the deposit of fifty dollars made by the petitioner with the clerk. The register proposed to grant the order on payment by the creditor of one dollar as the proper fee. At the request of the creditor the register certified the question for the decision of the court. The register, in his certificate, referred to that portion of the fourth section of the bankruptcy act, which provides that the fees of the registers, as established by the act, and by the general rules and orders required to be framed under it, shall be paid to them by the parties for whom the services may be rendered in the course of proceedings authorized by the act. He also referred to that part of rule 29 of the general orders in bankruptcy which provides that the fees of the register shall be paid or secured in all cases, before he shall be compelled to perform the duties required of him by the parties requiring such service. He also stated it to be his opinion that the granting of the order for the examination of the bankrupt having been required by the creditor and not by the bankrupt, the former and not the latter ought to pay the fees for the order. On the part of the creditor it was claimed, that such fees as are connected with the personal examination of the bankrupt are governed by the 47th section of the act; that that section says that such fees shall be paid out of the estate, and have priority over all other claims; that the court may, under rule 29 of the general orders in bankruptcy, exercise its discretion as to the payment of the whole or a part of the fees out of the fund in court; but that, without such direction from the court, the register must look to the fund in court for his fees in such a case as the present; [that the bankrupt is compelled by that section to deposit fifty dollars for that purpose; that that section contemplates that the services of the register in the examination of the bankrupt are services required by the bankrupt, and not by the creditor; that under the 47th section, the register was entitled to charge three dollars for the adjourned meeting of creditors on the 12th of July, such fee to be paid by the bankrupt; that such fee was the only fee the register had a right to charge, there being no provision by which he could exact one dollar from the creditor for entering an order for the examination of the bankrupt; that no such order was required; that there are services of the register specified in the 4th section of the act, which may be required of a creditor, and for which he should pay; but that the act does not contemplate that a creditor shall pay for the register's services in examining the bankrupt for the purpose of seeing whether he has made a proper exhibit of his affairs, when he calls a meeting of his creditors for that purpose; that under the 47th section the bankrupt must pay the register for that service, the three dollars for the meeting of creditors, and also the fees allowed by law for taking his deposition; that section 26 of the act requires the bankrupt at all times to attend and submit to an examination on oath upon all matters relating to the disposal of his property, &c.; that the fees for such examination are provided for by section 47 of the act. The views urged for the creditor are thus fully stated, in order that it may be seen that the question has been considered by the court in all its aspects.] [2]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The fee of one dollar proposed to be charged by the register in this case, for making the order for the examination of the bankrupt, is not provided for by the act, and is not at all provided for unless it is covered by the following provision of rule 30 of the general orders in bankruptcy, under the head of "Fees to the Register": "For every order made where notice is required to be given, and for certifying copy of the same to the clerk, one dollar." This provision allows a fee of one dollar for making an order and for certifying a copy of the same to the clerk, in a case where previous notice is required to be given to an adverse party of the application for the making of the order, before the order can be made. That this is the meaning of that provision of rule 30 of the general orders is shown by the language of rule 8 of the general orders. In the present case no notice was required to be given to any party of the application for the order for the examination of the bankrupt, before the order could be made. By the 26th section of the act it is provided, that the court may at all times require the bankrupt, upon reasonable notice, to attend and submit to an examination on oath upon all matters relating to the disposal or condition of his property, &c. An order requiring the bankrupt so to attend and be examined, and service of such order on him a reasonable length of time previously, are necessary; and the form of such order is prescribed by form No. 45 of the forms specified in the schedules annexed to the general orders in bankruptcy. But no previous notice is required to be given to any person of the application to the register by the creditor for the making of the order. It is to be made ex parte, on the application of the creditor. It may also, under section 26 of the act, be made by the register ex parte, on the application of the assignee, or by the register on his own suggestion, without any application. The register was, therefore, not entitled to charge any fee for making the order in this case. There are many specific services which must be rendered by the registers, and for which no specific fee is provided either by the act or the general orders in bankruptcy. Their compensation for such services is covered by the specific fees which are enumerated in the act and the general orders. Thus, the register receives two dollars for issuing a warrant, but no specific fee is provided for the adjudication of bankruptcy, form No. 5, which the register must make before he can issue the warrant. He receives compensation for making the adjudication, in the fee of two dollars which he receives for issuing the warrant. That fee of two dollars is a fee for doing everything (a fee for which is not otherwise specially provided) which results in the issuing of the warrant; and no specific fee is provided for the service of examining the bankrupt's petition and schedules, when such examination results in the withholding of the adjudication of bankruptcy. So, also, the fee of three dollars to the register for an order for a dividend covers all his services, not otherwise provided for, which result in the making of the order for the dividend; and the fee of two dollars to the register for every discharge, when there is no opposition, covers all his services, not otherwise provided for, which result in the granting of the discharge. The making of the order in this case for the examination of the bankrupt, not having any fee specially attached to it, must be considered as compensated by some one or more of the fees which are enumerated.

The fee of one dollar for the order cannot be considered as authorized by the provision of the 47th section, which gives a fee of one dollar for "every application for any meeting in any matter" under the act. The word "meeting," wherever used in the 47th section and elsewhere in the act, means a meeting of creditors such as is spoken of in the 12th, 27th, and 28th sections. The application by the creditor for the order for the examination of the bankrupt cannot be regarded as an application for a meeting of creditors.

As the register was bound to make the order asked for without requiring the payment by the creditor, or any other person, of any specific fee for such order, this decision might properly go no farther than to dispose of that point. But, in view of the positions urged by the counsel for the creditor, it is deemed proper to lay down the following proposition, which is applicable to this case, namely—that where a creditor applies, under section 26 of the act, for an order for the examination of the bankrupt, the creditor must pay to the register the fees allowed by law for taking the deposition of the bankrupt, not only for his direct examination, but for his cross-examination, if any, and the register is not required to look in the first instance for such fees to the bankrupt, or to the fifty dollars deposited by him, or to the bankrupt's estate.

[Whether such fees shall ultimately be paid out of the estate, will be a question for consideration hereafter. The clerk will make a certificate of this decision to the register, Edgar Ketchum, Esq.] [1]

BANKRUPTCY—SERVICE OF NOTICE, FORM NO. 52—REQUEST, FORM NO. 28.

1. When the discharge of a bankrupt is applied for after sixty days from the adjudication, the notice, form No. 52, need be served only on the creditors who have proved their debts, even though it contains a notice of the second and third general meetings of creditors.

2. It is not necessary, in such case, that the request of the assignee, form No. 28, should be furnished to the register.

In this case, at the request of the bankrupt [Charles H. McIntire], the register certified to the court two questions, viz.: (1) Whether, when the discharge is applied for after sixty days from the adjudication, the notice, form No. 52, if containing the notice of the second and third general meetings of the creditors, must be mailed to all the creditors known to the bankrupt, or only to such as have proved their debts; (2) Whether, in applying for the order to show cause why a discharge should not be granted, after sixty days from the adjudication, the bankrupt must furnish to the register the request, form No. 28. The register expressed his opinion, that it was safer to require the notice to be given to all the creditors, and that the request, form No. 28, ought to be furnished.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The notice need be mailed only to those creditors who have proved their debts, and it is not necessary that the request of the assignee, form No. 28, should be furnished.

BANKRUPTCY—SETTING ASIDE DISCHARGE—LACHES—VAGUE SPECIFICATIONS.

1. Where specifications of objection to a bankrupt's discharge had been filed, which were too vague to be triable, and no application was made to amend them, and a discharge was granted, and the creditor, about a month afterward applied, on petition, to have the discharge set aside, and for leave to file amended specifications: Held, that the creditor was chargeable with laches.

2. No specific ground of opposition to the discharge was made to appear in the petition, and the discharge could not be impeached on such vague averments; and, on the evidence, there was no ground to believe that the bankrupt had failed to insert all his property in his schedules, or to deliver it to his assignee.

In this case a discharge [2] was granted to the bankrupt [Charles H. McIntire] on the 24th of February, 1868. About a month afterward, this petition was presented to the court, in behalf of a creditor, praying that the discharge might be set aside, and that the creditor might be allowed to file amended specifications of opposition to the discharge. Specifications of objection had been filed in his behalf, which were, however, too vague to be triable, within the rules laid down in previous decisions of this court. Those decisions were known to the attorney for the creditor, but no application was made in his behalf for leave to amend the specifications, until the present motion was made.

F. C. Nye, for bankrupt.

Salter & Cowing, for creditor.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. 1. The proceedings in this case were regular, and the discharge was properly granted. The specifications of grounds of opposition to the discharge were too vague and general to be triable. The attorney for the creditor had ample opportunity, after the decisions of the court on the question of the sufficiency of specifications were made, and before the discharge in this case was granted, to apply to the court for leave to amend the specifications, and the facts in evidence show that he was guilty of laches in not doing so, after his attention was called to their probable insufficiency.

2. If there had been no laches in the case, still the petition now presented, that the discharge be vacated, and that the creditor be allowed to file amended specifications and oppose the discharge, sets forth no specific ground of opposition. It is as vague as were the specifications filed. It merely sets forth that the attorney for the creditor believes that, if the case is tried on its merits, it can be shown that the bankrupt has a large amount of personal property which he has not put into his schedule of assets, or passed over to the assignee in the case. Even if this is to be regarded as an averment that the bankrupt had such property when he filed his petition, it is too vague to found any action of the court upon. The discharge would have been granted notwithstanding so vague a specification, and, having been granted, it cannot be impeached on a petition containing only so vague an averment.

3. I have looked into the testimony of the bankrupt taken before the register in this case, and his testimony taken on the supplemental proceedings in the state court, and can see no ground for questioning the bona fides, fairness or validity of the transfer of his property to his brother, in August, 1862, and no reason to suppose the bankrupt failed to insert, in his schedule of assets, all the property he had at the time, or failed to deliver to his assignee all the property he was bound to deliver to him.

The prayer of the petition is denied.

MOTION TO ADMIT A WILL TO PROBATE.

1. A will to convey land must be perfect, and executed with all the forms and solemnities required by law. No defect in its execution can be aided or supplied by parol proof.

2. A will of personal property must be perfect on its face, or it must appear, if incomplete or defective, that it was intended by the testator that it should operate as his will in its unfinished state, or that he was prevented from completing the contemplated formalities by being overtaken by sickness or some other casualty.

A paper, acknowledged to have been written by the late Mr. Alexander McIntire, and purporting to be his last will and testament, but without date or signature, was presented to the orphans' court for probate. The case having been argued by the counsel for and against the paper as the will of the deceased, the judge gave the following as the judgment of the court.

BY THE COURT. The said paper upon its face purports to dispose of all his estate, real and personal, as his last will and testament. It is proved to have been written by said McIntire, and was found with another paper of his after his death, where it had doubtless been placed by said McIntire, without date, and not signed. Dr. Young, his intimate friend, and physician in his last illness, proved that McIntire said to him that he had made his will.

A will to convey lands must be perfect, executed with all the forms and solemnities required by law, and no defect in its execution can be aided or supplied by parol proof. It is equally true that the same strictness is not required in a will of personal property; but to constitute even a good will of personal property the paper must be either complete on its face, or it must appear if incomplete or defective, that it was intended by the testator that it should operate as his will in its unfinished or imperfect state, or that he was prevented from completing the contemplated formalities by being overtaken by sickness or death, or some other casualty. Plater v. Groome, 3 Md. 143; Tilghman v. Stewart, 4 Har. & J. 173; Barnes v. Syester [14 Md. 507], decided in the June term of 1859, being the will of Virginia W. Mason, propounded for probate, and refused both as to realty and personalty. See the opinion of Lord Loughborough in Mathews v. Warner, 4 Ves. 209.

Alexander McIntire, deceased, was an intelligent man; he understood perfectly well the formalities necessary to make his will effective as to his estate, and it cannot be presumed that he intended this unfinished paper to operate as his will. This paper, therefore, cannot be admitted to probate, and the motion is overruled.

BANKRUPTCY—LIENS—JUDGMENT—WITHDRAWAL OF PROOF.

1. The issuing of a writ of fieri facias upon a judgment recorded against the defendant in 1861, does not create such a lien upon his real estate as will be respected and enforced by the bankruptcy court, when the defendant has been subsequently declared a bankrupt so late as 1868.

[Cited in Re Butler, Case No. 2,236.]

2. The register cannot order or permit the withdrawal of a proof of debt after he has passed upon the same, allowed, certified, and transmitted it to the assignees.

In bankruptcy.

BROOKS, District Judge. By the case argued in this cause by D. G. McRae, assignee of Milton McIntosh and Henry Lilly, as creditors of said bankrupt, this question is first presented: "Does the issuing of a writ of fieri facias to the county in which the lands of the defendant are situated, upon a judgment recorded against such defendant in the county court of another county, tested of March term, 1861, and returnable at June term, 1861, of said court, create such a lien upon the real estate of the defendant as will be respected and enforced by the bankruptcy court, the said defendant having been subsequently declared a bankrupt upon his own petition in the month of March, 1868?"

It is now settled in North Carolina that a judgment does not create a lien in favor of the plaintiff, upon the property, either real or personal, of the defendant, nor does the issuing of a fieri facias upon such judgment create a lien. In this respect we are governed by the common law. In many of the states it is different, but it is made so by the statutes of those states. The law is also now different in North Carolina. It was the case long before in this state, that if a plaintiff obtained a judgment, issued his fieri facias, and the same came to the sheriff of a county in which the defendant's property was situated, and the sheriff levied upon such property, that such levy related back to the test term of the execution, and created a lien upon the property levied on, from the beginning of said term, for the satisfaction of the plaintiff's debt. But without a levy, the only execution issued in this case, became a dead process after the return day, to wit, the Monday of June term, 1861. Subsequent to that time the sheriff was not authorized to do anything by that process; and if a year and a day elapsed from the issuing of another execution, the judgment became dormant, so that no fieri facias or other final process could issue without a revival of the same. A federal court is asked to declare that a lien has been created in behalf of the plaintiff Lilly, and to enforce such lien by ordering the assignee to pay to the said plaintiff the proceeds of the sales of the bankrupt's property or sufficient to satisfy his judgment. This the court would do, if by the course pursued by the plaintiff he had by the laws of North Carolina acquired a lien, and had preserved such lien up to the time of the bankruptcy of the defendant. That the plaintiff never acquired such lien I think is very clearly shown in the leading case of Smith v. Spencer, 3 Ired. 256; and this, since the very able and elaborate opinion of Judge Ruffin in that case, has been regarded as the settled law in North Carolina.

It is unnecessary to decide the second question propounded, as it is in effect determined by answer to the first.

In answer to the third question submitted, I state that the register cannot order or permit the withdrawal of a proof of debt after he has passed upon the same, allowed, certified, and transmitted same to the assignee.

CONTRACTS—IN WRITING—NOVATION—ORAL AGREEMENT.

Oral evidence of an agreement that the defendant should retain certain notes as security against other notes, may be given although there be a written agreement to return them on demand.

Trover for sundry notes. Evidence was given of a demand and refusal, the defendant stating that he held them as counter security to indemnify him against his indorsement of a note held by Tafts and Brooks. Evidence on the part of the defendant was produced of conversations between the plaintiff and defendant in which it was agreed, or understood that the latter was to retain the notes for that purpose.

THE COURT instructed the jury that if they should be of opinion that McIntosh had agreed that the papers should be left with Summers for that purpose, then he had a lien on them: and that in such case his refusal was no evidence of a conversion.

Mr. Lee, for plaintiff, moved the court to instruct the jury that an oral agreement to leave the notes in his possession could not control the written agreement to return them on demand. Which instruction the court refused to give; and a bill of exceptions was taken, but the case was never carried to the supreme court, the verdict being for the plaintiff.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—ENDORSER—INSOLVENCY OF MAKER—REASONABLE NOTICE—EVIDENCE—DEEDS—NOT RECORDED.

1. Under the laws of Virginia, in an action against the indorser of a promissory note, the plaintiff, to excuse himself for not having first brought suit against the maker, must show him to have been insolvent at the time of bringing the suit; and in order to recover, must have given reasonable notice of the non-payment by the maker; and the jury is to decide whether the notice was reasonable.

2. A deed of land in Maryland cannot be read in evidence unless recorded in Maryland.

Assumpsit upon W. Wilson's note, indorsed by the defendant [James Kennedy], to the plaintiff, as assignee of Gillis' estate. 1st count on the assignment of the note, setting forth that the maker, W. Wilson, was insolvent at the time of the suit brought. 2d count for money had and received.

THE COURT decided, (doubtfully,) that the plaintiff must prove the maker of the note insolvent at the time of bringing the action; that the plaintiff must prove reasonable notice to the indorser, of the non-payment by the maker; and that the jury were to decide whether the notice was reasonable.

THE COURT refused to permit the defendant to read in evidence (to prove the solvency of W. Wilson,) a deed of land in Washington county, Maryland, certified by T. Williams, (who calls himself clerk of Prince William county, in Virginia,) to have been proved in the latter county, but not recorded in Washington county in Maryland, according to the laws of Maryland.

PLEADING AT LAW — NIL DEBET—ACT OF LIMITATIONS—BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNMENT—AUTHORITY TO SUE—NONSUIT—JUSTICE OF CASE.

The act of limitations can not be given in evidence upon nil debet. The plaintiff being assignee of a bankrupt, must produce the commission and proceedings and deed of assignment. Upon reinstatement of the cause after nonsuit, the court will not permit the defendant to plead limitation, unless on affidavit showing it to be necessary for the justice of the case.

Debt on an accepted order. Nil debet and issue.

E. J. Lee, for defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury that the acceptance of the order not being dated, and the order being dated September 24th, 1794, and no proof being given of the date of the acceptance, they ought to presume that the acceptance was on the day of the date of the order, and therefore barred by the act of limitations; the writ not being issued until the 5th of September, 1801.

CRANCH, Circuit Judge, inquired whether the act of limitations was pleaded.

E. J. Lee contended that it might be given in evidence on the issue of nil debet, and cited Esp. N. P. 262.

THE COURT said they had decided at last term in Washington, in the case of Gardner v. Lindo [Case No. 5,231],—see that case in the supreme court of the United States, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 343,—that the statute of limitations could not be given in evidence on the plea of nil debet to an action of debt on a promissory note; and refused to overrule that decision, it having been made unanimously by a full court; and the court being now not full.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice, absent.

Upon the motion of E. J. Lee, for defendant, THE COURT instructed the jury that the plaintiff [the assignee of E. C. Dick] must prove himself to be duly appointed assignee, by producing the original commission, and proceedings thereon, or a certified copy thereof, and the original deed of assignment.

The plaintiff became nonsuit, and THE COURT, on his motion, reinstated the cause without costs, and refused the defendant leave to plead the statute of limitations, unless he could show by affidavits that the plea was necessary to the justice of the case.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS — ADVERSE POSSESSION OF LAND—COLOR OF TITLE.

No claimant is entitled to the protection of the statute of limitations, under a plea of seven years' possession, without he entered under color of title.

The plaintiff [McIver's lessee] relied upon a grant from the state of North Carolina to Stokeley Donelson and William Tyrrill for forty thousand acres of land, dated in January, 1795. On the part of the defendant a grant was introduced covering the land in contest from the state of North Carolina to John Mebane, dated in the year 1800. The defendant had no legal title under that grant; but he had been in possession of the land for more than seven years before the commencement of this suit; and it was endeavored to be shown that he took possession of it with the consent of Mebane. The beginning corner of the land called for in the plaintiff's grant was, until the year 1806, within the Indian boundary; but that part of the land on which the defendant resided was not. Seven years did not elapse between the extinguishment of the Indian title and the commencement of the present action. Two questions arose in argument: First. Whether the act of congress which prevented the running of lines and making of surveys within the Indian boundary did not prevent the statute of limitations from attaching until after the extinguishment of the Indian title. Second. Whether the defendant had such a title as would authorize him to avail himself of the statute of limitations.

Whiteside & Trimble, for plaintiff.
Mr. Grundy, for defendant.

McNAIRY, District Judge. First. The act of congress relied upon by the plaintiff is in the following words: "If any citizen or other person shall make a settlement on any lands belonging, or secured, or granted by treaty with the United States to any Indian tribe, or shall survey, or attempt to survey such lands, or designate any of the boundaries, by marking trees, or otherwise, such offender shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, and suffer imprisonment not exceeding twelve months." [2 Stat. 289.] In construing the statute of seven years' possession it has always been understood that it can never apply, nor commence running, until the person against whom it is to operate, or those under whom he claims, is invested with a legal title. Until that time, in legal language, no entry or claim could be made. And it is equally clear that if the law imposes a legal disability to bring suit the statute will not apply until the disability is removed. So, if in this case the act of congress had prevented M'Iver from prosecuting his claim, I should be of opinion that he ought not to be at all affected by the possession of the defendant. But I do not consider that this was the case. The object of the act was to prevent a disturbance with the Indians, arising from persons going on their lands and marking trees, and making surveys, with a view to procure titles; but if a corner had been marked before the passage of the act, it surely could not have been intended that the owner might not go upon the land to examine for the corner, and collect such other proof as would enable him to establish his beginning. And, indeed, if there should be any doubt upon that point I consider that under the third section of the act a license might have been procured from the governor upon a proper application for that purpose. Inasmuch, therefore, as there was no legal disability to commence suit in proper time, and as, at most, the act only threw some impediments in the way of procuring testimony, the court is of opinion that the first proposition ought to be determined for the defendant.

Second. It will not be necessary for the court to say much upon the second proposition. A naked possession will not authorize the defendant to avail himself of the statute. Therefore, if the jury should be of opinion that the defendant took possession of the land in contest, as a mere trespasser, without any authority from Mebane, they ought to find for the plaintiff; but if, on the other hand, it appears that the defendant for seven years next before the commencement of the present action was in possession of the land with the consent or approbation of Mebane, the verdict ought to be for the defendant. The jury will determine this matter from the evidence now before them.

Verdict for the defendant.

This case was taken to the United States supreme court on a writ of error, and the judgment of this court affirmed. See 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 25.

SETOFF — BANKRUPTCY — NOTE ASSIGNED TO ASSIGNEE.

A bond due from the bankrupt to the defendant cannot be set off against the defendant's note to a third person assigned to the assignee of the bankrupt's effects after commission issued.

Assumpsit on a promissory note of Wilson to J. Kennedy, dated the 15th of October, 1805, at 20 days, indorsed by J. Kennedy to McIver, assignee of the effects of Gillis, a bankrupt. The defendant offered to set off a bond of Gillis to W. Wilson and Roger Coltart, who is dead, dated 15th of September, 1795, and payable the 15th of March, 1796. The note was given since the date of the commission. The declaration is by McIver as assignee of the effects of Gillis.

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. March 26, 1878.

PROMISSORY NOTE—COLLATERAL SECURITY—HOLDER FOR VALUE.

A holder of a promissory note as collateral security is not a purchaser for value.

Rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defence. Assumpsit on a promissory note made by defendants to the order of one Zohn and by him indorsed to the plaintiff. The affidavit of defence alleged that the note was given in renewal of another for which the defendants never received any consideration; that the original note was given to Cummings & Co. to be discounted by them for the defendants' benefit; that it was not so discounted, but was passed by them to Zohn to secure an antecedent debt due him by Cummings & Co.

Harold Goodwin, for the rule. The defence that the note was given to plaintiff as collateral only, although perhaps established in Pennsylvania and New York [Coddington v. Bay, 20 Johns. 637] [2] has been expressly declared invalid by the supreme court of the United States. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 15; Byles, Bills, 124. The renewal of the note implies forbearance of itself a sufficient consideration.

Jos. L. Tull, contra. There is sufficient evidence of fraud to put the plaintiff on proof of having given value. Cummings v. Boyd [83 Pa. St. 372]; Royer v. Bank [Id. 248].

CADWALADER, District Judge. After consideration I do not doubt the correctness of the decision of the supreme court of the state in Royer v. Bank, supra. There is an extra-judicial remark of Story, J., in Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 15, in which he holds that the taking of a note, simply as collateral security, is a sufficient consideration and gives the purchaser a better title than the indorser had; but this is no part of the real decision, which is that, where the note is taken in payment, the consideration is sufficient. Where time or indulgence is given, or something done to change the relation of the parties to the original consideration, the case is different, but here the defence is sufficient according to Royer v. Bank. The doubt I had of the case was as to the renewal of the note,—whether that was not equivalent to giving time. It is so generally, unless the ordinary effect is negatived by peculiar circumstances. Here the time given was on the collateral and not on the original debt, and could not suspend the right of action, as has been often decided. It is unnecessary to consider the supplemental affidavit. Rule discharged.

CHECK—ACCOMMODATION — ENTITLED TO NOTICE.

If a man lends to his friend his check upon a bank in which he has no funds, upon the assurance of his friend that he will provide funds there to meet it, and the plaintiff, at the time of receiving it, knew that the drawer of the check, at the time of drawing it, had a reasonable expectation that funds would be so placed in the bank, the drawer is entitled to regular notice of the non-payment by the bank.

[See Baker v. Gallagher, Case No. 768.]

Assumpsit, against the drawer of a check on the Bank of Columbia. The defendant lent his check for $300, on the Bank of Columbia, to Fitzhugh, payable to him or bearer, but had no funds in that bank. Fitzhugh delivered it to the plaintiff, and promised to take it up in ten days; and the plaintiff engaged not to present it to the bank, nor to call on the defendant until the expiration of that period.

THE COURT, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) at the prayer of the defendant's counsel, instructed the jury, that, if they should be satisfied, by the evidence, that the defendant, when he drew the said check, had a reasonable expectation that funds would be placed in the said bank, by Fitzhugh, to meet the check, and that such expectation was known to the plaintiff when the said check was presented to the bank for payment, then the defendant was entitled to regular notice of the non-payment thereof by the bank.

Verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial upon the ground of misdirection of the jury, by the court, upon the matter of law—and of newly discovered evidence—but the motion was overruled.

PATENTS—DEVICE FOR MENDING HOSE—ANTICIPATION.

[A device for mending rents in firemen's hose by clamping the torn edges together between

metal plates is not anticipated by a similar device for making preserving cans air-tight.]

[Appeal from the commissioner of patents.]

[Application by John S. Mackay for letters patent for an improvement in mending firemen's hose. The application was denied. Applicant appeals.]

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The applicant's claim relates to the stopping of holes or rents in firemen's hose, and consists in applying to the hose while in use an instrument or hand machine by which the edges of the leather or material of which the hose is made, that constitute the boundary of the hole or rent are clamped and tightly held between the two parts or plates of the instrument, thereby making the hose as water-tight at the point of breakage as at any other point. The commissioner having by his decision refused to grant a patent, Mackay filed his reason of appeal, which is that the references cited against the claim do not show that holes or rents in hose have ever been stopped as described and claimed by him; and that the refusal of said application is an error. The substance of the report of the commissioner in reply, after stating the claim, is as follows: "Now as stopping a hole is not the proper subject matter of letters patent, the claim here presented, can only properly be regarded as limited to the device employed for that purpose. The references clearly show that the same device precisely is familiar in many other uses, and therefore I cannot but think that the appellant has only made a double use of a well-known invention; and this double use is not patentable." The commissioner refers to my decision in the case of Ex parte Berry [Case No. 1,353] as being apposite to this case.

Such were the proceedings presented by the original papers and documents, with the decision reasons of appeal and report laid before me by the commissioner according to previous notice given of the time and place of hearing said appeal, when said appellant appeared by his attorney, filed his answer in writing and submitted his case.

The ground of the rejection is a double use of a well-known invention, and references are given to air-tight preserver-cans having a device consisting of a single-plate clamp, or a plate of the proper form and dimensions to cover the surface to be clamped, an india rubber packing-ring, and a resisting bar having a rod with a screw thread and clamping nut. When used the plate covers the packing, and is exterior while the resisting bar is interior, and serves simply to hold the clamp-plate in place. The description given of the instrument in the pending case is that it is made up of two thick plates of metal of elliptical form, both plates being thick at the centre and inclining to the edges which are thin and roughened and slightly elevated, the better to hold between them the edges of the hole or rent. These plates are of curved form also so that when applied to the hose the inner surface of that plate, which will be in the hose is convex, and the inner surface of the other plate which will be on the outside of the hose is concave, and the leather or other material of the hose is clamped and held in the line of its circumference. To the under or inner of these two plates is affixed the end of a bar or standard, which passes through a hole in the upper or outer plate; and by means of a screw thread on the outer part of this standard, and a screw nut fitting thereon the two plates are forced together. It will be perceived therefore that there are differences between the references and the instrument of the applicant in form, in dimensions in construction; a change not merely in form, but in substance, so that the one could not be used in the place of the other. The purpose and object,—the one is to resist a most powerful force from within in effectually preventing the escape of water and the form of the instrument is adapted to that end and must also be not only tight but very strong,—the other has no such object or purpose to answer. But if the combination as machinery were admitted to be old, the effect produced, is unquestionably a very great and valuable benefit to the public very far beyond that of the references and this combination has never before been applied or used in the way and for the purpose here described. The invention is therefore new.

For the foregoing reasons, I think there is error in the decision of the commissioner, and the same is reversed; and it is ordered that letters patent accordingly issue to said John S. Mackay as prayed.

and books of account put in evidence, and am compelled to come to the conclusion that discharges cannot be granted to the bankrupts.

The principal specification of objection to their discharge, is, that being merchants and traders within the meaning of the bankrupt act [of 1867; 14 Stat. 517], they have not, subsequently to the passage of the said act, kept proper books of account. Various particulars under this head are stated in the specifications. It is impossible to examine the cash-book of the firm of J. M. Mackay & Co., of which the bankrupts were members, nor to read in connection with it the testimony of the bankrupt Mackay, and not come to the conclusion that such cash-book fails to show, in an intelligible or proper manner, the nature and character of such receipts and disbursements of cash made by the firm as are entered therein, and that it fails to contain many entries of receipts and disbursements of cash that were made by the firm. It is also apparent from the testimony of the bankrupt Mackay, that many receipts and disbursements of cash were made by the firm that were not entered in any book or account, and of which no record was made. These objections are embraced in the specifications, and, upon them, without examining any of the other grounds specified, I am satisfied that it is my duty to refuse discharge.

PLEADING AT LAW—DUPLICITY—CONSTRUCTION OF FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT—RIGHT TO VOTE UNDER LAW OF OREGON—PENALTY.

1. Duplicity in pleading is forbidden by both the common law and the Code as tending to prolixity and confusion, but under the Code objection to duplicity is to be made by a motion to strike out the pleading rather than by special demurrer as at common law.

2. If a complaint contains more than one cause of action they must be separately stated or it will be liable to be stricken out for duplicity.

3. Under the fifteenth amendment to the constitution and the act of May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 140), to enforce it, all persons declared citizens of the United States by the fourteenth amendment are entitled to vote in the states where they reside, at all elections by the people, without distinction of race, color or previous condition of servitude; but the several states, notwithstanding the amendment, have the power to deny the right of suffrage to any citizens of the United States on account of age, sex, place of birth, vocation, want of property or intelligence; neglect of civic duties, crime or other cause not specified in the amendment.

4. The power of congress over the subject of the right to vote in the several states is conferred by the fifteenth amendment and is confined to the enforcement of such amendment, by preventing the states from discriminating between citizens of the United States in the matter of the right to vote, on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude.

5. Under the law of Oregon when a person offers to vote and is duly challenged, thereafter his right to vote depends upon his taking the oath that he is a qualified elector as prescribed in section 13 of the election law (Code Or. p. 700), and it then becomes the duty of the judges of election to tender him such oath, and administer it to him, if he is willing to take it.

6. The taking of this oath by the party offering to vote after he is challenged, is a necessary prerequisite to the right to vote within the meaning of section 2 of the act of congress, aforesaid, and a refusal or omission upon the part of the judges to give such party an opportunity to take it, is a violation of such section, if the same be done on account of his race, color or previous condition of servitude, but not otherwise.

7. In an action to recover a penalty under section 2 of the act of congress, aforesaid, it must appear from the complaint, that the plaintiff was a citizen of the United States, and otherwise qualified to vote at the time and place mentioned in the complaint; and that the defendant refused or knowingly omitted to furnish the plaintiff an opportunity to become qualified to vote, as by refusing or knowingly omitting to swear the plaintiff to his qualifications as an elector, when the law of the state made it his duty so to do, and that such refusal or omission was on account of the race, color or previous condition of servitude of plaintiff.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and by Benjamin Vaughan Abbott, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission.]

[This was an action by William C. McKay against James A. Campbell to recover a certain penalty provided by an act of congress for having been wrongfully prevented from voting. The case is now heard on the defendant's demurrer.]

John H. Mitchell and John C. Cartwright, for plaintiff.

James K. Kelly, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This action was commenced July 1, 1870, to recover a penalty of $500 under and in pursuance of section 2 of "An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several states of this Union, and for other purposes," approved May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 140).

Among other things it is alleged in the complaint that on June 6, 1870, as provided by law, a general election was held in the state of Oregon and county of Wasco therein, at which a representative in congress, and also state and county officers, were voted for and elected, and that on said day and long prior thereto, the plaintiff was a citizen of the United States, and a resident of East Dalles in said county and state, and legally entitled to vote at such election in the precinct aforesaid for all such offices. That on said day defendant was acting as judge of election in said precinct, in conjunction with George Corum and Thomas M. Ward, and as such judge was required by law to receive votes from the electors, and perform other duties required by law of such an officer; and that on said day the plaintiff appeared at the polls in said precinct and offered his vote for Joseph G. Wilson as a representative in congress, and for Joel Palmer for governor of Oregon, and for others for different state officers, and for John Darrah for sheriff of said county, and for others for the different county offices; and that "the defendant combining with the other said judges, unlawfully and wrongfully prevented him from voting, that defendant, confederating with said Ward and Corum unlawfully and wilfully refused his vote—refused to swear him to his qualification as an elector—refused to enter his name on the poll books of said precinct, and refused to enter on record in said book his vote for the different candidates for whom he preferred to vote. All of which duties, though required of him by the laws of Oregon, he, the defendant, wrongfully and wilfully failed and refused to do, though requested to do so by plaintiff—that defendant with said Ward and Corum ordered him away from said polls, and deprived him of his right as a citizen to vote, to his damage. By reason of which unlawful acts of said defendant, so acting and combining with said others, plaintiff has suffered damages; and he, defendant, forfeited and became liable as provided by law to pay said plaintiff therefor the sum of five hundred dollars, for which sum, with costs and allowances as provided by law, plaintiff now asks judgment of the court." On July 8, the defendant demurred to the complaint, and for cause of demurrer alleged: (1) That it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (2) That several causes of action have been improperly united therein. On August 2 and 3 the demurrer was argued by counsel and submitted.

Duplicity in pleading, or the statement of more than one sufficient matter as a ground of action or defense thereto in the same count or plea, is forbidden by the common law and the Code as tending to useless prolixity and confusion. 1 Chit. Pl. 259; Gould, Pl. 220, Code Or. pp. 157, 161, 163. Duplicity in pleading being however only an error in form, at common law the objection had to be made by special demurrer. Chit. Pl. 701; Gould, Pl. 466. The Code having practically abolished special demurrers except in the instances enumerated in title 8 of chapter 1, has substituted the motion to strike out for the special demurrer in the case of duplicity in pleading. It provides (section 103): "When any pleading contains more than one cause of action or defense, if the same be not pleaded separately, such pleading may, on motion of the adverse party, be stricken out of the case." For these reasons, I conclude that as to the second ground stated, this demurrer is not well taken and that the objection should have been made by a motion to strike out the complaint.

As this demurrer must be sustained upon the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, it may be well enough to briefly consider the question of duplicity in the complaint, so that the plaintiff, if he desires to amend, may frame his amended complaint accordingly. The complaint contains but one count or statement of a cause of action, but it is alleged therein that the defendant, in conjunction with the other judges of election, unlawfully and wrongfully prevented the plaintiff from voting for representative in congress and for governor of the state of Oregon, and for other state officers, and for sheriff of the county and for other "county offices." Now, if it was unlawful to prevent the plaintiff from voting for any one of the candidates for these several offices, that, it appears to me, is a separate and distinct cause of action, and should have been separately stated. But the complaint alleges, not only that the defendant prevented the plaintiff from voting for a certain candidate for each of these offices, but that the defendant unlawfully and wilfully refused his vote—refused to swear him as to his qualifications as an elector—refused to enter his name on the poll books—refused to enter his vote, etc. Here are four different acts, in addition to the first one stated, alleged to have been committed by the defendant, each of which are assumed by the pleader to be a distinct violation of the act of congress, and consequently a separate cause of action. If so, they should have been stated or pleaded separately, so as to avoid the prolixity and confusion necessarily resulting from jumbling them together in one count or statement.

It is a question, whether some of these alleged refusals are sufficient to support an action for the penalty given by the act. It does not appear that the penalty given by section 2 of the act, is given for preventing a person from voting or for refusing to receive or record a vote, but for refusing or knowingly omitting to give full effect to such section. Now, this section substantially provides, that if the law of the state requires any act to be done as a prerequisite or qualification for voting, and by such law, officers are charged with the performance of duties in furnishing to citizens an opportunity to perform such prerequisite, or to become qualified to vote, it shall be the duty of such officers to give to all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity to perform such prerequisite and become qualified to vote, without distinction of race, color or previous condition of servitude. What amounts to a refusal or wilful omission to give effect to this section, upon the part of the state officers, depends upon the duties imposed upon these officers in this respect by the law of the state. Upon examination, it does not appear that the section commands these officers to admit or permit citizens of the United States "to vote without distinction of race, color or previous condition of servitude," but to only give such citizens an equal opportunity to become qualified to vote according to the law of the state and to perform any act which the law of the state may require as a prerequisite —a condition precedent—to voting. The duty which this section enjoins upon the officers is something or anything which the state law requires the officer to do, so as to enable the citizen to qualify himself to vote, and from the nature of things, it must precede, in point of time and order, the act of voting, or anything subsequent thereto. If these suggestions be sound, then none of the acts complained of by the complaint are within the purview of the section, except the refusal to swear the plaintiff to his qualifications as an elector.

The law of this state provides (Code Or. p. 700), that "Sec. 13. If any person offering to vote shall be challenged as unqualified, by any judge or clerk of the election, or by any other person entitled to vote at the same poll, the judges shall declare to the person so challenged, the qualifications of an elector; if such person shall then state himself duly qualified, and the challenge shall not be withdrawn, one of the judges shall then tender to him the following oath: You do solemnly swear, etc. (to the effect that the affiant had all the qualifications necessary to authorize him to vote at that poll). And if any person so challenged shall refuse to take such oath so tendered, his vote shall be rejected.

"Sec. 14. If any person so offering such vote shall take such oath, his vote shall be received, unless it shall be proven by evidence satisfactory to the majority of the judges that he does not possess the qualifications of an elector, in which case a majority of such judges are authorized to reject such vote."

It seems to me that whenever a person offering a vote is challenged, that it then becomes necessary that he should take this qualifying oath before he can be said to be qualified to vote. By the interposition of the challenge it becomes incumbent upon him to perform this prerequisite, to entitle himself to vote. But he cannot take this oath and perform this prerequisite without the judges shall furnish him an opportunity so to do. Therefore, the law of the state makes it the duty of the judges, or one of them, to tender and administer the oath to him. Then comes the law of congress and makes it the duty of the judges to give to all citizens, "without distinction of race, color or previous condition of servitude," the same and equal opportunities to perform this prerequisite—to take this oath—and thereby become qualified to vote. It follows, that a refusal or omission to furnish this equal opportunity to any person seeking to vote, on account of either race, color or previous condition of servitude, is a violation of the act.

As to the first ground of demurrer, I think it well taken. The complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The act of congress upon which this action is brought provides for enforcing the amendment to the constitution which declares (article 15):

"Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state, on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude.

"Sec. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

The act also regulates the elections of representatives in congress, in pursuance of section 4, art. 1, of the constitution, which declares: "The times, places and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof; but the congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing senators." Sections 2, 3 and 4 of the act, which relate to the enforcement of the amendment to the constitution, give penalties, to be recovered by civil action, against persons who violate them, but violations of that portion of the act regulating the election of representatives in congress are only punishable by indictment or information.

In considering the sufficiency of the complaint therefore, in this action, no special significance can be given to the fact that the plaintiff offered to vote for a candidate for representative in congress.

By the fourteenth amendment to the constitution, it is declared that:

"Art. 14, § 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside. * * *"

This clause of this amendment declares who are citizens of the United States and of the several states respectively. The fifteenth amendment above quoted, declares in effect that citizens of the United States and of the several states shall vote in their respective states at all elections by the people, without distinction on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. But the amendment does not take away the power of the several states to deny the right of citizens of the United States to vote on any other account than those mentioned therein. For instance, notwithstanding the amendment, any state may deny the right of suffrage to citizens of the United States, on account of age, sex, place of birth, vocation, want of property or intelligence, neglect of civic duties, crime, etc. The power of congress in the premises is limited to the scope and object of the amendment. It can only legislate to enforce the amendment, that is, to secure the right to citizens of the United States to vote in the several states where they reside, without the distinction of race, color or previous condition of servitude. And this appears to be the intention of the act, so far as it relates to the enforcement of the amendment.

Section 1 declares in effect, that all citizens of the United States, being otherwise qualified by law, shall be allowed to vote at all elections by the people in any state, district, etc., without distinction of race, color or previous condition of servitude. Section 2 declares in effect that officers of the state shall furnish all citizens of the United States with the same and equal opportunities to become qualified to vote without distinction of race, color or previous condition of servitude. True, the language of sections 4 and 5, particularly the former, if taken literally would apply to acts and proceedings intended to prevent citizens of the United States from voting whether the same were done or carried on, on account of the race, color or previous condition of servitude of the citizen in question or not. But they ought to be construed so as to harmonize with the unambiguous sections which precede them, and must in any view of the matter, be construed so as to have effect only within the limits of the power conferred by the amendment on congress over the subject.

Upon this construction of the act, to maintain this action I think it would be necessary to prove on the trial: (1) That the plaintiff was a citizen of the United States and otherwise qualified to vote at the time and place mentioned in the complaint. (2) That the defendant refused or knowingly omitted to furnish the plaintiff an opportunity to become qualified to vote, as by refusing or knowingly omitting to swear the plaintiff to his qualifications as an elector, when the law of the state made it his duty so to do, and that such refusal or omission was on account of the race, color, or previous condition of servitude of the plaintiff. If it be necessary to prove these facts to maintain this action, they ought to be alleged in the complaint. Now the complaint is silent as to the reason of the defendant's refusal or omission to swear the plaintiff as to his qualifications as an elector. It may have been for some other reason than on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and then the plaintiff's remedy, if any, would be found under the state law and in the state tribunals. I know it may be said with much probability that disingenuous judges of election who are violently adverse to and prejudiced against the amendment and the act, may refuse or omit to allow a citizen to qualify himself to vote, ostensibly for some reason not within the purview of the act, but really and in fact on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude. But this is a question of fact, and if the evidence is sufficient the jury will be bound to disregard the pretences of the defendant and find according to what appears to have been the fact. Besides, to prevent a failure of justice on this account, it may be necessary and proper to hold in this class of cases, as in many others, that slight proof on the part of the plaintiff as to the reason of the defendant's refusal or omission, is sufficient to throw the burden of proof in this respect upon the latter. The demurrer must be sustained.

The plaintiff had until the first Monday in November to file an amended complaint upon the payment to the adverse party of $20. The same order was made in the following cases brought under the same act, and which, by the stipulation of the parties, were to abide the judgment on the demurrer in this, except that the $20 is to be paid but once: McKay v. George Corum; Same v. Thomas Ward; Peter de Lord v. James Farris; Same v. Daniel W. Butler; Same v. William McAtee.

[Subsequently the plaintiff filed an amended complaint; to this the defendant answered. The parties then filed an agreed statement of facts. Upon this the court entered judgment for the defendant. Case No. 8,840.]

By article 3 of the convention of October 20, 1818 (8 Stat. 249), between the United States and Great Britain, it was agreed that the Oregon territory should "be free and open to the vessels, citizens and subjects of the two powers;" which convention was continued in force until the convention of June 15, 1846 (9 Stat. 869); Held, that during the period of such joint occupation, the country, as to British subjects therein, was British soil, and subject to the jurisdiction of the king of Great Britain, but as to citizens of the United States, it was American soil and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States; and that a child born in such territory in 1823 of British subjects, was born in the allegiance of the king of Great Britain, and not that of the United States.

3. The Indian tribes within the territory of the United States are independent political communities, and a child of a member thereof, though born within the limits of the United States, is not a citizen thereof, because not born subject to its jurisdiction.

4. The fourteenth article of the constitution of the United States, commonly called the fourteenth amendment, is only declaratory of the common law rule on the subject of citizenship by birth, and therefore does not include Indians or others not born subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

5. In 1823, and prior thereto, the Chinook Indians were an independent political community, inhabiting the Oregon territory, at and near the mouth of the Columbia river; and in said year the plaintiff was born at Fort George (now Astoria) of a father who was an alien and a British subject, and a mother who was a Chinook Indian; Held, that the plaintiff is either to be deemed to follow the condition of his father, and considered a British subject, or that of his mother, and considered a Chinook Indian, but that in either case he was not born a citizen of the United States.

6. At an election held on June 6, 1870, at East Dalles precinct under the laws of Oregon, the plaintiff offered to vote, and his right to do so being challenged, offered to take the prescribed oath as to his qualifications as an elector, but the defendant then being one of the judges of election at said polls, refused to administer said oath to the plaintiff, as he was required to do by the law of the state, on the ground that plaintiff was not a citizen of the United States, but a half breed Indian; Held, that whether such refusal was wrongful or not, under the state law, the plaintiff not being a citizen of the United States, is not within the purview or protection of article 15 of the constitution of the United States, or the act of congress, entitled "An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States, to vote in the several states of the Union, and for other purposes" (16 Stat. 740), and therefore cannot maintain an action against the defendant on account of such refusal, to recover the penalty given by section 2 of said act of congress.

Joseph G. Wilson, for plaintiff.

James K. Kelly and Orlando Humason, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This action is brought to recover a penalty of $500, given by section 2 of an act of congress entitled "An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several states of the Union, and for other purposes," approved May 13, 1870 (16 Stat. 140). It was commenced July 1, 1870, and on September 26 the court gave judgment on a demurrer to the complaint that it was insufficient—because it did not allege that the defendant refused or omitted "to swear the plaintiff as to his qualifications as an elector, on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The court at the same time ruled that under the election law of the state of Oregon, when a person who is a citizen of the United States offers to vote at any poll therein, and his right to do so is challenged, it becomes the duty of the judges of election at such poll to tender such person the prescribed oath as to his qualification as an elector, the taking of which, after such challenge, is a necessary prerequisite to his right to vote; and that if any judge of election willfully omits or refuses to furnish such person an opportunity to take such an oath, and thereby qualify himself to vote at such poll, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, then he is liable to such person for the penalty prescribed by section 2 of such act of congress. McKay v. Campbell [Case No. 8,839].

On October 29, the plaintiff, upon leave obtained, filed an amended complaint, alleging that the defendant, as judge of a certain election therein mentioned, willfully refused to permit the plaintiff to become qualified to vote thereat, on account of his being an Indian. The defendant by his answer, filed December 7, 1870, alleged that the plaintiff was an alien and not a citizen of the United States, and therefore defendant refused as alleged in the complaint, and not otherwise. To this answer the plaintiff filed a replication, the allegations of which are not material to state.

On February 4, 1871, the parties filed the following statement of facts in the case, which they then and there stipulated in writing should "be taken and considered as the special verdict of a jury therein;" and also that "if the court is of opinion that the law arising thereon is with the plaintiff, then judgment shall be given for him for the penalty for which the action is brought;" but "if the court is of opinion that the law arising thereon is with the defendant, then judgment shall be given for him in bar of the action, and for his costs and disbursements."

"Alexander McKay, the plaintiff's paternal grandfather, was born in Scotland, and emigrated to Canada, where he married Margaret Bruce, a woman having one fourth Indian blood. The issue of this marriage was Thos. McKay, the plaintiff's father, who was born in Canada. About the latter part of the year 1810, Alexander McKay joined the expedition of John Jacob Astor, as a partner of the American Fur Company [2] and sailed from New York in the ship Tonquin, for the mouth of the Columbia river, taking with him his wife and son Thomas, the latter being then about thirteen years of age. They arrived at the mouth of the Columbia in 1811, and soon afterwards Alexander McKay perished by the destruction of the Tonquin. Thomas McKay afterwards entered into the service of the Northwest Fur Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Great Britain, having its principal office in Montreal. The trading post of Astor at Astoria was transferred to this Northwest Fur Company on the eleventh day of October, 1813, and afterwards called Fort George. In 1821, by an act of parliament, the Northwest and Hudson Bay Company were united under the name of the Honorable Hudson Bay Company, and as such held possession and control of Fort George as a trading post from that time until the treaty between the United States and Great Britain in 1846. Thomas McKay married a Chinook Indian woman, and the plaintiff was the issue of that marriage, born at Fort George (now Astoria), in 1823, while his father, Thomas McKay, was in the service of the Hudson Bay Company, and is seven sixteenths white and nine sixteenths Indian blood. Thomas McKay continued in the service of that company until about the year 1835; and his son, the plaintiff, was also in its service subsequent to the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, in 1846. The plaintiff has always lived in Oregon except from 1838 to 1843, while in the state of New York to obtain an education.

"Neither the plaintiff nor his father, nor his grandfather McKay, were ever naturalized under the laws of the United States. The plaintiff resided in Wasco county, Oregon, and in East Dalles precinct in said county, for five years prior to the election on June 6th, 1870. On that day, at a general election, the plaintiff offered to vote at the place of holding elections in East Dalles precinct, where the defendants James A. Campbell, T. M. Ward and George Corum were the judges of election. His right to vote was challenged by one of the judges, when the plaintiff offered to take the oath required by law, as to his qualifications to vote. The judges, or one of them, stated to plaintiff as a reason for not allowing him to vote, that he was not a citizen of the United States, but was a half-breed Indian, and refused to administer the oath to him as to his qualifications, and did not permit him to vote at that election."

Upon this state of facts, counsel maintains that the plaintiff was born in the allegiance of the United States, because he was born in its territory, and is, therefore, a citizen thereof, and was entitled to vote at such election. If the premises are admitted, the conclusion follows. The rule of the common law upon this subject is plain and well settled, both in England and America. Except in the case of children of ambassadors, who are in theory born upon the soil of the sovereign whom the parent represents, a child born in the allegiance of the king, is born his subject, without reference to the political status or condition of its parents. Birth and allegiance go together. 1 Bl. Comm. 366; 2 Kent, Comm. 39, 42; Ingles v. The Sailor's Snug Harbor, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 120; U. S. v. Rhodes [Case No. 16,151]; Lynch v. Clarke, 1 Sandf. Ch. 630, and authorities there cited.

Counsel for defendant, while admitting the major premise of plaintiff's proposition, that any person born in the allegiance of the United States, is born a citizen thereof, disputes the minor one, that the plaintiff was so born, and insists that he was born in the allegiance of the crown of Great Britain; because the British subjects in Oregon at the date of the plaintiff's birth, must be presumed to have occupied or dwelt in the country in pursuance of the treaty of joint occupation of June 15, 1846, and therefore as British subjects. Defendant's proposition concerning the allegiance in which plaintiff was born, is based upon article 3 of the convention of October 20, 1818, between the United States and Great Britain, which reads as follows:

"Art. 3. It is agreed that any country that may be claimed by either party on the northwest coast of America, westward of the Stony mountains, shall together with its harbors, bays and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open, for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of the present convention, to the vessels, citizens and subjects of the two powers, it being well understood that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any part of the said country, nor shall it be taken to affect the claims of any other power or state to any part of the said country; the only object of the high contracting parties in that respect being to prevent disputes and differences amongst themselves." 8 Stat. 249.

By the convention of August 6, 1827, between the same parties, it was provided as follows:

[2] The true name of this company was the Pacific Fur Company.

"Art. 1. All the provisions of the third article of the convention concluded between the United States of America and his majesty the king of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland on the twentieth of October, 1818, shall be, and they are, hereby further indefinitely extended and continued in force, in the same manner as if all the provisions of the said article were herein specifically recited." 8 Stat. 360.

By article 2 of this convention it is also agreed that either party to it may abrogate said article 3, on twelve months notice to the other after October 20, 1828.

On April 27, 1846, congress passed a "joint resolution concerning the Oregon territory" (9 Stat. 109), by which the president was authorized "at his discretion, to give the government of Great Britain the notice required" for the abrogation of said article 3. In the preamble of this resolution it is recited:—"And whereas it has now become desirable that the respective claims of the United States and Great Britain should be definitely settled, and that said territory may, no longer than need be, remain subject to the evil consequences of the divided allegiance of its American and British population, and of the confusion and conflict of national jurisdictions, dangerous to the cherished peace and good understanding of the two countries." This led to the convention of June 15, 1846, "in regard to limits westward of the Rocky mountains" (9 Stat. 869), by which the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude was made the boundary between the two countries. In the preamble to this convention it is admitted and declared by the parties thereto,—"that the state of doubt and uncertainty which has hitherto prevailed respecting the sovereignty and government of the territory on the northwest coast of America, lying westward of the Rocky or Stony mountains, should be finally terminated by an amicable compromise of the right mutually asserted by the two parties over the said territory."

The place of plaintiff's birth—Fort George—now is, and I suppose in contemplation of law from the American standpoint, was at the date thereof, within the territory or realm of the United States. But as a matter of fact, the title to the country was then regarded as doubtful, unsettled and obscure; and this is apparent from the admissions above quoted from the respective preambles to the resolution and convention of April 27 and June 15, 1846. Even the country itself was regarded by a large portion of the people of the United States as a desert waste, not worth disputing with England about. In February, 1844, when a motion to give notice to abrogate article 3 of the convention of 1818 was being debated in the senate, Mr. Dayton, of New Jersey, read from the columns of the National Intelligencer an article on Oregon, taken from Prentice's Louisville Journal, of which the following extracts are average specimens: "What there is in the territory of Oregon to tempt our national cupidity, no one can tell. Of all the countries on the face of this earth, it is one of the least favored of heaven. It is the mere riddlings of creation. It is almost as barren as the desert of Africa, and quite as unhealthy as the Campagna of Italy. * * * If the United States should ever need a country to which to banish its rogues and scoundrels, the utility of such a region as Oregon will be demonstrated." 13 Cong. Globe, p. 275. He also read from the Christian Advocate of February 7, 1844, as follows: "We have some opportunity, from our position, to found a correct estimate of the soil, climate, productions, and facilities of the country from the Rocky mountains to the Pacific ocean, as we have had a large mission there for several years, distributed in small parties over the territory; and, from all we have learned we should prefer migrating to Botany bay. With the exception of the lands of the Wallamet, and strips along a few of the smaller water courses, the whole country is among the most irreclaimable barren wastes of which we have read, except the desert of Sahara."

Under this state of things as to the title and occupancy of the country, and while his alien father is in the service of a British corporation, then exercising in the territory, by authority of the British parliament, large municipal power, the plaintiff is born within the lines of a post then occupied by said corporation as a place of business and defense. This being so, in my judgment, he was not born in the allegiance of the United States, but in that of the British crown.

The plaintiff being the child of an unnaturalized alien, and unnaturalized himself, cannot claim to be an American citizen, except upon the single ground, that he was born upon the soil, and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. Nothing that has happened since his birth can add to or take away from the strength of his claim. The treaty of 1846, which definitely acknowledged the country south of the forty-ninth parallel to belong to the United States, contains no provision naturalizing the British subjects living south of that line, who may elect to become American citizens by remaining there, or otherwise. The case turns upon the single point—was the plaintiff born subject to the jurisdiction of the United States—under its allegiance?

Suppose the government of the United States had undertaken to exercise jurisdiction over the plaintiff before the treaty of 1846, when for the first time it actually obtained exclusive jurisdiction over the country? Suppose it had attempted by means of laws applicable to American citizens under like circumstances, to draft or tax him? How natural and forcible would have been the objection: "I am the child of a British father—a natural born British subject. True, I was born in Oregon, but by a treaty stipulation the country was then, and is now, for the time being, British soil as to a British subject. I was, therefore, born subject to the jurisdiction and in the allegiance of the king of Great Britain, and am as truly a British subject as though I had been born on the banks of the Thames."

When, in 1818, the two governments entered into the treaty of "joint occupation," as it has been aptly called, they thereby agreed that this then unsettled and unknown country, might be occupied by the people of both nations—that it should "be free and open" "to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers"—without either of them losing their nationality, changing their allegiance, or passing beyond the jurisdiction and protection of their separate governments. As to the British subject and his children born here, the country was for the time being British soil, while to the American citizen and his offspring it was in the same sense American soil. Neither government was entitled to exercise any authority over the citizens or subjects of the other, or to assert the power and rights of a sovereign over them, or their effects, within this particular territory. If, prior to 1846, the plaintiff had died intestate and without heirs, leaving a large amount of personal property in the territory, there is no doubt but that the British crown would have claimed the escheat without a word of objection from the government of the United States.

When it is said that by the common law a person born of alien parents, and in the allegiance of the United States, is born a citizen thereof, it is necessarily understood that he is not only born on soil over which the United States has or claims jurisdiction, but that such jurisdiction for the time being is both actual and exclusive, so that such person is in fact born within the power, protection and obedience of the United States. Generally speaking, the various places in the world are claimed, or admitted for the time being, to be under the exclusive jurisdiction of some particular sovereign or government, so that a person born at any one of them is without doubt born in the allegiance of such particular sovereign or government. But that is not this case—which in this respect is a singular one. Its parallel has not been found in the books. The country of the plaintiff's birth was, at the time thereof, jointly occupied by the citizens and subjects of two governments in pursuance of a treaty to that effect. Under the circumstances, neither government can be considered as exercising general exclusive jurisdiction over the country and its inhabitants. It seems to me, that the only practical and just solution of the problem, is to consider the country for the time being, only to have been in the exclusive jurisdiction of each government as to its own citizens or subjects; and this is the view which congress appears to have taken of the matter in 1846, when, in the preamble to the resolution of April 27, it deprecated "the evil consequences of the divided allegiance of its American and British population," and "the confusion and conflict of national jurisdiction" growing out of the continued joint occupation of the country.

A parallel case may hereafter arise out of the present joint occupation of the island of San Juan, at the head of the straits of Fuca. It is well known that the title to this island is in dispute between the United States and Great Britain, and that in the meantime, in pursuance of an informal convention or understanding between the two governments, the island is occupied by the forces of each. Now, if hereafter the island is given up to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and in the meantime a child of a British subject is born there within the portion occupied by the British forces, could it be considered as born in the allegiance of the United States? Certainly not. The child, although born on soil which is subsequently acknowledged to be the territory of the United States, was not at the time of its birth under the power or protection of the United States, and without these, the mere place of birth cannot impose allegiance or confer citizenship.

Chancellor Kent says (2 Comm. 42): "To create allegiance by birth, the party must be born, not only within the territory, but within the allegiance of the government. If a portion of the country be taken and held by conquest in war, the conqueror requires (acquires) the rights of the conquered as to its dominion and government, and children born in the armies of a state while abroad, and occupying a foreign country, are deemed to be born in the allegiance of the sovereign to whom the army belongs. It is equally the doctrine of the English common law, that during such hostile occupation of a territory, if the parents be adhering to the enemy as subjects de facto, their children born under such temporary dominion, are not born under the allegiance of the conquered." For this latter clause, the author refers to Calvin's Case [7 Coke, 18a] and (note c) quotes Lord Coke as saying in that case: "An alien is a person out of the ligeance of the king. It is not extra regnum, nor extra legem, but extra ligeantiam. To make a subject born, the parents must be under the actual obedience of the king, and the place of birth be within the king's obedience, as well as within his dominion." Now, in 1823, the plaintiff's "place of birth"—Fort George—was no more within the obedience of the United States than is the Tower of London to-day. In Inglis v. Sailor's Snug Harbor, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 126, the supreme court, on a certificate of a difference of opinion from the circuit court for the Southern district of New York, held that, as a general rule all persons born in the state of New York prior to July 4, 1776, were born British subjects, but might thereafter elect to remain so or not, and that all persons born therein after such date, were born citizens of such state, but that Inglis, who was born of a British subject in the city of New York after that date, and while the city was in the actual occupation of the British army, "was born a British subject under the protection of the British government, and not under that of the state of New York, and of course owing no allegiance to the state of New York." The necessary conclusion from the rule announced in this case, is also, that a person to be born in the allegiance of a particular government, must not only be born within its territory, but under its obedience—exclusive jurisdiction and power. Of course it matters not whether the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States was excluded from the place of birth of this plaintiff by force of arms or by treaty with Great Britain. The result is the same in each case.

Articles 14 and 15 of the constitution, commonly called the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, have been cited by counsel for plaintiff as bearing upon this question of the plaintiff's citizenship and consequent right to vote. The latter simply provides that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged * * * on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." But as to who are "citizens of the United States" this article is silent—it being understood that that matter had been regulated or defined by article 14, § 1, which enacts: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, and of the state wherein they reside." Eliminate the words having reference to naturalized citizens, and the clause reads: "All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens," etc. This is nothing more than declaratory of the rule of the common law as above stated. To be a citizen of the United States by reason of his birth, a person must not only be born within its territorial limits, but he must also be born subject to its jurisdiction—that is, in its power and obedience.

The only other construction of this clause that I can imagine possible, is the following: Taken literally, it does not appear to require that the person should be born "subject to the jurisdiction of the United States;" but if he was born within its territorial limits, whether under its jurisdiction or not, and afterwards becomes subject to such jurisdiction; he then and so long as this status continues, becomes and remains a citizen of the United States. Assuming, as a matter of fact, that the plaintiff was born in the United States, although in the allegiance of the king of Great Britain, this construction of the fourteenth amendment would include him as a citizen, because he is now, and since 1846 has been, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. But I think such construction fanciful and artificial. It is not to be presumed that the amendment was made to the constitution to change the rule of the common law, but rather to declare and enforce it uniformly throughout the United States and the several states, and especially in the case of the negro.

Counsel for plaintiff, in reply to the fact that his client was born at a post under the flag of the Hudson Bay Company, a quasi public and political British corporation, endeavored by citations from the state papers to establish the fact that in 1817, the British government only held Fort George (Astoria) as a captured place, and that about that time it was delivered up to the United States. Astoria was in fact delivered to the United States in pursuance of article one of the treaty of Ghent (8 Stat. 218), for the restoration of places captured during the war of 1812, on October 6, 1818. 113 Cong. Globe, p. 218. But the fact so far as this action is concerned is not material. It is not claimed that Fort George was held by the British government at the time of plaintiff's birth therein, as a captured port or otherwise, but that it was occupied by a British corporation—British subjects—in pursuance of the treaty of joint occupation. It appears from the special verdict that the Northwest Company obtained possession of the place in 1813; and that thereafter the same was in the exclusive occupation and control of said company until its union with Hudson Bay Company in 1821, who thereafter occupied it exclusively, until 1846.

But I do not rest the conclusion—that the plaintiff was born in the allegiance of the king of Great Britain and not in that of the United States—on the mere fact that the plaintiff was born at a post of the Hudson Bay Company, rather than at any other point or place in the territory included in the treaty of joint occupation. It is admitted that the plaintiff's father was a British subject by birth, and while he lived in the territory—at least between 1818 and 1846—he was in the allegiance of the king of Great Britain, and his children wherever born therein, were born in the same allegiance and are British subjects.

It was also urged by counsel for plaintiff, that both Alexander and Thomas McKay—the plaintiff's grandfather and father—came to Oregon before the treaty of 1818, and therefore were not settlers under it. The fact is admitted, but I think the conclusion both illogical and irrelevant. The treaty operated upon those who were in the territory when it went into effect, to the same extent that it did upon those who came afterward. It placed them equally under the allegiance of their respective sovereigns, and limited them to the same use and occupation of the territory. It is immaterial whether plaintiff's ancestors came to the country or occupied it under the treaty or not. They were British subjects in any view of the matter, and if, when the plaintiff was born, the territory by reason of treaty was British soil as to British subjects, without doubt he was born one. Again, it being admitted by the special verdict that Alexander McKay joined the expedition of Astor as a partner in the so-called American Fur Company, and sailed from the American port of New York, in the Tonquin, for the territory of Oregon, it is claimed that these facts show that the plaintiff's ancestors did not come to the country or occupy it under the treaty of joint occupation, and therefore the plaintiff was not born in the allegiance of the king of Great Britain.

In the settlement of Oregon, Alexander McKay is a historical character. He was a British subject and a member of the Northwest Fur Company. The new company which he formed in conjunction with Astor, and of which he was the principal partner, was substantially a company of Canadians and British subjects. All the partners, except Astor, and three fourths of the clerks and employés, were British subjects. McKay went from Montreal to New York en route to the mouth of the Columbia in a birch bark canoe, transporting it on a wagon across the portages between the St. Lawrence and the Hudson. While at New York, there being then apprehensions of a war between the United States and Great Britain, McKay had an interview with the British minister for the purpose of getting his advice how to act in case of a rupture between the two nations, in which he represented that himself and associates were British subjects going to the Columbia to trade under the American flag. Northwest Coast of America, c. 1. Gabriel Franchere. I see nothing in these facts to cast doubt upon the conclusion that the plaintiff was born of a British subject, in the allegiance of the British crown. Alexander and Thomas McKay came to the country British subjects, and the mere fact that they embarked at an American port, and that the former was a partner in a fur company, that called itself American for the convenience of trade or the exigencies of war, in no way affected their political status or that of the plaintiff's.

It is also insisted that the plaintiff is a citizen of the United States, and a voter under the operation of articles 14 and 15 of the constitution, on the ground that they apply to and include Indians—at least half-breeds—born within the limits of the United States. Article 15 secures the right of suffrage, irrespective of race, color or condition of servitude, to citizens of the United States, as defined by article 14. It follows that an Indian, whether of the whole or half blood who is a citizen of the United States, is entitled to vote, or rather he cannot be excluded from this privilege on the ground of being an Indian, as that would be to exclude him on account of race. But the Indian tribes within the limits of the United States have always been held to be distinct and independent political communities, retaining the right of self-government, though subject to the protecting power of the United States. Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 575. They have the right of use in the soil which can only be divested by the United States, with their consent by purchase or without it, by war. Godfrey v. Beardsley [Case No. 5,497].

The special verdict states that the plaintiff was born of a Chinook woman, but does not state who the Chinook Indians were, or where they lived. I suppose the court has judicial knowledge of a fact so well-known in the history of Oregon, as that the Chinook Indians at the period of the plaintiff's birth, were a well-known tribe living at or near the mouth of the Columbia river. Its language was the basis and principal element of the "jargon" which, during the first half of this century, was the general medium of communication between the white and the Indian tribes from the Umpqua river on the south, to the straits of Fuca on the north, while their one-eyed chief, "Old King Comcomly," has been immortalized in the classic pages of Irving's Astoria. As the northwestern boundary was finally acknowledged or established, this tribe was within the limits of the United States. The plaintiff is nine sixteenths Indian, eight of which he gets from his Chinook mother, and the other one from his Canadian father. As a matter of fact, the Indian blood predominating, he is not a half-breed, as claimed on the argument by his counsel. But I cannot perceive that it is material to consider whether he is a half-breed or not. In legal contemplation he is an American Indian, by virtue of his mother being a member of the Chinook tribe, or a British subject, without reference to his race, by virtue of being the son of Thomas McKay, and his birth in the allegiance of the British crown.

According to the case of U. S. v. Sanders [Case No. 16,220], the plaintiff follows the condition of his mother, and is an alien. It was held in that case that the issue of an Indian woman and a white man is an Indian, and vice versa; that the rule of the civil law—partus sequitur ventrem—prevailed. But the contrary is the rule of the common law in the analogous case of the issue of a marriage between a freeman and a neif. 2 Bl. Comm. 94. In such case, by that rule, the child follows the condition of the father. My impression is that the plaintiff ought to be deemed to follow the condition of his father. Congress seems to have taken this view of the matter in the passage of the act of September 27, 1850, granting land to settlers in Oregon, commonly called the "Donation Act." 9 Stat. 496. Section 4 of this act grants land to each white settler on the public lands, who is a citizen of the United States, or who has or will declare his intention to become such, "American half-breed Indians included;" thereby excluding half-breeds, the children of alien fathers, as not Americans, but aliens. But it is not necessary to absolutely determine this question.

Suppose that the plaintiff should be held to follow the condition of his mother, and is therefore a Chinook Indian; is he then a citizen of the United States under article 14 of the constitution? According to the doctrine that has been uniformly held in regard to the status of the Indian tribes in the United States he is not. Being born a member of "an independent political community"—the Chinook—he was not born subject to the jurisdiction of the United States—not born in its allegiance. On the other hand, if the plaintiff is held to follow the condition of his father he is a Canadian of mixed blood, born in the allegiance of the British crown, and therefore a British subject. In neither case was he born a citizen of the United States, and can only become one by complying with the laws for the naturalization of aliens. True, as the law now stands, the plaintiff cannot be admitted to citizenship, because he is neither a "white alien" nor a person of "African nativity or descent." But that is a matter within the exclusive cognizance of congress.

By the constitution of Oregon (article 2, § 2) no person is entitled to vote at any election therein, unless, among other things, he is a citizen of the United States, or has declared his intention to become such, "conformably to the laws of the United States upon the subject of naturalization." This description of persons is broader than that contained in article 15 of the constitution of the United States, which does not include persons who have merely declared their intentions to become citizens. The act of congress under which this action is brought is enacted in pursuance of article 15, and only applies to citizens of the United States. 16 Stat. 140. On June 6, 1870, the plaintiff was not a citizen of the United States. This being so, he is not within the purview of the act and cannot maintain this action. If the defendant's refusal to permit the plaintiff to take the preliminary oath as to his qualifications, so as to give him a prima facie right to vote, was wrongful, as I think it was under the state law, the case is not within the act of congress. That only gives a remedy for such refusal in case of citizens of the United States.

A word in conclusion: I am aware that the ruling in this case, would exclude from the privilege of voting quite a number of persons of mixed blood—persons whose fathers were British subjects, and mothers, Indian women—who have heretofore often, if not uniformly been allowed to vote in this state. They have done so by common consent, and under the authority of a vague public opinion that these persons by remaining south of the forty-ninth parallel after the treaty of 1846, could, and thereby did, elect to become American citizens. But "public opinion is not any authority on a point of law;" and it appears in this instance as in others, "that common consent is sometimes a common error." The remedy, if any is deemed necessary, is with the leigslature, and not the courts.

There must be judgment for the defendant in bar of the action, and for his costs and disbursements.

Case No. 8,841.

McKAY v. CARRINGTON.

[1 McLean, 50.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Dec. Term, 1829.

REAL PROPERTY—CONTRACT TO CONVEY—INSTALMENTS—FAILURE—DECREE FOR SALE—TITLE TRUSTEE FOR PURCHASER—ADMINISTRATOR.

1. Martin purchased a tract of land in Ohio, of Carrington, of Virginia, to be paid for by instalments. On the failure of any of the payments, Carrington, by giving notice and paying into the Bank of Virginia, his heirs, executors or administrators, had a right to annul the contract.

2. This contract, except by consent, can be annulled in no other manner than the one pointed out.

3. During his life C. treated the contract as binding, and his administratrix after his decease, obtained a decree for the money, and sold the land, and became the purchaser at the marshal's sale. She could only purchase Martin's equity.

4. Where a contract for the sale of land is void, or cannot be enforced by reason of laches on the part of the vendee, on the death of the vendor the land descends to his heirs.

5. Where an estate is contracted to be sold, equity considers it as converted into personalty. In such case the vendor is a trustee for the purchaser.

[Cited in Smith v. Babcock, Case No. 13,009.]

6. The complainant purchased the land, and paid a part of the purchase money; failed to get possession, which was held by purchasers under Martin. Decree pro confesso by the administratrix against the heirs of her dec'd husband, one being a minor, for the title. No proof that all the heirs were included. A delay of seven years and more before the tenants of Martin were ejected, and the title under the decree was tendered. The property decreased nearly fifty per cent. in value, and on these grounds a rescission of the contract was decreed, and the repayment of the money with interest. The circumstances of this case are materially different from a common bill for the rescission of the contract and damages.

7. To obtain a rescission, it is not necessary to pay the whole of the purchase money.

8. That the notes given are negotiable and outstanding, is a reason why chancery will interpose its powers.

[This was a bill in equity by Jesse McKay against Elizabeth J. Carrington.]

Creighton & Bond, for complainant.
Mr. Scott, for respondent.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This controversy arises on a contract dated the 13th December, 1817, by which the defendant, a resident of Virginia, sold to the complainant 2367 acres of land in two tracts, in Ohio, which the defendant had purchased under a decree of this court against Samuel G. Martin. Martin had purchased the land of Edward Carrington, deceased, in his life time, the husband of the defendant; but had paid only a small part of the consideration money. To compel the payment of the balance a suit in chancery was brought by the defendant, as administratrix of her husband's estate, and the land was ordered to be sold. The complainant was to pay for the land ten thousand dollars; the first payment of three thousand dollars to be made immediately; the second, of three thousand one hundred and fifty dollars and fifty cents the 1st January, 1819, and the balance the 1st January, 1820. And if the complainant failed to make payment, the defendant had the right to sell the land under a decree of court for the balance of the purchase money, the surplus, if any, to be paid to the complainant. There being no provision in the contract that the complainant might enter into the possession of the land, he alleges that he obtained a writing from the defendant authorizing him to take possession; but that he was unable to do so, as possession was held by various persons under Martin. This operated, it is alleged, greatly to the injury of the complainant, and he had no means of maintaining an action at law for the recovery of the possession. The bill further states, Edward Carrington left several heirs, some of whom are yet not of age. That the complainant at the instance of the defendant, or with her approbation, advanced three hundred and twenty-four dollars to pay expenses incurred by her in prosecuting suits in the circuit court to perfect her title to the land. It appears from the proof, that the land has greatly deteriorated in value, and on that ground connected with the lapse of time and the inability of the defendant, even on the filing of the bill, to make a clear title, he prays the contract may be rescinded, and the money paid, with the sum paid for costs, may be decreed to him, with interest; and that the land may be ordered to be sold for the payment thereof. The defendant in her answer states, that the purchase was made by the complainant, with a full knowledge of the state of the title. That she made no representations to mislead him, and that all the facts relating to the land and the title were as well known to the complainant as to herself. That she has not attempted to coerce the payment of the money, but has brought an ejectment and recovered judgment against the persons in possession under Martin, and had them turned out of possession. And that so soon as she could ascertain the residence of all the heirs of her deceased husband, she caused a bill to be filed against them in the county where the land lies, and obtained a decree of the court of common pleas for a title; and that she is now ready and willing to make a deed for the land, on the payment of the balance of the purchase money. It appears that a part of the land was taken possession of by the complainant, and that, for some time he received the rents and profits thereof; and then declined receiving them, as he did the entire possession of the land after the recovery of it under the suit in ejectment.

The first question which may be considered as arising out of the foregoing facts is, whether a court of chancery, under all the circumstances of the case, would, at the instance of the vendor, decree a specific execution of this contract. It is contended that Martin having failed to comply with his contract, for the purchase of the land; the estate both equitable and legal, on the decease of Carrington, descended to his heirs; and consequently the administratrix, who represents the personalty only, had no control over the contract. This contract was entered into the 11th October, 1805. The purchase money amounted to three thousand five hundred and fifty dollars and fifty cents, to be paid by Martin as follows: fifty dollars in hand, one thousand dollars the first of May ensuing, and the balance on or before the first May, 1807; the said Carrington, his heirs, &c. to retain the title in the land until the payment of the purchase money, and then he was to convey the land in fee simple by special warranty. Should Martin fail in making any one of the payments, Carrington, his heirs, executors or administrators, had the option, at any time thereafter, to annul the bargain by giving notice thereof and paying into the Bank of Virginia, on account of said Martin, his heirs, &c., any sum or sums of money without interest, which had been paid on the purchase. There is a receipt on the agreement for the payment of fifty dollars, and one for five hundred dollars, dated 30th March, 1807. Thirty dollars, it seems, were sometime afterwards loaned by the vendor to Martin, which was endorsed on the contract. Carrington died, on or about the 29th October, 1810.

The principle laid down by the counsel for the complainant is correct, that where a contract for the sale of land is void, or cannot be enforced, on account of laches in the vendee, on the death of the vendor the land descends to his heirs, and the contract is not considered as forming a part of the personal estate which goes to the executor or administrator. By the contract under consideration, Carrington, in his lifetime, had the power expressly to annul it; as there was a failure to make the payment, it seems he did not think proper to exercise the power, but nearly two years after the second payment became due, he received from Martin five hundred dollars in part of it. This is conclusive that on the 30th March, 1807, the contract was considered by Carrington as of binding force; and until the day of his decease he failed to put an end to it in the mode provided. His administratrix had the same power as the deceased in his life time to annul the contract, by giving notice and repaying the moneys received. This she did not do, but on the contrary treated the contract as if it were in full force; and called upon a court of equity to decree a specific execution of it. When an estate is contracted to be sold, equity considers it as converted into personalty. And this is the case, although the election to purchase rests merely with the purchaser. 7 Ves. 436. Equity considers things agreed to be done as performed. The vendor is viewed as a trustee for the purchaser of the estate sold, and the purchaser as a trustee of the purchase money for the vendor; consequently the purchase money goes to the executor or administrator of the vendor, and the interest of the vendee descends to his heirs. As Carrington in his life time had given no indication of an intention to annul the contract, and as he had the power to do so, in a mode expressly provided; and as he received a part of the purchase money, after he had a right to put an end to the contract, no doubt can exist that he considered it in full force. If in the contract a particular mode is provided, by which a party may rescind it, as in the present case, by giving notice and repaying the money received, it can only be done in the mode provided. The repayment of the money by express agreement, is a condition precedent to the rescission of the contract, and must be so considered in equity as well as at law. This step not being taken, may be considered as indicating a determination to enforce the contract, and an acquiescence in the delay of payment. The equity of Martin, therefore, was not extinguished at or before the decease of Carrington. This being the case, there can be no doubt that the purchase money went to the administratrix, and formed a part of the assets in her hands. This view is greatly strengthened from the fact, that the heirs took no step to annul the contract; nor the administratrix, either of whom might have done so; but on the contrary, called the aid of a court of chancery to enforce it.

By the 3rd section of the act of this state, "for the execution of real contracts" it is provided, "that any person who has made a contract for the sale of land, and dies before the completion of it, leaving heirs under the age of twenty-one years, his executors or administrators being desirous of completing such contract, for and on behalf of such minor children and heirs, may apply to the court of common pleas who have power to authorize a conveyance, where the consideration money has been paid or secured to be paid, to be made in pursuance of the contract." This statute would seem to give the representatives of the personal estate a control over contracts for the sale of real property, which authorizes them to enforce such contracts, in all cases, where they may be considered for the advantage of the heirs. No application was made under this statute, by the defendant, it is presumed; because Martin had not paid, and was believed to be unable to pay the consideration money. A final decree was entered against him for the balance of the purchase money and interest, and on his failing to pay it, within a given time, the land was ordered to be sold. A contract thus sanctioned by a court of chancery, by the administratrix of Carrington, and by Carrington in his life time, cannot be considered or treated as a nullity. Chancery has enforced it, and given the heirs the full benefit of its provisions. Under the sale directed by the decree against Martin, the defendant became the purchaser of the land, for the sum of five thousand four hundred and forty dollars and twenty-five cents, as appears from the marshal's deed. What right did the defendant acquire by this purchase? The equitable interest of Martin was all that could be sold, or that the defendant under the sale could purchase. The marshal's deed, therefore, could only invest her with this equity.

The defendant prosecuted the suit against Martin as the administratrix of her husband's estate, but the purchase at the sale seems to have been made on her own account. Being the trustee of her husband's estate, I should entertain doubts whether chancery ought to aid a purchase made under such circumstances. There is no intimation, however, of any unfairness, and the high character of the party forbids any presumption that she did not intend to act in good faith.

It appears that in November, 1823, the defendant filed a bill in the court of common pleas for Clinton county, setting forth the contract with Martin, the proceedings under it, the sale of the land by the marshal, and her purchase of it. She also stated that the purchase money had been paid to the heirs and she prayed that a decree investing her with a title might be made. As the defendants were non-residents, and one of them a minor, notice was given as the statute requires. A decree pro confesso was obtained at a subsequent term.

It is a principle well settled in chancery, that where a person purchases a title, known to be defective by him, at the time, he shall not afterwards object to it, on account of such defect. Where a purchaser under a decree objected to a specific execution of the contract, because a part of the defendants being minors, might open the decree after they became of age, and perhaps set it aside, it was ruled not to be a valid objection, as the purchaser was bound to know the circumstances under which the decree was rendered. And it is contended that the complainant purchased with a full knowledge of the defendant's title, and that he cannot therefore avail himself of the objections urged against it. He must be presumed to have been acquainted, at least to some extent, with the nature of the title which the defendant acquired by the purchase under the decree against Martin, as in the contract there is an express reference to it. But it would be, perhaps, in the absence of proof, carrying the presumption too far to say, that he was bound to know the full legal import of that title. As a high price was to be paid for the land, it is not to be presumed that the complainant considered himself as purchasing a mere equity. Nor does such a construction seem to have been given to the contract by the defendant. The agent of the defendant who made a verbal arrangement with the complainant respecting the land, states that he did not consider the defendant as having the legal title, though it does not appear that his impressions were communicated to the complainant. From the sum advanced by the complainant to defray expenses of suits, prosecuted by the defendant to perfect the title, it appears that when the defects in the title were known to him, he took no step to disaffirm the contract, but aided the defendant in her efforts to remove the objections to it. It has been decided where a defect in a title becomes known to a vendee during a treaty for the purchase, although he was ignorant of it before, yet, if afterwards he continues the treaty, he shall not, on account of such defect, disaffirm the contract and recover his deposit. The same principle would have a strong application to the complainant if, after he was fully apprised of the objections to the title, he exercised acts of ownership over the land by the receipt of rents, and advanced money to defendant to assist her in procuring a good title. These facts would evince a determination, it would seem, to waive any advantage which a defect in the title might give him, and to abide by the contract. They were certainly calculated to make this impression on the vendor. By the contract there was no time fixed when the conveyance should be executed. The defendant agreed to "sell and convey" the land to complainant, and he agreed to make certain payments. Under this contract the defendant is not bound to make the conveyance until the purchase money be paid.

On the 1st January, 1819, the second instalment of three thousand five hundred and fifty dollars and fifty cents was due, and on the first of the succeeding January, the balance became payable. Neither of these payments has been made.

Although there is a great want of certainty as to time, in the facts proved, yet from their connection it is to be inferred, that no step was taken by complainant evincive of a disposition to rescind the contract, on account of the defects in the title, until a considerable time after the last instalment of the purchase money became due. At what time he abandoned the possession of a part of the land, which he admitted to one of the witnesses he had enjoyed, does not appear. He refused the possession when it was tendered to him, after the suits in ejectment had been decided. From the nature of the contract and the circumstances connected with it, it does not appear, if the vendor now claimed a specific performance of it, that the delay in making the conveyance could be urged as an objection by the complainant. He has neglected to fix the time himself, by paying the purchase money, or offering to pay it. Until this was done the vendor was not bound to convey. But the complainant has not only failed to make payment, but he has done several affirmative acts, which showed an acquiescence in the course taken by the vendor to clear the title.

But there are still two objections to be considered against the right of the vendor, to a specific execution of the contract. First, the great change in the value of the land. Second, the defect which remains in the title. Although modern decisions in England seem to consider a performance as to time, with more strictness than former decisions, still it is admitted that time is of far less importance than a change in the circumstances of the parties, or in the value of the property embraced by the contract. Where the property has not materially changed in value, and the circumstances of the parties in relation to it remain substantially as they were when the contract was made or was to have been performed, time is seldom considered material. But when a specific execution of the contract will give the purchaser the property, greatly deteriorated from the value it bore when he should have received it, it would be unjust to compel him to receive it. Chancery will never interpose its powers under such circumstances, to carry the contract into effect.

But it may be said that in the case under consideration, no time being fixed for the conveyance, the complainant should have fixed the time by the payment or tender of the purchase money, and not having done either, he ought not to be permitted to take advantage of his own negligence. That by failing to place himself in an attitude to demand a title from the vendor, he has acquiesced in the delay and justly incurred the risk of the rise or fall of the land. There is undoubtedly great force in this suggestion, and it is difficult to obviate the objection it presents. McKay, it is alleged, made this purchase for purposes of speculation; at least that he bought under the hope of selling without much delay, at a profit. The purchase and sale of lands, it is known were made extensively some years ago, by many persons in this state and elsewhere. And I do not know any objection to this business, which does not equally apply to the buying and selling of any other description of property. Land is a fair object of traffic, as well as personal property.

Chancery will not aid what may be called a speculating contract, but a fair purchase of land with a view of again disposing of it, at an advance, does not come within the objection. The object with which any description of property is purchased being lawful, may be considered by a court of chancery. The purchase of a reversionary interest, it has been decided, makes time a material part of the contract. So where an estate is sold to pay off an incumbrance bearing a higher rate of interest than the vendor is entitled to receive. And it may well be said that time is of the essence of the contract, where the vendor has purchased to sell. But to this consideration is opposed the fact that McKay has not entitled himself to the conveyance. It may, however, be fairly presumed, that the embarrassments of the title, and his failure to obtain possession of the land for a number of years essentially injured his interests by preventing a sale of it. Though he had but the equitable title, still if that title had been accompanied by possession, it is probable he might have sold the land, if not at an advance, at least so as to indemnify himself. But the purchasers under Martin retained the possession some seven or eight years after the purchase of McKay, and until they were removed by legal process. Before this was accomplished, and a full possession of the land tendered, it had become less valuable by nearly fifty per cent. than it was when the purchase was made. Although it may be said, therefore, that the vendor was not bound to make the conveyance until the purchase money was paid; yet from the manifest object of McKay in purchasing, the full possession of the land was essential to his interests. This he failed to obtain and the consequences have been extremely injurious to him. This fact, taken in connection with the defect in the title under the decree in Clinton county, is sufficient to refuse a specific performance in behalf of the vendor. There is one infant defendant against whom the decree was entered, who may open it up, and perhaps, as it regards his interests, reverse it when he shall become of age. This, it has often been ruled, constitutes a fatal objection to a title, in a court of chancery, except by purchasers under the decree. But, if a court of chancery would not, under the circumstances of this case, at the instance of the vendor, decree a specific performance of the contract, still it does not necessarily follow that on the application of the vendee the contract will be cancelled. The cases are numerous where both parties having been grossly negligent in the performance of the contract, have been refused the aid of a court of chancery and left to their legal remedies.

The remaining questions for consideration are, whether under the facts of the case the complainant is entitled to the interposition of a court of chancery, and if so, what relief can be given him. It is a rule in chancery that he who claims its interposition, must not only show himself entitled to it by the fairness of the contract, but also, by having done on his part what in equity he was bound to do. In this case it is contended—that the relief sought is at law and not in chancery; and that if chancery take jurisdiction, the relief to the extent prayed for cannot be given. Where the vendor of land has no title, or a defective title, and there are outstanding notes or bonds given for the purchase money, which may be assigned, chancery will take jurisdiction of the case and order the notes or bonds to be delivered up and cancelled. In such a case the remedy at law is inadequate, because the vendor may delay the commencement of an action for the purchase money at his pleasure, and if the obligations were assigned without notice, they being negotiable, a failure of consideration could not be set up against the assignee. No reference to authority need be made to sustain this position. It involves the exercise of a power which exclusively belongs to a court of chancery, and which has been exercised on numerous occasions.

But the question arises, whether the powers of a court of equity can be extended, beyond that of rescinding the contract. The damages to which the vendor, by his failure, has subjected himself, it is insisted must be ascertained in a court of law. In the case of Denton v. Stewart [1 Cox, Ch. 258]; 1 Fonbl. Eq. 44, note 2, Lord Kenyon, master of the rolls, sitting for the chancellor, directed the master to enquire what damages the plaintiff had sustained by the defendant's not performing his agreement, of which a specific performance was prayed by the bill, but which could not be decreed; the defendant having by sale of the estate put it out of his power to perform his agreement with the plaintiff. On the authority of this decision was the case of Greenaway v. Adams decided, in 12 Ves. 395. In that case the master of the rolls observes: "The party injured by the non-performance of a contract has the choice to revert either to a court of law for damages, or to a court of equity for a specific performance. If the court does not think fit to decree a specific performance, or finds that the contract cannot be specifically performed, either way he should have thought there was equally an end of its jurisdiction; for in the one case the court does not see reason to exercise the jurisdiction; in the other the court finds no cause for the exercise of it. However, the case of Denton v. Stewart is a decision in point against that proposition." In the case of Gwillim v. Stone, 14 Ves. 128, which was a bill to have a contract delivered up, on the ground of the defective title of the defendant, and for compensation for the injury to the plaintiff by the failure of the contract, the decree was made for delivering up the contract without prejudice to an action, instead of an enquiry before the master. In this case the master of the rolls observes, that in the case of Denton v. Stewart, and Greenaway v. Adams, above cited, the object of the bill was a specific performance; and in the latter he had some doubt upon the principle. This bill, he stated, is of a different nature, asserting from the first that the defendant cannot make a good title. It is more proper for an action. The equitable relief is obtained by a decree for the delivering up the instrument. The bill in the case of Todd v. Gee, 17 Ves. 275, prayed for the specific performance of an agreement for the sale of an estate to the plaintiff by the defendant; or if the defendant cannot perform it, that the plaintiff may receive satisfaction for the damages and injury sustained by the non-performance. And the lord chancellor observes in the case, "that he should be inclined to support the whole course of previous authority against Denton v. Stewart, not being aware that the court would give relief in the shape of damages, which is very different from giving compensation out of the purchase money. That court, he states, except under very particular circumstances, as these may be, upon a bill for the specific performance of a contract to direct an issue or a reference to the master to ascertain the damages. That is purely at law. It has no resemblance to compensation." Upon an adjournment of this case, the lord chancellor again observes, "that his opinion on the three cases cited (Denton v. Stewart, Greenaway v. Adams, and Gwillim v. Stone) was confirmed by reflection; that, excepting any special cases, it is not the course of proceeding in equity, to file a bill for a specific performance of an agreement, praying in the alternative, if it cannot be performed, an issue or an enquiry before the master with a view to damages. The plaintiff must take that remedy, if he choose it, at law generally, though not universally. In Denton v. Stewart, the defendant had it in his power to perform the agreement, and put it out of his power pending the suit. The case, if it is not to be supported on that distinction, is not according to the principles of the court."

From these authorities, it appears that the decision in the case of Denton v. Stewart has been overruled, or at least has been considered as turning on the peculiar circumstances of the case. The circumstance of the vendor having conveyed the title during the pendency of the suit, seems to be considered as the principal ground on which damages were decreed. The decision in that case cannot derive much support from the case of Greenaway v. Adams, for the master of the rolls seems to have yielded to the authority of the former case contrary to his own convictions, without adverting to the circumstances of the case, as stated afterwards in the case of Todd v. Gee. The objection to a decree for damages seems to be considered from the above authorities as stronger where a rescission of the contract is asked, than where a specific execution of it is prayed and damages in the event of the vendor not being able to make a good title. But in either case, by the authorities cited, except under peculiar circumstances, damages will not be decreed. In a bill for a specific performance, if the vendor be not able to make a conveyance for the entire estate sold, the purchaser may insist for the specific thing, so far as the right of the vendor extends, and compensation out of the purchase money for any embarrassment of the title or deficiency in the number of acres sold. If in such a case, however, the whole of the purchase money has been paid, it is difficult to distinguish it in principle from a case where the rescission of the contract is prayed. In the one case one half of the land is deficient, and a decree is entered for the one half, and the return of the purchase money paid with interest for the other half. In the other case the vendor having no title to the land, the whole of the purchase money paid is decreed with interest. If in the one case it may be said that chancery acquires jurisdiction by decreeing a specific execution of the contract in part, and consequently may put an end to the matter in controversy by doing full justice between the parties; may it not be said in the other, that jurisdiction is equally acquired by the court where there are outstanding negotiable notes or bonds given for the purchase money, which if assigned may be enforced against the vendee, and which should therefore be delivered up and cancelled.

In the case of Law v. Pratt, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 469, the court observe that "to obtain a specific performance is no object of Law's bill, it is incumbent on the opposite party therefore, to show some ground of right to force such a decree upon him. But considering as we do that Law is not in default, there can be no reason to decree a specific performance, when every thing shows that it would be productive of nothing but loss. Besides, a specific performance, such as would answer the ends of justice between these parties, has now become impossible. An issue quantum damnificatus it is certainly competent for this court to order in this case, but it is not consistent with the equity practice to order it in any case, in which the court can lay hold of a simple equitable and precise rule to ascertain the amount which it ought to decree." The court in that case decreed that the defendant should refund, for the deficient lots at the rate of the purchase. In a subsequent case between Dunlap v. Hepburn, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 197, the court say: "There are many cases in which a court of equity, although it would not decree a specific performance, will yet refuse to order a contract to be cancelled. The inability of the vendor to make a good title at the time the decree is to be pronounced, furnishes a very good reason for excluding him from relief in a court of equity; and yet it does not follow that the court will for this reason merely, set aside the contract. Generally speaking a court of law is competent to afford an adequate remedy to either party, for a breach of the contract by the other, from whatever cause it may have proceeded; and whenever this is the case a resort to a court of equity is improper. But if the contract ought not in conscience to bind one of the parties, as if he had acted under a mistake, or was imposed upon by the other party, or the like, a court of equity will interpose and afford a relief which a court of law cannot, by setting aside the contract; and having thus obtained jurisdiction of the principal question, that court will proceed to make such other decree as the justice and equity of the case may require."

In the case under consideration, the second instalment became due the 1st January, 1819, and the third the 1st January, 1820. Neither of these instalments were paid by the complainant, but he filed his bill the 13th April, 1821, for a rescission of the contract. Has he by a failure to pay these instalments been guilty of such negligence as to prevent the interposition of a court of chancery in his behalf. Did equity require that he should part with his money before he obtained possession of the land agreeably to contract, when it was apparent the vendor could not make him a title. The first default seems to have been with the vendor, in not putting the complainant into possession of the land. Had the complainant called upon the vendor for a specific execution of the contract, it would have been essential for him to have paid, or offered to pay the whole of the purchase money; but as he goes for a rescission of the contract, on account of a defect of title in the vendor, connected with other circumstances, a payment of the purchase money was unnecessary. To have paid the balance of the purchase money could not have strengthened the equity of the complainant. Chancery requires no act to be done in vain: it therefore could not require the payment of the purchase money in this case, after the defects in the title had become fully known to the complainant. More than two years were suffered to elapse from the time the second instalment became due to the filing of this bill. Was it incumbent on the complainant to give notice to the vendor, of his determination to rescind the contract so soon as he discovered the defect in the title. In ordinary cases this might be necessary, but in this case the possession in part of the land was given to the complainant and he, no doubt, entertained the hope that the entire possession would soon be relinquished to him. And under this expectation he seems to have given time to the vendor to clear the title. This bill was filed in April, 1821, and it was not until November that the vendor took the first step to perfect her title by filing a bill against the heirs of her deceased husband. In August, 1824, a decree was obtained in her behalf. Whether this bill embraced the whole of the heirs or not is left to conjecture; the only evidence of the fact seems to be that they were called the heirs of Edward Carrington, deceased, in the bill. A decree pro confesso was entered against them, one of them being a minor, for whom a guardian ad litem was appointed.

As before remarked, the court do not consider the vendor in an attitude to demand a specific performance of the agreement. The delay, the failure to give possession, the change in the value of the property, and the intrinsic defect in the title, are insuperable objections to such a demand. And these considerations, together with the fact that the notes for the balance of the consideration, are outstanding, and being negotiable may be assigned, constitute a ground, as we think, for the equitable interposition of this court. And taking jurisdiction of the case on these grounds, the court will not stop short of settling the matter in controversy. They will decree a rescission of the contract, that the outstanding notes be delivered up and cancelled, and that the money paid on the purchase be repaid with interest. This appears to be within the spirit of the decisions cited from Cranch and Wheaton, and it cannot be considered in opposition to the English adjudications referred to, unless it be supposed that there are no particular circumstances to vary this case from that of Todd v. Gee, in 17 Ves. 275. The outstanding negotiable notes, and the great change in the value of the land, are believed to bring this case within the English decisions. To rescind the contract and send the complainant to a court of law to recover back the money paid, would seem to be unnecessary, as the rule of damages, the money paid with interest, is the same at law as in equity. There is here then a certain and unvarying rule for the ascertainment of damages, and they can as well be ascertained by the court as by a jury. But the court will go no further in this case. They will not decree a payment of the money alleged by the complainant to have been expended by him, at the instance of the vendor, in the prosecution of certain suits to perfect the title. There is no evidence of the amount of money thus expended, and if there were, the complainant could resort to his legal remedy. This money is not alleged to have been advanced as a part of the purchase money. It may have been advanced under an agreement which is only properly examinable at law. At all events there are no special circumstances made known which connect this expenditure with the original contract, so as to bring it within the jurisdiction of the court. Nor will the court order the land to be sold to satisfy the amount decreed to be repaid. There is no allegation that the vendor is in doubtful circumstances, or that the decree will not be complied with, or may not be satisfied in the ordinary mode. The costs of the suit to be paid by the defendant.

LAND GRANTS — MISSOURI — NEW MADRID LOCATIONS—EJECTMENT — VALIDITY OF PATENT.

1. A patent issued in 1827, pursuant to a New Madrid certificate or warrant, under which both parties claimed title, and pursuant to the requirements of acts of congress is valid, and possession by the defendant under the patent for ten years was held to entitle him to a verdict in an ejectment against him.[2]

2. The case distinguished from Easton v. Salesbury, 23 Mo. 100, same case in error, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 426, where the patent of 1827 was decided to be void.[2]

3. Acts of congress pertaining to the New Madrid locations referred to by Treat, J.

This was an action of ejectment to recover possession of certain land situated in the city of St. Louis, forming part of a tract which was located under New Madrid certificate No. 159, dated November 16, 1816, in favor of James Smith, upon which a patent was issued May 28, 1827, to said Smith or his legal representatives. Smith, on July 9, 1811, had had confirmed to him by the commissioners for the adjustment of titles to land in the territory of Missouri, certain lots of land in New Madrid county, which lots were afterwards, and while still owned by him, materially injured by earthquakes; whereupon, by virtue of the act of congress approved February 17, 1815 [3 Stat. 211], making provisions for the relief of sufferers by the New Madrid earthquakes, the certificate aforesaid was issued in the name of James Smith, and upon this certificate the patent above mentioned was issued to Smith or his legal representatives. Both parties in this action claimed under the James Smith in whose name the certificate of location was issued. Plaintiff [George R. Mackay] claiming under a title bond by Smith to Andrew P. Gillespie, dated April 14, 1816, and under a deed by Smith to Gillespie, executed of date March 5, 1819, pursuant to the covenant to convey contained in such bond. Gillespie, in 1846, conveyed to William W. Gitt, who conveyed to plaintiff. Defendant [Alton R. Easton] claimed under a deed dated October 22, 1816, by James Smith to Rufus Easton, who, on June 28, 1826, conveyed to William Russell, from whom the title passed through various intermediate holders to defendant. The case was tried before a jury.

D. T. Jewett and John F. Darby, for plaintiff.

Charles Gibson, E. Casselbury, and William B. Thompson, for defendant.

Before MILLER, Circuit Justice, and TREAT, District Judge.

THE COURT, through TREAT, District Judge, instructed the jury that the patent of 1827, above referred to, was valid, and that the only point for their determination was whether the defendant had been in possession, under the patent, for ten years prior to the bringing of the suit, and that if they were satisfied that possession for that period had been proved, they would find for the defendant. The jury accordingly returned a verdict for defendant. [In view of former decisions, the most striking feature of the case was the ruling of the court that the patent of 1827 was valid, that being the point upon which the case eventually turned.] [3] It may be observed that the same patent has been decided to be void in the case of Easton v. Salesbury, tried in the St. Louis court of common pleas, in 1855, before his honor, Judge Treat (one of the judges who sat on the trial of the present case), a decision which was first affirmed by the supreme court of Missouri (23 Mo. 100), and afterwards, on writ of error, by the supreme court of the United States. 21 How. [62 U. S.] 426. Conflicting as the decision in Easton v. Salesbury, and that in the present case may appear, such conflict arises, not from a different interpretation of the law, but from the fact that in the former case there was wanting a link which in the present case has been supplied. In order rightly to understand the precise nature of this link, and the ruling of the court, an acquaintance with the acts of congress pertaining to the New Madrid locations is necessary. This was stated by Treat, J., as follows: "By the act of congress above referred to, approved February 17, 1815, any persons owning lands in New Madrid county, and whose lands had been materially injured by earthquakes, were authorized, subject to the limitations and restrictions therein mentioned, to 'locate the like quantity of land on any of the public lands in the territory of Missouri, the sale of which was then authorized by law.' This act made it the duty of the recorder of land titles for that territory, upon proof of the title of any such person to the benefits of the act, to issue a certificate that such person was so entitled. Upon such certificate being issued, location was to be made, on claimant's application, by the deputy surveyor of the territory, who was required to survey the same and return a plat of such location to the recorder, with a notice designating tract located, etc., which notice and plat were to be recorded in said recorder's office, whose duty it then was to transmit to the commissioner of the general land office a report of the claims allowed and the locations made, delivering to the party a certificate of the circumstances and of his being entitled to a patent. This certificate was required to be filed with the recorder within twelve months from its date, and thereupon the recorder was to issue another certificate, which, being transmitted to said commissioner, entitled the party to a patent. Following this act and curative thereof in respect to the mode of survey, was another act, approved April 26, 1822 [3 Stat. 668], which, inter alia, provided that all warrants issued under the act of 1815, should be located within one year after the passage of the amendatory act. that is, within one year after April 26, 1822, otherwise they should be null and void. Now, in the case of Easton v. Salesbury, where the controversy was between the title under the same New Madrid certificate No. 159, and a Spanish concession, but in which the validity of the patent to James Smith of May 28, 1827, above mentioned, was involved, that patent was successively adjudged by the three courts through which the case passed to be not only voidable, but absolutely void, ab initio, the warrant, according to the proofs in that case, not having been located within one year from April 26, 1822, as required by the act of that date. But in the present case the proofs showed that the warrant was located on February 26, 1823, thus establishing the fact of the location within the year limited by the statute of 1822, and thereby supplying the link that was missing in Easton v. Salesbury. This patent having been thus issued pursuant to the certificate or warrant under which both parties claimed title, and pursuant to the terms and limitations of the acts of congress, was therefore valid, and possession by the defendant, under the patent, for ten years before the suit was brought, having been proved, it only remained for the jury to find for the defendant."

[A writ of error was sued out from the supreme court, where the judgment of this court was affirmed. 19 Wall. (86 U. S.) 619.]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1873.

SUIT AGAINST FOREIGN CONSUL — PRACTICE—ARREST—APPLICABILITY OF THE NEW YORK CODE —PENDENCY OF ANOTHER SUIT FOR THE SAME CAUSE OF ACTION.

1. An action of debt was brought against a foreign consul, for money received in a fiduciary capacity. The defendant, being arrested, moved on affidavits to vacate the arrest: Held, that, under the act of February 28, 1839 (5 Stat. 321), in connection with the act of January 14, 1841 (Id. 410), and the 179th section of the New York Code of Procedure, the defendant was liable to arrest in the action.

2. Under the 5th section of the act of June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 197), the plaintiff had the right, under the 205th section of that Code, to oppose the defendant's affidavits by affidavits in addition to those on which the arrest was granted.

3. The pendency of another action in a state court against the defendant for the same cause of action was of no importance, as the state court had no jurisdiction of an action against a consul, and would be no defence if the defendant were not such.

4. The motion to discharge the defendant must be denied.

[This was an action at law by Nathaniel McKay against Edwin C. B. Garcia.]

William Tracy, for the motion.

William Blaikie and Merritt E. Sawyer, opposed.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is an action for a debt. By the act of February 28, 1839 (5 Stat. 321), in connection with the act of January 14, 1841 (Id. 410), imprisonment for debt is allowed, on process issuing out of a court of the United States, where, by the laws of the state, imprisonment for debt shall be allowed, the conditions and restrictions prescribed by the state being applicable to the process issuing out of the court of the United States. The act of 1839 provides that "the same proceedings shall be had" in the court of the United States "as are adopted in the courts of such state."

The 179th section of the Code of Procedure of New York provides for the arrest and imprisonment of a defendant in an action for money received in a fiduciary capacity. This is such an action.

This being an action at law, the practice in it must, under the 5th section of the act of June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 197), conform, as near as may be, to the practice now existing in a like cause in the courts of record of the state of New York.

The defendant having moved, on affidavits on his part, to substantially vacate the order to hold to bail, the plaintiff has a right, under the provisions of section 205 of the Code of Procedure of New York, to oppose such motion on new and further affidavits and proofs, in addition to those on which the order to hold to bail was made.

The pendency of a former suit against the defendant in a state court for the same cause of action, is of no importance, for such state court was and is without jurisdiction of the suit, as the defendant was and is a foreign consul. But if he were not, the weight of authority is that the fact of the pendency of such suit in the state court would be of no effect on this suit. Loring v. Marsh [Case No. 8,514].

The cause of action here is one which was assignable. On all the affidavits and papers on both sides, I am of opinion that the order to hold to bail would have been properly grantable in the first instance. If so, it must be upheld. The motion to vacate the order to hold to bail and to discharge the defendant from bail to the marshal on his filing common bail, is denied.

McKAY et al. v. HILL.

[1 Hask. 276.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Sept., 1870.

CORPORATIONS — STOCKHOLDERS — CAPITAL WITHDRAWN — LIABILITY — LIMITATION — DIVIDENDS NOT EARNED — NOTES GIVEN THEREFOR — STATUTE.

1. The withdrawal of any portion of the capital by a stockholder in a corporation, renders him liable under Rev. St. Me. 1857, c. 46, § 24, for the corporate debts contracted since June 1, 1857, to the amount of capital so withdrawn.

2. To construe a statute, effect should be given to each part of the enactment if possible, that the whole statute may have meaning.

3. The limitation of a year, in the above statute, does not apply to an action for a corporate debt, contracted after June 1, 1857, against a stockholder for having withdrawn capital from the corporation.

4. The surrender by a stockholder of his shares in a corporation and his receiving in exchange therefor the stock of another corporation, that he originally paid for his shares, operates as a withdrawal of capital.

5. So does the receipt of dividends not earned.

6. So does the surrender of shares in exchange for corporate notes that are subsequently paid.

7. Notes of a corporation, given in payment of dividends declared but not earned, are void in the hands of the stockholder receiving them.

Case, by [Nathaniel McKay and others] creditors of an insurance company, against a stockholder [William Hill], charged with having withdrawn the capital of the corporation, and thereby under Rev. St. Me. 1857, c. 46, § 24, become liable for corporate debts. The case was tried upon the general issue before the court without a jury, the parties having given the usual stipulation.

William L. Putnam, for plaintiffs.

Josiah H. Drummond, for defendant.

Before SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge, and FOX, District Judge.

FOX, District Judge. On the 14th day of March, 1866, the plaintiffs procured from the Piscataqua Fire and Marine Insurance Company, a corporation under the laws of this state, having its place of business in the county of York, a policy of insurance for the sum of $2,500, upon the steamer Gen. Hooker for one year, against the usual marine risks. Within the year the steamer was lost, and at the September term, 1867, of this court, the plaintiffs recovered against that company upon its policy a judgment for $2,703.33 debt and $45.33 costs of suit. Upon this judgment, execution issued October 31st, 1867. December 4th, 1867, the marshal of the district made return thereon, that he had made diligent search for property of the defendants with which to satisfy the execution in whole or in part and was unable to find any, and so for want thereof he returned the execution wholly unsatisfied. On the 2d of January, 1868, he made a further return, that on the 6th of December he had exhibited the execution to William Hill, one of the stockholders of said Piscataqua Fire and Marine Insurance Company, and requested him to show attachable property of the corporation to satisfy the execution, to which Hill replied, he had not any property of said corporation in his hands. On the 6th of December the marshal also served on the defendant a written notice from the plaintiffs, requesting him to show to the officer holding such execution attachable property of the company to satisfy the same, to which defendant replied as before. Thereupon the plaintiffs, on the 31st day of January, 1868, commenced the present suit against Hill, claiming to recover of him as a stockholder in the insurance company by reason of his withdrawal of a portion of the capital stock of the corporation. The case is submitted to the court under the provisions of the act of congress by written stipulation of the parties, without the intervention of a jury.

The first question which is presented for decision is, whether a stockholder in an insurance company, who withdraws a portion of the capital of the company, is thereby made liable to a law suit in behalf of the creditor of the company, for debts contracted after June 1st, 1857, the defendant contending that such liability no longer exists under any of the provisions of the laws of Maine. The 24th section of chapter 46 of the Revised Statutes of Maine declares that, "the stockholders of all corporations created by the legislature after February 16th, 1836, excepting banking corporations, unless it is otherwise specified in their charter, or by any general law of the state, shall be liable for the debts of the corporation contracted during their ownership of such stock, prior to the first day of June, 1857, in case of deficiency of attachable corporate property, to the amount of their stock and no more; and such liability shall continue, notwithstanding any subsequent transfer of such stock, one year after such transfer is recorded on the corporation books; but no stockholder whose stock has been fully paid in, and no part of the principal has been withdrawn, shall be so liable on debts contracted after said first day of June; but in the latter case, when an officer certifies on an execution against a corporation, that he cannot find corporate property to satisfy it, each stockholder's stock and interest in stock may be seized and sold thereon as on execution against him; and he may recover of the corporation the value of the stock or interest so taken, &c."

Section 25 of the same chapter as amended, authorizes a plaintiff, at any time within six months after the return of an execution against a corporation recovered on a debt for which any stockholder is liable under the preceding section, unsatisfied in whole or in part for want of attachable property of the corporation, to demand of any stockholder of such corporation to disclose and show attachable property of the corporation, sufficient to satisfy the execution; and by section 26 such creditor, after demand, may have an action of the case against such stockholder to recover of him individually the amount of his execution and costs, or the deficiency thereof, not exceeding the amount for which such stockholder is liable by section 24; such action to be commenced within six months after judgment recovered against the corporation.

The rights of these parties therefore depend on the true construction of section 24 of chapter 46 of the Revised Statutes. This section in the first place declares that "stockholders of all corporations created, &c., shall be liable for debts of the corporation, contracted during their ownership of such stock prior to the first day of June, 1857, in case of deficiency of attachable corporate property to the amount of their stock and no more; * * * but no stockholder, whose stock has been fully paid in and no part of the principal has been withdrawn, shall be so liable for debts contracted after said first day of June." Upon this language, the argument of the learned counsel of the defendant is, that but one class of liabilities is affirmatively and positively declared, viz: for debts contracted prior to June 1st, 1857; that the subsequent provision as found in this section is not of a positive, certain and obligatory character, declaring or establishing a liability, but is the rather of a negative order in its terms, viz: that for debts of the corporation contracted after the first of June, a stockholder, whose stock has been fully paid in and no part thereof withdrawn, shall not be personally liable for such debts. It is conceded that this company was incorporated after Feb. 16th, 1836, that the demand of the plaintiffs was contracted by the company after the first day of June, 1857, and that by the repealing act of 1857 the prior acts creating a liability against stockholders for corporate debts were repealed, leaving their rights and liabilities dependent on the enactments of the Revised Statues. The language of the 24th section of chapter 46; is certainly peculiar and somewhat doubtful and ambiguous, and we concur with the defendant's counsel, that it does not in clear, direct, absolute and positive words declare an obligation and liability against a stockholder, who has not fully paid in his stock, or who has withdrawn a portion of the capital. To express such a liability, language much more apt and positive might have been employed by the legislature; and yet, we entertain no doubt that it was the intention and design of the legislature that such conduct on the part of a stockholder, as would reduce or destroy the security which corporate creditors might otherwise have availed themselves of, should subject the stockholder to a personal liability for the debts of the corporation to the extent at least of his stock.

In the construction of statutes, several acts in pari materia and relating to the same subject, are to be taken together and compared, because they are considered as having one object in view, and as acting on one system, and the rule applies, though some of the statutes may have expired or are not referred to in the other acts. 1 Kent. Comm. 463.

By an act of the legislature of Maine, approved Feb. 24, 1821, c. 139, § 2, it was enacted that "in case of any loss or losses whereby the capital stock of insurance companies shall be lessened before all the installments are paid in, each proprietor or stockholder's estate shall be held accountable for the installments that may remain unpaid on his share or shares, at the time of such loss or losses taking place."

The 7th section of the act declares, that "whenever it shall so happen that by losses on policies or otherwise, their corporate property shall be insufficient to pay all their debts, the individual stockholders shall be liable in their private capacity, in case the whole amount of the capital stock is not paid in, to any creditor of said company, to the amount that may be due from said stockholders on their shares."

By chapter 200, Act 1836, this liability was broadly extended, and thereby stockholders in all corporations created after Feb. 16, 1836, excepting banking corporations, unless otherwise specified in their charter, in case of deficiency of attachable corporate property, were rendered liable to have their estate taken on execution against the corporation to the amount of their stock, or to an action on the case, in behalf of the creditor to recover of said stockholder the amount of the execution or the balance due thereon, not exceeding the amount of his stock.

The laws were revised in 1840, and by chapter 76, § 18, this provision of the act of 1836, was re-enacted. In 1855 by chapter 169, the remedy of scire facias was substituted for an action on the case. In 1856, by chapter 271, the 18th section of chapter 76 of Revised Statutes was repealed, but the liability of the stockholders for corporate debts, to the amount of their stock, was re-enacted, and an action of the case restored, and the liability to have their property taken on execution against the corporation was extinguished by a repeal of sections 18, 19, and 20, of chapter 76 of the Revised Statutes.

By a resolve of the legislature of 1856, c.

341, the revision of the laws, which had been made under a resolve of a prior legislature, was committed to Hon. Ether Shepley, "whose duty it shall be to compare the revision made under such resolves, with the existing laws, and make such further revision and new arrangement thereof, including the public laws passed at the present session, as may be necessary to present the same in the most complete form for the consideration of the legislature. Ch. J. Shepley made his report to the legislature of 1857, and in his revision incorporated the provisions of chapter 271 of Laws of 1856, continuing the general liability of the stockholder to the amount of his stock, for all debts contracted by the corporation during his ownership of the stock. Whilst the report of Ch. J. Shepley was pending before the legislature of 1857, and before it had been entirely adopted, that legislature by an act approved April 15, 1867, c. 58, entitled "An act to exempt stockholders in corporations from personal liability," enacted "that the stockholders of all corporations, * * * when the stock of the stockholders claiming this exemption shall have been paid in to the full amount thereof, and no part of the principal shall have been withdrawn, shall not be personally liable for the debts the corporation contracted after June 1, 1857; but when the officer having an execution against the corporation certifies thereon that he cannot find corporate property or estate wherewith to satisfy it, the stock and interest of each stockholder in the stock of the corporation shall be liable to seizure and sale on the execution in the same manner as on execution against him."

This act contains no repealing clause of any former provisions of the statutes. The Revised Statutes of 1857 were passed on the 16th day of April, 1857, approved the 17th, only two days after the approval of chapter 58 above recited. The 24th section of chapter 46 of the Revised Statutes clearly manifests a design to incorporate into the Revised Statutes the provisions of chapter 58, which had received the sanction and authority of the legislature only two days before, and to substitute the provisions of this chapter in place of those found in the revision of Ch. J. Shepley, which were simply a condensation of the act of 1856, c. 271.

From the examination of the prior statutes, it is manifest, that from the organization of this state, it has been its policy to require the capital stock of insurance companies to be fully paid in, and if the same was not done, any delinquent stockholder was subject to the suit of a creditor of the company for the amount unpaid; that in 1856 a much more stringent liability was established by which stockholders were, without any such faults on their part, either of neglecting to pay in full their subscription to the capital stock, or not allowing it to remain as a part of the capital, rendered generally liable to the amount of their stock for debts of the corporation contracted during their ownership.

This liability, onerous and severe as it manifestly was, continued until the session of the legislature of 1857, when chapter 58, Acts 1857, was enacted. But it was not entirely and absolutely extinguished by that act, although the title of the act is "An act to exempt stockholders in corporations from personal liability." The language of the act is perfectly clear and precise, and its import and effect does not admit of any question. Previous to its passage, stockholders were thus liable. The act of 1857 does not in terms repeal any of the prior acts by which such liability was created, but it declares that stockholders, whose stock has been fully paid in and no part of the principal shall have been withdrawn, shall not be personally liable. The liability certainly remained upon the stockholder, whose stock had not been fully paid in, or when a portion of the capital had been by him withdrawn, and it is quite apparent from the language employed, that on the 15th of April, the legislature did not contemplate an entire release of the stockholders from liability, but the rather did intend that if the capital was in any way deficient through the agency of the stockholder, he should continue responsible for the debts of the corporation.

In this state of the law, can we presume that two days afterwards, by the passage of the Revised Statutes, it was the intention and purpose of the legislature to abolish all liability of stockholders, a liability founded in justice and reason, and which had been so carefully guarded and protected by its enactments but a day or two previously? Could it have been the intention and design to have allowed such fraudulent dishonest proceedings on the part of the stockholders to become thus beneficial to the guilty party, and so unjust and detrimental to the innocent creditors of the company? It became necessary to incorporate into the Revised Statutes the provisions of the various acts passed at that session of the legislature, and in accomplishing this purpose, the legislature adopted the language now found in chapter 46, § 24, and at the same time it repeals chapter 58, and all other provisions of previous laws touching the liability of such stockholders.

The Revised Statutes were intended as a revision of former laws, and it has been expressly decided by the supreme court of Maine, Hughes v. Farrar, 45 Me. 72, that in the revision of the statutes of 1857, the principal design was to revise, collate and arrange the public laws, and in revising, to condense as far as practicable; that a mere change of phraseology should not be deemed a change of the laws unless there was evident intention in the legislature to make such change. The same principle as to the construction of statutes which are intended as a revision of former laws is found recognized in Gaffney v. Colvill, 6 Hill, 567; Croswell v. Crane, 7 Barb. 191; Taylor v. Delancy, 2 Caines, Cas. 143; Conger v. Barker, 11 Ohio St. 15.

It being certain that the general liability of stockholders existed from 1836 to 1857, and that it was not entirely abolished by the legislature of 1857, by act of April 15th, c. 58, but was thereby only modified and allowed to remain and exist in full force against this particular class of delinquent stockholders, guided by these decisions and rules of law, we cannot conclude that there was intended by the same legislature to be an entire extinction of such liability from the language it has seen fit to adopt in its revision as contained in the 46th chapter.

We do not find there any language sufficient to satisfy our minds that the legislature intended to make any change. On the contrary, it is manifest that they understood such liability existed, and they intended it should remain unabridged. After declaring expressly the liability of stockholders for corporate debts contracted prior to June 1, 1857, the act further declares "that no stockholder whose stock has fully been paid in, and no part of the principal has been withdrawn, shall be so liable for debts contracted after said first day of June." This language was designed to have some meaning, to convey some idea, to have force and effect as declaratory of the legislative will, and unless it is to be construed as recognizing a liability on the part of stockholders, thus refusing to make good their proportion of the capital stock, or who shall have diminished it after it has been paid in, the language is senseless and of none effect.

It should be remembered that all prior acts, relating to liability of stockholders in these corporations for the corporate debts, were repealed. No liability for these debts existed at common law, and the first clause of the 24th section, c. 46, was restricted to a liability for debts contracted prior to June 1, 1857. What force, propriety or object was there then in formally enacting that stockholders who had not withdrawn any portion of their capital should not be liable for debts contracted after June 1st? There was no such liability. Strike from this section this clause, leave it with only the prior clause, declaring stockholders liable for debts contracted prior to June 1st, without any other enactments on the subject, and it would make no difference whether the capital had or had not been fully paid in, or any portion thereof subsequently withdrawn, because no provision of law existed creating any liability for any debts contracted after June 1st; this provision is to be construed as exonerating such delinquent stockholders from liability for debts of the corporation contracted after June 1st.

When stockholders were already exonerated therefrom, and their liability by the previous clause expressly restricted to the debts contracted prior to June 1st, it is apparently the merest absurdity to declare a class as exempt, when by the most comprehensive language in the same section, the liability of the whole body of stockholders was limited to debts previously contracted, and by no existing provision of law were they subject to liability for debts subsequently contracted.

A statute is not to be thus construed; on the contrary, force and effect should be given to every clause, sentence and word contained in it if possible, so as to carry into effect the design and intention of the legislature. No clause or sentence should be deemed void, superfluous or unimportant; and if from the whole statute the intent is different from a literal import of some of its terms, the intent must prevail. It is our duty therefore to hold, that by this second clause the legislature intended some operative, effectual provision, other than that which preceded it, and not that it was mere surplusage, an ambiguous repetition in part of what it had expressed in the clearest language a few lines previously. In U. S. v. Freeman, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 565, Wayne, J., says, "Whenever any words of a statute are doubtful or obscure, the intention of the legislature is to be resorted to in order to find the meaning of the words. A thing which is within the intention of the maker of the statute, is as much within the statute as if it were within the letter. 'Every part of the act is to be taken into view for the purpose of discovering the mind of the legislature.'" In U. S. v. Babbitt, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 61, Swayne, J., says, "What is implied in a statute is as much a part of it as what is expressed;" and this principle was re-affirmed in Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 221.

In Ryegate v. Wardsboro, 30 Vt. 749, the court says: "The question arises, are we at liberty when the words of the statute are plain and unambiguous, but are directly repugnant to the whole spirit and intent of all our legislation on the same subject, and in the same act, and seem to involve an absurdity, to disregard the letter of the law and attach to it that meaning which the legislature really intended? It is urged that when the language of a statute is plain, clear and intelligible, it is itself the best, and should be the only expositor of the meaning of the legislature. Theoretically, this argument would seem to furnish a safe rule of interpretation. Practically it is not always safe or sensible. A rigid adherence to it woud not unfrequently involve us in contradictions, absurdities and palpable violations of the real intention of the legislature. * * The letter of the law is found by experience not to be in all cases a correct guide to the true sense of the lawgiver." The 14th section of the bankrupt act in terms dissolves only those attachments made within four months from the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, and yet it was decided in Leighton v. Kelsey, 57 Me. 85, that this provision is equivalent to an express provision for the preservation of an attachment made more than four months before proceedings in bankruptcy, and that thereby such attachments are saved and remain valid.

If the legislature of 1857 were inquired of as to its intention and purpose in case of a delinquent stockholder who had withdrawn his capital, would it not reply that only two days prior to our enacting the Revised Statutes, we by a legislative act, chapter 58, declared our intentions in language beyond question, and we did not intend any change by the words we have employed in the revision. Our meaning was to hold him responsible for such conduct to the creditors of the company, and although, in revising the law, we may not have used the clearest language to convey the idea, we have in fact declared that if the stockholder pays in his stock and permits it to remain unimpaired to satisfy corporate debts, he shall by so doing be exonerated from liability for such debts, and by thus exonerating him in such case, have we not only impliedly, but most manifestly indicated that we intended he should be accountable, if he should so conduct as to diminish the fund which creditors should always be at liberty to resort to wholly unimpaired.

That such was the design of the legislature, we gather from the further provision of the same section, by which the security provided for a creditor for debts of the corporation, contracted after June 1st, is that the stock of the individual stockholder in the corporation may be seized and sold on the execution. What possible profit or advantage would such a remedy prove to a creditor, if each stockholder could with entire impunity withdraw from the corporation the capital he had paid in? If a corporation on the verge of insolvency could with safety to its stockholders divide among them its capital, leaving nothing but the shares of a mere nominal value, such a course would in all cases be resorted to, and thereby the remedy of the creditor would be rendered of no avail whatever. The 33d section of chapter 46 declares that "corporations, &c., * * * are not allowed to divide any of their corporate property so as to reduce their stock below its par value, until all debts are paid, and then for the purpose of closing its concerns; and in case of such unlawful division, a judgment creditor may file a bill in equity against such stockholder, and the court may decree that any such property may be paid to such creditor in satisfaction of his judgment."

This remedy we hold to be cumulative, additional to that of an action of the case given the 26th section, and not in substitution thereof; that the liability of a stockholder for such a diminution of the corporate funds is clearly and distinctly recognized by this section from the same chapter of the Revised Statutes, and which was a mere revision and condensation of chapter 54, Act 1848. The rule of the federal courts is to adopt the construction of a state statute given to it by the supreme court of the state, and it would have afforded us great satisfaction if we could have found that the question here presented had been decided by the supreme court of Maine. Not being advised of such a decision, we have been compelled to form our own conclusions as to the construction of this statute, unaided by the investigations of the courts of the state, and we are of opinion that a stockholder of a corporation, who has withdrawn a portion of the capital, is by so doing, by force of chapter 46 of the Revised Statutes rendered liable to a suit of the creditor of the corporation on a debt contracted since June 1, 1857. Has the defendant violated the provisions of the statute by an illegal withdrawal of any portion of the capital stock of the company?

The Piscataqua Mutual Fire & Marine Insurance Company was incorporated by the legislature of Maine, as a mutual office by chapter 535, approved March 17, 1855. By section 12, a guarantee capital was authorized not exceeding $100,000, and the directors were empowered "to allow therefor a sum not exceeding six per cent. per annum, and may use, negotiate or assess the same, only for the purpose of paying the just debts of the company." By chapter 426, Laws 1860, authority was given to increase the guarantee capital of the company to $500,000, and by section 2 "the holders of the guarantee capital shall receive such share of the net profits of the company as may be provided by the charter and by-laws of said company, and declared by vote of the directors." By an amendment of the charter, chapter 168, Acts 1862, the company was made a stock company and by the first section of that chapter it was provided "that the guarantee capital shall not be less than $100,000, divided into shares of $100 each," and that the capital "shall be vested in the name of said company, and be held for the payment of all losses and liabilities incurred by said company during the continuance of its charter, or while any liabilities remain outstanding against it."

The 17th section of chapter 49 of the Revised Statutes provides, "that no dividend shall be made by any insurance company after any diminution of the capital stock by losses, depreciation or otherwise, until such diminution is supplied by actual funds, or the value restored;" and we do not find, in any of the provisions of the charter of the Piscataqua Fire and Marine Insurance Co. or of its amendments, any authority to contravene this general law, and distribute as dividends a portion of the capital.

The first section of chapter 168, Act 1862, would the rather require that the whole guarantee capital should be held for the payment of losses, &c., so long as any liabilities were outstanding against the company. By chapter 384, Laws 1867, the surrender of the charter of this company was accepted; but it was expressly enacted that any special remedies against its officers or stockholders shall not be affected thereby; nor shall this act relieve them, or any of them, from any personal liabilities under any of the statutes of this state."

It is shown that June 1, 1863, the defendant became the owner and received a certificate of eighty-two shares of the stock of this company, paying the company therefor by a transfer to it of eighty-two shares of the Dover and Winnepisseogee Railroad Company stock. He continued to stand upon the books of this company as the owner of these eighty-two shares until May, 1866, when he surrendered to the company the certificate of this stock and received back the eighty-two shares of railroad stock. The defendant received his dividends from the insurance company on the eighty-two shares of its stock standing in his name for the years 1864 and 1865. The directors, by a vote of May 5, 1866, voted, "that the president and secretary be directed to carry into effect the contract with Wm. Hill, according to the obligation of said company under date of June 1, 1863, and that they be authorized and directed to transfer to Wm. Hill eighty-two shares of the Dover & Win. R. R. Co."

The contract referred to by this vote is not produced, and there is nothing found on the record of the directors, excepting the above vote, relating to such a contract, or in any manner referring to or sanctioning the same, which, it is stated, was an agreement by the insurance company to return to Hill, on demand, the railroad stock received by the company from him in exchange for a like amount of its own stock. It is manifest that in May, 1866, when Hill received from this company the reconveyance of the eighty-two shares of railroad stock, the insurance company was deeply insolvent; and we are well satisfied that the defendant was aware of the condition of the company, as he had for for a long time been one of its directors and treasurer.

Their policy of insurance having been procured from the company, by the plaintiffs, prior to these transactions between the defendant and the insurance company, the right of the plaintiffs to resort to the capital of the company, for payment of their demand against the company, as it existed at the date of their contract cannot be impaired by these proceedings. It was a part of the contract that the capital should be applied to the liquidation of the debts of the corporation, and no part of it could be thus withdrawn, so as to impair the rights and securities of the plaintiffs. Such were the general provisions of law on this subject, and such also were the provisions of the charter of this company as amended in 1862, c. 168.

At the date of the plaintiff's policy, the defendant, by the records of the company, was the absolute unqualified owner of eighty-two shares of its stock, and the eighty-two shares of the railroad stock appeared on its books as a portion of the capital of said insurance company. There was nothing whatever, so far as is made to appear, to indicate any other rights or interests than those of full, complete, actual ownership by the several parties of the stocks in the several corporations according to the terms of their certificates. The records of the directors of the insurance company do not contain any note or indication that the defendant had a right to surrender his stock in the insurance company, and on demand to withdraw from its capital the eighty-two shares of railroad stock. From these circumstances, taken in connection with the acts of ownership of the parties over the several stocks, the insurance company receiving the dividends on the railroad stock and paying to the defendant dividends on the stock thus held by him in the insurance company, and the defendant receiving them until the company had become deeply insolvent and its stock of no value, we are of opinion he should not have withdrawn the eighty-two shares of railroad stock and cancelled his certificate of a like number of shares in the insurance company, although the company might perhaps have been bound to carry out this arrangement if the rights of other parties were not affected thereby. As against the plaintiffs, at the time creditors of said company, we hold the transaction as entirely unauthorized, and in its legal operation and effect a prohibited withdrawal of the value of $8,200, of the capital stock of said Piscataqua Fire and Marine Ins. Co.

On the first of August, 1862, the defendant subscribed and paid for 225 shares of the stock of this company for which he received certificate No. 222.

Upon this stock he was paid dividends at the rate of eight per cent. per annum to Nov., 1865. Dec. 24, 1862, it appears from the directors' records it was voted "that the treasurer, Wm. Hill, be and he is thereby authorized to purchase the following certificates of stock, viz: No. 222 for 225 shares, No. * * * amounting in all to 434 shares of the value of $43,400, and the said Hill is authorized to issue company notes for the same, payable on demand and bearing semi-annual interest."

This vote remained dormant, no action of any kind was taken under it for years, so far as it appears, but on the contrary, it was disregarded by all parties, and Hill drew his dividends on this stock at the rate of eight per cent. until Nov., 1865. Thirteen of the shares were disposed of by Hill in 1865, and the certificate for the balance was cancelled in 1866, and Hill received therefor a note of the insurance company for $21,200, being the par value of said shares. This note bears date Feb. 1, 1866, but from all the evidence we find that the project was not carried into effect till sometime afterward, and the note then dated back to Feb. 1st, in order to conceal and cover up the transaction if possible. This note for $21,200, is numbered 156 and dated Feb. 1st. Note No. 155 was dated Feb. 8th. That numbered 157 was dated April 5th. The defendant admits, "that from an examination of the cancellation of the stock certificate it looks as if it was written April 27, 1866, and then Feb. 1, 1866 was written over it."

This operation appears on the company's journal, the entry immediately preceding it bearing date April 25th, and the next subsequent April 26th. We are satisfied that this scheme was not completed until April 26th. The company note was then executed, the parties, the better to conceal their fraudulent designs, dating it Feb. 1st. Hill has since received from the property of the corporation the full amount of this note with interest. This manoeuvre finds no support in the vote of Dec. 26, 1862. All parties were satisfied that they were engaged in an illegal enterprise as is manifest from the false dates inserted by them in the instruments. When it was attempted, the company was insolvent, and it was simply a plan to allow the defendant to cancel his certificate of 212 shares of the worthless stock of this corporation and receive therefor the note of the company for their par value. On the same day a very large amount of notes and other property of the corporation was assigned to this defendant, a portion of which was applied by him to the payment of this note. This whole proceeding was a gross fraud, and as against the plaintiffs, the defendant cannot be permitted to reap any profit therefrom, but must be considered as having thereby withdrawn from the capital of this insolvent company the further sum of $21,200. The company being greatly embarrassed, on April 27th, and May 4, 1866, assigned to the defendant notes and other property of the company to the amount of about $160,000, he being also a bona fide creditor of the company for a very large sum. He collected from the property thus assigned to him $68,502.87, leaving uncollected a large amount. He states that after crediting to the company the sums thus collected, there remained due to him in January, 1869, about $20,000; but to produce this result, he charges the company with the note of $21,200, and interest, and also a note of $3,269, and interest, received by him for dividends which were made in contravention of the general provisions of the statutes, and which were not authorized by the charter of the company nor its amendments, if thereby the capital stock was diminished, which is beyond question; the books of the company also show, that he received for dividends about $4,000 more, he being the owner in all of 500 shares in the stock of said company. The defendant was summoned as trustee of the insurance company on the 8th of June, 1866, on a suit in favor of Albert Bowker, in which suit the defendant was defaulted as trustee, and a judgment was rendered April 8, 1868, against the corporation for $5,016.44 damages and $82.77 costs. An action of sci. fa. is now pending against Hill as trustee in said cause before the law court for York county, and it is claimed by his counsel that he should not be held accountable in this present suit on account of this trustee process, which was instituted long before the present plaintiffs commenced their action against the company. By the 27th section of chapter 46, the stockholder is permitted to "prove in reduction of his liability the amount of corporation debts which he has previously paid, and which have not been repaid to him by the corporation; also, any debt due him from the corporation for which, he at the time might maintain an action at law against it; and may show any other legal cause why judgment should not be rendered against him."

From the exhibit made by the defendant, we do not find he has paid any debts of the corporation which have not been repaid to him, or that he has any other claim on the company; and the pendency of the action of sci. fa. against him does not establish a legal cause why judgment should not be rendered in the present suit. We entertain great doubt as to his liability to be charged as trustee in said cause, and we certainly can perceive no pretence to hold him chargeable on account of the eighty-two shares of railroad stock, which he withdrew from the company in May, 1866. We are also well satisfied, that if he should be held chargeable as trustee, and compelled to pay the full amount of Bowker's judgment against the corporation, that he held in his hands and possession the property and estate of the corporation more than sufficient for his indemnity, after deducting from his claims against the corporation the demands which are manifestly illegal, and for which the corporation was not legally accountable to him. It is claimed that this withdrawal of the eighty-two shares of the railroad stock and of the $21,200, in payment for the 212 shares of the company's stock, if illegal, was a mere nullity and void, and that the case must stand therefore, as if the attempt was unsuccessful and without effect: that the defendant, in law, still continues the owner of these shares in the capital stock of the insurance company. If this is the legal result, then no stockholder could be held accountable for a withdrawal of a portion of the capital stock of the corporation; as in all such cases, the withdrawal of the capital is prohibited, and is in express violation of law, when thereby the capital is reduced below its par value. This defendant, having in our judgment violated the law, such violation, by the force of the statute renders him amenable to the plaintiffs' suit, and when the plaintiffs resort to the remedy provided for them in the act, it is not for the defendant to reply, true, my conduct was in violation of the law, but being so, it was without effect. The law having forbidden my doing as I did, I have not accomplished my purpose.

So far as these creditors are concerned he has accomplished it. The capital of the company is de facto reduced just the amount he has withdrawn, and he must abide the consequences. It is also suggested, that the trustees under the act for closing the affairs of this company have commenced a process in equity against this defendant to recover back from him the property of the corporation thus illegally obtained by him, and that this bill is now pending before the supreme judicial court of York county. It is a sufficient answer to this suggestion that the bill in equity was not filed until Dec., 1868, and the plaintiffs' rights as creditors of the corporation had become vested long previously, and were expressly saved to them by the act accepting the surrender of the charter and authorizing the appointment of trustees to close its concerns.

The defendant being held accountable for debts of the corporation contracted after June, 1857, by reason of his withdrawal of a portion of the capital stock of the company, the limitation of liability for one year does not apply to the present suit. The case shows that the present action was seasonably commenced, and that all the requirements of the statutes as to demand, notice, &c., were complied with. The plaintiffs therefore are entitled to recover from the defendant the amount of their execution against the Piscataqua Fire and Marine Insurance Co., with interests and costs. Defendant defaulted.

Circuit Court, D. California. April 7, 1873.

PATENTS—ASSIGNMENT OF TERRITORY—RIGHT TO VEND THEREIN—LAWFUL SALE—EMANCIPATION.

1. When a patented article has been lawfully made and sold without restriction or condition, it is no longer within the monopoly, and the purchaser may use it without restriction as to time or place.

2. The assignee of all the right, title and interest of the patentee in his invention and patent, in a specified territory, without any restriction upon his right to vend in said territory, may, with respect to the rights of a subsequent assignee for other territory, lawfully sell the patented article within his own territory, without restriction or condition.

3. B. is assignee, without restriction or condition, of all the rights of the patentees for the territory east of the Rocky Mountains, in a patent for an improved case for transporting eggs. M. is a subsequent assignee for all the territory west of the Rocky Mountains. E. purchased of B. at Chicago, a number of his patent cases, filled them with eggs in Iowa, and transported the eggs in said cases to San Francisco: Held, that such use of the cases west of the Rocky Mountains is not an infringement of the rights of M., under his assignment for the territory west of the Rocky Mountains.

Bill in equity [by David McKay against John B. Wooster and others,] to restrain the infringement of a patent right, by use and sale of a patented case for the transportation of eggs. The following facts appear from the stipulation of the parties filed in the case: On February 26, 1867, a patent was duly issued to J. L. and G. W. Stevens, of San Francisco, for an "improvement in cases for transporting eggs." In August, 1872, said patentees, by deed, granted and assigned to H. F. Billings, of Chicago, in the state of Illinois, "for, to and in all the states and territories of the United States, east of the Rocky Mountains, all the right, title and interest which they, the said John L. and George W. Stevens had in and to the said letters patent, and the invention as secured to them by said letters patent, and all their rights, liberties, privileges and franchises which they had or might acquire by or under the said letters patent," which said deed was duly recorded. Since said assignment, said Billings has erected a manufactory for said patent cases for the transportation of eggs, at Chicago, in the state of Illinois, and has manufactured, in accordance with the specifications of said patent, and he still continues to manufacture said cases; and he has sold and he continues to sell the same "to the public, or to whomsoever desires or desired to purchase them, without any restriction or reservation whatsoever." On the seventeenth of October, 1872, said J. L. and George W. Stevens made a similar transfer of all their right, title and interest in said patent and invention, in and to all the states and territories lying west of the Rocky Mountains, to the complainant, David McKay, who thereupon entered upon the manufacture of said patent cases at San Francisco; and he has ever since continued to manufacture and sell the same for use in that portion of the United States lying west of the Rocky Mountains.

The defendants are commission merchants, doing business at San Francisco, receiving goods consigned by merchants east of the Rocky Mountains, and selling the same on commission. M. Evans & Co., are merchants, doing business at Ames, in the state of Iowa, and a part of their business is dealing in eggs. Said Evans & Co., between the seventeenth of October, 1872, and the filing of the bill in this case, purchased in the usual course of business at Chicago, of said Billings, "without any restrictions or reservation" on his part, a number of said patent cases manufactured by him as aforesaid, filled them with eggs in the state of Iowa, for the purpose of transportation, and shipped them so filled with eggs to defendants at San Francisco, who received them and sold the eggs on commission in the regular course of their business as commission merchants. The use of the aforesaid cases in the transportation of eggs from the Rocky Mountains to San Francisco, is the infringement complained of; and the threatened continuance of the practice, and further use and sale of the cases so received, the injuries sought to be restrained. Numerous other parties are engaged in similar transactions.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge (after stating the facts). Under the view I take, the only question necessary to determine, seems to be precisely the same decided by Shepley, Circuit Judge, in Adams v. Burke [Case No. 50], viz: "Does the purchase of a patented article, lawfully manufactured, and sold without restriction or condition, within his territory by the territorial assignee of a patent right, convey to the purchaser the right to use or sell the article in another territory, for which another person has taken an assignment of the same patent?"

The learned judge answers the question in the affirmative. This is the only case I have found in which the precise question has ever been considered. One would suppose that a question of so much importance, and so likely to arise, would long since have been presented to the supreme court, and authoritatively determined, but it does not appear to have been done. It is insisted that the case cited is not correctly decided, and argued with a great deal of force, that since Lockhart and Seeley in that case, and Billings in this, only purchased the right of the patentees in a limited territory, they did not themselves have the right to supply, either directly or indirectly, other territory than that purchased; that their right only extended to making, using and vending to be used in the specific territory purchased; that, as they had themselves no right to use in other territory, their vendees could acquire no greater right than they themselves owned; that their purchase of the right to a specific territory necessarily limited their power to sell the machine to be used in that territory alone; that this limitation and restriction is necessarily implied in the sale, even without any express stipulation to that effect; that the patent under the fifth section of the act of congress of 1836 [5 Stat. 117], in terms, gives the patentee "the full, exclusive right and liberty of making, using and vending to others to be used," the said invention throughout the jurisdiction of the United States; that the eleventh section authorizes him to assign the whole or part of his interest for "any specific part or portion of the United States;" that when he assigns his entire interest for a specified part, he assigns the right acquired under the fifth section of "making, using, and vending to others to be used," in that specific part, and "to be used, as well as to make and use in that part alone;" and, therefore, when an assignee of a specific territory sells a machine in that territory, the machine so sold is taken out of the monopoly as to that territory only, there being no power in the vendor to withdraw it from the monopoly, as to other territory in which he has no monopoly or control, and that he can only dispose of his own share of the monopoly, or liberate therefrom to the extent of his own interest therein. This it is argued, is the reasonable construction of the law, and the contract of assignment of the right of the patentee to a specific part of the territory authorized by the act. The consequences of a different view are also urged in support of the position taken, some of which, it is said, find a striking illustration in this case. Thus, it is argued, that labor and materials being cheaper, and the other facilities for cheap manufacture being greater at Chicago than at San Francisco, the patent cases for transporting eggs can be made at a cost so much lower at Chicago than at San Francisco, that the purchaser of the Chicago manufacture could undersell the complainant in his own territory. Eggs, also, being so much cheaper east than west of the Rocky Mountains, large quantities are there purchased, and sent to these Western markets. The transportation of the patent cases costs nothing, because it is necessary in shipping to use boxes or cases of some kind, and these require no more room than others.

The freight is paid on the eggs as merchandise, and the greater security against breakage, and the improved condition of the eggs brought in these cases, more than compensate for their cost at Chicago. Those dealing in eggs, therefore, can purchase these patent cases at Chicago, ship them with eggs from any part of the United States east to parts westward of the Rocky Mountains, and after disposing of their contents, sell them at half cost, or even give them away, and still make a remunerative profit on their transaction. There is no use for the cases for return freight. Thus the entire market west of the Rocky Mountains, including nearly one third of the territory of the United States, can be wholly supplied, indirectly, through middlemen, at prices less than it is possible to make the article for here, by parties who have only purchased the territory east, to the utter loss or ruin of those who have purchased and paid for the territory west of the Rocky Mountains. So, again, it is said, it may well be in the case of many inventions, that some particular locality affords such facilities for cheap manufacture that the whole United States may be supplied from that point at prices that would defy competition in any other locality, so that it would only be necessary to purchase the right for the territory on which the factory is located, in order, through middlemen, to practically enjoy a monopoly of the whole country.

It is easy to see that the result of supplying the whole country, indirectly through the merchant, who is usually the seller to the consumer, is precisely the same as though the maker himself directly sells to the consumer. It must be confessed that these arguments are entitled to grave consideration. Enough has been said in this, and in the case cited, to render it manifest that great practical inconvenience may result from either view.

In the absence of an authoritative adjudication, I should hesitate long before venturing to dissent from a well considered decision of so learned, experienced and eminent a jurist as Judge Shepley. But in this instance, I can perceive no good ground for doubting the soundness of the proposition laid down in the guarded form in which it is stated in the case cited.

An important question not discussed by the learned judge, may, however, arise, as to when, or under what state of facts, a patented machine may be regarded as "lawfully * * * sold without restriction or condition, within his territory, by the territorial assignee of a patent right."

In the case now under consideration, it will be seen by reference to the stipulated facts, that the assignment to Billings was made in August, 1872, while that to complainant was not made till October following. If there is any conflict, therefore, in the rights claimed by the parties, the complainant's assignment, so far as the conflict is concerned, being subsequent in time, was taken in subordination to the prior grant to Billings—that is to say, he could only take by his assignment what was left after Billings' interest had been carved out. At the date of the assignment to Billings, the patentees were still the holders of the entire interest under the patent. Had they, at that time, at Chicago, sold one of the patented articles in question, without restriction or condition, that, undoubtedly, would have been a lawful sale without restriction or condition, and the article so sold would have been taken out of the monopoly, and the purchaser, or any one deriving title through him, would have been entitled to use it till worn out in any part of the United States. The patentee himself could not, by a subsequent assignment of his patent, have limited the right of the purchaser already vested. The vendor, being at that time entitled to the whole monopoly for the entire jurisdiction of the United States, it was competent for him to wholly emancipate the article sold by taking the entire royalty for the use in any part of the territory. And a sale, without restriction or limitation, would work such emancipation. In such case any party subsequently purchasing the right to any specific portion of territory, would take that right subject to the use of the machine so sold, at any point within the territory purchased. What the patentees could do with respect to one machine, they could do as to any number of machines in existence, or to be brought into existence. What they could do themselves, they could by contract authorize, or convey the right to any other party to do. As the patentees themselves could lawfully sell these patented articles at Chicago without restriction or condition, so as to authorize the purchasers, or those claiming under them, to use the machine anywhere in the United States, they could convey the right to Billings to lawfully do the same. This authority to emancipate from the monopoly by an unrestricted sale was a part of their "right, title and interest in the invention secured by the patent," that could be exercised and enjoyed at Chicago, or other place east of the Rocky Mountains, as well as elsewhere. The assignment to Billings is in the broadest terms. It is of "all the right, title and interest which the said John L. and George W. Stevens had in and to the said letters patent, and the invention as secured to them by said letters patent, and all their rights, liberties, privileges and franchises, which they had, or might acquire by or under said letters patent," "for, to and in all the states and territories of the United States east of the Rocky Mountains." There is no limitation of the power to vend within the territory. The patentees could lawfully make without restriction or condition, could use without restriction or condition, or could vend without restriction or condition anywhere within the specified territory, and all their rights they conveyed to Billings without restriction or condition, who, thereupon, stepped into the shoes of the patentees, as to the territory sold. Had they intended to limit the right of vending, "to vending to be used" by the purchasers within the territory sold only, they should, at least have so specified the intention, and by some apt words restricted the right of use in the deed of assignment. This unrestricted assignment of the right to vend, put it in the power of Billings to lawfully vend the patented article within his territory without restriction or condition, and, thereby, wholly emancipate from the monopoly the articles so sold. The complainant subsequently purchased his territory, and, whatever the terms of his grant, he could, of course, only obtain what was left of the franchise, or monopoly. As the patentees, after their sale to Billings, could not object to sales by him without restrictions or conditions, their subsequent assignee cannot object. The latter's right is subject to the right of Billings, and those who have lawfully purchased without restriction or condition from him. This is as far as it is necessary to go in this case. It is unnecessary, now, to consider the effect of an express limitation in the deed of assignment of the right to vend for the purpose of use only within the purchased territory; or how far the complainant, being a subsequent purchaser of territory, can lawfully vend without restriction or condition, so as to wholly emancipate the article sold from the monopoly, and enable the purchasers of the patented article of his manufacture to use it in the territory of Billings.

If there is any practical hardship in the construction adopted of the law and contract under it, and it should turn out to be the correct construction, then the patentee, when he desires to assign, must consider whether he can afford to do so without restriction, and the subsequent purchaser, when he wishes to buy, must determine whether he can afford to do so with the burden entailed upon his territory by a prior grant unlimited in the particulars indicated. There must be a decree for defendants. Let the bill be dismissed with costs.

[NOTE. This case was affirmed by the supreme court at the October term, 1873. The case was taken to the supreme court on appeal, where the decree of the court below was affirmed, with costs, December 15, 1873. There was no opinion, and the case is not reported.

Ex parte McKEAN.

[3 Hughes, 23.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Virginia. April 19, 1878.

HABEAS CORPUS — FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE — MITTIMUS — WHAT NECESSARY THEREIN.

Where a citizen charged with an offence committed in another state has been committed for trial by the committing magistrate of a state, it is competent for a court of the United States on a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into the validity of the mittimus, and to discharge the prisoner unless, 1. There is a charge of crime against the prisoner in the state from which he is alleged to be fugitive; 2. There be a demand by the governor of that state for his arrest and detention; 3. There be an indictment found in the state from which the prisoner has fled, or an affidavit made and certified by the governor of that state; and 4. The prisoner should have been in the state where the crime was committed, and have fled from it.

[Cited in Ex parte Brown, 28 Fed. 654.]

The petition is in these words: "Your petitioner, A. W. McKean, would respectfully represent to the court that he is a resident of the state of New York; that he is a commercial traveller representing the house of Kelly & Co., in the town of Rochester; that a few days ago he came to the city of Richmond in the interests of his house; that on the 17th day of April, 1878, he was arrested by the police of the city upon suspicion of being a fugitive from justice in that he has been guilty of forgery in the state of Kansas; that this arrest was made upon the bare description of the forger in a detective newspaper; that on the 18th of the month he was carried before the Hon. J. J. White, police justice of said city, and was by him committed to jail to await the action of the hustings court. The petitioner would state that he is wholly innocent of any such crime, that he is illegally held in custody, without just or sufficient cause. In consideration whereof your petitioner prays that your honor will issue a writ of habeas corpus directed," etc. The writ was issued, and on the hearing the following was the decision of the court:

HUGHES, District Judge. The constitution of the United States, article 4, section 2, authorizes the executive of any state from which a person accused of crime has fled to demand of the executive of the state into which he has fled, that he be delivered up and removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime; and congress has provided (section 5278, Rev. St.) that the arrest for that purpose be when there is produced a copy of an indictment found, or an affidavit made before a magistrate certified to be authentic by the executive of the state where the crime is charged to have been committed. The state of Virginia has adopted provisions similar to if not identical with those of the constitution and laws of the United States on this subject, and whether she had done so expressly or not, these latter provisions are a part of her law and are obligatory upon her officers and courts. It has been held that the power of congress to legislate on this subject of the delivery of fugitives from one state into another is exclusive, and that its law is the paramount law of the subject. Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 539; Martin's Case [Case No. 9,154]; Jones v. Vanzandt [Id. 7,502]; Smith's Case [Id. 12,968] It was competent for this court to issue the writ in this case, because congress has given jurisdiction to the courts and judges of the United States to issue the writ of habeas corpus in cases of prisoners who are in jail, or in custody in violation of the constitution or any law of the United States. So that the only question before me is whether this prisoner is illegally confined, that is to say, whether he is confined upon a charge and upon proofs illegal or insufficient in contemplation of the law under which he has been apprehended and held.

It would seem plain from the language of the laws of congress and of Virginia that, in order to justify an arrest and detention in a case like the present one, there must first be a charge of crime against the prisoner in the state where the crime is alleged to have been committed; that there must secondly be a demand by the governor of that state upon this for the arrest and detention; thirdly, that the evidence on which the arrest is based must be an indictment found in the state from which the prisoner has fled, or an affidavit made and certified by the governor of that state; and it would seem obvious, fourthly, that the prisoner should have been in the state where the crime was committed, and had fled from it. The law of Virginia does not strictly conform in language or substance to the law of congress describing the evidence on which the arrest and detention shall be made. The law of congress requires that they shall be made on production of the copy of an indictment found, or on production of an affidavit made before a competent magistrate, "certified as authentic by the executive of the state from whence the prisoner so charged has fled;" while the law of Virginia provides that the arrest may be made "upon complaint on oath or other satisfactory evidence that such person committed the offence." I think the intention of the legislature of Virginia was to make some such proof as that contemplated by the act of congress, requisite to the arrest of a person charged with crime in another state, but it does not in terms require that the affidavit or indictment should come certified by the executive of the state where the crime was committed. It seems to me that the law of the state ought to be construed in connection with the law of congress of which it is a part; and that on habeas corpus, it is competent for me to look into the proceedings which took place before the committing magistrate, for the purpose of determining whether the requirements of the law of congress in respect to the arrest and detention of fugitives from justice from other states have been observed. If the committing magistrate were merely holding this prisoner from day to day, awaiting such testimony as the law requires, I should remand the prisoner to him and await his final action; because it is customary as an act of comity between states that, in such cases, a reasonable time shall be allowed for sending on the requisite proofs of the crime and of the charges from the state where the crime was committed. But it seems that the magistrate has taken final action in the matter and exhausted the powers intrusted to him by the state law, so that the prisoner is before me on the validity of the mittimus, which is made part of the return of the jailer of Richmond to the writ of habeas corpus. The committing order of the magistrate does not set out in terms such facts as are required by law to give him authority to arrest and detain this prisoner. There is no demand from another state. There is no evidence that a crime has been committed. Nor is there evidence that this prisoner committed such a crime as the magistrate knew of only by hearsay. The prisoner must be discharged.

COLLISION—SCHOONER AND STEAMER — HEAVE IN STAYS.

1. A vessel when beating down the river, need not "heave in stays" in meeting a steamboat, but must keep her course.

2. It is the duty of the steamboat to avoid the vessel.

[Libel in rem by Frederick McKee, owner of the Pilot, against the Pearl.]

The schooner Pilot was beating down Detroit river in broad daylight, when near the head of Bois Blanc island, and close hauled on the starboard track, she was struck on her starboard side by the steamboat Pearl ascending the river, both vessels being near the buoy on the Canada shore.

John S. Newberry, for libelant.

Lothrop & Duffield, for respondent.

WILKINS, District Judge. The steamboat was ascending and the schooner Pilot was beating down the river. The important fact is admitted by the answer, which, according to the principles settled in [St. John v. Paine] 10 How. [51 U. S.] 580, fixes the fault on the steamboat. The answer alleges "that the schooner did not go about or heave in stays, but kept on her course." Being propelled by sails, this was her duty and no fault; and as settled by this court in The Whip and Michigan [Case No. 17,511], the steamboat should have avoided her. The collision occurred in broad daylight, and could have been, and should have been, avoided by the steamboat.

By the proofs submitted, the schooner sustained considerable damage by detention, repairs and injury to cargo, amounting in all, by the estimate furnished, to $265.81. Decree for that amount.

McKEE v. UNITED STATES.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 173.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1856.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT — SUBSEQUENT PERFORMANCE OF CONDITIONS—OCCUPATION AND INHABITATION.

The objection by the board met by further testimony taken in this court.

Claim for eight leagues of land in Colusi county, rejected by the board, and appealed by claimant [William H. McKee].

E. W. F. Sloan, for appellant.

William Blanding, U. S. Atty., for the United States.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case was rejected by the board, not however because any doubt was entertained as to the genuineness of the grant, but because no sufficient performance of the conditions was shown. The subsequent decision of the supreme court in the Case of Fremont has established a different rule for our guidance, and the testimony taken in this court on appeal is abundantly sufficient to remove the only objection urged by the board to a confirmation of the claim. Abner Bryan swears that the rancho [Jacinto] claimed by the appellant was known as Dr. McKee's rancho; that in 1846 and 1847 he was employed by McKee to take charge of and cultivate it; that he built a house upon and planted it with corn, wheat and potatoes; that he had upon it about one hundred head of cattle, and from twenty-five to thirty horses and some hogs. The witness remained on the land until the end of 1847, when he left it, and Capt. G. Swift took charge of the stock. José Castro testifies that Rodrigues, the original grantee, was a civil and military officer of the Mexican government; that on receiving his grant he was not required to occupy the land, as his services were needed in the army. He was subsequently transferred from the military to the civil service, but was required to hold himself in readiness for service in the army. He continued to be employed until July, 1846, in the custom house at Monterey, except at intervals when he was called into military service. The witness further states that at the time of obtaining his grant in 1844, the government owed him about half of what he had earned as an officer of the army, but it was without funds to pay him, and the witness states his belief that the debt has never been paid. The grant in this case does not contain the usual condition of occupation and inhabitation, and the above testimony satisfactorily explains the reasons of the omission.

We think that there is no evidence in the case to authorize the presumption that the claim was abandoned by the grantee, or that he is now attempting to resume it owing to the enhanced value of the land. On the contrary, the reasons of his delay are fully explained, and were such as were not only received by the former government, but were immediately owing to their own express commands. We think, therefore, that a decree of confirmation should be entered.

McKEE v. VERNON COUNTY.

[3 Dill. 210.] [1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Missouri. 1874.

MUNICIPAL BONDS—SUBSTITUTION OF NEW BONDS FOR OLD—ESTOPPEL.

The agent of the county and the presiding justice of the county court substituted engraved bonds, the signatures on the coupons of which were lithographed, for private bonds, the new bonds being of the same date and amount as the old, and the old being at the same time destroyed; there was no order of the county court for the substitution, but the county afterwards paid interest for two years, retained the certificate of stock, which was the consideration of the bonds, and entered of record other reasons than the substitution, for ceasing to pay interest on the new bonds: Held that the plea of non est factum was not sustainable as a defense to an action to recover coupons on the new bonds.

This suit [by Logan McKee] was for collection of interest coupons from bonds proved to have been executed by the presiding justice and clerk of the county court, and substituted, with the knowledge of the county agent, for other bonds regularly issued about seven months previously, which were surrendered and destroyed at the time of the substitution. Plea, non est factum. Reply (1) in denial; (2) estoppel. It appeared in proof that the county held $300,000 of railroad stock, and the railroad was built through the county. The defendant claimed that the surrender and destruction of the old bonds by their holders released the county, and the issue and delivery of new bonds without any order of the county court were without authority and that the bonds were therefore void. A jury was waived and the case tried to the court.

Mr. Stephenson, Mr. Shippen, and Ewing & Smith, for plaintiff.

Mr. Stone, Mr. Burton, Mr. Jackson, and W. P. Johnson, for the county.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge (orally). This is an action brought against Vernon county on coupons attached to bonds issued under authority contained in the charter of the Tebo and Neosho Railroad Company, approved in January, 1860, which conferred on the county court power to take stock in such company and issue bonds in payment therefor. The county court made a subscription to the capital stock and issued bonds to the amount of three hundred thousand dollars. This action is on the coupons for interest upon some of these bonds. The defendant pleads non est factum, to which plaintiff replies by denial, and by setting up that the county is estopped, 1st, by its having levied taxes and paid coupons up to 1872, making two or three payments; and 2d, by having received a certificate of its stock from the railroad company, and still holding it; whereby the plaintiff claims the case is brought within the decision in 13 Wall. Pendleton Co. v. Amy, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 297.

Upon the trial it appeared as follows: The county court made an order of subscription for the railroad stock, and appointed Mr. Birdseye, as the agent of the county, directing him to prepare the bonds, which were accordingly prepared and were issued under the order. The original bonds were printed and were signed by the presiding justice, and sealed with the seal of the county. The clerk was Hall, who had a deputy, Weyand. Hall being a dissipated man, Weyand attended to his duties and signed Hall's name with the knowledge of the presiding justice and of the county agent. These bonds did not receive favor because not printed in good style, and the county agent proposed to the presiding justice to substitute engraved bonds for the printed ones, and to this the presiding justice acceded. The old bonds were surrendered and destroyed by the presiding justice, as he testifies, and in January, 1871, new bonds were issued corresponding in terms and form with the old ones. Members of the county court had gone out of office and new members had come in, and Hall, the former clerk, had gone out of office and Weyand had become clerk.

The substituted bonds bore the same date with the former ones, and were signed by the same presiding justice and the same clerk, and this was at the instance and in the presence of the county agent to whom the matter had been especially intrusted by the county court. As the new bonds were made to bear the old date, Weyand still signed the name of Hall, his predecessor in office, for whom he had been deputy, and the signatures on the coupons were lithographed. These bonds were delivered by the presiding justice to the county agent, who proceeded to carry out his instructions.

The county paid interest on these new bonds in 1871 and 1872, and there was evidence that the county received a certificate of stock in the railroad company, not produced at the trial, but remaining in the possession of the county. The county court ordered the subscription to be made, and the bonds to be executed by the presiding justice, and attested by the clerk and the seal of the county. The statutes of Missouri make no provisions as to the mode in which these securities shall be executed.

The only irregularities presented in this case are, 1st, the substitution of new for old bonds; and 2d, the signing by Weyand of Hall's name as clerk. The question is then, whether the plea of non est factum is supported by proof of these irregularities.

If the statute provided expressly the mode in which these securities must be issued, the question, in case of non-conformity with its requirements, would be more difficult. The bonds were ordered to be attested by the clerk, but what was done afterwards in levying taxes and payment of interest makes a waiver of that part of the order, and the county is now estopped in relation thereto.

These irregularities are not so great as in the Winnebago Case in Iowa, decided by the United States supreme court. 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 6. The county judge there issued bonds which were objected to in New York, and he, as county judge and agent in New York, more than 1,000 miles from his official residence, had a new county seal made, cancelled the old bonds and issued new bonds in substitution. The power of a county judge in Iowa is no greater than of the county court in Missouri. Here there are no checks on the judges, and no fraud is alleged, and the county suffered no wrong. The feature of the substitution is much worse in the Winnebago County Case.

In reaching these conclusions our views are strengthened by the order made of record by the Vernon county court, declaring its reasons for not paying its interest. They were not the substitution of bonds, or the informality of execution, but solely on a ground not here taken in defense, namely, that the railroad company did not complete its main line according to contract. Again, we deem the acts and participation of the county agent of importance, and the county is to be held to know what he and the presiding justice knew. The failure to give notice of the special term of the county court is of no importance whatever.

The bonds recite their issue under the Tebo and Neosho Railroad charter, and if as we hold in this case they are the bonds of the county, no failure in the performance of duty on the part of the officers can affect the rights of bona fide holders.

We find for the plaintiff for the amount of his coupons, with interest from maturity. Judgment accordingly.

In Pennington v. Baehr [48 Cal. 565], July term, 1874, the supreme court of California decided that coupons may be signed by a printed fac simile of maker's autograph, although not expressly authorized by statute.

TRESPASS VI ET ARMIS — EVIDENCE THEREUNDER —QUARE CLAUSUM FREGIT.

1. In a suit to recover for injury done to personal property the plaintiff must show what property was injured, and that the defendant participated in said injury, either in person or by his advice and counsel.

2. In an action of trespass vi et armis the plaintiff cannot recover for any damages done to real property.

At law.

Brent & Brent, for plaintiff.

Jos. H. Bradley, for defendant.

BY THE COURT (charging jury). In the original case the declaration contained three counts. The first and third were, that the defendant, with force and arms, seized, &c., the goods and chattels of the plaintiff. In the second he is charged with having, with force and arms, broke and entered a certain shanty, &c., of the plaintiff situate in the county of Washington. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and issue was joined on that plea. On the trial the court refused to permit the plaintiff to give in evidence, that the defendant came to the shanty of the plaintiff, in Alleghany county, Maryland, with a large force of armed men, and also to show the value of the goods. Exceptions were taken to the above ruling, and the case went to the supreme court through a writ of error. The supreme court sustained the exceptions taken by the plaintiff, and remanded the cause for further proceedings. [1 How. (42 U. S.) 241.]

On the mandate of the supreme court being received, the declaration was amended as follows: "And therefore the said Bernard McKenna, by Brent & Brent, his attorneys, complains for that heretofore, to wit, on the first day of September, A. D. 1839, at Washington county, in the District of Columbia, the said Charles B. Fisk, with force and arms, seized, took and carried away, certain goods, chattels, bonds, promissory notes, accounts, evidences of debt and choses in action, to wit: one thousand gallons of spirituous liquors of different kinds, two thousand pounds of coffee, and one thousand pounds of tea, four hundred suits of clothing ready-made for sale, two hundred bushels of Indian corn, all the promissory notes and accounts of sundry persons due to said Bernard to the amount of at least four hundred dollars, a large quantity of household furniture, beds and bedding, and kitchen utensils, all of which said goods, chattels, bonds, promissory notes, accounts, evidences of debt and choses in action, then and there belonging to said plaintiff, the property of said plaintiff, of great value, to wit, of the value of two thousand dollars, current money of the United States, the said defendant then and there converted and disposed of to his own use, and other wrongs to the said plaintiff then and there did, against the peace, government and dignity of the United States. (2) And also, for that, heretofore, to wit, on the first day of September, A. D. 1841, at the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, the said defendant, with force and arms broke to pieces, spoiled, damaged and destroyed certain other goods, chattels, bonds, promissory notes, accounts, evidences of debt and choses in action, to wit, bottles, decanters, barrels, casks, hogsheads, jugs and demijohns containing one thousand gallons of spirituous liquors of different kinds, and also destroyed one thousand pounds coffee, two hundred pounds of tea, one hundred suits of ready-made clothing, two hundred bushels of Indian corn, sundry promissory notes, bonds, bills and accounts due to the plaintiff, from sundry persons, to the amount of five hundred dollars and a large quantity of planks, timber, shingles and lumber of the said plaintiff of great value, to wit, of the value of two thousand dollars, current money of the United States, then and there being, and other wrongs to the said plaintiff then and there did against the peace, government and dignity of the United States. Whereby the goods, chattels, bonds, promissory notes, evidences of debt, accounts, choses in action, and effects particularly described in the first and second counts hereof, of the value above mentioned, were wholly lost to said plaintiff, wherefore, the said plaintiff saith he is the worse, and hath sustained damage to the value of four thousand dollars, and therefore he brings suit."

The defendant pleaded "not guilty"; on which plea issue was joined.

The plaintiff to sustain the issue on his side joined, produced a certain James McGratt, a competent witness, who being duly sworn, said, that he was not present when the alleged trespass was committed, but arrived on the ground some time after; that on his reaching the premises of plaintiff he found his house in the possession of the militia; that the house, or shanty, was then unroofed, the casks which held liquor out on the ground, the liquor running from the heads, which had been apparently bored through; the papers and ready-made clothing scattered about in the house; that there were many citizens there; that the defendant was there, and witness saw him passing through the military and talking with them, as if giving orders, but could not hear what he said; that he was on the premises the preceding day, when the militia were also there, but witness did not see defendant there; that plaintiff was taken and carried away, and about a week after witness saw him in jail at Cumberland, ironed, and afterward saw him at large about five weeks after. To all which testimony relating to the acts of the preceding day, and the imprisonment of plaintiff, defendant objected; but the court overruled the objection, and suffered the evidence to go to the jury; to which defendant, by his counsel, objected. The plaintiff having given said evidence, the defendant then proved, on cross-examination of said witness, that the plaintiff had admitted the recovery and sale himself of a barrel of whiskey spoken of by said witness in his examination-in-chief as having been injured or destroyed by defendant, which had been taken, with the other articles mentioned in the declaration, by the defendant. Whereupon, the plaintiff asked the witness to state all that the plaintiff said at the same time in regard to the injuries complained of in the declaration; but the court refused to allow such question to be put, or the same to be answered; and the plaintiff excepted to such refusal.

After reciting certain evidence, the following prayers were, by the counsel for the plaintiff, asked to be given as instructions to the jury: "That the act of Maryland, named in the evidence and the proceedings offered in evidence by the defendant, do not justify the trespasses committed on plaintiff's personal property, if the jury shall find from the evidence that said trespasses were committed by the defendant and those with whom he acted, provided they further find that at the time of said alleged trespasses the plaintiff was absent in the custody of the civil authorities, and that there was no person in his shanty at the time of entering the same, as described in the evidence, and committing said alleged trespass. That the plaintiff is entitled to recover for any trespasses mentioned in the declaration and proved, if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the defendant was present ordering and abetting said trespasses, unless the jury should be of opinion that the said trespasses were all of them absolutely necessary to suppress the disturbances on the line of said canal. That if the jury find from the evidence that defendant is guilty of the trespasses as alleged in the declaration, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for the injury done to the personal property of the plaintiff by such trespasses, notwithstanding the jury may find that plaintiff afterwards recovered the whole of the personal property so trespassed upon. Should the jury be of the opinion from the evidence that the plaintiff was keeping a store on the line of the canal, as stated in the evidence, in a public manner, for the sale of liquors, groceries, dry goods and other articles, the presumption of the law is, that he had license for so doing, as the law directs, to sell said liquors, groceries, &c., and that it is not incumbent upon said plaintiff to produce said license, unless the contrary be proved, because the question arises incidentally in the cause, and no notice appears to have been given to the plaintiff to produce the license. Should the jury be satisfied from the evidence that the plaintiff sustained any damage, be it ever so small, by the conduct of the defendant, as stated in the declaration, or of those with whom he acted in the absence of proof of special damage, the law presumes a nominal damage to the plaintiff, and entitles him to a verdict in his favor. That in such case, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, as damages, whatever the jury shall find from the evidence to have been the value to the plaintiff of the powder and liquors totally destroyed, at the time and place of its destruction, and also whatever they shall find to have been the damage done to the other goods and property of the plaintiff, which were not actually destroyed, as stated in the evidence, valuing the goods and property also at the time and place, when and where they were so damaged. In ascertaining the actual loss of the plaintiff by the destruction of the liquors mentioned in the testimony, the jury are not to consider the profits he might possibly, or would probably, have made by the sale of the said liquors, by small quantities, from time to time, but the damages are to be measured by the amount which the liquors were worth, by the barrel or cask, at the time and place of its destruction, and upon the same principle the jury are to ascertain the value of the powder or other property actually destroyed. That the plaintiff is also, in addition, entitled to recover such damages as the jury may be of opinion from the evidence is a fair compensation to him for the disorder and interruption of his business, occasioned by the destruction of his property. That in addition to the damages referred to in the preceding instructions, the jury may give such other and further damages for the plaintiff as under all the circumstances appearing in evidence they may be of opinion is right and proper, provided they think any damage, in addition to the actual damage, right and proper upon the whole evidence; which the court gave as prayed. And the defendant, by his counsel, objected to the granting of the said instructions, each and every of them.

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant, acting in concert with a body of armed men, came to the house of the plaintiff, in his absence, while he was in custody, and without his consent and against his will, obtained entrance thereto by threatening to break down the door; that the party with whom the defendant was acting, in his presence and with his consent, threatened to burn the house in a short time, in consequence of which entry and threat the goods of the plaintiff were removed with the consent of the defendant and his confederates, by certain persons having no authority from plaintiff to remove his goods from his said house, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover any damages stated in the declaration which he may have sustained by reason of such removal, notwithstanding the acts of the legislature of Maryland, read in evidence, and the military orders and proceedings given in evidence. And notwithstanding there may have been rioting and disturbances at plaintiff's said house previous to said alleged trespasses."

This was given with the following qualification: "Unless the jury should find from the evidence that there was insurrection and disturbances as stated by the justices; that the plaintiff participated in the said insurrection and disturbances, or that the said rioting and disturbances at his house were by his permission, and that the injury done to said property was necessary for the purpose of effecting the suppression of said insurrection."

After offering certain evidence, the defendant, by his counsel, prayed the court to instruct the jury that if the jury shall find from the said evidence that an insurrection actually existed on the line of the canal in Alleghany county, at the time of the alleged trespasses; that said insurrection was attended with such violence as to endanger the lives and property of the peaceable inhabitants of the vicinity; and if they shall believe that the military authorities were called out and acted in the manner exhibited in said evidence; and if the jury shall further believe that the militia so called out and so acting did nothing more, and inflicted no other or further injury to property than such as they then reasonably thought was necessary to quell said insurrection, then the jury may find for the defendant.

If from the evidence the jury shall find that the property stated in the declaration was destroyed by being removed from the shanty of the plaintiff by the friends of the said plaintiff, in order to preserve it from injury, and the apprehension that the said shanty was about to be immediately destroyed by a detachment of military, and the said shanty was not in fact destroyed; that the said military had been called out in the manner stated in the evidence, and were under the command of said Barnes, also mentioned in said evidence, then the said plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action, although the jury shall further find that said defendant, being present with said military detachment, advised and counselled the destruction of the said shanty; which instruction the court (Judge THRUSTON, absent), refused to give. And the defendant, by his counsel, excepted to the said refusals of the court severally.

The following instructions asked for on the part of the defendant were given by the court: That in this action the plaintiff cannot recover for any damages done to real property, and consequently cannot recover for any injury done to the shanty. That before he can recover for any injury done to personal property he must show by evidence what property was in fact injured; and that defendant, either in person or by his counsel and advice, participated in such trespasses.

The jury brought in a verdict for the defendant.

Case No. 8,853.

McKENNEY et al. v. BAKER.

[2 Hask. 130.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. Jan., 1877.

BANKRUPTCY — RENEWED COMMERCIAL PAPER — RETIRED TRADER—ACCOMMODATION PAPER.

1. Renewed commercial paper subjects a trader to the same legal consequences under the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] that the original promise did.

2. A retired trader, who gives his negotiable promissory note for a trade debt, does not commit an act of bankruptcy by suspending payment of the same, for it is not his commercial paper, made and passed in trade.

3. Accommodation paper, signed by a trader, is not his commercial paper under the amendment of 1874 [18 Stat. 178].

In bankruptcy. Petition by the creditors of Jacob C. Baker, charging him with an act of bankruptcy in the non payment of his negotiable promissory note for the period of forty days after it fell due, the same having been made and passed by him in the business of a trader. Baker answered,, denying that he was a trader when he gave the note, or that the same was his own commercial paper, or that he made and passed the same in the business of a trader. The cause was heard upon petition, answer and proof.

William L. Putnam, for petitioners.

Hanno W. Gage and Sewall C. Strout, for respondent.

FOX, District Judge. This is a proceeding by the creditors of Mr. Baker to have him adjudged a bankrupt, "for that being a merchant and trader, he has suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper for more than forty days." The commercial paper thus overdue is set forth in the petition as three notes of Baker, amounting in the aggregate to $2,000, all bearing date of November 16, 1875, payable by Baker to Chas. W. McKenney or order in three months, and given for lumber sold by McKenney to Baker.

In his answer, Mr. Baker denies that he was a merchant or trader at the giving of said notes, and says that the same were not his commercial paper, within the meaning of the bankrupt law, but were made by him for the accommodation of A. L. Hobson and for his benefit, and were to be paid by Hobson at their maturity.

It appears in evidence that for some years prior to May, 1875, Mr. Baker had been a trader in Portland, dealing in pressed hay, straw, flour, short lumber and potatoes, shipping to Southern ports these various articles as the markets might justify; that on one or two occasions only, and many years since, had he shipped lumber of any kind to the West Indies.

It did not appear that he had ever traded in heading in any way until the transaction with McKenney in May, 1875. It was not questioned that on the afternoon of May 3, 1875, Baker sold out his entire stock in trade to O'Brien, and gave up to him his counting room and place of business, continuing to occupy desk room there for a short time to close up his accounts, but not being engaged in trade. On the third day of May, 1875, A. L. Hobson, who was the brother-in-law of Baker and then engaged in the West India trade, was desirous of obtaining from C. W. McKenney, a manufacturer of lumber, 25,000 pair of heading. McKenney, not being satisfied with Hobson's credit, was unwilling to sell the heading to Hobson, but would sell to Baker; during the forenoon of that day, May 3d, it was agreed between these parties that Baker should purchase the heading of McKenney, and that he should receive for it the notes of Baker from time to time as the heads were delivered, to be brought in on the cars from Buxton at McKenney's charge, but in the name and to the address of Baker. Hobson agreed with Baker to pay his notes given to McKenney as they should fall due. The heads were all delivered as agreed, and with the assent of Baker, were received by Hobson and by him disposed of. On the thirteenth of May there was $2,000 due to McKenney for heading delivered under this contract, and on that day he called on Baker for his note for that sum, which he received and caused to be discounted. When it fell due, it was renewed by Baker, and the renewal note not being paid, the three notes of Baker described in this petition, amounting to $2,000, were received therefor by McKenney and have never been paid.

The notes of Baker now held by McKenney, being renewals of one received for the note of $2,000 given by Baker to McKenney May 13, 1875, it is claimed by the petitioners that under the bankrupt act the court must look to the date of the original note; that the rights and liabilities of the parties are to be determined as of that date; that the renewals are not to be considered as payments of the primary note, but as mere extensions from time to time of the original liability; and that the question here to be decided depends upon whether the note given by Baker on the thirteenth of May is to be deemed his commercial paper made or passed by him in the course of his business as a trader.

In the opinion of the court, the new security must be regarded as a substitute for the original note. This, in reality, has never been paid, but the time of its payment has been extended, and the party has not, by such an extension, been discharged from any liability under the bankrupt act, to which he was subjected by the original promise; but he remains charged with all the legal consequences which the note of May 13th imposed upon him. Such was the opinion of the lord justices in Ex parte Griffiths [3 De Gex, M. & G. 175] hereinafter referred to, a case in this respect parallel with the present.

Was this note of May 13th Baker's commercial paper made and passed by him as a trader? It is not claimed that at that date he was then in fact a trader, engaged in trade as before, or carrying on business excepting in completing the purchase of the heading; but it is urged that on May 3d, in the forenoon, he was in trade as he had been for years, and as a trader, then contracted to purchase of McKenney the heading; that from time to time McKenney under and by virtue of and in performance of this contract sent forward to Baker's address the heading; and that in this behalf Baker's dealings as a trader were not completed and determined until all the heading was delivered and paid for; and that in all that he did under this contract in receiving the heads by his agent, Hobson, and in giving the note of August 13th, he was acting as a trader; that although he might have previously withdrawn from his other business, until payment was actually received for the heading, he could not by thus retiring from trade exonerate himself from the consequences growing out of this transaction.

Taking this transaction singly and alone, I am of opinion under the peculiar circumstances attending it, that it would hardly have constituted Baker a trader within the law. While the title to the heads did numerically vest in Baker, and he agreed to become accountable to McKenney for the payment of the agreed price, yet it was part of the arrangement that this was all for the benefit and use of Hobson, who was to take care of the notes of Baker as they matured, and on this account was to receive the headings as they were delivered.

Baker was not to sell the heading to Hobson in the ordinary usual course of trade; but the actual trading was between McKenney and Hobson with a right to demand of Baker his negotiable paper for the property. In this way he became, in one view, the purchaser of the heading, but not for his own benefit; and it is beyond question that if this transaction was the only evidence to constitute Baker a trader, it would not be within the act. By his former dealings, and not by this, was he a trader on May 3d, and when he entirely withdrew from the business he had before carried on, his carrying out the contract with McKenney, so far as he was required by its terms, did not continue him in trade as a trader within the purpose of the bankrupt law.

It is said that having been a trader May 3d, he could not, by abandoning trade, devest himself of the consequences resulting from such occupation, and that he remained a trader until the debts he owed when a trader were all discharged. Great reliance is placed upon the case of Ex parte Griffiths, 3 De Gex, M. & G. 175, before the lord justices. In that case a trader contracted a bond debt in 1839. He continued a trader until 1848. Judgment was recovered on the bond in 1850. Lord Justice Knight Bruce, in his opinion, says: "I apprehend that by the spirit and intent of the bankrupt law, according to principle equally and authority, these two rules are clearly established: First, that a trader, who, after becoming indebted, leaves off trading, is not to be heard to say to his creditors that the trading has been left off, if a question arises whether the debtor can or cannot be as a trader made bankrupt; secondly, that a bond, in the case of a simple contract, or a judgment in the case of a specialty, which for many purposes extinguishes (though not satisfying) the original debt, does not do so as against the creditor for the purpose of disabling him from making his debtor a bankrupt on the original debt, remaining in every sense, or in every other sense, unsatisfied."

Lord Justice Turner (page 178) says: "Then it is said that the respondent is not a trader under the 72d section of the bankrupt law consolidation act, because he ceased to trade in 1848; but as he had been a trader, and the debt existed during the trading, he must be considered as a trader still, so long as the debt is not paid."

The same principles are recognized in Stronge v. Hawkes, 3 De Gex & J. 70. In Bailie v. Grant, 9 Bing. 122, Chief Justice Tyndal, says: "The debt contracted before trade, but remaining unpaid at and after the time the debtor enters into trade, appears to us to be a subsisting debt for every purpose and subject to any consequences which belong to a debt originally contracted during trade."

The English bankrupt law then in force required as a foundation for proceedings against a trader for a commission in bankruptcy, that he should be indebted on a demand which was outstanding against him while he was, in fact, a trader; and under such circumstances, he was liable to be adjudged bankrupt, although he had left off trading. This liability, by reason of such indebtment as a trader having once attached, continued so long as the debt remained unsatisfied.

English decisions of a later date may perhaps create a doubt whether the same consequences would result under the bankrupt act, as in Ex parte Bailey, L. R. 13 Eq. 321. Bacon, C. J., says: "Then as to the point of the debt or some part of it having been contracted while the debtor was a trader, I am of opinion that the existing statute has, in this respect, no retrospective operation, and that it speaks of and refers only to such persons as, at the time of its commencement, were, or should afterwards become traders."

In Wms. Bankr. Prac. 24, in commenting on this language, the learned authors say: "It would seem clear that if the existence of debts contracted whilst in trade is in itself sufficient to constitute a man a trader, no question as to whether the act was retrospective would have arisen in this case, because trade debts were still existing at the time of the petition, which was in 1871, and therefore, this case would seem to be an authority that under the present act actual present trading was necessary."

In Re Schomberg, 10 Ch. App. 174, each of the lord justices declares that the language of the act, "the debtor being a trader has for the space of seven days &c.," must mean a trader at the time the summons was served; but as I read the case, the learned justices found that the debtor in that case was not a trader at the contracting of the debt or subsequently, so that the question as to the effect of the existence of a debt whilst a trader did not arise.

In my opinion however, it is not essential for the purposes of the present case to determine whether or not under the present bankrupt law of England the rule is different from that established by the decisions under former acts. Conceding that a commission in bankruptcy could in the English tribunals now be sustained by an act of bankruptcy, committed by a trader after retiring from trade, the debt having been contracted by him in the course of his trading, I am of opinion that under the provisions of the bankrupt law as amended by congress, the party is not subject to be decreed a bankrupt for non payment of his negotiable paper, given by him after retiring from trade in settlement of a trade debt.

In England it may be necessary that there should be a debt outstanding, contracted or owing by him whilst in trade to subject the debtor to bankruptcy. This debt still continues after the party retires from trading. It remains a subsisting debt just as before, burdened with all the consequences which originally belonged to it while the party was in business. Thereafterwards no new consequences arise from its remaining unpaid, or attach to it afterwards; but it simply exists and continues, without change or modification, affecting the debtor as it did originally, but not increasing or diminishing his liability. As a trader he owed this debt. In that state it afforded a basis for bankruptcy proceedings, and by his ceasing to be longer a trader, the party ought not to be thereby relieved from any consequences to which he was then subjected on account of it.

Under our bankrupt act, so long as a party refrains from issuing his commercial paper as a trader, however much he may be indebted in other ways, he is not liable to any of the provisions of the bankrupt law, and on account of such other indebtment could never be adjudicated a bankrupt. Such liabilities do not afford any foundation for proceedings in bankruptcy against a trader; and while they are subsisting debts for every purpose, and subject to every consequence which belongs to a debt originally contracted during trade, they do not entail any other consequences than those which exist while the party remains a trader.

If a trader under our law is liable to be subjected to bankruptcy on account of his general indebtedness, and should withdraw from trade, he would still remain liable to be put into bankruptcy so long as such debts are unsatisfied; but as by our law a trader is not liable to be thrown into bankruptcy on account of such debts, but only when the same are merged in commercial paper does the liability of bankruptcy follow, after it has been made and passed by a trader, and he has allowed it to remain overdue and unpaid the forty days made requisite by the act. If such paper is not put in circulation by a trader during the time he is actually in trade, it would be a strained and forced construction of our statute to hold that if made and passed months or years after withdrawal from trade, in discharge of a trade debt, it thereby becomes within the act commercial paper, then made and passed by a trader in the business of trade, when for years he had not bought or sold, in the way of trade, a dollar's worth of property.

A debt originally contracted by a trader may well be said to be a trade debt, due from a trader even when he has long been withdrawn from trade, and he continues liable to all the consequences, which attached to the debt in its then condition, but to none others; by giving his negotiable paper in settlement of the debt after he has retired from business, the relations of the parties ought not to be changed; each should stand as far forth as practicable in the positions they were previous to the making of the note, and thereby neither should acquire or lose any rights. Such is in fact the substance and effect of the English authorities, relied on by the petitioners. No one of them asserts that any new rights attach subsequently to the old debt; but they remain exactly as before, the debtor's ceasing to be a trader having no effect whatever; and in my view, such is the true construction of this provision of our law.

In the case of Re Jack [Case No. 7,119], before Woods, J., in the circuit court in Georgia, the head note is, "that a person, who gives a note when he has ceased to be a trader, does not commit an act of bankruptcy by suspending payment thereof, although the note is given for a debt contracted while he was a trader; for the law requires that he should be a trader at the time of making of the note." The opinion of the learned judge on this point is brief, and does not refer to any authorities, and the case was decided upon section 39 of the bankrupt act. It is similar to the present, and, being the judgment of the circuit judge, is of great weight, although not conclusive in another circuit.

The opinion of Hoffman, J., in Re Stevens [Case No. 13,393], it is claimed would lead to a different result. In that case, a firm were manufacturers; one member died; Stevens, the survivor, in settling the affairs of the firm and closing up its business, gave a draft in payment of a debt of the firm, contracted in the course of its business, which draft, having been protested, was the basis of the petition as an act of bankruptcy, and the petition was sustained. The report of the case is not very satisfactory. It does not appear but that Stevens still continued in business as a manufacturer after the death of his copartner; nor is it stated what was the nature of the debt for which the draft was given, whether it was or not commercial paper. The proceedings were prior to the amendatory act of 1874, by which, as I hold, the law in this respect was much limited and restricted, and the case of Re Stevens [supra] is therefore of but little assistance in the determination of the questions now before the court.

If this view of the law is erroneous, there still remains another ground upon which, as I think, this petition can not be sustained. I hold, that under the circumstances of the present case, this note of the respondent's of May 13th, can not, within the act, be considered "the commercial paper of Baker, made or passed in the course of his business as a trader."

The trade with McKenney for the heading was for Hobson's benefit solely; and he was to receive and dispose of it as he saw fit. McKenney was to have Baker's notes for the heading, but Hobson was to pay these notes as they matured, and they with their renewals are all entered among his "bills payable," and I am satisfied McKenney was cognizant of the agreement. All that he asked for was a direct and absolute claim upon Baker for the payments, and having obtained that, he was content, although he well understood that Hobson had agreed with Baker to protect him from these notes, and that Baker was not to be primarily liable, but that throughout the transaction, he was acting, not in his own behalf as the purchaser of the property, but simply for the advantage and accommodation of Hobson and as a guarantee of the payment by Hobson to McKenney.

Prior to the amendment of the bankrupt act in 1874, there existed a serious conflict in the decisions of the various tribunals upon the question whether one was liable to be adjudged a bankrupt by reason of non payment of negotiable paper to which he was a party for the accommodation of a third party. Since the passage of that amendment, I think the courts must decide that such paper is not brought within the act, and is not to be deemed the commercial paper of a trader made or passed by him in the course of his business as a trader. The object of this amendment was to restrict this liability within a much narrower range, and to confine it to a trader's own business paper by him negotiated in the course of, and directly connected with such business, and for his own purposes and benefit, and which he was bound to meet promptly at its maturity, and not to include what is known as accommodation paper which the party never expects to pay, and therefore does not ordinarily provide for as it falls due. Such paper would, of course, be provable against the estate if the debtor became bankrupt; but I can not think its non payment for forty days is now to be deemed an act of bankruptcy, as it is not his own business paper and does not arise or grow out of his business as a trader, but is wholly extraneous. Petition denied.

McKENTY v. UNIVERSAL LIFE INS. CO.

[3 Dill. 448; 3 Ins. Law J. 385; 6 Chi. Leg. News, 199; 4 Bigelow, Ins. Cas. 153.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. Jan. 7, 1874.

LIFE INSURANCE POLICY—INSURABLE INTEREST OF CREDITOR—SURRENDER—ACTION FOR BALANCE BY ADMINISTRATOR.

A policy of insurance was issued for $3,000 upon the life of a debtor, payable upon his death to his creditor: on the death of the assured, the creditor holding the policy received from the insurer $2,050.57, "in full of all claims under the policy," and surrendered it; afterwards the creditor assigned "all his right, title, and interest in the policy" to the administratrix of the assured, subject to the amount he had received from the company in payment of his debt. Held, that an action by the administratrix, under such assignment, against the insurer for the balance of the $3,000 could not be maintained.

The plaintiff [Johannah McKenty], administratrix of the estate of Henry McKenty, deceased, brought suit upon a policy issued on the latter's life by the defendant.

The following is a copy of the policy: "Universal Life Insurance Company, of New York. This policy of insurance witnesseth, that the Universal Life Insurance Company, in consideration of the representations made to them in the application therefor, and of the sum of $36.10, lawful money of the United States, first in hand paid by Henry McKenty, and of the quarter-annual payment of a like amount on or before the 14th days of October, January, April, and July, in every year during the continuance of this policy, at the office of said company in the city of New York, or to their agents, as hereinafter provided, do hereby promise and agree to pay to Charles H. Parker, the assured under this policy, his heirs, executors, or assigns, at their office aforesaid, the sum of three thousand dollars, lawful money of the United States (the balance of the current year's premium, if any, being first deducted therefrom), in thirty days after due notice and proof of the death of Henry McKenty, of San Francisco, in the county of San Francisco, and state of California, whereupon this policy shall cease and determine. * * * In witness whereof the said Universal Life Insurance Company have, by their president and secretary, signed and delivered this contract this fourteenth day of October, A. D. 1868. Wm. Walker, President. Jno. H. Bewley, Secretary."

Parker, the assured, was a creditor of McKenty, and after his death, on payment of his debt, executed the following receipt: "New York, February 26, 1870. Received from the Universal Life Insurance Company two thousand and fifty-six and 57/100 dollars, in full for all claims under the within policy, terminated by the death of Henry McKenty. C. H. Parker."

On receiving this amount, Parker surrendered the policy to the company. Afterwards, and on the 12th day of April, 1871, Parker executed the following assignment to the plaintiff, administratrix of the estate of her husband: "San Francisco, April 12, A. D. 1871. For value received I hereby assign to Mrs. Johannah D. McKenty, as administratrix of the estate of Henry McKenty, late of St. Paul, Ramsey county, Minnesota, deceased, all my right, title and interest in, to and by virtue of a certain policy of insurance number 5,736, dated October 14, 1868, made and issued by the 'Universal Life Insurance Company' of New York, to said Henry McKenty, then of San Francisco, California, for $3,000, payable to myself (Chas. H. Parker). This assignment being made to said Mrs. McKenty, as aforesaid, subject to the payment of the sum of about sixteen hundred dollars heretofore paid to me thereon by said company and receipted for by me. This assignment is made without recourse to me in any event or under any circumstances. Charles H. Parker."

On the trial the court ruled as shown in the opinion below given.

Gilfillan & Williams, for plaintiff.
Lorenzo Allis, for defendant.

NELSON, District Judge. This contract of insurance was effected by Parker, although the first premium appears to have been paid by McKenty. Parker was a creditor of Mc-

Kenty, and had such an insurable interest as would entitle him to recover in a suit against the company, had it refused payment to him.

The better opinion at this time is that policies of life insurance are not like fire and marine insurance, contracts of indemnity. The agreement is that in consideration of a certain annual, semi-annual or quarter-annual payment of money to the company, it will, on the death of the party whose life is insured, pay to the person named in the policy a certain amount therein specified.

It is unnecessary in this case to decide whether upon this policy the assured named therein could recover any more than his debt due at the time of the death of his debtor. This action is not brought by him as the beneficiary named in the policy, but by the administratrix of the estate of the deceased whose life was insured, and she seeks to recover the surplus over and above the amount paid to Parker by the company. It is undisputed that Parker was paid, on the death of McKenty, all that he claimed, and he has given a receipt in full of all demands against it, and surrendered the policy.

To sustain the demand made by the administratrix, it is urged that "Parker was a trustee for the estate of McKenty on his death for the amount of the policy, over and above his interest in it (which is said to be the amount of his debt), and that the receipt given by him in full of all demands, and the surrender of the policy can not affect the estate." I do not think the policy upon its face, or the testimony, shows that any one but Parker had an interest in it.

It was possible to effect an insurance so that a portion of the loss would go to the decedent's estate, and to have made the assured named in the policy a trustee to receive it; but there is nothing in the case to indicate that any such purpose was intended.

The plaintiff can not recover, under the assignment from Parker to her, after the latter had been paid by the company the full amount he claimed. At the death of McKenty, the right of action upon the policy belonged to Parker alone. He made his claim, and offered proofs to maintain it, was paid the amount and gave a receipt in full for all demands. That put an end to all his interest in the policy, and it is not possible for the plaintiff, who claims under an assignment made after this receipt was given, to recover anything more from the company. See Bliss, Ins. § 554; Rawls v. American Mut. Life Ins. Co., 27 N. Y. 282; [Insurance Co. v. Robertshaw, 26 Pa. St. 189.] [2]

Judgment for defendant.

On a motion for a new trial the court gave the following opinion:

NELSON, District Judge. This case is not to be governed by the common law rule defining what constitutes a good accord and satisfaction. Parker, the creditor and assured, did not urge a claim for or demand the full amount named in the policy, but agreed, on a sufficient consideration paid him, to exonerate the company from all further liability; received it, and gave his receipt in full, and surrendered the policy. This, in my opinion, had the effect of an absolute release, as much so as it would have been if a formal instrument had been drawn up and signed and sealed.

The old common law rule of accord and satisfaction was always considered technical, and unsupported by reason. Dewey, J. in Brooks v. White, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 283, says: "The foundation of the rule seems to be, that, in the case of an acceptance of a less sum of money in discharge of a debt, inasmuch as there is no consideration, no benefit accruing to the creditor, and no damage to the debtor, the creditor may violate with legal impunity his promise to his debtor, however freely and understandingly made." This is a rule founded on very poor morals to say the least, and it has been doubted whether it would apply to anything but a bond.

In Co. Litt. 212b, it is said, that "where the condition is for payment of twenty pounds, the obligor can not * * * pay a lesser sum in satisfaction of the whole, because it is apparent that a lesser sum can not be a satisfaction of a greater. But if the obligee do * * * receive part, and therefore make an acquittance, under seal, in full satisfaction of the whole, it is sufficient, by reason the deed amounteth to an acquittance of the whole." Thus we see that the common law rule was intended to secure only a settled and deliberate agreement to discharge the debt. When this appeared and was established, the acquittance of the whole is admitted.

A formal instrument under seal is not the only evidence in my opinion to establish a release. The surrender of the policy in this case by Parker, was, to say the least, prima facie evidence of an intention to release all claims under it, and when this fact is conceded, and a receipt in full of all demands is written upon the face of it, and signed by him, I think in law the company is absolutely discharged.

The other point presented, to-wit, that the construction of the contract, so far as the intention of the parties thereto, should have been left to the jury, is not tenable. The policy was the only evidence in the case to indicate what was the intention of the parties. There is no evidence outside to show that the assured was a trustee, and that when his debt was paid he must account for the balance of the amount specified in the policy. The question presented was, "what is the legal construction of the contract?" This the court decided and so charged the jury. Upon the conceded facts in the case, in the view taken by the court, there was no issue of fact for the jury to decide which would authorize a verdict for the plaintiff. See 2 Hare & Wallace's Notes to Smith's Leading Cases, p. 439. Motion denied.

McKENZIE et al. v. ANDERSON.

[2 Woods, 357.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Georgia. April Term, 1873.

EXECUTOR—BORROWING FROM ESTATE — INTEREST CHARGEABLE—MALADMINISTRATION—LOSS FROM VIS MAJOR—CONFEDERATE MONEY.

1. Where a trustee and executor, in entire disregard of the directions of the will, takes funds of the estate and treats himself as the borrower, he must be charged with the highest amount of interest allowed by the law. He is personally and absolutely responsible for the fund.

2. Mode of adjustment of accounts of executor and trustee, in case of maladministration.

3. For such public and national calamities as war, foreign or civil, and the vicissitudes of fortune which attend them, no individual, who does not incite them, is responsible.

4. An executor is not responsible for the loss of the funds received by him for dividends in Confederate money or notes, which, at the time, he was obliged to accept.

This was a bill filed by the legatees of William J. Scott, residing in Great Britain, against [G. W.] Anderson, the executor, for an account, and for a change of trustee. William J. Scott, a resident of Savannah, Georgia, was possessed of a considerable real and personal estate in said city, and made his will, dated October 6, 1823, and a codicil thereto, dated June 4, 1829, by which, after constituting the defendant and others as executors and trustees, he devised and bequeathed to them all his estate in trust: First, to convert the same into money unless invested in good mortgages or government funds, and with the proceeds to pay his debts and funeral expenses; secondly, to invest the residue in the public stock or funds of Great Britain, the United States, or any individual states, or any municipal corporation, or in the capital stock or shares of any chartered bank, or upon real estate, as they might in their discretion think proper; thirdly, fourthly, etc., to pay one-half the income and profits of said estate to his daughter Elizabeth (one of the complainants, wife of William McKenzie), during her life; and after her death, the said half of his estate to such child or children of either of his daughters, or their issue, as his daughter Elizabeth should by will appoint; and to pay the other half of said income and profits to his daughter Kezia now deceased, the mother of the other complainants, for her life; and after her decease, to pay the said half of his estate to such child or children of either of his daughters as his daughter Kezia should by will appoint; and if either daughter should die intestate, then to pay and divide her moiety to and among her children and their issue, if any, share and share alike. The testator further empowered his executors to call in any debts or securities which to them might appear unsafe or insecurely invested, and to invest the same or the proceeds thereof according to the directions before given. The testator died in 1830, and the defendant proved the will on the 3d day of November in that year, and took possession of the estate, amounting, as stated by the bill, in real estate, to the value of $24,000, and in personal estate to $48,323.20. The bill further stated the marriage of the daughters, Elizabeth, to William McKenzie, and Kezia, to Richard R. Manson; and the death of Kezia intestate, leaving her surviving the complainants, Richard R. Manson and Elizabeth R. Gordon, there being then no other children of either of said daughters of the testator, nor any children's children. The bill charges that large sums of money came into the executor's hands, which he failed to invest as directed by the will, but applied the same to his own use; that he has failed to pay over the interest as directed; that he invested large sums in Confederate States bonds, which he had no right to do; that he continued to keep a large amount invested in the stock of a banking corporation, to wit: the Planters' Bank, of Georgia, of which he was president, the assets of which were used for the benefit of the Confederate States government, whilst it was his duty to have changed said investment; and the failure to do so resulted in a great loss to the estate; that he kept large balances in his hands which he might have invested, and so lost the interest thereof, and then invested the same in Confederate bonds, which became worthless. Other delinquencies are charged which it is not necessary to specify.

The answer stated that the real estate sold for only $21,000, and that the personal estate was appraised at $45,895, a copy of the inventory being annexed to the answer. The answer further stated that of this amount, the sum of $3,497.96 was decreed to be the property of the two children and was paid over to them, and that certain other items did not produce the amount of the appraisement. The defendant appended to his answer a copy of his whole account from 1830, down to the time of filing the bill, and this account furnished the materials from which, with the aid of some further extraneous evidence, a satisfactory disposition of this case could be made. He admitted, and his accounts and testimony showed, that he received large amounts of money belonging to the corpus of the estate, arising from the sale of lands and other sources, which he loaned out on personal security, without investing the same as directed by the will. But he contended that he paid over the interest thereof, and that they were loaned out at greater profit in that way, than they could have been in any other manner. He admitted that on the 9th day of June, 1863, he invested the sum of $23,000 in Confederate States bonds, and on the 15th of January, 1864, the further sum of $1,010 in like securities; that this was money received by him in Confederate treasury notes for loans then due, part of the corpus of the estate, which he was authorized to receive in this form by a statute of Georgia; and that the purchase of the bonds was sanctioned by an order of the superior court of Chatham county, Georgia, made in May term, 1863; and that he still held the said bonds. He further stated that from and after the year 1861, all the rents, issues and income of the estate were received in Confederate treasury notes—a part of which were in his hands. He further stated that from 1864 to 1866 there was no income which came to his hands, and only a few hundred dollars thereafter, of which he gave a detailed statement. He admitted that he invested largely, to the extent of 244 shares, in the Planters' Bank of Georgia, of which he was president, and could not, in his judgment, have made a better investment. He admitted that said bank made large loans to the Confederate States of America, of which he gave a list; but said that it was forced to do so by law and public opinion. He denied that the failure of the bank was due to these loans; but insisted that it was caused by the statute of Georgia which compelled the bank to receive the treasury notes of Georgia and the Confederate States in payment of all dues to the bank. By an amended answer he said that the Confederate bonds purchased by him were not purchased from the government, but from private individuals in the market.

Upon this bill and answer the matter was referred to a master, who made a long report to which both parties excepted; and it was upon these exceptions that the case was heard.

H. R. Jackson, for complainants.

T. E. Lloyd and W. S. Chisholm, for defendants.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. It appears from the master's report and from the defendant's accounts and evidence, that the $23,000 invested in Confederate States bonds was a sum of money, part of the corpus of the estate which had accumulated in the defendant's hands many years before, as far back as 1840, and had been accumulating several years before that time, and which he had never invested in accordance with the directions of the will; but which, he alleges, he loaned out from time to time to individuals on their personal security, and which was all paid in Confederate treasury notes in 1863. It further appears that the balance of the estate had been invested by the defendant in bank stock of the Savannah Bank, including a few shares of railroad stock; that these investments commenced soon after the commencement of the trust, and were continued from time to time as funds came into his hands from the sale of lands and other sources. In 1840, these investments stood as follows:. bank stocks and railroad stocks whose par value was $47,400, and which had cost the trust fund the sum of $44,958. These investments remained unchanged down to the time of filing the bill in this case. In 1848, on occasion of receiving an extra dividend of $1,600 from the Marine Bank, the amount was invested in thirty-two additional shares in said bank. One complaint made by the complainants is, that these investments should have been changed when the Civil War rendered them precarious. With the exception of the railroad stock, they are now a total wreck and loss. The $23,000 was an additional amount which the executor retained in his hands, and which he alleges that he loaned out on personal security as before mentioned. His accounts contain annual credits of interest for moneys loaned, which he says were the moneys in question. These credits are always in a single sum, and from the year 1848 down to the period of the war, they were invariably the sum of $1,489.25. From 1842 to 1847 inclusive, they were $1,540. Prior to 1842, they were for less sums according to the amount which the defendant contends was thus lent out on personal security. These several sums prior to 1848 were just the amount of 7 per cent. on certain round sums of principal.

Now with regard to this account, the complainants contend: 1. That the defendant never gave credit for interest on the full amount remaining in his hands. 2. That, instead of simple interest, he ought to be charged with compound interest on the amounts actually remaining, or that ought to be, in his hands, because, as they contend, he used this money himself, and is guilty of gross misconduct and breach of trust in not investing it pursuant to the directions of the will. 3. That he ought to be charged with eight per cent. instead of seven per cent. up to 1846. But the accounts further show that in addition to the standing sum of $23,000, for which the executor allowed annual interest, an additional amount gradually accumulated in his hands over and above his remittances to the legatees.

These accumulations increased from $22.52, in 1843, to $21,278.21 in 1864. There was a sudden increase of this balance in 1851, from $2,794.78 to $6,454.11, and it rose in 1855 to as high as $20,000, but was reduced back in 1859 to $3,000. The cause of this is explained to be, that in 1850 Mrs. Manson, one of testator's daughters, died; and the executor says that no one appeared with proper authority to receive her portion of the income, and, therefore, he was obliged to keep it in his hands, ready at any moment to be paid over; and that when Mrs. Manson's children came of age he paid over to them the income belonging to them, which they received at his hands. He insists that they are now precluded from making any objections to the course pursued by him. The complainants insist that he ought to account for the interest on these balances. After 1861, it will be observed that the balance grew rapidly, till in 1864, it reached the amount of $21,278.21. The defendant says that the existence of the war and the blockade prevented him from making any remittances; and that he was obliged to receive the income during this period in Confederate state moneys and securities, in which he now has the said final balance on hand. As before stated, the complainants insist that the bank stock ought to have been disposed of and changed into some safe investment; and that the $23,000 ought not to have been invested in Confederate securities; but that the defendant is responsible for it on several grounds.

These are the principal facts and points in the case. The conclusions to which the master came, and which appear in his report, were: 1. That the defendant was not bound to change the investments of bank stock. 2. That he is responsible for the sum of $23,075, to be charged against him in 1863, in gold, with simple interest, and that he cannot claim credit for the investment of that sum in Confederate securities. 3. That he is chargeable with simple interest on the amounts of income of the moiety of the estate belonging to Mrs. Manson's children, whilst they remained in his hands. 4. That the dividends from stocks received by him in Confederate money should be "scaled down" according to Barber's Table, and that the balance of the account, when so amended, should be charged against the defendant.

By a supplementary report, the master states that on reflection he concludes that the defendant should not be charged at all with the dividends which the banks had paid him in Confederate money, because it was not his fault that such currency was paid to him; and that the evidence shows him to be still in possession of such notes so paid him.

Without going largely into the reasons which have influenced my judgment in this matter, I will proceed to state the conclusions to which I have come. I think the defendant is chargeable with the balances of principal money in his hands, from 1832 down to 1861, as for money used by him for his own purposes. The amount of interest annually credited by him was always invariably seven per cent. on a certain amount for the entire year. For several years, it was on $10,000, $12,000, $16,000, $18,000, and $20,000; for many years in succession, it was on precisely $22,000; and for more than twenty years, in succession it was seven per cent. on $23,000, less seven and one-half per cent. commissions. Now is it credible that these precise amounts were kept out on loan at precisely seven per cent. for precisely the entire year? It is impossible to think so. The defendant evidently charged himself with seven per cent. on the amount which he chose to regard as the proper amount to be out on interest. This was nothing else than borrowing the money himself. He treated himself as the borrower. What he did with the money does not appear, except from his general allegation that he lent it out. He cannot, when under oath, remember a single person to whom he lent it. It is manifest that he took it for his own use, on his own responsibility, and at his own risk. And he certainly did so in entire disregard of the directions of the will. He may not have meant wrong personally. He may have allowed to the legatees all the interest that he realized himself; nay, he may have allowed them more than he realized. He clearly did not account to them for what he did realize. It is impossible that his loanings and turnings of the money could have exactly produced just that uniform sum every year. His own accounts prove most conclusively that he used the money himself. He may have loaned it out to others; but where is the account of those transactions? They were never rendered. They were never kept. Under such circumstances the presumption must be taken most strongly against him. He must be charged with the highest amount of interest allowed by the law; and the secret deduction of seven and one-half per cent. for commissions must be disallowed. The rate of interest to be charged, therefore, will be, according to the decisions of the courts of this state, eight per cent. down to January 1, 1846, and seven per cent. from that date to 1863. The law, it is true, says six per cent. compound interest after January 1, 1854; but the executor concedes that he made seven per cent. with the money, and he must be charged at that rate. It follows as a necessary corollary to this view of the case that the executor is personally and absolutely responsible for this fund. It is a debt due from him to the trust fund. No inquiry need be made as to the regularity of the investment of the $23,000 in 1863. That investment cannot avail the executor in the least. By his own breach of trust, the money, if belonging to the estate at all, was lying around on personal security in temporary loans. But it did not belong to the estate; it belonged to him. He had made himself the borrower of it; and, under those circumstances, he cannot discharge himself by procuring such securities as Confederate bonds, in a time of civil war, the fate of which was to decide whether they were worth any thing or not.

In reforming the account upon the principles which I have stated, I do not deem it necessary to assume different balances of principal on which to calculate interest from those on which the executor allowed it prior to 1840. It will only be necessary to charge him with the additional one per cent. on the sums which he admits were at interest. He was entitled to some little margin on his balances, to allow him time to make investments. And, upon a careful examination of the account, I do not find that the actual balances prior to 1840 much exceeded the amounts on which he allowed interest in the account. From 1840 to 1847, inclusive, he ought to be charged with interest on $23,000 instead of $22,000; for that amount was in his hands during that period. After 1847, he should be charged with the full seven per cent. on $23,000, without deducting the seven and one-half per cent. commissions, and no commissions are to be allowed on the excess of interest to be accounted for. The excess of interest to be thus charged in reforming the account should be compounded, with annual rests, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, down to January 1, 1854, and at the rate of six per cent. per annum after that time; and the accounting is to be brought down to the present time; for the executor still owes this money. I do not deem it necessary to state the account on a specie basis, as distinguished from legal currency. Compound interest must be allowed on the recognized principles applicable to such cases as the present. The language of the supreme court of this state in Fall v. Simmons, 6 Ga. 272, aptly expresses the general law on this subject: "Liability to pay simple interest is the rule, compounding is the exception. If the trustee applies the fund to his own benefit in trade, or sells trust stocks and applies the proceeds to his own use, or refuses to follow the directions of the deed creating the trust, as to investments, or conducts himself fraudulently in the management of the funds, and in all other instances depending upon like principles, chancery will direct the compounding of the interest." See, also, Williams, Ex'rs (Ed. 1859) p. 1676, and note. I do not think that the act of 1847 (Cobb, New Dig. 336) is intended to control the operation of equity in such cases. It is the object of that statute to lay down the rule that shall govern the question of interest in ordinary cases. The court is asked to disallow the ordinary commissions of two and one-half per cent. charged by the executor in his accounts. This I do not think we are called upon to do. The general management of the estate by the executor, independent of the $23,000, has been successful and productive of a generous income. Whilst the court has the power to disallow this item in cases of misconduct, the circumstances of the case do not, in my judgment, call for it.

When the account has been thus reformed, it will appear that the balances of interest accumulated in the executor's hands from 1843 to the breaking out of the Civil War were larger than is shown by the accounts. These balances at one time, after the death of Mrs. Manson, grew to be very large, and the complainants ask that the executor may be charged with interest upon them. He, on the contrary, insists that he had to keep the money ready to be paid over at any time when a person should come forward with the proper authority to demand it. The executor knew precisely what the difficulty was, and that no person could be qualified to receive the money until the children came of age, without getting letters of guardianship in this state, of the application for which he, as the agent of the parties, would receive timely information. To pretend that he would have subjected himself to any peril in putting the money out at interest seems absurd. If he had opportunities, as he says he had, for lending out $23,000 of the corpus of the fund, without hazard that he was not willing to assume, he surely could have loaned out the $15,000 to $20,000 of accumulated interest. But he need not have loaned it out on mere personal security; he could have loaned it out on call, or on call with reasonable notice, upon securities abundantly safe, and was under no necessity of, and had no sufficient excuse for keeping such a large amount of money, belonging to minors, entirely idle and unproductive. I think he must be charged with simple interest, at six per cent., on the balances of interest due to the Manson family, year by year, up to 1858, inclusive, when he paid over the bulk of the accumulation to the children of Mrs. Manson. That amount was due to them, and should have been paid them. Simple interest at six per cent. per annum should be charged upon the aggregate amount from January 1, 1859, to the present time. That amount, at least, could have been realized on temporary loans. It is a debt due from the executor to the Manson children, and has never been discharged. I do not deem it necessary to charge him with compound interest on this item, because the children themselves have neglected to claim it. But I cannot regard their laches in not claiming it, or their acquiescence in the receipt of what the executor saw fit to pay them, as estopping them from claiming it now, either on the ground of the statute of limitations or any other ground. The very meagre accounts which the executor was in the habit of rendering to the legatees, consisting of mere aggregate sums of receipts and expenditures for the year, conveyed them no information which ought to stop their mouths with regard to the accuracy of the accounts, or to charge them with sleeping over their rights.

I would only observe in addition, that the amount of income in the executor's hands, due and payable before the commencement of the war, became a personal debt, and he is responsible therefor. Whatever the balance may have been at the close of the year 1860, less the two sums of $1,496.34 and $2,809.77, remitted in January and May, 1861, will be charged to the executor.

The only remaining question relates to the alleged neglect of the executor to change the investments of bank stock on the breaking out of the war. I do not think that he is chargeable with negligence on this score. The investment was authorized by the will. Indeed, some of the stock now held belonged to the testator himself at the time of his death. For such public and national calamities as war, foreign or civil, and the vicissitudes of fortune which attend them, no individual, who does not incite them, is responsible. And in the midst of the public alarm and disorder consequent thereon, no man, however prudent, can be expected to forecast what is best or most expedient to be done with property or investments, his own or those which he holds in trust. All property, all human interests, nay, life itself, is bound up in the national destinies which decide the fate or control the prosperity of the country in which it is situated or enjoyed. Whatever is at stake therein must abide by this law. No human foresight or sagacity can provide against the vicissitudes to which the human race itself is subject. Where was the man in 1861 to tell the executor what he should do, or what was most wise to be done? Was it his duty to emigrate from the country, or to send the property in his charge out of it? No one will contend for such an absurd proposition. For, to what country should he go, which might not be subject to the same convulsions? Considerations of like character exonerate him from responsibility for the dividends received on the stock. What he received, he must account for—nothing else. It is contended that he ought to have converted the Confederate funds received by him for dividends into gold or exchange, and to have transmitted them to the legatees. I do not think he was bound to attempt this. The perils were too great. He would have been chargeable with negligence had a loss occurred thereby. If anything could have been done by him more prudent than he did do, it might, perhaps, have been, to purchase gold and keep it on hand, or to invest in stocks or property. But where was the security of his keeping possession of gold? And in what securities or property could he have invested which were not exposed to loss or destruction?

Without attempting, therefore, to decide the delicate questions arising on the laws passed in 1861 and 1863, authorizing executors and trustees to invest in Confederate securities and to receive Confederate funds, which I think are to be regarded as valid and binding where they do not conflict with the savings and reservations of the constitution of 1868, I do not hold the executor responsible for the loss of the funds received by him for dividends in Confederate money or notes, which he was obliged to accept at the time. A decree will be made in conformity with this opinion, and a new trustee appointed.

Case No. 8,856.

McKENZIE et al. v. COWING.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 479.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1834.

NE EXEAT—EMBEZZLEMENT — DEPOSIT IN BANK—INJUNCTION TO RESTRAIN PAYMENT.

If a clerk embezzle the goods of his employer, and convert the same into money, and deposit it in a bank to his own credit, injunction will not lie to restrain him from disposing of it, although he has no other property, and is about to quit the district; no debt being positively averred so as to justify a ne exeat.

The bill in this case was filed in Alexandria, and an injunction was granted by one of the judges, to restrain the bank of Potomac and the bank of the United States at Washington from paying to the defendant [William Cowing], and to restrain the defendant from receiving or transferring the money deposited therein by the defendant to his credit.

Mr. Semmes and Mr. Jones, for defendant, moved the court to dissolve the injunction for want of equity in the bill.

By consent, the motion was heard at Washington, and was fully argued by Mr. Semmes, Mr. Bradley, and Mr. Jones, for defendant, and by Mr. Coxe, for plaintiffs [McKenzie & Co.].

Mr. Coxe, contra, cited Lutterell v. Reynell, 1 Mod. 283.

CRANCH, Chief Judge (nem. con.). The facts stated in the bill, and which upon the motion to dissolve the injunction for want of equity, are to be taken as true, are, that from 1828 to 1834, the plaintiffs employed the defendant as their clerk, book-keeper, and salesman in the retail dry-goods business at a salary of about $350 a year, and that, during that time, he clandestinely and fraudulently, and in violation of the trust reposed in him, abstracted and appropriated to his own use, money and effects of the plaintiffs to an amount exceeding $9,000. That he has a large amount of money deposited to his credit with the Bank of the United States at Washington, which, to that extent, if so much he has, is the money of the plaintiffs; or has arisen from their property and money so abstracted by the defendant. That the plaintiffs have brought suit at law against him to recover the money and effects so clandestinely taken and appropriated to his own use. That the defendant is about to remove from the District of Columbia, and that he has no property except the money in bank and two boxes at William Gregory's, the contents of which are unknown. That the defendant will remove and secrete the money before the determination of the suit at law against him, unless restrained by the court, &c.; and that the plaintiffs want his answer and discovery in some material points necessary to the prosecution of the suit at law. This is not stated to be such an equitable debt, nor averred in so positive a manner, as to justify the court in granting a writ of ne exeat if it had been asked for; and it was not asked for, probably, because the counsel of the plaintiffs correctly supposed that if it could be considered as a simple debt, it was recoverable at law, and would be a case for legal bail. If it is not a case for a ne exeat, to detain the person of the defendant, upon which alone a court of equity can act, there seems to be as much reason for not detaining the property of the defendant upon which a court of equity cannot act, unless by means of an execution specifically authorized by statute.

The only question remaining is, whether this money is, according to the statement of facts in the bill, to be considered as the money of the plaintiffs. The bill avers that it is the money of the plaintiffs; or has arisen from their property or money so abstracted, &c. If the averment had been positive and absolute that it is the plaintiffs' money, there could be no doubt that it might be retained by injunction. The doubt arises from the alternative averment that it has arisen from the plaintiffs' property and money so clandestinely, fraudulently, and in violation of his trust, abstracted and appropriated to his own use. If the fact be, as suggested by this averment, that this money is the proceeds of the plaintiffs' money abstracted by the defendant and appropriated to his own use, can the court consider it as specifically the money of the plaintiffs? The plaintiffs themselves did not so consider it or they would not have made the alternative averment; for if, in either case, it be the plaintiffs' money, it was sufficient to have so averred it to be. The question then occurs, can this court follow and specifically detain the money that has arisen from the abstracted money of the plaintiffs?

The strongest case which has been cited in favor of the plaintiffs, is that of Lord Chedworth, in 8 Ves. 46. In that case, however, the injunction was only to prevent a transfer of stock which had been purchased directly with the plaintiff's money by his agent, who had placed it in his own name instead of that of the plaintiff; and the injunction was only granted until the defendant should, by his answer, distinguish the property of his master which he had mingled with his own; and the lord chancellor says: "The case, though new, stands upon a principle that will maintain it only till he informs me what part of this property is not his master's." It is true that the injunction was at first extended to the money at the banker's as well as to the stock; but, a few days afterward the lord chancellor varied the order by confining the injunction to the stock. And in the case of Cox v. Paxton, subsequently reported in 17 Ves. 329, "Lord Eldon said he had consulted with Lord Ellenborough, and thought he had gone too far." This is stated in 1 Madd. Ch. Prac. 155, and in Eden, Inj. 211, although it does not appear in the case of Cox v. Paxton, as reported in 17 Ves. That case, however, does, in principle, overrule that of Lord Chedworth in 8 Ves. In the case of Cox v. Paxton, the plaintiff's clerk had embezzled his money by false entries in his accounts of receipts and payments, and laid it out in the purchase of policies of life insurance, which he had delivered to the defendants on account of a debt due by him to them, with notice that they were the produce of the plaintiff's property. This embezzlement was a felony within the 39 Geo. III. c. 85; but independently of that objection, the Lord Chancellor Eldon said: "You cannot denominate him" (the clerk) "a trustee, in any way; there was no trust to lay out this money upon policies of insurance, nor any obligation except to account. His application of the money in this way could never, even without this act of parliament, have given the plaintiffs a title to these policies of insurance. How, then, are they to be considered the plaintiff's property in the hands of the defendants?" "If this case is to be taken according to the representation of the bill, (as it must be upon this demurrer, but only for the purpose of the argument,) that the defendants, knowing that the plaintiff's money was laid out in these policies, insist upon holding them, the morality of it is obvious; but that cannot be the foundation of a rule in equity." The demurrer was allowed. The case of Rhodes v. Cousins, cited by the defendant's counsel, from 6 Rand. [Va.] 188, states the doctrine very strongly, that a court of equity cannot control a debtor as to the disposition of his property, until final judgment or decree.

If, therefore, the money in the bank is not the specific money of the plaintiffs, and if the defendant cannot, according to the judgment of Lord Eldon, be denominated a trustee in any way, we do not see that we have any authority to deprive the defendant of the control of it. If the transaction amounts to a felony, there is no civil remedy. If it be not a felony, it can only be a tort, or a contract, express or implied. If a tort, the remedy is in damages; if it be a contract, the remedy is in debt, or assumpsit; if it be a debt, it is as much a debt at law as in equity; and the plaintiffs may have bail at law, if they can make out a proper case.

We think the injunction cannot be supported upon the face of the bill, and that it must, therefore, be dissolved. Injunction dissolved.

District Court. S. D. New York. Sept. 21, 1841.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—MASTER'S CONTRACT—ILLEGAL VOYAGE—NAVIGATION ACT—DAMAGES FOR NONPERFORMANCE.

[1. A ship is bound by her master's contract with seamen for any voyage for which he has authority to engage her.]

[2. Foreign seamen, unwittingly shipping for a voyage wherein the navigation acts forbid their employment, may recover in rem damages resulting from nonperformance.]

[This was a libel for seamen's wages by McKenzie and others against the ship Oglethorpe, Knox, claimant.]

PER CURIAM. The defence made by the answer and supported by the testimony of the master, presents an eminently hard case on the part of the owner, if the demand of the libellants is to prevail. The ship took out a crew from this port on a circuitous voyage to Glasgow where the men deserted and the libellants with others were shipped in their place. This employment, the defence asserts, was specifically limited to bringing the ship to her home port, and it meets the objection that foreign seamen could not be expected to hire on such terms, by allegations that the rate of wages here were higher than in Scotland, that there was a great excess of seamen above the demand for them at Glasgow, and that they were anxious for opportunities to get to this country. This representation is corroborated by many intrinsic facts and presumptions. The vessel was bound to her home port and the common understanding would obviously be, that her voyage would then terminate and she would be at the absolute disposal of her owners. It was moreover notorious that the crew required was to supply the places of deserters, and this would indicate very clearly, that the new crew were only to fill out and complete the service begun by the former one, and would not be sought for to enter on any new prolonged adventure. Another consideration which, it must be presumed, would influence the master, was, that he could not but be apprized that by the laws of this country he would not be allowed to take a crew of foreigners in his ship out of the United States, and that accordingly any contract of his to that end, would be arrested here and he be prevented fulfilling it. Supposing, then, that the master acted with common fairness and had no more than the humblest understanding of his duties, the presumptions would be strong and persuasive that he contracted with the libellants only as he asserts to serve from Glasgow to New York.

The libellants however support their demand by a mass of proof too direct and of too great weight, to be displaced by mere presumptions and inferences or to be counteracted by the single testimony of the master. Three witnesses not interested in this controversy called by the libellants and one called by the claimant, all unite in swearing that the contract with the libellants was for a voyage to New York thence to other ports in the United States or South America and back to a British port. Two of the libellants examined as witnesses for each other, testify to the same facts. There is some variation in the meaning of the witnesses, as to the intermediate points of the voyage, but all agree in this, that the ship was to go to New York from Glasgow, and to return to a British port as her final terminus. The court would be compelled to yield to this weight of proof of the contract, if only influenced by the mere balance of evidence but there is connected with it an additional particular, adding to its force as against the claimant. The libellants all signed articles in Glasgow, and these witnesses assert those articles specified the terms of the agreement. The master admits the existence of articles, but says he refused to receive them or allow them to come on board his ship because they were British articles and that accordingly the broker, who shipped the men, in his presence separated the signatures of the crew from the heading or contracting part of the agreement and told the master he might annex that part to his American articles. He accordingly connected it by wafers to the bottom of his ship's articles.

Whatever the inducement or excuse might be to this procedure it is palpable that the statements of the witnesses as to the general contents of the agreement must on this hearing be conclusive against the claimant. He yet holds the written contract, which he could produce in court, or he might have examined the brokers abroad, if he does not assent to the version given by the libellants. The court must then proceed upon the fact that a written contract of the purport alleged by the libellants was made with the crew, by the ship's broker, and that it was placed in the hands of the master before the crew entered on board and that they have never assented to the destruction or alteration of that contract. Did the brokers abroad exceed their authority, or if they acted under the instructions of the master, could he charge the ship and owners upon the agreement so entered into with the libellants?

There being no other evidence of the understanding upon which the brokers were to obtain a crew, than the testimony of the master, it must in this case be regarded as proved that they were employed specifically to ship men for the remainder of the voyage and accordingly had no authority to make stipulations, binding the vessel to them for any services after her arrival at New York. The captain swears positively to this point and there is no evidence produced by the libellants which can countervail the proof. He goes farther and asserts that he never mentioned the ports named in the contract and that he could not have suggested expectations of going such a voyage, because he had never been at Charleston or Savannah and had no knowledge whatever of the intention of the owner to employ the ship on that route. There are many circumstances conducing to the persuasion that this statement is not entirely ingenuous. Why would the ship brokers at Glasgow engage men on such a voyage unless they gathered from the captain the idea that the ship was expected to perform it? And when the articles were offered him no exception was taken to the terms of the contract but his natural pride fired up at the indignity of placing on board an American vessel, shipping articles bearing the insignia and stamp of royalty. It is moreover to be remembered that the last voyage was from New Orleans to Glasgow, and that the ship was ordinarily engaged as a carrying vessel from New York to Southern ports and then to Great Britain. Besides, it is in evidence that the master offered the libellants to continue them on board if they would sign American articles and obtain their certificates of citizenship or protection and one of the crew testifies that he is yet retained on board to perform the voyage for which he shipped with the libellants and the owner, when he first heard of the difficulty with the crew, immediately ordered them to go on board and complete their voyage with the ship without objection to the contract claimed by them.

Upon these circumstances it is incredible that the contract framed, was a mere invention of the ship brokers and that there was no design or expectation when the crew were shipped that the vessel would after her arrival at New York be despatched on the voyage indicated in the articles. This evidence would certainly go far to uphold the contract as authorized by the captain if it stood alone opposed to his oath; but the libellants are entitled to the benefit of the ratification of the entire contract implied in law, from his accepting the articles and the service of the crew under their engagement. I feel, therefore, no difficulty in holding that the libellants have sufficiently established the validity of the contract of the brokers with them, so far as it respects the authorization of the master.

The remaining consideration is whether the master had power to bind the ship by the agreement so made by him. In discussing this proposition of law, every reasonable intendment is to be made in support of the act of the master and it must accordingly be assumed that he was controlled by no special instructions (none being shown) and that he might exercise to the fullest degree the powers incident to his office and situation. He was the commander of a trading vessel, on a circuitous voyage. He was then performing one from New York to a Southern port in the United States thence to Glasgow and back to New York, and the fair bearing of the proofs is, that she had been employed in similar voyages antecedently and that she was to continue in a like business. In shipping a crew then, is the authority of the master limited to the voyage already fixed upon or in progress or may he engage with them prospectively and contract for a voyage not yet declared or adopted by the owner? Each branch of this inquiry suggests a topic important to ship owners and mariners, but neither need be decided to its fullest extent, in order to dispose of the issue between these parties. The master might undertake to engage the ship to a crew, for periods so indefinite and remote, as to afford palpable proof of fraud upon the owners and if not to impute a participation in it to the seamen, at least, to amount to a plain caution or notice to them that the contract was beyond the authority of the master. As general agent of the owner, the master is clearly empowered to contract in correspondence with the apparent service of the ship (Abb. Shipp. pt. 2; The Tribune [Case No. 14,171]), nor do I feel disposed to throw a question upon his authority to engage men beyond the period that may be necessary or even proper in respect to the employment in which she is engaged.

The limits of a general agency of this character must from the nature of the case be indefinite and fluctuating and the law will accordingly impose the chief hazard of it on the party instituting it and protect the one honestly confiding in it. The master, wanting seamen, incontrovertibly has the power to hire them for a fixed period of time, a month, six months, a year. The possession of a vessel requiring to be navigated is a letter of authority to the master to contract for her employment (Abb. Shipp. pt. 2, c. 2) and this would seem to be without regard to the time necessary to fulfill the service (Abb. Shipp. p. 92, note 1; Id. p. 99; Holt, Shipp. p. 3, c. 1, § 1). And as the master has power to engage his vessel to a series of voyages (or for an indefinite period) he must necessarily have a like authority to provide seamen for such voyages. Take the instance of this ship, seeking freight in Glasgow. By the well-established principles of the maritime law the master might have chartered her or engaged on a stipulated freight, to run the very voyage for which he hired the libellants. Id. pt. 2, c. 2; Id. pt. 3, c. 1; Abb. Shipp. pt. 2, c. 2; 3 Kent, Comm. 161. And as it is the usual duty of the master to hire mariners for his vessel, his authority to make contracts of the most favorable character in this behalf will be presumed (Story, Ag. 119), where there is no express restriction upon it proved and where it is exercised out of a home port. At least his authority in this particular will not be regarded as narrower than that for the letting or employment of his ship. I perceive therefore in this case clear proof that the master contracted with the men for a voyage beyond the mere return of the vessel to her home port, and to be continued at least until the restoration of the seamen to the country of their residence, and I should be very unwilling to declare such a contract void or inoperative. It may happen that the only condition upon which American vessels, in their necessity, can obtain foreign seamen abroad, is to engage the return of the ship to the place they are taken from; and it seems to me that in all cases it would be no more than a reasonable stipulation and one therefore which ought to bind the ship.

It is contended that our laws prohibit taking out of the United States ports a crew of foreigners, and that a contract to that effect would accordingly be abrogated by the statute. It is true that at least two-thirds of the crew must be American citizens, but it was no part of the contract with the libellants that they should be qualified to serve in conformity to the requirements of our laws. It belonged to the master or owners to see that the contract could be fulfilled on their part and I apprehend a party would never be permitted to set up for his protection and in avoidance of his contract with a foreigner, that the execution of it would involve the violation of his own municipal laws. The English courts enforce contracts entered into with intent by both parties to violate the revenue laws of a country. (6 C. Rob. Adm. 348; 1 Doug. 252; 1 Cowp. 343), and navigation laws probably would claim no higher sanction than kindred acts in relation to imports. Here there is no pretence that the libellants contracted with any intent to violate the law of this country or with any knowledge of its provisions. Their contract may be bona fide and meritorious, and if the master led them into an engagement which he would not be allowed to fulfill in his own country, their claim to remuneration instead of being barred by such occurrence would rather appeal with a more urgent equity for that cause to the protection of the proper tribunals. This is so even when the vessel is condemned and their lien is lost, because she was engaged in an illegal voyage. [The St. Jago de Cuba] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 409; [Sheppard v. Taylor] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 675; Edw. Adm. 35; 6 C. Rob. Adm. 207, 350. The law implies in protection of seamen, the engagement of the master and owners, that the stipulated voyage is legal in regard to foreign governments and their own, and awards them damages, when it is proved that they have been drawn into a contract that is illegal. 3 Kent, Comm. 188. The voyage must be considered as broken up in this port, either because the master was not suffered by our law to carry it into execution at his own election or that of the owner. There being no default of the seamen, and the ship remaining as she was at the time of the contract, they are entitled to compensation in damages against the vessel. Abb. Shipp. 450, note 2; 2 Hagg. Adm. 158; Emerson v. Howland [Case No. 4,441]. I am rather inclined to regard this in the nature of a voyage broken up, in respect to the libellants, to the same degree that it would be, had the laws of the United States interdicted the voyage which the master contracted for. It would then be clear of the character of a wilful and wrongful act. In such cases, seamen are not held entitled to recover wages for the entire voyage agreed upon, but an allowance by way of wages, that shall compensate them for the loss sustained. This is plainly the spirit of the adjudications upon this subject. Woolf v. The Oder [Id. 18,027]; Hindman v. Shaw [Id. 6,514]. Broader damages are given when the case is marked by acts of fraud on the part of the owner or master. 3 Johns. 510.

I think there is no ground in this case to impute fraud or circumvention to the master. Independent of his testimony upon this head, it appears from the evidence of one of these foreign seamen, that he understood the contract to allow them to leave the ship in New York if they chose to do so. He plainly regarded the prolonged voyage named in the articles as a privilege which the crew could enjoy if they preferred continuing with the vessel to leaving her here. So, also, the suggestion to the libellants that they should be provided with passport protections, and the offer of the owner to continue them on board, all indicate that there was no purpose to enveigle the men to this country and then abandon them without furnishing them employment. But if the construction urged by the libellants' counsel is adopted and it be held that the master contracted with these men fraudulently and has wilfully violated the contract, that in order to give damages according to the measure proposed, there should be clear and consistent proof of the voyage agreed for. Except in the two particulars of running to New York and the termination of the voyage in Great Britain it would be impossible upon the evidence produced for the court to decree what were the termini or what the probable duration of the voyages stipulated for, after leaving New York. The court could not accordingly avail itself of that branch of the contract as a measure of damages in any respect. If the intermediate port was Charleston, the voyage might be protracted a fortnight—if South America, for a series of months. Taking then the agreement so far as the concurring weight of evidence defines it, I shall hold that the libellants are entitled to wages at the rate contracted for, to this port; for one-half a month here as a reasonable period after they knew the voyage was abandoned to enable them to obtain an opportunity to return and also for such time as will ordinarily be occupied in a voyage from New York to Liverpool or Glasgow. This time will be ascertained by the clerk.

A decree will be entered in conformity to these principles.

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1874.

BANKRUPTCY — DISCONTINUANCE AFTER COMPOSITION—VOLUNTARY AND INVOLUNTARY—WHAT ASSENT IS NECESSARY.

1. On November 11th, 1874, McK. filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, and was adjudged a bankrupt, and surrendered his property to the register. He then proposed to his creditors, under the provisions of section 17 of the bankruptcy amendment act of June 22d, 1874 [18 Stat. 182], a composition of his debts, on the payment of thirty cents on the dollar, to be paid in cash. No time of payment was specified. The composition was accepted by the creditors and confirmed by the court on December 15th, 1874. The bankrupt then presented to the court a petition, praying that the bankruptcy proceedings might be discontinued and his property restored to him, to enable him to carry out the terms of the composition, and a majority in number and amount of his creditors joined in the prayer: Held, that, even if the fourteenth section of the bankruptcy amendment act of June 22d, 1874, should be held to relate to voluntary as well as involuntary proceedings, still it would be necessary that there should be notice to all the creditors, and a hearing of them, and an approval by the court of the propriety of the discontinuance prayed for.

2. The court could not approve of this discontinuance until the terms of the composition had been carried out.

3. The creditors who accepted the composition must be deemed to have acted in reference to the case in its then existing status, and if the court were now to surrender the property which was then in its possession, that would be an alteration of the composition, which could only be altered by a resolution passed in the same way as the original composition.

4. In involuntary cases, where there has been no adjudication, there may be a discontinuance without the assent of any creditor except those bringing the petition, and without notice to other creditors.

In bankruptcy.

Ulman, Remington & Porter, for bankrupt.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the 11th day of November, 1874, Thomas McKeon filed, in this court, a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, and was, on the same day, adjudged a bankrupt by the register to whom the case was referred, and surrendered all his property to the register. He then instituted proceedings for a composition with his creditors, under section 17 of the bankruptcy amendment act of June 22d, 1874. The composition proposed was the payment of thirty cents on the dollar, to be paid in cash, in full discharge and satisfaction of all his debts. No time for making the payment was specified. The proposed composition was accepted by a resolution which was duly passed and confirmed by the creditors, and other due proceedings were had, the result of which was that the court accepted and confirmed the composition by causing such resolution to be recorded and the other necessary papers to be filed. This was done on the 15th of December. The bankrupt now presents to the court a petition, setting forth that he is desirous of complying with the terms of the composition; that, to enable him to do so, it is necessary he should resume his business, and regain his credit and standing in the business community; and that it is impossible for him to do so until the proceedings in bankruptcy are discontinued, and his property and books are released from the custody of the register and restored to his possession. He, therefore, asks that this be done. With this petition, he presents to the court a paper signed by a majority in number and amount of all his creditors, in which they set forth that they are satisfied he is complying, and intends to comply, with the provisions of the composition so accepted, and that it is for the best interest of all concerned that the prayer of the petition should be granted, and that they join in such prayer and request that it may be granted. Upon these papers, this court is asked to now make an order that the proceedings in bankruptcy be discontinued, and that the register, on payment of all fees and expenses, restore to the bankrupt all his property.

Section 14 of the bankruptcy amendment act of June 22d, 1874, provides, that "all proceedings in bankruptcy may be discontinued on reasonable notice and hearing, with the approval of the court, and upon the assent in writing of such debtor and not less than one-half of his creditors in number and amount, or, in case all the creditors and such debtor assent thereto, such discontinuance shall be ordered and entered; and all parties shall be remitted, in either case, to the same rights and duties existing at the date of the filing of the petition for bankruptcy, except so far as such estate shall have been already administered and disposed of." Although this provision is enacted as an amendment to a section of the bankruptcy statute which applies solely to proceedings in involuntary cases, and although the expression "such debtor," occurring twice in it, has relation properly only to "the debtor" just before spoken of, namely, the debtor against whom a petition is filed by creditors, yet, if it were to be held that the provision applied also to voluntary cases, it would still be necessary, by its express terms, that, before a discontinuance could be ordered under it, there should be reasonable notice to all the creditors, and a hearing of them, and an approval by the court of the propriety of such discontinuance.

In the present case, there has been an adjudication of bankruptcy. The property of the bankrupt has passed into the custody of the court, not provisionally merely, but in such wise that all the creditors have, by virtue of the adjudication, a right to require, that, unless they all assent to a different course, the proceedings in bankruptcy shall not be discontinued until the property of the bankrupt is substantially applied towards the satisfaction of their debts. In cases where there has been an adjudication, whether voluntary or involuntary, the practice has always been observed not to allow the proceedings to be discontinued, without the affirmative assent of all the creditors, unless provision was made to pay in full the debts of all. The new provision of section 14 of the act of 1874 was designed, where applicable, to apply to cases where there had been an adjudication, and not to cases where there had been no adjudication. No legislation was needed for cases of the latter description, for, where there had been no adjudication, the courts allowed a discontinuance. Moreover, the reference, in section 14, to the estate as having been "already administered and disposed of," implies an adjudication.

Now, assuming that section 14 applies to the present case, although it is a voluntary one, and that, although there has been an adjudication in it, there can be a discontinuance under the conditions provided in that section, yet it is impossible to see how the court ought to approve of the discontinuance until the terms of the composition have been carried into effect. The thirty per cent. was to be paid, and in cash. It is shown not to have been paid. By section 17 of the same act, the court may enforce, in a summary manner, the provisions of a composition. The creditors, in the present case, who have not signed the assent to a discontinuance, are supposed to know that there has been an adjudication in this case, and to rely upon the fact that the court will not, in such a case, so part with its control over the case, as to deprive itself of the power of considering the proceedings as pending, so as to be able to enforce the compromise, if necessary. Moreover, the creditors who passed the resolution of compromise, and the creditors who confirmed it, as well as those who did not, necessarily knew that an adjudication had taken place, and such of them as have not assented to a discontinuance must be considered as regarding the adjudication, and the control established thereby, as a security for the carrying out of the composition. No other security was exacted by the terms of the composition.

So, also, in reference to surrendering up possession of the property to the bankrupt, the creditors who passed the resolution of compromise, and those who confirmed it, must be regarded as having acted in reference to the case in its then existing status (as was said in Re Reiman [Case No. 11,673]), on the view that the court was to continue in possession of the property of the bankrupt, as a consequence of the adjudication, and was not to surrender it until the thirty per cent. in cash should be paid, nor sooner to vacate the adjudication. The property being in the possession of the court, under the adjudication, the creditors, besides making no provision for security that the thirty per cent. should be paid, other than the security arising from such possession, made no provision, in the resolution for composition, as they might have done, that the property should be surrendered to the bankrupt. The resolution for composition must be read as if it contained a provision that the property should not be surrendered to the bankrupt until the thirty per cent. should be paid. To permit it now to be surrendered is to add to or vary the provisions of the composition, which, under section 17, cannot be done otherwise than by a resolution passed in the manner and under the circumstances provided for passing the original resolution, and presented to the court in the same manner and proceeded with in the same way.

The foregoing observations have no reference to a case where there has been no adjudication. In the Case of Poznanski, recently, there had been an involuntary petition and a provisional warrant. Thereafter, and before adjudication, proceedings for composition were carried through. The terms of the composition were forty-two and one-half per cent., payable in instalments, to be evidenced by promissory notes payable in four, eight and twelve months from November 1st, 1874, and to be endorsed by persons named in the resolution for composition, the composition to be void in case of any default in payment. On the 4th of December, 1874, the debtors presented to the court the written consent of the attorney for the petitioning creditors, that the bankruptcy proceedings be discontinued, there having been no adjudication. It was also accompanied by the consent of a majority in number and amount of the creditors. The property of the debtors was in the custody of the marshal under the provisional warrant. Thereupon an order was made, that the proceedings in bankruptcy should be discontinued, and that the marshal should restore to the debtors the property which he held under the provisional warrant. This discontinuance was allowed without notice to other creditors, because there had been no adjudication, and because the attorney for the petitioning creditors consented to it, and because there was not, in the resolution for composition, any restriction against a restoration of the property to the debtors. The view was, that, although, when the resolution for composition was acted on, the marshal was in possession of the property, yet it was only under a provisional warrant; that the creditors who passed the resolution must be regarded as having acted in reference to the case under its then existing status, on the view that, as there had been no adjudication, the petitioning creditors could discontinue the proceedings by merely consenting thereto, and without notice to other creditors; and that, by exacting personal security, in the shape of endorsements of the compromise notes, and imposing no other restrictions, they could not be regarded as having created any restriction on the discontinuance of the proceedings, which discontinuance would necessarily result in the surrender to the debtors of the property. It was further considered by the court, that the provisions of section 14 of the act of 1874 do not apply to cases of discontinuance where there has been no adjudication, and do not confer the power of discontinuance in such cases, and do not restrict or take away the power of discontinuance which existed, and exists, in such cases, independently of such section, but that such provisions apply solely to cases where there has been an adjudication, and confer the power of discontinuance in such cases, it not having existed independently of such section. In this view, in an involuntary case, where there has been no adjudication, the assent in writing of one-half of the creditors in number and amount is not necessary to a discontinuance.

I do not intend to say that, where there has been a composition in an involuntary case before adjudication, there must necessarily be a discontinuance, if the petitioning creditors ask it, after a composition has been confirmed by the court. Far from it. In every case, the matter must be regarded with reference to the status of the case and property when the resolution for composition was passed, and with reference to the terms of the resolution. But, although compositions may be proposed and accepted as well in cases where there has been no adjudication as in cases where there has been one, yet debtors and creditors must be held to know that the relation of the court to the property, and to the creditors, and to the proceedings, is very different where there has been an adjudication from what it is where there has been no adjudication. This is known when the resolution for composition is acted upon, and its terms can be arranged accordingly in view of the then actual situation of the property and the proceedings. If, in an involuntary case where there has been no adjudication, but there has been a compromise proposed and accepted, the terms of which have not yet been complied with, the effect of a discontinuance before such compliance may be to deprive the court of the power of summarily enforcing the composition, and also of the power of resuming the bankruptcy proceedings, it is very easy for the creditors to provide, in the resolution for composition, that there shall be no discontinuance, or no surrender of property to the debtor, until the terms of the composition have been complied with. In an involuntary case where there has been no adjudication, the general rule is, that there may be a discontinuance without the assent of any creditor except those bringing the petition, and without notice to other creditors. This should be borne in mind, when a resolution for a composition in such a case is being considered.

If it be suggested that these views of the statute may have the effect to embarrass both debtors and creditors in proceedings for composition in voluntary cases, as compared with like proceedings in involuntary cases, it will be found that the statute has other provisions which seem to discriminate, without apparent cause, between voluntary and involuntary proceedings, to the prejudice of the former. It is sufficient to refer to section 9 of the act of 1874, which imposes on voluntary bankrupts, as a condition of their discharge, that they shall pay a certain proportion of their debts, or obtain the assent of a certain portion of their creditors, while it imposes no such condition on involuntary bankrupts; and to section 10 of the same act, which, in involuntary cases, makes void fraudulent conveyances made to creditors within two months, and to other persons within three months, before the filin of the petition in bankruptcy, while, in voluntary cases, those periods are left to be respectively four months and six months.

It results from these views, that the prayer of the petition must be denied.

BANKRUPTCY—DEFECTIVE PETITION—AMENDMENT—AFFIDAVITS BEFORE NOTARIES — FRAUDULENT MORTGAGE—APPLICATION FOR ARREST—COMMISSIONER'S SIGNATURE — DEPOSITION NUNC PRO TUNC.

1. A petition was filed against M. by seven of his creditors. On the hearing of the order to show cause, it appeared that two of the creditors' claims were for amounts less than two hundred and fifty dollars each, but that the five remaining did in fact constitute the requisite number in value and amount. Held, that the petition was defective in its allegations, and did not make out a case for an adjudication, but that it might be amended so as to conform to the facts.

2. Affidavits taken before notaries public cannot be read in matters pending before this court.

3. A fraudulent chattel mortgage on the bankrupt's stock of goods, to secure an alleged debt of several thousand dollars, made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, is a sufficient act of bankruptcy to warrant an adjudication.

4. In an application for a provisional warrant and order of arrest of the debtor, under section 40 of the bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 536], the better practice is to file a separate petition, supported by affidavits of persons having knowledge of the facts, when the same are not stated in the petition of the petitioner's own knowledge.

[Cited in Re Hadley, Case No. 5,894.]

5. In the present case, as the main facts are upon information and belief, a provisional warrant and order of arrest will not be granted; but, as sufficient cause does in fact exist for the issuing of a provisional warrant, leave will be given to make another application.

[Cited in Re Hadley, Case No. 5,894.]

6. Where the commissioner who took the deposition in proof of debts failed to sign the jurat to the deposition, the omission may be supplied if the commissioner distinctly recollects the fact of the creditor signing and verifying it in his presence, and, if not, the party may be sworn and the deposition filed nunc pro tunc.

These were motions (1) to vacate the order to show cause why [James A.] McKibben should not be adjudicated a bankrupt, for the reason that, at the time of granting the order, sufficient grounds did not exist, and no proper and lawful showing was made therefor. (2) vacate the provisional warrant of arrest, on the ground that it did not appear that there was probable cause for believing that McKibben was about to leave the district, or to remove or conceal his property, or to make any fraudulent disposition thereof.

Don. M. Dickinson, for the motion.

H. E. Burtand and D. C. Holbrook, for petitioning creditors.

BROWN, District Judge. The motion to vacate the order to show cause is a very general one, and does not distinctly apprise the petitioning creditors what defects in the proceedings are relied upon; but, as no objection was taken to it upon this ground, I shall proceed to dispose of the case as made upon the argument.

First. Principal objection to the petition is that it does not appear upon its face that the requisite number of creditors have joined in it. The 39th section of the bankrupt act, as amended January 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 178], provides that any person who has committed an act of bankruptcy, as defined by that section, "shall be adjudged a bankrupt on the petition of one or more of his creditors, who shall constitute one-fourth thereof at least in number, and the aggregate of whose debts, provable under this act, amounts to at least one-third of the debts so provable." "And in computing the number of creditors aforesaid who shall join in such petition, creditors whose respective debts do not exceed two hundred and fifty dollars shall not be reckoned."

The petition in this case alleges that the petitioners "are informed, and believe, that your petitioners constitute one-fourth at least in number, upon the basis of two hundred and fifty dollars and upwards, of the creditors of the said James McKibben, and that the aggregate of their debts, provable under the said acts, amounts to at least one-third of the debts so provable." There are seven petitioners. In the statement of their respective demands, contained in the body of the petition, it appears that the claim of A. C. McGraw & Co., one of the petitioners, amounts to only one hundred and sixty-five dollars; and that of W. D. Robinson & Burtenshaw amounts to but one hundred and three dollars.

The question is then distinctly presented whether the requirement that one-third in amount and one-fourth in number of creditors, having claims of two hundred and fifty dollars and over, should unite in the petition, is met by the allegation of seven petitioners that they constitute the required number, when in fact two of them hold claims of less than two hundred and fifty dollars each.

The legal effect of this allegation is: 1. That the seven petitioners constitute one-quarter in number of all creditors whose debts exceed two hundred and fifty dollars. 2. That the aggregate of their debts amounts to one-third of the aggregate of all claims provable against his estate. Two of these petitioners, however, hold claims of less than two hundred dollars. They are not, then, "of" the creditors whose debts exceed two hundred and fifty dollars. And the allegation is, therefore, pro tanto, untrue.

Second. But it is claimed that the names and debts of these two may be stricken out as surplusage; that the court is at liberty to look at the affidavits in proof of the act of bankruptcy, accompanying the petition (to which a schedule of creditors is annexed), and the petitions be allowed to stand as those of the five remaining creditors, it appearing by this schedule that these five petitioners do, in fact, constitute the requisite proportion of creditors authorized to institute proceedings. In the first place, however, I think the petition itself ought to make a complete case for adjudication, and that defective allegations cannot be supplied except by amendments made in the usual manner. If a single material allegation may be thus supplied, I see no reason why all may not, and the entire case thus made by a series of affidavits. The forms prescribed by the supreme court contemplate affidavits in proof of the claim of the petitioning creditors, and of the act of bankruptcy; but I do not understand they can be used to establish a case not made by petition. In Re Keeler [Case No. 7,638], it was held that the absence of the allegation as to the number and amount of the creditors in the petition could not be supplied by the admission of the debtor that the requisite number had joined. See, also, In re Scull [Id. 12,568]. In Re California Pac. R. Co. [Id. 2,315], it was held that the court might look at the facts set forth in the petition for an injunction to show that the case made by the petition for adjudication was untrue. But I know of no case where affidavits were admitted to make a new and different case.

Again, I do not see how, by any legal fiction, this petition of seven petitioners can be allowed to stand as that of the five whose debts exceed two hundred and fifty dollars. The allegation that "your petitioners constitute one-fourth at least in number, upon the basis of two hundred and fifty dollars and upwards, of the creditors of said McKibben, and that the aggregate of their debts provable under the said acts amounts to at least one-third of the debts so provable," would have to be interpreted as though it read, "That such of your petitioners as hold claims to the amount of two hundred and fifty dollars constitute one-fourth at least in number, etc.,"—an allegation to which it is safe to say none of the seven petitioners supposed he was making oath. It was originally filed as the petition of seven, and can no more be treated as the petition of five than of one. If it were true that the five petitioners did not constitute the requisite proportion of creditors, could a prosecution for perjury be sustained against them? An unnecessary allegation may sometimes be treated or stricken out as surplusage, but I have never known of parties to a suit being ejected in this summary manner. Perhaps, if the allegation with regard to the number of creditors were denied by a debtor, and, upon a reference to ascertain whether the requisite proportion had joined, it should appear that a part of the claims were less than two hundred and fifty dollars, yet, if the remainder constituted the requisite proportion, the petition might still be sustained and allowed to stand, as that of the remaining creditors; but I think the petition, as originally filed, should make a prima facie case. I must hold, therefore, that the petition is defective, and makes no case for an adjudication.

Third. Can this defect be remedied by amendment? In the only case I have been able to find, where the power to amend the allegation with regard to the number of creditors was denied (In re Rosenfield [Id. 12,061]), decided by my learned predecessor, the refusal was put upon the ground that the allegation was jurisdictional, and therefore could not be amended. In Re Cornwall [Id. 3,250], the allegation with regard to the claim of the petitioning creditors was treated by Judge Woodruff as jurisdictional, though the power to amend was not discussed. It was also held to be jurisdictional in Re Burch [Id. 2,138], and in Re Skelly [Id. 12,921]. On the other hand, it was expressly held by the district court of Massachusetts in Ex parte Jewett [Id. 7,303], that the allegation in question was not jurisdictional, and the opinion of this court in the Rosenfield Case was criticised at some length.

Jurisdictional allegations are of two classes:

1. Those strictly jurisdictional, and relating to the subject-matter or the parties. The judgment of a court having no jurisdiction of the subject-matter or parties is null and void, and may be impeached in collateral proceedings, and the record of the court showing such jurisdiction may be contradicted by parol evidence. Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 350; Starbuck v. Murray, 5 Wend. 148; Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 495; Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 457.

2. Allegations of quasi-jurisdictional facts, which must be made and proved, but, when so proved, are res adjudicata, and binding in collateral proceedings; such, for example, as that, in applications for letters of administration, the decedent left no will; in proceedings in rem, under the revenue laws, that the property has been seized by the collector; and in proceedings to sell real estate for the payment of debts, that the deceased left no sufficient personalty. Examples of these allegations, and of the conclusive character of the judgment rendered under them, are found in the following cases: Hudson v. Guestier, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 281; Thompson v. Tolmie, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 157; Ex parte Watkins, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 193; Grignon's Lessees v. Astor, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 319; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 691; Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 657; Griffith v. Bogert, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 158; Florentine v. Barton, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 210; Comstock v. Crawford, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 396; Dyckman v. Mayor, 5 N. Y. 434; Jackson v. Crawfords, 12 Wend. 533; Wright v. Douglass, 10 Barb. 97; Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh, 119.

In the recent unreported case of Michaels v. Post [21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 398], in the supreme court of the United States, the allegation with regard to the debt of the petitioning creditor is treated as jurisdictional, and the judgment of the district court as binding in an action by the assignee. In Betts v. Bagley, 12 Pick. 572, a similar allegation under the insolvent law of New York was treated as jurisdictional. The court remarks "that the magistrate before whom insolvent proceedings are instituted has jurisdiction of the person, where it is shown that the party petitioning as an insolvent is an inhabitant of the county, and of the subject-matter, where the proceedings are brought before him by a petition purporting to be a petition by the insolvent, in conjunction with persons holding two-thirds of all the debts due from the insolvent to persons residing within the United States." I think, therefore, that the allegation in question is a quasi-jurisdictional one, and falls within the second category above mentioned. Does it therefore follow that it is not amendable? It was so held, or rather assumed, by my learned predecessor in Re Rosenfield, above cited; but I think the weight of authority is decidedly the other way. It was held amendable in Ex parte Jewett [supra], and in Re California Pac. R. Co. [Case No. 2,315]. In Re Burch, already cited, the learned judge of the Western district also treated it as amendable. I find no such general doctrine as assumed in the Rosenfield Case, that a jurisdictional allegation, even in special proceedings, cannot be amended. In Conelly v. Taylor, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 556, and in Jackson v. Ashton, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 480, the allegation of citizenship necessary to be made to give jurisdiction to the federal court was held to be amendable. See, also, Greeley v. Smith [Case No. 5,747]. In attachment proceedings the rule is different in different states. Under the statutes of Alabama and Georgia they are held not amendable (see Hall v. Brazleton, 40 Ala. 406; Cohen v. Manco, 28 Ga. 27), while in Iowa, Mississippi, and New York they are treated as amendable (Bunn v. Pritchard, 6 Iowa, 56; Langworthy v. Waters, 11 Iowa, 432; Johnson v. Tuggle, 27 Miss. 836; Lawton v. Keil, 61 Barb. 558).

The section of the act in question provides that "if the allegation as to the number or amount of petitioning creditors be denied, and it shall appear that the requisite number have not petitioned, the court may extend the time within which the other creditors may join in the petition." Under this provision, amendments of the petition have been permitted in a large number of cases.

Petitions filed between December 1, 1873, and June 22, 1874, are also permitted to be amended by this provision. As congress has expressly allowed amendments of all petitions filed between these dates, and of all those where the allegation in question is untrue in fact, I think that courts ought to be equally liberal in allowing them where the allegation is defective in law. While upon ordinary questions, as they arise, I propose to follow the prior decisions of this court without comment, the practice of altogether disallowing amendments in cases of this character would frequently be so disastrous to creditors, and work such obvious injustice, that I feel constrained to take the responsibility of changing it, and of permitting amendments where the facts of the case would seem to justify it. It appears from one of the affidavits in support of the petition (and I think the court may look at the affidavits for this purpose, although not for the purpose of establishing a case not made by the petition) that the five creditors whose claims exceed two hundred and fifty dollars each do constitute the requisite number and amount, and I shall therefore permit the petition to be amended in this regard.

Fourth. Further objection is made that the acts of bankruptcy charged in the petition are not supported by the depositions. Twelve affidavits are filed in support of the petition, and of the application for a provisional warrant. One of those is sworn to before a circuit court commissioner, and is conceded to be inadmissible. Nine are verified before notaries public, and, I think, are also inadmissible. By the act of July 29, 1854 [10 Stat. 315], notaries public were authorized to "take depositions, and do such other acts in relation to evidence to be used in the courts of the United States, in the same manner and with the same effect as commissioners to take acknowledgments of bail and affidavits might lawfully take or do." In the case of Blake Crusher Co. v. Ward [Case No. 1,505], decided before the publication of the Revised Statutes, Judge Longyear held that the taking of verifications to bills and answers, and of affidavits in support of motions and injunctions, were "acts in relation to evidence" within the meaning of the above provision, and properly done before notaries. The object of this act, however, was, primarily, to amend the 30th section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 88], in relation to depositions de bene esse, and to extend the power of taking such depositions to notaries as well as to judges, clerks, and commissioners. The revisors of the statutes so treat it, and in section 863 they simply inserted the words "notary public" as one of the officers before whom depositions may be taken, and, apparently gave them no power to do "such other acts in relation to evidence" as was held, in the case above cited, to authorize them to take affidavits. Section 1778 provides that in all cases in which oaths or acknowledgments may be taken before any justice of the peace, they may also be taken before a notary public; but I find no provision by which oaths in general may be taken before justices. They are given power to take complaints for warrants of arrest, and also in certain cases under the merchants' seaman's act, and perhaps in some other minor matters; but I know of no act giving them a general power to take affidavits. I think, therefore, that the nine affidavits in question cannot be read.

The acts of bankruptcy set forth in the petition are: (1) A fraudulent chattel mortgage on McKibben's stock of goods, to secure an alleged debt of three thousand dollars. made with intent to hinder, delay and defraud creditors. (2) That McKibben, being insolvent, assigned, transferred, and disposed of his goods and other property, with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, and to defeat and delay the operation of the act. (3) A fraudulent stoppage of payment of commercial paper.

As there is no evidence in the depositions to sustain the last two counts, the only question is whether sufficient appears to show that McKibben made the mortgage specified in the first count with intent to defraud his creditors. The intent need only exist in the mind of McKibben (In re Drummond [Case No. 4,093]), and is determined by looking at what he has said and done, and the effect thereof (Ecfort v. Greeley [Id. 4,260]). The mortgage was made to Hiram Harrington, September 29, 1874, and purported to cover his entire stock of goods as well as the safe contained in his store, and to secure the payment of three thousand dollars, on or before January 29, 1875, with interest at ten per cent. It was filed in the township clerk's office, October 3. The facts set forth in the depositions are substantially as follows: that McKibben had been engaged in business about two years, during the first year as a partner of Harrington, and after that alone, and as successor of the firm of Harrington & McKibben. That on September 25, 1874, four days before the execution of the mortgage, one Rathbun visited St. Louis, where McKibben did business, and took from him an order for dry goods to the amount of two thousand four hundred dollars. Before sending the order to his principals, and on September 29, the day the mortgage was executed, he took from McKibben the following statement of his property: Three lots and houses in St. Louis, four thousand dollars; forty-four lots in wife's name, four thousand five hundred dollars; stock on hand, six thousand dollars; outstanding debts, twelve hundred dollars: total, fifteen thousand seven hundred dollars. Liabilities: Hiram Harrington's mortgage on three lots and houses, two thousand four hundred dollars; mortgage on forty-four lots, one thousand dollars; unsecured claims, two thousand three hundred dollars: total, five thousand seven hundred dollars. Relying upon the truth of this statement, Rathbun forwarded the order for the bill of goods, and also introduced McKibben to several other business houses in Detroit, of whom and of other Eastern creditors before his failure he purchased goods to the amount of about seven thousand five hundred dollars. That on the 18th of February, 1875, learning that McKibben had failed, Rathbun again went to St. Louis, saw McKibben, who admitted giving the chattel mortgage to Harrington, when his attention was called to the apparent loss or deficiency, it having been ascertained by an inventory made upon the foreclosure of the chattel mortgage, that the stock was valued at about two thousand nine hundred dollars. McKibben claimed that the value placed on his stock in September must have been too high, and when reminded that if his stock then and now was about the same, he had nevertheless purchased two thousand five hundred dollars worth more of goods than he had paid of debts, and, asked to account for those two thousand five hundred dollars worth of goods, said that he was unable to do so. Admitted sending off goods to the amount of five or six hundred dollars to other and distant places, but claimed they were old, shop-worn, and unsalable; that he had nothing with which to pay his debts; that when asked how much he valued his lots at, replied, about two thousand six hundred dollars, and that his wife's forty-four lots were worth about two thousand five hundred dollars. To Rathbun's counsel, who accompanied him to St. Louis, McKibben stated that he could not tell how much he owed Harrington, and had no means of knowing without consulting him; that he had paid some of his notes to Harrington, and given others before and after the date of said chattel mortgage. That McKibben refused to show him his books of account; that on asking him who his attorney was, he referred him to one Wright; that he refused to go in with him to see his attorney; that Wright also purported to act as the attorney of Harrington, and that both McKibben and Wright refused to meet together with Rathbun's counsel and discuss the matter at all.

There are many other facts set forth in these affidavits with regard to the removal of valuable goods to a large amount, but as they are sworn to only upon information and belief, it is at least doubtful whether they can be considered upon this motion; sufficient, however, appears to make out a prima facie case of conveyance with intent to defraud creditors, and to justify an order to show cause.

First. The mortgage covered all the stock of the debtor.

Second. If there was any consideration at all for it other than that already secured by the real estate mortgage, it seems to have been for a precedent debt of two thousand dollars, contracted about a year before, when McKibben bought out the interest of Harrington in the establishment. Harrington up to that time had rested content with personal security.

Three. It was made when McKibben was heavily indebted.

Fourth. On the day it was made, McKibben made a statement of his liabilities, in which the only claim of Harrington was the mortgage of two thousand four hundred dollars, secured on his real estate, no mention was made of the debt secured by this mortgage, if any such existed, nor was anything said about a mortgage being given; he stated the value of his real estate at four thousand dollars, when it was worth, as he afterwards admitted, but two thousand six hundred dollars. The value of his wife's property, stated upon that day at four thousand five hundred dollars, he afterwards admitted was worth but two thousand five hundred dollars.

Fifth. Notwithstanding that, between the giving of the chattel mortgage and his failure, he had purchased goods to the amount of two thousand five hundred dollars more than the amount of debts he had paid, the stock inventoried under the chattel mortgage but two thousand nine hundred dollars, when he had stated it in September at six thousand dollars.

Sixth. He refused to show his books of account, was evidently ignorant of the amount he owed Harrington, declined any explanations, and even refused to confer with his creditors in presence of his counsel. I think these facts are sufficient to justify the issuing of an order to show cause. Is there sufficient to justify a provisional warrant for the debtor's arrest and the seizure of his property? The 40th section of the bankrupt law authorizes a provisional warrant, if it shall appear that there is probable cause for believing the debtor is about to leave the district, or to remove or conceal his goods and chattels or his evidence of property, or make any fraudulent conveyance or disposition thereof. No separate petition for a provisional warrant is presented, but the prayer of the petition for the order to show cause, also asks the issuing of a provisional warrant. It was granted upon the prayer of this petition and upon the affidavits already referred to. Where the facts set forth in the affidavits justify the issuing of a provisional warrant, I should be unwilling to vacate it, simply upon the ground that the affidavits were not in the form of a petition, especially where a warrant was prayed in the original petition. See Morgan v. Quackenbush, 22 Barb. 73. Better practice, however, is to file a separate petition, supported by affidavits of persons having knowledge of the facts where the same are not stated in the petition of the petitioner's own knowledge. I think the provisional warrant should not issue except where all material facts are stated upon personal knowledge. In this case, nothing appears tending to show a removal or concealment of property, or fraudulent disposition thereof, except his admission that he had sent off to other places, not to exceed five or six hundred dollars worth of goods, and that they were old, shop-worn, and unsalable. It is true that deponents swear that they are informed that valuable goods to a much larger amount were sent away and disposed of at various places, but this fact is not established by the personal knowledge of any one, and I think sufficient did not appear to justify the issuing of a provisional warrant, the only object of which is to obtain immediate possession of the goods and person of the debtor, pending the appointment of the assignee. As it seems highly probable, however, from the statements of counsel, as to the contents of the inadmissible affidavits, that sufficient cause does, in fact, exist, for the issuing of a provisional warrant, leave will be given to make another application.

Seventh. The only remaining objection to the proceedings is, that the commissioner who took the depositions in proof of debts, failed to sign the jurat to the deposition of J. H. Bratshaw. It seems that all parties appeared before Mr. Graves, United States commissioner, on the 25th day of February, and made oath to the petition and to the depositions in proof of their respective claims, but that he accidentally omitted to sign the jurat to Mr. Bratshaw's deposition. As the omission is purely a clerical one, I think it may be supplied. If the commissioner distinctly recollects the fact of Mr. Bratshaw signing and verifying the deposition in his presence, he may sign his name to it as it stands, otherwise the party may be re-sworn, and the deposition filed nunc pro tunc.

It is therefore ordered that the petition be dismissed unless the same be amended within ten days; that the respondent be discharged from arrest, and the property seized by the marshal under the provisional warrant be delivered up, but without prejudice to a new application.

COLLISION—HUDSON RIVER—NAVIGATION IN CHANNEL—FOG.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.

[This was a libel by Robert H. McKibbin against the steamer C. Vanderbilt, to recover damages resulting from a collision. The district court rendered a decree for libelant (case not reported) in the sum of $7,020.53, from which claimant appeals.]

Mr. Morris, for libelant.

Mr. Jones, for claimant and appellant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The collision in this case occurred between the canal boat Canisteo, one of the tows in charge of the tug O. C. Hibbard, and the steamer C. Vanderbilt, on the morning of the 16th May, 1863, on the west shore of the Hudson river, about opposite the arsenal at Troy. The tug had left with her tow that morning, starting from the upper side-cut at Troy, on the west side of the river, descending along the same, one hundred and fifty or two hundred feet from the shore. The Vanderbilt was coming up the river on one of her usual trips, and making for the dock on the east side of the river. There had been a considerable freshet in the river, so that the water was some six or eight feet higher than its usual rate. There was no difficulty, therefore, as to sea room for the steamers to pass to the right and east of the descending tow. Indeed, upon the proofs, even in an ordinary stage of water, the Vanderbilt could easily have passed to the right in going to her dock. Both vessels, however, were in a dense fog at and before they discovered each other, and, as it respects the navigation of each, under the circumstances in which they found themselves, very little, if any, objection can be taken. The point pressing upon the steamer is, that she was too far to the east of the channel of the river, and, therefore, out of her proper course. This view was taken by the court below, and upon it a decree was rendered for the canal-boat. We are inclined to concur in this result. The west side is the natural and ordinary track for descending vessels; and the Vanderbilt, we think, was bound to take notice of this fact, and to have kept nearer to the middle of the river. She had no right to act upon the idea that the descending boat would take that course, and expect her to pass to the left or starboard, between her and the left shore. What makes the case more marked in this respect, is the fact that the steamer's dock was on the east shore, some miles above the collision.

Decree affirmed.

[The case was taken on appeal to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed, with costs. 6 Wall (73 U. S.) 225.]

[Taney, 502.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. April Term, 1851.

MARITIME LIENS—REPAIRS—NOTE GIVEN THEREFOR—SURRENDER—JURISDICTION—CONSENT.

1. A promissory note given for articles furnished towards the repair of a vessel, will not bar a suit in admiralty, on the original cause of action, where the libellant produces the note in court, and surrenders it.

2. If the district court has not jurisdiction independently of the consent of the parties, that consent could not confer it.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Maryland.

[This was a libel in personam by William McKim and Haslett McKim against Henry Kelsey and Andrew Gray. The district court rendered a decree dismissing the libel, without costs. Libellants appeal.]

J. Mason Campbell, for libellants.

Wm. R. Preston, for respondents.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. The libel filed in this case by the appellants, only states that, at the request of the appellees, who were agents and part owners of the schooner Greek, they found and provided a quantity of copper for the said vessel, which was useful and necessary to her safety and navigation on the high seas; that the appellees gave their promissory note for the amount ($616.16), payable on the 23d of August 1848; and that the note had not been paid; and they pray process in personam against the appellees, and a decree for the payment of the money.

The appellees accordingly appeared and answered, admitting the facts stated in the libel, and consenting that a decree should be passed as prayed; and the libellants produced the note mentioned in the libel, and filed it in court and surrendered it. There was no testimony taken in the case; and at the hearing in the district court, upon these pleadings and proceedings, the learned judge dismissed the libel without costs.

It is evident, that this decree was founded upon the opinion that the district court had not jurisdiction; and certainly, if it had not jurisdiction, independently of the consent of the parties, that consent could not confer it. But the circuit court is of opinion that the district court had jurisdiction of the case, as presented in the libel, and admitted in the answer. The reasoning and authorities upon which this opinion rests, have been already stated in the case of Reppert v. Robinson [Case No. 11,703], in which the same questions arose; and it is unnecessary to repeat them here; but upon the grounds there stated, this court is of opinion that the decree of the district court in this case is erroneous, and must be reversed. Decree reversed with costs.

McKIM v. PHOENIX INS. CO.

[2 Wash. C. C. 89.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1807.

MARINE INSURANCE — OPEN POLICY — SECOND INSURANCE—LIABILITY—WAIVER OF ABANDONMENT.

1. A policy was underwritten by the Philadelphia Insurance Company, on goods on board the Ann, at and from Baltimore to Jeremie, and at and from thence to Baltimore, 12,000 dollars, valued. After the arrival of the Ann in the West Indies, the owner was informed, by a letter from the captain, that the return cargo would be 112,000 pounds of coffee; and insurance was made by the defendants, stating the cargo at 125,000 pounds of coffee, valued at twenty-two cents per pound, from which was to be deducted 12,000 dollars, insured in the Philadelphia Insurance Company. A total loss took place, and the Philadelphia Insurance Company paid the loss, by compromise, waiving an abandonment. The policy underwritten by the Philadelphia Insurance Company, must be considered as open on the homeward cargo.

2. The policy underwritten by the defendants, does not bind them to cover the whole cargo, valued at twenty-two cents per pound, deducting the sum previously insured.

[Cited in Murray v. Insurance Co. of Pennsylvania, Case No. 9,961.]

3. The defendants were not bound to resort to the insurance office in which the first policy was made, to ascertain the precise nature of the same.

4. By the policy made with the Philadelphia Insurance Company, the underwriters had, in case of loss, a right to as much of the cargo as would, at prime cost, amount to 12,000 dollars; and the second policy, in respect thereto, was void.

[Cited in Ryder v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 98 Mass. 192.]

The case states, that on the 27th of November, 1803, the plaintiff effected insurance in the Philadelphia insurance office, on goods on board the Ann, at and from Baltimore to Jeremie, with liberty to touch at one other port at the West Indies, and at and from thence back to Baltimore; 12,000 dollars insured. A written memorandum was subscribed at the bottom, by which it was declared that the insurance was on flour, dry goods, wine, and provisions, &c. &c., valued at 12,000 dollars, clear of premium. The invoice contained the above articles, and some others of no great value, such as candles, tobacco, &c. The plaintiff, after the arrival of the vessel at her port in the West Indies, received a letter from his captain, informing him of the sale of the outward cargo; that he had then on board about 60,000 pounds of coffee, and expected to take in about 112,000 pounds, probably more. Upon receiving the letter, the plaintiff, in December, 1803, directed his agent to insure the return cargo, estimating it at 125,000 pounds of coffee, valued, as concerns this risk, at twenty-two cents per pound: from which was to be deducted 12,000 dollars, insured in the Philadelphia insurance office, which would leave 15,500 dollars to be covered. The agent made out his order on this letter of instructions, and carried it to the office of the defendants, where the risk was underwritten upon the terms mentioned; at and from Jeremie to Baltimore, being on coffee shipped, to be valued at twenty-two cents per pound. A total loss having taken place on the homeward voyage, the plaintiff gave notice to the Philadelphia and Phoenix offices, and offered to abandon, and to make such cessions as might be proper. The Philadelphia office insisted upon a cession of the whole cargo, which was refused by the plaintiff; the defendants, understanding the nature of the first policy, or from some other cause, refused the abandonment. After this suit was brought, the plaintiff compromised with the Philadelphia insurance office, and gave up his claim of interest, they consenting to pay the principal, and not to require any cession. Instead of 125,000 pounds of coffee, the vessel took in only about 113,000 pounds.

Tilghman and Lewis, for plaintiff, contended that the policy on the return voyage was open, and that the defendant being informed of the prior insurance, which it was his duty to examine, and agreeing to value the whole cargo shipped, at twenty-two cents per pound, did, in effect, agree to pay what might remain of the value of the whole cargo at that price; after deducting the 12,000 dollars, previously insured.

For the defendant, it was insisted, by Rawle and Ingersoll, that the voyage insured in the Philadelphia office, was out and home; and if the outward voyage was valued, which must be admitted, so too must have been the homeward voyage. If so, the whole being valued at 12,000 dollars, the plaintiff had no interest left to insure with the defendant; and of course the second policy, by the express terms of it, was void.

That the valuing the property at risk, is merely to save the trouble of proving it; and that the case must be considered precisely as if the cargo was really worth only 12,000 dollars; of course, there was nothing left to insure by the second policy. The plaintiff, in case of loss, must have abandoned all to the Philadelphia office, and had nothing left to abandon to the defendants; that the defendants were not obliged to examine the first policy, because it was referred to; particularly as the order was calculated to induce in them a belief, that in the first policy, the whole cargo was valued at twenty-two cents per pound. Strictly, then, the plaintiff can recover for no part of the cargo; but, at any rate, he can recover no more than the premium estimated in coffee, at prime cost, and then turned into coffee again, at twenty-two cents per pound. The question submitted is, on which principle is the loss to be settled?

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The first thing to be clearly and distinctly understood, is the nature and extent of the contract between these parties. The defendants have underwritten 15,500 dollars on the cargo of this vessel, at and from Jeremie to Baltimore, valuing every American pound weight of coffee, shipped on board, at twenty-two cents; but it was also agreed, that if the plaintiff should have made a prior insurance upon the cargo so shipped, these defendants should be answerable only for so much as the amount of such prior insurance might be deficient towards fully covering the premises, such amount being understood to be the whole sum so underwritten; and that the policy, so far as property had been previously insured, should be considered as null and void; and the premium to be returned on so much of the sum so insured, as the defendants were exonerated from by such prior insurance. The defendants then insured only the property which was uncovered by any prior insurances. This leads to the inquiry, what part of the cargo from Jeremie to Baltimore, had been previously insured; and how much, if any, remained to be covered by this policy? Twelve thousand dollars, clear of premium, had been underwritten in the Philadelphia insurance office, on the cargo of this vessel, at and from Baltimore to Jeremie, and back again; and the important question is, whether this latter policy covered the whole, or what part of the return cargo? The plaintiff contends, in the first place, that the first policy covers 12,000 dollars out of 24,847 dollars and 46 cents, the value of the whole cargo of coffee, at twenty-two cents per pound; and, on the other hand, it is insisted, by the defendant, that, in strictness, the whole cargo is covered by the first policy.

The arguments on which the plaintiff founds his first claim, are, that the policy, though a valued one on the outward voyage, is open as to the return cargo; and that the defendants having been apprized of the first insurance, which covered as much coffee only as the 12,000 dollars would purchase at twenty-two cents per pound, they consented to cover the balance of the plaintiff's interest in the whole cargo; which, valuing the coffee at twenty-two cents per pound, the price it would in the plaintiff's estimation be worth here, would have amounted to 15,500 dollars, the sum insured, if 125,000 pounds had in fact been shipped. To prove that the defendants knew and had it in their power to examine particularly the terms of the prior policy, and that they were content to make this special contract, reference was made to the order for insurance, which desires insurance to be made "on the homeward cargo, consisting of coffee, valuing the same at twenty-two cents per pound, as interest may appear on board, say 125,000 pounds, American weight, valued, as far as respects this risk, at twenty-two cents, is 27,500 dollars, out of which deduct the sum already insured in the Philadelphia insurance office, on the homeward cargo, 12,000 dollars;" which leaves 15,500 dollars yet to be insured, at and from Jeremie to Baltimore. Each and every pound of coffee which may be shipped on board, shall be valued at twenty-two cents per pound.

The plaintiff's counsel are, in the opinion of the court, perfectly correct in contending that the policy effected in the Philadelphia insurance office, is open on the homeward cargo. If the written memorandum had not been added, it cannot be denied but that the policy on the outward and homeward voyage would have been open; and it is not less undeniable, that the written clause which fixes the value, is confined to the enumerated articles, and any others which could properly be included in the et caetera. The enumerated articles are such as must have been understood to constitute the outward cargo, and by the invoice we find, that in fact they did constitute that cargo. If there were no other articles on board to satisfy the et caetera, we should, nevertheless, require strong authorities to convince us, that an entire cargo, constituting the whole property which might be brought back, was intended to be covered under an et caetera; when, in the same clause, so particular an enumeration had been made of the articles which constituted the bulk of the cargo. But there is no room for giving such a construction to the et caetera in this case, as we find in the invoice of the outward cargo, a variety of articles not enumerated, of no great value, and such as are worthy of being covered by an et caetera. This construction is greatly strengthened by considering how unlikely and how unusual it is, to value a cargo, the amount and value of which is at the time totally unknown to the insured. This point being established, what follows? The plaintiff's counsel say that the defendants have specially agreed to cover the whole cargo, valued at twenty-two cents per pound, deducting therefrom only the 12,000 dollars insured by the first policy. To this conclusion the court cannot assent. If the written clause were so express and plain, as to leave no doubt that such was the intention of the parties; and if it appeared that the defendants were fully informed as to the nature of the first insurance, this clause would control the printed clause, important as it is considered by all the insurance offices in this city. Every presumption is against such an intention, and the evidence to prove it ought to be extremely clear and strong. The words, "every pound of coffee shipped, or to be shipped," taken in reference to the words in the order, "valued, as far as respects this risk, at twenty-two cents per pound," and so stating the amount from which the 12,000 dollars was to be deducted, amounted to so plain a declaration that the cargo had been previously valued at twenty-two cents per pound, as to leave no doubt concerning the intention of the defendants, at least, if not that of the plaintiff. But it is said that the defendants, having been apprized of the first insurance, were bound to examine it, or to take the consequences of their negligence in not doing so. But we answer, that if, in any case, the underwriters are, upon such information, bound to run from office to office to examine papers thus referred to, they were not bound to do so in this case; when the plaintiff spoke a language respecting the nature of the first policy, if not too plain to be misconstrued, yet such at least as was sufficient to mislead. The order of insurance plainly intimates that only 12,000 dollars were to be deducted from the whole amount of the cargo, whereas it is admitted that in case of loss, the first underwriter would, upon abandonment, have been entitled to so much of the cargo as 12,000 dollars would have absorbed, at prime cost and charges; and the plaintiff would have been entitled to claim the value of the same proportion of the cargo. The defendants, therefore, were clearly misled by the manner in which the first insurance was represented to them. If these were the rights of the parties under the first policy, it follows, that so much of the cargo was covered thereby, as 12,000 dollars would purchase at prime cost and charges; and consequently the second policy, in respect thereto, was, by the terms of it, void. The defendants, then, are answerable only for so much of the coffee as remains after this deduction is made, at the price of twenty-two cents per pound. Upon the happening of the loss, the plaintiff could certainly have abandoned no more to the defendants, which proves that no more was insured. It is unnecessary to decide, whether an underwriter may, by an express agreement made at the time the contract of insurance is concluded, bind himself to run the risk of a technical total loss, and yet relinquishing all his right to the thing insured, should any thing be saved; because, in this case, there is nothing which, in any respect, amounts to such an agreement.

This argument on the part of the defendants, cannot be got rid of by the agreement of the Philadelphia Insurance Company, after the loss, to waive all their right to the property which might be saved; because, at the time this policy was signed, it was, by the terms of it, void, except as to the property uncovered by the first; and no future circumstance could give it life, as to the other property, without the consent of the other party to the contract.

CHECK—DEMAND OF PAYEE—INSOLVENCY OF DRAWER—PRESUMPTION.

If the drawer and payee of a check upon a bank reside in the town where the bank is, and the drawer be insolvent; the jury cannot, in law, infer from those facts, that the plaintiffs had used due diligence in demanding payment, and giving notice to the defendant.

The plaintiffs [McKinder & Guilliat] offered in evidence a check drawn by the defendant [Samuel Dunlap] upon the bank at Norfolk.

Mr. Jones, for defendant, contended that in order to charge the defendant, the plaintiffs must prove that they demanded payment from the bank; and gave notice to the defendant in reasonable time.

Mr. Taylor, for plaintiffs, offered to prove that the plaintiffs and defendant lived in Norfolk; that the bank was in Norfolk and solvent; and that the defendant was insolvent; and contended that the jury might infer from these facts that the plaintiffs had used due diligence in demanding payment from the bank and giving notice to the defendant.

But THE COURT was of opinion and so instructed the jury that they could not, in law, make that inference.

BANKRUPTCY—ADJUDICATION—SETTING ASIDE—JURISDICTION.

1. A petition in bankruptcy against McK., regular on its face, was filed. A proper case was presented to the court for service on him by publication. Such service was made, and, on the return day, proof of due service being presented, and the debtor not appearing, an adjudication of bankruptcy was made. A petition was afterwards presented to the court by R., representing that he was a creditor of McK., and had not been named as such in the petition in bankruptcy, and that the debts of McK. were much greater than was alleged in that petition, and that the requisite number and amount of creditors had not joined in the petition. On this petition R. prayed that the adjudication of bankruptcy and all the subsequent proceedings might be set aside and vacated. McK. also at the same time applied, on affidavits, for an order that the proceedings be vacated, or that he be allowed to file an answer. His affidavit set up that he had no knowledge of the filing of the petition, and that the petition was not signed by the requisite number and amount of creditors, and that the petitioning creditors knew it: Held, that the court having been satisfied on the evidence before it on the return day, that the requirements of the statute as to number and amount of petitioning creditors had been complied with, so adjudged, which judgment is by the statute declared to be final.

2. Such judgment is certainly final in the absence of fraud or collusion.

3. The allegation that the petitioning creditors knew that the proper number of creditors had not joined in it, was not sustained, and both motions must be denied.

In this case, after an adjudication of bankruptcy had been made, a petition was presented to the court by one Andrew Rhende, which set forth that the petition in the case was filed by creditors whose claims amounted to $8,790; that the petitioner was a creditor of [John H.] McKinley for over $10,000; that other parties, stated in the petition, were creditors to the amount of over $20,000, and none of them had joined in the petition, although all the debts were provable in bankruptcy; that McKinley was indebted in at least $40,000 of provable debts; and that the claims of the petitioning creditors were, therefore, much less than was required by the statute. On this petition Rhende applied to have the adjudication of bankruptcy vacated and the petition and all proceedings under it dismissed. At the same time an application was presented on behalf of McKinley to have the proceedings annulled, or that he might have leave to file an answer denying that the creditors who had joined in the petition constituted the requisite number and amount under the statute, and denying that McKinley had been during six months preceding the filing of the petition a resident of the Southern district of New York. This application was founded on an affidavit of McKinley, setting forth a list of his creditors, showing debts amounting to over $60,000; and setting forth also that he had had no personal knowledge of the proceedings, that the petition and order to show cause were only served on him by publication, and that he believed that the fact that one-third in amount of his creditors had not signed the petition was well known to the petitioning creditors at the time of filing the petition. In opposition to the motion, an affidavit was presented on the part of the petitioning creditors denying any such knowledge, showing the facts which justified the service by publication under the statute, and denying the truth of the allegation as to the amount of McKinley's debts.

S. B. Higenbotam and E. McKinley, for the motions.

M. Diefendorf, opposed.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The petition in bankruptcy was regular on its face. On the papers before the court the order for substituted service by publication was properly made. Service was so made. On the return day the debtor did not deny the allegation as to the number or amount of petitioning creditors by a statement in writing to that effect. Proof of service by publication being made, and the court being satisfied on the evidence then before it that the requirement of the statute as to the number and amount of petitioning creditors had been complied with, the court so adjudged, and that judgment is contained in the order of adjudication, which finds that the facts set forth in the petition are true, one of which facts is the allegation as to the number and amount of petitioning creditors. The statute declares that such judgment shall be final. Certainly it is final in the absence of fraud or collusion. No fraud or collusion is shown in this case. It is not denied that the bankrupt had carried on business within this district for the period requisite to give this court jurisdiction of the case. Jurisdiction by such carrying on of business is alleged in the petition. The allegation that the petitioning creditors knew, when the petition was filed, that the proper number and amount of creditors had not joined in it is not sustained.

The motions to vacate the adjudication are denied, and the motion of the bankrupt for leave to interpose an answer is denied.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The defendant, in connection with others, is an extensive stage proprietor, and runs the lines of stages from Columbus to Zanesville, in this state. The plaintiff being a passenger in one of these lines, through the negligence and want of skill of the driver, as he alleges, the stage was upset, and he was severely injured. For this injury, the loss of time and expense, this action was brought. It was proved that the plaintiff being in Columbus on the evening of the 18th December, 1838, took a seat for the next morning's stage to Zanesville, at the stage office, and paid the usual fare of four dollars and fifty cents. At the time this was done the agent or clerk, in the office, informed him that he would have to occupy an outside seat. The stage left Columbus for Zanesville the next morning at ten o'clock, and proceeded on the national road about thirty-five miles, to near Linnville, where, at the foot of a hill the stage upset and the injury complained of was done. When the stage left Columbus there were nine passengers inside, and two, the plaintiff being one of them, on the outside with the driver. At Reynoldsburgh, the first place of change, one of the inside passengers left the stage. And at Jack-town, there being another passenger, it was suggested to the plaintiff that, being the sixth person entered, he had a right to take his seat inside of the coach, which he declined doing. The route of the driver complained of commenced at Etna, and it was observed by several of the passengers, that he drove very fast. After a short delay at Jack-town, the driver continued on his route at the same rapid rate. Near the summit of the hill at the foot of which the misfortune occurred, the driver passed on the right-hand side of a two horse wagon of Mr. Hampden, a witness, who was driving the same direction as the stage. Hearing the approach of the stage, Mr. Hampden turned his horses to the left, which gave to the stage more than half the road. It passed without coming in contact with the wagon, and the witness observed that all the horses except one, which was a very fast trotter, were in full gallop. The stage had a patent lock or rubber, but the driver, instead of using the lock to retard the progress of the stage, in descending the hill, applied the whip twice within the observation of the witness. The hill was between a quarter and a half mile long. After passing Mr. Hampden's wagon, the horses ran to the verge of the right hand side of the road; they then inclined to the left. The plaintiff and his fellow passenger on the outside, Thompson, remonstrated with the driver more than once; and requested him to use the lock; but he refused to do so, telling them there was no danger. The horses continued their direction to the left, until the near wheels of the stage ran off the paved road a foot or two, and continued so to run some two or three rods, when the horses turned to the right, and the stage upset with great violence. The ground where this occurred was nearly level. The off-wheels ran on the paved road, but the descent was small from the paved to the unpaved part of the road, and with ordinarily good driving, the coach could have been in no danger of upsetting where it did upset. A moment before the stage turned over, one of the inside passengers observed they were going over. At this time the speed of the horses was about as great as it had been. When the stage turned over it became uncoupled, and the horses ran off with the fore-wheels. The plaintiff was picked up about a rod behind the stage body, shockingly mangled. His head was cut in several places, but the principal wound was in his left limb. The back part of his thigh was much lacerated, and from the knee down there was a severe contusion. From the manner of the injury, it it probable that he attempted to jump from the stage, the top of which must have fallen on his limb, as the left leg of his pantaloons was much torn. An attempt was made to remove him to Linnville, a short distance, but he could not bear the motion; and he was taken into a house at hand, where he remained under the care of a physician and nurses for three months, before he was able to be removed to his brother's, in Delaware. Forty-eight hours transpired before the physician could produce a reaction of the system, during which time his extremities were cold, and a sense of shivering pervaded his system. He also suffered under a delirium the greater part of the time. The flesh on his leg mortified and fell off, so as to expose the muscles, which were also much injured. The plaintiff being present, his leg was examined by physicians, in the presence of the jury. It has yet acquired but little strength, and is much smaller than the other; and it is the opinion of the physician that it will never become sound and strong. The plaintiff offered to prove a want of skill in the driver, by showing that at one time his lines were not properly fastened on his horses, and at another time he handled them unskilfully, and was near upsetting the stage.

To this evidence the defendant's counsel objected, on the ground that the plaintiff may prove the general character of the driver, but cannot show his incompetency or want of skill by proving particular facts. If in this respect the driver stands in the same relation as a witness, it is very clear that the inquiry must be limited to general character, and cannot go as to particular facts. This rule is founded in justice. A witness is brought before the court and is required to testify. And if his testimony shall be impeached, it would be most unjust to discredit him by the proof of particular facts, of which he has had no notice, and against which he cannot be expected to be prepared to defend himself. But as every man is presumed to be ready at all times to defend his general character, on this ground he may be impeached. A driver, as such, may have a general character. But the driver in question was a stranger, had been on the route only three or four days, and had established no general character. This, it is admitted, in the case of a witness, could have no influence on the general rule. But may not a distinction be drawn, in this respect, between the character of a driver and that of a witness? A driver is a voluntary agent, and professes to have skill in driving; and he is employed in a business, which, for the safety of passengers, requires firmness and a high degree of skill. He is charged with a want of experience and skill, and how are these to be proved? May they not be proved by persons skilled in driving, and who have observed him drive? If, for instance, he is so ignorant of the duties he assumes to perform, as not to know how to harness the horses, or to handle the lines, may the fact not be shown? In what way could his incompetency be more satisfactorily established? His skill as a driver is often the gist of the action; and it is involved in the present case. In this view, he does not stand in the relation of a witness whose credibility is attempted to be impeached; but he stands in the place of the defendant, who is answerable for his want of skill and negligence.

The question of skill is the point in issue, and is not collateral. May it not then be shown by proof of the fact, the same as any other material fact in the case? It is admitted that proof of negligence at any other time would not be proper, as it would not conduce to establish negligence at the time of the injury. But this is not the case as it regards a want of skill. Proof of this a few days or hours before the stage was upset, may have some important bearing, in the opinion of the jury, on the conduct of the driver at the time of the injury. If a few days before the occurrence, the driver showed himself to be ignorant of the common duties of a driver, it is not at all probable, that in so short a time he could have acquired the necessary skill and experience; and if for the want of these the stage was upset, the defendant is liable. This though offered as evidence in chief, is in the nature of rebutting testimony. For it will be incumbent on the defendant to show, that the driver was experienced and skilful. In an action against the owners, for negligently managing a ship, so that she was wrecked and the plaintiff lost his passage, another act of negligence not bearing on the wreck, and which could not possibly cause it, was held irrelevant. 1 Car. & P. 70. And where the defendant was indicted for keeping a disorderly house, the court confined the evidence to general reputation and excluded particular facts. 1 Serg. & R. 342, 343. But where an individual is indicted for passing counterfeit bills or notes, proof that similar notes or bills were found in his possession is admissible. And so on an indictment for passing counterfeit coin. If instruments for coining be found in possession of the defendant, the fact may be proved. Proof that he has at other times passed counterfeit notes or coin, is also proper. This is admitted to show the knowledge of the defendant, that the notes or coins which he is charged to have passed, were counterfeit. 1 Phil. Ev. 179; 6 Barn. & C. 145; 1 Camp. 324; Bayley, Bills, 447. To show fraud in selling an inferior kind of goods for blue guineas, a witness was allowed to prove a sale to himself of a parcel of blue guineas by the defendants, before the sale to the plaintiffs; and the declaration and conduct of the defendants towards him on the subject of the distinct parcel. 1 Johns. 90, 99, 100.

In the case of Stokes v. Salstonsall, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 181, the declarations of the driver after the upset of the stage, that he had upset fifty stages, &c. was admitted by the circuit court as evidence, and the judgment of that court was generally affirmed by the supreme court. Had these declarations been considered as having been made by a witness merely, they would, clearly, have been inadmissible. But coming as they did from the agent of the defendant, and for whose conduct he was answerable, they conduced to prove a want of skill in the driver, and were, therefore, received as evidence. In our limited research we have been unable to find a case in point, but we are inclined to think, that as want of skill is a fact material in the present case "it may be proved as any other fact in the case;" and that in this respect the driver stands in a relation different from a witness whose character is impeached. Under this decision the plaintiff proved that on one occasion the driver had his lines fastened wrong, the check rein of one or both the lines being buckled on the outside; and that on another he handled the lines so unskilfully, as to nearly upset the stage in passing the waggon of one of the witnesses. The defendant proved that the driver had been employed by an agent, some few days before the upset, on his enquiring for stock, and saying that he had driven stage two years and six months for Calder, in Pennsylvania, on the northern route from Harrisburg to Philadelphia. The driver had been in Columbus a short time, and had professed to be an apothecary and a blacksmith. The defendant also proved, that his stage lines were generally managed as well and indeed better than any other lines in the western country. That drivers had uniformly been dismissed for intoxication and for any misconduct, on the complaint of travellers. That an experienced person was employed at Columbus, whose duty it was to inspect the stage coaches, harness, &c., and to see that no coach was taken out of the yard which was not in good order, and also the harness. He also proved that a day or two before the accident an agent passed on the line, and found the horses of the driver and also the harness in a good state; and his habits were proved to be good for the time he had been on the road. It was also proved the day after the injury, the plaintiff on being interrogated by a witness whether the driver was drunk, replied, that he did not know, but rather thought not. And the defendant called a witness to discredit Samuel Thompson whose deposition was read by the plaintiff, by showing that to different individuals the witness made statements different from those in his deposition. To the introduction of this evidence the plaintiff objected, on the ground that the witness had not been interrogated as to these statements, and that until this was done they could not be proved. This question it is admitted, after a full discussion has been decided, by the supreme court of this state, in favor of admitting the evidence. But it is insisted that this decision is in violation of the general rule on the subject. In the construction of the statutes of the state, and in matters of practice, so far as they have been adopted by the law of congress, this court follow the same rule of decision as the supreme court of the state. But in all other questions the court will look to the decisions of the state, as the decisions of other courts, and not as establishing the law.

This rule is well settled in England, that the contradictory statements of a witness cannot be proved, unless the witness shall be examined as to such statements. 1 Phil. Ev. 293; 2 Brod. & B. 286, 315; 2 Peake, 232. But if the statements are irrelevant to the issue, they cannot be contradicted. 4 Leigh, 405, 406; 5 Wend. 301, 302–305; 3 Car. & P. 75. And we think this is the correct rule. It is reasonable and just. Until a witness shall have had an opportunity to explain prior and contradictory statements, by having his attention called to them, they should not be the subject matter of proof. But in the present case, the deposition was taken ex parte, under the act of congress, and the taking of it was not known to the defendant until it was opened, at the present term. The plaintiff could not know of this attempt to discredit the witness, until the evidence now offered. It was in the power of the defendant, on reading the deposition, to move for a continuance, on the ground that he wished to take the deposition of the witness in regard to the statements, with the view of afterwards contradicting him. This, perhaps, might be done, as the deposition of Thompson, thus taken, would be substantially a cross examination. But as the rule of evidence on this point had been differently settled by the supreme court from the view here given, we will, under the circumstances, admit the evidence. It is to be understood, however, that we adhere to the English rule on the subject. In the case of Daggett v. Tallman, 8 Conn. 169, 177, 178, the court say, in general, wherever a fact would be relevant as affecting the credit of a witness, and might be inquired of upon cross examination, the same fact may be shown to impeach his credit, where he is absent, having made a deposition. This rule, however, must be subject to many exceptions. Several witnesses being sworn, stated that Thompson, who was the outside passenger with McKinney on the stage, and who was also considerably injured, on the same evening that the stage was upset and the next day, said he did not think that the driver was much, if any, to blame; and that he hoped the company would not discharge him. That he stated, as they were going at a rapid rate down the hill, he and also McKinney requested the driver to check the horses, and that the driver, bracing his feet against the foot-board, pulled the lines with all his force, when something gave way, and the stage immediately upset. A statement of the facts which the defendant expected to prove by the driver McKee, having failed to take his deposition, was read as evidence, without objection. This witness stated, that near the summit of the hill he came in contact with a waggon, which frightened his horses, so that they became unmanageable, and that at the foot of the hill, in attempting to avoid a pile of stones, the lines broke and the stage upset. It was proved by other witnesses that some four or five hundred yards from where the stage was left, two pieces of the lines were picked up, one piece about four feet long, the other about one foot; and the witness stated that on those pieces being sewed on the lines they were complete. Another witness stated that he picked up a part of one of the lines, about four feet in length, in the road about a rod or two in advance of the stage. Whether this was the piece picked up by the other witness and brought near to the stage was not explained.

The cause was zealously and ably argued on both sides; and THE COURT charged the jury substantially as follows:

The injury received by the plaintiff, and for which this action was brought, is proved by Dr. Morris, the attending physician, and several other witnesses. There is no contrariety in the evidence as to the extent or permanency of the injury. The suffering of the plaintiff cannot well be estimated. It was as great as human nature could bear. For forty-eight hours the scales of life and death hung in suspense. The coldness which precedes dissolution pervaded his system. His pulse was at times not perceptible, and he labored under delirium. At length the system re-acted, and the symptoms became more favorable. But the progress of recovery was slow and painful; and it would seem, there is little ground of hope that he will ever recover from his present state of decrepitude. His leg may probably acquire more strength, but all the physicians agree that, in all probability, it will never become sound. In this form of action, the plaintiff seeks compensation from the defendant, for the sufferings he has undergone, the time he has lost, the money he has expended, the injury to his business, and the loss, in a considerable degree, of his limb. Should the plaintiff be entitled to your verdict, you will be as capable as the court, and indeed more so, of estimating the amount of damages he should recover. The upsetting of the stage is prima facie evidence of negligence, and to sustain his action it was only necessary for the plaintiff to show he was a passenger, having paid his fare, and that he was injured by the upsetting of the stage. The defendant, with his partners, is engaged in an enterprise intimately connected with the public accommodation. Having incurred a large expenditure in establishing his lines of stages, he holds inducements to the public to travel in his lines. He is bound to provide good coaches and harness, gentle and well broke horses, and a skilful and careful driver. These are obligations which the law imposes on every stage proprietor; and if any injury is received by a passenger, from any defect in this preparation, the proprietor is responsible.

There are certain risks which are incurred by every stage passenger, and for which the proprietor is not responsible. These are those casualties which human sagacity cannot foresee, and against which the utmost prudence cannot guard. If, for instance, a gun should be fired so near the stage as to frighten the horses, and they, becoming unmanageable, upset the stage and injure a passenger, he is without remedy as against the driver or his employers, as no fault can be attributed to them. We are surrounded with dangers at home and abroad; and they are greater when we travel than while we remain stationary. In some modes of travelling these dangers are greater than in others. They may be greater on water than on land; on a fast line of stages than on a slow one. And every passenger must make up his mind to meet the risks incident to the mode of travel he adopts; which cannot be avoided by the utmost degree of care and skill in the preparation and management of the means of conveyance. This is the only guaranty given by the proprietor of the line. You will understand the application of the evidence better, gentlemen, if I consider it, in strictness, as it might have been introduced. The plaintiff then has sustained his right of action by showing the injury he received from the upset of the stage, he being a passenger. And it is then incumbent on the defendant to prove facts and circumstances which go to reduce the damages, or to excuse him from all liability. The defendant has shown by several witnesses a promptness and vigilance, by the company, in the general management of their lines very creditable to them. They have evinced a commendable solicitude for the accommodation and safety of passengers. And it would seem that no lines in the Western country, by the preparation of coaches, horses, drivers and a vigilant superintendency, are better entitled to public confidence than the one now in question. But in this case it appears the driver employed had no other recommendation of his experience and skill, than that which was afforded by his own statements.

The main ground of the defence is, that blame does not attach to the driver. And this, it is insisted, is shown by the statement of facts which the driver would swear to, admitted as evidence; the remark of the plaintiff that he did not think the driver was intoxicated, and the repeated remarks of Thompson, that he did not think the driver was to blame and hoped he would not be discharged by the company. And it is contended that the fact of the lines being broken, strongly corroborates the statements of McKee, the driver, that the lines broke, which was the proximate cause of the upset of the stage. The declaration charges the injury to the want of skill and care of the driver, and not to any deficiency in the coach, harness, or horses. And the court recognize the principle urged, that the plaintiff can recover only on the grounds stated in his declaration. So that if the lines were broken by reason of any defect in them, that can give no right of recovery to the plaintiff. It must be observed that the statements made by Thompson, as proved by the defendant, are not evidence in chief, but can only be considered as lessening the weight or destroying the effect, of the facts stated in his deposition. On the part of the plaintiff, it is insisted, that the other evidence goes to disprove the statement of the driver, and that independently of the deposition of Thompson, which they do not admit to be discredited, they have shown recklessness and want of skill in the driver. That the speed with which he drove down the hill, using his whip and not using the lock, showed him to be reckless and was the cause of the disaster. The driver must not only be skilful, but he is bound to exercise the utmost degree of care. And if you shall think, from the evidence, that in commencing the descent of the hill and driving down it, in the manner proved, he acted imprudently or rashly, the defendant is liable, although you should find that the immediate cause of the upset was, the breaking of the lines. The least degree of imprudence or want of care in the driver fixes the liability of his employers. And if in this case in descending the hill, such an impetus was given to the stage as to render it difficult and hazardous for the driver to check and control his team, the defendant is liable. It is evidence of want of care in the driver, if he leave the common track and take one not used, which increases the risk. Something has been said as to the exposure of the plaintiff by keeping an outside seat, when he might have taken a seat inside of the coach. This circumstance can have no influence in the case. The defendant was as much bound to convey the plaintiff safely on the outside as the inside of the coach. It is not pretended that the upset of the stage was, in any degree, attributable to the position or the act of the plaintiff.

Upon the whole, gentlemen, having heard, with a most patient and careful attention, the evidence and arguments of counsel, it remains for you to make up your verdict in this important case. A case interesting to the parties and to the public. If you shall find from the evidence, that the upset of the stage was caused by one of those accidents which a skilful driver, using the utmost care could not avoid, you will find for the defendant; but on the contrary, if you shall believe that the injury received by the plaintiff was, in any degree, attributable to a want of skill or care in the driver, you will find for the plaintiff, and assess for him such damages, as under all the circumstances, you shall think him entitled to receive, and the defendant is bound to pay.

The jury returned a verdict of $5,325.00 in damages, for which a judgment was entered.

NOTE. As the statement of the driver, in this case, was read in evidence, without objection; and as the driver implicated was examined as a witness, without objection, in the case of Maury v. Talmadge [Case No. 9,315], tried at the same term, it may not be improper to say something as to the competency of this evidence. An interest in the question does not go to the competency of a witness. But if the verdict can be used in evidence against the witness, should the party who called him, fail, the witness is incompetent on the ground of interest. In Phil. Ev. (Ed. 1839) 56, 130, it is said that in an action against a master for the negligence of his servant, the servant is not a competent witness to disprove his own negligence; for the verdict may be given in evidence in a subsequent action by the master against the servant, as to the quantum of the damages, though not as to the fact of the injury. And to this effect are the following cases: Green v. New River Co., 4 Term R. 589; Martin v. Henrickson, 2 Ld. Raym. 1007; Miller v. Falconer, 1 Camp. 251; 15 East, 474; 3 Camp. 416; Rotheroe v. Elton, Peake, 84; 2 Moore, 508; 8 Taunt. 454. But though agents and brokers are competent to prove a sale or contract, they are not competent to prove the contract properly executed, in an action against the principal for their misconduct or negligence. 1 Holt, N. P. 139; Bird v. Thompson, 1 Esp. 339; 6 Esp. 73. The coachman in an action against another for an injury done by a cart to the coach, while the coachman is driving, is not a competent witness for the plaintiff, the owner of the coach. Kerrison v. Coatsworth, 1 Carr. & P. 645. So a pilot is not a competent witness for the captain of a steam boat, sued for running down a barge, the pilot steering at the time of the accident, though the captain was on board. Hawkins v. Finlayson, 3 Carr. & P. 305. The guard of a coach is not competent for the proprietors, sued for mismanaging it, so that the plaintiff was struck by the luggage. Whitamore v. Waterhouse, 4 Carr. & P. 383. In the case of The Hope [Case No. 6,678], it was held that where a vessel was seized for a violation of the non-importation act of 1st March, 1809, c. 91 [2 Story's Laws, 1114; 2 Stat. 528, c. 24], and there were strong circumstances to induce a presumption that the master was privy to the illegal importation of the goods, which were found concealed on board the vessel, it was ruled that he was not a competent witness for the owners of the vessel, to prove his ignorance of the goods being on board. He had a direct interest to prevent a forfeiture, occasioned by his own illegal conduct; for the decree of condemnation would be good evidence in a suit brought against him by the owners. From these authorities it would seem, that the driver is not a competent witness in behalf of the proprietor who is prosecuted for an injury received, through the negligence or misconduct of the driver.

McKINSEY et al. v. HARDING.

[4 N. B. R. 38 (Quarto, 10).] [1]

District Court, D. Virginia. Sept. 24, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—LIEN CREDITOR—JUDGMENT—GOING BEHIND—INSANITY OF BANKRUPT—CORAM NOBIS—REFUSAL TO BE EXAMINED—PROOFS.

1. Where assignees apply to court for an order to examine a lien creditor who had obtained judgment against Ira Hurt, one of the bankrupts, for four thousand three hundred and sixty-two dollars and fifty-one cents, and against Walter C. Calloway, the other bankrupt, for four thousand two hundred and fifty dollars and fifteen cents, alleging usury on the part of Calloway. In Re Hurt, the lien creditor refused to be examined, through advice of his counsel, and submitted to the court the following questions: Is it competent for the district court to go behind the judgment of the state court, and inquire into the consideration of the debt upon which the judgment is founded? The facts disputed were: Usury in the consideration of the debt—ability and opportunity of the bankrupt to plead to action at law in the state court—his mental condition at the time the process was served, and at the date of the judgment obtained against him. Held, the lien creditor should have produced evidence satisfactory to the register, or answered the questions of the assignee in relation to his asserted lien against the estate of the bankrupt.

[Cited in Re Pittock, Case No. 11,189.]

2. In view of the alleged insanity of the bankrupt, a writ, coram nobis, in the court where the judgment was rendered would be the proper mode of redress; the jurisdiction of this court will then attach to the whole subject.

3. In Re Calloway, the lien creditor again refused to be examined—the same questions were certified to the court, and it was admitted that the judgment was rendered upon a plea of usury. Held, the creditor was right in refusing to be examined in relation to a question of usury upon the debt for which the judgment was rendered.

4. Where the assignees, by their counsel, moved to strike out proofs filed in each of said cases, and the motion was objected to by attorney for lien creditor, held the proofs having been admitted to file, and appear in form, and since they distinctly assert and claim a lien, although against the entire estates of the several bankrupts, the real lien is not thereby vitiated.

5. The informality in the proofs objected to does not avail, for the reason, the witness has sworn positively, of his own knowledge.

[Cited in Re Watrous, Case No. 17,270.]

Hurt & Calloway filed their petition in bankruptcy, in Lynchburg, in 1868, and were duly adjudicated bankrupts. McKinsey & Brown, of Danville, were appointed assignees, and in the course of the proceedings in this case, these assignees applied to the court for an order to have Dr. Harding examined before the register, in Lynchburg, under the following circumstances:

On the 9th November, 1865, Harding obtained a judgment in the circuit court of Roanoke county, against Hurt, upon which he proved a debt against this bankrupt's estate for four thousand three hundred and sixty-two dollars and fifty-one cents, the defendant having waived his plea previously plead that he had well and truly paid the debt. Again, on 3d September, 1866, the said Harding obtained the verdict of a jury in the said circuit court of Roanoke, against Calloway, for the sum of four thousand two hundred and fifty dollars and fifteen cents, which he also proved against said Calloway's estate—in both cases principal, interest, and expense are included.

The object of the assignees' proceeding was to revive a charge which had been got up by Hurt & Calloway in the state court, of usury on the part of Calloway, but as the salient points of the case are fully elucidated in the register's reports and opinions, as also in the pleas of the counsel, we give them entire, this being the first case in which this question (of usury) in connection with state court judgments, has been before the district court in bankruptcy.

In re Ira Hurt, Senr.

At Lynchburg, in said district, on the 15th June, 1869, before me, John F. Cobbs, one of the registers of said court in bankruptcy, upon an order in said matter heretofore made and entered, for the examination of John B. Harding et al.

Present: L. D. Haymond, Esq., attorney for assignees; Andrew Rutherglen, Esq., attorney for J. B. Harding, creditor, etc.

The said John B. Harding personally appeared before me, at the time and place designated in said order, and through advice of his counsel refused to be examined in relation to a judgment obtained by him against the bankrupt, prior to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy: First. Because a question of law and fact has been raised in these proceedings. Second. Because, until the decision of the court has been obtained, it is incompetent to proceed with the evidence sought to be had, and desires these questions to be certified to the court, which are herewith submitted accordingly.

The following are the questions: First. Is it competent for the district court to go behind the judgment of the state court, and inquire into the consideration of the debt upon which the judgment is founded. Second. The questions of facts. Usury in the consideration of the debt—ability and opportunity of the bankrupt to plead to action at law in the state court—his mental condition at the time the process was served, and at the date of the judgment obtained against him?

Upon the foregoing questions, the register is of the following opinion: The lien creditor, John B. Harding, should have produced evidence satisfactory to the register, or answered the questions of the assignees, in relation to his asserted lien against the estate of the bankrupt. The validity of the judgment being put in question, and no certified copy of the proceedings in the state court being exhibited before the register, it is impossible for him to express any definite opinion on the questions presented. But if it should be shown that the proceedings in the state court were in all respects regular and legal, and that the defendant had a day in court and pleaded, and upon the issue joined the judgment was rendered, then the plea of res judicata prevails, and I am of opinion that said judgment, according to the laws in force at the time in Virginia, constituted a lien upon the real estate of the bankrupt; if, however, the record of the proceedings in the state court discloses the fact that the defendant made no appearance, that no matter was pleaded, and no issue joined, in the action upon which the judgment was obtained, it appears to the register that the whole matter should be inquired into, but that the remedy of the assignees properly belongs to another forum. The question of the jurisdiction of the district court to go behind the judgment of the state court, and inquire into the consideration of the debt upon which the judgment is founded, I think has been settled adversely in Re Campbell [Case No. 2,349], and reaffirmed in Re Burns [Id. 2,182]. Vide G. B. C. R., 69, 70. The plea of res judicata is conclusive, except for the fact of the insanity of the bankrupt alleged, or some informality or illegality in the proceeding in the state court. But if insanity, or any matter of fact, be the ground for a review of the judgment, a court of equity is not, but a court of law is, the proper forum for redress, and a writ of error, coram nobis, in the court wherein judgment was rendered, would be the proper mode of redress. The alleged insanity is matter of fact, which, if true, made the judgment erroneous, and which, if known to the court, would have caused it to provide for a proper defense, by guardian ad litem (Gordon v. Frasier, 2 Wash. [Va.] 130; Cole v. Pennell, 2 Rand. [Va.] 174); and when the fact is of the kind which may be made the ground of a writ of error, coram nobis, equity has no jurisdiction (Williamson v. Appleberry, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 206), in which a party was dead when judgment was rendered. The chancellor held it no ground for injunction, but for error, coram nobis. The relief granted in equity by virtue of Code of Virginia (Ed. 1860), 141, applies to cases wherein money has been paid out upon usurious considerations; and is not applicable to judgments upon which no money has been paid out. I am, therefore, of opinion that the district court cannot go behind the judgment; but that the assignees, if they desire to raise the question, must sue out a writ of error, coram nobis, in the court which rendered the judgment, and have it reversed. The suit will then be open, and the jurisdiction of this court will attach to the whole subject as if it were a pending suit when the proceedings commenced in this matter.

John F. Cobbs, Register.

In re Walter C. Calloway.

At Lynchburg, in said district, on the 15th of June, 1869, before me, John F. Cobbs, one of the registers of said court in bankruptcy, upon an order in said matter heretofore made and entered, for an examination of John B. Harding et al.

Present: L. D. Haymond, Esq., attorney for assignees; Andrew Rutherglen, Esq., attorney for John B. Harding, etc.

The said John B. Harding personally appeared before me, at the time and place designated in said order, but refuses, through the advice of his attorney, to be examined in relation to a judgment obtained against the bankrupt prior to the commencement of these proceedings in bankruptcy: First. Because a question of law as well as facts has been raised in these proceedings, and are requested first to be certified to the court for its decision. Second. Because, until the decision of the court has been obtained, it is incompetent to proceed with the evidence sought to be had.

The following are the questions of law and facts arising in said matter, and asked to be certified to the court for its decision, viz.: Is it competent for the district court to go behind the judgment of the state court, and inquire into the consideration of the debt upon which the judgment is founded? It is admitted that a judgment was rendered upon a plea of usury, and the amount and date of said judgment duly rendered after hearing both parties in the state court.

Upon the foregoing questions the register is of the following opinion:

By the petition of the assignees, the only question they ask to be inquired into by the court being that of usury, in the consideration of the debt upon which the judgment is founded, having already been adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction, the plea of res judicata in the present matter must prevail.

The register is of the further opinion that the witness and creditor, John B. Harding, is right, and should be sustained by the court, in refusing to be examined in relation to the question of usury upon the debt for which the judgment was rendered; the matter having been fully heard and determined in open court, and that said judgment, by the laws of Virginia in force at the time of its rendition, constituted a lien upon the real estate of the said bankrupts.

John F. Cobbs, Register.

In re Ira Hurt & Walter C. Calloway.

George C. Brown, assignee of Ira Hurt, and the same Geo. C. Brown and John W. McKinsey, assignees of Walter C. Calloway, by their attorney moved to strike out or expunge the proofs filed in each of said cases by Andrew Rutherglen, attorney for John B. Harding, on June, 1869, on the following grounds, to wit:

First. That the said proofs appear to be intended for cases in which the proceedings are involuntary, whereas both of these cases are voluntary proceedings.

Second. The debts set up and claimed in said proofs were founded on an usurious consideration, and are, therefore, illegal, and these estates cannot be charged with their payment.

Third. The debts are claimed as liens on the entire estate of the bankrupts, whereas, if they are liens at all, they only bind the real estate.

Fourth. For informality in not conforming to the requirements of general clause 103, section 22, of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 527)]. They do not, nor do either of them show any reason why the creditor himself could not have made the deposition in person. The attorney does not "testify to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief," nor does he set forth his means of knowledge as to said claims.

Fifth. In the matter of Hurt, if the writ of summons of the state court was served on said Hurt at all, it was at a time when he was of unsound mind, and incapable for that reason of giving it any attention; and the supposed judgment was rendered at a special term of Roanoke circuit court, held more than thirty miles from the place of Hurt's residence, when he was still of unsound mind, but also when there was no public means of communication between Roanoke Court House and Hurt's neighborhood, it having been not long after the close of the late war; and hence Hurt, or his agent, or committee (if he had one), had no notice of said special term, and could not for that reason have made any defense in said court. But if the proofs in these cases, or either of them, shall be sustained and admitted, then it is claimed that the creditor has thereby surrendered any and all liens supposed to exist or to have been created by the judgment described and set forth in said proofs.

In re Ira Hurt, Sen., and Walter C. Calloway.

John B. Harding, by his attorney, objects to the proposed proceedings in the cases in bankruptcy of Ira Hurt and Walter C. Calloway, in respect that they are beyond the jurisdiction of the court in bankruptcy.

First. Because the proposed proceedings are instigated by the assignees of these bankrupts in defiance of an established rule in law in bankruptcy, that "the rights of a bankrupt to sue for and recover back money paid by him as usury is not such a right of property as vests in assignees in bankruptcy." Nichols v. Bellows, 22 Vt. 581.

Second. Because the said Harding's proofs of debt, filed with the register in these cases, consists of judgments obtained in a competent court, and are conclusive with respect thereto. Williams v. Armroyd, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 423, 603.

Third. Because a judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive that where a matter has been once heard and determined in one court, it cannot be raised anew and reheard in another, and hence the plea of res judicata in the present case prevails. Hopkins v. Lee, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 109; Bank of U. S. v. Beverly, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 134.

Fourth. Because a judgment of a state court cannot be assailed in the district court, but the assignee and creditors must resort to the state court to test its validity. Ex parte Burns [Case No. 2,182]; Atkinson v. Purdy [Id. 616].

Fifth. Because, had there been grounds for making such an investigation as the one sought, it is out of time, and falls under the rule competent, but admitted, and therefore it has been held that "where the offense for which the penalty is demanded was alleged and proved to have been committed on the 14th day of October, 1807, and the bill was found by the grand jury November, 1808, that whatever interest the complainant might have had was lost at the commencement of the prosecution, more than one year, the time limited, having elapsed." Ang. Lim. p. 96, § 109.

Sixth. Because, in respect that the preceding points have arisen in the proceedings, the said Harding desires the opinion of the district judge thereon, and until such opinion be obtained and duly intimated to all concerned, he denies the competency of the register to proceed further under the order made on the requisition of the assignees.

John B. Harding,

By his counsel, Andrew Rutherglen.

Lynchburg, 15th June, 1869.

In re Ira Hurt, Sen., and Walter C. Calloway.

At Lynchburg, in said district, on the 15th of June, 1869, before me, John F. Cobbs, one of the registers of said court in bankruptcy, the foregoing objections being presented to the claims of John B. Harding, a creditor who has filed his proofs of debt, the same is requested to be certified to the court for its decision thereon, which is herewith done accordingly. And upon the foregoing objections I am of the following opinion:

The proofs have been admitted to file and appear in form, and since they distinctly assert and claim a lien, although against the entire estates of the several bankrupts, the real lien is not thereby vitiated. The informality in the proofs objected to does not avail for the reason the witness has sworn positively of his own knowledge. The remaining objections to said proofs, I think will be found passed upon in the opinion of the register expressed upon the questions certified to the court for its decision in each of the said matters in bankruptcy.

BANKRUPTCY—REGISTER'S FEES—ORDER FOR EXAMINATION OF A BANKRUPT.

[A register in bankruptcy is not entitled, under rule 30 of the "General Orders in Bankruptcy" or under any provision of the bankrupt law (Act 1867), to any fee, either from the bankrupt or the creditor, for issuing an order upon the application of a creditor for the examination of the bankrupt in behalf of such creditor, but the creditor must pay the register his legal fees for taking the deposition of the bankrupt, both on direct and cross examination.]

[In the matter of James Mackintire, a bankrupt.]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In this case the register certifies that the first meeting of creditors was held July 11th, at which notice was given of an application next day for an order to examine the petitioner on behalf of a creditor, and the meeting was duly adjourned to July 12th. On that day, the petitioner attending, a creditor who had filed proof of his claim applied for an order in pursuance of said notice, for the examination of the petitioner on behalf of the creditor, at that time the petitioner not objecting to the time, but insisting that the creditor must pay the register's fees for the order. The creditor refused to pay the fees, insisting that they must be paid out of the deposit of fifty dollars made by the petitioner with the clerk. The register proposed to grant the order on payment by the creditor of one dollar as the proper fee. At the request of the creditor the register has certified the question for the decision of the court.

The register in his certificate refers to that portion of the 4th section of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 518)] which provides that the fees of the registers, as established by the act, and by the general rules and orders, required to be framed under it, shall be paid to them by the parties for whom the services may be rendered in the course of proceedings authorized by the act. He also refers to that part of rule 29 of the general orders in bankruptcy which provides that the fees of the register shall be paid or secured in all cases before he shall be compelled to perform the duties required of him by the parties requiring such service. He also states it to be his opinion, that the granting of the order for the examination of the bankrupt having been required by the creditor, and not by the bankrupt, the former and not the latter ought to pay the fees for the order.

On the part of the creditor it is claimed that such fees as are connected with the personal examination of the bankrupt, are governed by the 47th section of the act; that the bankrupt is compelled by that section to deposit fifty dollars for that purpose; that that section contemplates that the services of the register in the examination of the bankrupt are services required by the bankrupt and not by the creditor; that under the 47th section, the register was entitled to charge three dollars for the adjourned meeting of creditors on the 12th of July, such fee to be paid by the bankrupt; that such fee was the only fee the register had a right to charge, there being no provision by which he could exact one dollar from the creditor for entering an order for the examination of the bankrupt; that no such order was required; that there are services of the register specified in the 4th section of the act, which may be required of a creditor, and for which he should pay, but that the act does not contemplate that a creditor shall pay for the register's services in examining the bankrupt for the purpose of seeing whether he has made a proper exhibit of his affairs, when he calls a meeting of his creditors for that purpose; that under the 47th section the bankrupt must pay to the register for that service, the three dollars for the meeting of creditors, and also the fees allowed by law for taking his deposition; that section 26 of the act requires the bankrupt at all times to attend and submit to an examination on oath upon all matters relating to the disposal of his property, &c.; that the fees for such examination are provided for by section 47 of the act; that that section says that such fees shall be paid out of the estate and have priority over all other claims; that the court may, under rule 29 of the general orders in bankruptcy, exercise its discretion as to the payment of the whole or a part of the fees out of the fund in court, but that without such direction from the court the register must look to the funds in court for his fees in such a case as the present.

The views urged for the creditor are thus fully stated, in order that it may be seen that the question has been considered by the court in all its aspects. The fee of one dollar proposed to be charged by the register, in this case for making the order for the examination of the bankrupt, is not provided for by the act, and is not at all provided for, unless it is covered by the following provision of rule 30 of the general orders in bankruptcy, under the head of "Fees to the Register." "For every order made where notice is required to be given, and for certifying copy of the same to the clerk, one dollar." This provision allows a fee of one dollar for making an order, and for certifying a copy of the same to the clerk, in a case where previous notice is required to be given to an adverse party of the application for the making of the order before the order can be made. That this is the meaning of that provision of rule 30 of the general orders, is shown by the language of rule 8 of the general orders. In the present case, no notice was required to be given to any party of the application for the order for the examination of the bankrupt before the order could be made. By the 26th section of the act, it is provided that the court may, at all times, require the bankrupt upon reasonable notice to attend and submit to an examination on oath, upon all matters relating to the disposal or condition of his property, &c. An order requiring the bankrupt so to attend and be examined, and service of such order on him a reasonable length of time previously, are necessary, and the form of such order is prescribed by form No. 45, of the form specified in the schedule annexed to the general orders in bankruptcy. But no previous notice is required to be given to any person of the application to the register by the creditor for the making of the order. It is to be made ex parte on the application of the creditor. It may also, under section 26 of the act, be made by the register ex parte on the application of the assignee, or by the register on his own suggestion without any application. The register was, therefore, not entitled to charge any fee for making the order in this case. There are many specific services which must be rendered by the registers, and for which no specific fee is provided either by the act or the general orders in bankruptcy. Their compensation for such service is covered by the specific fees which are enumerated in the act and the general orders. Thus the register receives two dollars for issuing a warrant, but no specific fee is provided for the adjudication of bankruptcy, form No. 5, which the register must make before he can issue the warrant. He receives compensation for making the adjudication in the fee of two dollars, which he receives for issuing the warrant. That fee of two dollars is a fee for doing everything, (a fee for which is not otherwise specially provided,) which results in the issuing of the warrant, and no specific fee is provided for the service of examining the bankrupt's petition and schedules, when such examination results in the withholding of the adjudication of bankruptcy. So also the fee of three dollars to the register for an order for a dividend, covers all his services not otherwise provided for, which result in the making of the order for the dividend; and the fee of two dollars to the register for every discharge, when there is no opposition, covers all his services not otherwise provided for, which result in the granting of the discharge. The making of the order in this case for the examination of the bankrupt, not having any fee specially attached to it, must be considered as compensated by some one or more of the fees which are enumerated.

The fee of one dollar for the order cannot be considered as authorized by the provision of the 47th section, which gives a fee of one dollar for "every application for any meeting in any matter" under the act. The word "meeting," wherever used in the 47th section and elsewhere in the act, means a meeting of creditors, such as is spoken of in the 12th, 27th, and 28th sections. The application by the creditor for the order for the examination of the bankrupt, cannot be regarded as an application for a meeting of creditors.

As the register was bound to make the order asked for, without requiring the payment by the creditor or any other person of any specific fee for such order, this decision might properly go no further than to dispose of that point. But in view of the positions urged by the counsel for the creditor, it is deemed proper to lay down some propositions which are applicable to this case, and which have been carefully considered: (1) Where a creditor applies under section 26 of the act, for an order for the examination of the bankrupt, the creditor must pay the register the fees allowed by law for taking the deposition of the bankrupt, not only for his direct examination but for his cross examination, if any, and the register is not required to look in the first instance for such fees to the bankrupt, or to the fifty dollars deposited by him or to the bankrupt's estate. (2) Whether such fees shall ultimately be paid out of the estate, will be a question for consideration hereafter.

The clerk will make a certificate of this decision to the register, Edgar Ketchum, Esq.

McKNIGHT v. McKNIGHT et al.

[2 Hayw. & H. 132.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of California. Oct. 26, 1853.

GUARDIAN AND WARD — PROPERTY OF WARD — SEIZIN — HUSBAND AND WIFE — ACTION BY WIFE — JOINDER OF HUSBAND.

1. The control of a guardian of the real estate of his ward constitutes a sufficient entry to invest the ward with actual seizin; and on the marriage of the ward the authority of the guardian ceases, so far as the right of the ward is concerned.

2. A wife, unless she be entitled to a sole and separate estate, can bring no suit without the union of her husband in relation to her property or interests, either real or personal, legal or equitable.

In equity. The complainant [Ann E. McKnight] states that she is a daughter and one of the heirs at law of Anthony Preston, deceased, who died intestate, seized of considerable real estate, leaving a widow and five other children besides the complainant. That she married James M. McKnight while under the age of 21 years, and the ward of Jacob Gideon. That upon the treaty of said marriage it was especially agreed and stipulated between her intended husband and her guardian that the estate of the complainant should be settled upon her and her heirs, free from any control of her intended husband, and from all liabilities for his debts. That her husband has not entered in fact upon any portion of said estate, nor received the rents and profits, nor seized in her right of her undivided interest therein; nor hath she made entry therein. That certain creditors of her husband have levied a fieri facias upon a life interest in her estate, who are made defendants in this suit. That without such ante-nuptial agreement the title of her husband as tenant by the courtesy, has not accrued, by reason of there having been no entry by her or him upon any part of the premises, but that the whole of said estate has remained awaiting partition and subject to dower. The prayer of the claimant was, that a decree be passed for the purpose of carrying into effect the ante-nuptial agreement, and that her husband be decreed to have no estate or interest in the premises, and that the creditors be enjoined from further proceedings, &c.

The defendants [James M. McKnight, James M. Small, John F. Dyer, Esau Pickerell, John F. Pickerell, William McVeigh, and James H. McVeigh] answering, admitted the facts as stated in the bill. That the husband of the complainant had issue by her born alive, and was entitled as tenant by the courtesy inchoate (his wife being still alive) to a life interest in one undivided fifth part, subject to the widow's dower in the whole. That if any ante-nuptial contract was made it never was reduced to writing, and is therefore null and void, so far as the defendants are concerned. That in point of law, the possession of the joint coparceners, and the reception of the rents and profits of the guardian, is equivalent to a reception thereof by the infant coparceners, and that the complainant, as one of the coparceners, has had an actual legal seizin of said estate. That the pendency of the partition proceedings cannot affect their right to enforce their judgments.

Sam'l Chitten, for defendants, says the grounds alleged in the bill for equitable interposition on behalf of the complainant are: First, An ante-nuptial agreement in contemplation and consideration of the intended marriage between the complainant and James M. McKnight, made between said James M. McKnight and said Jacob Gideon, the guardian of the complainant, to settle all the property of the complainant to her sole and separate use. Secondly, That the husband, James M. McKnight, has never had seizin of his wife's interest in the legal estate in question. It is conceded that no settlement has ever been made. An agreement to settle is all that is relied upon for the complainant. Whether such agreement, if it ever had existence at all, was in writing or by parol, the allegations of the bill furnish no information; but as no written agreement is produced, and its non-production is wholly unaccounted for, we are warranted in assuming that if any agreement was in point made it was by parol. It is not proved that any agreement at all was written or parol was made. The only evidence touching this question is found in the deposition of Mrs. McKnight, the mother of the husband, and Mrs. Preston, the mother of the complainant. The affidavit of Mr. Gideon to the allegations of the bill is not evidence (certainly not upon a final hearing). The testimony of the two mothers apart from all bias, is altogether too loose and indefinite to establish the fact of the existence of any agreement at all, and if deemed by the court sufficient to establish the existence of an agreement, is yet so loose that it is impossible for the court to give effect to it by decree. But we insist that an ante-nuptial parol marriage agreement, even if a post-nuptial settlement, in pursuance of its terms, and reciting the fact of such agreement, be executed, and that too before the lien of the creditor attaches by judgment or execution, is yet void as to the creditor of the husband, whose debt has existence before the execution of the settlement. See 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 366, 367; and Reade v. Livingston, 3 Johns. Ch. 481, and authorities cited. If we are right in this position, then the bill of the complainant must be dismissed. As a femme covert she can only be entertained when suing separate from her husband, to enforce or protect an existing separate right or interest. As to the objection that the husband has never been seized, the control by the guardian of the estate, and receipt by him in his official character of rents, constituted a sufficient legal entry to invest the wards with actual seizin, if such seizin were necessary to confer upon the husband an interest liable for his debts (which however is denied). And upon the marriage, the authority of Gideon as guardian, so far as the complainant's rights and interests were concerned, ceased. And the same seizin and all were by operation of law transferred to and vested in the husband, and he could by no mere parol agreement, divest himself thereof. It is not very distinctly perceived, however, in what manner the question of the husband's seizin can affect the rights of the creditors, pending the lives of the husband and wife. If the wife were dead, a question might arise as between the husband and the heirs as to his title as tenant by the courtesy which might possibly be affected by the character or fact of his seizin during the coverture, but whilst the wife is living, unless she be entitled to a sole and separate estate, she can without the union of her husband bring no suit in relation to her property rights or interests, either real or personal, legal or equitable. So that if her claim to a separate estate be without foundation, she cannot be entertained in a court of equity upon either of the grounds alleged in the bill. If she have no right to a separate estate, her husband during the coverture is entitled to all her rights and interests, legal and equitable. If by reason of want of seizin on his part, or for any other reason, his interests in his wife's estate are not legally subject to execution or sale, or if irregularities in the management of the process of execution are likely to effect a sacrifice, if the wife have no sole and separate estate, the husband singly or in conjunction with his wife can alone interpose by suit, either at law or in equity, for redress or protection.

J. M. Carlisle, for complainant.

THE COURT by its decree dismissed the bill with costs, and dissolved the injunction.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1801.

COURTS — JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT — OFFSET — ARREST OF JUDGMENT.

In an action of debt for an amount large enough to support the jurisdiction of this court, it is no cause for arrest of judgment that the sum due is reduced by offsets to a sum for which the court would not have had original jurisdiction.

[Cited in Hellrigle v. Dulaney, Case No. 6,343.]

Debt. Verdict for the debt in the declaration mentioned to be discharged on payment of £3. 11s.—the plaintiff's demand being reduced to that sum by offsets.

Motion by Mr. Taylor, for defendant, for nonsuit; the sum being less than twenty dollars, and so not within the jurisdiction of this court.

Mr. Swann, for plaintiff, cited Gross v. Fisher, 3 Wils. 49.

Nonsuit refused.

NOTES — DAYS OF GRACE — MAKER — PLEADING AT LAW — NOL PROS OF COUNT — ASSESSMENT OF DAMAGES — SUM CERTAIN — JURY.

1. The custom of merchants as to days of grace does not apply as between the maker and payee.

2. A plaintiff may enter a nolle prosequi to any count in his declaration.

3. When the sum is certain, or may be reduced to a certainty by computation, the intervention of a jury to assess damages is unnecessary.

Appeal from Pulaski circuit court.

[This was a suit by John McLain against Samuel M. Rutherford.]

Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE, and TRIMBLE, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. Among the numerous points relied upon by the counsel to reverse the judgment of the court below, we deem it necessary only to notice two. First, it is contended that according to the custom of merchants the defendant was entitled to "days of grace," and consequently the action was brought before the instrument, upon which it was founded, became due. We are of opinion that the custom of merchants is not applicable to this case. From an examination of the instrument upon which the action was brought, it will be seen that it is merely a simple duebill, payable to the plaintiff himself, and not to him "or order." It is not negotiable, nor can it be transferred, unless by assignment, under the statute. But, had the note in this case been, from its phraseology, negotiable, even then, unless it had been actually transferred, the custom of merchants allowing days of grace would not apply. The custom of merchants does not apply to the immediate parties to the transaction, or, in other words, to the maker and payee. While a promissory note continues in its original form of a promise from one man to pay another, it bears no similitude to a bill of exchange. The resemblance begins from the first indorsement, and when once indorsed, the law relative to bills of exchange applies.

The second point we have thought worthy of notice is, that "the plaintiff had no right to enter a nolle prosequi on the second count, and take final judgment on the first." We are most clearly of opinion that the plaintiff, in discontinuing the second count, acted in strict conformity with the most approved practice; the plaintiff having the undoubted right to the control of his own case. We are also of opinion that the judgment on the first count was correctly taken, the intervention of a jury being unnecessary. The rule, as established by the supreme court of the United States (Renner v. Marshall, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 215), is this: Whenever an action is brought for a sum certain, or any sum that may be reduced to a certainty by computation, the intervention of a jury may be dispensed with. Judgment affirmed.

Case No. 8,869.

McLANAHAN v. ELLERY.

[3 Mason, 269.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1823.

PARTNERSHIP—DISSOLUTION—DIVISION OF CREDITS—ASSIGNMENT BY PARTNER—RIGHT OF ASSIGNEE AGAINST DEBTOR.

Where a firm put a debt, after the dissolution of the partnership, at the disposal of one partner, and gave information of it to the debtor, such partner has a right to assign it as security for his private debt, and in equity the assignee may maintain a suit for it against the debtor.

Bill in equity. The bill stated, that in the month of September, 1818, the mercantile house of Dorsey & McLanahan of New Orleans, of which house the plaintiff was the surviving partner, sold to one Frederic Montgomery, of Marseilles in France, goods to the value of $15,000. That previous to that sale, the said F. Montgomery had been a partner of the house of Montgomery, Fitch & Company, of said Marseilles, and that whilst so a partner, John S. Ellery, the defendant, became indebted to the said house of Montgomery, Fitch & Co. to the amount of $4097 15. That on the thirty-first of June, 1818, and after said Frederic Montgomery had dissolved his connexion with the said house of Montgomery, Fitch & Co., the said house addressed a letter to said Ellery, which they dated as follows, "We have handed to Mr. F. Montgomery an extract of your account current, being now in liquidation of our concerns while he was a partner. In the event you have not already taken dispositions for remitting us by some of your ships, it will accommodate us very much if you will hold the balance at his disposal;" which letter the defendant received, enclosed in one from said F. Montgomery, and to which last he replied in February, 1818, promising to pay the balance so due from him, in Boston, in the course of the ensuing summer, provided the said balance had not been already remitted to Marseilles or paid by one Samuel B. Edes, whom he had entrusted to pay the same, in the event of his selling a cargo of elephant's oil belonging to the defendant at Gibraltar; which balance the bill stated, was not remitted by said Edes, or ever paid by said Ellery. That said F. Montgomery, on the thirteenth March, 1819, in order to secure to the plaintiff, as surviving partner of the house of Dorsey & McLanahan, the amount so due to that house from said F. Montgomery, for the goods purchased as beforementioned, drew a bill of exchange on said Ellery, payable to the order of the plaintiff, for the sum of $4000, showing to the plaintiff at the time the correspondence between said Montgomery and the defendant, relative to said balance of account; and that said F. Montgomery did also, at the same time, assign over to the plaintiff, in due legal form, the said balance. That the bill of exchange was presented to the defendant, and notice given him of the said assignment, but that he refused to accept the said bill or to pay over the said balance to the plaintiff.

The defendant in his answer admitted the facts as set forth in the bill, and stated that the only reason for refusing to pay the said F. Montgomery in the first instance, and afterwards the complainant, the balance so due from him, was his apprehensions that said Edes might pay it for him in Europe, either by the remittance of money or merchandise, the said Edes being in India, and not in a situation to receive intelligence from him the said Ellery. That some time in the latter part of the summer of 1820, Messrs. Munson & Barnard, of said Boston, as agents of Asa Fitch, Jun., who claimed to be the liquidator of the concerns of Montgomery, Fitch, & Co., called upon the defendant, and handed him a letter written to the defendant by said Fitch, dated March 1, 1820, enclosing a printed circular, bearing date February 28, 1820, giving notice of the dissolution of the firm of Montgomery, Fitch & Co., and that said Fitch was exclusively charged with the liquidation of the concern, and that the said letter stated to the defendant, that he said Fitch had authorized said Munson & Barnard to call on the defendant for the balance of account due Montgomery, Fitch & Co., as stated on the 30th June, 1818, and given them a power of attorney to receive it. That the said letter also enclosed an open letter addressed to the defendant by said F. Montgomery, dated February 18, 1820, in which he said, "Having been requested by Messrs. Montgomery, Fitch & Co. to settle your account with these gentlemen as per their letter to you under date of the 30th June, 1818, I made over and drew on you for the same, order of James J. McLanahan, Esquire, and by my respects of the 13th March, 1819, you were authorized to understand with him on that business. This cession having been made after I learned the unfortunate necessity that my friends were under of suspending their payments on the 4th January, 1819, and not having been debited with same in my account with them, I have no claim to this debt, which can only be disposed of by Messrs. Montgomery, Fitch & Co., and I hereby renounce all pretensions thereto, and annul the cession made to Mr. McLanahan, of which you will please take due note." And that the said Messrs. Munson & Barnard also exhibited to the defendant a paper, purporting to be an agreement made between one Francis Clapier, as attorney of the plaintiff, on the one part, and by Montgomery, Fitch & Co. on the other, being dated the 20th June, 1819, in which the said Clapier, for the said plaintiff, released all his claims upon said Montgomery, Fitch & Co., as acceptors of four bills of exchange, amounting together to the sum of 56,500 francs, and one other for the sum of 32,700 francs, reserving, however, all the plaintiff's rights against the said F. Montgomery. That the said instrument also contained, on the back thereof, a receipt of the said Clapier, in which he acknowledged to have received certain sums of money on account of the said bills, which receipt bore date November 2, 1819; and that the defendant having declined to account with said Munson & Barnard in consequence of his engagements to the plaintiff, the said Munson & Barnard, on the 2d September, 1820, instituted a suit against him in the name of Montgomery, Fitch & Co., to recover said balance, which suit was still pending in the supreme court of Massachusetts. The cause came on for a hearing upon the bill and answer and documents, all the papers being admitted to be duly proved.

Mr. Webster, for plaintiff.
Mr. Hubbard, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. There is no controversy as to the facts in this case; the principal question is, whether the bill of exchange and assignment to the plaintiff, stated in the bill and answers, were sufficient to pass a title to the property, to the plaintiff. The substance of the case is this; the defendant owed a debt to the firm of Montgomery, Fitch & Co. of Marseilles. On the dissolution of their partnership they apprized the defendant that they had put that debt "at the disposal" of one of the partners, F. Montgomery, and requested him to pay it accordingly. The defendant assented to it, provided the debt was not paid by an agent of his, then expected to go with his ship to Marseilles. The debt was not paid by the agent. In the meantime, F. Montgomery, being indebted to the plaintiff (as surviving partner of a firm at New Orleans,) as security for that debt drew a bill of exchange for the supposed balance in the hands of the defendant, and two days afterwards executed an assignment of the same balance to the plaintiff. The bill was refused acceptance by the defendant, and the assignment was duly notified to him. Upon these transactions, there can be no doubt that in equity the debt passed by the assignment to the plaintiff, unless the partner was incompetent to assign it for his own private debt. Assuming that, as partner, he was so incompetent, yet it is very clear, that the partners, by putting it at his disposal, and requesting the payment to be made to him, gave him an absolute right to receive it, or dispose of it, in any manner he might choose. In short, as to any third person, he became the complete proprietor. If any doubt could remain on this point, it is completely extinguished by the subsequent ratification of the other partners, as to this very assignment, contained in the letter of Fitch addressed to Messrs. William & J. Brown, in June, 1819. The assignment then was originally good and valid, and the defendant has shown nothing to prevent its full operation. The subsequent attempt of F. Montgomery to defeat this assignment, by a revocation, is entirely void. He can no more take away this, than any other security bona fide given to his creditor. The negotiation in Marseilles by Mr. Clapier, as agent of the plaintiff, absolved the firm of Montgomery, Fitch & Co. only, from liability to the plaintiff; but left his rights as a creditor in full force against F. Montgomery. The debt therefore, for which the assignment was given as security, remaining unpaid, the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for the amount of the balance in the hands of the defendant; and I shall accordingly so declare. Decree accordingly.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION—ORDINANCE—GAMING—STATE LAW.

The common council of Alexandria, have power to prohibit by their by-laws, the keeping of gaming-tables in the town, under a penalty to be recovered by warrant before the mayor, in the name of the common council, and to be levied upon the goods and chattels of the offender, although he may be also liable to prosecution under the laws of Virginia, adopted by the act of congress of the 27th of February, 1801 [2 Stat. 103].

[Cited in Town of Van Buren v. Wells (Ark.) 14 S. W. 40; State v. Lee, 29 Minn. 453, 13 N. W. 915.]

Trespass against the defendant (who was a constable,) for levying a penalty of $20, under the by-law of the 15th of June, 1816, for keeping a faro-table. By the amended charter of 1804 (section 5) the common council of Alexandria has power to make "all laws which they shall conceive requisite," "for the regulation of the morals and police of the town," and "for the prevention and removal of nuisances," "and to enforce the observance of their said laws by reasonable penalties and forfeitures to be levied upon the goods and chattels of the offender," provided that such laws shall not be inconsistent with the laws and constitution of the United States.

Mr. Mason, for plaintiff, contended that the power to make by-laws, was not intended to give the corporation power to make laws concerning matters which were already regulated by the general law of the land; but only concerning such subjects as affected the morals or police of the town exclusively. That the offence was already provided for and prohibited by the act of assembly of Virginia of the 19th of January, 1798, p. 373. That gaming did not affect the town exclusively. That the plaintiff might be twice punished for the same offence, if he was liable to this penalty.

Mr. Taylor, contra. This by-law applies exclusively to the police of the town. The penalty is for keeping the gaming-table in the town, which is a circumstance of aggravation of the offence, and is necessary to the conviction.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion, that the corporation had power to pass the by-law, and to enforce it in this manner.

McLAUGHLIN v. TURNER.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 476.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1807.

PLEADING AT LAW—ASSUMPSIT—ACCOUNT COUNT—ACCOUNT FILED—DAY STATED.

1. Upon a count "for sundry matters properly chargeable in account, as by account annexed," it is not necessary that the account should be such as would be evidence per se under Act Md. 1729, c. 20.

2. The day stated in the declaration is not material, so that the articles were delivered and payable before the action brought.

The first count of the declaration stated that the defendant [Samuel Turner] was indebted to the plaintiff [McLaughlin's administrator] "for sundry matters properly chargeable in account, as by an account there-unto annexed." The second count was for board and lodging, and other necessaries for twelve months. The plaintiff produced an account for a tavern-bill, and proved that he presented the account to the defendant, who said there were other credits on a former account, and he would produce them, and settle the account.

Caldwell & Morsell, for defendant, contended that the evidence did not support the first count, and that no evidence could be given upon that count, but an account which would in itself have been evidence under the act of 1729 (chapter 20), under which act alone they contended the count was good. The issues were non assumpsit and limitations. There was no demurrer.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) said, if the count is bad, he might have demurred, or might move in arrest of judgment. But if the count is good, there can be no question but that the evidence offered will support it.

Mr. Morsell contended also, that the plaintiff could not give in evidence any charge for articles delivered before the 4th of May, 1805, the day laid in the declaration.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) said the day was immaterial, so that the articles were delivered and payable before the action brought.

NAVY — ENLISTMENT — MINORS — CONSENT OF FATHER—HABEAS CORPUS.

1. The statutes in regard to the enlistment of minors in the navy of the United States, reviewed.

2. Under section 1 of the act of March 2, 1837 (5 Stat. 153), it is unlawful to enlist boys for the navy, unless they are boys not under thirteen nor over eighteen years of age, and unless, when they are of that description, they enlist with the consent of their parents or guardians, and unless they enlist to serve until they arrive at the age of twenty-one years.

3. In this case, a person who, when he was eighteen years and five months old, enlisted in the navy for three years, without the consent of his father, who was then living, and took an oath, on enlistment, that he was twenty-two years of age, was discharged from such service, on habeas corpus, on the petition of his father, after one year and seven months of service, he himself declaring, on oath, that he desired to be discharged.

On habeas corpus.

Samuel B. Higenbotam, for petitioner.

Henry E. Davies, Jr., Asst. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. One John McLave, who was born on the 20th of November, 1850, enlisted, on the 23d of April, 1869, being then eighteen years and five months old, in the naval service of the United States, for the term of three years, without the consent of his father, who was then living. On enlisting, he took an oath, that he was twenty-two years of age. On the 26th of October, 1870, the father presented a petition to this court, praying for the discharge of McLave from service, he being on board the United States vessel of war Guerriere, in the harbor of New York. The grounds urged for the discharge are, that the enlistment was invalid for want of the consent of the father, and that the laws of the United States do not authorize the enlistment of minors into its naval service, except minors above the age of thirteen years and under the age of eighteen years, to serve until they became twenty-one years of age, and for no longer or shorter term.

The first statute of the United States in which any provision appears in reference to the enlistment of boys in the navy, was the act of June 30, 1798 (1 Stat. 575), the 5th section of which provided, that the president might permit a proportion of boys for the vessels of the navy of the United States, according to the exigencies of the public service. The act of April 21, 1806 (2 Stat. 390), provided, in its 3d section, that the public armed vessels of the United States, in actual service, in time of peace, should be officered and manned as the president should direct, provided that the whole number of able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, should not exceed nine hundred and twenty-five. The act of March 3, 1807 (2 Stat. 443), authorized the president, in addition to the then existing naval peace establishment, to employ not exceeding five hundred able seamen, ordinary seamen and boys, should the exigency of the public service require the same. The act of January 31, 1809 (2 Stat. 514), in its 2d section, authorized the president, in addition to the number of petty officers, able seamen, ordinary seamen and boys then authorized by law, to cause to be employed three thousand six hundred able seamen, ordinary seamen and boys, who should be engaged to serve for a period not exceeding two years, subject to be discharged sooner, if, in the judgment of the president, their service might be dispensed with. The act of January 2, 1813 (2 Stat. 789), in its 4th section, spoke of boys as part of the crews of naval vessels. By the act of May 15, 1820 (3 Stat. 606), the 2d section of the act of January 31, 1809, was amended, so far as to authorize the enlistment of able seamen, ordinary seamen and boys during the continuance of the service or cruise for which they should be enlisted, not, however, to exceed the period of three years. In no one of these statutes was there any provision requiring the consent of parents or guardians to the enlistment of boys. These statutes came before the circuit court in Massachusetts, for consideration, in the case of U. S. v. Bainbridge [Case No. 14,497], in 1816. Mr. Justice Story was of opinion that, by them, congress had authorized boys to be engaged in the service of the navy, without requiring the previous consent of their parents to the contract of enlistment, and that such contract, when fairly made with an infant of reasonable discretion, was binding to all intents and purposes. The district judge (Judge Davis) was of opinion that the consent, either expressed or implied, of the parent or guardian, where there was one, was necessary, to authorize the engagement of a minor in the naval service.

We come now to the last statute that has been passed in regard to enlistments in the navy. It is the 1st section of the act of March 2, 1837 (5 Stat. 153). The title of that act is, "An act to provide for the enlistment of boys for the naval service, and to extend the term of the enlistment of seamen." The 1st section of it is as follows: "It shall be lawful to enlist boys for the navy, with the consent of their parents or guardians, not being under thirteen nor over eighteen years of age, to serve until they shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years; and it shall be lawful to enlist other persons for the navy, to serve for a period not exceeding five years, unless sooner discharged by direction of the president of the United States; and so much of an act entitled 'An act to amend the act entitled "An act to amend the act authorizing the employment of an additional naval force,"' approved fifteenth May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, as is inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be, and is hereby, repealed." This statute was considered by Attorney General Stanbery, in an opinion given by him to the secretary of the navy, in Gormley's Case, 12 Op. Atty. Gen. 258. He says: "The act of March 2, 1837, authorizes the enlistment of boys between the ages of thirteen and eighteen, with consent of their parents or guardians, to serve until twenty-one; but it also provides that other persons may be enlisted for a period not exceeding five years, unless sooner discharged. The latter clause of this act would seem to include minors above the age of eighteen, and extends the period for which they and other seamen may be enlisted; while the former clause of the act purports to take away the authority to enlist minors under that age, except with the consent of their parents or guardians. But this restriction in regard to the enlistment of minors under the age of eighteen, requiring the consent of their parents or guardians, necessarily implies that congress intended to dispense with such consent in the enlistment of minors above that age. It follows, therefore, that the enlistment of minors above the age of eighteen, as is the case in the army, seems to be valid without the consent of the parents or guardians." The argument urged against this construction of the act of 1837 is, that the first clause of the 1st section relates to "boys for the navy," and not merely to boys not under thirteen nor over eighteen years of age; that the second clause of that section relates to "other persons for the navy," that is, other persons than boys or male minors, and not other persons than boys or male minors not under thirteen nor over eighteen years of age; that, if the second clause, under the words, "other persons," includes male minors over the age of eighteen years, it must also include male minors under the age of thirteen years; and that such a construction as to minors under the age of thirteen years is against the spirit and intent of the act. This view of the statute necessarily makes unlawful the enlistment of boys over eighteen years of age, even with the consent of their parents or guardians. The other view would authorize the enlistment of boys under the age of thirteen years without the consent of their parents or guardians. But congress, in all the acts, prior to that of 1837, which authorized the employment of boys in the navy, made no restriction as to the age of the boy and required no consent of parent or guardian. The question as to the proper construction of the act of 1837 is a difficult one. But, on the whole, I think it is the better opinion, that it makes unlawful the enlistment of boys for the navy, unless they are boys not under thirteen nor over eighteen years of age, and unless, when they are of that description, they enlist with the consent of their parents or guardians, and unless they enlist to serve until they arrive at the age of twenty-one years. The words, "other persons," in the 1st section of the act, means, adult males. Congress, by the act, would seem to have adopted a new policy in regard to the enlistment of minors for the navy, namely, that of not allowing them to be enlisted of every age under majority, but of permitting them to be enlisted only at such age, above that of thirteen years, as will insure a service by them of at least three years before they shall become adults, and of requiring them to enlist to serve until they shall become adults, and of making the consent of their parents or guardians necessary, in view of the fact that the service is to continue during the entire remainder of their minority. An analogous policy appears in the 3d section of the act of June 12, 1858 (11 Stat. 318), which provides that "it shall be lawful to enlist boys in the United States marine corps, with the consent of their parents or guardians, not being under eleven nor over seventeen years of age, to serve until they shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years." Under that provision it was held, by the court of quarter sessions in Philadelphia, in the case of Com. v. Selfridge [7 Phila. 76, 81], that the enlistment of a minor under seventeen years of age, in the marine corps of the United States, without the consent of his father, was void.

In the present case, the person enlisted was not enlisted on the idea entertained by the officers enlisting him that he was a minor, but on the understanding that he was an adult. The return to the writ of habeas corpus avers, that McLave was twenty-two years of age when he enlisted. The testimony of his parents shows that he was born on the 20th of November, 1850, and it is proved that he enlisted without the consent of his father. On his examination before the court, he testified that he desired to be discharged from the naval service. His enlistment having been unlawful, it was unlawful not only as against himself but as against the rights of his father, as his natural guardian; and his father, by virtue of such rights, is authorized to prosecute the writ for his discharge. In re Ferrens [Case No. 4,746]. Moreover, although the petition for the writ does not state that McLave desires to be discharged, yet, as he has declared on oath that he does desire to be discharged, he will be regarded, in this case, in view of his unlawful enlistment, as himself applying for his discharge.

I do not intend, by any thing I have said, to assent to the proposition, that congress cannot authorize the enlistment of minors in the service of the United States, without the consent of their parents or guardians.

An order will be entered directing the discharge of McLave.

RIGHT TO INSPECT COURT RECORDS—STATUTE—RULE OF COURT.

An unlimited right of a citizen of the United States to inspect and examine all the records and papers belonging to the court does not exist. Such right exists only as allowed by statute or rule of the court.

[Cited in Re Chambers, 44 Fed. 789.]

At law.

Thomas Campbell, for McLean.

Geo. Hoardly and W. M. Bateman, for clerk.

Before BAXTER, Circuit Judge, and SWING, District Judge.

SWING, District Judge. This is a petition filed by Mr. J. R. McLean and the Enquirer Company, in which they set out that heretofore, to-wit, on the 7th day of November, 1879, application was made to Thomas Ambrose, clerk of this court, by J. H. Woodward, an agent of said Enquirer Company, for leave to inspect during office hours books containing the docket and minute entries, judgments, and decrees of the said district court and the United States circuit court, and that the said clerk then and there refused the said J. H. Woodward the privilege to so inspect or examine the books aforesaid. Your applicants would, therefore, respectfully ask the court to order that the judgments and decrees of said court, including the fee books and other books containing the public records and orders of said court, be open to the inspection of the said J. H. Woodward, agent of the said Enquirer Company and of said John R. McLean, under such regulations as to the court may seem proper. With this application there is filed the affidavit of one James H. Woodward, in which he says that he is employed by the Cincinnati Enquirer Company, a corporation doing business under the laws of the state of Ohio, and that acting under the orders of John R. McLean, the manager of said corporation, he made personal application to Thomas Ambrose, clerk of the United States circuit and district courts, for permission to examine the public record, fee books and decrees of said court, and permission was refused him by the said Thomas Ambrose, clerk as aforesaid; and said application was renewed on this day and date by him, as a citizen having the right to inspect said books, decrees and minutes, and was again refused.

To this application there is filed by the clerk a demurrer on the ground, that the petition does not contain facts sufficient to entitle the applicants to the order they pray for.

This proceeding, in one sense at least, is adversary in its character, and yet it is based upon the alleged refusal by an officer of this court of permission to exercise an alleged right of the petitioner. The right which they allege was refused was that of having one J. H. Woodward to inspect, during office hours, books containing the docket and minute entries, judgments and decrees of the district court and the United States circuit court. This right is based solely upon the ground that John R. McLean is a citizen of the United States and that the Enquirer Company is located in the United States. It is not claimed for either that they have any interest in the docket or minute entries, judgments and decrees recorded in said books. If the prayer of the petitioners prayed simply for the right which they claimed an officer of this court had deprived them of, there would be no difficulty in determining the case. But such is not the fact. They pray for an order that the judgments and decrees of said court, including the fee books and other books containing the public records and orders of said courts, be open for the inspection of one J. H. Woodward. It will be seen at a glance that their prayer is greatly beyond what they allege they were not permitted to examine. That was the books containing the docket or minute entries of the judgments and decrees, but this is not only that the judgments and decrees may be examined, but that all other books containing the public records and orders of the court shall be opened to their inspection. So much for the allegations of the petition itself.

But let us see how the allegation of the right, which they allege they were deprived of, is supported by the affidavit which has been filed. The petition says that the application was for leave to inspect the books containing the docket and minute entries, judgments and decrees. The affidavit of the man Woodward is that he applied for permission to examine the public records, fee books, and decrees, showing clearly and conclusively that the petition is not supported by the affidavit. Such is this application, as shown from the papers filed. But it is claimed that notwithstanding the variance between the allegations of the petition and the prayer, and the variance between the proof and allegations, petitioners are entitled in law to the order prayed for; that they are so entitled by the statutes of the United States, or if not by them, they are by the common law entitled to it; that all the books and papers of a court of record are subject to the examination and inspection of any citizen, whether he have any personal interest in them or not; that it is his high and indefeasible right, at any time he pleases during office hours, to make such inspection. If this is true, it is very clear that the petitioners are entitled to the order prayed for. The doctrine is a new and strange one, and certainly finds no support in any adjudication which I have been able to find, and I am very certain none can be produced sustaining any such proposition. But the very formation, purposes and duties of a court forbid such an idea. The court is composed of judge, ministerial and executive officers, together with the attorneys that are members of it. To this body so organized are committed for determination the highest interests of the citizen in his property, his reputation and his person. And a careful record of every step which may be taken in relation to either must be carefully made; every paper connected with any proceeding affecting any one in either of these must be carefully filed and preserved. The title to the entire property of the whole country passes through the courts of this country almost in every half century. They are the repositories of the rights of persons and of property, and in many cases the only evidence of either, and the law imposes upon the court the duty of their secure and careful protection and preservation; a protection and preservation which would be greatly jeopardied if every citizen of the United States at his pleasure and will should be permitted to examine and inspect them in his own way. Not only is such an idea in opposition to the formation, purposes and duties of the court, but it is clearly in opposition to the views of the highest judicial and legislative branches of this government. At a very early day, the supreme court of the United States adopted a rule, known as the fourth rule, which provides that "all motions, rules, orders, and other proceedings made and directed at chambers, or on rule days at the clerk's office, whether special or of course, shall be entered by the clerk in an order book, to be kept at the clerk's office, on the day when they are made and directed, which book shall be open at all office hours to the free inspection of the parties in any suit of equity and their solicitors." If the supreme court believed that all the books and records belonging to the court were open to the inspection of every citizen of the United States, why did they enact such a rule? Or why did they limit the right of inspection to parties and their solicitors? This rule itself is the most convincing proof that no such right, as claimed by the petitioners, was supposed by the judges of the supreme court to have existed.

But it is claimed by the learned counsel for the petitioners that there is a difference between suits in equity and at law; that there could hardly be a case in equity in which the government could have any interest. It is not perceived by the court upon what reason there can exist any difference in the care and custody of the records and papers in equity causes and actions at law, but learned counsel are mistaken in regard to the interest of the government in equity causes. The records of this court show numerous causes in equity in which the government of the United States is plaintiff. But it is said, if that is so, that the citizen is a party in interest, and would have a right to look into the records. In some general political sense it may be true that the citizen is a party in interest in every suit prosecuted in the name of the United States; but in a legal sense he is not such a party in interest as is contemplated by this rule.

That congress entertained the same view is abundantly shown by its acts. In 1848 [9 Stat. 292], it enacted a law providing that "all books in the office of the clerks of the circuit and district courts containing the docket or minute of the judgments or decrees thereof, shall during office hours be open to the inspection of any person desiring to examine the same without any fees or charge therefor." If congress believed the right already existed, why did they think it necessary to create such right by special legislation? Or if they believed it ought to exist, why did they limit the right to particular books, such only as contained the docket or minutes of the judgments or decrees? And again, by the act of February, 1875 [18 Stat. 333], congress provided: "That the accounts and vouchers of clerks, marshals, and district attorneys shall be made in duplicate to be marked 'original' and 'duplicate,' and it shall be the duty of the clerk to forward the original accounts and vouchers of the officers above specified, when approved, to the proper accounting officers of the treasury, and to retain in his office the duplicate which shall be open for public inspection at all times." If the public had the right already to inspect such papers, why did congress deem it necessary to create such a right by the passage of this act?

It is, therefore, very clear to my mind that the unlimited right of a citizen of the United States to inspect and examine all the records and papers belonging to the court does not exist. The right to examine certain records and papers does exist. It exists as to the books containing the docket or minute entries of the judgments and decrees of the court, and these the petitioners allege that they have been refused by an officer of this court. The prayer of the petition is not in accordance with this averment, and the affidavit is different from both. This petition, however, must be governed by the rules of pleading in other cases, so far as the demurrer is concerned. If the party is entitled to any part of the relief he prays for a general demurrer must be overlooked.

This application for the interference of the court is based upon the allegation that the petitioners have been deprived of a right given them by the law by an officer of the court. This is denied on behalf of the officer by two members of the bar, who are officers also of this court, and who appear in this proceeding on behalf of the clerk. This is a charge which the court is interested in having examined, and the truth or falsity thereof established. The demurrer will therefore be overruled, but no order will be made until a further hearing of the matter is had before the court, when we shall finally determine whether the petitioners are entitled to the order as prayed for.

The judges afterwards granted ex gratia what they ruled the petitioner was not entitled to, as a matter of law.

District Court, North Carolina.[2] 1869.

BANKRUPTCY — AMENDMENT BY IMPLICATION—EXEMPTION.

The approval by congress of the new constitution of North Carolina, does not operate as an amendment of the bankrupt law with respect to the additional exemptions therein provided for. A bankrupt is not entitled to an exemption of one thousand dollars in real estate, and five hundred dollars in personal property, under the new constitution.

Question certified by Wm. A. Guthrie, register. Is the bankrupt entitled to an exemption of one thousand dollars in real estate, and five hundred dollars in personal estate, as provided in the constitution of North Carolina, article ten, sections one and two?

[2] [District not given.]

Brief of J. W. Hinsdale, attorney for assignee: First. Section 14, bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 522], provides that "such other property as now is, or hereafter shall be exempted from attachment, seizure, or levy on execution by the laws of the United States, and such other property as is exempted from the levy and sale by the laws of the state in which the bankrupt has a domicile, at the time of commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such state exemption laws in force in the year 1864, shall be excepted from the operation of the provisions of that section." The present constitution of North Carolina, under which the bankrupt claims an exemption, was not in force in the year 1864.

Second. But it is urged by the bankrupt that this constitution, having been approved by congress, has thereby become a law of the United States, and must be administered as such by the bankruptcy court, with regard to its homestead exemptions. It is insisted, however, by the assignee, that this constitution was not enacted by congress. It does not appear in the official copy of the laws of congress. (See acts and resolutions of the United States passed at the second session of the fortieth congress.) The approval by congress was restricted to the question "whether it is republican in form." Article 4, section 4 of the constitution of the United States, provides that "the United States shall guarantee to every state in this Union a republican form of government." Without yielding the point that congress had no right to interfere with the previous constitution of this state, which was republican in form, it is maintained that the only question upon which congress is competent to pass is, as to the form of a proposed constitution, whether it be republican or not. It is the province of the judiciary to decide all the other questions regarding it. This view of the case is supported by the language used in the preamble of the act of congress entitled "An act to admit the states of North Carolina, &c., to representation in congress," to wit: "Whereas, the people of North Carolina, South Carolina, &c., have, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled 'An act for the more efficient government of the rebel states,' passed March 2d, 1867 [15 Stat. 2], and the acts supplementary thereto, framed constitutions of state government which are republican." See act of congress passed June 25, 1868 [Id. 73].

Third. But granting that the congress of the United States intended to approve and ratify the constitution of North Carolina in the fullest extent, such approval and ratification do not render valid a law, which violates the constitution of the United States. Congress itself cannot enact such a law. The exemption laws in question are unconstitutional, as having the effect to prevent the collection of debts. (See fifth amendment to the constitution of the United States, identical with section 12 of the bill of rights of the state of North Carolina, which was construed by the supreme court of North Carolina in Barnes v. Barnes, 8 Jones [N. C.] 372; Hoke v. Henderson, 4 Dev. 12. "A creditor has a vested right in his debt. It is a part of his estate or property in the broad sense in which the word is used in the section above cited.") Manifestly the exemption from execution of all a debtor's property, is an indirect but thoroughly effectual mode of depriving his creditors of his debt, and it is admitted on all hands, that the fifteen hundred dollar valuation will embrace the whole estate of ninety-nine debtors out of every hundred in North Carolina. A state constitution derives none of its binding force from any action congress may take upon it, but from the people of the state from whom it emanates.

Fourth. The provisions of our constitution in question under a retrospective construction, are in violation of that provision of the constitution of the United States which prohibits the states from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts, and are therefore void. Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 206; Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 1; Mason v. Haile, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 370; Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 311; McCracken v. Hayward, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 608. While it is admitted that the states have power in a certain degree over the remedy on a contract, they may not abuse that power in reference to any remedy, so far as to destroy the beneficial effects of the contract. Exemption laws which protect a reasonable amount of property from seizure may not be unconstitutional. Morse v. Goold, 1 Kern. [11 N. Y.] 281. But when they are framed to shield all of the property of nearly all of the citizens of a state, they invade the paramount law of the land, and are absolutely void. In the case of Jacobs v. Smallwood [63 N. C. 112], declaring stay laws unconstitutional, Mr. Justice Reade uses the following language: "The obligation of a contract is the duty of its performance—a full and complete compliance with its terms. Any statute which relieves a party from this duty or enables him to evade it, is void. If a stay law which postpones the enforcement of a contract but for a time, impairs its obligation, how much more so does one, which in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, has the effect to discharge the debtor altogether. Can there be a more certain and ready way to enable a party to evade the obligation of a contract, than to exempt from execution all his property; such a law may allow a man to be 'comfortable,' but surely holds out no inducement to him to be honest."

BROOKS, District Judge. The counsel for the bankrupt contends in effect, that the acceptance by the congress of the United States of the constitution of North Carolina, was in effect an amendment by congress of the bankrupt act of March 2d, 1867; and that the amendment thereby made had the effect to extend or alter the provisions, contained in the fourteenth section of the bankruptcy act, so as to embrace such a homestead, and such provision of personal property as is provided for in said constitution, in addition to the five hundred dollars in value, allowed to be exempted by said section. I am well satisfied that no amendment of the bankrupt law was contemplated by congress, in the act of acceptance referred to, and I am as well satisfied that that act had not the effect contended for. I have decided this question in the case of Thomas C. Dodson, certified from the fifth district, in which I filed an opinion which was published in October, 1868. I see no reason for changing the views expressed in that opinion. It is not necessary that I should determine the question presented by the counsel for the assignee, in regard to the retrospective character of the homestead provision in the North Carolina constitution, as I think it quite clear that the bankrupt is not entitled in any view of the case to the homestead or the personal property claimed by him.

Case No. 8,879.

In re McLEAN et al.

[15 N. B. R. (1877) 333.] [1]

District Court, D. Delaware.

BANKRUPTCY—PARTNERSHIP—JOINT ESTATE—INDIVIDUAL ESTATE—CREDITORS—CREDITOR PARTNER.

1. The joint estate of a partnership is first liable for the partnership debts, and the separate estate of the partners for the separate debts of its individual members, and neither class has a right to go on the fund primarily belonging to the other, until the creditors having preference are fully satisfied.

[Cited in Re Lloyd, 22 Fed. 91.]

2. The debt of a firm which has advanced money to an individual member beyond his share of the capital, is a separate debt of the firm as against the partner receiving the same, and the assignee of the firm may prove the debt in bankruptcy.

3. But while such claim may be proven by the assignee of the firm against the separate debtor partner, he cannot be permitted to come upon the separate estate of the debtor copartner for the use of the creditor copartner, until all the joint creditors are fully satisfied.

[Cited in Re Hamilton, 1 Fed. 811.]

4. A bankrupt creditor partner has no such equitable claim to his share in the separate estate of his debtor copartner, as that he can absolutely transmit it to his assignee in trust for himself, until all the firm creditors are paid.

5. His interest is altogether contingent on the sufficiency of the joint funds to pay the joint creditors; until these are fully satisfied there can be no right of enjoyment in the creditor bankrupt partner.

6. A decision which will satisfy all equities, and give consistent efficacy to all parts of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], is one which will permit the proof of the claim while it at the same time restrains the assignee from coming on the separate estate of the debtor bankrupt, until all the joint debts of the firm are fully satisfied.

William Canby was the assignee of John McLean & Son, and also of John McLean and John P. McLean, the individual members of that firm. John McLean & Son were bankers in the city of Wilmington, Delaware. Some twenty thousand dollars more than John P. McLean's share in the capital stock amounted to, was, during the course of business of the firm, advanced by John McLean (the father), to the firm for firm uses and purposes. Father and son shared equally in the profits of the concern. The assignee filed a petition to be permitted to take from the separate estate of John P. McLean, funds with which to pay this claim pari passu with the separate creditors of John P. McLean, and to distribute the same for the benefit of the joint creditors. The separate estate of John P. McLean was ample to pay all his separate debts, excluding this one. The joint estate showed no prospect of paying forty per centum of the amount of the joint debts.

BRADFORD, District Judge. On the 12th of June last, a rule to show cause why the prayer of the petitioner, William Canby, assignee in bankruptcy of John McLean and John P. McLean, trading as John McLean & Son, to obtain authority from this court to take from the separate estate of John P. McLean, funds, and apply the same to the payment of joint creditors pari passu with the separate creditors, was granted, and made returnable on the 26th day of the same month. William Bush, administrator of Maria T. Smith's estate, and as such a creditor of John P. McLean individually, opposed the granting of the petition, and was represented by the Hon. S. F. Bayard, as his counsel. The petitioner was represented by George H. Bates and Edward G. Bradford, Jr. The questions involved were argued at great length with much ingenuity and elaboration; and the confidence expressed by the counsel for the petitioner in the equity of the application, and the careful preparation they have given to the case, have induced me to go at greater length into its examination than I otherwise should have done. The direct object and purpose of the petitioner, for which he seeks the sanction of this court, stripped of all unnecessary verbiage, is to take money from a fund which is appropriated by law to the payment of one class of creditors to the exclusion of the other class until the first is fully satisfied, and apply the same pari passu between the separate and firm creditors in such manner that the separate fund is rendered insufficient to pay the separate creditors. Whether this may be done is the precise question to be answered, and all argument having a tendency to show what ought to be the law on this subject, arising out of the supposed equal equity between the separate creditors of the firm and the joint creditors, worked out through the medium of John McLean's equitable claim against his bankrupt partner, must give way to the actual state of the law as now existing on the subject of the distribution of the estate of the bankrupts, under the bankrupt act now in force.

The first question to be considered is, what is the law on this subject to be administered by a court of equity outside of the provisions of the bankrupt law? And the second is, has that law been changed by the bankrupt acts? It is the undoubted law of this country, decided and sanctioned by the supreme court of the United States, that the separate estate of insolvent partners must be first appropriated to the payment of the separate or individual creditors before it can be touched for the payment of the joint or partnership creditors. It is too late to enter on an examination of the reasons of the law and its equity. There was a short period during which joint creditors were permitted under a joint commission to prove against the separate estate, and come on that fund pari passu with the separate creditors. But that law was afterwards changed, and in England the result of the law is at last settled as above stated, with some exceptions not applicable to this case. Justice Story in his treatise on Partnership (section 376), says, "In the first place then, it is a general rule in bankruptcy, that the joint debts are primarily payable out of the joint effects, and are entitled to a preference over the separate debts of the bankrupt; and so, in the converse case, the separate debts are primarily payable out of the separate effects of the bankrupt, and possess a like preference, and the surplus only after satisfying such priorities can be reached by the other class of debts. For this purpose the joint estate and the separate of the bankrupt constitute separate funds to be administered separately by the assignees under the commission, whether it be a separate commission against one partner, or a joint commission against all the partners." Justice Story is not altogether satisfied with the certainty and definiteness of the equity underlying the decisions; but still states this to be the settled law of England, with three exceptions in which joint creditors shall be permitted to come on the separate property:—1. "Where the joint creditor is the petitioner for a separate commission against a bankrupt partner; 2. Where there is no joint estate and no living solvent partner; 3. Where there are no separate debts. In the first case the petitioning creditor may prove his debt, and share pari passu with the separate creditors in the separate estate. In the second case, all the joint creditors enjoy the same privilege; and in the third case, all the joint creditors share pari passu with each other." Mr. Gow, in his work on Partnership (pages 312-334), cited in note 1, Story, Partn. § 377, gives a statement of the decisions in England on this subject and arrives at the same result. Chancellor Kent, in Murray v. Murray, 5 Johns. Ch. 72, reviews all the law on this subject, stating Lord Hardwicke's rulings —Lord Thurlow's subsequent adverse decision by which he permitted the joint creditors to share pari passu with the separate creditors, and Lord Roselyn's restoration of the old rule, not to permit the joint creditors to share in the separate fund until the separate creditors were satisfied (with the exceptions as stated by Story, above quoted). The court of appeals of Maryland in McCulloh v. Dashiell, 1 Har. & G. 96–107, review the law on this subject, and after examining the authorities, say, "but this examination will satisfy us that amidst all the fluctuations of the rule the principles established in the first cases, occurring more than a century since, have been but for a short period materially encroached upon, and that now the leading principles of distribution, with some modifications, are what they were originally established to be;" and further on "we are thus disposed to adopt the ancient rule as more consonant to equity and justice, that the joint creditors can only look to the surplus after the payment of the separate debts; and on the other hand, that the separate creditors can only seek indemnification from the surplus of the joint fund after the satisfaction of the joint creditors." The Massachusetts cases in 9 and 10 Cush. and 10 and 13 Gray, cited by the counsel for the opposing creditor, all recognize this rule to be the established one in England; but ground their decisions on the language of their state insolvent act, which separates the funds and apportions them to different classes of creditors primarily, and then over to the other class after the preferred class has been satisfied. The statute of Massachusetts in this respect is, with the exception of the use of the word "company" for "partnership," identical with the national bankrupt act now in force, and these decisions will be hereafter referred to for another purpose.

This separation of the funds and their appropriation to the two classes of creditors, so that neither class can share in the fund appropriated to the use of the other until the latter has been fully satisfied, is recognized by the supreme court of the United States as the settled law of this country. The exceptions not pertinent to this case which have been above recited as attaching to the English rule are not considered as law in this country. Murril v. Neill, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 421. The case arose on the construction of a deed of trust for the benefit of creditors. The premises conveyed by the deed were the private property of one of the insolvent partners. It was held by the court (Daniels, Justice, delivering the opinion), that the deed on a proper construction passed the property to his separate creditors; but if such was not a proper construction, on the well-settled principles of equity, as established in England and in this country, the separate estate was set apart for the separate creditors, and could not be infringed on by the joint creditors until all the former had been fully satisfied. As the rulings of the supreme court are obligatory on this one, and as the case is precisely in point, I shall extract from it at some length. The court say (page 426): "The rule in equity, governing the administration of insolvent partnerships, is one of familiar acceptation and practice; it is one which will be found to have been in practice in this country from the beginning of our judicial history, and to have been generally, if not universally received. This rule, with one or two eccentric variations in the English practice which may be noted hereafter, is believed to be identical with that prevailing in England, and is this: that partnership creditors shall in the first instance be satisfied from the partnership estate; and separate or private creditors of the individual partners from the separate and private estate of the partners with whom they have made private and individual contracts; and that the private and individual property of the partners shall not be applied in extinguishment of partnership debts, until the separate and individual creditors of the respective partners shall be paid. The reason and foundation for this rule, or its equality and fairness, the court is not called on to justify. Were these less obvious than they are, it were enough to show the early adoption and general prevalence of this rule, to stay the hand of innovation at this day at least under any motive less strong than the most urgent propriety." The court here gives a history of the establishment of the rule as now in force, of interest to the legal reader, but too long for insertion in this opinion, and concludes in these words: "The proper conclusion from these authorities we deem to be this, as is stated by Justice Story in his treatise on Partnership (section 376), where he says: 'It is a general rule,' etc., etc., in the words already above quoted from Story's Law of Partnership."

Chancellor Kent, in the third volume of his Commentaries (page 65), says: "The joint creditors have the primary claim on the joint fund in the distribution of the assets of bankrupt or insolvent partners, and the partnership debts are to be settled before any division of the funds takes place. So far as the partnership property has been acquired by means of partnership debts, these debts have in equity a priority to be discharged; and the separate creditors are only entitled in equity to seek payment from the surplus of the joint fund after satisfaction of the joint debts. The equity of the rule on the other hand equally requires that the joint creditors should only look to the surplus of the partners after payment of the separate debts. It was a principle of the Roman law, and it has been acknowledged in the equity jurisprudence of Spain, England, and the United States, that partnership debts must be paid out of the partnership estate; and private and separate debts out of the private and separate estate of the individual partner. If the partnership creditors cannot obtain payment out of the partnership estate, they cannot in equity resort to the private and separate estate until private and separate creditors are satisfied; nor have the creditors of the individual partners any claim upon the partnership property, until all the partnership creditors are satisfied. The basis of the general rule is, that the funds are liable on which the credit was given. In contracts with the partnership the credit is supposed to be given to the firm; but those who deal with an individual member rely on his sufficiency."

It is contended, however, by the petitioner, that the firm of "John McLean & Son" was a separate creditor of John P. McLean, one of the bankrupt partners, and that he as the assignee of the bankrupt firm succeeded to all its rights, and thus is entitled, at the suggestion of and for the benefit of the joint creditors, to prove the firm's debt against one of the bankrupt partners. It is argued that this is not the case of joint creditors going upon a separate fund, but that the assignee in this case, succeeding to all the rights of the firm against John P. McLean individually, is entitled in equity, as a separate creditor, to prove its claim against him and come on his separate estate pari passu with his other separate creditors. It is further argued that this is an equitable claim and can be proven in bankruptcy; and that the right is expressly given by the bankrupt act to all separate creditors to prove their separate claims, so that the petitioner would be deprived of a right granted by congress, were the court to refuse to allow the petition.

It is also insisted on, as a reason for allowing the assignee to prove the claim of this firm as a separate equitable claim against John McLean, and to come on his separate property pari passu with his separate creditors, that there would be no liability over from the firm to any of the separate creditors; and that admitting such proof would not present the objection of permitting competing creditors to strive for a fund for which when obtained they might be liable over to other parties. So that the question now arises, is there a separate debt which is provable under the bankrupt act against the separate estate of the said J. P. McLean? Story, in section 391 of his work on Partnership, says, "The like question may arise in the converse case when the joint creditors seek to prove a debt from a single partner to the partnership against the separate estate of that partner; and here also it is now the settled rule that when one partner has become indebted to the firm, or has taken more than his share out of the joint funds, the joint creditors are not to be admitted to prove against the separate estate of that partner until his separate creditors are satisfied, unless it can be shown that in drawing out the money the partner has acted fraudulently with a view to benefit his separate creditors at the expense of his joint creditors." Mr. Gow, in his treatise on Partnership, says on this point: "The law sanctioned by the authorities of Lord Talbot and Lord Hardwicke formerly was, that if the debt raised by the partners arose out of contract, as upon a loan by the partnership to him, the joint creditors might be admitted to prove against the separate estate in competition with the separate creditors. But the opinions entertained by these learned judges have been receded from in more modern times, and the settled doctrine now is that if the claim arise out of contract, the estates are to be administered jointly and separately as they are actually constituted at the time of bankruptcy; the joint creditors not being permitted to recall into the joint fund what one partner has by contract, express or implied subtracted from the joint, and applied in augmentation of his separate estate. This rule was introduced by Lord Thurlow who, having much considered the question, finally determined that the assignees in behalf of the joint could not prove against the separate estate, unless the partner had taken the joint property with a fraudulent intent to augment his separate estate." "The principle established by Lord Thurlow's decision—i. e., Ex parte Assignees of Lodge & Fendal [1 Ves. Jr. 166]—has been acknowledged and followed by Lord Eldon; and it is now an indisputable rule in bankruptcy that when the debt from one partner to the partnership was incurred with the privity of his copartners, proof by the joint against the separate estate will not be admitted." Chapter 5, § 3, pp. 16–18. See, also, the opinion of Lord Eldon in Ex parte Harris, 2 Ves. & B. 212, 213.

It will thus be seen that the law in England is against the petition on this particular point of permitting the joint creditors to prove the creditor firm's claim against a bankrupt copartner proven. Lord Eldon in case last cited draws no distinction between the cases where the proving creditor is or is not liable over to the competing creditors. He states that there are other principles on which the rule if founded than the one "that a partner cannot come in competition with separate creditors, nor as to the joint estate with the joint creditors." And while we cannot see that John McLean, or the firm as the trustee of his interests, could be liable over to the separate creditors of John P. McLean in case they could reach his separate property, yet we fail to perceive that this constitutes any reason why the rule of equity which has been laid down so positively and clearly should not be applied, and especially as there are other reasons or principles which justify the rule. For, among others, it would violate the well-known principle that the rights of the creditors are worked out through the medium of the partners. To permit the joint creditors, or the assignee for their benefit, to prove the separate claim of the firm against J. P. McLean's separate estate, or, which is the same thing in substance, the equitable claim of the creditor bankrupt, against his debtor bankrupt copartner, would assume that John McLean or his assignee (remitted to all his rights and liabilities) had a right to possess himself of and enjoy the proceeds of the equitable claim he had against his debtor copartner, equally with, or pari passu with the separate creditors of John P. McLean; whereas he had no such right, and could transmit none such to his assignee. There was no possibility of his having an enjoyable interest until all the partnership debts were paid. His liability in solido, covering all the property he might derive from any source other than the partnership, prevented this. In this case the records disclose the fact that the firm debts so far overbalance all the assets, joint and several, that there is no human probability of any one standing in John McLean's place ever being equitably entitled to a dollar from the separate estate of J. P. McLean. He only, under the most favorable circumstances, had a contingent equitable claim; but never had and most probably never could have any equitable right to the realization of this debt which he could transmit to his assignee either for his own benefit or that of the joint creditors of the firm. The separate creditors have the separate estates of the debtors and the residuum of the separate debtors' estate in the joint fund after the firm or joint creditors are all paid. The partnership creditors have primarily the joint fund or property of the firm to come upon, and afterwards all the separate estates of the separate partners, after all the separate creditors are fully satisfied. A bankrupt creditor of his bankrupt copartner has the residuum of the estate, separate and joint, belonging to the latter after all the separate creditors of the debtor bankrupt and the joint debts of the firm are fully satisfied. The first two classes of creditors have a present priority of right to come immediately on the funds appropriated for them, viz., the separate and joint estates. But the third class, viz., the bankrupt creditor partners of their bankrupt debtor copartners, have no such right; indeed have no fund whatever to come upon until all the partnership debts are first paid. To hold otherwise would be to ignore the well-settled rule that the rights of the creditors must be worked out through the medium of the partners.

The next question for consideration is: Is this mode of the distribution of the assets of an insolvent partnership, and of insolvent partners, altered by the provisions of the bankrupt law? for if it is, we must be guided implicitly by them, regardless of the settled rule which courts of equity in this country, and lately in England, have adopted. The act of congress having reference to this point is in these words (section 5121, Rev. St.): "The assignee shall be chosen by the creditors of the company. He shall keep separate accounts of the joint stock or property of the copartnership, and of the separate estate of each member thereof; and after deducting, out of the whole amount received by the assignee, the whole of the expenses and disbursements, the net proceeds of the joint stock shall be appropriated to pay the creditors of the copartnership, and the net proceeds of the separate estate of each partner shall be appropriated to pay his separate creditors. If there is any balance of the separate estate of any partner after the payment of his separate debts, such balance shall be added to the joint stock for the payment of the joint creditors. And if there is any balance of the joint stock after payment of the joint debts, such balance shall be appropriated to and divided among the separate estates of the several partners according to their respective right and interest therein, and as it would have been if the partnership had been dissolved without any bankruptcy; and the sum so appropriated to the separate estate of each partner shall be applied to the payment of his separate debts." The bankrupt law of 1841 [5 Stat. 440] has precisely this mode of distribution. Judge Nixon, U. S. district judge for the New Jersey district, in Re Melick [Case No. 9,399], has given his view of the meaning of this provision, both in the bankrupt law of 1841 and the present act. He says, "That section" (the 36th) "was first introduced into the bankrupt act of 1841, and in its main features embodied no new law, but was only declaratory of the equitable principles which the courts had adopted in the distribution of the bankrupt's assets. It was, nevertheless, proper and useful in this respect that it put to rest the long-mooted and much-discussed question of the power of the bankrupt court in administering the bankrupt's estate, to make orders for the marshalling of assets and the payment of partnership debts with partnership funds and separate debts with separate funds, without the intervention of proceedings by bill in equity." In Re Lane [Case No. 8,044], Judge Lowell says: "The first question is, whether the joint creditors of the firm can have recourse to the separate estate for money drawn out by him while the firm was solvent with the assent of his co-partners." "The general rule in bankruptcy is, that there can be no proof between the joint and separate estates of partners unless there is a surplus of the joint estate to be divided. This rule was adopted, partly as being on the whole equitable, on the supposition that the joint creditors had given credit to the joint estate, and the separate creditors to the separate estates respectively; and partly, I apprehend, upon the consideration that there is no such thing as a debt between partners or between a partner and his firm in respect to partnership matters, excepting upon a winding up of all the affairs. And it was found to be very expensive and inconvenient to go into a general accounting in bankruptcy, and it was thought more expedient as well as more just to take the estates as the parties left them." So that in this case the precise point is made and decided that the joint creditors cannot prove the debt of the creditor bankrupt partner as against his debtor bankrupt copartner. He denies that it is a debt of such character as to be provable under the bankrupt act, much less such a one as to let in the joint creditors through an equity in the creditor bankrupt partner against his copartner, upon the separate fund. This same point has been decided under the insolvent law of Massachusetts by the supreme court of that state in 10 Cush. 592. As before observed, that law, as regards the distribution of the insolvent's estate, holds the precise language of our bankrupt act, with the exception of using the word "company" for the word "partnership."

The counsel for the petitioner tried to break the force of this decision by saying that equitable claims could not be proven under the insolvent law of Massachusetts. But the court did not place their decision on any such ground, nor indeed did they allude to such an idea. On pages 597 and 598 they say: "Our statute on this subject must be our guide; and whether in accordance with the views of Lord Hardwicke, in favor of joint creditors being admitted to share in the distribution of the separate estate, or of Lord Thurlow, who held the contrary view, it is equally the law to be administered here." "The statute under which these proceedings in insolvency were instituted, and by virtue of which the assignees hold these assets, has declared that, in cases where proceedings are thus instituted against a copartnership, all the estate of the partnership and all the separate estate of the individual partner shall be passed into the hands of the assignees, that the avails thereof shall be kept distinct, and, 'that the net proceeds of the joint stock shall be appropriated to pay the creditors of the company, and the net proceeds of the separate estate of each partner shall be appropriated to pay his separate creditors; and if there shall be any balance of the separate estate of any partner after the payment of his separate debts, such balance shall be added to the joint stock for the payment of joint creditors; and if there shall be any balance of the joint stock, after the payment of the joint debts, such balance shall be divided and appropriated to and among the separate estates of the several partners.'" St. 1838, c. 163, § 21. In this case the court would not permit the claim to be proven as against the separate estate. There was no absolute refusal of the proof of the claim. Now, unless there is something more in our bankrupt act to give these joint creditors a right to go upon the separate estate of the said John P. McLean than has already been noticed, I would consider the above-cited case conclusive.

The counsel for the petitioner, however, claim that they have the right to prove an equitable claim held by the firm against one of the copartners, and if they have a right to prove, then they have a right to prove against the separate estate and come in pari passu with the separate creditors. Judge Lowell has denied the right to prove at all. He says it is not the kind of a debt provable in bankruptcy. But admitting it can be proven, does it follow that it must be paid pari passu out of the separate estate, with all the separate creditors? The supreme court of Massachusetts did not refuse to have the claim proven, but denied the right to let it in on the separate fund until all the separate creditors were paid. In section 14 of the bankrupt act, "all rights in equity" of the bankrupt descend to the assignee. In section 19 it is enacted that "all debts due and payable from the bankrupt, at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy," may be proved against the estate of the bankrupt. In the 1st section there is this language: "And the jurisdiction hereby conferred shall extend to all cases and controversies arising between the bankrupt and any creditor or creditors who shall claim any debt or demand under the bankruptcy; to the collection of all the assets of the bankrupt; to the ascertainment and liquidation of all the liens and other specific claims thereon; to the adjustment of the various priorities and conflicting interests of all the parties, and to the marshalling and disposition of the different funds and assets so as to secure the rights of all parties, and due disposition of the assets among all the creditors; and to all acts, matters, and things, to be done under and in virtue of the bankruptcy, until the final distribution and settlement of the estate of the bankrupt and the close of the proceedings in bankruptcy." In the 36th section are these words: "And all the creditors of the company and the separate creditors of each partner shall be allowed to prove their separate debts."

These are the chief, if not all the provisions of the act from which is derived the conclusion that the court is bound by its proper construction to allow the claim to be proven, and the assignee to come upon the separate estate for the benefit of the joint creditors. This act and its supplements must be construed, if possible, so that it shall be consistent with itself, and so that all its parts shall cohere and be made efficacious. I am not prepared to go to the length Judge Lowell has gone, in denying the proof of this claim; but I am very clear in forbidding the assignee, after proof is made, to touch the separate estate of John P. McLean until all his separate creditors have been paid. It is admitted that the firm can be the separate creditor of John P. McLean (or more exactly that the firm stands as a trustee of the creditor bankrupt debtor, for the firm can have no ultimate enjoyment or usufruct, indeed is incapable in its nature of having it, but only stands as a medium for accounting between the partners. Nevertheless as a legal entity it is treated as creditor and debtor to the partners individually). There was then an equitable claim the firm had against John P. McLean for money advanced by John McLean to the firm, over and above the amount he was called on to contribute as his share of the partnership funds. Judge Lowell, in Re Blandin [Case No. 1,527], says: "The 19th section of our statute makes provable all debts and liabilities, in language broad enough certainly to cover such as a trustee owes to his cestui que trust or a partner to his copartner," so that we can hardly suppose he meant later, in Re Lane [Id. 8,044], altogether to deny the right to prove the debt, but rather the right to the assignee to come in on the separate fund for the benefit of the joint creditors. I do not see how, without violating the express language of the 19th section of the bankrupt act, I can refuse to allow the claim to be proven. There are other reasons why the claim should be proven, conspicuous among which are these: 1. It is not beyond the contemplation of law, however improbable, that funds may not come to the hands of the assignee with which he could pay, in part or in whole, John P. McLean's indebtedness to the firm. Suppose after the bankruptcy the real estate or other property of the partnership had so risen in value as to be more than sufficient to pay off all the firm debts. Then the assignee, I apprehend, could let in himself as the assignee of the firm, pari passu with the separate creditors of John P. McLean on his separate estate. So that, to meet all possible contingencies, it is necessary to have the proof made in order that the estate should be properly distributed, for the assignee can pay no debt unless it is first proven. And the case might in contemplation of law arise when he had the funds in his possession, and the knowledge that there was a just and equitable claim by one partner or another, and demand the power to pay it. 2. John P. McLean, if his conduct is not impeached by fraud or other impropriety, which stands in the way of his discharge, is entitled to a certificate of discharge in bankruptcy. If it should be that this debt is not provable, then he is not free from his liability therefor, for it is only from such debts that his certificate discharges him. He should be entitled to discharge from this separate debt as well as from any other separate debt. And as one of the prominent features and intentions of the law is to give complete relief in the absence of fraud, it would fail of its purpose if he was decreed a discharge as respects this debt.

I have no hesitation in allowing the debt to be proven. I am however equally clear that the debt should not be proven against the separate estate, for the following reasons: 1. There is no reason to suppose that congress intended to alter the mode of distribution of the insolvent's estate as recognized by the later cases in England and the United States. On the contrary it is fair to infer that it meant to adopt and enact those decisions as the law of the land. 2. Any other construction would not permit this act as a whole to stand and give effect and operation to all its parts. 3. The act plainly commands that separate funds shall be appropriated to separate classes of creditors, who have a priority therein, which shall not be encroached upon until the preferred creditors are fully satisfied. Now it is asked that the assignee be permitted to take funds prohibited to one class until the other is fully satisfied, and appropriate them pari passu to both classes. The proving of this claim then with this result attached would be a mere device to accomplish a forbidden purpose, and as such should not be permitted. No application of the assignee to prove a partner's debt against his bankrupt copartner can deprive these joint creditors seeking their pro rata divisions of their character as joint creditors. They cannot be remitted to the character of separate creditors by and through the medium of an equity as John McLean, for he had, as before said, no equity to transmit until all the debts of the firm were paid. Such then being their character as joint creditors, there is no mode of escape from the conclusion that they cannot come on the separate estate pari passu with the separate creditors. 4. On this construction all the equities of the creditors are preserved; the joint creditors have their fund to go on, the separate theirs, and the creditor bankrupt of his debtor copartner his, should all the joint debts first be fully satisfied; but until then he cannot possess a quality, character, or merit which will change the character of the joint creditors to that of separate creditors, and enable them to come into the present possession of a fund which, as the record at present discloses, John McLean never could have touched.

Let an order be entered admitting the proof of the claim of the firm of John McLean & Son against John P. McLean, but restraining the assignee from applying any portion of the separate estate of John P. McLean until all his separate creditors are fully satisfied.

McLEAN et al. v. BROWN et al.

[4 N. B. R. 585 (Quarto, 188).] [1]

District Court, E. D. Missouri. 1871.

BANKRUPTCY — NONPAYMENT OF COMMERCIAL PAPER—SUSPENSION CONTEMPLATED BY LAW.

The non-payment of a single piece of commercial paper is not an act of bankruptcy in itself.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

for the reason that there may be a defense to it; but where such suspension is chronic, or there is an inability to meet and pay checks and notes as they mature, then that is such a suspension as the law contemplates, and even though there may be but a single piece of paper and fourteen days past due, the maker may be adjudged bankrupt.

[Approved in Re Hercules Mut. Life Assur. Soc., Case No. 6,402. Cited in Re Hadley, Id. 5,894.]

This was a petition by creditors to have the defendants [Brown, Weber & Co.] adjudged bankrupts, alleging that they had suspended payment of their commercial paper and had not resumed within fourteen days. Upon this suspension issue was taken. At the trial a check of the defendants given in payment of rent of the store they occupied in their business, and which had remained unpaid for more than fourteen days, was presented in evidence. It was also shown that they had been embarrassed for some time before the filing of the petition; that they drew checks without funds in bank to meet them, drawing checks upon one bank and depositing them in another so as to gain the time of a day in their passage through the clearing-house, and also drawing kiting bills, upon which they raised money. The bankrupts alleged that they had arranged for the delay of the paper overdue, and that they had not suspended payment; and that they were not insolvent and could have paid their debts as they matured, but for the filing of the petition, which had destroyed their credit and prevented them from fulfilling their obligations.

TREAT, District Judge. This case differs in its elements from any that have come before me, but the views expressed in previous opinions still remain unmodified. The suspension referred to in the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] is a general suspension of commercial paper, not the mere non-payment of a single note or bill which the debtor refuses to pay because he denies his liability, or does not pay for the reason that he has, as he supposes, arranged for an extension or delay of payment. The court, upon an application of this kind, will not sit to try the validity of the reasons for the non-payment of the note or bill; it is not a court for the mere collection of debts, and each case must be considered by itself in connection with the circumstances surrounding it. This firm may possibly be solvent and able from its assets to meet all demands if it can get indulgence. It may happen to any man in business to find himself in a condition in which he cannot realize his assets in time to meet his obligations as they mature, and he may need a short indulgence to enable him to collect what is due him; but in this case the difficulty had become chronic, and the firm could not meet their paper in the ordinary course of business, and in that sense they may be considered as being insolvent. It had become a system with them in the course of which checks are drawn and redrawn, post-dated, laid over; notes met by checks without funds, trusting to funds to be received thereafter. This had become a habit. They would draw checks and afterwards order their bankers to pay some and throw out others, and then excuse themselves for the return of those dishonored, or try to make some arrangement with the holders thereof for delay. Although, therefore, but a single check is shown to have laid over unpaid for fourteen days, they may be really considered as having suspended payment generally. The non-payment of one piece of paper is not of itself a suspension, for there may be good reason for it; the party may have had a defense against it, or he may have arranged for delay of payment; but when he fails to pay for want of means, and continues unable to pay, he has suspended within the meaning of the act, and may be adjudged bankrupt. Let the judgment be entered for the creditor.

McLEAN v. HAMILTON COUNTY.

[4 Wkly. Law Gaz. 1.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. June Term, 1859.

PARTIES—COUNTY COMMISSIONERS—RIGHT TO SUE AND BE SUED—DERIVED FROM STATE STATUTE—FEDERAL COURTS—PRACTICE—POWER TO REGULATE—CONSTRUCTION OF STATE LAWS.

1. By the provisions of the act to establish a board of county commissioners, passed March 12, 1853, and the act April 20, 1852, the county commissioners of Hamilton county are authorized not only to make contracts in regard to public buildings and other matters, but to sue and be sued in all matters which involve the exercise of their powers.

2. In both cases the right to sue and the liability to be sued arises from the law of the state; and this, under the 34th section of the act 1789 [1 Stat. 92], constitutes a "rule of decision" for the courts of the United States. The citizenship of the plaintiffs must be shown in states other than Ohio, and this gives jurisdiction.

3. The suit must be brought within the state; but this arises from the local character of the commissioners who are sued, and not from any expressed or inferable intention to prohibit suit being brought in the circuit court of the United States.

4. No state has the power to regulate the practice of the circuit court, yet even this is frequently done by an act of congress, adopting the state practice, or by the rules of the court.

5. A circuit court of the United States, while sitting in a state, "is a court of judicature within it." It administers the laws of the state and is bound by their provisions, the same as the local tribunals.

6. The position is unsustainable, that no suit can be maintained in this court against a legal association of individuals, within a state, who do not possess in every respect the technical qualities of a corporation.

[This was a suit by Washington McLean against the commissioners of Hamilton county, Ohio. Heard on demurrer to the bill.]

Geo. E. Pugh, S. Matthews, and N. C. McLean, for plaintiff.

H. Stanberry, E. A. Ferguson, and T. M. Key, for defendants.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. It is alleged there is no jurisdiction in this case, as the defendants do not constitute, technically, a corporation. There is, at least, novelty in this position. The constitution provides that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to controversies between citizens of different states, and it is argued that persons, however associated under the authority of law, unless they are legally corporators, can have no standing in the federal courts. Having, in part, the functions of a corporation, so as to enable it to make contracts, to sue, and be sued, yet, if it fail in any part of its ideal creation, it is something less than a corporation, and can not sue or be sued in the courts of the United States. Is this position sustainable? As the right of the plaintiff to sue is unquestionable, he being a citizen of the state of Kentucky, we must look to the laws of Ohio to ascertain the rights and liabilities of the defendants. The seventh section of an act to establish a board of county commissioners passed March 12th, 1853, provides that the board of commissioners in the several counties of this state shall be capable of suing and being sued, pleading and being impleaded, in any court of judicature within this state; and by the act of April 20th, 1852, the board of commissioners of Hamilton and Cuyahoga counties, and their successors in office, were authorized to erect buildings provided for by law, either by contract or otherwise, as they might think the public interest might require; and by the second section of that act, the county commissioners may, at their discretion, require all persons sentenced to hard labor to be employed in the erection of county buildings, within the limits of the proper county.

The provisions of acts above cited, and others of the same class, authorize the county commissioners not only to make contracts in regard to public buildings and other matters, but to sue and be sued in all matters which involve the exercise of their powers. But it is objected that "this board is not a corporation, is not, in law, a person natural or artificial, and, therefore, not in any sense a citizen liable to federal jurisdiction." If the commissioners of a county, by their organization, lose their character of citizens, without acquiring that of corporators, in the opinion of the counsel, they can only be denominated as a quasi corporation. The former decisions of the supreme court, which required all the members of a corporation to be citizens of the state in which the suit was brought, practically withdrew from the federal tribunals almost all the great questions which arose on the construction of corporate powers, and denied, to a large portion of our citizens, all redress in the supreme court. This was seen and felt, at an early period, by the distinguished members of that court. And the reason on which this was done—the citizenship of the stockholders—was not satisfactory to Marshall or his associates; but they hesitated for some years to change the rule of decision. At length the rule was so modified as to make the situs of the corporation the place where jurisdiction should be exercised. This secured the full representation of all the corporate rights of the body, without reference to the citizenship of the particular stockholders. The concentrated interest of the body, existed where the business was done, and the agency which carried it on represented the stockholders, and was responsible for its management. This, in reason and law, was the body corporate which exercised the power, and was answerable to all concerned. The position is unsustainable that no suit can be maintained in this court against a legal association of individuals within a state, who do not possess, in every respect, the technical qualities of a corporation. But this will be hereafter considered. It is assumed that if the board of commissioners were a corporation, it is not amenable to the federal jurisdiction, because it is so constituted that it can only be sued in our domestic tribunals. And this, it is said, was clearly within the power of the state legislature. And it is said that the seventh section above cited, "that the board of commissioners in the several counties of this state shall be capable of sueing and being sued, pleading and being impleaded in any court of judicature, within this state," is "undoubtedly a limit to the right and liability of suit." With great respect it is suggested that the words as to sueing "in any court of judicature within this state" do not import a denial of jurisdiction to the circuit court of the United States. The state of Ohio, like all other states, legislates over its domestic concerns. Its laws have no binding force beyond the limits of the state. They are adapted in the terms used to its local policy and organization. A circuit court of the United States, while sitting in a state, "is a court of judicature within it." It administers the laws of the state, and is bound by their provisions, the same as the local tribunals. The jurisdiction of the circuit court is derived from the constitution and the acts of congress. And although no state has power to regulate the practice of the circuit court, yet even this is frequently done by an act of congress, adopting the state practice or by the rules of the court.

It is admitted that there are many provisions in the acts regulating the powers and duties of the county commissioners which are merely local, and refer to county administrations. But there are others of a different character, which relate to large contracts for the construction of public buildings and other matters, in which a general interest is felt. And it is the policy of the county to encourage a competition which shall reduce the public expenditure in this respect, to the smallest practical amount. For wise purposes, the powers of the commissioners are ample to enter into contracts of any amount, which shall be necessary to secure the objects expressed. The suit must be brought within the state, but this arises from the local character of the commissioners who are sued, and not from any expressed or inferable intention to prohibit suit being brought in the circuit court of the United States. Had such an intention been expressed by the legislature of the state, it could not have been carried into effect. The act of congress and the constitution secure to citizens of other states and of foreign countries the right to sue in the federal courts; and no power of a state can be so exercised as to defeat this right. If a state could so construct its own tribunals as to deny the right of suit to citizens of other states and foreign countries, it could at pleasure repudiate the federal powers. This has been attempted to be done by more than one state. By the first section of the act (February 27, 1846; Swan, St. p. 706) it is provided: "That any company or association of persons, formed for the purpose of carrying on any trade or business or for the purpose of holding any species of property within the state of Ohio, and not incorporated as such, may sue or be sued, in any of the courts in this state, by such usual or ordinary name as such company, partnership or association may have assumed to itself or be known by; and it shall not be necessary in such cases to set forth in the process and pleadings, or to prove at the trial, the names of the persons composing such company." Can any one doubt that a suit may be maintained against such an association under this law, and can it be supposed that the words, "suit may be brought in any of the courts of this state," are a limitation on the right to sue by any one living out of the state? It is of no importance whether the suit brought be against a corporation, technically so called, or an aggregate body made liable to be sued by a law of the state. The jurisdiction in the federal courts is unquestionable in either case.

The thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act of 1789 declares that "the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply." It is admitted that this section has no application to the process of the courts of the United States. Can anything be more explicit than the provision of the above section? It is not a practice act, but a rule of decision; and it applies as well to the association authorized to sue and be sued, by the act of 1846, above cited, as to the act establishing the board of county commissioners, and authorizing them to make contracts and to sue and be sued. In both cases the right to sue and the liability to be sued arises from the law of the state; and this constitutes a rule of decision for the courts of the United States. The citizenship of the plaintiffs must be shown in the states other than Ohio, and this gives jurisdiction. In Massingill v. Downs, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 767, 768, the court, in reference to the above section, say: "No statute is of more frequent application in the federal courts; and it has often been held that the settled construction of a state statute by its supreme court is considered as a part of the statute; and the statute as thus expounded is regarded as a rule of decision in the courts of the United States, where it applies—of this character is a statutory lien." In Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 25, speaking of the thirty-fourth section, Chief Justice Marshall says: "This section has never, so far as I recollected, received a construction in this court; but it has, we believe, been generally considered as furnishing a rule to guide the court in the formation of its judgment, not for carrying that judgment into execution. It is a rule of decision, and the proceedings after judgment are merely ministerial." And in Clark v. Smith, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 203, the court says: "The state legislatures certainly have no authority to prescribe the forms and modes of proceeding in the courts of the United States; but, having created a right, and at the same time prescribed the remedy to enforce it, if the remedy prescribed is substantially consistent with the ordinary modes of proceeding on the chancery side of the federal courts, no reason exists why it should not be pursued in the same form as in the state courts." The same principle is in Wickliff v. Owings, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 44. Language could not be more explicit than that used in this act to give power to the defendants to make contracts, to sue, and a liability to be sued. This is the law of the state; and under the thirty-fourth section of the act of 1789, "it is a rule of decision for this court," and binding on the parties in this case. The right to sue by the plaintiff having attached to him as a citizen of Kentucky, there is no power in the state to defeat it. It is secured by the act of congress and the constitution. The defendants are citizens of the state, and the capacity to sue and be sued does not divest them of that character.

It is suggested that this is a claim for unliquidated damages, and that no suit can be brought on it until it be presented to the commissioners for allowance, and shall be rejected by them. The answer to this is that it is a contract which was abandoned by the defendants. There is no pretense that there was a performance on their part, and the plaintiff could only seek by action a reparation in damages. Under the circumstances, therefore, it was not a case for adjustment as contemplated by the act. The case of Lyell v. Lapeer Co. [Case No. 8,618], involved an open account which should have been presented for adjustment. But the contract before us was not an account, but an entire contract, which had been repudiated by the defendants, and on which no account could be made out. Under the circumstances, nothing could have been done by the plaintiff but an offer to compromise, which he was not bound to propose.

Finally, the defendants insist, that the contract sought to be inforced is one which this board had no power to make. This objection follows, in order of time, the one made, that the claim under the law was not presented to the defendants for an allowance. But if it shall appear that the defendants had no power to make the contract declared on, no further answer will be required.

The Contract.

"The undersigned, Washington McLean of the one part, and the commissioners of Hamilton county of the other part, hereby agree: (1) That the said commissioners of Hamilton county shall have permission to enter upon, and take possession of, land belonging to said McLean, lying in the valley of Deer creek, east of the southern end of the south approach of the Dayton Short-Line Railroad, and to quarry out of the same all the limestone therein. (2) In consideration whereof, the said commissioners agree to finish the said quarrying within the space of five years from this date, and at the end of that period, or sooner, if the quarrying shall be sooner done, to surrender possession of the said tract of land to the said McLean; and also agree within the time aforesaid, to grade the said land and level down the same, according to a plat of the said ground made by Gilbert, the surveyor, so that the same when graded, cut down and leveled, shall conform to the levels as indicated on the same plat." Oct. 31, 1853.

It is said that the gist of this suit is to recover damages for the non-performance of work by the defendants on the property of the plaintiffs; that he claims to have made such a contract with the defendants; that thereby the public has become bound to improve his land. And we agree with the defendants' counsel that this proposition, as stated, does not make a very favorable first impression. I have just read the contract. It is concise, and contains few, if any, surplus words. The locality of the stone-quarry is described, and it is agreed between the parties that the commissioners shall have permission to enter upon and take possession of land belonging to the plaintiff, and to quarry out of the same all the limestone therein. In consideration whereof the defendants agree to finish the quarrying in five years, or sooner, if the quarrying be done, and also to grade the land and level down the same according to the plat of Gilbert, the surveyor, so as to conform to the plat. Not knowing the circumstances under which this contract was made, I can see nothing on its face to impeach its fairness. In the first place, it is an entire contract. The property, it appears, belongs to the plaintiff. And the defendants agreed to quarry all the limestone in the land, and to level the ground as required by the plat of Gilbert. No one can fail to see the intent of the parties to this contract. I have rarely seen an agreement more concise, or in which more perspicuous terms were used. The stone was to be removed from the ground, and the land leveled, according to Gilbert's map. This comprises the whole contract. Under the second section of the act of 1852, the commissioners had power to employ convicts in the erection of county buildings, or other public works within the county. This appears to me to be a very proper employment for such persons. And in the first section of the same act the commissioners of Hamilton and Cuyahoga counties, and their successors in office, are empowered, in the erection of public buildings, as heretofore by any law provided for, to proceed with the same, either by contract or otherwise, as in their opinion the public interest may require. Here is a wide discretion allowed to the commissioners in the discharge of their important duties. The court certainly will not presume against an exercise of power by the defendants contrary to their own contract, in the face of the law of 1852, which authorized them to proceed in the erection of public buildings or other works, either "by contract or otherwise." Having under their control convict or other labor, and being in want of stone for the public buildings or other public works, it may be supposed that the commissioners deemed it expedient in the exercise of their discretion to rent a stone-quarry on the terms stated in the contract. The object of the contract was to procure stone, and as a consideration for this the defendants agreed to level the ground. No one can be misled in regard to such a contract, especially when it may be supposed convict labor was employed by the commissioners under the authority of law.

In conclusion I would remark that it never has been decided in the courts of Ohio that a suit may not be sustained against the county commissioners; on the contrary, throughout the reports of the state, there are numerous instances in which suits have been sustained, and in many of them the commissioners have been considered as a corporation. Reynolds v. Commissioners of Stark Co., 5 Ohio, 205–207; Williams v. First Presbyterian Soc., 1 Ohio St. 510; Carey v. Commissioners of Montgomery Co., 19 Ohio, 245.

Harding v. Trustees of New Haven Tp., 3 Ohio, 227, 228, 230, held trustees of township were a corporation. Commissioners of Brown Co. v. Butt, 2 Ohio, 353, 355; Commissioners of Gallia Co. v. Holcomb, 7 Ohio, 232; State v. Piatt, 15 Ohio, 23, 24; County Com'rs of Lucas Co. v. Hunt, 5 Ohio St. 488; Boalt v. Commissioners of Williams, Defiance and Paulding Counties, 18 Ohio, 13; Commissioners of Hamilton Co. v. Mighels, 7 Ohio St. 109; Palmer v. Cuyahoga Co. [Case No. 10,688]; Cook v. Hamilton Co. [Id. 3,157]; Same Case [Id. 3,158]; Lyell v. Lapeer Co. [Id. 8,618].

The incidents of a corporation, Blackstone says, are five: 1. Perpetual succession. 2. To sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, grant or receive, by its corporate name. 3. To purchase lands and hold them. 4. To have a common seal. 5. To make by-laws. The second and third incidents are consequential to the first,—that of perpetual succession. The board of commissioners have this under the law. The power to have and use a common seal need not be given in express terms. In fact, the incidents of a corporation result, as has been held, for perpetual succession. So that it would seem, if the technical qualities of a corporation be applied to the defendants, the suit against them is maintainable. The demurrer is overruled.

BANKRUPTCY—INSOLVENCY—ASSIGNMENT—FRAUD—WHAT ASSIGNEE TAKES—DISTRIBUTION.

1. An assignment of all the property of a firm, in contemplation of a state of insolvency, is a fraud against the bankrupt act [of 1841 (5 Stat. 440)].

[Cited in Perry v. Langley, Case No. 11,006; Globe Ins. Co. v. Cleveland Ins. Co., Id. 5,486.]

2. Such transfer, within two months preceding the application for relief, is, of itself, strong ground of fraud.

3. If one of a firm apply for and obtain the benefit of the act, the firm being insolvent, the assignee takes all the effects of the firm.

[Cited in Amsinck v. Bean, 22 Wall. (89 U. S.) 402.]

4. Relief having been given to the bankrupt, the property must be brought into the bankrupt court, that distribution be made as the law requires. As at present situated, the bankrupt court has no control over the property.

In bankruptcy.

Mr. McLean, for plaintiff.

Mr. How, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This bill is filed by the plaintiff, as assignee of Aldrich, a bankrupt. He filed his petition for the benefit of the bankrupt law, on the 17th of December, 1842; and on the 13th of January ensuing he was declared a bankrupt. The facts agreed were, that the firm, consisting of Otis Aldrich, the above bankrupt, and William L. Aldrich, were insolvent and bankrupt at the time the petition was filed; that they had, on the 8th of December, 1842, assigned all their property, of every kind, to Samuel B. Pierre and William G. Pierre; and that their agents have in their possession a large amount of property which belonged to the late firm, consisting of goods, &c., amounting to about the sum of ten thousand dollars. The assignment was made in trust to sell the property, and distribute the proceeds, pro rata, among the creditors of the firm. Only nine days before the petition was filed, the assignment was executed. This, in itself, was an act of bankruptcy—as it was done in contemplation of a state of insolvency. The second section of the bankrupt act provides, "that all future payments, securities, conveyances, or transfers of property or agreements made or given by any bankrupt in contemplation of bankruptcy," &c.; "and all other payments, securities, conveyances, or transfers of property or agreements made or given by such bankrupt, in contemplation of bankruptcy, to any person or persons whatsoever, not being a bona fide creditor, or purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice, shall be deemed utterly void, and a fraud upon the act; and the assignee may claim the same," &c. The assignees were not creditors, and the fact that the assignment was made within two months preceding the application for relief, is, under the second section, if not in terms, impliedly fraudulent. The fourteenth section of the act provides, that the application for relief by one partner, the firm being insolvent, gives to the assignee the assets of the firm.

On the part of the defendants, it is insisted that, under the assignment, the same disposition of the property will be made, as directed by the bankrupt act; and that, as the assignment is not void, but only voidable, it can only be set aside by the creditors. That the creditors, or a greater part of them, are content with the disposition of the property; and that, as a matter of policy, debtors and creditors should not only be permitted, but encouraged to settle their own affairs. The bankrupt has asked and obtained relief under the law, and he must submit to all the provisions of the act. It is only upon the ground that the assignment shall be declared fraudulent, the property can be placed under the bankrupt court. The assignee appointed by that court, in all his acts, is under the immediate directions of that court, and he has given ample security for the faithful execution of the trust. The assignees may not carry out the trust, and for any failure in this respect, the creditors or the bankrupt would be obliged to ask the aid of a court of chancery. In this view it is important, and, indeed, indispensable that the property should be carried into the bankrupt court, that distribution of it may be made to the creditors of the firm, as the law requires.

If the creditors have consented to the assignment, why have they not executed releases to the firm?

A decree will be entered, declaring the voluntary assignment void, and setting it aside. Where the assets have been changed by the assignees, the present plaintiff may receive the money or other proceeds in lieu thereof.

McLEAN v. KLEIN.

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. 1875.

BANKRUPTCY — LANDLORD'S LIEN — HOW CREATED — VALIDITY AS AGAINST THE ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY OF LESSEE.

An express provision in a lease by which the lessee gives to the lessor a lien on specified personal property used by the former upon the demised premises, when not in conflict with any statute, is valid against the lessee and his assignee in bankruptcy.

[Cited in Merrill v. Ressler, 37 Minn. 85, 33 N. W. 117.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of Missouri.]

J. H. McLean is the assignee of the lessor of certain premises demised to the bankrupt. The district court made an order allowing McLean's demand to the extent of $660 as a secured claim against the estate of the bankrupt. From this order [Jacob Klein] the assignee in bankruptcy [of Byron A. Baldwin] appeals, and makes two questions: 1st. That McLean is entitled to no lien whatever, and is to be ranked as an unsecured creditor. 2d. If he is to be treated as a secured creditor, it should have been only to the extent of $500. The material facts are these: The lease to the bankrupt was of a hotel, and reserved rent at the rate of $500 per month, payable monthly, and contained this provision for the security of the lessor: "It is further agreed by the lessee (the bankrupt), that all the furniture, crockery, cutlery, and glass by him owned and used in said hotel shall be subject to the payment of said rent reserved as aforesaid, and all unpaid rent shall be construed to be a mortgage lien on the same after the same becomes due and payable." This lease was recorded long prior to the bankruptcy. The rent was paid to January 14th, 1874; on February 14th, 1874, there was one month's rent due ($500), which has never been paid. On the 28th of that month the lessee filed his petition to be adjudged a bankrupt, and the rent, at the rate agreed upon, between February 14th and February 28th would be $160, making in all $660, the sum allowed by the district court. The furniture, etc., has been sold by order of the court, and yielded more than sufficient to pay the amount of rent due.

Jacob Klein, for assignee in bankruptcy (appellant).

T. W. Stratton, for creditor.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The clause in the lease by which the lessee, in terms, gave to the lessor a lien upon the furniture, etc., in the hotel to secure the rent reserved, was valid between the parties. Although it was declared that "all unpaid rent shall be construed to be a mortgage lien" upon the furniture, etc., yet, technically, it may be conceded there was no mortgage of the property, because no language is used to convey or transfer the title thereto.

Admitting that the instrument is inoperative as a legal mortgage, still it is effectual to create an equitable mortgage, or at least a lien in the nature of an equitable mortgage, which does not depend for its validity upon a sale or transfer of the title to the property to which it attaches, and which is good in equity as against the lessee or his assignee in bankruptcy. Whether it could be maintained against an attaching creditor, or a purchaser from the lessee without notice, I need not inquire. In essence, a mortgage is but a lien upon the property mortgaged, and it is evident here that the parties agreed that the landlord should have security for his rent upon certain personal property used upon the demised premises, and to carry that intent into effect they stipulated that all such property should be subject to the payment of the rent which should be construed to be a lien thereon. Such a provision is valid, and contravenes no statute of the state to which I have been referred. Indeed, in many of the states there are statutes giving a landlord just such a lien or right as is here provided for by the agreement of the parties.

The right in the landlord was perfect as against the bankrupt, and the assignee in bankruptcy takes subject thereto. Abbott v. Godfroy, Mann. (Mich.) 178; Holmes v. Hall, 8 Mich. 66; Hil. Mortg. c. 22; Langdon v. Buel, 9 Wend. 80; Atwater v. Mower, 10 Vt. 75. The Case of Dyke [Case No. 4,227], cited by the appellant, was probably controlled by the Michigan statute, and it was not intended by the learned judge who decided it to deny the validity of equitable liens on property duly created by the contract of the parties, when such liens are good upon the general principles of the law and do not conflict with any statutory provision. The lien provided for in the case under consideration was broad enough to secure all rent becoming due down to the bankruptcy. Affirmed.

NOTE. By 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, § 184, the rights inter alia of execution creditors, and of mortgagees, and of persons having a lien upon any part of the property of the bankrupt before the date of the filing of the petition or fiat in bankruptcy, are preserved. McLEAN v. LAFAYETTE BANK et al.

[3 McLean, 185;[1] 1 West. Law J. 15.]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1843.

BANKRUPTCY—COURTS—CONCURRENT JURISDICTION—CONVEYANCE IN CONTEMPLATION OF INSOLVENCY—PREFERENCE—ASSIGNEE—JURISDICTION IN BANKRUPTCY.

1. In all cases arising under the bankrupt law, the circuit court has concurrent jurisdiction with the district court.

[Disapproved in Bachman v. Packard, Case No. 709. Cited in Re Sabin, Id. 12,195.]

[See Giveen v. Smith, Case No. 5,467.]

2. A conveyance of property, in contemplation of a state of insolvency, is void under the bankrupt law [of 1841 (14 Stat. 517)].

3. And any mortgage or other lien which is intended to give a preference to one or more creditors over others, is also void.

[Cited in Re Walton, Case No. 17,130; Giveen v. Smith, Id. 5,467. Cited in brief in Norton v. Barker, Id. 10,349.]

4. The circuit court has jurisdiction in all cases where a suit is brought by the assignee of a bankrupt, or against him.

[Cited in McLean v. Lafayette Bank, Case No. 8,887; Giveen v. Smith, Id. 5,467; Foster v. Ames, Id. 4,965; Walker v. Towner, Id. 17,089.]

5. All the property and rights of the bankrupt are vested in the assignee, not only from the decree of bankruptcy, but, by relation, from the time of filing the petition. The assignee also represents the creditors.

[Cited in Beardslee v. Beaupre, 44 Minn. 4, 46 N. W. 137.]

6. The bankrupt power is exclusively vested in the federal government.

7. Congress have not given jurisdiction to the state tribunals to carry into effect the bankrupt law. They have not power to vest such a jurisdiction.

[Cited in Shermann v. Bingham, Case No. 12,762; Goodall v. Tuttle, Id. 5,533.]

[Cited in Brigham v. Claflin, 31 Wis. 609.]

8. Bona fide liens under the state laws are valid under the bankrupt law; and a state court may enforce such liens.

9. But if there be fraud in the creation of such liens, and the creditors, through the assignee of the bankrupt, seek to set the liens aside, the district or circuit court of the United States affords the appropriate jurisdiction.

[Cited in Clarke v. Rist, Case No. 2,861; Smith v. Crawford, Id. 13,030.]

10. A state court, by the enforcement of a lien, cannot draw to its jurisdiction the administration of the bankrupt law.

[Cited in Beall v. Walker, 26 W. Va. 748.]

11. Where this effect will result necessarily from the exercise of jurisdiction, the circuit court may interpose by injunction, and stay proceedings in the state court. At least such interposition is proper until the cause can be heard on its merits.

12. A warrant of attorney to confess a judgment, the defendant being insolvent, executed within sixty days preceding the filing of the petition, by the bankrupts, cannot authorise the entry of a judgment.

13. Such judgment, if valid, would create a lien or security within the bankrupt law; and is void.

14. An execution issued on such judgment, though levied, creates no lien on the property levied on. The judgment being invalid, all the proceedings under it are equally so.

In bankruptcy.

Wright, Coffin & Miner and Brown & McLean, for complainant.

Chase & Ball, W. M. Corry, and Fox & Lincoln, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This bill is brought by the assignee of John Mahard, Jr., and William Mahard, who are bankrupts, to stay certain proceedings in the state court against the property of the bankrupts. On their schedule the bankrupts returned a large amount of real estate, and also personal property; but the defendants, who are numerous, set up various liens under mortgages, judgments, and levies by execution; and these liens are brought into the state court, to be there investigated. Large as the real estate of the bankrupts is, the liens, should they be established, will exhaust it, to the exclusion of a large class of creditors who have proved their claims under the bankrupt law. The complainant represents that the above liens were all created and obtained in fraud of the bankrupt law; and he prays that the defendants may be enjoined from further proceeding in the state court; that their liens may be set aside as fraudulent; and that the property of the bankrupts may be brought into the bankrupt court, to be distributed according to law. An injunction was allowed on filing the bill, and a motion is now made in behalf of the Lafayette Bank and the Buckinghams, to dissolve the injunction. Many if not all of the other defendants are desirous of having the matters of controversy brought into this court. The mortgage to the Lafayette Bank by the bankrupts was signed the 7th December, 1841, and acknowledged and recorded the 13th January, 1842. At October term, 1842, a decree for a sale of the premises was entered by the superior court. The petition under the bankrupt law was filed by the mortgagors the 27th May, 1842, and a decree of bankruptcy was made the 20th of July ensuing. The assignee of the bankrupts, and others who claimed an interest in the mortgaged premises, were made parties to the bill filed by the Lafayette Bank; but the assignee made no answer, nor in any form submitted to the jurisdiction of the court. On the 7th April, 1842, a warrant of attorney was executed by the bankrupts to William M. Corry, Esq., authorizing him to confess a judgment against them in favor of J. S. and M. Buckingham, for a sum exceeding fourteen thousand dollars. This was done at the urgent request of the Buckinghams, and it is agreed, that, at the time, the Mahards were insolvent. On the 8th April, a judgment was confessed, and on the 21st of the ensuing month, execution having been issued, a levy was made on certain personal property, which was afterwards sold, by consent of parties, under the order of the superior court acting as a court of chancery. The proceeds of the sale were brought into that court to be disposed of as it might direct. And it appears that an injunction, which had been previously granted by the superior court to restrain the Buckinghams from proceeding on their execution, was dissolved. From this decision there was an appeal to the supreme court of the state, which continues the injunction.

On the part of the Lafayette Bank, it is contended that this court has no jurisdiction; that the decree of the superior court for the sale of the mortgaged premises is final and conclusive on all parties; that, jurisdiction having attached to that court by the filing of the bill to foreclose the mortgage, it may examine and determine all questions arising under the bankrupt law; and that, as process was served on the assignee, he was a party to those proceedings. On the other hand, it is contended by the assignee, that the mortgage was executed by the bankrupts in contemplation of bankruptcy, to give a preference to the bank over other creditors, and that the mortgage is void under the bankrupt law. The second section of this law provides, "that all future payments, securities, conveyances, or transfers of property, &c., given by any bankrupt in contemplation of bankruptcy, giving any creditor, &c., any preference in priority over the general creditors of such bankrupt, shall be void. And the assignee shall be entitled to claim, sue for, recover, and receive the same as part of the assets of the bankrupt." In the same section, it is declared, that "all the property and right of property of the bankrupt, by operation of law, is vested in his assignee; and the assignee is vested with all the rights, powers, &c., in and over the property 'which the bankrupt had before or at the time of his bankruptcy, declared as aforesaid.'" In the sixth section, it is provided that, "the jurisdiction of the district court shall extend to all cases and controversies in bankruptcies arising between a creditor and the bankrupt, and between such creditor and the assignee." And, in the eighth section, concurrent jurisdiction is given to the circuit court, with the district court, "of all suits at law and in equity, which may or shall be brought by any assignee of the bankrupt against any person or persons claiming an adverse interest, or by such person against such assignee, touching any property or right of property of the bankrupt, transferable to or vested in such assignee." The jurisdiction vested in this court, under these sections, is ample, and reaches every possible controversy which can arise, in the collection and distribution of the effects of the bankrupt. Of whatsoever nature his rights may be, the assignee may invoke the jurisdiction of this court for relief. But he may do more than this. He is not only vested by the law with all the rights of the bankrupt, but with the rights of creditors also. He may set aside a fraudulent conveyance of the bankrupt, which the bankrupt himself could not do. In this respect the assignee represents the general creditors. And in this aspect he stands in the present case.

It is presumed that no one will doubt the powers of congress to confer this jurisdiction. The power "to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States," is given in the constitution, and belongs to the same class of powers, "as to regulate commerce, establish a uniform rule of naturalization, coin money, establish post-offices and post roads, and to declare war." These, in my judgment, are all exclusive powers. It is true, the supreme court have held that a state may pass a bankrupt law, to operate upon all contracts subsequently made within the state. But I cannot comprehend the principle on which this decision rests. No state can impair the obligations of a contract. That a release, under a bankrupt law, from a contract, does impair its obligation, no one will deny. How can a state exercise this power by any supposed assent of the parties to the contract. Does such a law become a part of the contract, and is the power, therefore, constitutional? This would be a ready, if not a safe mode, of acquiring power by a state, to do that which the federal constitution inhibits. It has been held that the assent of a state enlarged the federal power, so as to enable it to make a turnpike road or other improvement through the territory of a state, which, without such assent, would be unconstitutional. These positions, it seems to me, are equally erroneous. In neither case can the power be derived from the assent or contract of a state or individuals.

The obligation of a contract is as much impaired by a bankrupt law which operates upon future, as upon past contracts. The power is inhibited. Can a state, by the passage of a law, enlarge its constitutional power? Can it say that no contracts shall be made in future, which may not be impaired, under its bankrupt law? Nothing can be more unconstitutional than the notion, that the power vested in the federal government, which, from its nature, must be exclusive, can be exercised by a state, until the same power is exercised by congress. Such a conception seems to me to border upon the ludicrous. I see a state, like the holder of a floating land warrant, hunting among the federal powers for some vacant spot on which to rest, as a temporary occupant; and which must be abandoned as soon as a notice is served on it to quit. A state acts upon its own inherent sovereignty, and upon no such impracticable notion.

The bankrupt power, from its nature, must be exclusive. It must be uniform. A system of bankruptcy has been adopted, and its details are spread out in this act. And summary and extraordinary powers are given to the courts of the United States, to carry out and give effect to this system. This power cannot be exercised by the state courts. Their powers are derived from different sovereignties, to whom they are amenable. Congress had not the power to impose this jurisdiction on the state courts. They have not attempted to do so. Congress have adopted the state laws that relate to the practice of the courts; but the courts of the United States have decided that they cannot execute the insolvent laws of a state. Their organization does not admit of the exercise of the powers necessary to give relief under these laws. The objection is much stronger against a state court giving relief under the bankrupt act. The power belongs to the federal government exclusively, both as regards the enactment of the law and giving effect to it.

Mortgages and all bona fide liens under the laws of a state, and not in fraud of the bankrupt law, are declared to be valid. And the question is asked, have not the state courts power to enforce these liens? The answer may be in the affirmative, but subject to some restriction. The mortgage under consideration, if the allegations of the bill shall be sustained, may constitute one of the exceptions to the rule. That the mortgagee might have filed his bill to foreclose in the circuit court, seems to be clear. The assignee is a necessary party, and the law gives jurisdiction to this court "in all cases between a creditor and the assignee." But he may not have been compelled to sue in this court. Some doubt, however, may be entertained, whether the assignee, being an officer of the law, and bound to discharge his duties under the special direction of the court, should be subjected to any other jurisdiction. He has an undoubted power to redeem the property by paying off the mortgage, and he is entitled, in behalf of the creditors, to the surplus. If the assignee may be drawn into the state court on one lien, he may be so treated in all cases of liens. The present case affords a fit illustration of the principle. Some twelve or fifteen liens are set up on the property of these bankrupts. The property is large and valuable. And the validity of almost all these liens depends upon the construction of the bankrupt law. The entire property of the bankrupts will be absorbed in this way. Now, if this be a rightful exercise of jurisdiction by a state court, although the bankrupt law be uniform in its provisions, it cannot be so in its effects; a state court may hold the act or a part of the act to be unconstitutional. That a uniform construction shall be given to the act, under such an administration of it, is not to be expected. And if this be a proper exercise of jurisdiction, there can be no revisory power in the courts of the United States. There certainly can be none, unless it shall be under the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 85], to review a decision of the supreme court of the state. This would be a most dilatory and ineffectual mode of executing the bankrupt act; a mode, certainly never contemplated by congress.

On general principles, a state court has an undoubted right to determine a question arising under a law of the United States. This, however, is subject to the revisory power of the supreme court of the United States, as above stated. But questions which involve the efficacy of the bankrupt law, and are essentially connected with its uniform administration, it would seem cannot be brought under the same rule. No light is shed upon this question by the action of the English courts. They all form a part of the same system, and derive their powers from the same sovereignty. Here the judicial power is exercised under different sovereignties, having appropriate powers to give effect to the laws. Under the bankrupt law of 1800 [2 Stat. 19], I am aware, that this jurisdiction, to some extent, was exercised by the state courts. I have not compared that act with the one under consideration, to see whether its provisions in this respect, were different from the present act.

But the question in the present case, does not depend upon the ordinary exercise of jurisdiction by the state courts, for the enforcement of liens against a bankrupt. The complainant in his bill alleges that all the liens involved in this controversy, were given in fraud of the bankrupt act. Every creditor of the bankrupts is interested in this case. If the supposed liens are void, the property of the bankrupts will be distributed among the creditors generally; but if they are valid, the general creditor can receive nothing. And whether these liens are valid or not, must depend upon the construction of the bankrupt act. Shall these questions be drawn into the state court, and there decided? From the time of filing the petition, by relation, the property of the bankrupts became vested in the assignee. As before remarked, he not only represents the interests of the bankrupts, but the interests of the creditors also. The interests of those who have special liens can as well be protected in this court, as in the state court. They are protected by the law. Why then should the fact of special liens draw this whole controversy into the state court, and take it from the appropriate jurisdiction; a jurisdiction specially provided and vested with all the necessary powers to make a final decision in the case. This the state court cannot do. Should it undertake to determine the validity of the liens under the bankrupt law, and their priorities, still if there be a surplus, it must be handed over to the assignee to be brought into the bankrupt court, for distribution among the creditors. These creditors, through the assignee, are parties in this court, and by its decree the validity of the liens under the bankrupt act, their priorities, and the distribution of the surplus, can all be finally adjusted.

The bankrupt power overrides the contract and puts an end to it. And had there been no reservation in behalf of bona fide liens, they, with other contracts of the bankrupts, would have been abrogated. Shall this exception in the law, in effect, take, at the pleasure of the mortgage creditor, the administration of the bankrupt law into the courts of the state? This would be a matter of little importance in a case free from all difficulty. But where the foundation of the liens depends upon the continuation of the bankrupt act, it would seem, the jurisdiction under which the law was passed should carry it into effect. And this view acquires force from the fact, that the creditors, who are deeply interested in the case, have invoked the powers of the bankrupt court, by proving their claims. And the assignee, their agent, calls specially on the court to interpose its powers and protect the interests committed to it. Has it power to do so? If it has not, there is a great and radical defect in the system. Over the action of the state court the federal court can exercise no control. A foreclosure may be decreed, and so short a time allowed for the payment of the money, as to be unavailing to the assignee. Or the state court may order the sale of the premises, which, of course, must be under the law of the state which requires improved property to sell for two-thirds of its value. And unless the mortgagee shall purchase the property, it may not sell for many years. A connivance between the bankrupt and the mortgagee may, in this manner, keep from his creditors his whole estate. It may be said that the equity of redemption may be sold, under the order of the bankrupt court. But would that court order the sale of the equity of redemption, unless the parties interested were brought before it, and the extent of the liens were judicially ascertained? The district and circuit courts are vested with full chancery and common law powers, to act in all cases arising under the bankrupt law. They possess, in this respect, all the powers of the English common law and chancery courts, over questions of bankruptcy. And is not this jurisdiction exclusive? I am aware that the argument ab inconvenienti, is not a legitimate ground of jurisdiction. But in a case like the present, can it be disregarded? Our system of sovereignties is extremely complicated. The state and federal powers, like the colors of the rainbow, are found to intermix, and it may be sometimes difficult, if not impracticable, to determine the exact limit of either. And when this is the case, what is there but the argument ab inconvenienti to lead the judicial mind to a just conclusion? This, and this only, under the exercise of an enlightened forbearance, can preserve the harmony and efficiency of our system.

It has been shown that the federal court possesses a perfect jurisdiction over all the interests involved in the present case. That the parties are now before it. That the state court has but, at most, a jurisdiction over a part of the case. That it cannot enter a decree that shall settle the conflicting interests of all concerned. In principle, the case seems not to differ from an application to the federal court to discharge a defendant from imprisonment, under the insolvent laws of a state. Such laws generally provide, that on filing his schedule of property under oath, and giving security, he shall be discharged from imprisonment. But the federal court has uniformly refused such applications, on the ground that it could not carry out and give effect to the insolvent law. The act of bankruptcy brings into the bankrupt court, all the interests of the bankrupt. And it seems to be reasonable that that court should exercise an exclusive jurisdiction over those interests. It is no sufficient reason against this jurisdiction, that other interests arising under liens are involved. Those interests are valid under the bankrupt law, being excepted out of its operation, and will be protected by the bankrupt court. But do not those interests necessarily follow the property into the bankrupt court, where it is drawn by the act of bankruptcy? In overruling the motion to dissolve the injunction, as to the Lafayette Bank, the question of jurisdiction is not finally decided. It may again be discussed and considered on the final hearing. It is enough now to say, that from the allegations of fraud in the bill and other circumstances which have been adverted to, the court will not now dissolve the injunction on the ground that it has no jurisdiction of the case. The answer denies, generally, the allegations of the bill; but so complicated are the numerous interests involved, that the continuance of the injunction until the final hearing, seems to be required. The motion to dissolve the injunction, as regards the interest of the Lafayette Bank, is overruled.

The lien set up by the Buckinghams will be now considered. The warrant to confess the judgment was dated the 7th of April, 1842, and judgment was confessed under it the day following. On the 21st of May, ensuing, the execution was levied. The petition of the bankrupts was filed the 27th of May, and a decree of bankruptcy entered the 20th of July. The proceeding of the Buckinghams is void, it is insisted, under the second section of the bankrupt act, which provides, "that all future payments, securities, conveyances, or transfers of property, or agreements made or given, by any bankrupt, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving any creditors, &c., any preference or priority over the general creditors of such bankrupt, shall be void, &c., and the assignee shall be entitled to claim, sue for, recover, and receive the same as part of the assets of the bankruptcy." The warrant of attorney, judgment, and levy of the execution were within two months preceding the filing of the petition; and it is admitted that the Mahards were insolvent at the time the warrant of attorney was given. The only question, then, is, whether this proceeding was void, under the above section.

It is contended that the warrant of attorney is not a security or an agreement within the act. This may be admitted; and, if nothing had been done under the power, the argument would have been unanswerable. But is not the act of the agent, thus constituted, the act of the principals? This will not be denied. The Mahards, then, being insolvent, and within less than sixty days before their petition was filed, by their agent specially constituted for that purpose, confessed a judgment in favor of the Buckinghams for an amount exceeding fourteen thousand dollars. A judgment is a security paramount to all other liens of a subsequent date. If valid, it constitutes a lien within the bankrupt act. But is this a valid judgment? The second section of the act provides, "that all dealings and transactions by and with any bankrupt bona fide made and entered into more than two months before the petition filed against him, or by him, shall not be invalidated or affected by this act." This, by the strongest implication, declares that any transaction of the above nature, "made and entered into" less "than two months before the petition was filed," shall be void.

But strong and unanswerable as this position seems to be, there is another, if possible, still more conclusive. The warrant of attorney was given, and the judgment confessed, in contemplation of bankruptcy; and if so, the judgment is void, under the bankrupt act; not that it is necessary to show the Mahards, at the time the judgment was confessed, had determined to apply for the benefit of the act; but they were in an acknowledged state of bankruptcy; and this, from the circumstances, must have been known to the Buckinghams; and hence their great solicitude to procure the confession of the judgment. It does not follow that all judgments obtained within two months before filing the petition, are void. A suit commenced in the ordinary mode of proceeding, and prosecuted to judgment, the judgment, though entered within the sixty days, may constitute a valid lien. Whether such a judgment, therefore, be void or not, must depend upon the circumstances under which it is obtained. As regards the judgment of the Buckinghams, it seems to come within the law, not only as to time, but as to the circumstances which invalidate the transaction.

But it is contended that the lien now under consideration arises from the levy of the execution upon the personal property of the Mahards, which is not within the law: that such a lien is procured from the operation of law, and not from the act of the party. Of what value is the levy, if the judgment be void under the bankrupt act? If the judgment fall, can the levy stand? The argument, that if the judgment were inoperative as a lien, under the bankrupt law, still it is a judgment on which the execution may issue, and a valid levy be made, is more specious than sound. It may be admitted that the judgment may not be void for all purposes; but if it be void, as confessed, in contravention of the bankrupt act, the same principle must invalidate the proceedings on the execution; for such proceedings are equally in contravention of the policy of the act as the confession of the judgment. Indeed, it is a violation of the very letter of the act, by "procuring an execution to be levied." But the judgment, if void under the act, is void for all purposes. No valid rights can arise under it. It is as inoperative as would have been a mortgage or other security given under the same circumstances.

As before remarked, the overruling of the motion to dissolve the injunction will not preclude the party from taking the same ground on the final hearing. The motion to dissolve the injunction, in regard to the money for which the personal property was sold, claimed by the Buckinghams, is overruled; and the cause is continued.

[NOTE. The case was subsequently heard upon demurrer to an amended bill filed by the complainant. The demurrer was overruled. Case No. 8,886. It was again heard upon motion of complainant to appoint a receiver to take charge of a farm, part of the real estate alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed. The motion was allowed. Id. 8,887. It was then heard upon the question of the validity of the transfers alleged to be fraudulently made by the bankrupts. Some of these were held to be invalid. Id. 8,888. Finally it was heard on exceptions to the master's report, which exceptions were overruled. Id. 8,889.]

Case No. 8,886.

McLEAN v. LAFAYETTE BANK et al.

[3 McLean, 415.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1844.

BANKRUPTCY — ASSIGNEE — SUIT AGAINST MORTGAGEES — VALIDITY — PRIORITY — PLEADING IN EQUITY — MULTIFARIOUSNESS—WHAT DEMURRER ADMITS.

1. An assignee in bankruptcy has a right to file his bill in chancery against different mortgagees, to test the validity of their mortgages.

[Cited in Foster v. Ames, Case No. 4,965.]

2. In this proceeding the assignee represents the general creditors of the bankrupts.

3. There is no absolute rule in regard to the multifariousness of a bill. The decisions on this point are unsatisfactory and contradictory. The rule is founded on convenience, and must be applied to the peculiar circumstances of each case.

[Cited in Gamewell Fire-Alarm Tel. Co. v. City of Chillicothe, 7 Fed. 353.]

[See Giveen v. Smith, Case No. 5,467.]

4. The assignee having a right to discharge incumbrances on the bankrupt's estate, may file his bill against all incumbrancers to ascertain the validity, priority and amount of the incumbrances. Such a proceeding is analogous to the foreclosure of a mortgage.

[Cited in Sutherland v. Lake Superior Ship Canal, Railroad & Iron Co., Case No. 13,643; Jones v. Slauson, 33 Fed. 634.]

5. The demurrer admits all the material allegations of the bill.

[This was a bill by Nathaniel C. McLean, assignee in bankruptcy of John Mahard, Jr., and William Mahard, partners as John Mahard & Co., to set aside certain transfers of stock and mortgage of real estate made by the bankrupts and claimed to be fraudulent as to their creditors. An injunction was granted to stay proceedings in the state court seeking to enforce the alleged fraudulent preferences. The case was formerly heard upon motion to dissolve this injunction. Case No. 8,885. It is now heard upon demurrer to an amended bill.]

Wright & M'Lean appeared for complainant.

Mr. Corry, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. At the last July term this case was before the court, on a motion to dissolve the injunction which had been granted. On that motion the question of jurisdiction was generally considered and sustained. [Case No. 8,885.] Leave was then given to amend the bill, which amendment has been filed, and two of the defendants, J. S. and M. Buckingham, demur to the amended bill, and assign as cause of demurrer, that it is multifarious, in joining distinct rights; and, also, in the misjoinder of parties defendants. The complainant, as assignee of John and William Mahard, bankrupts, filed his bill in chancery, stating that John Mahard, Jr., one of said bankrupts, being insolvent, and in contemplation of bankruptcy, gave mortgages to the Lafayette Bank of Cincinnati, and other persons, named as defendants, on various tracts of land and town lots, to secure to some of them the payment of large sums of money, and to indemnify others as indorsers for the said Mahards, all of which deeds of mortgage are averred to be in fraud of the bankrupt law. That the partnership assets of the Mahards are small, except the real estate mortgaged as aforesaid, all of which being applied in the payment of debts, will still leave among the creditors of the bankrupts, a large amount unsatisfied. To the Buckinghams, mortgages were given on lots 404 and 460, in the city of Cincinnati, to indemnify and save them harmless on account of their indorsements for the said Mahards. On the same lots, previous mortgages had been executed to Andrew Johnson, to secure him against loss for his indorsements. In addition to these mortgages, a bill of sale was executed to the said Johnson, by the said John Mahard, Jr., for a large amount of personal property, which is also alleged to be void under the bankrupt law [of 1841 (5 Stat. 440)]. The amended bill alleges, that the bankrupts held certain shares of stock in the Lafayette Bank, and in the Franklin Bank, to which the Lafayette Bank and John S. Buckingham, and the trustees of the Franklin Bank, set up some claim. That John Mahard, Jr., sold to Charles B. Dyer, that part of in-lot 404, described in the mortgage to the Franklin Bank, for the sum of ten thousand dollars. That the bank assented to the sale, and having received seven thousand dollars, released its mortgage. And that John Mahard, Jr., received a house and lot in Lewistown, Hamilton county, from Dyer, in discharge of the balance due on the purchase of the above lot. That this arrangement was assented to by the Buckinghams, and was made by the said John Mahard in contemplation of bankruptcy, and in fraud of the bankrupt law. The amended bill further represents, that a mortgage was given by John Mahard, Jr., on certain real property in Covington, in the state of Kentucky, to the Northern Bank of Kentucky, to secure certain payments to said bank due by the Mahards, which mortgage was in fraud of the bankrupt law. It is also alleged that the mortgages executed to the banks, as aforesaid, were intended to secure loans of money, which were made at a greater rate of interest than six per cent. And the bill prays, that the conveyances aforesaid, for the reasons stated, may be set aside, and declared null and void, and the property mortgaged, sold for the general creditors of Mahard, and for such other and further relief, &c.

The above is a general but not a particular statement of the leading facts of the bill. It is sufficient to show the grounds on which the demurrer to the amended bill has been filed. The demurrer admits, of course, that the mortgages set forth in the bill were given, as alleged, in fraud of the bankrupt law; and that they are consequently void. It also admits the usury alleged against the banks, and that the proceeding by the Buckinghams, in obtaining their judgment and execution, on which a certain amount of personal property was levied, was also void. And the demurrer rests upon the ground that there is an improper joinder of distinct matters, in which the defendants have no common interest.

Before this point is examined, it is important that we should understand the nature and object of the present bill. The assignee not only represents the bankrupts, but their creditors; and it is his duty to contest the validity of all liens set up by a part of the creditors to the exclusion of others, where there is any reason to suppose that such liens have been created in violation of the bankrupt law. Under the eleventh section of the bankrupt act, he is authorised, by and under the direction of the proper court, in bankruptcy, to redeem and discharge any mortgage or other pledge, or deposite or lien, upon any property, real or personal, of the bankrupt. The bill then may be considered in a double aspect. First, to set aside the liens which are fraudulent; and secondly, under the general prayer of relief, and the special one that the lands, &c., may be sold, and that such liens as shall be found valid, shall be discharged according to their priority. The bill alleges that there is little or no property of the partnership effects; and that the real and personal estate named in the bill, constitute the only property out of which a dividend can be paid to the general creditors. That the debts of the bankrupts far exceed their means of payment. And first, on the supposition that the liens set out in the bill were executed in fraud of the bankrupt act, can the defendants be joined in a bill to set them aside? It is true, as alleged in support of the demurrer, that interests wholly distinct and separate, it is said by decisions of courts and by elementary writers, cannot be united in the same bill. and the reason assigned is, that individuals ought not to be subjected to the expense and delay of investigating matters in which they have no common interest. That the pleading in chancery should rather conform to the simplicity of pleadings at law. Lord Cottenham, in a late case, well observed, "that to lay down any rule applicable as to multifariousness, or to say what constitutes multifariousness, as an abstract proposition, is, upon the authorities, utterly impossible. The cases upon the subject are extremely various; and the court in deciding them, seems to have considered what was convenient in particular circumstances, rather than to have attempted to lay down any absolute rule." The decisions are contradictory, and each case, as it arises, must be governed by the peculiar circumstances connected with it. The matters of costs and hardship are the principal objections urged to such a proceeding; and the court must always determine from the case itself, whether these objections shall prevail. There is, in fact, no principle involved in this question, beyond the inconvenience and hardship stated. Where the inhabitants of a parish had a right of common under a trust, a suit has been sustained by one in behalf of himself and all the other inhabitants. "In such cases, although there were or might be distinct interests in the different tenants or parishioners, yet there was a general right and privity between them as to the claim asserted in the bill." Story, Eq. Pl. § 121. This is conformable to the decision in the case of Mayor of York v. Pilkington, 1 Atk. 282–284, that, says Lord Eldon, "was a case of a claim to an exclusive fishery against many others who also claimed a right, in which Lord Hardwicke observed, where the plaintiffs stated themselves to have the exclusive right, it signified nothing what particular rights might be set up against them." In Dilly v. Doig, 2 Ves. Jr. 486, it was held that an author cannot file a joint bill against several booksellers, for selling the same spurious edition of the work, for there is no privity between them; and his right against each of them is not joint, but perfectly distinct." Story, Pl. Ch. § 277.

Now, the above cases are irreconcilable In the case of the fishery, there being a joint interest asserted in the bill, "it mattered not what particular rights might be set up against them." And in the case of the author, who asserted a sole interest, the suit could not be maintained, because there was no privity between the defendants, who had violated the copyright. It seems to me there is no sufficient reason in the distinction drawn between these two cases, that the one interest was local and the other general. The trespassers on the fishery may have been as numerous, and probably were more so, than the violators of the copyright. "Upon a bill of peace, persons claiming by distinct titles, not in privity with each other, may be joined." Story, Eq. Pl. § 278. In the case of Brinkerhoff v. Brown, 6 Johns. Ch. 157, Chancellor Kent, after an elaborate view of the cases, said: "The principle to be deduced from those cases is, that a bill against several persons must relate to matters of the same nature, and in which all the defendants are more or less concerned, through their rights in respect to the general subject of the case may be distinct. And when we consider that the plaintiffs in the case now before me, are judgment creditors, having claims against the Genessee Company perfectly established, and not the subject of litigation in this suit; and that the general right claimed by the bill, is a due application of the capital of the company to the payment of their judgments; that the subject of the bill, and of the relief, and the only matter in litigation is, the fraud charged in the creation, management, and disposition of the capital; and in which charge all the defendants are implicated, though in different degrees and proportions; I think we may safely conclude, that this case falls within the reach of that principle, and that the demurrer cannot be sustained." The same doctrine is sustained in Fellows v. Fellows, 4 Cow. 682, and in Boyd v. Hoyt, 5 Paige, 55. This doctrine may have been carried farther by Chancellor Kent, in the above case, as Mr. Justice Story suggests, in his Equity Pleadings (page 234), than it has been carried in England. But whether such a case may have occurred in the English chancery, is not so much the question, as whether, by the decision, any salutary rule has been violated. The rule as to multifariousness, as before observed, is one founded on convenience, and if, in carrying it out, Chancellor Kent has imposed no peculiar hardship on the Genessee Company, or subjected it to unnecessary expense, the rule is not of less authority than if it had been sanctioned in the English chancery.

There was no privity among the complainants. They were judgment creditors, and they united in filing their bill against the company, alleging a fraudulent application of their capital. The case under consideration, it seems to me, is a stronger one for the exercise of jurisdiction, than the case before Chancellor Kent. The complainant represents the interests of the creditors in this procedure. He alleges fraud in the several liens set up by the defendants. Now, although the frauds charged consist of various and distinct transactions, yet these frauds are of the same character, and for the violation of the same section of the bankrupt act. In every instance where the allegation of fraud is made, as against the respective liens asserted by the defendants, it consists in the bankrupt having created the liens in contemplation of bankruptcy, and to give an illegal preference to certain creditors. Now, these allegations are admitted by the demurrer, and in view of this fact, can the defendants, who have demurred, complain of hardship and oppression in being connected with others, who are charged with having committed similar frauds on the rights of the general creditors. The liens of the Buckinghams cover the same property that is embraced by the liens of several of the other defendants. This is particularly the case as regards the mortgages on the two lots named, the lien of the judgment, and also as to the claim set up to the personal property. Indeed, from the statements in the bill, it would seem that the scramble for the property of the bankrupts was so great by the defendants, and their interests have become so interwoven with each other in endeavoring, according to the averments of the bill, to evade the bankrupt act, that it is difficult to act on the allegations of fraud, without having spread out before the court a connected chain of the facts.

In his Equity Pleadings (section 533), Mr. Justice Story says: "The result of the principles to be extracted from the cases on this subject seems to be, that where there is a common liability and a common interest, a common liability in the defendants and a common interest in the plaintiffs, different claims to property, at least if the subjects are such as may without inconvenience be joined, may be united in one and the same suit." And in section 534, he says: "Indeed, where the interests of the plaintiffs are the same, although the defendants may not have a co-extensive common interest, but their interest may be derived under different instruments, if the general objects of the bill will be promoted by their being united in a single suit, the court will not hesitate to sustain the bill against all of them." Campbell v. Mackay, 1 Mylne & C. 603. There is a common interest among all the general creditors, represented by the assignee, to set aside the liens named in the bill. The complainant's case, then, comes within the rule laid down in Campbell v. Mackay. How is it in regard to the defendants? Their interests arise under distinct instruments, but several of them claim liens on the same property; and, indeed, it may be said that they are all interested in a greater or less degree in the mortgaged estate of the bankrupts. The Buckinghams obtained a judgment by confession against the bankrupts, which, if valid, binds all the real estate of the bankrupts in Hamilton county; they are then interested to postpone all prior liens. And so it may be said of the mortgages under which they claim. It would be impossible for any court to act upon the liens of the Buckinghams, and especially to enforce them, without affecting, to some extent, the interests of other liens on the same property. There is, then, such an interest as makes it proper to include the Buckinghams in the suit, unless it shall subject them to unnecessary costs. And on this ground it is not perceived they have any cause to complain.

When the rule is established that all conveyances made by an individual, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving a preference to one or more creditors over the general creditors, it only remains to apply the rule to the different liens of the defendants. And it is not necessary to inquire into the intent of the bankrupt when he made the conveyance, but to show that he was in a state of insolvency, from which the intention is inferred, and the act makes the conveyance void. Now, although the mortgages were executed at different times, yet all subsequent mortgagees are interested in the question, whether the mortgagor was in a state of insolvency when the first mortgage was executed; for if that fact shall be established, it makes fraudulent, equally with the first, all the subsequent mortgages. In this most material fact then, the defendants, who set up liens to the bankrupt's estate, have a common interest. The bill asserts the fact, and the Buckinghams, by their demurrer, admit it. How then can they insist that they are improperly united in this suit with the other defendants, and that a great hardship will be imposed upon them to enter into a controversy in which they have no interest. The turning point, in all the mortgages, is the one above stated. And in this the defendants have all a common interest. If this be so, the objection that the Buckinghams can have no interest in the allegation of illegal interest, in the amended bill, cannot sustain the demurrer. It is not necessary that the common interest of the defendants should extend to all the matters in the bill. If they have an interest in one or more leading facts in the bill, it is enough to sustain the jurisdiction, though in some other things there shall be no common interest. But the interests of the defendants cannot be said to be wholly disconnected with that which is to be destroyed or lessen any one of the special liens. By this, the general creditors' dividend is increased; and this is especially the case to those who have other mortgages on the same property. In overruling the demurrer on this ground, I cannot see that any hardship or expense is imposed upon the Buckinghams. They are not necessarily subjected to any expense or even delay in investigating a matter in which they have no interest.

The question of jurisdiction on the other aspect of the case, is clear of all difficulty. The assignee has a right to pay the liens on the estate of the bankrupt under the order of the bankrupt court. He has a right to come into this court to set aside all fraudulent liens, and jurisdiction being acquired, the court, as a matter of course, will direct such liens as shall be held valid, to be discharged. On a broader ground the jurisdiction may be assumed. The assignee has a right to ask the aid of a court in chancery to assist him in the duty of discharging incumbrances. First, to ascertain their amount and their priority, and for this purpose, all who claim liens upon the bankrupt's estate, may be united as defendants, and called upon to answer. Under the extensive powers given to the assignee by the bankrupt act, he might, perhaps, sell the equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises in question. But such a procedure, under the circumstances of this case, would be exceedingly improper, as it might sacrifice the interests of the creditors. Here is an estate amounting in value, probably, to forty thousand dollars, and which, with the exception of a very inconsiderable amount, constitutes the entire estate of the bankrupts. There are many creditors of large amounts who have no interest in the liens enumerated in the bill, and who claim a distributive share of the estate. With the view then to ascertain the validity, the priority, and the extent of the liens, the assignee has an unquestionable right to bring a suit, in chancery, against all the incumbrancers, to test the validity, priority and amount of their claims. And should the liens stated be found legal, or any part of them, this court will ascertain their priority and amount, and direct the money from the sale to be applied by the assignee accordingly. This proceeding is in the nature of one to foreclose a mortgage. In such a case, all incumbrances, whether prior to or subsequent to the mortgage on which the procedure is had, are proper parties. This enables the court to ascertain the priority and extent of the liens, and on a sale of the mortgaged premises, properly to apply the proceeds. In such a proceeding, the object is not to ascertain pretended, but real incumbrances. The last mortgagee has a right to pay off all prior mortgages, and secure to himself the liens under them. But this is authorised only by a person who has a valid incumbrance; consequently, the court, in ascertaining all the incumbrances, must necessarily ascertain their validity.

The proceeding under consideration arises, necessarily, from the provisions of the bankrupt act. Effect could not be given to those provisions, in a case like the present, except through the interposition of a court of chancery. It is only in such a court that the priority of the liens can be ascertained. To determine this, the instruments must be before the court, so that they may be compared. The objection of usury, as averred in the amended bill, and which is the principal ground of demurrer to this procedure, can have no weight. The court must inquire into the validity and the amount of the liens, to enable the assignee to discharge them; and, indeed, such discharge must be made under the decree of the court. The interest of the general creditors, and, also, the interest of the mortgagees, are all adjusted and finally settled by the decree. For this purpose, then, the jurisdiction of the court may not only be exercised, but it is not perceived how such a case can be properly settled in any other mode. A sale on any mortgage does not affect the rights of other mortgagees, unless they are made parties. A mortgagee, whose mortgage is prior to that on which the sale is made, cannot be affected, as his right is paramount to the junior mortgage. Nor is the interest of a subsequent mortgagee affected; for, notwithstanding the sale, he may, not having been made a party, pay the purchase money and interest, and claim that the property shall be again sold in satisfaction of his mortgage, and of the sum paid by him to the first purchaser. The rights, therefore, of these mortgagees can only be settled by bringing them before the court, as has been done in this case. And the allegation in the amended bill, as to the rate of interest charged by the banks, whether, if sustained, the effect shall be to avoid the instruments or the interest only, it was proper to make it a charge in the bill. In the decision of this point, the general creditors are not only interested, but also all the other mortgagees. For if the bank mortgages shall be set aside or reduced in amount, their mortgages, if valid, being for, in part, the same property, will secure the payment of a larger amount. Whether the court can direct the sale of the land mortgaged in Kentucky, need not now be considered. The mortgagee is a party to the suit, and if, on no other ground, it would be proper to have that mortgage before the court, to see how it stands connected with other mortgages and liens, which the same mortgagee holds on other property in this state.

Upon the whole, I can entertain no doubt, that under this last head, the jurisdiction is sustainable. The force of the objection as to misjoinder of parties is not perceived. The defendants in Kentucky have voluntarily answered, and that makes them parties to the suit. And if the interests of the defendants are properly brought before the court, as has been shown, there can be no objection to the joinder of those who claim such interests. The demurrer is overruled.

McLEAN v. LAFAYETTE BANK et al.

[3 McLean, 503;[1] 2 West. Law J. 441.]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Dec. Term, 1844.

BANKRUPTCY — APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER — NOTICE—POSSESSION RELINQUISHED TO INCUMBRANCER.

1. Previous notice of a motion for the appointment of a receiver is not necessary, when counsel for the opposite party are present in court.

2. Where a bankrupt owned real estate incumbered by previous liens, which are before this court for adjustment, a receiver will be appointed on the application of the assignee in bankruptcy, although the bankrupt may have relinquished possession to some of the prior incumbrancers.

[Cited in Foster v. Ames, Case No. 4,965.]

[This was a bill by Nathaniel C. McLean, assignee in bankruptcy of John Mahard, Jr., and William Mahard, partners as John Mahard & Co., to set aside certain transfers of stock of the Lafayette Bank and mortgage of real estate made by the bankrupts, and claimed to be fraudulent as to their creditors. An injunction was granted to stay proceedings in the state court seeking to enforce the alleged fraudulent preferences. The case was formerly heard upon motion to dissolve this injunction. Case No. 8,885. Subsequently an amended bill was filed, to which the defendant demurred. The demurrer was overruled. Id. 8,886. It is now heard upon motion of complainant for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of certain of the real estate alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed.]

N. C. M'Lean, Mr. Wright, and Coffin & Miner appeared for complainant.

Mr. Corry, for J. & M. Buckingham.

Mr. Chase, for Lafayette Bank.

LEAVITT, District Judge. The complainant has submitted a motion for the appointment of a receiver, based on his affidavit, setting forth that J. Buckingham and Mark Buckingham, shortly after the decree in bankruptcy against Mahard, entered into the possession of, and have since occupied, without rightful authority, a farm described in the bill, formerly the property of the bankrupt; and that there is now a large amount of rent, in kind, upon the premises, the product of said farm, and under the control of said Buckinghams, who, as judgment creditors of said Mahard, are made defendants to the bill, and whose rights are, therefore, before the court for adjustment. The counsel for the Buckinghams, and the counsel for the Lafayette Bank, appear, and resist the application for the appointment of a receiver. They set forth, in substance, in their statements, that the Buckinghams, having a lien on the said farm, by virtue of a judgment and levy upon it, as creditors of said Mahard, with the consent of the Lafayette Bank, took possession, after it was abandoned by Mahard, and have since continued to occupy it. It is also stated, that said bank has the prior lien by mortgage upon said farm, and is content that the Buckinghams shall continue in the occupancy thereof, without the intervention of a receiver; they being, as it is alleged, men of substance, and able to respond to the parties interested for the rents and profits which have been or may be received by them.

It is insisted, in the first place, by counsel who oppose this motion, that it ought not to be granted, because previous notice has not been given to the parties interested, of an intention to submit it. The authorities referred to do not sustain the position, that this notice is necessary, under all circumstances. On the contrary, it appears that a court of chancery will sometimes appoint a receiver, on an ex parte application for that purpose; but ordinarily it will not do so until the time for the defendant's appearance has expired, and without an exhibition of facts rendering such summary proceeding necessary. 1 Barb. Ch. Prac. 669. It is believed that no authorities can be produced, proving that notice of the motion is required, in any case, where the parties to be affected by the appointment of a receiver are in court, represented by counsel, who appear in resistance of the motion. It seems to be supposed by counsel that the third rule, of the rules of practice for the courts of equity of the United States, adopted by the supreme court, and, consequently, obligatory on this court, requires a previous formal notice of the pending motion. This rule, however, obviously embraces only applications for "interlocutory orders, rules, and other proceedings," preparatory to the hearing of causes on their merits, made to a judge at chambers, or on rule days, at the clerk's office. It does not apply to a motion made in term, and in the presence of counsel. This motion is also opposed on the ground that the case pending, in which the motion is made, involves a question of jurisdiction between this court and one of the courts of the state; and that until this conflict of jurisdiction is finally settled, the power of this court to appoint a receiver cannot be rightfully exercised. In reply to this objection, Judge McLean, at the last term of this court, after full argument and mature consideration, refused, on a motion for that purpose, to dissolve the injunction granted in this case—maintaining that this court had jurisdiction, under the provisions of the late bankrupt law [of 1841 (5 Stat. 440)], both of the subject matter of, and the parties to, the pending suit. [Case No. 8,885.] After analysing and commenting on the 6th and 8th sections of the bankrupt act, he concludes, that "the jurisdiction vested in this court, under these sections, is complete, and reaches every possible controversy that can arise in the collection and distribution of the effects of the bankrupt." And again, "the act of bankruptcy brings into the bankrupt court all the interests of the bankrupt; and it seems reasonable that the court should exercise an exclusive jurisdiction over those interests." It is true, that in overruling the motion to dissolve the injunction, the judge remarks, that the parties will not be precluded from the discussion of the question of jurisdiction on the final hearing. [See Case No. 8,886.] In this posture of this question, the court will not overrule the present motion, on the ground of a defect of jurisdiction.

These preliminary objections being disposed of, the question is presented, whether, from the facts before the court, it will be a rightful exercise of its power, to appoint a receiver, according to the prayer of the complainant. The power to appoint a receiver pertains necessarily to every court having chancery jurisdiction. In 1 Barb. Ch. Prac. p. 658, it is said: "A receiver is a person appointed by the court, to receive the rents and profits of land, or other property, or things in question in this court, pending the suit, where it does not appear reasonable that either party should do it." "The immediate moving cause of the appointment, is the preservation of the subject of litigation, or the rents and profits of it from waste, loss, or destruction." In Story's Equity Jurisprudence (volume 2, p. 158) it is laid down, that "the appointment of a receiver is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the court." The same principle is asserted in 1 Pow. Mortg. note 294; 1 Johns. Ch. Cas. 57. "It (the appointment of a receiver) may be granted, in any case of equitable property, upon suitable circumstances." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. p. 157, § 829.

What is the case before the court? A bill has been filed in this court by the complainant, as the assignee of Mahard, a bankrupt. It is averred in the bill, that Mahard, at the time of his bankruptcy, was possessed of a large real estate, incumbered by various mortgages and judgments, which he represents as having been procured in fraud of the bankrupt law, and, therefore, void; that proceedings had been instituted by some of the lien holders, in the superior court of Hamilton county, for the purpose of obtaining an adjudication upon their rights; and that in order to the final and satisfactory adjustment of the interests of all the creditors, it was necessary that the liens should be brought into this court, which, under the ample powers conferred on it by the bankrupt law, would possess complete jurisdiction to settle the rights of all concerned. The bill prays an injunction, restraining the mortgagees and judgment creditors from further proceeding in the state court to enforce their liens. The injunction was granted, and still continues in full force. The whole case is, therefore, before this court for a final hearing, and the equitable adjustment of all the interests involved in this controversy. During the pendency of these proceedings, the Buckinghams have been in the occupancy of the farm in question, and are now in possession of a large amount of its products, the rightful ownership of which depends on the final decree and order of distribution to be made by this court. By the operation of the decree in bankruptcy against Mahard, all his interest in the premises, at the time of filing his application, was divested from him, and passed to and vested in his assignee. The assignee, therefore, stands in the position of legal owner of all the bankrupt's estate, and is also the legal representative of all his creditors. Ascertaining there were numerous and conflicting claims and liens on the large real estate of the bankrupt, and having reason to believe, as alleged in the bill, that some of these were fraudulent and void, as being in contravention of the bankrupt law, it was his duty to institute proceedings to test their validity, and to settle the priorities of such as should be adjudged valid. This court, in taking jurisdiction of the case, and enjoining further proceedings to enforce the liens, divested the holders of these liens of all right and power to interfere with the property to which the incumbrances attached, until the final hearing. Pending the suit in chancery, and while the injunction continued in force, none of the parties could rightfully exercise acts of ownership over the property in controversy. The Lafayette Bank, though represented as having a prior and undisputed lien on the farm, could not, in this posture of the case, without the sanction of this court, either take possession of the property, or give to another a valid assent to take possession. Neither did this right pertain to the Buckinghams, in virtue of their judgment and levy—especially as that judgment is distinctly alleged to be void under the bankrupt law, and as it is one of the objects of the bill to procure the adjudication of this court on that point. The property of the bankrupt may be justly said to have been in the keeping of the law from the time of issuing the injunction, and the rights of the lien holders in a state of suspension till the final hearing.

It would seem, that under these circumstances, the Buckinghams are not in the rightful possession of the farm in question; and it is equally clear that the case made, is one in which a court of chancery should exercise the power pertaining to it, of appointing a receiver. All the lien holders, as well as the general creditors of the bankrupt, Mahard, have an interest in the products of the farm, now under the control of the Buckinghams, and also in the rents and profits accruing, pendente lite; and there is great propriety in placing these in the keeping of a responsible officer of this court, to be held by him, subject to its final order. It is not perceived that this course can, by any possibility, injuriously affect the rights of any of the parties concerned. The assignee, as the representative of the general creditors, asserts that the appointment of a receiver is necessary. And, although the fact be conceded that the Buckinghams are now solvent, and will in all probability be able to respond hereafter to any claim that may be set up against them, growing out of their use and occupancy of the premises, yet, will it be proper to refer the numerous other creditors of the bankrupt to this troublesome, not to say doubtful, remedy, for the recovery of their rights? It is impossible to foresee what change may take place in the circumstances of the Buckinghams before the final adjudication of the rights of the parties concerned in this suit. If they should, in the intervening time, by any adverse fortune, become insolvent, the parties would be without any remedy. But, if no such change shall occur, it is altogether probable that, after the termination of this suit, should it be adverse to their claim, further litigation will be necessary to ascertain and enforce their liability; and, after the lapse it may be of years, such a proceeding would be attended with serious difficulties and embarrassments, and put the rights of other creditors in great jeopardy.

THE COURT, therefore, entertain no doubt that the case submitted calls for the exercise of its discretionary power in the appointment of a receiver; and the motion of the complainant is, accordingly, granted.

[NOTE. The case was subsequently heard upon the question of the validity of the transfers alleged to be fraudulently made by the bankrupts. Some of these were held to be invalid. Case No. 8,888. Finally it was heard on exceptions to the master's report, which exceptions were overruled. Id. 8,889.]

21. By giving collateral security to the Franklin Bank, by its debtor, the charter lien is discharged.

22. A judgment lien is good under the bankrupt law, and, being prior to a mortgage, must be first satisfied.

23. The charter of the Lafayette Bank provides, that it shall not take more than six per centum per annum, in advance, on its loans or discounts. This provision is similar to the one in the Bank of Chillicothe, and to the general act regulating interest. The rule of construction should be the same, on words of the same import, whether found in the charter of a bank, or in the general law.

24. On general principles, a contract made against law, or in violation of the policy of the law, is void.

[Cited in Tufts v. Tufts, Case No. 14,233.]

25. The law in Ohio is settled, that usury voids the contract only for the excess.

[Approved in Darley v. Boatman's Sav. Inst., Case No. 3,571.]

26. If the bills were void, and the mortgages, the money actually paid by the bank could be recovered. But the bills were not usurious. The regular interest only was paid in advance, and the established rate of exchange was charged for bills.[2]

27. Stock transferred to the bank as collateral security, for the time, extinguishes the charter lien.

28. A note being renewed, omitting one of the indorsers, he is not liable, and can claim no lien as such.

29. A co-security may claim that property, given to indemnify the other surety, may be sold for the benefit of both. But this cannot be done where the other surety is discharged by the payment of the debt.

30. Where parties, not within the jurisdiction of the court, appear voluntarily, the court can take jurisdiction.

31. Where a mortgage is given on personal property, which remains in the possession and under the control of the mortgagor, and he sells the property, in part, in payment of other debts, &c., the mortgage must be considered fraudulent and void.

[Cited in Fairbanks v. Amoskeag Nat. Bank, 38 Fed. 634.]

32. A concealment of a mortgage, by fraudulent representations to the injury of third parties, is void.

33. A mortgage to indemnify, may be subjected to the rights of the creditor, though the mortgagee may not have paid the debt.

34. Where a lien is common to two or more creditors, and one of the creditors has a lien on a separate property, equity will require the separate lien to be enforced first.

35. A contract made within the two months previous to the filing of a petition by a bankrupt, does not stand as if made prior to that time.

36. Such a contract is prima facie fraudulent—or, at least, it must be shown to be bona fide.

37. A judgment confessed within the two months before filing the petition, where the bankrupts had broken up their business, &c., is fraudulent, and also the proceedings under it.[2]

[This was a bill by Nathaniel McLean, assignee in bankruptcy of John Mahard, Jr., and William Mahard, partners as John Mahard & Co., to set aside certain transfers of stock of the Lafayette Bank and mortgage of real estate made by the bankrupts, and claimed to be fraudulent as to their creditors. An injunction was granted to stay proceedings in the state court seeking to enforce the alleged fraudulent preferences. The case was formerly heard upon motion to dissolve this injunction. Case No. 8,885. Subsequently an amended bill was filed, to which the defendant demurred. The demurrer was overruled. Id. 8,886. Complainant moved for a receiver to take charge of a farm, a part of the property alleged to have been fraudulently transferred. The motion was allowed. Id. 8,887. It is now heard upon all the papers in the case as to the validity of the alleged fraudulent liens and transfers.]

Wright, Fox, Miner, Corry, Russel & Corwin, for complainant.

Groesback, Chase, King & Anderson, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. In this bill the complainant prays, that the property of Mahard, real and personal, may be brought into the bankrupt court for distribution, and that the various liens under which the defendants claim may be set aside and annulled as fraudulent under the bankrupt and state laws. An injunction was granted to stay proceedings in the state courts on the mortgages and other liens set up by the defendants. The case in all its branches has been argued with much research and distinguished ability. As many of the defendants assert distinct interests, which are in no respect connected, a demurrer on that ground was filed to the bill. At a former term this demurrer was overruled, and the jurisdiction of the court sustained. Since then, the case of Ex parte Christy, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 308, has been decided, which maintains the ground assumed by this court. In February, 1837, John Mahard, Sen., and John Mahard, Jun., having been co-partners in a commercial business in Cincinnati, dissolved; and a new co-partnership was formed between John Mahard, Jun., and William Mahard. The same persons constituted a partnership in New Orleans. On the 27th of May, 1842, John Mahard, Jun., filed his petition under the bankrupt law, and on the 20th of July ensuing, obtained a decree of bankruptcy. William Mahard on the 12th of August following, petitioned for the benefit of the act, and, in due course of proceeding, was declared a bankrupt. The Cincinnati firm exhibited an amount of debts exceeding one hundred and seven thousand dollars, while its assets were little more than the sum of five thousand dollars. The firm at New Orleans seems to have owed, independently of its indorsements, about the sum of thirty-eight thousand dollars; and it returned nominal assets to nearly the same amount. In the list of debts are included the sums due to the defendants, and a statement of the mortgages given to them. There is no suggestion that the schedules filed in the bankrupt court do not contain a correct statement of the condition of the respective firms. The mortgage to the Franklin Bank of Cincinnati will be first considered. This instrument is dated the 3d of April, 1841, and was recorded the 18th of October ensuing. It was given on in-lots 404 and 460, in Cincinnati, by John Mahard, Jun., to secure the payment of about the sum of sixteen thousand dollars; for which he was then responsible to the bank, and "all other liabilities to the bank which he might afterwards incur." This mortgage was signed and acknowledged before the bankrupt law was passed, but, under the Ohio statute, it did not take effect until it was recorded, which was subsequent to the passage of the bankrupt act. That act did not go into operation until the 1st of February, 1842. The validity of this instrument is objected to on several grounds. 1. That it was intended to give a preference to the Franklin Bank over other creditors, the firm being at the time insolvent. 2. That it is void, as it was designed to secure debts which the bank had no power to contract. 3. That the debts secured by it were usurious.

To show that both firms commenced business without capital, and rested entirely upon credit, through the whole course of their business, in the concluding argument the books of the partnerships were referred to, and other evidence in the case. John Mahard, Jun., is a witness, and swears that until about the time of filing his petition, he considered himself solvent; and that the firm at Cincinnati were able to go on with their business. The books and the schedules are evidence, if for no other purpose than to lessen the weight of this statement. But they are clearly admissible on general principles, as facts which may conduce to invalidate liens created to benefit certain creditors to the prejudice of others. In this respect the assignee represents the creditors, and may take advantage of a preference and fraud which the bankrupt could not do. By the fifth section of the act of Ohio, of the 11th of February, 1832, a fraudulent transfer of property to defeat creditors is made a penal offense. And by the third section of the act of the 14th of March, 1838, it is declared that "all assignments of property in trust, which shall be made by debtors to trustees, in contemplation of insolvency, with the design to prefer one or more creditors to the exclusion of others, shall be held to enure to the benefit of all the creditors in proportion to their respective demands." The assets of both firms may be considered nominal at the time of their failure; and from their books it would seem that the partnership business was carried on mainly, if not exclusively, by discounts and the sale of bills. The property mortgaged was owned by John Mahard, Jun. It may be that funds from the proceeds of the partnership were used in the purchase of a part of this property. Of this, however, there is no positive evidence. The fact of taking this mortgage, it is insisted, goes to show that the Franklin Bank doubted the solvency of the Mahards. Such security to banks is not unusual, and although it may show on the part of the bank a desire for a higher security than that of an indorsement, yet it does not prove that the borrower is considered insolvent. Mahard may have executed the mortgage in preference to giving an additional indorser. At the date of this mortgage the credit of the Mahards seems to have stood fair. No facts have been proved in the case, which conduce to establish the fact, that at that time they contemplated bankruptcy, or a state of insolvency, within the bankrupt or state law. Much less is there any evidence that the bank, in taking the mortgage, acted under a knowledge that a state of bankruptcy or insolvency was contemplated by the mortgagor. A rigid scrutiny into the affairs of the firms, so as to ascertain the amount of their capital by their creditors, is not to be presumed. They did a large and, apparently, a prosperous business in the winter of 1840 and 1841. And it was not until the 2d of August, 1841, that any one of their notes was protested. Subsequent to this period, their bills were occasionally protested, sometimes for non-acceptance, and at others for non-payment. In the summer of this year, Mr. Groesbeck, the president of the Franklin Bank, refused to increase Mahard's indebtment.

In this part of the case, it may be proper to give a construction to the second section of the bankrupt act, which, it is contended, vitiates all the liens set up by the defendants. That section provides, "that all future payments, securities, conveyances, or transfers of property, or agreements made or given by any bankrupt, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving any creditor, indorser, surety, or other person, any preference or priority over the general creditors of such bankrupt; and all other payments, &c., in contemplation of bankruptcy, to any person or persons whatever, not being a bona fide creditor or purchaser, for a valuable consideration, without notice, shall be deemed utterly void, and a fraud upon this act." "Provided, that all dealings and transactions, by and with any bankrupt, bona fide made and entered into more than two months before the petition filed against him or by him, shall not be invalidated by this act: provided, that the other party to any such dealings or transactions had no notice of a prior act of bankruptcy, or of the intention of the bankrupt to take the benefit of this act." Then follows the clause: "If it shall appear to the court that the voluntary bankrupt, since the 1st of January, 1841, or at any other time, in contemplation of the passage of a bankrupt law, by assignment or otherwise, has given a preference to one creditor over another, he shall not receive a discharge unless a majority of his creditors shall consent thereto." And by another proviso, in the same section, liens valid under the state law are not to be affected by the act, if not inconsistent with its provisions. This section has given rise to much controversy, and the courts have not altogether concurred in its construction. It has not been construed by the supreme court. Where, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and to give a preference to one creditor over another, a payment or transfer of property is made, it is void under the first part of the section. But, by the first and second provisos, all bona fide transactions, more than two months before the petition was filed, and where the other party had no knowledge of an act of bankruptcy, or notice of an intention by the bankrupt to take the benefit of the act, are not invalidated by the act. From this it is clear, that before the two months a creditor or purchaser, acting bona fide, and without knowledge that the bankrupt had committed an act of bankruptcy, or intended to apply for the benefit of the act, might, in every respect, make as valid contracts with him as with any other citizen. And where a contract is impeached under these provisos, the party impeaching it must show that it was not made bona fide. A fraud at common law, or under this act before the two months, is not presumed. The above refers to the good faith of the purchaser or creditor, without regard to the motives of the bankrupt. He may have committed an act of bankruptcy, or intended to apply for the benefit of the act, and, consequently, acted in bad faith, still the contract is valid, if the other party has acted in good faith, and without the knowledge or notice specified.

But the important inquiry remains to be answered, what shall amount to a "contemplation of bankruptcy," and a preference of a creditor, within the section. It would seem, from some of the arguments in this case that nothing short of an avowal of an intention to take the benefit of the act and to give a preference, is within this section. This is clearly wrong. The courts, or juries under the instructions of the courts, must determine in this, as in other cases of fraud. This, being a fraud under the act, may not possess that turpitude which attaches to a fraud at common law. It may, indeed, separated from the statute, have the appearance of a just, if not a meritorious act; but whether it violate the statute, must be ascertained as in a common fraud. We may give a definition of fraud, but no court or jurist can lay down an unvarying rule, applicable to all cases, by which an act shall be held fraudulent. The character of the act, not unfrequently, depends upon the intention with which it was done. And we can only judge of the intention from the act and its attending circumstances. These are as diversified as human transactions. It is contended that the words, "in contemplation of bankruptcy," must be construed to mean, an "intention to take the benefit of the bankrupt law." An individual may be reduced to a state of bankruptcy, and yet, from pride, or other motives, not intend to take the benefit of the law. Now, if the construction contended for be correct, such an individual might, in contemplation of a state of bankruptcy, prefer certain creditors to others, without any violation of the act. This would defeat the great object of the law, which was, to secure to creditors a pro rata distribution of the estate of the bankrupt. A construction which leads to this, requires no further comment. The term bankrupt, as used in the act, has no technical significancy which sustains this view. "In contemplation of bankruptcy," means, in contemplation of a state of bankruptcy. Had congress meant more than this, they would have said so. Had an intention to take the benefit of the act been the thing "contemplated," it would have been expressed in appropriate terms. But such a provision would not have reached the evil to be remedied. A state of bankruptcy reaches the evil, and the above provisions of the act give a remedy.

A state of bankruptcy, or insolvency, means more than a mere inability to pay debts promptly. Such are the vicissitudes of trade, that but few of our enterprising merchants have not, at different periods in their course of business, been in this predicament. They were, perhaps, unable to meet the demands against them under any reasonable indulgence, had they closed their concerns. But their credit was good; they met promptly the current demands against them, and soon retrieved their affairs. A bankruptcy within the law, not only presupposes an inability to pay debts, but to continue in business. The preference of one creditor over another, implies an inability to pay both, and a determination to prefer one to the other. If, at the time Mahard executed this mortgage to the Franklin Bank, on a strict account of the partnership funds, they had been found inadequate to meet the partnership debts, it would not follow that the firms were insolvent. The private property of John Mahard, Jun., was liable, and this, being of large amount, gave credit to the partnerships. That the Mahards, at this time, did not contemplate closing their business is clear, as they continued it through the summer and fall of 1841. In October of that year, their embarrassments became so great as to induce them to apply to the "Lafayette Bank" for relief, to enable them to carry on their business. Whether this application was made known to the Franklin Bank does not appear. Why this mortgage was withheld from record, from the 3d of April, the day of its date, to the 18th of October, is not shown. This circumstance is not proved to be so connected with other facts as to authorise an unfavorable presumption against the bank. On a full consideration of the facts and circumstances connected with the execution and recording of this mortgage, it cannot be held void under the second section of the bankrupt act, nor does it come within the state law above cited.

Under the second head, it is argued, that this mortgage is void, as it was given to secure a debt which the bank had no power to contract. In support of this position, it is alleged, that the charter of the Franklin Bank prohibits it from taking more than six per cent. interest, and that a larger amount than that was received on the loans made to the Mahards, which, consequently, makes void the contract. In the case of Bank of Chillicothe v. Swayne, 8 Ohio, 254, the court held, that a bill of exchange which the bank had discounted at a greater rate of interest than six per cent. per annum was void, under a provision in its charter, that it should "not take more than at the rate of six per cent. per annum on its loans or discounts." The same principle has been sanctioned by the same court in subsequent cases. Before these cases are more particularly referred to, it may be proper to examine the charter of the Franklin Bank, to see if it contains a prohibition which will bring it within the principle of the above cases. It is admitted that, in terms, no prohibition against taking more than six per cent. interest is in the charter, but is supposed to be contained in the following words. "And it shall be lawful for said bank to loan money, buy, sell, and negotiate bills of exchange, checks, and promissory notes, and to discount upon banking principles and usages, bills of exchange, post notes, promissory notes, and other negotiable paper or obligations for the payment of a sum of money certain."

The power to "discount upon banking principles and usages," it is contended, imposes upon the bank a prohibition against receiving on its loans and discounts more than at the rate of six per cent. per annum. And this prohibition, thus brought into the charter, is to make void any contract made by the bank in violation of it. It, therefore, must be made to operate as a penalty. Now, that penal laws must be construed strictly, is a rule from which, it is believed, no court has departed; and yet, without such departure, it would seem the above prohibition cannot be made to operate in this charter. What is the plain and obvious meaning of the words, "principles and usages of banking?" It is, that the bank may take, on loans and discounts, the interest in advance. Many bank charters give this power specially. Without it, courts have held that taking the interest in advance is usurious. And strictly, this is so. But other courts have decided, that they would regard the usages of banks so far as to legalise this practice, though the charters may contain no provision on the subject. That this was the main object of the above provision, there would seem to be no doubt. If it include the prohibition contended for, because such prohibition may be found in other charters, it must equally include all other provisions in these charters, which are not found in the Franklin Bank charter. This would be a new rule for construing a contract. And especially would it be a new mode of introducing a prohibition into a charter. There can be no doubt, that the general law regulating interest applies to the Franklin Bank.

This leads us to the question of usury, which is the third objection made to this mortgage. This objection equally applies to the mortgages taken by the Lafayette Bank, and as the facts which bear upon this point apply, substantially, to both banks, the objection will be now considered. John & William Mahard, of the Cincinnati firm, were in the practice of drawing bills, at four months, on Mahard & Brother, of the New Orleans firm. The same persons, it will be observed, composed both firms. These bills were discounted by the banks, and, in addition to the rate of six per centum interest, per annum, was charged, from one to two per cent., for exchange; and on one or two occasions, three per cent. Several witnesses proved, that the rates of exchange thus charged were regulated principally by the banks who discounted the bills, and brokers and grocers, who, to a limited extent, were in the practice of purchasing such bills. It was proved that sight bills drawn on New Orleans, at Cincinnati, with the exception of the months of March and April, in the year 1842, commanded, uniformly, a premium. This exception arose from peculiar causes, and, being subsequent to the transactions before us, does not affect the question now under consideration. On time bills on New Orleans, exchange was charged at the rate of about a half per cent. per month for the time the bill had to run. The act fixing the rate of interest declares, "that all creditors shall be entitled to receive interest on all money, after the same shall become due, &c., at the rate of six per cent. per annum, and no more." A question is made, whether the banks did not purchase these bills. A purchase of a bill, at any price, is not usurious. It may be bought in the market, like a commodity, as the parties shall agree. But a bill to be thus sold must be complete. It must be in such a state as to enable the holder to bring suit on it. There is no evidence that these bills were in this condition. On the contrary, it appears that they were bills drawn by the house on New Orleans, to be accepted by the firm there. The proceeds of the bills were placed to the credit of the drawers. John Mahard, Jun., conducted the house in Cincinnati, and his brother William the one in New Orleans. If these bills were not accepted before they were negotiated with the banks, and the holders had paid no valuable consideration for them, they were discounted and not purchased. It is probable, that this distinction was not adverted to by the banks, but it was important, as it gave the character to the transaction. If the bills had been purchased at a discount of twenty per cent., there could be no legal objection to them. But, if they were discounted, with a reservation of interest exceeding the rate of six per centum per annum, it was usurious. And this is the question we are now to examine. There is nothing on the face of the bills which indicates usury; and it is not pretended that interest, as such, above the legal rate was charged. But it is contended, that the exchange charged was colorable only, and with the view of extorting illegal interest. That this allegation is not without plausibility, must be admitted. It seems the banks discounted these bills, when they refused ordinary discounts. Bills were preferred, one of the witnesses says, because they afforded, by the exchange, a higher profit to the banks. And then it appears, that sight bills on New Orleans uniformly sold for a premium. It seems that the exchange charged had no reference to a specie basis. At the time, the banks had suspended specie payments, and the paper of these banks, in both cities, constituted the medium of circulation. This paper was at a discount, for specie, of from five to ten, perhaps a greater, per cent. Its value was effected as the prospect of resumption of specie payments by the banks became more or less remote. The resumption by the Cincinnati banks, in March and April, 1842, caused exchange in that city to sell for a premium in New Orleans. It is true, that the holder of bills, payable in either city, could demand payment in specie, unless by the contract currency was to be received; but the paper basis is stated as having some influence on the present question. The laws of trade equally apply to the business of exchange. The balance must be adjusted by specie or its equivalent. And it is often said, but not with strict accuracy, that the difference of exchange between two places, is the expense of transporting specie from one to the other. That this expense is one of the principal elements of difference is undoubted. But there are other things which materially influence the rate of exchange. When specie becomes a commodity, as it does when used to restore the balance of trade, like every other commodity its price depends upon the demand and supply. The value of this article is regulated by the vicissitudes of trade. Great as are the fluctuations of exchange in reference to a specie basis, they must be still greater when the basis is a depreciated currency. This introduces a new element, the solvency of the banks, which must be greatly influenced by public opinion. It was in this disturbed state of the currency, that the transactions under consideration took place. The currency of either city became more or less valuable, as it might enable the holder to make profitable investments in foreign merchandise, or other property, or to pay debts.

It is objected that these facts can have no influence on the question under consideration. That they influenced the rate of exchange between the two cities is undoubted. And if they did this, are they not a part of the case? No just and legal result can be come to, which shall exclude them from consideration. And more especially are they important as conducing somewhat, perhaps, to show the great difference in value in the Cincinnati market, between bills at sight and on time. The longer the time the bill had to run the greater the risk. I do not speak of the legal result, but of the practical and commercial view which influenced the rate of exchange. This view seemed to be necessary from the evidence in the case. But on this question it is unnecessary to go into the grounds of the charge for exchange. The rate of exchange is a fact to be ascertained and established by the evidence. Like the price of any vendible commodity it depends upon the market. If the charge for exchange is a mere shift or device to cover usury, the act is not the less usurious. Many most respectable witnesses have been examined on this point, and there is no conflict in their testimony. They all agree that the rates of exchange charged by the banks, were the market rates. Banks, brokers, grocers, and all others who purchased similar bills on time, received them at the same rates of discount. No market rate of any thing could be more clearly established. Shall the court inquire into the grounds of this charge, and upon their own views of its propriety and justice, set aside and disregard this evidence? If they may do this in regard to the rate of exchange, why not do the same in regard to the market price of flour or any other article of merchandise? These depend upon the same principle and must be proved in the same way. When the court or jury as the case may be, are not brought by the evidence to the conclusion that the pretence under which the charge was made was a mere cover for usury, they cannot pronounce the act usurious.

It is suggested that a combination may have been formed by bankers, brokers and others, to establish the market rate of these bills. No evidence is produced to establish this, except the supposed unreasonableness of the charge. Whether the banks realised a profit or loss in this business, cannot affect the legal question; but it may not be improper to say, in reference to the character of the persons implicated, that one of the cashiers stated they found it a losing business. The court would require strong evidence to pronounce such a combination against a community so respectable, intelligent and commercial, as that against which the imputation is made. It includes a considerable portion of the most enterprising citizens of Cincinnati. Not only the grocers, brokers, and bankers of the city are included, but the stockholders of the banks.

These views seem to be sustained by the supreme court in the case of Creed v. Commercial Bank of Cincinnati, 11 Ohio, 495, where the court say: "On the Louisville bills (which were for sixty and ninety days) the bank charged six per centum interest per annum, and one per centum exchange, which was the market value of such bills, and the same rate at which they were purchased by other banks in Cincinnati; although exchange between the two places, Cincinnati and Louisville, on sight bills, was at par." And in page 498: "If certain rates of exchange were received, they were the fair market rates at the time." Some of the bills, it is said, were renewals of former discounts. It is not perceived that this can be material, unless it be connected with the original agreement to renew. Such an agreement would conduce strongly to establish a device to cover usury. Where a bill is drawn on New Orleans, or any other place, bona fide, and the acceptor is unable to meet it, there can be no objection to a discount of a new bill at the same rate, to pay the first one. This, it is true, would show an extravagant rate of interest and charges, in the course of a year; but the bills discounted are as distinct, as if the proceeds were to be applied to different objects. And in this latter case, the same rate would be charged.

On the 15th of February, 1837, John Mahard, Jun., executed a mortgage on the above lot 460, to secure the payment of an annuity to John Mahard, Sen., of seven hundred dollars per annum, during his life. Afterwards at the instance of John Mahard, Sen., John Mahard, Jun., conveyed a part of this lot to William Mahard, who agreed to pay John Mahard, Sen., a life annuity of one hundred dollars per annum. At the decease of John Mahard, Sen., there was a balance due of the annuities, and there is no doubt that both these liens are paramount to that of the Franklin Bank. Subsequent to the mortgage on lot 404, to the Franklin Bank, Mahard sold it to Dyer for ten thousand dollars; and the bank, at Mahard's request, released its mortgage on receiving of the purchase money seven thousand two hundred ninety-seven dollars and thirty-three cents, which is admitted as a credit on the claim of the bank. This credit, it is insisted should have been, and should now be, for the full value of the property sold. That the Franklin Bank has no right to release any thing which may prejudice subsequent mortgagees, who, on principles of equity, have a right to impose certain restrictions on the first mortgagee in the sale of the mortgaged premises, and, in fact, to redeem them and claim under the first mortgage.

These general principles must be admitted, but they can only apply where notice was given to the first mortgagee of the subsequent liens as in case of a mortgage to secure future advances; and there is no proof of actual notice in this case. The bank in its answer denies notice, and constructive notice from the recording of the subsequent mortgages is insufficient. It appears that the balance of the consideration was paid to Buckinghams, who were subsequent mortgagees. Guion v. Knapp, 6 Paige, 35; Nelson's Heirs v. Boyce, 7 J. J. Marsh. 401; Sherras v. Craig, 2 Pet. Cond. R. 411. The Franklin Bank also claims a lien on twenty shares of stock under an arrangement with John Mahard, Jun., before the 8th of March, 1842, and also under the charter lien of the bank. Bodman having made a purchase of real property from John Mahard, Jun., on which he was to pay the above stock in the Franklin Bank, which he owned, in part consideration; and finding after the purchase there was a lien on the property under a judgment obtained by Tron, against John Mahard, Sen. and John Mahard, Jun., he retained the stock in his own name to indemnify him against the judgment. This judgment was paid by John Mahard, Sen.. who now claims that he paid the judgment as the security of John Mahard, Jun., and therefore has a right to be subrogated to all the rights of the plaintiff in the judgment, which must be satisfied by a sale of the property purchased by Bodman, or the stock which was received in part consideration for the property.

The charter lien is set up under the tenth section of the act which provides, "that the shares of the capital stock of said bank shall be considered and held in law as personal property, and assignable and transferable, only on the books of the same in the presence of the president or cashier thereof, and in such manner as the directors shall prescribe; but no stockholder indebted to said bank, for any debt or demand due and payable, shall have power to assign or transfer any share or shares he may own of the capital stock therein, &c., until such debt or demand shall be paid or discharged, or collateral security be given," &c. "And said bank shall have the first lien in law on all stock due." To make a legal assignment of the stock the requisites of the charter must be observed; but the equitable interest of the stockholder may be conveyed bona fide, in any other mode, and a court of equity will give effect to such conveyance, as between the parties, if there be no paramount lien on the stock. After the judgment of Tron was paid by John Mahard, Sen., Bodman, on account of the lien of that judgment, had no right to retain the stock. But it is claimed by Mahard Sen., who, as surety, paid the judgment. The Mahards, senior and junior, were doing business in co-partnership, when the note, on which Tron obtained his judgment, was executed. Before the judgment this partnership was dissolved, and John Mahard, Jun., agreed to pay the debts of the firm. Suit was brought on the note to Tron, which, having been given jointly, authorised judgment against both the Mahards. An execution was issued on the judgment, which was paid by Mahard, Sen., and which was returned satisfied. Now the question is made whether, under these circumstances, Mahard, Sen., can claim so much of this stock as will indemnify him under the Tron judgment. The judgment constituted a lien on the property of Tron, and the stock was intended by Tron to save him from loss from that lien. That a surety having paid the debt has a right to all the collateral securities held by the creditors is not controverted. But it is insisted beyond this, that the surety is entitled to be subrogated to all the rights of the creditor; and to this effect was the decision in Morley v. St. Alban, 11 Ves. 21; and in the case of Lidderdale's Ex'r v. Executor of Robinson, 6 Pet. Cond. R. 656, a sanction is given to the same doctrine. This latter decision was given under a Virginia statute, but in their opinion the court say: "This then is the settled law of the state in which this contract and this cause originated." "But we feel no inclination to place our decision upon that restricted ground, since we are well satisfied with its correctness as a general principle." In that case the court held that the surety, being a joint indorser on a bill of exchange, which, by a statute of Virginia had the rank of a judgment, could claim the priority of a judgment creditor from his co-endorser for the amount paid above one half of the debt.

Mr. Justice Story says in his Equity Jurisprudence (section 499): "It seems formerly to have been thought that the surety had the right to claim of the creditor, on paying the debt, an assignment to him of the instrument by which it is evidenced." But, he says, "the doctrine is now fully established that the surety has no such right to be enforced in equity." Formerly a surety paying a bond debt, in the marshaling of assets, was considered as having a priority over simple contract creditors; but this doctrine was overruled in the case of Copis v. Middleton, 1 Turn. & R. 224; and has since been considered as settled by that decision. After a bond or other instrument evidencing a debt shall be fully paid, it is not perceived how it can be made the ground of a suit. If the surety on the bond shall take an assignment of it, in equity, it might give a control of a suit brought in the name of the obligee; but where the bond is paid the obligee has no claim on the obligor. John Mahard, Sen., was not the surety of John Mahard, Jun. He was a principal in the note and in the judgment, and the undertaking of John Mahard, Jun., to pay the debts of the firm, at the dissolution of the partnership, could only give a remedy on such contract. When one partner pays more than his proportion of the debts of the partnership, a contribution will be decreed as between co-securities. And in such a case the partner who has made the payment, will be substituted to the rights of the creditor as against the co-partner. To this effect was the case of Sells v. Hubbell's Adm'rs, 2 Johns. Ch. 393. Hubbell and Bedient were partners, and gave two notes to Sells; Hubbell died, and judgment was obtained against Bedient as surviving partner. Bedient took the benefit of the insolvent act, and executions on the judgments were returned nulla bona. Suit was brought on the judgments against the representatives of Hubbell, and the money was obtained from them. Afterwards it was discovered that Bedient had not returned his real estate in the city of New York on his schedule. The court ordered that a moiety of the judgments should be assigned to the representatives of Hubbell, that the money might be made out of the real estate of Bedient. Here the judgments against Bedient which had been discharged were set up and a remedy given on them. And this seems to be the doctrine in New York and in some of the other states. Eddy v. Traver, 6 Paige, 521. But, it is opposed to the modern English doctrine which seems to me to be founded in reason. How a judgment or a bond, having been discharged, can be resuscitated, so as to affect the rights of third parties, I cannot perceive. And if the rights of third parties cannot be affected by such a procedure, I can see no advantage in the principle asserted. As between the parties, it cannot be material in what mode the liability is enforced. And if the remedy contended for can go no farther than this, it is of no value.

A judgment lien cannot be revived after satisfaction of the judgment, to the prejudice of a third party. Why then attempt to set up the judgment, when a direct decree for the payment of the money will give the same remedy? It is a form without substance, unreasonable in its nature, and without benefit in its result. The judgment obtained against the Mahards has been satisfied, which appears from the return on the execution. Can this judgment be revived and a consequent lien be made to attach on the house and lot purchased by Bodman? I think it cannot. The stock has been transferred to John Mahard, Jun. Can the rights of the bank or of other creditors be affected by the resuscitation of the judgment? The same principle is involved in this as in the lien above stated. Third parties are prejudiced by it, who are innocent and in the nature of things could have no notice to affect their consciences. The collateral security given by John Mahard to the bank, discharges its charter lien. Until his debt is paid or secured to the bank by the stockholder, the bank is declared to have the first lien in law on the stock. In its answer the bank claims the stock under an agreement made with Mahard to receive it at par on account. There is no proof of this agreement, which, in the answer, is stated to have been made on or before the 8th of March, 1842. The fact is not denied by the counsel, and is understood to be admitted. As soon as the lien of the Tron judgment on Bodman's lot became extinct, the stock virtually became vested in Mahard, and in equity, was subject to the charter lien. And although the lien might not attach from debts collaterally secured, yet the arrangement to take the stock at par, though made on the 8th of March, 1842, must be held valid. There is no knowledge possessed by the bank, shown by the evidence, which can invalidate the transaction. At the July term, 1841, of the superior court of Cincinnati, a judgment was obtained in the name of the Bank of the United States against John Mahard, Jun., and John M'Laughlin, for twenty-seven hundred and twenty-eight dollars and sixty-three cents, which was appealed to the supreme court, where the judgment was affirmed. As the lien took effect from the time judgment was entered in the superior court, it is paramount to the mortgage of the Franklin Bank. An execution was issued on the judgment, which was levied on lots 404 and 460 and other real estate. The Franklin Bank, it seems, agreed to indemnify Dyer, who purchased lot 404, against the lien of the above judgment. This lien under the judgment, extended equally to all the real estate of John Mahard, in the county of Hamilton.

We come now to consider the mortgage executed by Mahard to the Lafayette Bank. It is dated the 7th of December, 1841, and recorded the 13th of January, 1842; and was given to secure the payment of two notes amounting to the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, on one of which John M'Laughlin was indorser, and on the other Andrew Johnson. In its answer the bank denies that the mortgage was executed in contemplation of bankruptcy, or that Mahard was then known or considered to be in a state of insolvency; and it had good reason to believe and did believe he was solvent, and fully able to pay his debts. To the validity of this mortgage the following objections are made: 1. That it is void, as it purports to secure a demand on which a greater rate of interest is charged than six per centum per annum. 2. That it covers a usurious debt, and is consequently void. 3. That it is void under the second section of the bankrupt law, as it was given in contemplation of bankruptcy, and to give a preference to the bank over other creditors. The second section of the charter provides, that the "corporation shall not, at any time, take more than six per cent. per annum in advance, on their loans or discounts." Assuming that a greater amount of interest has been charged than this, the counsel rely upon the case of Bank of Chillicothe v. Swayne, 8 Ohio, 257, to show that it makes void the instrument. This decision was referred to in treating of the mortgage to the Franklin Bank, but it will now be more particularly examined. The charter of the Bank of Chillicothe declares, that "the said corporation shall not take more than at the rate of six per centum per annum, on its loans or discounts." This provision is nearly in the same language and in effect the same, as the provision in the Lafayette Bank charter. The general law of Ohio regulating interest declares that all creditors are entitled to interest "at the rate of six per cent. per annum, and no more." And in the above case the court very properly remark, "It will be observed that the language is substantially the same with that used in the statute regulating interest." From this similarity of provision it was insisted that as the general statute, by the well settled construction of the court, made the contract for usurious interest void only for the excess, the same rule of construction applied to the charter of the Chillicothe Bank. To this the court replied: "There is certainly much plausibility and no little force in the argument. But there is another question involved in construing a contract made by a corporation, and that is the question of capacity of the corporation to make such contracts. There is a great difference between natural persons and corporations. Natural persons have capacity and power to make and enter into any contracts which are not prohibited by law, and will be bound by such contracts," &c. "But it is otherwise with corporations. A corporation is a body created by law, composed by individuals united under a common name, &c., and derives all its powers and capacities from the law of its creation." This citation contains the ground on which the court held the contract void. It may be a matter of some doubt whether, under the rule observed by the courts of the United States, to follow the settled construction of the statutes of the states, by their supreme courts respectively, this is an open question. And if this were a general statute there could be no doubt. But it is special, and partakes both of the character of a contract and a law. In this respect we are inclined to think the case does not come within the above rule.

From the view we have taken, the decision of this question is not necessary; but as it has been elaborately argued, it may not be improper concisely to notice it. In doing this we shall suggest some considerations, with the utmost respect, which are not without weight in our own mind. It is admitted that the "powers and capacities of a corporation are derived from the law of its creation." What are the powers and capacities of the "Lafayette Bank of Cincinnati?" It has power in its corporate name "to contract and be contracted with, to sue and be sued, &c. And it is authorised to loan money, buy, sell and negotiate bills of exchange, checks, and promissory notes, and to discount upon banking principles," &c., under the restriction in regard to interest, &c. Now here is a capacity imparted to do every thing which a natural person could do, in relation to the business specified. The natural persons who compose the corporation are authorised to do in their aggregate capacity, what each one might do in his natural capacity. Now what is the difference between the natural and artificial capacities here spoken of? It is admitted that an artificial person has no power to violate the law of its creation, or any other law. Has a natural person power to violate the law? We suppose not, and in this respect no difference is perceived between the two capacities. It is not a question of capacity, but of prohibition. A natural person is prohibited from taking more than six per centum per annum interest. If it were not for this prohibition, he might agree for any reasonable rate of interest. And if the bank had not been prohibited in like manner, might it not have charged in the same way? Is there any doubt of this? It has power to loan money on interest, and no rate of interest being established by law, may it not contract for the rate of interest as a natural person? If it may not do this, it can do nothing. The prohibition in the charter acts upon the artificial capacity, as the general law, of the same import, acts upon the natural capacity of every citizen. Repeal the proviso in the charter, and the power of the bank remains, subject to the general law. Is it not, then, clearly a question of prohibition; and is not the only inquiry, whether it does not operate alike upon all capacities, artificial or natural? This question would seem to be sufficiently answered by the admitted axiom, that all laws must be equal in their operation. But they are not equal, if the same provision is made, by construction, to have a different effect. Can this difference of effect arise from the mere circumstance, that in the one case the provision is in the charter of the bank, and in the other in the general law? Suppose the charter had contained no such provision, could the general law have been so applied, as in the one instance to make void the contract, and in the other to avoid it only for the excess of interest? This, I suppose, would not have been contended by any one. And yet, is not this the question under consideration?

But it is contended, that, there is a material difference between the general law in regard to interest and the provision in the Lafayette Bank charter. The supreme court said there was no substantial difference between the general law and the provision in the charter of the Bank of Chillicothe; and that provision is in no respect different from the one in the Lafayette Bank. The general law establishes the "rate of interest," on moneys due, at "six per centum per annum and no more." The Bank of Chillicothe "shall not take more than at the rate of six per centum per annum." Now a reservation of more than six per cent. interest is usurious under the general law, as well as under the above charters. They are, then, substantially the same provision. And if a different effect be given to these charters from that which is given to the general law, it must be on the ground that the words, or provisions, in the charters are to be construed by a different rule from that which governs the construction of the general law.

It is admitted, that where a contract is made in violation of a statute, or of the policy of the law, it is void. And that a usurious contract in Ohio is not only against the statute, but in violation of the policy of the law. But the law seems to be well settled in this state, that usury constitutes an exception from the general principle; so that the contract is only void for the excess of interest. Other states have construed their laws against usury in the same way. Now, whether this construction be right or wrong, is a matter of no importance; it is the law. And if the same rule of construction be applied to the charters of the above banks, the same effect must result, on a usurious contract. That this would be the effect of a usurious contract with a bank under the general law, has not been, and indeed cannot be, controverted. So that the only ground of distinction is, that the same provision against usury in a bank charter renders the entire contract void, while, as a general law, it avoids only the excess of interest. Can this distinction be sustained on the ground that there is a want of power in the bank to make the contract. This would be unanswerable, if there were not the same want of power to make a usurious contract by an individual. In this respect, the bank and the individual occupy the same ground. Neither can have any implied power to make a contract in violation of law; and the argument, that a bank can do nothing for the doing of which power is not given, whilst an individual may do any thing which is not prohibited, is without force, because it can have no application to the case. The act is prohibited, alike to the bank and the individual. On what principle, then, can the distinction be sustained? As has been shown, the bank has the same power, under its charter, to make a contract for the loan of money as an individual; and if more than six per centum per annum had not been prohibited, it might have charged more. But the prohibition acts upon the bank as well as upon the individual; and the only question is, does it act alike upon both? I think it does, and that there is no reason arising out of the limited powers of the bank which can affect the question.

The case of Bank of U. S. v. Owens, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 533, which is so much relied on, gives no support to this distinction. On the contrary, the question is treated as a general one, arising out of all contracts made in violation of law; and the cases referred to, as illustrating the principle sustained, were contracts between individuals. If the court had supposed that the charter of the Bank of the United States, which prohibited more than six per cent. per annum interest, was to be differently construed from a general law on the same subject, they would have said so, as the case arose under the charter; but no such distinction is made or referred to in their opinion. They seem not to have considered the limited powers of a corporation as having any bearing on the question. If the bills of exchange were void on the ground assumed, does it follow that the mortgage is void? The mortgage was given to secure the payment of the bills, and it is not denied, that where a contract is infected with usury, the same vice is carried into subsequent contracts covering the same transaction. But the objection now under consideration is not that the bills of exchange were usurious, but that they are void, having been given in violation of the charter. Now, does it follow that the mortgage must also be void? It is not pretended that there is a forfeiture of the sums paid by the bank on the discount of the bills. At most, it can only be argued that the instruments, as evidence of the debt, are void. Is there not, then, a bona fide consideration for the mortgage? On a general count, the bank could recover from Mahard the money loaned. And had he filed his bill for relief, setting up the same objection that is now urged, chancery would not have relieved him, except upon the payment of the money loaned, with interest; and this is the light in which the present case might be considered. The assignee represents the interests of the bankrupt and of the creditors. But, except in the case of fraud, the interests of the creditors can only be asserted through the bankrupt. There is no pretence of fraud, in this view of the case; so that the claim set up in the bill, in principle, is the same as if it had been set up by Mahard himself. But it is not necessary to a decision of the case to determine this point, or whether more than legal interest reserved on the bills discounted would make them void, in whole or in part. Were the bills discounted by the Lafayette Bank usurious? The facts in relation to the discount of these bills have already been considered, in reference to the Franklin Bank. No more than the legal rate of interest, in advance, was charged by the Lafayette Bank, to which was added the same premiums as charged by the Franklin Bank on time bills. Nothing more need be said on this head.

The third ground remains to be considered, whether the mortgage is void under the second section of the bankrupt law, as having been given in contemplation of bankruptcy and to give a preference to the bank over other creditors. As the construction of this section has already been discussed, nothing more is now necessary than to examine the facts on which this charge against the Lafayette Bank is attempted to be maintained. From the evidence it appears that in October, 1841, John Mahard addressed a letter to the bank asking for the loan of fifteen thousand dollars, to secure the payment of which the mortgage was given, to enable the company to carry on its business at Cincinnati and at New Orleans. The bills on the latter place, discounted by the bank, were about becoming due, and the loan was necessary to enable the firm to pay them.

By this application to the bank it satisfactorily appears, that Mahard had no intention to break up his business, as the loan was obtained to enable him to carry it on. In this view then, it was no violation of the bankrupt law. His object being to continue his business, he could not have executed the mortgage in contemplation of bankruptcy. The time given for payment of one, two and three years, shows great embarrassment; but unless from the circumstances attending the execution of the mortgage the inference is clear, that he intended to break up his business and to give a preference to the bank over the other creditors of the firm, the instrument is not void. This loan was not made, by extending previous loans, but to enable the Mahards to take up drafts which would soon become due. The money was paid by the bank and the mortgage taken at the same time. So that there was no preference in the case; and indeed there could be none under the circumstances. The bank stood more in the light of a purchaser, than in that of a creditor. And the question is, whether Mahard was in a condition to execute a valid mortgage on the advance of money, there being no pretence of fraud in the transaction. I can entertain no doubt on this subject. There is no provision of the bankrupt law which invalidates it. There is no principle in morals which makes it questionable. John M'Laughlin states that he believes now the Mahards were insolvent in the beginning of the year 1842, but at that time he thought otherwise. In the latter part of the year 1841 or the beginning of the year 1842, Josiah Lawrence, the president of the Lafayette Bank, in a conversation with the witness, said, "that the Mahards had failed or would fail shortly; or were in failing circumstances, or words of similar import." This conversation with Lawrence, in all probability, was subsequent to the execution of the mortgage. But whether this be the fact or not it cannot affect the mortgage; and the opinion of M'Laughlin in 1842, that the Mahards were solvent, goes rather to strengthen their business transactions at that period. Upon the whole we think that the mortgage to the Lafayette Bank must be considered and treated as a valid instrument. The above loan of fifteen thousand dollars was to be paid in three equal annual instalments. On the 12th of January, 1842, Mahard transferred forty-nine shares of stock, which he held in the Lafayette Bank, to that bank, as collateral security for the payment of the first instalment of this loan. On the 15th of December, 1841, the bank discounted a bill for $3,420 at sixty days, drawn by M'Laughlin on Mahard & Brother, of New Orleans, and indorsed by J. & W. Mahard. This was a renewal of a prior bill of the same amount, same drawer and acceptors, and indorsed by the Mahards and Andrew Johnson. But the indorsement of Johnson on the renewal was omitted, as alleged, through inadvertence. On the 1st and 8th of February, 1842, two notes were discounted, one of $163 and the other $162, same drawer and indorsers. No collateral security at the time of these discounts was taken by the bank. But on the 16th of February, 1842, Mahard mortgaged to Johnson lots 404 and 460, on Water street, to indemnify him as indorser on these bills, one held by the Commercial Bank, one by Milne & Co., which has since been paid, and the other, the above bill of $3,420, held by the Lafayette Bank. This mortgage, it is contended, should be made to enure to the benefit of the bank.

It is also insisted that the forty-nine shares of bank stock should be applied in payment of the above sum and of the two smaller discounts under the lien given by the charter of the bank. The tenth section of the charter provides that the "bank shall have the first lien in law on all stock and dividends owned by its debtors; and no debtor to the bank is permitted to transfer his stock, unless he shall have given collateral security for the payment of his debt." This stock, shortly after the discount of the bill for $3,420, as above stated, was transferred to the bank as collateral security for the payment of the first instalment of the $15,000 loan. And the bank now insists that as that instalment was not paid, through the default of Mahard, and as the bank was injoined from enforcing the mortgage, it is now entitled to a sale of the real property under the mortgage to satisfy it, and that the stock not being applied as was intended, and being released from the transfer, should be appropriated under the charter lien to the payment of the above bill, and the two smaller discounts. On the same paper which contained the assignment of this stock to the bank, John Mahard, Jun., indorsed, the 13th of April, 1842, "the forty-nine shares of stock are transferred to John S. Buckingham for value received."

Nearly a month after the discount of the above bill for $3,420, this stock was transferred to the bank as collateral security for the payment of the first instalment on the large loan. This shows that the bank did not rely upon the lien on the stock for the payment of the above bill. Mahard having given a mortgage to secure the payment of the fifteen thousand dollar loan, that debt was no obstruction to the assignment of the stock. It was assigned to the bank with its assent, and the question is, whether such assignment extinguishes the charter lien. There would seem to be no doubt that at least for the time being, it does extinguish such lien. If the first instalment of the large loan had been paid by Mahard, by the condition of the assignment the stock was to be re-transferred to him. But the payment was not made, and the stock still remains pledged. It stands, therefore, on the pledge and not on the charter. Had the stock been re-transferred, the charter lien would have attached, but at present it is extinct, and can only be revived by a re-investment of it in Mahard. Opposed to this re-investment stands not only the first instalment of the large loan, but the assignment of the stock to Buckingham. This assignment could not prejudice the lien of the bank under the transfer; but the stock being placed by the transfer beyond the provisions of the charter, it is no longer under its restriction; and the residuary interest may be assigned, it is supposed, as any other mortgaged property. Whether the assignment to Buckingham is not void, it having been made within sixty days preceding the filing of the petition of Mahard, will be examined hereafter. It is enough to know, in this part of the case, that the charter lien having been destroyed or suspended by the transfer, does not attach to the stock as it now stands to secure the bills discounted subsequently to the large loan. The final disposition of this stock is reserved until the proceeds of the mortgage shall be realised. As regards the general creditors it can be of no importance whether the stock or the land shall be first sold; but if there be additional valid liens on either, it will influence the order of distribution. The bank also claims that the mortgage given to Andrew Johnson should be made to enure to its benefit. This is opposed on several grounds, but chiefly because the name of Johnson does not appear on the bill, to indemnify him against which the mortgage was given. In answer to this fact, it is alleged that the omission was inadvertent. That the above bill was the renewal of a former bill of the same amount on which Johnson was indorser.

A creditor may claim all the liens held by the sureties of the principal debtor; and to avoid circuity of action, he may enforce those liens. This procedure is founded upon the liability of the sureties; for if they are not liable, there can be no ground of claim by the creditor. Now as the name of Johnson is not on the bill held by the Lafayette Bank, it is not perceived how any liability can attach to him on that bill. It may have been given to renew a former bill, of the same amount, which had the indorsement of Johnson. But that bill has been paid by the renewal, and consequently the indorser is discharged. Now the liability of an indorser is a matter of law, there being no consideration by which, in equity, he can be made liable. Had there been an express agreement by Johnson to indorse the bill, by reason of which it was discounted, and through inadvertence his name had not been indorsed, on sufficient proof equity might compel him to indorse the bill. But this is not the case before the court. There is no other evidence of Johnson's connection with the bill, than his indorsement of the one paid by it, and the provision in the mortgage to him in relation to it. The mortgage seems to have been executed by Mahard, and delivered for record without the knowledge of Johnson.

It is not perceived on what ground of equity M'Laughlin, who is surety on the bill for $3,420, can claim to be indemnified under the mortgage to Johnson. A co-security may claim that property given to indemnify one security shall be sold for the benefit of both; but, in this case, Johnson cannot be considered as a co-security, seeing his name is not on the bill. At the July term of the superior court of Cincinnati, a judgment was obtained by the trustees of the Bank of the United States against John Mahard, Jun., as principal, and John M'Laughlin as security, for $2,728.63; which was appealed to the supreme court, in which at April term, 1842, a final judgment was rendered for $2,979.69. Execution was issued on this judgment, which was levied on all the real estate of Mahard in Hamilton county. This constitutes a lien on the above property from the date of the judgment in the superior court, and is prior to that under the mortgage to the Franklin Bank, and all the other mortgages of subsequent date. On a sale of the property the proceeds must be so distributed as to satisfy the largest amount of valid liens. This will conform to the principles of equity. M'Intyre, it appears, holds a mortgage on the farm recorded the 22d of March, 1832, to secure the payment of two notes of four hundred dollars each. This mortgage, being the earliest lien on the farm, must be first paid.

On the 13th of January, 1842, John Mahard, Jun., mortgaged, to the Northern Bank of Kentucky, certain real estate in Kentucky, to secure the payment of certain bills drawn by J. & W. Mahard, indorsed by Andrew Johnson, accepted by Mahard & Brother, of New Orleans. Some of the bills were indorsed by Johnson and John M'Laughlin. This mortgage was recorded two days after its execution. The bank filed its bill in July, 1842, and obtained a decree for the sale of the mortgaged premises, which were sold for $11,203.63, including rents. This left a balance on the mortgage debt of more than $5,000, with which the indorsers of Mahard were charged. The bank also claims the benefit of a mortgage on personal property, executed by Mahard to Johnson, March 18th, 1842, to secure the bills indorsed by him to the bank. This mortgage was assigned to the bank, June 3d, 1842, and the bank agreed to release Johnson from his indorsements, provided the property mortgaged should be decreed to it. On this assignment, proceedings were instituted, in the names of Johnson and the bank, in the superior court of Cincinnati; and, by an order of that court, the property was sold for about $1,300, after paying costs. And this sum the court decreed to Buckinghams, who had levied an execution upon it, holding the mortgage to Johnson void. On the bills discounted by the bank, the same interest was reserved, and exchanges charged, as in the discounts of similar bills about the same time, by the Franklin and Lafayette Banks. There is nothing in this case which distinguishes it from the discounts of those banks which have been considered. We, therefore, hold that these discounts were not usurious, nor the instruments given to secure the same void, under the charter of the bank. Nor are there any facts conducing to show that, in the execution of this mortgage on the real property, Mahard contemplated bankruptcy, or that the bank could have had any notice of such intention. From the evidence, it appears that, in obtaining the loans from the bank, and the extension of them, he was endeavoring, in good faith, to surmount his embarrassments. By the frequent conversations of John Mahard, Jun., and his oath, at this time, it appears he hoped to sustain himself, and that he cherished the same hope for several months afterwards; and there is nothing in the case which authorises a doubt that he acted in good faith. Like hundreds of others struggling under embarrassments, he did not see or apprehend the bankruptcy which was before him.

A question is made, whether the court can take jurisdiction of the mortgage on the real estate in Kentucky. As no ground is perceived on which that mortgage can be invalidated, or the proceedings on it in the state court avoided, the question of jurisdiction becomes measurably unimportant. On this point, however, it may be proper to remark, that the bank having submitted to the jurisdiction of the court, by filing its answer in this case, it must be considered as before the court, for the purposes of the complainant's bill. A decree cannot operate as a conveyance of land out of the state, as it does, under the statute, within the state; but this is a matter which does not affect the jurisdiction. Having jurisdiction of the parties, by a voluntary appearance, the court may decide the controversy between them, and effect may be given to the decree, as the law shall authorise. The validity of the mortgage to Johnson on the personal property will now be considered. This mortgage was dated the 18th of March, 1842, and was given to secure the mortgagee against certain indorsements referred to. It was executed by Mahard without the knowledge of Johnson, and delivered to the recorder of deeds. This is not, of itself, a circumstance which would excite strong suspicion against the deed. It might be shown to have been done with a bona fide intention. The property covered by the mortgage was personal, and it remained in possession of Mahard. This is a badge of fraud, though it may be susceptible of a satisfactory explanation. One or two articles were delivered in the name of the whole. By an agreement of the same date as the mortgage, Mahard was to take charge of the property, and to make sales thereof, in whole or in part, consulting and advising with Johnson, and paying the proceeds to his benefit. This mortgage was executed but little more than sixty days before Mahard filed his petition. The house of Mahard & Brother failed about the 1st of March, and the mortgage was dated the 18th of the same month. It was executed without the knowledge of Johnson. Mahard continued to exercise acts of ownership over the property, selling a part of it at different times, and offering to sell the whole of it. At one time, he proposed to sell at auction; at another, to take the property down the river for sale. Occasionally, though not generally, in selling and offering to sell parts of the stock, he would refer to Johnson's mortgage, and say he was acting with his consent. But, upon the whole, he seemed to exercise in every respect, acts of ownership over the property; and, indeed, he says that Johnson consented that he should sell the property, at the prices proposed, in payment of other debts than those indorsed by him. About the middle of May, 1842, in a conversation with one of the witnesses, Johnson said he held a mortgage on the property, for the benefit of Mahard's creditors generally; that he had a claim, but that he did not consider the mortgage as securing it more than the claims of other creditors. Upon the whole, we think that this mortgage, under the circumstances, cannot be sustained. It was given to protect the property from other claims, and, under such protection, to enable Mahard to pay his debts, by selling the property at exorbitant prices. To this Johnson assented. This deferred and hindered creditors, which avoided the instrument under the state law. It was also void, as having been given in contemplation of bankruptcy. At the date of this instrument, Mahard could have had no rational hope of paying his debts. Whatever may have been his declarations to the contrary, the accumulation of his embarrassments must have convinced him that the crisis could no longer be postponed; and he resolved to adopt the desperate expedient, to cover his personal property by the mortgage to Johnson, that he might pay his debts with it at any price he might impose. For a cow, he asked $1,200; for some of his Berkshire hogs, $300 a piece; small pigs, $60 a pair; for calves, $100 a piece; cows, of common stock, $50 a piece, not worth more than from ten to twelve dollars. A schedule of the property, at these prices, was exhibited by Mahard, which made an amount of about $26,000. It was, no doubt, expected that, seeing his embarrassments, and knowing that this property was under mortgage, his creditors would become purchasers at any price. This object is fairly inferrible from the facts, and as, from the face of the mortgage, a preference was given to Johnson, it is void under the bankrupt law, and also under the state statute.

The mortgage set up by the Commercial Bank will be now examined. On the 16th of February, 1842, John Mahard conveyed to Andrew Johnson all his interest in lot 460, in Cincinnati, conditional that the mortgagor should cause to be paid unto the said Johnson, or rather protect and save him harmless from "his liability as indorser" of a certain bill of $3,500 indorsed by him for Mahards; the mortgage being "to secure said Johnson on his indorsement as aforesaid." In October, 1842, a judgment was obtained by the bank on the above bill against the Mahards as drawers and M'Laughlin and Johnson as indorsers. On which judgment execution was issued and returned no property found. This mortgage was executed and recorded without the knowledge of Johnson. Mahard states that he believed at the time this mortgage was given, they would be able to meet all their liabilities; but he was desirous of securing his indorsers against any contingency, and with that view the mortgage was executed. The debt to the bank was a bona fide one, and Johnson was liable for it as indorser. At this time the house in New Orleans had not failed, and there is no reason to doubt that Mahard believed, as he has sworn, that they would be able to sustain themselves. And from the facts, there is reason to believe, that Johnson did not consider the Mahards insolvent. As the mortgage was executed without his request, it appears he could have felt no very great solicitude in regard to his liabilities as their indorser. On the whole we think this instrument cannot be held void under the second section of the bankrupt law, as having been made in contemplation of bankruptcy and with a view to give the Commercial Bank a preference over other creditors. But this mortgage was afterward declared on the record to be canceled through the influence of the Buckinghams, who were interested in annulling it. This procedure was procured through the misapprehension of Johnson, and cannot operate to the prejudice of those who might claim under the mortgage. Being indorser to the bank, Johnson, as mortgagee, became the trustee of the bank, and could not destroy that which was designed by the mortgagor, if such be the construction of the mortgage, for the benefit of the bank. And more especially would a court of equity disregard the cancelment of such an instrument by the trustee, through the fraudulent representations of interested persons.

It is objected that this is a mortgage of indemnity merely, and that unless Johnson be damnified, neither he nor the bank can claim any thing under it. A judgment has been obtained against Johnson as indorser, on the bill of exchange named in the mortgage, and this fixes his liability. Must the bank proceed against him and sacrifice his property, if he have any, before it can reach the property pledged for his indemnity? On the contrary, may not the bank proceed directly against the mortgaged property? This would seem to be equitable. It saves the security and subjects the property of the debtor, as it should be subjected, to the payment of the debt. No objection is perceived to this principle. The solvency or insolvency of the surety cannot affect it. If the procedure against the property pledged in any degree is made to depend upon the amount of property the surety may have, then in every case the surety must pay the money, by suffering a judicial sale of his property or otherwise, before the mortgaged property can be reached by the creditor. This would be in violation of the plainest equity, and contrary to the established mode of chancery proceedings. When justice can be done and a circuity of action avoided, chancery will do it. A surety is damnified, when a judgment is obtained against him. And this gives him a right to proceed against the pledged property of his principal; and with the consent of the creditor, it may be made answerable for the payment of the debt. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 502, 638; Bank of U. S. v. Stewart, 4 Dana, 27; Green v. Dodge, 6 Ohio, 85; Wright v. Morley, 11 Ves. 22; West v. Belches, 5 Munf. 187; M'Mahon v. Fawcett, 2 Rand. [Va.] 514; Tankersley v. Anderson, 4 Desaus. Eq. 44.

The Commercial Bank has only the lien, through Johnson, on lot 460, and as the judgment of the Bank of the United States against Mahard and M'Laughlin is a lien upon that lot, and the other real estate of Mahard, and also of M'Laughlin's, it is claimed that the judgment should be made out of the other property of the defendants, or at least that their property should be exhausted before the lien is enforced against the above lot. It is a common principle in equity where two or more tracts of land are covered by a lien, and there is another lien upon one of the tracts, to require the lien common to the whole property first to exhaust that part which is not common to both liens. And this will be done in the present case. As the whole property must be sold, the distribution of the proceeds will be made in accordance with this principle. The two mortgages executed by Mahard to Mark Buckingham and to Mark and John S. Buckingham, dated 21st February, 1842, on lots 404 and 460, will be next examined. This instrument, it is alleged, is void under the second section of the bankrupt law, it having been given in contemplation of bankruptcy and to prefer the mortgagees to other creditors. As Buckinghams had some connection with the Mahards in the fall of 1841, it is insisted, that they must have known that they were insolvent and on the verge of bankruptcy before the mortgage was executed. It is not shown that the connection referred to extended farther, by the Buckinghams, than to occupy the pork house of Mahard in Cincinnati, and to ship pork to the house of Mahard & Brother in New Orleans. These shipments go very strongly to refute any presumption of knowledge injurious to the credit of the Mahards; and on the contrary show that the Buckinghams had confidence in their ability and integrity. And there is nothing in the evidence which goes to destroy this confidence, until the failure of the house in New Orleans. About that time, Mark Buckingham, being in New Orleans, seems to have been fully apprised of the desperate condition of that house, and of the urgent necessity of using the utmost circumspection and vigilance to secure their claim against the Mahards. This was in the early part of March, 1842, subsequent to the date of the mortgage. These facts, therefore, cannot be made to have any bearing upon the execution of that instrument. And aside from these, no facts have been proved which show that the mortgage was given in contemplation of bankruptcy, and to give an illegal preference. There are prior liens on the property covered by this mortgage, which may exhaust it; and if this shall not be the case, the Buckinghams must show that they are liable for the debts secured by it, or have paid them. This is a matter which will necessarily come up on a final distribution of the proceeds.

The judgment confessed by Mahards, in favor of Buckinghams, is the next question to be considered. On the 7th of April, 1842, a power of attorney was executed by John Mahard, Jun., to William Corry, Esquire, authorising him to confess a judgment in favor of the Buckinghams, for about the sum of fourteen thousand dollars; and on the succeeding day a judgment for that sum was confessed. This was within sixty days before the petition of Mahard was filed. An execution was issued on the judgment, which was levied on the personal property of the bankrupt. Was this proceeding void under the bankrupt law? The first proviso of the second section is, "That all dealings and transactions by and with any bankrupt, bona fide made and entered into more than two months before the petition filed against him or by him, shall not be invalidated or affected by this act." Now, this very clearly implies that transactions within the two months, though bona fide, are not valid. For, to make transactions valid before the two months, they must have been entered into in good faith. The proviso, therefore, if it mean any thing, as to transactions within the two months, intended to place them upon a different footing from transactions beyond that limitation. This is the clear inference from the language of the section. But it is asked, is every sale across the counter, within the two months, void? This is not a fair test of the principle. For although it may be impracticable to avoid minute transactions, yet is this any reason why large and important transactions should be held valid? A man, to defeat his creditors, may distribute his property in such small parcels, as to render any attempt to reclaim them impracticable. But from this it would not follow that creditors might not set aside the entire stock of a merchant, fraudulently transferred. That congress have power to adopt a provision having the above effect, is undoubted. Under the bankrupt power, they annihilate the contract—not being restrained or prohibited, as the states are, from impairing its obligation. It is, then, a question of policy with congress, and, with the courts, a question of construction. And it must be admitted, that some effect must be given to the proviso; and if this be done, it follows, that a contract made within the two months is not to be treated as a contract made before that time. But, in disposing of this judgment and the execution which issued upon it, we need not rely upon this construction of the proviso. At the time this judgment was entered, Mahard had no visible means, except the property afterwards levied on. The house at New Orleans had failed. Mark Buckingham's letters from that place show how utterly hopeless was the prospect of finding any assets of that concern. He imposed on his friends at Cincinnati the utmost caution, in order to reach the property of Mahard at that place. The business of both houses had been broken up; their credit gone. Mortgages had been multiplied on the real and personal property of Mahard; and even this personal property had been covered by a mortgage. In this desperate condition of Mahard's affairs, he was induced to yield to the pressure of the Buckinghams, and give a warrant of attorney to confess the judgment. The judgment was entered, and the execution was issued and levied. And yet it is contended, that these facts do not show a contemplation of bankruptcy by Mahard, or a preference of the Buckinghams as creditors. The judgment, if valid, constituted a lien on the real estate, and the levy of the execution a lien on the personal property. These proceedings were had with the consent of Mahard, and could only have been had with his consent. The warrant of attorney was not signed by William Mahard, until some time after the rendition of the judgment.

In the first section of the bankrupt act, it is declared, that if a debtor "shall willingly or fraudulently procure himself to be arrested, or his goods and chattels, lands or tenements, to be attached, distrained, sequestrated, or taken in execution," he is guilty of an act of bankruptcy. Do not the acts of Mahard bring him within this provision? By the confession of the judgment, did he not procure the lien consequent upon that judgment, and also the execution which was levied on his property? Is not the judgment lien a "security," within the second section of the act? It is a matter of surprise, that a procedure so open as this—a procedure so plainly in violation of the bankrupt act, and coming, too, within the two months before filing the petition, should be attempted to be sustained. The judgment and execution were void under the act. Where a suit had been commenced in the ordinary course of judicial proceeding, and a judgment had been entered within the two months, it might not be void. But where, by the consent of the bankrupt, the proceeding is commenced and consummated in a few days, within the two months, there could be no more glaring and indisputable act of fraud against the bankrupt law. No analogies drawn from the bankrupt laws of England, which, in many of their provisions, are wholly different from this act, can aid us in giving a construction to it. And the same remark may be made in reference to our former bankrupt act, and to the constructions given to it by the state courts. The transfer, by Mahard, of the forty-nine shares of the stock of the Lafayette Bank, having been made to John S. Buckingham on the 13th of April, 1842, but little more than one month before the petition in bankruptcy was filed, and under a knowledge of the above facts, must be held as void under the bankrupt act.

McLEAN v. LAFAYETTE BANK.

[4 McLean, 430.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1848.[2]

BANKRUPTCY—INCUMBRANCES—PRIORITY OF SALE—INCIDENTS OF JUDGMENTS—MORTGAGE—APPLICATION OF SURPLUS.

1. Where a mortgage is given on land and personal property, and other liens are set up to the personal property, the court will direct the real estate to be first sold. But if it should be insufficient to discharge the mortgage, the lien on the personal property will be enforced, it being prior to the others.

[Cited in Foster v. Ames, Case No. 4,965.]

2. When a judgment is appealed from the common pleas to the supreme court, the judgment below remains a lien on the real estate of the defendant, in the county, and it would seem that the accruing interest and costs and penalty ought also to be considered as an incident to that judgment.

3. A mortgagor is not responsible, without notice, for the application of any surplus which may remain on the sale of the mortgaged property, after satisfying his mortgage.

[This was a bill by Nathaniel C. McLean, assignee in bankruptcy of John Mahard, Jr., and William Mahard, partners as John Mahard & Co., to set aside certain transfers of stock of the Lafayette Bank and mortgage of real estate made by the bankrupts and claimed to be fraudulent as to their creditors. An injunction was granted to stay proceedings in the state court seeking to enforce the alleged fraudulent preferences. The case was formerly heard upon motion to dissolve this injunction. Case No. 8,885. Subsequently an amended bill was filed, to which the defendant demurred. The demurrer was overruled. Id. 8,886. Complainant moved for a receiver to take charge of a farm, a part of the property alleged to have been fraudulently transferred. The motion was allowed. Id. 8,887. The case then came up for a determination of the validity of the alleged fraudulent liens and transfers, some of which were held invalid. Id. 8,888. It is now heard upon exceptions to the master's report.]

Mr. Chase, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. From the case of McLean v. Lafayette Bank [Case No. 8,888], it appears that the bank loaned to John Mahard & Co. fifteen thousand dollars, to be paid in three equal annual installments, with interest. A mortgage on real property was given to secure the payment of this loan, on the 7th of December, 1841. About a month after the mortgage was given, Mahard transferred forty-nine shares of stock to the bank, as collateral security, for the payment of the first installment of the above loan. On the 13th of April following, Mahard, on the same paper on which the assignment of the stock had been made to the bank, indorsed, "The forty-nine shares of the stock are transferred to John S. Buckingham, for value received." This last transfer was made on the supposition that the real estate would pay the fifteen thousand dollars. But the court held in the above case that the assignment to Buckingham was void under the bankrupt law [of 1841 (5 Stat. 440)]. And they directed the real property to be first sold, under the mortgage, which has been done, and the proceeds do not pay the above loan. And the question now is, whether the transfer of the stock to the bank, remains a lien to pay the first installment.

The court, on the principle that the bank held two liens, directed the real estate to be sold first, and applied to the discharge of the fifteen thousand dollars loan. But this did not affect the lien of the stock, and was not intended to affect it, if the real estate should prove insufficient to pay the above loan. In their opinion in the original case, the court say, "The final disposition of this stock is reserved until the proceeds of the mortgage shall be realized." And in the concluding part of their opinion, they say, "The transfer by Mahard, of the forty-nine shares of the stock of the Lafayette Bank, having been made to John S. Buckingham, on the 13th of April, 1842, but little more than one month before the petition in bankruptcy was filed, and under a knowledge of the above facts, must be held as void under the bankrupt act." As the transfer of this stock to the Buckinghams was declared to be void, under the bankrupt law, by the court, the stock must be considered as held under the valid transfer, preceding that to Buckingham, to the Lafayette Bank. This stock was intended to secure, to the extent of its value, the first installment of the fifteen thousand dollars loan, and the court will now direct that it shall be so applied.

Exceptions are taken to the report of the master by the Lafayette Bank, as to the judgment of the Bank of the United States, and as to interest allowed on the Franklin Bank debt:

1. That the original judgment of the Bank of the United States, was recovered July, 1841, for $2,728.63, from which an appeal was taken to the supreme court, when the bank recovered a second judgment, 4th April, 1842, for $2,837.84 damages, and $141.89 penalty and costs of supreme court. And it is contended that the judgment for the penalty can only operate from the date of its rendition. The penalty was imposed under a statute by the supreme court, and can not be considered as a part of the judgment of the common pleas, as the amount could not be known to that court, nor to any one before the judgment of the supreme court. That an appeal bond was given which would secure the penalty and costs in the supreme court. And this penalty and costs in the supreme court, it is argued, can not constitute a lien as a part of the judgment of the common pleas. This is a small point to be brought up at this stage of the proceedings, in a case which involves numerous and intricate question of lien covering a large estate. There is, undoubtedly, plausibility in the grounds taken, and it is not stated the supreme court of the state has ever decided the question. It could only arise where liens had intervened after the rendition of the judgment in the common pleas, and before the judgment in the supreme court. That happens to be the case in the present instance. And the counsel contends that the addition to the judgment, by adding the penalty and costs in the supreme court, should not attach to the original judgment which constitutes a lien, but should be thrown upon the securities on the appeal bond. There seems to be no reason why the accumulating interest should not be included in the judgment of the supreme court as an incident of the judgment below; and the costs of the supreme court and the penalty which it annexes are a consequence of the appeal. As such sums must generally if not uniformly, be small, it is presumed they have been considered as partaking of the character of the first judgment. As against the defendant there can be no objection, and as against the opposing lien holders, I suppose that such has been the course. It may not have been considered of sufficient importance to make the question before the supreme court, and I do not feel disposed in the present case, under the circumstances, to allow the exception; it is, therefore, overruled.

2d exception: Can interest be allowed on a debt of the mortgager to the mortgagee after the mortgagee has purchased, at judicial sale, the property mortgaged to an amount sufficient to satisfy the debt? If the purchase money does not equal the debt, must not the interest stop on the amount of it, whatever it may be? So soon as the sale shall be confirmed and the purchaser has a legal right to enter into the possession of the property, the interest on the mortgage money must cease, because the amount bid is payment. But when sales are ordered by a court sitting in chancery or bankruptcy, the mere sale is not a title until it shall be confirmed by the court, and a title ordered to be made. For until that time, the bidder at the sale is not considered the owner of the property. The counsel for the Franklin Bank, however, admits the above exception, and, of course, it must so stand.

3d exception: The counsel for the Lafayette Bank claims that the Franklin Bank must pay a pro rata proportion of the amount of the judgment of the Bank of the United States, except the penalty and interest. The facts on which this position is founded are: The judgment of the bank was rendered July term, 1841. The mortgage of the Franklin Bank on lots 404 and 460 was recorded October 18th, 1841. The mortgage of the Lafayette Bank on the country property January 13th, 1842. And the judgment on the appeal was entered April term, 1842. On the 8th of March, 1842, the Franklin Bank assented to the sale of Mahard to Dyer, released to him all her interest in the part sold; and agreed with him to indemnify him against the judgment of the United States Bank. Of the price paid by Dyer, $10,000, the Franklin Bank received $7,297.33, the balance, $2,702.67, was paid to the Buckinghams with the assent of the Franklin Bank. The Buckinghams had, according to the adjudications made in this case, no valid liens on any of the property: as all the incumbrance of their judgments was prior to that of the Lafayette Bank, and that of their mortgage on lots 404 and 460 junior to that of the Franklin Bank.

And it is contended, that this being the state of facts, prior to the mortgage to the Franklin Bank, that corporation acquired, as against Mahard and the Bank of the United States, a right in equity, to compel the latter institution to resort to lands then unincumbered, for the satisfaction of its judgment; or in case the judgment should be satisfied out of the mortgaged property to have the judgment assigned to it and its lien on the property preserved for its benefit. And when the Lafayette Bank took its mortgage on the country property, it acquired a similar right, as between itself on the one side, and Mahard and the Bank of the United States on the other. And it is contended that the right of the Franklin Bank remained the same after the mortgage was taken by the Lafayette Bank as before. The Franklin Bank has no right to throw the judgment of the Bank of the United States upon the property mortgaged to the Lafayette Bank. Every mortgagee must inquire before taking a security, not only what mortgages and assignments bind the particular parcel proposed to be mortgaged, but also what mortgages bind every other part of the mortgager's estate. And from these premises the counsel concludes that the judgment of the United States Bank should be paid, pro rata, by the whole property which it bound. And he insists that the Franklin Bank, at most, could do no more than throw the Bank of the United States' judgment over on the Lafayette Bank property, so far as is necessary for its own protection. That if the property and other securities was sufficient to pay its own debt and also the Bank of the United States' judgment, it could not by any arrangement, throw that judgment upon the property mortgaged to the Lafayette Bank to favor junior liens. It is admitted that when an individual is about taking a mortgage or other security, it is incumbent on him to ascertain whether there are not other and paramount liens on the same property. And if in this respect he shall be negligent, he must suffer the consequent loss. But it is apprehended that the principle contended for is not the one just stated. It is not the acquisition of a lien, but an abandonment of one. The complaint against the Franklin Bank is, that it was content to receive a part of the consideration for which one of the lots mortgaged to it sold, and consented that the residue of the purchase money should be otherwise appropriated; and the question is, whether by so doing it rendered itself liable to account for the whole amount of the consideration for which the lot sold.

The general principles of equity argued by the counsel, may be admitted, and yet, it is supposed, they can not apply to the case before us. The same argument was pressed upon the court in the original case; and the court then said: "Those general principles must be admitted, but they can only apply where notice was given to the first mortgagee of the subsequent liens, as in case of a mortgage to secure future advances: and there is no proof of actual notice in this case. The bank in its answer denies notice, and constructive notice from the recording of the subsequent mortgages is insufficient. It appears that the balance of the consideration was paid to the Buckinghams, who were subsequent mortgagees. Guion v. Knapp, 6 Paige, 35; Nelson's Heirs v. Boyce, 7 J. J. Marsh. 401; Sharras v. Craig, 2 Pet. Cond. R. 411." The reason of this rule is apparent. The Franklin Bank looks to the property covered by its mortgage for payment, and that being received, not knowing that there are junior mortgagees whose rights may be affected, is indifferent as to the appropriation of the surplus. A notice, then, which puts the party on his guard, is essential to make him responsible; and of so much importance is this notice, that it must be actually given, and not by the recording of a mortgage which determines the lien.

The above exceptions are overruled.

In bankruptcy.

Brown & McLean, for complainant.

Wright, Chase, Walker, Coffin, Miner & McLean, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This bill is filed to set aside a conveyance of the effects of Lucas to the defendants, which is alleged to have been done in contemplation of bankruptcy. The assignment was made in May, 1842, Lucas then being insolvent, for the benefit of his creditors generally. At the July term of this court, in 1842, Cowperthwaite and others obtained judgment against Lucas, and at the same term Little & Co. obtained judgment. These judgments were upon suits commenced after the assignment to Meline & Young, and were obtained in the ordinary course of proceedings. On the former judgment, execution was issued on the 4th of November, 1842, and on the latter the 8th of the same month. They were both levied on the 8th, upon the personal property assigned, and in the hands of the assignees. By agreement, the assignees were permitted to sell, and hold the proceeds, subject to the opinion of the court as to the right of property. On the 16th November, 1842, Lucas filed his petition for a discharge, under the bankrupt law, and a decree of bankruptcy was entered on the 28th of January, 1843.

The second section of the bankrupt act declares that "any conveyances or transfers of property in contemplation of bankruptcy, to any person whatever, not being a bona fide creditor, or purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, shall be deemed utterly void." The transfer, in this case, was not made to a creditor or to a purchaser, within the act; and although it was made for the benefit of creditors generally, yet, under the act, it was void. That Lucas was bankrupt, at the time of the assignment, is admitted. The court have no difficulty in setting aside the assignment to the defendants; but a question is raised by the judgment creditors, who claim under levies by execution, before the petition of the bankrupt was filed. In answer to this, the assignee contends, that the assignment to the defendants, being an act of bankruptcy, all subsequent liens are void, and in opposition to the claims of creditors, which he represents, should be disregarded. This is the doctrine in England. An act of bankruptcy overreaches an attachment or an execution. Barker v. Goodair, 11 Ves. 84; 9 Ves. 78. A trader, after an act of bankruptcy, cannot create a lien upon his property. Copland v. Stein, 8 Term R. 199. By various statutes, however, all bona fide transactions with the bankrupt, two months before the date of the commission, are protected, if there be no notice of the act of bankruptcy. In this respect, our statute is more restrictive than the English statute; and I am not prepared to say, that an assignment, which is fraudulent under the bankrupt law, and in itself an act of bankruptcy, overreaches, under our law, an attachment or execution. The act of bankruptcy in England is tantamount to a filing of the petition under our statute, in most respects. In either case, any subsequent transfer of property by the bankrupt, is void. But whether liens are void or not, under our act, which were created more than two months before the petition was filed, must depend upon the peculiar circumstances of each case. The levies in this case were only made a few days before Lucas filed his petition: but the executions were issued on judgments obtained in a regular course of proceeding; and there are no circumstances in the prosecution of the suits, the obtainment of the judgments, or in suing out the executions, which conduce to show fraud. Fraud is never to be presumed, against the apparent fairness of a transaction; therefore, these judgments, and the proceeding under them, must be held valid.

It is further contended, that the assignment, being valid by the state law, the subsequent levy could create no lien. A levy binds the personal property; but if such property had been transferred, a subsequent levy could not affect the right of the assignee. By the third section of the act, "to amend the act directing the mode of proceeding in chancery" (Swan & C. Rev. St. 71), it is provided, that, "all assignments of property in trust, with design to prefer one or more creditors to the exclusion of others, shall be held to enure to the benefit of all the creditors," &c. But the above assignment, being for the benefit of all the creditors, does not come under this provision, and is valid on its face. On this ground, it is insisted that the lien set up by a levy of the executions, is not within the bankrupt act, as it is not a valid lien under the laws of the state. The assignment is void, under the bankrupt law, as being expressly against its letter; and consequently the property attempted to be transferred was liable to be taken in execution by judgment creditors. Whether a state court could take jurisdiction of this question, which arises under the bankrupt act, need not be considered, as the bill has been filed in this court. Of the jurisdiction of this court, there can be no doubt.

The assignment will be set aside as void, under the bankrupt act, and the proceeds of the property levied upon will be applied pro rata in discharge of the above liens. The effects assigned and not levied upon will be decreed to the complainant, deducting the expenses of sale, &c.

McLEAN v. ROCKEY et al.

[3 McLean, 235; 1 1 West. Law J. 300.]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1843.

BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNEE — WHEN RIGHTS ATTACH —JUDGMENT OBTAINED BEFORE PETITION—LEASE FOR NINETY-NINE YEARS—JUDGMENTS AT SAME TERM.

1. From the time of filing a bankrupt's petition, the right of the bankrupt, by relation, is vested in his assignee. And no subsequent lien created by the bankrupt, or by a judgment, can be valid.

[Cited in Phelps v. Sellick, Case No. 11,079.]

2. But a judgment obtained before the petition was filed, having been obtained bona fide, is a lien within the second section of the bankrupt law [of 1841 (5 Stat. 440)].

[Cited in Clarke v. Rist, Case No. 2,861.]

3. A lease for ninety-nine years, renewable forever, by the common law is only a chattel.

4. A judgment binds the real estate of the defendant, from the first day of the term at which it was rendered.

5. Under the construction of the Ohio statute, by the supreme court of the state, a permanent leasehold estate is land, within the execution law, and is bound by a judgment.

6. All judgments rendered at the same term have equal liens, on the real estate of the defendant, however the executions may have been issued and levied, provided the levy has been within a year from the rendition of the judgment.

7. Where there is no allegation of fraud in the bill, and the liens will more than absorb the property of the bankrupt, there is no reason why this court should exercise jurisdiction.

OPINION OF THE COURT. On the 8th November, 1842, Coffin filed his petition under the bankrupt law, and on the 3d of February ensuing he obtained a decree of bankruptcy. On the 25th of June, 1839, he procured a leasehold estate of ninety-nine years renewable forever. At October term, 1842, the following judgments were entered against him. In favor of Henry Rockey, for $199.64; Springer & Whiteman, for $675.50; Matthias Roosa, for $712.87. The court commenced its session the 3d of October, and adjourned the 7th of December. On Roosa's judgment execution was issued the 21st of October, and was levied upon the leasehold premises the 14th of November, 1842. The execution was issued on Rockey's judgment the 22d of October, and on Springer & Whiteman's judgment, execution was levied, as the above levies were made, on the leasehold property the 17th of November. The Northern Bank of Kentucky, at the same term obtained judgment for $2,049.32, on which an execution was issued within the year, which was levied on the same premises. At January term, 1843, of the superior court of Cincinnati, Marriott & Hardesty obtained a judgment for $668.72, on which an execution was levied on the leasehold property the 21st of the same month. As the above levies were all made subsequently to the time the bankrupt filed his bill, his assignee insists, that under the bankrupt law, the leasehold estate is vested in him, and he prays an injunction, &c.

Several questions have been raised and discussed, which will now be considered.

At common law a leasehold is only a chattel interest, and it is contended that it is nothing more under our statute. The 2d section of the act concerning "judgments and executions" (Swan & C. St. 468) declares that "the lands and tenements of the debtor shall be bound for the satisfaction of the judgment against such debtor, from the first day of the term at which judgment shall be rendered." Lands out of the county, and goods and chattels, are bound from the time execution shall be levied. The October term, at which all the above judgments were rendered, except one, commenced on the third day of October, so that unless the leasehold estate can be considered "lands and tenements" within the statute, and bound by the judgment, there is no lien paramount to the right of an assignee. By relation, his right to all the estate of the bankrupt, commenced from the filing of the bankrupt's petition.

The bankrupt from the time his petition is filed, is civiliter mortuus, "as to all suits at law or equity pending, in which he is a party" [Ex parte Foster, Case No. 4,960]; and that consequently, after that time, no judgment could be recovered against him. That the court will inquire whether in fact the judgment was not entered after the petition was filed; and if so, will treat the judgment, as of no more validity than if entered against a deceased person. So far as regards the disposition of his property, or the control of suits pending against him, the bankrupt, from the time his petition is filed, may be considered as civiliter mortuus. But the suits are not abated, and should be prosecuted to judgment, against the bankrupt. 1 Term R. 463; 3 Term R. 437; 15 East, 622. Whether the judgments, therefore, were entered before or after the petition was filed, is of no importance. The legislature of the state have an undoubted right to say, as is declared in the above act, that a judgment shall be a lien on lands and tenements from the first day of the term at which it was rendered. The important question is, whether the above leasehold estate was bound by the judgment. That a judgment constitutes a lien on real estate, which is recognized in the second section of the bankrupt law, is undisputed. And there is no allegation in the bill, that either in the causes of action, or in the prosecution of the above suits to judgment, there was fraud. The judgments therefore having been rendered against the bankrupt before his petition was filed, create a valid lien on his real estate. But if the leasehold property be not "lands and tenements," within the statute, there can be no judgment lien.

The act of January 29th, 1821 (Swan & C. St. 289, note), declared, "that all lands of whatever description, held by permanent leases, shall, in cases of judgments had and executions levied thereon, be considered as real estate; and the officer levying the execution or executions, shall conform to, and be governed by the provisions of the several acts regulating judgments and executions," &c. This act continued in force until the act of the 22d of March, 1837, (Swan & C. St. 289, note), which provided that leasehold estates renewable forever, should descend as estates of inheritance. And that law was repealed by the act of the 5th March, 1839, which contains a similar provision. The act of 1821 declared, that in case of judgment and an execution levied upon a permanent leasehold estate, it should be considered as real estate; and the officer was bound to conform to the law regulating sales of real estate on execution. Prior to this act, as the supreme court of Ohio say, in the case of Reynolds v. Commissioners of Stark Co. (5 Ohio, 204), that "a lease is personal property. Although the lease contains a stipulation, that it shall be renewable forever; yet any estate short of freehold gives the heir no interest." And it would seem that the act of 1821, in this respect has made no alteration in the law. It only provides that where a judgment has been obtained, and an execution shall be levied on a permanent leasehold estate, it shall be considered as real estate, and sold as such. In other words, such an estate shall be subject to valuation, and must be sold, if improved, for two-thirds of its value. This it is supposed is the extent to which the above act can affect permanent leases. But the acts of 1837 and of 1839, above cited, provided that a permanent leasehold estate should descend as land. This innovation, it would seem, should not change the nature of such an estate beyond the express words of the statute. It would not subject such an estate to the lien of a judgment. In Kentucky, by an express statute, negroes descend as real estate, and yet this does not make negroes land. The same quality, at the legislative discretion, may be imparted to any other personal property; but that would not change the nature or legal designation of such property, beyond the words of the statute. It does not make negroes in Kentucky, lands and tenements, any more than the acts of 1837 and 1839 make a leasehold estate, renewable forever, lands and tenements within the statute, subject to a judgment lien.

In the case of Murdock v. Ratcliff, 7 Ohio, 119, the court say in regard to a lease upon an annual rent, for ninety-nine years, renewable forever, "We know that such interests are usually treated as fees simple by the holders, and that the law requires them to be appraised as real estate in sales under execution; and that by statute they are liable to dower, &c.; but no proposition has been better settled, from the earliest days of the common law, than that a lease, of whatever duration, is but a chattel." But in Loring v. Melenda, 11 Ohio, 355, a different view has been taken of this question. The court there held that "permanent leasehold estates, are lands, subject to all the rules and laws which attach to land, for all purposes, and that judgment liens attach to them as lands." And they say that the point thus decided was fairly presented in the case, and "that it was the point upon which the case was reserved." This being the construction of a statute which makes a judgment a lien on lands, &c., it is conclusive of the point. We take as a rule of decision the construction of a statute by the supreme court of the state. The four judgments, first above named, must, therefore, be considered a lien on the leasehold estate in question, from the 3d day of October, 1842, which was the first day of the term.

It is contended, however, that as no execution was issued on the judgment in favor of the Northern Bank of Kentucky, until after execution had been issued and levied, on the judgment in favor of Marriott & Hardesty, entered at January term, 1843, of the superior court, that the lien of the Northern Bank is postponed in favor of the subsequent judgment. This must depend upon the construction of the statute.

The fourth section of the execution law, (Swan & C. St. 470) provides that "when two or more writs of execution against the same debtor, shall be sued out during the term in which judgment was rendered, or within ten days thereafter, and when two or more writs of execution against the same debtor, shall be delivered to the officer on the same day, no preference shall be given to either of such writs," &c. "In all other cases, the execution first delivered to the officer shall be first satisfied." "Provided, nothing herein contained, shall be so construed as to affect any preferable lien, which one or more of the judgments, on which such executions issued, may have on the lands of the judgment debtor." The twelfth section of the same act declares that "unless execution shall be taken out and levied within twelve months after its rendition, it shall not operate as a lien on the estate of any debtor, to the prejudice of any other bona fide judgment creditor." In Patton v. Sheriff, 2 Ohio, 395; Waymire v. Staley, 3 Ohio, 366; Riddle v. Bryan, 5 Ohio, 52, it is laid down generally that in the above fourth section "the legislature intended to provide for three classes of cases:" (1) "Where there are two or more judgment creditors, having equal rights, and where there is no priority of lien, as where judgments are recovered in the same term." (2) "In cases where judgments do not operate as a lien, but the property is bound only from the time when seized in execution, as goods and chattels and lands not situated in the county where the judgment is recovered." And (3) "for cases where the creditor in consequence of not having an execution levied within one year from the date of his judgment, has lost the benefit of his lien, so far as that it shall not operate to the prejudice of any other bona fide judgment creditor."

From the above cases it appears that a judgment lien remains in full force, if execution be issued and levied within the year, as was done in the case of the Northern Bank.

As there is no allegation of fraud in the bill, and as the judgments will absorb the whole of the leasehold estate, and leave no surplus for the general creditors, there seems to be no reason why this court should take any further jurisdiction in the case. The bill is, therefore, dismissed at the complainant's costs.

McLEAN v. ST. PAUL & C. RY. CO.

[16 Blatchf. 309; 25 Int. Rev. Rec. 249; 8 Reporter, 69; 20 Alb. Law J. 78.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 24, 1879.[2]

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — PETITION — SUFFICIENCY — CITIZENSHIP — COPY OF RECORD NOT FILED IN TIME.

1. Under sections 2 and 3 of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 470, 471), a suit may be removed into this court from a state court, on a petition by the defendant, averring that the defendant is a corporation created by, and a citizen of, one state, and that the plaintiff is a citizen of another state, without averring that the plaintiff was, at the time of the commencement of the suit, a citizen of a different state from the defendant.

2. The defendant in a suit, after taking steps to remove it into this court, did not file in this court a copy of the record of the suit until three days after the day named in the removal bond as the day on which the copy of the record was to be filed. The case was not within the exceptions provided for in section 7 of the said act. The plaintiff had not waived the delay, and the defendant offered no excuse except an allegation that the non-filing on the proper day was an inadvertence. The plaintiff moved to remand the cause: Held, that the motion must be granted.

D. M. Porter, for plaintiff.

Charles W. Bangs, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. On the 7th of February, 1879, this suit was commenced in the court of common pleas for the city and county of New York, by the service of a summons. A complaint was afterwards put in in the state court, which demands judgment against the defendant for $105,000 and interest, for breach of a contract. The complaint, which is sworn to February 27th, 1879, sets forth that the plaintiff "is a resident of the city of Brooklyn, county of Kings and state of New York." The defendant is a corporation created by the state of Minnesota. On the 17th of March, 1879, the state court made an order in the cause, in these words: "It appearing by the complaint in this action, that the defendant, the St. Paul and Chicago Railway Company, is a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Minnesota, and that the plaintiff is a resident of the state of New York, and the said defendant having, before the term at which this cause could be first tried in this court, made and filed a petition in this suit, in this court, whereby it appears that the plaintiff in this action is a citizen of the state of New York, and that the defendant is a citizen of the state of Minnesota, and that, pursuant to the second and third sections of the act of the congress of the United States, approved March 3, 1875, this being an action between citizens of different states, and the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum of value of $500, the defendant having prayed for the removal of this suit into the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York, and having made and filed with the said petition a bond, with good and sufficient surety, for the defendant entering in said circuit court, on the first day of its next session, a copy of the record of such suit in this court, and for paying all costs that may be awarded by the said circuit court of the United States, if the said court shall hold that this suit was wrongfully or improperly removed thereto, and also for the appearing and entering special bail in such suit, if special bail was originally requisite therein, now, on reading and filing a copy of the pleadings in said action in this court, and the said petition and bond and proof of service of a copy thereof, and of notice of application for this order, on the attorney for the plaintiff, and on motion of Mr. C. W. Bangs, attorney for the defendant in this action, no one appearing to oppose, it is ordered, that the said petition and bond be accepted and filed, and that this court will proceed no further in this suit, and it is hereby declared that the said suit is removed to the said circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York." The petition to the state court is dated March 3d, 1879, and sworn to the next day. It sets forth, that the defendant "is, and is alleged in the complaint to be, a corporation created and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Minnesota, and that it is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff is a resident of the city of Brooklyn, county of Kings and state of New York, and the plaintiff is, as your petitioner is informed and believes, a citizen of the state of New York, and the defendant corporation is a citizen of the state of Minnesota." The bond referred to in said order contains this recital: "Whereas the said Samuel McLean, a citizen of the state of New York, has commenced an action in the court of common pleas for the city and county of New York, against the St. Paul and Chicago Railway Company, a citizen of the state of Minnesota, * * * and the said action involves a controversy between citizens of different states."

The first day of the next session of this court after the 17th of March, 1879, was the 7th of April, 1879. The defendant did not file a copy of the record in the suit in this court on the 7th of April, nor did it enter an appearance in this court in this suit on the 7th of April, nor until the 10th of April, on which latter day it did file in this court a copy of such record, and enter its appearance in this suit in this court, and enter a rule in this court that this action proceed in this court as if originally commenced therein, of which notice was given to the plaintiff's attorney on the 10th of April.

The plaintiff now moves this court to remand this cause to the state court, on two grounds: (1.) Because the proceedings for the removal do not show that, at the commencement of the suit, the plaintiff was a citizen of the state of New York, but only show that the plaintiff was a citizen of the state of New York at the time the defendant applied to remove the cause; (2.) Because the record was not filed in this court until the 10th of April.

In Insurance Co. v. Pechner, 95 U. S. 183, a petition for removal on the ground of citizenship was presented to the state court under section 12 of the act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 79), which provided, that, "if a suit be commenced in any state court," "by a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought, against a citizen of another state," "and the defendant shall, at the time of entering his appearance in such state court, file a petition for the removal of the cause for trial into the next circuit court," "it shall then be the duty of the state court to" "proceed no further in the cause." The petition was dated ten days after the suit was commenced, and was sworn to the next day after its date, and it was presented to the state court at the time the appearance of the defendant was entered in that court. The statement of the petition as to the citizenship of the plaintiff was, that the plaintiff "is a citizen of the state of New York." The state court denied the application for removal. The plaintiff had a judgment. The case went to the court of appeals of New York, which held (Pechner v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 65 N. Y. 195), that the state court had a right to proceed with the cause, because the petition for removal did not show that the plaintiff was a citizen of the state of New York when the suit was commenced. The case was then taken to the supreme court of the United States. That court held that section 12 of the act of 1789, in the language above quoted, had reference to the citizenship of the parties when the suit was begun. It added: "The phraseology employed in the acts of 1866 (14 Stat. 307), 1867 (14 Stat. 558), and 1875 (18 Stat. 470), and in Rev. St. § 639, is somewhat different, and we are not now called upon to give a construction to the language there used. As to the act of 1789, we entertain no doubt in this particular. This right of removal is statutory. Before a party can avail himself of it, he must show upon the record that his is a case which comes within the provisions of the statute. His petition for removal, when filed, becomes a part of the record in the cause. It should state facts which, taken in connection with such as already appear, entitle him to the transfer. If he fails in this, he has not, in law, shown to the court that it cannot 'proceed further with the cause.' Having once acquired jurisdiction, the court may proceed until it is judicially informed that its power over the cause has been suspended. It remains only to apply this rule to the facts as they appear in this record. The suit was commenced June 1, 1867. At that time there was nothing in the pleadings or process to indicate the citizenship of the plaintiff. The defendant, in its petition for removal, bearing date June 11, simply stated that the plaintiff is—that is to say, was at that date—a citizen of New York. This, certainly, is not stating affirmatively that such was his citizenship when the suit was commenced. The court had the right to take the case as made by the party himself, and not inquire further. If that was not sufficient to oust the jurisdiction, there was no reason why the court might not proceed with the cause. We think, therefore, that the court of appeals did not err in its decision."

As there was nothing before the state court in this case, and there is nothing before this court, to show that the plaintiff was a citizen of the state of New York when this suit was commenced, it follows that this court would have no jurisdiction of this suit if the removal were sought under a statute worded as is section 12 of the judiciary act of 1789. But the order of removal shows that the state court regarded the case as one of removal under sections 2 and 3 of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 470, 471). Section 2 of that act provides, "that any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, now pending or hereafter brought in any state court, * * * in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states, * * * either party may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district." Section 3 of that act provides, "that, whenever either party * * * entitled to remove any suit mentioned in the next preceding section shall desire to remove such suit from a state court to the circuit court of the United States, he or they may make and file a petition in such suit in such state court, * * * for the removal of such suit into the circuit court to be held in the district where such suit is pending, and shall make and file therewith a bond, with good and sufficient surety, for his or their entering in such circuit court on the first day of its then next session, a copy of the record in such suit, * * * and also for there appearing * * * in such suit, * * * it shall then be the duty of the state court to accept said petition and bond and proceed no further in such suit * * *; and, the said copy being entered as aforesaid in said circuit court of the United States, the cause shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been originally commenced in the said circuit court."

The defendant contends, that, under the act of 1875, it is not necessary, in order to a removal in the present case, that it should appear that the parties were citizens of different states when the suit was commenced.

The act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 558) provided, "that, where a suit is now pending or may hereafter be brought in any state court, in which there is controversy between a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another state, * * * such citizen of another state, whether he be plaintiff or defendant, if he will make and file in such court an affidavit stating * * * may, at any time before the final hearing or trial of the suit, file a petition in such state court for the removal of the suit into the next circuit court of the United States to be held in the district where the suit is pending, and offer good and sufficient surety * * *; and it shall be thereupon the duty of the state court to accept the surety and proceed no further in the suit."

In Johnson v. Monell [Case No. 7,399], the plaintiff, being a citizen of Iowa, brought a suit in a state court of Nebraska against a citizen of Nebraska. During the pendency of the suit the plaintiff became a citizen of Nebraska, and the suit was tried in the state court while both of the parties were citizens of Nebraska. The plaintiff had a verdict. A new trial was granted on the application of the defendant. The plaintiff, having again, and voluntarily, become a citizen of Iowa, then petitioned, under the act of 1867, for the removal of the suit into the circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, the defendant having remained throughout, and being still, a citizen of Nebraska. The state court made an order removing the cause, and the defendant then moved the circuit court to dismiss the case, or remand it to the state court, for want of jurisdiction. The motion was heard before Mr. Justice Miller and Judge Dundy. The court held that the act of 1867 was within the constitutional power of congress. The court then proceed, Mr. Justice Miller delivering the opinion: "The next question is, whether the fact that, pending the litigation in the state court, the plaintiff changed his citizenship from Nebraska to Iowa, stands in the way of the removal of the cause? The act does not, in terms, prescribe the time at which the citizenship of the moving party must be acquired. Nor is there anything from which to imply that a time was intended to be limited in that regard. Had congress intended to confine the privileges of the act to parties who were citizens of different states at the commencement of the suit, it would have been very easy so to have provided. It did not see fit so to do. On the other hand, in express terms, or, at least, by the strongest implication, it provided otherwise. The language is: 'Where a suit is now pending, or may hereafter be brought, in any state court, in which there is a controversy between a citizen,' &c., which is as much as to say, whenever a controversy shall arise, in a suit pending in a state court, the parties to which shall at any time be citizens of different states, the cause may be removed. No time at which the citizenship shall be acquired is limited. So, the inference is, that it may be acquired at any time. Nor is the case changed by the circumstance that the citizenship in Nebraska was abandoned, and that in Iowa acquired voluntarily, or even for the purpose of securing the right of removal. It has been repeatedly held, that the fact that a party had removed from one state to another, in order to be able to bring his suit in the federal court, did not affect the jurisdiction." The conclusion of the court was, that congress intended, in reference both to plaintiffs and to defendants, to confer the right of removal from the state courts, at any stage of the proceedings before the final trial was begun, and when the requisite citizenship was found to exist, on the making of the proper affidavit and the giving of the required bond. In the particulars involved in the suit now before us, the provisions of the act of 1875 are like those of the act of 1867. This suit is within the terms of section 2 of the act of 1875. It is a civil suit, brought in the state court after the passage of the act of 1875, the matter in dispute exceeds the requisite amount, and there is a controversy in it between citizens of different states. The petition and bond were in proper form. The state court accepted them and made the order of removal. The expression in the act of 1875, "any suit now pending or hereafter brought, in which there shall be a controversy between citizens, either party may remove it," is in the same form, and must have the same meaning, in respect to the point now under consideration, as the expression in the act of 1867, "where a suit is now pending or may hereafter be brought, in which there is a controversy between a citizen and a citizen, the latter citizen, whether plaintiff or defendant, may file a petition for the removal of the suit." The observations of Mr. Justice Miller in regard to the act of 1867 apply fully to the act of 1875.

In McGinnity v. White [Case No. 8,802], the plaintiff, in February, 1870, brought a suit in a state court of Nebraska, against five defendants. One of them, White, after answering, and in April, 1875, filed a petition for the removal of the suit into the circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, under the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306). The petition set forth that White "is now, and, since the 19th day of February, 1873, has been, a citizen of the state of New Jersey," and that "the plaintiff is, and was at the time of bringing the suit, a citizen of Nebraska," and contained the other necessary averments. The state court made an order removing the cause. A motion was made before the circuit court, held by Judges Dillon and Dundy, to remand the cause to the state court. The opinion of the court was delivered by Judge Dillon. He cites the case of Johnson v. Monell [supra] as having determined, that, under the act of 1867, "a party to a suit, who, while it is pending, becomes a bona fide citizen of another state, is entitled, if the other required conditions are met, to have the case removed." He adds: "As both acts give the right to apply for the removal 'at any time before the trial or final hearing of the cause,' I can see no difference in this respect between the act of 1866 and the act of 1867, and the reasoning in the case cited seems to be applicable here and to favor the right of removal. Pending the suit in the state court, the defendant has, in good faith, become a non-resident of the state of Nebraska, and a citizen of another state, and it is this which constitutes the substantial ground upon which the right, under the act of 1866, to the removal, is based." The motion to remand was denied. See, also, Yulee v. Vose [99 U. S.] 539.

On the facts set forth in the petition in this case, this suit was and is one properly removable into this court, under the act of 1875.

As to the non-filing of the record by the 7th of April, the 3d section of the act of 1875 provides, that, when the proper petition and bond, in a proper suit, are presented to the state court, it shall be the duty of that court to accept them and proceed no further in the suit. It then goes on to provide, that "the said copy," that is, a copy of the record in the state court, in the suit, "being entered as aforesaid in said circuit court of the United States, the cause shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been originally commenced in said circuit court." The words "as aforesaid" are found in the same connection in section 12 of the act of 1789, and in section 5 of the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 757) and in the act of 1866, and in the act of 1867, and in section 2 of the act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 227), and in section 639 of the Revised Statutes. They cannot properly have any other meaning than that, when the copy is entered by the party removing the cause, it must be entered at the time mentioned before as the time to be named in the bond, namely, the first day of the then next session of the circuit court. It is true, that there are exceptional cases provided for in section 7 of the act of 1875, in which it is declared that the bond may be satisfied and discharged by the filing of the copy of the record by the party removing the cause after the day named in the bond. But the present case is not one of such exceptional cases. The term of this court to which this suit was removable commenced more than twenty days after the petition and bond were filed in the state court, and it does not appear that the clerk of the state court refused to furnish a copy of the record. On the contrary, the certified copy of the record filed in this court was certified by such clerk on the 18th of March, 1879. The two cases in this court, of Broadnax v. Eisner [Case No. 1,909], and Bright v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. [Id. 1,877], are authorities to show that the defendant has lost its right to perfect the removal of this cause, and that this cause must be remanded. The plaintiff has not waived the delay in filing the copy, nor does the allegation in the affidavit of the defendant's attorney, that, by inadvertence, the copy was not filed on the first day of the term, furnish a sufficient excuse to authorize this court to say that it acquired jurisdiction of the cause by the filing of the copy on the 10th of April. The case last cited is authority, also, for holding, that there is nothing in section 5 of the act of 1875 which prevents this court from remanding this cause. The case of Osgood v. Chicago, D. & V. R. Co. [Id. 10,604] was, on the facts involved in the decision of it, not like the present case. The copy of the record of the state court had, in that case, been filed in the circuit court in time by the party removing the cause, and the cause had, in all respects, been "removed" to the circuit court, within the language of section 5. The present case has not been "removed" to this court, because that has not been done which, under section 3 of the act, authorizes this court to proceed in the suit. In regard to what is said in the case of Osgood v. Chicago, D. & V. R. Co. [supra] respecting the authority of the circuit court, since section 5 of the act of 1875 was enacted, to dismiss and remand causes, it may be observed, that the provisions of it are enabling and not prohibitory, and that they are such as not to indicate any intention in congress to take away from the circuit court the power of remanding a cause to the state court, on the ground that the prescribed prerequisites necessary to authorize the circuit court to proceed in the cause have not been complied with.

The motion to remand this cause to the state court is granted, with costs to be taxed.

[This order, together with the subsequent order of December 22, 1879 (Case No. 8,893), was affirmed by the supreme court, on writ of error. 108 U. S. 212, 2 Sup. Ct. 498.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 22, 1879.[2]

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — SECOND PETITION — SAME TERM OF COURT — EDITION OF UNITED STATES STATUTES—BOND ON REMOVAL—WAIVER BY NEGLECT—EXCUSE.

1. On March 17th, the state court in which this suit was pending made an order, on the petition of the defendant, that it be removed into this court. The defendant ought to have filed the record in this court by April 7th. It was not filed till April 10th. This court, on May 24th, made an order remanding the cause. June 2d, on a new petition filed that day by the defendant, which set forth that the suit was then pending in the state court, that court made an order that the suit be removed into this court: Held, that, as the removal was provided for by sections 2 and 3 of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 470, 471), the petition was in time if filed before or at the term at which the cause "could be first tried, and before the trial thereof."

2. The publication of the second edition of the Revised Statutes, under the act of March 2, 1877 (19 Stat. 268), did not re-instate subdivision 1 of section 639 of the Revised Statutes, as applicable to this suit. The proper condition of the bond on removal was that prescribed by section 3 of the act of 1875.

4. As the defendant had once removed the cause to this court and had failed, by neglect, to perfect the removal, and the cause had been remanded for that reason, the right to remove it had been waived and lost.[2]

[Cited in Rowell v. Hill, 28 Fed. 434.]

5. The defendant could not now be allowed to furnish an excuse for not having in time filed the record on the first removal, and it had acquiesced in the first remand by averring, in the second petition, that the cause was then pending in the state court.[2]

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. A petition by the defendant and a bond for the removal of this suit into this court were filed in the state court in which the suit was pending, on the 17th of March, 1879, and on that day the state court made an order that the petition and bond be accepted and filed, "and that this court will proceed no further in this suit, and it is hereby declared that the said suit is removed to the said circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York." The defendant ought to have filed a copy of the record in this court by the 7th of April, but did not until the 10th of April. For that cause, this court made an order, on the 24th of May, on motion of the plaintiff, remanding the cause to the state court. [Case No. 8,892.] On the 2d of June, 1879, the defendant filed in the state court a petition and bond for the removal of the cause into this court, and the state court made an order, on that day, that said petition and bond be accepted, and "that this court will proceed no further in this suit, the said suit being removed to the said circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York." A copy of the record in the suit having been filed in this court in due time by the defendant, and the defendant having appeared in the suit in this court, the plaintiff now moves, on various grounds, to remand the cause to the state court.

It is contended that, under subdivision 1 of section 639 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the petition for removal in this case should have been filed in the state court at the time the appearance of the defendant was entered in the state court. This is on the idea that such subdivision was in force, as respects this suit. But, as the removal of this case is provided for by sections 2 and 3 of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 470, 471), those sections supersede, and take the place of, in regard to this suit, such subdivision. Under the act of 1875, the petition was in time if filed before or at the term at which the cause "could be first tried, and before the trial thereof." It is suggested, for the plaintiff, that the second edition of the Revised Statutes, printed and promulgated in 1878, is a re-enactment of the Revised Statutes in 1878, and that subdivision 1 of section 639, found in it, displaces the act of 1875. This is an error. The Revised Statutes were enacted June 22, 1874. The new or second edition authorized by the act of March 2, 1877 (19 Stat. 268), is the Revised Statutes, as enacted June 22, 1874, with all amendments made between December 1, 1873, and March 4, 1877. By section 5601 of the Revised Statutes, all acts passed after December 1, 1873, are left in force as if passed after June 22, 1874. The publication of the second edition of the Revised Statutes does not affect any statute passed subsequently to December 1, 1873. It does not affect the act of March 3, 1875, nor re-instate subdivision 1 of section 639, as applicable to this suit.

It is urged, that the bond in this case is not the proper bond, because its condition was not that provided for by section 639, Rev. St., but that provided for by section 3 of the act of 1875. As the suit is one mentioned in section 2 of that act, the proper condition of the bond was that prescribed by section 3 of that act.

It is further urged, that the petition filed June 2d, 1879, was not filed before or at the term at which the cause "could be first tried" in the state court, although filed before the trial of the cause in that court. Issue was joined in the suit, by the answer of the defendant in the state court, February 27, 1879. The order of removal made by the state court March 17, 1879, states that the petition for removal that day filed is filed "before the term at which this cause could be first tried in this court." This is an adjudication of that fact by the state court. Even if such an adjudication would be reviewed by this court, it is apparent, that the cause could not have been tried before the March term, 1879, of the state court, and at that term the petition was filed. It is plain, from sections 977, 980, of the Code of New York, that the cause could not have been noticed for trial, or put on the calendar of the state court, for the March term, or regularly brought to trial at that term, except by consent. The term at which the cause "could be first tried" is the term at which, under the legislation of the state and the rules of practice pursuant thereto, the cause is first triable, that is, subject to be tried on its merits. Dill. Rem. Causes (2d Ed.) p. 57; Ames v. Colorado Cent. R. Co. [Case No. 325]; Fulton v. Golden [Id. 5,155].

On the 17th of March, 1879, the state court declared, by the order of that date, that it would proceed no further in the suit and that the suit was removed to this court. This was equivalent to saying it would not try the cause. This state of things continued until this court, by its order of May 24th, remanded the cause to the state court. Then, under the state legislature and practice, the term at which the cause could be first tried was the June term, and at or before that term the new petition for removal was filed. So far, therefore, as the question of time is concerned, the new petition was filed in time, under the act of 1875.

It is further urged that, the defendant having once removed the cause to this court, and having failed to perfect the removal by neglect to file the record in time in this court, and the cause having been remanded to the state court for that reason, the right to remove the cause has been lost, because the delay is prejudicial to the plaintiff; and that, if the right to remove is to be allowed in this case, under such circumstances, the same course might be repeated ad infinitum. That a defendant may waive his right to remove a cause is plain. Hanover Nat. Bank v. Smith [Case No. 6,035]. He ought to be held to have waived it where he has attempted to exercise it once, and has failed, by neglect, to perfect the removal, and where, to allow the subsequent removal, would make effective the delay of the cause, to the presumed prejudice of the plaintiff, for the time elapsed after the failure to perfect the removal occurred. That is the present case.

The defendant calls attention to the recent decision of the supreme court in Meyer v. Construction Co., 100 U. S. 457, and claims that, under that decision, this cause ought not to have been remanded before, and, therefore, ought to be retained here now. The supreme court, in that case, says, that it does not appear, by the statute, that the circuit court is to be deprived of its jurisdiction, if "by accident" the party is delayed until a later day than the first day of the term of the circuit court, in filing a copy of the record of the state court; and that, if the circuit court, for good cause shown, accepts the transfer after the day and during the term, its jurisdiction will, as a general rule, be complete and the removal properly effected. The affidavit of the defendant's attorney, furnished to the court on the first motion to remand, purporting to give an excuse in this case for not filing the copy of the record, on the first removal, on the first day of the April term, and to make out a case of "accident," contained the following on that subject and nothing more: "And deponent says, that, by inadvertence, during his, deponent's, absence from his office on the 7th April, instant, the record, in said cause, of the said proceeding, in the court of common pleas of the city and county of New York, in the said action, and a copy of the pleadings therein, was not filed in the court on that day, and that deponent did not discover that the same had not been filed until the 10th instant." This affidavit does not make out a case of accident. Facts are not stated from which the court can see that there was an inadvertence or an accident. The conclusion of inadvertence is sworn to. The certified copy of the petition for removal, bond, and order of removal, filed in this court on the 10th of April, was certified by the clerk of the state court on the 18th of March. No reason is shown why it was not filed here before the 7th of April, as it might have been. This court did not accept the transfer, but remanded the cause. It did so on what then appeared, and still appears, to be a proper ground. This court could not now vacate the order of May 24th, remanding the cause, on the furnishing now, by the defendant, of an affidavit showing what would have been held to be a satisfactory excuse for not having filed the first record in time, or a case of "accident." The defendant had his day in court, at that time, and the matter became res adjudicata, not to be re-opened because of any facts then existing and which might have been then shown. Moreover, the defendant has acquiesced in the former remand, and waived all right to claim that the cause is in this court under the first removal, by averring, in its second petition for removal, that the suit "is now," May 28th, 1879 (that being the day the petition was sworn to by the president of the defendant corporation), "pending in the court of common pleas for the city and county of New York," and praying for its removal from that court to this court.

The motion to remand the cause to the state court is granted, with costs.

[This order, together with that of May 24, 1879 (Case No. 8,892), was affirmed by the supreme court, on writ of error. 108 U. S. 212, 2 Sup. Ct. 498.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1812.

COURTS—APPEAL IN ADMIRALTY—WRIT OF ERROR—CIRCUIT COURT—CONDEMNATION—JUDGMENT ON BAIL BOND.

1. The circuit court of Massachusetts has no cognizance of causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction from the district court of Maine, except by appeal; and a writ of error thereon will be quashed.

See The Struggle [Case No. 13,550].

This was a writ of error brought to reverse the decision of the district court of Maine in a cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. A motion was made to dismiss the writ of error, upon the ground that this cause was cognizable only by way of appeal, and not by writ of error. On inspection of the record it appeared, that the libel was filed against certain goods, for being unladen within the district of Saco without a permit from the collector of the district, contrary to the act of 2d March, 1799, c. 128 [chapter 22]. Pending the prosecution, on application of the claimant [Joseph McLellan] the goods were delivered to him on appraisement and giving a bond pursuant to, or intended to be pursuant to, the 89th section of the same act. A decree of condemnation passed against the goods at January term, 1812, and it was thereupon, in the same decree, further awarded by the court, that the appraised value thereof should be paid to the clerk of the court, together with the costs of prosecution, in twenty days from the award of judgment, and in default thereof, that execution should issue for the sums aforesaid against the claimant and his surety on the bond. No appeal was interposed from the decree to the next circuit court, and the cause had been removed to this court at this term upon the writ of error.

Mr. Jackson for plaintiff in error. The judgment on the bond is distinct from the decree, though coupled with it. The one is at common law; the other, is of admiralty jurisdiction. The bond under the collection act differs from the stipulation under the embargo acts, and is not analogous to the stipulations in admiralty. The judgment, therefore, is a judgment at common law, on which error may well lie. By section 89 of the collection act, judgment on the bond is to be rendered in open court on motion, unless the appraised value is paid within twenty days from the decree of forfeiture. The motion is equivalent to a scire facias, where there is a recognizance. This judgment having been rendered forthwith, without waiting the expiration of the twenty days, is erroneous.

Mr. Lee, district attorney of Maine, contended that the bond resembled a stipulation, and therefore the decision below was a decree of the admiralty, not a common law judgment.

STORY, Circuit Justice (after reciting the facts). On examining the language of the judiciary act of 24th September, 1789, c. 20 [1 Stat. 73], I am satisfied that a writ of error is not the proper process, to remove the decree of the district court of Maine for re-examination into this court. The mode prescribed by law is by appeal to the next circuit court, and as no such appeal was claimed or allowed, the party cannot now take advantage of any errors of fact or law apparent in the cause, so far as it is a cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. But it has been contended by the counsel for the claimant, that although the original decree of condemnation cannot now be inquired into, yet the award of judgment and execution upon the bond is to be considered as a distinct judgment at common law, and that a writ of error lies to correct the errors of law in such judgment; and it is further contended, that the award of judgment and execution in the case at bar, not having been in open court after the lapse of twenty days from the rendition of the decree, is irregular and voidable.

On examining the 89th section of the act under which this bond is taken, it appears that "if judgment shall pass against the claimant, as to the whole or any part of such ship or vessel, goods, wares or merchandize, and the claimant shall not within twenty days thereafter pay into the court, or to the proper officer thereof, the amount of the appraised value of such ship, &c., &c., so condemned, with the costs, judgment shall, and may be granted upon the bond on motion in open court, without further delay." It would seem, therefore, that the judgment on the bond ought to be in open court, after the lapse of the twenty days, and not before. If we had cognizance of the present suit, I should incline to think, that the judgment was irregularly rendered. But I am well satisfied, that upon the true construction of the act, this judgment cannot be considered as a distinct, independent judgment at common law; but as a mere incident and attendant upon the original cause. If the claimant had appealed from the decree of condemnation, the bond would have followed the cause into this court, and upon affirmation of the decree, the fruits of the bond might have been obtained in the same manner, as in the court below. The bond, in fact, is nothing more than a security taken to enforce the original decree; and is in the nature of a stipulation in the admiralty. It matters not whether a security in an admiralty and maritime cause be by bond, or recognizance, or stipulation. The court have an inherent authority to take it, and to proceed to award judgment thereon according to the course of the admiralty, unless where some statute has prescribed a different course. I consider this act as merely providing a new practice, as to admiralty proceedings on bonds within the purview of it, but by no means as separating the bond from its connexion with the original cause. Following, therefore, the nature of the original cause, it operates as a stipulation, and the court as a court of admiralty may rightfully award execution thereon. See Brymer v. Atkins, 1 H. Bl. 164.

Strictly speaking, a decree of condemnation, in cases like the present, is but an interlocutory having the effect of a final decree, and the ultimate adjudication of the cause is not complete, until judgment has been awarded upon the bond. In the case of The Alligator [Case No. 248], at the last term, the court had occasion to consider the nature and effect of bonds given in admiralty suits, and I refer to that case, as containing my own settled opinion. I am of opinion, that the writ of error should be quashed as having issued improvidently.

As the district judge concurs in this opinion, let the writ of error be quashed. Writ quashed.

McLELLAND v. The ROBERT MORRIS.

[3 Pa. Law J. 493; 1 Wall. Jr. 33; 2 Pa. Law J. Rep. 220.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Nov. 12, 1842.

MARITIME LIENS—REPAIRS TO VESSEL—STATE AND FEDERAL COURTS.

The repair of a vessel used to navigate tide-water, although used partly on inland navigation, is a maritime contract, and the mechanics and material men may proceed in the courts of the state or of the United States, and they may take a reasonable time to commence their proceedings. And the jurisdiction of the admiralty court cannot be ousted by any proceeding in the state courts by the owners or agents of the vessel.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania.]

The Robert Morris is a large canal boat, decked and rigged as a schooner, employed in carrying lime, &c., from Norristown, on the Schuylkill Canal, down the rivers Schuylkill and Delaware, to Salem, New Jersey, and occasionally through the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal into Maryland, returning with wood or such other cargo as could be procured. In February and March, 1842, she was repaired at the shipyard of the libellant, who retained possession of her until she was taken from his custody by the sheriff of the city and county of Philadelphia, under a replevin issued from the state courts. The libellant then filed a libel in the admiralty, and the vessel was attached for the amount of his demand. The claimant moved to have the attachment quashed, for want of jurisdiction in the court. (1) Because neither the vessel nor the contract was of a maritime character. (2) Because by the replevin the state courts had possession of the subject-matter, and therefore exclusive jurisdiction.

After argument by H. Hubbel, for the claimant, and Vandyke for the libellant, a motion was dismissed by Randall, J., and the claimant ordered to answer over. After a final decree for the libellant, the cause was removed to the circuit court, where the following opinion was delivered by BALDWIN, Circuit Justice: In the case of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 443, the supreme court declared that by the common law "material men and mechanics furnishing repairs to a domestic ship have no particular lien on the ship itself for the recovery of their demands. A shipwright, indeed, who has taken a ship into his own possession to repair it, is not bound to part with the possession until he is paid for the repairs, any more than any other artificer. But if he has once parted with the possession, or has worked upon it without taking possession, he is not deemed a privileged creditor, having any claim upon the ship itself." "No lien is implied unless it is recognized by the municipal law of the state to which the ship belongs." In the case of Peroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 341, it was held that a proceeding in rem against a steam-boat for materials found and work performed in repairing the vessel in the port of New Orleans, under a contract entered into between the parties for that purpose, that it was a maritime contract, and if the service was to be performed in a place within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, and a lien was given by the law of Louisiana, it would bring the case within the jurisdiction of the district court, and may be enforced in the admiralty. "The service was to be substantially performed, on the sea or on tide-water, because there is no doubt that the jurisdiction exists, although the commencement or termination of the voyage may happen to be at some place beyond the reach of the tide; the material consideration is whether the service is essentially a maritime service." The Jefferson, 10 Wheat.

[23 U. S.] 428. "A contract made at land within the body of a county is maritime in its nature, if it concerns the navigation of the sea." Zane v. The President [Case No. 18,201]. The true test (of the admiralty jurisdiction) in all cases of this sort is whether the vessel shall be engaged substantially in maritime navigation, or in interior navigation, and trade not on tide-waters. In the latter case there is no jurisdiction, nor where the services are not maritime, for its jurisdiction in matters of contract is limited to those, and those only, which are maritime. The Orleans v. Phoenix, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 183, 184. In that case the court thus explains the principles laid down in the case of The General Smith and Peroux v. Howard [supra]: "The contract was treated as a maritime contract, and the lien under the state laws was enforced in the admiralty, on the ground that the court under such circumstances had jurisdiction of the contract as maritime, and then the lien being attached to it might be enforced according to the mode of administering remedies in the admiralty. The local laws can never confer jurisdiction on the courts of the United States; they can only furnish rules to ascertain the rights of parties, and thus assist in the administration of proper remedies where the jurisdiction is vested by the laws of the United States." Id. 184.

Reluctant as I have been, and yet am, to extend the jurisdiction of the courts of admiralty beyond the limits defined by the common law, it would not comport with my duty to hesitate to follow the rules and be guided by the principles laid down in the preceding cases. They are the law of the case, and must be taken to be the law of this court, till changed or modified by the tribunal which has established and prescribed them for the observance of all inferior courts. The record and admitted facts in this case bring it within these decisions. The Robert Morris was employed in navigation on tide-water. That the commencement of her voyages was on one canal and their termination in another, both above tide-water, does not make her intermediate courses "interior navigation." The contract is maritime, for it was the navigation of tide-water which was substantially the service of the schooner. The repairs were made in this port, which is within admiralty jurisdiction. The state law gives a lien, and consequently the libellant has made out a case cognizable by the district court according to the course of the admiralty.

It is, however, contended by the counsel of the claimant, that the lien given by the state law was superseded by the replevin under which the schooner was taken from the possession of the libellant by the claimant, and retained by him at the time she was attached on the libel at a place above tide-water. Had the replevin been issued under any provision of the state law which gave the lien, it might have been considered as a qualification of the lien, and made it subject to be defeated by that process; but the law does not so qualify the lien, or in any way subject it to the forms or delay of proceedings according to the course of the law; above all not to the effects of an action of replevin, which is one of the most tedious cases, if not the most so, when conducted through all its stages, which is known to the law. On the contrary, the state law gives to the state court powers to enforce the lien according to the course of courts of admiralty, which would be utterly defeated if the possession of the vessel was to be taken under a writ of replevin while in the hands of those to whom the law gives a lien, and who have a right to enforce it by the process and course of proceedings appropriate to a court of admiralty, unless they had in some way lost their lien before the replevin was taken out. Having an acknowledged lien, the material men and mechanics have an election to proceed in the courts of the state or of the United States. They may take a reasonable time to commence their proceedings, and cannot be deprived of their remedy by any act of the owners or agents of the vessel, which affects to displace the jurisdiction of admiralty, and send those who have a right to its remedies into another tribunal, where they would lose, or could but partially enjoy the benefits which the maritime law permits privileged creditors in maritime courts. I very much doubt whether a court of the state would permit its jurisdiction, under the law of the state giving the lien in such a case as this, to be thus ousted; but certainly this court, in the administration of the jurisprudence of the United States, cannot sanction the doctrine contended for on the part of the respondents as to the effect of the replevin he has sued out; nor can we consider the consequent removal of the vessel to a place beyond the flow of the tide, as at all impairing the admiralty jurisdiction of the district court over her, resulting from the lien in a case completely covered by the decisions of the supreme court.

Decree of the district court affirmed, with costs, and interest from the date of the decree.

McLEOD v. CALLICOTT.

[Chase, 443;[1] 10 Int. Rev. Rec. 94; 2 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 113.]

Circuit Court, D. South Carolina. June Term, 1869.

WAR — CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY — TREASURY AGENT—HOW PROPERTY RECOVERED—COURT OF CLAIMS.

1. No agent of the U. S. treasury department under the captured and abandoned property act, was justified in receiving after June 30, 1865, any captured or abandoned property unless theretofore surrendered by Confederate agents or officers, much less making any seizure of unsurrendered property.

2. Property surrendered by the military authorities of the Confederate government could not be released by any state or provost court.

3. A treasury agent, acting under color of the captured and abandoned property act, under which he is appointed, or under a mistaken sense of duty, can not be held responsible in a suit at law, or other personal proceeding.

4. The only remedy provided for the injured party is his right to prosecute his suit before the court of claims, within two years after the close of the war.

During the Civil War, the congress of the United States, on March 12, 1863, passed a law known as the "Captured and Abandoned Property Act" [12 Stat. 820], which directed the secretary of the treasury to appoint certain agents, whose duties were to receive from the military officers and from private soldiers, all property captured by the forces of the United States within his agency. They were also to take possession of property abandoned by its owners, and all property thus received was sold by them, and it was provided that the proceeds should be paid into the treasury. The act further provided that all citizens of the United States who had remained loyal to the government of the United States during the war, should have the right at any time within two years after the close of the war to file their petitions in the court of claims, and on furnishing proof of their loyalty, that court was authorized to order the proceeds of such property to be returned to them out of the treasury of the United States. This being the law, and the war having practically terminated in May, 1865, the secretary of the treasury, on June 27, 1865, addressed a circular to those treasury agents charged with the duty of collecting captured or abandoned property, directing them to dispose of the property then on hand, and to refrain from receiving any more after the 30th inst.—except such as had been actually captured or surrendered by military or naval officers or agents of the Confederate States, and which had not been delivered before that day. On July 27, 1868 [15 Stat. 243], the congress passed another act declaring the intent of the several laws relating to captured and abandoned property, by which it declared that the true intent and meaning of those acts was that the remedy given before the court of claims, should be exclusive of all other remedies, and that the owner of any property taken as captured or abandoned by agents of the treasury department, in virtue or under color of said act, "should be precluded from suit at common law or any other mode of redress whatever, before any court or tribunal other than the court of claims." Under these circumstances, Callicott being a supervising agent of the treasury department of the United States, under the captured and abandoned property act, operating in South Carolina, on October 21, 1865, seized and carried off thirty-nine bales of cotton belonging to the plaintiff, Alexander McLeod. Thereupon McLeod made divers attempts to have his property restored to him. He took proceedings before the provost court, one of the military civil tribunals established in South Carolina by the military authority for this purpose, and failed, that tribunal adjudging that the seizure was proper, or that he had no remedy before it. He then applied to the secretary of the treasury, who ordered a restoration of it, and Callicott refused to do so, unless a bond of indemnity should first be given to himself. Thereupon, at the opening of this court in this district, this suit was brought, —an action of trespass to recover the value of the cotton, together with vindictive damages for the tort. The defendant plead specially that what he did was as special supervising agent of the treasury department, acting by virtue and under color of the captured property act, to this general replication. On the trial the plaintiff proved the taking of the cotton on October 21, 1865, and its value. That Callicott had told the witness Townsend, that he knew he had no authority to take the cotton, and that he would return it to McLeod, if he would pay him two hundred dollars, or some such matter. That a considerable correspondence had taken place between the plaintiff's counsel and Callicott, on the subject of a restitution of this cotton, in which they urged and argued the wrongfulness of the seizure, on the law and the facts, and on his refusing to restore it, they had made application to the secretary of the treasury, who eventually ordered its restitution. But that Callicott had suppressed in his report on the case to the department very material—the most material portions of this correspondence with counsel, and had refused to obey the order of the secretary unless the plaintiff gave him a bond to indemnify him from all future liability for his conduct. The defendant, on his part, proved and relied on the proceedings in the provost court as evidence of his bona fides in making the seizure, and as being the sentence of a court of competent jurisdiction, which had adjudicated the rights between the parties in a suit before it, between the same parties, and about the same subject-matter.

Corbin, U. S. Dist. Atty., for defendant.

CHASE, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The district attorney has asked for various instructions which the court will decline to give, not that we doubt the general correctness of most of the legal propositions contained in them, but we prefer to give you what we conceive to be the law in the case, in our own language, embodying the instructions asked, so far as we think them correct, in what we say. This is an action of trespass brought by Alexander McLeod against T. C. Callicott. The plaintiff alleges that thirty-nine bales of cotton belonging to him, were wrongfully taken by defendant and converted to his own use. The defendant pleads in justification, not denying the taking, but averring that what he did was done as special supervising agent of the treasury department of the United States, and in accordance with law. The plaintiff replies, denying the truth of this averment, and insisting that in what Callicott did he did not act as agent, but wrongfully and without justification in law. The pleadings present the issue which you are to try. First, did this cotton belong to Alexander McLeod, the plaintiff, in October, 1865? Was it his property at that date? And second, was the defendant justified in what he did by virtue of his office as supervising agent of the treasury? That the cotton belonged to the plaintiff, unless his title had been divested by capture, seems not to be questioned. The second question alone, therefore, is important. Under several acts of congress, during the late war, supervising agents of the treasury department were appointed in the several insurgent states, and charged with certain specific duties. Among these duties was that of receiving from the military officers of the United States all property captured by them, with instructions to turn it over to the proper authorities, for sale and for account. In respect to citizens of the United States, who had maintained a loyal adhesion to the government of the United States, it was provided by law that this property or proceeds should be returned to them upon making the necessary proofs in the court of claims, at any time within two years after the close of the Rebellion. It is alleged, and not denied, that Callicott was supervising agent, and had the general authority. It was his duty to receive from military officers, and from private soldiers, all property captured by the forces of the United States, during the recent war, within his agency.

If this case depended on this general authority, the only question to be determined would be whether the cotton in question was captured property. But there is something more in this case. These supervising agents were appointed by the secretary of the treasury, under regulations approved by the president of the United States, and were subject in all respects to his direction and control; and the general regulations established had relation only to a state of war. Now, actual hostilities between the insurgent states and the United States terminated practically in May, 1865. In the state of South Carolina a provisional government was organized, under a proclamation of the president, in June or July of that year, and the secretary of the treasury, having reference to the changed condition of affairs, on June 27, 1865, addressed a circular to those treasury agents, in which he prescribed a rule for their government in the new state of things. (The chief justice here read the fourth section of the circular.) This section provides that officers "charged with the duty of receiving and collecting, or having in their possession or under their control, captured, abandoned, or confiscable personal property, will dispose of the same in accordance with regulations heretofore prescribed, and refrain from receiving such from military or naval authorities after the 30th instant." The general regulation which required Mr. Callicott to receive all captured property from officers of the United States was thus rescinded on June 27, 1865, with the following limitation: "This will not be considered as interfering with the operations of agents now engaged in receiving or collecting the property recently captured by or surrendered to the forces of the United States, whether or not covered by or included in the records delivered to the United States military or treasury authorities by rebel military officers or cotton agents." The new regulation or prohibitory order, therefore, did not extend to property which had been captured or surrendered by military officers of the Confederate government to the United States. But with that exception the prohibition is complete and final, and no agent of the treasury department was justified in receiving, after June 30, 1865, any captured property, unless theretofore surrendered; much less was any such officer warranted in making any capture of unsurrendered cotton himself, after that date, with or without military aid. He had no authority to do so. All his powers, as we have said to you, were derived from the treasury department, and when the treasury department withdrew that general authority it was at an end. The question, then, in this case, is whether this was a part of the property which had been surrendered by the military authority of the Confederate government to the United States prior to June 27, 1865. You have heard all the evidence, and it is your province to determine whether or not this property was in that category. If it was, then it was Callicott's duty to receive it and transmit it to the authorities of the United States for sale, and the only remedy which the owner or claimant of the cotton could possibly have would be by application to the court of claims of the United States. The whole matter seems to be narrowed down to the simple proposition whether the evidence before you satisfies your minds that the cotton was included in the surrender referred to in the secretary's instructions of June 27. If it was so included, then the court charges you that neither the action of the provost court, relied on by the defendant, nor the action of any state court could withdraw it from that category without the consent of the United States. If it was on June 27 captured property, in this sense, that is, property surrendered by the military authorities of the Confederate government to the United States, then it remained captured property, and could not be released by the action of the provost court. That action, if intended to have this effect, was without sanction of law, and of no avail. If it was such property, it was the duty of the defendant to take possession of it; if not, his seizure was unlawful. But there is another question, not necessarily determined by the character of the property, on which it is the duty of the court to make some observations. By an act passed on July 27, 1868, congress declared the intent of the several acts relating to captured property. Among these was the abandoned or captured property act of March 12, 1863, of which, as well as of the others, the true intent was declared to be that the remedy given in cases of seizure by preferring claims in the court of claims should be exclusive, precluding the owner of any property taken by agents of the treasury department as abandoned or captured property, in virtue "or under color of said act" from suit at common law or any other mode of redress whatever, before any court or tribunal other than the court of claims.

It will be for you to say whether the defendant, in taking this property, proceeded under color of that act. If he was proceeding in good faith, believing himself to be warranted as the officer of the national government in taking charge of the cotton under that act, we think he is covered by its provisions. We adopt this view the more readily because in a subsequent part of the act it is provided that "in all cases in which suits of trespass" (which is this case) "may have been brought, or shall hereafter be brought, against any person for or on account of private property taken by such person as an officer of the United States, by virtue of any act relating to captured or abandoned property, and the defendant shall plead, or allege in bar thereof, that such act was done or omitted to be done by him as an officer of the United States, in the administration of one of the acts aforesaid, or in virtue or under color thereof, such plea or allegation, if the fact be sustained by proof, shall be deemed and adjudged in law to be a complete and conclusive bar to any such suit or action. It is our duty, under this act, to say to you that the plea of the defendant in this case is a conclusive bar to this action, if you find affirmatively that the acts of his complained of in the declaration were done by him in virtue or under color of any of the acts referred to. If it was done by him as supervisory or special agent, under a mistake as to the character of the property, he is in our judgment protected by this act. It would not protect the United States from a demand in the court of claims for this property, but it would protect the officer against a private suit, if he acted under color of this law, or under a mistaken sense of duty, though not in strict pursuance of the law. You have heard all the evidence, and it is for you to judge whether he acted under a sense of duty or not. You can weigh the whole evidence and determine that matter for yourselves.

The only remaining point on which it is proper to instruct you is this:—It is claimed by counsel that in the event you should find for the plaintiff, you may assess what are called vindictive damages. The court can not say that to you. If you find for the plaintiff, it will be your duty to assess the value of the property at the time of the conversion, October 21, 1865, with lawful interest from that date.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE added:—If there is anything in the evidence which satisfies you that the defendant acted without any color of law, willfully and in flagrant disregard of his duty—then you have a right to assess vindictive damages. But it is for you to say whether there is anything of that sort in the proof.

The jury returned the following verdict: We find for the plaintiff, eleven thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight dollars.[2]

The defendant then moved for a new trial. (1) Because the finding of the jury was against the evidence. (2) Because it was against the law as laid down by the court.

On a subsequent day, the motion for the new trial having been argued by counsel, the court pronounced its opinion.

CHASE, Circuit Justice.—This is a motion for a new trial. The grounds assigned are that the verdict was contrary to the charge of the court. The court left to the jury the question of the good faith of Callicott as an officer of the government intending the honest exercise of his functions in the seizure of the cotton. We also left to the jury the question whether the cotton itself was part of that surrendered by the military authorities of the Confederate government, upon the termination of hostilities.

Upon the second question, we think the finding was clearly right. It is not impossible that this cotton was in fact the property of the Confederate government during the Rebellion, and included in the surrender made by the generals of the Confederate armies at the conclusion of hostilities. It is enough to say that no evidence to this effect was offered to the jury. But there was some of a contrary tendency.

It was, therefore, clearly a seizure unwarranted of law. The only question was whether Mr. Callicott was protected by his official character. We thought he was, if he was acting in good faith, in the exercise of his authority as supervising agent, though mistaken as to the character of the cotton. The question of good faith, of honest mistake, was left, and, we think, properly left to the jury. We thought that the evidence taken altogether warranted a verdict in favor of the defendant, and should have been quite satisfied had such a verdict been rendered.

We can not say that there was no evidence that warranted the conclusion of the jury. Townsend's statement, admitted by the district attorney, was that Callicott told him that he knew he had no authority to make the seizure; that he was willing to take two hundred dollars or some such sum, and release the cotton. There was testimony also which showed an omission in Callicott's report to the secretary of the treasury of an important part of the correspondence between himself and the counsel of the defendant. And there was evidence also that when the whole matter had been submitted to the secretary of the treasury, and he had directed that the cotton should be released upon the defendant giving the usual certificate of probable cause, Callicott required, as an additional condition of release, a bond of indemnity to himself. The jury might possibly have inferred, from all these things, that Callicott was not acting in good faith. We can not say that the conclusion was wrong.

Upon the whole evidence, and we do not go into that in favor of the defendant, our conclusion was the other way. But the matter of fact was fairly left to the jury, and was peculiarly within their province.

We can not set aside their verdict because the jury did not agree with us as to the preponderance of the evidence.

The motion for a new trial will be overruled.

3. A motion for an attachment, for a violation of the injunction in the state court, cannot be allowed; nor a motion to dissolve the injunction, as it necessarily falls by the removal of the case.

4. An motion for an injunction may be heard on the face of the bill, in this court, the same as if it had been originally filed here.

[This was an action by John R. McLeod against Jeremiah W. Duncan. Heard on motions for an attachment and to dissolve an injunction.]

Mr. Backus, for plaintiff.

Howard & Chickering, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This case was certified from the state court, under the act of congress. It was a bill in chancery on which an injunction had been allowed and issued. A motion was made to dissolve the injunction by the defendant, and also a motion by the plaintiff, for an attachment against the defendant, for a violation of the injunction.

The 12th section of the judiciary act of 1789, under which this case has been brought from the state court, provides, "that if a suit be commenced in any state court against an alien, or by a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought against a citizen of another state, and the matter in dispute exceeds the aforesaid sum or value of five hundred dollars, exclusive of costs, to be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court; and the defendant shall, at the time of entering his appearance in such state court, file a petition for the removal of the cause for trial into the next circuit court, to be held in the district where the suit is pending, &c., and offer good and sufficient security for his entering in such court, on the first day of its session, copies of said process against him, and also for his there appearing and entering special bail in the cause, if special bail was originally requisite therein, it shall then be the duty of the state court to accept the surety, and proceed no further in the cause, and any bail that may have been originally taken shall be discharged, and the said copies being entered as aforesaid, in such court of the United States, the cause shall there proceed in the same manner, as if it had been brought there by original process. And any attachment of the goods or estate of the defendant by the original process shall hold the goods or estate so attached to answer the final judgment in the same manner as by the laws of such state, they would have been holden to answer final judgment, had it been rendered by the court in which the suit was commenced."

This, I presume, is the first case removed from a state court, where an injunction had been issued by the state court, and motions similar to those now submitted have been made in the circuit court. At least no reported case has been cited, and we have no recollection of such a case. In the circuit court, a case thus removed from the state court, the law seems to have contemplated no other process as having been issued, except the original process which brought the defendant into court. The attachment provided for, is in reference to the mode of original process in a suit, through which an appearance of the defendant is procured. The property attached, is to remain bound, the same as if the cause had been continued in the state court.

It seems to us that a disobedience of the injunction being a contempt of the state court, can only be punished by that court. The statute does not contemplate the enforcement of any order by the state court, as the petition for a removal of the cause, is to be filed on the appearance of the defendant. On the requisites of the statute being complied with, it is made the duty of the state court to certify the case. An injunction having been allowed before the bill is filed, is not embraced in the act. As this court cannot punish for a contempt of a state court, the motion for an attachment must be overruled. And we suppose that by the removal, the injunction must fall, so that the motion to dissolve is unnecessary.

A motion to grant an injunction, on the face of the bill, as it now stands before this court, would be proper; and this obviates all hardship in the case. In this court the case stands as if the bill had been originally filed here, and the defendant having been served with process, is subject to the order of the court. The motions, therefore, for an attachment, and to dissolve the injunction, are overruled.

Case No. 8,899.

McLOON v. LINQUIST et al.

[2 Ben. 9.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1867.[2]

EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT—GARNISHEE—SHIPPING—ADVANCES ON BILL OF LADING—RIGHT TO REIMBURSE.

1. It is the law of the courts of the United States, that, where an order is drawn either on a general or a particular fund, it does not amount to an assignment of that part, or give a lien as against the drawee, unless he consents to the appropriation, by an acceptance of the draft, or an obligation to accept may be fairly implied.

2. Where a firm had chartered a vessel for a voyage to New Orleans, and obtained advances on the bills of lading of her cargo from T., who took them under an agreement that the cargo should be sold in New Orleans by D., and the whole proceeds remitted to T., who was to take his advances out of it and pay the rest over to the firm, and the firm, being indebted to other parties, gave them a draft on D., "payable out of proceeds of consignment" by the vessel, which draft was not accepted, but D. gave T. notice of its presentation; and where, in a suit by the owners of the vessel, to recover the charter money, an attachment was served on T., who afterwards received the proceeds of the cargo from D., and, claimed the right to reimburse himself therefrom for his advances, and for the amount of the draft, which he had paid after receiving such proceeds, taking a bond of indemnity: Held, that the proceeds which came into T.'s hands were unincumbered by any appropriation or assignment which could bind him or them, and the surplus above his advances became subject to the attachment, and must be paid to the libellants, with costs.

The libel in this case was filed by the libellants [William McLoon and William Grant], as sole owners of the bark Caroline, to recover the sum of $3,368.39, with interest from July 26th, 1864, being the balance due on a charter party, whereby the libellant Grant, as master and part owner of the bark and agent for the libellants, chartered her to the respondents [Maurice F. Linquist and others] for a voyage from New York to New Orleans. On the filing of the libel, process in personam was issued, with a clause of foreign attachment commanding the marshal to attach the credits and the effects of the respondents, to the amount sued for, in the hands of Thomas Thacher, of the city of New York. To this process the marshal returned that the respondents were not found, and that he had attached funds in the hands of Thacher. On the return of such process, no person appearing, the default of the garnishee was entered, and it was referred to a commissioner to compute the amount due to the libellants. The report of the commissioner found the amount due to be $3,368.39, with interest from July 15th, 1864. Subsequently the garnishee, Thacher, appeared and answered the libel. His answer set up, that he held in his hands $88.67 belonging to the respondents, and that he did not hold any larger sum when the process was served or afterwards, and that he was ready to pay that sum. In answer to the written interrogatories propounded to him, Thacher testified, that, on the 1st of June, 1864, he received from the respondents a cargo of merchandise, and made advances to them thereon, and paid out charges thereon for them, under an agreement with them, that he should consign said cargo to New Orleans and dispose of it and reimburse himself out of the proceeds for such advances and charges, and pay over the balance, if any, to the respondents; that he consigned the cargo to New Orleans and it was sold, and he received the proceeds; and that, after deducting the amount of his advances and cash paid out for the respondents, and the amount of a draft for about $1,200 drawn on those moneys and payable out of them to the order of Husted & Brownson, he had in his possession $88.67 belonging to the respondents.

The controversy in the case was about a sum of $1,259.49, which Thacher paid, in June, 1865, at New York, out of the proceeds of the consignment. The charter party was made May 20th, 1864. Thacher, at the request of the respondents, who composed the firm of Linquist, Norton & Co., advanced to them, in June, 1864, $5,561.43, on shipments of goods by them to New Orleans by the bark. The advances were made on the bills of lading and invoices of the goods, which were sent by Thacher, at the request of the respondents, to F. D. Darling of New Orleans, under an arrangement that Darling should sell the goods and remit the whole proceeds to Thacher at New York, and that, out of them, Thacher should reimburse himself and hold the surplus for the respondents. In May, 1864, Husted & Brownson sold to the respondents a quantity of barley malt, some $2,000 worth, on which they paid about $800. This malt was part of the cargo of the bark so consigned to Darling. Being pressed for payment, the respondents told Husted & Brownson they could not pay till they got a return from the consignment, but they would give as security a draft on Darling. Accordingly they gave to Husted & Brownson a draft on Darling, drawn by Linquist, Norton & Co., dated June 14th, 1864, for $1,182.90, payable at sight, to the order of Husted & Brownson, payable "out of proceeds of consignment per bark Caroline, with current rate of exchange on New York." This draft was sent by Husted & Brownson to New Orleans for collection, and was not paid, but was returned with the message that it could not be paid because the balance due on the consignment was not ascertained. Thacher was advised by Darling, in July, 1864, of the existence and presentation of this draft, and was told at the time by Darling, that he had not paid the draft because he was not authorized by Thacher to do so. The attachment in this suit was served on Thacher, September 6th, 1864. Thacher did not receive from Darling funds enough to reimburse his advances till after the service of the attachment. The draft was not accepted or paid by Darling, nor did Thacher put his name on it. Thacher paid the $1,259.49, in June, 1865, as a payment of the draft, taking a bond of indemnity.

Joseph H. Choate, for libellants.
Geo. R. Thompson, for Thacher.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. It is claimed, on the part of Thacher, that the giving of the draft by the respondents to Husted & Brownson, coupled with the presentation of the draft to Darling and the knowledge of its existence communicated to Thacher by Darling, operated as an equitable assignment to the holder of the draft of an amount of the proceeds of the consignment equal to the amount specified in the draft, and cuts off the claim of the libellants, under their attachment, against such amount.

But there are two objections to this view: (1.) There were no such relations between the respondents and Darling as authorized the respondents to draw the draft on Darling. Darling was the agent and the consignee of Thacher and not of the respondents. He was responsible to Thacher and not to the respondents. The respondents could look to Thacher alone for the proceeds of the consignment. A request by the respondents to Darling to appropriate a part of the proceeds in a particular way imposed no liability on Darling to do so. The drawing of the draft on Darling and its presentation to him were ineffectual to bind him to respond to the holder of the draft. This being so, the fact that he advised Thacher of the existence of the draft cannot be regarded as binding Thacher to respond to the holder of the draft. There was no draft drawn on Thacher to support any notice to Thacher, and all the notice that Thacher had was in respect to a draft which was drawn on a party who was not liable to respond to the drawers of the draft.

(2.) There was no assent by Darling, much less by Thacher, to the assignment of so much of the proceeds as the draft purported to cover. Whatever may be the law in some of the states, it is the law of the courts of the United States, that, where an order is drawn, either on a general or a particular fund, for a part only, it does not amount to an assignment of that part, or give a lien as against the drawee, unless he consents to the appropriation by an acceptance of the draft, or an obligation to accept may be fairly implied. Mandeville v. Welch, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 277, 286. The reason assigned for this principle is, that a creditor shall not be permitted to split up a single cause of action into many actions, without the assent of his debtor, since it may subject him to many embarrassments and responsibilities not contemplated in his original contract; that he has a right to stand upon the singleness of his original contract, and to decline any legal or equitable assignments by which it may be broken into fragments: and that, when he undertakes to pay an integral sum to his creditor, it is no part of his contract that he shall be obliged to pay in fractions to any other persons. 3 Hare & W. Lead. Cas. 355, 356; 1 Pars. Notes & B. 331, 334.

In this case, there was no assent by Darling, so that, even if the consignment had been made by the respondents to Darling, so as to authorize the drawing of the draft on Darling, the presentation of it to Darling would have created no liability on his part to respond to its holder. Nor did Thacher in any way make himself liable to Husted & Brownson, or to the holder of the draft, or to any other person, by any assent or promise, so that he could be held to account to any other person than the respondents for the amount of money covered by the draft. That amount came into his hands, on being sent to him by Darling, unincumbered by any appropriation or assignment which could bind it, or could bind him in respect to it, and the moment it came into his hands it became subject to the attachment in this suit, his advances being reimbursed otherwise. The attachment was served on him before he received the amount which he afterwards paid on the draft.

It follows, that the libellants have a right to have the $1,259.49 as well as the $88.67 applied towards the payment of the amount due to them by the respondents, and a decree will be entered to that effect, and confirming the report of the commissioner finding the amount due to the libellants. Thacher must also pay so much of the costs of this suit as have been caused by his defence thereto.

This decision was affirmed by the circuit court, on appeal. [Case unreported.]

MARITIME LIENS — REPAIRS — ABANDONMENT BEFORE COMPLETION.

[Abandonment of repairs by a contractor before the completion thereof bars recovery for more than a quantum meruit.]

[This was a libel by James McMahon against the brig Primera. A decree was rendered for libelant (unreported). Heard on claimants' exceptions to the commissioner's report.]

Mr. Byrne, for libelant.
Lapaugh & Andrews, for claimants.

INGERSOLL, District Judge. This case was tried in last October, and a decree rendered in favor of the libelant, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain and report the amount of damages. The libel is filed to recover for repairs and supplies furnished to the brig. At the time of trial the question was raised upon what basis the damages should be calculated, it being claimed by the libelant that not only should he be paid for the actual repairs put on the vessel, but also that the profits should be included which he would have made if he had concluded all the work which he had contracted to do. The commissioner was thereupon directed to report the actual value of the repairs, and also to report what would have been his profits. The commissioner now reports the amount of the repairs at $414.10, and the profits which he would have made at $1,800; and to this latter item in the report the claimants except. The libelant alleges that this ship, having sailed from this port for Glasgow, and having put back in need of repairs, was placed in his hands by the master to be repaired. He does not allege that any contract was made as to how the work was to be done, but only that he was to do the needful repairs. After he had begun the work some one, who claimed to be agent for the owners, told him not to go on in the work, and intimated that he might have difficulty in collecting his pay for what he had done, and upon this the libelant ceased his work. The claim in the libel is in the nature of a quantum meruit. The libelant could have gone on in his work, but he voluntarily discontinued it, and I cannot conceive how he can recover any more than he has actually expended upon the ship. He does not claim profits in his libel. That part of the report, therefore, which allows the profits must be stricken out.

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Nov., 1871.

PATENTS — PUBLIC USE — UNAVOIDABLE DELAY — HOW RIGHTS ENFORCED — LAW — EQUITY — PREVENTION.

1. Where prevention of the violation of an inventor's rights is sought, the equity jurisdiction of the court must be invoked, as alone competent to furnish adequate relief. A court of law possesses no such power; its remedies afford redress only for past infringement, but no effectual security against future aggressions.

2. A trial at law is not a prerequisite to the exercise of the equity jurisdiction of the circuit court.

3. There is a broad distinction between the jurisdictional right to take cognizance of a complaint, and a denial of the relief which the complainants ask. Want of equity does not imply a defect of jurisdiction.

[Cited in Atwood v. Portland Co., 10 Fed. 285.]

4. The public use, for more than two years before the application, which renders a patent void, may be a public use by the inventor himself of a single machine.

[Cited in Consolidated Fruit Jar Co. v. Wright, 94 U. S. 94; Henry v. Providence Tool Co., Case No. 6,384; Manning v. Cape Ann Isinglass & Glue Co., Id. 9,041; Perkins v. Nashua Card & Glazed Paper Co., 2 Fed. 453; Andrews v. Hovey, 124 U. S. 710, 8 Sup. Ct. 681.]

5. The patentee completed his invention in 1855, and placed it on a steamboat which he owned, and used it as long as the boat remained under his control. He applied in April, 1865, for a patent, which was granted in February, 1866: Held, that the patent was void.

[Cited in Andrews v. Hovey, 124 U. S. 710, 8 Sup. Ct. 681.]

6. The act of 1861 [12 Stat. 246], which requires "that all applications for patents shall be completed and prepared for examination within two years," also provides that the delay may be condoned by proof to the satisfaction of the commissioner, that it was unavoidable. If a patent be granted, it must be assumed that there was evidence before the commissioner to show that there was no unavoidable delay in preparing the application for examination.

[Cited in Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Willis, Case No. 5,603.]

7. The decision of the commissioner upon a question of fact, upon which he is authorized to pass, is unimpeachable, except upon the ground that it is ultra vires. An infringer can not assail it for fraud, much less for mere error of judgment.

[Cited in brief in Fassett v. Ewart Manuf'g Co., 58 Fed. 364.]

8. The proof of actual abandonment, after application filed, ought to be indubitably clear. It ought not to rest upon doubtful or disputable inferences.

9. During two years before he applies for a patent, an inventor may publicly sell and use his invention, without any presumption of abandonment.

10. If an inventor has furnished, by his application for a patent, conclusive evidence that he does not intend to abandon his invention to the public, the disproof of this intention ought to be by evidence of equal weight and significance.

11. M. applied for a patent July 23, 1855; after various proceedings, he was finally rejected August 25, 1856, on appeal to the commissioner. He did nothing more until the early part of 1867, when the specification was amended, and the patent was granted April 16, 1867: Held, that there was no abandonment of the application between 1856 and 1867.

[Cited in Johnsen v. Fassman, Case No. 7,365; Colgate v. W. U. Tel. Co., Id. 2,995; Andrews v. Hovey, 124 U. S. 710, 8 Sup. Ct. 681.]

12. If the defendants appropriated the invention of the patentee, without consulting him, and he was passive when he knew it, because he was powerless to prevent them, he is not estopped from asserting his right when he is in a condition to enforce it.

[Cited in Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Smith, Case No. 5,598.]

13. Although prior publications may be remotely suggestive of the invention, yet if they do not describe it in such terms that the public could construct and put it in practice, without further invention, they can not destroy the patent.

14. If a new or improved useful result is effected by means before well known, or any useful result is produced by a new mechanical device, or combination of old mechanical devices, in both cases the exercise of invention must necessarily be presumed, because both are the proper subjects of a patent.

15. The presumption of law is that the patentee is the original inventor of that for which he has obtained a patent. The burden of disproving this is upon the party who denies it. Evidence of disputable or doubtful import will not meet this requirement, but it must be clear and convincing. To doubt is to be resolved against the party upon whom the burden rests.

16. Letters patent "for improvement in applying steam-power to the capstans of steamboats and other crafts," granted to John S. M'Millin, April 16, 1867, are valid.

17. The import of the claim is operating the capstan of a steamboat by power transmitted from an auxiliary engine, when both engine and capstan are placed on the deck of the boat, forward of the steam-boilers, so that their separate efficiency for all other purposes is preserved.

Final hearing on pleadings and proofs.

Suit brought [by John S. M'Millin, Hugh Campbell, and John Shaffer against James Barclay and others] upon two letters patent, granted to complainant, John S. M'Millin, one for "improvements in capstans for steamboats and other vessels," dated February 20, 1866; and the other for "improvements in applying steam-power to the capstans of steamboats and other crafts," dated April 16, 1867.

The claims of these patents were as follows:

Patent of 1866: "The arrangement of the wheels, l, m, n, o, k, j, i, h, e, and d, shafts, 6, 5, 4, 3, and B, capstan-barrel, p, heads, q and r, and pins, Q, the whole being constructed, arranged, and operating substantially as herein described, and for the purpose set forth."

Patent of 1867: "Rotating a capstan, placed on deck of a boat, by means of an auxiliary engine, when said engine and capstan are placed forward of the steam-boilers of said boat, substantially as hereinbefore described, and for the purpose set forth."

Bakewell & Christy, for complainants.

M. W. Acheson and John Barton, for defendants.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. June 9, 1855, John S. M'Millin, one of the complainants, filed a caveat in the patent office; and, on the 23d of July following, an application for a patent for a new and useful improvement in applying steam-power to the capstans of steamboats and other crafts. After several rejections and repeated renewals of his application, a patent was finally granted to him April 16, 1867, No. 63,917.

April 25, 1865, he applied for a patent for new and useful improvements in capstans for steamboats and other vessels, which was patented February 20, 1866, No. 52,730.

Of his interest in these patents he assigned two-thirds to Hugh Campbell and John Shaffer, and they are, therefore, joint complainants with him in the present bill, praying for an account and an injunction against the respondents for an alleged infringement of both patents.

To this bill the respondents interpose the plea "that its subject matter is not within the jurisdiction of a court of equity, there being a direct, certain, full, and adequate remedy at law for such alleged grievance." I am not aware that it has ever been held that the court has not jurisdiction of a bill to enjoin the use of a patented invention, and for an account of profits by an infringer, because an action at law may be maintained to recover damages for infringement. By section 17 of the act of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 124], re-enacted by the act of July 8, 1870 [16 Stat. 198], original jurisdiction is conferred upon the circuit courts, as well in equity as at law, in all suits for the violation of the rights of inventors, under the patent laws, and they are authorized, "upon bill in equity, filed by any party aggrieved, in any such case, to grant injunctions, according to the course and principles of courts of equity, to prevent the violation of the rights of any inventor as secured to him by any law of the United States, on such terms and conditions as said courts may deem reasonable." It is clear from this that the circuit court may rightfully take cognizance of every controversy arising under the patent laws, and that where prevention of a violation of an inventor's rights is sought, the equity jurisdiction of the court must be invoked, as alone competent to furnish adequate relief. A court of law possesses no such power; its remedies afford redress only for past infringement, but no effectual security against future aggressions. "The principle," says Mr. Justice Wayne, in Mott v. Bennett [Case No. 9,884], "upon which courts of equity have jurisdiction in patent cases, and upon which injunctions are granted in them, is not that there is no legal remedy, but that the law does not furnish a complete remedy to those whose property is invaded; for, if each infringement of the patent were to be made a distinct cause of action, the remedy would be worse than the evil. The inventor or author might be ruined by the necessity of perpetual litigation, without ever being able to have a final establishment of his rights." Hogg v. Kirby, 8 Ves. 223; Harmer v. Plane, 14 Ves. 132; Lawrence v. Smith, Jac. 472.

Nor is a trial at law a prerequisite to the exercise of this jurisdiction. Such trial may be ordered; but if its allowance were demandable of right, still the jurisdiction of the court would remain untouched, because, in the end, its result might be adopted or rejected, as the exigencies of equity might require. But it is altogether within the sound discretion of the court to allow or refuse such trial. In Goodyear v. Day [Case No. 5,569], Mr. Justice Grier says: "It is a practice founded more on convenience than necessity. * * * A trial at law is ordered by a chancellor to inform his conscience; not because either party may demand it as a matter of right, or that a court of equity is incompetent to pass upon questions of fact or of legal titles. In the courts of the United States the practice is by no means so general as in England, or as it would be here, if the trouble of trying issues at law devolved on a different court."

The subject matter of this bill is an alleged infringement of the right of an inventor, and the relief prayed for is an injunction to restrain the further invasion of it. It is then within the express terms of the act of congress, defining the jurisdiction of this court, and authorizing the exercise of equity powers to effectuate it.

There is a broad distinction between the jurisdictional right to take cognizance of a complaint, and a denial of the relief which the complainant asks. Although the relief invoked may be refused, it does not follow that it is because the court can not inquire into the merits of the cause, and adjudge it accordingly. Want of equity does not imply a defect of jurisdiction. But it is only when the court is without power to pass upon the subject matter of the complaint, or to grant the relief sought, that its jurisdiction may be challenged.

These views are in no wise discordant with the manuscript opinion of Mr. Justice Grier, in Sanders v. Logan [Case No. 12,295], Western district of Pennsylvania, 1859. So far from disclaiming the jurisdiction of the court, he in effect affirms it, by adjudicating the case upon its merits, and denying complainant's prayer, for the reason that he only asked what could be better secured by an action at law, and that to grant his prayer would inflict irreparable injury upon the respondent, but could not benefit him. It is an authority only for a conclusion, founded upon special facts and circumstances, such as characterized the case before him.

The respondents' plea to the jurisdiction must, therefore, be overruled.

The answer of the respondents denies infringement, and sets up various defenses, involving mainly the novelty of the invention and the claim of the parties to originality. These several defenses will be noticed in their proper order.

Two patents are in controversy. The first of these, in the order of date, is the last one applied for. Its claim is much less comprehensive than that of the other. In fact, as describing the method of effectuating the invention claimed in the last issued patent, it is really within the scope of the patent, although the latter is not limited to the specific combination claimed in the former patent. It seems to have been sought for in its restricted form, by reason of the rejection of the first and broader application, and to have led finally to the allowance of that application. The claim is for an arrangement or combination of specified mechanical devices, for the purpose of connecting the capstan of a steamboat with what is commonly known as the "little nigger engine," the whole constructed, arranged, and operating as described in the specification. No one of these devices is claimed as the invention of the patentee; it is their combination and adaptation to the production of a new result, in which the novelty of the invention is alleged to consist. The application for this patent was filed April 25, 1865, and the patent was issued February 20, 1866. It is now alleged to be void, for the reason that the invention described in it was in public use more than two years before the application.

The patentee was engaged in the business of navigation on the Western rivers, and in 1854 bought the hull of a steamboat, upon which he proposed to introduce a mechanical arrangement to operate the capstan by a connection with the "nigger engine." The boat was finished in June, 1855, and was supplied with bevel gearing, by means of which the capstan was actuated by steam derived from the "nigger engine"—the whole embodying the same mechanical elements and arrangements which were described in this patent. The steamboat was called the "Silver Wave;" was chiefly owned by the patentee, and was commanded and navigated by him for many years afterwards. During all this time, this improved capstan arrangement was used upon her, without any, or at least any material change. More than two years, therefore, elapsed, during which this use continued, before the application for this patent.

The question then is, did such use of the invention invalidate the patent?

The act of July 4, 1836, forbids the granting of a patent for an invention which had, at the time of the application therefor, been in public use or on sale, with the consent or allowance of the inventor. This provision is modified by the act of March 3, 1839 [5 Stat. 353], so as to allow such use or sale for two years prior to the application. Different opinions have been entertained as to the kind of use which these acts of congress contemplate. By some judges, they have been held to mean a use in public by persons other than the inventor, and again, others have held that a use in public by the inventor himself, which is not merely experimental, will have the effect of invalidating the patent. In Ryan v. Goodwin [Case No. 12, 186], Mr. Justice Story says: "It is clear by our law, whatever it may be by the law of England, that the public use or sale of an invention, in order to deprive the inventor of his right to a patent, must be a public use or sale by others, with his knowledge and consent, before his application therefor." But he must be understood to have predicated this of the facts in the case before him, in which only a use by persons other than the inventor was alleged. While the object of the law was to protect the public against the exclusive claim of an inventor who had dedicated his invention to their use, by allowing its practical employment in public, it was, at the same time, designed to require of him reasonable diligence in applying for his patent. As it is the public use of a completed invention against which this provision of the law is directed, it could scarcely have been intended to authorize such use by the inventor himself, which, if employed by another, with his consent, would work a forfeiture of his right to a patent. His own direct act is just as significant of an intended abandonment of his inchoate right as is that of another, with his consent. Indeed, it is difficult to comprehend that a use in public by an inventor himself is not as effectually "a public use with his consent and allowance," as where his invention is permissively so employed by another. So it was held in Pitts v. Hall [Id. 11,192]. Mr. Justice Nelson there says: "The patentee may forfeit his right to the invention, if he constructs it and vends it to others to use, or if he uses it publicly himself, in the ordinary way of public use of a machine, at any time prior to the period of two years before he makes his application for a patent. That is, he is not allowed to derive any benefit from the sale or use of his machine, without forfeiting his right, except within two years prior to the time he makes his application. * * * * On the other hand, if the machine was complete when it was constructed in June, 1843, and if the patentee put it into public use, or put it into operation himself publicly, deriving profit from it, and having no view of further improvements, or of ascertaining its defects, then, this use having occurred anterior to the two years, the effect would be to work a forfeiture."

It remains, then, to inquire whether the use by the patentee of his invention, more than two years before his application for a patent, was only a trial of it to test its efficiency, or ascertain its defects, and was, therefore, merely experimental. On this point, the proofs are decisively clear. On June 16, 1855, he filed in the patent office a caveat, in which he set forth that he had made certain improvements in applying steam-power to the capstans of steamboats, and that he was then engaged in experiments to perfect the same, preparatory to his application for a patent therefor; and he therein described the mechanism, substantially as claimed in the patent in question. On the 23d July following, he filed his application for a patent, accompanied by drawings, a model, and specification, in which are set forth the same mechanical devices, by means of which the invention therein claimed might be practiced. His invention then was complete. At this time, he had constructed and applied it on the "Silver Wave," and he continued to use it on her for years, as long as she remained under his control. In no sense, can this prolonged use be regarded as a mere trial of the invention to discover defects and make improvements. Indeed, on the first trip of the vessel its complete efficiency was demonstrated. It was obviously the use of an invention considered as complete, and with a view to derive such benefit from it, as might be due to a more efficient and economical mode of operating steamboat capstans than had been before applied. It was used, too, in the ordinary way of the public use of such mechanism. In the words of the act of congress, it was a public use of the invention, with the consent and allowance of the inventor. The result is that his patent of February 20, 1866, No. 52,730, is invalid, and can not be made the basis of a decree in his favor.

The patent of April 16, 1867, No. 63,917, stands upon a different footing. As already said, the invention claimed in it is of broader scope than that described in the patent of 1866. It is stated to be a "new and useful improvement in applying steam-power to the capstans of steamboats and other crafts," and, as set forth in the claim, consists in "rotating a capstan, placed on deck of a boat, by means of an auxiliary engine, when said engine and capstan are placed forward of the steam-boilers of said boat, substantially as hereinbefore described, and for the purposes set forth." The mechanical instrumentalities by which the prescribed result is effected are fully described in the specification. The import of the claim, then, is this —operating the capstan of a steamboat by certain mechanical means, actuated by steam derived from an auxiliary engine, where both the engine and the capstan are stationed on the deck of the boat forward of the steam-boilers. The mere effect indicated, however valuable it may be, is not claimed, for that would clearly be unallowable; but it is this effect, produced by means substantially as described, and employed under the conditions stated. If the result, thus accomplished, is new and useful, there can be no doubt of the validity of the patent, so far as its subject matter is concerned. I do not understand this to be contested by the respondent; but a clear definition and comprehension of the nature of the invention described in the patent are important in considering the defenses set up in the answer.

These defenses are: 1. That under section 12 of the act of March 2, 1861 [12 Stat. 248], the patentee's application should be regarded as abandoned, and the patent, therefore, as having been improperly granted. 2. That the invention was, in fact, abandoned, and that the patentee is estopped from enforcing his exclusive right against any one using his invention. 3. That, in view of the state of the art when the patentee made his application for a patent, the invention was not novel. 4. That the invention claimed was not original with the patentee. 5. That the respondents are not infringers.

1. The application for this patent was filed July 23, 1855, and on August 25, 1856, on appeal to the commissioner of patents, it was finally rejected. It stood then until the early part of 1867, when the specification was amended, and its renewed consideration was urged upon the patent office. This effort resulted in the granting of a patent, April 16, 1867. Under these circumstances, it is urged that the application was not "completed and prepared for examination" within the time required by the act of 1861, and that the patent is invalid for that reason. The section referred to enacts: "That all applications for patents shall be completed and prepared for examination within two years after the filing of the petition, and, in default thereof, they shall be regarded as abandoned by the parties thereto, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner of patents that such delay was unavoidable; and all applications now pending shall be treated as if filed after the passage of this act." This undoubtedly puts applications pending when the act was passed, on the same footing with those subsequently made, and both alike are within its purview, and subject to its operation. Conceding, however, that the act is to be so construed as to bring the present application within its scope—which is by no means clear—it can not be invoked to invalidate the patent.

The act does not interpose an absolute bar to the granting of a patent, where the application has not been completed and prepared for examination within two years. The delay may be condoned by proof that it was unavoidable. The decision of this fact is committed to the commissioner of patents. If it is shown to his satisfaction that the delay was unavoidable, the application is not to be regarded as abandoned. He is invested with power to grant the patent, and he may exercise it, subject to the duty of determining that the preparation of the application for examination was not unnecessarily delayed after two years. This is the plain meaning of the act, and there can be no doubt about it. Now, it must be assumed that there was evidence before the commissioner to show that there was no unavoidable delay in preparing this application for examination, after two years from the passage of the act. Its sufficiency was for him, and, in the exercise of the judicial function intrusted to him, he has decided the fact in favor of the patentee. He was the only judge to be "satisfied," and his judgment is conclusive. This court, at least, has no power to revise it, at the instance of the respondents, but must take for granted the truth of the fact which the law authorized him to determine. This is too well settled to need any citation of authority to sustain it. It is to be found in the numerous cases which hold, in accordance with a familiar general rule, that the decision of the commissioner upon a question of fact, upon which he is authorized to pass, is unimpeachable, except upon the ground that it is ultra vires. An infringer can not assail it for fraud, much less for mere error of judgment.

2. Nor has the second branch of the defense, that the invention was actually abandoned, any better foothold. This must result from the intention of the patentee, expressly declared, or clearly indicated by his acts. There is certainly no evidence in the case of any express declaration of the patentee to that effect; and, if the lapse of years between the date of his application and of his patent, and his own conduct, can be fully explained upon any other hypothesis, they ought not to be imputed to an intention on his part to abandon his invention. The proof of actual abandonment, after application filed, ought to be indubitably clear. It ought not to rest upon doubtful or disputable inferences. During two years before he applies for a patent, an inventor may publicly sell and use his invention, without any presumption of abandonment. Upon what reason, then, should he be regarded as having given up his invention to the public, merely because a public officer has repeatedly denied his application for a patent, and the recognition of his right has thus been delayed for years, when he was powerless to prevent it? "By the application filed in the Patent Office," says Mr. Justice Grier, in Adams v. Jones [Case No. 57], "the inventor makes a full disclosure of his invention, and gives public notice of his claim for a patent. It is conclusive evidence that the inventor does not intend to abandon it to the public. The delay afterward interposed, either by the mistakes of the public officers or the delay of courts, where gross laches can not be imputed to the applicant, can not affect his right."

If an inventor has furnished, by his application for a patent, conclusive evidence that he does not intend to abandon his invention to the public, the disproof of this intention ought to be by evidence of equal weight and significance. The proof in this case falls far short of that standard. Indeed, if the applicant was required to disprove an imputation of only sluggish diligence, the records of the patent office would more than meet such a demand. His application twice rejected, and as often renewed; appeals taken to the board of examiners and to the commissioner of patents; a new application filed in aid of his first; this one twice rejected, and as often renewed; an appeal and final rejection; another application limited to the combination of mechanical devices described in his first application; its rejection and renewal under an amendment of his specification, and the grant of a patent upon it; then a revival of his old application, accompanied by satisfactory proof that he had not abandoned his invention, and, some time after, followed by a decision in his favor and the issue of a patent. So far, then, from showing gross laches, this is a record of unexampled tentativeness, in the face of repulses by which most men would have been thoroughly disheartened. Not so the applicant here, but each failure only brought into stronger light the fixed purpose and unrelaxing diligence with which he sought to secure the recognition of his rights. He was not only a persistent, but an importunate solicitor, and to his importunity was largely due the ultimate result in his favor. Now, as the delay of the decision in his case is all that remains touching his alleged laches, it is hardly necessary to add that it is not to be imputed to him, because he did all he could to prevent it, but that the responsibility for it rests solely with the patent office.

I have failed to discover any evidence upon which an equitable estoppel in favor of the respondents can rest. It must necessarily grow out of some declaration or act of the applicant, by which they were induced to believe that they might rightfully or innocently use the invention now claimed by him. If they appropriated it without consulting him, and he was passive when he knew it, because he was powerless to prevent them, he is not estopped from asserting his right when he is in a condition to enforce it. If they took the risk of using what they did not own, the owner's helplessness then will not shield them from accountability to him now. This is the only effect of the proof; for, although the applicant publicly used his invention after he applied for a patent, he did not intend to abandon it, as has been already shown; and, as he had a clear right so to use it, the law does not presume from that fact that he assented to its use by others. Ryan v. Goodwin [Case No. 12,186]. Nor is this supposed estoppel invigorated by the fact that invasion of the patentee's rights has been wide-spread, and that all who may be found in that category may be held liable accordingly. Whoever reaps where he did not sow, wrongfully appropriates what belongs to another, and equity will not stay the hand of the rightful owner of the harvest against him.

3. The next objection to the patent is that the invention described in it was previously described in printed publications, and was anticipated by like mechanism devised by others. It would unnecessarily extend this opinion to point out in detail the specific differences between the several exhibits in evidence and the invention claimed by M'Millin. Of the publications exhibited, it may be said, generally, that they do not describe M'Millin's invention. Remotely suggestive of it they may be, but they do not describe it in such terms that the public could construct and put it in practice without further invention. Prior publications must come up, at least, to this measure of fullness and precision. Even a stricter rule is prescribed by high authority; for in Hills v. Evans, 6 Law T. (N. S.) 90, it is held that the publication must furnish "knowledge equal to that required to be given by a patent, namely, such knowledge as will enable the public to perceive the very discovery, and to carry the invention into practical use." No such exactness of description of M'Millin's invention is to be found in any of these publications. They indicate methods for the working by steam of coiling devices of different forms; but none of them, except Sickel's patent, contemplates the employment of an auxiliary engine, or the retention of the capstan on the forecastle of the boat, so that all the functions it is required to perform are unimpaired. In their mode of operation they are different from M'Millin's, and certainly, by conforming to the directions given for their construction and application, the public would not be able to construct and carry into practical use M'Millin's method. That a windlass or a drum, or any other form of coiling device might be operated by steam, or that a capstan might be so operated, when the place where it must be kept to perform its peculiar office is changed, and it is located in proximity to its motor, is not the problem which he proposed to solve. If that were so, he could not claim the merit of originality. But he aimed at the accomplishment of a result not before produced, under the conditions prescribed by him, by a new arrangement and organization of old instrumentalities adapted to that end.

It is satisfactorily shown by the proofs, that upon steamboats navigating the Western rivers, the operation of the capstan, in its usual place, by the main engine, is impracticable. Certainly it has not been done. Before M'Millin's invention, the capstan in these boats was worked by muscular power alone. If a method, then, could be devised by which the power of steam could be applied to the capstan, without changing its location, so that it could be worked more economically, easily, and efficiently, a new and useful result would thereby be produced. This was the problem which engaged the thoughts of M'Millin, and he solved it by taking the capstan in its accustomed place, and the auxiliary or "nigger" engine at the place usually assigned to it, both forward of the main engine, and connecting them by appropriate, but well-known mechanical devices, thereby producing the desired result.

It is to be observed that the retention of the auxiliary engine and the capstan in the positions where they were before located, is an essential element of this method. The main object was to secure the unabridged performance of other valuable functions pertaining to them. Now, by the patents and other publications referred to, no information is furnished as to where the engine and capstan must be located to produce the results effected by M'Millin's invention. On the contrary, assuming that they all describe a capstan, or its fair equivalent, the capstan must be located so that its usefulness, derived from its position on the forecastle, is lost, or the engine, which actuates it, so that it can not be used for the purposes for which the "nigger" engine is employed.

But it is urged that, as the "nigger" engine and capstan were before used independently on steamboats, and bevel gearing was before used to connect machinery in mills, any mechanic of ordinary skill could supply the mode of connecting the "nigger" engine and capstan employed by the patentee, and, therefore, no inventive skill was exerted by him. This is a narrow view of the patentee's invention. If a new or improved useful result is effected by means before well known, or any useful result is produced by a new mechanical device, or combination of old mechanical devices, in both cases the exercise of invention must necessarily be presumed, because both are the proper subjects of a patent. If the patentee, then, has devised a method of rotating the capstan of a steamboat, by an organization of elements not before employed in the concrete, for that or an analogous purpose, or if his method produces an improved result, a sufficiency of invention to support his patent must be presumed. The proofs undeniably show that he did demonstrate the practicability of operating the capstan of a steamboat by power transmitted from the "nigger engine," without changing the place of either, so that their separate efficiency for all other purposes was preserved. They show more—that he was the first to do this, and that it was followed by the almost universal abandonment, on Western boats, of the old method of working the capstan, and the adoption of M'Millin's. With the suggestive help of all this literature of the art, and the stimulus of a result of such general interest and utility to be achieved, no one put in practice a method of effecting it, until M'Millin demonstrated it to the public. These are notable facts, and surely they are persuasive, not only that the result accomplished was novel, but that it was the fruit of inventive skill.

Of the other exhibits but little need be said. They all fall short of illustrating M'Millin's complete method, or of embodying all the essential features of his organization. The first of these is the capstan on the "John H. Bills." It was arranged horizontally on one side, and nearer the stern than the bow of the boat; was coupled to the starboard wheel, and could therefore only move with and in the direction of the wheels. It was operated by the main engine through the paddle-wheel, and, after some time, was abandoned. If it embodied M'Millin's invention, which it plainly did not, as an abandoned experiment, it can not affect his patent.

In 1851, A. Martin made a model of a freight-hoisting apparatus to be operated by the "doctor" engine, aft the main engine. It was not put into practical use, was left by Martin on the steamer "Georgia," in 1852, was shortly after burned up and was forgotten. However it may have been constructed, or what its intended use, it is plainly valueless as evidence in this case.

The marine railway at Cincinnati embodies in its construction several vertical shafts. On the upper end of each of these a spool is made, around which the ropes used in drawing boats up the ways are coiled. These shafts are located fixedly on the bank of the river, and are revolved by the power of the main engine. Taking them and their mode of operation as a guide, the highest degree of mechanical skill, without invention, would be found inadequate to construct and apply M'Millin's invention. Of the devices used on the "Hope," it is only necessary to say that they were constructed more than a year after the time to which M'Millin's invention relates back, and can not, therefore, impugn its novelty.

4. The only remaining question, affecting the validity of the patent, is, was M'Millin the author of the invention claimed by him? The presumption of law is that a patentee is the original inventor of that for which he has obtained a patent. The burden of disproving this is upon the party who denies it. Evidence of disputable or doubtful import will not meet this requirement, but it must be clear and convincing. To doubt is to be resolved against the party upon whom the burden rests. It is alleged here that John Shaffer, one of the complainants, is the author of the invention claimed by M'Millin; that he had a drawing of it prepared, in which are exhibited the essential features of M'Millin's plan; and that M'Millin saw and examined it, and derived from it the first knowledge he had of what he now claims to have devised himself.

There is no dispute that this drawing represented, substantially, the M'Millin invention, or that M'Millin saw and examined it. The earliest date of its existence, which the proofs can be claimed to show, is November 20, 1854; but M'Millin did not see it for a considerable time, perhaps several months, after that date. In August, 1854, he bought the hull of the "Silver Wave," and at once ordered such changes in its construction as would fairly indicate a purpose to operate the capstan by power transmitted from the "nigger" engine. This hull, in the spring of 1855, was brought to Pittsburg, to be supplied with its outfit of machinery. A main engine and a "nigger" engine were ordered for it, and different machinists were employed to make a connection of some sort between the latter and the capstan. It is evident, therefore, at this time, that M'Millin entertained the purpose, and had in his mind a plan, definite or indefinite, to operate the capstan by power derived from the "nigger" engine. During the progress of his efforts in this direction, the Shaffer drawing was shown to him, when he at once declared that it represented what he wanted, and the connections indicated by it were made acordingly. It is claimed by the respondents, that, up to this time, he had not devised any practical or determinate plan for carrying his purpose into effect, but that it was furnished to him by the Shaffer drawing. Much testimony has been taken in relation to his declarations, and as to conversations with him, after he bought the "Silver Wave," for which this effect is earnestly claimed. If this were the only evidence, it might, not illogically, be treated as sustaining the respondents' hypothesis; although the weight of most of it is dependent upon the accurate recollection by witnesses, after the lapse of years, of the full and precise import of conversations with M'Millin, and of the dates and order of time when they occurred, in relation to the time when he examined the Shaffer drawing. But such is not the conclusion to which a consideration of all the evidence would lead.

It is evident that this subject had occupied the thoughts of M'Millin for years. His experience in the management of steamboats on the Western rivers enabled him to comprehend the advantages to be derived from the operation of the capstan by steam. To accomplish this by a connection with the main engine was confessedly impracticable. The only possible mode was to make the "nigger" engine available for that purpose. But this engine and the capstan each had appropriate and indispensable functions to perform, and it was therefore a condition that they should be retained in their accustomed places. To effect their co-operation, and at the same time to preserve their separate efficiency, was the problem which engaged M'Millin's reflections. That he conceived a practical solution of it, I think is clearly proved. He had not tested it by experiment, and therefore he was prompt to heed, and even to defer to the suggestions of experience and mechanical skill. This may account for his adoption, at first, of Hartupee's suggestion of the endless chain to connect the "nigger" engine with the capstan. At any rate, it is obvious he had sought the aid of Hartupee, as a machinist, to embody in a practical form, on the "Silver Wave," a plan which he had before formed in his own mind. However this may be, the testimony of William O. Leslie and John E. Smith conclusively shows that, long before, his speculations had reached the maturity of a definite method of reducing them to practice. In the fall of 1853 he had a conversation with Mr. Leslie, in which he explained his mode of working a steamboat capstan by power transmitted from the "nigger" engine, by means of shafting and bevel wheels, substantially as described in his specification; illustrated it by a rough sketch on paper, and suggested its application to the Coal Hill inclined railway, in which they were both interested. Like conversations occurred between them afterwards, during the winter of 1853–54. In the spring or early part of the summer of 1854, a similar explanation was made by him to John E. Smith. He then described how the attachments between the "nigger" engine and capstan should be made, consisting of a "bevel-wheeled gearing and upright shaft from the 'nigger' down into the hold—the horizontal shaft with the same kind of gearing connecting that with the spindle of the capstan." The significance of this testimony is apparent. It is given by unimpeached and disinterested witnesses. Its accuracy as to approximate dates is supported by satisfactory reasons. It is, therefore, entitled to full credence. And it is decisive of the fact that more than a year before the Shaffer drawing is shown to have been in existence, or M'Millin had seen it, he had devised the mechanical means of practicing his invention, substantially as he has described them in his specification. The legal presumption that he invented what he has patented is not impugned.

5. The fact of infringement by the respondents is satisfactorily proved. The models exhibited in evidence clearly show this—"Oculis subjecta fidelibus." From the course of the proofs, the respondents' denial of infringement would seem to have been made upon the assumption that this patent also was for a technical combination of mechanical devices. As before stated, this is not so. It is for an improvement in operating capstans by steam, under prescribed conditions, and by means substantially as described. To produce the same result by a mechanical organization not essentially different from that described in the patent, is within its scope. On the respondents' boat, the "Armenia," the capstan is rotated by power derived from the "nigger" engine, both being forward of the main engine, through mechanical connections, which, in their mode of operation, are the same, and in their construction and arrangement are substantially the same as are described in the patent.

The result of the whole case is that the letters patent No. 63,917, dated April 16, 1867, are valid; that the respondents have infringed them, and that the complainants are entitled to a decree for an injunction and an account, with costs.

A decree will be prepared accordingly.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—PETITION—CITIZENSHIP—MOTION TO REMAND.

[1. The petition by defendant for the removal to the district court of a case from a Pennsylvania state court states that the defendant is a citizen of Connecticut, but does not state the citizenship of the plaintiff. This is fatal, and the case will be remanded upon motion.]

[2. The filing of a proper bond by the party petitioning for removal is a condition precedent to the removal of a case to the federal court. A bond which is not conditioned for costs in case the cause is remanded to the state court is defective, under Act March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 471, § 3).]

[Cited in Stone v. Sargent, 129 Mass. 512.]

[3. A party is not guilty of laches who afterwards moves the federal court to remand a cause because he did not in the first instance oppose in the state court its removal.]

On May 20, 1876, the court of common pleas No. 4 granted a rule to show cause why the above cause should not be removed into the circuit court of the United States. On May 27, 1876, this rule was made absolute (not being opposed by defendant's counsel,) and a petition and bond for removal to the United States court were filed. On August 27, 1876, a certified copy of the record of the above suit in the court of common pleas No. 4 was filed in the circuit court of the United States for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania. The defendant had entered his appearance, but there were no pleadings. The petition stated that the defendant was a citizen of Connecticut, but did not state the citizenship of the plaintiff. The bond was not conditional for the payment of costs by the defendant, in case the circuit court should be of opinion that the cause had been improperly removed thither. An affidavit was handed up, stating that the plaintiff was, from the commencement of the suit to the present time, a citizen of Colorado.

A. Sydney Biddle (D. G. Eshlemon and James W. Paul with him), argued that the petition was fatally defective in not stating that the plaintiff and defendant were citizens of different states. The defendant was only entitled to remove this cause by virtue of being a citizen of a different state from the plaintiff. Non constat that he is a citizen of a different state from the defendant. It is a general rule that where jurisdiction depends upon statute, the jurisdiction must appear upon the record. This is not the case here. The record is fatally defective in this respect, and cannot be amended: (1) Because a correct petition is a condition precedent to the possibility of removal, and because now, as several terms have elapsed, the time for removal, the cause being legally still pending in common pleas No. 4, has elapsed. (2) Because when the suit was brought, and at the time the petition was filed, the plaintiff was a citizen of Colorado, which, until August 1, 1876, was a territory. Stat. 1875–76 [18 Stat. 470]. And it has been decided in a suit between a citizen of a territory, or of the District of Columbia, and a citizen of a state, that the controversy is not between citizens of different states. Hepburn v. Ellzey, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 445; Wescott v. Fairfield Tp. [Case No. 17,418]; Vasse v. Mifflin [Id. 16,895]; New Orleans v. Winter, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 91. Moreover, the bond filed was fatally defective, and cannot now be amended, inasmuch as the legal removal depends upon a bond of a certain form being filed with the petition. The act of congress, under which all removals now take place, of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 471, § 3), requires the party removing the case to the circuit court to "make and file therewith (his petition) a bond with good and sufficient surety for his entering in such circuit court, on the first day of its then next session a copy of the record in such suit, and for paying all the costs that may be awarded by such circuit court, if such court shall hold that such suit was wrongfully or improperly removed thereto." The bond filed in this case was conditioned merely for the filing of a copy of the record of the proceedings in the state court upon the first day of the succeeding term of the circuit court in the latter court, and did not provide, as is required by the act of congress, for the payment of costs if the suit should be, as is the case here, improperly removed.

M. Arnold and W. S. Price, contra.

In regard to the bond, the misapprehension has arisen from supposing that the cause was removed under the act of March 3, 1875, supra. It was properly removed under the former act of March 2, 1867, § 1 (14 Stat. 558), which is not repealed by the act of 1875.

[1] [4 Law & Eq. Rep. 69, contains only a partial report.]

It may fairly be inferred from the petition that the parties were citizens of different states, inasmuch as the plaintiff brought the case in a state court of Pennsylvania, against a citizen of Connecticut. In any event, an amendment would be permitted allowing the defendant to aver that the plaintiff is a citizen of Pennsylvania, to test that question.

Before McKENNAN, Circuit Judge, and CADWALADER, District Judge.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge (orally). It must always appear upon the record that the United States court has jurisdiction. This is not the case here, since it does not appear that the controversy is between citizens of different states. The inference contended for by the defendant cannot be made. For all that appears, the plaintiff may be a citizen of Connecticut or a citizen of a territory, in each one of which cases the cause would have been improperly removed. Apart from this, the bond filed is fatally defective. The act of 1875, supra, certainly takes the place of all former acts in the requirements which it makes for the removal of all causes to which it is applicable. The language of the act is: "Section 2. That in any suit * * * in which there shall be controversy between citizens of different states * * * either party may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district." "Section. 3 * * * That whenever either party entitled to remove any suit mentioned in the next preceding section shall desire to remove such suit from a state court to the circuit court of the United States, he or they may make and file a petition in such suit, * * * and shall make and file therewith a bond * * * for his entering in such circuit court on the first day of its then next session a copy of the record in such suit, and for paying all costs that may be awarded by such circuit court, if such court shall hold that such suit was wrongfully or improperly removed thereto." The requirements as to the nature of the bond, therefore, extend to all cases mentioned in the second section, and to that extent, at least, this act repeals all prior acts upon this subject. The filing of the bond conditioned as required by the act, is a condition precedent to the removal of the cause to this court. If the required bond has not been filed, this court has no jurisdiction; though it belongs to it exclusively, and not to the state court, to decide that fact.

Nor has the plaintiff been guilty of such laches as prevents him from having the cause remanded. This court cannot proceed unless it has jurisdiction, whatever the conduct of the parties may have been. Moreover, the plaintiff could have done nothing further than what has been done, except that he might have made this motion at the last October session instead of now, and by this the defendant has not been injured. The fact that the plaintiff did not oppose the removal from the state court, was not laches upon his part, since that court had no jurisdiction to decide the right of removal, that being wholly within the jurisdiction of this court.

For these reasons the rule nisi to remove is made absolute, and the cause is ordered to be remanded, the defendant to pay all the costs of the removal of the case to this court and of the remanding of the suit to the state court.

In re McMURRAN et al.

[2 Hughes, 207.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. 1877.

HOMESTEAD—WAIVER IN WRITING—PARTNERSHIP NOTE SIGNED BY ONE—BOTH BOUND.

Under the act of assembly of Virginia, allowing a waiver of the homestead exemption when done in writing, if a partner in a mercantile firm, in executing a negotiable note of the firm, inserts therein the homestead waiving clause, such clause is effective to defeat pro tanto not only the exemption of the partner who executes the note, but that of each member of the firm, not only in the estate of the firm as such, but in the estate of each and every member of the firm.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of Virginia.]

In bankruptcy.

BOND, Circuit Judge. On an appeal by William Devries & Co. to the supervisory jurisdiction of the circuit court, from a decree made in the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of Virginia, by the Honorable Robert W. Hughes, judge of said district court, on the 28th day of April, 1875. This cause coming on to be heard upon the petition of said William Devries & Co., upon a copy of said decree of the 28th of April, 1875, and upon copies of so much of the papers and proceedings in said district court filed with said petition as presents to the court the question to be reviewed, was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof the court is of opinion that the waiver of homestead exemption on the face of the notes to said William Devries and Co., executed by C. H. McMurran in the name of the firm of C. H. McMurran & Co. (said firm being then composed of said C. H. McMurran and J. P. C. Peters), for value received by said firm of C. H. McMurran & Co., is binding on both the members of the said firm, so that judgments rendered thereon constitute valid liens on the real estate of each and both, and operate so as to preclude either of the members of said firm from claiming his homestead exemption out of the proceeds of the sale of his real estate so far as said judgments are concerned.

Therefore the court doth adjudge, order, and decree that the said decree of April 28th,

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

1875, be reversed, and that the matter be remitted to said district court for further proceedings to be had therein in accordance with the opinion hereinbefore contained, and that the said John P. C. Peters be not allowed his homestead exemption as against the judgments of said petitioners, William Devries & Co., rendered by the county court of Culpeper, at its August term, 1871, and the assignee in bankruptcy of said J. P. C. Peters is directed out of the proceeds of the sale of said Peters's real estate to pay to said William Devries & Co. their costs in this proceeding expended.

McMURTRIE v. JONES.

[3 Wash. C. C. 206.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1813.

NOTES—ENDORSER—PROTEST—NOTICE—PLACE OF RESIDENCE—DILIGENCE.

1. Action upon a promissory note, endorsed by the defendant to the plaintiff. On the day the note became due, it was protested; and notice of its non-payment was left at the boarding-house of Mrs H., where the defendant was reported to reside. At the time of the drawing of the note, and for some time afterwards, the defendant continued to reside at Mrs. H's.; but before it became due, he went to New-York, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, and embarked for Europe. The notice left at Mrs. H's., was, under all the circumstances, sufficient.

[See Bank of United States v. Hatch, Case No. 918.]

[Cited in West Branch Bank v. Fulmer, 3 Pa. St. 401.]

2. Generally, notice to the endorser ought to be given, although he should be beyond sea, if the place of his residence is known; and a reasonable diligence to find out his place of residence ought to be used.

[Cited in Catlin v. Jones, 1 Pin. 132; Corwith v. Morrison, Id. 490.]

Action against the defendant, as endorser of a note of hand made by William Longstreth, 20th of October, 1806, payable six months after date; and assigned by the defendant to the plaintiff, before it became due. On the 23d of April, 1807, the note was protested for non-payment, of which, notice in due form, was left for the defendant, at Mrs. Hand's, in Philadelphia, the reputed place of residence of the defendant, as stated in the deposition of the clerk of the notary, who left it; and who says, that this was done acccording to the usage and custom of merchants of Philadelphia. Evidence was given, by a witness, that the defendant did lodge at Mrs. Hand's whilst he was in Philadelphia, until the time he left the city, which was some weeks before the note became due, when he went to New-York to embark for England. It appeared, that the defendant acted, whilst in this country, as the agent of a house in England, though he did some business for himself, and that this note was given for goods belonging to that house, and assigned to the plaintiff in part payment for a bill of exchange. That the defendant, whilst he had lodgings here, frequently went to the Eastern states on business. When the note became due, part of it was paid by the maker, who, at the same time, passed to the agent of the plaintiff, the note of one Isaac Jones, as a collateral security, on account of this note. Isaac Jones became insolvent before his note was due; and Longstreth, the day after his became due. One of the jurymen was examined, who thought it was the custom to leave a notice at the last usual place of abode of the endorser, but did not recollect any case exactly like the present.

M. Levy, for defendant, insisted—1. That notice of nonpayment by the maker of a note, must be given, and that this was not a good notice. It should have been sent to the defendant, as he had left Philadelphia, which, by inquiry, the plaintiff might have found out. 2. That the defendant acted as the agent of a foreign house, in this business, and is not liable personally. 3. That the note of Isaac Jones should be considered as a payment, it not appearing that the plaintiff had used due diligence to recover it. On the first point, he cited 2 W. Bl. 747; 2 H. Bl. 609; 1 Term R. 168; 1 Johns. 294.

On the same point, Mr. Tilghman, for plaintiff, cited Chit. 89.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). There is no weight in two of the objections made to the plaintiff's recovery. It is of no consequence, whether this note was made in consideration of goods sold to the maker by the defendant, as the agent of Bowerbank & Co., or on his own account; or whether the endorsement was made upon a consideration, in fact, passing from that house. If the defendant acted as the agent of that company, this circumstance might make that company liable, if they were the defendants; but still, the defendant is liable on his endorsement. So, in respect to the note of Isaac Jones, which was passed to the plaintiff by the maker of this note, as a collateral security;—no laches are imputable to the plaintiff, in respect to that note; it being proved, that the maker became insolvent before it became due; and the note is in court ready to be delivered to the defendant.

As to the question of notice, there is more difficulty. At the time the assignment was made to the plaintiff, the defendant resided in Philadelphia, as a boarder, at Mrs. Hand's. A few weeks before the note became due, the defendant left Mrs. Hand's and went to New-York, with an intention to embark for England, which he carried into execution. This was known to Longstreth, but it does not appear that it was known to Mrs. Hand, to the plaintiff, or his agent Mr. Craig, or to any one else; and it is worthy of remark, that it is proved, that before this final removal, he was frequently absent from this city upon visits to the Eastern states. Generally speaking, notice to the endorser ought to be given, although he should be beyond sea, if the place of his residence is known; and a reasonable diligence to find out his place of residence ought to be used, of which you are the proper judges. But under all the circumstances of this case, it appears to the court, that the notice left at the known place of residence of the defendant, before his final departure, was sufficient. The court give no opinion respecting the custom which has been mentioned, and respecting which some evidence has been given, as it does not appear to be sufficiently proved.

BANKRUPTCY — COMPOSITION — DISCONTINUANCE — NOTICE—WAIVER—PERSONAL AND BUSINESS CHARACTER.

1. A provision in a composition agreement, that the proceedings may be discontinued at any time without notice to the creditors, is to be treated merely as a waiver on the part of the creditors of notice of an application to discontinue, and does not bind the court to grant such an application.

[Cited in brief in Weeks v. Prescott, 53 Vt. 69.]

2. A composition is none the less payable in money because the payment is postponed to a future day.

3. The composition was for seventy-five per cent., payable in twelve equal instalments, the first being in three months and the last in three years from the date of confirmation, to be evidenced by the notes of the bankrupt without other security. It was also provided that upon the giving of the notes all the property of the bankrupt should be surrendered to it. It appeared that the president of the bankrupt, who was also its treasurer, had used the funds and credit of the company to a large amount for his own benefit; that, after his defalcation was discovered, he resigned his office as treasurer, but was continued as president; that none of the trustees have manifested any disposition to punish him or to compel him to make restitution, but have settled the matter by taking his stock and crediting him on his account therefor, and by paying the notes outstanding which were either made or indorsed by him in the name of the corporation. Held, that the corporation in its managing officers was not of that unquestionable personal, and business character that it would be reasonably safe to trust it for three years, pending the payment of the composition, with the property on which the creditors had a hold, and confirmation was accordingly refused.

Gray & Davenport, for certain creditors approving.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a motion for a final order confirming a composition. The composition, which has received the assent of more than the requisite number of creditors, is for the payment of seventy-five per cent., in twelve equal instalments, at intervals of three months from the date of confirmation, the first being in three months and the last in three years from said date, to be evidenced by the promissory notes of the bankrupt corporation without other security. One of the terms of the composition is, that, immediately upon the giving of the notes, all the property of the bankrupt, valued at about one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, is to be surrendered to the bankrupt, and that the proceedings may be discontinued at any time without notice to the creditors.

Several objections are urged by opposing creditors under the general ground that the composition is not for the best interests of all concerned.

1. The objection that the proceedings may under the composition be discontinued, so that the court would be disabled from enforcing it in case of default, is not a valid reason for refusing to confirm, because this provision is to be treated merely as a waiver on the part of the creditors of notice of an application to discontinue, and does not bind the court to grant such an application of the debtor, and the practice of the court is to refuse all such applications until the composition is fully performed.

2. The objection that the composition is not payable in money must be overruled. It is none the less payable in money because the payment is postponed to a future day or days, and the notes are to be given merely as evidence of and security for the several instalments.

3. The objection that the assets could be made to pay more than is now offered must also be overruled, because, upon a careful examination of all the testimony, it appears that, with the present assets and the present liabilities of the company, it could not be expected that the creditors could do better than this if the estate were wound up by an assignee. And on the question of the amount offered, I concur with the creditors and the register in their opinions, and on this question many matters discussed on the hearing relating to the mismanagement of the affairs of the corporation are wholly immaterial.

4. But the chief objection to this composition is, that the delay in the payment of the composition is unreasonable and that no security whatever is given for the payment except the notes of the bankrupt corporation.

The length of time proposed, three years, is certainly much beyond the usual period of credit given in these proceedings. It appears, however, to have been carefully considered and recommended by the creditors, and if the payments were reasonably secured this objection would not in this case be sustained. The time required for debtors to realize out of their property or business the amount requisite to pay the composition must vary greatly with the nature of the business and the property, the amount to be paid, and with other special circumstances. This objection of the length of the credit, however, is closely connected with the other, that there is no security for the payment of the composition. In two late cases,—In re Wilson [Case No. 17,785], and In re Bloch [Id. 1,551],—the objection that no security is given and that the property is surrendered to the debtor was carefully considered, and it was held that the principal element in the determination of the validity of the objection is what shall be shown as to the personal and business character of the debtor, and the composition in such case will be confirmed or rejected as upon the proofs it shall appear that the arrangement is or is not judicious and reasonably safe for the creditors. In the case of a debtor corporation the promises to pay which the creditors receive are necessarily of less value than in case of a natural person of the same means, because the natural person's promise may have a value in the future, notwithstanding the loss of his present property; whereas, in case of a corporation, if its property is gone, there is no chance of enforcing its promises against it. The principle of the cases cited applies therefore with even greater force to the case of a bankrupt corporation.

In the present case it appears that this corporation was organized in 1871 or 1872, and took the business and assets of James McNab and John Harlin, metal manufacturers and dealers. McNab and Harlin were the principal stockholders and managers of the corporation, the other stockholders being, with one exception, subordinates in the employ of the company. McNab was made the president and treasurer, and had exclusively the conduct of the financial part of the business, and Harlin was made the vice-president, and had the conduct of the mechanical part of the business. This continued until about the 1st of November, 1877. The business appears to have been prosperous, and large dividends were declared and paid, and the president and vice-president were each paid a salary of five thousand dollars. Then it was suddenly discovered, by the confession of McNab, that he had abused his trust, had used the funds and credit of the company for his own business in land speculations, to the amount of about one hundred and thirty thousand dollars; that there were then outstanding about eighty-three thousand dollars of paper of the said company, on which it was either maker or indorser, the proceeds of which had been thus used by McNab fraudulently for his own benefit. The evidence shows that up to that time Harlin knew nothing of these fraudulent transactions. The whole capital stock of the company was about one hundred and seventy thousand dollars, of which McNab owned fifty thousand dollars. The last previous account of stock or inventory showed a surplus of assets over and above the capital, so that this fifty thousand dollars stood on the books at the value of seventy-nine thousand dollars; but it is evident, from the testimony as to the actual value of the assets shortly after this period, that the valuation of the assets on the books, which was at their cost price, had become grossly excessive, and making allowance for this excess and for the debts thus fraudulently contracted by McNab on the part of the corporation, it was at least, a matter of doubt whether at the time of this discovery the corporation was solvent, if these fraudulent debts were assumed by it. McNab resigned his office as treasurer, but was continued as president till a few days before the commencement of these bankruptcy proceedings in April, 1878. The financial part of the business was at once assumed by, and has ever since been carried on by, Harlin. Under advice of counsel that the corporation was legally bound on the outstanding fraudulent notes, the trustees agreed to assume them, and they were either paid or renewed at maturity, and before the commencement of these proceedings had been fully paid. I do not think the criticism of the counsel for the opposing creditors, that the corporation thus assumed debts against which it could have been defended, is borne out by the evidence. Though the notes were usurious, this would have been no defense to a corporation, and the holders, so far as appears, were mostly, if not altogether, innocent holders, for value and McNab had apparent authority to issue the paper. The corporation took from McNab his stock, giving him credit for seventy-nine thousand dollars on his account. This was virtually forgiving him that amount of his indebtedness. Neither Harlin nor the trustees have manifested any disposition to punish him or to compel him to make restitution, and the settlement made with him and with the holders of the fraudulent notes was such as to release him from the consequences of his crimes, and to secure the payment of the paper fraudulently issued by him, regardless of whether the proper business creditors of the company would be paid in full or not. The case called for the most stringent measures against McNab; but instead of procuring his being sent to the penitentiary, the managers of this corporation have apparently in all things consulted his interests in conducting its affairs since the discovery of his frauds; and while there is nothing directly reflecting on the personal integrity of Mr. Harlin or the other trustees, who indeed are mere nominal trustees of the corporation, I think it cannot be held that the corporation in its managing officers is of that unquestionable personal and business character that it is reasonably safe to trust it for three years, pending the payment of the composition, with the property on which the creditors now have a hold. I have not overlooked the very large majority by which the creditors have approved this composition; but giving the action of the creditors its due weight, I am compelled to withhold the confirmation of the resolutions.

Motion denied, unless within ten days proceedings are duly instituted for a modification of the terms of composition or for securing the payment thereof, in which case the motion may be renewed.

BANKRUPTCY—WITNESS FEES.

A bankrupt summoned by creditor to appear as witness is not entitled to witness's fees.

[Cited in Re Paddock, Case No. 10,658.]

The following question arose, and was stated and agreed to by John D. Shaw, for bankrupt, and John W. Hinsdale, for J. J. Gilchrist, creditor, viz.: "Is a bankrupt attending before the court of bankruptcy for examination, entitled to the fees of a witness?"

The facts are: On the 6th day of May, 1868, Neill A. McNair, the above bankrupt, was ordered to appear before me at Fayetteville, N. C., on the 22d day of May, 1868, to be examined touching his said bankruptcy. In obedience to said order, on the said 22d day of May, the said bankrupt appeared before me, and was on examination two days. At the close of his examination the said bankrupt demanded of J. J. Gilchrist, the creditor, upon whose application the order for examination was issued, the usual fees allowed to witnesses attending the federal courts, which demand the said creditor declined to recognize, raising the question through his attorney, John W. Hinsdale, whether a bankrupt attending before courts of bankruptcy for examination, is entitled to the fees of a witness, when he is ordered to appear to be examined relative to any matter concerning his bankruptcy.

BROOKS, District Judge. At Elizabeth City, in the district of North Carolina, on the 5th day of October, 1868, this question is considered, presented by the certificate of Mr. Register Guthrie, of the 23d May, 1868: Is a bankrupt, when ordered to appear for examination in regard to his bankruptcy, at the instance of a creditor, entitled from such creditor to fees, as any other witness would be entitled to recover, for such attendance? I do not doubt as to the proper answer to be given to this question. The bankrupt summoned, or ordered, at the instance of a creditor, to be examined in reference to his bankruptcy, is not entitled to any compensation or fees for complying with such order from such creditor. Such a party does not stand as any other witness would, but he is expressly made subject to the order of the court, to be examined, when and where the court may direct, not as an ordinary witness, but it is one of the conditions that he shall do this if required; which entitles him to his discharge in the end, if no fraud is found against him.

BANKRUPTCY—PAPERS FILED—RIGHT TO WITHDRAW.

Original papers referred to in bankrupt's deposition, and annexed thereto, cannot be withdrawn from the files at the option of the bankrupt. The court may order a withdrawal for good reason shown by party interested.

John F. McNair, a witness summoned on behalf of the bankrupt, was on his examination before the register, Wm. A. Guthrie. He produced certain papers which were marked as a part of the deposition and filed with it. Whereupon application being made by J. D. Shaw, Esq., bankrupt's attorney, for the return of said paper, which was opposed by John W. Hinsdale, Esq., attorney for J. J. Gilchrist, creditor; the following question was certified to the judge for decision: Whether the original papers which have been exhibited to the court and annexed to the deposition of John F. McNair, being marked and referred to in said deposition as exhibits A, B, C, D, E, F, and G, have not thereby became a part and parcel of the deposition, and whether they should not remain with the deposition, and should copies of these be delivered to the assignee, or shall copies be retained and the original returned?

BROOKS, District Judge. The question presented by the certificate of the register in this case is—whether original papers, which have been exhibited to the court and annexed to depositions, being marked and referred to in deposition, have not thereby become so much a part of the deposition, that they cannot be withdrawn and a copy substituted?

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

After full consideration of this question, I am not able to concur with the register in the opinion expressed. The papers in question were exhibited, referred to, and stated as exhibits in the deposition, and annexed to the deposition. The court passed upon the deposition as it was, exhibits and all. In further progress of the case, if objections should be made to any reference to the exhibits, upon the ground that in the deposition they are referred to as original papers, but upon inspection they appear to be copies substituted—such objections might be good. The deposition as it is must be complete. It would not be so complete with copies, for it must then be established that the papers substituted are copies. That the court may, upon cause shown, order the withdrawal of the original exhibits, to be used as evidence in behalf of any one having an interest in them, I have no doubt. But the court as clearly will not order or allow them withdrawn, unless upon the application of some party who can show the proper use for which he desires them. The original papers referred to in, and annexed to, the deposition, should be retained by the register with the deposition, against this demand of the bankrupt.

COLLISION — RIVER — UNRELIABLE TESTIMONY—HELMSMAN—APPROACHED FROM BEHIND.

2. The only safe reliance, as a general rule, as to the course and deflections of a vessel, is the testimony of those who hold her helm in their hands.

[Cited in The Doris Eckhoff, 1 C. C. A. 494, 50 Fed. 139.]

3. A steamer, being approached from behind by another steamer, coming up on her starboard side, on a rounding course, intending to cross her bows from starboard to port, is under no obligations to promote that movement.

[Libel by Thomas McNally against Christopher Meyer and others to recover for damages sustained by collision.]

J. H. Choate and W. G. Choate, for libellant.

C. Donohue and W. J. Haskett, for respondents.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This libel grows out of the same collision which is the subject of the previous case of The Newport [Case No. 10,185]. The libellant was the owner of the barge which was in tow of the Quickstep, and he sues the owners of the Quickstep, to recover the value of the barge, and of some property on board of her, and of the freight money for the cargo of coal, and the amount of money paid to the Quickstep for the towage service. He does not sue the Newport.

The testimony is the same as in the case referred to. The libel contains substantially the same account of the occurrence as the answer contains in the suit against the Newport. The libel further charges fault in the Quickstep, in unnecessarily and improperly delaying to begin to tow the barge from Jersey City to the Atlantic Docks, so that she encountered the Newport. No proof was offered to sustain this allegation.

There are some averments in the libel which are not found in the answer in the case against the Newport, and serve to illustrate some remarks made by me in deciding that case. The libel avers, that, just at the moment when the Newport was rounding on her course up the East river, outside of the Quickstep, the Quickstep, without notifying her intention by whistle or otherwise, sheered to starboard, with the barge, across the course of the Newport, and then, in that position, shut off her steam. The rounding of the Newport on her course up the East river, was a rounding to port, which required starboarding, and, therefore, indicates a swinging of the Newport to port by starboarding, which would, even if the Quickstep kept a straight course, cause the Quickstep to appear to those on the Newport to be swinging to starboard by porting. Daily experience in the trial of collision cases shows that nothing is more unreliable than testimony from those on one moving vessel as to the absolute actions of another moving vessel. The irresistible propensity is to regard your own vessel as stationary with reference to the other vesel, and to attribute all deflecting movement to the other vessel. The other vessel, a moving object, is alone in the eye. Unmoving objects are not kept in view, as tests of movements in the vessels. The testimony which results is honest, but illusory, deceptive and unreliable. The only safe reliance, as a general rule, as to the course and deflections of a vessel, is the testimony of those who hold in their hands her wheel or her tiller. A change of bearing between two vessels, which may be the result of three things—a change of course wholly by one, a change of course wholly by the other, or a change of course by both—can give no reliable indication to an observer on either vessel, who judges merely from looking at the other vessel, as to which one of the three things has produced such change of bearing.

The libel also states, that the Quickstep was proceeding in a nearly straight course towards the East river, at no great distance from the Battery, bound for the Atlantic Docks in Brooklyn, and that, as the Newport came behind, and outside of, the Quickstep, and manifested her intention of leaving the Quickstep on her, the Newport's, port side in her course up the East river, it was a fault in the Quickstep to sheer to starboard at the moment when the Newport was rounding up on the starboard side of the Quickstep, and across the intended course of the Quickstep, and to not take precautions to allow the Newport to pass up the river, before attempting to tow the barge across. In so far as this statement in the libel advances the view that the Quickstep, being approached from behind, when bound to the Atlantic Docks, by a steamer which she saw was coming up on her starboard side, and intending to cross her bows from starboard to port, was under obligations to promote such movement, it is contrary to the settled law. The Quickstep had a right to her course, and the Newport, bound up the East river, had no right to run around her, in the way claimed in the libel, or to call upon the Quickstep to give way.

Although the owners of the Newport are not parties to this suit, the observations growing out of the libel are especially pertinent, for the reason that the libel was signed and verified by the proctor for the libellant, who was also the proctor for the claimants in the suit against the Newport, and signed and verified the answer in that suit.

The libel must be dismissed, with costs, on the ground that no fault is shown to have been committed by the Quickstep.

In equity.

Taft & Perry, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a bill in equity, prosecuted by Thomas McNamara, a citizen of the state of Pennsylvania, against Benjamin B. Gaylord and Thomas G. Gaylord, surviving partners of Thomas G. Gaylord & Co., and Thomas G. Gaylord and E. H. Pendleton, administrators of Thomas G. Gaylord, a former partner in said firm, now deceased. The bill avers, in substance, that in the spring of 1854, after some previous correspondence between the said Thomas G. Gaylord, deceased, and the plaintiff as to the purchase by the latter of an interest in the rolling mill and iron works of Portsmouth, in the state of Ohio, then owned and carried on by Thomas G. Gaylord & Co., on May 10, 1854, a written contract was entered into by which the said Thomas G. Gaylord, Sen., sold to the plaintiff an interest of one undivided eighth in the said mill and works for $15,000, of which $5,000 was to be paid on the 1st of July or October then next, and $2,500 annually thereafter with interest till the whole was paid; and it was also agreed that the plaintiff should take charge of the manufacturing department of the establishment, as manager, at a salary of $1,000 per annum. The plaintiff further avers, that on October 1, 1854, he took possession as a partner and manager, and that he continued as manager until October 1, 1855, and that at that time the profits for the year exceeded $70,000; that in consequence of his objections to certain improvements and additions to the works contemplated by the other parties, from October 1, 1855, he ceased to be the manager and took the place of a shipping clerk, and so continued till September 3, 1856, when he was notified that as he had not fulfilled his contract his connection with the concern must cease; that he left on said 3d of September, at which time the works were stopped to make repairs and improvements. He also avers, that from October 1, 1855, to the date of the stoppage of the works, the profits were $38,664, making an aggregate of profits from October 1, 1854, of upward of $110,000, of which he claims one-eighth part, after deducting payments received by him. The plaintiff also alleges that he proposed to and requested of Gaylord, on October 1, 1855, to settle with him, and that the $5,000, which he had agreed to pay, should be retained out of the profits to which he was entitled, which was refused; and he avers that he has been unable to procure a settlement, etc., and he prays for a dissolution of the partnership, an account of profits, and a decree for one-eighth part of such profits.

The exhibits and evidence show that on and prior to October 1, 1854, Thomas G. Gaylord, Sen., was the owner of an interest of three-fourths in the mill and works, and that Benjamin B. Gaylord owned the other fourth; and that, in the spring of 1855, Thomas G. Gaylord, Sen., sold and transferred to his son, Thomas G. Gaylord, one-half of his interest, to take effect from October 1, 1854, from which date he was therefore a partner. The entire interest was then estimated at $120,000. Benjamin B. Gaylord and Thomas G. Gaylord have filed their answers, as surviving partners; and the administrators of Thomas G. Gaylord, deceased, have also answered. In their answers the administrators refer to and adopt the answer of Thomas G. Gaylord, Sen., filed by him in a suit brought by McNamara in the court of common pleas of Scioto county, Ohio, which involved essentially the matters now in controversy. It is not necessary to notice in detail the numerous allegations of these answers. They deny explicitly that the plaintiff had an interest in the iron works, as a partner, and aver that he has no claim for an account of profits. They insist that the rights of the parties must be settled by the terms of the written contract of May 10, 1854; that the plaintiff failed to comply with his obligation to pay $5,000 on October 1, 1854, which was the condition on which the interest of one-eighth was to vest in him; that he has not paid or offered to pay said sum, nor has he in any way been released from such payment; that he was at no time accepted or treated as a partner, and had no connection with the concern except as manager under the contract, for the first year after its date, and subsequently as a shipping clerk, for which he has been fully paid according to the terms of the contract. There are also averments in the answers to the effect that the plaintiff was incompetent for the discharge of the duties of a manager; and, also, that the contract of May 10, 1854, was entered into by reason of the false and deceptive representations of the plaintiff as to his ability to pay the $5,000, and the other payments specified in the contract, and that he then was and for some time before had been insolvent and wholly unable to meet any pecuniary liability, and therefore that said contract was fraudulent and void.

I do not propose to examine these points in the defense, as there are other grounds which I deem decisive of the merits of this case.

I will not notice the written contract between the plaintiff and Thomas G. Gaylord, premising that it is set forth in the plaintiff's bill in connection with many collateral facts which seem to have no bearing on the merits of this controversy. It is, however, referred to in the bill, as the basis of the plaintiff's claim, as a partner, and his right to an account for profits. The contract is perspicuous and free from ambiguity in its terms, and must be viewed as the exponent of the intention of the parties to it. And as it can not be varied or contradicted by extrinsic evidence, there would seem to be no occasion to notice in this place the correspondence between the parties which preceded its execution. Such a correspondence had taken place, and Gaylord, in one of his letters, stated that the arrangement could not be consummated without the presence of the plaintiff at Portsmouth. He came out, and after an examination of the works, the parties signed the contract. Without reciting it at length, I will state its essential provisions. Its date is May 10, 1854. Gaylord agreed to sell the plaintiff an undivided eighth of the rolling mill and iron works, including everything pertaining to them, except the land, and to give possession the 1st of July or October then next. He also obligated himself to keep a capital of $60,000 in the concern so long as it might be needed, on one-eighth of which the plaintiff was to pay interest and to have one-eighth of the profits, and to share in the same proportion in the losses. The plaintiff was to take charge of the works and manage and superintend the manufacture of iron and nails, for which he was to receive an annual salary of $1,000. He agreed to pay for the interest of one-eighth the sum of $15,000, of which $5,000 was to be paid on the said 1st of July or October, and the rest in annual payments of $2,500, until the whole was paid.

The first remark in relation to this contract is, that it is not by its terms, and does not purport to be, an agreement for a partnership. It is clear that Thomas G. Gaylord could not, by an agreement to sell a part of his interest, compel the other partners to accept the vendee as a member of the firm. It was doubtless intended to be preliminary to such an arrangement, but, per se, can have no such effect. Two objects were within the contemplation of the parties to the contract. It was, in the first place, a conditional sale by Gaylord of an interest of one-eighth in the iron works; and, in the second place, it provided for the employment of the plaintiff as a manager or superintendent at a fixed salary, payable without regard to profit or loss. Under this contract the plaintiff entered on the performance of his duties as manager and superintendent of the manufacturing department on October 1, 1854. It would seem that in the copy of the contract retained by Gaylord, the 1st day of July is named as the time when the plaintiff was to commence as manager, and when the advance payment of $5,000 was to be made; while in the other copy, as already noticed, it is stated in the alternative the 1st of July or October. This difference in the contract is not material, and can not affect the decision of any of the questions arising in this case. As before noticed, the plaintiff commenced his service on the 1st of October. He continued in that capacity until October 1, 1855. By an arrangement then made, he was transferred to, and accepted, the post of shipping clerk, which he held until September 3, 1856, when his connection with the concern finally ceased.

Without noticing the numerous facts brought into this case by the pleadings, exhibits, and evidence, it seems to the court it may be disposed of by ascertaining what are the legal obligations of the parties under the contract in question, and whether the plaintiff has complied with it, in the sense of giving him a right to insist on its strict execution by the other party, and to claim its benefits as if complied with on his part. The terms of the contract have been already stated. As the consideration of the sale by Gaylord of the interest of one-eighth in the iron works, the plaintiff agreed to pay $15,000, of which $5,000 was to be paid October 1, 1854, and the balance in annual installments of $2,500. There is no pretense that the first payment was made on the day named in the contract, or at any time since, or that there has been at any time an offer to pay by the plaintiff, except by a proposition that the profits of the first year should be appropriated as a payment. Now, if this contract had provided only for the payment of the $5,000, without any reference to subsequent payments, I suppose it to be clear the payment of the money, and the transfer of the one-eighth interest, must be regarded as concurrent acts, and that until there was a performance or an offer to perform by one party, the other was under no legal obligation to perform his part of the contract. Where the agreement is to do an act at a time specified, in consideration of which the other party is to do another act at the same time, the party in default can not sue for a violation of the agreement, or insist on its specific performance without showing an offer to comply, or a sufficient excuse for not doing so. By the contract in question the obligation of the plaintiff is not limited to the payment of the $5,000 on October 1, 1854. He was bound to make four other payments of $2,500 each to complete the purchase of the one-eighth interest in the iron works. The contract does not require the vendor to convey to the plaintiff the interest of one-eighth on the payment of the $5,000 in advance; and, by fair legal implication, he was under no obligation to make or tender a conveyance till the whole sum of $15,000 was paid or tendered. This contract admits of no other construction than that now indicated. And in this view there can be no ground for the claim asserted by the plaintiff, that Gaylord was bound to tender a deed for the one-eighth interest in the iron works on the day named in the contract for the advance payment of $5,000. It is clear, then, that the plaintiff has no ground for the claim that under the contract he is to be regarded as a partner, and entitled to an account for profits. But it is insisted that, irrespective of the contract, the plaintiff has proved facts entitling him in equity to a share of the profits, on the ground that Thomas G. Gaylord, Sen., has waived the performance of the stipulation requiring payment of the purchase money, and that his acts, and the acts of the other members of the firm of Gaylord & Co., show that the plaintiff was recognized and accepted as a partner from October 1, 1854. If this position is sustained by the evidence, it is within the competency of this court, as a court of equity, and it would certainly be its duty, to give the plaintiff the relief sought for by holding him to be a partner, and decreeing a participation in the profits of the firm. I have examined carefully the evidence with a view to this aspect of the case, and without attempting a critical analysis of the facts, will state the conclusions to which I have arrived.

As to the waiver of the first payment required by the contract, there is nothing in the evidence by which it can be established by fair implication. On the other hand, there are several facts and considerations that negative the presumption of such a waiver. That the provision requiring the advance payment was made a part of the contract is a strong presumptive proof that Gaylord viewed it as an essential condition, and expected it would be complied with. There is no reason, from the nature of the transaction, to infer that he was indifferent on this subject. And the correspondence between Gaylord and the plaintiff, subsequently to the date of the contract, so far from showing a purpose or consent to dispense with the payment of the $5,000, proves that it was always insisted on, and referred to, as a condition on which alone the plaintiff could be let into the concern as a partner. It is true, as the evidence conclusively shows, that before and at the date of the contract Gaylord was mistaken as to the pecuniary ability of the plaintiff to make this payment. He had reason to conclude, from his representations on the subject, that the plaintiff had means from which to raise the amount agreed to be paid; and, when he ascertained his inability to do so, he could at once have rescinded the contract. Gaylord did not pursue this cause, but indulged him by an extension of the time of payment, with the expectation that he would be able to procure the money needed. But this indulgence affords no reason for the inference, that he intended to release him from the obligation of his contract, especially as other facts expressly negative any such intention. But upon this point, it is sufficient to remark that at least for the first year of his connection with the iron works, the plaintiff did not pretend to claim an interest in them as a partner, without the payment of the five thousand dollars. That he so regarded the contract appears clearly from the fact, that during that year, as appears from his letters, he was making efforts to raise the money in Pennsylvania. And in one of his letters to Gaylord, he states, in substance, that he did not ask or expect a transfer of the one-eighth interest until the first payment was made.

As a last alternative, he proposed that Gaylord & Co. should receive the remnant of a stock of dry goods, in part payment of the sum due. This was agreed to, on the condition that the goods were suitable for their store at Portsmouth. Upon examination, they were found unsuitable for that purpose, and the negotiation therefore failed. And on this subject it is proper to state, that the plaintiff in his bill avers that in October, 1855, Gaylord claimed that the first payment was due and unpaid, and that unless it was paid the contract would be void, and that plaintiff then proposed that the $5,000 should be credited to him from the profits of the preceding year, which was declined.

But it is insisted by counsel that, conceding the plaintiff was bound to make the first payment, under the contract, on October 1, 1854, and that he has failed to do so, if the evidence shows that he was accepted and treated as a partner, the members of the firm of Gaylord & Co. are estopped from denying the partnership, and are liable to account to the plaintiff for one-eighth of the profits accruing while he was so connected with them.

To appreciate properly the force of this position, it is necessary again to recur to the contract between Gaylord and the plaintiff, and the relation in which the parties stood to each other. Now, if the contract had been merely for the sale of a part of Gaylord's interest in the iron works, without providing for the employment of the plaintiff, as a manager, and he had been permitted to participate in the business of the firm without objection by the old partners, and without insisting on the payment of the purchase money required by the contract, there would be a plausible ground for the claim that these acts were a waiver of the contract, and a virtual recognition of the right of the purchaser as a partner. There are a class of cases in which this principle has been properly applied and enforced; but its application to this case is not perceived. The contract in question provided for the sale of an interest in the iron works to the plaintiff, and also for his employment as a manager. The two objects are divisible; and it is necessary to a right understanding of the intention of the parties that they should be separated. They have no necessary connection with each other. There may have been a failure on the part of the purchaser to comply with his contract, affording a good ground for its rescission, and it may have been in fact rescinded, and yet as to the employment of the plaintiff as a manager, it may have been in full force. There is reason to suppose this state of things was in the contemplation of these parties, in entering into this contract. Gaylord was desirous of securing the services of the plaintiff as a manager, under a belief that he would faithfully and skillfully discharge the duties of the station, and thus promote the interests of the company. He therefore agreed to give him a fair salary, to be paid without regard to the success of the iron works, while he superintended them. In addition to this, he was willing to sell him an eighth interest, at the price and on the condition stated in the contract. The arrangement was obviously a desirable one for the plaintiff, as it secured to him the means of livelihood, beyond all contingencies, with a chance of being interested in the firm on payment of the purchase money. If he failed in making the payments, and thereby forfeited his rights under the contract of sale, he would still occupy his place as manager, and receive his compensation as such.

This view throws light on the true construction of the contract between these parties, and their intention in making it. It also assists in a proper understanding of those acts, which, it is claimed by the plaintiff, are equivalent to a waiver of parts of the contract, and his recognition and acceptance as a partner. It shows, conclusively, that the possession of the plaintiff, so far as he had any, and his participation and agency in the business of the company, did not result from his purchase of an interest in the works, but from the position he occupied under the other branch of the contract, as the manager of the manufacturing department. And hence, the inference is not admissible, that his continuance in the employment of the company, after the failure to make the payment required, and his acts as manager, are evidence of the intention of the other parties to dispense with the obligations of the contract, or that he was accepted as a partner.

But, it is contended by the plaintiff's counsel, that there is affirmative proof that McNamara was treated as a partner during the first year of his connection with the iron works. This is apparent, it is insisted, from the correspondence between him and Gaylord, Sen., subsequent to the date of the contract, and from the verbal statements and admissions of Benjamin B. Gaylord. From a careful examination of the elder Gaylord's letters, I have failed to notice anything that can be fairly construed into an admission that the plaintiff was a partner. On the contrary, he often refers to the contract, and its requirement to pay the $5,000 before the plaintiff can have an interest in the concern. And there are no expressions in the letters from which the inference can be drawn that Gaylord regarded the plaintiff in any other light than a manager. His language is that of an owner to his employe; though he obviously, for a time, contemplated and expected that the plaintiff would make the payment required by the contract, and thus entitle himself to an interest in the iron works. But what seems conclusive on this point is the fact, that at least for the first year there was no semblance of a claim by the plaintiff that he was a partner. In one of his letters, before referred to, there is an explicit disclaim of any right as a partner, or to a transfer of the one-eighth interest, until the first payment was made.

Nor does the evidence of the acts or declarations of Benjamin B. Gaylord prove the recognition of the plaintiff as a partner. It is true that on several occasions he stated the fact that the plaintiff had purchased an interest in the establishment; and two witnesses testify that after the plaintiff became connected with it, Gaylord introduced him as a partner. It is obvious, however, when this evidence is taken in connection with other facts, that he had reference to the contract between the plaintiff and Thomas G. Gaylord, Sen., and to the expectation that the contract would be consummated, and that the partnership would thus take place. There can be no question that for the first year after the plaintiff began his service as a manager, the Gaylords supposed he was acting in good faith, and had the intention and the ability to comply with his agreement; and their conduct was consistent with this supposition.

It is insisted, also, as a strong proof of the plaintiff's recognition as a partner, that he negotiated a sale of a large quantity of iron to a mercantile house in St. Louis, with the knowledge and approbation of the Gaylords. Without noticing in detail the correspondence between the plaintiff and the St. Louis house, it is sufficient to state that while he intimates that he has an interest in the Portsmouth Iron Works, he does not use the name of the firm, as he properly might do, if a partner, but subscribes the letters T. G. Gaylord & Co., by Thomas McNamara. This fact repels any presumption that might otherwise arise from this transaction that he was a partner.

There is one fact, full of significance as to the understanding of the parties, in regard to the question of partnership. It is in proof, that, in accordance with an established usage of the firm of Gaylord & Co., an account of stock was taken in the beginning of October, 1854, and a few days after the plaintiff had assumed the duties of manager; and that in taking this account no notice was taken of his interest as a partner. It also appears that there was no change in the partnership books, and that no charge was made against the plaintiff as for stock purchased. Nor was any notice given to the public, through the papers or otherwise, of any addition to or change in the membership of the firm. It is incredible that a step of such interest to the parties should take place without being noticed in some or all the ways referred to. And on this question of partnership, it is proper here to notice that the proof is very explicit that Benjamin G. Gaylord often, and in very emphatic terms, denied the fact of the plaintiff's interest in the concern, and affirmed that his connection with it was exclusively that of a manager. But, without extending my remarks on this point, I may state it as my unhesitating conclusion, that the evidence wholly fails to establish affirmatively that the plaintiff was in fact a partner, or that he was recognized and accepted as such.

There is another aspect of this case, as presented by the plaintiff's bill, to which I will briefly advert. It is claimed, as I understand the allegations of the bill, that apart from the contract, if the court is satisfied the plaintiff has rendered valuable service to the firm of Gaylord & Co., and that during the period of such service large profits were made, he is entitled, on the broad principles of equity, to his proportionate share of such profits, and to a decree that will carry out that object. The basis of this claim is, that although the first payment of $5,000 was not made, the one-eighth of the profits from October, 1854, to October, 1855, were nearly, if not quite, enough to meet that payment, and that the plaintiff was entitled to credit on the contract for his proportion of such profits. He avers in his bill that in October, 1855, he requested a settlement with Gaylord & Co., on this basis, which they refused. It also appears from the plaintiff's letters written in 1855, that this proposition had been a subject of correspondence between him and Gaylord, Sen., and had been uniformly declined by the latter, with a protestation that the plaintiff was not entitled to anything on the ground urged by him.

It is only necessary to say on this point, that this was no part of the contract of the parties. The contract clearly contemplated the payment of the entire amount of $15,000. No principle of equity requires that the profits should be appropriated as claimed by the plaintiff; nor had the proposition a shadow of reason for its support. It was in effect saying, that without the contribution of a dollar to the capital of the firm, and after being paid his salary for his services as a manager, he was still entitled to all the benefits of an actual partner. The equitable phase of this matter would be different, if the plaintiff had devoted his labor and skill for the interests of the firm without any agreement for compensation as manager; but being fully paid for his services in that capacity, no reason is furnished for claiming a share of the profits.

But it is unnecessary to pursue this investigation. And without noticing the other points presented in the case, I have no hesitation in announcing the conclusion, that the plaintiff was not a partner of Gaylord & Co., and is not entitled in equity to an account of profits. The bill must therefore be dismissed.

McNAUGHTER v. CASSALLY.

[4 McLean, 530.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1849.

CONTRACTS—NONCOMPLIANCE—WAIVER—ESTOPPEL—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. A contract to deliver three thousand hogs, cleaned, at such times as should be required by the purchaser, not exceeding seven hundred in a day, may be waived by receiving a less number, and giving notice, under the contract, to furnish at subsequent periods.

[Cited in brief in Reggins v. Missouri River, Ft. S. & G. R. Co., 73 Mo. 600.]

2. On the failure of the plaintiff to deliver, the defendant might have put an end to the contract, and refused to receive any more.

3. This having been waived by defendant, he can not afterwards, set it up as matter of justification or defense, for not complying with his contract.

4. After the defendant's agents refused to receive any more hogs, there being one or two wagon loads, at the door of the pork house, ready to be delivered, and a great number killed and cleaned, it was unnecessary to make a tender of the hogs.

5. If the jury are satisfied that the plaintiff had the hogs ready to be delivered, a refusal to receive any more, was sufficient to charge the defendant.

6. The damages will be, the difference between the contract price, and the market value of the pork, in Madison, the place of delivery.

[This was an action by A. McNaughter against William Cassally for damages for breach of contract.]

Sullivan & Chapman, for plaintiff.

Marshall & Judah, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is founded upon a contract of the following import, agreement dated 17th June, 1847—McNaughter sold to defendant and partner, three thousand corn fed hogs, to be delivered on or between the 15th of November and 1st of January, next, at the option of Cassally, at Madison, Indiana, they giving twelve days notice for the delivery of the same, and to pay for the same $4.62½ per hundred, net weight; said hogs to average 190 pounds net, and no one to weigh less than 140 pounds, at Madison, to be killed one day and weighed the next; payment to be made $4,900 in advance on security by plaintiff, etc. This contract was modified on the 8th of November, 1847, so as to make the delivery at Madison, soon as the weather is cold enough to pack seven hundred hogs per day, until the completion of the contract. Payments were made by the defendant amounting to the sum of $15,640. Previous to the above modification of the contract, the defendant on the 2d of November, caused a notice to be delivered to the plaintiff as follows: "We want the three thousand hogs to be delivered to us on the 15th inst." On receiving this notice, the plaintiff informed the defendant that he would make his arrangements to furnish the hogs agreeable to contract—have them all killed in one day, and delivered the next. The plaintiff offered to prove that a large number of hogs were purchased, and forfeitures incurred by him by reason of the defendant's failure to take the number specified in the contract. But THE COURT refused to admit the evidence; that the contract of purchase by the plaintiff was not a matter to be proved. That the difference between the contract price with the defendant and the value of the hogs at the place of delivery were the facts to be proved, to show the damages sustained by the plaintiff.

In their charge to the jury, THE COURT said, it appears from the evidence, that the hogs delivered have been paid for under the contract. And the plaintiff claims damages for a violation of the contract in not receiving the whole number of three thousand, named in the contract. By the contract the hogs were to be delivered between the 15th of November and 1st of January ensuing, at the option of the defendant, he giving twelve days notice. This gave him the right to demand the delivery of the hogs in one day, and notice to this effect seems to have been given. But afterward, this notice was not insisted on, and the contract was so changed by the parties, as to require the delivery of seven hundred hogs per day, when the weather shall be cool enough. Schooley was engaged to cut and pack the pork, and he purchased the hams. He states that seven hundred hogs were required to be killed the 11th November, on Thursday. Mitchell and Payne, who acted for McNaughter in his absence, say that no such order was given, but that it was agreed that the hogs in the pens should be killed on the 11th, and delivered on the 13th. On the 12th November there was an order for seven hundred to be slaughtered on that day. But this order was waived by Irwin, the agent of the defendant. Irwin denies that he gave such an order, and declares that he had no authority to give it. It seems the defendant said to Payne and Mitchell, he was not, himself, a practical man, but that Irwin was, who would give instructions. An order was given the 13th, Saturday, for seven hundred hogs. Six hundred and sixty-three were weighed. Schooley agreed to make up the deficiency. Some of the hogs were sent which were supposed to have been killed on that day. Another order was given on the 15th of November for seven hundred to be delivered the 16th; six hundred and ninety-seven were weighed. On the 16th an order was given for two hundred hogs, to be delivered on the 17th; two hundred were weighed and delivered, but the defendant's agents, acting under his orders, refused to receive any more. At this time there were several wagons at Schooley's pork house, loaded with hogs, which were refused. At the same time, it appears, there were in McNaughter & Mitchell's slaughter house eight hundred hogs cleaned. There remained eleven hundred and forty-two hogs to be delivered to complete the three thousand. To recover damages for the refusal to receive these hogs this action has been brought.

This is, no doubt, a hard contract on the defendant. Pork could be purchased at less than he agreed to give. But the court can not change the contract. The defense mainly rests upon the failures to deliver the hogs, under the notices given, as the plaintiff was bound to. This would have been a good defense for breaking up the contract and refusing to receive any more hogs if it had not been waived by the defendant. From time to time orders were given, notwithstanding the previous failure to deliver the number required. Such orders, given from time to time, must be considered as waivers of the previous default, as it declared a willingness to go on with the contract, and the plaintiff was bound to make the deliveries as required. He could not take advantage of his own failures. Under these circumstances, THE COURT think the defense set up can not avail the defendant. He might have taken advantage of any failure by the plaintiff, and put an end to the contract, but he failed to do so. The order for two hundred hogs to be delivered on the 17th of November was complied with, so that when the defendant refused to receive any more hogs under the contract, the plaintiff was not in default, as the previous failure had been waived by subsequent orders. At this time, Schooley refused, as the agent of the defendant, to receive any more hogs, though it appears from the evidence, a large number were ready to be delivered, having been killed and cleaned. And the last order having been complied with, the plaintiff stands in the attitude of having performed his agreement as he had been required, and was ready to complete it if he had not been prevented by the refusal of the defendant. A tender of all the hogs was unnecessary, they being on hand, after the refusal of the defendant to receive any more.

If these facts are fully sustained by the evidence, it will be your duty to find for the plaintiff such damages as the law authorizes. The measure of the damages will be, the difference between the market value of the hogs at the time of the refusal to receive them, and the price which the defendant in his written contract agreed to pay.

The verdict was for the plaintiff. Judgment.

BANKRUPTCY — ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE — MOTION TO VACATE — SIGNATURE TO PETITION — ISSUE TAKEN — WAIVER — SINGLE ACT OF STOPPING PAYMENT.

1. On a motion to vacate the order to show cause, in a creditor's petition, for the reason that the verification and signature of the cashier of the bank is not a proper signature and verification, where no special authority is shown. The respondent also put in a denial of the act of bankruptcy and demanded a jury trial. Held, that the alleged bankrupt waived his objections by taking issue upon the petition and demand for trial.

[Cited in Re Simmons, Case No. 12,864; Roche v. Fox, Id. 11,974; In re Donnelly, 5 Fed. 787.]

2. It seems that a single act of stopping payment followed by a non-resumption for fourteen days is prima facie an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)].

[Cited in Re Hadley, Case No. 5,894.]

3. Motion to dismiss denied and case ordered to stand for trial.

[In the matter of Moses A. McNaughton, a bankrupt.] This is a motion to vacate the order to show cause on creditor's petition for adjudication, and to dismiss the petition on the ground that it "is not signed and verified as required by the rules and practice of this court."

Mr. Gibson (Digby & Gibson), for the motion.

Alfred Russell, opposed.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The petitioning creditor in this case is "The Merchants' and Manufacturers' Bank of Detroit," a corporation organized and in existence under the laws of the state of Michigan. The petition is signed and verified by the cashier of the bank. The grounds of the motion to dismiss are: 1. That the cashier has no authority by virtue of his office or employment as such, to sign and verify a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy on behalf of the corporation bank; and, 2. That no special authority to the cashier to so sign and verify is anywhere averred or shown. I do not think any officer of a corporation has authority, by virtue of his office, to sign and verify a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against a debtor of the corporation, unless specially authorized by some statute, by law or resolution of its board of directors. Such authority, being special, must in all cases be made to appear by the oath of the person signing and verifying the petition, or other competent evidence. This was done in this case, and if the respondent had stood upon his motion to dismiss, I should have come to the conclusion that the motion should be granted, so far, at least, as to vacate the order to show cause. I come to these conclusions by analogy to the provisions of the act and the forms and proceedings prescribed for proof of debts by corporations—section 22 and form 23. The motion to dismiss is in writing, and was filed on the return day of the order to show cause. Before the motion was heard, or any action whatever had upon it, and, in fact, on the same day, the respondent put in a denial of the act of bankruptcy alleged in the petition, and demanded a trial of that issue by a jury; and the usual order for such trial was then made and is now still pending.

The objections to the proceedings are not jurisdictional. They go to the sufficiency of the authentication of the petition only, and I have no hesitation in holding that the objections were waived by taking issue upon the petition and demand for trial. The court obtains jurisdiction of the proceedings by the filing of the petition for adjudication, and of the person of the respondent, in involuntary cases, by the issuing and service of the order to show cause. This is the usual mode by which jurisdiction of the person is obtained, and the only mode by which it can be enforced; but it is not the only means by which it may be conferred. A debtor against whom a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy is filed, may, no doubt, submit himself to the jurisdiction of the court without an order to show cause; and it is equally clear that he does so when he appears and confesses, or puts in a denial of the alleged acts of bankruptcy and demands a trial. By so doing he waives not only the necessity of an order to show cause, but the necessity of proof of the authority of the person signing the petition, and, in fact, of any verification whatever. Proof of the authority of a person signing a creditor's petition in a representative capacity, and a verification of the petition, like the accompanying proof of the petitioning creditor's debt, and deposition as to the alleged act or acts of bankruptcy, are requisite only to authorize the making of an order to show cause. When that is done their office is accomplished; and they never can be, and never are, of any further or other use in the case. It certainly does not need argument to show that the fact that an invalid order to show cause was made and served does not do away with or lessen the effect of the respondent's taking issue upon the petition, as a waiver.

On the argument an objection to the petition was raised, which does not appear, by the motion to dismiss, on file. It was this: That the only act of bankruptcy charged is a stoppage and fourteen days suspension of payment upon a single piece of commercial paper, whereas it is contended that nothing short of a general stoppage and suspension for fourteen days is within the meaning of the act. In the first place, the question cannot be raised in that manner. It must be done by way of exception or demurrer to the petition. But even if properly raised, the objection is not well taken. I am clearly of opinion that a single act of stopping payment, followed by a non-resumption for fourteen days, is prima facie an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the bankrupt act. The prima facie effect of a single act, may, of course, be avoided more easily than in a case of general suspension, but it must be done by proper allegations by way of answer and proofs at the trial.

It results that the motion to dismiss must be denied, and the matter must stand for trial as heretofore ordered.

JUDGMENT—CONFESSION—NO DECLARATION.

The court will permit a defendant to come in and confess judgment for the whole damages laid in the writ, although no declaration be filed.

Motion by the defendant to appear and confess judgment.

Mr. Simms, for plaintiff, contrá. Here is no declaration; and if no declaration, then no action; and if no action, then no judgment can be given. 3 Bl. Comm. 290; Rev. Code, p. 85, §§ 33, 88.

Mr. Youngs, for defendant, cited Laws U. S. March 2, 1793, § 7 (1 Stat. 335), power of the court to make rules of practice. Confession of judgment waives all error, even the want of a declaration. Judgment may be confessed to the amount of the damages in the writ. The plaintiff cannot lay more damages in his declaration than in the writ. A confession of judgment on the writ is a confession of judgment for every thing which the plaintiff can possibly demand in this action. The act of assembly requires that the cause of action shall be indorsed on the writ. The declaration is for the benefit of the defendant, to give him notice of the nature of the demand. The defendant is not bound to require it. The act of congress (1 Stat. 266), requiring the creditor to pay for the food of his debtor, imprisoned at his suit, applies only to debtors confined on execution, and not on mesne process.

Mr. Simms, in reply. The plaintiff may recover more than the damages laid in the writ, if the defendant does not pray oyer of the writ, and plead the variance.

THE COURT permitted the defendant to be brought in and confess judgment for the amount of the damages laid in the writ.

[Cited in Babcock v. People's Sav. Bank, 118 Ind. 213, 20 N. E. 733.]

The defendants had given a warehouse receipt to Upham & Co. for 800 bushels of wheat. Upham & Co. agreed with the plaintiffs to sell to them a much larger amount of wheat, and, in part execution of this agreement, assigned to the plaintiffs the receipt of the defendants. The plaintiffs presented the receipt to the defendants, and demanded the wheat mentioned therein; and upon refusal to deliver it, they brought this suit to recover their damages. The cause came on to be tried to the court without a jury. The defendants offered to prove that they had never received the wheat from Upham & Co., and had no such wheat as mentioned in the receipt at the time it was given; but that they issued it to those parties, as a security for a loan of $400, or an advance made to them on a purchase of 800 bushels of wheat, to be delivered in future.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. As civilization has advanced, and commerce extended, new and artificial modes of doing business have superseded the exchanges by barter and otherwise, which prevail while society is in its early and simple stages. The invention of the bill of exchange is a familiar illustration of this fact. A more modern, but still not recent invention, of like character, for the transfer, without the somewhat cumbersome, and often impossible, operation of actual delivery of articles of personal property, is the indorsement or assignment of bills of lading and warehouse receipts. Instruments of this kind are sui generis. From long use in trade, they have come to have, among commercial men, a well understood meaning. And the indorsement or assignment of them as absolutely transfers the general property of the goods and chattels therein named, as would a bill of sale. Austen v. Craven, 4 Taunt. 647; White v. Wilks [5 Taunt. 176] 12 East. 614; Conrad v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet.[26 U. S.] 386; Gardiner v. Suydam, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 357; Gibson v. Chillicothe Branch of State Bank of Ohio, 11 Ohio St. 311. When a warehouseman issues such a receipt, he puts it in the power of the holder to treat with the public on the faith of it. He enables him to say, and to induce others to believe, that he has certain property, which he can sell or pledge for a loan of money. If the warehouseman gives to the party who holds such a receipt a false credit, he will not be suffered to contradict the statement which he has made in the receipt, so as to injure a party who has been misled by it. That is within the most exact definition of estoppel. If A. gives to B. his note for $100. although he has received no value therefor, and may defend against the note in a suit brought by B., yet if B. sells the note to a third party who does not know of the facts, A. then must pay the note. Just so in the case of a warehouse receipt. If A. issues such a paper to B., for articles which he has never received, a third party treating with B. on the faith of the statement and promise contained in the receipt, will hold A. for the goods or their value. It is of no consequence what the transaction may be between the original parties; whether the receipt, as is claimed here, was intended as a security for a loan, or was entirely false.

The defendant here offers to prove that he never received the property mentioned in the receipt which he has given, but that the paper was issued as a security for a loan, or as an advance on wheat to be delivered. But he has stated in this receipt that he has the wheat in his warehouse, and also promised therein to deliver the wheat to the order of Upham & Co. These plaintiffs, believing this statement to be true, and relying on this promise, bought of Upham & Co. the receipt and property mentioned therein. They were justified in doing this, and the defendants must respond to their promise. The evidence is not admissible.

McNEIL v. MAGEE et al.

[5 Mason, 244.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1829.

REAL PROPERTY—AGREEMENT AND AWARD—CONCURRENT ACTS—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—LACHES—DAMAGES—RECORD OF DEED—NOTICE.

1. Bill for a reconveyance of an estate upon an agreement and subsequent award, dismissed upon the circumstances, the bill being brought against purchasers after a considerable lapse of time, the original vendee being dead and insolvent.

2. Where an award directed each party to release to the other certain estate, and the term of 20 days was directed, within which the acts were to be done; the acts are to be deemed concurrent acts, so that neither party can insist upon a release without offering to execute a release on his own part to the other party.

[Cited in Green v. Dyersburg, Case No. 5,756.]

3. Courts of equity have jurisdiction to enforce a specific performance of an award respecting real estate. But he who seeks performance must show a readiness to perform all the award on his own part.

[Cited in Akely v. Akely, 16 Vt. 459.]

4. After long delay and laches a court of equity will not decree a specific performance of an award, especially where there has been a material change of circumstances, and injury to the other party.

[Cited in Warner v. Daniels, Case No. 17,181.]

[Cited in brief in Akely v. Akely, 16 Vt. 455. Cited in Holden v. Purifoy (N. C.) 12 S. E. 850.]

5. A fortiori, it will not decree it against purchasers even with notice, if their vendee is dead and insolvent so that they can have no remedy over.

6. Quaere, in what cases a court of equity will award damages as a compensation for delay on a bill for a specific performance.

7. In what cases the registry of a deed is constructive notice.

8. The registry of a deed or paper not duly or legally recorded, is not constructive notice.

[Cited in Montgomery v. Dorion, 6 N. H. 255; Rushin v. Shields, 11 Ga. 636.]

9. Quaere, if an award respecting real estate is required to be registered by the laws of Massachusetts.

10. Notice, if denied by the answer, must be proved by two witnesses, or by one witness and circumstances.

11. If a bill admits the defendant to be a purchaser of the legal title, and the plaintiff sets up an equitable title, and demands a conveyance of the legal title to himself, he must aver and prove all the material facts to entitle him to such conveyance. If he relies on notice in the purchaser, he must aver it in his bill, and if not admitted by the answer, he must prove the notice before he can have relief.

[Cited in Dowell v. Applegate, 7 Fed. 887.]

12. A purchaser, who chooses to answer the bill generally, need not aver, that he is a purchaser without notice. The plaintiff must prove notice.

Bill in equity [by Archdeacon McNeil against James Magee and others]. The cause came to a hearing upon the bill, answers, depositions, and exhibits.

William Sullivan, for respondents.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is the case of a bill in equity, which was set down for a hearing at the last term, but from circumstances, to which it is unnecessary to allude, argued at so late a period of the term, that a continuance of it for advisement became indispensable. On the 13th of February 1808, McNeil (the plaintiff) executed two deeds of conveyance (which were recorded on the same day) to James Magee, (one of the original defendants but since deceased,) whereby, for the asserted consideration of $40,000, he granted to Magee, in fee simple, certain parcels of land in Charlestown, Massachusetts. On the same day an agreement under seal was executed between the same parties, whereby, after reciting the sale by the deeds aforesaid, and that Magee had given his notes for the $40,000 purchase money to McNeil, and that McNeil was indebted to sundry persons as by a schedule annexed, amounting to $18,850, Magee covenanted, "that whenever the said McNeil, his heirs, &c., shall feel dissatisfied with the said security of the purchase money aforesaid, or shall require a reconveyance of the estate described by said deeds, and shall give notice thereof to the said Magee, his heirs, &c., he or they shall forthwith reconvey to said McNeil, his heirs, &c., all right and title derived to him the said Magee by virtue of the two deeds aforesaid, the said McNeil giving up to the said Magee his notes aforesaid. And if the said Magee shall then have made any lease, sale, or other conveyance respecting any of the lands aforesaid, the same shall go to the benefit of the said McNeil, his heirs, &c., the notes, money, securities, or other property received in lieu thereof by said Magee to be transferred, &c., to the said McNeil, his heirs, &c., unless the said money, &c., shall have been previously applied in payment of any of said McNeil's debts as aforesaid." And it was therein afterwards declared, that "the true intent and meaning of the aforesaid contract is, that in case the said McNeil, his heirs, &c., shall elect to deliver up to the said Magee, his heirs, &c., the notes aforesaid, and have the land reconveyed to him or them as aforesaid, that the said McNeil shall account for, and repay all the sums paid by the said Magee on his said notes; and that the said Magee, his heirs, &c., shall account for all the lands sold, leased, or otherwise transferred, or incumbered either by applying the avails thereof to the said McNeil's debts as aforesaid, or any part thereof, or by transferring the said proceeds specifically to the value thereof to the said McNeil, his heirs, &c., on request; and all the residue of said estate, which may be unsold at the time of accounting as aforesaid, shall also be reconveyed to the said McNeil, his heirs, &c.; excepting however any and all incumbrances, whereby the said

McNeil is to be benefited by having the amount, for which the same may have been incumbered, applied to the discharge of his debts, as herein provided. The said Magee to retain sufficient property to pay all reasonable expenses he may incur, in all negotiations in said property, and a just and fair compensation for his own time and trouble." This agreement was not recorded until the 25th of September, 1809. There was a correspondent agreement executed by McNeil to Magee on the same day, giving Magee a like election to give up the purchase on the same terms, mutatis mutandis. Difficulties, as might naturally be expected, soon grew up between the parties in the execution of the trusts thus generally created, and carrying in their own bosom the elements of discord. On the 13th of April, 1811, McNeil and Magee entered into an agreement under seal, by which they submitted all claims and demands growing out of the deeds and contracts aforementioned, or otherwise, to three arbitrators, and covenanted to abide by any award, which they or any two of them should make in the premises, under a penalty of $50,000. It was specially covenanted, that for any sums of money which the arbitrators should award to Magee for expenditures, services, &c., he (Magee) should take in payment and satisfaction such portion of the lands conveyed to him, as the arbitrators should award; and that the arbitrators should make a valuation of the lands conveyed, and award what portion should be conveyed to Magee, and what to McNeil, and describe the same accordingly, and state the time when the deeds necessary to carry their award into effect should be executed; and that Magee should reconvey all the rest and residue to McNeil in fee simple, free of incumbrances by him made; and that McNeil, on receiving such conveyance, should release to said Magee all right, title, claim, and demand, in law and in equity, as to the portion of said land, which should remain to Magee, and be by him held. The promissory notes were to be deposited with the arbitrators; and upon delivery of such deed to McNeil, or tender of delivery, the said notes were to be given up to Magee.

The arbitrators, after many hearings of the parties, on the 21st of May, 1811 made their award. By it they awarded, that a balance of $27,100 was due from McNeil to Magee. They then proceeded to state their valuation and division of the lands conveyed, describing the same specifically, and awarded one portion, equal in value to $27,100, to Magee, and the other portion thereof, equal in value to $2832, to McNeil. They further awarded, that McNeil should within twenty days execute a deed or deeds of release to Magee, with covenants of warranty against incumbrances made by him, and of all lawful claims of persons claiming under him, as to the lands awarded to Magee. And that Magee should execute within twenty days a deed or deeds of gift, grant, bargain, sale, and release, to McNeil, of all the land awarded to him, with like covenants of warranty. On the 18th day of August 1811, Magee tendered a deed to McNeil duly executed and acknowledged by him, (Magee,) of the land awarded to McNeil, in conformity to the terms of the award; and at the same time requested McNeil to execute and acknowledge a deed of the lands awarded to him, (Magee,) which deeds were drawn up in conformity to the award. McNeil refused to receive the deed executed and acknowledged by Magee, and also to execute the deed prepared for him to execute to Magee. A suit was brought by Magee against McNeil at the January term of the court of common pleas for Suffolk county. 1812, for the penalty in the submission, to enforce the award. At the September term of the same court in 1812, a suit was brought by McNeil against Magee, upon the notes given for the $40,000 purchase money. Both of these suits were brought to a decision at the March term, 1814, of the supreme court of the state of Massachusetts, the first upon a demurrer to special pleadings; and the last upon an agreement of facts by the parties, bringing the validity of the award before the court. After a hearing and due proceedings had, the court appear to have adjudged the award good, as a bar to the suit upon the notes; and the other suit was decided in favour of McNeil upon the pleadings, the plaintiff's replication being adjudged to be bad and insufficient. In the years 1813 and 1814 Magee sold the lands awarded to McNeil, for various considerations, to certain of the defendants; and in December, 1814, he mortgaged the lands awarded to himself, (excepting that part, which had been mortgaged to Margaret Magee) to Simon Eliot for a large sum. By subsequent assignments, the same lands so conveyed to Eliot came into the hands of Amos Binney; but whether the equity of redemption had been foreclosed did not appear by any of the proofs in the cause. But it did appear, that McNeil in June, 1819, for the nominal consideration of $1, released all his title in the same lands to Binney.

To this summary of the leading facts it may be necessary, for a more full understanding of the case, to add, that the original bill was commenced at May term, 1823, against James Magee, and against sundry other persons claiming portions of the land as purchasers, &c., under him. The original bill was founded solely upon the deeds of McNeil to Magee, and the collateral agreements between them. After stating the substance of those instruments it charged, that on the 15th of October, 1810, McNeil became dissatisfied with the said security for the purchase money, and required a reconveyance of the lands then unsold from Magee; and that McNeil did then and afterwards offer and tender to Magee his notes, and to account for and repay all sums of money paid by Magee on his notes, and on the debts of McNeil, and to permit Magee to retain sufficient property to pay all his reasonable expenses and a just and fair compensation. It then charged, that Magee, confederating with the other defendants, refused to reconvey, and that he made divers conveyances to his confederates, &c., under which they had entered and occupied; and then prayed for a discovery and account, and a delivery of possession of the lands, or of so much thereof, as he was equitably entitled to, and for further relief. Margaret Magee (one of the defendants) died in July, 1822, and James Magee died in December, 1823. Their deaths were accordingly suggested on the record. A bill of revivor was filed at May term, 1824, against the administrator of Margaret Magee, upon which process was duly issued. In January, 1825, the bill was amended in several particulars. The amended bill, among other things, stated, that James Magee was dead, having at that time no goods or estate whatsoever; and that the agreement of 1808 was recorded in September, 1809. It added other parties, as defendants to the bill, with apt words to charge them as purchasers under Magee. It then proceeded to state certain pretences, under which the confederates claimed title, denying the same; and, among other things, stated, that they set up the submission and award before mentioned, and the refusal of McNeil to comply with the same. It admitted the existence of the submission and award, but charged that the arbitrators had no authority to award a deed of any particular form, or containing any particular covenants to be made by McNeil to Magee; and that the arbitrators exceeded their authority in prescribing such form of the deeds to be given by McNeil and by Magee; and further, that the award was not pursuant to the submission in another respect, inasmuch as it did not fix the day, on which the deeds should be delivered by the parties, nor that Magee should first make, execute, and deliver to McNeil a deed of the lands set off to him, nor make any award respecting the notes; and that on these accounts it was null and void. But if valid, it charged, that Magee did not execute the proper deeds, nor were the lands free of incumbrances made by Magee; and that a delivery of such deed of the lands, free of incumbrances, was a condition precedent to any act to be done by McNeil, and that McNeil is now entitled to the lands so set off to him. It then charged, that the confederates had notice of the conditions and trusts, on which the lands were held by Magee, and of the award, and of the title of McNeil, &c., at the time of their respective purchases. It then stated another pretence, viz. that a large portion of the lands was mortgaged to one Simon Eliot, and by him assigned to one Amos Binney, to whom afterwards McNeil released all his right and title; and charged, that a part only of such lands contained in the original deeds was so conveyed, and that the mortgage had been paid off and satisfied. The amended bill then stated, that a part of the lands (to some of which Samuel Jaques, one of the defendants, claimed title) was mortgaged by McNeil to Margaret Magee, the defendant, on the 28th of August, 1801, as security for $7000, with power to sell; and on the 28th of August, 1807, was again mortgaged by McNeil to her for $7000, and that it was pretended, that she took peaceable possession for non-payment, and continued the possession until the 29th of March, 1811, and then granted the premises to James Magee in fee, who then executed a deed of covenant to reconvey the same to her on request; and that afterwards, on the 15th of October, 1813, he did reconvey the same to her in fee, and that the mortgage money was never paid, and the mortgage was thereby foreclosed. It charged on the contrary, that the mortgage money was paid, and the mortgages ought to have been discharged; that there was no foreclosure or possession as pretended, &c.; that these conveyances and release by James Magee to the said Margaret were without a valuable consideration, and she at the time well knew, that he held the equity in the same lands upon the conditions and trusts abovementioned; and had no right to give such a release.

At May term, 1827, a bill of revivor was filed to revive the cause against Simon E. Greene, administrator of James Magee, who subsequently appeared, and filed an answer. At May term, 1828, upon motion of the plaintiff the bill was dismissed as to Margaret Magee and her representative, and her name was struck out of the bill. And the like dismissal took place as to Jonathan Amory, one of the defendants, who died pending the proceedings. The general replication having been filed, the cause was, by the consent of the parties, set down for a hearing at October term, 1828; and upon breaking the argument, it having been intimated by the court, that the decision of the state court was conclusive as to the objections taken to the validity of the award, a motion was then made to amend the bill, so as to confine the relief prayed for to that parcel of the lands, which had been assigned by the award to McNeil. The motion was somewhat irregular; but under the peculiar circumstances of the case was allowed, as it would not occasion any further delay. The bill was then amended by confining the relief prayed for to the lands so awarded to McNeil, and by striking out all that portion of the bill, which stated objections to the validity of the award. And the bill was treated, as if it stood dismissed by consent against all the defendants, except Magee's administrator, and the defendants, who made claim to the lands so awarded to McNeil.

Such is the posture of the case, as it was presented at the final argument; and it has been necessary to detail the proceedings somewhat at large in the order of time, that the pressure of some of the points made at the bar may be fully comprehended. It is obvious that the case made by the original bill has been abandoned. That case proceeded mainly upon the ground, that McNeil had become dissatisfied with his security in the notes for the purchase money; had notified that fact to Magee; had offered a full compliance, on his own part, of the terms and conditions, on which he was entitled to a reconveyance; and had demanded a reconveyance in October, 1810. His dissatisfaction is established, or rather admitted; but his compliance with the terms, on which he was entitled to a reconveyance, is not only not established, but is at war with the proofs in the cause. And no notice of that dissatisfaction, as averred, has been brought home to the purchasers under Magee, unless it be since the promulgation of the award. But if it had been otherwise, the subsequent submission and award, supposing the latter to be valid, would completely displace all equitable relief founded merely upon the original agreement in 1808. The validity of the award was effectually decided by the state court; and the subsequent amendment of the bill puts the right to relief upon the ground of the award; and, therefore, the case is now narrowed down to the consideration of the bill, as it stands connected with that award, and the accompanying facts.

The questions then, presented to the court for decision, ultimately resolve themselves into the following points: In the first place, whether the plaintiff would now be entitled to the relief prayed for upon the case made by the pleadings, and proofs against Magee himself, if living? If he would be so entitled, then, whether, under all the circumstances, the plaintiff is entitled to the relief sought against the defendants, who are purchasers of the lands under Magee.

Upon the first point the defendants have taken several objections to any relief, even against Magee himself. The first objection is founded upon the statements of the amended bill itself, the award being made a part of that bill. It contains no allegation of any compliance with the terms of the award on the part of McNeil, by his executing a deed of release, as therein required of him, nor of any tender of performance on his part. But it sets up as an excuse, that a delivery of a deed of the lands awarded to McNeil, free of any incumbrances by Magee, was a condition to be performed by Magee, precedent to any act on the part of McNeil; and that Magee never executed, or tendered any such deed; and that the lands so to be conveyed were not, at any time after the award, free of incumbrances. The objection is, that the award creates no such condition precedent; and therefore the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief he seeks, since there has been a total failure on his part to comply with the terms of the award. Upon examining the ward, it does not appear to me, that there is any ground for the suggestion, that the delivery of the deed by Magee was in that instrument made a condition precedent, as asserted in the bill, whatever might be the case standing upon the terms of the submission. Both deeds were to be executed and delivered within twenty days from the date of the award. There is nothing in the nature of the act to be done, which implies any priority on either side. And if any conclusion could be drawn (as I think it could not be) from the mere order, in which the acts are stated in the award, McNeil would be to perform the first act, since his act is first named. And as Magee was in possession of the legal title, which, by the terms of the original agreement in 1808, he had a right to hold, until he was fully indemnified and paid for all his advances, no inference can be deduced, that the arbitrators intended to diminish his security, until his indemnity was complete. The natural reasoning from the posture of the parties antecedent to the submission would be in favour of Magee, and that McNeil was to do the first act. But it appears to me, that the true view of the matter even at law is, that they are concurrent, or dependent acts; and that neither party had a right to demand a performance of the other, without a performance or tender of performance at the same time on his own part. If the case had been of mutual covenants to execute deeds, within the twenty days, of the lands awarded, neither party could in my judgment have recovered at law for a breach, without such an averment of performance. The one act would constitute the consideration for the other. It would be repugnant to all justice to require, that McNeil, refusing to perform his part of the award, should yet be entitled to demand a surrender of the legal title to the lands awarded to him from Magee. The submission does, indeed, contain a clause, which might be construed to require a prior performance by Magee, before McNeil would be in default on his covenant. The language there is, that Magee shall reconvey the land awarded to McNeil, and that McNeil, "on receiving such conveyance, shall release to Magee all right, &c., to the portion of said land" awarded to Magee. But it appears to me, that the true construction of the submission, taking into view its whole objects and terms, is that, which the arbitrators gave to it, that is to say, that the acts should be concurrent. Magee was to give a conveyance on receiving a release from McNeil, and McNeil was to give a release upon receiving a conveyance from Magee. The acts were to be concurrent, and to be executed at the same time. It was like the common case of covenants on a purchase, where one party covenants to give a deed on receiving the purchase money, and the other party covenants to pay the money on receiving the deed. In such a case, neither can recover at law without showing a performance, or tender of performance; on his part. It is not necessary to go into an examination of the cases at law on this subject, though the cases cited at the bar, and especially Glazebrook v. Woodrow, 8 Term R. 366, are strongly in point.[2] The general principles, by which questions of this sort, arising under agreements, are construed, are the same both at law and in equity. Where there are mutual covenants or acts, they are construed to be dependent, unless a contrary intention appears (Sugd. Vend. c. 4, § 3; Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 455, 465); and there is good sense as well as practical convenience in the rule.

But it is the less necessary to sift this matter minutely, because we are in a court of equity; and in such a court, he who seeks equity must do it. Now, the specific performance of a contract by a court of equity is not a matter of course, but rests in the sound discretion of the court; not, indeed, in an arbitrary discretion, but such as rests upon grounds of justice. Com. Dig. "Chancery," 2, c. 16; Sugd. Vend. c. 4, § 2. Goring v. Nash, 3 Atk. 186; Joynes v. Statham, Id. 387; Davis v. Symonds, 1 Cox, 402; Seymour v. Delancey, 6 Johns. Ch. 222. It may be refused, whenever there are circumstances, which show it to be inequitable or improper; and the party is then left to his remedy at law. And it may be laid down as a general rule, subject to few, if any, exceptions, that where specific performance is sought, the court will require the party, who seeks it, to show a performance or readiness to perform, on his own part, or a default on the other side, which utterly excuses him. 1 Madd. Ch. Prac. 331; Colson v. Thompson, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 336; 1 Fonbl. Eq. bk. 1, c. 6, §§ 1, 2, and notes.

In respect to awards, whatever may have been the case formerly, no doubt at present exists, that courts of equity have jurisdiction to enforce a specific performance of them. But the ground is, that it is but an execution of the agreement of the parties, ascertained and fixed by the arbitrators. Hall v. Hardy, 3 P. Wms. 187; Norton v. Mascall, 2 Vern. 24; Blundell v. Brettargh, 17 Ves. 232; Wood v. Griffith, 1 Swanst. 43, 54; Bishop v. Webster, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 51; Thompson v. Noel, 1 Atk. 60, 62. So that the case falls clearly within the general rule laid down as to performance, where a specific execution is sought. The doctrine is well summed up in Mr. Fonblanque's treatise on Equity, in the text and notes. Book 1, c. 6, §§ 1, 2. The case of Ewes v. Blackwall, Finch, 22, goes farther; and seems to assert a principle, that unless the party seeking relief has strictly performed the award on his part, the other shall be let in to every equity without any regard to the award. Whether it can be supported to this extent, it is unnecessary now to consider; and the case (which is very imperfectly reported) may well have stood on its own peculiar circumstances. In this view, the case of the plaintiff is surrounded by some difficulties. The bill does not, as has been already suggested, aver any performance or tender of performance, or even a present readiness to perform, on the part of the plaintiff, the requisitions of the award. The excuse for nonperformance, as we have already seen, fails in point of law. There was no condition precedent on the part of Magee; and if there had been, I should very much doubt if in a court of equity, under circumstances like the present, the plaintiff could entitle himself to a decree for specific performance, without showing an ability and an offer to perform on his own part. But I should have no doubt, that if entitled to any decree, it ought to be a conditional one only, that is, a decree stipulating for a performance on his part, eodem flatu, as one of the terms of the decree. It by no means follows, that because Magee might not be in a condition to demand a specific performance, the plaintiff might have it without complying with the terms of the award. But passing by these considerations growing out of the frame of the bill. let us advert to the objections founded on the merits of the case, as against Magee, as they are disclosed upon the answers and proofs.

Some commentary has been made at the bar upon the nature and effect of the deeds and agreements in 1808. It has been said, that taking the whole together the transaction amounts to a mortgage to Magee with a power to sell. Putting it in the light contemplated by the parties upon the face of the instruments, the transaction seems rather to have assumed the character of a conditional purchase with an election in either party, by notice, to convert it into a conveyance on trust to reconvey to McNeil, he discharging all the claims of the other party, all the estate undisposed of by Magee at the time of such notice. But independent of such notice, Magee had an unlimited and absolute power of disposal, of all the property conveyed, in respect to third persons. The submission and award converted the conditional purchase into an absolute title in Magee, as to all the lands awarded to him, and as to the residue, awarded to McNeil, converted Magee into a trustee of the latter. After that award, he certainly had no power to give a good title in the trust property to any person having notice of the trust. What is sufficient notice, will become matter of subsequent inquiry. It is clear, that on the 18th of August, 1811, Magee did tender a deed, with the proper covenants, to McNeil, of the lands awarded to the latter. This is conclusively established by the deposition of Mr. Welsh. And it appears by the same testimony, that Magee at the same time tendered to McNeil the correspondent deed of release to be executed by the latter, which he utterly refused. There is no proof that any tender of performance had been made on either side within the twenty days prescribed by the award, although there is an averment of performance by Magee within the time, in the answers of his administrator. It is asserted in the amended bill in somewhat loose and general terms, that Magee never did tender any such deed, and that the lands were not at the time of making the award, or at any time afterwards, free of incumbrances made by Magee. And this averment is connected with the assertion, that this was a condition precedent to any performance on his part. But this is an evident afterthought. There is not the slightest proof, that the refusal of McNeil originally proceeded upon any such ground. If he meant to rely upon it, it was his duty to have stated it at the time, for it was an objection capable of being removed; and if he had been willing to confirm and execute the award, on his part, there is scarcely a doubt that it would have been removed. The subsequent history of the case demonstrates, that McNeil never meant to comply with the award. He was dissatisfied with it. He contested its validity in the state court. He did not allude to, or admit, it in his original bill in 1823. When he stated its existence in his amended bill, it was mainly for the purpose of denying its validity; and down to the time of the last amendment in November, 1828, he never founded his title to relief exclusively upon it as a valid award. In short we cannot escape from the conclusion, that he never meant to perform it, if he could overthrow its authority; and in acceding to it now, he yields only to the force of circumstances, and the operations of law upon his title. Doubtless he had a right so to do; but in every such case a party must act at his peril, and must submit to those consequences, which his own delay and refusal unavoidably introduce in the way of relief. Now, nothing is better settled than that a court of equity will not interfere to decree a specific performance, where the party seeking it has been guilty of gross laches, or long voluntary delay, and in the meantime there has been a material change of circumstances. The party will be left to take his remedy at law, where the delay or neglect has been without just excuse, and there is no longer a prevailing and decisive equity to sustain his claim.[3] This is true not only as to agreements generally, but as to awards founded upon agreements, for equity interferes in respect to awards, only as growing out of agreements.[4] If therefore a court of equity perceives, that the delay, voluntary on the part of the party seeking a specific performance, has been very injurious to the other party, so that it would be inequitable to decree a specific performance, that alone is sufficient to induce the court to withhold its aid.[5]

It has been further suggested, on behalf of the defendants, that the plaintiff has disabled himself to comply with his part of the award, for he has released his equity in the lands awarded to Magee, to Binney, who is a purchaser claiming by a mesne conveyance, under the latter; and therefore a release to Magee afterwards became impracticable, in the sense of the award, since it would have been inoperative in point in law. There is some force in the objection; but whether to the extent, which the objection assumes, may admit of doubt. It certainly however cannot be admitted that McNeil could, in this manner, discharge himself, by his own act, from a strict compliance with the terms of the award. His release to Magee would operate at least as a confirmation of the absolute title of Magee in the land; and in this respect would be material to the covenants of warranty on any sale made by the latter. It is not denied, that McNeil did make a release, as stated, to Binney, in the year 1819; though it purports on its face to be for the nominal consideration of $1 only. The procurement of such a release, even at that late period, shows, that at least in the mind of the purchaser, the title was not absolutely perfect, and free from doubt. But it is the less necessary to dwell on this view of the matter, because there is one of far more importance pressing on the case, and which can never be lost sight of by a court of equity. It cannot admit of doubt, that the omission of McNeil to give the release required by the award, must have materially affected the marketable value of the property awarded to Magee. If the existence of the award, and of McNeil's dissatisfaction with it, and refusal to ratify it, were half as notorious as the plaintiff now contends it was, it must have materially injured any sale by Magee. No cautious purchaser could incline to take a title then in dispute, and over which such a cloud hung, unless at a sum far below its real value. The sum due to Magee was $27,100, and his whole means of reimbursement were exclusively confined by the award to the lands estimated at that value. The estimate of the arbitrators proceeded upon the ground, that Magee should possess an indisputable title. Its marketable value was essentially connected with the existence of such a title. A prompt compliance with the award on the part of McNeil was indispensable for this purpose; and every delay on his part was injurious to Magee. Mr. Welsh's deposition shows, that Magee offered at the time to give up the lands to McNeil, for $5,000 less than the sum for which they were set off to him; and McNeil was unwilling even to offer for them more than $20,000. All these lands (excepting those mortgaged to Margaret Magee) were mortgaged to Simon Eliot, by Magee, in December, 1814, (more than three years after the award,) as security for $9,800, and for other purposes, with a power to sell, and subject to a prior incumbrance to Jonathan Amory, in March, 1809, for $3,000 and interest. By subsequent assignments and conveyances, the whole became vested in Amos Binney; but there is no evidence of the exact amount realized therefor. But from the silence of all parties on this head, connected with the averments in the answers, and other circumstances in proof, there is no reason to presume, that it exceeded the mortgages. So that, at the utmost, the available proceeds of the lands awarded to Magee, (including the premises mortgaged to Margaret Magee,) so far as they can be traced, may be presumed not to have exceeded the sum of $22,550. In fact, the answer of Magee's administrator avers, that there was a loss to Magee of $5,000 exclusive of interest. In what manner this depreciation was occasioned, it would perhaps be difficult, if not impossible, at this distance of time, precisely to ascertain. But we have a right to presume, that the land was in 1811 worth the full amount at which it was estimated by the arbitrators. It did not realize. that amount when sold. The loss (whatever it was) actually fell upon Magee. This court has no right to say, that the same loss would have occurred if McNeil had punctually, when he was requested, executed the release. The original offer of Magee to take $5,000 less than his claim, is no proof that the land was not at that time worth the full sum awarded, for it probably was an offer to buy peace; and at all events it demonstrated, that a prompt realization of the value of the lands was, in Magee's own view, of great importance to his interest. In fact, if the court were compelled to judge of the injury to Magee by the imperfect facts before it, it would not be an irrational conclusion, that the refusal of McNeil up to the sale in 1814, had worked an injury to Magee exceeding the full value of the lands awarded to McNeil. He was entitled to a perfect, unclouded title, in a time of peace; and he was compelled to sell the lands, without any such benefit, in a time of war. Indeed, the argument from the defect of title, is pressed upon the court under another aspect by the plaintiff's counsel, against the defendants now in this cause; and it is urged, that they purchased cheaply from the very circumstance that there was a cloud upon the title. They purchased for $3300, upon the face of their deeds, though, from some unexplained circumstance, I find it stated in the answer of the administrator, that Magee realized no more than $2600.

The answer of the administrator relies upon this delay and refusal of McNeil, as a justification of Magee in selling the lands awarded to McNeil to indemnify himself for his losses and damages. Now, this court certainly cannot justify such a procedure. It is no excuse for A, that he sells B's lands, because B has injured him to an extent equal to their value. The act is, in point of law, utterly indefensible. But when a court of equity is asked to compel a specific performance in a case of injurious delay, voluntary and unjustifiable on the part of him, who seeks the aid of the court, it is bound to look at that fact, and to consider, whether it ought to be active in his favour. It has a right under such circumstances to say, that it will leave the parties to their respective remedies at law for mutual damages, rather than hazard a decree, which might administer justice only on one side. But to this presumption of loss and injury, there are to be added the lapse of time, and laches of the plaintiff, and a material change of circumstances in the intermediate period. Twelve years elapsed after the award, before the original bill was filed. Five years more, before the plaintiff admitted the validity of the award, and, by an amendment, confined his claim to the title derived under it. Magee died in 1823 insolvent, and before he had made any answer to the bill; and the equities between him and McNeil are now to be ascertained and litigated by persons, who are utter strangers to all the original transactions.

Now, I have not been able to find a single case, where a court of equity has decreed a specific performance under circumstances like the present. Lapse of time is sometimes overlooked, but only when there has been reasonable diligence by the party seeking a decree; or, as some of the cases say, where "he has shown himself ready, desirous, prompt, and eager." Milward v. Earl Thanet, 5 Ves. 720, note; Sugd. Vend. c. 8. § 1. Laches may be excused; but it must be under strong controlling circumstances. Sugd. Vend. c. 8, § 1; Benedict v. Lynch, 1 Johns. Ch. 370. But where a party has perseveringly, through a course of years, resisted the performance of an agreement, denying its validity; where he has taken no step towards a performance on his own part, and has repelled the advances on the other side, no case can, as I believe, be found. at least in modern times, in which a court of equity has interfered in his favour. Especially will such a court be disinclined so to do, where the other party has expressed a willingness to perform; where a presumed injury has arisen to him from the lapse of time; where the rights of third persons have intervened; where the circumstances of the parties have changed; and where death and insolvency have materially affected the remedy, which third persons may have in the premises, in respect to their own grantor. It is no sufficient answer, as has been already intimated, that Magee was unable at the time to give a deed free of his own incumbrances. The objection was not insisted on at the time, and was capable of being removed. The award itself provided a remedy by the covenants in the deed to secure the party against any such incumbrances; and at law the existence of incumbrances would not have been fatal to the award. I do not say, that a court of equity would not upon an early application have given relief in such a case; and would not have withheld a specific performance from Magee, until he had removed those incumbrances; or upon the application of McNeil would not have decreed him a compensation or indemnity pro tanto.[6] But the remedy of McNeil was just as perfect then, as it ever could be; and his long delay had a natural tendency to aggravate every evil on the other side. At this distance of time, when Magee himself is dead, it is not in the power of any court of equity to ascertain with exactness the amount of injury to Magee by that delay.[7] And it is not the habit of courts of equity to decree compensation in cases of specific performance for mere laches or delay; but compensation is usually, if not invariably, decreed upon other distinct grounds.[8] Upon this point of the case, therefore, if the question were, whether Magee himself, being before the court, as sole defendant, ought to be compelled to a specific performance at such a distance of time, under all the circumstances, there would be much room for hesitation. How could this court assume, that he had not been damnified by the delay, and refusal to perform the award. If damnified, in what manner is this court to exercise jurisdiction to decree compensation; and how is it to measure the damages? But Magee having sold, and the interests of third persons having intervened, it is plain, that no decree for a specific performance can operate, except through a vendee's holding the title. The question then, even if Magee were living a co-defendant, would become far more complicated and difficult. A decree on the part of the court for a specific performance would require it to interpose its active aid to strip these vendees of their title and possession in favour of a party, who had chosen to lay by for a great length of time, and had exhibited no legal, or reasonable diligence. I will not attempt to disguise, that I should feel the most serious difficulties in arriving at such a decree, even if the vendees had the most unequivocal notice of the plaintiff's equity.

But let us see how the case stands as to the vendees now before the court, not only in respect to notice, but to the equities, which are set up by them in their defence. In the first place as to notice. The defendants claim under a registered title from Magee, whose title is also registered. The plaintiff originally claimed under the agreement of 1808, which was not registered until more than a year and a half afterwards. He now claims under the award, which has never been registered at all. In each case his claim is to an equity. Now, it is the settled doctrine, that under such circumstances, where relief is sought against a purchaser, there must be clear and undoubted notice; and that suspicion, even strong suspicion, is not sufficient. Sugd. Vend. c. 16, art. 4, § 5; Hine v. Dodd, 2 Atk. 276; Wyatt v. Barwell, 19 Ves. 439. It is contended in the first place, that the defendants had constructive notice of the original agreement from its registry, although not referred to in the conveyances to Magee; and that its contents were sufficient to put them upon inquiry. Unless that agreement was properly matter for registry under the Massachusetts statutes of registry, there is no pretence to say, that it was constructive notice to any person.[9] Now I very much doubt, whether the agreement, disconnected as it was from the conveyances, was proper matter for registry under the act of 1783, c. 37, or the act of 1802, c. 33. The agreement was not in any legal sense a defeasance. It was not intended wholly to defeat the conveyances in a given event. Nor was it an incumbrance on the estates conveyed. On the contrary, it was the intention of both parties, that Magee should have a complete power to make absolute titles to purchasers; and in the event of notice to him of dissatisfaction, he was to reconvey the lands remaining unsold by him, and account for all sales and purchases antecedently made. I do not know that it has ever been held under these acts of registry, that a collateral, disconnected agreement between the parties, merely affecting the title to lands, must be registered. But supposing it otherwise; still the agreement itself admits the right of Magee to make sales, until it is rescinded by a notice of the dissatisfied party; and such notice is independent of the record, and must be established by competent proofs, aliunde. No such proofs exist in this case. Magee, at the time of the sale, was in possession of the legal title. The deed, under which he claimed, contained no reference to any collateral agreement. He had a right to sell; and no purchaser was bound to make inquiry, whether there had been any revocation of such right. The existence of the right was fairly presumable, until notice of the contrary was given by McNeil, either personally, or by some act of public notoriety. Then as to the award, it was never registered; nor was it in fact entitled to registry. Notice of its existence therefore must be established by matter in pais. The defendants positively deny in their answers, that they had notice of any legal or equitable title in the plaintiff, at or before their respective purchases, or of the award itself, until the commencement of the present suit. The answers do not, as technically they should, deny notice at the time of the payment of the purchase money. But no exception has been taken to them on this head; and it may be fairly presumed, that they paid the money at the time of their purchases. They add, that McNeil must have known, that after the purchases, the defendants were going on, making valuable improvements on the lands; and yet that he never gave them any notice of his title; and in this respect suffered them to be misled. Against these positive denials in the answers, there ought to be strong evidence of notice to overturn their force.

The evidence of notice adduced on behalf of the plaintiff, with a single exception, is founded upon the notoriety of the submission and award, and the disputes about the title between McNeil and Magee in Charlestown, where the lands lie, and the defendants lived at the time of their purchases. To give the evidence any application, it should distinctly point to the period of the purchases, or payments of the purchase money. Any notoriety at a subsequent time cannot invalidate rights antecedently vested. There is abundance of testimony, that of late years there has been in Charlestown an extensive, if not a general, notoriety of some claim of title to the lands by McNeil. The exact manner, in which that claim of title was asserted by McNeil, whether under the award or otherwise, was not as well defined, nor marked with so much notoriety. It appears, however, to have created sufficient alarm in the minds of some of the purchasers under Magee, to induce them to obtain, for valuable considerations, quitclaims from McNeil. But the difficulty is, to trace back that notoriety to a period antecedent to June, 1814, that being the latest period at which any sale of the lands awarded to McNeil was made by Magee. Fosdick purchased in June, 1811; Wheeler purchased one parcel of land in June, 1813, and another in June, 1814; Adams purchased in November, 1813; and Collier purchased in April, 1814. These purchases include all the lands awarded to McNeil, except a strip, which has been appropriated as a street, called Lawrence street. Much of the testimony, as to the time of the notoriety, is quite loose and unsatisfactory; and that which approaches nearest to the period of the purchases is not exact, and does not (with one exception) fix personal notice upon any of the purchasers from Magee. That it is strong enough however, to be left to a jury to infer notice, may be admitted; but this, in a court of equity, is not sufficient to outweigh the direct denial of an answer. There must at least be one positive witness, and cogent circumstances in support of his testimony, to enable a court of equity to overrule the effect of such an answer. Now the inference, generally deducible from notoriety, is in the present case somewhat shaken by the fact, that numerous witnesses, living in the same town and neighbourhood, were ignorant of the claim of McNeil and of the award, until a comparatively recent period before the commencement of the present suit. This ignorance it is difficult to account for, unless upon the supposition, that the notoriety was far less than some of the other witnesses suppose. And at all events it demonstrates, that a purchase might well have been made without actual or constructive notice. To this extent it fortifies the denials of the answers. What adds some confirmation is, that almost all of the purchasers have since made valuable improvements and erections on their estates, and that McNeil, though living in Charlestown, or its vicinity, during this period, has suffered these improvements to go on, without, as far as the court can learn, ever having given personal notice or warning to any of the purchasers. The answers of the defendants put this fact sufficiently before the plaintiff to have drawn forth some evidence on this head, at least to repel the claim for improvements, if it could have been fairly rebutted. And I cannot but think, that the testimony of Mr. Holden, one of the arbitrators, who resided in Charlestown, is entitled to some consideration, in the statement which he makes, that the rumour or report of the award, and that a quitclaim was necessary from McNeil, was not, to his knowledge, current in Charlestown, until two or three years after the award was made, when purchases began to be made of lots of the land. In respect, therefore, to the purchasers generally, although there is strong evidence of the notoriety, sufficient to raise a just suspicion of notice, I cannot say, that according to the rules of a court of equity it is so strong, as to put the stamp of falsity upon the direct denials of the answers. The exception, to which allusion has been made, is the testimony of Mr. Sawyer in respect to the purchase made by the defendant, Adams. This witness testifies to a conversation with Adams, soon after his purchase, under circumstances so peculiar, that it is difficult to resist the belief that Adams had notice at the time of his purchase, if the credibility of the witness is not impeached. It is true, that the witness is manifestly mistaken as to time, for he puts the occurrences in 1815 or 1816, whereas Adams purchased in November, 1813. But such a mistake would not ordinarily be fatal to his general credit. Still, giving the fullest effect to the testimony of this witness, it is but one witness against the positive denial of Adams's answer; and I am not satisfied, that the other circumstances do carry with them such positive force, as entitle the court to disregard that answer.

In respect to Wheeler, who was not an original defendant, but who died before he could answer, after he was made a party, I do not find, that it is any where stated directly in the answers of the defendants, that he was a purchaser without notice, though some of the averments seem intended to include him in this predicament, but are not pointedly drawn. It is matter of regret with me, that this omission, which is obviously a clerical slip, should have occurred. The point, which it raises, is somewhat nice and difficult, but upon which, after full deliberation, I have come to a settled conclusion. The point is this,—whether a plaintiff, setting up an equitable title against a legal title in purchasers, (it may be different, where it is an equity against an equity,) is not bound to aver in his bill, that these purchasers had notice of his title; and if so bound, then, whether he is not bound to prove at the hearing the fact of notice, unless it is distinctly admitted by the answers of the defendants. I think, that he is so bound in both respects. It appears to me, that the legal title is a sufficient protection to the defendants, and that a court of equity cannot displace that title, in favour of a mere equitable title, unless, assuming all the facts stated in the bill to be true, these facts justify a decree in favour of the equitable title. Now, where the bill itself sets up a legal title in purchasers, an equity does not attach to the estate in their hands, unless they have notice of it. And, therefore, notice must be averred in the bill; otherwise the plaintiff has no case. It is true, that upon a bill filed calling for a discovery of title from a purchaser of the legal estate, as well as for relief, he may, if he pleases, interpose, as a bar to the discovery and relief, the plea, that he is a purchaser without notice at the time of his purchase, and payment of the purchase money. And in such a case his plea will be bad, without such an averment and denial of notice; and if notice is charged in the bill without a supplemental answer, also denying that notice as charged in support of his plea. But the reason is, that by the plea he sets up a positive bar to all further inquiry and all discovery. If, instead of such plea, he chooses to answer generally and go to a hearing, he may well do so. And in such a case the parties stand exactly as they do in all other cases, that is to say, the plaintiff must prove all the allegations in his bill necessary to establish his right to a decree, unless so far as they are admitted by the answer. If the answer omits to deny the notice charged in the bill, that is no admission of the notice. The plaintiff may object to the answer for insufficiency in this respect, as he may for insufficiency as to any other fact charged. But if he takes no exception, and the cause goes to a hearing upon the general replication, it is a waiver of the exception, and the plaintiff must prove his case. If notice is essential to a decree, he must affirmatively establish it; for that is the whole foundation of equitable relief against the legal title. Some obscurity is thrown over this subject by confounding cases, where a preliminary objection is taken by way of plea, or special answer, as a bar to all further discovery and relief; with cases where there is a full and general answer and hearing, upon the whole merits. This is not the place to go into a full vindication of this doctrine, though it appears to me supported by a close comparison of the authorities, keeping in view the distinction alluded to.[10]

In my view of the matter, therefore, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to establish affirmatively, that Wheeler had notice, before the court can take from his grantees the legal estate vested in them, even supposing notice to have been brought home to the latter at their respective purchases from him. I do not dwell on this last consideration, though there is much room for observation, because there is not sufficient proof to affect the original purchasers with notice, and therefore it is not necessary to consider, how the case would otherwise stand as to notice to the subpurchasers under them. It is also a circumstance not altogether to be passed over, that Magee being dead and his estate insolvent, and the defendants having made expensive improvements upon their estates, they can, in case of a decree against themselves, have no remedy over upon their covenants of warranty against Magee, or his representatives. If McNeil, instead of lying by for so great a length of time, had pressed for redress at an early period, they might have had an effectual remedy over. I lay no stress upon the releases which the defendants have procured from Binney, because they operate as a simple extinguishment of his claim against them under the mortgage to Carey, assigned to Amory, and by him to Binney. They do not purport to assign any title, or grant an interest in or under that mortgage to either of the releases; and therefore create no bar in the way of the plaintiff.

Upon the whole, the conclusion to which my mind has arrived is, that there would be great difficulties in the way of relief for the plaintiff, if Magee were now before the court, as sole owner and defendant; that

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Sept., 1873.

ARMY AND NAVY—ENLISTMENT OF MINOR—BY WHOM AVOIDED.

1. By the common law of Massachusetts, a minor has not the legal capacity to make a contract of enlistment in the marine corps.

2. The only statute which authorizes such an enlistment is that of June 12, 1858 (11 Stat. 318), which applies only to boys under eighteen years old, and requires the consent of their parents.

3. A minor over eighteen and under twenty-one years of age cannot be lawfully enlisted in the marine corps, without the consent of his parents.

[Cited in Re Chapman, 37 Fed. 330.]

4. Such a contract may be avoided by the minor himself, as well as by the parent, or the United States.

[Cited in Re Wall, 8 Fed. 86; Re Baker, 23 Fed. 31; Re Chapman, 37 Fed. 331. Disapproved in Re Cosenow, Id. 670.]

These two cases were alike in their facts, and were tried together. Two boys, eighteen years old, left their homes together, and enlisted in the marine corps, without the knowledge or consent of their parents. One of them had only a mother living. It was alleged that the boys were drunk; but the court did not examine that question. They told the enlisting officer that they were of full age, and there was no reason to suppose that he doubted their statement.

LOWELL, District Judge. Until the year 1858 there was no statute expressly regulating the age, size, citizenship, or other qualifications for recruits in the marine corps. It was necessary to look to the law of the army, or to that of the navy, and the authorities were not, perhaps, entirely agreed which should be the guide. The importance of the decision, as far as minors were concerned, was this, that it was considered by many responsible authorities that boys might be enlisted in the navy, though they could not in the army, without the consent of their parents or guardians. Com. v. Gamble, 11 Serg. & R. 93; U. S. v. Bainbridge [Case No. 14,497]; U. S. v. Stewart [Id. 16,400]. It is not, however, unimportant to observe that U. S. v. Bainbridge, so often cited as a decision of this point, does not decide it; because the district judge agreed to the judgment on a wholly different ground, and upon this question expressed his dissent from the reasoning and conclusions of the presiding justice. Judge Davis' dissent had equal legal force with Mr. Justice Story's affirmation, though, being a mere statement of an opinion, without reasons, it may not be of equal persuasive power on the minds of others. So the case in Crabbe is not a decision, but notes collected by the judge in preparation for a decision which became unnecessary. On the other side is the able and elaborate opinion of Shaw, C. J., giving the judgment of the supreme court of Massachusetts, that a minor could not be lawfully enlisted in the navy without the consent of his guardian. Com. v. Downes, 24 Pick. 227.

A few months after this last decision was made, congress took up the matter, and passed the act of March 2, 1837 (5 Stat. 153), authorizing the enlistment of boys for the navy, between the ages of thirteen and eighteen, to serve until their majority, with the consent of their parents. This statute appears to dispose of the question. It was argued, indeed, in the cases now before me, that any one over eighteen years of age could be enlisted in the navy without consent, and that the marine corps follows the rules of the navy. But congress undoubtedly were informed that the main argument of those courts and judges who held the contract to be valid without consent was founded, almost entirely, upon the fact that the statutes provided for the enlistment of boys, and were silent as to consent. When, therefore, the legislature defined the persons who should be considered boys, and required the consent of parents to their enlistment, it destroyed this argument, and left other minors to be considered as men; and thenceforward those who would maintain their power to contract for naval service, without consent, must show that they have it by the common law of the state where the contract is made. Whatever decisions there may be elsewhere, the supreme court of Massachusetts have always maintained that such a contract is not one that a minor is capable of making. Kimball's Case, 9 Law Rep. 500; Com. v. Cushing, 11 Mass. 67; Com. v. Downes, 24 Pick. 227.

In this court, since the statute of 1837, the decisions have been similar. No opinion has been published; but Judge Sprague has discharged minors from the naval service who were eighteen years old, and had enlisted without consent. Chapman's Case, 45 Dist. Ct. Rec. p. 174.[2] The statute of May 15, 1872, requires the written consent of parents for the enlistment of minors in the military service. The act of June 12, 1858 (11 Stat. 318), authorizes the enlistment of boys between eleven and seventeen years old in the marine corps, with consent, to serve until they shall be twenty-one years old.

Considering all these statutes, I think it may be taken as the will of congress, that minors shall not be enlisted in any branch of the service without the consent of their parents. Such has always been the rule in the army, excepting for a short time during war. In the navy, a difference of opinion in the courts was settled by congress in favor of the necessity for consent. In the marine corps, the only statute which touches this subject requires consent. In my opinion, therefore, this contract is one not authorized by the common law, nor by any act of congress. And I have no doubt the rule is the same throughout the United States. It certainly is so in this commonwealth. The colonel commanding who holds these recruits, submitting the case to the judgment of the court upon the law, very frankly admitted that he could not, consistently with his orders, knowingly enlist minors without consent; which shows that the executive department agrees with the courts in the construction I have put upon the law, or else that the government does not need or desire men between eighteen and twenty-one years old; and in either case these enlistments are voidable by the minors themselves, or by their parents, as well as by the government, who have been misled by a false statement. One of these boys has no father, and it has been held that a mother has no claim to her son's services. Com. v. Murray, 4 Bin. 487. But the same court held that the mother is a parent, within the enlistment acts. Com. v. Callan, 6 Bin. 255. And this is the plain meaning of the acts. But that matter is unimportant, as the minor himself desires to set aside this contract. Petition granted.

TRIAL—PRODUCTION OF PAPERS—ORDER OF COURT—REASONABLE NOTICE.

1. To enable a party to call upon the other party to produce papers at the trial, there must be an order of the court upon the party to produce them; that order must be served a reasonable time before the time for producing them; and there must be reasonable notice, also, of the motion for the order.

[See Bank of U. S. v. Kurtz, Case No. 920.]

2. When a juror is withdrawn on the motion of the plaintiff and consent of the defendant, who elects a continuance of the cause, he is not entitled to costs also.

R. S. Coxe, for plaintiff, having given notice to the defendant to produce them, called for a certain letter and notice of demand and notice of protest.

Mr. Morfit produced the defendant's affidavit, that he had searched diligently for the letter and could not find it. He contended that the defendant was not bound to produce the notice, as there had been no order of the court to produce it, and no notice of a motion for such an order.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) said that there must be an order of the court for the production of the papers, which order must be served upon the party a reasonable time before the time for producing them; and that the party must have reasonable notice of the motibn for the order.

On motion of Mr. Coxe, and with the assent of the defendant's counsel, a juror was withdrawn, and the cause continued; THE COURT said it must be without costs, as the defendant had elected a continuance.

1. In a suit for wages, or for a share in a whaling voyage, if the defence sets up misconduct, there must be a special allegation of the facts, with due certainty of time, place, and other circumstances; otherwise the court will reject it. Loose allegations of general misconduct are insufficient.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

Libel [by John M. Thompson against Ichabod Macomber and others] for the share of the libellant, as cooper on a whaling voyage to the Pacific Ocean and back to the United States. The answer admitted the service and share of the party; but asserted gross misbehavior, as incurring a forfeiture. The decree of the district court was in favor of the libellant, from which an appeal was taken.

E. & F. Bassett, for libellant.

Simmons & Fletcher, for respondents.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is a libel for the share of the libellant, as cooper of the ship Maine, of the proceeds of a whaling voyage to the Pacific Ocean and back to the United States, brought against the respondents, as owners of the ship. There is no controversy, that the service has been duly performed by the libellant for the voyage, and that he is entitled to the proceeds of his share of the earnings of the voyage, unless the matters of defence, set up in the answer, constitute a legal bar to the claim. The answer, in the first place, asserts, that the libellant "did not, and would not, though often thereto requested and ordered by the master and other lawful officers of the ship, obey the said master and officers having command and charge of the ship, but wholly neglected and refused so to do; and disobeyed their lawful commands, and violated his contract and agreement, and became mutinous, and attempted to excite a mutiny on board said ship, while at sea at divers times." Whatever may be the sufficiency of such an allegation in a declaration at common law, founded on the shipping articles, as it has no specification of time, place, occasion, or other circumstances, it is far too loose and general in its texture to found any defensive allegation in proceedings in the admiralty. Every charge of such a nature is there expected to be propounded, or, as it is technically phrased, articulated, in distinct articles in the answer, with due certainty of time, place, and other circumstances, so that the court may distinctly see, to what charges in particular the evidence applies. If, therefore, a preliminary exception had been taken to the admission of the charge, thus generally and loosely framed, I should not have doubted, that the charge ought to have been expunged from the answer. As it is, I am clearly of opinion, that it is wholly insufficient in point of law to be acted upon by this court; and therefore, I should, if I did not deem it unsupported by the evidence, (as I certainly do,) deliver myself from all consideration of it. Where a charge of general and habitual misconduct is to be made out, it should be propounded in exact terms for the purpose; where specific acts of misconduct are to be relied on, they should be specifically put in issue, with due certainty and exactness of statement.

But the more important matter of defence, asserted by the answer, is, that on the return voyage, to wit, on the 10th of February, 1832, while the ship lay at Stonington in Connecticut, where she had been waiting for the opportunity of favorable winds and weather to return to her proper home port of destination, (Fairhaven, in Massachusetts,) and when orders were given to prepare for going to sea, the libellant used abusive language to the second mate of the ship, and refused obedience to orders; and clenched and assaulted the second mate; and told the chief mate he ought to be murdered; and assaulted and abused the chief mate; and conducted himself in so insolent and mutinous a manner, as to excite a mutinous spirit in many of the crew; so that the pilot on board refused to proceed to sea with the libellant on board; and it was in fact unsafe so to do; and that when the libellant had been secured, and before the pilot could get the ship out to sea, the wind changed, and the ship got upon dangerous rocks, and was greatly damaged; all of which damage was sustained in consequence of the very gross and mutinous misconduct of the libellant, and his disobedience of the lawful commands of the master and officers. The answer farther asserts, that the libellant was logged for the said offence by an entry in the log-book; and that the master went on shore, and entered a protest against him; and was obliged to confine, and did confine him, and keep him confined until the ship was moored in Fairhaven, where he was committed to prison in due form for trial for his mutinous conduct; and he did not return to the ship again. And it proceeds to allege, that the premises constitute a legal cause of forfeiture of the libellant's share of the proceeds; and that the damage sustained exceeds the value of that share.

The charge thus set up in its actual presentation is certainly of a very high and aggravated nature. If it were completely borne out in its full extent by the evidence, it would call for the severe animadversion of the court. Some parts of the charge are, however, wholly unsupported, not only in form, but in substance. Thus, the answer would lead us to suppose, that the ship's going on shore, and receiving an injury was the direct and immediate effect of the misconduct of the libellant. Now, the fact is, that the misconduct of the libellant, whatever it was, took place early in the morning of the 10th of February, 1832. The master went on shore and made a protest, and after several hours' absence returned on board again; and the wind having then shifted, it became improper to put to sea; and the ship during the succeeding night, by the violence of a storm, drifted her anchors and went ashore. So that the injury in no sense, legal or moral, resulted from the misconduct of the libellant, but was a mere maritime casualty. The damage, then, was not attributable at all to the libellant. It was not a consequence of his misconduct, but remote and contingent. And he is not in any measure responsible for it; for the rule of law, as well as of common sense, is, "Causa proxima, non remota, spectatur."

As little foundation is there, in my judgment, for the charge, that there was real danger to the ship in putting to sea with the libellant on board, from any mutiny of the crew. No such spirit was exhibited on their part, and no disobedience of orders ensued; although, if some parts of the testimony are to be believed, the libellant endeavoured to provoke them to it. And if the libellant's being on board was dangerous to the safety of the ship, it was clearly the duty of the master to put him on shore, and not to hazard the voyage by retaining him, as he did, on board in irons. This act cannot, as I think, be fairly under the circumstances attributed to a mere desire to provide for the safety of the ship; for that might have been accomplished by the more summary process of dismissal; but to a desire to punish the libellant for his misconduct. That all the rest of the crew duly performed their duty at Stonington, and until the termination of the voyage, without any insubordination, is manifested by the whole tenor of the evidence.

The case, then, stands singly upon the asserted misconduct of the libellant in disobedience of orders, in using insulting language, and in assaulting and striking the chief and the second mate at the time stated in the answer. And my opinion is, upon a review of the whole evidence, that the charge is distinctly in substance made out. It is sufficiently apparent, that the libellant and the second mate entertained no very good will towards each other; and that the libellant was not slow to use his opportunities to exhibit it. His conduct on the preceding evening was very gross and insulting, and utterly without excuse; though it did not amount to any thing more than contumacy and abusive language. And, as far as the conduct of the second mate has appeared in evidence, it was certainly that of a civil and humane officer. The truth seems to be, that the libellant is a man of quick passions and resentments, and could ill brook the commands and authority of the second mate, who was a foreigner by birth, (a Portuguese,) and towards whom he indulged a good deal of that contempt and pique, which is certainly an infirmity, if not a disease, in the American nautical character. That, in the affray on the morning of the 10th of February, the libellant was greatly to blame, if not wholly without excuse, is in my judgment clearly established by a decided preponderance of the evidence. I am also satisfied, that he struck both the first and second mate without any suitable justification. He was in a furious passion, and gave way the more readily to it, thinking that in the American waters he could more freely exercise his rights, according to his own boastful language, than he dared to do under the guns of a Portuguese fort. It is high time he should learn, that the American laws protect no man in insolence, disobedience of orders, mutinous conduct, or personal attacks; and least of all, protect the crew of a ship in such conduct towards their superior officers. The master was, therefore, fully justified in putting him in irons on this occasion by way of punishment, as well as of security. And I cannot but think, that the subsequent conduct of the libellant during the passage to Fairhaven was such as aggravated the original offence. It was not wholly without contrition, but in a spirit of cool and determined bravado. If a different course of conduct had been pursued, there might have been much to mitigate the offence; for repentance and an offer to return to duty are of high value and import in the maritime law. As the case stands, I should ill administer the true principles of that law, if I did not say, that the case called upon the court for an exemplary admonition. I do not think, that under all the circumstances I should be justified, for a single offence of this nature, in declaring a total forfeiture of the libellant's share of the proceeds. But I shall direct a deduction to be made of one hundred dollars from the amount remaining due; and each party must bear his own costs in this court. In other respects the decree of the district court is to be affirmed.

It is proper to add, that the main evidence, by which my judgment has been influenced in this decision, was never brought before the district court; so that there is no reason to consider, that there would have been the slightest difference of opinion upon this case between my learned brother and myself, if we had been called to decide it upon a similar posture of the evidence. Decree accordingly.

SEAMEN'S WAGES — DEDUCTIONS FOR BOARD AND TRANSPORTATION AFTER WRECK—BRITISH LAW.

[Under the acts of parliament it is the duty of British consuls in foreign countries to find conveyance home for the sailors of a wrecked British vessel; and where the master, without communicating with the consul, assumes his duties in this respect, the resulting expenses for board and transportation of the seamen cannot be deducted from their wages, which are to be estimated up to the day of the wreck.]

[This was a libel by Macpherson and others against the British barque Blytheswood, J. F. Long, master, to recover seamen's wages.]

R. P. Kane and B. Rush, for libellant.

B. Gerhard, for respondent.

Before KANE, District Judge.

This case was partially heard and was continued to hear an argument on the point "whether the expenses of boarding the men and transporting them to Philadelphia, after the wreck, formed a legal charge, to be deducted from their wages?"

THE COURT held, that under the acts of parliament, the responsibility is thrown upon her Britannic majesty's consul to find a conveyance for the seamen to their own country, upon receiving information of the wreck from the surviving officers of the vessel. In this case, no communication was made to the consul, and the master assumed the duties of the consulate. Although the consul might in his discretion, reimburse the captain, the expenses thus assumed and paid by that officer formed no legal charge against the wages due the men. These wages to be estimated up to the day of the wreck. Decree accordingly.

EXECUTION SALES—LAND—ERRONEOUS DESCRIPTION—SUMMARY RELIEF—CALL OF DEED—NATURAL OBJECTS.

1. A sale had been made by the marshal, under an erroneous description of the premises, and was set aside. "The court, exercising under the long established practice of the state courts, as well as of this court, a kind of mixed jurisdiction, will afford a similar relief. If the case were complicated, and especially if there were contradictory evidence, the court might think it most proper to rerer the parties to a more formal trial of their rights, on the law or equity side of the court, as might be selected. But no such objections arise in this case to prevent the court from granting relief in a summary way."

2. There is no principle of land law more firmly settled in this, and probably most of the states, in respect to country lands, than this: that where the calls of a deed or other instrument are for natural, or well known artificial objects, both course and distance, when inconsistent with such calls, must give way and be disregarded. This rule is founded upon the soundest reason and good sense, and is equally so in its application to town lots.

[Cited in Riley v. Griffin, 16 Ga. 141.]

At law.

Mr. Binney, for the rule.

Mr. Ewing, against it.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. This case comes before the court upon a rule to show cause, why so much of the marshal's sale as regards a three story brick house and lot, in the borough of Carlisle, should not be set aside. The facts are, that under a fieri facias, issued upon a judgment obtained by the plaintiff against the defendant in this court, certain property was levied upon, amongst which was a house and lot, the sale of which has given rise to this rule. It is thus described in the schedule annexed to the execution, and referred to in the return; "levied on a three story brick house, and part of a lot of ground on Hanover street, in the borough of Carlisle, in the county of Cumberland, containing in breadth on the said Hanover street thirty feet, and extending in length or depth two hundred and forty feet, to an alley adjoining the bank of Carlisle; and other property." The lot, thus described, was afterwards condemned by an inquisition; was ordered to be sold by a venditioni exponas; and was so advertised and sold in the city of Philadelphia, and the purchase money paid to the marshal. Kelker, the deputy marshal, who made the levy, deposes that, at the time he made it, the defendant gave him a verbal description of this property, which corresponded with that stated in the advertisement; that he told the defendant the sale would take place in Carlisle, where it could be put up agreeably to any description which might then be furnished him; that he afterwards informed the defendant that the sale was advertised to be made in Philadelphia, of which the defendant said he had heard, and that he then objected to the description of the property, and to the place of sale, and either then, or at some other time before the sale, showed the witness a diagram of the property, as he wished it to be sold, by which the lot in question appears to run back from Hanover street, one hundred feet, to a five foot alley adjoining the lot, on which is the bank of Carlisle. This witness further deposes, that at the sale, he put up this lot as running one hundred feet back; to which some persons present objected. But he does not say whether the objection induced him to make any, or what alteration in that description. It further appears, that under the above execution, a lot and stone building thereon, called the tavern lot, adjoining the above, and belonging to the defendant, was levied upon; but it was not sold. It is fully proved by the depositions, and it is also shown by the diagram exhibited upon this trial, that if the lot in question, which was sold, were to be extended two hundred and forty feet in depth, it would take in about one hundred and nine feet of ground, and nearly the whole of a large stone stable, standing on it, which since the year 1795, has been annexed to, and held and enjoyed by the occupants of the tavern lot, the loss of which, and also of three alleys with which the tavern lot communicates, and which would be the consequence of so extending the lot sold, would greatly impair the value of the tavern lot. At the time of the levy and sale, the tavern lot and stable, as laid down in the diagram, were in the possession of Mr. Armor, as a tenant to the defendant, and had been so for more than three years preceding. Upon these facts, it is perfectly clear, that the lot upon which the levy was made, extended back no farther than the five foot alley, adjoining the bank of Carlisle; that that part of the lot, and no other, was condemned, advertised, offered for sale, or sold. It is true, that the other part of the description, in regard to the number of feet back, cannot be answered by stopping at the above alley, and that there is consequently, an irreconcilable discrepance in the description.

We are therefore of opinion, that if the case stood singly upon the levy, inquisition, venditioni exponas, advertisement, and public declaration of the deputy marshal at the time of the sale, the purchaser could claim, and at law could recover, of this lot, only so far back as to the five foot alley adjoining the bank lot. No more of the lot was, in fact, sold, or intended to be sold, even by the marshal. There has then, obviously, been a mistake in this transaction; which, unless it be corrected by the court, would operate to the injury of the defendant, or of the purchaser, on whichever of them it might be visited. The purchaser, in fact, bought only to the alley, and yet it is manifest that he supposed he was buying to the depth of two hundred and forty feet, so as to include the stable adjoining the tavern lot. The defendant, on the other hand, never intended so to arrange these lots as to rob the tavern lot of improvements and easements so essential to its value, for the purpose of adding them to the other lot, without increasing its value in an equal degree. A court of equity, having such a case laid before it, would not hesitate to relieve the parties, or either of them, against the consequences of such a mistake, by setting aside the sale, unless the purchaser was willing to retain the property according to the boundaries, as they should be legally understood, that is, to the five foot alley. The court, exercising in this case under a long established practice of the state courts, as well as of this court, a kind of mixed jurisdiction, will afford a similar relief. If the case were complicated, and especially if there were contradictory evidence, the court might think it most proper to refer the parties to a more formal trial of their rights, on the law or equity side of the court, as might be selected. But no such objections arise in this case to prevent the court from granting relief in the summary way. We do not think that the purchaser is entitled either to interest, or to the costs of this motion, as he is, in truth, more benefited than the defendant, by having the sale set aside. We shall, however, permit the marshal to amend his return and the inquisition; the defendant's counsel having consented that he may do so, so as to extend the lot in question to the five foot alley. Rule made absolute.

McPHERSON v. GALLAGAN et al.

[1 Hayw. & H. 394.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 1, 1849.

CERTIORARI—MAGISTRATE'S COURT—ISSUES REGULARLY TRIED—AWARD BY JURY.

On a motion to dismiss a certiorari it was held that the writ would not lie to a magistrate's court where it appears on the record of said court that the issues below had been regularly tried on a traverse tendered by the petitioner, and the restitution awarded on an inquisition held by a jury.

Motion to dismiss certiorari and to award restitution.

The petition of Daniel McPherson respectfully showeth:

That in the month of March, 1846, General John P. Van Ness, late of the city of Washington, died seized of a large real estate situate in the said city, of which the north part of that lot of ground being on [Seventh] street, known and described on the ground plot of said city as lot numbered 1, in square 428, with the house thereon and appurtenances, formed a part. That in the summer of the year 1846, Governor Van

Ness, a brother of the said John P., and one of his heirs at law, who had entire control of his real estate aforesaid, put your petitioner into the peaceful and lawful possession of the said part of said lot and house thereon, with the appurtenances, which your petitioner has had and held from the summer aforesaid hitherto, and still has and holds, as tenant of the said Governor Van Ness. That the heirs of General John P. Van Ness have not, nor has the said Governor Van Ness, nor any person claiming under him, notified your petitioner that he or they or any of them wished to have again and repossess the premises aforesaid, or any part thereof. That in the month of June, in the present year, a man calling himself Dant, and two other men, the said Dant professing to act as the agent of James and Thomas Gallagan, of the city of Washington, called at the premises aforesaid and there and then demanded of your petitioner immediate possession of the same, which your petitioner refused to give, whereupon the said Dant and his said comrades commenced to take the windows out of the said house aforesaid, and it was with great difficulty your petitioner prevented the said parties from taking forcible possession of the premises aforesaid. That the said Dant and his said companions have since been tried and committed in our criminal court of a riot for their breach of the peace and acts aforesaid. That the said James and Thomas Gallagan have caused your petitioner to be proceeded against before John L. Smith and Thomas C. Donn, esquires, justices of the peace for Washington county, for a forcible entry and detainer. That the only acts charged and relied on as constituting the forcible entry and detainer complained of are your petitioner's refusal to surrender up the premises aforesaid to the said Dant, and your petitioner's resisting the said Dant and his associates in their said attempt to take forcible possession of the same in the month of June aforesaid. And your petitioner further shows, that in pursuance of a warrant issued by the said justices a jury was summoned and appeared on the premises aforesaid on Friday the 11th inst., and then and there convicted your petitioner of a forcible entry and detainer. Your petitioner, advised by a counsel learned in the law, and verily declares, and therefore charges that the said proceedings are unlawful and oppressive, and a manifest violation of his rights as a citizen of the city of Washington, and as the legal tenant of the premises aforesaid. Your petitioner therefore prays your honors to grant him the United States writ of certiorari to be directed to the said John L. Smith and Thomas C. Donn, commanding them to return and certify to this honorable court the warrant aforesaid by them to the marshal of the District of Columbia, and all proceedings had thereon as fully as the same now remains before them, and your petitioner will pray.

Wm. F. Percell and G. L. Giberson, for the petitioner.

The United States of America, District of Columbia, to wit:

To John L. Smith and Thomas C. Donn, Esquires, Justices of the Peace in and for the County of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and Each of Them, Greeting:

Whereas, a certain inquisition for a forcible entry and detainer was lately depending before you or one of you in the name of James and Thomas Gallagan against Daniel McPherson, late of said county, for a forcible, &c., which said inquisition, as it is said, is still depending before you or one of you, undetermined, and the circuit court here being willing, for certain reasons, to be certified of the said inquisition, therefore you and each of you are hereby commanded, that the inquisition aforesaid, together with all the proceedings thereon, as fully and entirely with all things touching the same, as it now remains before you or some of you, by whatsoever name the said James Gallagan and Thomas Gallagan, or either of them, may be called in the same, you or some of you certify to the said circuit court to be held at the city of Washington on the 3d Monday of October next, together with this writ, so that the said circuit court may be able to proceed thereon and do what shall appear to them of right ought to be done. Hereof fail not at your peril, and have you then and there this writ.

Witness the Hon. W. W. Cranch, Chief Judge, the 14th day of August, 1848.

The following is a summary of the proceedings had before the justices of the peace:

Writ of Inquisition.

District of Columbia, County of Washington, to wit:

We, Thomas C. Donn and John L Smith, Justices of the Peace of said County and District aforesaid, to the Marshal thereof, Greeting:

Whereas, complaints have been made before us that Daniel McPherson, of said district and county, did on the 22d day of June, 1848, with force and arms and with strong hands did unlawfully enter into and make forcible entry and detainer into the dwelling-house situate on 7th street, west side, between H and I streets, on the north quarter of lot numbered one (1) in square No. 428, whereof James Gallagan and Thomas Gallagan, trading under the firm name of J. Gallagan and Son, of said county, was then seized in his demesne as of fee, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided; therefore, in behalf of the United States, we do command you that you cause to come before us, on Friday, the 11th day of August, 1848, at 4 o'clock a. m., at the premises in said county, twenty-four sufficient and indifferent persons, dwelling near and about the said tenement so forcibly entered and detained as aforesaid, to enquire upon their oaths, for the United States, of and concerning the said forcible entry and detainer so made as aforesaid, and have you then and there this writ with the jury as aforesaid.

Given under our hands and seals this 12th day of August, 1848.

Plea of the Defendant.

United States vs. Daniel McPherson.

Forcible Entry and Detainer.

The defendant, by his counsel, Wm. F. Percell and G. L. Giberson, comes and denies and defends the alleged forcible entry and detainer or either, and upon this he puts himself upon his country.

Wm. F. Percell, Att'y.
G. L. Giberson, Att'y.

August 11th, 1848.

A jury was thereupon summoned and the inquisition was held and the jury found for the United States.

Upon which the defendant was required to appear before the justices, at the premises, on the 12th day of August, 1848, in the county, between the hours of three and four o'clock of the aforesaid day, to show cause, if any you can, why restitution of said tenement should be made to the said James and Thomas Gallagan.

The jury being summoned by the marshal to appear as aforesaid and being impanelled and sworn to speak the truth of and upon the premises before specified, do say upon their oaths that Daniel McPherson is guilty of the premises aforesaid in the inquisition above specified, as by the said inquisition is above found. Therefore it is considered by us, the justices aforesaid, that the said James and Thomas Gallagan have restitution of the premises aforesaid in as full and ample a manner as he had before the said disseizen by the said Daniel McPherson. And now here comes before us, the subscribers, &c., the writ of certiorari, &c.

Given under our hands and seals, this 14th day of August, 1848.

BY THE COURT. This cause having been heard and considered by the court on a motion to dismiss the certiorari, and it appearing by the record that the matter of fact, to wit, the forcible entry and detainer had been regularly tried, upon a traverse tendered by the petitioner, before the service of the certiorari, and restitution awarded but not executed; it is now considered by the court that the certiorari be dismissed with costs, and the justices proceed in the premises as if the certiorari had not issued; and that the clerk of this court do certify the same to said justices.

McQUAIN v. MELINE.

[4 Quart. Law J. 28.]

District Court, W. D. Virginia. Spring Term, 1858.

TAX TITLES—EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. Under the provisions of the Code of Virginia, when a sale of land has been made by a sheriff for the non-payment of taxes, and a conveyance has been made by the clerk of the county court, and recorded, such title as was in the person assessed with the taxes, at the beginning of the year for which the assessment was made, is vested in the purchaser, notwithstanding any irregularity in the proceedings, unless it appear on the face thereof.

2. Though the party in whose name the land was assessed, after the assessment, and before the sale, died, and under a decree against his heirs, the land was sold before the conveyance was made by the clerk in pursuance of the sale for the non-payment of taxes, the sale for the taxes will prevail against the sale under the decree.

3. The purchaser at the sale, for the non-payment of taxes, need not show the proceedings previous to the deed from the clerk to him, in order to recover on such title. The deed itself, when regular, is prima facie evidence that the proceedings were regular, and that the title passed.

4. The assessment of the land on the commissioner's book with the taxes, for the non-payment of which it is sold, is not a circumstance in relation to the sale, which is required to be recited in the deed from the clerk to the purchaser.

5. If the assessment be such a circumstance, a recital that the land was returned delinquent for the non-payment of the taxes, necessarily implies such previous assessment, and is sufficient.

BROCKENBROUGH, District Judge. This is an action of ejectment, originally brought in the circuit court of Gilmer, by Hugh McQuain against George Spurgeon, the tenant in possession, to recover a tract of 130 acres of land, situated in the county of Gilmer, on the Bear Fork of Cove creek. James F. Meline, the lessor of the original defendant, and a citizen of the state of Ohio, appeared, and was made defendant in place of his lessee, in pursuance of the provision of the Code of Virginia, p. 558, § 5. At the time of his appearance, the new defendant pleaded the general issue, and presented a petition to the state court, alleging that he was a citizen of the state of Ohio, and praying on that ground a removal of the cause to this court, in virtue of the act of congress in such case made and provided. The requirements of the act of congress having been complied with, the cause was regularly transferred to the docket of this court.

The cause comes on now to be heard on a case agreed between the counsel for the parties respectively, the important facts of which will here be stated. On the 30th of November, 1838, a patent was issued from the land office of Virginia, granting the land in controversy, described as containing 130 acres, situated in Lewis county, on Big Cove creek, and setting out the metes and bounds thereof, to one Cummins E. Jackson, in absolute fee simple. At a subsequent period, the legislature of Virginia created the county of Gilmer, embracing that portion of the county of Lewis in which the land in controversy is situated. The identity of the land granted to Jackson with that in controversy between the parties here, is a fact found by the special case agreed between them.

The plaintiff claims under a tax title deed, made to him on the 20th day of August, 1853, by C. B. Conrad, clerk of the county court of Gilmer, conveying the land in controversy to the plaintiff, as purchaser thereof, at a sale made by the sheriff of Gilmer, of said land, as delinquent for the non-payment of taxes due by C. E. Jackson, to the commonwealth. The conveyance was made by the clerk in virtue of the sixteenth section of chapter 37, p. 203, of the Code of Virginia. The fact of the due election and qualification of the grantor as clerk of Gilmer, is established by the case agreed. The material recitals in the deed are that it appeared from the papers in the clerk's office of Gilmer county, that the land in controversy, together with four other tracts conveyed by the same deeds, was included in a list of delinquent lands delivered by the auditor of public accounts, to the sheriff of Gilmer, to be sold by him, in the year 1850; that it was reported as being delinquent for the non-payment of taxes due thereon for the years 1845, '46, '47, '48 and '49; that the said list was copied three times, and that one copy was posted at the front door of the court-house, with a notice subjoined that the real estate therein mentioned, would be sold at September court, 1850, of Gilmer, as appeared by a copy filed in the said clerk's office; that it also appeared by a list of the lands reported as having been sold by said sheriff, in the months of September and October, of the last mentioned years, and filed in the clerk's office, that the land in controversy, described as number 5, at the September term of the court, 1850, and on the 23d day of that month, was sold for the amount of tax due thereon, being 76 cents, and that the plaintiff became the purchaser thereof for that sum; that the tract in controversy was returned delinquent in the name of Cummins E. Jackson, and that the purchase money, fees and commisssion, were paid by the plaintiff to the deputy sheriff who made the sale, as appeared by his receipts in the hands of the plaintiff; that two years had elapsed since the sale, and the land had not been redeemed; that the whole tract was sold; that the plaintiff after the expiration of two years obtained from the surveyor of Gilmer a report of the tract so sold, which was presented to the county court of Gilmer, at its August term, 1853, and no objection appearing to it, the court ordered it to be recorded, which was accordingly done. The land was conveyed by metes and bounds, conforming to those set out and described in the original patent from the commonwealth to Cummins E. Jackson, of November, 1838, before referred to. The deed was acknowledged by the grantor before a justice of the peace for Gilmer, and admitted to record on the day of its date.

The defendant claims title to the land in controversy under a judicial sale made under a decree of the circuit court of Lewis county. On the 21st of June, 1848, certain creditors of C. E. Jackson filed their bill in chancery in the circuit court of Lewis county against him and others, seeking to subject his real estate to sale for the payment of his debts, he being then a non-resident of the state of Virginia. Pending the said cause C. E. Jackson died intestate, and the cause was revived against his heirs at law. On the 26th of March, 1853, the court pronounced a decree directing the real estate which had descended to the heirs at law of the debtor, to be sold by certain commissioners named in the decree. The real estate embracing the land in controversy here, was sold by the commissioners on the 20th of August, 1853, Joseph H. Dis Debar became the purchaser of the last mentioned tract at the price of $400.50, which sale was confirmed by the court by a decree rendered on the 27th of August, 1853; and by another decree rendered on the 6th of September, 1854, the commissioners were ordered to execute a deed conveying said land to Debar when he should pay the purchase money. Cummins E. Jackson died in California in December, 1849. It is ascertained by the special case that the land in controversy was worth $400 at the time of the sale made by the sheriff of Gilmer, for the taxes. The purchaser at the judicial sale sold, or contracted to sell, the said land and make a deed of conveyance thereof, to the defendant Meline, and the original defendant Spurgeon took possession of the land as tenant of the present defendant, Meline.

The general question of vital interest resulting from the facts thus agreed is, was the deed of the 26th of August, 1853, from the clerk of Gilmer, effectual to convey the legal title to the land in question, previously vested in C. E. Jackson by the commonwealth's patent of November, 1838, to the plaintiff here or not? If that deed was valid and effectual for that purpose, then, although its execution was subsequent in point of time to the rendition of the decree of the circuit court of Lewis, directing a sale of said land to satisfy the claims of the creditors of the patentee Jackson, yet it operated by relation to vest in the grantee such estate as was vested in the party assessed with the taxes, on account whereof the sale was made at the commencement of the year for which the said taxes were assessed, notwithstanding any irregularity in the proceedings under which the said grantee claims title, unless such irregularity appears on the face of the proceedings. Code Va. p. 240, § 22. If, on the other hand, there be any irregularity apparent upon the face of the proceedings, such as the act contemplates, such irregularity vitiated the deed, and made it a simple nullity. Accordingly the whole stress of the able and elaborate argument of the counsel on each side has been directed to this point, the counsel for the plaintiff maintaining the validity of the deed, and the counsel for the defendant insisting with great earnestness that it was inoperative and void. It is much to be regretted that, sitting as a federal court, I am called to break the way in the exposition of a most important statute of the state, not heretofore expounded by her own juducial tribunals; and my embarrassment is increased by the consideration that if I err in its interpretation, the error is one which cannot be reversed by writ of error from the supreme court of the United States, the amount in controversy not being sufficient to give jurisdiction to that tribunal. In construing the various sections of this statute which are pertinent to the question presented for solution, I am to place myself in the position of a state court called to expound them, and apply the same construction which that court would apply, as far as that can be ascertained by the light of reason and the analogies of the law; for it is a most wise and salutary provision of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], that the laws of the several states shall be rules of decision for the federal courts exercising jurisdiction within the territorial limits of such states respectively. Had these sections of the act of 1850 been expounded by the highest judicial tribunal of the state, that exposition would furnish an authoritative rule for the guidance of the judgment of this court, for it is well settled that the decision of the highest appellate court of a state, involving the construction of the statute law of the state, is the highest evidence of that law, and that the federal courts of every degree, including the supreme court of the United States, as well as all subordinate tribunals, are absolutely bound by such decision. But although the recent law in relation to the sale of lands delinquent for the non-payment of taxes due to the state, has not yet been expounded by her own courts, the provisions of former laws on the same subject, and very similar to the law now to be interpreted, have been fully expounded by the court of appeals in several recent cases, and I derived great aid in reaching a conclusion satisfactory to myself, from the light furnished by the luminous opinions of that court in the cases of Flanagan v. Grimmet, 10 Grat. 421, and Hobbs v. Shumates, 11 Grat. 516.

It is insisted by the counsel for the defendant, that there is an irregularity on the face of the proceedings sufficient to vitiate the deed, under which the plaintiff claims. It is said there is no recital or averment in the deed that the land in question had ever been assessed at all. It is certainly true that there is no such averment in express terms. The statute requires that the deed of the clerk conveying land sold for the non-payment of taxes to the purchaser, shall set forth all the circumstances appearing in the clerk's office in relation to the sale. Another statute requires that the assessors of the lands of the commonwealth deposit in the clerk's office of their respective courts lists, showing the assessed value of all the lands in the county, and the law presumes, in the absence of direct proof, that the public duty thus enjoined has been properly and rightfully performed. There was, then, in the clerk's office of Gilmer county, on the 20th day of August, 1853, record evidence that the land conveyed by the clerk to the plaintiff had been regularly assessed, and the amount of tax with which it had been charged. Was the fact of such assessment, one of the circumstances appearing in the clerk's office in relation sale, the failure to set forth which vitiated the deed? If it was necessary to set it forth in the deed, has not this been substantially done in averring that the land in controversy was delinquent for the non-payment of taxes due thereon, and the amount of those taxes? I shall briefly address myself to each of these questions in the order stated.

Does the omission to aver in express terms, in the deed, that the land sold as delinquent for the non-payment of taxes was duly assessed, vitiate the deed? There can be no question that the assessment of the land, as a matter of fact, lies at the foundation of the plaintiff's title, for if there was no assessment, no taxes were due, and if no taxes were due there could be no delinquency for their non-payment. A sale, therefore, and conveyance of land for non-payment of taxes without a previous assessment would be a simple nullity. But though there must necessarily be an assessment in all such cases, it is one of those circumstances appearing in the clerk's office in relation to the sale, which it is indispensable to aver in the deed to give it validity. The case of Flanagan v. Brimmet is a strong authority in support of the negative of the question. This case required the court to construe the act of the 9th of February, 1814, respecting the sale of lands delinquent for the non-payment of taxes. The act was passed to remedy evils growing out of past legislation, and the construction put upon the former laws on the same subject by the court of appeals. Very stringent rules had been previously applied by the court against the purchaser of a tax title. "When the act of February, 1814" [Laws (Va.) 1813–14, p. 15], says the court, "was enacted, the legislature was fully aware of the construction which had uniformly been put on laws of this description. Few principles of law are more firmly established, and from their influence on the transactions of others, more widely known, than that where the validity of a deed depends upon an act in pais, the party claiming under it is bound to prove the performance of the act; that in the case of a naked power not coupled with an interest, the law requires that every prerequisite to the exercise of such power should precede it; that the claimant under a sale made to enforce a forfeiture must show that the law has been strictly complied with; that the recitals in a deed of an officer selling for taxes were not even prima facie evidence of the regularity of his proceedings, and that these facts must be proved by evidence aliunde." The court held that these rules were essentially modified by the act of 1814. That act required the sheriff to advertise a sale of delinquent lands at the May, June and July terms of the court of his county, and to publish the advertisement at least once every week for two months preceding the time of sale, in some newspaper published in the city of Richmond. It also directed him to execute a deed to the purchaser at such sale, reciting the circumstances thereof, and setting forth particularly and truly the amount of the purchase money; and that after the time of redemption allowed had elapsed, the regularity of the proceedings under which the purchaser at the sale claims title shall not be questioned, unless such irregularity appears on the face of the proceedings. In the construction of this act it was held that by the circumstances of the sale, which are recited in the deed, was not meant all the steps to be taken by the various officers which preceded the sale, but the circumstances attending the sale itself, viz: that the sale was made at the time and place prescribed for the sale of lands returned delinquent; if less than the whole lot or tract was sold, how much was sold; who was the purchaser, and the amount of the purchase money; and that it was not necessary that the deed should recite that the land had been advertised; that even if an insufficient advertisement was recited, it would not be an irregularity on the face of the proceedings which would avoid the deed, but any recital of that fact being unnecessary, the recital of an insufficient advertisement was mere surplusage, not affecting the validity of the deed. The deed to the purchaser was held to be valid, though there was no express recital of the fact that the land had been assessed. The attention of the court does not seem to have been called to this omission, but it is not to be presumed that an omission fatal to the pretensions of the purchaser's claim would have escaped the vigilance of both bench and bar, in a case so elaborately discussed by each. The only reasonable deduction to be drawn from the case, touching the point under consideration, is, that the recital, in express terms, of the fact of assessment was not one of the circumstances of the sale, required to be recited in the deed to the purchaser. Has the law of 1850 made any change in this respect? The language of the two acts are very similar, but not identical. By the act of 1814, the sheriff who conducted the sale was required to execute the deed to the purchaser; by that of 1850, the clerk of the county is required to make it: by the former, it was contemplated that the sheriff should make the deed before the expiration of the two years allowed for the redemption of the land; by the latter the clerk is required to make the conveyance after the expiration of that time: by the former, it is required that the deed recite the circumstances of the sale, and set forth particularly and truly the amount of the purchase money; by the latter, that the clerk's deed set forth all the circumstances appearing in the clerk's office in relation to the sale. The former act seems to have required a more minute recital than the latter, and this discrimination was not an arbitrary one. The sheriff was required by the former act to recite in his deed all the circumstances attending the sale, which seems to have been reasonable as he was personally cognizant of those circumstances; but by the latter, the clerk is only required to recite those circumstances, in relation to the sale, appearing in the clerk's office. We have seen from the case of Flanagan v. Grimmet, that the recital of the fact of assessment was not one of the circumstances of the sale required to be expressly recited in the sheriff's deed; and if not, I can conceive of no reason why it should be so deemed under the act of 1850, which was designed to restrict rather than enlarge those recitals. The assessment, though the remote foundation of the purchaser's title, under either, cannot be affirmed to be a circumstance having immediate reference to the sale. It is an indispensable element of title in either case, but not a circumstance in relation to the sale itself, within the meaning of the act. But even if it were so, I apprehend that the fact that the land was regularly and duly assessed is substantially averred in the deed in this case. The recital that the land was delinquent for the non-payment of the taxes due upon it, not by reasonable intendments only, but by necessary implication, involves the averment that the land was assessed. The assessment of land by the proper officers of the government is the only mode known to the law, by which the amount of tax chargeable on the lands, is fixed and determined. Until the assessment, the amount of tax due upon the lands is altogether indeterminate and uncertain, and no demand or levy for the tax, can lawfully be made, until the quantum of tax has been fixed and ascertained, in the mode prescribed by law. Lands may be assessed without a subsequent delinquency, because this may be prevented by the payment of the taxes, but the converse of the proposition is not true. There can be no delinquency without a previous assessment, and when it is affirmed, therefore, that lands become delinquent for the nonpayment of taxes, it is affirmed, by necessary implication, that the lands had been previously assessed. The silence of the court of appeals in the two cases of Flanagan v. Grimmet and Hobbs v. Shumates, above cited, as to the omission to recite expressly that the lands had been assessed, coupled with the decision in each case, that the deeds to the purchaser were valid to vest a good prima facie title in him, and such title, as at the time the land was returned delinquent was vested in the person in whose name it was so returned, seems pregnant with the admission, that the delinquency necessarily presupposes a previous assessment.

During my investigation of this case, I have felt a strong desire to sustain the title of the defendant, who appears to have acted in good faith, and to have paid full value for the land, rather than that of the plaintiff, who purchased it for a song. But it is the business of courts to declare and not to make the law, and as the plaintiff seems to have acquired his title, in accordance with the prescribed formalities of the law under which he acted, and as the court of appeals, in the two leading cases cited, have sustained the title of purchasers, in cases in which the recitals were much less special than in the case at bar, and in virtue of a statute not at all different in principle from that which is to govern the present case, I am constrained to say that judgment must be rendered for the plaintiff.

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug. 5, 1861.

HABEAS CORPUS TO MILITARY OFFICER—REFUSAL TO OBEY.

[Where a military officer made return to a writ of habeas corpus that he declined to obey it at the present time, under orders from his superior, which were produced in court, held, that the court could take no further action in the matter, and would deny a motion to execute the writ. Following Ex parte Merryman, Case No. 9,487.]

[This was an application for a writ of habeas corpus to procure the release of Purcell McQuillon, who was held in custody by the military authorities of the United States at Fort Lafayette, New York.]

Before BETTS, District Judge.

The judge asked if the matter of the habeas corpus of Purcell McQuillon was ready.

Mr. Edwards called for the return of the writ, which was addressed to the commander of Fort Lafayette, and commanding him to have the body of McQuillan brought before this court. A lieutenant handed Mr. Edwards the return.

Mr. Edwards said the return was merely altered. It read: "Headquarters, Fort Hamilton, New York, July 29, 1861. I beg leave to decline obeying this writ at this time, by authority of Lieutenant General Winfield Scott. Martin Burke, Brevet Lieutenant Col. Commanding, Fort Lafayette, New York."

Mr. Edwards objected to the sufficiency of the return, both as to date and substance.

The judge said the court could not take cognizance of the sufficiency of the order of General Scott until it was before it.

Mr. Woodford inquired if it was doubted that the return was made by the lieutenant colonel commanding at Fort Lafayette.

Mr. Edwards replied in the negative, but he respectfully insisted that it was not a sufficient or proper return.

The judge said it did not appear that such an order or interdiction upon the officer making the return, had been made.

Mr. Edwards remarked that if this was a matter against a civilian, he would ask an attachment to be issued. He would ask the judge, if he did not see fit to issue process against the officer, that the authority for his refusal to obey the writ be made a part of the return. This was merely the old return with three or four words added. The date was not as it should be, and the prisoner should be here.

Mr. Woodford said the lieutenant present had with him the authority under which his superior acted, with instructions to present it to the court. Mr. Woodford did not appear here to advise the form of the return. The military power in its wisdom had chosen to decline obeying this writ, and had furnished instructions to its officers accordingly. This was a matter not within his discretion as the law officer of the government, and he could not advise the making of this authority a part of the return.

Mr. Edwards took the order from the lieutenant and read it. It was as follows: "To Colonel D. D. Tompkins, Quartermaster's Department, No. 6 State Street, N. Y. Headquarters Army, Washington, July 24, 1861. Send orders immediately to commanding officer of Forts Hamilton and Lafayette to return to writ in case of Purcell McQuillan that he begs leave to decline obeying the writ at this time. (Signed:) Winfield Scott."

A copy of the order sent by Colonel Tompkins, in pursuance of the above authority, was then read.

Mr. Edwards still claimed that the return and orders were insufficient, and the prisoner should be brought here.

The judge said the officer made return that he could not bring the person here, as he was restrained by orders from Gen. Scott. He took it that the military authorities declined to obey the writ as a matter of right, and the civil power was not sufficient to enforce it. The court would not at this time grant any order to have the body brought here.

Mr. Edwards then argued that the return was insufficient in not showing the authority for suspending the writ of habeas corpus.

After argument, BETTS, District Judge, remarked that the question involved was a very grave one, and was similar in all respects to the case recently before Chief Justice Taney, in Baltimore [Ex parte Merryman, Case No. 9,487]. The questions raised in that case had never been solved. He would, however, follow out that case, but would express no opinion whatever, as it would be indecorous on his part to oppose the chief justice. He would therefore decline taking any action on the writ at all. The constitutional law must be upheld, and he would not cavil at the manner in which it was done. The public mind would settle itself into the conviction to let the matter rest as it is, without throwing open the habeas corpus to be used by every one during the progress of the war. The writ had been served, and the commanding officer had declined to produce the person by the authority of his superior officer, who claimed that the writ was not operative against him. The court could therefore not take any action in the matter, and would not direct the marshall to execute the writ. An order could be entered on the minutes stating that a motion had been made to execute the writ, which was denied.

McQUIRK et al. v. The PENELOPE.

[2 Pet. Adm. 276.] [1]

District Court, D. Pennsylvania 1806.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—SHIPS LOST BY CAPTURE—INSURANCE PAID.

1. Wages, otherwise lost, were claimed because the merchant had received insurance on the freight, and refused.

[See Adams v. The Sophia, Case No. 65.]

2. Wages cannot be insured.

[Cited in Joy v. Allen, Case No. 7,552.]

3. Seamen contract, with full knowledge of the course and nature of our trade.

4. Freight paid by captors, wages decreed, refused, if the loss is paid by the insurers.

A claim for wages for the voyage was instituted against a merchant, whose ship had been carried in by a belligerent, adjudicated, and ship and cargo condemned in the court of the captor. A point was made, that the owners had received insurance on the freight, and thereby the fund for paying wages was restored.

BY THE COURT. This point has often been made and over-ruled, and must be at rest, in this court. I have constantly held, that the insurers have all benefits accruing to the owner; and are not answerable to mariners, nor is the owner, in such cases. The fund for paying wages was lost to the owner by the condemnation, as much as if no insurance had been made. Seamen cannot, it is held, directly, insure wages; and if so, it ought not to be done circuitously, through the owner, who would in that case, lose so much of the insurance, for which he, and not the mariners, paid a premium. If, indeed, a ship be forfeited by the misconduct of the owner, and the seamen are not amenable to consequences, this may be shewn against the owner, whether he is insured or not. The contract for insurance is between the owner and underwriters; and the seamen are third persons, neither parties or privies to the agreement. If the freight be lost, the claims of mariners cannot be aided by the precaution of the merchant, who for compensation, procures others to bear his risks. Seamen generally know, as well as merchants, the nature of our commerce; and enter into contracts, under its circumstances. Freight being lost, is the ground of recovery against underwriters; but it is the reverse, as between owners and seamen. Capture, as much as wreck, extinguishes the fund, if the loss be total; and there is no difference between the effects of loss, in the one case or the other. In some instances, where the goods were condemned, and the freight paid by the captors,[2] I have allowed wages to the seamen, but never where losses have been paid by underwriters. I consider the cases to stand on very different grounds. The freight is saved by treaty or the laws of nations, in the case of payment by captors, and there is no difference, quoad hoc, whether the ship had earned it, by arrival at her port, or the amount paid in this way; but in the latter case, the freight must be actually lost to the owner, to induce a payment by the underwriters, not of the freight, but (for a reward previously given) an equivalent, or compensation, for its loss.

[1] [Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

[2] The ancient laws forfeited the ship carrying contraband; but modern practice is to let the ship go free, unless the contraband articles also belong to the owner of the ship, or he is fraudulently concerned in the transaction. The freight is always forfeited on contraband. On enemy's goods it is paid to the neutral owner. 3 Rob. Prac. (Phila. Ed.) 182, 183.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 406.] [4]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1823.

JUDGMENT—SUPERSEDEAS—EXECUTION—IMPROPER RECITAL.

The court will, on motion, quash an execution upon a supersedeas judgment and also the supersedeas judgment itself, if it does not truly recite the original judgment.

[Cited in Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Barcroft, Case No. 2,644.]

[This was a suit by Dennis McSherry against R. T. Queen, Charles J. Queen, and James King & Co.]

Mr. Wallach, for defendants, moved the court to quash an execution issued upon supersedeas; and also the supersedeas itself, because it did not truly recite the original judgment. The original judgment was for $200 damages, to be released on the payment of $100 with interest from the 13th of April, 1820. A payment of $50 is noted on the docket. The supersedeas stated the debt to be $50, taking no notice of the damages to be released on the payment of a smaller sum.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) quashed the execution and supersedeas, because the original judgment was not truly recited in the supersedeas judgment, and because a judgment against James King & Co. was too uncertain.

REAL PROPERTY—AGREEMENT TO SELL—PRICE PAID—EQUITABLE TITLE—JUDGMENT CREDITOR—INJUNCTION.

[This was a bill in equity by James McSorlay v. Thomas W. Ludlow.]

This case differs from the others[3] only in this respect: that the purchaser, instead of giving a bond and mortgage to secure the purchase-money, actually paid the same to Mr. Bayard on receiving the deed, and after the judgment obtained against Bayard, which brings the case precisely within that of Hampson v. Edelen, 2 Har. & J. 64, and which rests on the same principles that governed the decision in the case of Finch v. Earl of Winchelsea, 1 P. Wms. 278.

The injunction in this case must be made perpetual, without requiring the complainant to make any further payment for the land purchased by and conveyed to him.

LIFE INSURANCE—EXPIRATION—RENEWAL PREMIUM—SUBSEQUENT TENDER.

[The renewal premium on a life insurance policy was due on or before noon Sept. 1st. On Aug. 31st the agent of the insurance company in a personal interview desired the assured to make payment. The assured replied that he was unable to do so, but was about to start for St. Louis in order to borrow money from his brother, and in case he was successful he would upon his return pay the premium. The agent notified him that in that case his insurance would expire the next day. On the 2d of September at about 2 p. m. the assured was killed in a railway accident while on his way to St. Louis. At about 4 p. m. of the same day the amount of the premium was tendered by the friends of the assured. Held, that the insurance company was not liable on the policy.]

The case is upon a policy of life insurance in the sum of $2,500 executed by defendant, dated September 1st, 1874, upon life of Edwin Macumber, to plaintiff, [Lydia C. Macumber,] pursuant to application made by Edwin M., August 27th, 1874. Copy of policy is set out in the answer, and copy of application filed with the stipulation in the case.

The first premium, $54.63 was paid, and policy delivered September 9th, 1874. The second premium, by the terms of the policy, was due September 1, 1875, at noon, and was not paid before that time, nor yet tendered, until after Macumber's death, which occurred in consequence of a railway accident about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, September 2d, and tender was made about 4 o'clock in the afternoon of that day by friends of the plaintiff. It was in the policy, "agreed that if the assured shall fail to pay any premium due and payable after the date thereof, on or before the time and day above mentioned, (12 noon, September 1st in each year,) or fail to pay at maturity any note or draft taken in payment of any premium, then and in every such case this policy shall cease and determine, and said company shall not be liable for any sum whatever, on account of said policy." The policy also provided as follows: "Provided always, and it is hereby declared, * * * * nothing in this contract shall be construed to bind the said company by any declaration, admission, or assertion of its agent made before, during, or subsequent to the execution of this policy, or by any custom of said company or its agents, or by the act of said agent in receiving any payment after the same shall have become due and payable, it being hereby expressly understood that no agent of said company is authorized to make, alter, or discharge any contract of said company, or waive any forfeiture thereunder." The policy was not actually executed by the company in St. Louis, Mo., until the 2d or 3d day of September, 1874, and it was not received by the agent at Lincoln, Neb., where the assured resided, until several days afterward, and was not delivered to the assured until Sept. 9, 1874. The policy contained the provision that it "shall not take effect or become binding on the company until the first annual premium shall have been paid, to Henry Gerner, agent, evidenced by his receipt below." The first annual premium was paid Sept. 9, partly in cash and partly by a 30 day note, payable to Gerner personally, which was afterward paid. Renewal receipts were transmitted from the company's office at St. Louis to Gerner, the local agent of the defendant for the state of Nebraska, to be valid only when countersigned by the said agent, and delivered on the payment of the annual premium for the ensuing year. As between the company and the agent, the instructions of the letter were not to deliver the renewal receipts until actual payment in money to the agent of the premium, on or before the day named in the policy;—if not paid by the day named, the agent could accept payment after the day, within six days, upon the certificate of the company's medical examiner of the continued good health of the assured. The agent, if the assured was considered good, frequently delivered the renewal receipts and trusted the assured for the amount for 30 days or less, on taking his note or time check for the amount, and charging himself with the amount. The company did not know this, but did know that he held renewal receipts for collection after the day named in the policy, and that the agent afterward reported these as collected and forwarded the amount, and this was received by the company without objection and without requiring any certificate of the medical examiner of the company as to the continued good health of the assured.

The above relates to the general course of the defendant's business at Lincoln, where the policy in suit was issued, and where the assured and local agent of the company resided. In respect to the renewal receipt for the policy in suit, the facts are these: It was transmitted by the company to the local agent, Gerner, at Lincoln, early in August, 1875. The agent notified the assured, by letter, that it had arrived, and that the amount was payable Sept. 1, 1875, at noon; and on the last day of August, 1875, an interview was had between the agent and the assured, and the agent desired the assured to make payment. The assured replied that he was then unable to make payment; that he was about to start to St. Louis to borrow some money of his brother, and if he succeeded he would pay the premium on his return. The agent notified him that in that case he would be uninsured after Sept. 1, and until the premium was paid, and offered to countersign and deliver the renewal receipt to the assured if he would pay part of the premium and give a due-bill to the agent for the balance, payable in 30 days, which proposition the assured declined to accept, and the renewal receipt was not countersigned or delivered. The assured intended to keep his policy good, and to make payment within 30 days if he should be able. On the 2d day of Sept., 1875, the assured, when en route to St. Louis to see his brother and obtain money from him, was killed by an accident to the railway train on which he was traveling.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. Upon the foregoing facts, I find, as a conclusion of law, that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and that the defendant is entitled to judgment.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—PETITION—UNCERTAINTY—"CIRCUIT OR DISTRICT COURT."

A petition to remove a case from a state court to the circuit or district court of the United States, which was granted, creates no uncertainty, as the removal can only be to the circuit court.

At law.

Mr. Sullivan, for plaintiff.

Mr. Marshal, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This case is brought from the state court, under the act of congress [3 Stat. 234], by the defendant. A motion is now made to dismiss the case, on the ground that the order for the removal was in the alternative, either to the district or circuit court. The petition to remove the cause to the next circuit or district court of the United States in Indiana was granted by the state court. The district court has no jurisdiction in such a case, consequently it is void; the order for the removal was irregular. There is some irregularity in the application, and in the order of the state court, but as there can be no uncertainty or surprise by the other party, the motion is overruled. As the district court has no jurisdiction, the removal could only be to the circuit court.

McVEIGH v. MESSERSMITH.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 316.] [2]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1837.

SALE — ADVERTISEMENT — SUBSEQUENT EXAMINATION—CAVEAT EMPTOR.

If a lot of bacon be advertised in the Gazette, by the vendor, as "prime," and the vendee examine it, and afterwards agree to purchase it, and it proves to have been unsound, he cannot recover damages upon the warranty, although he should have paid a sound price for it.

Case, on warranty of a lot of bacon.

The plaintiff [William N. McVeigh] offered in evidence a printed advertisement in the Alexandria Gazette, of a lot of "prime bacon," to be sold by the defendant [Samuel Messersmith] and that he paid for it the full price of sound bacon. The defendant offered evidence to prove that the plaintiff came to the warehouse of the defendant, and looked at the bacon as it hung, and, after examining it as much as he thought proper, agreed to take it. It was sent to his warehouse, and about a week afterwards he gave his note for the amount upon which the defendant recovered judgment at law. The bacon was unsound at the time of sale.

Mr. Semmes, for defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury, in effect, that if there was no other warranty than that contained in the advertisement, and no fraud, and the plaintiff inspected the bacon before he purchased it, he cannot recover in this action. Calhoun v. Vecchio [Case No. 2,310].

Mr. Taylor, for plaintiff, prayed the court to add to the instruction, the following: "That if they should believe, from the evidence, that the plaintiff did not fully examine the bacon, and did not mean to rely on his examination, but to rely on the warranty in the advertisement, he did not waive the warranty." Starkie, Ev. pt. 4. p. 1660; Bridge v. Wain, 1 Starkie, 504; Yates v. Pym, 6 Taunt. 446.

Mr. Semmes, in reply. A representation of goods is no warranty. Caveat emptor. Seixas v. Woods, 2 N. Y. Term R. [2 Caines] 55; Chandelor v. Lopus (Case of Bezar Stone) Cro. Jac. 4; Jackson v. Wetherill, 7 Serg. & R. 480.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, contra,) gave the instruction asked by Mr. Semmes, and refused that asked by Mr. Taylor.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, was of opinion that it ought to be left to the jury to say what was the extent and object of the plaintiff's examination of the bacon, and whether he meant to rely upon that examination or upon the warranty.

Verdict for defendant.

Motion for new trial overruled.

TO SATISFY EXECUTIONS.

The husband of the defendant was insolvent, and largely indebted to sundry judgment creditors, who sued out attachments against him and levied them upon the defendant's share in the sale of certain real estate left by her father, and now in the hands of commissioners appointed by the court to make partition. As the proceeds of the sale were never in the actual possession of the husband, it was held that the attaching creditors acquired no right to the proceeds of the sale.

Anthony Preston died intestate, leaving a large real estate in this city. His widow and heirs applied to the circuit court for the appointment of commissioners to make partition of it, which application was granted. On examining the various parcels of land the commissioners reported that they were so situated that they could not be equally divided. The court thereupon, at the request of the petitioners, directed the lands to be sold, and the proceeds to be divided and paid to the widow and heirs. The sale was accordingly made, and the shares duly paid over, except that of the defendant, Mrs. Ann E. McKnight, who was a daughter of Preston. Her husband [James M. McKnight] was insolvent and largely indebted to sundry judgment creditors, who sued out attachments thereon against him, and levied them upon Mrs. McKnight's share, consisting of money and bonds, while in the hands of the commissioners. The creditors [William McVeight and others,] contended that the sale and confirmation thereof by the court converted her share into personal property, and that as such, it belonged to her husband and became liable to be attached for his debts. In behalf of Mrs. McKnight it was insisted that her share of the proceeds of her real estate continued hers until it came into the actual possession of her husband, or until he had exercised a legal control over it. A motion was made in her behalf to quash the attachments. During the pendency of this motion Mr. McKnight died, his wife and two children surviving him.

The cases were elaborately argued on both sides by—

Bradley, Davidge & Chilton, for plaintiffs.

R. H. Gillet and J. M. Carlisle, for defendants.

After full consideration THE COURT held: That the attaching creditors acquired no right to Mrs. McKnight's share in the proceeds of said sale, and thereupon quashed the attachments.

BANKRUPTCY — OPPOSITION TO DISCHARGE — SECURED CREDITOR—PROPER TIME—ACCORDING TO RULE.

A creditor as assignee of a note of the bankrupt secured by a deed of trust on land, cannot come in and oppose discharge of the bankrupt unless he shall have entered his opposition and filed his specifications within the proper time and according to rule.

[Cited in Re Frizelle, Case No. 5,132; In re Boynton, 10 Fed. 279.]

[In the matter of a creditor of W. C. McVey, in his opposition to the bankrupt's discharge.]

HILL, District Judge. The question now presented to the court in this cause arises upon the following facts referred to the court upon the application of W. H. Miller, a creditor of said bankrupt, by his attorneys, Orr & Matthews, and said bankrupt, by his attorney, Fred. Bell. Said Miller, as assignee of said Dean, has proved a debt due by note payable in gold for a balance of three hundred and twenty-four dollars and seventy-nine cents, on the 12th March, 1868, the time when said debt was proved. That a deed of trust was executed by said bankrupt on the 15th November, 1866, conveying a tract of land, situated in Oktibbeha county, to James Kennedy, as trustee, to secure said note, which trust deed was filed in the clerk's office of the probate court of said county, on the 24th day of August, 1867. That said bankrupt filed his petition, praying to be declared a bankrupt on the —— day of ——, 186 , and was so declared on the —— day of ——, 186 , and afterwards, within the proper time, filed his petition praying for a discharge from his debts; that due notice was given to the creditors, and especially to said W. H. Miller, to appear before the Hon. J. W. Field, register, at his office in Columbus, on the 3d day of August, 1868, to show cause, if any, why said discharge should not be granted. That some months since said Orr & Matthews requested the register to enter their names as attorneys for said Miller, to oppose such discharge when application should be made. That on the 28th of August, 1868, said attorneys, as such counsel, filed in writing with said register, objections to said discharge, specifying the following reasons: (1) That said bankrupt had executed said deed in trust, and had not reported the same in his schedule, as required by law, and his oath in such cases made and provided. (2) That said bankrupt had not reported said debt in his schedule as secured by said trust deed, as required by law. To their specifications and objections said bankrupt filed his answer by way of demurrer, and assigned as causes: (1) That said Miller had not entered his opposition at the time required by the rules adopted in such cases. (2) That said specifications were not filed within the time required by the rules of this court in such cases. (3) That the specifications do not show a sufficient reason why said discharge should not be granted.

I will consider the questions in the order presented. First. Was the opposition entered at the time and in the manner required? By reference to general rules adopted by the justices of the supreme court, and which are part of the law, it will be seen that Rule XXIV. provides "that a creditor opposing the application of a bankrupt for discharge, shall enter his appearance in opposition thereto on the day when the creditors are required to show cause, and shall file his specifications of the grounds of opposition, in writing, within ten days thereafter, unless the time shall be enlarged by order of the district court in the case, and the court shall thereon make an order as to the entry of said cause for trial on the docket of the district court and the time within which the same shall be heard and determined." By this I understand that the opposing creditor must, on the day fixed to show cause, appear before the register, by himself or counsel, and enter his opposition, which should either be in writing or verbally, but an entry of such opposition should be entered by the register on his docket, which suspends further proceedings, until the filing of the specifications, and if not filed within ten days the cause progresses as though no opposition had been made, unless, for sufficient cause shown to the judge, the time is extended. Whether the opposition was made and entered on the 3d day of August does not appear from the proceedings before me; the mere request made to the register months before, is not a compliance with the rule, and could not be made, at least until after the petition for discharge was filed, and not after the day fixed to show cause, without leave of the court. The proof that the opposition was made at the proper time being on the opposing creditor, and not being produced, the first cause of demurrer is well taken and is sustained.

The next question is, were the specifications filed within proper time? This question is already answered. More than ten days having elapsed from the 3d to the 28th day of August, the time fixed to show cause, of which Miller had notice, and the time the specifications were filed, and no extension of time having been asked for or granted, this cause of demurrer is well taken and is sustained.

The remaining question is, had the proceedings all been taken in proper time, are the specified reasons why the discharge should not be granted sufficient? Upon a careful examination of the causes specified in the bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 517], why a discharge shall not be granted, or if granted, vacated, I find that it must be some act omitted which was required to be done, or some act done which was forbidden on the part of the bankrupt, and must have been in fraud of the law. Mere oversight or mistake is not sufficient; these are infirmities to which all are liable, and for the correction of which ample remedy is afforded to all parties interested. The specifications in general terms charge that he did not state that the debt was secured by the trust deed, or that the land was covered by it, as the law and the bankrupt's oath required, but does not state in what particular, and does not state that this omission was intentional and fraudulent. Miller was notified and proved his debt—the proof of debt was made March 12th, 1868. He could have examined the schedules and applied for their correction, could have had his lien enforced, if valid, either by the trustee or assignee; if his lien is valid, and the land has not been sold, can now have it done, or if sold can have the proceeds applied to the payment of his claim, so that the omission cannot prejudice his rights, especially as the land is stated to be of sufficient value to pay the claim. If the lien is valid and the sale was made without giving notice to Miller or the trustee, it is invalid, or does not affect his interests, if sold subject to the lien. For the reason stated I am of opinion the third cause of demurrer is well taken and is sustained, reserving, however, to the creditor the right to apply to the court for any other proceedings to which he may be entitled. This being the first question in opposition to a discharge which has been considered by me, I have stated the case more fully and given my reasons more at length than I would otherwise have done, as it will, unless I should be convinced I am in error, be regarded as the rule of practice in similar cases. The clerk will certify the same to Register Field, and the cause will progress as though the opposition had not been tendered.

MACY et al. v. DeWOLF et al.

[3 Woodb. & M. 193.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1847.

NEW TRIAL—INTEREST OF WITNESS—PART OWNERS—MORTGAGEE OF ONE—LIEN OF VESSEL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—SHIPPING—SUPPLIES—COSTS.

1. A new trial will not usually be ordered on account of the interest of a witness, if, from the facts, it appears the interest would probably be released on another trial and the verdict be the same way.

[Cited in Aiken v Bemis, Case No. 109; Whetmore v. Murdock, Id. 17,509.]

2. Owners of whale ships are, in the absence of express proof making them partners, only part owners in the vessel, and a mortgagee of the share of one has no interest in the vessel to prevent him from being a witness in a suit against the part owners for supplies.

[Cited in Mitchell v. Chambers, 43 Mich. 160, 5 N. W. 64.]

3. The vessel is not under any lien to the creditor for his debt, or to the owners for contribution, if some pay more than others. Nor will the court presume that the proceeds of the voyage stand in any different position, if no special agreement is put in concerning them, as such an one generally exists and governs the nature of the interest rather than the rules of law, independent of such an agreement.

[Cited in The Jennie B. Gilkey, 20 Fed. 161.]

4. If a new trial is asked for newly discovered evidence, it must clearly appear not to have been known before, nor be merely cumulative of old points, nor left uncertain what it is and whether it be new and important; or whether the witness be credible who is to prove them.

[Cited in Aiken v. Bemis, Case No. 109; Whetmore v. Murdock, Id. 17,509; Vose v. Mayo, Id. 17,009.]

[1] [Reported by Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., and George Minot, Esq.]

5. If one who advances supplies for a ship, does it at first on the sole credit of one part owner, or afterwards takes his separate note for the amount and gives time on it after due, so that the other part owners settle with him, as having paid or been accepted as paymaster of the amount, it bars a recovery against the other owners.

[Cited in The Daniel Kaine, 35 Fed. 787.]

6. Agreements between the part owners before fitting out, may be proved on their part by their conversations, testified to by others, as it is evidence of a contract made between them, and is a part of the res gestae of the fitting out.

7. A creditor with no specific lien is not incompetent to testify so as to increase the amount of his debtor's estate; nor is a mortgagee of a share in a vessel liable for supplies to the mortgager, while the latter is in possession.

8. The whole previous cost must be paid, if a new trial is had on newly discovered evidence.

This was an action of assumpsit in three counts. One was for goods sold and delivered. Another on an account annexed for like goods and one for money had and received. The plaintiffs [Josiah Macy and others] proved the sale of copper for the ship Corinthian, January 10th, 1842, to the value of $2,493. The vessel lay at Bristol, Rhode Island, where all the defendants [William H. DeWolf and others] resided, and who were part owners of her at that time, in different shares. The plaintiffs resided in New York, and made the bargain there as to the copper, with DeWolf, but charged the same on their books to the owners of the ship Corinthian. The bill for the same was presented to DeWolf, and his note taken for the amount, August 8th, 1842, and the account settled. This note had never been paid, but run for six months; and the plaintiffs then indulged DeWolf with further time, till June, 1843, when DeWolf became more embarrassed, and was considered as failing. After that a resort was made to the other owners, in August, 1843. In the meantime the owners had met and adjusted among themselves the expenses of fitting out the ship, and allowed DeWolf on his receipt from the plaintiffs, at the time the note was given, the amount of it as thus advanced by him. The note on its face did not purport to be signed by DeWolf as agent, for the owners, but simply in his own name. There was much evidence in the case as to difficulties among the owners in fitting out the Corinthian on this voyage, and the refusal of some to unite in it, and especially to make DeWolf their agent, though he had acted in that capacity in former voyages. It was also proved that several of the owners were themselves to furnish supplies in a ratio with their respective interests; and that DeWolf purchased some articles as an owner, while in buying others he seemed to act as agent for the other owners. To show the settlement of the owners with DeWolf, as having bought this copper on his own account, and towards his share, and also, to prove that some of the owners refused to make DeWolf their agent to procure supplies, Mr. Dimon was placed on the stand, who held a mortgage from DeWolf of his interest in this ship and her cargo. Objections were made to his competency, but for the purpose of proceeding in the trial of the whole matter he was admitted, subject to future consideration. The case was attended by much conflicting evidence, and the jury having once disagreed, found, on the second trial, a verdict for the defendants. There was a motion for a new trial, not only for various rulings then, but on the allegation of newly discovered evidence since.

It is not necessary to enumerate further the different points which arose, and the ruling on them, as they are detailed sufficiently in the written motion for a new trial, a copy of which is annexed:

"Rhode Island District, ss. U. S. Circuit Court, June Term, A. D. 1846. In the action, Josiah Macy & Sons v. William H. DeWolf et al. And now, on the fourth day of said term, and within two days after verdict rendered in said action at said term, the plaintiffs in said action come and move the honorable court that said verdict and the judgment rendered thereon, be set aside, and a new trial granted therein. 1st. Because the court allowed Byron Dimon, a witness offered on the trial of said action by the defendants therein, to be sworn and testify in said action; said Dimon being then and there objected to by the plaintiffs as incompetent, on account of having an interest in the result of said action—said Dimon at the time of giving said testimony having and holding a mortgage made and executed by W. H. DeWolf, one of the defendants in said action, to him, said Dimon, on certain shares of the ship Corinthian and cargo and proceeds thereof in the last voyage, of Bristol, R. I., to secure a debt due from said DeWolf to said Dimon; and that the plaintiffs in said action claim that said ship and owners were pledged and liable to respond to the plaintiffs for the amount of their claim in said action; and that the other defendants, as part owners and partners, have a prior lien on said ship, cargo and proceeds, to said mortgage; and that if said plaintiffs recover in said action, it takes the share of said DeWolf in said ship, cargo and proceeds, to pay the other owners their contributive share of outfits and charges of said W. H. DeWolf for the amount which said other owners and defendants may have paid or advanced for him, and from and under the said mortgage and mortgages of said Dimon; and here refer to the rulings and remarks of the court at the time on trial. 2d. Because (although said Byron Dimon was thus incompetent as witness,) he was allowed by said court on said trial to testify as to a private conversation between W. H. DeWolf, Mark A. DeWolf and Lemuel C. Richmond, all owners in said ship and defendants in said action, relative to an al-
