Before the passage of the act a case came up in which the traverser was charged with keeping a common gambling house, in which, among other things, it was averred that the traverser caused and procured divers idle and evil disposed persons to frequent and come to play together at certain unlawful game called faro. U. S. v. Dixon [Case No. 14,970]. In that case the court said: "Act Md. 1797, c. 110, § 2, is the only act in force in this county for restraining any kind of games, except by the laws of the corporations of Washington and Georgetown, and that act only prohibits the setting up, keeping and maintaining certain gaming tables or devices, faro among the number, in any tavern or house occupied by a retailer of wine, spirituous liquors, &c. The game of faro is not an unlawful game; no person can be punished under that statute for playing at that game, whether it be played in a tavern or a private dwelling house. The offence under the statute is the setting up and maintaining the table or device. The indictment derives no assistance from any statute, nor does the playing at faro constitute any part of the offence. If it can be supported at all it must be as an indictment for a common nuisance in keeping a common gaming house for lucre and gain, at which divers idle and dissolute persons were permitted to assemble and game for divers large and excessive sums of money."

The court had long before held (in U. S. v. Willis [Case No. 16,728]) that playing at any game, even for money, is not an offence at common law. The offence is created by statute, and can only be punished as the statute directs. The common law is laid down to the same effect by Bailey, J., in Rex v. Rogier, 2 Dowl. & R. 436, as follows, viz: "Playing at a game is not per se illegal, unless the betting be excessive, for it is the amount played for, and not the name or nature of the game, which is the essence of an offence in the eye of the law." Such being the state of the common law upon this subject, the first blow against faro banks was struck by Act Md. 1797, c. 110; but that statute, as appears in the case of U. S. v. Dixon, above quoted, and by a decision of the court of appeals (Baker v. State, 2 Har. & J. 5), extended only to cases of a faro bank or like device, when set up and kept in a tavern or out-house, or place occupied by a tavern-keeper or retailer of wines and liquors. After the lapse of thirty-four years the prohibition was extended by the law of congress to the offences of keeping "faro banks or other common gaming tables," irrespective altogether of the character of the house or place where they might be kept. Now what is the true interpretation of this statute in view of the existing legislation and the evil intended to be remedied—the keeping of a faro bank or other device for the purpose of gaming for money in a tavern or house where liquors were retailed was already provided against. The statute of 1831 made the offences at which it aims independent altogether of the place where the acts may be done, and it dropped also the further limitation that the games to be criminal must be played for money. So that whatever article of value be the stake, it is equally within the statute as if money alone were played for. But it is argued that this statute nevertheless did not mean to prohibit all faro banks from being kept and maintained, and that the word "common" is to be supplied in its construction so that it shall read "whosoever shall be convicted of keeping a common faro bank or other common gaming table, &c." Such is certainly not the natural import of the words, but on the contrary the mention of a particular followed by that of the class to which it belongs, in the alternative as expressed by the word "other" is a legislative declaration that the particular has all the characteristics inherent in itself of its class, and so used it serves to illustrate and give character to the general expressions in which the class is described, so that the class is illustrated by all its particular rather than the particular is defined by its class. The expression as used then, according to its natural import is tantamount to saying, "Whosoever shall be convicted of keeping any common gaming table, of which common gaming tables a faro bank is one, shall be punished, &c." Now, although penal statutes are to be construed strictly, so as not to embrace within their purview anything which is not distinctly expressed, yet I know of no rule which requires the natural sense of terms to be rejected, and words not in the statute to be supplied so as to narrow the sense and come short of remedying the evil under which society labors. It is not only fair to presume, but it is our duty to infer that in legislating concerning the game of faro, congress knew what every individual knows, that it is a game at which people indiscriminately play for money, and frequently in large sums; and that it is not a game played for amusement, and hence by its very nature the faro bank is a common gaming table. Therefore when the term "Faro Bank" is used in an indictment, a particular kind of common gaming table is spoken of as explicitly and distinctly as if the further terms of definition, "the same being a common gaming table" were superadded.

This interpretation of the law is borne out by the unanimous opinion of this court at March term, 1836 (U. S. v. Cooley [Case No. 14,859]), in which case it was held that an indictment under the statute would be good, which charged the offence to be either the keeping of a common gaming table or the keeping of a faro bank. But it is said that the opinion in Cooley's Case was repudiated in the case of U. S. v. Ringgold [supra]. In that case the chief judge maintained (as has already been urged) that the words of the statute "a faro bank or other common gaming table," necessarily implied that a faro bank is a common gaming table, and that the keeping of a faro bank is per se made an offence. Upon an admission by the prosecuting attorney, that a faro bank might be innocently kept, Judge Thruston argued that the faro bank was too uncertain in itself to maintain an indictment, and hence thought the indictment ought to be quashed. Judge Morsell being unprepared to express an opinion, the case was held under advisement until the following term, when the indictments were quashed. The chief judge was not present at nor concurring in that judgment, for which no reasons are given in the report further than a memorandum, that it was understood that the indictments were quashed because the defendant was not charged with keeping a common faro bank, nor with keeping a common gaming table. If we compare the indictments in the Case of Ringgold with the present, a most important difference in structure appears, which is abundantly sufficient to relieve the case from the only objection assigned by Judge Thruston upon the argument to Ringgold's indictment, to wit: that a faro bank might be innocently kept. The indictment there charges only that the traverser on a particular day "did keep a faro bank against the form of the statute, etc."

The present indictment goes far beyond that, and contains averments which are entirely inconsistent with the idea, or rather which exclude the conclusion that the faro bank was kept innocently, or casually, or for mere amusement; for it avers that on a certain day, "and on divers other days, and times between that day and the taking this inquisition a certain faro bank for lucre and gain unlawfully and injuriously he did keep and maintain against the form of the statute," &c. These averments contain all the necessary description of a common law nuisance, viz.: its establishment and continued maintenance for unlawful profit during a considerable space of time. Insomuch then as the present case differs in the important particulars just indicated from Ringgold's case, and the indictment contains averments which meet the only objection which was urged in that case, and the decision there was by a divided court, we do not think that precedent sufficient to establish a rule or decision outside of the very form of indictment then used, nor to control this case which charges the offense, not only in the terms of the statute, but with superadded averments which repel any possible inference that the acts here charged in manner and form could have been innocent. Moreover we think according to the rule laid down by the supreme court, it has that clearness, positiveness, and certainty necessary to apprise the traverser of the precise crime which he must come prepared to defend. It is also abundantly specific to furnish the party with complete record evidence under a plea of anterfois acquit or anterfois convict. For these reasons we think the count good, and affirm the judgment of the criminal court.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The indictment in this case contains two counts. The one under which the question arises charges that on the 10th of Nov., 1859, and on divers other days, and between that day and the day of taking of this inquisition, the traverser with force and arms, at the county aforesaid, a certain faro bank there situate, for their lucre and gain, unlawfully and injuriously did keep and maintain against the form of the statute, &c. This indictment is upon the statute of March 2, 1831, 1st and 12th sections, which are: "That every person duly convicted of keeping a faro bank or other common gaming table," &c., in the 1st section; and in the 12th "or of keeping a faro bank or gaming table," &c. These two parts or sections must be taken together in construction so that it will then read "convicted of keeping a faro bank or other common gaming table shall be sentenced to suffer imprisonment for a period not less than one year, nor more than five years." At the time of the passage of this law, St. Md. 1797, c. 10, was in force and practiced under; the title of this act is: "To prevent excessive gaming," and reciting that certain persons, &c., carry about with them, from one public place to another certain gambling machines or inventions, calculated to deceive and defraud the innocent and unguarded, to the prejudice of society and the corruption of morals, to put a stop to such pernicious and baneful effect. "No E. O. A. B. C. L. S. D. or faro table or other device except billiard tables, for the purpose of gaming for money, shall be set up, kept and maintained in any dwellinghouse, out-house, or place occupied by any tavern-keeper, retailer of spirituous liquors, &c., on pain," &c. In addition it is made the duty of the magistrate to suppress the playing as in other cases of common nuisance. At the time also the common law, as laid down by Chief Justice Abbott in King v. Rogier, 1 Barn. & C. 272, was as follows: "Now in this case the indictment states not only that the defendant kept a common gaming house, but that they permitted persons to play there for divers large and excessive sums of money. The playing for large and excessive sums of money would of itself make any game unlawful, and if so there can be no doubt that this is an offence at common law."

I have thus placed the legislation and common law on this subject together. At the time of the passage of the act upon which the indictment is founded, in order that it might appear, as I think it clearly does, that although the name faro bank was not known to the common law, yet the crime which it has made is a species, namely as a common nuisance, and that in all cases of that nature the description in the indictment must allege the offence as practically applied by the term "common," in contradistinction to "private." This is the very gravamen of the offence and therefore indispensable. It is true that where the crime is by statutory provision, and the indictment is in the words of the statute, it will be sufficient; but this is a general rule, and only applicable where the statute sets out the crime fully and clearly. The rule, with its qualification, may be found laid down in the case of U. S. v. Gooding, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 474, 477. The words of the judge (Story) are: "In general it may be said that it is a sufficient certainty in an indictment to allege the offence in the very terms of the statute—we say in general, for there are doubtless cases where more particularity is required, either from the obvious intention of the legislature or from the application of known principles of law;" so again, "In certain classes of statutes the rule of very strict certainty has some time been applied when the common law furnished a close and appropriate analogy, such as the cases of indictments for false pretences," &c. This offence stands on the statute in juxtaposition to the offence indicated in this case. Again at page 477, Id., the judge proceeds: "This is a penal act,—Slave Trade Act April, 1818, c. 373 [6 Colvin's Laws, 325],—and is to be construed strictly, that is, with no intendment or extension, beyond the import of the words used; there is no certainty that the legislature meant to prohibit the sailing of any vessel on a slave voyage which had not been built, &c., within the jurisdiction of the U. S., &c." So in this case, the statute is a very penal one. There is no reason to think that the statute intended to make it an offence to keep a faro bank in a private house and for private purposes, nor that playing at such bank for any other thing than money, or some other valuable thing (neither of which is mentioned in the statute) should be offensive in a penal point of view. It would be entirely inconsistent with the rule just stated in a case like this to infer it. I think then I may confidently say, that the word "common" used in the latter part of the sentence should be distributably applied, by which the nature of the offence would be made to appear and reasonable certainty offered—it seems to me to be the very gravamen of the crime and charge in the indictment, and the charge stated according to the operation of the statute. The opposing argument following, as it purports the natural order of the word, and concluding that the import is tantamount to saying "whoever shall be convicted of keeping any gaming table—of which common gaming tables a faro bank is one, shall be punished, &c." seems to be for the purpose of proving that by construction the term "keeping a faro bank" may be considered the offence punishable by the statute. This may be correct, but if so, does not meet the grounds upon which I think the indictment defective. The want of an allegation or averment of the practical application or operation, instead of the equivocal sense in which it may be understood—such as stated in the conclusion of that argument—for although in the construction of the statute this may be correct, yet the rule is very different in the case of an indictment; as I have already shown, the practical operation of the statute ought to be averred, no intendment or implication can supply a direct allegation of anything material in the description of the substance or nature or manner of the crime.

In conclusion, I think the decision of the court in the Case of Ringgold is correct. It has stood, and I suppose been acted under for upwards of twenty years, and I think it ought not to be disturbed. For the aforegoing reasons I think the indictment in this case is insufficient, that the judgment ought to be arrested and the decision of the criminal court ought to be reversed.

PATENTS—SECOND INVENTOR—DELAY—ABANDONMENT—APPLICATION—SCOPE OF COMMISSIONER'S EXAMINATION.

[1. A first inventor's delay to apply for a patent for eight years after the second inventor has secured one bars him from thereafter making application.]

[2. Upon application for the issue of a patent, the commissioner should decide not only questions of law, but also of fact, including abandonment or neglect.]

[Application by E. E. Marcy for letters patent for an improved process for curing India rubber. An interference with the patent of John E. Trotter was declared, and the commissioner thereafter denied Marcy's application. Applicant appeals.]

DUNLOP, Chief Judge. This is an appeal to me, by Dr. Marcy, from the decision of the commissioner of patents, dissolving the interference heretofore declared by the office, between the parties above named, and refusing a patent to Dr. Marcy, for improvement in processes for curing India rubber. There is no dispute, that the invention claimed by the parties litigant are the same, and identical.

A great many questions of law and fact, have been presented and discussed, which it would be vain to consider and determine, because the solution of them would have no influence, on the judgment I am to render. I assume argumenti gratia, and only for the sake of the argument, that Dr. Marcy was the first and original inventor, and the question remains, has he forfeited his right to a patent by failing to apply for it in a reasonable time? The same invention was patented to Trotter in December, 1850, more than eight years before Marcy presented himself to the patent office, which was first done on the 6th July, 1859. Dr. Marcy resided in the same city with Trotter, who introduced his invention into public use there, of which Dr. Marcy had no doubt actual notice; at all events, he had constructive legal notice, because all citizens are bound to know the doings of the patent office, to which they all have access, and which is the legal public repository of the muniments of title in relation to all inventions.

The policy of the patent laws favors diligence and condemns neglect. It is the duty of an inventor without delay to patent his perfected invention. He has no right to use it himself or permit others to use it, as in this case, for eight years, and then expect a monopoly from the public, for fourteen years more.

A main inducement and consideration, with the public, in granting the monopoly, is the right of the public to have immediate knowledge and restricted use, of the perfected invention, and the free and unrestricted use of it, at the end of fourteen years. Dr. Marcy, has by his neglect and laches, permitted Trotter to enjoy a monopoly of the invention, for more than eight years, and now claims for himself the same monopoly for fourteen years more. This subject of laches, in inventors, has been several times before the supreme court of the United States, and has always received the condemnation of that high tribunal, and the law must be considered conclusively settled in that court.

In Pennock v. Dialogue, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 1, they say: "If an inventor should be permitted to hold back, from the knowledge of the public, the secrets of his invention, it would materially retard the progress of science and the useful arts, and give a premium to those who would be least prompt to communicate their discoveries"; and in Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 523, the same court says: "Whatever may be the intention of the inventor, if he suffers his invention to go into public use through any means, whatsoever, without an immediate assertion of his right, he is not entitled to a patent, nor will a patent obtained under such circumstances protect his right." If Trotter pirated the invention, as Dr. Marcy insists, no more stringent call could exist for the prompt action of the appellant.

The doctrine of the supreme court in the two cases above cited has been reasserted and reaffirmed by the same court, in the late case of Kendall v. Winsor, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 329. In this last case they say: "It is the unquestionable right of every inventor to confer gratuitously the benefit of his ingenuity on the public, and this he may do, either by express declaration, or by conduct equally significant with language, such, for instance, as an acquiescence with full knowledge in the use of his invention by others; or he may forfeit his rights as an inventor by a wilful, or negligent postponement of his claims, or by an attempt to withhold the benefit of his improvement from the public until a similar or the same improvement should have been made and introduced by others"; and again they say: "These (referring to the cases of Pennock v. Dialogue and of Shaw v. Cooper [supra]) may be regarded as leading cases upon the questions of the abrogation or relinquishment of patent privileges, as resulting from avowed intention, from abandonment or neglect or from use known and assented to."

If Dr. Marcy was misled by the opinion of Judge Grier, to which he refers as an excuse for his delay in presenting his claims to the patent office, the doctor himself ought to suffer, and not the public. He knew or ought to have known that the office treated the invention as patentable, and had actually granted a patent to Trotter, on the 3rd December, 1850. The effect of now giving him a patent for fourteen years more would be creating a monopoly against the public for twenty-two years, instead of fourteen, which the office has no right by law to do.

The 2nd reason of appeal denies the jurisdiction of the commissioner, to decide the question of abandonment or neglect. That question, in a suit for infringement of a patent right, is no doubt a question of fact for the jury, and not for the court, but on an application to the commissioner for the issue of a patent, it is his duty to decide all questions, both of law and fact, which go to establish the right, or the absence of right, in the applicant, to the patent which he seeks.

The 1st, 3rd and 4th reasons of appeal are hereinbefore treated of and answered.

I affirm the judgment of the commissioner, and return to him all the papers with this my opinion and judgment, this 16th April, 1860.

MAREAN v. UNITED STATES INS. CO.

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1814.[2]

INSURANCE—MARINE—AGAINST TOTAL LOSS—PARTIAL LOSS—SALVAGE EXPENSES—ABANDONMENT.

1. Insurance on goods on board the brig Betsey, from Cape Henry to Lisbon. The cargo consisted of corn, corn meal, and navy-bread; and the policy contained the usual memorandum, in which it was stated, that upon certain articles, and among them those insured, the insurer agreed to pay for a total loss only. The brig Betsey was driven on shore, within one or two miles of Lisbon; and the cargo was so injured, that when the part which was taken to Lisbon, was sold, it did not pay the expenses of saving it; and the insured claimed, in this action, for a total loss.

2. As to memorandum articles, the insurer agrees to pay for a total loss only; and if the property arrive at the port of delivery, reduced in quantity, or in value, to any amount, the loss cannot be said to be total; and the insured cannot treat it as a total loss, or demand indemnity for a partial loss.

3. There is no instance where the insured can demand, as for a total loss, that he might not have declined making an abandonment, and demanded a partial loss. If the property insured, be included within the memorandum in the policy, the insured cannot, under any circumstance, call upon the insurer for a partial loss; and consequently he cannot elect to turn it into a total loss.

[Cited in brief in Delaware Ins. Co. v. Winter, 38 Pa. St. 184.]

Action on a policy, dated 14th December, 1812, on goods on board the brig Betsey, at and from Cape Henry to Lisbon, at a premium of 6 per cent. valued at five thousand dollars, the sum underwritten; declared to be against all risks, except British captures; warranted neutral. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court, on the following facts agreed by the counsel: The cargo consisted of 4406 bushels of Indian corn, 100 barrels of navy-bread, and 20 barrels of corn meal. The brig sailed from Baltimore on the 11th, and from Cape Henry on the 13th of November; she experienced on the voyage many severe gales of wind. On the 18th of December, she passed the rock of Lisbon, and came to anchor about four miles below Belem castle. She leaked considerably, in consequence of the injury she had sustained, from the violent gales to which she had been exposed. After passing the rock, the wind died away, and the current being adverse, she came to anchor. The captain and supracargo landed; went through the customary forms at Belem, to obtain a permit to pass the castle, and then proceeded to Lisbon. The health-boat visited the brig, and ordered her to get above the castle as soon as possible. On the 19th, she was again exposed to a heavy and fatal gale, which drove her ashore, just below Belem castle, the sea breaking entirely over her. The supracargo considered both vessel and cargo as totally lost; but by directions of the custom-house, as much of the cargo as could be got out, was unladen, by a number of French prisoners, who were employed for that purpose. The cargo was all wet, and the part of it which was taken out was carried to the castle, where it was dried. From thence it was carried to Lisbon, in lighters, and was sold in the corn market, by the consignee of the cargo, at about one-fourth of the price of sound corn. The quantity thus saved and sold, amounted to 1988 bushels. The supracargo petitioned for liberty to sell, at the place where the corn was first deposited, which could not be granted; and he was obliged to submit to the custom of the place, and allow it to be sold at the corn market. The brig was so completely wrecked, that she was sold, with her materials, in lots, where she lay. Had the supracargo been left to the free exercise of his own judgment, he would not have attempted to save any part of the cargo, in consequence of the total damage, and the great expense of saving it. The nett proceeds of the cargo, after paying the expenses of unlading, drying, and selling it, exceeded very little the expenses of the supracargo, in attending to the business. The port of Lisbon commences above Belem castle, and the custom of the place is to discharge cargoes of corn, between that castle and Cantara; which latter place, is from one to two miles below Lisbon. The vessel never arrived at her port of discharge. She was entered, on the 23d of December, at the custom-house, by the American consul; which, he said, was a necessary measure; but port duties do not attach to vessels, till they pass the castle. Still, as part of the cargo was carried to Lisbon, the entry was made by the consul, and the dues were paid. On the 11th of March, the plaintiff having received notice of the shipwreck, offered to abandon, which was refused.

Chauncey and Sergeant, for plaintiff, contended, that the loss as to the cargo amounted to a total loss; and if not so, then (2) the voyage was lost, the vessel having been wrecked before she reached her port. That although a part of the cargo was saved, it was done by the orders of the government, not of the agents of the insured; and was not restored to them with full power to do with it what they pleased. That a right to abandon once existed; and it continues, unless before the offer is made, it is restored to the owner, in a condition to prosecute the voyage, clear of the effects of the peril—none of which circumstances concur in this case. Cases cited, 1 Marsh. Ins. 222; Wilson v. Smith, 3 Burrows, 1553; 1 Marsh. Ins. 226; 2 Strange, 1065; 1 Marsh. Ins. 227, 229, 233, 588; Burnett v. Kensington, 7 Term R. 210; Dyson v. Rowcroft, 3 Bos. & P. 474; Leroy v. Withers [2 Burrows, 683] Park. Shipp. 582, 486, 585, 587, 566.

Binney and Rawle, for defendants, insisted, that there can be no partial loss on memorandum articles, if they arrive at the port of delivery, either for deterioration, inequality, or reduction in quantity; and that it is the duty of the insured, to send on the cargo, however injured, if he has the means to do so; and he cannot, by neglecting to do so, turn a partial into a total loss. If this, as a partial loss, was a case out of the policy, it cannot be treated as a total loss, under any circumstances. Although the insured might, whilst the loss by the shipwreck continued, have abandoned, yet he cannot do so, if, at the time the offer is made, the loss has ceased to be total. Cocking v. Fraser [4 Doug. 295] Park. Shipp. 152; Mason v. Skurray [2 Doug. 438] Park. Shipp. 116; Nesbitt v. Lushington, 4 Term R. 783; Schieffelin v. New York Ins. Co., 9 Johns. 21; Wilson v. Royal Exch. WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. We shall in the outset, dismiss from this case all considerations connected with the loss of this cargo, in respect to quantity or value. As to memorandum articles, the insurer agrees to pay for a total loss only—the insured taking upon himself all partial losses, without exception. If the property arrive at the port of delivery, reduced in quantity, or in value, to any amount, the loss cannot be said to be total, in reality; and the insured cannot treat it as total, or demand an indemnity for a partial loss. There is no instance where the insured can demand, as for a total loss, that he might not have declined making an abandonment, and demanded a partial loss. But, if the property insured be included within the memorandum, he cannot, under any circumstances, call upon the insurer for a partial loss; and consequently he cannot elect to turn it into a total loss. These principles I consider to be clearly established, by the cases of Mason v. Skurray, Neilson v. Columbia Ins. Co., Cocking v. Fraser, M'Andrews v. Vaughan [1 Marsh. Ins. 219], Dyson v. Rowcroft, and Maggrath v. Church.

The only question which can possibly arise, between the insurer and insured, in relation to memorandum articles, is, whether the loss was total or not; and this can never happen, where the cargo, or a part of it, has been sent on by the insured, and reaches the original port of its destination. Being there specifically, the insurer has complied with his engagement—every thing like a promise of indemnity against loss or damage to the cargo, being excluded from the policy. If the question turn upon the totality of the loss, unconnected with the subject of loss by deterioration of the cargo in value, or reduction in quantity, we know of no difference between memorandum and other articles. If the loss be total in fact, or is such as the insured is permitted to treat as such, he is entitled to abandon, and to recover as for a total loss, in the case of memorandum articles; but always with this exception, that he is not permitted to turn a partial into a total loss. Keeping this distinction in view, the loss of the voyage, by capture, shipwreck, or otherwise, may be treated as a total loss. This is the doctrine of Dyson v. Rowcroft; in which case, the right to abandon was placed, not upon the ground of deterioration of the cargo, but upon the justifiable necessity which resulted from it, of throwing the cargo overboard. This was in effect the same thing, as if it had, in a storm, been swept from the deck. Such too was the case of Manning v. Newnham. In Cocking v. Fraser, no such necessity existed; and the breaking up of the voyage, was attempted to be justified, by the damaged state of the cargo, which, per se, did not authorize the insured to put an end to the voyage, and thus to turn an average loss, for which the insurer was not liable, into a total loss. Maggrath v. Church also establishes the same doctrine.

Now what is the present case? The brig being thrown on shore, within a mile or two from her port of destination, the agent of the insured employs persons to unlade as much of the cargo as could be saved; and by his exertions, nearly a half of it was landed, dried, and sent forward to the market at Lisbon, and sold by the consignees, at about one-fourth of the price of sound corn, leaving a very inconsiderable sum for the owner, after paying the expenses. Is not this precisely the case of Wilson v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co., and Anderson v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co.? with this difference only, that in the first case, the insured declined sending on the corn, when he might have done so, and consequently he was not permitted to turn a partial into a total loss, by his own neglect; and in the latter case, part of the cargo having been rescued from the wreck, before the offer to abandon was made, the insured could not claim as for a total loss, either on account of the injury which the corn had sustained, or of his own act, in not sending it forward to the port of its destination. In this case, the cargo which was saved was sent forward, and sold at the port of its destination. But it is contended by the counsel for the plaintiff, that if the loss be such, as that the insured might at one time have treated it as total, it continues to be so, unless at the time when the offer to abandon is made, it is restored to his possession, clear of the effects of the peril, and in a condition to prosecute the voyage. Now this is certainly not the condition of property, which, at the time of the offer to abandon, is in possession of the re-captor, who has a right to retain it, until he has satisfied his salvage. But in this case, the corn was never out of the possession of the agents of the insured, who exercised every act of ownership over it; subject nevertheless to the laws and customs of the country to which it was sent, with which the insurer and insured are supposed to have been acquainted, at the time they entered into this contract, and to which they impliedly agreed to submit. The cargo which was landed, not only continued in the possession and under the direction of the agents of the insured, but it was relieved from the effects of the peril, as between the insurer and insured; and it was not only in a condition to prosecute the voyage, but it did in fact complete it.

Upon the whole, we are clearly of opinion, that this is not such a loss as the defendants have engaged to indemnify against, and that judgment should be given in their favour. Judgment for defendants.

[Subsequently this case was carried by writ of error to the supreme court, where the judgment was affirmed. 1 Wheat. (14 U. S.) 219.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April 11, 1866.

LIBEL FOR DAMAGES—COMPENSATION FOR USE OF A VESSEL—PART OWNER—DISSENT TO VOYAGE.

1. A part-owner of a vessel, dissenting from a voyage, and receiving a stipulation from the other owners for the vessel's safe return, is not entitled to compensation for the use of his part of the vessel during the voyage.

[Cited in Coyne v. Caples, 8 Fed. 639; Scull v. Raymond, 18 Fed. 550; Head v. Amoskeag Manuf'g Co., 113 U. S. 23, 5 Sup. Ct. 447.]

[Cited in Swain v. Knapp, 34 Minn. 236, 25 N. W. 399.]

2. A court of admiralty has no jurisdiction of a claim by a part-owner dissenting from a voyage, for the use or destruction, during the voyage, of his share of the outfits. The remedy is in equity.

[Cited in Lewis v. Kinney, Case No. 8,325; The H. E. Willard, 52 Fed. 388, 53 Fed. 600.]

In the year 1859, the libellant brought his libel in this court, and therein alleged that the respondents were owners of three fourth parts of the ship Marengo, and were about to send her to sea on a whaling voyage, against the remonstrance of the libellant, who owned the remaining one-fourth part; and he prayed that his share might be appraised, and stipulation be taken in this court for its safe return: all which was done. At his request, his share of the outfits remaining on board the vessel from her former voyage was not included in the appraisement nor in the stipulation. The Marengo [Case No. 9,066]. The vessel made her voyage, and returned in safety to New Bedford, her port of departure, according to the exigency of the stipulation, bringing a very valuable cargo of oil; and this libel in personam was brought to recover compensation for the use of the libellant's part of the vessel, together with the value of such of the outfits above mentioned as were consumed in the course of the voyage. The law of England, which we have followed in this country, approximates the co-ownership of vessels to other commercial associations in this, that it gives to a majority in interest of the owners the right to control the employment of the chattel. A court of admiralty will, in their favor, dispossess the minority, or a master holding under and for them. If the majority, however, wish to employ the vessel in a way and upon a service from which the minority dissent, the court will require security to be given, as in this case, for her safe return. Story, Partn. § 428; 3 Kent, Comm. 152. So will a court of equity in cases not within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. Haly v. Goodson, 2 Mer. 77. It is upon this doctrine and practice that the libellant founds his claim to compensation. We say that the law which authorizes another person to use his property ought to require payment to be made for that use. It is like the taking of private property for public uses, which, by a principle universally admitted, and expressly sanctioned by the fundamental law of nearly every state of the Union, can only be done upon just compensation to the owner.

T. Parsons, R. C. Pitman, and W. W. Crapo, for libellant.

B. R. Curtis, T. D. Eliot, and T. M. Stetson, for respondents.

LOWELL, District Judge. The libellant contends that the law has taken his property, or required it to be taken for the benefit of the respondents. It would be more strictly accurate to say, that the law allowed the respondents to use their own property, or to dictate the use of the common property. The libellant's property happened to be, from its own nature, inseparable from theirs; but it may have been as great a hardship for them to be obliged to use it, involving, as such use must, an outlay and risk beyond their proper proportion, as it was for the libellant to have the vessel go upon a voyage which he did not approve. In the average of cases, it is equally probable that the majority would be embarrassed by the necessity of equipping and providing the whole vessel, as that the minority would be embarrassed by the necessity of providing for their part. It must be considered, then, as a difference of opinion between persons otherwise equal, excepting in their shares in the common chattel. The minority could hardly expect that their opinion should prevail; and the question then arises between the enforced idleness of the vessel, and her use according to the wish of the greater interest. The law says the latter alternative shall be adopted. The minority have full right to join in the enterprise, but refuse: the vessel sails at the sole risk and expense of the majority. Does it not logically follow that it shall be for their sole profit? This voyage happened to be successful. If there had been a loss, the libellant would not have shared it. What share shall he have in the gain? It is said that so much only is demanded as may fairly be due for the bare use of the libellant's fractional interest, after allowance for insurance and all other proper charges. The argument would be unanswerable, if the parties were strangers, and their property divisible; but in fact the compulsion and the hardship are or may be as great on one side as on the other. The respondents must either use the libellant's property, or let their own lie idle; and, to do this, they must furnish a capital, and assume a risk, proportionately greater than the use of their own fraction would require.

Again, the reason usually assigned for the rule is, that the free use and circulation of commercial property may be promoted. Now, if the majority owners are required to charter as well as to insure the whole vessel, it is to be feared that the burden will be too great, and that the contention would come to be, not who should employ the vessel, but who should evade this responsibility; and so the design of the law would be defeated.

The rights of a minority, indeed, are not fully equal to those of a majority, either in this or in other associations, whether social, political, or commercial. It is difficult to see how they can be made so. Perhaps, in this particular case, a law authorizing the sale of the ship under proper regulations might give the nearest approach to such equality. For in truth the actual hardship of their position comes chiefly from the fact that a small fraction of a ship does not readily find a purchaser. If it were as salable as the shares in any well-known stock company, the difficulty would be as nearly met as could be expected in a matter of this kind. But, whether this be so or not, I cannot believe that the remedy now sought to be applied would work fairly for the other owners. In theory of law, the choice is, as has been said, between the use and the idleness of the ship: if she is used, and the minority will not take their chances of the adventure, they are insured; if she were not used, they would earn nothing, and so they are not injured. Their rights are more fully protected than in most other similar cases. If they were partners or joint owners in a stock company, the majority could compel them to take the risks of any lawful enterprise. Here they have their option. That congress might well be asked to regulate this matter, I readily admit, for the rule does not seem so well adapted to modern voyages as to those of earlier times; but whether the regulation should extend to granting compensation, in all cases, to the minority owner, I very much doubt.

The weight of authority agrees with what I have supposed to be the true reason of the case. In an English case in chancery, decided in 1680, which brought up this point, the plaintiff was nonsuit. Anonymous, 2 Ch. Cas. 36. This action was taken upon consideration of a certificate of the course of the admiralty, made by Sir Lionel Jenkins, to whom this question was referred by the lord chancellor. See 2 Wynne's Life of Sir L. Jenkins, p. 792. The language of that learned judge is very explicit, as well as forcible. "I humbly submit," he says, "unto your lordship, that, in regard Mr. Clare was, according to the ancient practice of the admiralty of England in such cases, duly summoned, and admonished to contribute his quota as part-owner to the setting out of the ship, as the other part-owners did, and that he refused or at least neglected so to do; and that thereupon a due appraisement was made, and bail given by Mr. Newton, and other owners of the other parts, to bring back the ship, and consequently Mr. Clare's part in it, within the time limited in the acts of court for letting his part go out upon bail; or else, in case the ship should miscarry, to pay him the value of his part, as it stood appraised before its setting out, and that the said Mr. Clare's part was repaired, fitted, and set out in those voyages at the charge of the said other part-owners,—he, the said Mr. Clare, ought not, by the civil law, nor by the practice of the admiralty of our neighboring nations, nor particularly by the course of the admiralty in England, to have any share in the freight or any other profits made by the said ship in those voyages. If the law and practice in England were otherwise, it would be very mischievous to our shipping and navigation, the greatest part whereof being carried on by the contribution and joint power of part-owners, all partnership would cease, if a partner bearing no part of the burden should come to a share of the profits. Nor would there scarce any sea voyage go forward, if it were not in the power of the major part of the owners to overrule a cross-grained partner, and dispose of the whole ship," &c.

In a recent case, this doctrine has been reaffirmed, with the addition, that where the dissent was not notified until after the vessel had been repaired, and fitted for the voyage, the dissenting owner, though not entitled to any share of the earnings, must contribute his proportion of the repairs and outfits. Davis v. Johnston, 4 Sim. 539.

Although the point has not been directly decided in this country, yet the early case above cited is strong evidence of what the law was when our jurisprudence assumed a separate character. And the opinions of our jurists have generally coincided with the English doctrine. See Willings v. Blight [Case No. 17,765]; Story, Partn. § 431; 3 Kent, Comm. 152. And the course of practice and forms of stipulations in use here accord with this view. In a late treatise of acknowledged value, it is indeed suggested that the point is still open, and reasons are given in support of the position now taken by the libellant. 2 Pars. Mar. Law, 558. In the present case I have had the great advantage of the able development and illustration of these reasons by the learned author, in argument at the bar: but I cannot persuade myself that the law is still unsettled; and upon authority, if not upon the reasoning of the case, I must decide for the respondents.

The claim of compensation for the use or destruction of outfits is beyond the jurisdiction of a court of admiralty. A court of equity is the proper tribunal for the adjustment of accounts between part-owners. Kellum v. Emerson [Case No. 7,669]. It is true that the account in this case might be a very simple one, but that is not the test of the jurisdiction. The subject-matter is not within the cognizance of the court. The same objection would hold to the claim for earnings, considered as an item of an equitable account between part-owners. In undertaking to decide it, I have regarded it only as a demand for compensation in the nature of freight, due at all events, without regard to the issue of the enterprise, as upon a compulsory letting of the libellant's fraction of the vessel. If part-owners would be liable to make such a payment, it might be recovered here. Libel dismissed.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The libellant, owner of one-fourth of the ship Marengo, prays the court to require the claimants, owners of three-fourths, to give security, by stipulation, for the return of that ship from a whaling voyage, on which they are about to send her, against the will of the libellant.

The claimants object, on the ground that the libellant did not dissent from the voyage, or make known his intention to ask for security, until after the claimants had expended a very large sum in preparations and outfits for the voyage, and the ship was nearly ready for sea. It is admitted, however, that the libellant did, in due season, give notice to the claimants, that he, the libellant, would not fit his quarter part of the Marengo, or pay any of the bills for the contemplated voyage. It is not alleged in the answer, that the omission of the libellant to give notice of his intention to ask security, or make a more explicit declaration of his dissent, has caused any loss or inconvenience to the claimants, or that it would in any manner have changed or affected their determination, as to the voyage, or their action in relation thereto. The court cannot, either from the allegations of the answer, or from the evidence, infer that such delay, on the part of the libellant, has worked any injury or inconvenience to the claimants.

Beside this, the letter of the fifth of May, which was before the claimants had begun to prepare this ship for sea, was an express notice, that the libellant would not unite in the preparations for this voyage, or bear any part of the expenses thereof. This, surely, was sufficient to indicate to the claimants, that he did not concur in the contemplated enterprise, and the claimants could hardly have believed that the libellant was willing that his one-fourth of the ship should be sent upon a whaling voyage, of three or four years' duration, not only without compensation to the libellant, and for the sole benefit of the claimants, but also without any security for the final restoration of his property. And it is not even alleged in the answer, that the claimants went forward in the fitting of this vessel, under the belief that the libellant did not dissent from the voyage, or would not claim the security now asked. The only case cited to sustain this defence, is Christie v. Craig, 2 Mer. 137. That was an application to the chancellor, just as the vessel was about to sail. It seems to have been an ex parte motion, which the chancellor would not grant, without further inquiry. It did not appear that the applicant had, in any way, indicated to the major-part owners, that he should not concur in the voyage, or warned them against incurring expenses or liabilities; and the chancellor states that they had made charter-parties, and might be subjected to demurrage. That case was quite different from the present. If it had appeared that the libellant had once assented to this voyage, either expressly, or impliedly by knowing that the ship's husband would, in the usual course of business, prepare the vessel for sea, under the general authority previously given by all the owners, and had permitted the agent to incur large expenses in these preparations, certainly the court would have taken those facts into consideration, and either refused this application altogether, or granted it only upon such terms as would do justice to the claimants. But upon the answer, and, I may add, the evidence also, in this case, I do not think the objection can be sustained.

The remaining question is, for what shall the stipulation be taken? It seems, from the case of The Apollo, 1 Hagg. Adm. 306, that in the high court of admiralty in England, it is taken for the estimated value of the ship. But, in this court, the practice has been to take security in double the estimated value. Dun. Adm. Prac. 473. This is also the practice in the district court of the United States in Philadelphia,—Fox v. Paine [Case No. 5,014],—and this practice I shall follow.

In determining what shall be the estimated value, the question has arisen, whether the outfits which remained upon the return of the vessel from a former whaling voyage, in which all the owners had united, should be included. Those returned outfits were the property of all the owners in common. It is insisted, that the libellant's one-fourth of those returned outfits should be included in the stipulation, as constituting a part of the vessel, or of her tackle, apparel, and furniture, as a whale ship. The libellant insists that they ought not to be so included, and that they constitute no part of the ship, for the return of which he asks for security. This question may be disposed of, by saying that the court does not think it necessary to go into an inquiry, as to the value of articles of property, for the purpose of including the amount thereof in the stipulations, when the libellant does not desire such increase of his security; or, in other words, that the court need not give to the libellant more than he asks.

That the outfits are capable of a separate valuation, there is no doubt. Every witness, to whom that question has been put, has given a separate valuation of the ship, and of the outfits, without suggestion that there was any difficulty in making the distinction. The libellant, by his counsel, verbally requests the court for a stipulation upon the estimated value of the ship, without including the outfits, and that is what I shall give. I do not go into the question, whether the libellant might have had the outfits, included in the valuation, nor whether the claimants have the right to hold and use the returned outfits, upon the same terms as they have a right to hold and use the ship. Upon the actual request made by the libellant, I do not think it necessary to go into that inquiry. Upon the evidence, I think that the libellant's quarter part of the ship, exclusive of the returned outfits, was of the value of $1,700; and I shall require a stipulation in double that amount. As to costs, the claimants insist that no costs should be awarded to the libellant, because the whole litigation has arisen from his refusal of a reasonable proposition to give security out of court. This renders it necessary to look into the correspondence. Both parties offered to refer the valuation, upon which security was to be given, to suitable men; but the claimants insisted that the returned outfits should be included in such valuation, and to this the libellant would not accede. The adjustment out of court was prevented by the claimants insisting that the question of their right to hold and use the returned outfits, as a part of, or appurtenant to, the vessel, and give security therefor accordingly, should be settled at the same time with the valuation. But as the libellant was then, as now, willing to take security for the vessel only, there was no necessity for connecting with that the question of the right to the outfits. The claimants might have agreed to a valuation of the vessel, therefore, without yielding their claim to the use of the outfits, but reserving it to the same extent as it is now left, untouched by the decree of the court. If they had done this, the litigation would probably have been prevented.

I must award costs to the libellant.

The vessel having been heretofore delivered to the claimants, on stipulation, the decree will be, that they give a stipulation, with sureties for the return of the vessel to the port of New Bedford. This being a whale ship, and all the owners resident in New Bedford, I think she should be returned to that port.

[NOTE. Subsequently, upon the safe return of the vessel, the libellant, who had objected to its being sent on the voyage, filed a libel in this court to recover damages or compensation for the use of his part of the vessel, together with certain outfits consumed in the course of the voyage. The court held that, since the libellant had received a stipulation from the other owners for the vessel's safe return, he was not entitled to compensation for the use of his part of the vessel during the voyage, and that a court of admiralty had no jurisdiction of his claim for the use or destruction, during the voyage, of his part of the outfits. The remedy was in equity. The bill, therefore, was dismissed. Case No. 9,065.]

MARET et al. v. WOOD.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 2.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1826.

PLEADING AT LAW—GENERAL ISSUE—WHAT IT ADMITS.

By pleading the general issue the defendant admits the right of the plaintiffs to sue by the name of Charles Maret & Son, without naming the son; and a note, indorsed to the plaintiffs by that name, and produced by them on the trial, is primâ facie evidence of the existence of such a firm.

Assumpsit, on the defendant's promissory note for $163.25, dated May 27, 1820, payable twelve months after date to one Thomas Williams, or order, and by him indorsed "to Charles Maret & Son." Plea, non assumpsit, and issue. The declaration stated that "William Wood was attached to answer to Charles Maret & Son, trading under the firm of Charles Maret & Son," without naming the son, whereupon the said plaintiffs complain, &c.

Mr. Hall, for defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiffs could not recover unless they proved, by other evidence than the indorsement, the existence of such a house or copartnership as that of Charles Maret & Son; which instruction THE COURT refused to give, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) being of opinion that the defendant, by pleading the general issue, had admitted the existence of such a firm and the competency of the plaintiffs to sue by that name; and that if the defendant had now any remedy, it must be by motion in arrest of judgment.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, was of opinion that the production of the note by the plaintiffs, indorsed to them, by that name, was primâ facie evidence of the existence of such a firm.

The MARGARET.

[5 Biss. 353; [1] 5 Chi. Leg. News, 565.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. July, 1873. [2]

SHIPPING—TUG AND TOW—GROUNDING OF TOW—PRESUMPTION OF KNOWLEDGE—SAILING QUALITIES—CONDITION OF HARBOR.

1. The captain of a tug is bound to know the sailing qualities of a vessel which he had towed into a harbor on several previous occasions.

[Cited in Stretch v. The Margaret, 2 Fed. 258.]

2. He is also bound to know the condition of the harbor, the effect of the wind and waves, and the necessary course to safely enter the harbor.

3. Though the tow should be properly steered and follow in the wake of the tug, the responsibility as to the mode, manner and speed of entrance, and the course pursued, is with the tug.

This was an appeal from the decree of the district court, dismissing a libel filed by Charles F. Bliss et al., owners of the brig Mechanic, against the tug Margaret, to recover damages by reason of the grounding of the brig while entering the harbor of Racine in tow of the Margaret. [Case unreported.]

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. This case has been ably argued, and it must be admitted is not free from difficulty. I have hesitated somewhat in consequence of the decision of the district judge dismissing the libel, but the parties are entitled to my best judgment on the facts, and not being able to agree with the district judge on some of the leading facts, and on which the case must turn, I shall reverse the decree.

The facts are, that the brig Mechanic, of which the libellants were the owners, in November, 1868, took on a load of lumber at Suamico, for Racine, and not far from noon on the thirtieth day of November, arrived off that harbor, and signaled the tug Margaret to come and tow her in. The tug accordingly went out and reached the brig, about a mile and a half from the harbor, the precise distance not being distinctly ascertained. The tug approached the brig on the starboard, or weather quarter, the wind at the time blowing from the north and west. A starboard line was thrown from the brig to the tug, and either then, or shortly afterwards, and before the tug entered the harbor with the tow, there was a port line attached to the tug, and the brig was taken in tow. At this time the brig was northeast of the harbor. The harbor consisted of two piers extending out into the lake in nearly an easterly direction, and about 175 feet apart, the north pier extending 300 feet further east than the south pier. The evidence is not entirely clear as to the precise manner in which the tug approached the harbor. The channel was close to the north pier, and was about 12 feet in depth, and perhaps not exceeding 75 feet in width. On the south side of the entrance, there was a shoal. In rounding to, or approaching the harbor, either at a greater or less distance from the north pier, there being a considerable sea or heavy ground swell driving into the harbor, apparently from the northeast, the brig sagged off to the southward, struck the shoal there, and finally was thrown, by the force of the swell, upon the south pier, and a hole stove in her quarter, and was sunk and very seriously damaged. The question is, whether this was the fault of the tug.

There are several points on which there is a conflict in the evidence. The first is, as to the time and place where the port line was attached to the tug. On the part of the libellants it is claimed that, in the first instance, the starboard line was attached and then the brig towed within a hundred feet, more or less, from the north pier, when the tug stopped and another line was called for and attached to the tug, and the lines tautened up, and in that way the tug curved around the north pier with both lines fastened, the brig having thus lost her steerage way, and in consequence of that was thrown over on the shoal.

On the part of the defense, it is claimed that a mile from the north pier, and almost immediately after the starboard line was attached to the tug, and before it was tautened up so as to really commence the operation of towing, the captain of the tug called for another line, and it was immediately attached.

This is the first and one of the principal points of conflict in the evidence. Another is, as to what caused the parting of the lines. On the part of the defense it is claimed that the swell of the lake, the rise and fall of the tug and the brig, not always together, caused such a strain on the lines in entering the harbor that the port line parted, and then the brig sagged over on the shoal, and afterwards the starboard line parted.

The fact is, that the brig did fall off and run aground, and the question is how it was done, judging by the best lights that are before us in the evidence.

I think this fact may be considered as established by the clear weight of the evidence; and it tends greatly to elucidate this case, and to enable us to arrive at a correct conclusion: It is that the port line did not part until the brig was aground. That removes a great deal that was claimed as to the want of strength of the port line. It could hardly be expected that any line would stand the tension of a vessel of such tonnage, and loaded in the manner in which the Mechanic was when she was aground, and therefore it would not be surprising if the line should part under such circumstances.

The brig, then, did not run aground because the port line parted, but the port line parted because the brig ran aground. Now I think one of two things is true upon this hypothesis, that the tug had stopped or was moving so slow in entering the harbor that the brig lost steerage way in rounding the north pier, or that the tug had not given a proper opportunity, and had not the requisite steam upon her to enable the brig to enter the harbor, by laying the right course for that purpose.

Something was said of the brig not having ported her helm in time, and of her not being so manageable a vessel as some others. I think there is not sufficient evidence of any want of skill or diligence on the part of the brig in that respect. And as to the brig not being so manageable a vessel as others, if that were the fact it was known to the captain of the tug when he took her in tow, as he had taken her in port several times before, and it should have induced extreme caution in entering the harbor.

But perhaps there is no sufficient evidence indicating that the brig was any more unmanageable than vessels ordinarily are under such circumstances, and it seems quite clear to me that, from some cause not attributable to the brig, there was not sufficient steerage way on her, either in rounding the north pier or entering through the piers, to enable her to keep her course, and that the tug was bound to see that she had it.

There is a most extraordinary conflict in the testimony, especially in the first particular, namely, as to the time when the port line was given to the tug. Every witness on board of the brig declares that the starboard line was first given, and then, after a considerable interval, when the brig had been towed some distance, the tug arrested her progress and took in the other line and tautened them both up. On the part of the tug, this is asserted to be untrue. It is difficult to understand why, consistently, with the proper knowledge on the part of these witnesses, there could be such a conflict in the evidence upon so important a point; but without deciding where the truth may have been as to this point, I hold, as I have already stated, that owing to some cause, the fault of the tug, either in laying the course, or in turning the pier, the brig had not that control over herself through her helm as to enable her to lay her course so as to "hug" the north pier and go into the harbor by the regular channel. Now, the condition of the harbor, the ground swell, the depth of the water, were all better known to the tug than to the brig. The tug had just left the harbor, and the captain of the brig told the captain of the tug how much the vessel drew at the time, and he therefore had all the data proper to determine what course he should take in towing the brig into the harbor.

Something was said about the protest which was made almost immediately after the accident occurred, not having set forth that the tug was in fault. The protest does not pretend to state what was the cause of the fact which it alleges, namely, that in entering the harbor, the brig fell off to the southward and struck against the shoal, and therefore it is not a circumstance of any material weight in considering the general testimony in the case.

There is the more difficulty in this case because of the particular liability growing out of the relations between a tug and tow. The master of the brig perhaps misapprehended, to some extent, his relations to the tug. It is true the tow is under the control of the tug. The tug directs the course of the tow and its speed. The tug may be said in one sense to be the agent of the tow, and might be under certain circumstances required to accept an act under instructions from the tow. The theory of the master of the brig was that it was entirely under the control of the tug. While this is so in a general sense, it is not exclusively so. There are certain duties incumbent on those who have the management of the tow. It is the duty of the tow to be steered properly; to follow in the wake of the tug, and to perform all those duties which nautical skill demands in order to properly manage the tow. It will not do, in other words, to leave the tow without a suitable man at the helm, and the course of the tow must be directed in the wake of the tug; but, after all, as I have said, the tug controls the speed and the course of the tow, and in entering a harbor, such as that of Racine, the responsibility as to the mode and manner of entrance, the speed with which it is done, and the course to be taken, mainly, if not exclusively, rests with the tug. She should know the natural and necessary effect of the wind and of the waves upon herself and tow, and she should be managed with reference to herself and tow with competent nautical and engineering skill under the circumstances. This demand of the law was not, I think, met by the tug in this case, and, therefore, the court finds the tug was in fault, and liable for the damage sustained by the libellants, and refers the case to a commissioner to ascertain and report the amount of damages, and also to report the value of the tug at the time it was released, on the 2nd day of March.

[This case was taken by appeal to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed. 94 U. S. 494.]

The MARGARET.

[6 Wkly. Notes Cas. 304; 26 Pittsb. Leg. J. 86.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. May 3, 1878.

COLLISION—STEAMER AND SAILING VESSEL—LIGHTS—HALF DAMAGES.

Torch to be exhibited by sailing vessel upon approach of steamer. A steamer seeing but one light of a sailing vessel until too late to avoid a collision, held, under the evidence, responsible. Half damages.

Libel for collision, by Pickering, master of the schooner Margaret, against the steamship Catharine Whiting. Upon the night of November 2, 1877, the steamer Catharine Whiting was proceeding up the river Delaware in mid-channel, nearly opposite Salem creek, under steam, at the rate of about six miles per hour, with proper lights, and a good and sufficient lookout. The tide was about flood, and the wind blowing up the river. The schooner Margaret, a small vessel, was beating down and tacking, and at the moment of collision was heading S. S. W. and was struck on the port side and sank. She had proper lights, but did not exhibit a lighted torch upon the approach of the steamer. The witnesses for the steamer testified that they saw nothing but the green light of the schooner until immediately before the collision, when both lights suddenly appeared; that the green light appeared upon their starboard bow, and their wheel was then starboarded; that when both lights appeared their wheel was put hard-a-starboard and the engine reversed, but, the schooner being then under the steamer's bows, the collision was inevitable.

On the part of the schooner there was testimony that at the time of the collision she was on her western or port tack; that the captain, his son, and steward had gone below, but the captain had come on deck before the collision; that they had proper lights (red and green), and a man in the bow as a lookout. This man, however, was attending to the sails, and there was evidence that he was not forward and did not report the steamer to the man at the wheel. No one on the schooner saw the steamer until the two vessels were very close—almost twenty or thirty yards off—and then saw only the bright light and heard two whistles. The captain of the schooner testified as to the course of his vessel, and that it was impossible that the steamer could not have seen the red light much sooner. It was rather a stormy night, and the schooner made no effort to exhibit a lighted torch.

J. Warren Coulston, for the schooner.

The direction of the wind compelled the schooner to tack as she did, and the steamer is in fault for not keeping out of the way. It is impossible, in view of the course of the schooner, that the red light was not visible long enough before the collision to have prevented it, had it been seen. As to the torch, inasmuch as the failure to exhibit it did not contribute to the collision, the schooner was not guilty of contributory negligence. The Tonawanda [Case No. 14,092].

M. P. Henry, for respondent steamer.

The testimony proves conclusively that the schooner did not exhibit a lighted torch, and is therefore in fault, and that the steamer had a good and sufficient lookout, and did not see the red light of the schooner until it was impossible to avoid the collision. The schooner must therefore have changed her course when immediately in front of the steamer, and is therefore responsible. The Wenona [Case No. 17,411].

THE COURT (CADWALADER, District Judge,) held both vessels to be in fault; the schooner for not exhibiting a lighted torch, and the steamer for not seeing sooner the red light, its failure in that respect not being sufficiently explained. Decree entered in favor of the schooner for half damages with costs.

[NOTE. The following June, Judge Cadwalader granted a motion for a reargument, under which libelant took further testimony touching the allegation of fault in his vessel. The cause was reargued September 24, 1880, before Judge Butler, and a decree entered against the respondent for the damages sustained, with costs. 3 Fed. 870.]

The MARGARET v. The CONNESTOGA.

[2 Wall. Jr. 116.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Nov. 3, 1851.

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY—COSTS ON APPEAL—NEW EVIDENCE—COUNSEL FEES.

1. On an appeal from the district court in admiralty where the decree of that court is reversed here, the successful party has costs on the appeal, unless new evidence was introduced above, which might have caused a different judgment, if it had been offered to the court below.

2. Although, perhaps, in aggravated cases of appeal, where the judgment of the district court in admiralty is affirmed, the court might add by way of taxable costs a sum for counsel fees, in this court, yet such an allowance is not favoured. Involving the exercise of discretionary power, it is a dangerous jurisdiction and one disliked. And in the present case, although this court had decided that the libellee was to blame, yet it refused an application to make him pay fees to the libellant's counsel.

[Cited in The Baltimore, 8 Wall. (75 U. S.) 392.]

A collision had taken place in the dark between a schooner and a steamboat, in which the schooner was sunk and lost. The testimony was in conflict throughout; the hands on the schooner swearing that the accident was caused by the fault of the steamboat: and those on the steamboat swearing it was owing to the fault of the schooner. The testimony in favour of the steamboat being, as he thought, rather the stronger, the district judge, on a libel by the schooner, decided in favour of the steamboat. [Case No. 8,622.] The schooner paid all the costs ($154) incident to the judgment of the court below against her, and brought the case by appeal here, where, being well prepared, it was twice argued on the facts, and quite ably argued by Mr. Waln and R. R. Smith for the schooner, and R. P. Kane and H. Wharton for the steamboat. This court examined the testimony with more than usual attention and not believing all the steamboat's part of it, and declaring its conviction "that it is necessary to the safety of sailing vessels that steamboats be held to a rigorous rule of accountability," and that these latter "are always considered as having the wind free, and must always give way," and "must shew it," reversed the decree below for error in judgment on fact, and referred it to the clerk to assess the damages. [Case No. 8,622a.] The clerk, among other charges which he reported the steamboat bound to pay, reported, not only the $154 paid by the schooner in the district court, on the judgment against her, and a bill of costs ($60) now first filed, as if she had been originally successful and had judgment in her favour below, but also her costs ($44) in this the circuit court on appeal: and, stating that the counsel for the schooner made an additional claim against the steamboat of $200 as counsel fees for defending the schooner, reported the amount as a fair charge, but left the allowance or disallowance of it for the court itself. The allowance of either of these costs on appeal or the fee, as matters to be paid by the steamboat, were now the points in issue.

Mr. Waln and R. R. Smith, for the schooner.

The costs of the appeal are like all other costs: and are to be paid by the party against whom judgment is finally given. It is no fault of the now successful party that the court below erred in its decree: and it would be unreasonable to charge him with costs incident to appeal from a judgment which he strove every way to avert, and which on the same facts as were presented below, is now decided to have been erroneously given. He had as good a right to be heard on appeal as he had to libel the party at all. A recent rule of the supreme court of New York, varying a practice derived by it from the English house of lords, declares that in all cases of reversal of any judgment in this court, except for want of jurisdiction, costs shall be allowed the plaintiff in error or appellant, unless otherwise ordered. The practice independent of rule, is the same in Massachusetts, on all reversals for error in fact. Bullard v. Brackett, 2 Pick. 85. The reversal here was for error in fact.

On the subject of counsel fees the supreme court has said as follows (The Appollon, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 362, 379): "It is the common course of the admiralty to allow expenses of this nature, either in the shape of damages or as part of the costs. The practice is very familiar on the prize side of the court; it is not less the law of the court in instance cases, it resting in sound discretion to allow or refuse the claim;" and the court accordingly, in an instance case, regarded an allowance of $500, counsel fees, as one that was "unexceptionable." In Kentucky the principle is established that the plaintiff, in an action for mesne profits, is entitled to be re-imbursed in such amount as he has in good faith been compelled to pay for the restoration of the property which the defendant has wrongfully taken or withheld from him, and he may therefore recover any counsel fee which he has paid or bound himself to pay in respect to the ejectment, if such fee be not unreasonable. Doe v. Perkins, 8 B. Mon. 198, 200. The same rule prevails in like cases in New Jersey. Den v. Chubb, 1 Coxe [1 N. J. Law] 466. In the present case the court has decided that the steamboat alone was in fault. The owners of the schooner will lose, at any rate, their time, and will go unpaid for much trouble which they have had in prosecuting their case through two courts. They ought, at least, to be indemnified for all money actually paid in the suit. Stimson v. Railroads [Case No. 13,456], which rejected such allowances, and rightly, in patent and common law suits, admitted the distinction between such suits, and cases in admiralty.

R. P. Kane and H. Wharton, for the steamboat.

It is extremely hard to charge the defendant with costs incident to an error not of his, but of the court below. He is in no fault for that judgment. No statute gives costs in such cases, though statutes do in others; and the supreme court of Pennsylvania has held costs in cases of reversal to be so unjust that, where they had been levied by execution, it quashed the writ, and ordered the different officers to refund them. Wright v. Small, 5 Bin. 204; and see Smith v. Sharp, 5 Watts, 292. In an early leading case in New York (Le Guen v. Gouverneur, 1 Johns. Cas. 436, 523), an appeal from chancery, Mr. Justice Benson, after looking into all the cases, delivered the unanimous opinion of the court of errors, "that if judgment be given in the court below against the plaintiff, and he bring error, and the judgment in the court below be reversed, he recovers only the costs of the action below, because the court of errors gives such judgment as the court below ought to have given, and none other; and it would be unreasonable to compel a person, in case of a reversal, to pay costs for the error of the court below. The cases," he says, "are express and decisive." 1 Strange, 617; 1 Anstr. 180, 183; 1 Salk. 262. In 1829, this case was solemnly confirmed in a chancery suit, and declared to be in accordance with the practice of the house of lords in England. Murray v. Blatchford, 2 Wend. 221, 224. In Massachusetts, and in Maine, the plaintiff in error is refused costs on reversal for error in law, though there is a statute in both states, which declares that "in all actions the party preventing shall be entitled to his legal costs." Marble v. Snow, 14 Me. 196. Mr. Beames, in his treatise on Equity Costs (page 246), says: "It seems a general rule, that costs are not given where the decision of the tribunal appealed from is reversed, 'and that very reasonably, for why should any man, in case of a reversal, pay costs for the error of the court below?'"

On the matter of the counsel fees: Although the judgment in The Appollon is that of the court, the language quoted is in its opinion as given by Judge Story, who, in his circuit, went so far as to include counsel fees as damages in a suit on the law side of the court His doctrine, full before the eyes of this circuit, has been pointedly rejected by it, and is at variance with the tone of some of the best courts in the Union; those of Massachusetts, New York (see Stimpson v. Railroads [supra], and cases cited in the court's opinion), and Pennsylvania (Good v. Mylin, 8 Pa. St. 51). "The principle founded on it," says Chief Justice Gibson, "would be without bound or limit, both in the generality of its application, and the extent of its operation. A defendant sued on a plain bond, might find himself soused in damages, not only for the detention of the debt, but for the amount of a surgeon's bill for curing the plaintiff's leg, broken in a fall from his horse while travelling to court, in order to prosecute the suit. Where would it stop? . . . . . No law suit is prosecuted without trouble or expense, and were compensation for these recoverable, as an original ground of action by anticipation, the claim would be a standing dish, and we should have a direct precedent for it in every trial. There is many a right which is not worth the trouble and expense of enforcing it . . . . . and to pay for expenses and trouble in order to make it valuable, would make it the principal battle-ground." A reputable text writer (Conk. Adm. Prac. 780) refers to The Appollon as a cause involving questions of great importance, affecting the rights and sovereignty of foreign nations, and speaks with disapprobation of applying its principle to "other than such as are likely only very rarely to occur;" and says that doing so "would introduce a new element of controversy, and impose on the judge a disagreeable and embarrassing duty." He adds that in the Southern district of New York, extra counsel fees are not allowed except in extraordinary cases, and that no instance has occurred of such an allowance in the Northern. The allowance would have no foundation in professional delicacy, good morals or policy. A fee in this court, at least, is honorary, and cannot be recovered. So it ought to remain; and the court will not lay down a rule which refers the counsel from his client to his client's enemy, and tends to tarnish the brightness of professional honour by allowing counsel to receive his pay not as a grateful recompense from a protected client, who knows and appreciates his service, but makes him extort it from the client of opposing counsel; a client who feels unkindly to him, and whom his own client, stimulated by success, is ready, to any extent, to assist in burdening with appressive and unjust charges. But The Appollon at furthest makes the allowance discretionary; and whatever may be the abstract principle, this case is not one for its application. The collision was in the dark. The evidence was in conflict throughout. The decision of this court rested on a disbelief of the facts positively sworn to by one side, and on a presumption that every collision between a schooner and steamboat is presumed by law to be the fault of the steamboat, till she shows that it was not her fault. This presumption, however necessary to be adopted, may often be false in fact. The court below, on the same evidence that the court had here, thought it repelled by the testimony. Certainly the case was one of doubt. It was ordered for re-argument on facts only and the court examined the evidence with a care more than a case not doubtful would require. It was a case on which two minds might naturally disagree; and which, under favour, comes to be decided as it is, only because one mind was in a court below, and the other in a court above.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. When the judgment of an inferior court is affirmed on error or appeal, it is of course, that the defendant in error has judgment for costs. But when the judgment of the court below is reversed on writ of error or appeal, costs are not of course. It is said that as the appellee is not in fault for the judgment below, he should not pay the costs on appeal; but each party should be left to pay his own costs. Formerly, as there were no damages given on a writ of error, there could be no costs either at common law or by statute of Gloucester. The statute of 3 Hen. VII., c. 10, first gave costs where a judgment was affirmed on a writ of error. That of 4 Anne, c. 16, § 25, gave costs where a writ of error was quashed, but no statute gave them in case of a reversal. In equity and in admiralty there seems to be no other rule than the discretion of the court, as to costs, on appeal. So far as any rule on the subject has been announced by this court, it is only, that we would not allow costs on appeal where new evidence has been introduced above, which might have caused a different judgment if it had been offered to the court below. Carrigan v. The Charles Pitman [Case No. 2,444]. But I believe it has been our usual practice to give the party his costs here, who obtains the judgment of this court, with the above exception only. It is true the defendant is not in default for the judgment of the court below. And to this it may be answered, neither is the plaintiff.

The plaintiff who recovers a debt, or damages for an injury done to him, has a right to recover also the cost incurred in obtaining his judgment. The costs on appeal would seem to form a part of these, as justly as any other, unless in the excepted cases I have mentioned, where he failed below by not producing sufficient evidence, which was afterwards produced on appeal. In courts of law, at the present time, I believe in most instances, costs are given on reversal of a judgment. And I think also as a general rule, that where a plaintiff is forced to appeal in order to recover his debt or damages, and does not succeed in so doing, on his appeal he recovers all his costs up to the date of his decree or judgment, unless some special reason be shown to the contrary.

But while this rule applies to actual taxable costs I know of no instance where we have added a large sum for supposed counsel fees. I know that it was decided, in the case cited at the bar (The Appollon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 362), that courts of admiralty have a wide discretion to allow expenses of this nature, not only in prize, but in instance cases. The allowance is there said to rest in the sound discretion of the court. I must confess my decided repugnance to the exercise of discretionary power over men's property. This principle has been introduced from civil law courts. It partakes rather of the hall of the cadi, than of the judgment seat of the court. I have already refused to follow the practice of the late Judge Story in patent cases, and allow necessary counsel fees as part of actual damages. Stimpson v. The Railroads [Case No. 13,456]. "Sound discretion" is no doubt an excellent phrase in the abstract, but the exercise of it over men's property, liberty or life is sometimes called a tyrannical, not a judicial power. "Discretion" is admitted to be dangerous; but "sound discretion" is claimed as a different thing. Who is to judge of the soundness but the court? And by what is it to judge when it abandons precedent and principle? "Sound discretion" is discretion as settled by rules. Otherwise it is sound only when you decide as the party seeking the decision wants. And hence in practice it would come to mean the notion, whim or caprice of the judge who exercises it. In prize cases, the money is in court. Like plunder, it belongs to no one till it is divided, and it may be no more than right that some crumbs should fall to the share of the learned doctors and proctors who have the trouble of its distribution. I confess my decided aversion to the exercise of an arbitrary power over the property in the pockets or possession of parties in common cases. If I were to judge of the reward merited by the learned counsel on either side of this case, I should say that their labours on behalf of their respective clients, were worthy of ample remuneration. For the case was well prepared, and well argued on both sides; and I think it due to the younger gentlemen, who have for the first time made their appearance in this court (Mr. H. Wharton and Mr. R. P. Kane), to say, that they have defended the case of their clients, with a zeal and ability which deserved, if it did not obtain success, and which are certain omens of their future success and eminence in their honourable profession.

The defendants in this case have acted in good faith in making this defense; and, I have no doubt, consider themselves wronged by the judgment of this court. In all collision cases, both sides are sure they are not in fault, and they swear to it, believing it to be true. In deciding these cases, the testimony is always contradictory; much of it, though not intentionally false, is not true. The truth has to be guessed out by the court by a careful comparison of the admissions and contradictions of the witnesses. The last guess may not be the right one, but he in whose favour it is, may at least be said to have good fortune, if not justice on his side.

Now I will not say that there may not be aggravated cases of appeal when the judgment below is affirmed, that this court, in the exercise of this permitted but disliked exercise of discretion, may add, by way of penalty, to the taxable costs, a sum for counsel fees in this court. But where the defendants, as in this case, had the judgment of the district court in their favour, where there has been no attempt on their part to oppress the plaintiff by protracted litigation, we do not think that a case is presented, where this dangerous discretion of adding two hundred dollars to the damages should be exercised. If the plaintiffs have fortunately recovered in this doubtful contest, they must pay their counsel, as in common law cases, out of the damages recovered, and be thankful for the balance. But for the very able and valuable services of their counsel, they would not probably have recovered anything. It is true, that civil law tribunals by the exercise of this sound discretion, or summum jus propose to make the complainant whole for his entire loss; but this is not always possible, and we should be careful, lest the exercise of this discretion may be to the opposite party summa injuria.

The report of the clerk is therefore confirmed, without the addition of the two hundred dollars demanded as counsel fees.

PRIZE—BLOCKADE.

Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The vessel and cargo in the case were captured in about the same locality with the Banshee [Case No. 965], and by the United States vessel Fulton, for the same offense. The master, in his examination in preparatorio, states that the vessel and cargo were owned by a company or association residing in Charleston; that she was of English build; that she was laden at Nassau, N. P., and destined for Wilmington, North Carolina; and that the voyage was intended to run the blockade of that port. A large portion of her cargo was thrown overboard by her in the effort to escape the chase of the gunboat which pursued and captured her. There is no essential difference in the great mass of the evidence produced on the hearing. The master testifies that he was employed to break the blockade of Wilmington on this voyage. The first, second, and third mates and the steward corroborate the general evidence of the master, and prove, unequivocally, that the prize was engaged, carrying the Confederate flag, to run the blockade at Wilmington. No appearance is made in this cause for any party, and no defense is found in favor of the vessel, upon the proofs. The prize master found no papers on board the prize, and was told that she had none.

The evidence establishes a clear case of an attempt to violate the blockade of Wilmington, with full knowledge, by all parties concerned in the enterprise of its efficient existence. The vessel and cargo are, consequently, subject to condemnation and forfeiture.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1815.

NON-INTERCOURSE — PENALTIES — SECRETARY OF TREASURY—POWER TO REMIT — GOODS SUBSEQUENTLY IMPORTED—COLLECTOR'S SHARE.

1. The secretary of the treasury has no power to remit penalties, unless in cases provided for by law. If he recites his authority under a special act, and remits in pursuance of that act, the remission, if unsupported by such act, cannot be supported under the general act of March,

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

[2] [Reported by John Gallison, Esq.]

1797, c. 67 [1 Story's Laws, 458; 1 Stat. 506, c. 13].

[Quoted in New Orleans Nat. Bank v. Merchant, 18 Fed. 849.]

2. Under the act of 27th of February, 1813, c. 175 [2 Story's Laws, 1298; 2 Stat. 804, c. 33], the secretary of the treasury had no authority to remit the penalties for goods subsequently imported, contrary to the non-importation acts.

3. Under the act of 3d of March, 1797, c. 67, the district judge is bound, upon a petition for remission, to state the facts, and not merely the evidence of the facts; and the secretary of the treasury is bound by this statement of facts, and cannot legally act upon any other evidence. The district judge, in stating such facts, acts judicially, and the proof before him must be made by competent, as well as by credible testimony. A statement by the district judge, that the claimant only swore to the facts before him, is no legal proof under the act of 1797, upon which the secretary of the treasury is authorised to remit.

[Cited in Jewels Stolen from the Princess of Orange, Case No. 11,431; The Palo Alto, Id. 10,700.]

4. Under the act of 27th of February, 1813, c. 175, the secretary of the treasury had no authority to make a remission of part only of the property forfeited. If he remitted, at all, he was bound to remit the whole penalty or forfeiture.

5. Neither under the act of 1797, nor the act of 1813, had the secretary of the treasury any authority to remit the collector's share of the forfeiture, nor any part of it, eo nomine.

6. Until final judgment no part of the forfeiture vests absolutely in the collector; but, after final judgment, his share vests absolutely, and cannot be remitted.

[See The Hollen (Case No. 6,608). But see, contra, McLane v. U. S., 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 404.]

This was an appeal from the district court of Maine in a proceeding upon an information in rem on the instance side of that court. The information contained two counts. The first, which is the only one now necessary to be considered, charged that the cargo, consisting of prohibited goods, was, on the third of September, 1813, imported into the United States from New Brunswick, contrary to the non-importation acts. There was no question, that the vessel and cargo were liable to forfeiture under these acts. Pending the proceedings in the court below, the claimants, Stephen Glover and Charles Tappan, procured a remission from the secretary of the treasury, in consequence whereof the learned judge of that court decreed condemnation of nine sixteenths of the goods claimed by them, and restoration of the remaining seven sixteenths. [Case unreported.] From so much of the decree, as restored the seven sixteenths, the United States appealed to this court; and the sole question was as to the legal sufficiency of these remissions. They were both in the same form, and that to Glover was as follows: "To All to Whom these Presents shall Come, I, George W. Campbell, Secretary, &c., Send Greeting: Whereas a statement of facts, bearing date the 24th of February, 1814, with the petition of Stephen Glover thereto annexed, touching certain forfeitures and penalties incurred under the statute of the United States, entitled 'An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes,' has been transmitted to the secretary of the treasury by the judge of the United States for the district of Maine, pursuant to the statute of the United States entitled, 'An act directing the secretary of the treasury to remit certain fines, penalties and forfeitures therein mentioned,' as by the said statement of facts and petition remaining in the treasury department of the United States may fully appear; and whereas, I, the said secretary of the treasury, have maturely considered the said statement of facts and petition: Now, therefore, know ye, that I, the said secretary of the treasury, in consideration of the premises, and by virtue of the power and authority to me given by the said last mentioned statute, do hereby decide to remit to the said petitioners, the right, claim and demand of the collector only to the said forfeitures and penalties, except one eighth part thereof, on payment of costs and of the duties on the part remitted. Given under my hand and seal, &c. the 29th day of July, A. D. 1814." The summary statement of facts here alluded to consisted solely of the petition of the claimant attested on oath, and the following certificate of the district judge: "District of Maine, February 24, A. D. 1814. Upon a summary examination now had upon this petition, in the presence of the attorney, Lee, and the collector of Bath, the only evidence offered to support the facts stated in it is the deposition of the petitioner, taken before William Stevenson, a notary public and justice of the peace for the county of Suffolk, hereunto annexed."

G. Blake and Mr. Preble, for the United States.

Prescott & Kinsman, for claimants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The points involved in this discussion are of peculiar delicacy and embarrassment, inasmuch as they embrace considerations of the legal power and duties of one of the high officers of the government. It is not the duty of this court, and certainly it is not its inclination, to pry into the conduct of high executive officers with a jealous and scrutinizing eye. The court is, on the contrary, disposed to exercise towards them every liberality not inconsistent with the principles of law. Let it, however, be recollected, that ours is a government of laws and not of men; and that consequently every act of every officer, of the highest, as well as of every inferior grade, must be tried by the test of the law, and stand or fall, as that has dictated. The power to remit penalties and forfeitures is one of the most important and extensive powers, which can be exercised under the government. It vitally affects the rights, the revenues, and the prerogatives of the United States. These cannot be waived, or extinguished, except in the cases and by the persons provided by law. The party, therefore, who sets up a treasury pardon, to purge away a forfeiture, must show that such pardon is within the purview of the powers confided to that department. I do not say, that every thing is to be proved to be done with the precision and accuracy of special pleading, or that a rigid adherence to forms is to be exacted. But there must be a substantial compliance with the requisites of the law; and if, after every reasonable allowance, this cannot be found, the pardon must be adjudged to be inoperative.

I have come with these impressions to the consideration of this cause, and shall now proceed to examine the points, which have been made, with all the respect due to the talents and integrity of the late secretary of the treasury, and with all that firmness which befits the station, I have the honor to occupy. The counsel for the United States have introduced their argument with two propositions, which cannot well, upon legal principles, be doubted. The first is, that the power of the secretary of the treasury to remit penalties and forfeitures can be exercised only in the cases prescribed by law; and the second, that where he recites that the remission is granted by virtue of a special authority granted by a special statute, he cannot be presumed to have acted under any general authority granted by any general statute. The latter position has indeed been questioned at the bar; but I have not been able to perceive in what manner it has been, or can be, impugned. To adopt a contrary doctrine, would be to presume a fact, of which there is no evidence, against the express written declarations of the party; and might often lead to the most mischievous consequences. The present case affords an illustration of the propriety of the position. By the general act authorizing remissions (March 3, 1797, c. 67 [1 Story's Laws, 458; 1 Stat. 506, c. 13]), the secretary of the treasury can remit penalties and forfeitures, only when in his opinion the same shall have been incurred without wilful negligence or any intention of fraud. And, in my judgment, the argument is perfectly correct, that sufficient matter must be stated in a remission under this act, to show that the case is within its purview. It is a special authority, to be exercised only in given cases, and it must be shown on the face of the pardon, that in the opinion of the secretary, there has been no wilful negligence or intention of fraud; and such indeed has been the uniform practice under the statute. But it has never been considered, that it was compulsive upon the secretary to exercise this power; on the other hand, it has ever been deemed a subject submitted to his sound discretion. Very different is the statute (Feb. 27, 1813, c. 175 [2 Story's Laws, 1298; 2 Stat. 804, c. 33]) under which the secretary purports, in this case, to have acted. It is mandatory to the secretary to remit the penalties and forfeitures, where the facts of the cases are brought within the statute. If he is satisfied of the existence of such facts, he has no further discretion, but is bound to remit. The facts too required to be proved under this statute are very different from those under the statute of 1797. It is not necessary to be shown, that there was no wilful negligence or intention of fraud. The only facts to be proved are, that the goods seized were bona fide American property, at the time of their importation; that they were not clandestinely imported or introduced; and that they were imported or introduced since the declaration of war. There are other material differences in the powers given by these statutes, which might authorize and require a remission under the one, which could not be authorized or required under the other. To presume, therefore, an exercise of authority under the general statute, when it is recited to be under the special statute, would not only be a presumption against the fact, but a presumption in some cases, which would involve a violation of law.

The first objection to this treasury remission is, that it was made without any statement of facts, or competent evidence, according to the provisions of the statute, under which it purports to be granted. That statute requires the party to petition for relief to the judge proper to hear the same in pursuance of the act of 1797; and the facts shown on the inquiry before the said judge are to be stated and transmitted, as by the same act is required, to the secretary of the treasury. Nothing can be clearer, than that, by the act of 1797, the judge must state the facts, not merely the evidence of the facts, which appear upon the summary inquiry before him; and it is upon this statement of the facts, and this only, that the secretary is authorized to proceed. In the performance of this duty, the judge exercises judicial functions, and is bound by the same rules of evidence, as in other cases. The proof, therefore, of the facts must be by competent, as well as credible testimony; and he is to transmit a statement of the facts, as they judicially appear before him, and not the evidence, from which he draws a legal conclusion, as to the existence of those facts. Such a statement of facts is in the nature of a special verdict, or an agreed case; and, as there is no appeal allowed by law, it is not competent for any other tribunal collaterally to call in question the competency of the evidence, or the regularity of the proceedings, which preceded such statement. It is conclusive upon all the parties. In the present case, however, there was no such statement of facts. The only evidence offered, to support the petition, was the oath of the party, which was manifestly incompetent in itself, and appears not to have been taken before the district judge. The learned judge does not pretend to give any opinion, as to its competency or credibility, or to certify any facts relative to the subject matter of the petition. The whole proceeding was as pure a nullity, as can well be imagined. The question then comes to this; whether the secretary of the treasury can remit, where no statement of facts has ever been transmitted to him? It is conceived, that but one answer can be given to the question, viz. that he cannot. If, notwithstanding, he should so do, it would deserve great consideration, whether it ought not to be held void, as having issued by mistake or upon false suggestions. Upon this point, however, I beg leave to reserve a decision, until it shall be necessary in judgment. To guard, however, against misapprehension, it is proper to add, that where such statement of facts is transmitted, the opinion of the secretary, as to their sufficiency to bring the case within the statute, is conclusive, and cannot be overhaled in any collateral inquiry.

The next objection is, that the secretary had no authority, under the act of 1813, to remit the forfeiture upon a part only of the goods; nor, under any statute, to remit the collector's share, eo nomine. By the act of 1797, the secretary is authorized to remit "upon such terms, or conditions, as he may deem reasonable and just," the whole or any part of any forfeiture within the purview of that act. And the same power is expressly given, as to all cases within the non-importation act. March 1, 1809, c. 91, § 18 [2 Story's Laws, 1114; 2 Stat. 528, c. 24]. The forfeitures under this last act are to be distributed in the same manner, as those under the collection act of 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws, 573; 1 Stat. 627, c. 22], which in general gives (section 91) to the collector, and naval officer, and surveyor, if any there be, a moiety of the seizures made within the revenue district. But until final judgment or decree no absolute title vests in the collector. His right is merely inchoate, and when it is consummated by a final judgment, it becomes an inefeasible right. If, pending the proceedings, a remission be made of the whole property forfeited, his whole title is gone; if of a part only, his right attaches to the remainder, and by a judgment of condemnation becomes fixed and indissoluble. It is not therefore competent for the secretary to remit eo nomine the collector's share; for the law has expressly given him a moiety of all forfeitures recovered, and whatever may be the portion recovered, his right to the moiety thereof attaches. It is only by a remission of the whole forfeiture, that the collector's share can be wholly defeated; and then it takes place by the mere operation of law. Under the acts of 1797 and 1809, therefore, this special remission could not be supported. And the other part of the objection seems equally well founded. The act of 1813, c. 175, contains no provision authorising a partial remission. It is directory to the secretary to remit all forfeitures within that statute, upon the simple condition of payment of the costs, charges and duties. It was not competent, therefore, for him to interpose any limitation or condition, beyond that which the law had expressed.

Another objection, which rides over all the others, is, that under the act of 27th of February, 1813, upon which the remission purports to proceed, the secretary had no authority whatsoever to grant the remission. This objection, if true, is in every possible view fatal. The importation in the present case is conceded on all sides to have been made in September, 1813, at least six months after the passage of the act. If therefore it be not prospective in its operation, it is very clear that the remission is utterly void. It seems to me, that upon no reasonable construction, consistent with the apparent intent or language of the statute, can it be deemed to apply to future cases. It speaks of goods, which had then been imported into the United States, and of penalties which had then been incurred; and directs the secretary to remit such forfeitures, if it should be proved to his satisfaction, that the goods, at the time of their importation, were (not, should be) American property, and were not (not, should not be) clandestinely imported or introduced, and that they were (not, should be) imported since the declaration of war. The language, therefore, obviously points to cases already past; and directs the prosecutions, if any shall have been (not, shall be) instituted, to be dismissed. The only words of the statute, on which to hang a doubt, are the words, which give the benefit of the act to goods, "which were shipped from the said kingdom (i. e. of Great Britain and Ireland) prior to the second of February, A. D. 1811." But these words are evidently used with reference to goods already imported, and which had already incurred a forfeiture, and must be explained by reference to a preceding act. The act of the 2d of January, 1813, c. 149 [2 Story's Laws, 1283; 2 Stat. 789, c. 7], directing the secretary to remit the forfeiture upon all goods, which had been imported from the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and were shipped on board of vessels, which departed therefrom between the 23d of June, and the 15th of September, 1812. This act afforded a very limited relief, for there were many shipments made to ports in Nova Scotia, and other British colonies, with a view to be imported into the United States upon the repeal of the non-importation act, and which, since the war, had come directly from thence into the United States. The act of the 27th of February, 1813, was designed to reach this very large class of cases. It is not, like the act of 2d of January, 1813, limited to importations direct from the United Kingdom, but to cases, "where goods, &c. have been imported or introduced into the United States from the dependencies of the United Kingdom, &c. since the declaration of war by the United States against the said kingdom, or which were shipped from said kingdom prior to the 2d of February, A. D. 1811." If the sentence had stopped here, there might have been some foundation for the argument, that this last clause might apply to future importations of goods so shipped. But it is immediately added, "whereby the person or persons interested in such goods, &c. or concerned in the importation or introduction thereof, hath or have incurred any fine, penalty or forfeiture, &c." Now no fine, penalty or forfeiture could by law have been incurred, under the non-importation act, by any shipment of goods from Great Britain prior to the 2d of February, 1811, unless they had been subsequently imported into the United States; for that act was not in force until after that day. It is plain, therefore, that the legislature, in this clause, meant to speak of goods, which had not only been shipped, but had been actually imported into the United States. Whether the word "or" is to be construed, as here used for the connective "and," and so operate as a qualification upon the preceding description of goods, or whether it is to be construed as a disjunctive, and so refer to goods not only imported from the British dependencies, but also from other places, if shipped before the 2d of February, 1811, is not now material to consider. It is sufficient, that the words, in their connexion, refer to importations already made, and that it is impracticable, in any other manner, to reconcile the other provisions of the statute. The consequence is, that the present importation was not within the purview of the statute, and the remission was made without competent authority.

Upon the whole, in every view of this subject, I am entirely satisfied that the remission is void and ineffectual. I cannot but regret, that it has fallen to my lot to pronounce this unwelcome sentence; but it is pressed upon me by duties, from which I am not at liberty to shrink, and which, I trust, I am incapable of betraying.

Let the decree of the district court be reversed, and the property be condemned to be distributed according to law. Condemned.

This case was carried by appeal to the supreme court, and afterwards the appeal was abandoned upon a compromise between the parties.

The MARIA.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 283.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 23, 1862.

PRIZE—ENEMY PROPERTY — CLAIM BY NEUTRAL—CLANDESTINE VOYAGE—BLOCKADE—FALSE PAPERS—LOG-BOOK.

No legal transfer of the vessel shown from her enemy owner to her neutral claimant. She came out of the blockaded port clandestinely, on the voyage next preceding the one on which she was captured. She knowingly attempted to violate the blockade. Her papers were false as to her destination. Her log-book was mutilated and altered. Vessel and cargo condemned.

[See The Albert, Case No. 138.]

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. Many of the matters connected with this vessel and her cargo and voyage, and the prosecution and defence of this suit, are strikingly coincident with those occurring and considered in the case of U. S. v. The Albert and Cargo [Case No. 138]; and the proofs in the one case have in several respects been reciprocally invoked into the other, and made part of its proceedings. The Maria was Charleston built, and proceeded from that port to Matanzas, in March, 1862, with a cargo of cotton. She took in a cargo at Matanzas and Nassau for New York, and a charter agreement was entered into between William Smith, her owner, and Messrs. Monet, Jemenez & Co., merchants at Matanzas, March 26, 1862, to add to and complete her cargo at the Bahama Islands, for the port of New York. The cargo consisted chiefly of salt, especially adapted to the Charleston market. There was also a quantity of cotton cards, shipped by R. L. Sanchez. A provisional register of the vessel was taken out in the name of William Smith, at Nassau, New Providence, April 16, 1862. A crew-list was executed by the master, at Matanzas, March 20, and by the mate and men, at Nassau, April 16 and 19, 1862, for a voyage to New York, and back to the port of Nassau. All the cargo was shipped in the name of Charleston hirers, except one shipment by R. L. Sanchez. The vessel cleared at Nassau April 16, but the destination of the cargo was not named. The log described her departure from Nassau, Sunday, April 20, 1862, towards New York, and her arrest by the United States steamer Santiago de Cuba, at 1 p. m. on the 1st of May. It is alleged in the libel that this seizure was made at sea, near the South Carolina coast, on or about the 30th of April. The master, intervening in the suit, and claiming and answering for the owner, admits the allegation in the libel to be correct, and as the log contains no other entry after the close of the last day of April than the mention of the capture, that undoubtedly occurred at sea-time, 1 a. m. instead of 1 p. m.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

Monet, Jemenez & Co., intervene and claim a part of the cargo, 800 bags of salt and two cases of cigars. Rafael L. Sanchez claims forty boxes, containing eighty dozen of cards for cleaning cotton, as shipped at Matanzas for New York, to touch at Nassau. The names of Monet, Jemenez & Co., printed in the bill of lading, signed by the master at Matanzas March 26, 1862, as shippers of the goods, are erased in the bill found on board, and the name of R. L. Sanchez is inserted in the place, as shipper. Francisco Otero & Co., merchants, of Matanzas, were charterers of the vessel, and were to be her consignees at Nassau and New York. The bill of lading directs the consignees named therein to pay freight on their consignments to Messrs. F. Otero & Co., the charterers.

The facts, established by direct proof or strong presumption, were claimed by the libellants to be: 1. That the schooner, being enemy property, went, on the voyage directly preceding the one on which she was captured, with a cargo, from Charleston to Matanzas, and in violation of the blockade of the former port. 2. That her owner colorably attempted, at Matanzas, to change her title to a neutral ownership, but that the vessel remained, in law, enemy property. 3. That at Matanzas and Nassau she took on board cargo destined for Charleston or a blockaded port, and attempted, with such cargo, to enter a blockaded port. 4. That her papers, and the presentation of her voyage, were intentionally simulated and false. 5. That her log was culpably mutilated, and also contained false entries, intended to mislead belligerent cruisers. 6. That the voyage was fitted out and prosecuted with full knowledge of the existence of the war and of the blockade of the Southern ports of the United States, with a design to evade the blockade.

The claimants of the vessel and cargo contest these positions in pleading and on trial, and maintain that the voyage was honest and lawful in all particulars, and that the approach of the vessel, out of her true course, towards a blockaded port, was compelled by stress of weather and injury to the vessel therefrom, and a want of water. These various propositions have been subjects of such repeated consideration in this court for many months past, that all labored discussion of the points at this time will be unnecessary to disclose their legal bearing in the cause. The decisions in regard to them will remain the law governing the action of this court until changed by the judgment of the higher tribunals, and the attention of the court will be limited to ascertain the conclusions justly deducible from the proofs given in the cause.

The master and mate of the vessel, and Monet, a passenger on board, differ somewhat as to the time and place of the capture of the vessel. The master says it was about the 30th of April, 1862, near 12 o'clock, in latitude 30° and some minutes north, and longitude 84° 4′ 30″ west, but he rather thinks that the longitude was 80° 4′ 30″ west, and presumes the latter is the reckoning by the mate in the log-book. The mate testifies that the capture was on the 1st of May, twenty or thirty miles off the coast of South Carolina; and the passenger, Monet, states the time of capture to have been Wednesday, April 30, eighteen or twenty miles off land, and in the vicinity of Charleston. The entry in the log is that the prize was hailed by the capturing vessel May 1, at one p. m., and the computation of her position at the close of April 30 is entered at latitude 32° 7′ north, longitude 80° 44½′ west. The statement of this matter by the master is of no great moment, other than as showing that his verbal representation of facts connected with the voyage is to be accepted with caution. For instance, it is palpable that if the vessel was, when seized, at either point of latitude or longitude adopted by the master in his evidence, she would have been widely clear of any existing attempt to evade the blockade of Charleston or of the coast of South Carolina. The master says that he heard from Smith that he purchased the vessel at Matanzas from an agent of her American owner, and received a bill of sale, but the witness never saw any bill of sale, and does not know its contents.

The master had known, for ten months, of the war and the blockade of Charleston. These facts were publicly notorious on board. The master imputed her position out of the due route to New York to violent weather, and damages to the vessel, and loss of water on board, incurred after her departure from Nassau. He says he was not steering for any particular port, but was endeavoring to make the blockading squadron, to obtain a supply of water; that the course of the vessel was altered April 27, to endeavor to fall in with the blockading squadron to obtain water; that on the 22d or 23d of that month she had experienced a gale and shipped large quantities of water, and had two water casks stove in and lost all the water they contained; and that when the vessel left Nassau she had four casks of water. The original and natural entries in the log respecting the state of the weather on the 22d and 23d days of April are these: "22d, p. m. begins with fresh breezes, with rain, squally; 3 p. m. double-reefed the main and single-reefed the foresail, took in the flying jib; 5 p. m., tacked to the S. W.; 6 p. m. set the flying jib; 11 p. m. took in flying jib and tacked to N. W." Then follow in lighter ink and more constrained formation of the words: "Shipped several heavy seas, and stove the head in water-casks." After that paragraph is written, in the same hand and ink as the first entry, "M., fresh breezes." This supplies a forcible presumption that the paragraph in regard to water-casks was interpolated in the entry at an after day, to support the excuse set up on the seizure of the vessel, that she was seeking relief because of sea damages and the loss of water. Neither the mate nor the passenger, in their testimony, supports the statements of the log, or the evidence of the master in this respect, on his examination in preparatorio. Another flagrant inconsistency in the master's evidence under the 12th and 24th interrogatories forcibly impairs his title to credit as a witness.

Upon the facts and law of the case, the libellants have, in my judgment, established the culpability of this voyage. The claimants fail to show a legal transfer of the vessel from her enemy owner to the neutral claimant. She came out of a blockaded port clandestinely on the voyage next preceding this on which she was captured. She was hired, freighted, and despatched on this voyage with full knowledge of the existence of the war and of the blockade of Charleston and the Confederate ports. She was destined for Charleston or a blockaded port in that vicinity, and an attempt to make such unlawful voyage was made and persisted in, in her navigation, to the time of her capture. The papers of the ship, setting forth the destination of the voyage, were intentionally falsified. The log was unlawfully mutilated, and falsely changed and varied in important entries. The condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel and cargo are decreed.

SEAMAN'S WAGES—MISCONDUCT — IMPRISONED ON SHORE—LEFT BEHIND—CLAIM FOR TIME —EFFECTS ON BOARD.

1. Misconduct in a seaman will not be punished by an absolute forfeiture of his wages and of his effects on board, unless it be continued or repeated, or, if occurring but once, be of a highly aggravated character.

[See The Almatia, Case No. 254.]

2. If a master causes a seaman to be imprisoned on shore for misconduct, he ought, before leaving port, to ascertain if the seaman is willing to return to his duty.

3. If the seaman is imprisoned and wrongfully left behind, he will, in an action in rem for his wages, be entitled to include in his claim the time he is thus imprisoned and detained, and his necessary disbursements during that time, and the value of his property which was left on board; but direct damages, by way of compensation, are not, under such circumstances, recoverable in a court of admiralty.

4. If the voyage mentioned in the shipping articles is broken up without cause, and without the seaman's consent, he may recover wages for the whole voyage stipulated, deducting his earnings meanwhile.

[Cited in Highland v. The Harriet C. Kerlin, 41 Fed. 224; The Idlehour, 63 Fed. 1019.]

This was a suit in rem for seaman's wages. The defence was, that the libellant had, by disobedience and misconduct in the port of New-Orleans, forfeited his wages, wearing apparel, &c. The shipping articles were for a voyage from Boston to New-Orleans, thence to a port in Europe, and thence to the United States. The vessel returned directly from New-Orleans to New-York, without any cause assigned or shown for the non-performance of the agreed voyage; and it did not appear that the intended change of voyage was made known to the seamen, or acquiesced in by them. On the voyage out to New-Orleans, the conduct of the crew was unexceptionable. At New-Orleans, after the vessel had arrived at the wharf, and about noon of the day of her arrival, Rogers, the libellant, went on shore without leave, and against the orders of the mate, and returned that evening in a state of intoxication. The next morning, when called to duty, he did not turn out at the call. No other act of insubordination was shown. He was subsequently, but not the same day, put into prison, and was left at New-Orleans, when the vessel sailed.

Edwin Burr, for libellant.
William Emerson, for claimant.

BETTS, District Judge. The acts of disobedience or misconduct which are proved against the libellant are not enough to justify the withholding of all his wages. Courts will not visit, with an entire forfeiture of wages, every act of disrespect or disobedience by a seaman to his officers, or every neglect of duty. The misconduct must be either continued or repeated, or, if occurring but once, must be of a highly aggravated character, to subject a seaman to a forfeiture of the wages of a whole voyage, previously earned by him, and to justify, moreover, his imprisonment and his abandonment in a foreign port without money or clothing. This is the well-understood doctrine of maritime courts, both in this country and in England. Abb. Shipp. 472, and notes; The Mentor [Case No. 9,427]; Thorne v. White [Id. 13,989]; Relf v. The Maria [Id. 11,692]; Black v. The Louisiana [Id. 1,461]; Drysdale v. The Ranger [Id. 4,097].

The act of disobedience in the libellant was, his refusing to come back on board the vessel when ordered by the mate, and his absenting himself for half a day, and neglecting to turn out on the following morning when called to duty. No one of these offences calls for a forfeiture of wages. He behaved well up to the time of his arrival at New-Orleans; and the imprisonment he there suffered was itself a severe punishment. His not coming promptly to work on the morning after his return, was not noticed at the time, and was ascribed, no doubt properly, to the stupor following his recent debauch. After he was put in prison, there was no effort made on the part of the officers to induce him to return to his duty, and he did not even have notice that the ship was about to sail.

It was the duty of the master to have given him such notice, and to have ascertained whether he was willing to return to his duty; and, if he then persisted in refusing to do so, the master would have been justified in treating him as a deserter. The Bulmer, 1 Hagg. 163. I am, therefore, of opinion, that he is entitled to wages for the voyage, with an abatement because of his fault, and also to the value of his property left on board. Since the voyage actually performed was varied from the one stipulated in the shipping articles, without cause and without the consent of the seamen, the latter is to be taken as the voyage upon which the wages are to be estimated. This precise point has been adjudged in this state. Hoyt v. Wildfire, 3 Johns. 518. The admiralty courts of this country adopt the same doctrine. Woolf v. The Oder [Case No. 18,027]; Moran v. Baudin [Id. 9,785]; Emerson v. Howland [Id. 4,441]. See, also, 3 Kent, Comm. 187.

When the voyage is improperly broken up, or the mariner is wrongfully discharged in a foreign port, he is entitled to compensation for his charges and expenses incurred in consequence, which is sometimes given in the name of wages, and sometimes in the form of damages for breach of contract. I shall not regard the libellant's imprisonment any further than as it marks the time he was out of employ, and was necessarily detained at New-Orleans. If he makes claim to compensation, founded on the act of the master in imprisoning him, it must be pursued in another form, and before a different tribunal. He ought, however, to be allowed any disbursements he was subjected to for board, or for obtaining necessaries and comforts during the period of his imprisonment.

As the usual course of trade between New-Orleans and Europe is to the port of Liverpool or Havre, either of these may be taken by the claimant as the one to which the vessel would have gone, and wages will be allowed for the ordinary time of a voyage to such port, for the time of unlading and lading, and for the return of the vessel to the United States. On the other hand, the wages earned by the libellant, from the time he left New-Orleans up to the time when, by the estimate, the vessel would have returned to the United States, and also three days' wages for the day he was absent at New-Orleans without leave, and also the sum paid by the vessel for a man to supply his place, during that absence, are to be deducted. As the misconduct of the libellant appears to have been a sudden freak after the vessel had arrived in port, and was attended with no ill consequences, I consider the punishment already inflicted upon him as fully commensurate with the gravity of his offence.

It will be referred to the clerk to ascertain the amount due to the libellant, in conformity with the principles which have been indicated.

District Court, D. Oregon. July 26, 1864.

SHIPPING — SALE TO FOREIGNER — FORFEITURE — CORPORATION — ON CREDIT — AMERICAN REGISTER — SEAMAN'S WAGES — UNLICENSED ENGINEER.

1. A sale of a vessel to a corporation organized and existing under the laws of a foreign country, is a sale "to a subject or citizen of a foreign prince or state," as the case may be, within the meaning of section 16 of the registry act (1 Stat. 295), without reference to the nationality or citizenship of the shareholders therein.

2. But if such corporation were not a subject within the purview of such section, then if any of the shareholders therein were such subjects, such sale would be thus far, and therefore "in part," a sale "to a subject or citizen of a foreign prince or state."

3. A sale upon credit, and upon the condition that the purchaser shall not use the vessel until the purchase money is all paid, and that if default is made therein, the seller may retake the vessel into his possession, is a sale within such section 16.

4. Sale of vessel to a subject of a foreign prince, how and by whom made known, and upon whom, is the burden of proof concerning the omission to make such sale known.

5. Upon the sale of a vessel to such subject, she is no longer entitled to the benefit of her American register; and if she is afterwards navigated thereunder, it is a violation of section 27 of the registry act (1 Stat. 298).

6. An unlicensed engineer cannot recover wages for services on a steam vessel engaged in carrying passengers on the waters of the United States.

Lafayette Grover, for claimant Lubbock.
David Logan, for Gibson.

DEADY, District Judge. This suit is brought by the United States to enforce a forfeiture of the steamboat Maria, for alleged violations of sections 16 and 27 of the registry act, of December 31st, 1792 (1 Stat. 295, 298), which read as follows:

"Section 16. If any ship or vessel * * * which shall be hereafter registered as a ship or vessel of the United States, shall be sold or transferred, in whole or in part, by way of trust, confidence, or otherwise, to a subject or citizen of any foreign prince or state, and such sale or transfer shall not be made known, in manner hereinbefore directed, such ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel and furniture, shall be forfeited."

"Section 27. If any certificate of registry or record shall be fraudulently or knowingly used for any ship or vessel not then actually entitled to the benefit thereof, according to the true intent of this act, such ship or vessel shall be forfeited to the United States, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture."

The libel of information was filed on the date of the seizure—March 3d, 1863—and the first article thereof, alleges that the Maria, at the port of San Francisco, on July 29, 1858, was duly registered as an American vessel, of $69^{81}/_{95}$ tons burthen, with William Lubbock sole owner and master; that in August, 1858, the Maria cleared from the port aforesaid for the foreign port of Victoria, where in the year 1859, she was sold and transferred to a foreign corporation—the British Columbia and Vancouver's Island Steamboat Co.—the same being a body corporate under the laws of Vancouver's Island, and composed in whole or in part of aliens; that afterwards—about August 8, 1862—the Maria entered at the port of Astoria, in the district of Oregon, with Robert Haley as master, the same being the first American port that she had entered after the sale and transfer aforesaid, and said master did not then make such sale known to the collector at Astoria, but fraudulently and wrongfully concealed the same therefrom, whereby the Maria became forfeited, etc. The second and third articles of the libel are substantially the same as the first, except that in the third, it is further alleged, that said Lubbock first sold an interest in said vessel to certain persons at Victoria, citizens of the United States, and that afterwards said Lubbock, and such other persons, sold and transferred her to the foreign corporation aforesaid; that upon the entry of the vessel at Astoria, said Haley filed the American register aforesaid, with the collector of that port, together with a certificate of Allen Francis, United States consul at the port of Victoria, dated July 31, 1862, to the effect that the Maria was then owned by one John T. Wright, of San Francisco, and also his own affidavit that he was an American citizen and master of the Maria, and did then and there demand of and apply to the collector, for a coasting license for said vessel. The remaining article alleges, that the American register aforesaid was by the said vessel knowingly or fraudulently used at the port of Astoria, at the time of her entry then as aforesaid, she not being then entitled to the use of such register, according to the true intent of the act of December 31, 1792, whereby the Maria became forfeited, etc.

On April 1, John C. Gibson, intervening for his interest, answered the libel, wherein he alleged there was due him for services as engineer upon the Maria, at the wages of $200 per month, from July 27 to November 8, 1862, the sum of $728, and also $256 advanced by him about August 26, 1862, to the master and clerk, to purchase necessary supplies for said vessel.

On April 6, John R. Fleming filed a claim of ownership and answered the libel, denying all the material allegations therein, except the ones concerning the issuance of the register to the Maria, at San Francisco, her sailing to the port of Victoria and remaining there until her entry at Astoria.

On April 13, the claimant, Fleming, answered the claim of Gibson for wages and money advanced, wherein he denied all knowledge of money advanced, but admitted that Gibson served as engineer from July 28 to September 17, 1862, for which he was entitled to the customary wages of $150 per month, and the further sum of $11 expended by him for board while engaged in repairing the vessel, which amounts had been duly tendered to said Gibson and by him refused; alleges that Gibson was employed by one John T. Wright, who then owned the vessel, and that as soon as claimant came into possession of the vessel—about September 17, 1862—he discharged Gibson.

On April 6, the libellant filed exceptions to the claim of Gibson for money advanced to the master and clerk; and on the same day Robert Haley aforesaid, as agent of William M. Lubbock aforesaid, filed a claim of ownership and answered the libel, denying thereby all the material allegations of the same, except the ones admitted by the claimant Fleming, and alleging that said Lubbock is the sole owner of the Maria, and he, Haley, is the master and husband thereof and duly authorized by said Lubbock, now of San Francisco, to appear and make this claim and defense on his behalf.

On the trial the libellant read the testimony of C. A. Gillingham, Alexander D. McDonald, Frank Tarbell and Allen Francis, of Victoria, taken upon letters rogatory; and that of H. C. Leonard and William Irvine, taken before the court; also the following documents: A certified copy of the "Memorandum of Association of the British Columbia and Victoria Steam Navigation Co."; and of the entry in the books of the American consulate at Victoria, concerning the Maria. The claimant, Fleming, read in evidence a bill of sale of the Maria, dated September 1, 1862, from John T. Wright to himself, and acknowledged at Victoria the day of its date, before Allen Francis, aforesaid; also an extra-official certificate from said Allen to said Wright, dated March 21, 1863, wherein the former, for some reason not disclosed, certifies that on July 31, 1862, said Wright consulted with him about the propriety of purchasing the Maria, and that upon inspection of the papers then deposited in his office, including "various bills of sale," he advised said Wright, that as the vessel had an American register, and had never been under the British flag, he might purchase her with safety. The claimant, Lubbock, offered no evidence.

The following facts are satisfactorily proven: That early in the Frazer river gold excitement, in the summer of 1858, the Maria being a registered American vessel, the property of the claimant Lubbock, was taken to Victoria, to navigate the waters of British Columbia, that the vessel was commanded by Henry Lubbock, a brother of the claimant, William M., who, in the early part of 1859, sold one half of her to Leonard and Green, American citizens of Portland; Ainsworth and Thompson, of the like citizenship and residence, but then at Victoria, being interested in the purchase; that the Maria was run in opposition to the boats of the British corporation aforesaid, under special permits from the colonial authorities, until the close of 1859, or the beginning of 1860, when she was sold by her American owners aforesaid, to the corporation aforesaid, who continued to own her until sometime between May and August, 1862, when she was transferred to John T. Wright, aforesaid, by said corporation, for the purpose of being brought to Portland, to navigate the waters of this district, where she afterwards arrived, and remained until seized as alleged in the libel—said Wright being an American citizen, but then, and now, a resident of Victoria, and a large stockholder in said British corporation. A point is made on behalf of the claimant, Fleming, that the transfer to the British corporation was conditional, and did not amount to a sale within the purview of section 16 of the registry act. The facts are, that the Maria was sold and delivered to the corporation for $20,000. The terms of the sale were, that the corporation was to pay this sum in installments, bearing a certain proportion to the profits of their business. These profits, it was naturally supposed, would be much enhanced by the purchase, and thus the corporation expected to make the payments agreed on. It was also agreed, that if the corporation should fail to make the payments as per contract, that the sellers should have the right to retake the Maria into their possession, and to prevent any depreciation of their security in the meantime, it was provided, that the vessel should not be used by the corporation, until all the purchase money was paid, except an occasional trip, when one of its other boats might be disabled. Substantially, this is the testimony of Leonard, one of the sellers, and there is nothing in the case that suggests a doubt as to its correctness. The testimony of Irvine is to the same general effect, though being a very unwilling witness for the libellant, he endeavors in his account of the transaction, to make it as mild as possible.

This was a sale by way of trust or confidence at least; the trust and confidence being, that if the corporation should be unable to pay the purchase money, according to the terms of sale, then it would return the vessel to the sailors. To bring a case within the purview of the act, it is not necessary that the sale should be a beneficial or bona fide one, but it is sufficient if there be "a transmutation of ownership, by way of trust, confidence or otherwise." The Margaret, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 424. In the case just cited, the supreme court held that a mere colorable change of ownership or sale, made for the purpose of evading the revenue laws of a foreign country, was a sale within the statute. But if it was a conditional sale, the condition being in substance and effect, that the seller might reclaim the property, upon a failure to pay the purchase money; nevertheless, it was a sale. The property in the vessel in the meantime, was in the corporation, and if she had been destroyed by any casualty, it would have been its loss. But, in fact, the British corporation paid the purchase money as it agreed to, or as the sellers subsequently agreed to receive it, and the vessel was never retaken by the latter, but remained in the possession of the former. In pursuance of the terms of the sale, the corporation paid the former American owners the sum of $13,000, when in December, 1861, or January, 1862, Leonard, acting on behalf of the Portland parties, and Gillingham, of the claimant Lubbock, arranged with the corporation to take its notes, endorsed by the witness Irvine, for the sum of $7,000, the amount then remaining due, and give the latter an absolute bill of sale of the vessel. This arrangement was carried out at once. Leonard and Gillingham executed the bill of sale. The notes were made and delivered, and afterwards duly paid. Here, then, at least, was an absolute and unqualified sale to this foreign corporation.

Counsel for the claimants insist that the government should produce the bill of sale last mentioned; but upon the evidence it is probable, and such is the legal presumption, that this instrument as a muniment of title followed the ownership and possession of the Maria, and that, therefore, it is under the control of the claimants, at least in the case of Fleming, who claims to have purchased since the execution of this bill of sale to the corporation. Again, it is questioned whether this corporation, the British Columbia and Victoria Steam Navigation Company, can be considered "a subject or citizen of a foreign prince or state." The evidence proves that the corporation was formed and exists under and by virtue of the laws of the foreign country where it is located and doing business. Without reference to the nationality of the stock or stockholders therein, I am satisfied that the corporation, for the purpose of section 16 of the registry act, must be deemed a subject or citizen of the country by authority and permission of whose laws it was created and exists. Manifestly, the omission to make known a sale to such a corporation, is within the mischief intended to be guarded against and prevented by the section. But even admitting that the individuals who constitute the corporation or association, must be "subjects of a foreign prince or state," to make the latter such, I think there is enough before the court to warrant the conclusion that this was a sale to such a subject. The "memorandum of association" of the company, contains a list of the stockholders and their places of residence. Fifteen of them—about three fifths of the whole number—appear to be residents of Vancouver's Island, and one of the remainder of Canada. There is direct testimony that some of them are British subjects, and that two or three of the heaviest stockholders are American citizens, though probably they are British subjects by birth, and now so in fact. A sale in a foreign port to a person resident there, particularly if such person be of foreign birth, is sufficient to put the claimant upon the proof that such vendee is a citizen of the United States. But it is not necessary that all these individuals should be subjects of a foreign prince, for if any one of them is, then the sale was thus far and therefore "in part" made to such subject, and within the purview of the act.

It is claimed by counsel for claimant, that the Maria did not sail under the British flag, and was not registered as a British bottom; and much stress is laid upon these circumstances in considering the question of whether or not there was a sale. There is no direct testimony upon the subject, but all the circumstances tend to support the conclusion that the vessel was not registered in British Columbia. The fact that she was scarcely if ever used by the corporation while in its possession might account for the non-registry, if it was necessary or material to account for it. The forfeiture is not declared on account of the vessels obtaining a foreign register or not, but because of a failure to make known a sale to a foreigner. It makes no difference, then, whether the Maria sailed under the British flag, whatever that may mean, or not, or whether she had a British registry or not. If the alleged sale was doubtful, these circumstances might be evidence upon the question. But a sale, proven as this is beyond a possibility of a doubt, cannot be affected by the mere fact that the vessel did not have a British register. It appears that soon after the bill of sale to the corporation, and probably as early as May or June, 1862, John T. Wright, formerly of San Francisco, became a large shareholder and active manager in such corporation, and a resident of Victoria. The Maria being still laid up, the question of sending her to Portland began to be mooted in the corporation. It is a matter of general notoriety, that about this time a great impetus was given to steamboating on the waters of the Columbia and Willamette rivers, by the recent discovery of gold mines to the eastward of the Cascade Mountains. It is possible that the prospect of sharing in this rich harvest, or selling the Maria at a high figure to those who were already engaged in the business, was the immediate inducement for the contemplated removal. From all the circumstances, particularly the subsequent developments, it is equally probable that said Wright was the prime mover in this project. Irvine testifies, that in a conversation about this time with a fellow-stockholder, on the propriety of sending the Maria to Portland to engage in the navigation of the waters of this district, that he objected to her going as the property of the corporation, for fear she would be libeled here—in other words, seized as a foreign bottom engaged in the coasting trade—saying that if she went at all he wanted her to go as the property of said Wright. Soon after Irvine was informed by the same stockholder, that it had been settled that the Maria should go to Portland as the property of Wright. And this testimony shows who Irvine thought the Maria then belonged to. It is consistent with the fact otherwise abundantly established, that she was and had been the property of the British corporation of which he was a stockholder. This being the case, he was not willing to risk her being sent to Portland as the property of such corporation, but if Wright saw proper to become the owner and take her, well and good.

On July 30, 1862, the Maria arrived at Victoria from New Westminster, under charge of Wright as owner and master, on the way to Portland. At the consulate at Victoria, Wright produced the register issued to the Maria at San Francisco, and induced Consul Francis to make an entry in the records of his office concerning the Maria in these words: "1862, July 31. Bill of sale to John T. Wright, Jr., from C. A. Gillingham and A. C. Leonard, value $——." In his testimony, Francis says he made this entry upon information derived from Wright, and that otherwise he knew nothing of such sale to Wright. Both Leonard and Gillingham, disinterested and credible witnesses, testify that they never sold or made any bill of sale of the Maria to Wright. Wright is deeply interested in the result of this suit, and the whole circumstances excite a strong suspicion, that he is the real claimant, and that Fleming is only put forward because it was thought that he might have some advantage over Wright, by claiming as an innocent purchaser. The bill of sale to Fleming is dated September 1, 1862, but it is doubtful if he was ever in possession of the vessel. Why don't Wright produce the bill of sale from Leonard and Gillingham to himself, which he represented to the consul to exist in July, 1862? If it is lost or mislaid, why not account for it? He is a competent witness. There is no doubt but that the consulate entry of July 31, 1862, was fraudulent and false, and that Wright procured it to be made, to show an apparent title in himself directly from the American owners, and thereby suppress the fact of the intermediate sale to the foreign corporation, and to deceive the collector of this district into receiving and entering the Maria as an American vessel and entitled to a coasting license. There is no evidence or pretense that any of the sales or transfers made during the three years the Maria remained in British Columbia, were ever reported to the collector at Astoria, or that the American register was ever returned to any American collector, other than as stated at Astoria. This he did, either by false representations to the consul or by exhibiting to him a forged bill of sale. His silence, now that he is called upon to explain, justifies the worst conclusion. If he ever owned the Maria at all, he bought her of the corporation. To this conclusion points the testimony of McDonald, who testifies that he knows from the members of the corporation and an inspection of their books, that Wright did so purchase the vessel, and paid for her by giving in exchange $^{19}/_{40}$ of the American steamboat Eliza Anderson, now and then navigating Puget's Sound.

In pursuance of the fraudulent purpose above mentioned, Wright on the same day that he procured the false entry of sale to be made in the records of the consul's office, procured the consul, by some means, to make the extra-official endorsement upon the American register, to the effect that the Maria was the property of said Wright. Haley, the now professed agent of the claimant Lubbock, was present when this endorsement was made, and on the same day was qualified as master before the consul, and took command under Wright as owner. He also sailed the Maria to Astoria under this register, and there surrendered it and applied for a coasting license, first entering the vessel as the property of Wright, which involved the necessity of his swearing to that fact. As the law required him to swear to the ownership, it is fair to presume that it was done.

How then is the claim of Lubbock, or rather that of his professed agent, sustained? Waiving the question of forfeiture, he does not appear to have a title of right to the Maria. It is satisfactorily shown that Lubbock sold her long since. He does not appear in person to make this claim, or to testify in support of it, although Haley states that he is of San Francisco—and it is highly probable that he is to-day ignorant that one has been made for him. Even Haley himself does not come forward and testify as a witness in support of the claim. Fleming shows a paper title from Wright, but offers no evidence to show that Wright ever had any interest in the vessel to transfer to him, except the false entry in the consular records of the bill of sale from Leonard and Gillingham to him. Upon this ground, his claim might be dismissed as unfounded in fact. But I think it sufficiently appears from the evidence of the libellant, that Wright did become the owner of the vessel before her departure from Victoria. As has been said, it is probable that he purchased her from the British corporation, and gave $^{19}/_{40}$ of the Eliza Anderson in exchange. But this fact Fleming dare not avow. He has denied in his answer that the corporation ever purchased or owned any interest in the Maria. Either Wright purchased from the corporation or he did not. If not, then so far as appears, he never had any interest in the vessel and could not transfer any to Fleming. If he did, then the corporation must have been the owners in some way—"trust, confidence or otherwise"—and the sale by which it became such owner not being made known upon the return of the person in charge of her to an American port, but studiously and fraudulently concealed, she thereby became forfeited under section 16 of the registry act, some time before the bill of sale to Fleming. This being so, Wright lost his property in the vessel on August 8, and therefore had none to transfer or convey to Fleming on September 1, 1862.

The law is well established that the forfeiture, unless otherwise provided, attaches to the property at the moment of the commission of the act for which the forfeiture is denounced, and that from that moment the title of the previous owners is divested. Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 311; 1960 Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398, 417. It matters not whether Fleming purchased after this in good faith or otherwise. The forfeiture to the United States had occurred, and this proceeding is only for the purpose of establishing that fact by a judicial decree. The doctrine of an innocent purchaser, even if Fleming be one, which is very doubtful, has no application to the case. The two circumstances which constitute a cause of forfeiture under section 16—a sale to a foreign subject and the neglect to make such sale known as directed by the act, are established. There can be no question on the evidence but that there was a neglect to make this sale known, not only "in the manner hereinbefore directed," as expressed in such section, but in any manner by any one having charge of or connected with the vessel. But how this sale is to be made known is not so clear as might be. The question has not been made in the case, and it is not necessary to particularly consider it. Mr. Justice Story, in The Margaret, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 422, takes it for granted, that the "hereinbefore directed" of section 16, refers to section 7 of the act, and so far as I have observed, there is no other section of the act to which this clause can refer. Section 7 provides for the giving bond for a register, and one of the conditions of such bond, is that in case of any transfer of the vessel to a foreigner at a foreign port, the "master or person having the charge or command thereof, shall, within eight days of his arrival in any district of the United States, deliver up" the register thereof, "to the collector of such district." This direction appears to imply that the duty of delivering up the register devolves upon the person in charge or command of the vessel at the time of the transfer. The act intends that such transfer shall separate the vessel and the register. Presuming that the American owners and persons in charge at the time of this sale to the British corporation returned to a district of the United States, this register should have been delivered up long ago. But, as a matter of fact, it was not returned until the entry of the vessel at Astoria in August, 1862, and then it was not delivered up with notice of sale, as provided in these sections. I question whether Haley could have made the delivery of the register and given the information of this sale required by the act. Nor do I see my way clear in the absence of evidence to that effect, to presume that the party in charge at the time of this sale has yet returned to any district of the United States, and therefore had an opportunity to cause a forfeiture of the vessel by neglecting to deliver up the register and make known such sale. To show this in the first instance, is, I presume, a part of the libellant's case, though very slight proof may put the burden on the claimant to show the fact that such party is still abroad. True, it appears that Leonard has returned to this district, and it may be that under the circumstances it would be proper to consider him the party in charge of the vessel at the time of the sale, and whose failure to deliver the register and make known the sale upon his return to the United States, caused the forfeiture of the vessel. It also appears that Ainsworth, another one of the owners at the time of the sale to the British corporation, gave the information upon which this seizure was made, from which it is to be inferred that he had already returned to the district without delivering up the register or making known such sale.

The facts also show a clear case of forfeiture under section 27—the sailing of the Maria from Victoria to Astoria, and her entry at the latter port by the use of this register when the master and owner both well knew that she was not entitled to it, because she had been sold to a foreign subject since it was given, and should have been returned long before. And not only was this misuse of the register knowingly made, but also fraudulently. There must be a decree of condemnation. As to the claim of Gibson for wages, there is no proof that he was a licensed engineer under the laws of the United States, and therefore he was not qualified to serve in that capacity on the Maria while she was navigating the waters of this district. This fact is fatal to a recovery for the period that the vessel navigated such waters. After careful consideration this court held in The Pioneer [Case No. 11,177] that a pilot or engineer not licensed under the laws of the United States could not recover wages for services on steam vessels navigating the waters of the United States, and carrying passengers. But I see nothing in this fact to prevent the engineer from recovering wages for the time occupied in coming from Victoria to Astoria. This service was not performed upon the waters of the United States, nor on a voyage commencing on them, but on the high seas, and on a voyage from a foreign port. Besides, it may be considered that as the vessel came over in ballast, she was not engaged in carrying passengers, unless being ready and willing to carry passengers, if they offer, is being so engaged.

It is further urged by the district attorney, that this voyage was an illegal one, and that therefore the vessel is not liable for the wages of any one who contributed to it. But I cannot perceive wherein the voyage was illegal. The use of the registry was illegal, but the engineer is not responsible for that, or even chargeable with notice of the fact. The property in the vessel was already forfeited in fact to the United States, but until the government asserted its right to the forfeiture, whoever was in possession of her might make any lawful use of her—and for aught that appears a voyage from Victoria to Astoria was such a use. Nor do I wish to be understood as admitting that a forfeiture of a vessel affects the lien of the crew thereon, unless such forfeiture is caused upon or by the voyage on which such wages are earned; and that, too, by the vessels being employed in some transaction or voyage which is made a crime for any one to aid or participate in, or the unlawful purpose of which is manifest to the commonest understanding. The voyage from Victoria here was an extraordinary one for a vessel of this class, and I will allow Gibson one month's pay for it, at the rate of $200 per month.

Concerning the claim for money advanced, on the evidence, I have serious doubts as to the fact. It appears quite certain that Gibson loaned Haley $225, but I think it not unlikely that it was loaned to the latter for his own use, or that some of it was money which Haley lost to Gibson at cards. The proof of the claim rests upon Haley's testimony, and he has shown himself a very unreliable witness throughout this suit. The evidence as to the vessel's necessities is very indefinite. Haley states that between $70 and $80 of the sum was paid to Allen and Lewis, on account of freight taken from the steamship Pacific, of San Francisco, and that there was an open account between the vessels. Averaging this item at $75, it is disallowed. The remainder of the claim—$150—is allowed. Admitting that it is doubtful if all this sum was ever applied to meet the necessities of the vessel, and without attempting to argue the question of fact involved in its allowance, I remark that it is a hard case. By no fault of Gibson's he has been kept out of the money justly due him by the prolonged pendency of this suit. And even now he will be paid in legal tender notes received upon the sale of the vessel during such pendency at par, when their actual value on this coast is far below it.

Decree, that the vessel is and was forfeited to the United States for the causes alleged in the libel, and that Gibson recover of said vessel the sum of $350, which sum is ordered to be paid out of the funds in the registry of the court arising from the sale of the Maria, heretofore made, and that the remainder of such funds, after paying thereout the costs of this suit, be disposed of as by statute is provided.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 663.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1829.

SLAVERY—MARYLAND IMPORTATION ACT—SUIT FOR FREEDOM—RESIDENCE—INTENTION.

1. A slave was brought into this county by her master, a delegate from the territory of Florida, to wait upon his family while attending congress; and, at the end of the session, not being in a condition to be carried back with safety, was left here until the meeting of the next congress, with leave to hire herself out, and receive her wages to her own use, which she did until the return of her master, who was re-elected, and who, at her request, offered to sell her to her husband, a free colored man, residing in Washington, for $400, if he could raise the money, but he could not, and never paid it, or any part of it. The court (nem. con.) refused to instruct the jury that these facts were not evidence of an importation, contrary to the Maryland act of 1796, c. 67.

2. They also refused to instruct the jury, that, upon that evidence, they ought to find their verdict for the defendant; but instructed them that the petitioner is not entitled to freedom under the first section of the act, unless she was brought into this county, by the defendant, for sale, or to reside therein; and that the circumstances stated, although found by the jury, are not conclusive evidence that the petitioner was brought into this county with such intent, or for sale; and that the residence contemplated by the first section of the act is a permanent residence, as contradistinguished from a sojournment.

3. The court also refused to instruct the jury, that the defendant's offer and agreement to sell the petitioner to her husband, under the circumstances stated, was evidence of an importation, contrary to the act of 1796, c. 67, unless the jury should believe, from the circumstances given in evidence, that the defendant had no intention, at the time of importation, that she should be sold, or should reside in this county.

The petitioner, negro Maria, claimed her freedom by reason of importation, contrary to the act of Maryland, 1796, c. 67; by the first section of which it is enacted, "that it shall not be lawful to import or bring into this state, by land or water, any negro, mulatto, or other slave, for sale, or to reside within this state. And any person brought into this state as a slave, contrary to this act, if a slave before, shall thereupon cease to be the property of the person or persons so importing, &c., and shall be free." By the fourth section it is provided, "that nothing in this act contained shall be construed or taken to affect the right of any person or persons travelling or sojourning with any slave or slaves within this state, such slave or slaves not being sold, or otherwise disposed of in this state, but carried out of this state, or attempted to be carried." Upon the trial, evidence was given to prove that the petitioner was the slave of the defendant [Joseph M. White], a resident of the territory of Florida, and the delegate in congress from that territory. That he brought the slave to Washington to wait upon his family, while he was attending congress, in the winter of 1828–1829. That she remained with his family during the session; but, at the end of the session, on the 4th of March, 1829, was too far advanced in pregnancy to be removed, with safety, to Florida; and was, therefore, left by her master in Washington. That, at her request, after her confinement, she was permitted by her master, who was reëlected, to hire herself out in Washington, until he should return to congress, in December, 1829; which permission was given by a writing inclosed in a letter to Mr. French, the agent of the defendant. That she accordingly hired herself out, and received her wages to her own use. That the defendant, learning that she had a free husband in Washington, and that she wished to live with him, agreed that if he could raise $400 for him he should have her. That the money was never raised, nor any part of it ever paid to the defendant.

Upon this evidence, Mr. Key, for petitioner, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if, from the evidence, they found the facts to be as above stated, then the continuing of the petitioner in this county, under such circumstances, is evidence of an importation contrary to the law of 1796, c. 67.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to give the instruction. Whereupon Mr. Swann, for defendant, prayed the court to instruct them, that upon these facts, if believed by them, they ought to find their verdict for the defendant.

Which instruction THE COURT refused to give; but instructed them that the petitioner is not entitled to freedom under the first section of the act of 1796, c. 67, unless she was brought into this county by the defendant for sale, or to reside therein; that the circumstances aforesaid, although proved to the satisfaction of the jury, are not conclusive evidence that the petitioner was brought into this county with such intent, or for sale; and that the residence contemplated in the first section of the act is a permanent residence, as contradistinguished from a sojournment.

Mr. Key then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that "if they believed that the defendant contracted with the husband of the petitioner, (a free man,) for the purchase of the petitioner, at the price of $400, and that the said husband agreed to pay the said sum of money, as the price of the petitioner; then such contract is evidence of an importation contrary to the act of assembly of 1796. Unless the jury should, from the circumstances given in evidence, believe that the defendant had no intention, when he brought in the petitioner, of her being sold, or residing in this county."

But THE COURT refused to give the said instruction. And CRANCH, Chief Judge, suggested a doubt, whether a slave gained his freedom, under the third section of the act, by being sold within three years after being imported, if he was not originally imported for sale, or to reside.

The cases cited in argument were, Baptiste v. De Volunbrun, 5 Har. & J. 86; Defontaine v. Defontaine, in a note to the former case, 5 Har. & J. 86; Henry v. Ball, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 5; Gardner v. PRIZE—ENEMY PROPERTY—SALVAGE—AFTER CAPTURE.

1. Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy property.

2. The vessel and cargo having been shipwrecked after seizure, and having been saved by salvors, the court allowed to the salvors, as salvage, one-half of the net proceeds of the salved property, deducting the costs incurred by the United States in the prize suit.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The above vessel and cargo were captured off Charleston harbor, May 17, 1863. After seizure the vessel and cargo were shipwrecked. The vessel became a total loss, and was abandoned at sea, and the cargo was reclaimed by salvors, and brought to this port for adjudication. A libel was filed by the libellants, against the prize, in this court, June 3d thereafter, and a writ of attachment was issued thereon on the same day, returnable on the 23d of June following. The marshal returned thereon due service of it upon the said cargo, and no person intervening therefor, except as salvors, defaults were taken, according to the course of the court, and a decree of condemnation was ordered by the court thereupon. On the hearing of the case upon the merits, it was fully proved on the part of the United States that the vessel and cargo were enemy property, owned in Charleston, and had been brought out of that port in violation of the blockade thereof. On the 2d of June, 1863, the Coast Wrecking Company filed a libel against the aforesaid schooner Maria Bishop and her cargo, demanding a salvage compensation for services, etc., in relieving and saving her from shipwreck and loss while under capture, as aforesaid, by the United States. On the 21st of June following, the United States interposed an answer and claim, and also their own libel, setting forth and demanding the same relief for the aforesaid services. The United States attorney having admitted in court the justness of such demand, and the counsel for the respective parties having submitted it to the judgment of the court to determine the amount of salvage rightfully payable for the salvage services aforesaid, the court, having examined the testimony submitted in the case, and considered the premises, adjudges and determines that one-half of the net proceeds of the salved property, deducting the costs incurred by the United States in the prize suit, be paid to the salvors, or the party representing their interests. A decree to that effect will be entered.

INTERNATIONAL LAW—DUTIES OF NEUTRAL POWERS—NEUTRALITY.

The law of nations requires that strict neutrality should be observed between belligerents by other powers.

In admiralty.

JOHNSON, Circuit Justice. Questions of salvage are always questions of the most disagreeable kind. In vain the mind looks for relief in its anxiety to do justice by seeking the aid of fixed rules and principles. Such questions are addressed exclusively to discretion, and that discretion must move in a range to which there are no defined limits. This is attended with another embarrassing circumstance. It is impossible to separate the question of salvage from that which must finally dispose of the residue of this vessel and cargo. The same rule cannot be applied indifferently to both parties claimants. If the residue ought to be restored to the Spanish claimants, then no salvage can be demanded; if the treaty applies to the case, or if it does not apply, then much higher salvage ought to be paid than if it be adjudged to the captor. The principal question in the case, then, is forced upon me before I can dispose of that salvage; and here I cannot hesitate on the decision that must be made. The law of nations requires of the United States the observation of strict neutrality between the belligerents. Flagrante bello, no neutral nation is bound to pursue a course of conduct that may ultimately embroil it with the victor. We found the property in possession of one of the belligerents, and we are bound to leave it there. It is enough for us that we see a state of open war existing between two powers who are able to maintain it. The question of right is with the god of armies. This is no recognition of the independence of Buenos Ayres; it is the recognition of a fact known to all the world, and admitted by the claimant himself; that of a state of open war between Spain and one of her colonies. This is a most solemn and notorious fact by which nations can exhibit their independence to the rest of the world; and whilst the struggle continues other nations are not at liberty to distinguish between fact and right. Under these impressions I award one fifth of the net proceeds to the libelant; convinced that, had the captors been consulted at the time the vessel was taken charge of, they would have freely given that proportion to secure the rest; and that the libelants ought to be satisfied with eight thousand dollars for the service rendered.

There is another point on which I feel myself called on to make a remark; that is, the effect of the treaty between Spain and the United States. The sixth article has no bearing on the case. The object of that article is the protection of the vessels or effects of Spanish subjects from seizure, at the time of their being within our jurisdiction. Nor does the case come under the ninth article, since, in whatever light Spain may think proper to consider the cruisers of her enemy, they are not pirates in the view of other nations; and as to the second section of the fourteenth article, it makes no provision for the restitution of property captured by citizens who have accepted commissions to cruise against Spain. The provisions are, that no citizen shall accept such a commission, and that he who accepts such a commission shall be punished as a pirate. In a government of laws, everything has been done which good faith required to be done. Laws have been passed, and our courts are open for the punishment of such as accept of commissions under the enemy of Spain. But information must be lodged and evidence produced, before it can be required of the courts of justice to punish those offenders. For anything further Spain must depend upon the vigilance, activity, and intelligence of her agents; and in no case is it, or can it be made, an addition to the punishment of such offenders, that the property shall be restored, unless the United States may be made liable for indemnity; for when the capture is made, the property is vested in the government that grants the commission. It is the seizure of the state, and not of the individuals. In the case before us, there is no evidence that the San Martin privateer was fitted out in the United States. She has, indeed, very improperly, recruited her crew within our limits; and every individual concerned in that transaction will be punished, if prosecuted. But all the world knows that the arbitrary exertion of power is unknown to the genius of our constitution, and all that any state can expect of the United States is, that adequate laws should be passed to punish and prevent the commission of such acts. When acts are done in evasion of those laws, unless the government can be charged with winking at those evasions, it is not liable to indemnify Spain for such captures; and our courts of justice cannot, on that ground, violate the obligation of neutrality by seizing and restoring prizes that have been made by either party.

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Sept. Term, 1868.[2]

COLLISION — PRIMARY CAUSE — NEGLIGENCE—APPROACHING TOO NEAR—LOOKOUT.

1. A propeller ascending the Detroit river discovered the lights of an approaching barque and tug about two miles distant, the night being clear and starlight, but did not change her course until within half a mile of them, and then only enough to pass the tug at a distance of one hundred feet, when the barque suddenly sheered and struck the propeller amid-ships. Held, it was bad seamanship in the propeller to put only so short a distance between herself and the tug, and not slacken speed.

2. Though the proximate cause of the collision was the improper handling of the barque, the propeller, having committed faults, cannot go free.

3. It is immaterial that the propeller had not a competent lookout, the captain and mate having seen the lights in good season and needing no information which the lookout could give them. After they saw the lights the responsibility attached to them.

4. A vessel in tow is not excused from keeping close watch, and observing and obeying all signals.

was taken under advisement. Owing to my official duties in other circuits and the supreme court, I have been unable to consider it until recently. A very decided impression was made on my mind at the argument, which has been confirmed by an examination of the testimony. The result at which I have arrived is different from that of my learned brother, and I therefore state it with diffidence on account of his superior knowledge and larger experience. As the case will doubtless go to the supreme court, and as other engagements press heavily on me, I have deemed it necessary only to give my conclusions, and shall not therefore analyze the testimony in order to prove their correctness. In all cases of this kind the evidence is conflicting. The rules of navigation being well settled are easily applied to the facts in proof, but the difficulty lies in ascertaining the facts. The propeller Cleveland, owned by the libellants, on her voyage from Ogdensburg to Chicago, during the night of the 22nd June, 1866, while in the Detroit river and near its mouth, collided with the barque Maria Martin, in tow of the tug McClellan on their way down the river and was sunk.

The point to ascertain is, with which party, if either, or both, the fault rests. It is proper to remark, if the night had been dark and there had been difficulty in discovering objects on the water, some excuse would have been afforded for this collision, but as there was a clear starlight, and the signal lights of all the vessels burned brightly, and gave sufficient indications to careful mariners, the accident ought not to have happened. After the propeller entered the river, she steered north by east and headed for the Bois Blanc light, and her officers discovered at the distance of about two miles, the lights of the tug and tow. It is not important to determine whether the propeller blew her whistle after the first or second whistle of the tug was sounded, for that she understood the signal is evident, because she ported her helm at the distance of half a mile from the tug. She swung to starboard about half a point and then steadied, the tug being to the westward of her port bow, and there is no evidence that the barque was not then nearly in range with the tug. After the tug blew her whistle, she also ported half a point and then steadied. She was then heading southwest by south one-half south. The propeller pursued her course until she was abreast of the tug—distant about 100 feet—when her wheel was put hard a-port, and she swung to starboard. This change of course was rendered necessary, as the libellants say, because the barque took a sudden sheer to port, shutting out her red light, and showing only her green light to the propeller, but if so, it availed nothing, for the barque struck the propeller on her port side, as she was swinging to starboard, and she went to the bottom of the river. The libellants do not charge that the tug was in fault, but insist the propeller was blameless, and that the responsibility for the collision rests wholly with the barque. This position is not well taken. It is clear the collision occurred in a few minutes after the propeller answered the tug's whistle, and that her officers could see, owing to the calmness of the night and the conceded brightness of the lights, that the vessels were in close proximity to each other.

It is equally clear that they knew that the Detroit river, on account of the magnitude of its commerce, and the number of tugs with loaded vessels, passing through it, had to be navigated, to avoid accidents, with great watchfulness and care, and that the tug and barque, whose lights they had made, as they were descending the river, could not be handled, in case of peril, as well as the propeller. Notwithstanding these things, we find these officers managing their boat without regard to the dangers of navigating this river, and exercising no more watchfulness than if they had been navigating the open lake. Although they saw the lights of the tug and barque and pronounced them to be very bright at the distance of two miles, yet they did not change the course of their boat until the tug had signaled them to do it, and at this time the vessels had approached within half a mile of each other. But even then by the practice of reasonable seamanship all trouble could have been avoided. If the propeller, instead of porting half a point, or three-fourths even, had gone a point further to the eastward, the collision could not have taken place. There was nothing in the way of her doing this, for the river was wide enough and there were no lights closing on them from the east. To put only one hundred feet between her and the tug, when she could with safety to herself put a greater distance between them, considering the circumstances of this navigation, was bad seamanship. Watchful and careful officers, having due regard to the rights of persons and property, would not have taken the risk that the officers of the propeller did. They surely risked enough by not changing the course of their boat until she was close on to the tug. Common vigilance required that when they changed the course of the propeller they should have made a more decided change. But these officers, besides not going further to the eastward, were in fault in not checking the speed of their boat. They should not have entered a narrow river, where, in the night, there is always more or less danger of collision, without materially slackening the speed at which they had been running. And this duty was the more incumbent on them, because at so short a distance from the tug and barque they should, as careful seamen, have apprehended the possibility of danger. It will not do to say the propeller performed her whole measure of duty, because she safely passed the tug, and that the proximate cause of the collision was the improper handling of the barque. The propeller, having committed faults, cannot go free because the barque was also in fault. It is said the propeller had not a competent lookout, but whether she had or had not is immaterial, because this collision was not caused by any omission of duty on her part. The captain and mate of the propeller, standing abaft the capstan, with the lookout near by, in his proper position, at a distance of two miles discovered the lights of the approaching tug and barque, and from this time forward were in command of the ship, and needed no information that the lookout could give them. It would have been a useless thing to point out to them the lights which they saw in good season, and were commenting on as being very brilliant. After they saw the lights, the responsibility attaches to them; and if the ship was afterwards badly managed, the lookout is not to blame for it.

The next question for solution is, whether the responsibility for this collision rests with the propeller alone, or was the barque in such fault that the damages must be divided? It is plain, notwithstanding the faults of the propeller, that this disaster would not have occurred had the barque followed, as she was required to do, the course of the tug. That she did not follow after the tug, but, when the propeller was abreast of the tug, sheered to the port of the tug, shutting out from the propeller her red light, and showing only her green light, and continued on in this course until she struck the propeller on her port side as she was swinging to starboard, are facts clearly established by the weight of the evidence. The current or wind did not cause the sheering, for the barque moved faster than the current, and the wind, being southwest, would not cause her to sheer to port, and the officers of the boat say she steered well. It is said the fault was on the part of the tug, because at the critical moment she altered her course and turned short off to starboard. But the weight of the evidence is against this view of the case. After the tug blew her whistle she ported, as has been before stated, a half point, and then steadied herself back on her course, and was pursuing it when the propeller came abreast of her, and continued in it until after the collision. I agree that it is not easy to reconcile the sheering of the barque with the testimony of those on board of her, but we are more concerned to know that the sheering did occur than to show how it occurred. There have been many theories on this important question presented for consideration, but I have not time to examine them. The conduct of the barque was the result of either mistaking orders or careless management. We have the testimony of the mate that an important signal was mistaken, and it is not at all unlikely that the error in management commenced with this mistake.

It is in proof that the barque through the night did not steer after the tug, and, as she was a good steering vessel, the inference is plain that there was a want of proper observation on the part of those who had her in charge. The approach of the propeller was not regarded by her, because the officers of the deck understood the signal of the tug for casting off line, instead of an approaching vessel. If a vessel is in tow she is not therefore excused from keeping close watch and observing and obeying all signals. The duty of watchfulness was the greater because the river was full of boats, and, light as the night was, there was more necessity for it than if it had been daylight; but this duty does not seem to have been appreciated by the officers of the barque.

When the barque made the sudden sheer to port, the propeller, not being required to anticipate it, did all she could under the circumstances—put her wheel hard a-port.

It follows from what has been said that a decree should be entered dividing the loss, and it is so ordered.

This case was affirmed, on full argument, by the supreme court, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 31.

The MARIANNA FLORA.

[3 Mason, 116.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1822.[2]

CAPTURE AT SEA—MISTAKE—DAMAGES.

1. Case of capture or mutual combat by mistake.

2. Where a capture is lawful, the subsequent bringing in of the captured vessel is not a cause for giving damages.[2]

This was an appeal from a decree of the district court on the libel of the Portuguese ship Marianna Flora, by Robert F. Stockton, commander of the United States ship of war, the Alligator, in behalf of himself and his officers and crew; Philip Marett, the Portuguese vice consul, and Vertura Anacleto De Britto, being claimants and respondents in behalf of the owners of the Marianna Flora and cargo. The principal facts in the case were these: On the morning of the 5th day of November, 1821, the United States schooner Alligator, whilst on a cruise to the coast of Africa, commanded by Lieut. Stockton, fell in a with a large vessel, apparently in distress, and which, when first perceived, was judged to be about nine miles from the Alligator; she was supposed, by the officers on board of the Alligator, to be in distress, from the circumstance of her lying to shortly after she was first perceived, and from her having apparently a flag hoisted half mast high. Lieut. Stockton made inquiries of the purser of his vessel as to the quantity of provisions on board, and said he would move towards her and see what she wanted, and the course of the Alligator was accordingly changed to the direction of the strange sail. When the Alligator had arrived within gun shot of the latter, a gun was fired from the latter, the shot of which fell at a considerable distance forward of the Alligator's bow. American colors, an ensign and pendant, were immediately hoisted on board of the Alligator. Another gun was very soon fired from the strange sail loaded with round and grape shot, upon which Lieut. Stockton directed the bow gun of the Alligator to be fired as soon as it could be brought to bear, which was done; immediately after, another gun was fired from the strange sail and was returned by one or two of the cannonades of the Alligator, which fell short of the other vessel. No more guns were fired from the Alligator until she got within musket shot of the other vessel, when Lieut. Stockton hailed her, which was only answered by another gun. Lieut. Stockton then ordered a broad side to be fired, which was done, after which he got upon the arms-chest where his person and uniform could be seen, and waved his hat and trumpet to prevent further hostilities, when two more guns were fired by the other vessel. After these were returned by several from the Alligator, the Portuguese flag was seen to be hoisted by the other vessel, upon which Lieut. Stockton ordered the firing to cease, and again hailed, and called upon the other vessel to send its boat on board the Alligator. He was answered by another gun, but before this could be returned by the Alligator, Lieut. Stockton had an opportunity of hailing several times more, and a boat came on board the Alligator with the mate of the other vessel and her papers and log-book. A boat was then despatched from the Alligator for the captain, who was brought on board. In answer to inquiries made of him by Lieut. Stockton, why he fired on the Alligator, bearing the flag of the United States, he replied in Portuguese, that he took her for a pirate, and his suspicions were strengthened because she did not affirm her flag; and he appealed to his papers to show that his vessel was a Portuguese merchantman. Lieut. Stockton replied, that he did not understand the papers, but should send him to the United States for examination. Capt. De Britto, the Portuguese master, protested against such a measure, and told Lieut. Stockton that he should consider him answerable for damages. All on board the Marianna Flora were put in irons, except the captain and two boys. Provisions were put on board her from the Alligator. Lieut. Abbot, of the Alligator, was appointed to take charge of her and conduct her to the United States, and on the 7th day of November she left the Alligator and proceeded on her way to the United States, according to orders from Lieut. Stockton. It was satisfactorily proved by the evidence in the case, that the Marianna Flora was a Portuguese merchant ship, and was on her way from Bahia to Lisbon at the time of the capture.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is a most distressing and calamitous case, in which a serious loss must be borne by one of two innocent parties. The facts and the general principles applicable to them have been discussed with so much fulness, accuracy, and ability, in the opinion [3] of the learned judge of the district court accompanying the record, that it is wholly unnecessary for me to go at large into the examination. In general I may say, that I concur in his views of the facts, and the only questions that occur for decision here, are questions of law lying in a very narrow compass.

The first question is, whether the capture was justifiable; and if so, then the next and most important is, whether there was good cause for sending the vessel in for judicial inquiry and examination. In a time of peace it is admitted, that the public ships of war of one nation have no right to search the ships of other nations upon the ocean. Every ship sails there with the unquestionable right of pursuing its own lawful business without interruption; but whatever that business may be, it is bound to pursue it in such a manner as not to violate the rights of others. This results from the necessary equality of nations upon the ocean in time of peace. The general maxim in such cases is, "sic utero tuo, ut non alienum laedas." In respect either to merchant ships or ships of war I do not know that there is any thing reprehensible in approaching each other at sea. Each has an equal right to the use of the ocean, and neither has any right to assert that the ocean within a certain distance, not essential for its own movements, is exclusively its own. In respect to ships of war which sail as in the present case under the authority of their governments, to arrest pirates and slave-dealers, the latter being in truth the worst and most detestable of pirates, there is no reason why they may not approach any vessels descried at sea, for the purpose of ascertaining their real character; and it is no just cause of offence, even if all nations had not a common interest in such humane and laudable enterprises, that they make an approach, unless the conduct of such ships of war betray a design to insult or injure those they approached, or to impede them in their lawful commerce. And merchant ships certainly may in like manner innocently approach each other, either for the purpose of information or to relieve their own distress, or to ascertain the probable character of strangers; and there is no breach of the customary observances or of the strict law of nations in such conduct. On the other hand it is as clear, that no vessel is, under such circumstances, bound to lay by, and wait the approach of other ships; she is at liberty to pursue her voyage in her own way, and to use all necessary precautions to avoid any suspected attack or sinister enterprise. Each party is, in short, left free to act according to his own reasonable discretion, taking care not to violate the rights of the other; and if any mischief is sustained by either party from accident or mistake and without any fault or negligence of the other, it is a common evil, to be borne by the unfortunate sufferer without redress. It is, in the phraseology of the common law, "damnum absque injuriâ," a damage without a wrong. If, therefore, two armed ships should happen to meet upon the ocean and approach each other, and finally commence a combat upon mutual mistake, and without any hostile intent or any want of reasonable care, no wrong is done by either, for which the other can justly claim a recompense, whatever may be the extent of the calamity inflicted. But if the attack be wanton or from gross negligence, the party who is in fault is bound to make the most ample remuneration. Such are the principles deducible from the maxims of general justice, independently of those derived from the laws that regulate maritime warfare.

Without doubt, pirates may be lawfully captured on the ocean by the ships of any nation, private or public; for they are the common enemies of all mankind, and as such, they are liable to the laws of war. And any piratical aggression or attack by an armed vessel belonging to any nation, or sailing under the protection of its regular flag subjects the offending vessel to the penalty of confiscation, in the same manner as if they are common pirates (see act 3d March, 1819, c. 76 [1 Stat. 510]); nor do I conceive that it is indispensable to constitute piracy, that there should be an intent of private gain, for if a piratical burning or sinking of a ship or murder of her crew should take place by freebooters on the sea, it would be as genuine piracy as if the primary object were immediate plunder. The act would exhibit a piratical and felonious intent, an intent to despoil the owner of his property, and to accomplish it by the murder of the crew. The murder would be adminicular to the robbery. But every hostile attack of one armed vessel upon any other in time of peace is not necessarily piratical. It may be by mistake or in necessary self-defence, or to repel a supposed meditated attack by pirates. It may be justifiable or excusable, and then there is no blame, or it may be under circumstances of manifest default, and then it carries with it responsibility in damages. If, however, an attack be not piratical, but is yet wanton and unprovoked, arising from gross fraud or revenge, or abuse of power, it is a waging of private unauthorized war, and subjects the vessel if captured to the penalty of confiscation. For that penalty is ordinarily denounced against property taken in delicto, where the act is an offence against the law of nations. Such, I conceive, are the principles which are applicable to cases of this nature, springing from the general rights of nations upon the sea, and the duties resulting from their independence and amity.

In the present case, it appears to me that the contest arose from mutual mistake and misapprehension. There is no pretence to say that the Alligator approached the Marianna Flora with any hostile intention; she was induced to do so in the first instance by signals and manoeuvres, which were mistaken for indications of distress; and when the attack was commenced upon her, she had strong reasons to suspect the real character of the Marianna Flora, and at all events was entitled to repel a hostile attack by all the means in her power. The approach, even without these circumstances, was justifiable. It was in the performance of public duties confided to the commander by his government, and he might well wish to ascertain, as far as he might without violating the rights of other nations, whether the ships, met with in the course of his voyage, were engaged in lawful commerce, or in common piracy, or in the slave trade. If he did nothing more than approach, without indicating an intention to board or to attack the Marianna Flora, no law is to be found within my knowledge which imputes it to him as a fault or violation of duty, and I am as far from imputing any fault to the Marianna Flora. In the circumstances in which he was placed, her commander probably did suspect the Alligator to be a piratical cruiser, and whether he lay to or shortened sail before or after this supposed discovery, is immaterial, for he had an unquestionable right to prepare for his defence as soon as he thought that the danger was real. The first act of aggression was certainly on the side of the Marianna Flora. She had no right to prevent by force the approach of the Alligator if the latter was a lawful cruiser in amity. But the real character of the cruiser could not be known, and the firing upon her, while at a great distance, if it were wrong, was levissima culpa, and may fairly be construed as an indication of defensive resistance. It might justly inflame suspicion on the other side, but it was not decisive of meditated hostility, any more than of mistake, resulting from fear of pirates. Under these circumstances I agree entirely with the district judge in the conclusion, that the capture by the Alligator was lawful; and that her commander was in no fault for resisting an attack made upon him under no just provocation. If, indeed, there was any blame, it was in the first attack by the Marianna Flora; because she had no right to apply force, unless in self-defence, and where the circumstances admitted of no reasonable doubt of a hostile or piratical attack.

If the capture was lawful, the next question is, whether Lieut. Stockton was justified in sending in the Marianna Flora for adjudication. It was argued that there was no probable cause for sending her in, and if there was, that probable cause forms no justification except in cases of the exercise of belligerent rights on the ocean. In other cases of marine seizures, it is said the party can only justify himself by the event of condemnation. I am not aware that any such doctrine has been judicially settled. The cases of Murray v. The Charming Betsy, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 64, Little v. Barreme, Id. 170, and Maley v. Shattuck, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 458, which have been relied on at the bar, establish no such doctrine; for in each of these cases the court came to the conclusion, that there was no probable cause of capture. As far indeed as they go, they lead in the opposite direction, for the seizures in those cases were made under our non-intercourse acts against France. Act 27 Feb. 1800, c. 10 [2 Stat. 7]; Act 9 Feb. 1799, c. 108 [1 Story, Laws, 588 (1 Stat. 611, c. 2)]; Act 13 June, 1798, c. 70 [1 Story, Laws, 508 (1 Stat. 565, c. 53)]. So far from the court having undertaken to decide that probable cause would not have justified the capture, the judgments proceed upon the tacit assumption that it would, and limit the inquiry to the simple fact; and in the case of The St. Louis, 2 Dod. 210–264, where the seizure of a French ship in time of peace for traffic in the slave trade was held a marine trespass, Sir William Scott expressly overruled the claim for damages upon the ground, that the question was of the first impression. The court, therefore, in the present state of judicial opinions on this subject, is not called upon to admit, that probable cause would be no justification.

It is the less necessary in this case to sift that doctrine, because here there was not only probable cause, but justifiable cause of capture. The Alligator had a perfect right to resist the attack and to subdue a vessel acting as an enemy. And if this be so, where is the case which decides that a justifiable capture becomes tortious by sending in the vessel for adjudication? If in the combat any persons had been killed on board of the Alligator, it would have been a matter of absolute duty to have sent in the vessel for the deliberate consideration of the government, in what manner to deal with the parties to the aggression. If any persons had been killed on board of the Marianna Flora, it would have been an act of great prudence to have sent her in, that the government might have had an opportunity in their own courts to have ascertained the fact and the truth of the vindication from the very parties in interest, flagrante facto. It was not even denied in the argument, that cases of this sort might have authorized the act, and they differ not in nature but in degree only from that before the court. I do not say, that under all the circumstances it might not have been fit for Lieut. Stockton to have dismissed the Marianna Flora without further inquiry. Judging from the lights now before the court, that would certainly be my own opinion, because there were strong reasons to believe, that the attack was not hostile. But we are to consider that this is not the case of a private ship of war. Lieut. Stockton held the commission of the government, and his vessel bore the national flag. The attack was an indignity to that flag. It was a trespass upon the sovereignty of the nation, unintentional indeed, as the court now believes, but still it was a trespass. If the government should choose to seek any redress, it could be had against the vessel in our own ports only. If it should choose deliberately to investigate the circumstances, it had a perfect right to institute a judicial inquiry. Lieut. Stockton might therefore have justly thought, that in a case confessedly new in its character, he was not bound to take upon himself the responsibility of a final decision; that it was more compatible with his own honour and with that of the nation, as well as with the rights of the other party, to submit the whole to the judgment of a legal tribunal. If he thought, and that certainly appears to have been his impression, that the attack was wanton and piratical, the duty of sending in became almost peremptory. Certainly if there had been no probable cause of capture, this would not have justified him, but as the capture was justifiable, it takes off all pretence that his conduct was malicious or oppressive. Lieut. Stockton might have released the vessel; but the question upon which damages depends is, whether he was bound so to do. In a case of such novelty and responsibility I cannot say that he was bound so to do, or that his mistake in not doing it binds him to damages. I adopt in this respect the doctrine of Sir William Scott in the St. Louis. The question here, as there, is primae impressionis; the case here, as there, is the first of its kind. The nature of the attack could not be absolutely ascertained, in a manner free from doubt on the ocean, and the law arising out of it was certainly of no easy interpretation. If there be any case in which the admiralty has given damages for sending in a vessel for adjudication, where the capture was justifiable, it has escaped my notice. I do find that damages have been sometimes refused even where the capture was a marine tort. I am not for making the hard duty of a public officer in the exercise of his discretion (compelled as he often is to decide suddenly upon emergencies) more hard by inflicting damages, unless the law has imposed upon me that duty. In this case I cannot come to the conclusion that such is my duty; and therefore with the greatest respect for the opinion of the learned judge of the district court, I feel myself compelled to reverse his decree as to damages, which, I understand, is the only part of his decree appealed from, restitution having been acquiesced in after the first decree. Under all the circumstances each party ought to bear his own costs.

I am not sorry that the amount in controversy will enable the highest tribunal to revise the present decision, and to correct any errors into which I may have fallen.

[On appeal to the supreme court the decree of the circuit court was affirmed, without costs to either party. 11 Wheat. (24 U. S.) 1.]

SALVAGE—PILOTING THROUGH DANGEROUS SHOALS.

[Piloting a vessel through dangerous shoals, where she could not have made her way unaided, is salvage service, if performed in connection with other salvage services.]

MARVIN, District Judge. This schooner, laden with cotton and molasses, got ashore on the North Key Flats, one of the Tortugas Shoals. Three smacks, carrying 20 men, went to her assistance. They found the master employed in staving his deck load of molasses to lighten the vessel. She was lying easy, but surrounded with intricate and extensive shoals. On the arrival of the smacks, the master ceased the business of staving the casks of molasses, and the next morning forty barrels of molasses were put on board one of the smacks, and, sail being made she went off the reef into deep water, by an inner channel, known to the salvors, but unknown to the master. Considerable skill and good judgment were displayed by the salvors in managing the sails to get the vessel clear of the shoals, and by subsequently piloting the vessel through the channel out to sea. The master could have got the vessel afloat by throwing overboard the forty barrels of molasses, but he could not have got her out of her difficulties without a pilot. The chief value of the service consists in the piloting, which very likely has been the means of saving vessel and cargo. The value of the vessel may be estimated at $8,000, and the cargo at $25,000. I think $3,200 is a reasonable salvage. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the sum of $3,200 be allowed the libellants in full compensation for their services rendered in saving said vessel and cargo, and that upon the payment thereof, and the costs and expenses of this suit, the marshal restore said vessel and cargo to the master thereof, for and on account of whom it may concern; that the wharfage, storage and other bills be examined, and allowed by the court among the expenses.

SHIPPING—PERISHABLE CARGO—SALE BY MASTER—REFUSAL BY CONSIGNEES—AWAITING END OF LAY DAYS—RECOVERY AGAINST SHIPPERS FOR FREIGHT.

1. A perishable cargo may be sold by the master at the port of discharge for the benefit of all concerned, when the consignees refuse to receive it, and it cannot readily be stored in a place suitable to preserve it.

2. The master need not, before sale, await the expiration of lay-days, within which the cargo is to be discharged by the shippers, who are consignees, if they refuse to receive it.

3. Owners of the vessel, in such case, may recover from the shippers full stipulated freight, less the net proceeds from the sale of the cargo.

In admiralty. Libel in personam by the owners of the vessel against the shippers, to recover freight according to the terms of a bill of lading, for carrying a cargo of ice from Gardiner, Maine, to New Orleans, that had been sold on arrival by the master from necessity, inasmuch as it was perishable and the consignees had refused to receive it. The owners of the cargo, who were both shippers and consignees, appeared, and answered that they did not refuse to receive the cargo at the port of discharge, but that the master, without authority or necessity, sold and sacrificed it, and that the owners of the vessel are chargeable with its value, which was much greater than the stipulated freight.

FOX, District Judge. This libel is promoted by the owners of the brig, one of whom was master, to recover from the respondents Messrs. Cheeseman and Marshall, the balance of the freight for the transportation of a cargo of ice for the respondents from Gardiner to New Orleans. The bill of lading is produced as evidence of the contract. It bears date at Gardiner, August 21, 1865, and recites "the lading on board of the brig of 260 tons of ice by the respondents; ice and dunnage to be loaded and discharged by shippers, with the assistance of vessel's crew; freight $3,000." Certain stipulations are found in the bill of lading touching the care to be exercised over the cargo on the voyage by the master, upon which no question is presented. "The ice was to be delivered in like good order and condition, excepting what may be lost by the natural waste of the article, at New Orleans, the danger of the seas only excepted, unto Cheeseman and Marshall or agents, for the medical department of the United States army or their assigns. Freight for said ice, payable at place of discharge, after a proper discharge of cargo; twelve working lay-days for discharge of cargo; after that, demurrage at the rate of fifteen cents per ton on each register ton of vessel per day."

The brig arrived about seven miles below New Orleans on the 21st of September. The captain went up to the city and ascertained that one Gould was acting agent of the respondents, who were engaged in the business of shipping ice to that place. The master called on Gould that afternoon, and informed him that he had this cargo on board and was ready to deliver it. Gould replied, that he was the agent of respondents, but had not received from them any bill of lading, or instructions about the cargo. The next day, the master again called on Gould and tried to get him to receive the cargo. Gould offered to receive it, but said that he could not pay the freight or any part of it, as he had no funds. The master offered to deliver him the cargo if he would pay one thousand dollars on account of the freight and endorse on the bill of lading that the cargo had been delivered. Gould replied that he could not do it as he had no funds, and did not know as he could raise money enough to pay expense of unloading the cargo. Notice was given in the public prints, calling for the agent of respondents to come forward and receive the cargo, in reply to which, Gould again appeared, claiming to act in behalf of respondents, offering to receive the cargo and give the master sight drafts on respondents for the freight money, but at the same time informing the master, that his drafts heretofore drawn on the respondents had been returned protested for non-acceptance, one of which for $500, or $600 was shown to the master by Gould.

Gould finally notified the master that he would have nothing to do with the cargo, and that he abandoned all claims to it. The master thereupon took legal advice, and by direction of counsel the cargo was sold on the afternoon of October 4th at public auction for the benefit of whom it might concern. The quantity of ice delivered as per auctioneer's certificate was 153 tons, and the net amount realized was $664.85. The sale was advertised in three daily papers, and a large company was in attendance. The respondents had another cargo of ice at the time in New Orleans, and so far as there is any evidence before the court, the sale was fairly and honestly conducted, and the fair cash value realized.

The vessel was not entered at the custom house until September 23d, and did not reach her berth until that day, but she could have been ready to discharge on the morning of September 22d, if Gould had been prepared to receive the cargo and pay freight according to the bill of lading. The master remained at New Orleans until the 29th of October, but he received no communication from the respondents, and it is not shown that the bill of lading was ever forwarded by them to New Orleans, or that at any time they advised Gould, or any other person there, in relation to the cargo. The master applied to the medical department at New Orleans to receive the cargo, but it was declined.

The answer of the respondents admits that the master did notify their agent at New Orleans of his arrival, but claims that the notice was given on the 23d, instead of the 21st, and sets forth in justification, "that defendants at that time reasonably expected and supposed that their said agent at New Orleans would, on the arrival of said cargo, have sufficient funds to pay said freight, and they now believe that he did have sufficient funds as aforesaid, but that they are informed and believe that when called on by the master of said vessel as alleged in said libel, he did refuse to pay said freight in the manner stipulated as aforesaid, but he did not refuse to receive said cargo, or have anything to do with it, but gave as a reason for not paying freight that he had no funds, but that he would receive the cargo and give sight drafts for the freight on defendants, which drafts would have been duly honored and paid."

The agency of Gould is therefore fully admitted by the respondents, and I am satisfied from all the evidence in the case, that at last, he abandoned the cargo to the master and refused to have anything to do with it; and that before this, he had been requested by the master to obtain instructions from his principals by telegraph, to which he replied that the lines were out of order; and on another occasion that he had received no reply from them. Whilst I am still of opinion, as I intimated at the trial, that the mere declaration of the agent, that he had sent a telegram but had not received a reply, may not be admissible as evidence of the fact that such a telegram had been sent by him, I think the fact of the agent's having so informed the master is legal evidence bearing upon the question of good faith on the master's part, and of his desire and purpose to obtain directions from the shippers as to the disposition to be made of their property.

The agent, whose duty it was to receive this property, having thus abandoned it with the information to the master that he could get no instructions from the shippers, what was the duty of the master under all the circumstances? In the case of an ordinary cargo, the duty of the master under such circumstances, is settled by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of The Eddy, 5 Wall [72 U. S.] 495. In the opinion Judge Clifford says: "When the goods are not accepted by the consignee or owner of the cargo, the carrier should not leave them exposed on the wharf, but should store them in a place of safety, notifying the consignee or owner that they are so stored, subject to the lien of the ship for the freight and charges, and after he has done so, he is no longer liable on his contract of affreightment."

The master has a lien on his cargo for the freight due thereon, but this lien is a mere right of retention to hold the property as security for the payment of the amount due, and does not authorize him to sell the property to obtain the amount. His proper course is, either to retain the property from the consignees, or else to libel it in admiralty, as this is a maritime lien, which the district court of the United States will enforce and render available by taking the property into its custody, and determining the amount due, and ordering a sale of a sufficient portion to realize the amount with incidental expenses. I do not think any case can be found, which will justify a sale by a master of a portion of his cargo merely to defray his lien for its freight. If such an one is reported, it has escaped my observation. If this is the only ground on which this sale is to be sustained, I should think the master was not justified. It is claimed, however, that it was a necessity; that the master was so situated that he could not adopt any other course; that he was obliged, from the very necessity of the case, to act as he did; and on the whole, I am inclined to adopt this view of the transaction.

The agent of the shippers had, by his abandonment of the property, so placed the master that he had become the agent for all parties interested, and he had reason to believe that the shippers had themselves consented to that condition of things, as no advices or bill of lading had been received from them, although the master believed that an attempt had been made to obtain their directions. He was in a warm climate with a cargo of a most perishable nature, fast wasting away by the mere heat, more than forty per cent. having, as it appears, been already lost. The cargo was of a character which required a special warehouse for its preservation, one of peculiar construction, built for storing ice, and there is no evidence before me that such a building could have been obtained by the master, excepting that belonging to respondents, and this only by his surrendering all claim on the property and delivering it to their agent, taking drafts upon them for payment, which he had good reason to believe would be protested, and which he was under no obligation to receive and abandon his lien.

The cargo was of such a nature that it would very much diminish by its removal, and it must also have been attended with very great expense, the article being excessively bulky in proportion to its value. The bill of lading requires the cargo to be discharged by the shippers with aid of the crew, and there is not any evidence before me of any resources at the captain's command, to defray the expenses of discharging, if a place could have been obtained for it. It is true the master might have instituted, before the district court of the United States, a libel for his freight, but I apprehend the consequences would have been, that after defraying the court expenses, a much smaller amount would have remained to the credit of the defendants than now appears. It is claimed that the sale was made before the lay-days stipulated in the bill of lading had expired, and such appears to have been the case. But the sale was delayed to so late a day, that the vessel could not possibly be discharged before the expiration of the lay-days, and the respondents never appeared to claim the benefit of the lay-days under the bill of lading. The agent having declined to receive the cargo, and the master having become agent for all interested, I do not think he was absolutely bound to wait for the expiration of the lay-days before the sale.

In 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 248, it is said: "If the charterer has refused to load a cargo, the master should proceed at once to obtain another, and not wait till the time expires during which the charterer had a right, by the charter party, to put on board goods." He cites Blight v. Page, 3 Bos. & P. 295, note, where a vessel was allowed thirty lay-days by the charter, but on her arrival, the captain was informed by defendants' agents that the government had prohibited the exportation of the cargo, and that it would not be in their power to furnish it. The captain however, entered the port and remained forty-nine days, and then returned in ballast. Lord Kenyon held, that notice having been given to the master that the cargo would not be provided, there was no pretence to hold the defendant answerable for demurrage. This authority is cited with approbation by Cowen, J., in Heckscher v. McCrea, 24 Wend. 309, where he says: "It was completely ascertained that Low, Wilson & Co. could not fill the 130 tons, and the ship was not even bound to remain till the lay-days had expired with any view to performance. And if there is nothing more in the case, the master might have immediately weighed anchor and sailed for home. The defendant's contract might be considered as pro tanto already broken, and the master absolved from the duty of all further stay."

The case of Avery v. Bowden, 85 E. C. L. 728, affirmed on appeal, 88 E. C. L. 952, is not inconsistent with this view of the law, as Lord Campbell, in delivering the opinion of the court, states that the evidence did not show an absolute refusal to provide a cargo for the ship, but he says: "If the defendant, within the running days and before the declaration of war, had positively informed the captain that no cargo had been provided, or would be provided for him at Odessa, and that there was no use in his remaining there any longer, the captain might have treated this as a breach and renunciation of the contract; and thereupon, sailing away from Odessa, he might have loaded a cargo at a friendly port from another person, whereupon the plaintiff would have had a right to maintain an action on the charter party, to recover damages equal to the loss he had sustained from the breach of contract on the part of the defendant. The language used by the defendant's agent before the declaration of war can hardly be considered as amounting to a renunciation of the contract, &c."

Curtis, J., in Clarke v. Crabtree [Case No. 2,847], says: "It is objected, that the master waited but twenty-four hours at Bonaire; that if a master sails away, without waiting the stipulated number of lay-days, if the number is stipulated, or a reasonable number, if there be no stipulated number, he cannot recover for dead freight, and that the evidence shows, that three to five days is the usual and therefore the reasonable number at Bonaire. But the evidence only proves three to five days, the ordinary time occupied in taking a cargo of salt on board there; not to wait to find a cargo; and if the master ascertained, in less than twenty-four hours that by waiting three to five days, he could not obtain a cargo, he was not only not bound to wait, but he had no right to wait and impose the charge of lying there on the charterers." I do not deem it an insuperable objection to the validity of the sale of the cargo of the Maria White that it occurred before the expiration of the stipulated lay-days. Was the sale justifiable from necessity?

In Arthur v. The Cassius [Case No. 564], Story, J., says: "But suppose in the next place there was a final refusal to receive the cargo by the consignee, did that authorize the master to carry it to New Orleans? * * * I agree that in cases of necessity, the master becomes by mere intendment and authority of law the agent of all concerned, as well of the owners of the cargo as of the ship. But this right of the master is to be clearly made out by unquestionable proof of such necessity. In the present case, the cargo could have been landed at Velasco, which was the port of destination. Then there was no necessity of carrying it elsewhere. It is said, it could not have been sold at Velasco for want of money in the hands of purchasers. Be it so. But there was no necessity of any sale, the cargo was not perishable, and therefore the sale would have been unjustifiable on the part of the master, since it would not have been a sale from necessity. * * * If the consignee refused to receive the cargo after it was landed, and to give the bill on New York for the freight, then it became the duty of the master to place the same in the hands of some trustworthy person for the security of his lien for the freight, and, subject thereto for the benefit and account of the owners. But no right, even under such circumstances, could exist on the part of the master to sell the cargo, unless it was perishable and might otherwise have been lost or have perished. * * * It might, perhaps, have admitted of a very different construction, if the cargo could not have been landed at Velasco, or there deposited in safety for the owners, or if the sale had become indispensable from the perishable nature and condition thereof."

In that case, the cargo was lumber, freight payable in New York; applying the principles there laid down to this cargo of ice, in a warm latitude, fast wasting away, with no proper place for storage, and with no funds to pay the expenses of discharging the cargo, I am well justified in holding that this sale was from necessity, and authorized under the special circumstances attending it. It would perhaps have been more in strict accordance with his duties, after the agent had abandoned the cargo, if the master had himself attempted to communicate with the shippers by telegraph. But I think that his failing so to do should not be held so great a violation of his duty, as to render invalid all his subsequent proceedings, taken under advice of counsel, and which were all conducted in good faith on his part, and which I apprehend have proved as beneficial to the respondents as any course which could have been adopted, especially as their own agent induced the master to believe, that the respondents were unwilling to send instructions in regard to their property.

In case of The Treasurer [Case No. 14,159], which was in relation to a cargo of coal, the bill of lading of which had been assigned to the libellant, but which he did not receive, Judge Sprague says: "Even if the libellant were the owner of it, the master would have been authorized," in case of an absolute refusal by him to receive the cargo, "as an agent from necessity, to dispose of the cargo, and would have been responsible for the net proceeds, after deducting freight and his expenses and compensation as such agent." If such a necessity could exist in the case of a cargo of coal in Boston harbor, where the owner resided, and where probably a hundred places for its landing could be procured, much stronger must it exist in case of a cargo of ice at New Orleans in the early part of October, on board a single deck vessel, not very carefully stowed and protected from the sun as it appears from the great waste of forty per cent. in as many days, on a voyage from Maine.

It must be remembered, that in the very outset the respondents failed to comply with their duty. They should have forwarded the bill of lading with instructions to their agent, and provided him with funds to pay freight. All this they entirely failed to do. Their retention of the bills of lading is quite inexplicable. By their neglect, and the abandonment of their property by their agent, the master was thrown into a perplexing and hazardous situation; he was obliged to deal with a perishable article. Delay would be ruinous to the thing itself, and attended with great expense of demurrage if the cargo should be allowed to remain on board the vessel, and if removed and stored on owner's account, had it been practicable, in all probability the owners would not have been benefited thereby; under such circumstances, the conduct of the master should not be severely scrutinized by a court of admiralty, so as to establish a liability in behalf of parties as negligent as these respondents are shown to have been. The master acted honestly, and as he believed to be for the best interests of all parties under the very critical position in which he was placed, and on the whole, the shippers have no right or occasion to object to his conduct in their behalf.

The libel contains a claim for three days demurrage which is not allowed. Decree for the freight, less the net proceeds of sales of cargo at New Orleans, viz. for $2,335, and interest from date of filing libel.

Case No. 9,084.

The MARIETTA TILTON v. The HARRISBURG.

[36 Leg. Int. 66.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Feb. 14, 1879.[2]

COLLISION—RULES OF EVIDENCE—CONTRADICTING WITNESS—DEPOSITION BEFORE INSPECTORS—FOR WHAT USED.

1. In a plenary cause of collision, a witness was regularly examined for the libellants. He had been previously examined on oath in an investigation before the board of inspectors of steam vessels under the authority of an act of congress. The respondents could not use his deposition before the inspectors as evidence of what the witness stated in it, but could only use it for the purpose of contradicting him.

2. However the application of ordinary rules of evidence may be relaxed in a court of admiralty in proceedings which are summary and informal, there is no such relaxation in plenary causes.

In admiralty.

Henry Flanders and Curtis Tilton, for libellants.

Thomas Hart, Jr., and J. W. Coulston, for respondents.

CADWALADER, District Judge. The collision occurred in Vineyard Sound near to the Cross Rip light-ship. The case of the libellants, owners of the schooner, was that when the colliding vessels were about two miles apart, they were both approaching the light-ship upon converging courses, the schooner from the westward, and the steamer from the eastward; that from this time the schooner showed her red light on the starboard bow of the steamer, and that, throughout this distance, both vessels held their courses, without deviation, till in the peril of collision, when the schooner ported, and the steamer improperly starboarded.

The case of the respondents, owners of the steamer, was that although the respective courses were more or less easterly, and more or less westerly, they were not converging courses, that, on the contrary, each vessel showed her green light to the other vessel until just before the collision, when the schooner improperly changed her direction, attempting to cross the bow of the steamer, and thus caused the disaster.

What can have caused any danger of the collision which occurred is not easily conceivable. The night was very clear, the moon shining in her first quarter. It was not later than nine o'clock. Each vessel had the proper lights burning brightly. The deck of each was properly manned and officered. There was a sufficient look-out from each vessel; and each was actually sighted from the other at full distance. The light-ship, at her usual and known anchorage, was also in full view from each vessel. There was no extraordinary tide or wind—the actual wind being a full sail breeze for the schooner. The channel was broad. The narrowest part of it is where the light-ship lay, very near to the point of collision. Here the channel is three-quarters of a mile wide; and vessels pass in deep water, both inside and outside of the light-ship. The seeming absence of danger may, perhaps, have caused inattention where it has not been detected. The sum of the velocities of the approaching vessels was such that if an injudicious act or omission occurred on the part of either of them, there may not have been sufficient time afterwards to avert the evil consequences. There is, however, no certainty on the subject. The least improbable conjecture is, perhaps, that which may arise from the fact that, on board of the schooner, although it was the mate's watch, and he was thus nominally officer of the deck, her captain was also on deck directing some of her movements before and at the crisis of peril. To give such orders was not beyond the legitimate power of the captain. But his simple presence on deck and occasional giving of directions did not wholly exclude or supersede the duty or authority of the mate, whose watch it was; and it is not impossible that this may have caused some fatal misconception or confusion of orders.

It is not, however, necessary to consider the case upon any such theory or hypothesis. The burden of proof is on the owners of the schooner, who are libellants, to show that the steamer was in fault. The question is, whether the libellants have relieved themselves of this burden. The course of the steamer was more or less westwardly, with a bearing towards the light-ship; and the course of the schooner more or less eastwardly, with a bearing which must sooner or later have been towards the light-ship. But independently of testimony which is irreconcilably conflicting, it is impossible to assume how far to the northward or southward of a line due east and west from the light-ship, either colliding vessel may have been at any point of time before the crisis of peril. Therefore the ingenious diagrams exhibited on the argument may define or elude the difficulties of the case, but cannot assist us in resolving them. We know, with sufficient certainty, that when the colliding vessels, having sighted each other, were still perhaps two miles or further apart, their respective courses were such that the green light on the starboard bow of each vessel was shown to the other vessel. So long as this may have continued to be the case the vessels cannot have been upon converging courses, and there was no danger to be guarded against. We also know that the course of the steamer was maintained, without any change, until the crisis of peril. This was right, unless the schooner's direction had been so changed in the meantime that her port bow, with its red light, was shown to the steamer. Just before the collision this red light of the schooner was discerned by those on board of the steamer. The wheel of the steamer was then immediately put to starboard. If the vessels had not been in very close proximity this would have been a wrong movement, because the steamer's helm should have been ported. But according to the preponderance of opinions of the nautical experts who have been examined, if the schooner's red light had not been previously shown, the putting of the steamer's wheel to starboard, at this crisis of peril, was not injudicious. If the question were doubtful, there would not have been any responsibility for an error of judgment at such a crisis.

The point to be decided therefore is whether the peril was caused by any previous fault of the steamer. It is contended for the libellants that the schooner's course had, in point of fact, been previously so determined as to show her port light to the steamer. If such were indeed the case, the vessels must have been on converging courses before the crisis of immediate peril. In that case, the steamer was in fault for not porting her helm in season, to avoid the schooner. The question of fact is thus whether the schooner's red light had been shown to the steamer before the crisis of peril? Of the schooner's company two persons only survived the disaster. Of these two, one was not upon deck, and cannot have known any thing material. The other, a seaman named Carter, has been examined. He testifies that he was on the lookout, and reported the steamer's green light to the mate, when the captain came forward. The witness, after mentioning several orders given by the captain of the schooner, deposes that when about three quarters of a mile from the light-ship, and about two miles from the steamer, the captain ordered the helmsman to keep for the light-ship, that the steamer then bore on the schooner's port-bow, and the light-ship was on the schooner's starboard bow, and that, from this time, there was no change in the course of the schooner until a minute before the collision. If this was the truth, it establishes the case of the libellants. But it is irreconcilably contradicted by previous sworn statements of the witness himself. The first of these statements was an affidavit procured and written by an agent of the respondents under such circumstances that no effect useful to the respondents ought to be attributed to it. The second sworn statement was in an investigation before the local board of inspectors of steam vessels. This was a sworn examination, authorized by act of congress, and appears to have been conducted without any exercise of improper influence. In this examination Carter states that, in his judgment, the cause of the collision was "the undecided movements of the captain of the schooner, who was very nervous and excited;" and says that, when both vessels were showing their green lights, the captain ordered the wheel of the schooner hard down (or a-port), and that, if this had not been done, the collision would certainly have been avoided.

It is contended for the respondents, that they may use this former affidavit of Carter before the inspectors as evidence of what he states in it. The argument is founded on a supposed disregard in courts of admiralty of the ordinary judicial rules of evidence. The relaxation or inapplicability of such rules, which is to a limited extent allowable in summary causes, cannot, however, be extended to plenary causes. The present is a plenary cause. Therefore the only use which the respondents can make of the former affidavit is to contradict the judicial examination of Carter. This contradictory effect is so absolute as wholly to deprive the libellants of what might otherwise be the benefit of his testimony. This is the less to be regretted, because there is another extra-judicial affidavit of Carter, which we have not seen. This was an ex parte sworn statement to the proctor of the libellants. It was, under a notice to produce it, called for at the hearing, but was not exhibited. The call gave to the libellants an opportunity to exhibit it if they thought it confirmatory of his judicial examination. The court could not make an order, which was asked to compel its production. But this does not prevent an unfavorable presumption from its non-production. Such a presumption would arise in any tribunal. But the reason for the presumption is peculiarly strong in a court of admiralty, where all persons on board of colliding vessels are witnesses of necessity, rather than witnesses for the respective parties adducing them for examination.

The result is that the libellants are without any support of their case from testimony of any one who was on board of the schooner. The testimony of two persons who were on duty in the steamer is direct and explicit. Budd, who was on the look-out, sighted the schooner and reported her to the mate, whose watch it was. The mate responded. The schooner was then on the starboard bow. Budd, having reported her, was under no obligation of duty to keep her afterwards constantly in view. But there was nothing else in sight, and nothing to prevent him from doing so; and he testifies that he was watching her and her movements all the time. He certainly was in the most favorable position for discerning whatever was to be seen. He states that when she was within about three or four hundred feet off, and on the starboard bow of the steamer, she luffed, which brought her across the bow of the steamer, and caused the collision. Murphy, the mate, is a more important witness. He saw the schooner's green light before Budd reported her. She was about two miles off, on the starboard bow of the steamer. Murphy says, "the schooner kept on showing me her green light after the man reported her, for three or four minutes, ... when she shut in her green light for a second or two. As she did this, I told the man at the wheel to starboard the wheel. In a second, just as he commenced to starboard his wheel, I told him steady, for she showed her green light all plain again. The schooner at this time was two and a-half to three points on our starboard bow. She kept showing her green light until she came down about four points on our starboard bow. The schooner put her helm hard a-port, and showed her red light, shutting the green light in entirely. At this time she was between forty and fifty yards off." This was just before the collision. Murphy says further: "From the time I first saw the green light of the schooner up to the time she showed the red light, just before the collision, she was never less than two points on our starboard bow. She did not indicate at all that she was going to cross our bows until she showed her red light."

Recurring to the former part of his testimony, in which he had said that three or four minutes after the man at the wheel reported the schooner, she shut in her green light for a second or two, when the witness starboarded, and in a second steadied—he added, the vessel was then "all clear of me on the starboard bow; she showed her green light again immediately. . . . . When I starboarded and steadied, I could see the schooner; she did nothing to concern me; she did not actually port. The shutting out of her green light for an instant may have been due to the wind or her sail. It was not due to porting at that time." Here it is important to observe that when the green light was thus shut out for an instant, she did not show her red light.[3] If the red light had then been shown, it would have indicated such a changeableness, or uncertainty, in the course of the schooner as might have required the steamer to slow, or take some suitable precaution. But as the red light was not shown at all, and the green light was immediately again in full view, no change of direction was indicated, none can have occurred, and there was no occasion for any precautionary measure. If Murphy tells the truth, the steamer was not in fault. His testimony is not of a negative kind. He does not merely say that he did not see the schooner's red light, but positively deposes that her green light was fully in view until the sudden change of her direction which caused the disaster.

The man at the wheel of the steamer, named Kelly, has also been examined. His testimony is not clear. Neither is it important. The man at the wheel owes no duty to look out. He does not leave his post, and is there only to receive and execute orders of the officer of the deck; and a man at the wheel of so large a vessel would not be in a position to see much if it were his duty to look out. When he receives and executes an order, there is nothing to fix it in his recollection unless it is immediately followed by some extraordinary effect. This man remembers the order to starboard given to him at the crisis of peril; and seems to have an obscure and confused recollection of the previous order to starboard which was instantly countermanded. There was an interval certainly of some minutes between the two orders to starboard; but the witness, from indistinctness of recollection, or from the form or inverted order of questions put to him, seems to express himself without any clear discrimination between the two orders. His testimony, standing alone, might perhaps be understood as intimating that the course of the steamer had been changed when the prior order to starboard was given, which order as is explained by Murphy, was instantly revoked, and never executed. All obscurity in this part of Kelly's testimony is however cleared up when we bear in mind that by the other evidence in the case, and by the pleadings and arguments on both sides, it is admitted, without question, that the steamer's course was not, in any wise, changed, until just before the collision, when the only starboarding, properly so called, occurred. The witness explicitly and repeatedly states that he does not remember seeing the red light of the schooner until she thus got "right close," and was apparently crossing the bow of the steamer; and he says that if the schooner had kept her previous course she would, to the best of his judgment "have gone all clear." This witness says that when he first saw the schooner, he should judge she was about two points on the starboard bow as near as he can remember. He says: "I could not tell how far off she was. I asked Mr. Murphy what is that fellow doing. I did not know exactly how the schooner was going, and that is the reason I asked Mr. Murphy. He looked through the glasses and made some remark that she was coming this way as near as I can remember." In another part of the testimony the witness says: "When I first saw the schooner and noticed her course, I could not say how far she was off; she might have been three or four hundred feet; I starboarded at that time; I mean the time when I got the order. As near as I can remember it was after I starboarded that I saw the red light of the schooner. Mr. Murphy immediately took the glasses when I called his attention to the schooner. He immediately thereafter gave me the order to starboard."

It is not easy to analyze and apply this testimony. The libellants' counsel endeavors to apply it so as to impute negligence or inattention to Murphy. But I cannot see any sufficient reason for the imputation. The question put by Kelly was not one which required an answer from the officer of the deck. It was not necessary that the officer of the deck should be all the time using his glasses. The schooner and her light could be well discerned without them. But Murphy was actually using them at the time when the schooner's green light suddenly disappeared and reappeared; and there is no reason to doubt that he was using them as constantly as was necessary. This he was doing independently of any suggestion from Kelly. On a review of Kelly's testimony, I do not think that it materially assists or injures the case of either of the litigant parties.

A fireman named Butler, who was in the steamer, has been examined for the libellants. His duty was to work below at the coal bunker. He states that he was at work below when the vessel struck, but had not gone below until the schooner was distant four or five times her length from the steamer, and that he had continued to see her red light for ten minutes before he thus went below. It is highly improbable, if not incredible, that any man could thus have gone quietly below to his work, when within only four or five times the schooner's length from her, because a man the most unaccustomed to the water must then have seen that immediate collision was inevitable. But the witness, in cross-examination, admits that he "had been back at work about three minutes before she struck." He afterwards says "three or four minutes;" but persists in the statement that she was only four or five lengths off and that for ten minutes he had been watching the schooner, seeing, not her green light, but "only the red light." He admits that he saw nothing while he was below. Butler's testimony, however qualified, would, if true, decide the case in favor of the libellants. He is contradicted by another fireman named Duffy. But whether contradicted or not, the testimony of Butler is of little weight. Those who are in the habit of considering the testimony of persons on shipboard, even that of persons of the nautical profession, rely very little upon impressions on the memory of witnesses who were not performing any duty connected with the subject of their evidence. Listlessness and inattention when off duty are frequent if not habitual; and this man, if he was observing the schooner at all, was more or less neglecting his own duty. It would be quite unsafe to rely upon such evidence in opposition to that of the officer of the deck. Therefore the case of the libellants would fail if it depended upon testimony of persons in the colliding vessels.

The light-ship was at her anchorage, close to the point of collision. She was "lying head to the westward, stemming the tide." If we knew, with sufficient certainty, the respective bearings upon her of the approaching steamer and schooner, we might determine at about what distance their courses first became converging. It was not a duty of any one in the light-ship to observe such courses or bearings of passing vessels. But there was nothing to prevent such observation, and there might occasionally be strong reasons to induce it. Two persons who were in the light-ship have been examined. One of them, a seaman named Barnard, testifies in a very imposing manner. But when his testimony is carefully considered, he appears to have hastily conceived crude impressions, and to have relied on them afterwards with overstrained confidence. Thus, for example, he undertook to say that from his position in the light-ship he could see on board of the steamer, and that he could see no lookout on her deck. This he said so as to imply a statement or a belief on his part that there was no lookout from the steamer. Now he cannot have had any sufficient knowledge on the subject, and the testimony of those on board of the steamer establishes most conclusively that Budd was, from first to last, on the lookout, and remained upon the forecastle deck until he jumped down at the instant of the collision. I mention the fact here with a sole reference to the credit attributable to impressions on Barnard's mind.

In another part of his testimony, being asked what enabled him to give the bearings accurately of both the steamer and the schooner when he first saw them, and whether he looked at his compass, or made any particular observations at the time, he answered "yes;" and, being asked what induced him to look at that time, and whether doing so was any part of his business, he answered, that sometimes he went and looked at the compass to see how vessels were bearing when they were coming down, and that he took particular notice how this schooner was bearing from the light-ship before the steamer struck her. Here he does not mean to affirm that he took the bearing of either approaching vessel (not even that of the schooner) by the compass, nor was it contended in argument that he did so, and yet his language almost implied an assertion that he made either some observation by the compass, or some observation of not less precise accuracy.

This having been premised, we may consider his testimony. He was on the deck of the light-ship, and saw each of the approaching vessels. He says that when he first observed the steamer she was about a mile and a-half off, and was bearing east from the light-ship, and that when he first observed the schooner she was about half a-mile off, and bore from the light-ship about northwest by west, and that he saw no subsequent change in the course of either vessel until the collision. If all these impressions on the mind of the witness were, in every respect, precisely correct, the vessels must have been on such converging courses that the schooner's red light very soon became discernible from the steamer. In that case, the steamer ought to have ported her helm instead of continuing her course. According to the libellants' theory of the case the steamer was thus in fault. To this theory, as applied through Barnard's testimony, the libellants' diagrams mentioned in a former part of this opinion are adapted.

But the theory, so far as thus dependent upon Barnard's testimony, is refuted in a great measure, if not altogether, by that of the other witness, namely Plaskett, the captain of the light-ship. Captain Plaskett was not on deck of the light-ship at the moment of the collision. But he had been on her deck less than, or not more than, five minutes before it; and he did not go below until after he had seen the lights of both of the approaching vessels; and he testified that there was nothing in what he saw to lead him to expect a collision between them. An important part of his testimony with an intended application to Barnard's, is that vessels approaching at some distance eastward or westward of the light-ship, might change their courses "a point or two without altering their lights;" and he added that a seaman of experience could, with observation, tell from the light, the course of vessels within two points. In other words there would be no certainty, within twenty-two and a half degrees, in such impressions of the most accurate observer. This uncertainty may be considered greater as to Barnard, who was not a cautious observer, but conceived opinions hastily. It must be remembered also that both Barnard and Captain Plaskett were speaking of bearings from the light-ship, and not of the bearing of the schooner from the more distant steamer. Similar considerations are more or less applicable to the course of the steamer, which may likewise have been mistaken a point or two. This increases the uncertainty, and, in effect, doubles the measure of uncertainty.

Here it perhaps becomes important to observe moreover that Captain Plaskett says he saw the green light of the schooner, and does not mention her red light at all; but Barnard says "the schooner headed southeast when I first saw her. I saw both her lights until she got almost to us," and says that she then shut in her red light. This was almost at the instant before collision. Upon a comparison of these parts of the testimony of the two witnesses, we may conceive the probability, or possibility, that the red light of the schooner may not have been exhibited to the light-ship until after Captain Plaskett went below. If such was the case, the red light probably was not discernible from the steamer, which was farther off, until somewhat later. The last suggestions are not purely conjectural. They acquire force when we recur to the other testimony, which is inconsistent with the schooner having been, when Barnard first saw her, so far to the northward of the course of the steamer that the vessels were moving on converging lines. We do not know, with sufficient certainty, where the schooner was at any time. The course of the steamer, though perhaps less uncertain, cannot be determined with geometrical precision.

The case of the libellants, founded upon the testimony of Barnard and Butler, has been presented very plausibly and argued very forcibly. But the arguments have not convinced me that I ought to disregard the testimony of Murphy, the mate of the steamer, whose means of knowledge were the best. We should weigh testimony rather than count witnesses.

The libel must therefore be dismissed, and, I regret to say, with costs. But it is hoped that payment of them will not be exacted, as the case is one of extreme hardship.

SEAMEN'S WAGES — EMBEZZLEMENT OF CARGO — RESPONSIBILITY — CONTRIBUTION.

Embezzlement in a foreign port. Persons not of the crew assisted in lading, and a box plundered part of the cargo assigned to be stowed by strangers; but the crew worked occasionally with them, and were ordered by the court to contribute to the loss out of their wages.

[Cited in Spurr v. Pearson, Case No. 13,268; Edwards v. Sherman, Id. 4,298; U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. 251.]

[See Alexander v. Galloway, Case No. 167.]

The amount of wages was not disputed. The seamen were charged with a sum each (the whole being in the ratio of wages, averaged on the officers and crew) for a loss to the ship, in consequence of embezzlement of part of a box of cambrics and lawns, to a considerable amount. It appeared, from circumstances, that the embezzlement took place at the time of lading the ship in Liverpool, though it was not discovered until she was unlading at the port of Philadelphia. Several persons, not of the crew, were hired to assist in stowing the vessel at Liverpool; these had the part of the cargo assigned to them to stow, of which the box plundered composed an article; but the mate and some of the crew were always with them, and the case or box was in a situation to admit access of the crew, as well those who assisted the labourers, as any others of the seamen. The box was discovered to have been much injured and broken open with a crow-bar, or some such instrument, probably used at the time of stowage. It was contended, by the counsel for the owners of the ship, that if it could be even proved, that the labourers hired at Liverpool to assist the crew, had committed the embezzlement, they were, pro hac vice, part of the crew, and so the whole are answerable civilly, though not criminally.

BY THE COURT. If it could be proved that the labourers committed the embezzlement; without the participation, connivance or knowledge of the mariners, the latter would not be bound to contribute. The policy of the law which obliges mariners, engaged for a voyage, to be responsible for each other in such cases, does not apply when occasional labourers, or other strangers, commit depredations without the fault, negligence or connivance of all, or any part of the crew. The labourers, in this case, were not part of the crew. It is true, that if seamen are hired for a voyage, and work on board the ship, in the harbour of outfit, they may sue in the admiralty for their wages, though the voyage does not proceed. But this does not warrant the doctrine set up by the respondent's counsel, who contend that the labourers are, quoad hoc, a part for whom all the crew are responsible. There is no doubt but that the seamen are answerable for embezzlement, unless they can clearly shew either by positive evidence or strong circumstances, that it was committed by persons not of the crew. It is impossible for me to say, who committed the act in question in this cause; it may have been either a separate, or joint act; it may have been perpetrated by the labourers alone, or in company with some of the crew. But, under the uncertainty, I think the law throws the burthen of proof on the mariners. They are prima facie responsible. Some of them were mixed with the labourers, and all of them had access to the box plundered. It would give an opening to dangerous and ruinous collusions and frauds, if mariners were discharged from their responsibility, merely because occasional labourers were hired, to assist in loading a ship. Under all circumstances, I am of opinion, that the mariners must contribute, respectively, their proportion of the loss, and I decree accordingly.

NOTE. Frequent decisions have been had, on the principles of this case. Where the crew are mixed with strangers, it behooves them to be peculiarly watchful; though, in some instances, it is severe on mariners. I have generally, however, suspected collusion, when I have enforced responsibility. One case occurred, where the theft was, by circumstances strong and convincing, fixed on those not of the crew, and I decreed against any contribution. In a cause recently decided, the mate left the vessel, in a port of St. Domingo, in possession of the blacks —went on shore without securing the hatches— some others of the crew followed his bad example—and only the cook and a sick mariner remained on board. The vessel was robbed in the night, by people from the shore, as it appeared from circumstances, to me. There was much contrariety in the testimony, but I was convinced, that part of the crew partook of the plunder. There was, beside, gross negligence, which, of itself, would incur contribution. I decreed retribution, on the usual terms. The articles lost, however, were greater in value, than the amount of wages due. I listen to testimony, to throw off responsibility, in mixed cases, in any reasonable degree satisfactory. The merchant, who increases the risk of the crew, by introducing strangers among them, cannot expect that strict and rigid proof, which is required in ordinary cases.

SEAMEN'S WAGES — DEDUCTION — CONTRIBUTION — FOOD — QUANTITY — KIND — NAVY RATION.

[1. The vessel owner can retain wages of the crew, as a contribution for injuries from a collision alleged to have been caused by their negligence, until after the legal liability is established.]

2. The quantum or description of articles fixed for mariners in merchant ships, was not intended to be specifically according to the various kinds of esculents directed for the navy; but it was declared and agreed, that of such provisions as are ordered to be provided by merchants for their seamen, the quantities of the like kinds, furnished per diem, should be the same with those fixed for the navy. So of equivalents, where the designated species could not be obtained.

[Cited in Gardner v. The New Jersey, Case No. 5,233; The Elizabeth Frith, Id. 4,361; The Mary, Id. 9,191; The Childe Harold, Id. 2,676.]

The claim of the seamen consisted of two parts—

First. A demand for six dollars, each, retained by the owner [Ketland], to indemnify him against a suit brought against the master [Williamson], in a common law court, for running down and damaging a schooner at sea. This suit is pending and undetermined, and the captain agreed that he meant to contend the point; alleging that no negligence or misconduct on his part, or that of the crew, occasioned the accident.

BY THE COURT. It is clear to me, and must be well known to the counsel of the respondent, that the detainer of the six dollars out of each of the seamen's wages, is illegal. No contribution can legally be called for from them, until a recovery is had against the master, and the quantum ascertained. It is yet doubtful whether any damages will be recovered, for the accident mentioned. The master is satisfied that none are justly due. To withhold the payment under a bare possibility, is not warranted by law. As to what the merchant deems prudent and safe for himself, such considerations cannot control or destroy contracts. If negligence or malfeazance, on the part of the master and crew, had occasioned the accident, the mariners must, no doubt, contribute; but the fact and consequences must be legally established, before such contribution can be called for.

This point was given up, and the wages agreed to be paid.

The second demand was for a large sum, under the act of congress, for payment of additional wages, on account of short allowance, during the greater part of an East India voyage home. It was agreed that, to satisfy the words of the act of congress (designating what quantity and species of provisions should be on board at the departure of a ship destined across the Atlantic) "and so in proportion for a longer or shorter voyage," there should have been on board, previous to sailing, two hundred and fifty pounds wholesome meat, two hundred and fifty pounds good bread, and one hundred and fifty gallons of water, for each person, of whatever capacity or description, in the ship. The ration established for the navy,[2] was agreed to be that, by which the allowance of provisions to mariners should be regulated. There were eighty-four persons on board—the length of an India voyage was agreed to be equal to two and half voyages from America to an European port.

It appeared that the Washington was amply provided, previous to her departure from Philadelphia to India, not only with the requisite quantity for the voyage, of enumerated articles of provisions and water, but with a very considerable excess. In addition, there were flour, rice, and cabin-stores, in abundance. On her return, water was taken in, and provisions, though not of the specified articles, purchased. The passage was uncommonly long. Owing to over-care in the master, in putting the common ship-bread into tight casks, which happened not to be made of seasoned wood, twenty-six casks, out of thirty, were spoiled on the out passage. He therefore, gave bread of a better kind, in less quantities, making out the allowance in ample proportions, with other articles equivalent. At Batavia, the bread was saved, and except one biscuit per man, yams, rice and potatoes, were given in lieu thereof. But because the ration was not delivered, in the kind of esculents mentioned in the act of congress, and some precautions taken to ensure a sufficiency of provisions, the mariners now set up this demand.

[2] See Act Cong. July 1, 1797, "An act providing a naval armament" (section 7, vol. 4 [Folwell's Ed.] p. 14 [1 Stat. 524]), wherein the naval ration is established.

BY THE COURT. The only ground for establishing a claim of the nature of the present demand, is a negligence in the master or owner, in not furnishing the ship before her departure from the port, with the quantity and species of provisions and water, required by law. Where these can be procured, no equivalents can be admitted as substitutes. But in ports, where the specific articles of provisions cannot be obtained, it would be unreasonable to suppose, that the spirit and intention of the law, do not permit equivalents, of other good and wholesome esculents, to be substituted and supplied, in place of provisions damaged or consumed. The owner or master is to take the best precautions to procure good and wholesome enumerated articles, which is often difficult in foreign ports. But they are not answerable for accidents happening to them, without negligence on their part. After the requisite quantity and species are taken in (where they can be obtained) the master is the sole judge of their expenditure. He must not wantonly deprive the crew of an ample allowance. It is not his interest, nor does it comport with his own comfort, or the safety of the ship, to produce, by unwarrantable privations, discontents, illhumour and debility, in the crew. But if the voyage is likely to be uncommonly procrastinated; if provisions are, by accidents, diminished in quantity, he may, justifiably, abridge the usual allowance. There is not the shadow of reason to complain, where other provisions are substituted, for enumerated articles, damaged, consumed, or not to be procured. It appears, in this case, that there is no reasonable or legal ground of complaint. I therefore dismiss this claim.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1840.

MARITIME LIENS — REPAIRS — DOMESTIC SHIP — SHIPWRIGHT IN POSSESSION—ORIGIN OF LIEN —HOW CONSIDERED IN ADMIRALTY.

1. There is no statute law in Massachusetts, which gives a lien in rem to shipwrights for building, equipping, or repairing ships.

[Cited in Macy v. De Wolf, Case No. 8,933; The Alida, Id. 199.]

2. By the common law, no lien exists generally for repairs and work done on a domestic ship; but a shipwright has a lien for the repairs and work done on such a ship, so long as she remains in his possession. And the owner can only devest that possession by a discharge of the lien. Yet, if the owner retain possession during the repairs, or if after the repairs are made, the shipwright voluntarily yield up the possession, his lien is gone.

[Cited in Marsh v. The Minnie, Case No. 9,117; Pendergast v. The Kalorama, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 212; The B. F. Woolsey, 7 Fed. 110; The Two Marys, 10 Fed. 923, 16 Fed. 700.]

3. It is of no consequence, how a lien arises under the local law, whether by statute or by common or municipal law. Whenever its existence is established, the jurisdiction of the admiralty attaches to it proprio vigore.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

Libel for repairs and materials for the schooner Marion, and work and labor done on her in the port of New Bedford, to which port the schooner belonged, in October and November, 1839, amounting in the whole to the sum of $221.49. There was no dispute about the amount due for the repairs, work, and materials. But when the repairs were undertaken, one Goodwin was the owner, and he subsequently transferred the schooner during the time of the repairs to the claimant [Lawrence] Grinnell. The answer insisted, that the libellant (McFarlin) had no lien on the schooner for repairs; but that they were a personal charge only against the owner. The original libel was jointly filed by Seth McFarlin and one William Spooner, the latter of whom asserted a distinct and independent claim for painting done by him on the schooner, amounting to the sum of $100. But an exception having been taken in the district court, that these distinct and independent claims could not, in the admiralty, be joined in one libel, it was agreed between the parties, that the libel should be severed, and that each libellant should proceed separately for his own claim. Upon the hearing in the district court, a decree was rendered in favor of the libellant (McFarlin), for the sum of $221.49; and from that decree, an appeal was taken to this court by the claimant.

Mr. Brigham, for libellant.

On the part of the libellant, it was admitted, that, by the general maritime law, shipwrights and material men had no lien upon a domestic ship for repairs or supplies. But it was contended, that, by the local law of Massachusetts, the shipwright had a lien so long as he kept possession of the ship, and that such lien could be enforced in the admiralty. In the case at bar, the claimant had the ship in his possession, and he could no more be compelled to abandon that possession without being first paid, than a mechanic or artisan would be required to surrender any article, which he had made or repaired, without being first paid. Upon the question of lien, the counsel cited Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324; The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438; The Nestor [Case No. 10,126]; 3 Kent, Comm. 169; Story, Bailm. § 440; Mont. Liens; Abb. Shipp. 108. Upon the point of the jurisdiction of the admiralty, the counsel cited The Robert Fulton [Case No. 11,890]; Harper v. New Brig [Id. 6,090]; and Davis v. New Brig [Id. 3,643].

G. T. Curtis, for claimant.

For the claimant, it was admitted, that the court had full jurisdiction of the matter, and that the only question was, whether the libellant had a lien by the local law of Massachusetts. The vessel being a domestic ship, no lien is given by the general maritime law. There is no statute of this commonwealth giving such a lien; and what the libellant is to show, therefore, is, that he has a lien by the common law of Massachusetts. The common law lien is a mere right to detain the thing put into the party's possession to be repaired, until his charges are paid; a strict possessory lien founded on actual possession and a consequent right of detention. The Nestor [supra]; Abb. Shipp. p. 108, § 10. This, the counsel contended, is the unquestionable law of England; and to show, that the law of this country was the same, it was argued: 1. From the absence of all authority to show, that it was different. 2. From the recognition of this doctrine by this court in The Nestor. 3. From the various statutes passed by the state legislatures to amend the common law, and supply a lien, which should be operative out of possession. To show that the possession must be actual and exclusive, and so far as it is evidenced by locality, must be in the exclusive dominion of the party claiming the right of detention, he cited Abb. Shipp. p. 108; Story, Bailm. § 440; Story, Ag. § 352; Franklin v. Hosier, 4 Barn. & Ald. 341; Raitt v. Mitchell, 4 Camp. 146; Blake v. Nicholson, 3 Maule & S. 167; Chase v. Westmore, 5 Maule & S. 180; Ex parte Bland, 2 Rose, 91; Ex parte Hill, 1 Mad. 61; Ex parte Deeze, 1 Atk. 228; Pritchard v. The Lady Horatia [Case No. 11,438]. The idea of two concurrent liens of this sort, that is, of two concurrent rights of detention by parties having no privity of interest, is impossible. Pothier, Traité de la Possession, c. 4, § 1. For if the liens conflict, and the thing is sold without producing enough to pay both, what is to determine the apportionment? Liens, standing in the same rank of privilege, as those of different seamen for their wages, may be apportioned; because they do not depend on possession, and, therefore, do not involve the idea of exclusion. But it is otherwise with liens founded on possession, which necessarily involves exclusion. Jacobs v. Latour, 5 Bing. 130. Hence, it was argued, that, as the record here shows two parties, each claiming the possession, without any privity of interest, and the evidence tended to show an actual possession by both at the same time, neither of them had such an exclusive possession, which was indispensable to give a power to detain the vessel. It was further argued, upon the evidence, that the libellant never took the vessel into his custody; but that she lay at a public wharf, where the dockage was charged to the vessel itself, and not to the libellant, and other mechanics came on board there and worked.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is a libel against a domestic ship, for materials furnished and repairs made upon her in the port of New Bedford, in this district, to which port she belonged at the time of the repairs. Under such circumstances, it is admitted, that no lien attaches upon the ship by the general maritime law, as far as it is recognised and enforced in the courts of England and America. But the admiralty courts of this country possess a general jurisdiction in all cases of material-men, and shipwrights, for work done, and materials furnished for ships, engaged or employed in maritime commerce and navigation, which may be exercised in personam at all times; but can be exercised in rem only upon the maritime law, or in its silence, where the local law of the state or country, where the work and materials are applied, gives a lien. This was held in the case of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438; and the doctrine of that case has been constantly acted upon in this court, as well as in the supreme court, whenever the question has arisen, and has been required to be decided. See Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324. See also, The Robert Fulton [Case No. 11,890]; Davis v. New Brig [Id. 3,643]. In the present case, there is no statute of this commonwealth, which gives a lien in rem to shipwrights and others for building, equipping, or repairing ships, although in most of the commercial states of the Union such statutes do exist. They are founded in a wise protective policy, and I can only express my surprise and regret, that our state legislature has not provided the like remedy for this most important and useful class of our citizens, especially as it has given to carpenters and others a lien on houses under similar circumstances. But, although no state statute exists on this subject, yet as we all know, by the common law, which is a part of the law of Massachusetts, every shipwright has a lien for repairs and work done on a ship, while she is in his possession; and the owner or purchaser cannot devest that possession, except by a discharge of that lien. But this lien is strictly founded upon possession; and, therefore, if the possession either remain in the owner during the repairs, or after the repairs are made, the shipwright voluntarily yield up that possession without payment of his charges, his lien is gone, and is no longer capable of being enforced in any manner whatsoever.

These being the undisputed principles regulating this subject, two questions have been argued at the bar in the present case. The first is, whether, upon the whole evidence, there was any such possession of the schooner claimed by the libellant in this case, as created a lien for the repairs and the materials sued for, at the time when the libel was filed. The second is, whether, assuming such possessory lien then to exist, it is such a lien as can be enforced in the admiralty jurisdiction, considering the schooner to be a vessel employed (as without doubt she was) in maritime trade and navigation. Upon this last point, I do not think, that the slightest doubt can now be entertained. Since the decisions made in the supreme court, the question is not, how the lien arises under the local law, whether it be by statute, or by the common or by the municipal law. That is wholly immaterial. The lien is enforced, because it is of a maritime nature; and the moment its existence is established, the jurisdiction of the admiralty attaches to it proprio vigore. Such, as far as I know, has been the uniform understanding and practice, in all the admiralty courts of the Union. In respect to the other question, it involves rather the consideration of matters of fact, than of law. I pass over, without remark, every thing, which has been suggested at the argument, in respect to the joint possession, asserted in the original libel, by Spooner and the libellant (McFarlin), and their joinder, in one suit, of their respective independent claims for work, and labor, and materials. After the severance of the suit in the court below, the present appeal brings nothing, but McFarlin's claim, before the court; and the sole question is, not whether he and Spooner had, or could have, a joint possession upon their separate and independent claims and liens; but whether McFarlin had such a possession and lien, as he now asserts in his own libel, to sustain his separate suit.

The facts, as they appear in the evidence, are these. McFarlin is a shipwright by trade, and has his ship-yard, where he repairs ships, on a small island, about one half of which he hires of the owners in fee, Messrs. Randall & Haskell, who have also a wharf on the premises. McFarlin has been accustomed to use this ship-yard, and make repairs at or near the wharf, for about seven years. By a contract and understanding between Randall & Haskell and the libellant, the libellant is at liberty to repair any vessels at their wharf, and fasten them there; and the wharfage during the repairs, instead of being charged to the libellant, is charged to the owner of the vessel repaired. In this very case, the schooner Marion was brought from a wharf on the other side of the channel by the libellant and his workmen and certain riggers, and fastened at the wharf during the repairs. The wharfage was charged to the Marion, and has not yet been paid by any person. During the time of the repairs by the libellant, from the 28th of October to the 21st of November, 1839, when they were completed, the libellant and his workmen were on board every day. One David Field also, during a part of the time, while these repairs were going on, was on board doing work as joiner, in the cabin; and his work was not completed until about the beginning of January, 1840. Spooner was doing the work of a painter on board during a part of the same period. While the repairs were making, Goodwin, the owner, having become embarrassed and in doubtful circumstances, the libellant became solicitous about his pay; and accordingly he constantly told Field, that he should insist upon his retaining possession of the schooner, until he was paid in full. He also directed one of his workmen, who was employed by him in a neighbouring shop, to keep a constant watch upon the vessel by day and by night, and if any person attempted to remove her without his leave, to prohibit him. The libel was filed in the district court, on the 19th of December, 1839; up to which time, and afterwards, the schooner remained fastened at the wharf, the libellant going constantly on board, and asserting his intention of holding the possession, to Field, who was at work on board; and during all this period no person attempted to remove the schooner. So far, then, as any evidence exists in the case, the original possession taken by the libellant, when he undertook to repair the schooner, and for this purpose carried and fastened her to the wharf near his ship-yard, was never disturbed or interfered with.

Now, upon this posture of the facts, it seems to me, that the possession of the schooner must be deemed to have been originally taken and held by the libellant from the time, when he fastened her to the wharf, until the time, when she was libelled. He took, and held all the possession, which, in the critical circumstances, he was able to take; and he asserted his right of possession openly. It is not necessary to say, that this possession was to be treated as to all intents and purposes a possession exclusive of the owner. In one sense, it was the possession of the owner, and under him, and not adverse to him, and in the nature of a bailment. But it was such a possession, as is, in my judgment, sufficient to found a lien upon that possession with the consent of the owner. If the schooner had been hauled up within the known limits of a ship-yard, owned or hired on a lease by the libellant, no one could doubt, that the possession of the schooner there would be such a possession as would found a lien, even though other workmen for other purposes were admitted to be on board, such as ship joiners, and riggers, and painters. The possession for some purposes may well be deemed the possession of the owner, as for example, to entitle him to an action for any tort done to the vessel. But for the purpose of founding a lien in the shipwright, the possession must be deemed in the shipwright; as much so, as if the repairs had been made in an enclosed dock-yard of the ship-wright.

Then, does the fact, that the wharfage was to be charged to the owner of the schooner make any difference? I think not. It was a mere arrangement between Randall & Haskell and the libellant, for their mutual benefit, with which the owner, as such, had nothing to do. It amounted to an agreement on the part of Randall & Haskell, that they would look for their pay to the owner, and not to the libellant; but was not any waiver of the possession by the libellant, founded on his general use of that wharf for the purposes of his business. Under the arrangement between Randall & Haskell and the libellant, the wharf was as much to be deemed in his possession and under his control, for the purpose of the repairs, as, under his lease, were the neighbouring ship-yard and other grounds. Whoever seeks to devest an apparent possession of a shipwright, should, as I think, show, by incontestable proofs, that the real possession was understood between the parties to remain in the owner. That would naturally be inferred, if the ship should be repaired at the wharf or dock of the owner, or at the wharf or dock of a third person, by a direct contract between the owner of the wharf and the owner of the ship, with which the shipwright had no privity or connexion. But, here, the only arrangement actually made, is between the shipwright and the owner of the wharf; and this not for one vessel, but for all vessels, which the shipwright should or might repair there. The license was to him generally, and not for repairs for any owner in particular.

Upon the whole, my judgment is, that the decree ought to be affirmed with costs.

MARIONNEAUX'S CASE.

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1870.

BANKRUPTCY—SETTING ASIDE DISCHARGE—FRAUD KNOWN BEFORE DISCHARGE—IMMATERIAL ERRORS ON APPEAL.

1. A bankrupt's discharge will not be set aside where the fraudulent acts on which petitioning creditors rely for the annulling of the discharge were suspected and believed to exist before the discharge, and when the evidence (discovered after the discharge) to prove such fraudulent acts is incompeten, and inadmissible.

[Cited in Re Shaw, 9 Fed. 497.]

2. When upon the whole record it appears that the petitioner had no case, the judgment of the court below will not be reversed, even though the court may have erred in some of its rulings.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.]

This was a petition filed in the district court by certain creditors of A. P. Marionneaux, a bankrupt, to annul his discharge, on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained.

Chas. E. Fenner, for petitioners.

E. C. Billings and A. de B. Hughes, for bankrupt.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The petition alleges in substance that the order of discharge was granted on February 24, 1869; that the bankrupt fraudulently concealed and failed to surrender for the benefit of his creditors a certain judgment in the case of Pointer v. Mutual Ins. Co. [unreported], rendered in the sixth district court of New Orleans parish. That said judgment was really the property of the bankrupt, but the consideration on which it was founded was fraudulently conveyed to Pointer; that for the purpose of giving value to the transfer, Marionneaux took from Pointer a note or notes, which he held prior to and at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy, and that he neither surrendered the property in the judgment, nor the notes. That the petitioners have long suspected and believed the said facts to be true; they were always stoutly denied by Marionneaux and by Pointer, and petitioners had no knowledge of the same until after the discharge of Marionneaux, when, from the dying declarations of Pointer, who died on February 20, 1869, and certain provisions in his will, they did ascertain that the facts in reference to said judgment were as stated by them in their petition.

I have been unable to determine how this case comes into this court. It is called an appeal, but there is no testimony submitted to the court, and the agreed statement of facts does not cover all the questions of fact in dispute in the court below. There are two bills of exceptions incorporated in the record, which would indicate that the case is here on error, but there is no writ of error, assignment of error, prayer of reversal or joinder in error. If the case is considered as an appeal, it is sufficient to say that there is no testimony whatever submitted to the court, and the agreed facts do not prove or tend to prove that the discharge in bankruptcy of Marionneaux was fraudulently obtained. On the contrary, the agreed facts do not touch that question at all. This court cannot, of course, say that the discharge ought to be set aside for fraud when there is no testimony whatever showing fraud.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Regarding the case as here upon error, we might affirm the judgment of the court below, because no errors are assigned. I have, however, looked into the record to ascertain whether the court below fell into any error for which its judgment should be reversed. I think it very clear that if the petitioning creditors relied solely upon testimony to prove that Marionneaux obtained his discharge by fraud, which was known to them before the discharge, and which in fact they had used in a judicial proceeding to establish the identical act of fraud set up in this petition, they have no standing in court. If we look into the record we find that they did rely on other testimony, namely, the dying declarations of Pointer, and certain provisions in his will which could be considered as nothing more than dying declarations reduced to writing.

It is a well settled rule of evidence that dying declarations are admissible only in criminal cases, and when the death of the deceased is the subject of the change and the circumstances of the death are the subject of the dying declarations. Rex v. Mead, 2 Barn. & C. 605; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 156. As dying declarations, the statements of Pointer were clearly inadmissible. Nor could they be admitted as the declarations of one of two conspirators, for to make such proof competent, it must be preceded by proof of the conspiracy. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 111. They cannot be given as a part of the res gestae, for the declarations were long subsequent to the transactions to which they relate. Rawson v. Haigh, 2 Bing. 99, 104; 9 E. C. L. 335; Marsh v. Davis, 24 Vt. 363; New Milford v. Sherman, 21 Conn. 101; Johnson v. Sherwin, 3 Gray, 374. This additional proof, then, on which petitioning creditors relied, was the merest hearsay evidence, and not admissible; and, in fact, was no evidence at all. This testimony, when offered, would have been properly excluded, and that would have left the petitioning creditors to rely solely on facts which were well known to them long before the discharge of Marionneaux, to prove fraud in obtaining his discharge. So that, even if the court below erred in its rulings, it did not err to the damage of petitioning creditors. They had no case, and could not by any possibility have succeeded had the rulings of the court been in their favor upon all the points reviewed. In their petition they set out the nature of the new evidence that they have discovered since the discharge of Marionneaux. It is the dying declarations of Pointer. The record shows that they had no case, and that their petition should have been dismissed. A writ of error brings up the whole record, and the plaintiff in error may take advantage of a fatal defect in the declaration. Bank of U. S. v. Smith, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 171. There is no error in this record for which the judgment should be reversed.

MARIPOSA CO. v. BOWMAN.

Circuit Court, D. California. April 24, 1867.

DURESS—ILLEGAL DEMAND—PROPERTY—PERSON MAKING DEMAND.

An illegal demand paid under duress of property may be recovered back; but real property is not in duress unless there be an illegal demand made against the owner, coupled with a present power or authority, in the person making such demand, to sell or dispose of the same, if payment is not made as demanded.

[Cited in Stephan v. Daniels, 27 Ohio St. 540.]

[This was a suit by the Mariposa Company against C. C. Bowman.]

John B. Felton, for plaintiff.

Clarke & Carpentier, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. The complaint states that on November 18, 1862, Cyrus A. Eastman obtained a decree in the proper court of the state of California for foreclosure and order of sale of a portion of the real property known as the Mariposa estate; and that such portion of said property was then owned by John C. Fremont and others, but that for a year prior to the commencement of this action —September 24, 1866—such estate, including the mortgaged premises, was the property of the plaintiff—a foreign corporation, formed under the laws of the state of New York, for the purpose of mining on such estate. That while such order of sale was in the hands of the sheriff, and before a sale of the premises was made thereunder, the decree of foreclosure was duly paid and satisfied, but the sheriff afterwards sold the property in question under such order, and wholly disregarded the fact that the amount due upon said decree had been fully paid. That at such sale the defendant became the purchaser, and received from the sheriff a certificate of sale, dated March 22, 1866, and was about to receive a deed from him therefor, and that the proceedings were a cloud upon the title of the plaintiff and impaired the value of its stock. That a deed from the sheriff in pursuance of such proceedings would have been a further cloud upon such title, and that the plaintiff for the purpose of dispelling this cloud and "preventing the injury done to it by the acts and proceedings aforesaid," on September 18, 1866, paid to defendant the sum which he pretended to have paid for the property at the sale —namely, $38,003.60, together with 12 per centum thereon, and the fee for the certificate —$2. That there was collusion between said Eastman and the defendant in this—that defendant did not pay any money on account of the purchase, but by an arrangement with Eastman the amount bid was credited on the decree, and that the defendant then knew that the decree had been fully paid.

Although the fact is not explicitly stated in the complaint, it must be inferred from what appears therein, that the plaintiff, after the order of sale was issued, succeeded in some way to the interest of Fremont and others, and thereby became entitled to redeem the property from the purchaser, at the sale aforesaid.

On this state of facts the plaintiff claims that the payment by it to the defendant was made under such compulsion as entitles it to maintain this action to recover back the amount so paid.

The case of the plaintiff has been presented with great zeal and ability by counsel, but my judgment is not convinced. The leading case cited for the plaintiff (Boston & S. Glass Co. v. City of Boston, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 187) gives the rule on this subject as follows: "If a party with a full knowledge of all the facts of the case, voluntarily pays money in satisfaction or discharge of a demand unjustly made on him, he cannot afterwards allege such payment to have been made by compulsion, and recover back the money, even though he should protest, at the time of such payment, that he was not legally bound to pay the same. The reason of the rule, and its propriety, are quite obvious, when applied to a case of payment upon a mere demand of money, unaccompanied with any power or authority to enforce such demand except by a suit at law. In such case, if a party would resist such demand, he must do so at the threshold. The parties treat with each other on equal terms, and if litigation is intended by the party of whom the money is demanded, it should precede payment. If it were not so, the effect would be to leave the party who pays the money the privilege of selecting his own time and convenience for litigation; delaying it, as the case may be, until the evidence, which the other party would have relied upon to sustain his claim, may be lost by the lapse of time and the various casualties to which human affairs are exposed. "The rule alluded to, when properly applied, is doubtless a salutary one, and is not to be departed from, but in cases resting in a plain and obvious distinction from such as are ordinarily and familiarly known as embraced within it."

The court then states the exception as follows: "If there be a controlling necessity in the case, arising from the peculiar circumstances under which the money is demanded, the rule does not apply." The cases cited in support of this exception to the general rule, are, where money is extorted by duress of goods as where a party having the plate of another in pawn, refuses to deliver it to the owner, except upon the payment of an illegal demand; or where tonnage or light money is illegally demanded by a collector as a condition precedent to granting a clearance to a vessel, or to liberate a raft of lumber detained to exact an illegal toll; "and generally where money is paid to obtain possession of property which the party, making the illegal demand, has under his control, such payment will be considered compulsory." Astley v. Reynolds, 2 Strange, 916; Ripley v. Gelston, 9 Johns. 201; Chase v. Dwinal, 7 Greenl. 134; Shaw v. Woodcock, 7 Barn. & C. 73; Morgan v. Palmer, 2 Barn. & C. 729.

In the case at bar, the facts were all known to the plaintiff at the time of payment. The property alleged to be in duress, was in its possession and still remains so. No demand was made upon the plaintiff for money whatever. But on the contrary, the plaintiff as a volunteer came forward and paid this money to the defendant, for the purpose, at most, of removing what it deemed a cloud upon its title, or preventing a further cloud from settling thereon.

While I do not admit the doctrine contended for by defendant's counsel, that the duress of real property is never a sufficient compulsion to justify the payment of an illegal demand, I think it will be found, that a mere cloud upon the title, or of a threat to create one, has never been held to produce such compulsion. Suppose a case: a mechanic files a lien upon the property of A. The demand for which the lien is filed is an illegal one in whole or in part. So long as this claim remains of record unsatisfied, it may be said to be a cloud upon the title of the owner. But that is not a controlling necessity which compels the owner to pay the illegal demand, and if he does pay it with knowledge of the facts, he cannot recover back the amount. To make it a case of payment under compulsion, there must be an illegal demand, coupled with a present power or authority in the person making such demand, to sell or dispose of the property, if payment is not made as demanded. The case of a mortgage with a power of sale by the mortgagor without judicial proceedings, or of a mortgagor in possession after condition broken, or of a tax collector armed with a warrant which authorizes him to distrain property for taxes, are the leading instances given in the books of duress of real property which excuses the payment of an illegal demand with knowledge of the fact.

Hays v. Hogan, 5 Cal. 241, is cited by plaintiff to show that a party paying money to prevent a cloud upon his title to real property, may recover the amount, because paid under compulsion. In that case the defendant was proceeding to sell the property of the plaintiff for municipal taxes, upon a warrant authorizing him to distrain for the same. The court held that the tax was illegally assessed; and this was sufficient to justify the conclusion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover back the money. It is true that the court in the course of its opinion say, that the plaintiff paid his money "to protect his property from a clouded title;" but it appears to me that the expression was a mere inadvertence.

The illegal collection or exaction of taxes, tolls or fees, by persons having official position or under color of office, are placed upon peculiar grounds, and for obvious reasons. Money paid upon a demand made under such circumstances, has been recovered back, when as between private parties, dealing upon equal terms, the action could not have been maintained. In this case the plaintiff was under no such compulsion. At most, there was but a cloud upon his title, by reason of the sale and sheriff's certificate. The money was not paid to prevent this, for it was already a fact accomplished. True a conveyance from the sheriff to the defendant would follow in six months, unless the plaintiff redeemed, by the payment to the former of the purchase money. But the defendant did not demand this money of the plaintiff and could not collect it by law. The plaintiff having volunteered to become the successor in interest to the judgment debtor, sought to redeem the property from the effects of the sale. This was a privilege which the law gave it, to be exercised or not at its own option. The plaintiff was the actor. Under these circumstances, one of two courses was open to it; either to resist the proceedings founded on the sale, on the ground of its illegality, or to submit to them and redeem. In the former case the plaintiff could have had the sale set aside and the order therefor returned. The court, where the proceedings were pending, had control over its officer and process, and upon the facts alleged would undoubtedly have given the plaintiff relief. And, in any event, it might have brought a suit in equity to set aside the conveyance and sale as illegal and a cloud upon its title. But the plaintiff, instead of resisting this claim at the threshold, chose to pay the defendant the purchase money and redeem. Having made its election, without such compulsion as makes the payment in contemplation of law involuntary, it must abide the result, and cannot recover the money back.

The demurrer to the complaint is sustained.

USURY—NEW YORK STATUTE AS TO CORPORATIONS—ACCOMMODATION ENDORSERS—EFFECT OF USURY ON CONTRACT.

1. The statute of the state of New York, that no corporation shall interpose the defence of usury, does not extend to suits against accommodation endorsers for corporations.

2. Where the law of a state forbids a corporation taking over a certain amount of interest, is a contract for a greater amount void? If not void, the surplus interest paid should be credited to the debtor, as not collectible.

MILLER, District Judge. This suit is against the defendants as endorsers of a promissory note, of which the following is a copy:

"Office of the Milwaukee & Horicon R. R. Co., Milwaukee, Wis., March 23d, 1858. $20,000. Three months after date for value received, the Milwaukee and Horicon Railroad Company promise to pay to the order of J. B. Smith, Jasper Vliet, Garret Vliet and Daniel H. Richards, with interest, twenty thousand dollars, payable at the American Exchange Bank, in New York; having deposited herewith as collateral security with authority to sell the same on the non-performance of their promise, in such manner as the holder hereof may deem proper, either at public or private sale, and apply the proceeds hereon, sixty of the first mortgage bonds of this company of one thousand dollars each, payable in 1878, with the coupons that fall due November 1, 1857, attached. Milwaukee & Horicon Railroad Company, by J. B. Smith, President.

"Endorsed: J. B. Smith. Jasper Vliet. Garret Vliet. D. H. Richards."

This note was given to the Market Bank in lieu of other notes, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of twenty thousand dollars, that had been previously negotiated at the bank. The negotiation for a loan on those notes to the company was commenced at the instance of the company, through a resident of Milwaukee, who was a relative of the cashier of the bank. By a private agreement, interest at the rate of seven per cent. was paid, and exchange, and also a bonus to the agent, which was divided between the agent and the cashier of the bank. The exchange was charged and paid, at the rate of exchange between Milwaukee and New York, which was much higher than that between Troy and New York. On the giving of the note in suit, the same conditions were contemplated, but they were not carried out. The agent received the collaterals and the bank holds them. The plaintiff is a banking association under the general banking law of the state of New York, located in the city of Troy, where it can do business, and not elsewhere. This was a contract made and executed in the state of New York; and it must be controlled by the laws of that state. By those laws, the rate of interest upon the loan or forbearance of money is seven per cent. And no person or corporation shall directly or indirectly take or receive, in money, or in any other way, any greater sum. And all bonds, bills, notes, assurances, conveyances, and all other contracts or securities whatsoever, (except bottomry and respondentia bonds or contracts,) and all deposits of goods, or other things whatsoever, whereupon or whereby there shall be reserved or taken, or secured, or agreed to be reserved or taken any greater sum or greater value for the loan or forbearance of any money, &c., shall be void; and any person receiving interest in violation of the law, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine or imprisonment. In April, 1850, an act was passed, that no corporation shall hereafter interpose the defense of usury in any action. [Laws N. Y. 1850, p. 334.] Associations formed under the general banking law of the state of New York, according to decisions of the courts of that state, are not bodies corporate and politic within the spirit and meaning of the constitution of the state; but they are nevertheless corporations for all practical purposes. And they are subject to the general laws of the state regulating the rate of interest. The books of reports of the state contain many cases in favor of and against banks and banking institutions involving the question of usury. The proof shows that the original notes were given to the bank by the railroad company, endorsed by these defendants as payees, on a loan of money by the bank to the company. If the original notes were void for usury, the note in suit is to be considered void. Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 258; Jackson v. Packard, 6 Wend. 415; Tuthill v. Davis, 20 Johns. 285; Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 65; Walker v. Bank of Washington, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 62. If the charge for exchange was a cover for usury, the contract was usurious and void.

In the case of Leavitt v. Curtis, 15 N. Y. 9, it is decided, in effect, that under the act of April, 1850, a corporation cannot set up usury in any way to defeat a contract otherwise valid. And in Southern Life Insurance & Trust Co. v. Packer, 17 N. Y. 51, it is decided that the act applies to foreign corporations litigating in the courts of that state. In the opinion, the court use, in reference to the act, the words "this partial repeal of the usury laws." The act is not to be considered a repeal of those laws, but merely a prohibition of the defense of usury, on the part of corporations, in the courts of the state. It is not intimated in either of the cases, that the act was intended to include accommodation endorsers for corporations. The contract or transaction may be usurious; but that shall not be allowed to be pleaded in the courts of the state by a corporation. Corporations alone are prohibited from interposing the defense of usury. The system of the usury laws of New York, for the protection of individuals makes usurious contracts void; but the contracts of corporations are made an exception, by the act, merely to the extent of their interposing the plea of usury in the courts. The act declares it to be the policy of the state to withhold protection only from corporations. The act does not make contracts of corporations, to give more than seven per cent. interest, valid. It merely withdraws protection from corporations. The usury laws are left in full force against the lender. The note of the railroad company, and the endorsement of the defendant, were but one transaction. The endorsers were essential parties to the transaction. If the act had prohibited the defense on all contracts of corporations, then the defendants might be included in the prohibition. The defendants are so far parties to the note, as accommodation endorsers, that they may object to its payment for usury. Jones v. Hake, 2 Johns. Cas. 60; Wilkie v. Roosevelt, 3 Johns. Cas. 206; 11 Wend. 329; 8 Paige. 641; 9 Paige, 187; 7 Paige, 602. In the case of Bock v. Lauman, 24 Pa. St. 435, it is decided that a bill of exchange drawn at Buffalo, by the agent of a railroad company, to the order of the president of the company, and endorsed by the defendant, when it was negotiated in New York, on usurious loan, was void as to the endorsers; although by the act of 1850, it should be valid against the company. That is the only adjudicated case on this subject. And, although it is not of equal authority with a decision of the court of appeals of New York upon the construction and force of a statute of that state, yet it is a decision of a highly respectable court, and worthy of favorable consideration. The law of the state of New York in the most positive terms forbids corporations from receiving a greater amount of interest than seven per cent.

It was argued by counsel that, independent of the penalty for usury, the note in suit should be considered void as a contract for a greater amount of interest than a corporation was allowed by law to receive. In the case of Fleckner v. Bank of U. S., 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 338, the court say: "The act incorporating the Bank of the United States does not avoid securities, on which usurious interest may have been taken; and the usury laws of the state cannot be set up as a defense to a note, on which it is taken. It is merely a violation of the charter for which a remedy may be applied by the government." But in the subsequent case of Bank of U. S. v. Owens, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 527, the court decide that such a contract and loan on the part of the bank are void on general principles. The court remark: "Courts of justice are instituted to carry into effect the laws of a country and they cannot become auxiliary to the violation of these laws. There can be no civil right, where there can be no legal remedy; and there can be no legal remedy for that which is in itself illegal." Such has also been the ruling of the supreme court of Ohio. Bank of Chillicothe v. Swayne, 8 Ohio, 257; Creed v. Commercial Bank of Cincinnati, 11 Ohio, 489; Miami Exporting Co. v. Clark, 13 Ohio, 1. Also in 5 Conn. 560. It is well understood that a corporation created by statute is a mere creature of the law; and can exercise no powers, except those which the law confers upon it, or which are incident to its existence. Head v. Providence Ins. Co., 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 127; Bank of U. S. v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 64; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 587; Perrine v. Chesapeake & D. Canal Co., 9 How. [50 U. S.] 172; Pearce v. Madison & I. R. Co., 21 How. [62 U. S.] 441. Whenever a corporation makes a contract, it is a contract of the legal entity of the artificial being created by its charter. The only right it can claim are the rights which are given to it in that character. A corporation can make no contracts and do no acts, except such as are authorized by its charter, and those acts must be done by such officers or agents, and in such manner as the charter authorizes. The public have an interest, that banks shall not impose upon the necessities of their customers. Banks are created for the accommodation of the public, and they should not be allowed to assume a power of oppression. It is not the duty of the courts to lend their aid in carrying out contracts of banks, prohibited by their charter, or the laws of their state. Public policy as well as public interest require that usurious contracts, or loans of banks upon an amount of interest forbidden by law, should not be enforced by the courts. But as I have come to the conclusion that these defendants can plead, in their discharge, the law of the state of New York against usury, it is not necessary to consider further this last subject. At all events, the surplus interest paid over the legal rate, should be credited to the debtor, as not collectible.

MARKEY v. MUTUAL BEN. LIFE INS. CO.

[3 Law & Eq. Rep. 647; [1] 6 Ins. Law J. 537.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. April 13, 1877.

DISCOVERY—POLICY OF INSURANCE—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—MISJOINDER—LACHES—DEMURRER.

[1. A bill which seeks, firstly, the discovery and production of an application for a policy of insurance and of the policy made thereon, and, secondly, a decree requiring the delivery of the policy and a specific performance of a contract to deliver it, is bad for multifariousness.]

[2. A bill for discovery in aid of a suit at law cannot be maintained in the absence of allegations that it is material that the discovery should be had, and that the court of law in which the case is pending cannot compel the discovery.]

[3. A bill for specific performance of an agreement to deliver a contract of insurance cannot be maintained when the same is not filed for more than ten years after the cause of action accrued. Under such circumstances the suit is barred, both on the ground of laches and by the statute of limitations.]

Bill in equity for the discovery and production of the original application for a policy of insurance, and of a policy of insurance alleged to have been made by the defendants in accordance with the application, such discovery and production being sought to enable the complainant to maintain a suit at law; and also for the specific performance of an alleged agreement to deliver a policy of insurance and a decree for the delivery of the policy to the complainant. There was a demurrer to the bill.

[1] [Reprinted from 3 Law & Eq. Rep. 647, by permission.]

[2] [Dwight Foster, for defendant.

[This bill was filed May 20, 1876. It alleges (1) That James W. Hoyt, the plaintiff's late husband, on Sept. 21, 1865, made a written application for a policy of insurance on his life for the benefit of the plaintiff, for the sum of three thousand dollars; (2) that said application was delivered to Chas. F. Wells, the duly authorized agent of the defendant corporation; (3), that the defendant, by Wells, its duly authorized agent, agreed, if it should accept said application, to make and deliver to the plaintiff a policy of insurance according to the terms of the application and of the policy then in use by the defendant, upon the payment of a certain premium therefor by the plaintiff; (4) that the defendant accepted the application and made and signed a policy of insurance in accordance with the application, and in the form of a policy then in use by the defendant; (5) that Hoyt made an agreement with one Banks that the said Banks should pay the premium due on the policy, in behalf of the plaintiff; (6) that early in November, 1865, Wells, agent for the defendant, brought the policy of insurance to the house of Hoyt, and notified the plaintiff that the defendant had accepted the application, and made, written, and executed the policy; (7) and thereupon Wells agreed to go to Banks and obtain from him the premium, which premium Banks was ready, on behalf of the plaintiff, to pay to Wells, the defendant's agent, and to leave with Banks the policy; but Wells did not call upon Banks as he had agreed to, and did not demand of him the premium nor deliver to him the policy, but returned the same to the defendant; (8) that plaintiff the next day learned of Banks' neglect, and at once tendered the premium to the defendant at its office in Boston and demanded the policy, but the defendant refused to receive the premium or to deliver to her the policy; (9) that Hoyt died November 23, 1865; (10) that plaintiff notified defendant of his death, and demanded payment of said sum of three thousand dollars, which defendant refused to pay, or deliver said policy; (11) that plaintiff commenced a suit at law to recover said sum of three thousand dollars, returnable at the superior court of Essex county on the first Monday of June, A. D. 1866 [103 Mass. 78]; (12) that the plaintiff is advised "that in accordance with the decisions of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, she cannot safely proceed in said suit without a delivery to her of said policy, which she has demanded, but defendant refuses to deliver to her." (13) Then follow the interrogatories: 1. Did not Hoyt make a written application for a policy of $3,000? 2. Did not defendant accept it? 3. Did not defendant make and sign a policy? 4. Did not defendant, upon tender of the premium during the life of Hoyt, refuse to deliver the policy? 5. Does not defendant still refuse to deliver the policy? (15) Next is a prayer that defendant may discover and produce the original application, and the policy of insurance so made by it; (16) and may be decreed to deliver this said policy and that the terms of the agreement for a policy of insurance may be specially performed; (18) and for other and further relief. The present bill is an attempt to transfer wholly or in part to this court a litigation which has been pending for eleven years in the courts of Massachusetts, and on the merits of which its supreme court has pronounced three opinions adverse to the plaintiff. Hoyt v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 98 Mass. 541; Markey v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 103 Mass. 78, 118 Mass. 179.

[I. Assuming the present bill to be intended as one for discovery ancillary to the suit at law, it cannot be maintained. 1. There is no allegation that the discovery cannot equally well be obtained in the pending legal action. Hare, Disc. (2d Ed.) pp. 80, 88. Kerr, Disc. pp. 9, 10; Dunn v. Coates (1738) 1 Atk. 288; Bent v. Young (1838) 9 Sim. 180; Gelston v. Hoyt (1815) 1 Johns. Ch. 547; Mitchell v. Smith (1828) 1 Paige, 287; Heath v. Erie Ry. Co. [Case No. 6,307]. 2. This court takes judicial notice of the public statutes of Massachusetts. Covington Drawbridge Co. v. Shepherd, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 234. It therefore knows that by interrogatories in an action at law the defendant could have obtained all the discovery of facts and production of documents that she asks for by this bill. Gen. St. Mass. c. 129, §§ 46–57. 3. No delivery of the policy now made, whether voluntary or by decree of court, could assist the plaintiff in her pending action at law. (a) If she had when the action was brought a valid agreement to insure or to make and deliver the policy, she can recover for a breach of that contract, in damages, the amount agreed to be insured. Insurance Co. v. Colt, 20 Wall. 560. (b) If on the other hand, she has brought her suit on a policy which had not then been delivered to her, nothing which can be done by herself or by the defendant, or by the decree of a court of equity, will enable her to maintain such an action. A right of action can never be created after the action is commenced. Evans v. Bagshaw, 5 Ch. App. 340.

[II. The bill is not maintainable as one for specific performance of a contract to insure. On its face it shows that the alleged contract was made and broken more than ten years before the bill was filed. It is barred by limitation and the plaintiff has been guilty of laches. Gen. St. Mass. c. 155, § 1; St. N. J. tit. 4, c. 8; Miller v. McIntyre, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 61; Com. v. Cochituate Bank, 3 Allen 42; Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 233; Harwood v. Cincinnati & C. A. R. Co., 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 78; Peabody v. Flint, 6 Allen, 57; 1 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 587.

[III. The bill is bad for multifariousness; the plaintiff should be required to elect between the action at law and the bill in equity. 2 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 817; Pieters v. Thomson, Coop. 294; Tillotson v. Ganson, 1 Vern. 103; Hogue v. Curtis, 1 Jac. & W. 449; Jones v. Earl of Strafford, 3 P. Wms. 90, note; Connihan v. Thompson, 111 Mass. 270.] [2]

D. Saunders, for complainant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The frame of the bill does not sustain the position that it was brought for a single object, namely, the delivery to the complainant of the policy of insurance to enable her to maintain a suit at law. [The bill is two-fold. It seeks discovery and production of the original application for a policy of insurance and also of a policy of insurance alleged to have been made by the defendants in accordance with the application, such discovery and production being sought to enable her to maintain her suit at law. It seeks, secondly, not the mere discovery and production of the policy of insurance to be used as evidence in the suit at law, but a specific performance of an alleged agreement to deliver a policy of insurance, and a decree for a delivery of the policy to the complainant.][2] This sufficiently appears from the prayers of the bill, which are, first, that the said defendants may discover and produce the original application for a policy of insurance and the policy of insurance made by them; second, that the said defendants may be decreed to deliver the said policy of insurance, and that the terms of the agreement for a policy of insurance may be specifically performed, etc., and a prayer for general relief. Such a misjoinder of a bill for discovery in aid of a suit at law, and a bill for the specific performance of a contract to deliver a policy and a decree for such delivery, constitutes multifariousness, and is fatal to the bill, [upon demurrer, even if there were not other fatal objections to the bill in each of its branches, separately considered.][2] Where a bill contains several distinct grounds of a suit in equity, which cannot properly be joined, it is bad for multifariousness, and one test of this is, that the bill prays for multifarious relief. Daniell, Ch. Prac. 342, and notes; Story, Eq. Pl. § 280; Shackell v. Macaulay, 2 Sim. & S. 79; Dew v. Clarke, 1 Sim. & S. 108.

2. The bill cannot be maintained as a bill for discovery in aid of a suit at law, for two reasons: First, that there is no allegation that it is material that the complainant should have the discovery, which allegation is material. Gelston v. Hoyt, 1 Johns. Ch. 547; Heath v. Erie Ry. Co. [Case No. 6,307]. [The allegation in the bill is not of any inability to prove the contents of the application or policy, or of any inability to have them produced in evidence in the court below, but only that the orator "is advised that in accordance with the decisions of the supreme judicial court of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, she cannot safely proceed in said suit without a delivery to her of the said policy; and your orator has requested the said defendants to deliver to her the said policy, but they have refused, and still refuse, to deliver to her the same." The allegation that defendants have refused, and still refuse to deliver to her the policy, is not inconsistent with their entire willingness to produce and discover the paper in evidence. On the contrary, the allegations in the bill tend to show that there would be no difficulty on the part of the plaintiff in proving the contents of the application and policy, and no reason is perceived why, if the papers are in existence, their production in evidence might not be enforced by any court of common law jurisdiction without the intervention of a court of equity. This allegation in the bill that the plaintiff is advised that she cannot safely proceed in the suit at law without a delivery of the policy, seems not to refer to any supposed need of production and discovery, but is evidently inserted as a necessary averment to sustain that other distinct ground of relief sought in the bill, namely the specific performance of a contract to deliver a policy of insurance.][2] Secondly, there is no allegation in the bill that the court of law in which the case is pending cannot compel the discovery. Courts of equity do not interfere when discovery is scught in aid of proceedings in some other court, and the court itself in which the trial is to be had can itself compel the discovery required. Kerr, Disc. pp. 9, 10; Dunn v. Coates, 1 Atk. 288. [There is not only no allegation that the production of the application and the policy is withheld or resisted, but][2] the statutes of Massachusetts afford to the complainant every opportunity to obtain production of these papers that is asked for by the present bill.

3. The bill cannot be maintained for the specific performance of an agreement to deliver the contract of insurance. The agreement to make and deliver the policy is alleged to have been made early in the month of November, 1865, and the breach of the agreement and the death of the party whose life was to have been insured by the policy to have both happened during the same month. This bill was filed May 20, 1876, more than ten years after the cause of action accrued. These facts showed such laches as [aside from the express bar of the statute of limitations][2] would deprive the complainant of any right to the discretionary relief prayed for, and this objection may be taken on demurrer. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 484, 503; Maxwell v. Kennedy, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 210, 217. The defendants, though a foreign corporation, by the provisions of the general statutes of Massachusetts have an agent in the commonwealth on whom service might have been made. Under these circumstances, the bar of the statute of limitations, which binds courts of equity as well as law, also applied to this case. [The object of this bill seems to be after a lapse of ten years to transfer to this court a litigation which has long been pending, and three times tried in the courts of the commonwealth, and which after this lapse of time and in this manner cannot thus be transferred to this tribunal.][2]

Demurrer sustained; bill dismissed.

MARKOE v. COXE et al.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 537.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1839.

TRUST DEED—SALE BY TRUSTEE — INVESTIGATION OF TITLE—RENTS AND PROFITS—RESALE.

1. A purchaser at a trustee's sale for money payable by instalments with interest from the day of sale, and with leave to take immediate possession, is bound to pay interest from that day, although he should decline to take possession until some months thereafter, while investigating the title and waiting for the vendor to clear it; but is entitled to the rents and profits accruing during the same time.

2. If the purchaser pays the money into court under the order of the judge granting the injunction to stay a resale by the trustee, the interest ceases to run from the time of such payment.

Bill in equity to stay a resale of the property sold by the defendants [R. S. Coxe and others] to the plaintiff [Francis Markoe, Jr.] under a deed of trust from Timothy Caldwell, and to obtain a clear title.

This cause came before the court upon a motion to dissolve the injunction which had been granted by a judge of this court, upon condition of paying the purchase-money, and so much of the interest as the plaintiff admitted to be due, namely, from the day on which he took possession of the property, until the payment into court; which was done accordingly.

The facts upon the bill and answer of the defendant Coxe, appeared to be as follows: On the 8th of December, 1837, the defendants, as trustees under a deed of trust from Timothy Caldwell to secure a debt due to Mr. Joseph Walter, sold a house and lot in square 78, in the city of Washington, to the plaintiff, at public auction, for $4,075, one-fourth to be paid in cash and the residue in six, twelve, and eighteen months, on interest; and the purchaser to be entitled to immediate possession. That before the sale the plaintiff inquired of the defendants as to the title, and was informed by them that they could give no warranty as to title; but that as a friend they had no hesitation in saying that they believed the title good, and that, with the exception of an incumbrance to Mr. Fischer of Philadelphia, they were not aware of any incumbrance, other than that under which this sale was made. That the debt due to Mrs. Fischer should be paid out of the purchase-money, and that the purchaser might pay it, and would be allowed credit therefor. The deed of trust from Caldwell to Mr. Coxe, was acknowledged in Philadelphia before Mr. Justice Baldwin of the supreme court of the United States, who was also ex officio a judge of the circuit court of the United States for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania; but there was no certificate of the clerk of that court, that he was such judge at the time of the execution and acknowledgment of the deed, as required by the act of congress of the 31st of May, 1832 (4 Stat. 520), "for quieting possessions, enrolling conveyances," &c., "within the District of Columbia." The deed had been duly enrolled within the six months allowed by law, and the six months had now expired. There was no written evidence of a request by Mr. Walker to Mr. Coxe to make the sale under the deed of trust, or to receive the purchase-money. Under these circumstances, Mr. Markoe declined to take possession, or intermeddle with the property until the 8th of August, 1838, when Mr. Coxe invited the plaintiff to take possession of the property, promising that it should not injure his rights; upon which the plaintiff took possession, supposing it to be understood that no back interest would be claimed. Mr. Coxe claimed interest upon the purchase-money from the day of sale. Some rent accrued in the meantime, a part of which had been expended in repairs, and the residue had been received by Mr. Caldwell. Mr. Coxe threatened to resell the property, unless the purchase-money and full interest should be paid up; and to prevent such resale, the injunction was granted.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The defendant, Mr. Coxe, having answered the bill, has moved the court to dissolve the injunction, which restrains him from reselling the property for the default of the plaintiff in not paying the instalments due, and the interest thereon from the 8th of December, 1837, according to the terms of the sale. The plaintiff contends that, as he did not take possession of the property until the 8th of August, 1838, he is not bound to pay interest for any period before that day. The sale was made on the 8th day of December, 1837, and the purchaser was to be entitled to immediate possession. The plaintiff admits that he declined to take possession.

The plaintiff's counsel cited the cases of Blount v. Blount, 3 Atk. 636, and Fludyer v. Cocker, 12 Ves. 25, to show that interest is not payable upon purchase-money until the purchaser is in possession. But those cases were decided merely upon the general principles of equity. There had been no express promise to pay interest from the day of sale, as there was in the present case. If there had been, there can be no doubt that the chancellor would have decided according to the contract of the parties.

The plaintiff does not seek to be relieved from the contract, but contends that he has a right to be relieved from the interest while he was investigating the title, &c. I see nothing, in his own statement of his case, which can justify the court in rescinding the contract in part, and not in the whole; in permitting the plaintiff to avail himself of the benefit of the contract without taking upon himself the whole of its burdens. It was not the defendant's fault, that the plaintiff did not take possession of the property immediately after the sale.

I think the plaintiff must pay the interest from the 8th of December, 1837, the date of the sale, to the time of payment. But the plaintiff has a right to have the title cleared from the objections which have been made to the deed from the defendant Caldwell to the defendant Coxe, and from want of evidence that the sale was made at the request of the defendant Walter, and from the want of a release of Mrs. Fischer's mortgage, and therefore the injunction must be continued until those things are done; and the motion to dissolve it must be overruled.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, concurred in overruling the motion to dissolve the injunction; but was of opinion that the plaintiff was not bound to pay interest until he took possession of the property.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent.

This cause came to final hearing at November term, 1839, when THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra) was of opinion, and so decreed, that the plaintiff was liable for interest on the purchase-money from the day of sale, until it was brought into court, but not afterwards; and that the plaintiff was entitled to the rents and profits accruing between the day of sale and his taking possession, (deducting what was expended in repairs;) and his costs to be deducted from the purchase-money and interest. A trustee was appointed to convey to the plaintiff all the rights of all the other parties to the suit; and the injunction was made perpetual.

HUGHES et ux. v. SAME.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 306.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1837.

REAL PROPERTY—APPOINTMENT—TRUSTEE — SUIT TO COMPEL CONVEYANCE.

When property is conveyed in trust for the sole and separate use of the wife during the term of her life; and after the expiration of such term, for the use of such person or persons and for such purpose as she, by her last will and testament, shall appoint and direct; and in default of such appointment, to the use of her next of kin and personal representatives; a court of equity cannot authorize the trustees to convey the property to the husband, upon a bill filed by him and his wife against the trustees, for that purpose.

[Suits by Francis Markoe and wife against Virgil Maxcy and James Chester, Jr., and by George W. Hughes and wife against the same parties.]

These were bills in equity by husband and wife against trustees; stating, that before marriage, the wife conveyed certain personal property to the defendants in trust for the sole and separate use of the wife. That she is desirous to settle it all on her husband, and has requested the trustees to convey it to him accordingly, but they refuse because they have not the power, under the trust, to do so. The trustees, by their answer, admit the facts of the bill, but deny that they can, under the trust, convey the property absolutely to the husband.

The trust is, "to and for the use and benefit of the said Mary G. Maxcy, for and during the term of her natural life. And if the said Mary G. Maxcy shall, at any time hereafter, marry, then that she may have and enjoy, and take the use and profits of the aforesaid property, for and during the term aforesaid, to her sole and separate use, and not to be subject, in any manner, to the control or debts of her husband; and from and after the expiration of the term aforesaid, then in trust to and for the use of such person and persons, and for such purpose as the said Mary G. Maxcy, by her last will and testament, or by any instrument of writing, in the nature of a last will and testament, shall appoint and direct; and in default of such appointment, then to the use of such person or persons as, at the time of the death of the said Mary G. Maxcy, may be her next of kin and personal representatives;" and in further trust that the trustees might, at her request, and in their discretion, sell the property, and re-invest the proceeds in other property, "to be held subject to the aforesaid trusts, and with the like power of disposition," with full power, at her request, "to change the nature of the trust property and securities, whenever, and as often as it shall become necessary and expedient so to do."

The case was submitted to the court without argument, and, after great consideration,

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion that the wives had no power to convey but by last will and testament, or by an instrument in the nature of a last will and testament, as provided for in the deed of trust; and that the court could not enable them to do so.

[On specifications against the discharge of Charles P. Marks, a bankrupt.]

BY THE COURT. The second specification against the discharge would have been fatal, if it did not appear by the affidavit of the assignee and the report of the register that there were no assets remaining of the partnership. The applicant is one of the late firm of Marks, Palmer & Cushman. He applies for a discharge from his debts, partnership as well as personal. If there were assets of the partnership to be collected, it would be necessary to have the firm adjudicated bankrupts, and an assignee appointed to collect and distribute the same, before any individual member of the firm could be discharged. Where there are no partnership assets to be collected and paid out, one member of a former partnership may, upon his individual petition, be discharged from all his debts, partnership and private. In re Abbe [Id. 4]. It is not necessary to consider the third specification, because no assent of creditors need be asked for in regard to debts contracted before January 1, 1869, and it does not appear that the bankrupt has contracted any since that date. A discharge will be granted to the bankrupt from all his debts, partnership and individual, incurred previous to January 1, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—SEIZURE BY MARSHAL—INDEMNIFICATION—SUIT BY CLAIMANT—ASSIGNEE—INJUNCTION SOUGHT.

1. The United States marshal, under provisional warrant to seize the effects of the bankrupt, took goods claimed by one W., and being indemnified under G. O. No. 13, delivered the same to the assignee in bankruptcy. W. sued the marshal upon the tort in the state court. The assignee claimed the lawful possession of the property; alleged the claim of W. thereto to be illegal, and that he disposed of a portion thereof while in his possession, and prayed that W. be ordered to account therefor, and be permanently enjoined from prosecuting his action against the marshal. Held, that the facts do not warrant the granting of such injunction; the marshal is responsible if he seized property not belonging to the bankrupt, and the petitioning creditors are bound to defend him in the suit by the claimant.

[Cited in Marsh v. Armstrong, 20 Minn. 81 (Gil. 66); Clark v. Binninger, 38 How. Pr. 342.]

2. But the summary mode instituted by the assignee, by the petition, to collect the portion of the bankrupt's assets withheld, is not objectionable. Sale of the property ordered, and proceeds to await further order of the court.

In bankruptcy.

NELSON, District Judge. It appears from the petition filed by the assignee, that, at the time proceedings in bankruptcy, were instituted, a provisional warrant was issued to the marshal, under section forty of the act, commanding him to seize the property and effects of the debtor. The marshal, by virtue of the warrant, seized a certain stock of goods claimed by one Asa White, and being indemnified, under general order No. 13, delivered the stock to the assignee, as the property of the bankrupt. White has commenced a suit against the marshal, in the district court of the state, for the value of the property taken by him, and for damages for its detention. The assignee claims the property by virtue of the assignment, and alleges the claim of White to be illegal, and charges him with having disposed of some of the property when in his possession, and demands that he account for the same, and deliver over the proceeds of all sales and claims arising therefrom.

Upon this statement of facts an injunction was asked for, to restrain White from prosecuting his suit against the marshal, in the state court. An order was entered that White show cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted, and a preliminary injunction was issued. On granting the injunction we suggested that a motion to dissolve be argued on the return day of the order to show cause, if the counsel for the respondent desired. This motion has been argued, and also one for a dismissal of the petition. We are satisfied upon an examination of the case that the facts presented by the petition will not authorize us to interfere with the proceedings against the marshal in the state court. The warrant to take possession provisionally of property, referred only to the property and effects of the debtor. The marshal proceeds to execute this writ at his peril, and if he seizes property belonging to a person other than the debtor, he cannot justify his conduct under the warrant; he is liable to the injured party, and we can neither protect him, nor compel the party so injured to submit his claim for damages to this court for adjudication. There is no contest in regard to the possession of the property. The assignee has not been interfered with in the discharge of his duties, and no claim has been made upon him for any of the property in his possession. He is not responsible for the acts of the marshal, and until there is some direct interference, tending to harass him, and prevent the due administration of the estate, we cannot interpose. The marshal has been indemnified by the petitioning creditors, and they are bound to defend him in any action that may be brought by the claimant of the property seized by him under such writ. In the language of the United States supreme court (Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 347): "We see nothing, therefore, in the mere fact that the writ issued from the federal court, to prevent the marshal from being sued in the state court in trespass for his own tort, in levying it upon the property of a man against whom the writ did not run, and on property which was not liable to it." We deny the motion, however, to dismiss the petition, for the reason that there is an allegation that White has disposed of certain property belonging to the estate of the bankrupt, and retains the proceeds of the sale. The assignee is authorized by suit, if necessary, to collect the assets of the bankrupt, and there can be no objection to the summary mode instituted by the assignee for that purpose. We also order the property to be sold in the manner prescribed by general order No. 21, and the proceeds held subject to the further order of the court. Injunction dissolved.

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1804.

BANKRUPTCY — ENDORSER FOR BANKRUPT — DEBT NOT YET DUE—RIGHT OF OFFSET—CONSIGNEE —OWNER'S LIEN—AFTER SALE.

1. No debt, but such as is due and owing at the time of the bankruptcy, can be proved under the commission; and, consequently, an endorser or acceptor of a bill of exchange, drawn by the bankrupt, who has not paid it before the bankruptcy, cannot prove the debt.

[Cited in Pogue v. Joyner, 6 Ark. 241.]

2. The acceptor or endorser of a bill of exchange, who pays the bill, after the bankruptcy of the drawer, may offset the same against the bankrupt's assignees; but, he must show the debt to be a subsisting one in him, at the time the action was brought; for this is a case of mutual credit, given before the bankruptcy, although the money was not paid until after.

[Cited in Re City Bank of Savings, Loan & Discount, Case No. 2,742; Catlin v. Foster, Id. 2,519; Ex parte Whiting, Id. 17,573.]

3. Set-off. Where it will be allowed, in relation to claims upon the bankrupt's estate, arising from transactions not completed, before the bankruptcy.

4. Whatever lien might have existed upon goods unsold, in the hands of a consignee, shipped to him upon a particular account, and under an agreement, which he has not kept; when these goods have been sold, the lien is at an end; and the proceeds of the goods will become the subject of mutual accounts, and of set-off between the parties.

Action of indebitatus assumpsit, for money had and received to use of bankrupts, and goods sold and delivered by them. Plea, non assumpsit, and notice to offset. The case was—Anthony & Pleasants, having shipped a cargo of tobacco and flour to John Waring, in Bristol, and intending to ship more; drew bills, as they were permitted to do, on Waring, for two-thirds the cost of those cargoes; which they got the defendants in Philadelphia, to endorse, and negotiate for them on the usual commission. One of the bills having returned protested; and, the defendants [Barker & Ansley,] entertaining apprehensions for the fate of the others; they requested Anthony to come on from Richmond, in Virginia, where his house was settled, to Philadelphia, on this business. He did so; and then the defendants insisted, that Anthony should give them security, to indemnify them against their endorsements on the bills drawn on Waring. This, Anthony declared he could not do; and, if it were insisted upon, his house would be obliged to stop. The defendants objected to this step, lest it should decide the fate of the bills, not then protested; and would, in other respects, be injurious not only to Anthony & Pleasants, but to the defendants. To prevent this measure, and, at the same time, to secure the defendants; they, on the 1st of April, 1802, committed to writing, but it was not signed, the following proposition, in substance, viz. that they would accept a bill, drawn by Anthony & Pleasants, on them, for 2000 dollars, in favour of H. Gilpin, on condition, that Anthony & Pleasants would ship them forty or fifty hogsheads of tobacco; and that Anthony & Pleasants should ship them other cargoes, which they would sell to the best advantage, and would accept their bills, for the amount to be drawn, on advice received by Anthony & Pleasants, that the cargoes had come to hand. Anthony; (who, having executed a release of any benefit by an increase of the funds, in consequence of this suit, was admitted as a witness,) deposed; that a parol agreement was made, that Anthony & Pleasants might draw on the defendants, on forwarding them bills of lading of the cargoes to be shipped them; and that no part of the proceeds were to be appropriated to the discharge of the European bills, drawn on Waring. At the time this negotiation was going on, and, to secure the defendants against their endorsements of the bills on Waring; Anthony, for his house, assigned over to the defendants the cargoes shipped to Waring, for securing the defendants as endorsers; and the balance to be for the benefit of Anthony & Pleasants. Anthony & Pleasants, accordingly, shipped to the defendants different cargoes of tobacco; but, having drawn upon them before they came to hand, those bills were protested. The cargoes of tobacco shipped to the defendants, were sold prior to the 27th July, 1802. On the 26th August, a commission of bankruptcy was taken out against Anthony & Pleasants, and an assignment made to the plaintiffs. The bills drawn on Waring were all protested, before the bankruptcy of Anthony & Pleasants. The defendants paid those protested bills after the bankruptcy. The cargoes in England, were sold for so much less than was calculated upon, as to induce Waring to protest so many of the bills drawn upon him, as to oblige the defendants to take them up, to a larger amount than the proceeds of the tobacco shipped to them, and which they did pay, after the bankruptcy of Anthony & Pleasants, but before the bringing of this suit.

It was contended by the plaintiffs' counsel that, from the evidence in the cause, it appeared, that the tobacco shipped to the defendants, was appropriated to a particular purpose; and, that the defendants had bound themselves not to make use of it, to discharge any prior claims against Anthony & Pleasants, for which they were secured by the assignment. That this amounted to a waiver of their lien on those cargoes, and, consequently, of their right to offset those debts against this demand for the proceeds of the cargoes. They cited 2 Vern. 129; 2 W. Bl. 1269; 6 Term R. 258. On the other side it was insisted, that the contract was that which was reduced to writing; and circumstances were relied upon to discredit Anthony. That, at any rate, there was no evidence against the defendants of a waiver of their right to set off. That the fund provided in England, for the security of the defendants, having failed, they were not bound by their promise to Anthony & Pleasants, however strong it might be against them. Cases cited, 1 Term R. 285; 1 East, 98, 375; Cowp. 135; 3 East, 325.

The plaintiffs' counsel, when near concluding, started this point; that the defendants, not having paid the protested bill, on which they were endorsers, and which formed the mass of their claim, now attempted to be offset, until after the commission of bankruptcy, could not, under the bankrupt law, be entitled to set off those payments. He laid down the following propositions: 1st. That nothing but a subsisting debt, or a balance on a general account, or a liability to pay at all events, at the time of the bankruptcy, could be set off. 2d. That a debt depending upon a contingency, which does not happen until after the bankruptcy, cannot be set off. 3d. That no debt can be set off, which might not be proved under the commission. The conclusion from the premises is, that an endorser, who has not paid the bill before the bankruptcy, is only liable upon a contingency. He could not, in such case, prove under the commission, and consequently cannot set off. He cited Coke, Bank. Law, 565, 198, 201, 202; 1 Atk. 119; 8 Term R. 199; 3 Term R. 437; 4 Term R. 714.

THE COURT informed Mr. Dallas, the concluding counsel, that this was quite a new point, which the counsel who had opened, and argued on the part of the plaintiff, had never started; that this was an irregularity. But the point being important, the counsel for the defendant would be at liberty to discuss it.

Rawle and Lewis, for defendant, insisted that the credit having been given prior to the bankruptcy, it came within the 42d section of the bankrupt law [of 1800 (2 Stat. 33)], respecting offsets, and they cited Coke, Bank. Law, 579; Cowp. 251; 4 Term R. 211; 2 East, 227; 7 Term R. 378; Coke, Bank. Law, 572.

Upon the last point, WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court. The proposition that no debt can be set off, which cannot be proved under the commission, if true, would settle this point. But it is not. The two questions depend on different sections of the law, very differently expressed. The cases cited to show what debts cannot be proved under the commission, go upon the words of the statute; which declare, that the certificate shall protect the bankrupt against all debts due and owing at the time of the bankruptcy. Consequently, the endorser or acceptor of a bill, who has not paid before the bankruptcy, cannot say that it was due, and owing from the bankrupt, at that time. But the question of offset depends upon the construction of the words, "mutual credit," in the section where they are found. I was at first struck with the propriety of giving them a limited construction, extending them no further than to debts payable at a future day; so as to assimilate, as nearly as possible, the case of offsets to that of debts, proveable under the commission; but, after reflecting that, by thus narrowing the construction, a man who had given credit, by endorsements or otherwise, in confidence of the security he possessed, in retaining what he might owe to that amount, I should take from him a plank on which he had intended to save himself; I thought I should be more likely to fulfil the intention of the legislature, by extending it to all cases of credit, given before the bankruptcy, though not to be terminated at a particular day. In this case, the defendants, by endorsing the bills of Anthony & Pleasants, in order to give them credit, did most certainly give credit to Anthony & Pleasants; and, therefore, the words "mutual credit," are broad enough to comprehend this case, if their meaning is not narrowed by construction. This section of our law is copied almost verbatim from the British statute.

The argument urged by the plaintiff's counsel, that if the section in question be construed to extend to this case, the estate of the bankrupt might be twice charged, viz. by the defendant and by the holder, is without foundation; because, clearly, before the offset is allowed, the defendant must show the debt to be subsisting in him alone. This is the doctrine in common cases of offset, that the debt attempted to be set off, must be a good and subsisting one, at the time the action is brought. The bankrupt law permits such an offset on a credit given before the bankruptcy, which, without this section, would not have been allowed. I consider the case of Smith v. Hodson, 4 Term R. 211, as no ways distinguishable from the present; because, in this case, the bills having been protested before the bankruptcy, the defendants, as endorsers, were as much the principal debtors, as the acceptor in the case cited; and in both, the bills were, at the time of the bankruptcy, in the hands of third persons. We are, therefore, of opinion, that the defendants are not deprived of the right of set-off, on account of their not having taken up the bills before the bankruptcy of Anthony & Pleasants.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (after stating the facts, charged the jury). It is perfectly immaterial to this cause, whether the agreement of the 1st of April be such as the defendants contend it was, or such as is proved by Anthony; for except as to the time, at which Anthony & Pleasants were to be at liberty to draw, which is quite unimportant to the question in this cause, the two contracts are substantially the same; the declaration, which Anthony says was made by the defendants, that they would not appropriate the cargoes to be sent to them towards the European bills, was only expressing what necessarily resulted from the written promise, to appropriate them to another purpose, viz. to the taking up the bills which Anthony & Pleasants should draw on the defendants, to the amount of those cargoes. What, then, by this contract, were the defendants bound to do? To accept Anthony & Pleasants' bills, drawn upon them, either when the bills of lading for the tobacco were sent on, or on the arrival of the cargoes. But instead of this, those bills were protested. What then? The holders might possibly have sued the defendants, as acceptors, in consequence of their previous engagement to accept. But they protested the bills and returned them. Suppose Anthony & Pleasants had sued the defendants for a breach of their contract, in protesting their bills, having funds with which to take them up. They might have recovered damages, unless the defence now set up to justify their conduct, would have protected them. And most certainly, if the insufficiency of the funds assigned to the defendants, in Waring's hands, be made out, it would be a sufficient defence. Because that assignment was the consideration for the promise of the defendants; and if that failed, though without the default of Anthony & Pleasants, yet the defendants were thereby released from their promise. For what could have induced the defendants to agree to relinquish their lien, on future cargoes coming into their hands; but a belief that the indemnity they had received, against their prior engagements, was sufficient? This, I have no doubt, was the belief of all the parties at the time, but they were unfortunately mistaken. This, then, would have been the fate of such an action, as the one I have mentioned. But this is indebitatus assumpsit, for the value of the cargoes sold by the defendants. In answer to this, the defendants say, the bankrupts owe us more than you demand. Whatever construction may be given to the contract, it will not be pretended that the defendants, by agreeing not to appropriate the proceeds of the tobacco to the English bills, gave up their right to claim from Anthony & Pleasants, whatever sums of money they might be compelled to pay, on account of those bills. Now suppose Anthony & Pleasants were plaintiffs in this cause, and were defendants in a cross action to recover the amount of those protested bills, and judgments should be rendered on both actions. If the defendants' judgment exceeded that of Anthony & Pleasants, would not a court of chancery enjoin Anthony & Pleasants from proceeding on their judgment; particularly if it were stated that they would not, after receiving the defendants' money, be able to satisfy their judgment? Surely they would; and if so, the whole of the cause has dwindled down into a mere question of form; viz. whether the defendants shall be paid a demand, to which they are clearly entitled, in the way of a set-off, or a cross action, or an application to a court of chancery.

The plaintiffs' counsel have clearly been misled by applying the doctrine of lien to this case. When the defendants, by their agreement of the 1st of April, waived their lien on the tobacco, in consideration of a security for their engagements, on account of the English bills; they had another security, which they never waived, and that was, the personal responsibility of Anthony & Pleasants. Had Anthony & Pleasants, or the plaintiffs, brought trover and conversion for the tobacco, that being yet unsold; they might then have argued against the defendants' claim of lien, that it was waived. But the lien was gone by the sale, and the whole becomes now a question of personal responsibility, that is, to offset a debt admitted to be personally due, from Anthony & Pleasants, to the defendant, which debt never was given up, nor the right to set off expressly or impliedly waived.

The jury were out two or three days, and, on being called, the plaintiff suffered a nonsuit.

NOTE. During the trial, it was ruled, that what either of the bankrupts had acknowledged before bankruptcy, might be given in evidence against their assignees. An acknowledgment by the bankrupt, that he was indebted to the petitioning creditor, if made before suing out the commission, is good evidence to support it. 2 Esp. 592; N. P. Cas. 168. A man cannot be a witness to prove an act of bankruptcy, committed by himself; but his confession to a third person at the time, that he went out of the way to prevent an arrest, or to such like facts as are acts of bankruptcy, is admissible. 5 Term R. 512. Neither can a bankrupt be a witness, to prove the petitioning creditor's debt, or any other fact to support the commission; though he has a certificate. 2 H. Bl. 279. After his certificate is allowed, he may be a witness to any thing relating to the bankruptcy, except only to the act of bankruptcy (Id., note), though he releases (2 Strange, 829). The bankrupt is an admissible witness to explain a doubtful act, which may or may not be an act of bankruptcy; as whether an arrest, relied on as a concerted and fraudulent one, was so or not. 1 Esp. 287.

[9 Chi. Leg. News, 108.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Missouri. 1876.

BANKRUPTCY—USURY — SUIT TO RECOVER BY ASSIGNEE—AMOUNT RECOVERABLE.

[1. An assignee in bankruptcy is the "legal representative" of a bankrupt within the meaning of the term in section 5198, Rev. St., empowering a person or his legal representative to recover by action usurious interest paid to national banks.]

[2. Where usurious interest has been actually paid, double the amount thereof may be recovered from a national bank under the provisions of section 5198, Rev. St.]

Usury.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge.

KREKEL, District Judge. This suit is brought by the assignees of the King Wrought Iron Bridge Company, of Iola, Kansas, against the First National Bank, of Kansas City, Missouri, to recover under the statute of the United States usurious interest alleged to have been charged and paid. The national bank act, after providing that national banks may charge the highest rate of interest allowed by the state where the bank is located, enacts in section 5198, Rev. St., as follows:

"The taking, receiving, reserving, or charging a rate of interest greater than is allowed by the preceding section, when knowingly done, shall be deemed a forfeiture of the entire interest, which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt, carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon. In case the greater rate of interest has been paid, the person by whom it has been paid, or his legal representative, may recover back, in an action in the nature of an action of debt, twice the amount of the interest thus paid, from the association taking or receiving the same; provided such action is commenced within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred."

The assignees seek to recover, under this section of the act, double the amount of interest paid. The answer is a simple denial of the allegations of the petition. The evidence tends to show that during the years of 1872 and 1873, the bankrupt company from time to time obtained loans from the First National Bank of Kansas City, for which a rate of interest of not less than 18 per cent. was paid. The charging and payment of this interest is undisputed, but it is denied that the right to recover the usurious interest passed to the assignees. This, and the question as to the amount of recovery, were both decided in the case of Crocker v. National Bank of Chetopa [Case No. 3,397], district of Kansas, by Judge Dillon. The statute under which the suit is brought, provides, as we have seen, that "in case the greater rate of interest has been paid, the person by whom it has been paid, or his legal representatives, may recover back in an action in the nature of an action of debt, twice the amount of the interest thus paid." Who is the legal representative of a bankrupt? This question was fully considered in the case cited.

The 14th section of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 522)] provides for an assignment of the estate of the bankrupt to the assignee, and declares that upon such assignment by operation of law, all the property and estate of the bankrupt, including all choses in action, shall pass to the assignee. By section 16 it is provided "that the assignee shall have the like remedy to recover all said estate debts and effects in his own name, as the debtor might have had, if the decree in bankruptcy had not been rendered, and no assignment had been made." These provisions, as well as the general tenor of the bankrupt law, indicated that all right to sue for, and recover property, effects or choses in action of the bankrupt, by virtue of the bankruptcy assignment and the operation of the bankrupt law, pass to the assignee, who becomes the legal representative, one who stands in place of, the bankrupt. The effect of a differing holding strengthens the view here taken. Suppose it should be determined, as the defendant insists, that the right to sue under the statute for the recovery of usurious interest, is a personal right, and remains in the bankrupt, notwithstanding the bankruptcy. The bankrupt might sue and recover for his own use and benefit the usurious interest paid. which may have caused his bankruptcy, having by means of paying usurious interest so converted his estate that creditors could not, but he himself could recover and hold it against them. A construction working such results is not favored, to say the least. But the idea of a personal right, as contended for by defendant, loses sight of the distinction between what pertains to the person, and what to the estate. Usury affects the property and estate, and not the person of the bankrupt. The question of usury has lately been before the federal court, in the case of Tiffany v. National Bank of Missouri, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 409. The question was as to the amount of interest a national bank was authorized to charge in Missouri. That a trustee had a right to sue was never questioned. In the case of Darby v. Boatmen's Sav. Inst. [Case No. 3,571], the question as to a trustee recovering usurious interest, was determined affirmatively. These cases could not have been sustained by the trustees if the sueing for and recovering usurious interest was a personal action.

As to the amount of recovery the defendant makes the points that, if a recovery can be had, it is the amount paid over and above the legal rate (10 per per cent.) in Missouri, and relies on the wording of the statute to sustain this construction. Section 5198, already fully quoted, in the first place, declares forfeited the entire interest agreed to be paid, and next provides for a recovery of double the amount of such as has been paid. Reading the first part of the section "the taking, receiving, reserving, or charging a rate of interest greater then is allowed," in connection with the part providing for the recovery of "twice the amount thus" paid, gives countenance to the construction sought to be placed upon it by defendant. Reading the whole of the section together is adverse to this construction.

The forfeiture of the entire unpaid interest is no doubt intended to defeat the recovery of unpaid interest, and may be set up in defence. The recovery of paid interest, however, requires a suit on part of the debtor, or his legal representative, and the recovery of double the amount paid may recompense him for his trouble. To construe the act as contended for by the defendant would favor the usurer who had obtained payment of his usury by allowing him to retain the legal interest, while he who had only contracted for illegal interest forfeits the entire interest, a favor difficult to account for. The plaintiff is entitled to recover double the amount of the usurious interest paid, and judgment will be rendered accordingly.

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. Feb. 6, 1871.

BANKRUPTCY—JURISDICTION OF STATE AND FEDERAL COURTS.

1. A debtor residing in Kansas was adjudged a bankrupt on the petition of creditors, by the United States district court for Kansas, and assignees appointed. After the bankruptcy proceedings were instituted, a mortgage creditor commenced suit to foreclose in one of the state courts of Indiana without permission of the bankrupt court, making the assignees defendants. The mortgagee was a resident and a citizen of Minnesota. The assignees in bankruptcy filed a bill in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Minnesota against the mortgagee, charging that the mortgage was fraudulent both in fact and under the bankrupt law, and asking a decree to have it declared void, and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from further prosecuting his foreclosure suit in Indiana. Held, 1. That the district court in which the bankruptcy proceedings are pending, or the circuit court for that district, can, in cases where the suit in the state court is commenced after the proceedings in bankruptcy are instituted, enjoin the plaintiff therein from further prosecuting the same. Held, 2. That in this case the circuit court for the Minnesota district had no bankruptcy jurisdiction, and could exercise only its ordinary equity powers, and for this reason the injunction asked for was refused.

2. Whether in such a case the assignee may not, by an application to the bankrupt court, be authorized to sell the mortgaged property free of incumbrance, substitute the proceeds in the place of the property, giving the mortgagee notice wherever residing, and whether process in bankruptcy can, when necessary to exercise powers conferred by the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], be rightfully served on parties interested outside of the district in which the bankruptcy proceedings are pending, are questions discussed, but left open.

This is a bill in equity filed in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Minnesota, praying for an injunction, and relief. The plaintiffs [Herman Markson and Hugh M. Spaulding] are assignees in bankruptcy of one Antipas Thomas, and bring this bill in that capacity, alleging themselves to be citizens of the state of Kansas. The defendant [Daniel Heaney] is alleged to be a citizen of Minnesota, which is admitted in the answer to be true, and he was served in that state with process issued upon the bill. From the bill, answer, and exhibits, the following facts appear: On the 16th day of December, 1869, Antipas Thomas was, by the district court of the United States for the district of Kansas (of which he was a resident), adjudged a bankrupt, upon the petition of creditors filed on the 3d day of that month. In May, 1870, the plaintiffs were duly appointed assignees in bankruptcy of Thomas, and a deed of assignment has been made to them of all the property and estate of the bankrupt, save such as the law exempts. The bill alleges, and the answer admits that, prior to the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings against Thomas, to wit: on the 25th day of October, 1869, he, the said Thomas, executed a promissory note to the defendant, Daniel Heaney, for the sum of $26,500, and at the same time executed to secure it a mortgage upon lands belonging to him and situate in Kosciusko county, Indiana. The bill charges that this mortgage is fraudulent, 1. Because there was only a real debt due from Thomas to Heaney of $4,000, and because it was made to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors. 2. Because it was made in violation of the bankrupt act, since Thomas was insolvent, and Heaney, when he received the mortgage, knew, or had reasonable cause to believe, that Thomas was insolvent, and that the mortgage was made in fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt act. It may here be observed that the answer of the defendant in effect denies these charges of fraud. The bill avers, and the answer admits, that after the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, and after the date of the plaintiffs' appointment as assignees, to-wit: On the 14th day of September, 1870, the defendant, Heaney, commenced in the circuit court of the state of Indiana for the county of Kosciusko (where the mortgaged lands are situate) a bill to foreclose the above mentioned mortgage, making as defendants thereto, not only the said Thomas, but the present plaintiffs (the assignees in bankruptcy of his estate.) The bill alleges that on the 19th day of November, 1870, the plaintiffs filed a bill in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Indiana, against the defendant, setting up in substance, the same facts as in the present bill, and praying the same relief, and an injunction against further steps by the defendant in his foreclosure proceeding in the state court, but the defendant not being a citizen of, or found in, the district of Indiana could not be served, and the bill was consequently dismissed. It appears from the pleadings that in the foreclosure suit in Indiana, the present plaintiffs (being made defendants thereto), were notified of its pendency by publication, pursuant to the law and the practice of the state courts; and that at the next term, to-wit, on the 29th day of November, 1870, the assignees appeared in the said state court and setting up the said adjudication of the mortgagor as a bankrupt, and their appointment as his assignees by the United States district court for Kansas, pleaded to the jurisdiction of the state court, which plea was decided to be insufficient, and exceptions taken. Afterwards, on the 1st day of December, 1870, the plaintiffs filed an answer setting up against the mortgage, in effect, the same matters pleaded in the present bill, to-wit, that it is both fraudulent in fact, and under the bankrupt law. Afterwards, on the application of the present plaintiffs, a change of venue was ordered to the circuit court of the state for the county of Steuben, in which court the cause is now pending, and stands for trial at an early day. The bill prays that on the final hearing the mortgage may be declared void, and meanwhile that a writ of injunction issue to restrain the defendant from proceeding further in prosecution of his foreclosure suit in the state court in Indiana, or from taking or obtaining judgment against the said Thomas on the note, and for general relief. The bill was presented to the circuit judge at his chambers, January 7, 1871, for the allowance of the temporary injunction therein prayed for, and he directed notice to be given to the defendant, which has been done. The defendant appeared and filed an answer to the bill denying the fraud alleged, and produced, on the hearing of the motion for an injunction, certain affidavits showing the value of the mortgaged estate to be about $41,000, or about $10,000 or $12,000 more than the sum named in the mortgage, and tending to show that he did not have cause to believe when he received the mortgage that Thomas was insolvent. The plaintiffs produced affidavits and documentary evidence showing that Thomas and one Edwards were bankers in Kansas; that the firm suspended payment in a few days after the mortgage in question was executed; that they were insolvent, and the property mortgaged constitutes a large portion of the available assets of the bankrupt, and also tending to show notice or the insolvency, etc., on the part of the defendant when he received the mortgage.

Z. E. Britton and Morris Lamprey, for the motion.

Jas. T. Lane and Davison & True, contra.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The adjudication of bankruptcy was made by the United States district court for the district of Kansas, where the bankrupt resided. The property mortgaged to the defendant is situate in Indiana; and the defendant himself is a citizen of and resides in Minnesota. He has never proved, or offered to prove, his debt in bankruptcy; but after the proceedings in bankruptcy were instituted, and the assignees appointed, and while those proceedings were pending in the bankruptcy court in Kansas, the defendant commenced and is prosecuting in one of the state courts of Indiana a bill to foreclose his mortgage, making the assignees defendants thereto, and constructively serving them by notice of publication, pursuant to the laws of the state, and practice of the state tribunals. The present bill is filed by the assignees, not in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas, but in the circuit court for the district of Minnesota, and the suit was thus commenced because service of process could not be had upon the defendant in the former district. A similar suit was brought by the assignees in the United States circuit court for Indiana; but because the defendant could not be there served it was withdrawn.

The bill charges that the mortgage made by the bankrupt to the defendant, a few days before the former suspended payment, and which the latter is seeking to have foreclosed in the state court in Indiana, is both fraudulent in fact and under the bankrupt act; and it seeks a decree to have it so adjudged, and meanwhile asks for a writ of injunction to restrain the defendant from the further prosecution of the foreclosure suit. The case is now before me on the application for the injunction. In support of the application, it is argued by the counsel for the assignees that the bankruptcy court in Kansas, in which the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced and are pending, has exclusive jurisdiction over the estate of the bankrupt wherever situate, and over the claims of creditors, secured and unsecured, wherever residing; that the assignees are officers of the bankruptcy court; that since the adjudication in bankruptcy was had before the defendant commenced his suit to foreclose, it follows that the bankrupt court first acquired jurisdiction, and if so, it could not be interfered with by proceedings in any other court, and if such proceedings be commenced, the federal courts not only have the power, but it is their duty to enjoin litigants in the state courts, whenever necessary, to give full effect to the bankrupt act.

On the other hand, the defendant's counsel argue that a mortgage creditor is not bound to, nor can he be compelled to prove up his claim in the bankrupt court; that the only effect of not proving it up is that he waives or loses all right to share in dividends in respect to any balance of his debt which the mortgaged estate may prove insufficient to pay; that such a creditor, notwithstanding the mortgagor shall have been adjudged a bankrupt, may rightfully file his bill in any state court, having jurisdiction, to foreclose his mortgage; that the defendant did so file his bill in this instance, and that the assignees, having appeared thereto and answered, setting up as a defence the same matters which are made the basis of the present bill, the result is that the state court in Indiana first acquired jurisdiction of the matter in controversy, to-wit, the validity of the mortgage; and if so, then on acknowledged principles of law, no other court can arrest or interfere with the exercise of such jurisdiction.

Section 1 of the bankrupt act constitutes the district courts of the United States courts of bankruptcy, and confers and defines their jurisdiction: "That the several district courts of the United States be, and they are hereby, constituted courts of bankruptcy, and they shall have original jurisdiction in their respective districts, in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy; and they are hereby authorized to hear and adjudicate upon the same, according to the provisions of this act. * * * And the jurisdiction hereby conferred shall extend to all cases and controversies arising between the bankrupt and any creditor or creditors who shall claim any debt or demand under the bankruptcy; to the collection of the assets of the bankrupt; to the ascertainment and liquidation of the liens and other specific claims thereon; to the adjustment of the various priorities and conflicting interests of all parties; and to the marshaling and disposition of the different funds and assets so as to secure the rights of all parties and due distribution of the assets among all the creditors; and to all acts, matters, and things to be done under and in virtue of the bankruptcy, until the final distribution and settlement of the estate of the bankrupt, and the close of the proceedings in bankruptcy," etc.

The language of this section is taken in part from the sixth section of the bankrupt act of 1841, and the part above, placed in italics, from Judge Story's opinion in Ex parte Christy, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 221, expounding the policy and purpose of that act. I shall again refer to this opinion, after calling attention to the provisions contained in the second section of the bankrupt act of 1867, respecting the jurisdiction and powers of the circuit courts of the United States.

This section, after giving "the several circuit courts of the United States within and for the districts where the proceedings in bankruptcy shall be pending, a general superintendence and jurisdiction," revisory of all cases and questions in the district court arising under the act, adds that, "said circuit courts shall also have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the same district of all suits at law or in equity which may or shall be brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by such person against the assignee, touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt transferrable to, or vested in, such assignee."

It is not my purpose to recite in detail the various provisions of the bankrupt act; but a review of them would clearly show, as I think, that congress in passing the act, in pursuance of its constitutional power, not only intended to make it uniform, but operative throughout the United States. It does not stop at state lines, and the bankruptcy tribunal it establishes not only acts independently of state tribunals, but it would be destructive of the system itself to permit suitors by resorting to state tribunals to withdraw, against the will of the bankruptcy court, property or cases which belong to its jurisdiction.

Property, wherever situate, which is not exempted from the operation of the act, passes to the assignee, who is an officer of the bankrupt court, and thus is in the custody or under the control of that court. This is equally true of property under mortgage as of that which is unincumbered. See sections 14, 20, 22, 25. Debts, whenever payable, and creditors wherever residing in the United States, are within the operation of the act. The bankrupt court is invested with this jurisdiction over the bankrupt and his estate, and over creditors who are brought involuntarily into it, in order to administer the estate for the benefit of all the creditors according to their respective rights. The priorities of bona fide mortgagees and lien holders are protected by the bankrupt act, and will be respected by the bankrupt court in the final settlement and distribution of the estate. "By operation of law, the deed to the assignee conveys to him all the estate, real and personal of the bankrupt" (section 14), and "the assignee has authority, under the order and direction of the court, to redeem or discharge any mortgage, * * * real or personal, whenever payable, or to sell the property subject to such mortgage" (section 14). And see sections 15, 20, 22, 25.

Thus, it is plain beyond controversy, that the property of the bankrupt, though situate, as in this case, in another state, and although mortgaged by the bankrupt prior to the institution of proceedings in bankruptcy against him, is within the jurisdiction and under the control of the bankrupt court in Kansas. I think that to be an erroneous construction of the bankrupt act, which holds under the somewhat inapt phraseology of section 20, that mortgage creditors have absolutely the election to stand outside of the operation of the bankrupt act. Their debts are required to be scheduled, and the mortgaged estate to be inventoried by the bankrupt (section 11); the title thereto passes to the assignee, subject to the mortgage, and the assignee may sell, sue for, and manage the property (section 14); the debt of the mortgagee is provable, and such proof does not waive the lien (sections 19, 20, 22); the assignee may redeem the mortgage debt, or sell the equity of redemption vested in him (Id.); and it follows from these various provisions that the assignee has a right to call the mortgage creditor into the bankruptcy court, or into the proper circuit court, and test the validity of his mortgage or the amount due thereon. Ex parte Christy, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 221, and cases cited, infra.

It is not necessary in this case to say that the mortgage creditor is bound at all events to go into the bankrupt court and prove his debt, or ask to foreclose, or to have the property sold and his debt paid from the proceeds. See In re Davis [Case No. 3,618]; Foster v. Ames [Id. 4,965].

It is clear that the assignee has at all events the right to bring the mortgage creditor into the court of bankruptcy (unless he prefers to file a bill in equity in the proper circuit court), and contest the amount of his debt and the validity of his mortgage, and to have the court make such equitable orders as to the disposition of the property as seem best.

The powers to "ascertain and liquidate liens" on the property of the bankrupt, "to adjust the various priorities and conflicting interests of all parties, and to marshal and dispose of the different funds and assets," and the other express powers of disposition and sale of property, confer upon the bankrupt court the right of control over mortgaged estates and the mortgagees, and by implication give the right to prevent its control from being taken away by the resort on the part of the creditor to other tribunals against the will of the bankrupt court.

This view of the law is sustained by the opinion of Mr. Justice Nelson, in the case of the Kerosene Oil Co. [Cases Nos. 7,725 and 7,726]. In that case the oil company were adjudged bankrupts on the 16th day of June, 1868. The New York Guaranty and Indemnity Company held a mortgage on the realty of the oil company, and on the 10th day of October, 1868 (after the adjudication in bankruptcy), commenced a foreclosure suit in the state court. A bill was filed by the assignee in the bankruptcy court alleging the invalidity of the mortgage, and praying that it be declared void, the property sold, and the proceeds brought into court and disposed of, according to the rights of the several parties, and for an injunction enjoining the Guaranty and Indemnity Company from taking any further proceedings in the foreclosure suit. The injunction was granted by the district court, and on review this action was sustained by Mr. Justice Nelson, who directly affirmed the jurisdiction of the district court to entertain such a bill and grant such relief, and asserted a concurrent jurisdiction in the circuit court of the same district.

The right in a proper case to enjoin proceedings in state courts which contravene the bankrupt act, is declared by the circuit court of the United States, in the case of Irving v. Hughes [Case No. 7,076], heard before Grier and Cadwallader, JJ. The court says: "The state court cannot be enjoined, but the litigants in it may be restrained from doing what would frustrate, or directly impede, the jurisdiction expressly conferred by the bankrupt act." And it is the opinion of Chase, C. J., that after the bankruptcy, liens must be enforced under the superintendence of the national tribunals. In re Wynne [Id. 18,117]. A similar view of the bankrupt act of 1841 [5 Stat. 440] was taken by Mr. Justice Story, in Ex parte Christy, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 221. "Its success was dependent upon the national machinery being made adequate to all the exigencies of the act. Prompt and ready action without heavy charges and expenses, could be safely relied on where the jurisdiction was confided to a single court in the collection of assets, in the ascertainment and liquidation of liens, and other specific claims thereon; in adjusting the various priorities and conflicting interests; in marshaling the different funds and assets; in directing sales at such time and in such manner as should best subserve the interests of all concerned; in preventing, by injunction, or otherwise, any particular creditor from obtaining an unjust and inequitable preference over the general creditors by an improper use of his rights and remedies in the state tribunals, and finally in making a due distribution of the assets, and bringing to a close within a reasonable time, the whole proceedings in bankruptcy."

This language was quoted and approved by Justice Swayne, as applicable to the present bankrupt act (Bill v. Beckwith [Case No. 1,406]), and by Durell, J. (In re Barrow [Id. 1,057]). If the present bill had been filed in the circuit court for the district of Kansas, and service could have been had on the defendant in that district, I should for the reasons above stated, feel quite clear that I would have the power to award the writ of injunction against the defendant, and that under the circumstances it would be my duty to do so. But this bill is filed in the circuit court for the Minnesota district, and was so filed because the defendant resided in that district, and could be served with process therein, and it proceeds upon the assumption that the federal courts in Kansas by reason of the inability to serve the defendant therein, would be unable to take jurisdiction of the suit, had it been there instituted.

I am inclined to the opinion that the circuit court for the Minnesota district has no jurisdiction over this controversy conferred upon it by the bankrupt act; and that whatever powers it has and can exercise in the present case will be in virtue of its ordinary equity jurisdiction.

By recurring to the first section of the bankrupt act, it will be seen that the "several district courts are constituted courts of bankruptcy with original jurisdiction in their respective districts in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy." The powers which this section confers upon district courts are limited to cases of bankruptcy pending therein, as was very properly held by Mr. District Judge Blatchford in Re Richardson [Case No. 11,774]. In that case the petitioners had been adjudged bankrupts in Louisiana, and applied to the United States district court for the Southern district of New York for an injunction to restrain certain creditors from prosecuting a suit against them in the state courts of New York. It was denied for want of jurisdiction, the judge alluding to, but expressing no opinion upon, the question, whether the circuit court for the New York district, under its general equity powers, or the bankrupt court, or circuit court of Louisiana could, without further legislation, give relief. The provision of the bankrupt act as to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts is that, "the several circuit courts of the United States within and for the districts where the proceedings in bankruptcy shall be pending, shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the same district of all suits," etc. Under this provision the circuit court of Minnesota has no bankruptcy jurisdiction in the present case, since the bankruptcy proceedings are pending in the district of Kansas. It can only exercise its ordinary equity powers, and I think it cannot be claimed, aside from its jurisdiction in bankruptcy, that a court of the United States would be warranted in enjoining a foreclosure proceeding in the state court. A state court of equity in Minnesota would scarcely look with favor on an application, because the defendant resided there, to stay him from prosecuting a foreclosure suit in another state, but would leave the parties in the court which had, or was asserting, jurisdiction over them. If the bankrupt act confers no bankrupt powers with respect to the case on the circuit court for the district of Minnesota, it seems to me that it can only award an injunction on the same principle that would apply were the application made to a chancellor in the state tribunals. This point as to the jurisdiction of the Minnesota circuit court has not been prosecuted by counsel, and I therefore express only my first impressions concerning it.

Since I refuse for the present, the injunction on this ground alone, I will allow the counsel to be heard upon it if they think my impressions erroneous. In this view of the case, it is unnecessary to give any decided opinion respecting the question, whether on a similar bill filed in the circuit court for the district of Kansas, service can rightfully be made on the defendant without the limits of the district. Under the judiciary act which limits the powers of the federal courts to their respective districts, service within the district, or a voluntary appearance, is necessary to jurisdiction. If this limitation obtains in all suits and proceedings arising under the bankrupt act, it certainly will fail in many instances without further legislation, to meet the exigencies of particular cases, or to enable the courts to carry into effect the provisions of the statute. The power to bring creditors outside of the district within the operation of the bankruptcy court is often necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction and powers conferred by the act; but at present, I refrain from giving any opinion upon the right to serve bankruptcy process, or process in bankruptcy suits, beyond the limits of the district in which the bankruptcy proceeding is pending.

The question may be presented on an application by the assignees to the bankrupt court, to sell the mortgaged estate free of incumbrance, substituting the proceeds in the place of the property sold. See Bankrupt Act, § 25; Foster v. Ames [Case No. 4,965]; Bill v. Beckwith [supra]; In re Barrow [supra]. If this section applies to such a case as the present, the provision is that, "The court may, upon the petition of the assignee after such notice to the claimant, his agent, or attorney, as the court shall deem reasonable, order the property to be sold under the direction of the assignee, who shall hold the funds received in the place of the estate disposed of;" not, in terms, at least, limiting the notice to claimants residing in this district. Or the question may be presented by a bill like the present, filed in the circuit court for the district of Kansas, to impeach the mortgage, and asking for an injunction against further proceeding by the defendant in his foreclosure suit in Indiana. But until it arises in such a shape as to require disposition, and has been fully argued, it will be better to decline its examination or discussion. The injunction is refused, but the bill may be retained for final disposition, or dismissed, as the plaintiff's counsel may be advised. Injunction denied.

NOTE. After the foregoing opinion was delivered, the foreclosure suit proceeded in the state court of Indiana, and that court rendered a decree in favor of Heaney for the full amount of his mortgage, from which the assignees took an appeal to the supreme court of the state, which is yet pending,—the assignees throughout resisting and objecting to the foreclosure proceedings in the state court, on the ground of the alleged exclusive jurisdiction of the bankrupt court. After the foreclosure decree was entered, the assignees filed their petition in the district court of the United States for the district of Kansas, under the 25th section of the bankrupt act, stating, in substance, the existence of the Heaney mortgage, that it was fraudulent both in fact and under the bankrupt act; that Heaney resided in Minnesota, and asking an order to sell the real estate free of the mortgage, and have the proceeds substituted in the place thereof. Notice of this application was served upon Heaney by the marshal of Minnesota in that state, and he appeared in the bankrupt court in Kansas, and filed an answer denying the fraud alleged against him, and pleaded the proceedings and decree in Indiana to estop the assignees to re-litigate the question of fraud, that question having been, as he claimed, settled and adjudicated in state court. After hearing both parties the United States district court, on July 12, 1871, entered an order authorizing the assignees to sell the real estate in Indiana free from all liens, including the mortgage of Heaney, at public sale, after notice, and ordering them to bring the proceeds into court to be held in the place of the land, and subject to the further order of the court as to the distribution thereof, all rights of the said Heaney to the proceeds of such sale or any part thereof, being reserved for further hearing. To this order Heaney objected; and the assignees having subsequently thereunder advertised the land for sale, to take place on the 3d day of September, 1871, Heaney filed his petition in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas, under the second section of the bankrupt act, to review the aforementioned order of the district court, authorizing the assignees to sell the land. This petition was presented to the circuit judge in vacation; notice thereof was given to the assignees; the parties appeared before the circuit judge at chambers, August 28, 1871, and after argument it was there held: 1. That the order complained of was one which the circuit court could review or revise under the second section of the bankrupt act. 2. That the circuit judge had power in vacation, at his chambers, though outside of the district of Kansas, to entertain and act upon the petition of review. 3. That under the circumstances, the order of the district court would be modified as follows: The sale of the land by the assignees shall be postponed until the 30th day of October, 1871, but may then take place pursuant to the order of the district court, unless Heaney shall, before September 25, file his claim in that court or exhibit his bill therein or in this court, or institute proper proceedings in the one court or the other, to have settled between him and the assignees the question of the validity of his mortgage and the amount due thereon; this being done no sale shall take place during the pendency of such proceedings, either by the assignees, under the order of the district court, or by Heaney, under his decree.

The circuit judge reiterated the views expressed in the foregoing opinion as to the power and rightful jurisdiction of the federal courts to superintend the enforcement of all claims against the bankrupt after the adjudication of bankruptcy; but expressed no opinion as to the effect of the assignees entering an appearance in the state court, nor upon the question whether the decree therein concluded them from attacking the mortgage for fraud.

Circuit Court, D. Kansas. Nov. Term, 1871.

BANKRUPT ACT—SUSPENSION OF PAYMENT BY A BANK—ILLEGAL PREFERENCE.

A banker who allows his drafts to go to protest, suspends payment and closes his doors against depositors, proclaims to the world that he is insolvent, and a creditor who, with knowledge of these facts, receives payment of his debt secures an illegal preference, and is liable to the assignee for the amount thus received.

The plaintiff [Herman Markson], as assignee in bankruptcy of A. Thomas & Co. recovered at this term against the defendants, in six actions, verdicts for the sums severally received by them as creditors of A. Thomas & Co. A motion was made by the defendants for a new trial.

Messrs. Wheat, Britton, Royce, and Hoag, for assignee.

Messrs. Wagstaff, Simpson, Williams, and Pratt, for defendants.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and DELAHAY, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. These are actions by the assignee under section 35, of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 534)], to recover from the defendants moneys severally received by them on the 16th day of November, 1869, in payment for debts due them from the late firm of A. Thomas & Co. The firm of A. Thomas & Co. were private bankers, doing business at Paola, in this state. About the 1st day of November, 1869, a "run" was made upon their bank, and on the 2d day of November they were obliged to close their doors, which were not afterwards opened. In the month of December following, proceedings in bankruptcy were instituted against them. The defendants, all of whom resided in Paola, were creditors of

Thomas & Co. some of them holding protested drafts, and others being depositors. All of the defendants as witnesses admitted on the stand that they knew of the suspension of Thomas & Co. and the closing of their doors at and prior to the time they received payment. The immediate circumstances surrounding the receipt of payment by the defendants are these: After the doors of the bank were closed, Thomas & Co. who held considerable real estate, gave out that they would be able to resume in a few days, and that to this end they were negotiating for, and were about to secure, by mortgaging their real estate, a large sum of money. On the 16th day of November the negotiations for a loan to them of $20,000 were closed, the business being done in the office of Mr. Simpson, an attorney. This loan was secured by mortgage on a business block in Paola, then not quite finished. Of the above sum, about $3,000 were deposited in the hands of a trustee to provide for the completion of the building, and $7,700 deposited on the same day by or for Thomas & Co. not in their own bank, but in the Miami Savings Bank, in the same place. What was done with the rest of the money borrowed by Thomas & Co. does not clearly appear, but they never resumed business, nor did they attempt to do so. As stated, the borrowing was completed on the 16th day of November, in Mr. Simpson's office, late in the day, and the money deposited in the savings bank. Most of the defendants had been pressing Thomas & Co. for payment. When the transaction for the loan was consummated, Thomas & Co. being present, it was agreed that the $7,700 should be deposited in the savings bank, and the checks were then and there drawn by Thomas & Co. on the savings bank in favor of various creditors, including the defendants, for the amount of the $7,700. To recover payment received on these checks, the present actions were brought by the assignee. One of the checks so drawn was made payable to Mr. Simpson, the attorney in whose office the papers relating to the loan were executed, and was for the sum of $3,450. This was done after dark, on the 16th of November, and out of the proceeds of this check Mr. Simpson, being authorized and directed to do so by Thomas & Co., paid the debts of three of the defendants. Checks for the residue of the $7,700 were delivered to the other defendants, and to one or two other creditors of Thomas & Co. on the next day, and the money received thereon. All the defendants knew when payment was received by them that Thomas & Co. had suspended, and that their bank was then closed, and the circumstances are such that those who received payment through Mr. Simpson not only knew this, but must have known that Thomas & Co. had no intention to resume business. The defendants constituted and were known to constitute but a small portion of the creditors. Mr. Simpson was authorized to act for two of the defendants in thus receiving payment for them, and he assumed to act as the friend and attorney for the other, although without any express and specific authority in this instance, but his act was ratified and the money received. Of course the defendants thus receiving payment through Mr. Simpson are affected with knowledge of the facts known to him respecting the manner in which the money was obtained and disposed of by Thomas & Co.

A bank suspending payment and closing its doors against its creditors makes to the world a proclamation of its insolvency. The bank was thus suspended and closed when each of the defendants received payment on the checks drawn on the savings bank, and this fact was personally known to each of the defendants. The payments were not received in the usual course, but in checks drawn by bankers whose doors were closed upon another bank in the same place. The jury have properly found that payments thus made and received are in violation of the bankrupt law, because intended to give, and, if sustained, would give, a preference. The evidence fully convinces us that Thomas & Co. did not intend to resume business, and that they selected the defendants and a few others from the mass of their creditors to favor or prefer them by paying them hastily and secretly, in full, out of the $20,000 loan, and that the defendants, in receiving their pay, must have known, and certainly had reasonable cause to believe, that they were thereby securing an advantage over the other creditors. If payments received under such circumstances could be held against the assignee, the bankrupt act ought to be repealed, since its practical operation and effect would be to give to resident and favored creditors the very preference which the act in so many of its provisions professes to invalidate. The act disarms the vigilance of creditors generally by declaring that no vigilance can be rewarded by a preference, if obtained contrary to its provisions within four months prior to filing of the petition in bankruptcy. It undertakes to disable creditors from procuring preferences within that period by attachment, mortgage, or confession of judgment. What preference can be more unjust than that which would result from this prohibition to creditors to run the race of vigilance, and then to sustain payments made by a known insolvent to local creditors from importunity or personal considerations?

The bankrupt act must be so administered as to suppress illegal preferences, or it necessarily operates as a fraud upon the rights of the mass of creditors, who in good faith refrain from seeking advantages contrary to its provisions and policy. If preferences cannot in general be effectually suppressed, because of the sympathy of jurors in favor of the creditor who has simply been vigilant, or fortunate, in securing a just debt, and their disinclination to render a verdict, which, while it makes such a creditor pay back the amount, also disentitles him to prove his debt in bankruptcy or receive dividends, the professional and the popular voice will soon demand the repeal of the law, so as to allow, as before its enactment, creditors to strive for and hold if fairly obtained, the fruits of their vigilance. I have found jurors in general somewhat disinclined to hold preferences to be such, and I find it necessary to prevent the bankrupt law from being evaded, to state with clearness to juries, as I did in these cases, the purpose of the law, and that no prejudice against it, or sympathy with defendants, should prevent them from fairly and impartially applying its principles and provisions. Their verdicts in the cases under consideration were not only supported by the evidence, but if they had been otherwise, I should have regarded it as my duty to have set them aside. The motion for a new trial is in each case denied. Judgment for the plaintiff.

FINES—VIOLATION OF CUSTOMS LAWS—TO WHOM PAYABLE.

"Fines" imposed for obstructing officers of the customs, as well as "penalties," under Act March 2, 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws, 573; 1 Stat. 627, c. 22], are to be received and distributed by the collector of the customs.

[Cited in Matthews v. Offley, Case No. 9,290; U. S. v. Tilden, Id. 16,523; U. S. v. Chapel, Id. 14,781; U. S. v. Fanjul, Id. 15,069.]

[Cited in Ransdell v. Patterson, 1 App. D. C. 491.]

At this term, N. Hobson, and others, were convicted on an indictment for forcibly resisting and impeding certain officers of the customs at Rowley, within the collection district of Newburyport, against the 71st section of the act of the 2d of March, 1799, c. 128 [c. 22]. The fines imposed by the court having been paid into the hands of the marshal, a motion was made in behalf of Mr. Marquand, collector of Newburyport, to have the same paid over to him for distribution, pursuant to the 91st section of the same act.

[1] [Reported by John Gallison, Esq.]

G. Blake, Dist Atty., stated, that he had been requested by the collector to make the motion; but should submit it to the court without argument. The practice had uniformly prevailed, in cases of fines under this act, to pay them directly into the treasury, and no instance has heretofore occurred, in which they had been claimed or received by a collector for distribution.

BY THE COURT. It is not a little extraordinary, that this question should have slept in silence during so long a period. The 91st section of the act of March 2, 1799, c. 128 [c. 22], provides, that all fines, penalties and forfeitures, recovered by virtue of that act, and not otherwise appropriated, shall, after deducting all proper costs and charges, be disposed of as follows, one moiety shall be for the use of the United States, and be paid into the treasury thereof by the collector receiving the same; the other moiety shall be divided between, and paid in equal proportions to, the collector and other officers of the customs specified in the act, with a proviso giving a moiety of such moiety to the informer, by whose information to the collector the same fines, penalties and forfeitures shall be recovered. The 89th section of the same act authorizes the collector to receive all penalties, recovered under the act, from the court or the proper officer thereof, and further enacts, that "on receipt thereof the said collector shall pay and distribute the same without delay according to law, and transmit quarter yearly to the treasury an account of all moneys, by him received for fines, penalties and forfeitures, during such quarter." The former act for the collection of duties Aug. 4, 1790, c. 35 [1 Story's Laws, 83; 1 Stat. 112, c. 8]), which was repealed by the act of 1799, contains similar provisions as to distribution of fines, penalties and forfeitures (section 69), and as to the receipt and distribution of penalties by the collector (section 67); but there is no clause respecting the transmission of quarterly accounts of moneys received for fines, penalties and forfeitures. As the 89th section of the act of 1799 is, with the exception of this clause, a substantial re-enactment of the 67th section of the act of 1790, it is highly probable, that a doubt had arisen, whether the right of the collector to receive and distribute "penalties," included that of receiving and distributing "fines," and that this clause, among other objects, was meant to obviate that doubt. This explanation, if correct, will in part account for the unsettled state of the present question.

On looking at the language of the act of 1799, it seems difficult to resist the impression, that "fines" in the technical sense of the word, as well as "penalties," are to be received and distributed by the collector. There are indeed but two cases, in which, technically speaking, fines are contemplated to be imposed by the act viz. in cases of obstructing officers of the customs (section 71) and of perjury (section 88). In all other pecuniary forfeitures within the act, the legislature seem to have directed, not the process of indictment, where a fine might be imposed, but an action or information of debt; for, at common law, wherever a penalty is given, and no appropriation or method of recovery is prescribed by the act, an action or information of debt lies, and not an indictment. Rex v. Malland, 2 Strange, 828; Adams v. Woods, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 336. There may be good reason for this distinction, for penalties and forfeitures may be remitted by the secretary of the treasury under the act of March 3, 1797, c. 67 [1 Story's Laws, 458; 1 Stat. 506, c. 13]; but, notwithstanding the language of that act, it is extremely doubtful if fines for offences, technically speaking, can be so remitted, since the constitution has committed to the president the power to grant reprieves and pardons for offences, against the United States. U. S. v. Mann [Case No. 15,718]. It is singular, that bribery of officers of the customs should, by the act of 1799, be punishable only by a pecuniary forfeiture; and still more singular, that, as no other appropriation of the penalty is made, half of that penalty might, following the letter of the act, be received by the very party bribed.

Of the policy of a distribution of fines imposed for public offences, or of allowing them to be received and distributed by collectors of the customs, in cases within the express purview of the act of 1799, we do not pretend to judge. It is sufficient for us, that the legislature have expressed their will in direct and unequivocal terms; and we accordingly direct, that the fines imposed upon the defendants, and now in the hands of the marshal, after deducting the proper charges allowed by the court, be paid over to the collector.

SALVAGE—SPECIAL CONTRACT FOR PROPORTION OF PROPERTY SAVED—HOW FAR A SALVOR IS AN AGENT OF THE OWNER.

1. A wrecking company which had undertaken to raise a sunken schooner and deliver her at Detroit for six-tenths of her value when so delivered, hired of libellant, for a fixed compensation, certain divers, diving armor, and wrecking apparatus. Held, that libellant, having knowledge of the contract between the wrecking company and the owners of the schooner, could not maintain a libel in rem, and that the subsequent ownership of six-tenths of the schooner by the wrecking company could not relate back to the time of its contract with the owners, so as to affect their interests.

[Distinguished in The Louisa Jane, Case No. 8,532.]

2. A salvor by contract is not an agent of the owners, and cannot create against them or the property saved, any liability beyond the contract price.

3. A contract for a compensation to be paid at all events, whether the property is saved or not, creates a mere personal obligation, and no lien attaches on account of it.

[Distinguished in The Louisa Jane, Case No. 8,532. Cited in The Murphy Tugs, 28 Fed. 430.]

[See Baker v. The Tros, Case No. 783.]

The Marquette was sunk in the Straits of Mackinaw by a collision, and abandoned by her owners to the underwriters, and there lay sunken in about fifteen fathoms of water. The underwriters contracted with the Northwestern Wrecking Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Ohio for the raising of sunken vessels, to raise the Marquette, and place her in Clark's dry dock, in the city of Detroit, for six-tenths of the vessel. The Northwestern Wrecking Company entered upon the performance of their contract under the charge and supervision of Milo Osborne, and after working at the wreck for several days, found that on account of the great depth of water in which the wreck lay, the services of a diver were necessary. The libellant, who was also in the wrecking business, was then engaged in raising a wreck in Beaver harbor, near Beaver island, a few miles distant from the wreck of the Marquette. He had divers in his employ, and owned and had in use the necessary diving armor and apparatus, a hand pump, a steam pump, etc., adapted to the purposes of wrecking. He was also the patentee of a new invention for raising sunken vessels, which consisted mainly in sinking casks filled with water, and then, after being fastened to the vessel, inflating them with air by the use of a steam pump and connecting tubes or pipes, and thus expelling the water and giving the casks a lifting power. Osborne, who was in charge of the work for the Northwestern Wrecking Company, applied to and obtained of the libellant a diver and the necessary armor and apparatus, including a hand pump. After working a short time it was found that the hand pump was not sufficient for the divers to operate with safety in so great a depth of water, and Osborne returned the hand pump and obtained libellant's steam pump. After working a few days longer, and not making much progress, Osborne returned to libellant with the diver, apparatus and pump, and had a settlement with him up to that time, and paid libellant what was then found to be his due, at the rate of $50 per day with the hand pump, and $75 per day with the steam pump, less a small deduction made by libellant at the request of Osborne. Osborne desired the use of the diver, etc., longer, but complained that they could not afford it at the price charged by libellant. A new arrangement was then entered into, and Osborne returned to the Marquette, with two divers who were in the employ of the libellant, the necessary armor and apparatus, and the steam pump, and taking with him, also, some of libellant's casks, to be used on his patented plan, and had the same for use in raising the wreck, thirty-four consecutive days, and until the vessel was finally raised. The divers, etc., were actually used twenty-eight, and were idle six out of the thirty-four days. It is for this use, under the new arrangement, that the libellant brought this suit against the vessel. During this time the libellant came along where the company were at work, on his way to Cleveland, with the vessel he had been raising, and left a small vessel called the Barbour, and his chains, anchors, additional casks, etc., and the same were used by the company to some extent, but no additional claim is made for such use. On the Marquette being raised, she was taken to Detroit by the Northwestern Wrecking Company, and placed in Clark's dry dock, in complete fulfillment of their contract with the underwriters, and its interest of six-tenths in the vessel, her boats, etc., thereupon accrued to them, and the company intervened, and put in its claim and answer for the protection of that interest.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry B. Brown, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission. 6 Alb. Law J. 292, gives only a partial report.]

W. A. Moore, for libellant.

Where a lien has been created it will not be released except upon the clearest proof of an intention to release it. Moore v. Newbury [Case No. 9,772]; The Kimball, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 37; Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 325, 345; The A. D. Patchin [Case No. 87]; Dike v. The Joseph [Id. 3,908]. Failure to prosecute by one set of salvors does not inure to the benefit of the salvors who do prosecute, but to the owners. Evans v. The Charles [Id. 4,556].

H. B. Brown, for claimant.

It is unnecessary to consider whether if libellant's contract had been made directly with the owners for a sum certain, he could sustain a lien. He certainly could have no claim for salvage as such, for that is a contingent claim, and some of the cases would indicate he could have no lien upon the vessel. The Mulgrave, 2 Hagg. 77; The Independence [Case No. 7,014]; Adams v. The Island City [Id. 55]; Bondies v. Sherwood, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 214; The Susan [Case No. 13,630]; Hennessey v. The Versailles [Id. 6,365]. Libellant was a subcontractor, and clearly had no lien. Purinton v. Hull of New Ship [Id. 11,473]; Smith v. The Eastern Railroad [Id. 13,039]; Southwick v. The Clyde, 6 Blackf. 148; Hubbell v. Denison, 20 Wend. 181; Burst v. Jackson, 10 Barb. 219; The Whitaker [Cases Nos. 17,524, 17,525]; Harper v. New Brig [Case No. 6,090]; Ames v. Swett, 33 Me. 479; Squire v. One Hundred Tons of Iron [Case No. 13,270].

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The libellant and Osborne, both of whom were sworn as witnesses and testified in the case, agree that the divers were in the employ of the libellant, and that he was to be paid for their services, as well as for the use of the armor, apparatus, pump, etc. They also agree that libellant's compensation was not dependent upon success, but that he was to be paid at all events, whether the vessel was raised or not. It is true they do not say this in so many words, but the version which each gives of what the contract was under the new arrangement, admits of no other construction. They are also agreed as to the time, viz., thirty-four days, and that twenty-eight of those were working days, and six of them they were idle. The main facts upon which there is any disagreement are as to whether there was a fixed rate of compensation agreed upon, or whether it was left to a quantum meruit, and as to whether the libellant knew or was informed of the character or capacity in which the company was operating, that is, that they were operating as contractors, and not as owners.

28 working days at $75	$2,100
6 idle " " 37 50	225
Total	$2,325
Less payment conceded	310
Leaving a balance of.....	$2,015

—For which, with interest from October 1st, 1870, libellant claims a decree in his favor against the vessel. On the other hand, the company claims that no fixed rate of compensation was agreed upon, but, on the contrary, that when Osborne complained that they could not afford to pay $75 per day, libellant told him to take the divers, etc., and use them, and he would be reasonable with them, or words to that effect, and that that was the agreement as to compensation. But, without pursuing this disputed point further now, I will proceed to the other disputed fact. And here I must hold that libellant had notice of the character or capacity in which the company was operating. Libellant, in his testimony, says, "I understood the Northwestern Wrecking Company had taken the job to raise the vessel, and had failed. I did not know how much they had taken the job for." He understood, then, that the company was not operating as owner, but had undertaken the raising of the vessel as a "job," and the only point as to which he professes not to have been informed was how much they were to receive for the service. This is sufficient alone to settle this point. But there is further testimony which I think places it beyond all doubt that libellant knew, not only that the company was operating as contractor, but also the terms of the contract. Osborne, after producing in evidence the contract (which was in writing) between the Northwestern Wrecking Company and the underwriters, testifies positively and explicitly as follows: "I made known to Captain Falcon that we had such a contract; that I deemed it a good one, and that I wished him to go in with me and share in the results, etc. That was at the time we were at Beaver harbor. He replied that he wanted nothing to do with the wreck—that he wanted the money. He said they were slow things to realize from. I told him we were to have six-tenths, and that she ought to be raised in a very short time—we deemed it a good contract." In this Osborne is not contradicted. On the libellant being recalled to the witness stand, and asked if any such conversation took place, he says, "none that I recollect;" and this is all the denial he makes, which in fact is no denial.

But it is contended, on behalf of libellant, that the Northwestern Wrecking Company were in fact part owners of the vessel to the extent of the six-tenths which they were to have under their contract with the underwriters, in case of success, and which finally accrued to it. I cannot agree to this. The company was operating precisely the same as any salvors under a contract, and the agreement as to the six-tenths was simply fixing the quantum of compensation, in lieu of leaving it for after consideration between the parties, or to be determined by the court. Besides that, it was wholly conditional upon success, and it accrued to it only from the time the contract was fully performed. By no known principle of law or in reason can it be held to relate back to any previous period so as to affect the interests of those who were owners of the vessel at the time the contract was entered into. The company must therefore be held to have sustained the relation of contractor merely at the time the agreement between libellant and Osborne was entered into.

The case, then, is that of a person having rendered a service to salvors for a compensation to be paid at all events, who were themselves operating under a contract with the owners, known to such person, claiming and seeking to enforce a lien upon the vessel saved, independently and irrespectively of such latter contract, and of the compensation as fixed by it. The learned advocate for the libellant has referred the court to no adjudicated case in which this was allowed to be done, and to no authority or even dictum to that effect; and after a careful investigation, the court has been able to find none. On the contrary, the authorities are all the other way. The case of The Whitaker [Cases Nos. 17,524, 17,525] and that of Squire v. One Hundred Tons of Iron [Case No. 13,270], are quite analogous to the present case. Both cases were in fact more favorable to the libellant than the present. In the case of The Whitaker, Holbrook, the original contractor, after vain efforts to get the vessel off, gave the job over entirely to one Otis, who knew of the contract. Otis, at an expense largely beyond the contract price, succeeded in getting the vessel off, and then libeled her for his pay. Judge Sprague dismissed the libel, for the reason that Holbrook, the original contractor, was not made a party. Afterwards, upon a new libel, in which Holbrook was joined, the court granted a decree to Holbrook and Otis, jointly, limiting them to the original contract price, although it was less than half what Otis had expended. In that case also Otis' compensation was dependent upon success, while in the present case, as we have seen, libellant was to be compensated at all events. In the case of One Hundred Tons of Iron [supra], libellant had loaned to the owners seven large blocks, to be used by them in endeavoring to get their vessel off the beach, at $5 per day, with an express stipulation that the vessel should be responsible for hire and damage and for the return of the blocks. The hire not having been paid, and the blocks having been lost, libellant brought his suit, in rem, against 100 tons of iron which was of the cargo, and had been recovered from the vessel. Judge Blatchford dismissed the libel, not only on the ground that a pledging of the vessel was not a pledging of the cargo, but mainly on the broad ground that the libellant had no claim whatever as a salvor, giving as a reason that the hire of the blocks was for a fixed compensation, which was to be paid at all events, whether the vessel was saved or not, which is exactly the present case, according to the libellant's own theory. In that case also, it is to be observed, the contract was made with the master of the vessel, and it purported to pledge the vessel for its fulfillment, and yet the court held that the libellant could not recover in the admiralty, either in rem or in personam. In this case, not only was the contract not made with master or owner, but the libellant expressly refused to have anything to do with the wreck.

I think both of these cases are sustained by authority, as well as on principle. The case of The Whitaker [supra] was decided on the principle that a salvor by contract, like the Northwestern Wrecking Company in this case, is not an agent for the owners, and cannot create against the owners or the property saved any obligation or liability beyond the contract price, or, it may be added as applicable to this case, a different mode of payment than that expressed in the contract; and I think there can be no dispute as to the soundness of that doctrine. The most that the court could do, in any event, would be to let the libellant in to share the contract price with the original contractor. But the court cannot do that in this case without making a new contract for the parties, because, as we have seen, libellant expressly refused to share the contract price or have anything to do with the wreck at the time the agreement between him and the company was made. The case of One Hundred Tons of Iron was decided on the principle that the hiring, as in the present case, was for a compensation to be paid at all events, whether the vessel was saved or not. The same principle was also stated and acted on by Judge Sprague in the case of The Whitaker in deciding another branch of the case than that above alluded to. See, also, The Independence [Case No. 7,014], where the same doctrine is enunciated by Judge Curtis in the following language: "In my judgment, a contract to be paid at all events, either a sum certain, or a reasonable sum, for work, labor, and the hire of a steamer or other vessel in attempting to relieve a vessel in distress, without regard to the success or failure of the efforts thus procured, is inconsistent with a claim for salvage; and when such a contract has been fairly made, it must be held binding by a court of admiralty, and any claim for salvage disallowed." See, also, The Camanche, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 448, 477.

It must be understood that the nature of the claim as a salvage claim is not changed simply because the service was rendered by contract. It is well settled that the nature of the service as a salvage service is not changed for that reason alone (see the opinion of the court in the case of The Silver Spray [Case No. 12,857], decided by this court at the present term, and the cases there cited). It is because that by the contract the compensation is to be paid at all events, whether the property is saved or not, that a claim for salvage cannot be maintained. Such a contract creates a mere personal obligation, and no lien attaches on account of it.

I hold, therefore, that the libellant in this case cannot maintain a suit in rem in this court, for the reasons: 1st. That the services having been rendered under an agreement with a contractor itself operating for a specific compensation, and not with the master or owner of the vessel, he cannot, in any event, maintain a suit against the vessel, except by joining with such original contractor and sharing with it the compensation so agreed upon between it and the owners. 2d. That he could not maintain such suit in this case, because, by the very terms of his agreement, he was not so to share. 3d. That he was to be paid at all events, whether the vessel was saved or not. The libellant undoubtedly has a remedy against the Northwestern Wrecking Company in some form of action, but not in this.

Having arrived at these conclusions, it is unnecessary to determine the specific compensation the libellant was to receive, whether a per diem, or a quantum meruit, or how much. The libel must be dismissed, with costs; but, inasmuch as the merits of the case as between the libellant and the Northwestern Wrecking Company are not decided, it must be without prejudice as between them. Libel dismissed.

Case No. 9,102.

MARRETT v. ATTERBURY.

[3 Dill. 444; [1] 11 N. B. R. 225; 2 Cent. Law J. 11.]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. Dec. Term, 1874.

BANKRUPT ACT, § 22—FRAUDULENT PROOF OF DEBT —EFFECT ON RIGHT TO DIVIDENDS.

A creditor of a bankrupt included in his proof of debt claims against a bankrupt's estate, part of which was invalid and the rest valid, and made the claim in this manner intentionally, knowing that only part of it was legal, and supported the claim for the whole amount by a false oath: Held, that the effect of this fraudulent conduct on the part of the claimant was to disentitle him to any dividends whatever on any part of his claim.

Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Minnesota.

[This case was before the court in October, 1874, upon another point. See Case No. 9,103.]

A motion was made in the district court by [Thomas B. Marrett] the assignee in bankruptcy of John W. Baker, surviving partner of Atterbury, Baker & Co., that the proof of the claim or debt of Edward J. C. Atterbury be declared fraudulent as to creditors, and that no dividends be paid thereon. This motion was resisted by the said E. J. C. Atterbury. The claim of said Atterbury, as filed and proved against the estate, was for the sum of $19,155.25, for moneys advanced to the firm at various times from December 30, 1872, to April 13, 1873, as per statement or account annexed to claim. The claimant swore to the correctness of his entire claim in making proof of his debt, and that he held only a note for $10,000 and one for $363. The district court found upon the testimony that the first $10,000 of the amount claimed by E. J. C. Atterbury was intended as an advance to his son (the deceased member of the firm of Atterbury, Baker & Co.), and not provable as against creditors, and that the note for $363, interest thereon, fell in the same category. The district court held that the subsequent advances by the father were made to the firm as loans, and that court, accordingly, made an order reducing the amount of E. J. C. Atterbury's claim to $9,155.25, and allowing it to stand as a valid claim against the estate to that extent. As Baker, the surviving partner, had given his note for the controverted amount of $10,000, and had placed the entire claim for $19,155.25 in the schedule of firm debts, the district court did not, under the circumstances, consider the claim of E. J. C. Atterbury as one so founded in fraud as to taint and vitiate it entirely, and accordingly allowed the amount which was loaned, $9,155.25, to stand as a claim against the estate, and rejected the balance, as having been made as an advance or gift by the claimant to his son.

The following is the opinion of the district judge:

NELSON, District Judge. I think the evidence fully establishes the fact that there should be a diminution of the debt proved by E. J. C. Atterbury. Although he held the note of the firm of Atterbury, Baker & Co. for $10,000, given in January, 1873, it clearly appears that so far as the other creditors of the late firm are concerned it cannot be considered as a valid claim entitled to be entered on the list of debts recorded for dividends. This creditor had many times previous to the execution and delivery of the note to him informed the other creditors of the firm, that the amount specified in this note, and for which it undoubtedly was given, had been advanced to his son who was a member of the late firm of Atterbury, Baker & Co. as capital to carry on the business. Now he cannot be permitted to assert any claim against the assets at this time even upon the theory that they considered their financial condition so improved as to justify their consent to a withdrawal of this capital at any time, and had executed a note for it payable on demand. Baker, the surviving partner, in making up his schedule, has placed the note among the debts of the firm, and in his testimony states that he consented to the execution and delivery of it to the creditor. I think, therefore, under these circumstances, it cannot be considered as a claim founded in fraud which should taint the whole indebtedness proved up by the creditor against the estate. I do not think any collusion between the surviving bankrupt partner and this creditor has been shown, and no deliberate fraud has been attempted to be practiced upon the other creditors which would authorize me to reject the whole debt. The note for $363 given for the interest upon the various drafts which were included to make up the $10,000 advanced as above stated, must also be rejected. This will reduce the debt to that extent in addition to the $10,000.

An order will be entered in accordance with form No. 66, reducing the amount to nine thousand one hundred and fifty-five dollars and twenty-five cents ($9,155.25), which includes the interest up to May 22, 1873.

From this order the assignee in bankruptcy appealed to the circuit court, and there urged that the district court should have disallowed the whole claim, and prohibited it from sharing to any extent in the dividends of the bankrupt estate, at least until the other general creditors were paid in full, for the reason that the claim was founded in fraud, and that the proof of it was fraudulent, and false, and known to be so by the claimant.

The motion of the assignee was made under a provision in section 22 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 527)], to the effect that the court shall reject claims founded in fraud, illegality, or mistake. On the appeal, the assignee's counsel, in their brief, "admitted that the amount allowed E. J. C. Atterbury by the district court, to-wit, $9,155.25 was justly due to him from Atterbury, Baker & Co. or the bankrupt, as the surviving partner at the time he made and filed his proof of debt against the bankrupt's estate, but submits that the attempt of said claimant to sustain his proof of debt for the full amount claimed, $19,155.25, by the false and fraudulent testimony of the claimant himself, has the effect to deprive him of any right to dividends until the other general creditors are paid in full." The appeal was argued before Mr. Justice Miller, at the June term, 1874, and by him taken under advisement. Subsequently, after much consideration, he made the findings of facts and conclusion of law below given.

E. C. Palmer and J. A. Marvin, for assignee.

Morris Lamprey, for E. J. C. Atterbury.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. I find the following facts:

1. That Atterbury, the father, advanced to his son, the partner of Baker, the sum of $10,000, which was not intended as a loan to the partnership, but as an advance to the son by the father, which was no just claim against the insolvent partnership.

2. I find that said Atterbury, the father, also loaned the partnership the further sum of $9,155.25, which was intended by both the father and the members of the partnership as a loan of money to the firm, and which, but for the next finding of fact, would now be a valid claim against the assets of the bankrupt firm in the hands of the assignee.

3. I find that the appellee, Edward J. C. Atterbury, the father, with full knowledge that the sum of $10,000 aforesaid was an advance to his son, and well knowing that he had induced some of the creditors of the firm to extend credit by his statement that this $10,000 was such an advance, and was not claimed by him as a debt against the firm, did, nevertheless, claim that sum and the $9,155.25, also, in all the sum of $19,155.25, against the estate of the bankrupts, and did file that claim with the assignee, and did support that claim by a false oath, and did, in support of it, in this suit falsely swear that it was not an advance to his son, but was a just claim against the assets of the firm in the hands of the assignee.

Conclusion of law: And I am of opinion as a conclusion of law from the foregoing facts, that said Edward J. C. Atterbury, is not entitled to receive from the assignee of said bankrupt partnership any part of said sum of $19,155.25, neither the $10,000, advanced to the son, nor the $9,155.25 actually loaned to the partnership.

The result is that the decree of the district court is reversed, and a decree entered here disallowing said Atterbury's claim as a creditor, and dismissing his claim with costs. Let a decree be entered accordingly.

Decree accordingly.

MARRETT v. MURPHY et al.

[11 N. B. R. 131; [1] 1 Cent. Law J. 554.]

District Court, D. Minnesota. Oct. 16, 1874.

BANKRUPTCY — SURVIVING PARTNER — JUDGMENT AGAINST FIRM—HOW REAL ESTATE TREATED.

B., as the surviving partner of the firm of A., B. & Co., was adjudged a bankrupt, and an assignee was duly appointed, who received the proper instrument of assignment, which included certain real estate mentioned in the schedules of the bankrupt as the property of the firm, which firm is wholly insolvent. M. claimed the better right to A.'s interest by virtue of two judgments obtained against A. & B. as partners. The assignee claims that the property was purchased with partnership funds by the firm of A., B. & Co., as partnership property, and that A.'s interest is first subject to the debts of the creditors of the firm, before the individual creditors of A. can assert their claims, whether they are in the nature of judgments or otherwise. Held, that the rule in relation to real property purchased with partnership funds, so far as their creditors are concerned, is that it is to be treated as personalty of the partnership, and is charged with the debts of the partnership. If there is a survivor, the share of the deceased partner in the surplus of the partnership real estate, remaining after the payment of the partnership debts, and the adjustment of the claims between the individual members of the firm, is considered as real estate only in any controversy between the heirs-at-law and the personal representatives of the deceased; that the real estate in question as against this judgment-creditor must be first subject to the payment of the firm debts. Decree for the assignee.

The bill of complaint in this case is filed by [Thomas B. Marrett] the assignee, to determine which party to this suit has the right to the real estate mentioned therein, standing of record in the name of Livingston Atterbury and John W. Baker. The defendant [William] Murphy claims the better right to the interest of Atterbury in the real estate, by virtue of two judgments and executions levied. The first judgment was rendered and docketed October 11, 1872, in the district court of Ramsey county, Minnesota, in a suit pending between Murphy and Livingston Atterbury, and Crawford Livingston, partners; the second was rendered in the supreme court of said state, August 18, 1873, and docketed in the Ramsey county district court, August 20, 1873, in a suit pending between the same parties. The sheriff [John Grace] had levied upon the interest of Atterbury in the real estate owned by Atterbury and Baker, and was proceeding to sell the same, when an injunction was issued by this court. The assignee claims that the property was purchased with partnership funds by the firm of Atterbury, Baker & Co., as partnership property, and that Atterbury's interest is first subject to the debts of the creditors of the firm, before the individual creditors of Atterbury can assert their claims, whether they are in the nature of judgments or otherwise. The undisputed facts show that Baker, as surviving partner, was adjudicated bankrupt May 23, 1873; that Marrett was appointed assignee June 10, 1873, and received the proper instrument of assignment, which included the real estate in controversy, mentioned in the schedules of the bankrupt as the property of the firm; also, that the firm of Atterbury, Baker & Co., commenced business in May, 1872, and continued until March 3, 1873, when Atterbury died, and that during the existence of the firm the property in dispute was purchased, and the firm notes given for the purchase price of a portion of it, which were taken up and paid at maturity or shortly after; that for two of the city lots payment was made by deducting the amount out of the contract price for certain materials furnished and work performed by the firm in the line of its business. The deeds were executed to Livingston Atterbury and John W. Baker. The firm is wholly insolvent.

E. C. Palmer, for plaintiff.

I. V. D. Heard and H. J. Horn, for defendants.

NELSON, District Judge. The rule in relation to real property purchased with partnership funds, at least, so far as the partners and their creditors are concerned, is pretty well settled. Equity treats such real estate, without reference to the situation of the record title, as the personalty of the partnership. The tenure of real estate, applied to partners, is that they become tenants in common, and each partner can only convey his own share, but the general current of authority, although there is some conflict, in equity, charges such real estate with the debts of the partnership. If there is a survivor, the share of the deceased partner in the surplus of the partnership real estate remaining after the payment of the partnership debts, and the adjustment of claims between the individual members of the firm, is considered as real estate only, in any controversy between the heirs-at-law and the personal representatives of the deceased. Story, Partn. (3d Ed.) pp. 136, 137, § 93; 2 Barb. Ch. 165. The doctrine establishing by an equitable fiction partnership real estate as personalty, is in favor of trade, and for the benefit of surviving partners and firm creditors. I do not understand, or so interpret, the statutes of Minnesota that they change in any respect the equitable doctrine above stated. The claim here is not a secret trust, or secret equitable right. If it exists at all, it is the result of the operation of law, and nothing in the statutes of this state defeats it. I do not mean to assert that, as an abstract proposition, partners cannot with partnership funds purchase real estate, and hold it otherwise than as partnership property. If it was not the intention of the partners to so purchase and hold it, there can be no objection to a purchase, in good faith, for their individual account. In this case, however, the testimony shows that it was the intention to hold it as partnership property. The surviving partner so states in his evidence, and has so returned it in the schedules. It must, therefore, as against this judgment-creditor, be first subject to the payment of the firm debts.

Decree will be entered for the complainant.

[This case was again heard in the district court upon motion of assignee to strike out claim of E. J. C. Atterbury as fraudulent. A part of the claim was allowed. Upon appeal to the circuit court, however, the entire claim was stricken out. Case No. 9,102.]

CONTRACTS—AGREEMENT ON INTERPRETATION—ESTOPPEL.

[An agreement as to the proper interpretation of a contract bars each party from thereafter claiming a construction inconsistent therewith.]

[This was a libel by George W. Marriner and others against Charles Luting.]

This was an action to recover a balance of charter money. The vessel was, by the charter, to have "a full cargo of molasses, with 10 per cent. on the number of pieces for small stowage." The charterers did not furnish a full cargo, and on her arrival a dispute arose between the parties as to her capacity. They agreed to leave it to two stevedores to determine, and the stevedores made their report that she would carry 576 hogsheads, 20 tierces, and 56 barrels, and libellants presented a bill made out in that way. The respondent, however, was not satisfied with this award, and the parties met again. He claimed that she would not carry more than 552 hogsheads, and they finally agreed to split the difference on the hogsheads. The respondent, when the bill was again presented next morning, claimed that he should not pay freight on more than 564 hogsheads and 56 barrels, being 10 per cent. on the number of hogsheads. The libellants, however, claimed that they had agreed to settle the bill as it was now made out, deducting the twelve hogsheads agreed to be thrown off.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for libellants.

Benedict, Burr & Benedict, for respondent.

SHIPMAN, District Judge, without hearing the counsel for the libellants said he was inclined to the opinion that the respondent was correct in his construction of the charter party, but that as he had not objected to the bill on that ground when first presented, the transaction between the parties was a fixing of the amount to be paid as in the bill stated, less the hogsheads to be deducted, and he gave a decree for the amount claimed by the libellants.

PRIZE—BLOCKADE—PAPERS THROWN OVERBOARD.

Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The vessel and cargo in this case were neutral, owned by a British subject residing in Halifax, and were captured as prize on the 5th of February, 1862, within a few miles of Fernandina, in Florida, by the United States steamer Keystone State. The schooner was running directly for that port, with a cargo of salt for Inguana, in the West Indies. When the master found that his vessel was pursued by the public ship, he threw overboard some letters or papers, as did also another of the ship's company, — the steward, or a passenger on board. The master and owner of the vessel and cargo knew, as did all the crew, that the ports of the Southern states were in a state of blockade. The vessel purported to be to Halifax; the vessel was kept purposely wide of the true course for that port, under the suggestion that she designed to speak a blockading vessel and inquire if the blockade was still maintained. It is manifest, on the papers taken with the schooner and the preparatory proofs, that the outward and return voyages were planned and set out on foot with intent to evade the blockade and run a cargo of salt into some port of the enemy. Wheat. Mar. Capt. c. 6; Halleck, Int. Law, c. 23. This is so palpable and irrefragable that no appearance or claim has been interposed in behalf of any claimant, but the proceedings have been suffered to go to a decree without contestation.

The interlocutory decree of condemnation having been regularly taken by default against the vessel and cargo, final judgment of condemnation and sale of the vessel and cargo is ordered accordingly.

EMBARGO — FORFEITURE — BONA FIDE PURCHASER WITHOUT NOTICE.

A bona fide purchaser without notice is protected against an antecedent forfeiture to the United States.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

The information in this case proceeded for a forfeiture of the brig Mars, upon the allegation that the brig departed from the United States, bound to a permitted port, without giving bond pursuant to the act of 1st March, 1809, c. 91, § 16. There were other counts in the information, which were not considered by the court, because it was admitted, that there was a forfeiture under the first count, and the answer of the claimant set up, as a justification of his title, that he was a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice of the offence; and it was admitted that this justification was true in point of fact, and that there had been no laches, either as to the United States, or as to the purchaser.

G. Blake, Dist. Atty., for the United States, contended that the title of the United States related back to the time of the offence committed, and was not affected by the intermediate sale.[3]

Wm. Prescott, for the claimant [Daniel Hewes, Jr.]

In all forfeitures at common law, it is believed, without an exception, the forfeiture relates to the conviction, and not the commission of the offence; and, pending the indictment, the person accused may dispose of his chattels. 3 Bac. Abr. "Forfeiture," D; 4 Com. Dig. "Forfeiture," B, 6; 4 Bl. Comm. 387; 1 Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 49; Co. Litt. 391. It is said, the forfeitures by this statute are sui generis, and that, on the commission of the offence, the property in the thing is devested from the former owner, and vested in the government and its officers. But we contend, 1. That from the authorities cited, it does not appear, that the property vests on the commission of the offence; but, on the contrary, that it does not vest until seizure. 12 Mod. 92; 5 Mod. 193; 2 Bl. Comm. 93. 2. If the property does vest on commission of the offence, yet the former owner, so long as the government suffer him to keep possession of the chattel, can give a good title to a bona fide purchaser.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The question presented to the court is, whether property, which has become forfeited to the United States, and afterwards and before seizure, while remaining in the possession of the vendor, is sold to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, is protected against the claim of the United States. This question is peculiarly delicate and interesting, in whatever way it is considered. On the one hand, it strikes at the root of almost all the forfeitures in rem, which the legislature has provided, to guard the revenue laws from abuse; and, if the decision be against the United States, it may open a fertile field for fraud and colorable transfers, to the encouragement of offenders. On the other hand, if the secret taint of forfeiture be indissolubly attached to the property, so that, at any time and under any circumstances within the limitations of law, the United States may enforce their rights against innocent purchasers, it is easy to foresee, that great embarrassments will arise to the commercial interests of the country, and no man, whatever may be his caution or diligence, can guard himself from injury, and perhaps ruin.

Considerations of this nature have pressed heavily upon my mind, and I have therefore been solicitous to avoid a discussion involving so much public, as well as private importance. I could have wished to have reserved this question for the consideration of all the judges in the highest tribunal; that in forming my opinion I might have had the light reflected from their minds, and the benefit of their acknowledged learning. The parties have however seen fit to pursue another course, and I shall meet the question, as my duty requires, without asking for shelter under any authority, though not without extreme diffidence.

Before I proceed to the principal question, it will be necessary to clear the way by adverting to some considerations, which have grown out of the argument on each side. It should be remembered, that this is not a case where the vendor was out of possession, and of course where the law might infer a want of due diligence in the purchaser. To such a case the maxim caveat emptor would certainly apply. Nor is the present a case, where the sale was made at the first moment when the property came within the jurisdiction or grasp of the United States, for I should have little doubt, that such a hurried sale could hardly be the foundation of a solid title. It is not a case of a voluntary gift, or collusive transfer, which would probably share the fate of all bounties in fraud or exclusion of public rights. Jones v. Ashurt, Skin. 357. It is admitted, that the sale is bona fide, for a valuable consideration, and without any express or implied notice.

Further: The statute, on which the information is founded, has declared that the property shall be wholly forfeited, if the offence be committed. But it has not declared at what time it shall take effect, to what time it shall relate, nor whether it shall be incapable of being purged by subsequent events. The forfeitures under the statute are to be distributed in the same manner, as forfeitures under the collection act, March 2, 1799, § 91, by which informers and officers of the customs, as well as the government, may acquire vested interests; and it follows, therefore, that these interests, as to informers and officers of the customs, cannot vest until their rights are ascertained by seizure or condemnation.

It has been argued on the part of the United States, that the forfeiture is by the statute made absolute on the commission of the offence, and as it was competent for the legislature to enact such a law, the title cannot be devested by any subsequent event—that the cases of forfeitures at the common law are not applicable, because they depend upon the qualifications annexed to them by the common law, which make them conditional only, and not absolute forfeitures, whereas the present statute has annexed no qualification. And in support of this distinction, the opinion of the chief justice in U. S. v. Grundy, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 337, has been quoted, where he says (Id. 350): "It has been proved, that in all forfeitures accruing at common law, nothing vests in the government, until some legal step shall be taken for the assertion of its right, after which for many purposes the doctrine of relation carries back the title to the commission of the offence, but the distinction taken by the counsel for the United States between forfeitures at common law, and those accruing under a statute, is certainly a sound one. Where a forfeiture is given by a statute, the rules of the common law may be dispensed with, and the thing forfeited may either vest immediately, or on the performance of some particular act, as shall be the will of the legislature. This must depend upon the construction of the statute." I entirely subscribe to the doctrine here stated by the chief justice. There can be no doubt, that the legislature may provide, that its forfeitures shall take effect differently from the course prescribed by the common law. But the question will always be, have the legislature so done? If they have not, shall the rules of the common law govern in the absence of any positive declaration? It should be remembered also, that the chief justice is here speaking in a case, where the main question before him rested, in a considerable degree, upon the point, whether the legislature had not given an election of remedy, and suspended the vesting of any interest until the determination of that election. But I apprehend that the words of the chief justice by no means imply, that when a forfeiture in rem is attached to a statute offence, the rules of the common law are of course excluded. They do not in my judgment import more than the opinion, which I have already expressed. Now, in the case at bar, I cannot perceive in the language of the legislature any systematic exclusion of the common law as to forfeitures. They have declared no more, than that the commission of an act shall induce a forfeiture, and so has the common law. But the question, as to the nature and extent of the operation of this forfeiture, is nowhere, that I can perceive, touched. This view of the subject leads me to deny another position assumed by the counsel for the United States, namely, that the doctrine of relation has nothing to with the present controversy. In the progress of this examination, I think, if not already shown, it will sufficiently appear, that the doctrine of relation has a very powerful influence in every essential view of the subject.

I will now consider the main question, which perhaps may be divided into two branches. 1. What is the interest or right, which attaches to the government in forfeitures of property, before any act done to vindicate its claims? 2. What is the operation of such act, done to vindicate its claims, as to the offender and as to strangers?

As to the first point; in all cases at common law, where lands are forfeited for the personal offence of the party, I take the rule to be universally true, that until the offence is ascertained by conviction and attainder, no title vests in the sovereign. Before that time, the party is entitled to the possession and profits of his lands, and the government have no right vested in them, either to enter or dispose of the estate. 2 Inst. 48; Staund. P. C. 192. Nay, even after attainder, until office found, the sovereign is considered as having but a possession in law, and an office is necessary to complete the title. Staund. P. C. 198. The offender therefore has, until conviction, full power and authority to alien his lands, and to convey to the purchaser a complete and legal, though defeasible seizin, and unless such conviction follow the offence, the alienation is good against all the world. For as Bracton says (liber 2, c. 13, p. 30): "Ea vero quae post feloniam facta sunt, semper valent et tenent, nisi fuerit condemnatio subsecuta, et si fuerit subsecuta, non valent." If this be true, and there seems no reason to doubt it, it follows that the estate of the offender is rightful, that he has both jus ad rem and jus in re, and consequently, that the crown hath but a mere possibility, which in no wise restrains the exercise of ownership over the property. See 4 Bl. Comm. 382. The same doctrine is also in general true, as to like forfeitures of goods and chattels. Bract. lib. 2, c. 13; Co. Litt. 391a; Staund. P. C. 193; Id. 52; 2 Inst. 48; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 49. Nor do the cases of deodand and suicide form any exceptions, for the authorities all concur, that the forfeiture does not vest a property until the fact is found of record. Foxley's Case, 5 Coke, 109; Hales v. Petit, Plowd. 260, 262. It has been supposed, that goods waived, vested ipso facto in the crown upon waiver; but on a careful examination of the authorities it will be found, that the owner retains his full property, until an absolute seizure by the crown. Staund. Prerog. lib. 3, c. 25, p. 136; Fitzh. Abr. Estray, 2; 21 Edw. IV. c. 16. For all purposes of alienation and sale, therefore, the property in goods and chattels remains in the owner, notwithstanding the commission of an offence subjecting it to forfeiture, and consequently he may convey a good title against every person but the crown, and against the crown also, unless in cases where the anterior relation applies. Jones v. Ashurt, Skin. 357.

I think, therefore, it may be assumed as a settled principle, that in forfeitures for personal offences, before seizure or prosecution, the sovereign has no vested title. Can the case be distinguished, where the forfeiture is made to attach to the instrument itself by means whereof the offence is committed? It seems to me, that the most favorable cases for the United States, viz. deodands and waifs, conclusively show, that no such distinction anciently prevailed, for whatever may be the effect of relation, it is certain that no property vested in the crown until seizure or inquisition. I infer, therefore, that no absolute property vested in the United States, in the case at bar, until actual seizure was made, and the decision in the king's bench in Lockyer v. Offley, 1 Term R. 252, seems to me fully to support the inference. It has indeed been supposed by the counsel for the United States, that Roberts v. Wetherall, 1 Salk. 223, 12 Mod. 92, and Wilkins v. Despard, 5 Term R. 112, support a contrary doctrine. But on examination they appear to me to confirm it. In the first, the action was detinue for property forfeited under the navigation act of Car. II., and the court held, that the action well lay, because the bringing the action amounted to a seizure. In the latter case, there had been an actual seizure made for the forfeiture, and the sole question was, if condemnation were not necessary to devest the property of the owner.

If I am right in the view, which I have already taken of the subject, there can be little doubt, that the title of the United States, so far as affects third persons, rests mainly on the doctrine of relation; and that the counsel for the United States must call in the aid of the common law to enforce the present claim. For if no title vests until seizure, there must at the time of seizure be a title in the offending party capable of being devested, and of vesting in the United States. But at the time of the present seizure, that title had been transferred to the present claimant, and nothing was left in the vendor capable of transfer.

This leads me to the examination of the second point, viz. what is the operation of the acts done by the sovereign to vindicate his title by forfeiture? At common law, in case of attainder for treason or felony, the forfeiture of lands relates back to the time of the offence committed, so as to avoid all intermediate charges and conveyances (4 Bl. Comm. 481, 487; Co. Litt. 390b; Staund. P. C. 192); but in general, in like cases, the forfeiture of goods and chattels relates back only to the time of conviction, so that all previous charges and alienations, and even bona fide gifts, are protected (4 Bl. Comm. 387; Co. Litt. 391; Staund. P. C. 192; Perk. § 29; Skin. 357). There are some cases, in which the relation is carried back to the time of the inquisition made; but, unless that of suicide form an exception, there is no case, where the relation is pressed beyond the time of the prosecution. According to the decision in Plowd. 260, a felo de se forfeits all his goods and chattels from the time of committing the act, which occasions the death, and the doctrine seems supported by Rex v. Ward, 1 Lev. 8. The general ground assigned for it is, that otherwise the offender would go wholly unpunished, and it is compared to the case of flight after felony. Now admitting that this is a solid reason, and a sufficient foundation for a legal adjudication, it may well be doubted, if the doctrine of the decision in Plowden required the forfeiture to relate back further than the death of the party. The case was, that Sir James Hales, the offender, was joint tenant with his wife of a term for years, and the question made was, whether after inquisition, the forfeiture should not relate back, so as to over-reach the right of survivorship, which accrued to the wife. Now one of the judges (Weston) held that the forfeiture should only have relation to the death, at which time the title of the wife accrued, yet, in this concourse of titles, the king's title by prerogative should be preferred (Plowd. 204); and I find that Lord Hale (1 Hale, P. C. 414) expresses great doubt whether, for all purposes, the relation could be carried back to the stroke, which occasioned the death. Be this case as it may, it is the only exception to the general doctrine, and inter apices juris. A case so unjust, as that which robbed an unfortunate woman, not only of the moiety, which vested in her by survivorship from her husband, but of the other moiety absolutely vested in her by grant, I am glad to find is a juridical anomaly.

I have said, that the case of a felo de se forms the only exception to the rule. There are authorities to show, that in case of flight for felony, the forfeiture, after it is found by inquisition, verdict or indictment, relates back to the time of the flight, so as to avoid all mesne acts. Rex v. Wendman, Cro. Jac. 82. But I think the better opinion, notwithstanding, is, that it relates only to the time of finding the flight. Co. Litt. 390; Staund. P. C. 192; 5 Coke, 109b; Bro. Forfeiture des Terres, 119; Id. Relation. But it has been argued, that admitting the rule, that the forfeiture of goods and chattels in general relates back to the time of conviction, yet it is inapplicable to a case, where a specific thing is declared forfeited by law; for in such case, the corpus delicti attaches to the thing, into whose hands soever it may come, and the case of a deodand, put by counsel in Plowd. 262, is cited in illustration. "If my horse strike a man, and afterwards I sell my horse, and after that the man dies, the horse shall be forfeited." I do not find any authority to support this position, although it is cited as law in 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 26, § 7, and in Terms de la Ley, Deodand. It seems a peculiar case, growing out of the avarice of the church and the superstition of the laity in ancient times.

The distinction seems also countenanced by the court in Lockyer v. Offley, 1 Term R. 252. The counsel for the plaintiff there argued, that the ship was forfeited the moment the smuggling was committed, even though she had afterwards come into the hands of a bona fide purchaser, and Mr. Justice Willes, in delivering the opinion of the court, in alluding to the argument that the forfeiture attached the moment the act was done, said "it may be so, as to some purposes, as to prevent intermediate alienations and incumbrances." To be sure, this expression carries with it a pretty strong implication, but in the same case, returning to the argument, the same learned judge says: "I do not know that it has ever been so decided. It may depend upon circumstances, such as length of possession, laches in seizing, or other matters;" and the decision of the court went ultimately upon other grounds. I must therefore consider the authority, as not fairly extending to this point, and indeed as rather leaning the other way. On the other hand, the case of lord and villein has been cited from Co. Litt. p. 118, § 117, to show that even where a right to seize property exists in the lord, it is not forfeited by seizure, so as to over-reach prior alienations, for until seizure, it is said, that he has neither jus in re nor jus ad rem, but a mere possibility. And the conclusion drawn from this example is not materially affected by the consideration, that a contrary doctrine prevails in the case of the sovereign (Id. § 118) because the reason assigned is perfectly consistent with it, viz. that the property is in the sovereign before any seizure or office. I do not think much reliance can in general be placed upon analogies borrowed from the feudal tenures, because they were governed by peculiar and technical niceties, the reasons of which have long since ceased, and perhaps cannot now be well understood. But if the principle of the case put be, that where the absolute property is not vested before the alienation, a subsequent seizure will not avoid such alienation, if made bona fide, it is directly applicable to the case at bar. I have already endeavored to show, that the absolute property did not vest in the United States until seizure, and I think it would be a bold assertion, that the United States could, before such seizure, have conveyed the property to a purchaser, or have clothed it with a national character.

I consider a passage in Lord Hale's treatise on the customs as corroborating the view which I have already taken of this case. He says: "Though a title of forfeiture be given by the lading or unlading, the custom not paid, yet the king's title is not complete till he hath judgment of record to ascertain his title, for otherwise there would be endless suits and vexations; for it may be, ten or twenty years hence, that there might be a pretence of forfeiture now incurred." Harg. Law Tracts, 226. According to Lord Hale, even seizure would not be sufficient to fix the title in the king, but it must be consummated by a judgment of record.

But the point of difficulty is, to decide whether the United States had not such an inchoate title, as, connected with a subsequent seizure, would, by a retroactive effect, defeat the intermediate purchase. Now, it is precisely in this view, that the case of the villein may admit an unfavorable distinction. For until seizure, the lord has not even an inchoate title, but a mere possibility, and though the property is, in the like case of the sovereign, said to be in him without seizure or office, yet, I apprehend, the title is not consummate until seizure or office; for until that time, it could hardly be held, that a purchaser under the villein, or even the villein himself, had a tortious possession and user of the property. The case of villeinage then, even supposing it to apply, does not go quatuor pedibus with the present. The case of Attorney General v. Freeman, Hardr. 101, has also been relied on by the claimant. In that case, the party, after outlawry, and before inquisition, made a bona fide lease of his lands, and it was held, that the forfeiture did not over-reach the title of the purchaser. But I do not think that much reliance can be placed on this case, because it turned on a settled distinction, that until inquisition, the king has no title in the real chattels, or free-holds of the out-law; but in personal chattels, the title is in the king without inquisition (1 Ld. Raym. 305; Salk. 395; 12 Mod. 176), and the relation does not extend beyond the time of the commencement of the title. The case of The Anthony Mangin, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 356, note, before Mr. Justice Winchester, is the only other authority, that I recollect, which has been thought materially to bear on the question. I entertain the most entire respect for the opinions of that truly able and learned judge, and although the decision of that case did not rest upon the present question, it is but justice to acknowledge, that it has thrown great light on the subject, and enabled us all to meet the stress of this cause with more certainty, than could otherwise have been done. It was very clearly the opinion of the learned judge, that a seizure did not relate back to the time of forfeiture, so as to over-reach an immediate bona fide conveyance, and he has certainly offered cogent reasons in support of that opinion. But after a diligent examination of the authorities cited by him, I am well satisfied that the point has never been solemnly adjudged, and must now be decided upon principle.

It seems to be a rule founded in common sense, as well as strict justice, that fictions of law shall not be permitted to work any wrong, but shall be used ut res magis valeat quam pereat. 3 Coke, 28b. And this rule, so equitable in itself, seems recognized in the common law. 13 Coke, 21; 2 Vent. 200. And in respect to the doctrine of relation, this rule has been admitted in its fullest extent in civil cases. Brooke, Abr. "Relation," 18; 1 Hen. VII. c. 17; Brooke, Abr. Dett. 139; 6 Coke, 76b; 3 Coke, 28b. For it has been repeatedly adjudged, that relation shall never work an injury, "and shall never be strained to the prejudice of a third person, who is not a privy or party to the act," and further, that "in destruction of a lawful estate vested, the law will never make any fiction." 3 Coke, 29; 2 Vent. 200. It is true, as we have already seen, that a different rule prevails, as to forfeitures of lands in treason and felony, founded probably on feudal principles, or the barbaric character of the times. Yet even as to cases of treason and felony, a striking distinction is admitted in favor of goods and chattels; mesne acts before conviction or inquisition are suffered to retain their actual validity. Looking to the vast extent of commercial transfers, the favor with which navigation and trade are fostered in modern times and the extreme difficulty of ascertaining latent defects of title, it seems difficult to resist the impression, that the present is a case, which requires the application of the milder rule of the law. If the principle contended for by the government be admitted in its full extent, and it will be found very difficult to bound it, a bale of goods, which is once contaminated with a forfeiture, will retain its noxious quality, through every successive transfer, even until it has assumed, under the hands of the artisan, its ultimate application to domestic use. Yet such a position would strike us all as monstrous. If we say, that the forfeiture shall cease with the change of the identity of the whole package as such, still an intrinsic difficulty remains. The object of the government would be completely evaded by the offender, and the innocent purchaser would sink under the pressure of frauds, which he could never know, nor by any diligence avert.

On the whole, I have come to the result, not, however, without much diffidence of my opinion, that a forfeiture attached to a thing, conveys no property to the government in the thing, until seizure made, or suit brought. That previous to that time the owner has the exclusive right of possession and property, though the government may be considered as having an inchoate title or possibility. That as against the offender or his representatives, upon seizure or suit, the title by operation of law, relates back to the time of the offence, so as to avoid all mesne acts; but as to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, and without notice of the offence, the doctrine of relation does not apply, so as to devest his legitimate title. Considering, as I do, that this question is of very great importance, I trust that it will receive the decision of the highest tribunal, and I shall not feel humbled, if, upon better examination, a different doctrine shall prevail by the judgment of that court.

Case No. 9,107.

Ex parte MARSH.

[3 App. Com'r Pat. 291.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March 28, 1860.

PATENTS — GRAIN VENTILATOR — TUBES — SIDE WALLS.

[A device consisting of perforated tubes set vertically in a grain-bin so as to allow a free circulation of air through the grain, thus preventing overheating, is anticipated by a prior invention of hollow perforated side walls, for the same purpose.]

[Application by Sylvester Marsh for a patent for improvements in grain-bins. The commissioner refused a patent. Applicant appeals.]

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The appellant states his claim thus: "First. I claim grain-bins constructed with a series of perforated tubes open at both ends, the same being secured in the bottom of said bin so as to occupy a vertical position whereby the atmospheric air is permitted to penetrate into and evacuate from the bin by its natural ascent substantially as described. Second. I claim constructing grain-bins, with outer and inner walls, the latter being perforated and stayed from the former so as to admit of fresh air circulating around and through the mass of grain in the manner and for the purposes set forth. Third. In grain-bins of otherwise ordinary construction and suitable form I claim the combination of perforated tubes with perforated side walls arranged within the box or chest as described." The commissioner adopted for his decision the report of the examiners dated 24th Oct., 1859, in which report it is said: "The invention which Marsh presents consists of a bin having a series of tubes passing vertically from the top to the bottom of the bin at which points they are open at the bottom for the admission of atmospheric air, and at the top for its exit. The tubes are made of wire gause or of thin metal sheets perforated with numerous holes, and they may be made, it is suggested, funnel shaped at their lower ends, for the purpose of affording a means of securing them more perfectly to the bottom of the bin. It is also suggested in the specifications that in order to insure a thorough circulation not only through the mass of grain but also around it, the bin may be provided with double side walls leaving a free space between them for the passage of a current of air. The inner sides W being formed of metallic sheets perforated with holes in a like manner as the tubes c."

Upon this invention three claims are based, —the first to the tubes, the second to the double walls, and the third to the combinations of the tubes and the walls with each other. In each of these claims, the applicant limits himself to the especial construction he specifies as well when he claims the tubes and the double-walls as separate and distinct devices as when he claims the two in combination. Most of the references are grain kilns, so called because artificial heat and not atmospheric air is used in them to dry the grain subjected to their action; and upon this fact great stress is laid by the counsel for the applicant. Accepting this, for the sake of argument, although in point of fact we do not perceive the force of any such distinction that there is a substantial difference between the references in question because they are kilns, and his invention, because it is a bin, we still find in one of the references a device against which this objection does not lie. We allude to Noah Seitz's corn-house, an exact anticipation of the double wall as claimed in the second claim of the applicant and therefore in the light in which we find ourselves obliged to regard his invention, an answer also to it as presented in both his other claims. We will state the reasons which lead us to this conclusion as briefly as we can.

The double walls accomplish precisely the same functions that the tubes accomplish, only the quantity of air which may be introduced in this way into any given space or into any given bulk of grain is not so great as would follow the employment of the tubes in addition thereto. Nothing therefore else than a mere difference of degree does or can follow the use of tubes superadded to double walls, a result which would follow equally from a series of double perforated walls, or any other form of open spaces surrounded or enclosed by walls perforated to permit the external air to find its way into the grain. Considered in this aspect, the tubes then are nothing more than an amplification or extension of the idea involved in the use of the double walls, a duplication in other words, and as such they are not patentable as a substantive device. This view of the case as effectually disposes of the third claim as of the first, because the tubes and the double walls being practically the same thing, there can be no patentable combination between them any more than there could be between any two tubes of the series or between the opposite double walls constituting the sides of the bin. These reasons, independent of others which we do not consider it necessary to specify, satisfy us that the decision of the examiner upon the case was correct and hence we recommend the final refusal of a patent.

This report was confirmed and a patent refused by the commissioner on the 25th of Oct., 1859. To which decision there were six reasons of appeal filed. The first in substance is, that it was not shown that the applicant's claim or discovery had been invented by any other person prior to the applicant's discovery thereof, or that it had been printed or described, &c. Secondly: That Noah Seitz's patent for a corn house does not cover in substance or detail each or all of the several things or peculiarities, construction and combination of parts comprised in the applicant's claim, that neither separately nor in combination does the corn house of Seitz comprise a like use, construction or arrangement, &c. The third: Commissioner fails to show that the same special construction of which appellant's bin consists is found in Seitz's corn house, &c. The fourth: Because, that the tubes are something more than an amplification or extension of the idea, in the use of the double walls, at least in any ordinary signification, and do not in Marsh's invention either confine the grain as walls, nor restrict as walls, the diffusion of air, throughout the mass, but permit of its more general distribution at numerous points to the surrounding grain and as a substantive device widely differs from walls. The fifth: Because the commissioner has said he had other reasons, which were not stated as required by section 7 of the act of 1837 [5 Stat. 193]. The sixth and last: Because of a variance between the decision of the examiner and the commissioner, &c.

The commissioner's report in answer to the foregoing reasons, as to the first, is simply a denial of what is alleged by appellant; as to the second, the distinction between a grain-bin and a corn house is merely formal, as to the distinction of applicant's invention in the construction in the manner described of such a chamber with double walls, the inner wall or that next to the grain being perforated so as to allow the air which circulates between the two walls to come in contact with the grain. The construction has the further peculiarity that perforated tubes open at the extremities pass vertically from the top to the bottom of said chamber for the same purpose of ventilating the grain. An inspection of the case of Seitz shows identically (differing only in the size and form of the perforations in the inner wall) the provision for ventilating the grain which is exhibited in the application. This reference furnishes a substantial anticipation of all the three claims. The first of these is the construction of grain-bins with vertical perforated tubes open at the extremities passing through the space occupied by the grain. It is true, however, that the essence of the invention is a perforated ventilating duct or canal and whether this be rectangular or circular involves but a formal difference. It is still the same substantive invention. Four such ventilating passages appear in the section of Seitz's corn house, two of which may be regarded as passing through the body of the grain. Those two, however, are but the extension or multiplication of the same device, and if this be so the position taken by the office on final examination appears to be tenable,—that there is no combination between the tubes and the double walls which is the subject matter of the third claim, such combination resolving itself into a duplication of the same device. The third is supposed to have been substantially answered. The fourth, an explanation as to the distinction between tubes and walls. The fifth, no law compelling the commissioner to state all his reasons for rejection, &c. The sixth, unimportant. Thus the case appeared to be when all the papers and documents were laid before me by the commissioner according to previous due notice given of the time and place appointed for the hearing, at which time and place also the appellant appeared by his attorney, filed his argument and submitted his case.

The general question to be considered is whether the discovery claimed by the appellant to be new has not substantially been known and used before. The nature and object of the improvement as claimed is to secure and preserve from decay or injury stored cereals, and to keep the same sound and healthy by producing the circulation of fresh air through and around the grain by a peculiar manner of arranging the space in which the grain is to be deposited, so that a constant circulation of air will pass through and around the grain, and more economically by saving the expense of repeatedly stirring and moving the grain. The mode is by openings in a number of tubes, open at both ends, made of wire gauze or metallic sheets perforated with numerous holes of a size too small to suffer the grain to pass through, providing also side walls, leaving a free space between them for the passage of a current of air, the inner sides being formed of metallic sheets perforated with holes, as the tubes. To show the absence of novelty, the commissioner has referred to drawings showing the invention of Noah Seitz, by comparison of which with the one in question, as stated in his report in answer to the second and third reasons of appeal, he says that they are identical, and that the appellant's claim is fully covered by that of Sietz. The nature and object of each appear to be the same,—by a full and thorough circulation of air to prevent the heating and destruction of stored grain, the one in what he calls a bin, the other a corn house with cribs. I think, for the purpose of the issue in this case, there is no essential difference from the circumstances of one being known as a corn house and the other a bin. The arrangement in each by which the object was to be attained, though somewhat different in form, appears to me also to be substantially the same, and so with respect to all the other leading features, nor is there anything to show any material saving of expense. From aught that appears the contrivances of Seitz, by a full circulation of air, is amply sufficient for the protection of the grain, and although more might be an addition, it would not be a patentable improvement.

As to the authorities referred to, by a careful examination, it will be found that the main principle upon which the decisions turned was (whether singularly or in combination the different parts of the arrangements were presented)—the important matter was that a new and valuable result was produced. In this case I do not think that either the means or result were new and valuable according to the established principles of patent law. The decision of the commissioner is therefore hereby affirmed.

Case No. 9,108.

In re MARSH.

[6 Law Rep. 67.]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. April, 1843.

BANKRUPTCY—SETTING ASIDE VERDICT OF JURY—NEW TRIAL.

1. Whether the propriety of granting or refusing a motion for a new trial is a question, which, under the bankrupt act [of 1841 (5 Stat. 440)], can be adjourned into the circuit court, quaere.

2. But if it can be, then all the evidence and circumstances of the whole case must be brought fully before the circuit court, in order to enable it to form an opinion upon the question, whether a new trial ought to be granted or not.

3. The mere admission of incompetent testimony, or the mere misdirection of the court in a matter of law, is not of itself sufficient to establish, that a new trial ought to be granted, if in point of fact the verdict ought to be exactly what it has been upon the whole evidence and law properly applicable to the case, and the party moving for a new trial has suffered no injustice or prejudice thereby.

[Cited in U. S. v. Hudson, Case No. 15,412.]

4. Held, that the present case was too imperfectly stated to enable the circuit court to give any opinion upon the adjourned questions, inasmuch as the certified proceedings did not state what was the issue before the jury for trial, nor what the whole evidence was, which was submitted to the jury.

This case came before this court, upon a question adjourned from the district court of New Hampshire, as follows: "Whether the verdict of the jury may be set aside and a new trial may be granted upon the accompanying petition and statement." The case was submitted without argument.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I entertain the most serious doubts, whether the present question, adjourned into this court, is within the purview of the sixth section of the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9. That section declares, that "the district judge may adjourn any point or question, arising in any case in bankruptcy, into the circuit court for the district, in his discretion to be there heard and determined." Now, the granting or refusing a motion for a new trial is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the court, under all the circumstances of the case; and it by no means necessarily follows, that a new trial is to be granted for every mistake or misdirection of the judge at the trial, however trivial or unimportant it may be, if upon reviewing the whole evidence, so far as it is unobjectionable, and the law growing out of it, it is clear that no injustice has been done to the party, and that the merits are unequivocally against him, and the verdict just such as it ought to be. So, if the direction of the judge is objectionable in a particular passage, or on account of particular expressions, if, taking the whole together, it be such in substance, as will lead to a just conclusion, there is no ground to set aside the verdict for that cause only. The like result arises, where evidence has been admitted, which ought not to have been received, provided there be sufficient without it to authorize the finding of the jury. In short, in all these cases, the question is not, whether the ruling of evidence and the directions given by the judge at the trial have been entirely correct, but whether, upon the whole case, the party moving for a new trial has suffered any wrong or prejudice or injustice. The books are crowded with cases in support of the doctrines which I have stated. It is sufficient to refer to Edmondson v. Machell, 2 Term R. 4; Horford v. Wilson, 1 Taunt. 12; Pulley v. Hilton, 12 Price, 625; Cox v. Kitchin, 1 Bros. & P. 338; Gascoyne v. Smith, 1 McClel. & Y. 338; Wickes v. Clutterbuck, 2 Bing. 483; Teynham v. Tyler, 6 Bing. 561; Brazier v. Clap, 5 Mass. 1; Remington v. Congdon, 2 Pick. 310; Dole v. Lyon, 10 Johns. 447; and Woodbeck v. Keller, 6 Cow. 118. Nor do the recent cases of Crease v. Barrett, 1 Cromp., M. & R. 919; Baron de Rutzen v. Farr, 4 Adol. & E. 53; Wright v. Tatham, 7 Adol. & E. 313,—properly considered, overturn the doctrine as to the admission of improper evidence, although they certainly show an inclination of the courts to restrict its application to very clear cases. See, also, Estwick v. Caillaud, 5 Term R. 425, per Buller, J.; Grah. & W., New Trials, c. 9, pp. 301–310; 2 Tidd. Prac. (9th Ed., 1828) 907, 908; Tyrwhitt v. Wynne, 2 Barn. & Ald. 559, per Lord Tenterden. Considerations of this sort go very far to show, that the question, whether a new trial ought to be granted or not, being a matter exclusively in the discretion of the court, can most properly be disposed of by the district court before which the trial is had, and by which the whole circumstances of the case are fully understood, and can be best weighed; and that the bankrupt act was intended to provide for the adjournment of such questions only into the circuit court, as are mere questions of law, and not questions of discretion.

But without dwelling upon this matter in this view, it is obvious, that if the circuit court is to act at all upon the question, whether a new trial ought or ought not to be granted, all the evidence, which was given at the trial, and all the circumstances of the whole case ought to be brought by a complete report before the circuit court. That has not been done in the present case; and the want of it constitutes an insurmountable obstacle to any satisfactory decision upon the adjourned question by this court. It is not stated, what was the issue before the court upon which the trial was had, and the verdict of the jury was given; nor when or at what stage of the proceedings in bankruptcy the issue was directed. For aught that appears on the certified papers, it may have occurred before any decree, declaring the party a bankrupt, or upon some question occurring incidentally afterwards. In respect to the evidence admitted by the district judge at the trial, it is proper to state, that neither the deposition of Daniels or Gerrish is before this court, and, therefore, it is impracticable for me to say, what were the facts to which they testified. The same objection applies to the admission of the testimony of Osgood. It is not stated, what were the facts to which he was called to testify, or to which he actually did testify. So that the relevancy and materiality of the testimony of all these witnesses to the merits of the case, are beyond the power of this court to ascertain or weigh. In respect to Daniels, it is plain, that the admission of his deposition would be productive of no mischief to the petitioner, for he was present in court, and produced by the petitioner as ready to testify; so that it was the petitioner's own fault, if he was not examined by him to control, qualify, or explain any of the statements in his deposition. The objection now taken is strictissimi juris, and upon a motion for a new trial, I should think it entitled to very little regard. In respect to Gerrish, there might be a stronger ground for the objection to his competency; but it is difficult, if not absolutely impracticable to say, whether he was incompetent or not to testify, unless the point at issue between the parties, and the nature of his testimony was fully disclosed in the proceedings certified to this court. A creditor of a bankrupt petitioner is not in all cases incompetent to give evidence touching questions arising in bankruptcy; for in many cases he may not have any direct interest whatsoever in the point to be decided. In other cases his interest may be remote or contingent; as for example, upon the question, whether the petitioner shall be declared a bankrupt or not; for a party may be declared a bankrupt, and yet not be entitled to his discharge; and it is necessarily a matter resting in contingency, whether he ever obtains a discharge or not. Now, I take it, that to render a witness incompetent, it is not sufficient, that he has an interest in the question, but he must have a direct and positive interest in the result of the issue, and not a mere remote or contingent interest. How, then, can the court decide upon the question of incompetency, unless it knows, what the issue is?

In respect to the rulings of the district court at the trial, in matters of law, it is impossible for me, absolutely, to say, from the defects in the proceedings certified to this court and before alluded to, whether there was any misdirection of the court or not. Most of them, upon general principles, if I were at liberty to look at them in that view only, would seem to have been correctly decided; and as to the others, they might be perfectly maintainable upon all the facts and circumstances in evidence, or if unmaintainable in point of law, they may have had no legal effect upon the verdict, nor have in any manner been prejudicial or injurious to the petitioners. The case must therefore be sent back with a declaration, that upon these proceedings, now before this court, it is unable to give any opinion, whether a new trial ought to be granted or not.

Case No. 9,109.

In re MARSH et al.

[19 N. B. R. 297.] [1]

District Court, D. Vermont. Oct. 20, 1879.

BANKRUPTCY—BANKRUPT'S BOOKS—HOW KEPT—CASH BOOK—BANK BOOK.

The statute (section 5110, subd. 7) requires that the books kept by the bankrupt shall be proper,—that is, for their purpose, which includes being honest,—but does not go so far as to require that they shall show where losses accrued, or how. The bankrupts were engaged in buying and selling hemlock bark and lumber, each taking charge of each branch. They kept no cash book, but kept bank accounts showing the amount received, and each kept a book professing to show what amounts and to whom each paid. There was no claim that money had been paid by either and not entered on his book, or that any had been entered which had not been paid. Held, that the books kept were proper for the business done.

[In the matter of Marsh and Burnett, bankrupts.]

J. J. Wilson, for opposing creditors.

Hunton & Stickney, for bankrupts.

WHEELER, District Judge. This cause has been heard upon the application of the bankrupts for a discharge, and the specifications in opposition thereto. The specifications are, that the bankrupts did not keep proper books of account, because their books did not "show what moneys were received, or what disposition was made of the same," and that they did not keep a cash book. No question can properly be considered except such as arises with reference to these specific grounds. The grounds are confined to whether they kept proper books in respect to the receipt and payment of cash. What would be proper in this behalf must depend upon the nature of the business and the mode in which it was conducted. They bought hemlock bark and lumber, each taking charge of each branch, and forwarded it to customers by public conveyance. They kept bank accounts showing what money each received, and each kept a book professing to show what amounts and to whom each paid.

The counsel for the opposing creditor frankly states that they show no instance in which either paid money which he did not enter on his book, and none in which either entered money as paid which he did not pay; but claims that, by averaging the profits on what of the business they can trace with the result of the whole, they show a large proportion of business not to have been entered.

This method has too long a range to hit the object of the provision of the statute relating to books of account. The statute requires that they should be proper,—that is, for their purpose, which includes being honest,—but does not go so far as to require that books shall show where losses accrued, or how. The same provision was in the act of 1841 [5 Stat. 440], and in the English statutes, and was construed as requiring that the books should not, in what they showed, or failed to show, be fraudulent. The same provision, when adopted in the act of 1867 [14 Stat. 517], must be considered as having been adopted in view of the construction which it had received.

In this view, it cannot be justly held that the books shown to have been kept in this case were not proper for the business done.

Discharges granted.

Case No. 9,110.

MARSH et al. v. BENNETT et al.

[5 McLean, 117.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1850.

PARTNERSHIP—PROVISION FOR CREDITORS ON DISSOLUTION — PURCHASING PARTNER — TRUSTEE FOR CREDITORS — ASSIGNMENT — HINDER AND DELAY.

1. By the dissolution of a partnership, provision being made in the articles of dissolution for the payment, equally, of all the creditors of the firm, by the partner who purchases the interest of the retiring partner, and continues the business, such partner is a trustee for the creditors of the firm; and a subsequent assignment, by such partner, of the partnership effects, preferring certain creditors to others, and contrary to the stipulation in the articles of dissolution, is fraudulent and void.

[Cited in Darby v. Gilligan, 33 W. Va. 249, 10 S. E. 401.]

2. A provisional stipulation in a deed of assignment, coercing the creditors of a partnership "to delay their suits" against the firm, or else forfeit their claims upon the fund assigned, is fraudulent.

3. Such stipulation hinders the lawful process to which the creditors are entitled, tends to delay, and jeopards the right of creditors.

4. The notice required by the 5th section of the act of congress, of March, 1793 [1 Stat. 334], of an application for an injunction, may be waived by an appearance.

[This was a suit by Marsh and Compton against Bennett, Gilbert, and others. Heard on motion to dissolve an injunction.]

Romeyn & Wilson, for complainants.
Walker & Campbell, for defendants.

WILKINS, District Judge. Motion of Mr. Romeyn, of counsel for defendant Hill, to dissolve injunction heretofore allowed in this case, founded on the bill of complaint, and the allowance of the injunction by the court, without notice, according to the indorsement on the bill, and the records, files and entries in the case, and on the answer filed by the said defendant, George W. Hill.

The bill was filed on the 7th day of July, 1846, and the injunction allowed on the same day. There does not appear to have been any notice given to the defendants, or either of them, according to the provisions of the 5th section of the act of congress, of the 2nd of March, 1793, which provides that the writ of injunction "shall not be granted in any case, without reasonable previous notice to the adverse party, or his attorney, of the time and place of moving the same." And the 55th rule of practice for the courts of equity of the United States, incorporating this provision of the statute, enjoins due notice on the adverse party, prior to granting any special injunction. There is no proof of notice on the files, and no proof exhibited now that notice was ever given. The injunction, therefore, would now be dissolved, had not all the parties waived the proof of such notice by their voluntary appearance. The provision of the statute being designed for the benefit of defendants, the proof of the notice required by the statute may be waived either before or after injunction issued; and regular reasonable notice will be presumed after an appearance.

This defendant, George D. Hill, by his solicitors, Miles and Wilson, entered his appearance on the 29th of July, 1846; and the other defendants, Henry D. Bennett and George N. Gilbert, likewise voluntarily entered their appearance, by O. Hawkins, their solicitor, on the 14th day of July, 1846. On the 31st of August following, this defendant, Hill, filed his first separate answer to the bill of complaint, and on the 20th of October, 1846, his second separate answer. The other defendants never have answered.

These several acts upon the part of the defendant Hill, and the appearance of the other defendants, supply the want of proof of the reasonable notice required by the statute for the protection of the rights of defendants.

But the defendant Hill, in order to sustain this motion, further relies upon the equities exhibited in his answer, which chiefly sets forth an assignment to him, by Henry D. Bennett, on the 19th day of January, 1846, of all the goods, chattels, book accounts, claims and demands, and personal estate of every kind, of the late firm of Bennett & Ford, then (by the previous dissolution of the said firm) the property of the said Bennett, for the purpose expressed in the transfer to him, and including therein a note of the defendant, George W. Gilbert, for $3125, with interest from the 15th of January, 1846. This assignment to Hill is on certain conditions, and for certain uses and purposes, and upon certain trusts therein expressed. The assignor first provides for the payment of certain domestic creditors, in the order in which they are named in the first class, absolutely, and to the whole amount of their respective claims. And after the full payment of these creditors, provision is then made for the pro rata distribution, among the foreign creditors of the firm of B. & F., from the residue of the fund assigned; providing and expressly declaring, that the assignee or trustee "shall first appropriate all the proceeds of the trust to the payment, in the order previously prescribed and set forth, of all the creditors therein provided for, who shall not, at the time of making any payment or dividend, have made, by themselves or attorneys, any costs or expenses upon their claims; and that the claim or claims of any creditor or creditors of the said firm, who shall, at the time of making any payment or dividend, have made or occasioned any cost or expense upon their claims, by any resort to any proceeding having a tendency to interfere in any manner with, or prevent or obstruct the easy and economical execution of the trust, shall be postponed, and no payment whatever thereafter be made thereupon, until all the other creditors shall have been paid in full; after which, the remaining proceeds shall be first applied towards the payment, pro rata, of all such claims upon which costs have been made, in proportion to the present amount of said claims, exclusive of costs, so far as the same may be sufficient or necessary to satisfy such claims."

The answers disclose the material facts of the case.

On the first day of January, 1846, the firm of Bennett & Ford, being largely indebted to certain New York merchants, for merchandise purchased during the previous summer and fall, and also indebted to certain persons residing in their vicinage, dissolved their co-partnership; Ford, the retiring partner, on the same day, assigning and selling to Bennett all his interest in the stock of goods, books of account, &c., the property of the said co-partnership, "for the purpose of paying off" the creditors of the said firm, and closing the concern. On the 15th of the same month, the said Bennett sold and delivered to George W. Gilbert the stock of merchandise in the store lately owned by the said co-partners, for the sum of $3125, and took his note of the same date for that sum, payable in one year. On the 19th of January, but a few days after the dissolution of the partnership, and the sale to Gilbert (all within three weeks), Bennett makes the assignment to the defendant Hill, as set forth in his answer, with the preferences, and limitations, and trusts. therein contained.

No period is fixed in the assignment, when the trust is to be closed. It comprehends the co-partnership estate of the firm of B. & F., viz., "the claims, demands, and personal estate of every kind, which recently were the property of said co-partners, and then the property of said Bennett." The assignor Bennett, divides the creditors of Bennett & Ford into two classes, and designates a preference for the first class in payment. Annexed to the assignment, and forming a part of the same, is the schedule of property assigned, estimated by the assignor at $4749 19, inclusive of Gilbert's note for $3125, given expressly for the stock of goods, which had been, "during the previous summer and fall," purchased on credit by B. & F., from the foreign creditors, composing the second class. The first class of creditors are those who reside in Ann Arbor and its vicinity, and are directed to be paid first, the full amount of their claims, in the order in which they are named. Their claims are stated at $849 19; which amount, with the claims of the other creditors, not enumerated by name, but designated generally, as "residing in the neighboring towns," together with the expenses of the trust, will, at a reasonable estimate, bring the first payment to at least $1200; leaving, for pro rata distribution among the second class of creditors, (chiefly—yea, with one exception—merchants residing in the city of New York, who had, "the previous summer and fall," furnished the firm of B. & F. with their stock of goods, on credit,) the sum of $3549 19.

The amount stated to be due, in schedule 3, to these foreign creditors, is $6205 84; to meet which, the above balance of $3549 19, (if it ever could reach even that amount,) was designed for pro rata distribution; but, with the express provision, by the assignor, Bennett, that if any of this last list of creditors should commence, or have commenced, any legal proceedings for the recovery of their claims, such creditors should be postponed from any payment out of the trust fund, until all the other creditors, domestic and foreign, should have been paid in full; which, from the character of the assignment, and the amount appropriated for distribution, would of course be forever; or, in other language, such of the creditors who might bring suit, unless they all did so in second class, are excluded from the fund.

This assignment is, on its face, in law, fraudulent and void, as against the statute of frauds, being made with intent to delay, hinder or defraud creditors of their just and legal actions. Because,—

1st. By the transfer of his interest in the store, by Ford, to Bennett, it is expressly declared for the purpose "of paying off" the creditors of B. & F., without designating any preference between such creditors. By this transfer and assignment, Bennett became the trustee of all the creditors of B. & F., and had no authority to create another trust in the same effects, contrary to the provisions of the first trust, and therein prefer in payment one class of creditors to another class. Bennett was bound, in closing the concern of B. &. F., according to the trust conferred upon him by his retiring partner, "to pay off the creditors," without discrimination or preference; which, if the funds were insufficient to pay all, would of course demand a pro rata distribution amongst all. He had no right to prefer any of the creditors of B. & F., because, however B. & F. might have originally preferred one class of their creditors to another, yet, the terms of the dissolution, as set forth, and the original transfer to Bennett, by Ford, of the effects of B. & F., conferred no such power upon Bennett. The previous summer and fall, this firm (by the defendant's own showing) obtained credit for merchandise in New York, for better than $8000. They pass out of their hands, in the short time of a few months, on or before the 15th of January following, better than $5000 of this property, and then assign the remainder, by the act of Bennett alone, to a trustee of Bennett—not to pay all the creditors a fair proportion of their respective claims, so recently incurred to the foreign creditors, but absolutely devoting the means of these very foreign creditors—First, to pay other creditors residing on the spot, and then, to distribute among these foreign creditors the remnant, under the threatened penalty of losing all, should they seek a lawful remedy to recover a part of their own. The retiring partner conferred no such authority upon Bennett; and under the sale and transfer to Bennett, for the purposes indicated, he was clearly the trustee of all the creditors of B. & F., without the power of discrimination, and could not subsequently violate the original agreement with Ford.

2d. The creditors of B. & F. had a just right to legal process, at law or in equity, in order to reach either the effects of the co-partnership, or, the individual effects of either of the partners. The provisional stipulation in the assignment of Bennett to Hill, coercing the creditors to "delay their lawful suits" against the firm of B. & F., and so jeopard their claims, is therefore invalid, and a fraud upon the creditors. It "hinders" such lawful process; and, from the character of the assignment, and the powers conferred upon the assignee, as to time, would so tend to delay, as to carry beyond the statute of limitations such claims and demands. Partners contemplating bankruptcy could thus evade the salutary restraint of the statute of frauds, might make individual investments out of the partnership funds and partnership credit, and thus compel creditors to avoid and delay suit, until it would be too late by legal process to search out such hidden investments. The stipulation in the assignment to Hill, postponing those creditors who bring suit, until all the rest are paid, thus "hinders and delays" them, and is calculated to defraud them "of their lawful suit," as against the firm of B. & F., to reach the partnership effects, and also the individual effects of each of the partners. To reach either Ford's estate, or Bennett's estate, as the debt was joint, the judgment must be against both, and the prohibition to sue is general, as to the firm of B. & F. The stipulation is two-fold. 1st. Prohibiting payment to any litigant creditor, until all the others are fully paid; and, 2dly. In paying them, if ever,—confirming such payment to the "present" existing claim, exclusive of costs. By this, the debtor defines who shall be considered as his creditor, and closes all objection on the part of any one, as to the amount of the claim; for, should the matter be contested by any creditor enumerated in the schedules, or not, the sole arbitor is the debtor himself; for, if the disputant resorts to his "lawful suit" to ascertain his right, his whole claim is perilled, and by the amount of the fund appropriated, excluded from payment. This certainly tends "to hinder, and delay, and defraud."

The statute of this state, following the provisions of 13 Eliz. c. 5, declares every assignment or conveyance made with intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors or other persons of their lawful suits, damages, forfeitures, or demands, as against the persons so hindered, delayed, or defrauded, shall be void.

As exhibited in the bill, the complainants recovered judgment in the court of U. S. for this district, at the last June term, against B. & F., for $1020 77, and $41 92 costs. They are placed in the 3d list, seventh in order, at $993 25. Having brought suit, then, the terms and provisions of the trust, postpones the complainants from any participation in the fund assigned, until every other creditor, domestic and foreign, who has not sued, is fully paid. This cannot be sanctioned. Nor can its features be well assimilated to those cases of assignments by debtors in failing circumstances, in which (after surrendering all their property for the benefit of all their creditors, placing them all upon one common footing, without predilection or prejudice to any one creditor) they require the execution of a release by their creditors in their favor, and excluding those who do not execute such release from any participation in the trust fund. In such cases, the clause stipulating a release, is not a condition imposed upon the estate, but a mere designation of preference of those creditors who are to enjoy it, and for whom the trust is created. A debtor may prefer one class of creditors to another, and such a measure would be neither illegal nor immoral, per se: for, as is observed by Chief Justice Marshall in Brashear v. West [7 Pet. (32 U. S.) 608], "the right to make such an assignment results from the absolute ownership which every man claims over that which is his own." Whether creditors would come in under such a clause of release depends upon themselves, and not upon the debtor creating the trust. But, in the case under consideration, the trusts of the deed are, that the trustee should convert the assigned effects into money, or, that which would answer the creditors as money, —pay in full the 1st class of creditors designated, and distribute the residue pro rata among the 2d class of creditors, postponing such creditors who should bring their lawful suits, for the recovery of their claims, until all those in the 1st and 2d class, who had refrained from suit, were fully paid the whole amount of their claims. The 2d class, with or without suit, are postponed for an indefinite period, contingent on the full payment of the 1st class; an event altogether uncertain, thereby "sheltering from the claims of creditors" the estate of the debtor, in the language of Mr. Justice Washington, in Pearpoint v. Graham [Case No. 10,877], and "in the meantime the estate to be enjoyed by a mere volunteer, not the choice of the creditors." This is providing "for a future preference," contingent upon a future event, not under the control of the debtor or the trustee, namely, the solvency at the end of one year, of one of the principal debtors of the estate, whose indebtedness composes the chief portion of the assets, out of which the creditors of B. & F., are to be paid. By such a provision thus controlling the trust, the debtor, in fact, coerces his creditors to refrain and desist from their legal right to bring suit for the recovery of their claims against him; and what other intent could the debtor entertain, in thus contingently postponing one set of creditors to another,

(and, in fact, excluding them) than "to hinder and delay them in their lawful suits." He who is but a trustee of their property, virtually declares by such a provision, that they shall not have the remnant of their own, unless they shall refrain and delay from suit. The debtor thus enacts a law for his creditors, and withdraws his effects from their executions and the reach of the common law, in order to compel his creditors, under the apprehension of losing all their claims, to comply with a law of his own enactment. Without such a provision controlling the trust, any creditor suing subsequent to the assignment, would only be entitled to a ratable proportion of his claim existing at the date of the assignment, independent of costs of suit, such costs forming no part of the claims provided for; and, as to suits instituted prior to the assignment, such a provision would clearly be invalid, as calculated and designed expressly to hinder and delay,—for, if valid, such suits must at once be discontinued, and costs paid, in order to entitle the creditor to distribution. What other design, therefore, could prompt the debtor, in thus clogging the trust, than reserving an ultimate benefit to himself in the prevention of suits by his creditors? And what other intention can be gathered, than that of "hindering them" in the prosecution of their claims? No such provision was necessary to protect the fund from being wasted in litigation, and a debtor overwhelmed with debt, and with effects remaining confessedly insufficient to meet more than one third of his engagements, professedly assigning all for the benefit of his creditors, but also expressly excluding all who bring suit or have brought suit, from any benefit in the trust, can have no other object in view, than to defraud some one or more of his creditors, who have either already brought, or, to his knowledge, have contemplated bringing suit.

Such an assignment, by thus confining the distribution of the proceeds of the trust, to such of the creditors as should refrain from their lawful suits, in order to reach either partnership or individual effects, and making the payment of one class depend upon a contingency in future, uncertain as to occurrence and as to time, is a species of unfair coercion, prescribing unreasonable and illegal terms, upon creditors, thereby delaying and hindering them in their lawful suits, and, therefore, fraudulent and void as to such creditors.

In Brashear v. West [7 Pet. (32 U. S.) 608], which was a case, where the indenture contained a clause of release as a provision entitling creditors to come in, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall remarks as follows: "If this release were voluntary, it would be unexceptionable. But it is induced by the necessity arising from the certainty of being postponed to all those creditors who shall accept the terms by giving the release. It is not therefore voluntary. . . . . The objection is certainly powerful, that its tendency is to delay creditors. . . . . The weight of this argument is felt. . . . . We are far from being satisfied, that, upon general principles, such a deed ought to be sustained."

If an involuntary release, or, rather a compulsory release be exceptionable, and tends to delay and hinder creditors of their lawful suits, much more exceptionable, certainly, is a provision absolutely prohibiting suit, under the peril of losing the whole claim. If the one tends to delay, surely the other does. In the one case, within a specified period, a release must be executed; in the other, the last must wait the uncertain contingency of the payment of the first in full, and if suit be brought, and that fact is made apparent to the trustee at the time of a declaration of a dividend out of the remnant of the trust funds, the litigant creditor is further postponed until all the non-litigants are fully paid. If the objection be of "intrinsic weight" in the one case, it loses no force when applied to the other. In the one case, there is a present preference, and, in the other, in the language of Senator Tracy, in Grove & Wakeman, "there is a preference on a future contingency." In this case of Brashear v. West, the venerated and beloved chief justice expressly places the decision of the supreme court of the United States on the ground, that the court follows the construction of a local law of the state of Pennsylvania, and that the construction which the courts of that state had put on their own statute of frauds, must be received in the courts of the United States. The argument and expressed opinion of the chief justice on the point considered, is adverse to the decision pronounced.

The statute of Michigan has as yet received no judicial construction in this state, the case of Fox v. Clarke [1 Mich. 321] not applying to the point raised in this case, so that the question here is entirely new.

In Halsey v. Fairbanks [Case No. 5,964], which was also a case where the debtor stipulated for release, the learned Justice Story observes: "The question never can be whether a remedy exists for the creditors, but, whether the debtor has not endeavored fraudulently to delay or defeat them. Where the debtor stipulates for a release, he surrenders nothing except upon his own terms. He attempts to coerce his creditors, by withholding from them all his property, unless they are willing to take what he pleases to give. This is certainly a delay, and if the assignment be valid, to some extent a defeating of their rights. Has it not a tendency to obstruct the common rights of the creditors? The question is, whether the intent apparent upon the deed itself, be not to coerce them to a settlement, by embarrassing or delaying their remedy. Such an intent is of itself illegal."

And after reciting and commenting on several decisions in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and New York, this profound jurist and honest judge further observes: "The weight of authority is then in favor of the stipulation of release," and, "I am free to say that, if the question were entirely new, and many estates had not passed upon the faith of such assignment, the strong inclination of my mind would be against the validity of them. As it is, I yield without reluctance, to what seems the tone of authority in favor of them."

In this state, as has been already observed, the question is still open, both as regards an assignment containing a provision postponing the litigant creditor to others, and the validity of such a stipulation of release; the objection alluded to by Justice Story does not exist here, and his reasoning, therefore, in favor of sustaining the clause of release, instead of supporting the peculiar trust in this case, is conclusive against validity. What is the intent apparent upon the deed itself? Is it not to coerce the creditors to a settlement on the debtor's own terms, by embarrassing and delaying their remedy? In the simple interpretation of the language employed in the trust, is it any more or less than this: a surrender of all the property of the co-partnership, for the ostensible benefit of all the creditors, but, at the same time locking it up, from all such as shall bring suit, and without suit making the partial payment of the great body of the creditors dependent upon a distant and an uncertain contingency. Is not this exacting a stipulation in favor of himself and his co-partner, protecting their future acquisitions from future suits, by shielding them until the lapse of time would bar the claims of their creditors? Does not such a provision, if held valid, defeat their rights, unless they are willing to take what the debtor pleases—await the contingency of the trust, and delay and refrain from bringing suit?

In Austin v. Bell [20 Johns. 442], the supreme court of New York held: "That a deed which does not fairly devote all the property, but reserves a favor to the assigning debtor, unless the creditors shall assent to his terms, is void, as against the statute of frauds."

It is not, it would seem, the reservation of a portion to himself, that alone constitutes the fraud, although it constitutes a prominent badge of fraud; but, the prescription of the terms by the creditor, showing the intent to hinder and delay. But in this case, Judge Spencer approbates the decision of Hyslop v. Clarke [14 Johns. 458], which was an assignment of all the property, without such reservation, but with a stipulation of release; and in Seaving v. Brinkerhoff [5 Johns. Ch. 329], Chancellor Kent held: "That such an assignment with such a stipulation of release was, on that account, fraudulent and void." If a stipulation reserving a portion of the estate to himself is a badge of fraud, as connected with the prescription of terms upon the creditors, compelling their assent, certainly a stipulation which protects his future acquisitions from suit, is obnoxious to a like objection. In the one case, he locks up a portion of what he now has. In the other, he locks up all that he may ever acquire, from the just demands of his creditors.

In the case of Grover v. Wakeman [11 Wend. 187, Judge Sutherland, in a very elaborate, learned, and conclusive opinion, in which he reviews all the preceding cases in New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts, pronounces the decision of the court of errors of New York, that such assignments, containing a provision of release by creditors, in order to entitle them to share in the assigned property, are void. Mr. Justice Sutherland's opinion is rightly considered the opinion of the court, as the resolution declaring the assignment void, incorporating the decision of, and adopted by the court, was proposed by him, after solemn consideration, and his views sustained by Judges Nelson and Savage, who, with him, then composed the supreme court of New York, as also by Senator Tracy, in a most lucid exposition of the whole doctrine.

In the case of Ingraham v. Wheeler [6 Conn. 277], the supreme court of Connecticut pronounced such a stipulation fraudulent and void, mainly on the principle that it confined the distribution of the property to the releasing creditors. The same principle was also decided in Ohio.

From a review of all these cases, and the careful consideration of the character and object of the assignment of Bennett, of the effects of Bennett & Ford, to the defendant Hill, exhibited in his answer of the 20th October, 1846, I cannot arrive at any other conclusion, but that the assignment was made with the intent to hinder, and delay, and defraud creditors of their lawful suits, and especially Marsh & Compton, the complainants, and is therefore void.

Motion refused.

Case No. 9,111.

MARSH et al. v. BURROUGHS et al.

SCOTT v. SAME.

[1 Cent. Law J. 125.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Georgia. Nov. Term, 1873.

COMPUTATION OF TIME UNDER STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS — LIMITATION IN FAVOR OF ADMINISTRATORS — STATUTE FIXING BAR WHERE CAUSE OF ACTION HAS ALREADY ACCRUED — TWELVE MONTHS EXEMPTION IN FAVOR OF ADMINISTRATORS — COMPUTATION OF TIME UNDER THE TWO STATUTES.

1. On the 16th day of March, 1869, the legislature of Georgia passed an act providing that all suits of whatever nature, in which the cause of action accrued prior to the 1st day of June, 1865, should be barred unless brought by the 1st day of January, 1870. [Laws 1869, p. 133.] The period thus allowed for bringing suits was nine months and fifteen days. This is held to be a reasonable period in ordinary cases.

2. By the Georgia Code, § 2548, an administrator is not liable to suit until one year from the date of his qualification. It is held that this exemption is not repealed by the act of March 16, 1869. If the latter act has such an effect, it would probably be in contravention of the constitution of the United States; but as it does not, it is a valid enactment.

3. In computing the time which will bar an action with reference to these two statutes, it is held that the administrator is entitled, first to the one year's exemption allowed by section 2548 of the Code, and then that the creditor of the estate is entitled to the nine months and fifteen days of the act of March 16, 1869, added thereto, in which to bring his suit; although the time within which suit may be brought may thereby be extended beyond the 1st day of January, 1870.

[These were suits by William N. Marsh and others against Burroughs and others, and Thomas R. Mills, Jr., administrator with the will annexed of George Hall, deceased, and by Levi H. B. Scott against the same. For two similar cases by the same plaintiffs, previously decided, see Cases Nos. 6,203 and 9,112.]

A. W. Stone and A. T. Akerman, for plaintiffs.

Hartridge & Chisholm, for defendants.

ERSKINE, District Judge. The questions presented being similar, the cases were argued in connection with each other. These suits are two of the numerous cases which have, under various phases, been pending here for years, and known as the "Bank Cases." Many of these cases have from time to time been disposed of by decrees, judgments or compromises. But the question now presented is quite different from any which has hitherto come before the court for determination. No special statement of the contents of the bill or the declaration is necessary to an understanding of the questions given for decision. Suffice it to say that the bill prays a decree for seventy-five thousand dollars against the estate of the deceased for unpaid subscription upon his stock in the Merchants' and Planters' Bank; and in the common law action, the plaintiff demands one hundred thousand dollars as due to him as a holder of notes or bills of this bank—the estate of the deceased being, as is alleged, liable for the same.

All questions except the precise one presented for adjudication may be left out of view. Two pleas in bar are before me,—one to the bill, and the other to the declaration. They are substantially alike, and are based upon the act of the general assembly of this state, approved March 16, 1869. The statute is entitled: "An act in relation to the statute of limitations, and other purposes." The complainant (Marsh) filed exceptions to the plea put in to the bill, and Scott demurred to the plea in bar to his action. The pleas allege that the supposed causes of action accrued prior to the 1st of June, 1865, and that they did not accrue subsequently to that period; and this allegation is not controverted by Marsh or by Scott in their pleadings.

The third section of the act is as follows: "That all actions on bonds or other instruments under seal, and all suits for the enforcement of rights accruing to individuals or corporations, under the statutes or acts of incorporations, or in any way by operation of law, which have accrued prior to 1st of June, 1865, not now barred, shall be brought by the 1st of January, 1870; or the right of the party plaintiff or claimant, and all right of action for its enforcement, shall be forever barred."

Section 4. "That all actions on promissory notes, bills of exchange or other simple contracts in writing, and all actions upon open accounts, or for breach of any contract, not under the hand of the party sought to be charged, or upon any implied assumpsit or undertaking, which accrued on a contract which was made prior to 1st June, 1865, not now barred, shall be brought by 1st January, (1870) next after the passage of this act, or the right of the party, plaintiff or claimant, and all right of action for its enforcement, shall be forever barred."

Section 5 relates to all actions against administrators, trustees, etc., which accrued prior to 1st June, 1865, and enacts that they shall be brought by 1st January, 1870; and section 6 declares that there shall be no recovery on any liability whatsoever which accrued prior to 1st June, 1865, where the action is not brought by 1st January, 1870. Section 9 repeals conflicting laws.

Turning to section 2530 of the Code, there it is declared that "the administrator shall be allowed twelve months from the date of his qualification to ascertain the condition of the estate." Section 2548 enacts that, "No suit to recover a debt due by the decedent shall be commenced against the administrator until the expiration of twelve months from his qualification."

Hall, domiciled in Connecticut, died there in the autumn of 1868, testate, leaving real estate in Georgia disposed of by his will. There was no representation here until the 8th of April, 1869, when the defendant Mills, was appointed temporary administrator and he held this office until the 7th of June, 1869, when permanent letters were granted to him as administrator with the will annexed. The bill in equity referred to was filed by Marsh, against one Burroughs and others, on the 24th of September, 1868, but Mills was not made a party to the bill until the 7th of August, 1871. On the 30th of December, 1870, Scott brought the action at law against Mills, as administrator, as aforesaid.

Adverting to the act of March 16, 1869, it will be seen that from its date to the 1st of January, 1870, the time prefixed by the statute for the closing of the limitation is nine months and fifteen days, and this court has (per ERSKINE, J.) ruled, on more than one occasion, that this is a reasonable period of time within which a creditor, whose right of action accrued anterior to the 1st of June, 1865, and which was current on the 16th of March, 1869, may institute his suit. Whether the general rule as laid down by the court, is attended with exceptions, I will endeavor to indicate. As just mentioned, Mills received his permanent appointment on the 7th of June, 1869, two months and twenty-one days after the passage of the limitation act, and, consequently, nearly seven months before the 1st of January, 1870; and it was not, until the 7th of August, 1871, that he was brought before this court as a defendant in the equity suit. This was two years and two months subsequent to the granting of the permanent letters, and fourteen months subsequent to the expiration of the time of exemption from suit given to an administrator by section 2548 of the Code.

It was insisted by defendant that the twelve months' protection from pursuit by action, allowed to an administrator, was repealed by act of March 16, 1869; but if not so, still the cause of complaint, alleged in the bill against Mills, was nevertheless barred on the 7th of August, 1871, the date on which he was made a defendant. Because, as was contended, the twelve months barred to the administrator expired on the 7th of June, 1870, and allowing nine months and fifteen days to be added to the twelve months, that still the complainant was not within time, for he did not proceed against Mills until the 7th of August, 1871, some four or five months after the bar had attached.

For the complainant it was argued that the twelve months' exemption was not repealed by the act of March 16, 1869; but, if repealed such repeal is ineffectual to bar the suit of complainant, for this would impair the obligation of contracts. And it was correctly said that no state constitution or statute had authority to impair the obligation of antecedent contracts.

I will first direct my attention to the constitutional question made by the counsel for complainant. As already shown, Hall was deceased when the act of March 16, 1869, was passed, and no administration was taken out until nearly three months after the date of this enactment. It cannot, I apprehend, be safely contended that when a party has a subsisting right of action which will be barred by a certain time, that he is compellable to institute proceedings to recover its fruits before the last day of the limitation. Assuming the legal correctness of this, it follows that Marsh had at least to the last day of 1869 in which to bring his suit against Mills. Now suppose Hall had not died until, say, the middle of December, 1869, and the twelve months' exemption stood repealed, Marsh would be environed with unsurmountable evils and difficulties, which he could not have foreseen, and so avoided. As no administrator could have been qualified by the ordinary intermediate the death of Hall and the period fixed for the bar, Marsh's dilemma would have been this: The statute says, sue by the 1st of January, 1870, and the only reply he could make is, there is no one subject by law to answer the writ of subpoena. If the case under consideration was like the suppositive one, I should be inclined to hold a state statute that produced such a consequence violative of the constitution of the United States; for by thus depriving a party of all remedy, it works a forfeiture of his rights, without fault on his part. But there was a legal representative of Hall, in Mills, the administrator with the will annexed, and who had qualified as such seven months or a little less anterior to the 1st of January, 1870; and if the twelve months' exemption from suit has been repealed by the act of March 16, 1869, he could have been sued before the right of action would have been barred. This fact, however, in its result, would be very much like class legislation, so far, at least as Marsh would be affected; for as there was no representative of the estate of Hall for nearly three months after the passage of the act of March 16, 1869, the nine months and fifteen days allowed to sue in would be diminished to less than seven. Const. Ga. art. 1, § 26. Moreover, whether this would be reasonable time in which to bring civil suits or be barred, I am not called upon to determine. But has the twelve months exempted to an administrator by section 2548 of the Code been repealed? This is the prime question. Mr. Justice McLean, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of the United States in McClung v. Silliman, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 270, said: "Under this statute (section 24 of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 85]) the acts of limitations of the several states, where no special provision has been made by congress form a rule of decision in the courts of the United States, and the same effect is given to them as is given in the state courts." The rule of action is formed in the different states as it may have been adopted by legislation or a course of judicial decisions. The rule of decision must be found in the local laws, written or unwritten.

If the act of March 16, 1869, does not repeal the twelve months' exemption from suit, allowed to administrators, and after a careful consideration of the entire statute, I think it does not repeal the exemption given to administrators; therefore, I am of the opinion that it is a valid law, and in consonance with the constitution of the United States. The following case—Moravian Seminary v. Atwood et al.—was recently decided by the supreme court of Georgia, Tripp, J., pronouncing the opinion: "An account was contracted and due in September, 1862. Administration was granted on the estate of the debtor in September, 1869, it not appearing on the record when he died. Suit was instituted on the account in October, 1871. Held, that the plaintiff was barred by the statute of limitations of March 16, 1869."

Even though the plaintiff may not have been entitled to have brought suit against the administrator by the 1st of January, 1870, which we do not determine, the spirit and equity of the statute required that it should have been commenced within a period after twelve months from the grant of administration which was equal to the time allowed by the statute for bringing suits on such debts to wit: from the date of the passage of the act to the 1st of January, 1870. Mills, not having been made a party defendant to the bill filed on the 24th September, 1868, by Marsh against Burroughs and others, until after the expiration of the nine months and fifteen days immediately following the twelve months' exemption from suit given an administrator by the Code, I overrule the exceptions filed by the complainant, and decree the plea to be a full bar to the bill; and it is further ordered that the bill be dismissed as to Mills at cost of complainant.

The common law action having been instituted by Scott against Mills on the 30th of December, 1870, and within the nine months and fifteen days immediately following the twelve months' exemption from action allowed to an administrator by the Code, it is ordered and adjudged that the demurrer to the plea in bar be sustained.

[NOTE. From the judgment rendered in the action at law the defendants sued out a writ of error in the supreme court. Here an order was entered remanding the case, with directions to grant a new trial unless the plaintiff consent to remit from the judgment the excess over $40,000. Mills v. Scott, 99 U. S. 25.]

MARSH et al. v. BURROUGHS et al.

Circuit Court, S. D. Georgia. April Term, 1871.

CREDITOR'S BILL — CORPORATIONS — UNPAID SUBSCRIPTIONS—JUDGMENT—WHEN CONCLUSIVE—CONSTITUTION OF STATE—HOW VIEWED.

1. A judgment creditor, who has exhausted his legal remedy by execution returned nulla bona, may alone, or with other judgment creditors, file a bill against persons holding property of the debtor, which on account of fraud, or the existence of a trust, cannot be reached by the execution.

[Cited in Thompson v. Reno Sav. Bank, 19 Nev. 103, 7 Pac. 72; Tatum v. Rosenthal, 95 Cal. 129, 30 Pac. 137.]

2. In case a fund can only be divided satisfactorily amongst a certain class of persons, it is necessary to frame the decree in such a manner as that all those persons may be brought in for their destributive shares; but even then the bill may often be filed by any one of them on his own behalf.

[Cited in Tatum v. Rosenthal, 95 Cal. 129, 30 Pac. 137.]

3. It is only when it appears that a distribution of such fund must be made, that a decree will be entered for the benefit of all.

4. A judgment creditor, who has exhausted his legal remedy, may pursue in a court of equity any equitable interest, trust or demand of his debtor, in whosesoever hands it may be. If a party thus reached has a remedy over against others for contribution or indemnity, it will be no defense to the primary suit against him, that they are not parties.

5. Where a debtor, as in case of a bank, has a right to call for payment of stock subscriptions, and does not choose to exercise it, equity, at the instance of creditors, will exercise it for him.

6. When a person subscribes stock, and his subscription is accepted, it is not a mere power in the bank, but its right to call in the money, and it is the right of the stockholder to pay it; he is not obliged to wait until a call is made.

7. Unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of a company are corporate property, constituting a trust fund which can be reached by the creditors in a court of equity.

[Cited in Lewis' Adm'r v. Glenn, 84 Va. 971, 6 S. E. 878.]

8. The amount subscribed, and not the sums actually paid in, is the capital stock of the company.

9. The equity of the right in the bank to sue is attendant on the legal right vested in the holder of the bills as such; it goes with it as an incident.

10. When a judgment creditor of a bank has exhausted his remedy at law, and seeks in equity to enforce payment of stock subscriptions, the stockholders cannot go behind the judgment rendered against the bank and question the original cause of action, unless they can show collusion between the creditor and the bank, for the purpose of defrauding them.

[Cited in Wetherbee v. Baker, 35 N. J. Eq. 507; Baines v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 583, 592, 27 Pac. 676, and 30 Pac. 776.]

11. The fact, that when the state of Georgia applied for readmission to the Union, under the constitution of 1868, congress imposed certain conditions, does not make that constitution an act of congress, or tantamount to such an act. See Hatch v. Burroughs [Case No. 6,203].

12. The question, as to whether the adoption of the constitution of the state of Georgia of 1868 was the act of the people of the state, is a political one, in which the courts must follow the action of the political department of the government.

13. A state can no more pass a law violating a contract by means of a convention, than it can by means of a legislature; and a constitution adopted by a state, with a view to its admission or readmission, or after its admission into the Union, must be regarded as a law of the state, and amenable to the prohibitory clauses of the constitution of the United States. See Gray v. Davis [Case No. 5,715].

14. The final portion of article 5, § 16, subd. 1, of the constitution of Georgia, of 1868, which throws the burden of proof on the plaintiff to show that bills sued on have never been used in aid of the Rebellion, if only the defendant swears that he has reason to believe that they were so used, is not constitutional.

15. The fact, that holders of unpaid stock may have severally redeemed their share of the bills of the bank, does not release them from liability for the amount due on their stock subscriptions.

In equity. Submitted for final decree upon the pleadings and evidence.

[This was one of a number of proceedings brought both at law and in equity by William N. Marsh and others against the stockholders of the Merchants' & Planters' Bank of Savannah to enforce the payment of claims against the bank. Wm. Daugherty and A. W. Stone, for complainants.

Wm. Law, T. E. Lloyd, and W. S. Basinger, for defendants.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. This bill is filed by certain billholders of the Merchants' and Planters' Bank of Savannah, who have obtained judgments against the bank for the amount of bills held by them against certain stockholders of the bank, who have not paid in full their subscriptions of stock, seeking a decree against the defendants to the amount of their unpaid subscriptions, for the payment of the said judgment. The bank was chartered by an act of the assembly of the state of Georgia, approved February 13, 1854, by which certain persons therein named, their associates and successors, were incorporated by the name of the Merchants' and Planters' Bank, to be located at Savannah, with the usual powers given to such institutions. By the second section of the charter it was declared that the capital of the bank should be two millions of dollars, to be divided into twenty thousand shares of one hundred dollars each, and that so soon as ten per cent. of said capital was subscribed and paid in in specie, or specie funds, it should be the duty of the commissioners named in the act to call a meeting and organize the bank by the election of directors. The directors were empowered to appoint a president and other officers. By the seventh section the president and directors, after the first installment on subscriptions to the amount of two hundred thousand dollars had been paid in, were empowered to call in further installments of not over twenty per cent. at any one time, by giving at least sixty days' notice of said call. On failure to pay up a call the shares might be forfeited. By the 9th section, it was declared that the total amount of the debts should not, at any time, exceed three times the amount of the capital stock actually paid in, over and above the amount of specie actually deposited in the vaults for safe keeping. By the 15th section, it was declared that the persons and property of the stockholders should at all times be liable, pledged and bound for the redemption of bills and notes at any time issued, in proportion to the number of shares that each individual and corporation might hold and possess.

The bill alleges that the capital stock of the bank was all duly subscribed and the bank duly organized shortly after its incorporation, and that it went into operation, issued bills, received deposits and carried on a general banking business; that the complainants severally became lawful owners and holders of the bills of the bank, to wit: Scott, Zerega & Co., to the amount of $62,500, which were presented to the president and cashier in March, 1867, and were not paid, and the other complainants other amounts, which were presented at or about the same time with like result; that thereupon the complainants separately instituted actions at law on their bills against the bank, and on the 25th of November, 1867, recovered judgments as follows: Scott, Zerega & Co., for $71,789.35; Frisbee & Roberts, for $33,134.75; Wm. N. Marsh, for $57,600.63; George W. Hatch, for $81,271.20; Levi H. B. Scott, for $120,789.36; and that executions were issued in all the judgments and returned "nulla bona" on the 23d of May, 1868. The bill alleges that the bank had become insolvent, and had assigned its assets to Hiram Roberts, the president, in trust for the benefit of its creditors; but that the assets assigned would not pay more than ten cents on the dollar of its indebtedness, which amounted to a million of dollars or thereabouts. As an excuse for not joining other complainants, the bill alleges that the circulation of the bank was held in every state of the Union by innumerable unknown persons; and as an excuse for not making all the stockholders defendants, it alleges that there are 20,000 shares of stock held by a great number of stockholders residing in different states—some insolvent, some dead, etc. The bill then alleges that the defendants are stockholders, and states the number of shares held by each, and the amount paid thereon, and the amount still unpaid, and claims that the unpaid stock is a trust fund applicable to the payment of the debts of the bank, inasmuch as the debts cannot be paid by the assets. The bill prays that this may be so decreed, and that the defendants may be required to pay to the complainants, or into court, or in some other manner, the several amounts so in their hands respectively, and that the same may be applied to the payment and satisfaction of the bills held by the complainants.

By an amended bill, they allege that they purchased the bills prior to January 1, 1867, in a fair course of trade, for a valuable consideration, and without any notice that they had been used in aid of the rebellion or for any other illegal purpose. The principal facts stated in the bill are not disputed. The defendants, by their answers and in argument, set up various grounds of defense, which I will proceed to examine.

1. It is objected that the bill is defective for want of parties, both complainant and defendant; that it should have been filed by, or in behalf of, all the creditors, because all are interested in the funds—and against all the stockholders, because all are bound to contribute pro rata. As to the complainants, it has long been settled that a judgment creditor who has exhausted his legal remedy, by execution returned "nulla bona," may alone, or with other judgment creditors, file a bill against persons holding property of the debtor which, on account of fraud or the existence of a trust, cannot be reached by execution. 2 Kent, Comm. 443, and notes; McDermutt v. Strong, 4 Johns. Ch. 687; [Hadden v. Spader, 20 Johns. 554;] [2] Spader v. Davis, 5 Johns. Ch. 280; Lentilhon v. Moffat, 1 Edw. Ch. 451; Dix v. Briggs, 9 Paige, 595; Storm v. Waddell, 2 Sandf. Ch. 494; [Tappan v. Evans, 11 N. H. 311;] [2] Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 380; Dunphy v. Kleinschmidt, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 610. Where a case exists in which a fund can only be divided satisfactorily among a certain class of persons, it is necessary to frame the decree in such a manner as that all those persons may be brought in for their distributive shares; but even then, the bill may often be filed by any one of them on his own behalf. It is only when it appears to the court by the subsequent pleadings, or otherwise, that a distribution must be made (as where an executor pleads want of sufficient assets), that a decree will be made for the benefit of all. In this case, what law compels an equal distribution of the fund sought to be reached amongst all the creditors? The assets in the hands of the assignee are subjected to such a law, because they have been granted to him in trust for all creditors equally. But it is conceded that the unpaid capital stock is not subject to the assignment. If subjected to the demands of the complainants as judgment creditors, it will be exonerated, pro tanto, from all further demands. As to the nonjoinder of necessary defendants, the same authorities above quoted may be cited. A judgment creditor, who has exhausted his legal remedy, may pursue, in a court of equity, any equitable interest, trust or demand of his debtor, in whosesoever hands it may be. And if the party thus reached has a remedy over against other parties for contribution or indemnity, it will be no defense to the primary suit against him that they are not parties. If a creditor were to be stayed until all such parties could be made to contribute their proportionate shares of the liability, he might never get his money.

2. It is contended that the unpaid subscriptions of capital stock are not assets for the payment of debts, either legal or equitable; that they exist merely as possibilities; that they are not a debt due, having never been called in; that no one can call them in but the directors; and in them it is a mere discretionary power, which cannot be exercised, either by the assignee, the receiver, or the court itself, and cannot be assigned; that said unpaid subscriptions are no part of the capital stock of the bank; and that the real capital stock is what has been called in, namely $535,000, and not $2,000,000. This position may be somewhat plausible, but it is not sound. It is not a mere power vested in the bank to make further calls. It is a right; and where a debtor has such a right and does not choose to exercise it, equity, at the instance of creditors, will exercise it for him. When a stockholder subscribes stock, and his subscription is accepted, it is not only the right of the bank to call in the money, but it is the right of the stockholder to pay it. The mode of calling it in, prescribed by the charter, is a mere form of remedy given to the bank to enforce the subscription, usually followed by forfeiture for nonpayment, if the bank so choose. But the stockholder is not obliged to wait until a call is made upon him. He may pay in at any time; and if the business of the bank were very profitable, no doubt he would avail himself of the opportunity. Such a right cannot be described as a mere power on the part of the bank, to be exercised or not, as it chooses, and dependent for its existence on the personal discretion of the directors. The same objections were made in the case of the Planters' and Mechanics' Bank of Columbus, and were overruled by the supreme court of this state in Hightower v. Thornton, 8 Ga. 486, and it was there held that unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of a company are corporate property, constituting a trust fund, which can be reached by the creditors in a court of equity; and that the amount subscribed, and not the sums actually paid in, is the capital stock of a company. As to the position that the equity of the creditor is a mere right to sue, and is not therefore assignable, and could not be assigned to complainants, it is sufficient to say that the equity is attendant upon the legal right vested in the holder of the bills as such. It goes with that as an incident, and does not belong to that class of mere rights of action which become separated from the thing out of which they grew, and attach to the person only—as the right to sue for a trespass committed and the like.

3. The next point made is, that if the unpaid subscriptions are indeed assets for the payment of debts, then they have been assigned, and are in the receiver's hands, and must be collected and administered by him for the equal benefit of all the creditors under the trust of the assignment. But an examination of the assignment will show that it does not assume to convey these subscriptions; but on the contrary specifically assigns those things which are set out in a schedule annexed to the assignment, and does not contain any general words sufficiently comprehensive to cover stock subscriptions. And as the assignment is a common law instrument, deriving no extraneous efficacy from the statute law of Georgia, except the general statute which gives assignability to bonds, specialties and other contracts in writing for the payment of money, or any article of property, judgments and executions (Code, § 2725), it cannot be construed to reach the claims in question. Besides, the attitude of the bank, its directors and stockholders, from the first, has been inconsistent with the idea that these unpaid subscriptions were embraced in the assignment. It is just what they always have opposed and denied.

4. Another point quite strenuously urged by the defendants is, that the bills held by the complainants were issued directly to the Confederate States government, and to the state of Georgia during the Rebellion, and in aid thereof. The answers severally allege this fact, and the only evidence offered by complainants to rebut it is proof that they purchased the bills in open market, in regular course for value paid, without any notice or suspicion that they were issued for any illegal purpose. The defendants, therefore, rely on the article 5, § 16, subd. 1, of the constitution of 1868, which not only nullifies all contracts made during the rebellion, in aid thereof, but all bonds, deeds, promissory notes, bills or other evidences of debt, made in connection with such contracts, or as the consideration therefor, or in furtherance thereof; and declares that when the defendant will make a plea, supported by his affidavit, that he has good reason to believe that the obligation or evidence of the indebtedness on which the suit is predicated, or some part thereof, has been given or used for the illegal purpose aforesaid, the burden of proof shall be upon the plaintiff to satisfy the court and jury that it is not founded upon, or in any way connected with, any such illegal contract, and has not been used in aid of the Rebellion; and the date of the bill, etc., shall not be evidence that it has or has not, since its date, been issued, transferred or used in aid of the Rebellion.

Now, in reference to this point, it is to be observed that it does not fairly arise in the case. The bill of complaint is founded on certain judgments and executions in favor of the complainants, which were recovered in 1867. Had any such defense, as is indicated by the answers existed, it should have been made to the actions at law; for, although the constitution did not then exist, yet it would have been a good defense to have shown that the bills were issued in aid of the Rebellion, and that the plaintiffs knew it, or had reason to know it. Not being set up then, it cannot be set up now. The stockholders of the bank cannot ask to go behind the judgments rendered against the bank, and question the original cause of action, unless they can show collusion between the plaintiffs and the bank, entered into for the purpose of defrauding the stockholders. But even if the question were open I could not yield to the force of the defendants' argument. They contend that the constitution of 1868 has all the force and effect of an act of congress, and, therefore, is not obnoxious to that clause of the constitution of the United States which declares that no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of a contract; that the constitution of 1868 has the force and effect of an act of congress, they insist, because it was adopted under the reconstruction acts, under military supervision, and not by the free consent and express will of the people of Georgia, and because, after its adoption by the convention, it was revised by congress and certain parts were struck out—or, at least, congress made it a condition of admission that they should be struck out—and that the legislature should ratify the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States (see Act June 25, 1868; 15 Stat. 73); and that this was, in effect, an approval and adoption by congress of the parts not excepted to.

I cannot concur in this view. What was the precise status of Georgia after the war, and before its readmission into the Union, with all the normal relations of a state, will, perhaps, never be defined to the satisfaction of all. But that some sort of rehabilitation was necessary in order that Georgia might occupy her old position in the Union—that the adoption of a new constitution was one of the necessary things to be done, and that an act of the national authority, admitting Georgia to the representation and status of a state in harmonious relations with the Union, was also a necessary thing to be done—seem to be propositions that can hardly admit of a doubt. This conceded, how can it be said that the adoption of the constitution of 1868 was not the act of the people of Georgia? The courts cannot do otherwise than regard it as such. This is a political question in which the courts must follow the action of the political department of the government. To adopt any other course would be to introduce the greatest confusion. Congress, as was its right, regulated the elective franchise. There was no other legal authority to do it. The executive had no such authority. The state government of Georgia was a mere provisional one, and could not legally do it. No interference with the freedom of elections was interposed; on the contrary, the general government took measures to prevent any such interference. All that congress had to do, in relation to the constitution, when the state applied for readmission, was to impose certain conditions, to wit: That certain unwise clauses should be left out of the constitution, and that the legislature should ratify the fourteenth amendment. This was done. But Georgia was not compelled to do it. She could do as she pleased. It was at her own option. How can this possibly make the constitution an act of congress, or tantamount to such an act?

Then, is a provision in a state constitution which impairs the obligation of a contract void? I have no doubt on the subject. A state can no more pass a law violating a contract, by means of a convention than it can by means of a legislature; and a constitution adopted by a state, either after its admission, or with a view to its admission or readmission into the Union, must be regarded as a law of the state, and amenable to the prohibitory clauses of the constitution of the United States. Then, looking at the constitution of 1868, does the clause relied on impair the obligation of a contract? The first part of the clause, which declares void all contracts made in aid of the Rebellion, only expresses what would be the law without any declaration on the subject. The second part, which avoids the instruments in whosesoever hands they may come, when applied to such instruments as bank bills, is more questionable. But the final portion, which throws the burden of proof on the plaintiff to show that the bills have never been used in aid of the Rebellion, if only the defendant will swear that he has reason to believe that they were so used, imposes upon the plaintiff an impossibility, and is tantamount to destroying the contract on the simple oath of the defendant as to his belief. I cannot think that such a provision is constitutional.

5. But the defendants make still another point, namely: that they have severally redeemed their shares of the bills of the bank, and have them ready to show as offsets to their liability as stockholders. This part of the answer relates only to the personal liability of all stockholders for the debts of the bank, under the fifteenth section of the charter, and not to their liability for unpaid subscriptions to stock. But, supposing the answer was right in form, could the defendants set up this defense to the bill? They do not show how they procured the bills. They have not recovered judgment on them. They may be unable to do so. The bills they hold may be open to the very objections they raise against the bills held by the complainants. They would not be permitted to pay up their subscriptions, if called on by the bank, in its old, depreciated currency. The most they can do with these bills, it seems to me, is to present them to the receiver for their pro rata share of the assets of the bank; or, if they can recover judgment on them, to pursue the course which has been pursued by the complainants, if it is competent for them to sue other stockholders when they themselves are owing the bank.

For these reasons, I think a decree must be made in favor of the complainants, the form of which, on reflection, I think should be that the defendants should severally pay to the complainants the amounts due by them for unpaid stock, so far as may be necessary to satisfy the amount of the complainants' judgments, interest and costs. It was suggested that those who had paid the least per centage on their stock should be first called upon, but I think all are equally liable to pay what they have not paid on their subscriptions; and, although the directors might be required to pursue that order, I do not think the court is bound to follow the directions marked out for the directors. It was also suggested that the decree should be based on a settlement and distribution of the fund in the hands of the receiver, and should make the defendants liable only for such balance as might be due to the complainants after receiving their share of that fund; but this would postpone the complainants indefinitely, and it seems to be generally conceded that the assets in the receiver's hands are not sufficient to pay the other creditors.

Decree for the complainants.

[NOTE. At a later date the court heard two of these cases together,—a case at law and one in equity. They were heard upon demurrer to plea in bar in both cases. The plea to the bill was sustained, but the plea to the declaration was held not sufficient. Case No. 9,111. In the law case the defendants sued out a writ of error in the supreme court, when the judgment of the circuit court was reversed, and a new trial nisi ordered. Mills v. Scott, 99 U. S. 25.]

MARSH v. CHARLESTON.

[1 Hughes, 288.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. South Carolina. 1877.

CORPORATIONS—UNPAID STOCK—CREDITOR—STATUTORY LIABILITY—SUIT AT LAW—JOINDER OF CREDITORS.

Where the charter of a bank makes each stockholder liable to twice the amount of his shares for its debts, and a judgment creditor sues at law a single shareholder who owns nearly all the shares, and it does not appear from the complaint that there are any other creditors besides the complainant, held, on demurrer, that although the case might be different if there were more than this one creditor, yet, it not appearing that there were other creditors, the demurrer must be overruled.

[This was an action by Fennimore C. Marsh against the city council of Charleston. Heard on demurrer.]

Before WAITE, Circuit Justice, and BOND, Circuit Judge.

WAITE, Circuit Justice. The plaintiff is a judgment creditor of the State Bank in the sum of $40,127.25, and the defendant a stockholder to the amount of $39,800. The charter of the bank provides, that "in case of the failure of the bank, each stockholder . . . . shall be liable and held bound individually for any sum not exceeding twice the amount of his . . . . share or shares." The bank has failed, and the plaintiff seeks in this action at law to charge the defendant, under this provision of the charter, with the payment of his judgment. It does not appear in the case as presented, that there are any other creditors of the bank or any other stockholders.

The defendant has demurred to the complaint, and, in support of his demurrer, contends that the individual liability of stockholders, as defined and created by this charter, cannot be enforced by one creditor for his own exclusive use to the injury of others.

If it anywhere appeared in the complaint, either by direct averment or fair legal inference, that there were other creditors of the bank, and that the assets, including the liabilities of the stockholders, were not sufficient to pay all in full, we should sustain the demurrer. In our opinion, it was not the intention of the legislature, by this provision, to create a liability to the separate creditors, which one could enforce to the injury of another. The undertaking assumed by the stockholders is not to pay debts, but to such sums, not exceeding the amounts of their respective shares, as should be necessary under the circumstances. Undoubtedly the object was to furnish the creditors with additional security, and to have the payments, when made, applied to the discharge of the debts. The obligation, too, is one that may be enforced by the creditors, but as it is to or for all the creditors, and not any one alone, it must, as we think, be enforced by or for all. The form of action employed, therefore, should be one adapted to the protection of all.

As it does not now appear that there is any creditor of the bank except the one who sues, we cannot say that this form of action is not adapted to the circumstances of this case. The demurrer is therefore overruled, with leave to the defendant to avail himself of his proposed defence by answer.

MARSH v. DODGE & STEVENSON MANUF'G CO.

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. 1873.

PATENTS — CLAIM TO RESULT — LOCATION OF APPARATUS — COMBINATION — NEW DEVICES — NEW AND USEFUL RESULT — REVOLVING RAKE.

1. A claim to a result is not in itself patentable.

2. A claim can not be sustained which covers every mode or means by which certain advantages can be secured in a harvester.

3. The mere location of an old apparatus on a machine is not patentable.

[Cited in Gilbert & Barker Manuf'g Co. v. Tirrell, Case No. 5,417; Gilbert & Barker Manuf'g Co. v. Walworth Manuf'g Co., Id. 5,418.]

4. If such new location produced a new combination of devices, producing a new result, it is patentable.

[Cited in Carstaedt v. U. S. Corset Co., Case No. 2,467; Gilbert & Barker Manuf'g Co. v. Tirrell, Id. 5,417; Gilbert & Barker Manuf'g Co. v. Walworth Manuf'g Co., Id. 5,418.]

5. If such change of location requires new devices, and a new and useful result is produced, then the location in combination with the devices—the means by which the result is produced, not the result itself—is patentable.

[Cited in Gilbert & Barker Manuf'g Co. v. Tirrell, Case No. 5,417; Gilbert & Barker Manuf'g Co. v. Walworth Manuf'g Co., Id. 5,418.]

6. In these cases there is no infringement, unless the devices, by which the result is produced, are used.

7. The revolving-rake made by the Dodge-Stevenson Company does not infringe the Marsh patent.

Final hearing on pleadings and proofs.

Suit brought on reissued letters patent, granted James S. Marsh, for "improvement in harvesters," September 11, 1866, No. 2,354, as a reissue of the patent [No. 37,630] granted him February 10, 1863.

The first engraving shows the machine as patented by Marsh. The second shows the machine as afterward improved by him, and described in a later patent.

Jas. O. Parker and D. Wright, for complainant.

Geo. Harding, for defendant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. Upon a careful and protracted examination of the evidence, and consideration of the views exhibited in the elaborate printed arguments of the counsel for the respective parties, my conclusion is, that the defendants do not infringe the patent of the complainant for a raking and reeling apparatus for a reaping-machine in any feature which was new, and which the patent, properly construed, legally secures to the patentee.

The claims which it is alleged that the defendant impinges are the first, second, third, fourth, seventh, seventeenth, and eighteenth.

"1. The combined raking and reeling apparatus which rotates around a vertical shaft, when its arms adjust themselves successively from a horizontal to a vertical position, and when the combined apparatus is so located that its arms swing on hinges, which are below the highest point of the drive-wheel, and the extent of the sweep of any one of the arms does not interfere with a driver seated upon any part of the draft-frame, which is outside of the drive-wheel, substantially as described.

"2. The construction and adaptation of a combined rake and reel, which revolves entirely around a vertical center, so that it may be applied to the harvester at a point which is on the inner side of the drive-wheel, and below the highest point of said wheel, substantially as described.

"3. Locating the hinges of the respective arms of the combined rake and reel around a center, which is on the inner side of the drive-wheel and below the top of said wheel, substantially as described.

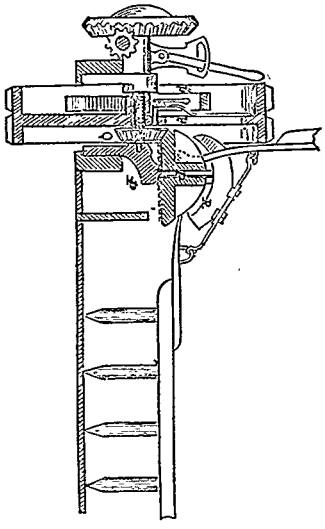
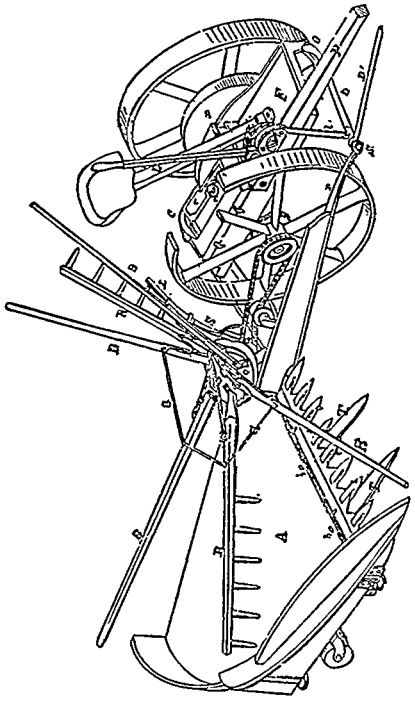
No. 1.



No. 2.



"4. Attaching each of the respective arms of the combined rake and reel to a hinge or pivot, which is on the inner side of the drive-wheel and below the top of the same, substantially as described."

"7. The construction of the crown-wheel with boxes for a series of rake and reel arms, in the manner described and shown."

"17. So arranging a revolving, raking, and reeling device, having two or more arms, including the rake as one arm, that the driver can sit on the machine and drive the team, the shaft of the rake and reel being at or nearly at right angles with the grain-platform, and the arms of the rake and reel not sweeping over the frame on which the driver is located, so as to interfere with the driver on his seat, substantially as described.

"18. The combination of a central shaft, a revolving hub or crown-wheel, a cam and hinged rake and reel arm, which are bent or curved near the hinging ends, as described, whereby the rake and reel arms, although hinged in rear of the cutting apparatus, are capable of reeling in and raking off grain at the inner front corner of the platform, as well as at the outer front corner thereof, and whereby, also, these arms are caused to incline over toward the grain side of the platform, when they rise to their greatest altitude, substantially as described."

Examination of these claims at once suggests, not only that they are largely repetitions, but that, if accepted in their broad generality, they are liable to two criticisms. They are very largely claims to a result which is not, per se, patentable; or, secondly, they are, most of them, in their terms, broad enough to cover any and every mode or means by which certain specified advantages, or alleged advantages, in the construction of a combined raker and reeler can be secured, which is too broad to be sustained. If this construction of the claims is to be avoided, it must be by construing the claims in the light of the previous specification, and modified by the words in each claim, "substantially as described."

By this view of these claims, they must be held to be either for the specific combination of the devices employed, described in the specification, or for the location of the devices in the place designated, with such changes, if any, as were devised to adapt the apparatus to that location.

In view of the disclaimers contained in the specification, and the description and office of the devices therein described, I am of opinion that one or both of the constructions last named is all that can be asserted in support of the claims, considered apart from the evidence, and upon the face of the patent itself. And when the evidence showing the state of the art is considered, in connection with the specification and its admissions, these restrictions of the several claims seem to me inevitable, if they can be sustained at all.

The testimony and the language of the claims, and especially the argument of the counsel for the complainant, show that the chief feature in the alleged invention of the patentee is the location of the apparatus. The counsel for the parties do not agree as to the construction of the patent in this respect. The counsel for the defendants insists that the patentee is restricted to a location below the top of the driving wheel of the principal machine, and within the limits of the circumference of that wheel; and in behalf of the defendants, it is insisted that the patent includes any location which is nearer the ground than a horizontal plane passing through the top of such driving-wheel.

But in either view, location is a chief feature in the complainant's claims. This, of course, suggests the question: Is the mere location of devices, such devices not being new, patentable? To this the answer must be that it is not. If the result is the same, and nothing new is required to adapt an apparatus to operate in its new location, nothing has been done which can be called invention. If such change of location produced a new combination of devices, producing a new result, then, indeed, something patentable may have been devised; but mere change of location is not invention.

On the other hand, where change of location involves the employment of new devices to adapt an apparatus for use in the new position, and a beneficial result is produced, then this location, in its connection with such new devices—that is, the means by which the result is produced, and not the result itself—is patentable. And where such change of location brings into existence a new combination of devices, operating by reason of such new combination to produce a new and useful result, such new combination is patentable. But in the former case there is no infringement, unless the new devices, or their equivalent, are used; and in the latter there is no infringement, unless all the material parts of the combination are used, or their equivalents.

In the present case the complainant's specification itself declares that a continuously revolving rake and reel is not new; that a continuously revolving rake and reel, mounted on an auxiliary frame within the draft-frame, or upon the rear right-hand corner of the platform, are not new, though revolving around a vertical center; that a continuously revolving rake and reel on such auxiliary frame within the draft-frame, having its arms separately hinged, is not new; that rake and reel arms which, during their united revolution around a vertical shaft, are turned up by segments, are not new, but have been mounted on a standard or post of the platform. This latter statement describes with great accuracy, though in general terms, the defendant's apparatus now claimed to infringe the complainant's patent. It also declares that a pair of arms has been formed by uniting the two parts which form the pair in such a manner that these parts form a stiff and non-adjustable right angle, and that a continuously revolving combined rake and reel has been combined with a driver's seat so that the driver would ride on the machine.

It further declares that the patentee does not claim a single rake-arm revolving around a center, nor broadly a rake and reel combined, which is composed of a series of rake and reel bars arranged around a center, nor a series of such arms hinged independently to the hub, nor a series of such arms hinged to a horizontal shaft, in which particulars he again describes the series of arms and rake used by the defendants, which are not only hinged independently of each other, and without any linked connection in pairs, but their relation to each other is non-adjustable. And, finally, he does not claim all cams in connection with such arms for producing or controlling their motion.

I find from the evidence a prior revolving-rake combined with reel-bars revolving around a vertical shaft hinged at the center, turned by a crown-wheel, acted on by a bevel-wheel connected with the main axle of the driving-wheel, and having the rake and reel arms in pairs, connected or linked crosswise together, so that each linked pair formed a right angle, or nearly so, and so that when the rake-head or reel-bar of one pair is horizontal, the other or fellow thereto is vertical, or nearly so, and in the construction or arrangement of which an elliptical curve or segment was placed around and partially over the crown-wheel, so that in the revolution of the arms they are successively lowered and held down by the linked connection, to perform the office of reeling and raking from the platform, and then raised to nearly a vertical position until again lowered to perform their office.

All this appears in the machine of Whitenack, of which a model is produced, and which was in actual public use prior to the alleged invention by the complainant.

I find also what, after the concession in the complainant's specification, might have been assumed without further proof, that the elevation of the arms, as they left the platform in their ascending revolution, enabled the driver to sit in his proper seat on the main frame while the apparatus was in motion.

Hinging the arms of a revolving rake and reel at the center of their motion had been done before in other machines; raising them in the course of their revolution by means of a cam or an equivalent to the cam, also appears in Mears' machine, in which the revolving raking device was located on the platform, below the plane of the top of the driving-wheel, and the like device appears in McClintock Young's machine. Both of these had the arms hinged at the center of motion, were revolved by means of a crown-wheel and beveled gear-wheel, not, as in the complainant's machine, attached to or operated directly by the revolving axle of the driving-wheel, but mediately through a flexible connection therewith. In these respects the defendants' apparatus more nearly resembles them than it does the complainant's; and what are called boxes, constituting hinges in which the arms were pivoted or hinged to the crown-wheel—referred to in the seventh claim—were neither new in themselves nor as hinges for the arms of a revolving rake and reel.

Under these circumstances, little remained which the complainant could claim as new, except the location and such specific devices as adapted the apparatus to operate in its new location, or such combination as resulted from the change of location, if any new combination was produced, and new location, or the result of the new location, was mainly urged by the counsel for the complainant on the hearing.

The location described by the complainant is upon the main frame and upon the grain side thereof, over the axle-box of the driving-wheel. The new devices which he seems to have employed to operate the apparatus in its new location, so far as any of the parts were new, were bending the revolving arms; and, what he states as his preference, casting the inner segment or axle-box of the driving-wheel and the upright vertical shaft upon which the crown-wheel (to which the arms are hinged) revolves in one piece; and, viewed as a combination, these features are included with the other parts of the apparatus already referred to.

It is true that the patentee, in his specification, says: "I have laid importance to the location of the rake and reel directly over the axle of the drive-wheel; and, while I regard this an important feature of my invention, I do not wish to limit myself to this location, where my other improvements in the combined rake and reel are found useful in other locations."

This language must be construed with reference to the entire specification and to the state of the art already adverted to.

Apart from the change of location specifically named, and the devices to operate the apparatus there, there were no improvements which were new. He points out in his specification no mode of operating the machinery in any other location. By elongation of the axle of the driving-wheel it would project the bevel-wheel and the crown-wheel to a greater lateral distance from the side of the driving-wheel, so that the latter would not be directly over the axle; or, by placing it on either side, forward or back of the axle, but adjacent to the bevel-wheel on the axle, it would still be operated by it, and yet not be directly over such axle.

That the specification contemplated a location upon or firmly attached to the frame of the principal machine, and contemplated no other location, is, I think, clear, from the specification and from other considerations. Within that range, although the patentee pointed out no mode of operating it except where he placed it, he may have contemplated location, not "directly over the axle of the drive-wheel," as I have above suggested. Still more clear it is that he did not conceive or contemplate, as within the purview of either his specification or claims, a location on the grain platform. That location he, in terms, condemns as of doubtful practicability, and in nowise suggests the possibility of placing his alleged invention there. Such rigid attachment to the main frame was alone contemplated, as I think, is clear. The details of the specification show it, wherein he proposes and prefers to cast the segment or axle-box of the driving-wheel and the vertical shaft of the crown-wheel in one piece; not that it must be so cast, but when the location is directly over the axle, he prefers it, though when placed elsewhere within the reach of the bevel-wheel it may not be possible.

The cam, which is to raise the arms in their revolution, "may be bolted firmly to the inner side timber or part of the draft-frame, as represented in fig. 1," and no other mode of securing it is pointed out or suggested. If it be said that this secures him against the use of any equivalent mode of securing it, it nevertheless indicates its firm attachment to the main frame.

His further language is still more specific, and altogether unequivocal. "I also think I have made an important improvement in being able to adjust the combined rake and reel by the same means which adjust the cutting apparatus. This end I have attained by having the rake and reel a fixture with the draft-frame, and locating it with reference to the drive-wheel, as shown."

It was hardly possible for him to be more explicit on this point. The alleged invention of the complainant was made for a one-wheeled machine. The machine which he described was a one-wheeled machine. Such a machine necessarily had its platform rigidly attached to the frame of the machine. This, it is true, would not be a conclusive fact if an infringer could have placed the same apparatus on the side of, or attached it as a fixture to, the draft-frame of a two-wheeled machine, and that would be possible if the platform was rigidly attached thereto. But it is, nevertheless, a fact of some significance, where the patentee claims that the defendants infringe by the location of an apparatus, embracing similar features not new, on the platform of a machine, such platform being flexibly connected with the principal machine and the location being where the use of the apparatus, arranged as the patentee describes it, is impracticable.

If attention be paid to what may be claimed to be the specific devices by which the patentee adapted the apparatus to the location described, or to what may be claimed to constitute in that location a new combination (if, in fact, there was any new combination), I must find that the defendants have not used them, or any of them, in the designated location; nor, in fact, have they used any of which the complainant had acquired any monopoly or exclusive right, either by the evidence or by the declaration of the patentee in the specification. Some are shown to be old, both as separate devices and in combination. Others are unlike the complainant's in their structure and mechanical operation.

There are many other particulars embraced in the argument in behalf of the defendants, upon which, though I do not disaffirm them, I express no opinion. What I have said seems to me to render it necessary to add that the defendants infringe no right secured to the complainant.

To hold otherwise would be to give the patent a construction which would render the patent itself invalid, or, on the other hand, to give it an interpretation, which, in view of the language of the specification, the state of the art, and the evidence in the case, it does not bear.

I add, moreover, without going into the details of the testimony and proofs, that the defendants have used nothing which they were not at liberty to use. In some of the details, their specific devices may, where they differ from the complainant's, be new. They have adapted known devices for raking and reeling, to use, in a location upon the platform of a reaper attached by flexible connection to the frame of the main machine. If, in adapting the combined raker and reaper to the location described in his patent, the complainant Marsh made any patentable invention, if he did anything more than yield to those mechanical changes which mere judgment or mechanical necessity imposed, the defendants, in adapting their apparatus to use upon the platform of a two-wheeled machine, flexibly connected therewith, used no device of which the complainant had an exclusive monopoly.

It will be seen that the patentee neither claims nor has any exclusive right to four arms, as well because his claims are not to four or any other specific number, but to a rake and reel arm, and to two or more arms, as because one, two, and four had been previously used, and the proof shows that increasing or diminishing the number is a mere matter of judgment, not requiring invention. So, also, it should be observed, that, except in the seventh claim, the patentee makes no claim to any of the separate distinct devices used as new.

The defendants do not use the location designated. They do not use the same device for guiding the arms and bringing the rake and reel down to the platform, but a device much more nearly resembling that shown in the Mears machine. They do not use arms linked in pairs, and if the arms can be said to be arranged so that, when in motion, they assume a similar relation to each other at any like angle, that relation is fixed or unchanging, and non-adjustable. The complainant's arrangement for operating the apparatus would be impossible applied to the defendants' machine, with its platform flexibly connected to the main frame. The mode of hinging the arms to the crown-wheel is not identical with that of the complainant's mentioned in the seventh claim, and if it could be considered equivalent, it differs more than the complainant's differs from what, as before observed, was already in use. So that, in no view of the subject, can the defendants be held infringers of the complainant's patent, even if it be held to cover a specific combination, or to embrace a new location, with specific devices to adapt the apparatus to operate therein.

The bill of complaint must be dismissed, with costs.

CONTINUANCE—DEPOSITION EXPECTED—DILIGENCE.

A deposition expected which may be material on the merits, and where proper diligence has been used, is a ground for the continuance of a cause.

[Cited in brief in Fisher v. Greene, 95 Ill. 95.]

[This was a suit by Marsh and Compton against Hulbert and Trumble.]

Mr. Edwards, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Kating, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. A motion for a continuance of this case is made on an affidavit that the goods sold by the plaintiffs to the defendants, for which the present action is brought, were of an inferior quality, were overcharged and not worth the prices charged. Also that a deposition is expected which will prove that one of the plaintiffs' witnesses denied what he has sworn to in his deposition.

This is opposed as there was no offer to return the goods—no special warranty, nor is fraud alleged. The object of the defendants is not to disaffirm the contract, but to show that more was charged for the goods than they were worth. We know not under what circumstances the goods were received, or whether the defects alleged were perceptible on a slight examination. It is said that a court will not grant a new trial on the ground that a witness examined can be impeached. Upon the whole, however, in this case, we think justice requires a continuance of the cause, unless the expected deposition shall be received so that the trial may be had at the present term.

MARITIME LIENS—SUPPLIES—HOME PORT—CONFLICT OF LIENS—MORTGAGE—REPAIRS.

S. did the joiner work, but was at no time in possession: Held, that these liens must be marshaled, as follows: First, J. M. & Son, the shipwrights, must be paid, because they had a strict maritime lien, and had possession, and no act of the owner can defeat a lien which the law creates; second, the mortgagee; and third, the balance ratably to the other libelants.

In admiralty.

Wm. D. Porter, for James Marsh & Son.

Edwd. M'Cready, for Bee & Tylee and Henry Smyzer.

M. P. O'Conner, for John Commins.

MAGRATH, District Judge. In these cases libels have been filed to recover certain sums of money, and for which, it is contended in each case, that there is a lien. John Commins, being the owner of the brig Minnie, sold her to W. H. Trott, the purchase being altogether on credit. W. H. Trott gave his promissory note to John Commins, dated the 19th May, 1856, at sixty days, for $1,400, and to secure its payment, executed a mortgage of the brig, dated the 4th June, 1856. The mortgage is duly executed, and recorded in the office of the collector of customs for the port of Charleston, where the brig is registered. The note is still unpaid. On the 7th June, 1856, James Marsh & Son, who have also libeled, and are shipwrights, commenced repairing the brig. They continued to work upon her until the 7th August, 1856, at which time, having completed their work, they now claim that there is due for it $2,808 30. Before they commenced, they took the brig into their possession, and so kept her until they surrendered her to the process of this court. They also claim the further sum of $131 for the services of a ship-keeper. Bee & Tylee, ship chandlers, have also libeled the brig for $1,994 38, the value of materials and supplies furnished by them. They have not been in possession. Henry Smyzer, ship joiner, has also libeled for $372, the value of work done by him. He has not been in possession.

The lien claimed by James Marsh & Son, is derived from the possession, which, as shipwrights, they had. The lien claimed by John Commins is derived from his mortgage. The lien claimed by Bee & Tylee and Henry Smyzer, is derived from the allegation that the brig was owned out of the limits of this state. Had such proof been made as satisfied me that this allegation was supported, it would have led me to decree the payment of these claims, in an order different from that which I will now direct. In such a case, liens under the rule of the maritime law, would have been implied (in the absence of the owner) for the benefit of all material men. But this has not been proved. W. H. Trott may be a citizen of New York and not resident within the limits of this state; but if so, it admits of higher and stronger proof than has been made, and which consists of idle discourse in which he indulged. If his declarations concerning his residence in New York are entitled to weight, as proof of that fact, then would his declarations as to his residence in Charleston, be also entitled to weight. In the mortgage to Commins he declares himself a citizen of Charleston, and he must have sworn to the same statement. I cannot, then, under such circumstances, declare him to be a citizen of New York, or resident of any other place than Charleston, particularly when the consequences to him might be so very serious. Had the non-residence here of W. H. Trott been proved, it would not have availed the parties who, from it, if proved, supposed that a lien would arise in their favor. For he is here, and has been here, and might have been sued. And when the owner is present, the reason for the maritime lien ceases, and the contract is inferred to be with him, on his ordinary personal responsibility, without a view to the vessel itself as security. St. Jago de Cuba, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 409, Fland. Mar. Law, 186. The brig is then before me, as in her home port, where her owner resides, and upon this I will now proceed to determine the relative positions of the lien claimed against her.

A lien arising under the maritime law is neither derived from, nor governed by the same principle as relates to a lien at common law. By the common law "a lien is the right in the possessor of property to hold it for the satisfaction of some demand." Mont. Liens. The right to retain the possession, and the fact that it is retained, are essential to a lien in every case. Lickbarrow v. Mason, 6 East, 27. But, in the maritime law, possession is not material in a question of lien. By that law, the benefit of the lien may be preserved, consistently with the enjoyment by the debtor of the right of ownership, including in this, the possession and control of the vessel. In countries which admit the rule of the civil law, which is also the rule in the admiralty, repairs and necessaries form a lien upon the ship. Such was the law in England, until reversed by the house of lords in the time of Charles II. The Zodiac, 1 Hagg. Adm. 325.

It is, perhaps, too late for us to inquire with what reason the rule of the maritime law, which followed that of the civil law, in regard to liens, was modified in England. A sense of natural justice is satisfied in declaring, that he who expends labor for the benefit of another shall be entitled to look to the thing benefited by such labor, as the primary source of such payment. No equivalent is afforded for the denial of this, in remitting the creditor as in the case of a material man to his personal action against the owner. A remedy operating wholly in personam is very seldom an efficient substitute for a proceeding in rem. But if it is no longer of use to examine the reasons for which, in former days, essential modifications and, in some cases, positive prohibitions were adopted in relation to the admiralty, there is still great use in understanding how a spirit of rivalry, permitted to interfere, falsified the great issue of determining a question between courts of auxiliary and, in some cases, of concurrent jurisdiction, by reference to the public good, and made every thing subordinate to a desire for success. Without the jealousy, and with little, if any, of the acrimony which marked the discussion in England; but nevertheless with great interest and ability, has the question been discussed in the United States, of the meaning in the constitution of the United States, of "all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." De Lovio v. Boit [Case No. 3,776]; Ramsay v. The Allegro, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 611; Bains v. The James and Catharine [Case No. 756]; The Huntress [Id. 6,914]. And without introducing here anything not pertinent to the case before me, I may very well observe, that the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States is not determined by the narrow construction which in England served to define it; but embraces a larger number of cases, recognized as properly within its spirit and jurisdiction.

When, in the time of Charles II., it was resolved, that the jurisdiction of the admiralty did not extend to cases in rem where the common law courts would afford a remedy in personam, the lien, which until then belonged to the material man, was lost. In all cases, therefore, where the ship was in her home port, or the person of the owner could be served, the lien of the material man was divested, and the remedy was by action against the owner. With foreign ships the lien was preserved, but from necessity; and it is only with such vessels that the material man enjoyed that security which once applied to all vessels. But in England, and in many of the United States, the wisdom of the maritime law as formerly enforced, has been vindicated by recent legislation. New York, Pennsylvania, Louisiana, Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, Maine, Connecticut, and perhaps others, have provided, that on all vessels, whether foreign or domestic, in the home port or abroad, material men shall have the benefit of a lien to the extent of work done or supplies furnished. In South Carolina there has not been any corresponding legislation; and the general rule applicable is that laid down in The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438. To this rule in England, and in the United States, there has been always an exception in favor of the shipwright who may be in possession. Abb. Shipp. 178; 3 Kent, Comm. 169; The Vibilia, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 7. For him a lien arises from the common law. Bland. Mar. Law, 186, 4 Barn. & Ald. 341. And the contract for repairs being a maritime contract, the lien may be enforced in the admiralty. Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 340. The lien claimed by James Marsh & Son, is of this kind, and corresponds to the lien which they would have under the general maritime law. But its value when enforced in this court, depends on the solution of another question; and that is, whether it will be here considered, as it would be in a court of law; or whether it will be here treated as a maritime lien in the proper sense of that term. And this question involves an important issue, as between James Marsh & Son and John Commins. If they have but the naked lien of the common law, they must be postponed to John Commins; but if, as material men in possession, they have a lien which can be enforced in the admiralty; and it is enforced here, as a maritime lien, then they will be preferred.

At the common law, a lien implies a power to hold, nothing more. He who has a lien, may hold; but except in certain cases, which need not be here considered, he cannot sell. The sale of the property to satisfy the lien can only be accomplished through an execution, following the judgment in a personal action against the owner. He who holds a lien, detains the thing which it affects, until he gets his judgment; and then sues out his execution under which he sells. In the admiralty, as has been already said, possession is not essential to the lien. The Marion [Case No. 9,087]. The lien is in rem; not only against the thing, but in the thing. Adhering to it, from its equitable properties; following it, into the hands of third persons; and never divested, but by payment; destruction of the thing; or consent of parties. Although wide in its operation, and liberal in its spirit, it can never do injustice. It is closely watched; and is ever defeated by that evidence which would be sufficient to establish the conclusion of personal credit to the owner. It cannot be used for fraud; because it cannot be kept secret, by being delayed; for it would be unsafe in him who claims it, to allow it to remain not enforced longer than the end of the voyage then in progress. The Carter, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 332; The Boston [Case No. 1,669].

In the admiralty, when a lien arising from some other source than the maritime law is enforced, it will be, according to the rule of the maritime law, and to the same extent, with a general maritime lien of that class, unless its operation is otherwise limited. If there is no limitation or qualification of the lien, by the law creating it, then this court will not undertake to affix to it, limitation or qualification. As it comes without either, so will it be enforced. The Marion [supra]. A material man, who acquires a lien, either by the common law or statute, under a maritime contract, and enforces it in this court, must enforce it in the same manner as a pure maritime lien, unless made subject to some qualification under the law which creates it. Davis v. A New Brig [Id. 3,643]; Fland. Mar. Law, 187. These general principles must now be applied in deciding to what rank shall this lien of James Marsh & Son be assigned in the distribution of the proceeds of this vessel. Is it preferred—held to be equal—or postponed to the mortgage held by John Commins, and which is prior in date to this lien? I have established it, when adopted in this court, as a maritime lien. It is enforced here, because it is connected with a maritime contract, and is in consistency with the principles of the general maritime law, which give a lien in all such cases. And the admiralty court, when it enforces this lien, must do so upon the same principles that it applies to the lien under the general maritime law, and to the same end; which is to have a preference for a debt which it holds as privileged. Boone v. The Hornet [Case No. 1,640]. The sale is the mode in which this court gives value to the lien, and secures the preference. By it the lien, whether operating as a power to hold, or in any other manner, becomes converted into money, out of which creditors may be paid. The contract out of which it arises is, as I have said, a maritime contract; and to such a contract the maritime law gives a lien. That lien is not allowed here, in the home port of the vessel, to exist; but another lien, by another code of laws, may arise: and such a lien this court is competent to enforce, but only because, growing out of a maritime contract, it is here still regarded as a maritime lien. There is no rule concerning its enforcement, in the local law out of which it arises. This court, then, has to consider it as it would its own lien, in a similar case, if it were operative. And the priority which it would give to that lien, it will give to this.

The mortgage held by John Commins is not a maritime hypothecation, and cannot, as an original proceeding, be maintained in this court. Bogart v. John Jay, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 399. In the maritime law it is not compared with those contracts which furnish the means by which a vessel is aided on her voyage. Ships, in the quaint language of the law, were made to plough the seas, and not to rot in the docks. And the contracts which are instrumental in aiding them to accomplish their mission, are preferred, to such as detain them. A mortgage, when compared with a bottomry, is called a dry security; it imparts no vigor to the thing to which it is attached.

Much has been said of the notice which James Marsh & Son had of the mortgage, when they were doing this work. I do not think that a question of notice has any place in a discussion involving the operation and effect of maritime liens. They do not arise by agreement—are not created by the act of parties—but are in themselves legal consequences. No one can, by his act, prevent a creditor, having a lien on his property, from enforcing it. But he is equally disqualified from defeating a lien which the law creates. If James Marsh & Son were not in possession, no person could give them a preference over the mortgagee. If the general maritime rule prevailed here, (and I have decided that it is considered as prevailing here, pro hac vice, through this lien of these material men,) no act of an owner, whether prior or posterior in time, could give any one a preference over the material man. Their contract is with the vessel itself, not with the owner; and to it a fixed place is allotted in the maritime law, which no one can disturb. Nor is there in this rule any hardship which may, at the first view, appear as any objection. Let it not be said that by it the owner can at any time extinguish the mortgage by a contract for repairs, which create a lien prior to the mortgagee. If an owner should attempt to make a contract for which a lien arises, and which in its operation supersedes the claim of the mortgagee, that mortgagee, if he were entitled to it, would have a right in equity to enjoin the progress of the work, until such measures might be adopted as would stay the progress of the work. However it may be in cases which the law cannot reach, yet, in all cases which it can reach, it enforces the principle that no one shall indirectly do, that which he cannot do directly. A mortgagee cannot waste or destroy that which he has made the subject of security to another.

Before leaving this part of the case, I must add, that I cannot consider the equity of the mortgagor comparable with that of the shipwright. This is not the vessel which the mortgagee took as security for a debt. Much work has been done, much labor expended, much material supplied. If in this case the shipwright did not have a lien, by virtue of his possession, all would be lost to him. The mortgagee would have power to sell, and unless the material man is able to protect himself, by buying or bidding, the debt of a mortgagee, secured by a hull, may be paid by the bill of sale of a vessel, repaired and refitted at a heavy expense.

I proceed now to inquire how far the priority claimed by James Marsh & Son is affected by the act of congress passed in the year 1850, and which provides that no bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance, shall be valid against any other person than the grantor or mortgagor, his heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice thereof; unless such bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance, be recorded in the office of the collector of customs where such vessel is registered and enrolled. And to this is added the proviso, "that the lien by bottomry, on any vessel created during her voyage, by a loan of money or materials necessary to repair, or enable such vessel to prosecute a voyage, shall not lose its priority, or be in any way affected by the provisions of this act." If the act of 1850 had been passed to marshal the liens which arise under the maritime law, or to classify maritime contracts, then it might be that the omission of a certain claim, in the enumeration of such as shall constitute a prior class, would be equivalent to its postponement. But that which congress intended to regulate was of a very different kind. The rights and liabilities of a mortgagee of a vessel had been a matter of doubt and controversy, often submitted to courts, and not unfrequently resulting in contrary decisions. To prevent this, and settle all doubt, by not allowing any interest to affect third persons, of which they did not have actual notice, congress declared that no transfers of a vessel, absolute or qualified, should be valid, except as against the grantor or mortgagor, his heirs and devisees, unless recorded. The only possible ground for the opinion that this question is affected by the act of 1850, is from the use of the general term, "hypothecation." But it is quite clear that "hypothecation," as used in the act, must refer to that class of hypothecations which are proved by some instrument in writing, and are created by the act of the parties. In the maritime law, all maritime contracts imply hypothecation; but the cases in which these hypothecations arise are clearly such as never could be in the contemplation of those who framed that act, as proper to be recorded, or that it should be essential to their validity. It is well that he who has a lien created by the act of parties, should not hold it so that it may be injurious to others. If the law does not require the transfer of a vessel to be recorded, it is as good without the record as with it. No wider field could be opened for fraud, than the privilege of having liens, and keeping them secret and concealed. This mischief is met by the act of 1850. And its operation would seem to include every case, where a transfer, absolute or qualified, is made in writing, and therefore capable of being recorded.

The general rule being thus laid down, a bottomry bond must be specially excepted; for that is an hypothecation created by the act of parties, and exists in writing. It would thus, unless excepted, be governed by the act, for there is no test of priority under the act, except that arising from recording. Whatever transfer is first recorded, passed the interest, absolute or qualified, which it professes to convey. But nothing could be more unjust than the operation of that rule in relation to a bottomry bond. Such hypothecations arise abroad: the act of the master in a foreign port, where he can have, or is supposed to have, no other resource, with which to prosecute his voyage or repair his vessel. To be foreign has been considered so essential a characteristic, that it has been doubted whether the owner in her home port can make a valid hypothecation in a security of this kind. The St. Jago de Cuba, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 416. If a stranger, far away, makes with the master a bottomry contract, by which the vessel is floated and speeded on her course, shall such a contract be postponed to some other, made by the owner, and for which priority is claimed, because it is recorded? Such would be the consequence, if bottomry bonds were not excepted. To obviate this difficulty, the exception is made in the manner already stated. But a bottomry bond is simply excepted, it is not preferred by the act; it is left where it would be, if the act had not been passed. If the bottomry holder had a priority before the act, he will still have it. But he did have a priority given by the maritime law: to it, then, we must refer for the nature and extent of that priority. Whatever is the relation which a bottomry contract bears to other maritime contracts, according to the maritime law, determines the relation which such maritime contracts would bear to those mentioned in the act of 1850. If such maritime contracts are preferred by the maritime law to a bottomry contract, and a bottomry contract is entitled to a priority over the contracts mentioned in the act of 1850, of course the preference of such maritime contracts as those mentioned in the act of 1850 is at once necessary and clear.

There is no mode of considering maritime hypothecations in which the impossibility of regarding them as necessarily to be recorded, does not become apparent. I have said that they often arise from circumstances, often suddenly developed; and their nature and extent, in most cases, is not known until they are perfected, and capable of being enforced. The extent of repairs is generally uncertain, and the amount of the debt continues uncertain until the work is done. The wages of a seaman can never be calculated until the voyage is ended. The claim of a freighter for damage does not arise until, the damage being done, the vessel arrives in port. If a ship from New York, being damaged, is in this port refitted and repaired, can a mortgagee from that city take her out of the hands of the shipwright? Can he extinguish a claim for damage under affreightment, by exhibiting his mortgage? Can he deprive a seaman of wages, because the contract for his services has not been recorded? No one will affirm either of these as results which the law would accomplish; yet they are, if the act is not read with the qualifications I have suggested.

But the public mischief which would arise from any other construction of the act, than that which I have suggested, would be deplorable. The rule under which maritime hypothecations are protected, is peculiar to no clime, bounded by no territory, confined to no locality. They operate as security for the material man, and as security for the owner of the ship. To the one, it gives the vessel as security for the work he may do; to the other, it offers the assurance that, if disaster shall befall his vessel, she will be refitted and despatched on her voyage. It is a common covenant, to which the commercial nations of the world are parties, and in which each secures for its citizens or subjects, indemnity and succor. Its cardinal principle, therefore, is that a maritime contract implies hypothecation: work done and supplies furnished create a special security in the vessel. No evidence is required of the assent of the owner: the maritime law implies it from the necessity, and supplies it. It gives it for him, and makes the security prior to others. In the strong language of Judge Johnson, "the vessel must get on: this is the consideration that controls every other." "The whole object of giving admiralty process and priority of payment to privileged creditors, is to furnish wings and legs to the forfeited hull to get back, for the benefit of all concerned." The St. Jago de Cuba, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 416. If this contract is broken or disturbed, so that the security implied in a maritime contract is denied or made doubtful, and the lien of the foreign mechanic or merchant is made subordinate to contracts in the home port, a blow will be struck at commerce productive of the most ruinous consequences. The lien of James Marsh & Son I hold, therefore, prior to that claimed by the mortgagee.

I come now to the consideration of the claim of the mortgagee. Freed from the questions which have been considered, he would have a right to a sale of the vessel in default of payment, and the surplus would belong to the mortgagor. But his right to any priority is contested; and it is a matter of importance to him, as it is supposed that the vessel will not be sold for as much as is necessary to discharge all the claims made against her. After seamen's wages, which are favored in admiralty and held sacred as long as a plank of the ship remains, the claims of material men receive the consideration of the court. But in this case, as this is the home port of the vessel, these material men have no lien. They are not in possession, the vessel is in her home port, and no local law recognizes their claim as privileged. They are in this court because they are parties to a maritime contract, which entitles them to pursue their remedy in personam, although they have no lien; and they may intervene in the distribution of the surplus after liens are satisfied. On the other hand, the mortgagee has no maritime contract for which he can seek a remedy here; yet he has an interest in the thing itself. The question is between two kinds of creditors, the one never having had a lien, and the other having had, at one time, a lien, which has been diverted in consequence of the extinguishment of the thing in specie, by the action of the court in its order for a sale. The right which the mortgagee had he cannot enforce, because the court has assumed jurisdiction of the subject matter; and being competent to do so, no other court would interfere. Had the mortgagee seized the vessel, it would not have ousted the court of its jurisdiction. And a sale if made by him, would not affect a subsisting maritime lien. not waived or lost from want of diligence. Filing a bill for foreclosure would have involved the question how far it was a proceeding in rem, to determine whether the material man were by it deprived of the rights which are recognized in this court. Wall v. The Royal Saxon [Case No. 17,093]. It must not, however, be understood from this, that the mortgagee is affected in his proper rights in the security which he holds. It is not because in the admiralty a lien paramount to his mortgage is enforced, which lien could not be adjudicated in a court of law or equity, that his rights are thereby diminished. His rights are determined not only according to principles administered in a court of law or equity; but are also held by him subordinate, to such also as are enforced in a court of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The proper measure of any right is determined by the combined operation and effect of all laws which are of force in relation to it. It would, therefore, be extremely incorrect to say, that had the mortgagee sued in this, or that court, or pursued this or that course of conduct, that his rights would be properly any other, than such as they will be under the decree of this court, or of any other court of competent jurisdiction. It would argue but little for the excellence of our system of jurisprudence, if it depended on the court to which a party appealed, to determine whether he would obtain the whole or the half of that which he claimed. Such a rule would measure the rights of parties by the pleasure of the suitor, for having choice of the forum, he would seek that most favorable to him. If the mortgagee here had prosecuted his claim in another forum, to which it would appear, that under another code of laws, not administered by it, there were other rights in the same subject matter; it would be the duty, as it has been always the custom of judicial tribunals in such cases, to allow the question to be decided in that tribunal where all the rights of all the parties could be considered and adjudged.

I have made these remarks, because in the course of the argument, much was said of what was done, and of what might have been done. But no court will enforce a right to the prejudice of some other right, which can only be enforced in another court. If in a court of law, its proceedings are likely to be perverted by suitors to purposes of wrong, a court of equity is open to afford relief. When the judgment of a court has been pronounced, with all parties before it, and the court has competent jurisdiction, it is presumed to be right. But if parties have been excluded, or could not be heard; or a question has been passed over; or could not be decided; and in consequence of this, injustice has been done; then I should be slow to doubt, what so far from doubting I affirm, that there is always a mode open and available by which error may be corrected, omissions supplied, and right and justice administered in the most complete manner. It is not then, because the mortgagee has been stopped, that this indicates more than the authority of a court has been substituted for that of an individual. His rights are still to be determined. He has now no claim in rem; but the proceeds of the sale represent the vessel. His claim is postponed to the shipwrights', because they had a lien which I have sustained as a maritime lien, and prior. But the other material men have no lien; and therefore no remedy in rem. Of course, they cannot have an equity against the proceeds of sale, except as against the owner. Their admission here to be paid from the surplus, is a doctrine at first slowly received; and concerning the true source of which there is not even now the certainty that we might expect and desire. Their claim upon the surplus is worked out through the debtor; and their equity as against him, in the proceeds of a sale, is admitted. But that cannot be compared with the claim of a mortgagee, which existed as a lien affecting the vessel itself, was divested by the action of the court, and postponed to another lien; but which by the plainest principles of equity survives against the proceeds, or the surplus which remains, to the exclusion of all others who are but general creditors.

I have no hesitation in holding, that after the payment to James Marsh & Son, John Commins is entitled to be paid the amount due him under his mortgage. The balance then remaining will be divided ratably between Bee & Tylee and Henry Smyzer. The decree will be so entered.

MARSH v. N. W. NAT. INS. CO.

[3 Biss. 351.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Oct. Term, 1872.

INSURANCE—POLICY CANCELLED BY MISTAKE—PREMIUM NOT PAID—MUTUAL ACCOUNTS—PARTNERSHIP.

1. An insurance company is liable to the legal holder of a policy, though the person who procured it had, by mistake, ordered it cancelled.

2. The fact that the premium had not been actually paid is no defense against a bona fide holder Mutual accounts have, in such case, the effect of payment.

3. A man who buys and ships for a firm in another city, whose funds are used, the profits or loss to be divided, and each shipment to be a distinct venture, is not a partner, and the firm can sustain a libel on a policy indorsed to them, without prejudice from his orders or mistakes.

This was a libel in personam on a policy of insurance.

The libellants, Marsh & Sternberg, partners in trade in the city of Buffalo, made an agreement with William B. Hibbard, of Milwaukee, to purchase wheat for them at Milwaukee and ship it to Buffalo, libellants to pay for each cargo, and if there should be a profit on a cargo Hibbard was to have half the profit, and if there were a loss on a cargo he was to pay half the loss. Libellants were to transact the business in Buffalo, and Hibbard in Milwaukee. Under this arrangement Hibbard, with three persons associated with him, purchased and shipped several cargoes, each purchase and shipment being a distinct venture.

Wheat was purchased by Hibbard and his associates with funds advanced by the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company Bank, of which David Ferguson was cashier, and shipped on board the schooner Excelsior, in the name of D. Ferguson as shipper, for Marsh & Sternberg, Buffalo. A certificate of insurance was issued by the respondent on the 7th day of October, 1871, to William B. Hibbard, for the amount of $7,500, "loss, if any, to be paid to D. Ferguson, cashier, or order hereon, on return of this certificate." Hibbard and his associates were agents of Eastern insurance companies, and, as such agents, issued certificates of insurance on the same cargo. October 9th Hibbard forwarded to libellants a statement of the purchase of the wheat, of the shipment, of the expenses of shipping and of insuring, and on the same day he gave Ferguson his draft, in favor of Ferguson, with the bill of lading and certificates of insurance. Ferguson indorsed the draft, bill of lading and certificate of insurance, and forwarded them to Buffalo, where Marsh & Sternberg honored the draft on the 12th of October, and received the bill of lading and certificate of insurance. October 11th Marsh & Sternberg sent to Hibbard a telegraph dispatch: "Security, Western, City Marine, probably all used up. Have cancelled policies on Athenium, Excelsior, Clayton Belle, renewed in New York, where we insured. Monterey will get it here if not in good companies." Hibbard, mistaking the purport of this dispatch, gave notice in the office of respondent on the 12th October that their policy on the cargo of the Excelsior was cancelled. The vessel foundered on Lake Huron on the 15th October, and the cargo became a total loss. Hibbard and the officers of the respondent considered the risk cancelled. When Hibbard gave notice of the cancellation the officers of the respondent demanded return of the certificate and the adjustment of a portion of the premium. October 11th Marsh & Sternberg wrote to Hibbard stating: "We have secured insurance in New York in place of Security, Buffalo Fire and Marine, and Buffalo City, for fear they might not be able to pay loss, should any occur." These are the companies of which Hibbard and his associates were the agents. Notice was given to the respondent of the mistake forty-eight hours after the loss. October 21st Marsh & Sternberg wrote to Hibbard repudiating his notice of cancellation, as done without their knowledge or authority. The certificate of insurance had not been returned to the respondent, and Marsh & Sternberg hold it and bring this libel to recover the amount of the insurance.

Proof of loss was given to respondent. Libellants never cancelled this risk, nor authorized any person to do so. They paid the draft on the faith of the bill of lading and the certificate of insurance.

The answer alleges that these libellants were partners in this business with W. B. Hibbard and his associates; that the risk was cancelled, and that the premium had not been paid.

Hibbard and his associates, as insurance agents, and the respondent did a mutual credit business, and at the end of every month they liquidated their respective accounts. The premium in this case had not been adjusted or paid, nor any attempt made to collect it; nor had the risk been cancelled on Hibbard's books. An entry of cancellation was made on the books of respondent.

The cargo of the schooner Excelsior, as well as those of the vessels previously purchased and shipped, was purchased in pursuance of the agreement for dividing profits and losses. This constituted the libellants, Marsh & Sternberg and Hibbard and his associates, partners in the transaction, and clothed each of the partners with all the powers of a partner over the business and property of the joint venture. Colly. Partn. p. 13, § 16; Story, Partn. §§ 2, 19, 21, 27; Smith, Merc. Law, 39. That a partner has power to transact the whole business of the firm, whatever that may be, and consequently to bind his partners in such transaction as entirely as himself, is a general principle relating to partnership transactions long since settled, and now no longer open to question. Marshall, C. J., in Winship v. Bank of U. S., 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 552, 561; Smith, Merc. Law, 66, 72, 73; Will. Eq. Jur. 190, 191. Each partner is the agent of the other, and can make any lawful contract in relation to the business of the firm. Reid v. McNaughton, 15 Barb. 177; Tapley v. Butterfield, 1 Metc. [Mass.] 515; Locke v. Stearns, Id. 560.

When Hibbard purchased the wheat it was the property of all the parties interested. When he borrowed the money to pay for it, and pledged the wheat as security, it still remained the property of the parties jointly interested, subject to the lien upon it as security for the payment of the money loaned, and when that money was paid by Marsh & Sternberg it was paid for the partners, who still owned the wheat subject to a proper accounting as between themselves.

The policy of insurance was effected for joint benefit. It is of no consequence that it was in Hibbard's own name. The court would compel its application for the benefit of those interested. The policy was cancelled by mutual agreement in good faith on both sides, and after the premiums had been partially earned, and before a loss had occurred, and both parties were bound by it.

It is claimed that Hibbard only acted as the agent of the libellants in relation to the cancellation of the policy, and exceeded his instructions in that regard; still his act was binding on the libellants. An agent acting within the general scope of his authority binds his principal, notwithstanding he may have departed from his instructions, provided the party with whom he contracts had no knowledge of the instructions. Fland. Ins. 157; Perkins v. Washington Ins. Co., 4 Cow. 645; New York Cent. Ins. Co. v. National Protection Ins. Co., 20 Barb. 468; Lightbody v. North American Ins. Co., 23 Wend. 18.

Hibbard was then agent for transacting the general business of purchasing, shipping and insuring here. If he misunderstood the purport of the telegram of the 11th October, and in cancelling the insurance in question acted according to his then understanding of it, but in excess of his instructions, under the authorities cited above the libellants are bound by his act. Even if he stood in the position of an agent, the loss should fall upon his principals, and not upon the insurance company, the officers of which had no knowledge of what his instructions were. The telegram was not sent to the insurance office at the time of the order to cancel. It was never seen by any officer of the company until after the loss.

There is nothing in the claim of the libellants that they are assignees of the insurance to take this case out of the general rule. They are a part of the original parties to the transaction, and when they paid the draft drawn by Hibbard the transaction was remitted to precisely the position it would have occupied if they had forwarded the money to Hibbard before the purchase and there had been no transfer of the insurance. Besides, no notice was given to the insurance company of the assignment of the certificate of insurance to the libellants, and the doctrine stated in 2 Duer, Ins. 51, 52, note, and Id. 59, 60, has no application to the case under consideration.

The libellants were not assignees of the insurance for their sole benefit. They were assignees, if at all, for the parties jointly interested—for the partners.

Emmons & Hamilton, for libellants.
Palmer, Hooker & Pitkin, for respondent.

MILLER, District Judge. Under the agreement between Marsh & Sternberg, the libellants, and William B. Hibbard, he purchased several cargoes of wheat in Milwaukee, and shipped them for Marsh & Sternberg to Buffalo. This business continued through a portion of the season of 1871. The associates of Hibbard were not known to or recognized by Marsh & Sternberg as partners. Hibbard associated these persons with him on his own account, without regard to Marsh & Sternberg. These persons were in no sense the partners of Marsh & Sternberg, nor do they in any manner change the original relations between the parties. Hibbard may have an account to settle with his associates, but Marsh & Sternberg have no connection with them, as partners or otherwise.

The purchase and shipment of each cargo was a distinct and separate venture. By the arrangement the parties mutually granted to each other a legal remedy. Hibbard acquired a legal right to prosecute an action at law against Marsh & Sternberg for his share of the profits on the respective cargoes, and they had a right of action against him for their share of each loss. Hibbard did not acquire an interest as a partner with Marsh & Sternberg in any of the cargoes. A bill in equity would not lie between these parties for an account of profit and loss, as each party had a complete remedy at law, and Hibbard had no share or interest in the wheat. His interest in the business was provided for by way of compensation, and nothing more. Independently of the agreement, one venture or transaction would not make the parties technical partners, requiring a bill in equity for adjusting their accounts. Musier v. Trumpbour, 5 Wend. 274; Brubaker v. Robinson, 3 Pen. & W. 295; Gillis v. McKinney, 6 Watts & S. 78; Coles v. Coles, 15 Johns. 159; Brigham v. Eveleth, 9 Mass. 538; Galbreath v. Moore, 2 Watts, 86; Borrell's Adm'r v. Borrell, 9 Casey [33 Pa. St.] 492; Van Amringe v. Ellmaker, 4 Barr [4 Pa. St. 281.

There are decisions to the contrary, but courts are inclined to relieve parties of the complication of proceedings in equity in this respect as far as possible. But speculation is unnecessary, as the agreement between the parties fixes their respective rights. The objection in the answer in regard to the alleged partnership raises a question of remedy and not of right; and in this case there cannot be necessity of a settlement between the libellants and Hibbard for either profit or loss, as the cargo became a total loss by the vessel foundering before reaching her port of destination.

The dispatch of Marsh & Sternberg to Hibbard, on which he ordered the risk cancelled, was dated October 11th. On that day Ferguson, in trust for the bank, held the legal title to the cargo and the beneficial interest under the insurance. On that day no person could control the insurance but himself, and neither Marsh & Sternberg nor Hibbard, nor the respondent could disturb his interest in the insurance without his consent. Any act of theirs jointly or severally in this regard, would be void as to him.

On the morning of the 12th October Marsh & Sternberg, having honored the draft, became the legal owners of the cargo by indorsement of Ferguson of the bill of lading, and the assignees of the certificate of insurance, entitled to be paid the loss, if any, on return of the certificate. They acquired the same rights as Ferguson in the insurance. The right of Ferguson or his assigns to the loss became vested in Marsh & Sternberg, who have the same power as he had to maintain this libel.

William B. Hibbard had no authority from any source to cancel, or give notice of cancellation, of the policy of insurance while it was in the hands of a bona fide holder entitled to the payment of the loss, if any. At the time he gave the notice to respondent the certificate of insurance had passed to Marsh & Sternberg. He gave the notice without their knowledge or consent; and for this reason the cancellation, if made, was void as to Marsh & Sternberg, and it was also void as to them on the ground of mistake on the part of Hibbard. It cannot be claimed that this mistake prejudiced the respondent, as the loss was total, and the company could not have prevented it. If the loss had been partial, possibly the company might, by the notice of cancellation, have been induced not to investigate the loss. By the terms of the insurance contract, in case of loss, the money was payable to Ferguson or order on return of the certificate. The company demanded the certificate, which was not returned, but was in the hands of Marsh & Sternberg. It also demanded a portion of the premium, which was not adjusted nor paid. A mere memorandum of cancellation was made on the books. It is questionable whether the liability of the company did not continue, even in the absence of the mistake, until the certificate was returned and cancelled and the rate of premium fixed.

To hold the contract of insurance rescinded under these circumstances would sanction a very loose manner of business where the utmost strictness is called for. At all events the error of Hibbard was corrected by notice to the company, and the original rights and liabilities of the parties were not disturbed or changed. The company has not been released from its obligation to pay the amount of the insurance.

The objection that the premium had not been paid cannot avail the respondent. The company and Hibbard's insurance agency mutually credited each other, and at the end of every month they struck a balance of their accounts. This was a payment in effect; and at all events the certificate that W. B. Hibbard is insured implies a receipt of the premium, which is binding in the hands of third persons and innocent holders of the certificate. The legal presumption was that the premium had been paid.

Decree for libellants.

NOTE. That the fact that the premium had not been actually paid is not a good defense to an action on the policy, consult Trustees of First Baptist Church v. Brooklyn Fire Ins. Co., 28 N. Y. 153; Post v. Aetna Ins. Co., 43 Barb. 351; Boehen v. Williamsburgh Ins. Co., 35 N. Y. 131; Pino v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co., 19 La. Ann. 214; De Gaminde v. Pigou, 4 Taunt. 246.

The cancellation of a policy must be the act of the principals; a broker or agent, even though the policy may have been left in his hands, has no right to demand or consent to the cancellation. Xenos v. Wickham, 33 Law J. C. P. 13.

PATENTS—DELAY IN RENEWING APPLICATION—ABANDONMENT—REJECTION—PRESUMPTION.

1. Where an inventor, whose application was rejected and withdrawn in 1851, delayed to renew it until 1869, and meanwhile—viz., 1859—a patent on substantially the same improvement was granted to another, the existence of which patent became known to the first inventor in 1865: Held, that the legal inference from these facts is that he acquiesced in the action of the patent office, and abandoned whatever claim he had to the public.

[Cited in United States Rifle, etc., Co. v. Whitney Arms Co., Case No. 16,793. Distinguished in Colgate v. Western Union Tel. Co., Id. 2,995.]

2. It is not material whether the rejection of his claim was right or wrong. Even if wrong, he was obliged, if he insisted on his claim, to take some action on the subject within a reasonable time, either by an appeal from the commissioner or by a bill in equity in the proper court.

3. The simple allegation in a bill in equity, under section 52 of the patent act, that the inventor did not abandon his claim to the public, is not enough to rebut the presumption to the contrary arising from the above state of facts.

4. The first inventor ought to have a patent for his invention, if he seeks to obtain it within a reasonable time and by the methods the law points out.

5. The proviso of section 35 of the act of 1870 [16 Stat. 202], which provides for the renewal of rejected and withdrawn applications, is subject to the implied condition that the applicant has not lost his right to make the application by abandonment or surrender of the same.

6. This proviso was not intended to restore what had been voluntarily given to the public, or what had become the property of the public by the neglect or refusal for a series of years to prosecute what was originally a valid claim.

Demurrer to bill in equity. Suit brought by complainant, Hiram H. Marsh, to obtain a patent upon an "improvement in cultivators," by proceedings under section 52 of the patent act of 1870, which reads as follows: "That whenever a patent on application is refused, for any reason whatever, either by the commissioner or by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, upon appeal from the commissioner, the applicant may have remedy by bill in equity; and the court having cognizance thereof, on notice to adverse parties, and other due proceedings had, may adjudge that such applicant is entitled, according to law, to receive a patent for his invention, as specified in his claim, or for any part thereof, as the facts in the case may appear. And such adjudication, if it be in favor of the right of the applicant, shall authorize the commissioner to issue such patent, on the applicant filing in the patent office a copy of the adjudication, and otherwise complying with the requisitions of law. And in all cases where there is no opposing party, a copy of the bill shall be served on the commissioner, and all the expenses of the proceeding shall be paid by the applicant, whether the final decision is in his favor or not." In addition to Thomas Sayles and the other parties interested in what was alleged to be a conflicting patent, granted to James Dundas Feb. 8, 1859 [No. 22,859], and reissued Oct. 16, 1866 [No. 2,380], a copy of the bill was served upon the commissioner of patents, who thereupon filed a demurrer to the bill. The case came up for argument upon the demurrer, which was based upon several distinct points, the most prominent among which were, first, that the facts, as set forth in the bill, showed that the plaintiff had abandoned the invention, and therefore was not entitled to the relief sought; second, that inasmuch as Marsh's proceedings before the patent office were, in contemplation of law, ex parte, he had a right, under section 48 of the act of July 8, 1870, to appeal from the adverse decision of the commissioner to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting in banc, and that he was bound to exhaust his remedy in that direction before proceeding by a bill in equity, as provided in section 52, this latter section, it was urged, being designed to furnish a remedy immediately upon a refusal by the commissioner to grant a patent only in those cases—e. g., in interferences—in which his action is made final. Only one of the various grounds of demurrer was considered by the court in its opinion.

Goodwin, Larned & Towle, for complainant.

Fisher & Duncan, for commissioner of patents.

Before DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge, and BLODGETT, District Judge.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. This is a bill filed under section 52 of the revised patent law of July 8, 1870, which authorizes a bill to be filed in equity when a patent has been refused. A demurrer has been put into the bill by the commissioner of patents; and, so far as it is necessary to state the facts of the case, they here follow:

In July, 1851, Marsh, the plaintiff, made application for a patent for an "improvement in cultivators." The same month his claim for a patent was rejected by the office. In November, 1851, he made application for, and there was refunded to him, twenty dollars of the duty fee which he had paid previously.

In August, 1851, James Dundas applied for a patent for substantially the same improvement. In December, 1852, this application was rejected by the patent office. This rejection, some years after, was reconsidered, and in February, 1859, a patent was granted to Dundas.

In October, 1866, Dundas obtained a reissue; and very soon after, Thomas Sayles, one of these defendants, as assignee of the Dundas patent, filed a bill in this court against one Hapgood and others, to restrain them from infringing the letters patent of Dundas. In October, 1869, this court decided the Dundas patent invalid, because Marsh was the prior inventor. The case is reported [Case No. 12,420].

Marsh did not know of the application and issuing of the patent to Dundas till 1865. He waited for the determination of the suit of Sayles v. Hapgood [supra], and in December, 1869, renewed his application, and in November, 1870, his claim was rejected. Decisions of Commissioner of Patents, 1870, p. 151.

In addition to these facts set forth in the bill, it alleges that Marsh never abandoned his invention to the public. There is no explanation whatever given, than as above, of the long delay, except that he supposed the decision of the commissioner in 1851 was conclusive, and that he was wholly uninformed of his rights. And he insists the patent office is estopped from setting up, in bar of his renewed application, the wrongful rejection of his claim and the issuing of a patent to another.

Various objections are taken in the demurrer to the bill, but we will consider only one, viz., that the bill does not make such a case as to entitle the plaintiff to the relief he seeks. And it seems to us that the legal result from the facts stated in the bill is, notwithstanding his denial to the contrary, that he did acquiesce in the action of the patent office in 1851, and therefore did abandon whatever claim he might have to the public; and, according to the view we take, it is not material whether the rejection of his claim was right or wrong. Concede that it was wrongful: if he insisted on his claim he was obliged, within a reasonable time, to take some action on the subject, either by an appeal from the commissioner or by a bill in equity in the proper court.

In this case he made no motion for more than eighteen years after the rejection of his claim, during all which time his invention remained in the patent office with such description as he had chosen to give. We think the simple allegation that he did not abandon his claim to the public is not enough to rebut the presumption arising from this state of facts. It is not necessary to decide whether any satisfactory explanation could be given of so long a delay. It is not furnished in this bill.

It is plain that, in consequence of the decision in the case of Sayles v. Hapgood [supra], an attempt was afterwards made to recall an abandoned claim. To sustain this bill would be to vitalize many an old forgotten claim that now lies buried under the rubbish of the patent office. We think it no answer to say that for his invention Marsh ought to have had a patent; because the meaning of that is, he ought to have had it, if he, within a reasonable time, and by the methods the law points out, sought to obtain it.

Section 35 of the patent law of 1870, declares "that any person who has an interest in an invention where a patent was ordered to issue, on the payment of the final fee, and who has failed to make payment within six months from the time when it was allowed, * * * shall have a right to make an application for a patent the same as in an original application: "Provided, that the second application be made within two years after the allowance of the original application;" * * * "And provided further, that when an application for a patent has been rejected or withdrawn prior to the passage of this act, the applicant shall have six months from the date of such passage to renew his application, or to file a new one; and, if he omit to do either, his application shall be held to have been abandoned."

It is argued that the plaintiff is within the terms of this section, and that the second proviso applies literally to the facts of this case. It is true that the application of the plaintiff for a patent was rejected prior to the passage of the act, and it is insisted that the sequence to this is that the applicant has six months from the date of its passage to renew his application. This is in fact the letter of the proviso, and yet it must be true that it is subject to the implied condition that the applicant has not lost his right to make the application, by abandonment or surrender of the same. It could not have been intended to restore what had already been voluntarily given to the public, or what had become the property of the public by the neglect or refusal for a series of years to prosecute what was originally a valid claim. Here the neglect or refusal had continued for more than eighteen years, and we can not think that the proviso in section 35 was intended to include so stale a claim as this. It may be admitted that, as stated in the last clause of section 35, abandonment is a question of fact, and we hold, notwithstanding the denial and pretexts to the contrary stated, that Marsh did in fact abandon his claim to the public; that such is the necessary conclusion from the allegations contained in the bill.

The demurrer will, therefore, be sustained.

MARSH v. UNITED STATES.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 301.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1857.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—LIMITATION OF QUANTITY.

The limitation of quantity in the fourth condition of the grant must govern, and the claimant confirmed to the precise quantity of three square leagues.

Claim for twelve leagues of land in Contra Costa county, rejected by the board, and appealed by the claimant.

Horace Hawes, for appellant.

P. Della Torre, U. S. Atty., for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case is for a tract of land called "Los Meganos," granted to José Noriega, October 13th, 1835, and approved by the territorial deputation, October 15th, 1835. The final documento and titulo issued December 2d, of the same year. The original grant was not produced to the board, nor was any satisfactory evidence of its contents given. The expediente, however, containing the petition, informes and decree of concession, was found duly archived, and on these documents, together with parol proof that the titulo had in fact issued, the claimant relied for confirmation. In his petition, Noriega set out the boundaries of the land solicited with some particularity, and states its extent to be four leagues from south to north, and three from east to west. Inasmuch as the decree of concession and the approval of the deputation showed that the land of "Los Meganos" had been granted, it was contended that the lost titulo must have embraced the land solicited in the petition. It was not, however, urged that all the land embraced within the boundaries had been granted, and the claim was confined to a tract of twelve square leagues which had been, at the instance of the claimant, surveyed by the surveyor general. By this survey, the last line which enclosed the rancho had been so run as to include the precise quantity of twelve leagues. Had the surveyor's lines been extended so as to embrace the entire tract according to the principles on which the survey was founded, the land would have been found to be about fifteen square leagues in extent. A survey, according to the description contained in the petition, would, it is observed by Mr. Commissioner Felch, embrace some twenty or twenty-five square leagues of land. Since the cause has been pending on appeal, the original record of the titulo has been produced from the archives, where it is set out at length. The fourth condition states the extent of the granted land to be a little more than three square leagues, and it contains the usual direction for a judicial measurement and a reservation of the sobrante.

It is urged that this limitation should be disregarded as being repugnant to the obvious intention of the grantor, and probably introduced by mistake. It is not, perhaps, very clear what the claimant [Alice Marsh] supposes herself entitled to. Whether she contends that the grant should be treated as a grant by metes and bounds, and the whole tract embraced within the boundaries mentioned in the petition should be confirmed to her, to the extent of twenty or twenty-five leagues, or whether, as it appears to have been admitted before the board, she should be restricted to the quantity of twelve leagues, according to the survey procured to be made. It is presumed, however, that independently of the limitation contained in the fourth condition, it would not be contended that the governor could have intended to grant a tract of twenty or twenty-five leagues in extent, when the petitioner himself stated it to contain only twelve leagues, and two of the witnesses a much smaller quantity; and such seems to have been the view taken of the grant by the counsel for the claimant. The grant cannot, therefore, be treated as a grant by metes and bounds, and the only question is, which of the specifications of quantity shall govern—that contained in the petition, or that contained in the grant?

It is urged that the governor by his decree of concession, and the deputation by confirming the title to "Los Meganos," clearly indicated their intention to grant the tract as described in the petition, and of the extent therein mentioned. Had the boundaries of this tract been found to embrace only the quantity stated in the petition; had the attention of the governor been particularly directed to the question of its extent; had he been apprised of its extent by the testimony of witnesses, and with these facts before him, repeated in his concession, and in the title, the boundaries as set forth in the petition; and had the deputation confirmed with express reference to those boundaries, we might have supposed, as in the case of Rosa Pacheco, that the limitation in the condition was the result of a clerical error—provided that in attributing to the governor the intention to grant by metes and bounds, we did not suppose him to have exceeded the quantity of eleven leagues to which his granting power was limited. But in this case the proceedings show, that in all probability the limitation in the condition accurately expressed the intention of the governor and of the assembly.

The petition was referred to the alcalde of the capital to take information, by the oaths of three competent witnesses, as to the qualifications, etc., of the petitioner, and the extent and character of the land. One of them states that the tract petitioned for may be three leagues long, and in width from two leagues to less than one-half a league. The second witness states its extent to be about two and one-half or three leagues in length, and from one-half to two leagues in width. The third witness states it to be four or five leagues in length, and three in breadth. It thus appears that by the evidence of two out of three witnesses the governor and the deputation were apprised that the extent of the land of "Los Meganos" was about three leagues. When, therefore, they granted the land by that name, it is at least as probable that they intended a tract of the extent sworn to by the two witnesses, as of the larger extent sworn to by the third or as represented by the petition. The limitation in the condition of the grant removes all doubt upon the subject, and unequivocally expresses the intention which, without it, we might well have attributed to the grantor.

The claim to twelve leagues rests entirely upon the supposition that the governor intended, by the term "Los Meganos," a tract of the extent represented by the petitioner. But when we find him informed by the depositions of two witnesses that the land of that name only included about three leagues, there is surely as much reason to suppose that he meant a tract of the smaller extent as of the larger. There is therefore nothing repugnant to the apparent intention of the governor or the deputation in the introduction of the limitation of quantity in the fourth condition. Nor can I perceive on what grounds the court would be authorized to strike from the grant so important a part of it. As the grant can in no case be deemed a grant by metes and bounds, the words "a little more than," which precede the words "three leagues," are not susceptible of any definite construction. They were probably inserted as an authority to the judicial officer, slightly to increase the quantity for convenience of boundary, or similar reasons. As no such discretion can be confided to the surveyor general, those words must be rejected for uncertainty, and the claimant confirmed to the precise quantity of three square leagues, to be located within the boundaries described in the petition, in the form and divisions prescribed by law for surveys in California, and embracing the entire grant in one tract.

COPYRIGHT—PRINTS—LABELS—REGISTRATION.

The statutory provisions which confer the rights and regulate the remedies of persons who register in the patent office, under the act of June 18, 1874 (18 Stat. 78), prints or labels designed to be used for any other articles of manufacture than pictorial illustrations and works connected with the fine arts, are those which are contained in sections 4948–4971 of the Revised Statutes, in regard to copyrights.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The statutory provisions which confer the rights and regulate the remedies of persons who register in the patent office, under the act of June 18, 1874 (18 Stat. 78), prints or labels designed to be used for any other articles of manufacture than pictorial illustrations and works connected with the fine arts, are those which are contained in sections 4948–4971 of the Revised Statutes, in regard to copyrights. The exclusive right of printing and publishing, given by section 4952, is given to the author or proprietor only on complying with the provisions of sections 4948–4971. One of those provisions (section 4956) is, that no person shall be entitled to a copyright unless he shall, "before publication," deliver at the proper office, (in this case the patent office,) a printed copy of the title of the article in respect of which the copyright is to be claimed. In the present case the first label and its title were registered September 24th, 1875. I understand the bill to state that this label was used by the plaintiffs' assignors, in the sale of their mixture, and of the bottles containing it, to which such label was affixed, before that date, and as early as the mixture itself was sold, to wit, June or July, 1875. The sale of the bottles of the mixture, with the label on it, was a publication of the label. At all events, the bill does not allege that the title and label were deposited before the publication of the label. Such averment is necessary. As to the other three labels, they and their titles were registered March 20th, 1877, and I understand the bill to state that those labels were used by the plaintiffs before that date, in the sale of the mixture.

The motion for an injunction is denied.

MARSH v. WHITMORE.

[1 Hask. 391.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Feb., 1872.[2]

PLEADING IN EQUITY — WEIGHT OF ANSWER — PLEDGE BONDS—SALE AT AUCTION — PURCHASE BY PLEDGEE—VOIDABLE—LACHES — NEGLECT BY ATTORNEY—INDEMNITY.

1. The answer to a bill in equity, so far as responsive, is to be taken as true, unless disproved by evidence of greater weight than the testimony of a single witness.

2. Bonds, pledged as security for liability incurred by the pledgee, cannot be purchased by him, even though they are sold at public auction.

3. Bonds, purchased by the pledgee at such sale, may be redeemed by the pledgor at his pleasure within a reasonable time.

4. Such purchase is voidable by the pledgor, and not absolutely void.

5. The pledgor, having knowledge of all the circumstances of the sale, after the lapse of eleven years is barred in equity from avoiding the sale by his own laches.

6. If such pledgor would avoid the effect of each lapse of time in equity, on the ground of concealed fraud, he must set forth in his bill with particularity, when and by what means the fraud was discovered.

7. Neglect, by an attorney at law of his duty in collecting demands left with him for collection, is not a subject of equity jurisdiction, as the parties have a full and complete remedy at law.

8. An officer has a right to require indemnity from the plaintiff before he is compelled to attach property of the debtor.

9. An attorney at law is justified in acting according to the decision of the supreme court of a state, although it be afterwards reversed by the supreme court of the United States.

In equity. Bill by a pledgor [George S. Marsh], charging that the respondent [Nathaniel W. Whitmore] fraudulently converted to his own use bonds given him as a pledge, and asking that he account for the same. The answer denied all fraud, and alleged that the bonds were lawfully sold and applied to the payment of the pledgor's debt, the payment of which they were pledged to secure.

FOX, District Judge. The rule being well established in equity, that all the allegations of the answer, which are responsive to the bill, shall be taken as true, unless they are disproved by evidence of greater weight than the testimony of a single witness, it becomes important to compare the bill and answer to ascertain how far the latter is to be deemed evidence in the case, as the only evidence produced by the complainant in support of his bill is his own testimony, and some few exhibits which are not very material.

The bill was filed March 12, 1869, and charges, that in 1855 the complainant owned $6,500 of bonds of the Kennebec and Portland Railroad, issued in October, 1852, and $2,000 of notes of said corporation; that being indebted to certain parties in the state of Maine, he retained the respondent, a counsellor at law, as his counsel and attorney to effect a compromise with his creditors, the respondent agreeing to advance money for that purpose, if the complainant would entrust and deliver to him the bonds and notes as security and indemnity for his advances and a fair and reasonable compensation for his services; that confiding in the respondent as his counsel and agent, he delivered to him the bonds and notes, who received the same upon the trust aforesaid, and agreed not to sell or dispose of said securities without complainant's consent, and not to claim or demand thereof more than was fair or sufficient to fully indemnify him for his advances and services, and when indemnified, to return to complainant on demand so much and such parts thereof as were not necessary to indemnify him; that at the time the securities were delivered to Whitmore, complainant instructed him to sue the notes and attach certain personal property of the corporation pointed out by complainant, and if not thus paid to collect the same from the stockholders who were personally liable, and that Whitmore agreed to attend diligently to the collection of the same. The bill further charges as follows:

"That on or about the first day of October, A. D. 1856, at said Gardiner, your orator not consenting thereto, the said Whitmore, in violation of said trust and of his duty as counsel, attorney, and agent of your orator as aforesaid, caused said bonds to be sold at auction.

"And your orator further shows unto your honors that the said Whitmore, as well before as after said sale, pretended and represented to your orator that he had expended large sums of money and incurred great expense for and on account of your orator in the premises, and that his said advances and services, together with the amount due and owing him for his said advances to your orator, greatly exceeded the fair value of said securities entrusted to him as aforesaid; that the sale of said bonds as aforesaid was a bona fide sale after due and sufficient notice and advertisement thereof; that said bonds brought all they were fairly worth in the market; that the purchaser was a bona fide purchaser thereof at said sale; that said notes were of no value and were not collectible of said company or of the stockholders of said company, and that your orator was largely indebted to him for his said advances and services after he had fairly and faithfully realized out of said securities so entrusted to him, all they were fairly worth; and your orator confiding in him as his counsel, attorney, and agent as aforesaid, believed such representations to be true.

"And your orator is now informed and believes and charges, that the amount due and owing the said Whitmore by your orator, for his said advances to your orator and on his account, and for services rendered as aforesaid, was the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars or thereabouts, and no more; that the representation of the said Whitmore, that there was due him from your orator a much larger sum than said securities were fairly worth, or than could be fairly realized therefrom, were and are untrue; that the sale of said bonds as aforesaid was not a bona fide sale upon due notice and sufficient advertisement thereof; that Robert Thompson, who attended said sale and became the purchaser of said bonds, did so by the procurement of said Whitmore; that said Thompson bid in said bonds not for himself or on his own account, but for and on account of said Whitmore, and for much less than the real value therefor, viz.: for and at the rate of five cents on a dollar or thereabouts, as your orator is informed and believes; that the said bonds were never delivered to the said Thompson after said pretended sale, and he paid nothing therefor; that said bonds were at the time of the sale and representations aforesaid, as the said Whitmore well knew, of the fair value of $6,500 or thereabouts, and said sale was so made in order to deceive, defraud, and injure your orator in the premises, and for the purpose of defeating and extinguishing said trust and your orator's right to reclaim and redeem said securities, and that said Whitmore might obtain the title to the same for much less than the real value thereof; that said notes were at the time they were received by said Whitmore and long afterwards collectible of said company and of the stockholders of said company, as the said Whitmore well knew; and that if said notes had not been collected by said Whitmore, the failure to collect them is attributable solely to his gross neglect, by reason whereof he has become and is justly chargeable with the full amount of said notes and interest thereon.

"And your orator further alleges, that he did not, until lately, by reason of the fraudulent concealments of said Whitmore in the premises, come to a knowledge of the matters and things alleged; that he was ignorant touching the fraudulent conduct and practices of said Whitmore; and that he was wholly ignorant of his rights in this regard, or that he could have redress at law or in equity touching the premises, and remained so till he had consulted counsel and been advised just previous to filing this bill of complaint; that within two years he had demanded of said Whitmore an account of said trust property and of the amount received by him on account of the same which he unreasonably neglected and refused to render.

"Wherefore he prays, that he may be required to make full, true and direct answer to all and singular the matters therein before stated and charged, and also to the several interrogatories thereunder written, and that he may be required to account, &c., and surrender the stock received by him in exchange for said bonds, or pay the value thereof in money, &c."

The second specific interrogatory contained in the bill is:

"Whether you caused said bonds or notes to be sold at auction about October 1, 1856, and what advertisement of such sale you gave? Whether they were bid in by one Robert Thompson, and if so, whether he purchased for himself and on his own account, or for you and your account. Whether you delivered the same to him after said sale, and at what price were they struck off to him? If not bid in by said Thompson, then by whom and for how much?"

And the fifth is:

The respondent in his answer admits he was an attorney at law, but denies that he was ever employed by the complainant as his attorney or agent, or in any capacity to adjust and compromise his liabilities with his creditors, and avers:

"That he never undertook to effect such a compromise, or to advance money for that purpose, and that the bonds and notes mentioned in the bill were not entrusted to him for any such purpose as is alleged in the bill; but that it is true, that on July 13, 1855, he did receive of the complainant $6,500 of the bonds to secure H. W. Paine and himself against any and all liabilities which they or either of them had or might incur for or on account of said complainant, and especially to secure the payment of three notes of that date, given by complainant to respondent, and amounting to $3,481.57, and also to secure the payment of a note of $90 given by complainant to C. Danforth on which said Whitmore was surety.

"That complainant never paid either of said notes, although repeatedly urged so to do, and that Aug. 27, 1856, he and Paine notified complainant that the bonds would be sold at auction Oct. 1, 1856, at Gardiner, if the notes were not paid, but at the earnest solicitation of complainant and his promise that he would soon adjust the whole matter, the sale was waived; that complainant paid no further attention to the matter, and on March 20, 1857, respondent notified him he should sell the bonds on the 4th of April, but hoping that the matter might be adjusted the sale was again waived till May 26, 1857, when he advertised the bonds for sale June 20, 1857, at ten o'clock, at the Gardiner Hotel, and notified the complainant in writing of the time and place of sale, and the complainant replied in writing that the respondent must do with said bonds what he thought was best for all concerned, and he fully believed it was best then to sell the same.

"That notice of the sale was published three weeks successively in the Saturday Evening Transcript, a paper published in Gardiner; that he sold $4,500 of said bonds at auction at the time and place appointed for $950, when the sale was adjourned by the auctioneer to the 23d day of said June, at the same place, when the balance of said bonds, being $2,000, were sold at auction for $410.

"That $500 of said bonds were purchased by E. A. Chadwick for $100.50, and $1,000 by W. L. Lewis for $204, and the balance was purchased by the respondent, and immediately after said sale, he sent said Marsh the auctioneer's account of the sale, containing the names of the purchasers and the prices paid, and endorsed the proceeds of said sale on the said notes of the complainant. That the respondent afterwards bought of said Chadwick and Lewis the bonds purchased by them, at the same prices they were sold for, and that the prices for which said bonds sold were the full and fair value of said bonds at that time, and more than he could get offered him at private sale, on enquiry for a purchaser.

"That after that, in 1858 and 1859, said bonds of said railroad depreciated in value so that they sold in the market at ten dollars on the hundred and thereabouts. That in 1858 he sought an interview with the complainant at Augusta in this state, for the purpose of trying to get a full settlement of his matters with him, and the complainant then stated to him that he received the account of the sales sent him by respondent. That he then represented to the complainant that there was considerable due him over and above the proceeds of said bonds and his securities, and urged him to pay, saying to him, that though he was not the owner of the bonds, he could get them, and would do so and give up all if he would pay, but the complainant answered, in substance, that he did not think the bonds worth so much as they sold for, that he must keep what repondent had got, and if complainant ever got able he would pay the balance.

"That he was never guilty of any fraudulent practices towards the complainant in any way, nor did he in any way conceal any facts in regard to the premises from the complainant, but on the contrary, the sale of said bonds was fair, in good faith, after due notice, made for the purpose of realizing the most possible for the complainant from the same, and when they were depreciating in the market, and continued to do so for some years after, till they were worth but half as much as they were sold for at the sale; that all the facts were fully stated to the complainant and he fully approved and ratified the proceedings in regard to the sale of said bonds, and he submits, that if he had not so ratified and approved said proceedings, he has been guilty of such laches, after having a full knowledge of the facts, that he is not entitled to the relief prayed for in his bill of complaint."

To the second interrogatory propounded to him the respondent makes answer:

"He did cause the bonds to be advertised and sold, as is fully set forth in the answer. * * * The complainant was personally notified as early as the first day of June, 1857, or thereabouts, of the time and place of sale. Robert Thompson was not the purchaser of any of the bonds. The names of the purchasers and the prices for which they sold are hereinbefore fully specified."

The main groundwork of the bill is an alleged sale of these bonds by the respondent in violation of his duty as trustee, and a purchase of them by himself, through the intervention of one Thompson, in fraud of complainant's rights, of which acts of the respondent the complainant avers he had no knowledge by reason of the fraudulent concealment of Whitmore, till a short time before the suit was instituted. These matters are charged with fullness and particularity, and the respondent is called upon to make full, true, and direct answer thereto.

In his answer, the respondent denies that any fraudulent practices were committed by him in the sale, but states, that the sale was at public auction after due notice to complainant; that the larger portion of the bonds were bid in by the respondent, and the balance by Chadwick & Lewis, from whom the respondent purchased them at the prices they were sold for at the auction; that the full cash value of the bonds was then realized, viz.: about twenty per cent. and that in a year they fell to ten per cent.

To that portion of the bill which alleges complainant had no notice of the sale, and that respondent was the purchaser, he answers, that immediately after the sale he sent complainant the auctioneer's account of the sale, containing the names of the purchasers and the prices at which the bonds sold, which account the next year at Augusta complainant acknowledged the receipt of.

The complainant in his bill sets forth statements made to him by the respondent,

"that the sale was bona fide, after due and sufficient notice and advertisement thereof; that said bonds brought all they were fairly worth in the market; that the purchaser was a bona fide purchaser thereof;" and also propounds to him interrogatory five on the same subject.

The respondent was thus called upon not only to answer the specific interrogatory, but also the allegations in the bill as to statements and admissions made by him on this matter. In reply thereto he states, that at Augusta in 1858 the complainant admitted he had received the account of sales sent him by respondent, and that respondent told him there was considerable due on the notes over and beyond the proceeds of said bonds, and that though he was not the owner of the bonds he could get them, and would do so, and give up all if he would pay; but that complainant replied that he did not think the bonds worth so much as they sold for and that respondent must keep what he got, and if he ever got able he would pay the balance.

To the fifth specific interrogatory respondent's reply is:

"I did after said sale send to the complainant the auctioneer's account of the sale, giving names of purchasers and prices for which the bonds sold, and afterwards, at the interview in Augusta, in 1858, I did state to the complainant, in substance, but not in the precise words, that I made the sale at auction after duly advertising the same, and that the sale was a good sale. I did not, to my recollection, use the words bona fide. I then stated to the complainant the gross amount of the sale and that it had been applied on the notes."

The court is of opinion that the answer is so far responsive to the charges and substance of the bill as to be evidence in behalf of the respondent, and to prove that the bonds were sold at public auction after due notice to complainant and advertisement in the public prints, and that soon after the sale the complainant had full information as to the prices realized and by whom the bonds were purchased. Is this evidence overcome by satisfactory evidence of the witnesses, or by the testimony of one witness corroborated by facts and circumstances which give it greater weight than the answer?

All the testimony in contradiction of the answer is found in the complainant's deposition; and in that he does state that the first he knew of the bonds being bid in by respondent was in 1869, and that he had a conversation with him a few years before, and he then said, he had no interest in the bonds, and that it was a bona fide sale. But to the seventh cross interrogatory which is: "State whether the respondent met you in the court house in Augusta in 1858 and explained to you the sale of the bonds and the situation of the notes, and what you said to him, if anything?" He answers: "I have some faint recollection of meeting him some time, but can't say when or where. The substance of the conversation I cannot recollect." This answer certainly does not afford much support to the statements found in his bill, which was sworn to by him March 9, 1869, and which purports to give with some detail the admissions made to him by the respondent. The complainant does not present himself as a witness in all respects worthy of entire reliance and confidence as to the truth and accuracy of his statements. The averments made by him in his bill as to the motives and purpose of this pledge of these securities is most clearly shown by the receipt given at the time to be erroneous, and that, on the contrary, the respondent's statement in his answer upon this point is true and correct; and it is equally manifest that the complainant must have been aware, prior to 1869, that the bonds were bid in by respondent, as the bill was filed in March, 1869, and the demand for an account was made by his attorney on the respondent on the 7th of the preceding January, while in his bill he states that he did not until lately come to a knowledge of these matters, and that within two years of the filing of the bill he had demanded an account of his trust from the respondent.

The evidence produced by the complainant is not sufficient, in the opinion of the court, to overcome the effect of the answer according to the well-established rules in equity.

Two causes of action are set forth in the complainant's bill; one on account of the bonds, and the other on account of the notes; and although the bill charges that both bonds and notes were at the same time pledged to the respondent, it is quite certain that such was not the case. The memorandum given July 13, 1855, at the time the bonds were deposited with respondent, does not mention the notes, and the answer states that they were not received by respondent until the next year. "They were left with him for collection with authority to retain them as security for his claims on the complainant;" and the bill charges that "the complainant pointed out certain personal property of the corporation, which he directed to be attached, and if the notes were not thus paid, to proceed against the stockholders on their personal liability, and that if the same are not collected, it has been owing to the gross neglect and willful default of said Whitmore."

This abstract from the bill demonstrates that so far as any claim is made against the respondent on account of the notes, it is solely founded on the neglect of his duty as an attorney at law. There is no charge of any fraud in this respect, but the whole gravamen is neglect; and this portion of the bill is nothing more than inserting in a bill in equity a count in case for neglect of duty as an attorney at law, in collection of demands entrusted to him for that purpose. A full and complete remedy at law exists, and may be had by complainant, if the facts would sustain such a suit, and it is clear that this court, as a court of equity, should not sanction such an attempt to confound the jurisdiction of the courts.

It is equally clear on the evidence, that the respondent has not been guilty of any negligence in this behalf. From his letter of March 20, 1856, to complainant, it appears "that the officer would not attach the property unless he had a bond of indemnity," which security he had a right to require, and it was the complainant's duty to furnish, if he desired the attachment to be made. It is shown by the testimony of Mr. Bradbury, "that the corporation failed and became insolvent in the latter part of 1855, and has continued insolvent ever since, and that all its property, so far as he knew, was covered by mortgages; that he had many demands in his office for collection which he was unable to collect or secure, could discover no means of securing them, and that in a suit against the stockholders, the supreme court of Maine held they were not liable." This decision was made in 1858, and was almost universally acquiesced in by the profession. Hundreds of actions were decided in accordance with it, and it was not until December, 1864, that the decision was reversed by the supreme court of the United States. An attorney certainly cannot be chargeable with negligence, when he accepts as a correct exposition of the law, a solemn decision of the supreme court of the state.

The memorandum of July 13, 1855, shows, that the bonds were deposited with Whitmore to secure to him the payment of complainant's notes and the note to Danforth, on which Whitmore was surety, and that "the coupons of said bonds may be applied by Whitmore towards said notes." The notes were not paid at maturity, and payment was repeatedly demanded without avail until the bonds were sold at public auction after notice to the complainant. The full market value of the bonds was realized, but the respondent himself purchased $5,000 of the amount at the sale, and was recognized as the purchaser by the auctioneer, and $1,500 were bid off by other parties from whom the respondent purchased them at the price they were sold for at auction. It does not appear that those parties at the sale acted in behalf of, or by any understanding with Whitmore, although it may be inferred such was the case from their subsequent dealings with the bonds.

It is quite clear that a pawnee cannot become the purchaser of the property pledged, even when sold at public auction. The law imposes upon him this restraint to insure good faith and fidelity on his part. This rule has been recognized both by American and Roman law. Story, Bailm. § 319; Maryland Fire Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 242; Middlesex Bank v. Minot, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 325.

The sale therefore was tortious and invalid as against the complainant, and it depended on his election whether it should become operative. It was voidable by him, but not absolutely void. The complainant was fully advised of the names of the purchasers and of the amount for which the bonds sold as early as July, 1857. The bonds continued to depreciate in the market until the next year, when they would not have produced more than half the amount for which they had been sold. In 1863 the complainant himself sold some of the same class of bonds for thirty per cent. flat, and Mr. Bradbury states that he received some from him at that rate in payment of his account. It was not until January, 1869, that the complainant made any claim to the bonds, or that the respondent was in any way accountable to him for any breach of contract or misconduct in relation to them.

The complainant, after full knowledge of all that had been done by respondent, acquiesced, and by his silence, sanctioned and adopted the proceedings of the respondent for more than eleven years, during which time there had been great changes in the value of these securities, falling fifty per cent. below the amount for which he had been credited on his notes, and subsequently rising in value till they are said to be worth nearly their face.

Will a court of equity sanction such silence and delay, and allow a party thus to reap so large a benefit from his remissness? The court cannot but be of opinion that it was the duty of the party, when fully advised of what had been done, in some way within six years at least, to have communicated to the respondent his disaffirmance of his conduct, and to have notified him that he should insist on his rights; and that after so long a time, and such great changes in the value of the property, it is not consistent with the principles which guide courts of equity, to permit him to repudiate the transaction at so late a day. If he could repudiate it after a sleep of eleven years, under full knowledge of the wrong inflicted upon him, there would seem to be no limit or restraint which could be imposed upon him or his representative in case of his decease. In Doggett v. Emerson [Case No. 3,960], Judge Story says: "Lapse of time in many cases is a most important consideration and weighs much, and sometimes, est maximi et momenti ponderis, especially when there has been a great change of circumstances as to the character and value of the property in the intermediate period; and a fortiori where the party complaining has been fairly put on his diligence, and has had ample means of inquiring as to all the material facts, and has chosen to lie by in gross indifference and indolence." See, also, Hough v. Richardson [Id. 6,722].

"There is a defence peculiar to courts of equity, founded on lapse of time and the staleness of the claim, where no statute of limitations governs the case. In such cases, courts of equity often act upon their own inherent doctrine of discouraging, for the peace of society, antiquated demands, by refusing to interfere where there has been gross laches in prosecuting the claim, or long acquiescence in the assertion of adverse rights." Story, Eq. Jur. § 1520, approved by the supreme court of the United States, in Wagner v. Baird, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 258; Badger v. Badger, 2 Wall [69 U. S.] 94; Id. [Case No. 718.] The statute of limitations is not pleaded in the case at bar, but laches is relied on and distinctly set forth as matter of defence in the answer, and in the opinion of the court the complainant is clearly chargeable with such neglect of his rights as to bar him of all claim to redress, which otherwise he might have been entitled to.

The complainant avers that he "did not, until lately, by reason of the fraudulent concealments of said Whitmore in the premises, come to a knowledge of the several matters and things hereinbefore alleged," but he does not state when or by what means the fraud was discovered. Such general and unsubstantial allegations of excuse cannot be regarded by a court of equity as sufficient. On the contrary, it is well settled that if the complainant would avoid the effect of lapse of time, or the statute of limitations, on the ground of concealed fraud, he must set forth with particularity when and by what means the fraud was discovered, and the averment so made must be supported by proof. Badger v. Badger, supra. In New Albany v. Burke, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 107, the same length of time had elapsed since the transaction had taken place, and the court says, "No excuse is therefore shown for the long delay, and it is difficult to see why they are not barred by the rule in equity analogous to the statute of limitations."

At the hearing, objection was taken that Paine should have been joined as a party respondent. This objection, under the circumstances, does not appear to have been made seasonably, as the case was allowed to come to argument before it was presented. It was admitted that Paine was a citizen of Massachusetts at the time the bill was filed, and it was shown that he never actually received the bonds, or in any way took any control over the same. It did not appear that he had made any advances or incurred any liabilities on account of the bonds, or that he had any claim or right of any kind to the same, or had ever asserted such right, and that the bonds were retained and held by the respondent, and by him disposed of, and that the proceeds had been by him applied toward the satisfaction of the liabilities of the complainant. If he had any reason to suppose that Paine had any interest to be affected by the decree, we think he should, in an earlier stage, have made known his claim and brought it to the knowledge of the court. The bill asks for relief only against the proceedings and dealings of the respondent with the bonds, and makes no claim that Paine has in any way wronged or injured the complainant; and although Paine might properly have been made a party, we do not think that it was necessary that he should be a party in order to have done full justice between the complainant and respondent. If the case could have been sustained on its merits, the case of Story v. Livingston, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 359, fully sustains this view of the objection. See, also, 1 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 285.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—PROPERTY LOST GAMING—ACQUIRED.

Property acquired in gaming is assets, which, if the bankrupt spends in gaming, he loses his discharge.

In bankruptcy.

S. J. Thomas & G. F. Verry, for objecting creditors.

J. Nickerson, for debtor.

LOWELL, District Judge. The objection to the bankrupt's discharge is that he lost a part of his property in gaming. The evidence tends to show that he was interested in a gambling house in Boston, and that he did lose money at that house and in some others like it. The preponderance of evidence supports the allegation of losses sustained in that way. On the other hand, the evidence for the defence tends to show that the bankrupt had lost all his property some years ago, so that whatever he may from time to time have made or lost, he is no worse off now than if he had never lost at all. From this the argument is deduced that he never had any property to which creditors had a right to trust, and cannot justly be said to have lost any property in gaming. It is said that, if the law should be rigidly applied in such a case, the creditors would receive an undue advantage, because they could always prevent the discharge of a person to whom they had given credit with a full knowledge of the character of the business, and an understanding of its hazardous nature.

So far as this argument applies to gambling debts the bankrupt would have the remedy in his own hands, because the debts, if objected to, could not be proved against his estate; as it regards other debts, much of its force would depend on the circumstances under which each particular debt was contracted. A creditor may know that his debtor has property without knowing how he acquired it, or he may lend him money or sell him goods for some legitimate purpose without reference to his occupation. And such are some, at least, of the debts in this case. I cannot limit the general language of the statute, though its effect may be, and I think is, to consider property acquired in gaming to be assets, which, if the bankrupt spend in gaming, he loses his discharge. It is impossible to look into the mode in which such property as the statute speaks of has been acquired. If property once in the possession of the bankrupt is spent in gaming, which, if not so spent, would be assets in bankruptcy, the case is made out. It is too late after it is spent to say that it was unlawfully acquired, or acquired in any particular way, or that creditors are no worse off on the whole. The case does not by any means show that whatever the defendant won was lost immediately, but rather that he had considerable sums at times, which he afterwards lost. I cannot distinguish such losses from those which any other debtor might sustain in a similar way. The statute is clear and explicit, and cannot be construed away in favor of one whose profession is gambling, though its operation may be somewhat severe in such a case. Neither the knowledge of his creditors of his course of business, nor any intent on his or their part, is material. The fact only can be inquired into. Nor does the law in the matter of discharge invest the court with discretion, as it does so largely in England. It is a mere question of legal right. Discharge refused.

MARSHALL v. BALTIMORE & O. R. CO.

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. Nov. Term, 1852.[2]

CONTRACTS — LOBBYING — POLICY OF LAW — CONCEALMENT OF PURPOSE IN ADVOCATING.

1. No action will lie on a contract to pay for services rendered in obtaining the passage of a law through the legislature, by what is commonly termed lobby members, the same being against the policy of the law, and void.

2. Such a contract is against the policy of the law, and void, if, at the time it was made, the parties agreed to conceal from the members of the legislature the fact, that the plaintiff was employed by the defendant, as its agent, to advocate the passage of the law it desired to obtain, and was to receive a compensation in money for his services, in case the law was passed by the legislature, at the session referred to in the agreement.

3. If there was no actual agreement to practise such concealment, yet, the plaintiff will not be entitled to recover, if he did conceal from the members of the legislature, when advocating the passage of the law, that he was acting as an agent for the defendant, and was to receive a compensation in money, in case the law passed.

This action was instituted the 22d of August 1850, on an alleged agreement by the defendant, to pay the plaintiff [Alexander J. Marshall] the sum of fifty thousand dollars, in six per cent. bonds of the defendant, at their par value. This sum was claimed under the said agreement, as a compensation for services rendered by the plaintiff, in procuring from the legislature of Virginia, the right of way for the defendant's railroad through that state.

By agreement all errors in pleading were waived, but the plaintiff was to furnish the court, before the day of trial, a statement of his grounds of claim, and the defendant was, in like manner, to furnish a statement of its grounds of defence.

The grounds of claim furnished by the plaintiff were as follows: The plaintiff, in pursuance of the agreement of counsel heretofore made, specifies as the grounds of his claim:

I. 1st. The contract between the plaintiff and defendant for the payment and delivery to the plaintiff of the sum of fifty thousand dollars, in the six per cent. bonds of the defendant, at their par value, upon the terms and considerations specified, and to be found in the resolutions passed at a meeting of the committee of correspondence appointed to take charge of the general subject in regard to measures for obtaining the right of way through the states of Virginia and Pennsylvania, on the 12th of December 1846. And the further resolution of the said committee, passed on the 18th of January 1847; and in the letter of Louis McLane to the plaintiff, dated the 18th of January 1847, and in the letters of the plaintiff to the said Louis McLane, of the 9th of February 1847, and the reply of said Louis McLane thereto, of the 11th of February 1847. 2d. The performance of that contract, by plaintiff's attendance at Richmond, during the session of the legislature of Virginia of 1846–1847, in order to superintend and further any application, or other proceeding, to obtain the right of way through the state of Virginia, on behalf of the defendant, and to take all prompt measures for that purpose. 3d. The happening of the contingencies whereon said compensation was payable, by the passage of the law by the legislature of Virginia of the 6th March 1847, and the acceptance of said law, by the acting under it by the defendant; by which law, upon the election of the city of Wheeling, not to pay to the company the difference of cost between the Grave creek and Fish creek routes, as specified in first section of said act, or upon the failure of said city to agree to pay such difference of cost, according to said first section, the defendant was authorized to extend its road through Virginia, to a point on the Ohio river, as low down as Fish creek.

II. The contract to be collected from all the correspondence between the plaintiff and Louis McLane, president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, between the 12th of December 1846 and the 6th of March 1847, touching the employment and agency of the plaintiff by the defendant, in superintending and furthering the applications and proceedings, by or on behalf of the defendant, to obtain the right of way for the defendant through the state of Virginia, to the Ohio river; all which correspondence is now in the possession and knowledge of the defendant.

III. An implied contract for reasonable compensation for work and labor, care and diligence applied, and money paid, laid out and expended, by the plaintiff for the defendant, at its request, in furthering and superintending, as its agent or counsel, the proceedings before the legislature of Virginia, during the session of 1846 and 1847, by or on behalf of defendant, to obtain the right of way through Virginia, to the Ohio river. On which three distinct grounds, the plaintiff rests his claim, and insists on a verdict in his favor.

The grounds of defence stated by the defendant were as follows:—The defendant in the above cause, having received notice of the plaintiff's grounds of claim, gives the following notice of defence: 1. That the agreement sought to be enforced by the plaintiff, admitting his ability to make it out by legal proof, to the extent of his pretensions, was an agreement contrary to the policy of the law, and which cannot be sustained. 2. Admitting the said agreement to be a valid one, which the courts would enforce, yet the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, because he failed to accomplish the object for which it was entered into. 3. That the law of Virginia, which was accepted by the defendant, after it had been modified by the waiver of the city of Wheeling, as mentioned in the plaintiff's notice, was not obtained through the efforts of the plaintiff, but against his strenuous opposition, and furnishes him no ground for his present claim. 4. That there was a final settlement between the plaintiff and defendant, after the passage of the Virginia law aforesaid, which concludes him in this behalf.

The resolution of the 12th December 1846, offered in evidence by the plaintiff, was as follows:

"Office of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, December 12, 1846. At a meeting of the committee of correspondence appointed to take charge of the general subject in regard to measures for obtaining the right of way through the states of Virginia and Pennsylvania, there were present Messrs. Harwood, Cooke, Hoffman and O'Donnell; the president also attended. On motion, it was resolved, that the president be and he is hereby authorized, in addition to the agent heretofore employed by the committee for the same purpose, to employ and make arrangements with other responsible persons, to attend at Richmond, during the present session of the legislature, in order to superintend and further any application, or other proceeding, to obtain the right of way through the state of Virginia, on behalf of this company, and to take all proper measures for that purpose. That he also be authorized to agree with such agent or agents, in case a law shall be obtained from the said legislature, during the present session, authorizing the company to extend their road through that state to a point on the Ohio river, as low down the river as Fishing creek, and the stockholders of this company shall afterwards accept such law as may be obtained, and determine to act under it; or in case a law should be passed authorizing the construction of a railroad from any point on the Ohio river, above the mouth of the Little Kanawha, and below the city of Wheeling, with authority to intersect with the present Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and the stockholders of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company shall determine to accept and adopt said law, or shall become the proprietors thereof, and prosecute their road according to its provisions; then, in either of the said cases, the president shall be and is authorized to pay to the agent or agents whom he may employ, in pursuance of this resolution, the sum of fifty thousand dollars, in the six per cent. bonds of this company, at their par value, and to be made payable in any time within the period of five years. Resolved, that it shall be stipulated in the agreement of said agent or agents, employed pursuant to this resolution, and as a condition thereof, that if no such law as aforesaid shall pass, or if any law that may be passed shall not be accepted or adopted, or used by the stockholders, the said agents shall not be entitled to receive any compensation whatever for the service they may render in the premises, or for any expense they may incur in obtaining such law, or otherwise. James Harwood, William Cooke, Samuel Hoffman, Columbus O'Donnell, Louis McLane, President."

The above resolution was modified, on the 18th January 1847, as follows:

"The committee of correspondence in regard to procuring the right of way through Virginia, met this 18th day of January 1847, at the house of Judge Harwood, the chairman; present, Mr. Harwood, Mr. Cooke and Mr. O'Donnell; the president also attended. A letter from A. J. Marshall, the company's agent at Richmond, dated the 16th instant, was submitted to the committee; on motion, it was unanimously resolved, that the right of Mr. Marshall to the compensation under the existing contract, shall attach, upon the passage of a law at the present session of the legislature, giving the right of way to Parkersburg or to Fishing creek, either to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, or to an independent company; provided this company accept the one, and adopt and act under the other, as contemplated by the contract. James Harwood, William Cooke, Columbus O'Donnell.

"January 19, 1847. Mr. Hoffman not having been present at the meeting yesterday, but coming to the railroad office to-day, and having read the aforegoing minute, approved the same. Samuel Hoffman."

A further modification of the resolution is contained in the following letter of the plaintiff, to Louis McLane, of the 9th of February 1847, and the reply of McLane thereto, by order of the company, dated 11th February 1847:

"9th February. Dear Sir: Sheffy reported, this morning, a route to Wheeling different from the prescribed route, but utterly unacceptable; you will not, in fact, be allowed to touch the Ohio at Fish creek; but if a cheaper route can be pointed out (you not to judge of the cheapness), you are to be forced to take it. I heard the bill read only, and need only tell you Mr. Hunter says it is more objectionable than the present law; Mr. Green has promised to get a copy of the bill, and send it to you to-night. We anticipated, from the information given us, that the Wheeling compromise would have given you Fish creek as terminus; we had rallied our strength on Fishing creek and Hunter's compromise; we had taken ground that Fish creek would certainly defeat the road, as you could not accept it; parties were organized on this issue, and many who had voted against us before, had determined to vote with us on this issue; I think we should have carried it; many members wished to end this agitating question; it jostles and endangers every interest in the state. They would pass any reasonable law that would quiet this clamor, and at the same time would embody a fair concession to Wheeling; the extent to which a concession to Wheeling would be compatible with the acceptance of the law, was the point at issue; we insisted that a law making Fish creek the terminus would be rejected, and for this reason we could have carried Fishing creek. In this state of things, we get the proceedings of your stockholders on Monday; their resolutions respond alone to the present laws; they emphatically reject them, and have no doubt that the 'prescribed route' to Wheeling will never do; at the same time, we get the 'American,' in which you are reported to say, you hope to get an acceptable terminus above Fishing creek. I have taken the ground, that this paper has mistaken and misrepresented you; I have no doubt, that a firm stand on your part, stating that Hunter's compromise would be accepted, and that no point higher up would be accepted, would have settled this question by a decided vote; I do not believe, under the present state of our information, you could ever get Fish creek as a terminus. The argument of Wheeling, that you will go to that city, if you can do no better, is greatly strengthened; they say that all you require is a change of the 'prescribed' route, and an assurance that you can do no better. I fear Sheffy's bill will be pressed to-morrow; if it is, I fear it will pass; it will be impossible to resist the belief, that if Virginia is firm, and will modify the route, you will go to Wheeling. It is necessary you should speak plain and speak at once; say you cannot extend your road, unless permitted to strike the Ohio, at least as low as Fishing creek. If you will accept Fish creek, and will be positive that you will go no higher, I think you can get it; this, of course, would cut me out; but that cannot be helped. I wish to get an ultimatum from you, for I assure you, you will be confined to Wheeling otherwise. Please write to Mr. Hunter; his letter can be exhibited; take a firm stand, and we may yet retrieve the day; even if the bill gets to the senate, it may be amended. I am, dear sir, with great respect, your obedient servant, &c., A. J. Marshall."

"Baltimore, February 11th, 1847. A. J. Marshall, Esq., Dear Sir: Your letter of the 9th reached me at too late an hour to afford me an opportunity of consulting the committee, and without that opportunity I could not give the reply I wished. It would be difficult for me to be more explicit than I have been in regard to Fish creek, and I am sorry that you, or any one else, should require any more than the resolution unanimously adopted by the stockholders. That resolution is not confined, as your letters seem to suppose, to the law; it, on the contrary, does, and was intended most explicitly, to reject in toto the route prescribed in the present law; and, as Fish creek could only be approached by that route, or some part of it, as certified in Mr. L.'s letter, forwarded to Mr. Hunter, that point is effectually and necessarily excluded. I am still free to assure you that, in the opinion of the committee, the stockholders will not, under any circumstances, construct their road to Wheeling, without the privilege of a terminus at some point on the Ohio river, not higher up than Fishing creek; and it is absolutely certain, that the compromise proposed by Sheffy will, under no circumstances, or for any inducement whatever, be assented to; to this effect I wrote to-day to Mr. Hunter. At the same time, that I am free to give you these assurances, the committee, after full reflection, are unwilling to assume the responsibility of preventing, by their act, the passage of a law, if nothing better can be had, tendering to the stockholders the option of rejecting or accepting it, which would confine their main stem to Fish creek by such route as the company might select. While the committee are persuaded that such a law would not be accepted by the stockholders, they know that there are a large number of them who believe that, if such a law should now be tendered to them, they would be thereby introduced into the state, and could hold it under consideration, if for nothing more, for the chance of getting it amended at another session, and we could not, therefore, be responsible for depriving them of that option. In this crisis, if, after the utmost exertion, nothing better can be done, if it were possible to pass Mr. Hunter's substitute, with Fish creek instead of Fishing creek, we would not undertake to prevent the passage of such a law; we would then refer the whole question to the stockholders; and I am authorized to say that, everything else failing, if such a law as is indicated pass, and the stockholders adopt it, and act under it, in the manner contemplated by the contract, your compensation shall apply to that, as to any other aspect of the case. The committee do this from the sense they entertain of the labor and exertions you have already made, and believing that the fruit of these, and your further exertions, if in a form to be acceptable to the stockholders, should inure to your benefit. They do not suppose this was needed to insure your continued exertions in the present crisis. It ought to be clearly understood, however, that Sheffy's compromise can, in no event, be brought within this view; and as it regards that, the committee are willing to be responsible for preventing even its tender to the stockholders; that, or anything like it, is wholly impracticable; it is worse even than the present law; it would involve the employment of Knight's route, under even greater disadvantages, and would be promptly and forever rejected. I am, dear sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, Louis McLane."

"February 11th, 1847. The committee met this day in the president's office; present, Messrs. Harwood, Hoffman, Cooke and O'Donnell. A letter from A. J. Marshall, dated the 9th inst., asking for the company's ultimatum, was submitted by the president; the same being considered, the president prepared an answer, embodying the views of the committee, which being read, was unanimously approved and adopted, and the president was ordered to send the same to Mr. Marshall. The foregoing is the letter referred to. James Harwood, William Cooke, Samuel Hoffman, Columbus O'Donnell."

In addition to the foregoing evidence, offered by the plaintiff, a great deal of testimony was offered by him to establish the performance of the conditions on which he was to be entitled to the compensation claimed.

The defendants, with a view to establish the illegality of the contract, as against public policy, offered in evidence a letter of the plaintiff, dated 17th November 1846, together with an inclosed document (the reading of which latter was objected to by the plaintiff, but permitted by the court); and also two letters from Louis McLane to the plaintiff, of the 25th November and 12th December 1846, as follows:

Letter of A. J. Marshall:

"Warrenton, November 17, 1846. Dear Sir: In an interview with you, a few days since, I promised to submit, in writing, a plan by which I thought your much desired 'right of way,' through this state, might be procured from our legislature; I herewith inclose my views on that subject, and shall respectfully await your reply. In offering myself as the agent of your company, to manage so delicate and important a trust, I am aware I lack that commanding reputation which, of itself, would point me out as best qualified for such a post; of my qualification and fitness, it is not for me to speak, and in consequence of the absolute secrecy demanded, I cannot seek testimonials of my capacity, lest I should incite inquiry. If your judgment approves my scheme, it is probable, you might get satisfactory information respecting me, by a cautious conversation with John M. Gordon, A. B. Gordon, Dr. John H. Thomas or Joseph C. Wilson, all of your city; without impropriety, I may say for myself, I have had considerable experience as a lobby-member before the legislature of Virginia; for several winters past, I have been before that body with difficult and important measures affecting the improvement of this region of country, and I think I understand the character and component material of that honorable body. I shall have to spend six or eight weeks in Richmond, next winter, to procure important amendments to the charter of the Rappahannock Company; this will furnish reason for my presence in Richmond. There is an effort in progress to divide our county, to which we, of Warrenton, are violently hostile; this affords another reason for myself, and also for one or two other agents, to remain in the city of Richmond, during the winter. Colonel Walden and myself are interested in large bodies of land in Western Virginia, near which the track of your railroad will pass; this is an ostensible reason for our active interference. I live in a range of country whose representation ought to be entirely disinterested on this question of 'the right of way;' notwithstanding which, I believe a plurality of our representatives have heretofore been in opposition; I know the influences that effected this, and am happy to say they will not exist next winter. Edward Broaddus, for many years a representative from Culpepper, a shrewd, intelligent man, influenced this result; Broaddus was a sort of protégé of the Richmond and James river Whigs, was distinguished and promoted by them, and habitually acts with them; his place is now filled by Slaughter, a personal friend of mine; I should have little fear to carry this section of the state. The proposed plan best speaks for itself; if you think it feasible, there is no time to be lost; I hope to hear from you at your earliest leisure. With entire respect, I am your humble servant, &c., A. J. Marshall.

"I tax you with the postage, as I do not wish to be known as in correspondence."

"In explanation of the plan I wish to submit, it is necessary to indulge some latitude of remark on the causes which have heretofore thwarted the just pretensions of your company. Richmond city, the Petersburg, Richmond and Potomac Railroad, the James river canal and the Wheeling interest, acting in concert, have heretofore successfully combated 'the right of way;' these interests fall far short of a majority in the two branches of the Virginia legislature; there is no sufficient ground, in the numeric force of this antagonist interest, to discourage the hope of an eventual success. On an examination of their arguments, based either upon justice or expediency, I find nothing to challenge a conviction of right, or an assurance of high state policy; on the contrary, standing heretofore as a disinterested spectator of the struggle, I have condemned the emptiness and arrogance of their pretensions, and felt indignant at the success of their narrow, selfish and bigoted policy. I have observed no superiority of talent, no greater zeal or power of advocacy in the opposition, than in favor of 'the right of way.' The success of a cause before our legislature, having neither justice, greater expediency, stronger advocacy or greater numeric strength, is matter of just amazement to the defeated party. The elements of this success should be a subject of curious and deeply anxious investigation; for when the cause is known, a remedy or counteracting influence may be readily applied. I have no idea that any dishonorable means or appliances (further than log-rolling may be one) have been used to defeat the 'right of way.' As to log-rolling, I am sorry to say, it has grown to a system in our legislature; numbers openly avow and act on it, and never conceal their bargains, except when publicity would jeopard success; no delegation are more skilful or less scrupulous at this game than our western right-of-way men, so in that regard, there is a stand off. It seems to me, the great secret of this success, is the propinquity, the presence on the ground, of your opponents. The legislature sits in their midst; they exercise a vigilant, pressing, present out-of-door influence upon the members. If the capitol were located at Weston or Clarksburg, who would question success? The Richmond interest is ever present and ever pressing; her associates of the railroad and canal are at hand, and equally active; you have no counteracting influence, and hence the success and triumph of your opponents. If I am right in these views, your claims, resting alone on justice, sectional necessity, or even high state policy, will be urged in vain, and must become as mere sounding clamor in the hall, unless you meet your opponents with the weapons they use so successfully against yourselves; experience shows that something beyond what you have heretofore done, is necessary to success; and in this necessity, the plan I have to submit, has its origin. The mass of the members in our legislature, are a thoughtless, careless, light-hearted body of men, who come there for the per diem, and to spend the per diem; for a brief space, they feel the importance and responsibility of their position; they soon, however, engage in idle pleasures, and on all questions disconnected with their immediate constituents, they become as wax, to be moulded by the most pressing influences. You need the vote of this careless mass, and if you adopt efficient means, you can obtain it; I never saw a class of men more eminently kind and social in their intercourse; through those qualities they may be approached and influenced to do anything not positively wrong, or which will not affect, prejudicially, their immediate constituency. On this question of the 'right of way,' a decided majority of the members can vote either way, without fear of their constituents; on this question, therefore, I consider the most active influences will ever be the most successful. Before you can succeed, in my judgment, you must reinforce the 'right-of-way' members of the house, with an active, interested, well-organized influence about the house; you must inspire your agents with an earnest, nay, an anxious, wish for success; the rich reward of their labors must depend on success; give them nothing if they fail; endow them richly if they succeed. This is, in brief space, the outline of my plan; reason and justice are with you; an enlarged expediency favors your claim; you have able advocates, and the best of the argument; yet with all these advantages, you have been defeated; I think I have pointed out the cause. Your opponents better understand the nature of the tribunal before which this vast interest is brought; they act on individuals of the body out of doors, and in their chambers; your adversaries are all on the spot, and hover around the careless arbiters of the question, in vigilant and efficient activity; the contest, as now waged, is most unequal. My plan would aim to place the 'right-of-way' members on an equality with their adversaries, by sending down a corps of agents, stimulated to an active partisanship, by the strong lure of a high profit. In considering the details of the plan, I would suggest, that all practicable secrecy is desirable; it strikes me, the company should have, or know, but one agent in the matter, and let that agent select the sub-agents, from such quarters and classes, and in such numbers, as his discreet observation may dictate. I contemplate the use of no improper means or appliances in the attainment of your purpose; my scheme is to surround the legislature with respectable and influential agents, whose persuasive arguments may influence the members to do you a naked act of justice; this is all. I require secrecy, from motives of policy alone, because an open agency would furnish ground of suspicion and unmerited invective, and might weaken the impression we seek to make. In regard to the cost of all this, it must necessarily be great; the sub-agency must be extensive, and of first influence and character; all your agents must be inspired by an active zeal and determined purpose of success; this can only be accomplished for you, by offers of high contingent compensation. I will illustrate this point by a single example. Were I to become your agent, on my plan, I should like to have the services of Major Charles Hunton, of this county; Hunton, for many years, was a member of our state senate; his last year of service was as president of that body. He is an unpretending man, of good understanding and excellent address; he is a great favorite with his own party (Dem.), and universally esteemed as a gentleman of highest character; he is in moderate circumstances, with a large family. I have no doubt, if I would bear his expenses, and secure him a contingent $1000, he would spend the winter in Richmond, and do good service; but if I could offer him $2000, it would become an object of great solicitude; it would pay all his debts, and smooth the path of an advancing old age; two thousand dollars would stimulate his utmost energies. If I am able to offer such inducements, I should have great confidence of success; under this plan you pay nothing, unless a law be passed which your company will accept. Of what value would such a law be to you? Measure this value, and let your own interests, in view of the high stake you play for, fix the price. There is no use in sending a boy on a man's errand. A low offer, and that contingent, is bad judgment; high service can't be had at a low bid. I have surveyed the difficulties of this undertaking, and think they may be surmounted. The cash outlay for my own expenses, and those of the sub-agents, would be heavy; I know the effective service of such agents as I would employ, cannot be had, except on a heavy contingent; taking all things into view, I should not like to undertake the business, on such terms, unless provided with a contingent fund of at least $50,000, secured to my order, on the passage of a law, and its acceptance by your company. If the foregoing views are deemed worthy of consideration, I hold myself in readiness to meet any call in that behalf that may be made upon me. Respectfully, &c., A. J. Marshall."

Reply of Louis McLane:

"Baltimore, Nov. 25, 1846. Dear Sir: I duly received your letter, and its inclosure, of the 17th instant, and would have acknowledged it sooner, but that I waited in the hope of being more definite in my reply. The subject is one, however, in which it is not easy to act promptly. I would be quite unwilling to act definitely, either to accept, or modify or reject your proposition, upon my individual responsibility, and the necessity of consultation with those whom I must, in some shape or other, consult, requires both caution and time; for the present, therefore, I propose only to acknowledge the receipt of your communication, and to assure you I will not necessarily lose time in obtaining a decision upon the subject to which it relates. It is possible, too, that I may find it necessary to ask you to repeat your visit to Baltimore. Meantime, I remain, dear sir, respectfully, your obedient servant, Louis McLane.

"A. J. Marshall, Esq., Warrenton, Virginia."

Second letter from the same:

"Baltimore, December 12, 1846. Dear Sir: I am happy to inform you that I am now prepared to close an arrangement with you, upon the basis of your communication of the 17th of November; but as it will be necessary to make some personal explanations, and to acquaint you, more fully than I can do by letter, with our views, I must ask you to visit Baltimore, as early as may be practicable. I am, dear sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, Louis McLane.

"A. J. Marshall, &c."

The plaintiff requested the following instructions to the jury: "Plaintiff's prayers: The plaintiff, by his counsel, prays the court to instruct the jury as follows: (1) That there is nothing in the terms or provisions of the agreement, embraced in the resolutions of the committee of correspondence, dated 12th December 1846, offered in evidence, which renders the same void, on grounds of public policy. (2) That the plaintiff is not precluded from recovering, under the agreement aforesaid, dated 12th December 1846, as modified by the agreement stated in the letter of 11th February 1847, by reason merely of the second proviso contained in the first section of the act of 6th March 1847, which has been offered in evidence, provided the jury shall find that the route, entering the ravine of the Ohio river at the mouth of Fish creek, and running so as to pass from a point in the ravine of Buffalo creek, at or near the mouth of Pile's fork, to a depot to be established by defendant on the northern side of Wheeling creek, in the city of Wheeling, upon minute estimates, made in the manner and on the basis prescribed in said act, and made after full examination and instrumental surveys of the feasible or practicable routes, appeared to be the cheapest upon which to construct, maintain and work said railroad; and provided they shall also find that the city of Wheeling did not agree to pay the difference of cost, as specified in said act, but on the contrary, renounced the right to do so, as early as the 10th of July 1847; and provided they shall also find that the said act was accepted by the stockholders of the defendant, as a part of its charter, on the 25th August 1847. (3) Upon the evidence aforesaid, the plaintiff prays the court to instruct the jury, that if they find the contract contained in the resolution of the committee of correspondence of the 12th of December 1846, and in the resolution of the committee of correspondence of the 18th of January 1847, and in the letter of Louis McLane of the 11th February 1847, aforesaid, to have been made with the plaintiff by the defendant; and also, that the act of Virginia of the 6th of March 1847 was passed at the session of the legislature of Virginia for 1846–1847, in the contract mentioned; and also, that the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, by the cheapest route to the city of Wheeling, entering the ravine of the Ohio at or north of Grave creek, was ascertained, by such estimates as the law prescribed, to be more costly to construct, maintain and work, than said road would be by the route passing into the ravine of the Ohio at or near the mouth of Fish creek, and then to the city of Wheeling, and that the difference of said probable cost was then, in like manner, ascertained; that the defendant accepted the said law, within six months from the passage thereof; and also, that when the difference of probable cost between said two routes was ascertained according to said act, the city of Wheeling did not agree to pay to the defendant such difference of cost by the time specified in said act; and that the plaintiff did attend at Richmond during the session aforesaid, and did then and there superintend and further the applications and other proceedings to obtain the right of way through the state of Virginia, on behalf of the defendant —then the plaintiff is entitled to recover, on the special contract contained in the instrument aforesaid, the value of the contingent compensation therein stipulated."

The defendants requested the following instructions to the jury: "Defendants' prayers: (1) The defendants, by their counsel, prayed the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, because the contract stipulated for the payment of a contingent fee of fifty thousand dollars, in the event of obtaining from the legislature of Virginia, such a law as is described therein, was against public policy and void. (2) That if the jury shall believe that it was agreed between the parties to the said contract that the same should be kept secret, either in the terms of it, or otherwise, from the legislature of Virginia, or the public, such contract, if otherwise proper and legal, was invalid, as against public policy, and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. (3) If the jury find that the special contract offered in evidence by the plaintiff, was proposed to be entered into by the plaintiff, from the reasons and motives, and to be executed by him, in the way suggested in his communication of the 17th November, and its inclosure, offered in evidence by the defendants (if the jury shall find that such communication was so made by plaintiff), and if they shall find that the contract aforesaid was entered into accordingly, and that said contract, or plaintiff's agency under it, was not made known to the legislature of Virginia, but in fact concealed, that then said contract was illegal and void, upon grounds of public policy. (4) The contract between the plaintiff and defendants of 12th December 1846, looked to the obtaining of a law authorizing the defendants to extend their road through the state of Virginia to a point on the Ohio river, as low down the river as Fishing creek, which law should be afterwards accepted by the defendants, with a determination to act under it, or to the incorporation of an independent company, which the defendants should determine to accept and adopt, or of whose charter they should become the proprietors, authorizing the construction of a railroad from any point on the Ohio river, between the mouth of Little Kanawha and Wheeling, and that no such law having been obtained, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. (5) That the modified contract of the 11th of February, looked to the obtaining of the passage of Hunter's substitute, with the adoption of Fish creek instead of Fishing creek as the point of striking the Ohio; that the law which was passed on the 6th of March 1847, was a law which did not, in its terms or effect, fulfil the stipulations of the modified agreement of February 11, 1847. (6) That the acceptance of the law of March 6, 1847, by the defendants, even supposing it to be substantially the same as Hunter's substitute, did not entitle the plaintiff to recover, unless the jury should believe that such law was obtained through his agency, under the agreement with the defendants. (7) That even if the jury should believe that the law of March 6, 1847, was obtained through the plaintiff's agency, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, if they shall believe that it was accepted by the defendants, in consequence of the waiver by the city of Wheeling of the privileges accorded to it therein, and the stipulations contained in the agreement between the city of Wheeling and the defendants of March 6, 1847. (8) That the modified agreement of February 11, 1847, which made Hunter's substitute, modified as stated in the foregoing prayer, the standard of the law which was to be obtained, to entitle the plaintiff to the stipulated compensation, made it necessary that such law should give to the defendants the absolute right to approach the city of Wheeling by way of Fish creek; should release them from the necessity of continuing their road to Wheeling, unless the city should within one year, or the citizens of Ohio county should, in the same time, subscribe one million dollars to the stock of the defendants; should enable the defendants to open and bring into use, as they progressed, the sections of their road as they were successively finished; and should authorize the defendants to charge in proportion to distance, upon passengers and goods taken from Baltimore to Wheeling, should the road be continued to the latter place; while the law that was actually passed made it the right of the defendants to take the Fish creek route, depend upon its being the cheapest, and even then placed the defendants' right to go to Fish creek, at the option of the city of Wheeling; made it imperative that Wheeling should be the terminus of the road, without any subscription on the part of herself or others; prevented the opening of any portion of her road west of Monongahela, until the whole road could be opened to Wheeling; and obliged the defendants to charge no more for passengers and tonnage to Wheeling, than they charge to a point five miles from the river; and that before the defendants accepted the law thus differing from that referred to in the modified agreement of February 11, 1847, the city of Wheeling waived its control of the route, leaving it to depend upon its comparative cost, agreed to subscribe five hundred thousand dollars to the stock of the defendants, and provide a depot for the defendants, at the terminus of the road; and that the adoption and acceptance of the law of March 6, 1847, thus differing from Hunter's substitute, and induced by the waiver and stipulation of Wheeling already mentioned and action under it; was not such an acceptance, adoption and action as entitled the plaintiff to recover. (9) That if the jury shall believe that the plaintiff received from the defendants the six hundred dollars given in evidence, in full discharge of his claims for compensation, under the agreement in question, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover."

Wm. Schley and H. W. Davies, for plaintiff.

R. Johnson and J. H. B. Latrobe, for defendants.

TANEY, Circuit Justice, held: 1. If, at the time the special contract was made, upon which this suit is brought, it was understood between the parties, that the services of the plaintiff were to be of the character and description set forth in his letter to the president of the railroad company, dated November 17, 1846, and the paper therein inclosed; and that, in consideration of the contingent compensation mentioned in the contract, he was to use the means and influences proposed in his letter and the accompanying paper, for the purpose of obtaining the passage of the law mentioned in the agreement; the contract is against the policy of the law, and no action can be maintained upon it.

2. If there was no agreement between the parties that the services of the plaintiff should be of the character and description mentioned in his letter and communication referred to in the preceding instruction, yet the contract is against the policy of the law, and void, if, at the time it was made, the parties agreed to conceal from the members of the legislature of Virginia, the fact that the plaintiff was employed by the defendants, as their agent, to advocate the passage of the law they desired to obtain, and was to receive a compensation in money for his services, in case the law was passed by the legislature, at the session referred to in the agreement.

3. If there was no actual agreement to practise such concealment, yet he is not entitled to recover, if he did conceal from the members of the legislature, when advocating the passage of the law, that he was acting as agent for the defendants, and was to receive a compensation in money in case the law passed.

4. If the contract was made upon a valid and legal consideration, the contingency has not happened upon which the sum of fifty thousand dollars was to be paid to the plaintiff, and the law passed by the legislature of Virginia being different, in material respects, from the one proposed to be obtained by the defendants, by the agreement of February 11, 1847, and the passage of which, by the terms of that contract, was made a condition precedent to the payment of the money.

Verdict and judgment for defendants.

Affirmed by the supreme court, in 16 How. [57 U. S.] 314.

Case No. 9,125.

MARSHALL et al. v. BAZIN.

[7 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 342.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1849.

JURISDICTION IN ADMIRALTY — CONTRACTS FOR TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS—STATE IMPRISONMENT ACTS — RULES OF SUPREME COURT — ARREST—SECURITY.

1. Libel in personam to recover balance of passage money for which a bill of exchange had been given but not paid. The libellant offers to surrender the bill. Suit sustained. Held, That admiralty has jurisdiction of contracts for the transportation of passengers by sea, and which may be exercised both in rem and in personam.

[Cited in McGuire v. The Golden Gate, Case No. 8,815.]

2. The new imprisonment acts of the state of New York, as adopted by the acts of congress of Feb. 28, 1839, and Jan. 14, 1841 (5 Stat. 321, 410), do not apply to process issued out of courts of admiralty.

3. The processes of these courts are subject to the regulation of the supreme court by virtue of the acts of congress of May 8, 1792, c. 2; and rules the supreme court adopted pursuant to those acts are authoritative and conclusive on the subject.

4. Rules 2 and 3 of the supreme court give parties the right to a warrant of arrest, and to the advantage of bail to satisfy the final decree rendered in a cause.

5. The respondent was properly held in custody if the libellant had a subsisting right of action.

6. The prospective operation of the act of 1841 is negatived in this respect by that of 1842.

7. Taking personal security for such demand by promissory note or bill of exchange will be regarded a waiver of the remedy in admiralty and bar proceedings, while such security remains outstanding.

8. Delivering up the security upon the hearing, is a sufficient compliance with the principles of law applicable to the case to prevent the respondent avoiding the action by a preliminary motion.

9. The jurisdiction of the admiralty in personam in matters of contract, has no connection with the question of "lien." The party is proceeded against upon his personal liability by process of arrest or citation.

The respondent with his family, came passengers from Havre, in France, to this port, on board the packet ship ——, owned by the libellants. He contracted to pay two thousand francs for the passage, one half to be paid in advance, and the other half in New York on the arrival of the ship here. The advance was duly paid, and for the balance the respondent drew a bill of exchange on himself, payable at sight at Delmonico & Co.'s in New York. The bill was duly presented and accepted by the respondent, and not being paid, the libellants sued out of this court a warrant of arrest against him for the balance of his passage money, on which, for want of bail, he was imprisoned. A motion was now made in his behalf, to discharge him from arrest, and to dismiss the libel and proceedings as not within the jurisdiction of the court.

H. D. Sedgwick, for respondent, made the following points: (1) A contract for passage money is a personal contract, not within admiralty jurisdiction. Brackett v. The Hercules [Case No. 1,762]; 2 Camp. N. P. 431. (2) Imprisonment for debt is abolished by act of congress. (3) Liens in rem or in personam in maritime courts, are waived by acceptance of a personal or other security, and by taking the bill of exchange in this case, the libellant relinquished his lien, and the contract no longer continues within admiralty jurisdiction. Pritchard v. The Lady Horatia [Case No. 11,438]; Hurry v. The John & Alice [Id. 6,923]; 1 Dod. 283; Murray v. Lazarus [Case No. 9,962]; [Ramsay v. Allegre] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 616; The Nestor [Case No. 10,126]; 2 Hagg. Adm. 136; Leland v. The Medora [Case No. 8,237]; Abb. Shipp. 288; [Peroux v. Howard] 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 345; 4 Camp. N. P. 150; 2 Marsh. 399; 15 Johns. 276; Riley v. Anderson [Case No. 11,835]. (4) If the waiver was not complete by taking the bill of exchange, the lien is lost from the lapse of time allowed before suit brought. Leland v. The Medora [supra].

Philip Hamilton, for libellant: (1) The affidavit of the respondents on which the motion is founded, does not state that the bill of exchange was taken in satisfaction or discharge of the antecedent debt. It only alleges it as received as security therefor. He cited against the application, Cro. Jac. R. 193; 1 Evans, Poth. 380a, 386; [Ramsay v. Allegre] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 611; 1 Cow. 290; [Harris v. Johnston] 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 311, 316; Cro. Car. 85; 2 Blackf. 317; [Clark v. Young] 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 191.

The counsel produced the bill of exchange in court, and declared his purpose to surrender it on the hearing of the cause.

BY THE COURT. The cases cited on the first point do not support the position that admiralty has no jurisdiction of contracts for the transportation of passengers by sea. The case Pritchard v. The Lady Horatia [Case No. 11,438] was a claim set up by the master of a vessel by way of answer, upon the proceeds of wrecked goods brought into port in his vessel. He had agreed to bring to the United States the crew of a wrecked vessel for $20 each, passage money, and he also laded on board his vessel such of the cargo of the wreck as had been saved. This cargo was libelled and condemned for salvage at the suit of that crew, and the master sought to attach a lien upon such salvage interests to satisfy their indebtedness to him for passage. The court decided that no lien existed in his behalf, and that the property condemned was not brought in the ship as the property of the seamen, and was not answerable for their personal contracts. That the money in court, was not of the nature of surplus and remnants on which an independent debt could be fastened.

Judge Hopkinson remarks, in the course of his opinion, that the demand is "strictly a personal contract, not made at sea, nor for any cause cognizable in admiralty." No authority is cited in support of the doctrine, excluding the case from the cognizance of the court for these causes; and the case referred to in 2 Camp. 632, rests upon the opposite principle, for it recognises a contract for the transportation of a passenger, as our giving a lien upon his luggage, and maritime liens arising from services by or to a vessel, are the familiar subjects of admiralty jurisdiction. It is not yet decided, that the method of remedy, in rem or in personam, determines the jurisdiction of the court. But the rule is definitely settled, so far as the courts of this district are concerned, by the decisions of the circuit and district courts, upon the precise point.

It was held in this court, that a passenger had a remedy against the vessel for breach of contract by the master, to bring him and his family from a foreign port to the United States, and could recover back the money advanced on the agreement, and damages for the violation of it. The Zenobia [Case No. 18,208]; The Aberfoyle [Id. 16]. The last case was appealed to the circuit court, and was after a full hearing, affirmed. [Id. 17.] This point was made the essential one on the appeal.

It has also been decided by this court, on full consideration, that the non-imprisonment acts of the state of New York, as adopted by the acts of congress of February 28, 1839, and January 14, 1841 (5 Stat. 321, 410), do not apply to process issued out of courts of admiralty. The processes of these courts are subject to the regulations of the supreme court, by virtue of the acts of congress of May 8, 1792, § 2, and August 23, 1842 (5 Stat. 518, § 6), and accordingly the rules of the supreme court, adopted pursuant to those acts, are authoritative and conclusive on this subject. Lane v. Buck [Case No. 8,048]; Lockwood v. Pearson [unreported]. Rules 2 and 3 of the supreme court, give parties the right to a warrant of arrest, and to the advantage of bail, to satisfy the final decree rendered in the cause, and the respondent in this case is properly held in custody, if the libellant has a subsisting right of action in this court. The prospective operation of the act of 1841, is in this respect intercepted by that of 1842.

The third and fourth points raised by the respondent, present the only matters of contestation open before this court in the cause. The jurisdiction of the court over the subject matter may be lost to the party, or be waived by him, by any act of his indicating that this special remedy is relinquished. Taking personal security for the demand, by promissory note or bill of exchange, will be regarded a waiver of the remedy in admiralty and bar proceedings in this court, whilst such security remains outstanding. Murray v. Lazarus [Case No. 9,962]; Ramsay v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 616. But that admiralty has cognizance of the demand in personam, is distinctly implied in that case, and is explicitly decided in that of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438, Peroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324, and that it was intended so to settle the doctrine, is made certain by the remarks of Judge Story, speaking for the court, in Andrews v. Wall, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 572, 573.

On the argument of the motion, the advocate for the libellant produced the bill of exchange, and declared his purpose to deliver it up on the hearing of the cause. This is a sufficient compliance with the principle embodied in the cases, to prevent the respondent avoiding the action by this preliminary motion. It is further noticeable, that the affidavit of the respondent does not aver that the bill was drawn by the agent of the ship at Havre or that he accepted it as a satisfaction of the demand. The implication therefore is that it was but a liquidation of the demand, and a memorandum of the time it was payable, and not intended by the parties to be made a security for the debt.

The jurisdiction of the court in personam, in matters of contract, has no connection with the question of lien. The party is proceeded against upon his personal liability by process of arrest or citation. This remedy, if suspended by taking a bill or note, is restored to the creditor, when the debtor is released of the hazard of having negotiable paper in circulation against him, by its being surrendered him or produced in court and cancelled.

The motion to dismiss the libel is accordingly denied, and the respondent must be put to his defence to the action. The costs will abide the final result of the suit. Decree accordingly.

MARSHALL v. CRAWFORD.

[4 Sawy. 37.] [1]

District Court, D. California. Aug. 12, 1876.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—MASTER—RETURN TO PORT—ERROR IN JUDGMENT—BOARD OF WIFE AND CHILD.

1. Where the master was compelled, by want of provisions, to return to his home port, and the insufficient supply was caused by an error of judgment, committed in the supposed interest of his owners, held, that under the circumstances, the error was not of so gross a character as to make the master personally responsible for its consequences.

2. Where the master claimed the gratuitous privilege of taking with him on the voyage his wife and child, held, that he must show a distinct understanding and definite agreement with the owners on the subject.

[This was a libel by George Marshall against Andrew Crawford.]

Jno. M. Coghlan, for libellant.

E. W. McGraw, for respondent.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. Suit for wages as master of the bark Legal Tender. The answer admits the services of the libellants, and the earning of the wages claimed. The defense set up is:

1. The willful disobedience by the master of the owners' orders. The answer alleges that the libellant, having been ordered to proceed from Guaymas to Humboldt Bay, arrived off the latter port on or about March 30, 1876, and there beat about until April 4, without making any attempt to enter the bay, and without any valid excuse for not doing so; and that, on said April 4, the libellant, willfully disobeying the orders of respondent, instead of entering the bay and there procuring a cargo of lumber, squared away for San Francisco, where he arrived April 6, 1876.

The proof shows that the master used every effort, and exhibited proper seamanship while doing so, to enter the bay, but was prevented by adverse winds. It also is clearly established that his sole reason for abandoning further efforts was the almost entire want of provisions. There can be no doubt that his return to San Francisco was rendered absolutely necessary by this circumstance. To have remained longer would have been a criminal breach of his duty to his crew.

The real point of the defense is that the insufficient supply of provisions was due to the master's neglect and carelessness.

It is not denied that he was amply provided with funds to obtain, at Guaymas, all the provisions he required.

There can be no doubt that the libellant made a mistake in not taking in more provisions, but I hardly think the mistake was of so gross a character as to render him personally responsible for its consequences. The subject was confided to his discretion, and his motive in stinting the supply was to effect a saving for his owners, the price of provisions at Guaymas being much higher than at this port.

The average length of voyages from Guaymas to San Francisco, is from thirty to thirty-five days. A voyage from Guaymas to Humboldt Bay is, perhaps, on the average, five or ten days longer. Several experienced shipmasters testify that for such a voyage they would take in two months' supply of provisions. But they state that there is no fixed rate, that they would be so governed by circumstances. The Legal Tender's provisions gave out on the fifty-third day.

The fidelity and general capacity of the master are not disputed. He has been in the respondent's employ for several years. I think that a mistake of this character committed in the supposed interest of the owner would not be held by any jury to be such negligence as to render the master liable for damages. If he would not be so liable the respondent cannot recoup or set off in this action such damages against the master's claim.

2. The respondent also claims a deduction from the master's wages, on account of board furnished to his wife and child, who accompanied the master on his voyage. There seems to have been no agreement or definite understanding between the master and respondent on the subject. The latter knew that the master's wife was to accompany him. He does not appear to have either given or withheld his consent in any very definite manner. Certainly he did not agree that she should be maintained at the ship's expense during the entire voyage. There was probably no intention on the respondent's part at that time to make any charge against the master, but he did not expressly renounce the right to do so. And probably the master expected, so far as he had any definite expectation on the subject, to pay the demand in case, contrary to his anticipations, a demand was made. He expressed his willingness to do so after his arrival, provided the balance of his wages was paid, and though his offer may have been merely intended as a mode of settling and compromising the dispute, yet I am inclined to think that it ought to be viewed as a recognition on the part of the master that he had no absolute right to insist upon receiving from the owner so considerable a gratuity. He may have considered the respondent's demand unhandsome, but he does not appear to have resisted it as absolutely unjust and contrary to agreement.

Under all the circumstances I have concluded to allow the deduction. If gratuitous privileges of this nature, involving considerable expense to owners, are claimed by masters, they should come to a distinct understanding on the subject and put the agreement into some definite form. I shall allow a deduction of $125 on this account; for the balance of his wages a decree must be entered.

Case No. 9,127.

MARSHALL v. DELAWARE INS. CO.

[2 Wash. C. C. 54.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1807.[2]

MARINE INSURANCE — CAPTURE — RESTITUTION — ABANDONMENT—ACTUAL STATE OF LOSS—RIGHT TO ABANDON.

1. The vessel and cargo insured, were captured as prize, libelled and acquitted on the 7th of July; and on appeal by the captors, the sentence was affirmed on the 9th of July, and restitution was decreed; and on the 19th of July, restitution of the property captured was actually made, except of that which had been pillaged by the captors; but at what hour of the day the same was made, was submitted to the court. On the same day, a survey was made to ascertain the amount of the spoliations of the cargo, and on the 30th of July the vessel proceeded on her voyage. On the 17th of July, (in New-York) the plaintiff received notice of the capture. On the 18th, he directed his agent in Philadelphia to abandon, who did so on the 19th, informing the plaintiff thereof by mail; the mail leaving Philadelphia for New-York, at twelve o'clock on the 19th of July. The actual state of the loss, at the time of the abandonment, ought to decide the right of the assured to make the loss a total one; and it is on the reality of the loss at the time of the abandonment, its legality depends.

2. The right to abandon did not depend, in this case, on the question, whether the restitution was actually made, and the property in possession of the master of the vessel. The property was in the actual possession of the master, after the decree and warrant of restitution delivered to the master.

3. In case of capture and recapture, the property remains with the recaptors until salvage is paid.

On a case stated, the plaintiff, a citizen of the state of New-York, and residing in the city of New-York, by his agent, on the 7th of May, 1806, caused insurance to made on the cargo, freight, and brig Rolla, all owned by him; S. Clapp, master, at and from St. Jago de Cuba. The policy on the freight, and part of the cargo, valued; on the vessel, and residue of cargo, open. On the 28th of May, 1806, the vessel, while proceeding on her voyage, was captured and taken possession of as prize, by the French privateer schooner Napoleon, and carried into Lemon, an out-port of Samana. The captors there committed great pillage of the cargo. The Rolla remained at Lemon four or five days, and was then carried to Samana, under the charge of a prize-master, where further pillage was committed. The captors libelled the vessel and cargo, in the inferior tribunal at the city of St. Domingo; and both were acquitted on the 7th of July. This decision was appealed from, by the captors, to the superior tribunal, at the same place; when the said vessel and cargo were again acquitted, and restitution awarded. On the 9th of July, restitution of the brig was ordered to be made to the captain, with what remained of her cargo. On the 19th of July, 1806, restitution was actually made; but, if the court should think there is a collision in the evidence, as to the hour or time of actually delivering possession, and the time shall appear to them material, the court are requested to fix the hour or the time, according to their opinion of the credit and weight of the evidence. The captain had a survey made on the same day, to ascertain the loss and damage from pillage, &c.; and on the 30th of July, he proceeded on his originally intended voyage to St. Jago de Cuba; where he arrived on the 6th of August, and where the remainder of the cargo was sold, and a part of the proceeds invested in a return cargo, which was sent by the Rolla, under the command of the mate, to New-York; and the rest of the proceeds were invested in bark, and brought home in the Jane by the captain. The return cargo arrived at New-York, on the 15th of October, 1806; and on the following day, the plaintiff wrote to his agent in Philadelphia, informing him thereof, and directing him to give the information to the insurers, which was accordingly done; but the insurers refused to have anything to do with the property, or to give any directions as to the disposal of it. The plaintiff then sold the said property, for the account of the underwriters, but without their assent; except some bark, which yet remains unsold. Intelligence of the capture was received at New-York by the plaintiff, on the 17th of July, 1806. He wrote on the 18th to his agent, directing him to abandon the freight, vessel, and cargo to the insurers; which letter was received at Philadelphia, by the agent, on the morning of the 19th; and an abandonment was made to the insurers on the morning of the 19th; of which abandonment the said agent informed the plaintiff by a letter, which was forwarded to New-York by the mail of the said 19th of July, which was closed at Philadelphia at twelve o'clock of the same day. The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover for a total or a partial loss?

Ingersoll & Hopkinson, for plaintiff, contended: First; that if a loss happen by capture, of which the plaintiff is informed, and he offers to abandon, not knowing that the property has been acquitted and restored, though the fact be so, before the offer made; the abandonment is good to authorize the insured to go for a total loss. The loss happened here by capture and detention. Second; that, upon the evidence, the restitution was not complete till one o'clock in the afternoon, whereas the abandonment must have been before twelve o'clock. As to the doctrine that there are no fractions of a day, it does not apply where priority of time, as to two facts, becomes important. 1 Ld. Raym. 281; 2 Ld. Raym. 1568; 3 Burrows, 1433.

Rawle & Dallas, for defendants, denied both propositions. They cited 1 Esp. 237, to show that even after a capture, condemnation, and sale, and the vessel purchased by the captain for his owners, that the insured could not abandon; the captain being the agent of the owners in the purchase. They relied upon the expressions of the supreme court, in Rhinelander v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co. [4 Cranch (8 U. S.) 29], and of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Dutilh v. Gatliff [4 Dall. (4 U. S.) 446], and of Lord Mansfield, in Hamilton v. Mendez [unreported], to prove that the fact of the loss continuing to the time of the abandonment, and not the information, fixes the right of the insured to abandon. Also the case of Hallet v. Payton, 1 Caines, 38, in which the case has been directly decided. They also cited Parker, 75, 161.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The question is, whether if a right to abandon once exist, the subsequent release or safety of the property before the abandonment, but the fact unknown to the insured, will defeat that right, has never been directly decided, that we know of, but in the case of Hallet v. Payton. The reasoning of the case would seem to show, that the state of the loss at the time of the abandonment, ought to decide the right of the insured to make the loss a total one, and thus to throw the property upon the underwriters; and to demand from them the sum insured. The foundation of the right is the loss of the property, really or technically; and the transfer of what may be saved to the underwriter, is predicated upon the reality of the loss. But if the property be in safety, how can the underwriter, under the terms of his contract, be called upon for an indemnity; which was only promised in case of loss, and when no injury, or such as is merely partial, has been sustained? The information received by the insured may have been correct when it was given, but it cannot make the fact otherwise than it really is, at the time when the claim is made for a total loss. Although there is no case, but the one before mentioned, precisely in point, yet there are some which seem to throw considerable light upon the subject; and we think, enough may be gathered from what was said by Lord Mansfield, in Hamilton v. Mendez, to show his opinion respecting it. In that case, the vessel, which had been captured and recaptured, was brought into Portsmouth before the offer to abandon. It is not stated, that at the time of the offer the arrival of the vessel was known to the insured, though the fact is strongly to be inferred. But it is clear, that if such was the fact it does not enter into the reasoning of the judge, who, when he lays down the principles of the law, uses expressions and illustrations, which seem strongly to exclude that circumstance from the consideration which he took of the subject. His lordship observes, that this action, which is brought for an indemnity, must be founded on the nature of the damnification, as it really is at the time of the action brought, or, at most, at the time of the offer to abandon. He considers it absurd to recover as for a total loss, when the final event proves that there was no loss at all, or only a partial one. He seems to fix the time of bringing the action, as that at which the rights of the parties are to be decided; and then lays it down, that if the cause of action does not subsist at the time, its having existed at any previous time will not avail. In no part of this opinion does he appear to consider the right of the insured to go for a total loss, to depend upon the circumstance of information he had received of the situation of the property at the time of the offer to abandon, or at that of the action brought; and the cases which he cites as analogous to, and illustrative of the doctrine he is endeavouring to establish, afford strong ground for believing that he altogether relied upon the loss continuing to the time of abandonment and bringing the action; (and so he also expresses himself in another part of the same case;) and not upon the information to the insured of the safety of the property. For certainly it cannot be contended, that in answer to a plea of the tenant, in an action of waste, that he had repaired before the action brought; or to that of the principal to an action of the surety for an indemnity, that he had paid the debt; the plaintiff could reply, that at the time of bringing the action, he had not notice of the fact set out in the plea. And I think it is impossible to produce a case upon any other subject, where the rights of the parties could be made to depend upon any thing, but the real facts at the time when these rights accrued. Why should there exist an exception in cases of insurance? That Parker has deduced the same conclusion which this court does from the expressions of Lord Mansfield, in this and other cases, is very obvious. He says, that "the loss must continue total at the time when the offer to abandon is made, or the action brought." Parker, 145. The case of Hallet v. Payton, in the highest court of judicature in the state of New-York, which appears to have been very fully argued and considered by the court, is in point. The expressions used by the supreme court of the United States, and the supreme court of this state, in the cases cited, are very strong, though like those of Lord Mansfield, in Hamilton v. Mendez, they are obiter dicta. Upon the whole, then, relying upon these authorities, and the reasons which support them; and considering that they stand unopposed by any case whatever; we feel ourselves warranted in deciding this point in favour of the defendants.

The next question is, whether at the time when the offer to abandon was made, the vessel was, in point of fact, in possession of the insured? I say, in his possession, because these are the terms which the counsel, in argument, appeared to consider as proper. But we wish it to be considered, that this court does not mean to decide that actual possession was not necessary after the decree and warrant of restitution delivered to the officer. It may, perhaps, become a question, whether if the property be in safety, by the acquittal and warrant to execute it, this circumstance may not be sufficient to defeat the right of abandonment. In the cases of capture and recapture, the possession of the property remains with the recaptors till salvage is paid; and in the case of Hamilton v. Mendez, the possession of the recaptors continued after the offer to abandon.

As to the fact, we think it very immaterial, whether the possession was delivered before or after the examination made of the state of the cargo, for it is obvious to any person who looks at the proces verbal, that it must have taken more than double the time to write this warrant, than was consumed in obtaining a knowledge of the facts which it records; consequently, if it began at nine in the morning, and the proces verbal was concluded at one in the afternoon, the facts of which it is a history, must have taken place and been completed long before meridian.

But we do not mean to decide so important a point, upon evidence which may be founded in conjecture. For we hesitate not to declare, that if for want of clear proof, the act of abandonment and restitution must be considered as contemporaneous, the decision ought to be in favour of the defendants, for two reasons—first; that the inclination of judges is not to extend the right of abandonment, for the purpose of converting a partial into a total loss, beyond the point to which former decisions have gone, because such a right is not warranted by the contract of the parties: and secondly, because the insured ought not only to prove the loss, but the continuance of it to the time of abandonment; and if the evidence is not sufficient for these purposes, he must fail. Upon the whole, we are of opinion that the plaintiff is only entitled to recover for a partial loss.

[The case was taken on a writ of error to the supreme court, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed, with costs. 4 Cranch (8 U. S.) 202.]

MARSHALL v. DORSETT.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 696.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1836.

ADMINISTRATORS—MARYLAND STATUTE—DECEASED WIFE—CHOSES IN ACTION—TRUSTEE.

Under the act of Maryland, 1798, c. 101, cl. 5, § 8. the husband is the administrator of his deceased wife, and may sue for her choses in action not reduced to possession in her lifetime; although her property had been conveyed, in her lifetime, to a trustee, for the sole and separate use and benefit of her, and her executors, administrators, and assigns;. she not having assigned the trust-fund in her lifetime, nor disposed of it by will or deed executed according to the terms of the trust.

Assumpsit for money had and received by the defendant [Amelia T. Dorsett] to the plaintiff's use. By a deed of trust, the property of the plaintiff [Robert Marshall] and his wife was conveyed to Mrs. Susan G. Beall, in trust for the sole and separate use of the plaintiff's wife, Anne Marshall, her executors, administrators, and assigns. The trustee, with Mrs. Marshall's consent, lent $400 to the defendant, and took her note therefor, payable twelve months after date, to the said "Susan G. Beall, trustee for Anne Marshall, with interest in advance, for value received;" dated September 18, 1832. The wife died, and this suit was brought by the husband in his own name, who, by the Maryland act of 1798, c. 101, cl. 5, § 8, is entitled to all the rights of administrator to his deceased wife, and may sue for and recover her choses in action, not reduced into possession during the coverture.

R. S. Coxe, for plaintiff.
Brent & Brent, for defendant.

THE COURT (nem. con.) decided, that the husband, standing in the place of administrator, had a right to recover this debt, the wife not having, in her lifetime, disposed of the trust-fund by last will or deed executed according to the terms of the trust.

Verdict for the plaintiff, $430.

PLEADING AT LAW—MISNOMER—IDEM SONANS.

"Jeffery" and "Jeffries" are not idem sonans.

Error to Lawrence circuit court.

Before JOHNSON and YELL, JJ.

JOHNSON, J. This is an action of trespass for an assault and battery, brought by Jeffries against [William B.] Marshall. Marshall pleaded a misnomer of the plaintiff named, alleging that he was called and known by the name of Jesse Jeffery, and not by the name of Jesse Jeffries. To this plea Jeffries demurred, and the demurrer was sustained. The only question for the consideration of this court, relates to the decision on the demurrer to the plea in abatement. We think the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to that plea. We do not think that Jeffery and Jeffries are the same name. They are differently spelt, and clearly cannot be said to be idem sonans. The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to permit the defendant in error to reply to the plea of misnomer, if he shall apply for leave to do so, and on his failure, then to give judgment in accordance with the plea in abatement. Reversed.

COLLISION — SECURED TO DOCK — BLOCKING PASSAGE—TUG AND TOW—DAMAGE BY TOW —LIABILITY.

[1. A vessel secured at a dock is entitled to keep that position against the voluntary approach of any other. Though its position blocks the passage of some other vessel, yet the law does not compel it to move; and if the moving vessel, in attempting to pass, should cause a collision, it will be liable to damages.]

[2. A tug, towing a steamer, collides with a vessel secured to a dock. It is claimed in defence that the tug was acting under the direct and immediate orders of the pilot of the steamer, and that the responsibility, if any, should rest with the steamer. Held, that these facts constituted no defence in an action against the tug.]

[This was a libel by George Marshall against Charles H. Marshall to recover damages for injuries sustained in a collision.]

BETTS, District Judge. The sloop Genius, owned by the libellant, when lying at the end of the pier, at Tenth street on the East river, was pressed against and injured by the steamer Goliah, owned by the respondent. The Goliah and Duncan C. Pell, steamers, were engaged in towing the hull of the steam boat Arctic from Rutgers street to the Novelty Works, the Duncan C. Pell on her starboard side and the Goliah on the larboard. The tide was on the last of the flood, and high water. Shell Reef lies off

[2] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

Ninth street, and reaches nearly up to Tenth street, and is about in the middle of the river. Tenth street pier projects 40 feet further into the river than Ninth, and the space between the reef and Tenth street pier is estimated at 50 or 60 yards. The width of the three boats in tow was 154 feet. As the tow proceeded up the river, the position of the sloop Genius was noticed, and the wheels of the two steamers stopped a distance of two or three hundred yards below her, and she was hailed by the pilot of the Arctic to move from the pier to afford room for the tow to pass. He also sent out a boat with like directions to the Genius. But the evidence is conflicting upon the fact whether the boatman carried the message, the weight of it being against the testimony of the boatman that he had delivered the order. So also it is doubtful whether the hail of the pilot to the Genius was heard on board her. It is also proved by the libellant that those on the Genius had no reason to apprehend a collision until the tow had come too near her to leave her the ability to move from the pier, although, upon the evidence, there would have been ample time to do it after the hail given from the tow.

The points insisted on by the respondent in defense are that it was the duty of the libellant to have moved the sloop from the pier under the circumstances, and by so doing the collision would have been avoided, and that if the collision was occasioned by any fault of the tow, it is ascribable to the pilot of the Arctic, who had exclusive command of the three vessels, and that the owner of the Goliah is not responsible for it. Neither of these positions are maintainable. It was incumbent on the tow so to be conducted in moving through the harbor as to avoid vessels at anchor or lying at the dock. The Scioto [Case No. 12,508]. It had no authority to command or compel the sloop to leave her mooring at the wharf. Had it been easy for her to do so, and she had wilfully persisted in holding her place when it was apparent to her that a collision must be the consequence, the other party making ineffectual efforts to avoid it, the court might well hold she should bear the consequences of such perverseness.

The equitable principles guiding the decisions of courts of admiralty lead it to discountenance all wilful acts of obstinacy, as well as a disobliging spirit, when either promotes a misfortune to the party exercising them or to others; but I am not aware the power of the court has been carried further in reproof of such dispositions than to regulate the allowance of costs with a regard to it. The admiralty court, no more than a court of law, cannot invade a legal right or privilege, and take it arbitrarily away from the one possessing it. A vessel safely secured at a dock is entitled to keep that position against the voluntary approach and encroachment of any other. The pilot of a steamer has no higher authority than the master of any other craft in this respect, and neither can assume the right to order off a vessel so placed, because her position is to his disadvantage or danger. In the present instance, if there was not room for the passage of the tow, it was the duty of the pilot to have stopped its advance, and, if necessary, to have anchored until he could prevail upon the sloop to leave her dock, or obtain the interference of the proper dock or harbor master to compel it. The wrong, if any, was with the tow in attempting to sweep through a narrow passage with a width of vessels which endangered others at the docks, and the law imposes on them the necessity of so arranging themselves as to go through it without crowding upon and injuring others, although their movement may be thus impeded. The same rule would obtain if the sloop had been at anchor in the river. It would have been her duty, then, to relieve the tow to the extent of her ability by sheering on her cable, or giving way with sweeps, when practicable. but the vessel approaching her without compulsion or necessity could not require her to slip her cable for their relief, or put herself in any peril for their accommodation. After the tow had come so near the sloop that its drift indicated a collision, it would have been hazardous for her to move into the river with intent to go up or down, for she would thus place herself more directly in the path of the tow, and then it would be urged against her, in case of injury, that she had brought it upon herself by such movement. She had a right to suppose the steamers would take care to stop or back or veer off so as to prevent all contact with her in a conspicuous and fixed position.

There is no evidence that there would have been danger—even difficulty—for the tow to have anchored, nor is the court furnished with anything more than mere suppositions that there was not ample width of channel for them all, between the sloop and Shell's Reef. If the Arctic could with safety pass the reef, the Duncan C. Pell might go over it at that state of the tide, which would have extended the channel 49 feet; and if there is 60 yards from the shoal to the dock, or even 50, the tow might thus have kept a safe course through. This, however, was the concern of the tow, and not of the sloop; and, as the danger was foreseen and well understood by the former, she was under obligation to take proper measures to avoid it. The Tecumseh, U. S. Dist. Ct. [unreported]. The injury was inflicted by the Goliah, and, if it must be regarded as caused by the act of the pilot on the Arctic, that in no way renounces the responsibility of the defendant. Ang. Carr. 664, 665. He put his boat under charge of that pilot, and his situation is in no way varied that the pilot took his stand and gave orders on the Arctic, instead of upon the Goliah. The improper management and direction of the Goliah by those to whom she was entrusted by the owner produced the injury sustained by the libellant, and he is answerable for that wrong to the same extent as if she had remained under the charge of her officers. The Duke of Sussex, 1 W. Rob. 273; Bussey v. Donaldson, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 206; Foot v. Wiswall, 14 Johns. 306; Denison v. Seymour, 9 Wend. 9 Indeed, the doctrine with respect to the obligations of tugs employed in towing vessels would seem to be that the steamer is responsible for damages inflicted by the vessel in tow, unless caused by an act of the latter, independent of the tug, and when it was not at the time in her power to prevent it. The Express [Case No. 4,596]. The duty is thrown upon her to so arrange the movements of the vessel in tow, if possible, as to prevent her coming in collision with any other. Id. But, even if the Goliah, in this case, might be regarded as under the motive power of the Atlantic, and propelled by her momentum, and not by her own voluntary action, the responsibility would remain the same. The owner, in placing her in that position, took on himself the risks consequent upon it, and being propelled against another vessel whilst so navigated subjects him to the same responsibility as if she had been governed by her own motive power independent of the Atlantic. The Express [supra]; The Hope, 2 W. Rob. 50; 9 Wend. 9; The Gipsy King [11 Jur. part I, O. S. 357].

In my judgment, the owner of the Goliah is answerable for the injury sustained by the Genius, and it must be referred to a commissioner to ascertain and report the amount. The libellant is entitled to recover the same with costs against the respondent.

Case No. 9,129.

MARSHALL v. MEE (two cases).

[1 MacA. Pat. Cas. 229.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April, 1853.

PATENTS—PRIORITY OF INVENTION—REDUCTION TO PRACTICE—CREDIBILITY AND COMPETENCY OF WITNESS.

[1. One who first conceives an invention and uses reasonable diligence to perfect it, and does in fact perfect it, is entitled to a patent over a subsequent original inventor who first reduces the invention to actual use.]

[2. Mistake by a witness in an immaterial fact should not discredit him. The maxim "falsus in uno falsus in omnibus" only applies where there is willful corrupt falsehood, in one particular, amounting to perjury.]

[3. Two witnesses who had owned an interest in the invention claimed to have sold out about a month before testifying. But one of them admitted that if the machine proved successful part of the proceeds were to be applied to the payment of certain debts of theirs, and the other stated that if it were successful he might or might not get a pecuniary benefit therefrom. Held, that both were disqualified, as interested parties.]

[These were two appeals by Moses Marshall from a decision of the commissioner of patents, awarding priority, upon interferences to John Mee in respect to an invention of improvements in knitting looms.]

DUNLOP, Circuit Judge. On the 17th of May, 1851, John Mee filed in the patent office his application for a patent for his invention of an improved knitting loom, and on the 24th of May, 1851, his application for a patent for his invention of an improved warp-knit fabric (afterwards patents Nos. 9718, 9719 [granted May 10, 1853]). The commissioner being of opinion that the patents thus applied for would interfere with patent for similar inventions sought by Moses Marshall, gave notice thereof to the parties; and upon a hearing before him, decided that John Mee was the original and first inventor in both cases, and entitled to patents therefor. From this decision Mr. Marshall has appealed, and the question is now submitted to me by the parties upon written argument. Both cases have been heard together by consent. The commissioner has furnished a certificate in writing of his opinion and decision, and the reasons in support of it, and Mr. Marshall has filed his reasons of appeal, with the written arguments of his counsel. The cases were finally submitted to me on Saturday, the 26th of March, 1853.

There are two reasons of appeal in each case; the first of which in each case has been abandoned by the appellant, leaving only the second reason of appeal in each case, which in substance is that Marshall, and not Mee, was the original and first inventor, in the sense of the patent laws, of the improvement in each case as to the loom. The specifications, drawings, and models of the two parties show that the machines are identical in those parts upon which their interfering claims are founded. The counsel of Mr. Marshall, "for the purposes of his argument, assumes that the two machines and the two fabrics are identical." Those parts embrace only the double-thread guides and two sets of needles and their relative motion in respect to each other. Both machines have two sets of thread-guides and two sets of needle-bars whose movements are the same. As one set of needle-bars is raised for the purpose of being acted on by the two sets of thread-guides, the other set is covered; and as the second set of needle-bars is raised to receive the thread from the thread-guides, the first set is depressed. The movement of these thread-guides in forming the loops around the needles is the same in both machines, and each is capable of like variation in order to change the width of the ribs in the fabric manufactured. The Pepper loom, on which this is an improvement, had one guide and two needle-bars. The two needle-bars were bolted so as to operate together. The principle of improvement admitted to be valuable and patentable, as I understand it, is the application to this Pepper loom of two separate guide-bars or thread-guides in combination with two separate and independent needle-bars, one working at a time, and the guide-bars reversing each other.

Assuming Mr. Mee and Mr. Marshall to be both original inventors of the improvement on the Pepper loom—Mee the first to conceive and describe it, and Marshall the first to embody it in a working machine; Mee using reasonable diligence to perfect his invention and to reduce it to practice, and succeeding in doing so after Marshall, but before a patent was granted to either—what are their rights, and to which of them should the commissioner award the patent?

It is contended by the learned counsel for Marshall that Marshall, under such circumstances, has the right; that although not the first to conceive, still, if he first reduced the conception to practice and use, he is the first inventor, in the sense of the patent laws, and that Mee must be excluded. The language of his argument is, that "in the race of diligence between rival inventors, he 'who first perfects his invention and reduces it to practice' is entitled to a patent." It will not be contended that if Marshall surreptitiously obtained a knowledge of Mee's invention, and applied for a patent, that he would be entitled, because he would not be the first or even an original inventor. But suppose him to have been an original contriver of the thing claimed, and not to have surreptitiously obtained a knowledge of it from another, then he can only be defeated by Mee's showing that he had previously conceived the idea, and that he had also carried the idea into practical operation; that is to say, in other words, that Mee had not only first conceived the idea, but had also first reduced it to practice. The case of Reed v. Cutter [Case No. 11,645], is cited to sustain this position; but a reference to that case shows that the doctrine laid down by Judge Story is the reverse of the position maintained by the counsel. Judge Story, in delivering his opinion in that case, uses this language: "The passage cited from Mr. Phillips' work on Patents, in the sense in which I understand it, is perfectly accurate. He there expressly states 'that the party claiming a patent must be the original and first inventor, and that his right to a patent will not be defeated by proof that another person had anticipated him in making the invention, "unless such person was using reasonable diligence in adopting and perfecting the same."' These latter words are copied from the fifteenth section of the act of 1836 [5 Stat. 123], and constitute a qualification of the preceding language of that section; so that an inventor who has first actually perfected his invention will not be deemed to have surreptitiously or unjustly obtained a patent for that which was in fact first invented by another, unless the latter was at the time using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same. And this I take to be clearly law; for he is the first inventor in the sense of the act, and entitled to a patent for his invention, who has first perfected and adapted the same to use; and until the invention is so perfected and adapted to use, it is not patentable. An imperfect and incomplete invention resting in mere theory, or in intellectual notion, or in uncertain experiments, and not actually reduced to practice, and embodied in some distinct machinery, apparatus, manufacture, or composition of matter, is not, and indeed cannot be, patentable under our patent laws, since it is utterly impossible under such circumstances to comply with the fundamental requisites of these acts. In a race of diligence between two independent inventors he who first reduces his invention to a fixed, positive, and practical form would seem to be entitled to a priority of right to a patent therefor. The clause of the section now under consideration seems to qualify that right by providing that in such cases he who invents first shall have the prior right if he is using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same, although the second inventor has in fact first perfected the same and reduced the same to practice in a positive form. It thus gives full effect to the well-known maxim, that he has the better right who is prior in point of time, namely, in making the discovery or invention. But if, as the argument of the learned counsel insists, the text of Mr. Phillips means to affirm (what I think it does not) that he who is the original and first inventor of an invention so perfected and reduced to practice will be deprived of his right to a patent in favor of a second and subsequent inventor, simply because the first invention was not then known or used by other persons than the inventor, or not known or used to such an extent as to give the public a full knowledge of its existence, I cannot agree to the doctrine, for, in my judgment, our patent laws justify no such construction." The same law is laid down by Judge Cranch in the cases of Heath v. Hildreth [Case No. 6,309], and Perry v. Cornell [Id. 11,001].

The case of Bedford v. Hunt [Id. 1,217], decided by Judge Story in 1817, is explained and modified by the case of Reed v. Cutter [supra], which was decided by the same judge in 1841.

There is no proof that Marshall conceived the idea of the improvement on the Pepper loom before November, 1850, while the witnesses Davis, Wallis, John Pepper, and others testify that Mee had conceived and described it in 1849 and early in 1850, months before Marshall, and had in fact knit the fabric. John Pepper, in his answer to the sixth interrogatory, says Mee so described the extra guide-bar that he (Pepper) could have put it on the loom if he had chosen to do so. Mee never abandoned his conception or failed in the use of reasonable diligence to perfect and adapt it to use. It was known early in 1851 to the Cranes and J. Pepper that he was engaged in preparing his model, and his applications for patents for the machine and fabric were filed in the patent office on the 17th and 24th of May, 1851. Marshall and Mee's machines are admitted on both sides to be identical in principle, and the fabric, the product of them, the same. It seems to me, therefore, wholly immaterial, upon the authority of Reed v. Cutter, above cited, whether Marshall first reduced the improvement to use in a working machine or not. If Mee first conceived it, and used reasonable diligence to perfect it, and did perfect it, though subsequent to Marshall, he is entitled to the patents claimed by him, even if Marshall was an original subsequent inventor, first perfecting and reducing the invention to use. But upon the proof I do not think Mr. Marshall was an original inventor. If Mee's witnesses are to be credited —confirmed, as I think, to some extent, by Harmon—Marshall is in no sense an original inventor, as he borrowed his ideas of the improvement from Mee. The testimony of Wallis in his answers to the seventh, eighth, and thirteenth interrogatories-in-chief is full to this point. So is the answer of Samuel Adams to the third interrogatory.

Wallis, in his answers to the seventh, eighth, and thirteenth interrogatories-in-chief, says: "* * *" The force of this evidence is felt; and it is attempted to discredit him, first, by the testimony of Crane, who denies that he was present or even heard such conversation. If Crane were a competent witness, the testimony of the two would be balanced. Even if Crane was not present, it would only show that Wallis was mistaken in an immaterial fact. Whether Crane was present or not, does not alter the other facts testified to. A mistake by a witness in an immaterial fact ought not to discredit him. The maxim falsus in uno falsus in omnibus does not apply. That can only apply where there is willful corrupt falsehood in one particular, amounting to perjury; in which case all the other testimony of the witness is to be rejected. It has no application to a case of mistake. The most honest witness may not be found correct in some particulars; and if those particulars are immaterial, they should not discredit him in material matters. But Crane, for the reasons hereinafter given, is himself disqualified as interested; so that Wallis is, in law, uncontradicted.

The learned counsel for Marshall next ingeniously endeavors to destroy the force of this evidence by arguing that the conversation occurred before November, 1850, when the new-improved loom was commenced by Marshall, and that it must have related to some other loom—to a then "late-improved loom." The conclusive answer to this suggestion of counsel is, that Wallis, in the beginning of his answer to the seventh interrogatory, says: "I heard something about an improvement that could be made on the Pepper loom." It did not relate to what had been done or was then doing on an improved loom, but to what could be done. No person can read the evidence without so understanding the witness, according to the natural import of his words, or being satisfied that Mr. Marshall must have so understood him. But Wallis is not alone and unsupported in bringing home to Mr. Marshall the knowledge of Mee's conceptions for improving the Pepper loom in the identical particulars in which it was afterwards improved. Adams corroborates him in his answer to the third interrogatory of his deposition. John Pepper, in his answer to the twelfth interrogatory, corroborates him. John Pepper says: "Jasper Crane wrote that the invention was none of mine, but that it belonged to John Mee. The invention I mean is the new ribbed loom with the double guide-bars." Jasper Crane was then a partner of Marshall, and Marshall is bound by his admissions. These three wit nesses are unassailed in general reputation for veracity, and there is nothing in their testimony in the record to justify me in concluding that they have not spoken the truth.

Next, as to the witnesses examined on the part of Mr. Marshall, the Messrs. Crane (J. G. and Hosea) are not in law competent witnesses, being interested. It is proved by John Pepper, and admitted by them, that they were each interested one-third with Marshall in the machine built by him at Lowell and in the patents he expected to obtain for the improvement on the Pepper loom and the fabric made by it. Though they say they sold out about a month before they testified, J. G. Crane on his cross-examination, in answer to the fifty-second interrogatory, says: "I am informed and believe that in case the machine is successful in a pecuniary view, part of the proceeds are to be applied to the payment of certain debts due from me and my brother to Aldritch & Tyne." The money value of the machine depends upon Marshall's getting a patent for it. J. G. Crane says, in his answer to the forty-seventh cross-interrogatory: "Aldritch & Tyne were substituted in our place, and they have now the interest that we had." For the interest, then, they were to pay the debts referred to. The last cross-interrogatory put to Hosea Crane is in these words: "Do you not expect any benefit to result to you pecuniarily in case Marshall succeeds in getting a patent for this loom?" His answer is, "I may or may not." He does not venture to deny his interest, and he thus disqualifies himself.

As to the testimony of Harmon. The fifteenth interrogatory, put to him on his examination-in-chief by Mr. Marshall's attorney, is in these words: "So far as you know, who claimed to be the inventor of the improved machine?" Answer. "Marshall, as far as I know anything about it. I can't say I am right about that, after all, because after awhile I knew there was another one claiming to have a part in it. It was but little I knew about it any way; what I knew I got from talk about the shop." Harmon does not say who that other one was who claimed part of the improvement, but he no doubt meant Mee, because, in answer to a cross-interrogatory specifically to this point, he admits that Mee did set up a claim to the invention. The thirty-third cross-interrogatory is in these words: "Did you ever hear Mee claim an interest in this improved loom?" His answer is, "I don't recollect anything definite about it through Mee; only by some incidental talk about it. In regard to Mee, as I recollect now in some conversation, he said that he had something to do with this, and that they were not willing to pay him for it, or something of that kind."

Upon the testimony of Mr. Marshall's own witness (Harmon), then, so much relied on by his counsel, what becomes of their argument that Mee could not be the inventor of the improvement because he stood by and saw Marshall spending his time and labor in perfecting the improvement without any assertion of right in himself? What becomes of the charges of bad faith to his employers (the Cranes), in suffering them to expend their money upon the understanding that Marshall was the inventor? It can hardly be thought that Marshall did not know what was talked of in his own shop, or knew less than his own witness (Harmon). Besides, the witnesses on the part of Mee before referred to fully prove Marshall's knowledge of Mee's claim, and also that the Messrs. Crane knew it. The Cranes "were not willing to pay Mee." They may have concluded he was too poor to perfect his improvement, which seems to have been attended with considerable expense; and as Marshall agreed to take them in as joint partners in the machine and patent, it was more to their interest to employ Marshall than Mee to construct the machine. If Mee's witnesses are to be believed, there can be no doubt that the Cranes and Marshall were well aware that Mee claimed the invention as his own. It is certainly of great weight that their statements on this point are to some extent confirmed by Harmon, Mr. Marshall's own witness.

Great reliance is placed by Marshall's counsel on the evidence of Harmon in relation to the cams. These cams, they say, were perfected by Marshall after a failure by Mee, and without them the machine was imperfect and made defective work, and the invention was not reduced to practice so as to be patentable. If the cams were of the essence of the invention, and constituted its principle, it is strange, as testified by Harmon, that Mee should have been intrusted by Marshall (the inventor) with the supervision of their construction. Harmon says that the cams, as made by Mee's order, failed to make a perfect ribbed fabric, and that Mee said "the defect could not be remedied." Harmon admits, however, that Mee on the same day, four or five hours after, said "he could remedy the defect." Marshall suggested the proper alterations in the cams, and then the machine performed its office and made a perfect ribbed fabric.

From the explanations made to me on the hearing by the examiner, I do not understand that the cams form any part of the principle of the improved Pepper loom. That principle consists in the application to the old Pepper loom of a double set of needle-bars, working separately and independently, one set of needle-bars being up while the other set is down, in combination with a double set of guide-bars or thread-guides reversing each other. The cams form no part of the principle of the improvement; are merely auxiliary; a mechanical device requiring no invention, and capable of being made and applied by any skillful machinist. If it was true, therefore, that Marshall had first perfected this mechanical device, and thereby caused the machine first to make the perfect fabric, still, if Mee first conceived the improvement and its principle, and was using reasonable diligence to perfect the mechanical details, he cannot be deprived of his patents. He did perfect his model in a reasonable time. No such delay occurred as to amount to abandonment of his right. His application to the patent office was previous to Marshall's. No patent in fact has yet been granted to anybody; and if he is the first original inventor, and has now reduced his invention to practice, he must prevail over any subsequent original inventor reducing it to use before him, and a fortiori over Mr. Marshall, not an original inventor at all, but borrowing his ideas of the improvement from Mee. The patents for the loom and for the fabric, the fruit of the loom, must therefore be awarded to the assignees of John Mee, unless some person other than Marshall can show a better right. John Pepper asserts that the double needle-bars, working independently, was his original idea; but all the other evidence shows it to be Mee's; and Pepper has entered no caveat, nor set up any adverse claim in the patent office, nor alleged that he made known his invention to Mee, and he is self-concluded.

Upon the whole, therefore, I am of opinion, and do now this 20th of April, 1853, order and adjudge, that the decision of the commissioner of patents of the 12th of January, 1852, in favor of Mee, Rourke, and McKennon, assignees of John Mee, in the cases of improvements in the knitting-loom and knit fabric, be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

MARSHALL v. PIERREZ.

[9 Ben. 39.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. Feb., 1877.

SHIPPING—CHARTER—JURISDICTION—DAMAGES ON CONTRACT.

Where a libel in personam was filed to recover damages on a contract for the use of a steamboat for two excursion trips, from the city of New York to Sandy Hook light and return, and a motion was made to dismiss the libel for want of jurisdiction: Held, that the contract set forth had all the legal characteristics of a charter-party, and was a maritime contract within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. The cases of The William Fletcher [Case No. 17,692] and The Druid, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 391, considered and distinguished.

[Cited in Wenberg v. Cargo of Mineral Phosphate, 15 Fed. 286.]

[This was a suit by William H. Marshall against Gustavus Pierrez for nonperformance of contract.]

A contract was made in August, 1870, between parties engaged in the business of getting up pleasure excursions for passengers, and the owner of the steamboat Minnie R. Childs, for two excursions from New York to the light-ship beyond Sandy Hook and back, for $125 for each trip, the charterers to have all the receipts from passengers, and the owner to pay the running expenses of the boat. The excursion was duly advertised and prepared for, many passengers gathered at different landings, but the boat did not come at all. The charterers thereupon commenced an action in personam, claiming $1,500 damages for breach of the contract as a charter-party. The contract was verbal, and the answer averred that the negotiations had were only preliminary and that no contract was in fact ever made.

W. H. McDougall and J. J. Allen, for libellant.

H. M. Whitbeck, for respondent.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action in personam brought to recover of the defendant damages for the non-performance of a contract. The libel avers that on the 8th of August, 1876, the defendant, being the owner of the steamboat Minnie R. Childs, agreed with the libellant to charter that boat to the libellant for two voyages from the city of New York to the light-ship outside of Sandy Hook, in the Atlantic Ocean, and back, to carry therein for the libellants a cargo of passengers, for the sum of $125 for each voyage; that the libellants were at all times ready and willing to perform their said agreement on their part, and entered upon the performance thereof by providing for the cargo required; but the defendant wholly refused to perform it on his part, and without cause declined to perform the voyages as agreed, whereby the libellant sustained damage to the amount of $1,500.

A motion has been made to dismiss this libel for the purpose of raising at the outset an objection to the jurisdiction of the admiralty to entertain such an action. In behalf of the defendant it is contended that the facts averred do not constitute a cause of action cognizable in a court of admiralty, and reference is made to the case of O'Brien v. The William Fletcher,—decided by Judge Blatchford, Nov. 14, 1876 [Case No. 7,692],—as a case exactly similar to this, where the libel was dismissed. But the advocate has not observed the distinction existing between an action in rem to enforce a lien upon a vessel and an action in personam to recover damages for the breach of a maritime contract.

The case of The William Fletcher [supra] was an action in rem, and the question determined was a question of lien. In respect to the question of lien, the law as now settled is that in the absence of a special agreement that the vessel shall be hypothecated as security for the performance of the contract, no lien upon the ship arises out of a contract to transport cargo in her, when no cargo is received by the ship and the voyage is never commenced.

This is an action in personam to recover a personal judgment against the defendant for the damages arising out of a breach of contract. The contract set forth is an explicit and complete contract in regard to the performance of two definite voyages by the boat of the defendant, at a definite time, for a definite sum of money. Such a contract has all the legal characteristics of a charter of the vessel and is a maritime contract. As such it furnishes a subject matter within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. The case of Quirk v. Clinton [Case No. 11,518] decided by Judge Betts, and affirmed on appeal by Judge Nelson, was a case similar in principle to the case before the court, and is authority to support this libel. The remark of the court in the case of The Druid, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 391, to the effect that no responsibility can attach upon the owner of a ship if the ship is exempt,—a remark afterwards stated by the judge who made it to be "in the nature of an obiter dictum" (The Bold Buccleugh, 2 Eng. Law & Eq. 540),—if to be understood as of general application, has not been considered to be in harmony with the maritime law of the United States (The Freeman, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 189; 1 Pars. Shipp. p. 174, note), and indeed has not been referred to by the defendant as authority in support of the objection taken to this libel. I am therefore of the opinion that the jurisdiction of the court to entertain this action is complete.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 2, 1858.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — BOND FOR PAYMENT — GOODS NOT IMPORTED — APPLICATION FOR REMISSION — DELAY—SUIT FOR RECOVERY —VOLUNTARY PAYMENT.

1. Where a bond for the payment of duties was given on a warehouse entry, on the importation of goods, and it turned out that some of the goods covered by the bond were not imported into the country, and a remission of the duties on those goods was refused by the treasury department, because the application was not made within a year after the importation, and the importer then paid, under protest, the duties on the missing goods, to avoid a suit on the bond: Held, that he could not recover back the duties thus paid.

[Cited in United States v. Schlesinger, 14 Fed. 683.]

2. The payment was voluntary, and was not made in order to obtain the possession of any goods, within the act of February 26, 1845 (5 Stat. 727).

This was an action [by Edward Marshall and Thomas Tileston,] against [Heman J. Redfield] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back duties charged to have been illegally exacted [under color of the law, by the collector].[2] Nine casks of hardware had been shipped to the plaintiffs, as appeared from the invoice and manifest, and a warehouse entry was made of the same, and a bond given in the usual way, by the consignees, with surety. When the ship was discharged [under the inspector],[2] but seven of the casks could be found on board, the other two having been either lost, sent by some other ship, or not shipped at all. The seven were sent to the warehouse. The plaintiffs, within the three years allowed by the act of congress, paid the duties [to the collector][2] upon the seven casks, and withdrew the goods from the warehouse. They also applied to have the bond cancelled without the payment of duties upon the two missing casks, which, it was claimed, had never been imported into the country, and were, therefore, not chargeable with duties. That application was refused by the collector. The parties then applied to the secretary of the treasury for a remission of the duties, which application was also refused, under a regulation of the department, requiring the application to be made within a year from the importation of the goods. The plaintiffs then paid the duties under protest, in order to obtain a cancellation of the bond, and to avoid a suit on the same. This action was then brought, to recover back the money thus paid, with interest.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The principal objection to a recovery in this case is, that the money has been paid by the plaintiffs voluntarily, and not under coercion or duress by color of law, so as to lay a foundation for the action. The act of congress of February 26, 1845 (5 Stat. 727), saves the action to parties "who have paid, or shall hereafter pay, money, as and for duties, under protest, to any collector of the customs," &c., "in order to obtain goods, &c., imported by him," &c., and upon which the duties claimed were not chargeable. Now, in the present case, the goods in question were not in the hands of the collector, or under his authority, and, indeed, had never been in the custom-house, and hence the money cannot be said to have been paid to get possession of them. It is supposed, however, that the payment with a view to the surrender or cancellation of the bond, and to avoid a suit thereon, comes within the spirit or intent of the act of congress; and the case of Maxwell v. Griswold, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 242, is referred to as sustaining this position. But, on looking into that case, it will be found not to be an authority for this action. There the goods were in the hands of the collector, and the merchant was obliged to do one of two things, in order to obtain them, namely, allow his invoice price to remain, and be subjected to the penalty of twenty per centum, under the 8th section of the act of 1846 [9 Stat. 43], or add to the invoice price, so as to bring it up to that claimed under the treasury circular. The claim was, in either case, unlawful, as was subsequently held by the court. Among other things, the court say: "The money was thus obtained by a moral duress, not justified by law, and which was not submitted to by the importer, except to regain possession of his property withheld from him on grounds manifestly wrong."

In the present case, the money was paid to avoid a suit on the bond, that being threatened if the duties were not paid. But the defence to that suit was as perfect as if the bond had not been in the case, and to hold such a payment to be one by coercion and not voluntary, would be equivalent to holding that every payment of money demanded by the collector is an involuntary payment, and lays a foundation for an action to recover it back, if the demand turns out, in the end, not to have been founded in law. Upon the case made, a judgment must be entered for the defendant, with costs.

MARSHALL v. UNION INS. CO.

[2 Wash. C. C. 357.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1809.

MARINE INSURANCE—ILLEGAL TRADE — CONCEALMENT—GROUND OF SUSPICION—CONDEMNATION—AGAINST RIGHT.

1. The vessel insured was captured on her voyage to Carthagena, and condemned on the ground of illicit trade, a part of the cargo having been brought from Spain to New-York by a Spaniard, entered for exportation, and afterwards sold to the plaintiff, the Spaniard going out as passenger on board the vessel, and the transaction being considered by the British court of admiralty as illegal, deeming it a trading between the mother country and her colony. If the jury considered that the assured was guilty of concealment of the shipment of the goods of Spanish origin, then the policies effected by the plaintiff will be void, for the taint of part of the cargo would occasion a seizure, detention, and expense, and give the assured a right to abandon.

2. The assured is not bound to anticipate every possible ground of suspicion which may, against right, weigh with the belligerent cruisers and courts, and to communicate the circumstances; although, if against right, the belligerent courts are in the habit of condemning property under particular circumstances, he should disclose the circumstances, if they exist, that the underwriter may know how to estimate the risk.

This was an action on four policies; one on the vessel, another on the freight, a third on the cargo, and a fourth on an additional cargo, effected in October, 1806. The additional cargo consisted principally of goods brought by a Spaniard from Cadiz to New-York, and entered for exportation for the benefit of drawback. These goods were afterwards sold by the Spaniard to one Cazenove, recently, before they were reshipped, and sold by Cazenove to the plaintiff. The policies contained the usual warranty of neutral property, to be proved here, and against illicit or prohibited trade. The defendant was informed that five Spaniards, with passports, were to go passengers in this vessel to Carthagena, but that any part of the cargo had been brought by one of those passengers from Spain, and had been recently sold by him to the plaintiff, was not disclosed. The vessel and cargo, after having had her papers taken away at sea by a British vessel, was again detained by another British vessel, carried into Jamaica, and condemned. The whole record was read, not as containing evidence, but to show the ground of condemnation. The objections to the recovery were, first; that there were strong circumstances in the case, to show that the sale by the Spaniard was not bona fide, and that the apparent sale was as a cover; and, secondly, that the circumstance of part of the cargo having been brought from Spain, and recently sold by one of the passengers, ought to have been disclosed to the defendants. Three presidents of insurance offices were examined, and they all gave it as their opinion that those circumstances were material. Two of them said, that a disclosure of them would have increased the premium. The third said, that it would have led him to inquire into the fairness of the transaction; but that, if he had found it bona fide, it would have made no difference with him.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, in charging the jury, observed—that it was for them to weigh the evidence, and to decide, not upon suspicions, but upon such circumstances as ought to influence a correct mind, whether the sale was bona fide, or not. If not, it was a fraud upon the neutrality of the United States, as well as upon the defendants, and amounted to a breach of warranty in the policy on those goods. That if the jury should be satisfied upon this point against the insured, it would be sufficient to avoid all the policies upon the ground of concealment, because, although the taint upon part of the cargo would not, or ought not to have caused a condemnation of the other parts, or of the vessel, yet it would necessarily occasion a seizure, detention, and expense, if not danger to the whole, and would, at all events, give a right to the insured, on hearing of the capture, to abandon. The insurer calculates not only the risk of condemnation, but of capture and detention, and a concealment of circumstances which may produce the latter, must be material to the risk, and would, if known, increase the premium.

As to the second point, the jury must inquire for themselves, whether these circumstances were material to the risk, and in making this inquiry, they should carry back their minds to the time when these insurances were effected, without attending to the subsequent capture and condemnation. We are all very wise in finding out the causes which have led to particular events, after the events have taken place; and we are apt to give weight and consequence to circumstances, which would originally have passed unnoticed. Would the circumstances of this case, which were disclosed, have appared material, in October 1806, to any of these parties? The insured knew, provided his purchase was bona fide, that the goods became thereby neutral, and were not liable to condemnation. He also knew, that, in general, it was not necessary for the insured to disclose from whom he had purchased the cargo which he asks to be insured; and he also knew, that according to the law of nations, it was no cause of condemnation, that the vendor was an enemy, and was to be a passenger in the vessel carrying the goods. It might or might not have occurred to him, that these were circumstances, which, with a suspicious court, or rapacious captors, might lead to difficulty; but we do not know that the insured is bound to anticipate every possible ground of suspicion, which might weigh with some minds, and totally escape the observation of others. If, according to any established adjudications of the belligerent courts, generally known, certain circumstances become grounds of condemnation, though in opposition to the law of nations, those circumstances, if known to the insured, should be disclosed. So a case may happen, where the circumstances are of such a nature, as to make the danger of capture very great, in which the court mean not to say, that a disclosure ought not to be made. But it is not every conjecture or opinion, as to the materiality of the circumstances concealed, which ought to weigh with the jury. In this case, the opinions of the witnesses, upon this point, deserve to be respected. Still, however, they are but opinions, which are not obligatory upon a jury. One of those witnesses put the question upon the true ground. The circumstances, if known, would have led him to inquire into the fairness and good faith of the transaction, and if he found it fair, they would have made no difference. This is certainly a very proper inquiry for a jury to make.

MARSHALL v. UNION INS. CO.

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1809.

NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—IMPORTANCE THEREOF.

The court granted a new trial, on the ground that new and material evidence had been discovered, which the court deemed so important, as that the same should be submitted to the jury.

[Cited in Macy v. De Wolf, Case No. 8,933; Aiken v. Bemis, Id. 109.]

This was a motion for a new trial, on the ground that new and material evidence had been discovered since the trial. Vide [Case No. 9,133]. The new evidence consisted of documents from the custom-house at New York, tending to invalidate some of the testimony given on the trial, and to show that the sale by the Spaniard was not bona fide, but a mere cover, and the goods, in fact, not neutral property.

E. Tilghman, against the motion, stated, that when this case was reached upon the trial list, Mr. Dallas, for the defendant, mentioned, that the commission, which had been received a day or two before from New-York, gave him reason to suspect that further testimony might be obtained from the custom-house, and that he had sent on there accordingly. Upon which, the plaintiff's counsel declined pressing on the trial, and left it to Mr. Dallas, whether it should then come on or not. It was, therefore, now too late to urge this testimony as a ground for a new trial. The defendants had chosen to take the chance of a trial upon the evidence they had, and ought not to be allowed a new one on this new evidence, for the production of which, the plaintiff's counsel had offered to wait. He also contended, that the new evidence was not material, and did not affect the merits of the case.

Mr. Dallas, for the motion, replied, that he did not, at the time of the trial, understand the proffered indulgence of the plaintiff's counsel to go so far as Mr. Tilghman did, and as it was merely a suspicion that further testimony might be obtained, he would not have been warranted in requesting from the court, or even from the counsel, a continuance of the cause. As to the materiality of the new evidence, he relied upon it as decisive against the defendant.

BY THE COURT. This is a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted, upon the ground of material evidence discovered since the trial. We are satisfied that the newly discovered evidence was not known at the time of the trial, although the defendants' counsel, upon seeing the New-York commission, which only came to hand a few days before the trial, suspected, from some parts of it, that some useful information might be collected. But this would not have been a good reason for continuing the cause; and as the counsel differ, with respect to what passed between them at the bar, we cannot say that Mr. Dallas understood that his opponents would have consented to a postponement, although we are well satisfied, from their declarations, that they would have so consented. But, certainly, he had no ground for insisting upon it.

As to the materiality of the evidence, we cannot positively decide, nor, perhaps, would it be proper now to give a positive opinion about it. It may be explained, but at present it appears to have a considerable bearing upon the point on which the cause turns, and we think it ought to be submitted to a jury.

Rule, for a new trial, absolute.

MARSHALL v. UNION INS. CO.

[2 Wash. C. C. 452.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1810.

MARINE INSURANCE—CONDEMNATION—EVIDENCE—PROCEEDINGS OF ADMIRALTY COURT—CLAIM TO PROPERTY—DUTY OF MASTER.

1. The whole record of the proceedings of the admiralty court in which the property insured was condemned, cannot be read in evidence, the sentence of the court not requiring the whole proceedings to explain them.

2. Cases in which the record may be referred to, in suits brought against the underwriters.

3. Unless under peculiar circumstances, no part of the record, other than the sentence, is evidence; and the party wishing to bring himself within the exceptions, must state the purpose for which he means to read other parts of the record, and confine himself to those parts.

[Cited in Azuria v. Insurance Co. of Pennsylvania, Case No. 691.]

4. It is the duty of the master to put in a claim to property against which proceedings are instituted; and his failing to do so, may possibly affect the claim of the insured, under certain circumstances.

[These were actions on four policies of insurance at the first hearing of which a verdict was rendered in the plaintiff's favor, Case No. 9,133.]

This cause, in which a new trial was granted at the last term [Case No. 9,134], now came on. The evidence was the same, with some additional circumstances, strongly pressed upon the jury by the defendants' counsel, to show that the additional cargo was Spanish property, covered by the plaintiff. No evidence was given to prove the materiality to the risk, of the non-disclosure of the purchase of that cargo, supposing it to have been bona fide. The defendants' counsel offered to read the whole of the record of the vice-admiralty court at Jamaica, condemning the vessel and cargo; but the court refused to let it be read, observing, that the sentence, being free from ambiguity, did not require any aid from other parts of the record, in order to explain the ground upon which it went; and of course, it was all that it was necessary or proper to read. The record might be referred to, for some purposes; such, for instance, as to show that no claim was put in; that the condemnation was probably produced by an untrue and fraudulent claim, or by other misconduct of the captain, to be collected from his answers to the standing interrogatories, and from the same source to impeach his evidence given in the trial here; and also to show what papers were found on board, as acknowledged by the captain. But unless with these exceptions, or such as rest upon similar principles, the record, other than the sentence, is not evidence; and, to save time, the party wishing to bring himself within any of the exceptions, must state the purpose for which he means to read any other part of the record, and confine himself to that point. The court referred to former decisions here upon this question, and to the opinion of the supreme court, at the last term, in the case of Hodgson v. Marine Ins. Co. [5 Cranch (9 U. S.) 100]. The defendants produced in evidence the oath taken at the custom-house by Cazenove, in which he states, that the goods mentioned in the entry, which includes the four boxes imported by Cazenove, he had delivered to Marshall, and Marshall swears that he received them from Cazenove; whereas, the form of the oath prescribed by law, is, that the one sold, and the other purchased. This was urged as strong evidence, to show, that no real transfer of this property from De Lastre had been made. Many inaccuracies were pointed out in the custom-house proceedings, where Cazenove appeared as the importer of these goods, instead of agent to De Lastre; and the invoice of the outward cargo is dated the 4th of October, whereas the sale to the plaintiff is dated the 14th. A witness was examined, to prove that this was a mistake, and that the date of the invoice should have been the 15th. Evidence explanatory of the inaccuracies at the custom-house, was also given. Other circumstances were also relied upon by the defendants, to show that the transfer of these goods, originally belonging to De Lastre, was not real. It was also objected, that the captain put in no claim at Jamaica; which might have produced the condemnation, and for which the insured ought to be responsible. It was also objected that the condemnation was for illicit trade; and also, that the vessel and cargo were not sufficiently documented; and further, that one of the boxes containing books imported by De Lastre, was not pretended to be sold to the plaintiff, although it was acknowledged that it was not covered as the property of the plaintiff, though put on board by him.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). It is certainly the duty of the master, to put in a claim for his owners, and their claim upon the underwriters may possibly, under certain circumstances, be affected by a neglect of the master to do so. But in this case, the letters of the captain to his owners calling for duplicates of the papers, of which the first privateer that brought him to had deprived him, proves that it was his intention to file a claim; and his omission to do so may fairly be attributed to his death, which took place before the sentence. As to the charge of illicit trade, there is not the slightest evidence of it; the letter of Mr.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

Lenox, the consul of the United States at Jamaica, stating this, not being to be regarded by the jury. As to the want of proper papers to prove the neutrality of the property, the charge is unsupported, and the contrary is sufficiently established.

The important point is, whether the goods imported by De Lastre, and mentioned in the bill of parcels from Cazenove to Marshall, were bona fide sold to the plaintiff? Cazenove swears that he purchased them from De Lastre, and sold them to Marshall, and received payment; and this is corroborated by the bill of parcels, with Cazenove's receipt for the money. In opposition to this, the defendants rely upon circumstantial evidence, which, if sufficiently strong to convince your minds that this was a fraudulent transaction, ought not to have the less weight because it is not positive and direct. The circumstances principally relied upon, are, the kind of goods—not such as could be intended for sale, but such as were suited to the condition of a man of fortune and high station; that they are the very goods brought in by him to New-York, and which were exported in the same vessel which was to convey him to Carthagena. Secondly. As a proof that Marshall acted as a mere agent, he charged 2½ per cent. commission at the foot of the invoice. Thirdly. The irregularities at the custom-house. Fourthly. Cazenove has produced no bill of parcels, receipt or other document whatever, showing that he purchased these goods from De Lastre. Lastly, and principally. The oaths taken at the custom-house by Cazenove and Marshall, in which they describe these goods as delivered by one, and received by the other, contrary to the prescribed form, which should have stated them as sold by Cazenove, and purchased by Marshall. It is for you to say, if these circumstances are sufficiently weighty to overpower the positive evidence in the cause. If this was in fact belligerent property, covered by Marshall, the owner of the vessel and cargo, this will avoid all the policies, upon the ground of concealment; because it exposed the whole to the hazard of confiscation, and most certainly to seizure, detention, and expense, affording to the insured an opportunity to throw the whole on the underwriters. If any of the articles put on board by Marshall were the property of De Lastre, and were not covered as belonging to the plaintiff, (which it was contended by the defendants' counsel was the case of the box of books,) this might also be material to the risk, by inducing seizure, a carrying in for examination and adjudication, though finally, a condemnation of more than the belligerent property could not have been justified. As to the materiality of this fact to the risk insured, you are to decide; and the court has only to inform you, that the concealment of a material fact avoids the policy.

Verdict for defendants.

MARSHALL et al. v. WILLIAMS.

[2 Biss. 255; [1] 3 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 77; 18 Int. Rev. Rec. 165; 2 Chi. Leg. News, 201; 5 Leg. Gaz. 337.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. March Term, 1870.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—COMMISSION MERCHANT—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIT—WAIVER.

1. Commission merchant is liable to his principal if he sells goods contrary to instructions, or is guilty of negligence in the sale.

2. The receiving without objection accounts of sales made on credit, is a waiver of a previous instruction to sell for cash, and the merchant may afterward presume that he has the right to make further sales on credit.

The defendant, George F. Williams, while acting as the agent of the plaintiffs in selling oil on commission for them sold on fifteen days credit, on the 18th of January, 1867, ninety-two barrels to McCormick and Callender, who soon afterwards failed, whereupon plaintiffs brought this action to recover the value of the oil. On the 16th of August, 1866, the plaintiffs had by letter instructed the defendant in selling oil for them to sell according to the "net cash rule." Nevertheless the oil subsequently sold by the defendant for the plaintiffs was sold not for cash, but on credit, sometimes more than fifteen days, sometimes less—and returns made accordingly.

George Willard, for plaintiffs.
S. A. Goodwin, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. The defendant is accountable, in the first place, if he has sold the oil contrary to the instructions of the plaintiffs, and secondly, if he has been guilty of any negligence in the sale by which they have been damnified.

The testimony introduced as to the commercial meaning of these words, "net cash rule" is not of such a character that the court can place any stress upon it; the result seems to be that the language is interpreted according to the notion of each particular merchant. Some construed it in one way, and some in another. There is no general understanding among commercial men applicable to the use of such language, therefore the court must place a legal construction upon it, which is that the oil was to be sold for cash. If the case stood upon that alone, then perhaps there would be no doubt that the plaintiffs could recover. But the subsequent transactions show that if that was the purport of the instructions, it was waived, and the business was done upon a different basis.

The credits given from time to time on sales by the defendant, were known to the plaintiffs, and if it was their intention to hold defendant up to the cash rule they should have at once notified him that such sales were contrary to their instructions and that they must sell for cash. But having accepted without objection the accounts of sale made from time to time by the defendant, and drawn for and received the balances, it must be considered that their letter of the 16th of August was modified by these subsequent recognitions of the credits given by the defendant. Accordingly the presumption is that defendant had the right to sell to McCormick and Callender on fifteen days credit in the same way as he had previously sold to other parties.

This is the construction that must be placed on the conduct of the plaintiffs unless it was the understanding and contract that the defendant was selling on a guaranty of the sales made. If that was so, and the plaintiffs were warranted in believing that it was so understood by the defendant, as a matter of course the change from cash to credit would not be objected to; but I doubt whether the plaintiffs could have so understood it. These sales and reports were made from time to time at the usual commissions charged. Now can it be possible that the defendant believed he was selling on a del credere commission and guaranteeing every sale that he made?

I cannot so interpret the conduct of the parties. I do not know what the facts may be in the commercial world. It may be that commission merchants are so anxious to get business that they may guaranty sales if they receive the property, and have the right to sell it, taking the ordinary commissions, but I do not suppose, and certainly it cannot be inferred from the testimony in this case that such practice prevails in Chicago; and therefore I cannot infer that that construction is to be given to the plaintiffs' conduct.

The only remaining question is, did the defendant act with reasonable diligence and good faith in the sales. Some things had occurred, undoubtedly, calculated to throw suspicion upon the commercial standing of McCormick and Callender, but it cannot be claimed in this case that those circumstances were known to the defendant, or to his agent. The agent who transacted the business expressly states that so far as he knew, he believed that McCormick and Callender were in good standing, and a suspicion as to their position seems not to have been known to a large number of the merchants engaged in the same kind of business, and of course may not have been known to the defendant.

It would be hard merely because a whisper is circulated among men affecting the standing of a merchant, that another should be held accountable for the fact, if it has been indicated to others, and not to himself. So that taking all the testimony together, I cannot say the defendant was guilty of any negligence in the sale of this property to McCormick and Callender. The weight of evidence is that their standing in the community was good at the time of this sale.

This is a hard case undoubtedly on plaintiffs, but somebody has to lose his money. It is a question whether it shall be lost by the defendant or plaintiffs. If the sale was at the owner's risk, then the owner should lose: if at the risk of the defendant, he should lose.

Plaintiffs by permission of the court took a non-suit.

NOTE. A sale by a factor contrary to the order of his principal, may be afterward affirmed by the receipt of the proceeds. Morse v. Smith, Dud. (S. C.) 248. Where a commission merchant from time to time sends an account of sales to his principal, who makes no objection and draws for the balance of account rendered, it is a ratification of the sales, and the principal cannot recover for any alleged violation of instructions as to the terms of sale. [1 Cranch, C. C. 117.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1803.[2]

MONEY—LEGAL TENDER—PAPER MONEY—DEPRECIATION—RENT—REDUCTION.

Upon a deed made in 1779, reserving an annual rent of £26 current money in Virginia, forever, the rents accruing during the existence of paper money are to be reduced according to the scale of depreciation.

In equity.

CRANCH, Circuit Judge. In May, 1779, at a public sale of lots contiguous to the then bounds of Alexandria, by the executors of John Alexander, for the benefit of his son, W. T. Alexander, (then under age,) by virtue of the will of John Alexander,—Peter Wise, for Jacob Sly, became the purchaser of a half acre lot, in fee simple rendering an annual rent of £26, current money of Virginia. Before any deed of conveyance was made, Faw, the defendant, purchased the lot from Sly, and on the 5th of August, 1779, obtained a deed in his own name from the executors of John Alexander in fee-simple, rendering an annual rent of £26 current money of Virginia, to William Thornton Alexander, who was also a party to the deed. No notice is taken, in the deed, of the existence of paper money, which was then a legal tender, but had much depreciated. Gold and silver were also current money, but were very scarce and difficult to be obtained. Marsteller, who, on the 29th of December, 1794, got an assignment of the rents and the reversion from W. T. Alexander, brought this bill to recover them from Faw.

[2] [Reversed in 2 Cranch (6 U. S.) 10.]

It appears in evidence that Wise, when he bid off the lot, did not particularly understand in what kind of money the rents were to be paid, but supposed they would be payable in gold and silver, and therefore did not buy a lot for himself. That the rent was low at that time if payable in paper money, but high if payable in gold and silver, on account of its great scarcity. That the general opinion of those who attended the sale was that the rents would be payable in paper money as long as it should be current, and afterwards in gold and silver. It is admitted by the parties that the contract was to pay the rent in such money as should be current at the time the rents would become payable. And that such was their understanding and intention at the time of executing the contract. The rents therefore were payable in paper money while that was current, but were afterwards hitherto payable in gold and silver. This being the nature of the contract, the question is whether the rents forever are to be reduced annually by the scale of depreciation established by the act of the Virginia assembly, passed at the November session, 1781, c. 22; Chancery Revision of the laws, p. 147—(see 1 Wash. [Va.] 341, 342); or secondly, whether those rents only which became payable during the existence of paper money, are to be scaled; or, thirdly, whether the whole rent is now to be paid in gold and silver; or lastly, whether the court will establish any other equitable rule for the payment of the rents. The sum of £26 reduced by the scale for August, 1779, will be only £1. 3s. 7½d. or $3.94. This sum appears farther below the real value of the rent at that time than £26—or $86.67 was above its value. Lots in 1774 rented for 20 to 40 dollars—a lot opposite at 30 dollars in 1774—some as high as 45 dollars of equal value;—in 1784, lots less valuable rented at 133 dollars. Hence it appears that the scale of depreciation does not form a fair and equitable rule of interpretation of the contract. Besides, it seems to me that the admission of the parties that it was their intention that the rents should be payable in money current when the rents should become due, fairly excludes the case from the operation of the scale. Each party knew that at the time of the contract, the rent, if payable in paper, was far below its real value. They knew that the paper was still depreciating, and that it would at a future time cease to be a circulating medium, either by its depreciating so as finally to become of no value, or by depreciating until it gained the par of gold and silver. Either event would produce the same effect. The uncertainty of that event was a risk which each party was willing to take upon himself; and both received a premium for that risk. The benefit to Faw was the present low rent and the length of time during which it might be paid in a depreciated currency. The contemplated advantage to Alexander was the future high rent, when paper money should cease. Faw might be further induced to take the risk of a future high rent from the probability that lots would increase rapidly in value in consequence of the progressive increase of the trade and population of the town. It seems to have been a speculation on both sides attended with no circumstance of fraud or oppression. Each party had the same means of making his calculations upon future events, and neither seems to have been disappointed in his expectations. Faw has had the opportunity of paying part of his rents in paper money, and the benefit of the increased value of the property, and it seems but right that Alexander should receive the benefit of the increased value of the currency. Parol testimony has been adduced, not to contradict or vary the deed, but to explain the ambiguous term current money of Virginia—two kinds of money being current at that time. They have very naturally explained the general understanding of those who were at the sale, and there seems to be no reason to doubt that it was the intention and expectation of both parties, that the rent should be paid in paper while current, but afterwards in gold and silver or other money current at that time, when the rents should become payable.

The contract then seems to be divided into two parts—the one to pay paper money for a certain period, and after that to pay gold and silver. The period for paying in paper has by subsequent events been ascertained to be the 1st of January, 1782. At which time the other part of the contract took effect, which was to pay the rents in the then current money, namely, gold and silver. The act of assembly seems to contemplate only those contracts in which the parties themselves have not ascertained the relative value of paper money and gold and silver, and not those where they may have provided against the depreciation of the money, and its final abolition. The present seems to me to have been a contract of the latter kind. Both parties seem to have had a full view of the existing state of things, and to have made an equally accurate calculation of future events.

The intention of the parties makes the contract. If the intention here was, as is admitted, to pay in paper money during its existence, and then in gold and silver, then it was a contract to pay in gold and silver after a certain period. The consequence is that as to the payments to be made after the period, the contract is not within the act of assembly, but as to those which were to be made before, it is. But if this contract cannot be considered as a contract to pay part of the rents in paper money, and part in gold and silver, still the question will arise whether this court has not power, under the fifth section of the act of assembly, to examine into the circumstances of the transaction, and make a rule of adjusting the rents, different from the scale of depreciation. Upon this point, I consider the case of Watson v. Alexander, 1 Wash. [Va.] 340, as decisive. The court of appeals in that case decided, that the fifth section was made as well for creditors as debtors. That the second section was intended to apply to contracts where no particular circumstances intervene; but where other circumstances do intervene, which would render the application of the rule unjust, whether to the creditor or the debtor, the court under the fifth section have a right to award such judgment as to them shall appear just and equitable.

The next question, then, will be whether the circumstances of this case, render the application of the scale unjust. The annual rent, when reduced by the scale is only £1. 3s. 7½d. This cannot be a just rule, when lots of equal value rented, before the existence of paper money, for ten times, and after its abolition, at thirty times that sum in gold and silver. If, then, the application of that rule is unjust, what rule can this court adopt more just and equitable? It is, in general, just and equitable that contracts fairly made, should be specifically executed, where a specific execution is possible, and will not be attended with circumstances of peculiar hardship. The contract in this case is to pay the rents annually in current money. This is admitted to be money current at the time when the rents become due. In the years 1780 and 1781, the rents might have been paid in the then current money, that is, paper, or gold and silver, at the option of the tenant. Payment in paper money has now become impossible; but the legislature has declared what shall be an equivalent for those years. Let the rents of those years, therefore, be scaled. But after those years, the option of the tenant ceased. Gold and silver became the only current money. It appears to have been the intention of the parties to pay in the current money of the time when the rents should become payable. It has now become possible to execute the contract specifically, and it appears to me that justice and equity require that it should be done, by paying the rents in the money which has been current ever since the year 1782.

PRACTICE AT LAW—RULE-DAY — PLEA OF LIMITATIONS—UNDER WHAT CONDITIONS.

The court will not permit the statute of limitations to be pleaded to an action of trespass for mesne profits after the rule-day, but upon payment of all antecedent costs and a continuance of the cause.

Trespass for mesne profits.

Mr. Taylor, counsel and attorney for defendant, made affidavit that the plea of not guilty only had been entered in the office, without his knowledge or consent; that he did not attend at the rules when the plea was put in; and that he had been instructed by his client and always intended to plead the statute of limitations. It was admitted that the defendant had only appeared to the ejectment as guardian of Kirk, but by mistake he was not named as guardian.

Mr. Taylor, now offered to file the plea of limitations.

THE COURT permitted him to file it, on payment of all antecedent costs and a continuance or postponement at the option of the plaintiff.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1809.[2]

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—DISABILITY OF PLAINTIFF—JOINT ACTION.

The disability of one joint plaintiff does not take the case out of the statute of limitations.

Trespass quare clausum fregit for mesne profits. The defendant pleaded the statute of limitations. Replication, infancy of some, and coverture of others of the plaintiffs; but Marsteller and some of the plaintiffs were under no disability.

As to them, Mr. Taylor, for defendant, contended that the replication is no answer to the plea. All the plaintiffs sue in their own rights, and as joint tenants, or tenants in common. There is no difference between the case of joint tenants of goods and joint tenants of land. If the plaintiffs were joint merchants, and some of them out of the country and others in, the action must have been brought within five years. Perry v. Jackson, 4 Term R. 516. The promise of one joint defendant takes the case out of the statute as to all. It is not necessary that the infants and femes covert should join in the action. They might be summoned and severed.

[2] [Affirmed in 7 Cranch (11 U. S.) 156.]

C. Simms, on the same side. This is trespass for mesne profits. Those plaintiffs who were competent to sue cannot avail themselves of the disabilities of the others. Nor can those who by themselves would be under the disability, claim an exemption from the statute, if they join with those who were able to sue. It is not necessary that the wives should be made parties, the husbands were competent to sue alone for a trespass.

E. J. Lee, contrâ. It appears by the whole declaration that the husbands sue in right of their wives. The tracing of the title up to Richard Arrell shows it. It is not averred that they sue in their own right. The husbands are parties only pro formâ. The replication goes to all the parties really interested. The wives would be entitled to the action if their husbands should die. Whereever the husband sues in right of his wife she must be joined.

Mr. Simms, in reply. The right of action is in the husband alone, it is for a trespass upon his possession. In the case of a bond given to a feme while sole, the right of action is in the wife.

THE COURT were of opinion that the replication of coverture as to some of the plaintiffs, and of infancy as to others, is not a good replication to a plea of the statute of limitations.

Where adults and infants have a joint right of action for trespass, the incapacity of the infants shall not avail the adults so as to avoid the statute of limitations.

APPEAL — AMENDMENT PENDING — CLERICAL OR JUDICIAL ERRORS.

1. While the cause is depending in the supreme court of the United States, the circuit court will not permit the declaration, which was substantially defective, to be amended.

2. After a writ of error returned, the court below can only permit clerical or judicial errors in the process or pleadings, to be amended.

Motion by E. J. Lee, for plaintiff, to amend the declaration, by inserting the time of the death of Hunter, the cause being now pending in the supreme court. Mr. Lee cited 3 Mod. 113; 1 Tidd, Prac. 662; 8 Coke, 162; 3 Term R. 349; Id. 749; Doug. 114; Cowp. 841; 1 Strange, 136; [Burrows v. Heysham] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 134; [Fury v. Stone] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 184; 1 H. Bl. 643; 2 Johns. 184; 1 Stat. 73.

C. Sims, contrà. The amendment prayed is the insertion of a fact, (after judgment on the demurrer and a writ of error thereon,) which would defeat the demurrer. All the cases cited are of amendments of errors in the process or proceedings, by the clerk or of the courts; such as omissions in rendering the judgment upon a verdict, &c. There must be something to amend by. There is no instance of an amendment of a defective declaration, or plea, after error. The parties must be bound by their own pleadings. This is not an act of the court or of the clerk.

E. J. Lee, in reply. This is not assigned as a special cause of demurrer. It is a general demurrer. The case in Strange is the act of the party; so in the case where the letter of attorney was amended.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) refused the amendment: it being a case where matter of substance is omitted in the declaration; not an error in process, or a clerical or judicial error.

DEPOSITION—REDUCING TO WRITING.

A deposition taken under the 30th section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 88] must be reduced to writing by the magistrate or witness, and no other person is competent to perform that duty.

[This was a suit by Charles A. Marstin against Bracy McRea, as administrator of John D. Bracy, deceased.]

J. M. Curran, for plaintiff.

A. Fowler, for defendant.

Before RINGO, District Judge.

The court suppressed depositions taken on the part of the plaintiff under the 30th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 88), because the judge taking the same certified that the testimony of the witnesses taken by him, "was reduced to writing under my direction." It was held, that the act of congress must be strictly complied with, and, as according to the express requisitions of that act, the deposition of a witness shall be reduced to writing "only by the magistrate taking the deposition or by the deponent in his presence;" no other person was legally competent to perform that duty, and that the magistrate could not depute any one to perform it; that the act itself excluded the idea that any others than those named could perform it, and so it was a fatal defect. Deposition suppressed.

BANKRUPTCY—MERCHANT OR TRADESMAN—SPECULATING IN STOCKS—SPECIFICATION.

1. A man who speculates in stocks, buying and selling them through brokers, is not a merchant or tradesman, within the meaning of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], and may receive a discharge, though he has kept no books of account.

2. A specification of opposition to the discharge of a bankrupt, alleging that the bankrupt has destroyed, mutilated and falsified his documents and papers showing his business and financial transactions, but not averring that the acts were done with intent to defraud his creditors, is defective.

[Cited in Re Condict, Case No. 3,094.]

[In the matter of William H. Marston, a bankrupt.]

Chambers, Pomeroy & Boughton and Brown & Estes, for creditors.

Torrance & Pitkin, for bankrupt.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The first specification alleges, that the bankrupt, since the 2d day of March, 1867, has destroyed, mutilated and falsified his documents, papers and writings showing and explaining his business and financial transactions. This specification is defective in not averring the act to have been done with intent to defraud his creditors.

All the other specifications, except the third, are too vague and general in their allegations to be triable. The third specification alleges, that the bankrupt, "being a merchant or tradesman," has not, since the passage of the bankruptcy act, kept proper books of account, or any books of account whatever. Assuming that it is sufficient, in the specification, to speak of the bankrupt as a "merchant or tradesman," in the alternative, the question presented for determination is, whether he was a merchant or a tradesman, within the meaning of the provision in section 29 of the act, which directs that no discharge shall be granted to the bankrupt, "if, being a merchant or tradesman, he has not, subsequently to the passage of this act, kept proper books of account." It is admitted that, after the passage of the act, he kept no books of account. Was he, after the passage of the act, a merchant or a tradesman? The only business he was engaged in was what is called speculating in stocks, that is, buying and selling them, with a view to his own profit, to be made by the excess of the selling price over the buying price. He kept no office, did not act as a commission broker for others in buying and selling stocks, and his buying and selling was done through brokers, who purchased in their own names but for his account, and paid for the stocks with their own funds, he being their debtor for the amounts paid. Of the transactions made through these brokers he himself kept no accounts. Although, according to the lexicons, one who is engaged in the business of buying and selling for gain may be called a merchant, and also a tradesman, yet I do not think it would ever occur to any one to speak of a person carrying on the business which the bankrupt carried on in the way in which he carried it on, as a merchant or as a tradesman, nor do I think that those words, as used in the 29th section, embrace such a person. The fact that the bankrupt was engaged in no other business, cannot have the effect to make him a merchant or a tradesman, because he carried on the business he did carry on in the way in which he carried it on. A clergyman, or a physician or a lawyer might carry on the same business in the same way, in addition to his regular professional business, and no one would call him, in consequence, a merchant or a tradesman. If not, the bankrupt cannot be so called. A discharge is granted.

BANKRUPTCY—GENERAL ASSIGNMENT—FRAUD ON CREDITORS—INJUNCTION—ATTACHMENT FOR CONTEMPT.

1. Where a general assignee for the benefit of creditors had been enjoined from disposing of the property of the bankrupt, and after service of the injunction had made a sale of the assigned property, a motion for an attachment for contempt was denied: (1) Because, under the case of Langley v. Perry [Case No. 8,067], general assignment for the benefit of creditors is held in this circuit, not to be necessarily in fraud of the bankrupt act [of 1867; 14 Stat. 517]. (2) Because the district court had no power to determine the validity of the assignee's title by summary proceedings.

[Cited in Ex parte Hollis, 59 Cal. 415.]

2. The fact that a bankrupt is adjudicated upon a petition charging him with making a fraudulent conveyance, does not estop his grantee from claiming that as to him the conveyance is valid.

3. An assignment for the benefit of creditors is not fraudulent, because it states the assignor's desire to distribute his estate "without the sacrifice of property incidental to judicial and official sales, and without the expenses attendant upon winding up an estate in bankruptcy."

Motion for attachment for contempt. [Charles J.] Marter was duly adjudicated a bankrupt on the 3d day of May, and a writ of injunction was issued, prohibiting him and one Moses Beckel from encumbering, disposing of, or in any manner interfering with the property of said bankrupt or any part thereof. Petitioning creditors now come in and move for an attachment for contempt against Beckel, upon affidavit that Marter had made a general assignment to Beckel prior to the adjudication, and that Beckel, since the service of the injunction upon him, had sold the goods assigned to one Lichtenberg; that Lichtenberg had sold them to the wife of the bankrupt, and that the bankrupt, who was then acting as clerk for his wife, was the real owner of the goods. A further affidavit is filed, showing that the wife of the bankrupt executed to Lichtenberg a chattel mortgage on the goods for four hundred and twenty dollars. The counter-affidavit of Beckel does not set forth a different state of facts, but states that the sale to Lichtenberg was made for cash, after public notice of the sale; that it was made in strict accordance with the trusts of the assignment; that before the sale he was advised and believed that the sale was no violation of the injunction, and that it was made with the advice and consent of a majority of the creditors of the said bankrupt. He also shows, for additional cause, that, after the commencement of the proceedings in this case, he held such property adversely to such proceedings, and claimed, and now claims, title thereto, as against any assignee which may be appointed in this case; but that, since the commencement of these proceedings, in obedience to the injunction, he has carefully desisted and refrained from any interference with any of the property of the said bankrupt, not covered by the assignment.

Alfred Russell, for the motion.

Don M. Dickinson, for respondent Beckel.

BROWN, District Judge. It is claimed by the counsel for the petitioning creditors that, admitting the assignment to be valid at common law, yet as it was a general assignment in trust for creditors, it is, within the meaning of the bankrupt act, a conveyance with intent to injure, delay, and defraud creditors, or at least to defeat the operation of the act, and is therefore void as against proceedings in bankruptcy. A large number of authorities are cited in support of this proposition. In re Smith [Case No. 12,974]; Ex parte Burt [Id. 2,210]; Spicer v. Ward [Id. 13,241]; Grow v. Ballard [Id. 5,848]; In re Randall [Id. 11,551]; In re Goldschmidt [Id. 5,520].

A different view, however, was taken by Judge Hall in Re Wells [Case No. 17,387], and by Judge Treat, of the Eastern district of Missouri, in Re Kintzing [Id. 7,833]. Whatever may be my own views with regard to this question, I feel compelled to follow the decision of Mr. Justice Swayne in the case of Langley v. Perry [Id. 8,067], in which he held, reversing the decision of the district court for the Southern district of Ohio, that where a debtor makes an assignment of his property for the benefit of all his creditors, with intent to secure an equal distribution of all the debtor's property among his creditors, it is not necessarily a conveyance of the property with intent to defeat or delay the operation of the bankrupt act. This opinion was afterwards reviewed and affirmed by him in the case of Farrin v. Crawford [Id. 4,686]; and I must hold it to be the law of this court until reversed by the supreme court, or by the learned justice himself.

The fact that Marter was duly adjudicated a bankrupt upon a petition charging him with making this assignment with intent to defraud, does not preclude Beckel from disputing that fact. The adjudication works an estoppel as to Marter, or other persons not parties, only so far as it fixes the status of the bankrupt. Indeed the conveyance may be an act of bankruptcy, under section 5021, and yet valid as to the grantee, under sections 5128 and 5129. In re Williams [Case No. 17,703]; In re Drummond [Id. 4,093]; In re Schick [Id. 12,455]; In re Dibblee [Id. 3,884]; In re Goodfellow [Id. 5,536]; In re Dunkle [Id. 4,160]; In re Hunt [Id. 6,881]; In re Beck [Id. 1,205].

Although there are certain suspicious circumstances set forth in the affidavit in support of this motion, I see no intent upon the face of the assignment to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. It is true the assignor states his desire to distribute his estate "without the sacrifice of property incidental to judicial and official sales, and without the expenses attendant upon winding up an estate in bankruptcy;" but he precedes this by saying: "It is expressly intended by this instrument to secure an equal distribution of the assets of the said party of the first part among all his creditors, and in no manner or way impede or delay the operation of the bankrupt act now in force, but give to the creditors the same benefits which might be derived under said act, in the true spirit of said act."

It being established, by the opinion above cited, that a general assignment is not necessarily in fraud of the bankrupt act, I see nothing in these words to indicate that this assignment was fraudulent; on the whole his desire to save a sacrifice of his property is rather praiseworthy than otherwise.

But, again, a still more serious question arises as to the power of this court to enforce a claim of this character by summary proceeding. If the assignment was valid it transferred the title of the property to Beckel, and his sale of it was no violation of an injunction restraining him from disposing of the bankrupt's property. It is only upon the theory that the assignment is void as against creditors, and that the property still belongs to the bankrupt, that Beckel has been guilty of contempt. We are asked then to determine, summarily, upon petition and affidavits, that this assignment was void and passed no title to the property. The right of the assignee in bankruptcy to the property or its proceeds, turns entirely upon the validity of this assignment, which, as we have already said, is valid upon its face. So far as this question is concerned, the case stands precisely as if an assignee had been appointed, and he had petitioned that Beckel should pay the proceeds of the property to him, or should turn over the property itself, in case he had not sold it. Clearly Beckel holds adversely to the proceedings in bankruptcy, and to any title which the assignee hereinafter to be appointed may take.

Whatever doubt may have existed in the minds of the profession in the early days of the bankrupt law, with respect to the power of the district court to proceed summarily against persons claiming titles to property adverse to that of the assignee, I regard it as settled by the supreme court, in the case of Smith v. Mason, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 419, that such proceedings cannot be taken except by a suit at law or in equity, as provided by section 4979 of the Revised Statutes. In this case the bankrupt had placed in the hands of an attorney, for collection, certain claims against the government, upon which he had collected a large amount of money. Prior to his bankruptcy, the firm of which the bankrupt was a member had made an assignment of the claim to Biddle & Co., as collateral security. Biddle & Co. also assigned their interest in the claim to one Smith as collateral security for their indebtedness to him. The assignee filed his petition summarily, setting forth that these several debts to Biddle and Smith had been paid, and prayed that the attorney might be restrained from paying out the money, and that he might be required to give bond for its safe keeping and its production in court when ordered. Subsequently he filed another petition against Smith, who, he alleged, claimed an interest in the fund, and prayed that he might be required to show cause why the fund should not be paid to him. "Beyond all doubt, therefore, the case is one where the appellant claimed absolute title to and dominion over the matter in controversy between him and the assignee of the bankrupt's estate." The court was of the opinion that such cases could not be commenced by a petition for a rule to show cause as in this case, nor be determined in a summary way by the district court sitting in bankruptcy, without due process of law. If the assignee in bankruptcy would divest him of the possession and control of the fund he must do it by a suit at law or in equity, as provided in the third clause of the 2d section. "Strangers to the proceedings in bankruptcy, not served with process, who have not voluntarily appeared and become parties to such a litigation, cannot be compelled to come into court under a petition for a rule to show cause."

The question again came before the court, in the case of Marshall v. Knox, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 551. In this case certain property of the bankrupt had been distrained for rent under the laws of Louisiana, and was in the hands of the sheriff at the time of the adjudication. The assignee obtained from the court a rule upon the lessor and the sheriff, to show cause why they should not deliver up the property to the assignees, alleging that various creditors of the bankrupt claimed a privilege on the property and that it was necessary for the proper adjustment of all liens that the possession should be surrendered to the assignee. The landlord claimed the right thus to hold possession of the property until his claim for rent was satisfied. This claim was adverse to that of the assignee. The court held that this case did not substantially differ from that of Smith v. Mason [supra], and that the district court proceeded without jurisdiction in compelling the lessor and the sheriff to deliver up possession of the goods in question to the assignee.

Prior to these decisions there had been a great conflict of authority upon this point. The rule here laid down had been substantially adopted in Irving v. Hughes [Case No. 7,076]; In re Kerosene Oil Co. [Id. 7,726]; In re Bonesteel [Id. 1,627]; Barstow v. Peckham [Id. 1,064]; Knight v. Cheney [Id. 7,883]; Rogers v. Windsor [Id. 12,023]; In re Ballou [Id. 818].

I am aware that a contrary view was taken by Mr. Justice Swayne in Bill v. Beckwith [Case No. 1,406], followed by the late judge of this district in Norris' Case [Id. 10,304]; but I think these cases must be regarded as overruled by the supreme court in the two cases above mentioned.

In Creditors v. Cozzens [Case No. 3,378], an attachment for contempt in disobeying an injunction was refused in a case very similar to the one at bar, on the ground that a separate petition must be filed so that the proceedings upon the injunction need not be complicated with those praying the adjudication of bankruptcy.

The rule adopted in this and the other cases above cited is but the enunciation of a general principle applicable to equity proceedings, that an injunction will not be granted against persons not parties to the suit (Fellows v. Fellows, 4 Johns. Ch. 25; Iveson v. Harris, 7 Ves. 251; Stevens v. Barringer, 13 Wend. 639), unless they are mere agents of the defendant.

I think the facts set forth in the affidavits in this case throw a strong suspicion upon the good faith of the assignment, but the only remedy is by a plenary action at law or in equity against Beckel for the value or the proceeds of the property. It results, therefore, that the motion must be denied.

Case No. 9,144.

The MARTHA.

District Court, S. D. New York. Sept., 1830.

SEAMEN—WAGES—DESERTION—FORFEITURE—VOYAGE ENDED—DISCHARGE OF CARGO—RIGHT OF ACTION NOT PERFECTED—COSTS—REHEARING.

1. The act of congress of July 20th, 1790, (1 Stat. 131,) makes desertion, carrying with it a forfeiture of wages, a statutory offence, and defines the evidence by which it is to be established.

[Cited in The Elizabeth Frith, Case No. 4,361; Granon v. Hartshorne, Id. 5,689; The Union, Id. 14,347. Cited in note to Gifford v. Kollock, Id. 5,409. Cited in The John Martin, Id. 7,357; Murray v. The F. B. Nimick, 2 Fed. 88; Welcome v. The Yosemite, 18 Fed. 383.]

2. There can be no desertion after the voyage is ended. The voyage is ended when the vessel is safely moored at her last port of discharge.

[Cited in The Elizabeth Frith, Case No. 4,361; Granon v. Hartshorne, Id. 5,689.]

3. Fifteen days will be taken to be a reasonable time for a vessel to unload in ordinary cases, and where, for wages due on the delivery of the cargo, a vessel was arrested on the fourteenth day after she was moored in her port of discharge, the suit was dismissed as prematurely brought.

[Cited in Granon v. Hartshorne, Case No. 5,689; The David Faust, Id. 3,595.]

4. There is no distinction between what is necessary to constitute the delivery of a cargo where it is owned by a freighter, and where both ship and cargo belong to the same person.

5. The mere offer of a master to pay a seaman's wages is not necessarily an admission that the wages are due and payable.

6. A libel brought before the right of action is perfected, must be dismissed, if duly excepted to on that ground, though such right becomes perfected during the progress of the suit. The case of Thompson v. The Philadelphia [Case No. 13,973] examined.

[Cited in Eight Hundred and Forty-One Tons of Iron Ore, 15 Fed. 618; Henderson v. Three Hundred Tons of Iron Ore, 38 Fed. 40.]

7. Courts of admiralty will dispose of the question of costs according to the general equities of the case.

[Cited in Lubker v. The A. H. Quimby, Case No. 8,586; Shaw v. Thompson, Id. 12,726.]

8. Where a dilatory plea was joined with a defence upon the merits, and the libel was dismissed upon the former, though it would have been sustained upon the latter, it was dismissed without costs.

9. The court will not allow its recollections or impressions of verbal consents and understandings between counsel, not entered in its minutes, to interfere with or control the rights of parties.

10. A court of admiralty will not, except with the free consent of all the parties to be affected, grant a rehearing, or modify its definitive decree, after the term in which the decree is rendered. If the court has the power to do so, such a practice has not been adopted.

11. A decree made on a rehearing without such consent, modifying a final decree made at a previous term, was held to be a nullity.

[Cited in The Illinois, Case No. 7,003.]

12. Semble, that a consent to a rehearing by the parties to a suit, will not affect the rights of a surety in a stipulation for costs, who has been discharged by a previous final decree.

[Cited in Lubker v. The A. H. Quimby, Case No. 8,586.]

The libellant shipped as seaman on board the ship Martha, at New Orleans, for a voyage to Laguyra, thence to one or more ports in Europe, and back to a port of discharge in the United States. One of the printed stipulations in the articles signed by him was as follows: "And it is further agreed that no officer or seaman belonging to the said vessel shall demand or be entitled to his wages, or any part thereof, until the arrival of the said vessel at her last above-mentioned port of discharge, and her cargo delivered." The vessel arrived at New-York on the 21st of February, and was moored on the 22d. On that day the libellant left the ship without permission, and did not return to his duty, and on the same day his absence was entered by the mate in the log. The cargo was not entirely discharged until the 12th of March. On the 5th of March the libel in this action was filed in rem for the recovery of wages, and on the 8th the monition was issued and the vessel was arrested. The defence was, that the wages were forfeited by the desertion of the seaman, or, if not forfeited, that the right of action for them had not accrued at the time the suit was instituted.

Erastus C. Benedict, for libellant.
John Anthon, for claimant.

BETTS, District Judge. The payment of wages to the libellant is resisted, upon the ground that he deserted the vessel, and thereby forfeited his wages; and this conduct on his part is said to have worked a forfeiture, both under the penalties of the law maritime and under the provisions of the act of congress of July 20th, 1790. 1 Stat. 131.

I have several times ruled that the desertion of seamen from the merchant's service, so as necessarily to work a forfeiture of wages, has now become a statutory offense, and must be established in the mode designated by the act of congress. The inquiry, therefore, will not be, whether the particular act of malfeasance charged upon the libellant constituted an offence under the maritime law, which carries with it, as its appropriate punishment, a deprivation or abstraction of wages, but whether it comes within the provision of the statute, so that the judgment of forfeiture is the only one the court can pronounce.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and Francis Howland, Esq.]

It is a well-understood rule in the construction of statutory law, that when new conditions or requirements are imposed in respect to existing offences, so that those acts constitute the offience which would not have constituted it before, the statute necessarily becomes the exclusive rule, and abrogates or supplants the preceding one. The thing prohibited is no longer an offence, except as it is brought within the terms of the act. Castle's Case, Cro. Jac. 644; Reg. v. Wigg, 2 Salk. 460; Rex v. Robinson, 2 Burrows, 799. If this be so with regard to offences at common law, where the familiarity and notoriety of the common law rule would more safely admit statutory regulations to be considered as subsidiary, it should apply with inflexible strictness to maritime cases, where the customary law is to be sought for in obscure and remote usages, practised not by our own people, but by foreigners, and in periods of comparative ignorance and barbarism.

When congress assumed to legislate in respect to the offence of desertion by mariners, and its consequences to them, it can hardly be supposed that they designed merely to introduce another particular within the limits and penalties of that offence. What the exigencies of the case demanded of the legislature was a clear and precise designation of the duties and responsibilities of seamen in the merchant's service, and especially those most prominent ones, their obligation to the vessel, and their liability to the loss of wages for the breach of it. The uncertainty of the maritime law, as to what constituted a desertion, was alike vexatious and injurious to owners and seamen. Was a mere leaving of the ship without permission a desertion? or, if not, how was the animus revertendi to be ascertained? What was the rule which would protect the seamen from the resentment of an exacting master, and the ship from a heedless or wrongful abandonment by the crew? The question was never settled merely by lapse of time, and accordingly controversies were incessant whether the master might regard the shortest unjustifiable absence as a desertion, or the men purge the longest by a lagging and reluctant return. The statute meets this difficulty. It looks to the fact of absence without leave. and marks that as the characteristic of desertion. With whatever purpose of mind to return the seaman may have withdrawn himself, still his going from the ship without leave supersedes all inquiry into the quo animo. The law, however, makes the reasonable allowance of forty-eight hours within which the sailor may come back, and be only subject to the loss of three days' wages for his misfeasance. And, furthermore, most effectually to guard the seaman from the resentment of the master, excited by any subsequent occurrences, it takes from the latter the power to revive such act of misconduct, or to change that into a desertion which was not so regarded at the time, by requiring that the absence shall be entered on the log-book on the day it occurs, and that the entry shall state the absence to be without leave. This was a most provident regulation. One-half of the attempts of masters to bar seamen of the recovery of their wages, which have passed under the observation of this court, are founded not directly upon the act of misconduct alleged, but are excited by some after occurrence, as a prosecution for wages or for assault and battery, or by some irritation of personal feelings on the part of the master or his officers, under the influence of which the master seeks to give to all preceding misconduct of his men the most odious colorings, and to demand a forfeiture of wages for alleged desertions not denounced as such at the time they occurred. The courts, therefore, for the protection of seamen, exact from the master the most rigid compliance with the requisitions of the act in this behalf. Malone v. Bell [Case No. 8,994]; Jones v. The Phoenix [Id. 7,489]; Herron v. The Peggy [Id. 6,427]; The Phoebe v. Dignum [Id. 11,110]. In my opinion, the statute has specified and defined the desertion by seamen which necessarily incurs a forfeiture of wages, and no desertion having that effect can be established against seamen, except conformably to the statutory directions. In this country, the point is governed by positive law, and all codes or usages of other nations, which are conflicting or inconsistent with the statute, are to be disregarded. The provisions of the statute are broad enough to meet every case, and I cannot suppose that congress meant to legislate respecting heedless and frequently inadvertent absences, and to convert these into desertions, and, at the same time, leave the greater offence of a wilful abandonment of the ship, to the uncertain rules and dogmas of the maritime law as previously administered, that is, to be punished by a simple mulct or abstraction of wages, at the discretion of the court.

The inquiry, therefore, is, whether the act now in proof is such a desertion, and whether it is established by such proof as the statute directs. It must be borne in mind, that it was after the full arrival of the vessel at her port of discharge in the United States that the seaman left her. She reached this as her last port of discharge, from a circuitous voyage, on the 21st of February, and was safely moored on the day following. This, in nautical acceptation, was ending the voyage. The voyage denotes the transit to be performed by the seaman, and it is in this sense that the term is used in the law maritime. Emerig. Cont. de la Grosse, c. 8, § 1; Frontine v. Frost, 3 Bos. & P. 302; The Baltic Merchant, 1 Edw. Adm. 86. The seaman is usually bound by his articles to continue with the vessel and unlade her, and perhaps his obligation to perform that service might, under the maritime law, be regarded as incident to his hiring. The Baltic Merchant, 1 Edw.

Adm. 91. Yet, in so doing, he is considered as fulfilling a specific engagement of service, direct or implied, and not as continuing the voyage. The vessel being securely moored at her port of destination, the duties of mariners, as such, are fulfilled, and any further acts of theirs become those of stevedores or laborers, and the seamen are bound to perform them only by force of special stipulations in the shipping articles. Cons. del Mare, c. 74, No. 144. A neglect or omission of this duty may be appropriately punished by deductions from former earnings. The Baltic Merchant, 1 Edw. Adm. 92. And the earnings payable for the performance of one duty, may well be made chargeable for neglect to perform the other, because the agreement, though consisting of two parts, is entire in its object and effects. The act of congress is in harmony with this distinction between the termination of the voyage and the unlivery of the cargo, though it requires the two things to concur to entitle the seamen to sue for their wages. Act July 20, 1790, § 6 (1 Stat. 133).

In my judgment, the offence of desertion under the statute, which carries with it the absolute forfeiture of wages, can only be committed during the continuance of the voyage, and must accordingly take place anterior to the safe mooring of the vessel at her last port of delivery. As, then, in the present case, the seamen left the vessel after her voyage ended, their departure did not constitute the desertion contemplated by the act, which must be punished by forfeiture of wages, clothing, &c. I do not, therefore, consider it necessary to pass upon the sufficiency of the entry in the log in this instance, because, if sufficient, it has relation to a period of time after the voyage was ended in nautical acceptation, and when the offence could not be committed. This decision will not, however, exonerate seamen from proper responsibility for such offences. The articles themselves make adequate provision for such a case, and the principles of maritime law, which are not superseded by positive legislation, provide sufficient punishment for malfeasances of this character. It is competent for the court, in either aspect of the case, to decree, by way of abstraction of wages, a suitable compensation to the owner for the unfaithfulness or misconduct of the seamen; and I am persuaded it will in practice be found as efficacious, in holding seamen to fidelity in their engagements, to lessen the amount they receive at the end of the voyage, as to strip them and their families of all pay for services during the entire voyage, together with their savings laid up in clothing.

A further objection taken to the suit by the claimant is, that the right of action had not accrued when the suit was instituted. By a stipulation in the articles, the wages were not to be paid until the cargo was delivered. The delivery was not completed until several days after the action was commenced. But there need not in every case be an actual unlading of the cargo, to constitute the delivery contemplated by the agreement. If the consignee should refuse to accept the cargo, or unreasonably delay its discharge, the seaman cannot by such acts lose his rights, and would be considered as having complied with his stipulation by delaying his suit a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time for the unlivery of cargo is not made certain by any fixed rule of law. By the 52d article of the Laws of Wisbuy, from eight to fifteen days are allowed, according to the circumstances of the voyage. By the 21st article of the Laws of Oleron, the same period is allowed for a vessel to discharge. 1 Pet. Adm. App. End. The laws of the United States require every vessel under three hundred and fifty tons burden, to be discharged of her cargo within fifteen working days after her report in her port of discharge, and every vessel over three hundred and fifty tons, within twenty working days, and the vessel is to be reported within twenty-four hours after her arrival. Act March 2, 1799, §§ 30, 56 (1 Stat. 649, 669); Act March 3, 1821 (3 Stat. 640). Following the spirit of these statutes, the district court in Pennsylvania often allowed fifteen days, and sometimes more, to unlade the cargo, before the seaman's right to claim wages was perfected. Edwards v. The Susan [Case No. 4,299]; Thompson v. The Philadelphia [Id. 13,973]; Swift v. The Happy Return [Id. 13,697]. The voyage ends for the seaman when the vessel is moored. She is then, in judgment of law, in a condition to unlade at once. In our chief ports, it would rarely happen that twenty working days would be expended in unlading the largest ship. The statute has allowed time amply sufficient to cover any delay in obtaining permits from the custom-house, or in placing the vessel in a position to begin her actual discharge after her report is made, or in providing for other contingencies which may occasion loss of time. In Massachusetts, the rule seems to be general to allow the statutory period for discharging the vessel, without regard to the special circumstances of the case. Abb. Shipp. 456, note. There is convenience in this analogy, but I do not think a too implicit obedience should be paid to it, and I am disposed to follow the rule in the Pennsylvania district, allowing special circumstances to abridge or prolong the time of unlading, but adopting fifteen days as a fair average period. In this case, even if the action be considered as having been commenced by the issue of the monition, but fourteen days had elapsed, and two of those were Sundays. No special circumstances are in evidence, calling for an abridgment of the ordinary time. On the contrary, a proper degree of despatch is proved, and, considering the state of the weather, the vessel was unladen in a reasonable time. Since, then, sufficient time for the unlading of the cargo had not elapsed when the suit was instituted, and since, also, it was commenced before the time fixed by statute for the unlivery of the cargo had expired, it must be held to have been prematurely brought.

This objection of the claimant being well taken, and no motion to amend or rectify the proceedings having been made or granted, I cannot, in the present shape of the pleadings, enter into an adjustment of the amount of wages due the libellant, or fix what compensation, if any, he ought to make the owners for withdrawing his services from the vessel. The action in this form must be considered as dismissed or suspended. But the main defence, which rested on the charge of desertion, having been gone into by the claimant, and decided in favor of the libellant, and the libel being stayed upon a point of form, in respect to other particulars, and not on the merits litigated between the parties, I shall give the libellant leave to file a new libel, or supplementary allegations to the one before the court, and to offer further proofs in the cause to show that he had a full right of action when his suit was commenced; and the final decree in the cause upon the merits, and the disposition of costs, will be deferred until the reformed pleadings and new proofs come in. The practice authorized by this decision is intended to be carried at present no further than the necessity of the particular case; that is to say, the claimant having given the court cognizance of the cause by intervening and contesting the question of forfeiture, and that jurisdiction still continuing after the libellant's right to sue for wages has matured, the latter will be permitted now to frame his libel so as to meet the objection that the recovery of wages cannot be had in the present form of the pleadings.

The libellant, under the above permission, filed several additional articles, alleging: (1) That the claimant of the ship was sole owner of her cargo, and that, as matter of law, the arrival of the vessel was a delivery of her cargo, within the meaning of the contract; (2) That the cargo might, with ordinary diligence, have been unladen, and the vessel discharged, within ten days from her arrival; (3) That no provision was made on board the vessel, or elsewhere, by the master or owner, for the support of the libellant until his wages were payable; (4) That previous to the commencement of any proceedings for the recovery of wages, the master called on the libellant's proctors, and told them that the libellant's wages were ready for him. The libellant proved the facts set up in the first and fourth allegations, but failed to prove those set up in the second and third.

Edwin Burr and Erastus C. Benedict, for libellant.

Gerardus Clark, for claimant.

BETTS, District Judge. It is contended that the terms of the shipping agreement were fulfilled, as the cargo was in fact delivered before the suit was brought. It is supposed there is a distinction in respect to the delivery of a cargo where it is shipped by a freighter, and where both ship and cargo are owned by the same person. It is not denied, that in the former case there must be an actual unlading to constitute a delivery; while it is argued, that in the latter, when the ship returns to the port of the owner, the cargo comes into his possession in such manner as to amount to a delivery of it from the ship. I cannot perceive any legal ground for the distinction. The contract of the seaman has no regard to the legal delivery of the cargo, which constitutes a change of property in it. It is as much the property of the consignee, and delivered in point of law, when it is shipped at the port of departure, as when it is unladen at the port of discharge. Dawes v. Peck, 8 Term R. 330; Dutton v. Solomonson, 3 Bos. & P. 582. To construe this clause of the shipping contract to mean a delivery in law, would be to hold that it was satisfied the moment the cargo was laden on board. The delivery referred to in the contract denotes the unlading of the vessel, frequently called, in the maritime law, the unlivery of the cargo. The other provisions of the contract import this. The mariner is not to leave the vessel until she be discharged of her lading, nor to receive his wages until her arrival at the last port of discharge, and the cargo delivered. The delivery of the cargo is made a distinct thing from the arrival of the vessel, and that delivery is the discharging her of her lading. The shipping articles are intended to correspond in substance with the provisions of the statute in this respect, and the court will always endeavor, in interpreting the articles, to enforce that conformity. By the 6th section of the statute, (Act July 20, 1790, 1 Stat. 133,) the seaman becomes entitled to his wages "as soon as the voyage is ended and the cargo or ballast be fully discharged at the last port of delivery." It is no less important to the shipowner, when he is his own freighter, to have an opportunity to ascertain the condition of the cargo, and detect embezzlements, and charge them, if discovered, upon the crew, than when he is merely a carrier for others. It would also be usually not less desirable for him to have reasonable time to raise funds to meet the charges of the ship, when the cargo is his own, than when those funds are to be collected from freighters. In both points of view, it would be in consonance with the character of the service of seamen, that their wages should not be payable until the actual delivery of the cargo, or until a reasonable time for that purpose had elapsed, and a stipulation on their part to that effect would be appropriate to their character and obligatory upon them.

It is further contended, on behalf of the libellant, that the offer of the master to pay the wages is evidence that he recognised and admitted the libellant's discharge, and that he was entitled to demand them. But the mere offer of the master to pay the wages, in the way in which it was made in this instance, cannot properly be understood as an admission of any legal liability on his part. It was stated on the argument, (and the fact would be implied under the proof,) that the libellant's proctors had made application to the master, and demanded payment of these wages. He knew that a litigation must ensue, unless the claim was satisfied, and his declaration, under these circumstances, that if the libellant would call at a designated place, his wages were ready for him, ought not to be construed into an admission that wages were due at all, much less that they were due and payable because the libellant had fulfilled his engagement and was discharged from the ship. There was a dispute, and a heated one, respecting the libellant's claim to wages. Under these circumstances, it would be a most strained and harsh interpretation of the language of the master, to consider it as having admitted the absolute right of the libellant. Admitting the declaration of the master to have been an offer to pay, it was a qualified, or conditional one; and I do not think it imported any thing more than that the master would rather pay the sum demanded, at a place convenient to him, than litigate the question with the sailor. Such concessions and admissions are never received as waiving any legal defence of the party. The courts encourage attempts at compromise and settlement, and will not permit any act done or language used on such occasions to work a prejudice to the party making the effort. 2 Starkie, Ev. 38, and note g. The nisi prius case of White v. Mattison, 2 Starkie, 325, before Lord Ellenborough, if it forms an exception to this general rule, is distinguishable from the present case; for there the defendant had called up the whole ship's crew to pay them off, and had tendered the plaintiff a specific sum, and the court held, that the seaman might recover that sum, although the period limited by the shipping articles had not expired. There was a plain, unqualified admission of a debt to a certain amount, accompanied by an offer to pay that particular part, and the recovery was limited to the sum so admitted to be due, and did not cover the whole of the plaintiff's demand. I do not think that the circumstance proved in the present case, establishes the libellant's right to sue, or in any way implies that the master recognised that the libellant had been discharged from the ship, or otherwise exonerated from the restriction as to the time when he would be entitled to wages; nor do I regard it as a waiver of the advantage secured to the master by the contract.

A point of practice respecting the authority of the court over the proceedings, as they now stand, presents itself at this stage of the cause. It was not adverted to on the argument, and, in deciding it now, for the purpose of disposing of this cause, I do not intend to preclude the further consideration of the point, should it be presented in another case. It is, whether the libel ought to be absolutely dismissed, or whether the suit may be continued as properly in prosecution since the expiration of the fifteen days.

The matter of defence now in question is no extinguishment of the libellant's claim. A forfeiture of wages has not been incurred, and no payment is established. The claimant, therefore, upon the proofs, stands justly indebted to the libellant for his services as a mariner on board the vessel. If the latter cannot recover his demand in the present action, it will be only for the reason that the claim was not suable when the action was instituted. Courts of admiralty deal liberally with suitors in matters of practice. They give the most favorable interpretation to pleadings, in order, if possible, to support them, and, when a libel is found defective or inapt, instead of dismissing it for such cause, they will even enjoin the promovent to exhibit another libel, clear and properly articled, in order that the case may be determined according to right and justice. 1 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law (2d Ed.) 462; The Adeline, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 245, 284. This practice should probably be considered as having relation to the form of the libel, and as coming under the principle of amendments, which are freely allowed in those courts. Consett, Ecc. Prax. pt. 3, c. 1, § 1, art. 2, and Id. § 2, art. 2; The Caroline v. U. S., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 496; The Anne v. U. S., Id. 570; The Divina Pastora, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 52; The Mary Ann, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 380; The Marianna Flora, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 1, 38. Judge Peters has given a wider application to this power of a court of admiralty over its proceedings, than usually obtains. In Thompson v. The Philadelphia [Case No. 13,973], he says: "In this case, although the ship had ended her voyage more than fifteen days, yet, it having been alleged, and not denied, that due diligence had been used, but the vessel could not be unloaded, I give further time for payment." The report of that case indicates a suit in ordinary progress, and the language of the judge imports that he will stay the cause until the time shall arrive when it ought to have been commenced, and will then proceed in it as if the cause of action had been mature when the suit was instituted. I am not prepared to carry the discretionary authority of the court to that extent. It goes far beyond all the doctrines respecting the mere correcting of defects occurring in the frame of pleadings or in the order of proceedings. It assumes that a party brought into court without right on the part of the promovent, may still be detained there until an adequate right is acquired, or, if one is already inchoate, until it ripens for enforcement. When the objection is presented distinctly and in proper order, I apprehend that every court must dispose of the controversy before it according to the rights of the respective parties as they stood when the suit was instituted. This is so at law and in chancery, and it is not perceived that any clear principle, recognised in the Civil Code, varies the rule in tribunals which have adopted that law.

In causes of civil and admiralty jurisdiction, every matter of exception which goes only to delay the suit, must be urged previous to contestation of suit, (Consett, Ecc. Prax. pt. 3, c. 1, § 2, and Id. c. 2; Cockb. Ecc. Prax. c. 6, §§ 1–7; Clerke, Ecc. Prax. tits. 31, 32,) and should be singly disposed of before contestatio litis, or before bringing the substantive parts of the suit ad judicium (2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, Ed. 1799, 104, 185; Pothier, Traité de la Proc. Civ. pt. 1, c. 2, § 2, art. 1). The matters of exception, however, which bar recovery, may, by the French practice, be urged after contestation of suit. Id. art. 2. So they may be, also, in ecclesiastical and admiralty causes at this day, though Browne questions whether such a practice was allowable in the ancient Roman law. 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law (Ed. 1799) 27, note. The result of these doctrines seems to be this, that in all the courts, if a party goes to trial upon the merits, he will not be permitted, after judgment, to avoid the recovery, by bringing forward an exception that no cause of action existed when the suit was instituted; but that that defence is open to him down to the time of trial, and that, if it is established, the consequence will be to turn the prosecutor out of court. The decision of Judge Peters will, therefore, stand an isolated one upon this branch of procedure, unless it is to be understood as having been given before answer filed, or on a preparatory examination before the judge, out of court, to ascertain whether admiralty process should be allowed. In the latter case, there may be a propriety in the judge's deferring the award of process, or, as it is put in the case reported, giving further time for payment. I should be inclined to understand that decision as made in an initiatory proceeding, rather than in an adjudication between parties litigating in court upon pleadings properly interposed. It does not appear to me to be consonant to the nature of actions in full prosecution, to permit them to be stayed until the plaintiff possesses himself of a right to what he demands; nor to allow him to go to judgment, against the objections of the opposite party, upon rights which have accrued during the progress of the cause and after a defence has been put in. The amendment or privilege allowed the libellant by the former order of the court in respect to his libel, had relation to the manner of pleading and proving his demand, to bring it into a condition to be enforced. It did not authorize him to go on in this suit upon a right which was not in existence when it was brought. I shall, therefore, not decree for these wages, although they have now become due, and although the claimant is liable to pay them. The libellant should not have arrested the vessel until his right of action was perfected; and the objection that she was not liable to arrest, having been duly taken and maintained by the claimant, must prevail. It is not intended to be decided that the same rule will necessarily apply, when the claimant gives his stipulation and makes his answer after the right of action has been perfected.

A further question remains, namely, whether costs shall be allowed or not. If the claimant had pleaded, in a formal manner, a dilatory plea that the suit was prematurely brought, he would undoubtedly be entitled to a decree for costs. But when, instead of pleading that plea by itself, he connects it with other matters of defence which go to the whole merits of the action, and requires full proof to be produced, it becomes questionable whether he is entitled to costs. In the main defence upon which he relied he has failed, and he prevails only upon an exception in the nature of a plea in abatement. Moreover, though the libellant has failed to prove his supplemental allegation, that the vessel might with ordinary diligence have been discharged in ten days, yet he has offered some evidence upon that point, which shows that there was probable cause for his supposing that his right was perfected, depending, as it did, upon the question of a reasonable time for unlading. Courts of equity dispose of the question of costs according to the justice of the case, in the sound discretion of the court; Nicoll v. Trustees of Town of Huntington, 1 Johns. Ch. 166; and courts of admiralty follow the same rule. I shall, therefore, in view of the general equities of the case, dismiss the libel without costs.

After a decree was entered in accordance with the foregoing decision, and in the following term, the counsel for the claimant applied to the court for leave to re-argue the question of costs, and a manuscript decision of the circuit court was produced, overruling the doctrine of this court upon the question of desertion, and holding in effect, that absence from the vessel without leave, after the voyage was ended, but while the cargo was yet undischarged, was a desertion, carrying, as a consequence, the forfeiture of all wages then earned; whereupon, in obedience to that ruling, and after hearing counsel on both sides, it was decreed by this court that costs should be awarded to the claimant. On a subsequent day, a motion was made by the claimant for a summary decree, and for execution upon the stipulation of the surety for costs on the part of the libellant. This was resisted, upon the ground that the decree awarding costs to the claimant was against the libellant, and did not affect his surety.

The affidavit of the counsel for the claimant stated, that within a few days after the decree dismissing the libel without costs was rendered, he applied to the court for leave to re-argue the question of costs, and that the question was subsequently argued by the counsel on both sides, and a decree was entered dismissing the libel, with costs. The affidavit of the counsel for the libellant stated, that immediately after the first decree was rendered, he apprized the surety that he was no longer liable for costs upon his stipulation; that he, the counsel for the libellant, had no authority to waive the rights of the surety under that decree; that, in the subsequent argument upon the question of costs, he contemplated nothing but the interest of the libellant, and supposed that the object of the claimant was to recover costs against the libellant merely for the purpose of extinguishing the wages. The affidavit of the surety stated, that he had given no consent or authority to waive his advantages under the first decree. Upon the facts proved, it was contended for the libellant that the second decree was nugatory and void, or, if not void, that it only availed as against the libellant himself, and that such was the understanding at the time. The counsel for the claimant contended that the second decree was valid, and carried costs against the surety, and that the question of costs was re-argued with that understanding, and he appealed to the recollection of the court to sustain that view of the case.

BETTS, District Judge. The court constantly sees the mischiefs attending efforts to carry on litigated causes by mutual understandings between the counsel concerned in them. I have uniformly declined acting upon such arrangements, unless their result was put in writing, or stated upon the minutes of the court. Nor will I allow my own recollections or impressions as to particulars which have passed in the presence of the court, to interfere with or control rights that may ultimately be brought up for decision. I should certainly never have allowed the argument in this cause to proceed, unless I had supposed that the whole case was under the control of the court, and that the former decree stood suspended until a decision could be had upon the question of costs. Yet, there appears to have been no act of the court bringing the matter within its control, or assuming cognizance of it, other than hearing the counsel for both parties upon that question. The proposition now before the court is, whether a court of admiralty, after entering a definitive decree, can, of its own authority, re-hear the cause or modify the decree, at any time subsequent to the term in which the decree is rendered. Although the court proceeded, in this case, upon a supposed assent of the libellant, yet nothing appears apud acta establishing such assent, or concluding his rights. The proceeding in this case had all the character and effect of a re-hearing. The cause had been disposed of. No reservation of any question had been made, so as to render the decree in any respect interlocutory. A definitive decree, entered on the 26th of August, was changed by force of another decree applied for on the first Tuesday of September. The objection is now specifically taken, that it was incompetent for the court to vacate the preceding decree in that manner.

The course of procedure in the ecclesiastical and admiralty courts in England, does not furnish us with any satisfactory guide on this inquiry. The judge usually renders judgment there after summons to the party to be present to hear it. If he does not appear, there is a succession of decrees of contumacy, and then the decree passes as if by default. If he appears, he must eo instanti present his claims for an alteration of the decree, otherwise it becomes definitive. Consett, Ecc. Prax. pt. 3, c. 6, § 2; Clerke, Ecc. Prax. tits. 232, 234. In the French practice, which conforms very closely to the civil, the judgment becomes perfect as soon as it is pronounced, and the judge cannot correct it after the rising of the court, and after the register has entered the judgment upon the minutes as it was given. Pothier, Traité de la Proc. Civ., c. 5, art. 2. The only case recognised in the early practice of the ecclesiastical courts, in which the same court can revoke its sentence, is where, when the party is cited to show cause why sentence should not be executed, he alleges the nullity of the former decree; and this, whether the former decree was one made by another and a higher court, or by the same court. Cockb. Prax. c. 15, §§ 8, 9. Such, too, appears to be the modern practice. Sir John Nicholl doubts whether the court is competent to rescind a sentence against the wishes of the party obtaining it. And that doubt was strongly expressed in a case where a question of costs had been reserved, and where the application to open the previous decree was made on the day assigned for hearing that reserved question. Thomas v. Maud, 1 Addams, Ecc. 481. This principle seems to be incorporated into the practice of the admiralty courts. In a prize cause, Sir William Scott reserved his opinion upon the question whether he could revoke a previous decree in the cause, but under a pointed intimation that it was a proceeding wholly unknown to the court. The Vrouw Hermina, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 163.

The ordinary rules of practice in the supreme court deny a rehearing of a cause after the term in which judgment is pronounced. Hudson v. Guestier, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 1. And some of the cases imply a doubt whether, after a definitive judgment pronounced, the court can revoke or reconsider that judgment. See The Fortitudo, 2 Dods. 58, 70; Smith v. Jackson [Case No. 13,064]; Norton v. Rich [Id. 10,352]. The court of chancery allows a rehearing, upon sufficient reasons, at any time before decree enrolled, and it has been permitted at the distance of twenty-four years from the time the decree was rendered. Har. Prac. K. B. 341; Mills v. Banks, 3 P. Wms. 8, and note. But this practice has never been introduced into the courts of common law or of admiralty, though I am not aware of any defect of authority in this court to establish such a rule. The character of the suits usually prosecuted here, would, however, deter the court from adopting that practice, unless the great ends of justice were put in hazard by withholding it. Usually, it is of the last importance to suitors here, to have an immediate despatch of their business. Seafaring men are not in circumstances to conduct protracted and reiterated litigations upon their claims, and it is usually better for their interests to have prompt decisions, even though adverse to their demands. Experience, I believe, fully justifies the remark, that whether in the instance or the prize court, every delay and appeal is of serious detriment to the mariner's interest. The sum in dispute is usually small, and of immediate necessity to the suitor. It is for his interest, therefore, that the most speedy decision possible should be obtained, and that, when it is adverse to him, he should rather go immediately to his employment than linger over the contingencies of a reconsideration of his case. These views have probably led to the exclusion from courts of admiralty of the practice referred to; and I concur in the sentiments of the eminent men sitting in the English admiralty and consistory courts upon this point, that it is a matter of great doubt whether a power of this description should be exercised in this court, without the free consent of all parties to be affected by it. The Vrouw Hermina, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 163; Thomas v. Maud, 1 Addams, Ecc. 481.

The fact of consent being expressly denied by the oath of the libellant's proctor, I cannot imply it from the subsequent proceedings, and must hold the last decree to be a nullity. The claimant may, however, if he wishes to have this point considered in the court above, have the stipulation delivered up to him, to be prosecuted in personam. Order accordingly.

Case No. 9,145.

The MARTHA.

[Olc. 140.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1845.

SHIPPING—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—DAMAGE—BILL OF LADING—FAULT OF SHIPPER—VIS MAJOR—BURDEN OF PROOF—PAROL TESTIMONY.

1. Where goods are shipped in good order, and are damaged on the voyage, it devolves on the owner of the ship to show that the damage was caused by fault of the freighter, or by vis major.

[Cited in The T. A. Goddard, 12 Fed. 177.]

2. Libellant shipped 340 bundles of sheet iron on freight from Liverpool to New-York, receiving a bill of lading that the same was received in good order, and to be delivered in like good order, the perils of the sea excepted; when unladen it was found to be stained and rusted by wet, and injured thereby; and notwithstanding proof that the iron was well stowed, that the ship came in tight and dry, that the iron was taken on board in dry weather, and not exposed to the access of water, the vessel was answerable for the damage. The burden of proof is upon the ship to show that the damage existed when the cargo was laden on board.

3. The acknowledgment in the bill of lading that the cargo is received in good order, though part of the shipping contract, may be explained or disproved by parol testimony.

4. Quere: Whether a general ship is liable for damages to cargo well stowed, caused by exhalations or dampness arising from the cargo on board, (also well stowed,) unless there be a special contract in the affreightment against such loss or injury?

This was an action by the consignee of a quantity of sheet iron (310 bundles) laden on board the ship Martha, at Liverpool, for New York, to recover damages for injury to the iron, by wetting. The libellant offered the bill of lading, which contained the usual conditions and stipulations. He then proved that the iron, when unladen from the vessel, was very wet, and water dripped off it. He further proved the damage caused by the injury amounted to about 30 per cent.

On the part of the claimant, it was shown that the vessel came in tight and dry, and that the iron was well and securely stowed, and was not so placed as to be subject to the access of water or moisture during the voyage.

The mate testified, that when taken on board, it had externally the appearance of being in good order, and that the weather was dry at the time, and the iron was not exposed to wet in lading, or before the ship sailed. Evidence was offered to show that the condition of the iron might be ascribed to its having got wet in the hands of the carriers and lightermen, at Liverpool, before it was delivered to the ship, and an instance of the kind was stated where an attempt was made to impose articles on a ship under similar circumstances, but by watchfulness and caution the deception was detected.

Wm. M. Evarts, for libellant.

Wm. M. Emerson, for claimant.

BETTS, District Judge. The bill of lading undertakes to deliver the iron, then in good condition, in the same order here; but without applying to this contract the character of an absolute assumption or admission of the fact, it must be received as strong prima facie evidence that the property was in good order when received on board the ship. Barrett v. Rogers, 7 Mass. 297. The law does not give a bill of lading the character of a warranty that the property received by the ship is in absolute good order and condition. It binds the ship and owner no further than to the external appearance of the case or boxes, or of the article itself, when imported without envelope. This is especially so as between the freighter and ship-owner (Valin, lib. 3, tit. 2, art. 2; 2 Boulay-Paty, 309, 313); and on general principle, that part of the bill of lading which operates as a receipt, is open to explanation or correction by parol evidence.

The sheets of iron, in this instance, were held together by hoops around them, but not in a way to confine a quantity of fluid, and prevent its being discovered by the mere act of moving the bundles. The injury or exposure of the bundles, by having water already deposited within them, would not thus be ever concealed from observation when they were brought to the ship by the mode of putting them up for exportation; and the claimant is necessarily required to give strong evidence, under such circumstances, that the injury had already been sustained, or the proximate cause of it existed, when the iron was laden on board, otherwise his acknowledgement and undertaking in the bill of lading must stand in force against him.

In this case the libellant does not rely exclusively upon the admission in the bill of lading, but gives positive proof that the iron was delivered to the ship in good order. The fact that it was damaged when delivered to the consignee, fastens the responsibility for the deterioration upon the ship, unless the owner is able to show the injury arose from perils of the sea, or some inherent defects in the article, not discernible when it was received on board. The presumption of the law, without countervailing proof on his part, is, that the injury has arisen from fault or negligence in the stowage or transportation in the ship. Bernadon v. Nolte, 7 Mart. [N. S.] 283.

The ship had a quantity of salt on freight, and an attempt was made to prove it stowed in the vicinity of the iron, in a situation where it might be inferred that an exhalation of dampness from the salt was the means of creating the rust or stain complained of; but the stowage of salt turned out to be in another part of the ship, nor do I think, this being a general ship, the owner would be answerable for this kind of injury received by one part of a cargo from another, if the stowage was in the usual manner, unless the contract of affreightment had stipulated the contrary. There was no evidence that the damage was caused by perils of the sea, or vis major, and it is not enough for the owner to raise a doubt whether the iron came to the ship in a wet condition or received the injury on board, nor to show that it is difficult to account for its condition; but it is cast upon him to prove, affirmatively, that the injury was received before its delivery to the ship, or at least to show circumstances affording a violent presumption that the rust or stain could not have been communicated on ship-board.

Without touching the question, then, whether as against the assignee of the bill of lading, or even the freighter, the ship-owner might prove a fraud practiced on him by the shipper of the goods abroad, in putting them on board in a damaged condition, I am of opinion, upon the evidence produced, that the owner has not shown that the iron came on board wet, or any other fact, discharging his responsibility under the contract in the bill of lading. The engagement of the bill of lading must accordingly be enforced against him, and the libellant is entitled to recover the difference between 4⅛ cents per pound, for which the iron was sold in its damaged condition, and its value here, 5½ cents; together with charges for cartage, labor and money expended in consequence of the damage, but deducting the abatement of duties allowed at the custom-house, because of the damaged state of the iron. The case will be referred to the clerk to state the account, upon the principles of this decree.

NOTE. A case similar to the foregoing has been since decided in Louisiana. The action was for damages of 780 bundles of iron on board ship, by wetting. It was shown in this case, that though the weather had been rough, that the vessel was staunch and well built, and not injured by stress of weather. It was also proved by defendants, by the testimony of the stevedores who loaded the vessel, as well as by other witnesses, that the stowage was such as is customary, and such as is considered safe. But the fact of damage being positively shown, and the burthen of proof resting on the common carrier to show that it was a damage occasioned by the perils of the sea, which fact was not made to appear, the vessel was held liable for the damage. District Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1843.

ADMIRALTY—JURISDICTION — LONG ISLAND SOUND —TORTS—ILLEGAL SEIZURE—DAMAGES —MITIGATION.

1. This court has jurisdiction on the instance side over maritime torts committed within the ebb and flow of tide.

2. Long Island Sound is not only, in common law acceptation, an arm of the sea; it is a strait and parcel of the high seas; it is not within the territorial limits of any particular state.

3. The inhabitants of Oyster Bay township have the exclusive right to the oyster fishing within that bay. And the town has authority to enact and enforce by-laws in support and protection of that right. But process issued by a justice of the peace, under the authority of those laws, cannot be executed on the Sound.

4. The seizure and detention of the libellant's vessel, for the purpose of executing such process on board her, was a maritime trespass and tort.

[1] [Reported by Edward R. Olcott, Esq.]

5. An action in rem against the vessel attached, and in personam against the respondent, her master, will lie in this court for the tort.

[Cited in The Florence, Case No. 4,880.]

6. The libellant is entitled to recover damages in this action, in satisfaction of the injury he has sustained. But those damages should be mitgated, upon the consideration that the respondent was acting under the command of officers of the law, and without intention to do the libellant any wrong.

In admiralty.

W. J. Haskett, for libellant.

Emerson & Pritchard, for claimant.

BETTS, District Judge. The pleadings and proofs in this cause are exceedingly diffuse and contradictory. The case to be gathered from them is, substantially, this. On the 2d of June, 1843, a number of fishing craft, of which the sloop Bahama, owned by the libellant, was one, went into Oyster Bay, on Long Island Sound, anchored in tide waters, and engaged in dragging and raking oysters, and taking them on board. None of the vessels or persons employed in them belonged to Oyster Bay. The libellant resided in Pelham, Westchester county, where the Bahama also belonged. The township of Oyster Bay, by an ordinance or by-law, authorized by the laws of the state of New-York (1 Rev. St. 336), prohibited any person who was not an inhabitant of the town, dragging or raking oysters within the bay, and subjected the person complained of and convicted of the offence, to a fine, &c.

Complaint was made by the supervisors of the town before a justice of the peace of the town, that the above mentioned vessels, including the Bahama, with their crews, had violated the law, and were then in the act of fishing oysters within the bay. Whereupon the justice issued a warrant to a constable of the town, commanding the arrest of the persons complained of. About the same time, the said oyster craft all made sail, and left the bay, running out into the Sound. The sloop Martha Anne was, at the time, in Oyster Bay, and was taken possession of by the constable, under the orders of the magistrate and supervisors of the town, to go in pursuit of the oyster craft, then under way. A posse of forty or more men were also summoned on board the sloop to aid the constable in making the arrest of the fishermen. Many of them took fire-arms on board, and the constable was accompanied in the expedition by the supervisor and justice of the peace, who issued the warrant of arrest, all of whom gave orders to the company on board the sloop to proceed and arrest the accused, and acted in directing and aiding the execution of the orders.

The sloop, thus prepared, sailed in pursuit of the oyster craft, and as she neared them, they were huddled together, some dozen in number. The men on them forbid the approach of the sloop; and by threatening to use various weapons, which were brandished and presented, including axes and fire-arms, endeavored to keep her and her company off. The sloop was, however, navigated so as to be brought up against and made fast to the Bahama, when twenty or more men from her, several of them with fire-arms, sprang on board and arrested all the persons found there, who were brought back in the Martha Anne to Oyster Bay. The respondent was master of the Martha Anne, and under the orders of the civil officers before mentioned, aided in navigating her out, and in towing back the Bahama to Oyster Bay harbor. It was proved that she was brought back to save her, there being no one on board to take charge of her after her master and crew were arrested. The Bahama was anchored and left by those who brought her back in that harbor, but her master was held in arrest under the warrant, and was taken before a justice of the peace, who condemned him to pay a fine for the offence charged against him. No one interposed to prevent the libellant resuming possession and free use of the sloop subsequently, but he allowed her to remain unreclaimed and falling to decay at her anchorage.

The respondent and claimant except to the jurisdiction of this court in the case, because the subject matter is within the cognizance of the local courts, and the remedy of the libellant, if any he has, lies at law, and not in admiralty. This objection would be unavailing in the English admiralty, provided the locus in quo, where the transaction took place, was upon the high seas. 3 Black, 106; 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 107, 201. So under our federal system, district courts proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, have cognizance on the instance side, of maritime trespasses and torts, both in rem and in personam. The Almeida, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 473; Dean v. Angus [Case No. 3,702]; L'Invincible, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 238; McGrath v. The Candalero [Id. 8,809]. The subject matter, then, indisputably appertains to the jurisdiction of this court, provided the place in which the wrongful acts were done was so also. In this respect, our national judiciary has a wider admiralty and maritime authority than is exercised by English courts of admiralty. It extends over all navigable waters where the tide ebbs and flows, and is not, as is urged with great learning and force of reasoning, restricted by the condition that the waters be out of the territorial limits of the states. De Lovio v. Boit [Id. 3,776]; Hale v. Washington Ins. Co. [Id. 5,916]. But in this case the proof is clear that the libellant's vessel was come upon by the respondent and the Martha Anne, near the centre of Long Island Sound. The Sound is an arm of the sea, within the common law acceptation of the term, being navigable tide-water (Hargrave, Law Tracts, c. 5; Carter v. Murcot, 4 Burrows, 2162; Hooker v. Cummings, 20 Johns. 98), and more specifically an arm of the sea than mere rivers, bays or inlets; because, in addition to its tide-water and navigable quality, it is without the territorial limits of any county (1 Kent, Comm. 364, 367.) It more properly is a strait, or inland sea, having communication with the ocean at each end, and lying between a long extent of land on two sides of it. Jacobs, Law Dict. "Straits." But what imparts an unquestionable maritime jurisdiction to the United States courts over its waters, and renders it within our jurisprudence, the high seas, is, that it is not within the territory of any particular state of the Union.

In my opinion, therefore, there is no solid ground of exception to the jurisdiction of the court over the case presented by the libel. The libellant is entitled to satisfaction for the wrong he has sustained, out of the vessel which was the instrument by which it was inflicted, and against the master who was the agent causing it. The great stress of the contestation in the cause between the parties has been upon the right of the inhabitants of Oyster Bay to the exclusive fishing of oysters in that bay, and the power of the corporation of the town to enact and enforce the ordinance or by-law in question. I do not go into that subject. It has been largely discussed in the state law courts; and the statute law of the state, together with the decisions of those tribunals, undoubtedly settle that point conclusively, independent of the coincidence of decisions of the federal courts with the doctrines laid down by the state courts. 6 Cow. 376; Id. 545, notes; 20 Johns. 90; Wend. 237; 5 Wend. 423; 14 Wend. 43; 1 Rev. St. 336; Bennett v. Boggs [Case No. 1,319]; [Martin v. Waddell] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 367.

The bearing upon that topic is unimportant to this case, because, conceding the exclusive title to the fishing in Oyster Bay is vested in the inhabitants of that town, and admitting the validity of the by-laws passed to support the title, and the regularity and conclusiveness of the proceedings before the magistrates to enforce those by-laws and arrest the parties accused on the occasion in question, yet no authority could be derived from those facts to seize or molest the libellant's vessel at the place where she was trespassed upon and arrested. That place was entirely out of the jurisdiction of the local magistrates. The law creating the county of Queens does not extend its boundaries into the Sound. 3 Rev. St. 2. And, accordingly, there is no color of right shown in justification of the acts complained of, and the libellant is entitled to a decree against the respondent and the Martha Anne, for remuneration of loss thus sustained by him.

I do not think those damages should be of an aggravated or exemplary character against these parties. The respondent did not inflict the wrong wantonly. There is no evidence that he volunteered his sloop or himself personally in the enterprise. He acted under the direction of officers of the law, who could rightfully exact the assistance demanded within the territory of the county; and there was sufficient probable cause for him to submit himself and his vessel to their commands, to remove all presumption of a wilful purpose on his part to perpetrate a wrong and trespass on the property of the libellant. The testimony does not fix upon him any further participation in the tort than being present with his vessel. He is undoubtedly legally responsible to the libellant for the injury inflicted, but the case made out does not call for vindictive or extraordinary damages against him. The Bahama was taken back to Oyster Bay by order of the public officers controlling the proceedings, and anchored there, within one hour after her arrest, and was there left in a safe position and one easy of access for the libellant; and it does not appear that he was in any way prevented resuming immediate possession of her. This, in my judgment, is the reasonable bearing and result of the statements of the witnesses given on the hearing.

I shall order that the libellant recover $50 and his costs, to be taxed, and that he take a decree in rem against the vessel, and in personam against the respondent therefor.

PRACTICE—STIPULATION FOR VALUE—BOND UNDER SECTION 941 OF THE UNITED STATES REVISED STATUTES.

1. A stipulation for value can be substituted for property in custody, at any time, by order of court.

2. At any time before default, property in custody may be bonded in pursuance of section 941 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, without any other condition than is prescribed in that section:

3. But whether it can be so bonded as a matter of right, after a default, quere.

In admiralty.

T. C. Campbell, for libellant.

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. I greatly doubt whether a party can as a matter of right obtain the release of a vessel from custody by giving a bond under section 941 of the United States Revised Statutes after a default has been entered upon the return of the process. It seems to be the intention that the bond should be approved and either filed or returned by the marshal for the purpose of being filed with the process, and it is plainly intended that the bond should be given before any decree has been rendered in the cause. Of course, as in other cases, a stipulation for value may be substituted for property in custody at any time, by leave of the court, but that is a different thing from giving the bond provided for in section 941. The difficulty here is that there has been no default and no publication of notice upon which a default can now be taken. The right, therefore, to have a bond approved in pursuance of section 941 still exists, and may be exercised without any condition other than is prescribed in the section.

The application, therefore, to have terms imposed as a condition of being allowed to bond under section 941 must be denied.

The bond, being regular in form, and the sureties having justified on due notice to the libellant, must be approved.

District Court, D. Maine. Jan. 10, 1860.[2]

SHIPPING—POSSESSION OF VESSEL—MAJORITY IN OWNERSHIP—TRANSFER—ACT OF CONGRESS.

1. The constitutional power of congress to pass the law of 1850, § 1 [9 Stat. 440], relative to recording the transfer of vessels, raised but not decided.

2. A court of admiralty has no jurisdiction to decree possession of a vessel to the owners of a majority, when a title to such vessel is set up in mortgage.

This case came up on an agreed statement of facts, about which there was no dispute, and the principal point argued was the validity of the law of the United States of 1850 (section 1). It was to obtain a decision on this point, on which there were conflicting opinions, that the suit was brought. The court thought itself obliged to decide it on a narrower ground.

Shepley & Dana, for libellants.
Fessenden & Butler, for respondent.

WARE, District Judge. This is a libel against the Martha Washington, a brig of about 270 tons burthen, by Blanchard and Sherman claiming 5-16 in full title. In an agreed statement of facts it is admitted that she was built in 1853, at Surry, in the collections district of Frenchman's Bay, within which all the owners resided, and, on the 5th of December, she was registered in that district. On the 25th of October, 1855, she surrendered her registry and was enrolled. On the 7th of December, 1855, being at Norfolk, and desirous to make a voyage to the West Indies, she surrendered her papers and took out a temporary register in that office, and under that register was employed during the whole of 1856 and the greater part of the year 1857. The libellants claim title to one-half of the brig by virtue of a mortgage of Wm. Coggin, dated Nov. 21, 1856, recorded in the collector's office at Frenchman's Bay, Nov. 27, 1856, and at Norfolk, May 11, 1857, and by the clerk of the town of Surry, Nov. 18, 1857. To this title of the libellants, Phebe Flood has put in a claim to three-sixteenths which is derived from a mortgage of the said Coggin, dated April 1, 1856, and recorded in the collector's office in Frenchman's Bay, Sept. 1, 1856. Amos D. Dolivar has put in another claim to one-sixteenth by a mortgage of the same Coggin, dated Sept. 1, 1856, and recorded the second day of the same month in the collector's office at Ellsworth. Coggin, it is admitted, owned one-half and no more of the brig. Of this he conveyed one-half by two mortgages to Flood & Dolivar, both of them of earlier date and record, in the office of the collector at Frenchman's Bay, than the libellants, but neither recorded in the office of the clerk of Surry. He then conveyed the whole of his half to the libellants, who had their mortgage recorded in the office of the collector of Norfolk, and with the clerk of the town of Surry. Coggin had his residence at Surry till the time of his death.

The libellants claim possession on the ground of title to a majority of the vessel, and to one-half, their title is a foreclosed mortgage under the revised statutes of Maine. The words of the law are: "No mortgage of personal property made to secure the payment of more than thirty dollars shall be valid against any other person than the parties thereto, unless possession of such property, is delivered and retained by the mortgagee, or the mortgage be recorded by the clerk of the town in which the mortgagee resides." Chapter 91, § 1. The third section provides that the property may be redeemed at any time within sixty days after the breach of the condition. That time had elapsed before the filing of the libel, and the parties claim an absolute foreclosure by operation of law. To this libel answers are interposed by Flood and Dolivar, claiming title, one to three-sixteenths and the other one-sixteenth parts of the same vessel, on mortgage prior in point of date of the conveyances and of the record in the collector's office at Frenchman's Bay, to that of the libellant. Their claim is under the United States statute of 1850 (section 1). The words of this statute are "that no bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance of any vessel or part of any vessel of the United States, shall be valid against any person other than the grantor or mortgagee, his heirs and devisees and persons having actual notice thereof; unless such bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance be recorded in the office of the collector of the customs where such vessel is registered or enrolled." In both statutes there is a reservation of bottomry contracts and implied liens, which it is immaterial to consider in this case. It may here be remarked, that though the law of the state was enacted in the revised statutes in 1857, it was but a re-enactment of the law of the state dated back to 1839.

On these mortgages the libellants shew a good title under the state law, and the claimants under that of the United States. If these two laws had proceeded from the same authority, that is, if both had been enacted by the same sovereign power, but little difficulty, I think, would be found in holding that of the United States an implied repeal of the state law, and that a compliance with the terms of both would be unnecessary. There appears to me to be a real difficulty in yielding to the authority of the case of Thompson v. Van Vechten, 5 Abb. Prac. 462, which was quoted at the argument, that to secure a mortgage, the mortgagee must record under both laws. Both provide for the same case, they cover the whole matter and they have the same penal sanction, that is, the nullity of the conveyance if the terms of the law are not complied with. They appear to me to fall under the common rule, that a subsequent law, relating to the same matter, is a repeal of a prior, so far as the provisions of the two are repugnant or inconsistent, and if the second covers the whole matter of the first, it is a repeal of that in toto. And it is so plain a principle of the constitution and has been so often recognized, that in all matters to which the authority of the United States extends, their laws are paramount to those of a state, that it seems superfluous to refer to any authority on this point.

If this be correct the rights of the parties under these mortgages must be decided by the United States law, if it is in force. It is so if congress had the constitutional right to pass it, for it has not been repealed. This brings up the point that was mainly, I may say solely, relied on at the argument, that the act of 1850 is purely void from excess of power; that congress, in enacting this law, passed their constitutional limits, and the act is therefore a pure nullity.

If congress has the power to pass laws regulating the title to vessels generally, it must be derived from the grant of power in the first article (section 8): "To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes." The clause at the end of this section, "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," &c., it has always appeared to me cannot enlarge the powers of the general government, because this refers only to incidental powers, which would necessarily follow the grant of the general power without express words. If it did increase their power, it would be neutralized by the tenth amendment. This provides that "the powers not delegated the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively or to the people." This is a complete negation of a constructive power on the clause, which I have mentioned.

The grant of power to regulate commerce, it is admitted, includes that of regulating navigation, but it includes it as an incident merely. Congress has the right to regulate foreign navigation so far as it is engaged in carrying on our commerce. Yet no one would contend that they had a general power over vessels belonging to a foreign nation. So congress has the power to regulate ships or vessels just so far and no farther than as they are employed in carrying on trade. There can be no doubt that, under state laws, any one may own a vehicle made of wood, iron, and copper in any form, whether in that of a ship, a barrel, or a box, and may transfer it under what conditions he pleases without reference to the United States laws. It is only when it becomes a vehicle in carrying on trade that it comes within the reach of the United States authority. And whatever may be the form, there can be no doubt that the United States, so far as it is used in trade and commerce, may regulate the transfer and the title generally; that is, so far as it is used in foreign and inter-state trade and trade with the Indians. To this limit was the power of congress carefully confined by the supreme court in the great case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1, 197. Under this power congress may order ships or vessels to be registered and enrolled, to be commanded and manned in a particular way, to be under a peculiar police adapted to the service, and be recorded in the custom-house, or they shall have none of the privileges and immunities attached to United States vessels. But the penalty by which this law is enforced must be confined to these privileges. The power of the United States must be restricted to taking away that which the United States can give. The laws of the Union never contemplate vessels as property simply, but as property employed in a particular way, or for a particular purpose. The tenure of all goods in civilized society is fixed by law. As property, the owner holds it under state laws. It is only as engaged in trade, that they hold it under United States law. What the state gives, the United States cannot take away. But the privilege of engaging in a certain trade is given by the United States, and of that vessels, like any other property, may be deprived.

If the authority contended for were allowed it would, in principle, go somewhat farther than is at first imagined. The only ground on which it can be pretended that the United States can regulate the mode of transfer of vessels, is that they may be, and most usually are, used in carrying on trade. But if for this reason alone they may regulate the title generally, I do not see but that with the same force it may be applied to barrels and boxes, nay, to wagons, carts, and horses, because they may be used in carrying on interstate and Indian trade. A cooper or a pedlar would be surprised to be informed that they could not convey a title to a barrel or a wagon without first consulting the United States laws.

It will not be pretended that a decision against the validity of the law of the United States, or one that should restrict its operation to the immunities granted by their laws, would not be attended with difficulties of the gravest character. There can be no doubt that they can regulate the transfer of vessels so far that they shall have none of the privileges granted by them, unless by a compliance with their laws. In this way only, can vessels be entitled to engage in the public trade, and without these privileges, they would be of little value, while other vehicles derive little of their value from this privilege, as barrels, boxes, carriages, etc. And there would be a real and substantial difficulty in separating the immunities from the thing itself, and allowing these to be transferred independent of the thing itself.

The question raised in this case is one of the greatest importance, as it affects the powers of the general government and of the separate states, as well as the commercial community at large. And it will require very grave consideration before it is decided either way. As property generally, the owners hold vessels as they do all other property under state laws. It is not perceived how, in this case, the United States can take away, in the form of a penalty, what they cannot give. This power of control is not expressly granted by the constitution. That of regulating navigation, so far as it is engaged in trade, is but an incident, and to allow the United States a general control over the transfer of vessels, when their own interests are not concerned, would be grafting an incident on an incident. For it will not be pretended that congress have this power because the public good would be promoted by having it lodged within them. If the plea of utility, of which, from the necessity of the case, the general government would alone be the judge, were sufficient, ours would be a government of discretion and not of fixed rules. And it is an elementary principle of law, that when one acts under a delegated authority he must show it to exist either by express grant or necessarily incident to some express grant, or it does not exist. The supreme court, in one of the most carefully considered opinions ever delivered in that court, have given this construction to the constitution. Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 326–349. The constitution is to be interpreted like every other grant of power. See 1 Pars. Mar. Law, pp. 47–51.

If it were necessary to decide this question on this case, I should desire a longer time to consider it. Every question involving the constitutional power of the general government is important, and there can be scarcely any one more so than this. Within the grant of the constitution the power of the general government is supreme, and overcomes all state legislation, but beyond that its acts are merely void. The conveyance of vessels is of daily occurrence, and it is of the last importance to ship owners when the laws are in conflict, to know whether they are to obey those of the state, or the United States. Although this question must be decided, I think it cannot be in the present case, and the courts of the United States are not in the habit of volunteering their opinions when they are not called for. Sufficient for the day are the evils and trials which the day brings. My opinion is that the case must be determined on the question of jurisdiction, and, as this is preliminary in its nature, it cuts off all questions which arise on the merits.

The title set up by this libel is founded on a mortgage, and the prayer is for possession. It is not pretended that the plaintiffs owned a majority independent of the mortgage. Without a majority they would have no right to claim possession against other co-tenants, and the transfer of the possession must have its foundation in that title. In the case of Boghart v. The John Jay, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 399, the supreme court held that the court of admiralty had no jurisdiction to decree a sale of a ship to pay an unsatisfied mortgage or to transfer the possession to the mortgagees. This case was confirmed in that of Schuhardt v. The Angelique, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 239. It was acted on in that of The William D. Rice [Case No. 17,691]. It is on the ground that the title set up is essentially one in equity, and though a court of admiralty professes to decide ux aequo et bono, on the general principles of equity, it has none of the peculiar powers of that court in the investigation of the title and the equities under it. How far a court of admiralty may look into a mortgage when it comes up collaterally, is another question; but when this lies at the very foundation of the case, it is too well settled in this country, as, before the statute of Victoria, it was in England, that the court looks only at the legal title, to be brought into doubt. It is equally clear that the consent of parties cannot give jurisdiction. If this defect appears at any time in the course of the trial, although not raised by the pleadings of the parties, it is fatal. So it has often been decided by the supreme court.

The libel dismissed with costs.

[5 Law Rep. 158; 1 Pa. Law J. 188.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. 1842.

INJUNCTION—SUITS AGAINST BANKRUPT—EQUITY—JURISDICTION—BANKRUPT ACT.

1. The equity jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States, under the bankrupt act [5 Stat. 440], is not confined to cases, originally arising and pending in the particular court where the relief is sought.

[Quoted in Goodall v. Tuttle, Case No. 5,533. Criticised in Shearman v. Bingham, Id. 12,733.]

2. Where a creditor, living in Massachusetts, commenced suits in Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Kentucky, against a party proceeded against as a bankrupt in Pennsylvania, which suits would deeply affect the property of the supposed bankrupt, if he should be declared a bankrupt; it was held, that an injunction ought to issue against the creditor, enjoining him from proceeding in any of the said suits.

This was a case in bankruptcy, adjourned into the circuit court from the district court of Massachusetts, and arose on a petition from James Martin, Jacob M. Thomas, John Thomas, and Samuel E. Stokes, merchants and partners, under the firm of Thomas and Martin; and William Stevens and William C. Claghorn, merchants and partners, under the firm of Stevens and Claghorn, of Philadelphia. The petition set forth, that James B. Danforth, of Philadelphia, merchant, was indebted to the petitioners in a sum of money exceeding five hundred dollars, and was owing debts to the amount of not less than two thousand dollars; that the petitioners, on the 26th day of May, 1842, filed in the district court of the United States, for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, their petition, praying that the said Danforth might be declared bankrupt, pursuant to the act of congress, and it was thereupon ordered, that the hearing upon said petition should be had before the said court, on the 24th day of June, current. That Samuel S. Lewis, of Boston, had commenced against said Danforth divers suits before competent tribunals, namely, one in the state of Massachusetts, one in New Hampshire, one in Kentucky, and was prosecuting the same to final judgment; in which said suits certain real and personal estate of the said Danforth had been attached. Wherefore the petitioners prayed, that the said Lewis might be enjoined from proceeding in said suits; and for general relief.

The district judge, upon the hearing, ordered the following question to be adjourned into the circuit court for a final determination, to wit: "Whether, upon the facts set forth in the said petition, an injunction can and ought to be granted as prayed for; or whether any, and what other relief, can, and ought to be granted to the petitioners."

The cause was submitted by A. H. Fiske, for petitioners. No counsel appeared on the other side.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This case is not unattended with doubt and difficulty; but, on the whole, I have come to the conclusion, that it must be governed by the decision of this court in Ex parte Foster [Case No. 4,960]. The ground of the doubt and difficulty is, whether the district courts of the United States have, under the bankrupt act of 1841 (chapter 9), any jurisdiction in equity, except in cases originally arising, and pending in the particular court. The language of the sixth section of the act is: "That the district court in every district shall have jurisdiction in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy arising under the act," the said jurisdiction to be exercised summarily, in the nature of summary proceedings in equity. The act then goes on to enumerate certain specific cases and controversies, to what the jurisdiction extends, (which I deem merely affirmative, and not restrictive of the preceding clause;) and then it extends the jurisdiction "to all acts, matters and things to be done under, and in virtue of the bankruptcy, until the final distribution and settlement of the estate of the bankrupt, and the close of the proceedings in bankruptcy." Now, this language is exceedingly broad and general; and it is not in terms, or by fair implication, necessarily confined to cases of bankruptcy originally instituted, and pending in the particular district court, where the relief is sought. On the contrary, it is not unnatural to presume, that as cases, originally instituted and pending in one district, may apply to reach persons and property situate in other districts, and require auxiliary proceedings therein to perfect and accomplish the objects of the act, the intention of congress was, that the district courts in every district should be mutually auxiliary to each other for such purposes and proceedings. The language of the act is sufficiently comprehensive to cover such cases; and I can perceive no solid ground of objection to such an interpretation of it. Here, is the case of a creditor, living in Massachusetts, and commencing suits in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Kentucky, against the party, proceeded against as a bankrupt, who lives in Pennsylvania, which suits deeply affect the property of the supposed bankrupt, and, if he shall be declared a bankrupt, which also deeply affect the rights and interests of all the other creditors. If the bankrupt proceedings go on, and the party is declared a bankrupt, and an assignee is appointed, the same consequences must arise, as in the case of Ex parte Foster [supra], and the same rights would attach in favor of the assignee, and the bankrupt, and the creditors, as were held to attach in that case. If the district court of Massachusetts has no jurisdiction to grant relief in the present case, it is clear, that no other court can grant it, at least no other court, sitting as a court of bankruptcy. No state court could entertain the suit; for the act confers no power or jurisdiction on any state court; and the district court for the district of Pennsylvania is bounded, as to its direct jurisdiction over persons and property, to such only as are within its territorial limits. It is possible, indeed, that the circuit court of the United States might possess equitable jurisdiction over the case in virtue of its general equity jurisdiction between citizens of different states, if the bankrupt should commence a suit here, or if the assignee should be a citizen of Pennsylvania, and should commence a suit here. But this would be a very circuitous remedy, if it be maintainable; and would hardly meet the practical exigencies of cases, like the present. On the contrary, if, as has been suggested, we give a broad interpretation to the words, then the whole objects of the bankrupt act will be promptly and effectually obtained, through the mere instrumentality of the district courts in each district, acting, as it were, sub mutual vicissitudinis obtentu, in aid of each other.

For these reasons, I am of opinion, that the adjourned question, as to the right of the district court to issue an injunction in the present case ought to be answered in the affirmative; and that a certificate ought to be sent accordingly from this court to the district court, in the terms of the certificate in Ex parte Foster, mutatis mutandis.

It may be proper to add, that the injunction ought to apply, as well to the suits in New Hampshire and Kentucky, as to that in Massachusetts, since the creditor is resident in this district, and the injunction acts in personam. The doctrine is now perfectly well settled in equity, that an injunction will lie against a party within the jurisdiction of the court to stay proceedings in any foreign courts. See 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 899, 900, and cases cited in the notes.

District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1872.

BANKRUPTCY — ERRONEOUS ADJUDICATION — COPARTNERSHIP.

On the petition and schedules of one member of a copartnership, an adjudication of bankruptcy of the firm was made. It appeared that neither of the other members of the firm had consented to the adjudication of bankruptcy, and that they had no place of business within, and resided out of, the district where the petition was filed: Held, that the adjudication as to the other members of the firm was erroneous, as the court was without jurisdiction as against them, and that as to them such adjudication must be vacated, but should be allowed to stand as to the petitioning member.

On the 16th of March, 1872, on the petition and schedules of Henry Martin, a member of the firm of Martin, Vaughan & Co., the adjudication of bankruptcy of said firm was signed by the register to whom the case was referred, under a misapprehension of the facts as to Vaughan and Montgomery, the other members of the firm. On a subsequent examination of the petition and schedules, it appeared that there was no evidence that either Vaughan or Montgomery had consented to the adjudication of bankruptcy of the firm; that they had no place of business in the district, and resided out of the district; and that the debts were all contracted prior to January 1st, 1869. The register thereupon, on the same day, of his own motion, made an order setting aside the said adjudication, without notice to the attorney for the petitioner, and, on March 18th, the following Monday, made an adjudication of bankruptcy of said Henry Martin individually. The petitioner thereupon moved that the order setting aside the adjudication of March 16th, and the adjudication of March 18th, be vacated. The register certified the above facts to the court, with his opinion that the adjudication of the firm of Martin, Vaughan & Co. was erroneous, and that Vaughan and Montgomery were entitled to be heard before being adjudged bankrupts.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The adjudication of March 16th, 1872, as to Vaughan and Montgomery, was erroneous, as the court was without jurisdiction as to them. I direct an order to be entered vacating such adjudication as to them, but allowing it to stand as to Martin alone. In order to prevent any possible embarrassment, the order had better provide that the register's order setting aside the adjudication of March 16th be vacated, and that the adjudication of March 18th be vacated.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1866.

CERTIORARI — HABEAS CORPUS — COMMISSIONER — MINUTES OF EVIDENCE—CONSPIRACY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. The courts of the United States have power, under the 14th section of the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789 (1 Stat. 81), to issue the writ of certiorari, as ancillary to the writ of habeas corpus, as a means of rendering their jurisdiction under the latter writ effective.

[Cited in Re Macdonnell, Case No. 8,772.]

2. Where a prisoner is committed by a United States commissioner, to await the action of a grand jury of a circuit court of the United States, that court, in connection with a habeas corpus, to inquire into the cause of his commitment, has power to issue a certiorari to the commissioner, to bring up the proceedings which took place before him.

[Cited in Re Coleman, Case No. 2,980.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

3. The functions exercised by a United States commissioner, in committing a prisoner to await the action of a grand jury, considered.

[Cited in U. S. v. Martin, 17 Fed. 155.]

4. The court, on a habeas corpus, is not concluded by the finding of the committing magistrate, but may go behind his order of commitment, and, by a certiorari, look into the evidence taken before him.

[Cited in Re Van Campen, Case No. 16,835; U. S. v. Brawner, 7 Fed. 87.]

5. To this end, the court may require the production before it of the minutes of oral evidence taken by the commissioner, and of any written depositions, and may examine the commissioner as to evidence taken by him and not reduced to writing, and as to lost minutes of evidence.

6. The admissions of an alleged co-conspirator, made after the conspiracy has terminated, and not in the presence of the accused, are not evidence against the latter.

7. Communications which pass between client and counsel are inviolable, and the latter cannot be compelled to disclose them.

8. A prisoner committed by a United States commissioner, for a crime against the United States, to await the action of a grand jury of this court, was discharged by this court, on habeas corpus, on the ground that the evidence before the commissioner, brought up on certiorari, was not sufficient to warrant his commitment.

This was a writ of habeas corpus directed to the marshal of the Southern district of New York, commanding him to bring the body of Robert M. Martin before the court. As the petition for the writ alleged that the prisoner was detained in custody under a warrant of commitment issued by a United States commissioner, a writ of certiorari, also, was issued by the court to the commissioner, directing him to send up the proceedings and evidence upon which such commitment was founded. By his return to the habeas corpus, the marshal justified his detention of the prisoner, by setting forth the order of the commissioner, and also produced the body of the prisoner in court. No formal return was made to the certiorari, though the commissioner was in court, with his proceedings in the premises, ready to comply with such order as the court should make thereon. The district attorney, on behalf of the United States, moved to quash the certiorari, on the ground that the commissioner possessed co-ordinate jurisdiction with this court to commit, for the action of the grand jury, persons charged with crime, and that, therefore, this court had no power to revise his action therein. It was insisted, on behalf of the government, first, that the court had no power to grant the writ; and, second, that, if it had, the writ could lawfully operate only to bring up the formal records and files of the commissioner in the case, and that the evidence taken before the commissioner was no part of such records or files, and, therefore, not within reach of the writ. The principal question discussed, on the argument, was the power of the court, through the medium of a writ of certiorari, to bring before it the evidence upon which the commitment was made.

Daniel S. Dickinson, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Jeremiah Larocque, for prisoner.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The power of this court to grant the writ of habeas corpus is not denied, and, therefore, need not now be dwelt upon. Neither shall I discuss at much length its power to grant the writ of certiorari, as ancillary to the former writ. The courts of the United States being courts of limited, though not of inferior jurisdiction, their powers must be sought for in the acts of congress. The 14th section of the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789 (1 Stat. 81), provides, "that all the before-mentioned courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law. And that either of the justices of the supreme court, as well as judges of the district courts, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus, for the purpose of an inquiry into the cause of commitment. Provided, that writs of habeas corpus shall in no case extend to prisoners in gaol, unless where they are in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States, or are committed for trial before some court of the same, or are necessary to be brought into court to testify." Under the authority conferred by this act, the writ of habeas corpus has been repeatedly granted by the courts of the United States, and by the judges thereof. And, although the power to issue the writ of certiorari is not conferred by name, it is no doubt included under the general terms, "all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law." Accordingly, the supreme court of the United States, in Ex parte Burford, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 448, and in the case of Ex parte Bollman, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 75, issued the writ of certiorari, as well as that of habeas corpus. These precedents would be quite sufficient to warrant this court in the exercise of its power to issue the former writ, for, jurisdiction in cases of habeas corpus is conferred upon the supreme and circuit courts by the same words of the act, as well as the power to issue all other writs which may be necessary for the exercise of jurisdiction. The writ of certiorari has always been considered, in appropriate cases, as ancillary to that of habeas corpus, and has long been issued by the courts of England and this country, as a means of rendering their jurisdiction under the latter writ effective. It is said, in Bacon's Abridgment (title "Habeas Corpus," B 3): "As the certiorari alone removes not the body, so the habeas corpus alone removes not the record itself, but only the prisoner with the cause of his commitment; and, therefore, although, upon the habeas corpus, and the return thereof, the court can judge of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the return and commitment, and bail or discharge or remand the prisoner, as the case appears upon the return, yet they cannot, upon the bare return of the habeas corpus, give any judgment, or proceed upon the record of the indictment, order, or judgment, without the record itself be removed by certiorari." Numerous cases, in the English, federal, and state courts are found, where a certiorari, in connection with a habeas corpus, has been issued. Hamond v. Howell, 1 Mod. 184; King v. Marks, 3 East, 157; King v. Taylor, 7 Dowl. & R. 622; the cases in Cranch, already cited; Edmonds, J., in People v. Martin, 1 Parker, Cr. R. 187. In the last case cited, the power was given by the statute, but in language which plainly indicated that the act, in that particular, was declaratory of what the law was, rather than remedial. The prisoner having been committed to await the action of the grand jury in this court, I have no doubt that, upon principle, by the power conferred by the act of congress, and upon the decided cases, this court is fully authorized to issue the writ of certiorari in connection with the writ of habeas corpus.

The next question is—what proceedings of the committing magistrate is the certiorari to operate upon and remove into this court? In determining this question, it is proper to notice, in the outset, the functions exercised by the commissioner in committing a prisoner to await the action of the grand jury. In this respect, he exercises the powers common to all ordinary committing magistrates. If he finds probable cause to hold the party for trial, he commits him; if not, he discharges him. In neither case is his action final, or a bar to further proceedings. If the prisoner is discharged, he may be again arrested, and, on sufficient evidence, may be committed. If he is committed, he may apply to the court to reduce his bail, or the prosecuting officer may apply to have it increased, or to discharge him altogether. In none of these proceedings of the commissioner are his orders in the nature of a final judgment of a court of record; and it is a common practice for courts, in England and in this country, to which a party is committed for trial, to revise just such orders as the commissioner has made in the present case. This court has repeatedly increased and diminished bail fixed by commissioners, and its authority has never been questioned. Now, in order that this court may exercise intelligently its undoubted authority over such matters, it must be able to go behind the mere formal order of commitment. In order to fix the amount of bail, it must be possessed of sufficient evidence as to what are the peculiarities of the offence committed—whether it is a merely technical breach of law, or one attended by circumstances of peculiar aggravation or atrocity. This court had occasion, not long since, on the application of a former district attorney, to inquire extensively into evidence for the purpose of fixing the bail of a swindler whose depredations on the treasury had been enormous. Indeed, the 33d section of the judiciary act expressly requires the court, in fixing bail, in certain cases, to regard "the nature and circumstances of the offence and of the evidence, and the usages of law." Now, in order to pass upon the evidence, the court must have the same before it. If it is not brought voluntarily into court, the court must have some power to compel its production. The witnesses are not always within its immediate reach, having given their testimony before the commissioner, and gone to distant homes. In some cases, they are abroad, or on the high seas, and the prisoner stands committed on depositions sent home by consuls residing in foreign ports. It is a common practice, for courts in most places where the common law exists, to bring before them the evidence produced before the committing magistrate, and upon which his commitment is founded; and, where this evidence is reduced to writing, in the form of depositions, whether by the committing magistrate or by other competent authority, this is frequently done by a certiorari, in aid of a habeas corpus. But, in whatever manner the evidence is brought before the court, the court is not concluded by the finding of the committing magistrate. 2 Strange, 911, note; King v. Marks, 3 East, 157; Van Boven's Case, 9 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 676; Ex parte Tayloe, 5 Cow. 39; People v. Martin, 1 Parker, Cr. R. 187. In the case of Ex parte Bollman, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 114, Chief Justice Marshall remarked: "I understand the clear opinion of the court to be (if I mistake it, my brethren will correct me) that it is unimportant whether the commitment be regular in point of form or not; for, this court, having gone into an examination of the evidence upon which the commitment was grounded, will proceed to do that which the court below ought to have done."

The only plausible doubt suggested in the present case is, as to the power of the court to compel the production of the minutes of the evidence taken by the commissioner. The law does not, in terms, require the commissioner to reduce the testimony of witnesses to writing, although this is generally done by those magistrates, in important cases. If this objection were to prevail, it would only produce embarrassment; for, it often happens, that the evidence upon which a commitment is founded consists in part of depositions taken abroad by consuls, and in part of oral testimony taken before the commissioner, and by him taken down in his minutes. The witnesses who thus testify sometimes leave for remote places, and, where they are officers of a ship, often depart on another voyage before the final trial; and it would be strange indeed, if, on an application to discharge or modify bail, the court were to be deprived of the power to examine into the evidence thus informally taken, while it would be compelled, in the exercise of a solemn duty, to look into that contained in formal depositions. Under such an administration of justice, the government as well as the accused would often be deprived of material evidence, and the power of the court to properly dispose of the case would be greatly impeded. In such a case, the court would certainly be justified in requiring the commissioner to produce his minutes, and, if he had failed to take them, or if they had been lost or destroyed, to summon him, and examine him under oath touching the evidence upon which his commitment was founded. Indeed, this very course of proceeding has been reduced to a formal rule of practice by at least one court of the United States, of high intelligence and extensive jurisdiction. Ex parte Bennett [Case No. 1,311]. It would be more satisfactory, if the minutes of the commissioner were always formally taken, and the testimony of the witness read over to him, and subscribed by his own hand; but the absence of this formality cannot be permitted to paralyze the arm of this court, and destroy its power to do justice to both the government and the accused.

The importance of this power of the court, to look into the evidence as far as may be necessary, in order to decide whether it is proper or not to hold a prisoner in confinement, will be clearly seen on examining the condition of things if no such power existed. One of two results would follow. Either the prisoner would be kept in confinement just as long as the prosecution might see fit to hold him, or the court would be compelled to make a mere arbitrary order limiting the time within which he should be indicted or discharged. It often happens that prisoners are brought into a district for trial, long before the necessary evidence can be obtained for submission to the grand jury. This happens more frequently in the case of crimes committed on shipboard, in remote parts of the world; but it may and does occur in other instances. In such cases, the court would not, unless compelled to do so, arbitrarily limit the time within which an indictment should be found or the prisoner be released. It would be all-important that the court should look into the evidence upon which the prisoner was committed, that it might determine whether or not the circumstances surrounding the commission of the alleged crime were such as to warrant his further detention in the absence of an indictment. The extent of a justifiable delay would be different in different cases, depending upon the evidence. To put an order upon the district attorney, that he should have his indictment in court by a given day, or that the prisoner be discharged, without looking into the evidence, would be a blind exercise of power, little meriting the term judicial. This the court would be compelled to do, unless it had control over, and the power to examine into, the evidence, or else leave the prisoner virtually in the hands of the prosecutor and to such term of confinement as he might think proper. Of course, no prisoner would be unreasonably detained under the official sanction of the distinguished and enlightened gentleman who now fills the office of prosecutor in this district. But this court, in the discharge of its duties, can be no respecter of persons, nor can it decline any of the responsibilities imposed upon it by the constitution and the laws. It is its duty to see that every person committed to its custody, whether under or awaiting indictment, has a speedy, as well as a public and an impartial trial; and it should accomplish this great object in such manner that the ends of public justice may be attained and the rights of every prisoner be preserved and protected.

There is another important consideration which it is proper to advert to. As this court has the power to issue writs of habeas corpus, for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of commitment (1 Stat. 81, § 14; Ex parte Watkins, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 193, 201) it would be compelled, in the exercise of this power, where the warrant of commitment was irregular and void on its face, to discharge from arrest, unless it could go behind the warrant and examine into the evidence upon which it was founded. This, as I have already shown, would sometimes be impracticable, unless the court could resort to the evidence upon which the commissioner acted, and which might be within reach of the court, on the return to the habeas corpus, only through the commissioner's minutes or his own testimony. For these reasons, the commissioner who committed the prisoner in this case must answer the certiorari, by producing the evidence taken before him. As this evidence was, I suppose, substantially reduced to writing by him on the hearing, it will be sufficient to produce his minutes thereof, and the affidavit upon which the original warrant of arrest was issued. The warrant itself and the order of commitment are already before the court.

To avoid all misconception, it may be well to remark, that the principles here laid down, have no necessary relation to the powers conferred upon commissioners under the laws touching the execution of extradition treaties.

The return to the certiorari having been made in conformity to the above decision, and the question of the further detention or discharge of the prisoner having been heard, the court proceeded to render the following decision:

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The evidence and proceedings upon which the prisoner, Robert M. Martin, was committed to await the action of the grand jury in this court, have been carefully examined and considered by the court. The question now to be determined is, whether he shall be remanded or discharged.

As the authorities are somewhat conflicting, touching the degree of certainty with which the affidavit, warrant of arrest, and commitment should specify the offence, I pass over their form in this case, with the simple remark, that they are extremely general, not to say vague and uncertain. One charge appears to be founded on the fourth section of the act of February 26th, 1853 (10 Stat. 170), entitled "An act to prevent frauds upon the treasury of the United States." It alleges, that the defendant, on the 1st day of November, 1864, within this district, "did knowingly attempt to destroy certain public records of the United States," without stating what records. The other charge is, that the prisoner "did knowingly and wilfully engage in giving aid and comfort to the then existing rebellion against the authority of the United States, and against the laws thereof." This offence, also, is alleged to have been committed in this district. This charge is grounded on the 2d section of the act of July 17th, 1862 (12 Stat. 590). The warrant of arrest contains the same charges, and the order of commitment is endorsed on the warrant of arrest, and refers to the charges within the same. It also states, that the commissioner has examined into the offences charged, according to law, and commits the accused to the custody of the marshal, to be by him held, in default of bail, to await the action of the grand jury.

By the decision of the commissioner rendered before the final commitment, he appears to have held that the charge of attempting to destroy public records of the United States was not made out, and that, therefore, the prisoner was entitled to his discharge, so far as that ground was concerned. It seems, however, that he was of opinion that the general charge of having given aid and comfort to the then existing rebellion, was so far supported as to warrant the commitment of the prisoner. It is only necessary, therefore, as I concur in the opinion of the commissioner as to the charge of attempting to destroy public records, to consider the evidence touching the charge of giving aid and comfort to the rebellion. I shall not dwell at any length upon this evidence, but, as the commissioner informs me that the copy furnished to me is substantially correct, I shall direct the clerk to append the same to, and file it with, this opinion.

An examination of the whole evidence taken on the hearing shows, that the prisoner was in New York about the time of an alleged attempt to burn that city, under suspicious circumstances; and the principal facts which are legal evidence at all, are, first, that he went under an assumed name; and, second, that he was, more or less, in company with certain characters to whom suspicions had attached, and one of whom was subsequently executed by the military authorities, as one of the incendiaries. I assume, rather than decide, that the second fact was admissible evidence against the prisoner. The intelligent assistant district attorney clearly saw that these facts, as they then stood on the proofs, only raised a general suspicion that the prisoner was here for no good purpose; and, in order to make out a case which would warrant the commitment of the accused, he offered evidence of certain declarations made by other parties, some or all of which were made in Canada, and none of them in the presence of the prisoner. The primary tendency of these declarations was, to establish the charge in the affidavit and warrant, of attempting to destroy public records, by burning the city. These declarations were made after the attempt had been consummated, and, so far as can be judged by the proofs, after the alleged conspiracy for that object had terminated. They were, therefore, inadmissible for that purpose; for, the admissions of an alleged co-conspirator, made after the conspiracy has terminated, and not in the presence of the accused, are not evidence against the latter. The commissioner appears to have taken this view of the law, and to have exonerated the prisoner from the alleged attempt to destroy public records by fire.

The only feature of the evidence, from which it can be in any manner inferred that the prisoner, at any time, within this district, gave aid and comfort to the rebellion, is that which was supposed to connect him with those fires. The destruction of the city by fire, involving the destruction of the public records of the United States, was the only act of aiding the rebellion, committed here, of which the evidence gives the remotest suspicion. The commissioner, as I have already stated, decided, and properly decided, that probable cause in support of this fact was not made out. The fact having failed, the inference fails also. It will, I presume, not be contended that the color of the defendant's carpet-bag, or the fact that he had a small amount of gold, supplies any material evidence in the case.

Some testimony was taken tending to show that the prisoner had been an officer in the rebel army. This was obtained from General Whittaker, one of the counsel for the prisoner on this very hearing, by putting him upon the stand as a witness for the prosecution. After the declaration of this witness that he had no personal knowledge about the prisoner during the rebellion except what he had learned from him in his capacity as counsel, the commissioner should not have permitted the examination to be further pressed. I need not cite authorities, or adduce reasons, in support of the inviolability of communications which pass between counsel and client. The highest considerations known to the law guard this relation with jealous solicitude. But, even if the personal knowledge of General Whittaker were admissible, the reputation of the prisoner as a rebel, upon which he was questioned, was wholly inadmissible. And, if we assume that it was legally proved on the hearing, that he had been in the rebel army, this would not tend to show that he had committed a crime in this district, unless the fact was in some manner connected with an unlawful act done here. As I have already remarked, the only act done here, to which the evidence relates, is the alleged attempt to burn the city; and of this the commissioner found no proof which would warrant him in deciding that probable cause had been made out.

It follows, from these views, that there was no sufficient evidence to warrant the commitment of the prisoner for trial in this district. He must, therefore, be discharged from custody under this warrant or order of commitment, and a proper order will be entered to that effect.

District Court, W. D. North Carolina.

BANKRUPTCY — EXEMPTION — HOUSEHOLD FURNITURE—TAKEN UNDER EXECUTION.

A bankrupt is entitled to an exemption of his household furniture, and other necessary articles, although they were taken under an execution prior to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy.

In bankruptcy.

DICK, District Judge. Upon the question of law certified by the register of this court, I have had the benefit of well-considered arguments, and the counsel for the bankrupt filed an elaborate brief referring to all the authorities to be found on the subject. No express decision upon the question in controversy has been cited, and we are left to determine the matter upon the "reason of the thing,"—to be ascertained by a consideration of the spirit and policy of the bankrupt laws.

Under the constitution congress has a paramount power to establish bankrupt laws, with a single restriction—that all such laws must be uniform in their operation in all states. The present bankrupt laws are highly remedial statutes, and are entitled to a liberal construction in effecting the purposes they were intended to accomplish. The general purpose and policy of these laws are to administer the estates of bankrupts in such a manner as to adjust, determine, and secure the rights of the various creditors who prove their debts; and they also afford reasonable benefits to the bankrupts who comply with their provisions.

These laws protect the rights of creditors: First. By requiring an honest surrender of the property on the part of the bankrupt, and by making suitable provisions to guard against fraud and dishonest practices. Second. By adjusting the rights of unsecured creditors upon the principle that equality is equity. They, however, fully recognize and enforce all liens and priorities acquired by other creditors, which are not in conflict with the spirit and purposes of the general system of bankruptcy.

The benefits conferred upon a bankrupt who makes a fair surrender of all his property, and who in all respects acts honestly, are: First. The means of a reasonable, immediate, and temporary support for himself and family against all liens created by operation of law. Second. A full discharge from all debts provable in bankruptcy.

The means of support thus allowed are expressly specified in the law, and consist of: First. The bounties directly conferred by congress in the first clause of the 14th section of the original bankrupt act (Rev. St. § 5045). Second. Exemptions allowed by the statutes of the state in which the bankrupt has his domicil, and which were in force in the year 1871.

Even a strict construction of those clauses of the law which confer the bounties of congress would allow the bankrupt the specified exemptions of household furniture and other property for the support of himself and family against all liens which he had not created by a direct act incumbering the property claimed by him. Congress has plenary power upon this subject, if its laws are everywhere uniform in their operation. The clauses of the law which we are considering are certainly uniform in their operation, and may be regarded as fundamental and essential principles in the system of bankruptcy so wisely established. Any system of bankruptcy would operate injuriously and cruelly that would deprive an honest and unfortunate debtor of all his property—even the necessaries of life—and leave him and his family to starve, or upon the mercy or charity of the public. Such cannot be the spirit and purposes of a system of bankruptcy established by a congress possessing paramount and plenary power over the subject, and representing an enlightened, patriotic, and Christian people. In our case the exemptions allowed by the state laws were set apart by the sheriff before he levied the executions in his hands. Under the state laws the levy would have been unlawful if the sheriff had not previously set apart such exemptions. This matter is not in controversy, and I refer to it only for the purpose of sustaining my views upon the question presented for determination. If the exemptions provided for by the laws of a state—which can exercise only very limited power over the subject—are set apart and allowed, how is it possible that the rights of a bankrupt secured by the law of a congress of plenary power can be defeated?

The question decided in this court in Re Shipman [Case No. 12,791], carrying out the principles adjudged in Re Dillard [Id. 3,912] and in Re Deckert [Id. 3,728], does not apply to the case before the court, as in that case it was only decided that state exemptions are not allowed against debts contracted before the adoption of our state constitution.

I deem it unnecessary to further discuss the question certified by the register. I am of the opinion that the bankrupt was entitled to the exemptions which he claimed, and I will direct an order to be drawn requiring the sheriff to pay over to the clerk of this court, for the benefit of the bankrupt, the money derived from the sale of the property, which he holds under a former order of this court.

District Court, S. D. New York. April 26, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY — DISCHARGE — EXEMPT PROPERTY — DELAY IN APPLICATION.

A bankrupt who had no assets except certain property set apart as exempt, failed to apply for a discharge within a year after adjudication of bankruptcy. Held, that the granting of a discharge was not a right, but a favor conditioned upon the performance of certain requirements of the statute, and the failure to make said application would preclude a discharge.

In bankruptcy

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In this case the original voluntary petition of the bankrupt was filed on the 12th of July, 1867. He was adjudged a bankrupt by the register on the 18th of July, 1867. His application for a discharge was filed on the 5th of January, 1869. It is drawn according to form No. 51, and does not contain any averment that no debts have been proved against the bankrupt or any averment that no assets have come to the hands of the assignee. On this application an order to show cause against a discharge was made by the register, returnable April 10th, 1869. The only debt proved against the bankrupt is one which was proved on the 10th of April, 1869. The only assets set forth in schedule B to the petition are seventy-six dollars and fifty cents worth of exempt property, all of which the assignee has set apart to the bankrupt under the fourteenth section of the act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 522)]. The assignee makes return that no assets have come to his hands as assignee of the bankrupt.

This case, therefore, is one in which, under section twenty-nine of the act, the bankrupt could have applied for his discharge within less than six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy, namely, at any time after the expiration of sixty days from the adjudication of bankruptcy. But it was said in the case of In re Greenfield [Case No. 5,775], by this court, on the strength of a decision made by Mr. Justice Nelson, that in a case where the bankrupt could, under section twenty-nine, apply for his discharge within less than six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy, he must so apply within one year from such adjudication. It is urged that the provision in section twenty-nine, as to the making of the application within one year from the adjudication, is merely directory; but I cannot so regard it. If it is merely directory, it is meaningless, and might as well not have been inserted in the section. Congress must have intended to apply the restriction of an application within one year to some cases, and if it be not applied to a case like the present one, it can have no application. The privilege of a discharge is given, by section thirty-three, only to a person who has, in all things, conformed to his duty under the act, and who has conformed to all the requirements of the act. One of these requirements is that the application in this case be made within one year from the adjudication. The discharge is a favor granted on a compliance with conditions prescribed, and not a right. I must, therefore, refuse a discharge in this case, until directed otherwise by superior authority.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York.[2]

SLAVERY — FUGITIVE SLAVE ACT — ARREST—EXAMINATION—TRIAL BY JURY—MATTERS OF FACT.

1. The act of congress empowering persons claiming the services of a fugitive slave, to seize or arrest him and take him before a magistrate, &c., makes no provision for the issuing of any process for the purpose of authorizing such arrest; and it has never been the practice, under that law, to issue any such process.

2. When the alleged fugitive is brought before the magistrate, the latter acquires jurisdiction of the case, and authority to proceed with the inquiry, whether the person so seized and brought before him doth, under the laws of the state from which he fled, owe service or labor to the person claiming him.

3. While such examination is pending, the party is in the custody of the law, and the magistrate has authority to imprison him for safe keeping. And during such examination, process issuing out of this court to an United States officer to take the alleged fugitive from the custody of the state officer, would be illegal.

4. The writ de homine replegiando, though nearly obsolete, is a common law proceeding, applicable to a trial of the question of slavery.

5. The act of congress relative to the reclamation of fugitive slaves, is constitutional and valid.

6. The object of the inquiry before the magistrate is only for the purpose of sanctioning the seizure or arrest, and authorizing the removal of the fugitive to the state from which he fled, and does not contemplate a trial on the merits.

7. The right of trial by jury, secured by the 7th article of the amendments of the constitution, is the trial according to the course of the common law, and is confined to matters of fact only. And the inquiry before the magistrate under this act of congress, so far as the question of slavery is involved, is a question of law, and not a question of fact.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. This is a motion to quash the writs de homine replegiando, issued out of, and made returnable in this court, by which the marshal is commanded that he cause to be replevied Peter Martin, otherwise called Lewis Martin, a citizen of the state of New York, (whom John Enders and John Grace, citizens of the state of Virginia, have taken and do keep,) &c. From the affidavits upon which this motion is founded, it appears that Peter was claimed as the slave of John Enders, and owed labor and service to him, at the city of Richmond, in the state of Virginia, from whence he had escaped. Upon satisfactory proof of these facts being given to the recorder of New York, he allowed a habeas corpus, upon which Peter was taken and brought before him. But before the recorder had decided upon the case, the writs of homine replegiando were issued to the marshal of this district, and the custody of Peter was transferred from the sheriff to the marshal. Certain proceedings were afterwards had in the supreme court of the state, which it is not material here to notice. At a subsequent day, to wit, on the 20th of October last, Peter was brought before the recorder, who, after having heard the proofs and allegations of the parties, granted a certificate, according to the provisions of the act of congress of February, 1793, — 2 Bi. & D. 331 [1 Stat. 302].

It is not material to examine whether or not the recorder had authority to allow a habeas corpus to bring before him the party examined as a slave. This course was probably adopted in conformity to the act of the legislature of this state. But the view we have taken of this case does not involve an inquiry into the validity of that law. The supreme court of this state has declared it unconstitutional and void. It is understood, however, that a writ of error has been brought upon that judgment, which is now pending before the court of errors; and it does not become this court unnecessarily to volunteer an opinion upon that question. Admitting the recorder had no authority to allow a habeas corpus, yet when the party was brought before him he acquired jurisdiction of the case, unless the act of congress is unconstitutional and void. That law empowers the persons claiming the services of the fugitive, to seize or arrest him, and take him before a magistrate, &c. No provision is made for the issuing of any process for the purpose of authorizing such arrest; and so far as our knowledge extends, it has never been the practice under that law to issue any such process. But the issuing or allowing the process cannot affect the jurisdiction of the magistrate. It must be deemed the act of the claimant, and if he had a right to arrest the fugitive without any process, that right is not taken away or relinquished by having such process. The recorder, therefore, had jurisdiction of the case, and authority to proceed in the inquiry, whether the person so seized and brought before him doth, under the laws of the state from which he fled, owe service or labor to the person claiming him. This inquiry may take up some time, and require some delay for the purpose of procuring testimony; and whilst such examination is pending, the party must be deemed in the custody of the law, and the magistrate must necessarily have authority to imprison him for safe keeping. When, therefore, the writs of homine replegiando were served, the fugitive was taken out of the custody of the law; and this was an illegal execution of those writs whether the habeas corpus was void or not. If it was valid, the fugitive was in the custody of the sheriff of the city and county of New York, a state officer. And to permit the marshal, a United States officer, under a process issuing out of this court to take a party from the custody of the state officer, would be sanctioning a conflict that might be very serious in its consequences, and cannot be justified or excused. But if the habeas corpus was void, the execution of the writs of homine replegiando was illegal, for the fugitive was either in the custody of the law under the order of the recorder, or was in the custody of the claimant. If in the custody of the law, it was irregular to execute the writs pending the examination before the recorder, and if in custody of the claimant, a penalty of five hundred dollars is incurred by any person who shall knowingly and willingly obstruct the claimant in seizing or arresting such fugitive, or shall rescue such fugitive from such claimant when so arrested.

It will be perceived that this opinion, thus far, has assumed the act of congress to be a valid and constitutional law. But the objections that have been raised against the proceedings under the homine replegiando, have been attempted to be surmounted by endeavoring to show that that law is unconstitutional and void, and that, of course, the arrest of the fugitive by the claimant was illegal; and that all the proceedings before the recorder were coram non judice, and furnished no objection to the service of the writs of homine replegiando, or justification for obtaining the fugitive. If the act of congress is unconstitutional and void, we see no objection to the issuing of a homine replegiando, to try the question of slavery. It is a common law proceeding applicable to such a case; and although nearly obsolete, we cannot deny to the party the right of resorting to it. Whether the writs in the present case, and the proceedings under them, are regular and according to the course of the common law, it is unnecessary to inquire, as we are clearly of opinion that the act of congress is a valid and constitutional law, and that the writs of homine replegiando must be set aside for irregularity. The great objection which has been urged against this law is, that it deprives the party of the trial by jury, which, it is said, is a common law right, secured under the 7th article of the amendments to the constitution. If the inquiry before the magistrate was a trial upon the merits, and conclusive upon the question of slavery, there would be great force in the objection; but it is not. It is only a preliminary examination to authorize the claimant to take back the fugitive to the state from whence he fled, and the question whether he is a slave or not is open to inquiry there, and we cannot listen for a moment to any suggestion that this question will not be then fairly and impartially tried. Reference to the act of congress will show such to be its provisions. It declares that, "where a person held to labor in any of the states, &c., under the laws thereof, shall escape into any other of the said states or territories, the person to whom such labor or service may be due, his agent or attorney, is empowered to seize or arrest such fugitive from labor, and take him or her before some judge or magistrate, (designated in the act,) and upon proof, to the satisfaction of such judge or magistrate, that the person so seized or arrested doth, under the laws of the state or territory from which he or she fled from service or labor, owe service or labor to the person claiming him or her, it shall be the duty of such judge or magistrate to give a certificate thereof to such claimant, which shall be a sufficient warrant for removing such fugitive from labor, to the state or territory from which he or she fled."

The object of the inquiry before the magistrate is clearly for the purpose only of sanctioning the seizure or arrest, and authorizing the removal of the fugitive to the state from which he fled. This necessarily involves an inquiry as to the identity of the person, as well as the question, whether, by the laws of the state from which he fled, he owes service or labor to the person claiming him. The magistrate must be satisfied that the person so brought before him does owe such service, and the examination is limited to these two questions, and depends upon proof being made satisfactory to the magistrate upon these two points. If this was intended to be a final determination of the question of slavery, the law would, doubtless, have declared the freedom of the slave to be thereby established, and it would be a judicial proceeding which would, under the constitution of the United States, be binding in each state. The magistrates designated in the act, who are authorized to entertain this inquiry, clearly show it would not be intended as a trial upon the merits of the case. It may be made before any judge of the circuit or district courts of the United States, residing or being within the state, or before any magistrate of a county, city or town corporate wherein such seizure or arrest shall be made. The 7th article of the amendments to the constitution does not apply to any such preliminary inquiries. It declares that, "in suits at common law, when the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." It is unnecessary to determine whether this amendment is not limited to suits involving a trial of the right of property merely, which is susceptible of valuation, and not to a question of personal liberty, which admits of no pecuniary valuation. But admitting that the trial upon the merits, under the homine replegiando, or any other mode of proceeding which is final upon the question of slavery, would fall within this amendment, and would require a trial by jury, it by no means follows that, for the purposes contemplated by this act of congress, the right of trial by jury is secured. If it is, it is secured in every case where a fugitive from justice is demanded according to the provisions of the same act of congress; and, indeed, it is secured in every possible case of arrest upon a criminal charge; for the identity of the person and prima facie evidence of guilt are subjects of inquiry, upon every such arrest. But another reason may be assigned why this amendment of the constitution has no bearing upon the law in question; the right of trial by jury, secured by this amendment, is the trial according to the course of the common law, and is confined to matters of fact only. All questions of law arising upon suits at common law, are decided by the court; and the inquiry before the magistrate, under this act of congress, so far as the question of slavery is involved, is a question of law and not a question of fact. The magistrate is to inquire whether, under the laws of the state or territory from which the fugitive fled, he owes service or labor to the person claiming him. But it is said that congress has no power to legislate at all upon this subject, there being no express delegation of such power in the constitution. The provision in the constitution is (article 4, § 2): "No person held to service or labor in one state, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due." This provision contains a prohibition to the states to pass any law discharging the persons escaping from the labor or service which he owes to another; and all such laws would be null and void, and no positive legislation might be necessary on the subject. But to secure the benefit of the latter part of the provision, some legislation on the subject, either by congress or by the states, is indispensable. It declares that the party escaping shall be delivered up to the party to whom he owes labor and service; but the mode and manner in which this is to be done and enforced must be provided for by law: the constitution makes no provision on that subject, and it cannot be presumed that it was intended to leave this to state legislation. There is no express injunction upon the states to pass any laws on the subject; and unless they choose to do it, the great benefit intended to be secured to slaveholders would be entirely defeated. We know, historically, that this was a subject that created great difficulty in the formation of the constitution, and that it resulted in a compromise not entirely satisfactory to a portion of the United States. But whatever our private opinions on the subject of slavery may be, we are bound in good faith to carry into execution the constitutional provisions in relation to it; and it would be an extravagant construction of this provision in the constitution, to suppose it to be left discretionary in the states to comply with it or not, as they should think proper.

We are, accordingly, of opinion that the act of congress under which the certificate of the recorder was given, is a valid and constitutional law, and that the writs of homine replegiando were irregularly issued, and must be set aside.

The subject of the reclamation of fugitive slaves was very fully discussed by Chief Justice Shaw in Sim's Case, 7 Cush. 285. And see, also, Dixon v. Allender, 18 Wend. 678.

MARTIN v. ACKER.

[1 Blatchf. & H. 279.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. July 9, 1831.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—HAND ON SLOOP—ACTION IN PERSONAM—ACCOUNT STATED.

1. A hand on board a sloop of over fifty tons burthen plying on the Hudson river, between New-York and Catskill, is a seaman; and an action in personam brought by him against the master and owner of the sloop, to recover his wages, is within the jurisdiction of this court.

2. The respondent in such action is bound by his acquiescence in an account stated.

This was an action in personam, for seaman's wages. The defence was, that the libellant [Levi Martin] was not a seaman but a boatman, that the matter claimed was not within the jurisdiction of the court, and that the demand had been satisfied. The libellant served as a hand, and as captain's clerk, on board a sloop of over fifty tons burthen, belonging to the respondent [Jacob Acker], and assisted in navigating her for two seasons up and down the North river, between New York and Catskill. The respondent was also master of the vessel during the time the libellant's services were rendered.

Edwin Burr and Erastus C. Benedict, for libellant.

Charles W. Sandford, for respondent.

BETTS, District Judge. The laws of the United States assume the regulation of all vessels of the description of the one on which the libellant served. They must be enrolled or licensed, and the men must pay hospital money the same as if on board sea-going vessels,—Act Feb. 18, 1793 (1 Stat. 305); Act July 16, 1798 (1 Stat. 695),—and, since the decision in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1, there can be no longer a doubt that the navigation from port to port in a particular state, is equally subject to the authority of the general government with that from state to state. Those employed in conducting that navigation are properly denominated seamen. The statute which makes provision for the recovery of seamen's wages, supplies no remedy in their case, it being limited to vessels "bound from a port of the United States to any foreign port," and to vessels "of the burthen of fifty tons or upwards, bound from a port in one state to a port in any other than an adjoining state." Act July 20, 1790 (1 Stat. 131). But that statute is never construed as interfering with the privileges of seamen under the law maritime, further than to determine the manner in which suits shall be commenced. It has, accordingly, been decided in several of the courts of the United States, after full consideration, that the remedies of the maritime law apply to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction on the rivers of the United States which are navigable to the sea for boats of ten tons burthen and upwards. Serg. Const. Law (2d Ed.) 195, 196. In the case of The Thomas Jefferson, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 428, the doctrines before recognised as having relation to all navigable waters, were restrained to waters within the ebb and flow of the tide. It is difficult to discern any principle upon which that limitation can be applied to one description of navigable waters in the United States more than to another. Contracts with seamen, performed or contemplated to be performed on the high seas, or within the ebb and flow of the tide, come under the admiralty jurisdiction, within the most rigorous construction of its extent; and the jurisdiction is not lost, though the voyage is to commence or end beyond the reach of the tide. The whole of the services claimed for in this case having been rendered upon tide waters, the subject matter of the suit falls within the cognizance of this court.

The libellant's account for his services was submitted to the respondent, each item of charge and credit was distinctly stated to him, and he made no objection to its correctness, but agreed to settle it, as stated, in a few days. One witness swears that he offered to give his note for the balance, payable in a few days. Another says, that he understood the respondent to say that a payment of $15 84 ought to be credited, and that he and the libellant would settle the residue between themselves in a few days. The respondent now claims, in addition to the credits stated upon the account, payment for boarding the libellant during the winter, on the vessel, at the rate of $2 or $3 per week. The respondent's witness who proves the boarding states, also, that he considered the libellant as being in the respondent's employment during the time. As the board was not claimed when the account was stated and the balance acquiesced in, the inference to be drawn from all the evidence is, that the respondent considered the board as satisfied by other services of the libellant, or by payment, and that it is now set up by the respondent out of resentment at the institution of a suit for the wages. This charge is disallowed.

The libellant collected two bills for wood sold, after he left the respondent's employ. These sums are to be credited on his account. On a report by the clerk of the amount due, a decree may be entered for the balance, with costs.

Case No. 9,156.

MARTIN v. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

[4 Wash. C. C. 253.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1821.

BANKS—NOTES ISSUED—PART OF NOTE LOST—RIGHT TO BE PAID FULL AMOUNT.

If the owner of a bank note of the bank of the United States cut it into two parts, and send those parts by mail, and one part be lost, and the other arrives safe, he is entitled to recover the whole sum from the bank; and this although the bank had previously given notice that in such cases they would not pay unless both parts were produced.

[Cited in Bank of United States v. Sill, 5 Conn. 110–113; Tower v. Appleton Bank, 85 Mass. 390; Hagerstown Bank v. Adams Express Co., 45 Pa. St. 429.]

Case agreed. On the 11th of December, 1820, the plaintiff owned and possessed sundry promissory notes called bank notes, drawn and signed in due form by and on behalf of the defendants, whereby they promised to pay to different persons, or bearer, on demand, the several sums mentioned in the said notes, which were of the description following: one note, letter A, No. 583, for $100, payable to Benjamin Morgan or bearer; fifteen notes for $20 each, payable in like manner, and of the following letters and numbers, viz. H, 1492, G, 1489, &c., &c.; nine notes for $10 each, payable in like manner, and of the following letters and numbers, viz. I, 1576, &c.; and one note for $10, payable to J. C. Faber or bearer, E, No. 1566: making together the sum of $500. That on the same day, the agent of the plaintiff, then being at Cincinnati in the state of Ohio, divided each of the said notes into two nearly equal parts, and thereupon indorsed the right hand parts of the said notes in a letter which he thereupon sealed, and addressed by indorsement or superscription to the plaintiff in Philadelphia, and on the same day placed the same in the post office at Cincinnati aforesaid. That the said letter, nor any one of the said halves of notes has not since come to the plaintiff's hands, but all the said halves of notes have been stolen, lost, or destroyed. That the left hand halves of the said notes were indorsed in another letter, and placed in the same office on the succeeding day, and are now in the possession of the plaintiff. That the plaintiff presented the said halves to the defendants before the institution of this suit, and demanded payment of the same, and at the same time offered to the defendants a good and sufficient bond of indemnity to indemnify them against all claims, payments, costs, or damages which might arise, or which the defendants might be compelled to make or incur in consequence of the said right hand moieties, or any of them. But the defendants refused to accept the said bond of indemnity, or to pay the said notes, or any part thereof. That the notes of the Bank of the United States of the description of those before mentioned, are numbered only on the right hand halves, and lettered on the left hand halves; that the signature of the president is on the right half, and that of the cashier on the left hand half, and there is no known mark, letter, or number, on either half of such a note by which its connexion with the opposite half of the same note is certainly established after the note has been divided. The same letter has numbers from 1 to any number the necessities of the bank require; and the same number is given to four letters, namely, A, B, C, D, but to no more; so that any number may belong to any one of those four letters, but to no more. On the 24th of August, 1819, or as soon as practicable after that date, the defendants published an advertisement, of which a copy is hereto annexed, in all the newspapers in the city of Philadelphia, and in the National Intelligencer at Washington; a copy was sent to each of the offices of discount and deposit of the bank, and published in one or more newspapers in their respective neighbourhoods.

The notice above referred to is as follows: "Notice is hereby given that the Bank of the United States will not, after the 1st day of November 1819, hold itself responsible upon any of its notes which shall be voluntarily cut into parts, except on the production of all the parts."

Mr. Binney, for plaintiff, insisted that, independent of the notice the question involved in this case has been decided, first by this court in the year 1808, in the case of Bullet v. Bank of Pennsylvania [Case No. 2,125], and afterwards in the case of Patton v. State Bank [2 Nott & McC. 464]; also by the circuit court for the District of Columbia, in the case of Armat v. Union Bank of Georgetown [Case No. 535]. He also read 3 Camp. 323, in which Lord Ellenborough had decided otherwise at nisi prius. Mossop v. Eden, 16 Ves. 430; Chitty, Bills (last English Ed.) 190, 201. He contended that the case was not altered by the notice; that it was not competent to the bank to vary the rules of law and of evidence; and to prescribe the terms upon which she would pay her notes, or under what circumstances she would refuse to do so.

Mr. Sergeant, for the bank, admitted that the practice of cutting bank notes for the purpose of transmitting the parts in letters by different mails, from one place to another, was sanctioned by a usage too inveterate to be now condemned. But he pointed out the expense to which it exposed the bank, and the difficulty which the loss of one of the halves occasioned to this bank in particular in identifying the note, and guarding against fraud and imposition. That, strictly speaking, a man has no legal right voluntarily to mutilate the evidence of a debt, and that it was competent to the bank to rid herself of the effects of a contrary usage, by a public notice that she would not pay any thing unless both parts of the note are produced. He admitted that if a negotiable note, which passes by delivery be destroyed, or if other evidences of debt be lost, the owner may resort to inferior evidence to prove his demand, and that a court of common law will afford him relief. But if a note payable to bearer be lost, and may therefore be yet in existence, and in the hands of a bona fide holder, the owner can be relieved only in equity, where alone an indemnity can be provided. As to the notice, he insisted that the right to cut a bank note, and to demand payment upon the production of one of the halves, are not incidents so inseparably connected with such notes, that the bank might not guard herself against impositions to which the practice exposed her, by the means which the defendants had resorted to.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. I have carefully reviewed the decision of this court in the case of Bullet v. Bank of Pennsylvania [Case No. 2,125], aided by the light shed upon the question involved in that and in the present case by the able arguments of the counsel on each side. My opinion remains unchanged, and is indeed confirmed by the two American cases cited at the bar, and particularly by the luminous argument of Judge Drayton in the case of Patton v. State Bank [supra]. The principles upon which this court decided the case of Bullet v. Bank of Pennsylvania were, that a bank, or any other promissory note, is the evidence of a debt due by the maker to the holder of it, and nothing more. It is also the highest species of evidence of such debt, and in fact the only proper evidence, if it be in the power of the owner of the note to produce it. But if it be lost or destroyed, or by fraud or accident has got into the possession of the maker, the owner does not thereby lose his debt, but the same continues to exist in all its rigour, unaffected by the accident which has deprived the owner of the means of proving it by the note itself. The debt still existing, the law, which always requires of a party that he should produce the best evidence of his right of which the nature of the thing is capable, permits him, where such better evidence is lost or destroyed, or not in his power, to give inferior evidence, by proving the contents of the lost paper; and if this be satisfactorily made out, he is entitled to recover. If the evidence be not lost, but is merely impaired by accident, or even by design, if such design be not to injure the maker or to cancel the debt, the principle of law is the same. Cutting a bank note into two parts does not discharge the bank from the debt, of which the note was but the evidence, nor does it even impair the evidence itself, if, by uniting the parts, the contents of the entire note can be made out. If one of the parts should be lost or destroyed, the debt would be no more affected than if the entire parts had been lost or destroyed. The evidence is impaired indeed, not by the act of cutting the note, but by the same accident which would have affected the entire note, had that been lost. In both cases, the owner must resort to secondary evidence, and is bound to prove that the note did once exist, that it is lost or destroyed, and that he is the true, bona fide owner of the debt. If one part only of the note be lost, the difficulty which the real owner of it has to encounter in proving his right to the debt is diminished. For if the entire note be lost, the owner of it at the time of the accident may not be entitled to the debt of which it was the evidence, at the time he demands payment, because the note, passing from hand to hand by bare delivery, may have been found, and have got into the possession of a bona fide holder. But against the real owner of one half of the note, there cannot possibly be an opposing right. The finder or robber of the other half part cannot assert a right to the debt, because he cannot prove that he came fairly to the possession of the evidence of it. I speak judicially, when I say that he cannot prove that fact, because he cannot do it without the aid of perjury, which the law does not presume, and can in no instance guard against it. If the lost half note gets fairly into the hands of a third person, he takes it with notice that there may be a better title in the possession of the other half, and consequently he looks for indemnity to the person from whom he received the half part, if it should turn out that he was not the real owner of the entire note. It is impossible, therefore, that the bank can be legally called upon to pay the note twice; and if the officers of the institution suffer themselves to be imposed upon by insufficient or false evidence, by which means the bank is brought into this predicament, she must abide the loss as being occasioned by an error of judgment in the officers of the bank, or their want of due caution. The law cannot adapt its provisions to every possible case that may occur, and it therefore proceeds from necessity upon general principles applicable to all cases.

If upon any other ground than fraud, or perjury, the maker of the lost note may by possibility be twice charged, the law will not expose him to that risk by relieving the asserted owner, of it; not because there may be imposition in the case, or because the debt ought not to be paid; but because the proof that the claimant is the real owner of the debt is defective; for it by no means follows, that, because the lost note did belong to him, that it may not then be the property of some other person. A court of law therefore will, in such a case, dismiss the parties from a forum which has no means of securing the maker of the note against a double charge, and leave him to one where those who ask of it equity will be compelled to do equity. The case then resolves itself very much into a question of jurisdiction. For it is quite clear that the real owner of the debt, the evidence of which is lost, is entitled to supply the want of the better evidence by that which is secondary, and this rule of evidence is the same in equity as at law. But whether the application for relief shall be in the one court, or in the other, must depend upon the particular case, and its fitness for the one jurisdiction or the other.

Many difficulties were stated by the defendants' counsel, to which the practice of cutting the notes and transmitting them by mail, exposes banking institutions in identifying the part of a note when produced for payment. That these difficulties do in a measure exist, must be admitted. But the bank knows that there can be but one owner of the note, and who that one is, must be satisfactorily proved, to entitle him to payment of it. The bank has a just right to call for such proof; and if it be truly and faithfully given, there can be no risk in paying it. The possessor of the other half part of the note, as already observed, by whatever means he acquired it, can never oblige the bank to pay the money over again to him. But after all, the rule of law does not rest upon this circumstance. The maker of the note is bound to pay to the person who proves himself to be the legal owner of it; and the difficulties complained of, are not greater than those which attend most litigated questions.

It may not be improper here to observe, that the decision in the case of Bullet v. Bank of Pennsylvania [supra] did not proceed upon any usage applicable to the case. None such was stated in the case agreed, or alluded to by the court.

The next question is new;—no case like it was cited at the bar, nor is there any within the recollection of the court. It is nevertheless within the range of some general principles of law, by the light of which I think it may be decided. The question is, whether it was competent to the bank to notify the holders of her notes, that in case they should be voluntarily cut into parts, she would not pay them, unless all the parts should be brought together? I mean to treat the question as if the notice were brought home to the plaintiff. It is unnecessary, in this case, to decide how far parties to a contract may, by positive stipulations, change the rules of evidence applicable to that particular contract. If they may do so, it must be upon the basis of an agreement assented to by both parties. But upon what principle is it, that one party to a contract can prescribe terms to absolve himself from its obligations, without the assent of the other? I know of none. If the bank can dictate to the holders of her notes the condition stated in this notice, upon the performance of which, and not otherwise, she would pay them; she might with equal authority prescribe any other condition, and declare in what case she would pay, and in what case she would not. The note is the evidence of an engagement by the bank to pay a certain sum of money to the bearer of it; and the general law of the land declares, that if such note, or a part of it, should be lost, or destroyed, the debt shall nevertheless be paid, upon satisfactory proof being made of the ownership and loss. Thus sanctioned, these notes pass from hand to hand; and if the bank can nevertheless discharge herself from her obligation to pay them, unless both parts of the note be produced, or unless the note be produced entire, (and there is no difference between the two cases,) then the arbitrary declaration of the bank must be stronger than the law. This observation applies with equal force to every other species of contract, where one of the parties to it attempts to prescribe to the other the rules of evidence by which alone he will be governed.

I thought the defendants' counsel seemed unwilling to contend, that the bank could go the length of declaring that they would not pay a lost note, or one which had been torn or defaced by accident. But if the court be correct in their opinion upon the first point, it follows, that the law as much compels the bank to pay the owner of half a note, where the other half is lost, as to pay in the two cases supposed; and if so, the right of the bank to prescribe terms in the one case, if admitted, would be equally valid in the others. There can be no difference, unless it be that in the one the notes were voluntarily cut, and in the other they were torn by accident. But the owner of the debt, being also the owner of the paper which is the evidence of it, he had a legal right to cut it, and by doing so, he could not impair the obligation, unless he intended to do so. In all these cases, the note is cut with a view to the security, not to the destruction of the debt, by doubling the chances of preserving part of the evidence of it, in case the other part should be lost. The defendants do not forbid, or condemn the practice, even if it could for a moment be admitted that they had a right to do either. That is not the gravamen stated in the notice; it is the production of one of the parts for payment, unaccompanied by the other part. That is the case in which the bank declares she will not pay, and in which the law pronounces she shall pay.

I am of opinion that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff.

Case No. 9,157.

MARTIN v. BARTOW IRON WORKS.

[35 Ga. 320.]

District Court, N. D. Georgia. Sept. Term, 1867.

PLEADING AT LAW—DUPLICITY—PLEAS IN BAR—DEMURRER—CONTRACTS UNDER SEAL—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION—ILLEGAL CONSIDERATION—HIRE OF NEGROES.

[1. A demurrer to a plea on the ground that it is double "in this, that it contains several distinct matters of defence, and also that said plaintiff cannot take or offer any certain issue upon said second plea," held insufficient, for failure to point out the particulars in which the duplicity consists.]

[2. In Georgia both a total and a partial failure of consideration may be set up as a defense to writings commonly known as sealed notes or single bills.]

[3. To an action upon a sealed note made in January, 1864, defendant set up, by one of his pleas, a failure of consideration in this, that the note was given for the hire of twenty negroes, claimed by the plaintiff at the time of said hiring as slaves, but who were in fact free under the laws of the United States and the proclamation of the president. Held, that the plea showed no failure of consideration, as it did not appear but that the negroes may have first hired themselves to plaintiff and the latter transferred their labor with their consent to defendant, or that plaintiff may have acted as their agent in the hiring and taken the notes in trust for them.]

[4. Held, further, that a similar plea alleging that the consideration was illegal in that the contract was in violation of the letter and spirit of the laws of the United States and the president's proclamation, was bad, because there was no legal distinction between the plaintiff's hiring these men to defendant and the men hiring themselves to defendant, there being no averment that they did not consent to be so hired, or that the contract was not performed by plaintiff.]

[5. A plea that the contract was made for the hire of negroes as slaves, and that it was part of the consideration of the contract that defendant was to remove said negroes away and keep them away from the territory within the lines of the Federal army for the purpose of preventing their liberation from their former state of servitude, held good as showing an illegal consideration, as the intent to prevent liberation was contrary to the settled policy of the government, and wicked in itself.]

[6. A plea that a note sued on was given with the express agreement that payment was to be made in Confederate treasury notes, and that said notes were prohibited by law to circulate, is bad, for plaintiff, having agreed to receive such notes in payment, has no right to ask a judgment for the amount of the note in "money."]

[This was an action at law by Ann V. Martin against the Bartow Iron Works, to recover money upon a sealed note. Heard on demurrers to the several pleas filed by the defendant.]

Hammond, Mynatt & Welborn, for plaintiff.
Brown & Pope, for defendant.

ERSKINE, District Judge. This is an action of debt brought by the plaintiff against the defendant on a sealed instrument, of which the following is a copy: "$3,000. On or before the 25th day of December next, I promise to pay Ann V. Martin, or order, three thousand dollars, for value received, as witness my hand and seal. Allatoona, January 6th, 1864. (Signed) T. J. Hightower, (L. S.) Supt. Bartow Iron Works."

To this action defendant pleaded nine pleas. The first was withdrawn. Replications were filed to the fifth and sixth, and issue joined. Special demurrers—several of which contained substantial objections also—were put into the second, third, fourth, seventh, eighth and ninth pleas. Defendant, in his second plea, alleges a total failure of consideration, and sets up affirmatively that the promise was made to the plaintiff in consideration of the hire of twenty negro men to work for defendant at the Iron Works in Bartow county, Georgia, for the year 1864, and that it was agreed, as a part of the contract of hiring, that if the Federal army approached near said county, defendant was to remove these hired men and their families, at the expense of plaintiff, and that no hire should be paid for the time lost by reason of said removal. Defendant then avers that the contingency thus provided for happened, and that he removed them to Macon, Georgia, and that there they were taken possession of by the authorities of the so-called Confederate states, and that he received no hire nor other benefit from their services. The third plea alleges a partial failure of consideration; but it is in all other respects substantially like the preceding one.

The demurrer to the second plea presents the following objections: That the plea is double in this, that it contains several distinct matters of defence, and that plaintiff cannot take or offer any certain issue upon said plea. Also, that defendant attempts to set up and plead a failure of consideration, and that the matters therein contained, in manner and form as therein pleaded, are not sufficient in law to show a failure of consideration, and that plaintiff is not, by law, bound to answer the same. Then follows the usual, but (I apprehend) useless formula, that the plea is inartificially pleaded, and is in other respects uncertain. The objections taken in the demurrer to the third plea are in language similar, and are stated substantially in like manner as those to the second plea.

Before giving the opinion of the court on the legal sufficiency or insufficiency of the pleadings in this case, I trust I may not be deemed obtrusive by the bar if I state, briefly, that the long and verbose manner in which pleadings are frequently drawn is unnecessarily laborious to the draftsman and fatiguing to the reader. Take, for example, the precedent for a general demurrer, as printed in the earlier editions of Chitty, and in other works on pleading, and it will be found attenuated to some dozen or fifteen lines, whereas, it would be as sufficient by the rules of good pleading, as understood by the fathers of the law, and equally as intelligible, if set forth in two or three. A general demurrer in the following form would, I apprehend, be sufficient in the case under consideration: "And the plaintiff, by her attorneys, Hammond, Mynatt and Welborn, says that the second, third, fourth, seventh, eighth and ninth pleas are not sufficient in law." Vide Steph. Pl. (8th Am. Ed.) 44. And I will here take occasion to repeat, concisely, what I said more at large in the case of Scott v. Planters' & Mechanics' Bank [unreported], that, while I have the honor to preside in this court, I will discourage, nay, discountenance, all the delicately cunning and curious devices that have crept into the science of pleading. The law, says Lord Coke, "speaketh by good pleading," and the day has arrived when this wise axiom of that great master of the common law is to be interpreted liberally. This is an age of progress and utilitarianism in law as in other sciences, and it is therefore high time that the subtleties, verbosities and useless disputations of the ancient pleader give way to common sense and common reason.

A general demurrer enables the party to assail every substantial imperfection in the pleadings of the opposite side without particularizing any of them in his demurrer; but if he thinks proper to point out the faults, this does not vitiate it. A special demurrer goes to the structure merely, and not to the substance, and it must distinctly and particularly specify wherein the defect lies; and, indeed, the statutes 27 Eliz. and 4 & 5 Anne, as it is said, oblige the party demurring to lay, as it were, his finger on the very point, otherwise the demurrer may not be noticed. 1 Salk. 219; Wils. 219; Snyder v. Croy, 2 Johns. 428. When a party demurs specially, he may, in argument, attack substantial errors.

The first point made in the demurrer to the second plea is, that it "is double, in this, that it contains several distinct matters of defence; and, also, that said plaintiff cannot take or offer any certain issue upon said second plea." It is an ancient and well settled rule that, if a pleading be double, it is bad on special demurrer; but the imperfection must, as we have seen, be pointed out in the demurrer. It is not sufficient to say that the plea is double, or that it contains two or several distinct matters, but the pleader must specially show wherein the duplicity consists (1 Tidd, Prac. 694); for, by pointing out the fault, the adverse party may amend, if he choose, or demand the judgment of the court on its sufficiency.

The objection for doubleness taken to the second plea has, and in like manner, been also taken to the third. This making the law equally applicable to the one as to the other, both may be passed upon together. Has the plaintiff, in this part or division of the demurrers to these pleas, or to either of them, come within the letter or spirit of the rule laid down? I think not. No duplicity—if there be any in one or both of these pleas—has been pointed out in the demurrer or disclosed in the argument.

Another objection—and it goes to the substance—is taken to the second and third pleas, namely: that defendant has attempted to set up in the second a total failure of consideration, and in the third a partial failure. And Mr. Mynatt, in his argument, contended that neither of these defences could be pleaded to a specialty. Such, doubtless, is the rule of the common law, as generally understood in England; but with us it has, in several of the states, been changed, or modified, by statutes; while in others, learned courts have, in a greater or less degree, relaxed this rigid rule, that substantial justice may be done speedily and with as little technical litigation as possible, and without circuity of action.

Whether the writing sued on in this action has all the attributes of the specialty of the common law, is not a question directly before the court for determination. The writing was executed in Georgia, and the contract was to be performed here; and the instrument being of a peculiar character, and not strictly speaking commercial paper, governed by the law merchant—though the promise is absolute, payable to order, and the sum certain—it ought to be given effect to and adjudged agreeably to the local law, and the construction given to such instruments by the local tribunals. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 1.

The distinction between specialties and simple contracts should be carefully preserved by the courts when the dignity of those contracts has not been interfered with by legislative enactments; for, in the payment of debts of deceased persons, and in other cases, the common law makes a distinction; but by the 25th section of the act of 1799 (Cobb's Dig. 1135), promissory notes and other liquidated demands are made of equal dignity with the bonds and other specialties. The act of December 26, 1836 (Cobb's Dig. 490), enables defendants to give in evidence a partial failure of consideration upon any contract, provided that it be pleaded only in such cases and under such circumstances, and between such parties as would now allow and admit the plea of total failure of consideration.

Albertson v. Holloway, 16 Ga. 377, was a suit on an instrument, in nearly every respect, like this. The defendant pleaded, among other defences, a partial failure of consideration. Plaintiff objected on the ground that no fraud or illegality was alleged in the contract, the same being under seal. The court below sustained the objection. A writ of error was taken, and the case went to the supreme court of the state, and it reversed the judgment.

The opinion of the court was delivered by Starnes, J., who, after commenting on the anomalous status of the instrument, used the following language: "Yet," said the judge, "we know that the rule we have been considering, has not been applied to ordinary promissory notes, but it has been the immemorial practice in our state to allow pleas of total failure of consideration (and of partial failure since the act of 1836) to suits on such notes."

From this it would seem to be the settled law of this state, that total as well as partial failure of consideration affords a good defence to writings, which are commonly known as sealed notes or single bills. And I can see no sound reason why matters which destroy the demand, as well as those which go to diminish it, may not be pleaded in defence of this action.

Withers v. Green, 9 How. [50 U. S. 213]. Action of debt on a single bill. This cause was brought by writ of error from the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of Alabama, to the supreme court. The law of that state places bonds, or any writing under seal, on the footing of promissory notes, and allows defendants, by special plea, to impeach, or go into the consideration of such in the same manner as if the writing had not been sealed. The opinion of the supreme court was pronounced by Mr. Justice Daniell, who, after reviewing the English and American cases, showing a relaxation of the old rule, and allowing the defendant to obtain justice in this way instead of driving him to a cross action, said: "But, however, the rule laid down by the courts of England, should be understood, it has repeatedly been decided by learned and able judges in our country, when acting, too, not in virtue of a statutory license or provision, but upon the principles of justice and convenience, and with a view of preventing litigation and expense, that when fraud has occurred in obtaining, or in the performance of contracts, or when there has been a failure of consideration, total or partial, or a breach of warranty, fraudulent or otherwise, all or any of these facts may be relied on in defence by a party when sued upon contracts, and that he shall not be driven to assert them, either for protection or as a ground of compensation, in a cross action." The doctrine here enunciated was approved in Van Buren v. Diggs, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 461; and again in Winder v. Caldwell, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 434.

The demurrers to the second and third pleas are overruled.

The fourth plea states that the consideration for the promise has entirely failed, in this, that the note was given for the hire of twenty negro men, claimed by the plaintiff at the time of the said hiring as slaves, but were in fact free, having been so declared by the laws of the United States, and proclamations of the president thereof, before the time of said hiring.

Plaintiff in the demurrer to this plea says, that the matter and things therein contained, in manner and form as set forth, do not amount in law to a failure of consideration. Also, that the plea consists altogether of matter of law upon which no apt or material issue can be taken; and that the plea is argumentative, uncertain and insufficient. The remainder of the demurrer goes to other matters of form generally.

The facts set forth in this plea do not constitute a failure of consideration. Admit that the plaintiff did claim these men as slaves—notwithstanding they may have been free—this would not affect the contract; for they may have first hired themselves to plaintiff, and by their consent, express or implied, she may have transferred their labor to defendant, or plaintiff may have acted as their agent in hiring them to defendant, and may have taken the notes payable to herself in trust for them. Besides, there is no averment whatever that the contract was not fulfilled on the part of the plaintiff.

The demurrer to the fourth plea must be sustained.

The seventh plea says that the consideration for the promise is illegal, for that it was made for the hire of negroes at Bartow county, Georgia, in January, 1864, and that the contract was in violation of both the letter and the spirit of the laws of the United States, and the proclamations of the president thereof. Plaintiff's demurrer alleges that the matters above contained do not support the plea of illegal consideration. The remainder of the demurrer is addressed to the structure of the plea.

The demurrer is well taken to the substance of this plea. The hiring of these men by the plaintiff to the defendant, in the state of Georgia, in 1864, was not in violation of any law of the United States, or any proclamation of the president. And indeed the president, in the emancipation proclamation, dated January the first, A. D. 1863, recommended to the freedmen, "that in all cases, when allowed, they labor faithfully for reasonable wages." 12 Stat. 1268. I perceive no legal distinction in the plaintiff's hiring these men to defendant, and the men hiring themselves to defendant. No averment is made that they did not consent to be so hired, nor that the contract is unperformed on the part of the plaintiff.

The eighth plea alleges that the consideration for the promise was illegal—being contrary to the public policy of the government of the United States; that it was made for the hire of negroes as slaves, and defendant avers that it was a part of the consideration of the contract, that the defendant was to remove said negroes, and keep them removed from the territory within the lines of the Federal army, with a view and design of preventing their liberation from their former state of servitude, and that, previously to the time of the making of said contract, the government had determined upon, adopted and established the policy of liberating said negroes from their former state of servitude.

Demurrer to this plea—and the causes alleged in it—are, that the plea contains no sufficient allegation of illegal consideration; and that no matter of fact has been alleged or shown in bar of the action, but that it consists altogether of matters of law, and that it is argumentative, evasive, double, etc.

Such is substantially the language of the eighth plea and of the demurrer to it.

Ex-Gov. Joseph E. Brown, who argued for defendant, cited and commented on the following authorities: [Marshall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co.] 16 How. [57 U. S.] 336; [Hannay v. Eve] 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 242; [Miles v. Caldwell] 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 45; [Chirac v. Reinicker] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 288; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 293a, 293b; 3 Kelly, 181; [Bartle v. Nutt] 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 188; [Lessieur v. Price] 12 How. [53 U. S.] 63; [Ranall v. Howard] 2 Black [67 U. S.] 585; Dana, Wheat. Int. Law, 305, note; Add. Cont. 93-96; Chit. Cont. 586; Smith, Lead. Cas. 423.

Mr. Pope, in his brief, referred to Steph. Pl. 256, 424, 260; [M'Niel v. Holbrook] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 84; [Shankland v. Mayor, etc., of Washington] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 397; Gould, Pl. 421.

Counsel for plaintiff presented the following authorities in support of the demurrer: Steph. Pl. 348, 384, 387; Chit. Cont. 570, 575; 2 Kent, Comm. (10th Ed.) 636, note.

The court will direct its attention to the first point taken in the demurrer. The plea is, perhaps, too general in its structure, and otherwise deficient in form, if tested by the rules of pleading; but if the formal faults be not specially pointed out, it must be adjudged certain to a common intent, this being all that is required in a plea in bar.

In resolving this plea, the court must look to its language alone for the meaning of defendant, and none of the other pleas pleaded, nor any part of them, can be invoked to aid in the interpretation and construction of this, or in explaining the import of any word or phrase used in it. Each plea must stand on its own merits. If this contract when entered into was in violation of the policy of the government, it is vicious and invalid and can find no favor in the courts. Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 258, said: "No principle is better settled than that no action can be maintained on a contract the consideration of which is either wicked in itself or prohibited by law." And in Tool Co. v. Norris, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 45, Mr. Justice Field in speaking of contracts void, as against public policy, said: "The law looks to the general tendency of such agreements, and it closes the door to temptation by refusing them recognition in any of the courts of the country."

The gist of the agreement of the parties as stated in the plea—and this statement as pleaded is admitted by the demurrer, is "that defendant was to remove said negroes away, and to keep them removed from the territory that was within the lines of the Federal army, with a view and design of preventing the liberation of said negroes from their former state of servitude." It needs no argument to show that this agreement was in contravention of the previously settled policy of the government, and wicked in itself.

Demurrer not sustained.

The ninth and last plea is as follows: That the promise aforesaid was illegal and void in this, that it was the express understanding and agreement at the time said promise was given, that the payment of the amount so promised should be made in what was denominated Confederate treasury notes, which currency defendant says was prohibited by law to circulate. Verification.

The demurrer states that the plea is double, containing several and distinct matters of defense, and that no certain issue can be taken thereon, and that the matters and things contained in the plea as therein set forth, are insufficient in law to show illegality of consideration, etc.

In my opinion it is not necessary to decide whether the promise is illegal or whether Confederate treasury notes were prohibited by law to circulate, for it is alleged, that plaintiff agreed to receive these notes for the amount promised. This being so, plaintiff cannot come into this court and ask a judgment for money. Clearwater v. Meredith, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 25.

Demurrer overruled.

Judgment nil capiat on the second, eighth and ninth pleas; and so far as the defense goes set up in the third plea, there must be judgment of nil capiat.

Circuit Court, D. Arkansas. July, 1834.

PLEADING AT LAW—TRESPASS—WARRANT — NEW TRIAL.

1. In trespass, any matter done by virtue of a warrant, must be specially pleaded.

2. A new trial will not be granted, because witnesses did not state facts which the party expected they would state.

Appeal from the Crawford circuit court.

[Action by William Martin against Josiah Clark.]

Before CROSS and LACY, JJ.

CROSS, J. The record in this case presents two questions for consideration: First, whether the court erred in excluding an execution offered in evidence by the defendant; and second, in refusing to grant a new trial.

1. Clark brought an action of trespass against Martin, and the cause was tried on the plea of not guilty. In trespass the rule is, that any matter done by virtue of a warrant or authority, must in general be specially pleaded. Co. Litt. 282b, 283a; 6 Com. Dig. "Pleader," E 17; 1 Salk. 107, 108; Doug. 611; 1 Saund. 298, note 1; 1 Chit. Pl. 538; 13 Johns. 443. The evidence was not admissible under the general issue.

2. The ground stated in the application for a new trial is, that two witnesses summoned by Clark did know, and were fully informed, that the property in controversy had been taken out of the possession of Clark and sold to Martin, and probably delivered to him; and that he, Martin, believed those witnesses would swear the truth in relation thereto; but that on the trial they either forgot the facts, or corruptly and wilfully refused to state them, and therefore that he did not have the benefit of a fair trial. This did not entitle Martin to a new trial, and his motion was rightfully overruled. Sayer, 27; 2 Caines, 129; 3 Johns. 256; 4 Johns. 425; 5 Johns. 259. Judgment affirmed.

PRACTICE AT LAW—IN CONFORMITY WITH STATE—SUMMONS IN NAME OF PLAINTIFF'S ATTORNEYS.

The effect of the 5th section of the act of June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 197), which provides, that the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding, in other than equity and admiralty causes, in the circuit and district courts of the United States, shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding, existing at the time, in like causes, in the courts of record of the state within which such circuit or district courts are held, is not to authorize the commencement of an action at law in the circuit court by a summons issued in the name of the plaintiff's attorney, according to the mode of commencing actions in the courts of the state of New York:

BENEDICT, District Judge. This motion raises the question, whether the effect of the 5th section of the act of June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 197), which provides, that the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding, in other than equity and admiralty causes, in the circuit and district courts of the United States, shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding, existing at the time, in like causes, in the courts of record of the state within which such circuit or district courts are held, is to authorize the commencement of an action at law in this court by a summons issued in the name of the plaintiff's attorney, according to the mode of commencing actions in the courts of the state of New York.

This question, I learn, upon inquiry, has already received the consideration of the circuit judge of this circuit, and he has advised the clerk of the circuit court for the Southern district of New York, that the act referred to does not authorize the commencement of an action at law by such a summons. This action of the circuit judge makes it proper that the practice in this district be made to conform to that directed by the circuit judge, in the Southern district, and, accordingly, the summons served in this action must be set aside, as unauthorized by any law of the United States.

[At law. Action by Martin and Coe against Edward Curtis to recover back duties illegally exacted.]

This action is brought to recover back the duties paid on several importations from Dundee during the year 1841, of gunny cloth, which were paid under protest, amounting to $4,500, and which were levied by the defendant upon the article imported as cotton bagging, gunny cloth being prior to the tariff of July 14, 1832, free of duty. The case (the first tried in this city and the second in the country) is one of very large importance, inasmuch as there have been an immense amount of duties paid on the article under protest, which will be immediately claimed to be refunded and put in suit. The treasury department at Washington also looks with anxiety to the result of the suit, as a case was recently tried in Boston before Judge Story, in which the plaintiff recovered back the duties paid, and instructions were sent here to have this case tried, notwithstanding the decision of Judge Story and the verdict against the United States, in order to obtain Judge Thompson's views as applicable to the law of the case. On the part of the plaintiffs, evidence was adduced showing that previous to 1832, gunny cloth was unknown as an article of cotton bagging. It came originally from the East Indies as gunny bags, and during a great scarcity of cotton bagging a Mr. Watt invented a substitute by cutting open these gunny bags, and sewing them together in another shape, he formed an article suitable for cotton bagging. It is made of the gunny or jute hemp, which grows in the East Indies, and differs in its construction from the cotton bagging known prior to 1832, and which was made of hemp, tow, flax, and sometimes cotton, by having a double wrap and web. The duty was levied by the defendant under the act of 1832, which says the duty shall be levied on cotton bagging, or any article used for cotton bagging, "without regard to weight or width," and the plaintiffs insist, that inasmuch as this article of gunny cloth was unknown at the time that act was passed, congress could not of course have reference to it, in levying a duty on "any other article used for cotton bagging, without regard to weight or width." The defendant urged a different construction of the act, and evidence was also offered to show that this article was in general use as cotton bagging. This was distinctly proved, but there was no evidence to show that it was known or used for such purpose prior to 1832.

D. Lord, Jr., for plaintiffs.

Ogden Hoffman, for defendant.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice, charged that in his opinion this case was one which depended entirely on the verdict of the jury, that is, whether in 1832, when the tariff act was passed, levying a duty on cotton bagging, gunny cloth was known as being used for cotton bagging. It had been supposed by the defendant that Judge Story in the case tried before him, had laid down some new principles as to the construction of the act of '32, and this court was now called upon to give a decision not in conformity with his. If this court considered that Judge Story had advanced any new principle, they would give the present case more deliberate examination. He did not understand that any new principle had been stated, but that the principle laid down by Judge Story had been established these ten years by the decision of the supreme court of the United States. He believed that the jury were to preserve the existence of the commercial understanding of terms made use of because the laws were made for those engaged in mercantile pursuits, and if they did not resort to that understanding in deliberating upon actions of this nature, they would mislead the merchant who deals in the article. This, which was the decision of Judge Story, was no new rule, but had been settled on the soundest principles for ten years.

The enquiry was then, whether under the act of 1832, this gunny cloth was known as an article applied to the bagging of cotton. The defendant insists that the words "without reference to weight or width" were susceptible of a different construction. It was proper that the duty laid in 1832 should apply to all articles then known and used for cotton bagging, and it did so apply because some was made of hemp, some of flax, of tow and even of cotton, and the qualification therefore did apply to all articles then known or used as cotton bagging, but not to an article unknown as used for such purpose, and if congress had intended to embrace every article which could be used for cotton bagging, they would have said so. They used the words with reference to the articles then known, and not to any which might afterwards be applied to the same use.

The act of Aug. 30, 1842 [5 Stat. 548] has not, as has been asserted, any material bearing on the case. In that act, congress uses broader language, and meant to adopt such language as would cover all articles which might be used for cotton bagging, and the 20th section embraces all articles which bear a similitude to articles which are liable to duty. In 1832, this was not known as an article used for cotton bagging and whoever applied it to that use, because it was cheaper, did nothing improper, but made an honest application of his ingenuity, but congress finding that the ingenuity of man had discovered something which would answer the purpose of bagging for cotton, and which was not known in 1832, and that gunny cloth would answer that purpose, laid a specific duty on it. The court saw nothing in the act of 1842 to take from this case the settled law, that the duty should be laid according to the commercial understanding and acceptance of the article.

Was then this gunny cloth known and used in 1832 when the act was passed, as cotton bagging? If the jury believe it was, the duty was properly laid; and if not, the plaintiffs were entitled to a verdict.

Verdict for plaintiffs.

MARTIN v. DELAWARE INS. CO.

MARINE INSURANCE—DEVIATION—JUSTIFIABLE NECESSITY—COURSE OF TRADE.

1. The smallest deviation from the usual course of the voyage, without a justifiable necessity, discharges the underwriters, although the loss was not the immediate consequence of the deviation.

[Cited in Parsons v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 465.]

2. The underwriters are bound to take notice of the course of trade; but it should appear that the course was so uniformly pursued, as that it should have been known to the underwriters, as well as to the insured.

[Cited in Bulkley v. Protection Ins. Co., Case No. 2,118.]

[Cited in Natchez Ins. Co. v. Stanton, 2 Smedes & M. 340; Crosby v. Fitch, 12 Conn. 422.]

Insurance made, on the 9th of November 1805, on one-third of the schooner Friendship, at and from Kingston, in Jamaica, to the island of Aruba, and at and from thence, back to Kingston, with liberty to touch at Rio de la Hache. On the 24th of December, a memorandum was endorsed on the policy, that, for the additional premium of a half per cent., the said vessel may take in the whole or a part of her cargo at Coro, without prejudice to the insurance; the additional premium to be returned, if she should not go to Coro. The vessel sailed on the voyage insured; stopped about eight days at Aruba; took in a person as a supra-cargo, to go to Coro, to assist in purchasing mules; then returned from Coro, with a load of mules to Aruba, where she remained a part of two days, when the island, then belonging to and in possession of the English, was attacked and taken by the Dutch. The vessel and her cargo were taken and condemned as prize. A regular abandonment was offered and refused.

The claim was opposed, by Rawle and Condy, upon the ground of deviation, in returning to and stopping at Aruba, on the voyage from Coro. Although the former is nearly in the route, from Coro, on the Spanish Main, to Jamaica, still, it was a deviation to stop there. Park, on the subject of deviation was cited; also Marsh, 393; [Hood v. Nesbit] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 137.

Ingersoll & Dallas insisted, that according to the plain intention of the parties, which was to cover the voyage out and home, it was absolutely necessary to return to Aruba, as otherwise the return voyage would not be protected, either by the policy or the memorandum; the words of the former being, "at and from Aruba to Kingston." That the permission being to go to Coro "without prejudice to the insurance," and there to take in "the whole or a part" of her cargo, the insured would be prejudiced, unless he was at liberty to return to Aruba; where, probably, it might be necessary for him to take in the balance of his cargo. Besides, without this construction, he could not call at Rio de la Hache, which, by the policy, he was to do, on his way back from Aruba. It was further insisted, upon the evidence of one of the jurymen, who stated that he had known two vessels on this voyage call at Aruba, to take in a supracargo to Coro for purchasing mules, that this was the course of the trade, and therefore it was permitted to call at Aruba, to land this person.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). In this case, the vessel was lost in consequence of the stopping at Aruba; but if it had been otherwise, still, if there was the smallest deviation from the usual course of the voyage, without a justifiable necessity, the underwriters are discharged, although the loss was not the immediate or certain consequence of the deviation.

The question is, what was the voyage, as described in this policy and memorandum. In giving the contract a construction, we must attend to the intention of the parties, as far as we can discover it; and we must supply as little as possible, beyond the meaning thus ascertained. It is contended, for the plaintiff, that the vessel was obliged to return to Aruba from Coro; else, the manifest intention of the parties to cover every part of the voyage out and home, would be defeated; since, neither in the policy or memorandum, is she protected back from any other place but Aruba. But, if this argument be sound, I would ask, what part of the policy protects her from Coro to Aruba? The permission to go to Coro, would cover her voyage thither; but there are no words which extend this protection to her voyage back to Aruba. This construction, then, instead of fulfilling, would manifestly violate, the meaning of the parties; which, I admit, was to cover her throughout. The only way to effect this, is to consider Coro, substituted by the memorandum as the termination of the outward voyage, instead of Aruba, which was in the first instance the ultimate point; and then the insurance will be, at and from Kingston to Aruba, and at and from thence to Coro, and at and from thence back to Kingston. But, if the plaintiff's exposition be admitted, we must go on, and add a new voyage, not expressed in the policy or memorandum, and by no means essential to the meaning of the parties as expressed. Had she gone to Coro without the permission, she would have committed a deviation, and the underwriters would have been discharged; but now, she is permitted to go there, so as not to prejudice the policy, the intention of which was, to cover the whole voyage. But it does not follow from this, that the insured should, though not at all necessary, and perhaps very inconvenient to him, stop at Aruba, for no other purpose than to take his departure from thence. This could not have been the intention. As to stopping at Rio de la Hache, if the construction I have given be correct, then the vessel might as safely touch there from Coro as from Aruba.

The evidence given by the juryman, is very far from proving a usage of trade. Twenty instances may have occurred, of vessels, not being otherwise provided with persons acquainted with the traffic in mules on the Main, calling there to obtain such a person; and as many instances may have occurred of vessels proceeding with a supra-cargo, brought from the port of the vessel's departure, relying upon finding such a character at Coro. But this is no proof of a usage. It should appear that this course is uniformly pursued, and that it should be known as well to the underwriters as to the insured. The former must take notice of the usage of trade, but then it must be uniform and fixed. There appears, upon the whole, to have been a deviation.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April Term, 1846.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—CERTIFIED COPIES—NEW DECLARATION—RULE TO PLEAD.

1. Where an action is removed from a state court to this court, under the 12th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 79), certified copies of the process or papers by which the suit was commenced in the state court, and of an order of that court for their transmission, should be sent to and entered in this court.

[Cited in Miller v. Tobin, 18 Fed. 612.]

2. Where a defendant, instead of adopting that course, entered here what purported to be a copy of a declaration in the action in the state court, but the copy was not certified from the state court, or accompanied by a certified copy of any order of the state court for its transmission, and then entered here a rule to declare: held, that the rule to declare must be vacated, and the copy declaration be taken from the files.

3. On the transmission of the process or declaration by which the suit was commenced in the state court, and the entry of the same in this court, the plaintiff must file a new declaration according to the practice of this court, as if the suit were an original one here.

[See Brownell v. Gordon, Case No. 2,039.]

4. Until the filing of such declaration the plaintiff cannot enter a rule to plead or a default for not pleading.

[See Brownell v. Gordon, Case No. 2,039.]

[John M.] Martin, a citizen of the state of New-York, commenced, by declaration, an action of assumpsit against [Cornelius] Kanouse, a citizen of the state of New-Jersey, in the court of common pleas for the city and county of New-York. Kanouse appeared in the action, and applied to the court for an order removing the action into this court, under the provisions of the 12th section of the act of congress of September 24th, 1789, known as the "Judiciary Act." 1 Stat. 79. The application was denied. But, on the first day of the session of this court next after the filing of his petition in the court of common pleas for the removal of the action, Kanouse entered in this court what purported to be a copy of the declaration against him in the court of common pleas, and appeared in the action in this court by entering common bail, and gave notice thereof to Martin's attorney in the common pleas. The copy of the declaration entered by Kanouse was not certified from the court of common pleas, and he did not enter a certified copy of any order for the transmission of any copy of the declaration. Subsequently, Kanouse entered in the book of common rules in this court a rule that Martin declare within twenty days after service of notice of the rule, or be non-prossed. Notice of this rule was served on Martin personally.

Martin now moved that the copy declaration on file in the action in this court be withdrawn from its files, and that the rule to declare be vacated.

John M. Martin, plaintiff, in person.

Andrew S. Garr, for defendant.

THE COURT vacated the rule to declare, and ordered the copy declaration on file to be taken off, on the ground that in an action removed from a state court under the act of congress in question, certified copies of the process or papers by which the suit was commenced in the state court, and of an order of that court for their transmission, should be sent to and entered in this court.

THE COURT decided at October term, 1850, in the case of Clarke v. Protection Ins. Co. [Case No. 2,860], that on the transmission of the process or declaration by which the suit was commenced in the state court, and the entry of the same in this court, the plaintiff must file a new declaration according to the practice of this court, the same as if a suit had been commenced by regular process in this court; and that until the filing of such declaration, the plaintiff could not enter a rule to compel the defendant to plead, or enter his default for not pleading.

[NOTE. Judgment was entered in the court of common pleas against Kanouse. This was affirmed by the superior court. From this judgment he sued out a writ of error from the United States supreme court. A motion to dismiss the writ for want of jurisdiction was overruled. Kanouse v. Martin, 14 How. (55 U. S.) 23. At the next term of the court the judgment of the superior court was reversed upon the ground that the power of the court of common pleas to render judgment terminated upon the application of Kanouse for order removing case to the circuit court. 15 How. MARTIN v. KERCHEVAL et al.

[4 McLean, 117.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1846.

NOTES—ASSIGNMENT—CONSIDERATION—BONA FIDE HOLDER.

1. A note in the hands of an assignee is prima facie evidence of the amount of the consideration paid by the assignee.

2. But the assignor, when sued, may prove what was paid.

3. This evidence can not be set up by the maker of the note, in the hands of a bona fide holder.

4. If the payee of the note paid no consideration, and the assignee paid none, the maker may show a want of consideration.

[Suit by Martin against Kercheval and Forsythe.]

Douglass & Duffield, for plaintiff.

Mr. Bates, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is brought by the plaintiff, as indorsee against the defendants as indorsers, of a promissory note. A judgment was obtained against the maker of the note by the Bank of Michigan, to whom the note was assigned in 1841. After this the counsel, Mr. Douglass, says he filled up the blank indorsement against the defendants. Notice to the defendants was proved to have been duly given by the bank.

A question is made whether, as between the indorser and indorsee, the consideration can be proved? The face of the note is prima facie evidence of the consideration paid on its negotiation. But this is only prima facie. The defendants may show an entire want of consideration, or that a small sum only was paid. This evidence could not be given by the maker. For he is bound to pay the face of the note, at whatever discount it may have been purchased by the holder. When a note has been reduced to judgment, its negotiability ceases; but questions may arise between the other parties to the note, if the maker becomes insolvent. If, indeed, the note was given without consideration, and was indorsed by the payee without consideration, the maker would not be precluded from showing these facts, by way of defense, to a suit brought by the assignee. But where the note, in the ordinary course of business, has been negotiated for a valuable consideration, the maker is bound for the face of the note.

It is alleged that the plaintiff has no interest in the note, and consequently can not maintain this action. The indorsement shows that his name is on the note, and the filling up makes him the legal holder of it. The indorsement having been made long before the judgment against the maker, it was a promise to pay the holder of the paper, who had a right to fill up the blank at any time, provided that legal steps were taken against the maker. This was the only condition of liability by the defendants, to any subsequent bona fide holder of the note. The presumption is in favor of the holder, and that the filling up related back to the time of the indorsement. But no hardship is imposed on the defendants, as they are permitted to go into the consideration between them and the plaintiff.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, on which a judgment was entered.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY—FRAUD—DISCOVERY—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. Unless congress has otherwise provided, state statutes of limitation are applied to controversies in the courts of the United States.

2. The fraud which in equity will prevent the running of the statute of limitations, is that which is secret or concealed, as distinguished from that which is open, visible or known, and a secret or concealed fraud is in equity a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action.

[Cited in Re Rainsford, Case No. 11,537; Re Dole, Id. 3,965; Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 141.]

3. Even in cases of fraud, the statute will in equity begin to run as against the plaintiff when he has knowledge or information of facts which reasonably creates the belief that the transfer is fraudulent, and can be proved to be so; and if, under all the circumstances, the plaintiff has been guilty of negligence in discovering or attacking the fraud, the statute will begin to operate against him from the period his laches commenced.

5. The statute of Missouri, which provides that "actions for relief on the ground of fraud, must be brought within five years after the cause of action accrued, but the cause of action shall be deemed not to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party at any time within ten years, of the facts constituting the fraud," construed and considered as in substance enacting the equity rule on the same subject, and fixing the period of limitation.

6. In an action by an assignee in bankruptcy of a fraudulent debtor, where the fraud was continuous, and the debtor remained down to the time suit was brought, the real owner of the property sought to be recovered, and in possession of it: held, that the statute did not bar the suit, even though the initial fraudulent transaction took place more than five years before the suit was commenced.

[Cited in Re Rainsford, Case No. 11,537.]

This was a bill in equity filed originally in the district court by Martin, as assignee in bankruptcy of Edward K. Woodward, to recover certain property from the defendants. Prior to February, 1861, Woodward had been a merchant in St. Louis, doing business in his own name and in the usual way. In the fall of 1860, however, he became much embarrassed, and, in fact, insolvent. He endeavored, late in 1860, first through the defendant, Gray, and subsequently through the defendant, Smith, to effect a compromise with his eastern creditors, but could not succeed. The defendant, Smith, is a brother-in-law of Woodward, is by profession an attorney at law, and resides in Hartford, Connecticut. On the 8th of December, 1860, Woodward, at St. Louis, wrote to Smith, at Hartford, informing him that suits were already begun against him, entreating him to go to New York and Philadelphia to see if he could not effect the desired compromise and extension. Woodward's letter then continues: "Make the best arrangement possible, except cash down or security; if you cannot arrange with them, come right on here and buy me out on terms that you will be safe in, and such as they will be forced to accept. One suit is within the justice's jurisdiction, and judgment will be rendered on the 10th, so I want something done previous to that time. The trial of the other two is set for the 17th. I shall call for a witness who, I don't believe, will be got at the time, and the probability is that they will be continued for the present. My real estate is in a precarious condition, and unless you can get those creditors into the arrangement, so as to give me time to protect it, everything will be swallowed up, unless you can come out, etc. * * I shall be anxious to hear from you." Smith failed to make any compromise, but he effected a purchase of certain claims against Woodward, at twenty-five cents on the dollar; went to St. Louis February, 1861, and on the 5th of that month purchased of Woodward his stock of merchandise, for the expressed consideration of $11,360. This sum was paid by turning over to Woodward, at their face value, the claims which Smith had purchased a few days before at one-fourth that sum; by assuming amounts due for the rent of the store building, and by his three notes to Woodward for $919.64 each. These notes were soon afterwards paid to Woodward in claims which Smith purchased of Woodward's creditors at twenty-five cents on the dollar, and then sent to St. Louis and turned over to Woodward at their par or nominal value, and the notes for rent were paid out of proceeds of goods sold from the store. After the sale of the goods to Smith, the store was operated in the name of Bailey, agent, for over a year; then in the name of Bell, agent, until March, 1864, when a limited partnership was formed under the statute of Missouri, the articles being executed by the defendants, Gray and Smith, the former being the general, and the latter the special, partner. This limited partnership was, by its terms, to continue for three years from March 1, 1864, and the business was to be conducted in the name of Gray. When the three years expired the same arrangement was continued, and the store was being thus conducted in December, 1867, when Woodward was, on his own petition, adjudicated a bankrupt, and in July, 1868, when the present suit was commenced. On the 22d April, 1861, Woodward, without beforehand consulting Smith, made to him, subject to certain incumbrances, a deed of all his real estate, and this deed was placed on record in February, 1862. Among other parcels was the house in which Woodward then lived, and where he has ever since resided, without paying rent therefor, and the taxes on which have been paid by Woodward out of money from the store. Certain parcels were redeemed by Woodward's direction, from judicial sales, by money likewise taken from the store, and titles made in the name of Smith, of which he was subsequently advised. From the store also, and under Woodward's management, encumbrances have been paid off and the claims have been assigned to Smith, who holds them against the property. See Bobb v. Woodward [42 Mo. 482], supreme court Missouri, March term, 1870. Soon after the purchase of the goods, Smith returned to Connecticut, leaving the store in the nominal possession of one Bailey, as his agent, and taking with him of moneys in the store, the sum of $37, to pay his expenses. In the professed capacity of clerk for Smith, Woodward remained in the store from the time of his sale to Smith, in February, 1861, down to the time of the filing of the present bill, and the evidence showed that, in fact, he managed there as before, and that Bailey and Bell, and even Gray, acted under his direction.

The bill made Smith, Woodward, and Gray, defendants, and set out at great length all of the abovementioned facts, with many others, and charged a fraudulent combination throughout all these transactions between Smith and Woodward, to defraud the creditors of the latter; that the sale of the goods was colorable and fraudulent; that in reality Woodward was the real owner during all the time the business was conducted in the name of "Bailey, agent," and in the name of "Bell, agent," and in the name of Gray; that the real partner of Gray is Woodward, and not Smith; that Smith has been refunded out of the sales from the store, all moneys which he has expended in the purchase of claims against Woodward, or for advances to purchase goods. The bill also alleged that Woodward, in pursuance of the original fraudulent design, procured to be effected the limited partnership with Gray, who was to contribute $6,000 in cash against the stock, which was put at $12,000, and Gray was to be interested in one-third of the profits, and Woodward in two-thirds, but to carry out the fraud Smith's name was used in the articles, and not Woodward's. The bill stated that large profits had been made; that the stock increased in value; that Woodward, at the date of his bankruptcy, was entitled to a large sum from the firm; that Gray had withdrawn large sums and amounts, and was indebted to his copartner, Woodward, therefor; that defendants Smith and Gray had a large amount of property belonging to the firm, which they had sold since the bankruptcy of Woodward was declared. The bill also stated that the assignee, after his appointment in January, 1868, first discovered the frauds aforesaid; that claims to the amount of about $13,000 had been established against the estate of Woodward, by various creditors named, none of whom, it was averred, knew of the frauds complained of, until January 3, 1867. It was also averred that Smith & Gray denied that Woodward had any interest in the firm, and it was stated that the latter had falsely returned to the bankrupt court that he had no interest therein. The prayer of the bill was that an account be taken of all the said partnership dealings between the defendants; that what should be found due from Smith & Gray to the firm, be decreed to be paid to the complainant as assignee; that the respective rights of the defendants in the firm property, at the date of Woodward's bankruptcy, be determined; that a receiver be appointed to collect the debts and take charge of the property of the partnership; that the property be sold and converted into money, and for general relief.

The defendants severally answered, denying the frauds charged against them, and also denying that Woodward ever had any interest in the limited partnership mentioned. Smith, in his answer, specially pleaded the statute of limitations of the state of Missouri, alleging that the purchase of the goods, charged in the bill to be fraudulent, was made February 5, 1861, and that no suit to set aside said sale as fraudulent as to the creditors was brought by or for them within five years after the sale was made and possession taken, wherefore the creditors and the assignee are barred of such suit by the statute of November 22, 1855, referred to in the opinion of the court. Replications were filed; a large amount of testimony was taken, and on final hearing the bill was dismissed by the district court, whereupon the assignee appealed to this court.

Lee & Webster and Cline, Jameson, & Day, for assignee.

Whittlesey & Hamilton, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. In the argument at the bar counsel differed, not indeed respecting the general nature of the bill, but upon the point whether in the relief sought it embraced the real estate conveyed by the bankrupt to the respondent, Smith, as well as the personal property or the interest in the co-partnership therein mentioned.

The point is important, for the limitation as to real actions is ten years, and as to personal actions five years. The present bill was exhibited more than five years, but within ten years, after the sale of the goods and the conveyance of the real property.

If the averments of the bill and the prayer for relief be carefully examined, it is plain, beyond controversy, that all that is alleged respecting the real estate is in the nature of inducement to show the character of the dealings between Woodward and Smith, and to make probable the gravamen of complaint.

It is extremely important that we shall obtain a correct notion of the real nature, scope, and purpose of the bill; for upon the view we take of this will depend, as we shall presently see, the question whether the statute of limitations bars the relief sought.

The bill is not one to set aside as fraudulent the sale of the specific stock of goods made in February, 1861, or to recover their value as property to which the creditors of the bankrupt are entitled. This sale is indeed set out in the bill, and is alleged therein to have been fraudulent, but it is set forth only as inducement, as the initial transaction of a fraudulent conspiracy and scheme which ended, not with the consummation of that particular sale, but which continued in existence and was flagrant down to the period when Woodward was adjudicated a bankrupt, and when this suit was commenced.

The plea of the statute sets out this sale made in February, 1861, and then alleges that the suit is barred by reason of the lapse of more than five years before it was commenced. The plea misconceives the nature and purpose of the bill, and proceeds upon the mistaken notion that it is brought simply to impeach the sale of the original stock of goods made more than seven years before.

The true view of the bill is, that it charges that the real parties in interest in the business of the limited partnership carried on in the name of the defendant Gray, are Woodward and Gray, and not Smith and Gray, as appears on the face of the written and recorded articles, and is given out by all three of them to the creditors and the world, and consequently that the interest of Woodward in this business and in the assets of the firm belongs to the assignee for the benefit of his creditors, and it is this interest which the assignee by the present suit is seeking to recover.

The suit is a personal, as distinguished from a real action, and hence the ordinary limitation period is five years, and not ten, from the time when the cause of action accrued. Bobb v. Woodward [supra], supreme court Missouri, March term, 1870.

In the case just cited the supreme court of Missouri decided, upon the proof before it, that the conveyance of the real estate by Woodward to Smith was fraudulent, and of the correctness of that judgment on this point there can be no question. That case had no relation to the personal property or partnership interests now in controversy, and there was no question as to when the fraud was discovered, and hence what is said in the opinion on these subjects by way of argument by the learned judge who delivered it, is not to be taken as points decided by the court.

Upon the proofs in the record now before us we consider the fraudulent conspiracy between Woodward and Smith, charged in the bill, to be so clear as not to admit of fair debate, and that so far from ending with the purchase of the goods in 1861, it continued down to the time this bill was brought. The evidence is voluminous, and it would require too much time without any resulting benefits, to enter upon a detailed or analytical statement and discussion of it.

Suffice it to say, that it firmly establishes that Woodward designed to place the property beyond the reach of his creditors; that Smith made a colorable purchase of the goods to enable the debtor to effect his purpose; that apparently he has received from the sale of the goods in the store all sums which he expended in buying claims against Smith or otherwise; that Woodward was all the time the real, while Smith was only the nominal, party in interest. That the purchase of the stock of goods by Smith was fraudulent is very faintly, if at all, denied by counsel. At all events, they have placed the stress of their defence upon the statute of limitations, and it was upon this ground, undoubtedly, that the bill was dismissed by the learned judge whose decree we are called upon to review.

The question involved is alike interesting and important. To determine it, we must first look at the statute to ascertain its meaning and purpose, and then at the special character of the case in hand, and see whether it is one where the statute will operate to bar the relief sought. In a suit of this kind the assignee is clothed with all the rights of creditors (whom, indeed, he represents) to impeach transfers of property made by their debtor or colorably held by others in fraud of their rights. Allen v. Massey [Case No. 231].

The Code of Missouri declares that "there shall be but one action in the state for the enforcement or protection of private rights, and the redress or prevention of private wrongs, which shall be denominated a civil action." 2 Wag. St. p. 991, § 1.

The statute of limitations (section 8) enacts that "civil actions other than those for the recovery of real property can only be commenced within the periods prescribed in the following sections, after the causes of action shall have accrued."

"Section 10, within five years; fifth, an action for relief on the ground of fraud—the cause of action in such case to be deemed not to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party at any time within ten years of the facts constituting the fraud." 2 Wag. St. p. 918.

Unless congress has otherwise provided, state statutes of limitation are applied to controversies in the courts of the United States with the same effect as they would be if the controversy were pending in the courts of the state.

It is necessary, therefore, to construe the 10th section of the statute of limitation above quoted, in order to determine its effect upon the rights of the parties to present suit.

We have had called to our attention no decision of the highest court of the state construing this statute in respect to the precise questions which we are now to decide. The legitimate office of construction is to ascertain the legislative will or purpose; and to this end it is not only proper, but often necessary to look not simply at the language of the particular enactment under consideration, but also at the subject matter of it, in the light which the former law, or general principles shed upon it.

Formerly, in the state of Missouri, the forms of action and modes of procedure were as at common law, with a distinct equity jurisdiction. At that time the statutes of limitations were, in substance, the same as 21 Jac. I. c. 16, and professed to apply only to certain specified actions at law. Rev. St. 1845, pp. 373, 374.

Equity at this time applied, of course, these statutes according to the settled doctrines of that court.

The Code subsequently enacted provided, as we have seen, that there should be but "one form of action"—"a civil action;" and the legislature made the statute of limitations apply to all civil actions; which statute would probably be held, in this state, as it has been in others under legislation of a similar character, to embrace equitable as well as legal causes of action so far as they fall within the terms of the act. That is, the limitations as to all actions therein mentioned and provided for apply equally to causes of action formerly cognizable either in equity or at law. Newman v. De Lorimer, 19 Iowa, 244; Johnson v. Hopkins, Id. 49; McNair v. Lott, 25 Mo. 182.

In this view it is easy to perceive why the legislature adopted the 10th section of the act concerning the limitation in cases of fraud. If the provision had been merely that "actions for relief on the ground of fraud should be commenced within five years after the cause of action accrued," it is extremely probable that the courts would have been obliged to have held that the statute would begin to run from the period when the fraud was consummated, and not as under the well-known equity rule, from the period when the fraud was or should have been discovered. To remove all doubt on the point, and to preserve the equity doctrine on the subject, the legislature added the words: "The cause of action in such case shall not be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party * * * of the facts constituting fraud."

In my judgment, the legislature by this provision, in substance re-enacted the doctrine which had been established by courts of equity, as to the effect of fraud in preventing the running or operation of statutes of limitation.

If this be so, it becomes important to examine the nature and grounds of the equity doctrine, the better to understand the meaning of the statute.

Mr. Justice Story states the doctrine of equity thus: "If a party has perpetrated a fraud which has not been discovered until the statutable bar may apply to it at law, courts of equity will interfere to remove the bar out of the way of the injured party." Story, Eq. Jur. § 1521. "The question often arises in cases of fraud or mistake, * * under what circumstances and at what time the bar of the statute begins to run. * * In cases of fraud and mistake, it will begin to run," he says, "from the time of the discovery of such fraud or mistake, and not before." Id. § 1521a.

This distinguished jurist, on the circuit, in the supreme court, and in the preparation of his commentaries, had frequent occasion thoroughly to explore the subject, and his opinions upon it are entitled to great consideration, though it is to be regretted that he does not go more into detail. In his commentaries, he does not discuss the nature of the fraud which in equity will prevent the bar of the statute from running; nor what, in the view of that court, will amount to a discovery of the fraud. An examination of these topics, as well as of the ground and reason of the rule itself, is essential to a thorough understanding of the subject, and is required by the circumstances of the cause now before us for determination.

As to the kind of fraud contemplated: Some judges have said that the fraud which will avoid the effect of the statute of limitations must be positive and actual fraud. But this is a point which we are not now required to notice, for in this case the fraud was actual and positive.

It seems to me quite clear, both from an examination of the authorities and the nature of the case, that the fraud which shall operate to displace the statute or prevent its application is secret or concealed fraud, a fraud unknown to be such to the party injured thereby. In a leading case on the subject Lord Redesdale said: "That as fraud is a secret thing, and may remain undiscovered for a length of time, during such time the statute of limitations shall not operate; because, until discovery, the title to avoid it does not completely arise, &c. Pending the concealment of the fraud, the statute ought not in conscience to run," &c. Hovenden v. Lord Annesley, 2 Schoales & L. 624.

That the fraud must be secret or concealed, not open, known, or visible, to prevent the bar of the statute from running, is distinctly asserted or assumed in many cases. Troup v. Smith, 20 Johns. 33, 47, 48, per Spencer, C. J.; Stearns v. Paige, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 819, 829; Carr v. Hilton [Cases Nos. 2,436, 2,437]; McLain v. Ferrell, 1 Swan. 48; Bucknor v. Calcote, 28 Miss. 432; Wilson v. Ivy, 32 Miss. 233; Cook v. Lindsey, 34 Miss. 451; Young v. Cook, 30 Miss. 320; Campbell v. Vining, 25 Ill. 525; Farnam v. Brooks, 9 Pick. 212; Phalen v. Clark, 19 Conn. 421; Moore v. Greene [Case No. 9,763], affirmed 19 How. [60 U. S.] 69, 72; Ang. Lim. c. 18; Sugd. Vend. 612, pl. 17.

It is declared, indeed, that no case can be found where the statute has been avoided, at law, or in equity, unless on the ground of fraudulent concealment on the defendant's part. Bishop v. Little, 3 Greenl. 405.

This subject was discussed by a truly great judge in the case of Carr v. Hilton, above mentioned, which was a suit in equity, by an assignee in bankruptcy, to recover of the defendant lands fraudulently conveyed to him by the bankrupt. The defendant relied on the statute of limitations contained in the bankrupt act of 1841. In holding that the cause of action did not accrue to the assignee till the fraud was discovered, Curtis J., says: "Statutes of limitation do not run in cases of fraud while it is secret. It is objected that the bill does not contain any averment that the cause of action was fraudulently concealed. But it does state a case of secret fraud, and it would be difficult to distinguish this from fraudulent concealment. A secret, or what is the same thing, concealed fraud, is a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action." This I assent to as a perspicuous and accurate statement of the law on this point.

As to what amounts to a discovery within the meaning of the equity rule: This is regarded as so important that it must, with all necessary circumstances, be distinctly stated in the bill.

Grier, J., speaking of this point when delivering the opinion of the supreme court, says: "Especially must there be a distinct allegation as to the time when the fraud was discovered, and what the discovery is, so that the court may see whether, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, it might not have been before made." Carr v. Hilton; Fisher v. Boody [Case No. 4,814]; Moore v. Greene [supra]; s. c. 19 How. [60 U. S.] 69. And the bill, it has even been said, should negative laches in not making the discovery. Mayne v. Griswold, 3 Sandf. 463; Field v. Wilson, 6 B. Mon. 479.

The question recurs, however, what is discovery? I answer, notice of the fraud; or, in the language of the Missouri statute, of "the facts constituting the fraud." What is notice? In answering this, Judge Curtis, in Carr v. Hilton, quotes and approves the following doctrine laid down in Kennedy v. Green, 3 Mylne & K. 719, 721, 722: "It is a well established principle that whatever is notice enough to excite attention and put the party upon his guard, and call for inquiry, is notice of everything to which such inquiry might have led. When a person has sufficient information to lead him to a fact, he shall be deemed conversant of it."

The cases quite generally hold that the statute will run and fraud will not avoid it, if the plaintiff, under all the circumstances, has been guilty of negligence in discovering or attacking it. Smith v. Talbot, 18 Tex. 774; McDonald v. McGuire, 8 Tex. 361, 370; Campbell v. Vining, 25 Ill. 525; Ferris v. Henderson, 12 Pa. St. 49; Johnson v. Johnson, 5 Ala. (N. S.) 90; Bucknor v. Calcote, 28 Miss. 432; Edmonds' Ex'rs v. Goodwyn, 28 Ga. 38; Lott v. De Graffenreid, 10 Rich. Eq. 348; Farnam v. Brooks, 9 Pick. 212; Way v. Cutting, 20 N. H. 187; Stearns v. Paige, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 819, 829; Edwards v. Gibbs, 39 Miss. 166; Ang. Lim. § 183, and note, § 190; Nudd v. Hamblin, 8 Allen, 130, and cases cited.

It is easy, it seems to me, to press this principle too far, and I prefer the test or doctrine approved and applied by Judge Curtis, i. e., holding the plaintiff to know all that the information he is possessed of makes it his duty, as a reasonable man, ordinarily vigilant in protecting his own interests, to know or to learn.

The language of the statute is "discovery by the aggrieved party at any time within ten years, of the facts constituting the fraud." This is the same, in my opinion, as if it read discovery of the fraud. If a party knows the facts constituting the fraud, he knows the transaction to be fraudulent. It is not enough simply that he is aware of the fact of the transfer, but he must know "the facts" which make that transfer fraudulent.

In Godbold v. Lambert, 8 Rich. Eq. 155, 164, where an alleged fraudulent deed was placed on record, and it was contended that creditors were bound to know its character, the chancellor very sensibly observed, "registry of a deed is only implied notice of its contents, and not of any fraud that may be perpetrated in its execution." I cannot assent to the correctness of the remark in the case of Lott v. De Graffenreid, 10 Rich. Eq. 346, that the registry of a deed is sufficient notice to creditors, and the statute of limitations begins to run from that period, even though the deed be fraudulent.

There is one peculiarity of the Missouri statute which ought not to be passed without notice, and that is the clause which renders it necessary to make the discovery of the fraud within ten years. The language of the section was evidently copied from the New York Code, which is literally the same as the Missouri statute, except that in New York the words, "at any time within ten years" are omitted. How. N. Y. Code, § 91. The same words are omitted likewise from the Ohio Code, the Nebraska Code (St. 1857, p. 395), the Kansas Code (St. 1868, p. 633), the Minnesota Code (St. 1866, p. 451), and the Iowa Code (Revision 1860, § 2741). All these statutes enact that in actions for relief on the ground of fraud, "the cause of action shall not be deemed to accrue until the discovery of the fraud," or of the "facts constituting the fraud." Words limiting the time when the discovery shall be made are, so far as I have observed, peculiar to the legislation of Missouri.

Lord Erskine, in one case, declared that "No length of time can prevent the unkennelling of a fraud." Forrester, 66. Lord Northington said, with emphasis, in Alden v. Gregory, 2 Eden, 285, "Never, while I sit here, will delay purge a fraud." These expressions of decisive indignation against fraud are natural enough indeed, but if taken literally they lay down a doctrine which, if fully carried out, would be at war with the peace and repose of society, on which rests the wise policy of all limitation statutes. Hence the provision very generally adopted in the legislation of the states that the statute will begin to run from the period when the fraud is discovered, and hence, also, the additional provision of the Missouri statute, which seems to require the discovery to be made within ten years from the consummation of the fraud. The effect of this provision is, not to declare that the plaintiff cannot for a period of ten years be guilty of laches, or that he may for full ten years shut his eyes to facts which it would otherwise be his duty to notice and act upon, but its effect, rather, is to require him, at his peril, to make the discovery within the prescribed period. I do not doubt that the provision is wise in conception, and will prove salutary in operation.

The reason or ground in this rule in equity is quite plain. Applying, as this rule does, only to cases of secret or concealed, as distinguished from known fraud, as before explained, I have no doubt that Lord Redesdale gives the true reason for its adoption by equity, viz: that it is against conscience for a party to avail himself of the statute when by his own fraud he has prevented the other party from knowing or asserting his rights within the period prescribed by the statutes of limitation. 2 Schoales & L. 634; Troup v. Smith, 20 Johns. 33, 47, 48.

This is entirely consistent with the exposition of the rationale of the doctrine by Baron Alderson in Brooksbank v. Smith, 2 Young & C. 58: "In cases of fraud, courts of equity hold that the statute runs from the discovery, because the laches of the plaintiff commences from that date, on his acquaintance with all the circumstances. In this courts of equity differ from courts of law, which are absolutely bound by the words of the statute." Imperial Gas, etc., Co. v. London Gas-Light Co., 26 Eng. Law & Eq. 425.

So in cases under the Missouri statute: the limitation begins to run as against the plaintiff when he has knowledge of facts which would have impressed a reasonable man with the belief that the transaction was fraudulent, for from that time his laches begins, if his debt is mature.

Judge Curtis, in the case before cited, speaking of the ground of the rule that fraud voids the statute, says: "In my judgment the most reasonable and sensible ground is that, substantially, the title to avoid it does not arise until the fraud is known." [Carr v. Hilton.] This is adopting the view of Lord Talbot, Cas. t. Talb. 63, and it has also the sanction of eminent judges.

The title to avoid the fraudulent transaction does ordinarily arise as soon as the fraud is perpetrated (26 Eng. Law & Eq. 425; J. J. Marsh. 445; 33 Miss. 233; 20 Johns. 33, supra; but substantially it does not, because the fraud is not known, and hence the fraudulent wrongdoer is estopped, while the aggrieved party is kept ignorant of his rights, from setting up against him the bar of the statute.

But this assumes that the creditor's debt is one which is due, so that he is in law enabled effectively, to assert his rights, and therefore properly chargeable with negligence if he fails, for the prescribed period, to do so.

There may be some question as to the scope of the language of the statute, "an action for relief on the ground of fraud;" but there is no doubt that a bill in equity by a creditor to set aside a fraudulent conveyance or transfer of property by his debtor, is such an action. The cases before cited will show that this point has never been disputed.

Having thus seen that the present suit is one which falls within the aforementioned tenth section of the limitation act; that the fraud contemplated by that act is fraud which is secret or concealed, as distinguished from that which is open and known; and having also seen what, in the view of a court of equity, is regarded as a discovery of the fraud, so that thenceforth the laches of the plaintiff and the running of the statute alike begin; that the ten years' limitation in the section is not to be construed as sanctioning negligence or the shutting of eyes to information of the fraud; and having also seen the reason, or policy and purpose of this legislation, we are now prepared to apply the statute as thus expounded, to the facts of the present cause. This, in view of the length of this opinion already, we must do briefly.

The facts constituting fraud in the transfer of property by a debtor, are, in some cases, concealed or secret, and in some visible or open. The fraud in the sale of the stock of goods to Smith, in February, 1861, in view of the relationship of the parties, of facts known to a great many creditors as to Woodward's condition, and Smith's knowledge of it, and the manner in which Woodward was still allowed to exercise control over the property, was such, in our judgment, that any creditor might, if ordinarily vigilant, have discovered it within five years from its sale.

If the present was a bill simply to have declared fraudulent the sale made in 1861, we should have to hold, taking all the circumstances together, that the fraud was not so concealed or secret but the creditors, using due diligence, might and should have discovered it, and if their debts were due, could and should have assailed it within the five years. Undoubtedly, it was this view of the case which was taken in the court below.

But, as we have before shown, such is not the case made by the bill, and such is not the relief sought. The question before the court is, whether, upon proofs, Woodward has any interest in the limited partnership carried on in the name of the respondent, Gray; whether Smith or Woodward is the party really owning the interest other than that owned by Gray.

Upon this subject we entertain a very decided conviction, and that is, that Smith has no real and substantial interest therein; has apparently no money invested in it beyond what he has received; that his pretence of ownership is purely sham, a device to keep at bay the creditors of Woodward; and that the latter, though held out simply to be a clerk, is the owner of the interest in the firm, other than that held by Gray. Since 1861, Woodward has, in effect, been managing the store the same as before, giving to it his time, attention, and skill; to these, and the profits which are their product, his creditors and not Smith, are best entitled.

Equity looks at substance and not form. It penetrates beyond externals to the substance of things; and it accounts as nothing, and delights to brush away barricades of written articles and formal documents when satisfied that they have been devised to conceal or protect fraud.

The fraud in the case before us, as we view it, ended not with the purchase of the goods in 1861, but continued down to the time this bill was filed. The case is different from what it would be if the sale of the goods had been the only transaction, and Smith had taken exclusive possession of them and held or sold them as his own more than five years before his purchase was attacked by creditors of his vendor.

It is our opinion that the fraud, commenced in 1861, has been continued down to the time this suit was brought; that in equity, as respects creditors, the interest in the firm and its business is owned by Woodward and not by Smith; that the latter holds that interest, whatever it may be, in secret trust for the former, and hence the statute of limitations cannot avail to prevent that interest from being ascertained and subjected to claims of creditors of the bankrupt.

It is not necessary in this view to consider the point made that at all events the statute could not bar the relief sought, at least not entirely, because the debts of some of the creditors of Woodward did not fall due until 1867.

We now decide two points only: First, that Woodward has an interest in the property and assets of the firm business carried on in the name of Gray, which may be reached by the assignee in the present suit. Second, that the statute of limitation, pleaded by the respondent, Smith, is no bar to the relief sought.

The decree of the district court is reversed. Reversed.

[3 Wall. Jr. 206; 5 Am. Law Reg. 400; 27 How. Prac. 161; 37 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 64; 13 Leg. Int. 332.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. Oct. Term, 1856.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CONTRACTS—ACT OF LEGISLATURE—MORTGAGE—REMEDY DESTROYED.

The constitution of New Jersey adopted in 1844 limits the powers of the legislature and separates them from those of the judiciary, and adopts the prohibitions of the constitution of the United States against laws impairing the obligations of contracts, and further, prohibits the depriving a party of any remedy for enforcing a contract which existed when the contract was made. Hence, where the legislature passed an act for the relief of the creditors of a manufacturing corporation, providing that certain persons should be authorized to sell all property mortgaged for the payment of bonds, at public sale, to the highest bidder, free from all encumbrances, and after paying certain expenses and costs, should distribute the proceeds to the corporation's creditors, according to the priorities of their several liens, it was held that such legislation was unconstitutional, by reason of its impairing the obligation of the contract between the mortgagors and the mortgagees, and depriving the mortgagees of a remedy which existed at the time the contract was made.

[Cited in State v. Assessors of City of Rahway, 43 N. J. Law, 340.]

The Somerville Water Power Company, incorporated under the laws of New Jersey, and doing business in that state, issued, in 1848, to different persons, a number of negotiable bonds, payable in 1853, and amounting in all to $50,000; and to secure their payment, executed (as under its charter it had power to do) a mortgage of all its real estate, property and franchises to trustees for the benefit of the bondholders; one of the conditions of the bonds being, "that if default should be made in the payment of the $50,000, or any part of it, it should be lawful for any holder to enter upon the premises, and to sell and dispose of them, and of all benefit and equity of redemption of the corporation, and to make a good and sufficient deed, &c., to the purchaser in fee simple, and out of the money arising from such sale, to retain the principal and interest which shall then be due on the said bond or obligation, together with the costs and charges of advertisement and sale of the premises." The title to the lands and property of the company having been encumbered by judgments, and embarrassed by decrees, sales and conveyances subsequent to this mortgage, the company or its assigns, and some of its creditors, sought the aid of the New Jersey legislature to enable them to put things on a new and better basis, and with that view to clear off all liens and make a perfect title to the property. For these purposes two acts of assembly (Acts of 10th and 18th of March, 1856 [Laws 1856, pp. 193, 393]) were passed. Taken together, they recited that certain persons had been appointed receivers of the property in a suit in the court of chancery of the state of New Jersey, to protect and superintend the real estate, property and franchises of the said company; that the concerns and interests of the company had become so involved in complicated difficulties and embarrassments, that the parties interested therein as creditors and stockholders could not have full and satisfactory relief, without protracted and expensive suits in the courts of law and equity. They recited further that it was represented by the parties interested in the property and affairs of the company, that the company was abundantly able to pay off and satisfy every just claim against it, and that a favorable opportunity was now presented to sell and convey its property, and that the interests of creditors and stockholders would be promoted by a sale of its real estate with all its franchises and works clear of all encumbrances, and had prayed for legislative aid in the premises. They then enacted—First. That the receivers might sell the real estate, franchises and works of the company, &c., at public sale, to the highest bidder, free and clear of all encumbrances, and free and clear of all mortgages, judgments and other liens whatever. Second. That these receivers might then deduct from the proceeds of such sale all reasonable allowance for commissions and services heretofore rendered by them as such receivers, and pay out of said proceeds all expenses by them incurred in effecting and consummating such sale. and all such costs and expenses as have heretofore been incurred in a suit pending in the court of chancery of New Jersey, wherein they had been appointed receivers.[2] Third. That after the same were so paid, the receivers should next, out of the proceeds, pay off and satisfy all just and lawful debts, due from said company to any creditor or creditors, in the order of priority in which they might lawfully stand of record, and after the payment of such debt or debts of record should, out of the balance, pay and satisfy all other just and lawful debt or debts which were not of record, if said balance was sufficient for that purpose, and if not sufficient, then in proportion to the respective amounts of such debts or claims, and after the payment of all said last mentioned debts, should ascertain by due and legal evidence, who, as contributors to the property, franchises and work of said company, or as stockholders in the same, were entitled to the balance of said proceeds, and in what proportions, and should pay to such persons their respective proportions of such balance. Fourth. That the receivers should have power to subpoena and examine witnesses, touching the duties and trusts reposed in them by these acts, and should make report to the chancellor of the state, of what they did in the premises; and that any person aggrieved by their proceedings should be at liberty to file exceptions to such report in respect to his own particular interest therein, which exceptions should abide the final decree of the chancellor to be made therein.

Under these acts, the receivers sold the whole of the mortgaged property for $50,000; the bonds never having been paid, and now amounting with interest to $60,000. Before the sale was made, however, the complainant who held some of the bonds which he had bought in common course in the New York market, and on which bonds default had been made in the payment of both interest and principal, filed this, his bill in this court for the foreclosure of the mortgage, and a sale of the property, or so much thereof as might be necessary to pay the amount due on his bonds; and for an injunction to restrain the receivers from proceeding any further under the acts of the legislature already mentioned. The constitution of New Jersey adopted in June, 1844 (article 3, § 1), says: "The powers of the government shall be divided into three distinct departments—the legislative, executive and judicial. And no person or persons belonging to or constituting one of these departments, shall exercise any of the powers properly belonging to either of the others," &c. It says again (article 4, § 3): "The legislature shall not pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or depriving a party of any remedy for enforcing a contract which existed when the contract was made." The constitutionality of the acts of assembly was, therefore, the point in question.

W. L. Dayton and A. O. Zabriskie, for the company, referred to many legislative acts of the state of New Jersey, which showed that from the foundation of the province a species of chancery jurisdiction had been exercised by the legislature; which acts, though often operating to substitute, against the creditors' will, one fund for another, had, nevertheless, never been regarded as impairing the obligation of contracts, or in any way unconstitutional; the main purposes of the contract under a new form being still kept in view. Potts v. Trenton Water Power Co., 1 Stockt. [9 N. J. Eq.] 593, was such a case. There the Trenton Water Power Company owed much money secured by mortgage, which the mortgagees were not pressing; and became insolvent. A receiver was appointed at the instance of some creditor; a subsequent one perhaps. But the receiver could make no sale free of liens; and the legislature passed an act to give him power. He did sell, professing to sell free of liens, and his sale under the act was declared to have discharged the liens. Of course the remedies of the mortgagees had been violently taken away; but the proceeds having been paid into chancery and so substituted in the place of the land, the legislative act was declared by the court of errors and appeals to be constitutional.

After argument by Mr. Ransom and by the complainant in person, the court's opinion was given by GRIER, Circuit Justice. [The demurrer to the bill in this case has been entered for the purpose of having a final hearing and judgment of the court on the validity of the act of the legislature of New Jersey, authorizing the receiver to sell the premises in question free and discharged from the lien and estate of the mortgagees.

[It is contended that this legislation is forbidden both by the constitution of the state and that of the United States.] [3]

[2] Of this suit the complainant had had no notice, and was not a party to it.

[3] [From 5 Am. Law Reg. 400.]

Previous to the 29th of June, 1844, the state of New Jersey was governed by the old colonial constitution, adopted on the 2d of July, 1776. This contained no bill of rights nor any clear limitation of the powers of the legislature. The history of New Jersey legislation exhibits a long list of private acts and anomalous legislation on the affairs of individuals, assuming control over wills, deeds, partitions, trusts and other subjects usually coming under the jurisdiction of courts of law or equity. Consequently the decisions of the courts of New Jersey on questions arising under the old constitution, cannot be cited as precedents applicable to the present one, which carefully defines and limits the powers entrusted to the legislature, the executive and the judiciary. It is very desirable that the constitution of a state should be construed by its own tribunals, and we regret that the researches of counsel have not furnished us with such precedents. The case of Potts v. Trenton Water Power Co., 1 Stockt. [9 N. J. Eq.] 592, has reference to an act passed before the adoption of the present constitution. That act was declared by the court "not to impair the obligation of any contract, and to be remedial only." The first mortgagees gave their assent to the sales made under it, and others could not object to it as made without their authority. In this important respect it differs from the present case, and cannot be relied on as a precedent.

The validity of this act has been challenged on several grounds. If found invalid on any one, we need not examine the others. The constitution of New Jersey has not only carefully limited the powers of the legislature, and separated them from those of the judiciary, but it adopts the prohibitions of the constitution of the United States against "ex post facto laws, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts," and with this addition, "or depriving a party of any remedy for enforcing a contract which existed when the contract was made." It is not contended that this act comes under the category of an "ex post facto law;" and if it be merely remedial in its character, as defendants contend, there can be no valid objection to it under this head of the constitution.

Does it impair the obligation of the contract between the mortgagees and mortgagors, or deprive the mortgagees of any remedy which existed when the contract was made? The act and supplement must be construed together as forming one act. It is entitled, "An act to relieve the creditors and stockholders of the Somerville Water Power Company," &c. It sets forth, in its preamble, certain representations, made no doubt by those who procured the act, showing plausible reasons for such legislative interference, but the validity of the act must be judged from its actual operation on the rights of parties subjected to it, and not by the pretences put forth by the preamble. This may show that the legislature acted in good faith, and believing that their interference would wrong no one, but not that such was the actual result. Legislatures cannot be too cautious, when asked to interfere with special legislation for particular persons or particular cases, on ex parte representations. They cannot call all parties before them and judge upon a full hearing; this is for the courts. Their action may not always be unjust, but it may be and often is tyrannical and injurious.

Let us inquire what is the contract, and how is it affected by this act? The mortgagees of this property hold the legal title in trust for the several bondholders, who may properly be treated as the real mortgagees. They may be said in common parlance, to have a "lien" or "security" on the property mortgaged, but they have it by force of their legal title to the property. It is an estate in fee simple, defeasible only by the payment of the debt. When the condition of the obligation is broken, the mortgagees may enter on the premises and recover the rents, issues and profits thereof, till their debt is satisfied. If they see fit, they may appoint an agent or attorney, who may enter on the lands under their direction, and make sale of the same in satisfaction of the debt. This disposal of the mortgaged premises is to be made according to the discretion and judgment of the mortgagees, and not of another. No subsequent encumbrancer or assignee of the equity of redemption can divest their estate contrary to their will, unless by a tender of the debt due. They cannot be compelled, to suit the convenience of others, to put up the property to sale at a time or in a manner which might lessen or injure their security. Now by this contract the estate of the mortgagees is defeasible only by payment of the debt. But this act permits the receiver to dispose of their estate, and does not provide that the debt shall be first fully paid. It permits the receiver to sell for any sum, whether it be sufficient for such purpose or not. And the receiver has made a contract of sale for a sum insufficient by many thousands of dollars. This is making a new contract for the parties and impairing the obligation of the mortgage. It may be truly said, "'tis not so written in the bond," The mortgagees may dispose of their security for less than the amount of their debt, but no other person can.

2. The obligation of this contract is moreover impaired by this act, in that it gives a precedence to certain indefinite costs and charges (not costs of the sale merely) to be paid out of the proceeds of the property before the mortgage debt. This is in direct contravention of the contract by which the estate was conveyed to the mortgagees free from all charges and encumbrances.

3. The mortgagees had, by their contract, a remedy to be used at their own option and discretion as to time and mode of sale, and by law they had the remedy of entry on the premises and receiving the rents and profits.

This act deprives them of both, contrary to the letter of the constitution of New Jersey, without invoking the aid of the cases of Bronson v. McHenry, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 311, and McCracken v. Hayward, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 611.

We have not thought it necessary to review the very numerous cases on this subject, or to attempt any metaphysical definition of what constitutes the "obligation of a contract;" as it is clear that any legislation which defeats the estate of the mortgagee, without payment or tender of the whole debt due on the bonds, which gives a preference to posterior liens, and which deprives the mortgagee of his remedy given by the covenants of his contract, as also that given by the law of the land, "impairs its obligation," and is contrary to the letter and spirit of the constitution of New Jersey. This act may be remedial as to the owners of the equity of redemption and those having liens against it, but the mortgagees have a right to say "non in hoec foedera veni"—we have never agreed to have our estate defeated to suit the convenience of others.

COURTS — JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT—COVENANT—PENALTY—DAMAGES—ACTION OF DEBT.

3. The defendant, against an express acknowledgment under seal, cannot deny the effect of such obligation, from expressions in the instrument, which amount only to an implication to the contrary.

[4. Cited in U. S. v. Craig, Case No. 14,883, to the point that comparison of handwriting is inadmissible as evidence.]

Covenant upon an agreement under seal, whereby the defendant, in consideration of a Virginia treasury land warrant for twenty thousand acres of land, which he acknowledges to have received of the plaintiff, and of a sum of money agreed by plaintiff to be paid on the performance of the work, stipulated by the defendant; agrees to enter the said warrant on vacant and unappropriated land in the state of Virginia, of a particular description, and to have the same surveyed and regularly returned, all at the expense of the defendant; except the surveyor's fees. The defendant, in another clause of the agreement, covenants, immediately on receipt of said warrant, to proceed to locate and survey, &c. The parties, for the true and faithful performance of all and singular the covenants, &c. bind themselves each to the other in the penalty of £120, Virginia currency.

Breach assigned in the words of the covenant. Plea, covenants performed. Replication, supporting the breach in the declaration.

Mr. Dallas objected to the reading a deposition which Mr. Ingersoll, for the plaintiff, was about to read, because not signed by the deponent.

Ingersoll: The deposition was only intended to prove the execution of the covenant; and as on this plea it is unnecessary to prove it, I shall not insist upon the deposition.

Dallas moved for a nonsuit, on the ground that the £120 was in lieu of liquidated damages, and that as the plaintiff could recover no greater sum than that, the court had no jurisdiction of the case.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. Where there is a penalty in an agreement under seal, the party injured, may, at common law, sue for the whole penalty, and must be satisfied with it; or he may bring covenant, and recover in damages more or less than the penalty. See 4 Burrows, 2225; 6 Brown, Parl. Cas. 470. If, in the latter case, the sum stipulated to be paid is not a penalty, but intended as a compensation for non-performance, it must govern the jury in the assessment of damages. But that is not the present case; and yet more, it is unimportant on the present motion, which is to nonsuit the plaintiff for want of jurisdiction. The action sounds in damages. The declaration claims more than 500 dollars; and by the decisions in the supreme court, the amount of the plaintiff's claim laid in the declaration, furnishes the rule for testing the jurisdiction of the federal courts. Motion overruled.

Ingersoll endeavoured to prove a receipt of defendant, by comparison of hands.

PER CURIAM. This kind of proof is inadmissible.

Ingersoll, having proved the Virginia treasury price of a land warrant, closed the opening.

Dallas insisted, that the plaintiff had not proved delivery of the land warrant, and therefore was not entitled to recover. That the acknowledgment of having received it, in the first part of the instrument, was contradicted by the latter part, which says, that "on receipt of the warrant, the defendant shall proceed to locate," &c.

PER CURIAM. The defendant cannot, against an express acknowledgment of the receipt, do it away by these expressions, which at most amount only to an implication of the contrary.

THE COURT, after stating to the jury that the only proof exhibited was the articles and the price of a Virginia land warrant at the treasury, left the question of damages upon this proof to the jury.

District Court, E. D. Arkansas. 1870.[2]

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. The inability to pay debts in the ordinary course of business as merchants in trade usually pay them, constitutes insolvency within the meaning of the bankrupt act [of 1867; 14 Stat. 517].

2. Where a party cannot pay his debts in the ordinary course of business and knows that he cannot, he will be held to have had knowledge of his insolvency.

3. The necessary effect of a conveyance to creditors in satisfaction either in whole or in part of a pre-existing debt, by one who knows that he is insolvent, is a preference in fraud of the bankrupt act, and he must be held to have intended this as a necessary result of his action.

4. Ignorance of the law cannot avail creditors who are possessed of facts that show the insolvency of the debtor, and a preference received under such circumstances is fraudulent and void.

5. Where a transaction that contemplates the securing of a debt is out of the ordinary course of business, the bankrupt act declares it to be prima facie fraudulent, and the onus of showing that it is not so is cast upon the defendant.

CALDWELL, District Judge. W. P. Haines & Co., a firm composed of W. P. Haines and C. E. Chetlain, were retail merchants doing business at Augusta, in this state. On the 29th day of February, 1868, they filed their petition praying to be adjudged bankrupts, and on the 22d May, 1868, they were so adjudged, and the plaintiff appointed assignee. On the 18th day of January, 1868, the bankrupts conveyed to the defendants for the consideration of $1,876.84, to be credited on a debt due from the bankrupts to the defendants, an undivided half of a parcel of real estate owned by the bankrupts as partnership property. At the same time the bankrupts assigned to F. M. Mahan, one of the members of the firm of Toof, Phillips, & Co., a title bond they held for certain other real estate in the town of Augusta, on which the bankrupts had made valuable improvements. This title bond was assigned to said Mahan for the consideration of $7,000, also to be credited on the indebtedness of the bankrupts to Toof, Phillips, & Co. There were some $740 of the purchase money still due on said property, and this said Mahan paid and procured a conveyance to himself from one Hough, the owner of the fee of the property.

The plaintiff charges that these conveyances were made in fraud of the bankrupt act; that the bankrupts were insolvent at the time they made them; that they were made with intent to give a preference to the defendants, and that the defendants at the time said conveyances were made, knew or had reasonable cause to believe the bankrupts were insolvent, and that said conveyances were made in fraud of the bankrupt act. Plaintiff also charges that the assignment of the title bond to F. M. Mahan, one of the defendants, was in fact for the use and benefit of the defendants, and for the purpose of securing the said property or its value to the defendants, in fraud of the rights of the other creditors of the bankrupts, and that this purpose was well known to, and participated in, by said Mahan.

In determining this case, the following inquiries arise: (1) Was the firm of W. P. Haines & Co. insolvent at the date of these conveyances? (2) Were these conveyances made with a view to give a preference to defendants over the other creditors of the bankrupts? (3) Did the defendants have reasonable cause to believe the bankrupts were insolvent?

1. That the bankrupts were in fact hopelessly insolvent at the date of this transaction cannot be questioned, as will be seen from the following statement of their liabilities and assets:

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed by circuit court; case unreported. Decree of circuit court affirmed by supreme court in 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 40.]

Indebtedness of firm at date of conveyance as per schedules on file and referred to in deposition of Haines		$55,353 01
Individual indebtedness of members of the firm:
Chetlain		3,850 00
Haines		105 00
Total indebtedness at date of conveyances		$59,308 01
Assets of firm as per schedules	$21,851 41
Stone house and lot, say	1,800 00
Dwelling house of each partner, say $2,000 each	4,000 00
		27,651 41
Excess of liabilities over assets.		$31,656 60

About $18,000 of the assets consisted of notes and accounts, most of which are shown to be worthless. Nearly all of the remaining assets as shown by bankrupts' schedules, consisted of personal property on which defendants held a mortgage, and the real estate embraced in the bankrupts' conveyances to defendants. The stock of goods on hand invoiced as shown by the schedules, $2,600. And this was the condition of the bankrupts' property at the date of the conveyances to the defendants. Chetlain and Frisbie both testify that the bankrupts sold no goods and did no business after that time. The indebtedness of the bankrupts is stated by some of the witnesses to have been from $31,000 to $35,000. How this discrepancy occurs between the statement of indebtedness by the witnesses and the statement of the indebtedness by the bankrupts in their schedules does not appear, and is not material, as taking either as correct the bankrupts were hopelessly insolvent. All the bankrupts' indebtedness, with slight exceptions, was in the shape of commercial paper, and with the exception of a debt owing to Walker Bro. & Co., amounting only to some $1,000, was over-due and unpaid at the date of this transaction. Creditors had pressed the bankrupts for payment of their debts without result; their stock of goods had been levied on, and their store closed by the sheriff by virtue of an execution issued on a judgment against one of the bankrupts; they had contemplated going into bankruptcy, and during the fall and winter of 1867–68, they only paid (excluding payments to defendants) $500, on an indebtedness of over $50,000 then over-due. The inability to pay debts in the ordinary course of business, as merchants in trade usually do, constitutes insolvency within the meaning of the bankrupt act. The bankrupts could not pay their debts in the ordinary course of business, and they knew it, and they must, therefore, be held to have had knowledge of their insolvency.

2. Knowing they were insolvent and unable to pay their debts, they conveyed to the defendants a large portion of their property, in part satisfaction of a pre-existing debt. The necessary effect of this conveyance was to give the defendants a preference, and they must be held to have intended the necessary result of their action. The witness, Frisbie, says that in the latter part of December, 1867, "I assisted Mr. Haines in making up his balance sheets; the result was that their available assets were not sufficient to pay their indebtedness."

3. The defendants not only had reasonable cause to believe the bankrupts insolvent, but they had actual notice of the fact. Chetlain, in his deposition, says: "I told Mr. Mahan we could not pay out," and the same witness says that Mahan was in Augusta during the time their goods were levied on, and that they "had an interview with Mr. Mahan on the subject." And the witness, McCurdy, swears that sometime in December, 1867, defendants sent him for collection, a note against the bankrupts, that he was unable to collect it, and he then says: "I wrote to Toof, Phillips, & Co., that I thought they had better look to their interests, as my conviction was that it was doubtful about their being able to collect their debt from William P. Haines & Co. I think shortly after writing this letter that a representative of the house came round to look after the matter. I think it was Mr. F. M. Mahan."

The defendants, in their answer, say: "It is true, as alleged in said bill, that at the time of the said several transactions, said Haines & Co. owed a large amount of debts, but that they were then insolvent is untrue, but, on the contrary, it is true that at the time aforesaid, said Haines & Co. had available assets in excess of their indebtedness, to the amount of sixteen thousand dollars; that while it is true said Haines & Co. did owe Toof, Phillips & Co., they were desirous to secure their debt, yet they deny they did so, or that they made any effort to secure the same, regardless of the rights of other creditors, but at the time aforesaid said Haines & Co. were not only able to secure said debt of defendants, but also to make good and secure all their other liabilities. Here is a direct admission of knowledge of the bankrupts' indebtedness, and the averment that the bankrupts were able to "make good and secure their other indebtedness" is fairly tantamount to a confession that they could not pay in the ordinary course of business, as merchants usually do. They had positive knowledge the bankrupts had not done so in their case, but all doubts on this point are put at rest by the defendants' answer to the first interrogatory of the bill, in which they say: "At the time of making of the transfers, defendants do not believe said Haines & Co. were able to pay their debts in money, but they were able to do so on fair market valuation of the property they owned, and of their assets generally, and they were then able to do so." Here is a direct confession of a fact that in law constitutes insolvency, and it is idle for defendants to profess ignorance of the insolvency of the bankrupts in the face of such a confession. If the bankrupts could not pay their debts in the ordinary course of business, that is, in money, as they fell due, they were insolvent, and if defendants did not know this constituted insolvency within the meaning of the bankrupt act, it was because they were ignorant of the law, and that ignorance can avail them nothing in this suit; and their denial of knowledge of the insolvency of the bankrupts, must, in view of their own confessions, and the overwhelming proof in the case, be held to be a denial of the law rather than the fact.

The transactions themselves being out of the ordinary course of business, the bankrupt act declares them prima facie fraudulent, and casts on the defendants the onus of showing they were not so. They not only fail to rebut this prima facie case, but their own admissions, and the proofs in the case, show that the transactions were, in fact, frauds upon the bankrupt act. The effort to make it appear that the transfer by the bankrupts, of their homesteads to Mahan, was a bona fide transaction, and that it was entered into without any view or expectation that the consideration Mahan was to pay for the property was to apply as a creditor on the indebtedness of the bankrupts to the defendants, is negatived by every fact and circumstance appearing in the whole case. Chetlain swears positively that it was "expressly understood between me and Mr. Mahan that the drafts (Mahan's drafts for the price of the property) should go to our credit." Haines swears to the same effect. The pretence that Haines & Chetlain were at liberty to make what disposition they pleased of Mahan's drafts on Toof, Phillips, & Co., for the $7,000 agreed to be paid for the property, and that their transmission to Toof, Phillips, & Co., by Haines & Chetlain, with instructions to place to the credit of Haines & Co., was an agreeable surprise, is too incredible for belief. It is obvious that these drafts never would have been paid if Haines & Chetlain had transferred them to any other of their creditors, or if they had demanded the money on them. The claim that Mahan made this purchase in good faith in his own name, and for himself, as "an investment," cannot be supported.

The property which he would have it appear he purchased as an investment on private account, for seven thousand dollars, to be paid in cash, is shown by the testimony of Chetlain to have been worth only $4,000, and by the testimony of Hamblet to have been worth only $3,500, and it is valued by the bankrupts in their schedules at $4,000, and we may reasonably suppose its value was not under estimated by them. The property at the same time was subject to a lien of $740 for the original purchase money. That some inducement other than a desire to make "an investment" must have operated on Mahan to have induced him to give $7,000 for property worth at most but $4,000, with an incumbrance on it for $740, is a conclusion which the mind cannot resist. What was that inducement? But one answer can be given to this question: it was to secure this property for his firm, on account of the bankrupts' indebtedness to them; and the testimony of the witness, Mahan, must be based rather on the form of the transaction as evidenced by the papers, than on the actual intention and purpose of the parties. That he expected to pay to his firm $7,000 in cash for taking up the drafts he drew for the agreed price of this property, I do not believe, nor do I believe he could or would so swear. It is true he says "the amount was charged up to him on the books of the firm." So was the title bond assigned to him and the deed made to him, but equity pays no regard to the forms resorted to by parties, in fraud of the law. Chetlain and Haines both swear, and every fact in the case shows that the inducement to this purchase on the part of Mahan, was to secure the value of this property to his firm; and on the part of the bankrupts, it was to give a preference to the defendants, and to obtain further advances. These advances Mahan promised to make in order to secure these conveyances, but as soon as he obtained the conveyances the defendants refused to make any further sales or advances to the bankrupts. Mahan admits he "agreed at the same time to continue selling them goods on the usual time, same as we had been doing before, and we continued to do business with them as usual until some time in the following month." If he means to be understood as saying defendants sold the bankrupts goods on credit, or made any advances to them in any manner, after the date of these conveyances, he is contradicted by the positive testimony of Haines and Chetlain, and by Exhibit A, to his own deposition, which contains a full statement of defendants' dealings with the bankrupts, and shows that defendants did not sell the bankrupts any goods, or give credit to them in any way whatever, after the date of these conveyances.

It must be recollected that in this case the interests, both of the bankrupts and defendants, are adverse to the assignee, for if the plaintiff succeeds it can only be on the ground that the bankrupts made a preference in fraud of the bankrupt act, which would preclude them from obtaining a discharge, and the defendants, of course, are interested to the value of the property. It is not, therefore, very remarkable that they should strive to avoid a conclusion leading to such results. As the evidence shows a state of facts from which the law will infer and declare insolvency and an intent to prefer, it is but fair to presume their denials were intended to repel a charge of actual moral fraud, and that they were made in ignorance of the legal effect of their action.

No one who will read carefully the pleadings and proofs in this case can resist the conclusion that this transaction was a bold effort of an enterprising and cunning creditor to possess himself of the bulk of the property of the bankrupts, in fraud of the bankrupt act and the other creditors of the bankrupts.

The conclusions reached on the law and the facts of this case are fully supported by the ruling of this court in the case of Rison v. Knapp [Case No. 11,861] and in the following cases: In re Black [Id. 1,457]; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Truax [Id. 9,451]; In re Arnold [Id. 551]; In re Gay [Id. 5,279]; Haughey v. Albin [Id. 6,222]; Wilson v. Brinkman [Id. 7,794]; Farrin v. Crawford [Id. 4,686]; In re Randall [Id. 11,551]; Ahl v. Thorner [Id. 103]; In re McDonough [Id. 8,775]; In re Kingsbury [Id. 7,816]; Graham v. Stark [Id. 5,676]; Scammon v. Cole [Id. 12,433]; Campbell v. Traders' Nat. Bank [Id. 2,370].

The mortgage on the personal property and the prospective crop of the bankrupts, executed to secure the defendants for advances made and to be made to aid in the production of a cotton crop, was executed many months before they were adjudged bankrupts, and so far as the proof shows, before they were insolvent, or the defendants had reason to believe them to be so, and so far as relates to the property mentioned in this mortgage, the bill is dismissed. As to the real estate conveyed by the bankrupts to Mahan and to the defendants a decree will be entered for the complainant vesting the title of the property in him.

The defendants should be repaid the $740 paid out by them to perfect the title of this property, and the decree will require the complainant to pay that sum to them after deducting therefrom the reasonable rents and profits of the property during the time they have had the possession. A master will be appointed to take and state the account.

Ordered accordingly.

[NOTE. From the decree entered in this case an appeal was taken by respondents to the circuit court. The decree was affirmed. Case unreported. The respondents then appealed to the supreme court, where the decree was again affirmed. 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 40.]

MARTIN v. UNITED STATES.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 146.][1]

District Court, N. D. California. June, 1856.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—VALIDITY—UNITED STATES—THIRD PARTIES.

This claim entitled to confirmation as against the United States, but without prejudice to third parties.

[Cited in Meader v. Norton, 11 Wall. (78 U. S.) 457.]

[1] [Reported by Numa Hubert, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Claim for one square mile of land in Napa county, rejected by the board, and appealed by the claimant.

Stanly & King, for appellant.

William Blanding, U. S. Atty., for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim of the appellant in this case is founded on a grant made in 1836 by Governor Manuel Chico to Nicolas Higuera. The authenticity of this grant is fully proved, nor does its validity appear to have been questioned either by the board or the law agent of the United States. The original grant and the expediente from the archives are produced, and the record of the act of judicial delivery of possession is also exhibited, showing that Higuera was personally put into possession of his land, and the boundaries were definitely established by proper authority. It is also shown that the conditions of the grant were fully complied with by Higuera, who appears to have enjoyed the uninterrupted possession of the grant, except those portions which he may have sold, until his death. There appears then to be no doubt of the validity of the original grant as against the United States, nor do I understand it to be disputed on their behalf. This fact having been ascertained, it would seem that the chief duty of this court is performed, and that the claim should be confirmed. It is however opposed nominally on behalf of the United States, but really in behalf of parties claiming under Higuera and affirming the validity of the original grant, but denying the rights of the present claimant [Julius] Martin, to the portion of the land alleged to have been conveyed to him. The real controversy is, therefore, between the claimant and third persons, and this court is asked in effect to decide between parties whose interests, by the very terms of the act, its decree cannot affect.

If under cover of proceedings instituted to ascertain the rights of the United States to the lands claimed under grants of the former government, all persons claiming adverse interests could come into the controversy and obtain an adjudication upon their conflicting titles, it needs no argument to show that this class of cases would soon assume so complicated and embarrassing a form as to indefinitely protract their final determination. In the mass of adverse claims which might be presented for the same land, and in the innumerable questions which might arise of fraud, accident or priority, or of heirship, devise, partition, succession, purchase, etc., under the Spanish or American laws, the great object for which the proceedings were instituted and the jurisdiction conferred upon the board and on this court would in many cases be wholly lost sight of, and the time and labor of the court would be devoted to trying a complicated series of cross ejectments in a suit not dissimilar to a proceeding in rem. But if this court were to undertake to adjudicate upon the rights of adverse claimants as between themselves, the very nature of the proceeding would require it to permit all such claimants to intervene in every suit. The impracticability of allowing this right was demonstrated in the opinion delivered by Mr. Commissioner Thornton in case No. 2 before the board, and for the reasons there assigned this court has heretofore decided that after ascertaining the validity of the original grant as against the United States, it would not attempt to adjudicate upon the rights of various claimants under the original grantee, but would decree in favor of the party presenting the application, provided he showed a prima facie right to the confirmation of his claim. In this way alone could the inquiries before this court be limited to the questions the act intended it should decide, while all questions of mere private right would be settled before the ordinary judicial tribunals of the country to which all parties have access.

The only question then to be determined in this case is: Do the mesne conveyances to the claimant show such a prima facie right in him as entitles him to a decree in his favor, or are they so clearly void as to make it incumbent to reject his claim, although we are satisfied that the land in no event can be the property of the United States? The claim was rejected by the board on the ground that the description of the land in the mesne conveyances by Higuera to Fallon and wife, and by the latter to the claimant, was vague and uncertain, and that therefore nothing passed by the deeds. The description is as follows: "A certain quantity of land lying, being and situated in the district and territory already named in the valley of Napa, containing more or less one mile square of land in the place known as the Rincon de las Carneras, commencing on the wagon road and ending at the point of the hill on the east."

Much additional testimony has been taken in this court. Had that testimony been before the board, it is not certain that their decision might not have been different.

It is, I think, sufficiently established by the proofs, that the Rincon de las Carneras is a triangular piece of land embraced between Napa river on one side and the arroyo de las Carneras on the other. These two streams come together at an acute angle at the south, forming the apex and two sides of a triangle. The limits of the Rincon on the north seem not very definite, but the boundaries of the land in that direction are indicated in the conveyance with tolerable distinctness. A line drawn from the wagon road to the point of the hills on the east would nearly form the base of the triangle above described, and I think sufficiently shows the intended limits of the grant in that direction. If then the grant had been of the Rincon, commencing at the line above stated, I do not perceive that any doubt could exist as to the precise tract intended to be conveyed. But the words of the grant are "a quantity of land containing more or less one mile square in the place kown as the Rincon de las Carneras, commencing," etc. Was this then a grant of one mile spuare out of the larger quantity contained in the Rincon, or did the grantor intend to convey the Rincon from the line mentioned, adding a rough estimate of its supposed extent? I incline to the latter view. If the parol testimony taken be deemed admissible, there cannot, I think, remain any doubt on the point, and the equitable right of the claimant as against his grantor and his heirs to have the land according to the limits originally intended, would seem indisputable. The looseness and inaccuracy of the estimates of the area of land formed by the Mexican population of the country is notorious, and there is nothing improbable in the supposition that a piece of land containing in fact eighteen hundred acres should be described as containing a "square mile more or less." If the intention had been to restrict the grantee to the precise quantity of one mile on the line mentioned, the words "more or less" would hardly have been introduced. The fact that they are in the deed shows that the grant was not intended to be of any specific quantity of land, but of some tract present to the mind and before the eyes of the parties. That tract or piece of land must have been the Rincon, limited on the north by the line mentioned in the grant.

It is unnecessary, however, to discuss the question further, for no decision of the court on this point can ultimately bind the parties who alone are the contestants. I think it clearly our duty to confirm the claim as against the United States to the whole Rincon, south of the line mentioned, without prejudice however to the rights of any third parties having or pretending to have any adverse title to the same land or to any part of it.

District Court, S. D. New York. Sept., 1850.

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY—LIBEL—AFFIDAVIT—BY ATTORNEY—BALANCE—JOINT ACCOUNTS—BAIL—STALE DEMAND.

1. The general course of admiralty procedure in this country requires a sworn libel as the foundation of any process of arrest of person or property.

[1] [Reported by Abbott Brothers.]

[Cited in The E. W. Gorgas, Case No. 4,585.]

2. When a libel is verified by an attorney in fact of the libellant,—as in case of the libellant's absence, &c.,—it is not necessary that the authority of the attorney to act should be made to appear when he attests the libel or files it; it is enough if he establishes such authority when it is called in question.

3. A mere general employment as proctor or attorney at law to prosecute a demand in a court of admiralty, is not sufficient to authorize the party employed to verify a libel as attorney in fact of the libellant.

4. No action can be maintained in a court of admiralty by one ship-owner against another to collect a balance to be determined in favor of the libellant on the settlement of the joint accounts of the parties.

5. In holding a respondent to bail, a court of admiralty will be governed much by the equitable considerations of the case.

6. Accordingly, where a libellant procured the arrest of respondent in a suit brought in a district different from that in which they both resided, upon a stale demand, of small amount, and which was already in litigation between the parties in the courts of the state in which they dwelt,—held, that the respondent ought to be discharged from the arrest.

7. A motion to set aside an arrest, founded on irregularity in the libellant's proceedings, is not within rule 25 of the circuit court, and will not be denied of course, merely because it was not made at the earliest day practicable after the arrest.

8. Compare the case of Duryee v. Elkins [Case No. 4,197], where it is held that admiralty has not jurisdiction to take an account of the profits of the voyage and determine the share due to a seaman employed on a "lay" or share of the proceeds.

This was a libel in personam filed by Mulford M. Martin against Lewis M. Walker, to recover for supplies and materials furnished to vessels of the respondent. The cause now came before the court on a motion to set aside the arrest of the respondent, and discharge the recognizance of bail given by him.

Scoles & Cooper and E. W. Stoughton, for the motion.

Beebe & Donohue, opposed.

BETTS, District Judge. The defendant moves to set aside his arrest in this cause, and that the recognizance of bail given by him therein for the limits, be discharged.

Both parties are residents of the district of New Jersey, and were such when this suit was instituted. On the 2d of August last, a libel in personam was filed, demanding of the defendant the payment of about $2,700, for supplies and materials furnished by the libellant to two vessels alleged to be owned by the respondent. The account is of long standing, the advances to the schooner Copper having been made more than ten years since, and to the schooner Roanoke between the years 1836 and 1841.

The libel alleges that supplies to the amount of $13,000 were furnished to the Roanoke, of which sum there yet remains due and unpaid about $2,150, besides interest, and in like manner to the schooner Copper to the amount of $139.

The respondent in his affidavit swears that the libellant was part owner with him of the schooner Roanoke, and that whatever supplies were obtained for her were furnished on account of the joint owners, and not for him individually. He further asserts that the charges in respect to the Copper, passed into the subsequent account in relation to the Roanoke, and have been adjusted between the parties in that account, and upon the merits of the case avers that he is not indebted to the libellant, but that a balance is due him on their transactions. It is moreover stated that the whole subject-matter is now in litigation between the parties on cross-bills filed by them respectively, in the court of chancery in the state of New Jersey.

Five objections to the plaintiff's right to maintain this action are taken: That the libel was not authenticated according to the requirement of the rules of this court, and that the process of attachment issued thereon was irregular. That no such affidavit of debt was made by the libellant as would entitle him to hold the respondent to bail in the suit. That one part owner cannot sue another in admiralty to recover advances made for their joint benefit. That the demands are stale, and if not actually barred by the statute of limitations, yet the court of admiralty will not give a party in such case the advantage of an arrest and imprisonment of the debtor on mesne proofs. That the voluntary selection of a home tribunal by the parties, for the litigation of these claims, precludes both from arresting each other out of that jurisdiction on the demands.

1. The attestation to the libel is made in the name of the libellant "by C. Donohue, his attorney," and in the jurat it is stated, that "the libellant is sick, and absent from the district, and could not swear to the libel," and the commissioner certifies that Donohue appeared before him, "who signed the libel as attorney in fact for the libellant."

For the respondent it is insisted that no fact is made to appear on this jurat authorizing the authentication of the libel otherwise than by the oath of the party himself, and that no arrest can be made of a party unless a libel regularly attested on oath is previously filed.

The general course of admiralty practice here unquestionably requires a sworn libel as the foundation of any process of attachment, (Ben. Adm. § 413; Dunl. Adm. Prac., 2d Ed., 126–128; Betts, Adm. 22, 23; Conkling, Prac. 423,) although the affidavit which justifies the arrest need not, it would seem, be made on the libel, but may be a separate deposition. Sup. Ct. Rules, 7. Such was the practice in the English admiralty, as the warrant of arrest issued previous to filing the libel. Clarke, Adm. tits. 1, 19; 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 410, 411, 432, 434.

The rule of this court requires the verification to be in the libel itself. Rule 3. This oath must be made by the party himself, (rule 4,) unless the libellant is absent from the United States, or resides out of this district, and more than one hundred miles from the city of New York, (rule 93,) in which cases it may be made by an attorney in fact or proctor. Id.

In the present instance the libellant's residence was out of the district, but less than the distance of one hundred miles from the city. The case did not accordingly exist as one in which the oath of the party himself could be dispensed with, and the libel must be regarded as insufficiently authenticated without it.

It is not necessary that the authority of the attorney in fact to act for the principal should be made to appear when he attests to or files the libel. It is sufficient for him to establish that authority when it is called in question.

The affidavit of the libellant himself is read on this motion for that purpose. It is exceedingly loose and ambiguous on this point, and goes no further than to swear that the proctors were authorized and empowered to take all steps, in his absence, for the collection of the debt, and to assert that the suit is brought for his own benefit and with his consent and approbation.

On a question of rightful authority in the agent, something more than general and loose statements of that kind should be produced to support his acts. If no positive and formal appointment need be shown, at least there should be an explicit recognition of such agent in the character of an attorney in fact, to uphold his assuming that representation.

Mr. Donohue testifies, in his affidavit, that he verified the libel as agent of the plaintiff, and that he had full power and authority to verify the libel, and was fully authorized to file the same.

It is to be remarked that the libel was filed in the name of Mr. Beebe as proctor, and Mr. Donohue as advocate, and that these gentlemen are connected in business in practice at this bar. All that Mr. Donohue states in his affidavit may be satisfied by the general retaining or authorization of these gentlemen as attorneys to prosecute this demand, without there having been any direct and express appointment of Mr. Donohue as attorney in fact or special agent in the matter. Attorneys in law are agents of the principal (Story, Ag. § 23), but attorneys in fact are so called in contradistinction to attorneys in law, and may include all other agents employed in any business, or authorized to do any act or acts en pais for another. Id. § 25.

Judge Story, however, observes, the appellation sometimes designates persons who act under a special agency or a special letter of attorney; so that they are appointed in factum; for the deed or act to be done. Id. § 25. This position is supported by reference to Bacon's Abridgment, but Bacon clearly regards it as necessary, in order to constitute an attorney in fact, that his authority should be delegated by deed. 1 Bac. Abr. 306, tit. "Attorney."

So Comyn distinguishes between attorneys in court (Com. Dig. tit. "Attorney," B) and attorneys for other purposes, (Id. tit. "Attorney," C 1); and lays down the principle that, in the latter case, the appointment must be by deed or letter. Id. 5.

Admitting, however, that a parol appointment is sufficient, it would seem that the nature of the authority delegated, in the fair import of the rule of this court, would require an express authorization to do the particular act, when done by one as agent and not as proctor. One cannot, by virtue of his retainer as attorney in law, assume to act in the cause in the character of attorney in fact. It does not appear, upon the proofs offered in this case, that any other authorization was given by the libellant than the usual one given to attorneys in court to prosecute and collect demands. Upon a case standing in that attitude, it is plain that the libellant could not rightfully take an order to hold the defendant to bail.

2. The oath of indebtedness attached to the libel is not sufficiently positive to satisfy the rule on that subject. The evidence of indebtedness must be direct and explicit, and the agent states nothing beyond his information and belief deduced from the examination of documents. Graham, Prac. (1st Ed.) 130; 1 Archb. Prac. 52, 53, 58, 65. The preliminary affidavit being requisite in admiralty courts in order to hold to bail, the English rule with regard to the requirements of such affidavit would naturally be adopted as the practice of that court, especially as it is the guide to the practice of the circuit court, and that court supplies the authority to the district court in matters of procedure not regulated by specific rules. Dist. Ct. Rules, 260. Supplemental affidavits, to make up a case sufficient to justify holding to bail, were not allowed in this state, (Norton v. Barnum, 20 Johns. 337,) upon the English distinction, that affidavits to cure defects in the original one upon which the defendant was held to bail, were not admissible. They could not be allowed to retroact so as to authorize continuing the defendant under bail when he had been arrested by means of a defective affidavit.

3. The libellant, in his affidavit, does not deny the allegation of the respondent's deposition that he was part-owner with the libellant in the Roanoke. He asserts that he made the advances claimed in the character of ship's husband, and that the respondent is responsible to him for them. That may be so upon a due adjustment of the legal and equitable rights of the parties, but this is not a competent tribunal through which to enforce such adjustment. The acknowledged fact that both parties are prosecuting suits against each other in New Jersey, in chancery, upon these claims, indicates plainly enough that the subject-matter is not one of simple indebtedness on the part of the one to the other. A libel cannot be maintained in this court by one owner against another, to collect a balance to be determined in his favor on the settlement of their joint accounts. The Fairplay (Case No. 4,615). The instance side of the court exercises in such cases no higher or other functions than a court of law, and before either tribunal it would be a bar to such action, to show that it was founded upon a counter and unadjusted responsibility of joint owners, it being insisted upon by each party that his advances to the common concern had been greater than those of his associate.

4. This objection does not apply to the small sum of $139 accruing from supplies furnished to the schooner Copper, and if the arrest of the defendant had been made for that demand alone, it might, perhaps, stand on the footing of an ordinary action by a materialman against the owner of a vessel.

In matters of bail, however, the court will be governed much by the equitable circumstances of each case. In this instance, the demand is exceedingly stale, and there is no allegation that the respondent could not have been arrested upon it within a reasonable period after the indebtedness had been incurred. Its justness is now denied by the affidavit of the respondent, and it is one of the subjects of litigation between the parties in their chancery suits. Under such circumstances it would not be reasonable or equitable to compel the respondent to give bail to this action in a state foreign to his domicil, and litigate the matter away from his own residence and that of the libellant, especially when it was already in prosecution between them before a home tribunal. All unwarranted arrests may be vacated, (rule 36,) and the court may, at its discretion, mitigate or enhance bail according to the rights of parties. Betts, Adm. 40. It appears to me that there is no proper ground in this case for the plaintiff to hold the defendant under arrest for a demand disputed by the latter, and which accrued more than ten years since.

5. I am not disposed to lay out of view the fact that the parties have selected a domestic forum for litigating these matters, which are now on investigation before it. Although I do not say that such fact is a legal bar to an action in this court on the same matters, it ought nevertheless to have a bearing in determining this question upon the equities between the parties. If the respondent has made his motion in due time, he is entitled, upon the principles already indicated, to his discharge, because of the defectiveness or irregularity of the proceeding on his arrest. Should his delay in making the application interfere with such relief as an absolute right, the equitable circumstances may properly be regarded by the court in determining whether he ought to be longer held in imprisonment in a controversy so circumstanced.

It is supposed by the libellant, that rule 25 of the circuit court governs the case, and that the respondent is precluded from making any application for relief after four days from his arrest. That rule, it must be remarked, does not in terms cover this case. The prohibition is in respect to orders to show cause of action, to mitigate bail, or for a bill of particulars, all of which presuppose regularity in the proceedings, and only provide for relief to the party proceeded against in connection with the continuation of the suit.

This application is founded upon irregularity and defectiveness in the proceedings of the libellant, and the respondent may rightfully appeal to the court for protection against it at any time after it is reasonably presumable he had means of ascertaining such irregularity, and especially when he has done nothing on his part to waive or cure it.

The arrest was made early in August last, and the respondent was confined in close prison thereon about ten days thereafter. No stated term of the court has been held since the arrest until the present sitting, nor has the Judge been residing in the city so that application could have been made to him personally for relief previous to the term now in session. Although the movement has not been at the very opening of the court, yet it does not appear that there has been any intentional delay or laches on the part of the respondent, and I am of opinion that he should not lose his claim to relief by the omission to bring forward his motion at the earliest day practicable.

The order will accordingly be, that he be discharged from arrest on his stipulating not to bring an action for false imprisonment against the libellant, or his attorney in fact.

If it was important to the interests of the libellant that his remedy should be sought in an admiralty court, he would have had easy access to the one in New Jersey, where both parties reside, and his arrest of the defendant in New York was needless and vexatious. The defendant is accordingly to be paid his taxed costs on this motion. Order accordingly.

Case No. 9,171.

MARTIN et al. v. The WILLIAM.

[Oliver's Forms (Ed. 1842) 474.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1819.

SEAMEN—WAGES — FORFEITURE — INCONSIDERATE TREATMENT—INTENTION.

[Rebellious and disobedient conduct on the part of a ship's crew will not be held to justify a total forfeiture of wages where such conduct was caused, more or less, by inconsiderate treatment on the part of the ship's officers, and was the display of a sudden irritation thereat, and not of a deliberate purpose to disobey.]

The libel was for $100 apiece as wages and compensation for having been kept on short allowance. The respondents [George Bachelor, master, and B. F. Pickman and others, owners, of the William], in their answer admitted there would have been due to the libellants, if they had discharged their duty as follows, namely: to John G. Martin, $63.26: William Jackson, $79.26; James Oliver, $87.71; Thomas Hay, $88.83; Andrews Armstrong, $85.65; but allege, that the libellants have forfeited their wages by neglect of duty and disobedience of orders, resistance to the lawful authority of the officers, and mutinous conduct.

James T. Austin, for libellants.

George Blake and George Sullivan, for respondents.

DAVIS, District Judge. The libellants demand balances of wages alleged to be due them respectively, for their services as mariners, on board the ship William, in a voyage from Boston to Calcutta, and back to Boston. The voyage was performed between the 22nd of February, 1818, and the 11th of February last, when the ship arrived at Boston. The engagement and services on board are not disputed, but the respondents contend that the wages, which would otherwise be due to the libellants, are forfeited by their violent and mutinous conduct on the 24th of October, and on the 30th of January last. An instance of disobedience is also offered in evidence, and, in a degree, urged at the hearing, which is asserted to have occurred at Calcutta, in July. It is not stated in the answer to the libel as one of the grounds of forfeiture, and seems to have been principally relied on in argument, as indicating an unruly disposition in those of the crew who are implicated in the charge. All the libellants, excepting Martin, are named in the log-book as culpable on that occasion.

In disputes which happen on board ships at sea, and especially in those wherein acrimonious feelings of hostility are engendered, the officers and crew taking different sides, it is generally extremely difficult to obtain a precise view of controverted facts. In this case, the mutual resentments excited on the voyage have been inflamed by proceedings since the return of the ship; and from the colorings which such occurrences naturally induce it is not easy to determine satisfactorily the true features of the transaction.

The affair of the 24th of October, commenced with a dispute, resulting in a violent affray of considerable continuance, between Isaac Bradford, the mate, and James Brown, one of the seamen. Brown was at the helm about 8 o'clock in the morning of that day, and, on being told by the mate that the ship was not in her exact course, but that the sails were shaking in the wind, he questioned the truth of the remark. An altercation on this subject, in which the mate's opinion was pertinaciously opposed by Brown, ended in blows. The first blow was given by the mate. The parties were soon locked together on the quarter-deck, giving and receiving blows, and exercising other modes of mutual annoyance. Armstrong was on the quarter-deck at the time, and either took part with Brown, or was endeavoring to relieve him, when Captain Bachelor, Mr. Smith, the supercargo, and Hay, the second mate, came up on deck. Armstrong was taken off from Bradford by the captain, and went forward. So also did Martin and Oliver, who, as Mr. Smith testifies, were on the quarter-deck when he came up from the cabin, and whom he ordered to go forward. The conflict continuing, Brown cried, "Murder!" Some of the witnesses say that this cry was repeated, and one of them, Taylor, exclaimed to the crew below, that "the mate was killing Brown." The eager attention of the whole crew was called to what was passing. With few exceptions, they advanced to the quarter-deck, avowedly with an intention of relieving Brown. The captain and officers ordered them to keep back, and for the purpose of maintaining the command of the quarter-deck, and to repel the approach of the men, some of whom were furnished with offensive weapons, the captain had his pistols brought up from the cabin, and the mate seized a capstan bar, which, when he went below for the pistols, he gave to the supercargo. The men made a pause at the gangway, and did not advance further. The two combatants, after a struggle of several minutes, in which the mate had the advantage, were separated by the captain. Brown went forward and washed the blood from his face. After a consultation between the captain and mate, he was soon ordered aft, to be put in irons. He made show of resistance to this order, and some intemperate language was uttered by one of the libellants. Martin, however, advised him to submit. Brown was accordingly put in irons, without resistance or opposition from any of the crew, and so remained three days, with a scanty allowance of bread and water.

In this affair though much sympathy was manifested by the libellants, and by the rest of the crew, with their comrade, Brown, the authority of the captain or officers was completely maintained, and though the interference of the men, for the relief of Brown, was in an unusual and imposing manner, yet the impetuous movement seems to have been seasonably checked, without actual force or violence having been committed by the libellants or any of the crew.

No further difficulty occurred until the 30th of January. The men, being below at dinner on that day, were called upon by Hay, the second mate, to haul out the bowlines. Martin first came up with his knife, which he had used at his dinner, in his left hand. The dinner, it appears, had not been satisfactory. It was a day on which pork had usually made part of the meal. Of this article, for some reason, which is not explained, they were on that day deprived; and the unpalatable rice, without its usual seasoning, had been the subject of complaint among them while at dinner. Martin was uttering some indistinct murmurs on this account, when he came upon deck, and looking at the captain, who was walking on the quarter-deck, used some abusive language in regard to him, intimating a determination to have satisfaction at some future time. The second mate said to him, "Who are you damning, and what are you grumbling about?" "What is that to you?" replied Martin, with a coarse argument too common among men of this class. The captain, hearing this reply, came forward, and ordered Martin to go aft. He refused to obey the order. It was the determination of the captain that he should be put in irons. In attempting to compel Martin to go aft, as required, the captain seized him by the collar. The two mates say that Martin first seized the captain in that manner. It is difficult to reconcile the testimony as to this fact. It was evident that it was the captain's intention to compel obedience to his order, and that Martin should be put in irons for his offensive language and deportment, and it appears probable that the mutual seizing by the collar was cotemporaneous. Bradford the mate, accompanied the captain, and assisted him in the struggle which ensued. On the other hand, the other four libellants engaged in Martin's assistance. In this operation, Bradford was pressed violently against the rails; and he is persuaded that nothing but very great efforts, by himself and the aid of the captain, prevented his being thrown overboard. Captain Bachelor was struck in the contest by Jackson, to whom he had given a blow with his flat hand. The parties, being at length disengaged, the purpose of compelling Martin to go aft, to be put in irons, was abandoned. Jackson, after the struggle, was ordered aft, but refused to obey, declaring that "he would see any man's heart's blood who should attempt to put him in irons." The officers deliberated on the state of the ship, and appear to have been in a state of alarm, and apprehension. Captain Bachelor said that he had no confidence in his crew, and a consultation ensued on the expediency of proceeding to Bermuda, or to Charleston, the nearest port in the United States. It was determined, however, to hold on their course to Boston, being careful to keep loaded arms constantly at hand, to be employed in case of an emergency, which they thought they had reason to expect. The officers were directed by the captain not to order Jackson or Martin, who were considered as the greatest offenders, to do any duty on board the ship. They were, however, occasionally employed, and took their turns in steering, though not in consequence of any orders given to them by the officers. No disorder or uneasiness afterward took place on board the ship during the twelve subsequent days that she was at sea.

It remains to consider how this culpable conduct is to be estimated in reference to the seamen's contract, and whether it shall operate, as the respondents contend it should, to the forfeiture of the wages of the libellants who were concerned, with more or less aggravation, in both affairs. The rules and principles applicable to this peculiar subject, the offences of seamen, require a full view and consideration of all the circumstances attending the transactions. These men undoubtedly committed an offence, but if there exist any circumstances in extenuation, or mitigation, they have a legitimate operation in their behalf, which the court is bound to regard.

The first remark which I would make, in respect to these two instances of disorder, is that they do not appear to have been the result of any preconcert, or premeditation, but were of sudden emergence, from unexpected circumstances. In the origination of the first affair these men had no concern. I cannot say that the mate was without fault in that instance. The conduct of Brown was, no doubt, impertinent and irritating; but some other and more deliberate mode of punishment should have been adopted than a blow with the fist, especially while the man was at the helm. The violence of the contest which ensued, was such as might have been expected from the intemperate passion with which it commenced. The mate was of superior strength. Cries of murder were uttered by Brown. It was proclaimed that the mate was killing him. The crew, who hastened to his relief, were undoubtedly wrong in part of their conduct on that occasion, especially in assuming offensive weapons; but they evidently were under the operation of sudden excitement, and were impelled by sympathies which have claims to a liberal consideration, unless there should be found combined with them a malignant and mutinous temper. I do not see evidence of that exceptionable disposition in this transaction. The sudden check to the advance of the crew should not be attributed altogether to the arms, or to the physical force opposed to them. A respect to authority should be admitted as having an influence in their minds, and in the midst of their impetuous burst of feeling, they had regard to their station and to their duties. Brown, after returning to his companions, and having washed off the blood with which he was disfigured, was soon called into the presence of the officers to be put in irons. There was no opposition to this severe act of discipline. He was advised by Martin to submit to it when manifesting some natural reluctance to that mode of confinement. This circumstance should be viewed as evidencing a prevalence of principles of subordination among the crew at that period and may lead us to impute the preceding angry appearances to sudden excitement and sympathy. There was an immediate return to duty, and if there was no subsequent misconduct, this transaction.

might be fairly considered, I think, as overlooked and forgiven, as in my opinion it ought to have been, from principles of common prudence, a discreet regard for the successful prosecution of the voyage, as well as from the general considerations applicable to cases of this description.

The second disturbance appears to me to have been much more reprehensible. But, even in regard to this, there are some mitigating circumstances, which ought not to be disregarded. It originated in discontents respecting provisions. "Though mariners and soldiers," says Molloy, "have just cause of complaint, as that their victuals or provisions are not good, yet they must not mutiny and rebel, whereby to distract and confound the whole crew, but must make a civil and humble address to their commander, that the same may be amended; and, if the case be such, that the commander cannot redress the same, they must like men bear with the extremity." The first discontent on board the William in regard to provisions appears to have been manifested in the manner which the authority enjoins, and which propriety dictates to the most uninstructed minds. The beef with which the ship was supplied, from defect in quality, or some other cause, was much disliked by the crew. They reckoned, therefore, very much on the two pork days, as they were called, Tuesday and Friday. On the Tuesday preceding the 30th of January, the quantity of pork at their dinner was so small, that an appeal to the captain was made on the subject. Instead of experiencing any beneficial change from the application, on the next pork day, which was the day of the disturbance, they had no pork at their dinner. This produced discontent at their meal, and they were especially dissatisfied with the insipidity of the rice, being without its usual relish, and without sugar, which, they thought, should have been substituted, if pork, which they preferred, should not be furnished.

From all that appears in the case, I cannot but think that a greater degree of attention to the wishes of the men, in this particular, would have been more prudent and reasonable. There would have been no loss of dignity, in an accommodation to expectations, which do not apear to have been immoderate, and were distinctly, though respectfully, expressed. The indulgences of mariners at sea are necessarily brief and few; but such as they are they cannot be abridged unnecessarily or negligently, without risk of disturbance; and a discreet regard to reasonable expectations on this head is a cheap and easy mode of acquiring cheerful obedience and submission to the severest duties of the employment. Inevitable privations are met with fortitude; but unnecessary or capricious curtailments are the sure incitements of resentment and ill will.

It would have been better, perhaps, not to have taken offense at the murmurings of Martin, or of any of the crew, when in a state of mind, which, it would seem, might have been anticipated; especially as the order which was given, was executed without delay; and in regard to Martin's intemperate language, part of which was in a degree equivocal, some more deliberate mode of punishment, I think, might have been selected to better effect, than that which was adopted. Still, the maintenance of authority on board of vessels at sea, though it may be harshly urged, is indispensable. The captain's order should have been obeyed, and whatever reluctance might have been manifested at submission to the threatened punishment, no man should have interposed to prevent its execution, unless by respectful request or representations. Mariners should understand this to be their duty most distinctly, and if the measures adopted by their commander be unnecessarily severe, due recompense is to be sought from the proper authorities, upon the arrival of the vessel.

Making every allowance, therefore, for the differences in testimony, as to some particulars of this disturbance, I must consider the conduct of the libellants as very exceptionable; but I cannot consider it when all circumstances are taken into view, as operating a forfeiture of their whole wages." The position laid down in Abb. Shipp. has been urged, that "what will justify a master in discharging a seaman, during the voyage, will also deprive the seaman of his wages." We do not gain any precise direction by this doctrine. Before it can serve as a guide, we have to apply the facts of the case to the question whether they would authorize a discharge of the men, if the ship were in a situation in which a discharge were practicable. Now, on the facts in this case, if the ship were in port, the voyage unfinished, I should doubt whether the master could have compelled the men to take a discharge, or a discharge which should deprive them of past wages, provided they should have signified proper repentant dispositions, and there should have been sufficient grounds to infer that there might be a reliance on their future good conduct. In estimating the confidence that could have been placed in them, I cannot but observe that, excepting in the two particulars relied on in the defence, and the transient and comparatively trivial instance of misbehavior at Calcutta, the history of the voyage evidences the good deportment of the men. They have performed the services required by their engagement, faithfully and uniformly, during a long voyage, and under circumstances of more than ordinary hardship and exertion.

The letter to the captain which was produced at the hearing, and all the circumstances occurring when the ship was about sailing from Calcutta, appear to me, when fairly considered, not unfavorable to these men. They pleaded the captain's declaration of a willingness to discharge them on request, and proceeded to solicit a discharge, provided the lading should be augmented to a degree which they thought unsafe. This was after the ship had put back, in consequence of a leak, and when it had been manifested that she had been overladen, and a portion of the sugars had been discharged. After a communication with the captain, the men adhered to the ship, though not without concern, and after the additional lading, which they objected to, had been put on board. The state of the ship, on the return voyage, seems to prove that the apprehensions of the crew were not altogether groundless. At any rate, I cannot but think that the concern which they expressed was genuine, and that the indications manifested in that particular, ought not to be imputed to a turbulent and unreasonable temper.

In the case of Johnson v. The Columbus [unreported] I had occasion to remark on the spirit, which it is allowable, and even requisite to introduce in causes of this description. The general considerations, expressed in that case, are applicable to this, and I shall not now repeat them. Dating from the earliest precedents, the law, in regard to the offences of seamen, admits of the reasonable operation of clemency. This is an ingredient intimately interwoven with the whole doctrine on this subject. "At the same time," as Sir William Scott observes, "this must not be understood, as if the court would show such a blind indulgence as should overrule the real justice of the case; it is only such an indulgence as the equitable considerations of public utility require, which can seldom, in such cases, any more than in others, be separated from particular justice."

From a full view of the conduct of the libellants, I cannot but consider them as very culpable, but not in an equal degree; and the mulcts, which I think I am bound to impose, will correspond to that diversity. Martin and Jackson, I shall view as not earning wages, after the 30th of January, and shall deduct three months' pay from the amount previously earned by them. Two months' pay will be deducted from the wages of Oliver, Hay, and Armstrong, each party to sustain their own costs. It will be understood, that in these deductions, applied as mulcts for the offences of these men, I do not impute to them the very atrocious design, which the mate supposes they meditated against him, in the affair of the 30th of January. I have no doubt of the reality of his apprehensions; but I do not see sufficient evidence, to authorize a conviction, that the enormity suggested was intended.

Some of the considerations, which have been expressed in giving an opinion on this case, would probably have had an operation to mitigate the demand, which has been made, of an entire forfeiture of wages, if some circumstances, peculiarly irritating, had not been adopted against the officers, soon after the arrival of the ship. The death of Brown, which happened soon after the arrival, was imputed to the officers, and a charge of murder was instituted against them. From the imprisonment consequent on the first examination on that charge, they have been liberated. From all that has appeared on this hearing, I see no ground for such an imputation. It is said that the charge was made by a relation of the deceased, and not by any of the crew. It would appear, upon the facts now disclosed, that the said prosecution could not have originated without exaggerated representations on their part. Whatever might have been their views on this subject, it is evident from the testimony of Dr. Warren, that Brown's death could not have been occasioned by any injury sustained in the affray with the mate. It was from a cause which brings many victims to a premature grave. Dr. Warren who examined the body of the deceased, testifies that he never witnessed more decided marks of disease from the intemperate use of ardent spirits. This question, however, has no intimate connection with this suit; but it having been introduced, what I have said has appeared to me to be required by the occasion.

NOTE. The decree of the judge was that, as the balance of wages, Martin recover $34.42; Jackson, $48.42; Hay, $71.84; Armstrong, $67.71; Oliver, $64.78; and each party pay his own costs.

Mutinous and rebellious conduct on the part of a seaman will justify the master in ejecting him from the duty of the ship. This will be a legal cause to refuse payment of his wages after his discharge, but, an acceptance of his services afterwards, will operate as a forgiveness of his offence, and a reinstatement in his former position. Relf v. The Maria [Case No. 11,692]; The Mentor [Case No. 9,427]. In some very aggravated cases, it would seem that all the wages due would be forfeited, if there had been no compromise or re-acceptance of service. Habitual intoxication so as to incapacitate a seaman for the discharge of his duty, habitual disobedience of reasonable commands, general neglect of duty, it would seem, will operate a forfeiture of wages; but not a single act. See The Mentor [supra] and the authorities there cited. But after a sufficient cause for forfeiture of wages has occurred, if the master, from the necessity of the case, has been obliged to retain the refractory seaman, it will not, of itself, operate as a forgiveness of his offence; and, therefore, the forfeiture will remain with its fullest effect.

MARTIN v. WINSLOW.

[2 Mason, 241.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1821.

NOTES—INDORSER—DEMAND—DELAY—NEW PROMISE.

1. In a suit by an indorsee against an indorser of a note payable on demand, the plaintiff must shew that the demand was made within a reasonable time on the maker for payment, otherwise the indorser is discharged. A delay for seven months to demand payment, unaccompanied by any circumstances accounting for such delay, is an unreasonable delay.

[Cited in Emerson v. Crocker, 5 N. H. 164; Sylvester v. Crapo, 32 Mass. (15 Pick.) 93; Poorman v. Mills, 39 Cal. 352.]

2. A promise by an indorser to pay a note, after being discharged by neglect of due notice, is not binding, unless made with a knowledge of all the material facts.

[Cited in Farrington v. Brown, 7 N. H. 274; Edwards v. Tandy, 36 N. H. 544; Spann v. Baltzell, 1 Fla. 301; Turnbull v. Maddux, 68 Md. 588, 13 Atl. 335.]

Assumpsit by indorsee against indorser on a promissory note given by Lewis Rousmaniere to the defendant [Andrew Winslow], on 4th September, 1819, for $1,129.76, payable on demand, at the New-England Commercial Bank in Newport. On the trial upon the general issue, it was admitted by the plaintiff [William Martin] that the note never was lodged at the Commercial Bank, and that no demand was ever made for payment upon Mr. Rousmaniere personally in his life time. It further appeared, that Mr. Rousmaniere died suddenly on the 6th of May, 1820. After his death, a demand was made upon his administrators as soon as could be, and notice of non-payment, Rousmaniere having died insolvent, was immediately given to the defendant, and payment demanded of him. The defendant said he had indorsed the note, and had received the notice, and being then insolvent, he said he had no objection to its coming in with his other debts. It did not appear, whether at the time of this conversation the defendant had any knowledge, that payment had never been demanded of the maker in his life time, or that the note had never been lodged at the bank. The present note was a renewal of a note originally given for the same sum, payable in nine months, which was indorsed by the defendant for the accommodation of Rousmaniere, and was delivered by the latter to the plaintiff for the purchase money of a vessel bought by Rousmaniere of the plaintiff.

Hazard & Hunter, for defendant, contended: (1) That demand of payment was not made of the maker within a reasonable time. It ought to have been made in his life time, and within a reasonable time after the note was indorsed. (2) That as it did not appear, that the defendant knew of the omission to lodge the note in the bank, or to demand payment in the maker's life time, the promise, such as it was, was not binding, being made in ignorance of the facts.

Pierce & Pitman, for plaintiff, argued e contra on both points.

STORY, Circuit Justice (charging jury). I have no hesitation in saying, that a note payable on demand must be demanded within a reasonable time, otherwise the indorser is discharged. What shall constitute a reasonable time is not a matter of absolute certainty, as to which a definite rule can be laid down. It must depend on circumstances. But unless there be circumstances in the case, which account for the delay, a neglect to demand payment of such a note for more than seven months is an unreasonable delay, and discharges the indorser. If the fact of such delay for such a length of time appear naked of all circumstances, it is a discharge of the indorser. And the onus to establish any justification or excuse for such delay lies on the plaintiff. It makes no difference in the case, that the indorsement was in lieu of a former security between the same parties, or was for the accommodation of the maker, unless the indorser assented to the delay. It will be for the jury to decide, whether there are any circumstances in this case, from which an assent to this delay can be inferred.

Then, as to the second point, a promise to pay with a full knowledge of all the facts, is binding upon the indorser, although he might otherwise be discharged. But if he promise in ignorance of material facts affecting his rights, it is not a waiver of those rights. The question then is, whether the indorser in this case had such knowledge. It may be inferred from the connexion between the parties, their near relationship, and the deep interest, which the defendant had in this particular case to ascertain, after the death of the maker, his own responsibility as indorser. It may also be inferred from the language used by him on this occasion. He did not object to the delay, though he knew the length of time, which had elapsed since the note was given. As no objection of this sort was made, it leads to the presumption, either that the indorser understood originally, that the note was to lie unpaid for a period at least as long, or that under all the circumstances he did not deem it an unreasonable delay. He had no ground to presume, that any demand of payment was made of the maker in his life time, and the fact, that the first known demand was on the administrators, and the first notice given to him after that demand, would strongly lead him to the conclusion, that there had been no prior demand. And in fact no prior demand was made. But as these are mere presumptions of fact arising from circumstances, the jury will give them what weight they think them entitled to.

The jury gave no verdict, having disagreed; and a new trial was had at June term, 1822, upon additional evidence, and a verdict returned for the defendant.

THEATRES AND SHOWS—INJUNCTION—COLORABLE IMITATION—DRAMATIC COMPOSITION—INDECENT CHARACTER.

1. Where a party seeks to enjoin another from the exhibition or performance of a spectacle or dramatic composition, he must show an exclusive right in himself to the use of such spectacle or composition, before his application will be allowed.

2. Where two spectacles, called respectively the "Black Crook" and the "Black Rook" produced the impression upon those who witnessed them that they were substantially the same: held, that one was a colorable imitation of the other.

3. The act of August 18, 1856 (11 Stat. 138), which gives "the proprietor of a dramatic composition, designed or suited for public representation, the sole right to represent the same, does not include a mere exhibition, spectacle or arrangement of scenic effects having no literary character—the same not being a "dramatic composition" within the meaning of the act.

4. The act aforesaid purports only to apply to dramatic compositions "suited to public representation," and therefore it ought not to be construed to protect the proprietor of a composition of an immoral or indecent character, in the exclusive right to represent the same.

5. In the exercise of its power to secure "to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries" (Const. art. I, § 8, subd. 8), congress may discriminate in favor of good morals, and against vice.

[Cited in Hockett v. State, 105 Ind. 256, 5 N. E. 178.]

6. The power aforesaid is conferred on congress, not generally, but only as a means to this particular end—"To promote the progress of science and useful arts"—therefore, it seems that it does not extend to writings of a grossly immoral or indecent character, or to inventions expressly designed to facilitate the commission of crime.

The complainants in [Julian] Martinetti and others against [Thomas] Maguire and others brought suit to enjoin the defendants therein from performing or exhibiting a play or spectacle, called by them the "Black Crook," alleging that the same was a mere colorable imitation of a play known as the "Black Rook," which is the property of the complainants. Thereupon, Maguire and others brought suit against Martinetti and others, to enjoin the latter from performing a play called by defendants the "Black Rook," alleging that the same was a mere colorable imitation of a play known as the "Black Crook," which is the property of said complainants.

Upon the filing of the bills, the complainants in each suit gave notice of an application to the court for a provisional injunction, as prayed for in the bill, until the final hearing. By consent of parties, the motions were heard together, upon the bills and evidence taken at the hearing.

Hall McAllister, for Martinetti and others.

Alexander Campbell, for Maguire and others.

DEADY, District Judge. The bill of the complainants, Martinetti et al., charges, that on October 17, 1866, at New York City, one James Schonberg composed and copyrighted a dramatic composition called the "Black Rook," and then and there assigned the same exclusively to complainants; that complainants are the proprietors of the Metropolitan Theatre, in San Francisco, and are about to produce on the stage thereof said play of the Black Rook; that the defendants, Maguire et al., by improper means procured a manuscript copy of the Black Rook from an employee of complainants, and is exhibiting the same at the theatre of said defendants, Maguire's Opera House, in San Francisco, to the injury of complainants; and that defendants before making such exhibition, changed the name of said play to the Black Crook, and also changed the names of the characters, and made some slight alterations in the dialogues and incidents thereof.

The bill of the complainants, Maguire et al., charges, that about July 1, 1866, one Charles M. Barras, of New York City, composed a dramatic composition called the Black Crook, and copyrighted the same; that said play was exhibited at Niblo's Theatre in New York, early in September, 1866, and continuously since that date, for the benefit of and with great gain to the author; that about March 25, 1867, the complainants became the exclusive assignee of the right to exhibit the Black Crook in the state of California, and in pursuance of such assignment, and by virtue of such right, are now exhibiting the same at Maguire's Opera House aforesaid; that during the exhibition of the Black Crook at Niblo's, as aforesaid, the defendants procured a copy of the same by employing one Schonberg, or other person, to attend such exhibition and take down the parts in shorthand, as they were spoken and acted by the players; and that the defendants are now about to exhibit such play from the copy so obtained, at the Metropolitan Theatre aforesaid, under the name of the Black Rook, to the damage of the complainants.

A number of witnesses have been examined on either side as to the identity of the plays. So far as I can judge from the evidence, the plays are identical. One of them must be a mere colorable imitation of the other. The triking similarity in the names—Black Crook and Black Rook—is enough of itself to suggest that the one is an imitation of the other. All the disinterested witnesses who have been present at the exhibition of the Black Crook at Niblo's and Maguire's agree in stating that they thought the plays the same. It is admitted and charged by Martinetti, that the play now on exhibition at the opera house is substantially the play which he calls the Black Rook, and claims to be the proprietor of. For the purpose of the comparison, let it be assumed that the Black Rook is being played at Maguire's Opera House, and the Black Crook at Niblo's. Whatever may be the technical differences in the exhibitions at these two places, if the result is so nearly the same as to produce the impression that they are identical upon ordinary spectators, it seems to me that as a question of fact, one ought to be held a mere colorable imitation of the other. A play like this has no value except as it is appreciated by the theatre-going public. It cannot be read—it is a mere spectacle, and must be seen to be appreciated. If the similarity in general character and effect between the alleged imitation and original, is sufficient to deceive the public who ordinarily witness such exhibitions, it is fair to conclude that the one is a piracy of the other.

Which, then, is the original, and which is the imitation? The respective dates of their composition seem to furnish a satisfactory answer to this question. It is admitted that the Black Crook was composed and copyrighted in the early part of July, 1866, while it is not claimed that the Black Rook was composed earlier than the middle of the October following—and after the former had been exhibited at Niblo's for at least six weeks. Unless both are original compositions or contrivances—unless this striking similarity between them is a mere coincidence, I must conclude that the Black Crook is the original, and the Black Rook the imitation or copy. As neither of these spectacles have any substantial claim to originality, I suppose the coincidence is possible. But such coincidence is not probable, while all the other circumstances of the case point to but one conclusion—that the manuscript of the so-called Black Rook, procured in New York by Martinetti from Schonberg, was a mere colorable imitation or copy of the Black Crook, obtained by improper means or without authority of the proprietors.

Whether Martinetti knew this fact at the time or since, is immaterial. In any view of the matter, he has only the same right in the premises that Schonberg would have, if he were now the party before the court. Under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, the reasonable inference is, that Martinetti did not purchase the Black Rook, believing it to be an original composition of that name, but rather that he employed Schonberg, or some other, to procure a copy of the Black Crook, to which, after making some unessential changes upon it, he gave the name of Black Rook. No evidence is produced of the alleged purchase of the Black Rook, except the allegation to that effect in the bill. If Martinetti had purchased an original composition, or what he believed to be such a composition, called the Black Rook, which had been copyrighted by the author, it is reasonable to infer that he would have taken an assignment of the latter's right to himself, and have produced it here in evidence or accounted for its absence. The omission to do this tends strongly to disprove the allegation of a purchase from Schonberg by Martinetti.

On the other hand, it is admitted that Maguire has the legal right to exhibit the Black Crook in California, and also that the present exhibition at the Opera House, is being made, not from the copy obtained from the author at the time of the assignment by him to Maguire, but from a copy of the manuscript which Martinetti alleges that he obtained from Schonberg; and that Maguire's copy is now on the way here from New York.

Martinetti's copy being prior in point of time to the assignment to Maguire, if it had been obtained by legitimate means, he would have the legal right to make an exhibition or representation of the play from such copy as against the author or his subsequent assigns. In that case, such copy would be the literary property of Martinetti, and the obtaining of a copy of this manuscript by improper means —without the consent of Martinetti—would be a fraud upon him. The purchase of this copy by Maguire's manager from Martinetti's employee—McCabe—was made under such circumstances, that he did not acquire any right thereby as against the lawful proprietor of the original. At the time of the sale McCabe declined to tell when, where, or how he got the copy. Maguire's manager then knew that the Martinettis were rehearsing the spectacle set down therein. The manager from these and other circumstances had good reason to believe that he was purchasing stolen property; and whether he believed so or not, as such was the fact, the effect is the same.

But Martinetti had no literary property in the copy which he obtained from New York. By literary property, of course, I mean property in the composition, and not in the mere paper. The Black Rook, or manuscript in the possession of Martinetti, was itself a plagiarism of, or a slightly disguised copy of, the Black Crook. This being so, it was stolen property in the same sense that the copy was which McCabe sold to Maguire, and therefore Martinetti has no literary property in it. He is neither the author, assignee or donee of the play or the manuscript of it. For this reason, I am clear that he cannot enjoin Maguire from the use of his copy, however obtained. In this respect, both parties are wrong-doers and in pari delicto.

More than this, I suppose that the owner of a play who finds that a colorable imitation of it, or a true copy surreptiously obtained, is in the hands of a third person, may purchase the same, even if he should know at the time that the person from whom he is purchasing has obtained it from another improperly. This may be the easiest and cheapest way of protecting his rights as owner. In effect he is only buying his own property—or buying his peace instead of going to law.

This, I believe, disposes of all the grounds on which the complainants—Martinetti et al.—rely for an injunction, and their motion must, therefore, be denied, with costs.

On the other hand, if this play is a "dramatic composition," within the purpose and meaning of the act of congress (4 Stat. 436; 11 Stat. 138), the motion of the complainants—Maguire et al.—for an injunction against Martinetti et al. should be allowed. But as at present advised, I do not think it such a composition. All the witnesses agree—particularly the experts—that the so-called play of the Black Crook has no originality, and that it consists almost wholly of scenic effects, or representations taken substantially from well known dramas and operas. The evidence of W. B. Hamilton, the stage-manager of the Metropolitan, is explicit and satisfactory on that point. He has been an actor since 1828, in both Europe and America. He appears to be well informed in what pertains to his profession, and impressed me with his fairness and candor.

The Black Crook is a mere spectacle—in the language of the craft a spectacular piece. The dialogue is very scant and meaningless, and appears to be a mere accessory to the action of the piece—a sort of verbal machinery tacked on to a succession of ballet and tableaux. The principal part and attraction of the spectacle seems to be the exhibition of women in novel dress or no dress, and in attractive attitudes or action. The closing scene is called Paradise, and as witness Hamilton expresses it, consists mainly "of women lying about loose"—a sort of Mohammedan paradise, I suppose, with imitation grottos and unmaidenly houris. To call such a spectacle a "dramatic composition" is an abuse of language, and an insult to the genius of the English drama. A menagerie of wild beasts, or an exhibition of model artistes might as justly be called a dramatic composition. Like those, this is a spectacle, and although it may be an attractive or gorgeous one, it is nothing more. In my judgment, an exhibition of women "lying about loose" or otherwise, is not a dramatic composition, and, therefore, not entitled to the protection of the copyright act. On this ground, the application of Maguire et al. for an injunction is denied, with costs.

But, further, the act of congress provides that a "dramatic composition" to be entitled to be copyrighted, must be "suited for public representation." What is intended by the word "suited?" Simply that the composition is technically adapted to the stage, and capable of being produced upon it? While it means this, I am inclined to think it means something more; that to be suited to public representation, it must be fit to be represented. I do not for a moment suppose or pretend that congress has the power to interfere directly and prescribe a standard of good morals on this subject. But the benefit of copyright is a privilege conferred by congress in pursuance of the constitution of the United States. In conferring this privilege or monopoly upon authors and inventors, I suppose that it is both proper and constitutional for congress so to legislate, as to encourage virtue and discourage immorality.

Congress has power "to establish an uniform rule of naturalization." Const. art. 1, § 8, subd. 4. In exercising this power, it has always discriminated in favor of morality, by providing that on the hearing of the application for citizenship, the applicant must prove that for five years prior to such application, "he has behaved as a man of good moral character." 2 Stat. 154.

Besides, the power to pass what are called copyright and patent laws, or as the constitution expresses it, to secure "for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries," is given not generally, but only as a means to this particular end—"to promote the progress of science and useful arts." Const. art. 1, § 8, subd. 8. Hence, it expressly appears that congress is not empowered by the constitution to pass laws for the protection or benefit of authors and inventors, except as a means of promoting the progress of "science and useful arts." For this reason, an invention expressly designed to facilitate the commission of crime, as murder, burglary, forgery or counterfeiting, however novel or ingenious, could not be patented. So with a dramatic composition which is grossly indecent, and calculated to corrupt the morals of the people. The exhibition of such a drama neither "promotes the progress of science or useful arts," but the contrary. The constitution does not authorize the protection of such productions, and it is not to be presumed that congress intended to go beyond its power in this respect to secure their "authors and inventors the exclusive right" to the use of them. Upon this ground, I very much doubt whether the spectacle of the Black Crook is entitled to the benefit of copyright, even if it were admitted that it was a "dramatic composition."

In considering these questions, this court does not pretend to be the conservator of the public morals in this respect. That is a matter for the local legislature. But in giving construction to the constitution and laws, when legitimately called upon to do so, it is the duty of all courts to uphold public virtue, and discourage and repel whatever tends to impair it. Now, it cannot be denied that this spectacle of the Black Crook only attracts attention as it panders to a prurient curiosity or an obscene imagination by very questionable exhibitions and attitudes of the female person. True, the lawfulness of such an exhibition depends upon the law of the place where it takes place. But when the author, inventor or proprietor thereof asks the power of this court to protect him in the exclusive right to make such an exhibition under the copyright act, the matter assumes a very different aspect. I am strongly impressed with the conviction that an injunction should not be allowed in this case on the ground that the Black Crook is not "suited for public representation"—not fit to be exhibited—within the meaning of the act of congress; and on the further ground that it is not within the scope of the power granted to congress to protect the authors or inventors of such exhibitions in "the exclusive right" to the use of them, as they neither promote the progress of science or useful arts.

MARTINEZ v. The ANGLO NORMAN et al.

[Newb. 492.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Louisiana. Nov., 1854.[2]

COLLISION—TOW—SHORT HAWSER—PROPER MEASURE OF PREVENTION.

1. Where it appeared, that while the libelant's schooner and a bark were in tow of a tow-boat, both vessels being astern of the tow-boat, the schooner by some mismanagement, ran in before the bow of the bark, broke her own hawser, capsized and immediately sunk; and it further appeared that the cause of the disaster was the shortness of the hawser of the schooner, and the refusal of those in charge of her "to pay it out," in obedience to the orders of the master of the tow-boat; it was held that neither the tow-boat nor the bark was to blame, and that the libel should be dismissed.

2. In a collision between two vessels, where it appears that one of them has neglected an ordinary and proper measure of prevention, the burden is on her to show that the collision was not owing to her neglect, but would have equally happened, if she had performed her duty.

[Suit in admiralty by Ramon Martinez and others, owners of the schooner Anita, against the steamboat Anglo Norman and the bark Jane E. Williams for the recovery of damages caused by collision.]

C. Roselius, for libelants.

Benjamin, Bradford & Finney, for the Anglo Norman.

Durant & Hornor, for the Jane E. Williams.

McCALEB, District Judge. In this case it appears that, while the schooner Anita belonging to the libelants, and the bark Jane E. Williams were in tow of the Anglo Norman, both vessels being astern of the tow-boat, the schooner by some mismanagement, ran in before the bow of the bark, broke her own hawser, capsized and immediately sunk. This suit is brought to recover the damages sustained by the libelants in consequence of the loss of their vessel; and they have filed their libel against both the tow-boat and the bark.

An attentive examination of all the evidence has led me to the conclusion that the cause of the disaster was the shortness of the hawser by which the schooner was towed. It is impossible, it seems to me, that the loss of the schooner could have occurred in the manner spoken of by the witnesses, if the two vessels astern had been placed at an equal distance from the stern of the tow-boat. The evidence on behalf of the libelants is very strong in support of the position assumed by their proctor, that the collision occurred in consequence of the wild and irregular steering of the bark; but on behalf of the latter vessel, it is equally strong that the schooner was to blame. I can see no fair ground for giving judgment against either the tow-boat or the bark. The captain of the former repeatedly gave orders to the schooner, to "pay out" the hawser; and he was certainly not to blame if his orders were not obeyed. Nor could the bark be responsible for the deficiency in the length of the hawser, or the irregular steering which was the consequence of that deficiency. I am therefore of opinion that the libelants have failed to make out a case which would entitle them to the judgment of the court.

In a collision between two vessels, where it appears that one of them had neglected an ordinary and proper measure of prevention, the burden is on her to show that the collision was not owing to her neglect, but would have equally happened if she had performed her duty. [Clapp v. Young, Case No. 2,786]; Abb. Shipp. 300, note.

The libel must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

The above case was taken by appeal to the circuit court, and the decree of the district court was affirmed by Justice Campbell.

MARTINS v. BALLARD et al.

[Bee, 51.] [1]

District Court, D. South Carolina. Oct. 1, 1794.

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY — LIBEL IN PERSONAM—TORT—DAMAGES.

Damages will be assessed in this court, upon a libel in personam, for commission of trespass or tort upon the high seas.

[Cited in Plummer v. Webb, Case No. 11,233; Camden & A. R. Transp. Co. v. The Lotty, Id. 2,337a; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank of Boston, 6 How. (47 U. S.) 432.]

In admiralty.

BEE, District Judge. This is a libel for damages. The evidence is, in all material points, the same that was produced in the cause of Jansen v. The Magdalena [Case No. 7,216], and these defendants; except only as to the matter of damages. I shall not, therefore, recapitulate that evidence; the former case having been so recently decided.

The proceedings are, now, in personam; but the principles of both cases, as relates to the law of nations and to treaties, are the same. The plea to the jurisdiction of the court is made as by [William] Talbot, with this difference, that, upon the former occasion, [Edward] Ballard made default, and every charge was of course taken, as against him, pro confesso. Here he has pleaded, and his advocate relies upon the ground not taken in the first case. I shall consider the arguments by which it is contended that a difference exists as to the merits. The former decree was founded on the 19th article of the treaty with the United Netherlands. It is said that Ballard's commission does not come within that article.

It is also contended that the schooner L'Ami de la Liberté is a vessel belonging to the French republic, and therefore not within the letter or spirit of the 19th article of the treaty with Holland. That any American citizen may lawfully command a public vessel, under French authority, and may of right examine, on the high seas, vessels belonging to neutrals or to the enemies of France. Molloy, 1, 3, 12. That Captain [Peter] Martins, having made resistance to such examination, must abide by the consequences of his own imprudence.

I have already declared my opinion of the authority under which Ballard acted. It runs thus:

"In the Name of the French People. On board the Tigre, 13th of Germinal, 2d year of the republic, &c. Peter John Vanstable, rear admiral commanding a division of the naval forces of the republic, stationed on the coast of the United States of America. In consequence of the offer of citizen Sinclair to enter, voluntarily and from pure love of liberty, into the service of the French republic, and the engagement on his part to conduct himself altogether as a good French republican, I give him an order to take command of the schooner 'L'Ami de la Liberté,' and to fulfil the commission confided to him by me. (Signed) Rear Admiral Vanstable.

"We Anthony Louis Fonsportuis, consul of the French republic, charged with the consul's office at Charleston, certify to all whom it may concern that the citizen John Sinclair, having declared to us his inability to go to sea, requires us to transfer the present commission to the citizen Edward Ballard. We have therefore transferred the said commission to the said Ballard, to be executed by him in the place of said Sinclair."

Given at the consul's office.

This commission, however legal for the purpose mentioned in it, was illegal when applied to others, so different from its tenor; and Ballard was highly criminal in so converting and abusing it. What proof is offered that this vessel belonged to the French republic? The admiral's commission does not describe her as such; nor is she so called in the consul's letter to the collector of Charleston. He says, only, that she is under a special commission of Admiral Vanstable, charged by him with a secret expedition. That it is indispensable that she should be allowed to go to sea; and that she does not come within the embargo. But he does not say she belongs to the republic. If we examine the evidence of Mr. Airs, we shall find that at the time when she was employed by Admiral Vanstable in the business committed by him to Sinclair (which both Airs and Sasportas explained to be unrigging and prevention from sailing of certain vessels at Norfolk) he (Airs) sailed in her from the fleet to that place. She was then, he says, commanded by Ballard, and Sinclair appeared as a passenger on board. He says further: that she was raised from a pilotboat, and was fitted with railing and stanchions, and a streak above wale, for guns. When she arrived here, she came in under American colours: Wallace the boarding officer, minuted her as a Virginia pilotboat, armed in Norfolk. The collector says she was entered as such, by Sinclair; that he alone managed all that related to her at the custom-house, even after she had been transferred by the consul to Ballard. Add to this Craig's evidence, and no doubt can remain as to her being private, not public property. Here is, indeed, proof positive from the acknowledgment of Sinclair himself, and of Talbot, that she was owned in part by Sinclair, whose partnership with the French republic is too ridiculous to be credited. All reliance upon the ground of her being a public vessel of that government must fail. As therefore Talbot, under the treaty with Holland, was not at liberty to capture Dutch property; as Ballard's was a private vessel, and himself incapable of making lawful capture, for want of a lawful commission; I can do no otherwise in this case than I did in that of Jansen v. The Magdalena [supra], I must sustain the jurisdiction of this court, and declare the proceedings of both these defendants to be wholly illegal.

It remains to inquire whether the court has any, and what, further jurisdiction in cases of this nature. The 9th section of the judiciary law of congress vests this court with exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. This necessarily includes all matters arising on the high seas, of a civil nature; all contracts, torts and trespasses; and, by the law of nations, is extended to all civil contests between our own citizens, and between foreigners, as to the right of property which has been illegally and piratically taken on the high seas. Such property, may if retained, and brought within the jurisdiction of the court, be restored: and equivalent damages may be given, if it has been disposed of. The court may proceed civiliter, even where it is, expressly, without criminal jurisdiction. In Le Caux v. Eden Doug. 594, it is shewn, by two cases, that the court of admiralty in England, sitting as an instance court, restored property taken by pirates, who had not been apprehended.

The supreme court of the United States having, in Glass v. The Betsey [3 Wall. (3 U. S.) 6], decided that this court is possessed of all the powers of a court of admiralty, whether as an instance or prize court, it must be authorized to inquire into, and to determine the quantum of damages and costs in all cases of trespass or tort. The case from Douglas above reported is supported by that of Livingston v. M'Kenzie, in 3 Durn. & E. [3 Term R.] 333. And similar proceedings have been had formerly in this court, as appears by reference to its records. I will, at present, content myself with mentioning the case of Walton v. Jeamans, in August, 1748 [unreported]. There the defendant was condemned to pay £500 for unlawfully capturing and entering the libellant's vessel and taking therefrom the goods, wares, and merchandise enumerated in the libel. Hopk. 137, is full to the same point, viz. the power this court has to assess damages in personam. I shall proceed to do so in the case before me.

It is pretended by the defendants that they boarded the actor's vessel (Fortune der Zee) merely for the purpose of examining her. Why then did they, in the first instance, order her to strike? and why, after boarding her, and finding that she was Dutch property, did they not relinquish the prize? Their conduct, on the preceding day, in the case of the Magdalena makes their real intentions too plain. But the bringing off the captain and crew of the Fortune, when they found themselves obliged to give up the ship, serves to shew that the folly of their conduct was equal to the guilt of it: for had they been left, the vessel would have proceeded on her voyage, and the trouble and expense of this suit would have been spared. It has been proved that the sails and rigging were much injured; and though this has been attributed to the circumstance of the vessel's going into the Havanna, it is neither probable that it was so, nor was any evidence adduced to support the assertion.

I find by reference to merchants of respectability, well acquainted with such business, that the amount of damages done to the sails and rigging could not be less than... Dollars 500
The pay and wages of a captain and seamen to navigate her to Holland is, at least..... 300
(I make no allowance for demurrage at the Havanna, as it appears that the vessel waited there for the fleet, not choosing to sail alone.)
From statements in the libel, which are not contradicted, and from information of the witnesses, I calculate captain Martin's damage, by loss of clothes, plate, &c. at.. Dollars 750
His pay as captain, from 18th May to 18th December, (seven months) when he may probably get back to Holland, amounts, at thirty dollars per month, to..... 210
His expenses here for four months, at thirty dollars per month..... 120
Counsel's fees 150

Total amount ..... Dollars 2,030

Of this sum I decree to the owners of the ship..... Dollars 800
To the captain, as above..... Dollars 1,230

As both defendants were included, by consent of their counsel, in this decision, I adjudge and order that each of them pay one moiety, say ten hundred and fifteen dollars, of the above total amount; and that they pay the costs of suit. I direct further that twelve hundred and thirty dollars be paid to the captain of the Fortune der Zee; and the remaining eight hundred deposited in the branch bank here, till applied for by the owner or owners of the ship, or their authorized agent.

Case No. 9,176.

MARTINS v. BALLARD.

[Bee, 258.] [1]

District Court, D. South Carolina. 1808.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT—RELEASE—TORTS.

Persons confined in jail for torts and trespasses do not come within the provisions of the act of congress, or that of this state [South Carolina] for relief of insolvent debtors.

The application now before the court is made on the part of Captain Ballard, who desires that he may be admitted to take the oath, mentioned in the act of congress, for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt. It has been objected that this act relates solely to persons confined for debt on execution; and that Ballard does not come within that description. The law of this state for the relief of insolvent debtors excepts such persons as are in confinement for torts and trespasses; and it has been contended that the exception ought to prevail in this instance. That such is the proper construction of the state law is admitted by the opposite counsel; but they assert that it cannot apply here. That the act of congress alone must guide the present decision, and that, in it, all civil actions are comprehended. That it must be construed favourably, being in favorem libertatis. That confinement of debtors is contrary to every principle of humanity. That the claim [by Peter Martins] against [Edward] Ballard, for which he stands imprisoned, is by operation of law become, and must be considered as, a debt, within the meaning and intention of the law of congress.

BEE, District Judge. As this is a case of first impression, I have considered it with much attention. In order to determine it, we must look to the origin of the suit, and see in what predicament Ballard now stands. The suit was instituted, originally, for damages, under the treaty with the United Netherlands. Ballard was taken into custody on a warrant out of this court, and gave bond with sufficient security to abide the court's decision. Previously to a final decision, his surety, or bail, applied here for leave to surrender back the defendant to the custody of the marshal; and this was done accordingly. Ballard now applies for relief under this act of congress.

It cannot be doubted that the act was intended solely for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt. It speaks of such as may be in confinement "on executions issuing from any court of the United States for satisfaction of judgments in any civil actions." If this suit had been for debt, or on contract, I should have had no doubt upon the point; but, by reference to the treaty with the United Netherlands, we find that this suit originated in a violation of that treaty expressly guarded against thereby. (See 13th article of that treaty.) We must, therefore, consider how far cases like the present could have been contemplated by congress, when they passed this act. Could they mean to discharge such offenders as Ballard; against whom the treaty expressly declares that their persons, as well as their goods, shall be answerable for any violation of its provisions? I am of opinion that the clause of the act relates not to him. To discharge him under the present application would, I think, shew a misconstruction of the law, and amount, on my part, to an infringement of the treaty. Let the application be dismissed.

[See Cases Nos. 7,216 and 9,175.]

COLLISION — SPECIFIC NEGLIGENCE CHARGED — HELM SHIFTED—NEGLIGENTLY NAVIGATED.

Where a libel, in rem, for a collision, alleged, that the collision occurred because the vessel sued shifted her helm from starboard to port, and it was not clear, on the evidence, that that was the fact, but the libel also alleged that the vessel sued could easily have avoided the collision, but was so negligently and carelessly navigated, that she ran into the other vessel, which was lying disabled, and the evidence sustained such allegation: held, that the failure to prove the alleged mode in which the collision occurred was no ground for refusing a decree to the libellants.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

Charles Donohue, for libellants.

Robert D. Benedict, for claimants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. I concur in the conclusion of the learned district judge, by whom, more than nineteen years ago, this case was decided. The libellants' schooner was suddenly disabled, and, while, with all diligence, her captain and crew were making the necessary repair, by which alone the schooner could be steered, the vessel meantime lying with her head to the wind, and with little or any motion, except with the current, the sloop, the Martin Wyncoop, having a range of the whole breadth of the North river, nearly three miles at the point in question, ran into her, and caused the damage for which recovery herein was sought. I cannot find that the schooner or her crew omitted any practicable and reasonable precaution to prevent the collision, or that they did anything which contributed thereto; and, that the sloop had abundance of time and opportunity to see and avoid the schooner, is most palpable.

It is, however, most urgently insisted, that the decree should be reversed, because the precise mode in which the vessels were brought together, as stated in the libel, is not confirmed by the proofs; that is to say, that it is stated in the libel, that the sloop had her tiller to starboard, and would have cleared, and was, in fact, clearing the schooner, when her tiller was shifted to port, and she was thereby directed and navigated into the schooner. It is claimed, that not only the positive testimony, but the manner in which the blow was given and received, disproves this allegation.

There is, no doubt, some difficulty, upon the proofs, to explain precisely how the two vessels got into the position in which they were at the moment of the blow, that is, starboard bow to starboard bow, for that is the preponderance of the evidence. But, the allegation in the libel relates to the time when the danger was imminent, when those on board the schooner had actually hailed the on-coming sloop, when, as I think, for want of a proper lookout on the sloop, she had got herself in too near proximity to the schooner, and when, whether it is true that she ported her helm, or, in the excitement of the peril, neglected to keep off sufficiently, ought not to be made the test of the right of recovery. The substantial fact stated in the libel, that, at a time when, at such distance from the schooner that she could easily have passed on either side of her, she was so negligently and carelessly navigated that she ran into her, is, I think, fully proved. On that ground the libellants should have a decree, for the amount decreed below, with interest and costs.

BANKRUPTCY—INSANE DEBTORS—OBJECTION OF GUARDIAN.

A person who is so unsound in mind as to be wholly incapable of managing his affairs, cannot commit an act for which he can be forced into bankruptcy by his creditors against the objection of his guardian.

[Cited in Re Pratt, Case No. 11,371; Re Weitzel, Id. 17,365.]

[In review of the action of the district court for the Eastern district of Missouri.]

A petition was filed, in February, 1871, in the district court for the Eastern district of Missouri, by creditors, under the 39th section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 536)] for an adjudication of bankruptcy against William L. Marvin. Two acts of bankruptcy were charged: (1) That Marvin, being a merchant, on the 4th day of January, 1871, suspended and did not resume payment of his commercial paper within fourteen days, nor at any time thereafter. (2) That in January, 1871, Marvin being insolvent, did suffer his property to be taken on legal process under writs of execution and attachment, with intent to defeat and delay the operation of the bankrupt act. Marvin, by his guardian, appeared and filed an answer to the petition, stating that on the 30th day of January, 1871 (prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy), by due proceedings in the probate court of St. Louis county, Marvin was adjudged to be a person of unsound mind, and incapable of managing his affairs, and that by an order of said court B. D. Lee was duly appointed, and has qualified as guardian of the person and estate of the said Marvin. And the answer states that at the time mentioned in the petition, when the acts of bankruptcy were committed, Marvin was a person of unsound mind, wholly incapable of managing his business, and of committing any of the acts of bankruptcy charged against him, and had been in that condition of mind for more than six months before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy. The district court (Treat, J.) held this to be a good answer to the petition, and accordingly overruled a demurrer thereto, and the petitioning creditors electing to abide by the demurrer, their petition was dismissed, and they bring the question into this court for review.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge, referring to the somewhat unsatisfactory state of the authorities cited in the note, observed, that upon consideration, the court is of the opinion that a person who is so unsound in mind as to be wholly incapable of managing his affairs cannot in that condition commit an act for which he can be forced into bankruptcy by his creditors, against the objection of his guardian. Whether such a person, on the petition of himself or guardian, may, if insolvent, go into voluntary bankruptcy, the court gives no opinion. Affirmed.

BANKRUPTCY—ILLEGAL PREFERENCE — MORTGAGE TO SECURE FUTURE CREDITS.

F., a dealer in boots and shoes, was accustomed to buy goods of C. At a time when he was not indebted to C., he applied to C. to buy more goods on credit, and it was agreed that C. should furnish him goods from time to time, on the security of a mortgage on certain lands of F. The mortgage was made by F. to C., being, in terms, to secure any liability, not exceeding $3,000, that might be incurred by F. to C., and being so drawn as to cover any present as well as any future liability. C. afterwards sold goods to F. to the value of $800, who continued his business, but was, shortly afterwards, adjudged a bankrupt. The assignee in bankruptcy of F. brought this suit to set aside the mortgage: Held, that the mortgage was valid to the extent of the goods sold by C. to F. on the faith of the mortgage.

In equity.

Richard Marvin, in pro. per.

Charles M. Dickinson, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action brought by Richard Marvin, assignee in bankruptcy of Joseph Farrel, to set aside a mortgage made by Farrel to the defendant James Chambers. It appears, from the evidence, that Farrel was a dealer in boots and shoes, accustomed to buy goods of the defendant. On the 5th of June, 1874, Farrel, not being at the time indebted to Chambers, applied to Chambers to buy more goods upon credit, whereupon it was agreed that goods should be furnished him from time to time, upon the security of a mortgage upon certain lands. In pursuance of this arrangement, the mortgage in question was made, which, in terms, stated that it was given to secure any liability, not exceeding the sum of $3,000, that might be incurred by the mortgagor to the mortgagee. The clause in the mortgage is drawn to cover any present as well as any future liability; but, as before stated, it is admitted that no present liability existed at the time of its execution. Goods were thereafter sold by Chambers to Farrel, to the amount of some $800, and, no long time afterwards, Farrel became bankrupt. Now, Chambers claims to hold this mortgage as security for the value of the goods actually sold by him to Farrel upon the faith of the mortgage. The evidence contains some contradictory testimony as to whether Chambers knew that Farrel was insolvent at the time of the execution of the mortgage; but, there is no dispute as to the fact, that, after giving the mortgage, Farrel continued his business, and actually received from Chambers some $800 worth of goods, which were purchased upon the faith of the mortgage in question. The case is thus shown to be one of a mortgage executed in good faith, for a present good consideration. Such a mortgage is protected by the bankrupt law, and, to the extent of the advances actually made, is good as against an assignee in bankruptcy.

There must, therefore, be a decree dismissing the bill, with costs.

[1 Blatchf. 159;[1] 20 Vt. 662.]

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. May Term, 1846.

EJECTMENT—TITLE—POSSESSION—PROPER PARTIES—BOND FOR DEED.

1. The object of the action of ejectment, as used in Vermont, is to settle the title and establish the right of property, as well as to recover the possession; and the judgment is made conclusive as to all the parties.

2. Where it appeared, in ejectment, that one of the defendants claimed title to the lands in question, under a mortgage from the others, and that the others were in the actual occupancy of the lands, there being no evidence, however, that the defendant claiming as mortgagee was in actual possession: held, nevertheless, that he was properly joined as a party defendant in the action.

3. It would seem, that any person under whom the tenant in possession may, legally speaking, be said to hold, whatever may be the nature or character of the tenancy, should be liable to be made a party to the action.

4. It would seem, also, that a vendor may be joined with his vendee, where the latter holds under a bond or contract for a deed; or a trustee with his cestui que trust, where the latter is in possession under the trust title.

This was an action of ejectment [by Ebenezer Marvin against Isaac Dennison and others]. It appeared that one of the defendants claimed title to the lands in question, under a mortgage from the others, and that the others were in the actual occupancy of the lands; but there being no evidence that the defendant, so claiming as mortgagee, was in actual possession, it was objected that the action could not be maintained against him. The court overruled the objection, on the grounds and for the reasons stated in the following opinion.

B. H. Smalley, for plaintiff.

Lucius B. Peck and Oliver P. Chandler, for defendants.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and PRENTISS, District Judge.

PRENTISS, District Judge. The object of the action of ejectment, as adopted and in use in this state, is not merely to recover the possession, but to settle the title and establish the right of property as well as to recover the possession. To this end, and to prevent repetition of actions, the judgment, instead of leaving the title and right of property unsettled, and the same question liable to be retried by successive suits, as at common law, is made conclusive as to all the parties. Looking to the purpose and effect of the action, as thus defined and regulated, it would seem that, as a general rule of practice naturally resulting therefrom, independent of any special legislative enactment on the subject, any person under whom the tenant in possession may, legally speaking, be said to hold, whatever may be the nature or character of the tenancy, should be liable to be made a party to the action.

How far the statute regulation, that "the action shall be brought as well against the landlord as the tenant in possession of the premises," which makes the joinder imperative, instead of leaving it optional with the plaintiff, as it otherwise would be, does or ought to be held to extend, is a question of construction. If it embraces all tenancies, tenancies of every nature and kind, then, of course, the parties to all not only may but must be joined. If it extends only to a particular class of tenancies, such as are created by lease, reserving rent, service, or other equivalent duty, where the relation of landlord and tenant strictly and properly exists, as would seem to be the more reasonable and just construction, then all other tenancies, not within the particular regulation, remain subject to the common rule, and the parties to them, like parties in other analogous cases, may, but need not be joined.

To the joinder of mortgagee with mortgagor, we are not able to perceive any well founded objection; nor any, we may add, to the joinder of vendor with vendee, where the latter holds under a bond or contract for a deed, or of trustee with cestui que trust, where the latter is in possession under the trust title. In these and other cases of a like nature, but especially in that of mortgagee and mortgagor, there is such a relation or connection existing between the respective parties as constitutes a tenancy, though it may not amount to that of landlord and tenant within the meaning of the statute. A mortgagee, if he claims title under the mortgage, cannot be allowed, in contradiction to the tenancy, to set himself up, or claim to be treated, as a stranger to the possession. If he claims nothing under the mortgage, and would, on that ground, not only discharge himself from, but recover costs, there can be no injustice or hardship in compelling him to disclaim, so that he may be forever estopped by matter of record from setting up any title under the mortgage.

If the mortgagee cannot be made a party, the suit would be, in a good measure, ineffectual; since a judgment against the mortgagor, though conclusive upon his rights, would have no effect upon the rights of the mortgagee, who would be at liberty to bring an action in his own behalf and have the title tried over again, or to leave it unsettled and open to litigation during his pleasure or until the statute of limitations should run. Instead of such being the rule of practice, it would seem to be more consistent with the general reason and policy of the law, that all the parties to the title, under and subsidiary to which the possession is held, should be liable to be joined in the first instance, and the title finally settled as to all, in one suit. The fitness and propriety of this will appear none the less obvious, when it is considered that otherwise, especially where different courts, acting under different and independent jurisdictions, exist and may be resorted to, there might, possibly, be conflicting decisions upon the same title.

As the mortgagee, even after default in payment, has no right, or but an imperfect right, under any view of the law, to the rents and profits, until demand made or action brought, he can be answerable for them only when he has received them. It has been argued, however, that if there is a recovery against him for seizin and possession, there must also, of necessity, according to technical rules, be judgment against him for the rents and profits. But we see no such technical difficulty, nor indeed any practical difficulty whatever, if the parties plead severally, as they may do, in giving judgment in such case for the damages against the mortgagor alone.

No adjudication of the state court has been brought to our notice or referred to by the counsel, nor are we favored with information in any other way how the subject is or has been considered there. We learn, however, that the precise question here presented was determined in this court several years ago by the late Judge Thompson, and we all know how to appreciate the soundness, as well as the learning and ability of his judicial opinions. On the authority of that decision, thus in point, as well as upon our own judgment on the merits of the matter, given in the views already expressed, the objection taken by the defendants' counsel must be overruled.

District Court, D. Maine. May 31, 1845.

BANKRUPTCY — PARTNERSHIP — CREDITORS — NO JOINT ESTATE—INDIVIDUAL CREDITORS.

1. Whether under the bankrupt act the creditors of a partnership can be allowed to prove claims against the separate estate of one of the partners to receive dividends, in concurrence with the separate creditors of the partner, when there is no joint estate and no living solvent partner—quaere.

[Cited in Re Johnson, Case No. 7,369.]

2. If there be any joint fund, however small, such proof cannot be allowed, although such fund may have been created by the separate creditors purchasing some of the partnership assets, actually worthless, for the purpose only of creating it; for if there be a joint fund, the court cannot, under the statute, look behind the fact, to inquire how it has been produced.

[Cited in Re Byrne, Case No. 2,270; Mead v. National Bank of Fayetteville, Id. 9,366; Re Dunham, Id. 4,144; Re McEwen, Id. 8,783; U. S. v. Lewis, Id. 15,595.]

[Cited in Harris v. Peabody, 73 Me. 269.]

This was a case of objection to a proof of a debt. [Albert] Marwick, the bankrupt, in May, 1837, entered into a co-partnership with one Frederick Davis, and as partners they purchased a quantity of provisions for the Georgia Lumber Company, to the amount of $800, for which they drew their bill on the company in favor of one Bradbury. Before the bill was paid, the company failed, and the failure of the company produced that of the copartnership of Marwick & Davis, by which the firm was dissolved. They afterwards gave their joint note for the sum remaining due, viz., $740.88. This note, Bradbury, for a valuable consideration, transferred to Dole, with notice with that it was a partnership debt. The assignee of Marwick & Davis, rendered in his account of the joint estate, Oct. 25, 1844, showing outstanding demands, in favor of the firm, to the amount of $13,000, which comprised the whole assets of the firm and which were all represented as utterly worthless. Dole, the creditor, proved his debt, June 17, 1842. The assignee, after rendering his first account, applied for liberty to compromise, or sell, the claim against the Georgia Lumber Company, which was disposed of for $40, of which a supplementary account was rendered, and the amount paid into court, April 25, 1845, to the credit of the joint estate. The final account of the assignee of the separate estate showed assets to the amount of $545.93. Two debts have been proved and allowed against the estate, one by Charles E. Marwick, for $684.04, and the debt of Dole. Marwick objected to the admission of Dole's debt against the separate estate.

WARE, District Judge. Two questions have been raised and argued in the present case. The first is, whether the creditors of a copartnership can, in any case, be admitted to prove their claims against the separate estate of one of the copartners, for the purpose of receiving dividends in concurrence with the separate creditors of the copartner. The second is, whether, admitting that they may in some cases, the partnership creditors can be admitted so to prove under the facts in this case.

The 14th section of the bankrupt act [5 Stat. 448] provides, when two or more persons become bankrupt who are partners in trade, that separate and distinct accounts shall be kept, in the settlement of their estates, of the joint effects of the firm and of the separate effects of the several partners, and when the whole expenses are paid, that the net proceeds of the joint property shall be applied to the payment of the joint creditors, and the separate property of each partner shall be applied to the payment of his separate creditors, and that the creditors of the respective estates shall be allowed to receive dividends from the other estate only after the creditors of that estate shall have been fully paid. This is in substance the rule established by the law, and it is quite clear where there is both a joint and separate estate, that the creditors of neither can prove against the other estate for the purpose of receiving dividends, except from the surplus remaining after its own proper creditors have been fully satisfied. This general rule for marshaling the assets and claims is taken from the English bankrupt law. But under that system there are exceptions, as well established as the rule itself. One of these exceptions is where there is no joint estate and no living solvent partner, as is the fact in the present case. In such a case, the joint creditors are allowed to prove and receive dividends against the separate estate, in concurrence with the separate creditors. Story, Partn. § 372; Eden, Bankr. Law, 172. But to bring the case within the exception, there must be absolutely no joint estate. If there be any, however small, the exception is not allowed, and it has been rejected where the joint estate amounted only to £1. 11s. 6d. And again, there must be no living solvent partner—and solvent is here used not in its ordinary sense, that is, an ability to pay the whole of one's debts—but in the sense of non bankrupt partner. For though he may be in fact insolvent and unable to pay the whole of his debts, if he be not actually in legal bankruptcy, the exception is excluded and the general rule prevails. Ex parte Janson, 3 Madd. 229. The principle is, that while there is any fund, however small, to which the joint creditors may resort, they cannot come against the separate estate in competition with the separate creditors; and though a person may be insolvent, if he be not in actual bankruptcy, and thus divested of all his property, he may still have the ability to pay part of his debts, and this possibility is held to be enough to exclude the joint creditors from sharing in the separate estate of the bankrupt partner, except in the surplus after the separate creditors are paid. Such is the general rule under the English bankrupt laws, and such the character of the exception to the rule, which it is supposed may be admitted under our law. Our statute has adopted the general rule, without taking notice of any of the exceptions. It does not appear to contemplate the case of there being no joint property, and as it passes it by in silence, it may be a grave question, whether it does not leave such a case open to the application of the general principles of equity. But as there is a joint fund in the present case, it is immaterial whether it does or not, unless the court may look behind the fact of there being a joint fund, to the manner in which it has been created.

It appears from the proofs in the case, or the facts which are admitted, that the assignee rendered in his first account of the partnership estate in October, 1844, in which the whole of the assets, consisting of outstanding demands, are represented as worthless; that afterwards he applied for liberty to compromise or collect a debt, on which he obtained $40, and rendered into court a supplementary account; and it further appears, that the money to take up this note was actually advanced by Charles E. Marwick, as creditor of the separate estate. Now, the argument is, that if the exception to the general rule of marshaling the assets and debts, established under the English bankrupt system, may be admitted under our statute, then, as it is founded on the general principles of equity and distributive justice, a creditor of the separate estate ought not to be permitted to defeat the equity of the joint creditor, by purchasing for a small sum a partnership demand, for which nothing could have been obtained but for this purpose. Allowing the premises on which the argument is founded to be correct, it does seem to present itself with some force to the equitable consideration of the court. The effect in the present case will be, that the separate creditor will receive nearly the whole of his claim and the joint creditors but a small percentage, if each is restricted to his own appropriate fund.

But after considerable reflection I have come to the conclusion, that, admitting the assumption on which the argument is founded, it cannot prevail. In the first place, if this matter is viewed as a struggle between the two classes of creditors, it is a strife on the part of the separate creditors, not de lucro captando, but de damno vitando. A creditor may, without any grave imputation in the forum of conscience, be allowed all fair and legal means to avoid a loss, though it may incidentally be at the expense of another creditor. And though it is a maxim in equity jurisprudence that equality is equity, yet the court holds the maxim subordinate to legal priorities, which one party may by his diligence acquire over another. And further, the whole subject of marshaling the assets and claims between the joint and separate creditors in bankruptcy, involves some of the most difficult problems that occur in the whole range of jurisprudence. It has hitherto been found impracticable to establish any general rule that will meet the equities of all the various cases that come up in practice; and the courts have been finally compelled, instead of subjecting the whole to a rigorous analysis and extracting a system of rules which will carry out the principles of natural justice, to cut down the difficulties by establishing a general rule, which at first seems conformable to general equity, and then to limit and qualify it by a number of arbitrary exceptions, in order to meet the particular equities of particular cases. Eden, Bankr. Law, 169, 174; Story, Partn. §§ 374, 382.

This system is admitted to be not entirely satisfactory; it has sometimes been departed from and again restored, and is now adhered to, not because it is in all respects conformable to the principles either of positive law or of natural equity, but partly as a rule of convenience, as it has been sometimes called, and partly because no system has been hitherto presented as a substitute, which is not found to be encountered by equal difficulties. Dutton v. Morrison, 17 Ves. 207; Ex parte Elton, 3 Ves. 238.

If, then, we admit that the equitable doctrines of the English courts, in the administration of their bankrupt law, are applicable under our statute, how will the case stand? In the first place, if this fund had been brought into court in consequence of the purchase of this note by any other person than a separate creditor, it is clear there would have been an end of the case. What difference does it make that he has advanced the money, and thus created the fund? It was the duty of the assignee to make the most of the assets. If, with the knowledge that $40 could be obtained by the transfer of this note, he had rendered it into court as worthless, he might have been compelled to pay the money out of his own pocket. The fund would then have been produced in this way, and the joint creditor would have been in the same condition he is now. It was not for the assignee to inquire who the purchaser was, or what were his motives in making the purchase. And even suppose that he might have done this and refused to sell to a separate creditor for such a purpose, the creditor might have gone to the debtor and furnished him the money to take up the note, and thus indirectly obtain the same result. And indeed this seems to have been the course adopted in the present case; for the note was nominally taken up by one of the company, who was liable upon it, though the money was advanced by the creditor. So that if we were to adopt the principle of going behind the fact of there being a fund, to inquire whether that had not been inequitably created by the management of the separate creditors, the court would at once be involved in inextricable difficulties.

The object of this inquiry is to reach the supposed equity of the case, by making a more just and equal distribution of the assets between the different classes of creditors, and to prevent the separate creditors from creating out of worthless assets a small fund for the sole purpose of preventing the joint creditors from sharing with them the separate assets. But after all, is not this supposed equity more apparent than real? Each class of creditors originally trusted to different funds and different responsibilities, one to the social and one to the separate responsibility. The general equity would, therefore, seem in all cases to confine each class of creditors to that fund which they primarily trusted, unless in a case where there had been a fraudulent or improper abstraction from one estate for the purpose of increasing the other. And this is the general rule, not only in bankruptcy, but in general equity. Each class of creditors has a right of prior payment out of the estate to which he is supposed to have given credit, and the other class can only go against the surplus. If a creditor of one partner attaches partnership property, his attachment only holds the right or interest which the parties shall be found to have in the property after an account is taken and the joint creditors are paid. Kent, Comm. (5th Ed.) 64, 65, note c; Story, Partn. § 363. The equity of each class of creditors against their proper fund, certainly seems to be stronger than that of the other class who never could have looked to it for their security, except so far as there might be a surplus after discharging its own proper liabilities.

The general rule, therefore, has its foundation in natural equity, and it is established by the law. The law itself makes no exception. Now, admitting the case of there being no joint estate to be a casus omissus, not contemplated and therefore not within the purview of the law, it certainly covers all cases where there is a joint fund, without inquiring into its origin. And it is a rule in the construction of statutes, that when the statute covers the whole case in all its circumstances, and makes no exceptions, none can be made by the court.

My opinion, on the whole, is, that the proof cannot be admitted against the separate estate, in competition with the separate creditors.

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 17, 1865.

PRIZE—BLOCKADE—COMING OUT OF BLOCKADED PORT—NO PAPERS—ADMISSIONS OF MASTER.

Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The above-named vessel, laden with a cargo consisting of cotton, tobacco, and spirits of turpentine, was captured, as prize of war, by the ship-of-war Mackinaw, Commander Beaumont, of the United States navy, on the 3d day of December, 1864, on the Atlantic Ocean, in latitude 32° 11′ north, longitude 78° 14′ west, and was sent into this port for adjudication. On the 22d day of December thereafter, the said prize vessel and cargo were seized and attached by the marshal, upon due process of law, and on the 10th of January, 1865, such attachment was by him returned in open court, and filed therein, upon which arrest and attachment due proclamation was made in court, and defaults were ordered and declared by the court, upon the motion of the United States attorney. The pleadings and proofs in the case, after such default was taken, and judgment thereupon was rendered by the court, were submitted to the consideration of the court by the United States attorney, and judgment final was moved thereon, for condemnation and forfeiture of the said vessel and cargo.

No paper documents proving the ownership of the vessel were discovered on board the prize. Her master testifies on his examination in preparatorio, that he believes she belonged to a man residing in Nassau, N. P., named Ferguson; that she sailed under English colors, and had no other on board; that she was captured for attempting to run the blockade imposed and maintained by the United States government against ports of the enemy; that he was appointed to her command in Charleston by an agent of the owner, and took possession of her at Dewey's outlet, fifteen miles from Charleston; that he shipped all the crew but the mate and one man, at Charleston, November 22, 1864; that he believes the vessel was built in Nassau; that the voyage on which she was captured began at Charleston, and was to have ended in Nassau; that her last clearing port previous to her capture was Charleston; that he has no bills of lading or other papers in his possession in relation to the vessel or cargo, and saw none signed, and does not know how many were signed; that the vessel was captured December 3, 1864, off the coast of Charleston, in the Gulf Stream; that he knew of the war, and of the blockade of Charleston, when he sailed; that he was directed to throw overboard papers, if his vessel became exposed to capture; that he threw overboard papers in envelopes, the contents of which he did not know, on the appearance of a vessel previously to the appearance of the one making the capture; that he supposed his vessel ran the blockade of Charleston in going into that port; and that she sailed from Dewey's Inlet for Charleston, December 1st, and, on being sighted and approached by the Mackinaw, surrendered herself immediately to that vessel.

Francis Hertz, the only witness on board of the prize vessel at the time of her capture, who was examined in preparatorio, gives substantially the same testimony as to the facts and circumstances of the voyage and the seizure of the prize.

The result of the proofs is clear and satisfactory that the vessel and cargo were designedly employed, when arrested, in violation of the lawful blockade of the port of Charleston, South Carolina.

A decree of condemnation and forfeiture is accordingly pronounced against the vessel and cargo.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1812.

EMBARGO—INTENT—VOLUNTARY ARRIVAL—PRIMA FACIE CASE.

To constitute an importation of a cargo into the United States, there must be a voluntary arrival within some port with intent to unlade the cargo. An involuntary arrival, by stress of weather, does not constitute an importation. A coming into port with a cargo is prima facie evidence of importation.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

There were two informations in this case; one against the schooner for taking on board, at Liverpool in Great Britain, certain goods of British manufacture, with intention to import the same into the United States, with the knowledge of the master, against the act 1 March 1809, c. 91, § 6 [2 Story's Laws, 1116; 2 Stat. 529, c. 24]; another against the cargo of the schooner, being goods of British manufacture, for being imported into the United States, contrary to the same act (section 5). By consent, both informations were heard together upon the facts stated by the district judge in his decree, and the papers transmitted on the appeal. In that decree, the facts are stated as follows: "These goods were shipped on board the Mary at Liverpool, in November last, by Carter and Storr, citizens of the United States, established and doing business as merchants at that place. The destination of the vessel was for Amelia Island, or any port to which she might be ordered to proceed by said Stephen Higginson, Jr. The bills of lading, in possession of said Higginson, bear date Nov. 13, A. D. 1811. The vessel touched at Lisbon, where the master was for some misconduct, or unsatisfactory behavior, displaced, and John Baxter received the command by appointment of the American consul. On the 28th Feb. said Baxter received his instructions from the consul, and was directed to proceed with said vessel to Boston Bay, and there to await the coming of a pilot boat, which would convey the instructions of said Higginson, and which were to be pursued. He was not to proceed into port with said vessel, unless so ordered by said Higginson, or unless he should learn, that goods purchased prior to the non-importation law would be admitted to entry. Soon after receiving these instructions, said vessel sailed from Lisbon, and on the 10th of April, having arrived in Boston Bay, was boarded about four miles from the Boston Light House, by a pilot boat, bearing a letter from said Higginson to Baxter, the master, directing him to proceed to Halifax. It appears to have been the determination of the master to comply with these instructions. But a strong head wind prevented an immediate departure from the bay, and in an hour after the receipt of the letter, the weather was such, that the master found it necessary, for the safety of the vessel and cargo, and of the crew, to seek a place of safety, and came to anchor in Nantasket Roads. About 4 o'clock p. m. on the same day, possession was taken of the vessel by a revenue cutter, and the next day she was brought under detention into the inner harbor. A manifest of the cargo was forthwith presented to the custom-house, with a destination expressed and claimed for Halifax, but intelligence of the recent embargo act having that day reached Boston, the collector considered himself restrained from permitting the departure of said vessel. A seizure was afterwards made, and this libel was filed, alleging said cargo to be liable to forfeiture under the 5th sect. of the act of March 1, 1809."

G. Blake, for United States.
C. Jackson, for claimants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. From an examination of the facts, (the result of which does not seem contested) I am satisfied that an actual landing of the goods was not intended to be made in any port of the United States, contrary to the statute; and that the goods of course were not put on board with that intent. It would seem, therefore, that no forfeiture could attach to the vessel, or cargo.

But it is contended on the part of the United States, that as the vessel arrived voluntarily within four miles of the coast, the importation became complete into the United States, as to its effects both on vessel and cargo. That as to the former, such arrival rebuts all presumption of a contrary intention, because the whole papers and evidence show, that the goods were laden with an intention to come as near the coast, as within four miles; and that as to the latter, the subsequent necessity imposed on the party, of coming into port, will not suspend the forfeiture fixed by the prior importation.

In support of this argument, the attorney for the United States has cited the 4th section of the act, 1 March 1809, c. 91 [c. 24], which declares, that it shall not "be lawful to import into the United States, or the territories thereof," &c. any goods of British growth, produce or manufacture, &c.; and also the 27th sect. of the collection act of 2 March, 1799 [1 Stat. 648], which prohibits any goods from being unladen from any vessel, "bound to the United States," within four leagues of the coasts thereof. The attorney further argues, that as to revenue cases, the term "import" means merely "bringing into," and that the limits of the United States extend to a greater distance than a marine league from the shore; and as to enclosed bays, like Boston Bay, at least in a direct line across from the head lands.

I will not undertake to decide how far, in a national view, the limits of the United States extend on the sea coast. Perhaps the argument of the attorney on this head may be perfectly consistent with the law of nations, but as to revenue laws, I am well satisfied that an importation into the United States, means not merely a bringing within our jurisdictional limits, but also a bringing into some port, harbor, or haven, with an intent to land the goods there. It is undoubtedly true, that the mere act of coming into a port, though without breaking bulk, is prima facie evidence of importation. Yet even this presumption may be rebutted. If a vessel come in by distress, or to avoid capture, it has never been considered as an importation, as to foreign ships; nor could a different rule be applied as to citizens. The Eleanor, 1 Edw. Adm. 135; The Paisley, Id. Append. 17; Reeves, Shipp. (2d Ed.) 197; Bunb. 236. Indeed it has been doubted, whether an arrival within the limits of the port of London, though it should seem nearly twenty miles below the usual places of unloading, constituted an importation. Leaper v. Smith, Bunb. 79. Upon a careful examination of the case of U. S. v. Vowel, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 368, the court evidently consider, that an importation into the United States did not mean an arrival within the limits of the United States, or even of a collection district, but within some port, harbor, &c. with an intention there to unload the goods. The case there was, that a cargo of salt had arrived within the collection district, but not within the port of Alexandria until after the repeal of the act, levying a duty on salt. The words of the first act were, that a duty should be levied upon all salt, &c. "brought into the United States," from any foreign port or place, &c. (Act Aug. 10, 1799, c. 39, § 1), and of the supplementary act, upon all salt "imported into the United States" (Act July 8, 1797, c. 15, § 1). The court held that the duty was not payable, because it did not accrue until the vessel arrived at the port of Alexandria. They consequently held, that until such arrival the importation was not completed.

The statutes of the United States on the subject of the revenue, evidently adopt the same construction. The 32d sect. of the collection act of 2 March, 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws, 601 (1 Stat. 651, c. 22)], contemplates the case of a vessel arriving at a port of the United States, with a destination of her cargo to a foreign port, and provides that, in such case, the cargo shall not be liable to the payment of duties. The 2d section of the act, 22d Feb. 1805, c. 78 [2 Story's Laws, 962 (2 Stat. 316, c. 18)], has a similar provision. I consider, therefore, the mere arrival within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, even supposing that they extend beyond a marine league, and to the four miles stated in the evidence, as not constituting an importation within the purview of the law. If this be true, there can be no doubt that the subsequent arrival within the port of Boston, in consequence of stress of weather, cannot be considered as an importation. The cases of distress and wreck are exempted from the operation of these, and I believe most other revenue laws. See Sheppard v. Gosnold, Vaughan, 159, 166; Courtney v. Bower, 1 Ld. Raym. 501; Hale, "Customs;" Harg. Law Tracts, 123; Peisch v. Ware, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 347, 355, note; Reeves, Shipp. (2d Ed.) 196, etc.; Reniger v. Fogossa, 1 Plowd. 1; Hardr. 358, 361; 2 Ruth. Inst. 353.

On the whole, I am satisfied that neither vessel nor cargo is forfeited. There was no loading with an illegal intent to import into the United States, which would affect the former with forfeiture, and no voluntary illegal importation, which would contaminate the latter.

I affirm the decree of the district court as to vessel and cargo, but I shall certify reasonable cause of seizure. Restored.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The brig Mary and cargo were captured on the 22d of April, 1813, by the privateer Paul Jones, Captain Taylor, being then on a voyage from Waterford, in Ireland, to Newport, with a cargo of British merchandize on board. It appears in evidence and is admitted, that the brig, with her cargo on board, sailed from Bristol on the 16th of August, 1812, and having received damage at sea, put back into Waterford about five days afterwards, and remained there until the 7th of April, 1813, when she sailed, by permission of the British government, for the United States. The declaration of war was published in the London Gazette on the 26th of July, 1812, and was well known at Bristol within one or two days after. The invoices of the cargo are dated the 13th of August, 1812, and it seems the whole is insured in England; but the exact day, when the shipment was actually made, does not precisely appear. No claim is interposed for the brig; but the cargo is claimed by a Mr. Nanning I. Vischer, as administrator of a General Fisher, an English gentleman, who is said to have died in England, and whose heirs are said to reside in this country. The cargo is alleged to have been shipped, as an investment of part of the proceeds of General Fisher's estate, for the benefit of his heirs. Who these heirs are, and how they claim, is not stated.

From the evidence in the cause, which I forbear to detail, I am by no means satisfied of the verity of the facts alleged in the claim; and I think it would be very difficult to establish the title to be bonâ fide American. There are instructions in the letters found on board, which carry a pretty strong odor of concealed British interests, although written after knowledge of the war. At all events here is a clear trading with the public enemy after knowledge of the war; and I cannot open the case to show, that the goods were purchased and shipped before that time.

I condemn the brig and cargo, as enemies'

SHIPPING—PRIVATEER—DAMAGES—OWNER—ESTOPPEL.

If a person has in the acts of court asserted himself as part owner of a privateer, he will be responsible as such owner for damages assessed against such privateer, although his name be not in the ship's papers.

This cause having been decided in favor of the privateer Cadet against the claim of the privateer Paul Jones the damages were assessed against the owners of the latter, under the decree of the supreme court, which is reported at large in 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 123. At May term, 1817, of the circuit court, process issued against the owners, who were named in the commission and ship's papers, for the damages so assessed; but the process was returned unsatisfied. And at October term, 1817, the plaintiffs filed a petition praying for a monition against Messrs. Bryant and Sturgis as joint owners, to compel them to pay the damages. It appeared of record in the proceedings, that at May term, 1816, Messrs. Bryant and Sturgis filed a petition in the circuit court, alleging that the Mary [Thomas, master] had been condemned in the district court of Maine, "to them the petitioners and others, owners of the private armed vessel Paul Jones as captors;" that the same decree had been affirmed in the circuit court "adjudging the said vessel and cargo to the petitioners and others, said owners, as captors;" and praying a delivery of the proceeds to them on bail pending the appeal to the supreme court. This petition was resisted on the part of the owners and officers of the private armed vessel Cadet, and finally an agreement was entered into by the parties, at the same term, as follows: "In the case of the application of Messrs. Bryant and Sturgis, in behalf of themselves and others, owners of the private armed vessel Paul Jones, &c. praying that the proceeds of the prize vessel might be paid out to them, on giving bonds, &c. It is agreed by the parties in interest, that one half of the said proceeds be paid out as prayed for and one half thereof be in like manner paid out to the adverse claimants, (the owners of the Cadet,) each giving therefor such security as the other shall approve, to be approved by the judges at chambers, or in court." The proceeds were paid out accordingly, and the proper approved security given, and Messrs. Bryant and Sturgis received one moiety thereof.

A monition was granted by the court against Messrs. Bryant and Sturgis, to appear and show cause, why the damages should not be paid by them. At the return of the monition they accordingly appeared, and filed a special answer, and defensive allegation on oath. It stated that at the time of the equipment and commissioning of the Paul Jones, she was armed by one Samuel Hubbard, who gave bonds at the custom house on the outfit for the cruise; that after the equipment of the Paul Jones, one Joshua Hilton representing himself a part owner, and being indebted to the respondents, proposed to give them one sixteenth part of the Paul Jones for five hundred dollars, in satisfaction of their demand, to which the respondents assented; that no written conveyance has been since made, and no money or settlement with Hilton upon that contract, although it was, and is, the expectation of the respondents to allow the said sum in account with Hilton on settlement; that the said Hubbard was constituted agent for the privateer, and that the proceeds have been paid into his hands, and are received by him for payment of the sums due in this case; and they, therefore, prayed that a monition might issue to the said Hubbard, and his sureties, on the custom-house bond, and to the other owners, to pay the amount before the respondents should be made liable; and they submitted to the court the question of their liability.

The court directed a monition against the sureties in the said bond. And the question as to the liability of Bryant and Sturgis as owners, was several times spoken to by Mr. Sprague, for owners of the Cadet, and by L. Shaw, for respondents.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Whatever might have been my opinion upon the special facts stated in the answer, as to which I affirm and deny nothing, I am very clear, that the proceedings of Messrs. Bryant and Sturgis, in the acts of court, in which they assert themselves to be owners, and claim a delivery of the prize proceeds on bail in that character, are conclusive upon them, and they cannot now be permitted to deny, that they are owners at least to the extent of being responsible for the damages in this case. This case is much stronger than that of The Nostra Signora de los Dolores, 1 Dod. 290, where Sir William Scott held a person liable, as owner, for damages, although his name was not in the ship's papers. There the party had only asserted himself owner by acts in pais; here the respondents assert it by acts of record, and must be estopped by such acts. The prize proceeds were delivered to them on bail, in virtue of their character as owners. How can the court now consistently permit them to shake off the character they have voluntarily assumed? There must then be a decree against them for payment of the damages; but we will do all we can to relieve them, by calling, with the consent of the plaintiffs, in the first instance, upon the original owner and his sureties, and suspend process to compel payment, until we see if that proceeding be effectual.

The money was afterwards paid by the sureties of the original owner.

Afterwards, while the vessel was at New-Orleans, she was sold, and went a voyage to Liverpool, and thence to New-York. Held, that the seamen could libel her on her arrival at New-York, and that they were entitled to their full wages to the time of their return to that city.

[Distinguished in The Rover v. Stiles, 5 Blackf. 485.]

This was an appeal from a decree of the district court for the Southern district of New-York, sustaining a libel for seamen's wages.

The respondents shipped on board the Mary, as mariners, in June, 1818, on a voyage from New-York to New-Orleans and back to New-York, or such other port as the ship might take freight for. Freight was earned to New-Orleans, but the ship remained at that port, after her arrival, until August, 1819, without obtaining freight for any other port, when the master, in pursuance of what he deemed his duty, discharged the seamen and left the ship himself. In October following, the present claimant purchased the ship, and sent her the next March on a voyage to Liverpool, and thence to New-York, at which latter place she arrived in July, 1820, and was soon after libelled by the respondents. The respondents were dissuaded from libelling the ship at New-Orleans, by the master, who informed them, that if they would come on with him to New-York, he would see them paid. The district court allowed full wages until the return of the seamen to New-York. [Case unreported.]

W. Slosson and J. Bulkley, for appellant, contended that, as the vessel did not earn freight after her arrival in New-Orleans, the seamen were not entitled to full wages; freight being the mother of wages. 3 Johns. 154, 518; 9 Johns. 350; 11 Johns. 279; Abb. Shipp. 430, 434, 483. And that, not having libelled the vessel in New-Orleans, where they might have done it, but having elected to return to New-York and look to the owners or master, they had either waived their remedy against the ship, or been guilty of such laches, that they could not proceed against her, in the hands of a bona fide purchaser. Code de Comm. arts. 191, 196; Abb. Shipp. 465, 470, note; 1 East, 4; 7 East, 5; Doug. 101; 2 Emer. Ins. 230; 1 Valin, Comm. 362; [Blaine v. The Charles Carter] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 328; 4 C. Rob. Adm. 245.

H. Wheaton and E. Paine, for respondents, replied that, where men are discharged by the master, without their own fault or consent, the maxim that "freight is the mother of wages," cannot apply. Johnson v. Sims, Case No. 7,413; 3 Johns. 517; 1 Holt, Shipp. 449; 2 Ld. Raym. 1044; 3 Bos. & P. 405; Roccus, De Nav. No. 43; Pothier, Des Matelots, 179, 198; 2 Rob. Adm. 251; 3 Rob. Adm. 92; 5 Rob. Adm. 224; Abb. Shipp. 491, note; The Saratoga, Case No. 12,355. That mariners are not barred of their remedy against the ship, though in the hands of a bona fide purchaser, by any lapse of time; the statute of limitations of the state not applying, and the United States having no statute on the subject: and that, at any rate, there was no evidence, in the present case, of that gross neglect which might occasion a forfeiture of their remedy. Madonna D'Idra, 1 Dod. 40; Brown v. Jones. Case No. 2,017; The Jerusalem, Id. 7,294; Relf v. The Maria, Id. 11,692; Code de Comm. art. 196; 1 Holt, Shipp. 443.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice. This is an appeal from a sentence of the district court, sustaining a libel for wages on behalf of the respondents, Wilson and Joseph.

That freight was earned on the voyage from New-York to New-Orleans, and that wages of course became due, admits of no doubt. It is equally clear, that the voyage, as it regarded the crew which shipped in New-York, was ended at New-Orleans by the act of the master, and the present libellants were discharged by him, with a promise that he would see their wages paid in New-York. They accordingly left the Mary on the 5th of August, 1819, and claim wages from the 4th of June, 1818, when they shipped on board of her, at the port of New-York, on a voyage thence to New-Orleans and back to New-York, or such other port as the said ship might take freight for.

The right of the libellants to wages thus far being either admitted or not much contested by the claimant, it is insisted that, by not libelling the ship at New-Orleans, they have lost all remedy against her, and can resort only to the former owner or master, inasmuch as she has since passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser, without notice of any lien on her for the wages now demanded. If a claim of this kind be not seasonably prosecuted, and the vessel become the property of another for a fair consideration and without notice, it seems reasonable that those who have been negligent should suffer, and not an innocent purchaser. Some rule of this kind appears the more necessary in a case where it is so difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain either the existence or the extent of demands of this nature. But however reasonable such a rule may appear, none has yet been adopted, either in England or this country, which requires a seaman to assert his lien in any given time, or which will justify this court in saying that if he does not proceed by libel the very first opportunity which is afforded him, (which is the case here,) he shall forfeit all right of obtaining satisfaction in that way, unless the vessel shall still belong to the same person.

Few claims are more highly favoured and protected by law, than those for seamen's wages. They are hardly earned, and liable to many contingencies, by which they may be entirely lost, without any fault on their part. When they become due, the vessel, owners, and master are generally all responsible until satisfaction be obtained. The liability of a vessel for wages may be considered as the law of every commercial nation. They take precedence of bottomry bonds, and in the language of Sir William Scott, they are "sacred liens, and as long as a plank remains, the sailor is entitled as against all other persons to the proceeds as a security for his wages." These unqualified and strong terms would hardly have been employed, unless it had been intended to postpone, not only a claim under a bottomry bond, which was then before the court, but also that of a bona fide purchaser, to a demand for seamen's wages. It is true that by the laws of France this privilege of prosecuting against the vessel is extinguished, if after a voluntary sale, she shall have made a voyage in the name and at the risk of the new purchaser, and without objection on the part of the privileged creditor of the vendor. The 16th article of the celebrated Marine Ordinance of Louis the 14th, confines this preference to the wages of the sailors employed on the last voyage; which provision, with the qualification just mentioned, is also found in the present commercial code of France. Whatever wisdom or justice there may be in thus limiting the continuance of this lien, it amounts only to a municipal regulation, and would rather seem to imply that antecedently, the law even of France was otherwise, and had been changed on account of the inconveniences to which purchasers of this species of property had been exposed. The same rule has not yet been adopted in this country.

A lien for wages was likened, on the argument, to that of a factor on merchandise in his hands, and it was supposed, that as the latter lost his lien by parting with the property, so a sailor, by giving up possession of the vessel, lost his right of proceeding against her for wages. There is no resemblance between those cases. A seaman as such has no possession of a vessel, and his claim for wages is perhaps incorrectly termed a lien. It is rather a right to proceed against the vessel, and to be paid out of her proceeds in preference to all other creditors. His very application to a court of admiralty is on the ground that the possession of the ship is not in him, and has for its object its arrest and detention by proper process, until his right can be adjudged.

It was also insisted by the appellant, that there had been a voluntary and express abandonment on the part of the libellants of their right to have recourse against the vessel. Even if abandonment by parol could have availed, there is no evidence of such abandonment. The only testimony on this point is, that the master brought the libellants with himself to New-York with a view to prevent them from libelling the ship at New-Orleans, which they threatened to do; and that upon their asking the master when they should get their wages, he told them to come with him to New-York and he would pay them. This amounts to nothing more than a forbearance on the part of the libellants not to libel at that time, in expectation of being paid in New-York, but not to a waiver of any remedy they might have if they were not paid on their arrival here.

There is one circumstance which has not been adverted to, but appears to me of some importance. The libellants were discharged, and the voyage for which they shipped was ended as to them at New-Orleans, on the 5th of August, 1819. The claimant made his purchase three months after, the Mary still being in that port, from which she did not depart for Liverpool until the month of March following. Now it cannot well be denied even on the claimant's own principles, that at the time of the purchase, and for five months after, that is, as long as the vessel was at New-Orleans, she was liable to be proceeded against in the district court of Louisiana for the very wages claimed in this suit. If then the purchasers took her when this lien, (as it has been called,) was in full operation, and might have been enforced, not only on the day of the sale, but long after, it is not perceived why it should be extinguished, as it regards the present owner, merely from the circumstance of the vessel's having since made a voyage to Liverpool and from thence to New-York. If she had been disposed of at Liverpool, the purchaser then might have had some reason to complain; but the present claimant is in no worse condition than if the Mary had been libelled at New-Orleans after his purchase, and previous to her departure for Liverpool.

Because, in the case of Blaine v. The Charles Carter, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 328, the supreme court of the United States postponed the obligee in two bottomry bonds to other creditors of the obligor, who had seized the vessel in execution on a judgment obtained more than a year after the date of the bonds, it is thought that within the reason of that decree the present claim for wages ought not to prevail in prejudice of the intervening right of a fair purchaser. But in that case, it should be remembered, that between the date of the first bottomry bond and the filing of the libel, the Charles Carter had made two voyages from Europe to America, and one from America to England, the freight of which had been received by the libellant, who held the bottomry bond. In the case before us, the delay is not only much less, but there is not that danger of fraud, which was relied on in the argument of that cause. It was said, and very properly, that the bonds might have been held up or concealed, for the purpose of giving a false credit to the owner of the vessel, while the obligee was receiving the whole benefit of her earnings. Such a fraud cannot be practised in the case of seamen, nor can their forbearance to libel ever be imputed to any sinister motive whatever, or be attributed to aught but negligence, inability or ignorance; and, therefore, there seems no reason for considering their case as at all affected by the decision which has been just mentioned, or as coming at all within the reason of it.

It may be further remarked, that the Mary was libelled very soon after her first return to New-York, at which port the libellants had shipped, and which may be regarded as the termination of the voyage for which they had engaged themselves; and if they had not been discharged, but had remained on board until her return to this city, a doubt cannot be entertained that the ship would have been bound, as well for their wages, which were earned on the voyage to New-Orleans, as for those which would have accrued afterwards, notwithstanding her intermediate alienation. If this be so, it would not be easy to assign any good reason why, as they were regularly discharged at New-Orleans, they should lose their remedy against the ship merely because they did not arrest her in transitu, but waited patiently for her arrival at New-York. If it be admitted that mariners may be guilty of such gross negligence in following up a claim of this nature, as to forfeit their remedy against a vessel in the hands of an innocent purchaser, it would be imposing on them a very unreasonable diligence to compel them in all cases, under the penalty of such a forfeiture to institute a proceeding in rem the moment their wages became due, or at any rate before the vessel left the port at which the voyage, as it respected them, was ended. It might be very inconvenient for them to remain in a foreign port until the termination of a suit in the admiralty; or, which would often be the case, they might find it very difficult in a strange place to procure that security or bail which is required on the institution of proceedings against a vessel—or they might be generous or liberal enough rather to forego for the moment their right of suit in this way, than to arrest for a small sum a valuable vessel at a distance from home, at the hazard of breaking up the remainder of her voyage, or of exposing her to be sold at a great sacrifice.

My opinion, upon the whole therefore, is, that the forbearance, or delay complained of in this case, furnishes no pretence for dismissing the present libel, or for deciding that the change of title which took place at New-Orleans, is a bar to the libellants of the vessel for the wages claimed in this suit. The sentence of the district court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

BOTTOMRY — ESSENTIALS — NECESSITY OF LOAN—WHO MAY PLEDGE—OWNER—MONEY TO BUY CARGO—MORTGAGE.

1. The risk of the lender and his right to repayment only on the safe arrival of the vessel, constitute the essential difference between a bottomry and simple loan.

2. Marine interest is also requisite to a bottomry loan, but if not expressed in the bond, it will be presumed to have been included with the principal.

3. The jurisdiction of courts of admiralty over contracts depends principally upon their subject matter; and in cases of bottomry, it is not the absolute necessity of the loan that gives the jurisdiction.

4. And the owner as well as the master of a vessel may pledge her by bottomry in a foreign port.

[Approved in The Draco, Case No. 4,057.]

5. The master of a vessel in a foreign port, acting in the character of agent, is limited in his power, and can only pledge the vessel in case of necessity; but the owner, having an absolute control over his property, may pledge her for money to purchase a cargo, and thereby create an admiralty lien.

6. In November, 1822, the owner of a vessel in Connecticut, gave a bill of sale of her in the nature of a mortgage, but was suffered to remain in possession and act as absolute owner, and her register and all her papers remained unaltered. In July following, he gave a bottomry bond for money advanced to purchase a cargo for the vessel in the West Indies, without notice to the lender of the mortgage: Held, that upon common law principles, the claim of the lender was to be preferred to that of the mortgagee.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Connecticut.]

In admiralty.

S. P. Staples and I. J. Hitchcock, for libellants.

N. Smith and J. Backus, for claimants.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. This case comes up on appeal from the decree of the district court, dismissing the libel which had been filed in that court against the sloop Mary, upon a bottomry bond given by William H. Young, captain and sole owner of the sloop, which is described as of Fairfield in the state of Connecticut. The bond bears date on the 1st day of July, in the year 1823, and purports to have been executed at the port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, to Robert Wear Elliot of that place, pledging the said sloop, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with her freight and earnings, for the payment of one thousand one hundred dollars, alleged in the bond to have been advanced for the repairs, outfits, and other disbursements, for the use of the said vessel, and for enabling her to perform her voyage, to be paid within sixty days next after the arrival of the vessel in the port of New-York. A claim was interposed by Daniel Young, under a bill of sale in the nature of a mortgage, executed by William H. Young, bearing date the 16th of November, in the year 1822, as collateral security and indemnity to the said Daniel Young, for one thousand two hundred dollars, for which he was bound for William H. Young to Walter Thorp, being the consideration for the purchase of the sloop. The sloop arrived safe in the port of New-York, and was shortly after removed to Bridgeport in Connecticut, and was there, after the expiration of the sixty days from her arrival in New-York, seized and libelled, possession having been taken by Daniel Young, under his bill of sale. It appears by the proofs, and was admitted by the libellant's counsel, that the principal part of the money advanced by Elliot was for the purchase of a cargo, and not for necessaries for the vessel.

Under these circumstances, the questions presented for consideration, are (1) whether the case falls within the admiralty jurisdiction of the district court; and (2) whether the bottomry bond has priority over the claim under the bill of sale, which is of an antecedent date.

It has not been denied, and I presume cannot be, but that the remedy upon a bottomry bond given by the master abroad, falls properly within the admiralty jurisdiction of the district court. But it is said, when the bond is given by the owner, recourse must be had to the courts of common law. No adjudged case either in this country or elsewhere has been referred to, or has fallen under my observation, to justify such a distinction; and I do not perceive any well founded principle growing out of the nature of the contract to warrant such a distinction.

I deem it unnecessary to go into an examination of the struggle that has been carried on between the English common law and admiralty courts, with respect to the extent of the jurisdiction of the latter. Much of that controversy grew out of the different constructions given in the one court and in the other to certain English statutes which we have not in this country. But with respect to contracts, over which the admiralty has jurisdiction, the common law courts in England have yielded in some measure to the doctrine of the admiralty, that the jurisdiction depends in a great measure upon the subject matter of the contract. This principle was recognised by Mr. Justice Buller, in the case of Menetone v. Gibbons, 3 Term R. 267. But we must look to our own constitution and laws to ascertain the extent of this jurisdiction. By the constitution of the United States the judicial power extends to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. And by the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 [1 Stat. 73], cognizance was given to the district courts of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. Without undertaking to define the precise extent of this clause, "all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," I think I may safely say, the terms are broad enough to embrace all maritime contracts, and if so, by the judiciary act, cognizance thereof is given to the district courts.

What are the contracts then, that properly fall under the denomination of maritime contracts? And here again I would not be understood as attempting to prescribe the limits of this class of contracts; but so far as my researches have extended, all civilians and jurists agree, that marine hypothecations fall under this denomination; and that a bottomry bond is such hypothecation admits of no doubt. And why should there upon principle be any difference as to the jurisdiction of the court, whether the bottomry bond is given by the owner or the master? If the jurisdiction depends upon the subject matter of the contract, this is the same whether the pledge is given by the one or the other: The object and effect of the bond are the same in both cases, creating a lien upon the vessel. And it would be a little singular if the master in this respect had greater powers than the owner; this would be giving to the agent an authority beyond his principal; reversing the established law in relation to principal and agent. The master acting as an agent is limited and restricted in his power, and can pledge his vessel only in case of necessity for the purpose of repairs and other things indispensable to the prosecution of the voyage. It is for the convenience of commerce, that he should have authority to pledge his vessel for the security of a foreign creditor, who might furnish the means of relieving his necessities. But such power ought to be well guarded, and confined to cases coming within the reason of the rule. It is therefore incumbent on the creditor to show that the advances were made for repairs and supplies necessary for effectuating the objects of the voyage, or the safety and security of the vessel. The master would, therefore, have no right to pledge the vessel for advances to purchase a cargo.

Had the bond in question been given by the master only, it would not have created a valid lien, for the advance was made for the purchase of cargo. But there is no such limitation upon the authority of the owner; he has the absolute control over his property, and has a right to pledge his vessel for money borrowed for any purpose, to be applied to repairs, outfits, or other necessaries, or to the purchase of a cargo.

The essential difference between a bottomry and a simple loan is, that in the latter the money is at the risk of the borrower, and must be paid at all events; in the former, it is at the risk of the lender during the voyage, and the right to demand payment depends on the safe arrival of the vessel. The perils of the sea being at the risk of the lender, gives the right of reserving any rate of interest the parties shall agree upon, without incurring the penalties and consequences of usury. By the bond in question, no interest whatever is stipulated. The reason of this has not been explained. It is perhaps reasonable to conclude, that the marine interest was included with the advance, and inserted in the bond as principal, for it can hardly be supposed that the lender gratuitously took upon himself the perils of the sea; his right to claim the money, at all events, depends, according to the terms of the bond, upon the contingency of the arrival of the vessel in the port of New-York, and no marine interest is now claimed. In the case of The Barbara (4 C. Rob. Adm. 1) the bond, as in this case, was given by a person who was both master and owner, and no objections appear to have been made to the jurisdiction of the court on this account. But proceedings were instituted and carried on in the admiralty, as a case within the admitted and ordinary jurisdiction of the court. This question has not, to my knowledge, ever come under the consideration of the supreme court of the United States. But so far as it has come incidentally before our courts, in this country, the admiralty jurisdiction appears to be sustained. And indeed I have not discovered any intimation to the contrary.

Doubts have been entertained whether a bottomry bond, executed by the owner, in his own country, might be enforced by admiralty process, because the owner might execute an express transfer or mortgage of his vessel, should his necessities require it. [Blaine v. The Charles Carter] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 328. And it may be said he can do this in a foreign country. But it would not be consistent with sound policy, and the interest of commerce, to impose upon the owner the necessity of selling his vessel in a foreign country, which must of course be attended with great sacrifice. In the case of Wilmer v. The Smilax [Case No. 17,777], the district court of Maryland sustained the admiralty jurisdiction, upon a bottomry bond, given by the owner of the vessel, even in one of our own ports. And the same principle is recognised in the case of Corish v. The Murphy, 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, Append. 22. The books furnish us with very few cases on this point, probably, because when the owner himself is with his vessel, he will have it in his power in some way to relieve his necessities, without submitting to the sacrifice of paying bottomry interest. I cannot, however, see any objection upon principle, under the provisions of our constitution and laws, against sustaining the jurisdiction. It is clearly a maritime contract. The vessel is pledged for the payment of the money. The principal was put at hazard, and the risk of the voyage assumed by the lender. The bond was executed abroad, and the contingency upon which the money became due has happened. I think, therefore, the court below erred in dismissing the libel.

The next inquiry is, whether this claim is to be preferred to that which grows out of the mortgage given to Daniel Young upon this vessel; and that it is, would seem to follow as a necessary result from my conclusion as to the first point. Abbot in his treatise on Shipping (part 2, c. 3, § 28), and for which he rests upon the authority of Bynkershook, says: "It should be observed of these securities (bottomry bonds) in general, that if they are given at different periods of a voyage, and the value of the ship is insufficient to discharge them all, the last in point of date is entitled to priority of payment, because the last loan furnished the means of preserving the ship, and without it the former lenders would entirely have lost their security" and this principle is sanctioned by Mr. Justice Story in the case of The Jerusalem [Case No. 7,294], who lays it down as an established rule, that a second bottomry bond, although posterior in time, has priority of claim. The present case, however, does not require the adoption of so broad a principle. The adversary claim here is not founded upon a bottomry bond, but upon a bill of sale in the nature of a mortgage, and which would not create any valid lien as against a subsequent bona fide purchaser or incumbrancer, without notice. William H. Young was permitted to remain in possession, and to act as the absolute owner of the sloop; the register, and all her papers, standing in his name, and without any endorsement, showing any incumbrance upon the vessel: Daniel Young is therefore chargeable with negligence, in permitting William to appear as absolute owner, and thereby putting it in his power to impose upon a foreign creditor, who should advance money upon the security of the vessel. Upon the principles of the common law, as well as of equity, the claim of Daniel Young must be postponed to that of the libellant.

The decree of the district court must accordingly be reversed, and a decree entered, that the proceeds of the vessel be paid over to the libellant towards satisfaction of his claim.

The MARY.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1841.

SHIPPING—GENERAL AVERAGE—WAGES AND PROVISIONS — PORT FOR SAFETY — TIME OF DETENTION — CARGO INJURED — DESTROYED BY FIRE—REASON FOR LANDING CARGO.

1. Wages and provisions are to be allowed in general average from the time when a vessel in distress alters her course to seek a place of safety.

[Cited in The Star of Hope, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 236, 237.]

2. If masts are cut away at sea, and the vessel lies for a time disabled, and afterwards alters her course and puts away for a port of safety to refit, wages and provisions are not allowed in general average during the time of such detention, but only from the time of altering her course.

3. Semble, if by cutting away the masts the deck is ripped up, and by that means water gets in and injures the cargo, such damage to the cargo is to be paid for in general average.

4. If a vessel, from perils of the sea, is compelled to seek a port of safety, and there the cargo is necessarily landed and stored in order to repair the vessel and to enable her to proceed on her voyage, and while thus stored is destroyed by fire, it must be paid for in general average. But if the cargo was landed and stored because it was damaged, and is destroyed by fire while thus stored, it is not to be paid for in general average. If both these causes for landing and storing the cargo concur, and it is destroyed by fire, it is not to be paid for in general average.

5. Where by a charter-party a gross sum, not divisible, was to be paid as freight for the round voyage out and home, the principal object of the voyage being to obtain a return cargo, and a general average has occurred on the outward passage; held, that the whole freight for the round voyage must contribute.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The questions, which have been presented in this case, relate to the adjustment of general average. First, from what time is the allowance for wages and provisions to commence? It is admitted to be the general rule, that it is from the time when a vessel in distress alters her course to seek a place of safety. There is a controversy here as to the time when the brig so altered her course. Her masts were cut away on the 10th of February. The protest of the master, mate and two seamen, states, that from that time until the 19th, the brig lay disabled, sometimes in the trough of the sea, but most of the time with an anchor out, to keep her head to the wind; and that on the 19th "at 8 a. m., kept her off S. S. W., concluding to run for St. Thomas." The log-book is said to be mislaid and is not produced, but the protest refers to and professes to conform to it.

The captain, in his first deposition, says, that the day after the accident "we set out for Nassau, New Providence, but finding we could not fetch there on account of westerly winds, we laid for St. Thomas; but thinking it not safe to run through the islands, I stood for Antigua. I did this on the 21st of March." By the day of the accident, I presume is meant the 10th of February, and if so, the statement does not correspond with the protest, which describes the condition of the vessel, and the measures taken to have been such as to repel the idea of her then setting out for Nassau, or indeed any other place. Nor does it correspond with the previous statement of the captain in the same deposition, for he says: "The eleventh we got clear of the wreck of the mainmast, got the water out of the vessel and got the cargo trimmed; after that we lay about twelve days a wreck without trying to get along, with one anchor down to keep her head to the wind." [Further on the deposition states, that the "day after the accident we set out for Nassau, but finding we could not fetch there, on account of westerly winds, we laid for St. Thomas." Now, when did they lay for St. Thomas? On the 19th, only nine days after the accident, during all which time the captain himself had just before stated, that they lay a wreck without trying to get along? How then could they, during any part of that time, have been endeavoring to get to Nassau, and found that they could not fetch by reason of the westerly winds?][2] There is something inexplicable in these two statements of the captain; and the protest made under oath, by the master, mate, and two seamen, on their arrival at the first port after the disaster, must prevail over the inconsistent statements of the deposition.

But it is urged, that the inability of the vessel to proceed from the 10th to the 19th, was caused by the previous voluntary sacrifice of the masts, and that the wages and provisions should therefore be paid for in general average. Suppose that the vessel, instead of putting away on the 19th, had proceeded to her original destination and arrived in safety,—would wages and provisions be paid for during the delay? If so, then in every case of the cutting away of a spar or other voluntary sacrifice, which protracts the voyage, this allowance must be made for the time the voyage is extended. But I cannot consider such consequential loss a voluntary sacrifice of wages and provisions for the common benefit. The allowance for them in this case must, I think, begin on the 19th of February.

In the second place, it is testified, that by cutting away the masts the deck was ripped up, and thereby salt water was let in, which injured the cargo, and that such damage should be paid for in general average. The fact is contested. The burden is on the owner of the cargo, and I do not think that he has sustained it by the evidence. No allowance, therefore, is to be made for this alleged damage. The cargo was landed and stored at Antigua, and a part of it destroyed by fire. Shall this be brought into general average? If it was landed and stored in order to repair the ship, then this new risk was incurred for the general benefit, and should be allowed upon the principle of the case in 1 Magens, 160. But if it was landed and stored because the cargo was damaged, then the new risk was incurred only for the benefit of the cargo, and the loss is particular average. But the evidence shows, that both causes concurred. The report of the surveyors ordered the cargo to be landed in order to examine the ship, and it was so much damaged that it could not have remained on board.

No decided case applicable to such a state of facts has been cited, and we must recur to original principles. Property is paid for in general average from justice and policy. It is just, that he whose property has been sacrificed for the general benefit, should bear no more than his proportion of the loss; it is good policy, because the owner who may be supposed to be present personally, or by his agent, is thereby induced to make less resistance to an act, which is deemed conducive to the common good. But this rests entirely upon the supposition, that there has been a voluntary and intentional sacrifice for the general benefit. In the case before us, the cargo was so damaged as to render its removal from the vessel indispensable. The owner had no option. I cannot therefore consider him as having made a voluntary sacrifice for the purpose of prosecuting the voyage. The goods consumed by fire are not, therefore, to be brought into general average.

The next question is, in what manner the freight shall contribute. By the charter-party a gross sum was to be paid for the round voyage out and home. It was not divisible. The principal object of the voyage was to obtain a return cargo, and there were but few articles on board on the outward passage, when the disaster occurred. Three modes of assessing the freight have been proposed: (1) That the whole freight for the round voyage should contribute. (2) That it should be divided, and that only the proportion for the outward voyage should contribute. (3) That only a fair freight on the articles actually on board should contribute. In Williams v. London Assur. Co., 1 Maule & S. 318, cited by the counsel for the libellants, it was decided by the court of king's bench, that the whole freight for the round voyage is to contribute. This is expressly approved by Mr. Hughes in his treatise on Insurance (page 298). In the case of The Progress, Edw. Adm. 210–224, military salvage was assessed on the same principle, and this appears not to have been new in that court; for Sir William Scott, in delivering his judgment says, that, "where a ship goes out under a charter, to proceed to her port of destination, in ballast, and to receive her freight only upon her return, the court is not in the habit of dividing the salvage." The case of The Dorothy Foster, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 88, tends to sustain the same doctrine. On the other hand, Mr. Benecke insists, that in such cases the freight ought to be divided, and such part only contribute as may fairly be presumed to belong to the outward voyage; and Mr. Phillips concurs in this opinion. Phillips' Stevens & B. Ins. 255, 257, note a.

The arguments of Mr. Benecke are entitled to consideration,—and at least show, that the question is not free from difficulty. But they are by no means conclusive. He first urges, that if the whole freight out and home should contribute for a loss upon the outward passage, it may also be called on to contribute for a loss on the homeward passage, while the outward cargo only would contribute to the first, and the homeward cargo only to the second general average. But would not the vessel in such case contribute to both? And if the same cargo or a part of it, as sometimes happens, were on board, out and home, that also would contribute to both. But suppose a portion of the freight, one-half, for example, is assessed for the outward loss, is not the whole at risk on the homeward passage, and liable to contribute for any general average there incurred? If so, the alleged inequality still exists, only in a less degree. His next objection is, that as the freight is not to be paid until the vessel shall have arrived in safety at her home port, expenses and risks are still to be encountered in earning it; for example, wages, provisions and disbursements at the port of destination; and that as none of these expenses would have been incurred, if the vessel had been lost by the misfortune which gave rise to the general average, the crew cannot be said to have saved the whole freight, after the arrival of the ship, at the end of the outward voyage. This is indeed a strong argument to show, that a deduction for these expenses ought to be made from the round freight, in determining the amount upon which the contribution should be levied; but has no tendency to prove that the residue, after making these deductions, ought not to contribute. On the contrary, the author seems to admit (page 259) that the owner ought to contribute for what the thing saved is worth; and the freight is worth the round sum, less these deductions. And Mr. Phillips, in a note to Stevens and Benecke (page 255), says: "The freight pending at the time of the jettison or other sacrifice contributes to the average; and if wages and provisions are to be subsequently expended in order to save the freight, the expense of them is to be deducted in ascertaining the amount in which freight is to contribute." See, also, 1 Phil. Ins. 360, 361; and 2 Phil. Ins. c. 15, § 11, note 2. And that such deduction is to be made in ascertaining the contributory value of the freight, is directly decided in Spafford v. Dodge, 14 Mass. 66. Neither in Williams v. London Assur. Co., nor in the case of The Progress, did the court decide as to the amount for which the freight was to contribute; that question was not raised.

It is further objected by Mr. Benecke, that the freight is still at risk, while the vessel and cargo are in safety. This point was fully considered in Williams v. London Assur. Co., and was necessarily before the court in the case of The Progress. And that safety is not essential to render it contributory is decided in Spafford v. Dodge, and conceded by Mr. Phillips in the extract I have just quoted, and also by Mr. Benecke himself, who says, (page 259): "When disbursements of the nature of a general average take place in the course of a voyage, and that voyage be continued, the parties pay their respective shares, not for actually gaining possession of their property, which still remains exposed to future perils of the navigation, but for the probability of the property coming ultimately to their hands."

Another argument urged by Mr. Benecke is, that it would lead to singular consequences, if the ship-owner could be liable to contribute for any other freight than that of the goods actually on board, or of such as the law considers as being actually on board. And by way of example, he says, "a vessel bound from A. to B. may be chartered to another party before her arrival at B. for a voyage from B. to C. If a general average should take place upon the voyage from A. to B., would it not be absurd to make the freight for the intended voyage from B. to C. also liable, because it was also at stake." Without undertaking to point out in detail in what respects the two cases differ, it is sufficient to say, that there is such a vested interest in the freight for the round voyage which has been commenced, that the whole is insurable; but as to the voyage which has not been entered upon, it is not so. Here is a marked distinction between the two cases, recognized by the commercial law. But the argument rests upon the supposition that there is no difference between them. Mr. Benecke, following out his reasoning to its legitimate consequences, says, that when a vessel is sent out in ballast under charter-party to bring a cargo home, the freight for the homeward cargo ought not to contribute toward a general average loss occurring on the outward bound passage. But to this Mr. Phillips does not agree, and places his dissent on the ground, that the homeward freight, that is, the freight for the round voyage, is at stake, and is insurable from the time the vessel breaks ground on the outward passage, and then argues that on an adjustment of an average on the outward or homeward passage, it should be apportioned and contribute on a proportion, in each case. But is such the legitimate conclusion from his premises? If the whole be at risk, then the whole is saved, and ought to contribute just as much as the whole vessel, which contributes in both cases. But upon what principle is it to be argued that the whole freight upon a round voyage, which is in no part earned or payable until the arrival of the vessel at her home port, is not to contribute to a general average loss occurring on the homeward passage? Is not the whole at risk? Is not the whole saved? Is it not the principle upon which the assessment is to be made, that every one shall contribute in proportion to the benefit received? And the owner is benefited to the whole amount of his freight then depending. I have not attempted to exhaust the argument, but merely to present some reasons why I prefer reposing on decided cases, rather than on the reasoning of Mr. Benecke and Mr. Phillips. I am of opinion that, in this case, the freight for the round voyage must contribute.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1843.

SHIPPING — GENERAL AVERAGE — SALE OF CARGO BY MASTER—NECESSARY REPAIRS—PROFITS—INTEREST.

1. Specie was shipped from Boston for Porto Cabello, for the purpose of purchasing a return cargo, and the vessel put into Antigua on account of a disaster, where the master, being destitute of funds, sold a part of the specie, for the purpose of making repairs, and the vessel proceeded to her port of destination, and thence to Boston. Held, that the owners thereof were not entitled to recover the profits which they might have made upon a return cargo, but that they were entitled to interest upon the value of the specie, from the time when they would have had the benefit of it at Porto Cabello, if it had been carried forward with the rest of the cargo.

2. No adjustment of general average was made at Porto Cabello; but this, under the circumstances, did not impair the right of the shipper to interest.

[Cited in Dupont de Nemours v. Vance, 19 How. (60 U. S.) 171.]

The libellants [Shelton and others] shipped a quantity of specie, consisting of five-franc pieces, on board the Mary, from Boston to Porto Cabello, for the purpose of purchasing a return cargo. On the outward passage, the Mary met with a disaster; her masts were cut away, and she put into Antigua for repairs. The master being destitute of funds, and unable to raise them, sold a part of the specie for the purpose of making the necessary repairs, and the vessel afterwards proceeded on her voyage to Porto Cabello; and thence to Boston. It was admitted, that the specie of the libellant, which was thus taken, should be paid for in general average, at its value at Porto Cabello, the port of destination; and it appeared, that five-franc pieces passed at that place, as currency, and of the same value as Spanish dollars. No adjustment of general average was had at Porto Cabello, and none, until since the filing of the libel in this case. The question presented was, whether, in making such adjustment, the libellants should be allowed interest on the specie so taken, from the time when they would have had the benefit of it at Porto Cabello, if it had been carried forward with the rest of the cargo.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. I am of opinion that the libellants are entitled to such interest. The owner of the cargo is under no obligation to keep the ship in repair. But in certain cases, the law allows the master, from necessity, to sell a part of the cargo without the consent of the shipper, in order to enable the vessel to prosecute the voyage. But in such case, the shipper is to be compensated, and the measure of compensation is to be such as to place him in as good a situation as he would have been in, had the property of some other shipper been taken, instead of his. This is the general rule, and it is manifestly founded both in justice and policy. In conformity to this principle, it is well settled, that the shipper is entitled to be paid for his property, at its full value at the port of destination, deducting certain necessary charges. This, it is supposed, will afford him an indemnity, because, with the money thus paid to him, it is presumed that he can replace the articles taken, or purchase others of equivalent value, at his election.

But it is obvious, that, in order to afford him an indemnity, payment should be made to him at the port of destination. He cannot otherwise be placed in as good a situation, as he would have been in, had the goods of some other shipper been taken. His purpose was to place his cargo in that port. There he needed it to carry forward his enterprise. To refuse this to him while the other shippers have their parts of the cargo carried forward and delivered at the port of destination, would by no means place him in as good a condition as they, and would clearly violate the fundamental principle by which compensation is to be made.

As he had a right to have the goods shipped delivered to him at the port of destination, so has he the right to have that, which, without his consent and for the benefit of others, has been substituted for the goods, delivered to him at the same place. And if this be not done, he is entitled to compensation for the injury sustained thereby.

What shall be the measure of such compensation? The libel asks that it may be the profits which would have been made on the homeward cargo. But this was abandoned at the argument, and very properly. The law cannot go into a speculation of contingent profits, and it presumes that the shipper might have substituted other funds for a return cargo, if he saw fit. Interest is the established measure of damages for the non-payment of money.

The shipper might waive his right to payment at the port of destination. But there is nothing in this case from which such waiver can be presumed, unless it be that the adjustment of the general average was not made up, until since the arrival of the vessel here. But I do not think that sufficient to warrant a presumption, that the shippers voluntarily relinquished their right. They were not personally at Porto Cabello; and it does not appear that any offer of payment was made to their correspondents, or consignees. It must be inferred, that the captain had no funds, or means of making payment, at Porto Cabello; and as the parties all resided here, the adjustment was properly left to be made by themselves, after the return of the vessel.

I have discussed this case, as if the goods of the libellants had been sold. But it is proved, that the five-franc pieces passed as currency, and were money at Porto Cabello. If this makes any difference, it strengthens the claim, bringing it more directly within the case of Sims v. Willing, 8 Serg. & R. 103, and the remarks of the author in 2 Phil. Ins. (2d Ed.) p. 131.

All the authorities cited at the bar tend in some degree to sustain the positions above taken. In many of them, and particularly in the case of The Packet [Case No. 10,654], such taking of the property of a shipper is regarded as a forced loan. And surely as much compensation should be made by the law in case of a forced loan, as is ordinarily allowed when the lending has been voluntary. Judgment accordingly.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. July, 1852.

SEAMEN'S WAGES — COASTING LICENSE — ILLEGAL VOYAGE—RIGHT TO RECOVER—KNOWLEDGE OF SHIP'S PAPERS.

1. Seamen on board of a small vessel, under a coasting license, employed in collecting and taking paving stones from Marshfield and Scituate beaches, and conveying them to Boston, the whole passage being within the ebb and flow of the tide, have a lien upon the vessel for their wages.

[See The Charles F. Perry, Case No. 2,616.]

2. If a vessel is engaged in the coasting trade, without a license, and that fact is not known to a seaman, it does not affect his right to wages. It is not incumbent upon a seaman to examine the vessel's papers, to see if the voyage be legal.

[Cited in The Norfolk, Case No. 10,297.]

This was a libel promoted by David Downing and others, of the crew of the schooner Mary, in a cause of subtraction of wages. It appeared that the vessel was employed in bringing paving-stones from Scituate and Marshfield beaches, to Boston, and the libellants were employed in loading the vessel with the stones, at the various places where they were obtained, navigating the vessel to Boston, and unloading her. The schooner had a coasting license, which expired on the 14th April, 1852; after which, and before the renewal of the license, she made one trip to Scituate. The claim of the libellants was for services on that trip. It was insisted in the defence, that the services of the libellants were not properly maritime, the compensation for which creates a lien upon the vessel; that the trip made after the expiration of the license, was illegal, and that no wages could be recovered for services on an illegal voyage.

H. C. Hutchins, for libellants.

R. H. Dana, Jr., for respondents.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The first ground of defence is, that the services of the libellants were not maritime. In the supreme court of the United States, in the case of The Jefferson, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 428, it was decided that the services must be rendered upon a vessel whose passages were upon the high seas, or within the ebb and flow of the tide. Judge Hopkinson, in the case of Thackarey v. The Farmer of Salem [Case No. 13,852], a vessel under fifty tons burden, the business of which consisted in going across the river, about two miles, for wood, the passage seldom occupying more than an hour, held that the admiralty had no jurisdiction. The same judge sustained the jurisdiction in the case of a vessel plying between Philadelphia and Smyrna, in Delaware, entirely a river navigation, but within the ebb and flow of the tide. Smith v. The Pekin [Id. 13,090]; Wilson v. The Ohio [Id. 17,825]. In Packard v. The Louisa [Id. 10,652] a small vessel carried stones from Quincy to Boston, and the men on board not only loaded and unloaded them, but assisted, also, in laying them into the wharves and other structures; and Judge Woodbury intimated that they had no lien upon the vessel. In my opinion, persons employed in navigating vessels, engaged in transporting goods upon tide-water, although within a harbor, are engaged in the maritime service, and have a lien upon the vessel for their wages, which may be enforced in the admiralty. If such service is merely incidental, and subsidiary to some other, as the quarrying of stone for the building of wharves, then the whole cannot be deemed maritime; but if the taking on board of the stones, and the discharging or laying them into the walls of the wharf, are merely incidental and subsidiary to the maritime employment of the vessel, then the whole contract service is maritime, and the suit thereon may be brought in the admiralty. In the present case, the vessel in her passage for the paving stones, went upon the high seas. After leaving the outer light, she was extra fauces terræ. While taking in her cargo, she was upon the high seas. It appeared, by the evidence, that the libellants were seamen, and that they signed shipping articles for a coasting voyage. Their contract, therefore, was maritime.

As to the objection of the illegality of the last trip or voyage, there is no evidence that the seamen were aware that the vessel had not the requisite papers. It is not incumbent on the mariner to examine the vessel's papers, or to see whether the master has done his duty. If it should appear that the seamen knew of the illegality of a voyage, it might bar his claim. Such is not the present case.

District Court, D. Maine. Aug. 18, 1838.

SEAMEN'S WAGES — WHEN TO BE PAID — CUSTOM OF PORT — PROVISIONS — SHORT ALLOWANCE — DOUBLE PAY — EQUIVALENTS — NAVY RATION.

1. A mariner is entitled to his wages as soon as he is voluntarily discharged from the vessel; and if not paid within ten days after his discharge he may have process from a court of admiralty against the vessel to enforce the payment.

[Cited in The Annie M. Smull, Case No. 423.]

2. Whether the seamen are bound to remain by the vessel after the voyage is ended and assist in discharging the cargo, depends on the custom of the port.

[Cited in Packard v. The Louisa, Case No. 10,652.]

3. If a vessel has not the quantity and kind of provisions required by the act of congress of July 20, 1790, § 9 [1 Stat. 135], and the crew are put on short allowance, they are entitled to double wages for every day that the short allowance is continued.

[Cited in The Childe Harold, Case No. 2,676; The John L. Dimmick, Id. 7,355; Foster v. Sampson, Id. 4,982; Collins v. Wheeler, Id. 3,018.]

4. But when the master is unable to obtain the kind of provision which the statute names, other kinds may be substituted as equivalents.

5. When the crew are put upon an allowance and there is a controversy whether it be short or not, the navy ration is assumed as the standard of a proper allowance.

This was a suit for subtraction of wages. The libel sets forth a contract for a voyage from Portland to Goree in Africa and the Cape de Verd Islands, and back to her port of discharge in the United States, for wages at the rate of eighteen dollars a month, alleges the faithful performance of the contract, and claims a balance due of $48.08. In another article the libellant claims extra wages in consequence of being put on short allowance of provisions for twenty-two days during the return voyage. The answer of the owner admits the contract, the service, and the balance due, as alleged in the libel, and avers that he is, and always has been ready to pay the sum, and brings the money into court, and alleges that the libellant has never demanded it. The answer denies that the crew was put on short allowance, and avers that they were at all times supplied with a sufficient quantity of good and wholesome provisions of the kind usually furnished in such voyages. The answer also contains an allegation that at the time when the libel was filed in court ten days had not elapsed since the discharge of the crew.

Mr. Haynes, for libellant.
Mr. Fox, for respondent.

WARE, District Judge. The first question raised by the pleadings in this case, in the natural order in which they present themselves, is whether the suit is prematurely instituted. The allegation of the answer, on this point, is incorrect in point of form, but if the facts bring the case within the exception it is susceptible of amendment. The statute does not prevent the filing of a libel before the expiration of ten days, but the issuing of process against the vessel. Whether this objection is available for the respondent upon the facts as they are proved, depends on the construction of the sixth section of the act of July 20, 1790, c. 56 [1 Story's Laws, 106; 1 Stat. 135, c. 29]. The particular clause fixing the time when admiralty process may be issued against the vessel, provided the wages are not paid, has been thought to be not of very easy interpretation. It is in these words: "As soon as the voyage is ended, and the cargo or ballast fully discharged at the last port of delivery, every seaman or mariner shall be entitled to the wages which shall then be due according to his contract; and if such wages shall not be paid within ten days after such discharge, or if any dispute shall arise between the master and seamen, or mariners, touching the said wages, it shall be lawful," &c. And at the close of the section it is further provided, that nothing herein contained shall prevent any seaman or mariner from having or maintaining any action at common law, for the recovery of his wages, or from immediate process of any court having admiralty jurisdiction, wherever any vessel may be found, in case she shall have left the port of delivery where her voyage ended before payment of wages, or in case she shall be about to proceed to sea before the end of the ten days next after the delivery of her cargo or ballast.

One difficulty in the construction of the act, is supposed to arise from coupling the two phrases, "as soon as the voyage is ended," and "the cargo or ballast is fully discharged." The statute seems to have been framed upon the idea, either that these two phrases are identical in their meaning, the latter being added as merely exegetical of the former; or that by the principles of law, the seamen are bound to remain with the vessel until the cargo is fully discharged. But it is quite clear that in the maritime sense of the word, the voyage is ended when the vessel has arrived at her last port of destination, not always her last port of delivery, and is safely moored at the wharf. Cloutman v. Tunison [Case No. 2,907]; Edwards v. The Susan [Id. 4,299]. The cargo may have been delivered at any other port, and thus the discharge of the cargo happens before the end of the voyage, yet the seamen are unquestionably bound to bring her to her last port of destination, and their wages will not be due by their contract until that time; or what is more common, the last port of delivery may be the last port of destination, and then the voyage will be ended before any part of the cargo is discharged. And further, admitting what is not perhaps quite clear, that the seamen are, by the general principles of the marine law applicable to their contract, bound to remain by the vessel and assist in discharging the cargo, the general principle may be controlled by an established usage to the contrary. In this port, and it is believed in most of the ports of the United States (Dunl. Adm. Prac. 98), the uniform custom on the return of a vessel from a foreign voyage is to discharge the crew before unlading the vessel, and to employ other persons to perform that service. It is a custom so uniform, general, and of so long standing, that it may fairly be considered as entering into, and making part of the implied terms of the contract. The end of the voyage and the delivery of the cargo do not therefore refer to the same time according to the established usage of this port. The end of the voyage is when the vessel has arrived and is safely moored at the wharf, or when the master has provided other men to take the place of the crew and assist in unlading the cargo. The owner in the present case acted upon this custom. The vessel arrived in the afternoon of Saturday the 28th of July; and the crew were discharged the same day. Their wages were made up including and terminating with that day, and some of them paid on Monday. The sum brought into court and admitted to be due to the libellant includes Saturday only, and no complaint is made that he left the vessel before the voyage was ended, or that he had not completely performed his contract. It is manifest, therefore, that both the owners and the seamen considered the voyage for which they contracted as ended when the ship was made fast to the wharf and before the discharge of the cargo.

The statute declares that when the voyage is ended, and the cargo or ballast discharged, the seamen shall be entitled to their wages. If by the terms of the contract or the usage of the place, the seamen are bound to remain in the vessel and assist in unlading the cargo, then on common principles they will not be entitled to their wages until the cargo is discharged. The contract is entire, and they are not entitled to their pay until it is completed. But if by the terms of the contract or the usage of the place, their term of service and with it their wages terminate with the end of the voyage, and before the unlading of the vessel, then on the same principle they are entitled to their wages when their term of service expires. In such a case, when do the ten days begin to run; is it from the end of the voyage, or from the discharge of the cargo? It cannot be from both. My opinion is, that the intention of the legislature was, that they should begin to run from the time when the wages become due, that is from the day when the term of service is completed. They are then of common right entitled to their pay. The statute couples the two phrases, the end of the voyage and the discharge of the cargo at the last port of delivery, and declares that the seamen shall then be entitled to their wages. Now it cannot without violence be presumed that the legislature intended to establish any new and peculiar principles of law to be applied to contracts of seamen in this particular. But if it is contended that the time begins to run from the time when the cargo is discharged at the last port of delivery, and that is not the port of final destination where the voyage ends according to the contract, then the statute would declare the wages to be due before the contract was fully performed. If the final port of destination is the last port of delivery, and by the usage of the place the term of service expires with the end of the voyage, that is, when the vessel is safely moored at the wharf, then a similar inconsequence will result in an opposite sense, and the legislature will be made to declare that the wages are not due until an indefinite period after the contract has been fully performed, that is, until the cargo is completely discharged. The difficulty will be avoided by holding that the time runs from the day the men are discharged. The wages are then completely earned, and of common right are due, and this, I think, was the intention of the legislature. This is the construction which has been given to the statute by Judge Peters. Edwards v. The Susan [supra]; Thompson v. The Philadelphia [Case No. 13,973]; The Happy Return [Id. 13,697]. It is also the settled construction of the statute in Massachusetts district. Holmes v. Bradshaw [Id. 6,635], Dist Ct. Mass. Dec., 1823; Dunl. Adm. Prac. 99. And though some hesitation has been expressed as to the soundness of this construction, it appears to me to be open to fewer objections than any other. Abb. Shipp. 635, note. In the present case process was not issued until the expiration of ten days including the day of discharge.

We come then to the principal question in the cause, whether any extra wages are due in consequence of the crew being put on short allowance. By the ninth section of an act of July 20, 1790, c. 56 [1 Story's Laws, 106; 1 Stat. 135, c. 29], every vessel of 150 tons burden or more, bound on a voyage across the Atlantic, is required to have 100 pounds of salted meat, and 100 pounds of bread for every person on board, independent of any other stores of live-stock which shall be put on board by the master or passengers, and in a like proportion for a longer or a shorter voyage; and if not so provided, and the crew shall be put on short allowance, then each of the crew shall be entitled to one day's wages extra for every day they shall be kept on short allowance.

It is admitted that there was not in this case the quantity of provisions on board which is required by law, and it is also proved and admitted that during part of the time, on the return voyage, the crew was put on an allowance; but it is denied that it was a short allowance. The law fixes with precision the amount and kind of provisions which a vessel is required to have on board. In its terms it does not admit of any substitutes for the kinds prescribed. But courts have thought that when a vessel happens to be in a port where it is not in the power of the master to obtain provisions of the amount and description directed by the law, other articles may be substituted which are of equivalent value. Mariners v. The Washington [Case No. 9,086]. This temperament has been introduced in the construction of the statute upon the reasonable presumption that the law does not intend to require of the master impossibilities. But when the courts by an equitable construction have introduced a qualification, and liberated the owners from the penal operation of the law against its letter, they are bound to see that the substitutes offered are a full equivalent, both in quantity and quality, for that required by the text of the law; the more so as the policy of the law addresses itself so strongly to the interests of humanity, it being intended to guard against the dreadful sufferings of famine while the ship's company are isolated from all the world and under a positive impossibility of relieving themselves.

This vessel, on her departure from Cape Bonavista, had considerably less than half the amount of bread and salted meat required for a vessel crossing the Atlantic. And all she had, which can fairly be considered as a substitute, was less than one fourth of a barrel of flour and about a half a barrel of beans. The whole live-stock was one pig and three goats, with about a bushel of corn to feed them, but this is expressly excluded from being admitted as a substitute for salted provisions. It is unnecessary to waste words to prove that these trifling stores could be no equivalent for the deficiency of the bread and salted meat. The master endeavored to replenish his stores at Cape Bonavista, but provisions could not be purchased at any price. He was obliged to sail with what he had, and nine days after leaving port the men were put on an allowance of three biscuits a day, and a few days after on an allowance of one pound of beef.

Whether the required quantity of provisions is on board or not, it is the duty of the master to oversee and regulate their expenditure. It does not follow that because they are dealt out in fixed and limited quantities, the men are put on short allowance. It must be shown that the allowance is not in a reasonable amount, not enough for the ordinary consumption of a man. What that reasonable quantity is, has not been determined by the statute. But in fixing the rations of the army and navy, the legislature has shown what they consider a proper allowance. The army ration is fixed at one pound and a half of beef, or three quarters of a pound of pork, and eighteen ounces of bread. Act March 16, 1802, c. 9, § 6 [2 Story's Laws, 831; 2 Stat. 134, c. 9]. The navy ration varies with the different days of the week, and is not made up exclusively of bread and meat, but is on the whole rather larger than that of the army. Act March 3, 1805, c. 91, § 3. A seaman in the merchant service requires as much food as one in the navy, and the navy ration has been assumed as the standard by which the allowance in the merchant service ought to be regulated. Mariners v. The Washington [supra]; Gardner v. The New Jersey [Case No. 5,233]. In the present case the allowance was one pound of beef, and, at most, not more than twelve ounces of bread. This is precisely two thirds of the army ration, and a little less than that proportion of the ration for the navy. To make up this deficiency there was, for the whole passage of thirty-two days, not more than forty pounds of flour and about half a bushel of beans to be divided among nine persons. This would make but a very small addition to the allowance, and if we assume the navy ration as the standard, it is quite clear that the men were on a short allowance.

But it is urged, as an argument that the allowance was sufficient, that some of the men did not consume the whole of what was allowed. This is true; but it should be added that they took care to have their savings carefully locked up in their chests. They knew that their stock of provisions was short, and that it was altogether uncertain when they would obtain more, and how long they would be under the necessity of sustaining life on what they had. It was therefore prudent and natural that they should practise the utmost frugality, and save all that could be spared from the urgent calls of nature, against a time of need, which they might reasonably have contemplated as not a very remote possibility; for if the voyage had been prolonged but a few days more, the crew must have suffered from absolute famine. I have no doubt that it was owing to unexpected contingencies that the vessel was left with this short supply of provisions, and not to the want of ordinary prudence or forecast on the part of the owners. Their intention was to have had an addition made to her stores for the return voyage, in a foreign port. But unfortunately, and without any fault on their part, they could not be obtained. A court, however, which is bound to administer the law, cannot take these circumstances into consideration. The text of the law is imperative, and it is framed in the spirit of wisdom and humanity; and the interests of commerce as well as humanity require that it should be carried into effect. The putting the crew upon an allowance, was, under the circumstances of the case, if not a matter of absolute necessity, one of prudence, and there cannot be a reasonable doubt but that it was a short allowance. According to the testimony of the cook, they were upon allowance twenty-two days, but the statement of the mate is, that they were upon allowance nine days after leaving Bonavista, and the allowance was discontinued five days before their arrival in this port. As the passage was thirty-two days, that will leave eighteen. In addition to the balance of wages, I shall allow extra pay for eighteen days.

SLAVES—SUIT FOR FREEDOM—RUNNING AWAY.

1. A slave, brought into the county of Washington, D. C., from Virginia, by her owner, afterwards ran away, and her owner sold her "running." Held, that she did not thereby lose the benefit of the provision of law in her favor.

2. A person coming to reside here may, under the 2d section of the Maryland statute of 1796, c. 67, lawfully bring his slaves with him; but if he sells them within three years after his removal, he loses the benefit of the exception in his favor, continued in the 2d section, and they are entitled to their freedom under the 1st section of the act.

Petition for freedom.

R. S. Coxe, for defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if the petitioner was brought here from Virginia by her lawful owner, and afterward ran away, and her owner sold her running, supposing her to be then in Virginia; the running away in fraud of the law will prevent the slave from the benefit of the provision in her favor.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, stated the construction of the statute to be this: By the 1st section of the Maryland act of 1796, c. 67, a slave imported, for sale or to reside, is free. The 2d section contains an exception in favor of those who come here to reside. The 3d section is an exception to the 2d so as to prevent it from operating in favor of an owner so removing, who shall sell the slave within three years after his removal.

THE COURT said that THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, stated the law correctly, as it had been decided lately in a case in Alexandria, in which Mr. Taylor was engaged. Harris v. Alexander [Case No. 6,113], at April term, 1830.

THE COURT refused to give the instruction prayed by Mr. Coxe.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—ILLEGAL VOYAGE—KNOWLEDGE—RIGHT TO PREVENT CRIME—MERE SUSPICION—TAKING POSSESSION—RIGHT TO LEAVE.

1. It seems that seamen employed on board a vessel forfeited under the act of 1800, (2 Stat. 70,) as fitted out for the slave-trade, are entitled to wages, notwithstanding the forfeiture, if they were not knowingly or willingly connected with the criminal purpose of the voyage.

2. Seamen are authorized under the general maritime law to prevent or restrain their officers from the commission of open and flagrant crimes in the ship, attempted in the presence of the seamen.

3. But the crew are not justified, by circumstances affording reasonable ground of suspicion merely that the master is about to engage the vessel in the slave-trade, in taking possession of her at sea, or in a foreign port, and bringing her back to her home port; and their undertaking so to do, forfeits both the wages already earned and those for the residue of the voyage. [See The Almatia, Case No. 254.]

4. The right of seamen to leave the vessel on the ground of her being chartered for a voyage in gross deviation from that for which they shipped, will not justify them in taking possession of the vessel while at sea.

5. Costs of a suit for seamen's wages imposed on libellants, where the crew had taken possession of the vessel while on her voyage and brought her home, under reasonable grounds of suspicion that she was to be engaged in the slave-trade.

A libel in rem was filed by James States, William Gray, Edward Davis, Thomas Holden, and Peter Johnson, crew of the schooner Mary Ann, against that vessel, to recover wages. There was also filed a libel in personam, by Peter Johnson alone, against William F. Martin, the owner of the schooner, to recover the same wages as were claimed by the libellants in the other suit. The facts in the case were, in brief, that the crew shipped on board the Mary Ann for a voyage to the coast of Africa. Arriving there, they became suspicious that the master intended to engage the vessel in the slave-trade. Resolving to prevent this, they took possession of the vessel, and after navigating her along the coast, in search of an American cruiser, under whose authority they might place her, but without success, they brought her back to the port of New York. Proceedings were taken in this court by the United States authorities, to procure the condemnation of the vessel as a slaver. The court decided that, upon the whole evidence, the charge was not sustained, but that there was probable cause for her arrest. The seamen having filed their libels, the causes were now argued upon the facts disclosed on the trial of the vessel.

The counsel in the personal action were—

Burr, Benedict & Beebe, for libellant.

J. M. Smith, Jr., for respondent.

The counsel in the action against the schooner were—

William Jay Haskett, for libellants.

J. M. Smith, Jr., for claimants.

BETTS, District Judge. These causes are connected in the argument with that of the United States against the same vessel, the final decree in which was rendered a few days since. The proofs presented in that cause form the basis of proceedings in the two cases under consideration.

The actions are by the crew of the vessel jointly against the schooner in rem, and by one of them separately against her owner in personam, to recover wages for the entire voyage to the coast of Africa and back to this port.

The schooner, on her return to this port, was delivered to the United States authorities, by the libellants, and was arrested upon a libel of information, in the name of the United States, charged with having been fitted out for the purpose of carrying on a traffic in slaves from one foreign country to another. Her forfeiture for that cause was demanded under the provisions of the act of congress of May 10, 1800 (2 Stat. 70), the offence being held by the supreme court to be embraced in the act of fitting out and preparing the vessel, with intent that she should be so engaged, although not actually employed in the business. U. S. v. Morris, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 464.

Immediately on the seizure of the vessel by the United States, the seamen filed their joint libel against her for wages. This was on December 12, 1847; and on the 20th of the same month, the libellant Johnson commenced his separate action for the same cause against the respondent as owner.

The court decided, in the suit brought by the United States, that upon the whole evidence the libel was not sustained, and decreed the surrender of the vessel to her owner, but held that probable cause for her arrest on the charge preferred against her, had been established.

Had the prosecution on the part of the United States resulted in the condemnation of the vessel, the seamen would have been entitled to their wages notwithstanding the forfeiture, if it appeared that they were not knowingly or willingly connected with the criminal voyage. The case of The St. Jago de Cuba, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 417, is directly in point to substantiate this principle.

The peculiarity of this case is, that the vessel was not condemned, nor was she brought in or diverted from her voyage by capture under authority of the United States. The seizers, if they may be so called, are not those who claimed the condemnation of the vessel for a violation of the acts in relation to the slave-trade, but they are the seamen composing her crew, who brought her off the coast of Africa clandestinely, and navigated her to this port, under apprehension that the master was about to employ the vessel and themselves in carrying slaves from Africa to Brazil.

The conduct of the crew is insisted, by their counsel, to have been justifiable and meritorious, because they acted bona fide under circumstances affording reasonable cause to believe that the master intended to engage the vessel immediately in the slave-trade, and in the full belief, on their part, that such was the fact. They accordingly had the right to withdraw themselves from connection with such a criminal enterprise, and did no more nor less than their duty in also saving to the owner his vessel, by putting it out of the power of the master to employ her in that felonious pursuit.

It is just to the crew to remark, in vindication of their good faith in the transaction, that they did not, under the influence of their alarm and apprehension, take the schooner immediately to the United States, but they honestly sought along the coast an American cruiser, in order to put themselves and the vessel under the protection and authority of the American flag, and to take the advice of an American officer in the emergency.

It is manifest, however, that though they might rightfully, under the circumstances, appeal to an American officer, the failure to find one could not be regarded as clothing them with an authority to act as they supposed he might have done in view of the facts. The interference with merchant vessels, by seizing them or altering their destination or employment, by public officers of high intelligence and responsibility, and free from personal bias or apprehension in the matter, is a most delicate power, the exercise of which is, by all free governments, placed under careful supervision and guarded by appropriate checks. No considerate jurisprudence would entrust such powers to common sailors, and permit them to act as umpire between the master and the owner, or the owner and the government. Nor would they on any account be authorized to assume the command of the vessel, or break up her voyage, or leave her master in a foreign port, on suspicion that the vessel was designed for illegal traffic, or even for a piratical expedition. Seamen are not a class of men whose prudence or discretion could be trusted with the exercise of such delicate and extraordinary powers. The utmost that has been allowed the crew by modern or ancient maritime codes is, to interpose by force, and restrain and prevent the officers in command from committing open and flagrant crimes in their presence, or through their agency. In such extreme case, they may refuse to obey an unlawful order, or even arrest and confine the officer who attempts to perpetrate a piracy or felony. U. S. v. Thompson [Case No. 16,492].

On this occasion, the crew, upon consultation, united in the determination to put or leave the master on shore, and carry off the vessel and endeavor to deliver her up to some American man-of-war upon the coast. Let it be admitted that a train of circumstances existed and had come to the knowledge of the crew, which afforded reasonable ground to suspect that the master contemplated employing the vessel in the transportation of slaves from Africa to Brazil, and that the liberty or lives of these men might become implicated by that attempt; still no act of guilt had been committed or avowed in their presence, nor do they show that an immediate interposition by them was necessary, or that abandoning the master on the coast, and going off with the vessel, was requisite for their protection and safety, or that that course was adopted to secure the rights of the owner, supposing that he was ignorant of the wrongful purpose of the master.

The vessel lay close into Gallinas, a place of resort for American, English, and French cruisers stationed on the coast to detect and prevent the prosecution of the slave-trade. An English vessel of war was then at anchor directly in the vicinity of the schooner, and if the crew could not find safe shelter on shore, they could at once have placed the ship and themselves under the guard of that ship, and there is no reason to doubt that on application to the British commander, and showing him probable cause for the proceeding, he would have extended his protection to them until some proper American authority could be communicated with. No imminent necessity accordingly is found for taking off the schooner by the libellants, even if it had been placed beyond question that she intended to take on board a slave cargo the next day. It is not shown that the libellants applied to the English vessel for protection; and that their flight was regarded as needless and suspicious by the commander of that ship, would appear from his sending his cutter, at the request of the captain of the schooner, in pursuit of her, to bring her back to Gallinas by force.

I do not, however, determine this point on the supposition that the libellants gave way to a groundless alarm. Admitting that there was probable foundation for their fears, there is no sound and safe principle of the maritime law which justifies their extraordinary determination to remove the schooner from her moorings, and the still more reprehensible one of breaking up her voyage and running her across the Atlantic to the United States, in charge of men of no known capacity for such an undertaking. She would lose the protection of her insurance; and the peril of actual loss of the vessel, on a voyage so conducted, would scarcely be less than that of abandoning her on the coast to enter upon a piratical trade. The subjection of the vessel and cargo to the arbitrament of the crew, as to the legality or propriety of such an adventure, would expose distant mercantile operations to uncertainties and perils of the most appalling character; and it can never be expected that the right of a crew to interfere at their discretion, and take forcible possession of a vessel on mere circumstances of suspicion against the master, can be countenanced by the courts as a general principle of law. Their interposition to that end must always be limited to extreme cases, where the facts are palpable, and leave no room to doubt that such interference had become indispensable to the safety of their own lives, or at least to avert the commission of some heinous crime.

The case then demands, not only that the conduct of the crew in running off with the vessel and bringing her to the United States should be pronounced excusable under the circumstances, but that it be held meritorious to such a degree as to entitle them to maintain an action in rem against the vessel, or in personam against the owner, to enforce payment of full wages during the whole period that she was so controlled by them and diverted from her voyage. This claim must be pronounced incompatible with every sound and safe principle of law.

If this branch of the case cannot be supported, it is contended that there is an equity in behalf of the crew, sanctioning their claim to wages on the outward voyage. That was faithfully performed, and the cargo safely landed at Gallinas.

This demand is supposed to be sustainable on either of two grounds—First, that the crew have given sufficient evidence that the vessel had deviated from her voyage, and was about to be employed in the slave-trade, to justify them in abandoning her service; second, that the act of the master in chartering her from Gallinas to Bahia, was a deviation which released the crew from their contract, and empowerd them to recover wages for the services already rendered.

1. The conduct of the master, at Gallinas, wore a very mysterious and suspicious appearance. The voyage stated upon the shipping articles was "from New York to one or more ports on the coast of Africa, and back to her port of discharge, in the United States." The evidence, on the part of the owner, showed that the voyage was intended for purposes of traffic up and down the coast, according to the usage of the trade on the western coast of Africa. The period that it was to continue was not stipulated in the agreement, or stated in his letter of instructions; and without admitting that this omission imported an understanding between the owner and master, that the latter was expected to do something else with the vessel than to run her upon the voyage proposed, there is no question that, if he protracted the services of the seamen along the coast to an unreasonable extent, they might, for that cause, leave the vessel at a suitable time and place. Abb. Shipp. 608; The Crusader, [Case No. 3,456]. The crew were not under his absolute power as to the direction of their services; much less could this indefiniteness as to the continuance of their engagement be used by the master to put them on a service wholly foreign to that agreed upon, and it would be, moreover, occasion for serious distrust as to his purposes, on their part. The chartering the vessel by the master to transport passengers to Bahia, without consulting his crew, and without stipulation as to the period she was to be employed on her destination after the charter-party should expire, taken in connection with the preparations before ordered by him on board of the vessel, and the notorious courses employed in carrying on the slave-trade, were all calculated to awaken their alarm. Had the men refused to perform that voyage, or left the ship to avoid being forced to make it, the court would, without doubt, have held that the circumstances fully excused the act, and that they were entitled to wages to that period.

2. Whatever question might be raised upon the first point, it is, however, most clear that they had a right to abandon the vessel, on the ground of her being chartered for a voyage in manifest and unreasonable deviation from that for which they shipped. The law on this point is precise and well settled. Cases to the point are collected, and the principles well stated in the elementary books. Curt. Merch. Seam. 24, 25; Abb. Shipp. 173, note 1.

But these doctrines, looking to the protection and indemnity of seamen in vindicating their rights under the shipping contract, give no countenance to the inference now sought to be deduced from them, that a crew may exercise that right of withdrawing from the contract, by also taking away with them the vessel in which they engaged to serve. Such a consequence has no legitimate connection with the right itself, or the means necessary to its exercise. It is a naked aggression upon the rights of the owner—certainly no less when committed in port, where the men could find protection from coercion and personal violence, than at sea—and it will hardly be claimed that a crew may arrest the master and ship at sea, and take command of her, to avoid a deviation from the voyage contracted. The authorities justify them in refusing, when in port, to perform service or remain on board after the vessel has deviated from her voyage (U. S. v. Mathews [Case No. 15,742]), but in no case is it intimated that they have the power to redress themselves for a past deviation, or to prevent an anticipated one, by seizing the vessel abroad and carrying her back to her home port.

This act of the crew was illegal. In an action by the owner against them for compensation because of the loss and injury occasioned to him thereby, they could not defend themselves on a plea of necessity, or on the ground of prudent precaution. They were entitled to leave the ship and abandon their engagement, or to defend themselves, in the harbor, from any attempt by force to compel them to go on the voyage to Brazil. Their privilege extended no further; and if, instead of furnishing grounds for strongly suspecting that the master was preparing to pervert the shipping engagement into a slave voyage, they had proved the fact explicitly, they would have no right in such case to do more than abandon the vessel. The ignorance and inexperience of the men, the suggestions made to them by others exciting or increasing their apprehensions, and the peculiar situation in which they were placed, tend to exonerate them from all mutinous or improper motives in what was done. They no doubt thought they were acting for the best interests of the owner, and in maintenance of the laws of their country; but most clearly these matters were not within their competency to determine, and in a civil action it is no justification for an illegal act that the party committed it with rightful and commendable intentions.

If fully persuaded that the libellants acted from worthy motives, and in the belief that what they did was for the benefit of the owner, yet the court could not countenance so glaring a dereliction of duty on the part of sailors, by permitting them to recover wages against the ship or owner, on facts and circumstances such as are disclosed in this case. If there was reasonable ground to apprehend danger to themselves, personally, in remaining on board and remonstrating with the master against his proposed voyage, and refusing to perform it, it was their duty to leave the vessel; and on such a termination of the engagement they would have recovered, certainly, the wages earned on the outward voyage, and probably, also, satisfaction for the return voyage thus lost. By absconding with the vessel and bringing her to the United States, from the coast of Africa, they have been guilty of a violation of their duty to the ship and to the owner, and deprived themselves of all rightful claim to wages for any portion of the time they were connected with her.

The libellants having been each examined as a witness in the cause, have had the opportunity of disclosing every fact and circumstance within their personal knowledge conducing to prove a guilty purpose on the part of the master of the vessel, or in excuse or extenuation of their imputations against him, and of their own conduct. They were not able, however, to present particulars which, reasonably considered, could establish the criminality of the master's conduct, or justify the determination adopted by them, and the means they took to carry it into effect.

Yet, upon the consideration that they acted under the influence of terror, and not from insubordination or dishonest motives, I should feel inclined to regard that state of excitement as so far palliating the conduct of the seamen as to warrant a decree leaving them to pay their own costs alone, without further punishing them, by imposing on them the costs of the owners; and if they possessed means which could be appropriated by the process of the court to the satisfaction of the costs created under these prosecutions, I should forbear giving authority to use it against them.

[2] [In pronouncing the opinion as first prepared, this view of the case was presented, and it was stated that such inclination would have prevailed if the crew had limited themselves to their suit in rem, prosecuted in connection with the seizure of the vessel by the government.

[But it was suggested that such favorable view of the case was overweighed by the act of the crew in commencing severally actions in personam against the owner, for their wages, and by different proctors, subsequent to the suit in rem, when no necessity existed for multiplication of actions and accumulation of costs, and the decree against the libellants for costs was placed substantially upon these reasons. Before the decree was entered it was pointed out to me by the counsel for the libellants, that only one of the crew had instituted a suit in personam, and that this was done before the return of the process in rem, and without the knowledge of his proctors that his name had been connected in fact with that suit.

[I have re-examined the original files and find I was mistaken in both these particulars. The first libel was filed the 11th or 12th of December, and the suit in personam was commenced the 20th, by the cook and steward alone: the other seamen having brought no action, against the owner. I have accordingly reconsidered the subject of costs to determine whether under the case first supposed and now found substantially to be its true position, the decree for costs ought to be revoked or modified.

[If the seamen had given stipulations for costs, or if discharging the order for costs against them would also absolve their proctors from liability to disburse the costs of prosecution created by the libellants, I should consider the condition in which the crew were placed at Gallinas, and their fright and unpremeditated departure with the vessel as reasonable grounds for adhering to my first impression, and for relieving their sureties and proctors, from paying these costs.] [2]

It is manifest that there is no equity in the case justifying the court in imposing costs upon the owner, who has sustained wrong and serious loss by the proceeding of the crew, and that the costs created in their behalf, in their own suit, must justly fall upon them. Their proctors, moreover, would derive no relief from a decree which only exonerated the libellants from paying costs to the claimant and respondent; and there being no sureties to protect it, it becomes, in the disposition of final costs, merely a naked question of equity between the seamen and the owner. The judgment of the court upon the merits has determined that the owner was clear of all culpability in the matter, and that there was not proof sufficient to fasten guilt upon the master. It results, that the right of the suit is on the part of the owner, and the mistake and the wrong on the part of the sailors, and that accordingly they should be subjected to bear at least their own costs.

Independent of that consideration, it seems to me that the owner can properly claim the award of costs against the libellants, as a protection and immunity against subsequent suits on their part. It is by no means clear that a decree merely dismissing the libel would bar after actions by any of these parties; but if there is connected with the order an award to the owner of his costs of suit, there would be a positive judgment for the amount rendered against them, and no tribunal would permit the cause of action to be again litigated until that judgment was satisfied. I shall, therefore, decree, that the action in rem and that in personam against the owner be dismissed, with costs to be taxed.

3. A creditor who has attached the thing in a suit against the owner, before the seizure, may intervene in the case as a claimant.

[Cited in Crapo v. Allen, Case No. 3,360; The Old Concord, Id. 10,482; Topfer v. The Mary Zephyr, 2 Fed. 825.]

This was a case of seizure made by the collector of Saco, for an alleged violation of the act of congress for the registering and recording of ships or vessels. The owner interposed no claim, but a claim was filed by Messrs. William J. and Charles E. Quincey, with a stipulation for costs, setting forth a claim against the vessel as attaching creditors, they having attached her, before the seizure, for a debt due to them from Dunlevie, the owner. The right of the Messrs. Quincey to intervene in the case as claimants, was denied on the part of the United States.

Mr. Shepley, Dist. Atty., for libellants.
C. S. Daveis, for claimants.

WARE, District Judge. It is contended by the district attorney that the Messrs. Quincey, upon the facts set forth in their claim and answer, cannot be admitted to appear as claimants, and make themselves parties, because the legal title to the vessel, and with it all their proprietary interest, passed by the bill of sale to the Howlands; and the lien which they acquired by attachment is not such an interest in the thing as will entitle them to maintain a claim in a court of admiralty. As a general principle, it is certainly true that in admiralty process in rem, all persons having an interest in the thing may intervene pro interesse suo, file their claims and make themselves parties to the cause, to defend their own interest. The process acts on the thing itself, and places it in the custody of the court. When thus in its possession, the court is bound to preserve it for all who have an interest in it, and not to deliver it but to those who prove a title. It follows as a necessary consequence that all who have a legal interest may appear, and by suitable allegations and proofs, show what that interest is, and claim to have it allowed. If it were not so, the greatest injustice would be done, because a decree of the court in rem is binding on all the world as to the points which are directly in judgment before it.

When property is brought into court on a revenue seizure, upon an allegation of forfeiture, the service having been regularly made according to law, it is deemed to be a service on all the world, and all persons who have an interest in the thing are presumed to have notice of the pendency of the suit. If no one appears to claim, and dispute the allegations of the libel, the act of congress prescribing the course of the court in revenue cases, directs that "the court shall proceed to hear and determine the cause according to law." Act March 2, 1799, c. 128, § 89 [1 Story's Laws, 653 (1 Stat. 695, c. 22)]. The practice of the court, when no person intervenes and files a claim, is to proceed by default and decree a forfeiture for want of a claim. This was the course prescribed by former laws. Act July 31, 1789, c. 5, § 36 [1 Stat. 29]; Act Aug. 4, 1790, c. 62, § 67 [1 Story's Laws, 155 (1 Stat. 176, c. 35)]. And this appears to be according to the course of the admiralty in its ordinary practice, and constitutes the law of the court. The legal notice of process having been given, the law presumes it to be brought home to all who have an interest in the thing, and if they do not appear and enter their claims they are held to be in contumacy, a decree passes on the motion of the libellant, the property is sold, and the proceeds brought into the registry; and on proof of the debt, upon a summary hearing, the libellant is entitled to be paid his debt and costs out of the proceeds. 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 399–405; Clerke, Praxis Adm. tit. 35. The excess is retained in the registry, for any one who shall claim and prove his title. In the case of libels for forfeiture in the name of the United States, if there be no claim, no proof of the facts is, in the ordinary practice of the court, required, but the allegations are taken to be true. The decree thus pronounced, conclusively ascertains the forfeiture, and is binding on all who claim an interest in the thing. The title acquired by forfeiture is good against all the world, and cannot be called in question in any other court. If it is so, what reason can be given why every person having an interest in the thing, whether it be a proprietary interest or a mere lien or privilege, should not be admitted to intervene for his own interest and contest the forfeiture so far as his right or interest would be prejudiced by the decree.

But it has been contended at the argument that the decisions of the courts lead to an opposite conclusion. It has been repeatedly held that a lien is not such an interest as will support a claim in a prize court. The Eenrom, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 5; The Tobago, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 221; The Marianna, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 26; The Frances (Irvin's claim) 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 418; The Mary, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 126. The principle on which this decision rests is that the person who has the lien cannot contest the title acquired by the captors, jure belli, but that the captors hold the property discharged of the burden. But there is one lien respected by prize courts, and that is the right of the neutral carrier to freight on enemy's goods, which is always awarded to him, this being a lien created by the general maritime law. But liens created by the act of the parties, which depend for their validity on the municipal laws of the country where the parties have their domicil, or where the liens are created, are not regarded by prize courts. "The difficulties," says Judge Washington in the case of The Frances, "which an examination of such claims would impose on the captors, and even on the courts in deciding them, and the door which such a doctrine would open to collusion between the enemy owners and the neutral claimants, have excluded such claimants from the consideration of the courts." In all these cases, the courts professedly take their stand on the principles of prize law; the reasoning by which the decision is vindicated applies peculiarly to that law, and has but a limited application on the instance side of the court.

It is, however, further contended that when the proceeding is for a forfeiture, a person having a lien cannot intervene and make himself a party in this stage of the cause, but must await the decision of the court, and in case of a decree of condemnation, file his petition to be paid out of the proceeds after they are brought into the registry. The case of The Louisetta [Case No. 8,535] is referred to, to show that this is the correct practice. That, like the present, was a case of revenue seizure, and there were attachments of private creditors. The vessel was sold on an interlocutory decree, and finally ordered to be restored. The counsel for the claimants moved for an order to the registrar to pay over the proceeds to them, the clerk having declined to do it without an order, as it was understood there were attachments on the property. The court merely said that they would take no notice of the attachment unless a caution were first filed. The question did not arise whether an attaching creditor could sustain a claim for the specific thing. The case of The St. Jago de Cuba, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 409, was a seizure under the slave-trade acts. Two claims were interposed, founded on liens; the first, of the seamen for their wages, and the second, of certain material-men for supplies for repairing and refitting the vessel. These claims were dismissed on the merits, but the faculty of the claimants to make themselves parties in the cause, was not called in question. But the question in this case did not present itself whether these privileged creditors could be admitted as parties to contest a forfeiture, because it was admitted that if the claims were valid they would overreach the forfeiture, and would entitle them to be first paid from the proceeds. Nor does it distinctly appear whether the claim was originally filed against the vessel, or the rights of the claimants came up on a petition against the proceeds in the registry.

The question then returns, as one not directly settled by any of the cases cited at the bar, whether a person who has acquired a lien on a vessel, and she is subsequently seized and libelled for a forfeiture, can be admitted to intervene in the cause, and show, in defence of his rights, that no forfeiture has been incurred. To say that he must wait until after a decree, and then come in and petition against the proceeds, would be little better than a mockery. For if the decree is against the vessel, it annihilates his claim and he can maintain no claim to the proceeds. It is not a claim, like that of seamen's wages, or that of material-men, which overreaches the forfeiture. The attachment operates only to the extent of the debtor's interest, to whose rights, so far as his lien goes, the attaching creditor succeeds, while the maritime lien of seamen for their wages, and of material-men for supplies and repairs, is a species of proprietary interest in the thing itself, which is independent of the title of any particular individual. It inheres in the thing, whoever may be the general owner. But the interest of an attaching creditor can only be defended by the same means which will be a defence for the owner whose interest is attached, that is, in this case, by showing that no forfeiture has been incurred. To decide that he cannot make himself a party to the cause, before a decree on the merits, is to decide that he cannot be admitted to defend his rights at all. My opinion, upon the whole is, that the claim may be admitted.

Case No. 9,196.

The MARY ANN GUEST.

[1 Blatchf. 358.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1848.[2]

SALE—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—BILL OF LADING—RIGHTS OF VENDOR.

Goods were purchased on credit and shipped by the vendor on board of a vessel whose master gave a bill of lading for their delivery to the consignee or his order. Before the vessel reached her port the bill was endorsed to A., who advanced cash upon it. After she arrived, and before A. demanded the goods, they were replevied by the vendor, on an allegation that the vendee had agreed to pay for the goods on delivery, but had become insolvent, and had not paid for them: Held, that A. was a bona fide purchaser, that the seizure of the goods by virtue of the writ of replevin constituted no bar to his right to the delivery of the goods, and that, on a libel in rem, the vessel was responsible to him, irrespective of the suit between vendor and vendee.

[Cited in The M. M. Chase, 37 Fed. 711.]

[Cited in Michigan State Bank v. Gardner, 81 Mass. (15 Gray) 372.]

This was a libel in rem filed in the district court by Townsend Underhill against the schooner Mary Ann Guest, for the non-delivery of goods shipped by that vessel from Philadelphia to New-York. The goods had been purchased on credit and shipped by the vendor, and a bill of lading in the ordinary form was given by the master for the delivery of the same to the consignee or his order. The bill of lading was transmitted to

New-York previous to the arrival of the vessel, and endorsed to the libellant, who advanced on it $1,050 in cash. After the vessel arrived, the delivery of the goods was demanded of the master in pursuance of the terms of the bill of lading, but they were not delivered. On the same day on which the vessel arrived, and before the demand was made, the goods were replevied in a suit brought by the vendor against the vendee, upon an allegation that the latter had agreed to pay for the goods on their delivery at New-York, but had become insolvent, and had not paid for them. The court below decreed in favor of the libellant, and the claimant appealed to this court.

THE COURT held that the libellant was to be regarded in the light of a bona fide purchaser, that the seizure of the goods by virtue of the writ of replevin constituted no bar to his right to have them delivered by the master, and that the vessel was responsible to him, irrespective of the suit between the vendor and the vendee.

Decree affirmed.

The MARY ANN GUEST.

[1 Olc. 498.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. March, 1847.[2]

SALE—BILL OF LADING—ENDORSEMENT — ACTION AGAINST CARRIER—DEFENCE—STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU—DUTY OF CARRIER.

1. By the endorsement, for a valuable consideration, of a bill of lading of goods already at sea, the endorsee becomes, as against all the world, the owner of the goods, free from any equities subsisting between the consignor of the goods and the consignee.

[See Balderston v. Manro, Case No. 793.]

2. It is no defence to an action by such endorsee of a bill of lading against the vessel, for damages for the non-delivery of the goods, to show that immediately on the arrival of the goods at the port of consignment they were seized in an action of replevin at suit of the consignor, he claiming a right of stoppage in transitu on the ground of insolvency of the consignee.

3. The master of the vessel had the right to hold the goods against the sheriff; and should have interposed in the replevin suit, and contested the claim to take the goods from his possession.

[Cited in The M. M. Chase, 37 Fed. 711.]

This was an action in rem for the recovery of $1,050, upon a bill of lading assigned to the libellant, Townsend N. Underhill. He alleges in his libel that Whitney, Schott & Co., merchants of Philadelphia, on the 18th of February, 1846, shipped on board the said schooner, then lying in Philadelphia and bound to New-York, twelve cases of merchandise, marked and numbered as in the bill of lading, to be delivered in good order to Mr. W. C. Noyes, or his assigns, he or they paying freight at the rate of three cents per foot—five dollars forty cents in all; which bill of lading was duly executed and delivered to the said W. C. Noyes. He further alleges that said schooner arrived with said goods on board in New-York on or about the 27th of February aforesaid. He further alleges that on or about the 19th of said February he advanced to the said Noyes, $1,050, on the faith of one of said bills of lading, then in the possession of said Noyes, who then endorsed and transferred to him said bill of lading. That after the arrival of said vessel in New-York he went on board of her by his agent, and demanded the twelve cases of merchandise, and was informed by the mate, the captain being absent, that they had been delivered to some other person. He further alleges that he was ready and willing to pay the freight. He further avers that he is informed and believes that said merchandise was delivered to the sheriff of the city and county of New-York upon a writ of replevin, issued at the instance of Whitney, Schott & Co. against said W. C. Noyes; that the damage to said libellant by the non-delivery of said merchandise has been $1,050, and the interest, commission and charges thereon. Wherefore he prays process of attachment against said schooner, and that she be sold, &c. The respondent, for answer to said libel, admits the shipment of said merchandise, and the execution and delivery of the bills of lading as alleged, and avers that Whitney, Schott & Company caused to be issued from the supreme court of the city of New-York a writ of replevin, in which it was alleged that W. C. Noyes unjustly had taken and detained the said merchandise, and that by virtue of said writ the sheriff of said county, on the 24th of February, entered on board of said vessel, and there seized and took and carried away from said vessel said twelve boxes of merchandise. He denies that any loss or damage was caused to libellant by any act of the master of said schooner; and says that said merchandise could not be delivered for the reasons above set forth. Wherefore he prays that the libel be dismissed. The bill of lading and its execution was admitted. It was also in proof that on the 19th of February, the libellant was applied to by Noyes, the purchaser and consignee of the goods, for $1,050, which he advanced; that the bill of lading was endorsed by Noyes and delivered to libellant at the time he advanced him this money; that as far as the witness, who was in the employ of Noyes, knew, Noyes was in fair standing for solvency. Libellant had been in the habit of advancing him money. It was also proved that a demand had been made for the goods, and the reply of the mate of the vessel was, that they had already been delivered to the sheriff, under a writ of replevin. It was also proved that the libellant offered to pay the freight upon the merchandise.

Mr. Nash, for libellant.

Mr. Sanxay, for claimants.

[1] [Reported by Edward R. Olcott, Esq.]

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 9,196.]

BETTS, District Judge. This was an action for the recovery of $1,050, with interest upon the same, money advanced by libellant to the consignee of certain packages of goods shipped by him from Philadelphia to New-York. The consignee, desirous of raising that amount of money, applied to the libellant for the same upon the security of the bill of lading, which, upon the loan being made, was duly endorsed and delivered to him. There is nothing in the evidence to impugn the fairness of the transaction between the parties, and although it appears that the purchaser of the goods was probably insolvent at the time of the sale of the goods, it does not appear that the libellant was aware of the fact.

There is no doubt that if the purchaser had fraudulently induced the seller to part with his goods by representing that he was solvent when the fact was otherwise, the vendor would have a right, by a stoppage in transitu, to reclaim the goods. Such fraudulent purchase, as between the vendor and vendee, would not divest the owner of his right and title to the goods. But when the vendor has, for a valuable consideration, parted with the possession of the goods, and third parties have innocently and in good faith purchased them from the vendee, the title of such third person cannot be disturbed by any equities which the original owner might have possessed. 6 Metc. [Mass.] 68.

For the convenience of commercial transactions, bills of lading have been allowed to become negotiable instruments: and upon the faith of them it is usual and customary for commission merchants to make advances. By such endorsement of the bill of lading the holder of it becomes, as against all the world, the owner of the goods. Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 385; Nathan v. Giles, 5 Taunt. 558. The bill of lading transfers the property to the consignee; and it seems to be conceded that the assignment of it by the consignee, by way of sale or mortgage, will pass the property, though no actual delivery of the goods be made, provided they were then at sea. 2 Kent, Comm. 549; McNeill v. Glass, 1 Mart. [N. S.] 261.

It is no defence to the claim of the consignee, that the goods have been attached or seized by virtue of any judicial process. The contract of the carrier is, that he will deliver the goods in good order and condition to the shipper or to his assigns, (the dangers of the seas only excepted.) He thus guarantees to protect the right of possession of the shipper and his assigns. He had the right to the possession of the goods as against the sheriff, and could have interposed in the replevin suit, and had an immediate trial of the right of the sheriff to take them from his possession. 2 Rev. St. p. 432, §§ 13, 16, 17.

The libellant is, upon the proofs and the law, entitled to a decree in his favor for the value of the goods claimed by him and his costs, and the cause must be referred to a commissioner to report upon such value.

This case was appealed and the decree affirmed upon the grounds of the decision here reported. [Case No. 9,196.]

[9 Ben. 187.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. July, 1877.

MARITIME LIENS—PRIORITY — SEAMEN'S WAGES—SUPPLIES.

Seamen held entitled to priority of payment out of proceeds of the sale of the ship in court, over material men who furnished supplies to the vessel during their employment.

In admiralty.

W. W. Goodrich, for libellants.
Weeks & Foster, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case presents a question of priority between the claims of seamen for wages and the claims of material men for supplies. The voyage began in Boston—thence the vessel proceeded to Brunswick, Georgia, thence to Rio, thence to Pernambuco, and thence to New York where she was sold by a decree of this court. Part of the seamen were shipped in Boston for a period of eight months, part shipped at Pernambuco for New York, as I suppose. In Pernambuco the material men furnished supplies to the vessel, and now claim that their demand takes precedence over the wages accrued at the time of making the advances.

The wages claimed by the libellants are due by reason of a continuous contract ending on the arrival of the vessel in New York. In accordance with the general rule therefore, their claims are entitled to be paid in preference to the demands of material men for supplies furnished during the period of the employment. The case is stronger in favor of the libellants than the case of The Louisa Bertha, 1 Eng. Law & Eq. 665, for in this case there is no room to doubt that the material men may resort to the personal liability of the owners of the vessel for any deficiency that remains after the proceeds of the vessel now in the court are exhausted.

MARITIME LIENS — SUPPLIES — HOME PORT—FOREIGN PORT—BILL AGAINST VESSEL AND OWNERS.

1. The maritime law does not give a lien upon a vessel for supplies furnished at the home port.

2. The residence of the owner is the home port of a vessel, although she may be enrolled elsewhere; the enrollment is only prima facie proof of the owner's residence, and therefore of the home port.

[Cited in The Albany, Case No. 131.]

3. Supplies furnished vessel in foreign port. To whom or what credit presumed to be given.

[Cited in The Mary Morgan, 28 Fed. 198.]

4. When a bill for supplies is made out against the vessel by name and the owners, it is evidence that credit was given to the vessel, and that the personal responsibility of the owners was not exclusively relied upon.

In admiralty.

Erasmus D. Shattuck, for libellant.

J. W. Whalley, for respondent.

DEADY, District Judge. This suit was commenced by C. H. Myers, on February 9, 1870, to enforce a lien against the Mary Bell, for materials and work furnished to said boat at Portland, by the libellant as a plumber and fitter, between December 19 and January 26, previous. The work and materials are alleged to be of the value of $576.25.

R. C. Smith, intervening for his interest as master and sole owner, appeared and answered the libel. The furnishing of the materials is not denied, but that any lien was given therefor upon the boat which can be enforced in this court, is contested upon two grounds:

1. That the materials and work in question were furnished to the Bell at her home port, and therefore that the admiralty law of the United States does not give a lien therefor.

2. That the owner was present with the boat when the work, etc., was furnished, and on this account the credit is presumed to have been given to such owner and not to the boat, and therefore the admiralty gives no lien upon the boat.

The rule for the determination of the legal question involved in the first objection is as follows:

"By the maritime law of continental Europe, no distinction is made between the cases of domestic and foreign ships, nor between supplies furnished in a home port and abroad. But by the maritime law of England and this country, supplies furnished to a domestic vessel, in a home port, are presumed to be furnished on the personal credit of the owner or master, and do not create a lien which can be enforced in a court of admiralty by proceeding in rem." Jackson v. The Kinnie [Case No. 7,137].

"Material-men, also, who furnish materials or supplies for a vessel in a foreign port, or in a port other than the port of the state where the vessel belongs, have a maritime lien on the vessel as a security for payment of the price of all such materials and supplies." The Belfast, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 643. "Such a lien does not arise in a contract for materials and supplies furnished to a vessel in a home port, and in respect to such contracts it is competent for the states, under the decisions of this court, to create such liens as their legislatures may deem just and expedient, not amounting to a regulation of commerce, and to enact reasonable rules and regulations prescribing the mode of their enforcement." Id. 645, 646.

The Bell was enrolled, under the act of February 18, 1793 [1 Stat. 305], at the port of Astoria, Oregon, on January 10, 1870. The enrollment states that she was built at the Cascades, in Washington Territory, 1865, and that R. C. Smith was her owner and master; and she is styled and described therein as the "Mary Bell, of Portland," but the residence of Smith is not stated, as it should have been. Smith was examined as a witness, and from his testimony it appears that he bought the boat in Portland in June, 1869, and took her to Ranier, on the Columbia river in Oregon, and rebuilt her, and then took her to Monticello, in Washington Territory, where he then and for a long time prior, resided and still resides, and where the boat now is. That about November 10, 1869, he brought the boat to Portland, for the purpose of having her machinery put into her, and her roof tinned, and the plumbing and fitting done for her. The port of Monticello, although within the collection district of Astoria, where the Bell was enrolled, is not within the state of Oregon, neither is it a port of entry or delivery established by law, but only a port or place on the Cowlitz river, near its junction with the Columbia river, where steamboats may, and do arrive from, and depart to ports or places upon the navigable waters of Oregon and Washington Territory.

Upon this state of facts, the first objection to the lien must fail. The only evidence that Portland was the home port of the Bell is furnished by her enrollment. Waiving the consideration of the fact that this enrollment was made after four fifths of these materials had been furnished, at best it is only prima facie proof that the boat belongs at Portland, which may be overcome by evidence to the contrary. Dudley v. The Superior [Case No. 4,115]; Hill v. The Golden Gate [Id. 6,492].

The evidence of the owner is conclusive upon this point. It shows that his residence is without the state, and at the port or place of Monticello, in Washington Territory. This being so, his boat belongs there in fact, although he may have procured her to be otherwise described in the enrollment. Whether a vessel is to be deemed foreign or domestic depends upon the residence of her owners, rather than the port of enrollment, but in the absence of evidence to the contrary, such residence will be presumed to be at the port of enrollment. For the purpose of this suit, and in the port of Portland, the Bell, being owned in Monticello, is to be considered a foreign vessel upon which the admiralty law gives a lien for materials or work. The reason for this is well stated by Mr. Justice Wells, in Hill v. The Golden Gate, supra: "It is important to observe that the character of the vessel is only referred to for the purpose of ascertaining to whom and to what the credit was given; and in no other respect, so far as regards this case, is it important. If the owners reside in a foreign country, or in another state the material-man is presumed to give credit to the boat and also to the owners, who live so remote, and who are beyond the jurisdiction of the courts of the state. If the owners reside in the same state with the material-man, the latter can easily resort to them for payment, and readily enforce it in the courts, therefore he may well be supposed to give credit to the owners alone. It is apparent, therefore, that the place of enrollment has nothing to do with the credit that is given; and has, therefore, nothing to do with the question of lien."

It is clear that the Mary Bell was owned at Monticello, and that was her home port or place. Therefore in the port of Portland, for the purpose of this suit, she is to be regarded as a foreign vessel, subject to a lien by the admiralty law in favor of material-men.

As to the second objection, the rule of law is substantially stated by Chief Justice Taney, in his dissenting opinion in Thomas v. Osborne, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 38, as follows: By the maritime law, repairs and supplies furnished at the request of the owner, are presumed to have been furnished upon his personal credit, unless the contrary appears. In The Chusan [Case No. 2,717], Mr. Justice Story states the rule more comprehensively, and, in my judgment, more correctly:

"We all know, that, by the general principles of the maritime law, material-men have a three-fold remedy for supplies and materials furnished for a foreign ship. First, the ship itself; secondly, the owners; and thirdly, the master; and neither of these remedies is displaced, except by conclusive proof, that an exclusive credit has been in fact given to one or more of the parties so liable, or to the ship itself."

Here the master and owner are the same person, and it seems to me that in such a case, unless the contrary appears, the presumption ought to be that the party furnishing the supplies dealt with him as master only, and therefore gave credit to the boat. This controversy does not arise between different creditors, as in Pratt v. Reed, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 359, but between the owners and the creditors. That was a case between mortgagees and persons claiming a lien for coals furnished the boat at the request of the owner and master, during a period of nearly two years. The court ruled in favor of the mortgagees, upon the ground that there was no proof of the necessity of procuring the supplies in question, upon the credit of the vessel. There was very little ground for claiming a lien as against the mortgagees, although it was allowed in the court below, but the opinion of Mr. Justice Nelson is an extreme one against the allowance of liens at all. See The Grapeshot, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 137. But as between the owner and material-men, when the supplies are furnished at the request of, or with the knowledge of the former, I do not think the question of whether they were necessary for the vessel, or whether they could have been procured otherwise than upon her credit, ought to arise. The owner should be estopped under these circumstances, from asserting the falsity or impropriety of his own conduct, to the detriment of his creditors.

It only remains, then, to ascertain to whom or what the credit was given when these supplies were furnished.

The facts bearing upon this question, are these: The libellant undertook to furnish the material and labor at the solicitation of the engineer, Wilcox, who seems to have had the immediate charge of putting in the machinery, and fitting up the boat. From him, Myers learned that Smith was owner, and that the boat came from Monticello, where Smith lived. Libellant refused to do the work for Smith on the ground that he had once done some work for him on a steamboat, and was not paid for it. The engineer then assured libellant that he had or would have an interest in the boat, and that the boat was good for it. Upon this understanding, libellant undertook the job, and, as he testifies explicitly, not upon the credit of Smith or the engineer, but that of the boat. The engineer was not examined as a witness. It took about five weeks to complete the work, and once or twice—the first time soon after the commencement of the work—Smith came into Myers' shop, and obtained some of the material himself. At the beginning, Wilcox desired the clerk of libellant to charge the articles to the Mary Bell, and the clerk testifies that he did so; and, further, that about the time the boat was enrolled, and when the material, etc., amounted to $400, he presented a bill to Smith for the amount, and he promised to call and pay a portion of it that afternoon. He also testifies that this bill was made out "to Mary Bell and owners," and that no objection was made to it by Smith on that account or otherwise.

On the stand, Smith stated that he expected the engineer to have procured these supplies at the Wallamet Iron Works, but admitted that the latter informed him at the time that he had employed the libellant. He also admitted that the bill was presented to him as stated by clerk, but could not remember how it was made out. He further admitted that the bill was left with him, and that he supposed he had it somewhere, but not with him. If this bill had not been made out to the Bell it would have been a strong circumstance against the conclusion that the credit was given to the boat. On the other hand, if it was so made out and presented to Smith and not objected to by him, it is pretty certain that not only the credit was given to the boat by the libellant, but that Smith so understood it, and assented to it. That the bill was so made out and presented, we have the uncontradicted and altogether probable testimony of the clerk. In addition to this, there is the presumption that if the bill was not made out against the boat, Smith would have produced it on the trial. It is the best evidence of the fact. He admits that he had it, and has made no effort to find it. Indeed, for aught that appears, he could lay his hand on it at any time. I think the evidence fully warrants the conclusion that the bill was made out and presented as the clerk states. Where an account for supplies and materials furnished was stated, "Barque Chusan bought of John and George Ring," it was held to be evidence that the credit was given to the vessel, and "to repel the notion that any mere personal responsibility of the owners was exclusively relied on or taken." The Chusan [supra].

Add to this the other circumstances disclosed by the testimony, the refusal of Myers to trust Smith for the work, the explicit pledge of the boat for payment by the engineer, with the immediate knowledge and implied assent of Smith, and the reasonable conclusion is, that the libellant credited the boat exclusively, and also that Smith, by his agent the engineer, obtained the supplies with the direct understanding that the credit was given to the boat and not to themselves, and that the boat was not only tacitly but expressly pledged for the payment of the bill.

The bill is made out in currency, at eighty cents on the dollar; it will be changed to the rate of ninety cents, and a decree given that the libellant recover that amount, with costs and expenses of suit; and in case the same is not paid into court within ten days herefrom, that execution issue therefor against the stipulators in the bond for the delivery of the boat to the claimant.

Case No. 9,200.

The MARY BELLE ROBERTS.

[3 Sawy. 485.] [1]

District Court, D. California. Sept. 30, 1875.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—ABANDONMENT IN FOREIGN PORT.

Defense by master that the seaman was detained on shore by the municipal authorities of the port: Held, unsupported by the proofs.

In admiralty.

D. T. Sullivan, for libellant.

Millon Andros, for claimant.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The libel, in substance, alleges that the libellant, who was a seaman on board the above vessel, was abandoned and left behind by the master thereof at Iquiqui, in the republic of Peru, the libellant being then on shore on liberty, and willing and anxious to return on board. The answer was, that the libellant was taken out of the vessel by order of the captain of the port of Iquiqui without the consent and against the wishes of her master; that the master requested the captain of the port to allow the libellant to rejoin the barque, but the captain of the port refused so to do, and the vessel thereupon sailed away without the libellant. The answer further alleges that libellant was not prevented from rejoining the ship by any act of the master, but by the act of the harbor authorities of said port, and not otherwise.

The evidence shows, that on the day previous to the sailing of the vessel, a dispute occurred between the libellant and the master, in consequence of which the former was, by the master's order, put in irons, and, as he alleges, "triced up." The next morning he requested leave to go ashore to see the captain of the port. This the master refused, until he should first have seen the captain. The master accordingly went ashore about nine o'clock in the morning, saw the captain of the port, and, as he says, "told him just how the thing was."

The captain of the port had, it would seem, already heard of the affair through some workmen and the master insists that he made no complaint against the seaman. By his own admission, however, he voluntarily sought the captain and related the whole occurrence. The result was that a boat with a policeman on board was dispatched to the vessel and the libellant brought ashore. The master testifies that this occurred about nine o'clock a. m., and in this he is corroborated by the mate. The libellant states very positively that he was taken ashore after dinner and between two and three o'clock, and David Oakshott, a seaman, testifies to the same effect. The point is not very material except as showing that the man was taken ashore not more than an hour and a half before the vessel sailed, and as tending to show that little opportunity was afforded him to rejoin the ship, and no very strenuous effort was made to recover him.

The libellant states that on landing he saw the master on the mole, and said to him that he desired to see the captain of the port. The master showed him his office, and not finding him in, said he would go up town and see where he was. He did so, and on his return informed the libellant that the captain would be down within half an hour. The master then returned to his vessel and the libellant waited for the return of the captain of the port. On his arrival the libellant informed him that he belonged to the vessel which he saw was beginning to make sail. The captain told him he must wait until the master came ashore again. The libellant then offered a boatman one dollar to put him on board. The captain of the port said something to the boatman, or to a policeman that was near, which the libellant did not understand. The boat proceeded a short distance towards the ship and then turned around and brought the libellant back, notwithstanding that he offered three dollars to be put on board the vessel.

The ship continued her course out of the harbor without stopping.

The master's account of the occurrence differs from that of the man in a few particulars: 1. He states, as already noticed, that the man was brought ashore at nine o'clock, and not at about half past two or three, shortly before the vessel sailed. He denies having told the man he would go up town to look for the captain of the port, and states that he told the latter several times that he was about to sail and wanted the man, but the captain refused to give him up, saying he would look out for him, and would put him in jail. The captain made no investigation and assigned no reason for keeping the man. The master then returned to the vessel and was under way in fifteen minutes after he got on board. With respect to this statement it is to be observed: 1. That assuming it to be true, the master's justification is by no means clear.

The policy of the laws of all maritime nations, and notably of the United States, discountenances in the most emphatic manner the discharge of seamen in foreign ports. By various acts of congress, it is provided that the master shall, before sailing, give bond for the return of his crew to the United States. If a seaman be discharged abroad, he is in general required to pay to the consul three months' extra wages, of which two-thirds are to be paid to the seaman upon his engagement on board any vessel to return to the United states; the remaining third to be retained to form a fund for the payment of the expenses home of other destitute seamen. Consuls are also required to provide passages to the United States for any destitute American seamen found within their districts. Masters are required to receive on board their vessels, and transport to the United States, on the request of the consul, such seamen in number not exceeding two to every one hundred tons burden of their vessels. And, finally, the malicious forcing on shore, or leaving behind, of any mariner in any foreign port or place is denounced and punished as a crime.

These various provisions clearly exhibit the deep solicitude of the legislature to secure in all cases the return of the mariner to the United States, and they indicate with equal clearness the duty of the master, viz., to bring back the mariner in his vessel, unless the circumstances are such as to render it impossible, or to relieve him from the obligation to do so.

It is not pretended that in the case at bar the master had any right to expel the seaman from the vessel. The defense rests upon the allegation that the seaman was in the custody of the local authorities from which the master was unable to liberate him. But the inquiry arises, did the master, on his own showing, make a reasonable and sincere effort to perform what, as we have seen, the law regards as one of his most important duties.

The man, he says, was brought on shore at nine o'clock; the vessel sailed at three p. m. He had been sent for by the captain of the port without any complaint on the part of the master, as the latter asserts. But he admits that he went to the captain of the port and "told him just how the thing was." It is not to be presumed that his narrative was very favorable to the seaman. The captain of the port at once dispatches a policeman to bring him ashore. To this proceeding the master makes no opposition. The man is brought on shore, and the master, as he says, requested the captain of the port "several times" to give up the man; and on his refusal, and without delaying his intended departure a single hour, sails away, leaving the man without clothes or money in a remote foreign port. I cannot consider that the master, under these circumstances, fulfilled his whole duty. A more resolute effort should have been made, and more decided measures taken, to procure the restoration of the man, and the departure of the vessel reasonably delayed for the purpose. I have little doubt that such an effort would have been successful. Had the man been a relative or ward of the master, or had a valuable bale of merchandise been removed from the ship, the master's reclamations would, I doubt not, have been far more energetic and persistent, nor would he have deemed the reasons he now assigns for not bringing back the man to his port of shipment a valid excuse for failing to deliver any part of his cargo to its owner. I consider his duty to restore the seaman to his home quite as imperative as his duty to deliver his cargo to its consignees.

If the account of the transaction given by the libellant be accepted, the master's breach of duty can hardly be denied. The man swears that he was taken on shore not more than an hour and a half before the vessel sailed; that when the master went off to the ship he said he would be back in half an hour; instead of doing so, he at once made sail. He denies that he was in custody, and states that when he discovered the vessel was about to sail, and mentioned it to the captain of the port, the latter told him to wait until the master came ashore. The man was certainly sufficiently at liberty to be able to make an effort to reach the vessel in a boat. But the boat, after proceeding a part of the way, turned back, against the remonstrances of the man, and in pursuance, he thinks, of previous instructions by the captain of the port. This circumstance seems to me extremely suspicious. It suggests very strongly the idea of a secret understanding between the master and the captain of the port, by which the former was to be rid of the man—an idea, favored by the facts that the master had had trouble with him, and had received on board two stowaway seamen by whom the libellant's place could be supplied. On the master's statement, the conduct of the captain of the port is unaccountable. The man had committed no violation of the municipal law of the place. The vessel lay a mile from the shore. A difficulty, such as are unhappily too common on board ships, had occurred between the master and one of the men. The offense, if any, was against the discipline and internal police of the ship. What motive had the captain of the port to seize and hold the man, when the master had made no complaint against him, when he was anxious to receive him back, and the man was desirous of returning, and this without any investigation whatever into the facts of the case? None has been suggested, except the mere wantonness of brief authority. I require more convincing proofs than have been furnished in this case, to induce me to believe that from such a motive, without any personal interest or hope of advantage to himself, an officer charged with important duties in a foreign port, and who was on friendly terms with the master (for the latter testifies that he shook hands with him, and bade him good-bye when he left), would have been guilty of so high-handed an outrage upon the commerce of the United States. If the master really supposed the officer was committing the offense he now charges upon him, the cordiality of his leave-taking is not a little extraordinary. Nor does the subsequent conduct of the captain of the port toward the man in any degree tend to corroborate the master's version of the occurrence. On the man's return from his unsuccessful attempt to reach the vessel, he was not consigned to a jail, or subjected to the slightest restraint of his liberty. He applied at once to the captain of the port for a passage to San Francisco, but this the latter declared himself unable to afford him; but when some six days afterwards the man procured a passage on a mail boat for Callao, the captain of the port gave him a letter to the American consul at the latter place, who paid his board while at Callao, and gave him, on his departure, a letter to the consul at Panama, by whom, in like manner, his board was paid until a passage to San Francisco could be obtained.

It seems highly improbable that an officer who was thus ready to do everything in his power to facilitate the man's return to his country, would have forcibly taken him from the vessel and detained him in custody against his own wishes, and in spite of the remonstrances of the master. After a careful consideration of the whole case, my opinion is, that the master desired to be rid of the man, and voluntarily abandoned him. And the defense now set up that he yielded to authority he was unable to resist, is not sustained by the proofs.

In this view of the case, it is unnecessary to consider whether if the facts had been as alleged by the master, the seaman would not still have been entitled to his wages up to the end of the voyage. A decree will be entered in favor of libellant for his wages up to the end of the voyage, and his expenses, deducting intermediate earnings, if any.

Case No. 9,201.

The MARY C.

[1 Hask. 474.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. Jan., 1873.

PLEADING IN ADMIRALTY — AMENDMENT TO ANSWER—COLLISION—BAFFLING WIND—RIGHT OF WAY—ITEMS OF DAMAGE.

1. An answer cannot be amended after the cause has been heard, so as to contradict a material admission in it.

2. A vessel on the starboard tack, nearly close-hauled with the wind one or two points free and baffling, need not give way to a vessel on the port tack close-hauled, when the vessels are crossing.

3. A vessel having the right of way must keep a proper lookout and use proper seamanship to avoid collision.

4. Freight money lost by the master of a sinking vessel when hurrying from the wreck and sails used for covering the deck-load are proper items of damage in cases of collision.

A cause of collision heard on libel in rem, claim, answer and proofs.

Nathan Webb, for libellant.
Almon A. Strout, for claimants.

FOX, District Judge. This collision took place between the Schrs. Sarah Buck of Belfast and Mary C. of St. Johns, about fifteen minutes after twelve in the morning of Dec. 12, 1872, and about seven miles southwesterly from Monhegan, and resulted in the total loss of the Sarah Buck, she having sunk. The night was very clear, with a whole-sail breeze. The Sarah Buck was on her port tack, without cargo, and on her return to Belfast from Salem. The Mary C. left Seal Harbor, near White Head in Penobscot Bay, about 8 p. m. Dec. 11, in the prosecution of her voyage from Rockport, N. B. to New Haven with a cargo of grindstones. She was on her starboard tack. Each of the vessels laid within about six points of the wind. The libel avers that at the time of the collision, the Sarah Buck was close-hauled, and the Mary C. free. These allegations are denied in the answer; but it does admit that the Sarah Buck was sailing on a course "about northeast," and avers that the wind was then north-northwest; this would be within six points of northeast, and I therefore consider it as established from the claimant's answer, that the Sarah Buck was close-hauled as is set forth in the libel.

Cook, master and part owner of the Mary C. alleges in his answer, which is subscribed and sworn to by him, that when he left Seal Harbor, "the wind was baffling from northwest to north-northwest;" after the case had been fully heard and the arguments closed, a motion was made by his proctor for leave to amend this averment in the answer by changing northwest to northwest by west. The amendment was not allowed; and on further reflection, I am satisfied that the ruling was correct. The cause had been fully heard and argued to the court, with this admission in the answer as to the course of the wind; it was a deliberate, sworn statement by the master, of the fact as he understood it to have been when called upon to respond to the charges against him in the libel, and it is not the practice of any court, at such a stage of the cause, to permit a material amendment which will destroy the effect of an admission of so much importance, relative to a matter which had been a principal subject of controversy before the court for more than ten days. The amendment, if allowed, would at once produce a conflict with the testimony of the master given by him upon the stand, as he had stated, that the wind was northwest when he left Seal Harbor, baffling a half point each way; and the only advantage to be derived from the amendment would be, that the statement in the answer would then more fully agree with the testimony of some of the witnesses produced by the claimant, by whom the wind was represented to have been still more westerly than is asserted by the master, either in his answer or testimony, and which the court is not convinced is in accordance with the truth.

The libel alleges that the wind at the time of collision was north, and that the Sarah Buck was on a course of northeast by east, and her master reiterates this statement when examined as a witness. Her crew, all of whom assert that they were on deck at the time, testify that their course was northeast by east, one half east, as this vessel did not sail nearer than within six points of the wind; it is manifest that these statements of the master and his crew are not correct, as with the wind north, a course of northeast by east would be within five points, which this vessel could not accomplish. There is therefore, to say the least of it, a mistake on their part in relation to the wind, or the course they were sailing, and perhaps they are incorrect in both particulars.

The crew of the Sarah Buck represent that the Mary C. when first discovered was one and one half to two points on their lee bow; the libel states her as being one and one half points, about half a mile distant; the answer on the contrary represents that when the Sarah Buck was first seen from the Mary C., she was on her lee bow. The claimant has produced in court a diagram in explanation of the position of the two vessels when first seen and as they came in collision; and he has stated it was substantially correct as laid down in this diagram; the Sarah Buck is clearly to the windward of the Mary C. and it fully corroborates the allegations on this point in the libel.

Upon one other matter there is a very severe conflict; every man on board the Sarah Buck swears that her regulation lights were in place and burning brightly, and that after the collision, one was taken down, was then burning and was extinguished by the master and brought on board the Mary C. The crew of the Mary C. all testify that they saw no lights on the Sarah Buck, that their attention was called by Capt. Cook to the absence of her lights, and upon this, they are said to be corroborated by the testimony of the master and mate of the Favorite of Cornwallis, who testify that at the time of the collision, they were within one eighth of a mile, and they run down and hailed both vessels immediately afterwards, offering assistance; that they run round the Sarah Buck and saw no lights upon her. The testimony of these men from the Favorite is presented in such a manner as to impress upon the mind of the court strong doubt as to its truthfulness. The case was in hearing for a number of days, the entire crew of each vessel had been fully examined, and the testimony of Capt. Cook had been very minute and protracted; a number of other witnesses had been examined as to the course of the wind, and it was then suggested that each party might desire to take further testimony on that point, and for that purpose the hearing was postponed. Up to that time, no suggestion or intimation had been thrown out from either side, that any other vessel was at the time in the immediate vicinity, or that either had been hailed by a third party with an offer of assistance; on the contrary, the master of the Mary C., when inquired of in relation to other vessels, stated, "I saw other vessels one-fourth to one-half a mile off. Three or four to leeward, two or three to windward. Some were steering about same course I was, others were running off more. I passed a great many of the vessels which came out of Seal Harbor." From the testimony on both sides, the court formed the opinion that no vessel came near or offered any assistance. If Jenkins, the master of the Favorite, has testified truly, the court was led into a very great error by the testimony of Capt. Cook, "that he saw vessels one fourth to one half a mile off," when he was well aware that he had been hailed by the Favorite at the time the Sarah Buck was in a sinking condition. If such was the fact, when asking for further time, he should have frankly stated that another vessel was near by and had offered assistance at the time, and that he wished to procure the testimony of her officers and crew if practicable; but instead of so doing, under the pretence of proving the course of the wind, he obtains the opportunity of producing this testimony, all knowledge of which he had concealed from the court as well as the adverse party. The course he has adopted leads me to conclude, and I think it is not unjust to him under the circumstances, that this testimony from the Favorite is an afterthought, especially as Jenkins admits that Capt. Cook had informed him as to the points in dispute, and he also had occasion to prompt him as a witness when under examination, and his testimony in some respects does not agree with Capt. Cook's statements, especially in regard to the course of the two vessels, which he gives west by south, and the wind which he states northwest by north, one point more westerly than Capt. Cook, and also the time of the collision, which he says was before twelve o'clock by his time, which was St. Johns, some fifteen or twenty minutes earlier than the real time, and that his watch was not called till a short time afterwards.

The court is satisfied that the Sarah Buck had her proper lights burning. The testimony from all of her crew is positive upon this point, and they must all have committed wilful perjury in relation to it if their statement is untrue, whilst that from the other vessels is of a negative character, as to their not seeing any lights; this matter of the lights is really quite immaterial in determining the rights of the parties, as both sides admit that the night was very clear, so that the vessels could be seen by each other in season to have done whatever was incumbent to have avoided the collision.

Sixteen witnesses have been examined on the part of the libellants, and seventeen for the claimants; the most material points in controversy being as to the course of the wind, and whether the Mary C. was or not close-hauled at the time the collision took place. The court has prepared a full abstract of the testimony, and it is very certain that it is utterly impossible to reconcile the evidence on these matters; no great benefit can result from a prolonged statement of the testimony of each witness, and the court therefore will confine its remarks in a great extent to the conclusions at which it has arrived in relation to them.

The answer states that when the Mary C. left Seal Harbor, the wind was varying from northwest to north-northwest. In his testimony, the master says, after getting by White Head, he headed west-southwest and sometimes southwest by west, and on that course passed north of Monhegan close-hauled to the wind; that as the wind changed to the north, he still held close up to the wind until his course was west. He has called various masters of vessels who left Seal Harbor the same night bound to the westward at about the same hour with the Mary C.; most of them represent the wind to have been northwest at Seal Harbor. Woodward, master of the Telegraph says it was baffling from northwest to northwest by west. Foster, master of the Laura represents it as west-northwest to northwest by west; none of the witnesses give the wind as far to the north as the answer N. W. to N. N. W; on the contrary they represent it as being from one to three points further west than the answer; but they all concur in their statements that when sailing westerly they were all running close-hauled to the wind. The libellants have produced two witnesses, one of whom came out of Seal Harbor and the other from Lobster Cove near by the same evening with the Mary C. Tate who sailed from Seal Harbor says the wind was north-northwest at eight o'clock, and that he passed the Mary C. half way over to Mosquito Island standing the same course with him; that the wind was then northwest by west and he was sailing two points free. He further states that from 10½ to 12, the wind was north by east to north-northeast, which is from one to two points further east than is claimed by the libellant, and which would not have permitted the Sarah Buck to run the course she was making as stated in the libel. Trenergy, from Lobster Cove, speaks of the wind as being nearly north at White Head at eleven o'clock that night.

The master of the Mary C. claims that with the wind northwest, the vessel making seven knots, he was close-hauled on a course of southwest by west and passed Mosquito Island. Six witnesses, who for many years have been acting as pilots and masters in and about Penobscot Bay, testify that thus running close-hauled, she would not have been able to have passed Mosquito Island, but would have gone ashore either on the island or inside of it; and the argument drawn from this testimony is, that notwithstanding the statements of Capt. Cook and his crew, the Mary C. must to some extent have been running free.

From the discrepancies which exist between the allegations of the respective parties in their pleadings and the witnesses they have produced, as well as from the discrepancies between the witnesses themselves, it is extremely difficult to decide what was the exact course of the wind, and whether or not the Mary C. was absolutely close-hauled. I am satisfied the wind was changing northerly after ten, though Tate says it was N. W. by W. when he passed the Mary C., sometimes very baffling; and to some extent these facts may harmonize the statement of the witnesses, as they probably took notice of the wind at different hours and when differently situated. The nearness to the coast may also have had its effect in changing the course of the wind. The answer of the Mary C. states the wind was baffling from northwest to north-northwest, and I am inclined to adopt northwest by north as being probably the mean course of the wind at White Head when blowing steadily at the time the Mary C. left the harbor. The master says his course was more, southwest to southwest by west up to time of collision, whilst Tate, who says he passed the Mary C. sailing a like course with his own, gives his course as southwest by west, which is the true course from White Head to a point seven miles southwest of Monhegan. Admitting that at this season of the year it is usual for coasting vessels to sail as close to the coast as they well can, and that Cook, being a comparative stranger to this vicinity, would not be likely to strike seaward beyond what was customary, I adopt his statement that his course varied from west-southwest to southwest by west, and with the wind, as I find it to have been baffling about northwest by north when they left Seal Harbor, it results that the Mary C. was not absolutely close-hauled, but that as she ran down the coast, she was sailing at times one or two points free with a baffling wind, which at times might head her off her course. Capt. Cook says, that from the time of leaving White Head until after the collision, his main sheet was not slackened, but that as the wind veered toward the north, he changed his course by following up the wind, and that he was making a west course when the collision took place. Having followed the wind, so that he must have changed his course at least two points more westerly, as he made no alteration he says in the trim of his sheets, it follows that the wind must have changed two points at least to the north, and I am therefore warranted in the conclusion that the wind must have been about north by west, not being steady, but baffling about that course.

Having thus determined that the Sarah Buck was close-hauled on her port tack, and that the Mary C. with a wind baffling about north by west was on her starboard tack, running west and within one to two points of being absolutely close-hauled, what was the duty of each vessel in a clear night, with a full breeze, each vessel having been discovered by the other in season to avoid a collision, but each having a poor lookout, as in such a night, each should have been seen from the other before they had approached within a half mile?

The claimants insist that it appears from the allegations in the libel, that these vessels were approaching end on or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, as the Sarah Buck is thus stated to have been heading northeast by east, and the Mary C. southwest by west, which would make them within one point of being direct end on, and so bring them within article eleven of the regulations adopted by congress, which requires both vessels to port when approaching end on, or nearly so, so as to involve risk of collision, and which the Sarah Buck neglected to do, but starboarded her helm just before the collision took place. The answer, instead of admitting that the libel states correctly the true course of the two vessels, and submitting for the decision of the court the question, whether two vessels when approaching on opposite courses within one point are brought within the eleventh article, joins issue on the fact, and charges that the course of the Mary C. was west, making a difference of three points, and from the evidence, I believe this statement to be substantially correct; as the case stands therefore, the two vessels in fact were crossing instead of approaching end on, and the case is brought within the twelfth article, which provides that "when two sailing ships are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, then if they have the wind on different sides the ship with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the ship with the wind on the starboard side, except in the case in which the ship with the wind on her port side is close-hauled and the other ship free, in which case the latter ship shall keep out of the way."

The Sarah Buck had the wind on her port side, and was close-hauled and should have kept out of the way of the Mary C. unless she had the wind free. I find that she was nearly close-hauled with the wind at best but one or two points free and baffling, and I do not hold that she was therefore deprived of the right of way and compelled to give way to a vessel on the port tack, close-hauled. It was therefore the duty of the Sarah Buck, under the twelfth article to have kept out of the way of the Mary C., and her prudent course would have been to have ported her helm instead of starboarding. By pursuing the course which she did, she placed herself in such a position as to greatly increase, instead of diminish the risk, and she must be answerable for the consequences. If the master intended to luff, he should have done it much sooner, and not have delayed it until the vessels were in such close proximity. I therefore hold that the Sarah Buck violated the twelfth article, and that her management contributed to the injury.

I am also of the opinion that the conduct of those in charge of the Mary C. was inexcusable, and that she is not exonerated from liability. She had but one man, her master, on the lookout. He states that until the vessels came within an eighth of a mile of each other, he could not discover whether or not the Sarah Buck was approaching towards him. I am satisfied that she had her proper lights, and of course, with proper attention her course could have been determined; but without lights, the Sarah Buck was in plain sight that night, and a diligent lookout under such circumstances should have discovered her course before she approached within that distance; after she was discovered, her course should have been constantly noticed by the lookout, so as to find out what means she intended to adopt, and so that the Mary C. might be in readiness to do all that the law required of her, if she should be in danger; for although by the 12th article she had the right of way, yet that must be taken in connection with article 18, which requires that "where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course subject to the qualifications contained" in article 19, viz.: "In obeying and construing these rules, due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case, rendering a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." By article 20, it is declared that "nothing in these rules shall exonerate any ship * * from the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case." Similar regulations on this subject have been adopted in England. It is declared by the privy council, in The Agra and Elizabeth Jenkins, L. R. 1 P. C. 501, "that if a ship bound to keep her course under the 18th sailing rule, justifies her departure from that rule under the 19th rule, she takes upon herself the obligation of showing not only that her departure was at the time it took place necessary in order to avoid immediate danger, but also that the course adopted by her was reasonably calculated to avoid that danger;" and the opinion says: "Their lordships therefore have come to the conclusion, that both vessels were to blame, and that the collision is attributable to both, the Agra for not sooner observing and getting out of the way of the Elizabeth Jenkins, and the Elizabeth Jenkins for departing from her course without sufficient necessity, and for departing from it in a manner calculated to increase and not to diminish or avoid danger."

In the case of The Havre [Case No. 6,232], Judge Shipman says: "I now come to another point in the case. It is a rule of prudence and sound sense, often reiterated in judicial opinions, that every vessel is bound to avoid a collision if she can; the fault of one approaching vessel does not authorize the other to run her down because she happens even through her own folly to lie in her wake. I am well aware that where the law charges one vessel with the duty of keeping out of the way of another, the corresponding duty of the other, to keep her course, is to be rigorously enforced. But it is to be enforced with intelligence and in the interest of safety, and not to be enforced, or even permitted blindly to destructive ends. It is therefore proper, in view of the fact that the Havre clearly saw the Scotland for fifteen minutes before the collision, watched her approach with more or less care for two miles, and without the slightest change in her course, struck the latter only a few feet forward of her stern, to enquire whether she did her whole duty; in other words, whether the slight change in her wheel to starboard, in order to have enabled her to clear the Scotland, might not and ought not to have been made;" and later on says: "There was risk of collision apparent for several minutes before it took place; the responsibility of avoiding it rested chiefly on the Scotland. She was bound to keep out of the way, and the Havre was bound to keep her course until it was apparent that the collision could not be avoided without a change on her part; I hold her responsible on the sole ground, that after it was clear that the only way of escape was for her to starboard her wheel she failed to do it, and that if she had done it no accident would have occurred."

The case of The Maria Martin, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 47, fully sustains this principle.

When the Sarah Buck began to luff, it was the duty of the Mary C. to have held her course or take such steps, if a collision was imminent, as would be calculated to diminish, rather than to increase the danger; but instead of doing anything of that kind, the Mary C. also luffed, necessarily bringing the two vessels into collision; and to accomplish this, she swung round so much that her port side struck the Sarah Buck aft of the fore rigging. It is apparent from the position of the vessels on claimant's diagram, that when the Mary C. commenced to luff, the Sarah Buck had ranged ahead of her, so that a lookout forward could have perceived her well on the starboard bow, instead of right ahead, thereby indicating that if the Mary C. held her course, there would be no danger; and it was the duty of the lookout on the Mary C. to have carefully noticed the position of the two vessels before giving any order to luff, which was wholly inexcusable, if the vessels were then bearing from each other as laid down on the diagram. A careful examination of all the testimony and this diagram convinces me that the statement of Capt. Cook, that if he had held his course he would have struck the Sarah Buck with his starboard bow a little further aft, and if he had starboarded she would have paid off some, but would still have struck her, is not correct. On the contrary I think the statement of the master of the Sarah Buck is true, that if each vessel had held her course, they would have gone clear. The luffing of the Sarah Buck did not increase the danger to the Mary C. if she had held her course, while if she had starboarded her helm in the slightest degree after the Sarah Buck had luffed, a collision would have been impossible.

In his direct examination Capt. Cook testified that he heard some one on the Sarah Buck cry out to luff, and that this was addressed to his vessel; on his cross examination he stated, he heard the cry of luff from the Sarah Buck, but was uncertain whether it was before or after she luffed, and did not know whether it was or not addressed to his vessel. Some of the crew of the Mary C. would have the court understand that she was ordered to luff by those on board the Sarah Buck, and from this it is claimed that the Mary C. luffed in compliance with such orders; but the answer does not attempt to cast the responsibility of her luffing upon the Sarah Buck, on the contrary, it states that "the Mary C. held her course until the Sarah Buck approached nearer, when the helm of the Mary C. was put to port in order that she might lay close to the wind, and finding that the course of the Sarah Buck rendered a collision possible, the helm of the Mary C. was put hard to port," to which has been added, "to lessen the force of the blow, collision being imminent;" and in his testimony Cook says: "I gave orders to put helm hard down, thinking she would come up more side to, and break off the blow." The Mary C. therefore is accountable for having luffed and for the consequences of deviating from her course. If she had held her course, I find the collision would not, in fact, have occurred; and she could have avoided it likewise by changing her course in an opposite direction, instead of producing it by the course she pursued. I am therefore obliged to hold her accountable jointly with the Sarah Buck; and the result is, that the damages of the two vessels must be apportioned between them.

The court can place but very little dependence on the statements of witnesses as to time or distances. Capt. Cook for instance testifies he saw the Sarah Buck one fourth to one half a mile off, and afterwards called the watch four or five minutes before the collision. It is not disputed that the vessels were approaching each other at the rate of twelve or thirteen miles per hour, less than five minutes for a mile, and at this rate, if the watch was called four or five minutes before the accident, the vessels must have been more than a mile apart when the Sarah Buck was first seen from the Mary C.

The claimant relies on the opinion of the court in The Nichols, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 656, where it was decided that "mistakes committed in moments of impending peril by a vessel, in order to avoid a catastrophe made imminent by the mismanagement of those in charge of another vessel, do not give the latter, if sunk and lost, a claim on the former for any damages." I do not consider this principle as applicable to the present case, because I have no doubt, that if the Mary C. had held her course, there would have been no collision; and secondly because ordinary seamanship would have satisfied a lookout attending to his duty, that the Sarah Buck when she began to luff had then ranged so far to the eastward of the Mary C., that there could be no collision if she held her course; and lastly, at the distance the vessels then were, a competent skillful master with nothing to distract his attention, the peril not being then imminent, and there being no occasion for excitement, would never have given an order to luff, which must inevitably occasion the collision. Upon the imminency of the peril at the moment, it may be well to refer to the statement in the answer, which says "that the Mary C. held her course until the Sarah Buck approached nearer, when the helm of the Mary C. was put to port in order that she might lay close to the wind, and finding that the course pursued by the Sarah Buck rendered a collision possible, the helm of the Mary C. was put hard to port." Since the answer was completed, there has been added in pencil (which additions the court does not sanction) the words "to lessen the force of the blow, collision being imminent." The imminence of the peril does not appear to have occurred either to the claimant or proctor in the early stage of the defense, as the answer itself only states that he put his helm to port when he saw the Sarah Buck approaching, thus in the very outset altering his course by laying closer to the wind, and after that, finding that the course of the Sarah Buck rendered a collision possible, not imminent or impending, he put his helm hard to port. Such a case, in my view, is not brought within the doctrine laid down by Judge Clifford in The Nichols [supra], for the answer admits that as the Sarah Buck came nearer he put his helm to port, that he might lay closer to the wind, thus changing his course without any justifiable cause, as there was then no danger, and after that, when there was only a possibility of collision, he turned towards the track on which the Sarah Buck was sailing, instead of holding his course or running away from her, and thereby produced the very result which would otherwise not have happened. It rather appears to the court that the Mary C. acted upon the theory, that under all circumstances she was bound to go to windward and compel the Sarah Buck to pass to leeward, even if a collision was occasioned thereby. Her answer shows, either inattention and want of seamanship, or a determination to go to windward, whatever might be the consequences.

The damages sustained by the loss of the Sarah Buck are testified to amount to $2,300, which includes $200 secured for freight of a cargo of hay to Salem, and which amount was lost by the master from his person, he having taken it from his cabin in an account book in which it had been put, and placed the book with the money in it under his coat for protection at the time he was getting into his boat to go on board the Mary C., when the Sarah Buck was sinking. In the confusion, the book and money were lost. This amount I find to have been lost, and I consider it a proper item of damage, and I do not find the master to have been so negligent as to relieve the Mary C. from accountability for its loss. Two sails used for covering the deck-load of hay were also lost, which are valued at $100. The boat and some of the vessel's furniture were saved. I assess the loss sustained by the Sarah Buck at $2,200. If the parties agree upon the damages sustained by the Mary C., the court will adopt that amount, otherwise an assessor will be named by the court to determine them.

Damages to be apportioned.

Case No. 9,202.

The MARY CELESTE.

[2 Lowell, 354.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1874.

SHIPPING—FORFEITURE—TITLE—INNOCENT PURCHASER—FRAUDULENT CERTIFICATE OF REGISTRY—SIGNATURE.

1. Where absolute forfeiture to the United States is the statute penalty for an act, the title accrues when the penal act is committed.

2. If the forfeiture is alternative, property or its value, the title does not vest until the election is made. Meanwhile, an innocent purchaser may acquire a title not subject to forfeiture by subsequent seizure.

3. Under St. 18 July, 1866, § 24 (14 Stat. 184), "If any certificate of registry . . . to any vessel shall be knowingly and fraudulently obtained or used for any vessel not entitled to the benefit thereof, such vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be liable to forfeiture," the forfeiture is an absolute one, and vests the property in the United States when the fraud is committed. "Liable" only implies that the United States may not discover or may not enforce the forfeiture.

4. If the papers, by means of which such registry is obtained, are identified, and come from the possession of government, it is not necessary to prove the signature to each paper.

The United States seized the brig Mary Celeste, July 9, 1872, and at once filed a libel against her as forfeited; alleging that in December, 1868, Richard W. Haines, the then owner of said brig, knowingly and fraudulently obtained a certificate of registry for said brig, to the benefit of which she was not entitled.

The answer denied the allegations of the libel; and further averred that the claimants were bona fide purchasers of the brig since the certificate was obtained, and without notice of any fraud. No objection was taken to the very general form in which the charge was made in the libel. There was evidence tending to show that the brig came into the port of New York in November, 1868, from Matanzas; that she was then the British brig Amazon; that she was sold at auction on or about Nov. 28, and bought by R. W. Haines, an American citizen and shipmaster, for $2,800; that she was repaired by him, at a cost of about $10,000, and was not worth much more than the cost of the repairs; that Haines applied to the secretary of the treasury to issue a register to the brig, under the statute of Dec. 23, 1852, 10 Stat. 149, which authorizes such action when a foreign-built vessel is wrecked in the United States, and bought and repaired by a citizen thereof; provided it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the secretary that the repairs amount to three-fourths of the value of the vessel when repaired. The application was granted, and a register was issued to the brig, under the name of the Mary Celeste. The government maintained that the brig never was wrecked in the United States; and introduced evidence that she arrived in New York from Matanzas without any appearance of having been wrecked, and that the protest and portwarden's certificate forwarded to the secretary of the treasury were false and fraudulent. There was evidence that the present owners of the brig bought their respective shares innocently.

The forfeiture was said to have accrued under section 24 of the act of 18th of July, 1866 (14 Stat. 184): "that, if any certificate of registry . . . to any vessel shall be knowingly and fraudulently obtained or used for any vessel not entitled to the benefit thereof, such vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be liable to forfeiture."

G. P. Sanger and P. Cummings, for the United States.

M. F. Dickinson, Jr., for claimants.

LOWELL, District Judge. The first question is, whether the papers said to have been forwarded to Mr. McCulloch, secretary of the treasury, are duly proved. A package of papers fastened together, of which the first and one other are positively sworn to, is produced from the custody of the government. Three witnesses, through whose hands they passed, recognize the package generally, though two of them can positively identify only the wrapper. The broker who got up the case, and gave the papers to the proper officer of the custom-house in New-York, swears to his letter, which contains a list of the papers, and the papers correspond to the list. He swears to the protest which was taken before him as a notary. The papers were put in evidence at the first hearing, which was some weeks before the close of the case; and it would have been easy to prove fraud or forgery in the documentary evidence, if any such existed. The papers are sufficiently identified.

The principal question of fact is, whether Haines knowingly and fraudulently obtained a register for the brig to which she was not entitled. In construing such a statute, it is right to give the citizen the benefit of any doubtful phrases, and that the offence is not committed unless the vessel is not entitled to the register which she obtained; that is to say, misstatements, though false and wilful, will not forfeit the vessel, if it can be proved as a matter of fact that the vessel, after all, was fully entitled to the benefits which she received. But I agree with the district attorney, that, if fraud and falsehood are proved, it cannot but be very strongly inferred that the truth would not have served the purpose. It is entirely clear that the protest was a tissue of gross fabrications from beginning to end. The man who swore to it as master was not master; the voyage he testified to was antedated about a month, to give time for an imaginary wreck on the shores of the United States; the cargo was not taken out of the brig, as he swears it was; nor was she towed to New York: from all which, it is safe to conclude that she never was wrecked at all. It is further proved that the port-warden's certificate, which purports to describe a wreck and uses that word, is spurious. As the protest is the only evidence which was before the secretary, or has been put into the case, that the vessel was wrecked in the United States, it is hardly necessary to examine the other and less startling falsehoods which are said to be found in the papers.

The question of law is, whether the brig can be forfeited in the hands of innocent purchasers; it being admitted that one-quarter part of the vessel is held by such persons, and argued that the whole is so held. When an act of congress denounces an absolute forfeiture as the consequence of an act, the title of the United States accrues when the prohibited act is done (U. S. v. 1960 Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398; Henderson's Distilled Spirits, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 44); and it is equally well-settled, that, when the forfeiture is in the alternative, the property or the value, then the title does not vest in the government until they have elected which they will take; and, in the mean time, an innocent purchaser may acquire a title which cannot be forfeited by a subsequent seizure (U. S. v. Grundy, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 338; Caldwell v. U. S., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 366).

The claimants insist that the statute governing this case is within the reason of the second class of decisions rather than the first. The words are, "shall be liable to forfeiture;" which they interpret to mean, that the property does not vest until the seizure. It is true of all forfeitures that they must be completed by seizure and the other requisite proceedings, before the title will vest in possession; but, when the seizure is made, it relates back to the time of the forfeiture, excepting when the statute has expressed a different intent. Such a difference was found when the forfeiture was alternative; but there is no alternative in this statute. The vessel is forfeited, if any thing is; and I can see only the contingency that the government may not choose to prosecute, or may not discover the liability; and this is all, I think, which is meant by the phrase in question.

The learned counsel have collated, with much pains, the very numerous provisions of the internal revenue laws, by which penalties are affixed to acts and neglects; and I have examined many of them. The enactments are very various in form. There are many in which it is clear that only the title of the individual wrong-doer is to be taken; as where, upon conviction, certain instruments or articles of the defendant are forfeited, or where the collector may seize distilled spirits which have not been sold by the manufacturer who has broken the law, or which have not passed out of his possession, &c. A large number use words of present forfeiture; a few have the alternative of "the goods or their value;" and a few the expression, "liable to forfeiture." I cannot discover, by an inspection of these last-mentioned sections, that there is any thing in the character of the offence to lead us to expect a different sort of forfeiture from those which are plainly absolute. The reason given in 3 Cranch [supra], that you cannot tell which of the two things is the property of the United States until they have made their choice, fails to apply; and I am bound to say, that I cannot find any legal distinction between the various forms of expression by which a forfeiture without an alternative is expressed.

Decree for the United States.

Case No. 9,203.

The MARY CLINTON.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 556;[1] Betts, Pr. Cas.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 26, 1863.

PRIZE—BLOCKADE—ENEMY PROPERTY — NEUTRAL — LOYALTY OF OWNER OF PROPERTY USED IN ILLEGAL TRAFFIC — LIEN ON CAPTURED PROPERTY.

1. Objections taken, in the claims, to the sufficiency of the libel, in point of pleading, overruled.

2. The hostilities subsisting between the government and the rebels have the character and attributes of a public war, and the rules of national law applicable to wars of that description govern the rights and liabilities of persons whose property is captured, as prize of war, during such hostilities.

3. A lawful blockade had been imposed by the government, and put in force, at the time of the arrest of the vessel in this suit.

4. The property of persons domiciled or residing within the rebel states is a proper subject of capture on the sea as enemy property.

5. The proclamation of the blockade is, of itself, conclusive evidence that a state of war existed which demanded and authorized a recourse to a blockade, under the circumstances existing in the case.

6. Property devoted to illegal traffic becomes thus stamped as enemy property, and the quality of hostility does not depend exclusively upon the personal sentiments or lawful allegiance of the party, but arises often from its actual or business residence; so that the produce of the soil of the hostile country, engaged in the commerce of the hostile power, is legitimate prize without regard to the domicile of the owner.

7. A neutral friend to both belligerents cannot transport over the sea the effects of one to the use of the other, though also his friend. He is not allowed to aid and benefit the commerce of one belligerent to the prejudice of the other.

8. By investing his means, and participating in the trade and mercantile concerns of a belligerent nation, a neutral has, in effect, affixed to him the national character of the places at which he carries on his commerce.

9. The produce of the enemy's soil and country, owned by a neutral, while it remains in the enemy's country, particularly if obtained therein by a resident agent of the neutral merchant, has imparted to it the stamp of enemy property, and the owner is, pro hac vice, an enemy.

10. Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade and as enemy property.

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Blatchford, Esq.]

11. The interest or expectancy of creditors in enemy property arrested as prize, even though amounting to a lien upon it, does not exempt it from capture as prize.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The above vessel and cargo were captured May 29, 1861, by the United States vessel-of-war Powhatan, in the Gulf of Mexico, near one of the mouths of the Mississippi, steering towards the river, and bound to the port of New Orleans, and were brought into this port for adjudication as prize. A libel for that cause was filed in this court against the prize, July 3 thereafter. The vessel was laden at Charleston with a cargo of rice on the 12th of May, 1861, bound to the port of New Orleans. Several parties intervened, and interposed claims and defences in the cause. On the 23d of July aforesaid, Patrick Henry Ryan filed a claim as sole owner of the schooner, alleging that he was a citizen of the United States at the time the vessel sailed from Charleston, and so continued to the time of filing his claim. On the 13th of July aforesaid, the firm of Trenholm Brothers & Co. (of which firm one member resided in New York, one in Liverpool, and six in Charleston) filed their answer and claim in the cause, as agents of, and intervening for, John R. Armstrong, of Liverpool, and claimed that 102 tierces of rice, part of the cargo of the vessel, belonged solely and exclusively to the said John R. Armstrong. They deny, by their answer, the rightful capture of the vessel. They also, by their answer, except to the sufficiency of the libel, in not charging against the vessel or cargo any act committed in violation of law; and they further allege that the libel does not, on its face, show any cause whatsoever for the detention of the vessel or cargo, or charge the existence of war between the United States and the state of South Carolina, or the state of Louisiana, or between the said states themselves, or the existence of any blockade, or the legal notification thereof, if one was imposed in fact. On the 6th of July aforesaid, D. M. Fry & Co., of New York, filed a claim to the proceeds of 283 casks of rice, part of the cargo of the vessel, to be paid and accounted for to them by the consignee in New Orleans, towards payment of an indebtedness due to them by the shippers of the rice, in case the rice was delivered and sold in New Orleans; and they deny that the rice was subject to seizure, detention or forfeiture, by reason of any matters alleged in the libel, and they also submit exceptions to the libel for insufficiencies in its allegations: (1) That it does not appear that a state of war subsisted, whereby the goods were subject to seizure, detention, or condemnation as prize of war. (2) That it does not appear that, at the time of the seizure alleged in the libel, any blockade existed or was duly notified, by reason whereof the goods were liable to seizure or condemnation. On the 10th of July aforesaid, the firm of Sturges, Bennet & Co., of New York, filed their claim in the suit, to 75 tierces of rice, part of the same cargo, alleging that J. A. Buchmeyer, in Charleston, South Carolina, shipped the said quantity of rice on the vessel, to be delivered at New Orleans to S. L. & E. L. Levy, consignee there, to be sold, with a view to operate as a remittance for the payment of debts owing by Buchmeyer to the claimants, his creditors; that, subsequently to that shipment, Buchmeyer transferred to the claimants the said rice, to be received and sold by them to the end aforesaid, and that, at the time, Buchmeyer was indebted to the claimants to an amount exceeding the value of the said rice; that, at all times, Buchmeyer and the claimants were citizens of the United States, the former residing at Charleston, and the latter in the city of New York; and the claimants deny that the rice is liable to seizure or condemnation. To this claim the same exceptions to the libel were annexed as to the one preceding. The firm of Grinnell, Minture & Co., of the city of New York, on the same day, July 10, filed a claim to 235 tierces and 3 half tierces of rice, part of the cargo seized in this suit on board the vessel. They allege that the aforesaid parcels of rice were shipped May 10, 1861, in the vessel, at Charleston, South Carolina, by Henry Cobea & Co., of the same place, consigned to S. L. & E. L. Levy, of New Orleans, and, at the time of shipment and capture, belonged to the said shippers; that, on the 20th of June, the said shippers transferred the said rice to Street & West, of Charleston; that, on the next day, Street & West transferred the rice to the claimants, to be received and sold by them on account of Street & West, and the proceeds to be applied to the payment of the amount owing by Street & West to the claimants, and they to hold the surplus for their account, which indebtedness to the claimants was $4,200 and upwards; and that, at all the times before mentioned, Henry Cobea & Co. and Street & West were each a commercial firm, doing business at Charleston, South Carolina, and the claimants were citizens of the United States doing business in the city of New York.

The above issues were noticed by the United States attorney for hearing at the present October term of the court, and the defaults of all the claimants, except John R. Armstrong, the claimant of 102 tierces of rice, were taken, they having failed to appear and make defence. The case has now been heard upon such defaults of the other claimants as against them, and on the contestation of the claimant Armstrong, and the argument of his counsel, in regard to his interest and defence in this suit. The objection sought to be raised through the claims, to the sufficiency of the libel in point of pleading has no foundation or support in the prize practice in the English or American courts. The Fortuna, 1 Dod. 81; Halleck, Int. Law, c. 31, § 32.

The judicial history of this case, patent upon the pleadings on file, and the concomitant action of the parties and the court in respect to the litigation involved in this suit, demonstrate that the points attempted to be brought into renewed discussion at this time were all definitely disposed of by the supreme court, in December term last, in the prize cases brought before that tribunal from various circuit courts of the United States. The Hiawatha, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 635. The main questions of law raised on this case were distinctly made upon the claims and answers filed by the several parties in the decision referred to, and are all resolved therein, against the defences. The bar interposed by those defences consisted of these cardinal positions: That the hostilities subsisting between the government and the rebels had not the character and attributes of a public war, and that, accordingly, the rules on national law applicable to wars of that description did not govern the rights or liabilities of the respective parties assailed in this suit; that a lawful blockade had not been imposed by this government and put in force at the time of the arrest of the vessel in this suit; and that the property of persons domiciled or residing within the rebel states was not a proper subject of capture on the sea as enemy property. But the judgment of the supreme court determines that the proclamation of the blockade is, of itself, conclusive evidence that a state of war existed which demanded and authorized a recourse to such a measure under the circumstances existing in the case; that property devoted to illegal traffic becomes thus stamped as enemy property; and that the quality of hostility does not depend exclusively upon the personal sentiments or lawful allegiance of the party, but arises often from his actual or business residence, so that the produce of the soil of the hostile country, engaged in the commerce of the hostile power, is legitimate prize, without regard to the domicile of the owner.

Ryan claims to be the owner of the vessel. Her register shows her ownership to be in New Orleans. The master testifies that he has no domicile, and that he resides with his vessel, and was born in Virginia. The mate knows no domicile of the master and his wife, except where his vessel is. The testimony shows that the vessel was laden at Charleston, and was despatched thence for New Orleans, in May, 1861. The vessel, on going out of the harbor of Charleston, was arrested and a warning was indorsed on her register by the United States boarding officer, not to enter any port in the Southern states. That indorsement, which is introduced in evidence before the court, is perfectly legible and intelligible in its terms and signature, and is in this form: "May 12, 1861, boarded and warned off the Southern coast by the U. S. S. Niagara, H. P. Dekrafft, Lt. U. S. navy." When the vessel arrived off the Mississippi she was seized by the United States ship-of-war Powhatan. The master testifies that he does not know for what she was arrested. The mate says it was for attempting to break the blockade.

It is very plain, from the statements of the master and mate, independently of the above notice, that they were well aware that New Orleans had been declared under blockade when the vessel directed her course there subsequent to her warning; and that, finding the proclamation fulfilled by a blockade efficiently enforced on her departure from Charleston, and her arrival at New Orleans, she repeated the violation of it, with full knowledge, and designedly. There is, accordingly, no room for doubt that the violation of the blockade at both ports was direct and intentional.

It appears, by the pleadings, that the cargo on board of the vessel was procured at Charleston, by residents domiciled there, who acted as agents for John R. Armstrong, who is represented to be the owner of the cargo, and to be a neutral, resident in Great Britain. It matters not that Armstrong has a co-partnership interest with his agents domiciled in the enemy's country, in the trade conducted in the products of that country with the enemy of the captors. A neutral friend to both belligerents cannot transport over the sea the effects of one to the use of the other, though also his friend. He is not allowed to aid and benefit the commerce of one belligerent to the prejudice of the other. By investing his means, and participating in the trade and mercantile concerns of a belligerent nation, a neutral has, in effect, affixed to him the national character of the places at which he carries on his commerce. Halleck, Int. Law, c. 29, §§ 26, 27; Upt. Mar. War. 124; The Dree Gebroeders, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 232. The produce of the enemy's soil and country, owned by a neutral, while it remains in the enemy's country, particularly if obtained therein by a resident agent of the neutral merchant, has imparted to it the stamp of enemy property, and the owner is, pro hac vice, an enemy. Sup. Ct. U. S. Decisions, note; Wheat. Int. Law (Lawrence's Ed.) Supp. p. 20; The Vigilantia, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 1.

The interest of the claimant Armstrong in the cargo procured by him in Charleston, and shipped on the voyage in question, falls within the principle, and is confiscable as enemy property. It is, also, directly so in consequence of its having been knowingly transported from an enemy port under blockade, and designed to be carried to another blockaded port, and being arrested in the effort to break the blockade of New Orleans. The knowledge of the master and his culpable purpose are established by the written warning indorsed on the register of his vessel, and are proved, against his denial on his examination in preparatorio, by that document, and also by the testimony of the first mate of the vessel, on the same examination. The fact of the blockade, both at the port of the departure and the port of destination, at the time of the appearance of the vessel before those lines, and its efficiency, are demonstrated by the actual arrest of the vessel at each on its attempt to pass them.

The other claimants had no fixed property in the cargo captured. They had no higher interest than a privilege or lien, at the utmost, for the payment of pre-existing debts from the proceeds to be realized out of the various shipments of rice, on the sale thereof in New Orleans. It is clear, that the interest or expectancy of creditors, in enemy property arrested as prize, does not exempt it from capture as such, and, accordingly, the libellants are entitled to its condemnation and forfeiture. Wheat. Capt. c. 3, § 15; The Sally Magee [3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 451], in which C. M. Fry & Co. are also claimants in part, and where like points of law are considered by this court.

For the reasons above suggested, the vessel and cargo prosecuted in this suit are subject to condemnation and forfeiture.

An appeal was taken to the supreme court from this decree, as to a part of the cargo, but not as to the vessel. Affirmed by default February 27, 1866. [Case unreported.]

Miner Bethel, for libellants.

S. J. Douglas, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. This cause having been heard upon the proofs and allegations of the parties, it is now ordered, and decreed, that the schooner Flying Arrow, recover for saving two hundred and ninety nine bales of cotton, from said wreck, valued at thirteen thousand one hundred and fifty six dollars, the sum of three thousand two hundred and eighty nine dollars, and also twenty nine dollars for saving portions of the materials and stores of said vessel, and also five hundred and ninety one dollars and sixty cents, for saving 67 bales of wet cotton, and breaking out seventy three other bales afterwards saved by the Texas. That the smacks Pinkney and Dudley, recover for saving one hundred and thirty one bales valued at five thousand seven hundred and sixty four dollars, the sum of fourteen hundred and forty one dollars, and also ten dollars and twenty eight cents for saving portions of the stores and materials. That the smack Welcome recover for saving twenty four bales, valued at one thousand and fifty six dollars, two hundred and sixty four dollars, and also ten dollars and ninety seven cents for saving portions of the materials and stores. That the schooner Eliza Catherine, recover for saving thirty nine bales and a half, valued at seven hundred and sixty five dollars and twenty five cents, the sum of three hundred and six dollars and ten cents. That the Sarah and Julia, recover for saving two bales, nineteen dollars. That the sloop Texas recover for saving seventy three bales valued at fourteen hundred and twenty three dollars and fifty cents, the sum of four hundred and ninety six dollars and forty cents, and sixty eight dollars and fourteen cents for saving portions of the materials. That the schooner Florida recover for saving materials fifty eight dollars and thirty five cents,—the total salvage on the cotton being six thousand four hundred and seven dollars and ten cents, and the total salvage on the materials, one hundred and seventy six dollars and seventy four cents. That upon the payment of the salvage and expenses as aforesaid, the Marshal restore said cotton and proceeds of the materials sold, to the master thereof, for and on account of whom it may concern.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Sept., 1875.

COLLISION—ON STARBOARD TACK—FOUL WEATHER—OFFICER ON DECK—INTEREST ON DAMAGES.

1. It is the duty of a vessel on the port tack to clear a vessel on the starboard tack.

[Cited in The Abby Ingalls, 12 Fed. 218.]

2. In thick or foul weather it is especially the duty of a vessel on the port tack to exercise all possible vigilance and care; there should be some one on deck competent to give necessary orders instantly upon an emergency.

3. Interest not allowed as damages when the bills of repairs had not been actually paid at the time the cause was tried.

Libel for damage to the fishing-schooner Alice P. Higgins, by collision with the fishing-schooner Mary Doane, on the afternoon of June 17, 1874, on Nantucket Shoals. Both vessels were lying-to in a fog, with their helms hard down, and relying chiefly on their foresails; and the witnesses for each party testified that their vessel was making from two knots to two and a half knots. The libellants' vessel was on the starboard tack, and the Mary Doane on the port tack.

The case for the libellants was, that they discovered the Mary Doane at a considerable distance, estimated to be half a mile, about a point under their lee bow; that they blew a horn and shouted, but that nothing was done by the other schooner, excepting, perhaps, to haul aft the mainsail, and that the vessels came together near the bows, causing the damage described.

The respondents admitting the collision and the state of the wind, denied all negligence on their part, and asserted the fog to have been so dense that it was impossible for them to do anything after the time that they discovered, or could have discovered, the Alice P. Higgins.

The Mary Doane had her helm lashed, and, when the master was called up by the lookout, he found he could not go astern of the libellants' schooner, and tried, by hauling aft his mainsail and letting go his jib, to bring his vessel up alongside the Higgins.

There was conflicting testimony upon the amount of fog, and as to certain admissions said to have been made by the master of the Mary Doane.

H. P. Harriman, for libellants.
J. M. Day, for claimants.

LOWELL, District Judge. It is not denied that the libellants complied with the statute in their use of the fog-horn, though the sound does not appear to have been heard on board the Mary Doane. It was argued that the vessel to leeward is, or may be bound to give way, under the peculiar circumstances of such a case as this; but I cannot yield to this suggestion. The vessels were under way, though not in the ordinary mode of navigation in clear weather, and the vessel on the port tack was bound to give way. If the libellants had undertaken the responsibility of going to leeward, it would have been at their own risk, and would most probably have brought about a collision, if it had happened that they had been seen a little sooner. In this respect the case is like one of great importance, from the very large damages involved in it, which came up in this district a few years since, between two whaling-ships, which were lying-to in the Arctic Ocean in a gale, in which it was decided that the ship on the port tack was bound to clear the ship on the starboard tack. The Ontario [Case No. 10,543]. This ruling was affirmed in the circuit court: Swift v. Brownell [Id. 13,695].

The libellants, then, having the right of way, and having made such signals by fog-horns as they should have made, are the claimants excused by the state of the weather? Upon this point the evidence is not to be reconciled. In a matter where estimates and comparative statements are necessary, there is great opportunity for unconscious exaggeration on either side.

It is plain that in a fog of considerable density it was peculiarly the duty of a vessel on the port tack to exercise all possible vigilance and precaution; and the evidence shows that no one competent to navigate the Mary Doane was on her deck. When the young man on the lookout saw something under the lee bow, and had satisfied himself that it was a vessel, he ran aft and called the master from the cabin. To be sure, there was a man, and perhaps a good navigator, on deck, but it was not his watch, and he was doing nothing, and he disclaims all responsibility. Suppose this man, or any other person corresponding to the officers of a merchant vessel, to have been in charge, the boy would have notified him at once, when he first saw the object, and would have had the benefit of his skill and experience, not only in handling the ship, but in ascertaining the nature of the danger. Where a ship was sailing before the wind in such a position that another ship approaching towards the bows could not be seen from the quarter-deck, Judge Sprague held that the lookout himself should have been a person competent to give the requisite order to the helmsman in case of meeting a ship: Allen v. Mackay [Case No. 228]. So in this case there should have been some one on deck whose duty it was to give the necessary directions instantly.

Then, was the fog so dense that no reasonable amount of vigilance and preparation would have availed? I do not think so. Whatever deductions are to be made from the libellants' estimates of the distance at which they saw the Mary Doane, I think the preponderance of the evidence is, that they saw her some time before they were seen. And I consider it altogether probable that the time which the claimants might have had, if they had used their opportunities, would have been enough to enable them to keep off, and go under the stern of the Alice P. Higgins.

I must hold the defendant vessel responsible.

I find the aggregate of the bills of repairs produced at the trial to be $197.80, and I award for detention $60, making the total $257.80 and costs.

I do not allow interest, because the largest bill, more than half the total, has not yet been paid. Decree accordingly.

paid for in monthly installments, and gave immediate possession to the vendees; and it was further agreed that in case of default in the payments, the vessel should be returned to the owner, and the contract of sale rescinded; and the proposed purchasers were in that case to pay $125 per month for her use, while in their possession, deducting all sums paid on account of the purchase money, and default was made in the payment stipulated; but before the owner resumed possession under the contract, the libellant sold out his interest to his partner and was immediately employed by the latter to serve as pilot and mate: held, that the libellant had no lien on the vessel in the hands of a subsequent vendee of the owner.

In admiralty.

Daniel T. Sullivan, for libellant.
Charles Page, for claimants.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The libellant in this case has proved that he served on board the above barge as pilot and mate from July 8 until August 28, 1874, at the rate of one hundred dollars per month, as agreed on between himself and Captain Bradbury, her acting master.

The defense relies on the following facts: On the fifth day of January, 1874, the Sacramento Wood Company, the owner of the barge, entered into a contract with the libellant and Captain Bradbury, by which they agreed to sell her for the sum of eight hundred dollars, to be paid for in monthly installments. Captain Bradbury and the libellant, on their part, agreed to purchase and pay for the barge as stipulated in the contract.

It was further agreed that should default be made in any of the payments, the barge was to be immediately returned to the possession of the company, the obligation on its part to convey title to her should cease, and the proposed purchasers were to be charged, and they agreed to pay, rent at the rate of one hundred and twenty-five dollars per month for the time she might have been in their possession, but credit was to be allowed on such rent for all sums paid on account of the purchase-money. It was also agreed that if the barge were lost before the full payment of the purchase, the loss should fall on the purchasers, and they should remain liable for the purchase-money.

Under this agreement Bradbury and the libellant took possession of the barge, and employed her in connection with the steamer Alvarado, with the owners of which they had made a somewhat similar contract. They failed, however, to make the stipulated payments to the company, but the possession was not demanded by, nor surrendered to, the company, nor were any steps taken to assert the rights of the latter until August 27, when the barge was sold to one Carroll, to whose vendees it was delivered by Captain Hutchins, who had bought out Bradbury's interest in the original contract.

On the eighth of the previous July, after the default in the payments had occurred, and while the barge still remained in the possession of Kates (the libellant) and Bradbury, Kates sold out his interest in the contract to Bradbury, and was immediately employed by the latter to serve as pilot and mate. He now claims that his demand for wages constitutes a lien on the barge in the hands of purchasers who derive title from the wood company.

But this claim cannot, in my opinion, be maintained. It is obvious that if the lien exists against the vessel in the hands of her present owners it would equally have existed against her if she were still owned by the wood company—and this whether the vendees of the company had or had not notice of Kates' claim. The lien was created, if at all, by his service on board the vessel, and not by the fact that the vendees of the company knew of his services. A lien may sometimes be lost by a transfer to a purchaser for value and without notice, but it cannot be created by the fact of such notice if it otherwise had no existence. If the vessel was free from the lien when the company resumed possession, the protection of its rights demands that it should be able to convey an unincumbered title to purchasers. If a mere notice of Kates' claim to a party proposing to purchase would subject the vessel in his hands to the lien, the effect would be the same as if she were subject to the lien in the hands of the company, her value in its hands would be diminished to the amount of the lien. But the point is too clear to need argument.

Could then the libellant, in the relation in which he stood to the owners of the vessel, acquire a lien upon her by virtue of services rendered in the employment of his associate after an assignment to the latter of his interest under the contract? It cannot, I think, be pretended that before that assignment either Kates or Bradbury could have acquired any lien for their services on board the vessel. They were not employed by the owners, and were rendering no services to them. They were on board a vessel of which they were the provisional owners. They had agreed to pay for her, and were put into possession to run her on their own account, and at their own risk. If she should be lost, the loss was to fall on them. In case of default in the payment of the purchase money, they were to pay a monthly rent for her use, and immediately surrender her to her owner.

They were thus quasi, or provisional, owners of the barge, or quasi hirers of her. But in either case their services were rendered to themselves, and for their own benefit, and not to or for the benefit of the legal owner. If an owner of a vessel of which he retains the possession takes service on board of her as mate or seaman, it is plain that he could not assert any lien upon her for his wages; his wages would be due from himself to himself. There would, therefore, be no debt to support the lien, or for which it could serve as security. The same consequence would follow, and for the same reason, if the person rendering the services were the charterer in possession.

It may be objected that these instances furnish no argument, for they merely present this question in dispute under another form. This objection has some plausibility, but these simple illustrations serve to point out what is the true principle to be applied to the case at bar where the circumstances are more complicated. I think it plain, therefore, that before the assignment Kates could have acquired no lien on the vessel. Did the fact that he assigned his interest in the contract to his associate alter his position with regard to the owners, or enable him to acquire, or his associate to create, a lien in his favor on the barge? It appears to me that it did not. His assignment to his partner conveyed his rights, but it did not relieve him of his obligations under the contract. The contract was not by its terms assignable. The company bound itself to sell and give title to Bradbury and Kates on receiving from them the purchase money. It did not agree to sell to their assignee. It may have been content to assume the risk of liens created by them in favor of strangers, but it could not have contemplated the creation by them of liens in their own favor on a vessel of which they were the provisional owners, and were bound, by paying the purchase money to become the absolute owners. And this result could not be brought about either by a joint assignment to a third party nor by assignment by one associate to the other; neither could, without the company's consent, alter his relation to the vessel or to the company. That relation, as established by the contract, remained unaffected by any assignment to which the company did not assent, and which it was under no obligation to recognize for any purpose; and especially when resorted to for the purpose of enabling one of the purchasers to impair, and it might be wholly absorb, the value of the property by creating liens upon her in favor of his associate.

My opinion is that under the circumstances, no lien attached to the vessel in favor of the libellant. Under this view of the case, it will be unnecessary to consider the novel, and, perhaps, embarrassing questions, which arise from the circumstance that the libellant's services were rendered to the barge and the steamer jointly; both vessels being engaged in a common enterprise, in the prosecution of which both were necessarily used, and which were taken possession of by the libellant and his associate under nearly similar contracts, but with different owners. In the contract with the owners of the steamer they appear to have stipulated against the creation of any liens whatever upon her. Disregarding for the moment this latter provision, the inquiry arises: to which vessel did a lien for services rendered to both, attach; or did it attach to both? Could they be libelled jointly, or would each be liable for the whole? And if not for the whole, how should the proportionate liability of each be determined? Or, if the whole debt was collected from one, could contribution be claimed from the other? And if so, whether for one half of the amount paid, or for a part of it, proportioned to the relative values of the vessels? These and other questions naturally suggest themselves, but it is unnecessary now to attempt to solve them.

The libel must be dismissed.

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. July 12, 1878.

MARINE INSURANCE — ABANDONMENT — TITLE DERIVED THEREUNDER — RELIEF EXPEDITION — FUNDS CONTRIBUTED THEREFOR — MARITIME LIEN—REPAIRS.

P., the sole owner of a vessel, procured marine insurance on her in four insurance companies, for an aggregate sum of $11,000, on account of himself, for one year. The policies valued the vessel at $13,500, and contained these clauses: "No abandonment, in any case whatever, even when the right to abandon may exist, shall be held or allowed as effectual or valid, unless it shall be in writing, signed by the insured, and delivered to the said company, or to their authorized agent, nor unless it shall be efficient, if accepted, to convey to and vest in the said insurance company an unincumbered and perfect title to the subject abandoned; and the valuation of said vessel, expressed in this policy, shall be considered the value in adjusting losses covered by this policy." "It is also agreed, that this policy shall become void, if any other insurance is or shall be made upon the vessel interest hereby insured, which, together with this insurance, shall exceed the sum of $11,000." The vessel was wrecked. P. paid 5-27ths of the contribution of the vessel in general average to the expenses of an unsuccessful expedition for her relief, the companies paying 22-27ths, under a clause in the policies. Thereafter P. gave to the companies notice of abandonment, and, two months after that, he signed and delivered to each company a paper, saying: "I, P., owner of the schooner M. E. P., insured under policy" of such a number, in such a company, for so much, of such a date, "do hereby abandon to said company all right, title, and interest possessed by me in said vessel, tackle, and apparel, under said policy, notice of said abandonment having been given" at such a date. The companies accepted the abandonment, and paid P., as for a total loss, $11,000, and afterwards, at their own expense, saved the vessel, and procured repairs to be made to her. On a libel against her for such repairs, P. claimed to be the owner of 5-27ths of her, and answered setting up that the claim was not a lien on his share of the vessel: Held, that P. had no interest in the vessel when the libel was filed, and was not entitled to defend the suit.

Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Northern district of New York.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission. 6 Reporter, 293, contains only a condensed report.]

[This was a libel for repairs by Robert Mills and others against the Mary E. Perew. From the decree of the district court in favor of the libellants the claimant appeals.]

Williams & Potter, for libellants.
Sprague, Gorham & Bacon, for Perew.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. The libellants, ship carpenters at Buffalo, filed their libel in the district court against the schooner Mary E. Perew, to recover the sum of $4,021.93, with interest from October 11th, 1877, for repairs made to said schooner at Buffalo, in September and October, 1877, claiming a lien on the vessel for the value of such repairs, under the laws of the state of New York. Frank Perew, claiming to be the owner of 5-27ths of the vessel, put in an answer to the libel, setting up a defense to the claim as respects his interest in the vessel, and praying for a decree that such claim is not a lien on the share of the vessel belonging to him, and that it is a lien only upon the other interests in the vessel, and that the libel be dismissed as to his interest.

In July, 1875, Perew, being sole owner of the vessel, procured an insurance on her in each one of four several insurance companies, the sums severally insured by them being $3,500, $3,500, $2,000 and $2,000. One policy is a specimen of the four. The insurance is on account of Perew, and insures the sum named, on the vessel, for one year. The policy states that the vessel is valued at $13,500, without any further account to be given by the assured to the assurers for the same. The insurance covers marine disasters in the navigation of the upper lakes. The policy contains these clauses: "No abandonment, in any case whatever, even when the right to abandon may exist, shall be held or allowed as effectual or valid, unless it shall be in writing, signed by the insured, and delivered to the said company, or to their authorized agent, nor unless it shall be efficient, if accepted, to convey to and to vest in the said insurance company an unincumbered and perfect title to the subject abandoned; and the valuation of said vessel, expressed in this policy, shall be considered the value in adjusting losses covered by this policy." "It is also agreed, that this policy shall become void, if any other insurance is or shall be made upon the vessel interest hereby insured, which, together with this insurance, shall exceed the sum of eleven thousand dollars." In the fall of 1875 the vessel was wrecked in the upper lakes. An expedition was sent to her immediately by the agent of the insurance companies, but was unsuccessful in getting her off. Perew paid 5-27ths of the contribution of the vessel in the general average to the expenses of that expedition, the insurance companies paying 22-27ths, under a clause in the policies which authorizes the insurers to recover the vessel, in case of loss or misfortune, and provides that they shall contribute to the expenditures according to the proportion the sum insured bears to the valuation aforesaid, and that the rest paid or incurred by them shall be a lien on and recoverable against the vessel, or against the insured, at the option of the insurers. Thereafter, the vessel was regarded by Perew and the insurers as a total loss. He gave to them notice of abandonment on the 7th of December, 1875. His right to abandon was recognised under a clause in the policy which provides that "the insured shall not have a right to abandon the vessel in any case, unless the amount which the insurers would be liable to pay under an adjustment as of a partial loss, shall exceed half the amount insured." On the 7th of February, 1876, he signed and delivered to each company an instrument in writing, which says: "I, Frank Perew, owner of the schooner Mary E. Perew, insured under policy" of such a number, in such a company, for so much, of such a date, "do hereby abandon to said company all right, title and interest possessed by me in said vessel, tackle and apparel, under said policy, notice of said abandonment having been given December 7th, 1875." The four companies accepted the abandonments, and each paid to Perew, as for a total loss of the vessel, the amount it had insured, the total amount he received from them being $11,000. Afterwards they sent out an expedition and got the vessel off and brought her to Buffalo. So far as appears, Perew had not paid, or been called on to pay, any part of the expense of this successful expedition. The insurance companies procured the repairs to be made for which this suit is brought. No defence was made to the suit by any one but Perew. The district court decreed for the libellants and Perew has appealed to this court.

The contention on the part of Perew is, that he abandoned to the insurance companies only 22-27ths of the vessel; that he owned 5-27ths of her when the repairs were made; that the repairs were made without his consent; and that her co-owners could not bind his interest in the vessel by procuring the repairs to be made. If, by the abandonments, Perew ceased to have any interest in the vessel, that disposes of the case, for he has no standing to be heard in defence.

The argument on the part of Perew is, that the insurance companies, by the abandonments, became the owners of only a so-called insured interest in the vessel, namely 22-27ths, because the insurance was only $11,000 on a valuation of $13,500, and that they did not thereby become the owners of a so-called uninsured interest, namely 5-27ths, as to which Perew took the risk himself, and that he retained that, after and notwithstanding the abandonments. This is an erroneous view. Authorities are cited to the effect that, by an abandonment, the assured transfers his insurable interest as far as it is a subject of the policy; and that an abandonment cannot transfer the interest of the assured any further than that interest is covered by the policy. But there is nothing in those well settled principles which upholds the claim made by Perew. Perew's insurable interest in the vessel was the whole vessel, which he owned, and it was the whole vessel which was insured and was the subject of the policy. If he had owned only an undivided half of the vessel, his insurable interest in the vessel would have been only an undivided half of the vessel, and the subject of the policy, while it could not have exceeded an undivided half of the vessel, might have been only an undivided quarter of the vessel. In such case, the abandonment would have been of only an undivided quarter of the vessel. So, if the interest covered by the policy was only an undivided half of the vessel, no more than the undivided half of the vessel could be transferred by the abandonment. But, where the interest covered by the policy is, as here, the whole vessel, the abandonment can transfer the whole vessel. The interest covered by the policy is not to be confounded with the extent of the insurance made on such interest. In the present case, the interest covered by the policy, or the subject of the policy, was the entire interest in the vessel, or the whole vessel, and not an undivided share of the vessel. Perew owned the whole vessel, and the policy states that the company, "on account of Frank Perew, do make insurance, and cause" so much "to be insured, upon the body, tackle, apparel and other furniture of the schooner called the Mary E. Perew." The entire interest in the vessel, or the whole vessel, was valued in the policies at $13,500. That interest, that is, the whole vessel, was insured for $11,000. The companies put at risk on the whole vessel $11,000. If she was totally lost, they were to pay, and Perew was to receive, only $11,000, although, if not lost, he might have sold her for $13,500. An insurance company will not insure a vessel to her full value, lest there may be a temptation to the insured to make a good sale of her by losing her. In this case, the extent of the insurance on the whole vessel was $11,000, but the policies covered the whole vessel, as the interest insured or the subject of the policy. When the policy speaks, in the clause above cited, of "the vessel interest hereby insured," it means that the insurance shall not exceed $11,000 on that interest which is spoken of in the commencement of the policy as the interest insured, that is, the whole vessel. The clause providing that the company shall contribute to the expenditures of recovery according to the proportion the sum insured bears to the valuation of $13,500, taken in connection with the provision that the valuation of $13,500 shall be considered the value in adjusting losses covered by the policy, shows a harmony with the foregoing views. If the expenditures of recovery were $3,000, the companies, insuring $11,000, would pay $2,444.44. If the damage, in case of loss, was one-quarter of the value of the vessel, it would be one-quarter of $13,500 or $3,375, and the companies, insuring $11,000 on the whole vessel, would pay $2,750. On the theory that the companies insured only 22-27ths of the vessel, they would be insuring up to the full value of the subject insured, for they would be insuring $11,000 on $11,000, 22-27ths of $13,500 being $11,000.

Moreover, the terms of the abandonment are very distinct. Perew, owner of the whole vessel, insured under the policy for so much, abandons to the company all right, title and interest possessed by him in the vessel, tackle and apparel, under the policy. The instrument declares that he is owner of the whole vessel, that the whole vessel was insured under the policy for the amount of insurance named in the policy, and that he abandons to the company all the right, title and interest possessed by him in the vessel, under the policy. The right, title and interest possessed by him in the vessel was the entire interest in the vessel, the whole vessel. He could not abandon all of that by abandoning only a part of it. He abandons under the policy, that is, in accordance with the provisions of the policy respecting abandonment, all his interest in the vessel, that is, the whole vessel. He does this to get payment for a total loss. He was satisfied that the vessel was in such a state that it was better for him to receive the $11,000 and give up the vessel wholly to the companies, and they met him on that ground. The instruments of abandonment carry out the provision of the policies. They were accepted by the companies, and they convey to the companies "an unincumbered and perfect title to the subject abandoned." The subject abandoned is the vessel, the whole vessel, all the interest of Perew in the vessel as owner of her, the entire ownership of her.

As Perew had no interest in the vessel when the libel was filed, he was not entitled to defend the suit, and the libellants are entitled to a decree for $4,021.93, with interest from October 12th, 1877, and for their costs in the district court. They are also entitled to their costs of appeal, in this court, against Perew.

CHARTER-PARTY—DEMURRAGE—DEFAULT OF CHARTERER—SUNDAY—LIEN—EXPENSES OF UNLOADING CARGO.

1. Where a charter-party specified that the charterer should pay demurrage for detention of the vessel, "provided such detention shall happen by default" of the charterer, and the master having delivered his deck load at one dock, was required by the charterer to deliver the rest at another (which was according to the custom of the trade), and lost several days in getting there by reason of the weather, held, that no demurrage could be recovered under the charter for such detention, nor for Sundays.

Woodruff, 19 Fed. 138. Cited, but not followed, in McLeod v. Six'een Hundred Tons of Nitrate of Soda, 55 Fed. 530, 531.]

2. Where the charterer had men and carts at the dock on a specified day to receive the cargo, but the vessel did not arrive till two days after, and then the master, without notice to the charterer, discharged the cargo and employed persons to cart it from the side of the vessel up the wharf and there to pile it, held, that the master could not throw upon the charterer this additional expense, without having first notified him of his intention to land and remove the cargo at the charterer's expense.

[Cited in Addicks v. Three Hundred and Fifty-Four Tons Crude Kainit, 23 Fed. 729.]

This action was brought by John Arnold, the owner of the schooner Mary E. Taber, to enforce an alleged lien upon a cargo of wood transported in that vessel from Holmes' Landing to the port of New York under a charter made with Bonnel, the claimant of the cargo. The charter-party provided, among other things, for certain lay days in loading and discharging, and for demurrage at a certain rate, to be paid for every day's additional delay, "provided such detention shall happen by default of the party of the second part" —the charterer. The claim was for $1,121.50, freight and demurrage, and $72.25, disbursements. Of this sum, $772, not really in dispute, had been paid by order of the court after the commencement of the action, and the controversy was only as to the demurrage and the disbursements.

P. C. Crooke, for libellant.

Benedict, Tracy & Benedict, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. Under the proofs in this case the objection to the four days' demurrage while loading, was properly abandoned. To that the libellant is clearly entitled. He is also, in my opinion, entitled to demurrage on the discharging, but not to the full amount claimed. By the custom of the trade, as conceded here, the vessel was bound to deliver the cargo at different places in the port, if requested. The deck load was accordingly delivered at the foot of Canal street, and the remainder at Clinton Avenue dock. No objection was made to going to Clinton avenue, but, on the contrary, the master, rejecting the charterer's offer to get a tug, expressly undertook to procure a tug for himself and tow there from Canal street. Some days were lost, however, in getting there because, as the master says, of the weather. This delay was not caused by any default on the part of the charterer, and under this contract, neither that portion of the detention, nor the detention of Sundays, can be charged to him. 1 Pars. Mar. Law, p. 265; Sprague v. West [Case No. 13,255]; Towle v. Kettell, 5 Cush. 18.

One day was also lost by reason of the vessel being aground when ordered to go to Canal street, which must be borne by the libellant. There was some delay at Canal street, which the claimant insists should also be charged to the libellant upon the ground that, by reason of being aground when he received orders, he lost his turn at Canal street. But the delay in getting to Canal street did not, as it appears, prevent the vessel from getting a berth there and being ready to discharge as soon as she arrived. The only reason why she did not then discharge was, because the dock was full of wood which it was necessary first to remove. The master testifies that this wood which filled the dock at Canal street was not discharged from any vessel which arrived after he had notice to proceed there, and this evidence does not seem to be overborne by the testimony of the claimant. The burden of excusing the delay in receiving the cargo at Canal street was upon the claimant, and no person having been produced from the dock to contradict the evidence of the master, I shall hold the claimants to be responsible for that delay. According to these views the libellant is entitled to recover, in addition to the four days in loading, three days' demurrage in the discharging.

As to the disbursements claimed, the facts are these. On Saturday the charterer designated Clinton avenue as the place of discharging the remainder of the cargo, and the master then undertook to procure a tug and be towed there; and on that day the charterer had men and carts at Clinton Avenue dock to receive the cargo on its arrival. The vessel did not proceed to Clinton avenue until just at night on the following Monday. On Tuesday the berth was occupied so that no cargo could be discharged, and on Wednesday, in the absence of the claimant, and without further notice to him, the master began to discharge the wood upon the wharf, and also employed persons to cart it from the vessel's side up the wharf and then pile and cord it.

The wharf is a long one, where cargoes can only be discharged at the end, and the master testifies: "I carted it for my own necessity, to make room for landing, as a canal boat was discharging at the same time. It would have filled up the wharf, if I hadn't carted it up the wharf. There was no other practicable way. I paid for carting and cording the wood up, $72.25."

This sum is claimed to be recoverable in this action upon the grounds that the disbursement was made necessary by the charterer's selection of such a wharf as the place of unloading.

But the non-delivery of this cargo on Clinton Avenue wharf upon the arrival of the vessel there, did not arise from any peculiarity in the wharf or any permanent obstruction which rendered a landing in the usual manner, within a reasonable time, impossible or improbable. It was simply a case of delay on the part of the charterer to take the wood as fast as landed. For this delay, the charter-party provided, and a compensation for it was fixed, and a lien on the cargo created for the amount. Before the master could justly cast upon the charterer the additional expense of carting away and cording the wood, it was incumbent on him to give a further notice to the charterer of his intention to land and remove the wood at the expense of the charterer. The Stephen Crowell [Case No. 13,362], Betts, J., 1859; Blossom v. Smith [Id. 1,565], Nelson, J., Oct., 1856. It is not pretended that any notification of such intention was given in this case, and in the absence of any such notice, I must reject the claim for these extra disbursements, which are not shown to have resulted in any benefit to the claimant, and which arose from the master's taking upon himself a labor not cast upon him by the contract, nor necessary to enable him to reap the full benefit of his charter.

This decision I prefer to rest upon the view here taken of the shipmaster's duty, rather than upon the ground that the disbursement was for service in the nature of stevedore service, and so, according to the decisions, not recoverable in a court of admiralty. But it is proper to add, that a claim for like disbursements was held by Judge Betts, in the case of Goughran v. One Hundred and Fifty-Seven Tons of Coal [Case No. 5,634], 1858, not to be enforceable in the admiralty. See, also, Regan v. The Amaranth [Id. 11,664], Hall, J., 1859.

A decree will accordingly be entered in favor of the libellant for the freight and seven days' demurrage according to the rates of the charter-party, with interest, less the sum paid by order of the court.

A reference may be had to ascertain the amount, if it be not agreed on by the parties.

COLLISION IN EAST RIVER — SAILING VESSELS IN NARROW CHANNEL—DANGEROUS MANOEUVRE.

1. A vessel, sailing free, and meeting a vessel beating, has no right, by going ahead, instead of astern of the vessel beating, to compel the latter to go about before beating out her tack.

2. Where, in a narrow channel, a sloop sailing free, and able to take either side of the channel, met two schooners beating close to each other, and taking the chance of passing them before or after they should tack, attempted to pass ahead of them, and was in the act of passing, where she could neither luff nor keep off, when the rear schooner came into the wind, and so was run into by that schooner: Held, that the sloop was in fault for placing herself in such a position, when she had no room to pass. She should have gone astern of the schooners before they tacked.

[Cited in The City of Alexandria, 44 Fed. 361.]

[A collision occurred on September 20, 1868, in the East river, N.Y., between Blackwell's Island and Long Island between the schooner Mary Eveline and the sloop Ethan Allen. The schooner was damaged and the sloop sunk and so injured as to be unfit to repair. Henry B. Merrill and others, owners of the Ethan Allen, filed their libel in rem against the Mary Eveline, John Petty and others, claimants, in the district court for the Southern district of New York. Petty and others, owners of the Mary Eveline, filed their libel in personam against Merrill and others in the district court for the Eastern district of New York. By agreement of counsel the two cases were tried in this court together.]

F. A. Wilcox and W. R. Beebe, for the Ethan Allen.

R. C. Huntley, for the Mary Eveline.

BENEDICT, District Judge. These are cross-actions; one brought in the Southern district of New York, by the owners of the sloop Ethan Allen to recover the damages caused by a collision between that sloop and the schooner Mary Eveline, which occurred in the Narrows, between Blackwell's Island and Long Island, on the afternoon of the 20th of September, 1868; the other brought in this district by the owners of the Mary Eveline to recover the damages sustained by their vessel in the same collision.

The actions were tried together before me, and the following facts were made to appear: The wind, at the time of the collision, was a strong sailing breeze, blowing six to eight knots from the westward; the tide was two hours ebb, the weather fair. The schooner Mary Eveline, with a reef in her mainsail, was beating toward New York, between Blackwell's Island and Long Island, and was just behind, but gaining upon the schooner Charles Hawley, a vessel also beating in the same direction. On the last tack before the collision, both the schooners tacked close to the Long Island shore, and stood over for a point below the coal dock, and nearly opposite the lunatic asylum, on Blackwell's Island, the legs being nearly equal. When near the Blackwell's Island side, the Hawley again tacked, and filled away up on her starboard tack, and the Mary Eveline, which was at the time very near, swung close to her stern, her larboard fore shrouds just clearing the Hawley's boom, and so she came up to the wind in the act of tacking. At this moment, the sloop Ethan Allen was passing up the Narrows close to Blackwell's Island, with her main-sheet off full-length, her boom off to port—her main peak slacked a little, her main-topsail clewed up and hanging, and was struck by the Mary Eveline, just as the latter came up to the wind, the Eveline hitting the Ethan Allen, at the starboard cat-head, the jib-boom of the Eveline going between the mast and the lee-rigging of the Allen. The blow caused the Allen to sink in a few moments, and injured the Eveline to a considerable amount.

It is obvious from this statement that, according to well-settled law, the burden is upon the Ethan Allen to show a good reason for not avoiding the Mary Eveline. This she has endeavored to do. She shows very satisfactorily that she could not have avoided the Mary Eveline by keeping away, for she was on a course as close to the west shore, as her boom would permit at that point; and, moreover, if she had kept off, she would have been in danger of receiving the blow on her broadside. She also shows that it was impossible for her to have avoided the Mary Eveline by porting after the Hawley luffed, as the three vessels were situated. But she fails to justify placing herself where she could neither port nor keep off to avoid the Eveline, but, of necessity, must strike that vessel without any false manoeuvre on the part of the latter. A fault is charged upon the Mary Eveline in the pleadings, that she stood on too far to leeward of the Hawley, whereby the Ethan Allen was prevented from passing her. But the evidence shows that the Eveline tacked about in the wake of the Hawley. The order, "Hard-a-lee," was given on the Eveline, as her fore shrouds cleared the Hawley's boom, and the fore sheet was at once let go. The Eveline was entitled to beat out her tack, and was compelled, by her proximity to the Hawley, to swing round her stern, and she had the right to do this in the way she did.

The Ethan Allen, by passing ahead, instead of astern, sought to force the Eveline to tack to the east of the Hawley, or run the risk of hitting the Allen when she passed. Whereas, the Eveline, being close-hauled, should have been left to beat out her tack and the Ethan Allen should have kept out of her way by passing astern on the Long Island side instead of attempting to pass ahead of the schooners, and on the Blackwell's Island side. She had a fair and full breeze, which enabled her to stem the tide, and was carrying her at the rate of some three miles an hour by the land. She saw the schooners beating down, and when they stood over from the Long Island shore upon their larboard tack, she had then two courses open; one to hug Blackwell's Island, trusting to the chance of passing the schooners before or after they should tack at Blackwell's Island. The other to luff out into the stream, and pass the schooners on the Long Island side. It is clear that the latter was the proper course, and that she could thus have avoided all danger of collision.

It was urged upon the argument that, in such a tide, the sloop could not, with safety, leave an eddy, which is supposed to make along Blackwell's Island, and attempt to pass up in the tide-way; and, inasmuch as she could not stop, must be held free from fault. No evidence in the case sustains this position, and I have no doubt that she could have luffed out into the stream without difficulty or danger.

In the absence of any evidence tending to show such a course to have been impracticable, I hold the sloop to be in fault for not thus avoiding the Eveline.

Let the decree in the action of John W. Petty v. Henry B. Merrill be for the libellants, with an order of reference to ascertain the amount; and, in the action of Henry B. Merrill against the Mary Eveline, let the libel be dismissed, with costs.

[NOTE. Appeals in each of these cases were taken by the owners of the Ethan Allen to the circuit court. The decree in the case in the Eastern district (Petty v. Merrill) was modified by the deduction of one item of damage claimed (Case No. 9,212), and a final decree affirming the district court was then entered for $1,292.81 (case unreported). From this decision an appeal was taken to the supreme court, where the case was dismissed, Mr. Justice Clifford delivering the opinion, for want of jurisdiction, the amount decreed being less than $2,000. Merrill v. Petty, 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 338.

The case in the Southern district was heard in the circuit court on November 20, 1870, and the decree dismissing the libel was affirmed. Decree formally entered on February 1, 1871 (case unreported). From this decree likewise an appeal was taken to the supreme court, which reversed the decree of the circuit court. Mr. Justice Hunt, delivering the opinion, dismissed the libel, and directed that a decree be entered in favor of the libelants, the owners of the Ethan Allen. 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 348.

In the case of Petty v. Merrill in the circuit court for the Eastern district, the defendants, Merrill and others, owners of the sloop Ethan Allen, moved after this last judgment of the supreme court for a rehearing in the circuit court. This motion was denied. Case No. 11,051. The case of the Mary Eveline was again heard in the Southern district upon the question of interest upon the items of damage, and for expenses incurred in raising vessel. Id. 9,212.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 13, 1878.

COLLISION — DAMAGES—FULL VALUE OF VESSEL—INTEREST ALLOWED—RATE PER CENT.

1. Where, in a suit in admiralty, for a loss by a collision, items of damage are allowed as for a total loss, interest is to be allowed at 6 per cent., from the date of the loss, and not at 7 per cent.

2. Where an allowance is made for the full value of a vessel sunk and lost by a collision, as for a total loss, the expense of raising the vessel, to ascertain the extent of the loss, is a proper charge.

In admiralty.

Richard H. Huntley, for libellants.

Franklin A. Wilcox, for claimants.

HUNT, Circuit Justice. After listening to the arguments of the counsel for the respective parties, I have carefully perused the testimony presented to the commissioner to whom it was referred to ascertain the damages sustained by the libellants by reason of the collision set forth in the libel. As the result of my examination, I overrule absolutely all of the exceptions to the report of the said commissioner, except the tenth exception. The tenth exception is, that "the commissioner reports interest on such erroneous findings at seven per cent., when he should not have reported any interest, or not to exceed six per cent., on the amount of the damage, when properly found." The items allowed by the commissioner amount, in the whole, to $4,454 75, and, with one exception, are as for a total loss. The item forming the exception consists of "cost of raising the vessel, $1,000," which is for money expended. This item is immediately followed by a credit of $550, "cash from sale of the sloop," which, it is proven, was deducted from the $1,000. This makes the exception so trifling that we are justified in looking at the whole allowance of $4,454 75 as one for a total loss. Upon this aggregate the commissioner allowed, as interest, the sum of $1,484 35, being at the rate of seven per cent. from the date of the collision and loss to the date of his report.

In allowing interest at the rate of seven per cent., for the damage sustained, as upon a total loss, I think the commissioner erred. The rate in such cases is established, in admiralty, at six per cent., and the exception under consideration is allowed, unless the libellants shall, within ten days after the entry of the order in pursuance of this opinion, file their stipulation deducting one-seventh of said interest, to wit, the sum of $212 05, from the decree to be entered in this case. If such stipulation be filed as above provided, the said tenth exception is overruled. This point is decided after a conference with Judge Blatchford, and with his concurrence and approval. See The Aleppo [Case No. 158]; Lincoln v. Claflin, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 132, 139; Hemmenway v. Fisher, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 255, 259; Allen v. Mackay [Case No. 228]; Egbert v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. [Id. 4,305].

When the point was started, that there could be no charge for raising a vessel, where the owner was allowed its full value, as upon a total loss, I was somewhat impressed with it. But, both the authorities and the principle of the cases are clear, that, when the vessel is raised for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of the loss, although it turns out that the loss is total, the charge is a proper one. There is, in many cases, no other mode in which it can be determined, whether the loss is total or partial, and a recovery as for a total loss oftentimes could not be had without incurring the preliminary expense of raising the vessel. The value of the raised vessel, in the present case, was credited to the expense of raising her. The America [Case No. 285]; The Falcon, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 75; The Clyde, Swab. 23; The Nebraska [Case No. 10,076].

Let an order be entered in accordance with this opinion.

[This was a libel against the derelict ship Mary Ford to recover salvage. Thomas McDonnough, British consul, appeared as claimant in behalf of British subjects, and J. B. Thomas Dannery, consul of the French republic, claimed the ship in behalf of said republic by right of capture by a French fleet.]

On the 4th of November, 1794, the owners and crew of the ship George, filed a libel in the district court of Massachusetts, in which they set forth: That the said ship George was an American vessel, owned and navigated by American citizens, loaded with a very valuable cargo, principally on freight, and bound from Virginia for Rotterdam; and that on the second day of October last, on the high seas, in latitude 44° and longitude 40°, they fell in with the ship Mary Ford, which they found utterly deserted, and abandoned, without any person on board, and in a most perilous state. That the captain and crew of the said ship George, took possession of the Mary Ford, and with the intention of saving the said ship and her cargo, the mate, and three of the said crew, entered on board the Mary Ford, and at great peril of their lives, and suffering great hardship, with the assistance of two men from a fishing vessel, whom they hired, brought her into the port of Boston; whereupon they pray that the said ship and cargo, may be adjudged to them. On the 5th of November, 1794, Thomas M'Donnough, consul of his Britannic majesty, for the states of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut and New Hampshire, filed a claim in the district court of Massachusetts, and suggested, that the ship Mary Ford, and her cargo, at the time she was taken possession of by the crew of the ship George, was, and, now is, owned by certain merchants, subjects of his said Britannic majesty, and prayed that the same might be delivered to him, in behalf of said owners on the payment of a reasonable salvage, or, if sold, that the proceeds thereof might be delivered to him, in behalf of said owners, deducting therefrom such salvage, with costs and charges. On the 2d of December, 1794, J. B. Thomas Dannery, citizen and consul of the French republic, resident at Boston, in behalf of said republic, and the citizens thereof immediately concerned, likewise filed a claim for the said ship Mary Ford, and her cargo; and suggested, that the said ship and her cargo, on the twenty-eighth day of September last, were the property of some of the subjects of the king of Great Britain; and afterwards, on the same day, between two and three o'clock, in the afternoon, on the high seas, were attacked, subdued, and taken by a squadron of ships, to wit, the Filaburtier, Charant, Postilion, Semiellante, Jean Bart, and Ranger, all in the public service of and belonging to the French republic, commanded by Commodore Vil Maudarine; and that the French republic, and all the citizens thereof, were then, and still are, at open war with the king of Great Britain, and all his subjects; and that some of the seamen of said squadron, entered on board the said ship Mary Ford, took compleat and entire possession of her, and took and brought away the British captain and seamen of said ship, and still hold them prisoners of war; and that they took and brought away the papers belonging to her;—by all which, and the laws of nations, the said ship Mary Ford, and her cargo, became the property of the French republic and the captors, by the rights of war. The said last mentioned claimant further suggested, that afterwards, on the twenty-ninth day of the same September, about three o'clock in the afternoon, the said ship and her cargo, by order of the commodore of said squadron, from an apprehension of weakening his force, were left at sea from necessity. The said consul prays a restoration of the said ship and cargo, to be adjudged to him, to the use of the French republic, on his paying reasonable salvage, with costs and charges, or that the said ship and cargo may be decreed to be sold to the use of the French republic, and her citizens concerned, after paying such salvage, costs and charges.

The facts which appear in evidence in this case are, that the Mary Ford and her cargo were, before the twenty-eighth day of September, the property of certain British subjects; that she was bound on a voyage from the West Indies to London;—that, on that day she was attacked on the high seas by the squadron mentioned in the claim of the consul of the French republic, or one of the ships belonging to the same to which she struck;—that an officer and some of the crew of one or more of the ships of said squadron entered on board, took out her captain and all her crew, and the greatest part of the ship's papers, and that she sailed some time, probably more than twenty four hours, with said French crew on board her, in company with said squadron, and was then left by order of the commander of said squadron, who directed her to be burnt; that some attempts were made unsuccessfully to effect this purpose;—that several British vessels had been captured and manned by said squadron, and many of the people of the squadron were sick, and incapable from that cause to do duty;—that from an apprehension of weakening his force, the said commander had given the said orders; that the said ship George, met with the said Mary Ford at the time and place mentioned in the libel, and brought her and her cargo into the harbour of Boston under the circumstances set forth in the libel;—the ship Mary Ford and her cargo have been sold by order of the court, and with the consent of all parties.

LOWELL, District Judge. The libellants have prayed, that the whole of the ship and cargo should be decreed to their use. There have been times in the history of nations, in which vessel and goods, left by necessity on the high seas, have been decreed the property of the finders; and where wrecks on the shore have been with-held from the original proprietors, by the sovereigns of the country, or some great man, on whose lands they have happened to be cast: but in very early times, they have, in both cases, been considered as the property of the original owner. Several of the Roman emperors made their edicts and decrees, for the preservation of such property, and the restoration of it; and for a long time, the law of nations has been settled on principles consonant to justice and humanity, in favour of the unfortunate proprietors; and the persons who have found and saved the property, have been compensated by such part thereof, or such pecuniary satisfaction, as the laws of particular states have specially provided, or, in want of such provision, (as the writers on the law of nations agree) by such reward as in the opinion of those who, by the municipal laws of the country, are to judge, is equitable and right. In our country, no special rule being established, this court is to determine what, in such case, is equitable and right. The rule in estimation, which ought, in my opinion, to be adopted, would be to give, if possible to ascertain it, such compensation or reward as would be sufficient inducement to engage reasonable persons, to encounter the peril and expense of the undertaking; what this may be, must, in almost every case, depend on the estimation which the judge, who is to decide, may make of the expense, the labour, the peril, and the actual suffering of those, by whose exertions the property is saved. And, as several of the most important of these are really mental, to which no measure of weight or capacity can be actually applied, it is probable, different persons would vary considerably in their estimation of them. It may, therefore, be a thing to be wished, that every nation would make, at least, some general rules for determining such cases: but as there are none established in this country, I am bound to exercise my own judgment, in determining what is a just and equitable compensation. Admiralty courts having the thing saved under their controul, may either adjudge a portion of such thing to the persons who have saved it, or a sum of money to be paid by the proprietor, or from the produce of the thing sold. And in either case, the same principle ought to operate, and such parts of the thing saved, or sum of money, be decreed to those who save it, as may fully compensate them, and will encourage others to like efforts. In this case, the Mary Ford, when found, was at the mercy of the seas, her sails and rigging partly taken away or lost; very little or no provisions on board her; the George was bound on a foreign voyage, with a valuable cargo, and it does not appear that she had any supernumerary hands; those who undertook to carry her into port, found her greatly disabled and difficult to manage; the risque of their lives must have been considerable, and their exertions great. I think few cases will happen, when the compensation ought to be higher.

Under all circumstances, therefore, I am of opinion, that one third part of the gross proceeds of the value, ought to be paid to the owners and crew of the ship George, for salvage of the said ship Mary Ford and her cargo, and in full compensation of their services, peril and expenses, in the following proportions which have been since settled by three merchants, named by them, and appointed by the court, viz.—to the owners of the George, nine thousand five hundred and eighty dollars, and twenty-eight cents, being two third parts of the sum decreed for the owners of the George and her crew, after deducting three hundred and seventy dollars and forty-two cents, for the owners, for expenses incurred and paid by them, on the joint account of the owners and the crew —and the remaining one third, viz. four thousand seven hundred and ninety dollars and fourteen cents, to the captain and crew of the George, in the following proportions, viz. to the captain, eleven hundred and fifty-six dollars and twenty cents—Lemuel Foster, eight hundred and twenty-five dollars and ninety cents—John Classin, four hundred and ninety-five dollars and fifty-four cents—five seamen, three hundred and thirty dollars and thirty-six cents each—one other, two hundred and eighty-nine dollars and seven cents—the cook, two hundred and forty-seven dollars and seventy-seven cents—and the boy, one hundred and twenty-three dollars and eighty-six cents.

The next question is, to whom shall the residue be decreed? To settle this question, passages have been read from many books written on the laws of nations, and others in which the municipal regulations, and decisions of several nations have been reported or commented on; and which have been supposed to be applicable to this case. The gentlemen who have been of counsel for the parties, have ingeniously supported their respective claims; I have, I trust, carefully perused their authorities and attended to their arguments;—very few of their authorities appear to me to apply; their arguments have been pertinent. I lay out of the case, the whole doctrine of postliminy, as applied to re-captures, which I consider as depending on the municipal regulations of states, which every sovereign has a right to make, as far, at least, as their own citizens only, are concerned, in such manner as may appear to them best. Under this head, though blended by some writers with the law of nations, are to be placed the regulations made, variously however, by the European nations, and the late congress of the United States, by which the property is divested from the former owners, by capture, after twenty four hours possession by the enemy; and all other arbitrary rules, made to settle questions of like nature; also, all questions about total and partial losses on policies of insurance. I embrace as sound doctrine, the principle, that neutral nations ought not to decide respecting the lawfulness or unlawfulness of capture, if it appears that the captor, and the nation from whom the property is taken, are at war with each other, and the captors or their vendees, are in possession of the property, save where the territorial rights of the neutral, or the rights of their citizens, are involved in the question; and that neutrals are always to take the existing state of things as right; so that if either of the powers at war, or those to whom they have transferred it, are in possession of a thing taken from their enemy in war, neutral powers are to suppose them lawfully possessed, and ought not to enquire how long, or under what circumstances, they have possessed them. To interfere and decide in such cases, must necessarily imply a partiality contrary to the idea of neutrality; for, they must either give greater firmness to the capture by deciding it to be lawful, or weaken and render it less secure, by determining it to be unlawful. Neither are neutral powers to give aid to either party, by conducting their prizes for them, when they are too weak to protect and conduct them.

These principles, I think, will serve as a guide to a decision in this case.—Neither of the belligerent powers was in possession of this property when found;—the British claimants say, it has been theirs;—this is admitted by the French claimants;—and we have evidence of this fact by the construction of the ship which is in our sight, by the cargo on board, and divers ship's papers which were found with her. The French claimants say, we took her in open war,—we firmly possessed her,—and she ought to be restored to us. The reply in behalf of the British claimants is, you did not complete your capture; you did not firmly possess her;—you were too weak, consistent with other views you held more important, to retain her. Is it necessary that we should decide these questions between them? Shall we try the legality of the capture, and decide the firmness of the possession? Will it not be to aid, to make the capture and possession firm and legal, which is said to be incomplete? The French claimants say, we were under apprehension of weakening our force and so left her from necessity. The vessel had been British,—of this, there is no question: did she by capture and firm possession, according to the law of nations, become French? Of this there is at least a doubt. On considering the whole matter, I do adjudge, order, and decree, that one third part of the money, arising from the sales of the ship Mary Ford and her cargo, be paid to the persons who saved them, in the proportions before mentioned. And that the duties and all other costs and charges be first deducted from the other two third parts, and the residue remain in court for the use of the British owners of said ship and cargo, or such other persons, who may derive right thereto from them, when the same shall be ascertained in court.

From the decree of the district judge, so far only as it respects the British owners, the French consul appealed, and the appeal being argued before the circuit court, the following decree was there pronounced, (LOWELL, District Judge, declining however to give any opinion:)

CUSHING, Circuit Justice. The court having fully heard the parties on the appeal in this case, by their counsel, it appears that the said ship Mary Ford and her cargo, being the property of some British subjects, were, on or about the 28th day of September, A. D. 1794, captured on the high seas, by a French squadron of ships, under the command of Commodore Vil Maudarine, and were taken into actual and quiet possession of said fleet, and so held for above twenty-four hours, and were then left on the high seas, without any hands aboard, after some unsuccessful attempts, by his order, to burn her, which was in consequence of many of the people of his squadron being sick, and incapable of doing duty, and from an apprehension of weakening his force in parting with any of his people, to keep on board and to conduct the said ship Mary Ford. That the said ship George, met with the said ship Mary Ford, and brought her and her cargo into the harbour of Boston, as set forth in the libel; not with intent to aid either party, in the war subsisting between the French republic and the British nation, but to save the property from absolute loss, or in expectation of proper compensation for the trouble. On which case the operation of the law of nations appears to the court to be, that by the said capture, the property became immediately the captor's. The questions about firm possession, appearing to relate chiefly, if not only, to cases of postliminy or recapture, or to that of a neutral vendee; things which 'tis apprehended have no place in this cause; and about which the municipal laws and regulations of different countries are very different.

The property, then, in this case, becoming the captor's immediately by conquest, and the right of war, must so continue, until divested by recapture, or by some legal means or act to that effect. And it is not conceived, that the abandoning the ship from the occasion stated in the evidence, could amount to a recapture, so far as to invest the property in the original owners, or prevent the captors from reclaiming the possession, when opportunity offered at any time previous to a recapture. It is, therefore, considered and decreed by the court, that the decree made in the district court, as far only as it decrees, that the said residue of the said two third parts of the money arising from the sales of the said ship Mary Ford and her cargo, remain in court for the use of the British owners of the same ship and cargo, or such other persons who may derive right thereto from them, when the same should be ascertained in court, be, and hereby is, reversed. And it is now further adjudged and decreed by this court, that the same residue of the said two-third parts of said money, remain in court for the use of the French republic, and those concerned in said capture.

From this decree of the circuit court, the British consul appealed; but the appeal being disallowed, the proceedings were removed into the supreme court by writ of error; and the plaintiff assigned for error the decree in favor of the French claimants, and also the disallowance of his appeal: the defendant pleaded in nullo est erratum, and thereupon issue was joined.

Wm. R. Hackley and S. J. Douglas, for libellants.

Winer Bethel, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. This ship, laden with cotton, from New Orleans bound to Trieste, was lost on Keysal Bank. The mate with four men, at the request of the master, crossed the gulf in an open boat, and brought information of the ship's condition to the wreckers in this port. Eight wrecking vessels, within a few days proceeded to the wreck, and saved the ship's materials and nine hundred and seventy bales of cotton. The ship's materials and two hundred and seventy three bales of the cotton have been sold; the residue of the cargo and materials saved is $35,364.37. These services were mostly rendered in bad weather, and under circumstances of some exposure and risk to the salving vessels; and, in my judgment, thirty six per cent. on the value is a reasonable salvage except as to the Relampago, which vessel ought to be allowed forty-five per cent. on the amount saved by her.

The services of the mate and the four men in crossing the gulf in an open boat to procure assistance were extraordinary and beyond the line of their duty, and entitle them to compensation. One hundred dollars to the mate and fifty to each of the men is a reasonable compensation.

BETTS, District Judge. The libel of information charges that the above vessel and cargo were captured, as lawful prize of war, March 24, 1863, on the Atlantic Ocean, off New Inlet, North Carolina, by the United States steamer Mount Vernon, and sent into this port for adjudication. The libel was filed April 3d, and process of attachment, and a monition thereon, were on the same day issued, and were returned in court on the 21st of the same month. On the 28th of April, 1863, separate parties intervened as owners of the vessel and cargo, and filed, by the same proctor, distinct claims and answers to the libel, each denying that the vessel and cargo are prize of war, and each also giving detailed allegations and statements, as by way of special plea, substantially with common averments. Proofs were taken in preparatorio before the prize commissioners on the 8th and 9th of April, 1863, and the case was submitted to the court for decision, on written briefs and points, by the counsel for the respective parties, on the 28th of May thereafter.

The vessel and cargo having been captured by a blockading vessel, near the land, and on a course to the blockaded port, the claimants are called upon to justify her position under the circumstances. The defence is attempted to be maintained upon the documentary proofs found on the vessel, and the testimony of the witnesses examined in preparatorio, and the fitting reply to that defence is supplied by the same testimony. The vessel was of British build and ownership, as shown by a certificate of British registry to William A. Fraser, of Pictou, N. S., dated at Halifax, January 24, 1863. The only other papers produced from the prize, on her seizure, are the shipping agreement between W. A. Fraser, named as master, and five men, dated at Halifax, January 26 and 27, 1863, for a voyage to ports in the West Indies, and back to the port of Halifax, term of time not to exceed six months; a note, indorsed thereon, of the arrival of the agreement at Turk's Island, February 25, 1863, and its deposit there, February 28; a letter of instructions, from Thomas S. Reid to Captain Fraser, of the schooner Mary Jane, dated Halifax, January 23, 1863, directing the master to proceed with his cargo to Turk's Island, as by charter party of that day, and there trade off or sell the goods shipped on the vessel, and purchase therewith a cargo of salt, and sail with the same for Halifax, any balance, after paying for the salt, to be remitted to the shipper; a clearance at the port of Nassau, for Halifax, given March 9, 1863, for 8 barrels of flour, 9 barrels of pork, 1 bucket of butter, 5 boxes of soap, 12 boxes of fancy soap, and 1,268 bushels of salt; and a custom-house certificate, dated at Turk's Island, February 28, 1863, that Captain Fraser, of the British schooner Mary Jane, having on board the above mentioned cargo, (except the salt,) had entered the same at that port, and had also cleared the same there for Nassau, with the addition of the before-mentioned quantity of salt. Fraser, the master, testifies that the vessel and cargo were captured March 24, last, in five fathoms of water, between six and seven miles north of Fort Caswell, Wilmington, N. C., and fully a mile off from land; that he owned the vessel; that she was of about 50 tons burden; that Reid, of Halifax, owned the cargo; that the vessel was sailed under a charter-party; that the vessel had bills of lading of her cargo on board when captured, all of which was taken by the captors; that he knew that Little River Inlet and the southern coast was under blockade, before he left Halifax; and that the vessel had suffered the loss of water in a storm, and was seeking the blockading squadron for relief when captured. Brown, the mate, testifies that the vessel was captured about four miles off from Wilmington; that she was bound to Halifax; that he understood she was going, when captured, to the blockading vessels to get water; that there was no charter-party signed; that he knew that the ports along the southern coast were blockaded; and that the vessel did not alter her course on seeing the blockading squadron. Power, a passenger, says that no guns were fired on the capture, except on a fort from shore; that he supposed that the vessel was bound from Nassau to Halifax; that, when she was chased by the blockading vessels, she was keeping along the land; that she then altered her course, so as to bear up towards the pursuing ships; and that he does not know whether her course was at all times towards Halifax.

This recapitulation of the occurrences of the voyage, and of the statement of the three witnesses examined, leaves, it appears to me, but one conclusion to be reasonably deduced from the facts. This small British craft started from Halifax on a trading voyage, purporting to be from her home port to Turk's Island and back to Halifax, with the instruction to dispose of her outward cargo at Turk's Island, and, out of the proceeds, purchase a cargo of salt, and bring the same back to Halifax, the balance of the proceeds, after paying for the salt purchased at Turk's Island, to be remitted to the shipper of the outward cargo. After making the run to Turk's Island, and performing her mission at that place, the vessel was cleared at Nassau, for her return voyage, on the 9th or 10th of March, and was captured off Wilmington, N. C., on the 24th of the same month, by the United States ship-of-war before named, which was guarding the blockade of that port. No log-book or other document furnishes further evidence than her clearance does of the day of her departure from Nassau, or of the course she was to pursue thence. It is to be intended that the passage was made under no circumstances of extraordinary detention or delay, and was most probably effected with all the expedition of a direct voyage. It appears, from the examination of the witnesses on board, that the vessel was discovered on the morning of the 24th of March by the capturing ship, and was immediately chased by her, when found crawling along close to the shore, bearing in towards the land, within about a mile of the fort off Wilmington, and was there captured, whilst the guns of the fort were brought to bear against the United States ship, in an attempt to cover and defend the prize with the enemy's fire. The prize was found to be laden with provisions and soap, and chiefly with commodities of the first importance to the enemy at the port she was about entering, and to the enemy in that whole section of country. She carried no letter of instruction, no invoice or bill of lading, no manifest of her cargo, and no documents in relation to the cargo or voyage, other than her clearance at Nassau. She was, as before stated, proceeding without any log-book or other memorandum of her time of departure, her destination, or the course of her route; and the only evidence given to the court, in respect to her position, is in the statement made by the master, on his examination in preparatorio, that she encountered a violent gale, after leaving Nassau, in which her water casks were stove or lost, and that he was compelled to bear away from his true line of navigation, and go in pursuit of the blockading squadron off the Carolina coast, for relief, under the necessity so incurred. He also avers that he bore up for that squadron, with the intent to speak them, as soon as they were discovered by him. Neither of the other two witnesses speak of such necessity having occurred, or states that the vessel had been put off her true course; and one of them asserts that the prize continued her way, under the pursuit of the United States ship-of-war, until the chase ended by her capture.

The case appears to me to be one of a manifest attempt by the master of the prize, under falsified papers and representations touching his voyage from Nassau, to run the blockade of Wilmington, N. C., he well knowing that the port was in a state of efficient blockade. A decree of condemnation and forfeiture against both vessel and cargo must be entered.

The counsel for the claimant, in his brief of argument, solicited leave to have a rehearing, upon further proofs, in this case. The impression of the court is, that the evidence upon the first hearing is so decidedly against the defence attempted to be established as to afford no reasonable ground for opening the case, to allow a new issue and a hearing on further proofs.

Case No. 9,215.

PLEADING IN ADMIRALTY—SWORN ANSWER—REPLICATION—PRACTICE IN ENGLISH ADMIRALTY.

1. In admiralty practice, in the absence of any specific rule regulating the proceeding, a replication is necessary to put in issue the facts set up by a sworn answer.

2. If no replication is filed, the libellant will be taken to have admitted the truth of the answer.

[Cited in Thomas v. Gray, Case No. 13,898.]

3. The method of procedure in the English admiralty, in matters of practice, and its origin and forms, considered.

4. New rule promulgated in regard to replications.

This cause was noticed for hearing and proofs. The claimants contended that, no replication having been filed to their sworn claim and answer, the libellants must be deemed to have admitted the facts set up by the answer, and that the claimants were not obliged to support it by proofs. The libellants contended that the issue was complete on the filing of the answer, unless, under peculiar circumstances, a special replication was demanded. Upon an examination of the files by the clerk, under the direction of the court, it was ascertained and reported that the general course of practice had been to file a replication, when proofs were to be taken in the cause. And such was the established practice in the old New-York colonial court of admiralty. See the Minutes, A. D. 1727, 1751, 1753, 1758.

Edwin Burr and Erastus C. Benedict, for libellants.

William S. Sears, for claimants.

BETTS, District Judge. This point of practice is not regulated by the standing rules of this court, and, accordingly, it must be governed by the principles and practice prevailing in courts of admiralty, or under the civil law, which is the common source of procedure to the forums both of this country and of England. The course of procedure in the English admiralty, which is the immediate source of our practice, is in conformity to the practice of the courts of the canon law, being administered substantially in the methods and with the formulae of the Roman law. Browne, in his treatise on Civil and Admiralty Law, adopts that principle as the basis of his work. Clerke, who is regarded as a standard authority, is the earliest authentic writer on the subject. He compiled, in Latin, a praxis for each tribunal, making that of the ecclesiastical courts the authoritative one, and refers throughout, in the other, for the rules of proceeding in admiralty, to the usages and practice of the ecclesiastical courts. No other treatises on the admiralty practice are recognized in the English court as authority. And, indeed, it may be said, that the admiralty in England appears to be governed by no determinate system of practice, but to conduct its business conformably to what is there understood to be the usage and custom of the court, evidenced by its files and archives, or by the report of the registrar.

Two modes of procedure prevail in the ecclesiastical courts—the one termed plenary, the other summary, from a distinction observed also in the Roman law. Code, 3, 9. In the first, every act in the suit is carried on with great fulness and particularity. The pleadings are on paper, and are drawn with minuteness and technical accuracy; and it is understood that any deviation from established forms, up to the final contestation of suit, vitiates the whole proceeding. 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law (Ed. 1799) 90; Consett, Ecc. Prax. 22. Summary actions are free from strictness of form. It seems that they may be conducted ore tenus, although a common usage appears to have been to exhibit short statements of the promovent's demand and impugnant's defence, in writing. 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law (Ed. 1799) 90, 136; Cockb. Ecc. Prax. 24; Consett, Ecc. Prax. 178; Wood, Inst. Civ. Law, bk. 4, c. 3, §§ 3, 5. Whether, however, the proceedings in summary causes are oral or written, the like order and rules of pleading are to be observed as in plenary suits. "In omnibus est petendum per procuratores, etc., ut in titulo de contestatione litis in causa plenaria." Clerke, Ecc. Prax. tit. 34. When an issue is to be formed in the nature of the general issue at law, it is called, contesting the cause negatively. 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 104. Clerke, in his work, (Ecc. Prax. tit. 31,) describes the course of pleading as follows: "Sed si intendit contestari litem negative, dicendum est in hunc modum. Ego, sub protestatione de nimia generalitate, ineptudine, obscuritate, nullitate, et indebita specificatione dicti libelli, respondendo eidem, dico narrata, prout in eodem libello narrantur, vera non esse, et ideo petita prout petuntur fieri non debere, animo litem contestandi negative. Tunc actor: Libellus est articulatus, et ideo eundem in vim positionum et articulorum repeto, et per denominationem eam sic repeti et admitti peto."

This reaffirmance of the substantive matter of the libel or replication to the answer of the defendant, seems always to have constituted an essential part of the procedure to an issue, whether the court adopted the practice of the civil law, or that of the common law. And, in a formal contestation of suit, when no explicit confession of the libellant's demand was made by the defendant, a replication was deemed necessary to constitute an issue. Code, lib. 3, tit. 9, note i, by Gothofrede. When matters in bar or in avoidance were set up by an exception, the civil law provided replications, duplications and triplications, by means of which the respective parties might avoid or deny new allegations, until the subject matter was reduced to a point asserted upon one side and denied upon the other. These were rather in the nature of special pleadings at common law, than mere re-assertions of prior pleadings. Inst. bk. 4, tit. 14; Vinnius, Comm. ad. id. 856; Heinec. Inst. bk. 4, tit. 13. The pleadings would continue their counteracting allegations until both parties agreed upon some matter of law to be referred to the praetor, or some matter of fact to be submitted to the judex or judices. Heinec. Antiq. lib. 4, tit. 7; Adams, Rom. Antiq.

The canon law transferred to its tribunals the practice of the civil law, and adhered so strictly to its text as to be perplexed with regulations not adapted to the nature and organization of the new courts. And it will be found that many rules, with respect to exceptions, interrogatories, &c., would apply most awkwardly to modern courts as they are now constituted. In the preparation of the cause for proof, however, all seem to have adhered to one course. An issue of law or of fact was formed by a replication to the exception. Consett, Ecc. Prax. 87; Cockb. Ecc. Prax. 24; Gilb. Forum Rom. So, also, in the common law courts, whilst the proceedings were, in effect, ore tenus, the plaintiff narrated his case, the defendant made his defence, and the plaintiff reiterated his own allegations, when they were denied, or repelled those of the defendant, if he brought forward any forming a new point for issue. Cases in illustration of this abound in the year books and other early reports. 2 Hen. IV. 12; 11 Hen. IV. 37; 2 Hen. V. 25; 2 Rich. III. 8. A replication is necessary, in chancery, to put the answer in issue. Gilb. Forum Rom. 113; Eq. Rules Sup. Ct. U. S. 13, 25. And, even to this day, at common law, issue is not complete on filing a plea denying at large the plaintiff's ground of action, but a similiter, in the character of a replication, must be added on the part of the plaintiff.

The concurrent usages of all the courts, with respect to the necessity of a replication, show evidently that it has always been regarded as an indispensable link in the chain of procedure in all properly conducted pleadings, of whatever construction or before whatever forum. There is, in the admiralty practice, by reason of the character and effect of answers, a propriety in requiring a replication, which may not have existed in the civil law. The answer, as a pleading or method of defence, was not known to the civil law, or introduced in the early practice of the ecclesiastical courts. It was drawn compulsorily from the defendant as part of the libellant's proof, (Mitf. Eq. Pl. 199; Cockb. Ecc. Prax. 25,) and might be obtained by calling the defendant into court, and having him there interrogated by the judge to the articles of the libel, or by the defendant's giving his answers in the form of a deposition. Id. The practice of requiring an answer of the defendant, on oath, to every species of libel, seems to have been introduced by the ecclesiastical courts, and not to have prevailed generally in the Roman practice. It arose, probably, from the supposed action upon the conscience of the parties, on which the jurisdiction of those courts was administered. In the civil law, the praetor had, undoubtedly, a right to exact an oath from the defendant as to the truth of his defence. This was, however, considered as a judicial oath, and as the act of the court, to avoid frivolous litigations. Dig. lib. 11, tits. 1, 21. And, in interrogatory actions, the defendant might be required, by the party petitioning, to answer, in the first instance, on oath. But it is denied, in the notes to the Code, that a party could, of right, impose the general oath on his adversary. Gothofrede, ad. id. loc. Wood, however, supposes that the defendant answered the articles of the libel on oath in all cases. Wood, Inst. Civ. Law, bk. 4, c. 3, § 5. See, also, Gammell v. Skinner [Case No. 5,210]. Browne shows clearly, that in this there is a misapprehension of the doctrine of the civil law, and his views are supported by Gothofrede. Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 42–45, note; Dig. lib. 11, tits. 1, 21, note. And, to this practice, proceedings in England conform. Marr. Forms, 363; Consett, Ecc. Prax. p. 3, c. 3, §§ 2, 4. As no oath could be compelled until after contestation of suit, which determined what points were in controversy between the parties, and the oath was then required, not to the whole case, but to the positions or specific interrogatories propounded by the promovent, it might well be that, in the civil law, the answer was hardly regarded in the character of a pleading, and was not, necessarily, followed by a replication. Cockb. Ecc. Prax. 28. The oath of the defendant did not conclude the plaintiff, or militate against him. It does not appear to have been allowed to have the effect of testimony in behalf of the defendant himself, and was called for and employed by the plaintiff alone, in aid of the case he had not other sufficient proof to support. Clerke, Ecc. Prax. tits. 31, 34; Cockb. Ecc. Prax. 25; Consett, Ecc. Prax. p. 3, c. 3, § 2. So, also, the defendant could support his defence by exacting the answer of the plaintiff to positions or interrogatories added to the proceedings after the pleadings were complete and after issue had been formed between the parties. Neither party could demand the oath of his adversary unless he had previously himself sworn to the truth of his own pleading.

From the principles recognised in the civil law, and the early practice of the common law, the course of proceeding which afterwards was established and now prevails in chancery and in the admiralty court in this state, appears to have been moulded—that the libel sets forth the full case of the actor, and is verified by his oath when filed, and that the answer is a full reply to all its important allegations, and is also sworn to by the party putting it in. The admiralty court in this state has always recognised the answer as a competent mode of pleading matters ordinarily stated by way of exception or special plea. Colonial Court MSS. 1727, 1758. Having adopted that course of procedure in regard to the structure and manner of interposing the answer, and its effect, the courts of admiralty would, by parity of reasoning, pursue the same course of pleadings to the completion of the issue. In chancery, since the pleadings have taken the shape of a case asserted under oath on one side by bill, and denied or evaded on the other by answer, it has been held, as a fundamental principle, that the answer should be regarded by the court as entirely true, unless a replication is filed to it, and it stands contradicted by full proof. Peirce v. West's Ex'r [Case No. 10,909]; Gilb. Forum Rom. 45. This proceeds upon the ground that the plaintiff, having referred to the defendant for the verification of his charge, can only displace his evidence by full proof. Inst. bk. 4, tit. 13; Dig. bk. 44, tit. 1. By bringing a case to hearing upon the pleadings alone, the plaintiff, in judgment of law, admits every fact asserted in the answer. It is also equally well settled, that the plaintiff cannot go into proof against the answer without having taken issue upon it by a general replication. Brinckerhoff v. Brown, 7 Johns. Ch. 217; 1 Moult. Ch. Prac. 277, 299. The obvious reason of this rule is, that the defendant cannot know that his answer is controverted, and be prepared to sustain it, unless a formal issue is taken upon it. Nor even then is a party permitted, in some of our highest courts, to go into evidence without due notice to the defendant that he intends taking proofs. Eq. Rules Cir. Ct. U. S. S. D. N. Y. 73, 75, adopted January 15th, 1833. The fundamental principles of chancery practice are referred to in elucidation of those appertaining to the procedure of admiralty courts, because, originally, equity took its rules, both of decision and of action, from the civil law, and the usages in chancery supply strong evidence of the true import and spirit of those principles.

The only authorities which seem to hold that, by the civil law, a replication to an answer is an unnecessary pleading, are Wood and the Code of Practice of Louisiana. Wood is not minute or explicit in his statement of this point, and his observations ought, perhaps, to be limited to exceptions or formal pleas, and not to embrace answers as used in the civil law. He says that, with the answer, the defendant may give in his allegations to the plaintiff's libel, and that, after this, both parties prepare to produce their proof. Wood, Inst. Civ. Law, bk. 4, c. 3, § 6. From the manner in which he has represented the proceedings, it may be implied that he considered no allegation necessary on the part of the plaintiff after the defendant had put in his answer, unless new positions or interrogatories were interposed. The original shape of the libel and answer ought probably to be considered in connection with this statement of Wood. The sworn answer was, in effect, no part of the pleadings, but a portion of the evidence which the promovent presented with his proofs, and it was to be placed with and to be considered as his testimony. There might be, accordingly, no occasion or propriety in putting him to reply formally to the answer so brought in.

Article 357 of the Louisiana Code of Practice, is, "The cause is at issue when the defendant has answered, either by confessing or by denying the facts set forth in the petition, or by pleading such dilatory or peremptory exceptions as he is bound to plead in limine litis, pursuant to the provisions of this Code." Considering the petition, in that state, as equivalent to the libel in admiralty proceedings, this Code would furnish a highly respectable and enlightened exposition of what should be deemed the true spirit of the practice according to the civil law, if it were not obvious that it is more particularly modelled upon the system of French jurisprudence, than drawn directly from the civil law. Its provisions throughout conform almost in letter to the rules collected in Pothier's different treatises, or to the modifications introduced by the Code Napoleon. In relation to this point, it is manifest that both Pothier and the French Code contemplate a replication as an essential part of the pleadings to constitute an issue. "Le demandeur à qui le défendeur a signifié des défenses contre le demande par lui donnée, peut répliquer à ses défenses par un acte signifié au procureur du défendeur, mais il le doit faire en trois jours. Ces répliques, ainsi que les défenses, se fournissent par un acte signifié de procureur à procureur." Pothier, Traité de la Proc. Civ., c. 2, § 7, art. 1; Code Nap. de Proc. Civ. liv. 2, tit. 6, arts. 97, 98. "Dans les affaires qui s'intruisent par écrit, la cause sera en état quand l'instruction sera complète, ou quand les délais pour les productions et réponses seront expirés." Code Nap. de Proc. Civ. liv. 2, tit. 17, art. 343. It may be thus implied, that the Louisiana Code introduced a new rule for determining when a case shall be at issue, and is not to be regarded as an exposition of the French rule, and, through that, of the principle and mode of proceeding in the civil law.

It thus appearing, that in all courts of this class, and at nearly all periods, a replication has been deemed an essential part of the pleadings, and that there is no rule of this court dispensing with it, but that, on the contrary, the usage has been to exact it, I consider, that by noticing the cause for hearing without filing a replication, the libellant must be held to admit the truth of the answer, and cannot go into proof in opposition to it. This is a technical point of practice, touching formalities in a suit, and not the essential merits of the cause; and, to avoid all perplexity or surprise hereafter, I have directed a rule to be entered regulating proceedings in this particular. The object of the replication not being to advance any new allegation, or present an issue varying in any particular from that formed by the libel and answer, but in effect to operate as notice to the respondent or claimant that his answer will not be admitted as true, I shall leave it optional, in this case, with the libellant, either to file a general replication, or to give notice, in writing, that proofs will be offered at the hearing in opposition to the answer.

The libellant having declined going to hearing upon the pleadings alone, it is not necessary for the court to enter any special order in respect to these proceedings, and it will, accordingly, confine itself to announcing what would be the correct course of practice.

The question having arisen incidentally, without any specific motion on the part of the claimants, no costs are allowed.

NOTE. In Dunlap's Admiralty Practice, (page 198,) it is said: "A replication, even as a matter of form, is seldom filed. It has not been the practice in the district court of Massachusetts, to file the general replication to the answer." It seems, however, that in that district "answers are not required to be on oath, unless at the instance of the plaintiff." Id. p. 298. Benedict, in his Admiralty Practice (section 367), says "The libellant, if he desires to dispute the answer, files a general denial, called a replication, and the cause is at issue." "To the answer of the defendant, if the libellant does not admit its statements, he replies by a replication." Id. § 481. Judge Betts, in his Admiralty Practice, (page 50,) says: "Replications need not be filed to answers without oath, taking issues in fact to the allegations of the libel. The respondent will be required, and the libellant will be permitted, each to give testimony in support of their respective allegations, the issue being complete without any replication being filed. but the allegations of a sworn answer, responsive to the charges of the libel, will be deemed admitted by the libellant, unless, within four days from the time the answer is perfected, or from the time allowed to except thereto, he files a replication or serves on the respondent's proctor a written notice that, on the trial, proofs will be offered in opposition to the allegations of the answer. Such notice, when given, supersedes the necessity of a replication." The 88th rule of the district court for the Southern district of New York, is as follows: "The matter set up by a sworn answer, responsive to the allegations or interrogatories of the libel, shall be deemed admitted on the part of the libellant, unless, within four days from the time the answer is perfected, or from the expiration of the time allowed for excepting thereto, replication is filed, or a written notice served on the proctor of the respondent, that on the trial of the cause proof will be offered, on the part of the libellant, in opposition to the allegations of the answer. No replication need be filed for any other purpose, to an answer taking an issue in fact upon the allegations of the libel." See, also, rule 27 of the Rules in Admiralty prescribed by the supreme court of the United States.

DAMAGES IN COLLISION CASES—LOSS OF CARGO—PLACE OF SHIPMENT—CURRENCY—INTEREST.

1. The measure of damages for cargo lost by a collision, is its value at the time and place of its shipment.

[Cited in The Aleppo, Case No. 158; Dyer v. National Steam Nav. Co., Id. 4,225.]

2. Where cargo was put on board a canal boat, in Canada, to be carried to New York, and was lost in a collision on the Hudson river, the currency of the place of shipment being shown to be United States gold coin, and the cargo, in that coin, being shown to be worth a certain number of dollars: Held, that the decree for damages must be for that number of dollars.

[Cited in Baker v. Ward, Case No. 785.]

3. The interest must be allowed at the rate of six per cent. per annum.

[Cited in Parrott v. Knickerbocker Ice Co., 46 N. Y. 369.]

This case came before the court on separate exceptions taken by each of the claimants of the two vessels sued, to the report of a commissioner. The libel was filed in rem, by the firm of Gordon, Bruce & McAuliff, merchants of the city of New York, as consignees of certain barley, against the two vessels, to recover damages for the loss of the barley, caused by a collision which took place on the Hudson river between Newburgh and Cold Spring in October, 1864, whereby a canal boat on which such barley was laden was sunk. The canal boat in tow of the propeller, was on a voyage from Troy to New York. The steamboat was bound up the river, with barges in tow, one of which struck the canal boat so as to sink her. The barley was laden on board of the canal boat at St. Timothy, in Canada. On the hearing, the court decreed a recovery against both of the vessels sued, and referred it to a commissioner to ascertain and compute the amount of the damages sustained by the libellants. The barley was laden at St. Timothy, October 7th, 1864. Other barley, consigned to the same consignees, was laden at the same place at the same time on board of another canal boat, which was in tow of the same propeller at the time of the collision, and arrived safely at New York, and was sold there for $1.70 in currency per bushel of 48 pounds, about October 27th, 1864. On this basis, the commissioner fixed the value of the barley lost at $1.70 per bushel, which, for 3,480 bushels, the quantity fixed by him, amounted to $5,916.00. As the price of $1.70 per bushel at New York, included, as an element going to make it up, the usual commission of 2½ per cent. to the consignee, which he would have received for selling the barley, and the freight on the barley, the commissioner deducted from the $5,916.00, the sum of $147.90, for 2½ per cent. commission on the $5,916.00, and also the sum of $676.51 for freight, being at the rate of 19 44/100 cents per bushel, that is, 9 cents in gold per bushel, computing gold as worth 216 per cent. premium in currency at the time of the collision, the 9 cents in gold per bushel being the rate of freight which the canal boat was to receive for transporting the barley from St. Timothy to New York. These deductions left remaining the sum of $5,091.59, on which the commissioner allowed interest to the date of his report, two years and six months, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, amounting to $889.02. This addition of interest made a total of $5,980.61, which the commissioner reported as the damages. To this report the claimants of both of the vessels sued excepted, on the ground that the commissioner erred in fixing the value at $1.70 per bushel.

The claimants insisted that the commissioner should not have taken the value at New York or at the place of collision, but should have taken it at the place of shipment. The value at the time and place of shipment was shown to have been from 67 to 72½ cents per bushel of 48 pounds, in United States gold coin, which was the currency then in circulation at such place, and the currency in which barley was then bought and sold there. The libellants insisted that the value at the place of shipment was what the commissioner did, substantially, in fact, take, but that he took it in the legal tender currency of the United States, by taking such currency value at New York, and deducting commission and freight computed in the same currency. The libellants also insisted that, as they sued here, they were entitled to have the damages computed in the current currency of the United States, and that, if such damages were computed in gold and were to be discharged in currency, they would not receive indemnity. The claimants insisted that they were entitled to have the damages computed at the value of the barley in the currency prevalent at the place of shipment, and that, as that currency was United States gold coin, and did not require to be converted into such coin, as would be the case with any other foreign currency, they were entitled to have the value in dollars so ascertained stated as the damages, without reference to any premium on gold, or to the fact that the claimants could discharge such damages in legal tender currency. The claimants further insisted that, even if the value in New York should be taken, it must be the value in gold, found by reducing the currency value stated by the commissioner to gold value according to the rate of premium on gold which ruled at the time at New York. That gold value they stated at 79 1/6 cents per bushel.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The law is well settled, that, in case a contract to deliver goods is broken, the party is entitled to recover the full value of the goods at the place of delivery. And such value is to be computed in the currency prevalent at such place. This was the rule applied by Judge Shipman, in the case of The Patrick Henry [Case No. 10,805], cited in this court for the libellants. [In that case, the suit was on a bill of lading to deliver sovereigns at New York, and on proof that the sovereign was worth at that place at the time $7.05, in the currency then and there prevalent, the court decreed a recovery on that basis.][3] If, in this case, the action was on the bill of lading of the barley, for its non-delivery at New York, the proper rate of damages would be $1.70 per bushel. But, in cases of loss of cargo by collision, or other tort, the rule is equally well settled, that the value of the lost property at the time and place of its shipment is the measure of damages. In a case of illegal capture as prize, where the property is wholly lost to its owner, the damages allowed are only the prime value, or invoice price, and interest, and no supposed profits or allowance of damages, on the basis of a calculation of profits. Murray v. The Charming Betsey, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 64; Maley v. Shattuck, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 458; The Lively [Case No. 8,403]; Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 333; The Anna Maria, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 327; The Amiable Nancy, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 546, 560. The same rule of damages has been established by the supreme court for collision cases. In Smith v. Condry, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 28, a collision occurred in the port of Liverpool. The plaintiff offered to prove, at the trial, that his vessel was laden with salt, and was so delayed in her voyage by the collision, that the salt was worth considerably less at her port of destination, when she arrived there, than it would have been worth if she had not been so delayed, and claimed to recover such difference as damages. The court excluded the evidence, and the supreme court held that the evidence was properly excluded, and that, in cases of loss by collision, the injured party could not recover for the loss of probable profits at the port of destination, and that the value of the property at the place of its shipment was the measure of compensation. That was the rule adopted by this court in the case of Adams v. The Ocean Queen [Case No. 64], before Judge Shipman, November, 1866, where the commissioner, in assessing the amount of damages caused to the cargo of a vessel by a collision, took as the measure the price it would have brought at the port of destination, instead of the price paid at the port of shipment. This court held that the proper measure was the value of the property at the port of shipment, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, from the time of the collision. The circuit court, on appeal (September, 1867), affirmed this decision. As the commissioner, in the present case, did not adopt, as the measure of damages, the value of the barley at the port of shipment, in the currency then and there prevalent, the first exception of the claimants to his report is allowed. The second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth exceptions of the claimants to his report necessarily fall with the allowance of their first exception, and no decision is necessary as to the points involved in those exceptions. They are neither allowed nor disallowed, but are ordered to be stricken from the record.

The damages computed on the principles above set forth will amount to a certain number of dollars in the money of the United States, and the decree will be for that number of dollars. The case will stand the same as if the barley had been shipped from England, in which event the value of the barley there, in sterling money of Great Britain, converted into the coined money of the United States, at the commercial value of such sterling money at the time in such coined money, would be the legal measure of damages, the only difference in the present case being, that, as the currency prevalent in Canada is the coined money of the United States, it does not require to be converted into such coined money. The rule is the same as if the action were one for the breach of a contract to deliver the like quantity of barley at a foreign port, whether in England or in Canada, or for the breach of a contract for the payment of money, made abroad and to be performed abroad, in a foreign currency. In a case of the latter description, this court has held that the proper rule of damages is the commercial value of the foreign money in the coined money of the United States, without any allowance for any premium on such coined money. The Blohm [Case No. 1,556]. The fact that, under the act of February 25, 1863 (12 Stat. 345), the debtor can discharge a judgment entered for the amount of damages so ascertained by paying it in the United States notes or legal tender currency, without any allowance for any depreciation in the value of such currency or notes, cannot affect the question as to the proper measure of damages, or the proper mode of computing them. A debt contracted in the United States before such notes were made a legal tender, and payable in the United States, can be discharged by such notes, dollar for dollar, according to the tenor of the contract. Such is the law, and the privilege of so discharging any judgment which may be entered in this case for damages computed on the principles herein set forth, is one which the debtor is entitled to as an incident of the bringing of the suit in this forum. The creditor, if he comes into this jurisdiction to bring his suit, must accept the right to sue with the incident.

The ninth exception of the claimants must be allowed, as the proper rate of interest was six per cent. per annum, and not seven. [The exceptions on the part of the libellants are all of them overruled.][3]

An order must be entered disposing of the exceptions as above stated, and referring the case back to the commissioner to ascertain the damages on the principles above set forth, and report the same to the court.

[NOTE. Both parties appealed to the circuit court—the libellants on the question of damages, the respondents upon the collision. Considering further argument by the counsel necessary, the consideration of the case was postponed. Case No. 5,618.

[The circuit court finally affirmed the decree of this court (case unreported), and the cause was taken, on appeal, to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed. Mr. Chief Justice Chase dissenting. 14 Wall. (81 U. S.) 258.]

SALVAGE — AMOUNT OF PERIL — BAD WEATHER — COSTS—UNNECESSARY LIBEL.

[1. Eight vessels with one hundred and twenty men were engaged in bad and boisterous weather in saving cargo and materials of a ship lost on Alabainian Reef, under circumstances of some peril to the lives and property of the salvors, and succeeded in saving cargo valued at $50,227. Held, that the salvors were entitled to $18,468, less 36 per cent. of expenses, etc., as compensation.]

[Cited in Baker v. The Slobodna, 35 Fed. 542.]

[2. The vessels engaged in the service before the weather became bad were allowed 25 per cent. on the value of the property saved by them, as they would also share in the salvage upon all the property; the others were allowed 40 per cent. to 50 per cent. on property saved by them.]

[3. Two libels having been unnecessarily filed the increased costs thereby caused should be borne by the libelants in the second libel.]

[This was a libel by Packer Geiger and others against the cargo and materials of the ship Maryland for salvage services.]

A. Gordon, for libellants.

S. R. Mallory, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. The ship Maryland, bound on a voyage from Baltimore to New Orleans, laden with a cargo of coffee and dry-goods, got ashore upon a reef known as the "Alabainian Reef," about fifteen miles to the eastward of this place. The master, in the hopes of forcing the ship over the reef by lightening her, commenced very promptly to heave overboard cargo, but very soon discovered that the tide was falling, he ceased this operation. The wrecking sloops Mystic, Lizzy Wall, George Eldridge and Eliza, arrived at the ship soon after she had struck the reef; and their respective masters offered their assistance. The master, becoming satisfied that the ship must be lightened in order to get her off, accepted their assistance. During the night and the next morning the wreckers loaded the schooner Lizzy Wall and sloop Mystic. The wind increased, and during the next day blew violently in squalls, causing a heavy sea. The salvors succeeded in loading the George Eldridge in part, but before night many of the wrecking vessels were obliged by the violence of the wind to leave the ship and make a harbor. The schooners Champion, St. Dennis and Lafayette arrived at the ship during the night of her first being ashore. Their assistance was accepted, but as the wind had increased in violence, they were, at this stage of the business, of but little service. The ship beginning to leak, and she still being hard aground, her main and mizzen masts were cut away to ease her. In the bad weather which succeeded, notwithstanding the efforts of the salvors to keep the ship free, she finally filled with water, destroying more than half of her cargo. The ship became a total loss.

The value of the cargo and materials saved from the ship is $50,227. Eight vessels with their crews, amounting in the aggregate to about one hundred and twenty men, were employed in saving this property. The service was rendered in very bad and boisterous weather, and under circumstances of some peril and danger to the lives and property of the salvors. Under these circumstances they are entitled to a fair and reasonable compensation for their services.

I have examined the cases of the Jean Key [unreported]; The Cora Nelly [Case No. 3,217]; The Yucatan [Id. 18,194]; The New England [Id. 10,151]; and several others heretofore decided in this court; and comparing this case with those, I think the whole salvage in the present case should be $18,468, less 36 per cent. of the wharfage, storage bills for labor, &c. It is difficult to distinguish this case from that of The New England [supra] in any other particular than that a larger amount of property was saved in the case of the New England. In that case the cargo and materials saved amounted to a little over $80,000, the number of salvors was about the same as in the present case, and the weather was equally bad. The total salvage allowed in that case was $20,807. The amount of property saved in that case was greater than in this. Consequently the rate per cent. of the salvage was less than it is in the present.

In decreeing the salvage in this case a difference in the rate per cent. should be made as between the different wrecking vessels. Upon the amount saved by the Mystic, Lizzy Wall, George Eldridge and Eliza, constituting the first consort, and which was saved before the other vessels came to their assistance, I think twenty-five per cent. should be allowed. This first consort saved $13,690. This was saved before the weather had become so bad as to make it dangerous to lie near the wreck. A less rate of salvage would therefore be a sufficient compensation. But in addition to this consideration, these vessels will draw their share of salvage upon all the property subsequently saved by other vessels, whereas, the latter vessels are excluded from any participation in the salvage earned by them. The second consortship, which includes the first named vessels with the others, saved $33,635. To this consortship I think forty per cent. should be allowed, deducting, however, a proportional share of the wharfage, storage, bills for labor, &c. To the Lavinia, Champlain and the other vessels saving small amounts, fifty per cent. will be allowed. Two libels have been filed by the wreckers in this case, giving rise to two answers, and increasing the costs in the case. One libel was sufficient in the case. There was no conflict of interest, and one libel could be made to present the claims and secure the interests of all the principal salvors. The increased costs must, therefore, be paid by the libellants, and I think they should be paid by the party of libellants filing the second libel.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the libellants have, recover and receive in full compensation for their services rendered in saving the cargo and materials of the wrecked ship Maryland as follows, to wit: That the masters, owners and crews of the sloop Mystic, the schooner Lizzy Wall, the sloops George Eldridge and Eliza recover and receive three thousand five hundred and sixty-three dollars, being twenty-five per cent. upon the value of the property saved by them, deducting, however, from their salvage their proper proportion of the costs and expenses of this suit, and of the wharfage, storage and bills for labor in landing and storing the cargo. That there be allowed to the masters, owners and crews of the vessels constituting the second consortship, to wit, the Mystic, the Champion, the St. Dennis, Lafayette, Eliza, Lizzy Wall, and George Eldridge, thirteen thousand and four hundred and fifty-four dollars, being forty per cent. upon the value of the property saved by them, however deducting from the salvage their proper proportion of the costs and expenses of this suit, the wharfage, storage and bills for labor in landing and storing the property. That there be allowed to the Lavinia, Champlain, and to the several smaller boats fifty per cent. of the amount saved by them, such amounts being small and saved with much difficulty and labor. That the increased costs and expenses growing out of the filing of the second libel, or the one filed by Geiger and others, be charged to the libellants in that libel. That the residue of the costs and expenses and of the wharfage, storage and bills for labor be charged to the cargo and materials saved. That upon the payment of the aforesaid salvage, wharfage, storage, and bills for labor be charged to the cargo and materials saved. That upon the payment of the aforesaid salvage, wharfage, storage and bills for labor, the marshal restore said cargo and materials to the master of the wrecked ship Maryland, for and on account of whom it may concern.

MARYLAND v. BALTIMORE & P. R. CO.

[1 Hughes, 337.] [1]

District Court, D. Maryland. April, 1877.

RAILROAD COMPANIES — NEGLIGENCE — DEATH OF EMPLOYE—MARYLAND STATUTE.

1. Responsibility of employer for injury to employé.

2. Construction of statute for wrongfully caused death.

By the statute of Maryland, similar to Lord Campbell's act, an action is given in the name of the state, for the use of the person entitled to damages, whenever death shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would, if death had not occurred, have entitled the person injured to damages; such action to be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent or child of the person whose death shall have been so caused.

The equitable plaintiff [Anna Murtaugh] brought this action for damages for the killing of her son, an unmarried man, twenty-one years of age, by a collision of an express train of defendant, on which deceased was fireman, with a construction train, caused by a switch being negligently left open at the junction of the main track with a siding on which the construction train was standing. The proof was that the express train was proceeding towards Washington, at its usual speed of thirty miles an hour, and the construction train which had been on the main track was moved off to and on the siding in order to allow the express to pass. By negligence of the hand in charge of the construction train, the switch, having been opened to allow it to pass on the siding, was not closed afterwards. That as the express train was approaching the siding, and nearing the

Washington turnpike road, which the main track there crossed, the engineer saw the construction train on the siding, and at the moment of perceiving it his attention was necessarily directed to a wagon on the turnpike, which was approaching very near the track, and, as the train got close to the road, the top of this wagon hid from the view of the engineer the switch target until it was too late to stop, and the train ran in on the siding, crashing into the construction train, and, among other damage, killing plaintiff's son. That, but for this wagon, the engineer would have seen in time that the red side of the target was toward him, and could have stopped in time. That the place where the track crossed the turnpike was about seven miles from Baltimore. That the road was much travelled by market people, and that the engineers of trains approaching it were compelled to look out for vehicles. It was also proved that the deceased had materially contributed to the support of his mother.

It was contended for plaintiff that there was negligence on the part of the general management of the company in not providing proper precautions at the point of turnpike crossing, and at the station where the switch was, and that if these had been provided, the collision, though caused by the negligence of the hands of the construction train, would have been prevented. The defendant denied this, and also contended that if such negligence was proved, yet as the deceased had as fireman passed daily over the road, where this alleged lack of proper care in providing for safety by the general management existed, he must be taken to have known the risk and incurred it as part of his service, and that, as there was no proof he had complained of any such risk, no recovery could be had. All the cases on the subject were referred to by counsel, and defendant especially relied on Maryland decisions.

William F. Giles, Jr., and Archibald Stirling, Jr., for plaintiff.

Bernard Carter, for defendant.

GILES, District Judge, in instructing the jury, said he approved the decision in 20 Md. 220, but was not disposed fully to approve the subsequent decisions of that court to the extent to which they seemed to go on the point. That he was disposed to limit this to cases where the employé injured was managing machinery the defects of which he knew, or where the damage caused by negligence of the employer or his general agent was in some particular in reference to which the employé was chargeable with the duty of operating and reporting to the employer if any danger existed, but he would not carry the principle so far as to affect with such responsibility any employé injured by negligence of the general management of a railroad, in some matter under the scope of the general management, and which they alone controlled and determined.

On the point raised that, as the son of the plaintiff was over twenty-one, no recovery could be had, THE COURT decided that the true meaning of the statute was to give an action where an actual pecuniary damage had resulted by the death of the child, no matter what his age.

THE COURT then gave the following written instructions to the jury:

1st. If the jury shall find from the evidence in this case that, when Patrick Murtaugh was killed by the collision between a passenger train and a gravel train on defendant's road, he was a fireman in the employment of defendant, and that this collision was caused by the neglect of the conductor, engineer and flagman of the gravel train to close the switch, after they had backed said train on the siding to enable the passenger train to pass, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, against the defendant, for such injury, unless she should satisfy the jury that the defendant had not used ordinary and reasonable care in the selection of officers in charge of said train; and, as she has offered no evidence on this point, she cannot recover in this case unless she recover the second instruction of the court.

2nd. If the jury shall find from the evidence, that the siding on which the gravel train had backed is quite near the Washington turnpike road, that said road is much used by market-people with their wagons, and which is here crossed by defendant's road, and which requires the engineer of a passenger train, as he approaches the said turnpike, to give his attention to vehicles coming along the same, and that but for this necessity the engineer of the defendant's passenger train, going south, would have seen on this occasion the signal that the switch was open, and would have been able to slow his train in time to avoid the collision, then ordinary care and prudence required of defendant the appointment of a flagman, to be stationed at this junction of the two roads; and, if the jury shall find that defendant had no such officer, and that if there had been such an officer stationed at this point the collision would have been prevented, the defendant is liable in this action for such damages as she, the plaintiff, may prove she has sustained by the death of her said son.

3rd. If the jury shall find for the plaintiff, they shall give such sum as they shall find from all the evidence will be an adequate compensation for the loss of such pecuniary support as the jury shall find the plaintiff would have received from the deceased; and in making such estimate they shall consider the age of the plaintiff and the probable duration of her life.

Verdict for plaintiff for $2,500.

Case No. 9,220.

MARYLAND v. TODD.

[1 Biss. 69.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. Nov., 1854.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS — IN MARYLAND — ABSENTEES—HOW OPERATION SUSPENDED—INDIANA STATUTE—RELEASE BY ADMINISTRATOR.

1. Suit on an administrator's bond executed in the state of Maryland; plea that by the laws of Maryland no suit could be maintained on such a bond after the expiration of twelve years from the time it was executed. Replication that defendant removed from Maryland to Indiana before the twelve years had expired and before the suit was barred. Demurrer to this plea. Held: There being no provision in the law of Maryland suspending the operation of the statute as to non-residents or absentees, the removal of the defendant made no difference.

2. The operation of the statute, after it commences to run, can only be suspended by positive law, and if the time expires while the statute is in force, and before the suit is brought, the right to bring the suit is barred, and no subsequent statute can renew that right.

3. The statute of Indiana on this subject, passed in 1852, gives full effect to the statutes of other states, and places debtors removing here in precisely the same condition in which they are placed by the law of the place which governed the contract.

4. Plea setting up a release from the former administrator, without showing that full payment was made, is bad, it being a general principle that an administrator can not release or compromise a debt, except upon full payment.

5. Plea of non damnificatus can only be pleaded to indemnifying bonds.

[This was a suit by the state of Maryland, on the relation of Partridge, against Todd. The case is now before the court on demurrer.]

David McDonald, for plaintiff.

I. G. Marshal and W. McKee Dun, for defendant.

HUNTINGTON, District Judge. This action is founded on an administrator's bond, executed in the state of Maryland, in 1835, the present defendant being one of the sureties in the bond. The declaration contains five counts. The first sets up a bond and condition, and assigns three breaches. The other counts are on the penal parts of the bond only. There have been thirteen pleas filed, only part of which is it necessary to mention. The eighth plea sets up the Maryland statute of limitations, which limits suits upon administrators' bonds to twelve years "after the bond is passed," that is, after it is approved. To this plea the plaintiff replies, that the suit was not barred when the defendant left Maryland, and came to Indiana to reside. To this there is a demurrer; and this brings up the really important question in the case.

It is said that the statute of limitations of the state of Maryland has no force here, except so far as our own statute of 1852 gives it force. See Story, Confl. Law, §§ 581, 582. The general doctrine, that "the recovery must be sought and the remedy pursued within the times prescribed by the lex fori, without regard to the lex loci contractus, or the origin of the cause," is not without its exception; at least there is, says Judge Story, a distinction to be observed which deserves consideration. For example, where the lex loci contractus declares the debt extinguished, or a nullity, after the lapse of a certain period; and after the expiration of that period, the debtor removes into a jurisdiction which has a longer period of prescription, or in which there is no prescription at all; in that case there can be no doubt, according to modern authorities, that the suit is barred. Id.

Quaere. Is not a statute extinguishment lege loci equally effectual? And if not, upon what principle is it not? In the one case the right is extinguished, in the other the remedy. This is the distinction in the books, and has always appeared to me to be a distinction without a difference; for in both cases the intention of the legislature was to deny to the creditor the right, after the lapse of a certain time, to collect his debt. But the replication sets up the fact that Todd, the defendant, left the state of Maryland before the twelve years had expired, and this is the ground on which the plaintiff rests his right to recover. Does this make any difference? Could Todd, were he now to return to Maryland (having removed from there before the twelve years had expired), be sued upon this bond? Clearly he could not; for there is no provision in the statutes of Maryland which suspends the operation of the statute as to non-residents and absentees. If the debtor was in the state when the statute commenced running, and in this case the statute commenced to run when the bond sued on "was passed," according to the language of the law,—that is, when it was approved and filed by the proper authority,—it could only be suspended by positive law, and there being no law suspending the operation of the statute as to absentees, etc., it continued to run.

If the time limited by statute expires while the statute is in force, and before the suit is brought, the right to bring the suit is barred, and no subsequent statute can renew that right. McKinney v. Springer, 8 Blackf. 506; Ogden v. Blackledge, 2 Cranch [6 U. S. 272]. In this case, without reference to the statute of 1852, passed by our own legislature, it would be doubtful, upon principle, whether a suit could be maintained on this bond. But, it seems to me, this statute relieves the case of all difficulty. This is the provision (2 Rev. St. 1852, p. 77): "Where a cause has been fully barred by the laws of the place where the defendant resided, such bar shall be the same defense here, as though it had arisen within this state." No argument or exposition can add clearness to this simple provision. If it means anything, it means to give effect to the statutes of other states in regard to the remedy upon contracts made under and governed by their own domestic policy—to place debtors removing here in precisely the same condition in which the law which governed the contract and the remedy placed them; and it seems to me that this is not only law but justice.

It was deemed sound policy in Maryland to enforce a prompt settlement of decedents' estates, and they have extinguished the right to sue on administrators' bonds after the lapse of twelve years, and it will be perceived that, in this particular, this class of obligations differ from all others known to the Maryland laws.

In Horton v. Horner, 16 Ohio, 145 (decided in 1847), this same doctrine was maintained. The Ohio statute is similar, viz: "That all actions founded on a contract, made between parties resident without this state at the time the contract was made, and which are barred by the laws of such state, shall be barred when brought in this state." The facts of that case were, that one of the parties was actually a citizen of Ohio; but the contract was made in New York, and the court held that he was a "resident" of another state, within the meaning of the statute.

Assuming, then, that by the laws of Maryland, where the contract was made, this suit would be fully barred, it follows that it cannot be maintained here. The demurrer, therefore, to the replication to the eighth plea is sustained.

PRIZE—ENEMY PROPERTY—LIEN FOR OUTLAYS IN FITTING—RELIEF FROM FORFEITURE.

1. Part of the vessel condemned, under the 6th section of the act of July 13, 1861 (12 Stat. 257), as belonging to a citizen of a state in insurrection. Part of vessel acquitted.

2. The claim of the owner of the acquitted part to a lien upon the condemned part for outlays in fitting the vessel was disallowed, and the claimant was referred to the power of the secretary of the treasury, under the 8th section of the act, to remit the ferfeiture.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This is a libel of information by the United States, demanding the forfeiture of the above-named brig, under the 6th section of the act of congress of July 13, 1861 (12 Stat. 257). It is ordered by the court that three fourth parts of said brig be adjudged forfeited to the libellants with costs, and that one fourth part, claimed by James Crocker, be acquitted. The claims of Crocker for outlays in fitting the vessel are no lien in law upon the remaining three fourth parts, and whether any portion of that forfeiture will be remitted to him rests in the discretion of the secretary of the treasury, under the 8th section of the act above named. Judgment accordingly.

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Oct., 1870.[2]

FORFEITURE—SHIPPING—STATUTE—PROVISO—FOREIGN VESSEL.

1. If an information sets forth a proper cause of forfeiture within the main part of a statute, the fact that it does not allege that the case is not within the proviso, under which there was an exemption from forfeiture, does not prevent the operation of the statute.

2. If the claimant relies upon the exemption under the proviso, he must allege it. That is matter of defense to be set up by him.

3. A barque built in Canada and owned in the United States is not a vessel of the United States; nor is it a foreign vessel of the character described in the first section of the act of March 1, 1817 [3 Stat. 351].

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of Wisconsin.]

Libel for forfeiture, under the act of March 1st, 1817, against the barque for the reason that there was imported in her into this district, in 1868 and 1869, from Canada, a quantity of goods, wares, and merchandise, the product of Canada, the barque being foreign-built, and at the time of importation, wholly owned by citizens of the United States. The case was disposed of by the district court upon an exception allowed to the libel that it did not set out that either Canada or Great Britain has adopted a regulation similar to that contained in this act of congress. The court below sustained the exception and dismissed the libel. [Case No. 15,733.] The only question was, whether this ruling was correct.

The first section of the statute is as follows: "After the thirtieth day of September, next, no goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, except in vessels of the United States, or in such foreign vessels as truly and wholly belong to the citizens or subjects of that country, of which the goods are the growth, production, or manufacture; or from which such goods, wares, or merchandise, can only be, or most usually are, first shipped for transportation: Provided nevertheless, that this regulation shall not extend to the vessels of any foreign nation which has not adopted, and which shall not adopt a similar regulation."

Levi Hubbell, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Norman J. Emmons, for respondent.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. It is clear that if the information sets forth a proper cause of forfeiture, within the main or principal part of the statute, the fact that it does not allege that the case is not within the proviso will not prevent the operation of the statute. That is a matter of defense to be set up by the claimant. If he relies upon the proviso as exempting him from the operation of the main cause of forfeiture set forth in the statute, he must allege it. The construction which I place upon this statute of 1817, is that it applies in either contingency to vessels of the United States, or of foreign nations having a national character. I do not understand that the barque Mary Merritt is a vessel of the United States. It was built in Canada, and is owned by citizens of the United States. It is a settled rule that in all cases in order to give vessels a national character as vessels of the United States, and entitle them to registry, they must be built in this country. Some question has been made whether the barque Mary Merritt was not a British vessel, and various acts of parliament have been cited upon that point; but so far as I can understand the application of these various laws to this case, it cannot be considered the vessel of any foreign nation, built as it was, in Canada, and owned here. It follows, therefore, from what has been said, that the exception made to the libel should have been overruled by the district court, and therefore, the order dismissing the libel will be reversed, and the defendant have leave to withdraw his exception and answer the libel.

NOTE. It is not necessary in a libel to anticipate and deny a matter of defense. The Aurora v. U. S., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 382.

In this case, which was a libel of goods under the non-intercourse acts, objection was made to the libel on the ground that it did not negative the American property in the goods: but the court held that this would constitute ground of defense, and in no case would it be necessary to state such defense or exception.

[On appeal to the supreme court, the decree of the court forfeiting the vessel was affirmed. 17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 582.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1872.

COLLISION—BOTH IN FAULT—CLAIM FOR SALVAGE—TOWAGE—COSTS.

1. In a collision cause in which a steamer and a sailing-vessel were both found to be in fault, and the steamer, after the collision, had towed the schooner into port,—Held, an allowance might be made for towage as part of the damage suffered by the steamer, but not for salvage.

[Cited in Leonard v. Whitwill, 19 Fed. 549.]

2. When, in such a case, both vessels were injured, and there was no ground for discriminating between them, the costs as well as damages were divided.

[Quoted in Vanderbilt v. Reynolds, Case No. 16,839. Cited in Memphis & St. L. Packet Co. v. H. C. Yaeger Transp. Co., 10 Fed. 396.]

3. It seems, that if one party suffers all the damage, and both are in fault, the libellant recovering half damages, should usually recover full costs.

In admiralty.

LOWELL, District Judge. The parties have agreed to accept the assessor's report upon all matters of fact, and have submitted to me the questions of salvage and of costs. The steamer took the schooner in tow after the collision, and, still later, hired a tug that completed the service. When deciding the general merits of the case, I intimated the opinion that towage might perhaps be allowed; and I then understood that the libel for salvage would not be pressed if the steamer was found to be in fault. But my decision being that both vessels were in fault, the question has been brought up again. If the steamer had been solely to blame, there could be no claim for either towage or salvage, because all the loss which the other party had sustained, including towage and salvage, would be chargeable to the steamer; and whether she did the work herself, or paid others to do it, would be immaterial. On the other hand, if the fault were wholly that of the injured vessel, and she chose to accept salvage services, she might perhaps be bound to pay for them as such. How is it in case both were in fault? The master and crew of a vessel which has been in collision with another vessel, and has not been crippled, are morally bound to stand by and save life at least, and often to aid in saving property too, if possible. In England, a statute makes a neglect of this duty presumptive evidence of fault in respect to the collision itself; and possibly without the statute a judge might find it to be so under some circumstances. It was the practice of the admiralty before the act was passed to refuse costs to a ship in such cases, though it was otherwise blameless.

This duty cannot be said to be of strictly legal obligation; because no law has yet visited the offender with damages for a breach of it. Nor, indeed, would it be obligatory at all where life was safe, and a very great disproportion of the value of one vessel to the demurrage of the other made it inexpedient.

My view about the towage was this: It was necessary that the schooner should be towed; and, if a tug was hired and paid by either party, the towage was a part of the necessary and proper damage to be divided; and it was not a matter of importance which actually made the bargain or paid out the money. I have more doubt about allowing towage to the steamer herself; but, granting that the act was proper and necessary, and for the benefit of both parties, it seemed to me I might consider it as part of the damage which the common fault had caused to the steamer herself, and thus bring it into the aggregate of the losses. In this way the assessor has made it up. This, in effect, gives the libellants half towage, or it may be called half demurrage for time properly spent in consequence of the collision. Such an allowance may tend to render steamers more prompt to lend their aid, and thus reinforce the imperfect obligation above mentioned.

The libellants say they should likewise have half salvage. But that stands very differently. In the first place, the relations of the parties were such, as now appears, that it was for the interest of both that the damage should be diminished as much as possible. If it had been necessary to pay salvage to a stranger, both must have contributed; but that a salvage service should arise out of a disaster that was partly the fault of the salvors would be unheard of. The argument for the libellants is based upon the absence of a legal obligation to perform the service, such as prevents officers or men from being salvors of their own ship. No doubt, the usual definition of salvage would cover this case; for it was a maritime service in saving property by persons not already legally bound to its performance. This is an excellent definition. But it must not be forgotten that a salvage reward, in so far as it exceeds a mere quantum meruit for work and labor, is dependent upon a rule of public policy for the encouragement of promptness, skill, honesty, and enterprise on the part of seamen and ship-owners, and is forfeited not only by misconduct, but by incompetency, after the work is begun. I think it fairly follows, by parity of reasoning, that previous misconduct may have a similar effect. It was said that the seamen on board the steamer were not in fault, and that they at least should have salvage. But the towage here was done by the steamer: the seamen took no actual part in it of any consequence; and there is no reason to suppose they have lost any thing by the slight delay which it occasioned. Besides, where a vessel is in fault, the crew are often involved in its consequences, without any actual fault of their own. The cases are many where salvage has been lost or diminished by conduct which was really that of the master of the salving vessel only. He is the agent by necessity of the ship and all persons interested in her. If the fault had been wholly with the steamer, no discrimination could have been made in favor of the seamen to give them a reward which their vessel could not share. I do not mean to decide that individual seamen could never, under any conceivable circumstances, have salvage in such a case. The counsel for the libellants very candidly cited The Capella, 1 Adm. & Ecc. 356, which is against his recovery. I have found nothing else so directly in point.

Whether the costs, like the damages, should be added together and divided, or each should bear his own, seems to be one of doubt. Judge Sprague decided that where both parties were in fault, yet if one was very much the more so, he should bear all the costs: The Rival [Case No. 11,867]; see The Celt, 3 Hagg. 321. No question was made of the correctness of that decision, nor that the court has full legal discretion over the whole matter of costs to adapt its decrees to the equities of each case. But no facts are relied on here to take this case out of the ordinary rule, if there be one applicable to an equality of fault.

It is very difficult to find any rule from the decisions, in no one of which is there any argument or reason given at the bar or by the court. In the leading case of Hay v. Le Neve, 2 Shaw, App. 395, costs as well as damages were divided. So in The Washington, 5 Jur. 1067; while in The Wansfell, 1 Spinks, 271, costs were given to neither party. In this district we have always followed Hay v. Le Neve. Judge Davis divided the costs in a case decided in 1832: Sancry v. Farrow [unreported], and in Dimock v. Hathaway [unreported]; and Judge Sprague, in Lenox v. Winisimmet Co. [Case No. 8,248]; O'Neil v. Sears [Id. 10,530]. I did so in The Monticello [Id. 9,739], though this point is not reported, and Judge Leavitt, in Lucas v. The Thomas Swann [Id. 8,588]. On the other hand, costs have been refused to both parties in The Bedford [Id. 1,216]; Foster v. The Miranda [Id. 4,977]; The Nautilus [Id. 10,058]; The Favorita [Id. 4,694].

There is one aspect of the question which does not appear to have received sufficient attention. If the loss is all suffered by one vessel, and her owner brings his libel, he will recover half his damages; and there is no reason why he should not, in general, recover his full costs. It is the ordinary case of a prevailing party recovering less than he asks for; and if there has been no tender or offer of amends, and no equity peculiar to the individual case, it is according to the sound and reasonable law of all courts that he should recover costs. It would take a very long and uniform course of practice to establish any other rule in collision causes; and, although some of the decisions above cited were of that character, the point appears to have been overlooked. In examining some late authorities, since the above paragraph was written, I am happy to see that the recent practice in New York conforms to what I have suggested as the true rule, and gives costs to the libellant, if he alone has been injured and recovers half his loss. The Austin [Case No. 663]; The Baltic [Id. 824]; The Paterson [Id. 10,821]; The Avid [Id. 678].

Returning to the case of injury on both sides, and of cross-libels to recover them, and no very substantial difference of fault or other equity, there appears to be authority for dividing the costs, and for refusing them to both parties. The former practice, which has always been ours, seems to me quite consistent with the theory which divides the damages; and I shall adhere to it until the direct authority of an appellate court, or a very decided preponderance of general practice, shall be against it. Decree accordingly.

The MARY PAULINA.

MARDER et al. v. BOYNTON et al.

[1 Spr. 45.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb., 1843.

SEAMEN—RATIONS—BREAD—EXTRA MEAT—RECEIPT IN FULL—DOUBLE WAGES.

1. The usual standard of a full allowance of bread to a seaman is the navy ration.

2. Five pounds of bread a week, to each man, is a short allowance, within the statute of July 20th, 1790, § 9 [1 Stat. 135].

3. No over abundance of meat can be substituted for the bread required by the statute.

[Cited in Broux v. The Ivy, 62 Fed. 603.]

4. A receipt given by a seaman in full of all demands, will not bar a claim for which he has not received compensation.

[Cited in The Topsy, 44 Fed. 632.]

5. If there be a short allowance within the statute, of any one of the three articles, the seaman is entitled to the double wages.

[Cited in Collins v. Wheeler, Case No. 3,018.]

This was a libel promoted by William Marder and four others of the crew of the brig Mary Paulina, for extra wages, under the statute of July 20th, 1790 (section 9), which provides that "every ship or vessel, belonging as aforesaid, bound on a voyage across the Atlantic Ocean, shall, at the time of leaving the last port from whence she sails, have on board, well secured under deck, at least sixty gallons of water, one hundred pounds of salted flesh meat, and one hundred pounds of wholesome ship-bread, for every person on board, over and besides such other provisions, stores and live stock as shall by the master or passengers be put on board, and in like proportion for shorter or longer voyages; and in case the crew of any ship or vessel which shall not have been so provided, shall be put upon short allowance in water, flesh or bread, during the voyage, the master or owner of such ship or vessel shall pay to each of the crew one day's wages beyond the wages agreed on, for every day they shall so be put to short allowance." The libel alleges a short allowance of bread for forty days, on a passage from the Atlantic coast of Africa to Boston. It appeared that the vessel sailed from Acra, on the coast of Africa, to Prince's Island, and thence to St. Thomas' Island, (both being on the coast,) and from the latter place to Boston. The passage being fifty-seven days. On the seventeenth day out from St. Thomas, the crew were put upon an allowance of five pounds of bread, per week, to each man. This continued for two weeks, when the allowance was reduced to four and a quarter pounds; and in one week more the ship-bread was exhausted. This continued for two weeks, when they spoke a vessel off the coast of the United States, which supplied them with bread and beans. The allowance was then five pounds a week, until the arrival at Boston. It also appeared that a part of the trading cargo of the vessel was ship-bread, and that the master sold a quantity of it while at Acra.

R. H. & E. T. Dana, for libellants.
Fuller & Andrew, for claimant.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The first question which has been raised is, whether a voyage from the coast of Africa, near the equator, to Boston, is a voyage "across the Atlantic," within the meaning of the statute, or one requiring a larger supply of bread than the one hundred pounds specified in the statute. In the view I have taken of the case, it becomes unnecessary to decide that point, as I think it clear that this vessel had not even the one hundred pounds. The next question is, whether Acra, or St. Thomas, is to be deemed the "last port of departure;" and I have no doubt that it is St. Thomas. That island is to the eastward of Acra, and more distant from Boston. It was the port of destination when the vessel sailed from Acra, and not one at which she merely touched on her passage home. Was there, then, a short allowance of bread on the voyage from St. Thomas to Boston? The usual standard of a full allowance is the navy ration, which is fourteen ounces a day, or a little over six pounds a week, to each man. During the time specified there was never over five pounds a week, and sometimes less. This was a short allowance.

It is contended by the claimant that there was an abundance of other provisions, so that the crew had always sufficient. I have doubts whether this would be any defence, if proved. At all events, the burden is on the claimant to show what the other provisions were. This he has not done, and the fact of the master's supplying himself with beans from the vessel he fell in with, indicates that there could not have been an adequate supply of vegetable food. No overabundance of meat, fresh or salted, can be substituted for the bread required by the statute.

The claimant has produced receipts, given by the libellants, in full of all demands, and introduced evidence to show that it was understood at the time of the settlement of the voyage, that this claim was relinquished. It appears, however, that the libellants, in fact, received nothing but the wages they had actually earned. It is quite time that the owners and masters of vessels understood that a seaman's receipt in full, given only for money actually due him, and with no additional consideration, cannot be used in bar of a suit for damages. This mode of depriving a seaman of his just right has been often attempted, and has been uniformly repelled by the court.

It is contended that the double wages given by the statute is for a deficiency of all the three articles therein named; and that if there be a short allowance of one only, then only one-third of the additional wages can be given. And Coleman v. The Harriet [Case No. 2,982], is cited as an authority. The court there gave only one-third of the additional wages for a short allowance of one of the articles. No reasons are assigned, and the case is a solitary one, I am unable to follow that precedent. The statute is in the disjunctive, and in my opinion does not admit of such a construction, but gives one day's pay for a short allowance of any one of the specified articles.

It is said that bread could not be procured at St. Thomas. If this were proved, it would constitute no defence, since the cargo consisted partly of bread, which was sold at Acra. The master should have retained enough to insure his having the statute quantity when he should leave St. Thomas.

Decree of double wages for each of the libellants for the time alleged in the libel.

In the course of the argument of the above case, Judge Sprague remarked that the rule laid down in Dunl. Adm. Prac. 284, that "when the answer is required by the libellant to be upon oath, it becomes, when responsive to the libel or interrogatory, evidence for the respondent, which must be disproved by the evidence of more than one witness," had never prevailed in admiralty, and had been distinctly disavowed in this district and circuit. The DORIS.

[3 Ben. 100.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1868.

COLLISION ON LONG ISLAND SOUND — STEAMERS MEETING—CONFUSION OF SIGNALS—LOOKOUT.

1. The propeller D., bound to New York, was on the north side of the channel east of Execution Light in Long Island Sound, heading southwest by west, when she discovered, about a point on her port bow, both the green and the red lights of the propeller M. S., which was also on the north side of the channel, heading northeast half north. The true course of the D., after passing the buoy at Execution Light, would have been southwest half south, but, as soon as she had passed the buoy, she ported her helm and blew one blast of her whistle. The answer to this was two blasts of the whistle from the M. S., to which the D. replied with a single blast, and immediately stopped and reversed her engine. The M. S. saw the lights of the D. a point or a point and a half on her starboard bow, she blew two whistles when about a mile off, and then, hearing the single whistle from the D., she again blew two whistles and starboarded, and, on hearing the second single whistle from the D., stopped and reversed her engine. Her first two whistles were not heard on board the D. The vessels came in collision, the stem of the D. striking the M. S. on her starboard bow: Held. That the vessels were meeting end on or nearly so, and were both bound to port their helms, in accordance with the 13th article of the Steering and Sailing Rules, and that the M. S. was in fault in starboarding.

[Cited in The Free State, Case No. 5,090.]

2. If there is a confusion of signals between two approaching steamers, each vessel is bound to stop, as soon as it perceives the confusion, in accordance with the 16th article.

[Cited in The Manitoba, Case No. 9,029.]

3. The M. S. therefore, was in fault in not stopping and reversing her engine when she heard the first single whistle from the D., which she understood to be in answer to her first two whistles.

4. As each vessel saw the other at a sufficient distance, there was no question of lookout.

5. The D. was not in fault.

In admiralty.

Benedict & Benedict, for the Doris.

Dudley Field and Dimock & Whitney, for the Mary Sandford.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. These are cross actions to recover damages for a collision which took place at about four o'clock on the morning of the 15th of September, 1865, between the steam propeller Mary Sandford and the steam propeller Doris, between Hart's

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Island and Execution Light in Long Island Sound. The Mary Sandford was on her way from New York to Boston, and the Doris was on her way from Boston to New York. The Doris was on the north side of the channel, heading southwest by west, and eastward of Execution Light, when she discovered ahead, about a point on her port bow, the lights of the Mary Sandford. Both the green and red lights of the Mary Sandford were visible from the Doris. Just to the westward of the place where the Doris was when she discovered the lights of the Mary Sandford, was a buoy off Execution Light, which buoy the Doris, in her course, would leave to the northward. Off the buoy, the course of the Doris, if nothing had intervened, would have been changed, by the chart, to southwest half south, a change of a point and a half to the southward from the course she had previously been running on, and which would have required, to effect it, a starboarding of her helm to an extent sufficient to produce such variation. But the Doris, having seen the Mary Sandford, and perceiving that the two vessels were meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, obeyed the rule laid down by article 13 of the "Steering and Sailing Rules" prescribed by the act of April 29th, 1864 (13 Stat. 58), and, inasmuch as the two vessels were steamers, put her helm to port, when she had passed the buoy and there was room for her to swing to the northward. At the same time she blew one blast of her steam whistle, as an indication to the Mary Sandford that she was porting. In reply to this one blast from the Doris, there was heard on the Doris a signal of two blasts from the Mary Sandford, indicating to the Doris a confusion of signals and that the Mary Sandford was starboarding. The Doris immediately gave orders for her engine to stop and reverse, which orders were obeyed with all practicable rapidity, and she gave another single blast with her steam whistle and put her wheel hard-a-port. Before her headway had been stopped entirely, her stem came in collision with the starboard side of the Mary Sandford, not a great way back from the stem of the latter, cutting into her some distance. Both vessels were damaged by the collision, the Doris less than the Mary Sandford.

The Mary Sandford, for some time before she sighted the lights of the Doris, and at that time, was also on the north side of the channel. Her course, at the time she sighted the lights of the Doris, was, as nearly as I can make it out from the evidence, about northeast half north, a course diverging a point and a half to the northward from a line parallel to what was the course of the Doris up to the time the Doris ported her helm after passing the buoy off Execution Light. This course of the Mary Sandford, if northeast half north, was parallel to what would have been the chart course of the Doris after passing the buoy off Execution Light, northeast half north being the counterpart of southwest half south; and, although the Mary Sandford was on the north side of the channel, it is not at all probable that, in the comparatively confined channel extending from off the southerly point of Hart's Island to off the buoy at Execution Light, she was running upon any other than the chart course, and the testimony also leads clearly to that conclusion.

The fact that the two vessels were in these respective positions and on these respective courses when they first sighted each other's lights is also made evident by the fact that these must have been their courses and positions or they could not have seen each other's lights in the respective bearings shown by the testimony. The testimony of those on board of the Doris is that they first saw the lights of the Mary Sandford bearing from a point to a point and a half on the port bow of the Doris. The testimony of those on board of the Mary Sandford is that they first saw the lights of the Doris bearing from a point to a point and a half on the starboard bow of the Mary Sandford. These are just the bearings which the lights of each vessel would have had to the persons on board of the other vessel, if the course of the Doris had been southwest by west, and that of the Mary Sandford had been northeast half north.

On this state of facts, as the Doris was not far to the eastward of Execution Light when her lights were first sighted by the Mary Sandford, and the latter was at that time a considerably greater distance to the westward of Execution Light, it must have been, or ought to have been, quite apparent to those on board of the Mary Sandford, that the Doris, when compelled to change her course off Execution Light to correspond with the chart course from that point westward, would be brought to meet the Mary Sandford end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision. This was apparent to those on board of the Doris, for her helm was put to port as soon as that manoeuvre could be safely executed after passing the buoy off Execution Light. On the same state of facts, the helm of the Mary Sandford ought to have been put to port. Instead of this being done, her helm was starboarded, and she persisted in keeping it to the starboard and thus running across the proper and lawful course of the Doris, until the collision occurred. In thus starboarding her helm instead of porting it, the Mary Sandford violated the requirement of article 13, before cited, and was in fault. The story of the witnesses on the part of the Mary Sandford, that they saw only the green light of the Doris, and did not see her red light at all, which is offered as an excuse for the starboarding of the Mary Sandford, on the idea that the Mary Sandford was some way to the northward of the course of the Doris, and therefore could not safely port, is not credible. Besides, the evidence shows satisfactorily that the single whistle of the Doris, indicating that she was porting, was heard on board of the Mary Sandford, before the helm of the Mary Sandford was starboarded.

The testimony shows that the Mary Sandford blew a signal, of two blasts of her steam whistle, when she was about a mile off from the Doris; that that signal was not heard on board of the Doris; that, after the Mary Sandford had blown that signal, the Doris blew her signal of one blast, before-mentioned, which was blown at the same time that the Doris ported her helm; that that signal from the Doris was heard on board of the Mary Sandford, and was understood by those on board of her to be an answer by the Doris to the signal of two blasts blown by the Mary Sandford; that, on that signal of one blast, from the Doris being heard on board of the Mary Sandford, a second signal, of two blasts, was blown by the Mary Sandford, and her helm was starboarded; that this last signal, of two blasts, from the Mary Sandford, was heard on board of the Doris; that the Doris, on hearing it, immediately blew a second signal, of one blast and stopped and reversed; that this last signal from the Doris was heard on board of the Mary Sandford; and, that the Mary Sandford, immediately on hearing it, stopped and reversed. When a steam vessel is approaching another steam vessel, so as to involve risk of collision, and there is a confusion or misunderstanding apparent to either of them, in reference to the signals made by either, the necessity arises for stopping and reversing, on the part of the vessel which perceives such confusion or misunderstanding. Such necessity is the necessity referred to in article 16 of the act of April 29th, 1864, which provides, that "every steamship, when approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or, if necessary, stop and reverse." The Doris perceived such confusion or misunderstanding of signals, when, and only when, after she had blown her first signal of one blast, she heard what was really the Mary Sandford's second signal of two blasts, and the Doris immediately, in compliance with the law, stopped and reversed. The Mary Sandford perceived such confusion or misunderstanding of signals, when, after having blown her first signal of two blasts, she heard the Doris answer by a signal of one blast. But she did not then stop and reverse, as she ought to have done. On the contrary, she blew another signal, of two blasts, and then waited to hear the second signal of one blast, from the Doris, before giving the order to stop and reverse. This was another fault on the part of the Mary Sandford. If she had stopped and reversed when she heard the first signal, of one blast, from the Doris, as she ought to have done, there would, probably, have been no collision, even with the wrongful starboarding of the Mary Sandford.

I do not think the question of the lookout, on either vessel, has any bearing in the case. Each vessel saw the other at a sufficient distance off to make the proper manoeuvres to avoid a collision.

It is urged as a fault, against the Doris, that her engine would not stop its forward motion, and take on a reverse motion, as quickly as some other engines would. But it is not shown that the engine was an improper or unsafe one, or that it was not in order. Nothing amounting to any fault is shown, in respect to the engine of the Doris; and the court cannot speculate as to whether the Doris might not, with a different engine, have stopped short of colliding with the Mary Sandford.

There must be a decree, dismissing the libel against the Doris, with costs. In the case against the Mary Sandford, there must be a decree for the libellants, with costs, with a reference to a commissioner, to ascertain and report the damages sustained by them, by the collision.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1874.

COLLISION—DAMAGES—PROBABLE PROFITS — FISHING VOYAGE.

1. In assessing damages for a collision, a fishing-boat, making weekly trips or voyages for the market, which has lost a trip as the necessary result of the injury, may be allowed the probable profits of the trip.

[Cited in The Iberia, 46 Fed. 303.]

2. These may be allowed when the only actual injury was to a seine, which could neither be repaired nor replaced in less time than a trip would require, and which was of so great value, that to assess it as a total loss would exceed the damage incurred by the loss of the trip.

Libel by the owners and crew of the schooner Hattie N. Reed, of Swampscott, and by the owners of a large and valuable seine used in connection with said schooner in the mackerel fishery, against the schooner Mary Steele, of Wellfleet. The allegations were, that all the libellants were associated together in the fishing business upon the coast of New England, dividing the catch in certain definite proportions; that the crew were engaged on the thirtieth day of July, 1874, at noon, in casting the seine about a school of mackerel, at a point near Boothbay, on the coast of Maine; that many vessels were in the neighborhood, and among them the Mary Steele; that the latter vessel came down before the wind near to the seine, and suddenly changed her course and shot directly into the seine, and damaged it, rendering it useless, so that the libellants were obliged to carry it to Boston to be repaired, whereby they lost their trip and were detained one week, and suffered damage to the amount of $1,000, besides the cost of repairing the seine.

The answer, admitting the collision, alleged that it happened without fault of the Mary Steele.

C. P. Greenough, for libellants.
F. Dodge, for respondents.

LOWELL, District Judge. The responsibility for the collision is upon the Mary Steele. She began by trying for the same school of fish; but seeing that the other schooner had the first right, her boats lay near by, hoping to catch the fish if they should escape the libellants. All of the crew, excepting the ship-keeper and a boy, were thus engaged in the boats, and the schooner was keeping near her boats, for convenience. Of course, it was for the schooner, while under way, to keep clear of the boats that were casting a seine, and the only excuse given for a failure to comply is, that the vessel missed stays. But if she was on such a course as to need to go about in order to avoid the seine, she is bound to take the risk of missing stays, as there was nothing in the wind or sea that can account for the misfortune, and make it, in law, an inevitable one.

The most serious question in the case is that of damages. These seines, it seems, are large and valuable, costing nearly as much, perhaps, as some fishing schooners. In this case the ship drew one-fourth, and the seine one-sixth of the catch. The libellants' counsel has cited many of the latest cases to the point, that where the voyage or business of a vessel is broken up, the probable profits may be given as damages for detention, if the character of the trade is such that an ordinary allowance in the nature of freight would not meet the justice of the case. The Cayuga [Cases Nos. 2,535, 2,537]; 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 270; The Favorita [Cases Nos. 4,694, 4,695]; Id., 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 598; and other cases, where the loss of the probable earnings of a ferry-boat, and other damages of like nature, have been allowed.

The objection taken to this allowance resolves itself into two: (1) Whether any damages should be assessed for the loss of the use of the seine; and (2) whether they should be assessed in the mode asked for by the libellants. It is proved that the Hattie N. Reed was a market-boat, accustomed to make trips which averaged about a week in length, bringing to Boston fresh fish for immediate sale, netting from $700 to $1,000 for a trip. She was fitted with ice and various other appliances, and, among others, with this seine, and with hooks and lines. At this time the fish would not bite freely, and must be caught in the net, or not at all. Without the seine the trip was certain to fail, and when it was damaged, the master thought best to carry it to Boston to be repaired.

There was some conflict in the evidence as to whether the seine could have been mended at Boothbay. Upon the whole evidence, I think the preponderance is that the work could not be done there to any better advantage, in point of time, than at Boston.

Under these circumstances, is the Mary Steele bound to pay for a broken voyage, or only for the immediate injury to the seine? It seems a hardship that a damage of $45 to a net should involve some hundreds of dollars by way of loss of the use of the net. Supposing a boat had been stove, would that carry like consequences, on the ground that the seine could not be set without a boat? And suppose a thole-pin in the boat were broken, is the voyage to be paid for?

The answer is, that the injury or destruction of any thing which cannot be replaced, and which entails the loss of the voyage, however insignificant the thing itself may be, will often carry with it damages for the loss which is its necessary consequence. A comparatively small injury might sometimes oblige a considerable deviation and delay, such, for example, as the loss of all the nautical instruments. The damages would not be the mere value of these instruments on shore, if the consequence is a further loss occasioned by the necessity of supplying them.

It is true that in collision cases loss of profit on the cargo is not allowed; but this is an old rule, which Mr. Sedgwick considers out of harmony with recent decisions. Sedg. Dam. (4th Ed.) 541, note 1. The loss of profits of a voyage is assessed in the form of freight and demurrage, and the mode of estimating cargo, while it does not give profits, gives interest instead. The general rule now is, that, in actions like trespass, profits may be assessed if they were reasonably certain to have accrued, and that they have been destroyed by the trespass; and in the case of a voyage broken up we have this certainty, because the enterprise is in such a state of forwardness that its results may be foreseen.

In salvage cases, which are neither contract nor tort, the probable profits of a fishing voyage which has been lost are sometimes allowed, if the voyage had already been entered on. It is said that if the loss of the voyage will be very great, and the danger is not of the most pressing kind, the master of the fishing-vessel ought to warn the master of the vessel in distress of the great expense he is incurring. But this is a consideration which cannot apply in collision. See The Salacia, 2 Hagg. Adm. 262; The Louisa, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 99; The Hedwig, 1 Spinks, 24, and note a; The Norden, Id. 185.

If a contract had been made to furnish this seine off the coast of Maine, the contractor being informed that the vessel and men would be waiting to receive it, the damages for not delivering would be the probable profits that were lost by the failure to deliver, because this loss must have been foreseen by the parties. Taken either as being a consequence sufficiently direct to be within the expectation of any one dealing in the subject-matter, or as being, in this particular case, unavoidable, I think profits may be recovered for the loss of the use of the seine.

Then as to the time. If the seine were an instrument of small value, damages could not be allowed for waiting to have it repaired, when it might have been replaced at less cost than that of the demurrage. But that, I understand, is not the case. Its value was more than the damages sued for.

As to the mode of ascertaining the value of the time lost, there seems to be no other that can be applied than the profitable profits. The schooner had a much larger number of men than merchant vessels carry, and different outfits. There is no customary rate of hire or market price for such vessels, and cannot be, from the mode in which the business is conducted. The precedent of the ferry-boat seems to be a strong one, because the reasons are the same.

It was stated by the libellants' witnesses that their trip was not a total failure, for they had caught thirty barrels of mackerel that morning, which they sold in Boston for about $300. In estimating the lost trip less the salvage, I think I ought to take a rather low average, and I accordingly assume that a trip would be worth $800; and, deducting the $300, we have $500 as the damages, besides the cost of repairs, which is $45, making $545 and costs. Decree accordingly.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE.

Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade.

BETTS, District Judge. The above vessel and cargo were seized, as lawful prize, June 1, 1862, off South Carolina, at sea, by the United States bark Gem of the Seas, and sent into this port for adjudication, and were here libelled and attached, July 7, 1862. On the 29th of the same month an interlocutory order was granted by the court, directing the sale of the schooner and her cargo as perishing property. It being proved to the court that the vessel was chased by the bark off the South Carolina coast, and was abandoned by all the persons on board of her before she was seized, and that, when she was arrested she was found wholly deserted, it was ordered, that persons present on board of the capturing vessel be examined in preparatorio in the suit.

It is proved that the schooner and her cargo were captured about six miles off North Santee river, on the coast of South Carolina, she appearing to be running the blockade of some Southern port. She was cleared from Nassau for St. John, N. B., and such was her voyage, according to her crew list. The invoice of her cargo, found on board, was from Nassau for Baltimore. Her manifest was for a cargo of salt, and some oil and tea. The log-book produced contains no entry of the schooner's being chased or abandoned. The entries are continued from May 22, 1862, at Nassau, to Monday, June 2, and were kept as if the vessel was keeping a regular course of sailing.

The preparatory proof given by the captors shows that the vessel was making a direct course towards an inlet off the port of Charleston when chased by the capturing vessel. The crew all deserted her, and have never since been apprehended. No appearance has been entered for vessel or cargo. On the evidence, there is no room for doubt that she was engaged in the endeavor to violate the blockade of the port of Charleston, and a decree must be entered condemning vessel and cargo to forfeiture for the offence. Decree accordingly.

PRIZE —VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE — GOODS FORMING CARGO—LAST EMPLOYMENT—AGENTS.

Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel was built in Wilmington, North Carolina, in 1862, and was provisionally registered at Nassau, New Providence, to Edward Gardner, a merchant of Charleston, South Carolina, April 29, 1862. Her shipping agreement was dated at Nassau, New Providence, in May, 1862, for a voyage thence to Halifax, Nova Scotia, and back to Nassau, and she was cleared at Nassau with a cargo consisting of 100 sacks of salt, 2 barrels of mackerel, 2 cases and 5 barrels of drugs, 2 bags of coffee, and 1 case of shoes. She was captured at sea off Charleston harbor, May 10, 1862, by the United States gunboat Unadilla, and sent to this port for adjudication. She was libelled as prize in this court May 29. A claim was filed in favor of British subjects having an interest, June 24, by the acting British consul, and one November 22 thereafter, by Edmund Gardner as owner. No party appeared personally to argue the cause on the trial, but the papers in the cause were submitted to the court by the district attorney and the counsel for the claimant. Silliman, the master of the vessel, an American citizen, testifies, on his examination in preparatorio, that the vessel came into Nassau with a cargo of cotton from Charleston about a week before this voyage; that Nassau was her next clearing port after that voyage; that the mate owned the cargo on that voyage, and came out in the vessel as master or mate from Charleston; that Henry Adderly & Co., of Nassau, were consignees of that cargo; that they are agents of several mercantile houses in Charleston, and many of the vessels arriving from Charleston are consigned to them; that all on board knew that Charleston was under blockade; that the vessel had no log; that she was directed to the northward after she left Nassau, and along the coast of the United States; and that she was captured about twenty miles south-southeast from Charleston bar. Gardner, the mate, says that he lived at Charleston, where his family lives, for two years; that he owns the vessel and most of the cargo; and that he knew that the port of Charleston was under blockade. Thomas Heffman, a passenger, testifies that he heard the captain or mate (he thinks the mate) say on the voyage that Adderly & Co., of Nassau, owned the vessel, and the mate and the cargo; and that he thinks that firm loaded the cargo on board at Nassau. William O. Bourke, a seaman, testifies that he is a native and resident of Charleston; that he heard it said on board that the vessel was going into Port Royal, South Carolina, for water; and that he has heard Gardner, the mate, say that he was owner of the vessel and cargo.

It is quite clear upon the registry that the legal ownership of the vessel was in a resident of Charleston, South Carolina. In that character she was subject to capture as prize by our own municipal law. But, in reality, she most probably was the property of Adderly & Co., of Nassau, whose practices in like methods of evading the blockade of the Southern ports are flagrantly notorious. The testimony establishes an unmistakable purpose, preparation, and attempt to run the vessel and cargo into Charleston. The master says that she was captured about twenty miles off that port. She was there in contradiction of the destination indicated by her shipping papers, and without a shadow of evidence justifying such departure from her declared voyage. The character of her ship's company, her last employment, her agents at Nassau, and the description of goods forming the cargo, speak very distinctly as to the intent with which she ran from the place of her departure directly to within eighteen or twenty miles of Charleston, under the semblance of seeking the port of Halifax.

The condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel and cargo are decreed.

CARRIERS—DELIVERY—NOTICE OF ARRIVAL — OPPORTUNITY TO REMOVE—CUSTOM—INJURY—DAMAGES —AFFREIGHTMENT — ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

1. The duty of a common carrier by water is not fulfilled by simple transportation from port to port. The goods must be delivered; or at least landed, and a reasonable opportunity given to the consignee to inspect them.

[Cited in The City of Lincoln, 25 Fed. 839; Constable v. National Steamship Co., 154 U. S. 51, 14 Sup. Ct. 1074.]

[Cited in Barker v. The E. M. Wright, 1 Mackey, 24.]

2. The general rule requires the carrier to notify the consignee of the arrival of the goods. If a carrier relies on circumstances as excusing this duty, he must prove them.

[Cited in The Boskenna Bay, 22 Fed. 665.]

3. To show that the carrier was accustomed to store goods in his warehouse, on their arrival, and let them remain there until the consignee should learn from the consignor that they had come, without showing that the consignor knew of and assented to this practice, is not enough to excuse the carrier from the duty of giving notice himself to the consignee. He will continue liable as carrier, until the consignee has received, from some quarter, information of the arrival of the goods and an opportunity to remove them.

4. The fact that after receiving such notice the consignee refuses to take the goods, cannot relieve the carrier from liability for injury sustained by them before that time.

5. The courts of the United States have not jurisdiction of actions against warehousemen, as such, prosecuted between citizens of the same state.

6. The fact that a contract of affreightment is to be performed wholly between ports within the same state, does not exclude it from the admiralty jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. The admiralty jurisdiction conferred by the constitution upon these courts, extends to all contracts of a maritime character to be performed upon navigable waters.

[Cited in The Belfast v. Boon, 7 Wall. (74 U. S.) 642; The Leonard, Case No. 8,256; Re Long Island, etc., Transp. Co., 5 Fed. 607; U. S. v. Burlington & Henderson County Ferry Co., 21 Fed. 336.]

7. A carrier transported goods to the port of delivery, and then, without notifying the consignee that they had come, stored them in his warehouse; where they were injured before the consignee knew of their arrival. Held: (1) That the carrier was liable as such, and not as warehouseman only; in the absence of affirmative proof of some facts excusing him from the duty of giving notice. (2) That, as the contract was for transportation over navigable waters, the consignor might proceed for damages, in the district court, in admiralty; notwithstanding the port of shipment and the port of delivery were both in the same state.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Maryland.]

failure to deliver in good order merchandise entrusted to them for transportation. It appeared by the evidence on the hearing in the district court, that the respondents below undertook, in consideration of a specified freight to be paid by the libelants, to transport the merchandise in question from Baltimore to a place called "Hill's Landing," on the Patuxent river, to be delivered to one Pumphrey. The respondents were in business as common carriers between these points. The goods reached Hill's Landing in safety; and, there, were landed from the steamboat, the Mary Washington. The consignee, Pumphrey, was not present to receive them; and they were placed in a warehouse occupied by the respondents, and connected with their wharf. While remaining there stored, the goods received the injuries for which this suit was brought. The respondents were accustomed, in the regular course of their business, to deposit goods arriving at Hill's Landing, which could not for any reason be immediately delivered, in the warehouse above mentioned, for safe keeping until delivery should be made. No additional charge was made for such storage; it was regarded as an incident to the carriage, and as paid for in the freight. It did not appear that any notice of the arrival of the goods was given to Pumphrey. Upon the above facts, the district court gave judgment for the libelants [case unreported], from which the owners of the steamboat now appealed.

P. W. Crain and William M. Addison, for appellants.

William Pinkney Whyte, for respondents.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. Under the circumstances of this case, I think that the contract of affreightment bound the carriers not only to carry the merchandise to the landing, but to deliver it to Pumphrey, or excuse non-delivery by proof of equivalent action or waiver. The duty of a carrier by water is not fulfilled by simple transportation from port to port. The goods must be delivered, or at least landed, and a reasonable opportunity given to the consignee of ascertaining their condition. In order that opportunity for inspection and for the removal of the goods may be given, the consignee must be notified of the arrival of the goods. This is the general rule. If exceptions are made by usage, circumstances, or special arrangements, they must be shown by proof.

In the present case, the respondents allege that it was not their practice to give notice to consignees, but instead of giving such notice, to deposit goods in their warehouse, where the consignees were expected to call for them, on learning from their correspondents, or otherwise, of their arrival. They insist that this arrangement was for the benefit of the owners of the goods, and was understood and agreed to by them. The evidence does not sustain this claim. It shows, clearly enough, the practice of the respondents; but it does not show any understanding, on the part of the owners of the goods, that the respondents were to be relieved from their responsibility as carriers until actual delivery of them, or an equivalent deposit in their warehouse, with information conveyed to the owners in some way that their goods had arrived. The warehouse arrangement was rather for the convenience of the carriers than of freighters or consignees. The storage, with information of arrival, however obtained, may be regarded properly enough as a substitute for actual and direct notice; and it may be admitted that opportunity for removal, after such information, would discharge the carriers from responsibility as such, in the same manner as actual notice and the like opportunity. But to hold that mere deposit in their own warehouse, under the circumstances of this case, terminated their special responsibility, would be a dangerous relaxation of the salutary rule on which the security of commerce so largely depends.

It is clear, from the proof, that the merchandise was damaged after the landing, and while in the custody of respondents, before Pumphrey had information of its arrival, or opportunity to take it away. It seems, however, that the merchandise was not ordered from the libelants by Pumphrey, and that he declined to receive it; and it is alleged that the carriers, therefore, were not liable. And there was proof that no order for the merchandise was actually given, and that Pumphrey, on learning its condition, refused to have any thing to do with it. But it is not easy to perceive the importance of this circumstance. It is plain enough that the libelants acted in good faith upon an expectation founded on a conversation with Pumphrey, that he would like to have the merchandise sent to him, and that he would receive and pay for it, if of good quality and in good condition, and the proofs show that this expectation was warranted. Whether warranted or not, the duty of the carriers was in no way affected. Their obligation, both to shippers and consignees, was to convey and deliver (or at least offer to deliver) safely. It is true that after Pumphrey had information of arrival, and declined to receive the merchandise because of its bad condition, the respondents could not be held responsible as carriers, to the libelants, for subsequent injuries in the warehouse; but their responsibility for prior injuries was not changed, and it is that responsibility only which is now in controversy.

In the present case, the question whether the respondents were liable as common carriers or as warehousemen is of little importance, except as a question of jurisdiction. The proof shows a degree of negligence which would make them liable in either character. But if their liability were as warehousemen only, they would not be responsible in this court. A court of the Union has in general no jurisdiction of suits against warehousemen by citizens of the same state. Remedies for violation of these contracts must be sought by their co-citizens in state courts.

It is not questioned, however, that the judicial power of the United States extends to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. This is a provision of the national constitution. Nor is it questioned that this whole jurisdiction is vested by law in the district courts of the United States, and, on appeal, in the circuit courts. This was expressly enacted by congress, in 1789 [1 Stat. 73]. Nor is it questioned that a contract of affreightment, to be performed by traversing tide waters, or other navigable waters, is in general a maritime contract, or that a suit upon such a contract makes a case of admiralty jurisdiction. This is settled by repeated decisions. But it is insisted that the contract of affreightment in this case was to be performed wholly within the state of Maryland, and that this case, therefore, having arisen from an alleged breach of it, is not within the admiralty jurisdiction. Upon this I remark, in the first place, that there is nothing in the nature or history of admiralty jurisdiction which excludes from its cognizance contracts to be performed within the country or state in which it is exercised. On the contrary, such contracts, if maritime in their character, were constantly held, before the organization of the Union, to be proper subjects of that jurisdiction.

Within a comparatively recent period, however, doubts have been expressed whether such contracts can be enforced by national courts sitting in admiralty. Such doubts were expressed, in 1848, by Justice Nelson, speaking for a majority of the justices of the supreme court of the United States in the case of New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 392. They were founded on the assumption that "the exclusive jurisdiction in admiralty cases was conferred on the national government as closely connected with the grant of commercial power," and were cautiously stated as follows: "It is a maritime court, instituted for the purpose of administering the law of the seas. There seems to be ground, therefore, for restraining its jurisdiction, in some measure, within the limits of the commercial power, which would confine it, in cases of contracts, to those concerning the navigation and trade of the country upon the high seas and tide waters with foreign countries, and among the several states. Contracts growing out of the purely internal commerce of the state, as well as commerce beyond tide waters, are generally domestic in their origin and operation, and could scarcely have been intended to be drawn within the cognizance of the federal courts."

The principle thus intimated rather than asserted was applied, ten years later, in the case of Allen v. Newberry, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 244, to a contract of affreightment to be performed on Lake Michigan, between two ports in Wisconsin; but the decision against the jurisdiction over the contract was placed quite as much upon the act of congress of February 26, 1845 [5 Stat. 726], which restricts admiralty jurisdiction on the lakes and interior navigable waters to contracts relating to vessels employed between ports in the different states,—as upon the more general restriction derived from the limitation of the commercial power.

It cannot escape observation that this denial of jurisdiction to the national courts of affreightment contracts to be performed between ports of the same state, but on navigable waters, where, in cases of tort, the admiralty jurisdiction is undoubted, rests wholly upon the assumption that the restriction upon the commercial power operates as a constitutional limitation of the jurisdiction in admiralty over contracts.

Now, without more than a reference to the difficulty of assigning a reason for such a limitation of that jurisdiction in matters of contract which would not require the like limitation in matters of tort, and to the admitted doctrine that in matters of tort no such limitation exists, it is proper to observe that it has been more than once distinctly denied by the supreme court that any inference whatever in respect to the jurisdiction in admiralty can be drawn from the constitutional provision concerning commerce. Thus in the case of The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 452, the late chief justice, speaking for the court, and speaking with special reference to admiralty jurisdiction, said: "Nor can the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States be made to depend on regulations of commerce. They are entirely distinct things, having no necessary connection with one another, and are conferred in the constitution by separate and distinct grants."

So, too, in the case of The Propeller Commerce, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 578, in 1861; the supreme court, noticing an objection to its jurisdiction on the ground that it did not appear that the propeller was engaged in foreign commerce, or in commerce between the states, and speaking through Justice Clifford, said: "Admiralty jurisdiction was conferred upon the government of the United States by the constitution, and in cases of tort is wholly unaffected by the considerations suggested in the proposition."

This is the latest judgment of the supreme court; and unless it can be shown that jurisdiction in matters of contract is not as "wholly unaffected by the considerations" referred to, as jurisdiction in matters of tort, it seems to be my duty, being fully satisfied that this court has jurisdiction, under the constitution and the law, over the contract of the respondents, to award to the libellants that justice to which the proofs clearly entitle them, without turning them out of this and requiring them to resort to another court. I do not think this can be shown, and therefore affirm the decree of the district court. Decree affirmed.

District Court and Circuit Court, D. Maryland. 1803.

SALVAGE — DERELICT — AMOUNT ALLOWED—LEFT ON BOARD—EMBEZZLEMENT—APPRENTICE.

[1. A ship and cargo abandoned in a sinking condition by its crew at sea is saved and brought three thousand miles into port without boats or anchors and at great risk. Held, that three-fifths part of the gross value of the ship and cargo is a fair compensation to the salvors.]

[2. One man left, either by design or through carelessness, on board of a ship abandoned at sea, is thereby discharged from his contract of service, and may claim salvage for assisting in saving the vessel.]

[3. Embezzlement of salved property by any one assisting in the salvage service forfeits his share of the salvage.]

[4. An apprentice who renders salvage service is entitled to receive compensation, which is to be paid to himself and not to his master.]

This was a libel for salvage, filed in the district court of the United States for Maryland district, by [William Mason and others] the master, officers, crew, owner, and freighters of the British merchant ship the Firm, against the French ship Le Blaireau.

The facts stated in the proceedings and evidence were as follows: The ship Le Blaireau, James Anquetil, master, on a voyage from Martinique to Bordeaux, laden with sugar, on the 30th of March, 1803, at 10 o'clock at night, in lat. 35. 46 N., long. 46. west from Paris, was run down by a Spanish 64 gun ship, called the St. Julien, commanded by Francisco Mondragora, which struck the bow of the Blaireau, carried away her bowsprit and cutwater close to the seam of the stem, started three planks of the bends, and all above them, and crushed to pieces the larboard cathead. Before morning there were three and a half feet of water in the hold, and the Spanish commander not being able to wait for an attempt to repair the Blaireau, he took her crew and passengers on board his ship, excepting one man, Thomas Toole, an Irishman, who could not be found, as it was alleged by the officers and crew of the Blaireau in their protest, but who was, as he himself alleged, prevented by force from getting into the first boat, and afterwards refused to go in the second boat, being determined to remain on board the Blaireau. Toole, being thus left alone, cut away, as he alleged in his libel, the anchors, and the bowsprit, (which had been left hanging,) to lighten her bows, put her before the wind, and hoisted a signal of distress. In this situation she was, the next day, found and boarded by the ship Firm bound on a voyage from Lisbon to Baltimore. The persons on board of the Firm were: Charles Christie, one of the charterers of the ship. William Mason, master. William Stevenson, mate, shipped at £4 sterling per month. John Falconer, carpenter, at £5. 5. 0. Daniel Ross, boatswain, £2. 10. 0. George Glass, cook, £2. 10. 0. Samuel Monk, Martin Burk, John Brown Hall, John Blackford, John Wilson, and Mark Catlin, mariners, £2. 0. 0. Joachim Daysontas, a boy, £1. 1. 0. John Moat and John M'Mon, apprentices to the owners of the Firm. And Negro Tom, a slave of the Rev. Mr. Ireland.

It was admitted that the ship Firm is about the burden of 330 tons, carpenters' measure, but 500 tons can be laden on board of her; that she is of the value of ten thousand dollars, and is owned by John Jackson, of London, but chartered to Charles B. Young and Charles Christie, who had a cargo of salt on board, of the value of 4,000 dollars. The proper complement of men to navigate the Blaireau was at least sixteen hands. She was a faster sailer than the Firm. They laid to together for two or three days during the bringing in the Blaireau, for the purpose of taking out part of her cargo, and rendering assistance from the Firm. The sum of £2,000 sterling was insured upon the Firm to cover her value and freight.

Upon taking possession of the Blaireau she had about four feet of water in her hold, and could not have swam more than twelve hours longer. There was great risk and peril in taking charge of her. She was brought into the Chesapeake Bay after a navigation of nearly three thousand miles, by six persons who went on board of her from the Firm, and the man who was found on board. Part of her cargo was taken out to lighten her forward, and put on board the Firm; and part of it shifted aft. The Blaireau was navigated by the people of the Firm without boat or anchors. She was obliged to be pumped in fair weather by all hands every two, three or four hours, half an hour at a time, and in blowing weather every hour, a quarter of an hour at a time. Her bow was secured by coverings of leather, copper and sheet lead nailed on, and pitch and turpentine in large quantities poured down hot between the planks and the coverings. The labor of working the Blaireau by the men on board was great and severe, and they had frequently thought of abandoning her, but fortunately persevered. She was a slight built vessel and constructed without knees, and was very weak. The forestay was gone, and the foremast was secured by passing a large rope through the hawse holes, and securing it to the foremast head. It was the opinion of several experienced sea captains that the bringing in the Blaireau was a service of great risk and peril, and nearly desperate, and such as they would not have undertaken.

The persons who went on board the Blaireau from the Firm were, Charles Christie, super-cargo, and one of the charterers of the Firm; William Stevenson, first mate; John Brown Hall, and John Wilson, seamen; John Moat, a boy, and Negro Tom. Mason, the master, and Stevenson, the mate, were the only persons capable of taking an observation and navigating the vessels or either of them, into port.

A claim was put in by the French consul in behalf of the owners of the Blaireau. It appeared in evidence that William Mason, the master of the Firm, had embezzled part of the cargo of the Blaireau, to the amount of at least 1,760 dollars and 71 cents.

WINCHESTER, District Judge. The counsel for the parties respectively intervening in this cause were heard by the court, and their argument, together with all and singular the proceedings and testimony in this cause, were by the court maturely considered. And it appearing to the court that the circumstances of extreme danger under which the salvage of the ship Blaireau and cargo were effected, required a salvage and compensation as liberal as is consistent with precedents and legal principles; that the danger, labor and service of the persons actually employed in navigation and bringing in the said ship, greatly exceeded the danger, labor and service of the persons who remained on board the ship Firm; and that their compensation should exceed at the rate of fifty per cent. the compensation of those who remained on board the ship Firm; that among the persons on board the Blaireau, the station, trust and services of William Stevenson and Charles Christie, entitle them to a compensation exceeding that of seamen, at the rate of 50 per cent., and that the apprentices, cook, and negro slave should not be classed with seamen, nor seamen with the carpenter and second mate, and there not being any general rule by which to settle the proportions of salvage among persons of those different stations, but that the same must depend upon the sound discretion of the court, applied to the circumstances of every particular case; that William Mason, captain of the said ship Firm, having fraudulently embezzled and secreted, with intent to appropriate the same to his own use, lace, and other articles of a large value, which constituted a part of the cargo of the said ship Blaireau, is not entitled to any salvage or other compensation; that in strictness the officers and crew are the only salvors; and the owners of the ship Firm and cargo, as such can only come in for any share of salvage, upon the consideration of the risk to which their property was exposed; that upon these principles salvage should be paid to and among the persons entitled thereto, at the rate of three fifths of the net proceeds of the sales of the said ship and cargo; and that of this sum one-ninth part of the net salvage will be a just and liberal compensation to the owners of that ship and her cargo for any hazard to which their property was exposed.

It is, this 14th day of July, 1803, by me, JAMES WINCHESTER, judge of the district court of the United States, for Maryland district, and by the power and authority of this court, ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the net amount of sales of the said ship Blaireau, her tackle, apparel, and furniture and cargo, (after deducting the costs in the cause, and the sum of three hundred and eighty-eight dollars, heretofore decreed by consent to Charles Christie for expenses and disbursements relative to the said ship Blaireau and cargo,) amounting, as stated by the clerk of this court, to the sum of sixty thousand two hundred and seventy-two dollars and sixty-eight cents, shall be paid, applied and disposed of, to and among the persons, and in the manner following, to wit: To the owners of the ship Firm and cargo, the sum of four thousand and eighteen dollars and fourteen and three quarters cents, to be divided between them in the proportions of their respective interests agreeably to the admitted estimation thereof. to wit: To the owners of the ship Firm, for the value of the said ship and freight on eighteen thousand dollars; and, to the owners of the cargo of the said ship on four thousand dollars. To the persons on board the said ship Blaireau, as follows, to wit: To William Stevenson, the sum of three thousand four hundred and three dollars, and sixty-three and a quarter cents. To Charles Christie, the sum of three thousand and four hundred and three dollars and sixty-three and a quarter cents. To Brown Hall, John Wilson and Thomas Toole, seamen, each the sum of two thousand two hundred and sixty-nine dollars and eight and three-quarter cents. To John Moat, an apprentice boy, the sum of eleven hundred and thirty-four dollars and fifty-four and three-quarter cents. And that there be retained a like sum of eleven hundred and thirty-four dollars and fifty-four and three quarter cents in this court, to and for the benefit of such person or persons as may hereafter make title to the same as owner or owners of the said Negro Tom. To the persons on board the said ship Firm, as follows, to wit: To John Blackford, second mate, the sum of eighteen hundred and ninety dollars and ninety and three quarter cents. To John Falconer, carpenter, the sum of eighteen hundred and ninety dollars and ninety and three quarter cents. To George Glass, the cook, and John M'Mon, an apprentice, each, the sum of seventeen hundred and fifty-six dollars and thirty-six and three quarter cents. To Daniel Ross, Samuel Monk, Martin Burk, Mark Catlin, and Joachim Daysontas (sailors of the Firm), the sum of fifteen hundred and twelve dollars, and seventy-three cents each. That no salvage or compensation whatever shall, for the cause above recited, be paid to the said William Mason, but that the libel in this cause filed, so far as it relates to the claim of the said Mason personally and only, shall stand, and the same is hereby dismissed.

And it is by these presents further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the residue of the proceeds of the sales aforesaid shall be deposited in the Bank of Baltimore, in the name of this court, and to the credit of this cause, to the use and the benefit of such person or persons as may in this court make title thereto, as owner or owners of the said ship Blaireau and cargo, or such person or persons as may be legally authorized by them to receive the same.

From this decree, an appeal to the circuit court was prayed by William Mason, the master of the Firm; by the owner of the Firm; by the claimants of the Blaireau, and by the charterers of the Firm.

Upon the appeal, additional testimony was adduced, in the circuit court, but it does not seem to affect the principles upon which the rates of salvage ought to be awarded.

On the 27th of December, 1803, the circuit court, held by CHASE, Circuit Justice, decreed as follows: The court having heard the parties on the appeal in this cause, by their counsel, and fully examined the evidence, exhibits and proofs, and maturely considered the same, do order, adjudge and decree, and it is hereby ordered, adjudged and decreed by the said court, that the decree of the said district court be, and hereby is in all things affirmed, (and, with respect to the said Mason, with the costs of his appeal,) except only so far as the said decree shall hereinafter, by this decree, be changed or altered.

And it is now further ordered, adjudged and decreed by this court as follows, to wit: That there be paid to John Jackson of St. Paul's parish in the county of Middlesex, in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, (who appears to this court to be the owner of the ship Firm,) the sum of two thousand eight hundred and seventy dollars twelve cents and eight dimes, on the amount of the value of the said ship estimated at the sum of ten thousand dollars.

That there be paid to Charles Bedford Young and Charles Christie, Jun. (who appear to this court to be the owners of the cargo on board the said ship Firm) the sum of one thousand one hundred and forty-eight dollars and five cents on the amount of the value of the said cargo, estimated at the sum of four thousand dollars.

That there be paid to William Stevenson, the sum of two thousand two hundred and sixty-nine dollars eight cents and nine dimes.

That the salvage money adjudged by the district court, and affirmed by this court to be paid to John Moat, (who appears to this court to be an apprentice to the above-named John Jackson, owner of the ship Firm,) be paid by the clerk of this court to the said John Moat, or to his proctor or attorney in fact for the use and benefit of the said John Moat; and that the said salvage money be not paid to the said John Jackson, or to his attorney, or to any other person or persons whatsoever, who shall claim the said salvage money as owner or master of the said apprentice; and that the said salvage money remain in court until paid according to this decree.

That the salvage money adjudged by the district court, and affirmed by this court, to be paid to John M'Mon, (who appears to this court to be an apprentice to the above-named John Jackson,) be paid by the clerk of this court to the said John M'Mon, or to his proctor or attorney in fact, for the use and benefit of the said John M'Mon; and that the said salvage money be not paid to the said John Jackson, or to his attorney, or to any other person or persons whatsoever, who shall claim the said salvage money as owner or master of the said apprentice; and that the said salvage money remain in court until paid according to this decree.

That the salvage money adjudged by the district court, and affirmed by this court, to be retained for the owner of Negro Tom, be paid to the Rev. John Ireland, (late of this state, but now of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland,) who appears to this court to be the owner of the said Negro Tom, or to the Rev. Joseph G. I. Bend, and Lewis Atterbury, who appear to this court to be the attorneys in fact of the said John Ireland, and who have expressed in writing to this court, that they, being duly authorized by the said John Ireland, will immediately, on the receipt of the said salvage money, manumit the said Negro Tom, according to the law of the state of Maryland, and will pay the said Negro Tom one-fifth part of the said salvage money, and have consented that the same may be retained by the clerk of this court for the use of the said Negro Tom.

And it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the appellants (except William Mason) pay no costs in this court on the appeal.

Upon this judgment separate writs of error were sued out by William Mason, the master, John Jackson, the owner, William Stevenson, the mate, Charles Christie and Charles B. Young, the chartereis of the Firm, and by the French claimants of the Blaireau.

William Mason assigned for error, that no part of the salvage was decreed to him for his own use, on account of his merits and services.

John Jackson, the owner of the Firm, assigned for error, that he was not allowed a reasonable proportion of salvage; that the whole sum allowed and decreed to the owner and freighters, ought to have been decreed to him; and that the sums decreed to the two apprentices ought not to have been ordered to be paid to themselves or their proctor only.

William Stevenson, the mate, assigned for error, that the share assigned him was inadequate to his services, merits and situation.

Christie and Young, the freighters of the Firm, alleged that the proportion allowed to the owner and freighters of the Firm was too small, in proportion to their risk; and that the proportion awarded the freighters was too small compared with that awarded to the owner.

[The judgment of the circuit court was affirmed in part by the supreme court, where it was carried by writ of error. 2 Cranch (6 U. S.) 240.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Sept. Term, 1858.

CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES—FEDERAL AND STATE RIGHTS—GRANTS—PROVISIONS.

1. Although it is a settled rule of law, that when a proviso to a grant of any kind is repugnant to the grant itself, the grant is good and the proviso only void, yet this is a rule which is to be taken with modifications. And in the construction, especially of American statutory grants in derogation of common right, passed as private acts, oftentimes are in our legislatures inconsiderate, and after having been ingeniously drawn beforehand, by persons who had a special and not allowable interest of their own in view, and who have contrived language to carry their object, in such a way that the legislature less acquainted than they with exact facts, could not discover the precise import of the words used, the rule is always to be taken in subordination to the greater rule of law, that the true intention, as apparent from the whole grant, is to be effectuated.

2. Hence, if on a whole case, reference being largely had to the public interests, in determining this point, it appears that a grant meant to give rights in case those rights could be enjoyed in a certain way, in which way it is plain, after experiment, that they cannot be enjoyed, then the whole grant is void. And in such case it makes no difference whether the qualification to the grant be put in adjectitiously and after an absolute previous grant, or whether it be put in previously and as a condition precedent.

3. No state of the federal Union, by declaring, in a grant which it makes of certain rights, that any question which arises under that grant, shall be determined in such or such a way, can prevent any class of citizens from suing in the federal courts, if, by the constitution and statutes of the United States, they have a right to sue in such courts.

4. Semble, that the Pennsylvania statute of 1806, which enacts that in "all cases where a remedy is provided or duty enforced, or anything directed to be done by an act or acts of assembly of this commonwealth, the directions of the said act shall be strictly pursued, and no penalty shall be inflicted, or anything done agreeably to the provisions of the common law, in such cases, further than shall be necessary for carrying such acts into effect" has reference to legal remedies only, and having been passed, when the equitable remedy of injunction was unknown in Pennsylvania, does not enjoin injunction.

This was a bill for injunction against stopping the complainants' lumber while it was floating down the Susquehanna; the case being thus:

A statute of Pennsylvania—Act March 29, 1849 [Laws 1849, p. 245]—made certain persons a corporation, under the name of the West Branch Boom Company, and authorized them to erect at a certain point on the Susquehanna, (a public highway of Pennsylvania,) such boom as might "be necessary for stopping and securing" lumber floating upon that river; giving them tollage; with a proviso that the boom should not extend more than half way across the river, and be so constructed as to admit the safe passage of rafts, boats and lumber, and not impede the navigation of the river. A second proviso not very consistent with the general scope of the law, enacted, that no lumber should be stopped without a written request from the owner, and that "a free and unobstructed passage shall at all times be kept open, so that the navigation shall be as free as it is now;" i. e., before the boom was constructed. It then provided that if any persons should "suffer damage by the exercise of the powers herein granted," and the parties injured and the boom company could not agree on the damages, "the court of common pleas having jurisdiction in the county where the boom is," should cause them to be ascertained by three freeholders, whom the court should appoint; and their report being confirmed, should have the effect of a judgment: with a right of appeal to a jury.

A previous well known general statute of Pennsylvania, passed in 1806,—Act March 21, § 2 [Thompson's Laws Pa. 1805-06, p. 569],—it is here necessary to say, enacts that in "all cases where a remedy is provided or duty enforced, or anything directed to be done by an act or acts of assembly of this commonwealth, the directions of the said act shall be strictly pursued, and no penalty shall be inflicted, or anything done agreeably to the provisions of the common law, in such cases, further than shall be necessary for carrying such acts into effect."

In this state of the law, the complainants, who were citizens of Rhode Island and Connecticut, were floating rafts down the Susquehanna, which got into the boom of the defendants, and were detained there several weeks; and having filed their bill as above stated against the defendants, praying that they might be enjoined from stopping it, the case came on to be heard on this bill and the answer to it.

The answer did not deny that the logs were detained, nor that the complainants might be damnified by such detention, but it alleged that the defendants could not help what occurred; that they were doing their best to prevent all unnecessary detention; that their boom was constructed in the best manner, and according to their act of incorporation, and that if any detention occurred, not authorized, it was unavoidable, and an incident to the lawful exercise of their franchise: damnum absque injuriâ. It submitted, impliedly, that the power to make a boom of specific dimensions, which dimensions were here complied with, was clearly and primarily given; and if the law, subsequently, and by way of proviso, declared that in making the boom, impossibilities should be accomplished—that is to say—if it declared (which it seemed to do) that while the boom came one-half across the river, the navigation should be just as absolutely unobstructed as if there was no boom there at all—such a proviso it was—a proviso which provided for a physical impossibility, and for a thing inconsistent with and repugnant to the main object of the grant—which was void, and not the enacting clause which expressed the chief scope of the act, viz.: the power to build the boom. It then opposed to the prayer for an injunction, these objections:

I. That the rivers of Pennsylvania, though highways for its citizens, were not necessarily so for the citizens of other states.

II. That the act authorizing the boom prescribed the manner in which any one aggrieved should get satisfaction, and the more ancient, well known and general statute of 1806, declared that in such a case no other remedy could be had.

Messrs. Armstrong and Maynard, for complainants.

Mr. Linn, for the Boom Company.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The objection that the river is made a highway only for citizens of Pennsylvania, and that the complainants claim rights as Pennsylvanians, while they deny their character as citizens, is answered by that article of the constitution of the United States which declares that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." The complainants have a right to hold land in Pennsylvania, to erect mills and use the public highways by land or water, as freely as citizens of Pennsylvania, and have, moreover, a right to sue a citizen of Pennsylvania, or a corporation, the members of which are presumed to be citizens of Pennsylvania, in this court.

To the second objection—that one founded on the specific remedy given by the act of incorporation and the general Pennsylvania statute of 1806—there are several answers, each of which is conclusive.

I. The legislature of a state cannot take away the privilege conferred by the constitutional laws of the Union upon citizens of other states, to sue in the courts of the United States, by enacting a special remedy in their own county courts.

II. It has never been decided that the act of 1806 has reference to any other than legal remedies and penalties. At the time that act was passed the equitable remedy by injunction was unknown, or at least not in use in Pennsylvania.

III. The act of incorporation gives the special remedy only in cases where persons suffer damages "by the exercise of the powers granted to the corporation;" whereas the complainants charge that they have been injured by an exercise of powers not granted to the corporation. If this were a case where complainants' land was taken, or the water diverted from or turned upon it, or any other injury, direct or indirect, caused by the legitimate exercise by the defendants of the powers granted in their act of incorporation, the remedy provided by the act might have been pursued. But has no application to the present case; and more especially so, as the bill does not demand the removal of the boom as a nuisance, but only an injunction against the exercise of powers not granted by law to the corporation.

The only question, then, that remains, is whether the company have a right to stop the logs of the plaintiffs, and detain them for weeks from passing down the river without their consent. Confused and contradictory as the language of the statute is, we need not grope for its meaning through its various sections. This much, however, we may assert as quite plain: That when the legislature granted this franchise to the defendants, it was on the representation of the grantees, and the understanding of all concerned, that a boom could be kept up, which would not necessarily infringe the public right of navigation. It is a condition of the grant, that the corporation shall not detain the logs of those who do not wish it; the company have no power to do so, and in accepting the franchise and acting under it, they have admitted their ability to exercise their powers without injury to the rights of others.

The assertion involved in the answer that it is impossible to construct the boom which is authorized, so as to separate the logs and give those a free passage which they have no right to detain, amounts to a confession that their boom is a nuisance. If they cannot so construct it as to detain only the logs of those who request this duty of them, and not detain the property of those who do not, they have a franchise which, by their own showing, is impossible to be exercised. They must take it with its burthens as well as its benefits, or not take it at all. It would be a strange construction of their franchise, which would permit them to exercise prohibited powers, because convenient for the exercise of those granted.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Sept. 3, 1874.[2]

INTERNAL REVENUE—SUCCESSION TAX — LIFE ESTATE—TERMINATED AFTER REPEAL.

1. Under the internal revenue acts of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 223], and July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 98], no succession tax accrued against a devisee of real estate in fee, after a life estate in another, until the termination of the life estate.

2. Such tax therefore cannot lawfully be assessed against such devisee where the life estate began before, and terminated after, the date fixed for the repeal of the succession tax by the act of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat. 256), the seventeenth section of which provided that the repeal should not prevent the levy and collection of "taxes properly assessed, or liable to be assessed, or accruing under the provisions of former acts," and that the act should "not be construed to affect any act done, right accrued, or penalty incurred under former acts."

[Cited in United States v. New York Life Ins. & Trust Co., Case No. 15,873.]

[This was a suit by William P. Mason against Otis Clapp for the recovery of tax claimed to have been paid after the repeal of the succession tax act.]

Russell & Putnam and J. B. Warner, for plaintiff.

George P. Sanger, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. This is an action brought in the state court, and removed by the defendant to this court by certiorari, to recover a succession tax paid under protest to defendant as collector of internal revenue for the Fourth Massachusetts district. The writ is dated Nov. 20, 1873.

William P. Mason, the plaintiff's testator, died Dec. 4, 1867. By his will, the real estate upon which the tax in question was levied, was devised to his widow for her life, or until she should cease to occupy the same as a place of residence, and upon her death or ceasing so to occupy the same, to the plaintiff. The widow occupied the said real estate as her residence until her death, on June 17, 1872. May 15, 1873, the tax in question was assessed by [Jonathan H. Mann,][3] the assessor of said district; and, May 31, 1873, plaintiff paid defendant said tax under protest, to avoid distraint or other forcible process to collect the same. June 9, 1873, plaintiff duly made claim upon the commissioner of internal revenue for the refunding of said tax, for the reason that the said property did not vest in possession in the plaintiff until the death of the testator's widow, which occurred after Oct. 1, 1870, the date at which the repeal of the succession tax went into effect, and that the tax had not accrued at said date so as to come within the saving clause of the act of repeal. Act July 14, 1870, § 17 (16 Stat.). Nov. 15, 1873, the commissioner of internal revenue rejected the appeal, "for the reason that the tax was due, properly assessed, and collected," within said saving clause, "as held by the circuit court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, in the case of May v. Slack" [Case No. 9,336]. If upon the above facts the court are of opinion that the tax was wrongfully assessed and collected, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff for six hundred dollars, with interest from May 31, 1873; otherwise judgment for the defendant.

The act of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat. 256), repealed the special tax "on legacies and successions" imposed by the internal revenue act of 1864. This repeal took effect on the first day of October, 1870. The seventeenth section of the act of July 14, 1870, provides that "all acts and parts of acts relating to the taxes herein repealed, and all the provisions of said acts, shall continue in full force for levying and collecting all taxes properly assessed, or liable to be assessed, or accruing under the provisions of former acts or drawbacks, the right to which has already accrued or which may hereafter accrue under said acts; and for maintaining and continuing liens, fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under and by virtue thereof; and this act shall not be construed to affect any act done, right accrued, or penalty incurred under former acts, but every such right is hereby saved."

The tax in this case was not assessed, or liable to be assessed, before the first day of October, 1870. It is, however, claimed that the beneficial interest of the plaintiff having accrued Dec. 4, 1867, on the death of William P. Mason, the testator, its liability to the succession tax or duty, when it became vested in possession, was saved by the exceptions of the seventeenth section in relation to taxes "accruing" and "rights accrued" under former acts.

Section 126 of the act of 1864 (13 Stat. 287), defined a "succession" to denote the devolution of title to any real estate. By the provisions of the succeeding section, "every past or future disposition of real estate by will, deed, or laws of descent, by reason whereof any person shall become beneficially entitled, in possession or expectancy to any real estate, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the passing of this act, shall be deemed to confer on the person entitled, by reason of any such disposition, a 'succession,' and the term 'successor' shall denote the person so entitled." The duty payable in case of such succession varied according as the successor's degree of consanguinity was nearer or remote to the predecessor, from one per centum in case of a successor of lineal issue, or a lineal ancestor of the predecessor, to a duty of six per centum in case of a stranger in blood, or one far removed in degree of collateral consanguinity. Provision was also made, that where, before any successor became entitled to the estate in possession, his interest, by reason of death, passed to any other successor, only one duty should be paid, and should be due from the successor who first should become entitled in possession; but such duty should be estimated at the highest rate which, if every successor had been subject to duty, would have been payable by any one of them. The duty was not payable until the successor became entitled in possession. Act 1864, § 137 (13 Stat. 289). By the provisions of section 145, the duty became a lien on the succession after assessment. By the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 140, 141), the assessment was to be made at the expiration of thirty days after the successor came into possession.

Thus, it will be seen that on the first day of October, 1870, when the repealing act took effect, it was uncertain when any duty was to be paid, upon what value it was to be paid, at what rate of duty it was to be assessed and payable, and against whom it would be assessed. No tax had then accrued or was accruing against William P. Mason. Before any one became entitled in possession, the succession might pass by death, by the laws of descent or otherwise, through many different persons. Although, when a successor became entitled in possession, the duty would have been assessable at the highest rate to which any successor in the line would have been liable had he come in possession, the duty did not accrue against that one or any other of the successors in the line, except the one who became entitled in possession, and not against him until he became so entitled. When he became so entitled in possession, the duty accrued against him; the "right accrued," although the assessment could not be made until the expiration of thirty days. Only one duty accrued against only one successor, however many there might have been in the line of succession. If the successor who became entitled in possession died before the first day of October, 1870, and the thirty days had not elapsed and the assessment had not been made, the case would have been within the exception, because the duty would have accrued against him. The right to the duty would have become absolute; the rate of duty would have become fixed; and the person liable to pay it would have been determined.

The evident intention of this exception was to provide for levying and collecting such sums as should have been assessed before Oct. 1, 1870, and such duties as before that time had accrued against any particular person, where, as against him, the right had accrued and become absolute, although the assessment had not been made. The expression used in section 134, "but such duty shall be at the highest rate, which, if every successor had been subject to duty, would have been payable by any one of them," recognizes the fact that only that successor was subject to duty who entered into possession. The definition of a succession in section 127, making it embrace interests "in expectancy," does not aid in the construction of this excepting clause, as it could not for a moment be contended that a duty accrued against one having only a contingent interest. In sections 125 and 128 the duty is referred to as accruing at the time of the final ascertainment of the tax, and the interest in the succession as accruing when the successor is entitled to possession. As the act of 1870 provided that taxes upon real or personal estate which may by any disposition become subject to trusts for charitable purposes are repealed, and no such taxes, whether already levied or not, shall thereafter be collected, the plaintiff might have disposed of his interest before the termination of the life estate, by a conveyance in trust for charitable purposes, so that no tax would have been payable upon it. A duty could not have accrued as against him, when it was in his power so to dispose of the estate that no duty would ever be payable upon that succession.

The case of May v. Slack [supra] was a case where the testator died in February, 1870, having made by will certain pecuniary legacies, which were paid by his executors in April, 1871. It is plain that the duty had accrued on these legacies, because they were then absolutely due to the specific legatees. The legacy was debitum in praesenti, even if it was solvendum in futuro. The amount was fixed; the rate was determined; the person ascertained who was to receive the legacy; the person ascertained who was to pay the duty. No one of these elements exists in this case, and the case before the court cannot fall within the rule or the reasoning in the opinion in that case. If the duty in this case was rightly assessed, then it follows that it would be necessary to continue the whole machinery of the internal revenue system to assess and collect duties upon remainders, whenever, after the lapse of years, the life estate determines. It is clear, from the general policy of the statute, that the excepting clause was never designed to have that effect.

Judgment for plaintiff for six hundred dollars, with interest from May 31, 1873.

Case No. 9,234.

MASON et al. v. CROSBY et al.

[1 Woodb. & M. 342.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Oct. Term, 1846.

FRAUD—SALE OF LAND—EXAMINATION—MATTERS WITHIN VENDOR'S KNOWLEDGE—PART OWNER—RATIFICATION—LIABILITY.

1. Where a bill claims relief on account of fraud in a sale, it may be sufficient or broad enough, in form, to justify a decree against the sale, if a gross mistake appears.

2. But a sale will not, on account of such a mistake alone, be rescinded, if a party had full opportunity to examine the land sold, and did examine it.

[Approved in Shaddle v. Disborough, 30 N. J. Eq. 381. Cited in Greene v. Harris, 10 R. I. 384.]

3. Such an examination, however, will not prevent a recovery for fraud, if falsehood was practised in respect to some of the examination, and the quality of timber and size of the streams on it to float timber, or any matter more within the vendor's knowledge; and the purchaser, relying in part on the false representations, made only a slight and general examination himself.

[Cited in Smith v. Babcock, Case No. 13,009; Clark v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., Id. 2,829; Simpson v. Wiggin, Id. 12,887.]

4. If such falsehood is practised by one of two owners of the paper title, and one of six owners in interest under subordinate contracts, it vitiates the whole sale; and the same result follows, if it was practised by a third person, who had a bond for a deed from some of the owners in equity, and who made the contract of sale, and the terms of which the owners of the paper title, and the grantors in the sale, adopted and carried into effect.

[Cited in Pratt v. Philbrook, 41 Me. 133; Grant v. Beard, 50 N. H. 133.]

5. The grantors thus ratify the whole sale, and cannot take the benefit of it, by receiving the price agreed on, without being liable at the same time civiliter on account of the false representations made in order to procure that price and the sale.

[Cited in Veazie v. Williams, 8 How. (49 U. S.) 157.]

6. If the sale be rescinded, the grantors being the only respondents, are liable severally to refund the money each has received and retained for his equitable share in the premises; but are not responsible after the lapse of several years for the money, which was immediately paid over to the other equitable shareholders. Nor are they now responsible for that part of the money, which was paid to the agent for his services, and never came into their hands, when the lapse of time has been such that he is dead and insolvent.

7. A delay in rescinding a contract, and in instituting proceedings for a recovery of the money, though not so long as to be a technical or equitable bar, by the statute of limitations, to any relief, yet may be so long as to change the positions of the parties and their remedies over on third persons, and thus excuse them in equity for the sums paid over to such third persons.

[Cited in Packard v. The Louisa, Case No. 10,652; Smith v. Babcock, Id. 13,009; Almy v. Wilbur, Id. 256.]

8. If a vendor or his agent make a false representation, which is material, it vitiates the sale, though it was not known at the time to him to be false.

9. The notes given to the respondents for the benefit of all interested and not yet paid by the plaintiffs, are to be refunded and cancelled so far as in their possession and control.

10. On doing this and making the payments aforesaid, equal in amount to their shares in equity, the plaintiffs must reconvey to the respondents respectively all interest in their shares of the premises, and another deed to them in trust for the other owners in equity, of all interest in so much of the residue of the land as the excess of the notes given up bears to the whole consideration.

11. Where one of the complainants had released all his interest in the land to the others, it was held to be no bar to a joinder of him in the bill to set aside the original trade and refund what had been paid.

12. If the parties to the conveyance are made respondents, but not all those interested in equity in the land, it is no ground of objection to a recovery on the merits against the respondents for their shares.

This was a bill in equity, in behalf of Horatio Mason, David Daniels and Amos C. Leland, against James Crosby and Deodat Barstow. It was filed August 20th, 1841, and alleged, that on the 24th of August, 1835, the respondents were owners of about six thousand acres of land, called the "Munroe Gore," in the county of Washington and state of Maine. That about the 1st day of said August, they authorized Joseph Porter and William F. Boynton to give to one Nathaniel Fifield a bond or contract in writing, conditional to convey said gore, on certain terms therein mentioned; and this contract was given to enable Fifield to negotiate a sale for the benefit of Crosby and Barstow and others. It next averred, that Fifield, acting under said contract, and with the knowledge of Crosby and Barstow, and for their benefit, and for the purpose of selling the land at an exaggerated price, and to deceive the plaintiffs, did procure, by sinister means, Samuel Sawyer and Joseph Sawyer to execute certificates, dated April 20th, 1835, at Stephens, saying that the average quantity of pine timber then standing on said gore, would exceed six thousand feet per acre, and the spruce four thousand five hundred to five thousand feet per acre, and a large part of the timber was "handy to haul," or put in, and Samuel said he had "recently explored it," and that it was situated on the Schoodiac waters. It further averred, that these certificates were false, and so known to be to Fifield and the respondents, or might and ought to have been so known to the latter. The bill, after several other averments, either not material or not proved, alleged that Fifield further declared the timber could be cut and floated to market twice a year from said land, whereas in truth it cannot be done without great difficulty oftener than once in two years. The bill next charged that, influenced by such false declarations and certificates, the complainants agreed with Fifield to purchase said gore at $8 per acre, and on the 24th of August, 1835, obtained a bond from the respondents to convey the same, (which was in terms at the price of $6 per acre) and gave a bond to them in return to pay for the same within eight days, one fourth in money, and the residue in three notes, one to be paid each year with interest, and all to be secured by a mortgage of the premises. That before the deed and notes were executed, and to induce the complainants to give the latter, Barstow, one of the respondents, averred, that there was more timber than the certificates stated, and that the land was worth $15 per acre, contrary to the truth, and they were thus persuaded, about the 1st of September, 1835, to complete said agreement, and pay the money and execute the notes, and take the deed of the land, as before mentioned. That this amounted in all to about $48,000, of which near $10,000 was then paid, and in the whole $22,000 has been paid in money, and the rest, viz., $26,000, or thereabouts, in notes to the respondents and others their agents and creditors. Fifield was averred to have received of this in money and notes about $12,000, or at the rate of about $2 per acre. The bill concluded with a prayer to have the money repaid, and the notes to be delivered up to be cancelled, and to pay all sums expended on the premises.

Among other averments in the bill was one, that Fifield was dead, so as not to be liable for prosecution; and in a supplemental bill, which the plaintiffs had leave to file and did file, October, 1845, it was further alleged, that Fifield, beside procuring and using false certificates by others, did himself make false representations as to the quantity of timber on said land, representing it to be twelve thousand feet of merchantable pine on one occasion, and eight thousand on another; that relying on Fifield's representations, they were induced to agree to look at the land, with a view of purchasing it, and started for that purpose, but by false statements of Fifield, were led to return without examining the premises, and to purchase the same on the terms before detailed; and in reliance on the falsehoods stated by him and by others through his procurement, they obtained the bond for the land, arranging with Fifield to pay $6 per acre to Crosby and Barstow, and the other $2 to Fifield, as his share or commissions in the purchase money for his agency; that Crosby and Barstow ratified all the doings of Fifield, and while the papers were preparing to complete the purchase, Barstow, in order to induce the plaintiffs to take the deed, averred that more timber would be found on the land than had been stated in the certificates, and that there was no doubt of the facilities in getting it off, and that the certificates could be relied on; whereas Barstow knew the falsehood of all this, and meant thereby to deceive the complainants. It was further averred, that Edward Munroe, in 1830, purchased this gore of land of the state of Maine for $1,500, or about twenty-five cents per acre; and then sold a permit to one Todd, to cut the timber therefrom, for the sum of $1,500; and it was cut accordingly before 1835, not leaving thereon over five hundred thousand feet of both pine and spruce; and that all this was known or ought to have been known to the respondents.

The answer of Crosby alleged, that he had given no authority to Boynton to employ Fifield, nor had himself employed Fifield to sell the Munroe Gore; that he had no knowledge and gave no assent to Fifield's statements or doings, nor to the obtainment or use of the certificates of the Sawyers. That in the spring of the year 1835 he purchased one sixth of this gore of Edward Munroe, who had the equitable title; but the deed was given by the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and run to him and Barstow for the whole. That he never owned any more of the land than one sixth, and paid therefor $2.25 per acre. That before the purchase it was agreed by the parties to the same that he, Crosby, should own one sixth, Barstow and Boynton two sixths, and Stephen Smith three sixths. That before the sale to the plaintiffs, Smith assigned his three sixths to J. D. Wilson, Samuel Thurston, Brazier Barstow and Joseph Porter, so that when the sale took place, Crosby owned one sixth, D. Barstow one sixth, Boynton one sixth, J. D. Wilson one eighth, Thurston & Barstow, as a firm, one eighth each, or equal to two eighths, and Joseph Porter one eighth. That the respondent Crosby took no part in the negotiation for the sale of the gore, being much engaged in other business, and saying merely that he would sell his interest to any person for $6 per acre. That about the 24th of August, 1835, he understood from D. Barstow, that the plaintiffs were ready to give said price per acre, having been on the land and explored it to their satisfaction, and that all those equitably interested therein were willing the land should be thus sold. That he and Barstow therefore executed a deed of the same to the plaintiffs for that price, receiving $6,275.40 in cash, and the rest of the $35,352 in notes, payable as before specified, secured, except two, by mortgage, of the date of the 1st of September, 1835, and which notes he and D. Barstow agreed in writing to account for with the other owners, when paid, in the ratio of their respective interests. That he knew nothing of any false representations by any one, and authorized none; that he received only the sum of money and notes before named, and has divided them as agreed, except that two notes are still unpaid. That on the 4th of June, 1836, he sold to D. Barstow all his remaining interest in the notes, being $3,332, for $2,741 from which he has since made a further deduction of $1,000, and took a conveyance of real estate of little value for the balance. That he has had no interest therein since. The answer further averred, that prior to the purchase by the plaintiffs, he was informed and believes that they explored the land in dispute, and were satisfied with it; that after the purchase they again visited the same, and continued to think well of their purchase; and that they have since stated the respondents to be innocent of any fault in the sale thereof. It then asked that the other parties in interest should be made parties to this bill, and subjected to pay over all they received if the complainants prevail; and averred, that the mortgage back of the land has not been foreclosed; that the plaintiff Daniels conveyed all his interest in the land to the other plaintiffs March 6th, 1837, and the others afterwards, in 1838, compromised the controversy with D. Barstow, and that no fraud had at any time been practised by him in relation to this subject.

Crosby filed an answer also to the supplemental bill, which, besides denying the material allegations, similar to those in the original bill, averred that, though Boynton was partly interested in said land, he was not authorized by the other owners to give any bond to Fifield or others for the sale thereof, nor does he know that Boynton had or used the Sawyer certificates to aid in the sale, and professes ignorance of most that is not denied. He averred, that he traded with the plaintiffs himself in person, and under a belief that they had explored the land for themselves, and was not aware that Fifield had employed any misrepresentations to, or made any agreement with, the plaintiffs; nor did he ratify or intend to ratify any such; nor did he or D. Barstow make any allowance to Fifield of $2 per acre for selling the land. Nor have the plaintiffs offered to restore it, nor has he been guilty in any way of any fraud towards them.

The original answer of D. Barstow stated, that he and Crosby jointly, in April, 1835, bargained with Munroe for the Munroe Gore, and Munroe obtained a deed thereof to them from the state of Massachusetts the 2d of May, 1835, at $2.25 per acre. The other averments were similar to those in Crosby's answer, except that Thurston and Brazier Barstow each owned one eighth, and that the respondent gave a verbal refusal to Boynton of his interest in the land at $6 per acre, but made no contract whatever with Fifield, nor authorized any. Nor did he know of any connection of Fifield with the sale, till a few days previous he understood Fifield had gone with the plaintiffs to explore the same; and on the morning of the 24th of August, 1835, Fifield told him that the plaintiffs had been on the land and refused to buy on certificates. The respondent then supposed that Fifield claimed to act under a belief that he, Barstow, was willing to sell his interest in the land at $6 per acre, and that Fifield was entitled to any sum over $6, which should be obtained; and the respondent was informed that Boynton and Porter had given to Fifield such a premium to sell the land, and that it had expired some days before the 28th of August, 1835. That having stated his willingness to sell at this price, he was ready to do it, and that it was no higher than other lands were then selling for. That the plaintiffs applied to him that day to purchase the same at $6 per acre; said they had been on it, and the timber had not been represented too high, and, after consulting with the others in interest, he agreed to sell to them the same and did sell it, as described in Crosby's answer. He denies any knowledge of any false representations, or certificates, or making any such representations himself, but admits that he carried the deed from Crosby and himself to Boston, to deliver it, if the money was paid and the notes executed in conformity with the bond, though the business was not finished there, but afterwards at Bangor. That Mason, in October, 1835, subsequent to the purchase, went upon the land again, and expressed himself satisfied with the purchase, and, in April, 1836, paid the notes then falling due to Munroe; and the respondent, relying on the solvency and integrity of the plaintiffs, bought out, in March, 1836, Boynton's interest in the notes then unpaid, and the interest of Crosby; and that the plaintiffs signified to him no dissatisfaction with the purchase, till on the return of Mason from another examination of the land in October, 1836. That Mason then and since has proposed to have the respondents take back a part of the land; but did not pretend the respondents had wronged him, or that he bought except on his own knowledge, as the respondents had no personal acquaintance with the land and timber till the summer of 1837. That Barstow then examined the same, and found some good pine, an "immense quantity of spruce, a good deal of cedar," and "a large quantity of good farming land," and sold to Edward Holyoke, in March, 1838, one half the notes and mortgages at the rate of $3 per acre, and with reference solely to the value of the land and timber. That in July and August, 1838, Mason and Leland proposed to abandon the land to him, if all the notes were obtained and surrendered, but it was not done, as other notes existed than those over which he had control. That afterwards the other notes were obtained, and all placed in his hands to be thus surrendered, and he notified the plaintiffs to make out the release and receive them. But they neglected to do the same, and filed the present bill, without any further negotiations in respect to the subject. That he considered the whole matter to be thus compromised, but if it is not, prays that the other persons interested in the land be made parties.

Barstow filed also an answer to the supplemental bill, which repeats the material denials in his former answer, except admitting that Boynton may have given a bond to Fifield for the land at $6 per acre, but denies any agency conferred on Fifield to sell for the owners. It further denies, that Boynton had the certificates of the Sawyers, to use for the defendants, or that the defendants authorized the use of them, or knew that Fifield had made misrepresentations, or knew that the timber had been cut from the gore by Todd, or that it was so cut to such an extent, as averred in the supplemental bill; though the respondent does not know, and never pretended to know, the exact quantity of timber on said land. That he knows nothing of Fifield's statements to the plaintiffs, and did nothing to secure $2 per acre to Fifield as agent, over and above the $6 per acre to be paid the owners; and that the bargain was made by him with the plaintiffs at Bangor, and that Fifield was not present, except once coming in on other business, and that he knows nothing of the terms agreed on by Fifield. That he and Crosby knew nothing personally of the land, but believed it to be heavily timbered, and nothing of its being cut off by Todd under a permit from Munroe, or of Fifield's representations about it. That Fifield did introduce the plaintiffs to the owners, as persons who wished to purchase, but left them to conclude a bargain; and, though once present, he took no part in the negotiation, and they knew nothing of his being entitled to the excess over $6, or had made any sale for them, and which they were adopting. That Fifield agreed to pay his expenses to Boston, and that he would see that the purchasers should pay him, when he, Barstow, went to deliver the deed, else the owners would not realize $6 per acre, and that Fifield did pay him. That he said nothing to the respondents or Bullard with a view to deceive, or which he did not then believe to be true, or to induce them to go on and complete the bargain. This respondent denied all fraud in the sale, or any mutual mistakes in regard to the timber, or any attempt to harass the plaintiffs with suits, but supposed all to have been adjusted. He corrects one mistake in his former answer, as to the first time when he heard that Boynton and Porter had given a bond to Fifield, and says it was a few days before the contract of sale with plaintiffs, August, 1835, and not after.

The evidence in the case was voluminous, and so much of it as is material to the facts found by the court, and legally proved and bearing on the questions of law settled, will be referred to in the opinion.

Mr. Bishop and Fessenden & Deblois, for plaintiffs.

W. P. Fessenden and Mr. Kent, for respondents.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. It is a matter of regret, that the bills in this case, both the original and supplemental, are not drawn with more precision. Several important matters are alleged only indirectly, and it is unusual that so many others, introduced with directness enough, are not even attempted to be proved. In the answers, also, some things are alleged, which are not responsive to the bill, and much difficulty is caused in settling first what is duly set out in both, and next what is properly proved of that which is duly set out. But from the whole it is undoubted, that the plaintiffs intend to claim relief on account of a fraud in the sale of the land in controversy, and not on account of a gross mistake. Whether, when fraud alone is averred and a mistake alone is proved, a recovery can be had on the latter ground—the allegations of fraud being considered broad enough to include a mistake—need not be here considered. See on this, Smith v. Babcock [Case No. 13,009], Oct. Term, 1846, Mass. Dist. Because, if there is not proved some falsehood or fraud, material in this transaction, it is doubtful whether the plaintiffs could recover for a mistake alone when they had so ample an opportunity to examine the land before the purchase, and undertook to make the examination, and expressed themselves satisfied with the result. On this, the case of Warner v. Daniels [Id. 17,181] may be regarded as decisive; and may be referred to for the precedents in support of that view. It was settled there, that though means of knowledge and explanation will usually defeat a rescinding of a contract for mere mistakes, yet it will not prevent a recovery for fraud, if that was practised in important particulars, relied on by the purchasers.

If the falsehood rendered the examination less perfect and full, or made the statements of the party to be in part confided in, as in respect to details, extending personal inquiry only to general matters and general appearances, the falsehood vitiates the whole. See cases cited in Smith v. Babcock [supra], and Tuthil v. Babcock [Case No. 14,275], (Mass.) Oct. Term, 1846. Thus if a vendor affirm the rent to be more than it is, it is a fraud for which he is liable; as that lies more within his private knowledge, even if the vendee made some further inquiries. Risney v. Selby, 1 Salk. 211; Pasley v. Freeman, 3 Durn. & E. [3 Term. R.] 51; 2 Esp. 572. Otherwise, if it was not so, and the truth could easily be ascertained. Harvey v. Young, Yel. 21; Leakins v. Clissel, 1 Sid. 146.

The next question then is, whether falsehood or fraud were practised in leading the plaintiffs to purchase the land of the respondents at the high price given. If they were, the sale was void, provided they were practised by either of the respondents, or by any person whom they previously employed as an agent to make the sale, or whose acts in negotiating the sale they ratified or adopted afterwards. They would be thus liable, if the plaintiffs relied mainly on the statements thus falsely made to them, though some examination of the premises and timber may have been attempted by them, but carried on slightly, or imperfectly, or erroneously in consequence of such reliance on what was false. See Warner v. Daniels [supra]; Harding v. Randall, 15 Me. 332; 2 Hayw. 240; Lit. Sel.

Cas. 218; 14 Ves. 7, 289; 3 Cow. 537; 2 Ves. Jr. 628.

Nor is it material in this case, whether or not either of the respondents or their agent knew to be false what was stated by any of them, provided he did state what was not true, and it was to a material point and was relied on. A vendor, in cases like this, is not in his own person or by another to throw firebrands, and say he is in sport, or make material statements which are untrue, and excuse himself by his own ignorance.

In relation to the evidence of fraud here, it is not of that plenary character which is found in some of the cases that occurred in the speculating era of 1835. Nor is it brought home so clearly to one of the defendants, Crosby. So far as affecting him, it is rather as a fraud in law and an avoidance of the contract in respect to him in consequence of fraud, committed by others, with whom he was associated in interest, and whose acts in making the sale he adopted, and hence is bound by their misconduct in respect to the sale, rather than from any personal behavior of his own, which is proved to be either dishonest or dishonorable.

What, then, in the first place, are the leading facts proved, from which to infer fraud? The great general fact, which is shown by full testimony, is, that the Munroe Gore, in April, 1835, cost the respondents only $2.25 per acre; and that this was two dollars per acre more than it cost Munroe only five years previous, with timber on it then, which had since been sold by him for a sum equal to all the original cost. The next fact of this character so proved is, that in only four months after their purchase, without making any improvements, the complainants were by some means induced to give $8 per acre for this same land, a price nearly fourfold what it had cost; and the respondents received of it themselves, in money and notes, $6 per acre, being a net gain in those few months of near three hundred per cent. Another of these facts so proved is, that from 1830 to 1835 this tract of land had been cut over by permission of the true owner, and all the timber which the licensee deemed worth cutting removed; and that when this sale was made, which was effected chiefly on account of timber on the land, nothing in fact remained there, except from a half to one and a half thousand feet to the acre. It will at once strike every observer of these general data, that there must have been some extraordinary mistake existing, or some extraordinary deception practised, in order to enable the respondents to sell land thus stripped of timber, to purchasers on account of the timber, and at such an extraordinary advance, within so short a period, on even the high price which the respondents had given. The times, then, were, to be sure, unusual, and almost insane. But, had the whole truth been known to the respondents, madness must have "ruled the hour," or they could not have given $8 per acre for land on account of timber, when only a half to one and a half thousand feet of pine existed to the acre, and that, as will soon be seen, could not then easily be got to market, nor much value be then attached to any spruce or cedar timber thus situated.

The next inquiry would naturally be, who could have any interest in misleading the plaintiffs to give so excessive a price, except the owners, who were to receive, or some agent or trustee in connection with them, who was to receive a portion of the consideration for his services in effecting such a sale? Accordingly, the position taken by the plaintiffs is, that the contract of sale, the price, and all the preliminary negotiations for the sale were made with Nathaniel Fifield, who had a bond for the land from some of the parties in interest. The form of this bond is not very distinctly proved, though its existence is by the evidence and circumstances satisfactorily shown. It is highly probable that the bond on its face either allowed Fifield to have the land on paying $6 per acre, if taken before a specified time, and which in that form was considered on this subject, in 1835, as constituting him an agent to sell at that price, and assumed this form in order that his statements as an apparent owner should have more weight than if he was an apparent agent merely. Or the bond on its face authorized him to sell for the owners at that price, he retaining for his services all he sold it for beyond that price. It is of little consequence which was the form, if it was in either. The evidence in support of its existence and tenor is not so distinct as it might be expected, if Fifield had not been dead, and hence he could not state the facts as a witness, or if made a party, disclose them in his answer to proper interrogatories in the bill. But I see no reason, except perhaps the subordinate interest of Boynton and Porter, who are supposed to have given the bond, why their testimony should not have been taken by the plaintiffs to prove the particulars, or at least been offered by the respondents, to rebut what is set up on that subject, if it could be rebutted. As the evidence now is, however, in respect to the existence and terms of the bond, one of the respondents, Barstow, admits in his answer, that before the sale he heard that two of the owners in interest, viz., Boynton and Porter, had given a bond to Fifield to enable him to sell. He admitted it also to Ware, and again in a letter, April 5th, 1837, he states, "We then told two of our company they had better put the land into the market at $6 per acre." He further states in that letter that a bond was given to Fifield by Boynton and Porter, that Fifield sold the land to the plaintiffs, and then introduced them to him, and a deed was given to them. And Jones understood from Barstow that Fifield said, in behalf of all the owners to Bullard, "that the land had been bonded to Fifield, to enable him to sell it for Crosby and Barstow."

This evidence looks much like the giving of the bond to Fifield of the character named, and by arrangement of all, and like a subsequent execution of his contract, with full knowledge that Fifield had made it for them. The statements of one of a company so situated bind all. Van Reimsdyk v. Kane [Case No. 16,872]; 18 Wend. 354; 2 Hill, Ch. 109. In their answers, likewise, both of the respondents concede, that they had stated verbally, "any person should have a deed of the land who would give" therefor $6 per acre. Barstow, in his answer, says, he gave Boynton verbally the refusal of all his interest at that price, and supposes Fifield acted under a belief they would sell at that rate, and Fifield receive all he got over $6 per acre. It is to be remembered, in connection with this, that Boynton is the son-in-law of D. Barstow, and that the latter admits further in his answer, that the plaintiffs were introduced to him before the sale was completed by Fifield, as being the persons who wished to purchase the land; that Fifield informed him they had been to Bangor to examine the land, and that he understood from some quarter Fifield was to have any sum he could get per acre beyond the $6 paid over to the respondents. He admits, also, that Fifield paid him for going to Boston, and he said to Bullard, that he came there to close the delivery of the deed and the giving of the notes and payment of the money, or in other words, "for the purpose of completing the bargain for the purchase, as it had been agreed upon by the said Fifield." And it is stated in several of Barstow's own letters, offered in evidence, that the plaintiffs bought the land of Fifield and not of the respondents; and it was on that ground, chiefly, for some time Barstow hesitated to make any compromise with the plaintiffs. So he stated also to Ware. The testimony is explicit from several witnesses, that Fifield in fact made the negotiations for the sale, arranged the terms, fixed the price, and probably received the two dollars per acre over the six, which the plaintiffs agreed to give.

After all this, it is hardly permissible to deny that he acted prominently in the transaction; that his acts, so far as regards the sale at $6 per acre, were adopted or carried into effect by the respondents; that being thus perfected by them and not him, he never having obtained the title himself, nor conveyed it to the plaintiffs, all he did must be regarded in the light of an agent, and not of a principal; that his conduct for the owners was not only thus ratified, but had the previous express assent of two of those interested in the premises, and the subsequent knowledge of his participation, having the refusal and a bond, without disapprobation, by Barstow, one of the respondents and the acting owner, and the general assent of the other, Crosby, to a sale to any body who would give $6 per acre. He left the details of the business to be arranged by the others interested, on account of the pressure of his own individual concerns.

Under these circumstances, it has been settled in the case of Doggett v. Emerson [Case No. 3,960], that the owners cannot take the benefit of acts or negotiations like those of Fifield, without bearing the burthen of them, or any liabilities growing out of them, on account of any falsehoods or frauds of his that accompanied them and were material to the sale. 12 Mod. 490; 1 Bos. & P. 406; Story, Ag. 455; 1 Durn. & E. [1 Term R.] 710; 10 Mass. 327; 1 Bailey, Eq. 343. It has also been settled, in the first named case, that this agency, independent of the circumstances which exist here and did not there of an agency created, or known or recognized by some of the owners themselves as by Barstow, one of these respondents, holding with the other all the legal title, is to be inferred in law, with all its consequences and adjuncts, civiliter, if the owners choose to carry into effect the contract made by and under it. It is a subsequent ratification of it. Clark v. Van Reimsdyk, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 153; [Bank of Columbia v. Patterson] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 299; Long v. Colburn, 11 Mass. 98; Cushman v. Loker, 2 Mass. 106; Ward v. Evans, 2 Salk. 442; 1 Metc. (Ky.) 650; 1 Dess. 461, 470. See, also, Daniel v. Mitchell [Case No. 3,562]; 15 Wend. 114; 4 Durn. & E. [4 Term R.] 39, 41, 177; Lanborn v. Stetson [Case No. 12,291]; 3 Hill, 552. So it is settled there, that the owners need not have known the falsity or fraud in order to be charged with its civil consequences, if they undertake to receive the benefit of the contract made under it.

This is not a new doctrine, as some seem to suppose. In Doe v. Martin, 4 Durn. & E. [4 Term R.] 66, Lord Kenyon observes: "But it is said, that the transaction, as far as Martin was concerned, was fair and honorable, and that the fraud only consists in the misapplication of the purchase money; but, without imputing any fraud to Martin, and, indeed, it is negatived by the verdict, the maxim, that the principal is civilly responsible for the acts of his agent, universally prevails both in courts of law and equity."

But in addition to that principle for charging the respondents here, it is proved by two witnesses, that one of them, Barstow, and the one who seems to have been the active person in transacting the business, made, before the sale was completed, like representations with Fifield himself as to the certificates about the timber and the quantity of it, and that another equitable owner, Boynton, probably furnished those very certificates, which are charged in the bill to have been so untrue and deceitful. Besides this, three, if not more of the owners, were conusant to Fifield's acting as agent for the whole, and did not forbid him to go on, but rather acquiesced in the bargain he had made, and thus gave him credit and standing. See on this, Pickard v. Sears, 6 Adol. & E. 469. More in illustration need not be now detailed after the numerous decisions in this court on questions resembling these. No progress can ever be made in disposing of cases of this character, unless we regard the decisions already made in this circuit on similar questions, as binding till reversed by the supreme court, or overturned by this court itself on a clear conviction of their error. Neither of these having yet happened as to what has been adjudged in Doggett v. Emerson [supra]; Warner v. Daniels [Case No. 17,181]; and several others, they are to be regarded as landmarks for the future, and it is considered not necessary on this occasion further to explain or to go behind them.

Next, in what did the falsity consist? In what particulars is the evidence as to falsity or fraud in material parts of this transaction, committed either by Fifield or any of the owners personally? It is sworn to, by two or three witnesses, that Fifield represented the certificates to be true and trustworthy, which stated the pine timber to be six thousand feet per acre, when in fact it did not exceed from a half to one and a half thousand, and that, "small, scattered and rotten."

One of the certifiers further stated, that he had "recently" explored the land to ascertain the quantity, when in fact he had not been on it for several years, and then all which possessed any value was in progress of being cut off, and when in fact the other certifier had not examined at all over half the land. Both the certificates, also, instead of being trustworthy in other respects, had been procured by Darling under a promise from Smith, who held a bond of the land at $1 per acre, that he should have one quarter part of the interest in the bond if he would assist him in selling it. Darling is also one of the certifiers to Sawyer's character, as if disinterested, when in fact he was secretly interested in the sale of the land to the extent of one fourth, and is proved to have been afterwards paid one fourth of all the increased price thus obtained. It further appears that these certificates were sent by Darling to Smith, in April, 1835, and that he, Smith, sent them to Boynton, one of the owners at the time of this sale, and the son-in-law to Barstow. The latter admits he saw them in Boynton's possession, who being part owner by sub-contract, and the one who gave the bond to Fifield, doubtless delivered these certificates to him with the bond. They had been so effective as to help Smith sell the gore at $2.25 per acre, for which he gave only $1, and enabled Boynton, and his associates to sell for $8 in gross or $6 net, what had cost them only about one third of the last sum. It was furthermore shown, that Fifield himself had represented to different witnesses the pine timber to be eight, ten, and twelve thousand feet per acre, being willing to guarantee ten, and the facilities for getting the timber off as good, and so good that it could be run twice a year to market, which would greatly increase its value, and especially impart all the value which the spruce possessed. When in fact it is now proved to have required usually two years then to get the timber to market, and so continued, till some improvements were since made in the stream at a considerable expense. It was next shown specially, that Barstow, one of the respondents, in person confirmed most of these statements, and urged the truth of these certificates on the plaintiffs, as a reason for completing the sale. He told Jones, that the quantity of timber was double what the certificates stated according to his belief; and the stream of water good to run the timber to market twice a year. Bullard testifies to similar statements of Barstow.

What is the result of all this? It is summed up truthfully by Barstow, in October, 1836, in his letter to Mason, in these words: "We all now believe that you have been basely imposed upon in the purchase of the Munroe Gore."

But other objections have been urged to a recovery here; because other persons interested in the land beside the respondents have not been made parties. It is to be remembered, however, that the respondents alone bought the land of Munroe, and that the title was vested in them alone by the deed, and by them alone conveyed to the plaintiffs. Under these circumstances the bill can well be sustained against them alone. West v. Randall [Case No. 17,424]; Wormly v. Wormly, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 421, 451, and note. But how much, under the circumstances here, must be paid back by them on a rescinding of the sale, in consequence of such sub-contracts, is a difficult question, and will be soon considered. See Doggett v. Emerson, May Term, 1846, on the master's report [Case No. 3,962].

In actions on contracts, which form the nearest analogy to the present proceedings, an omission of a person, who ought to be a co-defendant, cannot be taken advantage of except by plea in abatement. Powers v. Spear, 3 N. H. 35; 1 Chit. Pl. 29; 1 Saund. 291b, note 4, and 154, note; Nealley v. Moulton, 12 N. H. 485. Dormant partners, also, are not necessarily parties in a suit, and are not allowed to become so to defeat the action. De Mautort v. Saunders, 1 Barn. & Adol. 398. Nonjoinder of a defendant, can be objected to only in abatement. 5 Coke 119; 1 Saund. 154. Here the plaintiffs might perhaps have made all parties, who got the money and had any kind of interest at the time of the sale in its proceeds, and, on some accounts, that course would have been preferable. But it is very evident, that they were not obliged to prosecute any but those who conveyed to them, who alone contracted with them, and who possessed the legal title to the premises, leaving all subordinate interests and equities to be settled among those who were the parties to them, or to effect only the amount to be refunded by the respondents, and not their liability.

Another objection is, that one of the plaintiffs has conveyed all his interest in the premises to the other complainants. But it does not follow from this, that he is not entitled to join in bringing the suit for the benefit of his grantees, the original cause of action or complaint having arisen to him, and the remedy being properly in his name. Nor does his conveyance to them prevent them from releasing, or reconveying to the defendants all the title which came from them, it being still all in two of the plaintiffs, if not in the three equally. Such objections going to form rather than substance, should be taken earlier than pleas to the merits, and especially are they untenable if the decree can be so made as to prevent any injustice if there be a misjoinder. 4 Younge & C. Exch. 557; 1 Beav. 277. Again, if one applies for an injunction and relief against a judgment for land, to which he had after the judgment released his interest, it has been held to be no bar, as it is a naked equity, and nothing passed by the release, as he then had no interest and could have none till created by a decree of a court of equity. Dunlap v. Stetson [Case No. 4,164].

The length of time from this transaction, in August, 1835, to the filing of the bill, in August, 1841, is likewise urged against any recovery here. It would operate against the present proceeding, if not bar it, under some circumstances, unless satisfactorily explained, though six years had not quite elapsed before these proceedings were instituted. Because, when a party has taken possession of property purchased, and discovers fraud in the sale, which he thinks vitiates it, he ought, as a general rule, to return, or offer to return, the property speedily, so as not to change in any material respect its condition or the rights of the other party before rescinding, and so as not to deprive him of remedies over, which would have been good if he had been called on earlier. Here, however, the fraud does not appear to have been discovered before the autumn of 1836, and from that time till 1839, there is evidence of negotiations and mutual propositions to compromise the dispute, and an impression that it was or would be compromised till the bill was filed in 1841. Indeed, an actual compromise is set up in the answers of Barstow, as having taken place, and been confided in by him, till these proceedings were instituted. And though no evidence has been offered proving it in such manner as to be binding in law or equity, yet it is admitted by the respondents, and accounts in some degree for the lapse of time without suit after the fraud was discovered.

Another reason, probably, why the plaintiffs need not be so active in reconveying or bringing a bill in this case is, their impression that the respondents had foreclosed their mortgage and taken possession of the premises; and though the foreclosure is denied, it is admitted by Barstow that he had entered on the premises, and sold half of them to Holyoke, or half of the mortgage and notes as early as 1838. See on this, Warner v. Daniels, before cited, and 20 Johns. 585; 2 Schoales & L. 635.

There is one view, however, in which this length of time, though not barring the liability of the respondents, may have an equitable influence on the amount they are to refund, and I will consider this when giving directions concerning that amount. There are, also, several minor questions which have been started in argument, as to the competency of some of the witnesses, and the irresponsive character of some of the answers, which on this view of the evidence it is not necessary to discuss or settle.

On the question, then, of the liability of the respondents, my opinion is, that the sale of the land in question was void on account of the false and fraudulent representations which accompanied it, as they were very material in their character, reaching nearly the whole value of the premises, and were much relied on, notwithstanding the imperfect exploration for only one day or less, which was attempted by the plaintiffs. It must be set aside, therefore, and the consideration paid for it be refunded so far as hereafter pointed out, and the land reconveyed to the respondents. All this can be inquired into and reported on as to particulars, by a master in chancery. But in order to prevent difficulty and delay before him, and after his report is made, it is proper to consider two questions more at this time, in respect to the amount to be refunded.

One is, the influence which the length of time, under all the circumstances of this case, ought to have on the amount which these defendants should in equity refund. It has already been stated, that it is not such as to bar this liability, and I see no reason, therefore, why it should prevent the recovery of the whole amount of money which was received by themselves of the plaintiffs, either at the time of the sale or since, and retained for their own use. But as the money received by them then in equity belonged to others, who by sub-contracts were entitled to portions of it, and those portions were paid over before this bill was instituted, and the plaintiffs knew of the existence of such sub-contracts, and yet did not make the parties to them parties to the bill, nor prosecute the respondents at an early day, so as to enable them, if liable, to have a useful or seasonable remedy over on those sub-contractors, I am inclined to think this injurious neglect in the plaintiffs should prevent them from enforcing a repayment from the respondents beyond the amount of money which they have retained for their own shares. Called upon by this bill to exercise extraordinary powers on the ground alone that it is equitable, we ought to exercise them no further than is clearly equitable; and the parties beyond that, if left as they stand at law, have no reason to complain. In respect to the notes, received by the respondents from the plaintiffs, and still retained in their possession, or which were under their control when the bill was filed, I think they should be required to surrender all of them, as the lapse of time has not interposed so as to change the character or position of the respondents concerning them. These notes run to them, and were to be kept and collected by them in trust for all the shareholders.

The next question connected with the amount proper to be refunded, grows out of the sum and notes received separately by Fifield, the agent, and which did not pass originally into or through the hands of the respondents. If Fifield was a party to the bill, the proper rule would be usually not looking to the exception here on account of the length of time operating as to sub-contracts, to charge him and the other respondents with such portions as they respectively received of the money and notes, and to require a reconveyance of the premises by the plaintiffs, on being repaid such sums as they had advanced, and on having their notes, which had not yet been paid, returned. There is no agent here, through whose hands all the money and the notes passed, so as to make him responsible in the first instance for all, and to be aided afterwards by the others, who are parties to the bill according to the portion each received, as in Daniel v. Mitchell [Case No. 3,562], and Doggett v. Emerson, before cited. But Fifield not being a party, Crosby and Barstow can alone be charged, and the amount they can be required to pay in respect to him, is a question of some difficulty. Fifield is not a party as Emerson was in Doggett and Emerson, and as Todd was in Daniel and Mitchell. Nor did the money and notes, received by Fifield, pass through the hands of the respondents, or the latter run to the respondents, as they did in the former case, if not in the latter, and which seemed to be considered an essential ingredient to charge them when one of the agents, such as Williams, in Doggett and Emerson, was not a respondent in the bill.. Besides this, there is no admission in either answer, that money or notes were actually given to Fifield, though it is manifest from them and the evidence, and especially the letters in the case, that Fifield acted as an agent in the transaction, and indorsed some of the notes, and the bill states the amount given to him. The answers deny any knowledge that Fifield received $2 per acre, or any other sum, for his services, except by hearsay, or that the respondents in truth agreed to pay or allow any sum whatever for his agency aforesaid. The length of time, then, during which the plaintiffs neglected to prosecute their claims, is a decisive bar to making it equitable for them to account for Fifield's money or notes, by construction, when they never had either, nor can control either. The money and notes to Fifield might have been obtained back, had the respondents been called on and charged for them early. They went into the possession of Fifield at once, and from the plaintiffs, not the respondents; and hence with the knowledge of the plaintiffs, that they were in his possession. The respondents laid by and did not sue till, according to the evidence, Fifield had become insolvent and died, and after that, to charge them for his receipts, when the remedy over would be worthless, and has become so probably by the neglect of the plaintiffs, would be any thing but equitable. The most obvious remedy for them at all would have been against Fifield rather than the defendants. I must hesitate, then, under these peculiar circumstances, to charge the defendants with any money averred to have been paid to Fifield, as their agent, in part consideration for the land, or on account of any notes so given to him.

Some question arises, whether the sum to be refunded by the respondents is to be done jointly or severally. The deeds to and from them seem to have been joint, as were the notes to them. But they were acting for themselves and others, owning, in fact, separate shares; and as their shares are recognised in these proceedings as severed from the rest, in the amount to be refunded, it may be proper that a severance should be made between themselves in the decree. But this point has not been discussed, and before drawing up a decree we will hear the counsel on it for both parties. It will now be entered for the plaintiffs, on the principles here laid down, and the case submitted to a master, to make the computations necessary and the inquiries indicated. There are also some questions of costs for amendments and filing supplemental bills, which the counsel will please to present early, so as to have them settled by the time the case is ready for final judgment on the report.

[NOTE. District Judge Ware delivered an opinion to the same effect in this case. Case No. 9,235.

[Subsequently the master filed his report, to which exceptions were taken. The exceptions were heard and overruled in Case No. 9,236.]

MASON et al. v. CROSBY et al.

[2 Ware (Dav. 303) 306.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Oct. Term, 1846.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — PRE-EMPTION OF LAND TO MAKE SALE—EQUITY—STALE CLAIM—PECUNIARY EMBARRASSMENTS.

1. A contract, by which a right of pre-emption is given to a party for a certain time at a fixed price, on a bona fide expectation that he may become a purchaser, will not constitute him an agent of the vendor, although he sells his interest in the contract at an advanced price before the expiration of the term.

2. But if the right of pre-emption is given not with an expectation that the party will become a purchaser, but solely for the purpose of enabling him to make sale of the thing, and to get his compensation in the advanced price, this will render him the agent of the owner, and the consequences of agency will follow so as to render the owner responsible for his acts.

3. Generally, poverty is no excuse to a suitor, for delay in commencing a suit. But, when the statute of limitations does not create a bar to the legal remedy, the pecuniary embarrassments of a plaintiff will so far excuse delay, not beyond the period of legal limitation, as to relieve his claim from the imputation of staleness; especially when his embarrassments have been occasioned by the acts of the defendant.

This was a bill in equity, brought to rescind a contract for the sale of 6,000 acres of timber land lying in the county of Washington, on the waters of the Schoodiac, on the ground of fraud or mutual mistake. The land was originally purchased of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, by Munroe, who took of the commonwealth a bond for a deed. He assigned his bond to one Stephen Smith. Smith reassigned the bond and the equitable title to the land to the defendants, at the price of two dollars and a quarter an acre, and they, having paid the balance due to the commonwealth, took a deed to themselves. The legal title was conveyed to the defendants, Crosby and D. Brastow, but five other persons, viz.: Boynton, Wilson, Thurston, B. Brastow, and Porter were interested in the purchase, in different proportions, to the amount of two-thirds of the whole, so that these defendants owned but one-sixth each of the land, and held the other two-thirds in trust for the other purchasers. All the parties being desirous of selling, it was agreed between them to offer the land for sale at the rate of six dollars an acre, or $48,000 for the whole. Thereupon a bond was given by Boynton and Porter, two of the equitable owners, to Nathaniel Fifield, giving him a right of pre-emption of the land at that price, for a limited time. With this bond Fifield went to Massachusetts and agreed to sell the land to the plaintiffs for eight dollars an acre, the difference of two dollars being his own profit. When Smith transferred the bond of the commonwealth of Massachusetts to the defendants he delivered to Boynton two certificates, one of Samuel Sawyer and one of Joseph Sawyer, one of them stating that he had recently explored, and the other that he had worked on the land in getting off timber in 1832, and both certifying that there was then standing on the land 6,000 feet of pine timber to the acre on an average, and from 4,500 to 5,000 feet of spruce; and also, another certificate, signed by five persons of St. Stephens, certifying to the good character of the Sawyers. It was principally on the reliance placed by the plaintiffs upon these certificates, with the strong assurances of Fifield and some of the owners of the land, that they might be entirely depended on, that the purchase was made. Mason, it is true, went from Boston for the purpose of going upon the land and exploring it himself, but by the artifices of Fifield he was prevented from going to it, or, if he actually went on any part of the land, from exploring it. Before the sale of the land by Smith to the defendants, he agreed with one Samuel Darling, Jr., to give him one quarter of the profit he would make on the sale in consideration of Darling's assisting him in making the sale. For this purpose, Darling procured these certificates of the Sawyers, writing them himself, and they signing them. And he was one of the five persons who afterwards signed a certificate that the Sawyers were honest men, and that perfect reliance might be placed on their certificate. These certificates were proved to be grossly false, there not being one-tenth of the amount of timber on the land that was stated in them. Nearly the whole had been taken off in the years 1831–2 and 3. There was no evidence that Boynton and the other purchasers knew the manner in which the certificates had been obtained, or that they were false. Other representations were made, with regard to the expense and facilities of getting the lumber to a market, which were proved to be untrue. The plaintiffs charged in the bill that Fifield acted as the agent of the owners. The defendants denied, in their answers, the agency of Fifield and all knowledge of fraud or falsehood in the certificates; and stated that they had no personal knowledge of the land, and had purchased it on the credit of written reports exhibited to them. Part of the purchase-money was paid when the the deeds were executed, and notes were given for the residue with a mortgage of the land. The defendants have since entered on the land for the non-payment of the notes, and foreclosed the mortgage, and thus regained a complete title to the land. The bill prayed that the defendants may be required to repay the money they have received, and deliver up the outstanding notes, and be perpetually enjoined from suing them at law. These are briefly the material facts.

Mr. Bishop and S. Fessenden, for plaintiffs.

W. P. Fessenden and Mr. Kent, for defendants.

WARE, District Judge. The first question, that arises in this case, is whether there was such a fraud in the making of this contract, as will furnish a just ground, on the principles upon which courts of equity are accustomed to deal with such cases, for rescinding the contract, and replacing the parties, as nearly as may be, in the same situation as they would have been if the contract had not been made. Upon this question, it appears to me that there is no reasonable ground for hesitation. It is clear that the plaintiffs, in making the purchase, relied mainly on the certificates of the two Sawyers, supported by the strong representations of Fifield and some of the owners, that full confidence might be placed in them. The plaintiffs did indeed at first decline to consummate the bargain without examining and exploring the land themselves, and Mason went for the purpose of making the examination, in company with Fifield, and Fifield set out with him for that purpose. But before arriving at the land, Fifield was, or pretended to be taken sick, and after remaining near the land for two or three days, he informed Mason that his bond would expire in a short time, and that he should lose the opportunity of selling and they of buying, unless he immediately returned to Bangor; and they accordingly returned, without any examination of the land, and completed the bargain. So that the plaintiffs purchased entirely upon their reliance upon the representations made to them by Fifield, corroborated by that of some of the owners, that entire confidence might be placed on the certificates of the Sawyers, who were men of good character. Now it is proved to a demonstration, that these certificates were grossly false. In the years 1831–2 and 3, one William Todd had a general license from Munroe, who was then the owner, to cut timber from the land, paying for his license the gross sum of $1,500 for the three years. During those years, nearly the whole of the valuable lumber was taken off. So that when the plaintiff purchased, according to the testimony in the case, instead of there being 6,000 feet of pine lumber to the acre, there was not more than half a thousand, or about one-twelfth of the amount which the certificate stated.

The manner in which these certificates were obtained throws some light on their character. In the spring of 1835, Smith engaged one Samuel Darling, Jr., to aid him in disposing of the land, and promised him, for his services, one quarter of the profit he should make in the sale. Thereupon Darling obtained these certificates of the Sawyers, writing the certificates himself, and signing another paper to go with them, certifying to the good character of the men. It is immaterial whether Darling and the Sawyers did or did not know they were false. They would be equally fraudulent in one case as in the other. That the object in obtaining them, was to delude and defraud purchasers, cannot be doubted. These certificates were delivered by Smith to Boynton, one of the purchasers, and by them put into the hands of Fifield.

There is no evidence that the present defendants, or those interested with them in the purchase, had any knowledge of the manner in which these certificates were obtained, or that they were so grossly inflamed and false. But it is fully proved that they received them, that they were put into the hands of Fifield, and that he made use of them to induce the plaintiffs to purchase; that Fifield and some of the parties in interest gave the strongest assurances that they might be depended upon. Fifield said that there was a larger amount of lumber on the land than the certificate stated, and that he would guarantee 10,000 feet to the acre. It is said by Lord Eldon to be an old rule of equity, that, if a representation is made to a man going to deal on the faith of it, in a matter of interest, he that makes the representation shall guarantee its truth. Evans v. Bicknell, 6 Ves. 183. And it makes no difference, in law or morals, whether he knew or did not know it to be false. Ainslie v. Medlycott, 9 Ves. 21; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 193. It is equally a fraud to aver a fact to exist, the reality of which the party is ignorant of, as it is if it is known to be false. There is no doubt that the representation was made that the certificates were entitled to full confidence, and that there was even more timber than they stated. Nor is there any more doubt that Fifield knew that the plaintiffs relied mainly, if not wholly, on these representations, in making the bargain. Whether he knew them to be fraudulent and false, or not, is not material in this case. He made himself responsible for their fairness and substantial correctness. But I think it may be fairly inferred, that if Fifield did not know that the certificates were false and procured for the purpose of fraud, that he had reason to suspect, and did, in fact, suspect it. If this suit were against Fifield, therefore, no hesitation could be felt in coming to the conclusion that the contract ought to be rescinded, as being deeply tainted with fraud.

This brings us to one of the important questions in the case, whether Fifield, in making the contract, acted as the agent of the defendants, so as to render them responsible for his acts. This is charged in the bill, and is fully denied in the answers. It becomes, then, necessary to consider the terms of the contract entered into with Fifield. The instrument itself is not produced, but it is proved, by the evidence, and admitted to have been a bond, giving him a right of pre-emption of the land for a limited time. Fifield was not, therefore, an avowed agent, nor did he assume to act as such. If he was made an agent, it was rather as a legal result from the facts, than from the avowed intention of the parties, for it is not pretended that the owners, by this bond, intended formally to make him an agent. But an agency may be implied from the circumstances and mode of dealing, and forced by law on the parties, which will, when the rights of third persons have become involved, be equally binding as if it were created by the most formal instrument.

It is certainly true, that an agreement, giving a party a right of pre-emption of a thing, for a fixed price and a limited time, will not per se constitute him an agent of the vendor. Even if the party sells his bond or his interest in the contract before the expiration of the time, this will not render him an agent. Such engagements are of frequent occurrence in commercial transactions, and it was never imagined that they constituted the party, having such a bond or contract, an agent of the owner, so that he became responsible, as principal, for the contracts which the party made with others. If such a right of pre-emption is given to one, with the bona fide expectation that he may become a purchaser solely, or in company with others whom he may induce to join him in the purchase, this can in no sense make him an agent of the vendor, nor will it render the vendor responsible for any fraud, or misrepresentation, which the party having this right of pre-emption may make in a resale of the thing. The owner has nothing in contemplation but the sale of the thing to the person with whom he has made the engagement. On no principle of law or public policy can he be held, as a principal, for the misconduct of his vendee, in a subsequent sale of the thing to a stranger. Whatever passes between them, is res inter alios acta. If he makes false and fraudulent representations to his vendee, and these are communicated to the second purchaser, who relies upon them, he may in some cases become directly liable to the second purchaser for his fraud. Langridge v. Levy, 2 Mees. & W. 532; on error, 4 Mees. & W. 337; Pilmore v. Hood, 5 Bing. N. C. 97; Crocker v. Lewis [Case No. 3,399]. But this liability does not result, properly, from the principles of the law of agency.

On the contrary, if the vendor gives this right of pre-emption to a party, not with the expectation or understanding that he is to become a purchaser, either solely on his own account or in company with others, but merely to enable him to make sale of the thing to strangers, leaving him to get his commissions or compensation in an advanced price, then, I hold, he becomes in law the vendor's agent, whatever color may be given to the contract. In the interpretation of contracts, the law looks to the substance and effect of the contract, and will not be blinded by the disguise which the parties may throw over the essential characters of the engagement. Such an engagement has all the effects of an agency, and, according to the intention of the parties, it has no other. It is true that the party who has this pre-emptive right may, if he chooses, become a purchaser himself. But this forms no part of the original intention. The sole object is to clothe him with the power to sell, and he may sell under it just as well as he can under the most formal agency. The law will not and ought not to allow a man, under such a disguise, to reap all the advantages of an agency, and escape from all its liabilities. If this can be done, it is easy to see how he may practice frauds to any extent through a simulated vendee on the unsuspecting and unwary, may securely pocket the fruits, and leave the victims of the fraud to seek their remedy from an irresponsible man of straw.

To which of these categories does the engagement with Fifield belong? Was this right of pre-emption given with any expectation that he would become a purchaser, or was it merely to enable him to effect a sale of the land for the benefit of the owners? On the whole evidence there can be no doubt, I think, that it belongs to the latter. This appears in various parts of the record, but perhaps as clearly as anywhere in a letter of Brastow, one of the defendants, to Mrs. Leland, the wife of one of the plaintiffs, under the date of April 5, 1837. In speaking of the sale of the land, he says, "We told two of our company that they had better put the land into the market at six dollars an acre. Wm. F. Boynton" (the son-in-law of Brastow) "and Joseph Porter, according to the usual custom, gave a bond of said land to Nathaniel Fifield." There is not an intimation in this letter, nor in any part of the record, that Fifield was expected to become a purchaser. The bond was given to him to put the land into the market; that is, to enable him to make a sale of it. Can there be any doubt that the sole object of the owners was to enable Fifield to sell the land for their benefit? I think not. My opinion therefore is, that Fifield was substantially made an agent, and that the legal consequences of an agency must follow.

Brastow, in his letter, says: "We told two of our company they had better put the land into the market, and in pursuance of this advice the bond was given to Fifield." Who are included under this plural designation we, does not appear; and it cannot, therefore, be determined who concurred beforehand in this arrangement with Fifield. It is certain that Brastow did, and there can be no difficulty in holding him responsible. But Crosby, in his answer, denies that he took any part in it, and there is no evidence tending to show that he did, or that he knew of its existence until some time after it was completed. He admits, however, that he consented to sell his interest in the land at six dollars an acre. And when the pre-emption contract became known to him, he did not dissent but acquiesced; and, after the sale was made by Fifield, finally ratified it without any inquiry into the circumstances or authority under which the contract with Fifield was made, or the proceedings of Fifield in making the sale. Brastow and the other owners derived no authority to sell the interest of Crosby, from the naked fact that they were jointly interested in the land. Yet when they had all determined to sell for a fixed price, an authority to act for all, in making the preliminary arrangements, might be more easily inferred than it would be under other circumstances. It is a fair and reasonable deduction from the whole evidence, that Crosby passively acquiesced and allowed the acts of Brastow and the other owners, and this silent acquiescence, all the parties living in the same neighborhood, and the subsequent ratification of the sale, under the circumstances, will, in law, be equivalent to a prior mandate. A court of equity would be going a great way in covering up wrong to allow a part owner to lie by silently and permit his co-owner to practice a fraud in the sale of the joint property, and to take with impunity the fruits of the fraud, merely because he was not actively engaged in perpetrating it. My opinion on the whole case is, that though Crosby had no active participation in constituting Fifield an agent to sell, nor in any of the representations that led to the sale, he must be held as a principal, for the acts of Fifield, at least so far as he has been enriched by the fraud at the expense of the plaintiffs. "Jure naturae aequum est, neminem cum alterius detrimento et injuria fieri locupletiorem." Dig. 17, 50, 206.

This brings us to the last question in the cause, and which was strongly contested at the argument. If the right to rescind the contract ever existed, has it been lost by lapse of time? I have found more difficulty in coming to a conclusion satisfactory to my own mind on this point, than in any other part of the case.

In cases of fraud, time begins to run against the remedy only from the discovery of the fraud. Brooksbank v. Smith, 2 Younge & C. Exch. 58; Blennerhassett v. Day, 2 Ball & B. 129. The contract was, in this case, made in August, 1835, but the deception which had been practiced on the plaintiffs, was not in fact discovered until the fall of 1836. Suspicions had indeed before arisen in their minds, that the representations which had been made to them were highly exaggerated and untrue, but the real state of the facts was not known to them till something more than a year after the contract was made. The bill was filed in August, 1841, so that even the six years' limitation at law had not expired when the suit was commenced. If, then, the plaintiffs are barred, by lapse of time, of equitable relief, it is not by the statute of limitations operating, by analogy, in equity, as it does directly at law. If relief is denied on this ground, it will not be by the application of the legal prescription, but on the mere general ground, that the plaintiffs have slept on their rights for such a length of time that the claim has become stale and antiquated. The ancient brocard, "vigilantibus non dormientibus subvenit lex," is applied in equity, in some cases, with more stringency than at law, and therefore equity will sometimes, under peculiar circumstances, hold a party barred of equitable relief when he is not of his legal right. Then it simply withholds its hand and leaves a party to his remedy at law.

It would have been more satisfactory if legal proceedings had been instituted, in this case, at an earlier period, and while the matter was fresh. But the delay is in part accounted for. In the first place, negotiations were undertaken to effect a compromise. They failed, but some time was consumed in this way. And in the second place, the plaintiffs had been ruined and stripped of their whole property by the fraud, and were destitute of the pecuniary means of prosecuting their rights at law. It is said by Lord Redesdale, that the court cannot take into consideration, as an excuse for delay, the pecuniary embarrassments of suitors, for if this were done, there would be an end of all limitations of actions for distressed parties. Hovenden v. Lord Annesley, 2 Schoales & L. 639. But this was said in a case where the plaintiffs had slept on their rights sixty years, and in which the court held, on a full consideration of the subject that every equitable right must be prosecuted within twenty years, or it would be barred by the statute of limitations operating by analogy on equitable rights, as it does directly at law. But when the delay has been so great as to create a statute bar at law, it is not so clear that the pecuniary embarrassments of a suitor may not excuse some delay, so far as to relieve the plaintiff's claim from the imputation of staleness, especially when his embarrassments have been occasioned by the acts of the defendant. On the contrary, it appears to me entitled to consideration. For when a defendant relies for his protection, in equity, on lapse of time, independent of the statute bar, he addresses himself peculiarly to the conscience and discretion of the court. This is not an exemption which he can claim of strict right; but he puts his defense either on the particular equities of his own case, or on the general policy of discouraging the litigation of stale and antiquated demands. Now when the plaintiff pleads, as an excuse for delay, his inability to meet the necessary expenses of prosecuting his rights, and this inability is occasioned by the very fraud for which he seeks redress, this plea certainly goes far towards overcoming the defendant's objections, whether addressed to the conscience or prudence of the court. Such is the case with the present plaintiffs, and my opinion is, that they have not come into equity too late to be heard, though they may not be entitled to all the relief they might have had if they had come earlier.

The legal title to the land was in the defendants, and the deed was executed by them. But by an agreement between the parties concerned in the speculation, these two defendants were to have but one-sixth each of the interest in the purchase of Smith. Two-thirds was in several other persons, and this was known soon after, if not at the time when the bargain was completed. The money which was paid was distributed among the parties in proportion to the interest they had under this agreement. These persons should properly have been made parties, and if not known when the original bill was filed, should have been brought into the case by a supplemental bill. As this has not been done, the decree cannot affect their rights. Still, as Crosby and Brastow held the whole legal title, and were ostensibly the sole contracting parties, they might, perhaps, if the suit had been commenced as soon as the fraud was discovered, have been held for the whole and left to seek contributions among the other parties in interest. But since that time some of them have become insolvent, and it is not equally in the power of the defendants now to recall the money, as it would have been had the suit been promptly commenced. The delay has occasioned this inconvenience to them, that if they are now held to refund the whole of that part of the purchase-money received, the decree will operate, as to them, not simply to put them back in the same situation as they would have been in, if no contract had been made, but they will sustain an actual loss. It would be throwing on them a loss occasioned by the act, that is, the delay of the plaintiffs. If the defendants had been actively engaged in concocting the fraud, they might have been held responsible in solido, and left to bear the loss arising from the insolvency of the other parties. But there is no ground for imputing to them fraud, personally, certainly not to Crosby. They had not, and did not pretend to have, any personal knowledge of the land, but bought on the representations of others. It appears to me, therefore, that it would be inequitable to visit upon them the consequences of this delay of the plaintiffs. And a court of equity has authority not only to prescribe the terms on which it will grant relief, but to mold and temper its relief so as to meet all the equities of the case. My opinion, on the whole, is, that the sale should be declared void, as to so much of the land as, by the agreement of the vendors, belonged to Crosby and Brastow: that the outstanding notes in the hands of the defendants be ordered to be given up and cancelled; and that each of the defendants be decreed severally to restore to the plaintiffs so much of the purchase-money as they each severally received to their own use, and that it be referred to a master to examine and report the amount so received and to be repaid, and that the plaintiffs be required to release to the defendants such undivided portion of the land as equitably belonged to them according to the agreement aforesaid, and that all further action be reserved to the coming in of the master's report.

[Circuit Justice Woodbury delivered an opinion to the same effect in this case. See Case No. 9,234. Subsequently the master filed his report, which was excepted to. The exceptions were heard and overruled in Case No. 9,236.]

MASON et al. v. CROSBY et al.

[3 Woodb. & M. 258.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Oct. Term, 1847.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY—MASTER'S REPORT—SIMILARITY TO VERDICT—FOR WHAT SET ASIDE—WHO MAY QUESTION—IMMATERIAL ERROR.

1. The report of a master in chancery, like the verdict of a jury, relates only to facts, and as to them will not be reconsidered and set aside, unless some clear mistake or abuse of power is shown.

[Cited in Celluloid Manuf'g Co. v. Cellonite Manuf'g Co., 40 Fed. 476; Welling v. La Bau, 34 Fed. 42.]

[Cited in Butterfield v. Beardsley, 28 Mich. 423; Hulings v. Hulings Lumber Co., 38 W. Va. 370, 18 S. E. 627.]

2. The burthen of proof is on the party objecting to the report.

3. Third persons, after a contract is executed, cannot question its consideration.

4. If a master err in some respects, which do not appear to have produced results materially different from what would otherwise have happened, it is no ground for setting aside or recommitting his report.

After the decree in this case before given [Cases Nos. 9,234 and 9,235], a master was appointed, who made a report, a copy of which is annexed:

"District of Maine, ss. U. S. Circuit Court.

"Horatio Mason et al., in Equity, v. James Crosby et al.

"Pursuant to a decretal order made in the above cause at the October term, 1846, of said court, by which among other things it was ordered, adjudged and decreed: That the contract, conveyance, mortgage and notes in complainant's bill mentioned, ought to be declared, and thereby were declared null, void and rescinded. That the money received therefor by the respondents and others on their account, being their creditors, at any time before the filing of the bill, and retained and not paid over to other persons interested in the premises at the time of the sale, on their shares, ought to be, and thereby was ordered to be refunded by each in the proportion so received and retained for his interest therein, but on account of the delay of filing the bill, and other circumstances, they are not to be held accountable for other money paid over to other persons then interested. That the notes so received by them, unless paid over, or assigned to others then interested, and for their shares therein, are adjudged to be returned to the complainants by the respondents, as they may be in their joint or several possession or control. That each of the respondents be further ordered to pay interest on all such moneys received and retained from the time of such receipt to the time of final judgment in this case, deducting therefrom their share in the value of any timber taken from said premises by the complainants or their order. That the respondents be decreed severally to pay their share of any taxes on said premises advanced by the complainants, and of any improvements made by them thereon. That on the repayments of the money received and retained, as aforesaid, by each of the respondents, and the surrender of the notes, equal together to the amount of his share or equitable interest in said premises at the time of the conveyance, with the interest, taxes and improvements aforesaid, the complainants are ordered to execute a release to each so doing, of all their title and interest in the share in the premises so equitably belonging to that respondent. That on the surrender, by either of the respondents, of notes which, with the money paid over by him as aforesaid, exceed what was paid for his share in the premises, the plaintiffs be directed to release to such respondents, in trust for other shareholders at the time of the sale, a further interest in the premises, corresponding to the proportion which such excess of notes bears to the whole consideration paid by the complainants. That the respondents were ordered to be thus responsible, and to this extent, notwithstanding the non joinder of others in the bill who had some equitable interest in the premises at the time of the sale. That the complainants are thus entitled to a decree, although one of them, since the sale, has released his interest in the premises to the other. That it be referred to a master to ascertain the amounts of money, interest, taxes and improvements, value of timber, notes, &c., before named, and prepare suitable conveyances to be executed as aforesaid, and have power to examine witnesses, and require disclosures of the parties under oath, and the production of papers pertinent to said inquiries, and do all other things appertaining to a master on the subject. I the subscriber, the master appointed for the purposes hereinbefore recited, submit the following report: I have been attended, agreeably to notice duly served and returned, by J. P. Bishop, Esq., counsel for the complainants, and by the defendant, James Crosby, and his counsel, Edward Kent, Esq., also by Deodat Brastow and William F. Boynton, executors, in Maine, of the defendant Brastow, deceased, and for whom also Mr. Kent acted as counsel. The consideration by the master of so much of said decree as relates to the notes of the complainants in possession of said defendants, or their assigns, and the surrender of the same to said complainants; so much as concerns the value of timber taken from the premises, or stumpage therefor; so much as relates to the payment of taxes and the character and value of permanent improvements on the premises; so much as has regard to the release by the complainants of any part of said premises to said defendants, or either of them, in trust, or otherwise, and the preparation of suitable conveyances for that purpose; and the consideration of all other matters in said decree not hereinbefore recited, except those hereinafter fully and particularly stated, have been waived by the parties respectively, or their counsel.

"The complainants by their counsel claimed to charge the defendant Crosby, upon the pleadings and evidence in the cause, upon that produced to me, and upon the examination of said Crosby for the sum of fourteen thousand three hundred forty-two dollars and thirty-five cents; and the said Brastow's estate in the sum of eleven thousand six hundred and thirty dollars and thirty cents, including interest on the sums received by them respectively: the complainants insisting that said Crosby and said Brastow were responsible and were bound to refund to complainants all moneys received by them from the complainants, although said defendants had paid over certain proportional parts of said moneys to Sam Thurston, Brazier Brastow, Joseph Porter and John D. Wilson, as persons equitably interested in said premises at the time of the sale thereof to the complainants. To maintain this position, said complainants contended that the contracts between said defendants and said Thurston and others, were either parol agreements concerning real-estate, or bonds for the conveyance of certain parts of said premises to them respectively, on certain conditions which were never performed, giving said Thurston and others the mere right of preëmption. But the bill having charged one Fifield to be the agent of the defendants to negotiate a sale thereof, for the benefit and interest of said defendants, as well as said Fifield, and also for the benefit of other persons then unknown to the complainants, and the defendants by their answers having, in substance, admitted that such sale to the complainants was made for the benefit of themselves and of said Thurston, B. Brastow, Porter and Wilson, and the pleadings and proofs in the case and before the master, seeming to recognize said Thurston, B. Brastow, Porter and Wilson, as persons interested with the defendants at the time of the sale to the complainants, I have not felt at liberty to reconsider the evidence on which said decree was founded, or to give a different effect to the evidence adduced by the complainants or defendants at the hearing before me. I have, therefore, considered all moneys paid by the defendants, or either of them, to said Thurston, B. Brastow, Porter and Wilson, as paid to persons interested at the time of the sale to complainants. And for the same reasons, as between the defendant Brastow and William F. Boynton, although with some hesitation, I have treated moneys paid by the former to the latter, as paid to a person interested at the time of the sale to the complainants.

"It appeared that in pursuance of an agreement between the defendants and said Thurston, B. Brastow, Porter and Wilson, that the latter were entitled to receive certain proportions of all moneys which were to be paid by complainants to the defendants; that the complainants gave a mortgage to the defendants, conditioned to pay certain notes to one Munroe, given by the defendants to said Munroe as part consideration for the land in controversy; that the defendants alone having signed said notes, and being legally responsible for the same, they took a bond from said Thurston, B. Brastow, Porter and Wilson, by which they assumed the responsibility of paying one-half of said notes of said defendants to said Munroe, if the same should not be paid by the complainants. It further appeared that some of said notes to Munroe were taken up by said Crosby and Brastow, and not by the complainants; that the defendants commenced an action on said bond, and recovered judgment thereon for one-half of one of said notes, and that said judgment was nearly satisfied by a levy of execution on the estate of said Thurston and others, or of some of them.

"Upon this state of facts, the complainants insisted that the money so recovered of said Thurston, B. Brastow, Porter and Wilson, if they were to be considered as persons equitably interested at the time of the sale, (but which was denied,) must be deemed and taken to be the proper money of the complainants paid to defendants, and that if the same was so distributed by defendants to Thurston and others, said recovery and satisfaction were to be construed as a refunding of the same to the defendants. But I consider it otherwise, and have made no allowance to the complainants for any part of said money. In ascertaining the amount of money paid by the complainants to the defendants, one or both of them, my attention has been called by the complainants to no other evidence than the pleadings and proofs in the cause. No testimony on this point has been offered by either party, and both parties have relied on the case as printed to establish the proper sum. That each party may have the benefit of exception to my report on this point, it may not be improper to state the grounds of it. The bill states the sum paid in cash at the time of the purchase somewhat indefinitely at nearly ten thousand dollars; and the further sum of two thousand five hundred and fifty-one dollars on one of the several notes given in part payment for the consideration of defendants' deed; and also the sum of three thousand three hundred and fourteen dollars on one of the Munroe notes, which they had undertaken to pay, and had secured by mortgage to the defendants, in all, the sum of $15,865. These being material averments and discovery in respect to them being called for in the bill, required a full and careful answer, and both defendants have concurred in their several answers as to the sums paid, and the time and mode of payment, and which are hereafter particularly set forth, the total amount of which payments by the complainants, exclusive of interest, is alleged to be $12,647.06. The complainants, however, insist that it appears from the testimony of Elias Bullard, that they paid an additional sum of $2,200, but it seems to me that the testimony of Bullard on this point fails to establish the fact of any other payments than those particularly set forth in the answers.

"I therefore find the whole sum paid by complainants on account of the contract rescinded by the decree, to have been twelve thousand six hundred forty-seven dollars and six cents. I further find that said Crosby received or had the benefit of one-sixth part of the amount of the first payment by complainants to the defendants, and of the sum paid by complainants to Munroe; and that said Brastow received, retained and had the benefit of one-sixth part of said first payment, two-sixth part of the payment to Munroe, (Brastow at the time of said payment having become the owner of Boynton's share,) and for one-half the payment to said Brastow on Aug. 28, 1836, (said Brastow at that time having purchased Crosby's interest in addition to Boynton's, in the complainant's notes and mortgage,) and that each is chargeable with interest on those sums or proportions respectively, and which I have cast to May 1, 1847, and to be computed on the principal sums from said day to final judgment.

"Upon the foregoing principles, I find there is due from James Crosby to the complainants the sum of two thousand eight hundred fifty-seven dollars and eighteen cents, and no more, as per Schedule A; that there is due from the estate of the defendant, Deodat Brastow, deceased, the sum of five thousand nine hundred and fifty-eight dollars and twenty-two cents, and no more, as per Schedule B hereto annexed.

"All of which is respectfully submitted.

"Bangor, May 1, 1847.

"Fred. Hobbs, Master in Chancery."

Schedule A, referred to in this report, contains a statement of the moneys paid by the complainants to and for the use of James Crosby, one of said defendants, or received by him and not paid to others interested in the premises at the time of the sale to the complainants, viz.:

Fred. Hobbs, Master.

To this report the respondents filed several exceptions, with a written argument attached to each. A copy of the exceptions, without the arguments, is annexed:

"Maine, ss. Circuit Court U. S. in Equity.

"Horatio Mason et al. v. James Crosby et al.

"Exceptions taken by the complainants to the report of Frederick Hobbs, Esq., one of the masters in this honorable court, bearing date the first day of May, A. D., 1847, and filed in court the —— day of the same May, made in this cause, to whom the same stood referred by the decretal order bearing date the —— day of October, A. D., 1847:

"First—Because said master, in and by his report, certified 'that the defendants received of the complainants, in payment for said land, the sum of $12,647.06, and no more.'

"Second—Because said master, by his said report, has certified $3,537.77 as interest due up to the 1st of said May upon said money paid by complainants.

"Third—Because said master has, by his report, certified that defendant Crosby was bound to refund to the complainants the sum of $2,857.18, and no more.

To wit, the principal sum received by him.....	$1,697 70
Interest upon the same.....	1,150 48
	$2,857 18

"Fourth—Because said master, as appears by his report, 'did not feel at liberty to give effect to evidence adduced by the complainants,' upon a supposition that the court, by said decree, had conclusively settled, as a fact, that said Porter, Thurston, Brazier Brastow, Wilson and Boynton were equitably interested in lands at the time of said sale, and that he had no right to enquire whether such were the case or not.

"Fifth—Because said master, in his said report, makes no distinction between transactions between the defendants themselves, and between defendants and others prior to and after said sale, and treats the said Porter, Thurston, Brazier Brastow, Wilson and Boynton as though all the obligations between them and the defendants existed prior to and at the time of the sale."

These exceptions and the report were also accompanied by a statement of the new evidence laid before the master; and an exhibit of the claims and offers made before him by each party as to all the matters in dispute. These, when important, will be explained in the opinion of the court. The original complainants moved also for leave, on this hearing, to submit further evidence in support of these exceptions, which leave was not granted.

Mr. Bishop, in support of them.

W. P. Fessenden and Mr. Kent, against them.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. At the hearing of the exceptions in this case, a motion to introduce further evidence in their support was made by the complainants, and overruled. But if that disposition of it had, on maturer consideration, been found to be improper, we would still admit the evidence before deciding on the exceptions. But we think the ruling was right under all the circumstances. Because the further evidence was offered without any previous notice to the opposite party of a wish to offer more proof, or of a willingness that more might be adduced by them. The court, therefore, decided that the evidence could not be admitted without granting a like privilege to the other side, and allowing time to improve the privilege thus granted, and that, on such terms of mutuality and time allowed, it might be admitted. The plaintiffs objected to this indulgence to the other side, and hence we still think they were rightfully precluded from doing what they did not consent their antagonists should be allowed time to do.

In respect to the exceptions themselves, most of them seem chiefly to rest on an impression that the court, when a master's report is returned, should retry and reëxamine and decide on all the questions of fact, as well as law, raised before the master. But we regard the office of a master in chancery somewhat like that of a jury in the courts of common law. Originally there were twelve masters in number, and their duties were not only limited, in the progress of time, to matters of fact, but chiefly to those of mere debt and credit, and computation of interest. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. When they have once decided on these facts, and no legal question is involved in them, their report should stand probably without amendment here, or without recommitment, unless reasons exist for either, as strong as will justify setting aside a verdict. If there has been a clear mistake, or a palpable abuse of power, either of them ought to be corrected. But if the court should enquire or act beyond that, as to matters of fact, the office of master would prove but little aid in the administration of justice—the court being compelled to go over all the facts again, and thus their labors be greatly and unnecessarily increased. When a party has enjoyed one full hearing as to the facts involved in his claims of debt, credit, interest and kindred topics, there seems little justification for going into another, unless the master has clearly fallen into a mistake, or clearly abused the power confided to him. Without such a limitation, no prospect would exist of putting an end to litigation.

Proceeding to the examination of the different exceptions, with these views, our conclusions are, that judgment must be rendered in conformity to the report.

The first exception is, in substance, that the whole sum received by the defendants of the plaintiffs in money, was larger than that found by the master. But this was a fact involving no principle of law, and concerning which the testimony on the points in doubt was contradictory. The evidence, in one view of the subject, showed more, and in another view, near the amount found by the master. The probability seems to be, that if the plaintiffs paid more than $6,275, the sum allowed by the master, it was in the course of the business paid to Fifield, and not retained by the respondents; and that the notes to Fifield, and endorsed by him, were substituted for any money beyond that sum. After the lapse of eleven or twelve years, the truth is not likely to be attainable with much exactness, and this delay is so much more the fault of the plaintiffs in this case, than of the respondents, as to have formerly caused a decree, in some respects less favorable to them than it otherwise would have been. Not taking a receipt or some written evidences of the amount of money paid by them at the time of the sale, whether to the respondents or Fifield, (which is the chief cause of the difficulty on this point,) is another neglect on their part, the consequences of which must fall, rather on them than the defendants. It is the business of the former, rather than the latter, to remove doubts and uncertainties as to the larger amount claimed. Not doing this, and there being evidence to justify either view, the master has allowed the smaller sum; and we do not see enough in the case to warrant a belief that it has been done through any clear mistake, or abuse of power.

The second exception is merely a branch of the first, being that the interest allowed is not sufficient for the whole principal paid. It falls with the first exception, as the interest is enough in amount, if the principal allowed was probably enough, and we have already decided that it was, in respect to this item.

The third exception raises a question of law, rather than fact, since it contends that the defendant Crosby is not charged with enough in other respects, as he is allowed payments made before the bill was filed to other persons claiming to possess an interest in the land at the time of the sale in 1835 to the plaintiffs, when, in truth, the plaintiffs argued that those other persons then possessed neither an equitable nor legal interest in the premises, sufficient, in law, to justify such payments. But the fact is undoubted that they claimed some interest there; that the claim was then admitted by the respondents; that even the complainants alleged in their bill the existence of such interests, but without knowing the names of the parties; that the respondents gave their names and proportions of interests in their answers, and that the only question made in this matter at the hearing, was whether an interest like theirs, not by deed, but by bond in most of the cases, made it imperative on the plaintiffs to join them all as defendants in the bill.

Now, although several of the matters in the answers as to this may be not precisely responsive to the bill,—8 Cow. 387; 1 Johns. Ch. 580; 2 Johns. Ch. 88; 3 Blackf. 18; 8 Pick. 113; 4 Paige, 22; 15 Me. 125; Randall v. Phillips [Case No. 11,555],—and a bill with no formal interrogatories renders it more difficult to decide, with exactness, what is and what is not responsive, yet there is other evidence than these answers that these persons were interested. That was the, first step to be proved, before considering its effect. That was amply shown, without the answer, by the bond from the respondents to Smith, which had been assigned to most of those persons claiming an interest; next, by the bond of most of them given to pay their proportions of the original consideration for the land to Munroe; next, by the active part some of them took in getting certificates and an agent to make this new sale; next, by the testimony of most of them, on the stand, in support of their interest; and finally, by the allegations in the bill, and the grounds taken at the hearing and in the decree. It cannot be set up by any persons, that such a bond did not, in law, give an equitable interest, for want of consideration, when it is a sealed instrument. Or, in the case of Boynton, (one of them not included in the assignment of the bond,) that his interest was by parol, and without consideration, or was not mutual, when he procured one of the defendants to make the advances for him, and when the contract has already been executed, and this objection comes afterwards from a third person, and not a party to the agreement. See Tufts v. Tufts [Case No. 14,233], Mass. Dist., Oct. term, 1847.

An executed contract, though without consideration, mutuality or writing, to take it out of the statute of frauds, cannot afterwards be objected to by third persons, if it can be by the parties, however the latter may object while it is executing. And where one has stipulated to allow another an interest in certain premises, and admits, in his answer, that the interest was a just one, and this interest has since been recognized and executed, it is too late for other persons to object to the legal or equitable propriety of it, and on that account to attempt to avoid it. See cases in Tufts v. Tufts [supra]. It will not do in chancery to consider it unconscientious or unjust to treat such an interest as valid, when the parties to it have not chosen to make any objection, either on technical or substantial grounds. Nor would this decision, exonerating the defendants from what they had paid to others interested with them at the sale, and done many years before the present suit, and some time before any offer to rescind the sale by the plaintiffs, be at all injurious to the plaintiffs, if they exercised proper vigilance and diligence. These third persons could have been separately prosecuted early, and the due shares of money received from them, rather than the respondents. Or even in this bill, after their names and respective amounts of interests and money received, had been disclosed by the respondents, they could, as was requested, have been made co-defendants, and their proportions recovered back.

Considering the interests of all these other persons beside the defendants, to whom parts of the consideration were paid at the time as proved by testimony and circumstances, even without the aid of the answers of the defendants, it becomes of little importance what in them is or is not responsive on this point, and the only remaining objection under this exception is to the want of proper evidence to show actual payments made to these subclaimants to the extent of their interests. The evidence, as to that, consists, also, in part, of matter in the answers. Those are very clear to prove the payment and were not contested at the hearing of the original cause, but are now objected to as incompetent to prove them. Even now, they can separately be proceeded against, and made liable, unless the neglect of the plaintiffs has been such as to exonerate them, or they have some other valid defence. So if the defendants had been sued earlier, and the contract rescinded earlier, less harm or injustice would have happened in making them chargeable for all which went into their hands at first, as their resort over to others receiving it from them, might have thus been more early and successful, while by such delay their remedy over would probably now, in most instances, be worthless. It is probable that some of the answers in respect to this last fact, also, may not be exactly responsive to the bill, and might not alone suffice. Looking, however, to the other testimony, there seems little doubt from that. The oaths of Boynton, himself, Thurston, Porter and others, before the master, and the bond given by most of them to pay their portions of the original consideration, and the fact already and otherwise established, that they were interested in the land in certain proportions, are strong to show that they have been paid all to which they were entitled. The very lapse of time which was before referred to, being so long, and no existing claim being made of a failure to pay any of them, coupled with the continued ability of, at least, one of the defendants, to comply with their obligations, is quite decisive that the payments have been adjusted in conformity with the promises and right which really existed.

There is a further exception taken by the plaintiffs, that the defendants are not charged with the whole of $3,910, which the plaintiffs paid for them to Munroe. They were charged with only such portions of it as their interests required them in the end to pay. This, we think, was sufficient. They held the whole legal title to the land by deed, and gave their notes for the whole consideration. When they sold it for all interested, and paid over to others the proportions of the money received, it was proper, as the original consideration was not yet due, to take from the others' obligations to pay their ratio of it. They thus stood in the capacity of trustees, both for buying and selling, and all they did, in these respects, was not for themselves alone, owning but portions, or for themselves as joint obligors. It was rather for all possessing an interest in the premises. And when they received the $3,910, and paid it over to Munroe, as that was the substance of the transaction, it being paid by the plaintiffs for them, they received as well as paid it for all in their due proportions, and are liable individually for only the shares they themselves owned, or were bound to pay. Only that was to go to their real and final benefit, and that they are required to restore. As to the residue, when they collected money of the others to help pay for that, (which was owing to Munroe, and which they alone were bound to him to advance,) they collected only the portions which remained due from the others after applying their share of the $3,910. They hence cannot be considered as recovering back anything of this $3,910, but receiving the balance due from the others interested, after allowing to them their share in that sum paid by the plaintiffs.

The fourth exception is founded on the idea, that the master took for granted, as if already settled by the decree, what he ought to have decided on evidence offered before him, i. e. the interest of these particular claimants under the defendants. Now, although the fact of an interest in third persons had been alleged in the bill itself, and admitted in the answer, and proved by various testimony, yet I am not aware that the names of those possessing such an interest, or their exact proportions, were shown with precision, except in answers. And as those answers may not, in these respects, have been responsive to the bill, it would have been proper for the master to have resorted to other evidence for these particulars. The decree did not decide who in fact were the particular claimants, and their proportions, as it was not necessary, in order to decide on the merits. Again, it did not seem to be controverted, that these persons named by the master were the persons, and had the proportions in the sub-claim under the defendants, which both sides conceded to exist.

Has this view of the master, then, if to some extent erroneous, led to any error or mistake in the results? That is not pretended. All the evidence and circumstances concurred in support of that interest, and it is well settled, as to errors in ruling on evidence by courts, that if it do not appear to have changed the verdict from what it would otherwise be, a new trial will not be awarded. Allen v. Blunt [Case No. 217]; Taylor v. Carpenter [Id. 13,785]; and cases cited in them.

The fifth and last objection is, that the master does not distinguish between rights and obligations of the defendants or transactions of theirs with others after the sale of the land, and those before. But this, I apprehend, is misunderstood. The master does not appear to have taken the interests or duties of the parties for a guide, as they stood at any other time than the sale, though he may, and properly has, looked to their transactions afterwards, as in pursuance and in affirmance of those previous interests and duties. And at times they may be some evidence of what the prior contracts and interests had been, and therefore deserve attention in that view. But we see no instance of the master's making any new arrangement after the sale, a test or standard of any old obligations. The new bond, given by the sub-claimants after the sale, to pay their proportion of the original consideration to Munroe, if not paid by the plaintiffs, is the new contract or transaction which is probably meant to be referred to. But that was only a new form of securing what was their duty before to accomplish, i. e. the payment of that portion of the consideration to be paid for the land, which their share in the land rendered proper. The duty to pay that existed from the time their interest existed, and the new bond was only a new evidence or new security concerning it.

Judgment according to the report on the decree.

MASON v. CUTTS.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 465.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1838.

EQUITABLE LIEN—FRENCH AWARD—ADVANCES TO SHIP—BILLS OF EXCHANGE TAKEN.

1. Advances to a master of a ship seized and carried into France, in 1810, and liberated after eighteen months' detention, made after her release to enable her to prosecute her homeward voyage, are not a lien upon the compensation awarded to the administrator of the owner, by the commissioners under the French convention.

2. The plaintiff must resort to the administrator of the owner for payment in the ordinary course of administration; especially if the person making the advances takes bills of exchange for the amount advanced.

Bill in equity by [Gilbeck Mason,] the administrator of James Leveaux, against [Hiram Cutts] the administrator of Thomas Brown, to which the defendant filed a general demurrer. The bill stated that in 1810, the ship General Eaton, J. S. Place, master, owned by Thomas Brown, a citizen of the United States, was captured by a French privateer, and carried into Calais. That in 1812 she was liberated, but before she could proceed on her homeward voyage, it was necessary that she should undergo considerable repairs, and be fitted for the voyage; that Captain Place not having the funds for that purpose, applied to the deceased, (Leveaux,) who made the necessary advances therefor to the amount of 20,463 francs, including costs of protest and damages on certain bills of exchange drawn by Captain Place, on his correspondents in London, for the reimbursement of said advances; that the ship was afterwards seized and detained at an English port; that the advances have never been repaid, and that the owner, Thomas Brown, died insolvent; that the commissioner under the French treaty, allowed the claim of Hiram Cutts, administrator of the owner, Thomas Brown, for detention of the ship and expenses, to the amount of $4,687; a certificate of which is about to be issued from the treasury of the United States, which will be paid to the said Hiram Cutts, unless prevented by an order of this court. That the plaintiff has a just claim on the amount so awarded to the said Cutts, for the amount of his said advances, "and is entirely without remedy at law to obtain the benefit of his lien on said fund, and can only obtain the same by the equitable interference of this honorable court."

The plaintiff contends, in his bill, "that he is not bound to resort to the estate of said Brown, or to those funds thus awarded, as a general creditor of said Brown's estate, but that he has an equitable claim on the fund itself, for the amount of his advances as aforesaid, and the interest due thereon, which he believes will amount to as much as the sum to be received on said award," and prays a decree therefor, and for general relief.

Mr. Key, for plaintiff, cited Sheppard v. Taylor, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 692, 710; The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438; Forster v. Hale, 3 Ves. 696; Duke of Bolton v. Williams; 4 Brown, Ch. 430.

R. S. Coxe, contrà. The plaintiff's intestate never had any lien on the ship for his advances; and if he had, he has none upon the money awarded, which does not represent the ship, but merely demurrage, and expenses of prosecuting the claim before the French tribunals. But whatever lien he might have had, he abandoned by taking bills of exchange for the amount of his advances, and by suffering the ship to depart. He can now claim only as a general creditor, and must look to the administrator in the regular course of administration. This case is very different from that of Sheppard v. Taylor [supra], where the award was for the loss of the ship, and stood in the place of the ship, and liable to all liens by which the ship was bound.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) decided, that the plaintiff's intestate had not a specific lien on the ship; and if he had, he abandoned it when he received bills of exchange for the amount of his claim, and therefore he can only come in as a general creditor of Brown, and receive his dividend in the due course of administration.

MASON v. INGRAHAM.

[5 Ben. 81.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. March, 1871.

PILOTS—TENDER OF SERVICE—HALF PILOTAGE—AGENT OF VESSEL.

The pilotage law of New York provided, that in case of a tender of service by a pilot to a vessel, and a refusal of such service, half pilotage should be due and recoverable of the agent of the vessel. A pilot filed a libel on such a cause of action against a person, who was not at the time of the tender the consignee of the vessel, who did not act for her under a general employment, and who did not collect her freight. Held, that, in order to charge a person with liability as agent, under the act, it is necessary to show that he had some connection with the vessel at the time, and that the defendant was not liable.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action by a pilot to recover half pilotage of the defendant, as the agent of the bark R. B. Walker. It involves the same question of jurisdiction decided in the case of Banta v. McNeil [Case No. 966], to which reference is made for my opinion thereon. There is, however, another question in this case, which has not arisen in former half pilotage cases decided in this court. Here the right to recover is rested upon the state statute, which, it is claimed, creates a liability for half pilotage on behalf of the agent of the ship to which the tender is made; and it is only as agent that the defendant is sought to be held, as he was not master or part owner. Upon this point, it is sufficient to say that, in my opinion, it is at least necessary, in order to charge a person, in the capacity of agent, with a liability of this description, to show that he had some connection with the vessel. At the time of the pilot's tender, the defendant was not the consignee of the vessel, nor did he act for her under any general employment. Her freight was not collected by him, nor does it appear that he was in any way connected with the vessel at the time the libellant's cause of action arose.

The libel must, therefore, be dismissed.

MASON v. JONES.

[1 Hayw. & H. 323.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. 27, 1847.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY—MOTION TO FILE ANSWER—DEFENDANT IN CONTEMPT.

1. It is of right and not favor for the defendant to file his answer before the decree nisi is made absolute.

2. A defendant in contempt in a cause against himself and others may file his answer in another cause against himself individually, though both suits relate to the same matter.

An injunction was granted in the case of Barnes vs. Jones and others, which was entered served on all the defendants [Thomas P. Jones, and Alexander Hunter, marshal of the District of Columbia]. The defendants did not appear to this suit nor answer the bill. On February 10, 1841, a writ was issued in the name of Jones against the complainant [John] Mason, Jr., on a note dated April 15, 1839, made by said Barnes to said Mason or order, endorsed by him and M. Clark, payable October 15 following. Mason was arrested, and special bail was put in. Mr. Marbury found his appearance entered; but having received no instructions, and never having seen Mason, he entered judgment at March term, 1842. A ca. sa. was issued, and Mason was taken in custody.

In January 13, 1843, Mason filed his bill. The bill and injunction of Barnes vs. Jones et al. was referred to as part of this bill. The prayer of the bill was that the judgment of March term might be opened, or relief granted here by perpetual injunction and cancellation of the said note. The injunction was returned served on Jones. He did not appear or answer. On June 24, 1845, a perpetual injunction was decreed nisi, which was served on July 1, and on October 24, 1845, before the decree became absolute, the defendant Jones' answer to the bill was brought into court and offered to be filed.

Objection being made by the complainant, the matter stood over and was heard at this term.

Henry May, for complainant.

Jos. H. Bradley, for defendants.

[1] [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and George C. Hazleton, Esq.]

May, for the complainant, objected to the reception of the answer, because Jones was in contempt by having violated the injunction granted in the Barnes Case against him and others by suing upon one of the notes. Har. Ch. 222, 263; Williamson v. Carnan, 1 Gill & J. 211, 213.

Bradley, contra, contended that it was the defendant's right to file his answer before decree nisi becomes absolute, and that the contempt, if there was any, was in another cause. 1 Smith, Ch. Prac. 61, note a; Alkroyd v. King, 8 Paige[2] [Akroyd v. Klug, 1 Ch. Sent. 39].

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The bill states that, in 1838, certain persons, among whom was the defendant, Thos. P. Jones, associated for the purpose, among other things, of procuring and getting cuttings of the morus multicaulis, and authorized John F. Callan to sell them, and he did, as their agent, sell Abraham Barnes a large number of cuttings, which cuttings the said J. F. Callan, for the said persons, warranted to vegetate and grow, if certain instructions were followed. That the said Barnes, relying on the said warranty, was induced to purchase of the said Callan, 125,000 cuttings, for which he gave his several promissory notes with the complainants and M. St. Clair Clarke as endorsers thereon, and that all the said proceedings were with the knowledge and assent of the said Thos. P. Jones and others. That the complainant does not recollect the amount of each note or the aggregate amount of them all, but will show the same to the court. That the complainant charges that there "was the most manifest fraud in the sale of the said cuttings, and that the same did not vegetate or grow, and there was a total failure of the consideration of the notes, notwithstanding the said Barnes did follow the instructions given, and did everything in his power to make the same vegetate and grow." "That the same was known to the said Callan and the said Thos. P. Jones and others." "And that the said sale was made fraudulently, and that the said notes were given without any consideration whatsoever, the one for which they were given having totally failed, as the complainant is informed and believes, and so charges." That the notes were given and taken for the benefit of said Thos. P. Jones and others. That, on the 19th June, 1839, the said Barnes obtained an injunction from this court to prevent the said Callan and the said Thos. P. Jones and others from passing the said notes or from suing upon the same, as will appear by reference to the proceedings in the case of the said Barnes against the said T. P. Jones and others in this court, which injunction was regularly served upon the said T. P. Jones. But the complainant charges that the said T. P. Jones, in defiance of the injunction, which was then and still is in force, has sued the complainants upon one of the notes so enjoined.

The complainant then charges that payment of the note had never been legally demanded—whereby the plaintiff was discharged. That, on the 10th of February, 1841, while the injunction in Barnes' Case, was in force, the said defendant Jones brought suit against this complainant (Mason) on one of the notes so enjoined in Barnes' Case. That, not being able to attend to the case in person, he applied to a friend to enter special bail for him and to employ counsel; and his special bail, through mistake, entered the appearance of Mr. Marbury, attorney-at-law, instead of Brent & Brent, who alone were acquainted with the facts of the case and of the defence, and to whom the complainant had spoken. That the complainant was ignorant that the appearance of Mr. Marbury had been entered as his counsel, until after he (Mr. Marbury) had confessed a judgment in the case at March term, 1842, and until the ca. sa. was served against him, this complainant. That the note upon which this judgment was founded was dated 15th of April, 1839, signed by Barnes, payable to the order of the complainant, on the 15th of October, 1839, and endorsed by the complainant. That the injunction in Barnes' Case was granted June 19th, 1839. That T. P. Jones, at the time of receiving the note, knew that the note was given for the cuttings, and that the consideration had totally failed. Upon this bill an injunction was issued on the 14th of January, 1843 (after the complainant, Mason, had been arrested on the ca. sa., but before his commitment in execution), to restrain the defendant "from proceeding further upon the judgment" at law, which had been rendered on the 4th of April, 1842. That on the 24th of June, 1845, the defendant T. P. Jones, having failed to appear and answer the bill within three months after the day of appearance and after the filing of the bill, it was taken pro confesso and a perpetual injunction decreed nisi, i. e., to be absolute unless cause to the contrary be shown at the term next succeeding "that to which the decree shall be returned executed." Before the decree became absolute, on the 24th of October, 1845, the defendant, T. P. Jones, by his counsel, moved for leave to file an answer.

This motion was resisted on the ground that the defendant was in contempt by having violated the injunction granted in Barnes' Case, June 19th, 1839, against this defendant and others, by bringing this action at law upon one of the notes included in that injunction, and that his answer in this case of Mason against Jones cannot be received while he is in contempt in the case of Barnes against Jones and others.

In support of the objection to the motion to file the defendant's answer, the counsel for the complainant cited Har. Ch. 222, but that authority only shows what acts will authorize an injunction and what will be a violation of the injunction, not that a party who is in contempt in one cause may not file his answer in another. The authority in Har. Ch. 263, only shows that, although the answer denies the whole equity of the bill, the injunction will not be dissolved until the defendant's contempts are cleared, meaning, no doubt, contempts committed in that cause.

The complainant's counsel also cited Williamson v. Carman, 1 Gill & J. 211, 213. But in that case the contempt was committed in that cause, and has no relation to the filing of the answer, which was filed May 13th, 1826. The only point in that case applicable to this is that the chancellor will not hear a motion to dissolve the injunction while the defendant is in arrest under an attachment for a contempt in violating the same injunction. But there are many cases in which a party who has committed a contempt even in the same cause may sustain a motion. Thus a plaintiff in contempt for non-payment of costs for an irregular motion can enforce an answer from the defendant (1 Smith, Ch. Prac. see note a); and it is only where a party in contempt applies for a favor that such an objection is available (Akroyd v. Klug, 2 Paige [3] [1 Ch. Sent. 39]).

Can a party be said to be in contempt unless he be attached for the contempt? for until attached or otherwise brought before the court non constat that he is guilty of the contempt, so as to prevent him from proceeding in his cause. In the present case the defendant did not apply to the court for a favor in offering to file his answer, for he had a right to file it at any time before the decree became absolute, and therefore the rule that a party in contempt cannot make a motion until he has cleared his contempt, is not applicable to this case. But the injunction which the defendant is charged with violating was not granted in the present cause, but in that of Barnes vs. Jones and others, and the defendant is not guilty of a contempt in this cause by being guilty of a contempt in another cause.

For these reasons I think the defendant has a right to file his answer, which was produced and offered to be filed before the decree nisi became absolute.

[For a hearing on motion to dissolve injunction, see Case No. 9,240.]

[3] These citations are incorrect. There is no case in any of Paige's Chancery Reports under the name of Alkroyd v. King or Akroyd v. Klug. In Johnson v. Pinney, 1 Paige, 646, the defendant applied for a commission to take testimony of a witness. The plaintiffs resisted the application, on the ground that the defendant was in contempt for not paying a bill of costs. The chancellor held that where a party is in contempt, the court will not grant an application in his favor which is not a matter of right. If he applies to the court for a favor, it will be granted, on condition that he purge his contempt by complying with the former order of the court.

Case No. 9,240.

MASON v. JONES et al.

[1 Hayw. & H. 329.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1848.

FRAUD—NOTES—DEFENSE—HOLDER WITHOUT NOTICE—FRAUD OF AGENT — EQUITABLE RELIEF—CONFESSION OF JUDGMENT—INJUNCTIONS—VIOLATION OF—PRINCIPAL.

1. The proper order, where the defence set up to a promissory note is fraud, is to restrain its negotiation and permit the parties to proceed at law.

2. An injunction against negotiating a promissory note is not violated by suing thereon, and proceeding to judgment and execution.

3. By praying that a bill in another cause may be made a part of the present bill, all its statements are considered as repeated, and must be answered.

4. All the facts stated in the bill, not denied by the answer, are taken as true on a motion to dissolve on final hearing. Facts not admitted must be proved.

5. Denial of fraud charged to have been committed by an agent is not sufficient on the information of the agent and the belief of the principal.

6. Fraud in the origin of a negotiable note is no defence against a bona fide holder without notice.

7. But a member of a company who discounted individually a note belonging to the company, without knowledge of any fraud in its origin, is affected by the fraud of the agent of the company.

8. Where a judgment has been confessed by an attorney through the negligence of the defendant, equity will not relieve.

9. Where B. filed his bill against I. and others, alleging fraud in a contract, which was not answered, and M. afterwards filed his bill against I. for relief against a judgment at law in relation to the same matter, though the fraud can not be tried in M.'s suit, the injunction obtained by him will be continued until B.'s suit shall be tried or disposed of.

10. It seems that after judgment an endorser is considered in equity a principal and not a surety.

11. Courts of law and equity have concurrent jurisdiction in cases where fraud is the ground of relief, and the court which first obtains possession of the case must settle the matter conclusively.

[In equity. Heard on motion to dissolve an injunction.]

In the spring of 1839 Abraham Barnes purchased 125,000 cuttings of the morus multicaulis of J. F. Callan, agent of the Washington City Silk Co., and gave his negotiable notes with M. Clarke and Mason as sureties for the price of the same. The aggregate of the notes was $5,000, payable, it was believed by Barnes, in two payments of $2,500 each on the 15th of Oct. and Nov., 1839. Callan was represented, when the purchase was made, to have warranted that the cuttings would vegetate and grow if certain instructions were followed. Barnes did not examine them until they were delivered, when he was struck with the dry appearance of the cuttings; notwithstanding, he set them out, following the instructions; but all of them, except about 2,700, did not vegetate, and at the time of the sale were dead and worthless. Upon discovering this Barnes, on June 19, 1839, filed his bill, stating as above and charging that the contract was made by Callan as the agent and with the knowledge of the members of the company, and that he knew the worthless condition of said cuttings, and fraudulently misrepresented the quality and condition thereof; and his said notes being negotiable, he sought an injunction against the same being negotiated or sued on, and an abatement to the extent of the partial failure of the consideration. The members of the company were Dr. Jones, Pierce Hall, Callan and a number of other persons, who were made defendants. It was charged that the notes were then held by said Callan, or some member of the company, and by no one who had paid a valuable consideration therefor without notice. An injunction was granted "against negotiating or passing away said notes," which was returned served on all the defendants. The defendants did not appear to this suit nor answer said bill. On February 10, 1841, a writ was issued in the name of said [Thomas P.] Jones against the complainant, [John] Mason, [Jr.], on a note dated April 15, 1839, made by said Barnes to said Mason or order, endorsed by him and M. Clarke, payable on October 15th, following, for $1,250. Mason was arrested, and special bail was put in. Mr. Marbury found his appearance entered; but having received no instructions, and never having seen Mason, he entered judgment at March term, 1842. A ca. sa. was issued, and Mason was taken into custody.

On January 13, 1843, Mason filed his bill, setting out the purchase of the cuttings by Barnes of Callan, as the agent of the company, and of one Kinsman, of Philadelphia, the warranty, and worthlessness of the cuttings as above stated; the giving of notes for the price, and the injunction granted at the instance of Barnes as aforesaid; the suit by Jones upon "one of said notes," given for said cuttings; that he had been sued by Kinsman upon "three of said notes," and had employed Brent & Brent, who were his attorneys, and to whom he had explained the transaction, and requested them to attend to any suits on said notes; that he attended to Kinsman's in person, and employed those gentlemen; but being unable to do so when sued by Jones, he requested a friend to enter bail and to employ counsel, who, by mistake, entered Mr. Marbury's name, instead of Brent & Brent; that he often spoke to them afterwards of his cases, but without naming this of Jones', as the defence was the same as Kinsman's, who became non-suit; that his friend did not inform him of the entry of Mr. Marbury's name; and the first he knew of it, and of said judgment, was upon examining the docket after being taken in execution; that the said note for $1,250 was one of those given for said cuttings and enjoined as assigned, which, and the total failure of the consideration, were known to said Jones at the time the note was delivered to him, if he did not then hold the same for himself and the other members of said company; all of whom were charged to be parties to said fraud. The bill further stated that Barnes resided in Washington county, Maryland, and that the demand of the said note was made in the city of Washington. The note was dated, but not made payable there. The bill and injunction of Barnes was referred to as a part of this bill. Jones was required, among other things, to answer what office he held in said company, and what sum he gave for said note, in what paid, and to whom. The prayer was that the judgment might be opened, or relief granted here by perpetual injunction and cancellation of the said note. The injunction was returned served on Jones. He did not appear or answer. On June 24, 1845, a perpetual injunction was decreed nisi, which was served on July 1st; and on October 24, 1845, before the decree became absolute, Dr. Jones' answer to Mason's bill was brought into court and offered to be filed. Objection being made, the matter stood over, and was heard and leave granted at the October term. [Case No. 9,239.]

Redin and Bradley in support of the motion to dissolve.

The counsel in support contended that this was not a case for the interference of a court of equity.

I. Jones was not in contempt. He obtained the note bona fide before Barnes' injunction, and had a right to proceed to judgment. That injunction was against the company collectively, and was not meant to reach him individually. Barnes' injunction bond was to the parties, and would be no security to Jones as the individual holder of the note. The notes mentioned in Barnes' bill are not the same as those in Mason's. The order for the injunction was not against suing, but negotiating merely. It was settled on the presentation of the answer that the contempt, if one, was in another cause, and could not be urged in this. The remedy for contempt in violating an injunction is attachment. The judgment cannot, for that reason, be set aside.

II. But the defences set up are defences at law. 1. As to the fraud and warranty, they are denied; if upon the information of Callan only, the charge is merely upon the information of Barnes. Mason's bill does not aver that the company knew the cuttings were bad at the time of the sale, nor that the statements in Barnes' bill are true. What was given for the note, and what office Jones held, are immaterial inquiries, and cannot serve the complainant in his defences of fraud and failure of consideration. The denial of the defendant meets fully every material allegation in both bills. But, if not sufficiently denied, fraud and warranty are no defence against Jones, a bona fide holder of the note without notice; gaming and usury are the only defences against an innocent third party (Chit. Bills); fraud is not, except between the original parties, (Thornton v. Winn, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 183,) and on warranty the remedy was at law; no circumstances of fraud are stated, and if they had been, the defence was at law. 2. The failure of consideration is denied, but it is averred to be total, and that is also a full defence at law. 3. No advantage can be taken in equity of any illegality in the demand and notice after judgment. There is no averment that the residence of Barnes was known to Jones. If unknown, the note was properly demanded at the place of its date.

III. The judgment was properly obtained and cannot be stricken out. A party is bound by a judgment confessed by his attorney of record, unless fraud or collusion with the adverse party can be shown. He will not be relieved where it is produced by his own negligence. In this case the complainant did not inform his bail that Brent & Brent were his attorneys, and requests him to have their appearance entered; nor did he give any attention to the suit afterwards. There is no relief under such circumstances. 36 Law Lib. 259; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 885, 887, 889, 896; Prather v. Prather, 11 Gill & J. 110; Fowler v. Lee, 10 Gill & J. 358. The understanding at the bar, as to the confessions of judgments, is that the defence must be made known at the same time, and an opportunity afforded for a trial, before the jury are discharged; else a defendant might wait till the witnesses were dead and limitations would be a bar.

Mr. May, contra:

I. It is a case of partial failure of consideration, made so by reference to Barnes' bill. The fraud charged is denied on the information of Callan only, which is not sufficient. Alex. Ch. Prac. 86. The defendant was one of the company, and is charged to have known of the fraud, but, if no personal knowledge, he was answerable for the misrepresentations of Callan, the agent of the company. He is not a bona fide holder of the note. He received it as the property of the company, of which he was one. He, therefore, knew the consideration, or had reason to know, and was bound to inquire. His answer is not full; he does not state what office he held in the company, nor what he gave for the note. A case of fraud is made out in Barnes' bill, which the defendant and other members of the company were bound to answer.

II. The judgment was entered by mistake. The complainant was lulled into security by the former injunction. He had no knowledge of the appearance of Mr. Marbury. He had a defence which he had instructed his counsel, Brent & Brent, to make to all these notes. Equity can interfere. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 885, 887, 889, 896; Gott v. Carr, 6 Gill & J. 309; Offutt's Adm'r v. Offutt, 2 Har. & G. 179; Smith v. McIver, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 532; Brown v. Swann, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 497; Truly v. Wanzer, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 141; Marine Ins. Co. v. Hodgson, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 332; Creath's Adm'r v. Sims, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 204. 36 Law Lib. 61.

III. Jones was under disability to sue. The injunction in Barnes' Case was not to sue. The suit brought against Mason was on the same note, and was a violation of that injunction. The defendant was in contempt, and shall take no benefit from his illegal act. There will be a restoration of the rights of the parties as they stood before the suit was brought. The remedy for breach of an injunction is not merely attachment, but the acts done will be treated as nullities. Partington v. Booth, 3 Mer. 148; Marquis of Downshire v. Sandys, 6 Ves. 109 (2d Ed.) 108; 1 Smith, Ch. Prac. 623; Hearn v. Tennant, 14 Ves. 136, a case of possession restored; West v. Belches, 5 Munf. 187; 2 Har. Ch. Prac. 222; Alex. Ch. Before CRANCH, Chief Judge, and MORSELL, Circuit Judge.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The first question to be considered is whether defendant has violated the injunction in the case of Barnes v. Jones and others. Both subpoenas and injunction, by the return of the marshal, were served on all the defendants. The order for the injunction was obtained on 19th June, 1839, as: "Let the injunction issue to restrain the defendants from negotiating or passing away the promissory notes in the bill mentioned until the further order of the court." It is erroneously stated in Mason's bill that the injunction was to prevent Jones and others from "suing upon the same." This is not included in the order of the judge, though it appears to be interlined in the precept of injunction issued by the clerk. That order is in the words above stated, and I think it was entirely correct not to enjoin the bringing of suit by the original party, as the bill charges that the notes were obtained by fraud, the defence would have been available at law, and the party might have suffered great evil from being prevented from suing. He might have lost the security for the payment of his debt, which he might have had by a judgment. There might also be other evils occasioned which do not now occur to me. I find it sanctioned by authority (3 Bac. Abr. "Injunction," 651): "Injunction will be granted to restrain the negotiation of bills of exchange or promissory notes obtained by fraud, and in this case if the plaintiff support his motion by an affidavit of the truth of the facts stated in his bill, the injunction will be allowed immediately upon the bill being filed; but the defendant should, upon intimation of the suit by negotiating the security, defeat its object (in note), "where a motion was made to restrain a defendant either from bringing an action on a promissory note, suggested to have been given for undertaking to bring about a marriage, or to prevent him from assigning it over, the court made an order upon the defendant to keep the note in his possession, and not assign or endorse it, but would not extend the injunction so far as to inhibit the payee himself from proceeding at law."

Smith v. Aykwell, 3 Atk. 566, Amb. 61: In the case in 3 Atk. the chancellor says: "Here it is not only charged by the bill to be a marriage brokerage agreement, but the fact supported by an affidavit, and therefore I will make an order on the defendant to keep the note in his own possession and not assign or endorse it over to any person whatever, but shall not extend the injunction so far as to prevent him from proceeding at law. There being then for the reason, as well as the reasons already given in the opinion of the chancery judge in this case on the subject of allowing the answer to be filed, no violation of the injunction, the objections on that ground cannot avail."

The reason offered in support of the motion to dissolve will next be considered:

First, as to the jurisdiction. That the circumstances of the fraud ought to be stated in the charge of fraud in the bill, and not in terms only, and that none such are so stated. Second, that the defence might have been made at law, and that it is now too late, there being no clear evidence of fraud or accident, or the act of the opposite party unmixed with any negligence or fault on the part of the complainant. Third, the answer denies the fraud as to himself or Callan. The bill in this case prays that the facts and things stated in Barnes' bill against this defendant and Callan, and sundry others, may be made a part of this bill, and I supposed it must be so considered. It is objected that the complainant cannot have the advantage of the facts stated in that bill, because they are stated as of the knowledge of others, and complainant does not state in his bill "that he believes them to be true," but I suppose it must be understood that they become a part of the bill into which they are invoked according to the usual and common form, which is invariably with those words, and of course that this objection must be answered.

Barnes' bill, after stating particularly the attending circumstances and the contract and consideration made with Callan, the agent of the company of which the defendant in this case was a member, according to which the cuttings were affirmed and warranted to vegetate and grow, that he had no opportunity of examining and inspecting said cuttings unless they were delivered after the contract of sale. He charges that the whole lot of cuttings so purchased by him of said Callan, as agent aforesaid, was, at the time of sale, dead and utterly worthless except about 2,700 cuttings; proceeds to charge that, at the time of delivering said cuttings, they had not (with the exception just stated) been in the ground or any soil for some time, and were utterly valueless, and that said Callan well knew the same, and did fraudulently misrepresent the condition and quality of said cuttings, of which he also charges the other defendants in the suit had knowledge. And it seems to me that the bill filed in this case reiterates the same circumstances in substance, and charges a fraudulent knowledge of the same by the various parties to the contract, and the fulfillment of Barnes on his part. It appears then that the facts and circumstances of the fraud, and the fraud itself, are positively charged to have been practiced on the part of the defendants. What effect ought to be given to the answer? Admit that at the time stated in the bill, 1838, sundry persons, the names of some of whom are correctly given in said bill, and among whom were the defendants, united themselves into an association or company for the purpose, among other things, of procuring and selling cuttings and trees of the morus multicaulis, and that they offered the same for sale, and authorized John F. Callan to sell for them, who acted for them in the city of Washington as their agent; it admits the contract made with Barnes, but denies that Callan warranted as the agent of the company as stated. Admits also that Barnes, for the cuttings, gave to Callan his four several promissory notes, made payable to complainant, and endorsed by him and Matthew St. Clair Clarke, but declares and avers that he was personally and wholly ignorant of the said transaction, and was not advised with or consulted in any part of them; nor did he ever know of them until long afterwards and after he had become the sole bona fide holder of the notes hereinafter mentioned (the one mentioned in the bill). But this defendant, on the information he has received from the said John F. Callan, positively, particularly and circumstantially denied that there was any fraud done, or attempted or designed, in the sale of the said cuttings by the said John F. Callan; that he is informed and believes that some part of the cuttings did vegetate and grow; that Barnes, as he is informed and believes, did not follow the instructions; denies that the consideration of the notes entirely failed; admits that the notes were given for the benefit of the said company as a company; admits that an injunction was obtained by Barnes as stated, but that long before the granting of the injunction the said defendant, without any knowledge of any facts, and without having heard anything to cast suspicion upon the said notes, and without any knowledge or information about the consideration for which they had been given, bona fide and in the regular course of dealing and business, received one of the said notes, being the one mentioned in said bill, and gave full value therefor; this was within a few days after its date; that he had received the same from the said Callan as the property of the said company, but that he, this defendant, received it as any other person would have done, relying on the credit of the endorsers thereon more than that of the drawer; excuses himself for a disobedience to the injunction; does not recollect that it was served on him. He did bring the suit, &c., utterly ignorant of the facts with respect to Mr. Marbury, &c., except that he did confess the judgment, &c. That if the facts therein stated are true (which he does not admit, &c.), they are insufficient to give jurisdiction to this court to go behind the said judgment at law, and he prays to have the same advantage as if he had pleaded the same; denies all fraud and combination, &c., and declares and averring that on the 18th April, 1839, he received the said notes bona fide and gave full value therefor in the regular course of business; excuses himself for not having put in his answer earlier, &c. It is objected that this answer does not fully respond to the charges contained in the bill, and that those which are not answered are to be taken as true.

The rule laid down in Young v. Grundy, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 51, is: "If the answer neither admits nor denies the allegations of the bill, they must be proved on the final hearing, but upon a question of a dissolution of an injunction they are to be taken to be true." As to the objection that he does not state what office he held in the company, and what he paid for said note, and whether the proceeds of the said note were for the use of himself and the other persons named in the bill of complaint, &c., and what sum of money did he give for said note, he has answered that he was a member of the company; admits that he received the note; states that without any knowledge or information of or about the consideration for which they had been given bona fide and in the regular course of dealing and business, he received one of the notes, being the one mentioned in said bill, and gave full value therefor; that this was within a few days after its date; that he received the same from the said John F. Callan as the property of said company, but that he received it as any other person would have done, &c. This seems to me sufficient to answer all the material part of those interrogatories.

The next and last objection is, "that a case of fraud has been charged in the bill, and the answer does not meet it to the extent of it." The answer, besides the general denial of all fraud and evil practice and all combination, &c., says: "But this defendant, on the information he has received from the said John F. Callan, positively, particularly and circumstantially denies that there was any fraud done, attempted or designed in the sale of the said cuttings of the said John F. Callan, and he sufficiently denies it as to himself by showing his entire ignorance of all the circumstances," &c. The question is, what weight is due to the denial merely upon information of Callan and his belief, without any knowing? The charge is, that Callan as agent of the company was guilty of the fraud. Is the charge fully met?

The bills are injunction bills, and filed on oath. It is true the answer of the defendant is on oath, but it is not of facts from his own knowledge. He declares he was altogether ignorant of them. His answer is, therefore, nothing more than his belief of what another has informed him. I do not think such an answer ought to have the weight of a full and positive denial of the facts respecting the fraud as stated in the bill. The principle will be found established in the cases of Clark's Ex'rs v. Van Riemsdyk, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 153; Union Bank of Georgetown v. Geary, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 111. In the last case the judge, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It is to be borne in mind that the bill does not charge the agreement to have been made with the bank, but with their attorney. The denial by the bank is not, therefore, of any matter charged to have been within their own knowledge. They could, therefore, only speak of their belief, or from information received from their attorney, and not from their own knowledge of the transaction." This was also the case of an injunction bill. It has been contended, however, that the defendant in this case, being the holder of an endorsed negotiable promissory note, before the same became due for a bona fide and valuable consideration, and without notice, cannot be affected by the fraud. This, as a general proposition, is unquestionably true. Do not the circumstances, however, of this case show the principle inapplicable? It is admitted that at the time of the transaction the defendant was a member of the company; that Callan was the authorized agent to make the sale and contract of sale, and that he acted for them in the contract with Barnes for the 125,000 cuttings; who gave his several promissory notes drawn by said Barnes and endorsed by Mason and Clarke to Callan as such agent, for the benefit of the company, as such company; one of which notes some few days after the date was delivered by said Callan to him, the defendant, as the property of said company. Was he not, therefore, fully affected by the actings and doings of Callan in the transactions as much as any other member of the company, and as much so as if he had in fact known and been cognizant of all the facts and circumstances charged as fraudulent, and although he received it under the circumstances stated by him? If so, the principle relied on by him, above stated, is not applicable.

The next part of the case presents a question of more difficulty. It is in relation to the equity jurisdiction of this court in a case which has already been before it as a court of law between these same parties, and where the complainant could have availed himself of the matter set up in this case and had full and ample justice done to him, yet did not even attempt it, but, on the contrary, confessed a judgment to the defendant for the amount of the claim. The rule is that when a party has a good defence at law and omits to make it, he cannot afterwards upon the same ground have relief in equity. Gott v. Carr, 6 Gill & J. 312. In the court of appeals, the judge in stating the opinion of the court says: "The well settled general rule being that a court of equity will not relieve against a recovery in a trial at law, unless the justice of the verdict can be impeached by facts or on grounds of which the party seeking the aid of chancery could not have availed himself at law, or was prevented from doing it by fraud or accident or the act of the opposite party, unmixed with any negligence or fault on his own part," and the principle is the same where at law there is a confession of judgment. Many other cases might be here stated establishing the same rule, but I really do not think it necessary. The question then is, has there been any such circumstances of fraud or accident or the act of the opposite party, unmixed with any negligence or fault on his (complainant's) own part? To show this it has been said that the injunction granted by the court in the case of Barnes had the effect to lull him into security, &c., and, secondly, that Mr. Marbury, instead of Messrs. Brent & Brent, by mistake and accident was employed as the attorney in the case, and, not knowing there was a defence, confessed the judgment. With respect to the judgment, it was granted in a case in which the complainant was no legal party, and, as I have before said, the judge made no order inhibiting the defendant in that case to sue on the note, and the service of the writ in the case was amply enough to warn the complainant that the defendant did not consider himself thereby restrained from suing on the note, and the additional circumstances, which he states, of his having sometime before sued Kinsman on three of the notes given for the same contract, and feeling it necessary to attend to them in person, fully proves this excuse not to be sound. As to the mistake in employing Mr. Marbury, let the circumstances be considered proved as stated by the complainant himself. The suit was brought against him on the 10th of February, 1841, and in the usual course progressed until March, 1842, when the judgment was confessed, being the regular trial court; that, not being able to attend to the case in person, he applied to a friend to enter special bail for him and to employ counsel, and that his special bail through mistake entered the appearance of Mr. Marbury, attorney at law, instead of Brent & Brent, who alone were acquainted with the facts of the case and of the defence, and to whom the complainant had spoken; that if sued as an endorser on said notes, &c., he wished the said Brent & Brent to attend to the cases for him, of which he (the complainant) would inform them; that he was never informed by his said special bail that he had directed Mr. Marbury to appear for him, nor did he know the same until after judgment had been rendered against him, and not then did he know that any judgment was obtained until after a ca. sa. had been served upon him.

It appears, then, that Mr. Mason gave no directions to his bail, who he employed as counsel for him, or that he (the bail) knew that the Messrs. Brent were, nor does it appear that he ever inquired of his bail who he had employed, or that he ever informed the Messrs. Brent and requested them to appear. The suit was depending the usual time of twelve months, without any attention on the part of the complainant in the preparation for the trial; no order to summon witnesses; no reasonable and proper endeavor to procure evidence, but a total indifference. He must have known when, by the rules of the court, the trial court would be. Suppose Brent & Brent had been employed, could he think that it would not be necessary to have his proofs of the fraud ready to enable them to make the defence? instead of which he does not make any inquiry of them about it. Can it be said that this is the case of accident unmixed with any negligence or fault on his part? On the contrary, does there not appear to have been gross negligence?

But although the court has no jurisdiction to try and determine the question of fraud, for the reasons already stated, has it not the power and would it not be proper to continue this injunction to await the final decision of the case of Barnes against the defendant, with a number of other defendants hereinbefore mentioned? There is enough to show that that suit is to try the validity of the same contract with which the note in the case is connected, notwithstanding the erroneous description of the notes mentioned in that bill. It is true that after the liability of the endorser becomes fixed by judgment, as in this case, he is to be considered as a principal, so decided in the case of Creath's Adm'r v. Sims, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 206, and Prout v. Lennox, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 520:

"That the endorser of a note who has been charged by due notice of the maker's default is not entitled to the aid of a court of equity as a surety." But can we shut our eyes to the most unjustly oppressive and iniquitous effect which the complainant in this case would be made to suffer if he is not permitted to have the benefit of the rescission of the contract, if such should be the event upon the trial of that case?

That suit was brought on the 19th June, 1839, and, according to the return of the marshal, the defendants were all served with subpoenas. But no answers, I believe, have yet been filed. The delay in bringing it to issue has been certainly very great, but the case is still depending and undisposed of. It may be added that the defendants in this case cannot be said to be free from blame in occasioning the delay.

Fraud being the ground upon which relief was sought from the obligation of the contract, this might be availed of either in a court of chancery or of common law. In such case the rule is, "The court which first has possession of the subject must determine it conclusively, and has a right to retain it exclusively of the other." Smith v. M'Iver, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 535. Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "In all cases of concurrent jurisdiction, the court which first has possession of the subject must decide it." Again, at 536: "Admitting, then, the concurrent jurisdiction of the courts of equity and law in matters of fraud, we think the cause must be decided by the tribunal which first obtains possession of it, and thus each court must respect the judgment or decree of the other."

The court of chancery had first possession of the contract in connection with this note, and had an exclusive right to retain it until the case was disposed of. Is that not a sufficient reason for this court to hold up the injunction until the other case has been disposed of, or at least until this defendant has done everything in his power to bring it to a final action?

Case No. 9,241.

MASON et al. v. KANE.

[Taney, 173; 24 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 717.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. May 2, 1851.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—RECOVERY OF DUTIES PAID—PROTEST—IN WHOSE NAME SUIT BROUGHT.

1. The tariff acts of 1799 [1 Stat. 627] and 1845 [5 Stat. 727] do not prevent the actual owner of goods imported, from suing for the recovery of duties paid under protest by the consignee, and do not require such suits to be brought in the name of the consignee.

[Cited in Gray v. Lawrence, Case No. 5,722.]

2. The tariff act of 26th February, 1845, provides that no action to recover duties paid under protest, shall be maintained against a collector, "unless the said protest was made in writing, and signed by the claimant, at or before the payment of said duties, setting forth distinctly and specifically the grounds of objection to the payment thereof." A protest under this act, objecting in general terms to the additional duty exacted, but assigning no reason for the objection, will not warrant the institution of a suit to recover back the duties objected to, even though such duties were illegally exacted.

[Cited in Thomson v. Maxwell, Case No. 13,983; Pierson v. Lawrence, Id. 11,158; Davies v. Arthur, 96 U. S. 151; Chung Yune v. Kelly, 14 Fed. 641.]

This action was instituted on the 22d of October, 1850 [by David Mason and John E. Tullis], against [George P. Kane] the collector of the port of Baltimore, for the recovery of duties paid under protest. The facts sufficiently appear from the following statement of facts, agreed on by the counsel in the cause, and the opinion of the court.

Statement of facts: (1) It is admitted, that the plaintiffs are residents of Savannah la Mer, Jamaica, and aliens, and owners of the pimento, mentioned in the above case; and that Spence & Reid, merchants of Baltimore, were the consignees of said pimento, and entered the same, and paid the duties exacted upon them by the defendant, under protest in writing, signed by them. (2) It is further admitted, that on or about the 21st of September, 1849, the plaintiffs consigned, from Savannah la Mer, the said pimento, as per invoice and bill of lading, to said Spence & Reid, and that the invoice upon which it was entered, sets forth correctly the price paid by plaintiffs, at the time the same was purchased. (3) It is also agreed, that the custom-house papers relating to this case, or proper copies of the same, shall be read in evidence by either party, and that oral evidence may likewise be given at the trial of this cause.

Upon the foregoing statement of facts, and such other evidence as may be produced by either party at the trial of the case, it is agreed, that the following questions shall be raised and submitted to the court for its opinion: (1) Whether the plaintiffs in this case can maintain the action, by reason of the act of 26 February, 1845, or any other acts of congress. (2) Whether the appointment of the merchant appraisers, is not such an award as is final and conclusive on the plaintiffs, as to the value whereon the duty should have been estimated. (3) Whether the return of the government weighers of the gross weight of the pimento, being 87,139 pounds is conclusive; and the deduction therefrom for tare, or the weight of the bags, should be the weight shown by the invoice; or should be the tare returned by the said weighers, 2617 pounds, which is three per cent. on the gross weight. (4) Whether the additional duty or penalty of $899, exacted in this case, or any part thereof, may be recovered by the plaintiffs, inasmuch as a portion of the pimento, to wit, four hundred and twenty-three bags, has been exported, as will appear from the export entry thereof.

If, upon the foregoing questions, the opinion of the court should be in favor of the plaintiffs, then a verdict and judgment shall be entered for the plaintiffs, for the damages claimed in the narr. with costs; but if in favor of the defendant, then for the defendant with costs. And it is further agreed, that if the judgment should be in favor of the plaintiffs, the amount including interest for which the verdict and judgment shall stand, shall be hereafter calculated in conformity with the principles which the court shall decide to govern the case, and the said verdict and judgment corrected accordingly.

Brown & Brune, for plaintiffs.

Z. Collins Lee, Dist. Atty., and Hon. Reverdy Johnson, for defendant.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. This suit is brought against the collector of the port of Baltimore, to recover certain duties, which the plaintiffs allege were overcharged upon a cargo of pimento, imported from Savannah la Mer, in Jamaica. The official appraisers, acting under positive directions from the secretary of the treasury, estimated the value of this pimento much higher than that in the invoice; and upon a reference to merchant appraisers, although they valued it lower than the officers of the government had previously done; yet, the price at which they assessed it, exceeded the invoice price more than ten per cent., estimating the value by the pound, without regard to the difference in the dutiable quantity, arising from the difference in the tare allowed in the invoice, and that allowed by the official weighers; and upon this appraisement by the merchant appraisers, the penal duty of twenty per cent. was exacted by the collector, upon the whole cargo, and paid under protest by the consignees. The pimento was warehoused upon its arrival, and a part of it remained in the warehouse when the penal duty was demanded; and a large portion of it was re-exported and never withdrawn for consumption or sale in this country.

The suit is brought by the owners of the cargo, who reside in Jamaica, and not by the consignees, who paid the money and signed the protest; and it is objected by the defendant, that this suit cannot be maintained by a foreign owner, but must be brought by the consignee; that under the acts of 1799 and 1845, the consignees, for all purposes connected with the payment of duties, were to be regarded as owners; and that the principles and doctrines in relation to principal and agent in the ordinary concerns of life, do not apply to a case of this kind.

This is certainly a question of some difficulty. But we do not think that the language of the act of 1845 requires this construction; and the motives of policy which evidently introduced the provision upon this subject in the act of 1799, can hardly have influenced the provisions of the act of 1845, under which this suit is brought. We see no inconvenience that can arise to the collector, or the public, by permitting the owner to maintain the suit in his own name, instead of suing in the name of his agent or consignee; the payment by the consignee, is the payment by the principal; and the protest of the consignee, the protest of the principal, if he thinks proper to adopt it. We think the practice in some of the circuits has sanctioned suits by the foreign owner, in cases of this description; and as this practice is consistent with a fair construction of the act of 1845, and no injustice or inconvenience can arise from it, the court are of opinion, that this objection must be overruled.

But the objection to the sufficiency of the protest, is a much more serious one. Some question has been made as to the charges to which it objects; but it is very clear that it applies altogether to the additional and penal duty, which appears to have been demanded and paid on the day of the protest; it objects to this demand in general terms, without specifying any particular grounds of objection. But it is now insisted, in support of the action, that the demand was illegal: (1) Because the merchant appraisers assessed the value at the time of the shipment, and not at the time of the purchase. (2) Because they did not actually inspect the pimento. (3) That if their valuation was lawfully made, it does not exceed the value in the invoice ten per cent., taking into consideration the whole cargo, and the difference in the dutiable weight, arising from difference between the tare claimed in the invoice, and that allowed by the official weighers; and (4) That if a penal duty was incurred upon the part of the cargo withdrawn for sale and consumption, it was not incurred upon the portion of it which remained in the warehouse and was re-exported to a foreign country.

But none of these objections are set forth in the protest; it objects, as we have already said, in general terms, to the additional duty exacted on that day; that is, the whole penal duty, but assigns no reason for the objection. Now, the act of 26 February 1845, in express terms, provides that no action of this kind shall be maintained against a collector, "unless the said protest was made in writing and signed by the claimant, at or before the payment of said duties, setting forth distinctly and specifically the grounds of objection to the payment thereof." It is not, therefore, sufficient to object to the payment of any particular duty or amount of duty, and protest in writing against it; the claimant must do more; he must set forth, in his protest, the grounds upon which he objects, distinctly and specifically; and these latter words are too emphatic to be regarded as mere surplusage, or to be overlooked in the construction of this law. The object of this provision is obvious; in the multitude of collection offices in the United States, and the changes which so frequently take place in the officers, mistakes and oversights will sometimes take place, and irregularities in the assessment of duties; and the object of this provision is, to prevent a party from taking advantage of such objections, when it is too late to correct them, and to compel him to disclose the grounds of his objection, at the time when he makes his protest.

The case before the court strikingly exemplifies the policy of this provision. One of the objections is, that the merchant appraisers did not actually inspect the pimento. It was not actually looked at and inspected by these appraisers, because there was no controversy about its quality. The consignees had notice, and appeared before the merchant appraisers, and did not suggest that there was any defect in the quality, which would lower the value, nor express a wish to have it inspected; they offered to prove that it was bought at the price at which it was invoiced, and that such was then the market-price at the place where it was purchased. The appraisers were satisfied that it was bought at the price stated, but were of opinion that the price was lower than its market value in the principal markets of the island, and appraised its dutiable value accordingly. There is not the slightest reason to suppose that their appraisement would have been, in any degree, influenced or changed by their actual inspection of the article; and if this objection had been stated in the protest, the error could have been immediately corrected, before the duties were exacted; but it is now too late. If this oversight be fatal to the appraisement, and renders it invalid, then the public lose not only the enhanced duties to which the pimento was liable, but also the additional or penal duty which was the consequence of the merchant appraisal. The same may be said of the other grounds of objection above mentioned, if they had been set forth in the protest as the grounds of objection, and had been deemed tenable by the administrative department of the government, the errors could have been corrected without the expense of litigation, and the duties which the law imposes secured to the public.

It is for this purpose that the act of 1845 requires the grounds of objection to be distinctly and specifically set forth in the protest; for this suit, although in form against the collector for doing an unlawful act, is, in truth and substantially, a suit against the United States; the money is in the treasury, and must be paid from the treasury, if the plaintiffs recover. As the United States cannot be sued and made defendants in a court of justice without their consent, they have an undoubted right to annex to the privilege of suing them any conditions which they deem proper. In the exercise of this power, they have granted this privilege, in the form of a suit against the collector, where duties are supposed to be overcharged, upon condition that the claimant, when he pays the money, shall give a written notice that he regards the demand as illegal, and means to contest the right of the United States in a court of justice; stating also at the same time, distinctly, the specific grounds upon which he objects. This is the condition upon which he is permitted to sue the collector, and thus to appeal from the administrative to the judicial department of the government. It is a condition precedent; and as it was not performed in this instance, the present action cannot be maintained, even if the duty exacted were not legally due.

It is unnecessary, therefore, to inquire whether the objections now made would have been valid if set forth in the protest. If improperly charged, it is, no doubt, yet in the power of the administrative department to do justice to the claimant; but no action can be maintained under the act of 1845. The verdict must, therefore, be for the defendant.

MASON v. LAWRASON et al.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 190.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1804.

PLEADING AT LAW—ACTION BY ADMINISTRATOR—OYER OF LETTERS—PROFERT—COURT RECORDS—AUTHENTICATION.

1. Although the plaintiffs name themselves administrators, yet if they have not made profert of their letters of administration they are not bound to give oyer of them.

2. The act of congress respecting the authentication of the records of state courts does not apply to records of the courts of the United States.

[Cited in Turnbull v. Payson, 95 U. S. 424.]

Action on a contract made with the administrators and not with the intestate, but the plaintiffs named themselves administrators, and did not make a profert of their letters of administration. A rule had been laid upon the defendants [Lawrason & Smoot] to plead. They prayed oyer of the letters of administration, and cited Theobald v. Long, Carth. 453, and Adams v. Savage, 6 Mod. 134. The plaintiffs refused to give oyer.

Mr. Taylor, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Swann, for defendant.

THE COURT decided that they were not bound to give oyer, because there was no profert; because oyer is not demandable after the first term; and because the plaintiffs did not sue in the right of their intestate, but in their own right. So that the letters of administration constituted no part of their title.

A certificate of discharge of McPherson, as a bankrupt, was offered in evidence, with a seal, said by counsel to be the seal of the United States district court in Richmond, but not stated by the clerk to be such, but barely signed by him.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Circuit Judge, absent,) permitted verbal evidence to be given that this was the seal, and also that the clerk of that court, W. Marshall, had usually attested records in that manner, and did not insist on its being authenticated agreeably to the requisites of the act of congress, as it was not the act of a state court, but one of the United States. MASON v. MANSFIELD.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 580.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1835.

DAMAGES—ANCHORING WITHIN LIMITS OF FISHERY—REASONABLE CAUSE—MALICE.

1. If a master of a vessel navigating the Potomac, in the usual course of navigation, anchors in the plaintiff's fishing ground, without malice, for the purpose of taking in the residue of the cargo; and when required to depart, his not doing so immediately be not attributable to malice, but to a reasonable cause, and he removed his vessel as soon as the circumstances of wind, weather, and tide would permit, he is not liable for damages.

2. But if the defendant, knowingly and without necessity or reasonable commercial purpose, anchor his vessel within the limits of the plaintiff's fishery so as to interrupt the same; or if the defendant, having so anchored his vessel within the said limits, knowingly, and without necessity, or any reasonable commercial purpose, remained within the same, so as to interrupt the plaintiff's fishery, the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

This was an action on the case [by Richard B. Mason against Charles Mansfield], for "that the defendant, not ignorant of the premises, (that is, of the plaintiff's right of fishing,) but maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff in this behalf, and to deprive him of the use of his said fishery, did, on the —— day of —— and continually thereafter, for and during the space of —— days then next following, wrongfully and injuriously stop and anchor a certain vessel, then under the command of the defendant, in the berth and range of the said fishery, so that he entirely obstructed and hindered said fishery," &c.

Upon the trial of the general issue, Mr. Neale, for defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they should believe, from the evidence, that the defendant pursued the usual course of navigation when he entered the berth of the plaintiff's fishery, and that he anchored his vessel in the channel for the purpose of taking in the residue of his cargo, and not with the malicious intent to injure the plaintiff's right of fishery; and that when required to depart thereout, his not doing so immediately was not attributable to any malice on his part towards the plaintiff, but for the reasons stated in the deposition of the mate, and that he removed his vessel as soon as wind, weather, and tide would permit; then they will find for the defendant.

Mr. Taylor, for plaintiff, contended that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove malice, although it is averred in the declaration.

But THE COURT gave the instruction as prayed.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra, being of opinion that malice was not the gist of the action, and therefore need not be proved.

Mr. Neale cited Harman v. Tappenden, 1 East, 562; 1 Chit. 146; Reynolds v. Kennedy, 1 Wils. 233; Goslin v. Wilcock, 2 Wils. 305.

Mr. Taylor, contra, cited 1 Chit. 129, 130, 376; 4 Starkie, 418; Williamson v. Allison, 2 East, 446; Peppin v. Solomons, 5 Term R. 496; Bristow v. Wright, 2 Doug. 665; Barrett v. Wills, 4 Leigh, 114.

THE COURT, (nem. con.) at the prayer of Mr. Taylor and Mr. Mason, for plaintiff, instructed the jury, that if they should be satisfied by the evidence, that the defendant knowingly and without necessity, or any reasonable commercial purpose, anchored his vessel within the limits of the plaintiff's fishery, so as to interrupt the same; or that the defendant, after he had anchored within the limits of the plaintiff's fishery as aforesaid, knowingly and without necessity, or any reasonable commercial purpose, remained within the same, so as to interrupt the fishery, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

MASON v. MASON.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1829.

BILLS AND NOTES—INDORSER—SUIT AGAINST PRIOR INDORSER.

The plaintiff indorsed a note (as town indorser,) already indorsed by two others, for the accommodation of the maker, and at maturity was obliged to take it up. Held, that he may recover of the first indorser the whole amount paid to take up the note.

Assumpsit by the last indorser against the first indorser of a promissory note made by Thompson F. Mason, payable to and indorsed by the defendant, Richard B. Mason, and by H. Ashton. The note was offered for discount, but the bank required a town indorser, and the plaintiff, who resided in Alexandria, indorsed it. It was then discounted for the benefit of the maker, and, at maturity, paid by the plaintiff.

The defendant contended, that as he and Mr. Ashton indorsed it for the accommodation of the maker, he was only liable for one half; but

THE COURT (nem. con.), at the prayer of the plaintiff, instructed the jury that the defendant was liable for the whole amount paid by the plaintiff to take up the note.

THRUSTON and MORSELL, Circuit Judges, were of opinion that this case differs from that of McDonald and Magruder at Washington, in this particular, that here the plaintiff was not originally one of the indorsers before the note was offered for discount.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, did not think that that circumstance was material, because he was of opinion that the prior indorser was liable to the subsequent, for the whole, unless there be an agreement to the contrary.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES—VESTRY AND CHURCH WARDENS—SALE UNDER DECREE—ESTOPPEL.

1. The vestry and wardens of "the Protestant Episcopal Church of Alexandria," were the vestry of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the parish of Fairfax, in the ecclesiastical meaning of those terms as modified by the laws and constitution of Virginia, and the canons of the church.

2. By the sale made under the decree in the case of Taylor v. Terrett [9 Cranch (13 U. S.) 43] the purchasers became privies to the church, and may avail themselves of the estoppel resulting from the warranty of Daniel Jennings, the original grantor.

This was a bill in equity [by John Mason against John Muncaster and others,] praying for an injunction to stay the proceedings at law upon judgments rendered upon two promissory notes given for part of the purchase-money of the glebe, belonging to the parish of Fairfax, which had been purchased by the complainant and Mr. Jones, at the sale made under the decree of this court, affirmed by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Taylor v. Terrett, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 43, and praying, also, that the sale may be set aside for defect of title; that the notes may be given up to be cancelled, and that the part of the purchase money which had been paid, may be decreed to be refunded, &c.

The complainant in his bill states, that he purchased upon the faith of the decree of the supreme court, which he supposed to be binding upon all the world. That the opinion of that court was not printed till 1817, and that it is but very recently that his attention was directed to the reasonings in detail, upon which the decree was founded, and which he now perceives was founded upon the assumption of two facts which do not exist, viz.: (1) that the congregation of the Episcopal church of

[2] [Affirmed in 9 Wheat. (22 U. S.) 445.]

Alexandria is identical with the original parish of Fairfax, as it existed prior to the assumption of jurisdiction over the District of Columbia by congress; and that the vestry and church-wardens elected by and acting under the authority of that congregation, come in by legal and regular succession to the vestry and church-wardens of the parish of Fairfax; and (2) that there was no other Episcopal church in the parish of Fairfax, than that of Alexandria; and that the property belonged to the church of Alexandria, which in this respect represented the whole parish. The complainant further states, that there are two parties, who were not concluded by the decree, and who have a manifest interest and outstanding title, viz.: 1. The parish of Fairfax, in Virginia, which has a right to the whole glebe; and that many of the members of the Episcopal Church in that parish have threatened that the rights of that parish are to be prosecuted. 2. The heirs of Daniel Jennings, to whom the legal title will revert in consequence of the defeat of the capacities of perpetual and legal succession in the church-wardens, Dade and Wren, and the want of limitation by the deed, to their heirs in their natural capacity; so that the only protection of the complainant would be by setting up the estoppel in Jenning's deed, which he could not do, because there is no legal succession from the church-wardens Dade and Wren, to the church-wardens, Deneale and Muncaster, and so no privity between the complainant and the parish of Fairfax. By a supplemental bill, the complainant asserts that there is now a regular and duly elected vestry and wardens of the Falls Church, in the parish of Fairfax, as competent to assert the rights of the church of that parish as the defendants.

The answer of the defendants, (the vestry and church-wardens appointed by the church in Alexandria,) asserts that they are the vestry and wardens of the whole parish, and are the regular successors of the vestry from the year 1765, and that there never has been but one vestry for both churches in the parish. It contends that the complainant had full knowledge of the state of the title at the time he purchased, and that the question of the outstanding title in Jennings was settled by the supreme court in the case of Taylor v. Terrett [supra].

There were many exhibits, and much testimony, and the cause which came on to be heard on a motion to dissolve the injunction, which had been granted, was fully and ably argued upon the whole merits, by Mr. Key and Mr. Wirt, (the attorney-general,) for complainant.

Mr. Taylor, Mr. E. J. Lee, and Mr. Swann, for defendants.

After the argument, it was agreed that the cause should be considered as having been set for final hearing, and that the opinion of the court should be given at the next term.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. After the decision of the case of Taylor v. Terrett in the supreme court of the United States, the only question left open to the complainant in this case seems to be, whether the complainants in that case were the representatives of the cestuis que trust of the glebe; or in other words, whether they, with George Deneale and John Muncaster, two of the defendants in that case, were, at the time of filing the bill, (22d November, 1811,) the vestry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the parish of Fairfax, in the ecclesiastical meaning of those terms as modified by the laws and constitution of the state of Virginia, and the canons of the church. For, if they were, the supreme court having decided that that church was the cestui que trust, and that the vestry, as incident to their office as general guardians of the church, were entitled to assert its rights and interests, and with the assent of the minister, had a right to require a sale of the land; a sale so made by them, would constitute the purchasers privies to the church; and would enable them to avail themselves of the estoppel resulting from the warranty of D. Jennings, the original grantor; and they would be in no danger from the outstanding title in the heirs of that grantor, nor from the claims of that portion of the parishioners, (if any such there be,) who reside in the county of Fairfax.

After the Revolution, when the Protestant Episcopal Church ceased to be the established church in Virginia, and the vestries ceased to have the power to tax their respective parishes, a Protestant Episcopal parish in the ecclesiastical meaning of those terms, consisted only of those inhabitants of a territorial parish, who were members of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The word parish, therefore, in its ecclesiastical sense in regard to the Protestant Episcopal Church of Virginia, was synonymous with the phrase, "Protestant Episcopal Church in the same parish;" or, in other words, a parish, in its ecclesiastical sense, in Virginia, after the Revolution, meant the Protestant Episcopal Church in a parish. And the Protestant Episcopal Church in a parish consisted of the members of that church who resided within the territorial parish.

The right to the glebe in question, is decided by the supreme court to be in the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the parish of Fairfax. No individual member of the church has any interest therein, but in right of his church. It is a social, not an individual right. The Protestant Episcopal Church in the parish of Fairfax is recognized by the act of Virginia of 1786, as a religious society capable of having property, and belonging to a sect which could make, or had made rules for regulating the appointment of trustees. In May, 1787, the convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Virginia, ordained rules for that purpose, which rules are recognized by the act of 1788, which declares that the trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Church, (appointed according to their rules,) and their successors shall be considered successors of the former vestries, and have the same powers.

The repeal of the acts of 1786 and 1788, did not affect the right of the sect (that is, the convention,) to make such rules, because the right was not given by those acts. They are only evidences of a preëxistent right. The vestrymen, who were complainants in the bill of Taylor v. Terrett were duly appointed according to the rules of their sect, (that is, the canons of their church.) There is no evidence of the particular manner in which they were chosen, but it is certified by the church-wardens, that they were duly elected to serve the parish as vestrymen for the next three years; and the fact must be admitted, unless the contrary be proved. The only remaining question then, is, what parish were they to serve? The complainant's counsel say, not the parish of Fairfax, but the Alexandria congregation, or as they call themselves in the vestry-book, "The Protestant Episcopal Church of Alexandria," which had abandoned the parish of Fairfax, and set itself up in 1803, as a separate religious society. And they give this answer to the question, because they say there are no entries in the vestry-book from the 19th of April, 1799, to the 2d of April, 1804; because on the 15th of June, 1803, there was a new agreement entered into by certain subscribers to the church; because the vestry which was elected in 1804, and all the subsequent vestries, styled themselves the vestry of the Protestant Episcopal Church at, or in, or of, Alexandria, and never called themselves the vestry of the parish of Fairfax, as all the former vestries did; because in two or three instances, in the minutes of the proceedings of the vestry, they speak of the parish of Alexandria; and because the vestry suffered the Falls Church to go to ruin.

The court, however, is of a different opinion. We think the parish, mentioned in the minutes of the election of the vestry in 1810, was the parish of Fairfax: 1. Because the entry is made in the vestry-book of the parish of Fairfax.

2. Because there was no other parish which they could serve as vestrymen.

3. Because all the vestries chosen since 1803, have uniformly held, and claimed to hold the glebe, and the church, and all the church-property belonging to the Protestant Episcopal Church in the parish of Fairfax, in the right of that church, and as representing the whole Protestant Episcopal Church in that parish, and have exercised all the rights of property over the same, which a vestry could exercise.

4. Because when the congregation at the Falls Church ceased to exist, the Alexandria congregation became the only Protestant Episcopal congregation in the parish, and constituted the whole Protestant Episcopal Church in the parish. All the Protestant Episcopal inhabitants in the parish, who had a right to vote at all for a vestry, had a right to attend the election held in April, 1810, and to vote for vestrymen; and if they did not, it was their own fault.

5. Because there is no evidence to satisfy us that the Alexandria congregation abandoned the parish of Fairfax, or any of their parochial rights, or ever formed themselves into a separate religious society. The omission of entries in the vestry-book, is accountable for without supposing any such abandonment. There are twelve blank pages left between the minutes of 1796 and 1804, from which circumstance, a strong inference may be drawn that the person who left those blank pages supposed there were minutes of proceedings which had not been entered in that book; and, in fact, a rough minute-book has been produced in evidence, containing the minutes of several meetings of the vestry in 1796, 1798, and 1799, which ought to have been entered in those blank pages. It also appears in evidence that the minutes of the proceedings of the vestry were sometimes taken upon loose sheets; and that there was no time between 1796 and 1804, when there was not a regular vestry. There was a meeting of the vestry on the 16th of April, 1799, at which Mr. William Fitzhugh was elected a vestry-man, in the place of Mr. Hunter, who had resigned. As this meeting was after Easter Monday of that year, (which happened on the 25th of March,) and that being the day and year when a vestry ought to have been chosen, a strong presumption arises that a vestry was chosen in March, 1799, although no minute of such an election is preserved. It is true that the election of the vestry in 1804 (of which there is an entry in the book) raises a strong presumption that no vestry was chosen in 1802, when, regularly, it ought to have been chosen; for, the elections being triennial, if a vestry had been elected in 1802, it would not have been necessary to choose one in 1804; the old vestry, however, had a right, under the canons of the church, to act until a new vestry should be chosen. Under such circumstances, a single omission to choose a vestry, at the regular day, cannot justify an inference that the congregation of Alexandria had abandoned their parochial rights. The agreement of the 15th of June, 1803, which is fastened into the vestry-book with wafers, (evidently for its preservation,) instead of proving an abandonment of parochial rights, and the formation of a new and separate religious society, justifies a strong contrary inference. Its sole object is to raise a fund (by renting the pews of the church) for the support of the Rev. Thomas Davis, who was regularly inducted as rector of Fairfax parish in the year 1792, and continued to be the rector of that parish until October, 1806; during all which time the right of the church to the glebe was vested in him as persona ecclesiae. The subscribers to that paper agreed to hire certain pews at certain prices, and pay $1,000 per annum to Mr. Davis, the residue to be applied to the use of the church. The resolutions of the 18th of November, 1803, which are written on the page next after the agreement of the 15th of June, 1803, have no other object than the agreement; and afford no evidence either of the intention to abandon the parish, or to form a new religious society; but do, with the agreement, show the strongest evidence of a determination to adhere to the parish, and to support its rector and its church.

The counsel for the complainant seems to rely much upon the circumstance that the vestry of 1804, and all the subsequent vestries style themselves the vestry of the Protestant Episcopal Church at, or in, or of Alexandria, and never call themselves the vestry of the parish of Fairfax, as all the former vestries did. This circumstance is, at most, only evidence that they did not think themselves entitled, or did not choose to call themselves by that name. There is no evidence of the reason why they did not think themselves so entitled, or why they did not choose so to call themselves. One thing, however, is certain, namely: that it was not because they had abandoned their parochial rights. And if it was not evidence of an abandonment of those rights, it does not seem to be material to the complainant what were the motives of the vestry. The omission to call themselves by their right name did not work a forfeiture of the rights of their constituents; nor did they lose their rights by their ignorance of them. Their constituents were all those who had a right to vote at that election; and consisted of all the members of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the parish of Fairfax who had a right to vote at all elections of vestrymen. If the vestry was the real representative of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the parish of Fairfax, it is immaterial by what name they called themselves.

Although it may not be necessary in this case to ascertain what was the reason which induced the vestry of 1804, and the succeeding vestries to call themselves the Protestant Church of Alexandria, and to omit to call themselves the vestry of the parish of Fairfax, as their predecessors had done, yet it may be satisfactory if we can account for that circumstance without the necessity of an inference that they had abandoned their parochial rights. They might have supposed that the Protestant Episcopal Church of Virginia had been broken down by the acts of 1799 and 1802, and therefore felt a reluctance to take a name which should imply a connexion with the church. They might have erroneously supposed that the best way of preserving the rights of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Fairfax parish, was to have as little apparent connexion with it as possible. They knew that the Alexandria congregation was the only remaining Protestant Episcopal congregation in the parish, and really constituted the whole of the Protestant Episcopal Church in that parish; and as almost all the members of that congregation, and the whole glebe were in that part of the parish of Fairfax which had been ceded to the United States, they might have erroneously supposed that there would be an impropriety in calling themselves the vestry of the parish of Fairfax. There was also an ambiguity in the words church, and parish, which might tend to confuse and perplex their ideas on the subject. They might have supposed that as the only remaining Protestant Episcopal congregation in the parish worshipped in Alexandria, they might with more propriety be called the Protestant Episcopal Church of Alexandria than the Protestant Episcopal Church of Fairfax parish; and as the civil jurisdiction of part of the territorial parish of Fairfax had been ceded to the United States, they might not have been aware that the ecclesiastical parish still remained entire. Supposing it to be divided, they might have thought it would be improper in them to take the name of the entire parish. The circumstance, also, that the county, as well as the parish, bore the name of "Fairfax," tended to increase the confusion of ideas on the subject. The circumstances, in which they found themselves, were new. Their ideas, at first, must have been confused and unsettled as to the whole extent of their rights; but it seems clear, that from the first, they claimed the exclusive right to all the church property, upon the ground that they constituted the whole of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Fairfax parish. It is immaterial by what name they called themselves. All their acts showed that they claimed and exercised all the ecclesiastical rights of that parish. This view of the subject explains, and gives consistency to all their acts. In three instances, namely, on the 20th of October, 1809, and the 18th and 24th of February, 1810, the minutes of the vestry speak of obtaining a rector for the parish of Alexandria. This was, no doubt, an inaccurate expression, and arose from the same confusion of ideas which has been already mentioned.

It was strongly urged by the complainant's solicitor, that the complainants in the case of Taylor v. Terrett could not avow themselves to be the vestry of the whole parish of Fairfax without confessing themselves to be guilty of sacrilege in suffering the building commonly called the Falls Church to go to ruin. But surely it cannot be called sacrilege to suffer a useless building to go to decay. When the vestry ceased to have the power to tax the parish, its obligation, to keep the churches in repair, ceased also. They could only be kept in repair by voluntary contributions. The Falls Church was erected solely for those members of the church who lived in its vicinity. It was for them to keep it in repair; and if they did not, the vestry was not responsible. But the hypothesis of the complainant's counsel would charge the vestry with a much heavier sin than that of repairing a useless church. It would charge them with knowingly seizing upon, and converting to their own use, or the use of their constituents, property to which they had no right. The weight of this argument, therefore, turns against the complainant.

6. We are of opinion that the Alexandria congregation did not separate themselves from the parish of Fairfax, and establish a distinct separate religious society, because they could not do so consistently with the canons of the church then in force.

Upon the whole, then, we are of opinion that the complainants in the bill of Taylor v. Terrett, together with George Deneale and John Muncaster, two of the defendants in that case, were the vestry of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the parish of Fairfax, in the ecclesiastical meaning of those terms, as modified by the laws and constitution of Virginia and the canons of the church, and may avail themselves of the estoppel resulting from the warranty of Daniel Jennings, the original grantor; and therefore the complainant has failed to support his bill; which must be dismissed with costs.

The complainant appealed to the supreme court of the United States, where the decree of this court was affirmed. See 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 445.

[NOTE. Subsequently this cause was heard on a motion to show cause why four executions, in favor of Muncaster against Mason and Jones, should not be quashed, because issued more than a year and a day after judgment. The court refused to quash the executions. Case No. 9,920.

[The case again came before this court upon a motion to quash two writs of fieri facias in favor of Muncaster against Mason and Jones which had been issued upon the mandate of the supreme court, affirming the decree in this case. The motion was denied. Id. 9,248.]

Case No. 9,248.

MASON v. MUNCASTER.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 403.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1828.

DAMAGES—ON DISSOLUTION OF INJUNCTION — CAPIAS—POUNDAGE FEES—LEVY—GOODS SOLD.

1. Upon the dissolution of an injunction to stay proceedings on a judgment of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, damages at the rate of ten per cent. per annum must be awarded, unless it be a bill to obtain a discovery, or some part of the judgment remain enjoined.

2. The plaintiff in a ca. sa. is liable to the marshal for his poundage as soon as he has taken the body of the defendant in execution on that writ.

3. The plaintiff in a fi. fa. is also liable to the marshal for his whole poundage on the debt, if he levy goods to the value of the debt, whether they be sold or not. If sold, and they produce less than the debt, he can claim poundage only on the amount made.

4. The original defendant is not liable in any form of action to the marshal; nor to the original plaintiff for the poundage; nor is he or his property liable for poundage, unless the judgment be for a sum larger than the debt due from the defendant, to be released on payment of the amount really due, with costs; for the marshal cannot, on a fi. fa. make more than the amount of the judgment; nor can he detain the debtor upon a ca. sa. for more than that amount.

5. If the marshal has not returned the fi. fa. he may proceed to execute it for his poundage.

The injunction heretofore granted in this case to stay proceedings upon two judgments at law, obtained in this court by Muncaster against Mason, having been dissolved, two writs of fieri facias were issued and levied upon the land of Mr. Mason, in the county of Alexandria, returnable to December term, 1824, but not returned, the sale of the land having been postponed by consent of the parties.

Mr. Key, for defendant Mason, moved the court to quash these writs, because they included damages, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum from the time of granting to the time of dissolving the injunction according to the act of congress of the 24th of June, 1812, § 7 [2 Stat. 756], and contended that the bill was for discovery, and therefore the damages should be at the rate of six per cent. per annum only.

Another question was also submitted to the court, namely, whether Mr. Mason was liable to the marshal for his poundage fee for levying the executions on the land.

Mr. Key also contended, that the levy was invalid for want of a sufficiently certain description of the lands levied upon.

E. J. Lee, contrà. The bill was not to "obtain a discovery," but was an ordinary bill for an injunction grounded upon facts which it averred the plaintiff could prove.

CRANCH, Chief Judge (nem. con.). This case comes now before this court upon a motion to quash two writs of fi. fa. in favor of John Muncaster against John Mason and Mr. Jones, which were issued from this court on the 17th of May, 1824, returnable to December term, 1824, and which the marshal had levied on certain real estate of the defendant Mason, in the county of Alexandria, but which executions have not been returned; the sale of the land having been postponed at the request of Mr. Mason, and with the consent of the plaintiffs at law. These executions were issued upon the mandate of the supreme court of the United States, affirming the decree of this court, which dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill of Mason v. Muncaster [Case No. 9,247]. One of these executions was for $4,000 damages and costs; and by the clerk's indorsement thereon, the damages were to be released on payment of $2,000 with interest from the 4th of January, 1819, to April 6, 1821, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, and from that date to May 12, 1824, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, and from that time at the rate of six per cent. per annum, till paid, and costs. The other was for $360 damages and like interest. It was agreed by the parties in these cases, "that the court, upon a case stated shall say whether the plaintiff, John Muncaster, was, on the dissolution of the injunction of John Mason against him and others, entitled to the ten per cent. claimed for the delay occasioned by the said injunction; and so too, whether the marshal has a legal claim on the said John Muncaster for poundage fees on levying the said executions on the land of the said John Mason."

The first question is, whether the plaintiff at law is entitled to the ten per cent. for delay occasioned by the injunction? By the 7th section of the act of congress of the 24th of June, 1812, it is enacted, "That when any injunction shall hereafter be obtained to stay proceedings on any judgment rendered for money in the circuit court of the said district, and such injunction shall be dissolved wholly or in part, damages, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum from the time the injunction shall be awarded, until dissolution, shall be paid by the party on whose behalf such injunction was obtained, on such sum as appears to be due, including costs; and execution on the judgment enjoined, shall be issued for the same;" "provided that when the injunction shall be granted to obtain a discovery, or any part of the judgment shall remain enjoined, the court may, if it appear just, direct that such damages shall not be paid, or only such certain portion thereof as they may deem expedient." The statute is peremptory, that the ten per cent. "shall be" paid, unless the case be within the proviso. As no part of the judgment remained enjoined, the only question is, whether the "injunction" was "granted to obtain a discovery." That it was not technically a bill of discovery, is evident. It does not suggest the want of evidence of any kind, nor does it aver any material fact to be in the knowledge, much less in the exclusive knowledge, of the defendant. The object of the injunction was to stay the execution until the court should hear and decide upon the new facts which the defendant had discovered since giving his notes for the purchase-money. These facts were: 1st. That there is still remaining in that part of the parish of Fairfax, which continues in the county of Fairfax, a church belonging to the parish, and a worshipping congregation of Episcopalians, who claim all the rights of the parish, and consequently, a title to the land. 2d. That the legal title is still outstanding in the heirs of Daniel Jennings, who are not estopped by the deed of their ancestor, "inasmuch as the fact may be made clear and notorious, that there was no regular and legal succession, no right of representation, no identity of character and capacities between the said complainants and the original parish of Fairfax." 3d. That those heirs reside in distant states, so that they are not, and cannot be barred by the statute of limitations.

In the complainant's amended bill, filed after the injunction was awarded, he says he "hath discovered other matters and considerations, proper, as he is advised, to be suggested in support of his said original complaint." The new facts, alleged in this amended bill, are: 1. "That there is a regularly elected vestry and wardens of the said Falls Church, having all the powers that the said Alexandria Church can pretend to; and that D. D., W. B. R., &c. &c. are the vestry: and that B. G. T. and D. F. D., are the churchwardens thereof, duly elected by the said vestry; so that your orator is fully enabled to show to your honors, not only that such outstanding title might exist," "but that such title now actually resides in competent parties, in esse who have never relinquished, but on the contrary do assert the same." 2. "That your orator, upon inquiring into the nature and occupancy of the said glebe, has been most credibly informed, and does verily believe, that it was always considered and used as the common property, and to the common benefit of both churches in the said parish. That until the mansion house on the said glebe was destroyed, the rector of the whole parish, having charge of both the churches, resided therein, and cultivated the glebe, and that after his removal to Alexandria, the rents of the said glebe were applied equally to the use and benefit of both the said churches." 3. "That the grantor, D. Jennings, is dead, and has left as his representatives, two sons, Daniel Jennings, and Owen Jennings, residing, as your orator is informed and believes, one in the state of Kentucky, and the other in Louisiana." There is no averment that the complainant is unable to prove any of these facts, nor that they were known to the defendant. There is a general prayer, that the defendant may answer the allegations of the bill, but there are no particular interrogatories. If this be an injunction granted "to obtain a discovery," it would be very difficult to conceive of one which is not. It seems to us to be only the ordinary and common case of an injunction to stay execution. The rule adopted by the act of congress in such cases is, that the ten per cent. must be paid; the exception applies only to extraordinary cases.

The second question is, whether the marshal has a legal claim for poundage on levying the executions on the land of the complainant? It is understood that the land has not been sold, but was liable to be sold, and had been advertised; but that the sale has been postponed by the agreement of the parties, without prejudice to the rights of the marshal. One objection to the claim of poundage is, that there was no valid levy, because the land is not sufficiently described. The executions are not yet returned, and are still in the hands of the marshal; but they are exhibited with the schedule and appraisement; by which it appears that the beginning of the tract is at the end of the lower line of Patterson's land, where it touches the river Potomac. There is nothing to show that the other boundaries are not all correct. Apparently they are sufficiently certain. We cannot say that the levy is invalid for want of certainty. The question then is, whether the marshal is entitled to his poundage fee for levying on land which is not sold? By the act of congress of the 27th of February, 1801, § 9 (2 Stat. 103), the marshal was entitled to receive the same fees, perquisites, and emoluments which were by law allowed to the marshal of the United States for the district of Maryland. By the act of March 3, 1807 (2 Stat. 430), the marshal, for services not enumerated in that or some other act of congress, is entitled, if performed in the county of Washington, to such fees as were, on the first Monday of December, 1800, allowed by the laws of Maryland to a sheriff for like services; if performed in the county of Alexandria, to such fees as were then, by the laws of Virginia, allowed to a sheriff of a county in Virginia.

The poundage fee is not expressly given, or regulated by any act of congress. By the statute of Westm. I, c. 26, no officer shall take any reward to do his office, but of the king; and by 29 Eliz. c. 4, no sheriff shall "receive or take of any person for serving an execution on the body, lands, goods, or chattels of any person, more or other consideration or recompense, than twelve pence of and for every twenty shillings that he shall levy or extend and deliver in execution, or take the body in execution for, by virtue and force of any such extent or execution." That act does not contain the word poundage. The 3 Geo. I. c. 15, § 14, uses the word "poundage," and calls it "poundage, allowance, or reward." By the 16th section of the same act, it is enacted, "That it shall not be lawful for any sheriff, by reason or color of office, or by reason or color of executing any writ or writs of habere facias possessionem aut seisinam, to ask, demand, or receive any other or greater consideration, fee, gratuity, or reward, than twelve pence of every twenty shillings of the yearly value." And by the 17th section, it is enacted, "that poundage shall in no case be demanded or taken upon executing any writ of ca. sa., or upon charging any person in execution by virtue of such writ, for any greater sum than the real debt bona fide due and claimed by the plaintiff," under the penalty of treble damages to the party aggrieved; but the statute does not say whether the party aggrieved be the plaintiff or the defendant, nor which of them is bound to pay the poundage. By the statute of 8 Geo. I. c. 25, § 3, it appears that the halfpenny in the pound upon recognizances was to be paid by the prosecutor; and by the 5th section, the sheriff upon such recognizances is to take only the same fees as are appointed by the statute of 3 Geo. I. By the act of Maryland of 12th of October, 1753, c. 22, it is enacted, "that no officer, by reason or color of his office, shall have, receive, or take of any person any other or greater fees than by this act are allowed;" "to a sheriff serving an attachment or execution, 7 lbs. of tobacco," &c. The Maryland act of 1779 (chapter 25) gives "to the sheriff the same fees on a fieri facias, or replevin, as upon attachments;" and "for all goods and chattels which he shall attach and take into his possession, or wherewith he shall be chargeable, the same fees as on an execution." And by section 5, "on the service of any execution for money or tobacco, the sheriff, for the service of the same, shall charge and receive on the same at the rate of 10 per centum on the first £5, &c. and 5 per centum for the residue; and no sheriff shall be chargeable in any action of escape for more than the sum of money really due, or indorsed to be received on the execution in discharge thereof." It does not clearly appear by any of these statutes who is in the first place liable to the marshal for his poundage, if the defendant be taken on a ca. sa.—the plaintiff or the defendant.
