The case of Les Viscounts De London v. Michell (Anno 1616) 1 Rolle, 404, was an action of debt by the sheriff against the plaintiff in the execution, for his poundage fees upon a ca. sa. Lord Coke said: "If he has not an action of debt he has no remedy; and, therefore, forasmuch as the words are that he shall have, receive, and take, this makes it a duty in him, and so the action lies; quod fuit concessum per curiam." The case of Welden v. Vesey, Poph. 173, was debt by the sheriff against the creditor for £7 0s. 6d. for poundage on £181, for which the debtor was taken on a ca. sa. It was decided that the sheriff should have 5 per centum on the first £100, and 2½ on the residue; and Whitlock, J., was of opinion that the sheriff may refuse to do execution until the levying money be paid to him; but that point was not decided. In the following cases the sheriff recovered his poundage against the plaintiff: Brockwell v. Lock, 1 Salk. 331; Peacock v. Harris, Id. 331; Jayson v. Rash, Id. 209; Lyster v. Bromley, Cro. Car. 286; Earl v. Plummer, 12 Mod. 124; Tyson v. Paske, 1 Salk. 333; Pope v. Hayman, Holt, 317; Suliard v. Stamp, Moore, 468; Gurney and Some's Case, Cro. Eliz. 335. In all these cases the action was against the plaintiff in the execution; and there is no case in which the marshal or the sheriff brought his action for poundage against the original debtor in the execution. In Earl v. Plummer, the action was brought by the sheriff for his poundage on executing an erroneous writ, and the court said "that if the party himself will take out such an erroneous writ, he shall not, under pretence thereof, cheat the sheriff of his fees." Woodgate v. Knatchbull, 2 Term R. 148, was an action upon the case under the 29 Eliz. c. 4, by the defendant in a fi. fa. against the sheriff for damages, for taking more than his poundage, for levying the fi. fa. Verdict for the plaintiff, £54 14s. A rule was granted to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside. The counsel, in arguing in support of the rule, said: "The mischief intended to be remedied by the act of Elizabeth, was the negligence of the sheriffs in executing process; persons who had recovered judgments being obliged to pay money to sheriffs to induce them to do their duty properly in levying the sums recovered. This was to be remedied by allowing the sheriff so much in the pound for the sum levied, as a stimulus to him: but to prevent him from charging the plaintiffs in the original suits with more than was allowed, the act gave the two remedies therein specified. They, therefore, were the only persons intended to be benefited by such pecuniary compensations, and not the defendants." Buller, J., says: "If the plaintiff choose to have an auction, he must pay the expenses out of his own debt to be levied; for there is no color to charge the defendant with it. The sheriff can only levy on the defendant that sum which is given by the judgment of the court." The judgment was for £200; but the fi. fa. was indorsed to levy £116, besides the costs of levying and the sheriff's fees. Buller, J., further said: "Then the only remaining question is, 'whether,' in this case, it appears that the plaintiff is the party grieved. The first execution was what struck me as a ground for this doubt. The judgment there was for £200. The sheriff was at liberty by the judgment of this court to raise £200, but no more; and the expenses of levying must have been paid out of the debt. For in actions on simple contract, and judgment for a debt certain, the expenses of levying must be paid by the plaintiff, and not by the defendant; so that if the sheriff overcharge, the plaintiff is the sufferer. But if the judgment be for a penalty, the plaintiff has a right to receive the whole of his debt, independent of the expenses of the execution; and in those cases the defendant is the party injured by the sheriff's taking more than he ought." Grose, J., said: "At common law, no fee whatever was allowed to the sheriff; then if he be entitled to receive any, it must be by act of parliament. Now by looking into the act it appears clearly to have been the intention of the legislature that the sheriff should be paid in proportion to the sum levied, and that the sheriff should only levy what was really due." In Bonafous v. Walker, 2 Term R. 126, which was debt against the sheriff for an escape, the court decided that the plaintiff was entitled to recover against the sheriff all that he had a right to receive from the debtor who had escaped, including the poundage; and Buller, J., said: "For poundage is part of the debt, and the prisoner could not have been discharged out of execution without paying the poundage, and therefore if the plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, he was entitled to recover the poundage as well as the debt." The case of Lake v. Turner, 4 Burrows, 1981, was debt by the sheriff for poundage on a ca. sa. in favor of the defendant, against Gibbs, who was arrested by the plaintiff. The only ground of defence was, that the ca. sa. was prosecuted at the instance and for the benefit of the king, who, not being named in the statute 29 Eliz. c. 4, is not bound by it, and therefore not liable for poundage. But this defence was, upon demurrer, adjudged bad, and the plaintiff had judgment. In Alchin v. Wells, 5 Term R. 470, it was held that if a sheriff levy under a fi. fa. he is entitled to poundage, though the parties compromise before he sells any of the defendant's goods; and if the sheriff, notwithstanding the compromise, satisfy himself for the poundage on the debt, the court will not rule him to return the writ. The case of Fisher v. Beatty, 3 Har. & McH. 148, was an action of replevin for goods taken by the defendant, as sheriff, to satisfy his poundage and other fees due on a writ of fi. fa. and a venditioni exponas, which last writ was countermanded before execution, and so returned by the sheriff before he took the goods in execution for his poundage. The general court decided that the sheriff could not execute, in that case, for his poundage, and that the defendant in an execution is not liable to the sheriff for his poundage. In the case of Maddox v. Cranch, 4 Har. & McH. 343, the general court decided that the plaintiff in an attachment was liable for poundage. In Stewart v. Dorsey, 3 Har. & McH. 401, the defendant had been taken in execution by the plaintiff (the sheriff) at the suit of the state, who agreed to release the defendant, on his paying all legal costs, and the defendant promised to pay the poundage to the sheriff, who thereupon discharged him. The court gave judgment for the sheriff in an action against the defendant on that promise. A manuscript report of Howard v. Justices of Levy Court of Ann Arundel, in 1805, was cited in this court in April, 1821, in the case of Ringgold v. Nicholls [Case No. 11,848], in which the general court, after full argument, decided that the defendant, and not the plaintiff, is liable to the sheriff for poundage; and upon that decision this court (Morsell, J., absent, and the other judges doubting,) decided the case of Ringgold v. Nicholls. Letters were read by the counsel in that cause, from Mr. Harris and Mr. Taney, stating that the question was still open in Maryland, and from Mr. Williams, that the court of appeals had decided that the plaintiff is not liable to the sheriff for poundage when the defendant is discharged under the insolvent law.

By the consideration of all these cases we are led to the conclusion: 1. That the plaintiff in a ca. sa. is liable to the marshal for his poundage as soon as he has taken the body of the defendant in execution upon that writ. 2. That the plaintiff in a fieri facias is also liable to the marshal for his whole poundage on the debt, if he levy goods to the value of the debt, whether they be sold or not. If sold, and they produce less than the debt, he can claim poundage only on the amount made. 3. That the original defendant is not liable in any form of action, to the marshal, nor to the original plaintiff, for the poundage; nor is he or his property liable for poundage, unless the judgment be for a sum larger than the debt due from the original defendant, to be released on payment of the amount really due, with costs; for the marshal cannot, on a fi. fa., make more than the amount of the judgment, nor can he detain the debtor upon a ca. sa. for more than that amount. 4. That in the present case the marshal, not having returned the fi. fa., may proceed to execute it for his poundage; and in this way only has the marshal a legal claim on the defendant in this cause for the poundage, unless he shall have promised to pay it, upon good consideration.

Case No. 9,249.

MASON et al. v. NEWELL et al.

Circuit Court, W. D. Michigan. 1869.

CONTRACTS — INTERPRETATION — DEPENDENT AND INDEPENDENT STIPULATIONS—PLEADING.

[1. N. & Co., lumber dealers, entered into a contract with M. & Co., owners of a sawmill, by which N. & Co. agreed to furnish certain quantities of logs at M. & Co.'s mills, to pay M. & Co. five dollars per thousand for sawing, and to transport the lumber from M. & Co.'s dock. M. & Co. agreed to saw the logs, furnished by N. & Co., in sizes and styles as directed; to handle and pile the lumber in certain ways; to furnish boom-room for the logs; and to provide certain facilities for shipping the lumber, together with other stipulations. Held, that N. & Co.'s promise to pay for sawing the logs was dependent on M. & Co.'s performance of the various stipulations on their part, as to the manner of doing the work, etc., and that M. & Co. could not recover for sawing, without averring, specifically, performance of all such conditions.]

[2. Held, further, that N. & Co.'s agreement to furnish the logs was independent of all that M. & Co. were to do, except to furnish boom-room to receive the logs, and that M. & Co. might recover for a failure to deliver logs, without averring performance of any other stipulations of the contract on their part.]

Assumpsit (Lyman G. Mason and others against Theodore Newell and others) to recover damages for breach of contract. Demurrer to declaration.

Mr. Van Arman and Storrs & Wilson, for plaintiffs.

Judge Higgins and G. V. N. Lothrop, for defendants.

WITHEY, District Judge. So far as it becomes necessary to know the terms of the contract for the purpose of the demurrer, I give the substance of the respective agreements in their natural order, rather than the order written in the instrument.

Newell, Beaumont & Co.'s Agreements.

1. Newell, Beaumont & Co. are lumber dealers in Chicago, and agree to furnish in the Muskegon river, in time for the spring drive in each year, and deliver to Mason & Co. at their mills in Muskegon, good merchantable pine saw logs, running not more than 4½ to the thousand feet, during the four years succeeding Sept. 13, 1866, sixty-one million feet, board measure; the first year, sixteen million feet, and each of the three subsequent years fifteen million feet.

2. Pay all expenses of running, driving, booming, and delivering said logs at Mason & Co.'s mills, and assort the logs at their own expense, if they require it done, in storage places, which Mason & Co. are to provide.

3. Provide transportation for the lumber from the mill docks as fast as made; and,

4. At no time allow over five hundred thousand feet to accumulate on Mason & Co.'s dock without a further agreement, except near the close of navigation.

5. Pay Mason & Co. for every thousand feet of lumber sawed according to contract five dollars.

6. The price of sawing to be due and payable in the city of Chicago to the order of Mason & Co., on presentation of the certificates of tally and shipping bills of each cargo that may be delivered from Mason & Co.'s dock.

Mason & Co.'s Agreements.

1. Mason & Co. are owners of mill property in Muskegon, and they agree to run their saw mill to its full capacity during the usual sawing season, running day hours each year for four years, commencing with the season of 1867.

2. Manufacture for Newell, Beaumont & Co., from their said logs, in each said year, fifteen million or more feet of lumber.

3. To manufacture all lumber in a good and workmanlike manner. Such lumber to be sawed by the same gauge as used in 1866. And furnish proper gauge for all styles and kinds of lumber in common use in the Chicago market. Lumber to be cut as directed by N., B. & Co. from time to time, so far as the logs furnished will admit.

4. To handle the upper qualities of lumber with care, and pile separate, as far as practicable. All said lumber to be carefully piled on their docks, separate lengths by themselves, studding, joists, etc., with other dimension stuff, by itself, so that it may be conveniently shipped separate.

5. Furnish all boom-room and attend to receiving the logs in their mill boom, and receipt for the logs as delivered by the Muskegon Booming Co. in their mill boom.

6. Provide suitable pockets or places for storing and assorting logs at their mill.

7. For the convenience of shipping the lumber, they are to extend their dock 150 feet out into deep water, and furnish a scow, if required to facilitate the shipment of lumber, which scow, when required to be used, is to be loaded by Mason & Co.

8. Take the logs furnished by Newell, Beaumont & Co. at the scale as purchased by them, and guarantee the scale by delivering on their docks the same quantity of lumber, in feet, board measure, as the logs delivered scale.

9. To take duplicate shipping receipts and duplicate certificates of tally for each cargo. Upon presentation of either duplicate or original shipping receipts and certificates of tally, Newell, Beaumont & Co. to pay for sawing at five dollars per thousand feet.

Mutual Agreements.

The lumber to be tallied at the mutual expense of the parties, at Muskegon, as it goes on board vessels per order of Newell, Beaumont & Co. Culls to be rejected.

There are agreements in the contract not noticed in the above abstract, because not affecting the questions raised by the pleadings. Mason & Co., plaintiffs, have brought suit upon this contract against Newell, Beaumont & Co., defendants, to recover damages for a breach of the contract. The declaration contains six special counts and the common counts. The first count sets out the agreement of the parties in haec verba, avers that the parties entered upon performance of the contract; the defendants delivered logs during the sawing season of 1867 until the 10th of September, and plaintiffs received the logs at their saw mill, and manufactured them into lumber, according to the requirements of the contract, until such time, when the defendants wholly neglected and refused to deliver logs, and still do neglect and refuse. Plaintiffs claim damages for such neglect and refusal of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. All the other five special counts set out the contract by reference to the first count. The first three counts are quite similar; the last three cover the same ground as the first three, but are more full in their averments and statements of breaches on the part of defendants, claiming to recover for the price of sawing done, as well as damages for not delivering logs. I do not propose, nor do I deem it necessary, to state more fully the substance of the different counts. Performance by plaintiffs, as well as readiness and willingness to perform, are averred generally.

Defendants have filed a demurrer to all the special counts. The first and fourth grounds present objections of most importance, and in reference to which the arguments of counsel were almost exclusively confined. To these I shall first and mainly direct my attention.

The first objection is that there is not sufficient averment that plaintiffs have kept and performed the contract on their part; and, fourth, that what are defendants' agreements are set out to be independent, when in fact they are dependent; that plaintiffs' promises and undertakings are alleged to be the sole and only consideration for the promises and undertakings of defendants, whereas performance of plaintiffs' promises is the real consideration for defendants' promises. It is quite clear to my mind, that the promise of defendants to pay five dollars per thousand feet for sawing depends upon performance by plaintiffs of their agreement to saw the logs of defendants, handle and pile the lumber, furnish dockage for the convenience of shipping, and a scow to facilitate loading vessels, when needed, according to the terms of the contract, etc. The doing of these things by plaintiffs was the consideration for the defendants' promise to pay; hence, if any of the counts of plaintiffs' declaration are for the recovery of the contract price for sawing, such counts should aver such performance, and also that tally sheets and bills of lading of the cargoes of lumber shipped from plaintiffs' dock were presented to the defendants, etc. Without these averments, plaintiffs could not make the proof upon trial necessary to recover the price of sawing. I am satisfied that there are no sufficient averments of performance in these particulars, and therefore that there can be no recovery in this suit for the price of sawing. But I am equally clear that the first three counts do not state as any part of the cause of action the price of sawing. On the contrary, they go for damages consequent upon the failure to furnish logs to be sawed. These three counts are quite inartificially framed, but are, I think, in the substance sufficient.

The last three counts of the declaration are for the price of sawing and damages for failure to furnish and deliver logs by defendants, and for abandonment of the contract by them without cause or excuse. There can be no recovery under any of these counts for the price of sawing, because of the want of sufficient averments of performance on the part of plaintiffs. There are averments showing the sawing to have been done, but omission to aver performance of other things which are conditions precedent to payment by defendants. It is true that there is the general averment that plaintiffs have done and performed all things by them to be done and performed, according to the requirements of the contract; and, while a general averment of performance is sometimes held to be sufficient, depending upon the nature of the act or thing to be done, I think the rulings are not broad enough to sanction the general averment in a case like the present. It might have been sufficient to have averred that the logs were manufactured into lumber, in all respects as required by the contract, that the lumber thus sawed was handled and piled as required by the contract; that the dock was built within a reasonable time, or was being built, and that reasonable time had not elapsed for its completion; that a scow was furnished, and that tally sheets and bills of lading of each cargo shipped from plaintiffs' dock were presented to defendants, etc., etc., without specifying as particularly and fully as are the agreements in the contract; but clearly there should have been, what is lacking, to enable plaintiffs to recover for the price of sawing, viz. sufficient averments to inform the court that plaintiffs have fully performed the several things upon which payment depended. Inasmuch, however, as these counts also go for damages occasioned by failure of defendants to deliver the logs which they contracted to deliver, it becomes necessary to consider the fourth ground of objection presented by the demurrer as well to these as to the first three counts. The question presented by the fourth objection is really this: Are the agreements dependent or independent? Or, to put it in another form, are the promises by one party the consideration for the promises of the other party? Or, as defendants insist, was performance by plaintiffs the consideration for the promises and agreements of defendants? These are but different forms of the same question, so far as regards the objection I am now considering, and to be answered from the evident sense and meaning of the contract; not from anything which has transpired since the agreements were entered into by the parties, but from the provisions of the instrument as it was when it came from the hands of the parties.

Now, I have already said that defendants' agreement to pay for manufacturing the lumber could not be enforced against them, without first averring and proving performance by plaintiffs of their agreement in reference to several things by them to be done and performed, which were covered by, and entered into, the price to be paid by defendants; and hence defendants' agreement to pay was dependent and not an independent agreement. The consideration of that agreement of defendants was performance by, and not the promise of plaintiffs to perform on their part. Promise for promise was not the consideration here. But, if this suit has been brought solely to recover, not for the price of manufacturing the logs into lumber, but for not furnishing logs to be manufactured, the question would present an entirely different aspect, and its solution would turn upon other stipulations of the contract than those I have so frequently referred to, and this is the feature of the case to which we now call attention.

Now, Newell, Beaumont & Co. agree to furnish, in the Muskegon river, in time for the spring drive each year, beginning with the lumber season of 1867, and deliver to Mason & Co., at their mill in Muskegon, good merchantable pine saw logs, etc., during the four years succeeding September 13, 1866; the first year, sixteen millions, the second, third, and fourth years, each fifteen millions feet. Mason & Co. were to provide pocket or storage places, for these logs, from time to time, at their mill, and manufacture them into lumber. When as the logs came down the Muskegon river, with the logs of other lumbermen, occupying, as the whole quantity would, miles of the stream, they were stopped in their progress by the booms of the booming company. Here the logs are mixed indiscriminately. There are many owners of the logs, and many millions of feet, perhaps, owned by each. The booming company, or other party, as soon as logs come down, and the mills are ready to begin sawing, commence to deliver for the respective log-owners logs at the various mills, and this goes on the entire season, till all the logs are sawed into lumber, or until the mills stop sawing. Each mill has pockets or storage places for receiving from day to day the logs which are delivered from the booming company's booms. But a small portion of what are to be sawed during the season are at any one time at any mill; and the pockets or storage at the mills are required to be no larger than to contain such quantity of logs as prudence would dictate to ensure a supply in view of their constant or almost daily delivery in small rafts. Now, it is evident that the first thing to be done under this contract by anybody was furnishing and delivering logs by Newell, Beaumont & Co. to plaintiffs, unless possibly that the pockets or storage places were to be provided by Mason & Co. preparatory to the logs being delivered at their mill. The next thing to be done was the sawing of these logs into lumber by Mason & Co., and it is perfectly plain that there could be no sawing by the latter until the logs were in part delivered. How can it be claimed, then, that sawing on the logs was a condition precedent to delivering them? How can it be maintained that the delivery of logs depended on the sawing being done? How does it appear that performance by plaintiffs of their agreement to saw and do the several other things, dependent upon getting pay for sawing, was the consideration for the defendants' promise to deliver logs?

I have asked myself these questions, and I have turned to the contract for answers, and looking to the intention of the parties, by what they have said in that instrument, cannot escape the conclusion that no such claim can be maintained. On the contrary, Newell, Beaumont & Co. agreed to deliver logs, and the performance of that promise depended upon nothing to be done by Mason & Co. except providing, at their mill, storage. And this undertaking to deliver logs runs through the entire period of the contract.

Let us test this particular agreement. Suppose Newell, Beaumont & Co. had never delivered any logs under the contract,—had done nothing,—and for this failure Mason & Co. bring suits, claiming damages for the non-delivery of logs. Would it be necessary that Mason & Co. should aver that they had sawed the logs, or had done any other act or performance of their agreement beyond having provided storage, boom-room, and being ready and willing to receive the logs, and manufacture them into lumber, and to do and perform the contract on their part to be done? Clearly not. If Newell & Co. delivered logs to the mill, and no storage was provided, that fact would excuse them from further delivery, no doubt; but that aspect of the case is not presented, nor is the question, what failures would justify an abandonment? What had Mason & Co. to do, which must necessarily precede the delivery of the logs? Nothing, unless providing storage and boom-room. Hence performance by Mason & Co. of their agreement to saw, etc., cannot be regarded as the consideration for Newell & Co.'s promises. Now, if such is the contract at the outset, nothing subsequent is to be allowed to change the construction of it, except the agreement of the parties. And there has been no change by agreement. I have no doubt as to the character of this particular agreement by Newell, Beaumont & Co. to deliver logs. It is independent of any and everything which Mason & Co. are to do, except possibly providing storage and boom-room at their mill.

If Newell, Beaumont & Co. had incorporated into their agreement to deliver logs that such delivery from time to time was to depend upon Mason & Co., at all times during the life of the contract, manufacturing such logs into good merchantable lumber, piling and assorting the lumber, building a dock and furnishing a scow to facilitate shipment of such lumber, then there would be no doubt but after commencing to deliver logs, a default by Mason & Co. would release Newell, Beaumont & Co. for further obligations. And Mason & Co. would be obliged, in an action for not delivering logs, to both aver and prove performance of all those conditions.

I need not discuss this topic further, nor need I refer to and review the many authorities cited by counsel for defendants. I have examined them as far as I have had access to the volumes referred to, and find nothing which in the slightest affects the views expressed. The first and every other count, among other things, avers general performance by plaintiffs of all things on their part to be done and performed according to the terms and stipulations of the contract, and that they have been and still are ready to receive the logs of defendants, and manufacture the same into lumber, according to the conditions of the contract. Some of the counts aver that "they were ready, able and willing, and fully prepared to receive from defendants, and to manufacture into lumber, in a skillful and workmanlike manner, the entire amount of logs." These averments I regard as sufficient allegation that storage places were provided at plaintiffs' mill, if we are to regard their agreement in that respect a condition precedent to the delivery of logs. When plaintiffs say they were at all times ready to receive defendants' logs, or ready, willing, and fully prepared to receive them, it is equivalent to saying that pockets of storage places were provided, although it would be better to state specifically that pockets of storage were provided, and also boom-room. At the same time I am quite satisfied that the general averment of performance by plaintiffs is not sufficient to permit a recovery for the price of sawing, because, as before indicated, when several things are to be performed, which are conditions precedent to the right to exact payment, the averment must be sufficiently full and particular to advise the court that each and every of such acts have been performed, and yet I regard the court advised in reference to storage places at the mill having been prepared.

The first and fourth grounds of demurrer are, nevertheless, regarded as well taken to the last three or amended counts; the fourth ground, because these counts state that the promise of the plaintiffs to perform, on their part, constituted the consideration for defendants' promises, and that the promises of defendants constitute and were the sole and only consideration for the promises of plaintiffs. I regard nearly all the agreements of the contract dependent. The only serious doubt I have in reference to any of the agreements which I have particularly called attention to is that of defendants to deliver logs. And the doubt has been whether Mason & Co.'s agreement to provide pockets, storage, and boom-room is a condition precedent. I am inclined to allow that it is such, and, this being so, there is no doubt as Newell & Co.'s other agreements, to which I have referred, being dependent on performance by Mason & Co.; and so Mason & Co.'s agreement to saw, etc., being dependent on Newell, Beaumont & Co.'s furnishing logs to saw; hence the fourth ground of demurrer is sustained in reference to the three amended counts. The first ground of demurrer is well taken, because the counts present, as one of the causes of action, the price for sawing manufactured lumber, without averring performances, sufficiently of the various acts and things by them to be done and performed, as I have already indicated the rule to require. The second ground of demurrer, which is for inconsistent and repugnant averments in the different counts, is not sustained. The third ground is general, and need not be noticed.

The result is that the first three counts, though inartificially drafted, are regarded as not open to the objections of the demurrer. Whether they will serve the plaintiffs' purpose upon a trial is for them to determine. The last three amended counts are open to the objections presented by the first and fourth grounds of demurrer. What I allude to as the fourth ground of demurrer is the amendment made to the original cause of demurrer.

The plaintiffs have leave to further amend their declaration at any time within thirty days. The demurrant is allowed costs of the motion, including $50 attorney fee.

MASON et al. v. PEABODY.

Circuit Court, M. D. Tennessee. 1871.

INTERNAL REVENUE — DISTILLER — CAPACITY OF STILL—PRODUCTION—SURVEY—NOTICE —WHEN TAX DUE.

1. The true meaning of section 20 of the act of July 20, 1868, is that the distiller is required to pay the tax upon eighty per cent. of the capacity of his distillery ascertained according to the provisions of section 10 of said act, whether he actually produces so much or not, and is required to pay the tax upon the whole product if exceeding eighty per cent. of said capacity.

2. But in order that the distiller may be bound by the survey of his capacity, under section 10 of said act, the provisions of said section must be strictly complied with, and a certified copy of the survey, signed by the assessor and the surveyor, must be left with the distiller. It will not suffice that he has actual notice of the results of the survey, if not furnished with such certified copy.

3. The tax upon distilled spirits is due the moment it is produced, and must be paid even if the spirits are destroyed by leakage or fire.

[This was an action at law by M. O. Mason & Co. against D. W. Peabody, collector of internal revenue at Nashville, to recover certain taxes exacted under protest.]

TRIGG, District Judge. The case was an action of assumpsit against the collection of internal revenue at Nashville, to recover the amount of taxes paid and a protest upon an assessment for the deficiency in the spirits reported by the plaintiffs, who were distillers, below eighty per cent. of the surveyed capacity of the distillery. It was contended that the survey was not binding upon the distillers because a certified copy was not left with them according to the requirements of section 10, Act July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 129]. A certified copy of the survey was sent to the commissioner of internal revenue, and a correct copy of this, but not signed by either the assessor or surveyor, was retained in the assessor's office, but no copy was left with the distillers. It was shown, however, that the distillers were present while the surveyor was making his measurements, and there was evidence that they had actual knowledge of the results of the survey. It was proved that the distillers had regularly reported their production and paid the tax upon the amount of spirits actually made. Several months afterwards the distillery was burned, and shortly after this they were assessed for the tax upon the difference between the amount of their aggregate reports and eighty per cent. of their surveyed capacity, which they paid under protest; and appealed to the commissioner of internal revenue and afterwards instituted this suit in the circuit court of Davidson county, whence it was removed into the United States circuit court at Nashville. It was proved that four hundred gallons of spirits had been lost by leakage and the burning of the distillery which were not included in the reports of the distillers. It was contended by the U. S. district attorney, R. McP. Smith, that the requirement of section 10, Act July 20, 1868, to furnish to the distiller a certified copy of the survey of the capacity of the distillery was merely directory, and that, while it should be carefully complied with, yet, if this was not done and the distiller had actual notice of the results of the survey, he would be bound by it; that the analogies were numerous where things required by statute to be done in a particular way were held to have been validly done, although the precise mode prescribed had been disregarded, of which cases were cited. Stress was laid upon the fact that section 11, Act July 20, 1868, in connection with section 96, of said act, inflicted a heavy penalty on the distiller, who should have proceeded with his business before the survey had been made under section 10. Upon the other hand it was contended that the true construction of section 20, of said act, in regard to the eighty per cent., was as decided by Judge Drummond, in U. S. v. Singer [Case No. 16,292].

Judge TRIGG charged the jury that the language of section 20, Act July 20, 1868, "in no case shall the quantity of spirits returned by the distiller, together with the quantity so assessed, be for a less quantity of spirits than eighty per centum of the producing capacity of the distillery as estimated under the provisions of this act," was clear and imperative; that it was the intent of this section to impose a tax upon 80-100ths of the assessed capacity of every distillery, which must be paid irrespective of its actual product; that if more than 80-100ths of the assessed capacity was produced, the tax must be paid upon the excess also; that the entire product was meant to be taxed, but the tax upon 80-100ths of the capacity must be paid at all events, whether so much was produced or not.

But the judge charged the jury that the survey was not binding upon the distillers unless a certified copy had been left with them as required by section 10 of the act, and that, even if they had actual knowledge of the results of the survey, this would not supply the omission to furnish them with the certified copy required by this section.

In regard to the spirits lost by leakage and the burning of the still, it was held that, under section 4 of the act, the tax upon the spirits was due the moment of the production of the spirits, and must be paid even if the spirits were destroyed before being drawn from the receiving cistern, and before the distiller had received any benefit from them, and that the amount of tax upon the 400 gallons lost by leakage and burning here must be deducted from any recovery by the plaintiffs.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs.

Case No. 9,251.

MASON v. RHINELANDER.

[8 Ben. 163.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1875.

TORTS — INJURY TO A VESSEL BY FAULTY CONSTRUCTION OF A BULKHEAD—LEASE—DAMAGES.

1. A canal boat, lying at a bulkhead, was so injured by a projecting timber, on which she struck when the tide fell, that she sank. The land in front of which the bulkhead had been built formed part of an estate, and had been leased by the executor to other parties, reserving, however, the right to build the bulkhead, which was afterwards constructed by the executor: Held, that the executor was liable for the damage occasioned to the boat by the faulty construction of the bulkhead.

2. The owner of the boat was bound to raise her after she had sunk, using due care in raising her, and if, in so raising her, she received further injury, the executor was also liable for such injury.

This was a libel by [John C. Mason] the owner of the canal boat J. Stackpole, to recover the damages sustained by her while lying at a bulkhead at the foot of Ninety-Third street, in the city of New York, by reason of her striking on an obstruction caused by the logs or crib-work extending out from the bulkhead, the same not having been properly constructed. It was alleged that the respondent [William C. Rhinelander] had the control, direction and management of the bulkhead, which was a part of the estate of William Rhinelander, deceased.

The respondent denied that he had any control, direction or management of the bulkhead, and alleged that it had been leased to, and was in the possession and control of, Thomas J. Crombie and others. He also alleged that the bulkhead at the foot of Ninety-Third street, between the lines of the street, did not belong to the estate, but to the corporation of the city of New York.

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for libellant.

H. H. Anderson, for respondent.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. (1.) I deem it satisfactorily established by the evidence, that the sinking of the libellant's boat was caused by its striking a projecting timber in that part of the bulkhead which was not embraced within the lines of any street.

(2.) Having caused the bulkhead to be constructed with such projecting timber under water and out of sight, the respondent was responsible for all damage caused by it to vessels lying at it and using reasonable care.

(3.) When the boat, with her cargo, sank, as the result of her striking such timber, the loss was total, unless she was raised. It was incumbent on the libellant to raise her, if possible, and to use due care and caution in raising her. If, in the proper use of proper means to raise her, further damage was caused to her, the loss therefrom must fall on the respondent. There is nothing to show that adequate skill was not exercised in the measures taken to raise her.

(4.) It is not shown that the libellant did not use reasonable precautions, while his boat was lying at the bulkhead, in protecting her by fenders, or that he had reasonable ground for supposing that the fenders he had in use were not adequate.

(5.) There is nothing in the leases put in evidence to absolve the respondent from liability. By the reservation in each of them the respondent had the right to construct this very bulkhead, and it was constructed during the term of the leases, and by the respondent. The lessees were not responsible in any manner to third parties for any defect in the construction of the bulkhead. Indeed, if this boat had belonged to the lessees, there is nothing in the leases which could prevent them from recovering against the respondent.

There must be a decree for the libellant, with costs, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the damages.

Case No. 9,252.

MASON v. ROLLINS.

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Jan., 1869.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DISTILLERIES — POWER OF CONGRESS—REGULATING DISTILLERY — DISTRESS WARRANT — RESTRAINING GOVERNMENT OFFICERS.

1. The act of July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 125], regarding distilleries, is constitutional.

2. The power vested in congress by the constitution to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excise, with the authority to make all laws necessary and proper to carry that power into effect, is absolute, with the single restriction that no rights secured by other provisions of the constitution shall be violated.

3. Congress having the power to impose a tax, and to render its collection effectual, if the character of the business is such that the giving of a bond as a condition precedent to commencing business is a proper means of insuring its collection, such a bond may be required.

4. The prohibition of a distillery within 600 feet of a rectifying establishment is not an unwarrantable interference with the use and disposition of property. If a business affords unusual facilities for evading the government tax, then congress may prescribe the modes, conditions, and limitations under which that business can be transacted.

5. A distress warrant issued by a government officer is due process of law, and seizure of property under it is within the taxing power of the government.

6. Although it might be the duty of a court to interfere with the execution of a law imposing unreasonable conditions to the pursuit of a lawful business, yet it will not restrain the officers of the government from carrying out a law, on the application of a party who simply fears that he may be injured in a business which he proposes to undertake. He must first be pursuing his lawful business and some unauthorized act be done or threatened.

This was an application by Mason for an injunction against E. A. Rollins, the commissioner of internal revenue, and others, officers acting under the internal revenue laws.

The bill alleged that the complainant leased a lot of land, near Clintonville, Kane county, in this state, for the term of three years from the first day of September, 1868, together with the alcohol works, etc., thereon. That by the act of congress of July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 125], grievous and illegal burdens were imposed upon distillers and rectifiers, particularly in requiring a bond, in a large penalty, to be executed before they may proceed with the business; also, in prohibiting the use of any distillery or rectifying establishment within six hundred feet of any licensed distillery. The bill further states that the fifth and seventh sections of the act of March 31, 1868 [Id. 60], were unconstitutional and void, and that, in consequence of the threatened interference of the officers of the government, the complainant is afraid to commence the prosecution of his business, and is unable to find any one to assist him in carrying it on.

Edward Roby, for complainant.
Jesse O. Norton, for defendants.

DRUMMOND, District Judge It will be seen that the object of the bill is to restrain the defendants from carrying out various provisions of the laws referred to, and which are claimed to be an unauthorized interference with the plaintiff in the pursuit of a lawful business. It is not alleged that the plaintiff has done anything except to take the lease, nor that he has been stopped in anything which he has begun.

Under the constitution, congress has power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excise, and also the authority to make all laws necessary and proper to carry that power into effect. It may be admitted that in doing this congress cannot violate any rights secured by other provisions of the constitution, but, excepting this restriction, the power is absolute. There is, as will be seen, power to collect the taxes, and that implies the use of all proper and necessary means to make the collection effectual. Property cannot be subject to unreasonable seizures, nor the house or person of a citizen subject to unreasonable searches; nor can he be deprived of his property without due process of law.

As to the first special ground of complaint, requiring a bond as a condition precedent to the commencement of the business of rectifying or distilling: The right of congress to collect the tax being undoubted, everything that is produced by a distiller or rectifier may be subject by law to the tax. Congress has the right to render the collection of the tax due upon that business or product effectual, and if it is seen that the character of the business is such that irresponsible parties may engage in it, under the direction of capitalists who are in the background, and who thus seek to avoid the proper responsibility which belongs to them, and in this way to render it uncertain that the tax due upon the product shall be made available to the government, there can be no doubt, I think, that as a means of accomplishing that result, congress may require a bond of the person who proposes to engage in that kind of business. The question must always be, whether, under the circumstances of the case, it is a reasonable condition, and I cannot say that it is not in this case.

As to the second objection that is made, the existence of a distillery within 600 feet of a rectifying establishment: It is claimed that this is an unwarrantable interference with the use and disposition of property, that the owner has a right to appropriate it in any way to the performance of a lawful business. But, if the kind of business to which the owner wishes to appropriate his property is such as to afford great and unusual facilities for secreting what may be the actual product of a business, and thus to evade the tax which is due to the government, then the congress of the United States, within the authority which it has to collect the tax which may be imposed, can prescribe the modes, conditions and limitations under which that business can be transacted; and, if it has appeared by observation and experience that the construction and use of a distillery within a certain number of feet of a rectifying establishment enables those who use the one and the other in the prosecution of their business easily to evade the payment of the tax which is due, congress may prohibit this mode of doing the business, which affords these great facilities for avoiding the tax.

Experience has shown, I think, that there has been no one thing used in carrying on the distilling and rectifying business which has been so thoroughly calculated to evade the payment of taxes as the construction of these two establishments so near to each other; the ease with which connections could be made between them was such as to enable the owner to conceal from the officers of the government the amount of the product, and thus escape the payment of the tax. Therefore, as it seems to me, this was a particular mode which congress had a right to prescribe, in order to make the collection of the tax effectual.

It may be conceded that the question whether a seizure or a search is unreasonable, in the language of the constitution, is a judicial and not a legislative question; but, still in determining whether a seizure is or is not unreasonable, we have to look at all of the circumstances under which it is made. For example, at first blush, nothing appears more oppressive than for an accounting officer of the government to strike a balance against a public debtor, and to issue a warrant of distress against his property for the recovery of that balance. It is not a judicial determination; it is not a judicial process by which the property of the debtor, under such circumstances, can be taken for the satisfaction of the debt; but it is an executive process and has been expressly decided to be due process of law within the meaning of the constitution. Murray v. Hoboken Land, etc., Co., 18 How. [59 U. S.] 272. It is the taxing power of the government that interposes, the right to seize and take property for the payment of taxes that is exercised; and this is a potential right. All property of the citizen is subject to the imposition of taxes for the support of the government and the payment of its debts. The only security the citizen has is under the safeguards that are thrown around the subject by the provisions of the constitution itself—one of which is that they must be uniform, and they cannot be imposed without a vote of the representatives of the people in pursuance of law. That is the principal security that we have in relation to this tremendous power which the government has over our property in the right to tax.

I am inclined to think that if congress should impose an unreasonable condition as a prerequisite to the pursuit of a lawful business, it might be the duty of the courts to interfere with the execution of such a law by the officers of the government; but where a party comes into a court and asks that the officers of the government should be prohibited from carrying out various provisions of law which concern the details of a business he proposes to undertake, I think that he cannot ask its interference by injunction, for fear that, in the execution of some of those provisions, a right guaranteed him by the constitution may be violated. There must be some unauthorized act done in the first place, or threatened. He must be pursuing his lawful business and that business be interfered with, or the prosecution of it threatened with some act of the government, before the court can interpose.

I do not say—it is not necessary that I should say in this case—that every provision in these various laws is in strict accordance with the constitution; but I think that before the plaintiff can call upon the court to enjoin the officers of the government in relation to all, or any of them which it is claimed are unconstitutional, he must first establish that he is pursuing his business, and that some right in the pursuit of that business has been interfered with. In this case, with the exceptions that have been mentioned, nothing of the kind is shown. For this reason, in addition to the others which have been mentioned, the court cannot grant the injunction which has been asked in this case.

TAXATION—INTERNAL REVENUE—TAX ON SUCCESSIONS—REPEAL—ACCRUED RIGHT.

[A testator who died in 1867 bequeathed certion personalty in trust for his widow for life and at her death to be divided between his two adult children. The act of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat. 261), repealing the internal revenue tax on legacies and successions, exempted from repeal any case when the tax had become "an accrued right." Held, that the tax against the bequest accrued immediately upon the death of the testator, though not due and payable until after the death of the widow.]

[This was an action by William P. Mason and others against John Sargent, collector of internal revenue, to recover taxes, alleged to have been illegally exacted.]

George Putnam, for plaintiffs.

George P. Sanger, U. S. Atty., for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. This action is brought to recover back a legacy tax paid under protest by plaintiffs to the defendant as collector of internal revenue for the Fourth Massachusetts district.

William P. Mason, the plaintiffs' testator, died December 4, 1867. By his will the personal property upon which the tax in question was levied was bequeathed to the plaintiffs in trust for his widow during her life, and upon her death one-half to his son William P. Mason, and one-half to his daughter Elizabeth R. Cabot, both being of full age at the time of his decease. The widow died June 17, 1872.

In April, 1873, the tax in question was assessed by the assessor of internal revenue for said district upon the ground that the 17th section of chapter 255, Act July 14, 1870 [16 Stat. 261], exempted this tax as "an accrued right" from the operation of the 3d section of the same act which repealed "the special tax on legacies and successions from and after the first day of October, eighteen hundred and seventy." Plaintiffs, to avoid distraint, paid the tax under protest that the property did not vest in the plaintiffs' cestui que trust in possession until the death of testator's widow which occurred after October 1, 1870, the date at which the repeal of the legacy tax took effect, and that the tax had not accrued October 1, 1870, so as to be within the saving clause of the 17th section of the act of repeal. Plaintiffs duly claimed of the commissioner of internal revenue the refunding of the tax for the reasons above stated. The commissioner rejected the appeal upon the ground that the tax accrued under the act of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 223], and was saved by section 17 of the act of July 14, 1870. Plaintiffs thereupon commenced this action for the sum of two thousand two hundred and forty dollars with interest from May 13, 1873, and the case is submitted to the court upon the foregoing facts which are agreed by the parties.

By the provisions of the 124th section of chapter 173, Act June 30, 1864, "any person or persons having in charge or trust, as administrators, executors, or trustees, any legacies or distributive shares arising from personal property where the whole amount of such personal property, as aforesaid, shall exceed the sum of one thousand dollars in actual value, passing after the passage of this act, from any person possessed of such property, either by will or the intestate laws of any state or territory, or any personal property or interest therein, transferred by deed, grant, bargain, sale, or gift, made, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor or bargainor, to any person or persons, or to any body or bodies politic or corporate, in trust or otherwise, shall be and hereby are made subject to a duty or tax to be paid to the United States as follows," etc.

The 125th section provided that the tax or duty should be a lien on the property of every person who should die as aforesaid for twenty years, or until the same within that period, be paid to the United States. The act of July 13, 1866, c. 184, § 9 (14 Stat. 140), while retaining the lien given by the 125th section of the act of June 30, 1864, provided that "the tax or duty aforesaid shall be due and payable whenever the party interested in such legacy or distributive share of property or interest aforesaid, shall become entitled to the possession or enjoyment thereof, or to the beneficial interest of the profits accruing therefrom." It also made it the duty of the executor, administrator, or trustee, having in charge or trust any such legacy or distributive share of an estate, to give notice thereof to the assessor or assistant assessor of the district within thirty days after he shall have taken charge of the trust.

The third section of chapter 255, Act July 14, 1870, repealed the tax on legacies and successions from and after the 1st day of October, 1870. The 17th section of the same act continued the former acts in force "for levying and collecting all taxes properly assessed or liable to be assessed or accruing under the provisions of former acts," and "for maintaining and continuing liens, etc., incurred under and by virtue thereof," and further provided that the act of repeal "should not be construed to affect any act done, right accrued, or penalty incurred under former acts," but every such right was expressly saved.

The tax upon a pecuniary legacy under the provisions of these statutes must be taken to have accrued immediately upon the death of the testator, though not due and payable until the party interested in the legacy becomes entitled to the possession or enjoyment thereof, or the beneficial interest in the profits accruing therefrom. The lien of the United States for the tax attached to the fund in the hands of the executors and trustees as soon as they entered upon the trust. This lien was maintained and continued by the provisions of the 17th section until the tax, the right to which accrued at the death of the testator, became due and payable after the death of the widow, when the children became entitled to the possession and enjoyment of the fund. It was determined in May v. Slack [Case No. 9,336], that the tax is to be taken to accrue upon a pecuniary legacy immediately upon the death of the testator though not payable until the legacy is payable. If the tax accrued before October 1, 1870, it was within the exceptions of the 17th section, and was properly collected, and cannot be recovered back.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—IMPROVEMENTS—SANCTION—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—DELAY IN PAYMENT—WHEN TIME ESSENTIAL.

1. Where possession has been taken of property purchased, and valuable improvements made, the acquiescence of the vendor may be presumed.

[Cited in Story v. Black, 5 Mont. 26, 1 Pac. 1.]

2. A delay of payment for two years, under such circumstances, where the vendor sustains no damage which interest will not compensate, will not bar a bill for a specific execution of the contract.

[Cited in Ewins v. Gordon, 49 N. H. 461.]

3. Where time is made an essential part of the contract, the rule is different.

In equity.

Mr. Stevens, for plaintiff.
O. H. Smith, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a bill for the specific execution of a contract. On the 1st of January, 1835, Mason purchased from the defendant, Wallace, lots 112 and 113, in Jeffersonville, in this state, for six hundred dollars, payable in three annual payments, of two hundred dollars each. Wallace executed a title bond for a deed when the purchase money should be paid. Shortly after the purchase, Mason took possession, and has remained in possession. He has made large and valuable improvements upon the lots, and in the streets, &c., amounting to a sum exceeding 4,000 dollars. On the 1st of September, 1838, Mason tendered to Wallace 732 dollars, the amount due, including interest, on the contract of purchase, which Wallace refused, and declined making a deed. This refusal was founded on the negligence of Mason, in not paying the purchase money; and a specific execution of the contract is resisted on the same ground. Time may be made a material part of the contract, and, when that is done, chancery will not decree a specific execution in favor of a party who has failed to perform his part of the agreement. But in most cases time is not essential, and a mere delay of payment, unless it has been unreasonable, will be no bar to a specific execution of the contract. Where the default is connected with a material change in the circumstances of the parties, or in the value of the property, chancery will not decree a performance.

In the present case, the purchaser has not only been in possession of the premises since the purchase, but he has expended, in improving the property, more than seven times the amount of the purchase money. The defendant alleges that this was done by complainant in his own wrong, and without authority. But, from the possession of the complainant, and the progress of his improvements, the defendant must have had full notice, and, as it does not appear that he took any step to arrest the progress of the complainant, the acquiescence of the defendant may be fairly presumed. The delay was less than two years of the first payment, and less than one of the second. The doctrine which governs this case is found in Longworth v. Taylor [Case No. 8,490]; s. c. 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 174; and in Piatt v. Oliver [Case No. 11,115].

We think, taking all the facts and circumstances into consideration, the plaintiff is entitled to the relief prayed for in his bill, on his paying the purchase money, and interest up to this decree. There was an informality in the tender, and this, connected with the general features of the case, induces the court to require the payment of the interest, as stated. Decree, &c.

MASON v. WALLACE.

[4 McLean, 77.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1846.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — DELAY IN PAYMENT — PROPERTY ENHANCED IN VALUE—IMPROVEMENTS—INTEREST.

1. To entitle a purchaser to a specific execution of his contract, he should make payment either within his contract, or at least within a reasonable time afterwards. If there be great negligence and delay in the payment, and the property is greatly enhanced in value, the court will refuse to give effect to the contract.

2. But where the purchaser has entered into the possession of the property, and made improvements on the ground of four or five times the value of the land, the court will presume an acquiescence by the vendor, and will decree a conveyance, on the payment of the money, notwithstanding the delay.

3. But the court required the purchaser to pay interest up to the time the money was paid.

In equity.

Stevens & Thornton, for complainant.
Mr. Smith, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a bill for the specific execution of a contract, and the defense is, that the complainant has been negligent in making his payments, and, therefore, not entitled to a decree.

The contract was a purchase of certain lots in New Albany, and several years have elapsed since the purchase, and the complainant took no effectual steps to perform his contract, until a tender of the money was made a short time before this bill was filed. But the complainant, shortly after the purchase, entered into the possession of the property, and made permanent and lasting improvements upon it. The improvements have cost more than four times the value of the lots, and they were made with the knowledge of the defendant, and with his presumed acquiescence. The complainant averred a readiness to pay, which the answer denied.

If this case stood upon the contract alone, we should have no hesitancy in dismissing the bill. Where time is not made the essence of the contract, the purchaser is bound to pay the consideration in a reasonable time. That time may vary according to circumstances, and not unfrequently an excuse may be deemed sufficient for the delay. But where change in the value of the property occurs, and there has been unnecessary delay, chancery will not aid the purchaser. Some of the courts, in late decisions, have shown a disposition to require more promptness in the purchaser, than has, heretofore, been required. Where the relative positions of the parties, in regard to the property, remain unchanged, and there are no circumstances of hardship, the interest on the money is often deemed a compensation for the delay of payment. And this is especially the case where the purchaser is in possession of the property, and has expended large sums in improving it.

In the case under consideration, the improvements made by the complainant are permanent, and of great value; and the fact of delay is the only objection made to a specific execution of the contract. The improvements could not have been made without the knowledge of the defendant. The complainant was not formally put into possession by the defendant, but there was an acquiescence in his possession, and in the expenditures on the property. Under the circumstances, we feel bound to give effect to the contract, but in doing so, we will require the complainant to pay interest on the sum due, up to the time of making the payments, and the court will require this to be done in sixty days.

District Court, E. D. New York. Nov., 1878.

DAMAGE—EXCESSIVE SPEED IN NARROW CHANNEL—COSTS.

1. The M., a large passenger steamboat, passed through the channel between Blackwell's Island and New York City with excessive speed, being behind time. A canal-boat loaded with coal was lying then at a well-known and frequented place for discharging such vessels. The swell thrown by the M. rolled upon the canal-boat and sank her at once, the captain and his wife jumping into the river to save their lives. Thirty days afterwards the owner of the cargo of coal gave notice to the owners of the M. of a claim for damages and thereafter filed a libel to recover against the steamer: Held, That the canal-boat was properly laden and made fast, and that, though such boats as the M. pass the place daily, no other such accident was shown to have occurred and that the case was not therefore one of inevitable accident.

2. The M. was not in fault in going through that channel, or in going too near the canal-boat, but was in fault in running with excessive speed and the loss was due to such fault and the steamboat was liable therefor.

[Cited in The Rhode Island, 24 Fed. 295.]

3. The court, to mark its disapprobation of the delay in giving notice of the claim to the M., refused to give costs to the libellant.

In admiralty.

Treadwell Cleveland, for libellant.
Wm. P. Dixon, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought by the owner of a cargo of coal laden on board the canal-boat Dr. J. N. Huntley, to recover the damages arising from the sinking of that canal-boat and her cargo on the morning of the 9th of June, 1877.

It appears that this coal was laden on board the canal-boat at Port Johnson, and safely transported therein to the bulk-head at the foot of East 61st St., New York. The boat arrived at the bulk-head on the evening of June 8th, and was made fast outside of a schooner then lying alongside the bulk-head. At about 9 o'clock the next morning the steam-boat Massachusetts, one of the large passenger boats, engaged in making daily trips through the Sound, passed between the place where the canal-boat lay and Blackwell's Island, and in so doing raised a swell that broke over the canal-boat and sank her, causing the damage sued for.

The libel charges among other faults that the accident arose from the negligence of those navigating the Massachusetts in passing the canal-boat at an improper and unlawful rate of speed. The answer denies the negligence charged and avers that the accident arose from negligence on the part of those in charge of the canal-boat in that she was not properly secured at the bulk-head, and in that she was too deeply laden, and in that proper exertion was not put forth to avoid damage from the swell. The proofs show that the place where the canal-boat was moored was a well-known and much frequented discharging place for vessels of this class, and that so far as is known the present is the only instance of damage caused to any vessel lying there by the swells of passing steamboats, although the boat here proceeded against and others of her class pass the locality daily. The evidence also shows that this canal-boat was properly laden and that the accident cannot be attributed either to an excess of cargo or to the manner in which it was laden or to the manner in which the canal-boat was made fast or to any want of care or skill on the part of those in charge of the boat. The case is therefore one either of inevitable accident or of negligence on the part of the steamboat. There is no room for doubt that there was negligence on the part of the steamboat in regard to her speed.

At the place of the accident the river is narrow but not so narrow as in some other parts of that channel, and although it is not very clearly shown that there was any necessity to pass so near the bulk-head as the Massachusetts did on this occasion, I do not hold her liable by reason of passing nearer to the canal-boat than she was entitled to do. Nor do I find her guilty of fault in passing Blackwell's Island by the channel on the New York side. She had an undoubted right to go down that channel, there being no question as to her ability to pass without endangering the safety of boats made fast where this boat was. It is constantly done by boats of large dimension with safety to all. But negligence is proved against the Massachusetts in regard to her speed. While boats of the large size of the Massachusetts have the right to navigate as well as boats of a smaller class, circumstances often arise when it becomes the duty of such boats to slack their speed because of the great swell they produce when moving rapidly. This is a known duty and its performance has been frequently observed. It has been enjoined by the courts in well-considered cases. The C. H. Northam [Case No. 2,690]; The Morrisania [Id. 9,838], and cases there cited. It is a duty that attaches as well in the case of passing a vessel at anchor or made fast at the pier as when passing a vessel in motion. The degree of care required of course varies with the circumstances.

In this instance the proof is clear that the Massachusetts was going at more than her ordinary rate of speed. Her unusual speed was the subject of remark to bystanders on the shore before the accident happened, and it is proved by several witnesses. This evidence receives confirmation from the fact that the steamboat was behind time. This unusual speed caused an unusual swell, so that the waves broke over the canal-boat and sank her at once, the captain and his wife jumping into the river for the safety of their lives.

Against such a swell as the evidence shows to have been thus caused the canal-boat was unable to protect herself by any reasonable care, and for the damage thus caused to the libellant's coal the steamboat must be responsible, because she had no right to proceed at extraordinary speed in a narrow channel like this, where vessels were moored as this canal-boat was. "Her undoubted right to the navigation of the river is subject to the restriction that it must be exercised in a reasonable and careful manner and do no injury to others that care and prudence may avoid." Hunt, J., The Morrisania [supra].

The libellant is therefore entitled to a decree, but I give no costs for this reason: It does not appear that any notice of this claim was given to the steamboat until some thirty days after the damage was known to have occurred. The ease with which fictitious cases of damage done at the piers can be got up and the difficulty in being able to meet any such claim unless promptly informed of its existence, coupled with the fact that it is seldom if ever possible for those on board the steamboat to know when damage is done at the piers, seem to require some rule that shall insure notice being at once given to the steamboat when it is intended to charge her with liability for damage done at the piers by her swell.

As tending to secure this result I have on former occasions declared my intention to refuse costs in a case of this character, when prompt notice of the claim has not been given. To that I adhere, and no injustice can arise from throwing the burden of showing such notice upon the libellant. In this case no prompt notice is proved.

Let a decree be entered in favor of the libellant without costs and let it be referred to a commissioner to take proof of the amount of the loss.

BANKRUPTCY—SUSPENSION OF COMMERCIAL PAPER—INSOLVENCY—ADVANCES—MORTGAGE—ESTOPPEL.

1. The stockholders of a trading corporation agreed to lend money to the company in proportion to their several shares. One of them made the loan by giving his note, which the company indorsed, and agreed with him to provide for at maturity. They failed to take up the note when it became due, and the promisor paid it within fourteen days after its maturity. Held, that there had been no suspension of the commercial paper of the company for fourteen days.

2. Where stockholders were to advance money to the company in proportion to their interests, and did so advance it on a credit of four months, and all but one of them afterwards extended their loans for one year, in accordance with what the treasurer testified was an understanding at the time the loans were made, and the company paid all its trade debts as they matured, and was in good credit, whether it could be properly considered insolvent, quaere.

3. At a meeting of the stockholders, who were also the principal creditors of the company, it was voted unanimously to give a mortgage to one of the stockholders to secure him for advances made beyond his proportion. The petitioner, who was a stockholder and creditor, was present, and made no objection. Held, he was estopped to set up the mortgage as an act of bankruptcy by the corporation.

The Massachusetts Brick Company was incorporated in May, 1869, for the purpose of manufacturing bricks in Somerville and Medford, with a right to have a capital stock not exceeding $500,000, of which $300,000 might be in real estate. The evidence tended to show that the capital stock had been fixed at $400,000, of which about $350,000 had been paid in, and that in July, 1870, it was found that so much of this had been invested in land and machinery, that the operations of the company were embarrassed for the want of active capital. Thereupon certain of the shareholders, of whom the petitioner was one, signed this agreement: "The undersigned, stockholders in the Massachusetts Brick Company, hereby agree to furnish the treasurer, in proportion to the amount of stock held by them, whatever money may be required to pay the present indebtedness, at ten per cent interest per annum, provided that not over $75 per share shall be required on the amount subscribed to raise $150,000 in full."

The petitioner accordingly lent the treasurer of the corporation $5,000, and took the note of the company at four months, as did others. Some of the stockholders lent their notes on four months, and took a receipt from the treasurer that the company was to pay them at maturity. When the note held by the petitioner came due in December, 1870, he agreed to extend the loan, and lent the treasurer his note at four months, taking from him a receipt that the company were to provide payment for it at maturity, it being given for their accommodation. The petitioner offered evidence tending to show that he informed the treasurer that he should not renew the loan again, but should expect the company to pay the note at maturity, which would be the 4th of April, 1871.

The stockholders advanced different sums, not regulated precisely by the number of their shares, and Oliver Ames, the largest holder, advanced $90,000, which was $30,000 more than his proportion.

The treasurer testified that there was an understanding among the contributors that the money should not be called for until the company should be able to pay it, and that they should all share alike.

Early in 1871, at an adjournment of the annual meeting of the stockholders of the company, at which the petitioner was present, Mr. Ames presented a proposition: That if a mortgage were given him for the excess which he had advanced above his share, he would "carry" $60,000 for one year, if the other stockholders would do likewise. This proposition was accepted unanimously.

All the stockholders, excepting the petitioner, afterwards signed an agreement to extend their several debts, but he refused to sign it. When his note became due, it was not paid by the company, nor were funds furnished him by them, and he took it up within fourteen days after its maturity. He has sued the company at law, and in this petition sets up the non-payment of this note and the mortgage to Ames as acts of bankruptcy.

The treasurer testified that the company owed very few debts, excepting to its shareholders, and met all its ordinary obligations promptly, and was in good credit; that it could pay this debt, but considered that the petitioner was bound to wait.

D. W. Gooch, for respondents.

LOWELL, District Judge. This case has all the appearance of an attempt to coerce the payment of a disputed debt, by an attack on the commercial standing of a trading corporation. Nevertheless, if that corporation has suspended payment of its commercial paper, and there is no real dispute of its validity, or if it is bankrupt for any other reason, the powers of the court are rightly invoked. I am of opinion that there is no commercial paper of the company overdue. The debt to the petitioner is for money paid to take up his own note, which he had lent to the company; that debt does not depend upon the company's indorsement of the note, but upon the fact that money has been paid in their behalf. If there had been no indorsement, the right of action would be the same in fact and in form. When the petitioner took up his own note, it was paid, and he neither need to nor can declare upon it as still outstanding. He lent it to the company for the very purpose of having it discounted as his note, and not as theirs, and his obligation was always that of a promisor, and intended to be so, and their obligation to the holder was merely that of an indorser. Their obligation to this petitioner was truly represented by the receipt, which agreed to save him harmless; and, as soon as he was damni-fied, he had a good cause of action for money paid, but not upon a promissory note; and as the note was taken up within fourteen days after it was due, there never was any suspension for that period.

A more difficult question is, whether in March, 1871, when the mortgage to Ames was given, the company were insolvent, and intended the mortgage to be a preference. There is evidence that they needed money to carry on their business; and, if we leave out of view the fact that the great body of their creditors were their own stockholders, and hold the debts of this class to be ordinary trade debts, there is certainly much ground to say that they were insolvent. The petitioner maintains that these are ordinary debts; but it is quite apparent that the whole object and purpose of these loans was to enable the company to carry on its business, and that it would frustrate this purpose to require them to be repaid on demand, or even in four months, and, therefore, it may be presumed that most of the lenders had not the slightest intention of treating their loans in that way. I do not mean to say that they had not a legal right to demand payment, but they had no intention of pressing their demands at the risk of the insolvency of the company, which was precisely what they were seeking to avoid. When, therefore, all, excepting the petitioner, agreed to extend their loans for one year, the question of insolvency was perhaps adjourned for that time. This was the way it struck me at the hearing, as I then intimated. Here was a company in good credit, meeting all its trade debts, but having what the treasurer swears to have been, and the other members, excepting the petitioner, appear to have considered, a sort of permanent loan. I fear it might be straining a point to say that this company was insolvent, so that whatever payments it made or security it gave must be taken to be acts of bankruptcy, if attacked within four months. It is the result, undoubtedly, when traders are wholly insolvent, and generally known to be so, that all dealings with them, excepting for present considerations, are liable to be avoided, if they are objected to within the prescribed time.

But another ground exists in this case for saying that the petitioner cannot rely on this act of bankruptcy. The corporation, at a meeting at which he was present, voted to give this security; and he did not dissent, and, indeed, so far as appears, assented. It has been held that the vote cannot affect the private rights of stockholders, in their dealings with the corporation, if they were not present and did not assent, and had no notice of the vote until it was too late to affect action under it, though the meeting was a legal meeting: American Bank v. Baker, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 164.

But here the petitioner was present, and did assent, or did not dissent, and had full notice of the vote. It may be said that it would be useless for him to dissent, when he found that a majority was in favor of giving the mortgage; but I think, if he understood that the corporation was about to commit an act of bankruptcy, as he says it was, it was his duty to protest and see if the stockholders deliberately intended to put themselves in that position. He is proceeding against the corporation for an act which he helped them to commit, and this is a breach of faith towards his fellow-stockholders. There can be no clearer or more decisive act of bankruptcy than for a trader to assign all his property to trustees for the benefit of his creditors. Such an act is not even capable of explanation; because, however honest it may be, it is a technical fraud on the statute. But it has been uniformly held that a creditor who assents at a meeting of creditors, is estopped to set up the deed as an act of bankruptcy. Hicks v. Burfitt, 4 Camp. 235, note; Ex parte Kilner, Buck, 104, and the decisions of Lord Eldon, cited in that case in the argument; Bamford v. Baron, 2 Term R. 594, note; Ex parte Cawkwell, 19 Ves. 233; Back v. Gooch, Holt, N. P. 13; Oliver v. King, 8 De Gex, M. & G. 110. Two of these decisions go to the mere silence of a creditor. Indeed, in one of them the creditor advised against the course of action adopted. Applying them to this case, it would seem that the petitioner's failure to protest, at a time and place where he, as a creditor, had a right to be heard, would bind him, and this whichever way he voted on the question. My doubt was, whether at a meeting of stockholders, not called as a meeting of creditors, it might be presumed that any thing but the affairs of the corporation were to be regarded, and whether a creditor, who happened to be a stockholder, ought to be expected to interfere. But, upon reflection, I find it impossible to divide the rights and interests of the parties in this way; for every meeting of stockholders was, in fact, a meeting of the chief creditors, and, besides, it rather strengthens the argument for an estoppel, that the creditor was not only suffering the debtor to commit an act of bankruptcy, but himself held such relations to the debtor that he was bound to notify him of the consequences of his proceedings.

The evidence tends to show not merely a constructive breach of good faith, but an actual one. The petitioner left Boston before the mortgage was delivered, and left written instructions that the defendants should be made bankrupts, and the mortgage be broken up if his note was not provided for at maturity. And, on the other hand, there was no evidence that any other party interested had any thought of bankruptcy, or understood that an act of bankruptcy was about to be committed. The consent of creditors that was asked for and obtained was not to the mortgage, but to the extension; that is, Ames would extend his proportion if the others would extend theirs. As to the mortgage, no one is estopped if this petitioner is not; because all that any of them formally and in writing agreed to was the extension. I think, upon the whole, it was the duty of the petitioner to warn the corporation that they were committing an act of bankruptcy of which he or some other creditor might take advantage; and, as he has not done so, he is estopped to set up the mortgage as such an act.

Petition dismissed.

The MASSASOIT.

[1 Spr. 97; 7 Law Rep. 522; 12 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 367.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1844.

SEAMEN — WAGES — SHIPWRECK — REMNANTS OF VESSEL SAVED—OFFICERS AND SEAMEN SUPERSEDED BY OWNER IN SALVAGE.

1. In case of shipwreck, seamen are entitled to wages, as such, if by their exertions remnants of the vessel to the amount of the wages are saved, although no freight be earned.

[Cited in The Holder Borden, Case No. 6,600; Drew v. Pope, Id. 4,080.]

2. If, after a vessel is cast on shore, the owner appears with a competent force, supersedes the officers, and takes the business of salvage out of the hands of the seamen, and neither affords them subsistence, nor desires their aid, they being willing to render it, they may recover wages in a suit in rem against the remnants of the vessel.

This was a libel for wages in a voyage from Calcutta to Boston.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. If no freight was earned, the first question is, whether in case of shipwreck and total loss of freight, parts of the vessel being saved by the exertions of the crew, the seamen are entitled to wages. When the early editions of Abbott on Shipping were published, there had been no decision on this point in England. Abb. Shipp. (3d Ed.) p. 435.

In the American courts it has been settled, by a series of decisions commencing at an early date, that in such case the seamen are entitled to compensation. Should that compensation be wages under the contract? This was opposed to the maxim, that "freight is the mother of wages," which the courts were not prepared directly to encounter. Should the compensation be salvage? Salvors are mere volunteers, and very liberal compensation is awarded to them, in order to invite their exertions and secure their fidelity, in the laborious and oftentimes perilous service of rescuing and preserving wrecked property. Shall then seamen be absolved from the obligations of their contract, and from all duty of obedience to their officers, at the moment when their services may be most needed, for the protection of the property of the owners? Shall they be at liberty, at such a time, to divest themselves at once of their allegiance to the ship, and of the character of covenanted seamen, and assume, at their option, the character of salvors, claiming its large rewards, and subject to no control? This would not only be inconsistent with the contract of hiring, but a startling violation of that principle of maritime policy, which sedulously endeavors to bind up the interest of the mariner with that of the owner. It would be not only an inducement to relax his efforts in time of difficulty and danger, but a direct temptation to cause shipwreck and disaster, that he might successfully claim the large rewards of salvage service.

There may, indeed, be cases in which seamen may become salvors of their own vessel, as stated by Lord Stowell in The Neptune, 1 Hagg. Adm. 227, 237; and by Mr. Justice Story more liberally, in The Two Catherines [Case No. 14,288]; and as in Mason v. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 240, 269, 270; although that was against the judgment of that able jurist, Mr. Justice Washington, as appears in The Cato [Case No. 13,786]. But seamen can properly become salvors only in very extraordinary cases, where the services rendered are without the range of their contract, and therefore voluntary. Of such we are not now speaking.

The objections to seamen becoming salvors, in ordinary cases of shipwreck, are so formidable, that the idea could not be entertained; and it was decided that they were still held by their contract, and bound to continued exertions to save their ship, her tackle, apparel, and fragments. That for such laborious and hazardous service, when successfully performed, they should receive some reward, no one was bold enough to deny. It could not be salvage, for the insurmountable objections already stated. Should it be a quantum meruit? That was incompatible with the idea, that the service was rendered under a contract prescribing the rate of compensation, and was obnoxious, in a great degree, to the objections which excluded salvage.

Holding, as the courts generally did, and upon the strongest reasons, that the seaman was still serving under the obligation of his contract, the plain principle would seem to be that his compensation should be that which the contract prescribed. And this was the practical result to which they in fact generally came, although they did not see fit to give it the name of wages. They have called it sometimes salvage measured by the stipulated wages, sometimes quasi salvage, or wages in the nature of salvage. But the compensation actually given was the contract wages, neither more nor less; and this, too, whether the voyage had been long or short, the amount large or small, or the service, at the time of the shipwreck, great or trifling. It had not one quality of salvage, excepting that something must be saved. It was not for voluntary, but for covenanted service. It was not enhanced by peril and gallantry, nor diminished by the object being easily and safely accomplished. It was not affected by the value of the property saved, provided it was not less than the amount of the wages. It might exhaust the whole remnants, where there had been little either of peril or labor; or it might not take a hundredth part, where both had been great. Decisions of Judge Winchester, reported in a note in Relf v. The Maria [Case No. 11,692]; Frothingham v. Prince, 3 Mass. 563, more fully reported in 2 Dane, Abr. 462; Weeks v. The Catharina Maria [Case No. 17,351], which states what was the ultimate decree in The Cato [supra]; Giles v. The Cynthia [Case No. 5,424]; Clayton v. The Harmony [Id. 2,871], a remark arguendo; Coffin v. Storer, 5 Mass. 253, 254, a dictum; The Two Catherines [supra]; Adams v. The Sophia [Case No. 65]; Brackett v. The Hercules [Id. 1,762]. In Dunnett v. Tomhagen, 3 Johns. 156, the court, by Kent, C. J., considers the compensation that should be awarded, to be salvage; and the same opinion is expressed in 3 Kent, Comm. 195.

It will be seen by these cases, that while judges and jurists were really carving out a new exception from the general rule, that makes the earning of freight a pre-requisite to the recovery of wages, they had the fear of the maxim that "freight is the mother of wages," before their eyes, and sought to propitiate it by a misnomer. That maxim is probably indebted to the concise figure of speech in which it is conveyed, for something of its force and acceptance; for, as observed by Lord Stowell, in The Neptune [1 Hagg. Adm. 227], it is not strictly accurate. Wages are the legitimate offspring of the mariner's contract united with its performance,—cut off, indeed, sometimes by the stern decrees of maritime policy, seeking to unite the interest of the mariner with that of the owner.

Chancellor Kent, in Dunnett v. Tomhagen, and in his Commentaries above cited, expressed dissatisfaction with this equivocal state of judicial opinion, in which the language of the courts vibrated between wages and salvage; and to escape from it, he adopted the greater evil of considering that the reward should be strictly and merely salvage. Mr. Justice Story, in The Two Catherines [supra], says, "If the question were entirely new, it might, perhaps, be more consistent with the principle of the rule, that the earning of wages shall depend on the earning of freight, to hold that the case of shipwreck constituted an exception from the rule; and that the claim to wages was fully supported by the maritime policy, on which the rule itself rests."

What was thus clearly indicated in 1821, as the most proper course, and the course which Judge Story would evidently have pursued, but for the influence of previous opinions pronounced by others, was fully adopted by Lord Stowell, in The Neptune, 1 Hagg. Adm. 227. The case was this: A British vessel was wrecked on the coast of France, and the freight totally lost, but by the exertions of the crew, parts of the vessel were saved, which were sold by the captain, who was also the owner. After their return to England, the seamen instituted a suit in personam, in the admiralty, against the owner, for wages. The libel or petition contained no claim for salvage, or quasi salvage, services. Lord Stowell, after full investigation, in an elaborate judgment, sustained the naked claim for wages as such, distinctly announcing it as an exception to the rule, which makes wages to depend on freight. This is evidently approved by the American editor of Abbott on Shipping (4th Am. Ed., p. 452); and again by the same high authority, in Pitman v. Hooper [Case No. 11,185]; and we may now, with that directness which should characterize courts of justice, give to the established practice in this country its true designation, and say that in such cases wages, as such, are recoverable.

The result of the authorities, and the true doctrine, are well stated in Curt. Merch. Seam. pp. 285–290, where the learning on this subject is collected.

But it is contended that, in the case now before the court, the seamen did not save the remnants of the vessel; that they were preserved by other agency, and that this distinguishes the present case from all cases in which compensation has been allowed, and ranges it with that of The Elizabeth and Jane [Case No. 4,356].

What are the facts? The ship Massasoit, on a voyage from Calcutta to Boston, went ashore in a storm on the night of Wednesday, the 11th of December last, on Point Alderton, at the mouth of Boston harbor. The crew remained on the wreck, performing all their duties, until they were taken off by a life-boat, barely escaping with their lives, about three o'clock in the afternoon of Thursday. Previously to this, the owners had received information of the disaster, and at the time when the seamen were landed, the agent of the owners arrived with a steamboat from Boston, for the purpose of saving the remnants of the vessel and cargo. From that time, the captain gave up all control to the agent. The crew were in a suffering condition, and physically unable to perform any labor, during the residue of Thursday. On Friday, some of them were still too feeble to do anything; the others went upon the beach, near the wreck, and rendered some trifling service, by throwing out of the reach of the sea a few sheets of copper, that had been torn by the waves from the bottom of the ship. The agent continued to labor in saving the wreck, until Tuesday following, and then contracted with certain persons to take up the cables and anchors, when the sea should become smoother; which was done in the succeeding week. Neither the agent of the owners, nor the officers of the ship, furnished the seamen with any means of subsistence, or called on them for any service, or indicated in any manner, that their aid was desired.

The seamen never formally tendered their services, but no disinclination was manifested, on their part, to perform whatever services might be required of them. They remained, supported by charity, near the wreck; their presence and condition being known to the agent and officers, until Saturday, when they went to Boston.

The admiralty requires no vain or nugatory acts, and a formal and express offer of service was not necessary. Had the agent desired their aid, he would doubtless have made it known, and furnished them the means of subsistence, which might easily have been done. Instead of this, he came with a steamer, and as great a force of efficient men as he chose to take with him, and it was in his power, before Friday morning, to have increased that force to any desired extent. I must presume, therefore, that he had all the assistance that he wished, and the seamen being thus superseded, and the saving of the remnants taken out of their hands, might well consider themselves discharged, and, after remaining near the wreck about forty hours on charity, seek the means of subsistence elsewhere.

Why should they not have wages? Such performance would, upon the principles applicable to other contracts of hiring, entitle them to the stipulated reward. That policy which makes the compensation of the seaman depend on his saving property, entrusted to his care, for the owner, was intended to secure his fidelity, and stimulate his exertions in case of disasters, which usually occur at sea, or in remote countries, where the owners cannot be present; and oftentimes where none but the crew can know how far their duty has been fully performed. Here the owner appeared; all control over the property was delivered up to him, he assumed the entire management, superseded the seamen, took the business of the salvage out of their hands, and in effect, discharged them. Surely the stern rule of maritime policy, which has been adopted to stimulate continued exertions for the benefit of the owner, has no application to a case like this; and the just principles which usually govern contracts for labor need not be intercepted.

This differs from the case of The Elizabeth and Jane [supra]. There the vessel had been entirely abandoned,—left derelict by the crew. It had not been delivered up to the owner. He had never appeared. In such cases it is often difficult, sometimes impossible, to ascertain whether more could have been done or not; and the policy of making it for the interest of the crew to persevere, by saying to them, when you abandon the vessel, you abandon all hope of compensation, is manifest; and the accidental circumstance that the derelict is afterwards found by others and brought to the owners, burdened with heavy salvage, does not affect the justice or policy of the case, nor resuscitate the claim to wages.

Decree for wages and costs.

NOTE. Since the decision of The Massasoit the point there adjudicated has been considered, incidentally, in several cases reported in the United States. Davis v. Leslie [Case No. 3,639]; The John Perkins [Id. 7,360]; Bruce v. The America [Id. 2,046]. And some decisions prior in date to The Massasoit have since been reported: Cartwell v. The John Taylor [Id. 2,482]; Reed v. Hussey [Id. 11,646]; The Wave [Id. 17,300]; The Dawn [Id. 3,666]. In this last case, (previously reported in the American Jurist,) Ware, J., after a very careful examination of the authorities, expressed the opinion, "that the seamen, in these cases, have two distinct claims, one for wages, and another for salvage. Their wages are to be paid exclusively from the materials of the ship, they being pledged for that purpose, and the full amount due is to be paid without deduction. But they have no claim for wages against the cargo, except for the freight due upon it. Their claim for salvage is against the general mass of the property saved; and, as in all cases of salvage, the amount is uncertain, depending upon the particular circumstances of the case." The learned judge goes on to say, that "the crew are bound to remain by the vessel, and contribute their utmost exertions to save as much as possible from the wreck." Their service, therefore, wants one essential element of salvage service,—that of being voluntary. And the conclusion finally arrived at is, that they are not to be rewarded as general salvors, but are to be allowed, in addition to wages, "a reasonable compensation, pro operâ et labore."

It has been said by eminent authorities, that "it matters not whether the recompense be made in the name of wages, or as salvage." Reed v. Hussey [supra]; 3 Kent, Comm. 196, note; but there are cases where the compensation wholly depends on this distinction, as for example, where the ship perishes, and cargo alone is saved, with no freight due upon it.

In England, the exception contended for in The Massasoit, has been established both by the courts and by legislation. The next case to The Neptune, before the high court of admiralty, was The Reliance, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 119. There was a total loss of cargo and freight; the ship perished, and the crew in her, but portions of the ship were saved by strangers, and came into the owner's hands. The widow and administratrix of one of the crew, promoted a suit for his wages against the owners. The learned judge, (Dr. Lushington,) decreed wages to the time of the seaman's death. In the next year after this decision, (Sept. 5, 1844,) was passed 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, § 17: that "in all cases of wreck or loss of the ship, every surviving seaman shall be entitled to his wages up to the period of the wreck, or loss of the ship, whether such ship shall, or shall not, have previously earned freight; provided the seaman shall produce a certificate from the master or chief surviving officer of the ship, to the effect that he had exerted himself to the utmost to save the ship, cargo and stores." And in 1854, was passed the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 183: that "no right to wages shall be dependent on the earning of freight;" with the proviso that in all cases of wreck, or loss of the ship, proof that the seaman has not exerted himself to the utmost to save the ship, cargo and stores, shall bar his claim. "A most wise and salutary substitute," says Judge Betts, Davis v. Leslie [supra], of the first statute, "for that old figment of law, which had, in many cases, been most oppressively enforced against seamen, that freight is the mother of wages."

In the year 1849, the gentleman who had acted as proctor for the libellants, in The Massasoit, filed a libel in the district court for Massachusetts, on behalf of certain seamen belonging to the ship Niphon, against the owners, for wages. The libellants were on monthly wages, when the ship was abandoned at sea, on account of a dangerous leak, and set fire to, by the master's orders. They claim wages to the time of the abandonment, on the ground that the seaman's contract is a simple contract of hiring, and that his title to wages depends only on his faithful performance of the service for which he is engaged. Sprague, J., dismissed the libel in a judgment not reported: and upon appeal to the circuit court, the decree was affirmed. See The Niphon's Crew [Case No. 10,277].

In The Florence (May 14, 1852) 20 Eng. Law & Eq. 607, where the seamen, by the master's order, abandoned a leaky ship, at sea, saving nothing of ship, or cargo, Dr. Lushington said, "Their right to wages was gone, and would have been, if a year's wages had been due them." In an action for salvage, brought by certain of the crew, who subsequently returned and saved the ship, he allowed the claim; on the ground that by the peculiar circumstances of the case, their contract, as seamen, had been terminated; and they might well be salvors. MASSEY v. SCHOTT et al.

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1815.

DEBT—BOND—DOUBLE PAYMENT—VOLUNTARY PAYMENT.

1. In an action of debt on a bond, with a collateral condition, nothing can be recovered, but what the obligee is entitled to, upon a breach of the condition.

[See Bank of Mount Pleasant v. Sprigg, Case No. 891.]

2. One of the partners of a mercantile house, in Liverpool, having been arrested for a debt due by them, in the city of Philadelphia, paid the same; and took from the defendants a bond, in the condition to which, it was stipulated, that the obligors had agreed to indemnify him, against a double payment of the sum paid, should the house be obliged, by compulsion of law to make the same. The plaintiff's house in Liverpool having been called upon by two persons claiming the same money and suits having been instituted in England for the same; not having notice of the payment made by the partner here, and desirous to avoid the expenses of litigation; filed a bill of interpleader in the court of chancery, praying to be allowed to pay the amount claimed from them, in the two suits, into court; which was done, by permission of the lord chancellor. This was a voluntary payment, and the condition of the bond does not protect the plaintiffs from the loss sustained thereby.

The parties having entered into a written agreement, to waive all manner of form in the pleadings, and to try the cause on the merits, the case appeared to be as follows, viz:

In the year 1808 or 1809, the house of Pearson, Hodgson and Massey of Liverpool, of which the plaintiff was a member, became indebted to Nathan Davidson of Philadelphia, in the sum of about six thousand four hundred dollars; for the balance of the proceeds of a cargo of cotton, which had been shipped to them. In July, 1809, Davidson became insolvent, and assigned over his estate, to the defendants, for the benefit of his creditors. On the 16th November, 1809, Davidson, and on the 17th of the same month, the defendants, wrote to the house of Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, and directed them to pay over the balance of the funds in their hands, to William and John Bell and Co. of London. Soon after these orders were given, the defendants, as assignees of Davidson, empowered S. Potter of London, to collect the said balance for their use. The Bells, in consequence of the first orders in their favour, instituted a suit in the high court of chancery, in England, against Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, to recover the said balance. Pending that suit, Massey, one of the partners, came to Philadelphia, and was arrested at the suit of the defendants, in order to recover the aforesaid balance; and he, Massey, "in order to release himself from the arrest, and at the same time, to secure himself against a double payment of the said claim, which might take place, if his said house in England should have been compelled by course of law, to pay the demand, made on them by said William and John Bell and Co.; or by having paid or secured to the said Potter, or to any other person, on behalf of the said Davidson, or his assignees, in any manner whatsoever, prior to the date of the bond, hereafter mentioned; or before any countermand, to be given by the said assignees of such payment, shall have reached the said Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, in England;" paid to the defendants, the sum of seven thousand nine hundred and sixty-seven dollars and seventy-six cents; the balance supposed to be due; and the defendants entered into a bond, in which all the above circumstances are fully recited, and the parts marked as a quotation, are literally copied from the recital. Then follows the condition; which obliges the defendants to discontinue their suit against Massey; to use their best endeavours to procure a discontinuance of any suits, that have been, or might be brought against Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, in consequence of any orders of the said Davidson, before his assignment, or of the defendants afterwards, by the said W. and J. Bell and Co., or any other person, for the recovery of the said balance; and also, to save harmless, and indemnify the said Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, or either of them, against any loss, injury, or damage, they may, by compulsion of the law, have sustained, or may sustain; by reason of any payment, in consequence of any suit brought in England, or elsewhere, against them or either of them, by virtue of any order given by said Davidson, previous to his said assignment, or by the defendants, since the said assignment, or in consequence of any foreign attachment, levied in their hands, by any creditor of Davidson, for the recovery of the said balance; and also save harmless, and indemnify the said Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, and every of them, against all charges, injuries, losses and damages they may sustain, by reason of a double payment, of the said balance as aforesaid, or any part thereof. There is then a proviso; that the defendants should not, in any event, be liable, by virtue of this obligation, to pay any larger sum, than was received by them from Massey; and that all costs heretofore incurred in England, by reason of Pearson, Hodgson and Massey's non-compliance with the order of Davidson, and of the defendants as aforesaid, should be paid by Pearson, Hodgson and Massey; not extending, however, to more than the costs of one suit, if they should have been prosecuted on two contending claims; and that all legal costs, that should be incurred after the date of the said bond, should be borne by the defendants.

This bond was dated the 27th July, 1810; the bill in equity, against Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, by the Bells, was filed in November, 1809. On the 10th August, 1810, Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, filed in the same court, a bill of interpleader against the Bells; against Little and Wotherspoon, who also demanded the balance, but who, in their answer to this demand disclaimed; against Potter, Davidson, and his assignees; and prayed an order, to enable them to pay into the Bank of England, the balance acknowledged by them to be due to Davidson. On the same day the order was made; and on the 17th of the same month, Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, paid into the bank, to the credit of the accountant of the court, fourteen hundred and forty-three pounds, seven shillings, equal to six thousand four hundred dollars.

The questions were: First, whether the plaintiff, having paid to the defendants, about fifteen hundred dollars more than the house of Pearson, Hodgson and Massey acknowledge to have been due; should be at liberty, in this suit, to establish that fact, and to recover it back. Secondly, whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover any money in this action. The first question arose in the progress of the cause, upon the plaintiff offering to prove the overpayment; the second, upon a motion to nonsuit the plaintiff.

M. Levy and R. Peters, Jr., for plaintiff.
Sergeant & Todd, for defendants.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). This is an action of debt, brought upon a bond, with a collateral condition; and therefore the plaintiff cannot recover any thing, but what he is entitled to, upon a breach of that condition. The condition is; that the defendants should discontinue their suit against the plaintiff; should endeavour to obtain a discontinuance of any suits in England, against Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, in consequence of any orders of Davidson, or of the defendants; to indemnify said Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, and every of them, against any damages they might sustain by legal compulsion, in consequence of any suit brought in England, or elsewhere, against them, by virtue of any order given by Davidson, or by the defendants, or in consequence of any foreign attachment, levied in their hands, by any creditor of Davidson; and to indemnify them against all damages they might sustain, by reason of a double payment of the balance. It is admitted, that there has been no breach of the two first parts of the condition; nor has any attachment been levied; neither was the over payment made on the 27th July, 1810, by compulsion of law, in consequence of any suit brought against Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, or by virtue of any order, given by Davidson, or the defendants; nor was such over payment a double payment, that being the first payment, and the payment into the banks doubled it, so far as it went. But, as to the difference between the sum paid on the 27th July, 1810, and that paid on the 17th August, into the bank; there has never been any double payment of that sum, and of course, it cannot come under the last clause of the condition. The plaintiff, if he inadvertently paid to the defendants more than his house owed, may recover it back, in an action for money had and received, but not in this action.

As to the second question, it is the opinion of the court, that the action cannot be maintained. The recitals in the condition of the bond, express in most intelligible language, the intention of the parties. The defendants, having arrested the plaintiff in this country, for the balance due to them, by his house, and held him to bail, had obtained a security, which they were only induced to relinquish, upon receiving payment of what was supposed to be due. But, as it was possible, the house of Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, might be compelled, by legal process, to pay the same money again, to the Bells, or to some other person; or, that they might have paid, or before they could have notice of the settlement in Philadelphia, might pay, voluntarily, that balance, upon orders drawn by Davidson, or by the assignees; it was but just, that the defendants should indemnify those persons against a double payment, made under any of those circumstances. That this was the design of the parties, is clear, from the recitals; and the condition is precisely accommodated to that intention. The recital, as to the compulsory payment, states that the defendants had agreed to secure Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, against the event of a double payment of the said claim; which might take place, if they should have been compelled, by course of law, to pay the demand made on them by the Bells. In execution of this agreement, the defendants oblige themselves, to indemnify the said Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, against any damage they may, by compulsion of law, sustain, by reason of any payment, in consequence of any suit brought against them; by virtue of any order given by Davidson, or by the defendants. But the payment made into the bank, was not made by compulsion, or in consequence of any suit brought against Pearson, Hodgson and Massey; but it was made, under an order, obtained upon the prayer of Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, and in a suit in which they were complainants, not defendants. This proceeding was a violation, not only of the words, but of the intention of the parties. The defendants did not admit the claim of the Bells, but on the contrary, obliged themselves, to endeavour to have it discontinued; and that the cause might be defended, they bound themselves from the date of the bond, to pay the costs. Had Massey himself filed the bill of interpleader, and prayed to be permitted to pay the money into the bank, it would have been a gross fraud; in as much, as he would have attempted to deprive the defendants of the security they had obtained by his arrest, and then, by a voluntary abandonment of the cause of the defendants, and a payment of the money, to compel the defendants to restore the security, which they had taken, in lieu of the person of Massey. But although this case is clear of fraud, the payment in England having taken place, in about twenty days after the compromise was made in Philadelphia; still, it cannot for a moment be contended, that a payment made upon the prayer of Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, and in a suit brought by them, was a payment made by compulsion of law, in a suit brought against them.

As to any voluntary payment, which Pearson, Hodgson and Massey might have made, before the date of the bond; or might make, before any countermand, to be given by the defendants, of such payment, should reach Pearson, Hodgson and Massey in England; the recital states an agreement by the defendants, to indemnify Pearson, Hodgson and Massey, against any payment made to Potter, or to any other person, on behalf of Davidson, or his assignees, in any manner, before those periods. Then comes the condition intended to fulfil the agreement, and it stipulates, to indemnify the said Pearson, Hodgson and Massey from all damages, which they might sustain, by reason of a double payment of said balance as aforesaid. These words, "as aforesaid," clearly refer to the double payment, mentioned in the recital; that is, a payment made to Potter, or to any other person, on behalf of the said Davidson, or his assignees. But the payment in England, for which this suit is brought, was not made to Potter, or to any other person, on behalf of Davidson or the assignees. Persons claiming on behalf of Davidson or the assignees, could never be persons claiming adversely to them; but it is most obvious, that persons claiming for their benefit were intended. It is impossible, that the Bells, the only defendants to the bill of interpleader, who claimed adversely to Davidson, or to his assignees, could be intended; because, in the same sentence, but a line or two preceding these expressions, payment by compulsion of law, is expressly referred to the Bells by name. It would then have been absurd, immediately afterwards to permit a voluntary payment to them. It is of no consequence indeed, whether the words "as aforesaid," refer to the payments mentioned in the recital, or the words "said balance;" because, if they were omitted altogether, the meaning of this part of the condition, is ascertained by the obvious meaning of the recital; both of which refer to voluntary payments. That the words "his assignees," in the condition, mean the defendants, and not the Bells, or any other, to whom Davidson had given an order to receive the money, is obvious; not only from the preceding words, which in reference to the Bells, speak of a compulsory payment, and consequently, the order of Davidson in their favour, could not be on his behalf; but, because the defendants are immediately afterwards described in the same words, viz. "the said assignees."

For these reasons, it seems clear that the plaintiff cannot recover in this action.

The plaintiff suffered a nonsuit.

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1842.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY—BILL OF REVIEW—NEW MATTER—HOW BILL FILED—WHEN FILED—MISTAKE IN DECREE—COMPLIANCE WITH DECREE—DELAY.

1. The ordinances of Lord Bacon still govern bills of review. They may be filed for errors of law, for new matter or proof material in the case, of which the party, at the hearing, had no knowledge.

3. The mode of filing a bill of review is, by petition setting forth the grounds, and asking leave to file the bill. As the practice is new in this court, the bill being filed in the present case, considered as a petition for leave, &c.

4. In England, before the enrolment of a decree, a bill of review will not lie.

9. Lapse of time will bar a review. Especially where the death of persons interested in the transactions, leaves no probability of explanation.

10. The granting of a bill of review is not a matter of right.

In equity.

Scott & Massie, for complainants.

Leonard & Stansbury, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This case was argued at the last term, and continued under advisement. It is a bill of review to set aside a decree entered against the complainants, at September term, 1815, on the ground of new matter and proof discovered since the entry of the decree.

The ordinances of Lord Bacon still govern bills of review. They may be filed for error in law appearing in the decree, or for new matter or proof material in the case, of which the party had no knowledge at the hearing. There is some contrariety in the decisions, whether the newly discovered matter must not be such as would have been pertinent to the issue at the hearing. But the better opinion seems to be, that this is not necessary. If the matter be of a nature to have changed the decree, though foreign to the issue, it affords ground for a review. Story, Eq. Pl. § 416; Partridge v. Usborne, 5 Russ. 195; 3 Atk. 33; 2 Freem. 31.

There is also some want of concurrence in the authorities whether the new proof must not relate to facts which, at the hearing, were not attempted to be proved. And whether merely cumulative evidence of facts controverted at the hearing is admissible. If the new proof be of such a character as to have caused a different decree, it is not perceived why it should not be ground for a bill of review, whether it relate to new facts, or facts contested at the hearing. But whether the ground be newly discovered matter or proof, it must clearly appear that the party, at the hearing, had no knowledge of it, and could have had none by using reasonable diligence. Young v. Keighly, 16 Ves. 348; Ord v. Noel, 6 Madd. 127; Bingham v. Dawson, 1 Jac. 243.

A bill of review for newly discovered matter or proof, must be filed by leave of the court; for errors in law, it may be filed without leave. This is the English practice, and we have adopted it. The mode of application for leave to file such bill, is, by petition setting out substantially the original proceeding, and the new matter or proof on which a reversal of the decree is prayed. No such petition has been filed in the present case. Indeed, from the frame of the bill first filed, it was difficult to say whether it was an original bill for relief, a bill in the nature of a bill of review, or a bill of review. It partook more of the nature of an original bill than of any other. But amendments have been made, so as to give the bill now before us, the form of a bill of review. And the first question is, whether this bill, on a motion for leave to file it, shall be considered as a regular petition for such leave. Forms may sometimes appear tedious, if not unnecessary; but in judicial proceedings, they should never be lightly regarded. They are the result of experience and practical knowledge; and are often the best evidences of the law. They contain in themselves certainty, and when sustained by proof, lead to certain results. So far as regards the present proceeding, the formality of a petition is supposed to have been dispensed with. At a previous term, with a view to bring this case to a hearing, and meet the wishes of the counsel, an order was entered that the cause should stand for argument as on an application for leave to file the bill, and also on the merits. This departure from form, induced by the peculiar circumstances of the case, is not to be drawn into precedent.

Before the enrolment of a decree, in England, a bill of review to set it aside does not lie, but a supplemental bill, or a bill in the nature of a bill of review. All decrees in that country, until their enrolment, are considered interlocutory; and this is the reason of the above rule. Coop. Eq. Pl. 88, 89; Mitf. Eq. Pl. (by Jeremy) 90. But in this country, generally, decrees are matters of record; and in the courts of the United States, they are uniformly so considered. Dexter v. Arnold [Case No. 3,856]. As the decree was entered in 1815, and this bill was not filed until 1835, the statute of limitations is relied on to bar the right of complainants. As a bill of review for errors apparent in the decree, is in the nature of a writ of error, the same limitation applies to it. Story, Eq. Pl. § 410; Smith v. Clay, Amb. 645; 3 Brown, Ch. 639. But it would seem the statute should not operate against a bill of review for newly discovered matter, only from the time of such discovery. Five years, by the statute, bars a writ of error; but five years from the discovery, in this bill, did not elapse before it was filed.

A reversal of this decree is asked, on two grounds. 1. A mistake in the calculation of interest. 2. Payments made by the conveyance of land, and otherwise, and not credited.

From the original bill, it appears that Nathaniel Massie, the ancestor of the complainants, acted, for many years, as the agent of Graham, of Virginia, in the sale of Ohio lands. That on the 7th of August, 1805, a settlement between the parties took place, in which Massie was found indebted to Graham in the sum of $12,674 96; for the payment of which, the 10th of September following, a bond was executed. Massie continued to act as agent until the 23rd of February, 1807, when his agency was revoked in a power of attorney given by Graham to Robert Means. Another settlement was had between Massie and Graham, by his attorney, Means, the 30th June, 1807, in which the debt of Massie was increased to $16,512 96. To secure this certain lands were mortgaged. A bond was also executed for $3,834 67, the 1st of August, 1807, payable 1st July, 1809. In November, 1813, Massie died, and in 1814 the bill was filed against his administrators and heirs, to foreclose the above mortgage. The court decreed a payment of the sum of $16,512 96, with interest on $12,674 96 from the 10th of September, 1805, the time the first bond became due; on the sum of $3,834 67, from the 1st July, 1807, the amount of the second bond, and the mortgaged premises were ordered to be sold, &c. It is insisted, that the bond for the sum of $3,834 67 included up to its date the interest on the first bond; and that the decree should only have required the payment of interest on the gross sum from the date of the last bond. This would make a difference between the sum decreed and the sum due of $1,373 12.

That the above mistake occurred, is not seriously controverted by the defendant's counsel. But they contend: (1) That this mistake is no ground for a bill of review; (2) that it was the result of negligence; (3) that there is a larger sum still due and unpaid under the decree, and they are willing to enter a credit for the amount claimed.

It is said, in Seton on Decrees, 399, that in case of miscasting and miscounting, where the matter appears from the decree itself to be mistaken, it may be corrected by an order. The court will at any time correct a mere clerical error in a judgment, where the error is apparent; and so in a decree where the error appears from the decree itself, it may be corrected in a summary mode by the court. But is such the error complained of?

In the first place, the error does not appear from the decree itself. It can only be made to appear by evidence showing the consideration of the second bond. Had that bond been given, as might well be presumed, for moneys received, or other ground of indebtment discovered with the first bond, the decree was correct. And its incorrectness can only be shown by proof that the second bond included the interest up to its date, on the first bond. The error, therefore, cannot be considered as merely formal, nor one which the court, on motion, may order to be corrected.

Are the complainants chargeable with negligence, in not discovering this evidence, and using it at the hearing? It is not enough that the evidence was not within the knowledge of the party at the hearing, but it must appear that it could not have been known, by using reasonable diligence.

In the cases of Bingham v. Dawson, 1 Jac. 244, and Harvey v. Murrell, Harp. Eq. 257, it was held that the absence of an inventory which might have been procured at the proper office by a search, could not be a ground for a bill of review. Young v. Keighly, 16 Ves. 348; Dexter v. Arnold [Case No. 3,856]; Livingston v. Hubbs, 3 Johns. Ch. 124. If there be any laches or negligence, the party is not entitled to relief. And the question here arises, whether there was negligence, in this case, chargeable to the complainants. The present complainants being infants at the hearing in 1815, they were represented by a guardian ad litem, appointed by the court. Still, if this guardian were guilty of gross negligence, it might conclude the rights of the complainants. But, in this respect, there is no proof of such negligence. It is hardly to be expected that the guardian should have searched for the memoranda of the second settlement. There was nothing on the face of the second bond to show that it included the interest on the first bond; and such a presumption could not arise. It was ascertained from the notes of the settlement; and these, under the circumstances, we do not think the guardian was required to search for. Of this error in the calculation of interest the complainants may, therefore, take advantage by a bill of review; unless the remittitur proposed by the counsel for the defendants shall change their right in this respect.

By the calculation of the complainant's counsel, there remains unpaid on the decree only the sum of $1,042 73, exclusive of costs, a sum less, by $333, than the amount erroneously charged for interest. This calculation adds the interest up to the time of the sale of the mortgaged premises. But the defendant's counsel produce a very different result, by adding the interest up to the time the money was paid. And this is in conformity with the decree. It avoids compound interest, by ordering the payment of the two bonds, with interest from their dates until paid. This mode of calculation leaves a balance due on the decree including costs, after deducting the interest erroneously computed. A remittitur of this interest will correct the error complained of; and of course, in that particular, remove all ground for a bill of review.

An objection is made to the filing of this bill, on the ground that the decree, sought to be reversed, has not been performed. This is generally a good objection. But there are cases where a review of a decree is allowed, though it has not been performed. By one of the ordinances of Lord Bacon, the decree must be performed before a bill of review can be brought. If the decree be for land, the possession of it must be surrendered; if it be for money, the money must be paid. But if any act be decreed which extinguishes the party's right at common law, as making of an assurance or release, acknowledging satisfaction, or canceling of bonds, it may be dispensed with, on the special order of the court. So, where the party is unable to pay the money decreed. Story, Eq. Pl. § 406; Partridge v. Usborne, 5 Russ. 195, 244, 253; 2 Johns. Ch. 488; Mitf. Eq. Pl. (by Jeremy) 88; 1 How. Eq. Exch. side p. 329. The proposed remittitur being entered, this objection does not lie to the present bill, for the balance of the decree which remains unsatisfied is very small, and it may be a matter of doubt whether such balance will amount to more than the costs.

Before the other grounds for leave to file this bill are considered, it may be proper to inquire how far, on a petition for leave, matters of explanation or defence may be examined. In the case of Hodges v. Mullikin, 1 Bland, 506, the chancellor said, "on application for leave to file a bill of review, on the ground of newly-discovered matter, I consider more correct that the propriety of granting the leave should be at once fully investigated; that proofs should be admitted in relation to it; and that the question should be then finally determined." But this seems not to be the course of the court. If leave be given to file the bill, the defendant in his answer may contest the materiality of the evidence, and the fact of its having been newly discovered. On the petition a strong prima facie case should be made out, and, to prevent abuse in such proceeding, counter affidavits may be received, and other evidence against the facts stated in the petition. Dexter v. Arnold [supra]. But this being only a preliminary proceeding, the defendant ought not to be concluded from contesting the facts on the hearing of the bill of review.

The second ground for leave to file this bill is, a receipt by Robert Means, agent for Graham, dated 31st July, 1807. This paper acknowledges the receipt of two notes; one given by Jozabad Lodge for two hundred and forty-six dollars; the other by John Timberlake, for three hundred and twenty-seven dollars and eighty-nine cents, due the 1st of October ensuing, "which said notes, when collected, to be paid John Graham on account of said Massie;" also, "received said Massie's relinquishment unto his portion of bonds and debts now due in the hands of Nathaniel Pope, the whole amount thereof being eleven hundred and fifty-two dollars and seventy cents, the one-third thereof being said Massie's proporition; and also bonds and debts not due for land sold by said Pope for five hundred and nine dollars and sixty-five cents; the one-third thereof being said Massie's proportion; that when all or part thereof is received, to be likewise applied to said Massie's credit with said Graham." Pope, in the sale of lands, was the agent of Graham, and also of Massie. No part of these sums were credited in the decree, and it is insisted that all of them should have been so credited. Nearly thirty-four years have elapsed since this receipt was given. Massie, Graham and Dunn, and perhaps Means, are dead. No explanation can now be given of the transaction, except what appears on the face of the receipt, and some memoranda in regard to subsequent dealings between Massie and Graham. To allow a review of a decree after so great a lapse of time, and under such circumstances, would require strong evidence. Evidence not clear, or which is susceptible of a different application, must be held insufficient.

This receipt, it must be observed, is dated the day before the last mortgage bond bears date. And as this bond was given on a settlement of accounts, subsequently to the other bond in the decree, which had been given on a prior settlement, the inference is at least plausible that the sums named in the receipt were to be credited on the bonds. And this inference, if weakened, is not overthrown by the words in the receipt that, "the notes (or money) when collected were to be paid to Graham on account of said Massie." To be paid, on account, in common parlance, may not always refer to an open account, but may mean to the credit of the party. The language of the receipt, therefore, does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that these payments were not to be made on the bonds. Other facts in the case, though not connected with this receipt, may shed some light upon it.

Now if it shall appear that the settlement on which the second bond was given was not final, but that open accounts of monied and other transactions remained between the parties, the inference would be that the sums named in the receipt when paid were to be applied on such accounts. On the 18th December, 1809, Nathaniel Massie, in writing, acknowledged to Walter Dunn, to have received of Joseph West two hundred and twenty-one dollars, the 6th December, 1806, for John Graham, "which he would settle and account for at any time." And again, on the 23d of the same month and year, he acknowledged that he had received one hundred and twenty-six dollars and fifty cents, "on account of Graham, which he promised to pay to Dunn at any time." And it seems, by a paper signed by Massie, dated 10th May, 1810, that he was authorised to sell the land mortgaged to Graham, at a fixed price. And this paper shows that the bonds were unpaid at its date. It also appears, though not perhaps in an unexceptionable form, that certain sums specified in the receipt of Means, which were paid to Graham, he credited to Massie. The facts in the case fully establish, that, subsequently to the mortgage, Massie received moneys of Graham on land sales; that at the settlement on which the mortgage was given, all the moneys thus received were not embraced, and consequently the settlement was not a final one. This also appears from the correspondence of the parties and certain contracts respecting lands. So that if Massie ceased to be the general agent of Graham after the power was given to Means, he still continued to act as agent to some extent, not only in regard to past, but future transactions.

Taking into view the facts and circumstances which bear upon the receipt of Means, instead of showing that the sums named in the receipt were intended to be applied, when received, to the payment of the mortgage bonds, they rather lead to a different conclusion. And this, connected with the great lapse of time, must be held conclusive against the sufficiency of this ground for leave to file the bill.

The third ground relied on is, that payments on the mortgage debt were made by the conveyance of certain lands to Graham, and the payment of certain moneys to Dunn as agent for Graham. On the 22d June, 1810, Walter Dunn writes to Massie from Richmond, Virginia, that he had received one hundred sixteen dollars and sixty-nine cents, which he had entered to his credit with his uncle Graham. And the 8th May, 1811, Dunn received thirty-three dollars and thirty-three cents, being at Richmond, which were placed to Massie's credit with Graham. And also the 15th August, 1811, Dunn received one hundred and twenty-one dollars from Massie. These sums it is insisted should have been credited on the mortgage bonds, and that not having been so credited, nor in the decree, it is ground for a review of the decree. There is no evidence that these payments were made on the mortgage. And can such payment be inferred, when the evidence shows an open account of money and land transactions, between the parties, at the time of the payments? To authorize the leave prayed, it is not enough that the evidence should bring the mind to balance probabilities. The fact of payment, and of its having been newly discovered, must be clear. Such is not the proof in regard to the above items.

The complainants rely on two deeds for certain tracts of land executed by Massie to Graham, and a deed executed by Abijah Oneal to Graham, for three hundred and forty acres, for the consideration expressed of two thousand nine hundred and thirty two dollars, as showing a payment of that amount on the mortgage. There is no evidence of the consideration for these conveyances, nor how it was paid, except what the deeds contain. And there is nothing on the face of the deeds which show how the consideration was paid, or was intended to be applied. The facts in the case authorise a presumption that the lands were not conveyed in payment on the mortgage. It seems that in February, 1810, Massie owed Graham on account of warrants located, five tracts of land, amounting to four thousand five hundred and thirty-five acres. And that by an agreement executed the 19th November, following, Massie binds himself to convey to said Graham nine hundred and fifteen acres in addition. Without adverting to other and similar transactions between these parties, it may be assumed as highly probable, that the three tracts conveyed to Graham, as above, were conveyed to him on other considerations than payment on the mortgage.

The granting of a bill of review is not a matter of right. This is the import of Lord Bacon's ordinance. In the exercise of its sound discretion the court may refuse leave to file a bill for new discovered evidence, although the facts, if admitted, would change the decree. Story, Eq. Pl. § 417; Bennet v. Lee, 2 Atk. 528; Wilson v. Wall, 6 Wall. 83; Young v. Keighly, 16 Ves. 348; Partridge v. Usborne, 5 Russ. 245; Dexter v. Arnold [supra]; Thomas v. Harvie's Heirs, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 146.

The grounds on which this application rests have been examined with some minuteness; and with the exception of the first one, which is obviated by a remittitur, there is no clear and satisfactory evidence of payment to any amount, having been made on the mortgage. Indeed, in every instance the presumption is rather against such payment. If, on such evidence, after the lapse of more than thirty years, the parties all being dead, a decree should be reviewed, great mischief would result. The application for leave to file the bill is overruled.

MASSOLETTI v. MILLER.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 313.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1822.

WITNESS—INTEREST—JOINT OWNER OF VESSEL—PASSAGE MONEY—INDEMNITY GIVEN.

One of two joint owners of a vessel is a competent witness to prove a joint claim against a passenger in the vessel, for the passage-money, if the other joint owner has given credit in account for his share of the passage-money, and a release of a claim to recover it back in case he should not get it from the passenger.

This was an action for money had and received by the defendant, for goods of the plaintiff sold by the defendant on commission. The defendant claimed to set off the amount of passage-money due by the plaintiff to the defendant, and one Howland, who were joint owners of the brig Benefactor, for the plaintiff's passage from Marseilles; and to prove this set-off, the defendant offered the other joint owner, Howland, as a witness, the defendant having credited him in account with his share of the passage-money, and given him a release from all claims which he might have to recover it back from Howland, in case the defendant should fail to get it from the plaintiff.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) decided that the witness was competent.

BANKRUPTCY—LAST EXAMINATION—EXEMPTION—14TH SECTION OF ACT.

The exemption under 14th section of bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 522)], not allowable until after bankrupt has passed his last examination.

This was an issue certified to the court upon an exception to the ruling of the register (Davis).

The bankrupt applied to the assignee for the exemption provided for in the 14th section of the bankrupt act. The assignee refused to allow the exemption on the ground that the bankrupt had not yet made a satisfactory surrender of his property.

The question having been submitted to the register, he reported the fact to the court, together with his opinion thereon, to which the bankrupt excepted.

Mr. Cutler for exceptant, argued that the bankrupt had been very fully and extensively examined, although he had not yet passed his last examination.

Mr. Huey, contra.

THE COURT (CADWALADER, District Judge), dismissed the exception, holding that the bankrupt was not entitled to the exemption allowed in the 14th section of the bankrupt act until after he had passed his last examination, where a doubt existed as to whether he had made full disclosures of all his property in his schedules.

COLLISION—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE—SPEED IN ENTERING A HARBOR.

1. Evidence of verbal statements made in time of excitement and peril should be received with great caution, and when opposed to the direct and concurring testimony of many witnesses, is entitled to but little weight.

2. A sailing vessel entering a crowded harbor at the rate of six miles an hour, in addition to a favorable current of four miles, condemned for too great speed.

Libel for collision by Frederick H. Blood, owner of the schooner Maid of the Mist.

The collision occurred at about 2 o'clock in the morning of the 10th day of September, 1871, in the St. Clair river, a short distance below Port Huron, and opposite the Port Huron Middle Ground, so called. The schooner was lying at anchor, in about mid-channel, and the bark was coming down the river, bound on a voyage from Chicago to Buffalo, laden with wheat. The starboard bow of the bark struck the schooner on the starboard side, carrying away her jibboom and head gear, and her foremast head, breaking her starboard stanchions, and driving her anchor into her, and inflicted such injuries that she sunk in about an hour and a half. The night was dark, although it was a good night to see lights. There was a large number of vessels at anchor in the river, variously estimated by the witnesses at from thirty to seventy or eighty. The channel was somewhat narrow, although there was ample room for vessels exercising ordinary care and skill to pass. The wind was blowing a stiff breeze down the river, and was consequently free to the bark. The current at that point was about four miles an hour. The bark had up her mainsail, mainstaysail, topsail, and three jibs, and was running at the rate of about six miles an hour through the water, and about ten miles by the land. Her mainsail was being taken in at the time of the collision.' Thus far the facts were undisputed.

H. B. Brown, for libellant. The master was clearly in fault for running at too great speed. The following facts are not disputed:

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry B. Brown, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

First. That the wind was blowing almost a gale from the northerly, and was a fair wind for the Masten as she came down the river. Second. That she was passing through the water at six miles an hour. Third. That, with the addition of the current, she was actually approaching the schooner at ten miles an hour. Fourth. That no sails had been furled from the time she entered the river, and only a reef taken in her topsails. Fifth. That there were from fifty to eighty sail in the river, that had taken refuge there from a storm in the lake. These vessels were lying upon both sides and in the center of the river. It was the duty of the bark to furl all her canvas, except what was absolutely necessary to preserve her steerage way, or to come to anchor before she reached the schooner. The Morning Light, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 550, 558; The Virgil, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 202.

W. A. Moore, for claimant.

Mr. Moore's brief discusses simply the question of fact.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The main and only disputed essential fact in the case is, whether the schooner had up her proper anchor light; and it is conceded that if she had, then the bark is in fault, and must respond in damages. Too great speed is also charged as a fault against the bark; but this can be of importance only in case it shall be found that the schooner had not up her proper light, and then only on a question of division of damages. The question as to the schooner's light will, therefore, be first considered.

The testimony on the part of the libellant shows that from the force of the wind and current the schooner dragged her anchor a considerable distance before she came to, and that she came to only a few minutes—fifteen or twenty—before the collision. John Jones, master of the schooner, testifies that immediately upon coming to anchor, he took in the colored lights, and hung a bright light in the fore-rigging on the port side. He then describes the lamp or lantern, and its height from the deck, &c., but as no question is made in these respects, it is unnecessary to repeat his testimony. Hannah Dell, the cook, testifies that she trimmed the bright light, and handed it to Capt. Jones, in the cabin, when he brought in the colored lights. James M. Jones, son of Capt. Jones, and who was on the lookout on the schooner, testifies that he saw his father hang up the light, and that it burned brightly. Oscar Hill testifies that he was on deck several minutes after the schoner came to anchor, and that he distinctly saw the light; that he went below before the collision, but on hearing the alarm, came on deck, and at the time of the collision was standing near the fore-rigging; that when the foremast head was carried away, the fore-rigging came down with a run and the lamp with it, that the lamp hit him on his back, and that it was then still burning. Henry Sageman testifies that he was also on deck when the schooner came to anchor, and saw the light hung in the rigging, and that it was burning good.

Now these five witnesses testify with a particularity of detail which precludes the possibility of their being mistaken. One of two things must be true, either that the schooner had a proper and sufficient anchor light, or that each of these five witnesses has sworn falsely, willfully and deliberately.

In answer to this array of testimony, respondent produces the following: James Kendrick, master of the bark, testified that he was standing forward near the lookout, when the latter reported to him that he saw a vessel ahead; that by the aid of his glass he distinctly saw a vessel, which proved to be the Maid of the Mist, a little over his starboard bow, and only about 100 feet off, and that he saw no light on her; that he immediately ordered his wheel hard a-starboard, and the collision occurred almost immediately after. He also testifies to a conversation with Capt. Jones, master of the schooner, in which he said to the latter, that it would not have happened, if he, Capt. Jones, had had a light out, and that Capt. Jones replied that he ordered the boys to put one out. Two others of the crew of the bark testify to having heard Capt. Jones make the same statement. George Johnson, the lookout on the bark, testified to seeing the schooner, and reporting her to Capt. Kendrick, and that he saw no light on her. The wheelsman on duty, and several others of the crew of the bark, on deck at the time, also testify that they saw no light on the schooner before the collision, but it does not appear that any of them saw the schooner, and I am satisfied they were not in a position to have seen her, or any light there may have been upon her at any time before the collision occurred. All the witnesses on the part of the bark testify that the first light they saw on the schooner was a light coming out of her cabin soon after the collision.

Besides the above testimony on the part of respondents, a statement made by Hannah Dell, the cook on the schooner, in her testimony, to the effect that when the lamp was brought into the cabin after the collision, it was burning dimly and the glass was smoky, is alluded to as evidence that even if a light was out, as testified by the witnesses on the part of the schooner, it was not a sufficient one.

I shall take up and consider the points involved in respondents' testimony in the inverse order in which they are above stated. The condition of the light when it was brought into the cabin after the collision, as stated by the cook, is easily attributable to what happened to it by the collision, and therefore does not necessarily conflict with the statements of the witnesses on the part of the schooner, that it was burning brightly before the collision. The only thing that appears strange to me is that it was not extinguished entirely. The fact that those on board the bark did not see the light immediately after the collision is, in my opinion, to be attributed to the fact that it came down with the rigging, and was thereby hidden from their view.

The statement sworn to by Capt. Kendrick and two other witnesses on the part of respondents, as having been made by Capt. Jones, that he told the boys to hang out a light on the schooner, is attempted to be explained by Capt. Jones. He says that after the collision he did tell the boys to hang out the light again, and that although he has no recollection of making the statement testified to by Capt. Kendrick and the others, yet if he did make it, it must have been made in reference to that circumstance. Besides this, testimony of verbal statements made and heard in time of excitement and peril must be received with much caution, and when opposed to the direct and positive concurring testimony of many witnesses can have but little weight. If the fact of light or no light rested on Capt. Jones' uncorroborated testimony, then the statement might have considerable force; and perhaps in the light of the testimony of Capt. Kendrick and the lookout on the bark, that they saw no light on the schooner, it would outweigh Capt. Jones' testimony entirely. But Capt. Jones is fully corroborated by the testimony of three eye-witnesses as to the fact of the light being there in its proper position in the rigging, and these witnesses stand perfectly fair before the court. Capt. Jones' testimony may be thrown entirely out of the case, and still there is ample proof that the light was there, by whomsoever it may have been placed there.

There is more force, however, in the statements of Capt. Kendrick, of the bark, and his lookout, that they saw no light on the schooner. It was their business to look for lights, and it is a fair and even strong presumption that there was no light where they saw none. After all, it is a presumption merely, and cannot have the effect in this case, of outweighing satisfactory positive proof of the existence of the fact itself, viz., that there was a light. Capt. Kendrick and the lookout, in making their statement that they saw no light, do not stand in the same position of Capt. Jones and his men in their statement that there was a light. The latter could not be mistaken, while the former might be. The alternative presented in the case of the witnesses for libellant is not presented here. There may have been a light on the schooner, as testified by libellant's witnesses, and still it may be true that Capt. Kendrick and his lookout did not see it, as testified by them. Why they did not see it is not necessary for us to inquire. It is sufficient for our present inquiry that there is a strong preponderance of proof that the schooner had a proper and sufficient anchor light.

That it was the legal duty of the bark to avoid the schooner under the circumstances found to exist is, of course, conceded. Not having done so the bark was in fault, and must respond for the schooner's damages.

Having arrived at the above conclusion, it is unnecessary to consider the question of speed. But I deem it a duty, as a caution to navigators, to express the disapprobation of the court of the almost reckless speed of the bark under the circumstances. Capt. Kendrick testified that the bark was quick to mind her helm, and it is preposterous to say that a speed of six miles an hour through the water was necessary for steerage way, when beyond all question one-half that speed, or even less, was amply sufficient for the purpose. Here was a large vessel, heavily laden, coming down the current and before a strong wind, in a comparatively narrow channel in which were numerous vessels at anchor, carrying canvas sufficient for the open water in such a breeze, and rushing along at a speed entirely unnecessary for her management, and which, under the circumstances, seemed entirely regardless of danger to herself or to other vessels. It was clearly her duty, on coming into the river, to have taken in her canvas until her speed had been slackened down to just what was absolutely necessary for steerage-way. The excessive speed of the bark was a gross fault, and one for which she must have been held responsible in any event. Decree for libellant.

COLLISION — VESSEL AT ANCHOR — PROPER ANCHORAGE — ANCHOR WATCH.

In the absence of a law or custom prohibiting vessels from lying in a channel, anchorage there is not necessarily improper because the channel is narrow at that point, and vessels are constantly passing and repassing, if room be left for vessels and tows to pass in safety. In such an anchorage, however, a vigilant anchor watch is imperatively necessary.

Libel for a collision between the bark Fame and the schooner Wm. Raynor.

On the 8th day of October, 1868, about seven o'clock in the evening, the bark Fame lay at anchor in the St. Clair river, a little below Port Huron, and just opposite the foot of the middle ground (so called), which is on the American side of the river. As she so lay at anchor, the tug I. U. Masters came down the river with a tow of four vessels, the fourth vessel in the tow being the schooner Wm. Raynor. The tug undertook to pass the bark on the American or port side of her, and between her and the said middle ground, and in doing so the schooner sagged off to port and came in collision with the bark's jibboom, carrying it away, and doing other damage. The current at this point is about four and a half miles an hour, and the wind was blowing quite strong, nearly down the river, but varying a little across the current from the American side. The bark was lying with her bows up stream, but the wind had swung her stern a little—not to exceed one point, and probably less—toward the Canadian side of the river. The course of the tug, in attempting to pass the bark as she did, was a little across the wind and the current, and the immediate cause of the collision was the tail of the tow being carried down against the bark by the wind and current.

W. A. Moore, for libellant, claimed: (1) That the bark lay bow up stream, with sails furled, light properly placed and burning, steady at anchor, and occupying not over 35 feet in width. (2) That the channel was from one-quarter to one-third of a mile wide, and not difficult of navigation. (3) That it is usual for vessels driven in by stress of weather to anchor in a channel of that width. (4) That two-thirds of the navigable channel lay on the starboard side of the bark. (5) That if she lay nearer the middle of the river, the tug had sufficient room to pass on the American side. (6) That, so far as the schooner was concerned, the accident was unavoidable, and the tug is responsible.

H. B. Brown, for the tug. A vessel colliding with another at anchor in a proper place is prima facie in fault, but if she be anchored in an improper place she cannot recover, unless the other vessel has grossly neglected her duty in passing her. Strout v. Foster, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 89; Knowlton v. Sanford, 32 Me. 148; The Marcia Tribon [Case No. 9,062]; O'Neil v. Sears [Id. 10,530]. The bark ought not to have anchored in the narrowest part of the channel, without some good reason, when there was plenty of room above and below. The bark was also in fault for not having a proper anchor watch. Buzzard v. The Petrel [Id. 2,261].

LONGYEAR, District Judge. There was no satisfactory proof before me as to the exact width of the river at the point in question, but it is near enough for the purposes of this case to assume, and such, I think, the proofs tend to show, that it is from one-fourth to one-half a mile wide. The proofs are contradictory as to the precise point where the bark lay in the river, varying from one-third of the distance from the American channel bank (the middle ground before spoken of) to the middle of the channel; but there is no dispute but that there was room on both sides of her for vessels and tows to pass, and that is sufficient for the purposes of this case.

The proofs show that the schooner was in no manner in fault for the collision, and the case against her was in effect abandoned at the hearing. The libel must therefore be dismissed as to her, and the case will be considered as against the tug alone.

Where a vessel at anchor is collided with by a vessel in motion, the latter is always prima facie in fault, provided the former is anchored in a proper place, and herself observes the law. In order to exonerate the tug from this prima facie liability, it is contended that the bark was anchored in an improper place —that the channel is narrow, and vessels and tows are constantly passing and repassing, and owing to a curve or bend in the river just above, and the strength of the current, the whole channel is needed for safe navigation, unobstructed by vessels lying at anchor. Many witnesses were sworn on both sides as to the safety and propriety of a vessel lying at anchor at the point in question, but I think their testimony may all be summed up in this: that there are safer places for vessels to lie at anchor, and where they would be a less obstruction to navigation, both above and below the place in question, and which the bark might have reached if she had chosen to do so. No law or custom was shown, however, prohibiting vessels from anchoring there, but, on the contrary, it appeared that others had anchored there, and the legal right to do so was conceded. It also appeared from the proofs that there was room on both sides the bark for vessels and tows to pass in safety, by the exercise of due care and diligence. I must hold therefore that the bark had a legal right to lie at anchor where she did. While so holding, however, I must also hold that, having selected a comparatively insecure and inconvenient place to lie at anchor, no matter whether from necessity or from choice, she was bound to exercise the greatest degree of care and diligence in keeping watch and ward for her own safety and the safety of passing vessels. A viligant anchor watch was essential under the circumstances, and the want of it would constitute a fault which could not be overlooked. Had the bark such a watch?

The only man on deck was Druillard, the pilot, and he was not there in the capacity of or on duty as a watch at all. In fact, the purpose for which he was there, as stated by himself, shows that there was not only no watch as such, but that there was no pretense of any. He says, in substance, that he was there for the purpose of keeping himself warm by walking. It is true, when he accidentally, or otherwise, noticed the close proximity of the tow, he called the mate to put the wheel to port, but even this was not done in time to effect anything. If there had been a vigilant watch on board the bark, such as the circumstances in which she had voluntarily placed herself imperatively demanded, the danger would have been seen and the helm put to port, and thus by the force of the current the stern of the vessel would have been worked over against the wind, and the jibboom turned off to starboard in time, in all probability, to have cleared the schooner entirely, or, at all events, so nearly as to have much lessened the damages. If, in addition to this, the cable had been allowed to run out and the vessel to drop down the stream with the current, the collision would have been avoided with almost absolute certainty. Because the bark had not such a watch, and did not take any effective measures to avoid the collision, she must be held in fault. See 1 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 576, 577, and cases cited in note upon p. 577.

But this does not exonerate the tug from inquiry into her conduct, or from responsibility, if she was also in fault. It is contended, on behalf of libellant, that the tug ought to have taken the Canadian side of the river, where there was more room, and where the wind and current would have carried the tow away from the bark, instead of bringing it directly down upon her. The excuse made on behalf of the tug for not taking the Canadian side is that there were other vessels within that space at the time, making it dangerous to take that side. I do not think that it appears by the proofs that the position of those other vessels was such as to make it any more dangerous to pass on that side than on the other. But, as we have seen, there was room to pass on either side, and the tug, no doubt, had the right to pass on either side which in the best judgment of her master was the most feasible under the circumstances as they appeared to him at the time. Having made his choice, however, and that choice involving, as it did, the necessity of crossing the wind and current, the inevitable effect of which was as apparent then as it was afterwards, it became the duty of the master of the tug to make due allowance for that effect. This, of course, he did not do, or the collision would not have occurred. See The New Philadelphia, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 76.

The tug is therefore held also in fault.

Both vessels being in fault, it follows that each must bear a moiety of the damages. A decree must be entered in favor of libellant against the tug for a moiety of his damages and costs, referring it to a commissioner to ascertain and report the damages, and dismissing the libel as against the schooner.

KNOWLES, District Judge. On the 19th of June, 1868, a warrant in bankruptcy was issued against one John Masterson, on the application of Sheldon, Kelly & Hale, creditors, and on the same day an auxiliary injunction was granted against said Masterson, and one John P. Cooney, and Doyle & Joslon, auctioneers, forbidding a sale by them, or either of them, of certain personal property, then advertised to be sold at auction on the 20th of June, in virtue of a mortgage conveyance from said Masterson to said Cooney, bearing date March 7th, 1868.

Service of the injunction was made on the 20th, and the proposed sale postponed or abandoned, the property remaining, so far as appears, in the custody and charge of the mortgagee Cooney, the alleged bankrupt, Masterson, having absconded. On the return day of the warrant, the 27th of June, Masterson was adjudged a bankrupt on default; and on the same day it was agreed in writing between the petitioning creditors and the same Cooney, that the marshal or messenger should make sale of the said property at auction, at as early a day as he should see fit, the net "proceeds of sale to be brought into court, and held in lieu of the property." Under an order of court, pursuant to this agreement, the property was sold on the 2d of July by the marshal, who, on the 18th of July made return of his proceedings, paying into the registry as said net proceeds, three hundred and sixty-eight dollars and four cents. On the 28th of July said Cooney filed a petition to the court, representing that the mortgage aforesaid was a valid and unimpeachable lien upon the property described, and praying an order from the court that the aforesaid should be paid over to him out of the registry. So far as is shown by the record, this petition was not brought to the notice of the court until the 3d of February, 1869, when a hearing was indefinitely deferred at the instance of the petitioning creditors on account of the absence of a witness. Nor does it appear that action was afterwards invoked until the 1st of February, 1871, when a motion of the creditors, filed November 2d, 1870, that the said petition of Cooney be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, was called up for determination.

In support of the motion, the learned counsel cited as a binding and conclusive precedent, the opinion of this court, delivered in October last in Boutour v. Peckham [Case No. 1,707], dismissing a petition for want of jurisdiction, the court holding that by a suit in equity or by an action at law, and not by a petition merely, should the petitioner have sought redress or relief; electing to follow, as to this point, the rulings of Justice Nelson, Chief Justice Chase, and (as understood) of Justice Clifford, rather than that of Justice Swayne. And as this court has as yet seen no reason to retract or qualify its opinion in the case cited, it is manifest that the judgment in this case should be the same as was the judgment in that, if, as contended, the two cases are in contemplation of law the counterparts each of the other, of the same species as well as of the same genus.

Herein, however, I am constrained to differ with the learned counsel of the creditors. In the case of Boutour v. Peckham [supra], the property in question was in the hands of the assignee, Boutour being simply an outside creditor, claiming to have a valid lien upon the property, by virtue of unrecorded mortgages, for a demand against the bankrupt firm, the which demand he had not presented for registration. This petition was against both the assignee and a secured mortgagee, claiming the property as his under the mortgage, and praying a judgment of the court, establishing his claim, and an order to the assignee to surrender to him the property. This controversy between him and the respondents the court held was one of that species which the bankrupt act contemplates shall be settled by a suit in equity or action at law in either the district or the circuit court, with a right in either party to test the rulings of the district judge or of the circuit judge by an appeal or writ of error. Bankrupt Law, §§ 2, 8, 9. It was not, the court held, one of that other species which the law contemplated should be submitted by a simple petition to the court, to be passed upon summarily as it were by a district judge at chambers or in open court, subject only to the revisory action of a circuit judge "in term time or vacation," under the provisions of the 2d section of the bankrupt law, in relation to which Justice Clifford and Judge Shipley, in Littlefield v. Canal Co. [Case No. 8,400], thus spake:

"Appeals in equity suits and in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, vacate the respective decrees in the subordinate courts, and remove the whole record into the court of paramount jurisdiction; but nothing of the kind is done in a proceeding by petition under the 2d section of the bankrupt act. * * * Nor is the allegation by a petitioner that he is aggrieved, sufficient, unless it be also alleged in what the error consists, whether of law or fact, and the nature of the error should be distinctly stated for the information of the appellate court, and as a matter of notice to the opposite party. Appellate courts, even in appeals, proceed upon the ground that the decree in the subordinate court was correct, and the burden to show error is upon the appellant. The Baltimore, 8 Wall [75 U. S.] 378. Matters of fact as well as matters of law, may doubtless be revised in the circuit court; but it was not the intention of congress, in this form of proceeding, to give a party a second trial merely as such, but to secure to him an appellate tribunal for the re-examination and revision of the rulings, orders, and decrees of the district courts, and for the reversal of the same in case they are found to be erroneous."

In the case at bar, as is already shown, the property in question was, by agreement of the creditors and the mortgagee, sold by the messenger before the 21st of July, when an assignee was appointed and the proceeds deposited in the registry of the court, and in the registry has the money remained, unclaimed by any one save by the petitioner. Not only has the money never yet passed into the hands of the assignee as assets of the bankrupt, but no claim to it has he ever asserted in any manner cognizable by the court, its legal and only custodian. The agreement, it will be noted, was not that the proceeds be paid over to the assignee as monies to which his title was conceded to be prima facie paramount, but were to be brought into court—i. e. paid into the registry, whence it could not be removed, as the parties must be presumed to have known, save upon an order of the court authorizing a check therefor, to be signed by the clerk as clerk, and countersigned by the district judge, as judge. The results of the proceedings were, in my judgment, simply to lodge the funds in the court, without prejudice to the rights of creditors or of the mortgagee, an essential part of the agreement between the parties being, in legal intendment, that the claim of the assignee on the one side and of the mortgagee on the other, should be adjudicated by the court according to the law and usage of the court in cases of deposits in its registry. The money, it appears, was deposited to the credit of John Masterson, and on the appointment of an assignee, that officer was of course vested with all the rights of Masterson and of his creditors in the fund, as it then was in the registry, subject to the claim of the mortgagee, Cooney. Either party could at any time, by petition or motion, prefer his claim to it, whereupon it would become the court's duty, after causing proper notice to be given to whomsoever it might deem proper, to pass upon such petition or motion. The dismissal of it would not necessarily establish the title of any contesting party. The court might well adjudge that the petitioner, A, had failed to establish his right, and dismiss his petition, retaining custody of the fund until some other petitioner, maybe a second, maybe a fiftieth, should establish his right satisfactorily to the court.

Accordingly, I must hold that, by this agreement, sanctioned as it was by an order of the court, the parties submitted their matters in dispute to the decision of the court, upon petition to be filed, waiving their respective rights to institute proceedings in equity or at law, either in the district or the circuit court. Such, obviously, was the intent of the parties. At the date of that agreement, the rulings of Justice Swayne (Bill v. Beckwith [Case No. 1,406]), were recognized as authoritative by the bar in this district, and redress or relief in nearly all cases arising under the bankrupt law was sought by petition, that being, evidently, as held by that learned judge, "a cheaper, speedier, and more simple mode" than proceedings at law or in equity, according to established usages and existing laws. And in harmony with this hypothesis has been the conduct of the parties. Within a week after the deposit of the money, and the appointment of an assignee, the mortgagee, Cooney, files his petition to the court, and on the 3d of February, 1869, the creditors, without objection to the form of proceedings, ask delay of trial, that they may procure the evidence of one of the petitioning creditors; and thereafter, until the 2d of November, 1870, nearly two years, they permit the case to stand upon a docket, which was actually or constructively called for trial on the first Wednesday of every month, without motion to the court, or suggestion of error of process, or of misapprehension of rights, to the petitioner. These are not insignificant facts, regarded as bearing upon the intent of the parties to the agreement of June 27, 1868; nor is it an insignificant fact, that at this late day it may be questioned if either the assignee or petitioner can bring any action or suit. The bankrupt law (second section) expressly bars all actions or suits by or against any assignee, unless brought within two years from the time the cause of action accrued.

The motion or petition of the creditors, Sheldon, Kelly & Hale, that the petition of Cooney, mortgagee, be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, is overruled or denied, and the petition last named must stand for hearing upon its merits. When the assignee of the bankrupt, Masterson, shall see fit to file his petition that the money in the registry be paid over to him, it will become the court's duty to pass upon his claims, as against Cooney, as well as all other contestants. A petition to a court to order a distribution of a fund lodged in its registry, I do not, as at present advised, regard as an action or suit within the meaning of the clause above quoted from the 2d section of the bankrupt law.

MASTERSON v. KIDWELL.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 669.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1826.

ARBITRATION AND AWARD—NOTICE TO PARTIES—REVOCATION—MOTION TO SET ASIDE—WHEN MADE.

1. Upon the submission of a cause to arbitration by consent of parties and rule of court, the arbitrators are not bound to give notice to the parties of the time and place of making their award.

2. After submitting a cause to arbitration by rule of court, neither party can revoke his submission without consent of the other.

3. Notice of the filing of the award may be given to the attorney-at-law of the opposite party.

4. Want of notice is no ground of exception, but of a motion to set aside the award.

5. Quaere, whether a motion to set aside an award must not be made within four days after notice of the filing of the award.

This cause was, by consent of the parties and a rule of court submitted to arbitrators, who made their award, which was filed, and notice of the filing was given to Mr. Swann, the attorney-at-law of the defendant, who filed exceptions to the award: (1) Because the arbitrators made the award at a time and place of which the defendant had no notice. (2) That before the award the defendant had revoked his submission. (3) That notice of the award was served only upon the defendant's attorney-at-law.

1st. The parties must have notice of every meeting of the arbitrators. Rigden v. Martin, 6 Har. & J. 406; Kyd, Awards, 29, 31, 34, 96. No time was given to the defendant to produce his evidence. 2d. Before the award was made, viz. on the 15th of December, the defendant revoked his submission and gave notice thereof to the arbitrators; notwithstanding which, without any notice to the defendant of their intention to proceed, they made an award on the 20th. Kyd, Awards, 112, 113. The submission is only an authority, not a contract. If the submission be by bond, it may be revoked, and the arbitrators cannot proceed; but the party revoking will be liable upon his bond. If the submission be by rule of court, and he revokes, he may be attached, but the arbitrators have no authority to make an award. Kyd, Awards, 29, 33.

Mr. Marbury, contra. The want of notice is not the ground of exception, although it may be of a motion to set aside the award; but then it must be supported by affidavit. Exceptions must be for matter apparent on the face of the award. But a motion to set aside the award is now too late. It should be made within four days after notice of the award. Rigden v. Martin, 6 Har. & J. 403; Kyd, Awards, 29, 34; Oxley v. Oldden, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 430. Neither party has a right to revoke a submission made under a rule of court. It would be a contempt of the court. Under the act of assembly of Maryland (1785) c. 80, § 11, notice to the attorney-at-law is sufficient. The parties are not entitled to notice of the time and place of making up their award.

Mr. Swann, produced the defendant's affidavit stating the facts, which he considered as evidence of malpractice of the arbitrators, and moved to amend his exceptions by stating their improper conduct.

But THE COURT overruled all the exceptions and ordered the judgment to be entered upon the award. CRANCH, Circuit Judge, wishing for time to look at, and consider the papers, gave no opinion.

[The defendant filed a bill in equity to stay the judgment at law. A preliminary injunction was granted. Upon final hearing the court decided that the bill lacked equity, in that the complainant had a complete and adequate remedy at law. Injunction dissolved. Case No. 7,758.]

MASURY v. ANDERSON et al.

[11 Blatchf. 162; 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 457; 4 O. G. 55; Merw. Pat. Inv. 114.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 8, 1873.

PATENTS—PAINT CAN—INFRINGEMENT—EQUIVALENT—CLAIM OF PATENT.

1. The letters patent granted to John W. Masury, July 12th, 1859, for "an improvement in paint cans, &c.," the claim of which is, "the construction of a metallic can for hermetically sealing paints and other substances, having attached thereto a rim or ring of thin brass or other soft metal, in such a manner that the top or cover may be removed by severing the said rim or ring of brass or other soft metal with a penknife or other sharp instrument, in the manner and for the purposes herein described and represented, or its equivalent," are valid.

2. The invention covered by such claim consists in placing in one end of a can, and adjacent to the edge of the wall or side of the can, a rim or ring of thin brass or other soft metal, thus forming part of the end of the can, and designed to be cut through, to open the can, and is not anticipated by a can of tin with a band of sheet lead in the outer wall or side of the can, and encircling the circumference of the can, with each of its two edges soldered to the adjacent tin.

3. It is an infringement of such claim to make a can with one end wholly of thin tin, which can be easily cut at the outer edge of such end.

4. The rights of a patentee depend on the claim of his patent, properly construed, and not on what he may erroneously suppose it covers.

[Cited in McClain v. Ortmayer, 141 U. S. 419, 12 Sup. Ct. 78.]

[This was a bill in equity by John W. Masury against William Anderson and Frederick O. Pierce, brought upon letters patent No. 24,748, granted to complainant.]

W. Howard Wait, for plaintiff.
George Harding, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is founded upon the same letters patent upon which the suit of the same plaintiff against Daniel F. Tiemann and others was brought [Case No. 9,271]. The opinion in that case describes the invention, and sets out the specification and claim. It also states at length the value and use of the patented can.

In this suit, the infringement charged in the bill is the same as in that suit, namely, "that the defendants have made, and caused to be made, for their use, cans embodying the patented invention, and have vended paints and colors put up in cans so constructed." The defendants are shown to have sold cans containing paints made liquid with oil, put up by them in such cans.

The answer in this suit sets up the defence of want of novelty in the invention, as did the answer in the former suit, but adduces, to support such defence, matters not set up in that suit. It avers, among other things, that the plaintiff's invention is described in letters patent No. 11,892, granted in England to Jules Jean Baptiste Martin de Lignac, and dated October 7th, 1847. In the specification of the Lignac patent, which was enrolled April 3d, 1848, the following language is all that is material to this case: "The concentrated milk is then, as quickly as possible, to be filled into vessels made of plate tin, or other suitable material, which will allow of being closed hermetically, and also allow of being treated by heat, as hereinafter explained. The vessels I prefer for this purpose are cylinders, such as are shown at figure 5, and, in order that the upper end or cover may be readily removed by the simple act of cutting, I prefer that lead should be used all around, i. e., as is shown by the drawing. These vessels, being filled quite full with concentrated milk, are allowed to stand for twenty-four hours, when the vessels are soldered all around so as to hermetically close them." An exhibit introduced in evidence by the defendants, as being constructed in accordance with such description, is a cylindrical can made of ordinary sheet tin, some five inches in depth and four inches in diameter, one end of which is composed of a circular shaped piece of tin, formed with a flange something less than a quarter of an inch deep, turned down at the outer circumference of such end. The lower end of such flange is connected with the outer wall or side of the can by a band of sheet lead, a little over one-half of an inch wide, encircling the circumference of the can, the lower part of the band being soldered to the top of the wall or side of the can, and the upper part of the band being soldered to the lower edge of such flange, so as to leave a width of lead of about one-quarter of an inch, between the upper edge of the wall or side of the can and the lower edge of the flange, and to allow the lead to be penetrated and cut in such width around the circumference of the can, and thus the top or end of the can to be separated from the body of the can. This arrangement differs from the plaintiff's invention. The latter consists in placing in one end of the can, and adjacent to the edge of the side or wall of the can, a rim or ring of thin brass or other soft metal, such rim or ring thus forming part of the end of the can. It is shown, by the evidence, that lead is a much more difficult metal to solder than thin brass, owing to the fact that especial preparation is required in order to enable the solder to adhere to the lead, and that the lead is liable to melt when the soldering iron is brought in contact with it, in the process of soldering; and that, for these reasons, it would take a workman a much longer time to manufacture a given number of cans constructed according to the Lignac specification, with a lead band, than it would to make the same number of cans constructed in the same form, but with a brass band in the place of one of lead. It is also shown, that the use of thin brass instead of lead, in such form of can, admits of a neater and more perfect finish. Independently of this, the testimony shows that the plaintiff's can presents several advantages over the Lignac can: (1.) The plaintiff's can, in the size and number of pieces of which it is composed, and in the labor of preparing them and putting them into the form of, and securing them together as, a can, does not differ materially from the simplest form of can used; while, in the Lignac can, the band of lead constitutes a separate and additional piece, requiring additional labor in preparing it and inserting it in the can, and the seams cannot be soldered by machinery, as in the plaintiff's can. (2.) In the plaintiff's can, the force necessary to cut the metal in the end of the can, can be applied in an oblique or vertical direction, and is not required to be applied laterally, as in the Lignac can. The former mode of cutting affords a freer passage to the knife, for the reason that it causes the lips of the opening to spread in different directions; while, in cutting the lead band in the Lignac can, by lateral pressure, both lips of the opening are forced inwards, and they, in turn, bind upon and obstruct the passage of the knife-blade, so as to render the process of cutting more difficult. (3.) Cutting one end with the can standing on the other end, permits the can to be filled to its entire capacity; while, in the case of the Lignac can, if it be filled above the centre line of the inserted band, the contents will run out in the process of cutting through the band. If the Lignac can be an improvement on the ordinary hermetically sealed can, these advantages made the plaintiff's can a material improvement on the Lignac can, and the advantages thus shown to result from changing the position of the soft or thin metal from the side to the end are sufficient, in my opinion, to sustain the patent, as against the Lignac can.

The defendants prove that the plaintiff has made cans in the form of the Lignac can, but having, in place of the band of lead, a band of brass, and that he placed on such cans labels claiming them to be within his patent. It is urged, that, by reason of this, the plaintiff is estopped from denying that the Lignac can is the equivalent of his invention. But this view is not tenable. The rights of the plaintiff depend upon the claim in his patent, according to its proper construction, and not upon what he may erroneously suppose it covers. If at one time he insists on too much, and at another on too little, he does not thereby work any prejudice to the rights actually secured to him.

The evidence shows that a can constructed according to the Lignac patent does not accomplish the end sought by it, and is not a can which can be easily opened; and that, even when the plaintiff substituted in it a brass band for one of lead, his customers who used it found it more convenient to open the can by cutting out the hard top by the use of a hammer and a knife, than to do so by cutting through the brass band. Although the inventor of the Lignac can had the general idea of enabling a can to be opened by cutting more easily through a softer or a thinner metal, he did not embody his idea in a form which was practically of any substantial utility, and the means he adopted were substantially different from those adopted by the plaintiff.

The defendants also introduce in evidence, on the question of novelty, a can made wholly of tagger's iron, that is, sheet iron rolled so thin as to be easily cut by a pocket knife, and claim that similar cans had been used by the Pennsylvania Salt Manufacturing Company, for putting up caustic alkali, for some years prior to the date of the plaintiff's patent. These cans were filled by pouring in the alkali in a molten state, and it solidified on becoming cold. The only reason given for using tagger's iron by the witnesses who testify to the use of cans are, that, when tin was used, the heat the cans were subjected to caused the tin to melt, and that iron was less expensive than tin. It also appears, that, previously to July, 1857, while tagger's iron was used for the sides, sheet tin was used for the bottom and top, showing that the original use of tagger's iron was with no purpose to facilitate the opening of the cans. One witness testifies that the company put up the alkali in broken pieces, in cans made wholly of tagger's iron, but he does not state that they did so previously to the date of the plaintiff's patent, or that he knew of its being put up in that condition, in such cans, prior to such date.

The defendants, at the hearing, asked leave to put in further proof on the question whether the tagger's iron was used with a design to facilitate the opening of the cans, and on the question whether it was practicable to open the cans, when filled with the alkali, by cutting out the top. Leave was given to both parties to put in further proofs on those points. The defendants, however, failed to avail themselves of the leave so granted; but the plaintiff has furnished evidence which conclusively puts to rest all pretensions in favor of such can. He has produced in evidence sheet iron cans containing caustic alkali, of the manufacture of said company, the same being put up by said company in such cans and sold by it, together with the circulars in which the cans were enveloped when sold. These cans are made of sheet iron, not capable of being easily cut with a knife; and their contents consist of a solid mass of alkali, apparently conforming in shape to the capacity of the can. But the circular furnishes conclusive evidence against the claim set up in behalf of this can, in the directions it gives for opening the can, which directions are in these words: "Break up one box of the saponifier into fragments. by striking upon the sides of the box;" and again: "Knock off either end of a pound box of concentrated lye." Moreover, on the whole testimony, it is doubtful whether the tagger's iron actually used by the company before the date of the plaintiff's invention was so thin as to be capable of being cut to facilitate the opening of the can. It is, therefore, not shown that the use of tagger's iron in the manufacture of such cans by said company was a prior use of the plaintiff's invention.

The defendants admit, by stipulation, that they have made and used, for putting up paints and colors, and vending paints and colors put up therein, "cans with one end made wholly of thin tin, which can be easily cut at the outer edge of such end." The plaintiff claims such can to be an infringement of his patent. In the view I take of the patent, if one end of the can is made wholly of thin tin, and thereby the location of the thin or soft metal in such end is secured at the only part of the end where, by the patent, it is required to be, or where it is essential it should be, namely, at the part of the end nearest its outer edge, it is not material whether the metal in the other parts of the end be thick or thin, so far as the plaintiff's invention is concerned. The use of a plain end of thin metal secures what the patent is designed to accomplish, and in the mode specified in it, by enabling the end to be removed by cutting it out near its outer edge with a knife, while the body of the can may be made of thicker metal, and thus strong, and the thinness of the metal left thin, to be cut, does not interfere with the safe handling and transportation of the can.

There must be a decree for the plaintiff, for a perpetual injunction, and an account of profits, with costs.

PATENTS—PAINT CANS—RING OF THIN BRASS—METAL CAP.

1. The letters patent granted to John W. Masury, July 12th, 1859, for an "improvement in paint cans, &c.," are valid.

2. The claim of the patent is, "the construction of a metallic can, for hermetically sealing paints and other substances, having attached thereto a rim or ring of thin brass or other soft metal, in such a manner that the top or cover may be removed by severing the said rim or ring of brass or other soft metal with a penknife or other sharp instrument, in the manner and for the purposes herein described and represented, or its equivalent." The value of the patented can, as a can for holding paints liquid with oil, is, not only that it can be easily opened, but that, by severing the thin metal near the exterior wall of the can, the entire contents of the can can be removed without difficulty and without waste, while the can is as strong to resist injury as if there were no thin metal in it.

3. Such patented can is not anticipated by a can having a hole in the middle of its top covered by a thin metal cap, removable by being pried up or severed, the rim or ring between the cap and the edge of the can not being of thin metal.

[This was a bill in equity by John W. Masury against Daniel F. Tiemann and others, to restrain the defendant from infringing letters patent No. 24,748, granted to complainant.]

W. Howard Wait, for plaintiff.

Orlando L. Stewart, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is founded on letters patent of the United States, granted to the plaintiff, July 12th, 1859, for an "improvement in paint cans, &c." The specification describes the invention as "a new and improved can for putting up and hermetically sealing paints and other substances." It says: "The nature of my invention consists in the construction of a tinned or galvanized iron can, of any known form, with a rim or ring of thin soft metal attached to the top edge of the same. * * The principal objection to the use of fruits and other edibles put up in soldered tin cans, is the difficulty of opening the same without much labor and the convenience of proper tools. In the use of paints put up in hermetically sealed cans, this objection is most formidable. To remove the top from a small can of paint without injury to the contents thereof, is a task very difficult to accomplish. My invention obviates these difficulties, and presents a can possessing all the advantages of the ordinary can, and, in addition thereto, the extraordinary advantage of being readily openable by the most inexperienced person. To that end, I construct the body of the can, and attach the bottom thereto in the ordinary way; but, for the top of the can, in the place of using material of the same weight and thickness as for the other parts, I take thin brass or other soft metal, and attach a rim or ring thereof to the top of the can, and secure the same by soldering, as in the ordinary mode. For sealing the can after it shall have received its contents, I take a disk of tin, and solder it to the rim or ring, leaving between the said disk and the edge of the can sufficient space to admit the passage of a penknife blade. The can is then, in all respects, like the ordinary tin can hermetically sealed, except that the cover of my newly invented can may be removed by severing the thin brass rim or ring with a penknife or other sharp instrument." The claim is: "The construction of a metallic can, for hermetically sealing paints and other substances, having attached thereto a rim or ring of thin brass or other soft metal, in such a manner that the top or cover may be removed by severing the said rim or ring of brass or other soft metal with a penknife or other sharp instrument, in the manner and for the purposes herein described and represented, or its equivalent."

The infringement charged in the bill is, that the defendants have made and caused to be made, for their use, cans embodying the patented invention, and have vended paints and colors put up in cans so constructed.

The answer contains a general averment of want of novelty in the invention, without any specification as to prior use or knowledge, and denies the infringement. A mass of testimony has been taken, without objection, to prove prior use and knowledge of the invention. The only question in litigation is that of novelty. The utility of the invention is shown to be very considerable, especially for the purpose of putting up in the patented cans liquid or semi-fluid articles, such as paints liquid with oil. The claim on the part of the defendants on the question of novelty is, that they themselves used cans embodying the invention prior to the date of the plaintiff's discovery, such cans having been made by one Charles S. Hine. The value of the patented can in respect to semi-fluid paints is, that, while it is perfectly tight, after it is sealed by soldering, and can be easily opened, it can also be so opened, by severing the thin metal top near the exterior wall of the can, that the entire contents of the can can be removed without difficulty and without waste, because the opening left when the top is taken off is substantially of the same dimensions as the area of a horizontal section of the can. Moreover, the use of the rim or ring of thin metal does not detract from the strength of the can, or from its capacity to resist injury, the salient parts of it exposed to contact in handling and transportation being of the thicker metal which composes the body of the can, and the disk in the middle of the top, and between which and the edge of the can such rim or ring is interposed, not being made of the thin metal which forms the rim or ring.

The plaintiff made his invention about two months before the date of his patent. The defendants claim to have shown by testimony, that, in 1852, they substituted in use for a can with a loose or slip cover, a can having a hole in the middle of its top, covered by a thin brass cap, on which were shown, in relief, by being struck through from the other side by a die, the name of the defendants' firm and other words; and that this brass cap could be easily removed by inserting a knife under its edge and prying it up, or by severing it. But this can was not the equivalent of the plaintiff's, and did not embody the invention. The rim or ring between the brass cap and the edge of the can was not of thin metal, capable of being severed, but was of the same thick metal as the body and bottom of the can; and, when the cap was removed, the difficulty existed of getting at so much of the contents of the can as lay in the recess formed inside between the thick ring and the body of the can—a difficulty which the plaintiff's invention obviates.

The defendants also claim to have shown that, about 1853, they adopted a form of can like the one of 1852, in all respects, except that the cap, instead of being of brass, was, in order to make it cheaper, made of thinner tin than the rest of the can, such cap having on it, in relief, the same words, and being capable of being removed in the same manner, as the brass cap. But this can was no nearer to the plaintiff's invention than its predecessor of 1852.

The defendants also claim to have shown that, in the winter of 1856–7, they adopted a form of can, having a rim or ring of thin tin, and a centre cap of thick tin, the rim and cap being, each, a horizontal plane, and the cap not being marked with any words in relief; and that, after about a year, they modified the form slightly, by turning down, all around the inner edge of the thin rim or ring, or making a shoulder on such edge. This can was the same thing as the plaintiff's. That they adopted such a can, and at some time, is certain. The point is as to the time. On a careful review of the whole evidence, especially that derived from the defendants' books of account, and their circular to the trade, in January, 1860, I am satisfied that they had no such can, and that no such can was made by Mr. Hine, or for them, until some time in 1859, after the date of the plaintiff's invention. It would be enough to say, that, as the burden of proof is on the defendants, they have not satisfactorily shown that they preceded the plaintiff with their can. But it is shown, I think, affirmatively, that he preceded them. The controlling circumstance in the case, which outweighs the unreliable and unsupported evidence of mere memory, and is sustained by every piece of evidence in the case, derived from contemporaneous records in books, is the annual circular or catalogue, which the defendants issued on the 1st of January, 1860, for the use of their customers, being a pamphlet of thirty pages, giving a list of paints and prices. That pamphlet says: "Oil colors. To afford greater facilities in opening the cans, we have had a quality of tin imported expressly for us, from which the tops of all cans (of and under 6 lbs.) are made. This tin, while it in no way lessens the strength of the cans, is easily and rapidly cut with a stout penknife. The tin should be cut between the caps and the edge. Note. Customers wishing this style of can at the present time (January) must be particular in mentioning it in their orders, as all our stock on hand is not put up in this manner." This was the first time any notice of such a can had appeared in any of the defendants' catalogues, and it is impossible to resist the conclusion, that such a can was, at the time of this catalogue, a new style of can, that so useful a thing was announced as early as possible after its adoption, and that it is not true that it had been in use by the defendants since 1857, as claimed.

There must be a decree for the plaintiff, for a perpetual injunction, and an account of profits, with costs.

MATCALM v. SMITH.

[6 McLean, 416.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1855.

MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — PARTIES — CHARGEABLE WITH BALANCE.

1. All persons interested, should be made parties to a bill to foreclose a mortgage.

2. This is indispensable where a party may be chargeable with any balance, which the sale of the mortgaged premises may not satisfy.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

[This was a suit by William H. Matcalm against Osmond Smith. Heard on demurrer to the bill.]

Mr. Howard, for plaintiff.
Mr. Clark, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a bill in chancery to foreclose a mortgage. Charles D. Parkhurst executed three several promissory notes to plaintiff, each for five hundred and forty-four dollars, and to receive the payment of these notes, Smith and wife executed a mortgage for sixteen hundred and thirty-three dollars on the premises stated in the mortgage, dated 7th December, 1851, given by the said Parkhurst as collateral security. But if the money should not be paid, the party of the second part to sell the mortgaged premises. There was a failure to pay the sum due, $1280 70, on 1st July, 1853, and this bill is brought to have the mortgaged premises sold.

And the bill states that Eben Sherwood, who is also made a defendant, claims to have some interest or estate in the mortgaged premises, mortgaged to him by Parkhurst, dated 3d June, 1850, which required Parkhurst to pay to Sherwood $687 41, in three equal annual payments to be paid in sawing, and the said Sherwood to deliver the logs at the mill ponds. And the bill requires Sherwood to answer whether he has not received from Parkhurst the notes, &c., and whether the mortgage has not been fully paid; and whether the said mortgage ought not to be discharged of record. What amount, if any is due, on the mortgage. Whether he has delivered the logs, &c., at the mill pond. How many feet of lumber had been sawed by Parkhurst. Whether the said Parkhurst did not make the notes, and the said Smith and wife did not execute the mortgage; and whether the amount stated to be due on said notes is not due.

To the bill the defendants demur, and for cause of demurrer state, that Charles D. Parkhurst, alleged to be a citizen of Michigan, is not made a party, when the object of the bill is to foreclose a mortgage to pay his debt.

It is clear that Parkhurst should be made a party. The mortgage was executed by Smith and wife, to pay his debt. The debt was incurred by Parkhurst for the purchase of the premises mortgaged. He sold to Smith, and Smith and wife agreed to pay to the mortgagee the original consideration, for which the premises were sold, and himself and wife executed a mortgage to secure such payment. It seems Parkhurst had mortgaged the premises, while he owned them to Sherwood, for six hundred and eighty-seven dollars and forty-one cents, to be paid in three equal annual payments in sawing lumber, &c., Sherwood to deliver logs to be sawed at the mill pond. Parkhurst is a necessary party to show in his answer how much of the original consideration was paid, and especially is it necessary that he should answer how much he paid, on Sherwood's mortgage, if the whole of it were not discharged. Sherwood is called on to answer as to what payments were made, but Parkhurst has a direct interest in showing the payments to Sherwood, as he would be answerable to him for any remaining balance, or to the plaintiff, should Sherwood's mortgage be first satisfied, it being prior in date. The demurrer to the bill is sustained. Leave given to amend the bill.

MATERN v. GIBBS et al.

[1 Spr. 158; [1] 17 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 287.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1847.

SEAMEN—WHALING VOYAGE—LAY OF SEAMAN—JOINT SUIT—DISRATING—SPECIAL NOTICE.

1. The master and owners of a whaling ship, are not liable to be sued jointly by a seaman, for his lay or share.

2. A clause in the shipping articles, authorizing the master to disrate any seaman, whom he should judge indisposed, or incompetent, to his duty, which had been in use only three years, and was not brought specially to the notice of the seaman, at the time he shipped, was held not to be binding on him.

3. Whether any length of use, or special notice of such an article, would make the judgment of the master conclusive, quaere.

This was a libel in admiralty, for a cooper's lay on a whaling voyage, (one sixty-fifth of the net catchings, being more than $1300,) brought against the master and owners. An exception, that these parties could not be proceeded against jointly (see 13th admiralty rule), being sustained by the court, there was a discontinuance as to the master. Two other exceptions: 1st. That a master in a whaling voyage is not liable for the lays of the men; and 2dly. That all the owners must be joined; were argued at length in April last, but it became unnecessary to decide them. After a hearing, at a subsequent day, upon the merits.

E. T. Dana, for libellant.

J. H. Clifford and L. F. Brigham, for respondents.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The defence was, 1st. That the libellant being judged incompetent by the master, and displaced, this was conclusive against his claim, under the following clause in the shipping articles:—"It is further agreed that if any officer or seaman, after a fair trial of his abilities or disposition, shall be judged incompetent, or indisposed, to the proper discharge of the duties of his station, the master shall have a right to displace him, and substitute another in his stead,—a corresponding reduction of the lay of such officer, or seaman, with reference to the duty which he may afterwards perform, thenceforth to take effect." See Curt. Merch. Seam. p. 393.

It was alleged by the libellant, in his supplemental libel, and was uncontradicted, that he had no actual knowledge of this stipulation in the articles, and that they were neither read by, nor to, him, and that he received no additional compensation on account of it. It is the well settled rule of admiralty law, that a seaman is not bound by any new or unusual stipulation introduced into the articles, and which is in derogation of his general rights, without full knowledge thereof, and adequate compensation therefor. Brown v. Lull [Case No. 2,018]. Now, the object of this clause is, not merely to enable the master to disrate a seaman, which he might always do, but to make the master's judgment, on that point, conclusive upon the seaman and his wages, so that no court may afterwards inquire into its correctness. Such being the character of this article, and the libellant denying any knowledge of it in fact, the court is to inquire whether general usage and length of time, has so far established it, as a part of the common shipping articles, in the whaling business, that the libellant was, in legal contemplation, affected with knowledge of it. On this point, the facts as reported, under agreement, by a commissioner of this court are, that the introduction of this stipulation is peculiar to New Bedford, and its immediate vicinity; that a form of articles, with this clause, was first printed in 1839; that it began to be used in 1840, and from that time forward, has been growing into general use. This vessel sailed from New Bedford in 1843. Thus the average length of a single whaling voyage, measures the whole interval from its first introduction, to its use in the articles now in question. The duration of these voyages makes the shipping and the settling with crews, of much less frequent recurrence than in the freighting business. Upon these facts, I think it would be venturing too far, to say that this libellant must be presumed to have known of the introduction of this clause. He should have been specially informed of it, at the time he shipped.

In deciding this point, upon the special circumstances of the case, I do not mean to intimate an opinion that this clause in the shipping articles would, by any length of time, or by being brought specially to the notice of the seaman, make the judgment of the master absolutely conclusive, so that the court could not inquire into its justness, or reasonableness. I leave that question to be decided, when it shall become necessary to do so.

The judgment of the master being held not conclusive upon the libellant, I must pass upon the question of his competency. It was proved to have been perfectly well understood by all parties, that he shipped as for his first voyage, and not at the full lay of a cooper. Upon a careful examination of all the evidence, I am of opinion that the libellant was not incompetent to fulfil this engagement. Decree for the libellant for the lay claimed.

District Court, D. Indiana.

BANKRUPTCY — COMPOSITION — RIGHT TO VOTE — DEBTS NOT PROVEN.

Creditors are not entitled to vote upon proposals for composition without having first proved their debts.

[Cited in Re Keller, Case No. 7,654.]

By the Register:

I, Noble C. Butler, one of the registers of said court in bankruptcy, do hereby certify that in the course of the proceedings in said cause before me the following question arose pertinent thereto and was stated and agreed to by the parties: At a meeting called and held at the time and place aforesaid, for the purpose of considering a proposal submitted by the bankrupt for composition with his creditors, William Blakely offered to vote thereon without first having proved his debt, as required by section 5077, Rev. St. U. S. The undersigned register, presiding at said meeting, ruled that Blakely was not entitled to vote on such proposal until he has made proof of his debt in the mode prescribed by said section 5077; to which ruling the said William Blakely, by his counsel, Louden & Miers, excepted, and the question thus arising is, at the request of the parties, certified into court for decision by the judge, with the following reasons of the register for his ruling:

The bankrupt law provides (section 5077, Rev. St. U. S.) that, "to entitle a claimant against the estate of a bankrupt to have his demand allowed, it must be verified by a deposition in writing, under oath, and signed by the deponent, setting forth the demand, the consideration thereof, etc., etc., etc." And again, "no claim shall be allowed unless all the statements set forth in such deposition appear to be true." Elsewhere the officers are named before whom these proofs may be made, viz.: registers, U. S. commissioners, and notaries public. The forms in which they shall be made are prescribed by the justices of the supreme court, viz.: forms Nos. 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25. Creditors cannot vote for assignee or receive dividends; are not entitled to notice of application for discharge, and cannot oppose a discharge or contest its validity when granted, and, in short, they have no standing in court unless they have proved their debts. And in the proceedings under section 43 of the act (Rev. St. U. S. § 5103), which in old copies of it is entitled "superseding bankruptcy proceedings by arrangement," there is no exception made to this general rule. In these proceedings the estate of the bankrupt is administered by trustees under the supervision of a committee of creditors; but it is nevertheless a proceeding in court, and proofs of debt in the usual form are required of all creditors who participate therein. It is, moreover, to this section that the provisions for composition with creditors are added by the amendment of June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 178]. The language of the amendment is, "Be it enacted, etc., etc., that the following provisions be added to section 43 of said act." Now there is nothing in this portion of the law authorizing compositions which indicates that a different practice is to be observed as to proofs of debt from that already established. The character of the proceeding thus instituted is not such as to make any change necessary. It is merely another form of bankruptcy proceeding and the formalities of such proceedings are not inappropriate to it. It resembles in some particulars the proceeding by "arrangement," wherein the resolution to adopt this mode of settlement is first adopted by three-quarters in value of the creditors who have proved their debts, and afterwards confirmed by the court.

The statute concerning compositions requires the resolution in acceptance of the proposed composition to be first passed by a certain proportion of "the creditors" assembled at the meeting called to consider it. The language here does not, as in the case of an "arrangement," explicitly designate "creditors whose claims have been proved," but, in the opinion of the register, the word "creditors" is used in this instance, as in others throughout the law, to denote such creditors only. It would be a tiresome repetition to insert this qualification wherever the word occurs in the law, and it is frequently omitted without leaving the meaning in anywise obscure.

It was urged by counsel for Blakely that the schedules required of the bankrupts in composition cases dispenses with the necessity of proof; that the specification of the creditors therein is sufficient for their identification. But this objection, if valid, would obviate the need of proof in all bankruptcy proceedings, for in all of them the bankrupts are required to submit sworn statements of the names, residences, and occupations of their creditors, the amounts due them, the particulars of the indebtedness, etc., and these creditors are, notwithstanding this, compelled to prove their debts. The bankrupt's statement in neither case is accepted as conclusive. There is the same opportunity and the same inducement for collusion in each class of cases. The bankrupt might in composition cases procure a favorable compromise with his real creditors by listing enough fictitious ones to outvote them, if his statement is conclusive. He might wilfully, or ignorantly exclude genuine creditors from the terms of a composition, or at any rate from a participation in it to the full amount of their claims, for nothing is more common than discrepancies between the statements of debtors and creditors as to the precise amount of the indebtedness, which can be rectified only by the production in due form of law of the evidences thereof. These creditors would have but a very tardy remedy for this violation of their rights if they are denied the authority to prove their own debts, and referred to the statements of the bankrupt as the only and indisputable evidence of their existence. True, the composition is binding on the creditors whose names, etc., are included in the statement of the bankrupt, and does not affect or prejudice the "rights of any other creditors," but the same may be said of creditors in any bankruptcy proceeding, whose names are wilfully omitted from the schedules of the bankrupt.

There are no reported cases accessible to me in which this question is decided. In the matter of Holmes [Case No. 6,632], Southern district of New York, Blatchford, J., in enumerating the duties of registers presiding at composition meetings, said, "he (the register) must necessarily decide who are entitled to vote, and in respect to what amount of debts, and pass upon the regularity and propriety, in form, of the proofs of debt and of letters of attorney." It thus appears that the practice in composition cases in that district is to require such debts to be proved. There is also a dictum of Lowell, J., in Ex parte Jewett [Id. 7,303], district of Massachusetts, to the effect that "no oath is required of them (creditors) in ordinary cases."

For the foregoing reasons it is my opinion that composition cases are not excepted from the operation of section 5077, Rev. St. U. S., requiring proof of debts in bankruptcy proceedings, and this opinion and the reasons therefor are respectfully submitted.

GRESHAM, District Judge. The practice in this district has uniformly been as held by Mr. Register Butler. It is the only safe practice, and, indeed, the only practice recognized by law. The finding is approved.

Case No. 9,275.

MATHEWS v. ABBOTT.

[2 Hask. 289.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. Dec., 1878.

BANKRUPTCY—MAKER OF NOTE—SECURITY GIVEN TO INDORSER — SUBROGATION — NATIONAL BANKS—REAL ESTATE SECURITY.

1. By subrogation, the security, given by the maker of a note to the indorser or surety, when both have become insolvent and the liability of the indorser has become fixed, in equity, may be recovered by the holder of the note and applied to its payment.

[Cited in National Shoe & Leather Bank of Auburn v. Small, 7 Fed. 843.]

2. National banks may hold, under section 5137 of the Revised Statutes, real estate security so acquired, as acquired subsequent to the loan.

Bill by the assignee in bankruptcy of Henry R. Butterfield, the maker of sundry notes, indorsed by respondent Abbott, and held by sundry national banks, the other respondents, to determine whether such banks are entitled to be subrogated to the rights of Abbott as indorser, under a mortgage of real estate to him from the bankrupt to secure his liability for indorsing the notes, his liability having become fixed, and he being insolvent.

Edmund F. Webb and William L. Putnam, for orator.

Gardiner H. Vose, for respondents.

FOX, District Judge. On the sixteenth of November, 1877, the bankrupt mortgaged to H. G. Abbott, certain real estate in Waterville, on condition "that if the said Butterfield shall save harmless the said Abbott from all liability incurred by said Abbott on certain promissory notes signed by said Abbott as indorser, guarantee and surety, for the accommodation of said Butterfield to an amount not exceeding $8000, and from all liability which may hereafter be incurred by said Abbott on any notes given in renewal of said notes now outstanding, and from any and all liability which may hereafter be incurred by said Abbott on any and all promissory notes and bills of exchange as indorser or surety, or for the accommodation of said Butterfield, then this deed shall be void."

Abbott indorsed sundry notes for Butterfield's accommodation, which were afterwards discounted by certain national banks, who are now the holders of these notes, and are made parties to this bill. Abbott is insolvent, and has never paid either of the notes so indorsed by him; but his liability upon all of them has become absolute.

This bill is brought by Butterfield's assignee in bankruptcy against Abbott and the holders of these notes, that the rights of all parties interested in this mortgage may be ascertained and determined by this court; and it would seem that there could not be much occasion for controversy in the matter after the learned and ample discussion of the law in Re Jaycox [Case No. 7,242], by the late Judge Hall, and by Judge Lowell in Re Pierce [Id. 11,140], and subsequently by him in Ex parte Morris [Id. 9,823].

In these opinions both the English and the American authorities are referred to, and they fully sustain the principle as stated by Lowell, J., in Ex parte Morris [supra]. It is well settled, that if a mortgage, pledge, or lien is given by a principal debtor to secure his indorser or other surety, and both become insolvent, the holders of the notes or other debts, for which the surety is bound, have an equity to require the property to be applied to the discharge of their debts specifically."

A distinction has been sometimes taken between a security for the indemnity of the surety, and one conditioned for the absolute payment of the debt; but as is stated by Chapman, J., in New Bedford Institution for Savings v. Fair Haven Bank, 9 Allen, 178, "It is well settled by the authorities that the creditor has an equitable claim to the security as well when the mortgage is given for mere indemnity, as when the condition is added that the principal shall pay the debt."

It is quite immaterial whether the surety has or not actually paid the debt. If he has become absolutely bound for its payment, as was said by Lord Eldon in Ex parte Waring, 19 Ves. 345, as quoted by Lord Hatherly, 5 Ch. App. 776, "It was true these bills were not paid, but, inasmuch as the estate of the debtor could not be withdrawn until the debts were paid, * * * and inasmuch as the estate of the creditor holding the security was in such a condition that he was not able to make payment of the bills in money's worth, the only way was to dispose of the security and pay the bills. * * * The bill holder comes in, not on account of any special lien he has upon the property, but because the person from whom he holds has a security, which security can not be taken away until all liability upon the bills is at an end."

The surety is to be indemnified from his liability by means of the security he has received for that purpose from his principal; and to use the language of Parker, J., in Hopewell v. Cumberland Bank, 10 Leigh, 225, "If a surety is bound for the debt and is indemnified by the principal debtor, the creditor may pursue the indemnity in exoneration of the liability of the surety, not from any notion of mutual contract between the parties, that in providing for the surety, the creditor shall be equally provided for, but from a principle of mutual equity, independent of contract, namely, that to prevent the surety from being first harassed for the debt or liability, and then turning him round to seek redress from the collateral security given by the principal, a court of equity will authorize and even encourage the creditor to claim through the medium of the surety all the rights he has thus acquired, to be exercised for his benefit and in discharge of his obligations."

The security was given and received, not for the benefit of the general creditors of Abbott, but, it was for the special object of indemnifying him from the payment of these particular liabilities; and if, by a court of equity, it is so applied, the purpose contemplated by the parties to the conveyance is accomplished; the general creditors of the principal can have no cause for complaint, because, as against them, it was in all respects a valid transaction; and, as to the general creditors of Abbott, they are in the same condition they would be, if Abbott had never assumed this liability; they can have full recourse to all of his estate which should be applied in payment of debts for which he is primarily liable; and they certainly have no right to insist that Butterfield's property should thus be disposed of.

By adopting the course proposed, equal and exact justice is obtained, as the property of the bankrupt, which, he had agreed with his surety he should have as security for his liability, goes in discharge of these very liabilities, and a court of equity thus affords its aid to the surety, by applying the property of the principal to the payment of the debts for which it is pledged, which the surety might not be able to do for want of ready money, if he is unable to resort to the security before actual payment by him of the claims of his principal, for which he had thus become responsible.

The holders of the notes of Butterfield are various national banks; and, as they are prohibited from making loans on real estate, it is urged that they cannot avail themselves of this security. This objection is wholly without merit. It does not appear that either of the banks knew of the mortgage, or gave credit on account thereof. All the security which they took at the making of the loan was the personal obligation of the parties, and it is only when they have become insolvent, that the banks ask that the property of the principal may be applied to the relief of the surety; not by force of any agreement to which they were parties; but wholly through the application of certain equitable principles, which, under such circumstances, control such security. This is rather in the nature of security subsequent to the loan, which by section 5137, Rev. St., national banks may hold for debts previously contracted.

Decree in conformity with this opinion.

MATHEWS v. DOUGLASS.

[1 Brunner, Col. Cas. 196; [1] 1 Cooke, 136.]

Circuit Court, Tennessee.[2] 1812.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY—INJUNCTION—WHEN GRANTED.

An injunction will not be granted during the pendency of an action unless the parties asking relief in equity will confess judgment at law.

Douglass brought an action at law against Mathews, and filed his declaration, to which Mathews demurred. During the pendency or the action at law, and indeed before the demurrer had been determined, Whiteside, on behalf of Mathews, and upon a bill filed for that purpose, moved the court for an injunction.

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Dickinson, on behalf of the plaintiff at law, objected to an injunction being granted unless the complainant would confess a judgment.

BY THE COURT. An injunction generally operates as a release of errors; but if it be granted as this case now stands it will not so operate here. Suppose the injunction is granted to stay the proceedings at law, and ultimately there would be a decree against the complainant. He may still go on, and if the declaration is defective prevent the recovery of the claim, or at least delay it, without any pretence founded in justice. And besides, should the demurrer be decided against him, he might prosecute a writ of error. We, therefore, will not grant the injunction unless the complainant will confess a judgment at law.

And it was done accordingly.

MATHEWS v. SPRINGER.

[2 Abb. U. S. 283.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Mississippi. Jan. Term, 1871.

SLAVERY—EMANCIPATION—DEVISE TO FREED SLAVES.

1. By the laws of Mississippi and Ohio, as they existed in 1858–59, where an owner of slaves, residing in Mississippi, voluntarily carried them to Ohio with the intent that they should thereby become free, such slaves became free. And they could not lose that status by returning, with their former master, to Mississippi for temporary purposes.

2. A devise of proceeds of real property, in favor of negroes formerly held as slaves, but who have been emancipated, is valid. So held, under the law of Mississippi, in reference to a case where the emancipation was by the act of the owner.

3. One who is entitled, by the terms of a will, to a share of the proceeds of land sold, as legatee, cannot be barred of his rights in respect thereto, by an adjudication made in proceedings to which he is not a party.

Hearing upon pleadings and proofs in equity.

The suit was brought by Isaiah J. Mathews and Caroline J. Mathews against Benjamin Springer, executor of the will of Robert L. Mathews, and others.

W. P. Harris and Upton Young, for complainants.

T. A. Marshall and J. B. Chrisman, for defendants.

HILL, District Judge. This cause is now submitted upon bill, answer, exhibits, and proof, from which the following facts appear, and upon which the questions to be determined arise:

Robert L. Mathews, a resident of Warren county, in this state, a man possessed of a considerable estate within this state, both personal and real, was in the year 1858, the owner of a slave named Harriet, the mother of complainants, who were then his slaves, and whom he also claimed as his natural children, and whom he was anxious to emancipate and set free, Isaiah being then about seven, and Caroline about five years of age.

Not being permitted by the laws of this state to emancipate them here, and have them continue their residence here, he took them with him to the state of Ohio; and in the court of common pleas at the May term, 1858, of Hamilton county, in said state, executed a writing by which he declared them free and no longer slaves, and procured a decree of said court declaring them free persons of color, and remained with them in Ohio for some weeks, when he returned with them to Carroll county, in this state, where they remained until shortly after the death of said Mathews, which took place early in 1859; when, by the directions of Springer, one of the executors named in the will of said Mathews, they returned to the state of Ohio, where they have since remained. Said Mathews on February 20, 1859, made and published his last will and testament, and on March 26, 1859, died in said county of Carroll, in this state; and on April 25, 1859, said last will and testament was duly proved and admitted of record in the probate court of Warren county, the place of residence of said testator at the time of his death.

The testator, leaving no widow or legitimate children as the natural objects of his bounty, after providing in his will for a number of specific legacies to his collateral relatives and friends, directed that his executors should sell and convert the residue of his estate, real and personal, into cash, and deposit the same in the State Bank of Louisiana; that complainants should be maintained and educated out of said funds until they were twenty-one years of age, when the remainder should be divided between them, the said Isaiah Jefferson receiving two-thirds, and Caroline Josephine one-third; with the further provision that if anything should happen by death or otherwise that his said children should not receive said bequest, that the same should go to said bank for the use of the stockholders.

In June, 1860, the heirs at law and next of kin to said testator filed in the probate court of Warren county their petition against said Springer, who had qualified as such executor, and had proceeded to the execution of the trusts under the will, and also against Downs and Johnson, the other two persons nominated in the will as co-executors with said Springer, and against the said bank, and naming the complainants as defendants thereto, but taking no other steps against them. The petition alleged that complainants were slaves, and could not take the bequests provided for them in said will, and that the bequest to the bank was void, because there was no such corporation in existence, and that the pretended devise and bequest to the bank was intended, not for the benefit of the bank, but for the benefit of complainants, and that this provision in the will, as well as the pretended emancipation of complainants, were both attempted frauds on the laws of the state of Mississippi, and against its policy, and void.

To this petition the said Springer and the Louisiana State Bank, which claimed to be the bank intended in the said will, answered the allegations in the same. The court dismissed the petition as to complainants, for the alleged reason that they were slaves, and could not take under the will; and dismissed the same as to said Downs and Johnson, because they had not qualified as executors; and as to said bank, for the reasons charged; and proceeded, according to the prayer of the petition, to declare said bequests to complainants and to the bank void, and ordered distribution of the estate, after the payment of the specific legacies, among the petitioners.

From this decree said Springer and the bank appealed to the high court of errors and appeals of the state, where the decree rendered by the probate court was affirmed; and proceedings were had to distribute the personal estate according to said decree. Subsequently, Springer made a final settlement, so far as he had executed the trusts under the will; and the defendant, Diggins, was appointed administrator de bonis non, with said will annexed. No notice of complainants or their interest was taken in the proceedings in said probate court, nor were they in any way brought before it.

Complainants, by their next friend, filed this bill at December term of this court, 1868, for the purpose of setting up and enforcing the provisions made for them in said will, notwithstanding the proceedings so had in the said probate court, and so affirmed by the high court of errors and appeals, alleging that their father, the said R. L. Mathews, took them to the state of Ohio with the purpose of emancipating them, and that he did so emancipate them, and with the purpose that they should remain citizens of that state, and receive an education, and the advantages of free persons. That afterwards he returned with them to Mississippi, to remain a short time only; and in a short time they were to be returned to the state of Ohio as their permanent home. During their stay in Mississippi, after their emancipation, they occupied the position of citizens and residents of Ohio, as far as they were capable of doing so, and were only in Mississippi temporarily. That not having been parties to the proceedings in the probate court and high court of errors and appeals, they were not affected by any of the proceedings therein; and that they are now entitled to all the provisions in their behalf made in said will, so far as said estate can be collected.

To this bill, said Springer, Diggins, T. A. Marshal, and H. H. Miller, R. S. Buck, Reason Wooley and wife Elizabeth, and Hampton H. Griffith and wife Susan, have filed their answers, admitting the execution of the will, its probate, and the proceedings had under it, as first above stated, but denying that said Robert L. Mathews took complainants to Ohio with the intention of their remaining there; alleging that his proceedings were intended as a fraud and evasion of the laws of this state; and that complainants were, at the time of said Mathews' death, his slaves in this state, and a part of his estate, and incapable to take anything under his said will; that any pretended rights they may claim under said will are concluded against them by said proceedings had in the probate court, and affirmed by the high court of errors and appeals of this state.

The questions to be determined by the court are: (1) Did the complainants become free persons of color in the state of Ohio; and if so, was their condition changed to a state of slavery when they were brought back to the state of Mississippi, and at the death of the testator? (2) If they were free persons of color at the death of the testator, were they capable of taking under the provisions in their favor in the will? (3) If free persons of color, and capable of taking under the will, are they now precluded from the provision made in their behalf, by reason of the proceedings and decree of the courts above referred to?

These questions, if raised in this court before the attempted severance of this and other states from the Union, would have been regarded as of peculiar interest. For many long years a heated sectional controversy had been carried on between the people of the states where African slavery was maintained, and of those where it was forbidden. This controversy existed before the formation of the Federal Union; and as a compromise, and to avoid more serious results, provision was made in the constitution for the reclamation of persons held to servitude in one state, who might, without the consent of those entitled to their service, flee to those states where such service was forbidden.

But the result of the late bloody war has been to emancipate all of the race, so long the bone of contention between the slaveholding and the non-slaveholding states; all are now free, and, under the constitution and laws, enjoy equal rights as citizens of the United States, and of the several states, as did the white race before this change in the condition of the other race; so that we approach the consideration of the questions presented as we would any other question involving only pecuniary rights and remedies.

The changed condition of the race to which the complainants belong, has nothing to do with the questions to be determined. Their rights, if any they have, are to be determined under the law as it existed at the time of the death of Colonel Mathews, the testator. If they were incapable from their condition on account of race, color, or condition of slavery, then or before that time existing, to take under the provisions made for them in the will, they are now incapable to do so; so that we must, in considering all the questions presented, place ourselves back at the time of the death of the testator, and the time his estate should have been administered and the trusts in the will executed, had no change taken place.

The first question for determination is, did the complainants become free persons of color in the state of Ohio in consequence of their having been taken there by the testator, who was then their owner, and the proceedings there had by him as stated?

In the non-slaveholding states I believe it has always been held that when a slave was removed to their territory, or was permitted to go there with the intention upon the part of the owner that he should remain, he at once became free; and I am not aware of any contrary ruling by the courts of any of the Southern or slaveholding states; so that if the proof establishes the fact that it was the intention of Colonel Mathews that they should remain there when he took them into that state, they at once, without more, became free, and no change of purpose on his part, or any other act of his could change their condition. In the case of Rankin v. Lydia, 2 A. K. Marsh. 813, it is held that no law, at least in that state, could bring into slavery one over whom it has ceased to exist. As stated by the judge who delivered the opinion of the court: "It would be a construction without language to be construed, implication without a scrap of law, written or unwritten, statutory, or common, from which the inference could be drawn, to revive the right to a slave when that right had passed over to himself." But we are left in no doubt as to their then condition according to the law of Ohio, as expounded and settled by the supreme court of that state in the case of Anderson v. Poindexter, 6 Ohio, 622, in which it is held that a slave being permitted by the owner to go into Ohio, no matter for what purpose, thereby became free as soon as he entered that state. This, it is true, is contrary to the holding of the courts of most of the Southern states; with perhaps the single exception of Louisiana, the Southern states claimed and their courts, with the exception mentioned, held that the taking of a slave to a non-slaveholding state, with the intention of only a temporary sojourn or a mere transit through the state, did not communicate freedom to the slave. But conceding that the complainants were taken to Ohio by the testator with the intention that they should be free, there can be no doubt but that they became free, and there is no doubt but such was his intention and purpose. And it may as well be said now as again, that the preponderance of the testimony is that he intended that they should become residents of the state of Ohio, and enjoy all the rights of free persons of color resident within that state, although he would have greatly preferred that during their minority they should have remained with him in Mississippi, if they could have enjoyed the same advantages here. The testimony all goes to show that he was a man of intelligence, and understood the laws of Mississippi upon the subject, and knew that they could not be permitted to remain in Mississippi after the notice given them to depart from the state; he further knew that they could not be permitted to enjoy the benefits of an education in this state.

At the time he brought them back to Mississippi, they were too young to be at school; they were also too young to produce any of the evils which free persons of color residing in the state were supposed to exert as an evil influence on the slave population of the state. I am, therefore, satisfied that the complainants did become and were free persons, from and after they were so taken to the state of Ohio, even upon the view entertained by the people of the slaveholding states, and that expressed by their highest tribunals, and were then entitled to all the rights appertaining to free persons of color in the state of Ohio.

The next branch of the first inquiry is, did complainants lose the rights so conferred upon them, by being brought back to Mississippi? It is contended by defendants' counsel that they did, and the case of Hinds v. Brazealle [3 Miss. (2 How.) 837] is referred to as authority to maintain this position. That was a case in which the owner had carried a slave to the state of Ohio and executed a deed of emancipation with an intention of immediately returning with the slave to the state of Mississippi, and had done so to avoid the laws of the state of Mississippi, and to give to the slave so intended to be emancipated, the rights and privileges of a free person of color here, as though the emancipation had taken place here; it was held to be a fraud upon the laws of this state, and, therefore, void in this state, notwithstanding the act might have been held valid in the state of Ohio; and that to allow the emancipation of slaves to remain in this state was contrary to the declared policy of the state, as shown by the general course of legislation on the subject. The case reported in 1 Rand. (Va.) 15, was referred to in that case, and is relied upon in this. These cases would be applicable in this case were the facts similar, but, as already stated, the weight of the evidence is that the testator did not intend to return with them to this state when he took complainants to Ohio. The will itself, made but a short time afterwards, shows that he did not intend them to receive or enjoy the property here, and is a strong circumstance against his intention that they should remain here for any considerable length of time. The estate intended for them was all to be converted into money and deposited in the State Bank of Louisiana, in the city of New Orleans. The complainants were to be supported and educated out of it. These educational opportunities could not be obtained in this state, or in any one of the slave states; at least they could not be in this state, and could not in any other slave state as they could in Ohio. Taking all the proof together, I am satisfied it was the intention of the testator that complainants should be returned to Ohio to remain, and that they should enjoy his bounty there, or at least not in this state; and that this case does not fall within the principles of the case of Hinds v. Brazealle, and that complainants were not the slaves of the testator at his death, but were free persons of color, temporarily in this state, just as it was contended by the Southern states, that slaves might be taken to a non-slaveholding state, and remain temporarily without becoming free.

Upon a careful examination of the provisions of the Code of 1857, then in force, no prohibition of law can be found against their doing so, had they been adults, and much less so when they were infants incapable to violate the law, or suffer its penalties. Article 80, § 12, c. 33, of the Code, provided that it should not be lawful for any free negro or mulatto to emigrate to, and become a resident of this state, and provided as a penalty that any justice of the peace might give him ten days' notice in writing to leave the state, and if he did not do so, issue a warrant, and cause him to be apprehended; and authorized the board of police to order him to be sold by the sheriff to the highest bidder as a slave for life, the proceeds to go into the county treasury; and further provided, that free negroes and mulattoes then in the state without leave might be dealt with in the same way. It will be observed, that to incur this penalty, the free negro or mulatto must immigrate to the state, and must further become a resident of the state; in other words must make it his home. This cannot be said of one who came here to remain temporarily, or for a short time; such a person cannot be considered a resident. Again, no penalty was incurred until after the ten days' written notice had been given, and a failure to depart on the part of the person so here without authority, and until this was done no law could be held violated. Thus three things were necessary to subject him to this severe penalty: First, he must emigrate to the state; secondly, reside in the state, that is, make it his home; thirdly, he must refuse or neglect to leave the state after having first been served with a written notice from a justice of the peace to leave the state, being allowed a temporary residence in the state after the notice, all of which pre-supposed that the party was capable of acting, and where action, or non-action, was a crime, the commission of which was visited with the severe penalty of becoming a slave for life. Such a penalty it cannot be supposed the legislature intended to inflict upon an infant incapable of committing any other crime. No provision is made by the Code for a free negro brought into the state in infancy. The statute in force before the adoption of the Code of 1857 did provide, that after they arrived at the age of sixteen years, and upon thirty days' notice to leave the state, and a refusal, they might be sold for one year. Upon a careful examination of the subject, I am satisfied their residence here, under the circumstances, was not a violation of law. And without the same being as a punishment for some crime of which the party was convicted, I know of no law by which a person once a slave, but freed therefrom, could be returned to his former condition of slavery; even his own voluntary agreement could not bind him to servitude for life, much less, if a female, to transmit the condition of slavery to her children. The theory in the case of Hinds v. Brazealle is, that the slave mentioned never was free.

Having determined that complainants were, at the time the testator made his will, free persons of color, permanently domiciled in Ohio, and only temporarily here, they were entitled to hold all the rights and provisions made for them by the will, which they could have done had they always resided in Ohio; and which brings us in the investigation to the next point of inquiry, and that is, what are those rights?

Defendants' counsel deny that they could then or now acquire anything, and rely upon the cases of Heirn v. Bridault, 37 Miss. 209, and Mitchell v. Wells, Id. 235, to sustain this position. These two causes were decided by the court at the same time, under the same circumstances, involving the same questions as to principle, and the judges were divided in opinion in the same way, so that the consideration of the one may be considered as the consideration of the other, with this difference in the facts; that in the former case the free negro had never been a slave in this state—only a resident free negro—and in the latter had been a slave in this state, and was taken by her owner to Ohio, and there emancipated by deed, and only remained there some eighteen months, when she returned to this state, and resided with her former owner as a servant in his family, until September, 1848, about one month after the death of the testator, when she married a free man of color who resided in Jackson, Mississippi, and resided with him here until 1851, when she returned to Ohio. In the former case the beneficiary in the will was a free woman of color, and came with the testator from New Orleans to this state, and resided with him as the mistress of his family, and had done so for a number of years before his death.

The principles announced by the judge who delivered the opinion of the court in this case, were that "alien free negroes and mulattoes, being without the protection of the Federal constitution as citizens of the United States, and being of a barbarian race, with whom civilized nations have no commercial, social, or diplomatic intercourse, and hence regarded as perpetual enemies (though no war be waged against them), are incapable of taking or holding any species of property in this state; and a devise or legacy to any person of that class was absolutely void; and that all free negroes and mulattoes coming into this state from other states, were to be treated as alien enemies, and to have enforced against them the strictest rule of the ancient law applicable to alien enemies, except as to life and limb."

The same judge, in delivering the opinion of the court in Mitchell v. Wells, uses this language: "The policy of Mississippi being against emancipation, either here or elsewhere, of slaves once domiciled within her limits, her courts will not give any effect to the emancipation of a Mississippi slave in another state; and a slave so manumitted cannot, therefore, take or hold any property in this state, or maintain any suit in her courts." Although the facts in these cases are dissimilar to those in the case under consideration, it must be admitted, if the principles announced are held to be binding on this court, as is claimed, they would be decisive against the complainants. But upon a careful examination of the statute on wills, and of the authority to bring suits in the courts of the state, no prohibition will be found against such a disposition by a testator of his estate, or of its enforcement in the courts of this state. Therefore, there is no statute to construe making any such provision; and when left to judicial construction of the policy of the state, this construction will be found not to be the uniform construction given by the supreme court of this state.

In the early case of Leech v. Cooley, 6 Smedes & M. 93, it was held, that where a testator, by his will in 1836, directed his slaves to be set free, and sent to Indiana or Liberia, as they might prefer, and directed also a sale of his property, and part of the proceeds to be paid to his slaves thus liberated, the will was held to be valid, and that the executor could proceed with its execution; and that the bequest to the slaves was not void for want of capacity in the slaves to take. If they did not comply with the terms of the will, it was void; but if they did, it was valid. In the more recent case of Leiper v. Hoffman, 26 Miss. 615, it was held, where a conveyance was made to a negro over whom the owner had ceased to exercise acts of ownership, who had not been emancipated according to the laws of the state, but who afterwards removed to the state of Ohio, and by the acquiescence of the owner, and the residence in that state, afterwards became free, that she was entitled to the property conveyed, and to the right to bring and prosecute her suit for its recovery in this state. The learned judge, in delivering his opinion, held, that the principle announced in the case of Hinds v. Brazealle did not apply, and that the devise in that case was declared void, for the reason that the attempted manumission was intended to take effect in this state, in fraud of its laws; and in support of the principles decided in Leiper v. Hoffman, referred to the case of Ross v. Vertner, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 303, in which it is held, that it was not against the policy of the state of Mississippi for the owner of slaves to send them to Liberia, there to remain free, and that such a trust in his will was a valid trust.

But in the still more recent case of Shaw v. Brown, 35 Miss. 246, decided after the passage of the Code of 1857, the court held, that the owner of a slave domiciled in this state might lawfully remove him to another state, where emancipation is allowed, and manumit him in accordance with the laws of that state, and that the power so to do resulted from the absolute dominion of the owner over his property, and was not prohibited by the laws of this state, or against its policy, but was expressly recognized by the act of 1842; and I will here say, that the provision of the Code of 1857, when properly construed, does not conflict with the act of 1842 in this particular. Article 9, § 3, c. 33, which was doubtless in the mind of the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court in the cases of Mitchell v. Wells and Heirn v. Bridault, does not apply to the case of an owner of a slave taking him to another state, where emancipation is allowed, and emancipating him, but refers to a case where provision is made for the emancipation of a slave after the death of the owner, the reason for which doubtless was to prevent slaves from importuning their owners, when old, or infirm in body and mind, to make such provisions for them; and the still stronger reason, that when such provision was made, the slaves so provided for might, in their eagerness to obtain the boon of freedom, take means to hasten it by procuring the death of their owner and benefactor. Article 97, § 14, c. 33, provides, that if any person shall take any slave from this state for the purpose of emancipating such slave, or if, having been emancipated elsewhere, such emancipated negro shall return to this state, or be brought back by the former owner, such former owner shall in no case be allowed to protect such emancipated negro, or to claim any right or authority over them; but such negro shall be dealt with as a free negro being in the state without authority. This provision shows clearly that the legislature did not intend to prohibit persons from taking their slaves out of the state for emancipation, but only intended to prevent their return and residence here, by cutting asunder all the relation between the former owner and the slave after such manumission. If, in the case of Hinds v. Brazealle, the provisions of the Code of 1857 had been in force when the slave was taken to Ohio, the court would have held him free upon his return to Mississippi, but without lawful authority to remain. The case of Shaw v. Brown, whilst it decides that when the slave is taken by the owner to another state and manumitted, with the intention of an immediate return and residence in this state, it is a fraud against the laws of this state, and void, holds, that such intention must be immediately connected with, and made a part of the transaction of the emancipation; and also, that if the intention to return after manumission be abandoned, such intention, after abandonment, will not impair the rights of such free negro.

It is also held, in the same well-considered case, that it is not true that the states of the Union extend to each other no other rights than those given by the constitution of the United States; but on the contrary, the principles of private international law and the comity of nations apply with greater force, as between the inhabitants and citizens of the several states, than between foreign nations: and refers to the case of the Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 519.

It is further held in that case, that although free persons of African descent were not citizens of the states in which they resided, within the meaning of the constitution of the United States, yet, though they were an inferior and subordinate class, having no rights except such as those who held the power of government might choose to grant them, they were, nevertheless, subjects and inhabitants of, and derived their rights of person and property from the states of their residence; and, by the comity of nations, they were entitled to the enjoyment of their rights in every other state in the Union, unless the exercise thereof was positively prohibited, or incompatible with the laws and policy of the state in which they were claimed; and further, that free negroes of other states are not regarded as outlaws, banished people, or alien enemies in this state, and as such entirely without the protection of our laws; but such persons, being inhabitants of co-states, are entitled, upon reasons of comity, to enjoy here all the rights secured to them in the place of their domicile which are not positively prohibited by law, or contrary to the public policy. And that the ingress and residence in this state of free negroes from other states was prohibited, but that the reason of that policy was in reference only to their presence and residence here, and in consequence of their improper influence with the slaves in this state, and the force of their example in producing discontent and insubordination in the slaves; and hence they were only debarred from exercising here such rights as required their personal presence. And that a free negro of another state might, therefore, lawfully be a legatee of a pecuniary bequest, which is directed by the will to be raised by the sale of the testator's plantation and slaves, and paid to the legatee out of the state,—just the provision made in the will of Colonel Mathews. Indeed, it is probable that this will was made with a full knowledge of this decision, the decision being made in April, 1858, and the will in the February following. The principles laid down in the case of Shaw v. Brown, are not in conflict with any decision made in the state, or with any law of the state, but are sustained both by the decisions in the cases stated, and the statutes, with the exception of the cases of Heirn v. Bridault, and Mitchell v. Wells, the weight of which as authority, is greatly weakened when it is a matter of public history that they were made during a time of great public excitement between the people of the slaveholding and non-slaveholding states; in none of which was this excitement greater than our own.

Judges, no matter how learned they may be, and honest of purpose, are subject to like influences with other men, and it would be strange if under such excitement and pressure of public opinion, they would not sometimes come to conclusions to which they would not come under other circumstances. But this is not the only reason that goes to weaken the weight of these cases as authority. While, so far as they related to the cases then before the court, they were the judgment of the court, and to be respected as such, yet the conclusions to which the majority of the court came were not those to which all the members of the court arrived. The learned judge who had delivered the opinion of the court in the cases of Leiper v. Hoffman, and Shaw v. Brown, was so convinced of the incorrectness of many of the opinions expressed that he deemed it his duty to deliver well-considered dissenting opinions in each case, in which the reasons given by him were then and are still to my mind much more convincing and satisfactory. The decisions of the court of the state as to her laws and public policy, to be authority, must have been continuous and uniform. Those that are conflicting, and especially those made under public excitement and pressure of public opinion, have been held by the supreme court of the United States not binding on that court; nor are they on this. In the case of Pease v. Peck, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 595, Mr. Justice Grier, in delivering the opinion of the court, uses this language: "When the decisions of the state court are not consistent, we do not feel bound to follow the last, if it is contrary to our own convictions; and much more so is that the case when, after a long course of consistent decisions, some new light suddenly springs up, or an excited public opinion has elicited new doctrines subversive of former safe precedent." The same doctrine is held in recent cases in Wallace.

I am satisfied, from a careful examination of the facts and the law bearing on this point, that the complainants are entitled to have the trusts in their favor in the will of the testator executed, unless they are barred therefrom by the proceedings had in the probate court of Warren county, affirmed in the high court of errors and appeals. The defendants' counsel insist that they are; and this is the third question presented. It is insisted that the will directed the entire estate to be converted into money, and that such direction made the bequest personal, and not real estate; and that such being the case, the executor was the only necessary party before the court; and that the decree of that court declaring the complainants slaves, and incapable of taking under the will, is conclusive, and bars them from any right under the will; and numerous authorities are referred to to sustain this position. It is conceded that the general rule is, that real estate directed to be sold and converted into money will be treated as money, and money directed to be vested in the purchase of real estate will be treated as real estate. It is also true that the executor, as against all persons claiming the personal estate other than as legatees or distributees, does represent the personal estate, and none others need be made parties, as the executor represents the legatees or distributees, and also the interest of creditors, if the claimant is other than a creditor; and the judgment for or against him, in his representative capacity, binds those whom he represents; but after the debts and all other claims upon the property or fund are satisfied, and nothing remains but to appropriate the residue to the legatees or distributees, the executor ceases to be a representative, and becomes simply a bailee, holding the property or funds for those who are of right entitled to it; and the question as to whom it may belong is one in which the claimants are alone interested. It is a rule of law, too well settled in this state to be controverted, that no one can be deprived of his interest by judicial judgment, without being, by himself or a proper representative, made a party to it, with an opportunity to defend his rights. Where there is a right, there must be a remedy. Thus, the statutes of the state provide that, before a guardian's, executor's, or administrator's final accounts shall be confirmed, all the parties in interest must have been first cited to appear, and have an opportunity to show cause to the contrary, if any they have, why the same shall not be done, and for the reason the questions involved are alone between those entitled to the estate and the fiduciary agent in whose hands it has been placed. And when proceedings are to be had for the division or distribution of the estate or fund, all parties in interest must be before the court, because they, and they only, are interested in the decree that the court may pronounce. I am aware of no case in which a decree has been held binding upon one claiming an interest in an estate as legatee or distributee, who had not in some way been made a party to it, and by which decree he was deprived of his interest and right in the thing claimed.

There is no dispute as to the validity of this will, so far as to the forms of the law being complied with, and the testamentary capacity of the testator, or the validity of the other devises and bequests therein. The contest was one in which those claiming to be heirs at law and next of kin of the testator were parties on the one side, and these complainants and the bank on the other. These complainants were in no way made parties to it, and cannot in any way be bound by it. If they could have been bound by it, it would have had the effect of reducing them again to a state of slavery for life, without giving them a day in court—a proposition that would not, upon calm reflection, even in that day of excitement, have been maintained by any jurist. Indeed, the very Code, the provisions of which have been so earnestly invoked to sustain the defense, makes provision that any one held in slavery who claims to be free, may assert that right in the courts of this state; and makes provision for the protection of the slave against his master during the litigation. The rules of law and reasons against this point of defense are so palpable, reference to authority or further comment is unnecessary; and it must be held that the trusts under this will in favor of the claimants, as far as it can be done, must be enforced and executed. The will was admitted to probate on April 25, 1859, and was and has been notice to all the world of the trusts and provisions therein made: Consequently these heirs and next of kin of Colonel Mathews, and those who held under them, must be held chargeable with notice of the rights of claimants under the will. It cannot be held that their assignees are protected by the decree in the probate court, for they must be held to know the whole proceeding, and that it was without notice to complainants, and that they were not bound by it, for the reasons already stated. It is, however, contended by defendants' counsel, that this court can render no decree in this cause in favor of the complainants without having all the heirs at law of Colonel Mathews before it, who would have been entitled to the estate after payment of the debts and other legacies, had he died intestate, and that most of them being nonresidents of the state, have not been, and cannot be made parties, and that their interests are so blended that no decree can be rendered against those who are parties that will do justice to them. There is no controversy between the persons provided for in the will. The will being established and the complainants being entitled to the trust in their behalf, there are no parties in interest except those who have had the estate in possession. I am aware of no law or rule which requires the heirs at law and next of kin of a testator to be made parties to a proceeding to enforce the trusts created by the will, and for the very plain reason that they have no interest in it. Indeed, rule L., adopted by the supreme court, expressly provides that they shall not be made parties; but in a bill to establish the will, and not for the enforcement of the trusts in it, then they may be parties; and such will be found to be the rule in all equitable proceedings. It is very different from a proceeding against those entitled to the trusts under the will; as we have seen, beneficiaries under the will are the parties directly interested.

The result is, that as these complainants were in no way before the court when Springer the executor's final account was confirmed, they were not bound by it, and he must account for the estate that went into his hands, and the administrator with the will annexed must account for the estate that went into his hands. The property, real and personal, that remains, must be sold, and the proceeds loaned at interest, or vested in safe securities until, as provided by the will, the complainants shall become twenty-one years of age; or, if Caroline shall marry, her portion then to be paid to her. There having been a misdescription of the bank intended as the custodian, and, upon the contingency mentioned, the beneficiary under the will, this part of the provision of the will must fail. If, however, any of the specific legacies under the will have not been satisfied, and are chargeable upon the fund to be raised as aforesaid, they must be first paid; whether such is the case or not, will be a subject of future inquiry. Decree accordingly.

MATHEWSON v. SPRAGUE et al.

[1 Curt. 457.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1853.

GUARDIAN AND WARD—AD LITEM—OPPOSING INTERESTS—PROBATE COURT—JURISDICTION—NOTICE—WILLS OF LAND.

1. A statute guardian cannot represent his ward in court, in a matter where his interest is opposed to that of the ward, except by force of some statute authority, or by an appointment by the court; and no court would appoint such a guardian ad litem.

2. The court of probate has only a special and limited jurisdiction, and must act in the manner prescribed by statute; otherwise its acts are void. If it make a decree without notice, when the statute requires notice, a party entitled to notice may treat its decree as void.

[Cited in U. S. v. Hall (N. M.) 21 Pac. 86.]

3. The 10th section of act of Rhode Island of 1822, so far as it respects the service of notice to wards on their guardians, is repealed.

4. In Rhode Island the probate court has exclusive jurisdiction of the probates of wills of lands.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

This was an action of ejectment to recover an undivided part of four lots of land, situate in Cranston and Johnston. The plaintiff [George Mathewson] proved that William Sprague died seised of the lands, on the 27th of March, 1834, and it was admitted that he left three children, William, Amasa, and Almira, and that the plaintiff was one of four children of his daughter Susanna, who died in the lifetime of her father. The plaintiff, together with one sister and two brothers, were all minors, at the decease of their grandfather, and Amasa Sprague was their statute guardian. The defendants claimed under the will of William Sprague, and offered to put it in evidence. The plaintiff objected, because it had not been duly proved and allowed by the court of probate. On examining the will and its probate, it appeared, that William and Amasa Sprague, the testator's two sons, were executors and residuary devisees and legatees, and that far the larger part of the testator's property, including his lands, was devised and bequeathed to them. And on the production of the decree of the probate court, it also appeared that the will was presented by the executors for probate three days after the testator's death, and that the court dispensed with notice, by reason of the written consent of all parties known to the court to be interested, and residing within the state, that consent being given for the plaintiff, and his sister and brothers by Amasa Sprague, their guardian.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The questions are, whether the probate of this will is defective, and if so, whether that defect renders the decree void, or only voidable by some appropriate proceeding to be had in that matter, by appeal or otherwise, as provided by law. To enable a statute guardian to bind his ward by a proceeding in a court of justice, some statute authority must be found for his act. The statutes of the several states on this general subject are not uniform, but I am not aware that any where the statute guardian is made, generally, competent to represent his ward in legal proceedings. The general rule certainly is, that a guardian ad litem is to be appointed for that purpose. 1 Johns. 509; 10 Johns. 486; 8 Cow. 365; 3 Chit. Gen. Prac. 288. And this rule extends to probate courts. Hart v. Gray [Case No. 6,152]. It is very clear that no court would appoint the statute guardian, guardian ad litem, if his interest were directly opposed to that of the ward. Parker v. Lincoln, 12 Mass. 16; Noyes v. Barker, 4 N. H. 406.

The defendants' counsel do not assert that Amasa Sprague, who was one of the residuary legatees and devisees under the will, and, therefore, strongly interested to procure its probate, could, as statute guardian, represent and bind his wards, in that proceeding, unless some authority to do so can be found in the statute law of Rhode Island; but they urge that such authority is found in an act passed in 1822, and found in the Digest of 1822, p. 214. The 10th section of this act was as follows: "That previous to the rendering of any order or decree in any matter before them, the said court of probate shall give to all known parties interested, living within the state, at least three days' notice, that they may be heard thereon; which notice shall be served by the town-sergeant, or constable, or the sheriff or his deputy, by reading the same to the party, if found, or otherwise by leaving an attested copy at the last and usual place of abode of such party; and when infants or wards are interested, notice aforesaid shall be served on their respective guardians; or such court may give notice, as aforesaid, to all parties, by advertisement printed three successive weeks in some newspaper printed within this state." And the section then proceeds to declare the effects of an appeal upon the different kinds of decrees made by probate courts.

The first section of the act of January 20, 1824 (Pub. Laws R. I. 578), repeals so much of the tenth section of the said act as provides for the manner of giving notice. The second section requires, that previous to the rendering of any order or decree in any matter before them, the court of probate shall cause all parties known to them to be interested, living within the state, to have notice. It then prescribes different modes of giving notice, and then provides that if all such parties shall have given their consent in writing, the court may proceed without notice. It is argued that the clause in this tenth section, respecting the service of notice on guardians, is not repealed; and that if, by law, notice was to be served on the guardian, it was competent for him to consent to proceed without notice. I do not know that this necessarily follows, especially in a case like the present. It can hardly be supposed the law intended that a guardian, interested against his ward, would represent him in court; it must have expected that the effect of a notice to his ward, served on him, would be, that he would take care that his ward was properly represented in court by another; and not that he would consent to have the court proceed instanter, without actual notice to the ward, and without such fit representation being provided for by the ward, or his friends, or the court. And it does not seem to me that an authority to take a legal notice, of a length prescribed by law, for the ward, necessarily, and in all cases implies an authority to shorten the time and agree to a proceeding instanter. But it is not necessary to rest upon this; for I think this clause in the tenth section is repealed. The repeal is, of so much of the tenth section, as provides for the manner of giving notice. This is not a repeal of the whole section; but besides the first part of the section which relates to notices, there is another part which relates to the effect of an appeal. This satisfies the restrictive words, "so much," &c.; and though it is only what relates to the manner of giving notice which is repealed, yet the clause in question, which provides a manner of giving notice to wards by serving on their guardians, is clearly within the description of the part repealed. My opinion is, that this guardian was not empowered by any statute to consent in writing for his ward, and consequently, that the proceeding was irregular. And I think it very clear, that this irregularity was of such a nature to render the decree utterly void, as against this plaintiff.

A court of probate has only a special and limited jurisdiction. And being expressly required by statute, before making any decree, to cause those interested to have notice, if it proceeds to make a decree without complying with this requisition of law, any party entitled to notice, may treat such a decree as void; and this upon several grounds. 1. Because the court has not jurisdiction to determine the rights of such parties. This was held by the supreme court, in Harris v. Hardiman, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 344, in respect to a court of common law, which had rendered a judgment by default, without notice. And in numerous cases the same law has been applied to courts of probate. 11 Mass. 507; 5 Pick. 343; 18 Pick. 115; 3 Cush. 352; Hart v. Gray [supra]. 2. This court being of a special and limited jurisdiction can do no binding act which is prohibited by statute, and it is prohibited to make a decree without notice. 2 Mass. 120; 7 Mass. 70; 4 Mass. 117; 11 Mass. 513, 514, and the cases there cited. 3. The plaintiff could not appeal, for he had no notice of the decree; and no writ of error will lie; whenever a person interested, cannot have remedy according to law, by writ of error or appeal, he may avoid the judgment or decree by plea and proof; that is, whenever it is set up to affect his rights, he may aver its nullity. 11 Mass. 513, and cases there cited; 17 Mass. 91; 2 Metc. [Mass.] 138.

It has been argued, that though this may be so in cases affecting the person, these principles are not applicable to a decree of probate of a will. That this was a proceeding in rem; and when the will was filed the court obtained jurisdiction, and its decision that the guardian could consent for the ward, though it may have been erroneous, was an error occurring in the exercise of its jurisdiction. It is true, the proceeding is, in some sense, in rem; but so was the proceeding in 11 Mass. 507, where this subject was very carefully considered, and in 4 Mass. 117, and 7 Mass. 70, and 17 Mass. 91. These were decrees of partitions, which were strictly in rem. And there is no sound reason for any distinction between decrees in rem and in personam. In The Mary, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 126, 142, 144, the supreme court, speaking of proceedings in rem, say: "Notice of the controversy is necessary in order to become a party; and it is a principle of natural justice, of universal obligation, that before the rights of an individual be bound by a judicial sentence, he shall have notice, express, or implied, of the proceedings against him. Where these proceedings are against the person, notice is served personally, or by publication; where they are in rem notice is served on the thing itself." In Bradstreet v. Neptune Ins. Co. [Case No. 1,793], Mr. Justice Story held such a proceeding void, for want of notice of specific allegations; and he uses this language: "I hold, therefore, that if it does not appear upon the face of the record of the proceedings in rem, that some specific offense is charged, for which the forfeiture in rem is sought, and that due notice of the proceedings has been given, &c., it is not a judicial sentence, &c." Yet, in that case, the vessel proceeded against was within the jurisdiction of the court. The case in 4 N. H. 406, is also directly in point. Nor can it be maintained that this error occurred in the exercise of jurisdiction. It is true, the probate court, on the receipt of the will, has jurisdiction for the purpose of placing and retaining the will on its files, and issuing the proper notices to the parties in interest, and causing witnesses to be summoned and sworn, and taking all steps preliminary to a hearing; but it has not jurisdiction to make a decree, until all parties, entitled by law to notice, have been duly notified; and if it proceed to make a decree without notice, it acts without authority, and its decree is void. It is of no importance, that it decided that notice was not necessary in the particular case, because the guardian had consented for the ward. If notice was necessary, by law, the court had no power to dispense with it, and whether it thought the dispensing power existed, or what were its reasons for thinking so, are immaterial. The result is, that this will has not been proved.

After this decision had been given, the defendants' counsel offered to prove the will in this action; but THE COURT ruled, that the only tribunal competent to receive the evidence, and pass on the probate of the will, was the court of probate; that the decree of that court, admitting or refusing probate, is conclusive, both as respects lands and personalty, and its jurisdiction over the question of probate is exclusive. The defendants' counsel then moved for a continuance to enable the defendants regularly to offer the will for probate to the proper court, and it was granted; THE COURT being satisfied that the defect in the proceedings was not occasioned by any fraud, but was merely a mistake, which the defendants ought to have opportunity to correct.

CONTRACTS—LEX LOCI CONTRACTUS—REMEDY—LEX FORI.

1. The law of the contract must be regarded and enforced by all courts, wherever suit may be brought.

2. But this law can not embrace the remedy. The remedy belongs to the state where it is brought.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This case is submitted to the court, on the following facts: The judgment upon which the land in question was sold was for a note in Cincinnati, dated on the 5th day of September, 1839, executed by the defendant to Caroline White, etc. The judgment was rendered in Indiana, 7th day of October, 1841, and was replevied by Amos S. Wells, on the 23d day June, 1842, fi. fa. issued and delivered to the sheriff, and on the 12th July, 1842, the land was valued, under the provisions of the statute, at $1200; on the 15th of August, 1842, the land was offered for sale and a return made, "no sale for want of bidders." On the 3d of July, 1844, the plaintiff's lessor purchased the land for $161, without regard to the appraisement laws. He the lessor of the plaintiff then being the owner of the judgment by assignment. On the 28th day of December, 1846, the sheriff made a deed for the land. It is now worth $800.

The question which arises from the above facts is, whether the sale made by the sheriff, of the land in question, without regard to the valuation laws, is void. The statute of Indiana, approved 13 February, 1841, provides, that no lands shall be sold for less than one-half their value, and that to be determined by appraisers under oath. This land sold for $160, less than half its appraised value, and less than half its real value as agreed. At the time the law required real estate to sell for its full value. Rev. Code 1843, p. 1044. This case is supposed to have been decided by this court in the case of Smith v. Atwood [Case No. 13,006]. In that case a motion was made to set aside the return of the marshal, and that he be directed to collect the money under the laws of Pennsylvania, on the ground that the note on which the judgment was entered was made in Pennsylvania. The court overruled the motion. That was the decision given in the case referred to.

The case now before us calls upon the court to decide whether the laws of Ohio, where this note was made, shall control the execution on a judgment rendered in Indiana. And it must be admitted that the doctrine laid down in the case of McCracken v. Hayward, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 606, sustains the position taken, that the laws of Ohio must govern. In that case the court says, "the obligation of the contract between the parties, was to perform the promises and undertakings contained therein; the right of the plaintiff was to damages for the breach thereof, to bring suit and obtain a judgment, to take out and prosecute an execution against the defendant, till the judgment was satisfied pursuant to the existing laws of Illinois. Those laws, (that is the laws of the remedy), giving those rights, were as perfectly binding on the defendant, and as much a part of the contract, as if they had been set forth in its stipulations, in the very words of the law, relating to judgments and executions." No one can mistake the principle here laid down. It incorporates the remedy into the contract, as constituting an essential part of it. This being the rule, in regard to the remedy, we are not to look to the laws in force at the time it is actually sought, but we must refer back to the date of the contract, and inquire what laws were then in force. The legislature may have repealed them, but the simple act of making the contract keeps them in force, as a remedy, in defiance of legislative power. This, looking to the remedy only, is a startling position; and if it have no other merit, is certainly novel. We know, practically, that some of our state legislatures make, almost annually, alterations in remedial laws. How these different modes would work, all remaining in force as laws of contracts, remains to be seen. It would, certainly, greatly increase the perplexities of all sheriffs and marshals, and others who are called upon to perform similar duties. But the principle does not end here. The contract brings into any state where suit may be brought upon it, the remedy which the law gave in the state where it was entered into. This is clearly within the decision. And this places the law of the remedy, not only above the legislative control of the state where the suit is brought, but the contract brings into the state new remedies, of other states, never having been recognized in the state where they are to be enforced. And in carrying out such a principle, it might happen, and no doubt would occur, that the means of giving effect to a foreign remedy, legalized by the contract, do not exist in the state. Will the foreign law, brought into a state by the contract, enable the court or the parties to institute the necessary agencies to give it effect? The case in Illinois where the contract was made and enforced, gave some plausibility to the principles laid down in the decision; but it must be seen by every one who examines the subject, that the principle can not be carried out. It is impracticable, and can not be enforced in numerous cases. In the present case the laws of Ohio can not be recognized in Indiana, in giving a different remedy from the existing law here. No difficulties arise in giving effect, in any state to what is properly called the law of the contract, in contradistinction to the law of the remedy. The above decision confounds the two which are distinct in their nature and obligation, and treats them as one. In this, in my judgment, the error of the decision consists.

In the case before us, the note was given to a firm in Cincinnati, and payment was to be made there. We look to Ohio for the rate of interest, and also if there were indorsements, to the demand of payment and protest, and notice required by the law of Ohio. But as the remedy has been sought in Indiana, the laws of Indiana must govern. Not the laws in force at the date of the contract, for it having been made in Ohio, by no possible construction, could have had any reference to the laws of Indiana. Those laws are invoked for the first time in bringing the suit, and the law in force, regulating execution at the time judgment was rendered, must govern the case.

Case No. 9,280.

MATILDA v. MASON et al.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 343.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1822.[2]

SLAVERY—SUIT FOR FREEDOM—JURY—PREJUDICES—PRESUMPTION OF COMPLIANCE WITH LAW—LAPSE OF TIME.

1. In suits for freedom the court will not question the jurors, as they are called up to be sworn, as to their prejudices or prepossessions in favor of freedom, but leave the parties to their challenges.

2. A person relying upon the proviso in the Virginia law in favor of persons coming to reside in Virginia, and bringing their slaves with them and taking a certain oath, must produce competent testimony to prove that the terms and conditions of the proviso had been complied with, and in the absence of all testimony, no presumption can arise from lapse of time, to supply the defect of the testimony.

This was a petition for freedom [by the negress Matilda against Mason & Moore], founded upon an importation from Maryland to Virginia in the year 1792.

When the jury was about to be sworn, Mr. Jones, for defendants, stated that it had been an old practice in this court, in suits for freedom, to ask each juror, before he was sworn, the following questions: (1) Have you any conscientious scruple which disinclines you to find a verdict against the petitioners for freedom, and inclines you to find a verdict in their favor, even when the law and evidence, upon strict legal principles, are against them? (2) Do you consider yourself in conscience, and upon principle, bound to find a verdict in favor of the petitioner, if the evidence be doubtful?

[2] [Reversed in 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 590.]

No objection to these questions was made by the petitioner's counsel, and the court did not, at the moment, object to them. The questions were put, and some of the jurors stated that they did not feel indifferent in such cases, and were set aside.

But THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, not giving any opinion), having referred to the cases of Reason v. Bridges [Case No. 11,617], in this court at December term, 1807, and Joice v. Alexander [Id. 7,435], at December term, 1808, and Davis v. Wood [Id. 3,659], at December term, 1813, said, that this case must not be drawn into precedent, as the court did not mean to sanction such a practice; believing that the rights of the parties are sufficiently protected by the right of peremptory challenge given by the statute, and by the common-law right to challenge for cause. That the court was not aware of any precedent for such a practice, and was not inclined now to adopt it.

Upon the trial, the facts, as stated in the bill of exceptions, appeared to be, that before December, 1792, James Craik removed into the county of Fairfax in Virginia, with intent to settle therein, and to become a citizen of Virginia, and did so settle and become a citizen of Virginia, and continued to reside therein till his death in 1814. That at the time of his removal he brought the petitioner, she then being his slave, with him into Virginia, and there held her and her children as his slaves until his death, when he bequeathed them to his widow, who in 1814 removed from Fairfax county into the county of Alexandria in this District, with her said slaves, and continued there to hold them as her slaves until her death in 1815, when she bequeathed them to the wives of the defendants Mason and Moore, who were then inhabitants of the District of Columbia. That all the magistrates who were in commission in the county of Fairfax in the year 1792 were dead before the year 1818.

Upon which state of facts the petitioner's counsel, Mr. Turner and Mr. Taney, prayed the court to instruct the jury, "that if the defendant wishes to avail himself of the proviso in the 5th section of the act of 1785, c. 77, it is incumbent on him to produce competent testimony to prove that the said James Craik had complied with the terms and conditions of the said proviso; and that, in the absence of all testimony, no presumption can arise from lapse of time or other facts in the case agreed, to supply the defects of such testimony."

Mr. Turner and Mr. Taney, for the petitioner. This case is not subject to the ordinary rules of evidence. Queen v. Hepburn, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 298, Mr. Justice Duvall's opinion. No lapse of time can bar a claim for freedom. Even in ordinary cases lapse of time must be attended by corroborating circumstances. Butler v. Craig, 2 Har. & McH. 226; 1 Phil. 110. The burden of proof, that he had complied with the conditions of the proviso, rests on the master. Garnett v. Sam, 5 Munf. 542, 546; Rose v. Kennedy [Case No. 12,049], in this court, July term, 1801; Garretson v. Lingan [Id. 5,251], in this court, at April term, 1821,—where this court decided that no such presumption can arise from lapse of time against a slave who is incapable of asserting his right.

Mr. Jones and Mr. Lear, contrà, contended that a presumption that the oath was duly taken, arises from the lapse of thirty years since the petitioner was brought from Maryland into Virginia, and the long continued possession of the slaves by the defendants and their ancestors, without any question having been suggested as to that fact, and the death of all the magistrates of the county who could have administered the oath, of which no record, or even certificate, was required by the law. The 5th section of the act of 1785, c. 77, is a proviso that nothing in the act contained "shall be construed to extend to those who may incline to move from any of the United States, and become citizens of this, if, within sixty days after such removal he or she shall take the following oath before some justice of the peace of this commonwealth." The law does not require even that the oath shall be reduced to writing, and even if it were, and certified, the certificate would not be evidence, unless made so by the statute. If nothing but direct and positive testimony to the fact is sufficient evidence, and all the witnesses are dead, and the lapse of time raises no presumption, and the burden of proof is on the master, there is no security whatever for property of this description. The law is highly penal, and every man is presumed to be innocent till the contrary is proved. The presumption is in favor of duty; the negative must be proved. 1 Phil. Ev. 150, § 4.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, contrà) gave the instruction as prayed; but the jury found a verdict for the defendants. THE COURT granted a new trial without costs.

The cause came on again to be tried at April term, 1823, when the same instruction was given, and the jury found a verdict for the petitioners. The defendants took a bill of exceptions, which after stating the facts, and instruction given as above, proceeds thus: "And thereupon the defendants insisted and contended before the jury that the facts given in evidence as aforesaid, do not impose upon the defendants the necessity of proving by substantive evidence, that the said James Craik had taken the oath prescribed by the act of the general assembly of Virginia, passed in the year 1785, c. 77, within the time prescribed by that act; and that the jury, upon the said state of facts, ought not to find for the petitioner for the want of such substantive proofs on the part of the defendants. 2d. That the jury, under the circumstances so given in evidence, may presume that the said James Craik had taken the said oath in the prescribed time; but the court, upon the motion of the petitioners, overruled all the points so insisted upon and contended for by the defendants, and stopped the defendants' counsel from proceeding to maintain the points, or any of them, so insisted upon and contended for, before the jury, by the defendants."

Upon a writ of error the judgment in this case was reversed by the supreme court of the United States, and a venire facias de novo awarded. 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 590.

Memorandum. The case of Abraham v. Matthews, 6 Munf. 159, cited by Mr. Justice Johnson, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court, in this cause in 1827, was not brought to the notice of the court below.

The MATILDA A. LEWIS.

[5 Blatchf. 520.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 19, 1867.

OFFICERS—SECRETARY OF WAR—ORDER PROHIBITING EXPORTATION—CARRIERS—SHIPPING—BILL OF LADING—FAILURE TO DELIVER—SEIZURE—LIABILITY.

1. The order of the secretary of war, of the 13th of May, 1863, directing the commanders of departments to prohibit the purchase and sale of horses, mules and live stock intended for exportation, and to cause the value of the same to be appraised, and the articles to be reported to the quartermaster-general, and to be taken and appropriated to the use of the government, and the order of the secretary of the treasury, of the 19th of May, 1863, to the collectors of customs, directing those officers to refuse clearances for the exportation of horses, mules and live stock, and to cause the detention of all animals attempted to be exported in violation of such orders, and to report the detention to the commander of the nearest military district, for his action, in pursuance of such order of the secretary of war, were invalid, as not being authorized by any act of congress.

2. Under said orders, live fowls were not embraced within the term "live stock."

3. Where live fowls were put on board of a vessel, at New York, for exportation to Havana, and three bills of lading were signed for them, one of which was retained by the master of the vessel, and two of which were delivered to the consignor, and forwarded to the consignee, who made an advance thereon, and afterwards the fowls were seized by the collector of customs, under said orders, and removed from the vessel, and the bill of lading in the hands of the master was cancelled by the consignor: held, in action by the consignee against the vessel, on the two bills of lading, to recover the amount of such advance, because of the non-delivery of the fowls as Havana, that the vessel was liable.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court, by Philip E. Desvernine and Anthony Desvernine against the barque Matilda A. Lewis, to recover the amount of an advance made by them to one C. Glass, on the bills of lading of a shipment of seventy-four coops of live fowls, made by Glass, by that vessel, from New York to Havana, on the 6th of October, 1863. The district court dismissed the libel, and the libellants appealed to this court.

Robert D. Benedict, for libellants.
Charles Donohue, for claimants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The main defence set up, in this case, is, that the shipment was illegal, and the contract arising out of the bills of lading void. It appears, from the proofs, that the secretary of war issued an order, on the 13th of May, 1863, to the several commanders of departments, reciting, that information had been received at the department, that sundry persons were purchasing horses and mules, within the United States, for exportation, contrary to the executive order of November, 1862, and, to the end that, during the war, the military resources of the government should not be withdrawn from the country, directing the commanders of departments to prohibit the purchase and sale of horses, mules and live stock intended for exportation, and to cause the value of the same to be appraised, and the articles to be reported to the quartermaster-general, and to be taken and appropriated to the use of the government. The claims against the government were to be adjusted by the quartermaster-general. On the 19th of the same month, the secretary of the treasury issued an order to the collectors of customs, referring to the above orders, and directing those officers to refuse clearances for the exportation of horses, mules and live stock, and to cause the detention of all animals attempted to be exported in violation of the orders, and to report the detention to the commander of the nearest military district, for his action, in pursuance of the order of the secretary of war. The fowls in question were seized by the collector of the port of New York, under the orders above cited. The goods had been put on board, bills of lading had been given, and the vessel had cleared, before the seizure of the vessel and the fowls. Two of the bills of lading had also been forwarded to the consignees of the goods, and the advance in question made by the agent of the consignees. After the seizure, the fowls were taken from the vessel, by an arrangement with the consignor and the custom-house officers, and the vessel was allowed to proceed on her voyage. The consignor cancelled the bill of lading in the hands of the master. The other two bills of lading had already been sent to the consignees, with advices of the advance made by their agent.

It is quite clear, that the defence to the claim for the advance on the bills of lading, and for the non-delivery of the goods at the port of destination, must rest on the validity of these orders. For, I agree that, if they can be upheld, and if the fowls are embraced within the term "live stock," the contract of shipment was illegal, and cannot be the foundation of a suit. Abb. Shipp. pt. 4, c. 13; and see Evans v. Hutton, 6 Jur. pt. 1, p. 1042. There is great difficulty, however, in upholding them. No act of congress has been referred to, nor have I found any, authorizing them. They amount, on the most mitigated construction that can be given to them, to an entire prohibition of the commerce of the country in the articles of horses, mules, cattle and sheep, all of which are confessedly within the scope of the orders—a commerce made lawful by our navigation laws and by treaty stipulations. This trade is absolutely suspended indefinitely; and, not only this, but the government, in the mean time, is made the general purchaser of all this description of property destined to a foreign market.

Moreover, if the construction given to the orders by the custom-house officers can be maintained, then I do not see but that all the domestic animals of the United States fell within the prohibition, and were taken out of the foreign commerce of the country. I am satisfied, however, that, upon a true and obvious interpretation, the article of fowls was not embraced within the scope of the orders, and that the custom-house officers misconstrued them. Indeed, it is due to the secretary to say that, on his attention being called to the subject, he disavowed the construction.

The cancellation of one of the bills of lading cannot protect the ship. The master should have had all the parts of the bills of lading delivered back to him or cancelled. The case is an unfortunate one, and hardship attends the decision, in either way in which the case may be decided; but I can only follow out the law of the case. The decree below must be reversed, and a decree be entered for the libellants.

District Court, D. Vermont. Nov. 14, 1877.

BANKRUPTCY — PETITION — REQUISITE NUMBER OF CREDITORS—PARTNERSHIP—ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—DEFAULT—HOW OPENED.

1. Where the requisite number of creditors join in a petition against a firm, it is not necessary that they should all be creditors of the firm.

2. The taking of partnership property, when the firm is insolvent, to pay a debt not a debt of the firm, although each of the partners may be liable for it, is an act of bankruptcy.

3. Where the requisite number of creditors have signed the petition, an adjudication will not be set aside on the ground that such petition was procured by the bankrupts as an involuntary one to avoid the necessity of procuring the assent of the necessary number of creditors in case of a deficiency of assets; there can be no legal fraud in procuring an adjudication on involuntary proceedings unless it should be followed by a discharge that could not be had on voluntary proceedings. An adjudication by default can only be opened at the instance of a party to the default.

[In the matter of E. L. Matot & Co., bankrupts.]

WHEELER, District Judge. This is a petition brought by several creditors of the bankrupts, setting forth in substance that the adjudication of bankruptcy of the bankrupts, heretofore made, was upon a creditor's petition; that the petitioning creditors were not, in fact, creditors of the firm; that the requisite number and amount did not join in the petition; that the acts of bankruptcy alleged did not in fact exist; and that the petition was procured by the bankrupts themselves as an involuntary one to avoid the necessity of procuring the assent of one-fourth in number, and one-third in value of the creditors to a discharge in case of a deficiency of assets for the purposes of a discharge on a voluntary petition, and praying that the adjudication be set aside. The petitioning creditors and the bankrupts have answered this petition, and it has been heard on the petition, answers, proofs, and argument of counsel. Upon the proofs it may be somewhat doubtful whether both of the petitioning creditors are creditors of the firm to any amount at all, and if they are to any amount whether they are so as to all the claims set forth in their petition; but it does appear that one of them is a firm creditor to some amount, and that the other is an individual creditor, at least of one of the firm to some amount. By section 5121, Rev. St. U. S., two or more persons who are partners in trade may be proceeded against on the petition of any creditor of the partners, and the partnership property applied to the payment of partnership, and the individual property to the payment of individual debts. This sufficiently shows that, if there was a sufficient number joined, the proceeding was a proper one as to both the firm and its members, and that under it there can be no appropriation of firm property to the payment of any other than firm creditors. It does not appear whether the requisite number did join or not, for it does not appear to what amount, if any, there are creditors other than the originally petitioning, and these petitioning creditors; and if these are all there are, these now petitioning were secured by attachment, and not entitled to be counted, and the requisite number did join. But whether they did or not it is conceded that the lack in number was not such as that this petition should prevail on that ground alone, and the establishment of the sufficiency in number establishes the propriety of proceeding against the firm, because, as before stated, they were proceeded against by at least one firm creditor. If firm property could be applied to individual debts before satisfying firm debts there would be more force to an objection that the petitioning creditors were not all firm creditors, but as such property cannot be so applied, and there is no question of distribution here now, it can have but little force. It does appear that partnership property was taken to pay a debt, not a debt of this partnership, strictly speaking, although it may be that each of the partners was liable for it, when the firm was insolvent, which constituted an act of bankruptcy within clause 7, § 5021, Rev. St. U. S. So that one of the acts of bankruptcy alleged did in fact exist.

If there was the requisite number of creditors to the petition, there could be no fraud by the proceeding on the ground of the want of them in respect to procuring a discharge without the requisite amount of assets, or the assent of the requisite number of creditors to entitle the bankrupts to a discharge, although they may have been instrumental in instituting the proceedings. And as it does not appear but that there was the requisite number, the foundation on which the fraud in this respect would rest does not appear on which to grant the petition, if that would be sufficient ground for granting it. Generally, the grounds on which such an adjudication can be set aside must be exceedingly few, if they exist at all in favor of creditors not parties. Of course a default, on which an adjudication was founded could be set aside in favor of the party defaulted for the same reasons that other defaults are set aside in favor of like parties, and new trials could be granted in bankruptcy proceedings in favor of parties to the former trials as in other proceedings. This adjudication was on a default, in proceedings substantially regular. The parties defaulted are satisfied. The law, whether justly or unjustly, required no notice to any others. They were not parties to the default, and as such, have no standing place to have it opened. The law goes further than to leave the finality and conclusiveness of the judgment to the ordinary rules pertaining to similar adjudications, and expressly declares that it shall be final. Act June 23, 1874, p. 213, § 13 [18 Stat. 182]. In the eye of the bankrupt acts, however it may be practically, it is no loss to creditors for their debtors to be adjudged bankrupts in bankruptcy proceedings, of which they have any right to complain. If the debtors turn out to be solvent, it is supposed that they will be paid in full, which is all they could ask; if insolvent, that they will be paid their ratable share with the others, which is all they can, justly to the others, claim. Hence, any person owing provable debts exceeding three hundred dollars in amount, may file a petition and be adjudged a bankrupt, and have his estate settled in bankruptcy proceedings, without making any creditor a party till after the adjudication. Rev. St. U. S. § 5014. So the debtor is supposed to be the only one interested in the question, whether he shall be adjudged a bankrupt or not in involuntary proceedings, and, in that view, the law provides for a trial in respect thereto between him and the petitioning creditors; and it emphasizes the result, as before mentioned, by providing that the judgment shall be final, as if to exclude interference up to that stage of the proceedings by others. As the bankrupt law contemplates the proceedings there could be no legal fraud in procuring an adjudication, unless it should be followed by a discharge that could not be had on voluntary proceedings. No intimation that collusion between a debtor, and less than the requisite number of his creditors, to procure his discharge without the co-operation of the requisite number, and without the necessary amount of assets, would be successful beyond remedy is intended. Perhaps his procurement of such proceedings, for such a purpose, would be good ground for refusing his discharge, which would be all he could gain, or any of his creditors lose, beyond what he could have on his own petition; and perhaps there would be other remedies. To point them out is not the present purpose. In this case it does not appear that there would be a deficiency of assets such as to make an involuntary petition preferabe for the bankrupts to a voluntary one; and without that it would be difficult to find collusion to avoid it. These now petitioning creditors, who, it seems to be considered, are partnership creditors, can have the partnership and individual creditors distinguished from each other, and the partnership and individual assets marshalled for their payment, and a discharge refused, if just grounds exist, and in that way obtain all that in view of the law, as it stands, and its purposes they are entitled to, without disturbing the judgment they complain of. The petitioners in this proceeding claim costs; but it is not clear that any are taxable. It is not a suit in which judgment can be rendered one way or the other; but is an application addressed rather to the discretion of the court. It may be that costs are taxable on such proceedings in the discretion of the court; but if so they are not taxable of right, probably, and, under the circumstances, none are attempted to be awarded. The petition is dismissed.

COLLISION—NEW YORK HARBOR—FOG—STEAMBOAT AND SLOOP.

Where a steamboat in the harbor of New York was proceeding in a dense fog, running close shut off, when she heard a fog horn off her starboard bow from a sloop which was working by sweeps, from an unsafe anchorage in the Narrows, towards the east shore of the bay, and on hearing the horn the engine of the steamboat was stopped, but was not backed, and she was allowed to drift, and the two vessels came in collision. Held, that the steamer was in fault for not backing; the sloop was not in fault for being under way in a fog.

[See The Aleppo, Case No. 157.]

In admiralty.

Benedict & Benedict, for libellant.

Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. On the afternoon of the 16th of March, 1868, the steamboat Matteawan bound from New York to Key Port, was proceeding down the bay in a dense fog, and the sloop Fame was working by sweeps from an unsafe anchorage in the Narrows to a place of greater safety, on the east shore of the bay. There was at the time but little wind. A fog horn was constantly blown from the sloop, and a whistle constantly sounded from the steamboat. While the steamboat was running shut off close, she heard the sloop's horn, and her engine was at once stopped, but no stern way was given her, and she was allowed to drift. Shortly, the sloop appeared through the fog a very short distance away. It was then too late for the steamboat to avoid her, and so the vessels came in contact. As to these facts, there is no dispute, but on the part of the claimant it is insisted that upon these facts, under the ruling of the circuit court in the case of The Sylph [Case No. 13,711], there can be no recovery, in as much as both vessels had undertaken to move in a dense fog.

The case of The Sylph, was a case of collision between two steamboats, in a fog, where both vessels stopped and were backing at the blow. The court below considered, that the nature of the blow indicated that The Sylph had not checked her way as much as possible, and she was accordingly in fault. The court above, however, held, that such negligence on the part of The Sylph could not be deduced from the evidence, and added, that the court would not feel bound to examine into conflicting testimony with great closeness, when both the vessels had deliberately undertaken to navigate the bay in a dense fog.

Neither the adjudication of the case of The Sylph [supra], nor the remark of the court, which I have quoted, have any bearing upon a case like this. Here it is shown by the pilot and engineer of the steamboat that, although they were running in a dense fog, and made aware of the presence of an approaching vessel by her horn, they omitted to give their vessel sternway, as they had abundant opportunity to do, but, on the contrary, allowed her to drift down upon the approaching vessel, and so caused the collision. In a fog, a steamboat cannot, under ordinary circumstances, take any chances; she must exercise all the precaution possible, and it was a clear duty on the part of the pilot of the steamboat, under the circumstances, on hearing the horn of the sloop, at once to give his vessel sternway, instead of which he allowed her to drift, and she thus came under the bows of the sloop. This negligence must render her liable for the damages sustained by the sloop. Let a decree be entered accordingly, with an order of reference to ascertain the amount.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—DIMINUTION—DRUNKENNESS—PERFORMANCE OF DUTY—ALLOWING CLAIM—DEFICIENCY IN CARGO.

[1. The drunkenness of a mate in the home and foreign ports does not bar his right to wages, unless such habits interfered with the performance of his duties, and prejudiced the vessel.]

[2. The commission of improprieties by the mate on board cannot be implied from their perpetration, however frequently and disgracefully, out of the ship.]

[3. The act of the master in allowing the mate, at the end of the voyage, his full claim for wages, and giving a draft therefor, imports that, if there was cause of complaint against the mate for intoxication, it was overlooked or forgiven.]

[4. Although it might be implied from his office that a mate was in charge of a vessel, and intrusted with receiving or unloading a cargo, yet he cannot be charged with a deficiency in the cargo in the absence of evidence that he was put to that duty, or proof that cargo was lost.]

[This was a libel by Ezra Matthew against Alfred S. Chase.]

BETTS, District Judge. The libellant sues for $83.80, the balance of wages due him as mate on the barque Samosett on a voyage from New York to Mobile, thence to Rotterdam, and back to this port. The answer admits the services, and that upon the wages agreed, after deducting payments, a balance would remain in favor of the libellant to the sum claimed, but it alleges in diminution of the demand, and also by way of recoupment to the whole amount, that the libellant did not perform his duty to the ship, but, on the contrary, at Rotterdam, while the barque was taking on cargo, and in the port of New York, while discharging cargo, he was frequently and habitually intoxicated, and guilty of gross neglect and carelessness in taking in and discharging cargo and watching the vessel, and that a large quantity of tin, of the value of $95, part of the cargo, was thereby short, and could not be found, and the respondent was compelled to pay and did pay for the same the sum of $95, and he insists he is entitled to be reimbursed the same from the wages due the libellant to the full amount. The testimony proves that the libellant was grossly intoxicated at Rotterdam, and drank to excess in New York while the vessel was unloading; but there is no proof that he at the time was in charge of the vessel, or was intrusted with receiving or unloading the cargo, or that he was intemperate whilst on board the vessel. Both these facts might probably be implied from his office, yet there should be some evidence that he was put to the duty of taking in cargo, in order to charge him with its deficiency, if any was subsequently proved to exist. There is however no evidence produced to the loss of cargo. The master averred it when called on to pay the wages, and sets up the charge in his answer, yet offers no evidence in suppport of the allegation. That branch of the defence must accordingly be laid out of the case.

The drunkenness of the libellant might have been ground for an abatement of wages, or even for a total denial of them, had it occurred on board, or the master made it cause of discipline, or even objection, during the voyage. It is not shown he did so; on the contrary, on the terminating of the voyage he made up the amount of wages, and gave the libellant an order on the owner for the payment of $81.76 in full thereof. This was an implied concession that no exceptions were taken to the conduct of the libellant in executing the duties of his office. The instance of intoxication proved occurred on shore, and habits of indulgence and excess when out of the ship might not be incompatible with a strict observance by the mate of his duties on board. At least no evidence is given that at any time on the voyage he was incapable of duty, or any way neglected it.

The libellant proves a good general character of long standing, and that he has been intrusted with the command of vessels on foreign voyages, and is a competent seaman, and man of respectable standing, and of superior capacity as a seaman.

These facts do not disprove that he was drunk in Rotterdam and New York, but I must also say the fact of such intoxication cannot of itself bar the libellant's right to wages; his irregular habits must also be proved to have interfered with the performance of his duties, and prejudiced the vessel. The act of the master in settling with the libellant after his discharge in New York, allowing his full claim for wages, in giving a written draft for the amount, imports that if he ever had cause of complaint against the mate for intoxication it had been overlooked or forgiven. I am bound therefore to consider the charge as raised because of the supposed deficiency of cargo, subsequently brought to light, and not as resting on any prejudice to the service of the vessel in the particular itself. Had the mate disqualified himself by intemperance, and thus neglected or insufficiently performed his duties, it would have been easy to make it appear by witnesses on board, and the court would certainly mark the misconduct by saving to the vessel all the indemnity which would be afforded by a subtraction of wages due. The commission of improprieties on board cannot be implied from their perpetration, however frequently and disgracefully, out of the ship. There must be a decree for the libellant to the amount of his wages admitted by the answer to be unpaid. Decree for $83.80 and costs to be taxed.

ALIENS—NATURALIZATION — ACT OF CONGRESS—STATE LAWS—RIGHT TO HOLD LAND.

1. An alien could not become a citizen of the United States, or of either of the states, in the year 1793, by taking the oaths, and otherwise complying with the requisitions of the naturalization laws of any one of the states.

2. An alien, as such, has a right, under the 6th section of the Maryland act of December 19, 1791, "concerning the territory of Columbia," &c. to purchase and hold lands in the county of Washington, D. C., and transmit the same to his alien heirs.

[This was an action by Matthew's lessee against Rae, Hayman and Lipsicum.]

Ejectment for lots in Georgetown, D. C. The plaintiff's lessors were aliens and claimed as heirs at law of James Redman, who was born in England, came to this country in 1793, and went through the forms of naturalization prescribed by the laws of Pennsylvania, passed in 1789, and by the law of Maryland, passed in 1779. Congress had passed a general naturalization law in the year 1790 [1 Stat. 103].

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion that Redman was not naturalized; the state naturalization laws being superseded, and annulled by the act of congress, whose jurisdiction upon that subject is, under the constitution of the United States, exclusive (Chirac v. Chirac, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 261), and that, according to the case of Spratt v. Spratt, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 343, the plaintiffs, although aliens, were entitled to recover.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—ALIEN—RIGHT TO DENY REMOVAL.

[Where all the requisites of the act of congress relative to removals have been complied with, the state court has no right to deny the removal; and, if it should so deny, all its subsequent acts in the cause are coram non judice and void.]

[Cited in Lange v. Benedict, 73 N. Y. 36; Sharp v. Gutcher, 74 Ind. 364.]

The defendant being an alien, and being sued before the state court of Oakland county, filed a petition at the first term to remove the cause into the circuit court of the United States. Bond was given, to which there was no objection, and it appeared that the matter in dispute exceeded the sum of five hundred dollars. The state court refused to permit the removal. This court held, that the requisites of the act of congress having been complied with in this case, the state court had no right to deny the removal. The law declares, that, under such circumstances, the state court shall proceed no further in the case. And the supreme court have held, that all subsequent proceedings in the state court are coram non judice. [Gordon v. Longest] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 101. But in this case, the complainant dismissed his bill. This we suppose he had a right to do, whether the cause be considered in the state court, or in this court.

CONTRACTS—GUARANTY—STOCK TRANSFER — GENUINENESS—BANKS—TRANSFER BY CASHIER.

1. It is within the general authority of the cashier of a bank to sign, in its behalf, a blank transfer upon a certificate of stock in the name of the bank, held by it as collateral security for a loan, and deliver the certificate to the pledgor on payment of the loan.

[Cited in Com. v. Reading Sav. Bank, 133 Mass. 22.]

2. The signing a transfer in blank on a certificate of stock is a warranty of the genuineness of the certificate.

3. A stock certificate originally for two shares of stock in the name of C, which had been by him fraudulently altered so as to purport to be for two hundred shares in the name of a certain bank as collateral, was received in good faith by the bank from C, as collateral security for a loan to him. On payment of the loan by C, the cashier of the bank, as such, signed a transfer in blank upon the back of the certificate, and delivered it to C. Afterwards, the plaintiff in good faith received the same certificate from C, as collateral security for a loan then made to him. The plaintiff's loan was not paid. On suit by him against the bank to recover the amount of his loss, held, that the bank was liable.

Action at law [by Nathan Matthews]. The case was heard by the court upon an agreed statement of facts, the material parts of which are stated in the opinion. The first count in the declaration was as follows: "And the plaintiff says the defendant was possessed of a certain instrument in writing, purporting to be a certificate of stock issued to the defendant by the Boston and Albany Railroad Company, a copy whereof is hereto annexed, and pretended to be entitled thereunder to two hundred shares in the capital stock of the said Boston and Albany Railroad Company; and the defendant, in consideration of the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars paid to defendant by the plaintiff, on or about the twenty-eighth day of April, 1873, assumed the right to sell, and did sell, and agreed to deliver to the plaintiff, two hundred shares in the capital stock of the said Boston and Albany Railroad Company of the par value of one hundred dollars each, said stock being then and now worth in the market more than its par value; and, as evidence of such sale, and for the alleged purpose of transferring such stock, assigned in writing, and transferred and delivered to the plaintiff, said pretended certificate of stock, and thereby warranted its genuineness; and that the defendant was proprietor of the shares of stock therein described, and could convey a good title thereto by virtue of said assignment. A copy of said instrument of assignment is hereto annexed, the same having been indorsed on said pretended certificate.[2] But the plaintiff says that the defendant did not own at the time of said sale, and of the assignment of said pretended certificate, the two hundred shares of stock so sold and agreed to be delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff, and that the pretended certificate so purporting to have been issued to the defendant by said Boston and Albany Railroad Company was never in fact issued to the defendant by said company, and was not genuine, but was false, forged, and void, and the defendant was not the proprietor of the shares of stock therein described, and that the transfer and assignment of said pretended certificate conveyed no right or title in or to any shares of stock to the plaintiff, and was of no value, and that the plaintiff has received no consideration for the money so paid by him to the defendant. Wherefore, the defendant owes the plaintiff said sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, so paid by the plaintiff to the defendant, with interest thereon, but has never paid the same or any part thereof, though payment thereof has been duly demanded."

Dwight Foster and G. W. Baldwin, for plaintiff.

The defendant corporation, by signing the blank form of transfer, so far warranted the genuineness of the certificate that it is estopped from setting up the forgery as a defence to this action. This is well settled, as respects the transfer by indorsement of forged notes, checks, bills, and other negotiable instruments. State Bank v. Fearing, 16 Pick. 533; Hortsman v. Henshaw, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 184; Bank of U. S. v. Bank of Georgia, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 333; Redf. & B. Lead. Cas. 650; Story, Prom. Notes, 380; Chit. Bills. 242; Bigelow, Estop. 428, and cases cited. Certificates of stock, "although neither in form or character negotiable paper, approximate to it as nearly as possible." Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 377. The legal title passes by an assignment of the certificate and delivery, although there is no transfer upon the books of the corporation. McNeil v. Tenth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 325. And certificates so assigned are articles of commerce, passing from hand to hand like commercial paper. Leitch v. Wells, 48 N. Y. 585. The form of assignment printed on the back of the certificate, if signed in blank by the stockholder to whom the same was issued, may be filled up by a subsequent purchaser of the stock. Bridgeport Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 30 Conn. 273; In re Tahiti Cotton Co., L. R. 17 Eq. 279; Lickbarrow v. Mason, 2 Term R. 63. This establishes a direct relation between the last holder and the original owner of the certificate, and gives to the transaction the effect of negotiability, so far as is needed to justify this action.

The plaintiff makes out a prima facie case by putting in evidence a certificate purporting to stand in the name of the defendant, and duly transferred by it to him, for which he has paid in good faith a valuable consideration, and which turns out to be worthless. When that is done, the defendant cannot set up the falsity of its own representations by way of answer and defence, "as against them the plaintiff's case, though defective if the whole truth could come out, shall prevail." Gibson v. Minet, 1 H. Bl. 611. "Where the instrument is not negotiable, the maker may be affected by an estoppel in pais, if it be transferred upon his representation of its validity." Mechanics' Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 13 N. Y. 638. It is upon this representation that this action is founded, and not upon the forged certificate as the instrument containing the contract. The plaintiff's right of action rests on equitable grounds. He has advanced money in good faith upon the security of a forged title represented by the defendant to be genuine, and, although the forgery was known to neither, the loss should fall on the person who, without due caution, took the instrument from the wrong-doer, and afterwards gave it currency. Bank of Commerce v. Union Bank, 3 Comst. [3 N. Y.] 230; Cabot Bank v. Morton, 4 Gray, 156. "It is not necessary that the party should design to mislead. If the act was calculated to mislead, and has actually misled another, acting in good faith, it is enough." Manufacturers & Traders' Bank v. Hazard, 30 N. Y. 226. Had the bank desired to limit its liability, the name of Coe should have been inserted. By neglecting to do this, the case is brought within the rule that "where one of two innocent persons must suffer, he who has put it in the power of another to do the wrong must suffer." Wood v. Steele, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 82. It is not necessary that the false representation, which is the foundation of this suit, should have been made to the plaintiff directly. It is sufficient "if it is made to the public generally, with a view to its being acted on, and the plaintiff, as one of the public, acts on it, and suffers damage thereby." Richardson v. Silvester, L. R. 9 Q. B. 36; Swift v. Winterbotham, L. R. 8 Q. B. 253; Gerhard v. Bates, 2 El. & Bl. 476.

The essential principle established by the authorities is, that one who affixes his signature thereby warrants or authenticates the genuineness of the instrument to which it is affixed. Van Duzer v. Howe, 21 N. Y. 531; Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 645, 650; Garrard v. Haddan, 67 Pa. St. 82; Dair v. U. S., 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 4; Sprigg v. Bank Mt. Pleasant, 10 Pet. [35 U. Liability for injury sustained by reason of representations, carelessly made, which have proved false, has been enforced. New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30; Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397; Lobdell v. Baker, 3 Metc. [Mass.] 469; Preston v. Mann, 25 Conn. 131; Slim v. Croucher, 1 De Gex, F. & J. 518; Pickard v. Sears, 6 Adol. & E. 474; Ramshire v. Bolton, L. R. 8 Eq. 294; Hooker v. Hubbard, 97 Mass. 175; Collen v. Wright, 8 El. & Bl. 647; 2 Kent, Comm. 490, and note; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 270.

The fact that the signature of the defendant was given for the purpose of transferring title to the instrument, establishes a contract of sale between the defendant and the plaintiff, and brings the case within authorities which hold that the vendor of a specific chattel is responsible if the article be not a genuine article of the kind which the seller represents it to be. Gompertz v. Bartlett, 2 El. & Bl. 854; Jones v. Ryde, 5 Taunt. 488; Gurney v. Womersley, 4 El. & Bl. 133; Henshaw v. Robins, 9 Metc. [Mass.] 86; 2 Kent, Comm. 480, and note.

The defendant was negligent: 1. In trusting to Coe, the borrower, to obtain a transfer to them, from the Boston and Albany Railroad Company, of the two hundred shares of stock, instead of sending, themselves, to the office of the corporation to obtain the certificate. 2. In delivering the forged instrument to Coe, authenticated by a transfer signed in blank; thus giving it a currency and negotiability which it would not have possessed had Coe's name been inserted in the form of transfer, and putting it in his power to commit the fraud, upon which this suit is founded. The plaintiff was not negligent. He had a right to assume upon receiving this certificate, authenticated by the signature of the bank, that the defendant had obtained it from the railroad company in the usual way, which would have prevented the possibility of forgery or fraud in the body of the instrument. Espy v. Bank of Cincinnati, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 604; Lickbarrow v. Mason, 2 Term R. 63, and note in Smith, Lead. Cas. 1039.

Joshua P. Converse and Edward A. Kelly, for defendant.

The loan by the bank to Coe, and his delivery of the forged certificate of stock, as collateral, to the bank, was a transaction of which the plaintiff had notice; and the statement on the face of the certificate that it was held by the bank as collateral, was notice that the bank was not in fact the absolute owner, and that it was held only in pledge. Wilson v. Little, 2 Comst. [2 N. Y.] 443; 2 Kent, Comm. 579; 4 Kent, Comm. 138; Allen v. Dykers, 3 Hill, 593; Dykers v. Allen, 7 Hill, 497; White v. Platt, 5 Denio, 269; Newton v. Fay, 10 Allen, 505; Gen. St. Mass. c. 123, § 62; Id. c. 68, § 14. The certificate held by the bank having been given it by Coe as a pledge, when he paid the debt, the restoration of the certificate to him vested in him all the rights which the bank ever had. The possession of the certificate by Coe, after notice of its having been held in pledge, was notice to Matthews that the debt for which it had been held in pledge had been paid. The transfer in blank created no liability or obligation on the part of the bank to Matthews. The act of the cashier in signing and transferring the certificate to Coe was performed with the intention of restoring the pledge to Coe in discharge of the duty of the bank as pledgee, after the purposes of the pledge were answered, and not with any purpose of a sale of the certificate, or the stock supposed to be represented by it; and no contract of sale resulted from it. Langton v. Waite, 17 Wkly. Rep. 475; Ketcham v. Stevens, 19 N. Y. 499; Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 685. By the statute of frauds the transfer in blank is void. Browne, St. Frauds, § 372; Champion v. Plummer, 1 Bos. & P. (N. R.) 252. When Coe paid the debt and took back what he had pledged, his right became as absolute and complete as when the pledge was given; and if he could not have sued the bank, it is submitted that he could not by a delivery to another person transfer a right of action against the bank. Certificates of stock are not negotiable instruments, and the transferees of such certificates acquire the same rights which their assignors had, and no more, and deal in relation to them at their peril. Mechanics' Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 13 N. Y. 599, 622; McNeil v. Tenth Nat. Bank of New York, 55 Barb. 59; Bush v. Lathrop, 22 N. Y. 535; Mangles v. Dixon, 18 Eng. Law & Eq. 82, 95; Hil. Sales (3d Ed., 1869) 594, and authorities in note; Fisher v. Essex Bank, 5 Gray, 377; Athenaeum Life Assur. Soc. v. Pooley, 3 De Gex & J. 294. They are not in the nature of letters of credit, on the faith of which any one might act. Mechanics' Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 13 N. Y. 629-631.

The doctrine that the sale of goods carries with it an implied warranty of title or genuineness cannot apply here. 1. The doctrine is intended to protect those who otherwise have no means of protecting themselves. Did the bank covenant with Coe that the certificate forged by him was genuine? 2. It is not like a covenant running with land, and good in the hands of third persons. 3. The doctrine applies only where the vendor is in possession, and sells goods as his own. 2 Kent, Comm. 478, and note (Holmes's Ed.); McCoy v. Artcher, 3 Barb. 323; Edick v. Crim, 10 Barb. 445; Baxter v. Duren, 29 Me. 434; Morley v. Attenborough, 3 Wellsb., H. & G. 508; Medina v. Stoughton, 1 Salk. 210; Ormrod v. Huth, 14 Mees. & W. 664; Emerson v. Brigham, 10 Mass. 197; 1 Pars. Cont. 457, 458; Huntington v. Hall, 36 Me. 501, and cases cited; Whitney v. Heywood, 6 Cush. 82, 86. 4. The bank never was in possession of any thing but a forged certificate; and this Matthews has received. 5. The transfer is in the nature of a chose in action; and Matthews stands in the same situation as his assignor, and no covenants of warranty of title or genuineness are implied. Eaton v. Mellus, 7 Gray, 566. 6. Matthews received the certificate from Coe with constructive notice that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust had existed between the bank and Coe, which imposed upon him the duty of inquiry as to its character and limitations. And whatever is sufficient to put a person of ordinary prudence upon inquiry is constructive notice of every thing to which that inquiry might have led. Freeman v. Harwood, 49 Me. 195; Newton v. Fay, 10 Allen, 507; Shaw v. Spencer, 100 Mass. 390. 7. The transfer was of the identical certificate delivered to the bank, in performance of its duty as pledgee, upon the payment of the debt for which it was pledged, and was not a transfer of shares of stock generally. Westropp v. Solomon, 8 C. B. 345.

The declaration is in contract; and there is no allegation in the statement of facts that Matthews ever paid, or that the bank ever received, any thing for the alleged contract of sale. The amount advanced by Matthews was a loan to Coe; and the only money received by the bank was the debt paid to it by Coe; and neither was a legal consideration for a contract with the bank. Smith v. Bartholomew, 1 Metc. [Mass.] 278. The cashier had no authority or right to bind the bank to pay money upon any contract alleged, because: 1. He never had authority by virtue of his office, nor any authority delegated by the directors. Bank of U. S. v. Duren, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 51; U. S. v. City Bank of Columbus, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 356; Marsh v. Fulton Co., 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 676. 2. There was no consideration for the alleged contract, and the same was therefore void.

The claim against the bank is too remote. Anthony v. Slaid, 11 Metc. [Mass.] 290; Brown v. Cummings, 7 Allen, 507. Damage without fraud, or fraud without damage, will not sustain an action. Randall v. Hazelton, 12 Allen, 412; Stone v. Denney, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 151.

The bank having no right to sell the stock, as the debt had been paid, the cashier could not make a sale. As neither the bank nor the cashier could sell the stock, the act of the cashier in signing the transfer in blank could not operate as an estoppel. Lowell v. Daniels, 2 Gray, 161; Bigelow, Estop. 480. There was no intent on the part of the bank to induce Matthews to act on the faith of the alleged representation. Plumer v. Lord, 9 Allen, 458. Matthews was a stranger to the alleged representation, and, therefore, it is no estoppel in his favor. Mechanics' Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 13 N. Y. 638, 639. As the cashier had no right to sell the stock to the plaintiff, the alleged negligence in doing what he had no right to do could not bind the bank. Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 479.

Matthews had no right to fill up the blank transfer, so as to make it appear to be a contract of sale to himself. 1. Because he dealt only with Coe, and derives his title from him and not from the bank. Ketcham v. Stevens, 19 N. Y. 499. 2. Because he cannot make a contract by which the bank is bound, which he knew, or was bound to know, is in opposition to its wishes and intentions. 3. Because the bank and Matthews were both pledgees of Coe, and the relation of vendor and vendee could not, and did not, exist between them.

There was no negligence on the part of the bank in receiving the certificate from Coe as a pledge for a loan to him, nor in the mode of transfer to him. The loss sustained by Matthews can be traced to his want of prudence and care in dealing with Coe. Gloucester Bank v. Salem Bank, 17 Mass. 42; Maule, J., in Westropp v. Solomon, 8 C. B. 345; Shaw v. Spencer, 100 Mass. 391; Boylston Nat. Bank v. Richardson, 101 Mass. 290; Bank of U. S. v. Bank of Georgia, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 333.

If, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, no fault or negligence is imputable to either party, the loss must remain with Matthews where the course of business has placed it. Gloucester Bank v. Salem Bank, 17 Mass. 42. If it is claimed that the cashier was negligent or careless in the mode of transfer, it is submitted that the loss or injury sustained by the plaintiff is not the direct and immediate consequence of the alleged negligent act of the cashier. The felony of Coe in uttering the forged certificate, which he knew to be forged, and the laches of the plaintiff, were the direct and immediate causes of the loss to the plaintiff. Salem Bank v. Gloucester Bank, 17 Mass. 31; Hatch v. Searles, 2 Smale & G. 147.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The defendant, the Massachusetts National Bank, loaned to one James A. Coe twenty-two thousand dollars, payable on call with interest, taking from him his memorandum of indebtedness for that sum, with, as collateral security therefor, what purported to be a certificate of two hundred shares of the capital stock of the Boston and Albany Railroad Company issued to said Massachusetts National Bank, as collateral. This instrument was originally a genuine certificate for two shares of the capital stock of the Boston and Albany Railroad Company issued to H. E. Coe, but by false and forged erasures and interlineations it had been so altered as to purport to be a certificate for two hundred shares of its stock issued by said railroad corporation to the Massachusetts National Bank, as collateral.

The bank received the said certificate in good faith and without any suspicion of its fraudulent character, and in supposed fulfilment of the promise of James A. Coe to give as security for the loan aforesaid two hundred shares of the capital stock of said railroad corporation. Subsequently, upon payment by said Coe to the bank, he received back his memorandum of indebtedness; and the cashier of the bank, for the purpose and with the intention of restoring the collateral to Coe, returned to him the fraudulent certificate, with the usual printed form of transfer on the back thereof, signed by H. K. Frothingham, cashier of said bank, in blank.

About two weeks after the surrender by the bank of this certificate to Coe with the transfer in blank of the cashier on the back of it, the plaintiff, Matthews, pursuant to his agreement to loan Coe twenty-five thousand dollars on call with interest, received from Coe, in good faith, the said fraudulent certificate with the blank assignment on the back thereof, supposing the same to be a genuine certificate for two hundred shares of said stock issued by the corporation and duly transferred and assigned so as to enable him to obtain a new certificate therefor in his own name; and on receipt thereof loaned the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars. The signature of the cashier was well known to Matthews, who correctly supposed the signature on the blank assignment to be genuine. Coe was tried and convicted for obtaining money by false pretences; and indictments for forgery are now pending against him, and he has been declared bankrupt. The next day, or very soon after the day when the money was loaned by Matthews, the fact first became known to plaintiff and defendant of the fraudulent alteration of the certificate before it came into possession of defendant, and plaintiff thereupon notified the bank that he should hold it responsible for any loss sustained by him by reason of the premises. This action is brought for the recovery of the damages thus sustained.

The real question presented in the case is, whether the bank by signing the blank transfer has so far warranted the genuineness of the certificate that it is estopped from setting up the forgery as a defence to this action.

Defendant denies that the cashier had authority or right to bind the bank by the contract declared on. Cashiers of a bank are held out to the public as having authority to act according to the general usage, practice, and course of business conducted by the bank. Their acts, within the scope of such usage, practice, and course of business, will in general bind the bank in favor of third persons possessing no other knowledge. Morse v. Massachusetts Nat. Bank [Case No. 9,857]; Minor v. Mechanics' Bank, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 70; Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 604. One of the ordinary and well-known duties of the cashier of a bank is the surrender of notes and securities upon payment; and his signature to the necessary transfers of securities or collaterals, when in the form of bills of exchange, choses in action, stock certificates, or similar securities for loans, which are personal property, is an act within the scope of the general usage, practice, and course of business in which cashiers of a bank are held out to the public as having authority to act. Undoubtedly the ordinary duties of a cashier do not comprehend the making of a contract which involves the payment of money, without an express authority from the directors, unless it be such as relates to the usual and customary transactions of the bank. But the transfer of certificates of stock held as collateral is certainly one of the usual and customary transactions of banks, and the public would be no more likely to require evidence of a special authority to the cashier to make such transfer than of a special authority to draw checks on other banks, or to perform any other of the daily duties of his office.

The signature of the cashier must therefore be considered as the signature of the bank, and the question returns, whether such blank assignment on the back of the certificate by the bank be so far a warranty of the genuineness of the certificate that the bank is estopped from setting up the forgery as a defence. In the case of forged negotiable instruments, it is well settled that the indorser warrants that the instrument itself and the antecedent signatures thereon are genuine. Story, Prom. Notes, § 135; State Bank v. Fearing, 16 Pick. 533; Hortsman v. Henshaw, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 183; Critchlow v. Parry, 2 Camp. 182; Canal Bank v. Bank of Albany, 1 Hill, 287. The indorser's liability in these cases is properly placed upon the ground of estoppel. "This proceeds," says Judge Story, "upon the intelligible ground that every indorser undertakes that he possesses a clear title to the note deduced from and through all the antecedent indorsers, and that he means to clothe the holder under him with all the rights which by law attach to a regular and genuine indorsement against himself and all the antecedent indorsers. It is in this confidence that the holder takes the note without further explanation; and if each party is equally innocent, and one must suffer, it should be the one who has misled the confidence of the other, and by his acts held out to the holder that all the indorsements are genuine, and may be relied on as an indemnity in case of the dishonor thereof." This is a statement of the grounds upon which the rule of law rests as applicable to negotiable instruments, but the reasoning would seem to apply with equal force and pertinency to the case of a transfer of a certificate of stock by indorsement in blank. Stock certificates are sold in open market like other securities, and form the basis of commercial transactions. In the language of Davis, J., in Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall. [78 U.

S.] 377: "Although neither in form nor character negotiable paper, they approximate to it as nearly as practicable." In Leitch v. Wells, 48 N. Y. 613, it is said: "Since the decision of the case of McNeil v. Tenth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 325, certificates of stock, with blank assignments and powers of attorney attached, must be nearly as negotiable as commercial paper." The common practice of passing the title to stock by delivery of the certificate, with the blank assignment and power, has been repeatedly proved and sanctioned in cases which have come before the courts in New York. In New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 41, the rights of parties claiming under such instruments were fully recognized by the court, and such mode of transfer was shown to be the common practice of the city of New York. It is well settled that the form of assignment printed on the back of stock certificates, when signed in blank, may be filled up by a subsequent purchaser of the stock. Kortright v. Commercial Bank of Buffalo, 20 Wend. 91, and 22 Wend. 348; Bridgeport Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 30 Conn. 273. The certificate in this case, as it came from the bank, contained on the same piece of paper, and on the back of the certificate, a blank assignment, which was all that was necessary to transfer the title of the stock as between the parties. The defendant must, therefore, be held to have intended and agreed that whoever should present the certificate so issued from the bank, with the assignment executed in blank, should be entitled to fill up the blanks with his own name, and to have a transfer of the stock made to himself on the books of the company. The certificate accompanied with the transfer, executed in blank, has a species of negotiability of a peculiar character, but one well recognized in commercial transactions and judicial decisions, and absolutely essential in the usage and necessities of modern commerce to make such certificates available in commercial transactions. Even when such blank assignments, or powers of attorney to transfer stock, are under seal, the blanks may be filled up according to the agreement of the parties at the time. Bridgeport Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 30 Conn. 274, 275; Redf. R. R. § 35, and cases cited. The decisions to the contrary in the English courts have not been followed in this country, and they were influenced not merely by a rigid adherence to the technical rules of the common law in relation to instruments under seal, but by the policy of the stamp system. But the case of Walker v. Bartlett, 36 Eng. Law & Eq. 368, and later English decisions, recognize the validity of blank transfers of stock, and that such transfers of stock impose upon the holder of them the obligation to pay calls upon the shares while they remain his property. In Kortright v. Commercial Bank, 20 Wend. 94, speaking of the filling up of a blank transfer of stock and power of attorney, Nelson, C. J., after stating that this is in strict conformity with the universal usage of dealers in the negotiation and transfer of stocks according to the proof in the case, goes on to say: "Even without the aid of this usage, there could be no great difficulty in upholding the assignment. The execution in blank must have been for the express purpose of enabling the holder, whoever he might be, to fill it up. If intended to have been filled up in the name of the first transferee, there would have been no necessity for its execution in blank; Barker might have completed the instrument." The right to fill the blank in a blank transfer of stock is recognized by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Sewall v. Boston Water Power Co., 4 Allen, 277.

Matthews clearly had the right, having advanced the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars upon the supposed security of this blank assignment of stock, to fill up the blank with his own name and with the place of his residence, and whatever was necessary to make the instrument complete as an assignment and transfer to him of the shares described in the certificate. The case finds that the cashier signed the assignment in blank for the purpose and with the intention of restoring the pledge to Coe. But even if he went further, and agreed with Coe that Coe should fill the blank with his own name, such private understanding between him and Coe would not have affected the rights of third parties who parted with their property in good faith without negligence, upon the faith of the certificate of the cashier that the bank undertook to assign, and did assign, to whoever might be the lawful holder of the instrument, the amount of stock described therein. As above quoted from Nelson, C. J., "If intended to have been filled up in the name of the first transferee, there would have been no necessity for its execution in blank." Frothingham "might have completed the instrument." What possible explanation can be given of the course of the cashier in giving to Coe an assignment in blank rather than a transfer to Coe himself, other than to enable Coe to dispose of the certificate so that the holder could take his title directly from the bank, and that the instrument might be used according to the well-known usage of dealing with stock certificates, passing from one purchaser to another without the inconveniences and delays consequent upon manifold transfers on the records of the corporation? If the bank intended to limit the assignment to a particular assignee, or to a less number of shares than the number described in the certificate, the limitation should have appeared in the assignment. The assignment in blank purports to assign what is described in the certificate to the lawful holder, whoever he may be, who may fill the blank. The signature is given for the purpose of transferring title; and whenever the blank is filled, a contract of sale is established between the party who has signed the blank assignment and the person whose name is rightfully filled in as assignee.

It is contended in behalf of the bank that the transfer in blank created no liability or obligation on the part of the bank to Matthews, because the circumstances under which the certificate was received by the bank and surrendered to Coe indicate clearly that the act of the cashier in signing and transferring the certificate to Coe was performed with the intention of restoring the pledge to Coe in discharge of the duty of the bank as pledgee after the purposes of the pledge were answered, and not with any purpose of a sale of the certificate or the stock supposed to be represented by it. But there is nothing in the case to show any knowledge on the part of Matthews of any such intention on the part of the cashier. The certificate purports to be a certificate that the bank held the shares as collateral, but does not show that they were collateral for a debt of Coe's to the bank. Such a certificate of stock with the transfer in blank of a responsible bank might, in the ordinary course and usage of dealing in stocks, pass through the hands of many successive purchasers. The possession of the certificate would afford no indication that the holder of it was the person who had originally transferred it to the bank as collateral. If Coe had consented to a sale by the bank of the collateral to pay his debt, or if the bank had in any way acquired the right to sell it, and had sold it, if the assignment had been in blank, the purchaser would have been in the same condition, and Matthews, in dealing with such a purchaser, would have received no better evidence of title against the bank than he received from Coe. Had the bank desired to sell this stock, and placed it in the hands of a broker with a blank transfer in the usual course of business, Matthews, in buying from the broker, would have received no better evidence of title against the bank than in the present case. The mere words "as collateral" in the instrument do not tend to put the purchaser on inquiry, except so far as relates to the authority of the bank to dispose of the collateral as between the bank and its debtor. If this inquiry had been made, it would only have resulted in the information that the assignment was made in its actual form by the joint act and consent of the debtor and the bank. The name of the pledger was not settled in the certificate, as is required by the statute of Massachusetts (Gen. St. Mass. c. 68, § 13). In fact, if Matthews had gone to the bank to make inquiries, he could only have learned that, Coe having paid his debt to the bank, the certificate had been surrendered to him by the bank with a transfer in blank. There would have been nothing in this information to lead him to doubt the genuineness of a certificate to which the bank had given currency by its signature, and on the faith of which he would have learned the bank had loaned twenty thousand dollars, which had been paid. The bank or the cashier did not then doubt the genuineness of the instrument, and no inquiry at the bank would have inspired doubts in the mind of Matthews, there being no such doubts in the minds of the officers of the bank. Nor is it perceived how the bank can contend with any show of reason that Matthews was negligent in not inquiring at the office of the railway corporation. If the duty of making such an inquiry was incumbent on any one, it was surely incumbent on the bank to ascertain the genuineness of the instrument before they gave currency to it, and lulled suspicion and doubt by the responsibility of their own signature. The answer to all the positions taken by the defendant as to notice to Matthews from the words "as collateral" in the instrument, is that there is nothing to connect Coe with those words. There is nothing on the face of the papers, and there was nothing in the fact of the possession of the instrument by Coe, to show that he was the person for whose debt the stock was held as collateral. Had not Matthews a right to suppose, upon receiving this certificate authenticated by the signature of the bank, that they had obtained the certificate themselves from the railroad company in the usual way, thus preventing the possibility of fraud or forgery before receiving as collateral for a loan and before authenticating it with their signature? It is difficult to see in what respect Matthews was negligent.

The defendant, on the other hand, negligently placed confidence in Coe to obtain a transfer from the railroad company of the two hundred shares on which they loaned the sum of twenty-two thousand dollars, instead of taking their certificate directly from the company. But the negligent act which especially imposes upon them a liability in this case is, that they delivered the forged instrument to Coe, authenticated by their signature in blank to a transfer, thus giving to it a currency and negotiability which it would not have possessed had they made the transfer directly to Coe. Thus the bank put it in the power of Coe to commit the fraud on Matthews on which this suit is founded.

In McNeil v. Tenth Nat. Bank, the language of the opinion is precisely applicable to a case like the present: "Such, then, being the nature and effect of the documents with which the plaintiff intrusted his brokers, what position does he occupy towards persons who in reliance upon those documents have, in good faith, advanced money to the brokers or their assigns on a pledge of the shares? When he asserts his title, and claims as against them that he cannot be deprived of his property without his consent, cannot he be truly answered, that by leaving the certificate in the hands of his brokers, accompanied by an instrument bearing his own signature which purported to be executed for a consideration, and to convey the title away from him, and to empower the bearer of it irrevocably to dispose of the stock, he in fact 'substituted his trust in the honesty of his brokers for the control which the law gave him over his own property,' and that the consequences of a betrayal of that trust should fall upon him who reposed it, rather than upon innocent strangers from whom the brokers were thereby enabled to obtain their money?" If the bank only intended to revest in Coe whatever it acquired from him, it would have been perfectly easy to have limited the transfer to that extent only. A private understanding that such was the intention between Coe and the cashier could not affect the rights of those who, if misled, were misled by the acts of the bank. If the bank, by giving to Coe the transfer in blank with its signature, exhibited him to the money-dealing public as having the competent right of pledge and disposal, with all the usual evidences of such right, it substituted its trust in the honesty of Coe for the control which the bank should have exercised itself over the transfer of the instrument, and should suffer the loss consequent upon his betrayal of the trust, rather than to suffer it to fall upon an innocent stranger.

If the conditions upon which the apparent right of control which the bank conferred upon Coe were not expressed on the face of the instrument, but remained in confidence between the bank and Coe, the case is not distinguishable in principle from that of an agent who receives secret instructions qualifying or restricting an apparently absolute power. Jarvis v. Rogers, 15 Mass. 389; Pickering v. Busk, 15 East, 38; Fatman v. Lobach, 1 Duer, 354; New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 31.

One of two innocent parties must suffer in this case by the fraud of Coe. Under similar circumstances, courts have repeatedly held that the party must suffer who has exhibited the greater degree of negligence. The leading case on the indorsement of bills of lading, Lickbarrow v. Mason, 2 Term R. 63, is an authority on this point. See also Lobdell v. Baker, 3 Metc. [Mass.] 469; Polhill v. Walter, 3 Barn. & Adol. 114.

The bank is precluded from setting up the fact of the forgery of the instrument, because it would be a wrong on its own part and an injury to others whose conduct has been influenced by the acts and omissions of the bank. Swayne, J., in Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 645, says, "Estoppel in pais presupposes an error or a fault, and implies an act in itself invalid. The rule proceeds upon the consideration that the author of the misfortune shall not himself escape the consequences and cast the burden upon another." Clifford, J., recognizes this principle in his dissenting opinion in that case: "If a bank may be held liable in any case upon a certificate of their cashier that a check is good when they have no funds of the drawer, it is not because the cashier is authorized to make such certificate, but because the bank is bound by his representation, notwithstanding it is false and unauthorized." An estoppel is a salutary rule which prevents a man from proving that to be false which he has once represented to be true, when others have acted on the faith of his representation.

The fact that Matthews has also a right of action against Coe, who is a convict and a bankrupt, does not preclude him from a remedy against the bank. Gurney v. Womersley, 4 El. & Bl. 133.

Upon the facts as agreed in this case, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, and, according to the agreement of parties, the case is to be referred to an auditor to assess the damages. Judgment accordingly.

Case No. 9,287.

[2 Curt. 105.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1854.

PLEADING AT LAW — DEBT ON AWARD — PLEA OF REVOCATION — GENERAL ISSUE — NOTICE OF AWARD — DAMAGES AND COSTS — GENERAL DEMURRER.

1. There being four counts in a declaration, each founded on an alleged submission and award, a plea purporting to answer the whole action, but alleging only a revocation of one submission, and not showing which one of the four alleged, is bad on general demurrer.

2. A plea to an action of debt on an award, that the referees never made any such award as is averred in the declaration, is bad, as amounting to the general issue.

3. Ordinarily, notice of an award need not be averred; aliter if it be specially provided in the submission that notice shall be given to the parties.

4. An averment that an award was duly published, is equivalent to an averment, that the notice of the award, required by the submission, was given.

5. An action of debt lies for two sums, distinctly awarded, the one for damages, and the other for costs; and the omission to add them together, and go for the sum of both, as a sum single, is bad only on special demurrer.

6. A count on an award, that on the delivery of a release and the payment of a sum of money by the defendant to the plaintiff, the plaintiff was to deliver a release to the defendant, no averment of readiness or offer by the plaintiff to release the defendant, is bad on general demurrer.

[Cited in Smith v. Boston & M. R. Co., 88 Mass. (6 Allen) 270.]

7. A count showing differences, a submission of them, an award upon those differences, of a sum of money to the plaintiff, though very general, is good on general demurrer.

This was an action of debt in four counts. As the questions arose upon a part of the pleadings, it is necessary to set out their substance. The declaration was as follows:

First count. For that whereas certain differences having arisen and being depending between the said plaintiff [Edward Matthews] and the said defendant [Nathan Matthews], the said plaintiff and defendant heretofore, namely, on the eighth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two, at Boston, aforesaid, by a certain indenture bearing date, namely, the day and year aforesaid, after reciting, among other things, that the said parties had had for many years numerous transactions and dealings one with the other, and had at times stood in the relation of partners, and at other times in the relation of agents one for the other, and had at various times assumed and incurred liabilities one for the other, and had in divers other ways been connected and interested in business and property, and that said plaintiff and defendant were desirous of settling up and closing all their matters, and to that end of ascertaining the true state of the accounts between them, and of the indebtedness of one to the other, and of the respective rights and liabilities of each in relation to any and all matters, and to any and all property real and personal, and any interest therein of every nature and description in any way connected with any transaction between the said plaintiff and defendant, or which was, or could be in any way a matter of difference between them, so that the respective rights of the said plaintiff and defendant, to any property, real and personal, or to any interest therein, or under any agreement thereto, might be ascertained, and the requisite acts be done, and conveyance made by, from, and to each party, in order to fix, establish, and settle such rights, and so that the outstanding liabilities of the said plaintiff and defendant, whether joint or of one for the other might be determined, and the same be assumed and discharged by the proper party, and the indebtedness of one to the other might be paid and satisfied, and so that all matters between the said plaintiff and defendant, or in regard to which there was or could be any difference between them, might be adjusted, settled, and closed up, did refer and submit all said matters so by them desired to be settled as aforesaid, to the arbitration and decision of James W. Convers, Harrison Fay, and Abel G. Farwell, merchants, and doing business in said city of Boston, arbitrators indifferently elected and named as well by and on the part and behalf of the said defendant, as by and on the behalf of the said plaintiff, and in and by said indenture did empower said Convers, Fay, and Farwell, in any award they or a majority of them might make and publish in relation to any and all of the matters submitted to them as aforesaid, to direct either said plaintiff or defendant to specifically perform any contract subsisting between them, the said plaintiff and defendant, to convey and transfer to the other any property, real or personal, or any interest therein, to make all draft orders or assignments, to assume, pay, satisfy, and discharge any outstanding liabilities, and to pay to the other any sums of money as the said Convers, Fay, and Farwell, or a majority of them, should deem proper, to carry out and effectuate the settlement of the matters so submitted to said Convers, Fay, and Farwell, as aforesaid, (and the said plaintiff and defendant, in and by said indenture, did covenant and agree with each other to stand to, abide, and perform any and all the orders, decisions, and awards of said Convers, Fay, and Farwell, or a majority of them, of and concerning the matters so submitted to them, the said arbitrators, as aforesaid, as the same should from time to time be made known to said plaintiff and defendant.) And in and by said indenture it was further provided, that all the expenses and costs of said reference, so made as aforesaid, should be borne equally by the said parties, and the said arbitrators were empowered in any award which they, the said arbitrators, or a majority of them, might at any time make, to fix the costs of said proceedings under said indenture, so far as the same should then have been had. And the said plaintiff further saith, that the said Convers, Fay, and Farwell, having taken upon themselves the burden of said arbitration, did in due manner, namely, on the thirtieth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three, at Boston aforesaid, duly make and publish their award of and concerning the said matters so submitted to said Convers, Fay, and Farwell, as aforesaid, and did, among other things, thereby award that there was due and owing from the said defendant to the said plaintiff the sum of thirty-three thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars and seventy-eight cents, and did, among other things, order and award that the said defendant should pay to the said plaintiff the said sum of thirty-three thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars and seventy-eight cents, within forty days from the said thirtieth day of September, with interest from said last-mentioned day. And did, by the said award, among other things, find, that the costs and expenses of said arbitration were forty-four hundred dollars, and did award that the said Nathan should pay one moiety thereof, namely, the sum of two thousand two hundred dollars, and that the said Edward should pay one moiety thereof, namely, the sum of two thousand two hundred dollars, as by said award, reference being thereunto had will more fully appear; which said award was afterwards, namely, on the day and year last aforesaid, in Boston aforesaid, duly published and made known to both the said parties.

And the said plaintiff avers, that the said defendant did not, nor would not, within said forty days from the said date of said award, pay to the said plaintiff the said sum of thirty-three thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars and seventy-eight cents in the said award mentioned, or any part thereof, nor hath he since paid the same, nor any part thereof, although requested so to do. And the plaintiff further avers, that the said defendant did not and would not pay the said half of said costs and expenses, namely, two thousand two hundred dollars, so awarded to be by him paid as aforesaid, and that the plaintiff was by reason thereof, and in consequence of such refusal of the defendant, obliged to pay, and did pay, the whole of said costs and expenses, namely, said sum of four thousand four hundred dollars, whereby an action hath accrued to the said plaintiff to demand and have of and from the said defendant, the said sum of thirty-three thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars and seventy-eight cents, with interest thereon from the date of said award, and the said sum of two thousand two hundred dollars, yet the defendant hath not yet paid the said sums or any part thereof.

Second count. Also for that whereas heretofore, namely, on the eighth day of July, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and fifty-two, divers other controversies and disputes had arisen, and were then depending between the said plaintiff and the said defendant, for the determination whereof the said plaintiff and the said defendant, on the same day and year aforesaid, at Boston aforesaid, by a certain other agreement of submission bearing date the same day and year aforesaid, mutually submitted themselves to stand to the award and determination of James W. Convers, Harrison Fay, and Abel T. Farwell, or any two of them, arbitrators indifferently named, elected and chosen by and between the said parties to arbitrate, award, order, judge, and determine of and concerning the same controversies and disputes as the same should be made known to the said plaintiff and defendant. And the said plaintiff, in fact, says, that they, the said Convers, Fay, and Farwell, the said arbitrators, having taken upon themselves the burden of the said arbitration, they, the said Convers, Fay, and Farwell, afterwards, on the thirtieth day of September, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and fifty-three, at Boston aforesaid, did make their certain other award of and concerning the premises so referred to them as aforesaid, in writing under their hands and seals, ready to be delivered to the said parties, or either of them who should desire the same, bearing date the same day and year last aforesaid; and by the said last-named award, they, the said Convers, Fay, and Farwell, did award and determine among other things, that the said defendant should pay to the said Edward the certain other sum of thirty-three thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars and seventy-eight cents within forty days from the date of said award; and further, by the said award, they, the said arbitrators, did order and award that the said defendant should also, within said forty days from said date of said award, make, execute, and deliver to the said plaintiff a release under seal of him, the said defendant, his heirs, executors, and administrators, of and from each and all debts, controversies, variances, liabilities, rights, claims, demands, causes of action, and matters and things whatsoever, whether at law or in equity, which he, the said defendant had, or might, or could have had at said date of said agreement of submission, against the said plaintiff, and all other matters and things in relation to which there was or might have been any difference between said plaintiff and defendant at the said date of said agreement of submission, excepting certain claims against the said plaintiff for moneys which were in and by said award ordered to be paid by the said plaintiff to the said defendant, and excepting the claim which the said defendant had upon and against the said plaintiff, that said plaintiff should, for and during the continuance of a certain lease in said award mentioned, save said defendant harmless for or on account of any breaches of the covenants or conditions of said lease as in said award was ordered and provided; and further, by the said award, they, the said arbitrators, did order and award that upon the payment to the said plaintiff by the said defendant of the said sum of thirty-three thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars and seventy-eight cents with interest as aforesaid, and upon the delivery to the said plaintiff of said release from said defendant as aforesaid, he, the said plaintiff, should execute and deliver to the said defendant a release under seal by him the said plaintiff, his heirs, executors, and administrators, of and from each and all debt controversies, variances, liabilities, rights, claims, demands, whatsoever causes of action and matters and things, whether at law, or in equity, which he, the said plaintiff had a right, or could have had, against the said defendant at the said date of said agreement of submission, and of and from all other matters and things in relation to which there was or might have been any difference between the said plaintiff and defendant, at the said date of said agreement of submission, excepting a claim which the said plaintiff had against said defendant to have a certain lease mentioned in said award assigned to him the said plaintiff by the said defendant as is ordered and provided in and by said award; and the plaintiff avers, that the said defendant did not, nor would, within said forty days from the date of said award, nor at any other time hitherto, pay or cause to be paid to the said plaintiff the said sum of thirty-three thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars and seventy-eight cents, or interest thereon, which by the said award was to have been paid by the said defendant to the said plaintiff within said forty days according to the form and effect of said award, but therein wholly failed and made default, and by reason of the premises and of the said sum of money still remaining wholly due, in arrear, unpaid, and unsatisfied, an action hath accrued to the said plaintiff to demand and have of and from the said defendant, the said sum of thirty-three thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars and seventy-eight cents, with interest thereon from the date of said submission, yet the defendant hath not paid the same or any part thereof.

Third count. Also, for that whereas the said defendant, on the day of the date of this writ, at Boston aforesaid, was indebted to the said plaintiff in the sum of thirty-three thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars and seventy-eight cents, upon and by virtue of a certain other award made by James W. Convers, Harrison Fay, and Abel G. Farwell, on a certain other submission, before that time made by the said plaintiff and the said defendant to the award and determination of the said Convers, Fay, and Farwell, concerning certain matters in difference then depending between the said plaintiff and the said defendant, and upon which said reference the said Convers, Fay, and Farwell awarded that the said defendant should pay to the said plaintiff the sum of money aforesaid within forty days from the thirtieth day of September now last past, with interest thereon from the said last-mentioned day; and the plaintiff avers that the said defendant did not, nor would, within said forty days, nor at any time hitherto, pay to the said plaintiff the said sum of thirty-three thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars and seventy-eight cents, or any part thereof, whereby and by reason of the non-payment whereof, an action hath accrued to the said plaintiff to demand and have of and from the said defendant the sum aforesaid. Yet the defendant hath not paid the sum nor any part thereof.

Fourth count like first, with omission of the part in parenthesis.

2d. Plea. Actio non, &c., because the said instrument referred to by the plaintiff, and set forth in his writ as an award between these parties, and alleged to have been made and published on the thirtieth day of September last, was not made and published on that day, and was not signed till long after all authority of the persons alleged to have been referees between the parties by the plaintiff had been terminated by the plaintiff himself, and this the defendant is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays for judgment if the plaintiff ought to have and maintain his action against him. To this plea the plaintiff demurred generally, and it was joined.

6th Plea. Actio non, &c., because he says that the persons alleged by the plaintiff to have been referees between the parties, never made any such award as the plaintiff alleges, and this he is ready to verify; wherefore he prays judgment if plaintiff ought to have and maintain his action against him. To this plea the plaintiff demurred specially, assigning for cause that it amounted to the general issue.

11th Plea. Actio non, &c., because he says that the plaintiff by an instrument under the hand and seal of the plaintiff, and bearing date the thirtieth day of October, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, did, before the said persons named as referees had made any decision between the parties under the submission set forth by the plaintiff, revoke the said submission, and this the defendant is ready to verify; wherefore he prays judgment whether the plaintiff ought to have and maintain this action against him.

To this plea the plaintiff replied: 1. And the said plaintiff, as to the said plea of the said defendant by him eleventhly pleaded to the second count of the said declaration, says that he the said plaintiff by reason of any thing by the said defendant in that plea alleged ought not to be barred from having and maintaining his aforesaid action thereof against him the said defendant; because he says that subsequently to the making of the said alleged revocation, the said plaintiff and defendant mutually consented that said referees should proceed under said submission, and make their award thereon, and mutually agreed to stand to and abide the award of said referees, thereunder, and the plaintiff says that the said referees did make their award of and concerning the premises so submitted, as in said second count of the declaration is alleged and pleaded. And this he the said plaintiff is ready to verify; wherefore he prays judgment and his debt aforesaid, together with his damages by him sustained on occasion of the detention thereof to be adjudged to him, &c. 2. And the said plaintiff, as to the said plea of the said defendant by him eleventhly pleaded to the fourth count of the said declaration, says that he the said plaintiff, by reason of any thing by the said defendant in that plea alleged ought not to be barred from having and maintaining his aforesaid action thereof against him the said defendant, because, protesting that the defendant did not revoke said submission in manner and form as he has in his said plea alleged, for replication nevertheless the plaintiff says, (that after the making of said award by said referees, as in fourth count alleged, namely, on the first day of December last past, the said defendant and plaintiff mutually agreed to accept and stand to and abide said award, and as well the said defendant as the said plaintiff assented to and then ratified and confirmed the said award and the acts and authority of the said referees in making and publishing said award.) And this he the said plaintiff is ready to verify; wherefore he prays judgment and his debt aforesaid, together with the damages by him sustained on occasion of the detention thereof to be adjudged to him, &c. To these replications the defendant demurred generally, which was joined.

Bartlett & Thaxter, for plaintiff.

C. G. Loring and C. M. Ellis, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is an action of debt upon awards, set out in four counts in the declaration. Among other pleas the defendant has pleaded, secondly, as follows: (Here the second plea, as set out above, was read.) There are four counts in this declaration purporting to be for four distinct causes of action, and this plea is pleaded to all. It begins in bar of the action. Yet its subject-matter can answer only one count. It avers that "the instrument referred to by the plaintiff, and set forth in his writ, as an award between these parties, and alleged to have been made and published on the thirtieth day of September last, was not made," &c. There are three such instruments declared on. The plea, if good, can answer but one of them, and there is no means of knowing which one it is intended to answer. For both these reasons the plea is bad. First, because it is pleaded to the whole declaration, when it contains an answer to only one count; second, because it is impossible to decide which of these counts it was intended to answer. This is not the only defect in the plea. As already stated, there are four counts in the declaration. In three of them, an award founded on an instrument of submission is declared on. In the other count, no instrument of submission is referred to. The plea relies on a revocation of an instrument of submission as a bar to the action. Manifestly it cannot bar the count in which no such instrument is mentioned, and which is in no way dependent on it, and as the plea is to all the counts, and fails to answer one of them, it is bad on demurrer. The sixth plea is as follows: (Here the sixth plea, as set out above, was read.) This plea denies what the plaintiff would be obliged to prove under the general issue, and consequently is bad for that cause, which has been specially assigned in the demurrer taken to it. 3 Barb. 56; Wats. Arb. 208.

Without making any serious effort to support these pleas, the defendant insists that it will appear that the declaration is also bad. It was objected to the first count, that though it shows a special agreement in the submission to perform the orders and awards of the referees as the same should from time to time be made known to the parties, it is not averred that notice was given to the defendant of the award therein declared on. Ordinarily, notice by the plaintiff to the defendant, of an award, is not necessary to be averred or proved, because the first lies as much in the knowledge of the defendant as of the plaintiff. 2 Saund. 62, note 4; Child v. Horden, 2 Bulst. 144. But where, as in this case, it is specially provided that notice of the award shall be given to the parties, it is no award, until such notice is given. Id. It should appear in this count, by some sufficient averment, that notice was given to the defendant, of the award declared on. The court avers that the award was duly made and published. The word "duly," would not, of itself, be sufficient to supply the want of a substantive allegation of a fact, necessary to the validity of the award. Everard v. Paterson, 2 Marsh. 308, 6 Taunt. 645. But "duly published," is an averment that the kind of publication required by the submission was made. For publication is made by notice from the arbitrator to the parties that his award is in readiness and can be known to them if they choose to know it; this amounts to notice and publication of the award, and such a publication satisfies a requirement in a submission, that notice of the award shall be given to the parties. MacArthur v. Campbell, 5 Barn. & Adol. 518; Musselbrook v. Dunkin, 9 Bing. 605. This objection to the first count is, therefore, not sustained.

It is further objected to the first and fourth counts, that the action of debt will not lie for two sums distinctly awarded, the one for damages and the other for costs. This is not tenable. Every action of debt on a judgment is open to the same objection, for judgments are for one sum assessed as damages, or awarded as the debt, and another for costs. There is a technical defect in these counts in the declaration, that they do not add the two amounts together, and go for the sum of both as a sum single; but I do not consider this to be bad on general demurrer. It is also urged that these counts show that the award was of a sum of money "among other things." But it does not appear that any of these "other things" were awarded to the plaintiff, and so it is not a valid objection to an action of debt. The objections which have been made to the first and fourth counts are not sustained.

The second count alleges an award, that upon the payment by the defendant to the plaintiff, of a sum of money and the delivery of a release, the plaintiff was to deliver a release to the defendant; and without an averment that the plaintiff was ready or willing, or offered to deliver his release, it goes for the recovery of the money. I am of opinion that a readiness by the plaintiff to release and notice to the defendant of such a readiness, were necessary to be averred. Taking the statements in the declaration to be true, the acts of the parties were to be concurrent, and an action cannot be sustained by either without averring and proving a readiness on his part to perform and notice thereof, or something sufficient to dispense therewith. 1 Chit. Pl. 359. For this cause, I hold the second count bad in substance.

Whether an action of debt will lie for a sum of money, where that, together with a release, was awarded, I do not determine. See 1 Saund. 201a, note 1; Cro. Car. 137; 12 Mod. 84. The second count having been held bad for another cause, and that count alone showing an award of releases, it is not necessary to decide that question.

I consider the third count good. It is very general, but I believe it contains all that is necessary. It shows certain differences existing between the parties, a submission of them to referees named, and an award upon those differences, of a sum of money to the plaintiff, pursuant to the submission. This may be a good title; and as it is confessed by the demurrer, it is sufficient.

Having thus held all the counts, except the second, good, it remains to consider the eleventh plea, and the replications thereto. Questions of great nicety have been argued upon the demurrer taken to the replications of this eleventh plea. But as the first of these replications which are demurred to, goes to support the second count only, and as that has already been held to be bad, and as I consider the plea to which this other replication is made, as also bad, I shall not express an opinion thereon. It was suggested at the bar, that a decision of these questions might have an important bearing upon questions, which are expected to arise on the trial of the issues of fact. But it cannot be now known that those questions will be presented then, precisely as they are now, upon these pleadings. Their aspect may be more or less varied when they shall arise out of the evidence, and I do not think a decision of them can be anticipated, without some risk of injustice. It is far safer to decide them, when all the facts on which they depend shall be before the court, rather than to attempt to do so now, upon certain abstract averments in the pleadings. The eleventh plea is bad for the same cause as the second plea. It shows, in bar of the whole action, a revocation of one submission only. Four submissions are shown by the declaration. The result is that the second count, and the second, sixth, and eleventh pleas are bad. The other counts are good.

Case No. 9,289.

MATTHEWS et al. v. MENEDGER et al.

[2 McLean, 145.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1840.

JUDGMENT—ON TRESPASS—BAR—ELECTION—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—INDEMNIFICATION—SPECIAL LIEN—POSSESSION—INTEREST AS DAMAGES.

1. A judgment against one of several joint trespassers, is no bar to an action against another individual for the same trespass.

2. Having several judgments for the same trespass, the plaintiff may make his election on which one he will take out execution.

3. In such a case there can be but one satisfaction. The same rule applies in the action of trover, for successive conversions, by different individuals, of the same property.

4. The record of a judgment for the same cause can only be received in evidence to bar the plaintiffs' action, or to show that certain proceedings, under it, have operated to change the right of property.

5. Where a person becomes an agent to purchase wheat, or any other article, and a part of the money raised to pay for the wheat was obtained on his credit, he may withhold the delivery of the wheat, until he is indemnified. And this is especially the rule where the principal is insolvent, and the liability of the agent to pay is about to be enforced.

6. A factor has a lien for all advances, on account of his principal, for balances due, or for liabilities incurred in the course of their business. But this lien is special, and is connected with the possession of the property.

[Cited in Jordan v. James, 5 Ohio, 100; McGraft v. Rugee, 60 Wis. 409, 19 N. W. 531.]

7. If the property be voluntarily delivered, the lien is extinguished, and can not be reasserted. But if the delivery be special, so that the factor still retains the control of the property, the lien is not relinquished.

8. A jury, in the exercise of their discretion, may give interest on the value of property converted, as a part of the damages.

[This was a suit for damages by Matthews and Hopkins against P. & E. L. Menedger.]

Ewing & Stansbery, for plaintiffs.

Vinton & Wright, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action of trover, for a flatboat, and five thousand bushels of wheat, in barrels and sacks. It was proved that the plaintiffs were merchants in Baltimore, and in September, 1836, they made a contract with McCourtney and Read, merchants of Wheeling, to purchase for them a large quantity of wheat, which they were to have shipped to the plaintiffs by the way of New Orleans. Flatboats were to be used in conveying the wheat to New Orleans. At the time of the contract the plaintiffs advanced to McCourtney and Read ten thousand dollars, in two drafts of five thousand dollars each, which were paid at maturity. McCourtney and Read despatched an agent, by the name of Matthews, to Parkersburg, who made a contract with Chevalier, a resident of that place, to purchase the wheat at five per cent. upon the cost; McCourtney and Read to furnish the money. The sum of one thousand dollars was paid in a check by Matthews, and this Chevalier stated was sufficient, as it would enable him to make a small advance to the farmers on the purchase of the wheat. Chevalier having purchased about four thousand bushels of wheat, called on McCourtney and Read for money to complete the payments on this purchase, who drew a bill of exchange on E. Dorsey, for three thousand dollars, payable to the order of Cowgill & Son, at some bank in Baltimore. This bill was accepted by Dorsey, and made payable to Chevalier, by the indorsement of Cowgill & Son. It was negotiated by one of the banks at Wheeling or Pittsburg, and the proceeds were paid to Chevalier, he being the last indorser. A flatboat was sent down to Spencer's farm, near Parkersburg, by McCourtney and Read, in charge of Ford, to receive the wheat. Shortly after this McCourtney and Read failed, and made an assignment of their effects. Before this was done they applied to Forsythe and Atturbury, of Wheeling, to become the agents of the plaintiffs, and represented that, they having advanced money to buy wheat, it was just that the wheat purchased should inure to their benefit. The proposed agency was accepted by Forsythe and Atturbury, and they despatched Matthews, as their agent, to Chevalier to inform him of the failure of McCourtney and Read, and that the wheat belonged to the plaintiffs; and he was, also, authorized to inform Chevalier that the bill for three thousand dollars, indorsed by him, would not be paid. Matthews communicated this intelligence to Chevalier before the loading of the boat was completed, there having been placed on board of it between fifteen hundred and two thousand bushels. This was the first intimation received by Chevalier that the plaintffs had any interest in the wheat. He acted as the agent of McCourtney and Read, and supposed he made the purchase on their account. There was no more wheat delivered on board the boat after the arrival of Matthews; and Chevalier directed Ford to take the boat to Gallipolis, where he would meet him. The boat was taken to Gallipolis, and, on the arrival of Chevalier, he sold the wheat to the defendants, with the barrels in which a part of it was contained; the sacks they returned to the boat. The defendants paid to Chevalier eighteen hundred dollars for the wheat; and, owning a merchant mill, they manufactured it, and sent the flour to New Orleans, where it was sold at a good profit. Before the sale of the wheat to the defendants they admitted that Chevalier informed them of the circumstances, but what those circumstances, thus communicated, were, does not appear from the evidence.

The defendants offered in evidence the record of a judgment, in 1839, against Chevalier, in favor of McCourtney and Read, in the state of Virginia, in an action of trover for the same wheat. And, on the record, there was an indorsement that the suit was brought for the benefit of Matthews and Hopkins. To the introduction of this record the plaintiffs objected, as it was not between the same parties, and could for no legal purpose be received in evidence. But the defendant's counsel insisted that it was evidence, if not as a bar to the plaintiffs' action, to show where the legal right to the wheat was vested, to influence the jury in their assessment of damages in the present action; and, also, to show that, by the judgment in Virginia, the right of property, in the wheat, became vested in Chevalier. The form of the action in Virginia was the act of the attorney, and if he, by mistake, brought the action in the names of McCourtney and Read instead of the plaintiffs, that should not operate to their prejudice. So far as that action was concerned, the plaintiffs were bound by the acts of their attorney, as matters of form as well as to matters of substance, but beyond these they were not bound. The indorsement on the record, that the suit was brought for the use of the plaintiffs, is a fact, which it is not perceived can be received as evidence in this case. The indorsement was the act of the attorney, and cannot affect the rights of the plaintiffs in any other suit. Nor can the court perceive how the damages, recovered in the Virginia judgment, can influence the jury in the present case. The parties are different, and the evidence is different. How then can the jury be guided, or in the least degree influenced, by the verdict in Virginia? If the Virginia judgment can be received in evidence, it must be received in bar of the plaintiffs' action, or to show a change of property.

The defendants' counsel do not insist that, under the circumstances, the Virginia judgment is a bar to the present action. To constitute a bar the judgment must not only have been for the same subject matter, but between the same parties. Did the Virginia judgment operate to vest the right of property in Chevalier, the defendant? That this effect must be given to the judgment, is strongly insisted on by the defendant's counsel. And if this position be sustained there is an end to the present action. For, if the right of property to the wheat was in Chevalier, his sale to the defendants can not be shaken. How can the obtainment of the judgment operate a change in the right of property? Before the rendition of the judgment the plaintiffs had the right of property, and a demand against Chevalier for converting it to his own use; and after the judgment this demand remains, though it has assumed a different form.

A judgment against one of several joint trespassers is no bar to an action against either of the others. There is some conflict of decision on this point, but the weight of authority, and the current of modern decisions, sustain the above principle. All joint trespassers are liable severally as well as jointly, and the rule is well established, that there may be several judgments against different individuals for the same trespass, but only one satisfaction. Wright v. Lathrop, 2 Ohio, 33; 8 Cow. 43; 1 Johns. 290. After several judgments are obtained for the same trespass, the plaintiff may make his election, on which judgment he will take out execution; and, having done this, he can not proceed on the other judgments. From this it appears that one joint trespasser can not plead in bar a prior judgment against another for the same trespass; but to be a good bar the plea must state that the prior judgment has been satisfied, or, at least, that the plaintiff has elected to take the judgment by issuing execution on it. Where the judgment has been satisfied, which extinguishes the demand of the plaintiff, for the value of the property, the right of the property must, consequently, vest in the defendant. He has paid its value to the plaintiff, and, in addition, perhaps, something for the manner in which the property was taken. But before this satisfaction the defendant can set up no color of right to the property, on the ground that a judgment has been obtained against him for its value. The same rule that applies in a case of joint trespassers, in regard to the plea of a prior judgment in bar, and the change of property, must apply with equal, if not greater, propriety, in successive actions of trover, brought against different individuals, for the conversion of the same property.

In the case under consideration the judgment against Chevalier did not vest the property in him, and, consequently, he had no right, on this ground, to sell it to the defendants. And if the defendants, on demand, refused to deliver the property to the plaintiffs, they were guilty of a conversion, and are liable in this action. From these considerations the court think the record of the Virginia judgment is not evidence to bar the plaintiffs' action; to influence the jury in their assessment of the damages in this case; to show in whom the legal right to the property is vested; or, for any other conceivable legal purpose. Before the jury the counsel contended that the right of property was clearly shown, by the evidence, to be in the plaintiffs. That McCourtney and Read acted as their agents, and received from them ten thousand dollars. That the indorsement of the draft, by Chevalier, for the three thousand dollars, gave him no lien on the wheat purchased. That it was an ordinary case of indorsement, which gave the indorser no specific lien on the property of the drawer, when it might happen to come into his hands. But that, if a lien could arise out of this transaction, the delivery of the wheat, by Chevalier, on board of the plaintiffs' boat, and to Ford, their agent, who had charge of the boat, it was relinquished, and can not afterwards be asserted. That this delivery placed the wheat as much out of the power and control of Chevalier, as if it had been delivered into the warehouse of the plaintiffs. That the lien of a factor or agent is inseparable from the actual or implied possession of the property. That a tortious possession does not divert the lien, but that every voluntary relinquishment of the possession of the property is an abandonment of the lien. That the greater part of the wheat purchased was not delivered, and that to such part, if a lien existed, the plaintiffs could set up no claim, as against Chevalier, without indemnifying him. That it was not shown that Chevalier had paid more than one half of the three thousand dollar bill, though he had the bill in his possession; and having retained more than half of the wheat purchased, and the sum of eighteen hundred dollars received from the defendants, he was bound, in justice, to account to the defendants for any loss or damages they should sustain by the purchase of the wheat. That if the plaintiffs should recover in this action, they would still be losers, by the failure of McCourtney and Read, about eight thousand dollars, and that Chevalier could have no ground of complaint, if he, by giving credit as an indorser to the same firm of McCourtney and Read, should, also, sustain a loss which, at most, would be very small in comparison with the plaintiffs'.

These positions were all controverted by the counsel for the defendants, and they insisted there was no such delivery of the wheat, in question, as divested the lien of Chevalier. The court instructed the jury, substantially, as follows:

After recapitulating the evidence, as above stated, you must be satisfied, gentlemen, that the legal right of property in this wheat was in the plaintiffs, before you can find in their favor. And this the plaintiffs insist has been shown by the contract with McCourtney and Read, the advance to them of ten thousand dollars, and the fact of the purchase of the wheat, by Chevalier, under their direction. So far as it regards this right, it can be of no importance, whether Chevalier had any knowledge of it or not. He, no doubt, until after the failure of McCourtney and Read, considered himself as their agent in purchasing the wheat. And he looked to them, only, for the necessary funds. But this could not, in any respect, affect the agency for the plaintiffs, under which McCourtney and Read acted. It is by no means necessary, in establishing their right, for the plaintiffs to show that the same money advanced to McCourtney and Read was handed over to Chevalier. Having made the advance, McCourtney and Read were bound, in good faith, to purchase the wheat and pay for it; and so far as such purchase was made by themselves or their agent, as against them, the legal right to the wheat, was, unquestionably, in the plaintiffs. If the indorsement, by Chevalier, of the three thousand dollar draft, was one of ordinary occurrence, as contended by the plaintiffs' counsel, it is clear that it gave him no specific lien on the property of the drawer. But is this the character of that transaction? Chevalier had engaged to purchase wheat for McCourtney and Read, and had, in fact, purchased four thousand bushels, at one dollar per bushel, having received from them an advance of one thousand dollars; he calls upon them for funds to complete his payments, and the sum of three thousand dollars is raised, partly on his credit. And about the time he was to deliver the wheat, he is informed that McCourtney and Read had failed, and that the bill which he had indorsed would not be paid. Under these circumstances had not Chevalier a right to withhold the delivery of the wheat until he was indemnified? The court think he had, whether such delivery was demanded by McCourtney and Read or the plaintiffs. In making the purchase Chevalier acted as the agent of McCourtney and Read; and the rule of law which applies to a factor will apply equally to him. A factor has a lien on the property of the principal, in his hands, for all advances made, and for any balance that may be due. The lien, also, exists for responsibilities incurred by the factor for the principal, in the general course of their business. And this is, especially, the case where the principal is insolvent, and the liability of the factor is about to be enforced. 3 Har. & J. 339; 6 Greenl. 51–57; 10 Wend. 318; 2 Kent, Comm. 638, 639.

No case could well be imagined which could more strongly illustrate the propriety and justice of the rule, which gives a lien for responsibilities incurred, than the one under consideration. But this lien is put an end to by a voluntary delivery of the property. And this case must turn on the fact of the delivery of the wheat, by Chevalier, in the boat, to Ford, the agent of McCourtney and Read, or of the plaintiffs, it matters not which. The boat was purchased by McCourtney and Read for the plaintiffs, in pursuance of their contract, and the management of the boat was committed to Ford. It seems from fifteen hundred to two thousand bushels of wheat were delivered on board of this boat by Chevalier. This was done before he was informed of the insolvency of McCourtney and Read; that the wheat belonged to the plaintiffs; and that the bill he had indorsed would not be paid. Now, if there was an unconditional delivery of this wheat to the agent of the plaintiffs, or of McCourtney and Read, the lien was abandoned. The factor or agent can not stop property in transitu, where he has voluntarily delivered up the possession of it, on any pretence that he has a lien upon it for advances made on account of the principal. Having parted with the possession of the property he has relinquished his lien and can not reassert it. The owner may, in some cases, regain the possession of property, sold and delivered by him, and hold it until the payment of the consideration shall be received. But this can not be done by a factor whose interest is special, and connected with the possession. If you shall find that the delivery of the wheat was conditional, and, in fact, made to Ford as the agent of Chevalier, and to be subject to his control, then there was not such a delivery as divested Chevalier's lien, and the plaintiffs must fail in their action. If the wheat had been lost between the place where it was put on board of the boat and Gallipolis, whose loss would it have been? This may illustrate the character of the delivery. For if there was such a delivery as to make the loss that of the plaintiffs, then there is no ground on which the lien of Chevalier can be enforced. With the possession he parted with the lien. But, on the contrary, if the loss, had one occurred, could have been charged to Chevalier, then he did not part with the possession, or the lien connected with it.

The jury will determine from the evidence as to the effect of the delivery of this wheat, under the above rule. It is immaterial, if you shall find for the plaintiffs, whether the defendants had notice or not of the foregoing circumstances, prior to their purchase of the wheat. For if the lien of Chevalier was extinguished by a delivery of the property, he could convey no right to it which can defeat the plaintiffs' title. A demand of the property, by the plaintiffs, under such circumstances, and a refusal by the defendants, is all that is necessary to sustain the action. Should you find for the plaintiffs, you have a right, in the exercise of your discretion, to include interest on the value of the property sold to the defendants from the time of its conversion, as a part of the damages.

The jury could not agree on their verdict, and they were discharged by the court, and the cause was continued.

At the subsequent term the case was submitted to the jury on, substantially, the same charge, when the jury found for the plaintiffs.

Case No. 9,290.

MATTHEWS v. OFFLEY.

[3 Sumn. 115.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1837.

SHIPPING—PENALTIES—ACTION—HOW BROUGHT—DESTITUTE SEAMEN—REFUSAL TO TRANSPORT—AMERICAN SEAMEN—WHO ARE—DESERTION.

1. An action for a forfeiture or penalty must be brought in the name of the government, and not of a private person, unless some other mode is expressly provided by statute.

2. Under the act of congress of 1803, c. 62, [2 Story's Laws, 883; 2 Stat. 203, c. 9], providing for the recovery of a penalty, for the benefit of the United States, where a master refuses to take destitute seamen on board and transport them to the United States, the action for the penalty must be brought in the name of the United States, and not of the consul or vice-consul.

3. Under the act above mentioned, the certificate of the consul is prima facie evidence of the refusal of the master to take the seamen on board, and of all the facts stated in the enacting clause, which are necessary to bring the case within the penalty.

[Approved in Burbank v. People, 90 Ill. 555. Cited in Holmes v. Hunt, 122 Mass. 517.]

4. If a seaman be entitled to the privileges of an American seaman, and be destitute, the consul is the proper judge as to the ship on board of which he should be placed for his return to the United States.

5. Foreigners, while employed as seamen in the merchant-ships of the United States, are deemed to be "mariners and seamen of the United States," within the language and policy of the act of 1803, c. 62 [c. 9].

6. The fact of desertion from an American ship,—whether she be in port or not at the time when the seaman becomes destitute,—does not supersede the authority of the consul to require another American ship to bring him to the United States.

Error to the district court of Massachusetts in an action of debt, brought by the defendant in error, against the plaintiff in error, to recover the penalty of one hundred dollars, prescribed by the act concerning consuls, &c., of the 28th February, 1803 (Act 1803, c. 62 [2 Story's Laws, 883; 2 Stat. 203, c. 9]), for his refusal, as master of the brig Gem, to take a destitute seaman of the United States on board at the port of Smyrna, at which the defendant in error was vice-consul of the United States.

The declaration was in substance as follows:—"For that the said Matthews, heretofore, to wit, on the 28th day of September last past, was the master and commander of a certain brig called the Gem, a ship or vessel of the said United States, owned by certain citizens thereof, whose names are as yet unknown to the said vice-consul; and which said brig, then lying in the port of Smyrna aforesaid, being a foreign port, was bound to the port of Boston, a port in the said United States; and he, the said Matthews, then and there being the master of said brig, was requested by the said vice-consul to take on board the said brig one William Mann, being then and there a destitute seaman of the said United States, and to transport the said Mann to the port of Boston aforesaid; and the said vice-consul then and there tendered to the said Matthews the sum of ten dollars, as a compensation for receiving and transporting the said Mann as aforesaid; but the said Matthews did then and there wholly refuse to receive the said Mann on board the said brig, against the law, peace, and dignity of the said United States, and contrary to the form of the statute of said United States in such case made and provided: By reason whereof, and by force of said statute, the said Matthews has forfeited and become liable to pay the sum of one hundred dollars, to be recovered for the benefit of the said United States, by the said vice-consul, in his own name. Yet the said Matthews, although often required, has not paid to the said consul the said sum," &c.

Upon the trial upon the issue of nil debet in the district court [case unreported], a verdict was found for the original plaintiff, upon which judgment was entered; and a bill of exceptions being taken at the trial by the original defendant, the cause was now brought to this court.

The bill of exceptions was in substance as follows:—To maintain the issue on his part, the plaintiff's counsel offered in evidence the certificate of the plaintiff, as vice-consul of the United States for the port of Smyrna, which is in the words and figures following, viz.:

"Consulate of the United States. I, David W. Offley, vice-consul of the United States, hereby certify, that on the twenty-eighth day of the present month of September, as vice-consul aforesaid, I requested Richard Matthews, master and commander of the brig Gem, of Boston, of the burthen of one hundred and sixty-one tons, or thereabouts, then being a vessel belonging to a citizen or citizens of the United States, and lying in the port of Smyrna, to take on board his said brig William Mann, a seaman of the United States, and then being destitute within my official district, and to transport him to Boston, the port for which the said brig was then destined and soon to sail, on such terms not exceeding ten dollars for the said seaman; and that I then and there tendered to him, the said Richard Matthews, the sum of ten dollars for the said seaman as a compensation for receiving and transporting him as aforesaid, the said seaman being ready to be received (and then and there present) by the said Richard Matthews on board his said brig. But the said Richard Matthews, then and there and ever afterwards, altogether refused and neglected to receive the said seaman on board his said ship, and to transport him as aforesaid. In faith whereof, I have made this certificate under my hand and official seal, at Smyrna, this 30th day of September, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six. (L. S.) (Signed) David W. Offley, Vice-Consul."

"I, David W. Offley, vice-consul, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy from the original, existing in the register of this consulate. Witness my hand and the seal of office, at Smyrna, this 30th day of September, 1836. David W. Offley, Vice-Consul."

This was objected to as evidence of any facts therein stated, except the refusal of the defendant to take said seaman on board, but the district judge admitted the said certificate as prima facie evidence of all the facts therein certified to. The plaintiff's counsel also produced and put into the case a custom-house copy of the list of the crew of the ship Mars for the voyage referred to in the deposition hereinafter mentioned, and the name of the said William Mann there appeared as one of the said crew.

The defendant's counsel requested the judge to order the plaintiff to be nonsuited, because the action should have been in the name of the United States, and not in the name of this plaintiff; but the judge ruled that the action was rightly brought in the name of this plaintiff.

The defendant's counsel further requested the judge to instruct the jury, that if the said seaman had deserted from the ship Mars at Smyrna, the consul had no authority to require the defendant to take the said seaman on board his vessel, while the Mars was lying in the port of Smyrna, but should have restored him to the ship Mars; and that while the Mars was lying in the port of Smyrna, the said seaman was not a distressed seaman within the meaning of the statute on which the action was founded. And he further requested the said judge to instruct the jury, that, if the said William Mann was a British seaman, he had no American character, except while he continued to be one of the crew of an American ship, and that, by deserting from the Mars in the port of Smyrna, his American character was at an end, and he was no longer entitled to protection and relief as an American seaman. But it was left to the jury to consider and determine, whether it was satisfactorily proved by the evidence given, that the said William Mann was an Englishman, or a deserter from the ship Mars; or whether the ship Mars was in the port of Smyrna when the defendant was required by the consul to receive the said Mann on board the brig Gem, of which he was master. And the jury were further instructed by the judge, that the consul might rightfully judge on board of what vessel, then being in the port of Smyrna, belonging to a citizen of the United States, and bound to the United States, he would place the said William Mann, if then and there a destitute mariner of the United States in that port, though it were now proved, that the said William was at that time an English subject, and a deserter from the ship Mars; that, having acquired the character of a mariner of the United States, by becoming one of the crew of the ship Mars, in manner above stated, he was, if destitute or in distress, entitled to relief from the consul of the United States, under the act of congress on the subject; and the consul might rightfully require the defendant to receive him on board for conveyance to the United States, on the terms specified in and by the act aforesaid; and that the defendant, master of the ship Gem, could not legally refuse compliance with such requirement, on the ground, that the ship Mars, of which the said William Mann was one of the mariners, was at that time in the port of Smyrna.

B. R. Curtis, for plaintiff in error.
Mr. Mills, Dist. Atty., for the other side.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Three questions have been made and argued at the bar. The first is, whether the present action is well brought by the vice-consul in his own name to recover the penalty, or whether the action ought not to have been brought in the name of the United States. Upon general principles, where a pecuniary penalty or forfeiture is inflicted for any public offence or wrong, it seems clear, that the action to recover the penalty or forfeiture must be brought in the name of the government, and not in the name of any private party, unless some other mode for the recovery is prescribed by some statute; and the usual remedy in cases of a pecuniary penalty is an action or information of debt by the government itself. Ex parte Marquand [Case No. 9,100]. This is the rule of the common law; and, therefore, it has been held, that a suit will not lie by a common informer for such a penalty, unless power is given to him for that purpose by statute (Fleming v. Bailey, 5 East, 313); neither will an indictment lie for such a penalty, unless also specially allowed by statute (Rex v. Malland, 2 Strange, 828; Ex parte Marquand [supra]), for it is properly recoverable as a debt in a court of revenue, by the government; and is in no just sense, a criminal proceeding. The whole question on this point, then, resolves itself into this: whether the present action by the vice-consul has been authorized by any statute of the United States.

The act of 1803, c. 62 [c. 9], on which this suit is founded, in the 4th section, makes it the duty of our consuls and vice-consuls, &c., to provide for destitute seamen within their districts; and requires all masters of American vessels bound to some port of the United States on request of our consuls and vice-consuls, &c., to take such seamen on board, and transport them to the United States upon certain terms and conditions prescribed by the act; and inflicts upon the masters a penalty of $100 for refusing so to do. Nothing is said in the act as to the person by whom, or the mode in which, this penalty shall be sued for or recovered "for the benefit of the United States, in any court of competent jurisdiction." Now, this section is a substitute for the seventh section of the act of 1792, c. 24 [1 Stat. 255], on the same subject, which the act of 1803, c. 62, § 5 [2 Story's Laws, 883; 2 Stat. 203, c. 9], has repealed; and which prescribed, that the penalty therein provided for the like refusal of the masters, should be sued for and recovered "for the benefit of the United States, by the said consul or vice-consul in his own name, in any court of competent jurisdiction." The omission of these latter words in the act of 1803, c. 62 [c. 9], would seem to furnish a clear proof of a change of the legislative intention as to the mode of suing for the penalty; and it seems to me, is decisive of the question. The omission of the words must be attributed to design, and leaves no ground, upon which a court of justice can presume any right or authority of the consul or vice-consul, &c., to sue; since the whole penalty is to be for the benefit of the United States. The second section of the act of 1803, c. 62 [c. 9], furnishes also an indirect argument to the same effect. By that section, the masters of American ships, on their arrival in foreign ports, are required to deposit the ship's papers with the American consul or vice-consul, &c.; and it inflicts upon the master, for the refusal or neglect so to deposit them, a penalty of $500, which is to be recovered "by the consul, or vice-consul, &c., in his own name, for the benefit of the United States, in any court of competent jurisdiction." The common maxim is, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius." If the legislature meant to provide for the recovery of the penalty in the same manner, in each case, they would have naturally used the same language, and have inserted the same provisions. But, if we are satisfied that the omission was purely the result of accident, or negligence, or mistake, it would not aid the court on the present occasion; for courts of justice are not at liberty to supply the defects of legislation, even if they were at liberty to presume them to be unintentional, or founded in mistake or negligence. My opinion is, therefore, that this point is fatal to the very foundation of the present suit. But counsel on each side have requested the court to give an opinion upon the other points in the cause, in order to settle the merits of the controversy, which would otherwise be brought forward in another suit, in the name of the United States.

The next question is to the ruling of the learned judge of the district court, in admitting the certificate of the vice-consul, stated in the bill of exceptions, as primâ facie evidence of all the facts therein certified; whereas, the counsel for the original defendant contended, and now contend, that it was not evidence, except of the refusal of the defendant to take the seaman on board. The fourth section of the act of 1803, after the provisions which have been already alluded to, proceeds to declare, "And the certificate of such consul or commercial agent, given under his hand and official seal, shall be primâ facie evidence of such refusal, in any court of law having jurisdiction for the recovery of the penalty aforesaid." The whole question turns upon what is to be understood as intended to be included in the statute. Is it the dry naked fact, that the master refused to take a seaman on board, giving his name, at the request of the consul, &c.? Or does the statute mean by the words "such refusal," a refusal under the circumstances stated in the preceding part of the section? My opinion is, that the latter is the true interpretation of the statute. It meant to provide, that the certificate should contain and be evidence, primâ facie, of all the facts stated in the enacting clause of the section, which is necessary to bring the case within the penalty; for all those facts are indispensable to make it "such refusal" as the statute contemplates. Upon any other construction the enactment would be wholly nugatory for all the purposes of enforcing the statute; since every material fact to enforce the penalty must be proved aliunde the certificate. The statute placed confidence in the consul, as a public officer, bound to the performance of highly responsible duties, and meant to make his certificate the proper and ordinary proof, though not conclusive proof, of all the facts to sustain a suit for the penalty. That is to say, it meant that he should certify, that the seaman was a seaman of the United States, was destitute, that he requested the master of an American ship, bound to the United States, to take him on board and transport him to a port of the United States, for the statute compensation, with a proviso that he should not be compelled to take more than two seamen for every one hundred tons burthen of the ship, and that he refused so to do. "Such refusal," and no other, would constitute an offence within the statute; and such refusal and no other is to be certified. Now, the present certificate contains the allegations of these necessary facts; and none other; and, therefore, it seems to me, that it was properly admissible, in the whole, according to the ruling of the district judge.

The third and last question is, as to the instruction given to the jury by the district judge upon the prayer of the counsel for the original defendant. The instruction in substance was, that the consul was the proper judge on board of what American vessel he would place the seaman (William Mann), if destitute; that if he was an English subject, and a deserter from another American ship (The Mars), then in the same port of Smyrna, yet, having acquired the character of a seaman of the United States by becoming one of the crew of the Mars, he was, if destitute, entitled to relief from the consul, and the consul might rightfully require the original defendant to take him on board; and the defendant could not lawfully refuse to take him on board, on the ground of his being a deserter from the Mars, and her being in the same port.

In regard to the first part of the instruction, it does not seem to me that there can be any real ground for doubt. If a seaman be entitled to the privileges of an American seaman, and be destitute, the consul is the proper judge on board of what ship he should be placed, for his return to the United States.

In regard to the other parts of the instruction, it has not been contended that no other destitute seamen are within the act of 1803, c. 62 [c. 9], except those who are American citizens. It is notorious, that our laws authorize and allow foreigners to be employed as seamen in the merchant-ships of the United States; and while so employed, they are clearly within the protection of our laws; and it seems to me they are to be deemed to be "mariners and seamen of the United States," within the language and policy of the act of 1803, c. 62 [c. 9]. There seems a studious caution in the act not to confine the relief to American citizens; but to give the benefit of it to all seamen in the merchant service, whether natives or foreigners. But the argument is, that foreigners are no longer to be considered as holding the character of "mariners and seamen of the United States," than while they actually belong to a ship of the United States in that character. I greatly doubt if that proposition is maintainable in its full extent. Many cases may be stated, in which such a construction would involve great inconveniences and hardships, and be repugnant to the sound policy of the act. Suppose, for example, an American ship, with some foreigners composing a part of her crew, should be totally lost by shipwreck on a foreign coast; or should be captured and condemned in a foreign country; or should be sold in a foreign country; it would be a violent construction of the act to insist, that because the foreign seamen were absolved from their contract by such a disaster or sale, they were to lose their character as American seamen, although they were intent upon an immediate return to the country for the purpose of engaging anew in our merchant's service, and they and their families had a known domicil in the United States. Suppose a foreign seaman should be left ashore by one of our ships, on her departure from a foreign port, by accident, or mistake, or design; it would be difficult to support the doctrine, that he thereby lost his character as an American seaman in such a case, if his avowed domicil was in the United States. I do not know, that it ought to make any difference, if the case should be that of a foreign seaman voluntarily discharged from an American ship in a foreign port; or turned ashore for gross misconduct; or compelled to quit the ship from cruelty or gross ill treatment by the officers of the ship; if in each of these cases the seaman had his domicil in the United States, and had a bonâ fide intention to return to and remain in our marine service. It seems to me, that, where a foreign seaman has once acquired a domicil in the United States, and is engaged in our merchants' service, and retains, if I may so say, the habits of that service, and upon every discharge from one ship still has the animus revertendi to that service and domicil, he must be treated as intending to retain his acquired character of an American seaman, and his acquired American domicil. Some overt act on his own part, such as engaging in some foreign service, or resuming his original native character, or disowning his American character and domicil, seems to me indispensable to rebut the presumption that he still attaches himself to the American service. It does not strike me that his desertion from another American ship, at least, unless followed up by engaging in some foreign service, ought to have such an effect. If his desertion be without good cause and unjustifiable, although he has broken the shipping articles on his side, it is not dissolved. He cannot shake off his contract in this way. He is still in contemplation of law a seaman of the ship from which he deserted, and may be compelled to return to duty. If, on the other hand, upon his desertion the master justifiably declines to take him on board again, and cuts him adrift from the ship's service, he will then be discharged from the ship's service; but it by no means follows, that he is to be deemed discharged from the American marine service altogether, or that he has ceased, ipso facto, against his will, to be entitled to the protection of American seamen. I am, therefore, by no means prepared to admit that the fact of desertion from the Mars, if fully established, would, in this case, prove that the seaman was not entitled, if destitute, to the privileges of the act.

Nor do I think that the fact of the Mars being in port, supposing the seaman to have deserted from her, would per se establish that he was not a destitute seaman within the sense of the act. If the master of the Mars would not receive him on board again, he might be truly said to be a destitute seaman, if he could not find any other employment in the American service. The fact that the Mars was at the time in port would be a strong ingredient in the case to establish that he was not a destitute seaman, if he would have been received again on board of the ship for duty. But of itself it cannot be held, in point of law, as conclusive proof that he was not destitute. But I do not find that this point was ever required to be put to the jury under this aspect. Nor do I find any thing in the instructions of the district judge which precluded the jury from taking this matter into consideration, as matter of fact. For these reasons it does not appear to me, that there is any error in the instruction of the district judge given to the jury. The mere dry fact, that a seaman has deserted from an American ship, whether she be in port or not at the time, when the seaman became destitute, does not seem to me to supersede the authority of the consul to require another American ship to bring him to the United States. If the ship, from which he has deserted, has left the port, I do not understand, that the argument insists, that the consul may not, if he is destitute, require him to be brought home in another ship. Mere desertion, then, does not oust the consul's authority, or disqualify the seaman from the protection and assistance intended by the act. The fact of the ship's being still in port, from which he deserted, does not, in point of law, show, that he is not destitute, however proper, as a matter of fact, it may be for the consideration of the jury on that point.

Upon the whole my opinion is, that the two last objections to the ruling of the district judge are not maintainable. But, inasmuch as the suit is not brought in the name of the United States, and the vice-consul is not authorized by law to bring it in his name, the judgment must be reversed. Judgment reversed accordingly.

Case No. 9,291.

MATTHEWS v. SKATES et al.

[1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 602; Merw. Pat. Inv. 663.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Alabama. April, 1860.

PATENTS—INVENTION—WHEN REACHED—DATE OF PATENT—IDEA FIRST PERFECTED—SIMILARITY OF STRUCTURE—EQUIVALENTS.

1. It is not until the reflections, investigations, and experiments of the inventor have reached such a point of maturity that he not only has a clear and definite idea of the principle and of its application, but has reduced his idea to practice and embraced it in some distinct form, that it can be said that he has achieved a new and useful invention. This must necessarily be sometime, more or less, before the date of the patent, and sometime, more or less, after the first conception by the inventor.

2. To defeat a patent, it must appear that the invention was substantially communicated to the patentee by some other person, so that, without the exercise of any inventive power of his own, he could have applied it to practice.

3. Though others may have previously had similar ideas, and may have experimented upon them, the person who first perfected the idea and made it capable of practical use, is the inventor, and entitled to a patent.

4. Similarity in the structure, appearance, and effect of two things, is presumptive evidence of their being made in the same way.

5. It is not necessary to constitute an infringement that a man should work by the specifications contained in the patent. He might not even know there was such a patent, and yet infringe it.

6. Where a patent is granted for a composition made of several ingredients, it covers and embraces known equivalents of each of the ingredients.

7. An equivalent of any substance is another substance having similar properties, and producing substantially the same effect.

This was an action [by William J. Matthews against B. S. Skates and others] on the case tried before Judge Jones and a jury, to recover damages for the alleged infringement of letters patent [No. 5,767], for an "improved composition for metallic packing in steam engines," granted to Green S. Cox, October 2, 1849. The invention consisted of a composition of lead, zinc, tin, and antimony, for the purpose of forming a steam-tight packing.

E. S. Dargan and F. M. Taylor, for defendants.

JONES, District Judge, (charging jury). This action is brought by the plaintiff, as assignee of a patent issued to Green S. Cox, October 2, 1849, to recover damages for an alleged infringement by the defendants. The patent to Cox, with the specifications attached, has been read in evidence to you, and it is admitted that it was duly assigned to the plaintiff in July last. The defendants, among other grounds of defense, insist that the invention described in the patent to Cox was previously known to and used by Babbitt, and is covered by a prior patent to Babbitt, which is also in evidence before you.

That you may properly understand the nature and effect of these patents, as instruments of evidence, I will first state to you the object and source of the provisions of the patent laws. The object of the patent laws is to encourage inventors by securing to them for a limited period (fourteen years) the benefit of their inventions. It is not every invention, however, that will be thus encouraged. To be entitled to a patent, the applicant must not only be the first inventor of the thing to be patented, but the invention must be new and useful. To guard the public as far as possible against patents being taken out by other persons than the first inventors, or for little, frivolous, useless changes or inventions, a particular office has been established, called the "patent office," under the superintendence of a commissioner of patents.

A number of examiners are appointed, presumed to have skill and experience in such matters. Every application for a patent must be addressed to this office, and subjected to the scrutiny of these officers. The applicant must make oath that he is the original inventor; he must file specifications minutely describing his invention, and furnish accurate models or specimens of his invention. He must show that his invention is new and useful. All this must be done to the satisfaction of the proper officers of the government, before a patent will be granted. Having gone through this ordeal, the law very properly makes the patent, when issued, prima facie evidence that the invention is new and useful, and that the patentee is the first inventor. The construction of the patent to Cox, and also of the patent to Babbitt, presents questions of law for the court to decide. It is for the court to decide, from the language of the patent and the specification attached to it (which is part of the patent) what is the invention embraced by Cox's patent, and what is the invention embraced by Babbitt's patent, and to determine whether they are or are not substantially the same. The invention of Babbitt is an improved mode for making boxes for axles and gudgeons in the manner set forth in his specifications; that is to say, by the casting of hard pewter or composition metal, of which tin is the basis, into said boxes, they being first prepared and provided, or not, with rims or ledges, and coated with tin, as described in the specifications. This is not a patent for the making of tin, pewter, or any composition metal, but for making boxes for axles or gudgeons of the materials, and in the manner described in his specifications. In Cox's patent, some difficulty arises from a slight variance between the language used in the first part and that used in the latter part of the specification. The patent recites that Cox "alleged that he has invented a new and useful improved composition for metallic packing in steam engines." In the specifications, Cox states that the nature of his invention consists in a composition of the following metals, to-wit: lead, zinc, tin, and antimony, for the purpose of forming a steam-tight packing, etc. He then states the proportion in which these metals are to be generally used in making the composition, and the manner in which the composition is formed into rings and applied as packing. He concludes as follows: "What I claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, is the application of the composition above described, for the purpose of packing steam engines." There is manifestly some difference in the language of this claim, and the recital of his claim in the first part of the patent. But the granting part of the patent gives him an exclusive right to his invention, "a description whereof is given in the words of said Cox, in the schedule hereto annexed, and is made a part of these presents." The invention described in the schedule or specification is therefore the thing patented to Cox—that is, the application of metallic rings, made of a composition of lead, zinc, tin, and antimony, for the purpose of packing steam engines, in the manner described in his specification. This is an entirely different thing from that which was patented to Babbitt, and is not covered by Babbitt's patent.

There are four principal and material questions of fact for the jury to determine from the evidence. 1st. Was this alleged invention of Cox new and useful? However new an invention may be, it can not be legally patented unless it was also useful; and however useful it may be, it can not be legally patented unless it is new. If, therefore, you find, from the evidence, that the application of the composition described by Cox, for the purpose of packing steam engines, was not new or not useful, the patent would be void, and you should find for the defendants. In determining this question of fact, I charge you that the patent itself is prima facie evidence that this invention is both new and useful. Curt. Pat. 30; Alden v. Dewey [Case No. 153].

It is only prima facie evidence, however, and its effect is to throw upon the defendant the burden of proving that the invention is not new or is not useful. If the composition described in Cox's patent was known and used either for packing or other purposes, before his invention of it, in a form or manner substantially the same as that described by him, it would not be a new invention. A mere new use or application of a material or composition previously known is not a new invention. The point of time to which you are to look in deciding this question is the time of the invention. It is neither the date of the patent, nor is it the time when the idea was first conceived by the inventor. It is the time when the idea is not only distinct and complete in the mind of the inventor, but that idea is reduced to practice and embodied in some distinct form. Curt. Pat. 43. This must necessarily be sometime, more or less, before the date of the patent, and sometime, more or less, after the first conception by the inventor. When the idea first entered into the mind of the inventor, it is, almost necessarily, in a crude and imperfect state. His mind will naturally dwell and reflect upon it. It is not until his reflections, investigations, and experiments have reached such a point of maturity, that he not only has a clear and definite idea of the principle and of the mode and manner in which it is to be practically applied to useful purposes, but has reduced his idea to practice, and embraced it in some distinct form, that it can be said he has achieved a new and useful invention. That is the real time of his invention, though it may be months or years before he obtains a patent for it. Indeed, he would be none the less an inventor though he never obtained a patent for it. In determining the question whether the invention was new or not, that is the time to which you are to look, and not merely the date of the patent.

Cox, the patentee, has been examined as a witness before you, and he tells you he first conceived the idea of using a metallic compound for packing for steam engines in 1837, when he was an engineer on a steamboat on the Chattahoochie river; that he experimented on it from time to time; that in 1847, he became part owner of a steamboat on the Chattahoochie, and then first used the composition, as described in his specification, and found it useful and successful. You are the judges of what degree of bias he labored under when testifying, and of what weight and credit is to be given to his testimony. You are also to give due consideration to the testimony of other witnesses on this point, and decide upon the whole testimony whether the alleged invention was or was not new and useful at the time it was made. If you find it was not new or not useful, there is an end of the case, and you must render a verdict for the defendant. If, however, you find that it was new and useful, you will proceed to inquire into the next material question of fact, viz:

2d. Was or was not Cox the first inventor of the matter patented to him? In order to constitute a man an inventor, it is generally necessary that he must have exercised some inventive faculty of his own. I say generally necessary, because there might, no doubt, be cases in which an invention might be the result of pure accident. But the fact that he has received some ideas, hints, or suggestions on the subject from others, would not prevent him from being considered an inventor, and entitled to a patent as such. To have that effect, it must appear that the invention was substantially communicated to him by some other person, so that, without the exercise of any inventive power of his own, he could have applied it in practice. Though others may have previously had similar ideas, and may have experimented upon them, the person who first perfected the idea, and made it capable of practical use, is the inventor, and entitled to a patent. Curt. Pat. 48. The patent to Cox is prima facie evidence that he is the original inventor of the invention described in the patent. This throws upon the defendant the burden of proving that some other person was the inventor. I presume you remember the evidence on this point on both sides. It is for you to weigh and consider all the evidence, and determine from it whether Cox was or was not the first inventor. If he was not, that ends the case, and you should find for the defendants. If he was the first inventor, then you will proceed to inquire into the next material fact, viz:

3d. Have the defendants infringed on the patent granted to Cox or not? To determine this point properly, you should bear in mind what is claimed as Cox's invention, and what is patented to him. He did not claim a patent for metallic packing for steam engines of every description. Any one might, no doubt, make packing of lead, tin, copper, type-metal, or any other metal or composition previously known, without infringing on Cox's patent right. To constitute an infringement of his patent, the packing must be made substantially of the same materials as those described in Cox's patent. It is not necessary to constitute an infringement, that a man should work by the specifications contained in the patent. He might not even know there was such a patent, and yet infringe on it. Neither will a slight or immaterial change in the ingredients, or the manner of preparing them, make any difference. If, for example, a man were to use the ingredients specified in Cox's patent, and were to add a small portion of some other metal, say of copper or silver, or were to vary the proportions so that the result was not materially changed, it would be an infringement. In this case, it is not disputed but that the defendants made rings of some metallic composition for the packing of steam engines.

The question of fact for you to decide from the evidence on this branch of the case is this: Was the packing so made by the defendants substantially the same with that described in Cox's patent, or was it not? The burden of proof on this point rests on the plaintiff. He must prove that it is substantially the same. The plaintiff, to do this, has proved the manner in which Cox's metallic composition is made, and has produced a specimen of it before you, which you can examine. He has also examined witnesses as to the manner in which the defendants make metallic packing, and has produced a specimen before you which he proves came from the defendants' foundry. You can look at that specimen, also, and compare it with the other. It has been decided that similarity in the structure, appearance, and effect of two things is presumptive evidence of their being made in the same way (Curt. Pat. 226, 227), and such is the law. One of the defendants' witnesses, Mr. Stevens, who had been in their employment for many years as foreman, testified that the defendants, in making metallic packing, did not follow the specifications of Cox's patent: that they used lead, copper, tin, and antimony, generally varying the proportions as their customers wanted it harder or softer, and that he had no knowledge or recollection of their ever using zinc until within the past month. The principal difference between the two compounds, according to the testimony of this witness, is, that in Cox's, zinc is used, while in the defendants', copper, in place of zinc. It is insisted on the part of the plaintiff, that even if this be so, copper is, in such a composition, an equivalent of zinc, and its use instead of zinc, does not prevent the manufacture from being an infringement of Cox's patent. The law on this subject is, that where a patent is granted for a composition made of several ingredients, it covers and embraces known equivalents of each of the ingredients.

An equivalent of any substance is another substance having similar properties and producing substantially the same effect. Whether in such a composition as this, copper is an equivalent of zinc, is a question of fact for you to decide from the evidence, if you consider it material. Under the charges given, you will decide whether the defendants have or have not infringed on the plaintiff's patent right.

If you find from the evidence that Cox was the inventor of the invention described in his patent, and that the invention was at the time of its invention new and useful; and further, that the defendants have infringed on the patent right secured by Cox's patent, since the assignment to the plaintiff, and before the commencement of this suit, you will then inquire what damages the plaintiff has thereby sustained. Proof has been given, though not of a very exact character, of the profits made by the defendants since July last by the manufacture of the metallic packing. On this basis you can make some estimate of the damages. The amount of damages is stated by the counsel of the plaintiff, not to be their principal object in this case. The principal object is to establish the plaintiff's right. Still, if he is entitled to recover at all, you should give him such an amount of damages as, under the evidence, you find is the actual damage sustained by him by the defendants' infringement of his right.

Case No. 9,292.

MATTHEWS v. WADE.

[1 MacA. Pat. Cas. 143.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Sept., 1850.

PATENTS — INTERFERENCE APPEALS — AUTHORITY OF JUDGE TO STRIKE OUT REASONS OF APPEAL —REHEARINGS BY COMMISSIONER—FOREIGN PATENTS.

[1. The filing of the reasons of appeal is a proceeding in the patent office, over which the judge has no control, and he cannot order any of them stricken out; but when brought before him on appeal, if invalid, he will overrule them.]

[2. Under the act of 1836, §§ 7, 8 (5 Stat. 119), the power of the commissioner is not exhausted by once deciding a question of interference, and giving notice to the parties; but where cause is shown, as that material evidence was not received in time for the hearing, he may permit the unsuccessful party to withdraw his application, and refile it, and then declare anew an interference between the same parties.]

[Cited in brief in Fassett v. Ewart Manuf'g Co., 58 Fed. 364.]

[3. An application which, by permission of the commissioner, is withdrawn, and instantly refiled in the same words, must be regarded as a continuing application, so that a foreign patent, issued for the same invention more than six months before such refiling, but after the original filing, will not prevent the issuance of a patent.]

[4. The questions of the practicability and usefulness of the invention are within the discretion of the commissioner, and are not made the subject of an appeal, in a case of interfering applications.]

Appeal from the decision of the commissioner awarding priority of invention to Moses M. Matthews in respect of the "application of and substitution of rosin for linseed and other oils in the manufacture of printing ink."

Opinion of Reverdy Johnson, Attorney-General:

I have carefully considered the questions submitted to me in the case of Wade v. Matthews, conflicting claimants for a patent for applying rosin oil in the manufacture of printers' ink. The facts are these: In 1848 Wade applied for a patent, but before it was issued the like application was made by Matthews. An interference was then duly declared and notice given to the parties as in such case required. Neither party being present on the day fixed for the hearing, and no evidence received, the then commissioner (Mr. Burke) decided the priority of invention in favor of Wade, because of the priority of his application; and notice was given to Matthews that unless he appealed from the decision by a limited day a patent would be issued accordingly. An appeal was not taken; but before the time limited for taking it Matthews withdrew his application, received back his deposit of twenty dollars, and filed a new application in the words of the first. The commissioner declared an interference, and gave notice to the parties, as in the case of the original interference. Wade insists that the decision of the commissioner, upon the former application is a bar to the present, and that he has a right to a patent.

Your first inquiry is, "Can the unsuccessful party, under the circumstances, withdraw his application and refile it, and the * * * commissioner declare an interference? A proper answer to this question depends altogether, I think, upon the construction of the seventh and eighth sections of the act of July 4th, 1836, "to promote the progress of useful arts." 5 Stat. 117. There are no other provisions affecting it. If by these the entire authority vested in the commissioner is executed when he decides in a case of interference in favor of either party, and his duty, therefore, in the issuing of a patent is but ministerial, then the course pursued in this instance in declaring a second interference as between the same parties was illegal, and Wade is entitled to his patent. It is certainly true that a special authority once fully exercised is exhausted; and it is equally true that it can only be exercised in the way prescribed. It is also clear, as a general rule, that in such jurisdictions powers not delegated are not to be implied; but it is equally clear that where not expressly prohibited, they may be implied if necessary to the discharge of a power which is delegated. No authorities are cited for these propositions, as they are familiar and perfectly well settled. What, then, are the powers in a case like the present of the commissioner, and when are they fully exhausted? The power to issue a patent is under the seventh section of the act of 1836, and it is only authorized to issue when, "upon examination, it shall appear to him" that the same had not been invented or discovered by any other person in this country prior to the alleged invention or discovery thereof by the applicant, or that it had not been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, or had not been in public use or on sale with the applicant's consent or allowance prior to the application.

Being satisfied as to these several facts, and also satisfied that the invention is sufficiently useful and important, it then, and only then, becomes his duty to issue a patent. Under this provision it is manifest that the whole subject rests in the judgment of the commissioner until the patent is actually granted. It is that grant which finally decides the question submitted to him; and by the plain words of the law his authority to make the grant depends upon his being satisfied, at the moment he does make it, upon each one of the points made by the law necessary to the validity of the application. The remainder of the section only provides a mode in which, when the decision is against the applicant, he may have it reviewed by another tribunal, being by that act a board of examiners, and now, under the eleventh section of the act of March 3, 1839 (5 Stat. 353), the chief judge of the District of Columbia. As far as this section of the act of 1836 is concerned, it is clear that the authority of the commissioner is not only not exhausted by any preliminary or intervening opinion he may form on the question of title to patent before he issues the patent, but that his duty is not performed, and, on the contrary, is violated, if at the time he issues it he is not satisfied upon the facts necessary under the law to the validity of the claim. Let us now see if in this respect there is any difference between the seventh and eighth sections of the act. I think not. In the eighth, as well as in the seventh, in my opinion, the power of the commissioner is not extinguished and the matter put beyond his reach by anything to be done by him short of the issuing of the patent. The proceeding in the present case was had under the eighth section. That section provides that when an application for a patent is made which in the opinion of the commissioner would interfere with any other patent for which an application may be pending, or with any unexpired patent which shall have been granted, it shall be the duty of the commissioner to give notice thereof to such applicants or patentees, as the case may be; and if either shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the commissioner on the question of priority of right or of invention, on a hearing thereof he may appeal from such decision on the like terms and conditions as are provided in the preceding section; and the like proceedings shall be had to determine which, or whether either, of the applicants is entitled to receive a patent as prayed for.

It will be seen that this provision, as far as the act of the commissioner is concerned, refers to but one of the grounds upon which he is to be satisfied under the seventh section, and that but partly; that is to say, the ground of priority of invention between the applicant and any other applicant whose application is pending, or any unexpired patent, although other conditions required by the prior section are here omitted. Was it, then, the purpose of this section to limit the authority of the commissioner, or rather to limit his duty as that was prescribed by the previous section? Under that I think it is clear that at the moment of issuing the patent his authority exists in full force, and his duty in equal force, to patent or not, as he may be satisfied of the title. Does this latter section authorize him to issue a patent to one who he not only is not satisfied is entitled to it, but who he may be satisfied is not entitled to it? I think not. The title to patent depends on the seventh section. Its provisions must be found to give it; and up to the period when, under these, the commissioner is empowered, it is made his duty, to decide for or against the application. He must have like authority, and it must be equally his duty to decide under the eighth section. If this was not the case, this result would follow: that the act in one section would make the claim depend upon the judgment of the commissioner at the time of issuing the patent, and in the other, though the reason was precisely the same, would make it wholly independent of what might at that time be his opinion. The act, I think, is not liable to such an objection. The two sections are to be considered together, although they look, in part, to different states of things. In connection with the application, they look to the same end—the granting a patent only to the party entitled to it under the act. The latter is not to be construed to repeal that part of the former which does not only not empower the commissioner to issue the patent unless he is satisfied upon each of the conditions upon which it makes the claim to rest, but, on the contrary, makes it his duty, unless so satisfied, to refuse it. But what places this view beyond doubt is that the eighth section contains no authority to issue a patent at all. It contains no provision which, in words or by implication, can be construed to give the power. The patent, then, is issued under the authority of the seventh section, and can only go to him who, at the time it is issued, the commissioner is satisfied is entitled to it under the terms of the section. These, as already stated, so far from authorizing him to grant when he is not satisfied as to priority of invention, prohibit his granting it.

The whole object of the eighth section was to have the applicant and another applicant or patentee holding an unexpired grant for the same invention, as to priority of invention between themselves, as one of the means of satisfying the commissioner upon one of the points specified in the previous section. But it was not its purpose to limit his authority as to time nor to change his duty, as these were regulated by that section. They continue, as I think, to govern both, and are not performed, so as to put the subject beyond his control, until the patent is actually granted; nor do I see that the inconvenience or injustice supposed by the counsel of Wade to result from this construction will ensue. It is thought that by allowing the course adopted in this instance the controversy could never be brought to a close. But this is not so. The commissioner has control of the whole matter. When satisfied of the title, he will issue the patent; and it is his duty to issue it. The permission to withdraw an application in such case will be granted or not, as the commissioner may be satisfied or not. It is no answer to this to say that it leaves the right of parties to depend upon the discretion of the officer, and not upon the law. His discretion is not a loose and undefined one, which he may use in each case merely as he wills or desires. It is a legal discretion, or rather a judgment, founded upon the law, and duly to be exercised where, in his opinion, the law demands it This demand is made when the commissioner is called upon to issue a patent to an applicant who he is either satisfied is not entitled to it or doubts as to the title under the only section of the law which gives him authority to issue it—the seventh section. But the delay and inconvenience suggested which might be the consequence, in some cases the injustice, which might result to the true inventor or to the public from the opposite construction, commends this to adoption. Whilst in a spirit of true policy the act carries out the constitutional provision for the promotion of the "progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries," it at the same time guards the public against abuse, by requiring the commissioner at the very last moment to be satisfied that he is securing the real author or inventor the exclusive right to his own discovery, and not sanctioning an invalid or fictitious claim, and thereby furnishing the means of annoying and injuring the public. I have no doubt, therefore, that the commissioner, in the present instance Mr. Burke, had authority to receive the second application of Matthews, and that it was his duty so to do under the circumstances, and that the opinion he gave upon the former application, no patent having issued to Wade, is not a bar to such a proceeding. I decline for the present answering the second question, so far as it is not covered by this opinion, as it is not called for by the present case; but if you think that an answer is required for the proper execution of the duties of the commissioner, I will give it at a moment of more leisure than I now have.

Upon the receipt of this opinion at the patent office, the Hon. Thomas Ewbank, who had in the meantime become commissioner of patents, appointed a new day of hearing upon the testimony already taken, both parties having stipulated to that effect. Before the day of hearing, Wade moved for a further postponement of the day of hearing, to enable him to take new testimony, accompanying the same with affidavits of the witnesses to be called, setting forth the facts expected to be proved. This motion was denied by the commissioner, upon the ground that the proposed testimony, if admitted, would not materially affect the decision. Final decision was had in due course upon the merits of the controversy, awarding priority of invention to the said Matthews; and thereupon the present appeal was taken to the judge, praying him to reverse the said decision of the commissioner and all other acts of the office, down to the granting of letters-patent to the said Wade, and assigning ten reasons of appeal, as follows: 1. That the commissioner of patents having, on the 15th of February, 1849, decided a question of interference previously declared between the claims of Wade and Matthews to a patent for the manufacture of printers' ink by the use of rosin oil, and having given notice thereof to the parties that unless Matthews appealed by the 10th day of April then next a patent would be granted to the said Wade, and there having been no such appeal, the commissioner's power over the subject was spent, and the decision could not be reconsidered or renewed by him, and he therefore had no power to act in the present case. 2. That the commissioner was unauthorized by law to allow Matthews, after the question of interference was decided against him, to withdraw the application and receive back any portion of his deposit. 3. The question of interference in this case having been declared in favor of Wade, it is res adjudicata between the parties, and it is final and binding upon them both, and can only be reversed upon appeal to the chief justice, or by a proceeding in a court of equity of the United States. 4. The commissioner having acted upon and rejected Matthews' application, had no power to receive and act upon it again. His authority to act upon it having been once executed, was spent and gone, and he could not execute that power a second time. 5. If the commissioner had power to grant a rehearing in his discretion, he could not lawfully do so without allowing the party in whose favor the decree had been made to be heard on the question. 6. The commissioner erred in not granting the postponement asked for by Wade. 7. A patent having been lawfully decreed to Wade, which decree has never been annulled or vacated or appealed from, and having been challenged to this proceeding as a patentee, the law requires, and it is the duty of, the commissioner to issue one to him, as previously decreed. 8. The commissioner is forbidden by law to issue a patent to Matthews, because it is clearly and indisputably proved, and not contradicted or denied, that a patent was issued for this same invention in England in July, 1848, and in France in August of the same year—both more than six months before Matthews made his present application. 9. The inventions of Wade and Matthews are not identical, and Matthews' is not one which he can use, nor is it one which he has reduced and put in practice, or which is useful. 10. The evidence clearly shows that Wade, and not Matthews, is the first inventor of the improvement claimed, and the commissioner should have so decided; and for that reason his decision should be reversed.

At the hearing, counsel for Matthews moved to strike the first eight and latter part of the ninth reasons of appeal from the record, upon the ground that they involved questions not within the jurisdiction of the judge. The judge being in doubt as to his power to strike reasons of appeal from the record, directed argument to proceed upon the entire case, reserving his decision upon the motion until the final decision of the case.

The Commissioner in Reply: The questions raised in the first, fourth, and seventh reasons of appeal were involved in the opinion of the attorney-general; and as that officer is provided to advise and give opinion in all legal questions that may arise in the executive departments of the government, the questions are not properly before the court. There are two prominent acts of the commissioner which frequently occur in the discharge of his official duties: the one is called the rejection of an application, and the other a decision on an interference—each of equal importance to the parties interested, and neither necessarily final nor decisive of the issue of a patent. It is in accordance with this view that the practice of the office, established at the reorganization in 1836, has been steadily maintained to the present time. So far as the importance or the responsibility of the act extends, the review of an ordinary rejected application and that of a decision upon an interference are regarded as the same; each is a decision upon the testimony then before the office; and should anything then occur to arrest the execution of the judgment —as the filing of a caveat by another inventor, the arrival of a foreign journal announcing that the invention was patented abroad before the filing of the domestic application, or the filing of an application by another inventor—the commissioner considers himself bound by the spirit, if not by the letter, of the law to review or reverse his decision according to the testimony, whether the case be an ordinary rejected application or the decision on an interference. The former of these is almost of daily occurrence, while the latter is not without precedent. The noted case of interference between Coleman Coburn and a German by the name of Ferdinand Stark, in the Eolian attachment to the piano-forte, is a case in point. The following is the history of the case: In 1845 Coburn and Coleman each applied for a patent. An interference was declared between the inventions, and decided in favor of Coburn. But before the patent was issued, Stark applied for a patent for the same invention, and an interference was declared between the invention of Coburn and that of Stark, and the latter, by being permitted to go behind the printed publications of the day, by taking testimony in a foreign country, was declared to be the first inventor. But the counsel for Coburn (the Hon. Senator Berrien) submitted to the commissioner that an error had been committed in allowing the foreigner to go behind the printed publications, by taking testimony in a foreign country; the commissioner re-examined the subject in connection with the seventh section of the act approved July 4th, 1836, and became satisfied that he had before interpreted the act erroneously. A new day of hearing was appointed, and a new decision was made reversing the former, and the patent was finally granted to Coburn on the 1st of February, 1847. As to the fifth and sixth reasons of appeal, the act of 1839 (section 12) provides that the commissioner shall have power to make all such regulations in respect to the taking of evidence to be used in contested cases before him as shall be just and reasonable; and as this subject is intrusted to the discretion of the commissioner, it follows that the law will not disturb him in the exercise of his duties, so long as his rules of practice are neither unjust nor unreasonable. With respect to the eighth reason of appeal, the evidence adduced in the decision shows that Matthews used the invention in November, 1846, or about a year and three-quarters before the foreign patents alluded to were issued. The ninth and tenth reasons of appeal are inconsistent with each other and with the other reasons of appeal. As to the ninth, the claims show for themselves that the inventions of the two parties are identical, the concluding part of Matthews' claim not affecting its scope. The tenth reason presents the principal question before the judge.

R. H. Gillet, for appellant.

1. There is no statute giving the judge a power to order any of the reasons of appeal, which have been filed in the office in accordance to law, to be stricken out. If they are not valid reasons, the judge in his final judgment upon the whole case will overrule them, but they must be heard and considered.

2. The judge has jurisdiction of all questions which arise in the case. Bain v. Morse [Case No. 754]. Under the eighth section of the act of July 4, 1836, the jurisdiction of the board was not limited in anything. That section of the law gave them ample authority to review the decisions of the commissioner made under the seventh section. Whatever he might decide under it the board might examine. They were not confined to the third or fourth points; they could consider and reverse the whole. If their power stood on the seventh section alone, the jurisdiction would be ample; but under the eighth section, the authority given was still broader. By the eighth section it is enacted that if either of the conflicting applicants should be "dissatisfied with the decision of the commissioner on the question of priority of right or invention, on a hearing thereof he may appeal from such decision on the like terms and conditions as are provided in the preceding section of this act, and the like proceedings shall be had to determine which, or whether either, of the applicants is entitled to receive a patent as prayed for." By that act the board of examiners had perfect jurisdiction over the whole question. They might decide whether either of the contesting applicants is entitled to the patent, or which of them, or declare that neither of them shall have it. The judge stands precisely in the place of the board of examiners, and can do all that they could do. He has therefore a right to inquire into everything going to show whether Matthews or Wade is in this case entitled to the patent, or whether it can lawfully be granted to either. The jurisdiction of the judge extends over the whole case—not only to the question who was the first inventor or true inventor, but every other question which touches the title of either party to the patent. If there is such a limitation as is contended for, it equally excludes any decision on the question of interference; that question, under the statute, stands on the same ground as all others.

3. The rules of the patent office are not binding on the judge. The question whether an application for a patent can be withdrawn and a new one put in is not a question exclusively for the commissioner. He has no such discretion. A judge, after pronouncing judgment, cannot refuse to tax the costs and sign the roll on his mere personal discretion. There is not a word in the statute about discretion. It is this alleged discretion which has cast a cloud over this entire case.

The supervision of the judge is not confined to the testimony in the case. The act directs the commissioner in a case of appeal to send up everything in the case, that the judge may consider it. The eleventh section of the act of 1839 says "that the commissioner shall also lay before the judge all the original papers and evidence in the case, together with the grounds of his decision, fully set forth in writing, touching all the points involved by the reasons of appeal, to which the revision shall be confined." The language shows that the judge is to review all that has been before the commissioner. If he was to be confined to the evidence alone, why was the commissioner required to send all the rest of the papers?

1. The first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and the latter part of the ninth reasons of appeal embody matter not within the jurisdiction of the judge sitting as a court of appeal from the commissioner of patents. The jurisdiction of the judge is limited by the eleventh section of the act of March 3d, 1839, by which he is substituted for the board of examiners provided for in the seventh and eighth sections of the act of July 4th, 1836. The act of 1836 confined the jurisdiction of the board of examiners to the particular grounds on which the commissioner refused the patent. It gave the board no authority to inquire into any of his previous acts, nor to surpervise the rules and regulations of the patent office or the usages and customs prevailing in that office in regard to the mode of transacting its business. The grounds upon which the commissioner was authorized to refuse a patent were—first, want of novelty; second, abandonment to the public by sale or allowing its use; third, want of utility or importance; fourth, want of a sufficient specification. These are the four grounds on which the commissioner was authorized to refuse a patent; and it was to these points alone that the revision of the board of examiners was confined. They had no authority whatever to inquire into the matter. They could not inquire whether the proceedings before the commissioner had been informal and incorrect; whether a duty of $30 had been paid; whether a model had been duly deposited in the office or duplicate drawings been filed; or whether the application had been before made, and rejected, withdrawn, or renewed. On the contrary, their power was confined to the particular grounds of his decision, as stated by the law itself. And, therefore, inasmuch as the same jurisdiction, and that only which the board of examiners possessed, was transferred by the eleventh section of the act of March 3, 1839, to the judge, he cannot embrace in his review of the decision of the commissioner any other matters than those which were legally cognizable by the said board.

2. The eighth section of the act of July 4, 1836, provides, in the event of a conflict of inventions, for the proceeding called interference, and it gave the right of appeal from the decision of the commissioner to the board of examiners constituted by the eighth section of that act, to which right the judge succeeded by the eleventh section of the act of 1839. This jurisdiction, therefore, like that of the board, is confined to the question of priority of right or invention. He cannot go back to the question, and inquire into the correctness of the proceeding prior to his declaration of interference, nor can he inquire into the mere practice of this office, nor its rules, regulations, usages, and customs, or whether the commissioner has improperly, and not for good reason, refused a postponement or continuance of the hearing. If the judge were to assume this power, he would then in fact constitute himself the commissioner of patents, and the latter would in fact occupy the position of, and possess no more power than, a clerk under the judge. Congress in giving him jurisdiction over the decisions of the commissioner in certain specified cases, which must be his alternate and not his interlocutory decisions, never contemplated giving him unlimited power over the acts of the commissioner.

3. It is true that the judge in some of his former opinions intimates that his power extends to all the points involved in the reasons of appeal; but in these cases the question of jurisdiction was not expressly raised. The reasons required to be filed must relate exclusively to the particular matter appealed from and involved in the commissioner's decision. He cannot inquire into the mere ministerial acts of the commissioner. The board of examiners had no jurisdiction in such cases, and the commissioner can have none. Woodworth v. Stone [Case No. 18,021]; Whittemore v. Cutter [Id. 17,600]; Ex parte Janney [Id. 7,209].

4. If the jurisdiction of the judge were coextensive with the "reasons of appeal," all matters whatsoever might be brought within its embrace. The party appealing must thus compel the judge to inquire into and decide the question whether the examiner who examined the case had been duly appointed by the commissioner, and qualified by taking the oath required by law, or whether the commissioner himself was duly appointed and commissioned, or even whether the president of the United States, from whom the commissioner holds his commission, was duly elected and qualified according to the constitution.

5. If, as assumed in the first four reasons of appeal, the judicial power of the commissioner was exhausted by the first decision, and the matter is now res adjudicata, the remedy is not by appeal but by mandamus to compel the commissioner to exercise the ministerial duty of issuing the patent, or by impeachment for malfeasance. So, if the commissioner were about to issue a patent unlawfully for an invention patented abroad more than six months before filing the application in this country, the remedy is not by appeal, but by injunction.

6. The questions of utility and reduction to practice were decided by the commissioner before the question of interference was raised, and are not before the judge.

7. With regard to the fifth reason, the law gives no right to a party to be heard upon a motion to rehear. It is a matter entirely within the discretion of the commissioner, for reasons satisfactory to himself, to determine that the ends of justice require a rehearing.

8. With regard to the sixth reason, it is well established that a superior tribunal in proceedings at law has no power on appeal to reverse the decision of the inferior tribunal on a motion for a continuance arising under its own rules of practice.

9. Finally, the matter set forth in the reasons of appeal, above objected to, have not been appealed from, and are not properly before the judge. The only matter appealed from is the decision of the commissioner on the question of interference and novelty of invention, and others cannot be brought before the judge in this proceeding by way of assignment of errors.

10. The identity and priority of invention involved in the ninth and tenth reasons of appeal are admitted to be proper and legitimate subjects of inquiry in this proceeding.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The first question is upon the motion of the appellee to order a certain portion of the reasons of appeal which had been filed in the office to be stricken out. The filing of the reasons of appeal is a proceeding in the office over which the judge has no control. The proceedings in the office are all under the superintendence and control of the commissioner, who is uncontrolled in the discharge of the duties of his office, except so far as an appeal is expressly given by law. No reason of appeal can be considered as valid which would not justify the commissioner in refusing the patent. If the commissioner has received and filed the reasons of appeal, the judge cannot order him to strike them out. They wait to be heard and decided; and when brought before him upon appeal, if they are not valid, he will overrule them.

The first reason of appeal is, in substance, that the commissioner, by deciding the question of interference in favor of Wade, and giving notice thereof to the parties, had spent all his power over the subject, and therefore had no power to act in the present case. This reason of appeal is answered by the opinion of the attorney-general, in which I fully concur. The same answer may be given to the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh reasons of appeal. They were matters within the discretion of the commissioner, and over which the judge had no control —no jurisdiction—these matters not having been made the subject of appeal nor valid grounds of appeal. As to the eighth reason of appeal, I doubt whether the English and French patents obtained by Wade, or for his benefit, even if obtained more than six months before Matthews' application, would be good cause for reversing the decision of the commissioner in favor of Matthews if he was the first inventor; but it appears by the proceedings in the office that the first application of Matthews was on the 12th of May, 1848; the English patent obtained by Wade was in July, 1848; and although Matthews' first application was withdrawn, yet it was instantly renewed in the same words, and must be considered as a continued application; so that six months had not expired after the English and French patents were issued before Matthews' application. But it seems that the foreign patents must be issued before the American discovery.

As to so much of the ninth reason of appeal as regards the practicability and usefulness of the invention, and the reducing of it to practice, these were matters for the consideration and within the discretion of the commissioner until the patent should be finally issued, and are not made the subject of appeal. Nothing preliminary to the issuing of the patent is a valid ground of appeal, unless made so by the law. The said first clause of the ninth reason of appeal and the tenth reason of appeal are proper subjects of appeal, and involve the merits of the case. The said first clause of the ninth reason denies the identity of the inventions, and the tenth avers that the evidence shows that Wade, and not Matthews, is the first inventor of the improvement claimed. The identity of invention is admitted by all the previous proceedings in the case, and particularly by the agreement of Matthews and Wade of the 12th of April, 1849, to use the testimony already taken. Exhibit C.

There is nothing left, therefore, but the question of priority of invention involved in the tenth reason of appeal, and this plea depends upon the evidence. The question is not whether Wade made a better printing ink than that made by Matthews, but is, which of them first invented or discovered the application and substitution of rosin oil for linseed and all other oils in the manufacture of printing ink. The evidence is voluminous and intricate, and in some respects contradictory, and the question of priority of invention must of necessity be decided upon consideration of all the evidence "produced before the commissioner." The evidence is all in writing, and it cannot be necessary that I should point out any part of it as the particular ground of my decision. Upon a careful consideration of the whole of that evidence, I am of opinion, and so decide, that Thomas M. Matthews is the first inventor and discoverer of the application and substitution of rosin oil for linseed and other oils in the manufacture of printing ink, and therefore "is entitled to have a patent as prayed for."

[Subsequently, on October 1, 1850, letters patent No. 7,686 were granted to M. M. Matthews. For another case involving this patent, see the opinion of Johnson, Atty. Gen., in Wade v. Matthews, 1 MacA. Pat. Cas. 145.]

ARREST—CIVIL—CAPIAS AD SATISFACIENDUM—INSOLVENCY.

The court will not, on motion, quash a ca. sa. issued by the clerk of this court upon a judgment of a justice of the peace, upon the ground that the defendant had applied for the benefit of the insolvent laws of Maryland, and had obtained an order, and given bond, for his appearance in St. Mary's county, Maryland, but had not yet obtained his final discharge.

The defendant moved the court to quash a ca. sa. issued by the clerk of this court upon the judgment of a justice of the peace, because he had applied for the benefit of the insolvent laws of Maryland, where he resided, and had obtained an order, and given bond for his appearance in St. Mary's county, by which he is protected from arrest in Maryland, but had not yet obtained his final discharge.

THE COURT overruled the motion, and refused to quash the ca. sa.

SALVAGE COMPENSATION—RULE ON HIGH SEAS NOT SAME AS ON RIVERS.

1. Where the district court allowed one-third of the value of a cargo for salvage services which did not consume more than, or a little more than, half an hour's time of a tug, it was set aside on appeal on the ground of its being exorbitant and excessive; the amount of $750 being deemed reasonable, which sum was adjudged to the salvors.

2. Salvage compensation in cases arising on the high seas cannot be safely followed in cases arising on the western rivers, as the peril of life is generally much less.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the western district of Tennessee.]

[The material facts are as follows: The steamboat Mary Bell, a large vessel, was discovered to be on fire about two o'clock p. m. of the 27th day of February, 1876, while she was lying at the levee of the port of Vicksburg, Mississippi. She was taking on a cargo of cotton, her head being to the shore and her stern extending out into the Mississippi river at an angle of about forty-five degrees. On her larboard side, and to some extent caught under her guards, was the small steamboat Yazoo Belle, partially laden with cotton; and on her starboard side and next to the levee, but having sufficient room to be turned around, was the small steamboat Tallahatchie, likewise partially laden with cotton, which last named cotton was that involved in this litigation. The flames on the Mary Bell spread quite rapidly, and in this condition of affairs, and in response to the whistle of the Mary Bell for assistance, the steam-tug John Bigley, which was then some half mile distant, steamed to the place of disaster, with the crew at the time on board, to render such assistance as might be needed. The tug first made fast to the Yazoo Belle, she being in more immediate danger from the fact that the wind blowing off shore carried the flames in her direction, and towed her out of reach of the peril. The tug then returned as soon as possible, and having made fast to the Tallahatchie, likewise towed her to a safe place, first below, and afterwards above, the burning steamboat. This tug was the only steamer in port that could have rendered such assistance at the time; and the strong probabilities were that the Tallahatchie, as well as the Yazoo Belle, with their remaining cargoes, would have been destroyed, but for this service. Other parties were attempting to move the Tallahatchie to another position, and had moved her slightly, but with no great prospect of ultimate success. The time actually consumed in towing the Tallahatchie away from the fire was from five to ten minutes; and together with the time consumed in removing her to a position above the burning steamboat, aggregated about a half hour. While aid was being rendered to the Yazoo Belle, the orginal crew of the tug was joined by two others of the crew, who were off watch at the time, also by one of the owners, and by one or more persons belonging to the crews of the Yazoo Belle and Tallahatchie, and they all equally participated in the remaining service, the crew of the tug, all the time during its rendition, not being required to leave their vessel. The owners of the tug and her regular crew are the libelants in this suit, and seek a salvage compensation. Some of the libelants' witnesses testified that the tug, in rendering this assistance to the Tallahatchie and cargo, was exposed to danger, because of the proximity of the burning steamboat; and that the lives of those on board of the tug were likewise imperilled by the heat, by danger from exploding steampipes, and by risks from the probable falling of the chimneys, and also of the side-houses of the Mary Bell, which in fact fell soon after the Tallahatchie was towed away; but they consider that the tug might, at any moment, have quickly steamed away from the place of disaster.

[The cotton on board the Tallahatchie, which had come out of the Yazoo river, was consigned in part to Memphis, Tennessee, and in part to New Orleans, Louisiana. That consigned to Memphis was, after the fire, reshipped at Vicksburg for Memphis on the steamboat Capitol City, without objection by the salvors; but upon its arrival at Memphis, it was arrested in this cause, and was soon afterwards released on bond, it having been claimed by the Hernando Insurance Company and Planters' Insurance Company, both of Memphis, Tennessee, with small lots by other persons. The libelants dismissed their suit as to one hundred and nineteen bales of cotton, which was shown by claimants' proof not to have been on board the Tallahatchie at the time of the service; and this left two hundred and twenty-three bales to be adjudicated upon, out of the three hundred and forty-two bales actually seized under the warrant of arrest.

[Upon the hearing of the cause in the district court the libelants were awarded salvage at the rate of ten and seventy-nine one hundredths dollars per bale, the agreed value of the cotton being thirty-two and fifty one hundredths dollars per bale, which allowance, with interest on the amount, made the decree of the district court two thousand six hundred and eighty-six and eighty-five one hundredths dollars, against such of the cotton as was held liable. The cotton so held liable was the portion of the original cargo, which had been claimed and bonded by the Hernando Ins. Co. and the Planters' Ins. Co., by reason of the insurance risks they had therein; and therefore a personal decree was rendered against each of the claimants, and their sureties, for their respective proportions of the aggregate salvage awarded, together with the costs taxable, on said two hundred and twenty-three bales of cotton. The decree recites that the allowance made is based upon a like compensation voluntarily paid to libelants by the New Orleans Board of Underwriters, for the rescue of their cotton on board of the Yazoo Belle and Tallahatchie, and saved at the same time with the Memphis cotton. The New Orleans Underwriters paid forty-five hundred dollars for the saving of four hundred and seventeen bales, and did so voluntarily, though under circumstances not necessary to mention.][2]

J. M. Gregory, for libellants.

T. B. Turley and H. C. Warinner, for claimant.

BAXTER, Circuit Judge. The claimants have appealed to this court and here complain of the decree below as awarding an excessive compensation in salvage. I cannot concur with the district court in the amount allowed. Upon the statement of the case as presented by the proctor for libellants, I think the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars most ample compensation in the way of salvage. Indeed, I think five hundred dollars would be liberal; but I fix it at seven hundred and fifty dollars to cover interest. There is no doubt in my mind but that, if libellants had been called upon to do the work at a stated price, they would have gladly undertaken it for one hundred dollars. Their own proof shows that the ordinary compensation charged by the tug for towage was ten dollars per hour. I cannot consent to adopt the rule, which seems to have grown up among some of the courts, exercising maritime jurisdiction over the western rivers, of allowing such large awards of salvage.

The learned counsel for the libellants insists that upon the principles laid down in the text-books, and under the precedents established, the amount allowed below, being about one-third the value of the cotton, is not excessive. I cannot adopt this view. In former years such services as these, requiring but little time and labor, were rendered by steamboats on the rivers as acts of courtesy to each other, without any demand for compensation. But beyond this, "in salvage claims arising on the western rivers, the precedents of courts administering the admiralty law of the ocean in regard to the amount of compensation, cannot be safely adopted, because the peril of life is generally much less." McGinnis v. The Pontiac [Case No. 8,801]. This principle I most cordially approve; and while it may be true that in the multiplicity of courts and judges having salvage causes before them, some of them have been disposed to adopt and apply, in large degree, the theory of compensation recognized in ocean salvage; still, for myself, I am wholly unwilling to countenance or continue such extreme liberality in the exercise of my judicial discretion. In this circuit over which I am required to preside, and so long as I occupy my present position, I shall be careful to guard the property of suitors, whether they be insurance companies or general owners, against what seem to me to be excessive or extortionate demands; and in the expression of the judicial discretion vested in me under the law, I shall make for this circuit such precedents in the matter of salvage allowance as seem to me just and proper according to the circumstances of each case.

There are no facts presented in this record justifying a larger allowance than that I have fixed. The danger of peril to the tug and her crew, alleged in behalf of the salvors, and mentioned in their testimony, was more fanciful than real, and could, at any moment, have been withdrawn from and escaped. The time occupied in the rendition of the service was very short, and these elements, taken in connection with the other circumstances surrounding the transaction, lead me to the conclusion that the allowance of the gross sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars, instead of a pro rata per bale, or on the entire value of the property saved, is the proper amount to be awarded as salvage in this cause. But I adjudge this amount free of all costs, and direct the whole of the costs in the district court and in this court to be taxed against the claimants.

The decree of the district court is, therefore, reversed and modified as indicated in the opinion, and the decree will be entered accordingly.

Case No. 9,295.

MATTINGLY v. UNITED STATES.

[1 Hayw. & H. 195.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May 4, 1844.

CRIMINAL LAW—FEES—JUSTICE OF PEACE — ILLEGAL DEMAND—INSTRUCTIONS OF COURT—GENERAL VERDICT.

1. It is illegal for a justice of the peace knowingly to demand by color of his office payment of any fees other than those established by law.

2. It is an indictable offense for a justice of the peace to demand in any case civil or criminal the payment of any other fees than those established by law.

3. The jury ought to follow the opinion of the court and should be guided in matters of law by the instructions of the court as prayed by the parties in the cause.

4. The jury have a right to find a general verdict, and thus decide the law and the facts.

In error to the criminal court.

The plaintiff in error was indicted for taking illegal fees as a justice of the peace.

Archibald Nicholls entered a complaint before [Edward] Mattingly, a justice of the peace, stating that he had been robbed of his pocket-book containing fifty dollars, and that he suspected a man named Fisher of having committed the robbery. The justice issued a warrant against Fisher directed to John Cryer, a constable. Fisher was arrested and taken before the justice, and after a preliminary examination was taken in charge by the constable during the night. At the trial the next day the prosecuting witness, Nicholls, stated that the pocket-book was found on another person. The prisoner was thereupon discharged and a nolle pros. entered by the justice. The justice demanded of the complainant the sum of $3.42, which he alleges was due him and the constable and the witnesses in the case. Nicholls at first refused to pay it, but finally did, taking a receipt for the same. The grand jury brought in an indictment against the justice of the peace. The case came on for trial before Judge Dunlap, of the criminal court. The defendant plead not guilty. The jury returned a verdict of guilty. The defendant prayed for a writ of error on the following bill of exceptions:

During the trial the defendant offered to read in evidence the record and proceedings in the case of U. S. v. Clarke [Case No. 14,803], a justice of the peace for Washington county, District of Columbia, for extortion in receiving fees in a criminal case from the prosecutor, to show the usage and practice of the justices of the peace in Washington county, District of Columbia, in receiving fees in such cases; to the reading of which the United States through their attorney objected, and the court refused to permit the same to be read; to which refusal the defendant excepted.

During the trial and after the evidence had closed the defendant through his attorney moved the court to give the following instructions to the jury: 1st. That should the jury be satisfied from the evidence that the defendant took the fees under a belief that he had a right to take them, although he had no legal right so to do, but thought that he had, he is not guilty as charged in the indictment. 2d. That notwithstanding the defendant may have illegally charged and received the fees named in the indictment, unless they were wilfully and corruptly demanded and received, he is not guilty as charged in the indictment. 3d. That notwithstanding the defendant may have illegally charged and received the fees named in the indictment, if Nicholls voluntarily paid them, without a threatening or some act of violence of the defendant more than that of a request or demand so to do, the defendant is not guilty as charged in the indictment. 4th. That should the jury be satisfied from the evidence that Nicholls, from whom the fees were demanded and who paid the same to the defendant, was not a party to the suit, but it was a case between the United States and one Fisher, then the defendant, having no legal right to demand the fees of said Nicholls, he being no party to the proceedings, is not guilty in such case of extortion. 5th. That notwithstanding the jury be satisfied from the evidence that the defendant acted illegally in demanding and receiving the fees stated in the indictment, yet if they be satisfied that his heart and intention were pure, he is not guilty as charged in the indictment. 6th. That should the jury be satisfied from the evidence aforesaid that the defendant took the fees named in the indictment under his judgment that he was entitled to the same and that his intention was not to do an illegal or extorsive act by so doing, he is not guilty as charged in the indictment. 7th. That should the jury be satisfied from the evidence that it was usual for the justices of the peace in the District of Columbia to receive payment from others than the parties to a proceeding in a criminal case, that in criminal cases it is evidence from which the jury may infer that the defendant did not take the said fees with an evil or improper intention, and, if so, he is not guilty as charged in the indictment. 8th. That notwithstanding the defendant may have illegally charged and received the fees named in the indictment, unless they were demanded and received with intention to commit an illegal act and to do a wrong, he is not guilty as charged in the indictment. 9th. That should the jury be satisfied from the evidence that the defendant told Nicholls that he had to pay the fees and that after he had so told him Nicholls went out of doors and after consulting with others came in and offered to pay them, if the defendant would give a receipt for them, and that the defendant did give the receipt and asked and received the same, then he is not guilty as charged in the indictment. 10th. That should the jury be satisfied from the evidence that the defendant received from the said Nicholls only such fees as are charged in civil cases for similar services and that the money paid him was for his own fees, the fees of the constable, and a witness, and that the defendant paid over to the constable his part of said fees and to the witness what he was entitled to, then it is evidence from which the jury may infer that the defendant had no wrong or evil intention in receiving said fees. 11th. That should the jury be satisfied from the evidence that the defendant did not knowingly demand and receive the fees named in the indictment as illegal fees and such as he was not entitled to receive for himself and the constable and witness, he is not guilty as charged in the indictment.

Which instructions THE COURT refused to give; to which refusal the defendant through his counsel excepted.

The defendant also asked the court through his attorney to give the following instruction: That notwithstanding the defendant may have illegally charged and received the fees named in the indictment, if Nicholls voluntarily paid them the defendant is not guilty as charged in the indictment.

THE COURT gave this instruction, with the qualification: "But if the jury should be satisfied from the evidence aforesaid that the traverser demanded and received said fee by color of his office from said Nicholls, the said Nicholls protesting that said fees were illegal, the jury may infer that said Nicholls did not voluntarily pay said fees."

BY THE COURT (charging jury). In rendering a verdict you have a right to determine both the law and the fact, but that in matters of law you ought to follow the opinion of the court and should be guided in matters of law by the instructions of the court given and prayed for by the parties to the cause. It is illegal for the magistrate knowingly to demand and receive by color of his office fees from a citizen in a criminal case who is not a party to the same, and should you be satisfied from the evidence that the traverser demanded and received the said fees, as stated in the bills of exceptions, from the prosecutor Nicholls unlawfully, wilfully, extorsively, and by color of his office, you may find him guilty as charged. No magistrate in any case civil or criminal can rightfully demand and cause the payment of any fees other than those established by law. The traverser in the present case had by his docket entries appearing to treat the prosecutor Nicholls as a party to the case and had adjudged said Nicholls to pay said fees, he had no legal right to order him to pay said fees. It would be hard, indeed, if a person coming forward as a witness for the United States, as the prosecuting witness had done, himself a sufferer by the theft, should be made to pay fees to the magistrate who had conducted the investigation. If fees or compensation of any kind was chargeable, it ought to be to the United States and not to the complainant.

The defendant through his counsel excepted to the charge of the judge to the jury. The bill of exceptions was signed by the judge of the criminal court. A writ of error was granted. The case being argued by the several counsel and on due consideration by the circuit court, the judgment of the criminal court was affirmed, and that the defendant pay a fine of fifty dollars and costs.

Circuit Court S. D. Illinois. July Term, 1854.

LAND GRANT—AUDITOR'S DEED—EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. An auditor's deed is prima facie good, and is a title deducible of record within the meaning of section 2, c. 66, Rev. St. Ill.

2. When coupled with seven years' possession and payment of taxes, it is sufficient to protect a party who can connect himself with it.

At law.

Mr. Williams, for plaintiff.

Mr. Browning, for defendant.

McLEAN, Circuit Judge. This is an action of ejectment, brought to recover the southeast quarter of section 14, 2 north, 5 west, in Adams county, patented to William Purdy, the 18th of November, 1837. Purdy and wife conveyed the same to Schuyler and Mattison, 1 June, 1852. This was plaintiff's title; possession of defendant was admitted. The defendant claimed under a deed from E. C. Merry, auditor of the state of Illinois, to Robert H. Peebles, dated February 2, 1830, sale made the 14th of January, 1820, for the tax of 1827.

This proceeding was under the law of 1827. A deed from Peebles to Tillson was given in evidence, dated 27 June, 1830, recorded December 6th, 1830. Tillson conveyed to Russel Nevers, September 7th, 1830, recorded June 11th, 1831, and through mesne conveyances by a deed to Walker, the defendant, dated September 9th, 1847, under a contract of purchase, dated January 7th, 1840. The execution and delivery of this deed was proved, and also, that the defendant had been in the possession of the premises seven years, under his deed, before this suit was commenced. Tax receipts admitted.

The 11th section of the act of March 3d, 1845, that "no person who has or may have any right of entry into any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, of which any person may be possessed by actual residence thereon, having a connected title in law or equity, deducible of record, from this state or the United States, or from any public officer or other person authorized by the laws of this state to sell such lands for nonpayment of taxes, or from any sheriff, marshal, or other person authorized to sell such land on execution, or under any order, judgment, or decree of any court of record, shall make any entry therein, except within seven years from the time of such possession being taken; but when the possessor shall acquire such title after the time of taking such possession, the limitation shall begin to run from the time of acquiring title."

In the case of Irving v. Brownell, 11 Ill. 402, the court held that the auditor's deed to land, made in pursuance of a sale of land for taxes, under the law of 1827, will not show a complete title in a party without proof that the prerequisites of the law have been complied with.

The words "claim and color of title made in good faith," under the law of 1839, mean such a title as, tested by itself, would appear to be a good prima facie title; such a title, connected with seven years' actual possession and payment of taxes becomes invincible.

An auditor's deed is a title deducible of record under the law of 1835, and is sufficient to protect a party who can connect himself with it and show that he has been possessed of the premises by actual residence under such title, for seven years. That the facts bring this case within the 11th section of the above act, seems to be undoubted. His possession is protected, whether we regard the deed under which the defendant claims immediately, or the deed of the auditor under which he claims remotely. They are both prima facie good upon their face. The possession for seven years being proved, and also the payment of taxes during that period, this, as I suppose, gives a clear title, or at least, defense, under the statute and the decision of the supreme court, above cited.

The statute of limitation was intended to aid defective titles;—not a title defective upon its face, but a title prima facie good upon its face, under which the defendant entered in good faith, and continued to occupy the land the term of time required. Judgment for defendant.

MATTOCKS v. FARRINGTON.

[2 Hask. 331.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. Feb. 1879.

BANKRUPTCY—ATTACHMENT IN STATE COURT—OBJECTION BY ASSIGNEE—RETURN—APPRAISERS—JUDGMENT—LEVY—PRIORITY—DETERMINATION BY ASSIGNEE.

1. A creditor, having attached the property of his debtor four months prior to the latter's bankruptcy proceedings, if the assignee in bankruptcy does not intervene and object, may prosecute his suit in a state court to judgment and execution, regardless of the bankrupt proceedings, and may levy the execution upon the property attached.

2. The return of an officer, stating that the appraisers who acted in making a levy upon real estate are disinterested persons, is conclusive evidence of that fact.

3. Under the statutes of Maine the return of an officer, stating that the land levied upon by virtue of an execution cannot be divided by metes and bounds without damage to the whole, wherefore he levied the same upon a fractional part of the premises, is conclusive upon the parties to the judgment and their privies.

4. A levy is held to take effect from the date of an attachment when it appeared from the whole record that the land levied upon was the same that had been attached, even though the officer's return upon the execution did not disclose the fact.

5. It is not the duty of an assignee in bankruptcy, when a parcel of the bankrupt's estate is wholly absorbed by the first lien thereon, to determine the validity of subsequent liens, nor their priority.

Bill by [Charles P. Mattocks] the assignee in bankruptcy of Moses A. Pennett against [Ira P. Farrington and others] various creditors of the bankrupt to determine the validity of their respective pretended liens upon the property of the bankrupt under levies of an execution against him made thereon, after he was adjudged bankrupt, without leave from the bankrupt court.

The respondents answered that their respective levies were made upon executions from the state court in accordance with the provisions of the statutes of Maine to enforce attachments existing more than four months prior to their debtor's bankruptcy proceedings, and that the same are valid.

Thomas H. Haskell, and Nathan Webb, for orator.

Herbert M. Sylvester and Moses M. Butler, for respondents.

FOX, District Judge. Pennett was adjudged bankrupt February 5, 1878, on his voluntary petition filed January 29, 1878, and the complainant was appointed assignee March 1, 1878. He has brought this bill to determine the validity and amount of certain liens and incumbrances on an estate in this city which formerly belonged to the bankrupt, all persons interested having been made respondents.

The claims of Farrington, being of the greatest amount and involving the full value of the estate, and it being claimed that they are entitled to a priority, will first be examined. In December, 1876, Pennett mortgaged this estate to one Valpy to secure the payment of $700. This mortgage was assigned to Farrington January 23, 1878. No question is made by any party as to the validity of this mortgage, or as to its priority over any other incumbrance, and Farrington, therefore, is entitled to hold the same, and to receive the full amount thereof from the estate.

Various parties, having under the laws of Maine claims for laborers and materials furnished by them to Pennett to be used and employed in the erection by him of the house on this estate, and for which they had a lien by Revised Statutes of Maine more than four months before the filing of this petition by Pennett, duly commenced their actions for the enforcement of their respective liens, and therein attached this property; these actions were duly entered at the September term of the supreme court for this county, and were all defaulted and continued from term to term for judgment. In January, 1878, all these claims and the suits then pending were assigned to Farrington, and a special judgment was rendered in each of said suits on the fourteenth day of March, 1878, by the direction of Farrington and for his benefit, and the same were afterwards satisfied by a levy on the estate within thirty days after the rendition of the judgments. These judgments were so taken without any application to the district court for authority so to do; nor was any notice given to the assignees of the pending of said actions, or that the plaintiffs intended to take their judgments and issue executions thereon; and for these reasons, it is urged that the judgments were invalid and the liens were lost.

Whether a party, having an attachment in the state court upon a bankrupt's estate saved from the operation of the bankrupt act, could without the sanction of the bankrupt court, proceed in his suit, obtain judgments, and satisfy the same from the bankrupt's estate so attached, was for a long time a matter of serious doubt, the practice now being uniform in the various districts. In Maine, application was usually made to the district court for leave to prosecute the suit in the state court to final judgment, which was granted upon condition that the judgment should be satisfied upon the property incumbered by the attachment.

In Doe v. Childress, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 642, the supreme court of the United States decided that when an attachment in a suit returnable to the state court was made more than four months before commencement of bankruptcy proceedings, if the assignee did not intervene, the state court might proceed and render judgment and issue execution, and the sale of the property so attached would vest a good title in the purchaser. In the opinion, the court on page 646, says: "Where the power of a state court to proceed in a suit is subject to be impeached, it cannot be done except upon an intervention of the assignee, who shall state the facts and make the proof necessary to terminate such jurisdiction. This rule gains whether the four months' principle is applicable, or whether it is not applicable."

In Eyster v. Gaff, 91 U. S. 525, Judge Miller says: "The opinion seems to have been quite prevalent in many quarters at one time, that, the moment a man is declared bankrupt, the district court, which has so adjudged, draws to itself by that act not only all control of the bankrupt's property and credits, but that no one can litigate with the assignee's contested rights in any other court, except in so far as the circuit courts have concurrent jurisdiction, and that other courts can proceed no further in suits of which they had at that time full cognizance; and it was a prevalent practice to bring any person, who contested with the assignee any matter growing out of disputed rights of property or of contracts, into the bankrupt court by the service of a rule to show cause, and to dispose of these rights in a summary way. This court has steadily set its face against this view." It was there decided that a state court cannot take judicial notice of the proceedings in bankruptcy in another court, and that it is its duty to proceed as between the parties before it until, by some proper pleading in the case, it is informed of the changed relations of any of the parties to the subject matter of the suit.

By section 5106, Rev. St., it is provided that "no creditor whose debt is provable shall be allowed to prosecute to final judgment any suit at law or in equity therefor against the bankrupt, until the question of the debtor's discharge shall have been determined; and any such suit or proceedings shall, upon the application of the bankrupt, be stayed to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of the discharge, provided there is no unreasonable delay." To obtain the benefit of this provision, it is necessary that the state court should be legally notified of the pending of the proceedings in bankruptcy; if not so notified, it may proceed with the cause. The statute would seem to contemplate that the bankrupt should apply for the stay of the proceedings, and in Louisiana it was held that he alone could move in this behalf (Jones v. Clifton [Case No. 7,457]); while in Massachusetts it was held that the state court, in such a case, might proceed to judgment, "if neither the bankrupt nor the assignee moves for a stay of proceedings" (Ray v. Wight, 119 Mass. 426).

Language may be found in the opinion in Norton v. Switzer, 92 U. S. 364, 365, that may seem to imply that a cause thus pending in a state court could not be prosecuted to judgment excepting to determine the amount; but it could not have been intended that a state court was unauthorized to render judgment in a suit in which there was a valid attachment made more than four months prior to the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, and in which the bankruptcy of the defendant was not brought to the notice of the court, as the contrary had been repeatedly decided by the supreme court.

Under the later decisions of the supreme court, the judgments in these suits in the supreme court were not affected by the proceedings in bankruptcy, nor by the plaintiffs not having obtained the consent and authority of the district court to prosecute the same to judgment and execution, and levy on the estate attached.

Various objections are taken to the levies, three of which are alone worthy of much consideration.

I. It is said that it does not appear that the appraisers were disinterested men as required by the statute. Upon the execution, the officer states in his returns that the appraisers were disinterested, and, in all of his returns, he refers to and adopts as a part of his return, the returns of the appraisers; and in every instance in their return, they state they were disinterested; by this practice, the appraisers' return becomes incorporated with and a part of the officer's return, as sanctioned by Rev. St. c. 76, § 5; and he has thus certified to their being disinterested. The return of this fact by an officer on an execution has always been held conclusive on the parties and privies; and the fact, that one of the appraisers was a brother-in-law of Farrington, the assignee of the execution, cannot be received to contradict the officer's return; and if admissible, it would seem not to be entitled to any effect in destroying the levy, as this appraiser was selected by the debtor, who should be estopped from disturbing the levy on this account, after having seen fit to choose a relative of the creditor in interest to act in his behalf.

II. A further objection to these levies is, that they were made on undivided fractional portions of the premises, and the officer, as he states in his return, determined that the premises could not be divided by metes and bounds without damage to the whole. It is said it was the duty of the appraisers to determine this fact, and not the duty of the officer, and, therefore, the requirements of the statute have not been complied with. It may be that in Massachusetts, under the language of their act, appraisers are the proper persons to decide this question. Such would seem to be the result of the authorities cited in Pickering v. Reynolds, 111 Mass. 83; Sanborn v. Chamberlin, 101 Mass. 408; but the statute in this state is somewhat different, and in Mansfield v. Jack, 24 Me. 98, it was decided that "the return of an officer, that the land upon which an execution is to be levied cannot be divided without prejudice to or spoiling the whole, is conclusive of the fact as between the creditor and debtor and those claiming under them."

III. It is further objected that it does not appear from the execution to what estate the lien attached, or that the property levied upon was the same to which the lien did attach, or that it was taken for the purpose of enforcing a lien. When the whole record is examined, it discloses all the facts that are requisite to establish the validity of the lien, and that the estate levied upon was that to which the lien attached; and there is no provision of law, which requires that all such facts should again be set forth in the officer's return; they having become a part of the record, it is all that is requisite.

As the entire estate is exhausted by the prior claims of Farrington, it is unnecessary to determine as to the rank and position of the subsequent claims of other respondents; and as the unsecured creditors can in no event realize any advantage therefrom, it is not the duty of the assignee to call upon the court to pass upon the rights of these various parties; but they should be required, at their own expense, to litigate these matters between themselves, if they are advised so to do. Decree accordingly.

MATTOCKS et al. v. LOVERING et al.

[1 Law & Eq. Rep. 401.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. April 4, 1876.

BANKRUPTCY—DEBTOR BUYING CLAIM — SET-OFF.

A debtor buying a claim against the bankrupt after known insolvency and contemplated bankruptcy of his creditor, cannot set:off the claim against his debt. In such a case the debtor can only prove his claim and receive a dividend thereon, as his assignor could have done.

Bill in equity by the assignee in bankruptcy of Norris, Hall & Co., alleging the following facts: Norris, Hall & Co., the bankrupt, failed before February 10, 1874. On that day a meeting of the creditors was held at which a member of the firm of Stoddard, Lovering & Co. was appointed one of a committee of creditors to determine whether Norris, Hall & Co. should be put into bankruptcy. Stoddard, Lovering & Co. held notes of Norris, Hall & Co. to the amount of $476.-23. Geo. W. Cady & Co. were indebted to Norris, Hall & Co. in the sum of $4942.30. On the 11th of February, the next day after the meeting of the creditors, Stoddard, Lovering & Co. made a colorable sale of the notes held by them to Cady & Co., and received therefor the notes of Cady & Co., nearly equal in amount to the notes of Norris, Hall & Co. sold to Cady & Co. A petition for adjudication in bankruptcy against Norris, Hall & Co. was filed February 25th. Adjudication was had March 17th, and the assignees were appointed April 17th, 1874. Cady & Co. have attempted to off-set the notes thus purchased by them against their indebtedness to the firm of Norris Hall & Co. The bill in equity against Stoddard, Lovering & Co. prayed that the sale to Cady & Co. might be decreed to have been in fraud of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] and of the rights of the assignees and the creditors, and that they might be decreed to hold the notes of Cady & Co., and any sums received in payment of them, as trustees for the assignees and creditors, and to pay to the assignees the full amount of the debt owing by Cady & Co. to the bankrupt, less the dividend which Stoddard, Lovering & Co. would have received on their claim, if proved in bankruptcy against the estate of Norris, Hall & Co. There was a demurrer to the bill.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge, held, that a court of equity would not enforce any off-set of the claim purchased by Cady & Co. against the claim of the assignees of Norris, Hall & Co. upon Cady & Co. A court of equity would not allow a debtor, after known insolvency and contemplated bankruptcy of his creditor, by the purchase of his out-standing liabilities, to absorb, perhaps, the whole assets of the bankrupt in the entire payment of one portion of his liabilities, leaving the balance of the debts without any dividend, thus defeating that equal distribution of the assets among all the creditors. The result was that Stoddard, Lovering & Co. had a right to sell their demands to Cady & Co., who in equity succeeded to the rights only which Stoddard, Lovering & Co. had to prove their debt and receive a dividend, but could not in equity claim to set-off the debt to Stoddard, Lovering & Co. against the debt due from Cady & Co. to the assignees of the bankrupt estate. Bill dismissed without costs to either party.

[NOTE. The court subsequently vacated the order for dismissal, and allowed the case to stand on the docket. The complainants then moved to amend, on the ground that an actual sale was made by the defendants, which enabled a set-off to be made, and by means of which the defendants gained an undue advantage. The motion for this amendment was denied, and the bill dismissed without costs. 3 Fed. 212.]

Case No. 9,300.

MATTOCKS v. ROGERS et al.

[1 Hask. 547.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. Dec., 1874.

CONTRACTS — IN WRITING — CONSTRUCTION — COPARTNERSHIP—LIABILITY TO CREDITORS—FRAUD —BANKRUPTCY—ACTION BY ASSIGNEE.

1. A writing should be construed so that all its provisions may have force and effect if possible, and the intent of the parties prevail.

2. A copartnership is not established by a writing, stipulating that the first party shall furnish $3,000 and his services to the other to be used in his business for one year at a stipulated price, when the first party may elect to become a permanent and equal partner by increasing the sum furnished to $5,000 or to withdraw the same, and that the sum so furnished meantime shall not be chargeable with losses, notwithstanding, a provision in the writing that the first party "becomes a partner in said business from this date under the above conditions" and under a specified firm name.

3. Such first party, who transacts business under such firm name, and who holds himself out to the public as a copartner in the business, is liable to creditors as a copartner, and in case of insolvency of both partners, the sum so contributed by him to the business is partnership assets.

4. It is a fraud upon partnership creditors, for such first party, after both parties have become insolvent, to release to his associate all interest in the assets of the business, and receive therefor from him his notes for the $3,000 originally contributed to the business, payable to a third person, who, acquainted with all the facts had loaned the same to such first party to invest in the business, a part of such notes being endorsed by a fourth person, secured therefor by a mortgage upon the copartnership assets.

5. The assignee in bankruptcy of such copartnership may in equity invalidate such transactions as fraudulent and void.

In equity. Bill by [Charles P. Mattocks] an assignee in bankruptcy to annul a fraudulent transfer by the bankrupts [John T. Rogers, Jr., Frances E. Rogers, Dwight T. Golder, and Edward T. Elden] of their copartnership assets for the benefit of an individual creditor of one of the copartners. The answer denied any copartnership between the bankrupts, and averred that the bankrupt, Rogers, Jr., having borrowed $3,000 from his mother, Frances E. Rogers, loaned the same to Golder, who in consideration of a release from Rogers, Jr., gave his notes to the mother for the same, and a mortgage upon his business assets to Elden to secure him for endorsing a part of the notes; that the transaction was without fraud, bona fide, and valid. Replication being made the cause was heard on bill, answer and proof.

Charles P. Mattocks, pro se, and Edward W. Fox, with him.

William L. Putnam, for Frances E. Rogers.

Fabius M. Ray, for J. T. Rogers, Jr.

John Rand, for E. T. Elden.

FOX, District Judge. The plaintiff as assignee of D. C. Golder & Co., as well as of the individual members of the firm, has brought this bill to set aside a transfer made by John T. Rogers, Jr., one of said firm, on the 29th day of January last, of his interest in the copartnership effects, to his said copartner D. C. Golder, and also to obtain a surrender and cancellation of the notes given by said Golder to Frances E. Rogers, the mother of said John T., as a consideration for the said transfer, for the sum of three thousand dollars, two of which notes, each being for one thousand dollars, were endorsed by E. T. Elden.

It appears that on the 24th day of Sept., 1873, said John T. Rogers, Jr., and D. C. Golder entered into a written agreement by which said Rogers was to advance to said Golder three thousand dollars to be employed by said Golder in his business as a manufacturer of ladies' garments, and he was also to contribute for the common benefit all his time, &c., to the best of his ability in the business; for the capital and services so contributed he was to receive from said Golder, the sum of eleven hundred dollars per year. The agreement further stipulated, that the capital so furnished by said Rogers should not in any degree be held responsible or liable for any losses in the business during the year ensuing, at the termination of which time said Rogers was to receive the capital contributed by him, or he could as he should then elect become a permanent and equal partner by increasing his capital to five thousand dollars. The agreement then concludes as follows: "The said John T. Rogers, Jr., becomes a partner with the said Dwight C. Golder in said business from this date, under the above conditions, the firm name to be Dwight C. Golder & Co."

Rogers borrowed from his mother, Frances E. Rogers, the full amount of three thousand dollars, which was by him paid into the concern, and he continued to give his time and services, as required, to the business until the 29th day of January. His name appeared on the business card of Dwight C. Golder & Co. as one of the firm comprised of Golder and Rogers; all the business was transacted in the firm name, and it was well understood in the community, that he held himself forth to the public as a member of and jointly interested in the business of the firm of Dwight C. Golder & Co. No account of stock was taken at the time of the formation of this copartnership, and I am well satisfied, that Rogers from his entire ignorance of this particular branch, as well as his lack of experience generally in business matters, was very much deceived by the misrepresentation of Golder as to his condition and standing in Sept., 1873. Large debts, to a very considerable amount, were subsequently contracted in the name of Dwight C. Golder & Co. in the course of their business, which now remain unpaid, and the only means from which the same can be in any part satisfied is from the proceeds of sale of the stock formerly belonging to Dwight C. Golder & Co., and there is not sufficient to discharge the full amount.

From the admissions of both Golder and Rogers, it is shown that in Jan., '74, the firm was deeply insolvent; that both Golder and Rogers were well aware of their condition, and that Rogers was desirous of withdrawing with his advance of $3,000 from the business. To effect this there was a final dissolution, on the 29th day of January, of the firm of Dwight C. Golder & Co., and Rogers, by an instrument under seal, conveyed to Golder in consideration of the three thousand dollars, all his right, title and interest, as a member of the firm, in and to all the stock and fixtures of Dwight C. Golder & Co., together with all his interest in the rights, credits and book accounts of said Dwight C. Golder & Co., with authority to use the name of said Rogers in collecting the same. It does not appear, that any agreement or understanding was had between Rogers, Jr., and Golder, as to the debts due from Dwight C. Golder & Co.; they were not assumed by Golder, nor did he in any way agree to relieve or indemnify Rogers from his liability on account thereof.

Mrs. Rogers was desirous of receiving the amount she had loaned her son, and in these negotiations was represented by her husband John T. Rogers, who is shown by the evidence to have been fully cognizant of the pecuniary condition of Dwight C. Golder & Co., and that they were then insolvent; and Mrs. Rogers is, of course, to be held chargeable with all the knowledge or information derived in this respect by her agent, whilst in the conduct of her business. John T Rogers therefore would not accept the individual security of Dwight C. Golder, in payment for the three thousand dollars, but insisted on further security; and it was eventually agreed between Golder and himself, he acting in his wife's behalf, that Golder should make three notes of one thousand dollars each, payable in two, four, and six months to Mrs. Rogers, and that the last two should be endorsed by Edward T. Elden, Golder's father-in-law. Elden agreed to endorse these notes, on condition that he was secured therefor by a mortgage from Golder on the stock. These notes were made and endorsed as agreed, and the mortgage was given by Golder to Elden, which not only secured these endorsements, but also other liabilities of Golder to Elden for a very considerable amount. These latter claims have all since been proved as unsecured claims against Golder's estate in bankruptcy by Elden, and Elden has relinquished all claims under his mortgage in respect to them, but he insists that his mortgage is a valid subsisting security for his endorsement of the two notes held by Mrs. Rogers, if he is held liable as endorser. The petition in bankruptcy was filed by the firm creditors against D. C. Golder & Co., Feb. 18, 1874.

It is contended, in behalf of Mrs. Rogers, that J. T. Rogers, Jr., did not become a copartner with Golder by their agreement of Sept. 24, notwithstanding the statement contained therein at its close, "that said John T. Rogers, Jr., becomes a partner with said Dwight C. Golder in said business from this date, under above conditions, the firm name to be Dwight C. Golder & Co.;" that the whole instrument is to be examined, and its legal effect to be gathered from all contained therein, rather than from any single clause, and that it is clearly manifest, that although the parties might have supposed a copartnership, inter sese, was thereby created, that in law such was not the legal result of the entire instrument, as Rogers was not to have any right or interest in the property, but was only to loan the concern the three thousand dollars for one year, on which and for his services during that time, he was to receive a fixed compensation of eleven hundred dollars, in no way dependent on the profits or loss of the business; that he could not demand any account from his associate; had no right to claim that accounts ever should be kept of the transactions, and that it was expressly stipulated, that the capital contributed by Rogers shall not in any degree be held liable or responsible for any losses in the business of said Dwight C. Golder & Co.

Upon this branch of the case, the court is of the opinion that the construction given to this instrument by the counsel for Mrs. Rogers is the true one, and that the latter clause in the agreement, that Rogers is to become a partner with Golder, must be taken in connection with the stipulation that it is to be "under the above conditions," which as a whole are not sufficient to constitute a general partnership, as between the parties to such agreement. As between themselves, Golder became the debtor of Rogers for the amount thus advanced, and the same was not at the risk of the business. Rogers acquired, as against Golder, no legal interest in the effects of Dwight C. Golder & Co., but the legal title thereto was in Golder alone. It is therefore claimed quite strenuously, that by the dissolution in January and the bill of sale from Rogers to Golder the latter acquired nothing; that no interest in the estate of D. C. Golder & Co. whatever, passed thereby to Golder, as the whole was already vested in him, and that all that was really then accomplished was the repayment of the loan of three thousand dollars by Golder, for which he was indebted to Rogers, the same being made to Mrs. Rogers, by the authority of her son in satisfaction of the amount for which he was then indebted to her.

As between Rogers, Jr., and Golder, it may well be conceded that such was the effect of the arrangement; but there were others who were alike interested in the property of Dwight C. Golder & Co., who were no parties to these proceedings, and whose rights should not be compromised thereby; and these were the creditors of Dwight C. Golder & Co., who are now represented by the complainant. While no partnership inter sese existed between Rogers and Golder, yet to all intents and purposes, so far as the creditors of Dwight C. Golder & Co. were interested, Rogers and Golder were copartners. They were jointly liable as copartners for all the debts of Dwight C. Golder & Co., and the property held and acquired in the name of the firm was copartnership property, which the creditors had a right under the provisions of the bankrupt act to claim should be first appropriated to the discharge of the firm liabilities. For these reasons the court holds that both Rogers and Golder are estopped as against the firm creditors, to claim that the property which had been acquired in the firm name was in truth the property of Golder alone, and that by a secret agreement between them, he, Rogers, had no interest therein. It is not claimed that firm creditors were cognizant of any such agreement; on the contrary, all their dealings were with the firm of Dwight C. Golder & Co.; they sold to that firm, gave credit to the firm on the faith of the firm obtaining the title to the purchases made. Rogers in every way possible held himself out as liable for the firm debts, and that the firm obtained the entire title to the property purchased in the firm name. At the time of the dissolution, he again sanctioned this view of his relation, by advertising to the world at large his withdrawal from the firm, and his transfer of all interest in its estate to his copartner; and having so conducted himself from the inception of his connection with the business, a court of equity is bound in respect to all who have dealt with him, trusting to that relation as the true one, not to allow him to insist on something entirely different, and thereby derive a benefit to himself and his individual creditors, in fraud of his copartnership creditors.

The rights of the partnership creditors must be considered the same, as if the copartnership in the present case had been of the ordinary, usual character, and are not to be affected by the secret agreement between its individual members. Under what circumstances can one member of a firm, convey to his copartner the partnership effects, so that the transfer will be valid and effectual against the firm creditors and the assignee in bankruptcy of the copartnership?

In Wilson v. Robertson, 21 N. Y. 592, it is said: "It will be conceded, that the creditors of a firm are legally and equitably first entitled to the partnership effects. Such creditors have a claim upon the joint effects, prior to every other person, which the court will enforce and protect alike against the individual partners and their creditors. * * * An appropriation of the firm property, to pay the individual debts of one of the partners is, in effect, a gift from the firm to the partner, a reservation for the benefit of such partner or his creditors to the direct injury of the firm creditors. Can it reasonably be doubted, that when an insolvent firm assign their effects for the payment of the private debts of a member, for which neither the firm, nor the other members, nor the firm assets, nor the interests of the other members therein, are liable, such an assignment and appropriation are a direct fraud upon the joint creditors of the assignors?"

In Ransom v. Van Deventer, 41 Barb. 307, it was decided: "That a division by partners of the copartnership assets between themselves, and the transfer of such assets by the individual partners in payment of their private debts when the partnership is insolvent, is in point of law a fraud upon the creditors of the partnership. Such a transfer of the partnership effects is invalid, as against the creditors of the firm, and the property remains partnership property, until it comes to the hands of a bona fide purchaser for a valuable and new consideration. If the person to whom the property is transferred, has notice that it is partnership property, and he takes it in payment of a precedent debt, he will not be deemed a bona fide purchaser."

In that case, in a creditor's bill by plaintiffs as judgment creditors of a firm, they were allowed to reach the proceeds of a note given to the firm, and endorsed over to a creditor of one member of the firm by the consent of the other members, the firm being insolvent; but the party to whom the note was endorsed was entirely ignorant of such insolvency. The learned judge, in giving the opinion of the court says: "What is a partnership but a single person in law, having as such, debts and credits and rights as a single person? The assignment, or transfer without assignment, of the property of an insolvent partnership, is precisely the same violation of the rights of creditors that it would be if it were in fact a single person, and the gift to one of the partners, or to his creditors, or for his benefit, does not vary or affect the principle. It is the giving away in either case, of the property of an insolvent debtor, at the expense of, and in fraud of his creditors."

In a late case before the New York court of appeals (Menagh v. Whitwell, 52 N. Y. 146) it was decided, that "a transfer by one partner of an interest in, or a lien given by him upon the corpus of the partnership property to pay an individual debt, although made with the consent of the other partners, is fraudulent and void as to the creditors of the firm, unless the firm was at the time solvent, and sufficient property remained to pay the partnership debts."

The insolvency in the present case is clearly established, and there would be sufficient property remaining to pay out a small dividend upon the company liabilities, if this amount of $3,000 is first paid therefrom; and it is also clearly shown, that both of the partners, as well as the agent of Mrs. Rogers, at the time well knew of this insolvency, and this scheme was adopted for the payment of Mrs. Rogers by Golder from the property which formerly belonged to Dwight C. Golder & Co., Rogers still remaining liable for all the firm debts.

In Re Cook [Case No. 3,150], the court says: "A sale by one partner to his copartner, when the firm is insolvent and upon the eve of bankruptcy, which if upheld, would operate to apply the property of the retiring partner to the payment of the individual debts of the partner purchasing, is presumptively fraudulent as to the firm creditors, and the courts should set aside such sale, and distribute the property as firm property to the payment of the firm debts."

If the legal effect of such transfer would be to change the order of payment and prefer certain creditors, the private creditors over the firm creditors, it would be void as creating a preference, contrary to the provisions of section 35 of the bankrupt act.

It is claimed further in behalf of Mrs. Rogers, that if the court should hold that the property of Dwight C. Golder & Co., notwithstanding the transfer by Rogers to Golder, still remained company property liable for the payment of firm liabilities, that the remedy of the plaintiff is to be sought in the marshalling of the assets and postponing the payment of Golder's individual liabilities, until the partnership liabilities are fully paid, and that Mrs. Rogers should be allowed to retain her claim against Golder, as promissor of the notes, in case he does not obtain his discharge in bankruptcy, and should also be permitted to collect of Elden the two notes which he endorsed. By this course being adopted, it is said the rights of the creditors will be fully protected, and Mrs. Rogers will not be deprived of any rights to which she is entitled.

Courts of equity are not in the habit of allowing parties engaged in a fraudulent proceeding, to dictate as to the course to be adopted by those whose rights are affected by such proceedings; it is not for one thus situated to ask the court to require the other party to select that method of redress, by which the guilty party will derive more or less advantage from his fraud; on the contrary, it is rather the duty of the court, and of all parties interested, to sanction that method of redress, which will be most likely to prevent further attempts of a similar character, and to compel parties to abstain from all schemes in violation of law. A court of equity will not lend its aid, so as to require a party to adopt that course which shall render the fraudulent conduct of a party as profitable and advantageous as possible to him.

These proceedings of Jan. 29 were, according to the authorities before cited, fraudulent and void as to the firm creditors; and the assignee of the firm, by this bill, asks that they may be so decreed and set aside, and that the property may come to his hands unincumbered thereby, and without any cloud upon the title as individual property of Golder, but on the contrary as being the estate of Dwight C. Golder & Co.

In cases of this description, the courts in bankruptcy have frequently adjudged such transfer by a partner to his copartner as void, and that the property still remained firm property; and when property has been thus fraudulently conveyed, an assignee may resort to a court of equity, to recover the same for the benefit of the estate. As said by Curtis, J., in Carr v. Hilton [Case No. 2,436]: "A fraudulent conveyance is no effectual conveyance as against the interests intended to be defrauded. * * * The case of the assignee is, therefore, that the lands in question are the property of the debtor, and that he prays the aid of this court to remove an apparent cloud upon his title, which though void, interferes with the discharge of his official duty." It would be difficult to find language more applicable to the present case. Here copartnership estate has come to the hands of the assignee as belonging solely to the firm, with a cloud upon it by reason of the proceedings which are here sought to be impeached. The legal title stood in Golder alone when the property passed to the assignee, but this had been procured through the fraud of the parties, and the property in truth belonged to the firm as respects the rights of the firm creditors in relation to it, and it is to remove this cloud and restore the true condition of things which are asked for by this bill. As remarked by Judge Curtis (Carr v. Hilton [supra]): "In my opinion the property fraudulently conveyed is to be deemed property of the bankrupt, and was by the decree vested in the assignee. This enables him to maintain the bill."

The 14th section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 522)] expressly declares, that "all the property conveyed by the bankrupt, in fraud of his creditors, * * * shall in virtue of the adjudication of bankruptcy and the appointment of the assignee, be at once vested in such assignee, and he may sue for and recover the said estate."

The firm, in fraud of their creditors, made a transfer of the firm property to one of the members of the firm. The case is brought within this section most clearly, and the assignee is authorized thereby to recover the same.

In Pratt v. Curtis [Case No. 11,375], Lowell, J., says: "Great confusion would arise from any rule, which required creditors to follow the property on their own account; * * * and on the other hand, full power is given to this court, to set aside all fraudulent conveyances by which creditors are affected, and to marshal all assets."

The present case is quite similar to Re Waites [Id. 17,044], and to Re Johnson [Id. 7,369]. By a dissolution of the firm when insolvent, and an application of the firm's property to the payment of the private debts of the partners, a fraud was attempted in the way of a preference in violation of the bankrupt law. In this latter case, Judge Lowell says: "The point to which I now refer is this: when the bankrupt act lays down a positive rule of distribution of the joint and separate assets, and creates a fraud before unknown, called a preference, it is obvious that partners, who owe debts of both kinds, may commit that fraud, by conveying their joint property to a separate creditor, or even by dissolving their firm and dividing their property, and thus working out a preference to all their separate creditors."

The assignee in the present case has certainly good cause for resorting to this remedy, and for asking a complete rescission of the contract made at time of dissolution, and for a surrender and cancellation of the notes given by Golder to Mrs. Rogers; because if Mrs. Rogers is allowed to retain the notes and enforce her remedy against Elden as endorser, Elden in his turn would assert the validity of his mortgage, which he held as security for such liability. It may be, that the assignee might be in a condition to defend against such claim of Elden, and establish its invalidity under the provision of the bankrupt law; but the result, on the evidence now before the court, is not entirely free from doubt, and the assignee, therefore, should not be compelled to take the risk of a lawsuit, and rely upon establishing a successful defense against a security upon the property, given to the endorser at the time he assumed the liability. In the opinion of the court, the whole transaction being in fraud of the firm creditors, and it being the duty of the assignee to protect their rights, he was well justified in striking at the root of the evil, instead of endeavoring by circuitously striving to avoid in part its bad effects; and these participants in the fraud have no cause for complaint, if thereby they are deprived of all benefit from their fraudulent schemes, instead of being permitted to derive a partial advantage therefrom, by the assignees pursuing a different course. "Ex pacto illicito non oritur actio."

The transfer to Mrs. Rogers of the Golder notes was most clearly a fraudulent preference by John T. Rogers, Jr., of his individual creditor, and was therefore a fraud upon his other creditors; and for this cause, she could not be allowed to retain the notes, and withhold them from the plaintiff in his capacity of assignee of John T. Rogers, Jr. But upon the other grounds, I think there has been sufficient shown to set aside the whole transaction, and require Mrs. Rogers to surrender up and cancel the notes of D. C. Golder, received by her in satisfaction of her claim against John T. Rogers, Jr., and it is so ordered and decreed.

Bill dismissed as to Golder without costs. Decree for complainant against the other respondents.

Case No. 9,301.

MATTOX et al. v. CADY et al.

[7 Am. Law Rec. 613.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1878.

BANKRUPTCY—DEBTOR BUYING CLAIM—SET-OFF—KNOWLEDGE OF INSOLVENCY.

Where involuntary proceedings in bankruptcy are commenced and prosecuted against a bankrupt under the U. S. bankrupt laws of 1867 [14 Stat. 517], and an assignee is duly appointed, who commences suit against a debtor of such bankrupt to recover the amount of an account due him, such debtor is entitled to have set-off against his indebtedness notes against said bankrupt which he may have purchased and become the bona fide owner and holder of, at any time before the petition in such voluntary proceedings was filed, although the debtor, when he purchased said notes, had knowledge that such bankrupt was then insolvent.

Petition: (1) Plaintiffs [Charles P. Mattox and others] in their petition set forth their title to sue as assignees in bankruptcy of Norris, Hull & Co. (2) That on petition of Lucius Beebee and others, filed in U. S. district court of Maine, on the 25th day of February, 1874, Norris, Hull & Co., on the 2nd day of March, 1874, were duly declared bankrupts, and April 17, 1874, plaintiffs were duly elected assignees. (3) April 15, 1876, plaintiffs commenced suit against defendants [George W. Cady and others, doing business as Geo. W. Cady & Co.] on an account due the bankrupts, amounting to $4,826.30, on which interest is claimed from Feb. 11, 1874.

Defendants' Answer: The account set up in the petition is not denied, but "set-off" of two notes held by the defendants is set up in the answer. Said two notes were made by Norris, Hull & Co. to their own order, and indorsed by themselves in blank. One note, dated Nov. 20, 1873, at four months, for $2,384.12; one other note, dated Dec. 2, 1873, at four months, for $2,384.11. These notes are alleged in the answer to have been made and indorsed and delivered about the dates of the same to Stoddard, Lovering & Co., and on the 11th day of February, 1874, sold, transferred and delivered to defendants; and they then and thereby became, and ever since have been, the owners of said notes, and that the said notes defendants ask may be allowed to them by way of set-off against plaintiffs' claim, and that they, defendants, may have judgment accordingly.

Reply of Plaintiffs: (1) That on the 11th day of February, 1874, and many months prior thereto, Norris, Hull & Co. had been hopelessly insolvent, of which Stoddard, Lovering & Co., and defendants at the time aforesaid (Feb. 11, 1874), had knowledge; and that said transfers of said notes, if any were made, were only colorable, and not bona fide, and made for the purpose of enabling Stoddard, Lovering & Co. to realize in full upon said note through defendants, who were indebted to Norris, Hull & Co., as set forth in the petition. Plaintiffs therefore deny that defendants are holders of said notes, except for benefit of Stoddard, Lovering & Co. (2) That on the 11th day of February, 1874, Norris, Hull & Co. were, and for several months prior thereto had been, hopelessly insolvent. Proceedings in bankruptcy were then threatened and imminent against Norris, Hull & Co., of which facts both Stoddard, Lovering & Co. and defendants had full knowledge. That defendants were then and there indebted to Norris, Hull & Co., as stated in the petition. That said transfers of said notes, if any such were made, were made for the purpose of enabling Stoddard, Lovering & Co. to realize in full on said notes, instead of receiving a dividend thereon in bankruptcy, and for the purpose and with intent of preventing the plaintiffs from collecting the account against them, and with the purpose and intent of giving said Stoddard, Lovering & Co. an unjust and illegal preference over the other creditors of Norris, Hull & Co. And plaintiffs charge that if said notes were transferred at anything less than their face, such transfer was with intent and purpose of enabling Stoddard, Hull & Co. to realize more than they could in bankruptcy, and also with intent and purpose of making defendants to discharge their debt with said notes at their face, although defendants had paid for said notes much less than their face. That if any transfer of said notes were made by Stoddard, Lovering & Co. to defendants, they were not made in good faith, and defendants are not entitled to off-set the same against said account, but must be remitted to prove the same in bankruptcy. (3) That being ignorant as to whether any transfer of said notes was made to defendants, as stated in the answer, plaintiffs deny the same.

The case was argued elaborately by Willy & Terrill, for plaintiffs, who cited: Bump, Bankr. (9th Ed.) 420; Hitchcock v. Rollo [Case No. 6,535]; Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 610-622; 8 Gray, 572; Wat. Set-Off, § 113; 2 Johns. 274; 20 Johns. 137; Hilliard, Bankr. 224; Avery & H. Bankr. 157; Bump, Bankr. (7th Ed.) 381, 382; 27 Ohio St. 365; and commented on Hovey v. Home Ins. Co. [Case No. 6,743], and Moore v. Harley [Id. 9,764].

J. P. Bishop, and C. J. Noyes, for defendants, argued the case at length, citing and commenting on the following authorities: Hitchcock v. Rollo [supra]; Rollins v. Twitchell [Case No. 12,027]; Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 610; In re City Bank [Case No. 2,742]; Hovey v. Home Ins. Co. [supra]; Hunt v. Holmes [Case No. 6,890]; Fuller v. Sterglitz, 27 Ohio St. 361; 4 Ohio St. 593. On the point of notice of insolvency of Norris, Hull & Co., and putting on inquiry, etc., they cited Goodwin v. Simmons, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 343; Woolfolk v. Bank of America, 10 Bush, 504.

Before BAXTER, Circuit Judge, and WELKER, District Judge.

WELKER, District Judge. A jury in this case was waived, and the facts, with the evidence, were submitted to the court at a former term, but the case has been continued for argument and under advisement to this term, and has been argued at length, orally and elaborately; briefs have been submitted by counsel on each side. All the testimony in the case has been reduced to writing, and we have a full report of it before us, so there can be no controversy as to what was the testimony on the trial. The matters in controversy fully appear in the pleadings.

The questions presented and discussed by counsel are mainly as follows: 1. Were Norris, Hull & Co. insolvent when defendants acquired the notes which they seek to set off in this case? 2. Did the defendants know of the insolvency of Norris, Hull & Co. when they became the purchasers of these set-offs? 3. Was the purchase of the notes by the defendants a bona fide one for their own benefit, or for a valuable consideration? 4. Supposing the purchase to have been unobjectionable in other respects, what effect would knowledge on the part of the defendants of the insolvency of Norris, Hull & Co. when they made the purchase, have on their right to have the set-offs allowed?

First. As to the insolvency of Norris, Hull & Co. when the defendants purchased the notes in question, there seems to be no doubt. In fact it is admitted by their counsel. This being the case—

Second. Did the defendants know this when they acquired these notes? We have carefully considered this point. The testimony on the trial showed that before the transfer to defendants of these notes, Stoddard, Lovering & Co., a firm doing business at Boston, Mass., had knowledge of the insolvency of Norris, Hull & Co., but it nowhere appears that this was known to defendants, Cady & Co., unless they acquired such knowledge in the negotiations by which they acquired the notes in question. The defendant Awl was called as a witness on behalf of Cady & Co., to prove the purchase by them of these notes, and was cross-examined by plaintiffs' counsel, and defendant, Geo. W. Cady was called as a witness in behalf of plaintiffs, and both testified that they had no knowledge of the insolvency of Norris, Hull & Co. when they bought the notes. It is insisted, however, by plaintiffs' counsel, that the circumstances attending the purchase and what was said at the time, were sufficient to charge them with notice.

What were these circumstances, and what was said that should charge them with such notice? It appears that Norris, Hull & Co. were doing business in Portland, Me., and the defendants in the city of Cleveland, O. They had business transactions with Norris, Hull & Co. down to the very day of the purchase of these notes, Feb. 11, 1874. This business was done by correspondence. A short time before the purchase, they were applied by one Dresser, as agent of Stoddard, Lovering & Co., who offered to sell to them the notes in question, and if Cady & Co. received notice of the insolvency of Stoddard, Lovering & Co. it must have been during these negotiations. We have failed to find in the testimony anything equivalent to notice to the defendants of this insolvency, when they took the notes. It is said that during these negotiations Cady & Co. asked Dresser why Stoddard, Lovering & Co. wished to dispose of this paper, and the reply was that they had more of it than they wanted to keep, and wished to dispose of some of it. This would not have a tendency to charge them with notice of the maker's insolvency for such transactions are of very common occurrence. Other circumstances and conversations at the time are referred to, to charge them with notice, such as the remark of Dresser that they were tricky, but taken altogether, come very far short of proving that Cady & Co. had knowledge of the insolvency of Norris, Hull & Co. when they made the purchase of these notes.

It is further insisted on in argument by plaintiffs' counsel that at least the circumstances were such as to put Cady & Co. on inquiry when they made the purchase that the makers of the notes were insolvent. Whatever might have been the law formerly on this subject, such is not the law now, when applied to negotiable paper. It is so held by the supreme court of the United States in Goodwin v. Simmons, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 243; also in Woolfolk v. Bank of America, 10 Bush, 504; and is now a fixed rule of law. To charge Cady & Co. with notice of the insolvency of Norris, Hull & Co., the testimony ought at least to be as strong as would be required in cases where preferences have been made which are declared void by the bankrupt act. But the testimony here falls far short of what would be required in such cases.

We think, therefore, that the evidence in this case is insufficient to show that the defendants had knowledge when they purchased these notes of the insolvency of Norris, Hull & Co.

3. Did they pay value for these notes, so as to be entitled to be treated as bona fide purchasers and holders, and not as trustees for Stoddard, Lovering & Co.? On this point, it clearly appears that they paid a sufficient consideration and were fully protected in this respect, and, so far as this point is concerned, they are entitled to have the set-off made as claimed by them. This, of course, determines the case in favor of the defendants. Here we might stop and not determine the further point, but as the point has been made and discussed we think it ought to be decided. This is the fourth point above stated which is, supposing the question of notice of the insolvency had been found against Cady & Co., but that in other respects they were bona fide purchasers, would they then be entitled to have the set-off allowed? This we are compelled to answer in the affirmative. We do this knowing that there is not complete accord in the decisions that have been made on this subject. If the purchase of a set-off is otherwise unobjectionable, knowledge that the debtor is insolvent at the time of the purchase will not prevent the set-off being made. The law as to set-off under the bankrupt law of 1867 is as follows: "And be it further enacted, that in all cases of mutual debts or mutual credits between the parties, the account between them shall be stated, and one debt set-off against the other, and the balance only shall be allowed or paid, but no set-off shall be allowed of a claim in its nature not provable against the estate. Provided, that no set-off shall be allowed in favor of any debtor to the bankrupt of a claim purchased by or transferred to him after the filing of the petition." Of debts and proof of claims under the same law: "And be it further enacted, that all debts due and payable from the bankrupt at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, and all debts then existing, but not payable until a future day a rebate of interest being made when no interest is payable by the terms of the contract, may be proved against the estate of the bankrupt." As we read the law of 1867, as to set-off and proof of claims, this case comes within the letter and meaning of the law. It was necessary, in establishing a rule under which claims against a bankrupt might be purchased and set off. Congress provided substantially, that this might be done at any time—in case of involuntary bankruptcy—before the filing of the petition. In this case, the claims sought to be set off were purchased two months before the petition was filed. To hold that notice of the insolvency of the bankrupt at the time of acquiring the claims sought to be set off—he being a holder for value would permit the set-off—would, in our opinion, in effect, be ingrafting upon this law what is not contained in it, and which congress never intended should be embraced within its meaning.

Finally, it has been said that the defendants' claims not being due when the petition was filed, they were not proper set-offs; under the statutes of Ohio. This question came up in Fuller v. Steiglitz, 27 Ohio St., on page 361. It is there said: "Again, many cases arising under the bankrupt laws adopt a broader rule."

The court, in 4 Ohio St. 593, say: "They have very little, if any, application to this case. Those statutes have generally permitted a set-off of mutual credits, whether due or not, and have therefore, administered a much broader equity than the ordinary law of set-off." The law of set-off, therefore, under the United States bankrupt law, is to be administered by that law, and by the express provisions of that law the claims set up as set-offs, as in this case, are, if mutual debts or credits, allowed, whether already matured or not.

We, therefore, come to the conclusion on the whole case that the defendants are entitled to have their set-offs allowed, and we give judgment accordingly. We are sustained in this decision by the cases: In re City Bank, etc. [Case No. 2,742], and Hovey v. Home Ins. Co. [Id. 6,743]; the holding in which cases we approve.

Case No. 9,302.

The MAUD WEBSTER.

CHALMERS et al. v. HOWELL.

[8 Ben. 547.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1876. Jan., 1877.

COLLISION—AT PIER—LOCALITY—JURISDICTION—LIGHTS—FAIRWAY—PRESUMPTION.

1. Under a contract between H. and the proper officer of the United States, H. was engaged in furnishing the materials for, and constructing the pier for, a lighthouse to be erected at the Middle Ground, Stratford Shoals, in Long Island Sound. He had carried the work up about four feet above high-water mark, and had inside of the ring of stone work, and supported by four wire guys anchored outside of the rip-rap wall, a derrick which he used in the work. This derrick was run into on the night of September 2d, 1875, by the schooner M. W., which struck one of the guys, and both the schooner and the derrick were injured, and cross libels were filed to recover damages. The shoal, on which the pier was being built, was out of the fairway, and, for more than two years before, it would have been impossible for any vessel to sail over the spot because of loose stones and rip-rap, placed there as a foundation for the pier before H. began his work. No light had been placed by H. on the structure. He had asked permission to place one, but it had been refused by the engineer-in-chief of the light-house department. Held, that it must be presumed that jurisdiction over the place where the pier was being erected had been ceded to the United States.

2. The schooner was out of her proper course when she struck the derrick.

3. H. was not in fault for having no light and no watchman on the structure, and was not liable for the damage to the schooner.

4. The court had no jurisdiction of the claim of H. for injury to the derrick, the damage not being done upon the water.

5. The locality of an injury is the locality of the thing injured and not of the agent by which the injury is done.

[Cited in The Professor Morse, 23 Fed. 804.]

[These are two libels. One by David V. Howell against the schooner Maud Webster, George S. Chalmers and others owners, to recover damages sustained by a collision between the schooner and Howell's derrick. The other was by the owners of the schooner against Howell to recover the damages sustained by the schooner, due to such collision, which they claimed was owing to Howell's negligence in placing his derrick in such a position.]

Albert Stickney, for libellant.

George A. Black, for claimants.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. David V. Howell files a libel against the schooner Maud Webster, to recover the sum of $4,000, as the amount of the damages sustained by him, in consequence of the schooner's having come in contact with a derrick and other articles belonging to the libellant. The libel alleges that the libellant, under a contract between himself and the proper officer of the United States, acting for the United States, was engaged in furnishing the materials for, and constructing the pier for, a light house to be erected at the Middle Ground, Stratford Shoals, in Long Island Sound, and owned and had at that place a derrick and tackle and machinery, stone and material, which were being used by him in constructing said pier under said contract; that, on the 2nd of September, 1875, the schooner Maud Webster ran into and upon the said derrick and other articles and damaged them; that the weather, at the time, was clear, and the schooner was in a place where she would not have been with the exercise of care and good seamanship, and the collision was occasioned by negligence on the part of the schooner, her master and crew, and not by any negligence of the libellant or any of his agents or servants; and that the case is within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of this court. The libel prays for process against the schooner, and that she may be condemned and sold to pay such damages.

The answer to said libel alleges that the collision caused damage to the schooner, and was occasioned by no negligence on the part of the master and crew of the schooner; that the weather was thick and the night dark, and the schooner was, at the time, properly navigated, with a watch properly stationed and attentive; that there was no light on the derrick, nor was any one on the same, and it had been very recently erected in a place where vessels of the draft of the schooner were in the habit of passing; that the derrick and other articles had, at the time of the collision, been very recently put in the navigable waters of Long Island Sound, and were negligently left by the libellant without light or watchman, or anything to indicate their existence to vessels navigating the waters of the Sound; that the lights of the schooner were properly placed and burning; and that the collision was occasioned wholly by the negligence of the libellant.

The owners of the schooner file a libel against Howell to recover for the damages sustained by the schooner. That libel contains substantially the same allegations that are found in the answer to the libel filed by Howell. The answer to the libel filed by the owners of the schooner contains substantially the same averments that are found in the libel filed by Howell.

It is very plain, upon the evidence, that the schooner was very much out of her proper course. Her proper course would have been a considerable distance to the north of the pier or else south of the light-ship. The light-ship was considerably south of the pier. I think the evidence shows that, if a careful watch had been kept on board of the schooner, she would not have been where she was. Either through want of attention and observation on the part of those who were on her deck at the time, or through want of seamanship on their part, they allowed their vessel to strike this pier. The place where the pier was being erected was a shoal. Before any attempt was made to put a structure there, there had never been more than two feet of water there at low tide. The rise of the tide there was about five feet. The schooner might, perhaps, have gone over the spot safely before anything had been done there towards erecting the pier. But, for more than two years before this collision happened, it had been impossible for any vessel to sail over the place, because of loose stones and rip-rap placed there as a foundation for the pier. Buoys and charts showed that the proper course for vessels was wide of this spot. The light-ship was the recognized northern limit of the southern channel way, and the buoy to the north of the pier was the recognized southern limit of the northern channel way. The loose stones and rip-rap above referred to, had been placed there a long time before Howell had anything to do with the work. Howell had carried the work up to a height about four feet above the surface of the water, at high water. Notices from the United States light-house department that a light-house was being built at this spot, had been published in several newspapers. It is not shown that the master of the schooner in fact knew of the existence of this structure there.

But, although the schooner was out of her proper course through some cause, it is contended on her part, that, if there had been a light set upon the structure, or a watchman upon it to warn her off, she would not have struck it, and that it was the duty of Howell to have had a light or a watchman upon it. It must be presumed that jurisdiction over the place where this pier was being erected had been ceded to the United States, inasmuch as it is provided by law that no light-house shall be built on any site until cession of jurisdiction over the same has been made to the United States. Rev. St. U. S. § 4661. By section 4666 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, all works of construction in respect of light-houses are placed under the immediate superintendence of such engineer officer of the army of the United States as shall be detailed for the service. It is proved that Howell asked permission to put a light on the structure, but was forbidden by the engineer-in-chief of the light-house department to do so, on the ground that the lights of the light-ship were the proper lights to guide vessels, and that a light on this structure might lead vessels astray. Independently of this, this structure was not in any channel or fairway. If Howell had had a vessel there, and the schooner had struck the vessel, Howell would not have been in fault in not having a light or a watchman on such vessel, because such vessel would not have been moored in any channel, roadstead or fairway where vessels were accustomed to go. A fortiori, no such obligation rested on Howell, in respect of the structure in question. There being no fault on the part of Howell, the libel against him must be dismissed, with costs.

In respect to the libel filed by Howell against the schooner, I am of opinion that this court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of that suit. The objection to the jurisdiction was not taken in the answer, and, although the attention of counsel was called to the point at the trial, it seemed to be supposed on the part of the schooner, that, if this court had jurisdiction of the suit against Howell, it must have jurisdiction of the suit against the schooner. But as an objection to jurisdiction in respect of subject-matter is one which may be taken at any stage of a case, even in an appellate court, and even though not raised in pleading, it is the duty of the court to decline jurisdiction when want of jurisdiction is clear.

If Howell had been held to be in fault for negligently causing an obstruction to navigation, this court could have made a decree against him in the suit brought by the owner of the schooner. It could have exercised jurisdiction over a case of such negligence, because the damage sustained by the schooner would have been sustained on the water, in the course of her navigation, through an obstruction to navigation, although the thing which formed the obstruction which injured the schooner was affixed to and a part of the earth, and was not afloat. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. R. Co. v. Philadelphia & Harve de Grace Steam Towboat Co., 23 How. [64 U. S.] 209; Packet Co. v. Atlee [Case No. 10,341]; Atlee v. Packet Co., 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 389. But where, although the origin of the wrong is on the water, the consummation and substance of the injury are on the land, the admiralty has no jurisdiction. In this case, the schooner which did the injury to Howell's property was on the water, was afloat and engaged in navigation, but Howell's property was a part of the soil of the earth, or was affixed to it, and was wholly on land. In a case of tort, there can be no jurisdiction in the admiralty, unless the substantial cause of action, arising out of the wrong, was complete upon navigable waters. This was decided in the case of The Plymouth, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 20. In that case a vessel lying at a wharf, in navigable water, took fire, owing to the negligence of those in charge of her. The fire communicated to and consumed the wharf and some buildings on it, with their contents. The owners of the burned wharf and buildings sued the owners of the vessel, in admiralty, to recover for the loss. The district court and the circuit court dismissed the libel for want of jurisdiction and the supreme court affirmed the decrees on the same ground. In that case, it was urged, that, as the vessel was a maritime instrument, the tort was necessarily a maritime tort, but the court expressly overruled that view. The present case does not differ from the one cited.

In the case of The Neil Cochran [Case No. 10,087], a corporation owning a swing bridge, which spanned a navigable river, but was so constructed as to swing out of the way of vessels which wished to pass, sued a vessel in rem, in the admiralty, in the district court for the Northern district of Ohio, to recover for damage done by her to the bridge by negligently running into it. The point was taken that the wrongful act alleged did not constitute a maritime tort, and the court held, on the authority of the case of The Plymouth [supra], that, although the negligence or origin of the wrong was on board of a vessel, an instrument of commerce, and although the vessel was, at the time of the negligent act, on navigable waters, yet the whole damage or consummation of the injury was on land, and the admiralty court had no jurisdiction of the suit.

In the case of The Ottawa [Case No. 10,616], the lessees of a wharf or dock, which extended from the shore over the water of a navigable lake, sued a vessel in rem in the admiralty, in the district court for the Eastern district of Michigan, to recover for damages done by her to the wharf, by negligently colliding with it. The court held that the injury done to the wharf could not be considered as done upon the water; that the wharf must be considered as land, or as on the land, or as the shore; that it was of no consequence that the damage was done by a vessel, if it was not also done upon the water; and that the court had no jurisdiction of the suit. Although the criterion of admiralty jurisdiction in cases of tort is locality, yet, as was correctly remarked in that case, the place or locality of the injury is the place or locality of the thing injured and not of the agent by which the injury is done. See, also, The Rock Island Bridge Case, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 213, 216; Russell v. The Empire State [Case No. 12,145], Russell v. The Asa R. Swift [Id. 12,144].

In England, there is a statute (Act May 17, 1861; 24 Vict. c. 10, § 7) which provides that "the high court of admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship." This has been held to give that court jurisdiction over every case of damage done by any ship, and to authorize a suit in rem against a vessel, in admiralty, by the owners of a breakwater, to recover for injury done by the vessel to the breakwater. The Uhla, L. R. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 29, note. There is no such statute of the United States, giving such an enlarged jurisdiction to the courts of admiralty. The question is left to be decided under the provision of the constitution (article 3, § 2) which says that the judicial power of the United States shall extend "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," and under the 8th subdivision of section 563 of the Revised Statutes, which says that the district courts shall have jurisdiction "of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." Under these provisions, the suit against the vessel cannot be maintained, and the libel in it must be dismissed, with costs.

A re-argument of the suit of Howell against the schooner, for the damage done to the derrick, was had and the following decision was given, in January, 1877:

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In deciding this case recently, I held that the libellant's injured property was "a part of the soil of the earth, or was affixed to it, and was wholly on land." The libel alleges that the libellant had, at the Middle Ground, Stratford Shoals, in Long Island Sound, where he was erecting a pier for a light-house for the United States, a derrick and tackle and machinery, stone and material, which were being used by him in constructing said pier, and that the schooner Maud Webster ran into and upon said derrick and other articles and damaged them. The libel seeks to recover such damages in rem against the schooner. The evidence was, that whatever there was belonging to the libellant, which was damaged by the schooner, was not afloat, and did not rest upon any floating support, or upon any boat or vessel or raft which had at any time floated, and was not anchored there, in the sense in which a vessel or a buoy is anchored to the soil below so as to float on or in the water above, but was sustained against the force of gravity wholly by direct pressure upon the soil of the earth. On these facts, I held, on the authority of the cases of The Plymouth, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 20; The Neil Cochran [Case No. 10,087]; and The Ottawa [Id. 10,616],—that the damage was not done upon the water, because the locality of the thing injured was not upon the water, and that the admiralty had no jurisdiction of the suit.

At the request of the counsel for the libellant, this question has been re-argued before me. The libellant had constructed a circle of rip-rap about 70 feet in diameter. The interior of this was open both across and down through the water in it to the soil of the bottom, except where a ring of stone was built up to a line above the surface of the water. At low water men could stand on the bottom inside of the ring. There was a derrick there, used in constructing the pier, but not to remain there after the completion of the light-house. The derrick consisted of an upright, the lower extremity of which rested on the soil at the bottom of the water inside of the rip-rap, and the upright rose through what water was there into the air, and was steadied above by four wire guys which extended to a distance and were anchored to the soil at the bottom of the water outside of the rip-rap. The derrick had an arm or arms above. It is claimed by the libellant that the schooner struck one of the guys.

It is urged that the place where the accident occurred was on the high seas, and not within the limits of any state, and was, therefore, not on the land. The view is, that as it happened in the midst of the water, it must be considered as having happened upon the water. It is also contended that the derrick was there only temporarily; that it was resting on the bottom of the high seas; that such bottom was not land; and that the property injured must all of it be regarded as personal property on the high seas.

I cannot regard the injury to the libellant's property as having occurred on the water, in the sense of the decisions above cited, although, in one sense, it occurred in the water, because it occurred at a place in the midst of or surrounded by the waters. The property was not in use for purposes of navigation, and was none of it afloat, and was all of it supported by direct pressure on the soil of the earth. It was no more upon the water, and the injury to it did not any more happen on the water, than did the injury to the wharf in the cases of The Plymouth [supra] and The Ottawa [supra], or the injury to the bridge in the case of The Neil Cochran [supra].

I must adhere to my decision dismissing the libel, with costs.

Case No. 9,303.

The MAUD WEBSTER.

[1 Hask. 325.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. Feb., 1871.

COLLISION—DRIFTING—STRICT WATCH—MANAGEMENT DIFFICULT—RIGHT OF WAY—BOTH IN FAULT—DAMAGES.

1. A vessel on the port tack, drifting with the current, and hardly moving ahead so as to be controlled by her helm, is in fault for colliding with a vessel on the starboard tack that could have avoided her, if the vessel first named could have prevented the collision by strict watch, and by either going about or by taking inboard her boom so as to go clear.

2. A vessel on the starboard tack, approaching a vessel on the port tack controlled by circumstances that rendered her management difficult, is in fault for colliding with her, when the collision might have been avoided by proper exertions in the management of the first named vessel although she had the right of way.

3. When both vessels are in fault and contribute to the collision, the damages should be equally divided between them.

In admiralty. Libel in rem promoted in behalf of the owners of a smack, sailing upon the starboard tack, against a schooner on the port tack, lumber laden, drifting, and hardly moving so as to be controlled by her helm, for damages from collision. The cause was heard on libel, claim, answer and proofs.

Thomas B. Reed, for libellant.
W. C. Crosby, for respondents.

FOX, District Judge. The libellant is the owner and master of the fishing smack Matilda of the burthen of thirty-two tons, and claims in his libel damages to the amount of $180 from an alleged collision between the two vessels near Sheep Island in the Penobscot Bay, about 6 a. m., May 16, 1870. The smack was light, on a return voyage from Boston to Rockport, and the evening previous came to anchor below the Cow buoy, on Sheep Island bar, the libellant alleging she was well in towards the westerly side of the island. The Maud Webster is a large schooner, was loaded with lumber and bound from Bangor to a port in Connecticut. She came to anchor the evening before outside of Owl's Head, and the next morning between four and five got under way in company with the schooner A. B. Russell of Portland, Conn., Mr. Gaffey, master, also lumber loaded, and bound outwards. The tide was just turned to flood, as is admitted by both sides. It is alleged in the libel, the wind was N. E. by E., and that the collision was caused by the schooner running into the smack when getting under way. The answer states the wind as E. S. E., and under all the circumstances it is important to determine which of these statements as to the course of the wind is correct. The libellant and one of his hands support the averment in the libel, whilst the master, mate and one of the crew of the schooner state the wind as is alleged in the answer, and this statement is sustained by the testimony of the master of the A. B. Russell, who preceded the schooner in working out from Owl's Head, and was but one-fourth of a mile distant from the vessels at the time of the collision. He states, "The wind was E. S. E., quite light under Munroe Island. That both vessels got under way about the same time, but that his went ahead on account of the Maud Webster not being in good trim. That there was not wind enough to give their vessels steerage way opposite Munroe Island. That the Maud Webster was taken by the current across Muscle Ridge channel and quite near to Sheep Island bar and the Cow buoy, notwithstanding they endeavored to pay her off all they could, by shoving out the main-boom as far as possible to leeward." If the wind had been N. E. by E., or from that quarter, these vessels would not have taken the course they did and drifted over near to the island on the east side of the channel, but would have had a fair wind down the channel. I am satisfied therefore from this circumstance that the wind was not as is alleged in the libel, but was about E. S. E. as given in the answer, and as it is sworn to have been by three persons on board the schooner and the master of the A. B. Russell, in contradiction of two only from the smack.

The libel alleges that "the smack was anchored to the southward and eastward of the Cow buoy, close into Sheep Island, out of the channel and track of vessels, and that while getting under way, before the jib could be got into position to pay her off, the Maud Webster passed the Cow buoy, then hauled to, attempted to and finally did pass to windward of the Matilda and between her and Sheep Island, and there run into the Matilda, catching her jib-stay by the schooner's main-boom, which was on the starboard side, doing certain damages, &c."

The answer avers that "the Matilda had a fair wind for running up the channel, and came along with all her sails set and full, starboard tacks on board, and could easily have avoided the collision as she had the whole passage to leeward and might have kept off with proper management, but by negligence ran so near that her jib-stay caught under the schooner's main-boom, and that the collision occurred forty or fifty yards southwest of the buoy."

The libel is sustained by the two witnesses from the smack, they swearing she was not in motion, but that her anchor had broken ground and was hove in after the collision, which they swear occurred one quarter of a mile south-easterly from the buoy.

Those from the Maud Webster testify that the smack was under full sail at the rate of two and one half or three knots, and that the collision occurred a little to the southwest of the Cow buoy.

It is to be lamented that in a case of so small magnitude, there should be on almost every material fact a direct conflict between those on board the respective vessels, and I have been compelled to rely, to a great extent, on the testimony of the master of the A. B. Russell, to determine as to the real state of the case, especially when his statements are corroborated by other circumstances. He was a witness on the stand, a man of more than ordinary intelligence, I should judge, who showed he was well acquainted with the localities and had every opportunity of knowing as to the real state of the facts, and also gave his testimony without any apparent feeling or prejudice for or against either party.

With the wind as the libellant alleges, could these two vessels have come in contact in the place claimed in the libel, one-quarter of a mile south and east of the buoy? I think it is incredible that the collision took place at that point. Whilst the vessels were under the lee of Munroe and Sheep Islands, they were to a very great extent without the influence and power of the wind, as it was light, and the islands broke off its force and effect, but as Mr. Gaffey says, "after the schooners were outside of the buoy, they then began to feel the effect of the wind and his vessel made three knots." With the wind N. N. E. it was a fair wind from the buoy to sea, the N. E. point of Ash Island, which vessels pass bound out, being S. S. W. from the buoy. The schooner therefore, with the wind N. N. E., could have laid her course directly S. S. W., and could not have gone to the eastward so as to come into collision with the smack which was lying S. E. from the buoy as is claimed by the libel, close in under the island, out of the course of vessels bound up and down the bay.

With the wind E. S. E. the schooner would have had it directly abeam, and after she had passed and had got beyond the island, the breeze was sufficient to give her steerageway and let her hold her course without drifting to the eastward as she had done when in the narrow passage above. With the wind obstructed by the islands, after the buoy was passed, the channel was much broader and the breeze of much more power, and there was no occasion for the Maud Webster to have fallen away to the eastward as is supposed.

Mr. Gaffey states, that he preceded the Maud Webster and was one-quarter to three-sixteenths of a mile ahead at the time of the collision, sailed on a course of S. S. W., after passing 100 feet westward of the buoy, and on that course passed to windward of the smack; that she was then under way, and as he passed her noticed a man throw down his handspike and take the helm, and that she had on her mainsail and jib, that they were full and drawing; that at the time of the collision the smack had gone ahead one-eighth to three-sixteenths of a mile and that the two vessels when the collision occurred were between him and the buoy, so that he could not see the buoy. The A. B. Russell, being on a course of S. S. W. from the buoy, passed to windward of the Matilda. It follows as a matter of course that the Matilda was not at anchor at the time of the collision one-quarter of a mile S. E. of the buoy, as has all along been insisted on by the libellant and his witness. The weight of the testimony as well as circumstances, about which there can be no question, establish that the collision occurred S. W. of the Cow buoy and from 200 to 300 feet distant from it; and I am satisfied that the smack was under way and at least one-eighth or one-quarter of a mile from her anchorage, notwithstanding the statement of the libellant and his witness, that she was not in motion, and her anchor had only broken ground. All the witnesses from the schooner show that the smack was sailing so fast as to break water considerably, and Mr. Gaffey agrees with them by saying that she had gone one-eighth to three-sixteenths of a mile from where he passed her, and that the lightness of the wind gave the smack the advantage.

By the 20th article of the rules established by congress in relation to navigation, it is provided that no ship shall under any circumstances neglect proper precautions "which may be required by ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case." Although she was on her starboard tack, it was the duty of the smack to have used proper precaution to have prevented the collision. The courses of the two vessels at the place where the collision occurred, one sailing N. N. E. and the other S. S. W. with the wind abeam, was such that with a proper lookout and ordinary seamanship the smack could have avoided the schooner; being the lightest vessel and easiest to manage with the light breeze, she could without any difficulty have gone a very slight distance to leeward and passed by without interference. There was no one on the watch, the master was in his berth, and from his own statement "that there was quite a breeze at the time, and if the smack had been under way he could have prevented the accident," I am compelled to the conclusion that the smack was in fault, which occasioned or contributed to the accident. The least attention of those on board the smack to the position of the Maud Webster, and noticing that her mainboom was swung hard to leeward and stopped out, would have satisfied them that the schooner was not easily managed and controlled with the wind as it then was, and must have admonished them that they on their part were bound to exert themselves to prevent a collision; but instead of so conducting, nothing was done on the part of those on board the smack to avoid a collision until it had become unavoidable.

The Maud Webster was also in fault up to the time of her passing the buoy; with the light wind obstructed by the islands she appears not to have been entirely under the control of her helm. She was setting so far to the eastward across the channel, that it was found necessary to swing out the mainboom so as to throw her head off to pass by the buoy, but no necessity of this kind continued after she was beyond the buoy. The force of the wind was then more operative. She was beyond the obstruction of the island, and she had a free course from the bar to Ash Island. There was no longer any occasion for her boom being off as it had been, and if a proper, skillful watch had been on duty forward and descried the Matilda running down so close to them, he would have informed the captain seasonably, and the course of the Maud Webster should have been changed or the boom swung on board so as not to endanger the other vessel. There was no man on watch and no such precautions were taken. By the 12th article of the rules of navigation, "ships with the wind on the port side, shall (ordinarily) keep out of the way of the ship with the wind on the starboard side." The Maud Webster had the wind on her port side, and it was incumbent on her to keep out of the Matilda's way if she could. If therefore, she had it in her power by a change of course to have avoided the Matilda, she should have done it, or if by swinging on board her boom the collision would have been prevented. it should have been done. I have no doubt therefore, the collision might with proper care have been avoided by the Maud Webster, and I therefore find she also occasioned and contributed to the injuries.

The decree will be, that both vessels were in fault, and occasioned and contributed to the collision, and the damages and costs of the two vessels must be equally divided between them. Cause referred to an assessor.

BANKRUPTCY—PETITION AND SCHEDULES—VERIFICATION BEFORE NOTARY.

The petition and schedules may be verified before the attorney of the debtor, he being a notary public.

In this matter the debtor [Henry Mauer] verified his petition and schedules before his attorney who was a notary public. The register deeming such verification irregular, certified the question for decision.

E. B. Stonehill, for debtor.

No one in opposition.

HILLYER, District Judge. The rule that affidavits taken before the attorney in a cause cannot be read is an old rule of practice in the courts of king's bench and exchequer in England. It is a technical rule and is limited in actions at law to the attorney on the record, and in equity cases to the solicitor. People v. Spalding, 2 Paige, 326. It does not apply to an affidavit taken before counsel in the suit (Willard v. Judd, 15 Johns. 531), nor to a solicitor who was not named on the record though a partner of the solicitors of record (Hallenback v. Whitaker, 17 Johns. 2). The rule ought not to be extended to cases where the notary is called upon to do a merely ministerial act in which no exercise of judgment or discretion is required, such as swearing a party to the truth of a bill, or petition, or answer. McLaren v. Charrier, 5 Paige, 530. Although the attorney is the legal adviser of the deponent the affidavit may be read if he is not attorney on the record. Williams v. Hockin, 8 Taunt. 435. The rule is further limited to affidavits taken in a cause pending. It does not extend to those taken preparatory to the beginning of one. Vary v. Godfrey, 6 Cow. 587. Affidavits to hold to bail taken before the cause was commenced were held sufficient in Haward v. Nalder, Barnes' Notes Cas. 60, and it has always been the practice in the English courts to permit affidavits of service of process to be sworn to before the attorney in the cause, and also proof of service of the declaration in ejectment. Doe v. Roe, 2 Younge & J. 284; Steph. N. P. 1440.

The affidavits in this matter were not taken in a cause pending, and hence are not to be rejected, as the authorities show. The petition, schedules and inventory must all be made out and verified before being filed and before any bankruptcy proceeding is begun. I am not disposed to extend the rule beyond the cases cited. There is no reason to suspect the least improper influence over the affiant, or to doubt that if these verifications were held bad for the reason assigned the debtor would swear to the same thing immediately before some other officer.

The clerk will certify this decision to the register.

MAUGER v. HOLYOKE MUT. FIRE INS. CO.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1873.

INSURANCE—FIRE—POLICY — CONSTRUCTION — INTENTION—FACTS AND CIRCUMSTANCES EXISTING.

1. Policies of insurance are to be construed largely according to the intention of the parties, and for the indemnity of the assured, and the advancement of trade.

Hearing upon the report of an assessor appointed to assess damages after a default. The suit was brought [by Victor E. Mauger] to recover for a loss under a policy of insurance issued by the defendant. The only question in the case was as to the interpretation of several policies of insurance, the material parts of which are stated in the opinion.

Abbott & Jones and Shattuck & McFarland, for plaintiff.

Ives & Lincoln, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The question in this case arises upon the facts stated in the report of the assessor appointed to assess damages upon a default. On the 20th of April, 1872, the assured (Armstrong & Co.) effected insurance to the amount of $3,000, "on their new lithographic printing-press, contained in the fourth story of brick building situate No. 13 Bowker street, Boston, Mass. It is understood that $300 of the amount shall attach on hand-presses." Just before effecting this insurance, Armstrong & Co. had purchased a new lithographic-press worth $3,500, and of a smaller size than the one subsequently purchased, and referred to in the defendant's policy. Permission was given July 3 for removal to fourth and fifth stories of stone and brick building corner of Milk and Devonshire streets, Boston. On the twenty-eighth day of June following, Armstrong & Co. procured insurance to the amount of $4,000 "on their lithographic-presses and ink-mill, with shafting and belting connected therewith, contained in the fourth and fifth stories of stone building 57 Milk street, corner of Devonshire street." At this date Armstrong & Co. had two steam lithographic-presses and several hand-presses.

Oct. 30, 1872, Armstrong & Co. purchased the steam lithographic-press, described in defendant's policy now in suit, which insured them in the sum of $4,300, from Nov. 1, 1872, to Nov. 1, 1873, "on their Hugh & Kimbers No. 6 steam lithographic-press, size 30x40, situate in chambers of granite and brick building, situate No. 57 Milk street, corner Devonshire street," payable, in case of loss, to the plaintiff.

By the terms of that policy defendant is liable to pay the plaintiff three-fourths of the value of that property on the twenty-second day of January, 1873, being sixty days after the date when proof was made of the loss by fire, which occurred on the tenth day of November, 1872, unless that amount is to be reduced under the provisions of the following clause in the policy: "In case of any other contract of insurance upon the property hereby insured, whether such contract be valid or not, as against the parties thereto, or either of them, the assured shall not, in case of loss or damage, be entitled to recover of this company any greater portion of the loss or damage sustained than the amount herein insured shall bear to the whole amount insured on said property."

At the time of the fire, Armstrong & Co. had in their chambers, 57 Milk street, corner of Devonshire street, three steam lithographic-presses; also hand-presses and ink-mill, and shafting and belting.

Defendant contends that all the policies attach to the press last insured, and that the clause in relation to double insurance is applicable in adjusting the loss.

That the policy of the 20th of April did not attach, is too clear to require any argument or authority. That was in effect an insurance of $2,700, upon a specific steam lithographic-press, described as the new one contained in the fourth story of brick building situate No. 13 Bowker street, and of $300 on hand-presses. No possible construction of the language could make this insurance cover any other steam lithographic-press than the then new one thus specifically described.

The language of the second policy of June 28, 1872, "on their lithographic-presses and ink-mill, with shafting and belting connected therewith, contained in the fourth and fifth stories of stone building, 57 Milk street, corner of Devonshire street," is not so specific.

Policies of insurance are to be construed largely according to the intention of the parties, and for the indemnity of the assured, and the advancement of trade. Facts and circumstances dehors the instrument may be proved in order to discover the intention of the parties. Stacey v. Franklin Fire Ins. Co., 2 Watts & S. 506. This was the case of an insurance upon "merchandise generally, including liquors and groceries contained in store No. 37 South Wharves, for use of whom it may concern, say merchandise without exception." A second insurance was effected in another company, "on coffee and other merchandise, without exception, either on board the John Sargeant at this port, or in the brick store No. 37 South Wharves, in the city of Philadelphia." A loss happened by fire on goods in the store No. 37, not brought in the John Sargeant, or landed therefrom. After admitting evidence outside of the policy of facts and circumstances to show the intention of the parties as to the second policy being a specific insurance on other goods not covered by the first, it was held, that, as thus explained, there was not necessarily a double insurance, but that the first might be on goods generally in the store, and the second on specific goods brought by the John Sargeant, or landed in the store therefrom. Explaining the policies in this case in the light of the attending facts and circumstances at the time they were effected, the intention of the parties is arrived at without difficulty. The first policy was clearly on the new steam lithographic-press, definitely described and located. The policy of June 28, was on the two lithographic-presses then in the chambers corner of Milk and Devonshire streets, and was not intended to apply, and did not apply, to any steam lithographic-presses to be subsequently placed there. It was not a floating policy on a stock of merchandise in a store, bought for sale, and with the intention of replacing it as sold, and keeping the stock good; but on specific machinery, intended for permanent use in the location described. It was not expected or intended to embrace, and the literal meaning of the words used does not embrace, any presses not then in the building. It could only embrace such presses subsequently placed in the building, if explained by facts and circumstances dehors the policy, and the facts and circumstances do not thus explain it, or aid such a construction. The policy of Oct. 30 is specifically upon the third steam lithographic-press not in the building when the other insurances were effected, and not within the description in those policies. There was, therefore, no double insurance. The assessor, holding that the insurance procured April 20, 1872, and June 28, 1872, does not apply to the property covered by defendant's policy, has assessed the damages at $3,450, with interest thereon from Jan. 22, 1873. His report is confirmed, and judgment will be entered accordingly. Judgment accordingly.

MAUL v. SCOTT.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 367.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1822.

EXECUTION—RETURN NULLA BONA—SALE BY DEBTOR—ALIAS.

The lien upon the personal property of the debtor, arrested by the delivery of a fieri facias to the marshal, is lost by the return of nulla bona; and is not waived by the delivery of an alias fieri facias to the marshal, so as to overreach an intermediate sale by the debtor.

The plaintiff claimed property in a horse, which the defendant, as deputy marshal, had taken as the property of one E. P. Taylor, upon a fieri facias at the suit of A. B. The horse had been sold by Taylor to the plaintiff, Maul, on the 10th of January, the horse then being in the possession of one Edward Stone, as bailee of Taylor, who on that day gave a written order to Stone to deliver the horse to Maul. On the 29th of January, a fieri facias against Taylor was issued in favor of A. B., returnable on the 4th Monday of March, and delivered to the marshal on the 19th of February, and returned nulla bona. On the 27th of April, an alias fieri facias was issued and delivered to the marshal, upon which the marshal took the horse as the property of Taylor.

Mr. Hewitt, for defendant, contended that the lien, if any, which took place on the 19th of February, continued (notwithstanding the return of that fieri facias nulla bona), up to the time of the delivery of the alias fieri facias to the marshal, on the 27th of April.

THE COURT, however (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra), said that the lien was lost by the return of the fieri facias, nulla bona, and was not revived by the delivery of the alias fieri facias to the marshal. Verdict for the plaintiff. Motion for new trial on the ground of misdirection of the jury on that point, overruled.

MAULDIN v. CARLL.

[3 Hughes, 249.] [2]

Circuit Court, D. South Carolina. May 18, 1878.

ATTACHMENT—DEBTOR WITHOUT THE JURISDICTION—AUTHORITY TO ISSUE.

Whether an attachment can issue from a court of the United States against the property of a citizen of another state, he not being in the state, at the suit of a citizen of the state.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

The case was a suit brought for the recovery of damages for an alleged breach of contract in the purchase of a cargo of lumber. In accordance with the practice of the state court, which has been held to have been carried into the United States court by force of the provisions of the act of congress of 1872 [17 Stat. 44], the process by attachment has been heretofore referable to any United States court since that enactment in suits of that character. In the case before the court warrant of attachment was issued to the marshal, who arrested the schooner Frances and her cargo at Georgetown, S. C., seeking to attach the interest of Jesse Carll, a part owner of the vessel and the defendant in the action. The provisions of the 1st section of the act of 1875 [18 Stat. 470] re-enacted the law of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], which reads as follows: "No civil suit shall be brought before either of the said courts against any person by any original process or proceeding in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at time of serving such process, or commencement of such proceeding, except as hereinafter provided."

It was contended by Mr. Conner, for plaintiff, that the language of the 8th section would cover his attachment process. The section reads as follows: "When in any suit commenced in any circuit court of the United States, to enforce any equitable or legal lien upon or claim to, or to remove any incumbrance, or lien, or claim upon the title to real or personal property within the district where such suit is brought, one or more, of the defendants therein shall be inhabitant of or found within the said district, or shall voluntarily appear thereto, it shall be lawful for the court to make an order directing such person to appear, plead, answer or demur," etc.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, who represented the vessel attached, contended that the legal or equitable claim upon or claim to incumbrance or claim upon the title to real or personal property, contemplated by the 8th section, must exist before the suit brought for its enforcement, and could not be created by or in said suit.

After hearing the argument, BRYAN, District Judge, decided that he was controlled by the language of the 1st section of the act, but expressed himself dissatisfied with the conclusions to which his mind was forced by the words of the statute.

On motion of Messrs. Simonton & Barker, the following order was signed:

"United States of America, District of South Carolina, Fourth Circuit. W. H. Mauldin, a citizen of South Carolina, v. Jesse Carll, a citizen of New York. It appearing to the court that a warrant of attachment in the above-entitled cause has been issued by the clerk of the circuit court, together with a summons and complaint in a civil suit for damages for an alleged breach of contract, directed against the defendant, and that under said warrant the marshal of the United States has seized, or attempted to seize, the schooner Frances, lying in the port of Georgetown, South Carolina, with her cargo on board, ready to sail; that said seizure has been made, or attempted, on the ground of an alleged interest of the defendant, Jesse Carll, as part owner in said schooner; it also appearing that the defendant, Jesse Carll is not an inhabitant of this district, or found here at the commencement of such proceedings. After hearing argument of counsel on a motion to set aside proceedings as not warranted by law, the court being of opinion that the first section of the act of congress, approved March 3, 1875 (entitled 'An act to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from state courts and for other purposes'), forbids a civil suit to be brought in the circuit court of the United States against an inhabitant of another district, and not found within the district at the time of commencing the proceeding, and that the suit above stated is not within the exceptions of the act of 1875 as therein provided: Now, on motion of Simonton & Barker, it is ordered, that the warrant and summons, and complaint be, and the same are hereby set aside, and the marshal do forthwith release the said schooner Frances and her cargo. It is further ordered that each party pay his own costs."

Case No. 9,308.

In re MAULE.

[1 MacA. Pat. Cas. 271.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June, 1853.

PATENTS—NOVELTY—COMPOSITION OF MATTER—METALLIC PAINT.

[A metallic paint produced by well-known methods, and without the use of any new ingredient, from the refuse left in the manufacture of bi-chromate of potash, is not patentable as a new composition of matter, although the applicant was the first to utilize the refuse for this purpose.]

[This was an appeal by William P. Maule from the refusal of the commissioner of patents to grant him a patent for a metallic paint, alleged to be a new and useful composition of matter, made from the refuse produced in the manufacture of bi-chromate of potash.]

Thos. H. Speakman, for appellant.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The original application was filed on the 15th of December, 1851, and withdrawn, and the return fee paid to him. On the 13th of March, 1852, the same party filed another application for a patent for the same refuse material, to be treated in the same way and for the same purpose. This application was inclosed and sent on to the office in a letter from Mr. Maule's counsel bearing date on the 11th of March, 1852, in which letter he says: "The invention is a valuable one. The paint is manufactured at very little cost, being produced from an article which has heretofore been considered of no value, and yet it is of very superior quality for the purpose intended—for forming an almost purely metallic coating, very hard and durable. It has already been extensively used, and is very highly recommended." In a subsequent letter he incloses a printed paper dated 10th of February, 1852, from which it appears by the certificates of sundry persons that previously to that time, and previously to the application of the 13th of March just stated, the article for the invention of which the patent was prayed had been publicly bought and sold with the knowledge and consent of Mr. Maule. The provision in the statute of 1836 [5 Stat. 117], authorizing the party to withdraw his application is in these words: "In every such case, if the applicant shall elect to withdraw his application relinquishing his claim to the model, he shall be entitled to receive back twenty dollars—part of the duty required by this act—on filing a notice in writing of such election in the patent office, a copy of which, certified by the commissioner, shall be a sufficient warrant to the treasurer for paying back to the said applicant the said sum of twenty dollars." Section 7. Whether under such circumstances a statutory objection existed at the time of filing the second application to the claim for a patent, I express no opinion, no such objection having been raised.

It appears from the papers in the cause that another application, dated the 10th of September, 1852, was presented to the office by the appellant, in which he says: "I have invented a new and improved metallic paint." And he proceeds to give a full and particular description thereof, at the close of which he says: "What I do claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters-patent, is the before-described paint manufactured from the insoluble metallic residuum or refuse which remains after the extraction of the soluble parts in the manufacture of the chromate of potash or soda from chromic iron ore." This application was examined and rejected by the commissioner upon the ground that the alleged invention was not patentable for the want of novelty; and upon notice given an appeal was taken from the said decision and refusal to grant the patent as aforesaid. The reasons for which said appeal were duly filed, and the substance of which are—First. The application is not for making paint out of the oxides, &c., of iron, but from the residuum from the manufacture of bi-chromate of potash, which is a substance of a distinctive character well known in the arts, and is to be considered without reference to the elements of its composition. Second. The discovery of the peculiar properties of this substance, which render it capable of being manufactured into a most valuable paint, and its application to that purpose by the process of cleansing and manufacture pointed out in the specification, constitute a patentable invention under the sixth section of the act of congress of July 4, 1836. Third. Though these properties were due entirely to the oxide of iron which the substance contains, and which have been known to be applicable to the same purpose, yet the discovery of these ingredients existing in this refuse material in such combinations and proportions as to render it useful to mankind in the manner now applied by Mr. Maule, together with the manner of preparation pointed out for rendering it capable of use, are patentable, a new and important result in the arts being produced thereby. Fourth. Though the amount of novelty or invention was small, yet this discovery is patentable on account of its great utility. The manufacture of the residuum into paint, in connection with the manufacture of bi-chromate of potash, is, therefore, a great improvement of the trade. The paint yields a large profit.

The commissioner, in order to show the absence of patentable invention, in answer to the reasons of appeal, makes a comparative analysis between what the appellant states the ingredients of the residuum to be and what is stated in the books of the composition of chromic iron, from which the conclusion is deduced that iron rust or oxide of iron must give the leading character to the material, and the residue will be red or brown, according as the roasting has been more or less skillfully conducted. "Mar's Colors" are referred to, in which are to be seen various paints prepared from the oxide of iron, mixed with other bodies, and of similar colors. To the second reason, to show that appellant was not the first to discover that this refuse is capable of being pulverized, washed, dried, and mixed with oils to form a paint, he says there is but one operation common to all these substances by which each is converted to a paint, namely, washing (when necessary), drying, pulverizing, and mixing with oil. This process, therefore, is not new. As to the washing, the books direct that the chromate of potash shall be lixiviated with water to save all of its salts. Third, that as to the discovery of the ingredients existing in this refuse mineral in such proportions as to render it useful and give it value, and to produce a new and important result in the arts, the same was no new discovery by the appellant. The books give the analysis of this ore, and show how to find out the exact composition; and so also with respect to the process. Mr. Maule has added substantially nothing to the knowledge of the chemical arts that was not known before. As to the difference in the expense, the red oxide of iron is one of the most abundant and most easily pulverized (next to the ochres) of all earthy minerals, and is known under the name of bog-iron—hematite. This makes a paint equal to any iron paint, of a strong reddish-brown color, and it is very abundant. And so as to the hematites and other ores of iron. To the fourth, Mr. Maule's paint has no title to claim on the score of utility. It has not been shown to be better than any other ore or mineral. No invention has been proved. The mere repetition of this well-known process on any mineral or other matter, whether new or old, does not constitute a patentable invention. On the day and place appointed for the hearing said appeal, according to previous notice duly given, an examiner from the office appeared, and, as required of the commissioner by law, the said reasons of appeal and all the original papers in the case, together with the grounds of said commissioner's decision fully set forth in writing, touching all the points involved by the reasons of appeal, were laid before me; and the said appellant filed his arguments in writing in support of his claim.

It will therefore appear that the appellant states his claim to a patent to be for a metallic paint. The invention, he says, consists in making paint from the refuse insoluble matter which remains after the extraction of the soluble parts in the manufacture of chromate of potash from chromic iron ore; that this article has hitherto been considered as of no value in the principal establishments for the manufacture of the bi-chromate of potash in this country and in Europe; it is thrown out as a valueless commodity. The appellant has discovered that it is a valuable article for paint, when properly prepared, and has practically applied it to that purpose, by which about fifteen per cent. profit is gained in the manufacture of bi-chromate of potash and the public supplied with a valuable paint at a very cheap rate. The rejection by the commissioner appears to have been upon the ground that there was no new composition of matter, no new process, but one substantially formed of old ingredients, and by an old process, and, therefore, that there was no patentable invention. I do not understand from the argument in reply that anything is claimed because of any new ingredient in the refuse composition, or because of the process out of and by which the paint is manufactured, but that it is contended that the paint itself is a new and useful composition of matter and a patentable invention manufactured from said worthless residuum, and that he pretends to no claim whatever in connection with the manufacture of the chromate of potash; that his invention begins where that process leaves off. This manufacture, however, thus claimed to be a new composition and a patentable invention, has no feature in it that can constitute a new invention, unless its being manufactured out of the said residuum makes it so.

It is contended that it is within the provisions of the act of congress of July, 1836, § 6, which says "that any person or persons having discovered or invented any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement on any art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter not known or used by others before his or their discovery or invention thereof, and not at the time of his application for a patent in public use or on sale with his consent or allowance as the inventor or discoverer, and shall desire to obtain an exclusive property therein, may make application in writing to the commissioner of patents expressing such desire; and the commissioner, on due proceedings had, may grant a patent therefor." In the construction of this part of the statute as it regards this class of subjects, I suppose the test to be that the combination or process of compounding it must be new.

The cases of The King v. Wheeler, 2 Barn. & Ald. 345, and Crane v. Price [4 Man. & G. 580] were cited for the purpose of supporting the principles that wherever there is sufficient utility to render any discovery better or more valuable to the community, or to those engaged in the particular trade, there is a sufficiency of invention to support a patent; that a patent may be granted for the use of things already known, and producing effects already known, and acting in a manner already known, provided those effects be produced so as to be more economically or beneficially enjoyed by the public. Again, if there be anything material or new which is an improvement of the trade, that will be sufficient to support a patent. Crane's Case, one of those which is referred to for these principles, is amongst the most modern English cases upon the subject, and in which most, if not all, of the previous decisions on these points were reviewed. That case is decided with a view to the construction of the British statute of monopolies, according to the construction given to which, it must be considered as less restrictive than the terms contained in our statute. There are certainly dicta to be found in that and other English cases going to the extent with respect to the beneficiary and economical result contended for in the argument in this case. But it will be found by a critical examination of the facts in the case that there was enough in the case to warrant the decision without going to the extent of those dicta; that is, there was a new and material feature in the combination—that of the hot air blast—which had never been used in that particular combination before. This, together with the result, was a sufficient invention.

The argument, also, is that the objection of double use does not apply; that in this case it is not the double use of a thing before known, but the production of a new article from a substance which, though already known, was not known to have any use at all; that it is of no consequence that some, or even the principal, ingredients in the new article thus produced have been used for the same purpose before, if the composition claimed be new in its particular combination, proportions, or manner of being produced, and otherwise patentable. And for this Ryan v. Goodwin [Case No. 12,186], is relied on. In that case it will be found, as correctly stated in Curtis, that the patent claimed as the invention of the party a new and useful improvement in the making of friction matches by means of a new compound; and it was said that the ingredients had been used before in the making of matches. The court said that the true question was whether the materials had been used before in the same combination, and if not, that the combination was patentable. But in this case the compound out of which the paint was manufactured or made had no new ingredients in it, unless its being said to be a residuum would supply that deficiency; and I cannot agree that it would. In Howe v. Abbott [Id. 6,766], the rule of law laid down is that you cannot have a patent for a result merely without using some new mode or process to produce it. Again, it must be admitted that if new at all, it was only so because of the occasion; and the rule is that if the occasion only is new, that is, produced by old agents and by an old mode, it is not patentable. And so the supreme court of the United States in a very recent case have decided that a patent is not good for an effect or the result of a certain process merely. There is still another case of Steiner v. Heald, in 2 Car. & K. 1022. I have not had it in my power to obtain the book in which the case is reported, but will state the notice of it in Lund, Pat. p. 18. The invention patented was for extracting from spent madder a certain coloring matter used in dyeing, and known by the name of "garancine." The opinion is a very long one. I can therefore state such parts only as will show the reasoning and opinion of the court: "A person discovers a process by which he can get from fresh madder a large quantity of an article, which I must now take to be well known, called 'garancine.' Somebody applies precisely that same process to madder that has been merely boiled. There is no magic in a name or in any language that could be used. The boiling of madder gets out only some of it; this process gets out the rest of it. And in my opinion, in point of law, if the matter is reduced to that, you cannot take out a patent for using a perfectly-known process to get the residue of an article from a material which is known to furnish it, the process being one by which you could get, in the first instance, more or the whole of the article; and by your use of the process you merely get the residue which the common process left behind." Again, at page 22, the judge says: "There is no magic in calling this spent madder. It is madder that has undergone a process by which the whole virtues are not extracted. It appears to me that it is precisely the same as if you applied a process to grapes already imperfectly squeezed, by which you squeezed a little more juice out of them than was formerly done. I do not think you could have a patent for that, for see what it would lead to: If a person in manufacturing districts where they extract metal from certain ores were to find that by applying a process to an ore you could get ten per cent. more of the metal, and it then became worth working the refuse that might stand around in heaps, covering many acres, possibly, it would be just worth while to work that over again by the new process. I am clearly of opinion that no stranger could step in and say: 'Now, I will have a patent for using your process which you have given to the public. I will have a patent for using it to this old rubbish, because it may yield some ore.' I do not think that would do." I have referred to and cited this case for the principles settled by it, which I think are applicable to the case before me.

Upon the best consideration, therefore, which I have been able to give this case, the conclusion to which I have arrived is that the decision of the commissioner is right and correct, and I do hereby affirm the same.

PLEADING AT LAW—CONTRACT—ASSUMPSIT—PLEA IN BAR—ANOTHER SUIT PENDING.

1. When a contract has been executed, indebitatus assumpsit will lie for the amount due upon it.

2. Evidence of the pendency of a suit between the plaintiff Catherine alone, by the name of Catherine Frisset, against the present defendant, for the same cause of action, at the time of bringing the present suit, will not support the issue upon the plea of the pendency of a suit between the parties to the present suit.

[This was an action at law by Maupin and Catherine, his wife, against Francis Pic.] Indebitatus assumpsit for work and labor.

Mr. Morsell, for defendant, contended that as there was a letter stating the terms to be twelve dollars a month, and no count upon that special agreement, the plaintiff could not recover upon the indebitatus assumpsit. 1 Com. Cont. 228.

But THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent) said that, when a contract has been executed, indebitatus assumpsit will lie for the amount due upon it.

There was a plea in bar, that, at the time of commencing this suit, there was another suit depending between the same parties for the same cause of action. The evidence to support this issue was of a suit by Catherine Frisset alone, who was one of the present plaintiffs, for the same cause of action, which was discontinued after the present suit was brought.

THE COURT instructed the jury that it was not such a suit between the same parties as would support the issue on the part of the defendant.

MAURAN v. WARREN et al.

[2 Lowell, 53.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Aug., 1871.

AFFREIGHTMENT — CHARTER-PARTY — STIPULATION — PORT OF NECESSITY — COMMISSION — AGENT CREDIT FOR DRAWBACK.

1. In a charter-party made by a master of a vessel at a foreign port, it was stipulated, that, if the ship should put into a port of necessity, she should be consigned to the charterers or their agents, who were to pay disbursements, charging two and a half per cent commission on the amount, take care of the cargo, and have general charge of the business of the ship. Whether a master can lawfully bind himself to consign the vessel to any particular person in case of disaster, quaere?

2. Where, in a port of necessity, the master did put his vessel in charge of the charterer's agent,—held, the latter might properly require the master to produce his accounts when applying for money; such being the usage of the port.

3. Where the charterer had the funds ready, and kept them ready, to pay the disbursements, and the master broke off the negotiations and employed some one else,—held, the charterer might recover, as damages, the commission agreed on.

4. By the terms of the charter-party this commission of two and a half per cent was to pay for all the services of the agent, and he could not charge five per cent. though the usage of the port was to make that charge.

5. Where the charterer's agent was to have a commission on freight at the port of discharge, this is to be reckoned on the freight received, and not on the gross freight list, some of which could not be collected.

6. Where an agent, in accordance with a usage of business, receives back from the average adjuster a part of the amount charged for his services, he must credit his principal with the amount of such discount or drawback. An agent is not to receive payment from both sides; and a custom to do so would be void.

The libellant [Suchet Mauran, 2d], residing at Providence, R. I., was the owner of the ship Helen Clinton, of which S. C. Sprague was master, who, in August, 1868, being at Liverpool, chartered the ship to the respondents [George Warren and others], a firm doing business at Liverpool and Boston, for a voyage to the latter port. It was agreed, among other things, that the ship should be discharged by the charterers at Boston, who should collect the freight and averages, charging two and a half per cent commission on the amount; and that if the ship should put into any port before reaching her destination, she should be consigned to the charterers or their agents, "who are to pay disbursements, charging two and a half per cent commission on the amount of the same, take care of the cargo, and have general charge of the business of the ship." In the course of the voyage the vessel suffered damage, and was obliged to put back to Queenstown, where she was unloaded and repaired. The charterers were applied to by the master to furnish the money, and agreed to do so, and referred him to Messrs. James Scott & Co., of Queenstown, as their agents, who furnished him £200, and afterwards refused to make further advances. The agents testified that they were ready and willing, and offered, to make all necessary advances, if the master would send them his bills and accounts, as, according to their testimony, was the custom of the port in like cases. The master swore that the agents gave no reasons, but simply refused to let him have more money. There was a further conflict of evidence upon the question whether the libellant, who had gone to England on notice of the disaster, had made a new contract with the respondents varying the terms of the charter-party. This libel was brought to recover a balance of freight; and the respondents claimed the right to retain the commissions which they would have earned at Queenstown, if the master had been supplied with funds, &c., by them, and certain charges and commissions said to be due them at Boston.

F. Goodwin, for libellant.

1. The stipulation that the ship shall be consigned to the charterer's agent is ultra vires. The duty of the master at a port of necessity is to act on his own responsibility, for the benefit of all parties, and he cannot waive this right and duty. See Pope v. Nickerson [Case No. 11,274]; Hurry v. Hurry [Id. 6,922]; The Sir Henry Webb, 13 Jur. 639; Warren v. Skolfield, 104 Mass. 503.

2. We are not estopped, by suing on the charter-party, to set up that this charge is void, because, where an agent exceeds his authority, it is the excess only that is void. Story, Ag. §§ 166, 272.

3. The agents failed to perform the duties required of them.

4. If liable at all, it is only for two and a half per cent on the disbursements.

J. D. Ball, for respondents.

LOWELL, District Judge. In the case cited from the Massachusetts Reports, Warren & Co. acted merely as brokers, and the master appears to have given a gratuitous promise to consign the ship to them, which the court suggests is probably void. Here they were charterers, and had a right to say where the vessel should discharge, and their commission was part of the consideration for the entire contract. I must confess, however, that I have considerable doubts whether a master can bind himself to put his vessel into the hands of the charterer's agents at a port of necessity. But in this case he made the assignment after the disaster, when he had a right to do so; and his action seems to have met the approbation of the libellant, so that no question of ultra vires arises. All that I have to decide is, why the contract was broken, and whether the respondents are entitled to any damages which they can recoup in this action.

Upon the preponderance of the evidence, it seems to me that the true account is that given by the Scotts; that the master refused to show his bills. This is the only theory that reconciles nearly all the evidence, and indeed all, if we suppose that the master has forgotten the reasons given for the refusal. It seems a reasonable and proper precaution for the consignees to take, and is sworn to be usual at Queenstown, to require the accounts to be exhibited; and the master ought not to regard it as any imputation on his honesty. I do not think it is shown that a new contract was entered into in this particular in the interview between the libellant and Mr. Warren. It is not likely that any such point should have been brought up; and the statement of Mr. Mauran appears to be rather of a result, as it rested in his mind after the interview, than of the words, or even the substance, of the conversation; and as the burden rests on him to make out this new contract, and as he is contradicted by Mr. Warren, and to some extent by the other respondents, I cannot hold that he has proved his new contract. Then the case is, that the respondents were ready and willing to furnish the money in the usual way, and, as they swear, kept it on hand for that purpose. It seems to me they are fairly entitled to the two and a half per cent on the disbursements. I remain of the opinion expressed at the hearing, that the true construction of the charter-party is, that they were to charge only this commission. There is evidence that five per cent would have been a reasonable charge, and was paid to the agent actually employed; but this cannot overrule the contract, which agrees for the lesser commission. The respondents undertake to divide the usual commission, and to charge one half of it as the commission on disbursements, and the other half for general care of the business; but the custom does not so divide it. If the usual charge had been two per cent, the libellants would still be entitled to two and a half; and so they are when it is five or more. The evidence that an additional two and a half per cent would be a reasonable charge for the general conduct of the business, is only an argument founded on the fact that five per cent is the usual charge at Queenstown, and would be equally strong in favor of three, four, or five per cent, if they had been necessary to make up the usual charge at that port. If the case had been that the master applied to the respondents to do his business for the agreed commission, and they had insisted that they should charge the usual commission, he might well have refused to employ them, and would have had his action against them if he had been obliged to employ some one else at five per cent. It is only on this ground that the contract can be understood, or perhaps supported, at all. But the evidence does not show that this was the cause of quarrel, and, upon the whole, I think they are entitled to their two and a half per cent. This seems to me the true measure of damages for not using the money which was ready and waiting.

The respondents have charged precisely what Dawson, the agent who was applied to, and acted, did charge; namely, five per cent on disbursements, £25 for care of cargo, and one per cent for indorsing the draft drawn by the master on Baring Brothers, at four months, for the amount of the dis bursements. The measure of damages for not fulfilling the contract and not employing the respondents ought not to include one per cent for indorsing a bill which they never indorsed. It may be that they were to be paid by a bill on a banker, but the libellant would have been at liberty to pay them in some other way. They might as well add the interest for four months, which, I suppose, was added to the draft. For a like reason it seems to me the £25 ought not to be charged. It was for services not rendered, and does not come into the damages for not employing the respondents.

Coming to the charges in Boston, I understand the questions raised to be,—1. Whether a commission is to be charged on the total amount of the general average loss, or only on that paid by the cargo and the freight. 2. Whether the commission is to be on the face of the freight bills, or only on the amount collected. 3. Whether the discount which the average adjuster allowed to the respondents from the face of his bill ought to be credited to the libellant, so far as his proportionate share is concerned.

The evidence is not sufficient to enable me to decide the first point to my own satisfaction. I do not know what part the respondents took in the adjustment, nor how these sums were in fact settled and collected. I will hear the case further on this point, if either party desires it.

The second point involves only a trifle, as I apprehend. The true rule is, that the libellant, by the terms of the charter-party, takes the risk of the solvency of the shippers; but if any freight cannot be collected, he is not to be charged a commission on it.

It is said to be usual for the adjuster to make some discount from his regular charge, for the benefit of the person who gives him the business. This is common in many trades and callings; but it is plain that, when an agent receives such a drawback, he must credit his principal with it. It is, in fact, a deduction from the bill; and he who pays the bill is entitled to it. I have known this question to come up in various forms, and in different courts; but the result has always been the same. The respondents are to have their agreed compensation from the libellant for doing his business, and the expenses. If they can get any work done at less than the market rate, he must have the reduction. It is precisely as if the agent at Queenstown had received a commission from both sides, the libellant and the materialmen. I know this is often done; but no court could sanction it as against the principal, and I have not been instructed that any court ever did sanction it. The libellant's proportion of the discount must be credited to him. Interlocutory decree for libellant. Damages to be made up in accordance with this opinion.

MAURO v. BOTELOR.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 372.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1823.

RENT—GOODS WITH BAILEE.

[This was an action at law by Philip Mauro against Charles W. Botelor.]

Replevin, for fifteen chairs. Avowry for rent arrear. Verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon the following case: Mauro rented the premises of Ann McGunnigle at $150 a year, payable quarterly, for the purpose of having chairs painted therein by one Burden, employed by him for that purpose, Mauro paying the workmen engaged in the work. The chairs were deposited there by Mauro while he was such tenant, for the purpose of being painted and finished as aforesaid, and continued there until the premises were rented by one Esby, a chair-painter, and six months afterward. After Esby took the premises Mauro told him he should want the chairs painted by him, but not till he should give an order for that purpose. The chairs remained there four or five months before Mauro gave the order for painting them; and about a month before the distress was laid, he ordered the chairs to be painted and finished, and they would have been finished and delivered before the distress, but that Esby could not get a certain part of the work done in time. The chairs were distrained for two quarters' rent due from Esby. When the distress was laid, Esby was finishing them and kept them in the house for that purpose.

Judgment for plaintiff, on the case stated.

MAURO et al. v. RITCHIE.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 147.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1827.

PRACTICE — DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA — ORPHAN'S COURT—APPEAL—REVIEW—REHEARING—GUARDIAN—APPOINTMENT TO FULL AGE—REMOVAL.

1. An appeal from the orphans' court, in Washington county, D. C., will be dismissed, if the transcript of the record be not transmitted to this court within thirty days after the order appealed from.

2. The orphans' court has a right to review its sentence, although thirty days have elapsed, and the party has lost his right of appeal from the original sentence; and from the judgment of the orphans' court, upon that review, an appeal lies to this court.

[Cited in Archer v. Meadows, 33 Wis. 175; Estate of Leavens, 65 Wis. 447, 27 N. W. 324.]

3. The difference between a rehearing and a review is, that a rehearing may be had before enrolment of the decree, but after enrolment the party is put to his bill of review.

4. A petition for a review in the orphans' court is analogous to a bill of review in chancery.

[Cited in Estate of Leavens, 65 Wis. 447, 27 N. W. 324.]

5. A judgment of the orphans' court against the petitioner, upon demurrer to the petition for review, is, in effect, a judgment that the errors suggested in the petition for review, as apparent on the record, were not such as ought to have induced the orphans' court to reverse its decree; and from this judgment of the orphans' court the party may appeal to this court.

6. The authority of a guardian appointed by the orphans' court, under the power given by Act Md. 1798, ch. 101, c. 12, § 1, continues until the full age of the infant; and such guardian cannot be removed, unless for refusal to give security, when required by the orphans' court.

7. After a guardian has been appointed by the orphans' court, the infant has no right, at the age of fourteen, to choose another.

[Cited in Smoot v. Bell, Case No. 13,132.]

8. By the common law, it was only where there was a guardian in socage, or by nurture, (in which cases the guardianship continued only till fourteen,) that the infant had a right, at that age, to choose a guardian.

9. Different kinds of guardians: (1) in chivalry; (2) in socage; (3) by nature; (4) for nurture; (5) by statute; (6) by custom; (7) by the chancellor; (8) by the ecclesiastical courts; (9) ad litem; (10) by election.

10. Of the four kinds of guardians at common law, one only exists in Maryland, namely, guardian by nature.

11. Guardian by nature, at the common law, has no authority over the lands of the infant; but his authority over the person of the infant continues until he is of full age.

12. The English statutes of 4 & 5 Phil. & M. c. 8, and 12 Car. II. c. 24, so far as they authorize a father, by his will to appoint a guardian to his infant children, are in force in Washington county, D. C.

[Cited in Re Stockman, 71 Mich. 181, 38 N. W. 876.]

13. Under the Maryland statutes, it seems that the guardian by nature has the custody of the estates, as well as of the person of the infant, until the age of twenty-one; but the father was the only guardian by nature recognized by those statutes.

14. If the infant have no father, nor testamentary guardian, the orphans' court has the right of appointing the guardian to any infant who has an interest in lands, by descent or devise; or is entitled to a legacy, or distributive share of the personal estate of an intestate.

15. By the term "natural guardian," in the act of 1798, must be intended such a natural guardian as is entitled to the guardianship of the estate, as well as of the person of the infant.

16. The act of 1798 does not in any manner recognize the right of the infant to choose a guardian at any age.

17. The orphans' court, whenever it has authority to appoint a guardian, may appoint him to the full age of the infant.

18. An infant cannot choose a guardian, nor can the court appoint a guardian, unless the infant be personally brought into court.

19. A guardian cannot be removed, without notice and citation to show cause.

Appeal from the orphans' court, who had removed the appellants, (who had been duly appointed guardians of John W. Ott, an infant,) and appointed the appellee, John T. Ritchie, guardian in their place.

Before CRANCH, Chief Judge, and MORSELL and THRUSTON, Circuit Judges.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. On the 13th of September, 1826, Joseph Forrest and Philip Mauro, by J. Marbury, "their attorney," applied to the orphans' court for leave to file their petition, praying that court to review its order, granting to John T. Ritchie the guardianship of John W. Ott, to whom the petitioners had been appointed guardians in the year 1821; and that the said John T. Ritchie may be cited to answer the prayer of the petitioners. Whereupon that court ordered that leave be given as prayed, and that a citation be issued against the said Ritchie, returnable to the 20th of September, 1826. The petition was accordingly filed, stating the appointment of the petitioners as joint guardians of John W. Ott; that they gave bond, &c.; that the said John W. Ott is still under age, being about fourteen years old, and still subject to their control and care; that on the 9th of August, 1825, John T. Ritchie, ("who, your orators pray, may be made defendant to this bill of review,") made application to be appointed guardian to the said orphan, and filed a letter from the said orphan, dated from Frederick city, in the state of Maryland, on the 14th of July, 1825, directed to the judge of the orphans' court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, in which he represents himself to be fourteen years of age, and states that he chooses the said J. T. Ritchie as his guardian, and requests that he may be appointed. Whereupon the judge of the orphans' court, without notice to the petitioners, without having caused the orphan to be brought into court, and without further evidence, or other proceeding, by a decretal order appointed the said J. T. Ritchie guardian of the infant, which decretal order is signed and enrolled; that they are aggrieved thereby, and that it is erroneous, and ought to be reversed and annulled. And they assign for error: (1) Because the petitioners were appointed guardians under Act 1798, c. 101, c. 12, § 1, which gives the court power to appoint a guardian for an infant until the age of twenty-one, and that having exercised that power, by appointing the petitioners guardians of the infant till his age of twenty-one, it was not competent for the judge to remove the petitioners and appoint a new guardian except for cause shown, in the omission or neglect of duty, &c.; and if such neglect were alleged, the petitioners were entitled to be cited and heard. (2) Because the infant had no right, at the age of fourteen, to choose a guardian, having had guardians appointed until he should be twenty-one years of age. (3) Because the infant was not brought into court, and under the inspection and examination of the judge; that his age, competency to choose, and wish might be distinctly known to the judge. (4) Because the petitioners were not cited to show cause why they should not be removed, and the said Ritchie appointed guardian. (5) Because the petitioners had no notice of the application and appointment of the said Ritchie until after the said order was made, and had no opportunity to object to the same. "For all which errors in the said decretal order your orators have brought this bill of review, and humbly conceive that they should be relieved therein. In tender consideration whereof, and for that there are divers errors and imperfections in the said decretal order and proceedings, by reason whereof the same ought to be reviewed and reversed, &c.; and to the end that the same may be reviewed and reversed, &c., and that the said J. T. Ritchie may answer, &c., and that your orators may be relieved according to equity and good conscience, may it please your honor to grant your orators a subpoena to the said J. T. Ritchie," &c., and they file a record of the proceedings referred to. The said J. T. Ritchie appeared on the 20th of September, 1826, and prayed further time to answer, which was given to the 27th, when he appeared by Mr. Swann his solicitor, and said, "that the bill of review, so as aforesaid exhibited against him, and the matter therein contained, are not sufficient in law to compel him to answer the said bill," &c. "wherefore for want of a sufficient bill in this case the said John prays that the said bill may be dismissed," &c. And the said Joseph and Philip, by J. Marbury their attorney, say that the bill, &c., is sufficient in law, &c. &c.

The cause having been submitted to the judge of the orphans' court, without argument, he decreed that the prayer of the petition could not be granted, and that the petition be dismissed with costs. Upon which decree the petitioners appealed to this court.

The original order, appointing the petitioners guardians, was in these words: "March 21, 1821. Catharine Ott having declined the appointment of guardian to the infant children of her son, the late Doctor John Ott, it is by the court this day ordered, that Joseph Forrest and Philip Mauro, both of said county and district, be appointed joint guardians of the said orphan children of Doctor John Ott, deceased, they entering into a bond of $20,000, for each guardianship, with William Cooper and Hanson Gassaway securities." On the 9th of August, 1825, John T. Ritchie made application to the court to be appointed guardian to John W. Ott, and filed the following letter: "Frederick City, Frederick County, July 14th, 1825. To the Honorable Mr. Lee, Judge of the Orphans' Court for Washington County, in the District of Columbia. Honorable Sir,—I beg leave hereby to make known to you that I am the son of Doctor John Ott, late of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, deceased, and am above the age of fourteen years, but under twenty-one; and I do choose for my guardian, my uncle, John T. Ritchie, of Georgetown aforesaid; and do hereby make application to you, sir, and request that you will be pleased to appoint him my guardian; that thereby he may possess and exercise the right of protection to myself and the property that has descended to me. With great respect, I remain your most obedient servant, John W. Ott." On the back of which letter was the following affidavit: "Maryland, Frederick County, ss. On the 14th day of July, 1825, personally appears John W. Ott, son of Doctor John Ott, late of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, deceased, the individual whose signature is attached to the within letter, before the subscriber, a justice of the peace in and for said county; and the said John W. Ott, being by me privately examined apart from and out of the hearing of all persons whomsoever, declares that he had written the within letter for the purpose of having it delivered to the Honorable Judge Lee as thereby directed, with the view to procure the appointment of his uncle, John T. Ritchie, to be his guardian, and that he has not been induced to choose his said uncle to become his guardian by threat or ill usage of his said uncle, or of any other person, or through his or their displeasure. Witness my hand, George Rohr."

It is noted on the record of the orphans' court, that the court delivered an elaborate written opinion, concluding with a decree that the petition of Forrest and Mauro be dismissed with costs. It appears from that opinion, the substance of which was published in the National Intelligencer of the 25th of December, 1826, that although the counsel of Mr. Ritchie objected to the court's opening the case upon this bill of review, yet the court did open it; and did reconsider and confirm its former decree; and the question whether that court had power thus to review its decree is to be considered as reserved for the appellate court. The appeal from the original decree appointing Mr. Ritchie guardian, was dismissed by this court at May term, 1826, because the transcript of the record was not transmitted within thirty days after the decree. It is now contended by the counsel of Mr. Ritchie that the present appeal is to the refusal of the orphans' court to review its former decree, and not to the decree which in effect affirmed its former decree; so that the only question now before this court, as they contend, is, whether the orphans' court erred in refusing to reconsider its former decree. But the elaborate opinion of that court shows that it did review its former decree, and that it was because it found that decree to be correct that it passed the decree for dismissing the petition of Forrest and Mauro. The former decree was reviewed, and in fact affirmed. Does the appeal from this last decree bring before this court the question whether the former decree was correct? If it does, and if this court should be of opinion that the first decree was erroneous, and that the orphans' court, upon the review or rehearing, ought to have reversed that decree, is it competent for this court to reverse it? If the orphans' court, in its discretion, had a right to review or rehear the cause, and did review or rehear it, we suppose no one will doubt the right of either party to appeal from the new decree made at the rehearing.

The first question, then, is, whether the orphans' court had a right, circumstanced as the cause then was, to grant a rehearing, or to review its decree. It is said that the proceedings of the orphans' court are analogous to those of a court of chancery, and that by the rules of that court a cause cannot be reheard after the decree has been enrolled; and that it is considered as enrolled after the expiration of the term in which the decree was rendered. To this it is answered, that the orphans' court has no terms. It sits every day, or whenever the judge thinks proper. That its decrees are never, in fact, enrolled, and are only to be found in the paper minutes of the court. That the court is not bound by the rules of the chancery court; and if it were, yet in courts of chancery a rehearing is often had after the term in which the decree is pronounced, and is always within the discretion of the court, who will, and often have set aside the enrolment for the purpose of letting in a party to a rehearing. 1 Har. Ch. Prac. 649, and to this effect were cited the case of Travis v. Waters, 1 Johns. Ch. 48; and Consequa v. Fanning, 3 Johns. Ch. 364. See also the case of Mills v. Banks, 3 P. Wms. 1, 8, where a cause was reheard after a lapse of eighteen years, and where the chancellor says that a rehearing is in the discretion of the court, and is not always a matter of right; and in one case, where the decree was not enrolled, the court refused to discharge an order for a rehearing, although at the distance of about twenty-four years. The principal difference between a rehearing and a review, is in this, that a rehearing may be had before enrolment of the decree; but after enrolment the party is put to his bill of review, which, if it be founded upon new matter of fact, discovered since the closing of the commission to examine witnesses, cannot be filed without leave granted upon petition; but if it be founded upon error in matter of law apparent upon the record, no such previous permission of the court is necessary. In the latter case, "the constant method is to put in a plea, and demur, namely, a plea of the decree, and a demurrer against opening the enrolment; and an answer is rarely required, unless the same be ordered by the court; so that in effect a bill of review cannot be brought without leave of the court, in some shape; for if it be founded upon matter apparent in the body of the decree, then, upon the plea and demurrer, the court judge whether there are any grounds for opening the enrolment; and if upon matter of fact newly discovered, the court, upon the petition for leave to file the bill, will judge whether there be any foundation for such leave." 1 Har. Ch. Prac. 170.

The court, then, had a right to review its decree. In the present case, leave was granted "to file a petition, praying the court to review its order, in granting to John T. Ritchie the guardianship of John W. Ott." This petition was analogous to a bill of review in chancery, and points out the errors in law apparent upon the record for which it alleges that the decree ought to be reversed. It admits that the decree had been signed and enrolled, and prays that it may be reviewed and reversed. To this bill, or petition, the defendant, Mr. Ritchie, was cited to answer; and, having appeared, filed a general demurrer; to which there was a general replication and joinder. The decree of the orphans' court thereupon was, that the prayer of the petition cannot be granted, and that the petition be dismissed, with costs. This decree must be referred to the demurrer, and considered as a judgment in favor of the defendant, upon the issue of law joined by the parties; and cannot be considered as the mere exercise of the discretion of the court in refusing to review its decree, or to rehear the cause. That discretion was exercised, and perhaps expended in the order for leave to file the bill of review. The decree is, in effect, a judgment that the errors, suggested in the bill of review as apparent on the record, were not such as ought to have induced the orphans' court to reverse its decree appointing Mr. Ritchie guardian to John W. Ott. The parties had, by the demurrer and joinder, submitted to the court a matter of law, (of right,) not of discretion. The court decided the matter of right, and the parties, aggrieved by the decree, have appealed to this court. The question, then, upon this appeal, is, whether that matter of law, (or right,) thus put in issue by the parties, has been correctly decided by the orphans' court.

The bill of review states five grounds of error: (1) That the petitioners, Forrest and Mauro, had, by a previous order of the court, been appointed guardians of John W. Ott, by virtue of the first section of the 12th chapter, Act 1798, c. 101, and that it was not competent for the court to remove them, except for cause shown, in the omission or neglect of some duty; nor without being cited and heard. (2) That the orphan, having had a guardian appointed for him until the age of 21, had no right, at the age of 14, to choose a guardian. (3) That he was not brought into court to choose his guardian. (4) That the petitioners were not cited to show cause why they should not be removed; and (5) That they had no notice of the application and appointment of Mr. Ritchie, until after he was appointed.

1. By the 1st section of the 12th chapter of Act 1798, c. 101, it is enacted, "that whenever land shall descend, or be devised to a male under the age of 21 years, or to a female under 16," "and the said male or female shall not have a natural guardian, or guardian appointed by last will, agreeably to the statute in that case made and provided," (12 Car. II. c. 24,) "the orphans' court shall have power to appoint a guardian to such infant until the age of twenty-one years, if a male, and until the age of sixteen, if a female, or marriage." Under this clause of the statute, the petitioners Forrest and Mauro were, in 1821, appointed joint guardians of the infant children of Dr. Ott. As the court had power to appoint them guardians until the full age of the infants, and as they were appointed generally, without limitation of time, their authority continues until the infants respectively attain that age, unless it be lawfully revoked by the court. The orphans' court has no express power, under the statute, to remove a guardian, or to revoke the appointment, except in the single case of his refusing to give security when required; and by the 20th section of the 15th chapter of Act 1798, c. 101, it is enacted, "That the orphans' court shall not, under any pretext of incidental power or constructive authority, exercise any jurisdiction whatever, not expressly given by that act, or some other law." If it claim jurisdiction to remove a guardian for any other cause, it must claim it as a jurisdiction incidental to the power of appointment. But all incidental jurisdiction is expressly forbidden by the statute. The orphans' court, therefore, had no power to remove the guardians, or to revoke their authority, they never having refused to give the security required.

2. But it has been contended that an infant has a common-law privilege of choosing a guardian at the age of fourteen, and that this privilege has been "sanctioned by the uniform usage, in England and this country, of a thousand years;" that it is "a solemn, immemorial right;" and that the statute, when it authorized the court to appoint a guardian until the infant should attain the age of twenty-one years, meant to say, "unless the orphan, after he shall arrive to the age of fourteen years, shall object to such appointment, and ask permission to choose another guardian." [2] But it was not contended that this was an absolute right to choose a guardian; but a right to be exercised under the "surveillance" of the court; for it was admitted that the court would not appoint the person nominated by the orphan if he "were non compos, convicted of an infamous crime, or notoriously dissolute and immoral; nor unless he gave ample security for the faithful discharge of his trust." The statute does not in the slightest manner recognize, or allude to, the right of the infant to choose his guardian; but by giving the court an absolute power to appoint a guardian till twenty-one, evidently negatives the idea of any such right; for such a right is inconsistent with the power given to the court. But it seems to have been taken for granted that, by the common law, the infant had a right to choose his guardian in all cases. This is not true. When there was a guardian in chivalry, or by nature, or by statute, the infant had no right to choose. It was only when there was a guardian in socage, or for nurture, in which cases the guardianship continued only till the age of 14, that the infant's right of election existed.

By the law of England there are various kinds of guardians: (1) Guardian in chivalry; (2) in socage; (3) by nature; (4) for nurture: (these four were by the common law); (5) by the statute of 4 & 5 Phil. & M. c. 8, and 12 Car. II. c. 24, § 8, by which statutes the father has a right, by deed or last will, to dispose of the custody of his infant children until their age of 21, or for a less time, and these are called "testamentary," and sometimes "statutory" guardians; (6) guardians by the custom of particular manors, cities, &c.; (7) guardians appointed by the lord chancellor, exercising, in this respect, the royal prerogative of parens patriae; (8) guardians appointed by the ecclesiastical courts; (9) guardians ad litem, appointed by any court in which the interests of an infant are litigated (3 Bl. Comm. 426; Harg. Co. Litt. 88b, note 16); these are, in general, only appointed pro hac vice, and continue only until such interest is finally disposed of by the court; (10) guardians by election.

1. Guardian in chivalry existed only when the infant inherited lands holden by knight's service. This guardian had the custody of the person and lands of the infant until his full age of twenty-one, and took the profits to his own use without account; and also the value of the marriage of his ward. The infant had no right to elect a guardian. This tenure was abolished by the statute 12 Car. II. c. 24, and with the tenure went the right of guardianship connected with that tenure.

2. Guardianship in socage arose, like that in chivalry, wholly out of tenure. It was necessary that the ward should have inherited lands holden in socage. It continued only until the heir attained the age of fourteen, although some have said that it continued until the age of twenty-one, unless the ward, after his age of fourteen, should have elected another guardian. King v. Pierson, And. 313; Lit. § 123; Byrne v. Van Hoesen, 5 Johns. 67. The guardian in socage had the custody of the person and of the lands; but wholly for the benefit of the ward. The guardian in socage must be the next of kin, to whom the lands of the infant cannot by any possibility descend.

3. Guardianship by nature, existed only where the ward was heir apparent of the guardian, and extended only to the person of the ward. The father was always guardian by nature of the person of his heir apparent, even when the infant inherited lands holden by knight's service, and where the lord was guardian of the estate. Guardianship by nature continued until the full age of twenty-one; and the infant had no right to elect a guardian. This guardianship did not extend to the younger children who were not heirs apparent. Guardian by nature has no right to the custody of the infant's estate. H. St. G. Tucker's notes on 1 Bl. Comm. 461.

4. Guardianship for nurture extended only to the custody of the persons of those infants who are not heirs apparent, and continued only until their age of fourteen years, and none could have it but the father or mother. It only occurs where the infant is without any other guardian. After fourteen the infant is at liberty to choose his guardian. How this election is to be made, at common law, does not appear in any book that we have consulted.

The court of chancery, exercising, in regard to infants, the prerogative of the king as parens patriae, will appoint guardians whenever such appointment is necessary for the purpose of protecting the infant's general interest, or for the purpose of sustaining a suit, or of consenting to the marriage of the infant. In re Woolscombe, 1 Madd. 213. But it could never have been required, by the common law, that all the infants in the kingdom who had not guardians provided by the common law, should be brought into the court of chancery, to obtain them. The ecclesiastical courts have claimed a right to appoint curators or guardians, as to legacies, and distributive shares of the personal estates of intestates, and this right has been admitted by the common-law courts; but their right to meddle with the persons of infants has been denied both by chancellors and by common-law judges. 4 Burn, Ecc. Law, 88, 91; Banes v. Lowder, 3 Keb. 834; Bishop of Carlisle v. Wells, 3 Jones, 90, 2 Lev. 162; Buck v. Draper, 3 Atk. 631; Rex v. Delaval, 3 Burrows, 1436. There is a dictum of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke in 2 Ves. Sr. 375, that "supposing there was no testamentary guardian, nor a mother, if the infant has any socage land, and is of the age of twelve, if female, or of fourteen, if male, they are allowed to choose their guardian; as is frequently done on the circuit, and is the constant practice, and what this court frequently calls on infants to do; though this is still liable to any reasonable objection made to such choice." Mr. Hargrave, in note 16 to Co. Litt. 88b, understands the expression "on circuit" to mean before a judge on the circuit. We have not found this practice alluded to in any other book, unless it be in Style, 456; but it is so explicitly stated by Lord Hardwicke that we must take it to be so; and it is probable that the appearance of the infant, and his choice, with the approbation of the court, were entered upon the minutes of the court, and constituted the only evidence of the title of the guardian thus chosen. This practice is, by Lord Hardwicke, confined to the case where the infant has socage land; and probably to the case where there had been a guardian in socage, which could only be where the infant took by descent. A person cannot strictly be said to have land unless he has a freehold estate; for none but a freeholder can be tenant to the precipe, or be the owner of real estate. Where an infant had land by purchase, and not by descent; or where he had only personal property, it does not appear that a guardian could be elected or appointed before a judge on the circuit.

The right of the ecclesiastical courts to appoint a curator of guardian for the personal estate, is probably no more than the right of every court to appoint a guardian ad litem (3 Salk. 177, pl. 14; 3 Burrows, 1436); for those courts, having jurisdiction as to wills and legacies, and the ordering of distribution of intestate estates, all legatees, and persons entitled to distributive portions of intestate estates, were parties before them; and if any of those parties were infants, those courts, as every other court, would have had a right to appoint guardians ad litem to protect their interests, so long as they were pending before those courts, and to receive and apply the money or other property which they should receive under the orders of such courts, who would have a right also to take security from such guardians for the faithful execution of their trust. This is probably the only foundation of the power of the ecclesiastical courts to appoint guardians; and it will not support a claim to appoint a guardian for the person of the infant, (Loury v. Reynes, 2 Lev. 217,) or for his personal estate acquired in any other way than by bequest, or in the course of distribution. In the case of guardian for nurture it does not appear in what manner, or before whom the infant, when he attained the age of fourteen, was to make his election; it is probable, however, that it was to be made as in the case of tenure by socage. Nor does it appear that an infant, by the law of England, had a right to choose a guardian in any case where a guardian had been appointed for him by any person having a discretion to choose, unless such appointment were expressly limited to the time of the infant's attaining the age of fourteen, which it is believed, in analogy to the rule of the common law in guardianship in socage and for nurture, was generally the case in appointments by the court of chancery, and by the ecclesiastical courts; after which age of fourteen they were generally permitted to nominate their guardians, and if the courts perceived no material objection, they appointed the guardians thus nominated. And. 313, 2 Lev. 217. After the statute of 12 Car. II. c. 24, which abolished tenures by knight's-service, almost all the tenures became tenures in socage, and, consequently, almost all guardianships as to lands, fell upon persons not personally chosen by anybody. It was right that these accidental guardianships should be removable at the age of discretion of the infant; but the same reason did not apply to guardians selected by any authority competent to choose persons well qualified to take care of the interest of the infant. Hence the statute of 12 Car. II. c. 24, § 8, authorized the father to appoint a guardian to his child until the age of twenty-one, without recognizing any right in the child to choose a guardian. This provision, Mr. Justice Blackstone seems to think, was made in consideration of the imbecility of judgment in children of the age of fourteen.

Of the four kinds of guardianship at common law, it is believed that only one exists in this country, namely, guardianship by nature. Tenancy by knight's-service, and, consequently, guardianship in chivalry, never existed here, as the lands were, by charter, to be holden in free and common socage. Guardianship in socage cannot, since the Maryland statute of descents, 1786, c. 45, exist here, because there cannot be found any of kin to the infant, who may not, by possibility, inherit the land. Guardianship for nurture cannot exist here, because it is applicable only to such children as are not heirs apparent; and here all are, by that statute, heirs apparent, and, consequently, guardianship by nature exists in this country, and applies to all the children. But a guardian by nature, at the common law, has no authority over the lands of the infant, and, perhaps, not over his personal estate; as it has been decided, both in England and in some of these states, that he has no right to receive a legacy bequeathed to his ward. See Harg. Co. Litt. 88b, and note 12; Genet v. Tallmadge, 1 Johns. Ch. 3; Anderson v. Darby, 1 Nott & McC. 369; May v. Calder, 2 Mass. 59; Strickland v. Hudson, 3 Rep. Ch. 168; Dagley v. Tolferry, 1 P. Wms. 285; Eq. Cas. Abr. 300, pl. 2; Gilb. Cas. 103; Philips v. Paget, 2 Atk. 80; Cooper v. Thornton, 3 Brown, Ch. 96, 186; Cunningham v. Harris, cited by the master of the rolls, in Cooper v. Thornton; Tucker's notes to 1 Bl. Comm. 462; 1 Vern. 295; 1 Johns. Cas. 217.

5. Statutory guardianship. The statute of 4 & 5 Phil. & M. c. 8, which, by implication, gave the father a right to appoint a guardian, by deed or will, to his daughters until the age of sixteen, and upon the death of the father, without such appointment, gave the custody of the daughters to the mother; and the statute of 12 Car. II. c. 24, § 8, which authorized the father to appoint, by deed or will, a guardian for his infant children until their full age, were in force in Maryland; and the latter is expressly recognized and referred to in the testamentary system of Maryland of 1798 (chapters 101, 12, § 1). These statutes are now in force in this country, and such guardians may now be appointed by the father.

6. Guardians by custom are unknown in this country.

7. Guardians by appointment of the chancellor. The chancellor in Maryland, it is believed, never had the power of appointing guardians, except ad litem.

8. Guardians by appointment of the ecclesiastical courts. No such courts exist in this country. The judge, or commissary-general, or deputy-commissaries, who exercised in Maryland the only remnant of ecclesiastical jurisdiction transferred to this country, had no such power. It was, by Act Md. 1715, c. 39, vested solely in the commissioners of the county courts, that is, the justices of the county courts.

9. Guardianship ad litem. All the courts had power to appoint guardians ad litem, to protect the interests of infants in their respective courts.

10. Guardianship by election, as mentioned by some of the English writers, has never been recognized in this country. Hargrave, in his note 16 to Co. Litt. 88b, says: "The right of making such an election arises only when, from a defect of the law, the infant finds himself wholly unprovided with a guardian."

Lord Coke, in Co. Litt. 87b, says: "If a man be seized of a rent-charge, rent-seck, common of pasture, and such like inheritances which do not lie in tenure, and dieth,—his heir within the age of fourteen years,—in this case the heir may choose his guardian; but if he be of such tender years as he can make no choice, then (if the father hath made no disposition of the custody of the child,) it were most fit that the next of kin, to whom the inheritance cannot descend, should have the custody of him. And whosover taketh the rent, &c., the heir shall charge him in an account. But if he hold any land in socage, in that case the guardian in socage shall take into his custody as well the rent-charge, &c., as the land holden in socage, because he hath the custody of the heir." This is a case in which Lord Coke supposes that the heir may choose his guardian before the age of fourteen. Mr. Hargrave remarks upon it, that "Lord Coke only takes notice of such an election where the infant is under fourteen; and, as to this, omits to state how, and before whom, it should be made. Nor have we yet met with any prior or cotemporary writer who supplies the defect. As to a guardian after fourteen, it appears, from the ending of guardianship in socage at that age, as if the common law deemed a guardian afterwards unnecessary. However, since 12 Car. II., enabling a father to appoint a guardian to his children till twenty-one, it has been usual, for want of such a guardian, to allow the infant to elect one for himself." "Such election is said to be frequently made before a judge on the circuit. 2 Ves. Sr. 375. But we do not think this form to be essential. The last Lord Baltimore, when he was turned of eighteen, having no testamentary guardian, and being under the necessity of having one for some special purposes, relative to his proprietary government of Maryland, named a guardian by deed." "Indeed, it seems as if there was no prescribed form of an infant's electing a guardian after fourteen, any more than there is before; and therefore election by parol might, perhaps, be sufficient, though it would be wrong to trust to a mode so unsolemn. But we do not wonder at the deficiency, because guardianship by election of the infant is of very late origin; it being, we believe, not only unnoticed by any writer before Lord Coke, except Swinburne, but there still being no cases in print to explain the powers incident to it, or whether an infant may change a guardian so constituted by himself. Even Lord Coke, we see, though professing to enumerate the different sorts of guardianship, and though he had before mentioned the latter one, omits it here." Co. Litt. 88b. "Whence it may probably be conjectured that, in his time, it was, in strictness, scarcely recognized as legal."

What Swinburne says in part 3, § 11, respecting the right of the infant to choose his tutor, applies only to the custom of the province of York. Buck v. Draper, 3 Atk. 631. Thus we see that the right of infants, at the age of fourteen, to choose their guardians, is not universal, nor has been "of a thousand years' standing." By the law of Maryland (Act 1715, c. 39, § 7), "If any part thereof (that is, of the intestate's estate) belong to an orphan who is capable of choosing his guardian, such orphan shall be called to court (the county court) and shall then and there choose his guardian, into whose hands the said orphan's estate shall be committed; but if such orphan be not at age, then the justices aforesaid (of the county court) shall put the persons, lands, goods, and chattels of the orphans into the hands of such person or persons as they shall think fit, and take a bond, with two sufficient sureties, in the names of the orphans themselves, for the securing and delivering the said estate to said orphans, or their guardians, when thereunto lawfully called." The persons thus appointed, before the orphan is of age to choose his guardian, are, by the act, called trustees. It is not expressly said in the act how long these trustees shall exercise the rights of guardianship; but, from their being bound to deliver up the property to the orphans themselves, it is evident that the guardianship was to continue, or might continue, until the orphans should be of full age, and capable of receiving the possession of their estates; and by the provision being in the alternative, namely, to deliver up the estates to the orphans, or to their guardians, it is equally evident that guardians might be afterwards appointed; but as the county court had power, upon the trustees' refusal to give new security when required, "to remove the orphan's estates out of their hands" (Act 1715, c. 39, § 20), "and to remove the person and estate of such orphan into other hands" (Act 1729, c. 24, § 6), it does not necessarily follow that the trustees so appointed were to be removed of course, upon the infant's attaining the age of fourteen; nor that the infant, after such appointment, had a right, at the age of fourteen, to choose his guardian; for the obligation of the trustees to deliver up the estate to the guardian, when required, might be only an obligation to deliver it to the person into whose hands the court should order it to be removed, in the cases referred to in the 20th section of Act 1715, c. 39, and 6th section of Act 1729, c. 24.

This idea is corroborated by the 33d section of Act 1715, c. 39, by which, if a guardian should commit waste, and should fail to give security as the court should require, to answer to the orphan for the waste, when at age, the orphan (if at age to choose his guardian,) should elect his guardian; but if not of age to make such election, the court should appoint such other person as they should think meet; and the guardian so elected, and the other person so appointed, were to hold and enjoy the land and plantations until the orphan should "come to age." By this section, the persons appointed by the court while the orphan was under fourteen years of age, were required to hold the estate granted, until the full age of the infant; therefore, taking together the 7th, 20th, and 33d sections of Act 1715, with the 6th section of Act 1729, and Act 1763, c. 24, it seems to us that the right of the infant to elect a guardian, which is clearly recognized by those acts, is confined to the case where the infant is without a guardian or trustee already appointed by the court, or by the father, under the statutes of 4 & 5 Phil. & M. c. 8, or 12 Car. II. c. 24. By Act 1763, c. 24, the court was authorized, on application, to permit an orphan of fourteen years of age to choose his guardian; and if under fourteen, the court was to appoint the guardian, even before the distributive share of the orphan was certified by the commissary to the county court; and the guardian so appointed was to have the same power as a guardian otherwise appointed, viz. to hold the estate until the full age of the orphan. The act of Maryland of 1777 (chapter 8), by which the orphans' court was erected, gives to that court all the powers before vested in the county courts, or in the commissary general, in relation to guardians and testamentary affairs. Thus the law stood until the legislature revised the several acts upon the subject, and adopted the system reported by the chancellor of Maryland in Act 1798, c. 101.

In the previous acts nothing was said of guardians by nature, or natural guardians, or testamentary guardians, except that the latter are excluded from the operation of the 30th section of the act of 1715, which requires the guardian to ascertain the annual value of the real estate, &c., the words are "other (orphans) than such whom the testator in his lifetime, by his last will or testament, hath otherwise ordered and disposed of." But those acts only provided for the case of orphan infants; that is, fatherless infants. The legislature seems to have supposed that the father, as guardian by nature, had the custody and care of the real and personal estate, as well as of the person of his child; and does not seem to have considered the mother of an orphan as his guardian by nature, after the death of the father. This was not so at the common-law. By that law the guardian by nature, had only the custody of the person of his heir apparent; and, after the death of the father, the mother, if living, was guardian by nature to her heir apparent. The grandfather was also guardian by nature to his grandson, if he was his heir apparent. So the grandmother, the uncle, the aunt, &c., would, each, be guardian by nature to his or her heir apparent; and yet the old acts of Maryland, in all such cases, authorized the county courts to appoint guardians, although there were already, by the common law, guardians by nature whose authority over the person of the infant, continued until he arrived at the age of twenty-one years.

Those acts, and especially the act of 1715, having provided for a guardian in every case, except the case of an infant whose father was living, ought to be construed as having virtually declared that the father, as guardian by nature, should have the custody and care of the real and personal estate of the infant, as well as of his person. But the acts did not give the courts authority to require surety from the father, as natural guardian, unless that authority were given by the 20th section of the act of 1715, which enacts, "that the justices of the county courts take able and sufficient security for orphans' estates, and inquire yearly of the security; and if there be just cause, that they require new and better security; and upon refusal to give new and better security, that they remove the orphans' estates out of their hands." This section was not deemed sufficiently explicit to enable the county court to demand security from guardians, chosen by infants of fourteen years; and to remedy this defect, an act was passed in 1752 (chapter 3), expressly for the purpose of enabling the court to require security from such guardians; but that act did not apply to guardians by nature. If the 20th section of the act of 1715, did not, by its general terms, include guardians chosen by infants, it could not include natural guardians nor testamentary guardians. Indeed, if testamentary guardians had not been expressly recognized in the 30th section of the act of 1715, it would be difficult to maintain that the general words, in which the 7th section gives the power of appointment to the county court, would not be justly construed as repealing the statutes of 4 & 5 Phil. & M. c. 8, and 12 Car. II. c. 24, so far as they might have been supposed to operate in Maryland. But it is believed that those statutes have always been considered as in force in Maryland, so far as to authorize a father to appoint, by his will, a guardian for his infant children.

Again, the 7th section of Act 1715, c. 39, by giving power to the court to appoint a guardian for every orphan who is entitled to a distributive share, superseded, in all such cases, the common-law right of guardianship by nature, except in the case of the father; so that neither the mother, nor the grandfather, nor the uncle, could, in such cases, be guardians by nature, in Maryland. From whence it follows, that after the statute of descents (Act 1786, c. 45), and before 1798, in Maryland, there were only three kinds of guardians, viz.: (1) Testamentary guardians under the statute of 4 & 5 Phil. & M. c. 8, and 12 Car. II. c. 24; (2) natural guardians; (3) statutory guardian, viz. guardian appointed by the county court under the statute of 1715, and by the orphans' court under the statute of 1777 (chapter 8). For although the orphan, at the age of fourteen, had a right to choose a guardian, the appointment was still to be made by the court; and although the persons appointed by the court, when the orphan was under the age of fourteen, were called trustees, yet they were, in fact, guardians, and had all the rights, and were subject to all the duties of guardians; they are, indeed, sometimes called guardians in the same act of 1715. The infant, if no guardian had been appointed for him, and if his father were not alive, when he arrived at the age of fourteen, had a right to choose his guardian in court; but if a testamentary guardian had been appointed, or if the court had appointed a guardian for him before his age of fourteen, or if his father were living, he had no right to choose his guardian. If this be the true construction of the law of Maryland previous to 1798, the provisions of the act of that year (chapter 101) will be perfectly intelligible.

The act of 1798 (chapters 101, 12) does not, like the act of 1715, confine the power of the court to the case of orphans entitled to a distributive share of an intestate personal estate, but extends it to all infants to whom lands shall descend, or be devised, or who may be entitled to a legacy, or to a distributive share of the personal estate of an intestate, if the infant have no natural or testamentary guardian. By "natural guardian," in this statute, must be intended such a natural guardian as is entitled to the guardianship of the estate, as well as of the person of the infant. At common law, there was no such natural guardian; the guardian by nature, under that law, being only entitled to the custody of the person of his heir apparent. The previous law of Maryland, recognized only one natural guardian entitled to the guardianship of the estate of the infant; and that was the father. If, then, the infant have no father, nor testamentary guardian, the orphans' court has the right of appointing the guardian. The act of 1798, does not, in any manner, recognize the right of the infant to choose his guardian at any age. On the contrary, the orphans' court is authorized, in all cases in which it may appoint a guardian, to make the appointment until the full age of the infant. This power is directly repugnant to those parts of the former acts of Maryland, which authorize the infant to choose his guardian, and consequently repeals them. Guardianship in socage, and guardianship for nurture, which were the only two cases in which the infant had, by the common law, a right to choose his guardian, seem to have been virtually abolished by Act 1765, c. 39, which gave the power to the county courts to appoint guardians to all orphans entitled to a distributive share. The right of election, which they afterwards had, depended upon the statutes which were repealed by that of 1798 (chapter 101). The case of an orphan who has acquired property by deed of gift, or by purchase other than devise, is not provided for by that statute. There is no court competent to appoint a guardian for him, nor do we think he can constitute one by his own act. Indeed, we think he has not, in any case, a right to choose his guardian. And it was not without reason, that the legislature thought proper to transfer the right of election from the infant to the orphans' court. At the age of fourteen, the infant begins to be restless and ungovernable, and the salutary restraints of the guardian are irksome. The infant is apt to think his guardian penurious and tyrannical. He wants greater indulgences; and there are always artful and insinuating men enough, who are eager to grasp all the property they can lay hold of; and who, taking advantage of these dispositions in the infant, will stimulate his restlessness, excite his suspicions, undermine the authority of the guardian, and finally prevail on the infant, in his simplicity, to place his property in their hands. The chance of evil resulting from the infant's right of election, seems greater than the chance of good; and the choice of the court is more likely to be judicious than that of the infant.

The third error assigned, is that the infant was not brought into court to choose his guardian. This appears to us also to be a fatal error; especially as the infant was not out of the jurisdiction of the court at the time. In the case of Loyd v. Carew, in 1699, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 260, pl. 2, it is said, that "if a person, appointed a guardian pursuant to the statute (12 Car. II. c. 24), dies, or refuses to take upon himself the guardianship, my lord chancellor may appoint a guardian; but a guardian cannot otherwise be appointed, than by bringing the infant into court, or his praying a commission to have a guardian assigned him." 2 Fonbl. Bankr. Cas. bk. 2, pt. 2, c. 2, § 2, p. 236. In an anonymous case, in the upper bench, in 1655: "The court was moved in behalf of an infant to discharge a guardian assigned by the court, with an intent to make Richard Somers, attorney of this court, guardian in his room, and that the former inspection may be discharged, and that the infant may now be inspected again, because when the former inspection was, and the guardian assigned, there was no action depending in court against the infant. Glyn, C. J. Let it be so, for the cause you have alleged, and give notice of it to the former guardian." Style, 456. 1 Newl. Ch. Prac. 105. If the infant reside within twenty miles of London, the guardian is appointed by the court, for which purpose the infant, and the person intended to be appointed guardian, personally attend in court. If the infant reside above twenty miles from London, the guardian is appointed by commission, and the infant must be personally before the commissioners. 14 Ves. 172; 2 Newl. Ch. Prac. 151; 1 Har. Ch. Prac. 711, 712; 2 Mad. Ch. Prac. 279 The Maryland act of 1715 (chapter 39, § 7), which allowed an infant of the age of fourteen to choose his guardian, required the infant to be called to court, and then and there to choose his guardian; and Act 1798, cc. 101, 12, § 2, says, "The said court shall have power to call, or have brought before them, any orphan as aforesaid, for the purpose of appointing a guardian." If, as we have supposed, the only right which the infant had, in Maryland, to choose his guardian, be given by the statute, it must be exercised in the manner prescribed by the statute. We think, therefore, that if the infant had a right to choose his guardian, it could only be done personally, and in open court, and not having been so done, the election and appointment were void.

The fourth error assigned is, that the petitioners were not cited to show cause why they should not be removed. That the petitioners, who were the actual guardians, and who had a right to continue such until the full age of their ward, unless lawfully removed, should have had notice of his application, and an opportunity to show cause against it, seems to have been a course dictated by a common sense of justice. They had a power coupled with an interest, which they had a right, and perhaps, were bound to defend. But, as we think the orphan had no right to elect a guardian, and if he had, he could not exercise it out of court, we think the want of notice is a fatal error. The fifth error assigned is in substance only a repetition of the fourth.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion, that the orphans' court, having appointed Mr. Forrest and Mr. Mauro guardians of the infant until his age of twenty-one years, had no jurisdiction or authority to appoint Mr. Ritchie, and that his appointment is not merely voidable, but absolutely void; that Mr. Forrest and Mr. Mauro have never ceased to be guardians; and are now entitled to all the rights and powers of guardians; and that the sentence of the orphans' court, dismissing the bill of review, be reversed, with costs; and that this court, proceeding to pass such sentence, as the orphans' court ought to have passed upon the hearing of the bill of review, should order and decree that the order of the orphans' court, appointing John T. Ritchie guardian to the infant John W. Ott be reversed, with costs.

An appeal to the supreme court of the United States was dismissed for want of jurisdiction, the matter in dispute not being of the value of $1000. 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 243.

Case No. 9,313.

MAURO v. ST. JOHN'S PARISH.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 116.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1830.

CONTRACTS—CHURCHES—VESTRY—PEW TAXES—OWNER.

Quaere, whether the owner of a pew in the Protestant Episcopal Church in St. John's parish, in the city of Washington, is personally liable for the taxes assessed upon such pew by the vestry of that parish; the owner not being a member of that church?

Appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace for $38.50 for taxes upon a pew in St. John's Church owned by the appellant [Philip Mauro], who was not a member of the Episcopal Church, and who had taken an assignment of the pew in payment of a debt due to him by Mr. W. Lee.

Mr. Wallach, for appellant, denied, 1st. That the vestry was competent to sue; and 2d. That there was no personal obligation upon the appellant to pay; the only remedy being a sale of the pew.

Mr. Coxe, for appellees, cited Act Md. 1798, c. 24, §§ 2, 32, 33; the Proceedings of the State Convention in 1816 and 1824; erecting St. John's Parish; Vestry-Book 17, February 16, 1818, December 7, 1817; as to sale and rent of pews, November 1, 8, 1819; letter to pew-holders, November, 1819, April 26, 1826, March 22, 1819, November 1, 1819.

CRANCH, Chief Judge (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent, and MORSELL, Circuit Judge, doubting). This is an appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace, against the appellant, for $38.50 debt, and fifty-eight cents costs, rendered on the 17th of October, 1829, being the amount of taxes assessed on a pew in St. John's Church, which the appellant received by assignment from William Lee in payment of a debt; the appellant not being a member of that church.

It is contended by the appellant that he is not personally liable for such taxes; but that the only remedy for the non-payment thereof is a sale of the pew according to the terms contained in the certificate of ownership issued by the register of that parish, which is in these words: "I certify that Philip Mauro is the owner of pew numbered 35, of St. John's church in Washington City, valued at $200, subject to such annual tax as is, or shall hereafter, be fixed by the vestry of said church, and to be sold at auction for arrearages of such taxes due six months or upwards after due notice has been given of the time and place of such sale; the said pew to be transferable only on the books of the register of this church, and the delivery of this certificate. In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name and affixed the seal of the said church, this —— day of —— in the year ——. ——, Register." This certificate was issued and received by the appellant on the 25th of November, 1824.

The parish of St. John, although the church had been built in 1816, and the congregation had worshipped there ever since, was not erected until the 18th of June, 1824, and no legitimate vestry was elected until Easter Monday in 1825; so that in November, 1824, there was no vestry of St. John's parish, constituting a body corporate according to the act of assembly of Maryland of November, 1798, c. 24, competent to contract in that name, or in behalf of, or for the benefit of the future vestry. The giving and receiving of the certificate of ownership, therefore, did not constitute a contract binding on the vestry, or upon the appellant; for it was no contract unless both were bound. Whatever, therefore, might have been the construction or effect of that certificate, it conferred no right of action upon the subsequent legitimate vestry. Mr. Mauro, however, although he denied his personal liability before the magistrate, admitted himself to be the owner of the pew. This subsequent assent may, perhaps, give validity to the sale and to the contract, whatever it might be, which is contained in the certificate of sale. But that certificate does not purport to be a personal obligation, or to create any implied personal liability on the part of Mr. Mauro, to pay the taxes which might be fixed by the vestry. It expressly states that the pew is "subject to such annual tax," &c., "and to be sold at auction for arrearages of such taxes."

By the 2d section of the act of 1798, c. 24, the vestry cannot lay any personal tax exceeding $2 a year; and that only upon "a free white male citizen of the state, above twenty-one years of age, resident of the parish," and "who shall have been entered on the books of the said parish," "as a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church," and this tax must be made known and declared in writing within ten days after the election of the vestry. No express power is given to the vestry to tax pews which have been sold, and have become the private property of individuals. By the 31st section it is enacted that nothing therein before contained shall be construed to prevent the vestry from selling or renting the pews of their churches, provided that in so doing they shall not interfere with any existing right or title in any person to any pew or pews; but it gives no power to tax. The power to tax the pews is only given by the contract of sale; and cannot be extended beyond the terms of the contract. The person who purchases a pew, purchases it subject to the incumbrance of the tax liable to be collected by the sale of the pew; but he does not thereby assume any personal liability. The vestry may rent the unsold pews, and the amount of the rent will be determined by the terms of the lease; which may create a personal obligation. The certificate of sale, by providing one mode of collecting the tax, virtually excludes all others. I am, therefore, of opinion, that the vestry have no personal remedy against Mr. Mauro, for the tax on the pew, but may resort to a sale of it according to the terms of the contract.

At a subsequent term the matter was settled by the parties.

MAURY v. MASON.

[1 Hayw. & H. 400.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 3, 1849.

NOTES—ENDORSER—PAYMENT—MISTAKE IN DELIVERY.

Two notes drawn by the same party and for the same amount, one on which the defendant was endorser, were held by the Bank of Washington. Before the note on which the defendant was endorser was due the agent of the defendant paid the amount, but through mistake on the part of the bank the note on which the defendant was not liable was handed to the agent of the defendant instead of the note on which he was liable. Held, that on a suit against the defendant on the note on which he was an endorser, that the payment made was a payment on said note, and the plaintiff can not recover in this action.

At law. Suit against an endorser on a promissory note.

This suit was on the following note: "Washington, Nov. 4th, 1848. Two months after date I promise to pay to the order of Hon. John Y. Mason two hundred dollars for value received. Jno. E. Addison." Endorsed by J. Y. Mason, Seymour R. Bonner, John V. Wright and the plaintiff, Jourdan W. Maury.

The note was protested for non-payment. On the trial of this case the following testimony was read to the jury: The witness being more than 100 miles from Washington, a commission was appointed to take his testimony. His name is John Y. Mason, Jr.; that he is the son of the defendant; that on or about the 21st or 22d of December last he was requested by the defendant to go to the Bank of Washington and take up a promissory note drawn by John E. Addison and endorsed by the defendant; that the defendant gave witness $200 for that purpose; that witness went to the bank and asked at the counter for a note for $200, drawn by John E. Addison and endorsed by John Y. Mason; that the clerk in attendance handed him a note for two hundred dollars drawn by the said Addison. That he paid to him the $200 received by him as above stated, from the defendant, and took the note without looking at the endorsement, and handed it to the defendant on the same day; that subsequently the defendant showed him the note which witness had received at the bank; that he then discovered that it was not the note which he had asked for at the bank, but was one drawn by the said Addison and endorsed by Lewis C. Levin for the same amount.

Christopher Grammer, for plaintiff.

P. Barton Key, for defendant.

After the evidence was in, the following instructions were given by THE COURT:

If the jury believe from the evidence aforesaid that the defendant, on or about the 23d day of December, 1848, sent the sum of $200 to the Bank of Washington to pay the note of J. E. Addison for $200, endorsed by the defendant, and on which the suit is brought; and that the agent of the defendant accordingly went to the said bank and demanded the note aforesaid of which the said bank was then the holder and owner; and that the said agent then and there paid to the said bank the said sum of $200, and the officer of the bank delivered to him, and he received through mistake, another note of said Addison for $200, on which the defendant was not liable or endorser, instead of the note on which the said suit is brought; and that upon discovering the mistake the defendant offered to return the said last mentioned note to said bank, which the said bank refused, then the said payment of $200 was a payment and satisfaction of the note on which this suit is brought, and the plaintiff cannot recover in this action. But if from the evidence aforesaid the jury shall find that when the said agent of defendant demanded the said note as set out in said defendant's prayer he did not describe it in a voice so loud that the officer of the bank to whom the application was made heard or ought to have heard the said description, that there was a note of said Addison for the same amount due on the said 23d December, and the note endorsed by defendant was not due until the 7th of January next, and the agent of the bank understood the said agent of the defendant to apply for the note of said Addison due on the 23d December, and received the money from him, and applied to that note, and gave that note to said agent, and the said agent on the same day delivered the said note to said defendant, and defendant did not offer to return the same until after the 7th of January, 1849, then said payment of $200 is not to be applied by the jury to the note now in suit, and plaintiff is entitled to recover.

Verdict for defendant.

MAURY v. TALMADGE.

[2 McLean, 157.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1840.

CARRIERS—STAGE—PASSENGERS—CONTRACT AS TO NUMBER—CUSTOM—DRIVER—NEGLIGENCE—ACCIDENT—INJURY.

1. A contract, made by stage passengers with the agent of the line as to the number of passengers, can not be proved by a passenger, who, at another part of the route, took his seat, in a suit by him against the proprietor.

2. Being no party to the contract, and, in fact, having no notice of it, it afforded no inducement to him to become a passenger.

3. A general custom, as to the number of passengers conveyed, may be proved, but not the practice established on the route.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

4. The declarations of a driver, whose conduct is not implicated, that the stage was topheavy, and overloaded, not evidence.

[Approved in Franklin Bank v. Stewart, 37 Me. 532.]

5. The words of the agent, to be evidence, to charge the principal, must be a part of the res gestae.

6. Stage proprietors are bound to use the greatest care for the safety of passengers. The least neglect by the driver, or want of skill, makes them liable.

[Cited in Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 589, 22 Pac. 271; Sanderson v. Frazier, 8 Colo. 79, 5 Pac. 632. Approved in Frink v. Potter, 17 Ill. 410. Cited in Taylor v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 48 N. H. 316; Budd v. United Carriage Co. (Or.) 35 Pac. 663; Farish v. Reigle, 11 Grat. 712.]

7. The proprietors are responsible if the coach is driven out of the usual track, and an injury is, consequently, done.

8. It is the duty of a driver to caution the passengers when he is about to pass over a piece of road, bridge, &c., attended with danger.

[This was an action for damages for personal injury by M. T. Maury against Talmadge.]

Messrs. Ewing and Stanbery, for plaintiff.

Messrs. Wright and Hunter, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action was brought to recover damages for the upsetting of the defendant's stage, in 1839, in which the plaintiff, being a passenger, was much injured. The upset was near Somerset, on the route from Chillicothe to Zanesville; and is charged to have been caused by the want of skill, and negligence in the driver, overloading the stage, and want of lights. Plea, not guilty. The plaintiff offered evidence to prove that, at Maysville, in Kentucky, the southern terminus of the route, a special contract was made with the agent of the defendant, by the passengers, that not more than six passengers should be admitted inside the stage, and one on the outside. The plaintiff took his seat at Portsmouth, in a line of the defendant's, which connected with the Maysville and Zanesville line, at Chillicothe. The above evidence was overruled by the court, on the ground, that the plaintiff was not a party to the contract, and could claim no benefit under it. There is no proof that he had any knowledge of the contract; and, of course, it could have formed no inducement with him to travel in the line. He took his seat with no other pledge or guaranty from the proprietor, than that which the law implies.

On the part of the defendant, the driver was examined as a witness, there being no objection to his competency by the plaintiff. The defendant offered evidence to prove that it was the custom on that route to carry as great a number of passengers as were in, and on, the stage. This was objected to by the plaintiff, and the court sustained the objection. The defendant can not give, in evidence, a custom or practice established by himself, in his own justification, or in extenuation of the damages. The practice may be such as the law does not warrant, and, in that case, it should operate against the defendant. A general custom, as to the number of passengers conveyed by a coach of the same size, on other routes, may be proved; but this, in each case, must be regulated by the kind of road over which the stage is to pass. A number of passengers may be conveyed, by what is called a nine-passenger coach, on a level and paved road, with safety, which would be extremely hazardous on a road unpaved, and hilly. In a case of this kind, therefore, there can be no unvarying custom, as to the number of passengers. The number must be regulated by the character of the road; and the ordinary danger of stage travel must not, in any degree, be increased by overloading the stage. The question may be asked of drivers, acquainted with the road, what number of passengers could be safely conveyed by a nine-passenger coach, in the state the road was at the time of the upset. By way of rebutting evidence, the plaintiff offered to prove the declarations of the driver, who preceded the one implicated, that the stage was topheavy, and overloaded. To this evidence the defendant objected, and the court sustained the objection.

In favor of the admission of the evidence, it was insisted, that it was proper to be received, in proof of a fact connected with the cause. That, in the case of Saltonstall v. Stokes, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 181, the circuit court not only permitted the declarations of the driver to be given in evidence, but, also, the declarations of passengers, made in the hearing of the agent, and to him; that, in the case of McKinney v. Neil [Case No. 8,865], at the present term, the declarations of the passengers to the driver, and, also, among themselves, when the coach was about to upset, were proved; that every driver, being an agent of the defendant, and being a competent judge whether the stage was overloaded or not, his declarations on the subject, while driving, are evidence. But the court remarked, that the declarations of an agent are made evidence against his principal only, when they are part of the res gestae. While making the contract, or performing any act in his capacity as agent, he acts in the place of the principal, and what he says respecting the thing then being done, is evidence. But, afterwards, his account of the transaction, though given immediately, is not evidence. Now, if the driver, whose declarations are offered in proof, were the agent of the defendant to load the stage, still, his declarations could not be evidence, as he spoke of a past transaction. He said the stage was topheavy, and overloaded. This referred to the loading of the stage, and not to any act then being done. But the driver was not the agent for this purpose. The agent was the keeper of the stage office at Lancaster, who admitted two additional passengers. What he said, at the time of making up the load, would be evidence against the defendant. In the case of Saltonstall v. Stokes [supra], the declarations of the driver, at the time of the upset, were proved as a part of the res gestae. And the remonstrances of the passengers to the agent, against the driver, were proper, as notice to him that the driver was not in a state to be trusted. This should have led the agent to a strict examination of the condition of the driver, and was evidence, the same as if the remonstrances had been made to the proprietor of the line. Remonstrances of the passengers, to the driver, are also evidence, as going to warn him of danger, which should increase his vigilance. And so, as evidence of a fact, tending to show that the stage was not suddenly upset, the remark of a passenger, that the stage was going over, was proved. If the driver, implicated in this case, at the time of the upset, had assigned, as the cause of it, the overloading of the stage, the declaration would have been so connected with the disaster, and explanatory of it, as to be admissible in evidence; it would have been a part of the res gestae.

The main question in the case, is, whether the stage was overloaded. And, to prove this fact, the declarations of a driver, who is a competent witness, and whose conduct is, in no respect, implicated in the case, are offered in evidence; for this can be the only ground of admitting them. The counsel say, they wish these declarations to be received merely as a fact—not to prove the truth of the fact. But how can they be admitted on this ground? Neither the proprietor of the line, nor the driver, who is charged with negligence and want of skill, was present. The declaration, then, can not operate as notice to any one, so as to have the least bearing in the case. And, if the declarations be admissible, it must be with the view of establishing the fact, that the stage was overloaded. The court, therefore, overrule the evidence.

LEAVITT, District Judge (charging jury). The law relative to the liability of stage proprietors has been so fully expounded in another case submitted to, and passed upon, by this jury at the present term, that it will be unnecessary, on this occasion, to enter at large upon the consideration of that subject. As the present case, however, differs from the one referred to, in the facts connected with it, and the ground on which a recovery is sought for, it may not be amiss to call your attention, very briefly, to some general principles that may serve to guide you in your deliberations. It is a principle which commends itself to the reason and common sense of every man, that he who engages in the business of conveying passengers, by stage-coaches, or otherwise, for a reward, takes upon himself certain legal responsibilities, which the law will recognize and enforce. In the absence of an express contract to that effect, the law implies an undertaking to convey his passengers with safety, so far as human foresight and care can accomplish that object. And, it is well settled that, if an injury happen, which is fairly chargeable to the least negligence or want of skill, or prudence, on the part of the proprietor or his agents, he is answerable for it. Judge Story, in his treatise on Bailments, lays down the law as follows: "If he (the driver) is guilty of any rashness, negligence or misconduct, or is unskillful, or deviates from the acknowledged custom of the road, the proprietors will be responsible for any injuries resulting from his acts. Thus, if the driver drives with reins so loose, that he can not govern his horses, the proprietors of the coach will be answerable. So, if there is danger in a part of the road, or in a particular passage, and he omits to give due warning to the passengers. So, if he takes the wrong side of the road, and an accident happens from want of proper room. So, if by incaution, he comes in collision with another carriage." On the other hand, it is equally well settled, that coach owners do not guaranty the safety of their passengers, at all events, and against all hazards. They are not liable for injuries which result from accident or misfortune, where there has been no negligence or default. Keeping these general principles in view, it will be the duty of the jury to make the application of them to the case now under consideration.

The grounds on which it is insisted the defendant is responsible for the injury, which the plaintiff has suffered, are the overloading of the coach, and the negligence and carelessness of the driver. As it relates to the allegation in the declaration, that the accident happened from the want of lights upon the coach, it is presumed the jury will find no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion, from the evidence, that the moon was shining when the upset happened; and that there was no necessity for lights; and that no negligence is imputable to the defendant, on this ground. In this view of the case, the inquiries of the jury will, in the first place, be directed to the two points indicated, namely, the overloading of the stage, and the carelessness and negligence of the driver.

Without attempting to present, in detail, the evidence of the several witnesses who have testified in the case, it will be sufficient for the court to give a concise view of the material facts, as they are understood to be established. In October last the plaintiff, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, at Chillicothe, in the state of Ohio, took a seat in one of the defendant's coaches, for Wheeling. On its arrival at Lancaster, the coach contained nine passengers. At that place the defendant's agent, contrary to the remonstrances of some of the passengers, consented to take three others; two of whom took their seats with the driver, and the third one, then in a state of intoxication, was placed on the top of the coach. They arrived at the town of Somerset about 12 o'clock at night, which place they left, after changing horses, with the same passengers, namely—nine inside, and three outside, making, with the driver, thirteen persons, and without an unusual quantity of baggage. Owing to an obstruction, occasioned by the construction of a turnpike, on the route of the old road, a new road, for some distance from Somerset, had been completed a few days before, along which the stage had passed several times. For the distance of about one hundred yards, the new road was made along the side of a slope, by digging down the higher portion of the route of the road, and placing the excavated earth on the lower side, so as to produce a level surface. The width of this part of the road was eight or nine feet, and the track, passed over by carriages, was settled, and tolerably firm; but the part next to the descent of the slope, being made of removed earth, recently placed there, was unsettled and soft. In passing over this part of the new road, at a very slow rate, and when it was slightly ascending, the right wheels of the coach left the beaten track, and, for a distance of twenty-five feet, departed gradually from the track, until they were from two to four feet away from it; the right wheels, in the mean time, sinking deeper and deeper in the soft earth, till the coach upset. Two witnesses stated that the driver, at the time the wheels left the track, was attending to a conversation going on between some of the passengers. One witness testified, that he thought the driver made an effort to turn the horses on to the track, when he discovered the coach had left it. It appeared that it was perfectly in the power of the driver to have stopped the coach, and to have given the passengers an opportunity to get out, after leaving the track, and before the upset. It was also proved, that the driver said, shortly after leaving Somerset, that the coach was too heavily laden; and, as a witness at the stand, he stated that he considered the load dangerous for that part of the road. The plaintiff, in conversation with Dr. Stone, after the accident, said he did not blame the driver; but that the agent was censurable, for overloading the coach. It was conceded, that the general character and habits of the driver were good, and that he was a man of experience and skill in his calling.

At the time of the upset, the plaintiff was sitting with the driver, and at his right hand side. The plaintiff was thrown several feet from the stage. The physicians who saw, and attended him at Somerset, testified that one of his knees was dislocated, upward and downward; the ligaments of the kneepan torn asunder, leaving the kneepan an inch out of its natural position; and, also, that there was a longitudinal fracture of the thigh bone. Two eminent surgeons of Philadelphia, who examined the plaintiff's knee some months after the accident, testified that, in addition to the injuries above stated, there was a vertical fracture of the patella, or kneepan. They also state that the joint is greatly deformed, and the injury so great and permanent in its character, as to disable the plaintiff, for life, from the performance of his duties as a lieutenant in the navy. He was, previously to the accident, possessed of a robust constitution, and enjoyed excellent health. He was detained at Somerset 70 days, in the hands of surgeons, confined generally to his room, and suffering a good deal of pain. At the expiration of that period, he was able to move about, with the aid of crutches, and set off, by private conveyance, for his residence in Eastern Virginia. The expenses of plaintiff, during his detention at Somerset, for medical attendance, boarding, nurses, &c., amounted to about $250.

On this state of facts in relation to the upset, it is insisted by the plaintiff's counsel, that the disaster is attributable to the excessive weight upon, and especially the top-heaviness, of the coach; or, if not fairly chargeable to this cause, it is to be imputed to the carelessness and negligence of the driver, or to a combination of both these causes; and that, in either case, the defendant is responsible for the consequences. Whether the coach was, in fact, overloaded, must be decided by the jury from the evidence, and with reference to the particular circumstances connected with the case. It is impossible to lay down any general rule, by which the inquiry, whether a coach is excessively laden, can be satisfactorily tested. The character and condition of the road, over which a vehicle is to pass, will be the main consideration in such an inquiry. It will be obvious to the jury that, upon a properly graded and well-finished turnpike, there will be no great danger of the upsetting of a carriage, from any weight that may be put on it; while upon one of the common roads of the country, especially over a hilly region, there might be very great danger in conveying a weight, which, under other circumstances, could not be regarded as excessive. It will, therefore, be the duty of the jury, in coming to a conclusion on this point, to take into consideration the number of passengers, the weight of baggage, the general character of the road along which the defendant's stages run, and, especially, the portion of it over which the coach was passing, when this accident occurred. And, if the jury believe it can be fairly referred to the improper loading of the coach, there can be no question but what the defendant is legally answerable for the consequences. It is clearly the duty of a stage proprietor to see that the safety of his passengers is not put at hazard by an excessive load; and, if he disregards or violates his duty in this respect, he is liable for any injury that may follow. Nor can it be regarded as a legal excuse for such misconduct, that loads of the same, or even greater weight, have been previously transported, with safety, upon the same road.

As to the other position taken by the counsel for the plaintiff, namely, that there is proof of carelessness and inattention on the part of the driver, in this particular case, and that this may be regarded as the cause of the overturn, it is only necessary to remark that, if the jury believe this point to be established by the proof, then, on the principles already laid down by the court, they will be justified in returning a verdict for the plaintiff. On this point, it is insisted that the driver, without any necessity or excuse for so doing, permitted the coach, while proceeding at a slow rate, and upon ground slightly ascending, to depart from the track, till the right wheels sunk so deep into the earth as to cause the upset. The jury will observe, that the law holds a driver to the observance of the strictest care, and the most unremitting vigilance. And, however unexceptionable may be his general character as a driver, if, in a particular instance, he is guilty of carelessness or negligence, whereby an injury occurs to a passenger, his employer, whose agent he is, is accountable.

If, therefore, the jury should come to the conclusion, after a deliberate examination of the testimony, that the coach, owing to the excessive weight put upon it, was unmanageable, in the circumstances in which it was placed, by any power or skill which could be applied or used by the driver, and was, therefore, upset; or, if they should believe that the driver, even from a temporary inattention or neglect, permitted the coach to get into a predicament, from which an upset was the inevitable result; or, if they believe that the disaster, in the present case, is referable to these two causes combined, they will find for the plaintiff. If, on the other hand, from an attentive consideration of the facts of the case, as exhibited by the evidence, the jury should be of the opinion that the accident, in question, is not imputable to any impropriety of conduct on the part of the defendant's agent, in loading the stage, or to any negligence or carelessness on the part of the driver, but was, as contended for by the defendant's counsel, the result of mere accident or misfortune, which no human foresight, care or attention could have prevented, the defendant can not be held legally answerable.

On the subject of damages, it is only necessary to remark that, if the jury should come to the conclusion that the plaintiff has made out his case, in accordance with the principles indicated by the court, it will be competent for them to return a verdict for any amount they may think just, within the limit of the sum laid in the declaration. In the assessment of damages, the jury is not restricted to the actual expenditures of the plaintiff, in consequence of the injury received, and compensation for the loss of time; but may properly take into consideration the nature and extent of the injury, and its probable bearing and effect upon his prospects in life, in reference to the profession which he has adopted. The subject of damages, however, belongs so exclusively to the jury, that it would not be proper for the court to enlarge upon it. The case is committed to the jury, with the fullest confidence that they will give it the most mature consideration, and return such a verdict as will acquit themselves, satisfactorily to their own consciences, of the solemn responsibility resting upon them.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $2,325.

HARDING v. The MAVERICK.

[1 Spr. 23; [1] 5 Law Rep. 106].

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March Term, 1842.

FERRY—LICENSE TO KEEP—ASSIGNMENT — COLLISION—UNLAWFUL USE OF WATERS—USAGE.

1. A license to keep a ferry, under the statutes of Massachusetts, is not assignable.

[Cited in The Leopard, Case No. 8,264.]

2. The charter of the Eastern Railroad Corporation does not authorize the company to maintain a ferry between Boston and East Boston, and take toll for travel and purposes not connected with their road.

3. A steamer used as a ferry-boat, and in the act of transporting passengers in the harbor of Boston in violation of law, came, by accident, in collision with a vessel which was in the lawful use of the waters of the harbor: Held, that the steamer was liable for the damage done by such collision.

[Cited in The Morning Star, Case No. 9,817; Todd v. The Tulchen, 2 Fed. 603.]

4. A usage for vessels to let go their warps, upon the approach of the steamer, must be presumed to be founded on the supposition that the steamer was in the rightful use of the waters of the harbor. A usage which would require those who are in the legal use of the waters as a highway, to yield to others who are using them for an unlawful purpose, will not be upheld.

[5. Cited in The Willard Saulsbury, Case No. 17,681, to the point that this court has jurisdiction of an action in rem brought by a person injured on board a vessel against the vessel causing the collision.]

This was a libel for a tort. The Maverick, a steamboat, was plying as a ferry-boat between one part of Boston, and another part called East Boston. The brig Southern, of which the libellant was mate, had run a warp across the usual track of the steamer, and near the head of the dock. In her passage, the steamer ran against the warp, and, by means thereof, broke the leg of the libellant, and inflicted other injuries. The claimants [Fettyplace and Lamson] produced in evidence a license to keep a ferry, granted by the proper authorities, in the year 1832, to William H. Sumner, Stephen White, and Francis J. Oliver, and several instruments by which the said Sumner, White and Oliver, subsequently conveyed to the claimants all the steamboats and other boats and vessels used in said ferry, including the Maverick by name, and also all the rights and privileges which had been granted to the said Sumner, White and Oliver, by the said license, and constituted the claimants their attorneys irrevocable, with power of substitution, to keep and maintain said ferry, and to do all other acts, matters and things, which said attorneys, their successors, representatives or assigns, should deem needful or expedient for the support and management of the ferry, and to receive the tolls to their own use.

B. R. Curtis, for libellant.
S. Bartlett, for respondents.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. It is contended, in the first place, that the claimants had no right to keep a ferry, and that the Maverick was used for that purpose in violation of law. The instruments which have been put in evidence, constitute an assignment of the ferry, and divested the licentiates of all power and control over it. They go beyond the case of Gerrish v. Sweetser, 4 Pick. 374, in which it is said, that an irrevocable power to receive a sum of money, to the attorney's own use, is prima facie an assignment. Here is an express conveyance, to which the power of attorney is only auxiliary.

[They have produced a license granted by the proper authorities in the year 1832, to William H. Sumner, Stephen White, and Francis J. Oliver, and an instrument bearing date the 9th of December, 1839, by which the said Sumner, White, and Oliver, conveyed to the claimants, and one John Binney, who is since deceased, all the steamboats and other boats and vessels used in said ferry, including the Maverick by name, and also all tolls, ferriage and profits and income which had been received or which should thereafter be received from the ferry, and all profits and advantages whatever, which could or should be derived therefrom. All which the claimants and said Binney, and their executors, administrators, and assigns, were to hold as trustees for a certain voluntary association, called the East Boston Company. By the same instrument, the said Sumner, White and Oliver constituted the claimants and said Binney and their successors in said trusts, representatives, and assigns, their attorneys irrevocable to keep and maintain said ferry, and to do all other acts, matters, and things, which said attorneys, their successors, representatives, or assigns, should deem needful or expedient for the support and prudent management of the ferry; and also to establish, regulate, and change the rates of toll or ferriage, and to demand and receive said tolls and ferriage, and dispose thereof, and also full power to substitute any agent or agents under said attorneys, and their powers at pleasure to revoke. And said Sumner, White, and Oliver covenanted that they would not "in any manner obstruct, hinder, defeat, or interfere with the claimants and said Binney, their successors, representatives, or assigns, or any of them, in the conducting and management of said ferry." The same instrument also contained a covenant for further assurance and a declaration by said Sumner, White, and Oliver, of their "free consent for the city of Boston, or the government, to revoke the license granted to them, and to grant the same to said claimants and Binney, in their said capacity of trustees, or their successors or representatives in said trusts," &c. The claimants also gave in evidence another instrument bearing date the same 9th of December, 1839, by which they and said Binney covenanted with said Sumner, White, and Oliver, and others, members of said East Boston Company, to hold the said property and the ferry as trustees, and subject to the control of said association. They also produced another instrument, bearing date the 19th of December, 1836, being an indenture of three parts, between the said trustees, said East Boston Company, and the Eastern Railroad Company; by which the latter is substituted in the place of East Boston Company, so far as relates to the ferry and the property connected therewith. These instruments constitute an assignment of the ferry, and divested the licentiates of all power and control of it. They go beyond the case cited from 4 Pick. 374, in which it is said that an irrevocable power to receive a sum of money to the attorney's own use is prima facie an assignment. Here is an express conveyance, to which the power of attorney is only auxiliary.] [2]

Was this ferry assignable? This question must be answered by referring to the Massachusetts statute of 1796, c. 42, to which it owed its existence. The first section provides, "that no person or persons whatever shall keep a ferry in this commonwealth, so as to demand or receive pay, without a special license first had and obtained from the court of general sessions of the peace of the county wherein such ferry may be; and the said court is hereby empowered to grant such licenses to such person or persons, as shall be judged suitable for such service, by the same court." By the third section it is enacted, "that if any person or persons shall keep a ferry, or transport passengers over or across any stated ferry, so as to demand or receive pay, having no right or authority so to do, he shall forfeit and pay for every such offence, four dollars." The Revised Statutes which went into operation in 1836, have substantially re-enacted the same provisions. Chapter 26, §§ 1–6.

At the time of the passing of the statute, ferries constituted indispensable links in the chain of communication between different parts of the commonwealth; and so important was it deemed to secure fit persons as ferrymen, that it was provided by law, that no one should keep a ferry unless previously judged suitable, and specially licensed therefor by an established tribunal. It was a personal trust, to be reposed in those only whose qualifications had previously been considered and approved by the court, and is no more transferable than the office of a guardian, or the power of a master over his apprentice. If the licentiate can, by means of an assignment, appoint his successor, then a person becomes a ferryman, whom the court have never licensed, and of whose fitness they have had no opportunity to judge. It is not necessary to decide how far the person appointed must devote his personal attention to the management of the ferry; it is sufficient to say, that he must at least have a control over it, and that those who are engaged in its management must be not merely in name, but really, his agents or servants.

It has been contended, that this ferry was, in truth, kept by the Eastern Railroad Company, and that they are authorized to maintain it by the first section of their charter. Its language is as follows: "And said corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to locate, construct, and finally complete a railroad from the city of Boston to the boundary line between the commonwealth of Massachusetts and the state of New Hampshire; on or near the line next hereinafter described, beginning at or near the land or wharf of the Lewis Wharf Company; thence by steamboats, or other boats, over and across the ferry, to East Boston, so called; thence," &c., locating the road to the boundary of the commonwealth. This is merely descriptive of the line of the road. It was to run from a point at or near Lewis' wharf, over and across the ferry to East Boston. The ferry is mentioned only to designate the route over which the corporation were to pass by steamboats, or other boats, for the purposes of a railroad. It certainly is not to be understood that this railroad corporation was authorized to establish and maintain a ferry and take toll for all travel, and for purposes in nowise connected with their road. The route of the road passes over the Merrimack river, and across the site of a bridge. Could the corporation, there, establish a general toll bridge, independent of the railroad? But further, this charter was granted on the 14th of April, 1836. The ferry had been established, and Sumner, White and Oliver appointed ferrymen, in 1832. The second section of the charter declares, that "nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm, interrupt or impair, the existing rights of any corporation, person or persons, owning or interested in any ferry already established or licensed." This removes all pretence for saying, that the pre-existing ferry was intended to be merged in the railroad. It is preserved distinct and independent, and in nowise to be interrupted or impaired.

I am constrained, therefore, to say, that neither under the license to Sumner, White and Oliver, nor under the charter of the Eastern Railroad, do the claimants derive any legal right to maintain this ferry; and that in doing so they are contravening the express provisions of the statute.

But it is contended that the injury to the libellant arose from the misconduct or negligence of those on board the brig, and this on several grounds.

[In the first place, it is said, that the hawser was run for the purpose of obstructing the ferry-boat. In support of this, the claimants rely upon the previous occurrences in the morning, and upon the testimony of Keen, Douglas, Jolliffe, and Porter; and to repel it, the libellants refer to the testimony of Eldridge, Rider, Green, and Stetson. I do not propose to detail the very voluminous and contradictory evidence in relation to this and other matters of fact, which have been in contestation. To do so would answer no purpose, except perhaps to satisfy the counsel that the court had taken into view all the evidence upon which they relied. The brig lay at Lewis's wharf; there was a bona fide intention to remove her to the northward, for the purpose of taking her to Pratt & Cushing's ways. To carry this into effect, the captain gave orders to take the hawser out of coil and run it to the wharf south of the ferry-way, preparatory to removing the vessel. Considering the improbability that the captain would designedly bring a valuable vessel, of which he was part owner, with a cargo on board, and without cables and anchors, in collision with a steamboat, that all those engaged in this service, with the exception of Jolliffe, had given testimony going to negative such a design, and that the running the hawser may well be attributed to another and a legitimate purpose, and that the hawser was slacked up immediately on the approach of the boat, I am of opinion that this allegation of an attempt purposely to obstruct the steamboat, is not maintained. It is further contended, that, as the brig had no cables and anchors, it was negligence to attempt to remove her without having a stern line, so as to be prepared to let go the warps at the bow on the approach of the steamer. Whether such a line ought to have been previously run, is a question which nautical men, or those practically acquainted with moving vessels in harbors, are most competent to decide. Many such have given their depositions in this case, and their opinions have been extracted on various points. But to no one of them has this question been propounded. The mate, who made these arrangements, is proved to have been experienced and skilful in his profession. He had a warp and a hawser ahead. I cannot undertake to say that it was a want of ordinary care not also to have had a stern line. It is further contended, that there was want of due care in several particulars: 1st, in making fast the hawser to the windlass bitts, so as not to be cast off readily. 2d, in not hailing the steamer earlier, in order to give notice not to approach. 3d, in not having slacked up the warp and hawser earlier. 4th, that the warp was full of kinks, and should not, therefore, have been permitted to run out through the chocks, as it was liable thereby to bring her up. But whatever kinks there may have been, they did not catch in the chock, and in no way contributed to the disaster. As to making fast the hawser to the windlass bitts, no witness testifies that this was improper, or that there was any better manner of securing it. I do not see how an earlier hail from on board of the brig could have been of any utility. The wind was strong from a northeast direction, and, with the noise of the paddles and machinery, must have prevented any hail being heard by those on board the boat until after they must have seen the hawser and warp. They knew that a prior attempt had been made to haul the brig, and it is in proof, that they were on the look-out, and saw the warp, and hailed the brig to have it slackened. A main ground of the defence is, that such were the wind, currents and obstructions, that it was impossible for the boat, after she passed the ship, to stop or retreat, or to have taken any other course than directly across the wharf. No hail could possibly have been heard by the steamer before she passed the ship; how then could it have been of any utility? With regard to the objection that the warp and hawser ought to have been slackened earlier, although there is a conflict of testimony as to the time when this was done, or how soon after the first hail from the boat, there is no doubt that they were slackened some time before the boat came up to them. The damage was occasioned by the boat's taking the warp, which, being a new manilla rope, did not sink. If it had been cast off at the instant of the first hail, or at any time after those on board the brig had reason to apprehend that the boat would cross it, it would still have floated upon the surface and obstructed the boat. But there is another and broader answer to this objection, which reaches also to the allegation of negligence in not having a stern line, so as to be prepared to let go the warp, and in making fast the hawser to the windlass bitts.][2]

These complaints of negligence all rest upon the assumption that it was the duty of the brig to let go her warps on the approach of the steamer. There is much conflicting testimony, as to the usage in such cases, but I think the preponderance is in favor of the ferry boats; and that it is proved to have been the general practice for other vessels to yield to them, on their approach, and to slacken their warps to permit them to pass. I am not so well satisfied that the same usage prevails with respect to the approach of sailing vessels.

Without pausing to inquire how far a special usage, as to this ferry, ought to be brought home to the knowledge of those on board the brig, in order to be binding upon them, it is sufficient to say, that it must have been founded upon the supposition that this ferry was legally maintained, and that these boats were in the rightful use of the waters, for that purpose. But we have seen that this was not the fact, and any usage founded upon it must therefore fall. Indeed, the law would not uphold a usage, by which those who were in the legal use of these waters as a highway, should be bound to yield to others who were in the act of using it for an unlawful purpose.

It is further insisted that the libellant was negligent of his own personal safety. On the approach of the steamer, he let go his fasts which crossed her track, and ran aft for the purpose of having a stern line made fast to the steamer North America, and while doing this, his leg was caught in the warp, as it was running out, and he received the injury complained of. It is said that the warp was lying near to the libellant; that he was warned of his danger, and that he was unnecessarily taking another turn of the rope which led to the North America, around the cleat where it was fastened on board the brig. It is not denied that the line to the North America was necessary. The warp and the hawser had both been let go. There was nothing then to hold her, and she was without cables and anchors. There was no time for deliberation; the line must be made fast, and done instantly. The evidence of his being warned is, that one of the witnesses called out to him that he had better take care of his legs, as the steamer was going to take the lines; that he got tangled in the coil, and then jumped clear of it, and soon afterwards, while making fast the rope, he got caught again. It does not appear in what manner he could have avoided the danger; he was not at liberty to leave the place, and was performing an indispensable duty, which demanded his attention at the instant. To obviate the pressure of this fact, it is indeed said, that the rope had been already sufficiently made fast, and that the turn he was then taking was unnecessary. That rests entirely upon the opinion of Jolliffe; who says, that he thinks she was sufficiently fast before; but the libellant thought otherwise, and from the testimony in the cause, his experience and skill would entitle his judgment to a preference over that of Jolliffe. He was in command of the brig; upon him rested the responsibility of her safety; this was the only line by which she was to be held, and it would be harsh and presumptuous to condemn him upon the critical suggestion, that the last turn of the rope was unnecessary, and this, too, merely upon the opinion of a witness who was less skilled and who felt no such responsibility.

What then is the posture of this case? The brig Southern being in the legitimate use of these waters as a highway, for a lawful purpose and in a proper manner, comes in collision with the steamer Maverick, which, at the time, is using them in transporting passengers, as a ferry boat, in direct violation of law. Supposing the collision to have been accidental, which shall bear the loss occasioned thereby? Authorities upon this point have been cited at the bar. In the cases of Leame v. Bray, 3 East, 593, and Bullock v. Babcock, 3 Wend. 391, which were actions of trespass, the lawfulness of the purpose is adverted to as a material circumstance. In the former, Lord Ellenborough, alluding to another case, says: "Where one shooting at butts for a trial of skill, with the bow and arrow, the weapon then in use, in itself a lawful act, and no unlawful purpose in view, yet having accidentally wounded a man, it was holden to be a trespass. * * * Such, also, was the case of Weaver v. Ward, Hob. 134, where a like unfortunate accident happened, whilst persons were lawfully exercising themselves in arms." In Hammond's note (d) to Comyn's Digest, "Battery," A, it is said: "In order to render a trespass excusable, not alone must the act itself have been inevitable, the party must be altogether blameless with regard to the circumstances which led to it; for if the defendant has wrongfully placed himself in a situation whereby he becomes the instrument of mischief to another, he cannot excuse himself by saying that the accident happened without the possibility of his preventing it at the time." Davis v. Saunders, 2 Chit. 639, was a case of collision. The plaintiff's sloop had made fast to a raft of brandy which had been sunk by smugglers, and was endeavoring to secure it. The defendant's sloop came up and attempted to obtain the brandy, and the two sloops, by the force of the sea, were thrown against each other. The case turned on the question, whether the defendants were doing a lawful act; and the court decided in their favor, solely on the ground that their "original act was not unlawful." It was formerly contended, that, if a person injure another by violence, he is responsible in damages although it was accidental. But, it is now settled, that he is not liable for a mere accident, although accompanied by force, provided he is not engaged in an unlawful act. This limitation upon the immunity for accidents is frequently mentioned in the books, and I am not aware that it is anywhere denied.

It is insisted by the counsel for the claimants, that if these principles are anywhere recognized by the law, it is only when the act done is contra bonos mores, or an offence at common law; and that a violation of a statute provision secured by penalties, is not within the alleged principle.

In the case cited by him, of Atkinson v. Abbott, 11 East, 135, Lord Ellenborough remarks, that the statute of Charles II., by which a penalty is imposed for taking out a false clearance, does not make the voyage illegal. But our statute does make the voyage, if it may be so called, illegal. It prohibits the keeping a ferry, or transporting passengers over any stated ferry. Every trip, therefore, was a violation of the statute. The cases of Rex v. Dickenson, 1 Saund. 135; Anonymous, 3 Salk. 25; Rex v. Buck, 2 Strange, 679, merely go to establish the well known doctrine, that where an act allowed by the common law is prohibited by statute, and the mode of prosecution is prescribed by the statute, that mode must be pursued, and not the common law method by indictment. But the case now before the court is not a prosecution against the claimants for keeping a ferry, but a suit for running forcibly against a warp, by which the libellant was injured. The respondents, to justify this act of force, say, in substance, that they were duly licensed to keep a ferry, and were running the Maverick as a ferry boat, as they lawfully might. The reply is, that they were not licensed to keep a ferry, and in doing so were violating the law; and, therefore, are not entitled to the immunity which they claim. The libellant rests on the principle that if one, while doing an unlawful act, comes in contact or competition with another, who is pursuing his lawful occupations, the law gives a preference to the latter, and inclines the balance against the former.

The ground assumed by the respondents is, that the only inconvenience to which the party who violates a statute is subjected is the penalty which it prescribes. But I apprehend that this is not well founded. There are disabilities or liabilities to which the law subjects him, as consequent upon his unlawful act, wholly distinct from the penalties of the statute. Thus, in Wheeler v. Russell, 17 Mass. 278, the plaintiff had sold and delivered to the defendant a quantity of shingles, and taken his note for the price agreed. The action was upon the note. The defence was, that the plaintiff in selling the shingles, had violated a statute. The court sustained the defence, and refused to enforce the note, although the price agreed was no more than the fair value of the property which the plaintiff had parted with. In that case the authorities were collected with great diligence and ably and elaborately examined at the bar. The chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "No principle of law is better settled than that no action will lie upon a contract made in violation of a statute, or of a principle of the common law," thus in terms rejecting the distinction now set up. In Moody v. Ward, 13 Mass. 299, the defendant, a colonel in the militia, had mustered his regiment in the highway. After he had dismissed the regiment and retired from the field, the plaintiff's horse in passing along the highway, was frightened by the firing of the soldiers, who were remaining there, ran against a shaft and was killed. It was contended, in behalf of the plaintiff, that the defendant was liable, because mustering his regiment in the highway was prohibited by statute. The court said, that it did not appear that the defendant was to blame, unless the mustering there was unlawful, and as that point was not made out, they therefore decided in favor of the defendant.

The distinction contended for does not seem to be established, at least in civil cases, by authority; and I see no ground on principle for introducing it. The common law is said to be founded upon immemorial customs, which are supposed to embrace acts of the legislature, the records of which have been lost by lapse of time. But why should these be more efficacious in any respect, or their inviolability be more sedulously guarded by consequential liabilities, than acts of the legislature, the records of which are preserved?

The view which I have taken of the case renders it unnecessary to consider whether there was any negligence in the manner in which the steamer was conducted, or not. As the libellant was engaged in a lawful occupation, and the Maverick, when she ran against his warp, was running as a ferry boat, and in the act of transporting passengers, in violation of law, I am of opinion that she must be responsible, even for accidental damages occasioned thereby.

Decree for the libellant for $1400 damages and costs.

BANKRUPTCY—PRACTICE—OBJECTING TO DISCHARGE.

Where an opposing creditor, deeming that it appeared, from the examination of the bankrupt, that he was not entitled to his discharge, desired the opinion of the judge on the point, on a certificate of the register: held, that the question was not one on which the opinion of the court, under section six of the act, could be taken, at that stage of the case.

[2] [The above named bankrupt [George S. Mawson] filed his petition herein on the 11th day of July, 1867, and a warrant in bankruptcy was issued out of this court and a meeting of the creditors of said bankrupt was ordered for the 19th day of August, 1867, on which day the firm of Arnold, Neusbaum & Nordlinger of Philadelphia, creditors, proved their claim and appeared by their solicitor to oppose the discharge of said bankrupt. Their solicitor afterwards obtained an order for the examination of said bankrupt. Before the return of said order, or the examination of said bankrupt, said Arnold, Neusbaum & Nordlinger withdrew their opposition. Other creditors proved their claims; one of them, Felix L. Bauer, obtained an order from the register for the examination of the bankrupt, and the said bankrupt was sworn and examined before the register on the 23d day of January, 1868.

[Upon said examination the bankrupt testified as follows: "Question by solicitor of opposing creditors: How much do you owe the firm of Arnold, Neusbaum & Nordlinger of Philadelphia? Answer by the bankrupt: I owe Arnold, Neusbaum & Nordlinger of Philadelphia about $2,326.18. Q. Have you called upon that firm, or sent any person to them with reference to their withdrawing their objection to your discharge since your petition was filed? If so, state what you promised them, if anything. A. Yes; I have seen them in consequence of having heard that Mr. Solis, the opposing creditor, had misrepresented the facts of my case to them. I called upon them to disabuse their minds that I was no partner in the house of George King, but was there merely on salary; I made them no promise, directly or indirectly, nor any one for me. Q. Did they not agree to withdraw their opposition if you would pay the expenses they had incurred in your bankruptcy proceeding? A. They stated that they had been to some trifling expense in the matter, and they supposed I would pay that. I said I would have no objections to pay that expense. Q. To whom did you pay that sum? and how much was it? A. To Mr. Jacobs of this city; it was twenty dollars. Q. And they have withdrawn their opposition? A. They had withdrawn it before I paid the money."

[The said Felix L. Bauer, one of the opposing creditors, now claims that the said bankrupt should not be discharged, for the reason that he has in violation of section 29 of the "act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," [14 Stat. 531], &c., procured the assent of said creditors, Arnold, Neusbaum & Nordlinger, to his discharge, and has influenced the action of said creditors pending these proceedings by a pecuniary consideration or obligation, and said opposing creditor desires the opinion of the district judge upon the question above stated.

By the Register:

[2] [I, John Fitch, the register in the above entitled cause, do certify to the court:

[First. That this is one of the cases provided for in section 6 of the bankrupt act, and that at this stage of the proceedings the creditors had a right to ask the opinion of the district judge as to the matter raised by the testimony of George S. Mawson, the petitioner, as to the effect of the payment of $20 to Mr. Jacobs of New York, for Arnold, Neusbaum & Nordlinger of Philadelphia, as set forth in the said testimony.

[Second. That by the 29th section of the bankrupt act, "or if he or any person in his behalf, has procured the assent of any creditor to the discharge, or influenced the action of any creditor at any stage of the proceedings by any pecuniary consideration or obligation, then no discharge shall be granted."

[Third. The claim of the creditors as proven, namely, Arnold, Neusbaum & Nordlinger, was, as stated by the petitioner, about $2,326.18. The sum paid to Mr. Jacobs was $20, which was the amount of expenses they had incurred in the matter. The sum paid was small; yet small as it was, it may have caused them to cease opposing, or rather they did not oppose the discharge of the bankrupt on the 24th day of January, 1868, the day the order to show cause was returnable; the hearing was adjourned to the 31st of January, 1868.

[Fourth. I feel compelled to certify that from the petitioner's testimony, the action of the creditors was influenced in some degree by the payment of the $20 to Jacobs, and small as it was, it may bring this case within the 29th section of the bankrupt act, although Mr. Jacobs is a lawyer, and it was probably his legal charge that was paid, and none of the $20 ever went to the hands of the creditors, and was not a payment of any part of the creditor's claim.

[Fifth. Upon a thorough examination of the testimony and the law applicable thereunto, I cannot say that the $20 so paid to Mr. Jacobs was any part of it paid to the creditors, and certify to the court, that upon a fair and just construction of the act, I do not think the payment of the $20 to the creditors' lawyer should deprive the petitioner of his discharge, which, as the case now stands, he would otherwise be entitled to. I feel that the courts should give a fair, just, and liberal construction to the act, and not rigidly construe its provisions against the bankrupt, as the whole scope of the act is liberal and not oppressive.] [2]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I do not think that the question certified, as to whether the bankrupt is or is not entitled to his discharge, is one on which the opposing creditor is at liberty, at this stage of the case, to take the opinion of the district judge, under section six of the act [Act 1867, 14 Stat. 520]. The question is not one which has arisen or can arise in the course of the proceedings before the register, for the reason that, by section four of the act, the register is forbidden to hear any question as to the allowance of an order of discharge. Nor is it a question which has arisen upon the result of any proceedings before the register, because no such question can arise, upon the result of any such proceedings, until the opposing creditor has filed, under general order No. 24, a specification of the grounds of his opposition to a discharge; and, when that is done, the case is then, ipso facto, removed from before the register and taken into court, under section thirty-one of the act, and general order No. 24, and rule 16 of this court.

BANKRUPTCY — VAGUE SPECIFICATIONS OF OPPOSITION TO DISCHARGE.

1. Specifications of opposition to a bankrupt's discharge were filed, which stated that he had concealed part of his estate, and had not delivered all his property to the assignee, and had made a transfer of part of his property to prevent its coming into the hands of the assignee: Held, that they were too vague, and should have specified the property.

2. A specification stated that the bankrupt had procured the assent of certain named creditors to his discharge, but did not state that such assent was procured by a pecuniary consideration or obligation: Held, that it was insufficient.

3. The same specification stated that the bankrupt had influenced the action of "the said creditors," since the filing of his petition, by a pecuniary consideration and obligation: Held, that it was sufficient.

[In the matter of George S. Mawson, a bankrupt.]

In this case, a creditor filed specifications of objection to the bankrupt's discharge as follows: First. That the bankrupt has concealed part of his estate, and has been guilty of fraud in not delivering to the assignee all of the property belonging to him at the time of the presentation of his petition and inventory. Second. That the bankrupt has procured the assent of Arnold, Nusbaum and Nordlinger, creditors, to his discharge; and that he has influenced the action of the said creditors, since the filing of his petition, by a pecuniary consideration and obligation. Third. That, in contemplation of becoming bankrupt, he has made a transfer or conveyance of part of his property, for the purpose of preventing the same from coming into the hands of the assignee, and of being distributed according to law in satisfaction of his debts.

F. C. Nye, for bankrupt.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The first and third specifications of the grounds of opposition to the discharge are altogether too vague and general. [The first is that the bankrupt has concealed part of his estate, and has been guilty of fraud in not delivering to the assignee all of the property belonging to him at the time of the presentation of his petition and inventory.][2] The first ought to specify, with some particularity at least, what part of his estate he has concealed, and what property he has fraudulently failed to deliver. [The third specification is, that in contemplation of becoming bankrupt he has made a transfer or conveyance of part of his property for the purpose of preventing the same from coming into the hands of the assignee, and of being distributed according to law in satisfaction of his debts.][2] The third specification should state what part of his property he has so transferred.

[The second specification is, that he has procured the assent of Arnold, Nusbaum & Nordlinger, creditors, to his discharge; and that he has influenced the action of the said creditors since the filing of his petition by a pecuniary consideration and obligation.][2]

As to the second specification, a bankrupt is not forbidden, by the twenty-ninth section of the act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 531)], to procure the assent of a creditor to his discharge, nor is he forbidden to influence the action of a creditor. The prohibition is against procuring such assent by any pecuniary consideration or obligation, and against influencing such action by any pecuniary consideration or obligation. The second specification in this case only avers, in regard to procuring the assent of the creditors to the discharge, that the bankrupt procured such assent, and does not aver that he procured it by any pecuniary consideration or obligation. It is, therefore, insufficient in that respect. In regard to influencing the action of the creditors, the specification names the creditors, and states that the influencing took place after the filing of the petition, and was by a pecuniary consideration and obligation. It does not state what the influencing consisted in, but it may, perhaps, fairly be inferred, that the specification means that it consisted in procuring the assent of the creditors named to the discharge. No other influencing can be given in evidence under the specification. The time is, perhaps, sufficiently averred, and, although the amount of the pecuniary consideration or obligation is not stated, I am inclined, on the whole, though with considerable hesitation, to hold the specification sufficient in its averment in regard to influencing the action of the creditors named, in the respect above defined. It borders very much, however, on a fishing specification, as, if the party had any facts within his knowledge or information, it is to be supposed he would have specified them.

[This decision must not be regarded as a precedent except for a case identically like it in all respects. The rule in regard to specifications has been so often heretofore defined by this court that it ought by this time to be well understood.][2]

The case will stand for hearing on so much of the second specification as is so held to be sufficient, and will be heard whenever the parties have taken all the testimony they desire to present on the point. A reference may be had to the register in charge to take testimony on either side.

BANKRUPTCY — PROCURING CREDITORS' ASSENT TO DISCHARGE—AGREEMENT TO PAY COUNSEL FEES—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where creditors opposed the discharge of a bankrupt, on the ground that he had procured the assent of certain creditors to his discharge by a pecuniary obligation, and the evidence showed that he had paid to the counsel for those creditors, their fees, for services rendered in the matter, amounting to $20, but it also appeared that those creditors had announced that they would not oppose the discharge, before anything whatever was said about his paying their counsel fees, and that such payment was not made a condition of their withdrawing further opposition: Held, that the burden of proof was upon the opposing creditors, and the proof did not sustain the specification.

Two creditors opposed the discharge of the bankrupt [George S. Mawson] in this case, on like specifications, which were, in substance, that the bankrupt had influenced the action of Arnold, Nusbaum, and Nordlinger, creditors of his, by procuring their assent to his discharge, since the filing of his petition, by a pecuniary consideration and obligation.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I do not think that the evidence sustains this specification, or that the bankrupt has, either in letter or in spirit, violated any of the provisions of the bankruptcy act, or been guilty of any thing which is made a ground, by the 29th section of the act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 531)], for withholding his discharge. The testimony given by the bankrupt, on the 23d of January, 1868, on his direct examination, unexplained, seemed to support the averment, that he had influenced the action of the creditors named by a pecuniary consideration, by procuring them to agree not to further oppose his discharge, if he would pay their counsel the amount of his charge, already then incurred, for services in the matter, and which amount the bankrupt subsequently paid, it being twenty dollars. But on his cross-examination, on the 13th of March, 1868, the bankrupt explained the whole matter satisfactorily; and his testimony shows, that the announcement by the creditors to him, that they would not oppose his discharge, was made before any thing was said between them and him as to paying their counsel, and at a prior interview, and was not induced by any promise on his part to pay the counsel, and was entirely independent of any such promise, and it does not appear that the suggestion of the creditors to him, at a subsequent interview, that it was right and proper that he should pay their counsel, was coupled with any intimation to him that his agreement to pay the counsel must be a condition of, or a consideration for, or a precedent obligation to, their agreement not to oppose his discharge. It is not pretended that any thing was paid, or agreed to be paid, by the bankrupt, to, or for the benefit of, these creditors, except the twenty dollars. The affirmative is on the opposing creditors to support the allegation of the specification. It was open to them to do so by the testimony of that member of the firm, alleged to have been influenced in its action by the pecuniary consideration, with whom the transaction took place. They have not adduced such testimony, and they have failed to sustain the allegation. I see nothing in the evidence to impeach the honesty and fair dealing of the bankrupt in all respects, and a discharge will be granted to him.

BANKRUPTCY—PROCEEDINGS FOR DISCHARGE—ADJOURNMENT.

Proceedings on the return day of an order to show cause why the discharge should not be granted, can be adjourned by reason of the adjournment of the examination of the bankrupt.

[Cited in Re Seabury, Case No. 12,573.]

[In the matter of George S. Mawson, a bankrupt.]

The above named bankrupt, by Mr. Nye, his counsel, requests the opinion of his honor the district judge, upon the point whether the proceedings, upon the order to show cause why the discharge should not be granted, can be, on the return day of said order, adjourned by reason of the adjournment of the examination of the bankrupt, and also upon the point whether the examination of the bankrupt can be adjourned, beyond the return day of the order to show cause why the discharge should not be granted, without an enlargement of the time for the examination of the bankrupt for cause shown; and the bankrupt states that the petition to be adjudged bankrupt was filed in this matter on the 11th day of July, 1867, the first meeting of creditors was held on the 19th day of August, 1867, and the order to show cause why the discharge should not be granted was returnable December 20th, 1867, and said return day adjourned for the purpose of the examination of the bankrupt by the counsel now applying for another adjournment of said return day, and successively adjourned to the 27th of December, 30th December, 31st December, 4th January, 9th January, and 24th January, and no examinaton was had on the said return days except the 27th December, and 9th of January; and that the counsel for the bankrupt on said 9th of January, tendered him to said opposing counsel for examination continuously until the said 24th day of January, and now again tenders him for examination, but the said counsel declines to examine said bankrupt. And in regard to the certificate, filed by said opposing counsel for the opinion of this court, said bankrupt claims that the question therein stated is not the proper subject matter for a certificate, because the act has provided another particular way for determining whether the bankrupt shall have his discharge or not.

Francis C. Nye, Counsel for Bankrupt.

By JOHN FITCH, Register:

To His Honor Judge Blatchford:

First. The register certifies, that the proceedings upon the order to show cause why the discharge should not be granted, &c., can the same as any other proceedings, be adjourned upon proper reasons shown therefor, and continued by adjournment until the order is either granted or the cause be sent to the district judge, upon the filing of the objections by the creditor as provided for by section 31 of the act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 532)]. Such adjournments are necessitated from the fact that the necessary papers are not often ready for the register to act upon. The examination of the petitioner by a creditor or assignee is the equivalent to the examination of a witness at the circuit, and is, by the effect of the bankrupt law, in the nature of a cross-examination. The same rule should apply to the examination of the bankrupt before the register as at the circuit. The examination should proceed regularly with such adjournments as the circumstances of the case require. The register should use a proper discretion in the case before him, and not allow any unnecessary or unreasonable adjournments.

Second. The register would certify to his honor, the district judge, that the lawyers consult their own convenience as to the time of the examination of the bankrupt, and select their own hours to do it in, when they are not otherwise engaged, and in this way make their cases in bankruptcy subservient to their other cases in the state courts. This practice impedes, delays, and hinders the proper proceedings in causes, and most unnecessarily occupies the time of the register, for which he does not often receive any pay. The register certifies, that the statement as set out in the request of the attorney for the petitioner, does not fairly present this case, for the reasons, that almost all the adjournments were by consent of the parties, for their own convenience, or by the neglect of the respective attorneys to attend to their duties in this cause, owing to their other professional engagements. That the adjournments were almost all had on the examination of the petitioner by a creditor whose claim was barred by the two-third act, as was shown by the examination of the petitioner, and the discharge papers; that another creditor procured an order for the examination of the petitioner, and the adjournment on the day of the order to show cause, &c., was had to give time for the judge to pass upon the certificate of the register, as requested by the attorney for the creditor, which the court has done; the register had the power to grant it.

Third. The court having disposed of the question as certified to the court by the register, on the application of the attorney for the creditor as to his rights at this stage of the cause to set up the question of fraud, no question now arises on question 1st.

[For prior proceedings in this litigation, see Case No. 9,317.]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In answer to the question as certified in this case, I reply:

First. The proceedings upon the order to show cause why the discharge should not be granted, can be, on the return day of said order, adjourned, by reason of the adjournment of the examination of the bankrupt.

Second. The second question certified is not clearly stated, and I am not sure I understand it. The examination of the bankrupt can be adjourned beyond the return day of the order to show cause why the discharge should not be granted. Such adjournment necessarily operates as an enlargement of the time for the examination of the bankrupt. The presumption is that the register will not grant such adjournment except for good cause shown. The clerk will certify this decision to the register, John Fitch, Esq.

PRACTICE AT LAW—CITIZENSHIP—JURISDICTION—MOTION TO DISMISS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—FRAUD ON COURT.

[1. In an action at law it appeared that the parties are citizens of different states, and therefore within the jurisdiction of the court, but by subsequently discovered evidence it was shown that the real plaintiff was a citizen of the same state as defendant. Held, that a motion to dismiss was the proper remedy in order to dispose of the case.]

[2. M., a citizen of Delaware, claiming title under conveyance from W., a citizen of Pennsylvania, brought ejectment against L., a citizen of Pennsylvania, for lands lying in the latter state. It appeared by answer to bill of discovery subsequently filed in equity by L. against M., that M. had paid no consideration to W. for the lands in question, nor had he ever exercised any act of ownership thereover, and that the most he claimed was the bare legal title in trust for W., the equitable owner. Upon this answer as evidence, L. moved in the ejectment case that the action be dismissed for the reason that the real plaintiff for whose benefit the case was brought was a citizen of Pennsylvania, and therefore of the same state as defendant, that the conveyance from W. to M. was for the purpose of enabling W. to maintain the case in the federal court. Held, that the whole proceeding shows itself to be an attempt to defraud the court into acquiring jurisdiction not properly belonging to it, and therefore the case must be dismissed.]

[Disapproved in Briggs v. French, Case No. 1,871. Cited in Smith v. Kernochen, 7 How. (48 U. S.) 216; Richardson v. Mattison, Case No. 11,790; Barney v. Baltimore, 6 Wall. (73 U. S.) 288.]

In equity.

IREDELL, Circuit Justice. A motion was made for a rule to show cause why these ejectments should not be dismissed, upon an allegation that it appeared, by an answer to a bill in equity, for a discovery in this court, brought by the defendants in these ejectments, against the lessor of the plaintiff, that they are in reality the suits of a citizen of this state, (viz. Samuel Wallis) though under the name of a citizen of another state, to whom, it is alleged, conveyances were made without any consideration, for the sole purpose of making him a nominal lessor of the plaintiff in these ejectments. A rule to show cause was granted, and, upon the day appointed, the case was fully heard and argued on both sides, the proceedings in equity on the bill for a discovery having been exhibited to the court and read.

The importance of the present question is evident, because it concerns the constitution and laws of the United States, in a point highly essential to their welfare, to wit, the proper boundaries between the authority of a single state, and that of the United States. This, not only the constitution itself has been anxious to ascertain by precise and particular definitions, but the congress, in carrying into effect that part of the constitution which concerns the judiciary, has been solicitous to preserve with the greatest caution. The strong instance of this is a provision in the judicial act, to the following effect: "That no district or circuit court shall have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note, or other chose in action, in favour of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents, if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange." 1 [Story's Laws] 55, § 11 [1 Stat. 79]. This I adduce as a strong instance to show the solicitude of congress on this subject, for the regulation extends to a bona fide assignment in the instances specified, as well as to one mala fide: but the provision goes to all, more effectually to prevent any practices of deception by means of the latter.

Nothing is more evident than that if this be a controversy between citizens of different states, it is a controversy determinable in this court, and of which, therefore, the court must sustain jurisdiction. On the other hand, if it be not a controversy between citizens of different states, but between citizens of the same state, it not being one of those cases which entitle citizens of the same state to any exercise of jurisdiction by this court, it ought not to be determined here. But if it shall appear, from a consideration of the facts, that this is not a case which the lessor of the plaintiff was entitled to bring into this court, it will still remain to be inquired, whether the remedy pursued on the present occasion is proper.

The first question, therefore, is, whether it sufficiently appears to the court, that this is a controversy subsisting between citizens of different states, so as to authorize a dismission of the suit, in case the remedy be in point of law a proper one? The evidence, upon which the charge is alleged, is an answer to a bill filed in the equity side of this court by the defendants in the ejectments, in order to obtain a discovery by the oath of the lessor of the plaintiff. This is admitted to be competent evidence on a question at law, and therefore (supposing the method of proceeding in other respects proper) I am only to consider, if it affords satisfactory evidence of the facts suggested:

The facts admitted by the answer, in substance, are these: That there were certain applications to the land-office of this state for 64 tracts of land, in the county of Luzerne, containing 27,400 acres; that the applications were made (as the respondent has been informed and believes) by and for the use of Samuel Wallis of the county of Northumberland in this state; that in April, 1784, conveyances were executed to Maxfield the present lessor of the plaintiff, by which the legal title to the lands therein described was conveyed and assigned to Maxfield, as he apprehends and believes; that Maxfield paid no consideration, either pecuniary, or of any other nature, for the lands, and, therefore, he apprehends and believes, that the equitable title is in Samuel Wallis; that Maxfield consented to stand the trustee of the lands, for the use and benefit of Wallis, and left the management, direction, and prosecution, of the business to Wallis, by whose direction Maxfield apprehends and believes, that the caveats mentioned in the complainant's bill were filed, and all subsequent proceedings had. In comparing the facts thus admitted with the bill he was called upon to answer, it is very remarkable, that the last interrogatory was expressed in such particular and pointed terms, that if it had been directly and positively answered, it would have been decisive one way or the other. But it is not so answered, and his own counsel now object, that he did not answer directly to the question, and, therefore, the only remedy was to except to the answer for insufficiency, and compel a better answer.

This objection, I think, may be easily obviated by the following considerations. 1st. If the question had been an improper one, it might have been demurred to. By that not being done, it is confessed that the question was proper, and of course it ought to have been answered. And it is little short of an insult on the court now to tell it, that the lessor of the plaintiff purposely declined answering a question fairly put to him, which he might and ought to have answered, but by his not doing it he now sets the court at defiance. 2d. If for want of a fuller answer, no evidence was before the court, the objection might possibly be of weight. But all the other facts admitted by the answer, are open to all proper inferences, as well such as arise from this wilful and insolent omission, as from any other part of the case. The object was to effect a discovery, whether certain conveyances were actually given for the sole purpose of evading the constitutional limits, as to jurisdiction, prescribed to this court. Such a design could be expected only to be disclosed by direct confession, or a number of concurring circumstances. 3d. It does not appear that he will ever give a better answer. He may chuse to go through all the processes of contempt for not answering sufficiently, as he appears already to have done for not answering at all. He may even submit to perpetual imprisonment. Is the case never to be decided, until he thinks fit to consent it shall be? 4th. The jurisdiction of this court is not prima facie general, but special. A man must assign a good reason for coming here. If the fact is denied, upon which he grounds his right to come here, he must prove it. He, therefore, is the actor in the proof; and, consequently, he has no right, where the point is contested, to throw the onus probandi on the defendant. As this undoubtedly is the general principle, I see no reason to depart from it on the present occasion, when the knowledge of all the circumstances of the case is fully possessed by the lessor of the plaintiff, and he is regularly called upon to disclose them.

For these reasons, I am clearly of opinion, that Maxfield's forbearing to give a fuller answer, is no reason for my not weighing the amount of the answer, which he has thought proper to give; and considering whether it sufficiently establishes the allegations of the defendants in these causes. But it is objected, that Maxfield's answer, though evidence against him, is no evidence against Wallis, who is said to be the cestui que trust, and Maxfield a bare trustee. Answer: Upon the face of these ejectments Wallis's name nowhere appears. Maxfield, therefore, is the only person to be considered here. If a cestui que trust has a right to support an ejectment, but is forced, upon legal principles, to use the name of his trustee, he must take the consequences. This court, as a court of law, cannot punish the trustee for a breach of trust, though in another capacity it may. But if it had been material to have made Wallis a party, a great, if not an insuperable, difficulty has been alleged in doing it. Wallis and the defendants being citizens of the same state, it is very doubtful whether a bill in equity would have lain against Wallis in this court, though it was merely incidental to the suit at law. But, it is clear, that the objection in this case is merely frivolous, because upon the return of the rule to show cause, an ex parte affidavit might be produced. Wallis's affidavit undoubtedly might have been, as well as any others. Why has it not been? No reason has been assigned to show it could not be done, or that he desired, or that his counsel wished, he should do it. Nor has time been solicited for his putting in such an affidavit, though it is so seriously alleged, that it was highly important to him to have had an opportunity of answering this charge.

It is alleged, that Maxfield was a trustee, and as such authorized to come into this court. A trustee for what purpose? There is not the least shadow of evidence, that he was a trustee for any other purpose, than that Wallis should have a colour for suing in this court, in his name. The deed is not even stated to have been delivered. No fair object of the trust is specified. Wallis lived in Pennsylvania; the land lies in Pennsylvania; Maxfield lived in Delaware. What was he to do? It appears, from his own acknowledgment, that he has done nothing hitherto, nor does he state he was to do any thing. But, it is said, a man is not obliged to specify any object of a trust. He may create a trust from mere whim. Admitted. But the law cannot, without absurdity, permit a man to create a trust, for the purpose of defeating a solemn provision of its own. Nothing could be more ridiculous than such a principle. When the constitution has guarded, with the utmost solicitude, against the exercise of a particular authority, so as that, under certain circumstances, one man shall not sue another in a court created under it, can such a court for a moment support a doctrine, that it shall be in the power of such a man, by any contrivance expressly calculated to defeat this object, to render it wholly nugatory? This, indeed, would be to render the laws of our country a farce; to make the constitution a mere shadow; and deservedly to draw upon those entrusted with its execution, an odium which has been industriously, but, I hope, will ever be in vain attempted. But it is said, the system of fictions is not new; and an attempt has been gravely made to induce this court, by flattering expressions, to add to the list of fictions in being, one of its own, in the face of the constitution we are sworn to support, and by every sacred tie bound to maintain inviolate.

It is true, the courts of law in England have countenanced and supported some fictions. Such (for instance) as a fine and recovery, and an ejectment; and, still more exceptionably, fictions to give a jurisdiction, which otherwise could not be maintained. It is sufficient to say of all these, that they originally took place, when very dark notions of law and liberty were entertained; that they are supported now solely on the authority of long usage; and that no court would now dare to set up a new one. No court in America ever yet thought, nor, I hope, ever will, of acquiring jurisdiction by a fiction. And the only fiction ever in general use in America (perhaps with a few exceptions as to fines and recoveries) I believe, has been that of proceeding by ejectment, which is a mere form of action, and so modified as to do no possible injury. It cannot substantially affect any man's right whatever. In order to encourage the court to countenance this scheme, it is said that no injury can arise from this practice, because the decision in this court will be on the same principles, and, it is to be presumed, with an equal regard to justice, in this court, as in a state court. If a serious answer to such an observation is required, it is surely evident, that we are not to assume a voluntary jurisdiction, because, we think, or any others may think, it may be exercised innocently, or even wisely. The court is not to fix the bounds of its own jurisdiction, according to his own discretion. A jurisdiction assumed without authority, would be equally an usurpation, whether exercised wisely, or unwisely. But the fact assumed cannot be admitted to be true. If this court exercise a jurisdiction in such a case, it may do so after all avenues to a state jurisdiction are for ever closed. That is alleged to be the fact in the present instance. There are, also, other differences, such as regard the place of trial, the venue of the jurors, and other circumstances omitted to be mentioned, because this part of the case is too plain to require any formal discussion.

On this occasion, it may be material to consider whether, on the facts now apparent to the court, Maxfield has any title, either in equity, or at law; because, if he has not, it is evident, the title to be contested must be Wallis's, and not his; and, of course, the subject matter to be decided, is a title in question between two citizens of the same state. 1st. As to equity: He has none by his own acknowledgment. He paid no consideration. He is to perform no duty. He only permits his name to be used, for the support of a fraud on the jurisdiction of the court; a purpose which a court of equity would reject with the highest disdain. 2d. As little, in my opinion, can he support any title at law. 1st. Consider this as a mere bargain and sale. A bargain and sale is of no validity, where no money has been paid. Nothing gives a legal title under the act of H. 8. (concerning uses) which was not an equitable one before that statute. At that time no bargainee could have compelled a bargainor to convey, who had received no money. Therefore, since the statute, no use can arise on such a deed, without some money to support it. 2d. Allowing the highest efficacy to this deed under the act of assembly. This can only mean, that what a man can lawfully grant by any form of conveyance, shall be sufficiently granted in this form. Of course, if under any other form of conveyance, owing to technical difficulties, such a purpose could succeed without redress, a deed, professedly a bargain and sale, is not to have its influence extended, merely that an illegal purpose should take effect, under colour of form. The intent of the act certainly was, that the want of form should not defeat the intention of an honest, but unskilful conveyance; but surely not to smooth the path of injustice, by converting a rightful estate into a wrongful one. 3d. But admitting it to be any form of conveyance you please, then I say, that a court of law will not, any more than a court of equity, support a deed formally good, but substantially fraudulent. And whether the fraud be of a moral nature, for the purpose of doing a wilful injustice, or the act be, as the lawyers term it, in fraudem legis (that is, to evade some law) the law will equally interpose, to prevent its own principles from being made mere instruments, to defeat its own purposes.

There is no act in law, within my recollection, which fraud will not vitiate. It will not vitiate a feoffment, which is a very strict conveyance, requiring no consideration, and passes by an actual livery. It will vitiate a fine, though a solemn transaction in a court of justice, and peculiarly favored. It will even deprive a party of the benefit of a judgment deliberately given. Conveyances to defeat creditors (however formally agreeable to law) are held absolutely void, at least as against them. So, also, in the common case of usury, for which so many contrivances have been devised. No contrivance, no colour, no form whatever, can protect any transaction, which really appears to have been usurious, from being declared so. The application of these principles is obvious. If (as I observed before) the deed in question is to be considered as a mere bargain and sale, it is absolutely void for want of legal consideration (which must be money alone) to support it. If it is to be considered as any other kind of conveyance, it having no consideration whatever but an illegal one (that of defeating the constitution and laws of the United States in a most essential point) it is at least void as to that purpose, and, therefore, does not authorize Maxfield to come into this court. I, therefore, conclude with difficulty, that Maxfield has neither a legal, nor an equitable, title to authorize him to come into this court.

The only remaining consideration is, as to the remedy, which, from the first, was the only difficulty I found. I will venture to lay it down as an unquestionable principle, that no grievance can arise in the law, but some remedy may be applied to it. The present grievance, therefore (which, if unredresssed, will, in any case like the present, enable two persons, at their pleasure, to do injustice to a third, and force this court to exercise a jurisdiction never delegated to it) must admit of some remedy. Only three have been suggested, in the present stage of the proceedings. 1st. The method now under consideration. 2d. A plea to the jurisdiction. 3d. An injunction in equity. I will consider the two last first; for, if they are removed out of the way (as I think they must be) it will facilitate our consideration of the first. As to a plea to the jurisdiction. This can be of no avail, unless not only the fact, at the proper time of pleading, be known to the defendant, but that he has disinterested proof of it. This, in a thousand instances, would be impossible; and in no instance can be expected. To insist on this, therefore, as the only method, would leave the constitution, and the law, in almost every instance, open to certain evasion. It consequently cannot be admitted, that this is the only method of redress. With regard to a bill in equity. I will not say, equity ought not to interpose a remedy in any case. But it seems most proper, that a court of law should support its own jurisdiction, on its own principles, and, if proof can be obtained, I conceive it is necessarily incident to every court to take care, that its jurisdiction be not encroached upon, or in other words, that the court be not made either voluntarily, or involuntarily (if it can prevent it) an usurper of jurisdiction not belonging to it. In this case, the aid of equity may be useful (as it has been on the present occasion) in compelling a discovery; but there, I think, its interference ought to stop, unless the power of the law court over the action has entirely ceased; as for instance, after a judgment, in which case (but in which, perhaps, alone) equity might properly grant an injunction, to prevent a party availing himself of his own fraud.

The only remaining remedy suggested (or which occurs to me) in the present stage of the proceeding, is that now under consideration; and, of course, this must be adopted, if an interference by the court in the present stage of the cause is proper. It is, however, objected, that the court ought not to interfere at present, but to permit the case to go before the jury, who may find for the defendants, if they believe the facts suggested, and apply the law accordingly. If this case had, indeed, gone before the jury, I should have had no difficulty in telling them, that admitting the truth of the facts as stated, the lessor of the plaintiff had, in my opinion, no title; and, if the jury had found accordingly, redress (though late) could be obtained.

But, at present, I do not think myself at liberty to submit the case to the jury, for the following reasons: 1st. The court is the proper guardian of its own jurisdiction. It is alone responsible for it, and must, therefore, take care that it neither abandons a jurisdiction rightfully belonging to it, nor usurps that which does not. 2d. Admitting that a plea to the jurisdiction is not the only remedy, for the reasons I have given, upon complaint made of any fraud on the jurisdiction having been practised, if the complaint is supported on good grounds, it is just that an immediate inquiry should be made into it, in order that if any injury to a party has been hitherto unavoidably sustained by any such fraud, it may be put a stop to, as soon as possible. To compel a party, in such a case, to stay in court, until a jury shall be summoned and convened, to try a general issue, would be a voluntary exercise of jurisdiction, after the court entertained reason to doubt, at least whether they had any. 3d. To swear a jury is an exercise of jurisdiction. With what propriety can I order that, after being fully convinced from evidence, admitted to be competent, that the court hath no jurisdiction at all? 4th. Suppose the jury in this case should find for the plaintiff, when the court was thoroughly convinced it had no jurisdiction of the cause? Can the court give judgment for the plaintiff in such a case? Surely not. If, therefore, a verdict to that effect, could produce no good, why should a verdict be required of them? Because this would not be an ordinary case concerning a new trial; in which case, after two or three verdicts the same way, a court might be compelled to stop, and proceed no further. But if there were a hundred verdicts in a case, in their opinion, not within their jurisdiction, they could not give judgment without voluntarily usurping a power not belonging to them. 5th. In this case there is no occasion for a jury to try the facts, because the facts are not denied, and the court surely will not call a jury to decide a question of law, and a question which, as I have just observed, they could not decide finally.

Maxfield's allegations, in this case, are either a direct confession, or as to some points (if the expression is proper) a nil dicit. In neither case is a jury wanting. A complete denial can alone entitle a party to have facts tried by a jury. There is no denial in this case but of the merits, upon which a jury can be sworn; which certainly would be premature when facts had already been confessed sufficient to oust the jurisdiction. Had he positively denied, indeed, the allegations of the bill in equity, the jury must have been sworn; for, as a judge, I certainly could not, in any shape, determine on an issue of fact. But as he had not thought proper to deny them, but, in my opinion, substantially confessed every thing, to show that the court had no jurisdiction of the cause; I consider myself bound to order these ejectments to be dismissed, and do accordingly order them to be dismissed with costs.

Mr. William Tilghman, one of the counsel for the defendants, quoted a case in Saviry's Reports (page 12), which Judge Iredell thought much in point, and meant to have declared so, in delivering his opinion, but inadvertently omitted it.

See Worlay v. Harrison, Dyer, 249; 2 Inst. 215; 21 Viner, 535, 536, tit. "Vacat."

Here one of the counsel interfered, and asked the judge whether he would order costs in a case where he declared the court had no jurisdiction.

The judge answered, that that circumstance did not occur to him; he acknowledged he had committed a mistake in that part of the order. But, if it was in his power, he would order double costs.

NOTE. In the case of Brown v. Arbunkle [Case No. 1,990], in the circuit court, at October term, 1806, it appeared, upon bill and answer on the equity side of the court, that the lessor of the plaintiff was a citizen of the state of New York, and the defendant was a citizen of Pennsylvania; that the former was a member of the population company, who had purchased extensive tracts of land, on the northwestern boundary of Pennsylvania; that the land, so purchased, was held by trustees (all citizens of Pennsylvania) for the use of the company; that the trustees had conveyed to the lessor of the plaintiff his portion of the land (including the premises mentioned in the declaration) in severalty; and that the present ejectment was founded upon that conveyance.

The defendant, upon these facts, and upon the authority of Maxfield v. Levy, and Hurst v. Hurst [Case No. 6,929], moved to strike from the record this ejectment, and others in the same predicament. But the motion was overruled by the court; and this distinction taken:

Washington, Justice. In the cases cited, the deeds were executed, with a collusive intention, to give a jurisdiction to the court, which the court could not possess without them. The objection proceeded on two grounds: 1st. On the equity of the statute provision, which declares, that a suit shall not be maintained in a federal court, by the assignee of a promissory note, or other chose in action (with the single exception of foreign bills of exchange) unless it could have been brought there by the original party. And,

2d. On the manifest attempt, by a fraud, to create jurisdiction. But in the case now under consideration, the lessor of the plaintiff would have had a right, as a citizen of New York, to apply to the equity side of the court, to compel the trustees to convey his share of the trust estate to him: and if the trustees have only voluntarily made a conveyance, which the court would have decreed, surely we cannot call it a fraudulent deed, or refuse to take cognizance of a suit founded upon it, between a citizen of New York, and a citizen of Pennsylvania.

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. 1869.[1]

COLLISION—STEAM VESSEL — CROWDED HARBOR—DUTY TO SLOW DOWN—BOTH IN FAULT.

[It is the duty of all vessels, and especially such as are propelled by steam, on entering a narrow and crowded harbor, to slow down. A steam vessel violating this rule will not be exonerated from blame in case of collision, although the colliding vessel was also in fault in taking the wrong course, and for not signaling.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Northern district of Illinois.

[This was a libel in admiralty by John C. Maxwell and others, owners of the schooner Supply, against the steamtug Brothers and the propeller the Lady Franklin, for damages resulting from a collision. From a decree of the district court in favor of libellants (Case No. 1,969), the owners of the propeller appeal.]

Miller, Van Arman & Lewis, for libellants.
Rae & Mitchell, for the Lady Franklin.
H. F. White, for the Brothers.

DAVIS, Circuit Justice. This was a cause of collision in the Chicago harbor, and near its entrance. The district court found the tug, schooner, and propeller were each in fault, and decreed that each should pay one-third of the loss. The schooner and tug were satisfied with the decree, but the propeller took an appeal; and the sole question is whether the decision against her is correct.

The tug was proceeding with the schooner towards the lake, and, after passing through Rush Street bridge, crossed to the north side of the river without signaling the propeller, (which was then entering the harbor,) or obtaining her permission to do so. In the absence of this signal or permission, the tug should have kept to the starboard side of the river; and because she did not, was in fault.

It is insisted on the part of the propeller, as she kept her own side of the river, she was free from blame. This position is not well taken. It is the duty of all vessels, especially those propelled by steam, in entering a narrow harbor like the Chicago river, where the dangers of navigation are much greater than in the open lake, to use great caution. The interests of commerce, as well as the safety of life and property, imperatively require that courts should enforce this duty. No steamboat should enter a harbor like this, where different kinds of vessels are constantly passing, without checking down her speed to a point that would allow only a proper steerage way, and at the same time leave the boat under easy control. The master of the Franklin failed to check the speed of his boat down to this point, although the tug and tow were in plain sight, descending the river. If this plain duty had been performed, this collision would not have occurred; or had it occurred, would not have been so disastrous.

The fault of the tug in taking the wrong side of the river did not excuse or palliate the fault of the Franklin. The Franklin was bound to reduce her speed, in proper season, to the necessary rate, regardless of the conduct of the tug in violating the ordinary rules of navigation. In no other way, in case of collision, could she be freed from responsibility.

But, it is said, if the Franklin was in fault, the court erred in the rule of assessment of damages. This may, or may not, be true; but, if true, the error is in favor of the Franklin, of which she cannot complain.

The only serious question in this case is, whether the Franklin should not have been made to pay one-half of the loss.

The decree of the district court is affirmed.

MAXWELL et al. v. CALL et al.

[2 Brock, 119.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. Nov. Term, 1823.

REAL PROPERTY—DEVISE—ISSUE—RULE OF PERPETUITIES.

A testator devises his estate to his four brothers and sisters, and to their children; but if "they should all die without leaving any issue of the body of either of them alive at the time of the death of the survivor of them; or if such issue should all die before attaining the age of twenty-one years aforesaid, then I desire, &c." The term "issue" comprehends as well the more remote descendants as the children of the devisees, and, consequently, the remainder over is too remote, being limited to take effect on a contingency which may not happen during a life in being, and twenty-one years afterwards.

[This was a bill in equity by Maxwell and others against Call, executor of Means, and others.]

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. This suit is brought on the chancery side of this court, for one moiety of the residuary estate of Robert Means, deceased, which the plaintiffs claim under his will. The testator directs his whole estate to be sold, and the proceeds to be invested in stock, at the discretion of his executors. After several legacies, he directs the residue to be divided into four equal parts, and gives the dividends or interest of one of the said parts to his sister, Nancy Maxwell, during her life, and after her death, he gives the principal of the said fourth part to all and every of the children of the said Nancy Maxwell who may attain to the age of twenty-one years. In case of infancy, the children to be maintained on the dividends; but if the said Nancy Maxwell should die without leaving any issue of her body alive at the time of her death, or all such issue of her body should die before attaining to the age of twenty-one years, then he gives the principal of the said fourth part in the same manner, and to the same persons, as the other three-fourths are given. The other three-fourths are given—one to his brother, William Means, for life, and afterwards to his children; one to his brother, George Means, for life, and afterwards to his children; and the other to his sister, Elizabeth Means, for life, and afterwards to her children, in the same words as are used in the bequest to Nancy Maxwell and to her children. Then comes the following clause: "But if the said Nancy Maxwell, William Means, George Means, and Elizabeth Means, should all die without leaving any issue of the body of either of them, alive at the time of the death of the survivor of them, or if such issue should all die before attaining the age of twenty-one years, as aforesaid, then I desire the said stock to be divided into three equal parts, to be disposed of as follows, &c."

Nancy Maxwell, in the will mentioned, is dead, leaving the complainant, W. M. Maxwell, her only child, who has attained his age of twenty-one years. George and William Means died intestate, and without issue, in the lifetime of Nancy Maxwell. Elizabeth Means intermarried with William Ker, who is since dead. She is a plaintiff in the bill, and the infant plaintiff, Robert Ker, is her only child. The complainant, William M. Maxwell, claims two-fourths of the said stock, and prays that a moiety of the lands may be conveyed to him, instead of its remaining in the hands of the executor, to be sold as directed in the will. He contends that, on his attaining his age of twenty-one years, and the death of his mother, his rights became absolute by the happening of the contingency on which the legacy was to vest, and that he is also entitled to one moiety of the shares of George and William Means immediately, and to the whole property, should Elizabeth then die without leaving any child alive, or should that child die before attaining his age of twenty-one years. If this be not the proper construction of the will, he insists that the limitation over is too remote, and therefore void. The executor resists this claim, and contends that the limitation over is not too remote, and that nothing vests absolutely in the legatees until the death of Elizabeth Ker, who is the survivor of the four legatees for life.

Considering the bequests to the children of each of the testator's brothers and sisters separately, without taking into view the effect which the ultimate limitation in remainder may have on them, it is very clear that the portion allotted to the children of Nancy Maxwell, would vest absolutely in the plaintiff, William M. Maxwell. His mother is dead; he is her only child; and he has attained his age of twenty-one years. The contingencies mentioned in this part of the will have all happened, and the title of William M. Maxwell to one-fourth of the fund is complete, so far as it depends on this part of the will.

The legacies to the children of George and William Means can never take effect, they having both died without issue. It becomes, therefore, necessary to inquire, whether the two-fourths devised to the children of these two brothers be disposed of during the life of the survivor of the testator's sisters, in the clause which gives the whole property over, if there be no issue of any of the brothers and sisters living when that event takes place, or whether there be an intestacy for that time. And in making this inquiry, the court will also consider the influence which this clause may have on the preceding bequests. The words are: "But if the said Nancy Maxwell, George Means, William Means, and Elizabeth Means, should all die without leaving any issue of the body of either of them alive at the time of the death of the survivor of them, or if such issue should all die before attaining the age of twenty-one years, as aforesaid, then I give the said stock, &c." It is very clear, that this limitation over must take effect with respect to the whole property at the same time, and on the happening of the same event. No interest can vest in the remainderman under this clause, in the stock devised to the children of George and William, until it also vests in the stock devised to Nancy Maxwell and Elizabeth Means. It is entirely unimportant whether these words create cross remainders among the four families of the legatees until the death of the survivor, and the happening of the contingency on which the ultimate limitation is made to depend, or the testator is intestate until that contingency happens, with respect to those two-fourths, because the property passes for that time to the plaintiffs, under either construction. The real and only inquiry is, as to the effect of the last clause on the whole of the property in any event which can now happen.

The interest is given to Nancy Maxwell for her life; the principal is given to such of her children as may attain to the age of twenty-one years. If the clause stopped here, the remainder would vest in any child who should attain the age of twenty-one, to open and let in others who should afterwards attain that age. The will proceeds: "But if the said Nancy Maxwell should die without leaving any issue of her body alive at the time of her death, or all such issue of her body should die before attaining to the age of twenty-one years," then the property is given over. The word "issue" is known to comprehend, in its usual sense, all issue to the latest time. Nancy Maxwell is not dead without issue of her body, although she may have no child living, so long as any of her descendants in the direct line remain. Is there any thing in this will to confine the meaning of the term to children? I think there is nothing. The will is penned with great attention to technical language, and it is not to be presumed that technical terms are used without a knowledge of their meaning, and an intention to use them in their legal sense. The term "children" is abandoned in this part of the will for "issue," because the latter word conveyed the meaning of the testator. If he intended that, if Nancy Maxwell should have children who should die under twenty-one, leaving children, those last mentioned children should represent their parent, and take the property given to her, he has used the very words which would produce that effect. No intent is discovered by the words of the will, or in the relations of the parties, to alter the legal construction of these words.

I proceed next to consider the last clause. "But if the said Nancy Maxwell, George Means, William Means, and Elizabeth Means, should all die without leaving any issue of the body of either of them alive at the time of the death of the survivor of them, or if such issue should all die before attaining the age of twenty-one years, as aforesaid, then I desire, &c." The word "issue" is unquestionably used in this clause in the same sense in which it is used in the particular bequests to the children and families of each of his brothers and children. If, on the death of the survivor of his brothers and sisters, there should be no child of either of them living, but should be grandchildren, they would not all be dead without issue, and the remainder would not take effect. The only difficulty I have ever felt in the case remains to be considered. It depends on the meaning of the words, "if such issue should all die before attaining the age of twenty-one years." Does the word "such" restrict the issue which may take to those which are living at the death of the survivor, or may the issue of such issue take? If, for example, on the death of Elizabeth Ker, the survivor of the testator's brothers and sisters, the issue of all of them should be under the age of twenty-one years; if no one of the issue then living should attain the age of twenty-one, but should leave issue that do attain that age, would such issue take? Or would the property pass to those in remainder? According to a literal interpretation of the words, it would pass to those in remainder; but I think the will discloses enough to show that this was not the intent of the testator. Three of his brothers and sisters had no children, certainly, at the date of the will. The testator, therefore, could have no affection for them, but as the descendants of his brothers and sisters. In this view, his desire to provide for them would extend to the whole family, and not be limited to their children, or to such issue as might happen to be living at the death of the survivor, to the exclusion of those who might be born afterwards. He obviously prefers all the descendants of his brothers and sisters to the more remote relations who are the remaindermen. To provide for those descendants, per stirpes, is his primary object. The provision for the more remote relations, is postponed till the extinction of the issue of his brothers and sisters. This primary intent, I think, though with some doubt, must prevail, and if all the issue alive at the death of the survivor should be under age, and should die under age, leaving that issue, I think such issue would take. If I am correct in this, the remainder is too remote, because it is limited to take effect on a contingency which may not happen during a life in being, or twenty-one years afterwards.

If I am correct in this, the plaintiffs are entitled, and I perceive no objection to directing a conveyance of the lands, instead of leaving them to be sold by the executor, it being understood, that the terms on which such conveyance shall be made, are adjusted between the parties.

MAXWELL v. The POWELL.

[1 Woods, 99.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1870.

CARRIERS — FAILURE TO DELIVER GOODS — CONNECTING LINES—OFFSET OF FREIGHT—SHIPPING —GENERAL CREDITOR—COMMON LAW ACTION—MARITIME LIENS.

1. It is no reason way a libellant should not recover for the failure of the defendant to deliver goods according to contract, that no credit is given for the freight earned by defendant in carrying other goods. Such claim should be set up by cross libel.

2. Goods were shipped at New Orleans on the Caddo for Jefferson, Texas, and a through bill of lading given. At Shreveport the trip of the Caddo terminated, and all the goods with the bill of lading were transferred to the Powell. She delivered a part of the goods and demanded freight from the owner. In a suit to recover the value of a portion of the goods which was not delivered by the Powell, held, that she was liable for the goods lost and could not turn the libellant over to the Caddo for his remedy.

3. A general creditor of a ship has no lien on the vessel.

4. When she is attached by process from a common law court, nothing is or can be seized but the interest of the owner remaining after the maritime liens are satisfied.

5. A sale under such seizure conveys only the title of the owners subject to the maritime liens.

6. The fact that the proceeds of the sale were absorbed in the payment of certain preferred maritime liens, and were not sufficient to pay them in full, so that the attaching creditors received nothing, does not relieve the vessel from other maritime liens. A common law court is without power to divest maritime liens except by payment.

[Cited in Crosby v. The Lillie, 40 Fed. 368.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.]

In admiralty.

Wm. M. Randolph, for libellant.

Gustavus Schmidt, for claimant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The libellant claims to recover the sum of three hundred and twenty-five dollars and seventeen cents, by reason of the failure of defendant to deliver goods of that value, the property of libellant, which the defendant received at Shreveport, Louisiana, and undertook to transport to Jefferson, Texas. One Nicholas Quizzaro, claimant, intervenes and defends upon the following grounds: 1. Because the libellant has failed to establish his demand by proof. 2. Because he refuses to do justice by giving credit for the freight earned by the steamer in transporting the goods of libellant. 3. Because libellant should have proceeded against the steamer Caddo, with which the contract of affreightment was made, and by whose master the bill of lading was signed. 4. Because the claimant purchased the steamer Powell at a judicial sale made by order of the 4th district court of the parish of Orleans, in the state of Louisiana, in an action of foreign attachment against the owners. 5. Because the proceeds of said judicial sale were absorbed by the claims of privileged creditors, so that the attaching creditors received nothing, and if libellant had intervened in the case he would have received nothing. 6. And, finally, because the libellant has slept upon his claim and is not entitled to the aid of this court.

Of these defenses in their order:

(1) I am satisfied, from a careful scrutiny of the testimony, that the claim of libellant is established. The captain of the Powell admitted in substance the receipt of the goods for carriage from Shreveport to Jefferson. He admitted the failure to deliver the goods at Jefferson; promised to bring them up on his next trip and failed to do so. He agreed to pay their value, and said he had paid it to Phelps & Co., correspondents of libellant in Shreveport, which was false. The value of the goods is sufficiently established by the testimony of libellant and of his clerk.

(2) If the defendant has any claim against libellant for freight it should have been set up by cross libel, and the failure of defendant or claimant to do this cannot be alleged as a reason why libellant should not recover.

(3) It appears from the evidence that the goods of libellant were shipped at New Orleans on board the steamer Caddo, and a through bill of lading given by the Caddo. At Shreveport the trip of the Caddo terminated, and the goods with the bill of lading were transferred to the Thomas Powell. She carried the larger part of the goods to Jefferson, but failed to deliver the portion sued for in this action. Her master presented the bill of lading issued by the Caddo and demanded freight of the libellant. In undertaking to carry the goods from Shreveport to Jefferson, under the Caddo's bill of lading, she assumed the duties and responsibilities of a common carrier, and after delivering a portion of the goods and demanding freight, it is too late for her to claim exemption from liability and to turn the libellant over to the Caddo for his remedy.

(4) The main and interesting question in the case is, whether the sale of the Powell, in a proceeding by foreign attachment in the state court of Louisiana, divests the lien of the libellant?

The record of the state court, which has been submitted to us, shows that the suit in attachment was brought by the plaintiffs in attachment to recover the amount of a debt due generally from the owners of the Powell to the plaintiff; that the owners were nonresidents of the state of Louisiana, but that they had property, to-wit, the steamer Thomas Powell, situate in the parish of Orleans in said state. The steamer was seized by virtue of the writ of attachment, and was sold. Certain seamen and material men intervened, and their claims exceeded the amount for which the steamer sold. A general creditor of a shipowner has no lien on the vessel. When she is attached by process from a common law court, nothing is taken or can be taken, but the interest of the owner remaining after the maritime liens are satisfied. The seizure does not reach them. The thing taken is not the whole interest in the ship, and the only interest which this process can seize is a secondary and subordinate interest, subject to superior and paramount claims of lien holders.' Under the attachment process from the state court, nothing was legally in the custody of the sheriff but the interest of the owner, whatever it might prove to be after the liens were adjusted. The common law process was not a proceeding in rem to charge the vessel with the debt, for the creditor had no lien upon her, and the court no jurisdiction over anything but the owner's residuum. The whole ship could not be sold so as to convey an absolute right of property to the purchaser.

The constitution and laws of the United States confer the entire admiralty and maritime jurisdiction expressly upon the national courts, and admiralty and maritime liens are therefore outside of the line which marks the authority of a common law court of a state and excluded from its jurisdiction. And if a common law court sells the vessel to which the lien has attached upon condemnation to pay the debt, or on account of its perishable condition, it must sell subject to the maritime liens, and they will adhere to the vessel in the hands of the purchaser and of those claiming under him. Certain Logs of Mahogany [Case No. 2,559]; Poland v. The Spartan [Id. 11,246]; The Bolivar [Id. 1,610]. While, therefore, we hold that the judicial sale by order of the state court conveyed the title of the owners to the purchasers, it did not divest the maritime liens, but the purchaser took subject to those liens. The defense, that the proceeds of the vessel under the sale in the state court, were not sufficient to pay preferred liens, it seems to me is not tenable. Non constat, that the vessel would have brought sufficient to pay all liens, if sold by an order of a court of admiralty, by which the title to the steamer itself would have been conveyed. The purchase price at the sheriff's sale may have been insufficient to pay the claims of intervening lien holders because the purchaser knew that he was not receiving an unincumbered title.

It only remains to consider whether the libellant has lost his lien by delay. An examination of the testimony satisfies me that he has been quite vigilant in the assertion of his claim. It is not pretended that he had any actual notice of the proceedings in the state court. He endeavored to have the Powell seized both at Jefferson, Texas, and at Shreveport, and failing in these attempts, he, without unreasonable delay, commenced this proceeding. I am of opinion, therefore, that there should be a decree in favor of libellant against the Thomas Powell for the value of the goods not delivered. Decree accordingly.

Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE, and CROSS, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The record in this case shows the following state of facts: [Arden] Williams, the appellee, obtained a judgment before a justice of the peace, against Walter Tucker and James Bennett, on the 13th of March, 1830; and on the same day [John] Maxwell, the appellant, became bound as special bail for the stay of execution, which expired on the 13th of July, 1830. On the 17th of August, upwards of a month after the expiration of the stay, an execution was issued on the judgment, and returned the 7th of September, indorsed "No property found." A scire facias was sued out on the 9th of December following, requiring Maxwell to show cause why an execution should not issue against him, jointly with Tucker and Bennett, and upon the same day an execution was awarded by the justice. Maxwell appealed to the circuit court, and at the first term thereafter, on the motion of Williams, by his attorney, the appeal was dismissed, and the judgment of the justice confirmed. From this decision Maxwell prayed an appeal to this court.

Two points are relied on to reverse the judgment: First, it is contended that the circuit court erred in confirming the judgment of the justice, after dismissing the appeal; and, second, that Williams, by failing to issue execution on his judgment for upwards of thirty days after the expiration of the stay, released the special bail. It will be necessary only to notice the first objection. After dismissing the appeal, it is very clear that the circuit court had nothing further to do with the case. It then stood before the justice of the peace in the same situation it did before the appeal was prayed. If the appeal had been entertained Maxwell undoubtedly had the right to show cause why an execution should not issue against him in the same manner he could have done upon the return of the scire facias before the justice. Upon the second point, were it necessary to decide, there would be a unanimity of opinion, that the delay to sue out execution released the bail. Execution must be issued against the principal immediately on the expiration of the stay. Ter. Dig. 392. Judgment reversed.

BANKRUPTCY—PROVABLE DEBT—RENT—MONTHLY INSTALMENTS—TIME OF BANKRUPTCY.

1. Premises were leased by C. to M. & B., by lease dated February 17th, 1871, and expiring May 1st, 1873. The rent was payable monthly, the rent for January, 1873, becoming due February 1st, 1873. On the 28th of December, 1872, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against M. & B., and the adjudication was made before February 1st, 1873. C. filed a proof of debt for the rent from January 1st, 1873, to May 1st, 1873, to which the assignee objected: Held, that, under the 19th section of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 525)], the rent for that period was not provable.

[Cited in Bailey v. Loeb, Case No. 739; Re Hufnagel, Id. 6,837.]

2. The words "time of the bankruptcy," in that section, mean the time of the filing of the petition.

[In the matter of August May and Aaron Berwin, bankrupts.]

By the register:

[I, the undersigned register in charge of the above entitled matter, do hereby certify that the firm of T. H. & T. W. Conkling have proved a claim before me against the said estate, of one thousand one hundred and one dollars and sixty-four cents, for rent of premises leased by them to the bankrupts from the 1st day of May, 1871, to the 1st day of May, 1873, at a rental of three thousand five hundred dollars, payable monthly on the first day of each and every month, beginning with the first day of June, 1871, claiming the sum aforesaid as and for the rent due under the said lease, from January 1st, 1873, to May 1st of the same year, after crediting the sum of sixty-five dollars, paid them by the assignee for the use of said premises after the bankruptcy. The petition in bankruptcy was filed on the 28th day of December, 1872, the rent of said premises having been paid up to the 1st of January, 1873. The assignee objects to the proof on the grounds: (1) That after the bankruptcy he surrendered the premises to the landlords by delivering the keys to their agents. (2) That he hired the premises from the agent of the landlords, during the month of January, 1873, at a stipulated price of five dollars a day, and paid for the days he used and occupied the same, the sum of sixty-five dollars. (3) The assignee claims that the claim is not of the character specified in section nineteen, and cannot, therefore, under the last clause of that section, be allowed against the estate; that the language of the seventh clause of section nineteen, providing that, "where the bankrupt is liable to pay rent, which rent falls due at fixed or stated periods, the creditor may prove for a proportionate part thereof up to the time of the bankruptcy," followed by the words in the last clause of the section, "no debt, other than those above specified, shall be proved or allowed against the estate," in effect forbids the proving of a claim for rent which accrued subsequently to the bankruptcy, and the parties desire said issue to be certified to the court for decision. Respectfully submitted.][2]

Brewster & Crowell, for lessors.
T. Saunders, for assignee.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. T. H. & T. W. Conkling have proved a claim against the bankrupts for $1,101 64 and interest from May 1st, 1873, "being a balance for rent of premises" let to the bankrupts by T. H. & T. W. Conkling, by a lease bearing date February 17th, 1871, and expiring May 1st, 1873. The rent claimed in the proof is for the four months from January 1st, 1873, to May 1st, 1873, at the rate of $291 66 per month, less a credit of $65 00 as paid. The assignee of the bankrupts has filed with the register an objection to such claim and proof of debt, on the ground that the alleged debt or claim is not provable against the said estate under the bankruptcy act, "for the reason that the said debt or claim, or any part thereof, did not exist at the time of the filing of the petition for the adjudication of bankruptcy herein, to wit, the 28th day of December, 1872." The register has taken testimony in the premises, not under an order made by him, in pursuance of general order No. 34, on a petition to him for the re-examination of the claim, but apparently by the consent of the parties. Thereupon the register has certified to the court, under section 4 of the act, the question or issue as to whether the claim should be allowed. He also has certified the testimony and the proof of claim. The lease forms a part of the testimony.

The petition in bankruptcy was filed on the 28th of December, 1872. The rent under the lease was fully paid up to the 1st of January, 1873, before the petition in bankruptcy was filed. The rent reserved by the lease was payable monthly, on the first day of each month, at the rate of $3,500 per year. The lease was for two years from the 1st of May, 1871. The first rent became payable on the 1st of June, 1871. The rent for the month from January 1st, 1873, to February 1st, 1873, did not become payable till February 1st, 1873. The adjudication of bankruptcy was made before February 1st, 1873.

The 19th section of the act provides, "that all debts due and payable from the bankrupt at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, and all debts then existing but not payable until a future day, a rebate of interest being made when no interest is payable by the terms of contract, may be proved against the estate of the bankrupt. * * * Where the bankrupt is liable to pay rent or other debts falling due at fixed and stated periods, the creditor may prove for a proportionate part thereof up to the time of the bankruptcy, as if the same grew due from day to day, and not at such fixed and stated periods. If any bankrupt shall be liable for unliquidated damages arising out of any contract or promise, * * * the court may cause such damages to be assessed in such mode as it may deem best, and the sum so assessed may be proved against the estate. No debts other than those above specified shall be proved or allowed against the estate."

It is contended, for the lessors, that this claim for rent was, under the 19th section, a debt existing at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, but not payable until a future day, and that, therefore, it may, by the terms of that section, be proved against the estate. The case is sought to be likened to that where an article is purchased to be paid for in instalments, at fixed periods, and only part of the instalments are paid before an adjudication of bankruptcy, in which case, it is contended, the vendor can prove his debt for the remaining instalments, a rebate of interest being made if no interest is payable by the terms of the contract. This might be so if there were not a special provision for the case of rent falling due at fixed and stated periods. And there seems to be a reason for such special provision in regard to rent, in the fact that, where an article is purchased, the consideration is, or is assumed to be, executed, while, in the case of rent, the consideration is assumed to be not executed, but executory, the use and occupation being in futuro. But, whatever the terms of payment of rent may be, the creditor may prove for a proportionate part thereof up to the time of the bankruptcy, as if the same grew due from day to day, and not at the periods fixed by the contract of letting. The provision in regard to rent not yet due, and to proving for a proportionate part of it, with the further provision that no other than the specified debts shall be proved, makes it entirely plain that this debt, as proved, cannot be allowed. Whatever is not provable will not be discharged. The provisions in regard to what debts may be proved are arbitrary, but such provisions do not affect the existence or validity of such debts as are not provable, nor does a discharge release them. If the debt is provable, it comes in for a dividend, and can, unless it is an excepted debt, be discharged. If it is not provable, it does not come in for a dividend, but it will not be discharged.

The words "the time of the bankruptcy" mean the time when the petition was filed, to which time the adjudication relates. The rent to that time has been paid. The objection of the assignee to the proof of debt, as made, is sustained, and the claim set forth in the proof of debt is disallowed.

BANKRUPTCY—HOMESTEAD — EXEMPTION — MORTGAGED PROPERTY—PROCEEDS FROM SALE.

1. The head of the family, owning but a single piece of real estate, upon which he resided with his family, but which was mortgaged by himself and wife for more than its value, after condition broken, under the exemption laws of Ohio, is not the owner of a homestead.

2. Such head of family is entitled to hold exempt from execution and sale personal property, to be selected by him, not exceeding in value five hundred dollars.

3. Where all the personal property owned by him at the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy was covered by a chattel mortgage, he could make no such selection, and the assignee had no authority to set off the property to him.

4. Under such circumstances, the bankrupt would be entitled to the exemption out of the proceeds of such personal property; and, upon his application, the court would direct its payment by the assignee.

[In the matter of Henry May, a bankrupt.]

E. Devor, for bankrupt.

M. Kary and Howard Douglass, for assignee and general creditors.

SWING, District Judge. This case comes before me upon the application of the bankrupt for the allowance of five hundred dollars in lieu of a homestead. The facts upon which the application is based are as follows: The bankrupt is the head of a family, and, at the time of filing his petition in bankruptcy, was the owner of a house and lot in the town of Piqua, Ohio, and which was then, and now is, occupied by him as the residence of himself and family, and was not the owner of any other real estate. That there are valid mortgages upon said property, in whose execution the wife of the bankrupt joined, and which, the bankrupt claims, amount to more than the value of the property. The personal property of the bankrupt consisted of a stock of drugs, upon which there was a chattel mortgage of one thousand dollars. This property was sold, and realized to the assignee about fifteen hundred dollars after the payment of the mortgage, and which remains in his hands for distribution.

Among other provisions of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] relating to exemptions is the following: "And such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale on execution, or other process or order of any court, by the laws of the state in which the bankrupt has his domicil at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such state exemption laws in force in the year eighteen hundred and seventy-one." By the laws of Ohio, the head of each family is entitled to hold exempt from sale on execution a homestead, not exceeding in value the sum of one thousand dollars; and, if he be not the owner of a homestead, he is entitled to hold exempt from execution and sale personal property to be selected by him, not exceeding in value five hundred dollars. It is further provided by the laws of Ohio that when a homestead shall be charged with liens, some of which shall preclude the allowance of a homestead to either the head of a family, or the wife, and others of the liens do not preclude the allowance of such homestead, and a sale of such homestead is had, then, of the proceeds of such sale, after the payment of the liens which preclude the allowance of a homestead, the balance, not exceeding five hundred dollars, shall be awarded in lieu of such homestead.

It is objected that the bankrupt is not entitled to the allowance prayed for, because he is the owner of a homestead. If the bankrupt, within the spirit and meaning of the Ohio law, is the owner of a homestead, the allowance must be refused. In a general sense, the bankrupt may be said to be the owner of a homestead; he is in the possession of a house and lot, and holds a deed therefor; but he has executed mortgages upon it for a greater amount than the value thereof, and these mortgages are overdue.

The doctrine of the supreme court of Ohio is, that as between the parties to a mortgage and those claiming under them, the legal title to the mortgaged premises, is vested in the mortgagee. Rands v. Kendall, 15 Ohio, 671; Allen v. Everly, 24 Ohio St. 97. And this is in accordance with the decision of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Probst v. Beach, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 519. It can make no difference that the mortgagee held the legal title for the mortgagor. He could not be divested of it until payment in full of the amount due upon the mortgage, and he could commence proceedings at once to obtain possession of the premises. Giving to these laws that liberal construction to which exemption laws are entitled, I am of the opinion that the bankrupt was not the owner of a homestead within their spirit and meaning.

It is further objected that the exemption in lieu of a homestead can only exist as to personal property, and that to be selected by the bankrupt; that no demand was made by him before the sale of the property; and that there is now no personal property belonging to the estate which can be selected. It must be kept in mind that the entire personal property from which a selection could have been made had been mortgaged by the bankrupt, and as against the mortgagee he had no right to exemption. Although the amount of the mortgage was less than the value of the property, its lien and title extended to each and every part thereof, and even if demand had been made, the assignee had no right to permit him to take any portion thereof, or to set off to him any part of it. To have required of him, therefore, to have made a demand upon the assignee for this exemption, would have been requiring of him what the law never does, to do a vain thing. It was the duty of the assignee to proceed and sell the property, and pay the amount of the mortgage upon it, and distribute the balance according to law under the order of the court. This he is ready to do, and I think the bankrupt is entitled to receive from the fund in lieu of a homestead the sum of five hundred dollars.

It having been suggested that the mortgaged property might bring more than the amount of mortgage liens thereon, the order is suspended until that fact shall be ascertained.

[17 N. B. R. 192.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb. 6, 1878.

BANKRUPTCY — PARTNERSHIP — JOINT AND SEPARATE CREDITORS—PRINCIPAL AND SURETY —EQUITABLE RIGHTS.

1. Where the individual property of one of the members of a firm is pledged for a debt of the firm, the creditor may, and indeed is bound to prove at the request of the separate creditors, his whole debt without deduction against the joint assets; but can only prove the deficiency, after disposing of the security, against the separate assets of such partner.

2. Evidence is always admissible between principal and surety to show what their equitable rights towards each other are.

This case came up on the certificate of the register, the parties agreeing that the facts were truly set forth in the affidavit of the actuary of the Life Insurance Company in support of the proof. The company lent sixty thousand dollars upon this note:

"No. 5724. $60,000. Boston, July 10, 1875. For value received we promise to pay to the Massachusetts Hospital Life Insurance Company, or order, in Boston, the sum of ——Sixty thousand dollars—— in three years, with interest to be paid half yearly at the office of the said company in Boston, at the rate of six and one half per cent. per annum until this note is paid in full. (Signed) May & Co., John J. May."

At the foot is the memorandum:

"Secured by mortgage of real estate in Boston on Pleasant & Pond Sts., Dorchester Av., & Romsey, Ct., duly recorded with Suffolk Deeds."

John J. May was a member of the firm of May & Company, and the money was borrowed for and used by the firm; but the land mortgaged was the separate property of John J. May. The question certified was whether the amount of the note could be proved against the joint assets, without deduction.

L. S. Dabney, for Life Ins. Co.

D. McClure, for an objecting creditor.

LOWELL, District Judge. I have been asked to revise the decision given in Re Holbrook [Case No. 6,588]. The argument has been ably presented, but the law is too well settled to be changed. Our statute has borrowed and put into the act itself the practice of the courts of bankruptcy, by which a creditor having security upon the bankrupt's estate is to give credit for its value before proving his debt. There was no such general rule in equity in England, and in settling the estates of insolvents deceased, or in winding up insolvent corporations, or limited companies as they are called in England, a secured creditor could prove for his whole debt and retain his security besides, until he received full payment. By a late statute the proceedings in winding up cases are put on the footing of bankruptcy in this respect. In this country the rule in bankruptcy has been adopted in some of the states, and in others rejected, when no statute governed the point. But whenever there has been a statute upon the subject, it has followed the practice in bankruptcy, so far as I am informed.

The insolvent law of Massachusetts contained a provision very much like that in our present statute, and, under it, the courts held that where two or more persons had given their joint and several promissory notes, and all, or even one of them had given security for its payment, the value must be deducted, before proof was made against either. Richardson v. Wyman, 4 Gray, 553; Lanckton v. Wolcott, 6 Metc. [Mass.] 305, as explained in Bank v. Bodman, 11 Gray, 134, in which the decision was that a creditor may prove in full against a corporation, although he holds security on the property of a shareholder. It is not too much to say that Lanckton v. Wolcott, even as explained, has not met with approval. The general rule, both here and in England, is that the security which is to be valued and accounted for is that of the bankrupt against whose estate the proof is offered. Take the case of a surety pledging his own property for the debt of the principal; if this is to be applied before proof is made against the estate of the principal, the debt is cut in two and the surety proves for what he has paid or what his property has paid, while the creditor can only prove for what is left unpaid. This is unjust, both to the creditor and the surety, though the gain to the bankrupt's estate would be nothing. The equity rests on the sole ground that the secured creditor has something in his hands which the general creditors would have had but for the mortgage or pledge to him. Without this, they have no interest in the property, and no right to diminish his proof. This is admitted in the later cases in Massachusetts, as well as in all the cases decided under the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]. Ex parte Cram [Case No. 3,343]; In re Dunkerson [Id. 4,157]; In re Anderson [Id. 350]; Ex parte Parr, 1 Rose, 76; Ex parte Hedderly, 2 Mont. D. & D. 487; Ex parte Jones, 2 De Gex, F. & J. 554; Ex parte Turney, 3 Mont. D. & D. 576; Ex parte English & American Bank, 4 Ch. App. 49; Ex parte Peacock, 2 Glyn & J. 27; Ex parte Bowden, 1 Deac. & C. 135; Ex parte Manchester & Liverpool Dist. Banking Co., L. R. 18 Eq. 249, 3 Ch. Div. 481; Rolfe v. Flower, L. R. 1 P. C. 27; Ex parte Connell, 3 Deac. 201; Re Chaffey, 30 U. C. Q. B. 64. But this is now changed by statute in Canada. Clarke, Insolv. 1875, p. 255. Partners and their estates come under the rule for the reason that in bankruptcy the estates are settled separately; the joint creditors are to have the joint assets, and vice versa; and although there is no contribution between joint and separate estates, unless there should be a surplus of one or the other, yet when the property of one is pledged for the debt of the other, a court of equity will apply the right of subrogation precisely as it would if the contracting parties were not partners, and thus do justice to the different sets of creditors. Many of the cases above cited are cases of partners.

It is true, as was argued, that there is nothing on the face of this note to prove that John J. May was the surety, and the firm the principals; but evidence is always admissible between principal and surety to show what their equitable rights towards each other are. Indeed, it would be admissible against the creditor, if he was aware of the fact; so, of course, with the other fact that the land was the separate property of John J. May, the surety. It was argued that there was something to be found in the examination of one of the bankrupts, tending to show that this land should be treated as firm property by virtue of some sort of estoppel. It was not said to have been bought with the money or used in the business of the firm in fact, or to have been dedicated to the firm in any way, but to have been held out as part of the resources of the firm. It strikes me as improbable that such an estoppel could be made out in any case. If it is so, the assignees must look to it, and have the property distributed to the joint creditors. On this certificate I have no right to look at the evidence, but must take the fact to be that it was the separate property of one partner. It follows, that the creditor may prove, and indeed is bound to prove at the request of the separate creditors, his whole debt without deduction, against the joint assets; but only the deficiency, after disposing of the security, against the separate assets of J. J. May. Proof to stand, in full, against the estate of the firm.

BANKRUPTCY — PARTNERSHIP — WITHDRAWAL OF MONEY BY PARTNER—FRAUDULENT INTENT—KNOWLEDGE OF INSOLVENCY.

Where one of the members of a firm has withdrawn moneys therefrom with intent to use them for his private purposes, but such withdrawal was not fraudulent as against his copartners, the assignee of the firm cannot prove therefor against the separate estate of such partner, even if the firm estate was known to be insolvent at the time, and the withdrawal was made with knowledge of the insolvency.

C. W. Bangs, for motion.

T. Saunders, contra.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a motion to expunge a proof of debt filed by the assignee of the two bankrupts against the individual estate of Berwin, one of the bankrupts. The deposition of the assignee avers "that the said Aaron Berwin, one of the said bankrupts, and a member of the firm composed of them, and called May & Berwin, in and before the filing of said petition (for adjudication) was, and still is, justly and truly indebted to deponent, as assignee of said bankrupts, in the sum of thirteen thousand six hundred and fifty dollars, and interest, as hereinafter stated. That such indebtedness has for consideration, and arose in the following manner: At the times hereinafter mentioned, said Aaron Berwin, being a copartner in said firm, composed of himself and August May, both above named, and being then insolvent, did fraudulently and with a view to benefit his separate estate and creditors, if any, at the expense of the creditors of said firm, draw out of and receive of the firm bank account and assets the following sums of money, to wit: July 11, 1872, five thousand dollars; July 15, 1872, one thousand five hundred dollars; August 2, 1872, one thousand five hundred dollars; November 26, 1872, five thousand six hundred dollars; altogether, thirteen thousand six hundred and fifty dollars, and thereupon paid twelve thousand eight hundred dollars of the same to George King, his brother-in-law, upon an alleged individual debt; that said money had been returned to the individual estate of said Berwin." The executors of one King, who proved a debt against the individual estate of Berwin, have taken these proceedings for the examination of this proof of debt, and now move that it be examined. Some technical and formal objections are made to the proof filed, which it is unnecessary to discuss, as they are susceptible of amendment if the assignee of the joint estate has the right to make proof of this claim against the separate estate of Berwin.

The facts shown in the case are that May and Berwin entered into copartnership in or about the year 1864, that Berwin put in sixteen thousand dollars as capital. The amount that May was to put in does not certainly appear, but it was less than Berwin was to put in. Both were to give their time and services in the business, and they were to share equally in the profits. They began under written articles, which appear to have been lost; and after the term ran out, they continued the business without articles or definite agreement as to the term of the partnership. Interest was not allowed or paid on their capital accounts. The firm did business on credit, and at all times had occasion to borrow money to carry it on. In or about the year 1869, Mr. Berwin drew out funds which before that he had had invested in some other business, and he paid these moneys, to the amount of about forty-six thousand dollars, into the firm of May & Berwin. This money stood on the books of the firm to the credit of an account opened under the name of P. Berwin & Bro.; but it was understood by both parties to be, and was in fact when paid in, the money of Berwin. It was treated in all respects by the firm as money loaned by Berwin to the firm. Interest was allowed on it, and credited in the account. At the several times stated in the proof of debt, Berwin drew out of the firm's bank account the several sums therein specified, and these payments were debited to this account on the books of the firm. There was no agreement whatever at the time the money was paid in, nor afterward, between May and Berwin as to the length of time that the firm should have the use of it. There was no agreement between them that it was, or was to be treated, as capital. While it was in the firm, the firm had the use of it, as of any other moneys borrowed. When Berwin drew out the sums above referred to, amounting in all to thirteen thousand six hundred and fifty dollars, or at some of the times when he drew out parts of it, May objected to his doing so; but there is no evidence that he put his objection on the ground that in drawing it out Berwin had violated any partnership obligation towards him or any agreement between them. He testifies indeed that he did not suppose Berwin had a right to draw it out, but he states no fact whatever tending to show that any agreement or obligation was violated in his doing so. The firm continued to do business, borrowing money, getting discounts, paying its notes and other obligations, buying and selling goods, and enjoying a large credit, until the 13th of December, 1872, when it suspended payment, and on the 20th of the same month was put by its creditors into bankruptcy. At the time Berwin drew out these sums he had overdrawn his personal account with the firm about nineteen thousand dollars, and May had overdrawn his about twenty-two thousand dollars. A critical examination of the assets and liabilities of the firm would probably have disclosed that as early as July, 1872, when the first of these sums mentioned in the proof of debt was drawn out, the capital of the firm was gone, and that when the last of them was drawn out the firm was insolvent; but the evidence does not warrant the conclusion that any of this money was drawn out when Berwin contemplated insolvency or bankruptcy, or with intent on his part to withdraw it from the firm creditors for the purpose of giving a preference in the distribution of the assets to his individual over his firm creditors. For aught that appears, he may then have believed that the firm would go on and all its obligations be paid.

The testimony of the assignee that some time in the year 1870 the partners both told him that Mr. Berwin had put more money into the firm, and that of another witness who had dealings with the firm, that in 1872 they told him that Berwin had put more capital into the concern, is not sufficient to impress on this money, as held by the firm, the character of capital rather than money loaned, which the evidence shows it clearly to have been. As to the language used, these witnesses are to some extent contradicted, and even if their recollection as to the words used were accepted as wholly trustworthy, they testify to nothing which impairs the right of Berwin to draw this money out when he pleased as between him and his partner May.

The general rule that for moneys drawn out by a partner the joint estate cannot prove against the individual estate, is admitted by the counsel for the assignee; but it is claimed that where the firm were insolvent at the time the money was drawn out with the intention to give a preference to individual creditors over firm creditors, by using it in the payment of individual debts, then the withdrawal of it is fraudulent against the firm creditors, and the assignee of the firm can make proof against the individual estate. The authorities, however, do not sustain the claim of the assignee as applied to the present case. The right of the firm estate to prove a debt in bankruptcy against the separate estate of one of the partners has been much discussed in England. In the case of Ex parte Harris, 2 Ves. & B. 212, Lord Eldon thus states the rule and the history of it: "There has long been an end of the law, which prevailed in the time of Lord Hardwicke; whose opinion appears to have been, that, if the joint estate lent money to the separate estate of one partner, or if one partner lent to the joint estate, proof might be made by the one or the other in each case. That has been put an end to, among other principles, upon this certainly, that a partner cannot come in competition with separate creditors of his own, nor, as to the joint estate, with the joint creditors. The consequence is, that if one partner lends one thousand pounds to the partnership, and they become insolvent in a week, he cannot be a creditor of the partnership, though the money was supplied to the joint estate; so if the partnership lends to an individual partner, there can be no proof for the joint against the separate estate; that is, in each case, no proof to affect the creditors, though the individuals may certainly have the right against each other. The opinion of Lord Talbot seems also to have been in favor of this proof. But in and previously to the year 1790 great discussion took place at this bar, the result of which, according to Lord Thurlow's opinion, was expressed particularly in the case of Dr. Fendal and Lodge. The former, a physician, embarked a very large property, his whole fortune, in a partnership with Lodge, whom he permitted to have the whole management, and a bankruptcy ensuing, Lord Thurlow held that, as it was with knowledge and permission of Fendal that the whole management of the property was with Lodge, he was authorized to do as he thought fit with the partnership property, and Fendal must therefore abide the consequences of what had been done most improperly, but under his own authority, most imprudently given, and there could therefore be no proof. The law has been clear from that time that to make out the right to prove by one estate or the other, it must be established that the effects joint or separate, have been acquired by the one or the other improperly and fraudulently, in the sense that they have been acquired under circumstances from which the law implies fraud, or in the sense to increase his own means out of the partnership estate. Lord Thurlow, by 'fraud,' intended to express what he thought necessary to distinguish that from taking by contract or loan, or without the express or implied authority of the other partner, and that such act must amount to fraud. Upon this case I formerly expressed my opinion, and I now lay down, that if in either the expressed or implied terms of an agreement for a partnership there is a prohibition of the act, and it is done without the knowledge, consent, privity, or subsequent approbation of the other partner before the bankruptcy, and to the intent to apply partnership funds to private purposes, that is prima facie a fraud upon the partnership. To illustrate this, I will put the simple case of a partnership between two, and by the articles all the money is to be paid into their joint names at a particular bank, and they are prohibited from drawing out more than fifty pounds a month each for individual purposes; that during the month of January they mutually observed these articles by paying in, and on the 1st of February, one, instead of fifty pounds, draws out five hundred and fifty pounds, and upon the next day a bankruptcy happens; if it is made out that this overdrawing was for private purposes, and without the knowledge, consent, privity, or subsequent approbation of the other, as it was for private purposes, and therefore must be for the increase of the individual's estate, and as it was against the covenanted rights, or rather the prohibitions affecting both, and without the knowledge, consent, privity, or subsequent approbation of the copartner, it is as much a fraud within Lord Thurlow's rule as if, according to the expression I am informed I formerly used, he had stolen the property." This rule is again applied and illustrated in the cases of Ex parte Yonge, 3 Ves. & B. 31, and Ex parte Turner, 4 Deac. & C. 169. In the case of In re Lane [Case No. 8,044], Lowell, J., says: "The general rule in bankruptcy is that there can be no proof between the joint and separate estate of partners, unless there is a surplus of the joint estate to be divided. This rule was adopted partly as being upon the whole equitable, on the supposition that the joint creditors had given credit to the joint estate, and the separate creditors to the separate estate, respectively, and partly, I apprehend, upon the consideration that there is no such thing as a debt between partners or between a partner and his firm, in respect to partnership matters, excepting upon a winding up of all the affairs, and it was found to be very expensive and inconvenient to go into a general accounting in bankruptcy, and it was thought more expedient as well as more just to take the estates as the parties left them." To the same effect is the opinion of Hopkins, J., in Re McEwen [Id. 8,783]. See, also, In re Cooke [Id. 3,170].

Without calling in question the exceptions established by these English cases, which appear to be recognized in the cases last cited, as applicable under our bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], it is evident that the fraudulent withdrawal of funds from the firm assets, upon which the exception rests, is a withdrawal fraudulent as against the firm or the other copartners. It is not enough, if the partner withdrawing the money violated no duty towards his copartners in withdrawing it, that he did so with an intent to use it for his private purposes, nor does there seem to be any authority for proof by the firm against the separate estate, when there is no such fraud as against the copartner, even if the firm estate is known to be insolvent at the time and the act is done with knowledge of the insolvency.

In the present case, Berwin had a perfect right, as between himself and May, to withdraw this money. He had not agreed to leave it in the business of the firm for any definite time. It was a loan payable on demand. More than all that he had contracted to leave in the business was left there still. He was the general financial manager of the concern, and had undoubted authority to contract for and to pay off loans to the firm. May's objection merely expressed his displeasure at the act. He had no right to object to the act as in violation of any expressed or implied contract between himself and his partner. Moreover, if it would aid the assignee to show that, when the moneys were withdrawn, Berwin contemplated the winding up of the firm business in bankruptcy or insolvency, or that they must stop, the proof on that point is deficient.

The counsel for the assignee has cited, in support of his claim to prove this debt, certain cases in which the transfer of the partnership assets by the firm to one of the partners when the firm was insolvent, and with design to interfere with the proper and equitable distribution of the assets, as between firm and individual creditors, has been set aside as fraudulent against the firm creditors: Collins v. Hunt [Case No. 3,015]; In re Cook [Id. 3,150]. These cases have no application to the present. They are cases respecting the marshalling of assets as between the joint and separate estates, and not cases touching the right to prove debts as between the joint and separate estates. The principles governing the two classes of cases are distinct, and if the assignee's claim were good under these authorities, it would be not for a dividend as a creditor, but for certain money or property in specie as belonging to the joint estate. But even those cases of marshalling assets, if they afforded an analogy, would not aid the assignee in this case, since the transfer of the firm assets to one of the copartners, where the firm is known to be insolvent, is not held to be void if made in good faith, though the necessary result of it will be, if the firm's affairs have to be wound up in bankruptcy, that the relative interests of the different classes of creditors will be thereby seriously altered. In re Long [Id. 8,476]; In re Tomes [Id. 14,084]. The assignee has been held estopped by a stipulation entered into by him with this very creditor, George King, and under which stipulation King repaid to him, as asignee of Berwin, certain money which he still retains, from claiming that money as belonging to the joint estate. Whether that stipulation and the proceedings had in this and other courts, since it was given, would also prevent him from proving a dividend against the separate estate of Berwin, thereby taking a part of the money for the joint estate, as is claimed by the counsel for King's executors, is a question that is not be determined, since upon the facts shown the joint estate is not entitled in any event to prove against the separate estate of Berwin for these moneys withdrawn by Berwin, and used by him in paying his own debts. Motion to expunge granted.

District Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Oct., 1873.[2]

PENALTIES—STEAM VESSEL—INSPECTION—SEIZURE OF VESSEL.

A libel of information against a steam vessel, to recover the penalty for not being inspected according to the act of congress to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, cannot be sustained, if a subsisting seizure of the vessel at the time the libel is brought is not alleged, and which is to be proven at the hearing.

[Cited in The Paolina S., 11 Fed. 173.]

The libel of information, brought by the district attorney in this case, charges that the steam tug May had been employed in towing lumber on the Oconto river into Green Bay in this state, without having been inspected in conformity with the eleventh section of the act of congress, entitled, "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," (16 Stat. 440, approved Feb. 28, 1871), and that by reason thereof the owner or owners and master of said steam tug became liable to pay to the United States the sum of five hundred dollars; that for the payment of said sum of five hundred dollars, the said steam tug became liable to be seized and proceeded against summarily by way of libel, and for the recovery of which this civil and maritime action is instituted. The objection to the prosecution of this libel of information was the omission of an allegation of a seizure. The first section of the act under which the libel of information is brought provides, that "if any such vessel, 'propelled in whole or in part by steam,' shall be navigated without complying with the terms of the act, the owner or owners thereof shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of five hundred dollars for each offense, one half for the use of the informer, and for which sum the steamboat or vessel so engaged shall be liable and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel."

Levi Hubbell, U. S. Dist. Atty., for United States.

Finches, Lynde & Miller, for respondents.

MILLER, District Judge. By a long course of judicial decisions, it must be regarded as definitely settled that there must be in all cases under the revenue and navigation laws a subsisting seizure at the time the libel or information is brought. See Conk. 252–255, and cases cited, and many others. See Conk. Prac. (4th Ed.) 231. These decisions are pursuant to section 9 of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 73, 76), investing the district courts with exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, including all seizures under laws of impost, navigation, or trade of the United States, where seizures are made on waters navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen, within their respective districts as well as upon the high seas. By the section under which this libel is brought it will be observed that the owner of the vessel shall forfeit and pay the penalty, and for the recovery thereof the vessel shall be liable and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel. The remedy here prescribed for a breach of the law is by seizure and libel.

This libel of information cannot be further prosecuted unless it be amended by alleging a seizure by the proper officer, and which must be proven as alleged.

NOTE. On appeal to the circuit court, Judge Drummond affirmed the above case. Opinion delivered October term, 1874 [Case No. 9,330]. The present statute for the regulation of steam vessels comprises title 52 of the Revision of 1874, p. 857. The section of that act providing for the penalty is as follows (section 4499): "If any vessel, propelled in whole or in part by steam, be navigated without complying with the terms of this title, the owner shall be liable to the United States in a penalty of five hundred dollars for each offense, one-half for the use of the informer, for which sum the vessel so navigated shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense."

PENALTIES—INFORMATION—SEIZURE ESSENTIAL TO JURISDICTION—WHO SHOULD MAKE.

1. In cases of information an actual seizure of the res, prior to the filing of the libel, is essential to the jurisdiction of the federal courts.

[Criticised in The Joshua Leviness, Case No. 7,549. Cited in U. S. v. The Frank Silvia, 45 Fed. 642.]

2. United States Statutes and decisions of the supreme court commented upon.

3. The secretary of the treasury may authorize any United States officer to make the seizure; and in the absence of such authority, it is the duty of the customs officers.

[These were two appeals from decrees of the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of Wisconsin refusing to entertain jurisdiction of libels of information filed by the United States. The opinions of Judge Miller will be found in Cases Nos. 9,329 and 10,421.]

Levi Hubbell, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Wm. P. Lynde, for claimants.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. These are appeals from the district court, and I have, after some hesitation, come to the conclusion that these proceedings were irregular, for the reason that the res was not in either case seized before the libel was filed. The objection taken to the jurisdiction of the court is technical, and my own judgment is opposed to sustaining it; but I think that the decisions of the supreme court have substantially held that there should be in such cases as this, before the libel is filed, a seizure made by the proper officer, and I will state why I have come to the conclusion that these decisions must control in these cases.

The act of 1789 gave exclusive jurisdiction to the district court in all cases of seizure. The language is: "All seizures under laws of imposts, navigation or trade of the United States, where the seizures are made on waters which are navigable * * * within their respective districts as well as upon the high seas." 1 Stat. 77.

It will be observed it refers to all cases of seizure under the laws of navigation or trade, as well as of imposts. The principle is stated, and the authorities cited in section 301 of Benedict's Admiralty, in which it is said that "an open, visible seizure by an officer of the government authorized by law to seize, must precede the commencement of judicial proceedings. The seizures are usually made by the revenue officers, or by the commanders of armed vessels on the high seas." The leading case upon the subject is The Ann, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 289.

In conformity with this view is the 22nd rule in admiralty adopted by the supreme court of the United States, in which it is said: "All informations and libels of information upon seizure for any breach of the revenue or navigation or other laws of the United States, shall state the place of seizure, whether it be on the land or on the high seas, or on navigable waters within the admiralty or maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and the district within which the property is brought, and where it then is." Ben. Adm. p. 371.

The theory upon which this doctrine is maintained is this, that it is the place of seizure that gives jurisdiction to the court. Where there is a forfeiture or liability to seizure for an offense against the laws of the United States, of course the res can be seized anywhere, as authorized by law, and may be brought within a district, and when it is thus seized, or is brought within a district, then the jurisdiction of the district court of that district is said to attach, and the libel must state that it is seized, and is there, in order that the court may judicially know that it has jurisdiction of the case.

And therefore it is, that this rule requires that the libel should state the place of seizure. This seems to be the theory upon which these adjudications and this rule are made. On principle I confess I do not see any material distinction between cases of that sort and the ordinary cases of libels in admiralty by individuals, which are called cases of seizure, because the res is seized. But in all such cases the res is taken, not in the first instance, before the libel is filed, but after, and because the libel states a case in admiralty, the monition issues, and upon that monition the seizure takes place.

Now, it is not easy to comprehend why, in the one case as well as in the other, the seizure may not be made by the monition after the libel is filed. If the res is not taken, then the court has no jurisdiction of the case, and the proceedings must be dismissed. The only distinction is, that in the one case it is seized before, and in the other after the libel is filed.

And in either case, nothing could be done against the res by way of forfeiture or enforcement of a penalty or decree, unless there was an actual seizure. In the one instance the seizure is by the ordinary officers of the customs, and in the other, by the marshal of the court.

But, however this may be, whether the distinction is well founded in principle or not, it seems to be the rule adopted by the supreme court of the United States, and whatever view this court may entertain of the decisions, if such is the law as adjudicated by that court, we must follow it. And it must be confessed that this view is strengthened somewhat by the language of the first section of the act of congress of February 28, 1871 (16 Stat. 440). That act consolidated all previous acts and amendments upon the subject of the regulation of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, from 1838 down to that time.

It is for a penalty for non-compliance with this act that these proceedings are instituted. And the first section of that act says: "And if any such vessel shall be navigated without complying with the terms of this act, the owner or owners shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of five hundred dollars for each offense, one-half for the use of the informer; and for which sum the steamboat, or the vessel so engaged, shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense."

There is some force in the argument derived from the peculiar collocation of this phraseology, the act of seizing being first mentioned, and then the proceedings by libel in the district court of the United States. Whether that is accidental or otherwise, is not apparent, but such is the language and the order in which it is stated.

It has been contended that this act does not provide for any special officers whose duty it is to make the seizure, and it is said that there is a controversy upon the subject, the marshal declining to make the seizure, and the officers of the customs doubting their authority.

The act of 1799 provided that the officers of the customs should "make seizure of and secure any ship, vessel, goods, wares or merchandise, which shall be liable to seizure by virtue of this or any other act of the United States respecting revenue, which is now or may hereafter be enacted, as well without as within their respective districts." 1 Stat. 678. It is true that this section speaks of revenue alone, but it may be said that all laws connected with navigation are in a sense revenue laws. The terms are used sometimes indiscriminately.

The act of 1871 is a navigation law, and for the protection of lives and property, and is declared to be "for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes." It is clearly, then, a navigation law, and I understand it is so conceded by counsel.

I admit that there is nothing in the act of 1871 which prescribes it as a special duty upon any of the officers of the United States to make the seizures referred to in the first section, and it is only by analogy that we can hold that the officers of the customs are authorized to make the seizure under that act.

But, taking the whole scope of the decisions of the supreme court upon the subject, together with the 22nd rule, and the general tenor and effect of the act of 1871, I have no doubt that it is competent for the secretary of the treasury to authorize any officer of the United States to make the seizure; and that in the absence of any direction by him, it is the duty of the officers of the customs.

Mr. Lynde.—Has your honor considered the 30th section of the act of 1871, where it is made the duty of the officer of the customs to see that the act is enforced?

The Court.—I have not particularly, and I state this without reference to the 30th section of the act of 1871, which, possibly, may be broad enough to cover the case. The forms in Benedict, to which the district attorney has referred the court, in several instances, seem to indicate that the filing of the libel precedes the seizure, and perhaps it is not an unfair inference from that circumstance that there may have been cases of that kind in the Southern district of New York, under similar laws to that of 1871.

But it does not seem that the question ever came up before the federal courts in the Southern district of New York, and we cannot, therefore, give those forms the effect of an adjudication. In the case of The Fideliter [Case No. 4,755], the appeal in the circuit court was dismissed [and so as to dismiss also the case in the district court] [3] for the reason that there was no allegation in the libel that there had been a seizure, and the circuit court held that that must appear, citing various authorities.

It does not distinctly appear, by the report of the case, what particular law was violated in that instance, but merely that it was a proceeding in admiralty to condemn the steamship Fideliter for violation of the laws of the United States.

Mr. Hubbell.—Condemnation follows fraud, and seizure a violation of the laws of navigation.

The Court.—One may be said to be a case of forfeiture, and the other a case simply of penalty, and to enforce the one or the other, seizure is the remedy, expressly so made by the act of 1871, and this court in the one instance decrees a forfeiture, and in the other that the res shall be sold to enforce the penalty. But I hardly think there is any just distinction growing out of that view of the case. I regret that I am obliged, in obedience to what I consider the decisions of the supreme court, to make the order which I shall have to make in these cases. And I would like, if the district attorney feels so inclined, that the supreme court should have an opportunity of re-considering its decisions upon this point. It may be that they can find a distinction between this case and the others which they have decided. I would hope it may so prove, because I think that there ought not to be so much distinction between the cases of seizure before and after the filing of the libel. But they have taken that distinction. These libels were dismissed in the court below.

[Mr. Lynde: Yes, sir. There was one judgment upon the merits, and the other dismissed on my application on terms.] [3]

The decrees of the court below may be affirmed, and the libels dismissed by the order of this court for want of jurisdiction.

NOTE. That in cases of information an actual seizure of the res, prior to the filing of the libel, is essential to the jurisdiction of the court, and that such precedent seizure must be alleged in the libel, see The Lewellen [Cases Nos. 8,307 and 8,308]. But in that case it was also held that the act of the owners in executing delivery bonds under the act of congress, and thus regaining possession of the property, was a waiver of the objection of the want of a prior seizure.

The following are some of the decisions of the supreme court referred to in the above opinion: In order to give jurisdiction in rem, there must have been a valid seizure of the res by the marshal. Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 584. And the seizure must be actual, and not afterwards abandoned. The Josefa Segunda, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 312. As to what constitutes a seizure, consult, also, Pelham v. Rose, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 103.

The district court where the seizure is made has exclusive jurisdiction. The Little Ann [Case No. 8,397]; U. S. v. The Betsey, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 452; Keene v. U. S., 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 310; The Merino, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 402. The law now provides (Rev. St. 1874, § 3072): "It shall be the duty of the several officers of the customs to seize and secure any vessel or merchandise which shall become liable to seizure by virtue of any law respecting the revenue, as well without as within their respective districts."

Two justices of the peace cannot bind out an apprentice while the orphans' court is in session.

[Action by Thompson May against Henry T. Bayne.] Petition by an apprentice to be discharged.

Mr. Ashton, for petitioner.

The justices had no right to bind him out. The father was a resident of Alexandria county, and not poor or indigent. He might, under the 3d section of the Maryland act of 1793, c. 45, have bound out his son, but he has not done so. His assent was not absolute; but on condition that he could agree with the master as to the terms. Besides, the orphans' court was in session on that day, and the justices had no jurisdiction. See the Maryland law of 1794, c. 47, § 1. The indentures are dated June 7th, 1826, and were on the same day recorded in the orphans' court, but there is no evidence that the court saw or approved them.

R. S. Coxe, contrà.

It is not necessary that the orphans' court should not be in session, although that court should have been in session on that day, yet it does not appear that it was in session at the very time the indentures were executed. As the father did not reside in the county, his assent was not necessary.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that as the orphans' court was in session on the 6th, and adjourned to, and actually sat on the 7th of June, the justices of the peace had no jurisdiction. The petitioner was discharged.

[2] [Final hearing upon pleadings and proofs. Suit brought upon letters patent [No. 33,370] for an "improvement in stave machines," granted to William Sisson, September 24, 1861.

[Two defenses were set up in the answer of the defendants [Henry Chaffee and others]: (1) That Sisson was not the first and original inventor. (2) That Fuller & Ford, of the city of Chicago and state of Illinois, obtained a license from the owners of the patent to manufacture and sell in the city of Chicago, but not elsewhere, the patented machines, and a sale by them to the defendants at Chicago, of a machine which they were using in Rice county. The first defense was abandoned, and the defendants relied upon the license of Fuller & Ford for their authority to use the machine.

[A statement of the facts, as they appear from the pleadings and testimony, is as follows:

[Complainants' title: William Sisson, of Fulton, New York, obtained, on September 24, 1861, letters patent for a new and useful improvement in stave machines, for the term of seventeen years, giving him the exclusive right and liberty of making, constructing, using, and vending to others to be used, the said improvement. Sisson, on December 12, 1861, conveyed by deed an undivided half of the said letters patent and invention to Clinton H. Sage, of Fulton, New York, reserving certain interests and rights relating to certain places in the state of New York, and not elsewhere, to be held and enjoyed for the full residue of said term for which letters patent were granted. A power of attorney from Sisson & Sage was executed on June 22, 1865, to G. W. Clason, of Milwaukee, to sell rights to use the patented machines in the state of Wisconsin. A sale by G. W. Clason, as attorney of Sisson & Sage, to the complainants [Charles May and others], of the exclusive right to use, and to sell to others to use, the invention in certain counties in the state of Minnesota, including the county of Rice. A ratification and confirmation in writing of this sale by Sisson & Sage, dated July 7, 1868.

[Defendants' title: Sisson & Sage, by deed of assignment, properly executed, on March 15, 1862, sold to A. A. Jones, of Fulton, New York, the exclusive right, under the patent, for certain counties in the state of Michigan; and, on August 17, 1864, A. A. Jones joins Sisson & Sage in appointing, by a proper instrument in writing, F. E. Jones, of Chicago, Illinois, attorney and agent to use, and sell, and dispose of the right to "use and sell," the patented improvement, and also the right "to sell any territory which has not heretofore been disposed of, in any place or places whatever, and also the right to use the said invention, as to said F. E. Jones shall seem expedient, giving and granting unto said attorney full power and authority to do and perform all and every act and thing requisite and necessary to be done in and about the premises," etc. By virtue of the authority conferred by this instrument, F. E. Jones, as attorney for Sisson & Sage, granted the sole and exclusive right to Willard M. Fuller and David M. Ford to manufacture and sell the patent stave machines in Chicago, Illinois, and the machine now in use in Faribault, Rice county, Minnesota, was purchased of Fuller & Ford, in the city of Chicago.][2]

tent of the grant to Fuller & Ford, executed by Jones, as attorney of Sisson & Sage. Before considering this instrument with reference to its language, and the rights conferred by it, we will notice an objection made by the complainants' counsel to the power of attorney to F. E. Jones, to wit: that A. A. Jones, who, it is alleged, was an assignee of a portion of the patent and invention, did not execute the grant to Fuller & Ford. It is claimed that A. A. Jones having signed the instrument, in connection with Sisson & Sage, creating F. E. Jones attorney of all the parties, for certain purposes therein expressed, F. E. Jones could not execute an instrument conferring any rights under that power with reference to the patent, without signing the name of A. A. Jones to it. In other words, Fuller & Ford's license can not properly be received in evidence, because it is not executed pursuant to the power of attorney to F. E. Jones, in that it is only the act of Sisson & Sage, not of the three persons executing the power. Upon what principle this objection is urged does not appear, except as stated in the objection. The power of attorney recites the separate interest in the patent of the parties who executed it, and conferred upon F. E. Jones the authority to act for each of them, jointly or severally. In my opinion, then, a sufficient answer to this objection is, that A. A. Jones is, at the most, a grantee of an exclusive sectional interest, and one or two joint owners can legally grant, assign, license, or sell their own share or right in the patent. Pitts v. Hall [Case No. 11,193]. The power of attorney signed by Jones, Sisson & Sage gave F. E. Jones full power and authority to control any disposition of territorial rights under the patent, and to use the invention as to him might seem expedient. He had the authority from all the parties in interest, and inasmuch as A. A. Jones had no interest in the patent outside of the state of Michigan, he could grant nothing to Fuller & Ford, and it was not necessary for him to execute the assignment to them.

This grant to Fuller & Ford is in the following words: "* * * Now, this indenture witnesseth that for a valuable consideration, viz., five hundred (500) dollars, to us in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, we, William Sisson and Clinton H. Sage, aforesaid, have assigned, sold, and set over, and by these presents do assign, sell, and set over unto the said Willard M. Fuller and David M. Ford, the sole and exclusive right to manufacture and sell machines of the said invention as secured to us by the said letters patent and assignment, in the city of Chicago, county of Cook, state of Illinois, and in no other place, or places, the same to be held and enjoyed by the said Willard M. Fuller and David M. Ford, for their own use and behoof, and their legal representatives, to the full end of the term for which such letters patent have been granted, as fully and entirely as the same would have been held and enjoyed by us had this assignment and sale not been made."

Now the patentee, before the execution of this grant, would, without doubt, by the unrestricted sale of a single machine in Chicago, confer by implication upon the purchaser the right to use it until worn out, wherever he pleased. Chaffee v. Belting Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 217. The sale would have transferred the machine outside of the limits of the monopoly. The right to any exclusive privilege under the patent to the machine thus sold would have been gone, and the purchaser, by the tradition of the vendor, would obtain the absolute ownership of it, and it would become his private property.

The complainants insist that this may be true, so far as the patentee is concerned, but no such power is given Fuller & Ford by the assignment, and no legal authority to use the monopoly could be conferred upon a purchaser from them, at least to use outside the city of Chicago. The language of the grant to them, it seems to us, clearly gives such authority. The contract entered into by Jones, the attorney, and Fuller & Ford, operated as an assignment of an exclusive right, secured by the letters patent, to manufacture and sell, limiting them, so far as the monopoly was concerned, to the city of Chicago. The assignment was absolute, so far as the specified locality, of the exclusive right to manufacture and sell. No restriction of those rights was intended. On the contrary, Fuller & Ford and their representatives were to hold and enjoy them, "as fully and entirely as the same would have been held and enjoyed by Sisson & Sage had this assignment not been made." It seems to us that language could not have been used which would more certainly have given the authority.

Although the subject matter of this contract between Sisson & Sage and Fuller & Ford was a patent, the rule of construction of contracts generally is not thereby altered. An owner of a patent can make an assignment in regard to it the same as he may make in regard to any other species of personal property. Says the court, in Morse v. O'Reilly [Case No. 9,858]: "While the exclusive rights of a patentee are specially guarded from intrusion, the contracts which he makes to share them with third parties are interpreted and enforced in the same manner as other legal engagements."

Applying the usual rules of interpretation to this contract, there can be no doubt about the rights of Fuller & Ford under the patent. They not only had the right to establish a manufactory of machines in Chicago, but they had the exclusive right to sell machines to any and every one who might choose to purchase the same, the vendee taking all of the rights appertaining to their title as vendors.

If there were any doubts about this view or construction of the instrument, the condition in which we find it dispels them. The original grant to Fuller & Ford is full of interlineations and erasures, and in order to arrive at the true intent of the parties to this grant, these acts of the parties are to be considered. "Words struck out of an instrument, may be looked at to ascertain the intention of the parties to it." 3 Metc. [Mass.] 93; 3 Walton, 689.

Parol testimony to show all of the circumstances is also admissible when the language may be susceptible of more than one meaning, such as their knowledge of the subject matter of the contract, and all other facts that would throw light upon the intention of the parties. Phelps v. Clasen [Case No. 11,074].

In the testimony of Jones and Ford we find that the right to use the machine in Chicago was of no particular value. Jones had to abandon the only machines that were in use then, because they did not pay. Fuller & Ford had already manufactured machines for Jones; and persons outside, from other states, were applying to them for machines. In the light of these circumstances, it could not have been the intention of the parties to confer only the exclusive right to manufacture machines, and to sell them for use in Chicago, which all parties agree was of no value. Now, there being no restriction in the grant upon the rights thereby conferred, it must be construed in its terms favorable to the grantee and against the grantor. The grant carried with it by implication everything necessary and incident to its due enjoyment, and the defendants, when they purchased the machine from Fuller & Ford had the right to use it without reference to locality, except so far as F. E. Jones was restricted in authority under the power of attorney to him. In arriving at this conclusion, we have sustained the complainants' counsel in all of their objections, except to the admissibility of the record evidence, and overruled the defendants' counsel in his objections to testimony. A decree will be entered dismissing the bill.

BANKRUPTCY—PETITION—DEPOSITION—AMENDMENT THERETO.

The deposition of a witness to acts of bankruptcy in an involuntary proceeding cannot be amended, because it is the prooof upon which the rule to show cause issues, and without which the whole proceeding is defective.

[Cited in Re Hanibel, Case No. 6,023.]

[Action by May against W. L. Harper & Atherton.] This was a hearing sur motion to dismiss creditors' petition.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. A jury being called, and before they were sworn, attorney for creditors asks and has leave to amend the petition which is allowed because the creditors' petition is a part of the pleadings in the case. He further asks leave to amend the deposition of the witness as to the acts of bankruptcy, which is refused, because it is the proof upon which the rule to show cause why he should not be declared a bankrupt issues, and without which the whole proceeding is defective. This deposition of W. L. Harper proves no act of bankruptcy, and the proceedings are dismissed at the cost of the petitioning creditor.

DAVIS, Circuit Justice. The laws of congress secure to a party for a limited term of years a property right in a new and useful improvement. If the subject-matter of a patent possesses the requisites of novelty and utility, it is protected against the encroachments of society, and no one has the right to use it without paying for it. By a natural law, the creations of a man's genius are as much his own property as the horse or land he may purchase with money which he has earned. And the patent law [5 Stat. 117], in order to encourage the inventive faculty, recognizes as patentable an improvement in any art which is useful to the public and not before known, although the result is produced by a mechanism which combines old mechanical power without the use of any new element.

The true question in such a case is whether the combination of materials by the patentee is new. If they have never been combined together in the manner stated in the patent, but the combination is new, then the invention of the combination is patentable. So far as the evidence goes, it does not appear that any such combination was known or in use before May's invention. The jury, therefore, have only to consider whether Hodson's structure is an infringement on May's. Hodson's structure seeks to accomplish the same result as May's. Both construct prisons so as to avoid necessity of actual contact with the prisoners while the keeper can observe their movements and control them. The utility of such an invention commends itself to the common mind, and does not need to be enlarged upon. To construct a jail, so that prisoners can be safely kept and their movements controlled, and the jailer secure from violence, is a beneficial object. Does Hodson's structure infringe on May's? In their scope and object they are alike, and evidently intended to secure the same result. Do they differ essentially in their organization or mode of operation? The one is evidently equivalent to the other, as producing the same result, but in this sense it is not material to consider the subject.

The main question is, whether Hodson has used substantially the same means, or, mechanically speaking, equivalent means, to accomplish the same result. If he has, he is an infringer, otherwise not, and whether he has or not is a question for the jury to determine. A mechanical equivalent, as generally understood, is where one may be adopted instead of the other, by a skilled mechanic accustomed to machinery, and with a competent knowledge of mechanical powers. If such a man, seeing a new machine, and having a full description of the thing invented, can, by sitting down and examining it with care, see that the required thing can be done in a different mode, and it is done in that different mode by the knowledge which he has of his business, he has not produced a new invention, nor one substantially differing from the original. But, if the inventive faculties are exercised to produce the change, then he has a right to the benefits of whatever he thus invents. There must be mind and inventive genius involved in the change, and not the mere skill of the workman to avoid the consequences of an infringement. To constitute an infringement, the thing used by the defendant must be such as substantially to embody the plaintiff's mode of operation, and thereby attain the same kind of result as was reached by his invention. It is not necessary that the result should be precisely the same in degree, but it must be the same in kind. For instance, the shutting one dorr, instead of two is a difference in degree, but not in kind. The same function is performed.

Keeping these general principles in mind, I hope you will find no difficulty in applying them to the present case. May's patent is really for a method, unknown before, of bolting prison doors, without coming in contact with prisoners. The mechanical arrangement to do this was patentable, and he is to be considered as the original combiner of this mechanical arrangement so as to produce the intended result. In doing this he has used nothing new, nor was he required to do it. Bolts, bars, locks, levers, and pulleys are all old, but May has used them in such a way that the jailer can control the prisoners by working the doors while remaining away from the prisoners. It is the working the doors so as to avoid the necessity of actual contact with the prisoners which is the thing invented by May. This is his idea, and as he has carried it into successful practice, he is protected by law, and should be. If it were otherwise, there would be no encouragement to inventive genius.

Keeping in mind that May's invention is the ability of the jailer, from the moment he enters the outer door, to control the prisoners by bolting the doors while separated from him, the question arises, does Hodson's apparatus infringe it? The difference between the two machines, which it is important for you to notice, consists in the different means used to fasten the doors. In both machines the apparatus used is to fasten the doors, so as to control the prisoners, without being under any apprehension from them. May complains that Hodson has appropriated his purpose, and arranged his machine on the same principle although the form of it has varied. The question of infringement is one for the jury. The true point is, have the defendants used the invention of the plaintiff, or something substantially like it? Do the two structures operate upon the same principle? Are they substantially the same? Did it require any invention to substitute the pulley for the lever, or to fasten the first door horizontally instead of perpendicularly? If it did not, they are mere changes of forms, to produce the same result, and the party using them in this way is an infringer. The operation of pulleys and levers is as old as society. Suppose a skilled mechanic should see May's invention; would he not at once know that the lever power in the pulley could serve the same purpose as the lever power in the lever and endless chain? This is a question for your determination. May's invention secures to him, not only the means he used, but all other mechanical contrivances which are equivalent. It is well known to all intelligent men that the pulley and weight can be used to produce the same effect as the lever and bar. Did it require any exercise of invention to substitute the pulley for the lever, or the bolt horizontally for the bolt perpendicularly. Would or not any good mechanic at once see that these substitutes could be used to produce the same effect. If so, Hodson has pirated May's invention, and must respond in damages. It is for you, from the evidence, to say whether he has or not. You have heard the evidence, and must decide what witnesses to believe or disbelieve. I regret that the witnesses in this case have not, by their superior intelligence on this subject, been able to lighten your labors. But I think, after all, that the case will not give you a great deal of trouble. If you find for the plaintiff, you will find $400.

The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff and assessed his damages at $400, as instructed.

MAY et al. v. SHEEHY.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 135.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1831.

LANDLORD AND TENANT — ASSIGNEE OF LESSEE — ACTION AGAINST — COVENANTS OF LEASE — WHOLE ESTATE.

1. In an action of covenant by the assignee of the lessor against the assignee of the lessee, the plaintiff may give parol evidence of an assignment by the lessee to the defendant.

2. An assignee of the lessee is not liable to the lessor upon the covenants in the lease, unless he is assignee of the whose estate of the original lessee.

This was an action of covenant, by [John E. May and others] the assignees of the lessor against [Edward Sheehy] the assignee of the lessee.

The defendant pleaded that he was not assignee of the lessee.

The plaintiffs offered parol evidence of possession by the defendant, and his payment of rent to the plaintiffs, as evidence of an assignment. 2 Phil. Ev. 88, 89; Derisley v. Custance, 4 Term R. 75.

Mr. Hewitt, for defendant, contends that the assignment can only be proved by deed, and the deed must be produced.

Mr. Taylor, contra. The assignment from the lessee to the defendant is a matter not within the knowledge of the plaintiffs. They are no party to it. As to them, it is res inter alios acta. They have no power, at common law, to call upon the defendant to produce the deed of assignment, if there was one.

THE COURT (nem con.) permitted the parol evidence to be given; but instructed the jury that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover in this action unless they should be satisfied that the defendant was assignee of the whole estate of the original lessee.

Verdict for defendant.

MAY et al. v. SLACK.

[16 Int Rev. Rec. 134.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May 7, 1872.

TAXATION — LEGACY TAX — WHEN IT ACCRUES.

M. died February 23, 1870, testate, and bequeathed certain pecuniary legacies, which were paid by his executors in April, 1871; the act of July 14, 1870, repealed taxes on legacies on and after October 1, 1870, saving taxes already accrued. Held, that a tax was properly assessed as "accrued" upon said legacies under the saving clause contained in section 17, Act July 14, 1870, c. 255 (16 Stat. 261).

[Cited in Mason v. Clapp, Case No. 9,233; Clapp v. Mason, 94 U. S. 593; U. S. v. New York Life Ins. & Trust Co., Case No. 15,873; U. S. v. Townsend, 8 Fed. 307. Distinguished in U. S. v. Rankin, Id. 875.]

Samuel May died February 23, 1870, testate, and by will, dated February 15, 1862, and by codicil, dated February 15, 1870, bequeathed certain pecuniary legacies. Said will and codicil was admitted to probate March 28, 1870, and the plaintiffs [John J. May and others] duly appointed executors. In September, 1870, the plaintiffs made a partial payment of some of the legacies upon which a legacy tax was paid, respecting which no question is raised. In April, 1871, the plaintiffs paid all said legacies in full, and the United States assessor assessed upon the sums so paid in April, 1871, certain legacy taxes, which were paid under protest, and this action brought against collector to recover back said taxes.

S. E. Sewall, for plaintiff.

F. W. Hurd, for defendant.

Before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and LOWELL, District Judge.

LOWELL, District Judge. This is an action to recover back the legacy duties assessed upon certain bequests made by the late Mr. May, who died February 23, 1870, before, but less than one year before, the repeal of the duty. The act of July 14, 1870, repealed the tax on legacies and successions on and after the first day of October, then next, section 17 saving "all taxes properly assessed or liable to be assessed, or accruing under the provisions of former acts or drawbacks, the right to which has already accrued or which may hereafter accrue under said acts." The plaintiff's position is: That legacies are payable at the earliest in a year after the death of the testator, and that by statute of July 13, 1866, § 9 (14 Stat. 140), the legacy duties are payable when the legacy is payable; that the United States had no right or interest in the tax until it became payable, and thus the saving clause of the repealing act is intended only to preserve those taxes, which either were assessed, or at any rate might have been assessed before the first day of October. The defendant, on the other hand, contends that the legacy taxes "accrue" in the sense of the law upon the death of the testator, though they are not payable until afterwards, so that the saving is intended to cover all these cases where there was an inchoate right, so to speak, to the tax, whenever it might be thereafter properly assessable. This single point of construction on which the case turns is one of no inconsiderable nicety, and none the less so that it requires the intent of congress to be ascertained from general expressions, which were in all probability adopted without any view to the particular point under consideration. Upon the whole, we are of opinion that by the internal revenue law the tax is to be taken to accrue upon a pecuniary legacy immediately on the death of the testator, though not payable until the legacy is payable. Though it is true, in general, that a legacy is not payable until a year, yet this is an equitable rule adopted only for convenience. "There is no doubt," said Lord Eldon, "that the property is vested at the death of the party; and if a case was produced in which it was quite clear that there were no debts, the court would give the funds to the party, notwithstanding there had not been a lapse of twelve months." Garthshore v. Chalie, 10 Ves. 13. Although the executor is not bound to pay within the time, yet he may do so, as indeed in this case the executors did pay a certain part of each legacy. The legacy is vested, and if the legatee should die within the year it would go to his personal representative, but the latter would take it subject to the tax, which is made a lien from the death of the testator. Section 125, 13 Stat. 286. If the executor should become bankrupt within the year I have no doubt that the amount of the legacy could be proved against his estate as debitum in praesenti, solvendum in futuro; and the language of the tax act, which makes the legacy liable to a duty payable only when the legacy is payable, may well be taken to express a similar liability,—that is, one that is vested, though not payable. In the case cited by the defendant (Meredith v. U. S., 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 494), Mr. Justice Story says that duties accrue in the fiscal sense as soon as goods are imported, though they are not payable until after entry, valuation, and assessment; and he cites several cases to show that this is the established doctrine. If, then, a customs act were passed abolishing certain tariff duties on and after a certain day, and saving such as had accrued before the day, it is plain that "accrued" would not mean payable, but only vested.

There is another cause of inquiry which strengthens this argument. The statute applies to successions as well as legacies; and many successions vest not only in right, but in possession immediately on the death of the ancestor. Thus real estate descends at once to the heir; and there is no doubt that the succession duty may be assessed at once, because there is the express provision of section 137, 13 Stat. 289; and section 141 carefully provides that, if the succession shall be reduced by the payment of debts or otherwise, the tax, or a proportionate part thereof, shall be refunded; or, by section 143, 13 Stat. 290, the commissioner may arrange the duty by compromise in cases of doubt or difficulty. Then take the case of a specific bequest to the executor himself, or a specific devise of lands, or the case where the executor is himself the residuary legatee, and gives bond under our statute to pay debts and legacies, in all these cases it seems to me the duty not only accrues, but is or may be assessable within the year. Considering, therefore, that the statute was intended to be uniform, and that the construction contended for by the plaintiffs will make its application vary with the nature of the property and other circumstances, and for the other reasons above given, we think the better opinion is that these duties were rightly assessed, and that the judgment must be for the defendant.

BANKRUPTCY—JUDGMENT RECOVERED AFTER PROCEEDINGS IN BANKRUPTCY — GUARDIAN AND WARD—LIMITATIONS—DISTRIBUTIVE FUND.

1. A claim founded upon a judgment or decree recovered after the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, without leave of the bankrupt court, cannot be proved.

2. The liability of a guardian to his ward is not affected by his discharge in bankruptcy.

3. Proof of claims may be filed after an order discharging the assignee has been set aside, and the assignee ordered to proceed.

4. The filing of the petition arrests the running of the statute of limitations.

5. So long as there is a fund to distribute, all those who had valid, subsisting claims existing at the time of the commencement of the proceedings, upon making proof, will be permitted to participate in it.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

HILL, District Judge. The questions now presented for decision arise upon exceptions filed by the bankrupt to the claims filed against said estate, and in which Garrett, one of the creditors, has joined as against the other creditors in a portion of these exceptions. These exceptions are limited to alleged defenses, appearing upon the face of the claims, and matters appearing in the record, and will be considered as applied to the claims stated as follows: First, as to the claim of Mary L. Bourne, for the sum of twenty thousand six hundred and nine dollars and fifty-three cents, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, from October 31st, 1872, to April 22d, 1873, alleged to be the amount of a decree rendered by the chancery court of Warren county, on the last mentioned day, in favor of the said Mary L. Bourne, against the said bankrupt as the balance then due as her guardian, and which it is alleged remains due and unpaid. To the allowance and payment out of the estate of the bankrupt, both he and said Garrett except, and state seven different grounds of exception.

Only the fifth ground stated need be considered in this case, as that must be decisive against its admissibility as at present presented, and applies alone to this claim; other grounds stated apply to other claims, and will be considered in connection with them. All demands provable against a bankrupt's estate, whether then matured and due or not, must have an existence at the time of filing the petition of adjudication, which in this case was on the 30th day of December, 1868. The claim as now filed is a decree rendered on the 22d day of April, 1873.

To avoid this objection, it is insisted that an amended proof has been filed, making the bill and answer, as well as a copy of the decree, an exhibit which discloses the claim upon which the decree was based. Whilst this is so, it is the decree and not the accounts between the parties that constitutes the debt asked to be allowed and paid. At the time the petition of Maybin asking to be declared a bankrupt was filed, no adjustment of the accounts between Mrs. Bourne and her father and guardian, had been made, showing any indebtedness against him. The claim was then an unadjudicated equitable demand growing out of these relations as trustee and cestui que trust, which could only be ascertained upon an account based upon proof, to be ascertained by this court by such proceedings as it might direct, or if a bill or suit had then been pending to settle the liability, upon application to this court an order might have been made directing the assignee to be made a party to that suit, and represent the interests of the estate until its conclusion, so as to ascertain the true amount to be allowed as a claim against the bankrupt estate. But the court did not then have, nor has it now, power to direct the institution of a suit in a state court after bankrupt proceedings are commenced, only for the collection of debts not exceeding five hundred dollars. So that the only mode by which an adjustment could be had between the claimant and the defendant which then could or now be had, is by proceedings in this court. This did not, however, prevent Mrs. Bourne from instituting and conducting proceedings in the chancery court to a personal decree against her father as her trustee, it being a fiduciary demand, and not one from which he was entitled to be discharged by the order and decree of this court under the bankrupt proceedings. The decree against him personally is not affected by the proceedings in this court, further than he will be entitled to a credit for whatever sum Mrs. Bourne may receive from the assets in bankruptcy. The claim as presented being rejected, Mrs. Bourne and her husband will be allowed to present it in such form as she may be advised, when the court will make such order in relation to it, as in its judgment will best facilitate the ascertainment of such amount as may properly be made payable out of the assets for distribution. This disposes of this claim.

The next claim for consideration is that of E. F. Brown, for two thousand dollars and interest from November 10, 1868, evidenced by two promissory notes for one thousand dollars each, dated on that day and payable on the first day of January, 1869, and the other payable on the first day of January, 1870, each bearing interest from date.

Three grounds of objection are taken to this claim: 1st, because the proof was not filed until the 24th day of July, 1873, after an order had been made by the register, discharging the assignee. 2d, because the original proof did not have the notes or copy attached, and were therefore utterly void. 3d, because said notes were barred by the statutes of limitations before the amended proof was filed.

To the first ground of exception it is only necessary to state that the order discharging the assignee was by the order of this court held to have been improperly made, and the assignee directed to proceed with the administration of the estate. Therefore this ground of exception cannot be sustained. To the second ground stated, it is only necessary to state that the proof may in all cases be amended, if application be made in proper time; and when amended so as to comply with the law, it will relate back to the original filing, unless the rights of others have in the meantime intervened, which in this case did not occur. Therefore this ground of exception is not maintainable. The third and last ground stated is that the notes were barred before the amended proof was filed. The original proof was filed on the 24th day of July, 1873; the note first due was not payable until the 1st of January, 1869; from that time until the 24th of July, 1873, was four years, six months and twenty-three days.

As we have seen the amendment to the proof related back to the filing of the original proof, consequently neither of these notes were barred. Therefore the exceptions to these debts must be overruled and the debts allowed to be paid out of the assets.

The next claim for consideration is an open account for goods and merchandise filed by J. J. Garrad & Co., for the sum of two thousand five hundred and twenty-nine dollars and thirty-three cents. Two grounds of exceptions are insisted upon to this claim: 1st, Because it was not filed until the 20th of August, 1875, after it is alleged the bankrupt was discharged. 2d, That it is barred by the statute of limitations.

The first exception must be overruled for reasons heretofore stated. The second exception raises a question of more difficulty, and one which has been very ably argued by counsel for the exception. The account upon its face shows that the goods were all sold and delivered during the years 1867 and 1868, the account being closed February 1st, 1868, and was therefore not barred when Maybin filed his petition to be declared a bankrupt. The filing of the petition certainly arrested the running of the statute of limitations; the question is, was there any period after that time when it again commenced running. The bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] makes no provision for such a period. It provides for notice both special and general to all the creditors to come forward and prove their claims at the first meeting of creditors, and at each subsequent meeting provides for special notice to those who have proved, and a general notice to all to attend such meeting and take part in the proceedings, and it further provides, that upon the first distribution of the assets a sufficient amount shall be reserved to make those who had not proved equal to the pro rata shares then declared, and that upon the next distribution those participating in the first shall receive nothing until all are made equal. I am of opinion that the law contemplates that so long as there is a fund to distribute, all those who had a valid subsisting claim existing at the time the bankrupt proceedings commenced, upon making proof, shall be permitted to participate in it.

But admitting what is insisted upon by Maybin's counsel, that the statute commenced running at the expiration of the injunction created by the statute as a general rule, yet the facts shown by the record in this case upon well settled rules of equity, estop Maybin from setting up the bar. The claim out of which the fund for distribution was realized was in existence when Maybin filed his petition to be declared a bankrupt; this claim he did not place upon his schedule, so as to give his creditors an opportunity to pursue it. It may be, and I am inclined to the opinion he thought it worthless, yet the effect so far as the creditors are concerned is the same. Nothing being shown on his schedules for the payment of debts, there was no inducement to prove them. It may be that creditors might then have thought this claim worthless, yet they should have had an opportunity through the assignee, their agent, to test it. The failure to afford that opportunity, certainly in equity, and this is a court of equity, with the most extensive powers, Maybin is estopped from interposing this objection. For the reasons stated, the exceptions to this claim must be overruled, and the claim allowed.

The next claim for consideration is an open account filed by James Murray, for five hundred and sixty nine dollars and eighteen cents, for goods sold and delivered between the 7th of April and the 12th of December, 1866. The same grounds of exception are stated against the debt with the last mentioned debt, and the same reasons operate against their maintenance. Therefore the exceptions must be overruled and the debt allowed.

The last claim excepted to is one filed by Robert Wilson for four hundred and forty dollars, founded upon a judgment rendered by the circuit court of Warren county against said Maybin on the 11th day of February, 1869.

The second ground of exception is all that need be considered and that is decisive against its allowance, and that is that the judgment was obtained after the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, without leave of this court and in violation of the bankrupt law. The bankrupt not having suggested, as I take it, the pendency of the bankrupt proceedings, and having taken no steps to arrest it, it remains a personal judgment against him, but is not a charge upon the fund in court. The exception must therefore be sustained, and the claim disallowed.

Circuit Court, S. D. Mississippi. 1877.

BANKRUPTCY—CLAIM OF BANKRUPT—EMPLOYMENT OF COUNSEL—SUBSTITUTION OF ASSIGNEE—OTHER COUNSEL EMPLOYED—CONSENT OF COURT.

1. Where counsel, employed by the bankrupt before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy to carry on a suit at their own cost and retain as compensation one-half of the amount recovered, recover a large fund in such suit after the bankrupt is discharged, they are entitled to the one-half of such recovery, notwithstanding such bankruptcy and discharge.

2. A petition filed by the bankrupt after his discharge, praying that the share of the counsel be paid to them, and the balance, after paying debts and costs of the bankruptcy, be paid to him, is one in the ordinary course of a bankrupt proceeding and not a bill in equity, nor is a decree of the bankrupt court directing such payment the allowance of a claim against the bankrupt's estate. The proper method of reviewing such a decree is by petition.

3. The discharge of a bankrupt does not bar the right of his assignee to recover property afterwards discovered, which the bankrupt had failed to put in his schedules.

4. Where it appears that the discharge of the assignee has inadvertently found its way among the files of the court, the court has power to set it aside and direct the assignee to proceed with his duties.

5. Where the assignee was substituted as plaintiff, more than two years after his appointment, in a suit which was commenced in the name of the bankrupt, and recovers therein, the bankrupt cannot claim the amount of such recovery from him on the ground that the limitation provided in the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] barred his remedy at the time of his substitution.

6. Where the assignee, in obtaining authority from the court to make a contract with counsel to prosecute a claim and to pay them for their services one-half the gross amount when recovered, suppresses facts which if known to the court would have induced it to withhold such authority, the contract is not binding on the court or the parties, especially where such facts were known to the attorneys themselves. But a reasonable sum for services actually performed will be allowed.

[In review of the action of the district court of the United States for the Southern district of Mississippi.]

On the 3d of June, 1876, the district court of the United States for the Southern district of Mississippi, sitting in bankruptcy, made a decree, to revise certain portions of which these petitions were filed. This decree was made under the following circumstances: Raymond, the assignee of Maybin, had recovered in the court of claims a judgment against the United States for seventy-one thousand and twenty dollars, which sum had been drawn from the treasury of the United States, and at the date of the decree of the district court was in the registry of the court subject to distribution by its order. In anticipation of this state of facts, Maybin, the bankrupt, had filed, on January 26, 1876, a petition in the district court, in which he set forth that Messrs. Harris & Harris, a firm of solicitors in Vicksburg, were entitled to one-half the amount so recovered from the United States, by reason of a contract entered into in 1866 with them by him before his bankruptcy, by which he agreed that, in consideration of their prosecuting said claim and paying all expenses incident to such prosecution, they were to have and retain one-half the amount they might recover from the United States. That Harris & Harris had associated with themselves in the contract Messrs. Bartley & Casey, solicitors in Washington city, and that by the united services of all his said counsel on May 25th, 1875, a judgment was recovered in favor of petitioner and against the United States, in the court of claims, for seventy-one thousand and twenty dollars. His petition further states that in July, 1873, and more than three years after the discharge of the petitioner in the bankrupt court, John B. Raymond, his assignee, had procured himself to be substituted for the petitioner as plaintiff in the said suit in the court of claims; that but one debt had been proved against the estate of the petitioner, and that for the sum of two thousand dollars only; and that said assignee intended to collect said judgment and hold said money, and refused to recognize the compensation due to the said counsel of petitioner. The petition prayed that the counsel of petitioner should be paid their said fees out of the fund when recovered, and that petitioner should be allowed to deposit in the registry of the court a sufficient sum to cover all claims against him and all costs and commissions of the assignee, and that the remainder of the proceeds of said judgment should be paid to petitioner. After the filing of this petition and before a decree was made thereon, the judgment of the court of claims had been affirmed by the supreme court of the United States, and the amount of the judgment was drawn from the treasury of the United States and was in the custody of the bankrupt court. Before the decree was made upon said petition, other proofs of debt had been filed against the estate of said Maybin, in addition to said claim of two thousand dollars, so that the debts filed against the said estate amounted to about twenty-six thousand dollars. These debts, however, it was claimed by Maybin, were not valid claims against his estate. Raymond, the assignee of Maybin, filed an answer to this petition in which, besides denying many of the averments of the petition, he alleged that Maybin had fraudulently neglected to place the said claim against the United States upon his bankrupt schedules. That in March, 1873, he discovered that the said Maybin was then prosecuting said claim in the court of claims, and thereupon he, the assignee, filed his petition in the district court setting forth that said claim had come to his knowledge, that it would be necessary to employ an attorney to prosecute the same, that he had no funds for that purpose, and that it had been customary for such claimants to employ an attorney at a compensation of one-half the amount recovered, and praying for authority to make a contract with an attorney for the collection of said claim on those terms; that the authority was given, and he made a contract with Messrs. Adam & Speed, attorneys, dated March 22d, 1873, by which he employed them to prosecute said claim, and agreed to pay them for their services one-half the gross proceeds of said claim when recovered. Adam & Speed, who had associated with themselves in the prosecution of this suit Mr. S. E. Jenner, of Washington city, filed on October 2, 1875, a proof of their claim against the bankrupt's estate, in which they claimed that there was due them and said Jenner, from the bankrupt's estate, the sum of thirty-five thousand five hundred and ten dollars, by reason of their services under the contract aforesaid, and that they held an attorney's lien upon the judgment for seventy-one thousand and twenty dollars, which had been recovered in May, 1875, in the court of claims, in favor of said assignee. After due notice to all the parties in interest, and the taking of much testimony on both sides, the petition of Maybin came on for hearing before the district judge sitting in bankruptcy, on the 3d of June, 1876, and he made a decree. [Case unreported.] The decree found that there was on deposit in the Valley Bank of Vicksburg, the proceeds of said suit in the court of claims, the sum of seventy-one thousand and twenty dollars, subject to the order of the court in the cause, and directed its distribution as follows: To Raymond, the assignee, for his commissions on receiving and paying over said moneys, the sum of eight hundred and ten dollars; to S. E. Jenner, or Adam & Speed, his associates, five hundred and seventy-nine dollars and forty-six cents, being an amount paid by Jenner to Bartley & Casey, the attorneys for Maybin, and which sum was properly chargeable to the attorneys of said Maybin; to Harris & Harris, and Bartley & Casey, their associates, thirty-four thousand five hundred and twenty-six dollars and fifty-four cents; to Adam & Speed and S. E. Jenner, seventeen thousand five hundred and fifty-two dollars and fifty cents; and the court decreed that the remainder of the fund be held by the said Valley Bank until the further order of the court. Maybin, the bankrupt, has filed a petition to review this decree, in which his main ground of complaint is the allowance made to Adam & Speed and Jenner. And Raymond, the assignee, has also filed a petition of review in which he complains of so much of the decree as allows to Harris & Harris and Bartley & Casey the said sum of thirty-four thousand five hundred and twenty-six dollars and fifty-four cents. The other facts necessary to an understanding of the controversy are stated in the opinion of the court.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The respondents to the supervisory petition of review filed by Raymond, the assignee, have entered a motion which raises a preliminary question that first requires the attention of the court. The motion is to dismiss the petition because this court is without jurisdiction to entertain the same, the decree sought to be reviewed being either a decree in equity or the allowance of the claim of creditors, and therefore not reviewable by supervisory petition. I do not think this motion ought to prevail. The petition of Maybin was in the ordinary course of a bankrupt proceeding. Its main purpose was to secure to himself any surplus that might remain of his estate after paying all the claims upon the fund, and all debts due from him. It certainly was not necessary to present such a prayer by a regular bill in equity. The fund, at the time of the decree, was in the registry of the court, and Maybin's petition amounted simply to a motion to distribute the fund to those having claims against it and to pay him the residue. Nor does the decree appear to be the allowance of a claim in favor of Harris & Harris and Bartley & Casey. They were the owners by equitable assignment of one-half the fund, if what they alleged about their contract with Maybin was true. They did not set up a debt due to them against the bankrupt estate, but a title to one-half the fund. The decree that they be paid out of the fund was not the allowance of a claim against the estate from which, by the provisions of original section 8 of the bankrupt act (Rev. St. 4980), an appeal might be taken. "The assignee of a bankrupt is not the assignee of his creditor, nor of all the judgments, executions, liens, and mortgages outstanding against his property. He takes only the bankrupt's interest in the property; he has no right or title to the interest which others have therein, nor any control over it further than is expressly given by the bankrupt act as auxiliary to the preservation of the bankrupt's interest for the benefit of his general creditors." Goddard v. Weaver [Case No. 5,495].

In the district court the petition of Maybin was treated both by the parties and the court as an informal petition in the course of bankrupt proceedings; and I am disposed to treat it in the same way in this court, and think it was not a bill in equity; nor was the decree of the court the allowance of a claim against the bankrupt's estate. The motion to dismiss the revisory petition of Raymond, the assignee, is therefore overruled.

As to the merits of the revisory petition of Raymond, the questions are, what contract did Harris & Harris make with Maybin for the prosecution of his claim against the United States, and what were their rights under that contract? In my judgment the proof is clear and conclusive that one or two years before Maybin filed his petition to be adjudicated a bankrupt, he entered into a written contract with Harris & Harris, by which the latter agreed to prosecute said claim against the United States, and pay all costs and expenses of said prosecution, and for their said services they were to have one-half the net proceeds of the claim, and the other half was to be paid to said Maybin; that Harris & Harris, by themselves and those whom they associated with themselves, did prosecute said claim in the court of claims, and in the supreme court of the United States, and did recover therein final judgment for seventy-one thousand and twenty dollars, which amount is now in the registry of the district court.

Under this state of facts there can be no doubt of the right of Harris & Harris and their associates to one-half the net proceeds of the fund, notwithstanding the fact that, during the pendency of the cause in the court of claims, Maybin had been adjudicated a bankrupt, and before the recovery of the judgment in that court Raymond, his assignee, had been made a party plaintiff to the suit. Harris & Harris and their colleagues were not only willing to prosecute the suit after the bankruptcy and after the assignee was made party, but actually did prosecute it to a successful final judgment and recovery of the money. These services were accepted by the assignee, and he now enjoys their fruits. When their services had been rendered according to their contract, and the money recovered, they had a title to one-half the amount. When Raymond was appointed assignee the claim of Maybin vested in him, subject to the rights of Harris & Harris under their contract, which were in no way affected by the bankruptcy. As long as they were willing to perform their part of the contract, they were entitled to insist upon their rights under it. These rights of Harris & Harris and their associates were recognized not only by the district court, but also by the court of claims. The district court, in an order dated November 28, 1873, directed Raymond, as assignee, to prosecute said claim in the court of claims, and declared that all costs and expenses incurred by said bankrupt, including his counsel fees for the prosecution of said claim before the substitution of said assignee, should be paid out of the amount which might be paid into court to be thereafter determined by the court. And in the order of the court of claims, made on February 23, 1874, by which S. E. Jenner was made attorney of record for said Raymond as assignee of Maybin, instead of Bartley & Casey, it was provided that Bartley & Casey should have and retain a lien upon the cause of action, and upon the papers and effects of the said Maybin, and upon any judgment which might be recovered in the case, to the amount of such contingent fees and costs as it was agreed by or on behalf of said Maybin that his original attorney should receive for professional services for prosecuting the case. The order of the district court authorizes the assignee to prosecute the claim in the court of claims, and the order of the court of claims substituting the attorney of the assignee as attorney of record, both took care to preserve the rights of Maybin's attorneys under their original contract for fees. It is objected that the contract made between Maybin and Harris & Harris is champertous, and therefore void. "Champerty," says Blackstone, "is a species of maintenance, being a bargain with the plaintiff or defendant campum partire if they prevail at law; whereupon the champertor is to carry on the party's suit at his own expense." The common-law notions of champerty and maintenance have never fully obtained in this country, because the reason upon which they were founded in England did not exist here.

In the case of Slywright v. Pages, 1 Leon. 167, it was said by the whole court of common pleas that the meaning of the statute of 32 Hen. VIII., concerning maintenance, was "to repress the practices of many who, when they thought they had title or right to any land, for the furtherance of their pretended right conveyed their interest in some part thereof to great persons, and with their countenance did oppress the possessors." Blackstone speaks of the offense of champerty as "perverting the process of law into an engine of oppression." The same reasons were given for the rule of the common law that a chose in action could not be assigned. "Nothing," says Coke, "in action, entry, and re-entry can be granted over, for or under color thereof pretended titles might be granted to great men whereby right might be trodden down and the weak oppressed." Co. Litt. 14a. It has been well remarked that feeble, partial, and corrupt must have been the administration of justice when such a reason could have force. Thallhimer v. Brinckerhoff, 3 Cow. 643. The rule that a chose in action cannot be assigned has long since been exploded, because the reason upon which it rested has ceased to exist. And the ideas of the guilt of champerty and maintenance have measurably disappeared, and generally it is not now considered in this country a crime to aid the lawful suit of another with money and services, in consideration of a share in the recovery. Thallhimer v. Brinckerhoff, supra; Lytle v. State, 17 Ark. 608; Bayard v. McLane, 3 Har. (Del.) 139.

Where the government is defendant, the grounds upon which the offense of champerty were supposed to rest cannot, in the nature of the case, exist. In such cases as the one under consideration, the government invites the suits of her citizens having lawful claims, and is in no danger of suffering injustice, no matter how great and influential those are who are aiding in their prosecution. The objection that the contract under consideration is champertous cannot therefore prevail. It seems to me clear that the district court, in making the decree now under review, did right in directing the payment of the compensation of Harris & Harris and Bartley & Casey out of the fund. Maybin, when competent to contract, had agreed to pay them this compensation, and they had, without objection by the assignee, rendered the services and accomplished the object for which the allowance was made. Therefore, unless some obstacle appears in the consideration of other questions raised in the case, that part of the decree of the district court under consideration ought to be affirmed, and the petition of review filed by Raymond dismissed.

The questions referred to are made by the counsel for Maybin upon his petition to review so much of the decree of the district court as allowed Adam & Speed and Jenner the sum of seventeen thousand five hundred and fifty-two dollars. The objections upon which the counsel for Maybin rely reach to the entire decree of the district court. They assert that the district court had no jurisdiction to make the decree. They claim this on several grounds: First. Because the proceeding in bankruptcy was completed and concluded before Raymond was authorized to prosecute the claim in the court of claims, and that the court had therefore no authority to make that order or any subsequent order in the bankruptcy. This view is based on the alleged fact that the bankrupt Maybin, having been discharged about the 25th of January, 1870, Raymond, his assignee, was subsequently, but soon after, also discharged, and that this ended and closed the bankruptcy proceedings, and all proceedings thereafter in said bankruptcy were without jurisdiction and void. If the facts as claimed were borne out by the record, I should feel inclined to hold on this point with the attorneys for Maybin. But as I read the record, Raymond never was discharged as assignee. It is true a discharge written upon a printed blank, without date and signed by the register, is found among the files of the bankruptcy of Maybin, and doubtless this discharge was signed by the register soon after the date of the discharge of the bankrupt himself. But it appears farther from the record that on April 10, 1873, Raymond filed a petition in the district court, in which he represented that he was embarrassed, in the performance of his duty as assignee, by the said paper purporting to be his discharge as assignee; that said paper was signed without being applied for; that the date was purposely omitted, and that it was inadvertently put by the register among the papers in the cause, when they were returned into court.

Upon this petition the court acted, and found that said discharge was inadvertently made and filed in said cause, and ordered it to be annulled. The mere inadvertent filing of a discharge among the records of a cause does not paralyze a court and put an end to the case. A court at any time, on the truth being made to appear, would have the power to order such a paper to be stricken from the files. "A court has power at a subsequent term to set right mere forms in its judgments, to correct misprisions of its clerks, and to correct any mere clerical errors so as to conform the record to the truth." Bank v. Labitut [Case No. 842]. When, therefore, it was made to appear that the discharge of an assignee had inadvertently found its way among the files of the court, the court had power to order the paper to stand for naught, and the assignee to proceed in the discharge of his duties; and this the court did. The assignee was, therefore, in fact never discharged.

Second. It is further claimed, that the discharge of the bankrupt on January 25, 1870, was an adjudication that he had surrendered all his property for the benefit of his creditors, and that the assignee had no right, although he might afterwards discover property of the bankrupt which the bankrupt had failed to put upon his schedules, to bring it into the bankruptcy without first setting aside the discharge of the bankrupt; that this had never been done, and that the time within which it could be done had elapsed. I do not think that the discharge of a bankrupt was intended to have the effect claimed. Generally, a bankrupt may apply for his discharge at any time after the expiration of six months, and if no debts have been proved and no assets have come to the hands of the assignee, he may apply after the expiration of sixty days from the adjudication. A discharge once granted can only be annulled on the ground of fraud. Rev. St. §§ 5110, 5120. So that if the theory under consideration is correct, where a bankrupt inadvertently omits property from his schedule and gets his discharge fairly, newly-discovered assets can never be reached by the assignee, because the discharge can never be set aside. An interpretation of the law which leads to such results must surely be unsound. The fact is, that the adjudication of bankruptcy vests in the assignee the title to all property of the bankrupt not exempt, whether the same is placed on the schedules or not; and, without reference to the discharge of the bankrupt, it is the duty of the assignee to collect the assets, and apply them to the payment of the debts, and the discharge of the bankrupt interposes no obstacle to the performance of this duty.

Third. It is claimed that if the assignee acquired any right to the claim of Maybin against the United States, he is barred of that right because he did not prosecute it within two years; that is to say, because he did not have himself substituted for Maybin as plaintiff in the suit pending in the court of claims until after the expiration of two years from his appointment as assignee. Rev. St. § 5057. If it be conceded that under the circumstances the assignee was barred, it seems clear that Maybin cannot now avail himself of that fact. The limitation is for the benefit of defendants in the actions prosecuted by the assignee. If the limitation of the statute was effectual to bar the assignee, the United States might have set up the bar. But that was not done; after the suit of the assignee has been allowed to progress to judgment, and the money has been collected by him, it seems to be too late for the bankrupt to intervene and set up the bar of the statute. I am of opinion, therefore, that none of the grounds relied on by counsel for Maybin, to show that the district court had no jurisdiction to make the decree complained of, are well taken.

This brings up the merits of the revisory petition filed by Maybin. The petition claims that the allowance by the district court to Adam & Speed and Jenner of seventeen thousand five hundred and fifty-two dollars and fifty cents was not justified, and I think the objection to this allowance is sustained by the facts of the case. It is made perfectly clear by the record that the court, when it authorized Raymond, the assignee, to employ an attorney to prosecute the claim of the bankrupt against the United States, for the compensation of one-half the amount recovered, did so in ignorance of the facts of the case; and that this ignorance resulted from the suppression by the assignee of facts which must have been known to him, and the fact of such suppression was known to the attorneys with whom he subsequently contracted. It is not to be supposed that if the court had been advised that the claim of Maybin was already in course of prosecution in the court of claims, and almost ready for judgment, and that the attorneys prosecuting the claim had a contract with Maybin for one-half the amount to be recovered for their compensation, that under these circumstances the court would have authorized the employment of other counsel for the assignee, who was to receive the other half of the money for their services. The petition filed by the assignee for authority to employ counsel left the court in the dark as to the real state of the case; and the order of the court allowing the assignee to employ counsel who were to receive one-half the recovery for their services was not binding upon the court or the parties.

But aside from this, the services which Adam & Speed contracted to render, and for which they were to receive one-half the amount recovered by them, were never rendered. What were the services they agreed to perform? The petition of the assignee for authority to employ counsel represented that among the assets of the bankrupt there was a claim against the United States for cotton taken from bankrupt's plantation; that in the prosecution of said claim it would be necessary to employ counsel; that it was customary in such cases for the claimant to enter into contract with the attorney to pay him for his services in the collection of the same fifty per centum of the amount recovered, the claimant to be at no further expense in making said collection; and the petition prayed that the petitioner be authorized to employ counsel to prosecute the claim on the said terms, and the court authorized the contract to be made as prayed for in the petition. In pursuance of this authority the assignee, on the same day the authority was given, entered into a contract in writing with Adam & Speed and Jenner, by which they agreed "to prosecute and recover a certain claim or debt due and owing to the estate of said bankrupt by and from the United States, for and on account of cotton taken from bankrupt's plantation during the Rebellion." And the assignee agreed to pay them one-half the amount recovered for their services.

From all this it appears that what Adam & Speed and Jenner were employed to do, and what they agreed to do, and for the doing of which they were to receive one-half the amount recovered, was to prosecute and recover the claim against the United States. This they did not do, nor did they assist in doing. The record shows that the suit against the United States was prosecuted solely by Harris & Harris and their associates, and it fails to show any service performed by Adam & Speed and Jenner, or either of them, toward the recovery of the judgment against the United States. Adam & Speed and Jenner did perform services for the assignee about the claim, but they were not the services contemplated by the order of the court or by the contract between the assignee and them. These services were the procuring the substitution of the assignee as plaintiff in the court of claims in place of the bankrupt, and having Jenner substituted as attorney of record for plaintiff in place of Bartley & Casey. Doubtless these services were valuable to the estate of the bankrupt. They prevented the fund when recovered from going into the hands of Maybin, the bankrupt, and secured the possession of it to Raymond, the assignee. But the prosecution of the claim and the recovery of the money from the United States, by the final judgment of the supreme court, was done by Harris & Harris and their associates, and not by Adam & Speed and Jenner. It never entered into the contemplation of the court that Adam & Speed and Jenner were to be paid fifty per cent. of the recovery for preventing the fund from going into the possession of the bankrupt, and that the other fifty per cent. was to be paid to the attorneys of the bankrupt for their services in recovering the fund as against the United States.

In my opinion Adam & Speed and Jenner cannot claim under said contract: (1) Because the authority to make it was conferred by the court without a knowledge of the facts which the assignee must have known, and was bound to communicate; and (2) because none of the services contemplated by the order of the court and the contract between Adam & Speed and Jenner were performed. The services actually rendered were not those for which the assignee was authorized by the court to pay fifty per cent. of the recovery. But nevertheless Adam & Speed and Jenner have performed a valuable service to the bankrupt's estate, and they should be paid for such services what they are reasonably worth.

The result of my views is, that the petition of review filed by John B. Raymond, assignee, must be dismissed at the costs of the bankrupt estate, and that so much of the decree as directs the payment to Harris & Harris and Bartley & Casey of thirty-four thousand five hundred and twenty-five dollars and fifty-four cents must be affirmed. That so much of the revisory petition filed by J. W. Maybin as complains of the order directing the payment to Adam & Speed and Jenner of seventeen thousand five hundred and fifty-two dollars and fifty cents by said assignee be sustained, and so much of said decree as directs the payment to said attorneys of said sum be reversed; and that the district court be required to ascertain in such manner as shall seem to it most proper what sum of money is due to Adam & Speed and Jenner for their services in the premises, and to direct the payment to them of such sum out of the fund.

TRIAL—NOTICE TO PRODUCE PAPERS — JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT—EVIDENCE—WRITTEN INSTRUMENT—SECONDARY AFFIDAVIT.

1. Judgment by default, for not producing at the trial a paper which the defendant has been notified to produce, cannot be rendered unless there is a previous order of the court to produce it, founded upon a motion and notice.

[Cited in Gregory v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 10 Fed. 530.]

[See Bank of U. S. v. Kurtz, Case No. 920; Bas v. Steele, Id. 1,088.]

2. Before secondary evidence of a written instrument can be given, the court must be satisfied by the affidavit of the party offering it, or otherwise, that the supposed original paper did once exist, and that it is not in his power to produce it.

Replevin. Rent arrear, and issue.

The plaintiff, having given notice to the defendant to produce the original, offered to read in evidence to the jury, a copy of a paper in the handwriting of the deceased subscribing witness.

Mr. Taney, for defendant, objected; stating that his client had not the original.

THE COURT (nem. con.) decided that the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment by default, under the 15th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 73), because he had not given notice of a motion to the court for an order to compel the defendant to produce the paper. And that the plaintiff must lay the foundation for his secondary evidence, by satisfying the court by his own affidavit, or otherwise, that the original once existed, and that it was not in his power to produce it.

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Jan. 7, 1879.

STATUTES—TITLE—ATTACHMENTS—BODY OF ACT—REPEAL BY IMPLICATION.

1. The subject of an act is expressed in the title thereof, although the provisions in the act concerning the subject may be different from what may be inferred from or suggested by such title.

2. A provision in an act concerning the dissolution of attachments is a matter properly connected with the "subject" of disposing of an insolvent debtor's property.

[Cited in Hahn v. Salmon, 20 Fed. 810.]

3. Where the title of an act states that it is to provide a just disposition of an insolvent debtor's property, it cannot be maintained that the "subject" of the act is not expressed in the title, because the disposition of such property provided for in the body of the act is, in the opinion of the court, not just.

4. A repeal by implication is as much within the purview of section 22 of article 4 of the constitution of Oregon, and the mischief intended to be prevented by it, as an amendment in terms; but it appearing that the supreme court of the state has decided otherwise, this court follows such decision.

Action [by Daniel Mayer against E. Cahalin] to recover money.

John W. Whalley and M. W. Fechheimer, for plaintiff.

Joseph N. Dolph and Raleigh Stott, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This action is brought by the plaintiff, a citizen of California, against the defendant, to recover the sum of seven thousand nine hundred and sixty-seven dollars and ninety-three cents, the balance due upon certain goods, wares and merchandise theretofore sold and delivered to him. On December 23, 1878, the plaintiff sued out an attachment, upon which the marshal took the defendant's stock in trade into his possession.

The defendant now moves to dissolve the attachment, upon the ground that on December 30, 1878, he made an assignment of all his property, of the value of twelve thousand nine hundred and seventy-nine dollars and fifty-five cents, to an assignee for the benefit of all his creditors, in proportion to the amount of their several claims amounting in the aggregate to twenty-one thousand three hundred and thirty-eight dollars and fifty-two cents, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to secure creditors a just division of the estates of debtors who convey to assignees for the benefit of creditors," approved October 18, 1878; and that on January 7, 1879, the assignee aforesaid demanded of the marshal the property taken on said attachment, which he refused to surrender.

This act (Sess. Laws 1878, p. 36) provides that no general assignment for the benefit of creditors shall be valid unless made for the benefit of all the creditors pro rata; and that "such assignments shall have the effect to discharge any and all attachments on which judgment shall not have been taken at the date of such assignment." It may be remarked, in passing, that judgments are not taken on attachments, but are given in actions wherein attachments may be or have been issued.

By section 933 of the Revised Statutes an attachment of property in the national courts to satisfy any judgment that may be recovered therein, "shall be dissolved when any contingency occurs by which, according to the laws of the state where said court is held, such attachment would be dissolved upon like process in the courts of the state."

Upon this section counsel for the plaintiff admits that if the act of October 18, 1878, aforesaid, is valid, this motion must prevail; but maintains that this act is unconstitutional and void because (1) it was passed in contravention of section 20 of article 4 of the constitution—the subject thereof not being expressed in the title; and (2) it was passed in contravention of section 22 of said article—certain sections of the Code on the subject of attachments being thereby amended without being set forth and published at full length.

The first objection is sought to be maintained by showing that while the "subject" expressed in the title of the act is the just division of a debtor's property among his creditors—in effect, the body of the act provides for or permits a very unjust distribution of said property. For instance, while it provides that an assignment shall dissolve an attachment, it leaves judgments by confession, which may have been made in the mean time, or at any time, for the very purpose of preventing a just distribution of the property, in full force. Upon these judgments, executions may issue and be levied upon all the property of a debtor, and leave nothing for the assignment to operate on—its only effect in such case being to dissolve the attachment for the benefit of the creditors who have, with the assistance of the debtor, obtained judgments by confession. Besides, it provides that the assignment shall not pass any property not mentioned in the inventory, thus leaving such property liable to be taken on attachment by any creditor after the assignment. The effect of this is practically to invite and legalize a partial and fraudulent compliance with the act itself.

Evidently the object of the act was to prohibit insolvent debtors from preferring one creditor to another, and so far it is not obnoxious to the charge that its subject is not expressed in its title. But it must be admitted that in practice it will not accomplish such purpose, and that most probably it will operate as counsel contend—to secure an unequal, and, therefore, an unjust, distribution of a debtor's property.

But I do not think that a court can say that the "subject" of an act is not expressed in its title because it may appear that, owing to unintentional errors and imperfections in its composition, its practical operation may be somewhat or altogether different from what was expressed or intended. Besides, what constitutes a just distribution of a debtor's property is a subject about which a variety of opinions may be entertained, and as to which there is no absolute or fixed standard to which we may refer as authority.

The "subject" of this act is the distribution of an insolvent debtor's property among his creditors in a certain contingency, and beyond a doubt so much is expressed in the title. It also purports that such distribution is just—that is, according to the understanding of the legislative assembly—which I do not think is subject to judicial review.

It is also urged against the act under this head, that the "subject" of attachments is not expressed in the title, though embraced in the body of the act, and, therefore, it is so far void. But I think the dissolution of attachments is certainly a "matter properly connected" with the "subject" of the distribution of an insolvent debtor's property—particularly in a country where such property may be liable to attachment at the suit of a creditor—and, therefore, need not be otherwise expressed in the title.

As to the second objection: Section 22, aforesaid, provides that "no act shall ever be revised or amended by mere reference to its title, but the act revised, or section amended, shall be set forth and published at full length." In answer to this objection, counsel for the defendant insist (1) that the act in question does not amend any existing act; and (2) that if it does, it is only by implication, and such an amendment is not within the purview of this provision of the constitution as construed by the supreme court of this state; citing Fleischner v. Chadwick, 5 Or. 153; Grant Co. v. Sels, Id. 243; Hurst v. Hawn, Id. 279.

I think the act does amend the Code as to the effect and discharge of attachments. It is not merely cumulative, as was the case in State v. Berry, 12 Iowa, 59, cited by counsel for defendant. It changes, limits and restrains the operation of section 142 of the Code so that the property taken on an attachment is no longer held as an absolute "security for the satisfaction of such judgment" as the plaintiff may obtain, but only upon condition the defendant in the meantime does not make an assignment, which he is almost certain to do, unless he is in collusion or friendly co-operation with the attaching creditor. The same is true of section

159. In effect this section by a reference to sections 128, 129, provides that an attachment shall not be discharged or dissolved unless it satisfactorily appears that there was not sufficient cause for its allowance—that it was issued wrongfully. But this act provides that it shall be discharged if the debtor makes an assignment before judgment.

In short, the provisions of the Code in relation to the effect of an attachment upon property taken thereon as security for a judgment and the dissolution thereof prior to judgment and the provisions of the act cannot co-exist. The application of one to the subject necessarily excludes the other. They are plainly repugnant to one another. The provisions of the Code are by this act rendered null and of no effect whenever the defendant wills it to be so.

Upon the question of whether the act was passed contrary to section 20 aforesaid, counsel for the plaintiff insist that the decisions of the supreme court of the state cited from 5 Or., supra, are not in point; that they only decide that a statute may be repealed by implication, but not that it may be so amended. But in Grant Co. v. Sels, which is the case most relied on, while the court speaks of a repeal by implication, and not an amendment, the facts of the case, by the light of which the language of the court is always to be read, show that it was a case of an amendment of a section, and not the repeal of a statute.

In City of Portland v. Stock, 2 Or. 70, and Dolan v. Barnard, 5 Or. 391, the court held the amending act void. But in each of these cases the act purported to be an amendatory one. Yet in City of Portland v. Stock no weight is attached to that fact, and the supposed difference between repeals in terms and by implication is not even noticed. Neither is any significance attached to the fact in Dolan v. Barnard, where the act under consideration is said to be "not only amendatory in terms," but so "in its nature and effect."

For myself, I have a decided conviction upon the question. I agree heartily with the able dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Bonham in Grant Co. v. Sels, and especially when he says: "It is, in my judgment, wholly immaterial whether the act is eo nomine amendatory or not; the evil against which the constitutional provision in question was directed, is amendments which are such in effect, and is not limited to those which are so named in the title or preamble of the act."

It is said that the constitution is silent upon the subject of implied repeals. But it is no more silent upon that subject than upon repeal in terms. The fact is it speaks specifically of neither, but uses the term "amend" without qualification or limitation, and thereby includes both modes of amendment or repeal, and one just as much as the other. As I read it, the constitution does not contemplate any such immaterial distinctions as amendments in terms and by implication. In effect it says that an amendment of a statute shall not be valid unless the section amended is set forth and published at length. The evil intended to be prevented by this section of the constitution is a very serious one, and unless amendments by implication, which are more mischievous than those in terms, are held to be within its purview, the provision is practically nullified. The average legislator will never take the risk or trouble of amending a statute by name, when he can avoid both by doing it by implication—without professing to do so.

But while I have felt at liberty to throw out these suggestions on the subject, my duty is to follow the ruling of the supreme court of the state upon a question involving the construction of the constitution of the state. And while there may be some ground for the argument, that as the last case on this subject decided by the supreme court—Dolan v. Barnard, supra—ignores the distinction between repeals in terms and by implication, yet, I think, that that being a case in which the act purported to be amendatory, I am not at liberty to assume that the case of Grant Co. v. Sels, supra, is thereby overruled, and must, therefore, hold upon the authority of that decision that this act is valid. This being so, the attachment is dissolved; and it is so ordered.

MAYER v. FOULKROD et al.

[4 Wash. C. C. 349.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1823.

ADMINISTRATOR—EQUITY—REMEDY AT LAW—ADEQUATE AND COMPLETE—JUDICIARY ACT—PRACTICE IN EQUITY—TITLES TO LAND.

1. An executor or administrator is not an assignee, within the meaning of the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 78].

2. It is not sufficient to oust the jurisdiction of the equity side of the court, that the plaintiff has a remedy on the common law side; unless it appear that such remedy be adequate and complete to the object of the suit.

[Cited in Baker v. Biddle, Case No. 764.]

3. Although a legatee has a remedy at common law, by the law of Pennsylvania; this does not oust the equity jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States; to effect that, the common law side of those courts must be able to afford full, complete, and adequate remedy.

[Cited in Domestic & Foreign Missionary Soc. v. Gaither, 62 Fed. 423.]

4. The thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act applies only to the rights of persons and of property, and in those cases the state laws furnish rules of decision, which the federal courts must observe. But as to remedies and modes of proceeding at common law, they are fixed by the act of the 8th of May, 1792, c. 137 [2 Bior. & D. Laws, 299; 1 Stat. 275, c. 36] to be such as were then used in those courts, in conformity with the act of the 29th of September 1789 [1 Stat. 93].

[Cited in U. S. v. Wonson, Case No. 16,750.]

5. But the equity practice and mode of proceeding was fixed by the act of 1792, subject only to be changed by rules of those courts, or of the supreme court, and cannot be affected by state laws, either prior or subsequent to the act of 1792.

6. If a state law shall declare that to be a legal title, which without such a declaration would be considered only an equivalent one, the federal courts may afford a common law remedy to enforce it, but without excluding the equitable jurisdiction of the court in a case proper for it.

Bill on the equity side of the court, setting forth that John A. Holt, by his last will, devised to his wife all his real estate during her life, and after her death, he directs that the said real estate shall be let out for a yearly rent, to be paid to his daughter during her life, and after her decease, that the said estate should be sold at public auction by his executors, and that the proceeds thereof should be divided amongst his grandchildren, share and share alike, except that his grandson Michael Cooper should have two shares. That after the death of the widow and daughter, George Foulkrod, the surviving executor, sold a certain tract of land, part of the testator's estate, for the sum of $12,000. That the said Lewis Benner, a citizen of the state of Maryland, previous to the death of the widow of the testator, purchased from four of the grandsons, (of whom M. Cooper was one) five eighths of the real estate of the testator, or the proceeds thereof, which was duly assigned, transferred, and set over to him; that the plaintiff, who is the administrator of the said Benner, is a citizen of the said state of Maryland, and the defendants are citizens of this state. The prayer of the bill is, that the defendants [Jacob Foulkrod and others], who are administrators of George Foulkrod, the surviving executor of Holt, may discover which real estates of Holt had been sold, and to what amount, and may pay to the plaintiff five eighth parts of the proceeds of such sales. The bill does not state that the legatees from whom Benner bought were citizens of a state other than Pennsylvania. To this bill the defendants demurred for want of equity, and that all the matters stated in the bill are properly triable at law, where full, adequate, and complete remedy may be had.

Mr. Rawle, in support of the demurrer, contended:

1. That, upon general principles, a court of law can afford a remedy for the recovery of a pecuniary legacy, and consequently a court of equity cannot entertain jurisdiction in such cases by the express prohibition contained in the sixteenth section of the judiciary law.

2. That admitting the law to be otherwise, still the plaintiff has a full, adequate, and complete remedy at law, under the provisions of an act of assembly of this state, passed in the year 1772. See 1 Smith's Laws, 383. This act declares that it shall be lawful for a person to whom any bequest of money or other goods and chattels shall be made by will, to prosecute an action upon the case, debt, detinue, or account render, as the case may require, for such legacy, after it becomes due, in any of the county courts for holding pleas in any county of the province; and if it shall appear that the legacy is due, and that there are assets sufficient in the hands of the executor, &c. to discharge the debts of the testator, and the legacy so bequeathed, the plaintiff shall recover, &c. The law then provides for abatement in cases where there are not assets sufficient to pay all the legacies; and in case the defendant should plead a want of assets, the court is directed to appoint auditors to examine the accounts of the executors, and to report thereon, and also the proportion of the assets remaining, after payment of the debts, to which the plaintiff is entitled, for which judgment is to be rendered. But to enable the plaintiff to maintain such action, he must have first made a reasonable demand of the executor, accompanied by an offer of two sufficient sureties to be bound to the executor, in double the sum claimed, to refund in case a deficiency of assets to pay debts and other legacies should afterwards appear, which refunding bond, if the executor refuse to receive, the plaintiff is to file with the clerk of the court. It was contended that not only is the plaintiff's remedy under this law complete and adequate, but it guards the executor against future responsibility, by requiring a refunding bond to be given by the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff ought therefore to have pursued his remedy under this law. The courts of the United States take notice of the laws of the states, and shape the remedies in those courts accordingly; as was done in the case of Sims v. Irvine [3 Dall. (3 U. S.) 425], and is the daily practice in this court where suits are entertained in the name of the assignee of a bond, on the ground that bonds are made assignable by the laws of this state.

It was denied that the ground of jurisdiction is rendered stronger by the circumstance that the suit is brought by the administrator of an assignee of a chose in action, as courts of law entertain suits by such assignees, in the name of the assignor, and take notice of, and guard the interest of such assignees with the same care they would do could the suit be maintained in his own name.

3. That this court is precluded from taking cognizance of this cause by the eleventh section of the judiciary act; the legatees, by whom the assignment was made, being citizens of this state, or not stated to be citizens of a state other than this, are consequently disqualified to sue in this court. Sere v. Pitot, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 332; Chappedelaine v. Dechenaux, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 306.

4. Another objection was made to the form of the bill, in not stating that the defendant had refused, or neglected to settle his accounts, or, if rendered, that they were untruly or fraudulently settled.

In answer to the first and second objections, the plaintiff's counsel relied upon 2 Fonbl. 321; Deeks v. Strutt, 5 Term R. 690; Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 321; U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 108; Campbell v. Claudius, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 494; U. S. v. Wonson [Case No. 16,750]; 1 Call, 391; Telfair v. Stead, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 409.

To the third objection it was answered that the administrator is not an assignee within the meaning of the eleventh section of the judiciary law, and that upon this point the cases of Sere v. Pitot, and Chappedelaine v Dechenaux, are conclusive.

Condy & Dundass, for plaintiff.

Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The objections to the jurisdiction are: (1) To the general jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States in cases like the present, on the ground that the plaintiff, claiming as assignee of the legacies in dispute, the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is excluded by the eleventh section of the judiciary law, unless it appear upon the face of the proceedings that the court could have taken cognizance of the cause in case no assignment had been made, and the assignor had brought the suit. (2) To the jurisdiction of the equity side of this court, upon the ground that the plaintiff has an adequate and complete remedy at law in respect to the matter in dispute.

1. The objection to the general jurisdiction of the court was considered so clearly untenable by the supreme court in Chappedelaine v. Dechenaux, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 306, that the counsel, when proceeding to discuss it, were stopped by the court. This decision came afterwards under the notice of the court in Sere v. Pitot, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 332, and was then more deliberately considered. The opinion there given was, that the eleventh section of the judiciary law, which was relied upon, does not apply to the case of an executor or administrator who is an alien, or citizen of another state than that in which the suit is brought, because "they are not usually designated by the term assignees, and are therefore not within the words of the act." These cases so entirely refute the objection under consideration, that a further examination of it is rendered altogether unnecessary.

2. The grounds of the objection to the jurisdiction of the equity side of the court are: (1) That, upon general principles, a court of law can afford to a legatee a remedy is for the recovery of his legacy; but if not, still, under the act of assembly of this state, which was referred to, a legislative remedy is expressly provided, full, adequate, and complete.

1. In support of the first ground upon which this objection is rested, the learned counsel cited no case upon which he ventured to reply. Could it even be made to appear that courts of law have afforded a remedy in cases of this kind, it would not follow that the jurisdiction of the equity side of this court is excluded, either by the general principles which regulate the jurisdiction of a court of chancery, or by the positive provision contained in the sixteenth section of the judiciary law, which does no more than affirm the general principle. It is not sufficient to show that the plaintiff in equity has a remedy at law, in order to turn him out of that court, unless the defendant can go further, and prove that that remedy is complete, and fully adequate to the object of the suit. Upon what other ground is it that the jurisdiction of the chancery court stands undisputed by all other courts, in cases of account, dower, partition, rents and profits, lost deeds, and a variety of others, in which the courts of law afford a remedy, but that the remedy falls short of that which a court of equity can grant? Amongst the numerous cases which might be cited in affirmance of the jurisdiction of courts of equity over the particular subject of this suit, it may be sufficient to refer to that of Atkins v. Hill, Cowp. 284, for the purpose of seeing the opinion of Lord Mansfield, who, it is well known, was disposed to go to the very verge of the common law jurisdiction, if not beyond the mark which separated it from the ancient and well established jurisdiction of the courts of equity. He observes that "the discovery and account given in a court of equity is so preferable a remedy, that it has drawn all such suitors (legatees) thither; and therefore, in fact, there is scarce an instance of a legatee attempting to sue at law." "The relief given by a court of equity, is easier and better." See, also, 2 Madd. 2; 2 Fonbl. 321; Herbert v. Wren, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 370, 376.

But it is not true that courts of law do afford a remedy for the recovery of a legacy, unless in a case where the executor, under certain circumstances, assumes to pay it. In the case above referred to of Atkins v. Hill, the declaration set forth a promise by the executor to pay the legacy, in consideration of assets having come to his hands, more than sufficient to pay all the just debts and legacies of the testator; and the opinion of the court, in support of the action, proceeded upon the ground of this promise, made, as the court decided, upon a sufficient consideration. The case of Hawkes v. Saunders, which followed immediately after the above, Cowp. 289, is precisely like it, as are indeed the more ancient cases referred to by Mr. J. Butler. But it will be observed, that, in all these cases, the nature of the demand was changed, on account of the promise, from what it would have been, had the action been founded merely upon the bequest in the will; the judgment in the former, being de bonis propriis; whereas in the latter, it must have been de bonis testatoris, in case such an action could be supported. The general question, whether an action at law will lie for a legacy, came to be afterwards considered when Lord Kenyon was chief justice, in the case of Deeks v. Strutt, 5 Term R. 690, in which the court decided that the action would not lie; and the superiority of the remedy in equity was much relied upon by the judges, as a reason for not sustaining an action, which they considered to be without a precedent, except one which was decided in the time of the commonwealth, and which could only be justified by the circumstance that, at that time, no remedy existed in any other court. Although the declaration in Deeks v. Strutt, stated a promise by the executor, yet none was proved at the trial, and the court was of opinion that, from the mere circumstance of the executor having a sufficiency of assets, a promise to pay the legacy could not be implied by law. In the case now before the court, it is not stated in the bill that the executor had, at any time, promised to pay to the plaintiff the legacies demanded, but the reverse; nor even that the defendant has assets sufficient to pay all the debts and legacies of the testator. In respect to the amount to which the plaintiff may be entitled, the bill seeks a discovery, and prays for an account, those incidents (as Lord Mansfield observes in the case of Atkins v. Hill) to the equity jurisprudence, upon which the court of chancery claimed to hold plea of legacies. But even if a promise in consideration of assets were stated to have been made, still the equity jurisdiction of this court would not be excluded, as we believe has been abundantly shown by what has already been said. See, also, Blount v. Bestland, 5 Ves. 516.

2. The next reason relied upon for excluding this case from the equity jurisdiction of the court is the act of assembly of this state, before referred to. Let it be admitted, for the present, that, under this act, an action at law may be maintained in this court for the recovery of a legacy; still it would not follow that the equity jurisdiction of the court would be excluded, since the remedy, provided by the act, is not complete or adequate. For where, let us ask, could this court, in such an action, find the power to compel the executor to discover the amount of the assets which came to his hands?—The disposition which he had made of them?—The title papers of the real estate of the testator which he was empowered to sell?—The particular tracts of land sold by him under the power, and the amount for which they were sold? Where would we find the authority to impose upon the parties such equitable terms as the court might deem proper for the safety of the parties, and for the due administration of justice? It is obvious, in short, that the legal remedy contemplated by this act, although as complete, perhaps, as could well be exercised by a court of law, falls far short of that full, complete, and adequate remedy, which the legislature of the Union intended should oust the equity jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. As to the refunding bond for the security of the executor, equity always decrees it to be given.

If the counsel for the defendant meant to argue that, because the plaintiff might have maintained an action in the state court for the recovery of this legacy, therefore the equity jurisdiction of this court is ousted, we must protest against the doctrine. This case is clearly within the jurisdiction of this court. No objection can be made to the jurisdiction of the equity side of it, but that there is complete and adequate remedy on the other side of this court. It is no argument to say that the plaintiff may have such a remedy, (could it even be truly said,) in the state court. The conclusive answer is, that the plaintiff is under no obligation to resort to that jurisdiction. But we cannot admit (which has been conceded merely for the purpose of the argument just disposed of) that the common law and equity jurisdiction of the courts of the United States may be affected by state laws, which provide remedies for the state courts; or which prescribe their practice. The thirty-fourth section of the judiciary law of 1789, is very correctly stated by the court in the case of U. S. v. Wonson [Case No. 16,750], to apply only to the rights of persons and of property. In relation to these subjects, the courts of the United States are bound to consider them as rules for their decision, in cases where they apply; except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States may otherwise require or provide. As to the modes of process in suits at common law, the act of the 29th of September 1789, declared that they should be the same in each state respectively, as were then used, or allowed in the supreme courts of the same. And by the act of the 8th of May, 1792, c. 137, it is provided, that the forms and modes of proceeding in suits, in those of common law, shall be the same as were then used in the courts of the United States respectively, in pursuance of the above act; in those of equity, according to the principles, rules and usages which belong to courts of equity, as distinguished from courts of common law, subject to such alterations and additions as the said courts should deem expedient, or to such regulations as the supreme court might prescribe.

From these acts it results, that state laws, respecting rights, are to be considered by the courts of the United States as rules of decision; and that the modes and forms of proceeding at common law, as used by those courts in 1792, could not be altered, or in any manner affected by state laws regulating the course of proceedings and practice of the state courts, unless they should be adopted by the courts of the United States. But as to suits in equity, state laws, in respect to remedies, whether prior or subsequent to the act of 1792, could have no effect whatever on the jurisdiction of the court, the act having prescribed a rule, by which the line of partition between the law and the equity jurisdiction of those courts is distinctly marked. It follows therefore, that if a state law should declare that to be a legal title, which, upon general principles recognized by courts of equity, would be considered as an equitable one, the courts of the United States would afford a legal remedy, suited to the case, to enforce it, without excluding at the same time the concurrent jurisdiction of the equity side of the court; if such a jurisdiction could be asserted as belonging to that side of the court. It was upon this ground that the supreme court sustained the legal remedy by ejectment in the case of Sims v. Irvine [supra]; the common law of this state being, that a warrant, survey, and purchase money paid, constitutes a legal right of entry. Upon the same ground it is, that this court entertains actions by assignees of choses of action, which the laws of the state permit to be assigned. But because the state courts, from a necessity, which the want of a court of chancery induces, entertain actions at law upon equitable rights; or because a statute of the state shall authorise such suits, it does not follow that such practice or such laws, can affect the marked distinction between legal and equitable remedies in the courts of the United States. The only inquiry here must be, what are the principles, usages, and rules of courts of equity, as distinguished from courts of common law, and (to borrow the expressions of the supreme court in the case of Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 212) "defined in that country, from which we derive our knowledge of those principles." The case just referred to, is indeed an authority which so completely covers the present subject of inquiry, as to render the further investigation of it superfluous, and we shall merely add to that authority, the decision of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 108; which is conclusive, not only of this particular point, but of the question respecting the general jurisdiction of a court of equity, in a case where there is a remedy at law, though not as complete as that which a court of equity can offer. We think it unnecessary to prolong this opinion by noticing the alleged defects in the bill, being clearly of opinion that they do not deserve to be so called. The demurrer must be overruled, and the defendant ordered to answer.

[The defendants answered the bill, and the cause was subsequently heard upon bill and answer. The bill was dismissed. Case No. 9,342.]

JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA—BAR — PARTIES — ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—COMPROMISE.

1. If a defendant, acting bona fide, and without connivance with the plaintiff to enable him to obtain a judgment, is compelled by the judgment to pay what another, and not that plaintiff is entitled to, he may, in an action by that other against him to recover the money a second time, plead the former judgment in bar for his own protection. The money so recovered by the first judgment, is to be considered as recovered to the use of the real owner, who may maintain assumpsit against him for money had and received.

2. In what cases a compromise made by an attorney at law, will or will not bind a client.

[In this case a demurrer to the bill was overruled in Case No. 9,341.]

Condy & Dundas, for plaintiff.
Mr. Rowle, for defendant.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The bill states that John A. Holt, by his last will, devised all his real estate to his wife during her life, and after her decease, that the profits of the same should be enjoyed by his daughter, Catherine Sheneck, during her life; and after her death the said real estate to be sold by his executors, and the money thence arising to be equally divided amongst the grandchildren of the testator then living, share and share alike, except his grandson, Michael Cooper, who was to have two shares. That the testator died in the year 1788, and his will was proved by his executors therein named, (of whom George Foulkrod was one,) who took upon themselves the burthen of executing the same. That Catherine Sheneck, the daughter, died in the year 1808, and the widow of the testator in the year 1792. That at the time of the death of the widow and the daughter, the following grandchildren of the testator were living: that is to say, Mary C. Sheneck who intermarried with Lewis Benner, the plaintiff's intestate, Elizabeth Sheneck who intermarried with John Darr, Michael Cooper, Adam Sheneck, Jacob Sheneck, Sophia Sheneck who intermarried with Jacob Luntz, and Barbara Sheneck who intermarried with Michael Knurr. That on the 4th of April, 1809, George Foulkrod, the surviving executor, sold the real estate of the testator pursuant to his will, for the sum of $12,000, which he received. In the years 1799 and 1801, Cooper, Adam and Jacob Sheneck severally assigned their shares of the estate of said Holt to Lewis Benner, for a valuable consideration; and that, previous to the bankruptcy of the said Benner, he agreed with Darr and his wife for the purchase of their share, for which he paid a part of the consideration. That by these transfers, and the purchases, the said Benner became entitled to five eighths of the estate of said Holt, in addition to the share to which he was entitled in right of his wife. That George Foulkrod died in the year 1811, and the defendants are his administrators. The prayer of the bill is for an account and payment of the shares to which Benner was thus entitled.

The answer admits all the material allegations in the bill, but alleges that after the assignments to Benner by Cooper and the two Sheneck's, and the purchase from Darr, he, Benner, was duly declared a bankrupt under the bankrupt law of the United States, and the whole of his estate was assigned to A. Burt and J. C. Seton, by virtue of which all his right to the estate of said Holt became vested in his assignees under the commission. That, notwithstanding this, Benner afterwards assigned all the said shares, as well as the one to which he was entitled in right of his wife, to Frederick, and Henry Amelong, merchants of New Orleans, who assigned the same to L. Krumbhaar, of Philadelphia, or by some instrument empowered him to receive the amount of the said shares. That Burt and Seton as assignees, commenced a suit in this court against Foulkrod, in April, 1809, to recover the amount of the said shares, and on the 6th of November, in the same year, a verdict and judgment were rendered in their favour for the sum of $7072.25 cents, including Darr's share. That Krumbhaar had full notice of these proceedings and acquiesced therein, contending only for the share of Mrs. Benner. That, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of this court, whether he, or the assignees under the commission, were entitled to that share, an amicable suit was entered in the name of Krumbhaar v. Burt [Case No. 7,944], and that the decision of the court was in favor of the plaintiff in that suit. The answer then alleges that the above judgments have been fully paid and satisfied, and the executor's accounts of George Foulkrod settled and passed by the orphan's court; and finally, that the verdict and judgment obtained by the assignees of Benner under the commission, is a bar to the present suit.

The question which arises upon the facts stated in the bill and answer, and which the latter relies upon as a bar to this suit is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to a decree to compel the defendants to pay over again the money which was recovered against their intestate by the judgment of this court, at the suit of the assignees of Benner, and which was paid to them accordingly. If, upon the stern principles of law, which the more benign principles of a court of equity cannot control, he is so liable, it will be in vain to call his case a hard one. Justice must be administered, be the consequences what they may. There is, nevertheless, something in the proposition that he is so liable, which so outrages all our notions of justice, that we must hesitate to adopt it as law, unless it could be demonstrated to be such by unquestionable authority. No case to sanction this doctrine was read, or referred to by the counsel for the plaintiff; nor have we been able to find one which comes up to the point. We have examined the cases which are cited in the books to establish the general principle, that a verdict and judgment cannot be given in evidence, or be pleaded, except between the same parties or privies; but none of them, in our judgment, touch the question which is proposed to be decided. They are, in general, cases respecting land titles, or the admissibility of a verdict and judgment as evidence, or as a bar to affect the rights of those who are neither parties nor privies to that suit, or to fix a responsibility upon them. They prove nothing further than that the right of him who was not party or privy to the suit, is not affected by the judgment. The present is altogether a different question; it is this—can a person be legally called upon to pay to one man a sum of money which, by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, he had been compelled to pay to another; his conduct in defending the latter suit having been in all respects fair and honest? If he can be so called upon, and compelled to pay the money over again to the plaintiff in the second suit, it seems at least to be a reproach upon the law, that it should not protect a man against the consequences of an act which itself compelled him to perform.

It may possibly be said that this view of the question is altogether on one side, and that the hardship to which the creditor would be exposed by losing his remedy against his original debtor, in consequence of a judgment in a suit in which he was neither party nor privy, is equal to that of which the debtor complains by being twice charged. It is possible, we admit, that in some instances, this may be true. But grant, for the sake of the argument, that the equity of these parties to disregard the judgment on the one side, or to be protected by it on the other, is equal; why, it may be asked, should the rule of law operate against the defendant rather than against the plaintiff? We think it will not be easy to answer this question satisfactorily. May not the defendant fairly claim the protection of the rule of law which in cases of equal hardship, and of equal equity, where a loss is to be avoided, declares, melior est conditio defendentis? We see no reason why he may not.

But let us examine more particularly, whether the equity, and the claim to indulgence are equal between these parties. A lis pendens is constructive notice to all persons; independent of which it is quite improbable that a suit can be carried on in a court of justice between two persons, which involves the interest of a third party, and that such third party should be ignorant of the fact. It can seldom happen therefore that he can excuse himself from the charge of culpable negligence, in not interposing his claim to prevent the injury of which he complains. Supposing the equity of these parties then to be in all other respects equal, it must cease to be so in consequence of the laches of the one who has occasioned the loss.

But again. The doctrine insisted upon in this opinion is, not that the right of the real creditor, or person entitled to the money or thing recovered in the first action, is concluded, or in any manner affected by the judgment, but that his remedy against the same defendant is barred by the judgment against him. Had the judgment been in his favour, he clearly could not plead it in bar of the action as he might do to a second action brought by the same plaintiff. The money which the latter paid to the plaintiff in that action, not voluntarily, but by compulsion of law, is still the property of the party really entitled to it, notwithstanding the judgment; because the suit by which it was recovered, being res inter alios acta, his right cannot be affected by it. The money to which the plaintiff is entitled, has only changed hands by force of a legal and compulsory sentence of a competent tribunal, and upon every principle of justice and of law, it is money received by the plaintiff in the first suit to the use of the real owner of it. His right of action to recover it remains unimpaired and unchanged by the judgment, except that the plaintiff in that action, instead of the defendant is made the debtor. It is possible; and in this event only can the real owner be injured; that this receiver of the plaintiff's money may be a less responsible man than the original debtor. Yet he is certainly enriched by all that he has recovered, and therefore it can seldom happen that a loss will be sustained unless it should arise from the negligence of the real owner in asserting, in time, his right to the money. But on the other hand, if the original defendant should be compelled to pay over again the money to the real owner, he would be entirely without remedy, since the judgment would, beyond all question, be a bar to any suit in law or equity which he could bring against the plaintiff in the original action to recover back the money. The doctrine, that a man who, acting bona fide, and above all just suspicion of having connived with the original plaintiff to enable him to obtain the judgment, is compelled by that judgment to pay what a third person, and not that plaintiff was entitled to; is protected by that judgment against the claim of the real owner, and that the remedy of the latter is only against the person who has unjustly received it, is not unsupported by authority. In the case of Le Chevalier v. Lynch, 1 Doug. 170, it was decided, that if a bankrupt has money owing to him out of England, the assignment under the bankrupt laws so far vests the right to the money in the assignees, that the debtor shall be answerable to them, and shall not turn them round by saying that he is accountable only to the bankrupt. But if, in the mean time, after the bankruptcy, and before payment to the assignees, money owing to the bankrupt out of England is attached, bona fide, by regular process, according to the law of the place, the assignee in such case cannot recover the debt. In this case, the suit was brought against the debtor of the bankrupt in whose hands the money had been attached, and the decision of course was, that it could not be recovered by the assignees against him.

The case of Phillips v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 402, was that of a debt recovered in the United States by attachment, by a creditor of the English bankrupt, against one of his debtors, after the commission; and the creditor who recovered the money, having come into England, an action for money had and received was brought against him by the assignees, and a judgment was rendered in their favour. Upon a writ of error to the court of exchequer chamber, all the judges, Eyre, chief justice, excepted, concurred in opinion that the assignees were entitled to recover the money from the attaching creditor, as money received to their use. In giving their opinion, those judges say, that the cases of Le Chevalier v. Lynch, Allen v. Dundas, 3 Term R. 125, and Clerc v. Mills, Cooke, Bankr. Law, 370, only prove that where a debtor has paid money under due process of local law, he shall not be compelled to pay it over again; that the recovery, although conclusive between the parties, is to be considered as being for the use of the assignees. And in answer to the objection that the assignees ought to have stated their claim in the attachment suit, the court say, "that it does not appear that they had notice of it. As to the defendant, the judgment is conclusive." The chief justice, whose opinion was that the action could not be supported even against the attaching creditor, lays it down, nevertheless, that if a creditor of the bankrupt, from any cause, say defect of evidence, or error in the judge, should, after the bankruptcy, recover from a debtor of the bankrupt, he would be entitled to hold and pursue it to all its consequences, until the judgment is impeached in a due course of law. So that this distinguished judge, though he differed from the rest of the court as to the liability of the attaching creditor, concurs nevertheless in the doctrine that the defendant, who had been compelled by the judgment of the court, although an erroneous one, to pay the money, could not be called upon to pay it over again. This case appears to us to go the whole length of deciding all the doctrine insisted upon in the opinion. It was decided originally in the court of king's bench, without argument, the case being considered as decided by that of Hunter v. Potts, 4 Term R. 182. It may further be observed, in passing, that Law, who argued the latter case for the assignees, admitted "that nothing could be more clear than that a person who had been compelled by a competent jurisdiction to pay the debt once, should not be compelled to pay it over again." The last case which we think it necessary to refer to, is that of Embree v. Hanna, 5 Johns. 101, in which the broad doctrine before stated is asserted, and ably reasoned upon by Kent, chief justice, who delivered the opinion of the court. Were this then an action at law, we should consider ourselves fully warranted in deciding that it could not be maintained. But since it is possible that others may not view the subject in the same light that we do, we shall proceed to consider the precise case before the court. It is a bill filed on the equity side of the court, not by Foulkrod to be relieved against the claims of the administrator of Benner, for money which his intestate had once been compelled to pay to Benner's assignees, but by that administrator, for the purpose of enforcing such double payment. He ought, therefore, to make out a strong case of equity to entitle him to a decree. But what is the case?

The assignment of all the estate and effects of Benner which were assignable under the bankrupt law of the United States, was duly made in April, 1802. A part of the estate of the bankrupt consisted of certain legacies which he claimed in right of his wife, and as assignee, of other legatees, his right to which depended upon a contingency which did not happen until some years after the bankruptcy and assignment. After the contingency had happened, Benner made absolute assignments of the above legacies to F. and A. Amelong, for a valuable consideration stated in the deeds, and, on the same day, the Amelongs gave a general power of attorney to L. Krumbhaar, to demand, sue for, and recover from the executors of Holt, the legacies so assigned to them by Benner. On the 24th of March, 1809, the assignees of Benner under the commission, and Lewis Krumbhaar in behalf of the Amelongs, each notified the executor of Holt of their respective claims to these legacies, and warned him not to pay them to any person save to themselves respectively. Immediately after this, the assignees commenced an action against the executor in this court, and on the 6th of November, 1809, after a trial, in which the counsel for the executor has sworn that the cause was defended to the utmost, a verdict and judgment were rendered for the amount claimed by those plaintiffs. The executor, aware of the delicate situation in which he was placed by these conflicting claims, filed, at the first term, a bill of interpleader against all the parties, praying that they might be compelled to interplead, and for an injunction to stay proceedings in the suit of the assignees. The injunction was denied upon the ground of a want of jurisdiction, in consequence of which, this remedy became of no avail to the executor. Soon after Krumbhaar received his power of attorney from the Amelongs, he took the opinion of his counsel, a distinguished member of the bar, as to the title of his constituents to the legacies assigned to them by Benner. The opinion of that gentleman was, that the Amelongs were entitled to claim only the legacy of Mrs. Benner, and that the other legacies which had been assigned to Benner, passed under the commission and assignment to his assignees. This opinion was immediately forwarded by Krumbhaar to his constituents, from whom nothing, so far as the evidence goes, was afterwards heard indicative of the effect which that opinion had upon them in respect to their claim of the other legacies. But their conduct spoke all that their language could have expressed. For just previous to, or on the day when the above judgment was rendered at the suit of the assignees, an agreement was entered into, signed by the counsel for Krumbhaar and the assignees, to enter an amicable action in the name of Krumbhaar against the assignees, and that a case should be stated for the purpose of taking the opinion of the court upon the question, which of them was entitled to Mrs. Benner's legacy. The case was accordingly made, stating only such facts as were necessary to raise that question. It is not unworthy of remark, that the agreement above referred to was not entered in the amicable suit, but in that of the assignees against Foulkrod. The case, after stating the facts relating to Mrs. Benner's legacy, concluded with an agreement, that the rights of the two parties are the same as if the question was raised in a suit by either party against the executor, or as if a bill of interpleader had been filed by the executor. The opinion of the court in the amicable suit was pronounced on the 15th of November, 1809, in favour of Krumbhaar, upon the ground, that the legacy of Mrs. Benner depending upon the contingency whether she should be living at the time when it should happen, which was some years after the bankruptcy and assignment, it did not pass to the assignees under the commission, upon a correct construction of the bankrupt law of the United States. On the 18th of the same month, the assignees filed a refunding bond in the penalty of $12,000, and Krumbhaar another, in the penalty of $2828, being about double the amount of Mrs. Benner's legacy, for which the judgment in the amicable suit was rendered. On the 22d of the same month, the assignees received from the executor the sum of $6353, to which they were entitled under their judgment; and Krumbhaar also received the sum of $1413, to which the Amelongs were entitled, for which sums, the plaintiffs in the two suits indorsed receipts on their respective refunding bonds.

It appears by the deposition of Frederick Amelong, taken in this cause, that the assignments by Benner to the Amelongs, although absolute in their terms, were intended to be for the use of Benner, and that the amount received of the executor by Krumbhaar, having been in due time remitted to the Amelongs, was with interest, after deducting commissions and expenses, paid over by them to Benner in August, 1810. This then is the case of an executor, who has once been compelled, by the judgment of a competent tribunal, after an honest and bona fide defence, with full notice to the counsel and attorney in fact of the adverse claimant, to pay the very money which is now demanded in this suit by the legal representatives of that adverse claimant. This is not all. That attorney, after claiming the sum now sought to be recovered, so far from interfering with the suit of the assignees by claiming to join in the defence of it, or by asserting in any other way the claim of his constituents, which at one time was set up, commenced a suit for only one of the legacies, and this too under an agreement with the adverse claimant, and a case stated between them, which was industriously confined to the share which the Amelongs had been informed by their counsel he was alone entitled to claim. And we find these two friendly adversaries marching side by side throughout the whole of these proceedings, giving refunding bonds on the same day for the legacies which they respectively claimed, and on the same day receiving satisfaction of those claims from the executor; each conusant (how is it possible they should not be so?) of what the other was doing, and of what the deluded executor, acting on the faith of a compromise agreed to by those who were originally adversaries in their claims, was doing. That he was paying away to the assignees the money once claimed by the Amelongs, but afterwards relinquished by their attorney, could not but have been known to that attorney. The receipt given to the executor by the counsel of the Amelongs, affords an additional, and almost conclusive proof of that fact; for in that he states, that the $1413 is the share of Mrs. Benner "of the balance of the executor's account as settled in the register's office, as referred to in the foregoing (the refunding) bond." Upon referring to this settlement, it appears that on the 22d of November, 1809, the executor credits himself with $6353 paid the attorney of the assignees, $713 paid the attorney of Darr, and $1413, the balance, paid to the attorney of the Amelongs. What more could the executor have required, than that he should be placed in the same state of security in which the bill of the interpleader of which he had vainly endeavoured to avail himself, would have left him? But the adverse claimants did agree that the rights of the two parties were the same as though the question was raised in a suit by either party against the executor, or as if a bill of interpleader had been filed by the executor. Now, will any person contend that, if the rights of those parties had been decided either way, that the executor could afterwards have been called upon by the unsuccessful party to pay the money over again? We think it could not be so contended. Now, if it were admitted that this sum could be recovered again by the administrator of Benner at law, where is the plaintiff's case in equity? It is that of a man who, after abandoning, by a compromise, his claim to the money now sought to be recovered; then standing by and seeing a trustee innocently pay away that very money to the person with whom the compromise was made, and finally acquiescing in all these proceedings for ten or twelve years; asks a court of equity for a decree to compel this trustee to pay the money over again to him.

We think it quite unnecessary to pursue this inquiry further, and we shall therefore conclude this opinion by noticing some of the arguments which were relied upon in support of the relief prayed for by this bill.

1. It was contended, that Benner, not the Amelongs, was entitled to these legacies, as is proved by the deposition of one of the partners taken in this cause. If the inference intended to be deduced from this fact was, that Benner was not bound by what the Amelongs did, it is unfounded in law. The assignment to the Amelongs was absolute in form, and therefore put it in their power to appear, as in fact they did, as the real owner of the shares so assigned. If by doing so, a loss must be sustained by one of two persons, even allowing them to be equally innocent, he who occasioned the loss should bear it.

2. An attorney at law, it is said, cannot make a compromise to bind his client, and the case of Holker v. Parker, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 436, was relied upon for this doctrine. But upon examining the opinion delivered by the chief justice in that case, we find him saying, "that though an attorney at law, merely as such, has, strictly speaking, no right to make a compromise, yet a court would be disinclined to disturb one which was not so unreasonable in itself as to be exclaimed against by all, and to create an impression that the attorney's judgment had been imposed upon, or not fairly exercised." "Though it may assume the form of an award or judgment at law, the injured party, if his own conduct has been perfectly blameless, ought to be relieved against it." What that court would have said in applying these principles to the case of a compromise made by an attorney in fact, as well as the attorney at law, fully and promptly communicated to his principal, who afterwards received the fruits of it, and who acquiesced for ten or twelve years in what had been done, we need be at no loss to conjecture. We say acquiesced in by his principal; for even if Benner, quoad the defendant, is to be considered as the real owner of those legacies, he received from the Amelongs the fruit of the compromise, nearly twelve years before this suit was brought. Upon the subject of acquiescence, see Pickering v. Lord Stamford, 2 Ves. Jr. 582; 1 P. Wms. 355.

3. It was contended that the defendant's intestate was guilty of laches, sufficient to charge him in equity, in not notifying the Amelongs of the action brought against him by the assignees. We by no means admit that, in a case like the present, notice was necessary, as it might be in a case of warranty, where the defendant intends, or has a right to look to a third person for compensation in case of a recovery against him. But if notice were necessary in this case to protect the executor, it was clearly dispensed with by the attorney of the Amelongs, who, being conusant of the adverse claim, at first opposed it, and afterwards withdrew from the contest, except as to the share which he sued for and recovered.

4. It was in the last place insisted, that after the opinion of the court was given in the amicable suit, by which the right of the Amelongs to the shares purchased by Benner was established, equally with their right to Mrs. Benner's share, it was the duty of the defendant's executor to have applied to the court for a new trial in the suit of the assignees, or if too late for that, for an injunction, or to have sued out a writ of error to the judgment. But had the Amelongs no remedy to prevent the assignees from receiving the fruit of their judgment? Could they not have filed a bill against the assignees and the executor to enjoin the judgment, and to obtain a decree for the amount of it to be paid over to them? No person will question the fitness of this remedy, unless indeed they had, by the compromise, defeated their own equity. Upon what pretence then can the plaintiff, who, or whose trustee, has been guilty of laches, attempt to build up an equity against the executor, by charging him with a similar fault? But why should the executor have attempted to set aside the judgment for the benefit of a party who had relinquished his claim to the subject in controversy, and who still declined to take any step to re-assert it? We think it will not be an easy matter to answer this question.

We are upon the whole of opinion that this bill ought to be dismissed.

Case No. 9,344.

MAYER v. HERMANN.

[10 Blatchf. 256.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 12, 1872.

BANKRUPTCY — WHAT CONSTITUTES INSOLVENCY — SUBMISSION TO SUIT—EXECUTION THEREON —ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—NOTICE.

1. The inability of a merchant to meet his engagements, in the usual course of business, constitutes insolvency, within the meaning of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)].

2. The fact, that a merchant, in a mercantile community, who has no defence to debts maturing in his current business, submits to be sued, to compel payment of such debts, is very high evidence of inability to pay them.

3. The sale of the debtor's property, on an execution issued in such a suit, is a disposition of the debtor's property, for the benefit of the creditor, out of the usual course of business, and is evidence that the creditor has reasonable cause to believe in the debtor's insolvency, and contemplates a preference.

4. Although a debtor is not known to have yet committed an act of bankruptcy, his creditor, although he has reasonable cause to believe, or even knows, the debtor to be insolvent, may sue him, and proceed to judgment, execution and levy, for the purpose of proceeding against him in involuntary bankruptcy.

[Cited in Anderson v. Strassburger, Case No. 364.]

5. A creditor employed an attorney to collect his debt by suit. All the facts made necessary by the bankruptcy act to invalidate a preference gained by such suit, were made known to such attorney after he entered on such employment, and while engaged in collecting such debt by suit. The suit proceeded to execution and levy: Held, that the knowledge of the attorney was the knowledge of the creditor.

[Cited in Mathews v. Riggs, 80 Me. 110, 13 Atl. 49; Shattuck v. Bill, 142 Mass. 64, 7 N. E. 39.]

6. It made no difference, that the information was received by the attorney after he had been retained by the debtor, and while he was advising the debtor what course to pursue, such retainer by the debtor being after the employment by the creditor and before the recovery of judgment.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

[This was a proceeding by Ferdinand Mayer against Moses Hermann, assignee in bankruptcy of Maurice Bendix and others, bankrupts, to have his lien against the bankrupts' property established, and praying that two judgments recovered by him in the state court be paid out of the proceeds of the property. From a decree of the district court dismissing the bill, plaintiff appealed.]

Samuel Boardman, for plaintiff.
Charles H. Smith, for defendant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. On the 2d of March, 1868, the plaintiff recovered two judgments, in a state court, against the above named bankrupts, one for $388 46, and the other for $320 44. Executions were, on the same day, issued to the sheriff thereon, and levied on personal property belonging to the bankrupts. On a petition filed March 6th, 1868, the bankrupts were adjudicated such, and the defendant was appointed their assignee, and an assignment was duly executed to him. Thereafter, under an arrangement between the plaintiff and the defendant, the property levied on was delivered by the sheriff to the defendant, to be held subject to a determination by the district court as to the validity of the lien of the plaintiff upon it. The plaintiff then filed his bill in the district court, praying that his lien might be established, and the judgments be paid out of the proceeds of the property. The defendant answered the bill, setting up that the executions and levies were void as against him, for the reason that, the bankrupts, being insolvent, did, within four months before the filing of the petition, with a view to give a preference to the plaintiff for the debts set forth in the judgments, procure their property to be seized by said executions, and thereby made a transfer of the property levied on; that the plaintiff then and there had reasonable cause to believe the bankrupts to be insolvent; and that the executions were issued in fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt act; that the attorneys for the plaintiff in recovering the judgments and issuing the executions, were the attorneys for the bankrupts in their petition in bankruptcy, and, at the time of recovering the judgments and issuing and levying the executions, had reasonable cause to believe the bankrupts to be insolvent; and that the transactions were in fraud of the provisions of said act. Proofs were taken, and, on a hearing, the district court dismissed the bill. From such decree the plaintiff appealed to this court. The attorneys for the plaintiff in the judgments were the attorneys for the bankrupts in the bankruptcy proceedings. One of such attorneys was called as a witness by the defendant, in this suit, and testified, that they had not been attorneys for the bankrupts prior to the bankruptcy proceedings; that he first saw the bankrupts in regard to their affairs just before the judgments were obtained, and after the suits were brought; that Bendix then came to his house and stated to him that the firm (Reichman & Co.) had sufficient assets to pay its debts, but his suspicions had been excited by the actions of the husband of Caroline M. Reichman, (one of the firm,) and that goods had been taken out of the store, which could not be traced, and he feared, that, unless some steps were taken in the matter, they would not be able to pay their creditors, and the goods would disappear; that his (the attorney's) advice to him was, to immediately take possession of the store, and lock it up, and call a meeting of the creditors of the firm, and do something to secure them, by appropriating the goods to their benefit; that this was after the summonses in the suits had been served on at least two of the three defendants in it, Bendix being, at the time, aware of the summonses, although not served with them until two days after Mrs. Reichman was served, and five days after the remaining defendant was served; that Bendix, accordingly, locked up the store, and a meeting of the creditors was held, at which he (the attorney) attended, at the request of Bendix, and at which propositions were made and discussed to turn over the property to the creditors in full payment of their debts; that a majority of the creditors were in favor of that course, and a committee was appointed to investigate the affairs of the firm, and, at his (the attorney's) suggestion, the committee was empowered to take possession of the goods; that he (the attorney) heard nothing more of the matter until after the judgments; that then Bendix informed him that the proposition to take the property in payment of the debts had fallen through; that he then advised Bendix to go into bankruptcy; that he did not communicate with the plaintiff in regard to the matter, nor know personally on what day the summonses were returnable, or that the judgments had been obtained, until after they had been obtained; that he attended the meeting of creditors on behalf of Bendix; and that the plaintiff was not present at the meeting, and did not know of it.

The plaintiff was called as a witness by the defendant, and testified, that the debts for which the judgments were recovered were open accounts, for goods sold to the firm; that one account was due twelve days before the suit on it was commenced (both suits having been commenced February 21st); that he had sent for the money on it, and they had put him off, sending word that they would come in and pay; that he did not know that the meeting of creditors was to be held, nor learn of it after it had been held; that, when he directed suit to be brought against the firm, he had no idea that it was in a failing condition; that, when the executions were issued, he had no reason to believe that the firm was insolvent; that it was not proposed to him by the attorney to share ratably with the other creditors; and that, after he placed the claims in the attorney's hands, and swore to the complaints, he had no knowledge as to what was done in the suits.

The attorney also testified, that he stated, at the meeting of creditors, and that such was his opinion, that, if the stock of goods was fairly sold, and not sacrificed, and the debts were collected, there would be enough to pay seventy-five cents on the dollar, but that, if the goods were sold at auction, or by an assignee, he did not believe they would realize more than forty or fifty cents on the dollar; and that such statement was made before the executions were issued.

The debts proved against the bankrupts are $11,021 32. The assets realized by the assignee are $2,961 82, in which sum is included $2,680 72, realized from the sale of the goods levied on.

1. The plaintiff had reasonable cause to believe that the firm was insolvent, before his executions were levied upon their goods, and that the collection of the judgments would operate to give him a preference. The parties, debtors and creditors, were both merchants. Inability to meet their engagements in the usual course of business has been again and again adjudged to constitute insolvency, within the meaning of the bankrupt law. When, therefore, a merchant fails to pay his notes, or other mercantile obligations, as they become payable, the immediate presumption of inability to pay arises. This is according to the universal sense of the mercantile world. When a merchant does not so pay, he is at once, and everywhere, assumed, in the common language applied to the subject, to have "failed." Quite true, there may be reasons, in any particular case, why payment at maturity is not made. There may be a defence to the apparent debt; the non-payment may be caused by accident, or carelessness and inattention; or it may be the result of some other special temporary cause, entirely consistent with amplest solvency. Nevertheless, where no such cause exists, non-payment, prima facie, imports inability to pay in due course of business, and creditors everywhere, in commercial communities, proceed on that presumption. True, also, mere non-payment of an account for goods sold is not declared to be an act of bankruptcy; but this proves nothing upon the question of probable cause to believe that the debtor, in such case, is unable to pay in due course of business.

In the present case, the debts were mercantile debts. They were not paid at maturity. The plaintiff knew it, and, on repeated applications for payment, he was put off by the debtors, their promises to pay were broken, and he was obliged to sue. It was manifest to him that his debtors did not pay in the usual course of business. There was no suggestion of any defence or other special, temporary, or accidental cause of delay; nor was there apparent to him, nor is there proved now, any circumstance warranting any other inference than that they could not pay, for want of means. The circumstances within his actual knowledge indicated insolvency, in the sense of the statute; and such insolvency existed in fact, as was reasonably to be inferred.

2. This reasonable cause to believe that the debtors were insolvent becomes greatly increased, when, besides failure to pay in due course of business, the debtor submits to be sued, and the creditor commences suit. That, in a mercantile community, a merchant debtor is so straitened, that, without pretence of any defence, he is under the pressure of suits to compel payment of debts maturing in his current business, is very high evidence of inability to pay. The unquestionable fact, that such pressure would be utterly destructive of his commercial credit, clearly shows that it is and must be deemed abundant cause of belief in his insolvency; and the pursuit of a debtor by such suit is a plain attempt to drive him either into a preferential payment, or to lay the foundation for a very proper proceeding in bankruptcy against him. Following such suit to judgment, execution, sale of his goods, and appropriation of the proceeds by the creditor, is not only accumulating evidence of the debtor's insolvency, at every step, but, when consummated by the actual sale of the debtor's goods for the payment of the execution, another ground of impeachment of the transaction arises. It is a disposition of the debtor's property, for the benefit of the creditor, out of the usual course of business. It is a case, if not within the letter, plainly within the spirit and analogy of "sales, assignments, transfers, or conveyances to a creditor, not made in the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor," which, by section 35 of the bankrupt act, is declared "prima facie evidence of fraud," that is, is to be taken as prima facie evidence of actual fraud, or, at least, of a design to prevent the property from being distributed under the bankrupt act, or to defeat its object, or impair, hinder, or delay its operation and effect, or evade its provisions. It would be little short of absurdity, to say, that, when, under the circumstances of a case like this, the creditor has pursued his debtor down to an actual levy, he has not reasonable cause to believe that his debtor is insolvent, or that he can then proceed to a sale, for his own benefit, without contemplating the necessary result, if such insolvency exist, namely, a preference.

I have heretofore taken occasion to say—Coxe v. Hale [Case No. 3,310]—that this view of the rights and risks of creditors does not prevent, and need not discourage, suits against debtors who, not being known to have yet committed any act of bankruptcy, do not pay. The creditor, whether he has or has not reasonable cause to believe his debtor to be insolvent, has a right to bring suit. If a defence is interposed, he may go to trial and judgment. If no defence is interposed, he may take judgment by default. Nothing in the bankrupt law, and nothing above suggested, forbids this. I think, also, he may cause the goods of the debtor to be seized on execution. But, if he then knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, that the debtor is insolvent, and, therefore, knows, or has like cause to believe, that the appropriation of the property to paying his debts will operate to give him a preference, he must beware how he proceeds. An act of bankruptcy, the debtor being insolvent, has now been committed. A suit, judgment, and levy, procured in good faith, for the purpose of forcing an insolvent debtor into bankruptcy, is not illegal. It may often be a proper, and, in short, the only present means of compelling an unwilling debtor to submit his property to the just distribution among his creditors, for which the law provides.

3. The plaintiff had reasonable cause to believe that the debtors were insolvent, and that his proceedings against them were taking or securing a preference, because, his attorney knew it, and the plaintiff, under the circumstances of this case, is chargeable with that knowledge. Such attorney was employed by the plaintiff to bring the suits, obtain the judgments, and collect the debts. All the facts made necessary by the statute to invalidate any preference thereby gained, were made known to such attorney after he entered upon that employment, and while in the prosecution thereof for the purpose of making the collection. In the actual endeavor to collect the debt, and by reason of that endeavor, the attorney was brought into contact with the debtor, and learned the condition of his affairs. If information of the debtor's insolvency, so acquired, is no impediment to securing a preference, by seizing and appropriating the debtor's effects, there would be little effective vitality in the provisions of the bankrupt law, and the just remedial enactments of the 35th and 39th sections, to secure equality among creditors, would be easily evaded. All that it would be necessary for the creditor to do would be, to put his claim into the hands of an attorney, perhaps one in a distant place, near the residence of the debtor, and abstain from asking or receiving thereafter any information as to the condition of the debtor, or the progress made in collecting the claim, until the money was actually realized and sent to him. He could then say, what is alleged in this case, that what his attorney might have learned was not to be imputed to him, as knowledge or reasonable cause to believe, and was, therefore, of no avail to defeat the actual preference obtained. It seems hardly necessary to enlarge upon these suggestions, The consequences which would result from sustaining preferences thus gained are too obvious. The knowledge acquired by an agent in the conduct of his employer's business is knowledge of his principal.

It is sought to withdraw this case from the operation of that rule, by insisting, that here the information was gained after a retainer by the debtor, and while advising the debtor what course to pursue in his condition of embarrassment, though before the recovery of judgment by the creditor. I do not assert a broad rule, that all the knowledge which an attorney or counsel receives from his clients, in their confidential relation, is to be deemed the knowledge of all his other clients, or to charge them with notice. No such broad proposition is necessary to the ruling in this case. I do say, that, where the attorney of a creditor is prosecuting a debtor, to enforce payment of a debt, and, by reason thereof, the debtor discloses to him that he is insolvent, and asks his advice, and he assumes to give it, he may possibly find himself involved in some conflict of duty, for he certainly has no right to accept, in confidence, from the adverse party, information which his client ought to know, and which he ought not to conceal from him; but he cannot, by accepting such retainer, evade the operation of the rule. In every step of the prosecution of the claim to collection, he is the agent of the creditor, the performance of his duty to that creditor involves the gaining of knowledge of the debtor's insolvency, and no proffered confidence, put in him by the adverse party, can make that information less his client's property, or less information acquired in his agency, and imputable to such client.

District Court, E. D. Michigan. April, 1872.

COLLISION — DAMAGES — DEMURRAGE BASED UPON PROBABLE EARNINGS.

1. In the absence of a market value for the use of vessels, the value of such use to the owner, in the business in which she was engaged at the time of the collision, is a proper basis for estimating damages for detention.

[Cited in The Belgenland, 36 Fed. 505; The Margaret J. Sanford, 37 Fed. 152.]

2. The books of the owner, showing previous and subsequent earnings, are competent evidence of the probable earnings during the detention.

[Cited in The Margaret J. Sanford, 37 Fed. 152.]

3. The party in fault should bear whatever inconvenience or hardship there may be in proving the exact amount of damages sustained.

4. In cases of conflicting testimony as to amounts, where the preponderance is not palpable, the finding of the commissioner will not be disturbed.

5. The services of an agent employed in settling and paying bills is not a proper item of damages.

6. Estimates of the cost of repairs, though competent in absence of better evidence, are not so where the repairs have been actually made.

On exceptions to commissioner's report of damages. The propeller Mayflower was adjudged to be in fault in a collision with the steamer Dove, and it was referred to a commissioner to ascertain the damages done to the Dove by the collision. [Case unreported.] The commissioner having made his report, both parties came in and excepted to it in several particulars.

F. H. Canfield and G. V. N. Lothrop, for claimant.

The evidence does not justify the allowance of demurrage. No market value is shown for the use of such a vessel. The facts in the case of The Cayuga [supra] are very different from those proven in this case, and, whether rightly decided or not, it is no authority here.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The most important of the exceptions, as well in amount as in the principles involved, are respondent's ninth exception, which is to the item allowed by the commissioner for demurrage, 28 days at $100 per day, $2,800, and respondent's eleventh exception, which is to the item allowed for value of services of steamer Eighth Ohio, 11 days at $100 per day, $1,100; and libellant's third exception relating to the latter item, which is that the commissioners reduced the claim for services. for the steamer Eighth Ohio, it being claimed that a larger amount was actually paid. These exceptions will be first considered.

1. As to the item for demurrage. The River and Lake Shore Steamboat Line, the libellant corporation, was, among other things, running a line of steamboats between Detroit and Port Huron during the season of 1869, for carrying passengers and freight. The Dove was owned by libellant, and was running on that line, making daily trips from Detroit to Port Huron and back, at the time of the collision. The collision occurred on the night of the 31st day of May, 1869. The Dove was sunken by the collision, was raised and brought to Detroit, placed in dry dock and repaired, and resumed her place in the line and commenced running again on the 28th day of June, 1869. The time she was so detained from her regular trips was necessarily occupied in raising and repairing her. During her detention her place in the line was supplied by other boats belonging to libellant. Thus far there is no dispute as to the facts. Neither is it disputed as a proposition of law (and, in fact, the law in this regard is too well established to admit of question) that libellant is entitled to recover damages for the detention, or, as it is commonly called, demurrage. The question in dispute is as to the proper basis or measure of damages. On behalf of respondent it is contended that, in a case like the present, the rental or charter value alone is the proper basis, and because it appears by the evidence before the commissioner that at the port of Detroit, the home port of the Dove, there was no established rental or charter value of vessels like the Dove, and because it does not appear that she could have been chartered during the time of her detention, there is no basis for recovery of damages as demurrage; and that the most that libellant can recover is interest on the value of the vessel during the detention.

On behalf of the libellants it is contended that, because there was no established rental or charter value by which to ascertain the damages for the detention, and, at all events, because libellant did not keep the Dove for hire, but for libellant's own use and service in the business and employment for which she was intended, and in which she was then engaged, the value of such use and service to libellant in that particular business and employment, under the maxim "Restitutio in integrum," always applied in such cases, is the proper basis and measure of damages for the detention; provided, of course, that such value is susceptible of proof, and is proven, to a reasonable certainty. In reply to this, it is contended, on behalf of respondent, that the proof of such value must of necessity be based, as it is in fact in this case, upon probable profits of such service during the detention; and that such basis is excluded by express authority.

To support the propositions contended for on behalf of respondent, the cases of Smith v. Condry, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 28, and Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How. 101, are cited. The first named case is cited as an express decision of the supreme court excluding future profits as a basis or measure of damages for demurrage, and the last named case as a like decision establishing and limiting the rule of damages in such cases to include the market rental or charter value only, and that where there is no such value established, there can be no damages for detention allowed. These cases have been sometimes misapprehended by learned commentators, and to some extent by the learned advocates on both sides in this case. Mr. Conkling (1 Adm. 384), and Mr. Parsons (1 Shipp. 540, note 1), both assume that Smith v. Condry (which was decided in 1843) decides that the probable profits of the earnings of the vessel during the detention are not allowable as demurrage; and that Williamson v. Barrett (which was decided in 1851) decides that such profits are allowable, and thus subverts the former decision and establishes a different rule. As we shall presently see, these are misapprehensions, and that in neither case was the decision what is thus assumed. The questions presented in the two cases were entirely different, and the decisions are in no manner in conflict with each other. What was decided in each case remains the law to-day, unimpaired and unqualified by any subsequent rulings of that court.

In Smith v. Condry, the vessel detained was laden with salt, and the damages claimed were for a loss or diminution of profits on the cargo, in consequence of a decline in the price of salt at the port of destination during the detention. The court held that such damages were not allowable, and that is all the court decided. Such damages were clearly speculative merely, and too remote. The decision of the court excluding such damages was in accordance with what I understand to have been the uniform course of decision of the courts in England and America, both before and since, and it is undoubtedly the law to-day. But the court made no decision in that case as to damages for the delay of the vessel—whether such damages are or are not allowable—nor whether the probable earnings of the vessel during her detention, by way of freights, hiring or otherwise, are or are not allowable. No such question was before the court, and no rule whatever was laid down as to it. All that the court decided was that probable profits on the cargo, which might have been made but for the delay, are not allowable. When the court say (chapter 35): "It is the actual damage sustained by the party at the time and place of the injury that is the measure of damages," they are speaking of the case before them—a claim for probable profits on the cargo—and not of the detention of the vessel and damages resulting from loss of her use and service as such. The case of Smith v. Condry [supra], therefore, does not reach the present question.

In Williamson v. Barrett [supra], the general question of damages for loss of the use of vessel during the detention, was directly before the court. That was an action at common law, for damages by collision on the Ohio river. On the trial in the circuit court the jury were instructed, among other things, to give damages for "the use of the boat during the time necessary to make the repairs and fit her for business." The evidence given to support this claim for damages is not stated, and it does not appear upon what basis the claim was made—whether for rental or charter value or otherwise. The supreme court, however, after reciting the instruction, say: "By the use of the boat, we understand what she would produce to the plaintiffs by the hiring or chartering of her to run upon the river in the business in which she had been usually engaged." The court then, after announcing the general rule regulating damages in cases of collision to be the allowance to the injured party of an indemnity to the extent of the loss sustained, and after some discussion in regard to the difficulty in stating the grounds upon which to arrive, in all cases, at the proper measure of that indemnity, and having arrived at the conclusion that the demand in the market for vessels of the description of the one disabled, and the price which the owner could obtain, or might have obtained, for her hire, are proper bases of compensation, proceed as follows: "If there is no demand for the employment, and of course no hire to be obtained, no compensation for the detention during the repairs will be allowed, as no loss would be sustained. But if it can be shown that the vessel might have been chartered during the period of the repairs, it is impossible to deny that the owner has lost, in consequence of the damage, the amount which she might have thus earned. The market price, therefore, of the hire of the vessel, applied as a test of the value of the service will be, if not as certain as in the case where she is under a charter party, at least, so certain that, for all practical purposes in the administration of justice, no substantial distinction can be made." The point, and the only point actually decided in that case, is that damages for the detention are allowable, notwithstanding the vessel injured was not under a charter party at the time of the injury, provided it is shown that she might have been chartered during the detention. That is to say, that it is not indispensable to the recovery of damages for demurrage that the injured vessel should have been under a charter party at the time of the injury. What the court say in deciding this point, as to what is a proper measure or basis of damages in such a case, must be read and understood with reference to what they say they understood by the "use" of the boat, as that word was used in the charge to the jury, viz., "what she would produce to the plaintiffs by the hiring or chartering of her." What I understand the court to say is, that in that case, and under the general signification of the expression "use of the boat," as understood by them, a proper rule of damages is the rental or charter value of the vessel. I do not understand the court to lay this down as an inflexible and universal rule, applicable alike to all cases where the vessel injured is not actually under a charter party at the time of the collision. In fact, the contrary appears in the course of the opinion of the court. At page 111, the court cite approvingly the decision of Dr. Lushington in the case of The Gazelle, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 279, in which the freight the injured vessel was earning at the time of the collision, less the probable expenses in earning it, was adopted as the measure of damages for the detention. In citing this opinion, the supreme court remark: "This rule may afford a very fair indemnity in cases where the repairs are completed within the period usually occupied in the voyage in which the freight is to be earned. But if a longer period is required, it obviously falls short of an adequate allowance. Neither will it apply where the vessel is not engaged in earning freight at the time. The principle, however, governing the court in adopting the freight which the vessel was in the act of earning as a just measure of compensation in the case, is one of general application. It looks to the capacity of the vessel to earn freight for the benefit of the owner, and consequent loss sustained while deprived of her service. In other words, to the amount she would earn him on hire." And it was so understood (as not fixing an inflexible rule), by Mr. Justice Catron, in his dissenting opinion. On page 114, he says: "The supposition that the amount of damages can be easily fixed, by proof of what the injured boat could have been hired for on a charter party, during her detention, will turn out to be a barren theory, as no general practice of chartering steamboats is known on the Western rivers, nor can it ever exist; the nature of the vessels and the contingencies of navigation being opposed to it. In most cases," he says, "the proof will be that the boat could not have found any one to hire her; and then the contending parties will be thrown on the contingency, whether she could have earned something, or nothing, little or much, in the hands of her owner during the time she was necessarily detained." Here the learned judge describes exactly the contingency which exists in the present case; and it is because the decision of the majority of the court is, in his opinion, capable of being extended to cover such a contingency, that he dissents.

The rule that the party injured is entitled to an adequate compensation for any loss he may sustain for the detention of the vessel, is fully recognized and broadly stated in the opinion of the court. But what would be the proper mode of arriving at such compensation, in cases where the vessel at the time of the injury was not earning freight, not under a charter party, and no demand for the hiring of vessels, and no use for them, except by the owner, and therefore no market rental or charter value (as in the present case), is not discussed or decided. The principle upon which compensation is awarded for marine torts, enunciated in this case as well as in others, especially in The Gazelle, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 279, The Clarence, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 283, and other English cases, is broad enough to cover all such cases as those above enumerated, and they are clearly not excluded by any rule laid down in Williamson v. Barrett, nor in any other case I have examined, and I have examined all the numerous cases cited in the briefs of counsel, and some others. If actual loss on account of the detention is made to appear, the case is within the principle, and damages are recoverable. It then only remains to prove the amount. In The Clarence, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 283, the whole doctrine is very clearly stated. In that case there was no proof of any actual loss, and the court (page 286) says: "In order to entitle a party to be indemnified for what is termed in this court a consequential loss, being for the detention of his vessel, two things are absolutely necessary —actual loss and reasonable proof of the amount. Both must be proved," &c. And again: "It does not follow, as a matter of necessity, that anything is due for the detention of a vessel whilst under repair. Under some circumstances, undoubtedly, such a consequence will follow, as for example, where a fishing voyage is lost, or where the vessel would have been beneficially employed." And again: "The onus of proving her loss rests with the plaintiff, and this onus has not been discharged upon the present occasion. Had the owners of the Clarence proved that the vessel would have earned freight, and that such freight was lost by the collision, the case would have fallen within the principle to which I have last adverted." Under that rule, I think that the loss of earnings during detention is clearly allowable; and this, although not actually earning freight at the time of the injury, nor kept for hire, nor under a charter party, nor any market rental or charter value of vessels of like character, nor any demand for the hire of such vessels, provided it is proven to a reasonable certainty that the vessel would have been actually employed by the owner during such detention, and that she would actually have earned the owner something over and above her expenses. What is meant by this is, that such facts are competent as a basis of damages for detention. The difficulty is in making the requisite proof, both as to the fact of actual loss and of the amount. But more of that hereafter.

That the supreme court so understood the rule, and that no ultimatum was laid down in the case of Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 101, I think, appears with reasonable certainty by the opinion of that court in Sturgis v. Clough, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 269, by Justice Grier, in 1863. That was a case of collision. The injured vessel was detained fourteen days while undergoing repairs. The commissioner allowed demurrage on the naked opinions of witnesses as to what the vessel might have earned per day if engaged, unsupported by the exhibit of the owner's books, to show what she had actually made previously or afterwards. The district court disallowed the demurrage, and the supreme court sustained the decision. The district court did, however, allow something in consideration of demurrage, by way of confirming the commissioner's report as to the amount allowed for repairs, which the court regarded as too much, saying: "The result would be about just between the parties on the whole case." It appears that the injured vessel was a tug-boat used by her owners in towing vessels to and from sea, about the harbor of New York. In deciding the case, the supreme court (page 272) say: "The court did not decide that demurrage was not a proper item to be allowed in the computation of damages, but that the amount of his decree was a just allowance for all damages sustained by libellant." The force of this language will be understood by reference to the facts of the case in regard to which it was used, as above stated. And again: "On reviewing the evidence, we are satisfied that the sum allowed in the decree was 'just between the parties.' The report of the commissioner, allowing the whole bill for repairs, was not just, because the repairs necessarily made were chargeable not wholly to the collision, but to the age and previous condition of the boat. The charge for demurrage allowed by him was not justified by the evidence, although there was testimony to support it such as can always be obtained when friendly experts are called to give opinions." Thus recognizing that even such testimony as the opinions of experts as to the probable daily earnings of the vessel, in her common employment by her owner, is competent testimony, although not sufficient alone to justify the allowance. The court then, in the same connection, proceeds: "Besides, the libellant withheld the best evidence of the profits made by his boat, which would be found in his own books, showing his receipts and expenditures before the collision." Now, while this can hardly be given the force of a direct ruling upon the question, yet it is not mere dictum; and I think it is not claiming too much for it to say that it is a clear recognition of the doctrine that the probable net earnings of a vessel during detention, under circumstances very much like those of the present case, constitute a proper basis of damages for demurrage, and that the books of the owner showing the receipts and expenditures of the vessel before the collision are not only competent testimony, but constitute the best evidence as to the amount of such probable net earnings.

In the present case, the commissioner had before him not only the opinions of several competent experts as to the value of the services of the Dove to her owner per day, but the owner's books, from which trip sheets were made out and attached to the report, showing her daily receipts and expenditures during the month immediately preceding the collision, and the month immediately following the resumption of her trips. Besides the inference above drawn from Sturgis v. Clough, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 269, that the supreme court regards probable future earnings allowable as damage for detention in cases of marine tort, like the present, we have the positive opinion of Judge Leavitt, late of the Southern district of Ohio, in his charge to the jury in Jolly v. Terre Haute Drawbridge Co. [Case No. 7,441], and Judge Benedict, of the Eastern district of New York, in The Cayuga [Id. 2,535], and of Woodruff, Circuit Judge, in the same case [Id. 2,537], that such earnings do constitute a proper basis of damages in such cases. See also opinion by Justice Nelson, in The R. L. Mabey [Id. 11,871]. Such is clearly the rule in England, as has already been shown. See, also, Lown. Col. 154–156, and Shear. & R. Neg. § 599.

The subject of future profits, as a basis of damages in cases of tort, has undergone a vast amount of judicial discussion and decision in the law courts. A broad, if not well defined, distinction between actions ex contractu and actions ex delicto, is recognized in this regard, wherever it has been drawn in question. In actions ex delicto it is the almost, if not quite the unanimous voice of those courts, that such profits are recoverable as damages. Not speculative and merely possible profits. Those are never allowed. In order to be recoverable, "its source must be ascertained and its extent defined, and its realization must appear to have been reasonably certain." And I am willing to go further, and say its source must be the direct and immediate use or service of the thing injured, or the prosecution of the business interrupted.

The numerous cases cited by counsel from the law courts have been examined by me, so far as within my reach. It would be extending this opinion to too great length to notice them in detail. I shall, therefore, content myself with a simple citation of some of the leading and more prominent cases: Lacour v. Mayor, etc., 3 Duer, 406; St. John v. Mayor, etc., 6 Duer, 315; Walter v. Post, Id. 363; Allison v. Chandler, 11 Mich. 542; Sewall's Falls Bridge v. Fisk, 23 N. H. (3 Fost.) 171; Griffin v. Colver, 16 N. Y. 489.

The question in this class of cases is, has the owner lost anything by the delay, and, if so, how much? The answer to this question determines the right of the owner to recover damages for the detention. And in a case like the present, where the vessel was not kept for hire, but was kept for the owner's own use, and where there was, in fact, no market rental value of vessels, and no demand for employment in that way, the answer to be given depends upon the answer to certain other questions: First, had the owner use or employment for his vessel during the detention? And, second, how much would she have earned in such use or employment? Under the evidence in the present case, the answer to the first question is not difficult. The Dove constituted one of a line of steamers on a certain route, and upon which she was actually employed at the time of the collision. The libellant corporation continued to occupy that route during the entire time of the detention, and the Dove resumed her place upon it after the detention. At the time of the collision, and, in fact, during the detention, the libellant had virtually a monopoly of the route for both freight and passengers, and the earnings of the Dove upon the route were profitable. Of that use and employment, and of these earnings the libellant corporation was deprived by the collision. As to these conclusions from the evidence there is no contest or dispute. Clearly, then, libellant is entitled to recover something on account of the detention. How much depends upon the answer to be given to the second question. How much would the Dove have earned in such use and employment, but for the detention? The solution of this question presents some difficulty; it borders so closely upon the boundary line between that which is certain and that which is uncertain, shadowy, contingent and speculative. That the Dove would have earned something over and above her expenses we have already seen. The difficulty exists in determining how much. The certainty required is not absolute certainty, but reasonable certainty. In the first place, we have the opinions of several respectable boat and vessel owners, placing the value of the use of the Dove to her owner at sums varying from $110 to $130 per day. The opinions of witnesses, as we have seen in Sturgis v. Clough, supra, although competent testimony, are not sufficient alone to determine the amount.

But in the present case, the books of libellant were exhibited, showing the gross daily earnings of the Dove for the month of May immediately preceding, and for the month of July following the detention—testimony clearly recognized by the supreme court in Sturgis v. Clough, supra, as not only competent, but as the best evidence of the probable earnings of the vessel during the detention. And it is clearly the best evidence of which the case admits. In addition to this, the testimony shows that the month of June, during nearly the whole of which the Dove was detained, was the best month of the season. There is no conflicting testimony. It seems to me the testimony is sufficient from which the value of the use and services of the Dove, and the consequent damage to her owner by her detention, may be ascertained with reasonable certainty. I am free to admit, however, that the question is not free from difficulty, and some doubt. But the evidence given being the best the case affords, and being reasonably certain, I think strict justice requires that the party in fault should bear whatever inconvenience or hardship there may be arising out of the attendant difficulties and doubts. Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Gazelle, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 281, 284, in remarking upon the general question, with great clearness and justice, said: "The right against a wrong doer is for a restitutio in integrum, and this restitution he is bound to make without calling upon the party injured to assist him in any way whatsoever. If the settlement of the indemnification be attended with any difficulty (and in those cases difficulties must and will frequently occur), the party in fault must bear the inconvenience. He has no right to fix this inconvenience upon the injured party; and if that party derives incidentally a greater benefit than mere indemnification, it arises only from the impossibility of otherwise effecting such indemnification without exposing him to some loss or burden, which the law will not place upon him." It is true, this was said against a reduction of one-third new for old, as in insurance cases, in determining the amount due for repairs; but at page 284 the learned doctor expressly applies the same doctrine to demurrage.

The collision occurred on the night of the 31st day of May, and the Dove resumed her trips on the 28th day of June, 1869. The first nineteen days of May her trips were not daily, nor, in all cases, regular. She, in fact, made only five trips during that period. I think, therefore, that those trips must be excluded in arriving at her average daily earnings. During the last twelve days of May and the whole of July she made regular daily trips, except Sundays and the Fourth of July. She may have been, and probably was, employed on excursions on those days, but as nothing appears in the evidence with sufficient certainty to base any calculations upon as to these days, they must be treated as lay days, and excluded from the estimates. Excluding these lay days, then the Dove made eleven regular daily trips in May, and twenty-seven in July. Her gross earnings for the eleven days in May were $2,137.83, and her gross expenses for the period of time covered by these eleven days were $982.85, calculated on the basis of her gross expenses for the whole month, as proven. Her net earnings, therefore, for the eleven days in May were $1,154.98, and her average net earnings per day were $105. Her gross earnings for the twenty-seven days in July were $6,167.70, and her gross expenses for the whole month $3,179.88. Her net earnings, therefore, for the twenty-seven days in July were $2,987.82, and her average net earnings per day were $110.66. Looking at these results, and taking into consideration the opinions of the expert witnesses estimating the value of the use and services of the Dove to her owners at $110 to $130 per day, and the evidence that the period of her detention comprised a large portion of the most profitable part of the season, it clearly appears that the amount, $100 per day, fixed by the commissioner, is certainly not beyond, but, on the contrary, is entirely within the amount of the boat's probable net daily earnings during the time of her detention. I shall, therefore, not disturb his report in that respect.

But the able and usually accurate commissioner who made the report has committed two errors in regard to the number of days for which allowance for demurrage shall be made. In the first place, he has allowed for twenty-eight days when only twenty-seven intervened between the time of the collision and the resumption of her trips by the Dove; the collision having occurred on the night of May 31st, and the Dove having resumed on the 28th day of the following month. In the second place, no allowance was made for lay days. I think this allowance should be made, for the reason that the same proof upon which we base our conclusions as to the value of the boat's earnings, shows quite as clearly that Sundays were usually though not quite always, lay days. As four of these occurred during the twenty-seven days' detention, they must be deducted from the time. This is necessary to make the estimates as to time, and as to the amount of damages per day, consistent with the basis upon which both are established. And it is contrary to justice that the owner should receive pay for such days as it is reasonably certain, for anything the proofs show, the boat would have earned him nothing. Deducting the four days from the twenty-seven days, leaves twenty-three days, for which the allowance must be made at $100 per day, making in all $2,300, instead of $2,800, as found by the commissioner; and his report must be modified accordingly. The difference $500, together with interest thereon, at the same rate, and for the same time allowed by the commissioner on the whole amount, must be deducted from the gross amount of the commissioner's report.

2. As to the allowance made for the services of the steamer Eighth Ohio. Both parties except as to this item; respondent claiming it is too high, and libellant claiming it is too low. There is no dispute as to the fact of the service being rendered, its necessity, and as to the length of time. The only dispute is as to the amount. The steamer belonged to libellant. She was hired by the underwriters, and was used by them as a wrecking vessel in raising the Dove. She was so used in running of errands, boarding and lodging the men, and tugging. The price agreed to be paid was $140 per day, and that amount was paid, and allowed in the adjustment. Libellant claims that the price was agreed on and paid in good faith, and that the whole amount ought to be allowed. Respondent claims that a lower priced boat might have been obtained which would have answered just as well, by reasonable diligence; that the amount was unreasonable, because there was no crew hired with her, or if hired, it was unnecessary, as the crew of the Dove could have been used on her; and that at all events the crew of the Dove was in fact so used to some extent. The commissioner reduced the amount from $140 per day, as claimed, to $100 per day, and fixed the allowance on that basis. The testimony appears to be somewhat conflicting, and, as it comes to me, the preponderance is not palpable. The commissioner had the witnesses all before him, and heard their testimony, and no doubt gave it careful consideration. Under these circumstances, the safer rule appears to be, not to disturb the finding of the commissioner, and such I believe to be the usual practice. See Egbert v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. [Case No. 4,305]; Holmes v. Dodge [Id. 6,637]. The exceptions to this item are therefore overruled.

3. As to the remaining exceptions. * * * Libellant's second exception is to the disallowance of the sum of $100, paid Joseph Nicholson. However valuable Nicholson's aid may have been to libellant in the settlement and payment of bills—and I have no doubt it was valuable—I fail to see its necessity, and I think it is too remote to be charged as a necessary consequence of the collision. I therefore consider the disallowance correct. * * * Respondent's eighth exception is to damage to cornice, head lines and frescoes, $300. This allowance was made solely upon the estimate of Captain Sloan, master of the Dove, and who had charge of the repairs generally. Estimates of this kind are allowed and acted on in cases where the repairs have not been made at the time of the assessment, but never, I believe, where the repairs have been actually made. Where the repairs have been made, I believe it to be the invariable rule—at all events, I am clear that it ought to be—to adopt the actual cost of the repairs as the measure of damages. The actual cost admits of certainty of proof, while estimates depend upon the mere opinions of witnesses which may or may not be correct. In this case, the cabin, in which this item of damage is alleged to have been done was repaired, and it does not appear what these particular repairs cost, separately from the general repairs. Under the rule above stated, there is therefore no basis on which to make the allowance.

The remaining exceptions involve merely questions of fact and are not reported.

Case No. 9,346.

The MAY FLOWER.

[3 Ware, 300.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. Aug., 1863.

SHIPPING—GOODS ON BOARD — BILL OF LADING—DUTY TO GIVE—PROVISIONS OF.

1. When goods are laden on board of a vessel, the master is bound by the contract to give a bill of lading of them. But a bill of lading, in its essence, only contains a receipt of the goods with a promise to carry and deliver them according to the terms of the contractor.

[Cited in Robinson v. Memphis & C. R. Co., 9 Fed. 139.]

2. The price of the carriage and delivery is no essential part of the instrument, and is inserted merely for the convenience of the parties. If it is not agreed upon, or there is a misunderstanding between the parties on this point, the master is not obliged to give a bill of lading determining the freight.

In admiralty.

Mr. Gilbert, for libellant.

Mr. Fox, for respondent

WARE, District Judge. Mr. Tiffany, a merchant of New York, wishing to ship a quantity of ice to New Orleans, for the purpose of obtaining a vessel for that use, visited the Kennebec and hired the lower hold of the May Flower, of Mr. Hagar, of Richmond. By the terms of the agreement, he was to have the whole of the lower hold but no other part of the ship. The freight which he was to pay for the exclusive use of that part of the vessel, is partially, but not fully agreed, and out of this difference of opinion the present controversy has arisen. The May Flower was a new ship, having never made a voyage. By the United States admeasurement, she measured 899 tons, but her real carrying capacity was supposed to be considerably greater. For the purpose of ascertaining nearly what that was, Mr. McCarting, an agent of Mr. Tiffany, together with Mr. Hagar, was deputed to make a rough admeasurement of the vessel. They reported that she could carry, in the lower hold, 1,200 tons or more. On this report Mr. Tiffany agreed to pay $10,000 for the lower hold. So far is agreed by the parties. But it is alleged in the answer that the whole agreement was, that $10,000, at least, as a gross sum, should be paid, but if the quantity actually laden should exceed that sum, calculated at $9.75 per ton, then for the use of that part of the ship, should be paid for every ton so laden at that rate, to wit, $9.75 per ton. The ship completed her lading at Bath, where she took, including what was laden at Richmond, 1,233 tons. The agent of the shipper, Mr. McCarting, then demanded a bill of lading in the common form, hiring the freight at $10,000 a gross sum. This the master refused by the direction of Mr. Hagar, but offered one in conformity with the agreement as understood by him, fixing the freight at $9.75 per ton. It does not appear, from the evidence, that a bill in any other form than that in which the freight was determined was mentioned on either side.

On this state of the case a question was raised by the counsel for the claimant, whether he was bound to give any bill of lading, the bargain being merely for the transportation and delivery of the goods, and nothing was said in the contract of a bill of lading. The want of a decision on this point may be accounted for in different ways. One mode is, that the delivery of a bill of lading is so much a matter of course that no master has ever refused it when demanded, or has thought it worth the expense to contest the legality of the demand. But there must always be a first case, and the true question is, whether he was bound by law to deliver one. My opinion is, that he was so bound. All contracts bind the parties according to their common intention, when that can be clearly ascertained, not that of one party or of the other, but of both; and this whether the intention is expressed by words or not. By a contract, generally, a party binds his heirs and personal representatives, though they are not commonly named, for he binds all his property for the performance of it. This addition is annexed by the law. But customs and usages may annex terms and conditions to a contract, as well as positive law, and even vary the meaning of words actually used. In the case of Smith v. Wilson, 3 Barn. & Adol. 728, custom was allowed to change the meaning of a word which has as definite a signification as any in the language. In that contract, which related to rabbits, one thousand was held, according to the common intention of the parties, to mean one hundred dozen or twelve hundred. And this decision is confirmed by others of a like character. This was a land contract, but mercantile contracts are almost always elliptical, leaving something to be understood which is not expressed, and custom and usage may add terms and conditions to a contract as well as law. Indeed, almost all our mercantile law is the mere adoption, by the courts, of the customs of merchants. Contracts are conventions, says Domat, Lois Civiles, liv. 1, tit. 1, § 3, No. 1, bind the parties, not only by their words, but to all which is demanded by the nature of the contract, by the law and by custom, unless these consequences are expressly excluded. When the owner agreed to carry the ice, he bound himself just as much to give a receipt for it, with a promise to deliver it in the usual terms, as he did to carry it. Such a receipt and promise is just as much expected by the master as the shipper. It is included, by the common understanding, in the general contract. My opinion, therefore, is, that a bill of lading to this effect, he was bound by the contract to give. It is of the essence of a bill of lading, that it contains a receipt for the goods with a promise to carry and deliver them, for this the master promises, and it necessarily contains nothing more. But, for convenience, it is usual to insert also the sum to be paid for their carriage. And if this is agreed, as is usually the case, it may, very suitably, be inserted. But this instrument is commonly given after the goods are received and stowed. It is given by the master. And if the freight is either not agreed, which is certainly uncommon, or there is a misunderstanding on this point between the shipper and the master, or owner, what is to be done? The giving of a bill of lading is the master's own act. It is a very ancient document, probably as old as maritime trade, and highly respected. And though not conclusive between the owner of the goods and the vessel, it is at least prima facie evidence, and if indorsed for a valuable consideration, it is conclusive between such purchasers and the ship owner or master. 5 Pars. Mar. Law, c. 7, § 2. The master is not obliged to furnish evidence against himself, especially when the truth of this he does not admit. He was thus justified in refusing such a bill of lading, and he is then standing only for his legal right in refusing one, stating the freight at a higher rate than what he understood it. And such a bill only was demanded. It does not appear that one in any other form was mentioned or thought of by either party, and such an one the master was not bound to give. The amount of the freight not being agreed upon between the parties, this might, perhaps, be determined by a libel for not giving a bill of lading framed for that purpose. But the libel is not framed with that view, and it may as well be determined in a libel for the freight, if the ship carries it in safety to its port of delivery. And as, by the contract, the freight is to be paid at New York and not New Orleans, it may be more conveniently settled there. In the mean time no wrong can be done, as the manifest shows the amount of ice laden. The libel is dismissed with costs.

TAXATION—TAX TITLE—REQUISITES — DEMAND BY COLLECTOR—JUDGMENT.

1. Under the revenue law of Illinois, passed February 26, 1839 [Laws 1839, p. 31], (the circuit court acting as a court of limited and special jurisdiction,) it is necessary to show that everything was done, and how done, that is required by law to be done, to give it jurisdiction.

2. A collector of taxes must make a demand for taxes upon the owner of land, before a judgment can properly be rendered against it.

This was an action of ejectment [by Eusebius Mayhew against Samuel H. Davis]. The defendant pleaded a special plea, setting up a tax title, acquired since the commencement of the action; in which plea he set out fully the record of the judgment of the Peoria circuit court against the land; the collector's report, on which judgment was rendered, together with notice and certificate of the publication thereof; the process or precept under which the land was sold by sheriff, and his deed from the sheriff to the land in controversy.

The collector's report was in the following form:

[State of Illinois v. Suit for Taxes. List of land and other real estate situated in the county of Peoria, and state of Illinois, on which taxes are due and remain unpaid, for the year 1842.][2]

The costs already accrued on each of the foregoing tracts of land and town lots, are twelve cents.

Then follows the notice and certificate of publication, signed by John S. Zeiber, and indorsed on the back was a certificate of the collector, that said lands, etc., were assessed for taxes for the year 1842, for state and county purposes; that the taxes and costs thereon remain due and unpaid, and that the owners had no goods and chattels in his county on which he could levy for the payment of the same. The judgment and precept were in the form prescribed in the statute.

To the defendant's plea, the plaintiff filed a demurrer, alleging for cause, the want of jurisdiction in the circuit court to render said judgment, upon the facts set out in said plea. It was further agreed by the counsel, for the purpose of trying the question fully and fairly before the court, that the same objections might be made upon the demurrer, that could have been made to the record, etc., if the same were offered in evidence.

The following were the points made by the counsel for the plaintiff: (1) The record does not show that any demand was ever made by the collector for the payment of taxes, etc. (2) The judgment is void, being for a greater amount of taxes than the court was authorized in rendering by the law, and by the facts before the court.

A. Williams and B. S. Edwards, for plaintiff.

O. Peters and E. N. Powell, for defendant.

POPE, District Judge. This is an action of ejectment—special plea, setting up a tax title, under the act of the legislature of Illinois, of the 26th February, 1839, "concerning the public revenue." The defendant exhibits the proceedings before the circuit court of Peoria county, the judgment, execution, sale and deed by the sheriff; also, the report of the collector, giving a list of the land; that the owner had no personal property out of which to levy the taxes, and notice that he would move for judgment against the land upon which the taxes were due and unpaid. To this plea the plaintiff demurred.

When I consider the vast amount of property depending upon the question involved in this suit, I can not but feel the immense responsibility I incur; and this feeling is increased by the fact that my construction of the law is in conflict with that of the supreme court of Illinois, to whose decisions it is my duty to conform. I shall not attempt to overturn any of its decisions; but I dissent from its reasoning. That court allows great latitude of presumption in favor of the acts of the officers and persons engaged in the collection of taxes; I, on the contrary, hold them bound to show that they have acted in strict compliance with the law from which they derive their power. That court holds that some of the requirements of the law are directory; while I hold them to be material and essential. The defendant claims to hold the land in controversy (valued by the assessor at nine hundred and sixty dollars) by virtue of a sale, at which he paid less than five dollars for it. This, then, is a claim of strict right, where a court would not grant a new trial; nor would a chancellor enforce such an unequal bargain. But it is said that the state must raise taxes; and that can not be done unless the courts give to the sales a liberal support. This has not been found necessary in other states, or by the general government, and yet their faith has not suffered. Purchases of tax titles have been esteemed a good investment; for if the land be redeemed, it must be on the payment of a hundred per cent., and if not, the owner of the land almost always is willing to extinguish the tax title by paying a premium upon the advance. By the 8th article of the constitution of Illinois (section 8) it is provided that no man's property shall be taken from him, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land. The 20th section, same article, declares that "the mode of levying a tax shall be by valuation, so that every person shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of the property he or she has in his or her possession." What is a tax? It is not a debt. It is a contribution or contingent, which the citizen should pay to the support of the government under which he lives. It is the right and duty of the government to ascertain its amount, and make requisition therefor. This is done by making an estimate of the expenses of the government, the value of each one's property, and levying the tax accordingly. To accomplish this, legislation is necessary. So the people of Illinois, represented in general assembly, by the act of 26th February, 1839, consented to a tax of twenty cents on the one hundred dollars' valuation of their property, and also that the county commissioners' court might levy a tax for county purposes, not exceeding fifty cents on the hundred dollars, if the court should deem it necessary to defray the expenses of the county. The tax is to be collected. The legislature prescribes the modus operandi. One or more assessors for the county are to be appointed, whose duty it is to call upon each property holder for a list of his property—if not at home, a notice in writing must be left at his house, with some one over twelve years of age, notifying him to attend at some time and place specified in the notice, to give him a list of his taxable property. The list must be returned to the clerk of the county commissioners' court, and shall contain the names of the owners, with the valuation annexed to each piece of property. The next step is the appointment of a suitable person to act as collector; (this is the language of the law.) He is to call on the property holders for their taxes. If not paid, the tax payer is allowed twenty days to make payment, before the collector can employ coercion. This demand converts the tax into a debt, requiring the debtor to seek his creditor.

The tax payer could rest secure until the collector made the demand, which alone could put him in default. Without demand, and neglect or refusal to pay the taxes within twenty days, the collector could not proceed to levy on his goods and chattels, nor report him or his lands to the court as delinquent, When the tax payer shall have failed to pay on demand, or in twenty days thereafter, the collector may levy on his goods and chattels; and if he can find none, then he may return or report against the land to the court, and move for judgment.

It is here proper to pause on the inquiry, what is necessary to happen before the owner can be reported to the court as being in default, and the motion made for judgment against his land? I answer: First, the assessor must have listed his property for taxation; second, he must have valued it. These two facts are material and essential; because, without them, no tax could be levied, as no one but the assessor could take the list or value the property: without valuation no tax could be collected. In addition to this, two other facts are equally material and essential, viz: First, demand by the collector; and second, in default thereof, the collector must have levied on goods and chattels, if to be found. If all these things have been done, then the owner is in default. The collector is ready to bring his suit in the circuit court. The manner of doing this is to give notice of his intention to move for judgment for the sale of the delinquent property, and he is to make a report to the court. The 25th section gives the form of the list to be reported, but not of the facts to show to the court that the lands are subject to its jurisdiction. Those facts are to be found in the requirements of the law. Without the allegation of the necessary and material facts, to be set out in the report of the collector, the court can not render judgment. For the present, we will suppose that the collector reported to the court that the assessor listed and valued the property; that he (the collector) demanded the taxes, which were not paid; that he then sought in vain for goods and chattels of the owner—what faith and credit should the court bestow on the report? In other words, should the court require the facts to be proved, or receive them as true until the contrary is shown?

This is a grave question, upon which I do not feel myself called upon to express an opinion. When it becomes necessary for me to pass upon it, I hope my health will be better than it is now. It may not be out of place here to make some suggestions in regard to it. The faith and credit to be bestowed on the report of the collector, depend upon the character of this personage, who is appointed as a suitable person to act as collector. Is he a common law officer of any court? No. Does he form any part of the machinery of the common law? No. Are his duties general and permanent, or special and temporary? Special and temporary. Is his responsibility general or special? Special: this is to the state. His bond can only be sued for the use of the state. Is he not then an agent appointed by the state, for a particular object, and when that is accomplished, his agency ceases? Are not such agents bound to show that they have performed their duty, and how they have done it? But enough of this. These suggestions are thrown out only to awaken inquiry. I suppose the notice of the collector must be regarded as the process to bring parties before the court—the report of the collector, the declaration. Now, what must appear in a declaration? I answer, the facts essential to a recovery. It is impossible to presume that the court had proof before it, of any material fact not alleged in the declaration. Where the parties are properly before a court of common law jurisdiction, and the court is silent in regard to the evidence upon which it rendered its judgment, it will be presumed that the court had proof of the truth of all the allegations of the declaration, but none other. It will not be supposed that the court admitted, and acted on any matter de hors the declaration.

In the case at bar, the report of the collector avers the existence of only one of the material facts deemed by this court necessary to a recovery, namely, that he could find no goods and chattels upon which to levy—omitting to state, unless inferentially, that the assessor listed and valued the property, and omitting altogether any allegation of demand and refusal to pay the taxes. But the circuit court does not allow the presumption, that it received proof of the facts omitted in the report, because it expressly bases its judgment upon the report alone. It must be held, that the omission to state a fact material and essential to a recovery, is proof that it does not exist; therefore, no demand for the taxes was made by the collector. Hence, a judgment rendered upon that state of facts, is on an immaterial issue, and therefore inefficacious, even if rendered by a court of general common law jurisdiction. It is worthy of note, that the 43d section, which enumerates certain facts, some prima facie, and some conclusive, which are proved by the sheriff's deed, does not include in either class, demand by the collector. The existence of that fact, then, is not proved by the deed. That it is material and essential is too manifest to require proof. Indeed, it would be an insult to common sense to offer it. The court might here dismiss the subject, by deciding that the judgment and subsequent proceedings are void, because coram non judice, and therefore no defense to the action.

It was argued for the defendant, that this is an action in rem, not in personam. The court does not see what conclusion can be drawn from this position; for whether in rem or personam, the case must be brought legally before the court, before it can take jurisdiction, either of the thing, or person.

It was also urged, with an earnestness indicative of sincerity, that, admitting the judgment to be erroneous, it is still binding until reversed, and a sale on the execution will be sustained, and the purchaser hold the property, even if the judgment be afterward reversed. However this may be, where the court has jurisdiction by having the person or thing properly before it, it does not hold, where the court has not jurisdiction; a judgment in that case is void—a perfect nullity; and this is the case at bar. The circuit court had no jurisdiction. The 43d section gives a force to the sheriff's deed truly alarming. It takes from the man whose property has been sold, almost all defense. It matters not how corruptly or negligently the assessor and collector may have acted, he can not defend himself unless by making it appear that the land was not liable to taxation, that the taxes were paid, that the land was not listed and assessed for taxation, etc., etc. I advert to this section, to show how imperative it is on courts to exact of the ministerial officers, the greatest strictness in the performance of their duties, and require full proof that they have performed all the requirements of law, and how.

But, it is said that some of the requirements of the legislature are only directory, and may be dispensed with. Upon this, it may be remarked, that a judge should rarely (if ever) take upon himself to say that what the legislature required, is unnecessary. He may not see the necessity of it, still it is unsafe to assume that the legislature did not have a reason for it; perhaps it only aimed at uniformity. In that case, the judge can not interfere to defeat that object, however puerile it may appear. It is admitted that there are cases where the requirements may be deemed directory. But it may safely be affirmed that it can never be, where the act, or the omission of it, can by any possibility work advantage or injury (however slight) to any one affected by it. In such case it never can be committed. Does the circuit court, when executing the revenue law, act as a court of common law? It does not. It acts as a court of special and limited jurisdiction, and subject to the rules that govern courts of that character. The supreme court of the United States has so decided in the case of Thatcher v. Powell, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 119. In that case, Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "In summary proceedings, where the court exercises an extraordinary power under a special statute, prescribing a course, we think that course ought to be exactly observed, and those facts, especially, which give jurisdiction, ought to appear, in order to show that its proceedings are coram judice." "Previous to an order for the sale of lands for the non-payment of taxes, the sheriff is ordered to levy them by distress and sale of goods and chattels of the delinquent; and if there be no such goods and chattels, he is to report the same to the court, as the foundation of any proceedings against the lands. By this act no jurisdiction is given to the court over the lands of a person who has failed to pay his taxes, until the sheriff shall report that there were no goods and chattels out of which the taxes may be made." It was urged in that case, that although the judgment might be erroneous, yet it was binding until reversed; but the court held it void. The court held, also, that it must appear that due notice was given. That case arose in Tennessee. There the report was made by the sheriff, a common law officer, and an officer of the court. In the case at bar, the report was made by the collector, not an officer of the common law, or of the court. In that case, the sheriff was held to a strict performance of his duty, and to afford evidence that he had done so. In the case of Walker v. Turner, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 541, the supreme court of the United States says, "if the judgment be void, an execution or order of sale founded on it, is also void." Again, the same court, in the case of Williams v. Peyton [4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 77], says: "In a sale of land for non-payment of taxes, the marshal's deed is not even prima facie evidence that the pre-requisites required by law have been complied with, but the person claiming under it must show positively that they have been complied with." The same doctrine has been maintained in Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, Virginia, and most of the other states. Indeed, no departure from it, or conflict with, has been shown to this court in the argument, and none is supposed to exist.

It was contended at the bar that although the judgment is erroneous, still, until reversed, it will support the execution and sale. This is contradicted by the authorities just cited, and also by the case of Denning v. Corwin, 11 Wend. 648, 649, etc. In that case the supreme court of New York says that the court must have jurisdiction of the person and subject matter, or the proceedings will be void—this case was for partition of land; the judgment was held void because it did not appear that the requirements of the law were strictly pursued. The judgment was not erroneous, but void.

From the authorities here cited, and from numerous others, it appears that the circuit court, when executing the law of February 26th, 1839, concerning the revenue, acts as a court of limited and special jurisdiction, and therefore, bound to show that everything was done, and how done, that is required by law to be done, to give jurisdiction. That the legislature did not deem the circuit court, when executing the revenue laws, a court of common law, is manifested by the fact that it furnished to the court the forms for the judgment and final process, and further, denied to it the power to try the cases according to the course of the common law, but to "hear and determine them in a summary manner without pleading." And yet it is said, that a court so trammeled and supplied with manufactured forms is a court of common law jurisdiction, and entitled to all presumption belonging to such courts. This is truly preposterous. For the reason that no demand was made by the collector for the taxes upon the owner, and no reason given for its omission, the judgment of the circuit court and other subsequent proceedings are void. Therefore, the law is with the demurrant. It does not appear that this point was presented to or considered by the supreme court of Illinois, either in the case of Atkins v. Hinman, 2 Gilman, 437, or Taylor v. People, Id. 349. Hence my opinion is not in conflict with those decisions.

Again there is another fatal defect in the defense. By the collector's report it appears that the land in controversy was valued by the assessor at $960 00; the judgment is for $4 44; the state tax amounts only to $1 92; I suppose the residue was for county purposes. But it no where appears that the county commissioners' court levied a tax at all; the power given to that court was discretionary, to levy a tax not exceeding fifty cents in the hundred dollars, or any less sum, or none at all. This point, also, does not seem to have been considered or decided by the supreme court of Illinois.

The MAY HOWLAND.

COLD et al. v. The MAY HOWLAND.

[2 Adm. Rec. 307-312.]

Superior Court, Florida. Nov. 19, 1839.

SALVAGE—DECREE—AMOUNT—ALLOWING EXTRA TIME FOR PAYMENT.

In admiralty.

Charles Walker, for libellants.
A. Gordon, for respondent.

MARVIN, J. It appearing that the libellants are entitled to salvage for their services in saving the cargo and materials, as by them alleged; and that the total value thereof in cash at this port is $23,651.85; and that the miscellaneous character and nature of said cargo is such that salvage cannot be awarded and paid in kind, or by a division of said cargo, as the rule and custom of this court requires when salvage can be paid in kind, and it is not otherwise adjusted by the parties, so that a sale becomes necessary, unless the same shall be advanced and paid by the underwriters or owners thereof; and it also appearing that if a sale of part of said cargo be had to pay salvage and expenses, the residue thereof cannot be transhipped to its port of original destination without incurring an expense far disproportioned to its value; so that it is most to the interest of whoever may be concerned, that the whole of said cargo be sold by order of this court, unless such salvage be advanced and paid by the owners or underwriters, as is shown by the petition of the master filed in this case; and it also appearing reasonable that further time should be given to the owners and underwriters to advance and pay said salvage, before resorting to a sale thereof: ordered, adjudged and decreed that the marshal advertise and sell at public auction on the 2nd day of December the cargo and materials of the ship May Howland which remain unsold, unless before that time the owners or underwriters thereof pay to him the salvage and expenses hereinafter decreed; and that from the moneys paid into court, if sale be had, the clerk pay first the taxable costs and expenses of this suit, including the marshal's, clerk's and witnesses' fees, wharfage, storage and bills for labor duly attested.

Second, if the whole cargo be sold and the proceeds brought into court, that then he pay from the residue of said money arising from the sale of cargo and materials saved by them, to David Cold, Samuel Sanderson, John Geiger, William H. Bethel or their respective agents, in full for their services, forty-three per cent. thereof. If the cargo be not sold, that then he pay them the sum of eight thousand one hundred and thirty-six dollars for their services as aforesaid.

Third, that the clerk, if sale be had of that part of the cargo and materials saved by Haley, Curry, and Roberts, pay to them or their respective agents, fifty per cent. of the proceeds of sale after paying as above directed the costs and expenses properly chargeable to the cargo and materials saved by them. If no sale be had, that then he pay to them the sum of eight hundred dollars in full for their services.

Fourth, if the owners or underwriters as above provided advance and pay the salvage and expenses, then the marshal is ordered to receive, and the clerk to pay, the salvage above specified, and the costs and expenses of this suit above specified, and thereupon discharge the said cargo.

Fifth, that all moneys remaining in the registry of the court, the clerk is directed to pay, to the master of the said ship, as the agent of all persons interested therein, and that Spanish doubloons be received, and paid at $17.00 each, and Mexican doubloons at $16.00 each, and all other questions be reserved.

Case No. 9,349.

MAYNADIER v. DUFF.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 4.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1830.

DETINUE—EX CONTRACTU—JUSTICE OF PEACE.

1. Detinue is an action in form ex contractu and not ex delicto; and is not on that ground to be excluded from the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

2. The justices of the peace in Alexandria county, as single magistrates, have jurisdiction in cases of detinue.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace in the county of Alexandria, in an action of detinue brought by James Duff against William Maynadier, for nine silver spoons and a soup-ladle.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant, the appellant, contended, that a justice of the peace has not jurisdiction in detinue. In Virginia the jurisdiction was given by an act passed in December, 1806, since the separation of Alexandria county from that state. At common law there could be no execution in detinue but a distringas, and a justice of the peace, by the law of Virginia, could issue no execution but a fieri facias, and by that writ the alternative value in detinue could not be made. By the act of congress of 1823 (3 Stat. 743), enlarging the jurisdiction of justices of the peace, a fieri facias, and a ca. sa. only are given, so that a justice of the peace has no means of enforcing a judgment in detinue. None of the provisions of the act of congress apply to such an action. A justice of the peace has jurisdiction only of cases in form ex contractu; and detinue is in form ex delicto. 1 Tidd. Prac. 1.

Mr. Taylor cited Rob. Forms, 366, 367, and the case of Barnard v. Herbert [Case No. 1,347], in this court, July 28, 1829, as to the form of execution in detinue; also, Jordan v. Williams, 3 Rand. [Va.] 501.

Mr. Neale, contrà, submitted the case to the court without argument.

CRANCH, Chief Judge (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, dissenting). In this case it is contended by the appellant, that the justice of the peace had not jurisdiction of this suit because it was in the form of an action of detinue, of which the jurisdiction is not given to a justice of the peace, either by the laws of Virginia existing on the 27th of February, 1801, or by the act of congress of March 1, 1823 (3 Stat. 743), "to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace," &c. It is said that the justices have jurisdiction only in actions ex contractu, and that detinue is an action ex delicto. 1 Tidd, Prac. 1. Mr. Tidd, in page 1, says, "Actions upon contract are, account, assumpsit, covenant, debt, annuity, and scire facias;" and in page 5, "actions for wrongs are case, detinue, replevin, and trespass vi et armis." Yet in page 10, he says, "and there is a case where it was held that debt and detinue might be joined in the same action," and for this he cites Gilb. Com. Pl. 5, and 1 Bac. Abr. 30. And in page 93, he says, "Formerly it was not usual to proceed in the king's bench by original writ in debt, detinue, or other action of a mere civil nature." And in pages 95, 96, he says, "In actions of account, covenant, debt, annuity, and detinue, the original writ is called a 'praecipe,' by which the defendant has an option given him, either to do what he is required, or show cause to the contrary; but in assumpsit and actions for wrongs it is called a 'pone,' or 'si te fecerit securum,' by which the defendant is peremptorily required to show cause in the first instance. In point of form the original writ is special or general—'nominatum vel innominatum.' The former contains the time, place, and other circumstances of the demand very particularly; the latter only a general complaint without expressing the particulars, as the writ of trespass quare clausum fregit," &c. And in page 105, he says, "The first process or proceeding upon the original writ in actions of account, covenant, debt, annuity, and detinue, is a summons;" thereby classing detinue with the actions ex contractu. It appears therefore very clearly from Mr. Tidd's own book, that he committed a mistake in his first page in not classing detinue with the actions upon contract. Whether he also erred in page 5, by classing it with actions for wrongs, is not so clear, yet there is no more wrong in the unjustly detaining a chattel from a man to whom it belongs, than there is in unjustly detaining money which he owes and refuses to pay. When, in detinue, the cause of action is bailment of a thing to be redelivered, it is clearly an action ex contractu; when the cause of action is finding and refusing to deliver the thing to its owner it partakes of the nature of a tort; but still the form of action is ex contractu, and the plea is non detinet, and non culpabilis as in the action of trover and conversion, which, in form, is ex delicto. In detinue, the gist of the action is the unjust detainer; in trover, it is the unlawful conversion. In the former the grievance is temporary; in the latter the loss is total. Mr. Chitty seems to have fallen into the same mistake. In his first volume on Pleading (page 87), he classes detinue under both heads. He says, "Personal actions are in form, ex contractu, or ex delicto; or, in other words, are for breach of contract, or for wrongs unconnected with contract. Those upon contracts are, principally, assumpsit, debt, covenant, and detinue; and those for wrongs are case, trover, detinue, replevin, and trespass vi et armis." Yet in a note in page 117 he says, "as debt and detinue may be joined in the same action, though the judgment is different, (Brownlow, Redivivus, 186; Gilb. Ch. Prac. 5; 2 Saund. 117, b,) and as it has been stated that detinue is not sustainable when the goods come tortiously into the defendant's possession, (3 Bl. Comm. 152, post, 119,) I have therefore considered this action under the head of actions ex contractu." In pages 117, 118, he says, "It lies upon a contract for not delivering a specific chattel in pursuance of a bailment or other contract. But as, to support this action, the property in some particular chattel must be vested in the plaintiff, assumpsit, or debt in the detinet, is the only remedy for the non-delivery of corn, &c., sold, where no specific corn was contracted for." In page 121, he says: "This action is, in most cases, still subject to wager of law; on which account it was not much in use till that mode of trial became obsolete, but now it is frequently adopted." In page 122, Mr. Chitty again says: "Personal actions, in form, ex delicto, and which are principally for the redress of wrongs unconnected with contract, are case, trover, detinue, replevin, and trespass vi et armis." And in a note to the word "detinue," in this passage, he says: "We have already considered this action, which, we have seen, lies for the non-delivery of goods according to a contract, and therefore it is unnecessary to give it further consideration." Mr. Chitty seems to have confounded two ideas which ought to have been kept distinct, namely, the cause and the form of action. The cause of action may really arise ex delicto, and yet the party may, perhaps, in some cases, by waiving the tort, have remedy by an action in form, ex contractu; and this may be the reason why Mr. Chitty has classed detinue under both heads. When the owner has lost his goods, and they are found by a stranger, who refuses to deliver them to the owner, detinue lies; and yet there was no contract unless the law, in civil cases, will imply that every man has contracted to do what, in law, he was civilly bound to do. The cause of action, if not exactly ex delicto, is quasi ex delicto; yet our ancestors, more than six hundred years ago, gave a remedy by a writ in form, ex contractu, and even gave the very writ of debt itself, as well as detinue, for goods unjustly detained. See the forms of writs of debt in Reg. Brevium, 139; 1 Bac. Abr. 30; 2 Bac. Abr. Debt, F, and the cases there cited; Rast. Ent. 150a, where there is the form of a declaration in debt for money, joined with detinue for goods, in the same count, and wager of law as to both causes of action. And in Rast. Ent. fol. 174a, is the form of the judgment, in a like case, for the plaintiff's debt and damages, and also for ten quarters of malt, or the value thereof, and a distringas awarded as to the malt, and a writ of inquiry of damages for the detention of the malt and of the value of the malt, in case it should not have been delivered to the plaintiff. And in Co. Ent. 158a, pl. 32, is an action of debt, for money, in the debet and detinet, and for goods in the detinet, in one count. See, also, Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 273, 274; Debt for Chattels; 3 Wood. Lect. 103; 1 Rolle, Abr. 604; Brooke, Abr. "Debt," pl. 211. "The judgment in debt," Mr. Woodeson says, "is for money or goods demanded, and if the goods cannot be had, then for the value, which, if not found by the original verdict, may be ascertained by a writ of inquiry and verdict thereon." Mr. Woodeson classes detinue under the head of personal actions founded on contract; and in page 104, he says: "Detinue has a very close affinity to the last species of debt, and is, indeed, hardly distinguishable from it, except, perhaps, that in detinue the property is supposed to be vested before action brought. When a plaintiff purposes to recover a specific chattel, this action may be sued, and it may arise either ex contractu, as bailment, or the accidental possession and wrongful detention of goods." Bacon (1 Bac. Abr. 28), who takes his language from Gilb. Com. Pl. p. 4, says: "Personal actions are ex contractu, or those founded on contract, as debt, which is to restore the thing in numero, or detinue, which is to restore the thing in specie, or damages, where it cannot be had; also, actions of covenant, assumpsit, quantum meruit, quantum valebat, covenant, and annuity; or, ex delicto, as trespasses founded upon force, which are trespasses vi et armis; or, upon fraud, which are actions upon the case." In the case of Kettle v. Bromsall, Willes, 120, Willes, C. J., took it for granted that trover and detinue could not be joined. See, also, Mr. Durnford's note to the same case.

Upon the whole, I am satisfied that detinue is an action in form ex contractu, and not ex delicto, and is not, on that account, to be excluded from the jurisdiction of a single justice of the peace. Let us now see whether it is given to a single magistrate, under the statutes of Virginia. By the act of 3d December, 1792, concerning the county and other inferior courts (Rev. Code 1802, p. 84, § 5), all causes of less value than five dollars, (or two hundred pounds of tobacco,) except prosecutions on penal statutes, are expressly excluded from the jurisdiction of the county courts. By the 6th section, "When the cause of action shall not exceed five dollars (or two hundred pounds of tobacco,) the same is hereby declared to be cognizable, and finally determinable by one justice of the peace who may give judgment and thereupon award execution against the goods and chattels of the debtor, or party against whom such judgment shall be given, which shall be executed and returned by the sheriff or constable to whom directed, in the same manner as other writs of fieri facias are to be executed and returned; but no execution shall be by him granted against the body of the defendant." By the 37th section of the same act, "Any debt or penalty amounting to more than five dollars, (or two hundred pounds of tobacco, and not exceeding twenty dollars, or eight hundred pounds of tobacco,) may be demanded, by petition to the court of a county, city, or borough." "And the defendant being summoned," "the court shall and may hear and determine the matter in dispute in a summary way," "and give such judgment as shall appear to be just." And by the 38th section, "Any person may, by petition, to be served and tried in like manner, demand and recover goods detained, or the value of them, and damages for the detention; or damages for goods found by the defendant, and converted to his use, where the goods, with the damages, are not of greater value than twenty dollars, (or eight hundred pounds of tobacco.)" And "Whosoever shall bring any other action than a petition, if it appear, either by his own showing in the declaration, or by the verdict of a jury, that he might have brought a petition by this act, shall be nonsuit." It is evident, that, by the 5th section of this act, the county court has not jurisdiction of detinue in a cause of less value than five dollars; and that, by the 6th section, such a cause is cognizable and finally determinable by one justice of the peace, who has authority to award execution against the goods and chattels of the party against whom the judgment shall be given. The 37th and 38th sections, only authorize the county courts to exercise their jurisdiction in a summary way, in certain causes, and confine the jurisdiction of those causes to the county or corporation courts, and do not, in any manner, affect the jurisdiction given by the 6th section, to a single justice of the peace.

The act of the 16th of January, 1801, only extends the jurisdiction of a single justice of the peace to causes of ten dollars value, in cases where they had, before, jurisdiction to the value of five dollars. If a justice of the peace had not jurisdiction in detinue, in causes of five dollars value, no court had; for all causes of less value than five dollars were expressly excluded from the jurisdiction of the county courts by the 5th section of the act. Thus the law stood in Alexandria county on the 27th of February, 1801, when the laws of Virginia were adopted by the act of congress (1 Stat. 103), "concerning the District of Columbia," by which justices of the peace were to be appointed, who should, "in all matters, civil and criminal, and in whatever relates to the conservation of the peace, have all the powers vested in, and perform all the duties required of, justices of the peace as individual magistrates, by the laws thereinbefore continued in force in that part of the District, and should have cognizance in personal demands, to the value of twenty dollars, exclusive of costs." And thus their jurisdiction continued until the 1st of March, 1823, when the act of congress (3 Stat. 743), was passed, "to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace, in the recovery of debts in the District of Columbia." This act, it is said, contains provisions and terms inconsistent with the nature of the action of detinue, and with the process necessary to enforce the judgment; and, therefore, even if detinue to the value of five, or ten, or twenty dollars, could be maintained before a single justice, yet it cannot be maintained where the value is over twenty dollars.

The expressions and terms relied upon as designating the nature of the causes of action whereof jurisdiction is intended to be given to the justice of the peace, and to limit it to a certain species of personal actions, are the following, to wit: In the 1st section, the words, "debt and damages," "debtor," "creditor and debtor," "an interest thereon," that is, on the judgment; in the 6th section, the words "debt or damage;" in the 7th section, the words "debt or demand;" in the 9th section, the words "debtor and his sureties;" in the 10th section, the words "small debts;" and in the 15th section, the words "sum demanded." An argument is also drawn from the circumstance, that the only kinds of execution, mentioned in the act, are ca. sa. and fi. fa.; and that no provision is made for a distringas, which is the proper process to enforce the judgment in detinue. But the 3d section, which authorizes the justice to issue execution, does not designate the kind of execution. The words are, "authorized to issue execution or fieri facias, in the same manner as executions are now issued by the clerk of the circuit court of the District of Columbia." Whatever execution the clerk could issue, the justice may issue. It is true that the only executions named in the 9th section, are ca. sa. and fi. fa.; but that section is only applicable to executions upon supersedeas. The 13th section, also speaks only of ca. sa. and fi. fa., but it has no negative words to control the general authority given by the 3d section, or to exclude a distringas, or such an execution as was issued by this court, in the case of Barnard v. Herbert [Case No. 1,347], in July, 1829. If a justice of the peace has jurisdiction in debt, or detinue, for goods, I see nothing in the act to prevent his issuing a proper execution. The argument drawn from the words "debt" and "debtor," &c., is answered, by showing, that, at common law, an action of debt will lie as well for a specific chattel as for a sum of money; and that by the civil law, a man is said to be debtor for a specific article, as well as for the performance of a specific duty. I mention the civil law, because the original jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, in civil cases, and the manner of trial and appeal, are all analogous to the rules of that law, and seem to me to be founded thereon.

Upon the whole, I am satisfied that the justices of the peace in Alexandria county have jurisdiction in cases of detinue. I am also satisfied by the evidence, that Mr. Maynadier had no authority to sell the spoons at private sale, and that the judgment ought to be affirmed. Judgment affirmed. The complainant's patent was for a machine for cutting the soles of shoes by means of a die cutter. This he accomplished by mounting the die cutter upon a shaft, which, during the operation of cutting, is bolted, and after the cut is made, the die is lifted and unbolted, and then, by means of a rack and pinion at the top of the shaft, is made to perform a half revolution, thus reversing the ends of the cutting die, and then it descends, renewing the cutting operation, and so on continuously. One of the main features of the patented combination was the shaft, upon which, as a centre, the cutting die revolved. The defendants dispensed with the shaft, and substituted therefor a sleeve, by means of which the cutting die rotated, but the reciprocating motion was effected by the same operation, and the result accomplished was the same as in complainant's machine: Held, that the defendants infringed complainant's patent.

[1] [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[This was a bill in equity by James E. Maynadier against Daniel W. Tenney and others to enjoin the infringement of a patent.]

J. E. Maynadier, for complainant.
J. W. Hubbard, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The patent of complainants must be considered, upon the evidence in this record, as the first one in the class of machines to which the invention relates. The patent is for a machine for cutting the soles of shoes by means of a die cutter, which has a reciprocating motion, making after each cut a half revolution in order to present the widest extremity of the material to be cut opposite the narrowest extremity at the last cutting operation. This is accomplished by mounting the die cutter upon a shaft, which, during the operation of cutting, is bolted, and after the cut is made, the die is lifted and unbolted, and then, by means of a rack and pinion at the top of the shaft, is made to perform a half revolution, thus reversing the ends of the cutting die, and then it descends, renewing the cutting operation, and so on continuously. One of the main features of the combination was this shaft, upon which, as a centre, the cutting die revolved.

Under these circumstances, this being the first machine, it was competent for any person to do three things. He might, in the first place, dispensing with one of the elements of that combination in its precise form, introduce into it a known equivalent—equivalent not in the sense of being a shaft, for instance, but equivalent in the sense that, in that combination, it was the use of another well-known device, performing the same operation in the same way. That would be a naked infringement. It was competent, secondly, for a person to make the change in the machine by introducing, in the place of any one of the elements of that combination, another device, not known before as an equivalent device; that would not be an infringement under the decisions of the supreme court, which say it is not an infringement where the device substituted was not a known equivalent at the date of the patent. It was competent, in the third place, for a party desiring to change the features of the machine, to substitute for one of the elements in the combination, features which should accomplish the same result by the same mode of operation that this element accomplished, and which, in addition to it, should perform some other function which was novel and useful. That, without being a naked infringement, would be the subject of a patent for an improvement, in consequence of the additional new features which it introduced, but would still be subject to the original patent, having embodied in it that which was novel and useful in the original combination.

This last mode of modifying the machine, is the mode which it appears clearly to the court, upon inspection, has been resorted to in the defendants' patent. The shaft, as a shaft, although described as one of the elements, and as an essential element in the combination of all the claims in the complainant's patent, does not exist as a shaft in the defendants' device; but the defendants have substituted for that shaft a sleeve, by means of which the cutting die rotates, dispensing with the shaft, but still effecting the reciprocating motion, the reversed motion of the cutting die, by the same operation, and substantially accomplishing the same thing in the result of the machine; but it also accomplishes another result.

It being obvious, upon inspection of this machine, that, when the cutting die revolved upon a shaft, the cutting die was a prolonged one, as long as the sole of the shoe, so that, when the material to be cut was of unequal density or unequal thickness, the strain would be greater upon one end of the die than upon the other, it being mounted upon merely a central shaft, the new element in the combination introduced in the defendants' machine allowed the pressure to come down upon this die upon both sides of the central shaft, and thus, in the operation, effected an improvement over the mode of operation in the Hatch & Churchill—the complainant's machine. While it had this improvement, which is a valuable improvement, in some respects, over that of the complainant, it still substantially, under the impression which the court has from inspection of the two machines, clearly embodied what there was new in the complainant's invention. It is true that the experts in this case say that this mode of reciprocating the cutting die is not an equivalent, is not the same thing as the shaft which is made an important feature in the complainant's combination; and to the eye of a mechanic, perhaps, looking at it merely with the eye of a constructing mechanic, this is a different thing, and so it is to the eye of the court a different thing; but whether it be a different thing mechanically in that way or not, when we consider whether it be an equivalent in the sense of the law, by applying the doctrine of equivalents to a combination which is the first invention in a class of machines, and with the broader definition of the term "equivalents," as applied to such an invention, notwithstanding this testimony of the experts, it is clearly an equivalent in that sense. The decree, therefore, will be for the complainant.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1807.

BAIL IN CIVIL CASES—SURRENDER—NOTICE TO PLAINTIFF.

1. Upon surrender of the principal to the sheriff by the bail under the law of Virginia, notice must be given immediately to the creditor, his attorney, or agent.

2. The knowledge of the plaintiff's attorney is not sufficient.

[Action by Maynadier against Wroe, special bail of Bickenton.]

The question was, whether the surrender of bail to the sheriff, with the knowledge of the plaintiff's attorney, without regular notice, according to the 31st section of the act of Virginia of the 12th of December, 1792, is a discharge of the bail.

THE COURT was of opinion that the notice must come from the bail, and be given immediately to the creditor, his attorney, or agent.

PATENTS—PATENTABLE INVENTION—SELECTION OF MATERIALS—GUN CARTRIDGES.

[There is no patentable novelty or invention in placing upon a brass or other soft metal gun cartridge a bottom of steel or other hard metal, which gives capacity for repeated discharges without injury to the vent hole in the center of the bottom; for this is but the exercise of judgment in the selection of materials. Hotchkiss v. Greenwood, 11 How. (52 U. S. 248) applied.]

[This was an appeal by Edward Maynard from the refusal of the commissioner of patents to grant him a patent for an alleged improvement in gun cartridges.]

Z. C. Robbins, for appellant.

MERRICK, Circuit Judge. The claim of the applicant is for combining with the tubular portion of a metallic gun-cartridge, when that is made of brass or its equivalent of soft and tough metal, a base or bottom of steel or other hard metal, which hard metal bottom capacitates the cartridge for repeated discharges, and that without injury to the vent-hole perforation in the centre of the bottom. And his claim is further for constructing this said bottom with a flange extending beyond the walls of the cylindrical tube of brass, by means of which flange the cartridge may be more readily handled, withdrawn from the gun after discharge, and also strengthened and guarded against rough handling and other casualties. The claim has been rejected by the commissioner as wanting both the grounds of novelty alleged in the specification. A flanged-bottom cartridge is shown to have been previously used in the patent of G. W. Morse (No. 15,996, October 28th, 1856) and in the improvements of Chambers, described in Brevets d'Invention, N. S. (volume 13, pages 71 and 72.) This branch of the claim and specification was, therefore, destitute of novelty, and properly rejected. As to the other branch of inquiry, it is well stated in the report of Examiner Baldwin, made in the case on the 5th of June, that "the advantages of the brass cylinder are the same in his patent (viz., Morse' patent of 1856) as to the position of the charge, the expansion of the metal, and the durability of the tubular portion of the cartridge as they are in the same cylinder with the steel disc, except what of additional strength it derives from the disc and the permanency of the vent, and all that the disc does for the brass in the application it does in the patent of Morse for the soft-metal tube." In other words, by using a hard metal, as steel, the bottom of the cartridge is stronger and the small size of the vent-hole is better preserved than with the other softer metals. The claim does not, therefore, rest upon the idea of combining a hard metal for the bottom of a cartridge with a soft one for the tubular part. Clearly, if this form of statement of the proposition be all, Morse has anticipated the discovery. But the essence of this claim seems to consist in this: That inasmuch as steel, case-hardened iron, &c., have that greater degree of strength and hardness, as compared with sheet-iron, and, perhaps, other metals which especially adapt them to this combination, he is entitled to a patent for being the first to make this particular combination. But these qualities of comparative strength and hardness were not discovered by him; they are functions or capacities of the metals well and long known. What, then, does the claim amount to? Stripped of the incidents with which it is colored, it is this: That within the range of metals having strength and hardness he has selected one amongst many, and has applied it in the manufacture of his cartridges, so as to make a better cartridge than has been made before by similar combinations of a hard with a soft metal. His improvement consists in the superiority of the material, and which is not new; one that was previously employed to make the cartridge.

The case seems to me to fall within the principles and meaning of the supreme court in the case of Hotchkiss v. Greenwood, 11 How. [52 U. S. 248]. At page 266, Judge Nelson, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Now, it may very well be that by connecting the clay or porcelain knob with the metallic shank in this well-known mode an article is produced better and cheaper than in the case of the metallic or wood knob; but this does not result from any new mechanical device or contrivance, but from the fact that the material of which the knob is composed happens to be better adapted to the purpose for which it was made. The improvement consists in the superiority of the material, which is not new, over that previously employed in making the knob. But this of itself can never be the subject of a patent. No one will pretend that a machine made in whole or in part of materials better adapted to the purpose for which it is used than the materials of which the old one is constructed, and for that reason better and cheaper, can be distinguished from the old ones, or, in the sense of the patent law, can entitle the manufacturer to a patent. The difference is formal, and destitute of ingenuity or invention. It may afford evidence of judgment and skill in the selection and adaptation of the materials in the manufacture of the instrument for the purpose intended, but nothing more."

The foregoing explanations seem to me to cover all that is embraced in the assignment of reasons of appeal; and therefore I am of opinion that the decision of the commissioner rejecting the claim must stand. And accordingly I now certify to the Hon. Joseph Holt, commissioner of patents, that pursuant to notice heretofore given and filed with the papers in the cause the claimant was heard by his counsel at the city hall on the 5th of October instant in oral explanation and by reading a written argument, and after having fully considered the claim, the decision of the commissioner, the reasons of appeal, and the reasons filed in support of the decision, the judgment of the commissioner rejecting the claim must be affirmed; and herewith I return all the papers, drawings, molds, &c.

BANKRUPTCY—BOND GIVEN TO ASSIGNEE—LIABILITIES OF SURETIES—PAROL EVIDENCE.

[A bond under seal given by a bankrupt to the assignee in bankruptcy, and conditioned for the payment of money or the forthcoming of property, and the making good of any deficiency remaining after a sale of the same, being perfect and complete in all respects upon its face, held valid according to its terms, against the sureties, notwithstanding their testimony that they signed it under an agreement with the obligee that the signature of a certain third person was also to be obtained, and that it was understood that the sureties were only bound for the nonremoval of personal property and not for the payment of any money.]

[In bankruptcy. For prior proceedings in this litigation, see Case No. 5,245a.]

HUGHES, District Judge. This is a petition filed in the bankruptcy proceeding by the assignee in bankruptcy of D. C. Mayo, praying that Mayo's sureties, W. K. Watts and Lawrence Lottier in his bond of 27th October, 1876, conditioned to fulfil and perform all the conditions of the order of this court in this matter entered on the 12th October, 1874, shall be required to perform their obligation thereunder by paying the sum of $6,358.71, with interest, &c., to the assignee; that being the amount of their liability ascertained by the decree of this court in this matter, made on the 24th of May, 1876. The petition is resisted by Watts on the ground that at the time of signing the bond he did it on an understanding with W. H. Alderdice, the obligee and the then assignee in this bankruptcy, that the bond was also to be signed by one Joseph P. Winston, whose signature to it was not obtained. It is resisted by Lottier on a like ground and also on the ground that if the bond is void as to Watts, it is also void as to himself. The only question in the case is whether or not there was such an understanding in respect to the bond between Watts and Alderdice as renders valid this defense.

The bond itself is perfect in its form. On its face it contains no indication that any other name was intended by any party to it to be added to those apparent on its face. The signatures are admitted to be genuine. Watts did not insist when he signed the bond that Winston's name should be placed in the beginning of the bond where the names of the obligors were mentioned. That part of the bond is in appearance perfect and complete with the names of Mayo, Watts and Lottier recited as obligors, and contains no indication by interlineation or otherwise that Watts insisted upon the addition of Winston's name. So at the conclusion of the bond, the word seal is written but three times, and no proper room left for another seal. Mr. Wise testifies positively that the bond was in complete form just as it is, before any name was signed to it. In short, the bond is in form and appearance perfect, containing no indication that another obligor had been intended to be added by the draftsman or any one of the obligors or the obligee.

It is a bond under seal, attested by subscribing witnesses. It is an instrument of the most solemn form known to the law, and the law presumes everything in favor of its validity and binding effect, against the obligors.

[1] [Affirmed in Case No. 9,353a.]

Coupled with Watts' asseveration of an understanding with Alderdice that the bond should be signed by Winston, is the like asseveration of an understanding that the bond bound him only to the non-removal and forthcoming of the tobacco fixtures to which it refers, and not to the payment of money. This allegation is sustained by evidence scarcely less strong and direct than that in regard to Winston's signature; and yet an inspection of the language of the bond proves that there could have been no such understanding. The condition was to have all the personalty enumerated in schedule "B" forthcoming whenever the court should require him, &c., &c.; "and to pay said purchase money, to wit, $12,000, one fourth cash, the balance in six, twelve and eighteen months, from the date of an order requiring him so to do, or else surrender the personal property aforesaid for sale by the assignee, and in the event it sells for less than the balance due, to make good the deficiency." Watts is shown by the terms of the bond to be clearly mistaken as to any understanding with Alderdice, that the bond given did not bind him to pay money; and the complete form and finished appearance of the bond almost as clearly shows that there could have been no such understanding as he alleges as to the signature of Winston. For reasons stated in writing 30th of April, 1878, when I set aside the verdict of the jury then recently rendered, I cannot bring my mind to credit Watts' testimony or to conclude that this bond is void as to Watts. I do not mean in this declaration to impute bad faith to him or any witnesses who more or less corroborate him in regard to the alleged understanding with Alderdice as to Winston's signature. I have no doubt of his and their sincerity in such testimony as they have given. The strong bias of interest upon a mind long pondering over and much excited upon one subject has doubtless produced genuine convictions of the truth of the things to which he testifies. I think he has confounded what was said when the first bond which Mr. Wise prepared was brought to him for signature, with what was said when this second bond was executed. The testimony of Mr. Putney and Mr. Bondar when given before the jury was very indefinite, inconclusive and unreliable, and the fact of its having become much strengthened by the time their late depositions were taken, may be truly ascribed to their sympathy for a good man threatened with a loss of this sort. I do not think in refusing to accept their evidence as sufficient to overcome the strong, clear, unqualified language of the bond itself which stands before me as a fact which the law presumes to be genuine until absolutely disproved—that I reflect upon their veracity or integrity of purpose. I have taken pains to have the whole case put in writing in order that, if I myself am in error in making an order enforcing this bond, the error may be corrected on appeal. I will sign an order in accordance with the prayer of the petition.

From this decision of the district court appeal was taken to the supervisory jurisdiction of the circuit court, the chief justice of the United States sitting. [The judgment of the district court was affirmed. Case No. 9,353a.]

[1. Where a bond is given pursuant to an order made in bankruptcy proceedings, and the order itself is copied into the bond, as presented to the sureties for signature, the sureties are affected with notice of all that is contained in the order, and it is immaterial what the obligee may have told them as to the legal liability created by the bond.]

[2. [3. The fact that the assignee in bankruptcy, who was the obligee in the bond, first attempted to enforce it by an action at law, and that a verdict was rendered for defendants, which was set aside by the court, and a new trial granted, would not operate to prevent the subsequent proceeding to enforce the bond by petition in the bankruptcy case, for, after the granting of a new trial, the case stood as if no trial had ever been had.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of Virginia.

[In the matter of D. C. Mayo, a bankrupt. The appeal is from an order made by the district court, upon the petition of the assignee, Garnett, enforcing a bond against the bankrupt and his sureties, W. K. Watts and Lawrence Lottier. Case No. 9,353.

[For prior proceedings in this litigation, see Case No. 5,245a.]

WAITE, Circuit Justice. Upon the merits, I am entirely satisfied with the conclusion reached by the district judge. The defense relied on is not established by the evidence. The bond was conditioned as the order of the court required. The assignee had no authority to accept any other. As the order of the court was copied into the bond, the sureties are charged with knowledge of what the assignee was required to get before he delivered the property. It is clear, therefore, that what the assignee may have said as to the legal effect of the obligation to be assumed by the sureties is wholly immaterial. There can be no doubt as to the meaning of the language used to express the obligation.

The evidence does not satisfy me that the assignee is chargeable with knowledge of the alleged agreement between Watts and Mayo that the bond was not to be delivered unless signed by Winston. He, undoubtedly, did suppose Winston would become one of the sureties, but there is nothing to show that he understood that Watts was not to be bound unless Winston signed also. The understanding between Mayo and Watts is immaterial unless the assignee knew of it.

I think, also, that the district court had jurisdiction to proceed summarily as in bankruptcy to enforce the bond. The bond was taken by the bankrupt court in course of the administration of the bankrupt's estate. It was in the nature of a receiptor's bond, or a stipulation in admiralty, and took the place of the things which were delivered to Mayo on the acceptance of the security. In this way the sureties voluntarily made themselves parties to the bankruptcy suit, and submitted to the summary process of the bankruptcy court. In bankruptcy the court administers on the estate. The assignee is an officer of the court, charged with certain duties. The court must administer the estate according to law, and its proceedings are subject to examination and review by the circuit court under its supervisory jurisdiction in bankruptcy matters. Every one who contracts with the court in the course of the administration submits himself to the summary process which the law has provided to bring about a prompt settlement of bankrupt estates. Those who contracted with the bankrupt stand in no such position. Everything which depends on what was done before the bankruptcy, or afterwards, not connected with the administration, must be treated as outside of the bankruptcy proceedings, and governed accordingly. But all contracts with the court sitting in bankruptcy are in effect part of the proceedings in the bankruptcy suit. This is in accordance with the ruling of Judge Bond in Rosenbaum v. Garnett [Case No. 12,053], from which I am not disposed to depart. The fact that, after the order of the court requiring the assignee to proceed with the collection of the bond, a suit on the common-law side of the court had been begun, did not prevent proceedings for the same purpose under the summary jurisdiction before judgment actually rendered in the common-law suit. The power of the court to set aside the verdict in that suit, and grant a new trial, because the verdict was against the evidence, cannot be attacked collaterally. The new trial having been granted, the case stands as though no trial had ever been had, unless the order for the new trial is set aside in some appropriate form of proceeding instituted for that purpose.

The sureties were not entitled to special notice of the sale of the property after it was surrendered under the conditions of the bond. It was enough that the property was delivered up by the principal on demand, as he was bound to do, and that sufficient public notice of the sale was given. There is no allegation of fraud. It rested in the discretion of the court whether to submit the issues of fact to a trial by jury, or not. I think the court properly declined to allow a jury trial.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed, and an order may be prepared to that effect.

MAYO v. BLAIR et al.

[1 Hayw. & H. 96.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Aug. 13, 1842.

LIBEL—PLEADING—NOT GUILTY—JUSTIFICATION—EVIDENCE—DAMAGES—MITIGATION THEREOF.

1. Where a declaration charges a libel, to which the defendants pleaded not guilty, it is incompetent for the defendants to prove the truth of said libel even in mitigation of damages.

2. The defendants having pleaded justification, averring the truth of the libel, they must prove the truth of the alleged libel with the inuendoes as laid in the declaration.

3. It is not competent for the defendants in sustaining the issue on their part on the pleas of justification to give any evidence in mitigation of damages, if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the plea of justification was not made out by proof.

4. In a suit for libel the amount of damages is a matter for the determination of the jury.

[This was an action for libel by Robert Mayo against Francis P. Blair and John C. Rives.]

Richard S. Coxe and Brent & Brent, for plaintiff.

James Hoban and F. S. Key, for defendants.

The declaration is as follows: That whereas, heretofore, to wit, on the 7th of July, 1838, at the county aforesaid, the Hon. John Quincy Adams had stated in the house of representatives of the United States, that he had seen an original letter in the handwriting of Gen. Andrew Jackson, president of the United States, dated the 10th of December, 1830, and addressed to a certain Wm. Fulton, then, to wit, at the date of said letter, secretary of the territory of Arkansas, which letter was then stated by said Adams to be in the city of Washington, where it could be seen by any gentleman who had curiosity to examine it; and whereas the said Adams, at the same time and place, had read to the said house of representatives a paper purporting to be a true copy of said original letter, whereby it was represented that the said Jackson had written a letter marked "strictly confidential" to the said Fulton, advising him in substance that information had been received by said Jackson that an extensive expedition was organized in the United States with the view to the establishment of an independent government in the province of Texas, and that General Houston was to be at the head of it, and requesting the said Fulton to keep him, the said Jackson, advised of any movements which might serve to justify the suspicions entertained; and whereas the defendants afterwards, to wit, on the 2nd of July, 1838, had notice that the said letter had been shown to said Adams by the plaintiff, and was then and there in the plaintiff's possession by delivery from the said Jackson; but the said defendants, well knowing the premises, but greatly envying the happy state and condition of the plaintiff, and contriving and wickedly and maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff in his good name, fame and credit, and to bring him into public scandal, infamy and disgrace, with and amongst all his neighbors and other good and worthy citizens, and to cause it to be suspected that he, the plaintiff, had been and was guilty of improperly and dishonorably acquiring said letter, and to vex, impoverish, harass and wholly ruin the plaintiff, heretofore, to wit, on the 21st of July, 1838, in a certain newspaper called "The Globe," of which the defendants were then and there publishers and proprietors, falsely and maliciously did print and publish, and caused and procured to be printed and published, of and concerning the said plaintiff, and of and concerning the manner in which he became possessed of the said original letter, and of and concerning the said Adams in connection therewith, a certain false, scandalous, malicious and defamatory libel, containing, among other things, the false, scandalous, malicious, defamatory and libellous matter following, of and concerning the said plaintiff, and of and concerning the manner in which he became possessed of the said original letter, and of and concerning the said Adams in connection therewith, that is to say: "This letter was adduced and read as proof that General Jackson was apprised of Houston's design on Texas, and the duplicity imputed in regard to it was the inference of Mr. Adams that it was not sent because the original was not found on the files of the state department. That original Mr. Adams admitted, however, he had examined, but he does not explain how he came possessed of that strictly confidential state paper, which was evidently out of place in his hands. The natural inference is, that it must have been purloined" (meaning that the plaintiff, who had communicated said original letter to said Adams, had purloined and stolen said letter), "a very sufficient reason why it was not to be found in its proper place."

2nd count: That the defendants in a certain, &c., printed, &c., that is to say: "Mr. Adams" (meaning the Hon. John Quincy Adams who had read the paper purporting to be a copy of said described original letter, and to whom the plaintiff had shown said original letter), "it will be recollected, upon being called on by the chairman of the committee on foreign affairs to state how he came into possession of that letter" (meaning how and in whose hands the said Adams had seen the said original letter which he had stated he had seen), "refused to do so unless he should be required by an order of the house. Subsequent disclosures in another quarter have afforded the information which he" (meaning the said Adams) "refused to give, and have revealed to the public the means by which this letter was obtained." (Meaning that the rumor and report charging the plaintiff with improperly obtaining the possession of said original letter had afforded the information which the said Adams had refused to give, and had revealed to the public the means by which the plaintiff had obtained said original letter.) "We leave it to an honest and high-minded community to pass sentence upon the transaction." (Meaning that the transaction, to wit, the mode of obtaining the said original letter by the plaintiff, had been such that an honest and high-minded community would condemn it.) "It is not a subject for reasoning. The instinctive impulses of every honest man will at once condemn the use of such means in assailing an adversary. No one possessing the least magnanimity or delicacy of feeling would have read to the house of representatives a letter which he had reason to believe was obtained without the knowledge of the party to whom it belonged, and which was marked 'Private and confidential.'" (Meaning that said Adams in reading said letter had exhibited a want of magnanimity and delicacy of feeling, and that the plaintiff had improperly obtained said letter without the knowledge of the party to whom it belonged.)

3rd count. That the defendants in a certain, &c., printed, &c., that is to say: "The evidence in possession of General Jackson on the other hand, of a contemplated expedition against Texas, consisted of a single letter from an individual" (meaning the plaintiff) "of whom we will say no more than that any person of common sense, considering the circumstances under which it was written, the person writing it" (meaning the plaintiff), "and the internal evidence afforded by the letter itself, would have attached no more weight to the statement it contained than did the president. There was in this case no 'voluminous mass' of testimony to act upon, but a solitary letter" (meaning the said letter of the plaintiff) "unsupported by concurrent information or by the particular credibility of the relator." (Meaning that the said letter of the said plaintiff was unsupported by the particular credibility of the plaintiff.)

By reason of all which premises the plaintiff is the worse and hath damages to the value of $30,000.

The following are the pleas of the defendants: 1st. Not guilty in the manner and form, &c., of the matter alleged against them in the declaration. 2d. And for a further plea as to the words of the alleged libel as charged in the second count, defendants admit the publication thereof, and justify publishing the same because defendants say that it is true. 3d. And for a further plea they admit the publication of the words as stated in the third count and justify the publishing the same because they say it is true.

The plaintiff, through his counsel, offered evidence of the publication charged in the declaration, and the evidence of Mr. Adams as follows, taken de bene esse: "Dr. Mayo did exhibit to him certain documents, and stated to him the manner in which he became possessed of them. They formed a part of many letters which Dr. Mayo had written to President Jackson from the commencement or a very early period of his administration down to nearly its close; that a bundle of those letters, shortly before the expiration of the presidency of General Jackson, had been returned to him, Dr. Mayo, by order of President Jackson. That the letter from President Jackson to Mr. Fulton was included in the bundle, and that he never had seen it before the receipt of the bundle. That Dr. Mayo, in communicating this paper to him (Mr. Adams), did make some observations to him expressive of his own sense of duty to make these documents public; that he did subsequently receive a written communication from Dr. Mayo conveying to him copies of the papers referred to; and that Dr. Mayo never left with him any of the original documents or letters referred to, but only exhibited them to him for perusal."

The defendants, through their counsel, produced a pamphlet admitted to have been published by the plaintiff, and offered to read certain passages therefrom for the purpose of proving that plaintiff represented and set forth a certain affidavit of General Jackson in relation to the manner in which plaintiff had obtained possession of the letter mentioned in Mr. Adams' evidence, and that the plaintiff therein denied the truth of said affidavit, and stated the manner in which he did get possession of said letter. And the defendant's counsel, in offering to read the part of said publication containing said affidavit of said Jackson, stated they did not offer to read the same as a deposition or affidavit admissible as evidence of the facts it states, but only as evidence of what the plaintiff had stated, that General Jackson had sworn to, and of what the plaintiff said in answer to or in relation to what General Jackson had sworn to.

But THE COURT refused to allow the same to be read, which refusal was excepted to by the counsel of the defendants.

The following prayers were granted by THE COURT:

1st. The declaration in this case charging the libel as laid to consist in charging the plaintiff with purloining a certain paper, to which the defendants have pleaded not guilty, it is not competent for the defendants to prove the truth of said libel in this action even in mitigation of damages. But the defendants may prove the truth of any other improper way of getting possession of such paper by the plaintiff, or any improper use of such paper by plaintiff, known to the defendants, at the time of the publication.

2nd. The defendants having pleaded justification to the second and third counts of the declaration averring the truth of the libel, it is essential for the defendants to prove to the satisfaction of the jury the truth of the alleged libel with the inuendoes as laid in the declaration.

3rd. It is not competent for defendants, in sustaining the issue on their part on the pleas of justification, to give any evidence in mitigation of damages, if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the plea of justification was not made out by proof.

4th. It is not competent for the defendants to give evidence under the second and third pleas, if the jury shall believe the pleas averring the truth of said alleged libel not to be sustained, nor any evidence to disprove the malice which the law infers from the original publication of the alleged libel and from the retention of the same in the pleas of justification.

5th. That the only part of the declaration to which it is competent to defendants to give any evidence to disprove malice or in mitigation of damages, is the first count, and the jury are not to regard any facts as amounting to a negation of malice or as mitigating the damages, unless the jury shall be satisfied from said evidence that said facts actually existed and were known to defendants before and at the time of the alleged publication.

6th. If the jury shall believe from the said evidence that the defendants actually published the libel as laid in the first count of the declaration and that facts therein averred and the inuendoes in said first count mentioned are true, then the jury must find for the plaintiff upon the issue in that count, but the amount of damages is a matter for the judgment of the jury.

But the jury, before they can find a verdict for the plaintiff on said first count, with any damages, must be satisfied from the evidence that it was known to the defendants at the time of said publication that the plaintiff was the person who had delivered the letter to Mr. Adams. And if they find that the defendants had that knowledge at that time, they must be further satisfied by the evidence that the defendants intended to describe and point out the plaintiff in said publication as the person charged thereby.

The following prayer was refused by THE COURT:

Nor is it competent under pleas of justification for the defendants to give in evidence the use made by the plaintiff of the said letter after it came to his hands as evidence of the truth of the libel laid in the second and third counts.

Verdict for the defendants.

The plaintiff, through his counsel, Coxe and Bradley, moved for a new trial—Because the court mistook the law. Because illegal testimony was admitted on the part of the defendants. Because the verdict was against law and against the evidence; and because of newly discovered evidence materially affecting the merits of the case.

The motion was overruled by THE COURT.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 569.] [1]

Circuit Court. District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1839.

BAIL IN CIVIL CASES—ACTION OF LIBEL—AMOUNT OF DAMAGES ALLEGED.

In an action upon the case for a libel, the damages were laid at twenty thousand dollars, and the plaintiff in his affidavit averred damages to the same amount; the court required the bail to justify to the amount of five hundred dollars only.

Case for libel. Damages laid at $20,000. The plaintiff's affidavit to hold the defendants [Thomas J. Smith and F. S. Myer] to special bail stated that the defendants, on the 26th of March, 1839, "in a certain newspaper, called 'The Metropolis,' in the publication of which the said Smith and Myer were then and there concerned, published of and concerning" the plaintiff [Robert Mayo] "a certain false, scandalous, and malicious libel, headed 'Dr. Mayo and the Intelligencer,' which said libel is hereto annexed," &c. "And this deponent also saith that he is informed and believes, that said Smith has no intention of remaining in the District of Columbia, but is about to depart from said district for the Southern States. He further saith, that by the publication of said libel he hath incurred and sustained damages to the amount of $20,000.

Mr. Hoban and Mr. Key moved for leave to appear for the defendant without special bail; or that the bail demanded should be mitigated, and cited Jones v. Kelly, 17 Mass. 115, and 2 Wheel. Abr. 54.

R. S. Coxe and Messrs. Brent & Brent contended that the affidavit of the plaintiff was conclusive; that the libel is atrocious. The affidavit is positive that the defendants published it in the newspaper in which they were concerned, and that the plaintiff has thereby suffered damages to the value of $20,000. The plaintiff's counsel cited the case of Barrell v. Simonton [Case No. 1,041], in this court, at May term, 1826, where bail was refused in an action for a malicious arrest, only on the ground that the action in which the plaintiff was arrested was not then terminated; and the case of McDonald v. Little [Id. 8,760], in this court, and the case of Doyne v. Barker [Id. 4,055], at November term, 1834, in which bail was required, in slander, in $700, upon an affidavit of the plaintiff's belief that she had suffered damage to the value of $3,000.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), in the present case, said they would be satisfied with bail who could justify in $500.

SHIPPING—LIABILITY OF OWNER—SUPPLIES—CONTRACT WITH MASTER—OWNER FOR VOYAGE.

1. Where a master of a fishing vessel agreed with the managing owner to take her for the season and go to the "Banks" codfishing, the owners to have one quarter of the fish and oil, and three eighths of the bounty; the residue to belong to himself and his crew, and to be applied first to pay the bills, and then any balance remaining to be divisible among the master and crew; the master to have the vessel fitted where he pleased, and have the fish cured by whom he should choose; and the master hired the crew and purchased the provisions and supplies for the voyage. It was held, that, on these facts, he was owner pro hac vice, and that he, and not the general owners, was responsible for the "small generals."

[Cited in Flaherty v. Doane, Case No. 4,849; Fox v. Holt, Id. 5,012.]

2. The statute of 1813 (3 Stat. 2, § 1) furnishes no ground for a distinction in this respect between codfishing and other voyages.

3. Although the master is owner for the voyage, the general owners may, nevertheless, be liable for supplies, upon the ground of an agency for the owners to procure them, arising out of the particular terms on which he hires the vessel.

4. And here the owners were liable for certain articles, because, by the contract of letting to the master, they were to procure and pay for such articles before the beginning of the voyage; and they having authorized him to buy them, it was considered that they made him their agent therefor, not because he was master, but by virtue of the particular authority so given.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

[This was a libel in admiralty by Joshua C. Mayo and others against Jesse Snow and others, owners of the Lydia & Polly, to recover the price of certain supplies. From a decree of the district court in favor of respondents (case unreported), libellants appeal.]

William Brigham, for appellants.

H. A. Scudder, contra.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is a suit in the admiralty, against the owners of the fishing schooner Lydia & Polly, to recover the price of supplies furnished to that vessel by the libellants. The supplies were of three kinds: first, ship-chandlery; second, that class of articles commonly called in the fishing business, "great generals;" third, what are denominated in that business "small generals." For the amount of the first two, the respondents made a tender before suit, which they pleaded in their answer, and the district court found it to be sufficient. In that respect, with the exception of one item, the decree of that court has not been seriously contested, and I see no reason to disturb it.[2]

Upon the question of the liability of the respondents for the "small generals," it is necessary to ascertain their relation and that of the master to the vessel, when the supplies were procured. The libellants have produced the testimony of the master, and he is the sole witness in the cause. He testifies, that about the last of February, 1853, he agreed with the managing owner of the vessel, to take her for the season and go to the "Banks" codfishing; that the owners were to have one quarter of the fish and oil, and three eighths of the bounty; the residue was to belong to himself and his crew, and to be applied first, to pay the bills, and then any balance remaining would be divisible among himself and the crew: that he was to have this vessel fitted where he pleased, and have the fish cured by whom he should choose; that he hired the crew, and purchased the provisions and supplies for the voyage.

Upon these facts, it is clear the master was the owner pro hac vice, and he, and not the general owners, was responsible for the "small generals." Webb v. Pierce [Case No. 17,320]. The libellants however, insist, that though this may be the law generally, it is not applicable to vessels engaged in the codfishery under the acts of congress, or that if it is, the special facts of this case take it out of that general rule. It is certainly true, that though a master be owner for the voyage, the general owners may nevertheless be liable for supplies, upon the ground of an agency for the owners to procure them, arising out of the particular terms on which he hires the vessel. This case affords an illustration. For what is called the ship-chandlery bill, the owners are liable in this case; because, by the contract of letting to the master, the owners were to procure and pay for these articles before the beginning of the voyage, and when they authorized the master to buy them, they thereby made him their agent for that purpose; not because he was master, but by force of the particular authority thus given to him. But, aside from such an authority, I do not find any distinction, as to ownership pro hac vice and its consequences, between fishing and other voyages, and none appears to have been made in any case which I have seen. I have been referred to the case of Harding v. Souther [307], decided by the supreme court of Massachusetts in 1853, and not yet reported, in which it was held that the general owners of a vessel engaged in the mackerel fishery, were liable for the wages of the cook. But I understand, that decision rests upon the principle above indicated; that, without regard to who was owner for the voyage, the usages of the business included authority to the master, to hire a cook on account of, and to be paid by, the general owners.

It was suggested that the language of the act of 1813, c. 2, § 1 (3 Stat. 2), implies that the owners have the control of the crew. But the word owner, occurring in connection with the discharge of the crew, may well mean owners pro hac vice. And if it be taken to mean the general owners, it does not prove that congress intended to prohibit such a letting of the vessel to the master, as would make him the temporary owner, as to third persons furnishing supplies. This is a subject which does not seem to have been at all within the view of congress; and I think it would not be safe or warranted to declare it was intended to make a distinction between fishing and other vessels in this particular. In Winsor v. Cutts, 7 Greenl. 261, and Houston v. Darling, 4 Shep. [16 Me.] 413, the supreme court of Maine has applied to the owners of fishing vessels, the same rule of law as is applied to the owners of other vessels; and I consider it correct to do so. Nor do I find any thing in the circumstances of this particular case to take it out of the general rule. There are some loose statements by the master, mostly made in answer to very leading interrogatories, concerning his having received directions from the managing owners as to hiring men and furnishing supplies. But I am satisfied, by a careful consideration of his evidence and of the surrounding circumstances, that what was said was advisory merely, and was not intended, and ought not to be taken, to change the substantial relation of the parties, or to confer on the master an authority to purchase the "small generals" supplies, on the general owners' account. As to the item for money borrowed, the master had no authority to borrow money as the agent of the owners; and if he, in fact, applied some of it to pay for articles which he purchased for the owners, he also had credit for what he thus paid in his account with the owners. He must be taken to have borrowed it on his own account,

[2] The liability of the respondents for the "great generals" and the ship-chandlery bill was not contested by them here or in the court below; and they had offered to pay for the same before, and in their answer; and I am informed that in the district court, Sprague, J., on the question of tender, held, that an offer to pay, made in good faith, with undisputed ability and readiness to perform, renewed in the answer in court, was a good and sufficient tender in the admiralty, although originally accompanied with a request for a receipt, and although the money was not subsequently brought into court.

and applied a part, as his own money, to the owners' use.

Decree affirmed, with costs for the respondent.

DEEDS—ESCROW—CONDITION OF DELIVERY — BY WHOM CONDITION PERFORMED.

It is not necessary, to the delivery of a deed as an escrow, that the obligee should be privy to its delivery, nor that the thing to be performed, as a condition of the delivery, should be a thing to be done by the obligee.

[Action by the mayor and commonalty against Thomas Moore and his sureties, Charles Simms and Thomas Swann.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Debt, on an auctioneer's bond. Plea, 1st, non est factum, and 2d, delivered as an escrow, to be his deed, if also executed by William Hodgson and Peter Sherran, who did not execute it. Issue to the 1st plea; special demurrer and joinder to the 2d plea, because, 1st, the plaintiffs were not privy to the delivery as an escrow; 2d, the thing to be performed is to be done by strangers and not by the plaintiffs.

E. J. Lee, for plaintiffs. The obligee must be privy and consent to the conditional delivery. It does not appear that Cleon Moore, to whom it was delivered as an escrow, was authorized by the plaintiffs to receive it as such. It must be on condition that the plaintiffs do something. Shep. Touch. 13, 57; Vin. Abr. 27. But here the condition was to be performed by strangers.

Mr. Simms. If Cleon Moore had no authority to receive the deed, then it is neither a deed nor an escrow.

THE COURT overruled the demurrer. KILTY, Chief Judge, contra.

Thereupon J. Lee moved the court to strike out the judgment, and for leave to withdraw the demurrer, and to file general replications to the pleas, which was granted upon payment of the cost. FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, doubting whether the demurrer could now be withdrawn.

Upon the trial of the issues, E. J. Lee asked Cleon Moore, the subscribing witness, whether his name was signed by himself, to which he answered in the affirmative, but was not asked as to the delivery of the deed. The attestation was thus: "Sealed and delivered in presence of Cleon Moore."

Mr. Simms prayed the court to instruct the jury that there was no evidence of the delivery of the deed.

THE COURT gave the instruction. It being no more than proving the handwriting of the subscribing witness, while he was living, and within reach of the process of the court.

SEAMEN—WAGES—EMPLOYED IN TOWING—LIEN—TO WHAT IT EXTENDS.

1. The mate and engineer of an enrolled steamer, employed in towing vessels in and about the harbor of Boston, have a maritime lien upon the steamer for their wages.

[Cited in Raft of Cypress Logs, Case No. 11,527; The Sarah Jane, Id. 12,349; The Atlantic, 53 Fed. 608.]

2. Such lien extends to the boiler, notwithstanding the claim of the makers, who put it into the steamer, under an agreement that it should continue their property, until paid for, with a right to remove it, should any instalment be overdue; and instalments are unpaid and overdue.

[Cited in The John Farron, Case No. 7,341; The Charlotte Vanderbilt, 19 Fed. 220; Blowers v. One Wire Rope Cable, Id. 448; The James H. Prentice, 36 Fed. 781.]

3. The lien of the seamen is not impaired by knowledge of such agreement.

The libellants, the engineer and mate of a tow-boat, sue for wages, and several parties come in as claimants for certain portions of the steamer, and for the proceeds, as mortgagees. Benjamin F. Rogers comes in, by petition, claiming to hold a mortgage, and to be paid the same out of the proceeds. M'Kay and Alders also come in, alleging that they put a boiler into the steamer, which they still own, by virtue of an agreement in writing, of the tenor and effect stated in the opinion of the court, on record at the custom-house, where the steamer is enrolled; that this agreement was made with Walter F. Dodge, the master and owner, and was known to the libellants; that the boiler is still their property, and not liable to process.

R. D. Smith, for libellants.

C. T. Russell & Chas. Houghton, for M'Kay, cited the following authorities: 1st. As to the service being maritime: Curt. Merch. Seam. 5, 353; 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 477, 489, 490; 2 Pars. Mar. Law, 583–585; Packard v. The Louisa [Case No. 10,652]; The Phoebus, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 183; Phillips v. The Thos. Scattergood [Case No. 11,106]; Thackarey v. The Farmer of Salem [Id. 13,852]; Smith v. The Pekin [Id. 13,090]; Gurney v. Crockett [Id. 5,874]; The Amstel [Id. 339]; 1 Stat. 132; Act July 20, 1790, § 6; The Canton [Case No. 2,388]; 1 Kent, Comm. 379, note 2d. As to the ownership of the boiler: Coggill v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co., 3 Gray, 545; Sargent v. Metcalf, 5 Gray, 306; Blanchard v. Child, 7 Gray, 155; Burbank v. Crooker, Id. 158.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. Two questions have been raised. 1st. Whether this service was in its character maritime; and 2d. Whether, if the libellants have a lien upon the vessel, it attaches also to the boiler, notwithstanding the claim of M'Kay and Alders.

As to the first, this steamer is about eighty tons burden, and duly enrolled as an American vessel, was built at Philadelphia, was subsequently found at Bucksport, Maine, and afterwards in Boston. Her employment, during the time which the libellants were on board, was that of a steam tug, towing vessels in and near the harbor of Boston; generally within, but sometimes going beyond, the light, upon the high seas. The whole employment was upon tide-waters. No part, not even loading or unloading of a cargo, was upon land. It certainly is not necessary that the service should have been upon the high seas, in order to be maritime. That idea is, indeed, thrown out in Thackarey v. The Farmer of Salem [Case No. 13,852], but the same judge decided in Smith v. The Pekin [Id. 13,090] that a voyage between two ports in the Delaware river was maritime; and there are several similar decisions. It is urged that the libellants lived on shore, but prior to the 18th of October, Taylor, the mate, lived wholly on board of the vessel, and Douglas, the engineer, took his meals on board, but slept on shore, except when his services were required at night, which was not often. After the 18th of October, both lived on shore, except dining on board. If it were doubtful, from the other evidence, whether the employment of the libellants was on land, or on the sea, the circumstance of their living on shore might be material; but the other evidence is not equivocal, and the living on shore is by no means a decisive criterion. Pilotage, for example, is a maritime service, and yet the pilot not unfrequently lives on shore. He may pilot vessels only outward bound, going on board and returning the same day, eating and sleeping in his own house, and follow this employment from day to day, or only occasionally, and yet each act of pilotage would be a maritime service. Hobart v. Drogan, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 120.

Indeed, such is the rapidity with which passages are now made, that a steamer may run by daylight, on the high seas, from state to state, and yet the officers may sleep and take their meals on shore.

In Gurney v. Crockett [Case No. 5,874], Betts, J., decided that merely moving a vessel from one anchorage to another, in the harbor of New York, was a maritime service. The present case comes within the principles laid down in The Canton [Id. 2,388].

One of the libellants was the mate, and the other the engineer, of this steamer. Some question has been made, as to the latter's having the lien of a seaman. But engineers are as essential to the navigation of a steamer, as mariners who manage the sails are to the navigation of a sailing vessel; both control the motive power, and are equally entitled to the rights of a seaman.

I am of opinion, that both the libellants have a lien upon this vessel, for the amount of their wages.

Does this lien attach to the boiler, notwithstanding the claim of M'Kay and Alders? They were the makers of the boiler, and put it into this steamer, under an agreement with Dodge, her owner, that it should remain their property, until fully paid for, and that, if any instalment of the purchase-money should be overdue, they should have a right to remove it. It has not been paid for, and the instalments are overdue, and they now claim to remove it. As between them and Dodge, they have a right to do so; and it is contended that they have the same right against the libellants, at least, as to that part of their wages which were earned after they had knowledge of the claim of M'Kay and Alders.

This boiler was in the steamer, fastened in the usual manner, to her timbers, and united with her machinery, and constituted the sole motive power, at the time these libellants entered upon their service. There is no color for saying, that they had any knowledge of the claim of M'Kay and Alders, prior to the 11th of November; and, even then, there was no notice by M'Kay and Alders, that they should hold the boiler, as against the seamen; nor is there any evidence of an agreement, either express or implied, by the libellants to waive their lien, or relieve the boiler therefrom; the most that can be said is, that they had information, which might put them upon inquiry, as to the agreement under which the boiler was put into the boat, by its makers. But, if they had made such inquiry, and had obtained actual knowledge of the agreement between M'Kay and Alders on the one part, and Dodge on the other, it would not have impaired their security. When the makers of the boiler put it into, and made it a part of, this steamer, essential to her navigation, and left her under the exclusive control of her owner, they subjected that part of the steamer, in common with all other parts, to the lien of all seamen whom the owner might employ, in her navigation. If M'Kay and Alders had owned the whole vessel, and had made precisely the same agreement in regard to her, and let her go into the possession and control of Dodge, there is no doubt that seamen employed by him would have security upon the vessel. So, if they had owned an undivided portion. And it can make no difference, that the part of the vessel which they owned was physically separable; otherwise, the sails of a vessel might be withdrawn from a seaman's lien, by the sailmaker who furnished them; the rigging by the rigger; spars by the sparmaker; the rudder by the carpenter; and so of every separable portion, until nothing might be left for the security of the mariners but a condemned and worthless hulk; and, with equal reason, that also might be withdrawn by any person who had furnished it, upon condition of retaining the ownership, until paid for. Seamen are not bound to inquire into the ownership of a vessel, on board of which they serve; and if they know the general owners, in whole or in part, and know also, that those with whom they contract have only a special ownership and control for the time being, it does not impair their lien upon the whole vessel.

The mortgagees do not interpose any claim, as against these libellants. Decree for wages and costs.

FRANKLIN v. SAME.

[1 Spr. 584.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb., 1861.

SEAMEN—WAGES—DISCHARGE—SHIPPING ARTICLES—WHALING VOYAGE—NOVEL PROVISIONS—SHARE.

1. A seaman, during a sea-elephant voyage, was discharged abroad, and received from the master a written order, directing the owner to pay him his share of all the proceeds of the voyage: Held, that reference was to be had to the shipping articles, not only to ascertain the lay set against the name of the seaman, but also the mode of computation, by which the amount of his share was to be determined.

2. During such voyage, the seaman agreed to take his discharge, and to enter into the service of another ship, but he being wholly in the power of the master, and not allowed the option of completing his first voyage, held, that he was not bound by the terms of the discharge, or of his new shipment, as to the rate of his compensation.

3. In such case, the seaman is entitled to a quantum meruit, for the whole time of his service, for both ships, to be apportioned between them.

4. The shipping articles were in the usual printed form for whaling voyages, with an additional clause in writing, containing novel provisions as to the mode of computing the shares of the seamen: Held, that the seaman was not bound by such new provisions, they not having been made known to him at the time of the shipment.

In admiralty.

E. L. Barney, for libellants.

A. S. Cushman, for respondents.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. These two libels, against the owner of the ship Samuel Robertson and the ship Arab, have been heard together. They are brought to recover compensation for services rendered in two sea-elephant voyages. In the summer of 1856, the ship Samuel Robertson sailed from Fairhaven, with a small schooner, as a tender, bound for the South Pacific Ocean, for the purpose of taking sea-elephant oil, at Desolation Isle. The schooner was lost, and the enterprise could not be prosecuted, without another tender. There was no harbor, or other place, where the ship could lie, within a hundred miles of Desolation Isle. The tender was used for the purpose of killing the animals at the island, and conveying the blubber, or oil, to the ship. Another schooner, called the Oxford, sailed from Fairhaven on the 17th day of July, 1857, to take the place of the tender, which had been lost. On her passage, she put into Fayal, and there, on the 5th day of August, 1857, the libellants were shipped. They were natives of that island, and had always resided there, and were ignorant of the English language. They signed the shipping articles, which had been made at Fairhaven, and were the usual printed articles for a whaling voyage, with the addition of a written clause, adapted to the novel and peculiar character of this voyage. Their lay, as entered against their names, was one two-hundredth; but the written clause provided that the Oxford was to be a tender to the Samuel Robertson; that the lay should be calculated on only seventy per cent. of the proceeds of that ship's voyage; and that they should have only such part of their lay, as the time they served was of the whole time of the Samuel Robertson's voyage. There is no proof that this new clause was read or explained to these libellants; the evidence, at most, only shows that they were informed that the Oxford was to be a tender to the ship, and that they were to have a two-hundredth lay of the ship's voyage.

The Oxford, with the libellants on board, arrived in due time at Desolation Isle; and the libellants, with others of the crews of the Oxford and the Samuel Robertson, continued to serve, on shore and on board of the schooner, until the ship was filled with oil, which was in May, 1858.

It was the purpose of the master of the ship, to leave the Oxford at the island, with an adequate crew, to continue the killing of the sea-elephants, and securing their oil, while the Samuel Robertson should make a voyage to the United States and return, or send out another ship in her stead.

The libellants were among those who remained; and on the 10th of May, 1858, they signed articles for the ship that should be sent out, at a one-hundred-and-forty-fifth lay; and at the same time, each of the libellants received from the master an order on the owner of the Samuel Robertson, to pay him "his share of all oil, bone, &c., turned out by the ship Samuel Robertson."

The Samuel Robertson did not return to the island; but the Arab, in her stead, sailed from Fairhaven on the 14th day of September, 1858, and arrived at the island in due time, and remained until she had obtained a full cargo of oil, when she and the Oxford, with the libellants on board, sailed for the United States, where they arrived in April last.

Several questions have arisen, as to the amount which the libellants are entitled to recover. If their claim is governed by the express terms of the articles, they would each be entitled to only such proportion of one two-hundredth part of seventy per cent. of the proceeds of that voyage, as the time they served the Samuel Robertson bore to the whole time she was absent from Fairhaven; the time of such service being about nine months, and the time of such absence being about twenty-six months. This would give them about five dollars a month, and leave them somewhat in debt to that ship, for clothing and other necessaries. But it is urged, that the order given by the master, on the 10th of May, is for their share of all oil, bone, &c., and that this means that they were to have one two-hundredth of the whole proceeds, and not of seventy per cent., for a part of the time, as stated in the articles. This construction cannot be maintained. The order says nothing of one two-hundredth or of a seventieth, but merely directs the owner to pay each libellant his share of all the proceeds, &c. In order to ascertain his share, we must look at the articles, and there we find that it is one two-hundredth of seventy per cent., reckoned in proportion to the time of service. It is insisted that the libellants are not bound by the terms of the articles, and the order founded thereon.

It is quite clear, that the new and peculiar clause in the articles was not obligatory upon them, because it was never made known to them. But previously to the 10th of May, 1858, they had become acquainted, both with the character of the enterprise, and the terms of the articles. They then received their discharge from the Samuel Robertson and accepted the order given by the master on the owner, and signed the new articles for the ship Arab. The agreement by which they were discharged from the first ship, was a new contract, as was also that by which they engaged in the service of the second ship; and if these contracts were entered into voluntarily, and understandingly, for an adequate consideration, they were binding upon the seamen. But it is contended, that they were not made voluntarily. By their original shipment, the libellants had a right to continue with the Samuel Robertson, and return with her to the United States; and there is evidence that they claimed that right, and that the master refused to permit them to do so, but insisted, even with threats of violence, that they should remain with the Oxford, and continue their labors for the ship that was to make the second voyage. The circumstances of this case render this evidence entirely credible.

In May, when the Samuel Robertson was about to leave, these men had been more than six months at the island, and had become fully acquainted with the nature of the service into which they had been drawn. The sea-elephants were killed by spears, on various parts of the island, whose name—Desolation—fitly describes its condition; encompassed by floating ice; and after taking the blubber from the animal, wherever killed, it was carried by the men, on their backs, over blocks of ice, and other impediments, with great toil and exposure, to their hut on shore; and then, either the blubber preserved, or the oil extracted, and put into casks. With no comforts or provisions, except what the little schooner, or their hut on shore, afforded, and subjected to such severe and repulsive labor, it is not easily to be believed, that these young men, natives of Fayal, who had previously known only the fruitful soil and genial climate of the Azores, would have consented to see the ship depart, and continue such services for the uncertain period of the return of another ship.

I am fully satisfied that the whole arrangement, by which they were discharged from the Samuel Robertson, and entered into the service of the Arab, was made under duress. They were in the power of the master of the Samuel Robertson; and the option of coming in that ship to the United States was not allowed to them. They have a right, therefore, to set aside the agreement made at Desolation Isle, and are entitled to recover a quantum meruit for their services, from the time they shipped at Fayal, until the time of their discharge in the United States, to be apportioned in these two actions, according to the time they served for each of the ships.

The libel makes no claim for a wrongful discharge from the first voyage, but asks only compensation for services rendered.

PAYMENT—RECEIPT—EFFECT OF—NOTES—RECEIVED IN SATISFACTION—NOTICE.

1. A receipt for so much money, is only evidence of a payment, which may be explained by parol, or other proof.

[Cited in Frick v. Algeier, 87 Ind. 256. Approved in Ryan v. Rand, 26 N. H. 15. Cited in Kelly v. Perseverance Bld'g Ass'n, 39 Pa. St. 151.]

2. If the payment acknowledged in the receipt, turn out to be a note, bill, or the like; and, if the same were not paid or received in satisfaction, and turn out unproductive, it is no payment.

[Cited in Re Hurst, Case No. 6,925.]

[Cited in First Nat. Bank of Pueblo v. Newton, 10 Colo. 161, 14 Pac. 433; Frick v. Algeier, 87 Ind. 256.]

3. In order to make such bill or note a payment, it is necessary that it be received in satisfaction, and the receiver to run all risks; or, where the receiver has made it his own, by neglecting to give notice.

A rule was obtained to set aside an execution issued against the defendant, upon the ground, that the judgment was satisfied by a note of hand, given by the defendant, with an endorser, and a receipt by the plaintiff's attorney in fact, endorsed on the power of attorney, and given up to defendant, as follows: "Received from J. Miller, the sum of 1177 dollars, being in full, including costs and expenses of property he sold in Alexandria, belonging to J. Maze."

The note when it became due, having been protested, and the defendant having become insolvent, the plaintiff sued out execution of the judgment, to set aside which this motion was made. The affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney, proves that he did not receive the note as a satisfaction of the debt or judgment, and that it was not paid as such, or so intended by defendant, as he believes; and that no agreement was made, tending to show such an intention. The defendant's attorney stated, that when the negotiation was made, respecting the note, he never thought upon the subject, whether the payment was to operate as a satisfaction, or merely as a collateral security.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. After stating the above facts, the rules of law applicable to this case are, that the receipt of so much is only evidence of a payment and satisfaction, and may be explained by parol, or other evidence. This was gone into, and we find that the note was neither paid nor received as satisfaction; but, to constitute a good plea of accord and satisfaction, both should be averred. The plaintiff, then, received a note, which proved unproductive; and it is clear, that it was no satisfaction of this debt, or a discharge of the judgment, unless it were received as such, and the party agreed to run all risks; or, by his after conduct, made it his own. Rule discharged.

See Carth. 238, note. A receipt in full, with full notice, is a discharge. Esp. 174, cited by the counsel, in favour of this motion.

SALVAGE—VESSEL AGROUND—SIGNAL OF DISTRESS—IN PERIL—BENEFIT CONFERRED.

1. A vessel driven on one of the islands in Boston harbor in the daytime set her colors union down, and was pulled off and towed to her dock by a tug, whose master had during the same morning, and before the vessel was beached, offered to tow her up for seventy-five dollars. Held, a salvage service.

[Cited in Baker v. Hemenway, Case No. 770.]

2. Salvage is the saving of property from extraordinary sea peril, by persons not bound by any existing contract to render the service. A signal of distress is evidence of such peril; and a vessel driven on shore in a gale, is, while the gale continues, in such peril.

[Cited in The Athenian, 3 Fed. 250.]

3. The remuneration in salvage cases is reckoned with a view to the benefit conferred as well as to the time, trouble, danger, &c., of the salvors, especially when the danger is still present or imminent.

[Cited in The Mary E. Long, 7 Fed. 365; The Dennis Valentine, 47 Fed. 666.]

4. A bark loaded with sugar was driven on shore in the harbor of Boston in a severe gale and was promptly rescued and brought to a wharf, while the gale was still blowing, by a powerful tug. Value saved, $33,000; salvage awarded, $1500.

The bark M. B. Stetson, on her voyage from Cuba, with a cargo of sugars, made Boston harbor before daylight on the morning of the 30th of October, 1866. The wind was blowing very heavily from the south-east, and in the darkness the vessel came to anchor about five hundred yards to windward of George's Island, a place nearer shore than was entirely prudent, if there had been an opportunity to choose the ground. The master thought himself in no special danger, and in the course of the forenoon refused to take the tow-boat D. A. Mills to tow him to Boston at the price of seventy-five dollars. The vessel lay in the same position until soon after one o'clock in the afternoon, when the gale changed to the south-west, and increased in violence, and she parted her starboard chain and dragged towards the island until her stern took the ground, when she swung round and lay nearly broadside on the beach; the tide being between two and three hours' flood. Her port chain continued to hold, and had some effect in preventing the bark from getting as fast on shore as she might otherwise have done. The master immediately set his colors union down, and the same tug saw the signal soon after and promptly came to his assistance, and on the second trial succeeded in throwing a line on board, put on a very high pressure of steam, and after shifting the position of the hawser twice so that the strain would not pull the tug's bows to leeward, dragged the bark off the shore in fifteen or twenty minutes, with some aid from her own crew, who heaved upon the port chain. When the bark floated the master of the tug ordered her chain to be cut, and then towed her to Boston. The whole service occupied less than two hours. Almost immediately upon the vessel being relieved the gale began to moderate, and before high-water it had become comparatively calm. Upon examination it was found that the vessel had not been strained nor otherwise seriously injured, nor had she started any leak, so that the cargo was in perfect order. Both vessel and cargo were the property of the claimant and were together valued at about thirty-three thousand dollars. The tug was a large and powerful vessel of her class, valued at about $18,000. The libellants demanded $5000; the claimant offered $500.

J. C. Dodge, for libellants.

R. H. Dana, Jr., for claimant. The bark was not in much danger; she might probably have been hauled off at high-water by her own crew; the work done and risk run by the tug were not greater than are common in towage services. The master explains his signal by saying that owing to the relative position of the two vessels, the ordinary signal for a tug, which is a color set in the rigging, could not have been seen by the D. A. Mills, which was the nearest steamer from which he could expect assistance, and so he set the only signal that could be seen and understood, which was the flag put at the peak, union down; but that he did not intend this to be taken as a signal of distress, but to attract attention. The service is one of towage merely, and not of salvage. The Princess Alice, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 140; The Albion, 2 Hagg. Adm. 180, note.

LOWELL, District Judge. I cannot doubt that the libellants have performed a salvage service. Salvage is the saving of vessels or other property from peril at sea by persons not bound by any existing contract to render the service. The compensation in the absence of express contract is understood to be contingent upon success, but that is perhaps not absolutely essential to a salvage service when it has been rendered by request, though if that contingency is shown the contract is presumed to be for salvage; the degree of peril is not usually important except as bearing upon the amount of the reward, provided it be something beyond the mere ordinary dangers of the seas. If there is no danger at all, as where a neutral vessel not liable to condemnation by the law of nations, has been retaken from a belligerent who respects and acts upon the law of nations, or where the master of a ship accepts some aid as mere matter of precaution or to accelerate his voyage or the like, no salvage service is rendered. But where the vessel is in actual or apparent danger, or her position or condition is such that she may probably soon be in danger, and the master acts and permits others to act upon that supposition, it would require a strong case of mistake on his part to reduce the service rendered to something less than a salvage service. So that if there were here merely the fact of the signal seen and acted on, it would be very difficult to say that a salvage service was not undertaken by the master's request. I am aware that there are a good many cases in which salvage and towage have been discussed, and which have turned or seemed to turn upon a distinction between those two kinds of service, but the real inquiry in those cases was, not whether the service, but whether the contract was for towage or salvage. If a tug plying in her usual waters takes hold of a vessel and tows her into port, under no express contract, the question is what was the implied contract. If the circumstances were ordinary, we may well infer the usual towage contract; otherwise if the case is one quite out of the ordinary course. In this point of view the amount of danger may be important as a reasonable test of the probable contract. It is thus that I understand the case of The Princess Alice, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 140, and the others cited by the claimants. But here the evidence of the acts of the parties repels the inference of a towage contract, and so does the situation of the vessel. The James T. Abbott [Case No. 7,202]; The Reward, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 174; The Isabella, 3 Hagg. Adm. 427; The Charles Adolphe, Swab. 153. Speaking generally, it may be said, that the mere fact that a vessel is aground is enough to show that she is in a situation to have a salvage service rendered her. No doubt grounding in a tidal harbor or in the Mississippi river or some similar place, may often be in fact one of the ordinary incidents of navigation and not enough of itself to show danger or distress. But I apprehend it will be difficult to find an adjudged case of a vessel driven ashore in a gale of wind, and assisted while the gale is still blowing, in which any doubt has been expressed of her being in such danger as to be open to salvage.

The question of compensation remains; and this is always a nice and difficult question. Upon a careful examination of the evidence, I am satisfied that the property was in considerable danger, not of destruction, but of further damage. I cannot believe that the master felt then the confident security which he now testifies to. The gale was very severe, and the sea, considering the place, very high, three or four feet high, as the witnesses assert. It must have appeared to the master to be, and it was highly important that prompt relief should be afforded, not to save life, nor to save the ship from destruction, but to prevent damage to some extent to the vessel, and serious damage to the cargo of sugar, which, in case of a leak, must have been much injured. The aid was given with readiness and skill, and to so good purpose, that the small damage incurred is made a ground of argument to lessen its importance; and fairly, so far as it may tend to show that a longer stay on the beach would have had no very bad consequences, but no farther. On the other hand the risk was, as I have said, not of destruction, but of such damage as one or two hours more of pounding and straining might have caused. The bark was in a harbor within reach of assistance, and would in all probability have been gotten off at high-water, if not by her own crew, which I think she would not, yet by the aid of other vessels. The case of a vessel stranded in a thoroughfare, is to be distinguished from that of one on a lonely shore, where relief may not be expected, and where the first vessel that offers may probably be the only one available for the purpose. Upon this ground it has sometimes been said that a vessel abandoned in or near a much used harbor, could not be considered derelict in the strict sense. Neither was the danger to the tug very considerable. There was some danger, undoubtedly, arising from the high pressure of steam necessary to be used; and if this strain should break the machinery there would be great danger, but this was not very probable.

What then should be the reward? Where a vessel on shore in such a place as this in good weather is pulled off by a tug, it has been held that one fair criterion of the value of the service is what the tug would have undertaken to do it for, if payment had been made contingent, upon success. The James T. Abbott [supra]. It is obvious, however, that this rule will not answer for all, or most cases, because it takes into view only one side of the question,—the risk, labor, and expense of the salvors,—without regard to the value of their services to the other party. Where the necessity is more urgent, and no time is given to bargain, and to choose between different offers, another element, namely, what would the owners of the property be willing to give rather than that the service should not be rendered, may fairly be looked at. That a steamer, usually employed at remunerative pay, in towing about a harbor, does not stand precisely on the same footing in respect to salvage, as a vessel kept on purpose for saving life and property, nor as a merchant or passenger steamer deviating from an important voyage to give aid, must also be admitted. The H. B. Foster [Case No. 6,291]. And in this point of view some of the cases concerning tow-boats find their just application.

Taking into consideration all the circumstances, I have concluded that a fair and adequate remuneration for this salvage service is fifteen hundred dollars, which is nearly five per cent of the value saved. Salvage decreed.

BANKRUPTCY—PETITIONING CREDITOR — SERVICES AND COUNSEL FEES—COMMON BENEFIT —DOCKET FEE.

1. Upon application made to the court for payment to the petitioning creditor of $500 for personal services rendered and time spent by him in procuring the adjudication of bankruptcy, and of $1000 for indebtedness incurred by him for the professional services of counsel in the proceedings, and it appearing that the court had allowed to him payment in full for his expenses and costs, and that the aid rendered by counsel was chiefly to enable the petitioning creditor to hinder the other creditors of the estate, either from participating in the choice of an assignee or in the assets of the debtor. Held, that while the petitioning creditor is entitled to his costs and reasonable expenses out of the funds of the estate, in procuring the debtor to be adjudged a bankrupt, no compensation should be made to him for his personal services.

[1] [Reprinted from 28 Leg. Int. 277, by permission.]

2. The counsel fee allowed in such cases should only be for the services rendered by him in the proceedings for the common benefit of all the creditors.

3. The docket fee of $20 is only allowable in involuntary cases, and where there has been a denial and trial by jury.

[In the matter of B. F. Mead & Co., involuntary bankrupts.]

F. H. Nye, for petitioner.
A. C. Keasbey, for assignee.

NIXON, District Judge. This was a case of involuntary bankruptcy, and the petitioning creditor now files his petition in the court, setting forth "that in the discharge of his duty as such petitioning creditor, and in the conduct of the proceedings therein, in his behalf, and in the obtaining possession of the property of said bankrupts, and preserving the same until the appointment of an assignee, he necessarily performed many services and spent much time, and that the reasonable value of the same to the estate of said bankrupts, is five hundred dollars;" and further, "that he employed a solicitor and counsel in said matter, who carried on the proceedings on the part of said petitioner, and gave him advice in regard to the same, and that he incurred an indebtedness to him therefor in the sum of one thousand dollars." Upon the filing of the petition, a rule was taken, ordering the assignee to show cause before the court, on the 14th day of February last, why the prayer of said petitioner should not be granted. No testimony has been taken under the rule, but at the hearing, the respective counsel for the assignee and of the petitioning creditor, submitted to the court all the papers on file, as exhibiting the proceedings in the case, and agreed that the court should decide from their inspection, whether any, or, if any, what allowance should be made to the petitioning creditor for his own and his counsel's services, in procuring the adjudication of bankruptcy. These papers are very voluminous and have been carefully examined. It appears from them that the original petition was filed on the 26th day of August, A. D. 1869, and that Mead & Co. were adjudged bankrupts on the 14th day of September following. The first step taken by the counsel for the petitioning creditor, after the adjudication, was to apply to the court for an order excluding Henry A. Merrill and Harry Rockafellar, trading as Merrill & Co., and sixteen other firms, embracing nearly all the creditors of the bankrupts, from proving any debts or claims against the estate, and from voting in the choice of an assignee. Upon this application a rule to show cause was granted, a special examiner was appointed in New York, at the instance of the petitioning creditor, and a large amount of evidence taken before him, to establish the fact, that these creditors had forfeited all right to prove their claims and participate in the estate of the bankrupts, because they had been parties to an attempt to obtain a preference of their debts, contrary to the provisions of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)].

As my predecessor, after hearing the testimony and the argument of counsel, made an order discharging the rule and requiring the petitioning creditor to pay the costs of the proceeding, it is proper for me to assume, that it was an unwarrantable attempt on his part, either to secure the position of assignee, by the exclusion of proper votes, or to receive the payment of his own claims in full, by the exclusion of the great bulk of the creditors, from their equal share in the assets. After the appointment of the assignee, the next step in the proceedings on the part of the petitioning creditor, appears to have been an application by him to the court, for an order "that he be paid and re-imbursed certain expenses incurred by him and his solicitor, as petitioning creditor, amounting in all to $454.27, out of moneys in the custody of the court, belonging to said estate." The court ordered, that a copy of the bill of items of said expenditures, be served, with a copy of the order, upon the assignee, and that he show cause against reimbursing said amount, before the court, on the eighth day of February following. On the return day of the rule, and upon proof being filed that a copy of the order and the bill of items of the petitioning creditor's claim, had been served upon the assignee, the court adjourned the hearing until the fifteenth, and the assignee not then appearing, an order was made that he pay, out of the monies of the estate, to the petitioning creditor, the amount of his claim, to wit, the sum of $454.26, for the expenses which he had necessarily incurred in having the debtors adjudged bankrupts. I have examined the bill of items thus ordered to be paid, and find that the petitioning creditor has been exceedingly minute and particular in his statement of his expenses; items, as small as six cents for ferriage to Jersey City, being charged. As it nowhere appears that he has performed any duty in reference to the bankrupt's estate, since this claim for reimbursement for his expenses, I must assume that all his expenses have been paid; and his present claim rests entirely upon his demand for payment for personal services.

The question as to what allowance should be made to the petitioning creditor out of the funds of the estate, for his instrumentality in having the debtor adjudged a bankrupt, has been much discussed, and there seems to be a general concurrence of the judges that he should be paid his costs and reasonable expenses. He acts for the equal benefit of all the creditors, and it is not equitable that they should enjoy the fruits of his labors without contributing a fair share towards the burden borne by him in gathering them. Chief Justice Chase, in Re Mitteldorfer [Case No. 9,675]; Judge Bryan, Re Williams [Id.

17,704]; Judge Benedict, Re Schwab [Id. 12,498]; Woodruff, Circuit Judge, Re N. Y. Mail Steamship Co. [Id. 10,208]. Provision is made for his costs and fees in general orders in bankruptcy, rules 29, 31. What are reasonable expenses must depend upon the circumstances of each case. The expression has reference to necessary disbursements made in connection with the steps proper to be taken by the petitioning creditor, preliminary to, and attendant upon, the adjudication of bankruptcy. I can find no authority to extend it to compensation to such creditor for his time and personal services, and if I were permitted upon principle to give it any such construction, I do not think it would be to the general interests of creditors that I should do so, in this or any other case. It would be holding out encouragement to persons to make a business of putting their debtors in bankruptcy. The application, therefore, of the petitioning creditor for an allowance of five hundred dollars for his services and time, in addition to the $454.27 paid to him for the expenses incurred by him, is denied.

2. His petition further states, that in carrying on the proceedings against the bankrupts, it became necessary for him to employ counsel, and that he has hence incurred an indebtedness to the sum of $1000, for which he asks an allowance. It is just and proper to allow a fair counsel fee in such cases. But it should be only for the services rendered by him in proceedings for the common benefit of all the creditors, and such are the tendencies now a days, of courts as well as municipal corporations, and state and national legislatures, to be liberal and generous with other people's money, that great care should be exercised lest injustice be done to the creditor, by a thoughtless and undue liberality in such allowances. Where the petitioning creditor, as in this case, attempts, after adjudication, to use his position to exclude other creditors of the bankrupt, from participating, either in the choice of an assignee or in the assets of the estate, and so signally fails in the effort, that the court is constrained to charge him with the costs of the proceedings, it is hardly respectful to the judgment of the court, that he afterwards file a petition, asking to be allowed $1000 for counsel fees, for professional service, the bulk of which, as the items of the account show, was rendered in these unjustifiable proceedings against the interests of the general creditors. Upon presenting this matter to the court, the counsel for the assignee, hinted his opposition to any allowance for counsel fees, upon the ground, that the evidence disclosed gross professional impropriety on the part of the counsel employed by the petitioning creditor.

I have examined the testimony in reference to this charge, and find that he first acted as counsel for the debtor, in an effort to have his assets distributed by one of the creditors, for the equal benefit of all, without taking the estate into the bankrupt court, and that afterwards, when that course of settlement was interrupted by the intervention of the petitioning creditor, he came into this court, as his counsel, and attempted to exclude the other creditors from sharing in the estate, upon the allegations, that their proceedings, which he had advised, was a fraud upon the bankrupt law. I cannot but perceive that such a course of proceeding is not marked by that nice sense of delicacy and honor, which ought to characterize the gentlemen of the profession; and if the question was one of compensation to him upon his application I might feel constrained to refuse to make an order for an allowance.

But the real question is, whether the petitioning creditor has incurred liability in instituting proceedings for the pecuniary advantage of the other creditors, and whether the fund, secured, in part at least by his diligence, should be made to contribute towards re-imbursing him for what he has become liable. Looking at the matter in this light, I think that a reasonable fee should be allowed, for filing the petition and obtaining the order of adjudication, which is all the service that he seems to have rendered for the general benefit of the creditors. His other acts appear to have been at the instance of the petitioning creditors, and against the interests of the other creditors, and for these he must look to his client for compensation. As there was no denial filed, and no contest made by the debtor upon the petition, I cannot allow the docket fee of $20, which the statute gives upon a trial. I am aware that Mr. Bump, in his excellent and well arranged work, on the Law and Practice of Bankruptcy (page 195), states that, "in all cases in involuntary bankruptcy, the appearance fee of $20, is taxable in favor of the attorney of the successful party;" but neither the authority which he quotes, nor the act of congress regulating fees, sustains his position. He refers to Gordon v. Scott [Case No. 5,620], and a careful examination of that case, will show that the docket fee is allowable only in those involuntary cases, where there has been a trial by jury. The statute of February 26th, 1853 (10 Stat. 161), authorizes it only where there is "a trial before a jury in civil and criminal cases, or before referees, or on a final hearing in equity or admiralty."

Let an order be drawn in this case, refusing to the petitioning creditor any farther allowance, except the sum of sixty dollars, a reasonable compensation to his counsel for filing the petition, and obtaining an adjudication of bankruptcy.

[19 N. B. R. 81; [1] 2 N. J. Law J. 26.]

District Court, D. New Jersey, Oct. Term, 1878.

BANKRUPTCY — FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE — PURCHASER WITH KNOWLEDGE OF FRAUD—IMPROVEMENTS—INCUMBRANCES PAID.

One who, with notice of the fraud, purchases property fraudulently conveyed by a bankrupt, has no right, after being compelled to surrender it to the assignee, to reimbursement either for improvements upon the premises or for moneys advanced to reduce incumbrances.

On petition to expunge claim of Edmund Mead.

NIXON, District Judge. The assignee of Peter Mead, bankrupt, filed a bill in this court, some years ago, to set aside, as fraudulent and void against creditors, a conveyance of real estate made by said Mead and wife to one Temperance Berry. The claimant in this case was one of the defendants in that suit, filing a separate answer and contesting the assignee's right to recover. The decree of the court was that the sale was fraudulent and void, and that the claimant, who was a purchaser of the premises of the bankrupt's grantee, had sufficient notice of the fraud to put him upon inquiry, and that, although he may have paid full value, he took the property subject to the right of the creditors of Peter Mead to be paid their debts.

The testimony in these proceedings disclose the fact that when Peter Mead transferred the premises to Berry they were incumbered with two mortgages; one to a Mr. Bonnell, to secure the payment of five hundred dollars, and the other to a Mr. Whitty, for two thousand dollars, and that Berry paid off the latter in the month of October, 1868, while the property was held by his wife. He did not cancel the mortgage, however, but caused it to be assigned to one Alfred Berry, who says that he was ignorant of the transaction at the time and paid nothing on the mortgage. There seems to be some confusion in the testimony whether the Bonnell mortgage was paid by Berry before the execution of the agreement to sell the property to the claimant on the 19th of May, 1869, or with the five hundred dollars that Edmund Mead advanced on the delivery of the said agreement. But it is a matter of small consequence whether the mortgages were in fact paid by Edmund Mead or by Berry. In either case the person paying has no claim upon the estate of Peter Mead, as against his creditors, to have the amount refunded. The court has already decided that the transfer to Berry was a fraud and that Edmund Mead had cause to know that the fraud was being perpetrated upon the creditors of Peter Mead.

Under these circumstances he purchased the property at his peril, and when, after a long litigation, he was compelled to surrender it to the assignee, there does not remain in him any claim either for improvements upon the premises for reduction of incumbrances. The case falls within the rulings of the supreme court in Railroad Co. v. Soutter, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 517, and there must be an order entered expunging the claim.

BANKRUPTCY—PARTNERSHIP—NOTES ENDORSED INDIVIDUALLY—JOINT AND SEPARATE ESTATES—ENGLISH RULE OF ELECTION.

1. Where a creditor, to whom a debt was due by a copartnership composed of three persons, took, for a part of it, the note of the copartnership endorsed by one of the copartners, and for other parts of it, severally, three notes, each made by one of the copartners, and endorsed by the two copartners other than its maker, and afterwards the copartners were adjudged bankrupts, and the creditor proved his debts against the makers alone of the four notes: Held, that he was entitled to dividends, according to such proofs, out of the several estates, joint or separate, against which the proofs were made.

2. The copartners, in respect to the notes made or endorsed by them individually, were accommodation makers or endorsers for the copartnership, which, as between the copartners, and in equity, was the principal debtor.

3. There is nothing in the 36th section of the bankruptcy act of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 534.) which, in terms, prohibits such creditor from proving his debts, and taking dividends, against the joint and separate estates of his debtors, in virtue of their joint and several liabilities respectively, he being a legal creditor of the individual copartners in respect to the notes bearing their individual names either as makers or endorsers.

4. It is the doctrine of the English court of chancery, that, in bankruptcy, a creditor who has knowingly taken both the copartnership and the individual obligation of his debtors for the same debt, must elect whether he will prove his debt against the joint estate or the separate estate of his debtors.

5. The English rule is, that the mere form of the security or evidence of indebtedness does not control in respect to the question whether the debt can be proved against the copartnership, or must be proved against the separate estate of a partner.

6. Whether the creditor in this case would, at his election, have a right to prove his whole debt against the copartnership estate alone, or would have a right to prove, upon the copartnership note, against the copartnership and the endorsers on that note, and, upon the other notes, against the several makers and endorsers thereof, quere.

7. The English rule of election, discussed.

8. Whether, in this case, the joint estate of the copartnership ought not to be deemed a debtor to the separate estates of the several copartners, to the extent of any payment to be made, on the debt due to the creditor, out of such separate estates, quere.

[This was a bill in equity by Charles H. Mead against the National Bank of Fayetteville and others. Final hearing on pleadings and proofs.]

HALL, District Judge. The defendants Edwin P. Russell, Porter Tremain, and Augustus Tremain, were adjudged bankrupts on the 6th of January, 1868; and the plaintiff was soon after appointed their assignee. These defendants had been copartners in business, and, on the 5th of December, 1866, were indebted to the other defendant, the bank, in the sum of $43,000. This indebtedness was evidenced by sundry notes of the firm, as maker. Each of these notes of the firm bore the endorsement of one of the copartners, Porter Tremain being such endorser for $13,500, Augustus Tremain for $12,000, and Edwin P. Russell for $17,500. On the day last-named, and for reasons not deemed necessary to be determined or discussed, the form of the paper which evidenced such indebtedness was changed, on the application of the officers of the bank; and the notes of the firm were taken for $14,000, those of Porter Tremain for $10,000, and those of Augustus Tremain for $9,000, and those of Edwin P. Russell for $10,000. The notes made by the firm were endorsed by Edwin P. Russell, and those made by one of the individual partners, were respectively endorsed by the other two members of the firm. These notes were all given for the old previously-existing copartnership debt, and they were afterward renewed by like notes and like endorsements, all of the original and renewed notes and endorsements being in fact securities for debts which were the proper debts of the copartnership. In respect to the firm, whatever may have been the legal relations between the bank and the individual partners (see In re Babcock [Case No. 696]), these individual partners, in respect to the notes made or endorsed by them in their individual names, were accommodation makers or endorsers for the benefit of the firm; and the firm, as between the partners and in equity, must be considered as the principal and primary debtor. As between the bank and the individual partners, the making or endorsing of these notes created a legal obligation against the individual partner who thus made or endorsed such notes, and the bank might sue upon and enforce such obligation, according to its form and terms. It, therefore, had its election to sue either the maker or the endorser; and it might, if it chose, have maintained separate suits against the maker and each endorser, and taken a judgment against each. In short, the bank, when these notes were dishonored, was the legal creditor of the several parties thereto, according to their several and respective obligations; and there is no reason for holding that the legal relation of debtor and creditor, thus subsisting, did not exist under the bankruptcy act. In re Babcock, ubi supra.

After the adjudication in bankruptcy, the bank, being then the holder and owner of the paper thus given in renewal, proved its debts as against the makers alone, that is, against the firm and joint estate, upon the firm-note for $14,000, and against the individual members of the firm and their separate estates, upon the notes signed by each partner respectively; but it did not prove any demand against the separate estates of the copartners, upon such endorsements. There being assets in the hands of the plaintiff belonging to the joint estate of the bankrupts, as such copartners, and also assets belonging to the separate estates of the several individual members of the firm, and the relative amount of those assets being such that the bank would receive a much larger dividend, if allowed to take a dividend on its debt or debts as thus proved, partly against the firm, and partly against the partners individually, the plaintiff, as assignee, has filed his bill in this court, and now insists, that the whole debt of the bank, being in equity and in fact the debt of the firm, must be proved as a debt against, and take a dividend from, only the joint estate of the bankrupts, and that no part of it can be paid out of the separate or individual estates of the bankrupts, in consequence of their individual liability either as makers or endorsers.

It is impossible for me, at this time, to give this case the careful examination and deliberate consideration which its importance deserves, without neglecting other cases having equal claims to an early decision. The counsel who argued the case were, as they said, unable to find any decision, under the act of 1841 [5 Stat. 440], which determined this question; and my own limited research has brought under my observation but a single case, (that of In re Farnum [Case No. 4,674], which will be hereafter noticed,) in which the question appears to have been decided.

[In respect to the firm, whatever may have been the legal relations between the bank and the individual partners (see Babcock's Case [supra]), these individual partners, in respect to the notes made or endorsed by them in their individual names, were accommodation makers or endorsers for the benefit of the firm, as between the partners and in equity, must be considered as the principal and primary debtor. As between the bank and these individual partners, the making or endorsing of these notes created a legal obligation against the individual partner who thus made or endorsed those notes, and the bank might sue upon and enforce such obligation according to its form and terms. It therefore had its election to sue either the maker or the endorser, and it might, if it chose, have maintained separate suits against the maker and each endorser, and taken a judgment against each. In short, the bank, when these notes were dishonored, was the legal creditor of the several parties thereto, according to the form of their several and respective obligations; and there is no reason for holding that the legal relation of debtor and creditor thus subsisting did not exist under the bankrupt act. Babcock's Case, ubi supra.] [2]

The act of 1867 (section 36) provides, "that, where two or more persons who are partners in trade shall be adjudged bankrupt, either on the petition of such partners, or any one of them, or on the petition of any creditor of the partners, a warrant shall issue in the manner provided by this act, upon which all the joint stock and property of the copartnership, and also all the separate estate of each of the partners, shall be taken, excepting such parts thereof as are hereinbefore excepted; and all the creditors of the company, and the separate creditors of each partner, shall be allowed to prove their respective debts; and the assignee shall be chosen by the creditors of the company, and shall also keep separate accounts of the joint stock and property of the copartnership, and of the separate estate of each member thereof; and, after deducting out of the whole amount received by such assignee, the whole of the expenses and disbursements, the net proceeds of the joint stock shall be appropriated to pay the creditors of the copartnership, and the net proceeds of the separate estate of each partner shall be appropriated to pay his separate creditors; and, if there shall be any balance of the separate estate of any partner, after the payment of his separate debts, such balance shall be added to the joint stock, for the payment of the joint creditors; and, if there shall be any balance of the joint stock, after payment of the joint debts, such balance shall be divided and appropriated to and among the separate estates of the several partners, according to their respective right and interest therein, and as it would have been if the partnership had been dissolved without any bankruptcy; and the sum so appropriated to the separate estate of each partner shall be applied to the payment of his separate debts." The same provisions, in substance, are contained in the act of 1841 (section 14); and these provisions have been said to be in accordance with the rule as previously established. See In re Marwick [Case No. 9,181], before Judge Ware; Collins v. Hood [Id. 3,015]; In re Ingalls [Id. 7,032]. These provisions of our statute do not, in terms, prohibit the bank, which had taken the precaution to require the note of the copartnership to be endorsed by the members of that copartnership, in their individual names, before giving credit upon it, from proving its debts and taking dividends against the joint and separate estates of these debtors, in virtue of those joint and several liabilities respectively; for the bank is clearly a legal creditor of the individual partners, in respect to the notes upon which their individual names appear, either as makers or endorsers. But the English court of chancery, (in the absence, it is said, of any statutory provision on the subject,) has, it seems, established the doctrine, that, in cases of bankruptcy, a creditor having knowingly taken the copartnership and the individual obligation of his debtors for the same debt, must elect whether he will prove his debt against the joint estate or the separate estate of his debtors. Colly. Partn. §§ 940–948; Avery & H. Bankr. 308; 2 Lindl. Partn. (2d Ed.) pp. 1188–1195; 87 Law Lib. pp. 1013–1025. This doctrine of election necessarily concedes, that the creditor is a creditor of the firm and likewise of the separate partner whose individual liability he has taken the precaution to exact, and is, therefore, an authority sustaining the claim of the bank in this case, that it is the creditor of the individual partners upon the notes signed or endorsed by them individually.

The reasonable doctrine, that the mere form of the security or evidence of indebtedness does not control in respect to the question whether the debt can be proved against the copartnership or must be proved against the separate estate of a partner, seems, also, to be well established in England. See cases referred to by Avery & H. Bankr. pp. 309–311; Agawam Bank v. Morris, 4 Cush. 99. Thus, where a firm borrowed money for partnership purposes, and only one of the partners gave a bond for its payment, the other being a witness to it, and the moneys being entered in the cash book of the firm, it was held, that the debt therefor might be proved as a joint debt. Ex parte Brown [cited in] 1 Atk. 225; Ex parte Emly, 1 Rose, 61.

In this case, it is probable that the bank would, at its election, have a right to prove its whole debt against the copartnership estate alone, if the rules established by the English court of chancery were to be adopted; but it is not necessary now to decide whether the bank has such right to prove against the joint estate, or whether it has a right to prove against the firm upon the firm-note, and against the endorsers thereon, and against the general makers and endorsers of the notes not signed in the firm-name, according to the legal liability of each, for the bank has not, as yet, insisted upon a right to prove its debts, except as against the makers of the several notes which evidence the indebtedness. Looking to the questions actually presented in this case, I am of the opinion, that the bank had a right to prove its debts against the makers of the notes held by it, and is entitled to dividends from the joint and separate estates of the bankrupts, according to such proof. The utmost that can be claimed against the bank is, that it may be driven to its election; and, as it has proved its debts against the makers of the notes, and them alone, no valid objection has been urged against such proof.

It may, perhaps, be doubtful, whether the bank is compelled to elect, according to the English practice in bankruptcy. In the case of In re Farnum [Case No. 4,674], already referred to, the learned judge of the Massachusetts district held, that, under the bankruptcy act of 1841, a creditor who presented a bill of exchange drawn by the firm and endorsed by one of the partners, was entitled to a dividend from the joint estate of the firm, and also a dividend from the separate estate of the partner who made such endorsement; and he repudiated the English rule, which required an election by the creditor under like circumstances. The question seems to have been carefully considered by Judge Sprague, and I confess I regard the rule he adopted as more reasonable than that of the English courts; but, if I did not, I should be unwilling to disregard a decision, directly in point, made by that able judge, without very careful and deliberate consideration. The English rule has been disapproved by some of the most eminent judges and ablest lawyers of England; and Judge Sprague, in the case alluded to, declared, that the right of a party, holding two valid obligations, to the benefit of both, was founded both in law and justice, and that he did not think himself authorized to set aside that right, on account of an arbitrary rule, justly reprobated by the most eminent judges and jurists in England, and never recognized in this country. The English rule was condemned by Judge Story (Story, Partn. § 376 et seq.); and, in Borden v. Cuyler, 10 Cush. 476, Judge Cushing, in delivering the opinion of the court, declared, that it remained a mooted question in the United States, and that, in Massachusetts, the practice and the weight of professional opinion favored the double proof, but that the point had not then been adjudicated. It was not adjudicated in that case, nor has it been in any other case in our own courts, that has fallen under my observation, except in the case of In re Farnum, already noticed; and, upon the authority of Judge Sprague's decision, and the best consideration I have been able to give to the questions presented, I am of the opinion that the bank had, at least, a right to prove its debts and claim dividends in the manner stated.

It is not, perhaps, necessary now to consider, whether the assignee, as the representative of the creditors of the individual partners, is not, in equity, entitled to require, that the joint estate shall be deemed a debtor to the assignee, as such representative, to the extent of any payments which may be made upon the debt of the bank out of the separate estates of the individual partners, in the same manner that any other party, who has made or endorsed similar notes for the accommodation of the firm, might be—and that, whether the English doctrine of election is, or is not, to prevail. The bill states, that the assets of the firm, though nominally amounting to about $50,000, are really worth much less; that the individual assets of the partners, over and above incumbrances, are about as follows: Russell's, $7,000; Porter Tremain's, $11,000; and Augustus Tremain's, about $3,000. The amount of the debts (other than those of the bank) proved against the firm, and against the several individual partners, is not stated, but the firm was insolvent and bankrupt, and it is alleged that Russell, individually, owed debts amounting to about $900, while the other two partners owed no individual debts likely to be proved against their individual estates; but I see no statement of the firm or individual debts proved, either in the bill or in the testimony in the case, other than the debts held and proved by the bank. At all events, the question just suggested has not been argued, and a final disposition of it might require a settlement of the accounts of the individual partners with the firm; and, as the case decided by Judge Sprague, and the intimation made in 10 Cush., were not called to the attention of the counsel, and were not discussed by them, I think it better not to make any decree in this case at present, but to advise the counsel that, in my opinion, the bank has a right to dividends against the joint and separate estates of the bankrupts, according to their proofs in the case, and that any other question in the case may be further argued. Further research by the counsel or myself may lead to the discovery of other cases decided under the act of 1841, and bearing on the main question, but I am not able, at this time, to pursue the investigation. See Howe v. Lawrence, 9 Cush. 559, 560; Somerset Potters' Works v. Minot, 10 Cush. 597; Agawam Bank v. Morris, 4 Cush. 99; Fuller v. Hooper, 3 Gray, 334; Tucker v. Oxley, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 34.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1807.

COSTS—ON APPEAL FROM JUSTICE OF PEACE—DISCRETIONARY.

Costs on appeal from a judgment of a justice of the peace, are within the discretion of the court, if the judgment be affirmed in part.

Upon an appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace, the jury found a verdict for the appellee, for $10.69. The judgment of the justice was for $17.50.

Mr. Law, for appellant, contended for costs. Appeals from justices of the peace are given by the Maryland act of 1791 (chapter 68). The condition of the appeal-bond only provides for costs in case the judgment shall be affirmed. The appellee cannot sue upon the bond, for the condition has not been broken. The judgment has not been affirmed, although the appellee has recovered something; yet he had obtained a judgment below for too much. In the case of Austin v. Hughes, in Montgomery county court the judgment was diminished only two dollars, and yet the appellant recovered judgment for costs.

F. S. Key, contrà. It is an appeal as to fact as well as law, and new evidence was admitted. The case is taken up de novo. Costs are a matter of discretion. The bond, if appellant had given one, would have bound him to pay all such damages and costs as this court shall award against him.

Mr. Morsell, in reply, admits that this court has original jurisdiction as to fact, but as to law it is only appellate. If the proceedings below are not regular, the judgment must be reversed. If this court, or the jury, should give more than the justice of the peace had given, appellee may release and affirm the judgment as to the residue. If the judgment below was erroneous, the appellant has sustained his appeal, and ought not to pay costs.

THE COURT was of opinion that in such cases costs are within the discretion of the court, and as there was no evidence of a tender of any part of the money, or any offer to pay as much as the appellee finally recovered; it is the opinion of the court that the judgment of the justice ought to be affirmed as to the sum awarded by the jury, with costs, and reversed as to the residue.

District Court, S. D. New York. April 22, 1879.

BANKRUPTCY—PETITION TO VACATE ADJUDICATION—FRAUD—KNOWLEDGE THEREOF—LACHES—REPEAL OF ACT.

1. A creditor seeking to vacate an adjudication must make his application with due diligence on being informed of the facts, and even slight want of diligence is in such case imputed as laches and forfeits his claim to the aid of the court.

2. From the time creditors first receive notice of an adjudication they are put upon inquiry as to any matters in which it may affect their interests and which can be readily discovered by them, and if they make no inquiries and do nothing, it is evidence of acquiescence on their part.

3. In June, 1878, the bankrupt was adjudicated by consent in involuntary proceedings. In March, 1879, a petition was filed by a creditor who had recovered judgment and had a receiver appointed before the filing of the said petition in bankruptcy to vacate the adjudication on the ground of fraud and collusion; that the paper, suspension of which was alleged as the act of bankruptcy, was not made or passed in the bankrupt's business as a trader; that the petitioning creditors swore to the petition without knowing its statements to be true; that the greater part of their claims were fictitious; and that they did not constitute the requisite number and amount. It appeared that the petitioner did not prove her claim, but that she combined with other creditors and contributed money to pay the expenses of a re-examination of the proof of debt by one of the petitioning creditors and that she had been admitted to and did oppose an application of the bankrupt for a discharge. Held, that her actions in the proceeding estopped her from any claim of right to make this application; that she was guilty of laches, especially so as she waited until after the repeal of the bankrupt law of 1867 (14 Stat. 517), and thereby prevented the bankrupt from going into voluntary bankruptcy. In August, 1878, she had prepared a petition, but abandoned it because she had not then sufficient proof of the facts.

4. This did not excuse the delay; she should have made immediate application, and, if necessary, should have applied for such examination of the parties and such taking of testimony as was necessary for eliciting the truth.

[In the matter of Abraham Meade, a bankrupt.]

Coleridge E. Hart, for petitioner.

Wheeler H. Peckham and P. W. Ostrander, contra.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is an application of a creditor of the bankrupt to set aside the adjudication. On the 19th of June, 1878, a petition was filed against the bankrupt signed by six persons alleging themselves to be at least one-fourth in number and one-third in value of all the creditors of Meade, and alleging as an act of bankruptcy the suspension for forty days of his commercial paper, made in his business as a trader, and praying that he be adjudicated a bankrupt. On the return-day of the order to show cause, June 29, 1878, Meade appeared, and upon his filing a written consent thereto he was adjudicated a bankrupt.

This application to vacate the adjudication is made upon the petition of Elizabeth L. Hart, a creditor of said bankrupt, who recovered a judgment against him in March, 1878, for two thousand and eighty-six dollars. The petition now presented was filed March 12, 1879. The grounds upon which this relief is sought are fraud and collusion between the bankrupt and the petitioning creditors in procuring the adjudication; that the bankrupt was not in fact a trader; that the paper, the suspension of the payment of which constituted the alleged act of bankruptcy, was not made or passed in the course of his business as a trader; that the petitioning creditors, and especially three of them, swore to the petition without knowing that Meade was a merchant or trader within the meaning of the bankrupt law; that the greater part of the alleged claims of the petitioning creditors were fictitious, and that they did not constitute in fact one-third in value of the creditors of said Meade; and especially that the said claim of James C. Meade, one of the petitioning creditors, whose claim is stated at thirty-four thousand dollars, and constituted about one-third of the aggregate claims of the petitioning creditors, and which was necessary to make up the one-third in value of all the debts, was wholly fictitious; that the petition was prepared and filed collusively and fraudulently between the bankrupt and the petitioning creditors, who were relatives and friends of his family, to obtain a discharge without paying any part of his debts, and with intent on the bankrupt's part to defraud the petitioner, Mrs. Hart, of the result of her diligence in obtaining a judgment and an appointment of a receiver of Meade's property, which had been obtained in proceedings supplementary to her judgment the day before the petition in bankruptcy was filed; that the bankrupt knew that he had not committed an act of bankruptcy when he consented to the adjudication and permitted the court to be misled by the false averments of the petition.

Notice of this application having been given to the bankrupt and the petitioning creditors, and also to all known creditors of the bankrupt, the petitioning creditors and the bankrupt appeared and answered, denying the alleged frauds and false statements, and some of the other creditors appeared and offered no objection to the vacating of the adjudication; other creditors did not appear.

By the papers accompanying this petition, and in which, together with the petition, this application is made, it appears that the petitioner procured the appointment of a receiver of the property of the bankrupt by a state court in proceedings supplementary to her execution, and he gave bond and was duly qualified as such receiver, June 18, 1878; but that no assets have come to his hands, and that the receivership secures but a small part, if any, of her debt; that the petitioner, Mrs. Hart, has never proved her debt; that at the first meeting of creditors, July 19, 1878, objection was made by other creditors to the proof of James C. Meade's claim, and he was not allowed to take part in the election of an assignee; that a re-examination of his claim was demanded, and has been ever since proceeding before the register; that though this petitioner did not prove her claim, because she believed that her receivership gave her security on the debtor's property, yet that she entered into a combination with other creditors to defeat in the bankruptcy proceedings the claim of James C. Meade as fictitious, contributing the money to pay the expenses of this re-examination of James C. Meade's proof of debt; that an application by the bankrupt for his discharge has been opposed by this same combination of creditors, including the petitioner, who has obtained a special order of the court permitting her to appear therein and file specifications. These proceedings have involved very protracted examinations, at a large expense to the parties interested; that in August, 1878, this petitioner prepared a petition similar to her present petition, asking the setting aside of the adjudication on substantially the same grounds as are now urged, but abandoned it because she was advised that she had not at that time sufficient proof of the facts alleged to proceed with it successfully. The bankrupt and the petitioning creditors insist that the petition should be dismissed, on the ground that upon her own petition and accompanying papers she is not entitled to relief. This motion must be granted. The power of the court to vacate its own decree, which has been procured by fraud and deceit, either upon the motion of any party interested in having it set aside, or on its own motion when the facts are properly brought to its attention, cannot be doubted. But the power is one to be exercised cautiously, with a due regard to the interests of all parties who may be injuriously affected thereby, and especially to the rights and interests of any parties who may have relied on the decree as valid and be injuriously affected by its being vacated. In other words, the application is one made to the sound discretion of the court under all the circumstances. In re Court [Case No. 3,284]; In re Griffith [Id. 5,820]; In re Funkenstein [Id. 5,158], and cases cited; In re Lalor [Id. 8,001].

As regards the parties who may apply for such relief, it must appear that they have made the application with diligence on being informed of the facts; and even slight want of diligence is in such a case imputed as laches, and forfeits their claim to the aid of the court. Such delay is regarded as virtual acquiescence in the decree, so far as it affects them. Same cases; also, In re Thomas [Case No. 13,891]; In re Neilson [Id. 10,090]. In this case the petitioner has, through the co-operation and under the names of other creditors who personally appeared, actively taken the benefit of the decree now sought to be set aside, and also more recently in her own name endeavored, by proceedings in the due course of the bankrupt law, to obtain relief only attainable under and by virtue of the decree of adjudication as a valid judgment. This clearly estops her from any claim of right to make this application. It also appears clearly that early in August, 1878, she was fully aware of all the facts now relied on as the ground of this application. It was clearly incumbent on her, if she intended ever to proceed to set aside the adjudication, to make immediate application to the court, and if not yet in possession of all the evidence essential to her case, she should have applied to the court for such examination of the parties and such taking of testimony as was necessary for eliciting the truth. Instead of this, she has in fact proceeded under the adjudication for relief wholly inconsistent with the vacating of the decree.

Clearly no case is made which calls on the court of its own motion to vacate the decree. If erroneous, it has been acquiesced in by creditors by their inaction and failure seasonably to move to set it aside. Even their ignorance of the facts at this late day could not excuse their inaction, for, from the time creditors first receive notice of an adjudication, they are put upon inquiry as to any matters in which it may affect their interests, and which can readily be discovered by them, and if they make no inquiries and do nothing, it is evidence of acquiescence on their part. In this case, the decree has been made the basis of long and expensive litigation, all of which will be utterly without result if the decree shall be vacated. This renders it improper to disturb the decree, if originally procured by false suggestion. As to one of the principal grounds on which it is attacked—the alleged fictitious nature of the claims of the petitioning creditors—this petitioner and all other creditors have also full and adequate relief without vacating the decree, because if this fact is proved it bars the bankrupt's discharge, since he must have known the fact and did not disclose it. As to the other ground, that there was in fact no act of bankruptcy, the alleged bankrupt not being a "trader" within the meaning of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], the suggestion on behalf of the bankrupt is, I think, entitled to great weight: that if at any time before the repeal of the bankrupt law, September 1, 1878, this application had been made, he could have gone into voluntary bankruptcy, and that the petitioner, though knowing or having ample means to ascertain the fact, has waited till it is too late for him to take the benefit of the bankrupt law at all. The same suggestion is properly made also in respect to those of the petitioning creditors who are not directly charged with fraud, but only with carelessly joining in a petition, not knowing that its averments were true. It is observable that the petition does not allege that they did not believe that this averment of the act of bankruptcy was true, or that they knew that it was false; and however such carelessness is to be censured it seems to me that the petitioning creditors, who presumably had an interest in the adjudication of their debtor under the bankrupt law, have not forfeited thereby all title to consideration, and as to them and their interests this petitioner has been guilty of gross laches in not moving before the repeal of the bankrupt law.

I have gone thus at length into the reasons for dismissing this petition, not because I have entertained any doubt on the question, but because of the great diligence and earnestness with which the case of the petitioner has been presented to the court by the petitioner's counsel. Petition dismissed.

Case No. 9,371.

MEADE et al. v. BEALE et al.

[Taney, 339.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. Nov. Term, 1850.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES—BEQUEST TO — INCORPORATION — VALIDITY — STATE DECISIONS — WHEN ADOPTED—IN EQUITY—REMEDY—RIGHT.

1. A citizen of Maryland, by his will, dated the 6th of March 1836, bequeathed "to the Education Society of Virginia, for the benefit of the theological students at the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary of Virginia, near Alexandria, District of Columbia, one thousand dollars, the interest only to be annually expended." The object of the bequest was an unincorporated and voluntary association of individuals to take in succession. On a bill filed to enforce this bequest, held: that the case must be governed by those of Dashiell v. Attorney-General [5 Har. & J. 392, 6 Har. & J. 1], and consequently, the bequest was void.

[Cited in McDonogh v. Murdoch, 15 How. (56 U. S.) 398.]

[Approved in State v. Warren, 28 Md. 353.]

2. It does not follow that, because such a bequest would be maintained in England independently of the statute of 43 Eliz. c. 4, it will also be maintained in Maryland.

[Approved in State v. Warren, 28 Md. 353.]

3. The case of Vidal v. Girard College [2 How. (43 U. S.) 194] does not affect this case, as the decision of that case was founded on the common law of Pennsylvania.

4. This case must be decided on the doctrines of the Maryland law, as recognised and established by judicial decisions; and the two cases of

[1] [Reported by James Mason Campbell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Dashiell v. Attorney-General [supra] are conclusive against the validity of the bequest in question.

5. The circuit courts of the United States administer the laws of the states in which they sit, unless those laws are in conflict with the constitution of the United States, or its treaties, or the acts of congress.

6. These courts regard the decisions of the highest judicial tribunals of the state, when based upon the laws of the particular state, as conclusive evidence of the law affecting the right or claim in dispute.

[Cited in McDonogh v. Murdoch, 15 How. (56 U. S.) 398.]

7. In cases depending upon the usages of commerce, and the general principles of commercial law, where the state court does not decide the case upon any particular law of the state, or established local usage, but upon the general principles of commercial law, if it falls into error, that erroneous decision is not regarded as conclusive evidence of the commercial law of the state; and will not be followed by the supreme court.

8. In regard to equitable rights, the power of the courts of chancery of the United States is, under the constitution, to be regulated by the law of the English chancery.

9. But this rule applies to the remedy, not to the right. It is the form of the remedy for which the constitution provides; and if a complainant has no right, the circuit court sitting as a court of chancery has nothing to remedy in any form of proceeding.

This bill was filed against the defendants [Beale and Latimer], as executors of Philip J. Ford, deceased, late a citizen of Maryland, by William Meade, Edward McGuire, John Hooff, Philip Williams, and John Johns, citizens of Virginia, on behalf of themselves, and all others the members of the Society for the Education of Pious Young Men for the Ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church; said society having its place of business in Virginia, and being there situated, and all the members thereof being either citizens of that state or of other of the United States than Maryland.

The bill stated that, on the 6th of March, 1836, the said Philip J. Ford made and published his last will and testament in writing, whereby, amongst other things, he gave to the Society for the Education of Pious Young Men for the Ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, by the name of the Education Society of Virginia, for the benefit of the theological students at the theological seminary of Virginia, near Alexandria, District of Columbia, one thousand dollars, the interest only to be expended. That the testator having departed this life leaving said will unrevoked, the same was duly proved in the orphans' court of Charles county, Maryland, and the execution thereof assumed by the defendants. That the assets received by the executors were large, and amply sufficient to liquidate the whole of the said legacy in due course of administration. That the said Society for the Education of Pious Young Men for the Ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, whereof the complainants were members, and on behalf of which they sued, was commonly known and designated by the name of the Education Society of Virginia, and was the same society so designated by the testator in his said will; and that the place of the annual meeting of said society was now, and always had been, at the theological seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the diocese of Virginia, situated in Fairfax county, in said state. That the said society was composed of about two hundred members, who resided in various states of the Union, remote from each other. That, according to the constitution of said society, the affairs of the same were committed to the management of a board of directors, which consisted of the president, four vice-presidents, the secretary, the treasurer and thirty managers, who were all appointed annually, at their annual meeting at the said theological seminary. That the complainants were, at the death of the testator, and had been, ever since, members of said society and of its board of directors. That it was the duty of said board of directors, among other things, to determine on the propriety of accepting and approving of the candidates for the aid of the society aforesaid, in the prosecution of their education for the ministry aforesaid, selected and recommended by the standing committee, composed of four members of said board of directors, and upon the approval of the persons so recommended, it was the duty of said standing committee to appropriate and furnish the funds and assistance from the treasury of the society aforesaid, to the said beneficiaries. That said beneficiaries were bound to prosecute their studies at said seminary, under the direction of its professors, unless such condition were dispensed with by the standing committee; and they were provided with board and other necessaries by said seminary, which was provided for and supported, so far as the board of the students there is concerned, by said society. That said seminary was in full existence as a theological school; and the said society, through its board of directors, had been for many years before the death of the testator, and had continued ever since, in full existence and organization, and prosecuting successfully the objects of its formation, precisely in the same manner as at the time of the publication of the testator's will and at the time of his death. Prayer for discovery and relief.

The will of the testator, so far as it related to this bequest, was as follows: "I give and bequeath to the Education Society of Virginia, for the benefit of the theological students at the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary of Virginia, near Alexandria, District of Columbia, one thousand dollars, the interest only to be annually expended."

To this bill, the defendants demurred generally, and the case was submitted, upon written arguments, upon the demurrer.

J. M. Campbell, in support of the demurrer, contended (1) That the legacy was void, being in violation of the 34th article of the bill of rights of Maryland. (2) That the legatee not being incorporated, the legacy was void for want of a competent person to take. 2 Story, Comm. § 1147; 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] Append. 497. The statute of Elizabeth (43 Eliz. c. 4), it is true, supplies the defect of want of a charter, but without that statute, in England, and where it is not in force in this country the legacy is void. The statute is not in force in Virginia, and such a legacy is void there. Trustees of Philadelphia Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 1; 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] Append. 481. In Pennsylvania, the statute of Elizabeth is not in force, as to its mode of proceeding, but it is, as to the principles involved ([Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs] 2 How. 192), and the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Girard's Will, in 2 How. [supra], while upholding the legacy there given, under the law of that state, refers to and adopts the principle of the case [Trustees of Philadelphia Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs] in 1 Wheat. [supra], as applicable, where the statute of Elizabeth is not in force. In Maryland, the statute of charitable uses (43 Elizabeth) is not in force (5 Har. & J. 398); and on page 401 of that volume the very case of a devise to persons in succession, not incorporated, is put by the court.

R. J. Brent, for complainant. The doctrine of charities and conveyances to charitable uses has been so fully discussed in the opinion of the supreme court, in Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 194, that we can only refer to that decision as finally settling the law on this subject, and conclusively settling that such devises could be enforced in equity, independently of the statute of Elizabeth, thus virtually overruling the contrary decision made by our court of appeals, in Dashiell v. Attorney-General, 5 Har. & J. 400, which was based on the mistaken notion that chancery had no jurisdiction previously to that statute. The question, therefore, recurs whether the circuit court will not, in such a case, rather follow the federal decisions than the state decision? If so, the sole remaining question is, whether this legacy, as claimed, is not a charity? which will clearly appear by reference to the bill.

Henry Winter Davis, on the same side. The case is succinctly and accurately stated by the defendant's counsel; and in the two points insisted on, the merits of the case are fairly met. (1) The law of charitable bequests is not dependent on the statute of 43 Elizabeth, but is a part of the common law, prior to and more comprehensive than that statute. (2) The bequest of Ford's will is such, as within the principles of the law of charitable bequests, is valid and enforcible by bill in equity. (3) The bill of rights of Maryland does not affect the matter.

I. The elements of perfect trust are, a trustee, a subject, and an object or beneficiary competent to take. The want of a trustee will always be supplied by equity, and is not suggested or relied on here. The subject here exists in the legacy. The object or beneficiary is the party stated in the bill. It is an unincorporated, voluntary association, and it is on this that the objection of its incompetency rests. The purpose of the trust—the education of youths for the ministry—is directly within the immediate scope of the organization of the society, and we suppose is conceded to be a charitable purpose, which would be sustained and effectuated, if the body designated to take the fund be competent to take. In all cases there must be a beneficiary sufficiently certain and definite, or any gift or bequest will be void. That certainty varies with the subject-matter of the gift or bequest, and the objects to which it is directed. It may either be a natural person, or a corporate person, or a more indefinite body, such as a religious congregation, a voluntary association, or the public—either of the whole commonwealth, or limited portions of it. The first two are the ordinary objects of gifts and bequests. The third class is recognized as competent to take property—not generally, but only for specified purposes. The individual can take for all purposes, generally; the body corporate only for purposes within the scope of its charter. When the bequest or gift is for certain public or charitable purposes, an enlarged policy has relaxed the rigid rules which define the certainty of a competent donee, where individuals are concerned, and indefinite gifts and dedications are recognised and enforced. One class of such cases is, that in which dedications to the public, or to particular societies, have been protected; such was the case of Mayor, etc., of New Orleans v. U. S., 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 662, where the proprietors of the soil had laid out a town, and on the plat had designated a portion as "the quay," and the court held it a valid dedication to the public; and remarked that, without such dedications, an advanced state of society could not exist; and that the right might exist in the public at large, or in a definite part of it, without the intervention of a corporation (page 713). Similar principles are reiterated in the cases of Cincinnati v. White's Lessees, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 431; Barclay v. Howell's Lessee, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 499; and Beatty v. Kurtz, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 566; in which latter case, a piece of ground marked on the plan of Georgetown "for the Lutheran church," an unincorporated society taking in succession, was protected from violation, as a place of burial for the dead, validly dedicated to the public, and to pious uses. Such gifts as the above, to an individual, would have been void: to the public, the citizens of the town, the religious congregation—for those particular purposes, they were valid; and the persons intended to enjoy the gift were vague and uncertain, shifting, unascertained, unincorporated, and not protected by the intervention of trustees. The cases are thus far directly in point; they suffice to remove all à priori presumptions against the existence of other cases, embraced by their principles, where the rules relative to gifts or bequests to individuals for private purposes do not operate to avoid the gift. They lay the foundation for the principle, that for public purposes relative to the religion, the commerce, the municipal conveniences, the education of the people, the laws of limitation and conveyancing are not the same which govern the disposition of private property between private persons; but that an indefinite public may have rights which courts will protect. It is this principle which lies at the foundation, and is the origin of charitable bequests of an indefinite nature, whereby transfers of property—void if between private persons for private purposes—are taken under the protection of the courts, when applied to public or charitable uses. Within it, gifts or bequests for the establishment of schools or colleges, for the education of ministers or orphans, for the support of ministers, for the benefit of dissenting congregations, unincorporated, for the erection of light-houses, bridges, &c., are protected. The fact that such gifts are protected in England, and in certain states of this Union is conceded; but it is denied that they are so protected on the above principle, but only by virtue of the statute of charitable uses. 43 Eliz. c. 4.

We had supposed this principle at rest before the courts of the United States, since the case of Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 127; but it would seem that the counsel for the defendants entertains a different view of that case. It is true, that it was held, in conformity with the case of Zimmerman v. Anders, 6 Watts & S. 218, that the conservative provisions of the statute of Elizabeth were in force in Pennsylvania; but it is equally true, that that statute has been held not to be in force in Pennsylvania, and also that, independently of it, the more extensive range of charitable uses which chancery supported before that statute, and beyond it, were held to exist in that state; and that, after an elaborate examination of the cases, the supreme court solemnly affirmed the doctrine of Sugden in 1 Dru. & War. 258, that courts of equity have, independently of the statute of Elizabeth, an inherent jurisdiction in cases of charity; that cases of charity, in courts of equity in England, were valid prior to the statute of Elizabeth, and that from the more recent cases, and the result of recent investigations, such was the case at the common law prior to the statute; and therefore, without reference to the cases from the Pennsylvania reports, those doctrines would be part of the common law of Pennsylvania. [Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs] 2 How. [43 U. S.] 197, 198. Indeed, it is plain, such must have been the case, for St. 43 Eliz. only created a new tribunal for the enforcement of acknowledged rights; its language creates no new right, nor makes one valid which before was void; and if its modes of proceeding were not in force, nothing remained to be in force; for the rights it protected were old rights, which fraud had invaded, but not nullified in the eye of the law. The courts of Pennsylvania were, therefore very accurately discriminating when they held the statute not in force, but that the principles chancery had adopted in applying its provisions, obtained in Pennsylvania, not by force of the statute, but as part of the common law. Witman v. Lex, 17 Serg. & R. 88–90.

Upon such and much more powerful arguments, Sugden, in the case of Incorporated Soc. v. Richards, 1 Dru. & War. 294, in Ireland, where the statute of Elizabeth is no more in force than it is in Maryland and Virginia, and where, consequently, the bequest must either be void or valid by some other law, held the jurisdiction of chancery to decree and enforce indefinite charities; and that the statute only introduced a new and special, but not exclusive mode of enforcing trusts and uses previously valid; and Lord Redesdale in Plunkett v. Mayor, etc., of Dublin, 1 Bligh [N. S.] 312, 346, 347, held that the statute created only a new jurisdiction, by analogy to certain old writs—a jurisdiction ancillary to the court of chancery; and similar doctrines were maintained in Zane's Will Case, Brightly, N. P. 346, till finally, on the fullest investigation, and on the faith of new lights making plain a path over which their predecessors had groped in darkness, and not unfrequently stumbled, the supreme court proclaimed the same doctrine in so convincing a form, as to silence controversy; in a scientific point of view, however, doubts may still invest its practical application in particular cases. If this be so, it seems to be immaterial that the court of appeals of Maryland, following in the footsteps of Trustees of Philadelphia Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 1, have said the statute of Elizabeth is not in force in Maryland. We concede it, but ask relief of the courts of equity of the United States, administering the general equity jurisprudence of the common law, as expounded by the supreme court. If the question were whether St. 43 Eliz. is in force in Maryland, the case of Dashiell v. Attorney-General [supra] might well be relied on as a conclusive adjudication upon the local statute law of the state. So far as it decides that, we do not impeach it; we say only, that it is error in supposing that the whole law of charitable bequests of an indefinite character sprang from, and fell with, that statute, shall not bind the courts of the United States in deciding a question, under the common law, of general equity jurisprudence, and our protest rests on the reiterated decisions of the supreme court. That such was the only point decided in 5 Har. & J., appears from the very opening of the opinion on p. 398, where it is held, that the peculiar law of charities originated in St. 43 Eliz., and that, independently of it, equity could not, in its ordinary jurisdiction, sustain a bequest which, if not a charity, would, on general principles, be void. Then the vagueness of the particular bequest is discussed, and finally, it is shown that St. 43 Eliz. is not in force in Maryland. Now we concede, as a point of local law, that 43 Eliz. is not in force in Maryland; we controvert the opinion that the courts of equity had no general jurisdiction over indefinite charitable bequests; and as a point of general equity jurisprudence, the circuit court is not bound by the court of appeals of Maryland.

The question then, relates, not to a local statute, nor to a rule of law of title to real property, nor even to the meaning and effect and construction of the language of the will; but simply to the powers of a court of equity to enforce what is confessed to have been the intention of the testator. Neither is it a question as to whether the powers of the Maryland court of chancery are adequate to the enforcement, for they may be entirely inadequate, or such courts may not exist at all in Maryland, as they do not in Louisiana, or Massachusetts or Pennsylvania; but can the United States circuit court enforce this trust, no local statute declaring it void in itself; and if it fall at all, it being for want of competent power to enforce it. Now it is obvious that the powers of the circuit court cannot depend either upon the equity powers conferred by the state upon its courts of equity, or upon the decision of those courts upon their powers. And though they may decide, and profess to rest their decision upon general equity law, yet that would not bind the circuit court's decision as to its powers on the same question. For example, suppose it should decide that a legacy to the family of A., was too vague: or that a trust declared in a will was void, if no trustee were named; or that a court of equity had no power to substitute a surety to the right of the creditor secured; or that equity had no power to relieve against a mistake of fact; nobody would suppose the circuit court bound. On the contrary, the supreme court has declared that the judiciary act confers the same chancery powers on all, and gives the same rules of decision in all the states, whether courts of equity exist there or not; U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 108; and by parity of reasoning, whatever limit, whether by legislation or judicial construction, may have been set to their powers. And in Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 212, it was the opinion of the court, that their equity jurisdiction and powers were not confined to the modes and extent of administering relief possessed by the local tribunals; for in some states no courts of equity exist, and in others equitable rights are considered nullities, and no relief given for their violation; so that the United States courts would not have the same powers in all the states; and therefore, they must look to the common source of our law (England) for the powers of courts of common law and equity. In Livingston v. Story, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 633, 654–657, the above cases are affirmed, and the principle reiterated, that the courts of the United States may recognise and enforce equitable rights and remedies, even where they are not recognised in the laws or local tribunals of the state.

In the case of Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 1, 18, 19, the supreme court decided that the decisions of the local tribunals on contracts and instruments of a commercial nature (not on local statutes or land titles) did not furnish positive rules or conclusive authority to bind the judgment of the supreme court; that their interpretation and effect must be sought, not in the decisions of local tribunals, but in the general principles of commercial law, and this in a case upon a New York acceptance. So also in the case of Carpenter v. Providence Wash. Ins. Co., Id. 495, 511, 512, the court said, the questions were of the general commercial law depending on a construction of the contract of insurance, not local in its character, and that on such a question, the decisions of the state courts could not conclude them, however much they might regret the arrival at results varying from those of the state courts; similar principles are affirmed in the case of Gaines v. Chew, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 650. In the case of Swift v. Tyson [supra], the court draws the distinction between laws and mere judicial decisions, often re-examined, reversed, and qualified by the same courts; mere evidence of the laws, and so liable to be rebutted by further and better evidence; of which no better illustration can be imagined than the law of charitable uses—first repudiated as no part of equity jurisprudence in Trustees of Philadelphia Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs [4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 1], because supposed to have originated from St. 43 Eliz., then on recent investigations, readopted and re-instated in its place as an integral portion of that jurisprudence. And the court further distinguishes decisions on statutes, and relative to rights and things having a permanent locality, and other things immovable and intra-territorial in their nature and character (by which they confess themselves bound) from decisions on the general doctrines of the common law, whether administered in a legal or equitable forum; of the latter character is Dashiell v. Attorney-General, 5 Har. & J. 400. And in the case of Flagg v. Mann [Case No. 4,847], Story has expressly held that the courts of the United States are not bound by the decisions of a state court on a matter of general equity jurisprudence.

That this bequest is not too vague under the law of charitable uses, and that it is charitable in its nature, and may be executed by the courts of equity under their general powers, we refer to Witman v. Lex, 17 Serg. & R. 88; West v. Knight, Cas. Ch. 134; Simon v. Barber, 5 Russ. 112; Hayter v. Trego, Id. 113; Widmore v. Woodroffe, Amb. 639; Wellbeloved v. Jones, 1 Sim. & S. 40; Society for Propagation of the Gospel v. Attorney-General, 3 Russ. 142; Foley v. Wontner, 2 Jac. &

W. 245; Milligan v. Mitchell, 3 Mylne & C. 72, 84; 1 Dow, 1; 2 Bligh, 529; 3 Mer. 353, 418. Indeed, the case of the Trustees of Philadelphia Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 1, would of itself be sufficient on this point, for the complainants there failed only because the court thought the law of charitable uses arose from and depended on St. 43 Eliz., but it is plain that the court considered the bequest perfectly valid under the law of charitable uses, and would have sustained it had they considered that law a part of general equity jurisprudence at common law. Upon what part of the case in [Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs] 2 How. [(43 U. S.) 125], the counsel for the defendant bases his statement, that the supreme court refers to and adopts the principle of the case [Trustees of Philadelphia Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs] in 4 Wheat. [supra], as applicable, where the statute of Elizabeth is not in force, we are entirely unable to surmise. In reply to the authority of 4 Wheat. the court distinguish it from the one at bar, 1st, as arising in Virginia, where 43 Eliz. was repealed; and 2d, as being the case of an unincorporated association, an answer quite sufficient to withdraw the case at bar from the influence of 4 Wheat. But the court does not stop with that distinction between the cases, but proceeded to show the law to be other than it had been decided to be in 4 Wheat. and to adopt and affirm the law of charitable uses as a part of the common law of equity jurisprudence. And it was because the bequests of the will were within this general law that the court supported them. That such bequests have frequently been held valid in the courts of the states, independently of the statute of Elizabeth, and under the common law, and that these bequests in manner and form fall within those which have been sustained as sufficiently definite, will appear from the following cases: Attorney-General v. Dashiell [supra], decided in 1822, following close upon, and undoubtedly the result of Trustees of Philadelphia Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs [supra], in 1819; since then we have Witman v. Lex, 17 Serg. & R. 88, in 1827, and Burr's Ex'rs v. Smith, 7 Vt. 241, in which case, among many charitable legacies to persons not competent to take except under the law of charitable uses, all held valid, was one to the treasurer for the time being of the American Home Missionary Society, formed in New York in 1826. Notwithstanding a misnomer and error as to the organization of the society, the bequest was sustained, and the whole question of the relation of the law of charitable uses to the statute of Elizabeth was investigated with the greatest learning. The same is the case in Wright v. Trustees of M. E. Church, 1 Hoff., ch. 204–238. One bequest was to the Methodist society that met in the meeting house in John street; the corporate style was, the Trustees of the Corporation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the City of New York; and the corporation consisted of eleven congregations, having separate organizations, but not constituting separate parts of the corporate body. This was nevertheless held good, and that the money could be well paid, either to the clerk of this congregation, or to the general secretary or treasurer of the corporation. There was another bequest in the same will to the "Yearly Meeting of Friends in New York." It was a voluntary association, whose members resided in New York, Vermont, Massachusetts and Upper Canada, and yet the bequest was sustained. The opinion is one of the most elaborate on the subject of the independence of the law of charitable uses of the statute of Elizabeth, and its common law origin (pages 239–265). A similar decision was made in Dutch Church v. Mott, 7 Paige, 77. The case in 1 Hoff. Ch. was decided in 1839; that in 7 Paige, in 1838; that in 7 Vt. in 1835. The case of Moore's Heirs v. Moore's Devisees, 4 Dana, 354, decided in 1836, is fully up to the same point. We likewise refer to the case of Wellbeloved v. Jones, 1 Sim. & S. 40, for a case illustrating the circumstances under which the court refer it to a master to settle the safe and proper mode of disposing of the fund, where voluntary associations are interested, in certain circumstances.

II. The bill of rights is further evoked to avoid the legacy. Its 34th article is aimed, not at charitable donations generally, or even exclusively, but embraces all legacies, and only such legacies of goods and chattels as are given to the persons or the bodies designated. It avoids legacies for one particular class of charitable objects; but from this negative on one class of charitable donations, which would not have been forbidden, had they not previously been allowable and legal, arises a strong inference of the general validity of donations to general and indefinite, and unincorporated objects and purposes. Why avoid a legacy to a minister as such, to be taken in succession, if they were not previously valid? And how were such valid, save under the law of charitable donations? Does not the avoidance of all gifts to religious congregations, except land for a church, &c., admit their previous capacity, as such congregations, to take such gifts generally? of which general capacity the above exception still remains. But this only in passing to the construction of the article. The portion relied on is, we presume, that which avoids "any devise of goods or chattels for the support, use or benefit of any minister, public teacher or preacher of the gospel, or for any religious sect, order or denomination." Certainly, this legacy does not fall within the language descriptive of either of the two classes of proscribed objects. It is not to a minister, public teacher or preacher of the gospel. It is to the Education Society, not composed of clerical persons according to its constitution, but of all classes and denominations who conform to its constitution; the legacy is for the benefit of students at the Theological Seminary of Virginia. But students of theology are neither ministers, public teachers nor preachers of the gospel; they may become such, and so may any lawyer or scholar; and they may never become such, though they may study the science of theology. The bequest, in its very terms, excludes any benefit to any minister, teacher or preacher, and confers it solely on persons not clerical, studying a particular science at a particular institution of learning. On the principle which alone can bring this legacy under those terms, every legacy to any institution of learning, for the foundation of scholarships, wherein theology shall be taught, must be void; that is, any bequest for the benefit of any university, in the German, or English, or indeed, the American sense of that phrase. There is no abnegation whatever upon the students ever to become ministers.

Neither does this legacy seem to fall within the terms, for the benefit, use or support of any religious sect, order or denomination. Certainly, in no strict sense of the terms, is the Education Society, as described in the bill, either a religious sect, order or denomination; it is an education society, not a religious society; it may, or may not, be composed of religious persons; its objects are not religious worship, but the education of certain persons in one branch of moral science. An incidental advantage may result to one religious denomination, but if the gift be not for the use of that denomination, as such, it seems not to be within the intent of the article; it may derive an incidental advantage from the establishment of any institution of learning where persons might be aided in studying theology; for persons might there be aided who afterwards enter the Protestant Episcopal Church. A bequest to St. John's College might be void on the same ground. The words, religious sect, order or denomination, have a well understood meaning, which will not embrace the Education Society; they mean a number of persons united in a particular organization called a church, for the purposes of common religious worship; but surely a set of gentlemen forming a society for aiding youth in their theological education, could hardly be called a religious sect, order or denomination. Runkel v. Winemiller, 4 Har. & McH. 452. But in fact, whatever may have been the meaning of the article, has it not been virtually repealed and annulled by subsequent legislation? The act of 1798 (chapter 24), incorporating the Vestrymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church, expressly allows them to take bequests of goods and chattels, provided the income do not exceed a certain amount (section 28). The act of 1802 (chapter 111, § 8), confers like power on the trustees of any religious congregation of any denomination, with a proviso against gifts, &c., not to take effect till after death, and limiting the amount to be held by any congregation. This restriction of gifts to take effect after death, was annulled by the act of 1815 (chapter 222, § 1), and the power to take by will or deed made general and absolute. The act of 1814 (chapter 58), conferred like capacity on the Methodist Baltimore Conference, though its jurisdiction extended beyond the state, into Pennsylvania on one side, and to the Rappahannock, in Virginia, on the other; for the benefit of all which region it is empowered to hold property. These acts reflect a double light on this subject.

1. They show distinctly what was meant by religious sect, order or denomination; merely a congregation or single society, organized for purposes of common worship; not any multitude of persons who might happen to concur in one or more tenets of belief, still less any society, whatever might be the prevailing complexion of the religious opinions of its members, organized, not for the purposes of religious worship and improvement, but for the purpose of scientific instruction in matters of theology generally. This meaning appears from the preamble of the act of 1802. It speaks of petitions from religious societies and of all denominations of Christians, and their holding property in a congregational capacity, &c.

2. It is plain, that the bill of rights is entirely repealed in its principle and substance by these acts. The whole policy of the state is changed; it now sanctions what it before condemned. It forbade all bequests for the benefit of religious sects, and now all bequests for all sects are valid, if not beyond a certain sum. Upon what principle can this bequest be considered void under the article, when if in favor of any sect or denomination as such, it is in favor of those vested specially with power to take and hold property in Maryland? If the court should think this bequest ought to be confined to the benefit of certain of the Protestant Episcopal congregations of Maryland, it is competent for the court, in directing the execution of the trusts of the will, to limit the application in such manner, and to designate the mode of applying the fund: i. e., that it should be applied to the education of ministers for the church in Maryland, on a scheme to be reported by the master for that purpose.

Should the court not take that view, it may be worth while to consider, if the article extends to bequests to ministers or religious denominations beyond the state of Maryland, as this society is beyond the state. The same reasons would not apply to prohibiting bequests to foreign as to domestic associations; and we know that money bequeathed in England to be laid out in land in a foreign country, for charitable purposes, will be sustained, when if it be to be laid out in England, it would have been void. Whether the analogies of these cases touch the present is submitted, with a simple reference to 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1184, 1185, etc. If this bequest should be considered such in its character as the bill of rights describes, and so void, if the persons to take were in Maryland, it is not unfair to argue, that the article only contemplates gifts to such persons, or to such purposes, within the state; but never had any application to such persons, or associations or objects, beyond the state, since the state policy could in no manner be affected by the growth of such associations, or the accumulation of wealth in the hands of ministers beyond the state.

J. M. Campbell, in reply. The defendants' counsel in support of the demurrer in this cause, and in reply to the counsel for the complainants, deems it unnecessary to advert to a large part of their argument, and the bulk of their authorities, because, in his view, the question is disposed of by the cases already cited by him, in the supreme court, and in the state of Maryland. It is conceded by the complainants' counsel, that the statute is not in force in Maryland, and that under the decisions of the court of appeals in Maryland, the legacy now sued for would not be recoverable there, or at any rate such is the fair conclusion from what they say. Now, do the courts of the United States, in deciding questions of charities and charitable uses, cut loose from the law settled in the states where those courts sit? The case of Trustees of Philadelphia Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.], has already been cited by us. Of that case, the supreme court, in Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 192, say, it "arose under the law of Virginia, in which state St. 43 Eliz. c. 4, had been expressly and entirely abolished by the legislature, so that no aid whatsoever could be derived from its provisions to support the bequest." No objection is taken to the decision, upon the ground that the law of Virginia had nothing to do with the question, but on the contrary, the assumption is, that the court in Hart's Case decided rightly as far as that ground went, though possibly they might have erred on the ground that there was no jurisdiction of charities independently of the statute.

This view becomes still more clear on an examination of the case of Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs [supra]. That case having come up from the Pennsylvania circuit, care is taken, on pages 192 and 196 of the opinion of the court, to affirm and repeat with emphasis the fact, that though St. 43 Eliz. is not in force in Pennsylvania, its principles are, "by common usage and universal recognition; and not only these, but the more extensive range of charitable uses which chancery supported before that statute and beyond it." And on page 197, the opinion goes on to state, that "the case is completely closed by the principles and authorities already mentioned, and is that of a valid charity in Pennsylvania." It seems to us that, upon the principles laid down by the complainants' counsel, it was quite unnecessary for the court to have examined at all into the laws of Pennsylvania, and the fact that it has done so, coupled with its observation as to the different law prevailing in the circuit where Hart's Case was decided, shows that the United States courts, whatever they may do in other cases, do not mean to get up a different law of charitable uses from that recognized by the states in which they sit. Nor would it be proper. Upon general principles of law, commercial or otherwise, in which a state can have no interest different from that of the rest of the world, or Union, the federal courts may decide according to state decisions which break in upon the uniformity of a general system; but they never have so decided, where the effect was to uproot a particular line of policy adopted by the state; and such is the case of the doctrine of charitable uses. If a state sets its face against particular charities, the courts of the United States will never consent to plant them in its borders.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. This case has been submitted on written arguments. The money in question is bequeathed to the Education Society of Virginia, for the benefit of the theological students, at the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary of Virginia, near Alexandria, District of Columbia; and the demurrer admits that the complainants represent the society to whom this bequest was intended to be made. The society is not incorporated, and the bequest is to a voluntary association of individuals to take in succession.

The court is of opinion that this case must be governed by the case of Dashiell v. Attorney-General, 5 Har. & J. 392, 6 Har. & J. 1, decided in the Maryland court of appeals; and consequently, that this bequest is void. The principles decided in these two cases were also ruled by the supreme court, in a case arising in Virginia, in which state, as in this, the statute of Elizabeth concerning charitable uses has not been adopted, nor its principles recognized, as a part of the common law of the state. Trustees of Philadelphia Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 1. The case of Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs, was decided altogether upon the law of Pennsylvania. 2 How. [43 U. S.] 192.

It is very true, that in the last-mentioned case, the supreme court express the opinion that the courts of chancery in England possessed the power of enforcing charities of this description, before the statute of Elizabeth was passed; in other words, that such a devise was good, and might be enforced in chancery. But assuming this to be correct, and that the court were mistaken in the contrary opinion expressed in the case of Trustees of Philadelphia Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs [supra], yet it does not follow, that because such a bequest would be maintained in England, it must also be maintained in Maryland. Nor is such the doctrine of the supreme court in the case of the Girard College; on the contrary, while the court in that case held that such a devise was valid in Pennsylvania, it still recognized as authority the case of Trustees of Philadelphia Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs [supra], which decided that a similar devise was void in Virginia. The statute of Elizabeth is not in force in either of these states, and the supreme court founded its decision in the last of these cases, upon the common law of the state as recognized in Pennsylvania, by universal usage and judicial decision. Upon the same principle, this case must be decided upon the doctrines of the Maryland law, as recognized and established by judicial decisions; and the two cases in the court of appeals before mentioned are conclusive against the validity of the bequest in question.

The circuit courts of the United States administer the laws of the states in which they sit, unless those laws are in conflict with the constitution of the United States, treaties or acts of congress; and as a general rule, regard the decisions of the highest judicial tribunals of the state as conclusive evidence of the law. We do not speak of matters of practice, or the forms of proceeding; but of decisions upon the right or claim in dispute between the parties, where that right depends upon the laws of the particular state.

The cases of Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 1, and Carpenter v. Providence Ins. Co., Id. 511, 512, were cases depending upon the usage of commerce, and the general principles of commercial law. And the supreme court have always said that in cases of that description, where the state court does not decide the case upon any particular law of the state, or established local usage, but upon the general principles of commercial law, if it falls into error, that erroneous decision is not regarded as conclusive evidence of the commercial law of the state, and will not be followed as such by the supreme court. And the reason of this distinction is obvious. The state court does not decide in such cases upon the peculiar laws and institutions of the state. Its decision, therefore, is no evidence that any law has been adopted by the state in conflict with the general principles which regulate commercial contracts throughout the commercial world.

So too, as relates to the jurisdiction of the circuit court sitting as a court of chancery. It is undoubtedly true, as contended for in the argument of the complainant, in regard to equitable rights, that the power of the courts of chancery of the United States, is, under the constitution, to be regulated by the law of the English chancery; that is to say, the distinction between law and equity as recognized in the jurisprudence of England is to be observed in the courts of the United States, in administering the remedy for an existing right. The rule applies to the remedy and not the right; and it does not follow, that every right given by the English law, and which, at the time the constitution was adopted, might have been enforced in the court of chancery, can also be enforced in a court of the United States; the right must be given by the law of the state, or of the United States. It is the form of remedy for which the constitution provides; and if a complainant has no right, the circuit court, sitting as a court of chancery, has nothing to remedy in any form of proceeding.

In the case before the court, the question is: is the bequest which the complainants claim, a valid one by the laws of Maryland? It is a question which, in its nature, necessarily depends upon the laws of the respective states. Some of the states sanction devises of this description; some do not; and undoubtedly it depends upon every state to determine for itself, to whom and in what form, and by what instrument, any property within its borders may pass by devise or otherwise. The court of appeals in Maryland have decided, that a bequest like this is void by the laws of the state, and passes no right to any one. This court is bound to respect this as the law of the state; and if there is no right vested in the complainants by this bequest, this court cannot create one. There is, therefore, neither an equitable nor legal title upon which the powers of a court of the United States can be called into action, either as a court of equity or of law, in behalf of these complainants.

This is not a proceeding to appoint a trustee to execute a valid trust; nor, indeed, are there any cestuis que trust. This doctrine is fully maintained in the case of Wheeler v. Smith, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 55, which was decided at the last term of the supreme court. The cases of Trustees of Philadelphia Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs, and Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs, were in that case recognized as depending upon the laws of the respective states, and not merely upon the doctrines of the English chancery. The bill in this case must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

MILITARY LAW—COURT MARTIAL—ASSESSMENT OF FINES—MILITIA—NOT IN ACTIVE SERVICE—NOTICE.

1. It seems, that a court martial, organized under the authority of a state, has no power to assess fines upon delinquent militia-men, for failing to obey a requisition to enter the service, emanating from the secretary of war.

2. A court of inquiry is the proper tribunal for assessing fines against delinquent militia, or for the trial of privates not in actual service, under the laws of Virginia.

3. The sentence of a court martial rendered against an individual without notice, is void.

[This was an action by William Meade against the deputy marshal of the Virginia district.]

Motion to be discharged under a writ of habeas corpus.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. By the return of the deputy marshal, it appears, that William Meade, the petitioner, was taken into custody by him, and is detained in custody, on account of the nonpayment of a fine of forty-eight dollars, assessed upon him by the sentence of a court martial, for failing to take the field, in pursuance of general orders of the 24th of March, 1813, the marshal not having found property, whereof the said fine might have been made. The court martial was convened by the following order:

"November 8th, 1813. Brigade Orders. A general court martial, to consist of Lieutenant Colonel Mason, president, &c., will convene at the court house, in Leesburg, on Friday, the third day of next month, for the trial of delinquencies, which occurred under the late requisitions of the governor of Virginia, and secretary of war, for militia from the county of Loudoun. (Signed) Hugh Douglass, Brigadier General, Sixth Brigade of Va. Militia."

The court being convened, the following proceedings were had: "It appearing to the satisfaction of the court, that the following persons of the county of Loudoun, were regularly detailed for militia duty, and were required to take the field, under general orders, of March 24th, 1813, but refused, or failed to comply therewith; whereupon, this court doth order and adjudge, that they be, each, severally fined the sum annexed to their names, as follows, to wit: William Meade, forty-eight dollars," &c. On the part of the petitioner, the obligation of this sentence is denied. 1st. Because it is a court, sitting under the authority of the state, and not of the United States. 2dly. It has not proceeded according to the laws of the state, nor is it constituted according to those laws. 3dly. Because the court proceeded without notice.

1st. The court was unquestionably convened by the authority of the state, and sat as a state court. It is, however, contended, that the marshal may collect fines, assessed by a state court, for the failure of a militiaman to take the field, in pursuance of the orders of the president of the United States. The constitution of the United States, gives power to congress, "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union," &c. In the execution of this power, it is not doubted, that congress may provide the means of punishing those who shall fail to obey the requisitions, made in pursuance of the laws of the Union, and may prescribe the mode of proceeding against such delinquents, and the tribunal before which such proceedings should be had. Indeed, it would seem reasonable to expect, that all the proceedings against delinquents, should rest on the authority of that power, which has been offended by the delinquency. This idea must be retained, whilst considering the acts of congress. The first section of the act of 1795 [1 Stat. 424], authorizes the president, "whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion," &c., "to call forth such number of the militia of the state, or states, most convenient to the place of danger, or scene of action, as he may judge necessary, to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose, to such officer, or officers of the militia, as he shall think proper." The fifth section enacts, "that every officer, non-commissioned officer, or private of the militia, who shall fail to obey the order of the president of the United States, in any of the cases before recited, shall forfeit a sum, not exceeding one year's pay, and not less than one month's pay, to be determined and adjudged by a court martial." The sixth section enacts, "that courts martial, for the trial of militia, shall be composed of militia officers only." Act Feb. 28, 1795; 1 Story's Laws, 389, c. 101 [1 Stat. 424, c. 36]. Upon these sections, depends the question, whether courts martial for the assessment of fines against delinquent militia-men, should be constituted under the authority of the United States, or of the state to which the delinquent belongs. The idea originally suggested, that the tribunal for the trial of the offence, should be constituted by, or derive its authority from, the government against which the offence had been committed, would seem to require, that the court thus referred to in general terms, should be a court sitting under the authority of the United States. It would be reasonable to expect, if the power were to be devolved on the court of a state government, that more explicit terms would be used for conveying it. And it seems, also, to be a reasonable construction, that the legislature, when in the sixth section, providing a court martial for the trial of militia, held in mind the offences described in the preceding section, and to be submitted to a court martial. If the offences described in the fifth section, are to be tried by a court, constituted according to the provisions of the sixth section, then we should be led by the language of that section, to suppose, that congress had in contemplation a court formed of officers in actual service, since the provision that it should be composed "of militia officers only," would otherwise be nugatory. This construction derives some aid from the act of 1814. By that act, courts martial for the trial of offences, such as that with which Mr. Meade is charged, are to be appointed according to the rules prescribed by the articles of war. The court in the present case, is not appointed according to those rules. Additional act of April 18, 1814, 2 Story's Laws, 1424, c. 140 [3 Stat. 134, c. 82]. The only argument which occurs to me against this reasoning, grows out of the inconvenience arising from trying delinquent militia-men, who remain at home, by a court martial, composed of officers in actual service. This inconvenience may be great, and well deserves the consideration of congress; but I doubt whether it is sufficient to justify a judge, in so construing a law, as to devolve on courts, sitting under the authority of the state, a power which, in its nature, belongs to the United States. If, however, this should be the proper construction, then the court must be constituted according to the laws of the state.

On examining the laws of Virginia, it appears, that no court martial can be called for the assessment of fines, or for the trial of privates, not in actual service. This duty is performed by courts of inquiry, and a second court must sit to receive the excuses of those against whom a previous court may have assessed fines, before the sentence becomes final, or can be executed. If it be supposed, that the act of congress has conferred the jurisdiction against delinquent militia privates on courts martial, constituted as those are for the trial of officers, still this court has proceeded in such a manner, that its sentence cannot be sustained. It is a principle of natural justice, which courts are never at liberty to dispense with, unless under the mandate of positive law, that no person shall be condemned unheard, or without an opportunity of being heard. There is no law authorizing courts martial to proceed against any person, without notice. Consequently, such proceeding is entirely unlawful. In the case of the courts of inquiry, sitting under the authority of the state, the practice has, I believe, prevailed, to proceed in the first instance, without notice; but this inconvenience is, in some degree remedied, by a second court, and I am by no means prepared for such a construction of the act, as would justify rendering the sentence final, without substantial notice. But, be this as it may, this is a court martial, not a court of inquiry, and no law exists, authorizing a court martial to proceed without notice, as in this case, the court appears to have proceeded. For these reasons, I consider its sentences as entirely nugatory, and do, therefore, direct the petitioner to be discharged from the custody of the marshal.

NOTE. This case, in some of its aspects, resembles very much the case of Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 1. In that case, it was said by Mr. Justice Washington, in delivering the opinion of the court, that, although the "court martial," designated in the act of 1795, was in fair construction, to be considered a court martial, organized under the authority of the congress of the United States, yet, as the act had not withheld the power conferred by it from a court martial, organized under state authority, and as it was expressly conferred by a law of the state of Pennsylvania, the state court martial had a concurrent jurisdiction with the court, pointed out by the act of congress, Story, J., and another judge, dissenting. The latter judges held, that the state law of Pennsylvania, erecting a tribunal, and vesting it with jurisdiction to carry into effect an act of congress, was unconstitutional and void. [3 Cranch, C. C. 51.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term. 1826.[2]

EVIDENCE—PRODUCTION OF RECEIPT—COMMISSION TO TAKE DEPOSITION—CLERICAL ERROR—BY WHOM DEPOSITION WRITTEN.

1. If a witness for the plaintiff testifies that on a certain day he paid to the defendant a certain sum of money, and took his receipt, the plaintiff is not bound to produce the receipt on the trial.

2. If a dedimus issue to take depositions in a cause in which Richard M. Meade is plaintiff, whereas the name of the plaintiff was Richard W. Meade, and the commissioners certify that they took the depositions to be read in a cause in which Richard W. Meade was plaintiff, the depositions are admissible, notwithstanding the clerical error in writing an M. for a W. in the commission.

3. In taking a deposition under a commission it is not necesary that it should be written by the commissioners, or by their clerk, or by the witness.

[This was an action at law by Richard W. Meade against Richard R. Keane.] Assumpsit, for money had and received.

C. C. Lee, for plaintiff, offered to read a part of a deposition, in which the witness testified that he paid a certain sum of money on a certain day, and took his receipt.

Mr. Key, for defendant, objected, unless the plaintiff should produce the receipt.

But THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contrà) overruled the objection.

Mr. Key, then objected to the deposition, because the commission, under which it was taken, purported to be issued in a cause in which Richard M. Meade (not Richard W. Meade, which was the name of the plaintiff,) was plaintiff; although the commissioners certified that they took the deposition to be read in a cause in which Richard W. Meade was plaintiff.

But THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contrà) overruled this objection also; saying it was a mere clerical error; and that a commission is not an ex parte proceeding, as is the case where a deposition is taken under the act of congress, and the parties are not bound to the same strictness.

[2] [Affirmed in 3 Pet. (28 U. S.) 1.]

Mr. Key also objected that the commissioners had not certified that the deposition was taken down by the commissioners or their clerk, or by the witness himself.

But THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contrà) overruled this objection also.

Affirmed by the supreme court. 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 1.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1802.

PRACTICE—CALLING DOCKET—OFFER TO APPEAR—AFFIDAVIT—BAIL.

Upon calling the appearance docket, if the defendant offers to appear, the court will not give the plaintiff's attorney time to procure an affidavit to hold the defendant to special bail.

Motion to appear without special bail, there being no cause of action filed.

Mr. Woodward, for plaintiff, produced an account, but no affidavit. THE COURT decided it to be insufficient to hold to bail.

Mr. Woodward requested time to get an affidavit.

THE COURT were of opinion that the defendant had a right now to appear, and they could not amerce the marshal when an appearance was offered, unless there appeared to be a good cause of action.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—COMPELLING PERSONS TO TESTIFY—POWERS OF SUPERVISOR.

1. It is not necessary, in order to support an application by a supervisor of internal revenue, for an attachment to compel a person liable to taxation to appear and testify and produce his books, &c. that the supervisor should appear to have acted, in issuing the summons, under any special instructions from the commissioner of internal revenue. ERSKINE, District Judge. The supervisor of internal revenue for the states of Florida and Georgia issued a summons against each of the members of the firm of Meador & Brothers, dealers in tobacco, in Atlanta, Georgia, under a provision contained in section 49 of the act of congress of July 20, 1868, requiring them to appear before him, at his office, at a certain time, and to testify under oath, and to produce their books, papers, &c. relating to any business transacted by or through them, from July 20, 1868, to July 1, 1869. The foregoing is only a synopsis of the contents of the summons. The parties were duly served, but failed to appear or to produce their books before the supervisor. He then made application to me, in pursuance of a provision contained in section 9 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 102), for an attachment against the Meadors. But, before it was issued they voluntarily appeared; an attachment nisi was granted and time given to them to show cause why it should not be made absolute. On the return day, they appeared, and by their counsel, Gartrell and Lochrane, placed their defense on file. It is in substance as follows:

First. That so much of the act of July, 1868, as grants authority to a supervisor to compel persons to testify and to produce their books, &c. in an imaginary case, is unconstitutional and void.

Second. If constitutional, still the supervisor can only proceed to compel the production of books, &c. in the same manner and to the same extent as assessors can do; and that neither "can compel persons to testify and produce their books, &c. in an imaginary case against parties residing out of their districts."

Third. That section 49 of the act authorizing the supervisor to summon any person to produce books, &c. and to appear and testify under oath, is of no effect, "because the provisions of the act of July, 1866, for enforcing the summons are inconsistent with the provisions of existing laws for the punishment of contempts."

Fourth. That no order of punishment can be rendered in a case before the judge, for disobeying a summons to appear before a supervisor, as the act "directs that no order can be issued inconsistent with existing laws for the punishment of contempts, and by those laws no court or tribunal can punish for contempt, except as against violations of its own orders."

Fifth. That the powers here claimed by the supervisor "are judicial powers, and that the judiciary is expressly fixed by the constitution and previously existing laws—neither assessors nor supervisors forming any part of it."

During the argument, which was elaborate and able, additional propositions were advanced orally, and various objections were taken to the constitutionality of section 9 of the act of 1866, and section 49 of the act of 1868.

Section 49 of the act of 1868 (15 Stat. 144), after providing for the appointment by the secretary of the treasury, on the recommendation of the commissioner of internal revenue, of certain officers, to be called supervisors of internal revenue, proceeds to define their duties and powers as follows: "It shall be the duty of every supervisor of internal revenue, under the direction of the commissioner, to see that all laws and regulations relating to the collection of internal taxes are faithfully executed and complied with; to aid in the prevention, detection, and punishment of any frauds in relation thereto, and to examine into the efficiency and conduct of all officers of internal revenue within his district; and for such purposes, he shall have power to examine all persons, books, papers, accounts, and premises, and to administer oaths and to summon any person to produce books and papers, or to appear and testify under oath before him, and to compel a compliance with such summons in the same manner as assessors may do," &c.

The mode by which assessors may compel a compliance is pointed out in section 9 of the act of 1866: "In case any person so summoned shall neglect or refuse to obey such summons, or to give testimony, or to answer interrogatories as required, it shall be lawful for the assessor to apply to the judge of the district court or to a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States for the district within which the person so summoned resides for an attachment against such person as for a contempt. It shall be the duty of such judge or commissioner to hear such application, and, if satisfactory proof be made, to issue an attachment, directed to some proper officer, for the arrest of such person, and upon his being brought before him to proceed to a hearing of the case; and upon such hearing, the judge or commissioner shall have power to make such order as he shall deem proper, not inconsistent with the provisions of existing laws for the punishment of contempts, to enforce obedience to the requirements of the summons and punish such person for his default or disobedience."

At the opening of the proceedings, Mr. Milledge, United States attorney, stated that he held a letter of instructions from the commissioner of internal revenue to the supervisor, dated June 11, 1869, and added that it was desirable it should be read to satisfy the Meadors that it was not idle curiosity, but duty, that guided him in issuing the summons. It was produced and read.

The substance of the letter was, that certain officers of the internal revenue department had been in Georgia, examining with reference to the affairs of certain dealers in tobacco, snuff, &c., whose factories in Virginia and North Carolina had been seized, and that the assessor at Atlanta was instructed to procure information from agents of the tobacco houses in question, which it was necessary to use in connection with the cases in which the officers referred to were engaged. He is then instructed to obtain from the books, &c. of these agents,—whose names would be furnished to him by the said assessor,—the information needed by the said officers, and forward it to them, at Richmond, Virginia.

It was argued for the Meadors that the provision in the act giving power to the supervisor to compel persons to testify under oath before him, and to produce their books, papers, &c. for his inspection, in an imaginary case, is unconstitutional and void.

Admit the assumption—directly or hypothetically—does it therefore follow that the law is unconstitutional? If this is an "imaginary case"—a mere visionary fancy emanating from the brain of the supervisor—it ought not to be countenanced; for a proceeding of this kind might prove little less hurtful to the mercantile interests of the Meadors than one begun and prosecuted to gratify sinister inquisitiveness or mischievous espionage, and not bona fide, and for the public good. Moreover, to institute a proceeding or action, not to determine a right or controversy, but to deceive the court and raise a prejudice against third persons, is a contempt. Coxe v. Phillips, Cas. T. Hardw. 237, 3 Hawk. P. C. 229.

But after a careful perusal of the statute and the letter of the commissioner (which letter is in evidence), my mind is satisfied that this proceeding is not in an imaginary case; but that, on the contrary, there was sufficient cause for the issuing of the summons by the supervisor, and that his action in the premises was warranted by the statute. If so, then this proceeding is legitimately here. Under direction of the commissioner, it is the duty of the supervisor to aid in the prevention, detection and punishment of any frauds in reference to the collection of internal revenue. The commissioner informs him that certain tobacco factories had been seized in Virginia and North Carolina; and directs him to procure the names of the agents of those factories, and to ascertain from their books, papers, &c. information needed by certain internal revenue employees or officers, touching the factories seized. Upon these instructions he seems to have acted.

But it must not be imagined from what has been just said that either written or verbal instructions are necessary before the supervisor can issue a summons under section 49 of the act of 1868. Congress did not so intend to limit his authority and usefulness. True, he must obey and follow the instructions of the commissioner when given. He must also act in good faith. And a public officer is presumed to act in obedience to his duty, until the contrary appears.

The ruling on this point being adverse to the Meadors, the proceedings, with the exception of, perhaps, some brief details, might end here; so far, at least, as the constitutionality of the provision in section 49 of the act of 1868, has been impugned. For, if this provision is void, when there is no real case, the presumption is fair that it is constitutional and valid, when the case is not an imaginary one.

Another point was presented and discussed, namely: That, granting the constitutionality of the provision, still, the supervisor can only proceed to compel parties to appear, testify or produce their books, &c. in the same manner, and to the same extent as assessors can do; and that neither can compel them to do any of these acts, in an imaginary case against persons residing out of his (the supervisor's) district.

Section 49 declares that it shall be the duty of the supervisor to aid in the prevention, detection and punishment of any frauds in relation to the collection of internal taxes, and to examine into the efficiency and conduct of all officers of internal revenue within his district.

For what purpose were the powers in question conferred upon the supervisor? The act says to aid in the prevention, detection, and punishment of any frauds in relation to the collection of taxes. There are no words in this clause—nor can any be imported into it—restricting the operation and effect of the supervisor's action to the territorial boundary of his district. True, his action is within his denominated district; but the legal consequences of the action may affect persons or things elsewhere. The next clause confers on the supervisor powers distinct and different from these, namely, to examine into the efficiency and conduct of the revenue officers within his district. And on this point I concur with the counsel for the Meadors. I likewise agree with them, that the supervisor can compel the production of books, &c. only in the manner and to the extent that an assessor can, under section 9 of the act of 1866. When either issues a summons, and the party served neglects or refuses to appear, to testify under oath, or to produce his books, &c. the power of each—the one as assessor, and the other as supervisor—is exhausted. For remedy, to compel compliance with the exigencies of the summons, he must make application in the manner provided in the section last referred to, to a judge or a commissioner.

Even on the hypothesis that this is an imaginary case, it is yet due to counsel on both sides, that the clauses cited from section 49 of the act of 1868, should receive a construction to the extent of their argument. Counsel for the Meadors insisted that section 49, empowering the supervisor to summon persons to appear, produce books, &c. and to testify under oath, is of no effect, because the provision in section 9 of the act of 1866 is inconsistent with the provisions of existing laws for the punishment of contempts.

It may be borne in mind that the section just referred to gives the same power to the judge to punish for contempts when acting under the authority of these revenue statutes as is possessed by the national courts themselves.

Congress, deriving authority from the constitution to ordain and establish courts of justice subordinate to the supreme court, has hitherto conferred upon these courts such jurisdiction as it has thought proper to bestow; but there still lie dormant in the national legislature vast and various powers which only await the exigency essential to call them into action.

Notwithstanding the jurisdiction of the national courts—supreme and inferior—is limited; they yet possess powers not granted by positive law; not independent, but auxiliary. For instance, although they have been vested by statute with power to inflict punishment for contempts (act of 1789 [1 Stat. 93], modified, after the impeachment of Judge Peck, by the act of 1831), still it does not follow, either from the peculiar constitution of these courts—their limited and defined powers—or the statutes declaratory of these powers, that they could not exercise the same authority without the aid of acts of congress; for the right to inflict summary punishment for a contempt is an inherent one, and indispensable to all courts of justice.

Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of U. S. v. Hudson, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 32, said: "Certain implied powers must necessarily result to our courts of justice from the nature of their institution. . . . To fine for contempt—imprison for contumacy—enforce the observance of order, &c. are powers which cannot be dispensed with in a court, because they are necessary to the exercise of all others; and so far, our courts no doubt possess powers not immediately derived from statute."

Section 1 of the act of March 2, 1831, empowers the several courts of the United States to issue attachments and inflict summary punishment for contempts of court, but this power shall not extend to any cases except, &c., ". . . and the disobedience or resistance by any officer of said courts, party, juror, or witness, or any other person or persons, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts." See also the act of 1789.

Unlike those courts which have their origin in the common or unwritten law, the courts of the United States were created by written law. In the former, the jurisdiction is general, and all the proceedings brought before them are presumed to be within their cognizance until the contrary appears. In the latter, the jurisdiction is limited and defined, and they can take cognizance of such proceedings only as are affirmatively shown to be within their jurisdiction. Yet they possessed certain unexpressed powers incidental and appurtenant to all courts of adjudicature.

Comparing the provision of section 9 of the act of July, 1866, with the act just quoted and the act of 1789 referred to, I have failed to perceive wherein section 9 is inconsistent with either of those statutes. The powers granted by those acts are, I apprehend, sufficiently ample to enable the judge to carry into effect the provisions of section 9 of the act of 1866.

It was insisted that no court or tribunal could punish for contempt, except for violations of its own orders. This, as a general proposition, is correct. But, in proceedings under section 9 of the act of 1866, the question of contempt would arise for consideration only when some process or other lawful command of the judge was disobeyed.

It was contended, also, that the authority claimed by the supervisor to issue summons, requiring persons to appear before him, is a judicial act. That issuing a summons and requiring persons to appear, testify under oath, produce books, &c. may be, if taken in an extended sense, a judicial act, must, I think, be admitted. But the mere issuing of a summons is in itself only a ministerial act. Nor did congress in using the term "summons," in section 49 of the act of 1868, contemplate it to be of the legal dignity of a writ, or other judicial process; but simply a notice—and similar in its nature to a summons issued by an overseer of roads requiring persons to attend, with the necessary implements, and to work on the public highway. His summons, as has already been said, neglected or disobeyed, his authority ends. He must then apply to the proper officer, as directed by section 9 of the act of 1866, to enforce obedience. And when the alleged delinquent is brought before the judge, he will "proceed to a hearing of the case"; and then, and not till then, can it be properly said that there is any exercise of judicial authority.

There exists in every political sovereign community the inherent power of guarding its own existence and protecting and exalting the happiness and welfare of its people at large. This sovereign power is known as the eminent domain of the nation or state, and embraces the power to appropriate the acquisitions of its subjects or citizens to public purposes, and to control and preserve the relations of social life—internal polity or police, public health and public morals.

Generic with the power of eminent domain is the power of taxation; each is essentially a sovereign attribute, lodged in the aggregate of the people. When the right of eminent domain is exercised, it appropriates property exceeding the owner's share of contribution to the public burden. Taxation is the proportional and reasonable assessment which may be imposed from time to time upon persons or property. The national constitution prohibits the taking of private property for public use without just compensation. The tax-payer receives a full and just compensation for his share of contribution to the public necessity by the benefit conferred on him, in the proper appropriation of the tax paid.

Notwithstanding these two powers have, in my judgment, a common origin, both being inherent in the sovereign authority—the object of both being the safety and welfare of the whole community—yet the weight of authority would seem to be that there exists a distinction between these two modes of taking individual property for public use. West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 507; Brewster v. Hough, 10 N. H. 138,—in which it was held "that the power of taxation is essentially a power of sovereignty, or eminent domain." But see Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53, and Williams v. Mayor of Detroit, 2 Mich. 560. The direct question has not—at least so far as my knowledge extends—been decided by any of the national courts. See State of New Jersey v. Wilson, 7 Cranch. [11 U. S.] 164; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 420, 640, Story, J.; Gilman v. City of Sheboygan, 2 Black. [67 U. S.] 510. But whether there is any substantial difference in principle is not here a question requiring determination. It is enough for me on this occasion to declare that congress has not made any provision for trial, by jury, whether property be taken by right of eminent domain, or by authority of the taxing power.

It is, nevertheless, unquestionable that when the government appropriates individual property for public purposes, the obligation to make just compensation is concomitant; but congress is the sole judge of how the compensation shall be ascertained and paid. And as to the executorial and summary modes employed for the collection of taxes—fixed debts due to the government—although they cause a certain diversity in "the law of the land," and although such proceedings have been sometimes questioned, as infringing the right of trial by jury; nevertheless, it is, at this day, too well settled in this country—and in England from time immemorial—to be now disputed. Moreover, the collection of the excise or public taxes has never been deemed a judicial, but simply a ministerial act. Murray v. Hoboken Land & Imp. Co., 18 How. [59 U. S.] 272; Peirce v. City of Boston, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 520.

Out of the provision in section 49 of the act of 1868, empowering a supervisor to examine premises, and to issue summons requiring persons to appear before him, testify under oath, produce their books, papers, &c. —and that part of section 9 of the act of July, 1866, which provides the mode of compelling obedience to the summons—two questions arise for adjudication. The one is based upon the fourth amendment of the constitution, which says "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or thing to be seized." The other is found among the enumerated private rights in the fifth amendment, and is as follows: No one shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

The rights of personal security, personal liberty, and private property—and incidentally, the near identity of writs of assistance and general warrants to the summons issued by the supervisor, were fully discussed.

The introduction into the constitution of the provisions in regard to search warrants, was doubtless occasioned by the strong feeling excited both in England and America, from the practice of issuing general warrants on bare suspicion and without foundation, empowering the officer to enter and search any house, to break open any receptacle, seize and carry away all or any private papers or other property. These abuses had continued for many years until, at length, in 1765, the court of king's bench (then presided over by Lord Camden), in the case of Entick v. Carrington, 2 Wils. 275, declared them to be manifestly illegal. Vide Huckle v. Money, Id. 205; Money v. Leach, 1 W. Bl. 555; Com. v. Dana, 2 Metc. [Mass.] 329; Story, Const. § 1901. Several years anterior to the decision in Entick v. Carrington, the illegality of general warrants had been eloquently maintained by James Otis, in Massachusetts, in the discussion had respecting writs of assistance. The writer of an able article on Mr. Otis in the July number of the Am. Law Rev. (1869), gives a brief history of these writs, derived from notes to Quincy by Mr. Justice Gray, of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts. A copy of this writ may be found in the article. It authorized the person to whom it was issued to enter, accompanied by a sheriff, justice of the peace, or constable, any house, where uncustomed goods were suspected to be concealed; and, if resistance was made, the writ empowered the searcher to break open the house and seize the goods. These writs, modified in some degree, are still of force in England. 3 Am. Law Rev. 641; 4 Bancr. Hist. U. S. 414.

Counsel for the Meadors contended that, if there was any distinction in principle between general search warrants or writs of assistance and the power claimed by the supervisor to enter and examine premises, and to issue summons requiring persons to appear before him, &c., there was no difference in their practical effect—each being repugnant to the constitution, and all equally illegal.

The first point in the question presented for decision, is as to the right of the supervisor to enter and examine the premises. This power, as already noticed, is given by section 49 of the act of 1868, and no warrant whatever is made necessary before entry and examination.

Sir William Blackstone, speaking of the excise duty, which is an inland imposition upon commodities, charged, in some cases, on the manufacturer, and in others, on the seller or dealer in the manufactured articles, and answering substantially to our system of internal revenue or taxes, says: "The frauds that might be committed in this branch of the revenue, unless a strict watch is kept, make it necessary, wherever it is established, to give the officers the power of entering and searching the houses of such as deal in excisable commodities at any hour of the day, and, in many cases, the night likewise." 1 Bl. Comm. 318. Such was the law of England and of the colonies prior to the war of independence, and so it has continued to this day under the national government, and in nearly every state of the Union; and the validity of this apparently rigorous law, in its application to the inland revenue and the collection of taxes, has never yet been successfully questioned. Vide Act March 3, 1791 (1 Stat. 139); Act May 8, 1792 (1 Stat. 267); Act July 22, 1813 (3 Stat. 22) &c.

The second point in the question for determination involves the right of the supervisor to issue summons requiring persons to come before him, to testify under oath, and to produce their books, &c., for his inspection. The legal principles which govern the first point in this question are so closely blended with those which control the second, that the answer given to the first might suffice for this.

The objection made to the power given to the supervisor by the statutes is, as just mentioned, that it is forbidden by the fourth amendment to the constitution. But this is a civil proceeding, and in no wise does it partake of the character of a criminal prosecution; no offense is charged against the Meadors. Therefore, in this proceeding, the fourth amendment is not violated. Said Merrick, J., in pronouncing the judgment of the court in Robinson v. Richardson, 13 Gray, 454: "Search warrants were never recognized by the common law as processes which might be availed of by individuals in the course of civil proceedings, or for the maintenance of any mere private right; but their use was confined to cases of public prosecutions, instituted and pursued for the suppression of crime or the detection and punishment of criminals." Murray v. Hoboken Land & Imp. Co., supra; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 716. I do not perceive any likeness in principle between the summons issued by the supervisor and either general warrants or writs of assistance.

The second question in this branch of the case grows out of that important private right secured to the citizen by the fifth amendment, that he shall not "be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." This provision is deduced from its grand original, chapter 29 of the Great Charter, which protected every individual in the free enjoyment of his life, his liberty and his property, unless declared to be forfeited by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land. By "law of the land" was probably meant the ancient Saxon common law.

In Murray v. Hoboken Land & Imp. Co., supra, it was said by Curtis, J., in delivering the judgment of the court: "The words 'due process of law,' were undoubtedly intended to convey the same meaning as the words, 'by the law of the land.'" If the converse of this be true, the phrase, "by the law of the land," imports a meaning as comprehensive as "due process of law," and consequently includes, like the latter, trial by jury. But neither—even in an enlarged sense—means that, to deprive a man of his life, his liberty, or his property by means of the law in its regular administration through courts of justice, the intervention of a jury is, in all cases, necessary. Take for instance the case of a person indicted for a capital or other offense, and who, on arraignment, instead of pleading "not guilty" to the charge elects, for reasons satisfactory to himself to plead "guilty;" if the indictment be sufficient in law the court awards judgment against him; and this is judgment "by the law of the land," and as lawful under the constitution as if he had been tried and found guilty by the judgment of his peers. So, if a person stands in contempt of the court, the court summarily punishes him by fine and imprisonment, or either, thus depriving him of his property, or liberty, or both, without a trial by jury. And it may be remarked that if the imprisonment be for a time certain, executive pardon is the only mode of releasing him, before the expiration of his sentence. So, in cases of demurrer or special verdict, or where a person makes default, or confesses judgment; and so, too, in equity causes, where trial by jury is quite unusual, men are deprived of their property. Other instances could readily be given to show that the words "by the law of the land," "due process of law," do not necessarily import a jury trial as essential in every case to deprive a person of his life, liberty or property. Indubitable proof of this may be found in the case of Murray v. Hoboken Land & Imp. Co., supra.

That case arose out of the act of May 15, 1820 (3 Stat. 592). The main question was, whether the issuing, by the solicitor of the treasury, of what was denominated in the statute a warrant of distress, against a defaulting collector of revenue, was in conflict with the constitution. The court held the law to be valid, and not inconsistent with the constitution. The decision was placed mainly on the ground that the ancient common law of England recognized a summary remedy for the recovery of debts due to the government. See Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 19; U. S. v. Ferreira, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 40.

It was further insisted that the power given to the supervisor is violative of that clause in the fifth amendment to the constitution which declares that no one shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself. This clause, like that in the fourth amendment in reference to search warrants, is applicable to criminal cases only.

And here a thought suggests itself. As the Meadors, subsequently to the passage of this act of July 20, 1868, applied for and obtained from the government a license or permit to deal in manufactured tobacco, snuff and cigars, I am inclined to be of the opinion that they are, by this their own voluntary act, precluded from assailing the constitutionality of this law, or otherwise controverting it. For the granting of a license or permit—the yielding of a particular privilege—and its acceptance by the Meadors, was a contract, in which it was implied that the provisions of the statute which governed, or in any way affected their business, and all other statutes previously passed, which were in pari materia with those provisions, should be recognized and obeyed by them. When the Meadors sought and accepted the privilege, the law was before them. And can they now impugn its constitutionality or refuse to obey its provisions and stipulations, and so exempt themselves from the consequences of their own acts?

These internal revenue or tax laws were characterized as being not only repugnant to the constitution, but also unreasonably burdensome. With the most minute attention I examined those portions of the acts of July 13, 1866, and July 20, 1868, presented for my consideration; and carefully sought to ascertain whether they were in conflict with any of the provisions of the constitution. My conclusion on that question has been expressed. I do not concur with counsel, that these laws are unreasonably burdensome. But even if they are, nay, even if they are oppressive, and unjust modes are employed for their enforcement, the remedy lies with congress, and not with the judiciary. By enacting these laws congress has exercised the constitutional power of taxation, and the courts have no power to interfere. Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 514; Extension of Hancock Street, 18 Pa. St. 26; Kirby v. Shaw, 19 Pa. St. 258; Livingston v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 8 Wend. 85; In re Opening Furman Street, 17 Wend. 649; Herrick v. Randolph, 13 Vt. 525. In McCulloch v. State of Maryland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 316, 430, Chief Justice Marshall said, that it was unfit for the judicial department to "inquire what degree of taxation is the legitimate use, and what degree may amount to the abuse of the power."

Thus it will be seen that there are many cases in which the right of property must be made subservient to the public welfare. The maxim of the law is, that a private mischief is to be endured rather than a public inconvenience. On this ground rests the right of public necessity. 2 Kent, Comm. 336. And it is well to bear in mind that the national government is supreme within its constitutional limits, for to it is intrusted the paramount interest of the whole nation.

In declaring and carrying into effect the laws, my action, as a judge, will ever be "to use the least possible power adequate to the end proposed." Yet, let no one hesitate to do homage to the law; the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power.

Order.—It is ordered that the said John T. Meador, Newton J. Meador, and James G. Meador, composing the firm of Meador & Brothers, dealers in tobacco, in obedience to the summons of the supervisor, appear forthwith before him, and answer under oath, touching the receipt, storage, delivery or sale by the firm of Meador & Brothers, between July 20, 1868, and July 1, 1869, of any and all tobacco which came to their possession, or under their control in the way of business, during said period. And, also, that they, at the same time, produce to the said supervisor all books and papers of said firm, specified in said summons, which contain any entry, statement, or communication touching or in any way relating to tobacco.

And it is further ordered, that the clerk file this opinion in his office, and, that on payment of his fee, he furnish to the supervisor a copy of the same certified under his official seal.

NOTE. An application was made, a few days after the above determination, by the defendants' counsel, for a writ of error, and a supersedeas. Objection was made in behalf of the government, that no provision of law existed whereby a writ of error would lie to a decision made by the judge in a proceeding of this nature out of court, and whilst he was sitting simply as judge under the revenue acts of 1866 and 1868. The objection was sustained, and the application denied.

Case No. 9,376.

MEADOR et al. v. EVERETT.

[3 Dill. 214;[1] 10 N. B. R. 421; 1 Cent. Law J. 453.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Missouri. Aug., 1874.

LEASE—ASSIGNMENT BY LESSOR AS SECURITY—RIGHTS OF SUCH ASSIGNEE AGAINST THE ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY.

The assignment, transfer and delivery of a lease by the lessor to secure a debt, is valid as against the assignee in bankruptcy of the lessor.

[Cited in Platt v. Preston, Case No. 11,219; Re Oliver, Id. 10,492.]

Appeal in bankruptcy. In the bankruptcy proceedings against [R. D. Everett, assignee of] L. H. Clark, in the district court, the petitioners, Daniel F. Meador and his copartners, filed a petition in the nature of a bill in equity for the enforcement of a lien, to which the district court sustained a demurrer and dismissed petition. The petitioners, Meador & Co., appeal from this action of the district court. Their petition as filed in the district court, in substance states, that, in July, 1870, the complainants sold to L. H. Clark, one of the bankrupts, certain furniture to be used in his hotel at Kansas City, for the sum of $6,731.90, for which said Clark executed six notes for $1,000 each, payable in two, three, four, five, six and seven months from date, and one note for $731.90, payable eight months from date; that the same having been proved against the estate of said Clark, that on the 1st of May, 1870, Clark executed a lease of said hotel to one J. C. Parks for five years; that Parks took possession of the property under the lease July 1st, 1870; that the lease was duly recorded July 8th, 1870; that on the 7th day of July, 1870, said Clark, to secure the payment of said notes, assigned, transferred and delivered possession of said lease to complainants with the consent of said Parks; that on the 6th of July, 1870, said Clark gave complainants a power of attorney to receive and collect the rents accruing to said Clark under the lease, until their debt should be paid, and thereby authorized and empowered them to do and perform all in reference to said lease that said Clark himself could do; that on the 6th of July, 1870, as a further security, and a further recognition of the assignment of said lease from said Parks, said Clark drew his bill of exchange for $6,731.90 on said Parks, who accepted the same, thereby becoming liable for said debt, and agreeing to apply the rent of said building to its payment, as the same became due; that said Everett, as assignee, now has possession of said hotel; and that by reason of the premises complainants have a lien upon the rents of said hotel, and pray that the assignee be required to rent said hotel for —— months, the proceeds to be applied to the payment of their debt, and for general relief.

W. B. Napton, Jr., for petitioners.
Lay & Belch, for assignee in bankruptcy.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The bankrupt, owning a hotel, made a lease of it for five years to one Parks, reserving rent. Being indebted to the petitioners, the bankrupt, to secure them, it is alleged, "assigned, transferred and delivered possession of said lease to the petitioners, with the consent and sanction of said Parks, the lessee." At the same time it is further alleged, that "the bankrupt executed to the plaintiffs a power of attorney to receive and collect the rents accruing under the said lease, and to do and perform all acts with reference to said lease that the said lessor himself could do." And it is further alleged that lessee accepted the lessor's bill in the plaintiffs' favor for the amount of their debt against the lessor, said bill to be paid out of the rents as they fell due. No copy of the lease or assignment, or power of attorney is in the record, but according to the averments it must be taken that the assignment was in writing. In the absence of the written assignment and instrument I can do no more than to indicate the legal rights of the parties upon the facts set forth in the plaintiffs' petition.

If the transaction between the bankrupt and the plaintiffs gave to the latter any rights or equities in respect to the rents or the demised property, the assignee in bankruptcy takes the estate subject thereto. In this respect he stands precisely in the place of the bankrupt. Assuming the allegations of the petition to be true, they show in the plaintiffs, as against the bankrupt, such rights in respect to the rents or demised property as the law will recognize and protect. It is well settled that it is competent for the lessor to separate, by contract or devise, the rent from the reversion, retaining one and disposing of the other, or disposing of the rent to one person and the reversion to another. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 338, where many cases are collected.

Whatever the contract between the bankrupt and the plaintiffs shows the former disposed of to the latter, will be binding upon the former and his assignee in bankruptcy. In Russel v. Russel, 1 Brown, Ch. 269, it was decided that the pledge of a lease by the lessor, by delivery, merely, was in equity a mortgage of the lease-hold estate as against the assignee in bankruptcy. Much more clearly would this be the case where there was an express assignment and delivery of the lease by the lessor to secure a debt. In Ex parte Wills, 1 Ves. Jr. 162, Lord Chancellor Thurlow, said: "An assignment of rents and profits is an odd way of conveying, but it amounts to an equitable lien, and would entitle the assignee to come into equity and insist upon a mortgage."

The petition states a case which, prima facie, as to the demised estate puts the plaintiffs, so far as necessary to secure payment of their debt against the bankrupt, in the place of the bankrupt, and therefore the demurrer of the assignee ought to have been disallowed. The extent of the plaintiffs' rights I can not determine in the absence of the lease, the assignment and power of attorney. I only hold that the petition makes a case giving, to some extent at least, a lien which the bankruptcy court should respect. I see no reason why the rights of the plaintiffs and assignee may not be well determined upon the petition of the plaintiffs.

The order sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition is reversed, and the district court directed to permit the assignee to answer the petition if he shall be so advised. Ordered accordingly.

NOTE. After the cause was remanded it was tried on its merits in the district court, which rendered a decree dismissing the petition of Meador & Co.; and on appeal this decree was affirmed on the ground that Meador & Co. failed to show any assignment or delivery of the lease to them, and because, by the statute of Missouri, assignments of leases are required to be in writing, and to be recorded, or else are declared void as to all persons except the parties thereto, and persons having actual notice thereof. 1 Wag. St. p. 277, §§ 24–26; Id. p. 287, § 33; Id. p. 655, §§ 2, 3.

MEAGHER v. The LIZZIE.

[2 Woods, 243.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1876.

APPEAL — ADMIRALTY — FACTS NOT AVERRED IN PLEADINGS NOR SHOWN IN EVIDENCE.

Where, on a libel in rem to recover for repairs to a steamer, the jurisdiction of the district court was submitted to and the cause tried on its merits; after appeal to the circuit court, the claimants could not for the first time set up that the repairs were made in the home port of the steamer, and therefore did not create a maritime lien, no such fact being averred in the pleadings or shown by the evidence.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. This suit was brought to recover a balance claimed by the libellants to be due them for repairs made to the steamer Lizzie. The point is taken by the claimants in this court for the first time, that the repairs were made to the steamer in her home port, and therefore did not create a maritime lien. This point is made too late, and is not tenable now. It is not made by the pleadings, nor was it made in the district court, and I cannot find anything in the evidence even to show that the Lizzie belonged to the port of New Orleans when the repairs were made. The jurisdiction of the court was submitted to, and the cause tried on its merits. The objection cannot be raised now.

BANKRUPTCY—FEES—BY WHOM PAID—FURTHER STATEMENTS BY BANKRUPT.

The party for whom services are performed by the officers of the court must pay the fees incident to such service. A creditor is only bound to pay expenses of his own examination. A bankrupt making further statements, after creditor's examination is closed, must pay his own expenses.

[Criticised in Re Noyes, Case No. 10,370.]

A creditor had obtained an order for the examination of the bankrupt [Stephen A. Mealy] and other witnesses in respect to the property, &c., of the bankrupt, and upon that examination it was insisted by the bankrupt that the creditor was bound to pay not only the register's fees for the direct examination of such bankrupt and witnesses, but also fees charged for taking down the statement of the bankrupt on the so-called cross-examination of the bankrupt by his own counsel, and the fees for taking down the bankrupt's cross-examination of the witnesses produced and examined by the creditor. The register being of opinion that the creditor was bound to pay such fees, the question was certified to the district judge.

HALL, District Judge. The general rule in regard to the payment of the fees of officers of the court undoubtedly is that such fees must be paid, in the first instance, by the party or persons for whom the service is performed; subject, of course, in respect to the party upon whom the burden shall ultimately rest, to the decree or judgment of the court upon the final disposition of the case. This rule is applicable in its full force to the case above presented, and the creditor is only bound to pay the expenses of his own examination of the bankrupt and the direct examination of the witnesses produced by such creditor, and of his cross-examination of the witnesses produced by the bankrupt. The rule suggested by the register might lead to great abuses, and the fact that a bankrupt might, after the direct examination was closed, go on and charge the opposing creditor with large sums for taking down an irrelevant statement requires that the general and proper rule should be vigorously adhered to.

If the bankrupt make further statements, after his examination by the creditor is closed, he does so as a witness in his own behalf, and must pay the expenses of his examination—the same as those of the examination of any other witness called by him.

The rule which should govern in cases of this character is, in substance, that laid down by Chancellor Walworth in Trustees of Watertown v. Cowen, 5 Paige, 510.

REPLEVIN — WHEN LIES — UNLAWFUL TAKING — PLEA OF NON CEPIT—LIENS—JUS AD REM—IN RE.

1. Replevin does not lie unless there has been an unlawful taking from the possession of another. If after a bailment of goods, they are unlawfully converted or detained, detinue or trover and not replevin is the proper remedy.

2. A lien is neither a jus ad rem, nor a jus in re, but a simple right of retainer. It is therefore not attachable as personal property, or as a chose in action of the person, who is entitled to it.

3. Non cepit in replevin puts in issue the question of general property only, and not of special property; at least in a suit between the principal and his agent. On non cepit, the issue must be for the defendant, if there was not a wrongful taking of the goods from the possession of another.

signed by him to Charles W. Greene, for sale; and Mr. Greene placed them in the store of the defendant [Charles Head] on storage. Mr. Greene having failed in business, a Mr. Haskins, as a creditor of Greene, on the 5th of February, 1817, sued out a trustee writ against Greene and the defendant, as his trustee; and process was actually served on the defendant, on the 5th of the same month. Upon the 6th of the same month, the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant, that certain wheat flour, and other merchandise, placed in his hands by Mr. Greene, and on which he had advanced money, was his property, and requested him to hold the same on his account; and stated that Mr. Greene had no authority to place it in the defendant's hands for any purpose. It appeared by the defendant's books, which the plaintiff called for, that the defendant had advanced $3,500 on this wheat flour, but nothing on the flour sued for. On the 15th of the same month, the plaintiff, having paid all the demands, which the defendant had for storage and truckage of the said flour, and the defendant refusing to deliver over the same to him, sued out the present writ of replevin. At the commencement of this suit, a large sum of money, being the balance of accounts, was due from the plaintiff to Mr. Greene, as his agent and factor; and on the first day of October, 1817, there still remained due to him the sum of $1,826. There was no proof that either before, or at the time of the service of the writ of replevin, or at any time since, Mr. Greene authorized the defendant to hold the flour sued for, or any part thereof, for him, to secure his (Mr. Greene's) lien for the balance of the accounts due him. The evidence was, that the defendant received the said goods simply on storage. And at the trial, Mr. Greene swore, that he never gave any authority to Mr. Head to detain them for his (Mr. Greene's) lien; and he now expressly waived all his lien for such balance; and requested and authorized the defendant to suffer judgment to go in favor of the plaintiff. It further appeared in evidence, that on the 7th of December, 1816, a trustee process was issued from the district court of Pennsylvania against the plaintiff, as trustee of C. W. Greene, at the suit of William Payne and Co., which was served on the 10th of the same month on the plaintiff.

Upon these facts, by consent, a verdict was taken for the plaintiff, under the direction of the court. The defendant to be at liberty to move for a new trial, and if upon the facts the court were of opinion, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, then the verdict was to be amended, and a verdict entered for the defendant. And it was farther agreed by the parties, that if the defence of the lien of Mr. Greene could not be asserted under the present plea, then, that the court in its discretion, might, if the justice of the case required it, set aside the verdict, and grant a new trial, and give liberty to the defendant to amend his plea.

The case was shortly argued upon the motion for a new trial.

Mr. Welsh, for plaintiff.
Mr. Gorham, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. There is no pretence of a general property in Mr. C. W. Greene; and the plea puts in issue, so far as respects the parties to this suit, the general property only in the goods replevied. Nor had Mr. Greene any special property in the goods; for he had a lien only for the general balance of his account, as a factor; and a lien, as has been well observed in Brace v. Duchess of Marlborough, 2 P. Wms. 491, is neither a jus ad rem, nor a jus in re. The lien of a factor is a mere right of retaining the goods of his principal, until his demands in that capacity are settled; and it gives the factor a rightful possession, which cannot be devested without his own consent. But as against his principal, it gives him no general or special property, whatever may be the case in respect to mere strangers. Hammonds v. Barclay, per Grose, J., 2 East, 235; Lickbarrow v. Mason, per Buller, J., 6 East, 25, note; Wilson v. Balfour, 2 Camp. 579. And in the present case, Mr. Greene never authorized the defendant to assert any claim for a lien on his account. On the contrary, Mr. Greene now expressly waives any claim for a lien on account of his general balance, and justifies the defendant in abandoning it; and the defendant has been paid his own charges for storage. Under these circumstances a return irreplevisable could not, under any acknowledged form of pleading, be awarded by the court.

It is as clear, that the lien of Mr. Greene is not an attachable interest under the trustee process served on the defendant, either as personal property, or as a chose in action, due from the defendant to Mr. Greene. The only doubt, that I have ever entertained, is, whether a writ of replevin was a proper remedy in this case. At common law a writ of replevin never lies, unless there has been a tortious taking, either originally, or by construction of law, by some act, which makes the party a trespasser ab initio. In case of a bailment, or rightful possession of the property, replevin is certainly not the proper remedy at common law; but detinue or trover lies in such case, where there is an unjustifiable detention or conversion. This doctrine is very fully expounded and justified by Lord Redesdale in some recent cases (Ex parte Chamberlain, 1 Schoales & L. 320; In re Wilson, Id. 321, note; Shannon v. Shannon, Id. 324, 327. See, also, Galloway v. Bird, 4 Bing. 299); and has been recognised by a very learned judgment in our country (Pangburn v. Patridge, 7 Johns. 140). Nor has the statute of replevin of Massachusetts (Act June 25, 1789, c. 26, § 4) altered the common law in this respect. It gives the remedy only, when goods are taken, distrained, or attached, which are claimed by a third person, who thinks proper to replevy them. The act requires, that there should be a wrongful taking, distress or attachment from the possession of another; for the count in the statute, expressly alleges the goods to be taken unlawfully, and without justifiable cause.

Under the circumstances of this case, if the issue had been non cepit, it must have been found for the defendant; for he never took the goods in any legal sense from the possession of another. He received them on storage; and the delivery to him was a lawful delivery, upon a bailment for safe keeping. Non cepit puts in issue the fact of an actual taking; and unless there be a wrongful taking from the possession of another, it is not a taking within the issue. A wrongful detainer after a lawful taking is not equivalent to a wrongful original taking.

But if on non cepit, the issue would have been found for the defendant, no return could have been awarded to him. It would therefore after all be but a mere question as to costs; and as the parties have agreed in no event to claim any costs, there is no reason for entertaining the motion for a new trial, since the merits are clearly against the defendant. The motion is overruled, and the judgment must pass for the plaintiff upon the verdict. Portland Bank v. Stubbs, 6 Mass. 422.

BANKRUPTCY—LIENS—JUDGMENTS—PRIORITY—ASSIGNEE—DUTY AS TO PETITIONING COURT—SALE OF ENCUMBERED PROPERTY.

1. L. C., a creditor, recovered two judgments, in a county court of North Carolina, against a debtor, executions on which judgments were enjoined by the United States military commandant. The injunction was thereafter rescinded, and fieri facias were filed, but never delivered to or acted on by the sheriff. Subsequently two other judgments against said debtor were respectively obtained by R. T. and De V. & G., creditors, upon which executions issued, and property of debtor was levied on by the sheriff, before proceedings commenced in bankruptcy. Debtor thereafter was adjudged bankrupt, and assignee was appointed, who agreed with the sheriff that the property so levied on should be offered and sold by the assignee, free from all incumbrances, on account of said executions and levies, and it was sold accordingly. Held, that L. C., the senior judgment creditor, is not entitled to any of the proceeds of said sale, as he had no perfected lien upon proceedings commenced in bankruptcy.

2. The action of the United States military officer preventing him from issuing executions, does not help or cure the defect.

3. The junior judgment creditors are entitled to have their claims paid pro rata by the assignee out of said proceeds, after deducting expenses, costs, and fees of sheriff and assignee, and this by virtue solely of said agreement.

4. It is not the duty of an assignee to petition the court respecting the sale of encumbered property of bankrupt, unless he believes such sale will produce a larger fund for the general creditors whom he represents.

5. Assignee may sell encumbered property in his possession without petitioning the court, or without an order of the court, but in so doing he sells subject to lawful encumbrances. He can convey no higher or better interest than he took.

In bankruptcy.

BROOKS, District Judge. This is a case agreed under the provisions of the 6th section of the bankrupt act of March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 520]. Lewis Cobb recovered two judgments against John A. Mebane, said bankrupt, in the county court of Guilford county, at the August term, 1867. Executions on said judgments were enjoined or forbidden to be issued by the military commandant at the post of Greensboro', who was acting, at that time, under general orders from the headquarters of the Second military district. By reason of the orders of the post commander, no execution issued from the said term. The said order was rescinded in April or May, 1868, and thereupon the clerk of the Guilford county court filled up writs of fieri facias on said judgments, tested of the May term, 1868, which executions were never taken from the clerk's office, and never came to the hands of the sheriff, nor were they in any manner acted upon by the sheriff. At a special term of the superior court of Guilford county, held in December, 1867, two other judgments were obtained against John A. Mebane, said bankrupt, one in favor of Robert Thomas, administrator, and the other in favor of De Varnet & Gerringer; upon which executions regularly issued and were levied by the sheriff of Guilford county, on the real and personal property of the defendant, in February, 1868, and before the commencement by him of proceedings in bankruptcy. The property so levied upon was not sold until after the appointment of an assignee. Subsequently to the appointment of Peter H. Adams as assignee, and the execution of the assignment to him, the said assignee, by the consent of and agreement with the sheriff, sold the real estate so levied upon. Pursuant to said agreement between said assignee and sheriff, the assignee offered said real estate, clear of any and all encumbrances, on account of said executions and levies.

The question presented, and upon which the opinion of the court is desired, is, which of the judgment creditors is entitled to the proceeds of the sale, or so much thereof as will satisfy their debts. It appears to be conceded that if Cobb is not so entitled, the plaintiffs in the junior judgments are. I hold that but for the agreement between said assignee and the sheriff, and the terms of the sale made by the assignee, pursuant to such agreement, neither of the judgment creditors, in the present condition of the claims, would have been entitled to any part of the money realized by the sale. Upon the bankruptcy of a party all right and interest in the whole of the property he has at the time passes to his assignee, excepting only such of it as shall be exempted and subject only to existing legal liens or encumbrances. The bankrupt act respects existing, perfected liens. There is in the 1st section express provision in regard to their ascertainment and liquidation.

The judgments in favor of Lewis Cobb were first obtained, and it becomes necessary to inquire whether such proceedings were had as were necessary to create in his behalf a lien upon the land of the bankrupt, Mebane, before proceedings in bankruptcy in his case were commenced. I do not think any lien was so created in his behalf. The filling up of the fieri facias by the clerk was not issuing the executions. And even if they had been delivered to the sheriff, and he had not acted upon them by making and returning a levy, no lien would have been created in behalf of the plaintiff. In some of the states, by statutory provision, a judgment is made a lien from the time of its rendition. It was not so in North Carolina prior to the enactment of the Code of Civil Procedure. A levy was required to complete a lien. It does not help the plaintiff, Cobb, that his executions were enjoined by military power. He may have been greatly wronged by such interference. But this court cannot repair that wrong. In truth, the plaintiff, from that or some other cause, did not do, or procure to be done, an act indispensable to the perfecting of a lien. This may be set down as one of the many acts, extra constitutional or extra legislative, perhaps, performed by the military authorities subsequent to the cessation of hostilities, wherein powers of a questionable nature, some of them undefined, were exercised, and authority not warranted by law being frequently assumed. It would then be a matter of no surprise if many things were done, resulting in injuries beyond the ability of the courts to remedy, while keeping within the limits prescribed by the constitution and laws.

The next inquiry is: Did the plaintiffs in the junior judgments, at the instance of Robert Thomas, administrator, and De Varnet & Gerringer, so prosecute their claims as to acquire liens before the bankrupt filed his petition in bankruptcy? I think they did. They obtained their judgments, and immediately followed them up by executions, which were received by the sheriff, and by him were levied upon the land of the defendant, who afterwards became a bankrupt. By these proceedings a lien in behalf of these plaintiffs was clearly and perfectly created. It does not follow, however, that the proceeds realized by the assignee's sales of the property so encumbered should be applied to the satisfaction of such executions. If it be ascertained that the property of a bankrupt is encumbered by lien or mortgage, the assignee may, if he shall believe it to be to the interest of that class of creditors whom he especially represents—for instance, the class entitled to pro rata distribution—file his petition, and obtain an order directing him to sell the property encumbered, on such terms as to the court may seem proper, and convey the property freed from such encumbrances. The court will then protect the lien creditors by a proper disposition of the proceeds. But it is not part of the duty of an assignee so to petition, unless he shall believe such a sale will create a larger fund for distribution to creditors generally than if there should be a sale by the mortgagee or sheriff. So in regard to property the title to which is in dispute. The assignee may sell, however, without petitioning the court, or without any order of the court, any property of the bankrupt in his possession encumbered in any manner. But when he so sells, he does so subject to any and all lawful encumbrances, and can convey no higher or better interest. The proceeds of such a sale are supposed to be the price or value of the interest so sold, and with a knowledge of the encumbrances. I think this is not the rule, however, to apply in this case, for the real estate was offered by the assignee in conformity to the agreement with the sheriff, who, with executions in hand, was claiming all his rights under them, concurring with all parties in interest that a sale clear of encumbrances would prejudice no one, but be the surest means of obtaining fair prices. The bidders had good reason to believe that they were bidding for a good title.

It is therefore ordered and decreed by the court that the assignee, Peter H. Adams, of the proceeds of the sales of the property levied upon as aforesaid, pay the executions in favor of Robert Thomas, administrator, and De Varnet & Gerringer, if sufficient, first paying costs of sale, etc., and retaining his lawful commissions. And if the same shall not be sufficient for that purpose, that he pay the cost, and retain his commissions as aforesaid, and distribute the surplus proceeds of such sales pro rata, in the payment of said last-mentioned executions. Let this be certified to the parties to this case agreed.

Case No. 9,381.

MECHANICS' & FARMERS' BANK v. TOWNSEND.

[5 Blatchf. 315;[1] 3 Int. Rev. Rec. 143.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. May 12, 1866.

TAXATION—LICENSE TAX ON BANKS—CAPITAL—SURPLUS EARNINGS.

The term "capital," as used in the 1st subdivision of the 79th section of the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 251), means, in reference to a bank whose charter fixes the amount of its capital, the amount of capital so fixed, and does not include the surplus earnings of such bank, so as to subject it to a license tax on such surplus earnings, as capital.

In equity. This was an application for a provisional injunction, to restrain [Theodore Townsend], a collector of internal revenue, from collecting a license tax. The bill was filed in a state court, by the plaintiff, a banking corporation doing business at Albany, New York, and the suit was removed by the defendant into this court, under the provisions of the 3d section of the act of March 3, 1833 (4 Stat. 633). The tax was claimed to be collectible under the provisions of the 1st subdivision of the 79th section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 251), which provided, that bankers using or employing a capital not exceeding the sum of $50,000, should pay $100 for each license, and that those using or employing a capital exceeding $50,000 should pay, for every additional $1,000, in excess of $50,000, $2. The charter originally granted to the corporation, under the state law, fixed its capital at $350,000. It applied for a banker's license under the national banking law of congress, on such capital of $350,000. The application was refused by the assessor, on the ground that the surplus earnings of the bank were not included as capital. The bank refused to pay a tax upon such surplus earnings, as capital, and the collector was proceeding to enforce the collection of such tax, when this suit was instituted.

John H. Reynolds, for plaintiff.

William A. Dart, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. [2][The bill of complaint in this case was filed in the state court, to enjoin the defendant from collecting a license or tax on surplus capital claimed under the first sub-division of the 79th section of the act of congress passed June 30, 1864; and has been removed into this court under the 3d section of the act of March 3, 1833 (4 Stat. p. 633). The first sub-division of section 79 provides that bankers, using or employing capital not exceeding the sum of $50,000, shall pay $100 for each license; when using or employing a capital exceeding $50,000, for every additional $1,000, $2. The charter of the bank in this case under the state law, fixes the capital at $350,000. Application was duly made for a license as a banker, under the act of congress, on a capital as above named, which was refused, on the ground that the surplus earnings of the bank were not included as capital. And the assessors and collector on refusal to submit to this view, thereupon proceeded to enforce the collection of the tax according to the law in such case made and provided, until restrained by the instillation of this suit and injunction.][2]

I am satisfied that the assessor and the collector have fallen into an error. The term "capital," as used in the 1st subdivision of the 79th section, means the amount of capital fixed by the charter. This amount cannot be altered, enlarged, or diminished, except by legislative authority. A surplus earned by the bank is no part of its capital under its charter, nor does the act of congress, either expressly or impliedly regard it as such. Besides, a tax is levied specifically on all dividends in scrip, or money declared due, &c., to stockholders, &c., and on all undistributed sums made or added, during the year, to the surplus or contingent funds of the bank, (section 120,) thereby treating and dealing with surplus earnings as separate and distinct from the capital of the bank. According to the construction claimed, the surplus earnings would be subject not only to all the tax that is imposed upon the capital of a bank, as such, but to five per centum, in addition, as surplus. I think that, if congress had intended thus to deal with this description of property, and to regard it both as a part of the capital of a bank, and, at the same time, as surplus earnings, and to be taxed in both aspects, it would have said so in plain words, and not have left the question to inconsistent and strained construction.

It has been argued that, inasmuch as the 110th section, speaks of the average amount of the capital of a bank, the word "capital" may embrace something more or less than the amount fixed by the charter. But, admitting this to be so, it by no means follows that it includes surplus earnings. The "capital" of a bank and its "surplus earnings" convey distinct and different ideas and meanings. But, on looking at this section, the reason of the phraseology is very obvious. The words are, "a duty of one-twenty-fourth of one per centum each month, &c., upon the average amount of the capital of any bank, &c., beyond the amount invested in United States bonds." This amount would necessarily be fluctuating and variable, depending on the time and the amount of the investment in the United States bonds, and might often require an average to be made of the amount of capital stock liable to be taxed. This same section provides, that in case of banks with branches, the duty shall be imposed,

[2] [From 3 Int. Rev. Rec. 143.]

[2] [From 3 Int. Rev. Rec. 143.]

&c., and "the amount of capital of each branch shall be considered to be the amount allotted to such branch"—not the amount including surplus earnings or any other addition. The same section also provides for a duty of one-sixth of one per centum each month upon the average amount of circulation, &c., beyond the amount of ninety per centum of the capital of the bank, &c. It will hardly be contended, on the part of the government, that the term "capital" here includes surplus earnings; and yet the claim would be as well founded as in the case under consideration. I may add, that, according to the construction contended for, the capital of the bank would be changing during the whole period of the license. It might become much greater than the amount for which a license was paid, for, only the surplus at the time the license was granted could be estimated.

Upon the whole, I am satisfied that the assessor erred in setting up the claim that the plaintiffs were bound to take out a license on the basis that the surplus earnings of the bank were a part of its capital, and that an injunction must be granted.

NOTES—INDORSER—PLACE WHERE PAYABLE—DEMAND OF MAKER—PROTEST.

If a promissory note be made payable at the house of R. Y., the first indorser, and the notary public, on the day after the last day of grace, demand payment of R. Y., at his house, without asking for the maker, or inquiring whether he had left funds to pay the note, such demand is not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover against the second indorser.

Assumpsit against the second indorser of John Weightman's note to Robert Young, payable at the house of Robert Young, four months from the 25th of December, 1816. James Millan, a notary public, testified, that on the 29th of April, 1817, (the day after the last day of grace,) he demanded payment from Robert Young, and the defendant, Adam Lynn; and believed it was at the house of Robert Young; but did not ask for John Weightman, the maker of the note, nor inquire whether he had left funds to pay it. That Weightman did not reside in the county of Alexandria, and therefore he could not demand payment from him. The other parties all resided in Alexandria. Christopher Neale testified that the defendant requested the bank not to sue him, as, in the event of his being obliged to pay it, it would save the expense of one suit.

Mr. Swann, for plaintiff.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant.

THE COURT (nem. con.) instructed the jury that the evidence, so stated, was not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover.

NOTES—INDORSER—PROTEST—DEMAND—EVIDENCE.

If a notary-public, after demanding payment from the maker of a promissory note, go to the shop of the indorser, (a coachmaker who had journeymen,) and there demand payment, but of whom he does not remember, and thinks he did not see the indorser, this is not sufficient evidence of notice, to the indorser, of non-payment by the maker.

Assumpsit against [Evan P. Taylor] the indorser of Peyton's promissory note. The notary-public demanded payment from the maker on the last day of grace, after banking hours, and afterwards, on the same day, called at the shop of the defendant, and demanded payment, but did not remember whether he saw the defendant, and thought that if he had, he should have stated it in his protest, which he did not. The defendant was a coach-maker, and employed journeymen. The witness did not remember of whom he made the demand.

THE COURT, at the prayer of Mr. Taylor, for the defendant, instructed the jury that the plaintiff could not recover that evidence, because, as they thought, the notice was not proved.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—DEED TO WIFE—MONEY USED IN PURCHASE.

It is no fraud in a husband toward his creditors, to purchase real estate with the money which belonged to the wife before the marriage, and to take the deed directly to the wife, pursuant to a verbal agreement to that effect made with her before the marriage.

The bill states that the complainants levied an execution issued on a judgment in their favor against E. P. Taylor, upon a house and lot which were purchased by him with his own funds and fraudulently conveyed to his wife; that the complainants purchased it at the marshal's sale, under the fieri facias; that E. P. Taylor refuses to give them possession; and prays that the deed to the defendant's wife, and the deed from the defendant E. P. Taylor to the defendant David Marle may be set aside; and that the defendants may deliver possession of the premises to the complainants, and account for the rents and profits. The defendant Marle, in his answer, stated that he held a lien on the property for a debt of $205 under a deed purporting to be from E. P. Taylor and his wife, but executed only by E. P. Taylor. The separate answers of E. P. Taylor and wife, aver that the wife, having been a widow, and in trade before her intermarriage with E. P. T. had acquired considerable property, and had, at the time of the marriage, about $3,000 in bank; and that it was agreed between them, before the marriage, that it should be laid out in building a house upon a lot belonging to the wife; but that the lot being supposed to be too small, the intention to build was abandoned, and in lieu thereof the house and lot in question were purchased by E. P. T. with the wife's money, and conveyed directly by the vendor to the wife; denying all fraud, &c. The cause being, by consent, set for hearing on bill and answer,

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) decided that the claim of the wife was fair and upon a valuable consideration, and dismissed the bill.

In assault and battery, the affidavit to hold to bail, must state some specific injury to the person of the plaintiff, and must be positive as to some amount of damages.

Assault and battery. The affidavit stated a beating, without any special damage, except that the plaintiff could not, for some days, transact all his business, as clerk in one of the departments, as well as usual, and that the injury was such, that he thinks that ten pounds sterling would not be too great a compensation therefor.

THE COURT refused to hold defendant to bail on the affidavit, it not being positive as to any amount of damages, and not stating any specific injury to the person of the plaintiff.

This cause had been referred to arbitrators by rule of court, who made a report in favour of the plaintiff, for 1850 dollars, provided the plaintiff should give to the defendant a bond of indemnity against Holt & Co. [assignees of McCall Medford] and two or three other persons. The report was returned, about four years ago, and it appears by the records, that, on motion, it was confirmed and decreed. [Case No. 6,647.] The defendant now obtained a rule to show cause why the judgment should not be vacated, the judgment having been improvidently entered, until the indemnity was given, and by which it appeared, upon showing cause, the agent of the plaintiffs (they living in England) had refused to give or to receive the sum awarded, on the condition prescribed. It also appeared, that Holt had recovered, and been paid by the defendant, 1000 dollars, of the sum for which the indemnity was to be given; and other suits were now depending.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (PETERS, District Judge, absent). This judgment, having been entered at a former court, though probably improvidently done, and might have been refused, had it been opposed, until the indemnity was given, cannot now be vacated. If there was error in entering it, the court, at a subsequent term, cannot set it aside, unless it was entered by the misprision of the clerk, by fraud, or the like. It is a hardship upon the defendant, to have his real estate bound by a judgment which it is improbable will ever be enforced; and there is possibly no way to help the defendant, but by entering satisfaction on the judgment, whenever it is made to appear, that the sum awarded has been paid to those against whose claims the defendant was to be indemnified.

Rule discharged.

[Subsequently, upon motion of the defendant, the judgment was ordered to be entered satisfied. Case No. 9,390.]

JUDGMENT—MOTION TO ENTER SATISFACTION—EVIDENCE.

Judgment on an award that the defendant pay so much on receiving from the plaintiff an indemnity against certain claims. The plaintiff afterwards refused to give the indemnity; and on the defendant paying more claims, against which he was to be indemnified, than the amount of the judgment, the court ordered satisfaction to be entered on the judgment.

[The case was originally brought in this court by Holt & Co., assignees of McCall Medford, against John Dorsey, when the jury found for the plaintiff. Case No. 6,647.]

The defendant, since the decision [Case No. 9,389], having paid to one of the persons who had sued him, and against whom the plaintiff, by the report of the referees, was to indemnify him so much of the sum awarded, as with the sum before paid to Holt, and a small sum now paid into court, amounts to eighteen hundred and fifty dollars; moved the court to enter satisfaction of the decree, which the court directed.

BOTTOMRY—SUPPLIES—WHAT ARE NECESSARY—MASTER—COMPETENCY AS WITNESS.

1. In a suit by the holder of a bottomry bond, given by the master of a vessel, in a foreign port, for necessary supplies, the master is a competent witness, to prove that the supplies were furnished, and that they were necessary.

by the captain of the bark Medora, at Manilla. The holders of the bond, offer the captain as a witness, to the circumstances under which the bond is given. This evidence is objected to, and the case of The Fortitude [Case No. 4,953] is cited. In that case, the deposition of the captain was rejected, at the hearing, but in a subsequent and more deliberate examination of the question, Judge Story states, that he finds no authority in support of his ruling, but several against it, and indicates such doubts of its correctness, as to neutralize its authority. The Nestor [Id. 10,126] was the case of material men, claiming a lien for articles furnished in a foreign port. The captain was offered, as a witness for them, and admitted. There is an exception from the general rule of evidence excluding interested witnesses, by which agents are admitted, from necessity or public convenience. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 416, and cases there cited; Fuller v. Wheelock, 10 Pick. 137. It is urged by the counsel for the respondent, that agents are not admitted, unless where their interest is balanced. If so, agents constitute no exception from the general rule, by which, in order to exclude, there must be a direct and certain interest. If balanced, there is no interest.

It has been suggested, that the case of The Nestor was overruled by that of The Fortitude [supra], but for the reasons already stated, I cannot so consider it, nor can I perceive any sufficient ground of distinction, by which the captain is a competent witness for material men, to prove that supplies were furnished, and necessary, in order to maintain their lien; and not a competent witness for the bondholders, to prove the same facts, in order to maintain their lien.

Were the supplies necessary? They are necessary, if they are fit and proper for the service in which the vessel is engaged, and what the owner of that vessel, as a prudent man, would have ordered, if present. The Alexander, 1 Wm. Rob. Adm. 362.

First. As to the one hundred and three dollars, paid for unlading the outward cargo. I see nothing in this case to exempt the owner of the vessel from the obligation to bear this expense. It was clearly necessary.

Second. Wages. The amount paid, was due to the seamen, and the owners were legally bound to pay it, at the time, and it was eminently fit and proper that that obligation should be fulfilled by the captain.

Third. The fifty-two dollars borrowed of the clerk. On the outward passage, the crew became sick, and the captain put into St. Helena, for fresh provisions. He was without money, and borrowed of the clerk, and promised payment at Manilla. I have no doubt that the clerk had a lien upon the ship, which he might have enforced at Manilla, and that the master might well have taken up money on bottomry, for the purpose of discharging his claim. The Vibilia, 1 Wm. Rob. Adm. 8; The Trident, Id. 34.

Fourth. The sixteen dollars mentioned in the account, as board. The captain testifies, that this was, in fact, expended for several small items of necessity, at Manilla. I do not see sufficient ground to discredit the statement of the captain; and I have no doubt, that it was proper that the master should receive the small amount for contingencies, which was advanced to him for that purpose.

Fifth. The captain expended sixty dollars, at Manilla, for his own clothing. It is insisted, that this sum ought to have been appropriated by him to the necessities of the vessel, and reduced the bond to that extent. The owners had, on board the ship, an invoice of naval stores, to the nominal amount of about eight hundred dollars, which was consigned to Peel, Hubbell & Co., of whom the captain obtained an advance of one hundred and ten dollars, sixty of which he expended in necessary clothing for himself. This having been actually and rightfully expended by the captain; I cannot see that it affects the question of the necessity for the supplies to the vessel.

Sixth. The two hundred and thirty-four dollars, since realized from that invoice of naval stores. Peel, Hubbell & Co., were the agents of the libellants in making the advances for which the bond was given; and it is strenuously urged in behalf of the respondent, that, to the extent of the two hundred and thirty-four dollars, the captain was not without funds, or the means of raising them; and that the goods, being in the hands of the agent of the libellants, that amount, at least, ought to be deducted from the bond. If the libellants' agents had in their hands, property which ought to have been appropriated to the use of the vessel, the bond, to that extent, cannot be upheld.

How, then, is the fact? All the evidence comes from the captain; he testifies, that one hundred and ten dollars was all that could be obtained upon that invoice; that he went throughout Manilla, and made great exertions to obtain more, by sale or otherwise, but without success; and that he was compelled to leave the property in the hands of the consignees. I cannot say that the consignees were bound to advance more on that property, or that the captain could have obtained, by means of it, more than the one hundred and ten dollars. We have no information, under what circumstances the two hundred and thirty-four dollars have since been realized; and if any credit is to be given to the captain's testimony, this invoice did not furnish him the means of procuring funds to any amount over the one hundred and ten dollars.

Decree for $1587.35, and costs.

That the master is a competent witness, in favor of the holder of the bottomry, was decided in Furniss v. The Magoun [Case No. 5,163], a case reported since the decision of Deshon v. The Medora [Id. 3,820]. See same case, Leland v. The Medora [Id. 8,237].

5. If chattels are sold on an execution, the regularity of such sale cannot be contested by mere strangers.

6. Notice of an assignment of chattels to a judgment creditor, where possession has never been taken under the assignment, does not affect the right of the sheriff or the creditor to seize the property in execution, as the property of the assignor.

This was an action of trover, brought by the plaintiffs [Samuel Meeker and others,] against the defendant [Luther Wilson], who was a deputy sheriff of the county of Bristol, for the conversion of a parcel of sugars, alleged to be the property of the plaintiffs. At the trial, the facts proved or admitted were as follows. Jacob Shoemaker and Charles R. Travers, of Philadelphia, being in failing circumstances, on the 6th of December, 1806, made an assignment of their estate to the plaintiffs for the benefit of their creditors, including, among other things, the cargo on board of the brig Deborah from Guadaloupe, of which cargo the said sugars were a part. Soon after this assignment, and in the month of December, 1806, the Deborah arrived at New Bedford, and the cargo, not being entered according to law, was taken possession of by the collector of the port for payment of the duties due thereon to the United States. On the 17th of January, 1807, while the cargo was in the custody of the collector, Messrs. Port & Russell of New York, creditors of Shoemaker and Travers, sued out of the court of common pleas for Bristol county a writ of attachment against Shoemaker and Travers, upon which the defendant returned, that he had attached the cargo of the Deborah, the same having been previously attached at the suit of Howland and Allen, and Thomas Allen. At the time of this attachment, the property was in Messrs. Howland and Allen's store, where it had been deposited by the collector and attached by them, and no removal was made; and it was admitted that the attachment was intended to be made by all parties subject to the claim of the United States for the duties. On the 21st of July, 1807, a writ issued at the suit of the United States against Shoemaker and Travers, upon which an attachment was made of the same property. No removal, however, took place, but a part of the property was then separated from the rest, by a partition in the store, for the purpose of being applied to satisfy the duties due to the United States and charges. This suit of the United States was discontinued at the December term of the district court, 1807. On the 28th of September, 1807, the collector sold so much of the cargo, as was necessary for the payment of the duties and charges; and the residue was, on the 29th of the same month, sold by the defendant on the execution, which issued on the 24th of said month, upon a judgment obtained at September term, 1807, of the common pleas, by Messrs. Port & Russell, against Shoemaker and Travers, on their writ of attachment aforesaid, for the sum of $13.7056, damages, and $12.96, costs. The defendant, in his return on the execution, did not state that he had kept the property four days, &c. according to the requisitions of the statute of Massachusetts of March 17, 1784 (section 5). The present suit was commenced against the defendant on the 18th of October, 1808, and there was no evidence, that at any time before that day, he had had any notice of the assignment or claim of the plaintiffs, or that the plaintiffs had made any effort to obtain possession of the property.

Upon these facts the court directed the jury, that although an assignment of property abroad might be valid in law, yet it was the duty of the assignee, in order to perfect his title, to take possession of the property within a reasonable time after it came within his reach, and if he neglected so to do, it became liable to attachment at the suit of the creditors of the assignor. That in the present case, there was no notice at all of the claim of the plaintiffs for more than a year after the property had been seized and sold in execution; and that, under these circumstances, the laches of the plaintiffs must be considered as extinguishing all right of action against a public officer, who, having no notice of an adverse claim, was compellable to seize the property on the execution; that as between the parties to the present suit, it was not material to inquire, whether the officer had, in the sale, conformed strictly to the law or not. On the face of his return, there was nothing repugnant to law; and if he had acted in an irregular manner, he was liable to Shoemaker and Travers for all the damages, they had sustained thereby; that the title of the present plaintiffs stood altogether independent of the regularity of these proceedings. If their title were good, it could not be affected by the conduct of the officer, whether correct or otherwise; and in this suit, which was for mere damages and not in rem, it could not be disputed, that the property in the goods passed by the sale under the execution; that whatever legal doubts might arise, as to the right to attach property in the custody of the collector for a lien of the United States, the question could only arise in a suit, to which the United States or the collector was a party, and not in a suit between strangers to that lien; and it was sufficient, in the present case, that the property sold on the execution had been completely discharged of such lien before the levy; that admitting the right of the United States to a priority of attachment, (on which the court gave no opinion), that right could not be vindicated by mere strangers, and in the present case it was utterly extinguished by the voluntary discontinuance of the suit of the United States, previous to the commencement of the present action; and at all events, none of those special circumstances varied the necessity of the plaintiffs' giving reasonable notice of their claim to the defendant, and, therefore, the general principle, as to the reducing of the assigned property to possession within a reasonable time, must govern the rights of the parties to the suit.

A motion having been made for a new trial, upon the ground of a misdirection of the court; and also of the possession of other important evidence, which was omitted at the trial, from the inadvertence of counsel:

G. Blake, for plaintiff.
S. Dexter, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. By the common law, a grant or assignment of goods and chattels is valid between the parties, without actual delivery thereof, and the property passes immediately upon the execution of the deed. But as to creditors, the title is not considered as perfect, unless possession accompanies and follows the deed. The want of possession is considered in some of the authorities as an evidence or badge of fraud to be submitted to the jury, but the more modern authorities hold it, as constituting in itself, in point of law, an actual fraud, which renders the transaction, as to creditors, void. 3 Coke, 80; 2 Term R. 587; [Hamilton v. Russell] 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 309. In Benton v. Thornhill, 2 Marsh. 427, 429, Gibbs, C. J., dissented from the doctrine, that want of possession was per se conclusive of fraud. The entire law will be found collected in Mr. Smith's note to Twyne's Case, 3 Coke 80. See 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. p. 1. See, also, Mr. Wallace's careful and elaborate note to the same case, where all the American learning is collected. Philadelphia Law Lib. for January, 1844. It is true, that the cases, in which these decisions have been made, turned upon the construction of the statute of frauds of 13 Eliz. c. 5, but that statute is now fully settled to be only an affirmance of the common law. Cowp. 434; [Hamilton v. Russell] 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 309. An exception to the rule is, where the possession of the grantor is consistent with the deed, or where the property conveyed is, at the time of the conveyance, abroad and incapable of delivery. In the latter case the title is complete, provided the grantee takes possession within a reasonable time after the property comes within his reach. If he does not, the same inference of legal fraud arises, as if the property had been originally capable of immediate delivery, and the possession had remained unchanged. These principles of the common law are undoubtedly founded upon the consideration, that possession of personal chattels constitutes the ordinary indicium of ownership, and that the greatest public mischiefs would arise, if secret and unavowed transfers might overreach the attachments of creditors. It would enable debtors to hold out false colors, and protect covinous contracts from the animadversion of the law. The mischief would be still greater as to sheriffs and other public officers, who are bound to take the property of debtors in execution. They must act at their peril (Dalton, 146; Gilb. Ex'ns, 21), and where the debtor is in the open and visible possession of property, exercising acts of ownership, they are compellable to seize it on the proper judicial process; and great indeed would be the hardship, if their proceedings could be overhaled in an action of tort, where the utmost diligence and care could not protect them from deception. Upon principle, independent of all authority, it would seem that substantial justice would require that a party, who has a secret transfer of property left in the possession of the original owner, should be held to waive his rights in favor of creditors and public officers, even if the case were not held infected with fraud. "Vigilantibus non dormientibus leges subserviunt."

Upon these principles, independent of the special objections, which I shall notice hereafter, how stands the present case? The assignment was made on the 6th of December; the cargo arrived soon after at New Bedford; and an almost irresistible presumption arises of early notice thereof to the assignees. The property was documented as belonging to Shoemaker and Travers, was taken into the custody of the United States as such, was attached in the same character by Howland and Allen, and also by Messrs. Port & Russell, by the defendant, on the 17th of January following, and again by the United States in the July following; and although it remained unsold until September, the assignees never made any claim thereto, nor asserted their possession: nay further, no notice ever appears of their claim, until October, 1808. Under such circumstances, it seems impossible to maintain the present suit, unless the grossest laches entitle a party to the favor of the law. The case of Bamford v. Baron, 2 Term R. 594, note a, would alone be decisive. But it is argued, that the property, being in the custody of the United States, was not legally attachable by the defendant, and that therefore he stands in the character of a mere trespasser ab initio; and I have no doubt that in point of law, property in the hands of a person having a lien thereon cannot be taken from him under an attachment against the general owner. Vide Whitaker, Liens, 142; Vin. Abr. tit. "Pawn," A 3. He has a right to retain it, until discharged of the onus; and if it be wrongfully taken away, he may maintain an action against the seizing officer for the tort. But he may waive his right, and if he does, it is no objection in the mouth of the debtor himself. As to his assignees, if their title be consummate before the seizure, the officer is not the less liable on account of the lien; and if their title be defective, it cannot be made better by an independent title in a third person, with whom they have no relation. The objection rests on the supposition, that the plaintiffs had a legal title to the property; for if they have not, it is immaterial to them what has been done with it; but on the general principle, which I have stated, we are of opinion, that the title of the plaintiffs, under the assignment, was void as against creditors. A similar answer may be given to the argument, that the officer has not, on the face of his return, disclosed matter sufficient to show, that the property was sold under the levy in a legal manner. If the assignees had no title to the property, they cannot be injured by this irregularity: and the wrong, if any, was done to Shoemaker and Travers; and as to the objection founded on the suit of the United States, it is sufficient that no right under that suit is now in controversy.

On the whole, we are satisfied that the direction of the court at the trial was correct. The assignees, having omitted to take possession of the property within a reasonable time after it came within their reach, must be considered as voluntarily leaving it in the possession of the assignors, and as therefore possession did not accompany or follow the deed, the conveyance, as to this property, was in point of law void against creditors. The laches of the assignees amounted to a legal abandonment of all right to the property under the conveyance. But an application has been made to our discretion to grant a new trial, because the party has not had the benefit of the whole evidence of his case, through the inadvertence of counsel. I do not know, that the inadvertence of counsel in the management of a cause has ever been considered as a substantive ground for granting a new trial, and it would certainly be a dangerous practice to introduce at this time. There are however peculiar circumstances connected with this case, which, if the new evidence proposed could be available in point of law, might induce the court to accede to the application.

The new evidence proposed, as it was admitted in the argument, would go no further than to show, that Messrs. Port & Russell, before their attachment was made, had notice of the assignment. But it is not now pretended that the defendant ever had any such notice. I am at a loss to perceive how notice to Messrs. Port & Russell can vary the legal rights of the sheriff. No authority has been produced to show, that where a sheriff seizes goods in execution, which are in the possession of the judgment debtor, and used by him as his own, the acts of the sheriff become tortious by mere knowledge in the judgment creditor, that the same goods had been previously transferred to a third person. No such authority can be presumed to exist. The sheriff is bound to act in conformity with the commands of his writ, and to seize the property of the judgment debtor. If he seizes it, he is bound to proceed in the execution. If the property turn out to be the debtor's, the sheriff is at all events protected, whatever notice he or the judgment creditor may have, as to the rights of third persons. If the property turn out not to be the debtor's, the seizure is unlawful, and the sheriff is liable to an action, whether he has or has not any notice of the claim of the real owner. He acts, as I have before stated, at his peril. Notice of the claim of the assignees could not, as such, vary the legal rights of the sheriff. It could only be material, as one ingredient in the case, to unite with others in showing, that possession or its equivalent was sought and obtained within a reasonable time after the property came within their grasp.

In the present case, the original attachment by the defendant is conceded on all sides to have been in subjection to the rights of the United States; and as no actual custody was taken, it was merely nominal as to third persons. The first effective seizure was upon the execution; and at that time, all other prior claims of the United States by lien being extinguished, the property was in effect in the possession of the judgment debtors; no adverse claim having been made, or possession taken. The general property draws after it the possession, unless in special cases.

If at this time the officer had had actual notice of the plaintiffs' claim, as their laches would, in favor of a creditor, have avoided their title, I have no doubt that he would have been bound to have seized the property in execution; and if so, certainly notice to Messrs. Port & Russell could not make the case stronger. It is not necessary, however, to assume this strong ground. It is very clear, that the sheriff cannot be prejudiced by any knowledge of the judgment creditor. The legality of his acts depends exclusively upon the ownership of the property and the requisitions of his precept. Suppose there had been an agreement between the creditor and debtor not to take any property on the execution, would it be contended that a sheriff, to whom such agreement was unknown, would be a trespasser for obeying the injunctions of his precept? In Turner v. Felgate, 1 Lev. 95, no doubt was entertained that a sheriff was justified in seizing goods on an execution, although it issued irregularly under a judgment which was afterwards vacated on account of its having been unduly obtained. Bull. N. P. 84. I am yet to learn, however, in what manner the knowledge of Messrs. Port & Russell could affect the legality of the levy under the execution. Notwithstanding that knowledge, they had a right to contest, if they chose, the validity of the assignment. It has not as yet been established, to my knowledge, that the mere notice of a defective conveyance of property precludes the party having notice from availing himself at law of any right to attach that property; much less can it be admitted, that notice of a conveyance of personal chattels unaccompanied with possession, which the law has pronounced a fraud, can estop the party from his right, as a creditor, to defeat that fraud. And if the law were otherwise, it is clear that such notice cannot render a sheriff responsible in damages for conduct which otherwise would stand completely justified. And for myself, I am prepared to go further, and to hold, that if Messrs. Port & Russell not only had notice of the assignment, but had actually approved the same, and come in under it, (as was at first intimated to be the real fact, but is now abandoned,) the present action could not be maintained. A remedy at law or in equity might perhaps lie against Messrs. Port & Russell, to recover the proceeds of the execution after they had passed into their hands; but the sheriff himself would be protected, if the property, in point of law, was still to be considered as the property of the judgment debtors. No question has been made as to the effect of such an assignment, to convey the property of the debtor, lying in this state, so that it may not be subject to the attachment of creditors here. It will be time enough to consider that question when it shall arise. Vide, on this point, Le Chevalier v. Lynch, 1 Doug. 170; Hatch v. Smith, 5 Mass. 42; Widgery v. Haskell, Id. 144; Harrison v. Sterry, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 289; Hunter v. Potts, 4 Term R. 182; Rex v. Watson, 3 Price, 6; West, Extents, 334; Pickstock v. Lyster, 3 Maule & S. 371. On the whole, I am satisfied that substantial justice, as between these parties, has been done; and I am against granting a new trial.

As the district judge concurs in this opinion, the motion for a new trial is overruled. Vide Ladbroke v. Crickett, 2 Term R. 649.

Case No. 9,393.

MEEKS v. VASSAULT et al.

[3 Sawy. 206.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. Nov. 30, 1874.[2]

ADMINISTRATORS — REAL ESTATE ASSETS—SALE—TRUSTEE—CESTUI QUE TRUST — ACTION BY ADMINISTRATOR—BAR—REMEDY—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT.

1. Under section 190 of the probate act of California, an action to recover lands in the possession of a purchaser, at a sale made by an acting administrator under the orders of a probate court, even though the sale is void, must be brought within three years next after the sale, or it will be barred.

2. Under the statutes of California, real estate of deceased parties is assets in the hands of the administrator, to be administered like personalty.

3. Under the statutes of California, the exclusive right to the possession of real estate of the deceased, and the exclusive right of action to recover it is vested in the administrator, pending the administration, or till the lands are distributed to the heirs.

[Cited in Sharon v. Terry, 36 Fed. 353.]

[Distinguished in Staples v. Connor, 79 Cal. 15, 21 Pac. 380.]

4. The heir cannot maintain an action to recover the real estate of the deceased after administration has commenced, until the administration is closed, or the land has been distributed to the heir.

5. The pendency of administration and the inability of the heir to maintain an action to recover real estate by reason thereof, and of the present right of action being in the administrator, do not constitute a disability on the part of the heir within the meaning of section 191 of the probate act of California. Such a state of facts does not interrupt or prevent the running of the statute, as provided in section 190.

6. For the purpose of bringing an action to recover land belonging to the intestate's estate, the administrator is the trustee or representative of the heir, and since the exclusive right to bring the action is vested in him, the law also imposes upon him the duty to bring it.

7. Where the administrator neglects to bring an action to recover property of the estate until it is barred under the statute of limitations applicable to the subject, the heir is also barred, even though the heir is a minor at the time the action accrues to the administrator.

[Cited in McLeran v. Benton, 73 Cal. 343, 14 Pac. 884.]

8. In such case the heir has his remedy against the administrator and his bondsmen, or he may, in a proper proceeding, compel the administrator to sue.

9. Where the trustee having the right of action is barred, the cestui que trust is barred.

[2] [Affirmed in 100 U. S. 564.]

10. If the title to real estate of the deceased is put in issue and determined in an action between the administrator and another, the judgment will bind the heir to the same extent that it binds the administrator.

11. Sections 258 and 259 of the probate act, do not limit the operation of section 190.

12. An adverse possession of land for the time prescribed by the statute of limitations, vests the title thereto in the adverse possessor.

[This was an action of ejectment by William Newton Meeks against Ferdinand Vassault and others.] The land in controversy is one hundred-vara lot number ten, of the hundred-vara survey south of Market street, in the city of San Francisco, and within the limits embraced by the Van Ness ordinance, the decree confirming the pueblo title, and the acts of the legislature of California and of congress, confirming it; and not within any of the exceptions mentioned in said decree or in said acts. Said lot was granted by George Hyde, alcalde of San Francisco, to James G. D. Dunleavy, January 14, 1847, and possession duly taken under said grant. Said grant was duly recorded in "Book A" of alcalde grants on the same day. On June 2, 1847, said Dunleavy conveyed said lot to George Harlan, who afterwards died intestate in Santa Clara county, of which he was then a resident, July 8, 1850, seized of all the right, title and interest in said land derived from said grant and the possession thereunder. Said George Harlan left surviving him as his heirs-at-law, a widow, six children, and two grandchildren, lawful issue of a deceased child, who died during the lifetime of said Harlan, of whom four of said children, and the two grandchildren were minors, and the others adults of full legal age. The said widow and three eldest children conveyed all their interest in said lot to plaintiff at various times prior to August 11, 1874; the three next eldest in 1869, and the two grandchildren in 1872, by virtue of which said several conveyances, all the interest of the heirs of Harlan, deceased, in said lot, became vested in said plaintiff before the commencement of this suit. Some of said heirs attained their majority within three years next before the commencement of this action. Before, and at the time of the commencement of this action, the several defendants were severally in possession of the portions of said lot described in their respective answers. On August 19, 1850, Henry C. Smith was appointed by the probate court of Santa Clara county, administrator of the estate of said George Harlan, deceased. Letters of administration having issued to him, he duly qualified and entered upon his duties as administrator. On December 31, 1853, said Henry C. Smith, without first having settled his accounts as administrator, filed in the Probate Court his resignation in writing of his administratorship; and thereupon the court, without in express terms accepting said resignation, made an order in which, after the introduction, "Now comes Henry C. Smith, administrator of the above estate, and files his resignation as administrator of said estate," he is ordered to turn over to John Yontz, public administrator, all the said estate; to make with said public administrator a full and complete settlement relating to said estate on or before the first day of the next succeeding term of said court, and providing that upon such full settlement he and his sureties should be discharged. And it was further ordered that said estate be placed in the hands of said public administrator "for purposes of general administration." Sufficient funds had come to the hands of Smith, had they been properly applied to have paid all the debts of the estate, together with the expenses of administration. No final settlement of the accounts of said Smith as administrator was ever made, either with the public administrator or the court, but no further proceedings were had with respect to his removal except such as are implied from the recital in the foregoing order and from the appointment of a successor, and the subsequent recognition of the latter as administrator in the further proceedings of the court. On June 15, 1855, Benjamin Aspinwall, on his own petition, was by the same court, appointed administrator of said estate of Harlan, deceased. He duly qualified as such, and letters of administration were issued to him in due form of law, under which he acted till he resigned, settled his accounts, and was discharged. On August 25, 1855, said Aspinwall, as administrator, presented a petition to the probate court, praying the sale of said lot number ten, in order to raise funds for the payment of a judgment before recovered by himself personally against said Smith as administrator. Said petition was defective in that it omitted to state certain facts required by the statute to give authority to the court to order a sale. After notice given upon November 10, 1855, the probate court upon said petition, made an order for the sale of said lot. On January 7, 1856, in pursuance of said order, said Aspinwall, acting as such administrator, upon due notice, exposed said lot number ten to sale at public auction in thirty-two subdivisions, and sold the same in said subdivisions to said several defendants and their grantors respectively. Said sale was fairly conducted. The several purchasers paid the several sums bid at said sale to said Aspinwall. The sales, with the proper vouchers and proofs, having been reported to the probate court, they were confirmed, and deeds of conveyance ordered to be given to the several purchasers; and deeds were accordingly executed and delivered by the administrator on February 13, 1856, purporting to convey the fee simple of said lots held by Harlan at his decease.

Said several grantees of Aspinwall as administrator in said conveyances, made in pursuance of said sale, either immediately upon their execution, to wit, on February 13, 1856, entered into the actual possession of the subdivisions respectively purported to be conveyed thereby, or being already in possession, continued in such possession, and from that time forth till the commencement of this action, they and their grantees, including the defendants to this action, have actually and continuously possessed said several subdivisions, claiming title thereto in fee simple, under and by virtue of said several deeds of conveyance, and so possessing and claiming them openly, notoriously, exclusively of any other right, and adversely to all the world. Some of said defendants are the original grantees in said deeds from Aspinwall as such administrator, and the others have acquired the title of other such grantees of Aspinwall by conveyance in due form of law and for valuable considerations by them paid. Said Aspinwall continued to act as administrator till May 12, 1864, when, upon a citation issued, a rendering of his accounts, and a settlement, allowance and confirmation thereof by the probate court, he was discharged by order of the court. Afterwards, on May 12, 1864, Joel Harlan and Lucian B. Huff were appointed administrators of said estate. Having duly qualified, they entered upon the discharge of their duties as administrators, and they are still acting as such, the administration of said estate not having been finally closed. On October 16, 1869, the plaintiff filed a petition in the probate court in which the administration of said Harlan, deceased, was pending, stating, among other things, that said Joel Harlan and Lucian B. Huff were the administrators of said estate; that no debts or claims of any kind had been presented to them or either of them, as such, against said estate, and that none existed; that he had acquired from the said heirs of said Harlan, and then owned all the right, title and interest, which said heirs had derived from said Harlan in and to said lot number ten, and praying that said lot number ten might be distributed to said plaintiff, and he be declared by the court to be the owner thereof upon his giving security for the payment of his proportion of the debts of the estate. Afterwards, on November 6, 1869, a citation having been issued and notice given, and a hearing having been had upon said petition, it was by said court "ordered, adjudged and decreed, that there be, and there hereby is, distributed to the said Wm. Newton Meeks (the plaintiff in this action), said lot number ten (10), and he is hereby adjudged and decreed to be the owner thereof in fee simple absolute as against the said administrators and their successors, and the heirs at law of said deceased, and entitled to the possession thereof." Afterwards, on September 30, 1872, said Meeks, as plaintiff, commenced this action.

Wm. H. Patterson, for plaintiff.

S. M. Wilson and Alexander Campbell, for defendants.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. The probate proceedings down to, and including the administration of Aspinwall, are the same in question in the supreme court of California in Haynes v. Meeks, 20 Cal. 288, and the facts relating thereto are fully set out in the report of that case. These proceedings were also, to some extent, considered by the supreme court of California in Haynes v. Meeks, 10 Cal. 110; Meeks v. Hahn, 20 Cal. 621; and Harlan v. Peck, 33 Cal. 515. The sale by Aspinwall having been adjudged void in Haynes v. Meeks, by the highest court in the state, plaintiff claims a right to recover. But the defendants set up and rely on the special statute of limitations found in the probate act relating to administrators' sales. Section 190 of that act is as follows: "No action for the recovery of any estate sold by an executor, or administrator, under the provisions of this chapter, shall be maintained by any heir or other person claiming under the deceased testator or intestate unless it be commenced within three years next after the sale." If this section is applicable to a void sale, like the one in question, then the action was long since barred, unless there is some other provision of the statute, or rule of law, that preserves the right of action in the plaintiff upon the facts of this case. That the statute is applicable to the sale in question, has been settled, and I think correctly, by the supreme court of California, in cases arising upon a sale of a portion of this very estate. Harlan v. Peck, 33 Cal. 520, and Harlan v. Miller, Jan. Term, 1868, affirming it. This being the construction of a statute of California by the highest court of the state, it is conclusive in this court. Walker v. State Harbor Commissioners, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 648; Williams v. Kirtland, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 311; Tioga R. R. v. Blossburg & C. R. R., 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 137. The statute would be useless if it did not apply to a void sale. A purchaser at a valid sale would not need the protection of the statute.

Under the statutes of California real estate, like personalty, is assets in the hands of the administrator, and is to be administered, and applied first to the payment of the expenses of administration and debts of the deceased, and then the residue after satisfying all lawful claims distributed to the heirs. Realty and personalty stand upon the same footing, except that the personalty must be first exhausted before the real estate can be sold and applied to payment of the debts of the deceased. The right of possession, and right of action to recover possession of the real estate, vests exclusively in the administrator. The heirs cannot maintain an action to recover the real estate pending the administration, or after administration has been commenced, until the estate has been settled, or the real estate has been distributed to them by the probate court. This is also settled by numerous decisions of the supreme court of this state. Meeks v. Hahn, 20 Cal. 621; Meeks v. Kirby, 47 Cal. 168; Chapman v. Hollister, 42 Cal. 462; Burton v. Lies, 21 Cal. 91. This being so, it is insisted by plaintiff's counsel, that since neither he nor his grantors, the heirs of Harlan, could maintain an action for the recovery of the lands in controversy pending the administration, or until distributed by the probate court on November 6, 1869, they were under a legal disability to sue, within the meaning of section 191 of the probate act; and the action having been brought within three years after the said distribution, that it is not barred. Section 191 is as follows: "The preceding section shall not apply to minors or others under any other legal disability to sue at the time when the right of action shall first accrue; but all such persons may commence such action at any time within three years after the removal of the disability." The question is, what is the meaning of the phrase, "any legal disability to sue," as here used? This provision does not define the term "legal disability." It assumes that there are other disabilities known to the law, and we must go to the law as it existed outside of this section to ascertain what they are. The provision mentions "minors," and adds, "or others under any legal disability."

Upon turning to the general statute of limitations we find specified as disabilities, infancy, insanity, imprisonment for criminal offenses, coverture, etc., but neither in that nor in any other statute is anything of the kind now claimed as a disability, named or recognized as such. The definition of "disability," as given by Bouvier, is "The want of legal capacity to do a thing." Bouv. Dict. The disability may relate to the power to contract, or to bring suits; and may arise out of want of sufficient understanding, as idiocy, lunacy, infancy; or, want of freedom of will, as in the case of married women, and persons under duress; or out of the policy of the law, as alienage when the alien is an enemy, outlawry, attainder, praemunire, and the like. The disability is something pertaining to the person of the party—a personal incapacity—and not to the cause of action or his relation to it. There must be a present right of action in the person, but some want of capacity to sue. In this case there was no want of power, or capacity in the person. The difficulty is in his relation to the subject-matter of the suit. There was no present right of action in the heir, or his vendee. He had not yet succeeded to the right of action. The cause of action had accrued, but it was in the administrator, and had not yet passed to the heir. There was, however, a party in existence competent to sue—one to whom the law gives the right, and upon whom it imposes the duty to sue. This party is the administrator who is the trustee of the estate, and who for this purpose represents both the heirs and the creditors of the estate. He represents the title. If the administrator sues, or is sued, and fails when the title is in issue and determined, the judgment is binding both upon the heirs and the creditors of the estate. The matters thus adjudged would afterwards be res adjudicata between the opposing party in the action and the heirs, as well as the administrator. This has also been settled by the supreme court of the state. Cunningham v. Ashley, 45 Cal. 485. This could not be so unless the administrator represented the heirs. The disability mentioned is undoubtedly one of the disabilities already existing recognized by the statute, such as those mentioned in the statute of limitations affecting the capacity to sue of a person having a present right of action existing in himself, and which excuses him from bringing the action. It cannot mean the want of a present cause of action. If there is no present right of action in a party, he has no occasion for a present capacity, an ability, to sue, or, for an excuse for not suing. The administrator being invested with the right of action to recover land of the estate, if he neglects to sue too long the action is barred, and as he represents the creditors and heirs for this purpose, it has often been decided that when an action is barred as to him, it is barred as to the heir, even though the heir be at the time a minor, or resting under some other disability. Darnell v. Adams, 13 B. Mon. 278, 279; Couch's Heirs v. Couch's Adm'r, 9 B. Mon. 161, 162; Rosson v. Anderson, Id. 425; Williams v. Otey, 8 Humph. 569; Wooldridge v. Planter's Bank, 1 Sneed, 297; Worthy v. Johnson, 10 Ga. 358; Long v. Cason, 4 Rich. Eq. Cas. 60; Wych v. East India Co., 3 P. Wms. 309; Pentland v. Stokes, 2 Ball & B. 74; Smilie v. Biffle, 2 Barr. [2 Pa. St.] 52. Several of these are cases of administrators, and others of other trustees, where the cestui que trust was held to be barred when the trustee was barred. It is difficult to see how upon principle it should be otherwise. The moment an adverse possession by a wrong doer, of lands belonging to an estate in course of administration commences, a cause of action arises to recover it; but the policy of the law vests it exclusively in the administrator, and there it remains until the lands are lawfully sold and conveyed for purposes of administration, or are distributed to the heir. In the former case the right of action passes to the purchaser; in the latter to the heir. It is the same cause of action, and it exists in but one party at the same time. If the cause of action is barred before the sale and conveyance to the purchaser, or the distribution to the heir, there is none left to pass to either, and neither ever acquires any valid cause of action at all. If the authorities cited are not all wrong, the difficulty with the plaintiff is, not that he was laboring under a disability to sue upon an existing cause of action in his favor, but that he never became vested with a living cause of action. The cause of action became barred, and the title vested in the adverse possessor under the special statute of limitations before it came to him. Statutes of limitations are now regarded as statutes of repose, and not mere penalties for neglect, and are intended for the benefit of those who have purchased and occupied lands in good faith, believing they acquired a good title; and the policy of the law seems to have been, to shorten the time within which rights acquired in good faith under the sanction of judicial proceedings in probate courts can be disturbed. Whether as effective as desirable or not, the heirs are not without a remedy. They have a remedy against the administrator and upon the administrators' bond; and they may, in a proper proceeding, also compel the administrator to sue. Smilie v. Biffle, 2 Barr. [2 Pa. St.] 52–54; Tyler v. Houghton, 25 Cal. 29. Besides, it is not apparent in this case why the partial distribution could not have been made as well within three years, as more than thirteen years after the sale, and thus have enabled the distributees to sue. There must have been gross negligence on the part of the heirs in not compelling the several administrators to account, and in not applying for a distribution. Ample funds appear to have come to the hands of the administrator to pay all claims against the estate as early as 1855. If the heirs are not bound where the bar has attached as against the administrator, the administration, by the non-action of the heirs, might be kept open indefinitely, and the right of action prolonged for a century at their option.

The defendants entered under their conveyances in 1856. If, as claimed by plaintiff, the whole proceedings were void, a right of action accrued in favor of the administrator to recover possession immediately; and it was barred as to him at the end of three years, or in February, 1859. The partial distribution to plaintiff was not made till November, 1869, more than ten years after the bar of the statute attached as against the administrator. If the cause of action is not barred as to the heirs and the plaintiff, their successor in interest, then, we have this curious condition of things.

For upwards of ten years the defendants were wrongfully in possession of the land, and yet there was no right of action in favor of anybody to recover. The administrator could not recover because he was barred. The heirs could not recover because the law vested the right of action exclusively in the administrator. The heirs would at length acquire the land, while it would cease to be assets of the estate, and the creditors be cut off. Why should the creditors, who, under the statute, have the first lien upon the estate, be barred by the neglect of the administrator, while the heirs, whose interest is subordinate, are not? The language of the statute is express, that "no action shall be maintained by any heir or other person claiming under the deceased testator or intestate, unless it be commenced within three years next after the sale." The heir is named in terms.

The plaintiff's counsel insists that under our statute the heir occupies a position similar to a remainderman; that the remainderman is not barred by the neglect of the holder of the preceding estate to sue until his right is lost, and that for similar reasons, the heir is not barred by the failure of the administrator to sue. The decisions relating to remaindermen seem to depend upon the particular language of the various statutes under which they arose, and to vary with the language. But whatever the rule may be with respect to remaindermen, I do not think their position is like that of the heir under our statute. The owner of the particular estate and the remaindermen do not represent the same estate. There is no connection whatever between them, except that one estate begins where the other shall end. The intermediate owner is in no respect the trustee or representative of the remainderman. But the administrator is a trustee of the heir and the creditor. He represents the heir and the creditor in the administration. As we have seen, a judgment in a suit to which the administrator is a party, and in which the title to the estate is determined, binds the heir. This must be because he represents the heir. I put the decision upon the statute, and upon this principle as sustained by the authorities. The same statute which vests the right to the exclusive possession of the real estate, and the exclusive right of action to recover it from a disseisor pending administration, and which confers the power to sell and convey title to the real estate under the authority and direction of the probate court. also prescribes the time within which an action must be brought by the heir or any other party claiming under the deceased, to recover the land from a purchaser in possession under a sale improperly made. It also prescribes the exceptions to the general rule laid down, and the court is not authorized upon the idea that other cases are within the equity, though not within the letter of the statute, to interpolate other exceptions than those expressed in the statute itself. McIver v. Ragan, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 28; Tynan v. Walker, 35 Cal. 643.

Sections 258, 259, providing for a final distribution to the parties entitled, and providing that each party to whom a specific portion is allotted, "shall have the right to demand and recover their respective shares from the executor, administrator, or any person having the same in possession," in no respect limit the provisions of section 190, as claimed by plaintiff. These sections only apply to property belonging to the estate at the time of distribution. Of course, there can be no title created by the act of distribution. Nothing can be given to the distributee but that which remains in possession or custody of the administrator, as a portion of the estate. Property lawfully sold by the administrator and conveyed by valid conveyance, ceases to be a portion of the estate; and the fact that the court should assume to distribute such property to the heir would not revest a title in the distributee. The adverse possession for the time prescribed vests a perfect title in the possessor as against the former holder of the title and all the world. Arrington v. Liscom, 34 Cal. 380-387; Cannon v. Stockmon, 36 Cal. 541; Lamb v. Davenport [Case No. 8,015]; Winthrop v. Benson, 31 Me. 384; Leffingwell v. Warren, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 605, and cases therein cited.

Suppose an action upon a promissory note or other demand or to recover a piece of personal property belonging to the estate had become barred under the general statute of limitations by neglect of the administrator to sue, would it be claimed that a subsequent distribution of the dead cause of action to the heir, would give it new life and enable him to recover on it? I think no such claim would be made. Yet sections 258, 259, would as clearly apply to such cause of action as to real estate, the title to which has been vested in an adverse possessor under the section in question. I see no way of escape from the conclusion that plaintiff's action is barred under section 190 of the probate act. There must be a judgment for defendants with costs, and it is so ordered.

[The cause was taken by the plaintiff, on a writ of error, to the supreme court, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. 100 U. S. 564.]

Case No. 9,393a.

MEERSE v. ALLEN.

[Betts, Scr. Bk. 599.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 14, 1859.

PLEADING IN EQUITY—PATENTS—INFRINGEMENT—MULTIFARIOUSNESS—AVERMENT OF TITLE.

[1. A bill in equity to restrain infringement of patents is not demurrable for multifariousness, because charging that defendant's machine contains all the improvements contained in complainant's several patents, thereby infringing the same.]

[2. Complainant on such a bill need not set forth a deduction of title to the patents by numerous assignments, a simple averment that the title was vested in him is sufficient.]

[This was a bill in equity by Joel Meerse and others against R. L. Allen. Defendant demurs to the bill.]

NELSON, Circuit Justice. First. This is a demurrer to a bill in equity filed to restrain the defendant from the infringement of several patents for improvements in a reaping machine. The demurrer is grounded mainly upon the multifariousness of the matters set forth in the bill, namely, four distinct and several patents for as many improvements entering into the construction of what is claimed to be a perfect reaper. These improvements as patented are not limited to the improvement of any particular machine, but are intended to be used in any or all the variety of instruments of this class. Nor do all of them enter into the construction of the machine as necessarily connected together in practical operation and use; any one or more of them may be omitted. Hence it is argued that the bill sets up distinct and independent matters wholly unconnected, and in which the defendant is compelled in his answer to unite different and distinct matters pending upon different and distinct proofs, thus complicating and embarrassing the defence. It is undoubtedly true that four different claims set forth in the bill upon which the defendant is sought to be enjoined, and for the alleged infringements of which damages are claimed, call for separate and distinct defences, and the objection to the bill on the ground of multifariousness in a general sense, would seem to be well founded, within the settled rules of equity pleading. But on looking at the case made in the bill, we are inclined to think the objection not maintainable. The bill charges that the machine made and used by the defendants, sought to be enjoined, contains all the improvements embraced in the several patents, and hence the act of making, vending or using a single machine constitutes an infringement on all of them. The several improvements being capable of a combined use, and being thus connected by the defendant, the convenience of both parties, as well as a saving of expenses in litigation, would seem to be committed in embracing all the patents in one suit. A court of chancery allows distinct and separate causes of complaint between the same parties to be joined in one, in order to avoid multiplicity of actions, unless it is apparent that the defence will be seriously embarrassed by confounding different and unconnected issues and proofs in the litigation. In this case, although the defence as it respects the several improvements may be different and unconnected, yet, according to the allegations in the bill so far as the question of making or using a machine is concerned, the infringement of all of them is involved, and to this extent they are connected with each other. We agree if one of these improvements had been charged to have been used upon one machine and another upon a different machine there would have been much force in the objections taken to the bill. But in the respect in which the case is thus presented, we think them not well founded. It has not been unusual in actions at law, in case of alleged infringements of patents, to count upon two or more patented improvements upon the same machine.

Second. It is also objected that the bill does not set forth a complete title to the several patents in the complainants. The pleader has set a deduction of the title by numerous assignments which leave the question of title exceedingly complicated, but as far as we have been able to look into it, we discovered no defect, we think this deduction of title unnecessary, and that a simple averment that the title to the patents was vested in the complainants would have been sufficient. Such an averment is found in this bill in addition to the special title set forth.

The demurrer is overruled and the defendants directed to answer.

MEGRAW v. CARROLL et al.

[5 Ban. & A. 324.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. April, 1880.

PATENTS—INFRINGEMENT—BRUSH BLOCK—SAME EFFECT.

The complainant's patent consisting in cutting a groove of considerable depth in a brush block, and in nailing the bristles through a leather strip into the groove, so that the butts of the bristles being bent into the curve formed by the groove are thus fastened more securely, and are made to spread and flare, giving the brush a fuller and handsomer appearance, is infringed by nailing on the brush block a narrow strip about as thick as, and in lieu of, the groove, and which has the same effect.

[This was a bill filed by Evalena L. Megraw against J. Bond Carroll and others to restrain certain alleged infringements.]

Charles Marshall and G. H. Howard, for complainant.

W. H. Cowan, for defendants.

Before BOND, Circuit Judge, and MORRIS, District Judge.

This is a bill for injunction and account, alleging that the respondents are infringing patent No. 160,933, granted March 16th, 1875, to William A. Megraw, for an improvement in brushes, which patent now belongs by assignment to the complainant.

The invention consists in cutting a groove of considerable depth in the brush block, and in nailing the bristles through a leather strip into the groove, so that the butts of the bristles being bent into the curve formed by the groove, they are thus fastened more securely, and are made to spread and flare, giving the brush a fuller and handsomer appearance, making it more salable, and, it is claimed, more serviceable. The defences set up in the answer are want of novelty and absence of utility in the invention, and a denial that the brushes manufactured by the respondent are an infringement of the complainant's patent.

The evidence produced by the respondents, tending to show use of the same device by others prior to the date of the application for the Megraw patent, has failed, in our judgment, to countervail the presumption which the issuing of the patent creates in favor of the patentee, and the testimony of the witnesses in support of its novelty. It appears that in the old tied brush there was always a small groove in the block, the only purpose of which, however, was to sink the knot of the cord. It was not used at all on the brushes made with straps and nails. But it does not appear that there was any thought then of having the groove deep enough to serve any useful purpose in connection with brushes made in that manner. No one had then, so far as the evidence shows, brought into use the idea of having the groove of a considerable depth, and of forcing the butts of the bristles to bend into it, and, by that means, prevent their being pushed up or pulled out, and at the same time give them a flare, and spreading them. This was the invention of Megraw, and the remarkable increase in the demand for brushes of the class that are now made in that mode, as shown by the testimony, together with the respondents' substantial imitation of it, and the direct testimony of the complainant's witnesses, are conclusive proofs of its usefulness. The brushes made by the respondents do not have a deep groove cut in the brush block, but in lieu thereof a narrow strip about as thick as the groove is deep, nailed on the block, which has the same effect as the groove and is, obviously, and indeed confessedly, put on to produce that effect. A groove or channel can as well be made by nailing a narrow strip on and thus raising the surface of the block as by cutting a strip out and thus sinking a groove into it. This is what the respondents have done, and we are satisfied that one is the mechanical equivalent of the other.

In our judgment, the complainant is entitled to the relief prayed for in her bill, and we will so decree.

Case No. 9,394.

MEIER et al. v. KANSAS PAC. RY. et al.

[4 Dill. 378.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Kansas. 1877.

UNITED STATES—SUITS AGAINST—MORTGAGEE.

Whether the United States can compulsorily be made a defendant to a foreclosure bill where it holds a lien or mortgage on the property in respect of which the foreclosure is sought, quaere?

The bill [by Adolphus Meier and others against Kansas Pacific Railway and others], which was originally filed in the state court, seeks to foreclose a mortgage on the railway and property of the Kansas Pacific Company —one of the companies aided by congress in what is known as the Pacific system of railroads. The United States, under the legislation of congress, has certain rights in and liens on the property, and was made a defendant to the bill, but has entered no appearance.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

After the suit was removed to this court, the complainants' solicitor made the application set forth in the opinion of the court.

J. P. Usher, for the motion.

Before MILLER, Circuit Justice, and DILLON, Circuit Judge.

PER CURIAM. The solicitor for the complainants has filed in this court the following motion: "Complainants move the court that a motion, under the seal of this court, be issued, respectfully addressed to the attorney-general of the United States, notifying him that a suit has been instituted against the United States of America in this court, accompanied by a copy of the petition or bill of complaint, and requesting the attorney-general to appear and state whether the United States of America claim any rights in the premises which are the subject matter of this action, and whether the United States desire any adjudication of their rights in the premises to be made, and to show cause, if any he has, why the prayer of the bill shall not be granted. J. P. Usher, Solicitor for Complainants."

In support of this application, the complainants' solicitor has referred the court to the case of Elliot v. Van Voorst [Case No. 4,390], in which the late Mr. Justice Grier held that a mortgagee may have an effectual decree of foreclosure where the United States is the owner of the equity of redemption, on a notice given in such manner as the court may prescribe, if the land be not held for government purposes.

We grant the motion for which the complainants ask, but we do not thereby commit the court to the proposition that it can, on the final hearing, pronounce a decree against the United States without an authorized appearance by the attorney-general. This question is reserved. That officer, on being notified of this order, can take such action as he may be advised by asking the direction of congress, or by appearing or declining to appear in the cause on behalf of the United States. Let an order be entered and served in conformity with the motion. Ordered accordingly.

Subsequently the attorney-general directed the district attorney to apply for leave for the United States to enter its appearance and to plead.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—RECEIVER — APPOINTMENT —REMOVAL.

1. Principles upon which receivers should be selected stated.

2. A receiver should be an impartial person, not interested in the litigation or the partisan of any of the litigant parties.

[Cited in Wood v. Oregon Development Co., 55 Fed. 902.]

3. Neither a non-resident receiver of a railway corporation, nor more than one receiver, should ordinarily be appointed.

4. Where two receivers were originally appointed as the representatives of different interests which became hostile, leading to dissensions and unnecessary expense, both were removed and a single disinterested resident receiver appointed.

[Cited in Wood v. Oregon Development Co., 55 Fed. 902.]

Motion [by Adolphus Meier] to remove H. Villard, one of the receivers heretofore appointed by the state court, from whence this cause was removed. Mr. Carlos S. Greeley was the other receiver. The circumstances under which they were appointed, the grounds upon which the removal was sought, and the action of the court and the reasons for such action, appear in the opinions of the judges.

J. P. Usher and others, for the motion.

A. H. Holmes and others, opposed.

Before MILLER, Circuit Justice, and FOSTER, District Judge.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. I think the action of Mr. Greeley, in the paper which he sent to the court, relieves the court of the only serious embarrassment which the case presented, namely, the difficulty of removing one of two receivers who had become hostile to each other in their feelings and actions in relation to their duties, thereby leaving the other in sole possession of the field. As no motion was made to remove Mr. Greeley, and as, therefore, no charges against him were properly before us, it would hardly have been just to him for the court to remove him sua sponte. Nor do I think, for reasons which I shall presently suggest, if Mr. Villard was to be removed, and Mr. Greeley remain, that any one should be appointed in place of the former. Mr. Greeley having, with much consideration, expressed to the judges his willingness to give up his receivership if his retaining it would embarrass their actions, we are happily relieved of that difficulty.

I am of opinion that both receivers should be removed, and a single receiver appointed, for the following reasons:

1. The existence of two receivers is unnecessary and embarrassing, even if they were on amicable terms and had but a single place of business at or near the theater of the road's operations. They are obviously unnecessary as regards the successful operation of this road, which I assume to be the principal—if not the only—purpose for which a court should appoint receivers. If they should chance to disagree about the management of the road or the exercise of any functions of their office, as they have done in this case, the difficulty of the successful or proper discharge of their duties becomes manifest. When, in addition to this want of harmony, they establish separate places of business a thousand miles apart, and neither of them within two hundred miles of the road whose operations they are to control, it is apparent, without argument, that the hand of the court which they are must be, if not paralyzed, rendered very inefficient and uncertain in its grasp and control of the business of the company.

2. There is no necessity and a manifest impropriety in having a receiver located in New York. It is true, many such Western corporations as this have offices in New York, at which much of the financial business of the companies is transacted. But this has always been felt to be a grievance by the people of the West, whose business the road does, and by which alone it can live, and when such a company comes under the control of a court by reason of its insolvency, and a receiver is appointed to take charge of it, such control as the court can exercise over the operations of the road, and in collecting and disbursing its receipts, can be most safely used, exercised, and more strictly under the eye of the court, by an officer residing within its jurisdiction. I think, therefore, on general principles, and on the facts of this case, there was no necessity for a receiver in the city of New York.

3. I am of opinion that the receivership in New York should be abolished in the interest of economy. Its expenses are unnecessary and excessive. No reason can be perceived for the employment of three firms of lawyers —each firm composed of several members— for any business properly pertaining to the receivership [and the expenditure of $42,000 in that office inside of two years seems to me to be unwarranted by any requirements of a receiver's duties].[2]

4. The main argument against any action by the court is that Mr. Greeley and Mr. Villard were appointed by an agreement between the parties interested, and at their instance, because they represented certain classes of lien creditors of the company, and that to remove Mr. Villard would be to sacrifice one of those interests, or at least to leave it unprotected. There can be no doubt that such was the motive which led to the appointment of two receivers instead of one, and there can be as little doubt that it was a mistake to have done this, whatever the motive. But while a court may very properly conform its action in such a matter to the wishes of all the parties interested in the suit, when their wishes harmonize, it must consider for itself what is proper to be done when that harmony is turned into hostility, so that the two receivers represent two hostile camps, each intent upon securing the whole or the larger share of the spoils. It then becomes a duty of the court to see that its powers are exercised on principles of strict neutrality as regards the belligerents, and this can only be done in this case by removing the representatives of these hostile interests and appointing a receiver who, in feeling and in conduct, will be strictly neutral and strictly honest. The foundation of the agreement by which Greeley and Villard were appointed has given way, and the only possible excuse for appointing two receivers is gone. I have only a word to add.

In my view, a receiver is strictly and solely the officer of the court. By reason of the inability or neglect of the officers of the corporation to conduct its business as it ought to be done, the conduct of that business is taken charge of by the court and carried on by its agent. It is the duty of that agent so to conduct the business as that the lawful rights and legal interest of all persons in the property and in the business shall be protected, as far as possible, with equal and exact justice. This is much more likely to be done by a receiver who has no interest in the capital stock of the road, none in its debts, and no obligations to those who have. Such a person, acting under the control of the court, seeking its advice (as he would be inclined to do in all questions of doubtful duty), and bound in a sufficient surety for the faithful performance of his duty, is, in my opinion, the proper one for such an office. While it may be true that a large personal interest may stimulate the activity and direct the vigilance of the receiver, it is equally true that such vigilance, whenever occasion offers, will be directed unduly to advancing that personal interest and that activity to securing personal advantages.

For these reasons, I think that the offices of the two receivers should be consolidated into one, that both the present receivers should be discharged, and that one living in the state in which the road mainly lies, and where its business operations are conducted, and who also has the requisite capacity and knowledge of the business, and the honesty and firmness to discharge his duty faithfully, free from the influence of the hostile interest in the case, should be appointed.

FOSTER, District Judge. In addition to what has already been said by Mr. Justice MILLER, I have but a few words to offer. At the time of the appointment of the two receivers in this case, the parties then before the court, or at least the parties controlling the proceedings, plaintiffs and defendants, were acting in harmony, and agreed upon Mr. Villard and Mr. Greeley as the receivers—the former as representing the Denver extension bondholders, and the latter the defendant company and junior securities. The theory of the parties seems to have been that the different interests should be represented and protected by the different receivers. So long as harmony prevailed among these diverse interests, no difficulty was experienced in operating the road under this double management, excepting the additional expense of two receivers and the delay occasioned in transacting the business with their offices a thousand miles apart. But, eventually, the different interests antagonized each other, and whether one party or the other is in fault we need not stop to inquire, for we cannot discriminate between these interests in deciding who shall be the receiver of this property. Suffice it to say, the theory upon which these two receivers were appointed has failed in the practical management of the road, and the only clear way out of the difficulty is to go back to the general principles upon which a court acts in taking the custody of property through its receiver. And nothing can be more apparent than that this officer of the court should stand indifferent between the contending parties. He should act on rules of strict neutrality. He should aim to manage and operate the road to the best advantage, neither favoring one party or the other, but leaving all to seek protection and adjustment of their rights through the adjudication of the court. Upon these principles we must act in this case, and the several reasons so clearly stated by Mr. Justice MILLER, and in which I fully concur, demonstrate not only the necessity but the advantages of such a course.

Therefore, an order will be made removing both Villard and Greeley as receivers, to take effect on some day to be named in the near future, and upon the appointment and qualification of a successor, to whom they will deliver possession of all the property (real and personal), moneys, books, and all other effects of the defendant railway company in their hands as receivers. Ordered accordingly.

Case No. 9,396.

MEIGS v. SUN MUT. INS. CO.

[17 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 183.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June, 1847.

MARINE INSURANCE—PROPERLY MANNED—END OF VOYAGE—TEMPORARY ANCHORAGE.

[1. The fact that a ship has performed her voyage and arrived at her home port in safety raises a presumption that she had been all the time properly manned and in every respect seaworthy, and it devolves upon insurers of the cargo defending against a suit for loss by fire, to prove that at the time of loss she had not a full complement of men.]

[2. To terminate a risk upon a marine policy insuring a vessel against loss, until she arrived at the port from which she started after her voyage and had been "moored 24 hours in safety," the voyage must have ended by the arrival of the vessel at the port of delivery, and anchoring her with a view to end the voyage at her proper station at that port for the delivery of cargo.]

[3. Merely dropping anchor in the harbor short of the usual anchorage grounds, for temporary purposes, and especially if from necessity or on account of the character of the navigation or of the harbor is not such a mooring.]

This was an action [by Loring Meigs against the Sun Mutual Insurance Company] to recover the amount of a marine policy of insurance, effected on the ship Joseph Meigs, on a whaling voyage from Mattapoisett, Massachusetts. The terms of the policy were, that it was to continue in effect until the vessel arrived at the same port, after her voyage, and had been moored 24 hours in safety. The vessel reached home in November, 1844, and was anchored within a mile and a half of the dock, for the purpose of lightening her, as it was supposed that she drew too much water to proceed to the usual landing place, without first taking out some of her cargo. She was, therefore, kept at anchor, three-quarters of a mile from the wharf, for seven or eight days, during which lighters were employed unloading her; and, while in this position, she took fire from lightning, or some other cause which did not appear, and was totally destroyed, and the insured now seek to recover the amount of their loss. For the defence it was contended that the policy had expired before she was destroyed, as she had arrived at her port of destination, and was safely moored 24 hours before the fire took place, and that, therefore, the insurers were not responsible.

NELSON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). This was an action on a policy of insurance taken out on the Joseph Meigs, a whaling ship, her outfit and tackle, to continue for a limited period of time, until her return, after her cruise and safe arrival, at the same port, and until she was there moored at the wharf 24 hours in good safety. In order to call your attention to the material part of the policy, I will refer to it in its terms, as the whole question depends on a proper understanding of a particular clause, namely, the clause indicating the termination of the voyage and risk. The defendant, on the 24th of September, 1844, at noon, made an insurance on a vessel, at and from Mattapoisett, on a whaling voyage, to continue until said vessel had safely arrived at Mattapoisett, and until moored 24 hours in good safety. This is the material clause on which the whole case hangs, taken in conjunction with the clause, "until the same shall be safely landed." This clause differs materially in respect to the insurance of the ship and cargo. With respect to the ship, the risk ends on the arrival of the same at the port of Mattapoisett, and on being there moored 24 hours in good safety. But as respects the cargo, the risk does not end until the same is safely landed.

In respect to the cargo, the first objection taken to the right of the plaintiff to recover, is that, in point of fact, at the time of the loss—that is, the destruction of the ship and cargo by fire—the vessel was not seaworthy, for the reason that she had not on board a competent number of hands to take care of the ship, and to keep watch. But the fact that the ship had performed her voyage, and arrived at her home port in safety, for aught that appeared to the contrary, the presumption of fact is that she had been all the time properly manned, and in every respect seaworthy; and, as I apprehend, it devolves on the insurers to prove that at the particular time of the loss, she was not manned with a proper complement of hands. If that fact is established to your satisfaction, it is a sufficient answer to as much of the case as it covers, namely, in respect to her cargo. If not, then the plaintiff is entitled to your verdict on that branch of the case. The main question is in respect to the ship, and, as has been very properly stated by counsel on the trial, the simple question on this branch of the case is, whether this voyage had ended, within the meaning of the clause in the policy, before the loss of the vessel, by destruction from fire.

On the part of the defendant it is insisted that it did, and the plaintiff says that it did not. This clause is inserted in the policy for the purpose of indicating the termination of the voyage, and contains the express stipulations of the parties on the subject. The decision of the case, you will therefore see, involves the necessary and proper understanding of this clause, when applied to the particular voyage in question. Now, as a general rule, I lay down this to be the meaning of that clause, namely, that in order to terminate the risk on the part of the underwriters, by virtue of this clause, the voyage must have ended by the arrival of the vessel at the port of delivery, and the anchoring her at the usual anchorage ground in that port, for the delivery of her cargo. I, of course, refer to the port of delivery in which the voyage is to terminate. The question as to what is the usual anchorage ground, in any given port, is of course a question of fact, and depends on the usage and custom of that port. And several of the witnesses in this case have proved the fact, that every port has its particular anchorage ground. The mere dropping of the anchor in the harbor, short of the usual anchorage ground, for temporary purposes, and especially if from necessity, or on account of the character of the navigation, or on account of the harbor, under the view that I take of the case, proves nothing. It must be a dropping of the anchor for securing the vessel at the end of the voyage, and with a view to end the voyage, and for the purpose of securing the ship in its proper station, in the port of delivery, for the purpose of unloading the cargo. It is for the jury to say whether, in this sense of the policy, the vessel was moored in safety more than 24 hours, and that the policy expired before the destruction of the vessel. I regard the main question as one of fact for the jury to determine, under the instructions I have given you. You will, therefore, say whether, on the whole case, was casting anchor at the usual place for large vessels, drawing 13 feet of water, with a view to lighten her—was that casting anchor, in the meaning of this clause of the policy, at the usual anchoring ground of that harbor, or was the usual anchoring ground at the wharf, which is the usual place for unloading the cargo?

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for $10,500, being the full amount of the policy, subject to liquidation.

MEISSNER et al. v. DEVOE MANUF'G CO.

[9 Blatchf. 363; 2 O. G. 545; 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 285.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 27, 1872.

PATENTS—STOP-VALVES FOR PETROLEUM—CUP-SHAPED—CONVEX-FORM.

The letters patent granted to Albin Warth, April 19, 1870, for an improvement in stop-valves for petroleum packages, make, in each one of their two claims, a cup-shaped disk, a material part of the invention, such disk being a valve-seat for a valve, and having the effect, by reason of being cup-shaped, to sink the valve within the package, so that there shall be no part projecting outside. The cup-shaped form of the disk is made, by the specification and claims, an essential part of the invention. Such patent is not infringed by a stop-valve of convex-form, not suspended below the surface of the package, though in other respects constructed like the patented arrangement.

This was a final hearing, on pleadings and proofs, of a suit in equity [by Frederick Meissner and others against the Devoe Manufacturing Company], founded on letters patent [No. 102,187], granted to Albin Warth, April 19th, 1870, for an improvement in stop valves for petroleum packages. The specification said: "This invention consists in the arrangement of a cup-shaped flanged disk, provided with a vent-hole, with a discharge opening, and with a central hole, and with a flat internal face, said central hole being intended to receive a screw, which is tapped into the solid body of a valve covered with leather or other suitable packing, in such a manner that, by means of its flange, the disk can be readily soldered to the side of a petroleum package or case for carrying petroleum or other liquid, without producing an objectionable projection on said package, and that, by turning the screw in and out, the valve can be readily opened and closed, the valve being prevented from turning with the screw, and from dropping off, by hook-shaped arms, extending from the inner surface of the cup-shaped disk, and bearing against lugs projecting from the periphery of the valve. When the valve is opened, the contents of the case or package can be readily poured out through the discharge-spout, the vent-hole admitting the external air into said case. In the drawing, the letter A represents a case or package made of tinned sheet-iron, or any other suitable material, and capable of containing petroleum or other liquids, particularly such as are intended for transportation. In one side of this case is secured a stop-valve, B, which consists of a cup-shaped disk, provided with a flange, a, and perforated with three holes, (see Figs. 2 and 3,) one in the centre, to receive the screw, b, and two on the sides, the hole, c, being the vent, and the hole, d, the discharge-opening, of the case. The head of the screw, b, is provided with a circular shoulder, to catch under a lip, e, projecting from the edge of the central hole in the cup-shaped disk, and to the bottom of said disk is secured a plate, f, so that the head is confined in a chamber, and prevented from moving in the direction of the axis of the screw. The plate, f, is smoothed off on its exposed surface, so that it forms a seat for the valve, g, and said plate is provided with two hook-shaped arms, h, which form guides for the valve, and prevent the same from dropping off, and also from turning round, said valve being provided with lugs projecting from its periphery, and bearing against the edges of the arms, h. The valve, g, is cast of Babbitt metal, or other suitable material, and it is provided with a socket to receive the screw, b. The face of the valve is covered with a disk, i, of leather, or other suitable material, which is retained by studs cast solid with the valve, and riveted over said disk, as shown. The flange, a, is soldered to the side of the case, A, the head of the screw being situated in the cavity of the cup-shaped disk, so that no part of the valve projects materially beyond the face of the case. By turning the screw, b, in the proper direction, the valve, and the holes, c and d, are opened, so that the contents of the case can be poured out through the discharge-opening, d, the external air having free access to the interior of the case, through the vent-hole, c. By screwing up the screw, b, the valve is closed, and the case is hermetically sealed. The nip of the screw, b, is dove-tailed, to receive a handle, C, of the proper form, for the purpose of operating the same. It (the screw) may, however, be also operated by means of an ordinary screw-driver. If desired, the cup-shaped disk of the valve, together with the hook-shaped arms, h, may be produced by casting, and, in this case, the lip, e, is omitted, and the screw is prevented from moving in the direction of its axis, by a pin passing through it under the cup-shaped disk, as shown in Fig. 2. This valve is of particular value for petroleum packages, which are transported across the ocean in very large quantities, and which have to be hermetically sealed, and, at the same time, so constructed, that their surfaces have no projecting parts, and that the contents of the package can be readily drawn off." The claims were these: "1. The cup-shaped disk, suspended within the package, A, receiving the screw, b, and forming a valve-seat, in combination with the valve, g, suspended from the screw between guides, h, substantially as and for the purpose described. 2. The vent-hole, c, and discharge-opening, d, in the cup-shaped disk, in combination with the central screw, and with the valve and the guide-arms, all constructed and operating substantially as described."

John Van Santvoord, for plaintiffs.
George Gifford, for defendants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. I deem it highly probable that the stop-valve made by the defendants, when considered in reference to its construction, and its office and function, as a mere stop-valve, is substantially like that described in the complainants' patent, and that, if the latter had been described and claimed by the patentee independently of the precise form and location of the parts, and of the material office or function which such precise form and location perform in the combination described, the stop-valve of the defendants must have been declared an infringement. But, the patentee has seen fit, by his specification and claim, to confine the right secured to him within much narrower limits. He does not, in his specification, claim that either part used in the construction of his stop-valve is new, or that any number of the parts, not including a cup-shaped disk by means of which the whole apparatus is sunk below the outer surface of the oil can, are new in their combination with each other.

Viewing the device, as described and claimed in either the first or second claim, as a combination of parts not new, the cup-shaped disk is, by each claim, made a material part of the invention. The form of the disk is material. Without the form described, the result at which the invention is directed, and which is represented as its peculiar feature, would not be effected, that is to say, without that form, it would not be a stop-valve which could be applied to packages for transportation, so that their surfaces would have "no projecting parts." It is, therefore, not (as represented in the specification and claim) a case in which form is not of the substance of the combination.

Viewing the device, as described and claimed, as a machine or structure—for, all machines and structures are, in a literal sense, combinations of things, old or new—the same observations are applicable. The patentee has made the peculiar disk which he describes, and which forms the valve-seat, a prominent feature. He has done so in both of his claims, and, in his specification, he represents the immediate and necessary effect of that form of disk as constituting the peculiarity of his stop-valve and its especial utility.

It is quite possible that he might have claimed this identical stop-valve, useful, and adapted for use, in admitting oil to a can or vessel, enclosing it tightly within the can, and, at pleasure, to be opened for discharging it therefrom, and to be inserted in the end or side of the can or vessel, according to the judgment of the manufacturer of such can or vessel. Had he done this, the question whether the defendants' stop-valve is within the claim would have been a very different one. Here he has chosen to define the object or result of his invention, to describe the parts thereof, and to specify the form, without which the object in view would not be attained.

The defendants do not use the parts in the same form, nor in an equivalent form. and do not produce the same result. The change they have made in the form of the disk constituting the valve-seat, is such as necessarily defeats the purpose for which the complainants' device was intended, and which it accomplishes. The defendants' disk is, therefore, not an equivalent to that used by the complainants. It has not the same effective operation. Instead of suspending the stop-valve below the surface of the can or vessel, by its convex form, it rises, necessarily, above that surface, and carries still higher the parts with which it is connected, thus doing the very thing which the complainants, by the peculiar form of their disk or valve-seat, profess to avoid and do avoid. The conclusion cannot be escaped by saying that the difference is not in the material or essential characteristics of the device, but only in the degree of utility, that the defendants' device is the same in principle and in substantial structure, but that, by a change in the form of the valve-seat, by inverting it, the device is rendered less perfect and less useful. Under a specification and claim which might readily be suggested, this reasoning might be entirely just and true, and might render it necessary to pronounce the defendants' device an infringement. But the actual claims cannot be rejected. The complainants must stand or fall by the claims as made, and those, not only in terms, but when read and construed with reference to the whole specification, make the form of the disk a part of the complainants' structure, material to its location in connection with the can, and especially material to the function or effect designed to be produced, and in fact produced thereby. I think, therefore, that, under this patent, the complainants cannot reject the form of the valve-seat, and the location of the structure within the can, and allege that any form of valve-seat, and any location of the stop-valve, however projecting above the surface of the can, is an infringement of their claims, provided, in other respects, it is substantially like theirs. I think, that, in all other respects, the defendants' stop-valve does include the complainants', and all of its parts, in substantially the same form and manner of combination, and operating in substantially the same way, and producing the same result. The difference in the nut and screw, in the guide, and in the contrivance for preventing the turning of the valve, are not changes in the principle, or in the manner of operation, which would relieve their stop-valve from condemnation as an infringement. They are a mere substitution of equivalents. For this reason, it seems not improbable that the conclusion to which I am compelled is not because the actual invention of the complainants has not been infringed or copied by the defendants, but because the specification and claims upon which the patent is granted have so narrowed the ground on which they stand, that they fail to realize all the monopoly to which, in virtue of the actual invention, the patentee may have been entitled. If this be so, the court is, nevertheless, unable to relieve them. We can only deal with the rights of the complainants as they are defined in and secured by the letters patent; and, as there defined, my conclusion is that the defendants' stop-valve is not an infringement. The bill of complaint must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

MEISTER v. BISSELL et al.

SAME v. MOORE et al.

[22 Pittsb. Leg. J. 85; 32 Leg. Int. 5.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Dec. 21, 1874.[1]

MARRIAGE—IN MICHIGAN—HOW CELEBRATED.

Under the statutes of Michigan, it is essential to the validity of a marriage that it shall have been solemnized in the presence of a minister or magistrate and at least two witnesses.

[These were actions in ejectment brought by Rebecca Meister, executrix of Bernard L. Meister, against F. H. Bissell and others, and by the same plaintiff against Robert C. Moore and others, for the possession of certain property.]

Marston, Hatch & Cooley, of Bay City, Michigan, Ferguson & Murray, and Weir & Gibson, for plaintiff.

Holmes & Haynes, of Bay City, Michigan, Schoyer Acheson, Morrisons & Palmer, for defendants.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge (charging jury). Both parties claim the property, which is the subject of these suits under Dr. Peter Mowry, and thence to W. A. Mowry, one of his sons. The plaintiff is the alienee of the alleged wife and daughter of Wm. A. Mowry, and the defendants are his mother's vendees. Mrs. Eliza Mowry, in whom the title of the property was vested if he died unmarried and without issue. It is obvious then that the fundamental question in the case is, whether the Indian woman alleged to have been Mowry's wife was united to him by a valid marriage, and this is to be determined by the laws of the state where the marriage contract was made. So the plaintiff's counsel have requested me to instruct you, in the second point submitted by them, and that point is accordingly affirmed. The alleged marriage took place in the state of Michigan, in the latter part of the year 1845. From 1833, when the present state of Michigan was a territory, down to the present time, a statute on the relation of marriages has been in force, and during that period it has remained without essential changes. So far as we are advised, and we have had the benefit of the knowledge and researches of learned counsel from that state, on both sides, of these cases, there has not been any judicial construction of that statute or any determination of its effect, upon the marriage contracts, not made in conformity with its requirement. The only case touching it, to which we have been referred, decides that in so far as the age of consent is fixed by it, the common law is abrogated. We are therefore, left without the guidance of an authoritative exposition to ascertain its meaning, and declare its effects upon the marriage in question. The sixth section of the act authorizes the solemnization of marriages by justices of the peace, within the counties for which they are respectively chosen, and by resident or ordained ministers of any denomination at any place within the state. By the eighth section it is provided that "in the solemnization of marriages, no particular form shall be required, except that the parties shall solemnly declare in the presence of the magistrate or minister and the attending witnesses, that they take each other for husband and wife. In every case there shall be at least two witnesses besides the minister or magistrate, present at the ceremony." The requirements of the section are imperative and its meaning clear. It is expressly applicable to every case of the solemnization of marriage, or in other words, of the proposed creation of the marriage relation. No particular form is required to be observed in any case, but a magistrate or minister prescribed in the sixth section, and two witnesses shall be present, and before them the parties shall solemnly declare their assent to the contract. The co-existence of both conditions is imperatively prescribed, and the fulfilment of each is, therefore, indispensable to the lawful creation of the marriage relation.

This construction of the section is confirmed by subsequent sections of the act. Thus, the 14th section declares that, "No marriages solemnized before any person professing to be a justice of the peace, or a minister of the gospel, shall be deemed or adjudged to be void, nor shall the validity thereof be in any way affected on account of any want of jurisdiction or authority in such supposed justice or minister: provided, that the marriage be consummated with a full belief on the part of the persons marrying, or either of them, that they have lawfully been joined in marriage." Does not this recognize the necessary presence of a minister or magistrate invested with the jurisdiction defined in the sixth section of the act, at the solemnization of marriage, and declare in effect that only when it is solemnized in the presence of a person professing such character and authority, under a full belief of the persons so married, or either of them, that the pretended magistrate or minister was really such, shall not be deemed or adjudged invalid. But if the false pretence was known before the nuptials, or was discovered before the consummation of the marriage, is not the indication clear that the marriage shall be deemed or adjudged to be void? More certainly then would this result follow, where the presence of either of these functionaries was wilfully pretermitted. No less significant in this connection, is the next section of the act, which is in these words: "The preceding provisions, so far as they relate to the manner of solemnizing marriages, shall not affect marriage among the people called Friends or Quakers, nor marriages among the people called Mennonists. But such marriages may be solemnized in the manner heretofore used and practised in their respective societies." Now this section is certainly not to be assumed to be meaningless or intended to have been ineffective. What reason can there be assigned for its insertion, if it be not upon the hypothesis that the eighth section, to which it plainly refers, prescribed essential conditions in the ceremonies of marriage which were exclusive of all different modes of solemnizing it? It is well known that among the Quakers at least, there were no ordained ministers, and that in the solemnization of marriage among them the agency of a minister or civil magistrate, was not permitted. According to their practice, marriage was contracted by the declared acceptance by a man and woman of each other, as husband and wife in the presence of witnesses. This comprehended all that the common law required to constitute marriage, but it did not embrace all that the eighth section of the act prescribed. Why then were these people relieved from observances of the requirements of this section, when they omitted but a single one—the presence of a minister or magistrate—if such an omission would not otherwise invalidate the contract? Can there be any sufficient answer to this question, other than this, that the fulfillment of all the requirements of the section was essential to the validity of marriage, but as the observance of one of them was not practicable among Quakers, it was therefore necessary, to save the validity of their marriage, to exempt them from the operation of the section?

It is said, however, by some text writers, whose opinions are entitled to respect, that statutes regulating marriage are not to be construed to avoid marriages contracted in violation of some of their provisions, unless the acts contained express words of nullity. Although there is high authority against this statement of the law, it certainly has the apparent support of a number of decisions by courts of great respectability. But it should be predicated of what, in the sense of the statute, may be treated as irregularities, and of a non-observance of provisions simply directory, not of a disregard of conditions prescribed to be performed when the contract of marriage is made, and which constitute essential elements of the mode of its solemnization. The supreme court of Pennsylvania has gone beyond this, but not for the reason upon which the rule is stated to rest, declaring that the colonial acts of 1700 and 1729 had outlasted their adaptation to the habits and customs of society, they gave a constructive effect to a clause in those acts, substantially like the 8th section of the Michigan statute, confessedly against its natural import, that they might thereby avert the extended social mischief which would result from its rigid execution. Rodebaugh v. Sanks, 2 Watts, 11. But this court has no such dispensing power with regard to the Michigan statutes. It is not so old that it has grown into disuse. It is a cherished feature of the policy of the state in reference to a subject which it has wisely undertaken to regulate. Whatever its true import is, must be accepted by tribunals, at least as its intended meaning and effect must be given to it accordingly. If the jury, therefore, find that neither a minister nor a magistrate was present at the alleged marriage of Wm. A. Mowry and the daughter of the Indian Perot—and such is the plaintiff's own proof—they are instructed that such marriage was invalid under the Michigan statute, and their verdict in such case should be for the defendants.

BANKRUPTCY — PARTNERSHIP—JOINT CREDITOR — ADJUDICATION OF ONE PARTNER.

An adjudication of bankruptcy may be made against one partner only upon a joint debt. The partnership creditor has such an interest in the separate property of any one of the partners, that he may proceed against one alone.

In bankruptcy.

W. L. Dayton and J. N. Voorhees, for creditor.

James Wilson, for debtor.

NIXON, District Judge. Benjamin Cole files his petition in this court, praying that one Isaac C. Melick be adjudged a bankrupt, and in his petition he sets out that the nature of his demand against the said Melick is a certain judgment obtained by him in the supreme court of the state of New Jersey, on the 10th day of June, A. D. 1870, against the said Isaac C. Melick and one Daniel H. Cole, late partners, and trading as Cole & Melick, for the sum of five hundred and six dollars and eighty cents damages, and forty dollars and sixty-five cents taxed costs of suit. Various acts of bankruptcy are charged in the petition to have been committed by the said Melick, which are denied by the alleged bankrupt, and before the trial the said Melick appears by counsel, and moves the court to set aside the petition upon the ground that the debt proved is against the late firm of Cole & Melick, and that the proceedings in bankruptcy should have been taken, if at all, against both members of the firm.

This objection brings before the court the consideration of the question, whether the bankrupt law [of 1867; 14 Stat. 517], confers upon the court jurisdiction against one partner where the debt proved is a partnership debt. The question is not a new one. It arose in the time of Lord Hardwicke, and he entertained such grave doubts upon the subject that he directed a trial before Lord Chief Justice Willes. The chief justice also doubted, and reserved the matter for argument by counsel before the court of common pleas, which unanimously decided that a commission could be regularly issued in such a case. Lord Hardwicke, in adverting to the case Ex parte Crisp, says, "Whatever doubts I might have before, it is now established to be law, in the unanimous opinion of the court of common pleas, that a commission of bankruptcy may issue against one partner only for a joint debt." 1 Atk. 134. This early settlement of the question in England has been uniformly adhered to by subsequent chancellors. It was recognized by Lord Loughborough, Ex parte Elton, 3 Ves. 239, and expressly acted on by Lord Eldon in Ex parte Clay, 6 Ves. 813a, and Ex parte Chandler, 9 Ves. 35, and Ex parte Bolton, 2 Rose, 389, where he says, "Since the case of Ex parte Crisp [1 Atk. 134], a decision now, at least, sanctioned by time, it has been clearly settled, that a joint creditor may take out a separate commission." The same view of the question has been taken by the courts of this country. The case of Tuckers v. Oxley, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 34, turned upon this, and all the reasoning of Chief Justice Marshall, in his able opinion, goes to the recognition of the principle, that the joint creditor of a partnership, upon the proof of his debt, is entitled to have a separate commission against any one of the partners.

In Murray v. Murray, 5 Johns. Ch. 60, Chancellor Kent reviews the English cases with his usual learning and discrimination, and, although that case is principally taken up in discussing and stating the proper mode of marshaling the partnership and separate assets, in the payment of the partnership and separate debts, yet it distinctly asserts the right, and in many cases the propriety, of a separate commission against one partner when the debt proven is a partnership debt. But it was insisted upon the argument of the learned counsel of the alleged bankrupt, that the bankrupt act of 1867 has changed the law in this respect, and that section 36 of that act was framed and designed to prevent proceedings in bankruptcy against one partner upon proof of a partnership liability. In the judgment of the court, counsel has misapprehended the object, purport, and scope of that section. It was inserted simply to indicate the correct and equitable mode of administration of the partnership property and separate estates of each partner, when "two or more persons who are partners in trade shall be adjudged bankrupt," and cannot be made to apply to the case under consideration, where only one of the partners is proceeded against. That section was first introduced into the bankrupt act of 1841 [5 Stat. 440], and, in its main features, embodied no new law, but was only declaratory of the equitable principles which the courts had adopted in the distribution of the bankrupt's assets. It was, nevertheless, proper and useful in this respect: that it put to rest the long mooted and much discussed question of the power of the bankrupt court in administering the bankrupt's estate, to make orders for the marshaling of assets and the payment of partnership debts with partnership funds, and separate debts with separate funds, without the intervention of proceedings by bill in equity. It required some such provisions to enlarge the jurisdiction of the bankrupt court, and to clothe its orders with authority, for before this time, as was quaintly said by one of the lord chancellors, each order seemed "to carry a chancery suit in the bosom of it," and thus involved greater delays and expenses in the equitable administration of partners' estates.

I do not now consider the other objection, urged in the argument against this proceeding, to wit: The practical difficulties which may arise in administering the joint and separate estates, where a joint creditor asks for a separate commission. This objection is addressed rather to the fears of the petitioning creditor than to the power of the court. There are, doubtless, many difficulties in the proceeding. The relation which the assignee of the bankrupt will sustain towards the other partner, as to the right to administer and control the partnership property: how far the assignee, by an order of the court, and without the intervention of a bill making the other partner a party, can reach the joint assets: whether, if there be partnership assets and the other partner is living and solvent, and if there should be separate debts of the alleged bankrupt, the dividend of the petitioning creditor must be postponed until the payment of such separate debts; are all questions which have heretofore arisen, and have been the fruitful source of doubt and discussion, and may arise in this case. But without expressing any opinion in reference to them, and looking to the single question now before me, I am constrained, upon principle and authority, to say that a partnership creditor has such an interest in the separate property of any one of the partners, that he may proceed against one alone upon the proof of his debt, and the motion to set aside this petition is overruled with costs.

SEAMEN—WAGES—STALE CLAIM—PLEADING—INFANCY—COSTS.

1. The defense of stale claim must be set up in the answer, and will not avail where the owner has retained a portion of the purchase money in his hands, and the suit is defended in the interest of the vendor.

[Cited in The Hercules, Case No. 6,400.]

2. A minor may recover for his wages where the contract was made personally with him, and it does not appear that he has any parent, guardian, or master entitled to receive his earnings.

3. Quaere, whether the defense of infancy can be made available otherwise than by a plea to the competency of libellant to sue in his own name?

4. Costs were awarded where the suit was defended in the interest of a former owner, though no demand had been made of the claimants.

Libel for wages. The libel was filed October 6, 1873, and is based upon a due bill for $44.75, for services as seaman in the season of 1871, bearing date June 3d of that year. The answer ignores the facts alleged as to the services rendered, and the giving of the due bill, and alleges the purchase of the scow in 1873 by the claimants; that the scow was within the jurisdiction of the court during the whole time between the giving of the due bill and the claimant's purchase, and therefore, as to them, libellant's claim has become stale, and is no longer a lien upon the vessel. No other defense is set up in the answer.

Jno. C. Donelly, for libellant.

L. S. Trowbridge, for claimants.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. In order to maintain the defense of stale claim it is necessary to allege and prove that the respondents are purchasers in good faith, for a valuable consideration, and without notice of the existence of the claim. The answer contains none of these allegations. The defense set up might, therefore, be overruled, without further remark. But as proofs were taken as though the defense had been sufficiently alleged, the case will be considered briefly in view of what was proven. The proofs show that the claimants bought the vessel of one Brown, April 8, 1873, for $1,425, of which $600 was paid in cash, and the balance was secured by a mortgage on the vessel, to be paid in two years from that date, Brown to pay all claims then existing against the vessel; and that the claimants are defending this suit for and in the interest of Brown. There is no pretense that the claim of libellant was not good against the vessel in Brown's hands at the time of the sale by him to respondents; and, the suit being defended in fact by Brown, and the respondents having full protection by means of the balance of purchase money still unpaid, against any decree which may be made against the vessel, the defense set up is wholly untenable under the proofs. The proofs were all taken by deposition, and certain objections taken by respondents before the commissioner were insisted upon at the argument. The above facts, however, are all arrived at without resort to the testimony objected to, and for that reason the objections are not noticed.

Libellant was examined as a witness, and on his cross-examination it came out that when this suit was commenced he was, and that he still is a minor; that he was twenty years of age on the 18th day of November, 1873. He further testified that his father had been dead ten or twelve years, but that his mother was still living. On this proof it was contended, upon the argument, that the libel must be dismissed, for the reasons: (1) That libellant's mother was entitled to his earnings, and was the only person who could sue therefor; or (2) that if libellant could bring the suit, he could do so only by next friend. I think the objection comes too late. No such defense is set up in the answer; and I think it exceedingly doubtful, even if a legal defense, whether it could be made available otherwise than by a plea to the competency of the libellant to sue in his own name. Wicks v. Ellis [Case No. 17,614]. Even if a proper foundation had been laid, however, I do not think the defense would have been good in this case. The contract was made with libellant in person, payments were made to him, and the due bill for balance due him upon which this suit was founded, was given to him, and a payment made to him upon it, and the matter had lain upward of two years before the libel in this case was filed, and the mother nowhere appears as setting up any claim. Under these circumstances, I think she would be estopped from setting up a claim after the recovery against the vessel by libellant.

There is no rule in the admiralty courts requiring minors to sue by next friend. Their right to sue in the admiralty for wages has been fully recognized. Wicks v. Ellis [supra]; The David Faust [Case No. 3,595]; The Etna [Id. 4,542]. The general rule seems to be this: That a minor may recover in the admiralty for wages, where the contract was made personally with him, and it does not appear that he has any parent, guardian, or master entitled to receive his earnings. 2 Pars. Adm. 372, and note 3; Wicks v. Ellis and The David Faust, supra. And, in Wicks v. Ellis, on a motion by respondent to be discharged from arrest on the ground, among others, that the libellant was a minor, and no next friend had been appointed, &c., Judge Betts held that it could not be demanded as a matter of right, that a minor, suing in the admiralty for wages, should sue by next friend; and, also, that if his so doing in his own name, without the appointment of a next friend, was a legal defense in any case, the respondent must be put to his plea to the competency of the libellant.

Minors suing in admiralty for wages become peculiarly the wards of the court, and the court will go to the utmost limit consistent with the interests and rights of respondents in protecting and enforcing their rights. The Etna [supra]. In this case, the rights of the respondents can be in no manner jeopardized by a decree in favor of libellant, on account of any danger of having to pay the claim to the mother of the libellant, because, as has been already remarked, she must be held, in any suit she might bring for that purpose, by having permitted libellant to contract in his own name, to receive wages, and delayed so long to set up any claim on account of the balance here sued for, to have abandoned all claim thereto in her own right.

There is no dispute that the amount due libellant is the amount of the due bill, and interest from its date, less $10 paid June 8, 1872:

Due bill dated June 3, 1873	$44 75

—And for which he must have a decree.

It was claimed, on the argument, that costs ought not to be awarded against respondents, because no demand had been made of them before the libel was filed. But, as we have seen, the respondents are fully protected, and the suit is defended in the interest of the former owner, Brown. So far as the question of costs is concerned, the case must be treated as though Brown was the responsible party respondent, and as against him the court has no hesitation in awarding costs.

BANKRUPTCY—STATE PROPERTY—SALE BY WARDEN OF STATE PRISON—PRIORITY.

S., who was the warden of Clinton prison, in the state of New York, sold to M. & Co. goods which were the property of the state. Thereafter M. & Co. being in bankruptcy, S. filed a proof of debt for the price of the goods, stating the debt to be due to him as agent and warden of Clinton state prison. A priority for the debt was claimed as due in fact to the state of New York: Held, that the debt was entitled to such priority.

[In the matter of Joseph Mellor and John Mellor, bankrupts.]

William A. Beach, for the State.

Martin A. Knapp, for assignee.

WALLACE, District Judge. This case involves the question whether a claim proved by James C. Shaw and stated in the proof of debt to be due to him as agent and warden of Clinton state prison, is entitled to priority in the distribution of the bankrupt's estate, as a debt due to the state of New York.

Disregarding for the present the form of the proof, and going behind that to the evidence produced upon the re-examination of the claim, I am of opinion that the debt is in fact a debt to the state of New York, and as such entitled to priority. It is a debt for merchandise sold to the bankrupts, which at the time of the sale was the property of the state. It was sold by the warden of Clinton prison as the agent of the state. I am aware of no reason why the state cannot maintain an action to recover the price of the merchandise upon the same rule which authorizes any other principal to sue upon the contract of an agent made in behalf of the principal. If the state can maintain an action, it can prove the claim against the estate of the bankrupts. Doubtless, the warden could maintain an action to recover the price of the goods, because where a public office is created by the state, an implied authority is conferred in the officer to bring all suits which the proper discharge of his official duty requires; but this is not inconsistent with the right of the state to adopt his contract and sue upon it.

My attention has been called to the case In re Corn Exchange Bank [Case No. 3,242], and to that in 11 Metc. [Mass.] 129, cited in the former case. These cases are not applicable here. They were decided upon the assumption that, under the statutes regulating the rights and responsibilities of wardens of state prisons in Wisconsin and Massachusetts, the warden was in effect a contractor with the state, and chargeable as such with all moneys that came to his hands, and not responsible as an agent to his principal; and, therefore, when he had deposited the money in a bank which failed, it was his money and his loss, and the state had no priority in bankruptcy. Under the laws of this state no personal liability is imposed upon a warden of a prison for contracts made officially, and no action could be maintained against him by other parties to the contract, neither could an action be maintained against him officially or his successor in office. He has no control over the funds transmitted to him, except to apply them to the specific uses for which they are designated. So far as he is invested with any duty in regard to the moneys of the state, it is that of an agent, merely, to obey the directions of other officers of the state to whom in this behalf he is a subordinate.

BANKRUPTCY—PETITION FILED — TITLE THEREAFTER TO PROPERTY—EXECUTION LEVIED.

The property mentioned in the schedule of a petitioner belongs to his creditors from the time of filing his petition, and an injunction will be granted to stay proceedings on an execution issued after the filing of such petition, unless it should be shown that the application was not bona fide.

The question decided by the court arose in the case of John H. Mellor & Co., who presented their petition for the benefit of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], on the 6th ult., at which time the court ordered cause to be shown on the 5th of September, why they should not be declared bankrupts. It seems, that on the day after this order was made, an execution was placed in the hands of the sheriff of Allegheny county, in favor of Adams H. Gale & Co., by virtue of which the said sheriff had levied upon various articles of household furniture, which were returned by the said petitioners in their schedules for the benefit of all their creditors, in consequence of which they petitioned the court for protection. Upon this petition, the court directed notice to be given to the execution creditors to show cause why an injunction should not issue, to restrain the sale under said execution until further order.

On the 22d of July, Magraw and Hamilton appeared for said creditors, and Mr. Austin for petitioners.

After argument, THE COURT decided, that from the time of filing a petition in bankruptcy, the petitioner is by law deemed a bankrupt, and the property mentioned in his schedule, if not secured by previous lien, belonged to his creditors generally, and could not be legally seized upon execution by any one of them; that, if it remained in possession of the petitioner, it was in trust for his creditors; and that after the decree in bankruptcy their rights related back to the time of filing the petition; and that it would be the duty of the assignee in bankruptcy to demand such property, or to sue for it or its value, as circumstances might require. Unless, therefore, it was proved that the application for the benefit of the bankrupt act was not bona fide made, an injunction would be directed to issue to prevent the sale of property mentioned in the execution, until further order, with permission to the respondents to move to have it dissolved in case the petition is not prosecuted, or in case a decree in bankruptcy should not be granted.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY—TAKING OF EVIDENCE—TIME RULE—WAIVER.

Where a time rule has been waived by the parties, and no other substituted, some special order must be obtained, on motion, before either party can force the other to proceed.

[This was a bill by Henry Mellus against William D. M. Howard asking that certain conveyances between the parties be set aside, and for an accounting and settlement to the plaintiff as partner in the firms of Mellus & Howard and Mellus, Howard & Co.]

In this case, F. C. Loring, for respondent, moved for an order of publication of the evidence in an equity suit. It appeared that the three months, allowed by the 69th rule for taking evidence having expired, both parties, without obtaining any order from a judge enlarging the time, had taken out commissions and proceeded to take evidence. The respondent now insisted that the complainant had had time enough to take his evidence, and that due diligence had not been used by him. The complainant asserted that he had used all possible diligence, and had not been able to obtain his needful evidence.

F. C. Loring, for the motion.

J. M. Bell (with whom was C. B. Goodrich), contra.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The parties have, by mutual consent, waived the 69th rule; and there is no other general rule of practice limiting the time within which evidence is to be taken. The respondent now asks me to declare that his opponent has had time enough to take his evidence, and to give effect to this declaration, by ordering publication, and thus cutting him off from the production of further evidence. I can make no such declaration. I cannot undertake, in this summary way, to pass on the rights of parties, and finally conclude them, on my ex post facto view of their conduct of their cause, guided by no rule whatever. This is too broad a discretion to be exercised in any case where it can be avoided. I think the party has a right to know, beforehand, what time is allowed him to take his evidence. And where the only rule fixing a limit of time has been dispensed with, by mutual consent, some other rule, to operate prospectively, must be made, before the party can be put in default.

In the great liberality, not to say laxity, of practice, which exists in this circuit, I have frequently had occasion to consider this matter; and I desire now to say, that where a time rule is waived by mutual consent, either express, or implied from the conduct of the parties, some other rule, prospective in point of time, must be obtained on motion, by special order of the court, before one party can force the other to proceed.

[NOTE. The respondent, W. D. M. Howard, died in 1856. The complainant then filed his bill of revivor against Joseph P. Thompson and others, administrators of Howard. Service was had on Thompson, who appeared, and filed a special plea to the jurisdiction. The plaintiff demurred to the plea. The case was then heard upon the demurrer, which was overruled, and the plea to the jurisdiction sustained. Case No. 9,405.]

PATENTS—PUBLIC USE—DEDICATION—ENGLISH PATENT ACT—ON A SALE.

1. If an inventor knowingly suffers his invention to go into public and general use without objection, it is a dedication of it to the public, and he cannot afterwards resume the exclusive right.

[Cited in Whitney v. Emmett, Case No. 17,585; Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet. (32 U. S.) 318; Bartlette v. Crittenden, Case No. 1,082; Locomotive Engine Safety Truck Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., Id. 8,453; Henry v. Providence Tool Co., Id. 6,384; Anderson v. Eiler, 46 Fed. 780.]

2. Our patent act differs from the English in several respects. A mere public use by others before taking a patent, on a sale thereof by the inventor, is not decisive against him here, as it is in England.

[Cited in Allen v. Blunt, Case No. 217; Wilder v. McCormick, Id. 17,650; Jones v.

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

Sewall, Id. 7,495; Henry v. Francestown Soap-Stone Stove Co., Id. 6,382.]

Case for infringement of a patent, dated the 3d of August, 1822, for an improvement "in the mode of securing from decay the plank, forming the deck, waist, or bottom of ships or vessels, at or near the head of the nails, spikes, or bolts, in correction of the mode heretofore adopted of boring and driving the nails, spikes, or bolts, by which the planks are secured to the timber, beams, or frames, and the mode of securing the head from the effect of the water." Plea, the general issue.

Upon the trial it appeared, that the plaintiff first made the invention in 1804; and had suffered it to go into general use without any claim of an exclusive right, or any objection, and without receiving any compensation, until the year 1822. The invention was not much used until after 1809, but since the peace of 1815 it had come into very general and public use.

Mr. Webster, for defendant, took several exceptions to the plaintiff's right, and among them, that the plaintiff could not recover, because his allowing the invention to go into public use was a waiver of the exclusive privilege, and it would now be a fraud to enforce it.

Nichols & Gorham, for plaintiff, contended, e contrà, that there had been no such general use as excluded the plaintiff from a recovery. He had a right to allow the public use, so as to test the utility of the invention, and for as long a period as he thought necessary for that purpose.

STORY, Circuit Justice. There is a difference between the language and effect of our statute respecting patents, and that of England. The statute of 21 Jac. 1, c. 3, commonly called the statute of monopolies, prohibits the grant of monopolies generally; but in the sixth section it excepts "letters patent and grants of privileges for 14 years or under, of the sole working or making of any manner of new manufactures within this realm, to the true and first inventor and inventors of such manufactures, which others at the time of making such letters patent and grants shall not use." Upon this statute it has been held, that it is not necessary that the invention should be new to all the world, but it is sufficient, if new within the realm of England, and it matters not whether learned by travel or by study. Edgeberry v. Stephens, Salk. 446. The provision further is, that it must be an invention which others, at the time of making the letters patent, "shall not use." Therefore it was held in Wood v. Zimmer, Holt, 58, Dav. Pat. Cas. 429, by Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, that if the inventor, before obtaining a patent, allows his invention to go into public use, he cannot entitle himself to a patent. The public sale of it by the inventor to other persons for use, makes the patent void. It is not then new to the realm, but is used by others within the meaning of the statute.

Our patent act uses language somewhat different. The first section (Act Feb. 21, 1793, c. 11 [1 Stat. 318]) declares, that "when any person or persons, &c. shall allege that he or they have invented any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement on any art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, not known or used before the application," he or they shall, on application to the secretary of state, &c. &c. be entitled to a patent. If this were all, there would be great difficulty in construing the words, "not known or used before the application," differently from the words of the English statute, "which others, at the making of the letters patent and grants, shall not use." We should be driven, therefore, to consider the accuracy of the decision of Lord Chief Justice Gibbs. But the 6th section of our statute throws light on this subject, and enables the court to ascertain with more precision the intention of the legislature. That section authorizes the defendant to give certain matters in evidence, by way of defence, under the general issue, upon proper notice, and among other things, that "the thing thus secured by patent was not originally discovered by the patentee, but had been in use, or had been described in some public work, anterior to the supposed discovery of the patentee." Upon these clauses it has been uniformly held, that it must be shown that the invention is new, not only in the United States, but to the world, and that it was not in use before the asserted discovery. The fact of its being in use before his discovery is, by the sixth section, made decisive against the patentee. Now, if the intention of the legislature had been, by the first section, to provide, that the mere fact of the invention being "known or used," even with the inventor's permission, before the application for a patent, should destroy his right, however otherwise well founded, it is strange, that the use should not be limited, in the sixth section, to the time of such application, instead of the "supposed discovery." The sixth section manifestly proceeds upon the ground, that the same thing being in use at the time of the supposed discovery establishes, that there is nothing new in the invention; but it may be known and used at the time of the application for a patent, and yet the applicant have been the true and first discoverer. And the words of the first section are susceptible of the same construction. The things sought to be patented must be something "not known or used" by others before, but must be first known or first used by the person claiming to be the inventor; that is, others must not have known or used it before his discovery. Upon any other construction, if a party were the true and first inventor, yet if, before his application for a patent, another were to know his invention or use it, piratically or innocently, the first inventor would be ousted of his right to a patent, which is inconsistent with the spirit of the act. Construing therefore the first section by the sixth, it seems to me, that the true meaning is, that the first inventor has a right to a patent, though there may have been a knowledge and use of the thing invented by others, before his application for a patent, if such knowledge or use was not anterior to his discovery.

But however this may be, I am clearly of opinion, that if the inventor dedicates his invention to the public, he cannot afterwards resume it, or claim an exclusive right in it. It is like the dedication of a public way, or other public easement. The question, in such cases, is a question of fact, Has he so dedicated it? I agree his acts are to be construed liberally; that he is not to be estopped by licensing a few persons to use his invention to ascertain its utility, or by any such acts of peculiar indulgence and use, as may fairly consist with the clear intention to hold the exclusive privilege. But if the inventor proclaims his intention to all the world, and suffers it to go into general and public use, without objection; if he asserts no exclusive right for years, with a full knowledge that the public are led by it to a general use, such conduct, in my judgment, amounts to strong proof, that he waives the exclusive right, and dedicates the invention to the world. After such conduct, the attempt to regain the exclusive right, and secure it by a patent, would operate as a fraud upon the public; and would hold out inducements to incur heavy expenses in putting inventions into operation, of which the party might be deprived at the mere will or caprice of the inventor.

If the jury believe the evidence in the present case, it seems quite decisive But of that they will judge.

Verdict for defendant.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY—RULES OF COURT — NO REPLY — ADMINISTRATOR — SUED OUT OF STATE WHERE APPOINTED—ACT OF CONGRESS—BILL OF REVIVOR.

1. When a plea to a bill in equity is set down for hearing under the thirteenth additional rule, without being replied to by the complainant, all the facts therein alleged, which are well pleaded, must be considered as admitted, for the purpose of determining whether the plea constitutes a sufficient answer to the suit.

2. An executor or administrator, deriving his authority solely from one state, cannot sue or be sued in his official character in another state for assets lawfully received by him in the jurisdiction where he was appointed.

[Cited in Bartlett v. Rogers, Case No. 1,079.]

[Cited in brief in Luce v. Manchester & L. R. R., 63 N. H. 588, 3 Atl. 619.]

3. The thirty-first section of the act of congress of the 24th of September, 1789 [1 Stat. 90], confers no jurisdiction upon this court of a bill of revivor against the administrator with the will annexed, of the deceased respondent in the original suit, said administrator having been appointed by a probate court in California. Clark v. Mathewson, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 170, reviewed and construed not to assert a doctrine contrary to this.

[Cited in Mason v. Hartford, P. & F. R. Co., 10 Fed. 337.]

This was a bill of revivor, in which it was alleged that, at the May term of this court, in the year 1853, [Henry Mellus,] the complainant, exhibited his bill of complaint against one William D. M. Howard of San Francisco, in the state of California (since deceased), praying that certain conveyances from him, the complainant, to said Howard, and certain settlements between them, might be set aside, and the said Howard might be decreed to account to the complainant and settle with him as partner in the firm of Mellus and Howard, and Mellus, Howard, and Company, and for other purposes and interests as were in the bill of complaint more fully set forth. The bill of revivor further alleged that the same Howard, having been fully served with process, appeared and answered to the original bill, and filed the general application, and proofs were also taken. [See Case No. 9403.] In January, 1856, the respondent, Howard, deceased. The bill further set forth that the deceased left a last will and testament; and that letters of administration, with the will annexed, were duly granted to [Joseph P. Thompson and others,] the respondents in this case, and that they had taken upon themselves the trust. Service of the bill of revivor was only made upon one of the respondents, which one appeared and pleaded, denying the jurisdiction of the court, and alleging that the decedent at the time of his death was a citizen and resident in the state of California, and that his last will and testament was duly proved and allowed by the court of probate for the county of San Francisco in that state, by which court also the respondent was appointed as one of the executors, but that he never was appointed an executor of the said will, or an administrator upon the estate of the deceased by any court of probate or any other court in the state of Massachusetts. The respondent also alleged that at the time service was made upon him he was casually in the state of Massachusetts for a temporary purpose, and that he then had no assets of the estate of the deceased in his possession or under his control. None of the facts alleged in the plea were in any manner controverted by the complainant.

R. Choate and Mr. Bell, for complainant.

F. C. Loring, for respondent.

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. When a plea to a bill in equity is set down for hearing under the thirteenth additional rule, as in this case, without being replied to by the complainant, all the facts therein alleged which are well pleaded must be considered as admitted for the purpose of determining the question whether the plea constitutes a sufficient answer to the suit. Accordingly the complainant insists, notwithstanding the present respondent is not a citizen of, or resident in, this state, and was never appointed executor of the last will and testament of the decedent by the state courts of this district, that he is entitled to revive the suit against him by virtue of his appointment as such executor by the court of probate for the county of San Francisco in the state of California, where he was domiciliated at the time of his appointment. All of the transactions for which relief is sought took place in California, and all of the assets belonging to the estate of the decedent are in that jurisdiction. Certain rules and principles respecting the rights and powers of executors and administrators appear to be so fully settled that they ought not to be regarded as the proper subjects of dispute. One is, that an executor or administrator, deriving his authority solely from another state, is not liable to be sued in his official character in this state for assets lawfully received by him in the jurisdiction where he was appointed, under and in virtue of the original letters of administration. Every grant of administration is strictly confined in its authority and operation to the limits of the territory of the government which grants it, and it is well settled that it does not extend to other political jurisdictions. As matter of right it cannot confer any authority to collect by suit the assets of the deceased in another state; and whatever operation is allowed beyond the jurisdiction of the state where it is granted is mere matter of comity, which every other state is at liberty to accord or withhold, according to the policy of its own laws and with reference to the interests of its own citizens. Vaughan v. Northup, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 1; Bond v. Graham, 1 Hare, 482; Spratt v. Harris, 4 Hagg. Ecc. 405; Price v. Dewhurst, 4 Mylne & C. 76; Whyte v. Rose, 3 Adol. & E. [N. S.] 507, 43 E. C. L. 842. Executors and administrators are bound in general to account exclusively for all the assets they receive, under and in virtue of their administration, to the proper tribunals of the government from which they derive their authority; and it was expressly determined by the supreme court, in the case of Vaughan v. Northup, that the tribunals of other states have no right to interfere with the assets which come to their possession in the jurisdiction where they are appointed, or to control their application. Repeated decisions have affirmed the principle that no suit can be maintained by or against an executor or administrator, in his official capacity, in the courts of any other state except that from which he derived his authority, in virtue of the probate and letters testamentary or the letters of administration there granted to him. Fenwick v. Sears, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 259; Dixon's Ex'rs v. Ramsey's Ex'rs, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 319; Kerr v. Moon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 565; Armstrong v. Lear, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 169. Some attempts have been made by courts of justice in one or two jurisdictions to limit and qualify the general rule laid down in the earlier cases, but without success, as appears from numerous decisions both in this country and in England; and it may now be regarded as the established doctrine, that an executor or administrator appointed in one state cannot sue or be sued in his official character for any debts due to or from the estate under his administration in any other state, unless he is first appointed as such administrator or executor in the state where the suit is brought. These principles, so far as respects the maintaining of an original suit are not controverted by the counsel for the complainant, and they have been so repeatedly affirmed by courts of the highest respectability, that it seems unnecessary to multiply authorities upon the subject. That letters testamentary or of administration granted abroad, without new probate authority, give no right to sue or be sued, is a principle almost universally acknowledged by courts of justice. It was so held in Carter v. Crost, Godb. 33, decided in 1585, and since that period has been the received doctrine in most jurisdictions to the present time. Tourton v. Flower, 3 P. Wms. 369; 2 Kent, Comm. (9th Ed.) 563, and note c; Hutchins v. State Bank, 12 Metc. [Mass.] 421; Story, Confl. Law, § 513; Tyler v. Bell, 2 Mylne & C. 110; Whyte v. Rose, 3 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 507, 43 E. C. L. 842. But attention is drawn to the thirty-first section of the act of congress of the 24th of September, 1789, and it is insisted, that the original suit in this case may be revived against the present respondent, within the principles of that provision. It provides, that where any suit shall be depending in any court of the United States, and either of the parties shall die before final judgment, the executor or administrator of such deceased party who was plaintiff, petitioner, or defendant, in case the cause of action doth by law survive, shall have full power to prosecute or defend any such suit or action until final judgment; and the defendant or defendants are hereby obliged to answer thereto accordingly; and the court before whom such cause may be depending is hereby empowered and directed to hear and determine the same, and to render judgment for or against the executor or administrator, as the case may require. Further provision is also made, in case such executor or administrator shall refuse to become a party to the suit, that the court may render judgment against the estate of the deceased party in the same manner as if the executor or administrator had voluntarily made himself a party to the suit. At common law, the death of either party before judgment in real and personal actions abated the writ; and it was held by the supreme court, in Green v. Watkins, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 260, that the provision contained in that section was necessary to enable the action to be prosecuted against the representatives of the deceased party in cases where the cause of action survived. In the case of Macker's Heirs v. Thomas, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 530, the same court held, that this provision was clearly confined to personal actions, assigning as the reason for the conclusion, that the power to prosecute or defend is given to the executor or administrator of the deceased party, and not to the heir or devisee. Neither of those cases precisely touches the question under consideration, for the reason that the abatement of a suit in equity by the death of a party, in cases where the cause of action survives, does not amount to an unconditional determination of the suit. Unlike the abatement of a suit at common law, the death of one of the parties to a bill in equity, before a final decree, only has the effect in general to suspend the proceeding in the suit, but does not operate to extinguish the right of further prosecution, provided the proper representatives of the deceased party seasonably appear and prosecute the same by bill of revivor. Bills of revivor, strictly so called, lie only against the persons who are the proper representatives of the deceased party. If the suit has respect to the personal assets only of the deceased party, his executor or administrator is the proper person by or against whom the bill of revivor should be brought; but if the suit has respect to the real estate of the deceased, and the cause of action survives, then the heirs of the deceased party are the proper persons to institute and prosecute the bill of revivor. Story, Eq. Pl. (6th Ed.) § 54. Applying these principles to the present case, there would be no difficulty in sustaining the views of the complainant, but for the fact that the respondent in the bill of revivor has never been appointed an executor of the last will and testament of the decedent by the tribunals of Massachusetts. His appointment, as the plea shows, emanated from the court of probate for the county of San Francisco in the state of California; and if it be true, as was expressly held by the supreme court in Vaughan v. Northup, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 5, that the grant of administration upon the estate of a deceased person is strictly confined in its authority and operations to the limits of the territory of the government which grants it, then it follows, as it would seem, that the appointment of the respondent as executor by the tribunals of the state of California cannot have the effect to confer upon him that character in the courts of another state. Federal laws do not make provision for the appointment of executors or administrators. They only recognize the existence of such appointments under the local law. Executors and administrators are recognized in the thirty-first section of the judiciary act now under consideration, but they are such as have received their appointments, not from federal authority, but from the tribunals of the state where the suit was pending at the time the abatement took place. Accordingly it was held by the supreme court, in Aspden v. Nixon, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 497, that executors and administrators appointed in one state cannot be known in another state as the representatives of the estate of a deceased person, for the purpose of prosecuting or defending a pending suit. This principle was subsequently affirmed by the same court in the case of Stacy v. Thrasher, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 58, in still more decisive language. Mr. Justice Grier said, in the case last named, that an administrator receives his authority from the ordinary or other officer of the government where the goods of the intestate are situate. But coming into such possession by succession to the intestate, and encumbered with the duty to pay his debts, he is considered in law as in privity with him, and therefore bound or estopped by a judgment against him. Yet his representation of his intestate is a qualified one, and extends not beyond the assets of which the ordinary had jurisdiction. He therefore cannot do any act to affect assets in another jurisdiction, as his authority cannot be more extensive than that of the government from whom he received it, and the courts of another state will not acknowledge him as a representative of the deceased, or notice his letters of administration. Borden v. Borden, 5 Mass. 67; Pond v. Makepeace, 2 Metc. [Mass.] 114; Chapman v. Fish, 6 Hill, 554. Similar views were also held by the same court in Hill v. Tucker, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 467, in which the preceding cases were cited and approved. Nevertheless, circuit courts have jurisdiction of suits by or against executors or administrators, if they are citizens of different states, in certain cases where they are the real parties in interest before the court, and have succeeded, by virtue of their appointment, to all the rights and interests of their testators or intestates, as in suits upon promissory notes given by the deceased in certain special cases, or in bills of equity for an account. Chappedelaine v. Dechenaux, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 306; Childres v. Emory, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 669. Both of those suits, however, were commenced in the district constituted within the limits of the political jurisdiction or state from which the defendants derived their authority. Civil suits may be brought against persons in their individual capacity, either in the district whereof they are inhabitants or in which they shall be found at the time of serving the writ. 1 Stat. 79. That provision, so far as the latter clause of it is concerned, does not apply to executors and administrators, for the reason that their authority is limited by the territory of the state from which it is derived; and it has been expressly held by the supreme court, in repeated instances, that they cannot be sued in any district out of the state from which their authority proceeds. It was so distinctly held in Vaughan v. Northup, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 1; and such, as before remarked, is the settled law, both in this country and in England. Fenwick v. Sears, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 259; Dixon's Ex'rs v. Ramsey's Ex'rs, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 319; Kerr v. Moon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 565; Aspden v. Nixon, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 497; Stacy v. Thrasher, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 58; Hill v. Tucker, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 467. But reliance is placed upon the case of Clark v. Mathewson, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 170, as asserting a different doctrine. On a careful examination of the facts of that case, it does not appear to warrant any such conclusion. It was a bill in equity, brought by a citizen of the state of Connecticut against a citizen of the state of Rhode Island, for an account of certain transactions set forth in the bill, with a prayer for general relief. After the cause was at issue, it was by the agreement of the parties ordered by the court to be referred to a master to take an account, and pending the proceedings before the master the complainant died. Administration upon his estate was taken out by one John H. Clark, in the state of Rhode Island. By the laws of the state, no person not a resident thereof can take out letters of administration; and such administration is indispensable to the prosecution or defence of any suit in the state, in right of the estate of the intestate. Clark filed a bill of revivor in the circuit court of Rhode Island against the defendants in the original suit, in which he alleged that they were citizens of that state; and he also alleged himself to be a citizen of the same state, and administrator of the intestate. Judge Story dismissed the bill of revivor, on the ground that it was a suit between citizens of the same state. Whereupon the complainant appealed to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was reversed, with the concurrence of the circuit judge; and it was held that the bill of revivor was a mere continuance of the original suit, and that, inasmuch as the parties to the original bill were citizens of different states, the jurisdiction of the court completely attached to the controversy, and could not be divested by the fact that the administrator of the complainant subsequently appointed was a citizen of the same state with the respondents. That principle is entirely consistent with the determination previously made, that the removal of the original plaintiff, after the commencement of the suit, into the same state with the respondent, does not divest the jurisdiction of the court, if they were citizens of different states at the time the suit was commenced. Morgan's Heirs v. Morgan, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 290; Mollan v. Torrance, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 537; Dunn v. Clarke, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 1. Besides, it will be perceived that the suit in that case was revived in a circuit court constituted and having jurisdiction in the state from which the administrator derived his authority; and consequently the decision of the court is perfectly consistent with all the previous and subsequent adjudications upon the subject. It was objected in that case, that the jurisdiction could not be sustained, because the complainant and respondent in the bill of revivor were citizens of the same state; but the supreme court held that congress, in the provision of the judiciary act under consideration, treated the revivor of the suit by or against the representatives of the deceased as a matter of right, and as a mere continuation of the original suit, without any distinction as to the citizenship of the representative, whether he belonged to the same state where the cause was depending, or to another state. This last remark was made by the court, in answer to the objection that both parties in the bill of revivor belonged to the same state, and without any reference whatever to the question, whether an executor or administrator appointed only by the probate court of another state could be made a party to such a proceeding without a new appointment. For these reasons I am of the opinion that the case of Clark v. Mathewson does not touch the question under consideration. Such being the fact, the proceeding stands without any authority to support it, and must be determined upon general principles. All of the reasons assigned in the adjudged cases to show that an executor or administrator cannot be made an original defendant in a state other than the one from which he derives his authority apply with equal force against making him a respondent to a suit in equity abated by the death of his testator or intestate. He has no official existence in such other state, and possesses no power there which he can exercise in his official character. Decided cases have established the doctrine, that the authority granted to him is strictly confined to the limits of the state from which it was derived; and if so, then it would seem to follow that any other person might be made a party defendant to the bill of revivor with equal propriety, and for the reason that, while here, in a jurisdiction where his authority is not acknowledged, he is not in any legal sense the representative of the estate of his testator. He cannot be liable de bonis propriis, and as there are no assets in this jurisdiction, there can be nothing on which a judgment would operate. Relief is prayed, not only for the payment of money, but that conveyances of real estate situated in California may be set aside, and that the same real estate may be conveyed to the complainant. Whether executors, as such, have authority, under the laws of California, to convey real estate does not appear, and is at least very doubtful. But if it were less so, it is difficult to see by what warrant this court can recognize the respondent as the executor of the last will and testament of the decedent, while it appears that he is not such by the local law of the district in which the suit is pending, and that there are no assets of the estate within this jurisdiction. Counsel would hardly contend that a bill of revivor could be maintained against an executor or administrator appointed in England, without new probate of the letters testamentary, or new letters of administration in the state tribunals of the district where the original suit was brought. Nothing is better settled than the rule, that a person claiming under a will proved in one state cannot intermeddle with or sue for the effects of a testator in another state, unless the will be first proved in that other state, or unless he be permitted so to do by some law of that state authorizing such a proceeding. He cannot sue for the personal estate of the testator out of the jurisdiction of the power by which the letters of administration were granted, and upon the same principle and for the same reason he cannot be sued or compelled to defend a suit in any jurisdiction to which his authority as executor does not extend. Doe v. McFarland, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 151; Kerr v. Moon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 571. Devisees or heirs would not be bound by the decree, if one were made, so far as the real estate is concerned, for the reason that they are not made parties to the bill of revivor, and have had no notice of the proceeding. It is obvious, therefore, if the court should render a decree that the complainant is entitled to the relief prayed for, the respondent in the bill of revivor would have no authority to comply with the order of the court, and the court would have no power to enforce its mandate. In view of all the circumstances disclosed in the case, I am of the opinion that the plea to the jurisdiction of the court is sufficient, and that the demurrer must be overruled.

District Court, D. Minnesota. May 14, 1878.

BANKRUPTCY—PARTNERSHIP—SALE IN CONTEMPLATION OF INSOLVENCY—DIVISION OF PROCEEDS—STATE EXEMPTION.

Within a month prior to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and while the firm was insolvent, a large amount of the partnership property was sold and the proceeds divided between the partners, and the firm then offered to settle with their creditors at fifty per cent. One of the partners, upon receiving his share of the proceeds of said sale, immediately purchased property which was exempt under the state statute. Held, that under the circumstances such property was not exempt, but must be regarded as partnership assets held in trust for creditors.

[Cited in Re Corbett, Case No. 3,220.]

The firm of [William S.] Melvin & [J. R.] Fox were adjudicated bankrupts March 8, 1878, on petition filed the 20th of February previous. On January 22d, 1878, being insolvent, a large amount of partnership stock was sold, and the proceeds divided between the partners without paying any firm debts, and an offer to settle with creditors at fifty cents on the dollar was then proposed. Fox immediately purchased, with the proceeds received by him, horses, wagons, harness, sled, cow, etc., which he now claims as exempt property under the laws of the state of Minnesota, and the fourteenth section of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 522)], and refuses to turn over this property to the assignee. There had been no dissolution until bankruptcy adjudication. By the statute of Minnesota (Rev. St. p. 489) this class of property, to the extent claimed, is not liable to execution and sale.

Rogers & Rogers, for assignee.

Amos Coggswell, for bankrupts.

NELSON, District Judge. The question presented is not free from difficulty. Ordinarily such property, if owned by a debtor, is exempt under the laws of the state of Minnesota, and would not pass to the assignee under the 14th section of the bankrupt act. Fox purchased it with the proceeds of partnership stock received by him, with the consent of his partner, on a division mutually agreed upon between the partners. There was a severance of interest by the individual members of the firm in a portion of the partnership property about one month before the bankruptcy adjudication; but the firm was insolvent, and a short time afterwards made an effort to settle with creditors at a large discount. Under such circumstances, an appropriation of partnership property of an insolvent firm by one of its members to his own use, in equity would be regarded void as against creditors, and the property, if found in the hands of voluntary grantees, or purchasers with notice, can be recovered as partnership assets. Unless the severance of partnership funds, and the purchase by Fox of the property in controversy, is a legal transformation from partnership to individual exempt property, the assignee in bankruptcy is entitled to it. In several cases courts have, in applying the maxim that exemption laws should be liberally construed, decided that the conversion of property subject to execution into exempt property would not deprive the person of an exemption, although the property was disposed of for the purpose of investing the proceeds in that way; and even, in many cases, the individual members of a firm have been permitted to claim exemption from the property of the firm. On the other hand, the decisions are more numerous that no exemption is allowed. I should permit Fox to retain the property as exempt if the facts did not show a design, on his part at least, with the concurrence of his partner, by such appropriation of partnership property, to escape, if possible, the payment of partnership debts. The sale of the partnership stock and the division of the proceeds, and the purchase of property supposed to be exempt and beyond the reach of creditors, and the offer to compromise, were acts done, in my opinion, for the purpose of compelling creditors to submit to the terms proposed. The exemption law was not enacted for, and cannot be invoked to aid, any such transaction. I do not mean to decide that one partner cannot purchase property with funds taken from the partnership and charged to himself, which by law he could hold as exempt, although at the time the firm was insolvent, but only that inasmuch as partnership property is ordinarily a fund for the payment of partnership debts, a deliberate intention, on the eve of bankruptcy, under the conceded facts in this case, to place property beyond the reach of creditors, is an effort to perpetrate a legal fraud which courts must take notice of, and the property must be regarded as partnership assets held in trust for creditors. TRIAL—EVIDENCE—PAPER READ TO JURY—CONSENT OF COURT.

No paper can be read in evidence to the jury without the leave of the court.

Mr. Coxe, for defendant, offered to read a paper in evidence to the jury, to which the plaintiff's counsel objected.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent) was divided in opinion upon its admissibility. The question then occurred as to the effect of this division of opinion, that is, whether the paper should be read or rejected.

THE COURT agreed, that no paper can be read in evidence to the jury, without the leave of the court; and as the court could not agree to admit it to be read, it must be considered as rejected. The paper was not read.

Case No. 9,411.

MEMORANDUM.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 337.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Sept. Term, 1833.

COURTS—SPECIAL SESSION.

The circuit court of the District of Columbia cannot, at a special session for the trial of criminal causes, try a cause which was pending at the preceding stated session.

A special session of the circuit court, in Washington county, for the trial of criminal causes, was holden on the 2d of September, 1833, by virtue of the following order, made at the last term, on the 29th of May, 1833:

"Ordered, that a special session for the trial of criminal causes, be held on the first Monday of September next, and that the marshal summon the usual number of grand and petit jurors;" and of the following clause of the 5th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 73;) "and the circuit courts shall have power to hold special sessions for the trial of criminal causes, at any other time, at their discretion, or at the discretion of the supreme court;" and of the following clause of the act of 2d of March, 1793 (Id. 333): "That any special session may be adjourned to any time or times previous to the next stated meeting of the circuit court; that all business, depending for trial at any special court, shall, at the close thereof, be considered, as of course removed to the next stated term of the circuit court;" and the 8th section of the act of the 13th of February, 1801, which provides, "That the said circuit courts," (that is, the circuit courts by that act established,) "shall have power, and are hereby authorized, to hold special sessions for the trial of criminal causes, at any other time or times than is hereby directed, at their discretion;" and the 3d section of the act of the 27th of February, 1801 (2 Stat. 89,) by which it is enacted, that "the said court," (the circuit court of the District of Columbia,) "and the judges thereof, shall have all the powers vested in the circuit courts, and the judges of the circuit courts of the United States."

A question was suggested, whether prosecutions, commenced at the last stated term, can be continued to, and tried at, this special session; and whether process upon presentments made, and indictments found, at that term, can be made returnable to this.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra,) was, after argument, in which the following cases were cited and considered, namely, U. S. v. Hamilton, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 18; U. S. v. Insurgents of Pennsylvania [Case No. 15,442]; and U. S. v. Cornell [Id. 14,868]; decidedly of opinion that the court, at this special session, cannot try any cause which was pending at the last stated session.

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug. 20, 1862.

PRIZE—APPRAISERS—LIBEL NOT FILED—NOTICE—CLAIMANT—ORDER SIGNED OUT OF DISTRICT.

1. This vessel having been sent in to the court as a prize, the court, on the application of the district attorney before libel filed, and before any appearance by any claimant, and without notice to any claimant, made an order appointing appraisers to value the prize, with the view to her being taken for the use of the government. After the libel was filed the claimant appeared in the suit, and moved to vacate the order because it was made without notice to him. Held, that the motion could not be granted.

2. Property captured as prize is under the control of the court from the time it is delivered to the court by the prize-master until it is finally disposed of, and the filing of a libel is not necessary to give the court cognizance of the property.

3. The fact that the order appointing appraisers was signed by the judge when out of this district is no objection to its validity.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel and cargo were captured, off Charleston harbor, July 31, 1862, and brought into this port, by a prize-master, on the 4th of August afterwards. On the 7th of August the district attorney addressed a letter to the judge, then absent from the city, and out of the district, stating that no appearance had been given in court for the prize, and, upon the usual evidence, requesting, in behalf of the government, that appraisers might be appointed to value the vessel and cargo, and that thereupon the prize might be appropriated and delivered over to the public use, on the deposit of its appraised value in the office of the assistant treasurer, subject to the judgment and direction of the court. The order was signed by the judge and remitted to the district attorney, and was filed in court on the 13th of August. By the papers filed on this motion it would appear that the order so signed was received here on the 9th of August. On the 8th of August the vessel and her fitments were libelled by the United States for condemnation as prize of war, and on the 9th of the month the claimants gave notice to the district attorney of their appearance in the suit. Upon these facts a motion is now made to vacate the above order of appraisal made in this suit, or for such other or further order as may be just. No specific order is indicated in the notice of motion, as sought for, other than one setting aside or vacating the order formerly granted, and the exception to that order would seem, on the papers, to be confined to a merely technical irregularity in the district attorney's office in not furnishing the claimants with previous notice of the application. The court would scarcely regard as of sufficient force to rescind the order the circumstance that a severe strictness in the mode of procedure in obtaining it, it being substantially one of course, was not observed. No objection of substance or to the merits is now interposed, either to the qualifications or integrity of the appraisers named, or to the amount of appraisement; and the criticism that the claimants were not called in to participate in their selection would be entitled, in such case, to slight weight, connected with the consideration that it does not appear affirmatively that the claimants actually entered their appearance in the suit until after the libellants had obtained the ratification of the appraisers proposed. It is not supposed that any court would be prone to reverse proceedings resting upon the explicit consent and solicitation of a party in interest, because of the mere omission of formalities by him in obtaining the subject-matter of his pursuit, and with which no other party then before the court was entitled to interfere. The question of the jurisdiction of the court, or its competency to authorize the appointment of appraisers at the time, will be considered under the other and main objection raised and discussed on the counter motion of the district attorney to execute the order by delivering over the vessel to the use of the libellants.

The point most strenuously urged by the several counsel was that the prize court acquires no cognizance of a prize case except by means of a libel, which causes an arrest, in law, of the property captured, and subjects it thereafter to judicial jurisdiction. This, it appears to me, is a manifest misapprehension of the state of the matter under the jurisprudence of the United States. The prize vessel and all her cargo and papers are, in the first instance, transmitted by the officer making the capture to the charge of the judge of the district to which such prize is ordered to proceed. 2 Stat. art. 7. The standing prize rules, fully confirmed by the act of congress "relative to judicial proceedings upon captured property and the administration of the law of prize," approved March 25, 1862, place the property captured under the control of the court and its officers, until the final adjudication and disposal of it by the court. The notion, therefore, that the prerogative powers of the government can be exercised only directly by the United States in its military capacity, and not at all through the courts, cannot be supported under our laws. Those high functions are legitimately put in force by the instrumentality of the judiciary, in obtaining, through its agency, the active use of the possession of prize property, which first vests in that department. Accordingly, an order for the appraisal of captured property, and the surrender or transfer of it to governmental uses, under precautionary provisions to secure individual interests vesting in it, is palpably a judicial power, to be performed at the instance of the government, and need not, if indeed it can, be superseded or dispensed with by a direct and summary act of appropriation of the property by the executive authority.

It is not intended, in the decision of this case, to go beyond the facts directly involved in it. I accordingly hold that the order asked for by the district attorney was correctly granted by the judge, on the assent, on the part of the libellants, to his authority to make it before any party was known to have intervened in the suit; and that, no objections being established against the competency of the appraisers, or adopted and confirmed by the court, in all its terms, it be executed accordingly. This decision does not proceed upon the assumption that the judge, when out of his territorial district can, of his own option, perform functions strictly judicial. The act of appointing appraisers ex parte would be performed by an order of course, entered in the book of orders within the district, and the signature of the judge given thereto in a neighboring district does no more than authenticate the ministerial act of the officers of the court, or permit them to perform it apud acta. I think, therefore, that this objection, as made, does not invalidate the signature, as given, or the force of the order. Order accordingly.

[Subsequently a decree of condemnation and forfeiture was entered against the vessel (Case No. 9,413), which decree was affirmed upon appeal to the circuit court. Id. 9,414.]

The case is now heard upon libel and proofs.]

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 9,414.]

BETTS, District Judge. The allegation in the libel, filed August 8, 1862, is, that this vessel and cargo were captured as lawful prize July 31, 1862, off Charleston Harbor, South Carolina, by the United States steamship Magnolia, and sent to this port for adjudication. Thomas S. Begbie and Peter Denny intervene as claimants of the vessel, alleging that they are British subjects, and owners of the vessel, which is a British vessel, and denying that she is lawful prize. The test oath of ownership is made by Donald Cruikshank, her master. Theodore Andrews, also a British subject, claims the cargo, and denies that it was lawful prize at the time of seizure. He makes the test oath of ownership. Both claims allege that the Magnolia, when she made the seizure, was not a vessel employed in enforcing the blockade of Charleston, but was casually passing on the ocean eighty-five miles from that place. This point was also made on the argument. Both of the above claims were filed September 2, 1862, by the same proctor. The vessel, by due course of interlocutory proceedings, was appraised and delivered to the government for the use of the United States, and was put into the public service before the final hearing of the cause, and public sale was also made of the cargo, as being perishable, and perishing in fact.

The evidence is ample and unquestioned that the vessel and cargo were, at the time of seizure, neutral property. The libellants claim that both are forfeitable, because the vessel had entered the port of Charleston on the preceding voyage, carrying with her articles contraband of war, and also in evasion of the blockade, well knowing at the time that the port was under actual blockade by the forces of the United States; and that the cargo seized on her was laden on board at Charleston, and brought out with intent to violate the blockade of that port then existing.

The testimony is clear, and was unquestioned on the trial, that the cargo on the outward voyage, landed at Charleston, consisted largely of articles contraband of war, and that the master and owners of the vessel and cargo well knew that the government of the United States claimed that the port of Charleston had been since May, 1861, held in a state of efficient blockade, and that an adequate force was stationed there to maintain the blockade. The documentary, notorious, and judicial evidence, connected with the points of law made by the defence, has been adverted to and detailed so repeatedly on those heads during the progress of this war, in the disposition of prize suits contested in the courts of the United States on captures made during the war, that it is superfluous to make a further recapitulation of these points until a judgment of the supreme court of the United States shall indicate that they are unsound and not warranted by law. I accordingly rule that the testimony taken in preparatorio in this suit satisfactorily establishes that the owners of the vessel and of her cargo had full notice and ample knowledge, when she was fitted out in England and sailed therefrom on this voyage, that a state of war existed between the United States and the seceded states; that Charleston was under an efficient blockade by the United States; and that the master and owners of the vessel on her outward and return voyage intended that the ingress and egress of the vessel to and from that port should be effected by an evasion of its blockade.

The point taken by the claimants, that the capture in this case is invalid because not made by a vessel actually stationed at the blockaded port, is not supported by any authority produced, nor does it comport with any reason upholding the authority of a belligerent to repress infractions of a blockade. The guilty vessel does not purge her offence by a successful act of fraud or deceit in preventing an arrest by the force supporting the blockade. Her capture is lawful, although the blockading force may be entirely absent from its port when the culpable act is committed. 1 Kent, Comm. 145. Any public vessel of the belligerent whose rights are violated may be the agent or minister to apprehend the offender, though, by dexterity or superior speed, the culpable actor may escape arrest at the time or place of the perpetration of the wrong. The only question which seems to be allowed in that respect is, whether the capturing vessel possessed the attributes of a national ship, so as to be entitled to participate in prize proceeds. The Charlotte, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 280; The Melomane, Id. 50. Yet, aside from any right to a participation in the prize proceeds, the power to capture an enemy vessel by any national force at sea seems irrefragable, whether the liability of the vessel attached arises from her positive hostile character, or from her violation of the belligerent rights of the captor. The Charlotte, 1 Dod. 220; The Donna Barbara, 2 Hagg. Adm. 373. The vessel and cargo in this case were captured in flagrante delicto; and after the undisguised avowal by the officers, on their examination in preparatorio, and the open contract on the shipping articles, all recognizing the culpability of both voyages, with the papers on board verifying the reward paid to the crew for accomplishing the illicit enterprise, it is not without surprise that the court has witnessed a formal issue made by the claimants on the justness of the seizure of the vessel and cargo. The legal point which has been pertinaciously invoked by the defence, that the United States public ship which arrested the culprit, not being stationed off the port as one of the blockading squadron, had no authority to make the capture, has no foundation in American or English prize law. A vessel guilty of an unlawful trade with the enemy is liable to capture for the offense at any time during the voyage in which the offence is committed. Hal. Int. Law, c. 21, § 12.

Decree of condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel and cargo ordered.

This decree was affirmed, on appeal, by the circuit court, July 17, 1863. [Case No. 9,414].

PRIZE—BLOCKADE—INTENTION TO RUN THE SAME.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.

[This case was first before the district court upon motion of claimants to vacate order appointing appraisers. Motion overruled. Case No. 9,412. Subsequently a decree of condemnation and forfeiture was entered against it. Id. 9,413. It is now heard upon appeal from this decree.]

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The steamer Memphis was captured on the 31st of July, 1862, by the United States sloop-of-war Magnolia, in latitude 33° 50′ north, and longitude 78° 19′ west, about eighty miles to the eastward of Charleston, South Carolina. The Memphis is an iron screw steamer, of 791 tons burden, by her register, Donald Cruikshank, master. She is a British vessel, and the cargo belongs to British subjects. Her voyage was, in fact, from Liverpool, England, to Nassau, and thence to Charleston, South Carolina. She left Liverpool on the 10th of May, and Nassau on the 19th of June, 1862, passing the United States blockading squadron, and entering Charleston, on the 23d of the same month. The cargo landed in Charleston consisted of eighty tons of gunpowder, a large quantity of rifles and muskets and general merchandise. She took on board, at Charleston, for her return voyage, some 1,500 bales of cotton and 500 casks of resin, which constituted her cargo at the time of her capture. Mr. Andrea, a part owner of the cargo which was put on board at Liverpool, says that it consisted of about 4,000 stands of arms and 900 barrels of powder; and that she had, when captured, 1,500 bales of cotton and 400 casks of resin.

The proofs are full to show that the master and Andrea, the owner of the cargo on board, knew of the blockade of Charleston at the time the vessel started for that place from Nassau, and intended to run it; and also when she left Charleston on her voyage home. They are too full and decisive of the criminal intent to call for any extended examination of them. Decree below affirmed.

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. March, 1872.[2]

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — CONTRACTS — CONDITIONS PRECEDENT — PAYMENT — INTENTION OF PARTIES—UNREASONABLE CONTRACT — MEASURE OF DAMAGES—NEGOTIABLE BONDS.

1. When contracts have been made, acts done, and labor performed in pursuance of a construction of a city charter, acquiesced in by all its citizens, such an interpretation will be sustained if justified by any possible reading of the statutes.

2. In reference to all acts which a municipal corporation has power in any mode, and by any agency, to perform, it may bind itself by those agents whom it suffers to act for it, and in the modes which it sanctions by its own usages.

3. Where the charter prescribes votes of shareholders, citizens or directors, or other formalities as conditions precedent to the performance of acts, and such acts are performed without such formalities, third persons acting in good faith may presume all has been done which the charter demanded, and the corporation will not be suffered to prove its own negligence or willful dereliction to defraud innocent parties of their labor, property or money.

4. A municipal, like a private corporation, may in the ordinary course of its government, and in the conduct of improvements it is its duty to execute, make promissory notes, bonds, guaranties, and all other agreements necessary or convenient for the economical and proper financial management of its affairs as fully as a natural person.

[Cited in Memphis v. Bethel (Tenn.) 17 S. W. 194.]

5. The mayor, city attorney and treasurer of the corporation having ordinarily been suffered to make similar agreements, may engage attorneys to collect demands due the municipality, when its interests demand such service.

6. If the service is in a suit in which the city is a party, or in which it is interested, and they are performed with the knowledge of the officials, it is liable for the services in the same manner as a natural person. Judgments holding the contrary depend upon statutes which expressly prohibit such retainers.

7. A guaranty of payment imposes an obligation to pay at the maturity of the security, and the holder need not wait the result of a suit against the principal debtor, but may demand the money from the guarantor immediately upon the dishonor of the paper.

8. The payment of a less sum is not a sufficient consideration for an agreement to discharge a greater, but the Code of Tennessee alters the common law rule, and enforces such contracts when in good faith fully performed according to the intention of the parties.

9. When an agreement is made by a debtor to deliver in full satisfaction of a large sum due, his notes or money for a less sum, even though there is a consideration for the agreement, it must, in order to operate as a discharge, be fully and fairly performed in all its parts, both in time and amount.

[See Bank of North Carolina v. Dewey, Case No. 897.]

10. Equity will not enforce the performance of unfair or hard or unreasonable contracts.

11. In order to sustain a contract of settlement without other sufficient consideration, upon the ground that it was the compromise of doubtful claims, the doubt must be such as would arise in the mind of an ordinarily intelligent person familiar with the class of things which is the subject of the settlement.

12. The measure of damages for the non-payment of money, or the non-delivery of a debtor's obligations for money, is the amount due and interest, and as an almost universal rule, no collateral damages can be given.

13. If negotiable bonds, of a class which by the usage of trade, are vendible in market at established rates, are to be issued in payment, accompanied with a sinking fund to give them greater market value, such bonds are to be treated as if they were chattels and things in esse, and the damages for failure to provide the fund will be the difference between the value of the bonds as they were agreed to be made, and the value as they were in fact made.

Suit at law was originally brought by [T. E.] Brown & Co. in this court for paving; subsequently the city filed its bill in equity against Brown & Co. in the state court, on the same contracts, to restrain certain collections by Brown & Co., and for an accounting. This suit the defendants removed to this court, and by consent of parties the subject of the action at law was by cross-bill united with this suit. The action is based upon two contracts made by the city with the assignors of Brown & Co., for street paving. Under the first, paving at the intersections of streets and alleys and opposite public ground, was to be paid for in cash by the city, and that opposite lots of private owners, by such owners, on bills to be made out by the city engineer, one-half when each section of 400 feet was done, and the other half, in installments, due in thirty, sixty and ninety days, the payment of which the city guaranteed. Under the second contract, the whole work was payable by the city, as each such section was done, in 6 per cent. coupon city bonds, running five, ten and fifteen years, guaranteed by a sinking fund. [Bonds were delivered for the work done, and were sold by the contractors to prosecute the work; but the city established no fund for their payment, nor paid the interest on them, and the bonds sold at the price of other unsecured city bonds, which was less than a sinking fund bond would have brought, and such difference the contractors claimed.][3] After some work had been done, this second contract was modified so as to make the work opposite private lots payable in cash as under the first. After most of the work was done, when over half a million dollars were due, the city agreed to loan Brown & Co., first $100,000, then afterwards $175,000 of its bonds, upon an agreement to secure them by pledges, and to return them with interest in eighteen months, and also to release the city from all liability on the contracts unless it should be determined by the court of last resort that the lot owners were not liable. Some forty thousand dollars of the bonds under this loan agreement were not delivered. [By the contracts the city was to collect the bills for paving from the lot owners, but that was mainly done by Brown & Co., at the request of the mayor and city attorney. Brown & Co. claimed compensation for such services, and also the reimbursement of moneys paid out to them to attorneys for enforcing other like collections.][4]

EMMONS, Circuit Judge. [4][A distinct consideration cannot be given to the manifold objections made by the counsel for the city in reference to the power of the mayor, the treasurer, the city attorney, and other officials to perform various acts during the progress of this work. That the mayor and other officers could not make the agreements to take the bonds below par, that they could not, under the contract order the work suspended, could not authorize the retention of counsel to aid the city attorney in duties for the benefit of the corporation, without a vote of the council, and various similar objections were elaborately urged.

[Deeming every one of them to refer to powers which the city had in some form and some mode full right to exercise, and being referred to no express statutory prohibition, forbidding the performance in the manner which is shown to be usual in its administration of this whole class of duties, we consider them all answered by the familiar doctrine that corporations, like individuals, are bound by acts of those whom they have suffered to act as their agents, and by such modes of action with or without vote, as they have by common usage sanctioned as proper. We repeat, after careful reconsideration, the doctrines in this regard contained in Ray v. Nashville, in the middle district of Tennessee, 1871.

[We had, in that case, the benefit of a most careful and learned argument. The securities of the city had been, in violation of its ordinances, put upon the market much below their par value. The court, after explaining to the jury the distinction between acts and contracts, which were not authorized at all by the charter, and those which were so authorized, but required the performance of official acts in order to render them regular, said that the latter, even though made or performed without the formalities demanded by the statute, bound the corporation as to all parties not having actual notice as to the irregularity. That this principle was applicable alike to negotiable and non-negotiable securities, to municipal as well as to private corporations. Among other charges, the following was given:

["It is in evidence, that, by usage, such instruments have been signed and issued by the officers who issued these. If you credit this evidence, it is sufficient to authorize you to find that the mayor, recorder, and treasurer were agents of the corporations for this purpose, and competent to bind it by these instruments. A corporation unless restricted as to manner by its charter, may, by holding out to the public officers as clothed with certain powers, be bound by their acts within the scope of the functions so equally exercised."

[This, it was said, was at least the law of the national courts, and most clearly that of Tennessee. In the same case we excluded offered evidence of irregularities in the issue of the securities sued on. The court in that case relied on the following federal judgments: Board of Com'rs of Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 539; Zabriskie v. Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co., 23 How. [64 U. S.] 381; Bissell v. Jeffersonville, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 289; Rogers v. Burlington, 3 Wall. [70 U. S. 654; Van Hostrup v. Madison City, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 291; Mercer Co. v. Hacket, Id. 83; Meyer v. Muscatine City, Id. 384; Supervisors v. Schenck, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 772; Mann v. Miami Co., 2 Black [67 U. S.] 722; Railroad Co. v. Howard, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 415; Mayor. etc., v. Lord, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 414. A great number of state adjudications were also cited and discussed by counsel in the case, which it is unnecessary to cite here, in view of the pointed character of the national and local state judgments in Tennessee. A small number from the extensive list are referred to, only to illustrate the principle we consider firmly embodied in the American common law. It is not peculiar to the federal courts or those of Tennessee. The citations of course might be greatly multiplied. They are collected by Messrs. Angell & Ames, by Mr. Redfield, and other writers upon this subject, to the propositions they deem long settled, and no longer questionable. Herm. City of San Francisco, 9 Cal. 469: The city officers had lighted the city buildings with gas without any contract of the common council. The gas company sued for the value of the gas so consumed during several years. Field, J., says: "The city is bound by its acts and conduct as an individual or private corporation. It is impliedly bound, and liable whenever justice demands it to be."

[Peterson v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 17 N. Y. 453: The suit was for plans for market, made at the request of a committee; although the contract of employment was void, the city was held liable on a ratification by the use of the plans. The court, by Denio, J., says: "The ratification may be by acts or conduct inconsistent with any other supposition than that it is intended to own and adopt the acts done in its name." Quoting Kent, J., he adds: "The doctrine that corporations can be bound by implied contracts, to be deduced by corporate acts, without either a deed in writing or vote, is generally established in this country with great clearness and solidity of argument," and quotes many cases. See, also, Meyer v. City of Muscatine, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 393; Gelpke v. City of Dubuque, Id. 175; Allegheny City v. McClurkan, 14 Pa. St. 83; Dougherty v. Hunter, 54 Pa. St. 381.

[In Ardesco Oil Co. v. Gilson, 63 Pa. St. 150, a suit for damages from the explosion of an oil refinery, built under the direction of the president of the company, without any special authority from the company, the court says: "It is their officers, having charge of their business, who, for all practical purposes, must be regarded as the corporation itself. The same rule of liability must be applied to them as to natural persons." See, also, Bank v. Gilstrap, 45 Mo. 419. Corwith, 48 Ill. 423; People v. City of Cairo, 50 Ill. 154; Blunt v. Walker, 11 Wis. 349; De Voss v. City of Richmond [18 Grat. 338]; San Francisco Gas Co. v. City of San Francisco, 9 Cal. 469; Trustees of Aberdeen Female Academy v. Mayor, etc., of Aberdeen, 13 Smedes & M. 647; 5 N. Y. (1 Seld.) 374; 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 61.

[Adams v. Railway Co., 2 Cold. 645, puts at rest all the objections in this case in reference to the want of authority to guarantee, to issue bonds generally, to agree to pay counsel for the collection of paying bills, to sell bonds below par, and all other subordinate acts in this case, germane to, and proper for, the execution of the main duty of contracting and paying for the paving of its streets. In that case the city guaranteed the bonds of the Little Rock R. R. Co., and to secure them mortgaged a tract of land donated to it by the United States. The charter contained no special provision authorizing this action. The supreme court of Tennessee deduced the right to make the mortgage and the instrument of guaranty solely from the implied power of the corporation. On page 660 they quote [White Water Valley Canal Co. v. Vallette] 21 How. [62 U. S.] 424, including the citations of state judgments, as follows: "It is well settled that a corporation, in the course of its ordinary business, may make bonds, note, mortgages, and drafts, except when restrained by law. 25 Barb. 146; 1 Sand. Ch. 280; 14 Barb. 358; 5 Watts & S. 223; 4 Robb. 517; 4 B. Mon. 423; 6 Gill & J. 323; 32 N. H. 486."

[The citation of this clause, including these judgments and the comments accompanying them, render it clear that the law of Tennessee fully authorizes the city of Memphis not only to issue negotiable securities, but to make the guaranty in question. This judgment is equally conclusive that in this state the nonperformance of conditions by a corporation, necessary to render its action regular, will not affect parties who are not cognizant of the irregularity. On page 661, and onward, Zabriskie v. Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co., 23 How. [64 U. S.] 381, is approvingly cited, as follows: "Corporations cannot, by their representations or silence, involve others in erroneous engagements, and then defeat the calculations and claims their own conduct had superinduced." This language is frequently used by the U. S. supreme court. 24 How. [65 U. S.] 300; 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 667, etc. They also cite and approve Mercer Co. v. Hacket, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 93; Board of Com'rs of Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 539; Avery v. Alleghany City, Id. 365; Van Hostrup v. Madison City, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 291. Although the case before the court was that of a municipal corporation, the rule was applied that it was estopped from setting up its own irregularities to defeat its apparently formal obligations with the same vigor as if it were a private company. All the cases referred to in support of the doctrine, except Zabriskie v. Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. [supra], are also those of municipal corporations. Towns, counties, and cities, and railroad companies, are all, by the judgments of this state, put upon the footing.] [4]

The city is liable to the contractors for the difference between the value of the bonds it agreed to give, and the value of those it did in fact give, the same as if it had agreed to deliver chattels, or the bonds of other corporations.

The questions which have given us most difficulty, and about which from the first, we have had most doubt, are—can any, and, if so, what damages be given against the city for its failure to provide the sinking fund covenanted for in the second contract, and what shall be the measure of recovery for a failure to return the $240,000 of borrowed bonds? This covenant of guaranty was intended to give value to and went to the character of the thing it agreed to deliver in payment for the work performed by the defendants. It has caused us much study, and although we have been afforded all the assistance which able counsel could give—anxious to aid our attempts to arrive at correct results, such has been the extraordinary pressure upon our time from other duties, that we are compelled to concede that our conclusions, however much confidence we have in their rectitude, cannot be sustained by such an argument as we should, in better circumstances, have been glad to present.

Owing to the novelty of some of the applications of principles demanded by the decree we make, we felt authorized to depart from those general rules which prevent coordinate judges from troubling each other with their judicial difficulties. We have, in this instance, consulted several of our circuit and district court brethren, and have received some most valuable aid from learned justices of state courts of last resort. They were all, without exception, decided in favor of the general principle that damages should be given, and that for the failure to return the borrowed bonds, the measure of recovery should be the market value only.

The measure of damages for the conversion of the note or other obligation of a private person, not intended for common circulation, and where there was no class of securities to which it belonged, which had by frequent sales acquired a market value, in an action by the maker of an instrument, is the nominal amount of par of the note or security. The same rule applies in an action against the debtor, when there is a failure on his part to deliver his own obligations. The only compensation, with rare exceptions, ever given by the common law for the non-payment of money, or the non-delivery of the private securities of individuals for money, is the maximum legal interest allowed by the lex loci contractus.

That if the note of a private party be converted, its par value is the criterion of recovery, Murray v. Burling, 10 Johns. 173; Buck v. Kent, 3 Vt. 99; Decker v. Mathews, 12 N. Y. 313; Sedg. Dam.; Evans v. Kymer, 1 Barn. & Adol. 528,—and many like judgments decide. There is no conflict in the decisions or commentators. The reason given is, that however below its par value may be the security, as the subject of immediate sale to the wrongdoer, its negotiation has in contemplation of law subjected the maker to liability for its whole amount. This rule, counsel for the city say, in its proper extension sustains the position that the non-delivery of the kind of bonds described in the contract, cannot create a liability beyond the amount which the contractors have subjected the city to pay, by the negotiation of the bonds they have voluntarily received. If the bonds in this case are to be likened to the notes of private persons, this position would manifestly conclude all claim of the contractors for the damages allowed by the master.

That the non-payment of money, or the non-delivery of the debtors' own obligations for money, subjects to no collateral damages, and that the principal and interest are the limit of recovery, is claimed to be the universal rule. 3 Pars. Cont. 214. This is too elementary and unquestioned to require verification, if it is asserted only as a general principle. Much reliance is placed upon its manifold applications in analogous agreements. The law, it is said, in all such cases, conclusively presumes there are no damages, because money, being the basis of the whole agreement, can always be obtained at the lawful interest. This old presumption, however, that money is always accessible on the instant, and that by no possibility can injury result which the statutory interest will not compensate, often so false in fact and frequently productive of the most substantial damages to the covenantee, caused by deliberate wrong and gross carelessness, has in modern times been frequently disregarded. Where, in the ordinary conventional process of commerce, upon which men are authorized to rely, losses have occurred, impossible of prevention by an ordinarily careful creditor, and clearly anticipated by a willful or negligent defaulting debtor, the most substantial and compensatory damages have been given. The distinction between the obligation to deliver a chattel and the payment of money, has been rejected. Courts of the very highest character have set these examples. In Rolin v. Steward, 14 C. B. 595, 78 Eng. Com. Law, 595, the defendant having funds, against which the plaintiff drew his check, neglected to pay it, and the paper was protested. In an action for non-payment, the jury found £500 damages. The court in deciding that substantial damages were lawfully awarded, although it deemed these excessive, approbate Marzetti v. Williams, 1 Barn. & Adol. 423, ruling the same principle, and hold that although it was but a debt in defendant's hands, inasmuch as the plaintiff was a trader, and would in all probability be injured by the failure to pay his drafts, the jury might find substantial damages. Sedg. Dam. (4th Ed.) 83, cites Boyd v. Fitt, 14 Ir. C. L. 43, where similar damages were given for a breach of an agreement to keep a sum of money in bank and to meet punctually plaintiff's drafts. Defendant having absented himself on a particular day, drafts were dishonored. Special damages were given for the loss of an agency by plaintiff, for the suspension of one branch of his business, and general injury to another trade. Rolin v. Steward is cited and approved. We do not overlook the real spirit of these decisions. They do not overrule the old doctrine that where one private citizen owes money to another, the creditor cannot on failure to pay, claim compensation for losses in future operations, predicated upon his expectations of the money. The rule applicable in all other cases, excluding remote and consequential injuries, would apply. Indeed we do not understand that any, but the most special circumstances, will sustain such a recovery at all. It is only when the probability of collateral loss is great—growing out of the accredited forms of business in so much that the irresistible presumption is, that both parties must have known and contemplated the results.

We know of no decisions which have as yet applied even such a limited rule to any case where the injury resulted from the peculiar private circumstances of the plaintiff. In those cited, the injury was such as might be presumed to attend similar defaults in reference to all traders, relying upon the regular performance of a financial duty, by defendant assuming a quasi public character—that of banker or broker. They partake strongly of the nature of an action on the case for negligence, although strictly in form ex contractu, and we do not suppose they intend to place in all cases the non-delivery of money in the same category with that of the like default in relation to personal property. In an extreme case where all the facts are known to the debtor, where he is, by the very face of the contract, by the nature of the subject, the amount required and the financial condition of the creditor or contractor, fully apprised that punctual payment is absolutely necessary for the prevention of irreparable losses, whether damages in any possible case could be given beyond interest, it is not necessary to decide. But I desire to say that further examination would be requisite if this record demanded a judicial answer before I would refuse to hold the municipal government of a large and prosperous city like that of Memphis, which ought at least to represent its wealth, and its gentlemen to that decent degree of responsibility upon its lawful contracts, to which the English courts have held its brokers and its bankers. The presumption of direct injury in cases like the present, is as forcible and general, it depends as little upon the exceptional condition of the contractor, as in the instances of traders whose checks are unlawfully dishonored. The contractor had as much right to rely upon the good faith of a government as upon the punctuality of a banker. When we take into consideration the magnitude of the work, the financial absurdity of supposing any man would place on deposit the million, necessary for its performance, and the knowledge derived, not from accidental information, but deduced with absolute certainty from the nature of the undertaking, that the proceeds of preceding portions were necessary for the completion of its successive sections—it would seem to present a case quite as urgently demanding substantial damages as any of those which have received such in judgment, and while the relief granted for the failure to provide a sinking fund, will not rest upon any assumption of a new general rule giving collateral damages for the non-payment of money, or the non-delivery of a defendant's private obligations for money, still the modern refusal to apply the rule which upholds it, to cases not within its reason, gives us more confidence that we are not unwarrantably extending the principle upon which we do rely, beyond its true limits. The judgments which have likened these public bonds to chattels and held them, even in the hands of their makers, to be the subjects of sale, pledge and contract, wholly divested of their common law features as mere evidences of indebtedness, have sprung from precisely the same commercial reasons and necessities as those judgments to which we have referred, giving substantial damages for the non-payment of money. This decision, however, is rested upon the assumption that the subjects of the contract are in all their features involved in the question of damages, to be treated like chattels in possession, and the public securities of other corporations or states. The rule of damages, therefore, in reference to chattels and the implications of law resulting from their reception and use, where a warranty has been broken, will be applied in this case.

We shall give the two questions of damages for failure to provide the sinking fund and to return the borrowed bonds, no distinct consideration. The same principles substantially govern each. The measure of damages for the conversion of goods, or of the obligations of third persons, is their market value in all cases not accompanied with special injury to the owner. For the non-delivery of goods or the obligations of third persons of the kind and value contracted for, it is the difference between the value of the chattel or bond agreed to be delivered and that which is in fact furnished. The following cases among many others sustain this rule in its application to the non-delivery of the obligations of third persons, including bonds, shares in corporations, bank bills, etc.: Shelton v. French, 33 Conn. 489 (a recovery was had of the difference in value between a bond with and without a guaranty); Coolidge v. Bringham, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 552. The difference in value between a note with a genuine and a forged endorsement was given. Not the face of the note, but its value as shown by the evidence. And see Struthers v. Clark, 30 Pa. St. 210; Henegar v. Isabella Copper Co., 1 Cold. 241; Simpkins v. Low, 49 Barb. 382; Otter v. Brevoort Petroleum Co., 50 Barb. 247; Enders v. Board of Public Works, 1 Grat. 364; Smith v. Dunlap, 12 Ill. 184; Baird v. Tolliver, 6 Humph. 186; Younger v. Givens, 6 Dana, 1; Robinson v. Hurley, 11 Iowa, 410; Cleveland & P. R. Co. v. Kelley, 5 Ohio St. 180. See, also, Redf. Wills, pt. 2, p. 312, and Sedg. Dam. That this is the rule in the case of the non-delivery of personal property, books need not be cited. It is entirely clear. Within this principle the contractors claim their own case comes. If these bonds in the hands of the corporation which makes them for public sale are to be treated for all purposes germain to the contest here, like chattels or other things in esse, like the bonds and securities of third persons, and other public securities; if they cannot be upon principle, and are not in fact, by the courts treated in any degree like the obligations of private individuals, where they refuse to deliver them according to contract, the same rule of damages will apply as if chattels were the subject of the agreement.

It is fully conceded by the counsel for the contractors that no such rule could be applied, if the contract was for the delivery of private notes of citizens in ordinary business between individuals. After much consideration we think no distinction should be made between the contract before the court, and one between the same parties for the same work payable in the public bonds of another corporation where there has been a refusal to deliver those of the kind contracted for. It is believed the adjudications already made in reference to the nature of these bonds, go quite beyond the necessities of the present case. That these corporate securities, under seal, made payable to bearer, and intended for sale in the public market, are negotiable, in as ample and full sense as the circulating medium of the country, the following adjudications which decide it in manifold applications determine: White v. Vermont & M. R. R., 21 How. [62 U. S.] 575; Board Com'rs Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, Id. 545; Zabriskie v. Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co., 23 How. [64 U. S.] 381; Woods v. Lawrence Co., 1 Black [66 U. City of Vicksburg, 31 Miss. 216; De Voss v. City of Richmond, 18 Grat. 338; Mills v. Gleason, 11 Wis. 488; Clark v. City of Des Moines, 19 Iowa, 213; Bank of Ashland v. Jones, 16 Ohio St. 145; all these judgments assert the general rule by which we have preceded them. Many of them go further and decide that such bonds are to be deemed essentially chattels, and things in esse, and not mere choses in action.

This has been done as often as exigencies required it. No judgment conceding their negotiability, has denied the additional feature of their similitude to chattels. Pennsylvania alone decides differently, confessing that this local rule is exceptional, and at war with well settled law here and in England.

It would be useful and very persuasive evidence of the conclusions at which we have arrived, to follow the numerous applications of this general principle through the cases which announce it. The pressure upon the court and the absence of all clerical assistance which forbids elaborate examination, render this impossible; a few instances only in illustration of how fully the courts have likened these bonds to chattels, and how substantially they have refused to apply the old rule of the common law, applicable to the non-delivery of the evidences of indebtedness of individual defendants, to bonds like these, can be referred to. If the note or other chose in action of a private party is pledged as security for a debt, the creditor, owing to the nature of the subject, takes only the power of collection, not that of selling it. See Morris, C. & B. Co. v. Fisher, 1 Stockt. [9 N. J. Eq.] 667; Morris C. & B. Co. v. Lewis, 1 Beasley [12 N. J. Eq.] 323; Wheeler v. Newbould, 5 Duer, 29, on appeal 16 N. Y. 392; Brown v. Ward, 3 Duer, 660; Garlick v. James, 12 Johns. 146. The reason given is that such securities have no market value like chattels, are not so dealt with in commerce and that there is, therefore, no implied power of sale. Where bonds of a corporation intended for general sale, like those now in question, are thus pledged, this rule has been in vain invoked to invalidate their sale by the pledge. That literally they come within this rule is conceded. That they are choses in action, evidences of indebtedness, is said; but of so different a nature from those included in the principle relied on, that they are to be treated like chattels, and must be subject to the same rule and property incidents. In Wheeler v. Newbould, 5 Duer, 29, on appeal 16 N. Y. 392, in deciding that private notes could not be sold, they go upon reasons necessarily involving the right to do so, if they had the incidents of such securities as those before us. The following case (Brown v. Ward) in 3 Duer, 660, had been tried, but not determined, when the preceding one was decided in the superior court. In the latter, the public bonds of a railroad company had been pledged and sold like personal property. The court sustaining the sale expressly distinguished the case from Wheeler v. Newbould upon the ground that the subject of the pledge was to be treated like things in esse, and not like the private notes in that case. In Morris C. & B. Co. v. Lewis, 1 Beasley [12 N. J. Eq.] 323, the company's own bonds were pledged to secure its own debt, and sold at about thirty cents on the dollar. The court says the bonds in the hands of the company making them were alike the subjects of pledge and sale as were personal chattels. They were not to be treated like those of private persons. See, also, Morris C. & B. Co. v. Fisher, 1 Stockt. [9 N. J. Eq.] 667. There are other similar judgments but this principle is undoubted. These have been particularly noticed only to say, that every reason upon which this whole case rests, shows that if the same defendant had three different classes of bonds—1st, 2d, and 3d, worth according to the priority of their respective liens, 100, 75 and 50 cents upon the dollar, and they should make a contract for work, or for the purchase of engines and cars, agreeing to pay therefor in their first mortgage bonds at par, and should deliver instead those of the third class of one-half their value in the market, the company would be liable in damages for the difference in value between what it agreed to and what it did deliver. Freed from all questions of waiver and unembarrassed by the old notion that interest is the measure of damages for the non-delivery of money, or a chose in action for money, and treating the subject of the contract as what the courts now affirm they are, chattels and things in esse, no plainer proposition can be stated than that the breach of the contract subjects the violater to substantial damages.

Hasbruck v. City of Milwaukee, 21 Wis. 217, Wills v. Gleason, 11 Wis. 488, Cady v. Watertown, 18 Wis. 322, and other similar cases, although not in their principle distinguished from White Water Val. Canal Co. v. Vallette, 21 How. 414, and the large class to which it belongs, are in their facts so like the case before the court as to entitle them to special mention. In 21 Wis. 217, the corporation contracted to pay for a public work in its bonds at par. City officials without special resolution agreed, if the contractors would proceed, they should have the bonds much below par. This modification was sanctioned by the court of last resort. It overruled manifold objections to the general power of the corporation to make such an agreement, and if it had the authority of its officials without formal corporate action to do so. A similar transaction between the citizens dealing with private notes would have been illegal upon many common law and statutory grounds. Reposing, however, upon the peculiar character of these securities, it was held the city might dispose of them at their market value. The whole treatment of the case necessarily includes the propositions essential to give these contractors substantial damages, where the corporation has contracted to deliver them one kind of bonds, and has constrained them to accept another. The other citations quite as forcibly, for our purpose here, apply the principle which holds these securities to be subjects of sale and payment by the city at the common price. It is well settled law, too, that when a citizen desires a loan of money, and makes his private note for the purpose of raising it, that no device of sale, pledge or other collateral transfer can protect the ownership of him who receives it from the imputation of usury if taken at a price less than that which will allow him lawful interest. May v. Campbell, 7 Humph. 450; Taylor v. Bruce, Gilmer, 42; 10 N. Y. 198; 9 B. Mon. 530; 8 Cow. 689. The judgments are very numerous to this point. In circumstances identically like those where private paper has been held void for usury, a like disposition of this class of bonds has been held not to come within this rule. Municipal, railroad and other public and quasi public corporations, have, in numerous instances, where the sole object has been a loan, published and negotiated as such, and where no statute authorized a sale below par and where the question turned solely upon the essential and substantial character of the security sold, disposed of their bonds at rates giving the purchaser manifold the lawful interest, and it has been adjudged not to be usurious.

The point has been in all these cases directly raised, and the judgment always rested upon the answer to the question, are they to be treated like chattels or like the choses in action of private persons? The answer has been that where a corporation makes such securities for vendition in the market, they are to be treated as if it offered for sale its personal property, or the notes and bonds of other corporations. In White Water Val. Canal Co. v. Vallette, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 414, mortgage bonds of the corporation reciting that they were intended for a loan, were paid at fifty cents on the dollar to a contractor. It was claimed that the transaction was usurious, but the supreme court going upon the nature of the securities and the transaction, held it to be lawful. In Morris C. & B. Co. v. Fisher, 1 Stockt. [9 N. J. Eq.] 667, like bonds of the company to double the amount were pledged to secure a debt. In support of the plea of usury it was argued that it was but the pledge of one promise to secure another, that the legal consequences could not be different than if the whole transaction had been evinced by a single contract. It was quite conceded by the learned court that had it so been, or had the dealing been with the private paper of an individual in a like transaction, it would have been unlawful; nevertheless it was held that these public securities in the hands of the corporation which makes them, as well as in those of third persons, are to be treated like other personal property, and the objection was not sustained. In Bank of Ashland v. Jones, 16 Ohio St. 145, bonds of a railroad company having been guaranteed and sold at a price under par, and suit brought upon the guaranty, among other objections urged was that of usury. In the argument by which it was overruled, the court say the bonds in the hands of the original makers "are like chattels." The guaranty is substantially treated like the warranty of personal property, and see the cases of Curtis v. Leavitt, 17 Barb. 311, on appeal 15 N. Y. 200; Leavitt v. De Launy. 4 Comst. [4 N. Y.] 364; Tracy v. Talmage, 18 Barb. 456, 14 N. Y. 162; People v. Mead, 24 N. Y. 125. The argument and illustrations to be found in this whole class of judgments leave nothing for the court by way of analogy or extension of their principles, in order to decide that the delivery of a bond of less market value, and of materially a different character from that agreed upon, subjects the corporation to damages. The case comes within the conceded truism that the measure of recovery for the breach of an express warranty in the sale of personal chattels is the difference between the value of the thing as warranted and its value as actually delivered. Numerous decisions, many of which are obligatory upon this court, determine principles which we think brings the subject of this contract within the rule. That in this case the city should respond in damages in justice to the contractors, is apparent from the fact that upon a resale of some of these bonds with like warranty these very defendants were held liable to this measure of damages. Callanan v. Brown (1871) 31 Iowa, 333.

In the hurried examination we have been compelled to make, we find but one case of the exact application we make of these principles to the question of the liability of the contractors, for the bonds loaned, though we can affirm with much confidence there are others. In Tracy v. Talmage, 18 Barb. 456, 14 N. Y. 162, the state of Indiana sold its own bonds to a trust company. The sale was held void for illegality, but the company was held liable to the same measure of damages as if it had disposed of the bonds without any contract. The court below decreed their payment at par. The superior court modified the judgment in this respect and held their market value to be the true criterion. The case is one of the most elaborately argued upon the question of illegality to be found in the books. That of damages was not fully discussed, but from the character of the counsel, its re-argument in the court of appeals, the modification of the decree in that court upon this very point, it is very high evidence of the law that where such securities are converted the measure of recovery in a suit by the maker is their market value and not as in the like case of the private note of an individual, the sum which he may be ultimately compelled to pay. The different rules are naturally adapted to probable financial consequences of the act or omission complained of. The private citizen has circulating no class of securities having a well known price, and which, in theory and fact, he can, at any moment, purchase at market standard. If his note is borrowed and not returned he must pay its amount. If the bonds are converted or withheld which have an established price at which they are in fact purchasable, no possible injury beyond it can result from withholding them. Every familiar rule regulating the right to damages, that which stops at the limit of loss but gives all which the real loss is, will sustain both branches of this portion of our decree. They will compensate for refusal to deliver the more valuable bond agreed upon by the city, and will restrain its recovery to the value in the market of what it loaned and what it can still purchase for the sum allowed by the master.

[4] [The acceptance and sale of the bonds was not a waiver of the claim for damages. The guaranty in this case is not technically a warranty of the bonds. It is for the performance of a collateral act affecting their value. The legal and financial consequences, however, are precisely the same as if the city had warranted the bonds to be of a particular character. Their treatment, therefore, has been and will be the same as if they were the special subjects of the guaranty.

[We are referred to no decision giving any countenance to the position that mere acceptance and use by the contractors is per se a waiver of the breach of warranty on the part of the city. Counsel have not relied upon them, but there are a few decisions holding that in action for the price of goods sold with a warranty the defendant could not show the breach if he had accepted the property, and a few commentators, misapprehending them, have erroneously supposed they rested upon the ground of waiver, and that there could be no recovery in any form for a breach of warranty after a voluntary appropriation of the subject. Those judgments, however, announce no such rule; but, on the contrary, some of them expressly, and all of them impliedly, concede there may be a cross action for the damages, notwithstanding the acceptance and use. The decisions say only, that under the general issue, in an action upon a contract, there could be no partial defense. It is a mere question of pleading and form of action.

[The general doctrine that the vendee of personal property with warranty may maintain an action for the breach, notwithstanding he has accepted and used it, is well established in this country, and especially in the federal courts. Withers v. Green, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 213; Benjamin v. Hillard, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 149; Lyon v. Bertram, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 150. Numerous similar cases are found in the circuit courts. It is, however, by no means peculiar to the national jurisprudence, for in its earlier history, there being some decisions tending the other way, they adopted the rule we have announced, because it was supported by so many state adjudications. Every American treatise announces the rule which is applied in the following judgments. They decide and illustrate the principle that waiver is a question of fact, depending upon the circumstances of each case, and that the law will not presume a waiver where it is not clear that the parties intend one. Kellogg v. Denslow, 14 Conn. 411; Reed v. Randall, 29 N. Y. 358; Muller v. Eno, 14 N. Y. 598; Borekins v. Bevan, 3 Rawle, 23; Osgood v. Lewis, 2 Har. & G. 496; Hastings v. Lovering, 2 Pick. 214; Field v. Kinnear, 4 Kan. 476; Babcock v. Trice, 18 Ill. 420; Coolidge v. Brigham, 1 Metc. [Mass.] 547; Fielder v. Starkin, 1 H. Bl. 17; Buchanan v. Parnshaw, 2 Term R. 745; Heyworth v. Hutchinson, L. R. 2 Q. B. 447; 1 Pars. Cont. (5th Ed.) 591; Benj. Sales, 463, 522, 673, et seq.; Sedg. Dam. (4th Ed.) 319.

[Within the rule of these cases, the acceptance and use of these bonds must either have ben sold or the work must have stopped. It is an irresistible inference from the proof that every city official knew the rate at which they were being disposed of—one utterly ruinous to the contractor, if he was to have no remedy for the city's default. So far from the circumstances under which the parties acted indicating an intention on the one part, or expectation on the other, of waiver, the presumption is much stronger of an understanding that they would be sold at a discount and the loss made good.] [4]

There is one objection to this limited measure of recovery by the city which deserves notice and which could not well be dealt with in other connections. It was said by the corporation's counsel that whatever other powers the city might exercise and howsoever its officers without vote might bind it in the ordinary and accustomed course, at least there was no power anywhere in the charter to make its bonds for the purpose of loaning them to third persons, and such a loan, upon the face of the papers, this transaction was. As a general proposition, if it were simply a loan and no more, I should say counsel are right. Few such corporations have any power of making negotiable securities solely for the purposes of loan and circulation. But here, although called a loan, being made to its own creditor and in furtherance of an object it was its duty to promote, it would seem quite clearly beyond the reach of any such objection. It is, however, wholly immaterial here, because if illegal then, as is decided in the case of Tracy v. Talmage, just cited, the contract being void, the defendant will be held to have wrongfully converted the bonds and the measure of recovery be what is here allowed, their market value. Although quite in another connection, and having reference to a matter before disposed of, we add that if this point is well taken, if the contract of loan is void for illegality, it necessarily renders also void the release which is a part of it. If void in part, it is so, of course, in whole.

It is to be regretted that a novel application of general doctrines, one believed to be beneficial in all its rightful limitations, should for the first time come before the court in circumstances well calculated to startle a conservative judgment and challenge the severest criticism of the principle which allows such damages at all. We have endeavored, however, to disregard the accidents of this record, and not to be deterred from an assertion of what was thought to be a right rule, because in the instance before us the proof forces a decree beyond what (had there been a fit administration of the city finances,) ought to have resulted from similar defaults. There should with public confidence in the integrity and intelligence of the municipal government, be no such extraordinary difference in price as the witnesses establish. The city, for some reason, introduced no testimony whatever upon the difference in market value between bonds secured by a sinking fund and such as were delivered in their stead. It may be true, that such was the reputation of the city government, that no counter proof upon this point would have varied results; still, so far as the amount of damages is concerned, it would be more satisfactory to know whether such a consciousness withheld the efforts or a reliance upon the doctrine that the whole inquiry was immaterial. That a superior court will adopt our views, we are not confident; but being certain that at an early day the general principles upon which we rely, must be adopted into our law, we have not hesitated to declare it now, although no precedent precisely applicable has been found for our decree.

[NOTE. Upon appeal to the supreme court the decision in this case was reversed as to the amount to be recovered, several of the items being stricken out. 20 Wall. (87 U. S.) 289. In accordance with the mandate of the supreme court a decree was entered in the circuit court for $292,133.47 and costs. Execution was issued and returned nulla bona. The plaintiff then filed his petition for mandamus to compel the city of Memphis to levy a tax sufficient to pay his judgment. Upon a hearing the writ was issued (case unreported). This decision was affirmed by the supreme court. 97 U. S. 293. See, also, collateral appeals, Id. 284, 300. Subsequently the case was again heard in the circuit court upon the petition of the plaintiff for a writ of mandamus compelling an additional levy. The writ was granted. Case No. 2,020.]

An assignee must give a special bond in each case where a bond is required; a general bond is not authorized..... 85

An assignee, clerk of the bankrupt's attorney, who is charged with mismanagement, and whose removal is asked by the creditors, will be removed, but he will be protected against costs, where it appears that he acted in entire good faith..... 546 —— Rights, duties, and liabilities.

The property and rights of the bankrupt are vested in the assignee by relation from the time of filing the petition in bankruptcy 253

When a parcel of the bankrupt's land is wholly absorbed by the first lien, the assignee is under no duty to ascertain the validity of subsequent liens.....1147

Suppression of material facts by the assignee while obtaining authority from the court to make a contract to pay counsel one-half the gross recovery in a cause makes the contract invalid, but a reasonable sum will be allowed.....1223 —— Discharge.

The court may set aside a discharge of the assignee, which has inadvertently found its way into the court files, and order him to proceed.....1223

Property of bankrupt—Custody and control.

A provisional assignee will not be appointed unless the court is satisfied that it is necessary for the protection of the property, and that it will inure to the benefit of all the creditors..... 593

The removal of the debtor's goods in fulfillment of an existing contract, made long before the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings, is not sufficient ground. 593

A receiver will be appointed for property incumbered by liens before the court for adjustment, although the bankrupt has relinquished possession to a prior incumbrancer 262

On breach of the condition of a bond given, pursuant to an order of the court, for the forthcoming of property, which the bankrupt is allowed to retain, the court may proceed against the sureties by summary petition 1262

Such a proceeding is not barred by the fact that the assignee previously brought a suit at law on the bond, resulting in a verdict for defendant, which was set aside and a new trial granted.....1262

—— Exemptions.

The approval by congress of the new constitution of North Carolina did not operate as an amendment of the bankrupt law with respect to exemptions therein provided for 239

Household furniture and other articles are exempt, though taken under execution before commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings 850

Where a conveyance of the homestead has been set aside at the suit of the assignee, the homestead rights remain, and the assignee holds subject to them..... 90

The district court cannot go behind a judgment of a state court and inquire into the consideration of the debt upon which it was founded..... 225

A creditor attaching lands of the bankrupt in a state court over four months before commencement of the proceedings may proceed to judgment and execution unless the assignee intervenes.....1147

A mortgage given on both land and personalty will be enforced as to the land first, where there are other liens on the personalty 280

The federal court will not take jurisdiction where the liens on the bankrupt's property will more than absorb it..... 283

—— Sale.

It is not the duty of the assignee to petition the court respecting the sale of incumbered property, unless he believes it will produce a fund in excess of the incumbrances 1304

A sale by the assignee without an order of court is subject to all lawful incumbrances 1304

A sale by the assignee free from all liens will not divest liens of judgments not specified in the petition or order of sale..... 107

A simple confirmation by the court is not a ratification of the act of the assignee in excess of his authority..... 107

Nor does the presence of the judgment creditor at the sale estop him, where there was no authority to sell clear of his judgment 107

A sale of incumbered land free of the incumbrances, without notice to the lien creditors, may be set aside by the court on petition of such creditors and notice to the purchasers 526

The voluntary assignee has no right to buy of the marshal a stock of goods ordered by the court to be sold as likely to deteriorate, and such sale will be set aside on motion of the assignee..... 700

Where mortgaged personalty of an absconded bankrupt was sold by agreement, under order of court, and the proceeds paid into court, held, that the right thereto, as between the mortgagee and assignee, must be determined by a petition for distribution, and not by suit.....1084

A claim founded on a judgment recovered after commencement of the proceedings, without leave of the bankrupt court, is not provable 1221

The running of limitation against claims is arrested by the filing of the petition, and the suspension continues so long as there is a fund to distribute.....1221

Money advanced by a firm to a member beyond his share of the capital is a separate debt of the firm against such member, and the assignee of the firm may prove it.. 240

If there is any joint fund, however small, even if purposely created by separate creditors by purchasing worthless partnership assets, partnership creditors cannot prove against the separate estate concurrently with separate creditors..... 929

A holder of different notes, all made for partnership debts, but some executed by the firm, and indorsed by the partners, and others made by individual partners, may prove the former against the firm, and the latter against the individual, assets.....1277

The assignee cannot prove against the separate estate of a partner for moneys withdrawn by the latter from the firm without fraud against his copartners, though with knowledge of insolvency of the firm.....1209

When a debt from one partner to a bankrupt firm was incurred by the consent or privity of the other partners, proof of the joint creditors against the separate estate will not be admitted..... 82

Where there is a surplus in the hands of the assignee after paying all other creditors in full, he cannot object to proof of a claim by a judgment creditor from whom he has recovered the amount collected on his judgment 132 —— Secured debts.

A firm creditor, whose debt is secured by pledge of individual property, is bound, on request of the individual creditors, to prove his whole debt against the joint assets...1208 —— Set-off.

A creditor may set off notes of the bankrupt purchased with knowledge of his insolvency, but before the filing of a voluntary petition.....1154

A debtor buying a claim against the bankrupt after known insolvency and contemplated bankruptcy cannot set it off against his debt 1149

Property recovered, after the bankrupt's discharge, by means of a suit in which the assignee was substituted as plaintiff more than two years after his appointment, cannot be claimed by the bankrupt on the ground that the action was barred.....1223
A decree declaring a conveyance void at the suit of the assignee, and directing defendant to convey to the assignee, does not establish title in the assignee under such defendant, nor any privity between them... 90
One compelled to surrender to the assignee property purchased with knowledge that it was fraudulently conveyed is not entitled to reimbursement for improvements, or for money advanced to reduce incumbrances 1277

Review.

An order for the sale of lands of the bankrupt free of incumbrances may be reviewed in the circuit court under section 2, Act 1867 769
The circuit judge has power in vacation, at his chambers, outside the district, to entertain and act upon a petition for review. 769
A petition filed by the bankrupt after discharge, praying that certain money recovered for his estate since the discharge might be applied to his debts and the costs of the proceedings, and the balance paid to him, is not a bill in equity, but a petition, and a decree thereunder is reviewable by petition 1223

Arrangement with creditors: Composition.

A second meeting will be ordered where the object of the first one failed by reason of the mistakes or misinstructions of attorneys for creditors..... 69
Creditors who have not proved their debts are not entitled to vote on proposals for compositions 1093
A provision of the agreement that the proceedings may be discontinued at any time without notice to the creditors is not binding on the court..... 313
Confirmation of a composition payable in equal quarterly installments in three years refused where a defaulting officer was continued in office 313
A composition is none the less payable in money because the payment is postponed to a future day..... 313
In a voluntary proceeding in which a composition had been agreed upon for payment of 30 per cent. in cash, held, that a discontinuance and restoration of the property would not be decreed on petition of the bankrupts joined in by a majority of creditors until the terms of the composition had been carried out..... 207
A composition agreement, where no assignee was appointed, held to bind creditors in another state whose names were entered on the schedule, but not to affect their rights in rem against property attached... 103

BANKS AND BANKING.

Construction of special charters of certain Ohio banks..... 264
A charter authorizing a bank to discount notes, etc., on banking principles, does not make void a contract or note reserving more than 6 per cent. interest..... 264
The Bank of the United States is bound to pay the full amount of a note which has been cut in two, and each part mailed separately to it, though but one part is received. 885
A bank president borrowed money for his personal use, on the security of shares of stock fraudulently issued to him. The money went into the assets of the bank. Held, that it was liable therefor..... 602

It is within the authority of a cashier to sign a blank transfer on a certificate of stock held as collateral, and deliver the certificate to the pledgor, on payment of the loan 1113

A declaration at law by a single bank creditor to enforce the charter liability of one stockholder, who owns nearly all the stock, for twice the amount of his shares, is not demurrable where it does not appear that there are any other creditors..... 804

National banks may hold real-estate security acquired by subrogation from a holder of a negotiable note.....1094

A national bank cannot purchase its own stock 568

To relieve the holder of national bank stock from the obligations imposed by law, the transfer by him must be made on the books of the bank to some person capable of succeeding to his obligations..... 568

Stockholders of an insolvent national bank are bound by the action of the comptroller in making an assessment against them, and have no right to examine the accounts of the receiver as to the assets or debts of the bank..... 568

The jurisdiction of the federal circuit court on a creditor's bill against a national bank, for discovery and other relief upon allegations of fraud by the officers, is not superseded by the appointment of a receiver by the comptroller..... 71

In such case, the costs of a master appointed to investigate the affairs of the bank will be ordered to be paid by the receiver 71

Where usurious interest has been actually paid, double the amount thereof may be recovered from a national bank under Rev. St. § 5198 768

An assignee in bankruptcy is a "legal representative," within Rev. St. § 5198, and may sue to recover usurious interest paid to a national bank..... 768

BILLS, NOTES, AND CHECKS.

Orders.

An order drawn on a general or particular fund does not amount to an assignment of that part, or give a lien, as against the drawee, unless there has been an express or implied acceptance by him..... 299

Letter of credit.

The acceptor of bills drawn under the usual forms of commercial letters of credit can compel the holder of the letter to furnish funds to meet the acceptances; and a bill due by the issuer of the letter to the holder cannot be set off against this obligation 8

Validity.

It is a good defense to a note given in 1864, for the hire of slaves, that, as part of the consideration, the hirer was to keep them out of reach of the Federal army.... 888

Indorsement and transfer.

One holding a promissory note as collateral security is not a purchaser for value.. 155

Notes given by factors by way of advances on goods consigned, where not in excess of the value of the goods cannot be held to be accommodation paper..... 676

Fraud in the origin of a negotiable note is no defense against a bona fide holder...1038

A member of a company, who individually discounts a note belonging to the company, without knowledge of fraud in its origin, is yet affected by the fraud of the company's agent 1038

The holder must show the insolvency of the maker, to maintain suit against the indorser 153

An indorser is in any event liable to his indorsee only for the amount actually paid by the indorsee, with lawful interest thereon, and not for the face value of the note. 676

One indorsing a note, after previous indorsement by two others for accommodation of the maker, may recover from either of them the whole amount paid by him to take up the note.....1048

The indorsers of accommodation paper are considered as joint sureties, and liable to contribution 41

On a several indorsement for the accommodation of the maker of a note, one indorser, who is obliged to take up the note, may recover his proportion from the other.*488

Demand: Notice: Protest.

The custom of merchants as to days of grace does not apply as between maker and payee 231

To hold the indorser of a note payable on demand demand must be made within a reasonable time. An unexplained delay of seven months is unreasonable..... 918

Demand by a notary public, the day after the last day of grace, upon the indorser at his house (where the note was payable), without inquiring for the maker, or whether he had funds there, held not sufficient to bind a second indorser.....1307

Testimony of a notary that he made demand at the shop of an indorser, but did not remember whether he saw him, held not sufficient proof of notice.....1307

Where Sunday is the last day of grace, demand must be made on Saturday, but notice may be given on Monday..... 82

If Sunday be the last day of grace, the demand, protest, and notice may be on Saturday, and suit may be instituted the same day, after banking hours..... 592

The accommodation drawer of a check on a bank in which he had no funds is entitled to notice of nonpayment, where the holder took it with knowledge that the drawer had reasonable expectations that the drawee would furnish funds to meet it. 155

Notice to an indorser should be given, though he be beyond sea, if his residence is known, and reasonable diligence should be used to find his place of residence..... 312

A notice left at a boarding house where the indorser resided when it was drawn, but which he had left without the holder's knowledge, having embarked for Europe, held sufficient 312

Release or discharge of indorser.

The indorser is released where, without his consent, the holder assents to the discharge of the maker in bankruptcy..... 36

Plaintiff must show, in an action against the indorser, that he instituted his suit against the maker in due time, and prosecuted it diligently to an ineffectual execution 591

A promise by an indorser to pay, after being discharged by neglect of due notice, is not binding unless made with knowledge of all material facts..... 918

Actions.

In Georgia, both total and partial failure of consideration is pleadable in defense to sealed notes or single bills..... 888

A note in the hands of an assignee is prima facie evidence that the face thereof was paid by him for it, but the assignor can prove what actually was paid..... 896

Due diligence in making demand and giving notice cannot be inferred from the fact that the parties to a check resided in the same town, and that the drawer was insolvent 218

BILLS OF LADING.

See, also, "Admiralty"; "Affreightment"; "Carriers"; "Demurrage"; "Shipping."

The master is bound to give a bill of lading when goods are laden on board, even if the freight is not agreed on, or there is a dispute about it; and in such case the bill need not specify the freight.....1250
A bona fide purchaser of a bill of lading to consignee or order may hold the ship liable, though the goods are replevied on arrival by one who sold them to the shipper, for nonpayment of the price. (Affirming 956.) 955
A vessel is liable to a consignee who has advanced money on the bill of lading, although the goods were illegally seized by the customs authorities at the commencement of the voyage.....1108
A bill of lading stating the weight of the cargo on the representations of the shipper, without weighing, binds the consignee to pay freight on such weight, where he receives the goods without weighing them.. 563
The acknowledgment that cargo was received in good order may be explained or disproved by parol testimony..... 867
The option to reconsign under the provision "with shipper's reconsignment option" cannot be exercised by the consignee; and parol evidence is inadmissible to show a usage to the contrary..... 123
The answer, in an action on a bill of lading, which fails to allege that the damages claimed accrued from the sweating of the vessel, is amendable..... 11

BONDS.

See, also, "Counties"; "Municipal Corporations"; "Principal and Surety"; "Railroad Companies."

A bond under seal, perfect in all respects, held valid against the sureties, notwithstanding their testimony that they signed on condition that another signature should be obtained 1261
The liability of sureties signing a bond, given pursuant to an order of court copied therein, is unaffected by anything the obligee may tell them as to their liability..1262
In debt on a bond with collateral condition, nothing is recoverable but what the obligee is entitled to on a breach of the condition 1073

BOTTOMRY AND RESPONDENTIA.

The risk of the lender, and his right to repayment only on the safe arrival of the vessel, constitute the essential difference between bottomry and a simple loan..... 938
Marine interest is requisite to a bottomry loan, but, if not expressed in the bond, it will be presumed to have been included with the principal..... 938
The owner, as well as the master, may pledge the vessel by bottomry in a foreign port; and, while the power of the master is limited to cases of necessity, the owner may pledge her for money to purchase cargo.. 938
Supplies are "necessary" when fit and proper for the service, and such as a prudent owner would order.....1309
Page
A bill of exchange taken with a bottomry bond for the same sum must share the fate of the bond..... 522

BOUNDARIES.

See, also, "Deeds"; "Grants"; "Public Lands."

Courses and distances must give way when inconsistent with calls in the deed for natural or well-known artificial objects.. 340

CARRIERS.

See, also, "Affreightment"; "Average"; "Bills of Lading"; "Charter Parties"; "Demurrage"; "Shipping."

A contract by passengers with an agent of a stage line, limiting the number of passengers for the trip, is not admissible in an action for damages by a passenger not a party to it, who entered the coach on the way 1182
In such case, defendant may prove a general custom as to number of passengers carried, but not the practice of its own line...1182
Stage owners are bound to the greatest care; and the least neglect or want of skill by the driver makes them liable for injuries to a passenger.....1182
It is the duty of a stage driver to caution the passengers when about to pass over a dangerous bridge or piece of road.....1182
A stage proprietor is bound to furnish proper coaches, horses, and harness, and a skillful and careful driver, and he is liable for the smallest degree of negligence in this particular 219
A stage proprietor is not responsible for casualties which could not be foreseen nor guarded against 219
The upsetting of a stage is prima facie evidence of negligence in the proprietor, and the passenger need not show more.... 219
A vessel receiving goods from a connecting carrier under a through bill of lading may be sued primarily for goods lost by her 1203
A carrier by water must, as a general rule, notify the consignee of the arrival of the goods. If he fails to do so, he must prove an excuse.....1006
The fact that a carrier is accustomed to store goods in his warehouse until the consignee learns from the consignor of their arrival does not excuse the carrier from himself notifying the consignee, where it is not shown that the consignor knew of the practice 1006
A carrier stowing goods in his warehouse, without notifying the consignee of their arrival, remains liable as a carrier until the consignee learns the fact from some source; and, if the goods are injured before such notice, the carrier is liable, though the consignee afterwards refuses to take them...1006
Where the loss of a cargo has been paid by the insurer, it is no defense to a libel against the carrier that the policy was issued by a foreign insurance company which had not complied with the laws of the state 617
The shipper of grain, who takes no bill of lading, is bound, in an action for short delivery, to prove the amount delivered to the carrier 655

CERTIORARI.

Federal courts have jurisdiction to issue a writ of certiorari as ancillary to a writ of habeas corpus, and to render their jurisdiction under the latter writ effective.... 875

Page

Where a prisoner committed by a United States commissioner is brought up on habeas corpus, the circuit court may issue a of certiorari to the commissioner to bring up the proceedings had before him..... 875

Certiorari to magistrate's court to bring up proceedings in forcible entry and detainer dismissed under circumstances stated 341

CHARITIES.

The English statutes of mortmain and superstitious uses were never adopted by the colony or state of Pennsylvania..... 408

The principles of the common law relative to charitable uses, which were resorted to in England by the statute of charitable uses, were, however, adopted, as well as the principles of equity in the administration of such trusts..... 408

The jurisdiction of chancery over charitable uses and gifts therefor does not depend upon the statute of charitable uses (43 Eliz. c. 4)..... 408

Unincorporated religious, literary, or charitable associations, in Pennsylvania, may take property by devise or bequest, for pious or charitable purposes, without a license from the state..... 408

Societies of Friends, unincorporated associations in Pennsylvania, held capable of taking property by devise or bequest for the purposes of their organization 408

A devise or bequest to a society for its purposes, with which testator is familiar, where such purposes are proper objects of charitable uses, is a good devise or bequest for such charitable uses..... 408

A gift to a religious society for the relief of the poor thereof, and towards enlarging and improving the meeting house, is a good charitable use..... 408

A gift to a religious society for the relief of the poor members thereof is a good charitable use 408

An annual subscription to the stock of a religious society, which is applied to the printing and dissemination of books and writings approved by such society, is a good charitable use..... 408

A gift to the treasurer of a society organized for the civilization and improvement of certain Indian tribes, for the benefit of such Indians, is a good charitable use.....408

A gift to a town for a fire engine and hose is a good charitable use..... 408

CHARTER PARTIES.

See, also, "Admiralty"; "Affreightment"; "Average"; "Bills of Lading"; "Demurrage"; "Shipping."

A verbal contract for the use of a steamboat for excursion trips, at definite times, for definite sums, is a charter, for breach of which admiralty has jurisdiction in personam 847

Where the vessel arrived two days late, and, without notice to the charterer, discharged the cargo, and employed persons to cart and pile it on the wharf, held, that the charterer was not liable for this expense.. 978

Where charterer's agent is to have a commission on freight at port of discharge, it is to be reckoned only on freight received, if some is not collected.....1169

CHATTEL MORTGAGES.

A mortgage on a stock in trade, where the mortgagor is allowed to keep possession and sell in the regular course of business is void as against creditors.....264, 628

Page

A chattel mortgage permitting substitution of property held not binding on the substituted property in the absence of a formal delivery by the mortgagor..... 16

A mortgage concealed by fraudulent representations, to the injury of third persons, is void..... 264

A mortgagee of a share in a vessel is not liable to the mortgagor for supplies furnished while the latter was in possession..... 353

CITIZEN.

By the common law, a child born within the allegiance of the United States is born a subject thereof, without reference to the political status or condition of its parents.. 161

A child of a member of an Indian tribe within the territory of the United States, though born within the limits of the United States, is not a citizen thereof..... 161

Under the treaty with Great Britain of October 20, 1818, art. 3, a child born in the Oregon territory in 1823, of British subjects, was born in the allegiance of the king of Great Britain..... 161

A person born in 1823, in the Oregon territory, whose father was a British subject, and whose mother was a member of the Chinook Indian tribe, is not a citizen of the United States..... 161

COLLISION.

See, also, "Admiralty"; "Pleading in Admiralty"; "Practice in Admiralty"; "Towage."

Nature of liability—Contributive fault.

A contractor, building a lighthouse for the United States on a mud shoal out of the fairway, and forbidden by the lighthouse department to keep lights on the structure, held not liable for damage to a schooner colliding therewith at night.....1157

The want of extraordinary measures of precaution, or a fault on the imminence of a collision brought about by the fault of another, cannot be alleged as a contributing fault 478

The want of a lookout will not be considered a fault where the other vessel was seen in good season by the master and mate 734

A vessel having the right of way must keep a proper lookout and use proper seamanship to avoid collision..... 962

Rules of navigation.

Rules of navigation on the Mississippi river 391, 478

A steamer navigating a river leaving the ordinary and usual track of vessels, under the circumstances is bound to show some palpable necessity for the deviation..... 478

Between sail vessels.

A vessel approaching another so circumstanced as to be difficult of control is in fault for colliding with her, if, by proper exertions and management, she could keep out of the way.....1160

Where both vessels are closehauled, the vessel on the port tack must keep away from one on the starboard tack..... 972

A vessel on the starboard tack, nearly closehauled, with the wind baffling, and perhaps at times one or two points free, need not give way to one on the port tack, closehauled, on crossing courses..... 962

In thick or foul weather, a vessel on the port tack must exercise all possible vigilance. There should be some one on deck to give orders instantly on an emergency.. 972

A vessel on the port tack, with hardly sufficient headway to give control, is yet in fault for colliding with one on the starboard tack, if the former could have gone clear by keeping strict watch and either going about or taking her boom in board..1160

A vessel sailing free, and meeting one beating, has no right to go ahead and compel the latter to go about before running out her tack..... 979

Between steam and sail.

A vessel beating down a river need not "heave in stays" on meeting a steamboat, but must keep her course..... 187

Between steam vessels.

The rule requiring steamers meeting to pass to the right does not apply where both colored lights are anywhere but ahead..... 620

The obligation to slacken speed arises in case of continuous approach, or when the approaching light is found to be closing in, instead of opening out..... 620

If there is confusion of signals between approaching steamers, each is bound to stop, under article 16 of the rules.....1001

Overtaking vessel.

The boat astern takes all the risk of an attempt to pass, and the vessel ahead is not obliged to give way or change her course 130

A vessel approached from behind by another, intending to cross her bows from starboard to port, is under no obligations to promote such movement..... 316

Vessels moored, etc.

A vessel voluntarily approaching another moored at a dock, and striking her, is solely liable, although the other may somewhat block the passage..... 841

Anchorage in a narrow channel, where vessels are constantly passing, is not necessarily improper, if room be left for vessels and tows to pass in safety; but a vigilant anchor watch must be maintained.....1082

Tugs and tows.

It is no defense to a tug colliding with another vessel that she was acting under the orders of a steamer which she was towing 841

River and harbor navigation.

A propeller will be held equally in fault for passing at full speed a tug within 100 feet, where she comes into collision with the tow astern, which is improperly handled 734

A boat running at great speed up the Mississippi river on a dark night, when a descending boat is visible, of whose course she is in doubt, takes the risk of a collision. 478

A steamer used as a harbor ferryboat, in violation of law, is liable for collision with a vessel in the lawful use of the harbor...1186

A steamer entering a narrow and crowded harbor without slowing down will be held in fault, though the colliding vessel was also in fault for taking a wrong course and not signaling.....1200

Speed: Fogs.

Seven miles an hour for a steamer in a fog, surrounded by sail-vessels, held too great speed..... 618

Lookouts, officers, etc.

A steamer will be held in fault where a collision was caused by her failure to keep her lookout stationed in the bow..... 391

The absence of a competent and skillful lookout is prima facie evidence of fault... 130

A steamer is responsible for a collision which a better lookout might have prevented 478

Particular instances of collision.

Between tows, resulting from failure of one to pay out the hawser in obedience to an order from the tug, held to have occurred from the sole fault of such tow..... 923

Between a steamer and tow of another steamer, where the former was held in fault for being out of her proper course..... 215

Between ferryboat coming out of Fulton Ferry slip and tow of tug coming down East river and rounding to pick up a boat just above the slip, where the former was held in fault..... 593

Between steamer and schooner in Delaware river, where both were held in fault, the former for insufficient lookout, and the latter for failure to exhibit a torch..... 715

Between schooner going out of harbor and sloop anchored in channel outside harbor master's line, where both were held in fault, the former for want of lookout, the latter because anchored in an improper place.... 701

Steamer colliding with sloop in New York harbor in a fog held in fault for merely stopping, without reversing, on hearing fog horn 1111

A sailing vessel entering a crowded harbor at night at six miles an hour, in addition to a current of four miles, and colliding with an anchored vessel, held in fault 1080

Sloop sailing free and attempting to pass ahead of two schooners beating, being struck by one of the schooners, held solely in fault *979

Where steamers were meeting nearly end on, held that one was in fault for starboarding instead of porting, and for not reversing on perceiving a confusion of signals.....1001

Procedure.

The insurer of a cargo lost by a collision may sue the colliding vessel, after notice and proof of the loss and demand of payment, though before actual payment..... 617

Where there has been actual payment of the loss before trial, it is no defense that the suit was brought before payment.... 618

Libelant must show absence of fault on the part of his boat, as well as fault on the part of the other..... 130

The fact that the engineer and master left their posts of duty after the lights of an approaching vessel were seen may be considered on the question of negligence in giving and executing orders..... 620

The deposition of a witness on an investigation before the board of inspectors, who is called for libelant in a suit for the collision, can only be used by respondent for the purpose of contradicting him..... 744

Evidence of verbal statements made in time of excitement and peril should be received with great caution.....1080

In a case of collision with the foundation of a pier for a lighthouse, it must be presumed that jurisdiction over the site has been ceded to the United States, as the law provides that no lighthouse shall be built until such cession.....1157

The testimony as to the course and deflections of a vessel of those who hold her helm is entitled to more weight than those on board another moving vessel..... 316

Where the testimony shows that the fault of one is flagrant, and leaves the question of fault of the other in doubt, the former only will be held in fault..... 618

A vessel negligently running into another, which is lying disabled, may be held liable, although the precise manner of the collision is not proved as alleged..... 926

On a libel by a tow against her tug and the colliding vessel, the libelant may recover against the latter alone, where there was independent fault on her part..... 593

The finding of a commisioner of the amount of damages in a collision case will not be disturbed when there is not a palpable preponderance against it.....1243

Rule of damages. Page
The party in fault should bear any inconvenience or hardship in proving the exact damages 1243
In the absence of a market value, the value of the vessel to the owner, in the business she was engaged in at the time of collision, is a proper basis of damages....1243
In such case, the books of the owner showing previous and subsequent earnings are competent to show probable earnings during the detention.....1243
Services of an agent in settling and paying bills are not chargeable as damages...1243
Estimates of the cost of repairs are not competent when the repairs have been actually made.....1243
In a case of collision by mutual fault between a steamer and sail vessel, the steamer may be allowed, as part of the damages, a sum for towing the sail vessel into port after the collision..... 998
A fishing boat making weekly trips to market, and losing one trip by a collision, which injures her seine, may be allowed the probable profits of such trip.....1003
Interest will not be allowed as damages when the repair bills have not been actually paid before the trial..... 972
Interest on items of damage is allowed at 6, and not at 7, per cent..... 981
Where the full value of a vessel sunk is awarded, the expense of raising her to ascertain the extent of the loss is a proper charge 981
The measure of damages for cargo lost is its value at the time and place of shipment 991
Damages for cargo shipped by canal boat in Canada, where United States gold coin was the currency, and lost on the Hudson river, in New York, must be paid for at its value in such coin..... 991
Freight money lost by the master when hurrying from his sinking vessel, and sails used for covering the deck load, are proper items of damage..... 962

Division of damages.
The damages will be equally divided where both vessels were in fault for the collision 391, 701, 998
In such case, costs are also equally divided 701, 998
But it seems that if one vessel suffers all the damage, and both are in fault, the libelant recovering half damages should recover full costs..... 998

COMPROMISE.

See, also, "Accord and Satisfaction"; "Bankruptcy"; "Payment."

To sustain a contract of settlement on the ground that it was a compromise of doubtful claims, the doubt must be such as an ordinarily intelligent person would entertain 1343

A lease of the mine, made by a mining corporation to the minority stockholders, to withdraw control from the board of directors about to be elected, and to perpetuate the control of the minority, will be canceled on a bill filed by the corporation..... 497

The officers of a moneyed corporation have no right to make a dividend unless there are actual profits over and above all losses..... 506

An officer is bound to know the condition of the corporation's affairs, and he has no right to receive a dividend unless it is earned..... 506

In deciding whether a dividend was rightfully made, the transaction must be viewed from the standpoint of that time, and not in the light of subsequent events..... 506

Notes of a corporation given in payment of unearned dividends held void in the hands of the stockholder receiving them.. 176

The withdrawal of any portion of the capital by a stockholder renders him liable under Rev. St. Me. 1857, c. 46, § 24, for corporate debts to the amount so withdrawn..... 176

The limitation of one year does not apply to an action on such liability..... 176

The surrender by a stockholder of shares, and receiving in exchange therefor the stock of another corporation, that he originally paid for his shares, on the receipt of unearned dividends, or the surrender of shares in exchange for corporate notes which are subsequently paid, operates as a withdrawal of capital..... 176

When the legislature creates a corporation, it may also prescribe what remedies shall be used against it, and such remedies then become exclusive..... 665

COSTS.

Where a juror is withdrawn on motion of plaintiff and consent of defendant, who elects a continuance of the cause, he is not entitled to costs also..... 337

On reversal in the circuit court of the decree of the district court in admiralty, the successful party is entitled to costs on the appeal, unless new evidence was introduced which might have affected the judgment in the court below..... 716

Counsel fees to the successful party in such case may be allowed in the discretion of the court, but such power is sparingly exercised..... 716

No costs on appeal awarded to either party where a decree of the district court was affirmed in so far as it dismissed the libel, but reversed as to the award of costs to claimant..... 37

Costs will not be allowed where the libel is dismissed on a dilatory plea after a trial in which the court overrules the defense on the merits..... 860

Where a demurrer to a bill is overruled in part and sustained in part, costs not allowed to either party..... 133

Costs are not taxable for the preparation of written arguments, except upon a stipulation in writing to that effect..... 574

Summary costs only are recoverable on a libel in admiralty where libelant admits that a sum less than $50 is all that is due, irrespective of the claim in the libel..... 110

In what cases costs may be taxed for motions to postpone the hearing of a cause called in its order on the calendar..... 574

In what cases costs may be taxed upon motions to enlarge time to answer, for a final decree, for costs, for a reference, etc.. 574

The district court, on dismissing a libel for want of jurisdiction, has no power to award costs against libelant..... 37

An unfounded claim for a lien dismissed without costs, the vessel owners being personally liable..... 15

Costs denied to owners of canal boat sunk by swells, because they delayed for 30 days to give notice of their claim.....1066

On dismissal of a libel for wages, held that costs should be imposed on libelants, when they had taken possession of the vessel and brought her home, though this was done on reasonable grounds of suspicion that she was about to engage in the slave trade..... 949

Costs on appeal from a justice of the peace are in the court's discretion, where the judgment is affirmed.....1281

Defendant may require security for costs from a plaintiff who has removed from the district since the commencement of the action..... 13

Where a cause has been continued at defendant's costs, an attachment will be granted against defendant for such costs, after judgment for plaintiff..... 107

COUNTIES.

See, also, "Municipal Corporations"; "Railroad Companies."

County commissioners in Ohio may sue and are liable to be sued in relation to all matters which involve the exercise of their powers..... 247

Plea of non est factum not allowed as to engraved bonds of the county, substituted for other bonds of like date, etc., where the county paid interest, without objecting, for two years..... 188

COURTS.

See, also, "Admiralty"; "Bankruptcy"; "Equity"; "Justices of the Peace"; "Maritime Liens"; "Removal of Causes"; "Rules of Court."

In general.

It is only where the court is without power to pass upon the subject-matter of the complaint or to grant the relief sought that its jurisdiction may be challenged..... 302

The court can take jurisdiction of parties who, not being within its jurisdiction, voluntarily appear..... 264

Page

Courts of law and equity have concurrent jurisdiction in cases of fraud, and the one first obtaining jurisdiction must settle the matter conclusively....1038

Comparative authority of federal and state courts: Process.

The federal circuit court has concurrent jurisdiction with a state probate court to decree an account in favor of distributees. 542

Where two courts have concurrent jurisdiction, the one which first has possession of the subject may adjudicate; and neither of the parties can be forced into another court 542

An administrator in the process of accounting before a probate court cannot be compelled to account in a federal court by a bill in equity.... 542

Federal courts—Jurisdiction in general.

The equity jurisdiction of the federal courts is not affected by state statutes giving legal remedies....1231

The distinction between law and equity, as recognized in the jurisprudence of England, must be observed in the federal courts; but this relates only to the remedy, and not to the existence of rights....1283

The federal courts have no authority to enjoin federal officers against performing any merely ministerial act.... 74

County commissioners, though not possessing in every respect the technical qualities of a corporation, are amenable to the process of the federal court within the state.. 247

Under the judiciary act of 1875, a federal court has no jurisdiction to attach property of a citizen of another state who is not found in the jurisdiction....1164

A federal court has no jurisdiction of a bill of revivor against an administrator with the will annexed of the original respondent, where such administrator was appointed in another state....1334 —— Grounds of jurisdiction.

The circuit court has jurisdiction in covenant where the damages laid exceed $500, though the penalty named in the contract is less than $500.... 906

The fact that defendant corporation was organized under a federal law is not enough to give the federal court jurisdiction.... 390

A joint-stock association organized under the laws of New York may be sued in the federal court by a citizen of another state without regard to the citizenship of its individual members.... 566

In a suit by a national bank, an allegation that plaintiff is a citizen of the state of Illinois, and located and residing and doing business in the city of Chicago, in said state, and that defendant is a citizen of New York, is sufficient to give jurisdiction to the federal court in New York.... 671

A motion to dismiss is the proper remedy when it appears that the real plaintiff in interest is a citizen of the same state with defendant 1195

An action of ejectment will be dismissed where it appears that plaintiff acquired naked legal title from a citizen of the same state with defendant merely to give jurisdiction 1195

An executor or administrator is not an "assignee," within the meaning of the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789 1231

—— Circuit courts.

The circuit court has no cognizance of causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in the district court save by appeal.. 292

A national bank cannot be sued outside the district in which it is located. Service on the cashier when found within another district does not give jurisdiction.... 509

—— District courts. Page

Consent of the parties cannot confer jurisdiction on the district court.... 215

A libel in personam is not a "civil suit," within the meaning of Act 1789, § 11, requiring defendant to be a resident of the district within which suit is brought..... 570 —— Administration of state laws.

The right to sue and the liability to be sued of county commissioners arising under the local law constitute a rule of decision for the federal courts.... 247

—— Following state decisions.

The federal courts will follow the decisions of the state in respect to the validity of a bequest to charitable uses....1283

The Pennsylvania doctrine that the assignee of a bond and mortgage takes subject to all existing legal and equitable defenses does not apply to a suit in equity in the federal court.... 94

The federal courts are not bound to follow state decisions based on general principles of commercial law....1283

—— Procedure.

The act of June 1, 1872, adopting state practice, etc., does not authorize the commencement of an action at law in the circuit court by a summons in the name of plaintiff's attorney, according to the New York procedure 892

Local courts.

Where the verdict in an action in the circuit court of the District of Columbia is for a sum less than the jurisdictional amount, judgment will be arrested..... 234

It is no ground of arrest of judgment in the circuit court of the District of Columbia that the sum sued for has been reduced by offsets to a sum below the jurisdiction.... 231

The probate court in Rhode Island has exclusive jurisdiction of the probate of wills of land....1103

Terms: Sessions.

A federal court may be held on a day appointed by the president of the United States and the governor of the state as a day of thanksgiving.... 122

At a special criminal session, the circuit court of the District of Columbia cannot try a case pending at the preceding stated session 1340

CRIMINAL LAW.

See, also, "Arrest"; "Bail"; "Extradition"; "Habeas Corpus"; "Indictment and Information."

CUSTOM AND USAGE.

The rules of law in relation to the proof and nature of customs stated by Washington, J. 129

A usage for vessels to let go their warps on the approach of a steamer is not applicable in favor of a steamer having no right to use the waters of the harbor....1186

CUSTOMS DUTIES.

Customs laws.

Goods removed from a bonded warehouse and carried without the jurisdiction of the United States, and returned, are subject to duty, though not actually landed at a foreign port.... 118

A law imposing a duty on articles used for a particular purpose should not be construed to cover articles not so used at the date of the act, unless expressly so provided 892

Page

The purpose, adaptation, and use of the article, and not its commercial designation, is the test of its dutiable description by the words "wearing apparel." (Act July 30, 1846.) 500

Rates of duty.

Substances not used for cotton bagging before the act of July 14, 1832, are not dutiable as such thereunder..... 892

Shawls or scarfs manufactured on looms in strips or pieces, but separated before importation, held dutiable as "wearing apparel." (Act July 30, 1846.)..... 500

Invoice: Entry: Appraisal.

The valuation of goods as at the time of their exportation, instead of the time of their purchase, is illegal. (Act 1846.)..... 501

The penalty of 20 per cent. (Act July 30, 1846, § 8) cannot be exacted for a 10 per cent. undervaluation in coal arising solely from an excess of quantity..... 600

The importer is not liable in such case, under section 4, to pay the fee of the weigher and measurer..... 600

Payment: Protest.

The objection that the collector did not order a reappraisement, or that one of the examiners was hostile to the importer, cannot be raised unless made in the protest..... 501

Under the act of February 26, 1845, a protest objecting merely in general terms to the additional duty will not support an action 1044

A protest against the illegal exaction of the penalty of 50 per cent. under Act Aug. 30, 1842, § 17, is necessary in order to recover it back..... 501

Protest held sufficient to raise the objection that the goods were erroneously valued as of the time of their exportation, instead of the time of their purchase..... 501

Actions for duties paid.

The acts of 1799 and 1845 do not prevent the actual owner of the goods from recovering duties paid under protest by the consignee 1044

Payment under protest of duties on goods never imported, to avoid suit on a warehouse bond, is a voluntary payment, and an action to recover back is not maintainable 848

Violation of law: Forfeiture.

In cases within Act March 2, 1799, c. 128, § 89, judgment cannot be rendered on the bail bond until after 20 days from the day of condemnation, and then in open court 292

Customhouse documents are prima facie evidence of the facts which called for their issue 118

"Fines" imposed for obstructing officers of the customs, as well as "penalties," under Act March 2, 1799, c. 128, are to be received and distributed by the collector of the customs..... 776

DAMAGES.

See, also, "Contract"; "Collision"; "Patents."

The measure of damages for refusal to deliver certain merchandise as agreed is the difference between the contract price and the market value at the place of delivery.. 322

Damages for nonpayment of money or nondelivery of obligations for money is the amount due, with interest. Collateral damages are not given.....1343

Damages for failure to provide a sinking fund for bonds, according to agreement, are ascertained by taking the difference in the value of the bonds as agreed to be made and their value as in fact made.....1343

Page

Vessel owners are only liable in actual and not in punitive damages for the torts of the master involving a breach of a passenger's contract..... 141

One allowing his vessel to be taken, on command of officers of the law, for the purpose of making an arrest in an illegal place, but without malice, is not liable for exemplary damages..... 868

When the sum is certain, or may be reduced to certainty by computation, the intervention of a jury to assess damages is unnecessary 231

DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT.

No recovery can be had under the Maryland statute for the death of a fireman on a railroad train, by collision with another train, unless the company had not used ordinary and reasonable care in selecting the officers of the train in fault..... 994

Under the Maryland statute, a mother can recover for the death of her son her actual damages, though he was over 21 years old 994

Grandchildren living with their grandparent have no right of action for her death, through the wrongful act of defendant, under Wag. St. Mo. c. 43, § 22, giving a right of action to the husband or wife or minor children of deceased..... 13

DEBT, ACTION OF.

Debt will lie for two sums distinctly awarded, one for damages and one for costs 1120

DEED.

See, also, "Boundaries"; "Vendor and Purchaser."

A deed of land in Maryland cannot be read in evidence unless recorded in Maryland 153

The words "grant, bargain, and sell" import the conveyance of a fee simple, indefeasible with special warranty..... 105

DEMURRAGE.

Time lost in getting from one dock to another, by requirement of the charterer and according to the custom of the trade, is not by default of the charterer, for which he must pay demurrage..... 978

Though the shipper only has the right to reconsign, under the bill of lading, the master, by accepting a reconsignment from the consignee, waives his right to object, and cannot recover demurrage for delays incident thereto..... 123

DEPOSITION.

No person but the magistrate or witness can reduce to writing a deposition taken under the judiciary act of 1789, § 30..... 856

In taking a deposition under a commission, it need not be written by the commissioners or their clerk or a witness.....1293

A clerical error in the dedimus, whereby an initial of a party's name is changed, will not prevent the admission of the depositions 1293

DETINUE.

Detinue is an action in form ex contractu, and not ex delicto.....1255

DISCOVERY.

Page

A bill for a discovery in aid of a suit at law cannot be maintained in the absence of allegations that it is material that the discovery should be had, and that the court of law in which the case is pending cannot compel the discovery 759

The fact that plaintiff is entitled to the discovery prayed does not necessarily entitle him also to an account 403

On a bill for discovery and other equitable relief, where plaintiff's ultimate object is to obtain damages, proper relief in damages will be given after discovery is granted 403

DURESS.

Real property is not under duress unless there be an illegal demand made against the owner, coupled with a present power or authority in the person making such demand to sell or dispose of the same if payment is not made as demanded 755

EJECTMENT.

The conveyance of a homestead by a bankrupt and his wife set aside at the suit of an assignee in bankruptcy works no estoppel in favor of the purchaser from the assignee, and he has no title to support ejectment 90

One claiming as mortgagee is a proper defendant to an action of ejectment in Vermont, though it does not appear that he is in possession 928

In ejectment, the fictitious lease may be amended, after the jury is sworn, upon payment of term costs 15

The object of ejectment as used in Vermont is to settle title, as well as to obtain possession, and the judgment is conclusive on all parties 928

ELECTIONS AND VOTERS.

A state may deny the right of suffrage to any citizens of the United States for other causes than those specified in Const. U. S. Amend. art. 15 157

Act May 31, 1870, is inapplicable to the qualifications of voters, except as founded upon the distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude 147

The refusal to allow a person, when challenged, to take the oath of qualification, if made on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude, but not otherwise, is a violation of Act May 31, 1870, § 2 ..... 157, 161

Sufficiency of allegations of complaint in action for penalty under Act May 31, 1870, § 2 157

All persons must take the oath of qualification required by the state law, when challenged 157

EMBARGO AND NONINTERCOURSE.

An involuntary coming into port by stress of weather is not an "importation" of cargo contrary to the embargo laws 932

A bona fide purchaser without notice is protected against an antecedent forfeiture to the United States *784

The secretary of the treasury had no authority under Act Feb. 27, 1813, c. 175, to remit the penalties for goods subsequently imported contrary to the nonimportation act 719

Page

Until final judgment, no part of the forfeiture under the embargo and nonintercourse act vests absolutely in the collector; but after final judgment his share vests absolutely, and cannot be remitted 719

EQUITY.

See, also, "Courts"; "Injunction"; "Pleading in Equity"; Practice in Equity."

Jurisdiction.

Negligence by an attorney at law in collecting claims is not a subject of equity jurisdiction, there being an adequate remedy at law 822

Equity jurisdiction is not ousted by the existence of a remedy at law which is not adequate and complete 1231

As between creditors having a common lien on property, equity will require the one having also a separate lien on other property to enforce it first 264

Equity will not relieve from a mistake of law as to the effect of an agreement, whether it was mutual or not 461

Jurisprudence.

Poverty may excuse delay, within the period of limitation, so as to relieve plaintiff's claim from the imputation of staleness 1024

In a suit to rescind a sale of lands, one of the purchasers may be joined as plaintiff though he has since released his interest to the others 1016

In a suit to rescind a sale of lands, if all the parties to the conveyance are made respondents, it is no objection to a recovery on the merits that some who had an equity in the land are not joined 1016

General averments of fraud or mistake will not bring the case within equitable jurisdiction where the special averments do not make out a case of fraud or mistake 461

Where the defense to a promissory note is fraud, the proper order is to restrain its negotiation and permit the parties to proceed at law 1038

ESCROW.

It is not necessary to a delivery in escrow that the obligee shall be privy thereto, or that the condition is to be performed by him 1268

ESTOPPEL.

One who undertakes by deed to convey an indefeasible estate in fee simple, though there are no covenants of warranty, will not be allowed to set up against his vendee, or one claiming under him, a subsequently acquired title 105

EVIDENCE.

See, also, "Appeal"; "Deposition"; "Trial"; "Witness."

Presumptions: Burden of proof.

Delivery of the cargo to the owners by the supercargo is evidence of his receipt of his commissions, in an action by a third person entitled to a share therein 657

Best and secondary.

Subscribing witnesses will be presumed to reside at the place of execution of the instrument; and, where that is without the jurisdiction of the court, proof of signatures is admissible as secondary evidence of execution 573

Page

Statements in a deposition that witness paid a sum of money and took a receipt may be read in evidence, though the receipt be not produced 1293

Declarations and admissions.

The declarations and admissions of the owner, made after he has parted with title to property, are inadmissible against the purchaser 677

The declarations of the grantor are not admissible to defeat the title of the grantee under a conveyance alleged to be fraudulent 451

Admissions of an alleged co-conspirator after the conspiracy has terminated, and not in the presence of the accused, are not admissible 875

Declarations of a stage driver that the coach was overloaded are not admissible against his employers 1182

Agreements between partners before fitting out a vessel may be proved on their part by their conversations, as a part of the res gestae 353

Documentary.

The act of congress respecting the authentication of the records of state courts does not apply to the records of the federal courts 1046

Parol evidence.

A receipt for a sum of money may be explained by parol or other proof.....1272

Oral evidence of an agreement that defendant should retain certain notes as security against other notes may be given, although there be a written agreement to return them on demand..... 152

A written contract may be contradicted by parol evidence showing that the whole contract was not reduced to writing..... 4

Explanation of the rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to explain or vary a writing, by Washington, J..... 4

Competency: Materiality: Relevancy.

In covenant by a lessor's assignee against the lessee's assignee, plaintiff may prove the lessee's assignment by parol evidence of possession and payment of rent by defendant 1220

Handwriting.

Handwriting cannot be proved by comparison before the jury..... 349

EXECUTION.

See, also, "Attachment"; "Bankruptcy"; "Garnishment"; "Judgment."

Notice of an assignment of chattels to a judgment creditor will not prevent a levy where possession has never been taken...1311

After the lapse of a year, execution cannot issue in the District of Columbia upon a judgment obtained in Maryland without a sci. fa. 49

A levy on a stock of goods seen through the transom, over the door, of the store, into which the sheriff was unable to gain an entrance, held valid 41

A levy on land attached takes effect from date of the attachment, when the record shows that it is the same land, though the officer's return does not so state.....1147

The return of the officer stating that the appraisers who acted in making a levy on real estate were disinterested is conclusive.1147

Under the Maine statutes, the return of the officer that the land levied on cannot be divided without damage is conclusive on parties and privies 1147

The lien on personal property acquired by delivery of a fi. fa. is lost by making a return of nulla bona; and seizure by an alias fi. fa. will not overreach an intermediate sale 1164

Page

A sale made under an erroneous description of the premises will be set aside..... 340

The nonimprisonment acts of New York, as adopted by congress (5 Stat. 321, 410), do not apply to process in admiralty..... 835

A ca. sa. on a justice judgment will not be quashed because defendant has applied for the benefit of the Maryland insolvent laws 1142

Where the debtor arrested on a ca. sa. is set at liberty by plaintiff, though on express condition that plaintiff shall not be prejudiced thereby, it operates as a discharge, and equity will not interfere..... 461

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

Under the Maryland statutes, the husband is administrator of his deceased wife, and may sue for her separate estate not disposed of by deed or will..... 841

In California, real estate is assets in the administrator's hands, to be administered like personalty 1314

An executor who makes personal use of funds of the estate is chargeable with the highest amount of legal interest..... 198

An executor is not responsible for the loss of the funds received by him for dividends in confederate money or notes, which, at the time, he was obliged to accept..... 198

A judgment obtained by the administrator of an administratrix of her husband on notes taken by her personally in payment for property sold belonging to the estate will not be ordered to be entered up for the use of an administrator d. b. n. of the husband, unless it appear that the sureties of the administratrix are insolvent, and that the balance of her administration account is against her 487

Mode of adjustment of accounts of executor and trustee in case of maladministration 198

An account of an administrator, though settled by a judicial decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, may be opened for fraud 542

An executor who built a bulkhead on the water front of the estate held liable for damage resulting from the sinking of a vessel by its faulty construction, and also for additional damage occurring while the vessel was being raised with due care by her owner 1061

An executor or administrator appointed in one state cannot be sued in another for assets lawfully received by him in the former 1334

In an action against an administrator, a plea of a release by a former administrator, without showing full payment, is bad. An administrator cannot release a debt except on full payment..... 996

Plaintiffs naming themselves administrators, but not making profert of their letters, are not bound to give oyer of them.....1046

In California, an adjudication affecting title to land, in an action between the administrator and another, binds the heir....1314

EXEMPTIONS.

State exemption laws apply to process issued from the federal courts 663

EXTRADITION.

Necessity of a mandate from the executive for the arrest of a fugitive from justice before the commissioner can entertain jurisdiction of proceedings 51

Page

The complaint on which the warrant is issued need not set forth the issuing of a mandate by the executive for the arrest of the fugitive 51
The warrant for the arrest of an alleged fugitive may follow the words of the treaty in describing the offense charged..... 51
A description in the mandate of the offense charged, in the terms of the treaty, is sufficient 51
Pending extradition proceedings, a second warrant, on a new complaint, for a distinct offense, may be issued..... 59
The commissioner may, in his discretion, grant reasonable adjournments, in the course of hearing the evidence, to enable testimony to be produced..... 51
Admissibility of copies of depositions taken abroad in extradition proceedings..... 59
The four requisites of a valid commitment for trial in another state are a charge of crime therein, a demand from its governor, an indictment found or affidavit certified by the governor, and the presence of the prisoner in the state when the crime was committed 186
Extradition proceeding may be reviewed upon certiorari after a warrant of surrender has been issued by the president..... 59
Decisions on questions as to evidence made by the commissioner on extradition proceedings cannot be reviewed on habeas corpus pending such proceedings..... 51
On habeas corpus, the court or judge does not sit as an appellate tribunal to review the proceedings which have taken place before the commissioner, as upon allegation of error 59
On habeas corpus and certiorari, the court cannot entertain the question of the sufficiency of the evidence before the commissioner, to warrant the commitment for surrender 59
Error of the commissioner in the reception of evidence is no ground of discharge on habeas corpus 59

FACTORS AND BROKERS.

A commission merchant is liable for selling goods contrary to instructions, and for negligence in the sale..... 852
Receiving without objection accounts of sales made on credit is a waiver of instructions to sell for cash, and authorizes the factor to make further sales on credit.... 852
Existing liens on goods unsold are discharged by the sale, and the proceeds become the subject of mutual accounts..... 765

FERRY.

A railroad charter describing part of the route as "thence by steamboats or other boats over and across the ferry to East Boston" does not authorize the company to maintain a ferry for general purposes.....1186
A ferry license under the Massachusetts statutes is not assignable.....1186

Fines.

See "Customs Duties."

FISHERIES.

Anchoring a vessel within fishing grounds, without malice, and to take in residue of cargo, does not make the master liable for damages; otherwise, if it is without reasonable commercial purpose.....1047

FORFEITURE.

Page

See, also, "Customs Duties"; "Shipping."

Seizure of the res, before filing of the libel, is essential to jurisdiction under a libel for a penalty or forfeiture. (Affirming 1212.).....1213
An action for a penalty or forfeiture must be in the name of the government, unless otherwise expressly provided by statute 1128
An information of forfeiture need not show that the case was not within the exemption of a proviso of the statute. This is matter of defense..... 997
A decree of forfeiture in rem is conclusive on all claiming an interest in the thing. 953
Where absolute forfeiture is the statute penalty, title accrues when the penal act is committed; but, if the forfeiture is alternative, — property or its value,—title does not vest until election; and meanwhile an innocent purchaser may acquire a title not forfeitable 968
The secretary of the treasury has no power to remit penalties, unless in cases provided for by law..... 719
As to legal proof of facts under Act March 3, 1797, c. 67, upon which the secretary of the treasury is authorized to remit penalties and forfeitures..... 720
The secretary of the treasury has no authority under Act Feb. 27, 1813, c. 175, to make a remission of part only of the property forfeited..... 719
The secretary of the treasury has no authority, under either the act of 1797 or the act of 1813, to remit the collector's share of the forfeiture, nor any part of it eo nomine 719

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

See, also, "Assignment for Benefit of Creditors"; "Bankruptcy."

To make a contract void under 13 Eliz. c. 5, for fraud against creditors, both parties must concur in the fraud..... 451
A contract of conveyance in consideration of marriage is within 13 Eliz. c. 5, § 6, if bona fide and without notice of fraud, etc..... 451
A contract of conveyance in consideration of marriage is valid as against creditors of the husband..... 451
Payment of the sum stipulated in the articles may be made after marriage, on the eve of a judgment against the husband. 451
An indiscreet expenditure for furniture is not per se fraudulent against creditors, where the husband agreed by the marriage articles to furnish a house as he saw fit.. 451
A purchase of lands by a husband with money belonging to his wife before marriage, and the taking of a deed to her, pursuant to a verbal agreement with her before marriage, is no fraud on his creditors.1308
An agreement to pay one known to be insolvent a part of the purchase money of property held by an assignee in insolvency is void as to creditors..... 133
An assignment of chattels is not perfect against creditors unless possession accompanies and follows the deed. Want of possession is evidence of fraud.....1311
A grant of chattels out of the country at the time will be held fraudulent unless possession is taken within a reasonable time after their return.....1311

GAMING.

An assignment of an order for the payment of money, by one who obtained it

INSURANCE.

See, also, "Marine Insurance."

Policies are to be construed for indemnity of the assured and the advancement of trade 1163

A policy on lithographic presses in a certain building, there being two presses then there, held not to cover a press subsequently put in, so as to make double insurance, within the meaning of a policy specifically insuring the latter press.....1163

The insurer is liable to the legal holder of the policy, though the person procuring it by mistake ordered it canceled..... 815

A firm paying a draft for a cargo of grain on the faith of an insurance policy, indorsed to them by the shipper, is not affected by his mistake in ordering the policy canceled, although he was to share in the profit or loss on each cargo..... 815

The mere fact that a premium has not been actually paid is no defense to a bona fide holder. In such case, mutual accounts have the effect of payment..... 815

The acceptance by a general agent of overdue premiums is a waiver of the forfeiture, where the insured has no notice of limitation upon his powers..... 125

But a notice in the policy and renewal certificates of limitations upon the agent's power is binding on the insured..... 125

The receipt and holding of the premium until requirements are complied with is no waiver where the money is returned on noncompliance with the requirements..... 125

The fact that the agent was in the habit of giving extensions of time to pay renewal premiums will not prevent the policy expiring, under its provisions, on nonpayment of the premium at the time when due.... 349

A dividend due a policy holder should be applied to the payment of his premium, upon his request, if such has been the practice of the company..... 604

A note given a foreign insurance company for premiums cannot be enforced by the company after it has failed to comply with the state law by obtaining a renewal of its certificate 365

An action will not lie on the bond of an agent of a foreign insurance company for failing to pay over premiums collected after the company had failed to comply with the state law by obtaining a renewal of its certificate 365

A creditor, to whom a policy was payable having received from the insurer the amount of his claim, and surrendered the policy, no action lies by the representatives of deceased against the insurer to recover the difference between the amount paid and the amount of the policy..... 196

INTEREST.

See, also, "Banks and Banking"; "Usury."

In admiralty, interest on cargo lost by collision runs at 6, not at 7, per cent..... 991

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Act July 20, 1868, in relation to a tax on distilled spirits, is not unconstitutional because of its regulations requiring a bond before commencing business, etc.....1061

The tax on 80 per cent. of the capacity of a distillery must be paid, whether so much is produced or not, under Act July 20, 1868, § 20.....1060

The provision of section 10 of that act must be strictly followed in ascertaining the capacity of the distillery.....1060

The tax on distilled spirits is due the moment they are produced, and must be paid, even if they are afterwards destroyed by leakage or fire.....1060

Surplus earnings of a bank are not liable to a license tax under the act of June 30, 1864, § 79.....1306

A supervisor may procure an attachment to compel a person liable to taxation to appear and testify, without showing that he acted under special instructions from the commissioner in issuing the summons.....1294

Under the acts of June 30, 1864, and July 13, 1866, no succession tax could be levied against the devisee of a remainder in fee until the life estate terminated.....1014

Under Act June 30, 1864, where personal property was bequeathed in trust for testator's widow for life, afterwards to his adult children, the legacy tax accrued on testator's death, though not payable until his widow's death, and was therefore unaffected by the repealing act of July 14, 1870 1063

A legacy tax "accrues," so as to be exempt from the repealing provisions of the act of July 14, 1870, on the death of the testator 1220

A dividend declared will form part of the taxable income of the stockholder, though he has not called for and received it. (Act July 1, 1862.)..... 382

A tax upon the income of a person up to the time of his death, during the tax year, is properly assessed against his executor... 576

If an assessment of income tax under act July 1, 1862, is not made in legal form, the remedy of the person aggrieved is at law, and not in equity..... 382

If such assessment is made in legal form the party aggrieved must pursue the remedy given by section 93 before he can resort to a court of equity for relief..... 382

INTERNATIONAL LAW.

Strict neutrality must be observed between belligerents by other powers..... 733

Concealment of facts is no ground to avoid the sentence of a foreign court acting in rem 483
A decree rendered in a suit between two parties is not admissible as evidence in a suit between one of those parties and a third person 625
A decree for divorce declaring that articles previously entered into for alimony should remain in force is no bar to an action upon a bond given to perform those articles.... 124
Where lands were devised with directions to be sold by the executor, and a share of the proceeds paid to certain emancipated slaves, and in a suit against the executor, to which such legatees were not parties, it was decreed that they were incompetent to take, held, that this was no bar to their rights..1096
A person compelled by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction to pay money to one man, having acted in good faith, is protected by that judgment from paying it to another.....1235
The rule that a judgment against one of several joint trespassers is no bar to an action against others applies in trover for successive conversions by different persons...1125
A judgment of the Illinois circuit court under the state revenue law of February 26, 1839, is no bar unless it is shown that everything required by the statute to give jurisdiction was done.....1251

Relief against: Opening: Vacating.
A judgment of the circuit court of the District of Columbia cannot be superseded without two sureties..... 589
The court will quash an execution upon a supersedeas judgment, and also the supersedeas judgment itself, if it does not truly recite the original judgment..... 349
The orphans' court of Washington county, D. C., may review its sentence, even after the right of appeal is lost; and an appeal lies on that review.....1171
A petition for review in the orphans' court is analogous to a bill of review in chancery 1171
Equity will not relieve against a judgment confessed by an attorney through defendant's negligence 1038
An erroneous judgment cannot be set aside after the end of the term, unless entered by misprision or fraud.....1309

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

A justice of the peace in Alexandria county, D. C., has jurisdiction in detinue.....1255
The creditor may, if the debtor does not object, give a sufficient credit on the debt to bring it within the jurisdiction of the justice 361
It is an indictable offense for a justice to demand any fees other than those established by law.....1144
A bond or writing obligatory cannot be given in evidence where the summons describes the cause of action as a note of hand 361
No appeal lies from a judgment of a justice of the peace rendered upon the verdict of a jury..... 361

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

Chairs left with a painter for repairs are not liable to distress for his rent.....1171
The landlord may distrain after the death of the lessee..... 234
In replevin for goods distrained for rent, upon the issue of "no rent arrear," defendant need not prove that the distress was laid by his order or authority..... 234

LIBEL AND SLANDER.

One proprietor of a newspaper is responsible for the act of his coproprietor in publishing a libelous article..... 49
The fact that the libelous article was copied from another paper, and so appeared on its face, is no justification..... 49
But such fact is admissible in mitigation of damages under the general issue..... 49
Under a plea of justification, no evidence in mitigation of damages can be given....1263
Under a plea of justification, the truth of the libel, with the innuendoes, must be proved as laid.....1263
Under a plea of not guilty, defendants cannot prove the truth of the libel, even in mitigation of damages.....1263
Plaintiff in slander may have leave to withdraw his general replication and file a general demurrer, and the court will give defendant leave to change his plea..... 107
The amount of damages for a libel depends upon the degree of malice..... 49

LIENS.

Advances to the master to enable a ship detained in France to prosecute her homeward voyage are not a lien on the compensation awarded under the French convention 1035

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

Page

See, also, "Adverse Possession"; "Ejectment"; "Equity"; "Maritime Liens."

State statutes of limitation are applied in the federal courts, unless congress has otherwise provided..... 896

A state statute of limitations is ineffectual to bar a right of action secured to the United States by act of congress..... 118

Nine months and a half allowed in a statute of limitations for bringing suit in causes of action accrued over four years prior thereto held reasonable..... 797

The Indiana statute of 1852 gives full effect to the statutes of other states, and places debtors removing to Indiana in the same condition as if still in the place of the contract..... 996

Under section 190 of the California probate act, suit to recover lands sold by an administrator by order of the probate court is barred in three years from the sale....1314

The statute of limitations does not begin to run against an action by the assignee of a corporation to recover back a dividend wrongfully declared until the fraud is discovered by him..... 506

Fraud which will prevent the running of limitations is secret or concealed fraud,—a concealment of the cause of action..... 896

Where plaintiff has been negligent in discovering or attacking fraud, the statute will run from the commencement of his laches, notwithstanding the fraud..... 896

In California, the exclusive right to recover real estate is in the administrator until distribution, and, if his right becomes barred by neglect, the right of the heir, though a minor, is also barred.....1314

The inability of an heir to sue to recover real estate pending administration is not a disability, within the meaning of section 191 of the California probate act.....1314

The exemption by Code Ga. § 2548, of an administrator from suit for one year from his qualification, held not repealed by the limitation law of March 16, 1869..... 797

Act Ga. March 16, 1869, barred suits on causes accruing prior to June 1, 1865, if not brought by January 1, 1870. Held that, in the case of an administrator, the time was extended one year. (Code, § 2548.).. 797

In the absence of positive provision, the statute, after it has commenced to run, is not suspended by defendant's removal from the state..... 996

Action on note held barred in 13 years, notwithstanding frequent absences of defendant from the state..... 14

The statute may be pleaded on the first day of the term next after office judgment 1307

In trespass, the infancy or coverture of some joint plaintiffs does not prevent the plea of limitations as to the others..... 855

Amendments made to the writ after the statute has run, where they introduce no new cause of action, will not bar the right of action..... 118

The act of limitations cannot be given in evidence upon nil debet..... 153

Mandamus will not lie to the head of an executive department to compel the performance of an act not merely ministerial, but involving the exercise of judgment.... 74

MARINE INSURANCE.

See, also, "Average."

The contract—Interpretation.

A policy on goods on board a vessel for a voyage out and return, "$12,000 valued," must be considered an open policy for the return voyage..... 216

A second policy on the return cargo of coffee valued at a certain sum per pound, deducting $12,000 previously insured, is only binding on the balance of cargo after deducting so much as would at first cost amount to $12,000..... 216

Representations: Concealments.

Concealment by the assured of the fact that part of the cargo is such as would be condemned by belligerent courts vitiates the whole policy..... 849

The assured is not bound to anticipate and disclose every possible ground of suspicion which may weigh with belligerent cruisers; but he must disclose circumstances under which belligerent courts are in the habit of condemning, though against right. 849

The risk.

Construction of exception in Boston policies with regard to seizure on account of illicit or prohibited trade..... 483

In case of a capture, where the vessel is lost by fire or accident, or negligence of the captors before she is delivered up, the whole loss is attributable to the capture... 483

Underwriters are liable as for a total loss where a vessel seized for violation of revenue laws is acquitted by a foreign court, but by the long exposure is so injured that necessary repairs will amount to more than her value, and she is abandoned..... 483

Where the insurer was to be liable for a total loss only, he is not liable where the cargo saved on the wreck of the vessel did not pay the expense of saving it..... 707

Where the risk is to terminate, at the end of the voyage, after the vessel has been "moored 24 hours in safety," a mere anchoring in the usual anchorage grounds, for temporary purposes, does not end the risk.1323

Deviation.

The smallest deviation without justifiable necessity discharges the underwriters, though the loss is not an immediate consequence 894

Abandonment.

The right to abandon is determined by the actual state of affairs at the time it is made. Where a captured vessel was restored at the time of attempted abandonment, though not known to the owner, held, that the same was ineffectual..... 838

A waiver of abandonment by the first insurer does not affect the relations of the insured with a second insurer..... 216

Abandonment in writing, pursuant to the policy, held to convey full title, so as to prevent claim of ownership by the assured after raising and repair of the vessel..... 975

Right of recovery.

An alleged local custom to keep back one-third the gross freight for charges in a policy on freight where the loss is total is unreasonable, and will not control against the terms of the policy..... 129

Suits.

Safe performance of voyage raises a presumption that the vessel was properly manned, and devolves upon the insurers of cargo injured by fire the burden of showing the contrary.....1323

Page

Where the property has been condemned by the court of a belligerent, only the sentence of that court is to be read in evidence, except under peculiar circumstances. 851

MARITIME LIENS.

See, also, "Admiralty"; "Affreightment"; "Bottomry and Respondentia"; "Charter Parties"; "Demurrage"; "Salvage"; "Seamen"; "Shipping."

The right to a lien.

A general creditor of a ship has no lien..1203

By the common law, the lien for work or repairs on a domestic ship does not exist independently of possession..... 751

The repair of a vessel used to navigate tide water, although used partly on inland navigation, is a maritime contract..... 293

Repairs upon a vessel in winter quarters in a foreign port, done by contract with the owner, there being no express claim of a lien at the time, and no immediate necessity for such repairs, do not constitute a lien 520

A watchman on board a vessel laid up for repairs has no lien for wages..... 111

The mate and engineer of an enrolled steamer employed in towing vessels in Boston harbor have a lien for their wages....1268

Such lien extends to her boiler, though the seamen knew that the makers who put it in were to retain title until paid, with a right to remove it on any default.....1268

Where a vessel was sold on condition, and possession delivered, and one of the purchasers, after default, sold his interest to his partner, and engaged as mate, held, that he had no lien for wages as against a subsequent vendee of the owner..... 973

That a bill for supplies is made out against the vessel by name and her owners is evidence that credit was given to the vessel, and that the personal responsibility was not exclusively relied on..... 957

The maritime law gives no lien for supplies furnished at the home port..... 957

The residence of the owner is the home port, though the vessel is enrolled elsewhere. The place of enrollment is only prima facie the home port..... 957

Priority and enforcement.

Attachment of a vessel on process from a common-law court operates on nothing but the owner's interest after the maritime liens are satisfied.....1203

A bottomry bond given by the owner in a foreign port for money to purchase cargo held entitled to priority over an earlier mortgage, under which the mortgagor was allowed to remain in possession without alteration of the ship's papers..... 938

Where a vessel was libeled in the home port while in possession of shipwrights, held, that they must be first paid; then a prior mortgagee; and, afterwards, one who made repairs, but was never in possession, ratably with furnishers of supplies..... 810

The act of 1850 does not give a recorded mortgage priority over maritime liens, which by the maritime law are preferred to a bottomry bond..... 810

Seamen's wages are payable out of proceeds prior to the claims of material men furnishing supplies during their employment 957

The jurisdiction of the admiralty courts to enforce maritime liens cannot be ousted by any proceedings in the state courts by owners or agents..... 293

Waiver: Discharge: Extinguishment.

Maritime liens are not divested by a sale of the vessel under process from a common-law court.....1205

Liens under state laws. Page

Whenever the existence of a lien on a vessel for work or repairs is established, under the local law, whether by statute or by common or municipal law, the jurisdiction of the admiralty attaches proprio vigore 751

A lien held to have attached upon a vessel by the common law for materials furnished and repairs made, and not to have been divested by a voluntary surrender of the vessel by the owner..... 751

There is no statute law in Massachusetts (1840) which gives a lien in rem to shipwrights for building, equipping, or repairing ships..... 751

MARRIAGE.

In Michigan, it is essential that a marriage shall be solemnized in the presence of a minister or magistrate, and two witnesses *1326

Marriage articles are not affected by not being recorded within the time prescribed by the laws of New Jersey..... 451

Marriage articles will not be presumed to have been abandoned by any delay or negligence of the trustee in their execution 451

A covenant by the father of the intended wife to stand seised to her use, after marriage, of a piece of real estate, does not operate after marriage to pass the legal estate by the statute of uses; the use remains executory in the trustee and his heirs..... 451

MARSHAL.

Plaintiff is liable to the marshal for his whole poundage if he levy goods to the value of the debt, whether they be sold or not 1052

MASTER AND SERVANT.

A person employed to assist in unloading a vessel is charged with the usual knowledge of its construction, and the location of the usual hatches, and cannot recover for injuries caused by falling through an open hatch 561

MORTGAGES.

See, also, "Chattel Mortgages"; "Shipping."

A prior mortgagee may release his claim on payment of the debt, unless he have actual notice of the claims of subsequent mortgagees 264

A person who may be chargeable with a balance in case the proceeds of the mortgaged premises do not satisfy the debt is an indispensable party to a foreclosure suit 1091

The purchaser at a trustee's sale held not relieved from paying interest as agreed from the day of sale, pending investigation of the title, and waiting its clearing, though he refused to take possession..... 761

But interest will cease to run from the time the money is paid into court..... 761

Auction sale set aside where a party interested publicly announced that it was merely a legal form to perfect his title, and that purchasers would be subject to a suit at law..... 133

A mortgagor is not responsible, without notice, for the application of any surplus which may remain on the sale of the mortgaged property after satisfying his mortgage 280

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

Page

The municipality of Alexandria, D. C., has power to prohibit the keeping of gaming tables under penalties to be recovered by warrant to be levied on the offender's personal property, though he be also liable to prosecution under the state law..... 234

In a justice's warrant for the penalty of a by-law, all such defects will be disregarded as would be disregarded after verdict in debt or information upon a penal statute.. 146

In respect to all acts which the corporation has power to perform, it may bind itself by those agents whom it suffers to act for it, and in the modes which its usages sanction 1343

The mayor, city attorney, and treasurer may engage attorneys to collect demands due the municipality, where they have ordinarily been suffered to make similar agreements 1343

When contracts have been made, acts done, and labor performed pursuant to a construction of a city charter, acquiesced in by all the citizens, that construction will be sustained, if justified by any possible reading of the statutes.....1343

In the ordinary course of its government, and in the conduct of improvements which it is the city's duty to make, it may execute promissory notes, bonds, and guaranties necessary and convenient for the purpose..1343

The mere fact that New Orleans consolidated bonds were older than bonds subsequently issued held to give them no priority over other bonds. (La. Act. Feb. 23, 1852.) 380

Money collected as provided by law to pay interest on bonds is a trust fund for such purpose, and the city will be enjoined from using it for other purposes..... 377

NAME.

"Jeffery" and "Jeffries" are not idem sonans 841

NAVIGABLE WATERS.

A steamer going at excessive speed through the channel between Blackwell's Island and New York City, and thereby causing swells which sink a moored canal boat, is liable.....1066

One constructing a boom of specified dimensions under a private statute containing a proviso that navigation shall not be obstructed cannot assert that logs of others, which went into his boom, were there by inevitable accident, and that he was not responsible for their detention.....1012

NE EXEAT.

The writ will not issue where plaintiff's clerk, about to quit the district, had embezzled his goods, and converted them into money, which he has deposited in a bank to his credit; no debt being positively averred 202

NEW TRIAL.

New trial will be granted upon the discovery of new, material, and important evidence 850

It must clearly appear that the newly-discovered evidence was not known before, and is not merely cumulative, and that the witness is credible..... 353

Failure of witnesses to state facts which the party expected them to state is no ground for new trial..... 892

Page

New trial not granted because of interest of a witness, where such interest would probably be released on another trial..... 353

Errors of the court are no ground for a new trial where the verdict was right, and the moving party was not prejudiced.. 790

The whole previous cost must be paid where a new trial is had on newly-discovered evidence..... 353

NOTARIES.

Notaries public have authority to take the acknowledgment of creditors to their powers of attorney in bankruptcy proceedings.. 71

OATH.

Affirmation by juror not a Quaker, not attached to any particular religious sect, not permitted 151

PARTNERSHIP.

An agreement to furnish $3,000 and personal services to the business of another for a year, at a stipulated price, and not to be chargeable with losses, does not constitute a partnership as between the parties.....1149

But where the party furnishing such money holds himself out as a partner he is liable as such to creditors, and, in case of insolvency, the sum contributed is partnership assets.....1149

A partner cannot compel his copartner to accept a purchaser of the former's interest as a member of the firm..... 317

Owners of whale ships, in the absence of express contract making them partners, are only part owners in the vessel..... 353

The representations of a member of a firm to the purchaser of its negotiable paper that it is business paper will estop the firm or their assignee from setting up that it is accommodation paper, and void for usury 676

The dissolution of a partnership by mutual consent does not affect the rights of existing creditors, nor of those who subsequently become creditors, if the members continue to treat each other as partners... 89

A debt put at the disposal of one partner after dissolution of the firm may be dealt with in equity as his individual property. 232

A continuing partner who agrees, on dissolution of the firm, to pay the firm creditors, is a trustee for them, and a subsequent assignment by him, with preferences, of the partnership effects, is fraudulent and void 793

PATENTS.

Patentability.

The substitution of wood for paper in the construction of a box of peculiar pattern does not amount to novelty..... 640

There is no invention in placing on a soft metal gun cartridge a bottom of hard metal, to give capacity for repeated discharges...1260

A metallic paint produced by well-known methods from the refuse left in the manufacture of bichromate of potash is not patentable as a new composition of matter...1165

A device consisting of perforated tubes set vertically in a grain bin, so as to allow a free circulation of air through the grain, thus preventing overheating, is anticipated by a prior invention of hollow perforated side walls for the same purpose... 788

Page

The mere location of an old apparatus on a machine is not patentable unless it results in a new combination, producing new and useful results..... 805

A prior invention to anticipate must have been reduced to practical use. The mere conception of the invention and experiments alone are not sufficient.....677, 684, 1133

Superior utility, where not derived from the use of better material or greater skill or care in the manufacture, is evidence of invention 684

The condition as to utility does not require that the thing invented should be the very best article for the use to which it is applied. Practicability is all that is required 677

The amount of labor, study, or thought which the invention cost is of no consequence, if it be really a new and useful invention 684

Combining a curved metal receiver with an elevated instead of a horizontal delivery involves no invention, and is not patentable 635

A new and useful process for the making of hoop skirts held patentable, although effected by the use of a "former" previously known and used for other purposes..... 630

The double independent leather covering for base balls, where such covering had been previously applied to soft balls, held not a patentable invention..... 494

A device for mending rents in firemen's hose by clamping the torn edges together between metal plates is not anticipated by a similar device for making preserving cans air-tight 155

Who may obtain patent.

One first conceiving an invention, and using reasonable diligence to perfect it, and doing so in fact, is entitled to a patent over a subsequent original inventor who first reduces it to actual use..... 843

Prior public use or sale.

Mere public use by others before issuance of the patent is not decisive against the inventor here, as in England.....1332

The public use for more than two years before the application, which renders the patent void, may be a public use by the inventor himself of a single machine.... 302

The use of the invention in the inventor's factories, when not for the purpose of experiment, is a public use..... 643

Prior description or foreign patent.

Prior publications which do not so describe the invention that the public may construct and put it in practice without further invention do not destroy the patent 302

An application withdrawn and instantly refiled in the same words is a continuing application, and not affected by the issuance of a foreign patent within six months before such refiling.....1136

Abandonment: Laches.

An inventor who knowingly suffers his invention to be in public use for years without objection dedicates the same to the public 1332

Passive conduct with knowledge of an appropriation by defendant, which the inventor is powerless to prevent, does not estop him from subsequently asserting his right on obtaining a patent..... 302

The proviso in Act 1870, § 35, providing for renewal of rejected applications, does not restore a right once lost by laches.... 818

The inventor delayed 12 years after the final rejection of his application on appeal to the commissioner before amending his specification. Held no abandonment..... 302

Page

Delay of 18 years in renewing a rejected application is an abandonment where another has in the meantime secured a patent for the same thing..... 818

During two years before application made, the inventor may publicly use and sell his invention without any presumption of abandonment..... 302

The first inventor's delay to apply for a patent for eight years after the second inventor has secured one bars him from thereafter making application..... 705

Application and issue: Interference.

Upon the application, the commissioner should decide, not only questions of law, but also of fact, including abandonment or neglect 705

It must be assumed from the granting of the patent that there was evidence before the commissioner to show that there was unavoidable delay in preparing the application for examination. (Act 1861.)..... 302

The decision of the commissioner upon a question of fact upon which he is authorized to pass is unimpeachable, except upon the ground that it is ultra vires..... 302

The commissioner, after deciding an interference, may, for cause shown, allow one party to withdraw and refile his application, and may then declare an interference anew 1136

Appeals from commissioner's decision.

The questions of practicability and usefulness are not subject to appeal in cases of interference.....1136

The judge cannot order reasons of appeal to be stricken out, but may overrule them 1136

Validity.

A claim for a result merely, or for every means by which certain advantages in a harvester can be secured, is invalid..... 805

A patent for a new article so described that it can be made without invention is not invalidated by an ineffective attempt made to describe the best machine for making it..... 394

Patent held, on the evidence, to date back for 12 years before the application..... 37

Extent of claim.

The claims in a patent should be liberally construed, but must be limited by the state of the art, showing the degree of improvement effected..... 635

A disclaimer made by an attorney in the prosecution of an application does not necessarily estop the patentee from maintaining that his claim embraces the matter referred to..... 635

Repeal of patent.

Method for repeal of patents provided for by Act 1793, § 10..... 96

Assignment.

The assignee of territorial rights not restricted as to sales within the territory, may, as to subsequent assignees of other territory, sell within his own territory without restriction or condition..... 183

Licenses.

The infringing articles were put into defendant's factory at its expense, under the direction of the inventor, and were used under his direction up to the time of the application for a patent. Held, that defendant had a special license to use such articles.. 483

A grant of the exclusive right to "manufacture and sell" in a specified city carries to a purchaser from the licensee a right to use the machine anywhere.....1216

Sale of patented machine or product.

When a patented article has been lawfully made and sold without restriction or condition, it is no longer within the monopoly, and the purchaser may use it without restriction as to time and place..... 183

Infringement—What constitutes.

A patent for a composition of several ingredients covers known equivalents of each ingredient 1133

The use of substantially the same means to accomplish the same result is an infringement 1218

A mechanical equivalent is a means which may be adapted by the mere skill of a mechanic to accomplish the same result as the device used in the patent.....1218

An equivalent of a substance is another substance having similar properties and producing substantially the same effect...1133

A claim for a paint can having a thin rim of soft metal, to be cut through in opening, is infringed by making one end wholly of thin tin.....1087

—— Who liable.

One may be an infringer without knowing of the existence of the patent.....1133 —— Remedy generally.

Equity has jurisdiction in case of infringement on the ground of want of adequate remedy at law..... 302

Defendants, in consideration of a license to manufacture under plaintiff's patents, expressly recognized their validity, and agreed not to manufacture certain articles covered thereby. Held, that plaintiff could sue in equity either for breach of the agreement or for infringement..... 399

—— Preliminary injunction.

Denied where the validity of the patent, six months old, was put in issue, and defendant alleged a license granted by complainant before the patent issued..... 140

A prior decree sustaining a patent, if entered by default, will not warrant a preliminary injunction in a subsequent suit..... 640

The rendition of a verdict in favor of plaintiff is not conclusive upon his right to an injunction..... 690

Where the patent is only recently granted, very strong evidence of acquiescence on the part of the community is required to justify a preliminary injunction..... 640

—— Procedure.

In an infringement suit, it is sufficient for plaintiff to aver that title is vested in him, without tracing it by the assignments....1319

The express recognition by agreement of the validity of a patent, in consideration of a license, will estop the licensee, in a subsequent suit for infringement, to set up its invalidity 399

A mere mercantile agreement not to deal in certain patented machines therein named is not an estoppel to deny the validity of the patent..... 640

Prior knowledge of a person, of which notice is given, cannot be proved by another person, not mentioned in such notice..... 677

—— Evidence.

The patent is prima facie evidence that the patentee is the original inventor..... 302

Declarations of the patentee, made after he had assigned all his interest, impeaching the validity of the patent, are inadmissible against the assignee..... 677

Nor is evidence of such declarations admissible to contradict the patentee, who has testified as a witness for the assignee, where he has not been interrogated as to such declarations..... 677

The evidence on the subject of anticipation must be clear and convincing..... 394 —— Injunction and its violation.

The fact that defendant, who has sold an infringing article, sold it on behalf of its owner, and had no interest in it, or in its sale, is no ground of refusing an injunction against him..... 563

Page

Various particular inventions and patents.

Base balls. No. 127,098, for double leather covering, held invalid for want of invention 494

Brushes. No. 160,933, for improvement, held infringed.....1320

Capstans. No. 63,917, for improvement in applying steam power to capstans, held valid and infringed 302

Car wheels. No. 640, for improvement in mode of making cast-iron car wheels, construed.....677, 684, 690

Harvesters. No. 15,044 (reissued No. 4,281), for improvement, held invalid..... 635

Harvesters. Reissue No. 2,254 (original No. 37,630), for an improvement in harvesters, consisting in a raking and reeling apparatus, construed, and held not infringed 805

Hats. No. 34,043, for improvement in men's hats, held valid and infringed..... 553

Isinglass. No. 134,690, for improvement in manufacture, held invalid, the invention having been in public use for more than two years..... 643

Jails. No. 110,483, for an invention relating to the construction of jails, construed in a charge, and found infringed by the jury 1218

Metallic packing. No. 5,767, for an "improved composition for metallic packing in steam engines," construed in a charge to a jury 1133

Paint cans. No. 24,748, for improvement, construed, and held valid and infringed 1087, 1089

Ruffles. No. 28,244, for improvement in manufacture, construed.....394, 399

Shoe-sole machine. A patent for cutting the soles of shoes by means of a cutting die mounted on a shaft held infringed....1258

Skirt protector. No. 155,534 held valid against the defense of anticipation, and infringed 37, 38, 47, 48

Stop valves. No. 102,187, for an improvement in stop valves for petroleum packages, construed, and held not infringed 1324

PAYMENT.

See, also, "Accord and Satisfaction"; "Bills, Notes, and Checks"; "Compromise."

The giving of a bill or note is not a payment unless there is an agreement to receive it as such.....1272

If it be shown that a payment, acknowledged in a receipt, was by bill or note, which was not paid, then there is no payment 1272

Where an indorser paid the amount of the note, but by mistake another note by the same maker was surrendered to him, held that it was nevertheless a payment of the first note.....1182

The giving of a note for supplies to a vessel will not bar a suit in admiralty on the original cause of action where libelant produces the note in court and surrenders it.. 215

Reservation in 1779 of an annual rent of £26, current money in Virginia, permits payment in paper money while current, but requires gold and silver afterwards..... 853

Money paid on contracts expressly prohibited by law cannot be recovered..... 264

Where, on payment of a debt, a bond was given to secure the obligee against a possible subsequent payment "on compulsion of law," and afterwards two suits were brought to recover the same debt, whereupon the obligee filed a bill of interpleader, and paid the sum into court, held a voluntary payment, not recoverable under the bond 1073

Page

Advances made on account generally will be applied to extinguish the amounts due on contracts completed in preference to those not completed..... 70

PERSONAL PROPERTY.

A lease for 99 years, renewable forever, by the common law is only a chattel..... 283

PILOTS.

To charge one, as agent of a vessel, for half pilotage fees under the New York statute, he must be shown to have some connection with her..... 1036

PLEADING AT LAW.

The facts and circumstances which make an act unlawful or actionable must be set forth; the words "wrongfully and improperly" are insufficient to sustain the action.. 580

Averment that an award was duly published is an averment that the notice of the award required by the submission was given 1120

A count on an award which requires a release by plaintiff on payment of a sum by defendant is bad on general demurrer if it failed to aver plaintiff's readiness to give the release 1120

In debt on an award, a plea that the referees never made any such award as is averred is bad, as amounting to the general issue 1120

Where four counts declare on an alleged submission and award, a plea purporting to answer the whole action, but alleging revocation of one submission only, without showing which one of the four, is bad on general demurrer..... 1120

In an action by husband and wife, a plea in bar setting up pendency of another action between the same parties is not supported by evidence of a suit by the wife alone prior to marriage..... 1168

A plea of non damnificatus is only pleadable to indemnifying bonds..... 996

A plea that the written contract set forth in the declaration is not the contract made by the parties, but is a fraud upon defendant, is bad on demurrer..... 43

A rejoinder is bad which avers several distinct answers to the replication, or puts in issue to the jury matter of law..... 1

After a plea of general performance, a rejoinder stating an excuse for not performing is bad..... 124

A demurrer for duplicity must point out the particulars in which the duplicity consists 888

A special demurrer operates as a general demurrer as to all the pleadings of the party demurring..... 1

Upon a general demurrer, judgment goes against him who commits the first substantial fault in pleading..... 1

A demurrer to a special plea cannot be carried back to the declaration where the general issue has been pleaded..... 43

Plea of general issue held to admit plaintiffs' right to sue in their firm name without proving the partnership..... 713

Upon a count "for sundry matters properly chargeable, as by account annexed," it is not necessary that the account should be such as would be evidence per se under Act Md. 1729, c. 20..... 234

Page

Plaintiff may enter a nolle prosequi to any account in his declaration..... 231

A defective averment of citizenship of parties may be amended after verdict..... 362

PLEADING IN ADMIRALTY.

See, also, "Maritime Liens"; "Salvage"; "Seamen."

The defense of stale claim must be set up in the answer..... 1329

It is no defense to a libel for failure to deliver goods that no credit is given for freight earned. Such claims should be set up by cross libel..... 1203

A respondent in a suit in personam, whose vessel is attached because personal service cannot be made in the district, does not waive his right to plead to the jurisdiction by filing a stipulation to secure the release of the vessel..... 570

One verifying a libel as attorney in fact need not show his authority at the time. It is enough to show it when called in question 911

A mere general employment as proctor to prosecute an admiralty suit does not authorize the verification of a libel as attorney in fact..... 911

An answer cannot be amended, so as to contradict a material admission, after the cause has been heard..... 962

PLEADING IN EQUITY.

There is no absolute rule in regard to the multifariousness of a bill..... 258

A bill for the discovery of the application for a policy of insurance, and the policy, and specific performance of the contract to deliver it is bad for multifariousness... 759

A bill alleging infringement of several different patents by one machine of defendants is not multifarious..... 1319

Praying that a bill in another cause may be made a part of the present bill is the same as repeating all its statements..... 1038

A bill for relief on account of fraud in a sale may be broad enough to justify a decree if gross mistake appears..... 1016

Where fraud is charged to have been committed by an agent, denial by the principal on belief and on information from the agent is not sufficient..... 1038

When a plea is set down for hearing, under the 13th additional rule, and is not replied to, all the well-pleaded facts are taken as admitted..... 1334

PLEADING UNDER STATE CODES.

Objection for duplicity, under the Oregon Code, must be made by motion to strike out 157

A complaint containing more than one cause of action will be stricken out for duplicity, unless they are separately stated.. 157

PLEDGE.

Pledged bonds sold at public auction, and bought in by the pledgee, may nevertheless be redeemed within a reasonable time; but a delay of 11 years after the sale is unreasonable 822

POWERS.

Where power is given to a cestui que use to appoint by will, it cannot be exercised in any other way, and the court cannot interfere..... 763

Page

PRACTICE AT LAW.

Replevin discontinued by negligence of the clerk reinstated after lapse of a year.. 15
The court will not, at a subsequent term, reinstate an action of replevin which has been non-prossed at a preceding term upon a rule to declare..... 13
Permission granted after rule day to plead the statute of limitations on payment of costs..... 855
On reinstatement after nonsuit, defendant not permitted to plead the statute of limitations unless he show it to be necessary for the justice of the case..... 153
The order for production of papers at the trial must be served a reasonable time before they are required..... 337
On a writ of inquiry, plaintiff's oath may be given in evidence of the amount of his claim 592

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALITY.

Admiralty requires a sworn libel as the foundation of process of arrest of person or property..... 911
A motion to set aside an arrest for irregularity in libelant's proceedings will not be denied of course merely because not made at the earliest practicable day..... 911
In holding a respondent to bail, admiralty is governed much by equitable considerations 911
The question of jurisdiction in the case of a public armed vessel in the service of a foreign nation libeled by one claiming title thereto may be determined upon a suggestion filed by the district attorney acting under orders of the executive..... 85
Under a libel of forfeiture, any one claiming an interest in the thing may intervene to contest the forfeiture..... 953
A creditor who has attached the thing before seizure under a libel of forfeiture may intervene as a claimant..... 953
In the absence of a specific rule, a replication is necessary to put in issue facts set up by sworn answer; if none be filed, such facts will be taken as admitted..... 987
The court will not allow mere verbal understandings between counsel to control the rights of the parties..... 860
A vessel may be released on bond under Rev. St. § 941, at any time before default is entered on the return of process..... 870
The amendment of the libel by adding a colibelant does not discharge the surety on the stipulation..... 392
The taking of notes and mortgages from the owners as collateral security after the seizure and bonding of the vessel held not to operate to stay the suit nor discharge the surety..... 392
The taking of personal security is a waiver of the remedy in admiralty, but, if the security is returned, the liability in personam may be enforced by citation or arrest 835
On default of one summoned as garnishee, libelant is not entitled to execution in personam against him..... 44
After default by one summoned as garnishee, he is not entitled as of right to put in an answer, except to state facts occurring since the default..... 44
Such answer allowed on condition that libelant might take issue upon it, and that the garnishee should stipulate with sureties to pay whatever the court should allow... 44
A motion will not lie to review a decree after writ of error lodged..... 128
Page
A rehearing after entry of a definitive decree will not be allowed after the end of the term, except by consent of the parties. 860

PRACTICE IN EQUITY.

It is of right, and not of favor, that defendant may file his answer before the decree nisi is made absolute.....1036
Where a time rule is waived, and no other substituted, some special order must be obtained before either party can force the other to proceed.....1332
That a defendant is in contempt in a suit against himself and another will not prevent him from filing an answer in another suit against himself only, though relating to the same matter.....1036
The court may direct further investigation where the master's report discloses facts which, in its opinion, should be further investigated..... 403
A master's report relates only to facts, and will not be set aside unless clear mistake or abuse of power is shown.....1029
Error of the master, producing results not materially different from what would be reached if there was no error, is no ground for setting aside or recommitting his report 1029
In the case of an alleged violation of a water privilege, the bill will not be retained after a decree in order to give plaintiffs an opportunity, by a new trial and proofs, to establish the fact that a further lowering of defendant's dam is necessary to the protection of plaintiff's rights..... 638
The proper practice in respect to filing bills of review is by petition stating the grounds and asking leave to file the bill....1076
The ordinances of Lord Bacon still govern bills of review. They may be filed for errors of law and for newly-discovered material proofs.....1076
New matter which would have changed the decree is ground for review, though foreign to the issue.....1076
To authorize a review for new evidence, it must appear that the same could not have been discovered by reasonable diligence 1076
Miscalculation leading to an excessive decree may be obviated as a ground of review by entering a credit for the excess.....1076
Lapse of time will bar a review, especially where death of persons interested leaves no probability of explanation.....1076
It is not necessary in all cases to comply with a decree before it can be reviewed, as where a conveyance is required by it..1076

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

See. also. "Factors and Brokers."

One having a contract right to purchase lands in a limited time, and selling the right before expiration thereof, is not an agent of the vendor, if there was a bona fide expectation that he might make the purchase; otherwise if the purpose was merely to speculate by selling the right within the time.....1024
The principal, and not the agent, is liable for the negligence of the latter..... 586
An agent purchasing property with money partly raised on his own credit may hold the same until indemnified, if his principal becomes insolvent.....1125
An agent receiving back from a maritime average adjuster a part of the sum charged for services must credit his principal therewith 1169
An agent who undertakes to procure insurance, and does it so negligently that a loss which occurs is not covered by the policy, is liable to his principal..... 657

Page

A direction to procure a policy of insurance is not satisfied by a verbal contract of insurance 658
The principal need not maintain a suit on such verbal contract, where its validity is doubtful, before suing the agent for damages 658

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.

See, also, "Bail"; "Subrogation."

A surety who has paid a debt cannot claim an assignment of the instrument evidencing it..... 264
The surety who has paid the money upon execution may maintain an action against the principal for money had and received, though he holds the execution by assignment 14
Property given to indemnify one surety will not be sold for the equal benefit of a cosurety where the former is discharged by payment of the debt..... 264

PRIZE.

Grounds of condemnation.
Produce of the soil of a hostile country, embarked in the commerce thereof, is legitimate prize, regardless of the owner's domicile 969
Produce of the enemy's soil owned by a neutral, while it remains in the enemy's country, is enemy property..... 969
A neutral friend to both belligerents cannot transport the effects of one to the use of the other..... 969
Property shipped from an enemy's country by an American citizen, after knowledge of the war, is subject to condemnation as enemy property.....*954
Property of persons residing within the rebel lines during the War of the Rebellion is proper prize..... 969
The interest of creditors in enemy property, though amounting to a lien, does not exempt it from capture as prize..... 969
A vessel guilty of an unlawful trade with the enemy is liable to capture at any time during the voyage.....1341
The rules of international law, in relation to public wars, are applicable to the hostilities subsisting during the War of the Rebellion 969
The proclamation of the blockade is of itself conclusive evidence of the existence of war warranting the blockade..... 969
A clear necessity will justify an entrance into a blockaded port, but satisfactory evidence will be required of the reality and urgency of the necessity..... 530
Seizure of a vessel for violation of a blockade is lawful, though made by a national vessel forming no part of the blockading squadron.....1341
Vessel captured close in shore near blockaded port, with falsified papers, and cargo of first importance to enemy, condemned.. 985
Vessel and cargo condemned for attempting to violate blockade....530, 719, 723, 733, 783, 932, 1005, 1341, 1343
Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy property 723, 733

Procedure.
A prize delivered to the court by the prize master is under its control, and the filing of a libel is not necessary to give it jurisdiction of the property.....1340
An order appointing appraisers before libel filed, without notice to any claimant, but under circumstances showing assent of subsequent claimants thereto, will not be set aside on their subsequent motion.....1340

That an order appointing appraisers was signed by the judge out of his district does not affect its validity.....1340
Admiralty has jurisdiction of claims by seamen to shares in prizes..... 499
Members of a privateer's crew forced on shore without reasonable cause after the voyage is begun are entitled to share in prizes taken..... 499
Salvors of captured property shipwrecked after seizure were allowed one-half the net proceeds 733
Where the share of one owner in a vessel was condemned under the act of July 13, 1861, and the remainder acquitted, held, that the owner of the latter had no lien for outlays in fitting the vessel..... 997
Abandonment by captors does not restore the rights of the owner; and, if the vessel is saved by others, the captors have a right, as against the owners, to a balance of proceeds 981
After the lapse of the term in which a decree is rendered in a prize case, the authority of the court to revoke or alter it is extinct 533
The allowance of costs and fees to counsel and officers in prize cases discussed... 533

Unlawful capture: Damages.
A suit for consequential damages will lie for the illegal seizure of a vessel, by a French privateer, where there was a decree of restitution by the French court of admiralty 127
One claiming in the acts of court to be part owner of a privateer is responsible for damages assessed against her, though not named in the ship's papers..... 935
False papers divest a neutral vessel of all right to redress for an unlawful capture.. 637
Where a capture is lawful, the subsequent bringing in of the captured vessel is not a cause for giving damages..... 736

Ransom.
A friendly belligerent may ransom the property of a neutral after capture..... 513
An action may be sustained in a court of common law upon a bill of exchange given for the ransom of a vessel..... 513
In such action the capture must be taken to be justifiable and the ransom regular, for a court of common law cannot incidentally decide a question of prize..... 513
Duress arising from threats of destruction of the vessel and cargo cannot be admitted to avoid a contract of ransom, where the capture was justified by probable cause 513

PUBLIC LANDS.

See, also, "Grant."

Possession for 10 years under patent issued in 1827, pursuant to a New Madrid certificate or warrant, held sufficient to defeat ejectment..... 174

RAILROAD COMPANIES.

See, also, "Carriers."

Construction of acts of June 3, 1856, and May 5, 1864, granting land to Wisconsin for railroads from Madison or Columbus to the St. Croix river, and from thence to Lake Superior and to Bayfield, and the effect of acceptance thereunder 366
Neither a nonresident receiver nor more than one receiver should ordinarily be appointed for a railroad.....1321
A shipper whom the receiver of a railroad company had charged more than the statutory rate of freight allowed to sue the receiver in the federal court for the excess. 72

The federal court declined to order its receiver to disregard a state statute fixing maximum rates for freight and passengers on all the roads within the state..... 72

Real Property.

See "Adverse Possession"; "Boundaries"; "Deed"; "Ejectment"; "Grant"; "Public Lands."

RECEIVERS.

Previous notice of a motion for the appointment of a receiver is not necessary when counsel for the opposite party is present in court..... 262

A receiver should be an impartial person, not interested in the litigation or a partisan of any party to it.....1321

Two receivers appointed as representatives of different interests, which became hostile, removed, and a single disinterested receiver appointed.....1321

RECORDS.

The right to inspect and examine all the records and papers belonging to the court exists only as allowed by statute or rule of court 237

REFERENCE.

Testimony merely filed with the report, without any bill of exceptions, cannot be considered on exceptions to the referee's decision, under Comp. Laws Mich. c. 186... 45

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

The vestry and wardens of the "Protestant Episcopal Church of Alexandria" held to have been the vestry of the Protestant Episcopal church in the parish of Fairfax..1048

One taking an assignment of a pew in the Protestant Episcopal church in St. John's parish, Washington, D. C., for a debt, is not personally liable to the vestry for taxes thereon.....1180

REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

Right of removal.

The citizenship of the parties at the time of filing the petition for removal, and not that at the time of commencing the action, governs the right of removal.....116, 285

The right to removal is waived or lost where the cause has been remanded after it has been once removed, for failure, by neglect of defendant, to perfect the removal 289

It is sufficient if the matter in dispute exceeds $500, besides costs, at the time when the right to the removal accrues and is applied for. (Act July 27, 1866.)..... 116

One of several defendants sued as copartners may have the cause removed so far as concerns himself..... 116

Time for removal.

The petition is in time if filed before or at the term at which the cause "could be tried, and before the trial thereof." (Act 1875, §§ 2, 3.)..... 289

A cause commenced by attachment, in which no process was issued or served, held removable by petition filed at the term at which appearance was entered by consent, the cause continued, and time given to answer. (Code Iowa, § 2744.)..... 12

Where a cause has been regularly removed, and is subsequently remanded for neglect of defendant to file a copy of the record in time, a petition filed at the first term after the remand is in time..... 289

Proceedings to obtain.

A petition which does not state the citizenship of both parties is fatally defective. 310

A petition for removal to the federal "circuit or district court" is not fatally defective, as the removal can only be to the former court..... 351

The filing of a proper bond is a condition precedent to a removal..... 310

A removal bond not conditioned for costs in case the cause is remanded to the state court is defective. (Act March 3, 1875.).. 310

Effect of removal: Subsequent proceedings.

When all requisites of the act are complied with, the state court has no right to deny a removal, and its subsequent acts are void.....1113

On a removal under the act of 1789, certified copies of the process in the state court, and of an order of that court for their transmission, should be entered in the federal court..... 895

Where the removal proceedings are perfected, the circuit court, on petition and notice, will grant leave to file the record before the day appointed by statute, for the purpose of administering provisional remedies to which petitioner may be entitled.. 495

Motion to remand may be made before the trial, where there are no disputed facts. 390

A party is not guilty of laches affecting his right to move to remand because he did not in the first instance oppose the removal in the state court..... 310

The cause will be remanded where the removing party fails, without other excuse than inadvertence, to file a copy of the record in the federal court until after the day named in the removal bond for such filing. 285

A cause removed on the ground that defendant has a defense arising under the laws of the United States will be remanded when it appears by defendant's answer that no such defense is claimed or made..... 390

Where a cause has been removed under the judiciary act of 1789, the case stands as though it had been originally commenced in the circuit court..... 298

Under the act of 1789, a new declaration must be filed in the federal court, as if the suit were original there, before defendant is required to plead..... 895

An injunction allowed by the state court before the petition was filed necessarily falls on the removal of the cause; and defendant cannot be punished for its violation 298

REPLEVIN.

Replevin does not lie for goods converted by a bailee thereof. Detinue or trover is the proper remedy.....1302

On non cepit, the issue must be for defendant if there was not a wrongful taking.1302

The merits of the case may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages in an action upon a replevin bond..... 13

RIGHT, WRIT OF

It is not a bar to the writ that there has been a judgment on a petition for partition between the same parties in favor of the tenant upon an issue joined therein upon the sole seisin of demandant..... 545

RULES OF COURT.

Rule 96 of the district court of the Southern district of New York of 1838 held to be abrogated by circuit court rules of 1845... 574

SALE.

An order, "Please ship me at once 25 bbls. same whisky I had before," is an order for a cash sale..... 362

Where the seller sent an invoice for goods ordered, and a draft for the amount, with a request to accept and return it, held that the sale was conditional, and title did not pass until the condition was complied with 362

The seller may replevy such goods from a marshal who has levied upon them as the property of the purchaser..... 362

The purchaser of a horse gave in payment an order on a third person, payable at a future day. Subsequently he countermanded it, and acceptance was refused. Held, that an action would not lie for the price before the time when the order was payable 450

The purchaser cannot claim damages upon a warranty or an advertisement where he purchases after an examination..... 351

SALVAGE.

Jurisdiction.

A derrick boat raised from the bottom of the channel of a public navigable river may be the subject of a libel for salvage in admiralty 564

In salvage cases, the district court has jurisdiction to determine the right to a balance of proceeds as between adverse claimants; and this notwithstanding that it involves an adjudication upon the validity of a capture at sea, and the effect of a subsequent abandonment..... 981

Right to salvage compensation.

Salvage is the saving of property from extraordinary sea peril by persons not bound by contract to render the service. A signal of distress is evidence of such peril..1272

A vessel driven on an island in Boston harbor in the daytime set a signal of distress. A tug pulled her off and towed her to a dock. Held, a salvage service, for which $1,500, on a valuation of $33,000, should be awarded.....1272

The fact of peril is to be ascertained from the circumstances surrounding the boat at the time when the salvage services commenced 112

One man left by design or negligence on an abandoned ship is thereby discharged, and may claim salvage for assisting to save her 1009

Services of the mate and four men of a wrecked vessel in crossing the Gulf in an open boat to procure assistance held a salvage service..... 985

Piloting a vessel through dangerous shoals, where she could not have made her way unaided, is salvage service, if performed in connection with other salvage service 740

A person requested to take charge as master of a vessel in peril, and save her, if possible, is not deprived of salvage compensation where no definite contract is made with him..... 112

The fact that the exertions of the salvor did not save the boat, but she was saved by natural causes, will not affect his right to salvage, where he encountered the danger, and did all he could under the circumstances 112

Page

Salvage earned by an apprentice is payable to him, and not to his master.....1009

Associates of a salvor with whom a master corruptly agrees to wreck his ship cannot recover salvage..... 556

The wrongful act of a master in wrecking his ship does not bar the claim of a salvor not in collusion with him..... 556

Contracts for salvage services.

A contract for a compensation to be paid at all events, whether the property is saved or not, creates a mere personal obligation, and no lien attaches on account of it.... 777

A salvor by contract is not the agent of the owners, and cannot create against them or the property saved any liability beyond the contract price..... 777

A person who has knowledge of a contract, between a wrecking company and the owners of a wrecked vessel, to raise the same for a certain interest therein, cannot maintain a libel in rem for services rendered for the wrecking company..... 777

Forfeiture of salvage.

Embezzlement of salved property by one of the salvors forfeits his share.....1009

Amount.

Salvage services rendered, without uncommon skill or exertions, to a ship in no great danger of loss, are of small merit.... 695

Allowances in cases arising on the high seas are not safe precedents in cases arising on the Western rivers.....1142

In the case of a derelict sent in by a salvage crew, the reward should be such as would induce reasonable persons to encounter the peril and expense of such undertakings 981

Three-fifths of the gross value allowed where a derelict found in a sinking condition was, at great risk, and without boats or anchors, brought 3,000 miles to port... 1009

One-third of the gross proceeds allowed in the case of a derelict sent in by a salvage crew from a vessel bound to a foreign port 981

An allowance of one-third the value of cargo saved for services of a tug consuming half an hour reduced on appeal from nearly $2,700 to $750.....1142

Thirty-six to 45 per cent. awarded on the value of property saved from a wreck in bad weather..... 985

Forty-three to 50 per cent. of cargo and materials saved from a wreck awarded to the salvors 1255

Eight vessels, with 120 men, saving cargo and materials from a wreck in boisterous weather, awarded $18,468 on a valuation of $50,227..... 993

Sums awarded to various vessels and crews for saving cotton from a wreck.... 972

One and one-half per cent. on $15,000 allowed 483

Remedies for recovery.

Facts tending to show that the master willfully caused the wreck may be considered, though not introduced by either party, and brought to the court's notice by accident 556

The master's neglect of reasonable precautions to prevent wreck, and of reasonable efforts to remedy the same without help, is evidence that the ship was willfully wrecked by him..... 556

Where two libels are unnecessarily filed for salvage, the increased costs must be borne by the libelants in the second libel.. 993

SCIRE FACIAS.

The remedy for a defective return of a sci. fa. against terre-tenants is a motion to quash the return. But such return may be amended 589

Page

The terre-tenants warned may plead in delay of execution that there are other terre-tenants in the same county not summoned 589

SEAMEN.

See, also, "Admiralty"; "Maritime Liens."

Protection and relief.

Under the act of 1803, the consul is the proper judge as to what ship shall bring to the United States a destitute seaman.....1128

The fact that the seaman has deserted from a ship still in port does not prevent the consul from requiring another ship to bring him home.....1128

Foreigners employed as seamen in American merchant ships are seamen "of the United States," within the meaning of the act of 1803, c. 62.....1128

An action against a master for the penalty given by Act 1803 for refusing to bring destitute seamen to the United States must be brought in the name of the United States, and not of the consul.....1128

In such action the certificate of the consul is prima facie evidence of the facts....1128

Double wages are given under Act July 20, 1790, § 9, if there is a shortage in any one of the three articles named therein.. 946, 1000

In determining whether an allowance be short or not, the navy ration is the standard 946, 1000

Five pounds a week is a short allowance of bread, within the statute.....1000

An overabundance of meat cannot be substituted for the bread required by the statute 1000

If the master is unable to obtain the kind of provisions required by the statute, other kinds may be substituted..... 946

The contract of shipment.

Where the shipping articles for a sea-elephant voyage contained novel provisions for computing the shares, held, that the seamen, whose attention was not called thereto, were not bound by them.....1270

A clause in use only three years in shipping articles, and authorizing the master to disrate any seaman whom he judged incompetent or indisposed to his duty, held not binding where it was not brought to the seaman's notice.....1092

Seamen on a fishing voyage, who were discharged on an island in the Pacific, and then entered for a new voyage, held not bound by the shipping articles, but entitled to a quantum meruit.....1270

The shipping articles must declare explicitly the ports at which the voyage is to begin and end..... 384

Where the voyage is "from Philadelphia to South America, or any other port or ports, backwards and forwards, when and where required, and back to Philadelphia," the master may proceed from South America to Europe..... 384

A ship is bound by her master's contract for any voyage for which he has authority to engage her 204

Foreign seamen unwittingly shipping for a voyage wherein the navigation acts forbid their employment, may recover in rem damages resulting from nonperformance..... 204

Whether seamen are bound to remain after the end of a voyage to assist in discharging depends on the custom of the port. 946

That the cargo is owned by the freighter does not make the mere arrival in port a delivery, within the meaning of the shipping articles. Such ownership is no ground of distinction..... 860

Under the British law, where an injured seaman is left behind in a foreign port, his wages stop, but the ship is liable for his cure and care..... 448

Where a sick seaman, left behind at a foreign port, is picked up by the vessel on the same voyage, it will be presumed that the old rate of wages is to be paid him, where there is no express agreement..... 448

The first engineer, who employs the second engineer, may also discharge him, even against the consent of the master..... 450

Conduct of master or mate in respect to seamen.

The imprisonment of a seaman in a foreign jail at the instance of the master is only justified by extreme necessity..... 384

A master who causes a seaman to be imprisoned on shore must, before leaving port, ascertain if he is willing to return to duty.. 725

Wages—Right to.

The right of a seaman to wages is not founded in the articles, but in the service.. 499

The right in respect to wages depends upon the law of the flag, without regard to the nationality of the seamen themselves.. 448

Where the ship is captured by a belligerent and condemned, the seamen lose their wages, though the owner receives full insurance on the freight..... 348

Where the owner of a wrecked vessel takes the business of salvage out of the hands of the seamen, and furnishes them no subsistence, they may recover wages from the remnants 1070

Seamen saving remnants of their wrecked vessel to the amount of their wages are entitled to wages as such, though no freight be earned 1070

A seaman left in a foreign port because the master desired to be rid of him held entitled to wages to the end of the voyage, and expenses 960

A seaman rightfully imprisoned on shore for misconduct, but wrongfully left behind, may claim wages for the time he was imprisoned 725

Where the voyage is broken up without cause, and without the seaman's consent, he may recover wages for the whole voyage stipulated, deducting his earnings meanwhile 725

Seamen on a vessel forfeited as fitted out for the slave trade are entitled to wages if ignorant of the criminal purpose of the voyage 949

The fact that a coasting vessel has no license does not affect the right to wages if the seamen are ignorant thereof..... 945

The wages of a mariner who ships during war should not be lessened because a peace takes place while the vessel is at her outward port 7

—— Remedies for recovery.

Seamen on a small licensed coasting vessel employed in taking paving stones from Marshfield and Scituate Beaches to Boston have a lien for their wages..... 945

There is no rule prescribing the time for proceedings to enforce the lien for wages.. 936

Forbearance by seamen to libel their vessel at a port where they are discharged before the end of the voyage is not a waiver of their lien as against a subsequent bona fide purchaser 936

A sheriff's sale of a steamboat will not discharge the lien for seaman's wages of the owner's minor son, who for two years had been permitted to receive his own wages, and control his own actions..... 111

Page

A libel for wages brought before the wages are due must be dismissed, if duly excepted to on that ground, though the right is perfected in the meantime..... 860

Ordinarily, 15 days is a reasonable time for unloading, and a suit for wages brought on the fourteenth day must be dismissed as premature 860

Wages are due immediately on voluntary discharge, and if not paid within 10 days thereafter, the seamen may sue in rem..... 946

A receipt by a seaman in full of all demands is no bar to a claim for which he has not received compensation 1000

The master and owners of a whaling ship are not liable to be sued jointly for a seaman's lay 1092

In a libel in rem for wages, the defense of stale claim will not avail a purchaser who retains part of the purchase money, and defends in the interest of the vendor.....1329

A plea of misconduct in defense of a suit for wages must allege the facts with due certainty of time, place, and other circumstances; otherwise it will be rejected.... 337

A mere offer of the master to pay wages, to avoid a libel, is not an admission that the wages are due..... 860

Ship's articles, with the signature of the sailor, are prima facie evidence of his having been on board the vessel..... 555

The log-book entry is legal evidence of the time of the seaman's coming on board and leaving the vessel. (Act 1790.)..... 555 — Deductions: Extinguishment, etc.

Damages can be recovered for misconduct only when they are the direct and immediate results of the seaman's acts or omissions 337

The crew were ordered to contribute for a loss by embezzlement where strangers assisted in loading the cargo, but the fault could not be fixed..... 749

The vessel owner cannot retain wages as a contribution for injuries from a collision, alleged to have been caused by their negligence, until after the legal liability is established 750

The costs and charges of an imprisonment for violation of the laws of the country may be deducted from the seaman's wages..... 384

The master cannot deduct from the wages of seamen of a wrecked British vessel expenses of their board and transportation home 340

Drunkenness of the mate in ports, when not on board, is no bar to wages, unless his duties were interfered with.....1111

Allowance by the master of full wages, and giving a draft therefor, imports that any grounds of complaint for intoxication were forgiven 1111

Rebellious conduct will not justify total forfeiture when resulting from sudden irritation aroused by inconsiderate treatment.. 914

Misconduct will not be punished by an absolute forfeiture of wages and effects on board unless continued or repeated or of a highly aggravated character..... 725

Receiving a seaman on board after the time appointed does not remit the penalty for his neglect to render himself..... 555

Gross deviation from the chartered voyage will not justify seamen in taking possession at sea..... 949

Reasonable ground of suspicion that the vessel is about to engage in the slave trade does not justify the seamen in taking possession of her at sea or in a foreign port and bringing her home; and by so doing they forfeit all wages..... 949

Willful derangement of the engine by an engineer, in order to compel the boat to stop at a certain port, at which he desired to leave, will work a forfeiture of wages..... 450

Where a seaman employed by the month leaves before his month is up, his entire unpaid wages are forfeited..... 450

There can be no desertion after the voyage is ended by mooring the vessel in her last port of discharge, though the seamen are bound by the shipping articles to remain till delivery of the cargo..... 860

The prescribed entry in the log book is indispensable to subject a seaman to the forfeiture of his wages for desertion. (Act July 20, 1790.).....384, 555, 860

But such entry is not incontrovertible... 555

Seamen do not forfeit wages by a departure from the vessel before termination of the voyage, where it is involuntary or with reasonable cause, or with apparent assent of the master 384

Cruelty of the master will justify leaving the vessel only where it is apparent that the seaman could not remain without extreme danger to his personal safety..... 384

SEIZURE.

See, also, "Prize."

A certificate of probable cause cannot be granted where there has been neither claim nor trial, nor decree, nor anything to which an appeal could lie..... 535

Restitution and acceptance held a mutual release, barring a claim for damages for unlawful seizure 535

Reasonable ground for a seizure is a defense to a libel for damages..... 535

The court will entertain the question of damages, as well as costs, at the same time with the principal question of the legality of the arrest of the vessel..... 535

SHIPPING.

Public regulation.

A vessel built in Canada, and owned in the United States, is not a vessel of the United States, entitled to registry..... 997

Under the act of July 18, 1866, § 24, the forfeiture of a vessel for fraudulently obtaining a certificate of registry is absolute 968

A sale to a corporation organized and existing under the laws of a foreign country is a sale "to a subject or citizen of a foreign prince or state" (Act Dec. 31, 1792, § 16), regardless of the citizenship of the shareholders 726

A sale upon credit, and upon the condition that the purchaser shall not use the vessel until the purchase money is all paid, and that on default the seller may retake the vessel, is a sale within the registry laws. 726

The navigation of a vessel under an American register after her sale to a foreign subject is a violation of section 27 of the registry act..... 726

If documents by which registry of a vessel has been obtained are identified and come from the possession of the government, the signatures need not be proved.. 968

The provisions of section 2 of the passenger act of March 3, 1855, do not apply to steamships 596

An unlicensed engineer cannot recover wages for services on a steam vessel engaged in carrying passengers on the waters of the United States 726

Title to vessel.

Part owners of a vessel are not partners, and each may maintain a separate action against the ship's husband for his proportion of the freight; and this though he be one of the part owners..... 488

Minority owner held entitled to security for the return of the vessel, though he did not dissent from the voyage until the vessel was nearly ready for sea, where he had previously refused to share expenses of the outfit 711

A part owner of a vessel, dissenting from a voyage and receiving a stipulation from the other owners for the vessel's safe return, is not entitled to compensation for the use of his part of the vessel during the voyage 709

The master.

Where the master of a fishing vessel is to fit her out and cure the fish himself, giving the owner part of the catch, and paying all bills from the proceeds of the remainder before division with the crew, he is owner pro hac vice, and responsible for the "small generals".....1266

The vessel owners are liable for torts of the master when they involve a breach of the passenger's contract and are done while acting within the scope of his employment.. 141

Where, in a port of necessity, the master puts his vessel in charge of the charterer's agent for payment of disbursements, he is bound to produce his accounts when applying for money, according to the usage of the port.....1169

Where, in such case, funds were provided by the charterer's agent, but the master broke off negotiations, and employed some one else, held, that the charterer could recover the agreed commission.....1169

The master may sell a perishable cargo where the consignee refuses to receive it, and it cannot readily be stored in a place suitable to preserve it; and he need not wait the expiration of lay days..... 740

A master claiming the gratuitous privilege of taking his wife and child on the voyage must show a distinct understanding to that effect 837

An error of the master in regard to provisions, making it necessary to return to port for an additional supply, held not so gross as to take away his right to wages... 837

Liabilities of vessels or owners.

The ship is liable in rem upon the master's contract of affreightment, though it is let to him by charter-party, where the shipper is ignorant of that fact..... 11

A vessel illegally seized by an American consul in a foreign port, and sent home, is liable for wages of the crew and pilotage.. 740

Employés on vessels cannot recover for injuries caused by the mere negligence of the officers or other employés..... 561

A shipowner who provides a seaworthy vessel, properly equipped, and commanded by competent officers, has discharged his duty towards the subordinates, and cannot be held liable for mere neglect of officers..... 561

The share of a part owner in a vessel or the proceeds of a voyage is not under a lien in law to pay another part owner for his extra advances 353

The giving of credit to one part owner and the taking of his separate note, where the other owners settle with him on the basis thereof, bars recovery against them by the creditor 353

SLAVERY.

A devise to emancipated slaves by their former master is valid in Mississippi.....1096

The act of congress relating to the reclamation of fugitive slaves is valid..... 881

The writ de homine replegiando is applicable to the trial of the question of slavery 881

No process is usual or necessary for seizing a fugitive slave, to take him before a magistrate, under the act of congress of 1793 881

There is no right of trial by jury of the question of slavery when a fugitive is brought before a magistrate under the act of congress 881

In a suit for freedom, the court will not question jurors, as they are called up to be sworn, as to their prepossessions in favor of freedom 1106

Slaves carried by their owner from Mississippi to Ohio, with intent that they should become free, acquired freedom, and did not lose it by returning to Mississippi with their former master for temporary purposes 1096

There is no presumption from lapse of time in favor of persons who rely on the proviso in the Virginia law in relation to persons bringing their slaves into Virginia.*1106

Right to freedom of slaves brought into the District of Columbia 949

Evidence of an importation contrary to Act Md. 1796, c. 67..... 732

The proprietor of a stage who allows a slave to depart in his stage without consent of the owner is liable for damages for his running away 580

Color is prima facie evidence of slavery.. 580

Stage owners held liable for damages in suffering a slave to go off in their coach by means of a false certificate of freedom.... 586

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

A person who seeks performance of an award respecting realty must show a readiness to perform all the award on his part.. 326

A delay of two years in making payment held not to bar specific performance where the vendee had made valuable improvements without objection from the vendor, who sustained no damage which interest would not compensate.....1065

After long delay and laches, equity will not decree specific performance of an award respecting realty where there has been a material change of circumstance and injury to the other party 326

Where the property had decreased half in value, the court refused, after a delay of many years, to decree specific performance, but ordered a rescission of the contract and repayment of the amount paid..... 167

Bill for reconveyance of an estate upon an agreement and subsequent award dismissed under the circumstances, the bill being brought against purchasers after a considerable lapse of time, the original vendee having died insolvent..... 326

A bill for specific performance of an agreement to deliver a contract of insurance cannot be maintained after the lapse of 10 years..... 759

On a bill against the purchaser of the legal title a notice to defendant, relied on by plaintiff, must be averred and proved.. 326

STATUTES.

The publication of the second edition of the Revised Statutes under Act March 2,

Page

1877, did not affect any statute passed subsequently to December 1, 1873..... 289
An act whose subject is disposing of insolvent debtors' property may properly include a provision that the assignment in insolvency shall discharge prior attachments 1229
A prohibition of amendments by mere reference to the title of an act does not prevent repeals by implication.....1229

SUBROGATION.

The security given by the maker of a note to the indorser may, after both are insolvent and the surety's liability has become fixed, be recovered by the holder and applied in payment 1094

TAXATION.

See, also, "Internal Revenue."

A statute providing that the rate per cent. of the tax in each municipality shall be in proportion to the indebtedness of each is not in conflict with a constitutional provision that taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state 377
Act Ark. T. Oct. 26, 1825, in relation to the mode of collecting taxes, held inapplicable to nonresidents..... 144
Where fees were improperly received by a sheriff acting as a tax collector, held that penalties were recoverable 144
A collector must make a demand on the owner of land for taxes before judgment can be rendered against the land 1251
An auditor's tax deed is prima facie good, and is a title deducible of record, within the meaning of the Illinois statute of March 3, 1845, § 11 1146
In Illinois, an auditor's tax deed, coupled with seven years' possession and payment of taxes, gives good title.....1146
A tax sale and conveyance in pursuance thereof (in Virginia) vests the purchaser with the title of the person assessed with the taxes at the beginning of the tax year, notwithstanding irregularities in the proceedings, if they do not appear on the face thereof 343
The deed, when regular, is prima facie evidence that the proceedings were regular, and that the title passed..... 343
The deed need not recite that the land was assessed on the commissioner's book.. 343
A recital that the land was returned delinquent for the nonpayment of the taxes is sufficient as a recital of the assessment.. 343

Torts.

See "Admiralty"; "Collision."

TOWAGE.

See, also, "Collision"; "Salvage."

The master of the tug is bound to know the sailing qualities of a vessel which he has several times before towed into the harbor, and to know the condition of the harbor; and he is responsible for the manner in which he enters it..... 713
Tug held liable for damages to ship towed stern foremost from pier in East river, and drifting into pier on opposite shore, where the ship's hands failed to catch the line thrown from the tug..... 540

Page

Tug held not liable for collision of tow with dock 85

TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES.

Trade-marks are an entirety, and are incapable of exclusive use at different places by more than one independent proprietor.. 605
The right to a trade-mark is forfeited by its deceptive use to designate a spurious article 605
Voluntary relinquishment of the original mark for a new device forfeits the right to the old mark 605
Disregard of territorial limits allotted by license and misuse of the trade-mark forfeits the right 605
A resemblance sufficient only to deceive ordinary purchasers is sufficient to constitute infringement 605
An accounting for past profits will not be decreed where there has been laches in bringing suit, and long acquiescence in the adverse use of the mark by others..... 605

TRESPASS.

In trespass, any matter done by virtue of a warrant must be specially pleaded 892
In a suit for trespass to personal property, plaintiff must show what property was injured, and that defendant participated therein 190
In an action of trespass vi et armis, plaintiff cannot recover for any injury done to real property..... 190

TRIAL.

See, also, "Appeal"; "Continuance"; Evidence"; "Judgment"; "New Trial"; "Practice"; "Reference"; "Witness."

No paper can be read in evidence without leave of the court; and, if the court is equally divided as to its admissibility, it is rejected 1339

TROVER AND CONVERSION.

To establish a conversion, there must be proof of wrongful possession, or of exclusion of the owner's right, or of unauthorized and injurious use, or of wrongful detention after demand 510
A jury may, as part of the damages, give interest on the value of property converted.1125

TRUSTS.

See, also, "Charities"; "Executors and Administrators"; "Guardian and Ward"; "Wills."

A person acquiring the legal estate in property as the agent of another, or upon a trust and confidence that he will acquire it for the benefit of another, will be required to account therefor in equity.....*645
Such a trust is not within the statute of frauds, and it need not be manifested by a writing *645
An attorney employed to foreclose a mortgage, who purchases at the sale, will be held to be a trustee for the client, at his option, unless it satisfactorily appears that he was in no wise injured or prejudiced thereby *645
Lapse of time is no absolute bar to a suit for relief in the case of a constructive trust.*645

USE AND OCCUPATION.

Partial eviction does not bar an action for use and occupation..... 145

USURY.

See, also, "Banks and Banking."

A purchase of a bill in the market, like a commodity, at any price, is not usurious. But an unaccepted bill is not so purchased. 264

When paper is the basis of exchange, it must be shown as influencing the rate of exchange 264

A discount of a bill upon which exchange is charged, to take up a prior bill, is not usurious unless the agreement was made at the discount of the first bill..... 264

Where the rate of exchange charged is only colorable, it is usurious..... 264

In Ohio, usury avoids the contract only for the excess..... 264

Where a statute forbids a corporation taking over a certain amount of interest, all money taken over such amount must be credited to the debtor on the principal..... 757

The New York act of 1850 providing that no corporation shall interpose the defense of usury does not extend to suits against accommodation indorsers for corporations... 757

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

See, also, "Bankruptcy"; "Boundaries"; "Deed"; "Fraudulent Conveyances"; "Grant"; "Sale"; "Specific Performance."

The vendor of land contracted to be sold is a trustee for the purchaser..... 167

Where a contract for the sale of land is void, or cannot be enforced by reason of laches on the part of the vendee, the land will descend to the heirs of the vendor..... 167

The registry of a deed or paper not duly or legally recorded is not constructive notice 326

A creditor obtaining judgment against the vendor, after the latter has received the purchase money, but before he makes a deed, will be enjoined, at suit of the vendee, from levying on the land..... 349

A material false representation by the vendor or his agent vitiates the sale, though not known to be false when made.....1016

Where a sale is rescinded after several years, for fraud, each of the several equitable owners is liable to refund only the money he received, and not that received by the others, or paid to an agent since insolvent 1016

Fraud practiced by one of several owners, or by one having a bond for a deed from some of the owners, is ground for rescission of the whole sale, where the owners take the benefit of the price obtained by the fraud 1016

A sale will not be rescinded for mistake alone if the party had full opportunity to examine the land, and did examine it.....1016

That the purchaser examined the land will not prevent a rescission, if falsehood
