1. The plaintiffs effected insurance in New-York, on the Hope, from Gibraltar to New-York, to the amount of four thousand dollars, valuing her at that sum; and they afterwards effected insurance on her with the defendants, to the amount of four thousand dollars, valuing her at six thousand dollars, without notice to the defendants of the prior insurance. A partial loss occurred, and the plaintiffs claimed to charge a partial loss, upon the whole amount insured by the defendants in the second policy.

2. The defendants are liable for as much of the agreed value of the Hope, as is not covered by the prior insurance, being to the extent of two thousand dollars.

[Cited in Ryder v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 98 Mass. 192.]

3. As the plaintiffs claim only a partial loss, the defendants are not entitled to an abandonment.

4. It is not the incapacity of the assured to abandon, or his failure to do so, which can defeat his right to a recovery, unless he claims for a total loss.

5. It was not necessary to give notice of the first insurance to the defendants.

6. In case of a total loss, when two insurances have been made, the assured may abandon to the second underwriters, and take from them so much as the second policy covers.

This was a case stated for the opinion of the court. The plaintiffs [Murray and Mumford], on the 21st of October, 1803, effected insurance on the ship Hope, from Gottenburgh, to New-York, in the office of the New-York Insurance Company, to the amount of four thousand dollars, valuing her at that sum. On the 20th of December, in the same year, they effected insurance on the same ship and voyage, to the amount of four thousand dollars, in the office of the defendants, valuing her at six thousand dollars. But, at the time of effecting this last policy, the defendants had no notice of the insurance made at New-York. The real value of the ship, when she sailed from New-York, exceeded six thousand dollars. A partial loss, by one of the perils insured against, took place; and the question for the opinion of the court was, whether the defendants are liable, on the last mentioned policy, for the amount reported by the referees, as per report filed; or whether the said last mentioned policy is void, by reason of the prior insurance? The referees reported the sum of —— thousand dollars to be uncovered by the first policy. Both the policies contain the usual printed clause, "that if the assured shall have made any other insurance upon the premises aforesaid, prior in date to this policy, then the said company shall be answerable, only for so much as the amount of such prior insurance may be deficient towards fully covering the premises hereby insured; and the said company to return the premium upon so much of the sum by them insured, as they shall be by such prior insurance exonerated from."

Rawle and Lewis, for defendants, contended, that the first policy being valued, the one in question having been effected without notice of the first, is void; because, in case of loss, the insured had deprived himself of the power of ceding any part of the property saved, to the defendants; the first underwriters being entitled, upon abandonment, to the whole. They relied upon the case of Yard's Assignees v. Murgatroyd [4 Yeates, 161], in the supreme court of Pennsylvania; and the case of M'Kim v. Phoenix Ins. Co. [Case No. 8,862], in this court. Also, that the plaintiff was bound by the valuation of the first policy.

Hallowel and Hare, for plaintiffs, argued, that the first policy created no estoppel, as to the value of the property, except as between the parties to that policy. 1 Marsh. Ins. 200; Emerigon, 275; 1 Johns. 385. That the cases cited on the other side do not apply; because, in those, the question was not whether the plaintiff could recover any thing upon the second policy, but how much he was entitled to: that, although the plaintiffs might have defeated their right to recover in this action, if they had abandoned to the first underwriters, yet as they do not go for a total loss, and have not abandoned, the argument cannot affect them.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The parties to this suit have agreed, by the policy on which the action is founded, that the property insured was worth six thousand dollars; and the defendants bound themselves to the extent of four thousand dollars, the sum subscribed to cover so much of the agreed value, as had not been covered by any prior assurance. It turns out, that four thousand dollars of that value had been previously insured in New-York. As to that sum, therefore, the defendants are not liable; but they would have been liable to that amount, had the agreed value of the property been eight thousand dollars; because so much of the value was uncovered by any prior policy. But, as in the present case, only two thousand dollars of the value was uninsured when the last policy was effected, the defendants cannot be called upon for a sum exceeding that so left uncovered. This is the plain import of the contract between these parties; and why should not the defendants comply with it? The reasons assigned are, that the first policy being valued, the insured, in case of a total loss, must have abandoned the whole property saved, to the first underwriters, and were thereby incapacitated to cede any thing to the defendants; without doing which, they could not demand a total loss from the defendants; and that the omission to communicate to the defendants the existence of the first policy, is such a concealment as renders this policy void in its inception. In answer to these objections, it is sufficient to say, that the plaintiffs do not claim for a total loss; and in point of fact, if this were material, they have not abandoned to the New-York Company. Claiming only for a partial loss from these defendants, they are not entitled to an abandonment. It is not the incapacity or the failure to abandon, which can defeat the right of the insured to recover, unless he goes for a total loss. But if the law were otherwise, still the insured is not incapacitated to abandon to the second underwriter, until he has deprived himself of the power of doing so, by having previously abandoned to some other underwriter. It was correctly observed, by one of the plaintiffs' counsel, that he might, if he chose, and sometimes it might be his interest, abandon to the underwriters on the second policy, and take from them so much as such policy, from the terms of it, covered. It follows from these principles, that whether there was or was not a prior policy, was a circumstance of no consequence to the underwriters on the second, except as to the amount for which the latter, in case of loss, might be liable; and, therefore, notice of such prior policy to them, was unnecessary and idle. Besides, the very terms "in case the assured shall have made any prior assurance" imply, that whether he has made such or not, is a fact unknown to the underwriter on the second policy. The case of M'Kim v. Phoenix Ins. Co. [supra] is, so far as it resembles the present case, against the defendants. In that case, the first policy was underwritten by the Philadelphia Insurance Company, to the amount of twelve thousand dollars, and was clearly open. The Phoenix Company afterwards underwrote fifteen thousand dollars, on the return cargo of coffee, valuing the same at twenty-two cents per pound; and the question before the court was, whether the plaintiff could recover any thing upon the latter policy; and if any thing, how much? The court decided, that the first policy covered as much of the coffee, as twelve thousand dollars would absorb at prime cost, and charges, instead of the value fixed on that article in the second policy; which, of course, would leave to be covered by the second policy, as much less of the cargo, as the difference between the prime cost and charges, at twenty-two cents per pound, would amount to. For so much of the cargo, the Phoenix Company was held to be answerable. The court also decided, that the subsequent agreement of the Philadelphia Company to waive all their right to the property, which might be saved, could not change the nature of the contract entered into by the plaintiff with the Phoenix Company, because, at the moment the latter was made, no more of the cargo was insured than that which the first policy left uncovered, and was void, as to so much as was so covered. If so, the subsequent agreement with the Philadelphia Company was, in relation to the Phoenix Company, res inter alios acta, and could not affect the rights of the Phoenix Company. The notice spoken of, in that case, was not in relation to the existence of a prior policy, but the nature and extent of it. The case of Yard's Assignees v. Murgatroyd, is very imperfectly stated; but it appears, so far as we understand it, to resemble this as little as the one just noticed. The opinion of the court is, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the sum reported by the referees.

Case No. 9,962.

MURRAY et al. v. LAZARUS et al.

[1 Paine, 572.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1826.

SHIPPING — ADVANCES IN FOREIGN PORT — HYPOTHECATION—TAKING DRAFT—EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT.

1. The master may hypothecate vessel and freight, in a foreign port, for advances necessary for repairing and provisioning the vessel, if such advances cannot be procured on the credit of the owner.

2. Whether, by the maritime law, the contracts of the master, under such circumstances, for necessaries, create a lien without an express hypothecation? Quere.

3. But if they were admitted to have such effect, an express contract for payment would be a waiver of the implied lien. As where a vessel bound from New-Orleans to New-York, put into Wilmington in a damaged state, where the master, having no other means, obtained advances from the libellants for the necessary repairs, and gave them a draft for the amount on his consignees, which was afterwards protested for nonacceptance. On a libel against the freight, in the hands of the consignees, held, that the taking of the draft was a waiver of the lien if any existed.

[Cited in Harned v. Churchman, 4 La. Ann. 310.]

4. The draft was expressed to be "for value received in disbursements, and repairs of the brig Hannah," with directions to charge the same to her account, and signed by the drawer as master: Held, that the draft was not an hypothecation of the freight, as it wanted all the requisites, such as an express pledge, maritime interest, risk of the lender, of an instrument of hypothecation.

5. Nor has such draft the effect of an equitable assignment of the freight, as a draft on a specific fund.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was an appeal from a decree of the district court of the Southern district of New-York, establishing a lien on freight and general average, for necessary repairs and supplies for the vessel, furnished in a foreign port. The libel stated, that the brig Hannah, Thomas Hillyer, master, of Eastport, in Maine, owned by Jonathan Bartlett, of that place, sailed from New-Orleans for New-York, on the 4th of March, 1826, consigned to John B. Murray & Son, of New-York, having on board a cargo consigned to different merchants in New-York: That she was obliged, on account of damages occurring on her passage in her spars and rigging, to put into Wilmington, North Carolina, in distress: That the master or owners had no funds, nor correspondents at Wilmington, and the vessel requiring repairs and provisions for the voyage, the libellants [Lazarus & Whitmarsh], at the request of the master, expended on her, and to enable her to prosecute her voyage, 536 dollars 30 cents, whereby she was enabled to complete her voyage, and arrive at New-York. That the libellants, as a voucher for their expenditures, and as a mere mode of obtaining payment, took from the master a draft upon the said John B. Murray & Son, the consignees of the vessel, and agents of the owner, for payment to them, or their order, of the amount due them, which payment was expected and intended to be made out of the freight of the vessel, and the contributions for a general average on account of the said damages. That John B. Murray & Son, on the arrival of the vessel at New-York, exacted from the consignees of the cargo an obligation for the payment of their respective shares of the general average which they still held, and claimed or had received the payment of the freight. The libel also stated, that payment of the draft was refused on presentment; that the master was unable to pay the debt, and that neither he nor the owner could be arrested on process; that the vessel had been transferred to Israel Foot, who had not yet paid the whole price, and that all the parties had received notice of the libellants' claim. Process of attachment was prayed against the monies and credits belonging to the master or owner, in the hands of any of the parties.

The answer of John B. Murray & Son set forth the following facts as matters of defence:—That the libellants, while the vessel was at Wilmington, wrote to them, informing them that she required repairs, and desiring to know if the master's bill on them for 300 or 400 dollars, for advances to him for that object, would be accepted: That they replied, through their agent, that it would not be accepted; which reply, they believed, was duly received by the libellants, who, however, made the advances and permitted the brig to depart without waiting for it: That John B. Murray & Son had long done the business of the said owner, Bartlett, and that a balance of 17,000 dollars was now due them from him: That they had received nothing on account of the general average, and only 579 dollars 37 cents of the freight, of which they had paid 122 dollars 38 cents for expenses of the vessel before notice of the libellants' claim, and 337 dollars 32 cents to the master before notice of the attachment, and that a balance of 108 dollars 19 cents, after deducting their commissions, remained in their hands. The balance of freight, in their hands, they insisted on retaining for their general balance against Bartlett.

The bill of exchange drawn in favour of the libellants, as mentioned in the libel, was as follows:—"Wilmington, 25th April, 1826. Exch. $531.55 cts. Five days after sight of this first of exchange, (second unpaid,) pay to the order of Lazarus & Whitmarsh, five hundred and thirty-one dollars, fifty-five cents, for value received in disbursements and repairs of brig Hannah, and charge the same to her account. Your obedient, Thomas Hellyer, master of brig Hannah. Messrs. John B. Murray & Son, New-York." The consignees of the cargo not having appeared, their default was entered.

The court decreed that the libellants were entitled to a specific lien on the contributions for general average; and to such lien on the freight received by John B. Murray & Son, for the amount of said bill of exchange; and that the general averages, and the freight after deducting therefrom 122 dollars 38 cents, being expenses paid at New-York, incurred after the arrival of the vessel, and as payment before notice of the libellants' claim, should be paid into court to satisfy the demand of the libellants. From this decree John B. Murray & Son appealed. The consignees of the cargo submitted, and paid the general average into court.

R. Sedgwick, for appellants, insisted: (1) That Wilmington was not a foreign port within the rule of law, as to maritime liens. Abb. Shipp. 136, pt. 2, c. 2, passim. (2) That by taking the bill, the lien, if any had existed, was lost. Yeates v. Groves, 1 Ves. Jr. 280; Roe v. Dawson, 1 Ves. Sr. 331; M'Menomy v. Ferrers, 3 Johns. 71; Stevens v. The Sandwich [Case No. 13,409]; Mandeville v. Welsh, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 277. (3) That by the payment over before the attachment was laid, the defendants were protected; and that they had a right to retain the balance on their general account with the owner.

D. Lord, for respondents, contended: (1) That by the maritime law, the claim of the libellants formed a lien on the vessel and her freight. The Jerusalem [Case No. 7,294]; Watkinson v. Bernadiston, 2 P. Wms. 367; Hussey v. Christie, 13 Ves. 599; Ex parte Shank, 1 Atk. 234; The Jacob, 4 C. Rob. Adm. (Am. Ed.) 245. (2) That the bill in question was an instrument, on its face importing payment to be made out of the earnings of the vessel, and was therefore to be considered either an assignment or hypothecation of the freight. Ex parte Halkett, 3 Ves. & B. 135; Peyton v. Hallett, 1 Caines, 364; The Rebecca, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 102, 105.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. The only inquiry arising upon the appeal in this case, is, whether the respondents have a specific lien upon the freight monies, (received by the appellants.) for the advances made by them for the repairs of the brig Hannah, at Wilmington in North Carolina. That these expenses were properly and necessarily incurred, is not denied; nor can the authority of the master, to hypothecate the freight as well as the vessel for the payment of such expenses, be questioned. He is the agent of the owners, and they are bound by all lawful contracts made by him. It is indispensable that he should have a right to contract for all necessary repairs and supplies for the vessel on the voyage, and may, therefore, indirectly bind the owners to the value of the vessel and freight. It is therefore well settled, that he may for like purposes, expressly pledge and hypothecate the vessel and freight, and thereby create a direct lien upon the same for the security of the creditor. [The Aurora] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 102; Abb. 134. But this being a high and important trust reposed in the master, the authority is to be exercised cautiously, and he is not at liberty to subject the ship or freight to this expensive and disadvantageous lien, if such repairs and supplies can be procured upon the credit of the owner independent of such hypothecation.

The case is not open for the inquiry, whether, by the general maritime law, every contract made by the master for repairs and supplies for his ship whilst on a foreign voyage, does not import an hypothecation. When an express contract has been entered into for the payment of such expenses, that must be resorted to, and will be considered a waiver of such implied lien if any existed. And a party who has waived his right in this respect cannot be permitted, at a subsequent time, and under a change of circumstances to reinstate himself in his former condition to the injury of others.

In this case there was a special agreement between the master and the respondents for the payment of their advances. They took from him a bill of exchange, drawn upon the appellants, for the amount of their advances and commissions. If this is to be considered a regular and ordinary bill of exchange, it was a substitution for any lien that might have existed, and must be considered a relinquishment thereof.

But it is contended, that from the language of the bill, taken in connexion with the condition of the parties, it must be considered a lien on the freight in the hands of the appellants. If such is to be the effect and operation of this bill, it must be either as an hypothecation of the freight, or as a draft upon a specific fund amounting to an assignment of such fund.

The bill is drawn by Thomas Hillyer, as master of the brig Hannah, on the appellants, payable to the order of Lawrence & Whitmarsh, five days after sight, for 531 dollars 55 cents, for value received in disbursements and repairs of the brig Hannah, with directions to charge the same to her account. It is these latter words that are said to give to this bill the operation of an hypothecation. In all other respects it is in the usual form of bills of exchange drawn in sets.

I cannot think that the mere circumstance, of the nature of the consideration's being expressed in the bill, with directions to charge it to the account of the brig, should entirely change the character of the instrument. This was a very natural and proper course for the master, especially when drawing upon the consignees of the brig, that they might understand for what the bill was drawn, and that it was not a private transaction of the master.

It is laid down by Abbot in his Treatise on Shipping (page 143) that there is no settled form for the contract of hypothecation, "but that, whatever be the form, the occasion of borrowing, the sum, the premium, the ship, the voyage, the risk to be borne by the lender, and the subjection of the ship itself as security for the payment, all usually are, and properly ought to be expressed." The bill in this case falls very far short of containing some of the most essential requisites; it does not in terms or by implication pledge the freight for the payment; the freight is not even named in the bill. There is no premium mentioned, nor any thing either in the bill or any of the proceedings showing that maritime interest was allowed. And indeed the contrary is shown by the proofs; for the account annexed to the libel contains the items which made up the amount of the bill, in which the usual commissions alone are charged upon the advances. But what is of still more importance, there is nothing showing what, or that any risk was to be borne by the respondents. The owners of the vessel are still liable for these advances.

The libel does not even contain any allegation of an agreement in any manner, that the freight should be pledged for the payment of the advances; it only alleges, that the bill was taken as a voucher for the expenditures, and a mere mode of obtaining payment thereof; which payment was expected and intended to be made out of the freight, &c. This is no allegation of an agreement between the master and the respondents, that it should be so paid; it is nothing more than the mere expectation and intention of the respondents.

And there is no proof, giving the least colour to an inference, that there was any understanding between the parties that the freight should be pledged for payment of the bill. And the conduct of the respondents shows, that they did not so understand the transaction; for, on the 14th of April, they wrote to the appellants, that the vessel had put into Wilmington in distress, and that the master wanted advances for repairs, and proposed drawing in their favour on the appellants for the amount that would be required, and requesting to know whether such bill would be honoured. If it had been understood that the freight was to be pledged for these advances, no such letter would have been written. The master having the right to hypothecate the freight, there could have been no necessity for writing at all to the appellants; but if any communication was made, it would have been to inform them of the hypothecation, if such had been the fact, and not an inquiry whether they would honour the master's draft. But before the answer of the appellants was received, the repairs were completed, and the brig had sailed, the master giving to the respondents the draft in question, dated the 25th of April. This draft was endorsed and sent on here, and dealt with as an ordinary bill of exchange, by presenting it for acceptance and payment, and on refusal, having it regularly protested. No part of the transaction will, therefore, warrant the conclusion, that any express hypothecation was agreed upon or intended by the parties.

Nor is there any more foundation for considering this bill of exchange as a draft on the freight as a specific fund, and amounting to an equitable assignment thereof. No fund whatever is mentioned or referred to in the draft. And the direction to charge the amount of the bill to account of the brig, cannot certainly have the operation of an assignment of the freight.

In whatever light, therefore, this case is considered, it appears to me that there is no specific lien on the freight for the advances for repairs. But that the respondents took the draft on the appellants as an ordinary bill of exchange, in payment for their advances; and whatever remedy they may have against other parties for the payment thereof, the appellants cannot be made responsible.

The decree of the district court, therefore, as to them, must be reversed with costs.

WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—ACTION FOR—RATIFICATION OF ACTS OF ATTORNEY—BAR TO ACTION.

1. An attaching creditor, by giving a bond of indemnity to the sheriff, and ordering him to sell the attached property, thereby ratifies the act of his attorney in directing such attachment, and becomes liable as a trespasser to the owner of the property so attached, if the same is not the property of the debtor; and if such creditor is notified of a suit pending against the sheriff for such property, and appears and assumes the defence of the suit, the judgment rendered therein is conclusive in another suit against him for the same trespass.

This was an action of trespass, and the case came before court upon an agreed statement of facts.

Agreed Statement of Facts.

[3] [This is an action of trespass. The writ bears date on the first day of October, A. D. eighteen hundred and sixty. And the writ and declaration are made a part of the case. The plaintiff [Edward D. Murray] is a citizen of Beloit, in the state of Wisconsin, and the defendants are citizens of Boston, Massachusetts. The defendants in this suit, William R. Lovejoy & Co., on the sixteenth day of May, A. D. eighteen hundred and fifty-seven, in a suit wherein they were plaintiffs, and one O. H. Pratt was defendant, in the district court of Dubuque county, Iowa, made an attachment in Dubuque of certain personal property, as the property of said Pratt, for which the plaintiff in this suit now sues. M. M. Hayden was the sheriff who made the attachment. Chapline and Dillon were the attorneys of said William R. Lovejoy & Co., in that suit, and gave a bond, a copy of which is hereto annexed, and which the defendants ratified. The said William R. Lovejoy & Co. recovered judgment against said Pratt, in said suit, and the property attached was sold by said Hayden upon said William R. Lovejoy & Co.'s process, by the direction of their attorneys. The plaintiff in this suit claiming said property, on the thirtieth day of May, in the year eighteen hundred and fifty-seven, sued said Hayden in the district court for said county of Dubuque for the same trespass in so attaching said property that he now sues these defendants for, and recovered, on a verdict of the jury, judgment against said Hayden in that action, on the twentieth day of October, A. D. eighteen hundred and fifty-nine, for six thousand two hundred and thirty-three dollars and three cents damages, and costs of suit, taxed at seventy-seven dollars and fifty-five cents, which judgment has never been reversed, and is still in full force. And the said Hayden satisfied said judgment in part, to wit, for the sum of $830 out of the proceeds of the attached property before the bringing of this suit against the defendants. Either party may refer to a certified copy of said judgment against said Hayden as a part of this case. The said Hayden notified said William R. Lovejoy & Co.'s said attorneys, Chapline and Dillon, to defend said suit so brought against said Hayden, and said William R. Lovejoy & Co. employed and paid said Chapline and Dillon to defend the same, and they did defend it, and had the exclusive control of the defence of said suit, being assisted therein by Benjamin M. Samuels, Esq., who was employed by William R. Lovejoy & Co., by their said attorneys, Chapline and Dillon, and who was paid by William R. Lovejoy & Co., and said Hayden paid him also $100 out of the proceeds of the attached property. On the twenty-eighth day of April, A. D. 1860, said William R. Lovejoy & Co. paid to said Hayden $1,000, and said Hayden delivered up said bond to them, and it is now in their possession, the plaintiff not admitting that said bond was rightly delivered up. Either party may refer to the printed laws of Iowa. If the court are of the opinion that the plaintiff cannot maintain this action against the defendants by reason of having recovered judgment against the sheriff, Hayden, and by reason of having received part satisfaction of him, judgment is to be entered for the defendants, otherwise the case is to stand for trial before the jury, unless the court shall be of opinion that the defendants are estopped upon the foregoing facts, by the judgment in said suit against the said Hayden, from making further defence in this action, in which case the court are to enter such judgment as shall be proper. Either party may prosecute a writ of error to the supreme court of the United States.

[Hutchins and Wheeler, Defendants' Attorneys.

[Know all men by these presents, that we the undersigned, William R. Lovejoy & Co., of New York, C. J. Cummings, and B. W. Balch, of the city and county of Dubuque, Iowa, are held, and firmly bound unto M. M. Hayden, sheriff of the county of Dubuque, state of Iowa, in the penal sum of nine thousand dollars, well and truly to be paid.

[Dated this 16th day of May, A. D. 1857.

[The condition of this obligation is such, that whereas the said Hayden, as sheriff of Dubuque county aforesaid, has attached and taken possession of certain dry goods and merchandise more particularly described in an inventory hereto annexed, and marked "Exhibit A," at the request of William R. Lovejoy & Co., under and by virtue of a writ of attachment issued out of the office of the clerk of the district court of Dubuque county, aforesaid, in the cause of the said William R. Lovejoy & Co. v. O. H. Pratt, now pending in said court. Now, therefore, if the above bound William R. Lovejoy & Co. shall and will pay all damages which the said Hayden may sustain, or which may be recovered against him by reason of his attaching said property as aforesaid, and shall in all respects save the said Hayden harmless in the premises, then this obligation to be void, otherwise in full force and effect in law.

Brooks & Bell, for plaintiff.

Torts are joint as well as several, and a party can maintain an action against all the tort feasors or against each one separately. Baker v. Lovett, 6 Mass. 80; Smith v. Rines [Case No. 13,100]. If this be true, all the legal consequences must follow, and the injured party may have the right to pursue each tort feasor to judgment and execution.

A judgment against one tort feasor is no bar to a suit against another, unless full satisfaction of the judgment has been obtained. Morgan v. Chester, 4 Conn. 387; Hyde v. Noble, 13 N. H. 501; Hepburn v. Sewell, 5 Har. & J. 211; Calkins v. Allerton, 3 Barb. 173; Curtis v. Groat, 6 Johns. 168; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 533; 2 Kent, Comm. 388, 389.

All the case finds is, that judgment was obtained by the plaintiff against the attaching officer, but no execution issued, and the officer paid a small sum on the judgment. Simonds v. Center, 6 Mass. 18; Ward v. Johnson, 13 Mass. 150; Drake v. Mitchell, 3 East, 258.

A verdict and judgment against the attaching officer are conclusive upon the defendants; the sheriff was their agent. He notified them to defend the suit against them; they were the real parties in interest. Privies as well as parties are concluded by a judgment. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 523; Smith v. Kernochen, 7 How. Henry C. Hutchins, for defendants.

The recovery of judgment by the plaintiff in Iowa against the officer who served defendants' process, for the same trespass for which he now sues the defendants, bars the plaintiff from maintaining this action against the defendants. White v. Philbrick, 5 Me. 147; Campbell v. Phelps, 1 Pick. 62; Alexander v. Taylor, 4 Denio, 302; Fox v. Northern Liberties, 3 Watts & S. 103; Davis v. Scott, 1 Blackf. 169; Allen v. Wheatley, 3 Blackf. 332; U. S. v. Cushman [Case No. 14,908]; Trafton v. U. S. [Id. 14,135]; 2 Kent, Comm. 389; Ward v. Johnson, 13 Mass. 148; 1 Greenl. Ev. (3d Ed.) § 533, note 3; Add. Torts, 750, 753; 2 Hil. Torts, 329, 330; Buckland v. Johnson, 15 C. B. 161; King v. Hoare, 13 Mees. & W. 504, 506; Lechmere v. Fletcher, 1 Cromp. & M. 623; Bird v. Randall, 3 Burrows, 1345.

In White v. Philbrick, it was held that recovery of judgment and issue of execution would bar a second suit.

But if the court shall be of opinion that a party may sue and recover separate judgments against co-trespassers, then we say that the recovery of judgment against the officer and the receipt of partial satisfaction of that judgment by the plaintiff, will operate as a bar to this suit. Thomas v. Rumsey, 6 Johns. 26; Livingston v. Bishop, 1 Johns. 290; Page v. Freeman, 19 Mo. 421; Knott v. Cunningham, 2 Sneed, 204; Fox v. Northern Liberties, 3 Watts & S. 103.

To accept partial satisfaction of one judgment is an election, and after that he is not at liberty to commence a new suit for the original trespass. The original trespass does not remain as it was, it has been partially satisfied. The original state of things has been changed, and by the act of the plaintiff. If the party may take a small part, why not take the whole?

How can the court proceed now to try the original trespass when it has been partially settled for? How would the court proceed at the trial? What becomes of the $800 payment? Must it not be credited in some way, and if so, how? The plaintiff is seeking to recover full damages for a wrong partially redeemed, and if permitted will lead to double satisfaction. Fox v. Northern Liberties, 3 Watts & S. 103.

The fact that payment was made by the sheriff from the proceeds of the goods sold can make no difference as to its effect. It was received as a payment and must operate as a payment. The money used had no ear-mark, and the payment cannot be recalled, and the money was not paid with the assent or knowledge of the defendant.

The defendants are not estopped to defend this suit because the plaintiff recovered judgment against the officer, or because the defendants took part in the defence. If the officer had sued defendants upon their bond of indemnity against that suit, and upon notice or otherwise the defendants had defended the suit, then, perhaps, the defendants, as between them and the officer, would have been concluded by the judgment. But that is not the question here. The question is whether one trespasser is concluded from defending a suit against himself because a judgment has been recovered against a co-trespasser.

The defendants were neither parties nor privies to the plaintiff's judgment against the sheriff. Sprague v. Waite, 19 Pick. 455; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 535; Kinnersley v. Orpe, 2 Doug. 517; Alexander v. Taylor, 4 Denio, 302.

[CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. This is an action of trespass, and the case comes before the court upon an agreed statement of facts. Referring to the agreed statement, it will be seen that the present defendants, on the sixteenth day of May, 1857, in a certain suit, wherein they were plaintiffs, and one O. H. Pratt was defendant, attached certain personal property as the property of the defendant in that suit. According to the agreed statement, the suit was commenced in the district court for the county of Dubuque, in the state of Iowa, and the writ of attachment was served, and the attachment made by the sheriff of that county; but the case shows, that in serving the writ, and in making the attachment, he acted by the directions of the attorneys of the plaintiffs in the suit, and that they, the attorneys, gave him a bond of indemnity, conditioned that the plaintiffs should pay all damages he might sustain by reason of his making the attachment, and stipulating to save him harmless in the premises, and that the plaintiffs ratified their doing in giving the bond. Agreed statements also show, that the plaintiffs in that suit recovered judgment, and that the property so attached was sold under the process of the plaintiffs, and by the directions of their attorneys. Property so attached and sold, was claimed by the plaintiff in this suit, and he, on the thirtieth day of May, 1857, brought an action of trespass against the sheriff, who had thus attached and sold the property. Due notice was given by the sheriff to the attorneys who brought the attachment suit and gave the directions and executed the bond of indemnity, to appear, and defend the trespass suit, and the present defendants employed counsel and defended the suit. Trial was had, and on the twentieth day of October, 1859, judgment was rendered against the sheriff for the sum of six thousand two hundred and thirty-three dollars and three cents damages, and costs of suit, taxed at seventy-seven dollars and fifty-five cents. No execution ever issued upon the judgment, but the case shows that the sheriff satisfied the judgment against him, in part, to wit, for the sum of eight hundred and thirty dollars, out of the proceeds of the attached property. Present defendants employed the counsel to defend that suit, and had the exclusive control of the defence; and the case shows that they had paid all of the counsel fees, except one hundred dollars, which was paid by the sheriff out of the proceeds of the attached property, and it should be remarked, that both of the payments made by the sheriff out of the proceeds of the attached property, were made prior to the commencement of this suit. Mention should also be made of the fact, that, on the twentieth day of April, 1860, the present defendants paid the sheriff one thousand dollars, and that he on the same day surrendered the bond of indemnity to their attorneys; but it should be remarked, in the same connection, that the admission to that effect is accompanied by a denial on the part of the plaintiff in this suit, that the surrender so made was rightful, and also that the bond is now in the possession of the attorneys to whom it was delivered. Writ is dated the first day of October, 1860; and the agreement is, that if the court should be of opinion that the suit cannot be maintained against the defendant, by reason of the former judgment against the sheriff, and by reason of having received part satisfaction of him, then judgment is to be entered for the defendants; otherwise the case is to stand for trial, unless the court shall be of opinion that the defendants, upon the foregoing facts, are estopped from making further defence in this action, in which event the court is to enter such judgment as shall be proper.] [4]

Practical questions, like those presented in this record, ought not now to be the subject of dispute or doubt, but it must be admitted, that in respect to most or all of them, it would not be difficult to present authorities of an entirely contradictory character. Certain general principles, however, which are applicable to the case may be regarded as settled; and among the number is the rule, that the attachment and sale of the property of a third person, under the circumstances disclosed in the agreed statement, is tortious, as against the person whose property is so taken and converted, and renders the sheriff liable to the plaintiff therefor, as a wrongdoer.

Doubt cannot be entertained upon the subject, and it is equally clear that the present defendants rendered themselves also liable to the plaintiff as wrongdoers, by subsequently ratifying the directions given by their attorneys, and by approving what they had done, in giving the bond of indemnity. Indemnification itself must be regarded as a ratification of the attachment, and as the cause of the subsequent sale; and the well-settled rule is, that all persons who direct, or request another to commit a trespass, are liable as co-trespassers, if their directions or request are obeyed and followed. Herring v. Hoppock, 15 N. Y. 409; Castle v. Bullard, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 185. Where the attachment is made by the directions of the plaintiff, he is as much liable as the sheriff making it; and after conversion, the injured party may sue both or each one separately, as in other cases of joint and several liability. More than half a century ago, Parsons, C. J., held, in Baker v. Lovett, 6 Mass. 80, that where a trespass had been committed by several persons jointly, the party injured might sue any or all the trespassers, but he could have but one satisfaction for the same injury. Nothing is more clear, said Judge Story, in Smith v. Rines [Case No. 13,100], than the right of the plaintiff to bring an action of trespass, or trespass on the case, against all the wrongdoers, or against any one or more of them at his election. Undoubtedly, the injured party may proceed against all the wrongdoers, jointly, or he may sue them all or any one of them separately; but if he sues them all jointly, and has judgment, he cannot afterwards sue any one of them separately; or if he sues one separately, and has judgment, he cannot afterwards sue them all in a joint action, because the prior judgment against one is, in contemplation of law, an election on his part to pursue his several remedy; but it is no bar to a suit for the same trespass against any one or more of the other co-trespassers. Cases may be found, and have been cited at the bar, which assert a different rule, and which decide, that, where separate actions are commenced against several tort feasors for the same act of trespass, the pendency of the first suit may be pleaded in abatement of all the rest; but the doctrine, as was well said by Prentiss, J., in Sanderson v. Caldwell, 2 Aikens, 201, is opposed to the principle, which runs through all the authorities, that a separate trespass attaches to each of the parties individually, and which asserts that the plaintiff may sue all or any of them, or bring separate suits against each, at his election. Heydon's Case, 11 Coke, 5; Mitchell v. Tarbutt, 5 Term R. 649; Thomas v. Rumsey, 6 Johns. 30; Livingston v. Bishop, 1 Johns. 290; Brooke, Abr. "Judgment," Pl. 98; Cocke v. Jennor, Hob. 66; Corbet v. Barnes, W. Jones. 377; Bird v. Randall, 3 Burrows, 1345. Much discussion, says Mr. Greenleaf, has taken place as to the effect of a former recovery, in cases where different actions of tort have successively been brought in regard to the same chattel; as, for example, where an action of trover is brought after a judgment in trespass. Great diversity of opinion, he says, has existed, whether a plaintiff, after having recovered judgment in trespass without satisfaction, is thereby barred from subsequently maintaining trover, against another person for the same goods. Decided cases, asserting the negative, assume that the recovery of the judgment, in trespass, for the full value, has the effect to vest the title to the property in the defendant in that suit; and consequently, that the plaintiff cannot recover of another for that which he himself has ceased to own. Broome v. Wooton, Yel. 67. Other cases decide that the rule of transit in rem judicatam, extends no further than to bar another action for the same cause, against the same party. Of this latter class, the case of Drake v. Mitchell, 3 East, 258, may be regarded as the most important; and Mr. Greenleaf, after referring to it, states that the weight of authority seems in favor of the latter opinion, and the same views are expressed in numerous cases decided by different courts in the United States. Lord Ellenborough held, in the case last named, that a judgment recovered in any form of action, was still but a security for the original cause of action, until it was made productive in satisfaction to the party; and therefore, until then, that it could not operate to change any other collateral, concurrent remedy which the party might have. Attempt was made by a majority of the court in Campbell v. Phelps, 1 Pick. 62, to maintain that there was a distinction between cases of trespass or trover for goods, and trespass for a personal wrong or injury done to property; but Parker, C. J., who gave the opinion, was compelled to admit, that according to the modern decisions, nothing short of satisfaction of a judgment against one trespasser, for any tortious act, would bar an action against his associates; and Wilde, J., utterly denied that there was any such distinction, and held that a recovery against one person, without satisfaction, was no bar to an action against another, for the same cause, and that there was no difference in this respect between joint contracts and joint torts. Adverting to the maxim solutio pretii emptionis loco habetur, Chancellor Kent says (2 Comm., 10th Ed., 388), that "the books either do not agree, or do not speak with precision on the point, whether the transfer takes place, in contemplation of law upon the judgment merely, or whether the amount of the judgment must be first actually paid or recovered by execution." Three theories, it will be seen, are stated by that author. First, that the mere recovery of judgment transfers the title, and he refers to Broome v. Wooton, Yel. 67, as an example of the cases where that doctrine is held. Secondly, that the recovery of judgment merely, does not have that effect; but if execution follow, the two things combined transfer the property. The example given, is that of a case in Jenkins; but the language of the opinion is, that "by the recovery and execution done thereon," the property of the chattel is vested in the trespasser. Jenk. Cent. 189. Language to the same effect is employed in Shep. Touch. tit. "Gift," where it is said, that if one recovers damages of a trespasser for taking his goods, the law gives the trespasser the property of the goods because he has paid for them; but he has not paid for them, unless something has been done besides the issuing of the execution, which is only an incident of the judgment, an act of the clerk. Two cases, however, are cited, which support that view of the law, but neither of them seems to rest upon any substantial basis. Curtis v. Groat, 6 Johns. 168; White v. Philbrick, 5 Me. 147. Thirdly, the reference is to the rule of the civil law, that when the wrongful possessor or movable property, who is not in a condition to restore it, has been condemned in damages, and has paid the same to the original proprietor, he becomes possessed of the title; and the learned author refers to Drake v. Mitchell, 3 East, 251, as an example of the decisions of the common-law courts, where that view of the law is maintained. Commenting upon that case, he concludes by saying, this is the more reasonable, if not the most authoritative conclusion on the question. Some diversity of judicial decision still exists, even in this country; but the great weight of authority in the United States, is on the side of the theory, that nothing short of satisfaction transfers the title, and in that view of the question I entirely concur. Morgan v. Chester, 4 Conn. 387; Hyde v. Noble, 13 N. H. 501; Sharp v. Gray, 5 B. Mon. 4; Hepburn v. Sewell, 5 Har. & J. 212; Barb. v. Fish [8 Blackf. (Fed.) 481]; Calkins v. Allerton, 3 Barb. 173; Jones v. McNeil, 2 Bailey, 474; Sheehy v. Mandeville, 6 Cran. [10 U. S.] 253; Cooper v. Shepherd, 3 C. B. 266; Knott v. Cunningham, 2 Sneed, 204. Recovery of judgment merely, therefore, against one of the several tort feasors, is no bar to a suit against another for the same trespass; and it makes no difference whether the plaintiff did or did not take out execution on the first judgment, unless it also be shown that he received satisfaction. Where no satisfaction has been received, the law is clear, to the effect as stated; but the defendants contend, in the second place, that the recovery of judgment against the sheriff, and the receipt of partial satisfaction of the judgment from him, operate as a complete bar, upon the ground that the receipt of partial satisfaction is an election, on the part of the plaintiff, to seek his redress against that party. But the reason assigned for the conclusion, if it be a good one, proves too much, because the plaintiff, when he brought the first suit, elected to seek redress against the party prosecuted, and that election, if such it be regarded, was confirmed by his act, in prosecuting the suit to judgment. Subsequent acts, however, such as the taking out execution or the receipt of part satisfaction, add nothing to the force of the argument that the institution of the suit, and the prosecution of the same to judgment, show that the plaintiff had elected to seek redress against that party. A recovery of judgment against one is an election, undoubtedly, to regard the remedy as several, and such an election is final and conclusive. But the judgment is no bar to another suit against another of the co-trespassers, as has already appeared, unless the judgment has been satisfied. Full satisfaction by one tort feasor, whether before or after judgment, is a good defence to a suit against any one of the others; but part satisfaction before suit would clearly be no defence, and it is not perceived that part satisfaction after judgment can have any other or greater effect. Suppose the part payment made by the judgment debtor had been made by him before he was sued; in that case it clearly would not have afforded him a full defence to the action, and if not, it is difficult to see how it can be any more effectual as a defence for a co-trespasser, because paid after judgment. Looking at the question as a question of principle, I am of the opinion that there is no middle ground on which a court of justice can safely stand in regard to it. When viewed in that light, it must either be held that the recovery of the judgment is a bar, or that it is no bar; and if the latter, as I hold, then nothing short of full satisfaction is an answer to a suit against another of the co-trespassers. Question is also made, whether the verdict and judgment against the sheriff are or are not conclusive upon the defendants. The affirmative of the proposition is assumed by the plaintiff, and the defendants maintain the negative. The facts of the case have already been stated, and need not be repeated, except to say that the case shows that the defendants were jointly liable for the same trespass; that they were duly notified of the pendency of the suit against the sheriff, and voluntarily appeared and conducted and controlled the defence.

Justice requires, says Mr. Greenleaf (1 Greenl. Ev. § 522), that every cause be once fairly and impartially tried; but the public tranquillity demands, that having been once so tried, all litigation of that question between the parties should be closed forever. No man ought, however, to be bound by proceedings to which he was a stranger; but the converse of the rule is also true, which is, that by proceedings to which he is not a stranger, he may well be held bound. Under the term parties, says the same commentator, the law includes all who are directly interested in the subject-matter, and have a right to make defence, adduce testimony, cross-examine witnesses, and control the proceedings, and appeal from the judgment. Courts of justice in general agree that a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive in a second suit between the same parties or privies on the same question, although the subject-matter may be different, and a fortiori it is so when the subject-matter is the same. Doty v. Brown, 4 Comst. [4 N. Y.] 71; Castle v. Noyes, 14 N. Y. 331. All parties are estopped by the judgment who had a right to appear, control the defence, and appeal from the judgment. The attachment in this case, in legal effect, had been made by the directions of these defendants, and they had given a bond of indemnity to the sheriff, and stipulated to save him harmless. They were, therefore, under a moral as well as legal obligation to defend the suit; and when they were duly notified to make the defence, and appeared and assumed the control of it, in pursuance of such notice, they had the right to adduce testimony and cross-examine the witnesses, and might have appealed from the judgment. Appeal, undoubtedly, must have been taken in the name of the sheriff; but as they had appeared in the case in pursuance of notice, and the control of the defence had been conceded to them, under the stipulation in the bond of indemnity, to save the sheriff harmless, it cannot be doubted that they might have appealed from the judgment. Castle v. Noyes, 14 N. Y. 332. Where the first action was against the agent, who had taken lumber by the direction of the principal, and the case showed that the principal appeared and defended the suit, the court of appeals, in the case last mentioned, held that the parties in the second suit, which was a suit against the principal, who gave the directions, were to be regarded as the same, and that the former judgment was conclusive. Parties appearing and defending under such circumstances are regarded as having the same rights substantially as the party in fact, and as having the same power and authority to use the judgment against the adverse party. Smith v. Kernochen, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 217–219; Calkins v. Allerton, 3 Barb. 173; Glass v. Nichols, 35 Me. 328; Warfield v. Davis, 14 B. Mon. 33; Tarleton v. Johnson, 25 Ala. 314; Eaton v. Cooper, 29 Vt. 444; Peterson v. Lothrop, 34 Pa. St. 228; Farnsworth v. Arnold, 3 Sneed, 252; Train v. Gold, 5 Pick. 387. The stipulation of the bond of indemnity was, that the defendants would pay all damages the sheriff might sustain, or which might be recovered against him by reason of his attaching the property, and, of course, they covenanted for the results or consequences of any suit which might be brought against him on that account; and I am of the opinion that such a covenant so connected them in privity with the proceedings, that the record of the judgment is as conclusive against them as the actual party to the suit. Rapelye v. Prince, 4 Hill, 119; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 523; Carver v. Jackson, 4 Pet [29 U. S.] 86; Case v. Reeve, 14 Johns. 81; Chapin v. Curtis, 23 Conn. 388; Emery v. Fowler, 39 Me. 326. Judgment, therefore, must be for the plaintiff; but the question is also presented, as to what the amount shall be, and the authority is conferred upon the court "to enter such judgment as shall be proper." Attention should be called to the fact that the case is presented upon an agreed statement of facts. The federal courts regard such statements as a part of the record; and hence it is that a writ of error will lie upon an agreed statement of facts. Suydam v. Williamson, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 434; U. S. v. Eliason, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 291; Stimpson v. Railroad Co., 10 How. [51 U. S.] 329; Graham v. Bayne, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 60.

Regarding the question in that point of view, that it appears of record in this case that the measure of the injury sustained by the plaintiff was legally ascertained in his suit against the sheriff; that it also appears of record that $830 of that amount has been paid, I am of the opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the same damages as in the suit against the sheriff, deducting the amount received in part satisfaction of that judgment, as set forth and admitted in the agreed statement, but adding to the balance so ascertained a sum in the nature of damages equal to six per cent. interest on account of the delay.

Judgment for plaintiff accordingly.

[Upon a writ of error, the case was taken to the supreme court, where the judgment of this court was affirmed, with costs. 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 1.]

Case No. 9,964.

MURRAY v. McLANE.

[1 Brunner, Col. Cas. 405;[1] 2 Car. Law Repos. 186; 5 Hall, Law J. 514.]

Circuit Court, D. Delaware. 1815.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—PROOF NECESSARY TO MAINTAIN ACTION—MALICE—PROBABLE CAUSE.

1. In an action for malicious prosecution, plaintiff must prove malice, express or implied, and want of probable cause, or the action will fail.

2. The question of probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact; whether the circumstances alleged to show probable cause are true, is a question of fact; whether, if true, they amount to probable cause is a question of law to be decided by the court.

The declaration in this case is drawn with great care, and exhibits a full statement of the plaintiff's case. It contains two counts. The first count charges the defendant with having falsely, maliciously, or without cause, instituted a suit against the plaintiff, demanding heavy bail, whereby he was arrested and imprisoned. The second count charges that the suit was instituted maliciously and without cause, and that excessive bail to the amount of $1,200,000 was demanded in a case where he had no right to demand bail, in consequence of which he was arrested and imprisoned. This action, in its nature is peculiar and delicate. Formerly, it was used as a remedy for malicious prosecutions only. It was afterwards adopted as a remedy where a civil suit had been maliciously and without cause instituted against the party.

THE COURT has been applied to by the counsel for the defendant to instruct the jury upon the law arising in the case. The jury must have observed that the counsel engaged in this cause have not materially differed as to the proof which the plaintiff must necessarily produce in order to sustain his case. That the original suit was instituted maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause. The court consider the law upon this subject as settled. This species of action is not favored in law. It is incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that the suit by the defendant was instituted with malice, express or implied, and without probable cause. Without probable cause malice may be implied according to the circumstances of the case; but from the most express malice, want of probable cause cannot be implied. Hence, to sustain this suit, the plaintiff must prove malice, express or implied, that there was a writ without probable cause. Whether malice existed or not, is a matter of fact for the jury to decide, taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case.

The question of probable cause is a mixed proposition of law and fact. Whether the circumstances alleged to show it probable or not probable are true, and existed, is a matter of fact; but whether, supposing them true, they amount to a probable cause, is a question of law to be decided by the court. Whether the bail required in this case was excessive or not, depended, in a great measure, upon the law of the state of Delaware, and the practice of the courts under those laws. In Maryland, in an action of this kind, no man could be held to bail for the trifling sum of fifty dollars without an affidavit. In Delaware, I understand the practice is proved to be different, and that a man may be required, without affidavit, to give bail to any amount, according to the value of the thing in contest, in the first instance. He may afterwards be exonerated on application to a judge or justice for a rule on the plaintiff to show cause why he may not be discharged on common bail; and it also appears that the practice is, to require bail in double the amount of the value of the ship in dispute. In the case under consideration, it does not appear to the court that $1,200,000 was more than double the value of the Superior and her cargo. The question of probable cause has been considered as involving the legality or illegality of the seizure, and possession of the Superior by the plaintiff, and by the defendant. Here it is necessary to recapitulate the evidence in the case. The principal facts appear to be these: On the 24th of August, 1812, Joseph Grubb wrote a letter to the collector, informing him that the Superior was in the bay of Delaware, having on board a cargo of goods of the growth, produce, and manufacture of Great Britain, and he states that he gave this information in order that he might receive the proportion of any penalty or forfeiture to which he might be entitled by reason of his giving this information. That Thomas Little boarded the Superior near the Capes of Delaware, by instruction from the principal owners and consignees, and obtained a copy of the manifest to be given to the collector. That on the 25th of August one of the gun boats and the revenue cutter were proceeding down the bay, the gun boat being ahead; at seven o'clock in the morning the Superior was boarded near Reedy Island, by —— Smith, an officer of the gun boat, pursuant to the orders of Commodore Murray, commander of the flotilla, then lying in Delaware Bay, by whom she was ordered to Newcastle. About eleven o'clock of the same day she was boarded by Captain Sawyer of the revenue cutter, who demanded the ship's papers, and they were delivered to him by the master of the vessel. She was ordered by Captain Sawyer to the mouth of Christiana creek. A contest arose between the officer of the gun boat and the officer of the revenue cutter, as to the destination of the vessel, and both remaining on board she ascended up the river to Newcastle where the flotilla was stationed. Previous to her arrival off Newcastle, Samuel Spackman, the owner, declared his intention to the collector to order the Superior to Wilmington, and the collector advised the surveyor at Newcastle, and the captain of the cutter, of this circumstance. At Newcastle orders were given that she should be fastened to the pier, but this was prevented by an officer of the flotilla, who, aided by a number of his men, who were armed, forcibly carried her up the river to Philadelphia, the officer of the revenue cutter continuing on board. In this place it may not be improper to remark that the force used was in the absence of Commodore Murray. If he had been present, in all probability it would not have taken place. Under these circumstances, the collector, consulting the district attorney, was advised to take out a writ of replevin to recover the possession of the vessel, but as she had been carried out of the district the writ could not be served. The attorney then, in the absence of the collector, ordered an action on the case, and directed the writ to be indorsed per bail, to the amount of $1,200,000, double the supposed amount of the vessel and cargo. The writ was served on Commodore Murray, and for want of bail, he was committed to gaol by the marshal. This proceeding is the ground of the present action. It is made by law the duty of the collector of the revenue to board, or cause to be boarded, all vessels arriving from foreign parts, within the limits of the United States, or within four leagues of the coast, if bound to the United States, for the purposes specified in the law, and it is the duty of the person on board to remain there until the vessel shall arrive at the port or place of destination. Before the war a collision of this sort could not have happened. The authority of the collector was complete and exclusive. How far the existence of war authorized the commander of the armed vessels of the United States to capture merchant vessels, belonging to citizens, which had arrived within the waters and jurisdiction of the United States, for a supposed violation of the non-importation act, is a question on which the opinion of the court is required.

The only question of difficulty is whether the boarding by the officer of the gun boat, in the manner pursued, amounts to a capture as prize of war, exclusive of the boarding by the revenue officer, who demanded and obtained the ship's papers. No authorities having been cited on either side, we must decide the case as it is now before us. There is no legal restraint on the officers of the navy to prevent them boarding a merchant vessel belonging to a citizen in the waters of the United States. Boarding for the purpose of examination is a legal act. Under the circumstances which have been stated, the court is of opinion that after the Superior was boarded by the commander of the revenue cutter, who obtained possession of the ship's papers, he was, in construction of the law, in possession of the vessel, and that she ought to have been delivered up by the officer of the flotilla; and that the carrying her out of the district by force was wrongful on the part of that officer, acting under the authority, as he conceived, of Commodore Murray. It has been contended on the part of the plaintiff, and authorities have been produced to prove, that in time of war all trading with the enemy is unlawful, and that the goods of an ally or even of a citizen found trading with an enemy are lawful prizes of war, and confiscable as such. There can be no doubt that the law is so. If the Superior had been captured on the high seas trading with the enemy, or in violation of the laws of the United States, the vessel and cargo without doubt would have been prize of war. Such, I conceive, was the case of the Sally, condemned by the decision of the United States. I do not recollect particularly the facts in that case, but I have no doubt she was captured on the high seas, because she was captured by a private armed vessel whose right to capture is confined to the high seas. The case of the Nelly referred to in the opinion was a capture on the high seas. The reference, in the opinion, to the fourth, sixth, and fourteenth sections of the act of June 26, 1812 [2 Stat. 759, 761, 763], seems to imply a capture at sea. The words of the sixth section are: "And in case of all captured vessels, goods and effects which shall be brought within the jurisdiction of the United States, the district courts of the United States shall have exclusive cognizance thereof, as in civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," etc. In the case of the Sally it was contended by the attorney-general, on the part of the United States, that as soon as she had on board her cargo, with intent that the same should be landed in the United States, they became forfeited, and that the forfeiture was complete and immediately attached, but the court was of a different opinion, and that she was lawful prize; there was no intervening claim in that case on the part of the revenue officer. Seizures of vessels within the waters of the United States, for violation of the non-intercourse act, are considered as properly belonging to the revenue officers. This appears by the instructions of the executive department to have been the opinion of the government; and although the instructions were not received in time by Commodore Murray to prevent this contest, yet this clearly shows the construction put upon the law by the navy department. After seizure by the collector, the vessel and cargo are considered to be at the risk, and in case of loss by the neglect or omission of the collector, he is responsible to the owner. Hence the court is of opinion that, admitting the facts to be truly stated, there was probable cause for the suit, which was the ground of this action. It would be rigorous in the extreme, to say that there was not probable cause for the original suit when the attorney for the district, whom the collector was bound to consult, advised and directed the measure. And if it be admitted that the district attorney was mistaken, it cannot alter the case as it respects probable cause, because if the case was of so doubtful a nature as that eminent counsel was mistaken, it affords a strong presumption that there was probable cause.

THE COURT are therefore of opinion, that there was a probable cause of action, and to the jury the case is now submitted.

After such a decided charge, the jury retired for about ten minutes, when they returned with a verdict in favor of the defendant, Col. McLane.

WITNESS—DISCHARGED BANKRUPT—INTEREST AS A DISQUALIFICATION—DEPOSITIONS—RECORDS OF UNITED STATES COURTS—PROOF OF.

1. A bankrupt who indorsed a note before his bankruptcy, and who has obtained his certificate, is a good witness for the indorsee.

2. A record of the proceedings against a bankrupt, attested by the clerk of the district court is good evidence, the act of congress not requiring the certificate of the presiding judge in the case of records from United States courts.

3. If the objection to a witness on account of interest arise from proof made by the objector, the witness cannot discharge himself of the objection by any matter sworn by himself; it must be removed by proof drawn from some other source.

4. Depositions which do not show, either in the caption or body of them, between what parties they were taken cannot be received.

5. If a plaintiff supposing himself ready, press a trial, and it is found on the trial that the testimony he relied on cannot be given in evidence as he expected, and he be nonsuited, the allegation of surprise shall not prevail to set aside the nonsuit.

[This was a proceeding by Murray & Murray against Marsh & Marsh.]

Before MARSHALL, Circuit Justice, and POTTER, District Judge.

PER CURIAM. Loomis and Tillinghast assigned to the plaintiffs the note sued on, which was made by the defendants, and afterwards became bankrupts, and obtained a certificate. And now Loomis is offered as a witness for the plaintiffs. He is a competent witness, for he is by the certificate discharged of all debts provable under the commission, and his indorsement to the plaintiffs rendered him liable to them, so as to make their demand provable against him; secondly, the record of the proceedings against them, attested by the clerk of the district court, without any certificate of the presiding judge, is good evidence; for the act of congress relates to certificates in case of officers of the several states, not to those of the United States; thirdly, if the objection to a witness arises from proof made by the objector, the witness cannot discharge himself of the objection by any matter sworn by himself; it must be removed by proof drawn from some other source; fourthly, depositions, not specifying the parties between whom they are taken, in the caption, nor naming them as parties in the body of the deposition, cannot be received; fifthly, if a plaintiff supposing himself ready, press for trial, and it is found on trial that the testimony he relied on cannot be given in evidence as he expected, and he be nonsuited, the allegation of surprise shall not prevail to set aside the nonsuit.

NOTE. Records of United States courts do not require the judges' certificate; such provisions apply only to certificates of state officers. U. S. v. Wood, 2 Wheeler, Cr. Cas. 326.

TRIAL—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE—ONUS PROBANDI—ACTION FOR LIBEL.

The case of Kerr v. Force [Case No. 7,730] reaffirmed. He who has the onus probandi should commence the proceedings before the jury, and he who commences should have a right to reply and close the argument to the jury.

At law.

This action was brought [by Charles Murray] on a letter written by the defendant [Richard C. Mason] accusing the plaintiff of perjury. The defendant pleaded "not guilty," and justification. The plea of not guilty was withdrawn and the jury was sworn on the plea of justification. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty. In the course of the trial the following was submitted to the chief judge, the assistant judges differing:

Whether the plaintiff or the defendant shall have the opening and conclusion of the case?

The counsel for the plaintiff contends that he has to prove the loss of office charged in the declaration and the damages sustained, and refers to Moncure v. Dermott [Case No. 9,707]; Evans, Prac. (Md.) 296.

The defendant, by his counsel, contends he holds the affirmative of the issue, and refers to Kerr v. Force [supra]; 1 Starkie, Ev. 381, 384, 385; 6 Har. & J. 469.

J. M. Carlisle, for plaintiff.

Jas. H. Bradley, for defendant.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The plea of not guilty having been withdrawn, the jury was sworn to try the issue upon the plea of justification only.

The counsel for the defendant contend that as they hold the affirmative of the issue they have a right to open and close the argument before the jury, and they rely upon the decision of this court in the case of Kerr v. Force [supra]; Starkie, Ev.; and Cullum v. Bevans, 6 Har. & J. 469.

On the other side, the counsel for the plaintiff cited Evans, Prac. (Md.) 296, and Moncure v. Dermott [supra].

The case of Kerr v. Force seems to have been well considered, and is decisive of the present question, unless it be overruled by the case of Moncure v. Dermott, or controlled by the case of Kearney v. Gough, 5 Gill & J. 457, cited by Evans on page 296. In the case of Kerr v. Force there seems to have been more reason than in the present to permit the plaintiff to open and close the argument to the jury, because the court had directed the jury to assess the plaintiff's damages upon a demurrer which had been been decided in his favor, yet the court said that that circumstance did not throw the affirmative on the plaintiff, and said also that the uniform practice of this court had been that the party who held the affirmative of the issue should open and close, unless there was some issue in which the plaintiff held the affirmative, in which case the plaintiff had a right to open and close the whole case to the jury; observing also that in all cases the plaintiff must show his damages, and if that were a good cause for giving him the right to open and close, he would have it in all cases whether he held the affirmative of the issue or not. It may also be observed that the question of damages does not arise until the issue is found for the plaintiff.

In the case of Moncure v. Dermott, one of the pleas was "covenants performed," but before an issue could be made up on that plea there must have been a replication setting forth some special breach which would throw the burden of proof upon the plaintiff. That case, therefore, cannot be considered as inconsistent with that of Kerr v. Force.

I have not seen the case of Kearney v. Gough, cited by Mr. Evans from 5 Gill & J. 439. Whether the quotation is a mere dictum of one of the judges, or a decision of the court, does not appear. Judge Dorsey, in delivering the opinion of the court of appeals in Maryland, says: "No principle of law seems more universal or better established than that the onus probandi rests on the party who maintains the affirmative side of the issue." And nothing can be more natural than that he who has the onus probandi should commence the proceedings before the jury, for before he moves nothing can be done. The other party has nothing to say. It is right also that he who commences the contest should have a right to reply to the defensive allegations of the other party.

I am therefore of opinion, in the present case, that the defendant should open and close the argument to the jury.

[6. Cited in Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U. S. 294, in dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Clifford, to the point that removals under section 643, Rev. St., are confined to civil actions.]

This was an application for an order requiring the clerk of the supreme court of the state of New York for the county of Greene, to make a return to a writ of error issued by this court, to remove into this court a suit brought in such state court by Albert W. Patrie against Robert Murray and William Buckley, to recover damages for false imprisonment, and in which a judgment had been rendered by such state court in favor of Patrie, for $9,343.34. After such judgment was rendered, the defendants therein sued out such a writ of error.

Samuel Blatchford and Clarence A. Seward, for plaintiffs in error.

Amasa J. Parker, for defendant in error.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The principal ground of defence set up on the trial of the suit in the state court was, that the arrest and imprisonment of the plaintiff therein, which occurred between the 27th of August, 1862, and the 3d of September, 1862, took place under the order of the president of the United States. The fourth section of the habeas corpus act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 756), provides, that any order of the president, &c., made during the Rebellion, shall be a defence, in all courts, to any action, &c., pending or to be commenced for any arrest or imprisonment made or committed under such order, or under color of any law of congress. The fifth section provides for the removal of any such suit commenced in a state court, to the circuit court of the United States, either before or after judgment. As respects the latter, the section declares, that "it shall, also, be competent for either party, within six months after the rendition of a judgment in any such cause, by writ of error or other process, to remove the same to the circuit court of the United States of that district in which such judgment shall have been rendered; and the said circuit court shall thereupon proceed to try and determine the facts and the law in such action, in the same manner as if the same had been there originally commenced, the judgment in such case notwithstanding."

This provision of the 5th section, and, indeed, the whole of it as to the removal of causes, is a literal copy of the 6th section of the act of March 3, 1815 (3 Stat. 233). The question of the removal of causes from the state courts to the circuit courts of the United States was discussed very much in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 346-350, and no doubt was entertained that it might take place after, as well as before, judgment. It was again commented upon in the case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 821-828, and especially by Mr. Justice Johnson, in his dissenting opinion (pages 884-889.) Mr. Justice Johnson was inclined to the conclusion, that congress could not confer original jurisdiction upon the circuit courts of the United States, either directly or by removal from state courts, in cases arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties," &c., inasmuch as the federal court must assume the jurisdiction upon the simple hypothesis that such question had arisen, and that, until such question had actually arisen and was presented for decision, the case was exclusively cognizable in the state court. This view led the learned justice to maintain that the question could be brought properly before the federal court only under the 25th section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 85], as it could not be ascertained whether the case had actually arisen, till it was heard and decided. The chief justice, who delivered the opinion of the court, held that jurisdiction could be entertained when the question assumed such a form that the judicial power was capable of acting on it; that it then became a case; and that the judicial power extended to all cases arising under the constitution, &c.

I admit, that the bringing of the suit in the federal court, and the averments in the declaration in conformity with the act of congress conferring the jurisdiction, do not vest it necessarily or definitely in the court. If it did, the argument of the learned counsel against this motion would be conclusive, namely, that the principle would draw within the federal jurisdiction cases without limit, at the election of the plaintiff. But the defendant may meet the question, whether or not it is a case arising under the constitution, &c., by pleading, or on the trial, as I have endeavored to show in Dennistoun v. Draper [Case No. 3,804], and thus confine the jurisdiction within the constitutional limit. So in the case of original jurisdiction by removal from the state court.

An objection is taken to the removal in this case, on the ground of its violation of the 7th amendment to the constitution, which is, that "no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reëxamined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law." Whether or not this amendment would deprive this court of jurisdiction, I am not inclined to determine on this motion. It is a question that may come up on the trial, and be there ruled by the court, and the ruling can be reviewed on error by the supreme court. The question, also, whether the fourth section of the act of March 3d, 1863, is constitutional, and, if so, whether it applies to this case, are questions that belong to the trial, and need not now be examined.

It was suggested by the counsel for both parties, on the argument, that, if the court had any serious doubts upon the questions involved in this removal, the decision be reserved, and the cause heard before both of the judges, that the parties might have the benefit of a division of opinion, if such should be the result. Having come to the conclusion that the objections to the jurisdiction are properly available on the trial, the suggestion is unimportant.

Let an order be entered requiring the return to be made.

BANKRUPTCY — LIFE INSURANCE POLICY PAID FOR BY THE WIFE FOR HER HUSBAND'S BENEFIT — CONTEST BETWEEN ASSIGNEE AND HUSBAND FOR PROCEEDS OF POLICY.

A wife possessed of a separate estate, secured to her by an ante-nuptial settlement, obtained in 1869, a policy of insurance upon her life, payable upon her death to her husband. She paid the premium for a year out of her own estate. Before the year expired her husband was adjudicated a bankrupt. Out of her own estate she paid the premium for the two following years, 1870 and 1871, and before the next premium fell due she died; and the question arose between the husband, and his assignee in bankruptcy, which was entitled to the proceeds of the policy: Held, considering the nature of the contract of insurance and the obvious intention of the wife, that the assignee had no right to the proceeds, but that they belonged to the husband.

Bankruptcy. This cause is brought here to revise an order of the district court for the eastern district of Missouri, overruling the demurrer of the assignee in bankruptcy to the petition of James Murrin, one of the bankrupts, and directing the assignee to pay the bankrupt Murrin the proceeds in his hands of two policies of life insurance, less the sum paid by him for costs and expenses of collection. The petition thus demurred to is as follows: "To the Hon. Samuel Treat, Judge of Said Court: The petition of James Murrin, one of the said bankrupts, respectfully represents, that a petition in bankruptcy against your petitioner and said Bolivar Owen, was filed in this court on the 30th day of November, 1869. That a hearing was had and an adjudication of bankruptcy entered on said petition on December 10, 1869. That on December 28, 1869, your petitioner and said Owen filed their schedules as required by law. That on January 18, 1870, Charles Green was elected and appointed assignee in bankruptcy of said Owen and Murrin as partners and individually. That Sarah E. B. Murrin was the wife of your petitioner, James Murrin; and that by marriage settlement made previous to their intermarriage, all the property and estate of said Sarah was settled and secured to her own separate use and behoof, so that the said James had no right or interest therein, nor title nor claim thereto, nor to any portion thereof. That said separate estate was large in amount and of great value. That on March 17, 1869, the said Sarah made application to the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company, doing business in this state, for an insurance upon her own life in the sum of five thousand dollars, payable upon her death, upon proper proof, to her husband, the said James Murrin. That upon said application said company issued to said Sarah a policy of insurance upon her life, in consideration of the payment by her of the annual premium of one hundred seventy-seven fifty-hundredths dollars, payable one-half in cash and one-half by note bearing interest at six per cent. payable in advance on or before the 26th April in each year during the continuance of the policy. That said Sarah, out of her own funds, paid the premiums required in cash and also the interest upon the notes for the years 1869, 1870, 1871 in advance. That the said Sarah died on the 19th day of January, 1872. That your petitioner did not pay any of said premium sums, nor were the same paid out of any funds or property in which he had any interest legal or equitable, nor did he suppose that he had any interest or title to said policies either legal or equitable which could pass to his assignee, in bankruptcy, and for this reason he did not enter said policy in his schedule of assets belonging to him at the date of the petition filed in this court. That after the death of the said Sarah and the money due on said policy became payable, the said Green, assignee in bankruptcy of your petitioner, and said Owen, applied to your petitioner, required him to set over said policy and the sum secured thereby to him as assignee; and your petitioner supposing that said demand was legal did give to said Green an order for the payment of the sum due upon said policy as follows:

"'Policy No. 9,199, on life of Sarah E. B. Murrin, I, James Murrin, the person in whose favor the above policy was issued, make no claim for the sum thereby insured, or any part thereof, or any interest therein, and do request and direct the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company to pay the same to Charles Green, my assignee in bankruptcy, who is entitled to the amount. Witness my hand and seal the 7th day of May, 1872. James Murrin. (Seal).'

"And the said Green, as assignee by suit at law in the St. Louis circuit court, recovered judgment against such company on December 11, 1872, and said judgment for the sum of $4,933.05 was duly satisfied and paid to said Green on the 26th day of December, 1872."

Precisely the same allegations are made in respect to another policy issued to the said Sarah by the Connecticut Life Insurance Company on the 29th day of April, 1869, for the sum of $5,000 payable at her death, to the petitioner, her husband, upon which the said Green as assignee, collected May 11, 1872, the sum of $4,948.57. The petition then continues:

"Your petitioner further represents, that the orders for collection of the amounts due upon said policy were without consideration; that your petitioner had no title or interest legal or equitable in said policies on the 30th November, 1869, the date of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, which could pass to his assignee by virtue of the act of congress to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and he is informed by counsel and believes that the sums of money collected by said Green upon said policies belong to your petitioner and to his creditors, becoming such since the filing of said petition in bankruptcy. In consideration of the premises, he prays that said Charles Green, as assignee, may be made to pay over to your petitioner the said sums of $4,933.05 and $4,948.57, less the costs, charges, and expenses by him incurred in collecting the same, and that your petitioner may have such other and further relief as to the court may seem meet."

Lackland, Martin & Lackland, for assignee.
C. C. Whittelsey, for petitioner.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The wife of the petitioner being possessed of a separate estate, secured to her by an antenuptial marriage settlement, applied in the spring of 1869 for two policies of insurance of $5,000 each, upon her life, payable upon her death to her husband. They were issued accordingly, and she paid the premiums for one year, one-half in cash, and one-half by note. Before the year expired her husband was adjudicated a bankrupt. Out of her own estate she paid the premiums for the two following years, 1870 and 1871, and before the next premium fell due she died. The question is, whether the assignee as against the bankrupt, is entitled, for the benefit of the estate, to the proceeds of the policies. The assignee does not claim that his right is strengthened by reason of having obtained, in the manner stated, the actual possession of the proceeds, and the only contest is as to the respective legal or equitable right of the assignee and bankrupt thereto.

Counsel on both sides, in their well considered briefs, have argued many points which, though pertaining to the general subject of life policies for the benefit of others, are, nevertheless, not necessarily involved in the decision of the case.

The counsel for the assignee claims that at the date of the bankruptcy of the husband, November 30, 1869, the husband had a right of property in the policy (which it is contended is a chose in action) of such a nature that it vested in the assignee by virtue of the adjudication in bankruptcy. Bankrupt Act, § 14 [14 Stat. 522]. Under this section, property and rights which are acquired by the bankrupt after the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy do not vest in the assignee; and to make good his claim the assignee must show that the right to the benefit of the policy was one which not only existed in the husband at the time he was proceeded against in bankruptcy, but is one of such a nature as to vest in the assignee as of that time, by virtue of the provisions of the bankrupt act. This act should receive such a construction as accords with its well known purpose, which is, that if an insolvent debtor will surrender all his property (not exempt) for distribution among his creditors, he may, on the terms provided in the act, have his discharge. If the wife's death had happened before the bankruptcy, there being no statute protecting the husband's rights under the policy, the right to collect and hold the money would, it may be admitted, pass to the assignee. But her death did not happen until over two years afterward, during which time the wife continued to pay the premiums. It is admitted that she could not have been compelled to pay them, either by the husband, or by the assignee. Her payment of them proceeded purely from her bounty. It is certain, to a practical intent, that if she had not paid the subsequent premiums, the first payment, made before the bankruptcy, would have been of no benefit, either to the assignee or to the husband, for she did not die during the year. It is also certain, to a practical intent, that, had the last premium not been paid, there would have been no proceeds here about which to litigate. Her intention, her object, in making these payments, in virtue of which the policy was kept in esse, must have been to make provision for her husband; and what equity, let me ask, have creditors, or the assignee representing them, to thwart the purpose which she had in view, and for which she paid her money—money to which they had no claim? The assignee, if it be conceded that he could have done so for the benefit of the estate, which I do not admit nor decide, took no steps to pay the premiums, but asks the benefit of those paid by the wife. It is inconceivable that she made, or intended to make, the payments for the benefit of the assignee, and she doubtless died in the confident belief that she had made provision for her husband.

Without discussing the questions which have been argued at the bar as to the nature and extent, before the death occurs, of the interest of a person designated by the bounty of another as the one to whom a policy is ultimately to be paid, I am quite confident that the husband, at the time of his bankruptcy, had no such interest in these policies as to give the assignee the right to retain their proceeds against the manifest intention and purpose of the wife.

Could the assignee, as against the wish of the wife, have said, "I demand the policy, and intend to keep up the premiums for the benefit of the estate?" If it were necessary to answer this question, it would seem that he had no such right, and that she could properly say, "This is a matter of my own, a provision originating in my bounty, one upon which my husband's creditors have no claim, and with which they have no right to interfere." But the assignee took no such steps; on the contrary, he allowed, or did not prevent the wife from making the payments which kept the policy alive; and I rest my judgment against him on the broad ground, that, under the circumstances of the case, the creditors, for whose benefit the money is sought, have not the shadow of a shade of equity to it, nor to defeat the provident and just provision which the wife intended to secure for her husband, not for them. The policy was kept up by her for the benefit of her husband after her death, not for the benefit of his creditors before his bankruptcy. The district judge, in deciding the case, seized the considerations which control it, when he remarked: "Looking at the nature of the contract for the insurance as being a provision by one married party for the benefit of another, and kept in force by the wife out of her separate estate without any step being taken by the assignee, her equities should be carefully regarded. The policy was for the benefit of the husband, and was kept alive by the wife after the bankruptcy, and it would be inequitable that a sum becoming payable after the bankruptcy under such a contract, should, by relation back to the time of commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, be held to belong to the assignee. The design of such charitable acts for the benefit of a third party was not intended to be defeated by the bankrupt law, in a case like the present, where such a result would be against all equity."

MURTAGH v. PHILADELPHIA et al.

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 19, 1874.

RESTRAINING ERECTION OF PUBLIC WORKS—ACT OF 8TH APRIL, 1846—JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS.

Application for preliminary injunction by plaintiff, who was a citizen of New York, to restrain the completion of a bridge over the river Schuylkill, at an elevation of only sixteen feet above high-water mark, on the ground that it would, at that level (which was four or five feet lower than that of the former bridge), interfere with the navigation of plaintiff's barges. The Schuylkill is a tidal and navigable river, lying wholly within the state of Pennsylvania.

Affidavits and depositions were read by both parties as to the facts set forth in the bill.

Thomas Hart, Jr., and Mr. Tilghman, for plaintiff.

Thayer & Sellers, for Keystone Bridge Co.

The City Solicitor and R. N. Willson, for the City of Philadelphia.

THE COURT refused the preliminary injunction, saying that where a suit in equity was merely for the enforcement of a legal right, and there was any disputable question upon the merits, it was not in general, proper to grant an injunction before final hearing or a judgment at law; and that the reason for not awarding an interlocutory injunction was here the stronger because the case depended wholly upon questions of right under the laws of Pennsylvania, and the law of that state (Act April 8, 1846; Purd. Dig. 599, pl. 55) provided that no court within the county of Philadelphia should enjoin the erection of public works until question of title and damages should be finally decided by a common-law court.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 6, 1858.

PATENTS—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION — EXCLUSIVE POSSESSION — DOUBTFUL INFRINGEMENT — PRACTICE IN EQUITY—BILL RETAINED.

1. A preliminary injunction will be refused, unless upon proof of exclusive possession under the patent, or of public acquiescence in the exclusive right of the patentee or of a trial at law.

2. Whether a claim, embracing the use of any metallic sulphate, in connection with any alkali; or, any sulphate having an alkaline base, could be sustained, upon proof that substantially the same proportions, of other sulphates than those named in the specification, would not produce the required result. Quaere.

3. Where the patent is recent, the specification obscure, and the proof of infringement meager and unsatisfactory, the court will not grant an injunction, even upon final hearing, but will retain the bill and require the complainant to bring an action at law.

4. The terms, upon which such an order will be made, stated.

In equity. This was a final hearing, on pleadings and proofs, on a bill for an injunction and account, founded on the alleged infringement of letters patent [No. 16,961] granted to Samuel Barker, dated April 7th, 1857, and assigned to the plaintiffs, for an "improvement in processes for treating moss for mattresses." In the specification, the invention was said "to consist in preparing or treating the ordinary moss of commerce, by saturating its fibre with certain metallic sulphates in connection with alkalies, and which will not be separated therefrom by washing, which increases its hardness and elasticity, and renders it indestructible by moisture or exposure to the weather, whereby it is capable of being employed to advantage in various upholstery manufactures, wherein hitherto only the best quality of curled animal hair, could be used satisfactorily." This specification stated the processes by which the desired results were to be obtained, as follows: "My treatment is as follows: I prefer to use sulphates of both characters, viz: a sulphate having a metallic base, as the sulphate of iron, and a sulphate having an alkaline base, as the sulphate of soda; and, to the action of these, the crude moss, having been cleared by the usual machine from the dirt and bark with which it is admixed, is submitted, in a liquor prepared by dissolving in one hundred gallons of water fifty-six pounds of sulphate of iron, to which is then added sixty-five pounds of sulphate of soda, the whole being well mixed. In this the moss is to be kept immersed, say from thirty-six to forty-eight hours, and, when taken out, is to be well washed in clear water, dried, and passed again through the clearing machine, when it will be ready for use." The specification then stated, that it might be desirable to have the article dyed black, to render it more uniform in appearance, and proceeded to describe a process for giving it that color; and it then gave a mode for testing the proper preparation of the moss, when treated according to the specification. It also contained a statement that "other metallic sulphates, as well as other alkaline matters, will effect, in combination, the same desired result, as, for instance, the sulphate of copper, in connection with sulphate of soda. or with pure soda;" but that the patentee had found that neither alone would accomplish the purpose attained by his invention. The claim of the patentee was in these words: "I claim the method of treating or preparing the moss of commerce, to serve as a substitute for curled animal hair, substantially as set forth herein." The bill alleged, that the defendant had used, and was still using, the processes so patented, in the treatment of moss, and had sold, and continued to offer for sale, moss so prepared and treated, in violation of the rights of the plaintiff, as assignee of the patentee, and prayed an account and an injunction. The defendants' answer admitted the issuing of the patent, but denied that Barker discovered or invented the improvement patented, and averred that such processes were known and in use before his alleged discovery and application for a patent therefor. It also denied the infringement alleged. The bill was filed June 26th, 1857, less than three months after the issuing of the patent.

HALL, District Judge. And if there has, in fact, been any infringement by the defendants, it is more than probable that the defendants' use of the process patented began sometime prior to the issuing of the patent, and was continued until or near the time of the commencement of the suit.

In short, there is no proof to show any exclusive possession under the patent: there is no proof of such a public acquiescence in the exclusive right of the patentee as would justify the assumption that the claim to such exclusive right is well founded, and there has been no trial at law. And, therefore, if this was a motion for a preliminary injunction, instead of the final hearing of the cause, it is quite clear that an injunction would not be granted without a previous trial at law, to establish the complainants' right.

Objections were also taken to the sufficiency of the specification, and if the claim should be so construed as embracing the use of any metallic sulphate in connection with any alkali, or any sulphate having an alkaline base, these objections might deserve serious consideration upon the trial of an action for an infringement, especially if it should appear that substantially the same proportions of other sulphates would not produce the result which is said to be produced by the use of the sulphate of iron and sulphate of soda in the proportions and manner set forth in the specification. On this ground, also, I can not but feel some doubt in regard to the right of the complainants to the injunction and account prayed for by their bill.

On the question of infringement, too, the proof is very meager and unsatisfactory. The proof shows that on the 17th of June, 1857, nine days before the filing of the bill, a person purchased of the agent of the defendants, at their place of business, four pounds of prepared moss, and some fifteen or twenty bales of the same, or a similar article, at the same place. The moss so purchased was delivered to Dr. James R. Chilton, chemist, who made a set of experiments upon it for the purpose of ascertaining whether it contained the ingredients described in the specification annexed to Barker's patent. He found that it contained sulphate of iron, and sulphate of soda, and coloring matter. And he gave it, as his opinion, that this moss had been treated with the same substances described in Barker's specification; but the manner of treatment, or whether the sulphate of iron and sulphate of soda had been used in the proportions given in that specification, he confessed himself unable to state. These proportions, he says, are not, in his opinion, essential to the effect produced; but he does not say how far they may be departed from, without failing to produce the effect said to be produced by the use of the process described in Barker's specification.

There was also evidence given, showing the purchase, by the defendants, of sulphate of iron and sulphate of soda in considerable quantities, but in very different proportions from those stated in Barker's specification, as well as evidence to show that the defendants were first made acquainted with the process of treating moss for the purpose of improving its quality and adding to its value, by a person who had learned from Barker a mode or modes of treatment adopted by him prior to his application for a patent.

On the other hand, there is some proof to show that the processes adopted by the defendants (it appearing that different processes were used at different times) are not like the processes described in the specification annexed to Barker's patent, but were essentially different from that process, and different, to some extent, at least, from each other. But this evidence, like all the other evidence bearing upon the question of infringement, was indefinite and unsatisfactory.

This evidence does not sufficiently show that the patented process has been used by the defendants, if the proportions are substantially the proportions stated in the specification, and the modus operandi there described is essential to that process.

It certainly would be sufficient to raise a strong presumption that the patented process has been used, if there was no proof that substantially the same results could be produced by other and distinct processes; but as this has been stated, rather than satisfactorily proved, by witnesses on the part of the defense, I think there is so much doubt even upon the question of infringement, that there should be a trial at law before an injunction and account are ordered.

The right of the plaintiffs is not, therefore, clear; and this cause will therefore stand over a reasonable time, for the bringing of a suit at law against the defendants for an infringement; and if such a suit is brought, until a sufficient time for the final determination thereof has elapsed. And if, in such suit, there shall be final judgment for the plaintiffs, they will be entitled to a decree for injunction and account, as prayed for in the bill; and if, in such suit, there shall be final judgment for the defendants, the bill will be dismissed with costs; and so, also, it will be dismissed with costs on an application of the defendants, if such suit is not brought within a reasonable time, and prosecuted with reasonable diligence.

MUSCATINE v. MISSISSIPPI & M. R. CO. et al. MUSCATINE COUNTY v. SAME. LETZ et al. v. CLARK et al.

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. 1870.

RAILROAD AID BONDS—DEFENCES—JUDGMENTS—INJUNCTION—TAXATION AND EXEMPTION.

1. Matters, such as fraud, which should have been pleaded as a defence, are not sufficient grounds after judgment, upon which to apply to equity to enjoin process to collect the judgment.

2. Fraud of the payee is no defence to negotiable bonds in the hands of innocent holders for value, before due.

3. Where, by reason of complainant's own carelessness (no fraud or malfeasance in this behalf being charged against the creditor), judgment in an action on coupons is, by clerical mistake, rendered for too large a sum, a proper remedy of the creditor is to apply to the court which rendered it to have it corrected, and where the alleged mistake was not plainly shown, and if it existed, could not have happened except for the debtors' laches, and no application had been made to correct the judgment, an injunction, to restrain process to enforce such judgment, was denied.

4. A creditor having an obligation of a principal debtor and of a surety, may pursue his remedy against both for the satisfaction of the debt; and if the creditor has reduced his claim against the primary debtor to judgment, equity will not enjoin process to enforce the judgment at the instance of such debtor on the ground that the creditor is also pursuing the surety and has seized a fund, which is in litigation, belonging to the surety; but the creditor can have only one satisfaction.

5. Conceding a statute of a state exempting railroad companies from their due proportion of taxation to be unconstitutional, the omission, pursuant to such statute, to tax the property of railroad companies the same as that of individuals, does not render void a tax levied upon the property of others which is liable to taxation; and hence the owner of property properly assessed cannot, on the ground that other property subject to taxation is omitted to be assessed, enjoin the collection of taxes against his own property.

6. Where a state constitution requires all general laws to be uniform in their operation; and all laws for the assessment and collection of taxes to be general and of uniform operation throughout the state, and that the property of all corporations shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals, quere whether it is competent for the legislature to tax railway corporations on their earnings, while the bulk of the other property in the state is taxed upon its value?

7. Gilman v. Sheboygan, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 510, commented on by Mr. Justice Miller, and the statute in question in that case distinguished.

[8. Cited in Furbush v. Collingwood, 13 R. I. 723, to the point that fraud, as a ground for enjoining or setting aside a judgment, is not mere falsity of claim or proof, but fraud outside of them, perpetrated by some artifice or contrivance of the party or person benefited, or by collusion, whereby in the course of the trial, or in entering judgment, the injured party or the court has been imposed upon or betrayed into inattention, and deceived.]

In the three causes above entitled [the city of Muscatine against the Mississippi & Missouri Railroad Company and others, County of Muscatine against same, and Letz and others against G. W. Clark, United States marshal, and others], application at chambers was made by the complainants to Mr. Justice MILLER, one of the judges of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Iowa, for writs of injunction to restrain further proceedings to collect taxes to pay certain judgments severally rendered against the city of Muscatine, against the county of Muscatine, and against the county of Louisa.

These judgments were rendered against the afore-mentioned public corporations by the United States circuit court for the district of Iowa, upon coupons attached to what are known as railroad bonds, that is, bonds issued by these corporations in payment for their subscription to the capital stock of certain railway companies.

At the May term, 1870, of the said circuit court, on a showing made to it, the court (Dillon, Circuit Judge, and Love, District Judge, being present), entered an order appointing the marshal to collect the taxes to pay certain judgments against various counties, and, among others, against the said county of Louisa, and that officer entered upon the execution of this duty in the county last named, and it was for this reason that the marshal was made a defendant in the bill filed by Letz and other tax payers of that county.

The facts respecting the Mark Howard Case, mentioned in the opinion, are briefly these: The city and county of Muscatine severally issued their bonds in payment for their subscription to the stock of the M. & M. R. R. Co. (made a defendant in the bills of complaint), and by virtue thereof became stockholders in said railroad corporation. These bonds, the said railroad corporation guaranteed before they negotiated them, so that a holder thereof had the liability of the city and county as principal debtors, and the railroad company as guarantors. All of the property and franchises of this railroad corporation were subsequently sold on a decree foreclosing a mortgage thereon, and there was a surplus which would belong to the stockholders, and among other stockholders to the city and county of Muscatine; but before it came into their hands it was seized by proper process to answer these judgments against the city and county. That fund is still in the hands of the receiver, and the litigation in respect thereto is yet undetermined.

Concerning the constitutional question referred to in the opinion, it may be here mentioned that the constitution of Iowa contains the following provisions. Article 1, § 6: "All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." Article 3, § 29: "The general assembly shall not pass local or special laws in the following cases: For the assessment and collection of taxes for state, county, or road purposes; * * * and all such laws shall be general, and of uniform operation throughout the state." Article 7, § 7: "Every law which imposes, continues, or revives a tax, shall distinctly state the tax and the object to which it is to be applied; and it shall not be sufficient to refer to any other law to fix such tax or object." Article 8, § 2: "The property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be subject to taxation, the same as that of individuals."

A statute of the state of Iowa, general in the sense that it applies to all railroad corporations, and not specially to any one of them, provides that they shall pay into the state treasury as taxes one per cent. each year of their gross receipts in lieu of all taxes. Acts 1862, p. 227; and see Acts 1870, p. 109.

The provision of the constitution of the state of Wisconsin referred to in the opinion, is in these words, article 8, § 1: "The rule of taxation shall be uniform, and taxes shall be levied upon such property as the legislature shall prescribe."

The opinion of Mr. Justice MILLER was pronounced orally, and, in substance, as below given.

D. C. Cloud, for the motion.

Grant & Smith, contra.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. These are applications to me as a judge of the supreme court and of the circuit court of the United States, for the district of Iowa, for injunctions to restrain further proceedings in the collection of certain taxes which have been assessed against citizens of the counties mentioned and of the city of Muscatine. These taxes have been levied and are in process of collection in pursuance of writs of mandamus from the circuit court for the payment of numerous judgments against the city and the two counties aforesaid.

A bill of complaint in each case has been filed, and the answers, though not filed, are before me and sworn to, and are supported by affidavits. These will be sent to the clerk by me, to be filed with the bills of complaint.

The bills in the cases of the city and county of Muscatine seek relief upon substantially the same grounds, and will be considered together. These grounds are:

(1) That the bonds on which the judgments are founded, and for the payment of which the taxes are levied, were without consideration, and obtained by fraud. (2) That the judgments are for more than they ought to be. (3) That the judgment creditors have a decree for funds now in the hands of the receiver of the circuit court, on account of the same debt for which the taxes are levied.

In regard to the first ground of relief, it may very well be doubted whether the bill shows any fraud or failure of consideration which should be a defence to the bonds either in law or equity. When the allegations are examined closely they seem to amount to more than a failure of the railroad company to which the bonds were first issued, to comply with certain promises made at the time of the transaction.

If, however, they could be held sufficient as allegations of fraud or failure of consideration, there are two very sufficient answers to them in this application.

1. They are no defence to the bonds in the hands of innocent holders.

2. They were proper defences, if good at all, to the action in which the judgments were rendered, and cannot be set up against the enforcement of these judgments now.

3. The judgments as to which these injunctions are sought are numerous, and the plaintiffs in them are different persons in most of the cases. The bill alleges that in some of these judgments, without specifying which, the amounts are too large. That is shown by the absence of coupons from the clerk's office in which the judgments are found, and that a rate of interest too large was calculated in some cases. The judgments in which these supposed mistakes were made are not specified. Indeed the complainants say they have no means of determining in which of the judgments the mistakes were made, but they arrive at the conclusion that judgments on the whole have been rendered for more than the corporations were liable in these suits, by a conjectural calculation based on the coupons not sued on and the amount originally issued.

A court of chancery can hardly be expected to restrain the collection of the judgment of A B, because there is error in the judgment of C D, nor can the force of this proposition be avoided, by alleging that there is error in the judgment of A B or C D, and therefore both of them shall be enjoined. Besides, as the only error worth notice is one of clerical mistake, and one which never could have been made without gross carelessness on the part of the complainants in this suit, the only remedy is to apply to the court to correct the calculations. The absence of the coupons for which the judgment was rendered from the clerk's office cannot be assumed to imply that they were not present when the judgment was rendered, though it is certainly true that they should then have been cancelled and filed.

4. In regard to the funds in the hands of the receiver in the Mark Howard Case, it is certainly true that when paid to the judgment creditors it will operate as a discharge of so much of the judgments on which the tax proceedings are based as those creditors shall receive on account of these judgments. The fund is one which was designed to go to the county and city, as well as other stockholders in the railroad company. Before it came to their hands it was seized and held to answer these judgments against the city and county, and if appropriated to that purpose pays so much of that debt. But the judgment creditors have not received that fund as yet. It is still in litigation. They are pursuing their remedy against it, as also against the city and county at the same time. This they have an undoubted right to do, and especially against the latter, as they are the primary obligors. It is also provided in the decree that when the debt is paid the city and county shall be subrogated to all the rights of these judgment creditors in regard thereto.

The right of the creditor to pursue his remedy in each case until satisfaction of his debt, is clear upon all the authorities, and no harm can come to the present complainants from this course, as upon payment from either fund, whether complete or partial, on application to the circuit court the judgment creditors will be restrained from any further use of their judgments or decrees to the prejudice of these complainants. It is proper to add that the portion of this fund which any of these creditors may receive can in no case exceed one-sixth of the amount of the judgments which they are seeking to collect of the city and county.

In the case of the citizens of Louisa county the usual allegations of fraud in obtaining the bonds by the parties to whom they were originally issued, are made. This is concluded by the judgment on those bonds. It is further alleged that Fellows, the principal judgment creditor, bought his bonds after the courts of Iowa had judicially held them void. This defense cannot now be set up against the judgment. This allegation is expressly denied in the answer, and this is supported by the affidavit of a witness, who says he knows Fellows purchased before such a decision was made. It is further alleged that two railroad corporations have in Louisa county a large amount of valuable property amounting to one-fourth of the taxable property within the county, which is not assessed by the officers who are collecting this tax; although by law it is liable to its share of the tax.

As the tax complained of is being collected under the order of the federal court, and as the evident tendency of all that has been said by the supreme court in regard to these corporation debts, implies that no interference by state courts will be permitted in enforcing the tax, the statement here made presents a very grave question for the consideration of the court which is collecting the tax by its agents. I have had more difficulty on this point than on any which has been presented in these applications.

A statute of Iowa exempts railroad property from all other taxes except one per cent per annum paid into the state treasury. The constitution of the state declares that all taxation shall be uniform. Whether this constitutional provision (the exact terms of which I have not attempted to state) renders the statute void, is a question upon which the supreme court of this state has twice, as I am informed, been equally divided. If the question was presented to the circuit court by way of supervisory control over the officers, who, under its command, are collecting this tax, whether this railroad property should be assessed the same as other property, I confess I do not see how it could avoid deciding it. But, instead of an order to assess the property, I am asked to declare all other assessments void, because it is not assessed. This, it will be seen, is a very different question; and it is clear that I can only enjoin its collection on the ground that it is void. The case of Gilman v. Sheboygan, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 510, is relied on as authority for the latter proposition. In that case, after the city of Sheboygan had issued bonds in aid of a railroad, the legislature of that state passed an act, declaring that the tax to pay these bonds should be assessed exclusively on the real estate of the city. The constitution of Wisconsin has a provision similar to the one referred to in the constitution of Iowa, and the supreme court of the United States held that this attempt to make a part only of the taxable property of the city responsible for this particular debt, was a violation of the constitution which rendered the tax levied under that statute void.

In the case before us there is no attempt to render any species of property liable to taxation for any specific debt, or class of debts, but an exemption of the railroad from all other burdens, in consideration of a definite sum, which may be more or less than its share of such burden. Whether this exemption be forbidden by the constitution or not,

I am quite clear that it does not render void the tax which is levied upon other property.

The case of Gilman v. Sheboygan does not go so far as this, either in the facts on which it is grounded or the reasons by which the judgment was sustained. There is a manifest difference between an attempt to impose the entire burden of a debt already incurred by a municipality, upon a particular species of property, and the attempt to exempt a species of property from all other taxation, in consideration of a sum supposed to be its just share of the general public burden.

It is not inappropriate to look to the consequences of holding that this failure to assess the railroads renders all other tax void. It applies to the tax assessed for all other purposes as well as this tax. Every non-resident holder of property in the state could apply to me and insist on an injunction against the tax on his property. And if the state judges believe it to be void, they would be bound on the same principle to suspend the collection of all taxes throughout the entire state. A proposition which leads inevitably to such a result cannot be sound. I cannot therefore grant an injunction on this ground, whether the railroad property is liable to taxation or not. It is alleged that the officers are collecting the penalties for failure to pay the tax, according to this law as it stood before the act of last winter, which provides that only seven per cent should be collected in this class of cases.

Whether this is right or not, I do not pretend to decide. It is matter for application to the court for direction, and I am informed that the course pursued is one prescribed by the court at its last term. It is clearly no foundation for an injunction.

Injunction denied.

NOTE. After this decision, denying the injunction, upon assurances given to the circuit judge, by the county authorities, that if the marshal were withdrawn, they would proceed to collect taxes to pay the judgments, the execution of the order appointing the marshal was suspended, and the required taxes were collected by the county officers.

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. 1882.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—NEGLIGENCE—EMISSION OF SPARKS FROM LOCOMOTIVE.

[1. The mere fact that a spark from a locomotive enters the window of a building and sets it on fire does not render the railroad company liable for the damage; but plaintiffs must prove that the company was negligent in the use of its engine.]

[2. The company is liable only in case it fails, in using its engines, to use the diligence which good specialists in this department are accustomed to exercise.]

This is a petition in the suit of Skiddy, Barlow & Duncan, Trustees, v. The Atlantic, Mississippi & Ohio Railroad Company, claiming the payment of about $1524, for alleged damages to the petitioners from fire, alleged to have been caused by live sparks emitted from one of the locomotive engines of the receivers, drawing a freight train, in passing near a shop building in the town of Abingdon, owned by [J. M.] Musselwhite, which, with its contents, some of which belonged to the other petitioners, were burnt and destroyed on the afternoon of the 7th November, 1879. The shop was distant some forty yards from the railroad track on the north, and fronted south to the railroad. The fire began in the upper story of the shop, inside, in the end of that story next the railroad near two windows, both of which were closed at the time; but a pane of glass in one of the windows was broken, and a third to a half of it had fallen out of place. The fire occurred about five minutes after the train passed, and about half an hour after two workmen who had been upstairs in the shop had left the building. There was no fire burning in the stove in the building at the time, and had not been that day. No one was in the building when the fire began, and it was locked. When the building was broken into and the fire seen by the first person who reached the upper story, the fire was burning on the floor in the southeast end of the building near the window with the broken pane, and was running up the legs of the benches and up standing pieces of lumber, and blazing in lumber overhead on the ceiling joists. There was an engine house one story high adjoining the building on the east side, which was consumed by the fire. The wind was from the direction of the railroad towards the buildings; but was light, it being a matter of doubt with many, what its direction was. The afternoon was very dark and cloudy; the atmosphere damp and heavy; the clouds low and thick. Witnesses testify to seeing dense smoke issuing from the engine; some of them testify to seeing sparks in the clouds of smoke; others say nothing of sparks, though they testify to the smoke. One witness testifies to seeing these sparks from a distance of three hundred yards off: but claims that he is exceptionally far-sighted. Another witness, who was the driver of a team of horses which was standing not far from the shop and about thirty yards from the railroad, testifies, that the sparks were so large or fervid that they burnt the hair of ("swinged") his horses.

One witness says the alarm of fire was within four or five minutes after the passage of the freight trains; another says it was five minutes. Witnesses who were at a distance say the alarm of fire reached them within ten minutes after the trains went by. Testimony is given estimating the damages by loss of the buildings at $505; by destruction of lumber in the building, engine and implements at $734; and by destruction of tools, $102, in all $1511.

On the part of the defense, a paper is filed by which counsel for petitioners "admits that the receivers can prove that they used the most improved appliances to prevent the escape of sparks from their locomotives at the time of the fire, which is the subject of the investigation in this cause." Such is the substance of the evidence.

HUGHES, District Judge I have little to remark on the evidence. I must express a doubt whether the statement of McCannahan is not an afterthought, not only as to the sparks themselves, but as to the "swingeing" they are alleged to have inflicted on his horses; and it is also rather difficult to think that Midkiff does not exaggerate a little when he testifies to seeing sparks three hundred yards off which Henry Johnson could not see as near as ten yards; although he claims to be exceptionally far-sighted. A doubt occurs, also, whether the shower of sparks not seen at all by some witnesses, but seen so vividly by others to fall upon the buildings, should have ignited nothing in or near it on the outside; but should have confined their operations to what could be effected inside, by entering a very small aperture through a part of the space of a pane of glass, the only open space in that part of the building.

A doubt also arises whether a fire communicated by a single spark could in five minutes have produced the cloud of smoke that was seen pouring out of the eaves of the building, of which there was an alarm over the town in ten minutes. I think the evidence is inconclusive. It is only circumstantial; and the soundest test of the validity of that sort of evidence is, that no other theory but the hypothesis on which the conclusion is based, can be formed. Are there not many ways of accounting for a fire in a carpenter's shop attached to an engine house, full of combustible material, with a stove in it, frequented by workmen who smoke pipes or cigars and carry matches, than by supposing it was burnt by a spark from an engine forty yards off that could not have entered the building at all except through a single aperture in the window of the upper story? I do not think the evidence taken and submitted by petitioners (the defendants not appearing and waiving cross-examination) is conclusive of the fact that the shop and contents were burned by fire from a spark getting in at that broken pane of that shop window.

But I do not base my ruling in this case on the inconclusive character of the evidence. The law applicable to all such cases must govern in the decision of this. The petitioners would not be entitled to damages from the mere fact, if it were a fact, that a spark from the defendant's engine, by entering the building, caused the fire which consumed it. It is necessary to their case that the defendants should have been guilty of negligence in the use of their engine, and for the petitioners to prove that they were. The law as to railroads is, that when a railroad company is chartered with a right to propel its trains by steam engines, then the company is liable only in case, in using its engines, it fails in the diligence which "good specialists" in this department are accustomed to exercise. As to "good specialists," see Whart. Neg. §§ 635 and 872, and cases there cited. The emission of sparks from the engine is not negligence; unless the sparks were negligently emitted. See Vaughan v. Railroad, 3 Hurl. & N. 685; Whart. Neg. § 869.

The authorities on this point are so numerous that it would be a useless burden to cite them. The trains in this case were running lawfully over the company's property; they were running under powers granted by the legislature to the company. Running thus, they are not responsible for fires arising from sparks proceeding from their own engines, unless it is proved that the emission of the sparks was due to negligence on the part of the defendants, either in using engines improperly equipped and furnished; or in using properly furnished engines in some negligent manner. Such negligence is not even charged in the petition. Though the burden is on the petitioners to prove it, no evidence is offered on that point. Being neither charged nor proved, there is no case made or shown for damages. The petition must be dismissed with costs.

MUSSER v. CURRY.

[3 Wash. C. C. 481.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1819.

WILLS — IN PENNSYLVANIA — PROBATE — BEFORE WHOM HAD—RE-PUBLICATION—WHAT PROOF NECESSARY.

1. By the laws of Pennsylvania, the register of wills is authorized to take the probate of wills, copies of which, with the wills, under his seal, are declared to be matters of record and good evidence.

2. This authority extends to re-published wills and codicils, which, in reference to after acquired lands, are as new wills.

[Cited in Harvey v. Chouteau, 14 Mo. (594) 416; Newton v. Seaman's Friend Soc., 130 Mass. 97; Shield's Appeal, 20 Pa. St. 295.]

3. The same evidence is necessary to prove a re-publication, as a publication; and proof of such re-publication by one witness, will not be sufficient.

The plaintiff [the lessee of Musser] claimed as heir at law of John E. Allen, and fully established his title as such. The defendant was the husband of Susanna Allen, the natural daughter of John E. Allen, and claimed the property in dispute, under the will of Allen, as tenant by the courtesy; his wife, and the child he had by her, being dead. It was conceded, by the plaintiff's counsel, that the clause in the will, under which the defendant claimed, passed to his late wife an estate of inheritance; but it was denied that the will operated on the property in question, as it was acquired after the will was made. The date of the will is in the year 1805; and the property in dispute was conveyed to the testator on the 13th of June, 1812. The defendant insisted, that the will was re-published after the above period, and this was the turning point of the cause. The will was proved by two of the subscribing witnesses, on the 28th of August, 1813, before the register of wills, and certified accordingly. On the 10th of November of the same year, one of the witnesses made oath, before the same officer, that the testator had, on the 23d of August, 1813, re-published his will in his presence, at which time he was of sound and disposing mind and memory. Evidence having been given of the death of this witness, the defendant offered to prove his signature to the oath endorsed on the will, and certified by the register, which was opposed by the plaintiff's counsel, on the ground that the register has no power to receive the probate of a re-publication, but that, having once received the proof of publication, he was functus officio, and his certificate of subsequent proof of re-publication, was no more than the certificate of any other person, and consequently inadmissible as evidence.

Peters & Newcomb, for plaintiff.

J. R. Ingersoll, for defendant.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The register is authorized, by the law of Pennsylvania, to receive the probate of wills; and copies of such wills and probates, under the public seals of the courts, or offices, where the same shall have been taken, or granted, if in force, are declared to be matters of record, and good evidence to prove the devise thereby made. The authority of the register being general to take the probate of wills, extends as well to the re-publication as to the publication of a will. The will, in relation to after acquired property, is a new will, by virtue of the re-publication; and the probate belongs to the register, under the literal expressions of the law, as well as under its plain and obvious meaning. For, if on account of the want of a court of chancery, to perpetuate the testimony of the witnesses to a will, or for any other cause, the probate of the will before the register was to be received as evidence of the devise of land, the same reason would seem to have required, that the re-publication should be proved in the same way. A codicil amounts to a re-publication; and there can be no doubt, but that the register, having received probate of the will, may afterwards receive probate of the codicil, which does not differ materially from the present case. But the same evidence is necessary to prove a re-publication, as the publication. The proof before the register was only that of one witness, which is not sufficient, without further evidence, to establish the re-publication.

The defendant then examined two others of the witnesses to the will, to show that the will was re-published subsequent to the 13th of June, 1812. The credit of one of these witnesses was powerfully attacked; and some degree of uncertainty, as to the time of re-publication, accompanied the evidence of the other.

THE COURT stated to the jury, that the cause turned altogether on the fact, whether the will was re-published after the 13th of June, 1812, or not; and left it to them to weigh the credit of the witnesses, and to find their verdict according to the conclusion they might come to as to that fact.

Verdict for plaintiff.

MUTUAL BENEFIT LIFE INS. CO. v. CHARLES.

[4 Ins. Law J. 265.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Feb. 27, 1875.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—INSURANCE AGENCY CONTRACT—CONTINUING INTEREST.

The defendant, an agent of the company, purchased the business of two local agents, with the acquiescence of the company, and continued to collect the premiums and reserve his commissions. He was subsequently appointed general agent for the state. The warrant appointing him to this position provided that "no commission can be claimed by any person whose agency has been discontinued;" also, "the right to discontinue any agent or agency at any and all times is reserved." In a memorandum bearing even date and evidently intended to be part of the contract, it is provided that "business obtained previously to date hereof shall stand on same basis as heretofore." The testimony tended to show that the basis of such previous contracts were the same as the present, except as to the rate of commission. Afterward the company abolished its state agency and proposed to allow the defendant to appoint local agents, and make his own bargains with them for the transfer of his interest. The defendant claimed that by an understanding with the company, he was entitled to a life interest in the business which he had purchased, and that which he had worked up, which the company denied. Held, that the agent had no continuing interest in the business after the discontinuance of the agency. In the absence of proof of such continuing interest in the business previously purchased, the memorandum must be construed as referring simply to the rate of commissions during the existence of the agency. The offer to treat with him on the basis of a continuing interest, was of the nature of an amicable settlement, not the concession of a right. No such continuing right can be raised by implication or usage. The defendant is ordered to account for and pay over to defendant all money in his hands as agent, and surrender all books and papers.

At law.

Hitchcock & Dupee, for complainant.

Thomas J. Turner and F. W. S. Brawley, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The bill in this case charges in substance that on the 1st of April, 1870, complainant appointed the defendant, William Charles, its agent for the state of Illinois, and that said Charles continued to act as such agent in the management and prosecution of the business of the complainant in this state until the 13th day of Sept., 1873, when he was removed from such agency. Demand was made on Charles to account for and pay over to the company all money in his hands as such agent. At the time of being so removed Charles had in his hands the sum of $16,000 belonging to the company, which he refused to pay over to them. To this bill defendant filed an answer, and also a cross-bill in both of which he alleged in substance that he went into the employment of the complainant as an agent in 1863, acting in a general way all over the state; that in 1868 he bought the interest of one Oviatt, a local agent, in the business of the company, for which he paid $7,000, with the consent and knowledge of the company, which sum, he avers, he was induced to pay from an understanding between himself and the company that he was thereby securing to himself a life interest in the business of said company in the hands of Oviatt, which was the collection of renewed premiums on policies which had been placed by Oviatt. In like manner he afterward paid to G. R. Clarke, the agent of said company at Chicago, the sum of $4,000 for Clarke's interest in the business of the company, and on the 1st day of April, 1870, he was appointed the general agent of the company for the entire state of Illinois. He continued to act as such agent until some time in the spring of 1873, when the company changed its plan of doing business, and adopted a system of appointing local agents, each reporting to the home office instead of to the general agent for the state. He was dissatisfied with this change, and refused to act as special agent, and a difficulty then arose between himself and the company in regard to the amount he was entitled to claim from them; he insisting that he was entitled to the commuted value of all the business he had himself worked up, as well as that he had purchased from Oviatt and Clarke—that is to say the right to collect during his life the renewal premiums on the business which he had organized and purchased, and retain his commissions therefrom. The complainant, by its answer to the cross-bill, denies that it ever made any contract with Charles entitling him to any commissions except so long as he should continue to be the agent of the company, and insisting that by the terms of the contract appointing Charles its agent the right of removal was reserved. His agency had ceased, and his right to commissions had therefore ceased, so that there was no interest to commute or settle.

The warrant or letter appointing Mr.

Charles the agent of the company for this state, provides (section 11): "You will be allowed 15 per cent. commission on the cash paid on the first year's premiums on all policies procured by you; 5 per cent. commission on cash collected and remitted for renewal premiums on such policies. No commission is allowed on premium loans or interest collected, or on dividends or losses paid. No premium can be collected and no commission can be claimed by any person whose agency has been discontinued." Section 16 provides, "The right to discontinue any agent or agency at any and all times is reserved." And by a memorandum signed by the president of the company, bearing date the same day as his appointment, and evidently intended to be part of the contract it is stipulated among other things, that "business obtained previously to date hereof shall stand on same basis as heretofore." What were the specific terms of the former contracts by which Charles acted as agent of the company prior to April 1, 1870, is not shown by the proof,—Charles insisting that his copies were destroyed in the fire of Oct. 9, 1871,—but what testimony there is tends to show that the contract was substantially the same as that of 1870, with the exception that the commissions were somewhat higher.

It is conceded that after Mr. Charles purchased the interest of Oviatt and Clarke, he continued to collect the renewal premiums on the policies placed by them respectively, and to retain his commissions therefor. It is also conceded that, when the company decided to discontinue the state agency, the officers proposed to allow Charles to name the local agents, and to make such bargains as he could with them for the transfer of his interest in the business for their respective localities.

Upon this testimony the question is, does it appear that Mr. Charles had any continuing interest in the business of the company originated or purchased by him after he ceased to be the company's agent? In other words, was he entitled either to continue to collect the renewal premiums on his old business, and retain his commissions for so doing, or if the company withdrew those collections from him, was he entitled to the commuted value of the business? The contract in unambiguous terms says: "No premiums can be collected and no commission can be claimed by any person whose agency has been discontinued," and the right to discontinue any agent or agency is at all times reserved by the company. Clearly, then, there is no right in Charles to continue to collect the renewal premiums. Much stress is laid on the memorandum made at the same time with the appointment which provides, that "all business obtained previously shall stand on the same basis as heretofore," and, if the proofs showed that there was a continuing life right to commissions or renewals on the business "previously obtained," this memorandum would show that this right continued. But I think that the fair construction of this memorandum is that it applies to the rate of commissions on such business during the time Charles remained agent. Manifestly the legal effect of the contract of April 1, 1870, is to give the company the right of removal of any agent at pleasure, and to prohibit his collection of premiums after such removal, and, to my mind, the memorandum or supplementary contract does not change any original contract in that regard. It does appear that after the decision to vacate the state agency had been arrived at, negotiations were had between Mr. Charles and the company with a view of adjusting and settling his interest in the business, and that at least one of the officers—Chancellor Dodd—seemed to treat with him on the basis that he had a continuing interest, but I think that was done more for the purpose of obtaining an amicable settlement than as a concession that his contract gave him such right. The company naturally wished to avoid an open rupture with an agent, so influential and active as Mr. Charles was and had been, and probably considered the propriety of allowing something of his claim to avoid difficulty, and also was willing to concede something to him from the fact that his salary had in a certain sense terminated without fault of his, but solely from a change of policy on the part of the company. The case of Partridge v. Insurance Co., 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 513, is in point on the question that there can be no continuing right in the business raised by implication or usage. The cross-bill is therefore dismissed, and the defendant ordered to account for and pay over to complainant the money in his hands and surrender all books and papers.

In re MUTUAL BUILDING FUND SOC. & DOLLAR SAV. BANK.

Ex parte BEATTY.

[2 Hughes, 374; [1] 15 N. B. R. 44; 5 Am. Law Rec. 571.]

District Court, E. D. Virginia. Dec. 19, 1876.

BANKRUPTCY—BANK DEPOSITS — NEW ACCOUNT—SPECIAL FUND—PREFERENCE—LIEN.

Where a bank, which had suspended payments, advertised that it would on a certain day "resume business by receiving special separate deposits in trust to new account, pledging the bank to use these deposits only in payment of checks against that new account, and as fast as the bank can collect and realize from the loans and securities to pay pro rata instalments of its present indebtedness," etc., etc., and received new deposits, and soon after finally failed, and was adjudicated in involuntary bankruptcy: Held (on petition of a new depositor to be paid in full as a preferred creditor), that the new deposits were not special deposits; that no lien was secured when they were paid in over the counter of the bank; that no preference was secured by the advertisement, and that the new depositors were general creditors to be paid pro rata.

This savings bank suspended payments over its counter on the 23d of September, 1873, a day memorable among bankers. Its managers, in the belief that the failure would be temporary, invited, a few days after, new deposits by means of and as described in the following advertisement, which they published in the Richmond newspapers:

"Dollar Savings Bank.—This bank will resume business on Monday, October 6th, as per resolution herewith adopted by the board of directors: 'Resolved, that this bank resume business on Monday, October 6th, by receiving special separate deposits in trust to new account, pledging the bank to use the deposits only in payment of checks against that new account, and, as fast as the bank can collect and realize from the loans and securities, to pay pro rata instalments on its present indebtedness until the whole shall be liquidated, the same drawing the usual interest as heretofore until paid.' (Signed) John E. Bossieux. Thomas S. Armistead, Cashier. Oct. 3—3 times."

Deposits were made under this call, by a few men, one of whom was this petitioner; but the bank very soon found itself unable to go on, and closed its doors. In February, 1874, proceedings were taken against it by creditors, and it was duly adjudicated an involuntary bankrupt in this court. There is no evidence that the new deposits were marked and kept separate, as special deposits, and the fact seems to be that they were received over the counter in the same manner as general deposits are received. Indeed, the advertisement itself virtually announced that the new deposits would be treated as a common fund as to the new depositors, and not treated as special separate deposits, except as against the old depositors. A dividend has been declared and paid, without prejudice to the claim of the petitioner, John Beatty, and of the other depositors under the advertisement of October 3d, 1873, to be paid in full, according to the tenor of the advertisement, as preferred creditors.

John B. Young and Holliday & Holliday, for petitioner.

James Neeson, for the trustees in bankruptcy of the assets of the bank.

HUGHES, District Judge. It is claimed on the part of the petitioner that his deposit, under the advertisement of the 3d October, was a special deposit, and that the advertisement was a contract which this court is bound ex aequo et bono to specifically execute, as a court of equity. I do not concur in either of these propositions.

First. The deposit of the petitioner was not a special deposit; for it is only where the special money or thing deposited is received by the bank to be kept to itself and returned in corpore on demand, that the deposit can be claimed to be special. True, the advertisement held out that the bank would receive "special separate deposits;" but calling a thing what it is not does not make it what it is not.

Second. It is claimed for the petitioner that he has a higher equity than the former depositors of the bank, created and given by the advertisement of the 3d October. I do not think so. The former depositors made their deposits on precisely the same terms, in all essential respects (save one), as those on which the petitioner made his deposit; those terms being implied in their case, while in his they were expressed.

In the exceptional respect to which I allude, the case of the petitioner is weaker in point of equity than that of the former depositors. The contract under the advertisement was, virtually, that all the existing resources of the bank as well as the new deposits would be first used for paying the checks of the new depositors. The bank proposed to go on with its banking business; and the new deposits were of course intended to be used for the purpose of making new discounts in the regular course of that banking business. As the new deposits were to be loaned out for this purpose, the checks of the new depositors would have to be paid in whole or in part from the moneys taken in on notes already discounted and which would be falling due. The advertisement of October 3d was virtually a promise to use the funds collected on maturing paper in paying the checks of the new depositors; that is to say, the contract required money belonging ex aequo et bono to the old depositors to be paid to the new depositors. I think such a contract, so far as it was to operate in that way, was ultra vires. The bank had no power to make it; and the contract when made was contrary to equity, and, so far as it had the unjust operation described, ought not to be enforced in equity.

But even if it were a contract free from the two objections of being illegal and contrary to equity, and were such a contract as a court of equity dealing with solvent parties should specifically execute, still this court, as a court of bankruptcy, would be unable to decree a specific performance. In its nature this court has little to do with the specific execution of contracts. It has to deal with bankrupts who have broken all contracts, and are unable to perform any of them. It is a court whose primary duty is the distribution of assets gathered from the wreck of the estates of bankrupts, who themselves have already exhausted them of every resource available for the execution of contracts. The policy of the law under which the court acts is to avoid preferences, and to divide the assets pro rata, share and share alike, among creditors. The business of the court in this case is to distribute assets under the terms of a law which, except in favor of liens, requires a pro rata distribution.

If the new deposits which have been spoken of had in fact been special deposits, duly earmarked and set aside and held as such, the bank would have been a simple bailee of them and would have been obliged to return them in kind. But it is precisely because they were not special deposits, were not duly earmarked and set aside and held in kind, that a return of them cannot be decreed to the new depositors. No principle has been more thoroughly settled than the one that deposits of money paid into a bank over the counter are not received by the bank as a bailee, the property in them remaining in the depositors; but that they become the property of the bank, which itself thereby becomes the debtor of the depositors.

This bank, therefore, having become the debtor of Mr. Beatty and of the new depositors, and having gone into bankruptcy, and the new deposits having been paid into it over the counter, no pains having been taken to separate them from other moneys or to preserve their identity, it follows that no lien was preserved at the time of the deposits, that no legal preference could therefore arise under the advertisement of 3d October, 1873, and that the petitioner stands in this court only on the footing of a general creditor. I will sign an order dismissing the petition with costs.

Case No. 9,977.

MUTUAL BUILDING FUND SOC. & DOLLAR SAV. BANK v. BOSSIEUX et al.

[1 Hughes, 386.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Virginia. May, 1877.

RULES OF COURT—UPON WHOM BINDING—FOLLOWING STATE PRACTICE—DISCRETIONARY POWER OF FEDERAL COURTS.

1. A rule of practice prescribed by a court of justice, is for the government of suitors, counsel, and officers of the court in the conduct of causes and proceedings; and though it controls these persons, it does not control the discretion of the court itself so as to deprive it of power to secure the trial of causes on their merits, on proper showing.

2. An act of the legislature which takes away this discretion from a court, and deprives it of this power, is more than a rule of practice, and affects the common law right of suitors to sue in the courts.

3. Section 914 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, requiring the United States courts to conform their practice as near as may be to the practice obtaining in the courts of the several states in which they are held, contemplates only those rules of practice which are merely such, and does not contemplate those enactments of state legislation relating to practice in the courts which deprive them of power to control the application of rules of practice according to their discretion.

4. The discretionary power of United States courts held in Virginia over proceedings at rules, is not limited by sections 2 and 52 of the 167th chapter of the Code of Virginia of 1873, pp. 1089 and 1097.

In these suits [against E. Bossieux & Bro. and other defendants] an order was made on the first day (2d April) of the present term of the court, directing that these causes be reinstated on the rule docket. They appeared from the record to have been dismissed from that docket at the July rules, 1876, for want of declarations. Motion is now made (17th May, 1877, of the same term of the court) to set aside the order of the 2d April, on the ground that the motion to reinstate ought to have been made at the regular October term of 1876, and is now too late. Although the declarations were filed at the adjourned term of the court, held next after the July rules, 1876, at which the suits had been dismissed for want of declarations, it seems that the clerk did not make up the causes for the docket of the October term, and that the counsel of plaintiffs were not aware of that fact until shortly before the April term, 1877, when they promptly moved that the causes should be reinstated at rules. Counsel for defence, in moving to set aside and annul the order of April 2d, rely upon sections 2 and 52 of chapter 167 of the Virginia Code of 1873. Counsel for plaintiffs rely upon Nudd v. Burrows, 91 U. S. 426; Indiana & St. L. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291; The Palmyra, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 1; Sibbald v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 488; Harris v. Hordman, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 334; and Bank v. Wistar, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 431.

James Neeson and Thomas G. Jackson, for plaintiffs.

John A. Meredith, for defendants.

HUGHES, District Judge. These were suits at common law, and were brought to March rules, 1876, when they were each "continued for declaration." At the April, May, and June rules, they were "continued for declaration." At July rules they were dismissed for want of declaration, on the 31st of July, 1876, and on August 2d, 1876, the declarations were filed, the court being then in session. Although the declarations were marked as filed, they do not purport to have been filed by leave of court. It is sufficient to conceive how they could have been filed after dismissal of the suits, except by leave of court, given on application of the counsel for plaintiffs (himself one of the plaintiffs), who, as we all know, had been in a protracted illness. I conclude that such leave was given, and will deny the motion now made on that ground, but I would deny it on other grounds.

Section 918 of the United States Revised Statutes gives the United States courts authority to adopt rules and orders, directing (among other things) the taking rules, and making and entering up of judgments by default in vacation, and otherwise regulating their own practice. And section 914 requires that the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding in common law suits, shall be conformed by the United States courts, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, and forms and rules of proceeding existing in like causes in state courts of record. Since 1872 this court has not, under section 918, adopted rules of practice conforming its own practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding to those of the state court. But section 914 is itself a general direction and authority on this subject, rendering any express adoption of rules of practice prevailing in the state courts unnecessary by this court. The Code of Virginia (page 1089, c. 167, § 6), requires the clerk to enter at rules a dismissal of any suit in which, after the lapse of three months after the defendant has been summoned, though he has not appeared, the declaration or bill has not been filed. And the same chapter of the Code (page 1097, § 52) gives control to the court at its next term, over all proceedings in its clerk's office, during the preceding vacation, with power to reinstate any cause discontinued during such vacation, to set aside any proceedings at rules, correct any mistake therein, and make any order concerning the same that may be just. The question is, whether these two sections of the laws of Virginia, operating together, are not more than rules of practice, and such as would take away from the United States courts that discretionary power over the proceedings of its officers which they have been decided to possess by the supreme court in the cases cited by plaintiff's counsel. Section 2 of this chapter of the Code, it will be observed, is more than a rule of practice, intended to govern the officers of court. It is a rule depriving a citizen of a right enjoyed before this law was enacted. It is, therefore, when enforced, in conjunction with section 52, a rule of right, and seemed to have been relied upon as such by the defendant's counsel in argument. It may be said of every rule merely of practice, that it is for the government of the officers of court, and does not deprive a court of its discretion to modify the application of it for sufficient cause. Any law which takes away that discretion from the court ceases thereby to be a mere rule of practice. Though the plaintiff and his attorney (as in the cases at bar) may be prevented by unavoidable accident from filing their declaration within three months, this section of the Virginia Code requires that suit shall be dismissed at rule, and if not reinstated at the next term of court, makes dismissal final. Having been dismissed by the clerk, section 52, of the same law, authorizes the court at its next term to reinstate the cause; but does not in terms prohibit the court from doing so at any subsequent term upon a proper showing. Now if this last section of the law be held by the state courts, as I believe they do, to be a statute of limitation, stringent in its meaning and purpose, and prohibitory upon the court after the expiration of the first term following the dismissal at rules, then section 2d is thereby made more than a mere rule of practice; it more than directs the methods, forms, and times of proceeding in a suit to be pursued by the officers of court; it takes away in many cases (like the one at bar) a right of action; it deprives the suitor of a right, and the court of its discretion in respect to the suit. It would deprive a United States court of a discretionary power over orders of dismissal, affirmed by the supreme court in the cases cited by plaintiff's counsel. As such it does not fall within the meaning of the 914th section of the United States Revised Statutes. That section was not intended as more than a regulation of the practice in the courts of the United States. By rules of practice are meant the rules prescribed for the government of the officers of court respecting the times, forms, and methods of orderly proceeding in a court; and I repeat that rules of practice are not superior to the discretion of a court, so as to deprive it of the power to secure the trial of causes on their merits. A statute of limitation is more than a rule of practice. Section 2d of the chapter 167 of the Code of Virginia is a statute of limitations, and when enforced in connection with section 52 is more than a rule of practice. It affects very important and very valuable rights of citizens in many cases. I feel authorized therefore to hold that it does not fall within the contemplation of the act of congress of June, 1872, now incorporated into the Revised Statutes of the United States, as section 914. Section 52 of chapter 167 of the Code of Virginia does not in terms prohibit a court at a later term than the one next following a proceeding at rules from correcting those proceedings for good and sufficient cause; but is construed to do so by the state courts. If it does, it is more than a rule of practice, and becomes a statute of limitation. As a statute of limitation it does not fall within the contemplation of section 914 of the United States Revised Statutes. I arrive therefore at the conclusion that this court is not bound by section 914 to enforce the two provisions of the Code of Virginia which have been mentioned, because they have the character of statutes of limitation. I feel authorized to treat the motion now made as addressed to its discretion.

If the suits which were reinstated on the rule docket by the order which this court made on the 2d of April, 1877, were allowed to stand as dismissed at the July rules, 1876, the right of action is lost to the trustees in bankruptcy of the Dollar Savings Bank under the limitation of two years put by law upon their authority to sue. The court ought to prevent such a result if possible, and allow the causes which would be dismissed by default to be tried upon their merits. The well-known illness of the counsel for the plaintiffs, who was himself one of the trustees, his filing his declaration by leave of court long before the commencement of the next succeeding regular term of the court, his belief that the cause had matured for regular hearing at the October term, 1876, and ignorance of its previous dismissal at rules, and all the circumstances of the case, are sufficient grounds, in my judgment, to warrant the court in its discretion in refusing the motion now made to the court by the defendant's counsel, to set aside and annul the order of 2d of April, 1877.

INSURANCE PREMIUM NOT A MARITIME LIEN ON VESSEL.

In admiralty.

Charles E. Kremer, for libelant.
Rae & Mitchell, for respondent.

BLODGETT, District Judge. These cases are before the court upon exceptions to the commissioner's report as to the claim which was filed by the Millville Mutual Fire Insurance Company, for premiums on policies of insurance, issued upon the vessel in question. The commissioner, upon reference to him, allowed the libellant's claim for these premiums, as a lien upon the vessel. He did this upon the authority of a case lately decided by his honor, Judge Brown, of the Eastern district of Michigan, assuming that this court would follow that case, as it was directly in point. With all due respect to the learning which is displayed in that decision, I have never been entirely satisfied to follow it, and the best authority we have in this circuit is the other way. The learned circuit judge of this circuit, when district judge in 1869, had before him the case of The Security Fire Ins. Co. v. The Proceeds of the Lady Franklin [unreported], and after due consideration, dismissed the case upon the ground that a debt incurred for premium for insurance on the vessel did not create a maritime lien.

In this case it is not necessary to decide that question in as broad a sense, because it may be a debt against the owners of the vessel which would have a right to participate in the remnants, if there were any remnants. But here there are no remnants or will be none after the satisfaction of the maritime liens proper. I don't intend in making this decision to do any more than intimate my own views. I have not gone to the labor of writing out an opinion, nor have I attempted to cite any authorities, I would prefer that the question should be taken to the circuit court, and have an authoritative decision of this circuit on that question. I rule as I do because it is in accordance with my own conviction of what the law should be, and because I think until the law is definitely settled the other way in this circuit, that this class of claims should be rejected, and complications avoided growing out of the allowance of claims which may hereafter be held not to be properly enforcible in this form of procedure.

Exception to the commissioner's report is sustained.

It is due to Judge Drummond, that I should here say that his opinion in the Lady Franklin Case was never reported, and I have only been able to gather the purport of it from the recollection of counsel, and some brief notes in one of the daily newspapers of the city.

BONDS—EXECUTED IN BLANK—PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—PRIOR LIABILITY SETTLED—INSURANCE AGENT—DEFALCATIONS.

1. The fact that a bond was executed in blank by the surety and afterwards filled up by his principal, does not alter the liability of the surety, where this irregularity is not brought home to the knowledge of the obligee.

2. An agent's bond is not invalidated by being left blank in regard to the place of the agency.

3. If an agent gives a trust deed to secure payment of a defalcation, the cancellation of the deed upon subsequent payment in full of that defalcation, would not affect the agent's surety on a subsequent bond.

4. If the agent at the time of the signing of the bond had moneys in his hands which he ought to have reported as collected but had not—they would come within the condition of the bond.

5. In order for the surety to escape liability on the ground of existing irregularities and defalcations of the agent, it must be shown that these were known to the latter's principal.

At law.

M. W. Fuller and F. H. Winston, Jr., for plaintiff.

George W. Smith and E. A. Storrs, for defendants.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This is a suit upon a bond given by Cronkhite as principal, and signed by the other defendant, Sextus N. Wilcox, as surety, conditioned for the faithful performance by Cronkhite of his duties as agent of the plaintiff and for the payment to the plaintiff of all moneys which might come into his hands as agent in the due course of his business, pursuant to the rules and regulations of the company. The proof shows, and in fact it is admitted, that Cronkhite was a defaulter to the amount of something over fourteen thousand dollars on the 12th day of January, 1876, and suit is brought upon the bond to recover the amount of this defalcation.

The defenses set up are: First—That the bond was executed in blank by the surety, Mr. Wilcox. Second—That the bond as it now stands is in blank in regard to the location or place in which Cronkhite was agent. Third—That Cronkhite had been for many years prior to the execution of this bond an agent for the plaintiff in this city, and was a defaulter to the company at the time the bond was executed, and that the company obtained the bond in question by fraudulently concealing from Wilcox the fact that Cronkhite was a defaulter at the time. Fourth—That some seventy-eight hundred dollars of the alleged defalcation was incurred before the bond was given.

In reference to the defense that the bond was executed in blank and is not the deed of Wilcox, the evidence shows this state of facts: The company sent to Cronkhite a blank form of the bond used by them, the only written portion of the bond being the amount of penalty, $20,000, with directions to Mr. Cronkhite to have it filled up, signed by his surety, and returned. Mr. Cronkhite took the bond to Mr. Wilcox, who signed it in the condition in which it came from the hands of the company; that is, without being filled up. Cronkhite then filled up the bond, and it was forwarded to the company. It was filled and returned to the company in precisely the condition in which it is now offered in evidence. There is no claim or pretense that it has been altered or changed since it came into the possession of the company. Cronkhite filled up the bond, putting in his own name, the name of the surety, and the date, perhaps, but left blank the name of the place where Cronkhite was agent.

I am satisfied that this does not vitiate the bond in any particular. The authorities upon that point [Dair v. U. S.] 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 1, and [Butler v. U. S.] 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 273, go to show that unless this irregularity is brought home to the knowledge of the principal to whom the bond is payable, the company will not suffer from it. There is certainly no evidence that it was brought home to this company, that this bond was not precisely as it now is, when Mr. Wilcox wrote his name for the purpose of giving this bond and having it properly placed in the hands of the company. Cronkhite was not the agent of the company in this transaction, but was acting in his own behalf, and if Mr. Wilcox saw fit to deliver a bond signed in blank to Mr. Cronkhite, he must suffer if there has been any irregularity.

It is further claimed that this bond was obtained by fraudulent concealment of the condition of Cronkhite's account, and that the company surrendered certain securities which they had, and of which the sureties should have had the benefit; whereby the contract is vitiated.

The facts bearing upon this branch of the defense, are simply these: Cronkhite, as has been stated, had been for several years, the agent of the plaintiff in this city. In 1873, he was found to be behind in his accounts, and making explanations that his deficiency had grown out of his giving indulgences to parties here in Chicago, who had suffered by the fire and various other reasons, he was continued in his office and an arrangement made that he should pay up from month to month this defalcation; and between the time that this defalcation was discovered, which I think was in September, 1873, and the time this bond was given in 1874, the deficiency was all paid up. About the time that Cronkhite had made or was making the last payment, at the time he remitted the drafts which as he supposed liquidated his former defalcation, he stated to the company that Mr. Warner, who had been his surety upon his bond as agent for the company here, had made an arrangement with his co-partners by which they had mutually agreed not to make indorsements, or become surety for any person, and asked that Mr. Warner's bond be cancelled. He said that a wealthy man—without naming him, of this city who would be entirely satisfactory to the company, was willing to become surety for him, and by the return mail, or shortly afterwards in acknowledging the receipt of the remittances, the company sent this blank bond and stated that when a new bond satisfactory to the company was returned, the Warner bond would be surrendered.

In accordance with this arrangement the bond in question was executed and forwarded to the company and the Warner bond surrendered. At the time the defalcation of 1873 was discovered, Cronkhite, in order to secure it, in addition to his bond signed by Mr. Warner, gave a trust deed upon certain property here in Chicago, for the nominal sum of $20,000, but for the real purpose of securing this defalcation, and at the time, or shortly after the Warner bond was surrendered, a small balance of some six hundred dollars for interest upon this defalcation, having been paid, Mr. Cronkhite wrote to the company that he wished this old trust deed surrendered to him, and it was accordingly cancelled and returned.

It is alleged that this was in bad faith to Mr. Wilcox. But the evidence is conclusive to my mind that this old trust deed had reference only to the old defalcation; that whenever that defalcation was paid up, Cronkhite could enforce the cancellation of that deed; that there was no understanding or agreement that it was to stand as security for the future transactions or dealings between Cronkhite and the company, but only for this single defalcation; and in accordance with that understanding on the final adjustment of that defalcation, this security was cancelled.

Now with reference to the concealment of the condition of Cronkhite's affairs, there is no evidence that any inquiry in the first place was made by Mr. Wilcox or anybody else, as to the condition of Cronkhite's accounts. There is no evidence that any statement was made to Wilcox by any person connected with the company, except Mr. Cronkhite, and he, of course, was an interested party and making his own explanations, and the company was not bound by them, as it was simply a business relation between Cronkhite and Wilcox.

There is some evidence in the case that at the time this bond was executed, Cronkhite was in default to the company, but the defalcation was concealed, and concealed in this way: The chief business of Cronkhite consisted in the placing of policies of insurance or the obtaining of new risks and in the collections of the annual or semi-annual payments upon past policies. The renewal receipts were forwarded to Cronkhite from New York and it was his duty to collect the premiums and return them during the month or return in time so that he could get them in the succeeding month's business. It was his duty to forward them or return the money in his report of that month's business, but instead of doing so, he got into the habit of returning a certain portion of his receipts as not paid, and carrying them over into the next month, and collecting the money the next month, and applying it upon them, and reporting them as paid and so lapping over the business of one month into the next.

There is no evidence whatever, that the company at this time had any knowledge of this course of dealing on the part of Cronkhite. They supposed him to be conducting his business entirely in accordance with the rules of the company and in a correct manner, but it is now attempted to defeat the claim of the plaintiff on the ground that this irregularity had been going on with the knowledge of the officers of the company for some time before this bond was given. I am satisfied that this irregularity on the part of Cronkhite was not known to the officers or general agents of the company, and that it supposed that Cronkhite's accounts were square. At the time this bond was given it was given in substitution of another bond which had been standing for several years, and I have no doubt that the understanding of all the parties was that the new surety stepped into the place of the old one, but if it were not so, I should consider that by the terms of this bond if there were any moneys in the hands of Cronkhite at this time, which he had not paid over and not reported as collected, they come within the spirit, intention and letter of the bond. That is to say, suppose that this bond was given on the first day of April, and that Cronkhite had money remaining in his hands which he ought to have remitted as part of his March collections, but had not remitted, I have no doubt that such money would come within the obligation of this bond. This consideration disposes substantially of all the objections to the claim of the plaintiff upon this bond.

The finding will be, the issues for the plaintiff—debt, $20,000; damages, the amount of $14,982, and six per cent. interest, being in all, to date, $17,041.82.

NOTE. A surety cannot escape liability on a bond as having been signed only on condition that a specified co-surety should be procured before it was used if he delivered it to the principal to be completed, with nothing on its face to suggest that such a condition was imposed. Brown v. Probate Judge, 42 Mich. 501, 4 N. W. 195.

[Cronkhite was also indebted to the insurance company $10,000 for money loaned him. For this he gave his note, indorsed by the defendant Sextus N. Wilcox. For action on the note, see Case No. 9,980.]

At law.

M. W. Fuller and F. H. Winston, Jr., for plaintiff.

Geo. W. Smith and E. A. Storrs, for defendant.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This is a suit upon a promissory note executed by Orville Cronkhite, payable to Merrill & Ferguson, and guaranteed by [Sextus N.] Wilcox. The note bears date June 29, 1875, for the sum of $10,000. The facts surrounding the transaction are these: The Mutual Life Insurance Company is a corporation created in the state of New York, and deriving its powers from the charter granted by the state of New York, and certain of the general laws of that state. The provisions of its charter applicable to this case are sections 9, 10, and 11.

"Sec. 9. It shall be lawful for the said corporation to invest the said premiums in the securities designated in the two following sections: * * *

"Sec. 10. The whole of the premiums received for insurance by said corporation * * * shall be invested in bonds and mortgages on unincumbered real estate within the state of New York; the real property to secure such investment of capital shall, in every case, be worth twice the amount loaned thereon.

"Sec. 11. The trustees shall have power to invest a certain portion of the premiums received, not to exceed one-half thereof, in public stocks of the United States, or of this state, or of any incorporated city in this state."

Mr. Cronkhite was the agent of the plaintiff in this city. In the month of June, 1875, he applied to the plaintiff for a loan of money, stating to them that his interests required that he should raise the sum of $10,000; that it was very difficult for him to attend to other business here as their agent, and at the same time make necessary changes in his own affairs. Considerable discussion and correspondence took place between the parties in regard to this matter, and finally the company concluded to let him have the money, and directed Merrill & Ferguson, who were the general agents of the company in the northwest, to advance the money, and the note was taken by Merrill & Ferguson and assigned by them to the company. This note was guaranteed by Mr. Wilcox in due form; and at the same time, and simultaneously with giving the notes, Cronkhite gave to the company an assignment of all his interests in the renewals, as they are called. It was claimed, on the part of the defendant, that Cronkhite, as the agent of the company, had a vested right in the commissions upon the premiums which should be paid upon certain policies which he had placed as the agent of the company.

Shortly after this note was given, or perhaps simultaneously with giving it, the money was remitted to Mr. Cronkhite by Merrill & Ferguson; but Cronkhite continued to collect these premiums and receive them; did not remit to the company, but retained in his own hands all the premiums to which he was entitled as agent of the company from that time on until January, when it was discovered that he was a defaulter for a large amount of premiums collected and not paid over.

It is claimed: First, that this note is ultra vires; that this company had no right to loan this money to Cronkhite on the security of this note; and second, that the company has been reimbursed by the collection of the premiums upon policies which Cronkhite had placed, and upon which he was entitled to commissions.

With reference to the first question—that of the power of the company—there is a class of old cases in the state of New York, which, perhaps, go to the extreme extent of holding that this company, being by its charter directed to invest its funds in a certain manner, all other methods of investing its funds are excluded, and even securities given for such investments are void. But there is no case parallel with this cited by counsel, and I have found none. The later New York cases, and the later cases all through the United States, do not go to the extent of the New York cases cited by the defendant, and I think the settled rule now is, that the question of how this company shall invest its funds, is a question between itself and the sovereignty that created it, and not a question between the borrowers and the company; in other words, that it does not lie in the mouth of this defendant to charge that this security is void. The money was advanced upon the faith of this security. But whether the company had the power to take this security or not, is a question the defendant has no right to raise.

There is a large number of cases that have arisen lately under the United States national bank act [13 Stat. 99], that are very analogous to this; where the bank is positively prohibited by the act from loaning more than ten per cent. of its capital to any one person, and yet the courts have held that securities given on such loans, in excess of ten per cent. were valid, and that it does not lie in the mouth of the party who borrowed the money of the company to object to a violation of this rule. Any other rule than this would make the policy holders and parties interested in the funds of this company entirely remediless. Suppose that the directors of this corporation, induced by the larger rate of interest which is usually proffered in the western states, or outside of New York, had, instead of loaning their money upon New York state security, seen fit to invest largely in securities in the state of Illinois, would the stockholders have to lose it all, simply because their directors had violated the charter? It would seem to me a very harsh rule to say that the parties interested in this fund should be the losers simply from this violation of the company's charter; a question simply between the sovereignty and the corporation itself.

Some force may also be given to the suggestion that this was an isolated transaction made between the company and its agent, and not a general change in the policy or business of the company. But the same section which I have just read, for instance, requires that the funds of the company shall be invested on unincumbered real estate. Suppose that the directors had made loans to a man in the state of New York upon incumbered real estate, would it lie in his mouth to say that that loan was void because there was a mortgage on the property prior to the mortgage of the company for the debt? The same section also provides that the real estate shall be at least double the value of the amount loaned. Now, the same rule that is invoked here on the part of the defense would entitle a man in the state of New York, who has borrowed this fund, to say that the security for the loan was void because the property was not of double the value; that the directors had exceeded their power, and the note or obligation was ultra vires. I therefore conclude that the defense of want of power to make this loan here, and consequent invalidity of the note, is not well taken.

The next objection is, that the company has been paid by the collections of commissions which ought to have gone to Cronkhite, and which should be applied in liquidation of this note. As I have already said, in stating the facts, Cronkhite, during the time he remained the company's agent, after the giving of this note, retained all the commissions in his hands, and the company received no commissions from him while he remained the company's agent. It may be a very important question whether Mr. Cronkhite is entitled to draw any commissions after his agency ceased.

On general principles, I would be inclined to hold that the insurance company would certainly have made a very improvident and unbusiness like contract to agree to pay an agent commissions on collections after he had ceased to be worthy of their confidence as an agent to make collections. But whether that is so or not, I am satisfied that this defense, if available at all, can only be made in a court of equity where an account can be stated, and it can be ascertained how much this company has collected that ought to be applied upon this claim.

I do not intend to commit myself by saying that the defense could be made applicable even in equity; but if at all available, it must be maintained in equity. I shall, therefore, find the issues in this case for the plaintiff, and assess the damages at the amount of the note.

[NOTE. The defendant, Sextus N. Wilcox, was also the surety on Cronkhite's bond to the company given, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties as agent. For action on this bond, see Case No. 9,979.]

10. Invoices and bills of lading are competent evidence of the value of the cargo at the place of its purchase and shipment.

The cargo and its proceeds are libelled in this action by three insurance companies [the Mutual Safety Insurance Company, the American Insurance Company, and the Jackson Marine Insurance Company], underwriters on ship and freight, to recover a contribution share on general average, claimed to be payable by the cargo on board the ship George, because of a voluntary stranding of the vessel by her master to save the cargo and freight. The underwriters had accepted the abandonment of the ship and freight after the loss of the ship, and paid a total loss on the vessel and freight. The facts are as follows: The George, being insured by the libellants, (all the three companies having underwritten the vessel to the valued amount of twelve thousand dollars, four thousand dollars each, and the Mutual Safety Insurance Company having underwritten the freight to the amount of $4,400, on a valuation of $6,800,) sailed in May, 1841, from New Orleans to Trieste, with a cargo of cotton, consigned to the claimants, Reyea & Schlick. When about six days out, the vessel met with heavy weather, and sprung a leak. The leak increased, and the master, after making a fruitless attempt to reach the harbor of Nassau, finally, with the view to save the cargo from destruction, ran the ship on a reef, about three-quarters of a mile from the main land on the west end of the Grand Bahamas. The vessel and freight were wholly lost, and after abandonment to the underwriters, a total loss was paid by them. A large portion of the cotton was saved, and the proceeds came to the hands of the defendants, [Josiah] Macy & Son, as agents of Reyea & Schlick, and Livingston & Barclay. The libel was now filed in rem against the cargo and its proceeds, on the ground that they were bound to contribute in general average to the loss of the vessel and freight, and in personam against the respondents, as holders of those proceeds or parts of the cargo. A foreign attachment was prayed against the defendants, Reyea & Schlick, and Livingston & Barclay, to make them personally liable for the funds in their hands, and also to compel the appearance of the owners of the cargo. There was very little dispute as to the facts of the case. The answer of Barclay & Livingston, the agents of Reyea & Schlick, insisted that the vessel was run on shore to save the lives of the master and the crew, and that the most expedient course had not been pursued in running the vessel on shore. The answer of J. Macy & Son admitted the proceeds of cargo to be in their hands, and disclaimed all personal interest in the subject matter. The only witness examined on the hearing was Thos. S. Minott, master of the George. He testified that the vessel sprung a leak soon after leaving New Orleans, and between the 17th and 22d of May the leak had averaged from two hundred to twelve hundred strokes of the pump per hour; that the water was four feet in the hold, and increasing, when he determined, on the 28th, to run the vessel ashore. The wind was light, with little sea. He testified positively that he ran the vessel ashore to save vessel and cargo, and that he did not consider any life on board in danger, as they had good boats, and the weather was moderate. That if the cargo had been thrown overboard, the leak might have been stopped, if it was in the upper works, but he did not know where it was. That he thought there was a chance, although a small one, of keeping the vessel free, even without running her ashore or throwing over cargo. That he selected the place of running her ashore with the view and in the hope of saving both ship and cargo. An average statement had been made up by an adjuster, and was submitted to the court by the libellants as the basis of the decree demanded.

Theodore Sedgwick, for libellants.

[2] [I. This libel is filed by insurers on a vessel voluntarily stranded for the benefit of all concerned, and her freight on which a total loss has been paid, to subject the cargo to a contribution in general average. Columbian Ins. Co. v. Ashby, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 331. The ship George, in May, 1841, being at sea was found leaking, and could not be kept free by the pumps. The condition of the vessel was not desperate, but no attempt could be made to stop the leak without throwing the cargo overboard, and as it was more valuable than the vessel, the captain thought it most for the benefit of all concerned to run the vessel ashore. The cargo was thus saved—the vessel lost. II. By reason of the voluntary stranding, and sacrifice of the vessel and freight for the general benefit, the cargo became liable to the owners of the ship for a contribution in the nature of general average. III. The owners of the vessel and freight, being insured by the libellants, made abandonment and received payment of a total loss. The general average contribution is, therefore, due to the libellants. IV. The claim is founded on the implied maritime contract by which the vessel and cargo are reciprocally bound to each other to contribute to all sacrifices made for the common benefit of that contract—this court has of course jurisdiction. V. The court can either order a reference to the clerk to adjust the account or act definitely on the average statement already made, if no errors are shown to exist in it. VI. The admiralty has jurisdiction of a question of general average. 2 Phil. Ins. 580; Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law; De Lovio v. Boit [supra]. VII. The master has a lien on the cargo for its share of contribution towards a general average. Curt. Merch. Seam. 217; Abb. Shipp. pt. 3, c. 8, § 17; Simonds v. White, 2 Barn. & C. 805; Scaife v. Tobin, 3 Barn. & Adol. 523; The Hoffnung, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 383; Stev. Av. p. 50; U. S. v. Wilder [Case No. 16,694]. VIII. The doctrine that the admiralty has no jurisdiction over accounts, means accounts in the original sense of the term, i. e. disputed merchants accounts. Dunl. Adm. Prac. p. 16; Ordinance of 1648. "The court of admiralty shall not hold pleas or admit actions upon any bills of exchange, or accounts betwixt merchants and merchants or their factors." The John, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 288; (Am. Ed.) 234. "The account is of too general and unsettled a nature to entitle the party to this remedy." Dunl. Adm. Prac. p. 29. "A copartner or part owner of a ship cannot institute a suit for accounts in the admiralty in England." IX. The result is, that this court has jurisdiction of the case, both as one of maritime contract, and one of maritime lien, and that it does not come within the exception of disputed merchant's accounts.

[Danl. Lord, Jr., for respondents.

[I. The libellants are mere assignees of a chose in action, and as such, cannot sue in admiralty. II. The vessel being a maritime vessel, the underwriters residing in New York, the ship bound for Louisiana, to Austria, and the respondents being citizens of the latter country, there is no sufficient evidence that, either by the laws of Maine, New York, Louisiana, Austria or England, general average is due in a case like this. We insist, that in New York, where the contract was made, it is settled in a similar case, that no contribution in the nature of a general average is due. Bradhurst v. Columbian Ins. Co., 9 Johns. 9; 1 Parke, Ins. 280, c. 7; 2 Phil. Ins. "Gen. Average," 102. III. Even if a general average contribution were due, the court of admiralty has no jurisdiction to state the account between the parties. 2 Hagg. Adm.; 3 C. Rob. Adm. 288. IV. If any average were due, and this court is competent to make it, Bermuda is the proper place of adjustment, and there is no evidence of the law there. The learned counsel commented at length on the statement which had been made; citing 2 Phil. Ins. 141–167.

[BETTS, District Judge. The undersigners, by the abandonment, became clothed with all the rights of the insured, in respect to contribution in general average. 2 Phil. Ins. 322. The cargo is bound to the vessel to satisfy such contribution, and courts of admiralty will enforce the lien, it being of a maritime character. The proceeds of cargo may be pursued by libel or petition to recover general average. Stev. Av. 25; Dunl. Adm. Prac. p. 57; 4 Wash. 99, 100. As a general rule, when admiralty has jurisdiction in rem, or over the subject matter, it can be exercised against whatever represents the thing, or to which it may be changed or converted; and is exercised by monition, &c., against those who hold the proceeds. [Sheppard v. Taylor] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 675. The voluntary stranding of a vessel by the master, to save the cargo, is ground for a general average, although the vessel be totally lost. Abb. BETTS, District Judge. The main subjects of controversy in this case are: The competency of this court to entertain the action; the right of the ship-owners to compensation on general average; and the principles upon which the average contribution shall be adjusted and distributed. The ship was totally lost and was abandoned to the underwriters, who are the libellants in the action by virtue of that title. The abandonment conferred on them every interest and right in the ship possessed by her owners. They take all title and authority of the assured, even the spes recuperandi; his agents become theirs, and they stand subrogated to every privilege and power he possessed and might legally exercise. 2 Cond. Marsh. 601ab; 2 Phil. Ins. 420; [Chesapeake Ins. Co. v. Stark] 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 268; Jumel v. Marine Ins. Co., 7 Johns. 412. If this complete substitution of the assurers in the place of the assured should fail to confer also the capacity to sue at law in their own names, they would meet no such technical impediment in this court; an assignee of an interest may maintain an action upon his title as if originally vested in him. It accordingly presents no objection to the sufficiency of parties that the libellants sue in their own names or solely. The objection to the jurisdiction of this court over the subject of general average was earnestly pressed on the argument. No case, however, was produced in the American or English maritime courts, in which the jurisdiction has been disavowed; and upon the criterion by which the capacity of the court is determined, general average would seem to be a subject eminently adapted to its functions, and to be made up of those ingredients which constitute a maritime jurisdiction and require its exercise. If not strictly international, it is cosmopolite in character, useful to the navigation of all nations, and everywhere recognized as an essential accompaniment of maritime commerce. Its necessity is created by transactions at sea, and relates to the exigencies and liabilities of ships, cargoes and freights reciprocally to each other at sea, in respect to maritime disasters, in which the exposure is common to each, and especially when it happens that some interest is, wholly or in part, voluntarily sacrificed for the preservation of the others. The rights springing out of that condition are recognized instinctively or by natural reason, and the primitive sea laws acted upon those rights, as subjects appropriate to their cognizance and authority. The civil law gave body and system to the usages and customs which had before prevailed in place of primitive law, and with the simplicity and practical equity which pervaded that polity, dealt directly with the property benefited or prejudiced by the sacrifice, and distributed between the two that which remained after the disaster in such ratio as to render the loss a mutual one to the owners of ship, cargo and freight, undergoing the common peril. The master of the ship became, in his official capacity, the minister of the law, who arrested and detained the property remaining, determined the amount of loss and the scale of contribution to be made and received by the respective portions of it, and carried the decision into effect by his own authority. The practical procedure in accomplishing this end is subject to regulation by the governments to which the vessels belong, but all the elements and gist of a general average, as recognized in its inception, and now administered by commercial nations, are maritime in their origin and nature, and appertain to the functions of maritime tribunals. This was the understanding of the law by the old English civilians. Zouch says, "Admiralty courts have jurisdiction touching contributions to be made for loss upon occasions of common danger." Zouch, Adm. assertion 3, art. 4, p. 32. Godolphin enumerates carefully the subjects over which the admiralty courts had a clear jurisdiction, and says, "Within the cognizance of this jurisdiction are all affairs at sea immediately relating to vessels of trade and the owners thereof"; also, "all cases of jactus, or casting goods overboard." Chapter 4, pp. 44, 169. Alexander, justice, in a treatise upon the sea laws, published in London, 1705, reiterates this declaration, and commends Godolphin as an eminent and reliable authority upon the subject of admiralty jurisdiction. Sea Laws, 259. The more modern elementary writers evidently hold the same sentiments, although expressed with a perceptible dread of the despotism of writs of prohibition. Browne says, "If a party institute a suit in admiralty in a cause of average and contribution, and be not prohibited, I do not see how the court could refuse to entertain it." 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 122. When objection was made to the authority of the court to award average contribution, Sir William Scott yielded to the objections, but on two special grounds, first, that the claim was one of prize against a ship by captors of the cargo as prize of war. The cargo would have been entitled to average contribution as between its owner, and the owner of the ship. A part of it had been applied to repair the vessel before her capture. She was restored by the court. The court held, that as a prize court, it could not take notice of a contributory liability of property, expended for the benefit of the ship, and that, though cases of average on the part of the ship against the cargo are not unfrequent, a demand of the cargo against the ship is perfectly novel. The Hoffnung, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 383. No intimation is given by the court that it had no jurisdiction in cases of average. Its remarks strongly imply the contrary. In The Gratitudine, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 255, the implication is direct and forcible that cases of contribution are properly within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. Mr. Abbott refers to the civil law as the source of the authority for enforcing average contribution (Abb. Shipp. 361, § 17), and its procedures were in rem, and belong now only to courts of admiralty. The doctrine of the American courts is clear and distinct on this subject. Judge Story, in his thorough and profound discussion of the jurisdiction of the courts, says, "It embraces contracts and quasi contracts respecting average contributions." De Lovio v. Boit [supra]. In U. S. v. Wilder he says, "The general maritime law enforces a contribution in default of any notion of a contract upon the ground of justice and equity, and is the only mode of remedy in many cases." Case No. 16,694. See, also, The Packet [Id. 10,654]. The practice is familiar to the courts. Dunlap, Prac. 57. It seems peculiarly fitting the functions of the court, no other tribunal having the faculty to compel property made liable to contribution by the maritime law, to fulfil that obligation.

A suit at law or in equity may be employed to obtain the value of the contribution (1 Smith, Merc. Law, 192; 1 Law Lib. (N. S.) 115; 1 Story, Eq. § 490); but the proceedings can only be in personam at law, helped out by the fiction of a contract (3 Chit. Pl. 87, 88), where none subsists in fact. And the interposition of equity affords no specific relief against the property, and is invoked rather to bring suitable parties into the controversy than to effectuate, by its direct action, the remedy the case requires. It will not even restrain the master from parting with the goods, if he thinks proper to do so. The civil law supplies the only forum adequate to the full necessities of the remedy. Abb. Shipp. (Ed. 1829) 361, 362, § 17. So, also, in my opinion, the parties entitled to a contribution can enforce their right by appropriate proceedings against the proceeds of the property, subject to make contribution in average, in whosesoever hands those proceeds may be found; or against whatsoever represents that property; without regard to a continuing possession of the goods to which the right of lien or contribution attached. [Sheppard v. Taylor] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 675; Harris v. Lindsay [Case No. 6,123]; [Ramsay v. Allegre] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 615; 11 Johns. 323; Dunl. Adm. Prac. 57; Stev. Av. 25. The owner, if a foreigner or non-resident, may be brought under the jurisdiction of this court by suits of foreign attachment, so that the proceedings will be as efficacious against him, as if the were under personal monition or arrest. Munro v. Almeida, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 473.

The point most contested on the hearing is involved in the objection that the ship-owner is not entitled to bring the value of the ship into contribution on general average, when the peril to which she was voluntarily exposed resulted in her total loss and destruction. The facts of the case are free from all conflict, and upon the testimony of the master, it appears the vessel was voluntarily run ashore by him to save the cargo, the lives on board not being in danger, and was totally lost in consequence. The policy and justness of the rule which, in my opinion, warrants this demand, is clearly manifested by these facts, because, if the probable or even possible destruction of the ship might follow the act, the master would have no inducement to risk that sacrifice, if, when the total loss followed, no claim for indemnity could be maintained against the cargo and freight for whose benefit it was made. In this act are all the requisites to a case of general average. The exposure of the ship to loss was voluntarily made by the master and crew for the common benefit of the shippers, and solely for the purpose of saving the cargo. It conduced to their preservation. The controlling test in questions of average is the voluntary placing of part of the property in peril by the master and crew, for the safety of the residue. 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 199; Whitteridge v. Norris, 6 Mass. 125. And in vindication of the soundness of the new rule, admitted in the American courts, giving the value of the ship when she is totally lost a right to contribution, Ch. J. Tilghman, in Gray v. Waln, says, if the case is not one of general average, because the ship was totally lost, the result would be that for a small loss there shall be compensation, but a great loss is to go without compensation. 2 Serg. & R. 229.

To constitute a case of general average it is admitted to be essential that the ship and cargo should be in common danger, and that a part should be sacrificed for the preservation of the remainder, or, as is laid down by Emerigon (volume 1, 603), "le dommage n'est avaire grosse, que dans les cas ou il été opéré voluntairement pover le salut commerce." All these ingredients to a case of general average are proved to exist in the present instance, and it varies only from those described and approved in the earliest edicts and adjudications on the subject, in the feature, that the ship was subjected to a total instead of a partial loss, in the effort to save the cargo. This consideration augments the equity of the claim that such loss should be apportioned, and the property saved should contribute towards its remuneration. The argument against the claim attempts to replace the old doctrine declared by Emerigon and sanctioned by the supreme court of New York, excluding the owners of a ship totally lost from participation in the general average shared by the owners of cargo and freight. Bradhurst v. Columbian Ins. Co., 9 Johns. 9; Emerig. vol. 1, c. 12, § 13, p. 614. "It will be general average if the stranding has been voluntarily made for the common safety, provided, always, that the ship be again set afloat; for if the stranding be followed by shipwreck, then it is, save who can." To do this effectually, the effort is made to distinguish the facts and principles acted upon by the supreme court of the United States and other American tribunals, from the broad and direct proposition presented by this case. But in my judgment no sound distinction can be shown between them, and the scope and force of the reasoning and conclusions of the supreme court embrace and dispose of every material question made upon that point in the case. Judge Story, in speaking for the court (Columbian Ins. Co. v. Ashby, 13 Pet. [U. S.] 539): Surely, says he, the question of contribution cannot depend upon the amount of the damage sustained by the sacrifice, for that would be to say, that if a man lost all his property for the common benefit, he should receive nothing; but if he lost a part only he should receive full compensation, and emphatically declares the law to be that a voluntary stranding of the ship, followed by a total loss of the ship, but with a saving of the cargo, constitute, when designed for the common safety, a clear case of general average. In this cardinal doctrine other influential decisions concur. The principle to be gathered from the new application of the rule is, that if the voluntary act of the master and crew is the direct occasion, the efficient motive and cause of the stranding, the loss becomes one of general average. Caze v. Reilly [Case No. 2,538]; 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 199; Whitteridge v. Norris, 6 Mass. 125; Gray v. Waln. 2 Serg. & R. 229; Sims v. Gurney, 4 Bin. 513. The Rhodian law, whence the doctrine of contribution is derived, is founded upon this principle, jactus factus levandae navis gratiâ. The particular loss incurred is elected, with a view to the safety of what remains. 2 Cond. Marsh. 536. There is nothing in the adage of the Rhodian edict which imports that a partial injury of the property put in peril is all that is contemplated by the devotion of it to relieve the common peril; on the contrary, the larger doctrine has always been deduced from it, that as the jettison is unreserved, and may naturally result in the entire loss of the property abandoned to the risk, so the average remuneration shall correspond to and be measured by the degree of loss. Jac. Sea Laws, 345; Wesk. Ins. (Fol. Ed.) tit. "General Average, Jettison"; Abb. Shipp. (Ed. 1829) 348; 3 Kent, Comm. (3d Ed.) 232. This reference to the foundation of the law of general average is sufficient to indicate that the application of its rules and principles by the supreme court of this state (9 Johns. 9) is in restraint of the exalted and comprehensive equity it is designed to accomplish in cases of common perils wherein the property of one is sacrificed to promote the safety of others standing in equal exposure. Had the counsel then succeeded on this argument in raising a doubt whether the conclusions of the supreme court (13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 359) were in conformity with antecedent adjudications or usages on this subject, the doctrine of that decision supplies the more satisfactory exposition of this important branch of maritime law, and gives a rule eminently adapted to the exigencies of commercial navigation. Independent of this acquiescence in the soundness of the views of the court in that case, I should feel bound to conform to its expositions of the general principles and rules applicable to average claims, although the particular facts of this case may be shown not to be exactly coincident with those on which that judgment was founded. The leading feature of that case embodies the principle which controls this. But even if it could be demonstrated that the conclusions of the supreme court were speculative and hypothetical, the solemn enunciation and sanction of a rule of maritime law, by that high tribunal, would be a guide and light I should not fail to follow in the administration of that law in this court.

In commercial and maritime questions, the federal courts are not governed by the jurisprudence of particular states, but by the general principles and doctrines of commercial law, or the law-merchant. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 1. I shall, therefore, hold the libellants, representing the rights of the owners of the ship, as entitled to contributions on general average upon her value, at the place of loss, notwithstanding she was totally lost by the stranding. The act was voluntarily done by the master with a view to the safety of the cargo alone. They are entitled to contribution toward the loss, from all that was saved, including cargo and freight. The ship, cargo and freight are to be estimated at their full value, at the place of stranding. That value will be ascertained on the adjustment of the average by appropriate proof. The invoices and bills of lading will be received as evidence of the value of the cargo at the place of purchase and shipment, and the policies may be consulted as evidence conducing to prove the worth of the ship at the port of departure, and the value of the freight lost. 3 Kent, Comm. 167; Abb. Shipp. 607; 2 Cond. Marsh. 618. But additional evidence of the value must be produced. The principles governing the valuation between assured and assurers, are not conclusive in cases of average, because, in the first instance, the policy is the common act of the parties in interest, and may estop all question as to valuation, whilst on general average interests are brought in which are not controlled by the policy. Still I think the policies may be admissible before the adjusters as auxiliary proof of the value of the ship, cargo or freight. The decree will be drawn up in correspondence with this decision, and all questions of law which may properly be raised on the proceedings of the adjusters under it, may be brought forward for consideration on the coming in of the adjustment or auditor's report.

The following decree was adopted by the court and entered in the cause: This case having been heard upon the pleadings and proofs, and having been argued by Mr. Sedgwick for the libellants, and by Mr. Lord for the claimants, and due deliberation being had in the premises, it is considered by the court that the libellants are entitled to recover against the claimants and against the proceeds of the cargo owned by them, and saved from the wreck of the ship George, a contributory part in general average, in the proportion the value of the cargo saved bore to the cargo on board paying freight. And it is further considered by the court, that the libellants, for the purpose of such contribution, are entitled to have the ship and freight valued at the sums respectively named in the policies in the pleadings mentioned, deducting, in respect to the ship, a reasonable allowance for wear and tear on the voyage up to the time of the disaster, and all sums received on sale thereof, or any part of her tackle or apparel at the place of wreck or elsewhere. And it is further considered by the court, that the goods of the claimants saved pay contribution according to the prices at which the same were sold at Nassau, (the place of the stranding,) deducting therefrom salvage and other necessary charges; and if it be found that such prices are below the average invoice prices of such goods, or the valuation thereof in the policies of insurance, that then the residue of the cargo paying freight be valued, for the purpose of adjusting the average contribution, at the same rate or proportion. And it is ordered by the court, that it be referred to the clerk, (or to an auditor to be named or designated by consent of the proctors of the respective parties,) to adjust and state the average contribution against the claimants, conformably to the principles of this decree, and that on such reference, the testimony used in this cause, and such other evidence as may be pertinent and competent, may be offered by either party, subject to all legal objections.

Case No. 9,982.

MUTUAL SAFETY INS. CO. et al. v. CARGO OF THE GEORGE.

[Olc. 157; 8 Law Rep. 363.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1845.

SHIPPING—GENERAL AVERAGE—LOSS BY JETTISON—VALUE OF VESSEL—STRANDED TO SAVE CARGO—ESTIMATING FREIGHT.

1. In the adjustment and settling of general average the contributory interest of the ship is to be estimated at her value at her port of departure, making reasonable allowance for wear and tear on the voyage, up to the time of the disaster.

[Cited in The Star of Hope, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 235.]

2. General average on loss by jettison is allotted on the principle that the property pays and receives in contribution upon the basis of loss and value at the time of the sacrifice.

[Cited in Dupont v. Vance, 19 How. (60 U. S.) 171.]

3. As between assurers and assured, the valuation agreed in the policy may be taken on general average, as the value of the property at risk.

4. But the valuation in the policy on the ship is no more than prima facie evidence of her value as against owners of the cargo; her value must be established in the ordinary modes of proofs in respect to their interests.

5. Invoices and bills of lading are admissible evidence of the value of the cargo at the place of shipment.

6. The valuation of freight in the policy may be received as prima facie evidence of its value in favor of and against the ship-owner, on general average.

7. In case of total loss of the ship voluntarily stranded for the safety of the cargo, all the property exposed to the risk must contribute, and be contributed for at its value, when the sacrifice was made.

8. The more ancient method of estimating freight at its gross value, both when contributed to and when contributory, held to be preferable to the modern practice of estimating its full value in the first instance, and in the second, diminishing it at discretion, by abating one-fifth, one-third or one-half from its value.

[This was a libel by the Mutual Safety Insurance Company, the American Insurance Company, and the Jackson Marine Insurance Company against the cargo and proceeds of the ship George, to recover a contribution share on general average, claimed to be payable by the cargo because of a voluntary stranding of the vessel by the master in order to save cargo and freight. The underwriters accepted an abandonment and paid a total loss. There was a decree in favor of libellants, and a reference to an auditor to adjust and state the average contribution against the claimants. Case No. 9,981.]

On the coming in of the report of the auditor under the reference of April term last [Case No. 9,981], various exceptions were interposed to the report by the respective parties, and applications were made to the court to change the terms of the interlocutory decree, and to insert other provisions in the final decree.

The hull of the vessel had been sold after the disaster on the beach for a small sum; about two-thirds of the cargo was lost, one-third only saved. The interests to be contributed for were (1) the value of the vessel represented by her underwriters, and valued at $12,000; (2) the freight represented by the underwriters on freight to the extent of the insurance, $4,400, and by the owners of the vessel for the balance; (3) the cargo lost. The interests to contribute to make up this loss were, of course, as to vessel and freight, the same, and the entire cargo. The rate at which the vessel and freight should contribute was the subject of difference of opinion. The insurers on the vessel contended on the authority of the case of Leavenworth v. Delafield, 1 Caines, 573, and on what they asserted to be uniform custom, that to determine the wear and tear of the vessel, one-fifth should be deducted, and the vessel be contributed for upon the balance, or four-fifths. The insurers on freight contended, on the authority of the same case and custom of alleged similar generality, that the freight should only contribute on one-half its gross amount, or, in this case, $3,400, and be contributed for on the whole, the reason of this rule being stated to be the propriety of making a deduction for the expense of earning the freight; and lastly, the underwriters, whether on vessel or freight, contended that the valuations in the policies were to govern.

In the case above cited, the following language was held by Livingston, J., in the supreme court of New-York: After citing Pothier and Marshall, he proceeds (page 579):

[1] [Reported by Edward R. Olcott, Esq. 8 Law Rep. 363, contains only a partial report.]

"As the rule is not accurately defined by the law of England, and the one adduced applies to cases of jettison only, we are at liberty to make one for ourselves. The injustice of making the ship and freight contribute for their full value has already been stated. The first will be injured by the voyage, and oftentimes the whole freight received will not be equal to the disbursements and expenses to which the owner has been exposed. * * * What value to put on the vessel and freight, and do complete justice, is more difficult, perhaps impracticable. To take their full worth will not do. After the best reflection I have been able to bestow on the subject, I am for valuing the vessel at four-fifths of her original cost, reckoning nothing for provisions or wages paid in advance, and the freight at one-half of the gross sum agreed to be paid. This rule may be deemed arbitrary; so will any that can be devised, and yet, perhaps, it will come as near as any other in producing a contribution in proportion to the real interest of each which may be in jeopardy." For the respondents it was insisted, that this case of Delafield v. Leavenworth did not apply to the present; that the valuations in the policies could not affect third parties, that is, the owners of cargo; that the actual wear and tear of the vessel should be ascertained by evidence, not by any arbitrary deduction, and that the freight should contribute on its whole gross amount.

John Duer and Theo. Sedgwick, for libellants.

Daniel Lord, Jr., for respondents.

BETTS, District Judge. The specific points in contestation, and determined between the parties by the decree of April last, were, that the court has cognizance of the case as one of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, that the ship was voluntarily stranded for the benefit of the cargo, and although a total loss, her owner was entitled to compensation by way of general average; that the adjustment of average could be made in this port, where the proceeds of the cargo were attached, and that the freight was both subject to contribution, and entitled to a contributory allowance. The frame of the order was not discussed between the parties when adopted, and the claimants, by exception to the report of the auditor, and the libellants, through a direct petition or motion to the court, seek to have portions of the decretal order explained, modified or annulled. To avoid the complexity of cross motions and arguments upon objections in relation to the details of the order, the court permitted the counsel to consider the whole matter open as to the particulars to be embraced in the final decree, beyond the general principles settling the rights of the libellants to recover, and that the argument be directed to the terms asked by the libellants to be inserted in the decree adjusting the contributory interests, or fixing the rules by which they shall be determined, with the right to the claimants to propose any substantive provisions in the final order not moved by the libellants, and pertinent to the case.

The positions which the libellants maintain are, that the ship is to contribute and receive contributions upon her value agreed in the policy of insurance, deducting one-fifth for wear and tear, conformably to the rule declared by the supreme court of this state, in Leavenworth v. Delafield, 1 Caines, 573. That the cargo saved is to contribute according to its invoice value, and that lost by stranding to be contributed for at a like valuation. That the freight is to be contributed for at its gross value, according to the amount named in the policy, being the sum payable to the ship-owner: and the freight is to contribute on such gross amount less one-half, being its cost or value at the time of loss, according to the rule in Leavenworth v. Delafield, 1 Caines, 573. That the libellants are entitled to a decree in personam against Macy & Co. and Barclay & Livingston, who hold portions of the proceeds of the cargo, or part of the cargo itself, for the amount of such cargo or proceeds and costs, and to a decree against the foreign owners of the cargo, upon a proceeding by foreign attachment for the value of the cargo saved, and not recovered of Macy and the other respondents.

The claimants combat each of these propositions, except the second, and also ask the direction of the court as to the compensation chargeable in behalf of the auditor and adjuster of average. It is understood the latter particular may be arranged between the parties, and it will not, therefore, be further noticed in this opinion. In directing, by the former order, the ship and freight to be valued at the sums named in the policies set forth upon the pleadings, being their true values at the port and time of departure, the court did not overlook the fact that the owners of the cargo were not parties to those policies, and would not be considered, in judgment of law, to have assented to the valuations made in them; nor was the court unaware of the diversity of opinions and usages stated in the books in relation to the basis of valuations which were to be subjects of general average. 1 Cond. Marsh. Ins. 290, 291; 2 Cond. Marsh. 621–623.

The preponderance of authority is believed to be, that the contributory interest of the ship should be estimated at her value at her port of departure (3 Kent, 242; 2 Serg. & R. 258; Benecke, 210; 1 Caines, 573), with proper allowances for wear and tear; that is, upon her value at the time to which the apportionment relates (1 Phil. 358). Other cases indicate that if the ship is sold, her contributory value is to be the sale price. 2 Johns. R. 98. Abbott considers the rule to be that the ship is to be estimated according to her value at the end of the voyage (Abb. Shipp. 356), that is, at her port of destination (2 Marsh. London Ed. 1802, c.

13, § 7). But Benecke combats that doctrine (Benecke, 310), and his conclusions are more in consonance with the principle upon which average is exacted and given, which clearly is, that the property should pay and receive in contribution upon the basis of loss and value at the time of the disaster. The means of measuring these particulars with certainty are not, however, well defined, and different commercial states, and sometimes different tribunals in the same country, are at variance as to the proper method of attaining that end. Weskett, 255; 1 Marsh. (Ed. 1802) c. 13, § 7; 2 Phil. 358; Benecke, 322–325; Stev. Av. pt. 1, art. 3. It is, moreover, not a definitely settled principle whether these methods or means are matters of evidence only, or are raised to rules of decision, and thus become fixed doctrines of law. In the latter case it would belong to the court to determine the amount of the contributory interests, very much as it settles the relative liability of the parties; and in the former, the inquiries would be essentially matters of fact, to be ascertained by ordinary modes of proof.

The case of Leavenworth v. Delafield, 1 Caines, 573, is an instance in which embarrassing questions under a general average are disposed of by the judgment of the court as purely legal, and Gray v. Waln, one where the same particulars were referred to the jury to be passed upon as matters of fact. 2 Serg. & R. 229. The court considered the jury rightfully exercised their discretion in following the reason of the New York case as conducing to certainty, but the decision itself is not sanctioned beyond the special case of capture; 2 Johns. 98; and is regarded an anomaly in its principle by high authority. 2 Phil. Ins. 218. No reason is assigned in the decision for giving an effect to a loss by vis major, different in one case from that of another; so that losses by jettison or capture can stand on different rights to compensation by average. It is to be borne in mind, that the speculations in the English books upon the valuation of the ship as a subject of general average, and essentially so, also, in the American authorities, until the case of Columbia Ins. Co. v. Ashby [Case No. 3,038], had relation to partial injuries by voluntary sacrifice, and not to her total loss. In the latter case no reason is discovered for distinguishing her valuation on general average from that on a claim against her underwriters. In respect to the valuation of the ship, as she is to contribute and be contributed for at her value at the port of departure, with a proper allowance to cover the deterioration at the time of her loss, how are these particulars to be ascertained? As between owners and assurers, the valuation agreed in the policy is ordinarily taken for the purposes of general average, as the value of the ship (Stev. Av. c. 1, art. 2); and Benecke says that valuation is frequently the best guide in determining the contributory interest between all parties concerned (Benecke, 311, 312). Upon the assumption that it belongs to the court to prescribe the means by which the value is to be determined, the policy might, perhaps, be safely adopted as a more reliable approximation to the value than the report of surveyors, or the estimate of casual observers or appraisers. Usually the vessel is examined on the part of the underwriters by an experienced surveyor, having knowledge of her age, build and character, who will be watchful to prevent an over-valuation; and the strong interest of the owner and his agent, on the other hand, to have the policy a sufficient indemnity in case of loss, might, in the conflict of these interests and views, secure an estimate sufficiently near the fair value to answer the purpose of a general rule, which would prevent serious injustice to either party. It is no more arbitrary to declare such valuation to be that on which the average shall be estimated, than to direct one-fifth or one half (1 Caines, 373; Abb. Shipp. 356; 2 Valin, 294, 295), to be deducted from the proved value at the commencement of the voyage, to determine the worth of the vessel at the time of her destruction. In view of the vagueness and want of uniformity in fixing the contributory value of property subject to general average, with which the courts and text writers have always been embarrassed, the first order in this case adopted the valuation in the policy as the value of ship and freight, and this seems a common method of fixing such value in case of total loss (Stev. Av. 163–167). Yet I am not satisfied the policy can be received as more than prima facie evidence of the value of the ship and freight, admitting it covers no more than her naked valuation, if admissible to that extent, because the parties proceeded against in this action are not parties or privies to the policy on the ship or freight, and I do not find that the practice of taking the valuation in the policy as full evidence to that point is so far recognized in the mercantile law as to require the force of a general usage, and where a legal proposition is rather experimental than established, it may be considered preferable to adhere to known rules, however fit and reasonable a proposed change may appear.

Proceeding in subordination to legal rules of evidence, no less so in case of jettison than in privation of property by other casualties, the party claiming recompense for his loss should establish its value by the ordinary modes of proofs. Benecke, 294. The court cannnot look to the probable inconvenience or delays he may be subjected to in pursuing his remedy in that method; those are incidents to every demand put in suit, and I accordingly hold that the libellants must establish before the adjuster, by legal evidence, the value of the ship at the time the disaster occurred. He must determine that fact by due proofs. I can see no reason to vary the rule on this inquiry, or to assume that the value at the place of departure of the vessel may easily be proved, whilst it must be impracticable to prove it at the place of her loss. Testimony, for aught that appears in this case, may as well be furnished tending to show the degree of depreciation of value, as to determine its state when the voyage commenced. The rule is, that a reasonable allowance shall be made for wear and tear (3 Kent, Comm. 242), and there would manifestly be great conveniency in possessing a criterion which should infallibly fix that amount; but without the support of notorious usage and custom to an uniform scale of depreciation of a vessel by performing the whole or any portion of her voyage, it must be sheer conjecture with the court to pronounce that the abatement of one-fifth or one-half, or any other aliquot of the value of the ship when sound, a reasonable measure of its worth at the time of loss. The method of ascertaining the value of the ship at her place of departure, and that which governs the same inquiry, at the period of her loss, should be alike.

On the argument, the counsel on both sides agree to accept the invoice prices and bills of lading as proof of the true value of the cargo, and the policy as evidence of the value of the freight; and that agreement renders it unnecessary to inquire what effect in law those documents would be entitled to upon the question of actual value of the cargo at the time and place of its shipment, or of the freight at the time of loss. The next consideration is, how freight is to be contributed for, and on what sum it is to contribute. In the authorities upon which the decision on the merits in this case is rendered for the libellants (2 Serg. & R. 229; Caze v. Reilly [Case No. 2,538]; [Columbian Ins. Co. v. Ashby] 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 331), it is held that freight is to be brought into the account on general average, both as receiving and rendering compensation, because of the loss of the vessel, but those cases do not settle the ratio of allowance or contribution. In the United States circuit court the point was not debated by the bar or court, nor does it clearly appear that any average adjustment had been made in that cause. In the Pennsylvania case the jury found the freight payable per cask, but the case does not state what rate on the value was allowed in adjustment. The case in the supreme court is alike barren of facts on this point, and the attention of the court was not directed to the consideration of the special question made in this case. It appears, by the opinion of the court, that an auditor's report was made, but not being excepted to, no information is given of the basis upon which it was formed. In no one of those cases, or the thoroughly studied arguments made by the counsel in them, is it intimated that the freight is to receive contribution upon one valuation, and be contributory on a different one.

The libellants, by means of the abandonment to them, stand in place of the owners in this case, and it is admitted, that on portions of the cargo, freight has been received by them, and earned pro rata on others, and that they are bound to contribute on what is so saved towards the general loss. It is contended for them that they are first entitled to be allowed in contribution for the gross freight taken on board, and that they are only to contribute on the freight saved after deduction of the expense of earning it, whether the expenses are measured by a fixed ratio of deduction, as is the practice frequently adopted, or are ascertained by subtracting the wages and other expenditures in earning it as chargeable in favor of the ship against freight.

Legal writers, and the adjudged cases, constantly speak of the contribution in respect to freight as divisible in its character, the ship-owner to have contribution upon his gross freight on average adjustment, and to pay only upon the net amount saved him by the sacrifice to the common benefit. Abb. Shipp. 356, 357, and notes 1, 2; 1 Phil. Ins. c. 15, § 11; Benecke, Ins. 291; Id. 313; 1 Marsh. c. 13, § 7; Stevens, pt. 1, arts. 2, 4; Id. pt. 2, art. 3; Ann. Ins. 98; Hughes, 225, 226; Id. 283; Hall, 489, 492; 1 Smith, Merc. Law. 192. And such undoubtedly is the prevalent usage in respect to the contributory value of freight in cases of total loss. The principle recognised as the foundation of this doctrine is that every thing sacrificed for the common safety shall be contributed for by those benefited at its actual worth or value when lost, and that the contribution shall be drawn from every thing saved at its value at the same time. Maggrath v. Church, 1 Caines, 216. The court says the freight actually gained or earned in the voyage, and not what the vessel would have earned if she had gone the full voyage, ought to be the rule of contribution. When a jettison occurs, the freight for the voyage upon the goods thrown overboard is lost with them, and is provided for by general average at the rate of its full value. The freight on the residue of the cargo must accordingly be called on to contribute towards that loss at its value to the ship-owner, as one of the particulars benefited and saved by means of the jettison. What, then, in this relation to the subject, is that value as saved? There is great diversity and looseness of opinion and practice on this point, and it must be regarded yet an undetermined question of commercial law. The justness of the distinction set up between the amount to be paid and received on account of freight is not obvious, particularly as the freight lost, though paid for in full, need not be, and rarely if ever can be, fully earned at the time. The principle of the rule seemed to be aimed at is, to require the freight to be placed on the same footing with the ship and cargo, and have its interest in contribution at a common valuation, whether lost or saved.

The ship contributes upon her actual value, for loss or injury to herself or to the cargo, and in the present case is so contributed for; and it is not undeserving notice in this connection that wages and provisions, which are estimated in average adjustments as expenditures in earning freight saved and to be deducted from the valuation of freight, would perhaps be more appropriately referred to the ship, as necessities of her equipment and navigation, or of the expense of carrying her to the place of disaster. 2 Serg. & R. 229; Id. 237, notes. In that sense their value would be involved in the valuation of the vessel, and ought not to be reiterated and again provided for as a distinct interest in connection with freight. But adopting the usual mode of valuation, and regarding provisions and wages as expenditures in gaining freight and chargeable against that, the question yet recurs, whether the ship-owner is entitled to full freight on the cargo lost, and chargeable with less on that saved?

The case under consideration would mark the unequal operation of such rule as a general one. The owner here claims to be credited gross freight on part of the cargo, and to realize that amount in the adjustment, yet that he should be made chargeable in contribution upon the same, less the cost of earning it, say one-fifth. Thus he would be paid the expense of gaining the freight in a full allowance therefor, and receives compensation again, or what is equivalent, is relieved from contribution, in the way of deduction from the amount, before it is made contributory to the common loss. Such method of valuation, in effect, imparts to the ship-owner a double contribution on the same loss; first, in ranking him as creditor for gross freight, then abating from the sum (which is tantamount to adding it to the ship) the cost of earning it, when it becomes contributory. It is not easy to discern the equity which permits the subtraction of the cost of wages and provisions from freight, and does not allow them on the valuation of the ship. They are the indispensable conditions to her navigation; freight is not. Whatever her value may be at the place of loss, greater or less than at the place of her departure, the services of the crew (represented in wages and provisions) become ingredients of that value, in being the means of placing her there, and would be estimated by the owner as part of her cost price at that place, as the voyage is not necessarily one earning or seeking freight. The ship is the only losing party contributed to in this case, and, it seems to me, the suggestion is not without force, that in adjusting the average by allowing her full freight as parcel of her loss, and abstracting from the amount, when made contributory, her advantage on the average is augmented. She is relieved from contribution proportionably to the privilege thus given to freight when it is contributory.

If the rule were to be regarded as definitely settled, that between owners of the cargo, or in respect to the ship-owner, in compensation of the usual average losses on the vessel, the proportion of contribution laid upon freight shall be adjusted by deducting from the gross freight the cost of earning it; can that privilege be justly claimed, when the vessel seeks not recompense for a partial injury, merely retarding the voyage, which is performed after her reparation, and towards which she must make like contribution, but in compensation for her entire value as a total loss? The modern practice undeniably favors that distinction, and freight is relieved from contributing on general average upon its gross value; and a lesser one, supposed to have first satisfied the expenses of earning it, is assumed as the contributory valuation. 2 Phil. Ins. c. 15, § 11; Abb. Shipp. (Ed. 1829) 356; 1 Caines, 573; Humphreys v. Union Ins. Co. [Case No. 6,871]. Although this is accepted and acted upon by most commercial tribunals as a general doctrine, yet, as has already been shown, there is no uniformity in the rules governing the estimates of value. Sometimes it is an arbitrary abatement of one-fifth, one-third or one-half, and at others the proportion is worked out by valuing the charges incurred in gaining the freight. Without intending presumptuously to originate a plan of contribution in this respect, or to overlook or underate the prevailing practice, or the considerations upon which it is supported, I am more disposed to fall back upon the primitive usage, the great stock from which these diversities are offshoots. The decision now adopted will at least afford the opportunity to parties concerned in the question, to carry the subject before the national court of last resort, where a rule may be established and declared which will govern the American merchant navigation on this important topic.

In the Consulato de Mare, Bourdier's translation, c. 96 (2 Pardessus, Us et Coutumes de la Mer, quarto, p. 101, note 6), it is said, "In case of jettison, if the master receives freight for his whole cargo, the same shall be included in the general contribution;" although the ship, in the same ordinance, on such an average, is rated at one-half her value. And in chapter 98 it is expressly declared, that the freight saved shall contribute for its full value, the same as do the goods saved (2 Pardessus, 103, note 3); and the compiler points out the error of Bourdier in his translation of chapter 98, in this respect. The Laws of Oleron (8) declare, that losses by jettison are paid in full out of the vessel or freight, at the discretion of the master. Zouch, Append. 169, 170. So in various sea laws and ordinances collected by Molloy (B. 2, c. 6, § 12, pp. 12, 13), it appears that the contribution was laid upon the whole value of the freight. The ordinance of Philip II., of 1563, at Antwerp, so allots it, and the same usage had prevailed in the northern parts of Holland before 1300. La Recopila-cion de Leyes de las Indias, in Spain, and the statutes of Genoa, lay on the ship a contribution both for the whole of her value and freight; and the ordinances of Koningsburgh and Hamburgh agree that the ship is to contribute to the same extent for the whole of her value and freight. Molloy refers to some instances amongst the old edicts in which the contribution appointed is less than on the whole value of the freight; but their general bearing and usage puts the gross value of the freight in contribution. Stevens quotes Van Weytsen (Traité des Avarie, 1563), who concludes his examination of the subject, by saying, "that in reason and justice they ought to carry in common contribution the whole value of the vessel, as well as the entire freight which the master receives for the voyage." (Stev. Av. 52; 1 Pardessus, Us et Coutumes de la Mer; Laws of Oleron, art. 8, p. 329, note 2; Id. art. 31, p. 344, note 5).

The considerations adverted to will lead me to place this decision on that basis, and to direct the freight to be charged on the adjustment at its full value at the place of disaster. The proceeds and part of the cargo being arrested in this port, the adjustment will then be made up conformably to the rules governing the subject here; preserving, however, a common basis of contribution in respect to freight, either to it, in satisfaction of its loss, or from it, contributing to the common loss. The decree adopted in this case will meet the other points also brought forward on these motions, and determine the terms of the adjustment to be carried into execution under the judgment of the court.

The court accepted, and ordered to be entered the following form of decree in the case:

This cause having been further heard in respect to the form of the order or decree to be rendered therein, and due consideration being had of the premises, it is considered and adjudged by the court, that the libellants recover against the proceeds of the cargo in the pleadings mentioned, a contributory part on general average in proportion to the value of the cargo saved (represented in whole or in part by the said proceeds) bore to the cargo on board paying freight. And it is further ordered and adjudged, that for the purpose of such contribution, the said ship be estimated at her value at her port of departure, when the voyage in the pleadings mentioned commenced: such value to be proved on the part of the libellants, subject to such deduction for wear and tear up to the time of her loss, as on the part of the claimants shall be proved to be reasonable; and also deducting all sums received by the libellants on sale of said ship, or any part of her tackle or apparel, after the stranding in the pleadings mentioned. And it is further ordered and adjudged, that the cargo laden on board be valued for the purpose of contribution, at the prices stated in the invoice and bills of lading thereof, or either, if both cannot be produced, deducting therefrom salvage and other necessary charges incurred in consequence of the wreck of said ship. And it is further ordered and adjudged, that the freight of the said ship be contributed for at its gross value, and that the freight saved after the wreck also contribute at its gross value, being the amount contributed for in the general average, deducting therefrom all necessary expenses incurred (if any) subsequent to the wreck aforesaid. And it is further ordered and adjudged, that it be referred to the clerk of this court (or, at the option of the parties, to an auditor, to be selected by their respective proctors) to adjust and state the average in this district, conformably to the directions of this decree, and that on such reference the proof produced on the hearing of the cause, and such other evidence as may be pertinent and competent, may be offered by either party, subject to all legal exceptions. And it is further ordered and decreed, that on the coming in and confirmation of the report of the clerk, (or auditor,) the libellants may take and enter a final order, that the claimants, Josiah Macy and others, in the pleadings named, and holding in their hands part of the proceeds aforesaid, pay over to the libellants respectively the sum so reported to be due them, or the rateable proportion thereof, according to their respective insurances, with interest thereon, from January 10, 1842, to the amount of the said funds in their hands, if necessary for that purpose. And it is further ordered and decreed, that the libellants recover their costs to be taxed, to be paid out of said proceeds, but no decree or process by virtue of the proceedings of foreign attachment is to be taken in personam against any party in the pleadings mentioned.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—ACT OF 1790 CONSTRUED—PROCEEDING BY SUMMONS—ATTACHMENT.

1. The provisions of section 6 of the merchant seamen's act of 1790 [1 Stat. 131], with respect to the recovery of wages, apply only to the classes of vessels enumerated in the first section of the act.

2. The proceedings by summons to the master, provided for in section 6, are cumulative and optional, and the party may resort to an attachment in the first instance.

[Approved in The Waverly, Case No. 17,301. Cited in Murray v. The F. B. Nimick, 2 Fed. 88; The Edwin Post, 6 Fed. 208; The Frank C. Barker, 19 Fed. 334.]

On exception to answer, and motion to expunge.

The libel was for seaman's wages. The answer, by its first, second, and third allegations, ignored the hiring of libellants, the rate of wages, and the rendering of the services as alleged in the libel, but on information and belief, disputed the validity of libellant's claim, and in general terms denied the jurisdiction of the court. The fourth allegation of the answer was in the following words: "Fourth: These respondents allege, upon information and belief, that the said steamer, during the season of 1870, was employed in running from the port of Bay City, Michigan, to the port of Pine River, Michigan, making the round trip from said Bay City to said Pine River and return once in each twenty-four hours, and that during said season she made no trip or voyage except between said ports as aforesaid; that since on or about the 4th day of August last, said steamer has been tied up and remained idle at the port of Bay City aforesaid, until about November 1st, 1870, and during that time made no trip or voyage whatever, and that none of the preliminary steps or proceedings provided for and required by the sixth section of the act of congress, passed the 20th day of July, A. D. 1790, entitled 'An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service,' has ever been taken, or complied with by the said libellants, or any person on their behalf; and these respondents therefore submit that the said libellants ought not to have or maintain their said libel, and they pray that they may be allowed to have the same benefit of this objection and defense as if the same had been especially pleaded to the jurisdiction of this court in this proceeding." The exception and motion to expunge related solely to this fourth allegation, and were based upon the alleged reason that the allegations of said article "set forth no defense to said libel or any part thereof."

H. B. Brown, for libellant.
Hoyt Post, for claimant.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The questions discussed upon the argument of the exception and motion, and which are for decision, are: 1. Does this case fall within the purview of section 6 of the act of 1790 (1 Stat. 131)? 2. If the case is within the purview of said section, then do the provisions of the section relating to commencement of suits by seamen for recovery of wages, supersede the law in force at the time the act was passed, or are those provisions merely cumulative and optional?

Section 6 is in the following words: "That every seaman or mariner shall be entitled to demand and receive from the master or commander of the ship or vessel to which they belong," (he belongs) "one-third part of the wages which shall be due him at every port where such ship or vessel shall unlade and deliver her cargo before the voyage be ended, unless the contrary be expressly stipulated in the contract; and as soon as the voyage is ended, and the cargo or ballast be fully discharged at the last port of delivery, every seaman or mariner shall be entitled to the wages which shall be then due according to his contract, and if such wages shall not be paid within ten days after such discharge, or if any dispute shall arise between the master and seamen or mariners, touching the said wages, it shall be lawful for the judge of the district" (or a commissioner appointed by the circuit court, as amended by the act of August 23, 1842,—5 Stat. 516), "where the said ship or vessel shall be, or in case his residence be more than three miles from the place, or of his absence from the place of his residence, then for any judge or justice of the peace, to summon the master of such ship or vessel to appear before him to show cause why process should not issue against such ship or vessel, her tackle, furniture, and apparel, according to the course of admiralty courts, to answer for the said wages; and if the master shall neglect to appear, or appearing, shall not show that the wages are paid, or otherwise satisfied or forfeited, and if the matter in dispute shall not be forthwith settled, in such case the judge" (commissioner), "or justice, shall certify to the clerk of the court of the district, that there is sufficient cause of complaint whereon to found admiralty process, and thereupon the clerk of such court shall issue process against the said ship or vessel, and the suit shall be proceeded on in the said court and final judgment be given according to the course of admiralty courts in such cases used; and in such suit all the seamen or mariners (having cause or complaint of the like kind against the same ship or vessel), shall be joined as complainants; and it shall be incumbent on the master or commander to produce the contract and log-book, if required, to ascertain any matters in dispute; otherwise, the complainants shall be permitted to state the contents thereof, and the proof of the contrary shall lie on the master or commander: but nothing herein contained shall prevent any seaman or mariner from having or maintaining any action at common law for the recovery of his wages, or from immediate process out of any court having admiralty jurisdiction, wherever any ship or vessel may be found, in case she shall have left the port of delivery where her voyage ended, before payment of the wages, or in case she shall be about to proceed to sea before the end of the ten days next after the delivery of her cargo or ballast." I have quoted this section in full for the reason that there are expressions interspersed all through it plainly indicating to my mind the true interpretation to be given of it. The act is entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service." Section 1 provides that "every master or commander of any ship or vessel bound from a port in the United States to any foreign port, or of any ship or vessel of the burden of fifty tons or upwards, bound from a port in one state to a port in any other than an adjoining state, shall, before he proceed on such voyage, make an agreement in writing, or in print, with every seaman or mariner on board such ship or vessel," etc. Then, after providing what shall be the prices or wages to be paid by any master or commander to every seaman or mariner he shall carry out "without such contract or agreement being first made and signed," and for a forfeiture by such master or commander of twenty dollars for each seaman or mariner so carried out, section 1 closes as follows: "And such seaman or mariner, not having signed such contract, shall not be bound by the regulations, nor subject to the penalties and forfeitures, contained in this act." Now, it is apparent, that if section 6 is intended to provide for the same class of cases as is specified in section 1, then the case under consideration does not fall within the purview of section 6, because the vessel was not a vessel "bound from a port in the United States to any foreign port," nor "from a port in one state to a port in any other than an adjoining state."

Mr. Sedgwick, in his treatise on Statutory and Constitutional Law (page 237) says, "It is an ancient and well settled rule, that where any cause of doubt arises, although apparently the doubt attaches only to a particular clause, the whole statute is to be taken together, and to be examined, to arrive at the legislative intent." Applying this rule to the act in question, we find that by section 1 a certain contract or agreement is required to be entered into between the master or commander and the seamen, and the class of vessels and kind of voyages defined to which that requirement shall apply. By a subsequent part of the same act (section 6 above quoted), we find certain rights conferred upon seamen and mariners as to demanding and receiving wages during the voyage, and certain regulations prescribed for the collection of what may be due them on the termination of the voyage, by the express reference to "the voyage," and "the contract." If section 6 stood by itself—if it was all there was of the act—the language used, "the voyage," and "the contract," would at once suggest the idea of something lacking, and an incompleteness of expression and meaning. What "voyage?" what "contract?" We might infer, and should be under the necessity of inferring, however great a grammatical inaccuracy, it would involve, that it meant any voyage in which such ship or vessel was or had been engaged, and any contract relating to such voyage. But when we find section 6 embodied in an act in other parts of which a certain class of voyages are defined, and a certain contract is prescribed and required to be entered into, the meaning of the language used in section 6 at once becomes plain, full, and consistent, and we are not only under no necessity of resorting to inference, but are not allowed to do so under the well settled rule of construction above laid down. Sections 1 and 6 are but parts and parcels of one general system adopted by congress for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service (as expressed in the entitling of the act) in the class of cases therein specified. It is foreign to the plain object and intent of the act, and it is unnecessary, unnatural, and far fetched to attempt to put upon section 6 any other construction. Section 6, standing alone, is also incomplete and inconsistent in another respect, but which incompleteness and inconsistency not only entirely disappear, but the provisions of that section become harmonious and perfect when interpreted in the light of the last clause of section 1. Thus, the idea of the existence of a written or printed contract is so impressed upon section 6 by the language used throughout, that the rights of seamen prescribed by, and the procedure provided for the enforcement of such rights, can hardly be conceived of under said section, in a case in which there is no such written or printed contract. It is impossible to read the section without that impression being produced upon the mind. It is spoken of as "the contract," and "his contract," as containing express stipulations, as determining the amount due, as something to be produced, and of which the contents may be stated; and it is so spoken of in the same manner and evidently in the same sense as it is in every other part of the act, and in such parts, too, as without doubt relate to the written or printed contract prescribed in section 1. Therefore, standing alone as a law to apply to all cases of collection of seamen's wages, the section is incomplete and inconsistent.

Now let us interpret section 6 as a part of a system of which section 1 also constitutes a part. The last clause of section 1 provides as follows: "And such seaman or mariner, not having signed such contract, shall not be bound by the regulations, nor subject to the penalties and forfeitures contained in this act." We can now see clearly why section 6 should, and is consequently made to cover only such cases as arise upon written or printed contracts, and why it makes no provision for any other class of cases. It is because, and only because, by the provisions of the clause of section 1 above quoted, seamen not signing such contract are not subject to any of the provisions of the act of which section 6 is a part. Interpreting section 6 then as a part of one system, of which section 1 is also a part, it again becomes complete, harmonious and consistent. See, also, Cooley, Const. Lim. 55, 57.

I have been referred by counsel to no adjudicated cases involving the point under consideration, and it is believed there are none reported. Judges Betts, Conkling, and Benedict have alluded to it, however, in their several treatises on admiralty practice. Judge Betts (Betts, Adm. 67) adopts the construction that the provisions of section 6 refer exclusively to the class of cases specified in section 1. Judge Conkling (2 Conk. Adm. 68) expresses a doubt, and on account of such doubt, and for reasons based upon certain provisions of the act of February 26, 1845 [5 Stat. 726], extending the jurisdiction of the district courts to certain cases arising on the Lakes, says he had applied the provisions of the sixth section indiscriminately to all vessels embraced by the act of 1845; that is to vessels of twenty tons burden and upwards. He does not discuss the question at all independently of the provisions of the act of 1845, and it is quite apparent that his doubt as to the true interpretation of section 6, and his disagreement from Judge Betts in his practice under it, arose more on account of the difficulties he thought he perceived in the application of Judge Betts' interpretation of section 6 to certain cases arising under the act of 1845, than to anything found in section 6 independently of the act of 1845. Saying nothing of the propriety or soundness of resorting to an act of congress passed fifty-five years after a former act in order to arrive at the legislative intent of such former act, I have simply to observe that, it now being conceded that the act of 1845 is obsolete, and that there is no distinction between the jurisdiction of the admiralty on the Lakes and on tide water, it is to be presumed that that learned judge would now adopt the same reasonable interpretation of section 6 as that adopted by Judge Betts, and would conform his practice to such interpretation. Mr. Benedict (Ben. Adm. 507) goes a little further than Judge Conkling. He says, speaking of the practice in cases for collection of seamen's wages, as founded on the act of 1790: "This is believed to embrace all vessels not in the national naval service. The first three sections of the act relate to vessels and voyages of a particular character, but other sections of the act embrace 'any ship or vessel,' 'any seaman or mariner,' and the careful use of different phraseology for different purposes in the different sections, shows that the language, in every case, was intended to have its appropriate force." But then in this immediate connection the learned judge adds: "The law as administered under this act in the Southern district of New York, will be found very fully laid down in Betts' Practice, pages 59 to 68." Although the learned judge comments somewhat further upon the practice as adopted by Judge Betts, he nowhere alludes to the difference of views between them, as to the class of cases to which section 6 applies. This circumstance, as well as others which become apparent to any one examining the matter closely, such as the fact that the reference made is not to section 6 specially, but generally to "other sections of the act" (other than the first three sections), while the question arises upon section 6 alone; also, that the language quoted by him as the words of the act upon which he bases his opinion, are inaccurate as applied to section 6, and the more important fact that he fails entirely to consider the language quoted, or any like language used in section 6, in connection with and in the light of the context, all tend strongly to show that this learned judge and author did not bring to bear upon the question that close scrutiny and intelligent discrimination which usually characterize his writings and opinions. The subject-matter of section 6 is introduced as follows: "That every seaman or mariner" (general terms, it is true) "shall be entitled to demand and receive from the master or commander of the ship or vessel to which they" (he) "belongs, one-third part of the wages which shall be due to him at every port where such ship or vessel shall unlade and deliver her cargo before the voyage" (qualification No. 1—what voyage? See section 1) "be ended, unless the contrary be expressly stipulated in the contract" (qualification No. 2—what contract? See section 1). And so throughout the whole section qualifications occur which can be satisfactorily explained and understood only by reference to section 1, and by the application of those old and well-settled canons of interpretation and construction of statutes to which I have already alluded.

Upon the whole, therefore, I am of the opinion, as to the first question stated, that the provisions of the sixth section of the act of 1790, for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service (1 Stat. 131), are to be considered as referring exclusively to those voyages preparatory to which the master or commander is required, by the first section of the act, to make an agreement in writing with the seamen. From this it follows that the voyage or voyages in which the wages claimed by the libellants in this case are alleged to have been earned, not being voyages from a port in the United States to some foreign port, or from a port in one state to a port in any other than an adjoining state, as specified in section one of the act, but, on the contrary, to and from ports in the same state, the case does not fall within the purview of section 6; and hence that the exception to article 4 of the answer is well taken.

I am also of opinion, under the second question stated, that the proceedings prescribed by section 6 are merely cumulative and optional; and consequently, even if the case were within the purview of section 6, the exception would be well taken. But as the exception is disposed of upon the first question, I shall not enter into any extended discussion of the second. It is an old and well-settled rule of construction, that "where a right or remedy exists at common law, and a statute is passed giving a new remedy, without any negative, express or implied, upon the old common law, the party has his election either to sue at common law, or to proceed upon the statute." Sedg. St. & Const. Law, 93, 125, 401, 402, and the numerous cases cited. This rule is applicable to the remedies under the maritime law as well as the common law. When the act of 1790 was passed, it was lawful for seamen to commence suit in rem in the admiralty by libel, and arrest the vessel in the first instance. The act of 1790 simply makes it lawful, in certain specified cases, to proceed by summons in the first instance, as preliminary to the libel and arrest. There is no provision expressly negativing the old law, and the language used in conferring the right to such new proceeding is certainly very far from implying such negative. The rule of construction above quoted, therefore, applies with its full force. This same rule of construction has been applied in numerous cases to another branch of the act of 1790, viz., that relating to desertion of seamen; and it may be now regarded as well settled that the maritime law of desertion is not superseded by the statute, notwithstanding the latter defines and prescribes punishment for desertion in some respects different from the offense and its punishment as defined by the former; and hence it is optional with the party injured to proceed under the maritime law, or under the statute. I can see no good reason why the same rule should not apply to the provisions of section 6, so far as it prescribes a mode of procedure for collection of seamen's wages.

I hold, therefore, that the preliminary proceedings by summons, &c., prescribed by section 6 of the act of 1790, are cumulative, and in addition to the ordinary proceedings by libel, according to the admiralty practice, and may be resorted to or not at the option of the libellant. See Judge Sprague's opinion in the case of The William Jarvis [Case No. 17,697], in which this question is fully and ably discussed, and the above views and conclusions are fully maintained. The exceptions are allowed. Motion granted.

Circuit Court, D. Maryland.

BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNMENT OF PROPERTY—UNDER DECREE OF STATE COURT—VOID PREFERENCE.

1. A trustee, who had misappropriated a fund intrusted to his management, and so turned it over as finally to invest it in property in his own name, finally is adjudicated a bankrupt; but, within six months before adjudication, he had executed a deed of this property for certain proper purposes in obedience to a decree in equity of a state court, before which he was sued as trustee. Held, that this assignment was not such as is meant to be declared void by section 5129 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (section 35 of the bankruptcy act of congress [14 Stat. 534]).

2. An assignment within six months of bankruptcy, of real estate acquired before he became trustee, but paid for out of funds acquired under the trust, was not such an act as section 35 makes void.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Maryland.]

Petition for review in circuit court. This was a petition on the part of certain creditors of Andrew J. Myers to the district court to have him adjudicated a bankrupt.

The acts of bankruptcy set forth in the petition are, that within six calendar months preceding the date of the petition the alleged bankrupt, being seized and possessed of certain real estate in the district, made an assignment thereof to a certain Edward P. Suter, trustee, with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors. The deed is dated the 10th day of April, 1876, and it is not disputed that Myers executed and delivered it. It is then alleged that Myers, about the 28th day of March, 1876, suffered and procured his property to be taken upon legal process in favor of Suter, trustee. After the hearing of the petition, and an examination of the facts, the district court refused to declare Myers a bankrupt, and this is an appeal to the supervisory jurisdiction of the circuit court.

The facts pertinent to the questions to be here considered appear to be that Myers, about the 21st of December, 1860, by the circuit court of Baltimore county, in a cause there depending, in which he and his wife were complainants, and a certain Thomas J. Griffith, together with certain infant children of the complainants et al., were defendants, was appointed trustee to execute the trusts contained in the will of a certain Edward Griffith, and as such trustee took possession of a large amount of real and personal property. It further appears that in total disregard of his obligations as trustee, he squandered a large part of the trust property, and by many changes, sales, and transfers, had managed to get the most of that left, and that which was purchased with the proceeds of sale of such as in violation of his trust he had sold, invested in his own name. These facts coming to the knowledge of the cestuis que trust, about the 13th of March, 1876, they filed a petition in the cause depending in the circuit court of Baltimore county, setting them forth, and asking to have a new trustee appointed, and that Myers should be made to account. Myers, about the 28th of March, 1876, answered this petition, admitting the facts alleged, the truth of which could not be denied. The state court, on the same day, passed a decree removing Myers from his trust, and appointed one Edward P. Suter trustee in his stead. The decree directed Myers to surrender and deliver all the trust property to the new trustee, together with all the property standing in his individual name, or held by him individually, but really belonging to the trust estate, or for the purchase of which the trust funds were used and applied. In compliance with this decree Myers executed the deed of assignment which is here alleged as an act of bankruptcy.

BOND, Circuit Judge. So far as the charge of the petition that Myers procured his property to be taken upon legal process is concerned, it seems to me it is easily settled The proof is pretty clear that until Myers came into possession of the trust property he had none of his own, or at least but little, and even if he had caused the petition on the part of his cestuis que trust to be filed, of which there is no proof, he could hardly be said to have procured his own property to be taken in execution, for it was not his in any full sense. The assignment in obedience to a decree of a court of equity, which, if he had not made it immediately, ought to have sent him to prison at once for contempt, is not such an assignment as is contemplated by the 35th section of the bankrupt act. But proof is offered to show that one piece of property assigned by Myers to the trustee, Suter, was held by Myers in his own name antecedent to his appointment as trustee of Edward Griffith's will, and the assignment of this piece of property which it is said is not within the terms of the decree of Baltimore county court is an act of bankruptcy. Myers says, however, in his examination, and there is nothing to contradict it, that he borrowed the money to purchase the property in question, and afterwards paid the lender with the money of Griffith's estate. This, it is argued, does not make the property in question part of the trust estate, because the money of the trust is not traced directly to investment in it. But surely it would be hard to adjudge that an act of bankruptcy which stands upon so doubtful a point of equity law. Myers was required by the decree of a court whose confidence he had grossly violated to convey to Suter all property in the purchase of which he had used funds of the trust estate committed to his care. He had not, perhaps, in this instance taken the actual money paid to him as trustee to pay for this particular piece of property, but he repaid the loan which he had made in order to its purchase with trust funds. It is not unlikely, had he not done as he did, and made the transfer, Baltimore county court would have imprisoned him till he complied with the decree, and would have ruled, as it should have done, all doubtful questions of equity against the faithless trustee, leaving their final determination to await the suit of some injured creditor. We do not think this, under the circumstances and facts shown, was an act of bankruptcy on the part of Myers. There is nothing else alleged in the petition of these creditors as an act of bankruptcy which is set out with any particularity. Proof has been offered here, however, of an assignment of an interest in an insurance company; but as that assignment was not specifically set forth in the petition, or mentioned in any way, so as to give the bankrupt notice that he was to be held to answer it, no proof of it was allowed to be given in the district court, but was properly refused. I think the judgment of the district court was correct, and that this petition should be dismissed.

Case No. 9,985.

MYERS v. COTTRILL.

[5 Biss. 465.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Oct., 1873.

INNKEEPERS—LIABILITY FOR LOSS—COMMERCIAL TRAVELER—NEGLIGENCE—ACTION BY HUSBAND FOR PROPERTY OF WIFE.

1. Where a guest at a hotel takes to his room valuable articles of merchandise and keeps them there for show and for sale, inviting purchasers to examine them, the hotel-keeper is relieved as to such merchandise from the special liability of the common law.

2. The fact that such guest sleeps in the room does not alter this rule.

3. The statute of Wisconsin does not alter this rule, for that did not contemplate the case of guests bringing quantities of merchandise to be placed in the safe, nor did it intend to compel an innkeeper to receive whatever merchandise his guests might choose to bring, nor to provide a safe to contain it.

4. These rules will not, however, under either the common law, or the statute, excuse the innkeeper for the negligence of either himself or his servants.

5. The innkeeper, knowing that such goods were in the room, should use reasonable diligence with reference to the condition and value of the property.

6. Negligence is a relative term, depending very much upon the circumstances of each case, and is frequently a mixed question of law and of fact.

7. Property belonging to the wife may be recovered for in an action brought by the husband, provided it was given to the wife by the husband.

8. The fact that the property of the wife was in the same room with the merchandise does not alone prevent him from recovering.

9. The innkeeper in order to avail himself of the state statute as a defense must show that he has literally complied with it.

This was an action by Samuel Myers against William H. Cottrill, the proprietor of the Plankinton House in Milwaukee, to recover the value of certain property alleged to have been stolen from his room in the

Plankinton House, on the 29th of May, 1872. The plaintiff and his brother were partners in business in Boston, and were in the habit of taking to different parts of the country for sale various articles of jewelry, which when thus taken were charged to the person taking it, and he was considered accountable to the firm for it. The plaintiff and his wife arrived at the Plankinton House on the 27th of May, 1872, and were assigned to room No. 80, on the third floor of the hotel, to which room were sent his trunks and certain packages, forwarded to him by express, containing a large quantity of watches, chains and various kinds of jewelry, of the value of from $15,000 to $16,000. The admitted object of the plaintiff's visit was to dispose of this property in the ordinary course of business, and immediately after his arrival he took part of it out of his trunks and arranged it in his room and from that time forward displayed it from time to time to different persons, and sold a considerable quantity of it. Either the plaintiff or his wife were in the room regularly except when absent at their meals. On the morning of the 29th of May, between eight and nine o'clock, the plaintiff and his wife left their room to go to breakfast, leaving it in its usual condition, locking the door, and taking the key with them. On their return, in about twenty minutes, they found the door open, papers strewn on the floor and several empty watch-cases scattered about, the trunks open, having the appearance of having been rifled of their contents, and watches and jewelry of the value of about $4,000 missing. The alarm was immediately given, the police called and an examination of the apartment made by them, but no clew was found to the perpetrators of the robbery. There was no appearance that the door had been broken open, and a key which on trial was found to open the door was discovered upon the bureau. In addition to this jewelry, there was also taken a gold watch and jewelry belonging to the plaintiff's wife, of the value of $400.

The statute of Wisconsin concerning innkeepers, which was relied upon by the defense, is as follows:

"Sec. 71. No innkeeper in this state, who shall constantly have in his inn, an iron safe, in good order, and suitable for the safe custody of money, jewelry, and articles of gold or silver manufacture, and of the like, and who shall keep a copy of this act printed by itself, in large, plain English type, and framed, constantly and conspicuously, suspended in the office, bar-room, saloon, reading, sitting and parlor room of his inn, and also a copy printed by itself in ordinary size plain English type, posted upon the inside of the entrance door of every public sleeping room of his inn, shall be liable for the loss of any such articles aforesaid, suffered by any guest; unless such guest shall have first offered to deliver such property lost by him to such innkeeper for custody in such iron safe, and such innkeeper shall have refused or omitted to take it and deposit it in such safe for its custody, and give such guest a receipt therefor.

"Sec. 72. * * * Any innkeeper shall be liable for any loss of any guest in his inn, caused by theft or gross negligence of the innkeeper, or any of his servants, anything to the contrary thereof in this act notwithstanding." 2 Tayl. St. Wis. 1871, pp. 1662, 1663.

It was conceded that the notice required by law to be posted in every room was not posted in the room occupied by the plaintiff.

Winfield Smith, for plaintiff.

1. The innkeeper is the insurer of the property of the guest within the inn. Hulett v. Swift, 42 Barb. 230, on appeal, 33 N. Y. 571; Calye's Case, 8 Coke 32; Mason v. Thompson, 9 Pick. 280; Sibley v. Smith, 25 Wend. 642; Burrows v. Trieber, 21 Md. 320; Thickstun v. Howard, 8 Blackf. 535; Taylor v. Monnot, 4 Duer, 116.

2. At all events he is liable for any negligence, and a loss is prima facie evidence of negligence. McDaniels v. Robinson, 26 Vt. 316; Gile v. Libby, 36 Barb. 70; Johnson v. Richardson, 17 Ill. 302; Laird v. Eichold, 10 Ind. 212; Kiston v. Hildebrand, 9 B. Mon. 72.

3. The liability extends to goods and merchandise, as well as to the guest's personal baggage. Calye's Case, 8 Coke, 32; Johnson v. Richardson, 17 Ill. 302; Richmond v. Smith, 8 Barn. & C. 9; Piper v. Manny, 21 Wend. 282; Hawley v. Smith, 25 Wend. 642; Clute v. Wiggins, 14 Johns. 175; Farnworth v. Packwood, 1 Starkie, 249; McDaniels v. St. 92; Kellogg v. Sweeney, 1 Lans. 397, 46 N. Y. 291, 293. See Manning v. Hollenbeck, 27 Wis. 202.

4. Slight, or even considerable negligence of guest does not exonerate innkeeper. Classen v. Leopold, 2 Sweeney, 705; Shoecraft v. Bailey, 25 Iowa, 553; Wilkins v. Earle, 44 New York, 172; Cashill v. Wright, 6 El. & Bl. 891; Buddenberg v. Benner, 1 Hilt. 84; Richmond v. Smith, 8 Barn. & C. 9; Profilet v. Hall, 14 La. Ann. 524; Berkshire Woollen Co. v. Proctor, 7 Cush. 417; Woodward v. Birch, 4 Bush, 510; Quinton v. Courtney, 1 Hayw. (N. C.) 40; Burrows v. Trieber, 21 Md. 320.

5. Even if personal and actual notice to the guest of the safe, etc., would bring the case within the statute, so as to relieve the innkeeper (Purvis v. Coleman, 21 N. Y. 111), nothing short of such notice would have that effect (Lima v. Dwinelle, 7 Alb. Law J. 44; Bodwell v. Bragg, 29 Iowa, 232; Richmond v. Smith, 8 Barn. & C. 9).

6. Though a guest may become his own insurer by taking exclusive charge of his room, yet the innkeeper is not relieved merely because he gives the guest a key. More especially, when as in this case, the keys of other rooms in the hotel unlock the plaintiff's door. Farnworth v. Packwood, 1 Starkie, 249; Newson v. Axon, 1 McCord, 509; Epps v. Hinds, 27 Miss. 657; Berkshire Woollen Co. v. Proctor, 7 Cush. 417; Pope v. Hall, 14 La. Ann. 324; Johnson v. Richardson, 17 Ill. 302; Burgess v. Clements, 4 Maule & S. 306.

7. The innkeeper's liability extends to property brought into the hotel by the guest, though it belong to others. Johnson v. Richardson, 17 Ill. 302; Epps v. Hinds, 27 Miss. 657; Berkshire Woollen Co. v. Proctor, 7 Cush. 417; Needles v. Howard, 1 E. D. Smith, 54; See Manning v. Hollenbeck, 27 Wis. 202.

8. The merchandise in question was committed to the plaintiff by the firm of which he was a partner, charged to his account, and is to be accounted for by him, and although the partner has an equitable interest, the plaintiff may properly sue alone, as entitled to the sole custody, and as "trustee of an express trust" under the Wisconsin statute, which is taken from the New York Code. Rev. St. Wis. p. 858, c. 122, § 14; Kimball v. Spicer, 12 Wis. 668, 671; Gardinier v. Kellogg, 14 Wis. 605; People v. Norton, 9 N. Y. 176; Minturn v. Main, 7 N. Y. 220.

9. The letter of the plaintiff offered in evidence does not prove a contract. If it is evidence of a contract, such contract is not champertous. "Such an agreement is neither unlawful, immoral, nor disreputable." Allard v. Lamirande, 29 Wis. 502, 508.

Cary & Cottrill, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge, after stating the facts, charged the jury as follows: The counsel for the defendant insist that he is not liable for the merchandise stolen, because at the time of the alleged loss it belonged jointly to the plaintiff and his partner. But as I understand the facts, although there was no absolute sale of the property by the firm to the person who thus took it for sale, it was nevertheless considered as in his custody and to be accounted for by him to the firm in any event. This being so, the court instructs you that inasmuch as the property was within the custody and control of the plaintiff, he was a trustee of the property, accountable to the firm, and therefore can maintain an action for it in his own name.

The defendant was an innkeeper at the time. He was subject to the law applicable to innkeepers as to the property of guests in his house, either under the common law or the statute law of this state. And the first question is, whether he was liable for the property, confessedly mere merchandise and not ordinary baggage of the plaintiff and his wife, which was in their room at the time they were the guests of the house.

The general rule of the common law undoubtedly was and is that an innkeeper is responsible for the property of a guest brought within the house, or within that which may fairly be considered as appurtenant to the house, and so within his custody. And perhaps it is not going too far to say that it is very nearly an absolute liability, that is he is bound to see that the property is kept safe, as it is in his custody in contemplation of law. But conceding that to be the rule of the common law do the facts in this case change the rule?

I think this is the true rule of law on the subject. If a person, going into a hotel as a guest, takes to his room not ordinary baggage, not those articles which generally accompany the traveler, but valuable merchandise, such as watches and jewelry, and keeps them there for show and sale, and from time to time invites parties into his room to inspect and to purchase, unless there is some special circumstance in the case showing that the innkeeper assumes the responsibility as of ordinary baggage, as to such merchandise, the special obligations imposed by the common law do not exist, and the guest, as to those goods, becomes their vendor and uses his room for the sale of merchandise, and really changes the ordinary relations between innkeeper and guest.

It is, we know, as a matter of experience impracticable for the landlord to notice and vouch for every person who goes into the room. The guest permits them to stay as long as he pleases, and shows his goods and sells them to whomsoever he pleases. We must presume that it is not for that purpose that the innkeeper allows persons to come to his house and enter his rooms, and the fact that the vendor may sleep in the room I do not think changes the rule. Therefore the court will leave it to you as a question of fact to say whether or not the evidence brings the case within the conditions stated; that is, whether or not the plaintiff did use room No. 80 as a place for showing and selling his merchandise as such. If he did, in the absence of evidence proving the contrary, then I think, as to that, the extraordinary obligations of the innkeeper did not exist.

One point to be considered is as to the effect of the special act of the legislature of this state as to the liability of innkeepers. It is a question not free from difficulty perhaps, but I am inclined to think that the law of Wisconsin did not contemplate the case of guests bringing to the inn quantities of merchandise to be placed in the safe. The law may be said to assume that there is a safe in the house, but it is not to be assumed that is was within the intention of the legislature that an innkeeper should have a safe so large as to retain any quantity of merchandise that guests might bring into the house, and thus turn the hotel into a warehouse. It is very difficult, undoubtedly, to decide precisely what meaning is to be attached to the language of the statute, when it speaks of "money, jewelry, and articles of gold and silver manufacture, and of the like," whether, in other words, it intends to include the ornaments which a lady, for example, may have, and from time to time wear about her person, and which may be and often are of very great value. I think, however, that it is clear that it was not within the contemplation of the lawmakers to compel the innkeeper to take in any quantity of merchandise, however bulky or valuable it might be, which the guests might choose to bring into the house.

Here the plaintiff brought into this house a large quantity of watches, chains, and other jewelry. They were confessedly not used either by himself or his wife as travelers, but he was there with them as a merchant selling goods, and I do not think the statute contemplates a case of that kind. So that it depends upon the general principles of law whether the defendant is liable for the merchandise if it were taken.

Although in one aspect of the case the defendant might not be liable, still the fact that these articles were there as merchandise, and were exposed and sold in the manner stated, would not prevent the plaintiff from recovering the value of the property if there was any negligence on the part of the defendant or of his servants, for I am not prepared to go so far as to say that the principle which I have stated will excuse the innkeeper for the negligence either of himself or of his servants. But that is a question to be determined by the jury under the instructions of the court; for example, whether or not the defendant knew that the goods were there and shown and sold in the manner stated; whether or not he had provided the proper means of security for the goods. I will not say that it was incumbent on the defendant if he knew they were there to keep a watchman in the hall and at the corners to watch the ingress and egress of every person that might come or go. But he should have used reasonable diligence with reference to the condition of the property, as one whose duties and responsibilities may have been qualified by the special circumstances of the case, he being to some extent relieved from the extraordinary responsibility of an innkeeper.

And it is also proper for you to consider whether or not there was a key to the room, or whether there were keys of other rooms that would open the door of No. 80, and which would enable any person or any guest in the house to enter the room, because, of course, a guest may be a thief as well as an outside intruder or the servants of a hotel. Then if the defendant or his servants were guilty of negligence, and of course if his servants abstracted the property, the defendant would be liable.

Another question proper for the jury to consider is whether or not the plaintiff was himself guilty of any negligence. Negligence is a relative term depending very much upon the circumstances of each case. We feel it our duty sometimes as a court to say, under conceded facts of a case, whether or not they constitute negligence, and to instruct a jury absolutely that such facts do or do not constitute negligence. At other times, it is a mixed question of law and of fact, partly for the court and partly for the jury to determine, whether or not there is negligence in a given case.

A person might be in a hotel as an ordinary guest, and protected in every way in which a guest could be in his property, and yet might be guilty of such negligence as to prevent him from recovering for its loss. For example, if a man occupies a room in a hotel and goes out and leaves his door open, and on his table, exposed to view, a large sum of money, where persons are passing backward and forward in the hall, there perhaps would not be a difference of opinion. Every man would say the guest had no right to go out of his room and leave his door open, and a large sum of money thus exposed, tempting the cupidity or the criminality of any person who might happen to see it. That may serve as an illustration. I think that we may say that there is more care required of a guest in a hotel, where he has articles of great value in his room, and especially when he is aware that it is known by many persons that they are there, than if he had but ordinary baggage. Now it is for you to say, taking the testimony of the plaintiff, whether there was any want of due care on his part which contributed in any way to the loss of this property. He says—and if that is true, and you believe that statement, of course it goes very far to show that there was a very considerable amount of care exercised as to the custody of this property—that either he or his wife was always there except when they went to their meals.

It is insisted on the part of the defendant that the value of the property which belonged to the wife, and which it is alleged was taken, cannot be recovered in this action. I shall instruct you that it can be recovered, provided you believe from the evidence that the property lost was given to the wife by the husband. For it depends upon different rules from those stated in relation to the merchandise. It is said that there was about $400 worth of property of the wife taken, one article of which was a very valuable watch.

I am not prepared to say that if the plaintiff had those goods in the room, and was showing and selling them, and they together with other property belonging to his wife were taken, that circumstance alone would prevent him from recovering for the property of his wife. That may depend upon the construction to be given this special act of the legislature upon the subject. It is very difficult, as I have stated, to limit or qualify this act of the legislature so as to exclude the ordinary articles of ornament which a lady may be in the daily habit of wearing about her person. For example, I hardly think that it could have been the intention of the legislature to require every guest that entered a house to deposit his watch in the safe of the hotel.

Mr. Cottrill: Will your honor allow me to state that in a case at Madison the supreme court of this state expressly held that the legislative act covered the watch of the guest which he had put under his pillow. Stewart v. Parsons, 24 Wis. 241.

THE COURT: Very well. If the supreme court of this state has so held, and it is the settled law of this state, of course we may feel obliged to acquiesce in that decision, and to rule accordingly. I was about to say that I doubted very much whether it was the intention of the law to compel every man when he went to bed, instead of putting his watch under his pillow or somewhere where he could see the hour, to put it in the safe, but if the supreme court of this state has so declared, we will acquiesce in that decision. Our rule is to follow the decisions of the supreme court of the state. I would like to see that decision. (Counsel produces it.) Well, if that is the law of this state, then I think it my duty to say to you that before the innkeeper would be exempt from liability for the loss of the wife's property he must show that he has literally complied with the law. He must do all these things specified in the act, and prove them, in order to exempt himself from liability. And if this decision is to be received, and these facts are all proven, then I suppose that the innkeeper would not be responsible for the property of the wife. Otherwise he would be. Now, in regard to the wife's property, if the plaintiff has been guilty of negligence, of course the same rule would apply as I have stated it, and so if the defendant or his servants had been guilty of negligence, even if he had complied with the act of the legislature, because the law excepts the negligence of the innkeeper or his servants.

The jury returned a verdict of $456.15, the value of the watch and jewelry belonging to Mrs. Myers, with interest.

MYERS v. DAVIS.

[6 Blatchf. 77.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. March 19, 1868.

PLEADING AT LAW—ASSUMPSIT—FORM OF DECLARATION—BAD COUNTS—GENERAL DEMURRER.

1. The proper form of a declaration, in an action of assumpsit, in this court, commented on.

2. A count in such a declaration, alleging a sale and delivery of property by a third party to the defendant, an agreement by the defendant to pay such third party so much money therefor, and an assignment of the claim of such third party to the plaintiff, but not alleging that the defendant ever undertook or promised the plaintiff to pay to him the whole or any part of the claim, is bad, on general demurrer.

3. A count in such a declaration, alleging a sale of property by the plaintiff and a third party to the defendant, for so much money, and an agreement by the defendant to pay that sum therefor, but not alleging that the promise was to pay at any specified time, or on demand or request, and alleging that the defendant had not paid any part thereof to the plaintiff or to such third party, that such third party assigned his interest in the demand to the plaintiff, and that the defendant, in consideration of the premises, promised to pay such money to the plaintiff, but not alleging that the defendant promised the plaintiff, or that the promise was to pay at any particular time, or on demand or request, and not alleging any other consideration for the promise, or any request or refusal to pay, is bad, on general demurrer.

4. Another count in such a declaration, held bad, on general demurrer, and its defects pointed out.

This case came before the court on a general demurrer to the third, fourth and sixth so-called counts of a pleading, on the part of the plaintiff [Austin Myers], in a suit at law, which the defendant [Frank S. Davis], in his demurrer, treated as a declaration.

HALL, District Judge. The plaintiff's pleading, so far as it can be said to have form or comeliness, is probably in the form of a complaint under the New York Code of Procedure; and, if it has, in some respects, the substance of a proper pleading in this court, it may properly be considered as belonging to the same class of misbegotten and ill-shaped hybrids with the pleading I had occasion to remark upon in the case of Birdsall v. Perego [Case No. 1,435], decided at the October term, 1865.

If the demurrer, in this case, had been special, and had properly alleged the want of form of the pleading demurred to, as a pleading in this court, a single glance at the pleading itself would have been sufficient to justify the court in declaring that the whole declaration was clearly bad. But the de-murrer is not special, and a somewhat careful examination has been given to so much of the plaintiff's pleading as is covered by the demurrer.

The pleading demurred to has not the proper form of a declaration in either of the several forms of action which are sustainable on the law side of this court. The plaintiff's case required a declaration in assumpsit, and the pleading demurred to approaches more nearly to a declaration in assumpsit than to any other legitimate form of pleading, and its sufficiency must, therefore, be maintained, if at all, on the ground that the three several parts of the plaintiff's pleading to which the demurrer applies, are sufficient, in substance, as counts in assumpsit, under the rules of pleading which obtain in this court. It is in that light that I shall consider the questions raised by the demurrer.

The statement of the cause of action thirdly alleged, is bad, in substance, for the reason, among others, that it alleges a sale and delivery of stock by one Hagar to the defendant, an agreement by the defendant to pay Hagar $3,300 therefor, and a subsequent sale and assignment of this claim of Hagar's to the plaintiff, without alleging that the defendant ever undertook or promised the plaintiff to pay to him the whole or any part of the claim.

The statement of the cause of action fourthly alleged, is bad, in substance, for a different cause. It alleges a sale of stock, by the plaintiff and Hagar, to the defendant, for the price of $7,000, and an agreement, by the defendant, to pay that sum therefor, but without alleging that the promise was to pay at any specified time, or on demand or request; that the defendant had not paid any part thereof to the plaintiff, or to Hagar; that Hagar, for a valuable consideration, transferred and assigned his interest in said demand to the plaintiff; and that the defendant afterward, and before the commencement of the suit, "in consideration of the premises respectively, promised to pay the said sum of $7,000 to the plaintiff," without alleging that "the defendant undertook and promised the plaintiff," &c., or that the promise was to pay at any particular time, or on demand or request, and without alleging any other consideration for the promise, or any request or refusal to pay. The undertaking and promise of the defendant should have been alleged to have made to the plaintiff, and the pleading should have alleged a promise or undertaking to pay on request, or at a specified time, and then have alleged, in proper terms, the non-performance of such promise or undertaking.

The statement of the cause of action sixthly made in the declaration, is bad, in substance, for the reason that there is a failure to set forth an undertaking or promise, and its non-performance, in such manner as to show a right of action, these defects being similar to those already referred to in respect to the cause of action fifthly stated. It is bad, also, because it does not state why, or how, the plaintiff and Hagar sustained damages, or sufficiently show that the damages claimed are the legal consequence of the suspension of work, or that the defendant undertook, or promised, to pay such damages, the alleged promise "to pay the said several sums of money respectively to the plaintiff," not being an allegation of a promise to pay damages the amount of which had only been stated in one single aggregate sum of $10,000.

The defendant must have judgment on the demurrer, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his declaration, and the several counts therein, within twenty days, on payment of costs.

Case No. 9,987.

MYERS et al. v. D'MEZA.

[2 Woods, 160.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1875.

ESTOPPEL—RES JUDICATA—LIEN—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

A creditor of a succession claimed title to a part of the proceeds of a life insurance policy, on the ground that the policy had been pledged to him to secure a debt due him from the testator, but his claim was rejected by the court, on the ground that there had been no delivery of the pledge: Held, that this decision was no bar to a bill in equity to enforce a specific performance of the contract to deliver the pledge and for a decree for so much of the proceeds of the policy as might be necessary to pay the complainant's claim.

In equity. Heard upon bill and plea in bar. The case made by the bill was as follows: The complainants, [Myers & Levy,] during the lifetime of [A. D.] D'Meza, advanced to him the sum of $3,524, on the condition that he would assign to them a certain policy of insurance on his life for $5,000. D'Meza did indorse an assignment on the policy, but died before delivering the policy to complainants. His executor, instead of complying with the contract of his testator by delivering the policy to complainants, collected the money due thereon from the insurance company, and refused to pay the same to complainants. So much of the amount collected as was necessary to pay the sum advanced by complainants to the testator was, by the order of the probate court, kept separate from the other assets of the succession. The prayer of the bill was for a specific performance of the contract to assign the policy, and for an order enjoining the executor from paying out said money, or mingling it with other funds of the succession, until the final decree in this case, and that said executor might be ordered to pay over said $3,524 to the complainants. To this bill the defendant filed a plea to the effect, that on an opposition to the provisional account and tableau of distribution filed by him in the probate court, in his said capacity of executor of the succession of D'Meza, the said complainants did claim the same thing, founded on the same cause of action as that demanded of defendant in this case, and judgment was rendered dismissing said opposition, which on appeal to the supreme court of Louisiana was affirmed. In other words, the defendant claimed that the question raised by this litigation had been decided by a court of competent jurisdiction, in a proceeding between the same parties, and that such decision was a bar to suit.

Harry T. Hays and J. H. New, for complainant.

A Voorhies and W. Voorhies, for defendant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The proof to support the plea is a certified transcript from the record of the probate court of the parish of Orleans, of the opposition of the complainants, Myers & Levy, to the provisional tableau of the defendant, as executor of A. D. D'Meza, and the decree of the supreme court rendered on appeal. The provisional tableau to which their opposition was made shows that Myers & Levy were placed in the same as ordinary or general creditors. The opposition to this tableau represented that opponents had a special lien on said policy of $5,000, to secure the payment of their debt, and prayed that they be declared to have a privilege upon said life policy, or the funds received thereon, and that the executor be ordered to pay the opponents said sum of three thousand, five hundred and twenty-four dollars.

It seems to me quite clear that a judgment that the complainants in this case had no lien or privilege on this fund does not bar them from setting up an absolute title to the policy, or to a part of its proceeds. It is plain from the opinion of the supreme court, that the claim of the complainants to a specific performance of the contract of D'Meza, to transfer to them the policy, has never been adjudicated upon.

The supreme court, in affirming the judgment of the probate court, dismissing the opposition to the tableau, say: "Whether opponent's remedy were an action to enforce the verbal contract, with regard to the policy, or a suit for breach thereof, it is unnecessary to decide in disposing of this case. But it is proper to remark, that a contract or promise to transfer or deliver a collateral to secure a debt resulting from the payment by the indorsers of notes indorsed for accommodation, gives no privilege or pledge upon the collateral, not transferred or delivered in pursuance of said contract or promise." Succession of D'Meza, 26 La. Ann. 35. It appears from this as well as from the opposition to the tableau, that the opponents were setting up a claim to the fund as to a thing pledged. The case went against them, because it appeared that the thing which was claimed as a pledge had never been delivered. On this ground alone the court decided against them. Can there be any doubt that a decision of that controversy does not bar the complainants from praying a specific performance of the contract to deliver the pledge? It is clear, that this would be an entirely different issue, and would not be decided by a judgment, finding that the pledge had never been delivered. To ascertain what is demanded in a particular suit, in order to determine whether it is a bar to another suit brought, resort must be had to the prayer of the petition. Slocomb v. Lizardi, 21 La. Ann. 355.

The prayer of the opposition to the tableau, and the prayer of the bill in this case, differ in the relief sought, and the title to the relief sought is different in the two cases. But the defendant says, that when a party has brought suit upon a particular title, and has been defeated, he cannot afterwards bring another suit for the same thing upon another title, unless he acquired such title since the former demand. In support of this proposition he cites the cases of Williams v. Close, 12 La. Ann. 873, and Shaffer v. Scuddy, 14 La. Ann. 576. But these authorities do not settle the question raised by the plea in bar. It may well be held, that if a plaintiff has two titles to a thing, one derived from A. and the other from B., and he brings suit for the recovery of the thing to which his titles relate, and offers in evidence only the title derived from A., and loses his case, he cannot afterwards bring another action and set up the title derived from B. The reason is, that he might have used both titles in his first suit. But in this case, the complainants having claimed in the probate court, to have a pledge of the policy, could not at the same time set up an absolute title. Evidence to sustain title would not have been pertinent to the issue and would have been excluded. In fact, the probate court would not have had jurisdiction of a suit for the specific performance of the contract. Code Prac. art. 126.

I am of opinion, that the controversy presented by the bill in this case, has never been passed upon, and it would be depriving the complainants of their day in court upon it, to hold them concluded by the proceedings in the probate court. The finding of this court must, therefore, be against the plea of defendant.

Case No. 9,988.

MYERS v. DORR et al.

[13 Blatchf. 22.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. Oct Term, 1870.

COURTS—FEDERAL JURISDICTION—NEITHER PARTY RESIDENT OF STATE—CORPORATIONS—PURCHASE OF INTEREST PENDENTE LITE—PLEADING IN EQUITY.

1. M., a copartner with D., filed a bill against D. for a dissolution of the copartnership, and an account. The firm had a contract with the S. Co., a corporation, in regard to the furnishing by it to the firm of marble. A receiver of the copartnership property was appointed. Afterwards, M. filed an amendment and supplement to the bill, alleging a secret agreement by D. with the S. Co., in fraud of the rights of M. under said contract, and the refusal of the S. Co. to furnish marble to the receiver, and making the S. Co. a defendant, and praying a specific performance of said contract by it. M. was a citizen of Ohio. The bill alleged that the S. Co. was a citizen of Vermont. The S. Co. interposed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court over it, alleging that it was a corporation created by Massachusetts. Issue was joined on the plea, and proofs were taken, and the cause was heard thereon, as to the S. Co.: Held, that the court had no jurisdiction of the suit as to the S. Co.

2. Where a plaintiff in equity, instead of setting down the defendant's plea for argument, replies to it, he admits its sufficiency as a defence, if the facts it alleges shall be established.

3. A corporation can have no citizenship or inhabitancy out of the state by which it was created, and, under section 11 of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, (1 Stat. 78,) cannot be made a party to a civil suit, in a circuit or district court, by original process, in any other district than a district of the state by which it was created.

4. One who purchases pendente lite the interest of a defendant in the subject-matter of a suit, does not thereby become a necessary party to the suit; and, if the court has no jurisdiction of him, he cannot be compelled to come in as a party.

5. As to the S. Co. the amended and supplemental bill is an original bill.

In equity.

The bill of complaint herein, filed in October, 1869, alleged a copartnership between the plaintiff [John J. Myers], a citizen of Ohio, and the defendant [Seneca M.] Dorr, a citizen of Vermont, stated various facts as grounds for a dissolution of such copartnership, and prayed a decree declaring such dissolution and directing an account, a disposition of the copartnership property, and a distribution, &c. The copartnership was formed for the purpose of sawing and selling marble, and the firm were owners of mills, machinery, &c., used in their business. The firm also held a contract with the Sutherland Falls Marble Company, by which the latter, upon certain terms therein specified, agreed to furnish to the firm marble in blocks, to be sold, and gave them the right to hold and use certain mills and property of the said company. Such contract contained a provision that no assignment thereof should be made by the firm without the consent of the marble company. After the filing of the bill a receiver of the copartnership property was appointed. In the October term, 1869, the plaintiff filed what was termed an amendment and supplement to his bill of complaint, alleging that the defendant Dorr had, in September, 1869, entered into a secret agreement or understanding with the Sutherland Falls Marble Company, in fraud of the plaintiff, under said contract, or in modification thereof, the object of which was to depreciate the value of the interest of the latter in the contract for the supply of marble to the firm, and embarrass the business of the firm; that the said company had, since the appointment of the receiver herein, and in pursuance of such fraudulent agreement with Dorr, by notice in writing, refused to supply marble under such contract, and called on the plaintiff to vacate and deliver up the quarries and other property of said company, on the ground that the appointment of such receiver operated as an assignment of the contract, in violation of the provisions thereof; and that said company had, since the said notice, discontinued the supply of marble, and refused to continue the same, although the receiver desired, and was ready to proceed with, the execution of the said contract. It then averred that great injury to the plaintiff and to the business, and great embarrassment to the receiver, would ensue, if marble were not supplied to the firm or its receiver, for the purpose of maintaining and preserving the business. Thereupon the plaintiff insisted that he was entitled to a decree for a specific performance of the said contract by the said marble company, and to an injunction restraining any further acts, &c., tending to discharge, modify or suspend the said contract; that the giving of such notice was a contempt of this court; and that the said Sutherland Falls Marble Company ought to be made a party to this suit. This bill further alleged, that the said marble company was organized for the sole purpose of quarrying marble in the state of Vermont; that its quarries, property, business and principal office were in that state; that a part of its directors and stockholders, and its general agent, resided in that state; that the company had likewise a charter obtained from the legislature of the state of Vermont; and that it was a citizen of said state of Vermont. Wherefore the complaint prayed relief as aforesaid, and that the company might be decreed specifically to perform their contract, and be enjoined from suspending business or the supply of marble under the contract, &c., with a prayer for process against the said company, &c.

The Sutherland Falls Marble Company, appearing specially and only for the purpose of objecting to the assumption of any jurisdiction of that company by this court, interposed a plea to the jurisdiction, wherein it was alleged, that the said company was not organized for the sole purpose of quarrying marble in the state of Vermont; that its property was not solely in that state; that it had not, and never had had, any charter obtained from the legislature of that state, and, if any person or persons had obtained from that legislature any act of incorporation under the same name or a similar name, it was without the knowledge or consent of such defendant, and such defendant had never adopted or acted under it; and that such defendant was not, in any sense, a citizen of the state of Vermont, but was a corporation organized and established within and by the laws of the state of Massachusetts only, and had its locality, residence and citizenship solely in Massachusetts, and had no residence, citizenship or locality within the state of Vermont.

Upon this plea the plaintiff took issue, averring that the said plea and the several matters and things therein pleaded and therein set forth were not true. Proofs were taken, and, upon the bill and supplement, plea and proofs, the cause was heard as to the said Sutherland Falls Marble Company.

Edward J. Phelps, for plaintiff.
Isaac F. Redfield, for defendant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The single question presented by the pleadings in this suit, as now brought before us, is, whether the facts alleged by the Sutherland Falls Marble Company in their plea, are proved. The complainant has thought proper, by replying to the plea, to put its averments in issue. The rule is elementary, and is well settled, that, when a complainant in equity, instead of setting down the defendant's plea for argument, to test its sufficiency, elects to reply thereto, denying the facts alleged, he admits its sufficiency, both in form and substance, as a defence to all the matter of the bill to which it is pleaded, and that, if the facts shall, upon the proofs taken, be found established, the bill must be dismissed (Story, Eq. Pl. § 697; Gallagher v. Roberts [Case No. 5,194]; Hughes v. Blake, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 453; Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 210, 257); and this must be done without reference to any equity arising from other facts stated in the bill.

There is no occasion to discuss the evidence. The proofs taken to sustain the allegations of the plea are uncontradicted by any evidence produced on the part of the complainant. Indeed, we do not understand the counsel for the complainant to claim that those facts are not established. The plea is to the jurisdiction of the court over the defendant corporation. By replying, the complainant admits the sufficiency of the facts alleged, to support the plea. The allegations of the plea are proved, that is to say, it is proved that the corporation was not organized for the sole purpose of quarrying marble in Vermont, and has property without that state; and that it has never had or adopted or acted under any charter granted by the legislature of that state, and is not a citizen of that state, but, on the contrary, is a corporation organized and established within and by the laws of the state of Massachusetts only.

It is quite too late to insist that the residence or citizenship of a director or stockholder of a corporation in another state than that by which it was created, changes or affects its citizenship. Whatever was formerly held on that subject to the contrary, it is now well settled, that a corporation can have no citizenship or inhabitancy out of the state wherein it was created; and this has become too familiar to require that we should refer to the numerous modern cases to that effect. We might therefore, with great propriety, stop here, and say the defendant has established the plea, and is, therefore, entitled to a decree dismissing the bill. The discussion, upon the hearing, had a much broader range. The counsel for the complainant treated the hearing as if it were upon a demurrer to the plea, insisting that the facts alleged therein and proved did not show a want of jurisdiction, and that, in considering that question, the court should regard every fact alleged in the bill, which the plea does not deny, as true. What we have above said, is in direct denial that the complainant is at liberty to raise any question touching the sufficiency of the plea. But, if we should pursue the subject, and consider the views urged upon us, the result to the complainant must be the same.

The defendant is a corporation created by or under the laws of the state of Massachusetts, and has no other residence or inhabitancy. The judiciary act of 1789, § 11 (1 Stat. 78), is express, that no civil suit shall be brought before a circuit or district court, against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ. In respect to the question of jurisdiction, a corporation is to be treated, pro hac vice, as a natural person. Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. [Case No. 2,859]; Day v. Newark Ind. R. Co. [Id. 3,685]. Such corporation cannot be found out of the state wherein it is created, within the meaning of the statute, and be served by or through its officers. Pomeroy v. New York & N. H. R. Co. [Id. 11,261]. To the general rule declared by the statute, see Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 300; Picquet v. Swan [Case No. 11,134]; Richmond v. Dreyfous [Id. 11,799]; and the other cases cited above: and the case of Minnesota Co. v. St. Paul Co., 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 609, relied upon by the complainant as creating an exception, affirms the general rule. And yet here the Sutherland Falls

Marble Company is sued and required to answer in the district of Vermont. The circuit court of that district has no jurisdiction to compel that corporation to appear and answer, and the repeated decisions of the supreme court, that no decree can be pronounced which shall affect the rights of a party who is out of the jurisdiction, show that no decree can be pronounced against this defendant. Story v. Livingston, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 359; Coiron v. Millaudon, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 113; Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 130; Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 15 How. [56 U. S.] 233; Barney v. Baltimore City, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 280.

In order to sustain the jurisdiction, the counsel for the complainant insists that the Sutherland Falls Marble Company have, since this suit commenced, purchased the interest of the defendant Dorr in the contract with them; and this is claimed to be a submission to the jurisdiction, and to make them substantially parties to the suit. In the first place, the fact alleged is not proved, and we are constrained so to find, upon the evidence. In the next place, if proved, it could not affect the question. A purchaser pendente lite may be said to submit to the jurisdiction, but in this sense only—he purchases subject to the litigation; but the litigation may proceed without noticing his purchase, and he does not, by such purchase, become a necessary party. If the court have not jurisdiction of him, he cannot be compelled to come in as a party. And, once more, it is claimed to be essential to the rights of the complainant, and to the protection of the business now in the hands of the receiver, and its successful prosecution, that the complainant should have the relief against the marble company sought by the supplemental bill. A short answer might be given to this. The complainant or the receiver must seek that relief in a court having jurisdiction of the party against whom it is sought. The circumstance that such relief would be beneficial to the parties, and prevent incidental loss to them, pending the prosecution of the original bill, will not warrant or create any extension of the power of the court.

We forbear to remark upon the extraordinary character of the whole case now before us, in which a complainant who has commenced a suit to dissolve a copartnership and adjust its affairs with his partner, seeks, by what he calls a supplemental bill, to compel a third party, who has no interest in the copartnership, specifically to perform an agreement made with the firm; and that is just what is sought against this defendant. As to him the bill is, in every just sense, an original bill. If the complainant can maintain such a suit upon the contract in question, he must prosecute it where the court has jurisdiction, and the attempt to unite it with a controversy with his partner touching their copartnership affairs, cannot avail anything. And so, also, the receiver of the copartnership property, if, in virtue of his receivership, he can sue on the contract, or if he can maintain a suit for its specific performance, must prosecute it elsewhere. Arguing that it is important that this court should have jurisdiction of this defendant, in order to do full justice and protect all parties, will not avail to confer jurisdiction, where the limitation imposed by statute and settled by adjudication forbids its exercise.

We have referred to the nature of the suit for the purpose of adding, that the case of Minnesota Co. v. St. Paul Co., 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 609, touches no question here discussed. There, a suit was rightly brought and was decided, the court having jurisdiction of the parties, a decree was made, it was found that certain orders made in execution of the decree were invalid by reason of a change in the jurisdiction of the court, and that further adjudication was necessary in order to the execution of the decree and the disposal of the property in the hands of the receiver, and it was held that a bill supplemental in its nature, filed in order to carry the prior decree into execution and administer the property, was to be regarded, not as an original suit, but as a continuation of the former suit, and that, as no other court could execute that decree and make due administration of the property, the power of the court to act was not impaired by the fact that persons who had acquired interests in the property or questions were citizens of the same state as the complainant in such last-named bill; and the court refer to cases in which a person acquiring rights as purchaser under a decree, is regarded as a party having a right to proceed in continuation of the suit, so far as to protect his rights, irrespective of any question touching his citizenship. In a recent case (Jones v. Andrews, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 327), the supreme court have gone so far as to hold, that, where a judgment has been recovered in a suit in the circuit court, and the judgment creditor is proceeding in that court, by the process of garnishment, against an alleged debtor of the defendant in the judgment, such debtor may file a bill supplemental or ancillary to his defence, to protect himself against a compulsory proceeding duly instituted to compel him to pay, showing by such bill a just and equitable defence, and the necessity of making the creditor not residing in the district a party will not defeat such ancillary suit. And, in Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 450, where a suit had been duly commenced in the federal court by attachment of property, and, while the same was in the possession of the marshal, it was taken from him by process of replevin issued by the state court at the suit of a third party, the court not only held that such interference with the custody of the marshal was illegal, but declared that a bill of equity might, in such case, be filed by the plaintiff in the federal court against the plaintiff in the replevin suit, notwithstanding both were citizens of the same state. These cases proceed upon the ground, that, where the federal court is proceeding in the due exercise of its jurisdiction, it has power to regulate and control its own judgments, and carry them into execution, and power to maintain its own jurisdiction, and protect either plaintiff or defendant therein, in respect of the subject-matter thus lawfully within its jurisdiction, and, by an ancillary suit, to call in parties for those purposes, whether their citizenship would have authorized an original suit against them by the plaintiff in such ancillary proceeding, or not. The present is no such case. Here, the original suit was for the dissolution of a copartnership, and the adjustment of the rights of the complainant and Dorr. In that the marble company had no interest, and they have done nothing to prevent that suit from proceeding to its termination according to its intent and purpose. The cause of action against the marble company is its refusal to perform a contract made with the firm, and the decree sought is the specific performance of that contract. To grant the relief might be useful to the parties to the original bill, but it has no legal connection with the cause of action therein, and is in no sense necessary to the full exercise of the jurisdiction of the court. It is not, in any sense, a continuation of the original suit, but an attempt to add a new cause of action against a new party.

This bill must be dismissed, as to the defendant the Sutherland Falls Marble Company, with costs.

Case No. 9,989.

MYERS et al. v. DUKER et al.

[1 Ban. & A. 535.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. Oct., 1874.

PATENTS—EQUIVALENTS—CLAMPS FOR CIRCULAR SAWS—ROLLERS.

1. The complainant's patent was for clamps, having a lateral elastic movement, independent of the roller beds of a circular saw, to which the clamps are attached, for the purpose of compensating for the varying thickness of different pieces of lumber, and keeping them in a proper relative position to the saw. The defendants used pressure rollers, having the same mode of operation, and performing the same functions as the clamps. The evidence showed no device prior to the clamps for accomplishing the result: Held, that the defendants infringed complainants' patent.

2. A patented mechanical device, by which a new result is produced, is infringed by the use of another device, which, although different in form, produces the same result by substantially the same means.

[This was a bill by Margaret Meyers and others against Otto Duker and others to restrain the infringement of certain letters patent, No. 10,965.]

Benjamin Price, for complainants.

L. M. Reynolds, for defendants.

GILES, District Judge. In this case, it is admitted, that defendants have infringed the first claim in complainants' patent, which bears date the 23d of May, 1854. This first claim is for the deflecting plates. The answer of defendants denied that they used any of the devices claimed by complainants and described in their patent, but their solicitor, in his argument, narrowed this defence, and limited it to an infringement of complainants' second claim, to wit: the clamps I, I. This claim is as follows: "We claim the employment or use of the clamps I I, arranged, as herein shown, or in an equivalent way, so as to have a lateral elastic movement, independent of the roller-beds to which said clamps are attached, for the purpose of compensating for the varying thickness of different pieces of stuff, and keeping them in a proper relative position to the saw." Such is the claim, and the models of complainants' saw, and defendants' saw, have been exhibited in court.

Now, it is apparent, from an inspection of them, that the pressure-rollers of defendants' machine, while different in their construction and form, have the same mode of operation, and perform the same function, as the clamps in complainants' machine. Were the clamps, then, the first device ever used for the purpose of keeping the plank in a proper relative position to the saw, and for compensating for the varying thickness of different pieces of stuff? If they were, then complainants are entitled to be protected against a device which effects the same substantial purpose by substantially the same mode of operation. The result could not be patented, but only the mechanical device by which it is attained; and no device is an infringement of the patent but such as produces the same result by the same mode of operation, although the form may be varied.

Judge Grier, in McCormick v. Talcott, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 405, says: "If the complainant be the original inventor of the divider, he will have a right, to treat as infringers, all who make dividers operating on the same principle, and performing the same functions by analogous means or equivalent combinations."

Now, there is no evidence in this case, that prior to the invention of Myers & Eunson, any device had been made or used, to keep the plank in a proper relative position to a circular saw, or which possessed a lateral elastic movement independent of the roller-beds, and, by that means, compensated for the varying thickness of different pieces of stuff. This was accomplished by the clamps described in the patent of Myers & Eunson. In the defendants' machine, the pressure rollers act on the same principle, and reach the same result, and, therefore, the defendants have infringed the second claim in complainants' patent.

I will, therefore, sign a decree, in favor of the complainants, and will refer the cause to APPEAL—SUPERSEDEAS—BOND—FEES TO MASTER—ATTACHMENT.

A final decree, in an equity suit, awarded a decree against the defendant in favor of the plaintiff, for a sum named, and then decreed that the defendant pay the master $500, allowed to him as his compensation, less such sum as the defendant had paid to the master, and that the plaintiff have execution for the sum awarded to him. The defendant paid to the master $35 on account of the $500, and refused to pay more. He appealed to the supreme court from the whole of the decree, and gave a bond to the plaintiff, sufficient to cover the amount awarded to the plaintiff and to stay the execution, and a citation was issued and served. The master applied for an attachment against the defendant for the $465: Held, that the bond did not cover the amount directed to be paid to the master, and was not a bond to the master; that the provision for the payment of the master was not subject to be stayed by the proceedings for appeal; and that the attachment must be granted.

[This was a bill in equity by Margaret Myers, executrix, etc., of Eugene S. Eunson, against John Dunbar and Jeremiah Hopper to restrain the infringement of letters patent No. 10,965, granted to John Myers and Robert G. Eunson, May 23, 1854.]

Frederic H. Betts, for the motion.

Samuel J. Glassey, opposed.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In this case a final decree was entered in May last, on the report of the master, overruling exceptions taken by both parties to his report, and ordering, "that the compensation of the master herein be fixed, determined and settled, (including what may have already been advanced or paid to him,) at the sum of five hundred dollars." The decree then proceeded to award a recovery to the plaintiffs against the defendants for the sum of $9,120 94, and $686 32, interest thereon from the date of the report to the date of the decree, being, in all, $9,807 26, and to decree, "that said defendants pay to the master the said sum of five hundred dollars allowed to the master as compensation, less such sum as may have been paid or advanced to said master by the defendants, and that the complainants have execution or other proper process of the court for the said sum awarded to them." The 82d rule in equity provides, that "the compensation to be allowed to every master in chancery for his services in any particular case shall be fixed by the circuit court in its discretion, having regard to all the circumstances thereof, and the compensation shall be charged upon and borne by such of the parties in the cause as the court shall direct;" and that "the master shall not retain his report as security for his compensation, but, when the compensation is allowed by the court, he shall be entitled to an attachment for the amount against the party who is ordered to pay the same, if, upon notice thereof, he does not pay it within the time prescribed by the court." The 10th rule in equity provides, that "every person, not being a party in any cause, who has obtained an order, or in whose favor an order shall have been made, shall be enabled to enforce obedience to such order by the same process as if he were a party to the cause." The defendants have paid to the master the sum of $35 on account of such compensation, and no more. Demand has been made upon the defendants by the master for the payment of the residue of the $500, but it has not been paid. Prior to the date of the master's report, the plaintiffs advanced to the master $100 on account of his compensation, and, after the date of the report and before the entry of the final decree, the plaintiffs advanced to the master $200 more on account of his compensation. The master now applies to the court for an attachment against the defendants for the $465.

The defendants have taken an appeal to the supreme court from the whole of the decree. They have given a bond, with sureties, in the penalty of $21,000, to the plaintiffs, conditioned that the appellants "shall prosecute their said appeal to effect and answer all damages and costs, if they fail to make their plea good." The bond has been approved as to form, and amount, and the sufficiency of the sureties, and a citation has been issued and served. The citation was made returnable to the first day of the present term of the supreme court, now past.

In opposition to the granting of the application, the defendants contend, that the 82d rule is subject, in its application, to the provisions of law regulating appeals; that the defendants have appealed from the whole of the decree and have given security, by bond, for the full performance of its requirements, if it shall be affirmed, and, therefore, all proceedings upon the decree are superseded and stayed; that the cause is pending in the supreme court; that injustice to the defendants will result, if the application is granted, in case the defendants should succeed on the appeal, because the defendants will not be able to recover back from the master any money paid to him; and that, if the plaintiffs pay the amount due to the master, they will be able, if the decree is affirmed, to recover that amount on the bond.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission.]

Although the defendants have taken an appeal from the whole of the decree, their bond does not cover the amount directed to be paid to the master. It is a bond to the plaintiffs, payable to the plaintiffs, and is a bond only to respond for the amount which the decree awards to the plaintiffs as a recovery, and for which execution is awarded to the plaintiffs by the decree. The bond is not one under which either the master or the plaintiffs could recover the $465 from the defendants. Notwithstanding the appeal, it remains for this court to enforce the provision of the decree for the payment of the master.

Nor would the case be varied if the defendants had given a bond to the master to stay proceedings to enforce payment of his compensation. The order as to the compensation of the master might as well have been in a separate order, and not have formed a part of the final decree. The master is not a party to the suit, in any sense, and it was not intended that a provision for his payment should be subject to be stayed in its operation by proceedings such as are employed to stay the execution of a decree inter partes. The 82d rule prescribes the mode in which an officer of the court is to be compensated, and where the court directs which of the parties is to be charged with and bear the compensation of the master, whether in the first instance, or ultimately, the direction must be carried out, as between the master and such party, however, ultimately, such party may be entitled, as against the other party to the suit, to relief or reimbursement in respect of the amount paid to the master. If the defendants succeed, as against the plaintiffs, in reversing the decree, they will, indeed, not be able to recover back any money from the master, but it will be competent for the court, if, on such reversal, costs of the suit shall be awarded to the defendants, to regard the amount paid by the defendants to the master as a part of such costs, and to enable the defendants to recover such amount from the plaintiffs. The amount disbursed by the defendants to the master will merely take its place with other items of disbursements, as to which the defendants, with a decree against them, now have no recovery, but which may form part of a recovery, in case they shall have a decree in their favor.

The application is granted.

[On appeal to the supreme court, the decree of this court was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a decree dismissing the bill. 94 U. S. 187.]

PATENTS—INFRINGEMENT—IMPROVED MACHINE FOR SAWING THIN BOARDS—DISCLAIMER—COSTS.

1. The letters patent granted May 23d, 1854, to John Myers and Robert G. Eunson, for an "improved machine for sawing thin boards, &c.," are valid, when construed in connection with the disclaimer filed to a part of the first claim of the patent.

2. The inventions described and claimed in the patent, explained.

3. Various devices in the defendants' machines described and explained, and held to be infringements of the patent.

4. The disclaimer in this case held to have been proper, and in proper form.

[Cited in Electrical Accumulator Co. v. Julien Electric Co., 38 Fed. 135.]

5. A claim to the use of two deflecting plates, one at each side of the saw, sustained, as not being a mere duplication, although a single deflecting plate, on one side of the saw, had before been used.

6. Costs not allowed to the plaintiffs on a recovery, as the disclaimer was not filed before the suit was brought.

7. Where the owner of the entire right under the patent for the territory where the infringements had taken place, had not joined in the disclaimer, and there was no evidence that he had unreasonably neglected to disclaim, and no such defence was set up, he was allowed to make such disclaimer, after final hearing.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. These suits are founded on letters patent of the United States, granted May 23d, 1854, to John Myers and Robert G. interest in the patent and in the extension thereof and in all damages for infringing the same. On the 19th of October, 1864, John Myers and Robert G. Eunson assigned to Eben Peek and Gilbert J. Bogert all their interest in the patent for that part of the city of New York lying west of a line running through Broadway to the Eighth avenue, and through the Eighth avenue to the northerly limits of the city. On the 23d of May, 1868, John Myers, Robert G. Eunson and Eugene S. Eunson assigned to Peek and Gilbert Bogert all their interest in the patent for such territory for the extended term. The suit first above entitled is brought for an infringement of the patent within such territory. After it and the suits secondly and thirdly above entitled were brought, John Myers, who was one of the plaintiffs, in each of them, died, and Margaret Myers, his widow, was appointed his executrix, on the 17th of November, 1870, and was substituted as a plaintiff, in his stead, in each of them. The suits secondly and thirdly above entitled are brought for infringements of the patent within that part of the city of New York not embraced in the territory conveyed to Peek and Gilbert Bogert. On the 12th of September, 1866, John Myers assigned to Jacob Lagowitz all his interest in the patent for the state of New Jersey, and all damages for infringing the same; and on the 19th of June, 1868, John Myers assigned to Lagowitz all his interest in the patent for the state of New Jersey, for the extended term. The suit fourthly above entitled is brought for an infringement committed at Newark, New Jersey.

The specification of the patent states that the invention is of "improvements in machines for sawing lumber into thin stuff, for mirror and picture frame backs, and other purposes for which thin stuff is used." It says: "The nature of the invention consists, 1st. In the employment or use of deflecting plates, one or two, placed at the sides of a circular saw, for the purpose of preventing the sawed stuff from coming in contact with the sides of the saw, and enlarging or expanding the saw kerf, and thereby preventing the stuff from binding against the edge of the saw near its teeth. The deflecting plates also allow the saw to be stiffened by a proper plate secured to it, and a thin veneer saw may consequently be employed, which will cause but a small waste of stuff in sawing, as a narrow kerf is made thereby. 2d. Our invention consists in the employment or use of elastic clamps, attached to the ordinary adjustable and elastic beds, between which the stuff is fed to the saw. The clamps above mentioned have an elasticity independent of the beds, and compensate for the varying thickness of the different pieces of stuff to be sawed, by holding firmly the extreme end of the stuff, and keeping it in proper position to the saw, however much the elastic beds may be expanded by a succeeding piece of stuff of greater thickness. 3d. Our invention consists in the employment or use of knives or cutters, secured to the adjustable beds, and so arranged as to cut or smooth off the rough and projecting sides of the stuff at the ends, making it of uniform thickness. 4th. Our invention consists in the combination of an adjustable bed and circular saw, arranged as will be hereafter shown." Then follows a description of the machine. A shaft runs transversely across the front part of a frame. On the shaft is placed a circular saw, formed of thin steel plate and such as is used for sawing veneers. On one side of the saw, a circular plate, somewhat less in diameter than the saw, is secured by rivets or screws. This plate stiffens the saw, and, without its use, a comparatively much thicker saw would be required. There are two deflecting plates, placed one at each side of the saw. The deflecting plate which is on the same side of the saw with the stiffening plate, covers the upper part of the stiffening plate, and the inner end of it does not project outward from the saw quite as far as the outward end of it. The deflecting plate on the opposite side of the saw is rather smaller in diameter than the other deflecting plate, and projects from the saw at about an equal distance at both ends. There are two feed roller beds placed vertically in the back part of the frame and parallel with each other. Both of these beds are made adjustable by screw rods, which bear against the sides of the beds, the screw rods of each bed being operated simultaneously by means of chains passing around small toothed wheels at the ends of the screw rods. There are two cranks, one of which is attached to one of the toothed wheels of each bed. The beds also have a lateral elasticity given them by means of india rubber or other springs attached to them in any proper manner. There are four feed rollers placed in the beds, two rollers in each bed. The feed rollers project some distance beyond the inner edges of the beds. There are two clamps, attached to the inner ends of the beds. At the back part of each clamp there are two journals, one at the top and one at the bottom. These journals fit in boxes which work or slide in recesses in the top and bottom pieces of the beds. There are set screws which pass transversely through the top and bottom pieces of each bed, and the inner ends of which bear against india rubber springs which are placed directly back of the boxes. There are two india rubber springs at the top of the clamps, one spring to each clamp. These springs are placed between the clamps and set screws which pass transversely through the top pieces of the beds. There are two stops which pass through the top pieces of the beds, one through each top piece, and regulate the distance of the lateral vibration of the clamps. Then follows a description of the knives or cutters before referred to, but they are not involved in any of these suits. Motion is given to the feed rollers by proper gearing at the lower part of the rollers. The beds are adjusted relatively to the saw, so that the stuff may be sawed into the desired thickness. Either side of the saw may be made the "line side", by fixing permanently or destroying the elasticity of the proper roller bed. The stuff is placed between the feed rollers in the beds, and, motion being communicated to the saw and feed rollers, the stuff is fed towards the saw and cut by it, the two pieces being prevented from bearing against the sides of the saw by means of the two deflecting plates. When the outer end of the stuff has passed the innermost feed roller, the clamps bear against the stuff and hold it in a proper relative position to the saw. A fresh piece of stuff is then placed between the feed rollers and forces forward the preceding piece. If the new piece of stuff is rather thicker than the preceding piece, it merely acts upon the beds and forces the elastic one farther from the permanent one, without affecting the clamps, which have an independent elasticity, owing to the springs. If it is desired to saw stuff two inches in thickness into two strips, one of which is to be a quarter of an inch in thickness, that strip, being the thinner one, may be deflected by the plate which is on the same side of the saw as the stiffening plate, as that deflecting plate is inclined or projects outward from the saw farther than the other deflecting plate. The roller bed in line with the deflecting plate which is on the same side of the saw as the stiffening plate, is permanently fixed at one-quarter of an inch from the side of the saw. The opposite bed being elastic, the side of the saw on which the thin strip passes is the "line side." The opposite side of the saw may be made the "line side," by permanently fixing the opposite roller bed, and allowing the other one to remain elastic. The patentees state that, by those improvements, they can employ a thin veneer saw, and, consequently, a small amount of stuff is lost, as the saw kerf is narrow; and that the stuff to be sawed is always kept in a proper relative position to the saw, when varying in thickness. The specification says: "We do not claim the adjustable and elastic roller beds, F. F., for they have been previously used." The first, second and fourth claims of the patent, which are the only ones involved in these suits are as follows: "1st. The employment or use of the deflecting plates E. E'., one or both, placed at the sides of the saw, as herein shown, for the purpose of preventing the sawed stuff from bearing against the sides of the saw, and expanding the saw kerf, and also for the purpose of allowing a thin veneer saw to be stiffened by plates, D., one or two, as desired." "2d. The employment or use of the clamps, I. I., arranged as herein shown, or in an equivalent way, so as to have a lateral elastic movement, independent of the roller beds to which said clamps are attached, for the purpose of compensating for the varying thickness of different pieces of stuff, and keeping them in a proper relative position to the saw." "4th. The employment of an adjustable bed, F., with clamps, as described, in combination with the saw, C., when the saw has a stiffening plate, D., in line with said bed, by which the stiffened or rounded side of the saw is made the 'line side.'"

After these suits had all of them been brought, Eugene S. Eunson, and Margaret Myers, executrix of John Myers, filed in the patent office (but when, does not appear) a petition dated November 30th, 1870, signed by them, which states that they are the joint and exclusive owners of the patents for the whole of the United States, except the state of New Jersey, owned by Eugene S. Eunson and Jacob Lagowitz jointly, the city and county of Philadelphia, owned by persons unknown to them, and all that portion of the city of New York lying west of Broadway and the Eighth avenue, owned by Eben Peek and Gilbert J. Bogert; and that they thereby enter their disclaimer to that part of the first claim of the patent "which covers the employment or use of the deflecting plate E.," (which is the deflecting plate on the same side of the saw with the stiffening plate,) "at the side of the saw, thereby causing the said claim to include only the combination of the saw described with both of the deflecting plates, E., and E'., when both of said deflecting plates are used at one and the same time, in the manner and for the purposes described in said patent." The disclaimer then states that the said first claim of the patent will accordingly be as follows: "1st. The employment or use of the deflecting plates E. E'., both placed at the sides of the saw, as herein shown, for the purpose of preventing the sawed stuff from bearing against the sides of the saw, and expanding the saw kerf, and also for the purpose of allowing a thin veneer saw to be stiffened by plates, D., one or two, as desired;" that the petitioners also desire to disclaim that part of the patentees' description of their invention, wherein they say that the nature of the invention consists, first, in the employment or use of deflecting plates, "one or two," placed at the sides of a circular saw, &c., and to limit the nature of the invention to which claim is made, to the combination with the saw of the two deflecting plates, one at each side of the saw, as described; and that the disclaimer is to operate to the extent of the interest in the patent vested in the petitioners.

In the suit against Frame, Nichols and Robbins, the answer admits the use, by the defendants, of a machine for sawing thin boards, but denies that it infringes the patent. It also sets up a prior knowledge and use of the patented inventions by Charles Turner, Isaac Smith, John N. Lyman, Daniel Doncaster, James Hay, Henry McGoffin, James Moses, C. M. Whiting, George W. Cook, Alvah Metcalf, William Rockwood, and the defendants. It also sets up, as containing prior descriptions of such inventions, Holtzapffel's Mechanical Manipulation, London, 1847, volume 2. pages 809 to 813; letters patent of the United States to Manassah Andrews and James Sproat, granted December 31st, 1839, to Pearson Crosby, granted April 8th, 1851, and to Pearson Crosby, granted November 3d, 1841, reissued March 10th, 1849, extended October 30th, 1855, and reissued April 28th, 1857; and letters patent granted in England to Auguste Edouard Loradoux Bellford, dated May 2d, 1853, and specification dated October 26th, 1853, and filed November 2d, 1853.

The plaintiffs' machine is one of great utility. It is not designed for the sawing of logs or of boards from logs, but is designed to saw lumber, that is, boards and planks, in the state in which they are found in the market, into thinner lengths. It is generally called a re-sawing machine, which indicates the subjecting again to the process of sawing, lumber which has been created by sawing. It is an object, in a re-sawing machine, that the kerf, or portion of the wood converted into saw-dust by the operation of sawing, should be as narrow as possible, in order that the largest possible number of thin boards may be obtained from a thick one. To accomplish this end, the only suitable saw is what is called a veneer saw, or a saw such as is generally used for sawing veneers. A veneer saw is a circular saw composed of thin plates or segments screwed fast to a central circular flange or stiffening plate, in such a manner that the stiffening plate protrudes on only one side of the saw, the other side of the saw being a plane. The veneer, after it is cut, passes off on the side which has the stiffening plate, while the unsawed part of the wood passes on, on the other side.

In the plaintiffs' machine, the organization is such that the stiffened veneer saw can be used, while the stuff can be sawed thin, and of an uniform thickness, from end to end, and the operation be rapidly performed. The saw revolves on a horizontal axis, and the board to be re-sawed is fed in with its two flat faces standing perpendicular. It is fed by feeding rollers, which have a yielding pressure to accommodate inequalities in the thickness of the board. When the machine is running, the feeding rollers on one face of the board are left free to yield, while those on the other face have their yielding feature destroyed. The distance, on the unyielding side, between the line of the periphery of the rollers and the line of the nearest face of the saw, is equal to and determines the thickness of the piece to be sawed off, such two lines being parallel to each other. The feeding rollers on either face of the board can be made to yield or be fixed so as not to yield, at pleasure, the fixed side being the gauge side or line side, determining the thickness of the piece to be sawed off, and the rollers on the other side being set so as to yield to inequalities in the thickness of the board. Thus, either side of the saw can be made the line side, as well the stiffened side as the plane side.

There is, in the machine, a provision for holding the board that is being sawed, after its rear end has passed beyond the gripe of the feeding rollers, and while a portion of it still remains to be sawed. This arrangement consists of two pressing instruments, one pressing on each side of the board near the saw, and between the feeding rollers and the saw, and forming a clamp. Each one of these two instruments can be set so as to yield to inequalities in the thickness of the board, and each one can be fixed so as not to yield. In the use of the machine, the fixed side of the clamp is the same side as the fixed side of the rollers and the line side of the saw, and when one side is fixed, the other side is left free to yield. The elasticity of each clamping instrument is independent of the elasticty of the feeding rollers which are on the same side with it. Therefore, when one of the clamping instruments is set to yield, it can yield in and of itself, without reference to the yielding of the feeding rollers on the same side. Hence, a board of one thickness may be pressed between the yielding and the unyielding jaws of the clamp, while a board of a different thickness is being fed and pressed between the yielding and the unyielding rollers.

Another feature of the plaintiffs' machine is the use of two deflecting plates, one on each face of the saw. They are thin, stiff plates, set in close to the saw face, and operating to relieve the saw from the pressure and friction of the surfaces each side of the cut in the board, and to open the cut and relieve the cutting edge of the saw.

The machine used by the defendants Frame, Nichols and Robbins, and which I call the Frame machine, has a circular veneer saw, composed of segments of thin metal, secured to a central supporting plate, and a deflecting plate on each face of the saw. The saw and the plates are substantially the same, in construction and mode of operation, as the saw and the plates in the plaintiffs' machine, and the combination of the saw and the plates is the same in the two machines.

The Frame machine has two pairs of feed rollers, one pair on each side of the board, each pair being in a frame. The rollers on one side can be set to yield, and, when so set, yield independently of the frame. In the plaintiffs' machine, when yielding is required, the entire frame which contains the pair of rollers yields. But this is only a formal difference. The Frame machine has two pressing instruments, which together form a clamp. On the same side with the yielding feed rollers, there is a yielding clamping instrument, which, like the clamping instruments in the plaintiffs' machine, is a non-rotating piece of metal. Opposite to this, and on the line side or gauge side of the machine, is a fixed, unyielding roller, which forms the other member of the clamp. It is contended, for the defendants, that this clamping arrangement of theirs does not infringe the second claim of the plaintiffs' patent, for the reason that the roller, which forms part of the clamp, is not capable of having any lateral elastic movement, and that the clamp does not hold the stuff at its extreme end, as does the clamp in the plaintiffs' machine. But, the Frame machine does hold the stuff by means of an elastic action in the clamp, which elasticity is independent of the feed rollers, and thereby the machine can and does saw successive boards of varying thickness, one being held by the clamp while the succeeding one is being held by the feed rollers. To accomplish this, it is not requisite that more than one of the two instruments which form the clamp should be elastic at a given time, or that both of them should be elastic at one and the same time; and as shown by the description and drawings of the plaintiffs' patent, the roller bed on the line side is never set so as to be elastic when the machine is running, and, when such roller bed is made inelastic, the elasticity of the clamping instruments on the same side is destroyed, so that, in use, but one clamping instrument at a time is suffered to be elastic. The difference between the Frame machine and the plaintiffs' machine, in this respect, only measures the inferiority of the former. It has the entire invention and apparatus of the plaintiffs', in respect to the clamp, applied, however, to only one side of the machine.

The Frame machine also contains substantially the same arrangement of adjustable bed, clamp, saw and stiffening plate which is found in the plaintiffs' patent, and so combined that the stiffened side of the saw can be made the line side.

The foregoing views apply to the Frame machine of which Exhibit No. 5 is a model. It follows that it infringes the first, second and fourth claims of the plaintiffs' patent. The Frame machine of which Exhibit No. 6 is a model, contains the combination of two deflecting plates with the saw, which is covered by the first claim of the plaintiff's patent, and infringes that claim.

The answer in the suit against Dunbar and Hopper sets up the same matters of defence that are set up in the answer in the suit against Frame, Nichols and Robbins, adding, in respect to prior knowledge and use, the name of E. W. Robbins, and omitting that of John M. Nichols.

The machine used by the defendants Dunbar and Hopper has the combination of two deflecting plates with a circular veneer saw, which is covered by the first claim of the plaintiffs' patent.

That machine, which I call the Dunbar machine, has four feed rollers, two on each side of the machine. Two of the four are opposite to each other, and nearer to the saw than the other two are, which latter two are, also, opposite to each other. It also has two clamping instruments, which are located, with reference to the saw, substantially in the same place as the two clamping instruments described and shown in the plaintiffs' patent. One of those clamping instruments is rigidly attached to the standard which holds one of the two rollers nearest the saw, and the other of such instruments is rigidly attached to the standard which holds the other one of the two rollers nearest the saw. Therefore, neither one of such clamping instruments can have any lateral elastic movement independent of the roller held by the standard to which it is attached. One, however, of such clamping instruments has a lateral elastic movement independent of the feed roller on the same side which is farthest from the saw, and the result of the arrangement is, that inequalities in a board that is being sawed affect independently the lateral elastic action between the clamping instruments, and the lateral elastic action between the two feed rollers that are farthest from the saw, and two boards of different thicknesses may follow each other through the machine, and one of them be firmly held by the clamp, while the other is firmly held by the two feed rollers that are farthest from the saw. This is the substance and essence of the invention covered by the second claim of the plaintiffs' patent.

It is objected, that the plaintiffs' clamping instruments have an elasticity independent of the roller beds to which they are attached; that the clamping instruments in the Dunbar machine have no elasticity independent of the roller beds to which they are attached, one of them having an elasticity which is independent only of the roller bed to which it is not attached; that the second claim of the plaintiffs' patent claims expressly only clamping instruments which have a lateral elastic movement independent of the roller beds to which such clamping instruments are attached; and that, therefore, the Dunbar machine is, in respect to its clamping instruments, not an infringement of the second claim of the plaintiffs' patent. But this is too technical a view, and sacrifices substance to shadow. Taking the whole specification, and the statement of the invention, and the description, and the second claim, and reading them together, it is manifest, that the arrangement in the Dunbar machine embodies the real invention covered by such second claim, and that there is no violence to the language of that claim in so construing it as to hold it to cover an arrangement in which one of the clamping instruments has a lateral elastic movement independent of feed rollers with which it is combined or in connection with which it is used. The change made in the Dunbar machine is not a substantial change, but is one that would be made by a mechanic seeking to vary form without varying substance, and hoping, while using the invention, to avoid the charge of infringement.

It is also objected, that each of the plaintiffs' clamping instruments has a swinging motion, on a vertical axis, so that they can hold at the same time between themselves, two boards of different thicknesses, without reference to any independent elastic action of the roller beds; and that neither of the clamping instruments in the Dunbar machine has any such swinging motion on a vertical axis. This feature exists in the plaintiffs' clamping instruments, and is a useful one, and is absent from the Dunbar machine, but it is not a feature that enters into the second claim of the patent, nor is it a feature that has anything to do with the question of a lateral elastic action in the clamping instruments independent of a lateral elastic action in some or all of the feeding instruments.

Nor does the absence from the Dunbar machine of provision for making the clamping instruments on both sides elastic independently of the elastic action of the feed rollers farthest from the saw, make it any the less an infringement of the second claim of the patent. This question has been already considered in reference to the Frame machine.

The Dunbar machine also infringes the fourth claim of the plaintiffs' patent.

In the case against Swift, no proofs have been taken on the part of the defendants. The answer sets up prior knowledge and use of the inventions by Asa M. Beard, George Hyde, J. B. Graham, R. Dorsett, and H. J. A. Neilson.

The machine used by Swift is made by the Huntington Machine Company, of Newark, New Jersey. It has the combination of the saw and the two deflecting plates of the plaintiffs' patent. The clamping instrument on the same side with the stiffened or rounded side of the saw, is permanently fixed to the roller bed that is nearest to the saw on that side. That side of the saw is permanently the line side. The clamping instrument on the other side is permanently fixed to the roller bed that is nearest to the saw on that side, but has a lateral elastic movement independent of the feed roller on the same side that is farthest from the saw. In this respect, the arrangement is, in substance, the same as in the Dunbar machine. The machine of Swift also infringes the fourth claim of the plaintiffs' patent.

The answer in the case against Peddie sets up the same matters of defence that are set up in the answer in the case against Dunbar and Hopper, omitting, in respect to prior knowledge and use, the names of Whiting, Cook, Metcalf, and Rockwood, and the patent to Andrews and Sproat. The machine used by Peddie is the same in construction as that used by Dunbar and Hopper.

There is no force in the suggestion that the specification of the plaintiffs' patent contemplates the use of any other description of feed than a roller feed, in connection with an independent elastic action in the clamping instruments.

The disclaimer of the use of only one deflecting plate with the saw, and the limitation thereby of the first claim to the use of the two deflecting plates with the saw, was proper, and the disclaimer was in proper form.

There is nothing in the fact that one deflecting plate is described in the extract from Holtzapffel, and in the Andrews and Sproat patent, which affects the novelty of the invention of the use of two deflecting plates in the plaintiffs' machine. The case is not one of mere duplication. In view of the fact that, in cutting from a block, as in the Andrews and Sproat patent, and from a log, as in the machine described in the extract from Holtzapffel, but one deflector is required, or could be used, and that the plaintiffs substituted, for the carriage feed before used with one deflector, a roller feed, in the use of which, in a machine for resawing boards, the saw is exposed to friction on both sides of it, so as to require a deflection of the board on both sides of the saw at the same time, the introduction of deflecting plates on both sides of the saw, so as to render practical the resawing of boards by a circular saw with a roller feed, must be regarded as a substantial invention, notwithstanding one deflecting plate had before been used in a machine for sawing from the log or block without a roller feed. The Andrews and Sproat patent, containing the one deflecting plate, was granted in 1839. Yet Crosby, in his patent of 1851, introducing devices to relieve the saw on both sides at once, did not hit on the idea of putting in two deflecting plates. The use of them was not obvious in such a machine as the plaintiffs'.

The prior use, by Doncaster, of the two deflecting plates with the saw, is not established; and the evidence shows that Myers and Eunson made the invention before it was made by Doncaster, or any one connected with him.

The English patent to Bellford, and the Crosby patent of 1851, are the same. Neither of them contains any clamping instrument which has a lateral elastic movement independent of any feed-roller bed in the machine. The machine which they describe would not allow one board to be held by a clamp, while a board of greater or less thickness was being held and fed by feed rollers.

There is nothing in the Crosby patent of 1841 to affect the novelty of the plaintiffs' patent. No evidence was given as to any other prior use or knowledge, that is set up in any of the answers; nor was the novelty of the fourth claim of the plaintiffs' patent attacked.

In the case against Dunbar and Hopper, and in the case against Swift, the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree for a perpetual injunction, and for an account of profits, based on an infringement of the first, second, and fourth claims of their patent, but without costs, as the disclaimer in respect to the first claim was not filed prior to the bringing of the suits.

In the suit against Frame, Nichols and Robbins, Margaret Myers and Eugene S. Eunson are merely nominal plaintiffs. The plaintiffs Peek and Bogert are the owners of the entire right for the territory within which the infringement in that case took place. They have not disclaimed the claim to the use of one deflecting plate with the saw. That claim is anticipated by the Andrews and Sproat patent. There is no evidence that Peek and Bogart have unreasonably neglected to disclaim; nor is any such defence set up in the answer. Unless such disclaimer be made, there can be no decree for the plaintiffs. An opportunity will be allowed to Peek and Bogert to make such disclaimer, and present to the court evidence of its having been made. When such evidence shall have been presented, a decree will be entered for a perpetual injunction and an account of profits against Frame, Nichols and Robbins, in respect of the first, second, and fourth claims of the patent, but without costs.

The same course must be taken in respect to the suit against Peddie. Lagowitz is a joint owner with Eugene S. Eunson of the right to the patent for the state of New Jersey, where the infringement complained of in that suit took place. Eunson's disclaimer operates only to the extent of his interest, and does not cover the interest of Lagowitz.

SHIPPING—GENERAL AVERAGE — FREIGHT — SALE OF CARGO TO REPAIR SHIP—SHIPPER'S DAMAGES.

[1. General average for repairs to the vessel are not allowed as against the cargo except where the vessel goes to a port of necessity from which the voyage is afterwards resumed; hence, where the cargo was sold in a port of refuge to obtain funds for repairing the vessel, there is no right to contribution.]

[2. Where a vessel after sustaining injury in a storm, puts into a port of refuge, and the master, without attempting to obtain funds by hypothecation of the vessel or other maritime contract, sells the cargo and uses part of the proceeds for making repairs, such sale must be considered to be without justification or excuse, it appearing that half the amount brought by the cargo would be sufficient to make the repairs.]

[3. In such case the shipper's damages are to be measured by the value of the cargo at the place of shipment, together with all expenses and interest from the time of shipment. If libelant claims more than this or respondent asks to be discharged for less, they must clearly show what would have been the value of the goods at their destination.]

This case involves principles of great importance to the mercantile community. The Harriet sailed from Norfolk on the 27th of November, 1847, bound to Point a Petre, Guadaloupe. She was loaded with staves, shipped by Myers & Co. to Carron & Bonaffe, of Guadaloupe. She met with very heavy, tempestuous weather, which damaged the vessel and rendered it impossible to continue the voyage without repairs. She therefore put into Kingston, Jamaica, where she arrived December 25th. On survey it was found that the upper works of the vessel were considerably strained, and that they needed repairs. These were made under the orders of the captain, and in order to pay for them, he took the responsibility of selling the cargo, and returned with the vessel in ballast to the United States. The vessel has now been libelled by the shipper and consignee for a breach of contract and of affreightment and they ask for a decree for the value of the goods at the point of shipment with interest from the time of sailing. The defendant does not deny a liability for the value of the cargo, but claims that the goods shall be charged with general average for the expenses from the time of the enforced deviation, and also the freight. He also contends, in the second place, that he is only liable for the net proceeds of the cargo at Kingston.

OPINION OF THE COURT. General average is not allowed except when the vessel went to a port of necessity, from which its voyage was afterwards resumed.

2. That freight is not earned if the voyage is abandoned by the delict of the ship or master.

3. The captain was not justified in making sale of the cargo at Kingston. It does not appear that he made any exertion to obtain funds by the hypothecation of the vessel or by any maritime contract. In order to justify a sale of the cargo, the necessity must be absolute and unequivocal or the sale is a tort. The captain sold the cargo, not only to pay the repairs, but because he had determined the voyage should be broken up. It appears that one-half of the amount brought by the cargo would have been sufficient to pay all the repairs—even if such a course were allowable. The sale was without excuse. The cargo was not perishable, and the master has no right to dispose of the property of the shipper for the sole benefit of the shipowner. The goods appear to have been disposed of solely for the benefit of the transporter. The rule is, where the sale of the cargo is allowable, that no more shall be sold than is necessary, so that the remainder may be carried to its place of destination by another vessel.

4. The rule determining the amount of damages is the value of the cargo at the place of shipment, all expenses and interest from the time of shipment. If the libelant claims more than this, or the defendant asks to be charged less, they must clearly and unequivocally show that the goods would, at the place of destination, bring the amount claimed to be the proper value.

Decree for libelants.

It is referred to the commissioner to ascertain the amount.

The defendant afterwards obtained leave to appeal to the circuit court.

MYERS v. The LIZZIE HOPKINS.

[1 Woods, 170.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1871.

SEAMEN—INJURY IN DISCHARGE OF DUTY—WAGES—MEDICAL ATTENDANCE—SUBSISTENCE.

When a seaman, while in the discharge of his duty, is injured by reason of the neglect or carelessness of an officer of the boat, the boat is liable for his wages until restored, and for his subsistence and medical attendance in the meantime.

[Cited in The Guiding Star, 1 Fed. 349.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.]

In admiralty.

R. H. Shannon, for libellant.

B. Egan, for claimant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The libellant claims of the libellee the sum of $350. He alleges that while employed upon the steamer Lizzie Hopkins, as a deck hand at the wages of $50 per month, and while engaged in the discharge of his duty under the orders of the officers of the boat, he was seriously injured by reason of the carelessness of said officers and other employees of the steamer. That by reason of his injuries he was disabled from labor and confined in the hospital for three months and fifteen days. He asks a decree for his wages for that time at $50 per month, amounting to $175, and for $175 for his subsistence, lodging and medical attendance for the same period, also amounting to $175.

The defense is, substantially, that the injury received by libellant was caused, not by the wrongful conduct, carelessness or negligence of the officers of the boat, but wholly through the neglect and carelessness of libellant, and that the libellant was shipped for the round trip from New Orleans to Natchez and return, and no longer, and that the defendant is not liable for his wages or the expenses of his cure after the expiration of the time for which he was engaged.

The record shows that, while the Lizzie Hopkins was lying at Natchez Island taking on board a lot of cotton, and while the libellant and a comrade were engaged in rolling a bale of cotton on board, having just reached the shore end of the staging, another bale of cotton was allowed to escape from the grasp of two other hands who were upon the bluff, and it came down and struck libellant, knocking him down and breaking his arm, and that at the time the mate of the steamer was on the bluff giving orders and hurrying up the lading of the cotton. The pretense that libellant was injured by reason of his own carelessness and negligence is utterly unsupported by any testimony in the case. No prudence or vigilance on his part could have averted the injury. He was in no way to blame. On the other hand, it appears that at the time of the occurrence it was raining, the bluff was muddy and slippery, and several bales of cotton had escaped from the grip of the hands and rolled down the bluff. Notwithstanding the lives and limbs of employees of the steamer were thus endangered, no additional care seems to have been taken by the mate to prevent a recurrence of this dangerous accident. The result was the serious injury of the libellant as above stated. I think it clear, from the record, that a decent regard for the lives and limbs of the hands in the employ of the boat, exercised by the officers of the boat, would have prevented the injury to the libellant.

The only question in the case then is, how far is the defendant liable for the wages and expenses of the libellant? Without passing upon the question whether the steamer would be liable for the wages and expenses of the injured party after the end of the trip or voyage for which he shipped, when there was no fault on the part of the officers of the boat, I think that, in a case where an injury is received by a seaman while in the discharge of his duty, through the fault or neglect of the officers of the boat, the boat is liable for wages until the seaman is restored, and for the expenses of his keeping and medical attendance until restored. Brown v. Overton [Case No. 2,024]; Croucher v. Oakman, 3 Allen, 185. I am satisfied that libellant has demanded no more than the defendant ought to pay. Let a decree be entered in his favor for $350 with interest from the date of the decree of the district court.

CORPORATIONS — UNPAID SUBSCRIPTIONS—ACTION BY ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY—CREDITORS' BILL—ASSIGNEE OF STOCK—CALLS.

1. Unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of a corporation are assets applicable to the payment of corporate debts, which the corporate authorities may call in for corporate purposes.

[Cited in Glenn v. Abell, 39 Fed. 12.]

2. Primarily the amount due on subscriptions is a debt due to the corporation which it alone can enforce, and, unless the corporation is without other assets to meet its obligations, and fails to meet the needed calls, creditors cannot interpose.

3. An account should be taken to know what, if any, calls should be made, for the bill by creditors cannot reach beyond the satisfaction of their demands.

4. An assignee of stock may have paid for it to the assignor and relied on his representations, and those of the officers of the company, that the shares so bought were fully paid for; yet creditors are not bound thereby, and if the stock was not fully paid, the holder is liable to creditors of the company for the amount remaining unpaid.

5. The assignee in bankruptcy has all the authority of a receiver to collect demands and pay debts, and, under the order of the court appointing him, an assessment may be made on the unpaid shares just as if the same had been ordered by the corporation before bankruptcy.

[Bill in equity by [Nathaniel Myers] the assignee of a bankrupt corporation [the St. Louis Soap Company] against the stockholders [F. A. Seeley and others] to collect the amount alleged to be due on their respective shares of stock.][2]

Meyers & Litton, for plaintiff.

S. M. Breckenridge, Ira C. Terry, and Lee & Adams, for defendants.

TREAT, District Judge. The bill is by the assignee of a bankrupt corporation, against certain stockholders, to compel payment by them of the amount alleged to be due on their respective shares of stock. Many of the parties defendant have not been served, and many responsible stockholders are not made defendants. Bills by creditors who have judgments against a corporation have been sustained against the corporation and its stockholders. Said bills being framed in the name of the judgment-creditors and of all others who may choose to come in and be made parties thereto. In such cases the decree has been for an account to be taken of the debts and assets of the corporation, for the appointment of a receiver, to whom the stockholders and officers are ordered to pay and account respectively for so much of the assets and capital stock as are necessary to pay the debts due to the creditors; the assets thus collected and received to be applied by the receiver in discharge of the debts. The reason of that rule is, that the unpaid subscriptions are assets applicable to the payment of corporate debts which the corporate authorities may call in for corporate purposes. If there are adequate assets other than said calls, then the creditor has no legal or equitable right to insist upon such calls. Primarily, the amount due on subscriptions is a debt to the corporation which it alone can enforce, and unless the corporation is without other assets to meet its obligations, and fails to make the needed calls, creditors cannot interpose. When the facts justify their interposition, an account of assets and debts should be taken in order that it may be known what, if any, calls should be made. No further call should be made than what is sufficient, together with the other assets, to meet all debts; for the bill by creditors cannot reach beyond the satisfaction of their demands. They have no other equity. Adler v. Milwaukee Patent Brick Manuf'g Co., 13 Wis. 57.

If a company is insolvent, the original mode of making calls upon the stock is not to be pursued in the enforcement of such a decree; for the debt is then due on the stock without demand, and no stockholder can shelter himself behind an agreement that he might pay otherwise than in money, or money value, as other stockholders have to do. Every share of stock subscribed represents an asset available to the corporation and its creditors. The payment of it in full, that is, actual cash payment, or payment of cash value, is enforceable. As between the corporation and its stockholders, its agreement as to paid up stock may be valid, but neither directors nor stockholders, nor both, can so act towards creditors as to debar the latter from insisting upon the actual payment by stockholders of what is really due on their stock. The assignee of shares can be in no better condition than the assignor. The transfer is not, so far as the right to make calls is concerned, dependent upon the good faith of assignor and assignee in their dealings between themselves. The question is simply whether the stock has been really paid in full to the corporation. The assignee may have paid for it to the assignor, and may have relied on the representations of the latter, and of officers of the company, that the shares bought were fully paid; yet creditors are not bound thereby, and if the stock was not fully paid, the holder is liable to creditors for the amount remaining unpaid.

The foregoing rules are clear enough for all ordinary cases brought by creditors; yet here, as stated in the case cited from 13

Wis., and in the case of Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 380, where the corporation is in bankruptcy, what is the proper course to be pursued? The assignee in bankruptcy has all the authority of a receiver to collect demands and pay debts; the proceedings in bankruptcy are adjusting the accounts, and the court sitting in the bankrupt case is proceeding to ascertain what calls, if any, will be necessary. If this suit in equity (and it might have been brought in the United States circuit court) is to result in a decree for an account, etc., shall the decree take from the court sitting in bankruptcy all further cognizance of those matters, or in other words, shall the court of equity draw into its jurisdiction and supersede all the powers and functions of the court in bankruptcy, specially charged by law with the collection and distribution of the assets of this insolvent corporation? This suit is by the assignee in bankruptcy, and under the orders of the court appointing him, an assessment may be made on the unpaid shares, just as if the same had been ordered by the corporation before bankruptcy, for he represents the corporation for the collection of all its assets. He represents also the creditors who are not bound by any agreement between the corporation and its stockholders, whereby the latter were to be considered as holding full paid stock. Hence, to now order an account to be taken by a master and to appoint a receiver, etc., would be virtually to supersede the pending proceedings in bankruptcy.

The proper course seems to be to dismiss the bill without prejudice, and order an assessment on all unpaid stock to be collected by the assignee; otherwise the proceedings will be embarrassed at every stage.

As the assignee is plaintiff, the court cannot appoint him receiver; and if he is to be superseded in the administration, what is to become of his powers and duties, and also of the ordinary and regular proceedings in bankruptcy? The powers and duties devolved by the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] seem necessarily to make a distinct proceeding in equity improper—to supersede that mode of satisfying creditors' demands against an insolvent corporation which has been adjudged bankrupt.

[NOTE. To avoid any difficulty arising from the two years' limitation clause in the bankrupt law which might prevent the bringing by the assignee of new suits against the individual stockholders, to recover payment of the unpaid stock on their respective shares, the court instead of formally dismissing the bill, as indicated in the opinion, subsequently directed "that the bill be retained for further proceedings thereunder on the following order: That the assignee proceed to collect from all stockholders of said company the amount due and unpaid on their respective shares." As to the general right of creditors and of the assignee in bankruptcy against the delinquent stockholders of a bankrupt corporation, see Sawyer v Hoag, ante, p. 43.] [2]

MYERS v. TYSON et al.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 15, 1876.

JUDGMENT—LIEN ON REALTY — NEW YORK STATUTE—DISCRETIONARY POWER OF STATE COURT.

Under section 967 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provides, that "judgments and decrees rendered in a circuit or district court, within any state, shall cease to be liens on real estate or chattels real, in the same manner and at like periods as judgments and decrees of the courts of such state cease, by law, to be liens thereon," the courts of the United States, in the state of New York, are not vested with the discretionary power which the state courts of New York have, under section 282 of the Code of Procedure of New York, to order real property bound by the lien of a judgment to be exempted from such lien, in certain cases, during the pendency of an appeal from such judgment.

[Cited in U. S. v. Sturgis, 14 Fed. 811.]

[This was a suit by Margaret Myers against William P. Tyson and Martin Murphy. It is now heard upon application of defendant Tyson for suspension of lien of decree entered upon real estate.]

Frederic H. Betts, for plaintiff.

Samuel J. Glassey, for defendant.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. This is an application for an order to suspend the lien of a decree of this court in equity upon all the real estate of the defendant Tyson. It is founded upon the claim, that the provision of the New York Code (section 282) applies, by force of the statute presently to be mentioned, to the lien of the judgment in question. If that claim is well founded, then it would rest in the discretion of the court, in view of all the facts, to grant or deny the order asked for. Section 967 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is as follows: "Judgments and decrees rendered in a circuit or district court, within any state, shall cease to be liens on real estate or chattels real, in the same manner and at like periods as judgments and decrees of the courts of such states cease, by law, to be liens thereon." This section is a re-enactment of part of section 4 of the act of July 4th, 1840 (5 Stat. 393), and which differs from it only by the word "now," and reads "now cease, by law, to be liens thereon." The state law, as it existed in 1840, was that, therefore, which was adopted by the statute of the United States of that year. At that time, no statute of New York gave to a party a right, on giving security on appeal, to apply for a suspension of the lien of a judgment against him. That right was given by an act of 1851, for the first time, which made it discretionary with the court to suspend the lien. The phrase of the act of 1840, re-enacted in section 967 of the Revised Statutes, was not intended to cover such a case, so far as this state is concerned, when it was adopted. Nor does it appear to me that the alteration of the statute, by re-enacting it, omitting the word "now," has the effect of introducing into the law of the United States, in this state, this particular provision. The lien, according to the section of the Code before referred to, is suspended during the appeal, but does not cease. It is suspended not by law, but by the discretion of the court. The words "by law," in section 967, are emphatic, and refer, in my judgment, to a fixed rule in respect to time and manner, and not to a discretionary power vested by statute in a state court. The section of the Code (section 282) is: "Whenever an appeal from any judgment shall be pending, and the undertaking requisite to stay execution on such judgment shall have been given, the court in which such judgment was recovered may, on special motion, after notice to the person owning such judgment, or to his attorney, and to the sureties to such undertaking, on such terms as such court shall see fit, by order, exempt from the lien of such judgment the whole of the real property upon which said judgment is a lien, or a specific portion thereof, to be described in such order, and direct an entry to be made by the clerk on the docket of such judgment, that the same is 'secured on appeal,' except that in case only a specific portion of such property is exempted from such lien, such order shall direct an entry to be made on such docket, that the same is 'secured on appeal, as per order of the court, dated ——,' specifying the date of such order, and thereupon such judgment shall cease, during the pendency of such appeal, to be a lien upon the property so exempted, as against purchasers and mortgagees in good faith." This vests a discretionary power in the state court to order the whole or a part of the real property bound by a judgment, to be exempted from its lien during the pendency of the appeal, in favor of purchasers and mortgagees in good faith. It does not, in my opinion, come within the meaning of section 967 of the Revised Statutes, and the courts of the United States do not, under that section, take, in this state, the discretionary power conferred upon the state courts in respect to their own judgments.

The motion must be denied.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Ohio.]

At law.

Mr. Wright, for plaintiff.

The District Attorney, for the United States.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The action in the district court was brought on a penal bond for fifteen hundred dollars, given by Peter Wilson, Abraham Myers, and others, securities, conditioned that the said Wilson should faithfully perform his duties as receiver of public moneys, at Steubenville, in the state of Ohio. The bond was dated 22d September, 1820. The breach assigned is, that Wilson received a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, which he failed to pay over or account for to the government, as he was bound to do. The defendant, in the district court, pleaded non est factum, and gave the following notice, under the statute. 1. That Wilson was first appointed in the recess of the senate, and gave bond in ten thousand dollars, dated 3d of November, 1808, with Johnson, Wells, and Pritchard, securities. That his permanent appointment was made 6th December, 1808; and that bond was given 6th January, 1809, with Pritchard and George Wilson securities, in $10,000. That afterwards, and upon the requisition of the secretary of the treasury, on the 15th of February, 1819, he gave another bond, with Campbell and Myers, securities; and upon like requisition gave the bond in suit, and if operative, is only collateral, &c. 2. That the duties of receiver were materially changed by several acts of congress. 3. That judgment was obtained on the first bond at July term, 1827, for $10,000, to be released on paying $9,919, on which $2,320 have been paid. 4. Judgment on second bond against Wilson, at the same term, for $10,000. 5. Judgment on the third bond, at the same term. 6. That the United States brought suit on the bond declared on in July, 1826, and obtained judgment in July, 1827, for the sum due, and on which a large sum has been collected which is claimed as a credit in this case. 7. That Wilson performed his duties as receiver from 22d September, 1820, to 20th December, 1820, from 30th September, 1820, to 6th December, 1820; when his term of office expired. 8. That defendant was surety, and the agent of the treasury, the 18th September, 1828, gave Wilson time till January, 1828.

On the trial, a bill of exceptions was taken by the attorney for the United States, substantially as follows: The defendant offered in evidence under the issue, payment of $2,320 received on execution which issued on a judgment against Wilson and his surety on the above bond, without showing that the vouchers had been exhibited and rejected at the treasury department, or any excuse for not thus exhibiting them, and which vouchers were admitted as evidence. And the court instructed the jury that the question of the application of payments in this case was a substantive fact to be proved by the plaintiff, and whether Wilson's payments since 22d September, 1820, had been applied to the balance then due, was to be determined by the jury from an inspection of the transcripts, and if not applied, the jury could apply them. And the court refused to charge as requested by the attorney of the United States, that from the manner of keeping the accounts, as shown in the transcripts, the jury should apply Wilson's payments since 30th September, 1820, to the balance then due, until such balance was discharged, and that the jury should apply the overplus above the debt of 30th September, 1820, pro tanto, to the sum due 6th December, 1820, or that the jury should apply said surplus, according to priority of time.

The bond on which this action was brought is dated 22d September, 1820, and the first question that arises is, whether the sureties in this bond can be held liable for any prior defalcations of Wilson, the receiver. The answer is, that the sureties are bound for a faithful discharge of the duties of receiver, from the date of the bond; and not that he had performed those duties. If the government intended the bond to cover the official responsibility of Wilson in time past, as well as for time to come, its language would have been adapted to such an object; and the sureties would have had due notice of the extent of their liability. The obligation of a surety is a matter of strict law, and can never arise from implication. The bond must speak for itself, and its language can never be extended or altered, to the injury of the surety. But it is insisted that the transcript shows a large balance due at the date of the bond, which the receiver was bound to pay over to the government; and a failure to do this, is a failure of official duty, for the due performance of which the sureties in this bond are bound. The transcript, it is true, shows that Wilson was a defaulter in a large sum at the time this bond was executed, and which he should have paid over before its execution to the government. Now can the sureties to this bond be held responsible on this evidence. The receipt of the money by the receiver may be admitted, but suppose, as the fact probably was, that he had applied it to objects of a private nature before the execution of the bond, would any one contend that the sureties are responsible for such misapplication of the public money. The default in this view was complete before the date of the bond, and the fund was misapplied. There could, therefore, be no liability of the sureties under such circumstances, unless the bond provided expressly for the case. And unless there was more evidence before the jury than that which is found on the transcript, the defendant below could not be charged with any part of this defalcation. It may be admitted, if the government had shown that the whole or any part of the balance due, at the date of the bond, came into the hands of the receiver subsequent to the date of the bond, the sureties might be held responsible for the payment of the amount received. Or if it had been shown that the balance was in the hands of the receiver, not presumptively but in fact, when the bond was given, there would be ground on which to insist that the sureties are liable. But there appears to have been no evidence to the jury that the balance was in the hands of the receiver at the date of the bond; or that it came into his hands subsequently. I am aware that this might have been set up as a matter of defence. But I am inclined to think, that it is not incumbent on the defendant to show the misapplication of monies received, and for which the receiver was in default prior to the execution of the bond. It appears to me that when the government seeks to make a surety responsible for a balance due, at the time the bond is executed, it must show the money was in the hands of the principal when the security became bound.

The court in the case of Farrar v. U. S., 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 389, say: "We feel no difficulty in affirming that for any sums paid to Rector prior to the execution of the bond, there is but one ground on which the sureties could be held answerable to the United States, and that is on the assumption that he still held the money in bank or otherwise. If still in his hands, he was, up to that time bailee to the government; but upon the contrary hypothesis, he had become a debtor or defaulter to the government and his offence was already consummated. If intended to cover past dereliction, the bond should have been made retrospective in its language. The sureties have not undertaken against his past misconduct."

And the court held that the court below erred in not suffering the defendant to prove the misapplication of the money before the date of the bond. But the question was not raised whether it was not incumbent on the government to show the amount of money in the hands of the surveyor at the date of the bond. This evidence is essential to the liability of the surety; and I am inclined to think that proof of the defalcation only, does not fix this liability. The default being prior to the bond, the government must show that the money was in the hands of the principal at the date of the bond. And this upon the simple ground, that the surety does not undertake to account for prior defaults, but for those which may subsequently occur. In the case cited the fund was placed in the hands of the surveyor for disbursements; but in the case under consideration, the receiver was bound to pay over the money, which he had failed to do; and for such failure, I hold a subsequent surety is not bound, unless the bond be retrospective in its conditions, or the money is shown to be in the hands of the receiver when the bond was given. In [U. S. v. Giles] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 227, 229, it was decided that the sureties were not bound for moneys received by a marshal, before the date of the bond. But the charge of the district court, in regard to the application of payments was not prejudicial to the government. It adopts the language of the court, substantially, in the case of U. S. v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 720. The court there remark, that the general doctrine is, that the debtor has a right if he pleases, to make the appropriation of payments; if he omits it, the creditor may make it; if both omit it, the law will apply the payments according to its own notions of justice. It is certainly too late for either party to claim a right to make an appropriation after the controversy has arisen, and a fortiori, at the time of the trial. But this is not a case where the general doctrine on this subject applies. It is a case between different sets of sureties, under several bonds which have been stated. And I do not conceive that the government had any right to apply monies received and paid over, in the regular course of his duties, subsequent to the date of the bond under consideration, in discharge of a balance due from the receiver, before the date of the bond. This would be doing gross injustice to the defendant, in holding him responsible for a default consummated before he became bound. [U. S. v. January] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 575. Subsequent to the date of the bonds, the respective sureties are held responsible. But in ascertaining this liability it is necessary to show when the bonds took effect, and what defalcations they cover.

I am clearly of the opinion that the court very properly refused to instruct the jury, as asked, that the moneys paid by the receiver subsequent to the date of the bond should be first applied in discharge of the balance due before the bond was executed; and consequently there was no error in refusing to instruct them how the residue of the payments, after the discharge of said balance, should be applied. Nor did the court err in permitting evidence of the money collected on the judgment as a credit on this identical bond, against another surety. It was not necessary that the voucher for this payment should be presented, for allowance, at the treasury department. The return of the marshal is evidence of the payment to the government; he being the legal agent of the government to receive it, the execution being placed in his hands. I suppose it would hardly be contended that where an individual had paid to the treasurer of the United States in full, a sum of money which he had collected for them, he must exhibit to the treasury the voucher he had received, before such voucher would be admissible in evidence in an action by the government, for the money thus paid. And the principle is the same whether a payment is made in whole or in part. But the case under consideration is still stronger, as the government has placed the claim in the hands of the officers of the law, and the payment is shown by the official action of those officers. In fact the charge was favorable to the United States, and in some parts against the defendant, as it regards the application of the payments, so that had the verdict been in favor of the government, there would have been error.

Upon the whole the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Sept. Term, 1854. [2]

REFERENCE—FORMAL DEFECTS—AWARD—RULE OF DAMAGES — RAILROAD CONSTRUCTION — PAY IN STOCK — STOCK RESERVED — MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. A reference of a pending action, under a rule of court, authorizes the referee to take into consideration only the subject-matter substantially shown by the declaration; but he may disregard all such formal defects as might be amended if the case were tried in court.

2. The award cannot be accepted if it does not enable the court, by inspecting it, to separate what was, from what was not awarded within the submission. But a general award of a specific sum, without specifying the items of which it is composed is good, in point of form.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

[2] [Affirmed in 18 How. (59 U. S.) 246.]

3. Reference of an action of covenant by a rule of court, makes the referee the final judge of the lawful rule of damages, and the court, on an application to accept the award, will not review his decision.

4. Under a stipulation to pay for building a railroad by monthly payments, twenty-five per cent. to be paid in stock of the corporation, "reserving one half the stock as indemnity for the fulfilment of this contract until said division of said road shall be completed," the corporation having wrongfully interrupted the work before the completion of the said division, held, that the stipulation as to the stock was executory, and the covenantee had not obtained a title thereto, and consequently should be allowed in damages the value thereof.

[Cited in McCreery v. Green, 38 Mich. 180.]

5. In an action of covenant, the plaintiff having been wrongfully prevented by the defendants from completing the work, the measure of damages is the difference between the price agreed to be paid for the work, and what it would have cost the plaintiff to complete it.

[Cited in McCreery v. Green, 38 Mich. 183; Hammond v. Beeson (Mo. Sup.) 15 S. W. 1002; Id., 112 Mo. 198, 20 S. W. 476.]

[This was an action of covenant by John G. Meyers against the New York & Cumberland Railroad Company, to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of plaintiff's dismissal by the railroad company before the completion of his contract.]

F. O. J. Smith (with whom was Deblois), for plaintiff.

Clifford & Shepley, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This action was referred under a rule of the court, entered at the April term, 1853, to John Davis, Marcus Morton, and Nathan Hale, Esquires, and after these referees had fully heard the parties, one of their number, Mr. Davis, died, and then Mr. Morton became so ill as to be unable to act. The parties thereupon agreed, that the remaining referee, Mr. Hale, should make an award, and he having done so, it was presented to the court at the last term, and its acceptance moved by the plaintiff, and opposed by the defendant,—only one judge being then present, by consent of parties, the case was continued to the present term, when the defendants filed their objections to the acceptance of the award, as follows:

"United States of America, Circuit Court of the United States for Maine District. In the action John G. Myers, Plaintiff, v. The York and Cumberland Railroad Company, Defendants. And now at the September term of said court, the defendants in the above entitled cause come into court and object to the acceptance of the award of Hon. Nathan Hale, as referee in the above action, and allege the following objections to the acceptance of the paper offered as an award of the said referee: First. That the said Hale has acted and awarded upon, and included in said award, damages for a subject-matter not referred to him. Second. That the said Hale has included in his said award damages for a claim not embraced in the plaintiff's writ or declaration, and not sued for in the above action, and not referred to his arbitration or decision. Third. That in and by his said award he has awarded to the plaintiff in said action damages for the non-delivery of the reserved stock specified in said writ and declaration, and in the contracts therein set out and copied, although the said reserved stock is not sued for, nor is any allegation made in the said writ and declaration that the same had been demanded, nor was any proof of demand of the same offered at the hearing before said referee, nor was any claim for the same referred for his arbitration or decision. Fourth. That the said Hale has awarded damages to the said plaintiff, in lieu of profits for work not performed by the plaintiff, under his said contracts, contrary to law. Fifth. That there having been no proof or claim that the defendants, in fraud of the plaintiff's rights under his said contract, had taken the contract from the plaintiff and given it to any other person at a lower rate, or taken it for the purpose of giving it to any other party, at a lower rate, the referee has awarded a sum as damages to the plaintiff, for prospective profits not earned by him, contrary to law. Sixth. That it does not appear in and by said award whether the said referee has credited or charged the plaintiff with an amount of bonds deposited in the hands of Levi Morrell, under the terms of the supplementary contract dated February 6, 1851, and set out in said writ and declaration. Seventh. That it does not appear in and by said award what disposition was made by the referee, of an amount of bonds in the hands of D. C. Emery, the treasurer of said corporation. Eighth. That it does not appear in and by said award whether the said referee charged the said plaintiff with an amount of bonds in his hands purporting to have been issued by one Nathaniel J. Herrick, describing himself as treasurer pro tempore of said corporation."

Upon these objections, by permission of the court, the testimony of Mr. Hale, the referee, was taken, and the counsel of the respective parties having been heard, and the objections to the award considered, we will now state our opinion thereon. The first three objections are statements in different forms, of the same thing. Their substance is this, that the referee exceeded his authority, by awarding to the plaintiff damages on account of certain stock of the defendant corporation, called reserved stock. This involves two inquiries: 1. Whether the referee did, in point of fact, allow such damages; and 2. Whether that subject-matter was referred to him. The first has been answered by the referee himself. He has testified "the value of the reserved stock, as estimated by me, was included in the damages I awarded." And it is insisted by the defendants, that the referee had not authority to include in his award a compensation to the plaintiff, for not receiving this stock. The argument is, that this was not a reference of all demands, but only of this action; that nothing was referred which was not sued for; that under the declaration in the case neither the reserved stock, nor its value, nor a compensation for not receiving it is demanded; that the referee therefore exceeded his power in awarding damages on this account, and as the amount of those damages does not appear upon the award, so that they can be separated from the residue of the damages, by the court, the whole award is void.

To the correctness of many of these positions the court at once assents. This being a reference of the action, it was not competent for the referee to take into consideration any subject-matter, not substantially shown by the declaration. We say substantially, because formal defects in a declaration may be, and should be overlooked by a referee of an action under a rule of court. He has not the power possessed by the court, to allow them to be amended, but he may disregard them. Coffin v. Cottle, 4 Pick. 454; Forseth v. Shaw, 10 Mass. 253. Still the declaration must in substance, embrace a subject-matter, to enable a referee of that action, under a rule of court, to include that subject-matter in his award. We are of opinion also, that under our practice, the award itself must be such, as to enable the court to distinguish what is, from what is not, legally awarded. The practice here, derived from ancient usage in the state of Massachusetts, is to render a judgment on the award. The record must contain the basis of such a judgment. The award goes upon the record. But if the court were to hear parol testimony as to the amount of damages actually awarded, and act thereon, and render judgment therefor, the judgment would accord with that parol evidence, which would not be on the record, and would not pursue the award, which would be on the record. We think the correct practice, in such a case, would require us not to accept the award. Whether it should be recommitted or not, must depend on circumstances, not necessary in this connection to be described.

The important question here is, whether this subject-matter of the reserved stock was substantially embraced in the declaration; and to decide this question we must consider the contracts set out in the declaration, and the averments there made. and the breaches there assigned. The declaration, which is in covenant broken, sets out in haec verba, two principal contracts under seal. The first bears date the 12th day of August, 1848, the second on the 5th day of August, 1850. The subject-matter now under consideration, namely, "the reserved stock" depends upon the second of these contracts, by force of which the original contract to build the railroad was modified and changed in many important particulars. By this second contract the road was to be divided into four parts: from the depot in Portland to the station house in Gorham, being the "First Division;" from Gorham to the Saco River, "No. 2;" from Saco River to Alfred, "No. 3;" from Alfred to the terminus, "No. 4." And the second contract provides that for the work on the first division, "as the same shall progress from the first day of August current, payment shall be made at the rate of fifty per cent., in cash, and twenty-five per cent. in the six per cent. bonds of the company hereafter described, and twenty-five per cent. in stock, reserving one half of the stock, as indemnity for the fulfilment of this contract until said division of said road shall be completed." The declaration avers, that after the making of the last-mentioned contract, the plaintiff proceeded in the performance thereof, and continued, down to the 19th day of August, 1851, to do all that was incumbent on him towards the fulfilment thereof on his part; that on that day, while proceeding with the work, and when he had nearly completed the "first division," and while he was willing to continue to execute his contract, the defendants removed him from his situation as contractor; and prevented him from completing the work and performing the residue of his contract.

Upon this declaration, the question is, whether the referee could take into consideration that claim in the contract, which entitled the plaintiff to receive from the company, twelve and a half per cent. of the contract price of the work upon the "first division" in the stock of the corporation, upon the completion of that work. It is entirely clear that the time for this payment had not arrived when this action was brought. The language of the contract is, that payment shall be made to the extent of twenty-five per cent. in stock, "reserving one half of the stock as indemnity for the fulfilment of this contract, until said division of said road shall be completed." The substance of this stipulation, and its legal as well as its practical effect, were, that until the "first division" should be completed, this part of the payment was not to be made. And the declaration avers, that when the plaintiff was prevented by the defendants from going on with the work, the first division had not been completed. The precise ground of action, therefore, so far as concerns this stock, was not that the defendants would not deliver it to him, for he had not become entitled to receive it; but it was, that by preventing him from completing the first division of the road, they have prevented him from acquiring a right to this stock. This was one of the benefits which would have accrued to him by the completion of his contract. Of this benefit they deprived him by stopping his work. And, consequently, the value of this right is, among other things, to be made good to him, he having lost it by the wrongful act of the defendants. Having set out in the declaration the contract which gave him the right, and made its enjoyment dependent on the completion of the work, and having averred that he was prevented from completing it by the defendants, the declaration contains sufficient to lay the foundation for this claim of damages. Suppose the contract had stipulated that the price of the work should be paid on its completion, in some species of merchandise, and the defendants had prevented the contractor from completing the work. It would then have been necessary to ascertain at what time the contractor could and would, if not prevented, have finished the work; then to find the market value of such merchandise on that day, and then to allow the contractor, by way of damages, that market value, deducting the cost of completing the work; and all this would be done by the jury, under a declaration describing the contract, and averring that the defendants had prevented its completion. In our opinion, the assignment of the breach, that the defendants discharged the plaintiff from the work, and refused to permit him to complete it, was sufficient to enable the plaintiff to claim before the referee, all damages which naturally arose from that breach; and that the value of the stock, which the plaintiff was prevented by this breach from obtaining, constituted a part of those damages.

It was strongly argued by the defendants' counsel, that so far as the plaintiff had earned these stocks by work actually done, they were, in truth, his property; that he was their legal owner; that though they continued in the hands of the company, it was only that the latter might retain a lien thereon for their security; and that the company had been at all times ready to acknowledge his title. But whatever force this argument is entitled to, we think it was an argument to be addressed to the referee, and considered by him, in the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred on him by the parties. He was to determine what damages Myers was entitled to recover, by reason of any breaches of covenant by the defendants, alleged in the declaration. Among those breaches, was the refusal to permit him to finish the work. But the amount of damages which he should recover for this breach, necessarily depended on the general state of the account between the parties. He was entitled to recover the contract price of the work, deducting the cost of finishing the work, and deducting also so much of that contract price as had been paid to him by the company. Suppose the ground had been taken before the referee, which is taken here, that for twelve per centum of the work done on the first division the plaintiff had already received payment in stock pursuant to the contract, and, therefore, to that extent, could have no claim for damages by reason of the interruption of the work by the defendants; and suppose the plaintiff had then answered, as he now does, that the provisions of the contract, taken in connection with what was done respecting this stock, did not amount to a payment pro tanto, and so did not reduce his claim; must not the referee have decided that question? and if he decided it in favor of the plaintiff, must he not have gone on and put a money value on this stock, which the plaintiff was entitled to receive as part of the contract price of the work? Whether such questions were in fact raised before the referee, we do not know, nor is it material. It is enough that they might have been raised; for if they could, and he had power to decide them, he did not exceed his authority, when he allowed the value of this stock, as estimated by him, as part of the damages he awarded. He has testified that he did not perceive how he could assess the damages in money without passing on this question, and we think he was justified in taking this view of his powers and duties. For reasons which will be presently more fully stated, we consider the decision of the referee final upon this question, which he had authority to decide. But if we were now to revise that decision, we do not perceive how we could declare it to be erroneous. The plaintiff, as already stated, was not to receive the reserved stock on account of the first division, until the contract for that division should be completed. The time for receiving this payment had not arrived; his title to it was yet incomplete when the action was brought. This stock was to be evidenced by certificates thereof issued by the company in pursuance of their charter and by-laws, describing and identifying the particular shares. So far as appears to us, no tender of any certificates of this stock was ever made by the company to Myers, and no admission made that there was any balance due him on general account. And the only act done by the company concerning this stock which has been shown to us is, that in the account exhibited by the company to the referee is the following entry:

The Amount of Stock Estimated to Mr. Myers by the Engineer.
Amount of certificates issued.....	$65,000 00
Amount of reserved stock.....	31,435 33
Amount of stock due Myers, Nov. 1, 1851	1,294 69
Bal. stock due Myers and not issued	1,294 69

Upon this state of facts, we are unable to see how the company could successfully maintain that this reserved stock had actually passed to the plaintiff and become his property. In this account they do not even treat it as due to him. The object which the parties had in view in the stipulation for its being reserved, the security of the company, could only be obtained by having the title continued in the company. No certificates having ever been issued, and no particular shares identified, the property was not the subject of a pledge, or mortgage, or lien by contract, and the only mode in which it could stand as security, was to consider the whole contract as executory; that is, that the company agreed to issue certificates to him, and thus constitute him a stockholder to the extent of this twelve and a half per cent., when the first division should be completed; and, that until that time should arrive, no such shares were in existence, and the company was under no obligation to create them for his benefit. We are aware, that under some circumstances, a party may be the owner of stock in a corporation, though no certificate has been issued to him. But we consider such cases distinguishable from this case, by strongly marked features. Where the title of a party to receive a certificate is perfect, he may insist, as against the company, that he shall be treated as a stockholder. Where the obligation of a party to take a certificate is perfect, the company may insist that he shall bear the burdens of a stockholder. But where an executory contract is made by a corporation to issue shares of its stock to a party when he shall have done certain work, and the company prevent him from completing the work, make no tender of certificates, and do nothing to set apart any particular shares for his use, we do not think they can defeat the action of the contractor for damages, upon the ground, that the contract on their part, executed itself and made him the owner of the stock which they agreed he should have, and so he has no cause of complaint. Our opinion is, that this stipulation for a payment in stock, was executory merely; and the plaintiff no more became the owner of such an amount of stock, by doing a part of the work, than he would have become the owner of the defendants' money, while in the hands of their treasurer, if the whole payment had been to be made in money instead of partly in stock. The first, second, and third objections are, in our opinion, insufficient to prevent the acceptance of the award. The fourth and fifth objections to the award are, in substance, that the referee has awarded damages for prospective profits on work not actually done by the plaintiff.

At the hearing, the court intimated that it considered the law to be, that profits which the contractor would have made, if allowed to complete the work, were recoverable, as damages in this action; and that however this might be, the judgment of the referee upon the rule of damages was final. Upon this intimation, though the court expressed its willingness to hear the counsel, and to allow the referee to be examined, to ascertain what rule, he in fact adopted, the counsel declined to press their objections, and the referee was not examined on this subject-matter. Still, if on further reflection and examination, the court had found that its intimations were not well-founded, it would have given opportunity further to examine the referee. But we have not so found. Under a contract for building part of a railroad, in its nature precisely like the one now before us, the supreme court, in the case of Philadelphia, W. & B. R. R. v. Howard, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 344, decided this question. It is there said, "It is insisted that only actual damages, and not profits, were in that event to be allowed by the jury. It must be admitted that actual damages were all that could lawfully be given, in an action of covenant, even if the company had been guilty of fraud. But it by no means follows that profits were not to be allowed, understanding as we must, the term profits, in this instruction, as meaning the gain which the plaintiff would have made, if he had been permitted to complete his contract. Actual damages clearly include the direct and actual loss which the plaintiff sustains propter rem ipsam non habitam, and in case of a contract like this, that loss is, among other things, the difference between the cost of doing the work and the price to be paid for it. This difference is the inducement and real consideration which causes the contractor to enter into the contract. For this he expends his time, exerts his skill, uses his capital, and assumes the risks which attend the enterprise; and to deprive him of it, when the other party has broken the contract, and unlawfully put an end to the work, would be unjust. There is no rule of law which requires us to inflict this injustice." Upon the other ground, the conclusiveness of the judgment of that tribunal to whose decision the parties have voluntarily submitted their case, we are equally clear. Unless we overrule the decision of Mr. Justice Story in Kleine v. Catara [Case No. 7,869], we must hold, that the judgment of the referee upon all questions of law and fact, necessary to a determination of the matter submitted to him, is final, and binding on the parties, in the absence of fraud and under regular proceedings in which no improper conduct is alleged. We are satisfied of the correctness of this rule, which has received the sanction of courts of great respectability, and among others, of the supreme court of Maine, in Brown v. Clay, 31 Me. 518, and of the supreme court of Massachusetts, in Boston Water Power Co. v. Gray, 6 Metc. [Mass.] 131. Our opinion is that the fourth and fifth objections are not tenable.

The remaining objections were, properly, not pressed at the hearing, and it is not necessary to notice them in detail. A referee may certainly make a general award, provided it appears on its face to embrace, and finally dispose of, what was submitted to him. He is not bound in a case like this, to show what disposition he made of each item in a long and complex account. If this case had been tried by the court and jury, the verdict and judgment would have shown no more particulars than are upon the face of this award, and the court does not exact of a referee of an action under a rule, any more fulness and particularity of finding than the law has deemed sufficiently certain in its own regular proceedings.

The result is, that the objections to the award are found insufficient, and it must be accepted.

[This case was carried by writ of error to the supreme court, where the judgment of this court was affirmed. 18 How. (59 U. S.) 246.]

Case No. 9,998.

MYGATT v. GREEN BAY.

[1 Biss. 292; [1] 8 Am. Law Reg. 271.]

District Court, D. Wisconsin. Sept., 1859.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — BONDS — RIGHTS OF HOLDER—PAYABLE IN DISTANT PLACE—ACT AUTHORIZING ISSUE—NOTICE.

1. The holder of a city bond issued to a plank road company or bearer in aid of the construction of the road, pursuant to a legislative act, is not bound to examine the records of the city to ascertain whether the resolution of the council for issuing the bonds corresponds with the resolution recited in the bonds. The recital in the bond binds the city in an action by a bona fide holder.

[Cited in Milner v. Pensacola, Case No. 9,619.]

2. Where city bonds are issued to a corporation or road company payable in the city of New York, without express authority of law to make them so payable, the bonds are not void for this reason, but the city is not bound to transport funds to New York for their payment.

3. The act under which the bonds are issued is the basis of the contract, and dealers in such bonds should take notice of the act, it being a public statute.

An act of the state legislature to amend the charter of the town of Green Bay, and to enable the corporation to aid in the construction of roads, approved March 7th, 1853 [Laws 1853, p. 138], provided, that the corporation of said town shall be hereafter known and styled the "President and Trustees of the Borough of Green Bay." Section 2 of said acts is: "That the president and trustees of said borough shall have authority to subscribe in behalf of said borough, to the capital stock of any rail or plank road, which is now, or may thereafter be incorporated for the purpose of constructing roads passing through, or terminating in said town, or on the Fox river opposite said borough, to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars." And by section 3: "In order to provide for the payment of the installments on the stock subscribed as aforesaid, the said president and trustees may borrow, on the faith of said borough, any sum or sums of money not exceeding in the aggregate the whole amount of the installments to become due on such stock, at a rate of interest not exceeding eight per cent. per annum, and for a term not exceeding twenty years. And in order to provide for the payment of the installments becoming due on such stock, in case the same shall not have been provided for by law, or otherwise, and also in order to provide for the payment of the interest and principal of any loan made in pursuance of this act, the said president and trustees shall levy annually a tax on the real estate within the corporate limits of said borough not exceeding one per cent. on the assessed value of said property: provided, that if in any year the exigency of the case may require it, such tax may be increased to any rate not exceeding two per cent. on such assessed value." By an act to incorporate the Taychudah and Green Bay Plank Road Company, approved April 16th, 1852 (Laws 1852, p. 551), that company was incorporated; and the city of Green Bay was incorporated by an act approved February 27th, 1854 (Laws 1854, p. 100). By this act the city was made liable for the debts of the borough. This suit is on bonds of the borough of Green Bay, for the recovery of the interest accrued, according to their condition, and coupons annexed. The bonds recite the authority given the president and trustees, by the act of March 7th, 1853, to subscribe to stock. And also: "Whereas, the president and trustees of said borough at a meeting of their board, did agree by resolutions of said board to subscribe the sum of twenty thousand dollars to the stock of the Taychudah and Green Bay Plank Road Company, and that the said borough issued bonds to the amount of said subscription, to the said plank road company, and that said bonds be signed by the president and countersigned by the clerk, under the seal of the corporation. Now, therefore, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the said act of the legislature, and in accordance with the resolutions of the said board, as aforesaid, the borough of Green Bay is held and firmly bound unto the Taychudah and Green Bay Plank Road Company, or bearer, in two thousand dollars, upon the condition that the said borough of Green Bay shall pay or cause to be paid to the said Taychudah and Green Bay Plank Road Company, or their successors or assigns, or to the bearer hereof, the just and full sum of one thousand dollars in ten years from the first day of January, 1854, with interest annually at the rate of eight per cent. per annum until paid, said principal and interest to be paid at the Bank of New York, in the city of New York." The coupons annexed are for eighty dollars each. The annual interest is payable at the Bank of New York. The bonds are signed by the president of the borough and countersigned by the clerk under the corporate seal. The coupons are signed by the president. The following resolution of the board on the 19th of November, 1853, was read on the part of the defendant: "That the board of trustees of the borough of Green Bay, hereby authorize their committee on subscriptions to subscribe the sum of twenty thousand dollars to the capital stock of the Green Bay and Taychudah Plank Road Company, payable in bonds of the borough at seven per cent. per annum, under the act authorizing the said borough of Green Bay to subscribe to plank roads and railroads." One terminus of the road was at Green Bay. The defendant's counsel offered to prove, that the contractor received seventeen of these bonds, and that he had only made three miles of road, at a distance of sixteen miles from Green Bay, which offer was overruled as immaterial. A verdict was taken pro forma for the amount of coupons due before suit brought, not adding exchange on New York. The defendant's counsel moved for a new trial.

Peckham & Bloodgood, for plaintiff.
Howe & Beckwith, for defendant.

MILLER, District Judge. The two questions worthy of consideration, raised on this motion are: 1st. That the resolution of the board did not authorize the issuing of the bonds at a rate of interest higher than seven per cent. 2d. That the act did not authorize bonds to be issued payable in the city of New York.

The resolution of the board of trustees, as recited in the bonds, does not correspond with the resolution of record, excepting in this, that twenty thousand dollars of stock in the company is authorized to be subscribed for, and that bonds be issued for the amount. The rate of interest recited in the bonds is not as prescribed by the resolution. The recital refers to a resolution directing how the bonds shall be executed. The clerk testified that there was no other resolution of the board on record but the one. It may be, there was another resolution which was not recorded. At all events it is immaterial in this suit of the holders of the bonds, whether there was such a resolution or not. The city cannot take advantage, in this suit, of the omission or neglect of the clerk. The recital in the bonds binds the borough the same as if a previous resolution had been passed by the president and trustees, and duly recorded. The city is now estopped from denying the existence of a resolution authorizing the president and clerk to execute bonds in the form of these bonds at an interest of eight per cent. The purchaser was not bound to look for the resolution. Commissioners of Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 539; Royal British Bank v. Turquand, 6 Ell. & Bl. 327. The bonds are the acts of the trustees directly and not through agents.

The weight of authority sustains the principle, that when an obligation is payable at a particular place, and is necessarily sued at a place where the exchange is in favor of the place of payment, the party is entitled to recover the real difference of exchange. Story, Confl. Law, §§ 308–313, and cases cited; Story, Bills, §§ 150–152, and cases cited; Sedg. Dam. 240, and cases cited; Smith v. Shaw [Case No. 13,107]; Lanusse v. Barker, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 101; Woodhull v. Wagner [Case No. 17,975]; Lee v. Wilcocks, 5 Serg. & R. 48; Grant v. Healey [Case No. 5,696]. In Wood v. Kelso, 27 P. St. 241, a suit on a note dated in Erie, Pennsylvania, payable in New York, the exchange was allowed.

The decisions against the allowance of exchange are Martin v. Franklin, 4 Johns. 125, which was an action of assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, and insimul computassent, Schofield v. Day, 20 Johns. 102. It will be observed, that the courts in each of those cases contented themselves with a per curiam opinion without any examination of authorities or precedents, and also Adams v. Cordis, 8 Pick. 260. These bonds would on their faces entitle the holders to the exchange between Green Bay and New York, in addition to the debt and interest.

The legislative act authorized the president and trustees of the borough of Green Bay, to borrow on the faith of said borough, at a rate of interest not exceeding eight per cent. per annum. The condition of the bonds is for the payment of the principal and interest at the rate of eight per cent. at the Bank of New York, in the city of New York. The act did not expressly authorize the issuing of bonds, but it is reasonable to suppose it was contemplated that some security or evidence of debt should be given by the president and trustees for the money borrowed. The bonds were given to the company for stock subscribed, and according to the modern system of financiering, they were put into negotiable shape, so that money could be raised on them for the prosecution of the work. By the law the principal and interest on these bonds are to be paid out of taxes assessed upon the real estate of the inhabitants of Green Bay.

In the case of the Commissioners of Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 539, the act authorized bonds to be issued, redeemable at such time and place as the directors of the company may determine. The bonds were made payable in the city of New York, to the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company, or bearer, for stock in said company. There was express lawful authority for issuing these bonds.

These bonds, on their face, import a compliance with the law under which they were issued. "The act under which the bonds were issued is a public statute of the state, and the person dealing in them is chargeable with a knowledge of it, and as the board was acting under delegated authority, he must show that the authority has been properly conferred." In reading the act, under which the bonds in suit purport to be issued, he will not find express authority to issue bonds, nor any authority, express or implied, to issue them payable in the city of New York, where the exchange is uniformly against Green Bay. The purchaser of these bonds might properly consider them nothing more than a certificate under the corporate seal of the borough, signed by the president, and countersigned by the clerk. They are in substance nothing more.

The borough of Green Bay, instead of borrowing money to pay installments on the stock, issued bonds direct to the plank road company. The company thus became the creditor of the borough, instead of some person from whom the money might have been borrowed, and it received the bonds as cash in payment of the subscription. It was attempted to be proved, at the trial, that the borough never received the certificates of stock, but proof was not to be received to affect the bonds in the hands of these plaintiffs, for the neglect of the corporation in not obtaining the certificates, could not be a reason for not paying the bonds. The city is entitled to the certificates of stock for which the bonds were given, and can recover them, or damages for their amount on demand.

Giving the bonds to the plank road company cannot be now made an objection on the part of the city, even if it were not according to the literal terms of the act. The borough preferred this mode of carrying out the provisions of the act, and either received an equivalent, or a supposed equivalent for the bonds, or is entitled so to receive it on demand. Under the act it could have borrowed the money, and paid the subscription in installments, or paid the whole amount in advance, or given its bonds for the whole amount. Either proceeding would be a substantial compliance with the act. And having preferred the latter mode, a defense to the payment of the bonds and interest, based upon technical grounds, is not to be favored. In the case of City of Bridgeport v. Housatonuc R. Co., 15 Conn. 475, the bonds were made payable in the city of New York, without express authority of law. That was not made a point of defense. The defense was, that the interest on the bonds was payable semi-annually when it was directed to be paid annually. The court held it was not such a material violation of the authority for issuing the bonds, as to invalidate them, particularly as the freemen of the city afterwards approved them. The rate of exchange between New York and Bridgeport was probably so nearly balanced, and the expenses of transporting the money to New York, so trifling—that this objection was probably not thought worthy of consideration.

A note payable generally is a different instrument from one given by the same parties for the same amount, payable at New York. The rate of interest, the exchange, and the place of demand are controlled by the place where it is payable. Nor will a note payable at a particular place be received on a declaration, in which the place of payment is omitted. Sebree v. Dorr, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 558; Covington v. Comstock, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 43. In this case the rate of interest is prescribed in the bond. And no demand is necessary. But the rate of exchange between Green Bay and New York, or the expense of transporting funds from Green Bay to New York, is so considerable in amount as greatly to enhance the amount of debt. It is evident that the act did not authorize the loans or debts to be contracted on this condition. But shall the bonds be adjudged void for this reason? It was the duty of the plaintiffs to examine the act, and there they would not see any authority for contracting the loan or debt on this condition.

After much reflection upon the subject, I have come to the conclusion, that the interest on the bonds is recoverable, but not with exchange on New York, as the act did not authorize the loan or debt to be contracted on that condition. The act controls the extent of the obligation. That part of the condition of the bonds is not binding on the city, as a part of the contract under the act, and the property in the city should not be taxed for its payment. The holder of such bonds and coupons cannot require the city of Green Bay to pay in the city of New York. I think the bonds are a lawful debt of the city, with annual interest at the rate of eight per cent. The motion for a new trial will be overruled.

NOTE. The holder of coupon bonds payable to bearer but referring to act under which they were issued, is chargeable with knowledge of its provisions, and the construction to be placed upon them by the courts. Com. v. State, 32 Md. 501. County bonds payable absolutely to bearer are good in hands of bona fide holder, although restrictions in statute have been disregarded. Wood v. Alleghany Co. [Case No. 17,939]; City of San Antonio v. Lane, 32 Tex. 405. Bona fide purchaser without notice of a suit pending to cancel the bonds, not prejudiced. Durant v. Iowa Co. [Case No. 4,189].

Want of power to issue bonds is a good defense, even against a bona fide holder. Treadwell v. County Com'rs, 11 Ohio St. 183; Mercer Co. v. Hackett, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 83; Starin v. Town of Genoa, 23 N. Y. 439; Marsh v. Fulton Co., 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 676; Aspinwall v. Commissioners of Daviess Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 364; Gould v. Town of Sterling, 23 N. Y. 456; Hill v. Manchester & S. Water Works Co., 5 Barn. & Adol. 866; City of Aurora v. West, 22 Ind. 88; Marshal Co. v. Cook, 38 Ill. 44; Clay v. County Court, 4 Bush, 154.

Mere irregularities, however, do not vitiate them. Thompson v. Lee Co., 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 327; Gelpcke v. City of Dubuque, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 175; Moran v. Commissioners, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 722; Maddox v. Graham, 2 Metc. [Ky.] 56; Butz v. Muscatine, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 575; Van Hostrup v. Madison City, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 291; Commissioners of Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 537; Woods v. Lawrence Co., 1 Black [66 U. S.] 386; Bissel v. Jeffersonville, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 287; Butler v. Dunham, 27 Ill. 474; Mercer Co. v. Hackett, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 83; Commissioners of Knox Co. v. Nichols, 14 Ohio St. 260; Mayer v. City of Muscatine, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 384; Rogers v. Burlington, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 654.

The supreme court has lately held recitals in bonds, issued by supervisors under an act of the legislature, binding upon the county as against bona fide holders and that want of compliance with the forms of law, or fraud by the agents of the county, could not be shown in defense. Town of Grand Chute v. Winegar [15 Wall. (82 U. S.) 373].

Compare, also, Luling v. Racine [Case No. 8,603]; Goedgen v. Manitowoc Co. (June term, 1870) [Id. 5,501]; and Schenck v. Supervisors of Marshall Co. (Oct. term, 1866) [Id. 12,449].

[3 N. B. R. 153 (Quarto, 38).] [1]

District Court, S. D. Georgia. April 6, 1869.

REAL PROPERTY—LIMITATIONS—NOT TO BE BOUND FOR DEBTS—BANKRUPTCY.

1. A father, resident of Georgia, bequeathed lands therein to the husband of his daughter, in trust "for her sole and separate use, during her natural life, and the use of her children," with limitation over on her death to her then husband and children living, share and share alike, with a clause that no part of the property should be liable for the debts of any present or future husband. The wife having died and the husband become bankrupt, held, he took, under the laws of Georgia, on her death, a fourth interest in fee in the said lands.

2. The clause against the use of any part of the lands in payment of debts of husband, applied during the life of the wife only, and does not apply after the fee vested in the husband.

Benjamin H. Myrick filed his petition in bankruptcy February 10, 1868. At that time and for some years before, he was in possession of, besides other lands, four hundred and sixty-five and a half acres—being two tracts or parcels put together—the one, the "Greene Place," two hundred and sixty-three acres, the other, the "Britt Place," two hundred and two and a half acres, making in all four hundred and sixty-five and a half acres. He acquired the Greene Place directly by the will of John Edmondson, deceased; and the Britt Place was bought by him under the instructions of the will, and paid for with money which came to him by the will; and the question now under consideration is, did that land or any part of it, at the time of his bankruptcy, belong to Benjamin H. Myrick, so as to be liable as assets in the hands of the assignee? In other words: did Benjamin H. Myrick, at the time of his bankruptcy, possess such an interest in the land as should, under the law, pass to his assignee for the benefit of his creditors, and if so, what interest? In order to determine this question, it is necessary to recur to the will of John Edmondson, who was the father-in-law of Myrick, and give it a legal construction in so far as it relates to this property. The clause of the will relating to this property, and the terms and conditions of its bequest, reads as follows, to wit: "All of which property, together with all that which my said daughter may receive according to my will, I give to Benjamin Myrick to hold in trust for the sole and separate use of my said daughter, Mary Ann, during her natural life, and for the use of her children; and at her death, the said property to be equally divided between the children she may have living, and the descendants of such as may be dead, and her then husband, share and share alike. And said property to be in no wise liable to the payment of the debts of any present or future husband." Mrs. Mary Ann Myrick died some time previous to Mr. Myrick's bankruptcy, leaving three children and Mr. Myrick, as her then husband.

By ALEXANDER G. MURRAY, Register:

The general rule for construing a will is, to give it such construction as will carry into effect, if possible, the intention of the testator. But, at the same time we take intention as the guide, we must not suffer a departure from the legal restrictions thrown over the making of wills by legislation, to lead to a conclusion that will violate the law—always presuming that the intention of a testator is to conform to the law. It is clear, from the provisions of the will, that Benjamin H. Myrick held the property in trust during the lifetime of Mrs. Mary Ann Myrick, his wife. All must admit this. But, what was the condition of the property after her death? The will provides, that on the happening of that event, the property should be equally divided between the children she then had, and her then husband, viz.: three children and Benjamin H. Myrick, share and share alike. If it were at all doubtful whether the testator intended that the trust estate should then end, the law settles the question. The legislature of Georgia has enacted (Code Ga. § 2230) "that limitations which, by the English rules of construction, would create an estate tail by implication in this state, shall give a life estate to the first taker, with remainder over in fee to the * * * beneficiaries intended by the maker of the instrument." Thus Mrs. Mary Ann Myrick was the first taker, and took a life estate in trust in the property bequeathed. But at her death, the law vested an absolute title in fee in the three children and Benjamin H. Myrick, share and share alike. Consequently, Benjamin H. Myrick, at the time of his bankruptcy, was the owner in fee of one-fourth interest in the four hundred and sixty-five and a half acres of land, and that interest is assets which passed to the assignee. The clause of the will which says: "Said property to be in no wise liable to the payment of the debts of any present or future husband," must be construed to be limited by and to apply only during the life of Mrs. Mary Ann Myrick. It cannot apply after the property has vested in fee.

INTERNAL REVENUE—STAMP DUTY—POWER TO REPRESENT CREDITOR IN BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF CLAIM—CORRECTION OF ERRORS.

1. A power to represent a creditor in bankruptcy is not subject to stamp duty by existing laws.

2. A creditor may correct clerical errors in his proof of claim at any time before final dividend.

[This case was previously heard upon the question of the interest of the bankrupt in certain real estate under the will of John Edmondson, the bankrupt's father in law, Case No. 9,999.] At the second general meeting of the creditors of Benjamin H. Myrick, bankrupt, on the 16th day of February, 1869, the assignee, in the absence of a majority of the creditors, determined on a dividend; and preparatory to computing the same, William McKinley, attorney for John Wood, a junior creditor, objected to the proofs of debt filed in favor of David Bateman and George L. Denning, respectively, and moved that they be rejected as not duly proved, because the proofs had been made by Lucilius H. Briscoe, under powers of attorney which were void for the want of the proper revenue stamps. To remedy the defect, if defect it was, Col. Briscoe moved to affix the proper stamps instanter; but contended that the law did not require a stamp at the date of the powers. Col. Briscoe also moved to fill two blanks that were not filled at the execution of one of the proofs. This proof had been made out on a printed blank, and the blank place left for the name of the county of his residence, and also the name of the agent proving the claim, had been omitted in one place only, but appeared in every other proper place throughout the proof. The motion to fill these two blanks was resisted by Col. McKinley.

By ALEXANDER G. MURRAY, Register:

The revenue laws of the United States, prior to March, 1867, did require such papers to be stamped; but since the removal of stamp duty from judicial proceedings by congress, in March, 1867 [14 Stat. 517], a power to represent a creditor in bankruptcy (being a paper which is part and parcel of bankrupt proceedings, and is required to be filed in the case as part of the record), dated in October, 1868, does not require a stamp. As to the right to remedy technical errors or omissions, or correct clerical errors, the law gives a creditor the right to prove his claim at any time after the commencement of proceedings, and before final dividend; and so long as the right to prove continues, the right to correct a clerical omission in a proof filed should not be denied. If a proof on file were totally defective, the party would have the right to file anew. The just and fair distribution of the assets of a bankrupt according to law, should not be defeated on mere technicalities.

ERSKINE, District Judge. I have carefully examined the matter certified for review in the case of Benjamin H. Myrick, and I am of the opinion that the decision of the register is correct, and I approve it. The clerk will certify the same to Register Murray.

MYRICK v. MICHIGAN CENT. R. CO.

[9 Biss. 44; 7 Reporter, 229; 11 Chi. Leg. News, 151.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Jan., 1879.[2]

CARRIERS—LIVE STOCK—NECESSARY ACCOMMODATIONS — RAILROAD COMPANIES — CONNECTING LINES—THROUGH BILL—CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION.

1. In the construction of a contract the court will ascertain what the surrounding circumstances and facts were, in order to determine the intention of the parties and the full legal purport of the contract.

2. In this case it was held, where the defendant received at Chicago certain cattle consigned to Philadelphia, giving shipping receipts therefor, that these receipts constituted through contracts, by which the defendant was liable for the proper transportation of the cattle beyond the line of its own road.

3. In such case it was the duty of the defendant to notify each of the carriers beyond its terminus of the requirements of the contract, and each of them became the agent of the defendant for the purpose of executing the contract and seeing that its terms were complied with, and the delivery of the cattle to a stock yards company by the last carrier, made the managers of the yards the agents of the defendant, which is liable for any wrongful or negligent delivery of the cattle by them.

4. Railroad companies which become carriers of live stock must provide accommodations, whereby the stock can be safely and properly kept and cared for until a delivery can be made to the consignee according to the terms of the shipment.

5. No mere usage between the consignor and carrier concerning the delivery of the cattle at the end of the line of transportation, contrary to the terms of the contract, could affect the rights of an assignee of the bill of lading, when such usage was not known to him.

[This was an action by Paris Myrick against the Michigan Central Railroad Company to recover damages for a breach of contract.]

A. L. Osborn and Wirt Dexter, for defendant.

BLODGETT, District Judge (charging jury). This suit is brought to recover damages for a breach of two contracts which the plaintiff claims he made with the defendant, as common carrier, one on the 7th, and the other on the 14th of November, 1877, for the transportation of beef cattle from Chicago to Philadelphia. The allegation on the part of the plaintiff is that on the 7th of November, 1877, he delivered to the defendant at the stock yards in this city, and the defendant there accepted, two hundred and two head of beef cattle to be transported by the defendant as a common carrier from this city to Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and there delivered to the plaintiff or his order; that plaintiff received from the defendant a bill of lading or receipt for said cattle, and that he duly indorsed the same, to the Commercial National Bank, as security for a loan of money advanced by said bank to the plaintiff to pay for said cattle, and thereby the defendant became bound to safely transport said cattle to Philadelphia, and there deliver them to said bank or its proper agents; that the defendant failed to perform its contract and neglected and failed to deliver the cattle to the bank or its agent, whereby the cattle were wholly lost to the plaintiff and said bank.

It is also alleged that a similar contract in all respects was made by the plaintiff with the defendant on the 14th of November, for the transportation of another lot of two hundred and two head of beef cattle, and that the defendant has failed to perform said contract in the same manner it failed to perform the first. The defendant contends:

First. That it owns and operates a railroad from Chicago to Detroit and no further, and while it received the cattle and carried them on its own line as far as Detroit, it did not undertake to transport them beyond that point, and that the obligation to the plaintiff was fully performed when it delivered the cattle to the connecting carrier at Detroit, for their place of destination.

Second. That even if the contract with the plaintiff was for the transportation of the cattle in question from Chicago to Philadelphia, it fully performed its undertaking in that behalf by the delivery of the cattle to the North Philadelphia Drove Yard Company, and that the loss to the plaintiff occurred through the neglect of said drove yard company, for which defendant is not responsible.

It is conceded that the plaintiff did ship by the defendant's road, the two lots of cattle in question; that the cattle passed over the defendant's railroad to Detroit and from there over connecting railroad lines to Philadelphia, reaching the latter place by what is known as the North Penn. Railroad, and that the North Penn. Railroad Company delivered the cattle to the North Philadelphia Drove Yard Company, a corporation or firm owning and managing certain cattle yards in the vicinity of Philadelphia, fitted up with conveniences for receiving and yarding live stock; that the first lot of said stock arrived at the drove yards on the 11th of November, and the last on the 18th of November, and that the officers or managers of the drove yards delivered the cattle to J. and W. Blaker, without the surrender of the receipt or bill of lading which the defendant had issued to Myrick, and which Myrick had indorsed to the bank, and without the order of Myrick. The following is a copy of one of the shipping receipts given by defendant to plaintiff, the other being like it except as to date:

"(Michigan Central Railroad Company, Chicago Station, Nov. 7, 1877.)

"Received from Paris Myrick, in apparent good order, consigned to order Paris Myrick. Notify J. and W. Blaker. Philadelphia, Pa.

Articles.	Marked.	Weight and Measure.
Two hundred and two (202).	Cattle.	240,000.

"Advanced charges, $1,200, marked and described as above (contents and value otherwise unknown) for transportation by the Michigan Central Railroad Company, to the warehouse at ——.

"This receipt can be exchanged for a through bill of lading.

"Notice.—See rules of transportation on the back hereof. Signed,

"Wm. Geagan, B. Agent.

"Indorsed, Paris Myrick."

The only rule on the back of the receipt which affects this question, is rule 11, which is as follows:

"Goods or property, consigned to any place off the company's line of road, or to any point or place beyond its termini, will be sent forward by a carrier or freightman, when there are such, in the usual manner, the company acting, for the purpose of delivery to such carrier, as the agent of the consignor or consignee, and not as carriers. The company will not be liable or responsible for any loss, damage or injury to the property, after the same shall have been sent from any warehouse or station of the company."

It is claimed by the plaintiff, that by the terms of the shipment it became the duty of the defendant as a common carrier, to notify J. and W. Blaker, of the arrival of said cattle at the place of destination, and that no rightful delivery could be made, except upon the order of Myrick and the surrender of the bill of lading, but that without the order of Myrick the cattle were wrongfully delivered to the Blakers, who sold them and converted the proceeds to their own use, whereby the cattle were wholly lost to the plaintiff and the bank which had advanced money on them the defendant as a common carrier, to contract for the transportation of these cattle beyond its own terminus, and to Philadelphia. If such a contract was in fact made, the carriers beyond the defendant's terminus, that is, beyond Detroit to the place of destination, became the agents of the defendant to complete the contract, and the defendant is liable for any breach of it whereby the plaintiff sustained damage. Considerable discussion has been had before the court upon the questions of law raised, whether these receipts are, or are not, a through contract or bill of lading. At first I was inclined to submit this as a question of fact to the jury; that is, to submit all the testimony, including the shipping receipts, and allow the jury to say, as a question of fact, whether the defendants did contract to transport these cattle through to Philadelphia, or not, but upon further reflection, I have concluded that this is solely a question of law for the court.

In construing a written contract, courts have the right to hear, to a certain extent, parol evidence as to the circumstances under which a contract was made, for the purpose of putting themselves in the place of the contracting parties, and determining the purport and effect of the language used; that is, the court has the right to ascertain what the surrounding circumstances and facts were, in order to determine the intention of the parties, and the full legal purport of the contract made. Perhaps the rule asserting the right of the court to look into the surrounding facts connected with the making of a contract, for the purpose of determining its meaning has never been more lucidly stated than by Mr. Justice Caton, of the supreme court of the state of Illinois, in the case of Doyle v. Teas, 4 Scam. 256: "But the true rule, clearly deducible from the cases, I think, is where the language is of such a character as to show that the parties had a fixed and definite meaning which they intended to express, and used language adequate to convey that idea to persons possessed of all the facts which they had in view at the time they used the language, it then becomes the duty of the court to learn those facts, if need be, by parol proof, and thus, as far as possible, by occupying the place of the parties employing the expressions, ascertain the sense in which they were intended to be used."

Now, taking into consideration the circumstances, as shown in the proofs, surrounding the making of these shipping receipts or bills of lading, I come to the conclusion, and say to you, gentlemen of the jury, that they are through contracts, whereby the defendant agreed to transport the cattle in question from Chicago to Philadelphia, and there deliver them to the order of Paris Myrick, and to notify J. and W. Blaker of their arrival. This was the undertaking on the part of the defendant with the plaintiff, and with whoever might be made the assignee or holder of this contract.

It thus became the duty of the defendant, if the defendant's road did not reach the place of destination of the property, to properly notify or inform each of the carriers beyond the defendant's terminus, of the terms upon which that shipment was made, and each of the carriers beyond the defendant's terminus is, for the purpose of executing this contract, the agent of the defendant, and as completely bound to carry out the terms of the contract as if defendant's road extended from here to the place of destination, and the agents of the last carrier that transported these cattle are the agents of the defendant for the purpose of executing this contract and seeing that its terms were complied with.

This, then, being a through contract, the only question is, whether there has been a breach of it. The defendants insist that owing to the peculiar nature of live stock as freight, it is not to be considered as ordinary merchandise; that it must be yarded, watered and fed, not only along the route, but at the terminus, or place of destination, and that peculiar accommodations are required for that purpose, such as railroad companies do not usually have; and that the plaintiff knew when he shipped this stock that the railroad at the place of destination had no facilities of its own for caring for cattle, but that its course of business was to deliver to this drove yard company, and that, therefore, the contract of carriage was completed when the delivery was made to the drove yard company. Undoubtedly this kind of freight must have accommodations adapted to it, and railroad companies that become carriers of live stock may provide such accommodations themselves, or may adopt those provided by other independent companies or persons. But if they adopt the yards of another, they thereby make them their own for the purpose of performing their contract, the same as if they were their own depot, and the managers of the yards their servants and agents. As with merchandise, they are bound to provide a depot or freight house in which the goods may be safely kept for a reasonable time until the consignee can take them away; so, in regard to cattle, they must make some preparation whereby they can be safely and properly kept and cared for, until a delivery can be made to the consignee, according to the terms of the shipment. For this purpose, as I have already intimated, the railroad company, as a common carrier, had a right to make this drove yard its warehouse or place for the storage of these cattle, and the drove yards were required to hold the cattle, as the railroad company itself would have been compelled to hold them until the consignee called for them, or until a reasonable time elapsed. The cattle being, of course, expensive to keep, they would be kept at the cost of the consignee, and the charges upon them would be additional charges to be paid whenever they were taken away; and if they were detained an unreasonable time, then, under the law pertaining to the rights and duties of common carriers, the drove yard company would be entitled to sell the cattle as perishable property for their advances and charges thereon. They would not be obliged to keep them indefinitely, but they would be obliged to keep them a reasonable time, the same as a railroad company is obliged to keep your goods a reasonable time after they arrive at the terminus in order that you may pay the charges and take them away. So, that, as I have already instructed you, the defendant, by its contract, agreed to transport these two lots of cattle to Philadelphia, and deliver them to the order of Paris Myrick there, and to notify J. and W. Blaker; and it being admitted, or at least not disputed, that Myrick had duly assigned and delivered the shipping receipts or bills of lading given him by the defendant to the Commercial National Bank, to secure the advance of money, if you are satisfied from the proof that the railroad companies along the route, which transported the cattle to Philadelphia, delivered them to the drove yard company mentioned in the proofs, and that the persons in charge of the said drove yard did, on the day after the arrival of each of the said lots of cattle, deliver them to J. and W. Blaker, without the order of Myrick, and that the plaintiff and the Commercial National Bank of this city thereby lost the said cattle, or the benefit of them, or the proceeds thereof, then the defendant is liable to the plaintiff in this action; it being the duty of the defendant, if it or its agents, the railroad company at the terminus, delivered the cattle to the drove yard company, to accompany the cattle with the proper directions for their being delivered only to the order of Myrick, and if the railroad company failed to properly direct the drove yard company, or if they had been properly directed, and the drove yard company had delivered them improperly, then the defendant in either event, would be liable. That is, it makes no difference whether the North Penn. Railroad Company, which made the delivery to the drove yard company made the mistake, or whether the drove yard company made the mistake and delivered the property wrongfully; in either event the defendant is liable, as both these parties were agencies by which the defendant undertook to complete its contract.

It is contended by the defendant, that by the course of business growing out of a series of shipments by the plaintiff over the defendant's line to the same destination, a usage had grown up to deliver the cattle to the Blakers upon substantially such contracts as this, and therefore defendant is not liable, and upon this point I say to you, while the parties to a contract like this, may, by a long continued usage, change the mode of delivery, yet in order to warrant a delivery contrary to the terms of the contract, it must appear satisfactorily from the evidence, that the plaintiff knew that the terms had been changed at the terminus; and that in this case, if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff assigned his bill of lading or receipt to the Commercial National Bank as security for a loan or advance of money, then no mere usage between the plaintiff and the defendant in that regard, contrary to the terms of the contract, would affect the rights of the bank as the holder of this bill of lading; that is to say, the bank had the right to have the contract executed according to its terms, unless the proof shows to your satisfaction that the bank had become cognizant of a usage by which the terms were changed, and acquiesced therein.

Then, gentlemen of the jury, the next question for you to consider will be the measure of damages. The evidence in the case, which is undisputed, I may say, shows that Myrick immediately upon receiving this bill of lading, that is, as soon as the two things could follow each other in the due course of business, repaired to the Commercial National Bank, where he received a discount or advance of money to the amount of $12,287.54 on the shipment of the 7th of November, and $12,448.12 on the shipment of the 14th of November; and that he drew drafts on J. and W. Blaker for these respective amounts, and secured their payment by assigning and delivering these bills of lading to the bank, and that these bills of lading went forward with the drafts to the First National Bank of Newtown, Pennsylvania, for collection. The evidence in the case tends to show, and perhaps does show without dispute, that Myrick, the plaintiff in this suit, bought the cattle in question for the Blakers; that is, he was the agent of the Blakers here for the purchase of cattle; he had no interest in the cattle further than to be reimbursed for the money which he borrowed, and became responsible for, to pay for the cattle. The undisputed proof shows that he was to buy the cattle in Chicago, make drafts upon the Blakers for the purchase money which he was to have discounted here, and pay for the cattle with the proceeds of the discount, and the drafts so made were to be secured by the transfer of the shipping receipts or bills of lading obtained from the railroad.

[And he was compensated for his services in the matter by a draw-back which he received from the railroads for furnishing them with this large amount of freight; the proof is so uncertain as to the amount of the draw-back, to which Myrick was entitled under his arrangement with the railroad, and as to whether he collected the draw-back from each railroad separately, or whether some one railroad paid him the whole and settled with the other members of the combination or line, that I do not think the jury can predicate any claim in favor of the plaintiff upon this draw-back item. It is left wholly uncertain, as I conceive it, by the proof, in the first place, as to how much draw-back Myrick was to have, and secondly as to who was to pay it. I therefore direct you to exclude this item from the plaintiff's claim.] [3]

If you are satisfied from the instructions that I have given, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, his damages will be the amount of these two drafts, with interest thereon at six per cent. from the time the cattle were wrongfully disposed of; which was, in one case, by the undisputed testimony, the 12th of November, 1877, and in the other the 19th of November, the cattle having arrived in Philadelphia on Sunday in each case, and having been disposed of on the following Monday.

Verdict for plaintiff for $26,451.22.

NOTE. Where goods are delivered to a common carrier to be carried to a designated place, and the charges for transportation to that place paid in full, and the goods are received by the carrier without any contract limiting its liability, such carrier is responsible for the delivery of the goods at the place designated, notwithstanding its line ends before reaching such place, and the goods are delivered to another carrier in good order at the termination of its line. Adams Exp. Co. v. Wilson, 81 Ill. 339; Erie Ry. Co. v. Wilcox, 84 Ill. 239; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Copeland, 24 Ill. 332; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Johnson, 34 Ill. 389; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Frankenberg, 54 Ill. 88; Carter v. Peck, 4 Sneed, 203; Western & A. R. Co. v. McElwee, 6 Heisk. 208; East Tennessee & V. R. Co. v. Rogers, Id. 143; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Campbell, 7 Heisk. 253; Angle v. Mississippi & M. R. Co., 9 Iowa, 487; Mulligan v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 36 Iowa, 181; Bennett v. Filyau, 1 Fla. 403; Bradford v. South Carolina R. Co., 7 Rich. Law, 201; Kyle v. Laurens R. Co., 10 Rich. Law, 382; Mosher v. Southern Exp. Co., 38 Ga. 37; Southern Exp. Co. v. Shea, Id. 519; Mobile & G. R. Co. v. Copeland, 63 Ala. 219; Nashua Lock Co. v. Worcester & N. R. Co., 48 N. H. 339. But in Gray v. Jackson, 51 N. H. 9, the court held that whether the contract was for through transportation or not, so as to make the first carrier liable for a loss off of its line, was a question of fact.

The rule as stated above, though followed by many of the American courts, is called the "English rule," and was first laid down in Muschamp v. Lancaster & P. J. Ry. Co., 8 Mees. & W. 421, where it was held that when a carrier accepts for carriage goods directed to a destination beyond its own route, it assumes by the very act of acceptance, in the absence of any express contract upon the subject, the obligation to transport them to the place to which they are directed. Scothorn v. South Staffordshire Ry. Co., 8 Exch. 341; Crouch v. Great Western Ry. Co., 2 Hurl. & N. 491; Great Western Ry. Co. v. Crouch, 3 Hurl. & N. 183; Wilby v. West Cornwall Ry. Co., 2 Hurl. & N. 703; Watson v. Ambergate, N. & B. Ry. Co., 3 Eng. Law & Eq. 497; Collins v. Bristol & E. Ry. Co., 11 Exch. 790, 7 H. L. Cas. 194.

On the other hand, many of our courts have held that in the absence of contract, except such as is generally to be implied from the acceptance of goods for carriage, the obligation of the carrier extends only to the transportation to the end of its own route, and a delivery there to the next succeeding carrier to forward or complete the transportation. And this is frequently called the "American rule," in distinction to that laid down by the English courts. Nutting v. Connecticut River R. Co., 1 Gray, 502; Darling v. Boston & W. R. Co., 11 Allen, 295; Perkins v. Portland, S. & P. R. Co., 47 Me. 589; Skinner v. Hall, 60 Me. 477; Plantation v. Hall, 61 Me. 517; McMillan v. Michigan, S. & N. I. R. Co., 16 Mich. 120; Burroughs v. Norwich & W. R. Co., 100 Mass. 26; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Schumacher, 29 Md. 176; Condict v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 54 N. Y. 502; Van Santvoord v. St. John, 6 Hill, 158; Elmore v. Naugatuck R. Co., 23 Conn. 457; Hood v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 22 Conn. 502; Irish v. Milwaukee & St. P. Ry. Co., 19 Minn. 376 [Gil. 323]; Camden & A. R. Co. v. Forsyth, 61 Pa. St. 81; Crawford v. Southern R. Ass'n, 51 Miss. 222; Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Champlain Transp. Co., 23 Vt. 186; Brintnall v. Saratoga & W. R. Co., 32 Vt. 665; Railroad Co. v. Manufacturing Co., 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 318; Railroad Co. v. Pratt, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 123; Phillips v. North Carolina R. Co., 78 N. C. 294; Stewart v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. [3 Fed. 768.]

Where goods are shipped on a "through freight contract," and in through cars, to a point beyond the line of the first carrier, such carrier is liable for loss beyond its line, under the terms of the bill of lading, notwithstanding the same limited the liability to loss on its own line. Toledo, P. & W. Ry. Co. v. Merriman, 52 Ill. 123. As to what constitutes a through bill of lading, and the duties of the carrier thereunder, consult Dixon v. Columbus, etc., R. Co. [Case No. 3,929]; Woodward v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. [Cases Nos. 18,006 and 18,007], and notes to those cases.

The libel was filed to recover damages from the owners of the Nabob, for colliding with and sinking the steamtug John Martin, the alleged property of the libellants. The schooner Nabob was on her voyage from Buffalo to Milwaukee. Having been towed out of the St. Clair river into Lake Huron, on the evening of May 16th, 1863, she anchored in the lake for want of wind to continue her voyage. She remained at anchor until midnight, when she again started on her voyage up the lake, her course being north by west, for Pointe aux Barques. The tug John Martin, engaged in the business of towage, and in search of vessels in Lake Huron, took in tow the bark British Lion, a short distance above the village of Lexington, and about thirty miles from the river St. Clair, and headed for the river, designing to procure other vessels, which she expected on her way down, her course being south or about south half east, and four miles from shore. Just about daybreak she was run into by the Nabob, which struck her amidships, and so forcibly that she immediately went to the bottom. It was further alleged and proved, that the tug John Martin having been duly enrolled and licensed, was in January, 1863, transferred in part by John Pridgeon, her owner, to William K. Muir, one of the libellants, who was at the time a subject of her Britannic majesty; that subsequent to her enrolment and license as the sole property of Pridgeon, libellants knowingly and unlawfully used such enrolment and license, together with the custom house certificate thereof. It was also admitted upon the trial, that Pridgeon made oath at the custom house, in Detroit, that he and Muir were both citizens of the United States, and not subjects of any foreign power. This oath was not true, as Muir had never been naturalized, but had simply declared his intention to become a citizen, though Pridgeon had taken the oath under the erroneous impression that his declaration of intention had actually made him a citizen.

Pridgeon and Muir, at the time of the collision, and at the time of bringing suit had no title to the tug John Martin. The title was in the United States.

(1) The evidence shows that John Pridgeon sold one-third of the tug (being then an enrolled and licensed vessel) to Muir, who was then a British subject. This forfeited the vessel. Act 1793, § 32 [1 Stat. 316], Brightly, Dig. p. 149, § 46; Act 1792, § 16 [1 Stat. 295], Brightly, Dig. p. 829, § 16.

(2) On April 28th, 1863, Pridgeon took and subscribed an oath at the custom house, stating Muir to be a citizen, which was not true, and obtained a new enrolment and license upon the oath. This forfeited the vessel. Act 1792, § 4 [1 Stat. 289]; Brightly, Dig. p. 824, § 4.

(3) No title passed to Muir by the sale; he was a foreigner—incapacitated to receive a title to an American built vessel—consequently, as one of the joint libellants never had any title to the tug, the suit must fail.

(4) Pridgeon's title was divested from him and vested in the United States at the moment of sale to Muir, so that neither libellant had title to their interest.

In U. S. v. 1960 Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 405, it was held that a sale to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice did not prevent condemnation. See also Conk. Treat. (3d Ed.) 526, and cases cited; Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 311; Caldwell v. U. S., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 366, 381; McLane v. U. S., 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 427.

No proceedings to condemnation are necessary to effect a change of title—in fact the United States never get any record or paper title. The Florenzo [Case No. 4,886].

WILKINS, District Judge. The severe penalty prescribed by the statute was undoubtedly intended to prevent false swearing in taking the oath necessary to obtain enrolment, and the fact that the oath was taken in haste and in ignorance that Muir had only declared his intention of becoming a citizen, would be no excuse in a prosecution for a forfeiture. By the 7th section of the act of 1792, in regulation of the coasting trade, the certificate of enrolment is to be solely used for the vessel for which it is granted, nor can it be sold or disposed of to any person whatsoever, but shall be delivered up under the circumstances described, to the collector of the district; and if any foreigner shall purchase the whole, or any part of the ship, the delivery of the certificate shall be made within seven days. By the 16th section, if such sale be made to a foreigner, and be not reported and made known, such ship, her tackle, apparel and furniture shall be forfeited. This section clearly contemplates a trial before the forfeiture is incurred.

[2] [Affirmed by the circuit court; case unreported.]

The proofs establish the fact that, previous to the collision, one-third of the John Martin was conveyed by Pridgeon, one of the libellants, to the other libellant Muir, and that Muir was not then, and is not now a citizen of the United States. It is contended by the claimants that, by this alien ownership, the tug was eo instanti forfeited to the United States, and that one of the libellants having no title, this action cannot be maintained. The case of The Mohawk [3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 566], though not exactly this case, was a proceeding for a forfeiture under the act of 1792. There was, however, a subsequent purchaser, without notice and before condemnation, whose interest was involved in the controversy. This, however, is a case of collision, by which a trespass was committed by the claimants, and for which damages are sought to be recovered. The res, though forfeited under the act of congress, yet that forfeiture never having been enforced by the government, nor the vessel seized, it has remained in the possession of its alien owner. No information was made until the close of this trial, and the government has since remitted the penalties. It is true the language, "shall be forfeited," is positive; but the forfeiture was never judicially consummated, nor the vessel condemned. It is true the libellants, being the transgressors, cannot plead want of notice or ignorance of the act whereby the forfeiture was incurred, but they were still in possession at the time of the trespass; no right or title had been asserted by the United States, which might never see fit to enforce the forfeiture; and, until the assertion of a claim, the res remains under the protection of those in possession, who, at least, have a quasi title that would sustain an action of trespass against a wrongdoer. Whether there was a forfeiture or not is an issue not to be tried in this case.

Under the act of 1792, I am satisfied that no forfeiture is consummated until decree of condemnation. Where such decree is pronounced, it will, according to circumstances, modify or control subsequent transfers. The Bags of Coffee Case, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398, involved the validity of a sale after forfeiture, though the purchase was made in good faith before condemnation. The question arose as to the title of the purchaser as against the United States, and it was held the condemnation consummated the forfeiture. This case certainly does not apply to the facts now before the court, as there has been no decree, and by the act of the government in omitting to prosecute, the owners implicated in the offence remained in possession until the collision. The case of Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 311, simply exonerated the officer from trespass in making the seizure, but held him to respond in damages where no forfeiture was proved at the trial, and no certificate of probable cause given. In Caldwell v. U. S., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 366, the rule is clearly stated, that the United States acquires no title by the mere forfeiture, but, in order to avoid sales between forfeiture and decree, the latter has relation back to the offence. There must be a consummation by judicial decree to vest title in any one as against the owners. If otherwise, how can the ship be protected? Is she to rot at the wharf until prosecution is commenced? Is she to be abandoned when no one claims her possession? When negligently damaged by others, who is to sue for recovery? What provision thus makes the vessel an outlaw? I do not think the act, in directing a prosecution and trial, contemplates an instantaneous forfeiture upon the commission of the offence, and therefore hold that the libellants are rightfully in court.

This collision occurred in Lake Huron, the Nabob being on a northerly course up the lake, and the Martin with her tow steering south by east, and bound for the river St. Clair. It is conceded that if the Nabob, being a sailing vessel, kept her course, she was not in fault, and the Martin is responsible. This is a simple question of fact. Much time was consumed in the examination of the proofs, as to the direction of the wind, though not with a view to an argument that if the wind was not free to the Martin, she is measurably exculpated. To such a proposition I could not assent for one moment. The Martin was propelled by steam power, and, whether the wind was free or not, she must avoid a sailing vessel, the law considering the propulsive power of a steamer as tantamount to a free wind. But the direction of the wind becomes important simply in regard to the course of the Nabob at the time of collision; for if the Nabob, after weighing anchor, took her course after midnight north by west, with the wind west southwest, she had a free wind, and could easily keep her course; but otherwise, if the wind was north of west. Upon this point the proofs were conflicting, and to so great and so painful an extent that the court is compelled to believe that there is either willful perjury on one side or the other, or that the wind, within the period of half an hour, was most wonderfully capricious. There is great difficulty in the settlement of facts where the crews of antagonistic vessels come in conflict in court. Abeel, the second mate of the Nabob, swears that the wind was W. N. W. when he made the light of the tug, and he is followed by Byron, Clancey, Willes, and Bensly, of the crew of the Nabob; while Barret, Allen, Dumass, and others, of the Martin and Lion, swear as positively to the wind being W. S. W. But it has been settled, in the case of The Genesee Chief [12 How. (53 U. S.) 463], that the crew of the sailing vessel, as to the direction of the wind, is most entitled to credit. Hilson, the captain of the Nabob, whose calm and deliberate manner, as a witness, most favorably impressed the court as to his truthfulness, says: "The wind varied in the space of one hour in four different directions, but that, near the time of the collision, it was W. N. W., free and steady, the Nabob keeping her course." This is a positive and credible declaration. The testimony of this witness is so conclusive on the main point in controversy, that the court has no hesitation in declaring, that, giving him credence, the libel must be dismissed. He says that "he was towed out of the river a little after 8 o'clock in the evening, and was left by the tug Eagle a mile out in the lake, and the wind being light, he came to anchor. That he got under weigh again shortly after midnight. The wind was then light, from the southwest; that he steered north by west. In a few minutes the wind hauled about to the northwest, and we headed then north by east. In a few minutes she came up north by west half west, and the wind was variable from that time until about two o'clock. It then settled into west northwest. I told the wheelsman if she would go as far as north by west half west, to let her go; if not, to keep her full and by. I was close by the compass, and noticed how she was heading at that time, about two o'clock. My watch commenced at midnight, with Abeel, Byron, and Clancey. Shortly after two o'clock I turned in, after giving the wheelsman directions to keep her on that course, which I also communicated to the second mate. I directed him to call me if he saw anything he did not understand. The wind was then west northwest, and my vessel was on her course at that time, and carrying a green light, all sails set except the square sail. We were on the port tack." This was when he left the deck. Further, he says: "On turning in, I only took off my boots, coat, and hat. Afterwards the mate called me, and I came on deck with what clothing I had on. Heard the tug's whistle; saw her on my lee bow, about two points, and heading across my bow, going pretty fast, and about five hundred feet off, and I immediately ordered my helm hard up." In response to a question propounded by the court, this witness said: "When I came back on deck, the Nabob was on the same course as when I turned in, and did not swing, or, if she did, she swung to the eastward." This is to the point. I repeat, then, if this witness is to be credited, the tug was in fault, and not the Nabob, because, 1st, the latter kept her course till the moment of collision; 2d, the Martin was heading across her bows; and 3d, his retiring from the deck, to obtain rest, and leaving the vessel in charge of the second mate, was not a fault contributing to the collision. If such neglect of duty caused the collision, or might have led to it, then it was such a fault as would have condemned his vessel. But he swears positively the Nabob was on the same course as when he left the deck, and, as positively, that the Martin was crossing his bows.

Aware of the importance of Captain Hilson's testimony, the libellants have undertaken to impeach his credibility; not on the ground of mistake or failure of memory, but for absolute corruption. Mistake in incidental particulars, or a failure of recollection as to collateral facts, or a disagreement between the witness and others as to material facts, will not impeach his credibility; but knowingly swearing falsely, or giving two different versions of the same transaction, must exclude the whole testimony from consideration. Now, Captain Barret, the master of the Martin, does not, in my estimation, so impeach the credibility of Hilson. Hilson swears he was on deck. This fact is not disproved by Barret's simply stating that he told him he was in bed. And, as to the conversation of which Barret testifies, it is but the adverse statements of the two masters, after the collision, when both were striving to exculpate their respective vessels, and under the excitement of the moment, when Barret's crew had been just rescued from drowning. He may or may not have made the statement; or, if made, and days after he denied it, his cool and firm denial of it in court frees him from the taint of willful perjury. It is but witness against witness. And, as to the alleged contradiction by Abeel calling him after the tug's whistle, it is not so conclusive or satisfactory as to warrant the entire rejection of Hilson's testimony, for the tug may have whistled both before and after the captain was called. I pass by Swartwourt, as to the tow bill, and Enwright, as to the steeve of the bowsprit, as unworthy of serious attention, in this connection. The rule of impeachment is not of such an iron character as to condemn a material fact as false which corresponds with other proof, because other statements made by the witness have been, by the preponderance of number, successfully contradicted. Money has purchased—power sometimes overawes—and it will not do to weigh testimony by the multiplicity of the witnesses, especially in hotly contested admiralty cases. Difficult as it sometimes is, I have always endeavored to get at the facts, through the manner and matter of the witness. If he carries the appearance of integrity and candor, and his testimony is consistent with itself and all the surrounding circumstances, I cannot but yield my confidence, despite trifling discrepancies. The rejection of Captain Hilson's testimony, however, could not change the determination of the case. The law casts the burden of proof upon the master of the steamer who sues, to prove that his vessel exercised all proper care and diligence and prudence to avoid the collision. It will not do for the steamer to say that the sailing vessel was first in fault.

If the tug has violated the law and the rules of navigation, especially if such infraction be a primary omission or fault, she cannot recover, if the same has led to the casualty. Steamtugs are vessels propelled by steam. As such they are governed by the rules applicable to steamers; and as to precautionary regulations, having other vessels in tow and in peril, there is more reason for their strict observance by steamtugs than by steamers. The law in admiralty in regard to this is well settled. As early as The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 463, it was declared by Chief Justice Taney, that "it is the duty of every steamboat traversing waters where sailing vessels are often met with, to have a trustworthy and constant lookout besides the helmsman." "And whenever a collision occurs with a sailing vessel, and no other lookout is on board but the helmsman, such omission is prima facie evidence that the collision was occasioned by her fault."

From this decision, in 12 How., down to The Louisiana v. Fisher, in 21 How. [62 U. S. 29], there is one unvarying strong current of authority in the same direction; the last case making the rule more stringent in requiring proof of the competency of such lookout, and prescribing, as his station, the most suitable place for his observation. In the intervening case, in 18 How., the steamer was a tug, and the rule by Chief Justice Taney, in the 12th, applied by Mr. Justice Nelson, drawing no distinction between steamboats and steamtugs. Without referring to the other cases since The Genesee Chief [supra]—and they are numerous—the correct doctrine as to lookouts, thus collated and embodied is this: All vessels propelled by steam, navigating the highways of commerce, must have constant and vigilant lookouts, employed as such, and so stationed on deck as to possess timely and perfect observation of all approaching or passing vessels, so as readily to ascertain their courses and movements, so far as practicable under all the surrounding circumstances. By the proofs in this case, the mate, Allen, was the only lookout. He and the wheelsman were in charge of the tug at the time. Without reference to his competency, which has been assailed, I entertain no doubt that his gross neglect misled the tug across the bows of the Nabob, and caused the collision. A wheelsman is not a lookout. He cannot discharge that duty when steering by the compass. His attention is to his wheel and the compass—not over or beyond them. The mate, having the general command of the vessel, cannot perform lookout duty. He has the general supervision of the ship, and directs both the wheelsman and engineer. While so engaged searching for vessels, he cannot discharge the duty of lookout, as required by the law. This neglect, then, as to a lookout, was a fault, and, as such, if there was no other, must prevent a recovery by the libellants.

NACHTRIEB v. The HARMONY SETTLEMENT.

[3 Wall. Jr. 66;[1] 12 Leg. Int. 98.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1855.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES—CONFIDENTIAL RELATIONS—ADMISSIONS AGAINST INTEREST — CONTROLLING POWER OF JUDICIAL LAW — SOCIAL PARTNERSHIP.

1. The relation of a spiritual ruler with his people is so confidential, and one of such inequality, that courts watch it narrowly as liable to abuse; and considering that free will can hardly be predicated of acts done by a person at the direction of such ruler or superior, will treat as of very little intrinsic value, receipts or releases, given by a person so dependent, by such direction against his own interest.

2. Admissions, such as might be considered the natural effusions of mortified pride or vanity, though clear and distinct against a party's interest, are entitled to but little weight as evidence against him.

3. The law allows no communities, however independent in their structure of general society —or however long established—or however much in the habit of regulating, as a community in a community, their own concerns,—to be above its constant and complete control. And even where such communities are well formed, and have been long existing with order and success, the court will neither enforce nor allow their peculiar arrangements, if against common right, further than the parties have agreed to enforce and allow them. In case of the violation by such a community, of a party's rights, as the law and the court deem rights, the court will interfere, and dealing with the community as a defendant, will override its administrations, plans and opinions; and will enforce rights and duties as it and such law deems them, irrespective and in violation of the general administration, plans or opinions.

4. In a social partnership, where an absolute community of property with right of survivorship, on the one hand, and care, by the community, of every member, through life, on the other—is the fundamental and pervading principle; if one member be unjustly expelled by an usurped though unquestioned authority, not having under the clear terms of the association any right to expel him, the court will not oblige him to return to the association (there not being on its part an offer of full and satisfactory reconciliation and reception), but will interfere with the fundamental and pervading principle; and though the expelled member brought nothing into the community, will give to him, for himself, a separated and individual part of the property. And where payment for the party's services at the ordinary rate of services like his—during many years that he was a member—would give to him more than his numerical proportion or share of the whole capital stock, and where the question of profits was a little obscure, the court regarding this as the simplest and most natural justice, gave to him his numerical share or proportion of the whole capital stock, from whatever source arising, as the same existed at the time he was expelled, irrespective of the amount which he found in the association when he became a member.

In the year 1805, one Rapp, calling himself the Reverend George Rapp, as chief or superintendent, with a number of his countrymen, emigrants from Germany, formed, by a solemn compact in writing, embracing many particulars, the well known social arrangement at Harmony, in Butler county, Pennsylvania, called sometimes Rapp's Settlement, and sometimes the Harmony Society. The causes which led to this association, were declared to be "the existing state of society and the Christian church, as well in America as Europe; and a conviction that this condition had been caused by a departure from the theory of common property and community of interests and of labor, set forth in the primitive apostolic church, and a firm persuasion that a return to the plan of the said primitive church would have the effect to promote the temporal and eternal happiness of all such as should embrace it." The compact, accordingly, had for its basis, "Christion fellowship, the principles of which being faithfully derived from the sacred Scriptures, include the government of the patriarchal age, united to the community of property adopted in the days of the apostles." It required on the part of the members severally, and in their social capacity, entire submission to the laws and regulations of the community, and a ready obedience towards the appointed superintendents thereof; and obliged the superintendents to a patriarchal, which included a pastoral and parental supervision, regard and fidelity. Many of the founders were poor. Some had property. All of them, severally and jointly, conveyed it in fee to Rapp and his successors, superintendents, for the mutual and equal participation and enjoyment of all the members; and the property itself, with the increase thereof, however contributed or arising, was declared to be, then and forever, joint and indivisible stock, with the right of survivorship to those who lived longest. The restoration of property is declared to be of "pernicious tendency, and which cannot be enforced with uniformity and fairness," and "should any individual withdraw from the society, it is declared that he is not to be entitled to demand an account of the contributions he may have made, whether in lands, goods, money or labor, or to claim anything from the society as a matter of right, but it shall be left altogether to the discretion of the superintendent to decide whether any, and if any, what allowance shall be made to such member as a donation." Since the foundation of the society in 1805, many of its members have died while in "communion" thereof. A large number of them were aged men and women. None ever left a last will or testament, or desired distribution of the contributions or earnings among their heirs at law, nor had administration ever been taken out in the settlement. Neither did any of them, except Rapp, appear to know anything about the property of the settlement. In 1847, Rapp himself, after a laborious devotion of forty-two years to the interests of his settlement, died intestate, leaving no property.

Celibacy was enforced, and except in one or two cases which Rapp allowed and judged of, incredibly few marriages had been allowed in the community in the course of half a century. "He taught," said the testimony, "not to marry at all, and that those that will marry, or would marry, would be damned, for they must leave the society. They could not live there. He won't suffer it at all. As he is father, king, and priest, he has the right to do with us as he thinks proper. Christ would ask him in the other world, if we were fit or suitable for the kingdom of God." Where married persons came into the society they were not allowed to cohabit, nor have intercourse as man and wife. The relations of parent and child, brother and sister, as well as those of husband and wife, were merged in the grand social obligation. The society was to take care of the sick and aged. (Of poor, and rich, of course, there were none.) If a mother was sick, and her daughter lived out of the limits, she could not be invited to come and see her; and the "reward" of the brother who brought his sister to their sick mother, would be "to be damned, or to be the last that came out of hell, or somehow, or in this manner;" such being the lucid conception that one of Rapp's disciples seemed to have of his master's dogma on this subject. The study of the English language was discouraged, and German was the ordinary tongue.

The compact contained no enumeration of offences by which a member should forfeit his rights and interest in the common stock—nor did it fix or refer to any tribunal which should have the power to inflict expulsion. And although the members all covenanted to give implicit obedience to "the laws and regulations of the community," it did not appear that they had ever made any code of regulations or bylaws. The will and word of Rapp was in fact the only law. The government was patriarchal, that is, absolute; Rapp exercising all power, civil, religious, temporal and spiritual. He was priest and king, having absolute control over the fate and fortunes of his followers, not only in this world, but (as they were told and appeared to believe) in the world to come. If they obeyed his precepts, their names were to be written in the "Lamb's Book of Life," otherwise, they were to suffer in purgatory some millions of years, if not forever.

The members were allowed by Rapp to walk within the limits of the settlement, and to converse with one another; but to hold intercourse with any seceded members (of whom since the settlement in 1805, there had been several, some going on one or two occasions—as on a memorable one in 1832, under a Comte de Leon—in bodies) was a thing entirely forbidden. And when done, Rapp would deal with the offender in the way of discipline; sometimes excluding him from love-feasts, sometimes (as the testimony said), "to make it impressive," ordering him to be fed on bread and water, sometimes "to make it more impressive still," ordering that he should have no food at all, and sometimes, doubtless to give to it the consummation of effect, turning him directly out of the society.

Notwithstanding the peculiarity of this community, it had thus far been very prosperous. In the course of fifty years, not one single member of the society had ever been criminally prosecuted. External order, cleanliness, and apparent tranquility, marked the settlement; and though occasional "indiscretions" occurred among the women, and certain discontents appeared to prevail with the men, it had thus far been a moral, well-governed and contented body; and the social problem is considered by some persons as yet in a course of favorable solution.

But the more immediate case, to which the foregoing is a general, though not entirely irrelative preface, was this: One Joshua Nachtrieb had joined the society, without any property, in 1819; and had remained a peaceful and useful member for twenty-seven years. In 1846 certain seceding members, who professed to have claims against the society, and had given Rapp a good deal of anxiety, met Nachtrieb, with one or two others, and held a few short conversations with them on the subject of their demands and discontents. They inquired of Nachtrieb whether the society was willing to do anything for those who had left it and got nothing—whether Rapp had brought their request before the society; matters to which Nachtrieb answered that nothing had been done or said in the society about their getting anything. Rapp hearing of the meeting and colloquy, proceeded to discipline. Nachtrieb and the others were summoned to Rapp's house. "When Rapp came in," said the testimony, "he commenced on Joshua and said, 'Now let us give them fellows our judgment—Joshua, you are to blame for all this.' Joshua said, 'He did not know it was wrong or he would not have done it.' Rapp said, 'You intended to raise a mob.' Joshua said, 'No; if I had thought it was wrong to go there, I would not have done it.' Rapp then said, 'You must go right off and leave the town.' Joshua pleaded off, said he was sorry, said he would not go. Rapp said, 'No; we won't have you—you must go.' A night or two after this, the society being all present at a religious meeting, one of the elders, when the services were over, said to Rapp, 'There is something to be said.' Rapp then observed from the pulpit, 'Something has taken place lately—it is this: Joshua Nachtrieb and some others have gone out and conversed with their friends who left us. He must now leave the society; we cannot have such men.' Rapp then asked if he was present. Nachtrieb said, 'Yes, father, I am here.' Rapp said, 'What are you doing here? I thought you had gone.' Nachtrieb said, 'He was sorry if he had done anything wrong, and that if it had happened it should not happen again.' Rapp answered, 'Any fool can speak so; we cannot use such men; you must leave the society; you must be off.' Rapp then inquired of the society if they agreed with him—they said yes. Rapp then said to Nachtrieb, 'Now you know what you have to do: thy father himself, don't want you any longer.' Nachtrieb went away two days after, having previously received from Rapp $200, and signed this receipt, which it was not shown had been obtained by any specific fraud or misrepresentation: To-day I have withdrawn myself from the Harmony Society, and ceased to be a member thereof. I have also received from George Rapp, two hundred dollars as a donation, agreeably to the contract. Joshua Nachtrieb. Harmony, 18th June, 1846."

Soon after this Nachtrieb declared to several of the members, that he was glad to go away—was tired of the society—and that he did not depart from any compulsion. The property of the concern at this time amounted to $901,723.42, and there were 321 members. So that if Nachtrieb had received a full share of the concern, as on a division, he would have got about $2,809.10.

In this state of things, Nachtrieb having married after his departure, and got children, now filed a bill in chancery—this suit—against the Harmony elders or trustees, setting forth his joining the society in 1819, being then 21 years old; his faithful and diligent labors in its business, receiving nothing in return but a bare maintenance; and that in June, 1846, being then 48 years old, and worn out with labor, he was wrongfully excluded from the society, turned out of its possessions, and deprived of participation in its property and effects, by the fraud, &c., of Rapp and his associates. The bill prayed an account "of the sums due complainant, for his labor and services in said association, and of the share he was justly entitled to, in the property and estates of said association, and the profits accrued during his membership, and that the same may be decreed to him."

The respondents, in their answer, admitted that the complainant was a member of the association, as stated in his bill, and that up to 1846 he had labored diligently in the affairs and business of the association, increasing its wealth and promoting its interest agreeably to the terms and spirit of their mutual compact—and that the association had prospered in its temporal affairs, having, from small beginnings, become the owner of property to a considerable amount.

It then averred that the complainant, during the period of his membership, enjoyed all the benefits, advantages, and comforts, individual, social, and religious, which were enjoyed by the fellow members, and all that were contemplated in forming the association and to which he was entitled by the terms and spirit of their agreements, and was entitled to be maintained, cherished, &c., by the association; one of the objects of the society being that of making old age comfortable and free from cares or the necessity of labor. But it denied that the defendant was wrongfully and unjustly excluded from the association. On the contrary, it averred that the complainant voluntarily and of his own free will separated himself from and abandoned said association, and consequently, according to the terms of their articles of association, was not entitled to any compensation for his labor and services, other than that which he received in his support and maintenance, instruction, &c., while he remained a member.

On this case, two questions arose:

1. A question of fact: Whether Nachtrieb had "withdrawn" from the society; and so, under the articles of compact, lost his right to demand any account of its property, and bound himself to take such allowance as "the discretion of the superintendent might decide should be made to him as a donation?" or whether he was improperly expelled, and had some further rights against the society?

2. A question of law: Supposing the last to be the case, viz., that he had been improperly expelled, what was the exact nature and extent of the remedy to be awarded him? Whether he was entitled to compensation for his labor during the time that he had been in the community? or whether he was entitled to a share of the profits made since he was there? or whether he was entitled to an equal and separated share of the whole property as it stood at the time of such expulsion? or finally, whether under so peculiar a kind of contract and arrangement as that which lay at the base of this community, he could, under any circumstances, ask more than a restoration to his ancient membership and its rights.

The whole capital of the Harmony Society when Nachtrieb entered, in 1819, was $368,690.92, and when he was expelled in 1846, it had increased, as has been already stated to $901,723.42. A numerical share being $1/321$ part, in this last sum would be $2,809.10. His labor, if paid for during the twenty-seven years, at what was proved to be the ordinary rate of labor, would give him $4,290, and this last, as giving him the largest compensation, was what he claimed. If the court, disallowing this claim, and thinking further that he was not entitled to a share of the capital of 1846, should think him entitled to profits only since he came in, then he regarded as profits the increase between 1819 and 1846, on the capital as found at these two dates, that is to say, $533,032.50, and claimed as his share of them the $1/321$ part.

The case was well argued by Mr. A. W. Loomis for the society, who, after insisting on the first point, the point of fact, that there was no expulsion, where he relied much on the word "withdrawn" in the receipt, contended on the second point, the point of law, as follows:

I. The complainant is not entitled to a decree for compensation for his labor during the time he remained in the society as a member. All his rights and claims spring from the articles of agreement or association. These create and define the rights and obligations of both parties. His right cannot arise from implication. There can be no pretence that the respondents have employed the complainant to perform services for them. The right to recover for such services must be found, if at all, in the agreements. Such a claim could never have been contemplated by the parties. Running through a period of twenty-seven years, (twenty-one beyond the limitation provided by law,) against a voluntary association, whose members have been continually changing, by the death and withdrawal of some, and the accession of others, such a claim against the present defendants only cannot be sustained upon any known legal or equitable principles.

Conceding the value of the services, the injustice of allowing the complainant to recover for services rendered, is thus shown: He claims $4,290 as compensation. The whole value of the property at the time he left was $901,723.42. This divided by 321, the number of members entitled to community of property at that time, yields $2,809.10. This deducted from $4,290, would leave a balance of $1,480.90 more in his favor than any remaining member would receive were the whole property of the society divided pro rata among the members. Again, the property belonging to the society, June, 1819, when the complainant became a member, amounted to the sum of $368,690.92. This sum deducted from $901,723.42, the amount of property belonging to the society when he left in June, 1846, would leave the sum of $533,032.50, which, divided by 321 would yield $1,660.53, which deducted from $4,290.00, the value of his services, would leave $2,629.47 to be received by him more than the other members, or more than his share of the increase of the property of the society during the time he was a member thereof.

II. When we consider the complainant's claim of a share of the profits while he was a member. The whole property of the society amounted, at the time the complainant left, to less than $902,000.00. What, then, were the profits of the society during the period of complainant's membership, from June, 1819, to June, 1846, a period of twenty-seven years? Deduct from $901,723.42, the amount of property when he left, the sum of $368,690.92, the amount of property owned by the society when he became a member, and add to the latter sum interest thereon for the period of twenty-seven years, and his share of the profits, if any, will be ascertained:

Amount of property owned by the society, in June, 1819.....	$368,690 92
Interest for twenty-seven years..	597,279 29
Principal and interest	$965,970 21
Exceeding amount of property owned by society in 1846.....	$ 64,246 79

—And showing that during the twenty-seven years of complainant's membership the society made no profits; but, on the other hand, taking into consideration the capital and interest thereon, there was a deficiency of said sum of $64,246.79.

Equity would seem to require that the complainant should pay to the society his share of this loss, rather than that the society should pay anything to him.

III. Neither is the complainant entitled to an equal share of the whole property as it stood, when he left the society in 1846. What was his interest in the property at that time? The character of that interest had been fixed and established by his own free and voluntary action. He had no individual right to it whatever; it was declared "forever joint and indivisible stock;" he could transfer no title to another; no interest could pass from him by devise or descent. He could only enjoy the property or benefits secured by his contracts so long as he continued a member of the association. How then can he obtain a decree for his share of the property? His right is to secure sustenance, &c., during membership; his claim is to recover compensation for services, and to a share of the property of the association, to be held and enjoyed in severalty. This he cannot recover, so long as he remains a member of the association, for the reason that no several enjoyment is permitted by the letter or spirit of the agreement, so long as he continues a member, nor afterwards, for the reason that the property is expressly declared by the agreement forever indivisible. The right to its enjoyment is incident to membership, and membership is essential to the right of enjoyment. Individual ownership and dominion, possession and enjoyment in severalty, are utterly inconsistent with the nature of the title, the quality of the estate, and the incident of tenure. The character of neither can be changed by the election of an individual, or without the assent of the owners. The validity of such an agreement as that entered into by Nachtrieb with the society is clearly recognized by the supreme court of the United States in a case very like this. Goesele v. Bimeler, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 590, was the case of some religious separatists from Germany, who founded a society at Zoar, in Ohio, on the principle of "a community of property." A member having died, his heirs sought to have his share of the property; but McLean, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, declares that the ancestor of the complainant renounced "individual ownership of property, and an agreement was made to labor for the community, in common with others, for their comfortable maintenance; all individual right of property became merged in the general right of the association; he had no individual right, and could transmit none to his heirs." If he had no individual right, and could transmit none to his heirs, how, it may be asked, could he pass such right to another, or claim to enjoy it himself in severalty? Yet that is what the complainant here seeks to do.

So long as the complainant continued a member of the association, so long his right to the participation and enjoyment of all its stipulated privileges, immunities and benefits was complete and perfect. If he withdrew from the society and ceased to be a member thereof, his interests in its rights and property ceased. If he were wrongfully and unjustly excluded from the association; turned out of his possession, and deprived of all share and participation in its property and effects, its benefits and advantages, by fraud and combination, such exclusion and deprivation did not divest him of any property, or terminate any of his rights. His interest in the property of the society would remain precisely the same after such exclusion as it was before. Such exclusion could not change either its nature, duration or extent, nor extinguish any of his rights.

IV. The complainant has, therefore, mistaken his remedy, which is restoration to membership. The society is bound in equity to the performance of its contracts. By that contract the complainant was bound to contribute his services, if in health, for the benefit of the association; he was entitled to the enjoyment of its property whilst a member, in connection with the others, as joint and indivisible stock. He was entitled to food, clothing and sustenance when in health—to care, nurture and attention in sickness. He had a right to a home—the comforts and enjoyments of a home in the society. He could not be properly or legally deprived of these so long as he performed his own duties. If wrongfully excluded from the enjoyment of them, such exclusion could not operate as a forfeiture of property or termination of right of enjoyment. He claims, as Judge McLean says, that the heir of Goesele did, in the case already cited, "pay for his labor." But the answer which the court gave in that case is our answer here also. "He has been paid for this in pursuance of his own contract. In sickness and in health he has been clothed and fed, and a home provided for him." It is not pretended by the complainant in his bill that, up to the time of his alleged expulsion, the society had not performed all its duties towards him; that he had not received and enjoyed all that had been stipulated or promised. Then it is clear that, up to that period, no recovery can be had for services, when the entire stipulated compensation had been provided and furnished by one party, and received and enjoyed by the other. It is equally clear that no account can be taken, or decree promised, for subsequent services, for the very obvious reason that none were rendered. His appropriate remedy is, then, a restoration to the enjoyment of that which his contract promised and secured; a performance by the society of what it promised to perform; a decree for complete and perfect restoration to the enjoyment of the rights and property of which he had been improperly deprived; a specific performance by the society of its agreement. This could be attained by petition and decree for restoration to the full and complete enjoyment of all his rights and privileges as a member; by restoring him to the bosom and privileges of the society, a full, complete and adequate support by the society, under the order, direction and supervision of the court or its officers. In the case of Com. v. St. Patrick's Benevolent Society, 2 Bin. 441, the supreme court of Pennsylvania ordered a peremptory mandamus to issue against the society, to compel the restoration of John Binns (who had been illegally and improperly excluded) to his standing as a member of the society. If a court of law could compel such restoration to standing as a member of a benevolent society, a court of equity can decree such restoration to the rights and privileges of a member in a voluntary association, whose articles expressly secure to the complainant the enjoyment of such rights and privileges, and bind the respondents to provide and furnish them. Such remedy is appropriate, but the complainant must seek it by a new bill, of different and appropriate structure and prayer.

After argument on the other side by Messrs. Shaler, Stanton, and Umbstaetter, the opinion of the court was given by GRIER, Circuit Justice. On the first question; the question of fact: Although by the contract and agreement of the several members of this association, each had an equal right to and interest in their common property and had estopped himself from even setting up any claim for property or labor contributed to the common stock, in case of a voluntary withdrawal from the society; yet it contained no enumeration of offences by which a member should forfeit his rights and interest in their common property; it pointed out no tribunal which had a power to inflict the punishment of expulsion or forfeiture of all title to an immense property gained by their common contributions and labor. In dealing with rights of persons and property, the court can only look at the agreements of the parties, as written and signed by themselves. In these we have found no power conferred on Rapp to expel, at his mere whim and caprice, any unoffending or even offending member, and divest his title to the common property, after the labor of a life, spent in assisting to accumulate it. If he could expel one member in this way, he could another, and thus get rid of all the partners but himself, and retain the property for his own use.

That parties wrongfully expelled would have a right to the interference of courts of justice, has not been disputed. Nor has it been pretended that the evidence shows any case which could justify the expulsion of the complainant. He had been a faithful, diligent and laborious member of the association for thirty of the best years of his life, obeying every command and ordinance of Rapp, even to that of enforced celibacy. The only offence charged against him was holding a few minutes' conversation with some of his friends out of the society, who were anxious for some information as to the fortune of certain claims which they had made on the Harmony Society. No charge seems to have been made against him, save that of thinking and speaking about the concerns of the society to which he belonged.

We come, therefore, to the point on which this case turns. Did the complainant voluntarily and of his own accord abandon and forsake the society? or was he wrongfully and unjustly excluded or expelled therefrom? As we have seen, there was no proof of any act of the complainant which would justify his expulsion. The argument has therefore turned entirely on the fact of expulsion or voluntary abandonment.

Nachtrieb's receipt, in which he in terms declared that he has withdrawn from the society, is much relied on; and so have his own declarations soon after he went away, that he had left the society voluntarily.

In regard to the receipt, when we consider the nature and extent of the authority exercised by Rapp, over his followers—their reverence and fear of him, and their unbounded submission to his command—it must be evident that the signature of such a receipt would be but slender evidence that the complainant acted voluntarily in withdrawing himself from the society. It is plain that if Rapp commanded him to go, he would feel bound to go, and that unless, after a servitude of thirty years, he was willing to go penniless, he must sign the receipt. It was the consideration for the means of departing without being reduced to beggary. As yet the complainant was not free from the shackles of the spiritual and temporal slavery to which he had been all his life subject; a power which forbade him to learn English, to marry, or if married, denied him intercourse with his wife. Free will can hardly be predicated of actions, performed at the command of a ruler believed to possess the keys both in this world and the next, and who taught that disobedience to his orders was a sin against the Holy Ghost, not to be forgiven, here or hereafter.

If the complainant departed from the society in obedience to the commands of Rapp, it may be said he obeyed them voluntarily, as there was no physical compulsion. But we may easily conceive of a social or spiritual excommunication, or a combination of both, which would leave as little choice to the party who feared them, as the rack or the inquisition. So also the declarations of the complainant, that he went away voluntarily, can have very little or no weight against the clear evidence of his expulsion. This sort of testimony is seldom worthy of any reliance. It cannot be contradicted. Conversations are always but partially recollected, never truly stated, and often purposely misrepresented. Besides, if the conversations stated, were literally and strictly true they amount to nothing. I presume every member of this society felt uneasy, as to what would be the state of it after Rapp's death; and may well have doubted, whether a community of property can well exist without an infallible apostle with patriarchal or absolute power, so that unity may be attained by having but one will in the society. That the complainant after his expulsion, may have exulted in his first taste of the sweets of liberty; that he may have frequently said that he came away of his own accord, may well be admitted. Probably there are few instances, where a man has been expelled from any respectable society, in which his personal vanity would not soften the word expulsion into withdrawal, in speaking of his change of connection with it. An expelled member seldom expresses much respect for those who have wrongfully ejected him, or affects to regret the loss of their society.

The plaintiff is therefore entitled to a decree, and the only question which remains is, what is the character and the extent of the relief which we shall give him. We shall not consider the objection to the form of the pleadings; for the case having been argued and considered on the merits, without objections, until a late time as to that point, we shall not go back to decide a game of sharps between the parties.

On the second question; the question of law: The complainant demands pay for his labor during the time he was a member. This would be the extreme and longest rate of compensation. The defendants, on the contrary, without tendering in their answer a reconciliation with the complainant, and a restoration of him to his rights, or intimating a willingness to receive his wife and children as members, now insist that the court can decree no other remedy than restoration to his rights as a member. Such a decree would compel him, perhaps, to forsake his wife and children, for the small hope of the survivorship in the tontine. This, we think, would be rendering very scant justice or recompense to a man for half his life's labor. The Pennsylvania case cited has no resemblance to the present. That was a corporation for benevolent purposes, where membership and not the ownership and enjoyment of property to the corporator's own use, was the object. Its members accumulated to give away, or to expend on charitable purposes. These accumulated for themselves. They have, by joint labor, accumulated property of great value, which they hold as joint owners. The complainant had an equal ownership with his three hundred and twenty partners. By their contract, it is to remain joint and indivisible stock forever, but the complainant has his right to enjoy it equally with his fellows. Their articles of partnership or association provide for the case of any partner who chooses to withdraw or depart from it; but makes no provision for those who are unjustly driven away and expelled. Whether the society be governed by prophet, priest, king, or majority, they are subject to the law of the land; and if the complainant has been wrongfully deprived of valuable rights of property, the law should afford him a remedy. I know of no other measure of satisfaction or compensation more just than to give the expelled and injured party his several share of their joint assets. The dissolution of the partnership by the wrongful act of the majority of the firm or association, necessarily dissolves, inter sese, viz., as between the expelled and the remaining partners, the covenants as to the indivisibility of their joint property. If this were otherwise, a majority could at any time expel the minority, and retain all the joint property. They who break the agreement as to perpetuity of the benefits of membership cannot be heard to allege it as to destination of the property. By their wrongful expulsion of the complainant, the whole power and force of the articles as between them is broken, and inter sese, annulled; and the complainant has a right to the separate use of his heretofore undivided interest in the property, because he is wrongfully deprived of his joint use of it. The wrong done to plaintiff, is capable of a compensation in money, without compelling him to leave his family, and spend his days among those who have injured him. And the proper measure of his compensation is the amount of his interest or share at the time of his expulsion. It is not like a mere corporate privilege or office, to which a court of equity may restore a corporator who has been wrongfully expelled. It is a question of the enjoyment of property. His copartners have ejected him from his joint use and enjoyment of their common property; they have severed the tenure, as between him and themselves, and he has a right to his share in severalty. This is the proper measure of the complainant's compensation, and not wages for his labor during the time of his membership. Let the decree be for the 1/321 part of the whole property of the society, $901,723.42, at the time of his expulsion, with interest from that date; deducting what the complainant has received.

Decree accordingly.

NOTE. In a case brought by another complainant against these same defendants, there being imperfect evidence of any expulsion, and the defendants by their answer, "conceding the complainant's perfect right and liberty to return to the enjoyment of all the privileges, benefits, and advantages contemplated by the association, he discharging the duties incumbent on him as a member of it," the court refused to grant the complainant any relief, but dismissed his bill with costs. [6 McLean, 413.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1855.

APPEAL—REASONABLE DILIGENCE—MARITIME LIEN—HOME PORT—LOCAL LAW.

1. On an appeal in admiralty, from the district to the circuit court, reasonable diligence should be used in prosecuting the appeal.

2. If the party delay perfecting the appeal for six months, and until a day or two before the term of the circuit court, the appellee may, under the rule, notice the cause for a hearing, and the court will require him to take his depositions during the session of the court, so as to come to a hearing.

3. At the home port of a vessel, the local law must regulate the lien. A purely maritime lien may arise in every other port, under the maritime jurisdiction, unless it be in the home port. This must be regulated by the local law. The lien cannot arise under the local law and also under the maritime.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Michigan.]

[This was a libel by James Nall, Jr., and others against the steamer Illinois and others for supplies.]

Mr. Howard, for libellants.

M. Newberry, for respondents.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an appeal in admiralty from the district court. The libel is for articles furnished the steamer Illinois, an account of which is stated and satisfactorily proved by the libellants. In their answer, the respondents allege that articles were furnished, but they deny that the claim in said libel mentioned is a lien upon the steamboat, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, &c.

In the libel there are some defects, which, if they had been taken advantage of in time, would have required amendment. The proceeding, though in the admiralty, is under the act of Michigan, which gives a lien on the vessel. In such a case the law should be specially referred to and substantially stated. So the tonnage of the vessel should be stated to show, that it comes under the admiralty jurisdiction and has a license. The libel asserts a lien on the vessel, by the maritime law, and the law of Michigan. This is inconsistent, as a lien must arise at the home port of the vessels under the local law. No lien attaches upon a domestic vessel, for work and labor done and performed on her, except by statute. Read v. Hull of a New Brig [Case No. 11,609]. By the common law, material men have no lien for articles furnished a vessel, whether she be foreign or domestic, and such is the law of the English admiralty. But by the civil law, they have such a lien. In the United States they have it only in the cases of foreign ships, or ships of one of the states of the United States, furnished in another state. Zane v. The President [Id. 18,201]. It is of no importance how a lien arises under the local law, whether by statute, or common, or municipal law; whenever its existence is established, the jurisdiction of the admiralty attaches to it. The Marion [Id. 9,087]. A common law lien is always connected with the possession of the thing, and is simply a right to retain. But a maritime lien does not depend upon possession, but is an interest in the thing, and may be enforced, whenever the admiralty jurisdiction is exercised. The libel alleges, that, "the articles were delivered to the said steamer at Detroit aforesaid, to be used in furnishing and completing her; and it alleges some of them were put in and upon, and worked into said steamer by the work and labor of the libellant," &c. Now if the articles were not all so used, it would be difficult to say, what part of them were so used, and the libel could not be sustained. The averments should be positive, in order that the extent of the lien may be seen. Although the forms of procedure are less technical in admiralty, than at common law, yet there should be certainty in the material matters to give jurisdiction.

As an admiralty court, the district court has a general jurisdiction, yet it can enforce no liens against a vessel which is not of a size and character to engage in maritime navigation. It has been strongly suggested by some writers, that the lien under the statute is the same as the common law lien for mechanics, which depends for its validity on possession. But this point has not been raised in the pleadings, and it need not be examined. The maritime lien arose out of the conveniences, if not necessities, of commerce. The floating vessel is constantly changing its locality, and the master is often under the necessity of contracting debts for the repairs of his vessel, &c.; the work and labor done, or articles furnished for the ship, is presumed to be done or furnished on the credit of the vessel. A personal liability of the master only, would not be sufficient to meet the exigency. The vessel is, therefore, bound in such cases.

The motion which was made in this case for a continuance was overruled, on the ground that as the decree in the district court had been made six months before this court commenced, the appeal being filed a day or two before its commencement, showed such a want of diligence in the appellants in the prosecution of their appeal, as not to entitle them to further delay. A continuance would necessarily give a delay of eighteen months, from a decree in the district court. The court considered the circumstances as coming within the rule which authorized the appellants to notice the cause for trial; and that it would impose no unjust hardship on the defendants, to take their depositions during the present term. When this decision was announced, the court stated, all the time would be given, to take the depositions during the term, which could be given.

A statement has been made of what the defendants' counsel expected to prove, and which, if admitted, could not affect the justice of the case. The correctness of the charges is admitted by Mr. Newberry, who built the vessel, and also by Mr. McKnight, who purchased her. In addition to these admissions, the items are proved by the clerk who sold the articles. As these articles were used in building and furnishing the boat, under the Michigan law, they constitute a lien on the boat, whether it be in the hands of Newberry the builder, or McKnight the purchaser, both of whom are defendants. Upon the whole, the decree of the district court is affirmed with costs.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

[This was a libel against the sloop Nancy, Jabez Hatch, claimant, for violation of the embargo acts.]

G. Blake, for United States.

S. Dexter, for claimant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The sloop Nancy was libelled in the district court, for exporting from the port of Boston divers goods and merchandizes, of domestic growth and manufacture, during the existence of the embargo, contrary to the prohibition of a certain act of the United States; and (2) for trading with, and putting on board of another ship or vessel a quantity of goods and merchandizes of domestic growth and manufacture, contrary to a certain other act of the United States.

The facts appear to be these; that the sloop Nancy is a lighter, whose employment has been confined to the port and bay of Boston, and as such, at the time of the seizure, she was under bonds at the custom house, pursuant to the provisions of the act of January 9, 1808, c. 8 [2 Stat. 453]. On the 15th of July, 1808, she departed from Boston, stood off into the bay, and at the distance of about four or five leagues met with another vessel, and immediately came along-side, and hoisted out into said vessel, all the cargo, which she had on board (which seems to have been flour), but the quantity does not appear. She remained along-side about an hour, and then quitted the other vessel. There seems no reason to doubt, that during this time a considerable quantity of flour was discharged. These facts present a clear case of a violation of the embargo acts, and if the libel contains sufficient allegations to enable the court to pronounce a sentence of forfeiture, it is their duty so to do. The first count seems to be founded upon the fourth section of the act of 12th March, 1808, c. 33 [2 Stat. 474], but it concludes against an act, whose title, as stated in the libel, is not known among our statutes. As this count stands, therefore, it does not warrant the court to proceed to condemnation. For it is a general rule, that where an offence is created by statute, it must, on the face of the information or libel conclude against the form of the statute, or at least refer to a subsisting statute authorising the offence; and we have so held the doctrine in other cases at this term.

The second count contains a very dry allegation, that the sloop on the high seas, in or near the harbor of Boston, on the 14th of July, 1808, did trade with, or put on board another certain ship or vessel, then being on the high seas, in or near the harbor of Boston, a quantity of goods, wares, and merchandizes of domestic growth and manufacture, to wit, flour, contrary to the act of 9th January, 1808, c. 8. Now it is material to observe, that it is not every trading with or putting on board of another vessel of such goods, wares, and merchandize, that subjects the property to forfeiture. The act declares, that it must be a trading with, or putting on board, contrary to that act, or the act of 22d December, 1807 [2 Stat. 451]. But a trading with, or putting on board in the port, where the goods are first laden, is not prohibited; and so it has been held by the supreme court of the United States. Nor is a trading, or putting on board by foreign vessels on the high seas, within the purview of the act. Sufficient matter, therefore, ought to have been alleged to have shown, that this trading or putting on board was clearly against the acts above stated. A mere conclusion against a statute has been uniformly held inadequate to supply the deficiency of material averments, to bring the case within the statute. It ought at least to have been averred, that the vessel was a vessel owned by citizens of the United States, and proceeded from some port of the United States, with her cargo, during the continuance of the embargo. As this libel now stands, without amendment, I do not feel at liberty to affirm the decree of the court below, and I shall, therefore, suspend a decree, until the question of amendment has been argued and considered.

After amendment allowed, the decree was affirmed.

NAPIER et al. v. BARNEY.

[5 Blatchf. 191.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 11, 1863.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—SUGAR IMPORTED IN BAGS—DRAFT AND TARE.

1. Under the fifty-eighth section of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 671), both draft and tare are allowable on sugar imported in bags, and subject to duty by weight.

[Cited in Moke v. Barney, Case No. 9,698.]

2. "Draft" and "tare," explained.

This was an action [by James Napier and others] against [Hiram Barney] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back an alleged excess of duties paid under protest, on the importation of five thousand bags of sugar.

Joseph S. Ridgway, for plaintiffs.

E. Delafield Smith, Dist. Atty, for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The sugar in this case was imported from Brazil, on the 1st of December, 1861. The duties exacted were two cents per pound, by weight, under the act of March 2, 1861 (12 Stat. 178). There is no dispute as to the rate of the duty, or that it is to be charged according to weight. The dispute arises out of the allowances or deductions to be made to the merchant when the duties on the articles are to be ascertained by weight. The fifty-eighth section of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 671), provides, that the following allowances shall be made for draft and tare on articles subject to duty by weight: "For draft on any quantity of one hundred weight, or one hundred and twelve pounds, one pound; on any quantity above one and not exceeding two hundred weight, two pounds;" and so on till the last clause, which is, "on any quantity above ten and not exceeding eighteen hundred weight, seven pounds; and on any quantity above eighteen hundred weight, nine pounds." This latter allowance is the maximum. "For tare on every whole chest of Bohea tea, seventy pounds;" and so on, enumerating half and quarter chests, and the different kinds of tea, with the quantity to be allowed for the tare; "on sugar other than loaf sugar, in casks, twelve per cent.; in boxes, fifteen per cent.; in bags or mats, five per cent." The fifty-eighth section of the act of 1799 is taken substantially from the thirty-fifth section of the act of August 4, 1790 (1 Stat. 166). The tare was allowed in this case, but the draft was refused.

Draft and tare, in a commercial sense and usage, have a separate and distinct meaning and application. The former is an allowance to the merchant when the duty is ascertained by weight, as in the present instance, to insure good weight to him. As defined in some of the books, it is "a small allowance in weighable goods, made by the king to the importer." It is to compensate for any loss that may occur from the handling of the scales, in the weighing, so that, when weighed the second time, the article will hold out good weight. The latter, tare, is allowed for the outside or covering of the article imported, whether it be box, barrel, bag, bale, mat, &c. Now, the tare in this case was allowed, but the allowance for the draft was refused. I cannot perceive any distinction between the two, as the right to the allowance of the one stands as express and as explicit, on the statute, as the right to the allowance of the other. Both might as well have been denied as either. It is a mistake to suppose that the allowance for the tare covers that for the draft, for, as is seen, it is intended to cover a different loss, one incident to the weighing of the article, while the other relates to the loss from the rough outside covering of it. Neither is there anything in the suggestion, made on the trial, of inequality in the weighing of large and small packages. If they are small, numbers, to the amount of fifteen or twenty, depending on the bulk or size, are weighed together.

The sixteenth section of the act of July 14, 1862 (12 Stat. 558), modified the allowance of the tare under the fifty-eighth section of the act of 1799, and repealed it altogether, as far as it related to the draft. I know of no other way of getting rid of a positive enactment, and hence must hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover.

Case No. 10,010.

NAPIER et al. v. SERVER et al

[2 Wkly. Notes Cas. 400.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Dec. 28, 1875.

RESULTING TRUST—ELECTION BY PRINCIPAL OF SECURITIES IN DEBT OWED BY AGENT.

Money was given to an agent to purchase real estate, which the latter did in his own name, and, becoming insolvent, conveyed it to his principal. Eight months previously the latter had taken from the agent a single bill for all moneys advanced, including that with which the real estate was purchased, and this whole claim was proved against the agent's estate in bankruptcy. Held, that, as the consideration of the single bill included the money advanced to buy the real estate, no resulting trust could be asserted by the principal, and a reconveyance was ordered to the assignee.

[This was a bill in equity by A. D. Napier & Co., to the use of Jacobs, assignee, against Angelina A. Server and John P. Server.]

The case was heard on bill, answer, and proofs. On January 1, 1872, John P. Server, one of the defendants, purchased a house and lot in the city of Philadelphia; and on January 1, 1873, entered into articles of partnership with E. C. Wells and S. C. Gray, under the firm name of Wells, Gray & Server. On the same day he gave his mother, the other defendant in this case, a judgment note for $8,690 which was subsequently proved against his estate in bankruptcy. On September 4, 1873, Wells, Gray & Server stopped payment. On the same day Server conveyed the premises in question to his mother without consideration. A petition in bankruptcy was subsequently filed against Wells, Gray & Server, and they were adjudicated bankrupts. Pending these proceedings, A. D. Napier & Co., firm creditors, filed this bill, alleging the above facts, and praying, inter alia, for a decree against Server's mother for a reconveyance of the premises to the assignee of the bankrupt firm.

Witnesses testified, on the part of the defendants, as follows: Mrs. Server, the defendant, had requested her son to buy the property for her, and had given him $4,000 to pay the purchase-money. He had stated at the time of the purchase to the agents of the vendor that he was buying the house for his mother. Mrs. Server had advanced to her son, in addition to the $4,000 to buy the house, at different times prior to 1875, various sums amounting to $8,690; but no sufficient resources were shown on Mrs. Server's part to have enabled her to have given her son the additional $4,000; and there was evidence that Server had stated to a creditor that he owned the house himself.

Wilson & Ward (with whom were Earle & White), for plaintiffs, argued that the conveyance by Server to his mother without consideration, on the day the firm of which he was a member stopped payment of their commercial paper, was prima facie in fraud of creditors, and the burden of proof was on the defendants to establish a resulting trust. Cook v. Fountain, 3 Swanst. 585; Kaine v. Weigley, 10 Har. [22 Pa. St.] 183; Shontz v. Brown, 3 Casey [27 Pa. St.] 123; Prevost v. Gratz, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 481; Alexander v. Todd [Case No. 175]. That the declarations of Server at the time of the purchase of the house were insufficient to prove the trust. Sidle v. Walters, 5 Watts, 389; Lloyd v. Lynch, 4 Casey [28 Pa. St.] 419; Blyholder v. Gilson, 6 Har. [18 Pa. St.] 134. As the defendants had failed to prove that Mrs. Server had an estate sufficient to enable her to advance to her son $4,000 to purchase the house, in addition to $8,690, the consideration of the note of January 1, 1873, the acceptance of the note was a settlement of accounts between the parties, and Mrs. Server thereby elected her security, and the resulting trust fell.

Mr. Hepburn, contra, contended that the property having been purchased with Mrs. Server's money, a trust resulted in Server for her; that the conveyance of September 4, 1873, was a transfer of the legal title in accordance with her equitable interest; and that the failure of the defendants to prove the full consideration of the note for $8,690 did not affect Mrs. Server's equity, but she should be allowed to remit her claim, pro tanto; citing Post v. Corbin [Case No. 11,299]; Scammon v. Cole [Id. 12,432]; Fisher v. Henderson [Id. 4,820]; In re Brand [Id. 1,809]; In re Clark [Id. 2,806]. And that the plaintiffs had no equity by reason of the defendant controlling the individual creditors of John P. Server, and, therefore, that nothing but costs could result to the assignee in bankruptcy, the property being admitted to be the individual property of John P. Server.

CADWALADER, District Judge. I think it established that the defendant, Mrs. Server, furnished the money with which the equity of redemption of the house in Mount Vernon street was bought, and if the conveyance by her son, the bankrupt, to her had been made on or before the 1st of January, 1873, I would have considered it the mere execution by him of the trust in her favor, which resulted from her ownership of the money. But on the 1st of January, 1873, she accepted from him the single bill for $8,690, of which she has made proof in bankruptcy. If the consideration of this obligation included the $4,000 paid for the equity of redemption in question, there could be no subsequent assertion of a resulting trust. I do not think it would be safe to rely upon the testimony which is adduced by the defendant to show that the settlement of 1st January, 1873, on which the obligation for $8,690 was received, did not include the $4,000 in question. Her testimony, unsupported by that of her son, would not suffice, and his testimony is in this respect vague and improbable, and is contradicted by his statement to a creditor that he owned the house himself.

Therefore it is decreed that the defendant convey the house and lot of ground in question, with the appurtenances, to the complainant and his heirs, in trust for the uses and purposes of the trust vested in him under the bankrupt law of March, 1876, and the suppletory and amendatory acts of congress. But I think that the costs of this conveyance and the complainant's costs in this case ought to be paid out of the separate estate of the bankrupt, John P. Server, and that the defendant's proof, already made in the court of bankruptcy, should be allowed.

District Court, E. D. Wisconsin. April, 1877.

MARITIME LIEN—WAIVER—TAKING NOTE—TRANSFER OF NOTE—PURCHASER WITH KNOWLEDGE—TRIAL—SURRENDER OF NOTE.

1. In the absence of express contract of waiver, or of an agreement that a note shall be taken in actual payment, a maritime lien is not waived or extinguished by giving credit for a limited time, nor by the acceptance of a note for the amount due on account of the service which is the foundation of the lien.

[Cited in The Illinois, Case No. 7,005.]

2. In the case of a note taken it is necessary that it should be surrendered at the hearing.

3. Although a maritime lien is strictly personal and is not assignable, yet if a note taken without waiver of the lien is discounted by a bank upon the indorsement of the person having the lien, and the indorser afterwards takes up the note, he still can enforce his lien, as such a transfer of the note does not extinguish it.

[Cited in The Emma L. Coyne, Case No. 4,466.]

4. The above principles apply where the vessel had been purchased by persons knowing of the existence of the lien.

5. Many cases cited and commented upon.

In admiralty. In 1873, Tyson, Sweet & Co. were the owners of the schooner Napoleon. The libelants composed a firm known as the Milwaukee Tug Boat Line, and were the owners of tugs engaged in towage service at the port of Milwaukee. Between the 13th of July, 1873, and the 19th of December of the same year, libelants' tugs rendered towage service for the Napoleon to the amount of $359. In February, 1874, the claimant purchased the vessel from Tyson, Sweet & Co., and received a conveyance. On the 12th day of May, 1874, the libelants took from Tyson, Sweet & Co. their note for the amount due for such towage service, payable in thirty days, which note included the amount due for a similar service rendered for the schooner Jason Parker, which vessel had been at the time of such service owned by Tyson, Sweet & Co., and was sold and conveyed to claimant at the same time that he received a conveyance of the Napoleon. Prior to the maturity of the note, the libelants presented it to the Second Ward Savings Bank, with their indorsement thereon, for discount. The note was discounted by the bank.

When the note fell due, it was presented to the makers for payment, was not paid, was protested for non-payment and notice given to the indorsers, the libelants. Libelants thereupon paid to the bank the amount due upon the note, and it came back to their hands. They then filed a libel against the vessel, thereby asserting a maritime lien for the towage service on account of which the note was originally given, and at the hearing surrendered the note.

H. H. Markham, for libelants.

N. J. Emmons, for claimant.

DYER, District Judge. For the towage service rendered by the libelants, they had a lien upon the vessel. Upon the testimony I must find that the claimant purchased with knowledge of libelants' claim. He therefore acquired and held title subject to the lien. Subsequent to the conveyance of the vessel, the libelants took from the former owners, their note for the amount due on account of the towage service. The lien existed and was in full force at the time the note was taken notwithstanding the previous purchase of the vessel by the claimant. The first question presented, is, did the acceptance of this note operate as a waiver of libelants' lien. The discussion of this question is unnecessary, since it is settled upon authority that in the absence of express contract of waiver, or of agreement that a note shall be taken in actual payment, a maritime lien is not waived or extinguished by giving credit for a limited time, nor by the acceptance of a note for the amount due on account of the service which is the foundation of the lien. The Nestor [Case No. 10,126]; The Chusan [Id. 2,717]; The Active [Id. 34]; The Eclipse [Id. 4,268], and cases there cited; The Gate City [Id. 5,267]; Harris v. The Kensington [Id. 6,122]; The Kimball, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 37; The Emily Souder, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 666; Raymond v. The Ellen Stewart [Case No. 11,594]. In the case of a note taken, it seems essential to the maintenance of a libel in rem, that the note be surrendered at the hearing.

Ramsay v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 611, is not in antagonism to the cases cited, and is to be distinguished from them. In that case the material man had received a negotiable note for the amount of his demand. The note was still outstanding when the libel was filed. It had not been surrendered, and it did not appear that it had not been negotiated and that it was not then in the hands of a third party. These being the circumstances, the supreme court held that the libel could not be maintained, resting the decision upon the fact that the note had not been given up or tendered at the hearing.

In the case at bar, the proofs tend to show, not only that it was not agreed, when the note was taken by libelants, that it should be received in absolute payment of their claim, but that it was understood that libelants' lien should be unaffected, and that if the note should not be paid, recourse would be had against the vessel.

The remaining and principal question in the case is this: Did the subsequent negotiation and transfer of the note by libelants to the bank, extinguish the lien? Libelants placed their indorsement on the note and presented it to the bank for discount. The bank discounted it on the strength of the indorsement, held the note till due, then presented it to Tyson, Sweet & Co. the makers, for payment, and upon its non-payment, protested it and gave notice to the indorsers, who paid the bank and took up the note. Was the lien, by this transaction extinguished? Or, upon the note coming back into the hands of the payees unpaid by the makers, could they, on surrender of the note, maintain proceedings against the vessel?

Whatever doubt once existed as to the assignability of a general maritime lien, the question has been put at rest by repeated adjudications. The lien of a salvor on account of salvage service, of a mariner for wages, of a material man for repairs or supplies, is strictly personal and does not pass to his assignee. The same must be said of a lien for towage. It is equally well settled that an assignment or transfer of the claim which constitutes the basis of the lien, extinguishes the lien.

The question whether the assignment by a mariner of his claim to unpaid wages, confers upon the assignee a right to maintain a suit in rem for the recovery of such wages, was fully discussed in the case of Patchin v. The A. D. Patchin [Case No. 10,794], and was answered in the negative. A distinction was taken between a claim of this character, and bottomry bonds, which are assignable because they are express hypothecations and bind the ship to the lender and his assigns, and bills of lading which are made negotiable for the benefit of trade and commerce. The rule that an assignment of a claim to secure which the maritime law gives a lien, divests the lien which originally existed in favor of the holder of the claim and confers no right in the assignee to claim reimbursement in a court of admiralty, was also laid down in the following cases: Sturtevant v. The George Nicholaus [Id. 13,578]; Logan v. The Aeolian [Id. 8,465]; Rusk v. The Freestone [Id. 12,143]; Reppert v. Robinson [Id. 11,703]; Harris v. The Kensington [supra]; The Champion [Case No. 2,583].

In the case at bar, as we have seen, the claimant purchased the vessel with notice of libelants' claim and lien. He therefore stands in no better position to contest the libelants' rights to a lien, than would Tyson, Sweet & Co. if they were yet the owners of the vessel. The case is not therefore one where the rights of innocent purchasers, without actual notice, are involved. Now, admitting the principle of law before stated, that the assignment or transfer by the original holder of a claim against a vessel extinguishes the lien, did libelants, by procuring the note which they had received from Tyson, Sweet & Co. to be discounted by the bank, in fact or effect transfer their claim against the vessel to the bank? If the transaction was such transfer or assignment, then it must be conceded the lien was divested and lost. But I am of the opinion that it was not. The execution of the note, as we have seen, was not a payment of libelants' demand against the vessel. Its acceptance was not a waiver of the lien. The original claim remained unimpaired, and would only be discharged on payment of the note. Pertinent to this point, is the language of Judge Sprague in Page v. Hubbard [Case No. 10,663]: "The creditor has received nothing except another promise of the debtor to pay the debt. This second promise is indeed in writing and negotiable, but it is a promise to pay the same debt. It acknowledges value received, but the only value received was the materials which went in the ship. The debt, therefore, cannot properly be said to be satisfied, merely because there had been two promises by the debtor to pay it, the one by parol, and the other in writing negotiable." It is true that while the note was outstanding the libelants could not pursue their remedy in rem, and this is for the reason, as the courts express it, that the debtor would still be responsible to the holder of the note, and he ought not to be twice liable in any form, on account of the same debt. And that he may not be subjected to this hazard the courts require "the production of the note to be cancelled when the judgment is rendered on the original promise." Though the remedy on the original claim was suspended while the note was outstanding, it does not necessarily follow that the discounting of the note by the bank operated as a transfer or assignment of the original debt or demand. The transaction between libelants and the bank, amounted to an advance of money on the note by the bank on the strength of libelants' indorsement. It was not an indorsement without recourse, but was in form such that upon notice of its non-payment by the makers, the libelants would become obligated to take up the note. Upon maturity and non-payment, the note came back into their hands, and I think that upon its surrender they were remitted to the privilege they would have had if the note had remained in their continuous possession until due, namely, the privilege to proceed in rem against the vessel. The transfer of the note to the bank was accompanied with libelants' contingent liability to take it up when due, which liability became absolute on non-payment by the makers and notice. The question I admit is not free from difficulty; but in view of the special circumstances of the case, the claimant having no better right to contest libelants' asserted lien, than would be possessed by Tyson, Sweet & Co. were they still the owners of the vessel, and the note having been discounted upon libelants' indorsement, and having come immediately back to their hands when due, I think it most consonant with correct reasoning to hold, that there was not such an assignment of libelants' claim against the vessel, or her owners, as extinguished the lien. In this view I am supported by Judge Betts, who, in the case of The Active [supra], held, that the taking of a promissory note was not a waiver of a lien on a vessel for supplies, as against a claimant who did not innocently and without notice acquire rights or interests in the vessel, and that while the note remained in circulation or outstanding, it operated as a suspension of the remedy on the lien; but on its surrender by the original creditor he was remitted to his original privilege and could proceed in rem against the vessel.

A different view was taken by Judge Magrath in the case of Harris v. The Kensington [supra]. He admits that where a lien arises under the maritime law it is not waived or lost because a note or bill has been taken for it by the creditor, and that the acceptance of the note is not to be held a payment of the original demand unless so agreed. This conceded, it is then held that a transfer of the note transfers the original debt or claim and thereby extinguishes the lien, which cannot be revived by taking back the note. I am unwilling to adopt unreservedly this course of reasoning.

It may be observed that the precise point under consideration was not necessarily before the court for decision in either of the two cases last cited, as it did not appear in either case that the note taken by the original creditor had ever been transferred.

Admitting the full force of Judge Longyear's statement in the case of The Champion, supra, that the decisions of our own admiralty courts fully sustain the position that the lien which, for example, a material man has, "is strictly personal to himself, and does not pass to the assignee, that it is in fact extinguished by the assignment of his claim, so that neither he nor his assignee can come into a court of admiralty for its enforcement," I have been unable, after as diligent an examination as I could make, to find a case, where the principle was enforced, which did not upon the facts show an absolute assignment or transfer of the original debt or demand.

In Reppert v. Robinson [supra], the libelant had taken a due-bill for the amount of his claim, produced it at the trial and offered to surrender it. There was an assignment to a third party indorsed on the due-bill which bore date prior to the filing of the libel and which was erased. Judge Taney in his decision granting a decree, held that as the due-bill was produced by the libelant and offered to be surrendered and delivered up, he must be regarded as the lawful owner, and if it had been assigned, that it had again been returned to the libelant. It is evident that the right to a decree was here considered to rest upon the libelant's ownership of the due-bill when the libel was filed; and upon his offer to surrender it at the hearing; and that the fact that it might have been previously assigned was not deemed material as affecting the lien.

In the case at bar, I rest my conclusion upon the ground, that the transaction between the libelants and the bank, by which the note was discounted and again taken up, was not a transfer of the original debt or demand so as to bring the case within the principle of those authorities which hold that such transfer or assignment effects an extinguishment of the lien. Decree for libelants.

Case No. 10,012.

The NAPOLEON.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 296.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1862.

PRIZE—PRACTICE—WHAT ISSUES ALLOWED—COLLATERAL SUBJECTS—OWNERSHIP—USE BY BELLIGERENTS.

1. A claim and answer in a prize suit cannot put in issue anything but the question of prize or no prize.

2. Collateral subjects can be controverted in prize cases only by means of pleadings and further proofs, specially authorized by the court after a decision on the first issue.

3. The vessel had, up to the time of her capture in enemy waters, been employed by the enemy for purposes connected with the operations of war and was found with the enemy's flag and the enemy's artillery on board. She was captured by the United States naval squadron, acting in co-operations with the land forces, in the attack upon Newbern. Her owner, though he was a loyal citizen of a loyal state, had left her in charge of an agent, who allowed her to be so employed, and it did not appear that she was taken by the enemy by duress or in fraud of her owner's right. Under such circumstances her owner is concluded from denying her hostile character.

4. No equity of lien or claim, however urgent, held by innocent third parties, is allowed to prevail, in a prize court, against property seized while in use by a belligerent.

5. Vessel condemned.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The vessel proceeded against in this case was captured by the United States naval squadron, acting in co-operation with the land forces, in the attack on and seizure of Newbern, North Carolina, in March last. The vessel was totally abandoned, when taken possession of by the United States armed vessels. The evidence is, from reports prevalent at the time and place, that armed troops in the rebel service had been stationed on board of her until driven out by the close approach of the United States forces, and then left her without any crew, papers, or equipment, other than several pieces of artillery which were found on board, and were placed on shore by orders of the commandant of the United States squadron, and that the vessel was afterwards laden with rosin and other stores, and ordered to this port for adjudication. A libel was filed June 3, 1862, demanding the condemnation of the vessel. A claim and answer thereto, in the name of D. C. Murray, a citizen of and resident in the United States, was put in on the 27th of June thereafter, upon which two defences are raised: First, that the libel is indefinite in its charges and allegations, and, therefore, insufficient to found a conviction upon; and, secondly, that the averments in the answer present an adequate bar and defence to the suit, and, if not evidence of themselves, are entitled to be supported by proofs aliunde on the part of the claimant.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

The rule of practice in prize suits upon these points is as fully settled in law, in this court, as it lies within the competency of the court to determine. The libel has all the fulness and particularity of statement demanded in prize suits, and the claimant cannot bring any other issue in contestation, by an answer to the libel, than the question of prize or no prize. 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] note Append. 19; The Empress [Case No. 4,476]; The Delta [Id. 3,777]; and other cases in this court. Collateral subjects can be controverted in prize cases only by means of pleadings and further proofs, specially authorized by the court after a decision on the first issue. There having been a hostile seizure of the vessel, her tackle and equipments, in enemy waters, by a United States squadron co-operating with land forces in an attack upon Newbern, and in the capture of that place, she must be regarded as lawful prize, unless some fact showing her legal exemption from seizure be established, or be necessarily implied from the circumstances of the capture. If the fact be conceded that the Napoleon was bona fide the property of the claimant, and that he was loyally opposed to her being employed or held by the enemy, that would not relieve her from liability to condemnation in a prize court, unless she was taken out of the possession of her rightful owner, and held in use by the enemy by duress, or at least in fraud of his right. The true title may be in the claimant, but, as it came to him through the enemy holder, the law will presume that such retaining of possession by the vendor was by the consent or permission of the purchaser. It is not necessary that the vessel should be placed in the control of her possession with a view to her being employed in any warlike acts or in the commission of a wrong against others, but whether she was chartered or loaned, or how otherwise she was allowed to be employed by the subjects of a nation at war, prize courts will treat her as enemy property, equally as if full ownership of her had vested in the enemy. The external symbol of her employment by the enemy or his officers, for purposes immediately or mediately connected with the operations of war, concludes her real owner from denying her hostile character. The Carolina, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 256; The Orozembo, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 433; 3 Phil. Int. Law, § 272; Halleck, Int. Law, 641.

This vessel was, at the time of her capture, clothed with symbols of hostility. She was riding in enemy waters, had been occupied by enemy troops to the time of her seizure, and had on board the enemy's flag and a heavy armament of artillery. I think, also, that the reports of residents in the port, that she had been, previous to her seizure, used in running the blockade of that port, and had been also fitted out as a privateer, are legitimate evidence of her antecedent course of employment, although all these acts were without the sanction of and violently in opposition to the wishes of the claimant, who is personally a loyal citizen, of high character and integrity, and a resident merchant of this city, opposed strenuously to the Rebellion, and has been deeply injured pecuniarily by the misuse of his property on this occasion and otherwise; yet the acts of his agent, with whom the vessel was left by him, determine the character of the vessel, and the integrity of her real owner cannot secure her from the consequences of her illicit employment. The claimant must appeal to his government for relief from the forfeiture. The court is not empowered by the existing laws to adjudge the case upon principles of fair and reasonable equity, but must adhere to and apply the severe edicts of prize law. It is understood that congress may, at its present session, make provision for the protection of the property of loyal residents of the North which may be in the hands of the rebels, and subject to forfeiture for its criminal use by them. That is a matter to be controlled at the discretion of the legislature. The courts cannot, in time of war, depart from the strict behests of the law, by shielding property from the effects of a hostile character impressed upon it by the culpable conduct of those who are intrusted with it, or who so hold it that it can be turned to the aid of the enemy, or to a hostile use against our own government. No equity of lien or claim, however urgent, held by innocent third parties, is allowed to prevail in a prize court against property seized while in use by a belligerent. 1 Kent, Comm. 87. A decree of condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel, her tackle, &c., will be entered.

An appeal from this decree was taken to the circuit court. Subsequently the secretary of the treasury released seven-eighths of the vessel to the claimant, and the appeal as to the rest was abandoned.

[There was a rehearing allowed in this case, but the decree of forfeiture was allowed to stand. Case No. 10,013.]

Case No. 10,013.

The NAPOLEON.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 357.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. May, 1863.

PRIZE — VIOLATING BLOCKADE — INSTRUCTIONS — ACTUAL INTENTION—REHEARING.

1. Rehearing, on further proofs furnished by the claimant of seven-eighths of the vessel.

2. One-eighth of the vessel being condemnable in any event, the libellants have a right to enforce their remedy against her as an entirety, whether they retain or remit the proceeds.

3. In the case of a vessel seized as prize by reason of her having violated a blockade, or been used by the enemy for warlike purposes, it is of no consequence that she was so employed without the knowledge or approbation of her owner.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

4. In time of war, a neutral vessel is subject to forfeiture if run into a blockaded port by her commander, independently of proof of instructions by or actual intention on the part of her owner to evade the blockade, he having previous due notice of its existence and efficiency.

The former decision in this case [Case No. 10,012] confirmed for these reasons: 1. The vessel entered the port where she was captured, by violating the blockade. 2. One-eighth of the vessel was enemy property, lawfully seized in the enemy's country, in actual battle, by the United States military forces. 3. The remaining seven-eighths of the vessel, if legally the property of the claimant, is subject to forfeiture for holding commercial intercourse with the rebel states.

BETTS, District Judge. This case comes before the court, by consent of the counsel for both parties, in effect as upon a rehearing on further proofs, but without the formality of an issue on pleadings and proofs following the first hearing, and the decision on the libel, and the evidence taken in preparatorio. In that state of the proceedings, the vessel was condemned, as lawful prize of war, in December term last. It thus clearly belongs to the claimant to show, by further proofs, collated with such as shall be given by the libellants, that the vessel is not guilty of the offence charged in the libel. This burden the claimant assumes on his side, and insists that he has fulfilled it in the affidavits produced and read in his behalf; while the libellants contend that the weight of evidence, direct and presumptive, remains against the claimant, unchanged, and justifies the condemnation rendered. The Vigilantia, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 1; Harmony v. U. S., 2 How. [43 U. S.] 210.

It appears that the vessel was originally owned by a resident of North Carolina, who, in September, 1860, conveyed seven-eighths of her to the claimant, in satisfaction of a debt secured to him on that vessel. The vendor retained the possession and use of her subsequently, on different voyages, until he finally returned with her into port, in August, 1861; and it is not shown that his possession was afterwards changed until her capture by the libellants. It is to be remarked, that no legal exception is taken against the condemnation of one-eighth of the vessel. That portion of the decree must, therefore, stand unaffected by this rehearing; and the lien or special interest of the claimant in the residue of the vessel, if established, does not intercept or qualify the right of the United States to enforce its remedy against the vessel as an entirety, whether they retain or remit the whole proceeds involved in the condemnation.

The question before the court on this trial is as to the innocency or guilt of the vessel, as if the transaction in which she was implicated was one of personal violation on her part; and that inquiry may be resolved quite independently of the individual intentions or cognizance of the parties who are made pecuniarily responsible for acts of the vessel or of the property, which incur or have imputed to them forfeitures because of such acts. It is, accordingly, not sufficient for the claimant, in defence of this suit, to establish his own loyalty of character, and his disapproval of the connection of the vessel with the enemy, or with the illicit conduct alleged against her. The evidence on the first hearing was amply satisfactory in that respect, without the corroboration of subsequent proofs, which also show his unquestioned patriotism and rectitude as a citizen and a merchant, and that his most earnest efforts were exerted to prevent the prize from being in any way employed in aid of the enemy. But, notwithstanding his individual integrity, the vessel is responsible, in law, in rem, for the malfeasance of the agent who had control of her, in violating the penal laws of navigation. The most distinguished and unblemished reputation on the part of a ship-owner will not protect his vessel from confiscation, when it is engaged, though through untrustworthy agents, and without his knowledge, and against his prohibition, in illicit employments, in infractions of revenue and fiscal laws, and, pre-eminently, in violating the laws of war. The res culpabilis has meted out to it the mulct or confiscation legally applicable to an agent acting voluntarily in violation of law. Ships and cargoes of the largest values are constantly subject to forfeiture, without regard to the intentions of their owners, for being the means of smuggling property of trifling value into port, in evasion of restrictive laws of trade; and, in time of war, a neutral ship is subject to forfeiture if run into a blockaded port by her commander, independently of proof of instructions by or actual intention on the part of the owner, to evade the blockade, he having previous due notice of its existence and efficiency. In this case, no necessary intendment of law can arise, that the vessel, after the execution of a bill of sale of her to the claimant, was tortiously perverted from the possession and use of the claimant, nor that she did not remain with her original owner, and at his order, with the assent of the claimant. In this posture of the case, if the further proofs produced should establish all the facts alleged in respect to the equipment and acts of hostility charged against the prize vessel within the waters of North Carolina, they would fail to exonerate her from the decree of condemnation rendered against her on the first hearing; because she was, in fact, partly enemy property, and stationed in an enemy port, and was captured during an actual attack on such port by the United States forces, whilst it was defended by the military power of the enemy, and by the presence of the captured vessel; and, also, because the interest of the claimant in the vessel, entire or fractional, is confiscable under the general prize law, and by special enactments of congress, because the vessel had commercial intercourse with an enemy port. Chit. Law Nat. 1; 12 Stat. 257, §§ 5, 6; Id. 319, § 1.

The particular point to which the further proof was prayed and offered by the claimant is, to show that the evidence in preparatorio was misapprehended by the court, or was grossly inaccurate in itself, so far as respects any illicit conduct of the vessel in aid of the enemy, and, most essentially, in the representation that she bore arms, or was in any way in a condition, at the time of her capture, to help the enemy in attacking the United States forces, or in defending the place they were assailing. To this end, various affidavits have been put in by the respective parties, taken ex parte, in North Carolina, since the decision of the cause on the first hearing. In most instances they are very loose, and wanting in precision in their statements and structure, and are subject to distrust, in being a literal repetition, by different witnesses, of facts ascertained by them at separate times and distant places, and without concurrent examinations. The prominent purpose aimed at by the claimant, in these proofs, is to contradict or countervail the evidence in preparatorio tending to prove that, when the vessel was captured, she was abandoned by all hands, leaving only her arms on board, which consisted of three 24-pounder guns and one 32-pounder, which were taken out of her by Captain Rowan, commander of the squadron, and put on shore at Newbern; and, by the testimony now offered, to disprove that the prize was armed and had artillery on board when captured. It does not appear to me that that fact is in any way material to the issue on trial, any further than as it may bear upon the credibility, in a general point of view, of the witnesses who give the evidence. The criminality of the vessel would be more certainly manifested if, when captured, she was fitted, manned and armed as a vessel-of-war, and was, in that way, taking part with the enemy; but she would be no less guilty and confiscable if she united in aiding and promoting the cause of the rebels against the government, otherwise than with arms and soldiers on board. Every act of intentional aid and assistance to the enemy, in whatever manner rendered by means of the vessel, would be visited upon her as an agent de facto in the offence, by the same consequences of condemnation and forfeiture as if it were committed by aggressive force and open hostilities. It, therefore, becomes of small moment to weigh critically the testimony with respect to the state of the vessel, in point of armament, at the instant of her capture; and it is a reasonable and fair interpretation of the affidavits given on both sides, except in two instances only, that the deponents speak of matters which must be derived from and known to them by general repute or belief, as having occurred within their personal knowledge, because it nowhere appears that they were members of the ship's company, or individually on board of her during the time she was within the waters where she was captured, or had been so since the war commenced. This circumstance is not adverted to as detracting from the general title of the witnesses to credit, but to mark the character of the evidence, as founded upon what the parties regarded as true according to common acceptation and belief, without assuming to assert it to be correct of their individual knowledge.

Admitting, then, to the fullest extent, the probity of the claimant in all his personal transactions in respect to the vessel and her voyages, and his loyalty and fair conduct towards the laws and rights of his own government, so far as his personal intentions or authority were concerned, the considerations set up and pressed in his behalf cannot be admitted as constituting a legal defence to the suit. They may supply a forcible ground of appeal to the executive department of the government, in respect to the ulterior disposition of the proceeds of the prize, but the judiciary have no competency to control that matter. In my judgment, therefore, the former decree in the suit must stand and be executed; because the court must judicially recognize that, in August, 1861, when it appears the vessel entered the ports of North Carolina, they were in a state of efficient blockade, publicly notified, and continued so to the time of the arrest of the vessel; because one-eighth of the vessel was enemy property, lawfully seized in the enemy country, in actual battle, by the United States military forces; and because the remaining seven-eighths of the vessel, if legally the property of the claimant, is subject to forfeiture for holding commercial intercourse with a rebel state. Decree accordingly.

An appeal from this decree was taken to the supreme court [case unreported]. Subsequently the secretary of the treasury released seven-eighths of the vessel to the claimant, and the appeal as to the rest was abandoned.

COLLISION—VESSEL AGROUND IN NARROW CHANNEL—RIGHT OF WAY.

1. Where a tug is working at a vessel aground in the channel of St. Clair flats, it is her duty to obstruct navigation as little as possible, and to give way to passing vessels, though it may require a temporary suspension of her efforts.

[Cited in The Cherokee, 15 Fed. 123.]

2. In approaching a tug so engaged, the master of a steamer has a right to rely upon her observance of this duty, and the same precautions are not demanded of him as would be if no such obligation rested upon the tug.

On libel of Chester Kimball, for damages sustained by the steamtug J. D. Morton in a collision upon the St. Clair flats. At the time of the collision, which was on the 30th of August, A. D. 1856, the Morton was engaged in getting off the Torrent, which was aground upon the St. Clair flats, on the southerly side of the channel, and about a quarter of a mile from the lower end. The tug had taken a line about 40 feet in length from the schooner, and was endeavoring by slackening and then going ahead at full speed, by a sudden jerk to start her off. The schooner Muskingum was also lying aground on the opposite or northerly side of the channel, and to the southwest of the Morton. In pulling on the Torrent, the Morton was headed up and partly across the channel, although it was charged in the libel that there was a clear passage of 10 rods wide between her and the northerly bank. While lying in this position, the propeller Napoleon came up the channel, passed to the northerly of the Muskingum, and ran into the Morton, striking her upon the port wheel nearly amidships, and doing her considerable damage.

WILKINS, District Judge. The channel of St. Clair flats, where the collision in this case occurred, navigable for vessels drawing ten feet of water, does not exceed 180 feet in width. There is some conflict in the testimony as to the exact position of the Morton, but I am satisfied she was not lying parallel or nearly parallel with the channel, as she could not in this position have worked to any advantage in getting the Torrent off. Bearing in mind that the length of the Morton was 165 feet, and the distance between her stern and the bow of the Torrent 30 feet, she would naturally assume a position, in getting off the Torrent, that would throw her so far across the channel that it would be impossible for a tug, drawing so much water as the Napoleon, to pass her to the northward. I am satisfied that such was the fact. Of course, too, it would be out of the question for the Napoleon to pass between the two vessels so long as the line was taut. Evidence was given of a custom for tugs, while working at vessels aground upon the flats, to give way upon the approach of other vessels and permit them to pass. Considering the number of vessels using the narrow channel, and the frequency with which they ground there, I think that good seamanship and the interests of commerce require that tugs, in assisting stranded vessels, should obstruct the navigation of the channel as little as possible, and should yield a right of way to passing vessels, even if they are obliged to desist temporarily from their efforts. Had this course been pursued by the Morton in the present case, the collision would have been avoided. While it is true her failure to do this would not have justified the Napoleon in running her recklessly down, or in omitting the observance of ordinary care in approaching her, still her duty to give way, and the probability of her so doing, ought to be taken in consideration in determining what would be ordinary care under the circumstances—in other words the master of the Napoleon had a right to suppose he would conform to this well known custom, and to rely upon his observance of it, and would be excused from such precautions as would have been necessary had he known the Morton would not have given way. As she approached the group of vessels in question, the Napoleon passed to the northward of the Muskingum, which lay nearly abreast of the Torrent, and a little to the northward of the center of the channel, and as she passed her, her master hailed the Morton to stop his boat, back her, and let him go by. To this Capt. Kimball replied, "No, go round me"; and when Capt. Pridgeon, of the Napoleon, again said, "I am drawing too much water, and can't go round you," he still refused to move, and continued working his engine ahead. Seeing then that a collision was imminent, Capt. Pridgeon rang his bell successively to check, stop, back and back strong. This was immediately done, and the wheel of the Napoleon was working backward at the moment of collision. If the Morton had backed at once when requested, and opened a passageway, as she ought to have done, the Napoleon would have passed her without injury. There was not sufficient water for her to pass either to the southward of the Torrent or the northward of the Morton, and they were thus obstructing the only available channel there was at that point.

Bearing in mind that as against the Morton the Napoleon had the right of way, I cannot see that there was any omission of ordinary precautions on her part to avoid a collision, and she must therefore be exonerated from fault. Libel dismissed.

The NAPOLEON.

[Olc. 208.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct., 1845.

SEAMEN—WAGES—PAYMENT—CONFLICT OF TESTIMONY—NUMERICAL PREPONDERANCE OF WITNESSES—JURISDICTION—FOREIGN VESSEL.

1. If, on the termination of a voyage, the master admits verbally that a balance of wages is due a mariner, and when sued therefor alleges, in his answer, that he has paid the amount in full to him, it devolves upon the respondent to prove the payment.

2. When there is an irreconcilable conflict in the testimony of witnesses, and circumstances of suspicion attach to the credit of them on both sides, the balance of evidence will be regarded as in favor of the party having the greatest number.

3. The federal courts have jurisdiction of actions for wages for services on board foreign vessels.

4. These actions will be entertained of right in behalf of American seamen against foreign vessels, owners or masters; and will also be readily sustained in behalf of foreign seamen against masters or owners of foreign vessels, when the voyage terminates or is broken up in an American port, or foreign seamen are discharged from a foreign ship there, and are necessitous. But the courts are unwilling, under other circumstances, to support such actions, and discourage their prosecution in our tribunals.

[Cited in Davis v. Leslie, Case No. 3,639; The Hermine, Id. 6,409; The Lilian M. Vigus, Id. 8,346; The Maggie Hammond, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 450; The Topsy, 44 Fed. 635.]

5. An allegation in the answer that all the parties are foreigners, and the ship is foreign property, must be proved by the respondent or claimant.

The libellant sues in a summary action for wages earned on board the brig Napoleon, on a voyage from New York to Jamaica and back, and avers that he is an American seaman, and was discharged on the arrival of the vessel at this port, September 5th, without payment of his wages. The answer asserts that the vessel is a British bottom, owned at the port of St. John, New Brunswick, and excepts to the jurisdiction of this court over the subject matter. It admits the shipping and services of the libellant as charged by him, and that the vessel returned to the port of New-York or on about the 3d day of September last, and avers that the libellant "was then paid off and discharged, the voyage being ended." The answer reiterates, in the form of denial, the same allegation, asserting that the libellant was not discharged without having been first paid the wages due him, "but on the contrary thereof, the fact was that he, at the time of his discharge, received from the respondent the full amount of wages due him," &c., and proceeds to state in detail the manner and amount of payment. The libellant filed a general replication to the answer, and both parties put in their proofs under the issue. Four witnesses, two on each side, were examined before a commissioner, and their depositions have been read, and three others have been examined orally in court.

Nash & Manchester, for libellant.
P. Hamilton, for claimant.

BETTS, District Judge. There is no direct proof of the discharge of the libellant, but it appears that he left the vessel on her arrival here; and no objection being shown to his so doing, although he was repeatedly afterwards at the vessel, it must be taken as admitted by the answer, that he was discharged on the 3d or 4th of September, the day the vessel came up to the city from quarantine. The mate deposes that the libellant's wages were paid him in full by the captain in the afternoon of Monday, the 8th of September, in the cabin of the vessel, the mate and captain's wife being also present. Collateral facts in proof fix this to have been the time when the libellant carried a pitcher of water into the cabin at the request of the mate. The mate testifies he did not pay the money himself, nor have it in his hands. That the captain took a twenty dollar bill out of his pocketbook, laid it on the table, and then handed it to the libellant. The mate had made up the libellant's account of wages, and found there was due him twenty dollars, deducting payments he had previously received. The whole wages in arrear at the time amounted to about twenty-two dollars. The respondent, before this action was brought, tendered the libellant two dollars in specie, and the tender not being accepted, paid the sum into court, setting up the tender in his answer. Daniel Dwyer, a seaman on board, deposes that the libellant told him, a day or two after that Monday, that he had received all his wages of the captain, except about a dollar and a half, which he was trying to obtain. This representation is contradicted by the libellant's proofs. A clerk in the office of J. W. Hallett, Esq., testifies that the libellant came to the office to have his demand collected. On Thursday, the 11th September, he left his account for $22, and the same day notice was sent the respondent from the office advising him thereof, and requesting payment of that sum. That the master came to the office the same day, accompanied by his mate, and brought the note with him. He said the wages had been paid the libellant in full the Saturday previous, in the afternoon, towards evening; that he did not pay the money himself, but it was paid by his mate. The mate said nothing. He was directly alongside the master at the time that statement was made. The Saturday after (13th) the master came again to the office, and then said that the libellant had come to the vessel Monday morning (8th) for his wages, and he himself then paid him in full. The answer was sworn to by the master on the 17th September, six days after the statements made at Mr. Hallett's office, in the presence of the mate, and to which the assent of the mate must be implied; and the discrepancy between the answer and the declarations made by the captain, and the after testimony of the mate, is of a character to excite strong suspicions against the integrity of these parties. The answer avers, in positive terms, that the vessel arrived here on or about the 3d of September, "when the libellant was paid off and discharged, the voyage being ended"; and to demonstrate that his attention was fixed to this connection of facts, and that he meant to make it emphatic, in the next article of his answer he repels, by a positive denial, an assertion in the libel, sworn to the 15th September, "that he (libellant) had been discharged out of and from the services of said vessel without being paid the balance of wages due him, &c., amounting to twenty dollars and upwards," and avers the fact to be, on the contrary, that the libellant, at the time of his discharge, received from the respondent the full amount of his wages.

The main fact stated, that the wages had been paid before suit brought, would be sufficient, if proved, to bar the action, although the time or place of payment might not correspond with the allegations of the answer, and the court would not regard such variations as material. But these particulars become of significant importance toward determining between conflicting proofs, whether the alleged payment was ever made. Three witnesses for the libellant testify that they went with him to the vessel the 8th of September, to procure his wages; it was the Monday afternoon referred to by the mate. They identify the time, as he does, by the circumstance of the pitcher of water brought by the libellant to the cabin. All these witnesses swear that neither the captain or mate were present in the cabin with the libellant at that time, and that he merely carried the pitcher of water there, and came immediately out. The master and his wife were on deck. The mate was there, also, with a book in his hand; and it appears, from other evidence, the vessel was at the time discharging cargo. The witnesses all saw the libellant go up to the master and address him, as if making some inquiry, and two of them, Joyce and Young, testified that they were standing near him and heard him ask the master if he would settle with him or pay his wages; and the master replied he would pay him as soon as the cargo was discharged or out; and all the witnesses swear that no money was paid him that day by the master. These two witnesses state further that they went again with the libellant to the vessel on Tuesday and Wednesday following that day. Both assert that the master was not on board on Tuesday, and say that the libellant asked the mate when the master would pay his wages, and the mate replied he would not pay them until the cargo was out. Young says the mate made the like answer to the same inquiry on Wednesday, the master not being on board; but Joyce says it was the master, and not the mate, who made that answer on Wednesday. Three witnesses, Joyce, Peterson and Young, all swear that Daniel Dwyer came to the libellant's boarding-house on Sunday, (the 14th,) and inquired for the libellant, and then asked him if he had got his wages from the master. The libellant replied he had not. Dwyer then told him that he would not get them without suing the master, and if he (Dwyer) had his things ashore, he would not go in the vessel. Upon the main fact of payment the two classes of witnesses stand in direct and positive contradiction with each other, and under circumstances which admit of no ground for supposing there is with them any mistake or forgetfulness in the matter. On the one side or the other, there is unequivocal perjury.

In considering the evidence to determine how the credibility preponderates upon that issue, the court cannot overlook the incongruity in some collateral particulars stated by the libellant's witnesses. Nor under circumstances awakening distrust as to the integrity and motives of the witnesses on each side, can it escape notice that the libellant and his witnesses are colored people, all lodging together, and that the keeper of this boarding-house has this suit chiefly under his own management and direction, and undoubtedly is to receive its proceeds. These circumstances afford color for suspicion of connivance between these parties, or at least that these witnesses have been brought to the stand strongly prepossessed for the libellant, and very much under the influence of their boarding-house keeper. These considerations would probably deserve weight beyond that of mere suspicion had the defense set up on the part of the respondent been ingenuous and consistent. The court might then feel compelled to disregard the fact of a greater number of witnesses on the part of the libellant, and decree conformably to the direct and positive testimony of the mate, corroborated by that of Dwyer, as to the admissions and declarations of the libellant. But the glaring discrepancy between the answer and the proofs, the confused and contradictory declarations of the master, in Mr. Hallett's office, the mate being present, and apparently assenting to the statements made by the master, and then testifying to one in direct opposition to them, in my judgment, tend to depreciate the reliableness of the defence quite as much as the disparaging circumstances bearing against the credibility of the libellant's witnesses do against the justness of the action.

In this confused and conflicting state of the testimony, the numerical superiority of witnesses with the libellant ought to be regarded as at least neutralizing the evidence of the respondent on this defence of payment. That the wages demanded had been earned, and were due to the libellant on the arrival of the vessel at this port, is admitted in substance by the answer. It devolves upon the respondent to discharge himself from that debt. The state of the pleading, as well as nature of the defence, casts the burthen of proving such satisfaction upon the respondent. It is always with the party who offers an affirmative fact in support of his case. Phelps v. Hartwell, 1 Mass. 71; Buckminster v. Perry, 4 Mass. 593. An answer alleging payment is of that character; it places the burthen of proof upon the respondent. The respondent is bound to maintain the allegation by evidence clearly and satisfactorily overbalancing that of the demandant. It is not enough to do that for him to make out a probable case in his favor; he must render it reasonably certain.

Under this feature of the case, I shall decree that the libellant recover the wages claimed, together with summary costs, to be taxed. The two dollars deposited in court by the respondent is to be applied in part payment upon this decree. The exception taken to the jurisdiction of the court because of the foreign character of the vessel and her master, cannot prevail. It has not been proved that the libellant is an alien; and were it so, the law affords no exemption of foreigners or their vessels from the jurisdiction of this court. Nor if both parties were aliens would that fact affect the power of the court; it has cognizance of the subject matter, although, as a general usage, it forbears exercising its jurisdiction over controversies between foreign seamen and shipmasters. But it is no way probable it would withhold it in such case, when the suit is for wages by a seaman who had completed his contract and voyage, and was discharged from his vessel. Nor would its jurisdiction be denied in case the voyage was broken up in an American port, leaving the crew in a necessitous condition, with outstanding wages due them. Decree for the libellant.

District Court, E. D. New York. June, 1871.[2]

COLLISION—STEAMER PASSING STEAMER—RULES OF SUPERVISING INSPECTORS.

1. Two steamboats, the P. and the N., left their piers in the North river nearly together, both bound through the Sound. The P. left her pier first, but took a wider sweep, so that when the two vessels were in the East river, the N. was ahead. The P., moving faster than the N., overhauled her, so that when they arrived at Hell Gate the stem of the P. was ahead of the stem of the N., the vessels, however, being alongside. In this position they entered the Gate together, both vessels holding on, and a collision occurred, in which the P. was injured. Previous to the collision, the supervising inspectors had adopted a rule in reference to such navigation, but it had not been promulgated, and neither party knew of its existence at the time. Held, that the rule was not applicable to the case.

2. It was unlawful for two boats of such size, going in the same direction, to be in the Gate together, and the one which was chargeable with their being there together was responsible for their collision.

3. The P. had the right to pass the N. in the East river before reaching the Gate, if she could, but not having done so, it was her duty on reaching the Gate, to stop and go astern of the N. As she did not do so, she, and not the N., was liable for the collision.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought by the owners of the steamboat Providence, to recover for injuries sustained by that vessel in a collision with the steamboat Narragansett, which occurred in Hell Gate on the afternoon of the 24th day of April, 1869.

The controlling facts of the case are not involved in any doubt, and as little doubt exists as to the law to be applied.

The two steamboats left their respective piers in the North river, at nearly the same time, both bound for the Sound. The weather was fair and the tide flood. The Providence moved out in the North river ahead of the Narragansett, but in consequence of vessels off the Battery, took a wide sweep, going over towards Governor's Island and the Brooklyn side, in turning into the East river. The Narragansett took the inner course and passed close to the New York side as she turned. The result was, that when the two vessels headed up the East river along by the Wall street ferry, the Narragansett was some distance ahead of the Providence. Upon this point, which I consider the decisive point of the case, the proof appears conclusive.

As the two vessels continued their courses through the East river, the Providence, which was the larger and the faster boat, gained on the Narragansett, and when the channel west of Blackwell's Island was entered, the Providence had the Narragansett on her port quarter, her own bow being ahead of the bow of the other. Owing, however, to the strong suction occasioned by so large a vessel in that narrow channel, the Narragansett was enabled to maintain about that position, and when the upper end of Blackwell's Island was reached, and the Gate was to be entered, the Providence, although her bow was ahead of the bow of the Narragansett, had been unable to shake off that vessel, but still had her hanging on her port side and quarter. So situated relatively, the vessels entered the Gate and naturally came in contact before they were through, the Narragansett striking the Providence just aft the port paddle-box, and doing the injuries complained of.

I take no time to scrutinize the handling of the two vessels in the Gate, as I hold it unlawful for two boats of this size, going in the same direction, to be in the Gate together, and shall hold that one liable for the consequent damages, which is responsible for the presence of two such boats alongside each other in that dangerous tideway.

The Providence is the vessel so responsible. When she reached the upper end of Blackwell's Island, and began to near Flood Rock, she was in the face of a passage which she could not lawfully undertake alongside the Narragansett. The Narragansett was still on her quarter, pursuing a lawful course, and not liable to be called on by the Providence to stop. The right of the Providence to keep on terminated at the entrance of the Gate, which she could not, under the circumstances, enter alone, and could not lawfully enter otherwise. Her duty, therefore, was to stop while she could. This duty was imposed upon her by the presence of the Gate immediately ahead, which she could not then go through in the only way the law would permit. Instead of stopping, the Providence kept on, and thus found herself in the position of attempting to pass the Narragansett in the Gate. Having undertaken a dangerous manoeuvre and sustained damages in the attempt, she cannot now call upon the Narragansett to reimburse her.

The case may be stated another way. At the Wall street ferry the Providence was in a position astern of the Narragansett. It being unlawful for two steamers to pass the Gate together, the Providence, when she passed through, was bound to be either in a position astern of the Narragansett or in a position ahead of her. She had an undoubted right to take the latter position, if her power would enable her to do so, but in point of fact she found herself unable to attain that position before she was called on to enter the Gate. Not having been able to place herself in one of the only two positions which the law would permit her to occupy in passing the Gate, she was bound to place herself in the other, by stopping. This is no new law. It was held in the case of The Governor and The Worcester, that a river steamer desiring to pass another one ahead, was bound to select a place for effecting it which would not expose the latter to injury, and if the leading vessel be so placed, that safe room is not left to pass her, the passing boat must stop and await the opening of a sufficient passage [Case No. 5,645].

So in the case of The Rhode Island [Case No. 11,745], it was held that a passing steamer was not entitled to exact from the other anything more than to hold her own course, and not to embarrass or impede the efforts to pass. These cases were referred to and approved by the supreme court of the United States in Whitney v. Dill, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 454, and they furnish the rule which was binding upon these steamers, and according to which the Providence must be held in fault.

It was contended on the part of the libellant, not very strenuously, however, that the amended regulation of the supervising inspectors, which was determined on in January, 1869, prior to this collision, but never promulgated until July after this collision, furnished the rule of navigation to be applied by the court in this case. The collision occurred on the 24th of April, 1869, at which time, as the evidence showed, none of these parties knew of any new regulation; and the copies of the regulation, which the act required should be signed by the inspectors and furnished to every vessel, had never in fact been issued or signed. I am of the opinion that under such a state of facts the regulation referred to cannot be said to have gone into effect. The deliberations of the supervising inspectors are not public.

They have, by law, power to make regulations, which the law also requires them to promulgate over their signatures. Until that is done, I do not think any regulation can be said to have been established as required by the statute. The libellants cannot, therefore, derive any advantage in this action from the new regulation.

A decree must accordingly be entered dismissing the libel, with costs.

[This case was taken to the circuit court by the libellants, on appeal, and the decree of this court affirmed. Case No. 10,018.]

APPEAL—COLLISION—DAMAGES—SALVAGE SERVICE — DAMAGE IN EFFORTS TO SAVE — LOSS OF SERVICES WHILE UNDERGOING REPAIR.

1. On an appeal in admiralty from the district court, in a case of collision, where the principle on which an allowance has been made by that court is sustained by authority, this court will not interfere with the amount of that allowance, unless it is very strikingly out of proportion to the service or damage.

2. Accordingly, in such a case, though some of the items allowed by the district court appeared large in amount, held, that this court would not disturb them.

3. Allowances for salvage service discussed. (Per Betts, District Judge.)

4. Where a vessel is disabled by a collision, damage suffered by her in the course of reasonable and proper efforts to save her, is a consequence of the condition in which she is left by the wrong-doer, and therefore properly chargeable in an action founded on the collision.

5. The value of the services of a vessel while she is undergoing necessary repairs for injuries received by collision, is to be allowed as part of the damage sustained by her owners.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

The owners of the sloop Corinthian and the owners of her cargo filed a joint libel in rem, in the district court, against the steamboat Narragansett, to recover damages for a collision. The case was this. On the 3d of January, 1845, the sloop sailed from New-Bedford, Mass., for New-York, with a cargo of sperm and whale oil, sperm candles, whalebone, soap, and spermaceti. She was heavily laden, and had a heavy deck load. About 8 o'clock p. m. on the 8th, while in Long Island Sound, about opposite Black Rock, and midway between the Long Island shore and the Connecticut shore, steering a south-west course, the wind being about west by north, the sloop came into collision with the steamboat. The latter was bound to the eastward. The bowsprit of the sloop was torn from its place, also her rail and bulwarks and windlass, and her bows were broken open, so that she sank in two or three minutes to the water's edge. The captain and mate and the two hands of the sloop got into her boat and remained by her till 5 o'clock a. m., and then rowed to Brookhaven, L. I., where they arrived about 9 a. m. The captain there procured two sloops, the Editor and the Emperor, to assist him. They were laid up in winter quarters, but crews were collected to man them, and about 11 a. m. they started for the Corinthian. When they got to her, about 1 p. m., some sloops and boats were picking up the cargo. Her deck load had been washed overboard, and she was capsized. The two sloops succeeded in righting her, and towed her into Black Rock, where they arrived the same evening about 9 o'clock. They worked till midnight in getting her ashore. Some of the cargo that was picked up was taken to Black Rock, some to Southport, and some to Bridgeport, but part of the deck load was never found. Where the Corinthian lay when the sloops reached her, was about nine miles from Brookhaven, and six miles from Black Rock. The captain of the Corinthian endeavored to make a bargain at Brookhaven with the masters and owners of the two sloops to go to the wreck. They refused to make any specific bargain, saying they could not tell how much their vessels would get damaged, or how much trouble they would have; but said they would go out and assist in getting the sloop in, and charge a fair compensation. The captain of the Corinthian made no offer to them of any distinct compensation. There were five or six men on board of each vessel. It was about seven days from the time of the collision till the Corinthian's cargo was discharged. The masters of the Editor and Emperor refused to give up the vessel or cargo, and instituted legal proceedings on their salvage claim, and the property was attached by an officer. The value of the property which the two sloops brought in was between eleven and twelve thousand dollars. The vessel and cargo, including the deck load picked up and brought in by others, were worth about $17,000. Under these circumstances, Mr. Jones, an insurance broker in New-York, who was employed by the underwriters to look after the wreck, allowed the Editor and Emperor $800 in settlement of their salvage claims, with the approval of the master of the Corinthian. Two schooners, the Despatch and the Union, were employed to convey the cargo from Black Rock to New-York, about seventy miles distance. They were paid $60 each, being for four days' services at $15 per day. The Corinthian, after her cargo was discharged, was temporarily repaired at Black Rock, and was then taken to New-Bedford for thorough repair, because the work could be done there better and cheaper. It took a month or more from the time of the collision before the sloop could be got up to the wharf at New-Bedford, so that the crew could be discharged, and it was then some time before she could be got to the ship-yard, because of the ice. She was hauled up for repairs on the 9th of March, and launched on the 2d of June. About half of the time she was under repair was occupied in making repairs that had no connection with the injuries caused by the collision. It was proved that such a vessel as the Corinthian could earn $200 per month, net profits. The capsizing of the Corinthian during the absence of her captain and crew at Brookhaven occurred in this way. The steamboat Eureka came alongside of the sloop, fastened a hawser to her, and attempted to tow her. She steered very well for a few minutes, but the cargo on deck got against her tiller and jammed it hard down, so as to give her a shear, and she capsized. The hawser was then cut, and the Eureka left. The deck load went overboard when the sloop capsized. The Corinthian was fifteen years old at the time of the accident, was in good order, had been thoroughly repaired two years before, had a new hull, a new mast, and new sails, and was of eighty-two tons burthen. It was proved that when new she would cost about $6,000; and that after the collision and before she was repaired, she was worth $1,000 to $1,200, and after she was repaired $3,500 to $4,000.

The district court decreed that the steamboat was in fault on the occasion of the collision, and the sloop without fault; that the libellants were entitled to recover their direct damages caused by the act of the steamboat; that on adjusting the damage in respect to the sloop, she was to be replaced at the expense of the claimants, substantially in the same situation she was in when injured; that the fair and reasonable cost of her necessary reparation was, under ordinary circumstances, to be referred to as measuring the damages with reasonable certainty; that the same principle applied to the cargo—the parts of it destroyed or lost by the collision to be paid for at their fair value, and the parts saved to be deducted, at their value as saved, less the reasonable and actual expenses of saving, from the amount estimated as a total loss; that no distinction was to be made in respect to the liability of the claimants for those parts of the cargo on deck which were deteriorated or lost by the capsizing of the sloop during the endeavors made by the steamboat Eureka to tow her into port; that the owners of the sloop should recover the amount of injury done to her, including a just proportion of the reasonable and actual salvage expenses and disbursements; and that the owners of the cargo should recover the value of the parts of the cargo owned by them respectively which were lost, and the amount of injury done to the parts saved, including a just proportion of the reasonable and actual expenses and disbursements included in the salvage of the same; and it was referred to a commissioner to ascertain and report the amounts. [Case No. 10,019.]

The commissioner reported that there was to be paid to the owners of the sloop $2,147.87, and to the owners of the cargo $2,960.01. He allowed $2,029.87 as salvage expenses, to be apportioned among the several owners of the vessel and cargo. On exception to his report by the claimants, the court disallowed $510.05 of the amount reported as salvage expenses, and a further item of $50 in the amount reported as due to the owners of the sloop. But among the items allowed by the court as salvage expenses, notwithstanding the claimants' exception, was the $800 paid to the sloops Editor and Emperor, and the $120 paid to the schooners Despatch and Union. The court also allowed to the owners of the vessel, under the claimants' exception, $500 for the value of the services of the sloop to her owners for two months and a half while she was undergoing repairs. [Case No. 10,020.]

In the district court, Betts, District Judge, in delivering the opinion of the court upon the exceptions taken by the claimants to the commissioner's report, said:

"The first objection touches the allowance of $800 paid the two sloops, the Editor and Emperor, for assisting in raising the Corinthian and towing her into Black Rock harbor. The claimants insist this was no salvage service, and that the amount is exorbitant as a quantum meruit, or compensation on the footing of wages earned. The work turned out to be of no great duration or hazard to the vessels or persons employed; but those particulars do not settle the character of the service and necessarily withdraw it from the class of maritime and salvage claims. Relief to a wrecked vessel does not lose its grade of salvage service, although it may be of the lowest character, and merit compensation only by measure of daily wages. The Emulous [Case No. 4,480]; Bearse v. 340 Pigs of Copper [Id. 1,193]; The Hector, 3 Hagg. Adm. 90; The Industry, Id. 203; The Clifton, Id. 120. In neither of the five cases cited, was the situation of the salved property so perilous as that of the Corinthian and her cargo, nor were the services rendered greater in extent or in hazard to the salvors.

"In this case, the owners of the two sloops arrested the Corinthian for their compensation, and their claim was adjusted by the master of the Corinthian, with the approval of Mr. Jones, agent of the underwriters, at $800. Those parties thought the compromise advantageous to all concerned in the wreck. Adjustment of salvage claims on the spot, by parties who suppose they are acting for their own interest, though not binding upon third parties, will yet be regarded favorably by maritime courts, as affording, probably, a safer rule of valuation than can be gathered from the ex parte depositions of witnesses. In view of the probable risk of the enterprise, and the value of the property saved, and the promptitude of the service rendered I am not inclined to disturb that adjustment, and am satisfied with the judgment of Mr. Jones that the arrangement was fair and just under the circumstances.

"The next exception is to the allowances to the schooners Union and Despatch. I do not think they should be restricted to mere ordinary freight, but it is reasonable and proper, under the circumstances of their employment, to allow them a compensation of $15 per day, each, for the time occupied in loading, transporting and unloading the cargo.

"The last point in dispute is an allowance of $500 for the value of the services of the vessel, which were lost to her owners while she was undergoing repairs. This particular is necessarily a good deal vague in itself. It is not to be expected that the evidence can fix with exactness the time indispensable for the repair of the injured vessel, or where the work could be most advantageously done, or the value of her services during the period of her disablement. These particulars must rest in a good degree upon estimates. I think the judgment of the witnesses examined on this subject, justifies the conclusion adopted by the commissioner, and I shall allow his report in this behalf to stand."

From the final decree of the district court the claimants appealed to this court.

Francis B. Cutting and Charles B. Moore, for libellants.

J. Prescott Hall and William M. Evarts, for claimants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. I have examined the several questions presented in this cause, arising out of the damages decreed by the court below, and see no sufficient ground for disturbing the allowances made. Some of the items appear large, but the principles upon which they have been allowed, seem to be sustained by authority. I cannot interfere with the amount unless it is very strikingly out of proportion to the service or damage.

The additional damage arising out of the upsetting of the Corinthian in the attempt made by the Eureka to tow her into harbor, is perhaps a close question. But the accident does not appear to have occurred from the use of improper means, or from proper means being unskilfully or negligently used. Damage arising from reasonable and proper efforts to save the disabled vessel, is a consequence of the condition in which she is left by the wrong-doer, and is therefore properly chargeable.

The item for the loss of the services of the vessel while undergoing necessary repairs, seems to be a proper allowance, according to the maritime law, which is less stringent in this respect than the common law. The loss of wages is to be taken into account, as part of the damage sustained. Decree affirmed.

COLLISION—VESSEL OVERTAKING—DUTY.

Two steamboats, the P. and the N., bound from New York, to go through Hell Gate, proceeded up the East river, the P. astern. On entering Hell Gate, the stem of the P., which was the faster boat, and the longer boat, had reached to a few feet in advance of the stem of the N.; the stern of the P. was not up to the stern of the N. The two vessels collided, and the P. was injured: Held, under article 17 of the rules in the act of April 29, 1864 (13 Stat. 61), that the P., as the overtaking vessel, was bound to keep out of the way of the N., and that the P. was in fault, and the N. was not in fault.

In admiralty.

Abbett & Fuller, for libellants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The steamboat Providence, belonging to the libellants, and the steamboat Narragansett, were freight and passenger boats, running from the port of New York, through the East river and Long Island Sound, the former to Newport and Fall River, and the latter to Stonington. The berth or dock of the former was at the foot of Chambers street, on the North river, and the berth of the latter was at the foot of Jay street, on the North river, two piers, or about four hundred feet, higher up the river. The hour of departure for both was five o'clock in the afternoon. On the 24th day of April, 1869, the Providence started about twenty minutes after five, and, when partly out of her slip, the Narragansett started from her slip above. They proceeded towards the Battery, the Narragansett astern of the Providence, but, on nearing the Battery, the Providence, meeting a tow and other vessels, took a broad circuit, down to near Governor's Island, and over to very near the Brooklyn wharves, and then took her course up the East river, still, however, near the Brooklyn shore. As the Narragansett, much the shorter boat, neared the Battery, an opening presented itself, and she swung around close to the Battery, and took her course up the East river near the New York side of the river. The Providence was the faster boat, when each was at full speed. The speed of neither, while making their turns and passing up to Hell Gate, is given with much precision, by the testimony, but it is clear, upon all the evidence, that, when they were opposite Thirty-Fourth street, they were near each other, and the bow of the Providence lapped the after part of the Narragansett. There is great conflict, in the evidence, in regard to the relative position of the two bows before that time, as well as thence onward, until they were in Hell Gate; but, although the stem of the Providence was, while passing along Blackwell's Island, and on entering Hell Gate, a few feet in advance of the stem of the other boat, the testimony will not warrant the conclusion, that, in any part of that portion of their passage, the stern of the Providence was, at any time, up to the stern of the other. They entered Hell Gate thus, side by side, the stem of the Providence a few feet in advance, and to the starboard, of the Narragansett. In that dangerous, narrow and crooked channel, just after turning Hallett's Point, the Narragansett was drawn towards the Providence by what the witnesses call the suction of the latter, and her guards, at about midships, broke into the side of the upper works of the Providence, inflicting upon her the injury for which indemnity is sought in this cause. In the district court, the libel of her owners was dismissed [Case No. 10,016], and the libellants appealed to this court.

There is evidence tending to show that the Providence unnecessarily crowded upon the Narragansett, where it was easy and safe to have kept off more to the starboard, and that the Narragansett was, in fact, as far to port as was safe, and further than was ordinarily prudent. It is, on the other hand, denied, that the Providence did not give the other all the room consistent with safety to herself. If it was at all material to the decision, I should be constrained to find, upon the evidence, that the Providence brought the injury upon herself, by needlessly crowding to port, and upon the other boat, and ought to bear the consequences. But, in truth, the boats ought not to have been in any such position, in so narrow and difficult a passage, among the rocks of Hell Gate.

I concur fully in the opinion of the judge of the district court, which places the decision upon other and conclusive grounds. The decided preponderance of the evidence establishes, that the Providence, by her long circuit around, near Governor's Island and the Brooklyn wharves, was astern of the Narragansett, when the boats respectively straightened up the East river. She endeavored, and her somewhat greater speed enabled her, to come up with the other boat, so as to place herself in the position first above described; but, she at no time passed the other. She was, therefore, under the full operation of article seventeenth of the rules of navigation, enacted April 29, 1864 (13 Stat. 61): "Every vessel overtaking any other vessel shall keep out of the way of the said last-mentioned vessel." It was her duty to keep out of the way of the Narragansett; and the next following rule made it the duty of the latter to keep her course. True, it is not the duty of a faster boat to remain behind when she overtakes a slower one; but she takes upon herself the risk and hazard of passing. She must choose a safe and sufficiently wide place, where it may be done with safety to both, the slower vessel doing nothing to prevent, other than keeping her own course. It is not enough, that the faster vessel has so far succeeded as to come alongside, or even project her bow beyond the bow of the other, so as to make it probable that she will pass. If she does this and persists, she does it at her peril. The rule has not then ceased to operate upon her. That rule is explicit, and neither greater speed, nor an attempt to dictate to the other, will excuse her, if collision ensues. It is not necessary to enquire whether any rule of the supervising inspectors would relieve her, if she violate this express statute; for, here, it is proved, that no rule had, at the time of this collision, been promulgated, which is in conflict with this view. It is unnecessary for me to repeat the further views of the rights, the conduct or the duty of the two vessels, expressed in the opinion of the court below. They are, I think, conclusive. Let the libel be dismissed, with costs, including costs of the appeal.

The NARRAGANSETT.

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 1846.

COLLISION—WRONGFULLY IN TRACK—CONSEQUENTIAL DAMAGES—STEAMER AND SAIL VESSEL—LOSS IN ATTEMPTING TO SAVE.

1. If a steamer wrongfully placed herself in the track of another vessel, and in such circumstances as allowed the other no chance of avoiding a collision, the former is answerable for all the damages which might have been occasioned by her running into the other.

2. In case of collision, the party injured is entitled to recover the actual damages sustained, but cannot claim such as are merely consequential.

[Cited in brief in Austin v. New Jersey Steamboat Co., 43 N. Y. 78.]

3. If a steamer and sailing vessel are approaching each other in such directions that a collision may be reasonably apprehended, it is the duty of the steamer to take proper precautions for avoiding the sailing vessel, particularly so if the latter be close-hauled on a wind.

[Cited in The Cornelius C. Vanderbilt, Case No. 3,235.]

4. In determining the merits in a case of collision, the court will look chiefly to the facts in proof, and will pay but slight attention to the opinions and hypotheses of witnesses, especially those of each ship's company, in respect to the acts of the other.

5. Witnesses upon a vessel in motion, looking at another also in motion, cannot determine by the eye, unaided otherwise, with reliable exactness, either her course, distance or speed.

6. Plans and diagrams, intended to exhibit the courses, bearings and distances of two vessels approaching each other, are of no value as evidence, when framed merely upon the conjecture or opinion of witnesses as to the speed, relative bearing and distances of the vessels.

7. The actual damages sustained by a collision at sea are to be paid by the faulty vessel, both in respect to ship and cargo.

8. The colliding vessel is not exonerated from full damages, because after the wreck a portion of the cargo was injured or lost through the efforts of a third vessel to save it.

BETTS, District Judge. This was a case of collision. The sloop Corinthian, proceeding from New-Bedford to New-York, and the steamboat Narragansett, going in an opposite direction, up the Sound, came in collision on the night of January 8, 1845, in the middle of Long Island Sound, about opposite the harbor of Southport, on the Connecticut shore, in consequence of which the sloop was almost immediately sunk. This action seeks to recover the damages incurred thereby, with the expense of subsequently raising and saving the vessel, and also the damages and loss sustained by her cargo. By the pleadings, each party exonerates himself and imputes all the fault to the other; and the testimony, by persons on the respective vessels, and concerned in their management, is in direct opposition in respect to the acts of the vessels and the cause of the disaster. Their testimony, however, generally consists more in criticisms on the doings on the opposite vessel, than a clear statement of their own acts. The opinions and inferences of witnesses on a vessel under way, in relation to the manoeuvres of another also in motion, afford no satisfactory or reliable evidence of the actual facts of the transaction. This is especially so, if the occurrence be in the night, and the observations are made when the two are closely approximating each other. Courts accordingly, in this class of controversies, look most sedulously to the facts sworn to, independent of the judgment of witnesses, and in that aspect the knowledge of the witness is usually confined to what was done, ordered, or attempted to be done on his particular ship. It is out of the disaccord and clashing of these statements with the result, rather than the jarring opinions of the respective witnesses, that the court must determine where the fault lay. Twenty witnesses were examined, at large, between the parties on the hearing, and taking in view the pleadings in the case, and giving credit to the testimony of the master and mate of the sloop, and the two pilots and wheelsman on board the steamer, in their statements of any act done by them on board their respective vessels, I find the facts touching the collision of the vessels to be these: That the wind was west by north, light and dying away. That the sloop was deep loaded, and standing on a course about southwest by the compass, holding as close to the wind as she could lay, and was making about three knots the hour. The steamboat was steering east northeast, proceeding at the rate of about ten miles the hour. She had lights set in her bows and aloft, and was first seen from the sloop twenty or thirty minutes before the collision, and was then supposed to be eight or ten miles off. The sloop set a light in her rigging, which was seen from the steamboat one or two miles distance. The sloop held her course without deviation to the instant the collision was seen to be inevitable, and then her helm was thrown hard a starboard, but not in time to make any change in her direction perceptible to those on board. The steamboat, when the light of the sloop was descried, bore off one point south. The sloop, when next noticed by her, appeared to be coming head on to the steamer, and in the act of striking her at right angles. The wheel of the latter was instantly jammed over, by two men, with a view to wear her off, the vessels coming together nearly at the instant, and before the steamboat had yielded to her helm to any serviceable extent.

This statement of facts, if the case is to rest on them, would clearly prove the steamboat in fault. It was first her duty to take timely means to avoid the sailing vessel, and not press upon her so as to put her in jeopardy or alarm. The Shannon, 2 Hagg. Adm. 173; The Perth, 3 Hagg. Adm. 414. And, moreover, according to all the authorities, and upon the reason of the subject matter, the sloop could rightfully rely upon the steamer using due precaution to avoid her, and adhere to her course, particularly she being close-hauled upon the wind, and it would be incumbent on the steamer to adopt the measures which would leave her secure. Story, Bailm. §§ 608, 609, 611; The Thames, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 345; The Woodrop-Sims, 2 Dod. 83; The Jupiter, 3 Hagg. Adm. 320; The Chester, Id. 317; The Diana, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 131; The Harriett, Id. 182, 7 La. 222. The officers of the steamer seemed aware of the obligation, and attempt, in their evidence, to clear themselves of blameable conduct in their approach upon the sloop and the collision. Her pilots and wheelsman testify that the sloop, four or five minutes previous to reaching the steamer, changed her course, keeping off to the south, seeing which, the wheelsman says, two minutes before the blow was received, the pilot had seized hold of the wheel, and ordered it shoved hard a port, the sloop having gone off full to the south. Both these witnesses testify that the sloop, when they first discovered her, was off north from them, two points on the weather bow, steering southwest, or west southwest. It is proved that the bowsprit of the sloop, in the act of collision, crossed the deck of the steamboat nearly at right angles at the after-part of the forward gangway. The latter fact, it is contended, corroborates the evidence of the witnesses that the sloop had changed her course, and they allege that this wrongful manoeuvre caused the collision.

The witnesses on the other side represent the steamboat to have come upon the starboard quarter of the sloop, nearly stem on, and then as she passed by, in clearing her, pressed her round, bearing against the bowsprit, and wrenching it out of its bed and fastenings. The shipwright who repaired the sloop supported this version of the transaction, judging it must be so, from the appearance and place of the wound on the sloop, and the condition of the bowsprit and its fastenings. But the shipwright and others, who examined the steamboat the day after the collision, testify that they could discover no mark on her stem, not even the rubbing of its paint, and, in their opinion, the injuries could not have been inflicted by the striking of her stem against the sloop; but in their judgment the injury resulted in part from her lifting the bowsprit of the sloop out of its place, and chiefly by the wheels of the steamer breaking the timbers and beating in the starboard quarter of the sloop, as the two vessels hung alongside, and were separating from each other, the steamboat being high enough out of water, and having been kept under full way until after the separation of the two.

It does not appear to me, however, that the bearing of these facts authorizes the conclusion that the sloop had previously varied her course, or even if, at the instant, the movement of her rudder had slightly altered it, that she thereby became answerable for the collision. Various diagrams have been exhibited, and computations of bearings and distances have been made to demonstrate that the vessels could not have been brought in contact under their relative speed and bearings, if, according to the rule of evidence, greatest credit is given to the outnumbering witnesses on the side of the claimants, in those particulars, in which the two classes differ. I confess I place slender confidence in this description of proof. The inferences from it depend wholly on the accuracy of the elements on which the computation is made, and a mis-estimate in trivial particulars of the courses, or distances, or speed of the two vessels, would take away all value from the hypotheses and conclusions upon which the plans are based. For instance, no confident reliance can be placed on the conjecture in this case, that the sloop was two points on the weather bow of the steamer, and one and a half miles off, when first descried from her. It was in the night, the bearings were not taken by compass, and no other examination was made than merely a glance at the sloop. These considerations would prevent the evidence having any important effect, however intelligent and confident the witnesses might be. The main witnesses, in this instance, do not concur in the cardinal facts. The pilot inferred the sloop was one distance, and the wheelsman, observing her at the same moment, judged she was a greater one, the two differing from a half to a mile. In exhibiting the positions of the vessels, on a chart or diagram, those variations necessarily destroy all certainty in the calculations and conclusions attempted to be founded upon them. It is far more satisfactory to reject these surmises and conjectures, and resort to the facts in proof to ascertain with which party, if either, the fault rests.

In my judgment the facts show a want of due precaution and proper management on the part of the steamer on this occasion. The pilot was aware the sloop was approaching him on a fresh wind, at a rate which, coupled with his speed and their short distance, either one or two miles apart, must bring the two vessels across the same line almost instantaneously, for, on his lowest estimate, they were approaching at a conjoined speed of a mile in from two to four minutes. These facts demanded of him the utmost vigilance and alertness, and he was inexcusable in not instantly taking such course as would place both vessels out of danger. So, also, it is clear, upon the testimony of the experienced nautical experts, Captains Thayer and Comstock, examined by the claimant, that it was the duty of the pilot, in the position of the two vessels, to have gone north of the sloop, or to have borne off more than one point, if intending to pass south of her. This should have been manifest to him, for on his own testimony, the bearing of the two was such that if the steamer had not changed her course, she must have come upon the sloop head on, and run her directly under. He regards it a happy movement that he swung off the steamer one point or more, thereby rescuing the sloop from certain destruction by a direct blow. But the proof is clear that the sloop had made no change of her course when the steamer bore off. Her pilot misapprehended the relative position of the two until nearly in the act of striking. Instead of passing her half a mile to the south, as he supposed he should do, by bearing off one point, his course, until that alteration, must have been directly on her, and the only effect probably produced by the change he made was to convert a perpendicular blow into one slightly glancing or oblique. The steamer, then, taking a direction east by north, and the sloop holding about southwest, would, as her stem passed the sloop, bring her beam nearly at right angles with the bow of the sloop, so that the bowsprit of the latter might cross the deck, as asserted by the witnesses who traced the mark. They do not state it to have been exactly at right angles to the steamer's side, but rather oblique towards her stern. Be the angle of contact what it may, I do not accede to the argument of the claimant's counsel that its direction is a demonstration that the sloop must have been heading south, or that her movement was the cause of the collision. Had she been at anchor, the drift and headway of the steamer passing under her bowsprit, might have produced a collision exhibiting the same external marks, though probably with less disastrous consequences. Nor is it of any importance in respect to the rights and liabilities of the two vessels, whether the sloop came into the steamer, or the latter ran upon the former. The steamer had wrongfully placed herself in the sloop's track, under circumstances leaving the latter no means of avoiding her. A collision, thus occasioned, would subject the steamer and owners to the same responsibilities as if the damage had been given by her running upon the sloop.

I do not think it important to discuss the differences between witnesses as to which vessel was to the north of the other when they came in sight, or what their actual bearing might be to each other's bows. I put the case essentially upon this, that the steamboat did not take due precautionary measures to avoid the sloop after it was ascertained the two vessels were running on courses which must bring them speedily across each other's track. In the night time, and in the uncertainty as to the velocity and proximity of the vessels, the duty of the steamboat was to go astern of the sloop, and not attempt to run under her bows; and though her pilot acted under the persuasion he could do it safely, and leave large room to the sloop to pass, the steamer must take the responsibility of the error in judgment, particularly as the claimants are unable to prove the sloop guilty of any fault contributing to the collision. Captain Comstock was called to prove that the mate of the sloop gave a statement of the occurrence, immediately after the collision, in which he admitted the sloop had changed her course, and payed off her sheet, and that the two vessels came together at right angles, the bowsprit of the sloop running into the steamer's beam. The testimony is adverted to now only in elucidation of the justness of the rule which enjoins the strictest caution in acting upon proof of declarations or admissions of parties or witnesses; for although Captain Comstock thus makes the testimony given by the mate, before a commissioner, stand in open contradiction with that declaration, yet it is palpable that Captain Comstock is mistaken in his recollection, and that some other impression on his mind has been substituted for what he heard from the mate. He was employed to attend the examination of the mate before a commissioner, and was, at the time of the conversation, travelling in company with him, for that purpose, and says he paid very particular attention to the whole of his deposition, taken immediately after those admissions; that the mate was a very intelligent man, and seemed honest and candid, and that what he stated upon that examination corresponded exactly with the declarations he had so made to the witness. The impressions he then received, and under such circumstances, would be much more to be depended on than those collected from his memory a year after the event, and without association with a written record, to test the accuracy of his remembrance; and instead of operating as an impeachment of the mate's testimony, amounts to a strong confirmation of its truth.

The libellants are entitled to recover their actual damages incurred by the act of the steamboat, but they cannot claim damages that are remote and merely consequential. The collision caused the vessel and her cargo to sink, and, had they been thus wholly lost, the damages would have been the value of the two. The Iron Duke, 9 Jur. 476. In so far as the libellants have succeeded in rescuing either, to that extent the liability of the respondents is reduced or discharged. There can be no difficulty, under the rule, in adjusting the damages incurred by the sloop itself; she is to be replaced at the expense of the respondents substantially in the condition she was when injured, and the cost of her reparation will ordinarily measure with reasonable certainty, the amount of damage. The same principle applies to the cargo. That portion lost by the collision must be paid for at its fair value, and that rescued is to be deducted at its value as saved (including expenses of saving) from the amount estimated as a total loss. In other words, the libellants take the cargo rescued at its net value, and recover damages commensurate to that not restored.

A question is raised in respect to the liability of the steamer for part of the cargo on deck, which was deteriorated or lost, by the capsizing of the sloop in an endeavor made to tow her into port by the steamer Eureka. It is alleged that the unskillful and improper manner of conducting the salvage caused the loss, and that accordingly it was only consequential to the collision; or if the deterioration or actual loss is chargeable against the steamer, she is not liable for the expenses incurred in recovering that part of the cargo lost overboard on such attempt to save the sloop. I perceive no reason for a distinction in this respect, in favor of the steamer. If the Eureka had committed an act of trespass, or wilful wrong, it might be different. But she found the vessel under water, apparently abandoned, and applied those measures in her aid which seemed best calculated to afford relief. A hawser was carried out to her from the steamer, and efforts were then made to tow her into a harbor. The cargo had so shifted, however, as to render the sloop innavigable; after moving her a short distance, and finding she was careening, the hawser was cut, and the sloop remained under water, most of her deck load having in the operation, gone overboard. I do not think a fruitless effort to save the wreck, made in good faith, and so far as appears with good judgment, though leading, by its failure, perhaps to additional expense and loss to the wreck or cargo, can be regarded as wrongfully causing such damage, and thus exonerating the steamer from it. The mode of saving the vessel and cargo ultimately adopted was doubtless the most efficacious and judicious, but in the absence of the means afterwards obtained and applied, it could not be blameable to try any other at command which afforded a reasonable promise of success. In the then condition of vessel and cargo, those efforts were all apparently for the interests of the claimants. They being liable, in the first instance, for the entire value of both, their loss would be diminished in proportion to the amount of the property saved. Efforts directed alone to the saving of the wreck, although resulting disadvantageously and imposing enhanced expense in its final rescue, do not change the nature of the injury, and substitute a new cause and liability in place of the colliding ship. I shall, accordingly, decree for the libellants, to the amount of the injury done the sloop, the value of the property lost, and the expenses and disbursements necessarily incurred in the salvage of that which was preserved. The particulars will be more conveniently ascertained by a commissioner, and I shall order a reference for that purpose.

[NOTE. The commissioner's report was sustained by the court. Case No. 10,020. The cause was subsequently taken to the circuit court by the claimants on an appeal, from the final decree of the district court as to damages, which decree was affirmed in Case No. 10,017.]

Case No. 10,020.

The NARRAGANSETT.

[Olc. 388.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Sept., 1846.[2]

COLLISION — DAMAGES — FULL RECOMPENSE — SALVAGE EXPENSES—COMMISSIONER'S REPORT.

1. Damages caused by a collision will be awarded against the colliding vessel, adequate to the full recompense of the injured vessel and cargo.

2. The loss of the use of the injured vessel whilst undergoing repairs is so directly consequential to the collision as to be entitled to compensation.

3. The owners of the injured vessel will be allowed salvage expenses and other charges necessarily paid by them in rescuing the vessel and cargo from perils they were placed in by the collision.

[Cited in The Rhode Island, Case No. 11,740a.]

4. Services of a salvage character, expended in saving and restoring the injured vessel and cargo, will be compensated by salvage rewards, and not limited to a quantum meruit for mere work and labor.

5. A bona fide adjustment of such claims and charges between parties interested in the vessel and cargo, will be accepted by the court as a proper mode of fixing the value of the services.

6. The commissioner's report of damages, when parties have been fully heard before him with their proofs, and no question of law is involved in his decision, will be adopted by the court, unless palpable errors or inadvertencies have been committed by him.

The commissioner, in his report of the damages sustained by the libellants by occasion of the collision sued for in this cause [see Case No. 10,019], made allowances for salvage compensations paid by the libellants to other persons and vessels for aiding to save and secure their vessel and cargo wrecked by the collision; for all direct damages and injury to the sloop and cargo, and also the consequential damages sustained by loss of the use and services of the vessel during the time she was out of employment for the purpose of repairs, &c. The claimants excepted to all these classes of allowances.

F. B. Cutting, for libellants.

J. P. Hall and W. M. Evarts, for claimants.

BETTS, District Judge. The report of the commissioner made in the cause, pursuant to the decree of the court upon the merits [Case No. 10,019], having been filed, the claimants excepted to it in various particulars, but more generally the exceptions call in question the amount of allowances stated than the principles adopted by the commissioner in making them.

The case was submitted to the court on the evidence before the commissioner, and written arguments of the counsel. As a general rule, a commissioner's report of damages upon the facts only, will be adopted by the court, unless errors or inadvertencies in his valuation are clearly established by the excepting party. It will be useless, in this case, to set forth twenty or thirty exceptions in detail, which these claimants have filed to the report. The essential ones will only be considered. Exception is taken to the allowances of a salvage compensation made two sloops, (the Emperor and Elector,) employed by the libellants to assist in raising the wrecked vessel and cargo, and towing them into Black Rock harbor. It rests on two objections: first, that no salvage service was rendered by the vessels; and second, that the allowances are exorbitant as a quantum meruit. The vessels were engaged in the service but a short time, and neither they or the crews were exposed to hazardous or severe services. These particulars do not, however, determine the character of the service, nor necessarily withdraw it from the class of salvage claims. Judge Story held, in The Emulous [Case No. 4,480], that whenever the service has been rendered in saving property on the sea, the service is, in the sense of the maritime law, a salvage service; and in a later case he adds, that compensation for such services is not to be estimated upon the footing of a mere quantum meruit for work and labor upon the dry principles of the common law, but upon the footing of a quantum meruit upon the enlarged principles and policy of maritime jurisprudence in salvage causes. Bearse v. 340 Pigs of Copper [Id. 1,193]. The rule in the English admiralty is of the same tenor. Sir John Nicholl rewarded as a salvage service the taking of an anchor to a ship coming into the Downs, by a lugger under contract to procure it from Dover and put it on board the ship. The anchor was necessary to the safety of the ship in her then condition. The lugger encountered heavy wind in a dark night in taking out the anchor. It was objected that the service was slight, and not of a salvage character. The judge held this a salvage service not to be paid for merely as work and labor; when fairly and honestly rendered, it is to be liberally rewarded without a minute inquiry into the quantum of labor. The Hector, 3 Hagg. Adm. 90. In another case he says, salvage reward is not a mere question of work and labor—not a mere calculation of hours. The Industry, Id. 203. In The Clifton, Id. 121, he enumerates the chief ingredients of a salvage service, some of which are prominent in the present case, with the reservation that where none or scarcely any of those ingredients exist, the compensation can hardly be denominated a salvage compensation; it is little more than a mere remuneration pro opere et labore. These cases present a succinct recapitulation of the doctrines which have always prevailed in this court, and sufficiently mark the distinction between salvage services and pilot services, or ordinary services of work and labor.

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 10,017.]

In neither of the cases above cited was the situation of the salved property so perilous as that of the Corinthian and her cargo, nor were the services rendered greater in extent or hazard to the salvors or their vessels. The Emperor and Elector had been laid up; crews had to be collected, to man and fit them for this service; yet they were made ready and got alongside the wreck within three or four hours after the first notice and application to them. This was mid-winter. The wreck was found, when the sloops got to her, capsized and filled with water, and by their assistance she was righted and towed by them into Black Rock. The owners of the sloop attached the Corinthian at that place for their compensation, and their claims were adjusted by her master, with the approval of Mr. Jones, agent of the underwriters upon her, at $800. Those parties thought the compromise advantageous to all concerned in the vessel and cargo. An adjustment of salvage services by parties on the spot, who are dealing for their own interest, though not binding on parties not present or represented, will yet be regarded favorably by maritime courts, as affording probably a safer rule of valuation than can be gathered from the depositions of witnesses.

In view of the probable risk of the enterprise, and the value of the property saved, and the promptitude with which the succor was rendered, I am not inclined to disturb that adjustment. I concur in the judgment of Mr. Jones and the master of the wreck, that the arrangement was fair and just under the circumstances. The exception to this point is accordingly overruled.

The exception to the second and third items, being allowances to the schooners Union and Dispatch, to each $120, is in part well sustained. Those charges include a compensation for freight carried, and also for employment per diem, to search for the wrecked property. The vessels cannot come in on the footing of salvors upon claims for unsuccessful efforts to rescue or find the wrecked property. Their charges must be limited to services rendered by them beneficial to the wreck. The contract made with them by the insurance offices to search for the wreck cannot rightfully be thrown on the cargo or vessel, when neither is proved to have derived any advantage from it. [Talbot v. Leeman] 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 1; [The Alerta v. Moran] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 367; Clarke v. The Dodge Healy [Case No. 2,849]; The Henry Ewbank [Id. 6,376]. I do not think the vessels should be restricted to mere ordinary freight; it is reasonable and proper, under the circumstances of their employment, to allow a per diem compensation for the time occupied in loading, transferring and re-loading the cargo. This was a special undertaking very different from the regular business of carrying freight; but, on the evidence, I consider $15 per day a reasonable remuneration for the time employed transporting and securing the cargo, and raise the allowance in the report to that amount.

The court does not intend, by this distinction, to discountenance the employment of vessels by the day in efforts to aid wrecked vessels to avoid salvage charges by others; nor to suggest that those expenditures may not be taken in account on a general average between the ship-owner and freighters. But I discover no principle which permits a charge to be laid on the vessel or cargo for a precautionary employment of other vessels, unattended with actual aid to the property in distress. Before these sloops discovered the wreck, she was safely in port, and their connection with it was to wait until the cargo could be unladen and transferred to them, and then to transport it a distance of seventy miles to New-York. The testimony does not fix clearly the time the sloops were engaged in the carriage of the cargo, but, without creating the expense of sending the case back to the commissioner for new proofs to that point, I shall assume, upon the evidence before me, that four days to each sloop would cover all the time reasonably required in the service performed, and shall accordingly reduce the allowance of the commissioner in these particulars to $60 for each vessel.

I think the exceptions to the allowance of items 4, 5, 12, 13, 16 and 17 are well taken. The decree contemplates only the payment of salvage reward, and though in the mode of stating those charges some of them would appear to include services which might fairly fall under that head, yet the proofs do not specify the quality or extent of those acts, so that the court can discriminate and apply a proper compensation to each. Items 4, 5 and 12 are of that character, and must accordingly be rejected. The other particulars embraced in those items, and the accompanying charges in 13, 16 and 17, not being any of them proved to have a necessary or just relation to the salvage of the property wrecked, must also be rejected. The damages decreed against the steamboat compose a fund out of which each party sustaining losses is to take his proper share. The report appears to have been made up upon the assumption that the steamboat contributing this fund is also bound to pay the charges of settling between the common claimants their respective interests in it. This is a mistake. The owners of the steamboat have no concern with, and cannot rightfully participate in that question. Accordingly, they ought not to be subjected to any of the charges incurred in making that distribution.

The principle involved in the last exceptions allowed will also dispose of that to the charges of R. Gibbs, Jr., for travelling expenses. It is not proved that there was any necessary or reasonable relation between those services and the salvage of the wrecked property. Upon the testimony they are rather to be referred to the condition of the claims of the respective libellants and underwriters between themselves, and would more appropriately belong to general average allowances than salvage claims. These items are accordingly disallowed. The exception to the allowance made for injury to sails, cordage bill, painting and rigging, in all, $319.26, must be overruled. The testimony of Sheppard, Watkins and Hillman sufficiently supports these charges. The collision rendered it necessary to put this class of repairs on the vessel, and although the proof is not positive that they no more than reinstated the vessel in the condition she was before collision, yet the moderate amount charged, and the proof that such reparations were necessary, is evidence enough, in the first instance, to support the claim, none being offered by the claimants tending to show an overcharge. 2 Hagg. Adm. 90. I shall, therefore, allow that amount.

The last point in dispute is the allowance of $500 for the value of the services and use of the vessel lost to the owners whilst she was undergoing repairs. This is a subject for valuation and allowance, because the owner of the injured vessel is entitled to a full reparation of the injuries and losses caused by the collision. [The Apollon] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 362; 2 Hagg. Adm. 30. Questions of consequential damages are necessarily vague in their nature. It is not to be expected that the evidence can fix with exactness the time indispensable for the repair of the injured vessel, nor where the work could be most advantageously done, or the value of her use to the owner during the period of her disablement. Those particulars must rest, in a good degree, upon estimates; and although there is a diversity of opinion with the witnesses, I think the conclusion adopted by the commissioner is reasonably sustained by the proofs, and accordingly I shall allow his report in this behalf to stand.

These rulings upon the exceptions will require $559.05 to be deducted from the sum of $2,147.87, reported payable to the libellants, and the decree will be entered in affirmance of the residue of the report, with costs.

NASH v. LE CLERCQ et al.

[2 Cin. Law Bul. 146.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. 1877.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—SUIT TO SET ASIDE—VENDOR'S LIENS—DEED WITH CONDITION SUBSEQUENT.

[1. A mortgage given by a debtor to secure his indorsers, a few days before making an assignment, and under circumstances putting the grantees upon inquiry as to his financial condition, is void under the bankruptcy law, as creating a fraudulent preference; and such a mortgage cannot be sustained, as made in pursuance of a prior agreement to give security, unless that agreement was definite and specific as to the property to be mortgaged; in other words, such an one as a court of equity would enforce upon a bill for specific performance. Jackson Iron Co. v. Manufacturing Co., Case No. 7,153, followed.]

[2. A mortgage given to secure a prior loan three months before the debtor's assignment, but while he is still struggling to meet his liabilities, and when the mortgagee has no good reason to believe that these efforts will not succeed, is not void under the bankruptcy law as creating a fraudulent preference.]

[3. While the receipt of a personal note, bond, or other obligation of the vendee is no waiver of the vendor's lien, yet the taking of the obligation of a third party, or of a mortgage upon the property sold, or upon any other property, constitutes a waiver.]

[4. A conveyance made partly in consideration of the grantee's covenant to assume and discharge all indebtedness against the grantor growing out of a previously existing partnership between them does not create an implied lien upon the land, for the purpose of indemnifying the vendor in case the covenant is not performed, especially as the time of performance and the amount to be paid are indefinite, and depend upon a contingency.]

[5. A partner, upon withdrawing from the firm, conveyed his interest in the firm property, including real estate, to the remaining partners, "subject to his proportion of the debts and liabilities of said firm." The habendum clause was as follows: "The said [grantees], assuming and agreeing to pay my said interest's share of the debts and liabilities of the said firm, to have and to hold my said interest, being the undivided one-third part of the property, * * *; but subject to said interest's share of the debts and liabilities of said firm," etc. Held, that this was a conveyance upon a condition subsequent, and that upon failure to perform the condition a right of re-entry arose, although none was expressly reserved, and that consequently the vendor had a lien thereon superior to subsequent mortgagees, who must be held to have taken with notice of the condition.]

This was a bill in equity [by Samuel A. Nash, assignee], to set aside a number of mortgages upon the property of Francis L. Le Clercq and James A. Le Clercq, doing business under the firm name of Le Clercq Bros., and upon the separate property of the individual members of said firm. Seventeen answers were filed by persons claiming different interests in the property.

Before BROWN and SWING, District Judges.

BROWN, District Judge. No question is made with regard to any of the numerous mortgages in this case, except those of the Fords, Adam Uhrig, James W. Steinberger, H. H. Menager and Roman Menager.

1. As to the mortgage to H. N. and Mary E. Ford. It seems that in November, 1872, H. N. Ford endorsed a note of Le Clercq Bros. for $800, discounted by Charles Creuzet, upon which Ford was afterward sued and a judgment rendered against him. In December, 1872, he endorsed another note for $750, discounted by the Ohio Valley Bank, which was subsequently renewed by the endorsements of himself and wife, and paid in January or February, 1874. January 10, 1873, Ford and wife endorsed still another note for $3,000, to be used by the firm as collateral security for loans to be made by the same bank. These loans were afterwards made, to the amount of $3,000, and paid by the Fords at the same time the note for $750 was paid. This last note was endorsed upon the faith of a promise of the firm to give a mortgage upon their real estate, to indemnify the Fords against their entire liability for the firm. Their clerk, under their instructions, drew up a mortgage upon the individual property of Francis Le Clercq, which was never signed, but was afterwards destroyed, and a mortgage finally given bearing the date September 2, 1873, which was not recorded, however, until October 7th, the day of, or the day before, the assignment. I think there is no doubt that the firm was actually insolvent within the meaning of the bankrupt law at the time this mortgage was given. They had been engaged in operating a woolen mill in Gallipolis; had suspended work in the spring of 1873, and had not resumed up to the time of the assignment, except about a month in the summer, when the mill was engaged in doing some small jobs for the country people about there. Their note for $25,000, due March 4th, 1873, had been returned dishonored. Another note for $500, endorsed by Uhrig, was protested September 14th, and was subsequently taken up by Uhrig. Another note for $1,000, endorsed by him, became due October 4th. Another note for one Bray was protested October 6th. After the closing of the mill in the spring, the Le Clercqs, finding themselves embarrassed, made ineffectual efforts to organize a corporation, and finally, October 7th or 8th, made a general assignment to Ford for the benefit of all their creditors. While it is not free from doubt, I think there is a preponderance of evidence showing that Ford had reasonable cause to believe that the firm was insolvent at the time the mortgage was given. He was the brother-in-law of the Le Clercqs, and lived in the other part of a double house occupied by Francis Le Clercq. He had endorsed for them in November and December, 1872, and in January, 1873. Whenever any of these notes became due, they were renewed. Nothing was ever paid upon either of them from the time of the first endorsement. When the $800 note, upon which he was endorser, became due, Le Clercq's agent brought it to him and he waived the protest; that, he says, was the last he heard of it until after the assignment. He does not recollect whether he ever saw the mortgage until after it was recorded, viz. about the time of the assignment. Living within three-quarters of a mile of the mill and next door to Francis Le Clercq, his brother-in-law, it is scarcely possible that he should not have known of the suspension of business during the summer, or of Le Clercq's efforts to organize a joint stock company, and that they were not paying their debts in the ordinary course of business, while the fact that the mortgage was not taken until a few days before the assignment, would seem to indicate that if he had been aware of the contemplated assignment, he would have taken it sooner. It is explained in his testimony that he supposed a mortgage had been given at the time the endorsements were made, and had relied upon that for his protection. We must then hold this mortgage to have been a fraudulent preference, unless it can be supported upon the theory that it was executed in pursuance of a prior agreement. Having had recent occasion in the case of Jackson Iron Manuf'g Co. [Case No. 7,153], to examine the question under what circumstances a mortgage will be sustained if made in pursuance of a prior agreement to give security, I then came to the conclusion, after a careful examination of the authorities, that to support such a mortgage the agreement must be definite and specific; such a one as a court of equity would enforce upon a bill for specific performance. In the case under consideration, the Fords endorsed the note for $3,000 upon the promise of Le Clercq to give a mortgage, but the property which the mortgage was to cover was not specified, and remained entirely uncertain until the mortgage was executed. In fact, a mortgage was drawn up by Wilson, a clerk of the firm, upon the individual property of one of the partners, but was never signed, and was subsequently destroyed. The mortgage afterward executed covered the mill property belonging to the firm, and cannot be said to have been executed in pursuance of a prior agreement. I think the circumstances were such as to put Ford upon his inquiry, and to constitute reasonable ground for believing the firm to be insolvent. The mortgage must be held invalid as a preference.

2. The mortgage to Adam Uhrig was given under very similar circumstances. Some time in April or May, 1873, one of the firm applied to Uhrig to endorse their note of $1,000, payable in sixty days. It was renewed at maturity, and Uhrig again became security for the further sum of $500, which notes were renewed from time to time until October 4th, when new notes were given for $500 and $1,000 respectively, payable in ninety days. The mortgage was given October 6th, but a day or two before the assignment. Uhrig knew that none of the notes which he had endorsed had been paid at maturity; that the business of the firm had been suspended for several weeks before the execution of the mortgage, and he says he took the mortgage at the time because he found the firm was not in as good condition as when he endorsed the notes. There was also evidence tending to show that he had heard it said that the firm was liable to be adjudged bankrupts at any time. It seems that in this case also the endorsements had been made upon the promise of Le Clercq to give a mortgage of indemnity upon his real estate, but the promise was, if possible, less definite than that to Ford. There was no property specified, and no attempt made to procure the mortgage until a day or two before the assignment. I think that Uhrig must have known at this time that the firm was in extremis.

3. As to the mortgage to John W. Steinbergen, administrator, in 1871, Steinbergen having in his hands $1,000, belonging to the estate of Joseph Spencer, loaned the same to the Le Clercqs, taking their note endorsed by Rosena Le Clercq, their mother. The note was made payable a year from date, but we think the evidence shows that it was intended for an investment; that there was no desire or expectation that it would be promptly paid, and, in fact, Steinbergen told the firm, before the year was up, that the note might run another year. In May, 1873, the interest being due, he called for it. Le Clercq told him that he was a little pressed at that time, but would pay in a few days. Calling a second time, and not getting it, he requested a mortgage, and after some delay a mortgage was executed and delivered to him, bearing date June 30th, 1873. I am not satisfied that Steinbergen had reason to believe the firm was insolvent at the time this mortgage was given. Both LeClercq and Steinbergen deny it in most unequivocal and explicit language. The latter says, that he had heard they were embarrassed, but supposed and believed that their property would pay their debts. He says he does not remember hearing they could not get along, but did hear it said that it would be better for them to make a sale of their mill. Efforts were then being made to organize the joint stock company, and had not at that time failed. The only circumstance that would naturally put Steinbergen upon inquiry, was the fact that he was director of the Point Pleasant Bank, which had taken a mortgage from Le Clercq on the 5th of May, to secure a note for $2,065, and it seems that he knew this mortgage had been taken. He swears, however, that his real reason for taking the mortgage was that he had understood that the endorser upon the note had been traveling, and had spent more than her income; that she was liable to become irresponsible, and he deemed it his duty as trustee to take additional security. As a matter of fact, business men are usually more likely to look out for the security and safe investment of money which they hold in a fiduciary capacity, than for that which belongs to themselves individually. We are disposed to accept this theory of the case as the true one, and to sustain the mortgage. While the firm was undoubtedly somewhat embarrassed at the time it was given, they were evidently struggling to meet their liabilities and Steinbergen had not, then, good reasons to believe they would not succeed.

As to the claim of H. H. Menager, it appears that on the 17th day of November, 1869, Menager being the owner of certain real estate in West Virginia, sold the same to L. Le Clercq for $16,000, taking in part payment certain real estate in Gallipolis, at a valuation of $12,000. For the remaining fourth, Le Clercq gave his unsecured note. A settlement was had April 17, 1873, upon which there was found to be due $552. A new note was given for this amount, and as the note is still unpaid, Menager claims a vendor's lien upon the land. The land was afterwards incumbered by a mortgage, taken without notice of the vendor's lien, and it is conceded that Menager's claim is subject to this mortgage. That the vendor has a lien upon land sold for the purchase money, is now too well settled to admit of any doubt. Repeated adjudications of the supreme courts of Ohio and of West Virginia have firmly established the principle in those states. Tiernan v. Beam, 2 Ohio, 383; Neil v. Kinney, 11 Ohio St. 66; Brush v. Kinsley, 14 Ohio, 24; Edwards v. Edwards, 24 Ohio St. 411; Boos v. Ewing, 17 Ohio, 500; Redford v. Gibson, 12 Leigh, 332; Sinnett v. Cralle's Adm'r, 4 W. Va. 600. No security having been taken for the purchase money, we see nothing to indicate that the lien has been waived. The assignee, taking the property as he does, subject to all just liens, will be required to pay the amount of this claim, after payment of the mortgage.

As to claim of Roman Menager. He also claims a vendor's lien upon the woolen mill property in Gallipolis. The facts are substantially as follows: On September 7, 1870, Menager sold an undivided one-third of this property to the Le Clercq brothers, in consideration of which they secured to him by mortgage upon their property $16,000, as a part of the consideration, and for the residue thereof agreed to pay and discharge all indebtedness that then existed against Menager growing out of a firm partnership existing between the Le Clercqs and him. For this covenant Menager took no security or indemnity. At the time of this sale there existed an indebtedness growing out of the former partnership to one Samuel Couch for $1,178, for which Menager was liable. On January 12, 1875, he was compelled to pay this indebtedness which then amounted to $1,374.33. For this amount he asks a lien upon the property. It is admitted that by reason of a clause in the deed hereinafter mentioned the other mortgagees took with notice of this lien, if any such existed. There can be no pretense of a lien so far as the $16,000 is concerned, for which an independent mortgage was taken. While the receipt of a personal note, bond, or other obligation of the vendee is clearly no waiver of lien, the receipt of the obligation of a third party, or the taking of a mortgage upon the property sold, or upon any other property, constitutes a waiver.

We think there is no implied lien in favor of the vendor for the remainder of the consideration, viz. the payment of that proportion of the debts for which Menager was liable. There is a marked distinction between a conveyance as for money paid with a separate security for the price, whether by covenant, bond, or note, and a conveyance expressed to be in consideration of a covenant entered into by the purchaser. Where, as a part of the consideration of the deed, there is a covenant to perform some collateral undertaking, especially if the time of the performance or the amount to be paid is indefinite, or dependent upon a contingency, there is no lien. In Clarke v. Royle, 3 Sim. 499, A. conveyed an estate to B., in consideration of B. entering into the covenant contained in the deed, for paying an annuity to A., and three thousand pounds to certain persons in the event of B. marrying, and it was held the covenant did not create a lien on the estate. "The deed plainly marks out that the consideration on the one side was the conveyance of the estate, and on the other the entering into the covenants." In Parrott v. Sweetland, 3 Mylne & K. 655, a vendor, in lieu of the price of three thousand pounds, agreed to accept an annuity of one hundred pounds for the joint lives of her intended husband and herself, in case the purchaser should so long live, the purchaser engaging that his personal representatives should within three months after his decease, in certain events, pay a further sum of three thousand pounds. This was held to be not a security, but a substitution for the price, and the lien of the vendor on the land was discharged. See, also, Buckland v. Pocknell, 13 Sim. 406. In Brawley v. Catron, 8 Leigh, 522, by agreement between the vendor and vendee of land, the vendee engaged, in consideration of the land, to pay off certain debts of the vendor, and to support him during his life, and two of his daughters until their marriage. Held, the agreement for supporting the vendor and his daughters constituted no lien upon the land. In McKillip v. McKillip, 8 Barb. 552, where A. conveyed land to B., and in consideration thereof B. covenanted with A. to support and maintain him and his lunatic son, the covenant was held to create no lien upon the land in favor of the son. In discussing the question of the vendor's lien, the court observed: "The doctrine should not be extended beyond the vendor and vendee, and privies in estate or in law, and then only for unpaid purchase money. Where a covenant of the vendee is substituted for the purchase money, or as a mode of payment of the price of the land, the land should be held discharged of the lien." In Patterson v. Edwards, 29 Miss. 67, a conveyance was made in consideration of the vendee's assuming to pay the principal and interest on certain notes, and it was held the lien was lost. "If the obligation consist of a collateral covenant, or be for the discharge of a liability to a third party, no lien is retained when the conveyance is absolute; and where the obligation of the vendee to discharge such liability appears to be substituted for the purchase money, the lien is lost." Had this deed been made simply in consideration of the sum of $16,000, and of the agreement of the vendee to pay the debts for which Menager was liable I should find no difficulty in holding there was no lien. It is insisted, however, that as the conveyance was made subject to the payment of these debts, there is thereby created a condition subsequent, for the breach of which there exists a right of re-entry, and consequently a lien. The recital of the consideration of the deed is, "Subject to his proportion of the debts and liabilities of said firm, so fully and entirely that said Francis L. Le Clercq and James A. Le Clercq stand in the place of Roman Menager thereto, taking his interest in and being liable for said interest's share of the losses, debts and liabilities of said firm." The habendum clause is as follows: "The said Francis L. Le Clercq and James A. Le Clercq, assuming and agreeing to pay my said interest's share of the debts and liabilities, of the said firm, to have and to hold my said interest, being the undivided one-third part of the property, real, personal, and mixed, above described unto the said Francis L. Le Clercq and James A. Le Clercq, their heirs and assigns; but subject to said interest's share of the debts and liabilities of said firm of Le Clercq & Co., which interest's share thereof the said Francis L. Le Clercq and James A. Le Clercq agree to pay and bear."

It is insisted that this is a grant upon a condition subsequent and that upon the nonperformance of this condition, the grantor has a right to re-enter without express reservation of such right, and consequently a right of lien. While it is very doubtful whether the defendant has a right to avail himself of this condition under the allegations of his answer, as this objection was not made by the complainant upon the argument or in his brief, I feel authorized to take the question in consideration. It is frequently a matter of great difficulty to determine whether words of this nature, inserted in a grant, are to be construed as qualifications of the estate granted, running with the land, or merely as personal covenants, binding only upon the grantee. With some hesitation we have come to the conclusion that the words in this deed were intended to create a condition subsequent. In Heist v. Baker, 49 Pa.

St. 9, the deed contained the provision, "under and subject to the payment" of a sum of money at the decease of a widow, to the children named, and it was held the purchaser took subject to an express lien for the amount. In Wolveridge v. Steward, 3 Moore & S. 561, also 1 Cromp. & M. 654, certain premises were assigned, subject to the payment of rent and to the performance of covenants and agreements reserved and contained in the original lease. It was held that the lessee was not liable in an action of covenant upon the grant, and that the words "subject to payment of rent," etc., were words of qualification, and not of contract. So, also, in Sanborn v. Woodman, 5 Cush. 36, a condition in a deed of land subject to a mortgage that the grantee should indemnify the grantor from the payment of the principal and interest secured by mortgage, was held to be broken by failure to pay interest when due, and that the grantor on paying the interest might immediately enter upon the land for breach of condition. In Stone v. Ellis, 9 Cush. 95, a deed contained the following clause: "The above premises are subject to mortgage, etc., and are conveyed upon the condition that the said grantee, his heirs and assigns, do assume and pay the same debt." It was held to create an estate upon condition, which, if not performed, would entitle the grantor to enter for a forfeiture. See, also, Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 372; Kline v. Bowman, 19 Pa. St. 24. It is true that in this case there is no right of re-entry in terms reserved, but this seems to be unnecessary where the condition of a grant is express. Washb. Real Prop. bk. 1, c. 14, § 15; Gray v. Blanchard, 8 Pick. 291; Jackson v. Allen, 3 Cow. 220; Wheeler v. Walker, 2 Conn. 201. It seems to follow from these authorities that the right to re-enter for nonperformance of a condition subsequent creates a lien upon the premises, which may be enforced in this proceeding. Stephenson v. Haines, 16 Ohio St. 478. Under all the circumstances, we think that Menager must be held to have a lien upon the premises, and inasmuch as the subsequent mortgages took with notice of his rights, contained in the original deed, he must be preferred to these mortgagees, so far as an undivided one-third of this property is concerned.

We do not wish to be understood as expressing any opinion with regard to the sufficiency of the bill in this case. We have not had occasion to pass upon a bill praying, as this does, for the cancellation of separate mortgages upon distinct parcels of property, owned by different persons, none of the defendants apparently having any common interest in the question litigated. We assume that the litigation is amicable, at least so far as the form of the proceeding is concerned, or a demurrer would have been interposed by some of the twenty-three defendants for multifariousness. A decree will be entered in conformity with this opinion.

Case No. 10,022.

NASH v. The THEBES.

[12 Hunt. Mer. Mag. 82.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Sept., 1844.

PILOTAGE—RIGHT TO FEES UNDER MASSACHUSETTS STATUTE—VESSELS PASSING THROUGH HARBORS.

[1. Under the Massachusetts statute regulating the pilotage of vessels (Rev. St. c. 32, §§ 15–22), and the regulations made by the commissioners thereunder, a pilot of Boston Harbor, who tenders his services to vessels bound for Lynn or Dorchester, which reject the same, is not entitled to the pilotage fee, although such vessels must necessarily pass through parts of Boston Harbor, it appearing that they would not stop therein, and that if the pilot's services were accepted, he would leave the vessel while under way, and before she was moored.]

[2. The regulations made by the commissioners pursuant to the statute are of the same force as if they had been incorporated into it.]

[3. It is not the mere clearance for a port, but being actually bound into it, that imposes on a vessel the obligation to pay a pilot.]

This was the case of a libel by Nash, a duly-commissioned pilot for the port of Boston, against the schooner Thebes. It appeared that the libellant hailed the schooner Thebes, a foreign vessel, bound from Digby to Lynn, outside the line drawn from Harding's Rocks to the Outward Graves, and from thence to Nahant Head, and offered his services as a Boston pilot, which were refused because she was bound to Lynn. He subsequently twice spoke the same vessel outside the same line, when bound from Digby to Dorchester, and offered his services as a Boston pilot, which were refused because she was bound to Dorchester. Lynn and Dorchester have respectively harbors, not within the harbor of Boston; but, in order to reach them, it is necessary to pass some distance within the line above described; and it was testified by an experienced Boston pilot that he considered Boston Harbor to extend to that line, because it was named in the statute and regulations respecting pilotage, and that a Boston pilot on board a vessel bound to Lynn would leave her at a point some distance within that line, called the northwest head of Lynn, and, if bound to Dorchester, at a point some distance within that line, near Thompson's island. The libellant claimed full fees as a Boston pilot, for the several times his services were tendered.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. In the case of Com. v. Ricketson, 5 Metc. [Mass.] 412, it was held that the 11th section of the 32d chapter of the Revised Statutes of Massachusetts applied to the port of Boston; and that a pilot whose services are refused, when duly tendered to a vessel bound into that port, is entitled to full fees. It is agreed that the words "port" and "harbor," as used in the act, are synonymous. Was this vessel bound into the port or harbor of Boston, within the meaning of the law, so as to entitle the libellant to his stated fees as a pilot? The statute has neither prescribed the fees, nor defined the duties of pilots for the harbor of Boston, but has left that to be done by certain commissioners, who are authorized to appoint and commission pilots, and to make regulations respecting pilotage. Rev. St. c. 32, §§ 15–22. The commissioners have established the fee to be paid for piloting a vessel like the Thebes into the harbor of Boston, and one of the regulations is as follows: "It shall be the duty of every pilot, after having brought a vessel into the harbor of Boston, to have such vessel properly moored in the stream, or secured to a wharf, at the option of the master, within twenty-four hours after the arrival of said vessel, if the weather permits, without extra charge." Regulations, No. 8. The duty to be performed is entire, and the fee prescribed supposes the performance of the whole duty, including that of securing the vessel to a wharf, or mooring her in a place of safety. These regulations made pursuant to the statute, are of the same force as if they had been incorporated into it; and they do not contemplate a case in which only a part of the service can be performed within the harbor of Boston, and where it must be completed in another port. In the present case, if the track of the Thebes, in going to Lynn and Dorchester, would be over waters which may, for any purpose, be deemed within the limits of Boston Harbor, it does not appear that there was any anchorage or any place used as a harbor for repose or security, or where a vessel could be moored in safety, in any part of such track. And it is proved that she would pass beyond the limits of Boston Harbor before she could be moored or secured in the port to which she was bound; and if she had taken the libellant on board, he would have left her while still under way to her port of destination, and she must have sought another pilot for the residue of the voyage. Suppose a Lynn pilot, duly commissioned by the governor, under the statute, should take charge of a vessel bound to Lynn, outside the line from Harding's Rocks to the Outward Graves, and thence to Nahant Head, the construction contended for by the libellant would compel the master to pay a Boston pilot also, and that, too, for the service of perhaps but a moment; for if it be said that, within the strict letter, a vessel is bound into Boston Harbor if she be about to cross any of its waters, it may also be said that she is bound out of that harbor the instant she enters it, and the services of a Boston pilot would no longer be required for the purpose of bringing her into it. Another result of that construction would be, that a Lynn pilot, who should merely conduct a vessel from sea, directly to his own port, would incur the penalty imposed by the 23d section of the statute for piloting a vessel into Boston Harbor. Such construction is not required either by the language of the act, or its general scope and policy, and ought not, I think, to be adopted. The Thebes was cleared for Boston, but was in fair truth bound to Lynn and Dorchester respectively, and actually proceeded directly to those ports. It is usual at Digby to clear for Boston, although bound to those other ports, and there is no sufficient ground to presume that any fraud or evasion was intended. It is not the being cleared for a port, but being actually bound into it, that imposes on a vessel the obligation to pay a pilot. Libel dismissed, with costs.

SHIPPING—PUBLIC REGULATIONS—PENALTY—HOW RECOVERED—REVENUE LAWS.

1. A prosecution for a penalty under the third section of the act of July 4, 1864 [13 Stat. 390], regulating the carriage of passengers on steamships, &c., must be by action of debt, and not a libel in rem.

2. Revenue laws are those laws only whose principal object is the raising of revenue, and not those under which revenue may incidentally arise

In admiralty.

Alfred Kilgore, U. S. Dist. Atty., and C. E. Marsh, for the United States.

Hanna & Knefler, for defendants.

McDONALD, District Judge. The libel in this case was filed by the United States on the 27th of September, 1867. It charges that on the 3rd of August, 1867, at Evansville, Indiana, a port of delivery, the steamboat Nashville, being subject to enrollment and license under the laws of the United States, and engaged in navigating the Ohio river along the shores of Indiana, and carrying cabin and steerage passengers for hire, and being wholly propelled by steam, and being temporarily moored at the Indiana shore in that city, while in the regular course of a voyage on said river, violated the revenue laws of the United States, by her master and owners then and there failing and neglecting "to place or keep in any conspicuous place in said vessel a duly certified copy of the paper or document required by law to be placed and kept, and known as the inspector's certificate, and described as such, and defined also by sections 9 and 25 of the act of congress entitled 'An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes,' approved August 30, 1852, in a place where such copy of said certificate would have been most likely to be seen by the steerage passengers of said vessel."

The libel claims, that, by reason of said facts, the steamer is subject to a penalty of one hundred dollars, and is liable to be seized, summarily proceeded against, and holden for the payment of that sum. And it prays that a warrant for the arrest of the boat issue accordingly, &c.

On the filing of the libel, a warrant was issued on which the marshal seized the steamer, and held her till the owner obtained a re-delivery of her by executing a bond under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1847 (9 Stat. 181).

The owner of the boat now appears, and demurs to the libel. In support of the demurrer it is argued that the present proceeding is fatally defective, as being a libel in rem, whereas it should have been an action of debt. Whether this objection is valid, must depend on the act of congress on which the proceeding is founded.

The act on which the libel is framed is that of July 4, 1864 (13 Stat. 390). The third section of that act provides, "that hereafter there shall be delivered to masters or owners of vessels three copies of the inspector's certificates, directed to be given them by collectors or other chief officers of the customs by the 25th section of the act entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam; and for other purposes,"' approved August 30, 1852, one of which copies shall be placed, and at all times kept, by said masters or owners, in some conspicuous place in the vessel, where it will be most likely to be discovered by steerage passengers, and the others as now provided by law; and the penalty for neglecting or refusing to place and keep up such additional copy shall be the same as is provided by the said 25th section in the other cases therein mentioned."

The twenty-fifth section referred to in the section above cited is as follows:

"That the collector or other chief officer of the customs shall retain on file all original certificates of the inspectors required by this act to be delivered to him, and shall give to the master or owner of the vessel therein named, two certified copies thereof, one of which shall be placed by such master or owner in some conspicuous place in the vessel, where it will be most likely to be observed by passengers and others, and there kept at all times; the other shall be retained by such master or owner, as evidence of the authority thereby conferred; and if any person shall receive or carry any passenger on board any such steamer not having a certified copy of the certificate of approval, as required by this act, placed and kept as aforesaid; or who shall receive or carry any gunpowder, oil of turpentine, oil of vitriol, camphene, or other explosive burning fluids, or materials which ignite by friction, as freight, on board any steamer carrying passengers, not having a certificate authorizing the same, and a certified copy thereof placed and kept as aforesaid; or who shall stow or carry any of said articles at a place or in a manner not authorized by such certificate, shall forfeit and pay for each offense one hundred dollars, to be recovered by action of debt in any court of competent jurisdiction." 10 Stat. 71.

The inspector's certificate referred to in the sections above cited is a certificate of the seaworthiness of the vessel, and by the ninth section of the act last aforesaid, is required to be annually obtained. 10 Stat. 63-65.

If we consider the two sections above copied separately from all other legislation on the subject, I think that we must draw from them the following deductions:

First. That both of them contemplate a personal penalty and judgment, and not a judgment in rem. The twenty-fifth section expressly declares that the recovery shall be "by an action of debt." It is singular enough that the verbs—"shall forfeit and pay"—in the twenty-fifth section, have grammatically no nominative. Whether the "master or owner," or the "steamer" shall forfeit and pay, is not expressed. So, the third section—the section on which this prosecution is founded—does not in terms declare who shall pay the penalty. It merely says, that "the penalty for neglecting and refusing to place and keep up such additional copy shall be the same as is provided by said 25th section." But I think it very plain that the twenty-fifth section intends that the master or owner shall incur the penalty, and not the steamer; and that the construction of the third section must, in this respect, follow that of the twenty-fifth.

Secondly. By the twenty-fifth section it is perfectly clear that the action must be in debt and not in rem; and, as the third section provides that the penalty "shall be the same as is provided by the said twenty-fifth section," I think it a fair deduction that the form of action shall also be the same. It is true that the section does not say that the form of action shall be the same, but only that the penalty shall be the same. But, as the third section does not expressly say anything about a form of action, and as, upon general principles, where a statute creates a penalty and fixes the amount, debt will lie for it; it seems to me fair to conclude that congress, as these two statutes are in pari materia, meant to give the same form of action in relation to both. I think, therefore, that, if no other act of congress controls this question, debt will lie for penalty under consideration. For, "if a statute prohibit the doing of an act under a penalty of forfeiture * * * and do not prescribe any mode of recovery, it may be recovered in this form of action." 1 Chit. Pl. 101. In this case, however, taking the two sections in question together, and irrespective of any other act, I think that these sections do prescribe the action of debt. And, if so, then the rule will apply that when a statute creates a penalty and prescribes a remedy, that remedy alone can be pursued. Stevens v. Evans, 2 Burrows, 1152.

It is insisted, in support of the libel, that the eighth section of the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 180), authorizes an action in rem in the present case. That section provides, "that in any case where a vessel, or the owner, master, or manager of a vessel, shall be subject to a penalty for a violation of the revenue laws of the United States, such vessel shall be holden for the payment of such penalty, and may be seized and proceeded against summarily by libel to recover such penalty, in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense."

This section is decisive of the regularity of the present proceeding, if the offense charged in the libel is "a violation of the revenue laws of the United States." But is the third section of the act of July 4, 1864, a "revenue law" within the meaning of said eighth section?

The act of July 18, 1866, is undoubtedly a revenue law. But that is not the question. The question relates to the act of July 4, 1864, and especially to its third section on which this libel is founded. It is certain that this third section makes no provision whatever touching revenue. The act itself is entitled "An act further to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels." And, consisting of 10 sections, it contains no provision of any kind concerning revenue. The act, indeed, refers to and amends various sections of prior acts, found in 5 Stat. 306; 10 Stat. 71, 715, 719. But not one of these sections relates to the United States revenue, nor do the acts in which they are found. On the contrary, all these acts concern the protection of the lives of passengers on steamers.

Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, defines revenue to be "the income of the government arising from taxation, duties, and the like." "Revenue laws" within the meaning of the section above cited from the act of July 18, 1866, should, then, mean laws relating to the income of the government, arising from taxation, duties, and the like.

The seventh section of the first article of the national constitution provides that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the house of representatives." I suppose that "bills for raising revenue" are, when passed, "revenue laws" within the meaning of the eighth section of the act of July 14, 1866. It may, therefore, throw light on the question under consideration to ascertain what has been the construction of said constitutional provision. It is certain that the practical construction of this provision by congress has been to confine its operation to bills the direct and principal object of which has been to raise revenue, and not as including bills out of which money may incidentally go into the treasury, or revenue incidentally arise.

What bills are properly "bills for raising revenue," in the sense of the constitution, has been matter of some discussion. A learned commentator (Tucker) supposes that every bill, which indirectly or consequentially may raise revenue, is, within the sense of the constitution, a revenue bill. He therefore thinks, that the bills for establishing the post office, and the mint, and regulating the value of foreign coin, belong to this class, and ought not to have originated (as in fact they did) in the senate. But the practical construction of the constitution has been against this opinion. And, indeed, the history of the origin of the power, already suggested, abundantly proves, that it has been confined to bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the words, and has not been understood to extend to bills for other purposes, which may incidentally create revenue. No one supposes that a bill to sell any of the public lands, or to sell public stock, is a bill to raise revenue, in the sense of the constitution. Much less would a bill be so deemed which merely regulated the value of foreign or domestic coin, or authorized the discharge of insolvent debtors upon assignment of their estates to the United States, giving a priority of payment to the United States in case of insolvency, although all of them might incidentally bring revenue into the treasury. Story, Const. § 880.

Counsel for the libel argue that all acts of congress regulating commerce, and navigation, and the carriage of passengers by water, are revenue laws, as they all, more or less, incidentally touch the interests of the United States treasury. And so they hold that, since by an act of congress the master or owner of a steamer must pay a certain sum of money for the inspector's certificate already alluded to, which money goes into the treasury, and since the gist of this action is the failure to put up in a certain place in the steamer Nashville a copy of that certificate; and since a part or the whole of the penalty sued for in this case will, if recovered, go into the treasury; therefore the law creating the penalty is a revenue law. But I cannot assent to this logic. I think it is too subtle. The thread of the argument is "long drawn out" and very attenuated. To me it appears that the obvious meaning and common sense of the thing is that the eighth section of the act of July 18, 1866, in employing the phrase, "revenue laws," intended those laws—and those only—which upon their face are plainly designed to raise revenue. The act on which this libel is founded was evidently not passed with any such design. Its sole design clearly was the protection of the persons and lives of steamboat and steamship passengers.

Many other questions have been raised on the argument of this demurrer. But the conclusion above arrived at renders a notice of them unnecessary. I am of opinion that the action in this case ought to have been debt; that a libel in rem does not lie in it; and that the libel must be quashed and the suit dismissed.

SALE—BILL OF SALE—CONSTRUCTION—QUESTION OF LAW.

The court have a right to instruct the jury as to all questions of law growing out of the facts of the cause. The construction of a bill of sale is a question of law.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Maine.]

At law.

C. Jackson, for plaintiff in error.

G. Blake, for the United States.

DAVIS, District Judge. The bill of exceptions in this case is grounded on an alleged error of the district judge, in Maine district, before whom the cause was tried, in his direction to the jury, in two particulars: 1. As to the operation of a bill of sale of a moiety of the offending vessel, from Maxwell to [Benjamin] Nason, one of the plaintiffs in error. 2. In regard to the evidence respecting Atkinson, the other plaintiff in error.

In regard to the first exception, it does not appear to be relied on by the counsel in this court, and it undoubtedly belonged to the judge to declare his opinions relative to the legal effect of the bill of sale in question in application to the action. As to the second objection, when this record was read, the court had an impression, that the judge had directed the jury, as to the weight of evidence, and that he had so far interfered with their exclusive province. But on a careful examination of the whole record, it does not appear, that the direction of the judge was erroneous. He declared and delivered an opinion to the jury (says the bill of exceptions), "that the several matters so produced and proved were sufficient to prove the issue aforesaid, on the part of the plaintiffs." It is not understood, that the judge declared the said several matters to be proved. That must be supposed to have been left to the jury to determine, unless admitted. But the bill of exceptions seems to admit the said matters to have been proved, and the judge must be considered as only declaring their legal operation. So with respect to Wells. The judge declares, "that Wells ought by law to be considered as the said Atkinson's agent, in all concerns respecting said vessel and cargo." The question appears to have been, as contemplated and embraced in the direction given by the district judge, not as to the existence of the acts of Wells; they must be considered as left to the jury to determine, or so fully proved, that they were not questioned. But the direction ought to be viewed as declaring the legal operation and extent of those acts. This it was competent to the judge to direct, and to declare, if such were his opinion, "that the acts of Wells ought to be considered as the acts of Atkinson." That the court is to judge of the law, and the jury to determine facts, is a rule so familiar, and so generally respected, that I do not recollect a writ of error grounded on its alleged violation. In summing up a cause to a jury, many facts are often so clearly proved, or remain uncontested, that the judge assumes them as a basis of argument, without suggesting to the jury their known and unquestionable right that they are to determine as to the truth of the facts alleged. But an ultimate reference to the opinion of the jury, as to any such facts, is always understood to be implied. If the court, in their direction, should undertake to give a decided opinion, as to the truth of an alleged fact, which is contested, it would undoubtedly be wrong, from its probable influence on a jury, though the right of the jury, notwithstanding such direction, would remain unimpaired. But from a full view of the record in this case, the court cannot infer, and ought not to presume, that the district judge did thus exceed his legitimate authority. The fair and just construction is, that he merely declared the legal operation of facts proved, and which the bill of exceptions admits to have been proved. Judgment affirmed.

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY—PRIZE—PERISHING CONDITION—SALE PENDING HEARING.

On a motion for the sale of a cargo pending the hearing, on the ground that it is in a perishing condition, the judgment of the prize commissioners, founded on their inspection, as evidenced by their report, will prevail, unless controlling evidence is produced counteracting their judgment. A sale ordered in this case.

BETTS, District Judge. On Saturday last, motions were made in behalf of the libellants, upon two reports of the prize commissioners, supported, in respect to the vessel, by the affidavit of the marshal, and in relation to the arms, by the deposition of Orison Blunt, stating that, in the opinion of the commissioners, and on their examination and personal inspection, the rifles laden on board the prize vessel Nassau are deteriorated by swettage and rust from water, and that the vessel is rapidly leaking, and is kept afloat with difficulty, and that both the vessel and her cargo of arms are in a perishing condition. The reports advise the court that, for the causes aforesaid, the said vessel and arms should be immediately sold, which recommendations of the commissioners the United States attorney moves the court to have carried into effect. Mr. Edwards, on the part of the claimants, opposes the motion for the sale of either the vessel or the arms, upon a report of one of the port wardens, that, in his opinion, the leakage of the vessel is not such as to render her state a perishing one, and because neither portion of the seized property having been yet condemned, the court ought not to deprive the claimants of their rights to the property in kind, in case it be acquitted on trial of the charges on which it was captured as prize.

It appears to the court that, in a case of speculative differences of opinion between witnesses, whether the condition of property seized as prize "be perishing or perishable, or deteriorating in value," the judgment reported to the court by the commissioners should prevail, unless controlling evidence is produced counteracting their judgment; this matter being very pointedly placed by congress under their supervision. There is no such proof furnished in this instance. The balance of evidence, in particularity and precision, is in concurrence with the report of the commissioners, and the strong terms of the act (Act March 25, 1862, § 1 [12 Stat. 374]), would indicate that the proceedings of the court should be greatly guided by the judgment of these officers, who are specially charged with the duty of ascertaining and making known to the court these particulars. The general argument against the expediency of subjecting property to peremptory sale before condemnation or trial must yield to the provisions of positive law. It does not lie with the court to prejudice the manner in which the prize commissioners shall conduct their possession or management of prize property before sale. The facts now laid before the court are, in my judgment, abundantly sufficient to authorize the sale of the vessel and the arms specified in these motions. An order for such sale will be entered accordingly.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—CONTRABAND ARTICLES.

Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade, and for being engaged in transporting to an enemy port articles contraband of war.

[This case was first heard upon motion of libelants for an order to sell cargo as being in a perishing condition. Case No. 10,025.]

BETTS, District Judge. The proofs in this case show that the vessel, registered as English, evaded the blockade of the port of Wilmington, N. C., on the 1st of May, 1862, with a cargo of cotton and other produce of the enemy's country, destined to Nassau, N. P.; that at Nassau she immediately took on board a lading consisting of arms and ammunition; and that on the 22d of the same month she departed therefrom with such contraband cargo, and with papers by which her destination purported to be St. John, N. B., but took her course directly for Wilmington again, and was captured by the United States ship-of-war in its vicinity, and in the act of attempting to enter said port. The vessel, and cargo, with several of the officers and crew, were sent to this port. A libel was filed July 12, 1862, and a claim in behalf of British subjects was filed July 29 last, claiming the vessel and cargo to be British property, by the British vice-consul at this port, with his test oath attached, verifying the prize to be British property, according to the best of his knowledge and belief, derived from his position in the consulate, and from conversations with the officers and crew of the vessel. The vessel had a British certificate of registry, executed May 16, 1862, to Augustus John Adderly, at Nassau, N. P. She was built in New York in 1851. No bill of sale or paper transfer of her at the time of registry is produced. The bills of lading and clearance were made out on the 21st of May, as were also the shipping articles, at Nassau, for St. John, N. B. The master, the mate, the engineer, and the fireman, parcel of the ship's company, and three passengers on board, were examined on preparatory interrogatories. Upon the proofs, it is clearly shown that the owners of the vessel and her lading, and the ship's company, well knew of the existence of the war, and of the blockade of the port of Wilmington, when the vessel departed from that port on her last previous voyage, and when she attempted to re-enter it at the time of her capture; that on both occasions she was acting with an intention to violate the blockade, and that on the last occasion she was transporting to Wilmington articles contraband of war. It is, therefore, not requisite to detail more minutely the particulars of the proofs, or the doctrines of public law which determine the guilt and confiscability of the property.

A decree of condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel and cargo is rendered.

This decree was affirmed, on appeal, by the circuit court, November 18, 1863. [Case unreported, but see Case No. 10,028.]

[NOTE. The court at a subsequent date refused a special fee bill in behalf of the counsel for the captors. Case No. 10,027. PRIZE—PRACTICE—FEE BILL—COMPENSATION OF COUNSEL—FOR WHAT EMPLOYED.

1. The fee bill of February 26, 1853, discussed, in its application to prize suits.

2. The prize acts of March 25, 1862 (12 Stat. 375), and July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 608), considered as affecting fees to counsel for the captors.

3. Congress intended, by these acts, that the employment of counsel in prize cases, in order to warrant their compensation out of the prize fund, should be for the assistance of the district attorney, and in protection of the interests of the captors in common, and should be authorized or recognized by the secretary of the navy.

4. The court in this case refused to charge on the prize fund the bill of costs of a counsel employed by the captors, who did not bring himself within this rule.

[This case was first heard upon motion of libelants to sell cargo as in a perishing condition. Case No. 10,025. Subsequently a decree of condemnation was entered. Case No. 10,026. It is now heard upon the question of taxation of costs.]

BETTS, District Judge. As some novel questions of law and practice have arisen in this case, the court has reserved the disposition of them for a few days in order to have an opportunity to state the reasons governing the decision rendered. Should the present condition of the law on the subject remain, and prize captures continue to be brought before the courts for adjudication, it may become important to the profession to understand the principles upon which the adjustment of costs in cases similar to this will be made by the court.

The above suit was instituted July 12, 1862, conformably to the usual course of practice, in the name of the United States, and by the attorney of the United States of this district officially. In form and character, it is an action within the admiralty cognizance of this court, and under the sole superintendence and control of the district attorney (1 Stat. 92, § 35; 2 Stat. 761, § 6; 10 Stat. 166, § 3; 12 Stat. 375), over which no other officer possesses any legal control, except it be conferred by statutory authority. In the progress of the suit, as appears by the papers on file, Mr. Arnoux, Mr. Sandford, and Mr. Upton, counsellors of the court, became concerned as counsel for the captors in the cause, under retainer directly, either by the commanding officers of the capturing vessel or by the secretary of the navy. The action was placed upon the trial docket of this court at the November term thereafter, and was brought to a final hearing at the December term, 1862, and the vessel and cargo were then condemned and forfeited as prize of war by decree of the court. The district attorney, Mr. Upton, and Mr. Sandford have each presented bills of costs in their own behalf for substantially the same items of services in the suit, in conducting it from its inception to its termination, claiming the right to have those costs adjusted and paid to them in the character of counsel for the libellants, under the provisions of the third section of the act of congress approved March 25, 1862. Mr. Arnoux has not as yet formally presented his bill in that capacity, although he has made known to the court his relation to the cause. The bills of costs prepared by the district attorney and Mr. Upton have been heretofore adjusted by the court, and, it is presumed, have been regularly acted upon by the accounting officers of the government. That of Mr. Sandford, now under consideration, stands upon circumstances distinguishable in important particulars from the claims of the district attorney and Mr. Upton, and their allowance supplies no authority or precedent, determining the course to be followed in respect to other officers of the court, holding only the relation of counsel for individual captors. The differences will be further adverted to subsequently. Counsel, merely in that character, have no provision made for them in the standing fee bill, regulating their fees or costs in suits in court, and either fixing the amount or the mode of recovering the same. 10 Stat. 161. District attorneys are recognized therein in transacting the usual business of a suit, only in the capacity of attorneys, and are compensated as such. Id. § 1. That statute has been generally understood to have codified into positive enactments the vague allowances of costs to the officers of court designated in the act, and to have annulled the system for some time prevailing in the federal courts to compensate legal services by fees given at discretion by the courts. The first section expressly declares that the compensation fixed by statute shall be in lieu of all other rates or modes of allowance in the courts of the United States, reserving the right to solicitors, attorneys, and proctors to bargain with their clients, and receive, in addition to taxable costs, such reasonable satisfaction as may be agreed between the parties, or may be in accordance with general usage within the state where the services are rendered. By sections 3 and 5 all contradictory provisions of law are repealed; and it would be difficult, since the passage of that fee bill, to uphold any rate of charges for law services, resting upon the usage or practice of admiralty or prize courts, variant from the existing fee bill.

The argument in support of the bill of costs submitted to me for approval proceeds mainly on the assumption that the costs claimed are granted by the third section of the act of March 25, 1862. If this position be tenable, the claimant is of course relieved from the restrictions of the fee bill of 1853, and stands upon the ground of quantum meruit, or upon the rule of custom or usage, as to the rate of his counsel fee, so far as that guide may yet exist in this court on the subject. The act of March 25, 1862, has not yet been the subject of judicial interpretation in this respect, that I am aware of. It is painfully obscure in some of its vital provisions. The face of the third section does not limit the number of suitors who may come into a prize litigation individually, and be guaranteed their expenses out of the general fund on condemnation of the prize, whether they personally, or the vessel with which they were connected, had any concern in the capture or not; and the question must arise whether the court can avoid recognizing each man of a crew, or of a squadron, or of an entire fleet, as a competent party to be represented in court by counsel, and compelling compensation to such counsel without regard to the necessity of his aid or its intrinsic value. In this particular instance, three distinct counsel claim to be representatives of two officers of the capturing ships. They show no express appointment from any other individual. No authority from the subofficers and crews appears upon the files empowering those two persons to intervene and represent the body of captors, nor any that would entitle the other men composing the equipages of the capturing vessels to place themselves in the same attitude with those officers, and come into the suit in their own right, as captors. Mr. Upton alone acts under an appointment embracing the rest of the crew. By virtue of the act of July 17, 1862, the secretary of the navy authorized Mr. Upton to act in behalf of the unrepresented crew, which in this case is the whole of them. Official letter of the secretary of the navy of September 6, 1862. The language of the third section authorizes the fund to be charged with counsel fees for "the counsel for the captors." Can the commanding officers of separate ships claim to themselves a right to these fees without authentic powers of attorney from each member of the crew? or can they, virtute officii, represent the whole crew, and collect their distributive shares out of the prize proceeds? These and other uncertainties are not solved by the terms of the law, and must, therefore, be determined by legal construction of the meaning and purpose of the legislature. If that intention fails to be disclosed in the enactment itself, it may be sought in concurrent legislation in pari materia, and the more directly coincident in point of time a concurrent enactment may follow, the more impressive and effective it will become as a key of interpretation. On the 17th of July, in the same session, congress passed an enabling or declaratory clause respecting the prosecution of prize suits, providing, among other things, that "the secretary of the navy is hereby authorized to appoint an agent, or to employ counsel when the captors do not employ counsel themselves, in any case in which he may consider it necessary, to assist the district attorneys and protect the interests of the captors, with such compensation as he may think just and reasonable." 12 Stat. 608, § 12. This authority was executed by the secretary of the navy in the official letter above referred to. The secretary enumerates several conditions accompanying the appointment—"that of furnishing such information as the department may require in relation to cases pending or to be brought before the court," and "that the services would be expected to continue in every case, without further charge, until a termination of judicial proceedings." In reading together the concurrent clauses of these two acts, a strong implication is afforded that congress meant that the retainer and employment of counsel in prize causes, in order to warrant them compensation out of the prize fund, should be for the assistance of the district attorney in the suit, and in protection of the interests of the captors in common; and, in that way, and in so far as they are acting under the recognition and authority of the secretary of the navy, either by his direct selection, or their employment by the captors themselves, in cases in which he may consider it necessary, they would be entitled to compensation as provided in the law. The act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 760, § 4), repealing and explaining the prior enactments referred to on this subject, affords strong evidence that the prior provisions were only intended to cover and be "confined to compensation for such services as may be rendered necessary by reason of the captors having interests conflicting with those of the United States, and proper, in the opinion of the court, to be represented by separate counsel from those representing the United States."

I do not consider that the legislation of congress in regard to prize suits has annulled the principles of practice governing admiralty cases, and also equity and common law actions. The courts possess and will exercise their inherent powers to restrain, in cases presenting numerous parties possessing common rights of action or defense, the crowding of the pleadings and records of the court with multitudes of persons not necessary to determine the rights in litigation. Neither will parties be permitted to encumber and embarrass the proceedings of the courts by the introduction of needless numbers of proctors, solicitors, or attorneys into the control of, or interference with, the actings of the courts. A suitor may undoubtedly employ, at his own expense, attorneys or counsel at his discretion, but the court, when appealed to, must prevent the burden of such charge being transferred to and placed upon the subject in litigation, arbitrarily, at the discretion of particular suitors. I think that this suit, having been commenced in the name of the district attorney, and Mr. Upton, under the appointment of the secretary of the navy, having assisted in conducting the prosecution, from its institution, in favor of the captors, and having had the adjustment and payment of his costs therefor out of the proceeds of the prize, prior to the presentation of Mr. Sandford's bill of costs for allowance, and no order of the court, or of the secretary of the navy, having been previously made, connecting him, as counsel for the captors, with the suit, his claim cannot be lawfully adjusted by the court and charged upon the fund. Under these circumstances, his retainer, by the captors named, was a personal one, and they are individually liable to him, if at all, for his professional services. In that respect, such services may be eminently valuable to captors. Unjust and unreasonable charges brought against the fund may be defeated or diminished; the claims of competitor captors, or their counsel may be avoided; and the proceeds of the prize within the jurisdiction of the court may, through the watchfulness and diligence of the counsel for the captors, be protected from important losses through illegal disbursements in its collection or keeping, or improvident delays on the part of agents who hold it in possession without prompt distribution. It is those extrinsic acts of supervision and control which it must generally be most useful to have wisely and actively performed for captors by their counsel; and the court cannot intend that congress meant that each captor should be entitled to appoint counsel ad libitum, who should receive a full bill of costs out of the prize fund.

The written argument submitted by Mr. Sandford in this case was able and satisfactory. My certificate to his bill of costs is not withheld because of the inadequateness or want of force and pertinency of the argument, but on the ground that I do not consider his legal relation to the cause as authorizing the court to tax his costs against this fund. The distinction between the efficacy of the consent of the district attorney to the taxation of the gross bill of costs to Mr. Sandford, and the assent of the same officer to the taxation of Mr. Upton's costs, is, that the latter holds his connection with the suit directly through statutory appointment. It is proper to remark, that although I decline to allow Mr. Sandford's costs against the proceeds in court in this suit, without exceptions to the items charged in the bill, I do not mean to be understood as passing any opinion upon the legality or justness of those allowances. Those questions have never yet arisen before me for judicial determination. An allowance for compensation to the United States attorney has been adjusted by the court, in obedience to the peremptory terms of the third section of the act of March 25, 1862, but on the construction of all the laws applicable to the subject that he could not be paid, by virtue of the taxation and because of his services in prize cases, any sum exceeding his official salary; and, in respect to the counsel appointed by the secretary of the navy, his compensation was fixed, under the statute, by that officer, and was not originally taxable by the court. The question will, therefore, be open for adjudication before the court, in any cases arising on the taxation of costs to counsel for captors in prize suits, unaffected by any previous action of the court.

The opinion of the court in the present case, therefore, is, that the costs demanded by Mr. Sandford are not taxable by the court against the fund in this suit.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The Nassau was captured on the 28th of May, 1862, by the steamer State of Georgia, while attempting to break the blockade of the port of Wilmington, North Carolina. The vessel has been sold [Case No. 10,026], and a great portion of the cargo, consisting of arms and military equipments, has been appraised and turned over to the government. Harlan and others intervened in the court below, and claimed a lien upon the vessel as material men, and for repairs made upon her at their yard in Wilmington, in the state of Delaware, in the summer of 1860. The amount claimed is some $10,000 and upwards. It is admitted that property seized as prize of war, under the law of nations, is discharged from all latent liens or incumbrances, and, in this respect, is distinguishable from property seized as forfeited under the municipal laws of a state. The learned counsel for the claimants has, with great industry and ability, sought to bring the case of the seizure of the Nassau within the latter category; but, after the judgment of the court in the case of The Hiawatha [Case No. 6,451], and especially after a state of civil war was recognized by the war-making power under the constitution, there can be no well-founded doubt that vessels and cargoes seized for a violation of the laws of blockade, or as enemy property, are prize of war under the law of nations, and not under municipal authority. This vessel was, as we have seen, captured as late as May, 1862. The case of the claimants is, no doubt, a hard one. The remedy, however, is not in the courts, but in an appeal to the government, in whose hands are the proceeds of the vessel. Decree below affirmed. [Case No. 6,067.]

MARVIN, District Judge. This ship being lost in this case and the materials sold for $1,682.14, and the cargo appraised at $2,872.25, making an aggregate of $4,559.39. It is ordered, and decreed, that the libellants have and recover in full compensation for their services, forty-five per cent. upon the net value of the property saved by them; the net value to be ascertained by deducting from the gross value the wharfage, storage, labor bills in landing and storing the cargo and reshipping it, merchants' commissions, and other charges; and upon the payment of said salvage, costs, and charges, the marshal restore said cargo to the master of said ship, for and on account of whom it may concern.

GENERAL AVERAGE—JETTISON—AFFREIGHTMENT—FULL FREIGHT—PART PROFITS—CHARTER PARTY—CARGO LIABLE TO DETERIORATE.

The ship Nathaniel Hooper sailed from Havana, in the island of Cuba, in June, 1838, with a cargo of sugars, to be carried to St. Petersburgh, via Boston. In the course of the voyage, about the 8th of July, 1838, she struck on the South Shoal, so called, of Nantucket Island, and was there left by the master and crew, after an unsuccessful jettison of part of the cargo, about one thousand boxes of sugar. She was left by her captain, and in this situation, being discovered by the brig Olive Chamberlain, a mate and part of the crew thereof were placed on board. The ship had suffered by striking on the shoal and leaked badly. She was put on the course for Boston, and afterwards fell in with a fishing schooner, the Climax, from which the assistance of an additional crew was obtained, and the ship then reached Boston about the 11th of July, and before the master himself arrived, who came round by land. She was immediately libelled for salvage, and the cause was heard by Judge Davis, of the district court of the United States. The evidence in the case was very voluminous, making nearly one thousand folio pages, and eight days were occupied in reading it.

Messrs. Mason, C. G. Loring, Betton, Choate, Bartlett, and Brigham, for salvors.

C. P. & B. R. Curtis and Blair & Parsons, for respondents.

DAVIS, District Judge, made a decree, giving to the salvors one-half of the nett proceeds, reserving some points, made by the owners and insurers, arising out of the alleged misconduct and perjury of a portion of the salvors, as bearing upon another part of the case, and to be decided when the question of the division of the salvage was considered. The opinion was quite brief. The judge decided that the Nathaniel Hooper, though not derelict when the master and crew first left her, because they left with the purpose of return, yet became derelict when the master and crew afterwards gave up the pursuit of her, in the belief that she had sunk. And, being thus a case of derelict, he felt bound by recent decisions to apply the rule of one-half, as he considered this rule now so firmly established as to leave the court almost without a discretion in the matter, unless there were manifest reasons for reducing the salvage, of extraordinary force, which reasons he could not clearly perceive in this case. From this decree the owners and insurers claimed an appeal. But the parties subsequently agreed among themselves upon the amount of salvage, and the decree of the district court was modified accordingly, to the effect that the whole sum to be awarded as salvage of the ship and cargo should be $25,000, and that a further sum of $2,000 should be charged on the funds in court for fees of the libelants' counsel, whereof the sum of $1,000 was to be paid to the counsel of the libelants in the original libel, and a like sum of $1,000 was to be paid to the counsel of the libelants in the supplemental libel.[1] The costs of the cause to be charged on the funds in court.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1839.

AFFREIGHTMENT — GENERAL AVERAGE — VOYAGE WAIVED—CONTRIBUTION—PRIZE PROCEEDINGS—SALVAGE—DELIVERY OF SHIP—DETERIORATION OF CARGO.

1. Where a ship, bound from Havana to St. Petersburg, with a cargo of sugars, shipped in part on freight and in part on half profits, with a right to enter and clear at Boston, in order to obtain a clean bill of health, struck on the south shoal of Nantucket, and was there, after a jettison of part of her cargo, abandoned by the master and crew, and the ship afterwards floated off the shoal, and was met and brought into port by salvors, and there libelled for salvage; and the ship was there repaired and made ready for sea; but the cargo was in part sold on account of damage, and part sold to pay duties, and part was delivered on bail to underwriters, and part was held in the custody of the court; and the ship was ready to take on board the cargo, if ready, but afterwards, owing to the admiralty proceedings, she was sold; held, under all the circumstances of the case, that the full freight of the sugars, of which there was a jettison, for the voyage, was to be allowed as part of the general average to be borne by the ship and cargo, and the freight, (pro rata), saved.

[Cited in Hugg v. Augusta Insurance & Banking Co., 7 How. (48 U. S.) 606; The Julia Blake, Case No. 7,578.]

2. No freight was due upon the sugars, sold at Boston on account of damage and their perishable nature; nor upon the sugars sold to pay duties; nor upon the sugars applied to pay the salvage.

3. Full freight was not due for the voyage upon the sugars delivered to the underwriters; because the ship had been sold before they were delivered to them on bail by the court; and, taking all the circumstances, the case was to be treated as one, in which both the owners of the ship, and of this part of the cargo, had reluctantly acquiesced in waiving any further prosecution of the voyage, as to that part of the cargo.

[Cited in Sayward v. Stevens, 3 Gray, 104.]

4. Full freight was not due for the voyage for the sugars in the custody of the court; because neither party was in any default on account thereof, the detention being occasioned by the common calamity, and the proceedings for salvage; and the owners thereof never having been in a condition to re-ship them.

[Cited in The Harriman, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 172.]

[Cited in Leckie v. Sears, 109 Mass. 428.]

5. But a pro rata freight was due upon the sugars delivered to the underwriters, and upon those detained in the custody of the court, for the voyage from Havana to Boston, upon the ground that there had been a mutual dispensation, by both parties, of any farther prosecution of the voyage.

6. No claim for half profits was admissible, as the cargo never arrived at St. Petersburg, and non constat, that it ever would have arrived there, or if it had arrived, would have yielded any profit, the whole matter of profits resting in contingency.

7. The freight, earned pro rata for the voyage, ought to contribute to the salvage with the ship and cargo.

8. In general, freight for the entire voyage can only be earned by a due performance of the voyage. The only acknowledged exception is, where there is no default or inability of the carrier-ship to perform the voyage, and the ship-owner is ready to forward them, but there is a default on the part of the owner of the cargo, or he waives a farther prosecution of the voyage.

9. Freight pro rata itineris is not ordinarily due, unless there has been a voluntary acceptance of the cargo at an intermediate port: and not where there has been an acceptance from mere necessity, occasioned by an overwhelming calamity or superior force.

[Cited in The Joseph Farwell, 31 Fed. 848.]

10. The doctrines of prize courts, in the administration of prize laws as to freight, are not generally applicable to cases of mere civil commercial adventures, or cases of civil salvage.

11. The capture of a neutral ship and cargo, if afterwards restitution is decreed, does not dissolve the contract of affreightment; but, at most, it only suspends it during the prize proceedings.

12. A mere unlivery of the cargo during the voyage, occasioned by prize proceedings, or by an overruling calamity, does not absolve the carrier ship from the obligation to carry the goods to the port of destination.

[Cited in The Star of Hope, Case No. 13,312.]

13. In case of prize proceedings, if a neutral ship, carrying a neutral cargo in no default, would earn her full freight, she must wait and be ready to take the cargo on to the port of destination, when restored; otherwise, at most (it seems), a pro rata freight only would be due.

14. The cases where freight has been allowed in prize proceedings reviewed.

15. Courts of admiralty have full jurisdiction, as incidental to cases of prize, and salvage, and other proceedings in rem, to decree freight to the ship owner in proper cases.

16. Where proceedings in rem are had in the admiralty for salvage, neither party is bound to obtain a delivery of the ship and cargo on bail; and it is no matter of default on either side, to wait for the regular termination of the salvage proceedings.

17. In suits for salvage, courts of admiralty will not ordinarily, without the consent of the salvors, deliver either ship or cargo on stipulation to the claimants, where, from the circumstances of the case, it is apparent to the court that a proportion, and not a specific or gross sum, ought to be allowed as salvage.

18. If the cargo is liable to deteriorate or perish, or the ship to be injured by the delay incident to the salvage proceedings, the proper course is to apply to the court for a sale thereof. It is not a matter of right of either party to have a delivery on bail in such cases.

19. Where a charter-party contained covenants that the general owner should equip, victual, man and sail the ship during the voyage, and carry the outward and homeward cargoes to their proper destinations, and the cabin and some part of the ship were retained by the owner; held, that the general owner remained owner for the voyage, although the cargoes were on joint account of himself and the co-charterer.

[Cited in Sheriffs v. Pugh, 22 Wis. 276; Swift v. Tatner, 89 Ga. 660, 15 S. E. 844.]

20. Where the master agrees for a specific sum, half of a stipulated freight, to victual, man and navigate the ship on certain voyages under the direction of the owner, the master is not owner or part-owner for the voyage.

[Cited in Hill v. The Golden Gate, Case No. 6,491.]

21. The shipper of cargo is not entitled to salvage earned in the voyage, unless the stoppage and deviation were authorized by him. Under other circumstances, his only remedy for any loss, occasioned by the stoppage and deviation, is against the master and owner.

22. The grounds, on which salvage is allowed to the owner of the ship, stated, and the distinction between his case and that of the shipper of the cargo commented on and explained.

[Cited in The Camanche, 8 Wall. (75 U. S.) 473; The Persian Monarch, 23 Fed. 822, 823.]

23. In salvage cases the general rule is, to decree all the costs and charges in the case to be borne and paid by the property saved, and apportioned among the claimants according to their respective interests. The only admitted exceptions are, where the charges have been occasioned by the gross neglect or laches of the claimant, in which case they are to be borne by him; or where the right has been forfeited by the misconduct of the salvors, in which case the court refuse any allowance to them, and compel the guilty parties to bear their own costs, expenses and charges.

[Cited in Merithew v. Sampson, 4 Allen, 195.]

This was a suit for salvage, brought by appeal from the decree of the district court, awarding a salvage of one moiety of the ship Nathaniel Hooper, and cargo, to the salvors. After the appeal, the amount of salvage was adjusted between the libellants and the claimants, and the decree of the district court was, by consent, modified accordingly. The whole salvage awarded on the ship and cargo, was, by agreement, $25,000. The claim, now brought before the court, was that of the owners of the ship, for freight to be paid to them on the remainder of the cargo, not exhausted by the claim for salvage, upon the ground of the ordinary lien belonging to the owners of the ship. The facts necessary to the understanding of the case, are as follow: Nicholson Broughton was the owner of three quarters of the ship, and John Bogardus, the master, was owner of the remaining fourth part. In the month of June, 1838, the ship, being at Havana, in the island of Cuba, took on board a cargo of sugars, shipped by George Knight & Co., to be carried to St. Petersburg, via Boston, (the object of stopping at Boston being merely to obtain a clean bill of health,) part of the sugars being shipped for a specific freight, and part on half profits. By the bills of lading, part of the sugars (about one third) were consigned and deliverable to Messrs. Cramer Brothers, at St. Petersburg, or assigns, and the other two third parts to the order of Messrs. Holford & Co. of London, or assigns. But the whole cargo was to be forwarded to Messrs. Cramer Brothers, at St. Petersburg, who were to sell the same, and hold the proceeds of two thirds, to extinguish the claims of Messrs. Holford & Co. on the same. The ship sailed on the voyage with the cargo, and in the course thereof, about the 8th of July, 1838, struck on the South Shoal, so called, of Nantucket Island, and was there left by the master and crew, after an unsuccessful jettison of part of the cargo, about 1,000 boxes of sugar. She afterwards floated off the shoal, and went adrift to sea. In this situation she was discovered by the brig Olive Chamberlain, and the mate and part of the crew thereof were placed on board. The ship had suffered by striking on the shoal, and leaked badly; she was put on the course for Boston; and afterwards fell in with a fishing schooner, the Climax, from which the assistance of an additional crew was obtained; and the ship then reached Boston about the 11th of July. Admiralty proceedings, in rem, were immediately (on the next day) had against the ship and cargo for salvage; the cargo was unlivered; a survey thereof was directed by the order of the court; and the surveyor having reported, that a large part thereof was in a perishable condition, it was ordered by the court, that all the damaged sugars should be sold; and they were accordingly sold on the 17th of July, by the marshal of the district. On the 17th of July, upon the claim and petition of the owners of the ship, she was ordered to be delivered up to them upon stipulation to pay the salvage. The ship being so delivered up, and Broughton, who had procured insurance on the freight and half profits, having abandoned his right thereto to the underwriters, they refused to accept the abandonment, but authorized him to go on and repair the ship. Messrs. Bates & Co., to whom the ship was consigned at Boston for entry and despatch (meaning for the purpose of obtaining a clean bill of health), were the agents of Messrs. Cramer Brothers, in many commercial transactions, but were not their general agents. They had procured insurance on the one-third of the cargo consigned to Messrs. Cramer, from certain insurance companies in Boston, and on the 10th of July, abandoned the same to those companies, who accepted the same, and, within sixty days afterwards, paid a total loss thereon. On the 30th of July, the ship being fully repaired, Broughton, with the consent of the underwriters, gave notice to Messrs. Bates & Co., of Boston, that the ship was repaired and in readiness to receive the cargo of sugars to be carried forward to St. Petersburg. Messrs. Bates & Co. replied by stating, that they had no knowledge of the cargo of sugars, and had taken no cognizance thereof, except under the direction of the marshal. On the 7th of August, Messrs. Broughton and Bogardus severally filed in the district court the claim and petition for freight, upon which the present controversy turned, in which the foregoing facts were in substance stated. On the 8th of August, the libellants petitioned for an appraisement and sale of the residue of the cargo unsold, (the same being in the custody of the court), upon which an order was passed, on the 9th of October, by the court, to sell so much thereof as should be sufficient to pay the duties and charges due thereon; and it was accordingly sold by the marshal on the 24th of October. On the 10th of August, Broughton addressed letters to the Suffolk Insurance Company, the Columbian Insurance Company, and to William S. Skinner, agent for certain foreign underwriters, of a similar purport to his letter of the 30th of July to Messrs. Bates & Co. At this time the companies had not accepted the abandonment made to them respectively. On the 7th of September, one half of the ship was sold by the owners, and the other half on the 26th of the same month. It is a fact, also stated in the case, that Broughton was the owner of the brig General Glover, which arrived in Boston on the 27th of July, which was a good coppered vessel, and could have carried on the cargo to St. Petersburg, the harbor of which port closes with ice in October or November, and opens again in April or May of every year.

But to proceed with the historical facts. On the 2d of November, the Suffolk Insurance Company, the Columbian Insurance Company, and the Tremont Insurance Company, of Boston, to whom the one third of the sugars had been abandoned, and the abandonment had been accepted, and the loss paid as above mentioned, applied by claim and petition, to have the same appraised and delivered to them upon stipulation, which was accordingly granted by the court, no objection appearing to have been made thereto by any of the parties in interest before the court. On the 26th of February, 1839, Messrs. Bates & Co. addressed a letter to Broughton, for the owners of the ship, stating, that they had received advices from Messrs. Holford & Co., of London, to have the sound remaining sugars shipped to St. Petersburg without delay, asking him to decide either to send them forward, or not, so that application might be made to the court accordingly for a delivery on appraisement for that purpose; to which Broughton replied on the 1st of March, declining to have any thing farther done on his part in the business. On the same day, Messrs. Bates & Co. made application to the court for a delivery to them of the residue of the sugars in the custody of the court, belonging to Messrs. Holford & Co., and the underwriters on their account; which application was refused by the court; and the sugars still remained in the custody of the court. On the 15th of the same month, the insurance companies, which had underwritten upon the cargo, and Messrs. Bates & Co., for Holford & Co., intervened and made claim thereto, and answer to the libels, in order to contest the claim to salvage. The final decree of the district court in the premises was made on the 11th of May, 1839, from which the present appeal was taken. The answer to the claim for freight was not put in the district court, the parties intending to appeal from the decree, and it was filed in this court by consent of all parties. It contested the general claim to freight, and insisted, that, if any whatever is due, it ought to contribute to the jettison as a general average, and ought to contribute towards the salvage, the latter having been apportioned by the decree on ship and cargo only.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Such are the most material facts, in the present case, which are somewhat complicated, but all of which have been deemed important to be brought to the view of the court upon the present occasion. The question of freight has been accordingly argued under two aspects: (1) Whether a full freight is due upon any, and, if any, upon what part of the cargo; (2) if a full freight is not due, whether a pro rata freight is due upon any, and if upon any, upon what part of the cargo. There is certainly a great deal of novelty in some of the circumstances, under which the claim is presented; and the law, which ought to govern it, is by no means satisfactorily established in any of the authorities. To a certain extent, however, there are principles, which may safely conduct us to the correct conclusion.

There are one or two considerations presented by the case, which may be dismissed in a few words. In respect to the jettison of the cargo, it is clear, that it constitutes a case of general average, to be borne by the ship, freight, and cargo, ultimately saved; and of course in that contribution the entire freight of the cargo thrown overboard is to be added to the loss, as a part of the sacrifice, and is to be allowed to the ship-owners. This is the settled course in the adjustment of general average, and is so laid down in Lord Tenterden's work on the Law of Shipping. Abb. Shipp. (Am. Ed. 1829) pt. 3, c. 8, § 16, pp. 358–360. In respect to the sugars, which were damaged, and brought in and sold on account of their perishable nature, they are not liable to pay any freight whatsoever. As to them the entire voyage neither was, nor in fact could have been, performed, but it was defeated by an overwhelming calamity, common to the whole adventure, which made the sale a sale from necessity at an intermediate port. In such a case I conceive it to be now well settled, that no freight whatever is due. Many of the cases will be found collected in the text and the notes to the American edition of Abbott on Shipping, in 1829, pt. 3, c. 7, §§ 9–17 f, and notes pp. 300–329. But the cases on which I mainly rely are Armroyd v. Union Ins. Co. 3 Bin. 437; Hurtin v. Union Ins. Co. [Case No. 6,942]; Callender v. Ins. Co. of North America, 5 Bin. 525; Gray v. Waln, 2 Serg. & R. 229; Marine Ins. Co. v. United Ins. Co., 9 Johns. 186; Caze v. Baltimore Ins. Co., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 358; Liddard v. Lopes, 10 East, 526; and Hunter v. Prinsep, Id. 378; and the learned Commentaries of Mr. Chancellor Kent. 2 Kent, Comm. (3d Ed.) lect. 47, pp. 228, 229. There has here been no voluntary acceptance of the damaged sugars at an intermediate port, dispensing with the farther carriage of them, but an involuntary sale from necessity, to prevent them from there perishing by a total loss. There is no principle, which would justify a pro rata freight under such circumstances. I am aware of the decision of Lord Stowell (then Sir William Scott), in the case of The Friends, Edw. Adm. 246, the circumstances of which case are not very fully stated; and it does not appear, whether the sale of the ship and cargo, to pay salvage on a recapture, was involuntary, or with the consent of the parties interested. Certainly it does not appear, that the goods were perishable and sold from necessity. It is fair, however, to state, that his lordship does not appear to have decided the case upon any such distinction; but upon the broad principle, that, as the loss arose from the common incapacity both of the ship and the cargo to perform the voyage by reason of the blockade of the port of destination, equity suggested, that the loss should be divided; and he accordingly directed the ship and cargo to be restored upon payment of a moiety of the freight for the voyage. The case, therefore, was disposed of upon circumstances not strictly applicable to the present; for the sale of the ship and cargo seems not to have been held lawful or justifiable. I must also say, with all deference to so great a judge, that the case does not stand upon principles entirely satisfactory. Certainly it is not consistent with the doctrine of the supreme court, in Caze v. Baltimore Ins. Co., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 358; and its authority, as far as applies to the present case, is overcome by his subsequent judgment in The Louisa, 1 Dod. 317.

In regard to the goods sold to pay the duties, it seems to me, that they fall under the like predicament. The sale was a natural, if not a necessary, consequence, of the common calamity, and the unlading and other proceedings at the intermediate port, where the salvage was decreed; and therefore it was in a just sense proximate to the original cause of the loss. The owners were in no default for the sale, and were compelled to submit to it, as an involuntary, and not as a voluntary act—to discharge the superior claim of the government. Under such circumstances, as they have not co-operated in the sale, they are not liable for any freight; not for a full freight, for the goods never were in a condition to be carried to St. Petersburg; and not for a pro rata freight, for the owners have not accepted them at an intermediate port, or dispensed with their farther carriage. We cannot presume, that they have derived any advantage from the sale here; and if they have, it cannot found a right to a pro rata freight, but was accidental, and without volition or election on their part. They were not bound to pay the duties out of other funds; and, indeed, it does not appear, that they had any other means on the spot to pay them.

In regard to the goods sold to pay the salvage, or moneys advanced to relieve the cargo from the salvage, to the extent of the salvage, they are to be treated exactly as if they had been lost on the voyage; for in the eye of the law it is a loss of them pro tanto, to the extent of the salvage; and therefore no freight whatsoever is due thereon. This doctrine was clearly settled in Luke v. Lyde, 2 Burrows, 882, where the owner had received his whole cargo, paying a moiety of their value as salvage; and Lord Mansfield expressly held, that, to the extent of that moiety, the cargo was to be considered as lost; so that half the goods were considered as lost, and half saved. Whatever may have been the doubts, entertained upon other points decided in that case, upon this point it has never been doubted or denied, at least to my knowledge. Lord Mansfield there took notice of a doctrine, not improper to be brought under review in the present case, that the salvors (in that case they were recaptors) are not bound to agree to a valuation, but might insist upon having the goods actually sold, if they had pleased, and taken their share of the produce of the sale, and thereby there would have been a total loss to that extent. What he thus states is ordinarily true; and probably is rarely or never departed from in the practice of courts of admiralty, unless by consent of the parties, where, from the circumstances of the case, the court clearly see that a proportion, and not a specific sum, ought to be allowed as salvage.

In regard to the claim for half profits, it is wholly inadmissible upon general principles. The half profits which were to be allowed, were the half profits upon a sale at St. Petersburg. The goods never have arrived there; and non constat, even independent of this calamity, that they ever could have arrived there, or when they had arrived there, if ever, what would have been the profits, if any. The whole claim, therefore, rests in mere possibilities and contingencies, which are incapable of being appreciated by a court of justice. The supreme court of the United States have on this account rejected the claim of profits, as an item of damages, even for a manifest tort committed on property, going on a foreign voyage, and intercepted by the wrongful act of the captors. The Amiable Nancy, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 546, 560.

A suggestion has also been made at the argument, that if the petitioners have any claim to freight, the claim cannot be enforced by this court, because the lien for the freight has been displaced by the superior right of the salvors, and by the property having been transferred, by the possession of the marshal, to the custody of the court; and besides, as to Broughton's share, it has been transferred by the abandonment to the underwriters on freight. This last consideration is disposed of by the fact, that at the time, when the petition was entered, the underwriters on the freight had not accepted the abandonment. It was, therefore, rightfully filed to avail for the benefit of whom it might ultimately concern, like the claim of a trustee for his cestui que trust, or an assignor of a bond for the benefit of his assignee. The other grounds are equally untenable. The lien for freight, if any is due, is not displaced by the superior lien for salvage; but, subordinate to that, it has full validity and operation. The possession of the property by the court through its officers, is a possession protective of the interests of all concerned, and not displacing the rights or lien of any party. Nothing in point of jurisdiction is better founded, or in point of practice more extensively acted upon, than the rights of courts of admiralty to recognise and enforce all claims to freight, and, indeed, all other liens attached to property in their custody. In such cases the court considers itself as bound as matter of duty, to act in rem for the benefit of all concerned. See The Racehorse, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 101; The Martha, Id. 106, note; The Angerona, 1 Dod. 382.

The case, then, in the view, which I take of the matter, is reduced to the simple consideration, whether any freight is due upon the portion of the goods delivered to the underwriters, and on that which is still retained in the custody of the court, or on either. And let us first consider, whether full freight is due. The general principle of the maritime law certainly is, that the contract for the conveyance of merchandise on a voyage is in its nature an entire contract, and unless it be completely performed by the delivery of the goods at the place of destination, no freight whatsoever is due; for a partial conveyance is not within the terms or the intent of the contract; and unless it be completely performed by the delivery of the goods at the place of destination, no freight whatsoever is due, and the merchant may well say: "Non in haec faedera veni." For this proposition no authorities need in the present state of law be cited, for it is established, as well upon principle, as authority. In Lord Tenterden's Treatise on Shipping (Abb. Shipp., Am. Ed. 1829, pt. 3, c. 7, § 1, p. 273); and in Mr. Chancellor Kent's Commentaries (3 Kent, Comm., 3d Ed., lect. 47, pp. 227, 228) it is laid down in broad terms; and in Caze v. Baltimore Ins.

Co., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 358, 362, the supreme court fully recognized it, saying: "Freight in general is not due, unless the voyage be performed." Such, then, being the general rule, and the voyage not having in the present case been performed by the transportation of the goods to St. Petersburg, it is certainly incumbent upon those who assert the claim, to show, that it falls within the spirit or sense of some exception. There are certainly exceptions to the general rule; but they all stand upon special and peculiar grounds. There are cases, where full freight is due, notwithstanding the goods have not arrived at the port of destination; and there are cases, where a pro rata freight is due, notwithstanding the like non-arrival. The latter will presently come under consideration. The former is properly before us in the view of the case, which I propose now to discuss. And I think the whole of the cases, in which the full freight is upon the ordinary principles of commercial law due, notwithstanding the non-arrival of the goods at the port of destination, may be reduced to the single statement, that the non-arrival has been occasioned by no default or inability of the carrier ship, but has been occasioned by the default or waiver of the merchant-shipper. In the former case, the merchant-shipper cannot avail himself of his own default to escape from the payment of freight; in the latter case he dispenses with the entire fulfilment of the original contract for his own interest and purposes. Thus, for example, if the goods be seized or detained at an intermediate port for the illegal conduct, or wrongful act, of the shipper, or if, at such intermediate port, he voluntarily insists upon receiving, and does receive his goods, the carrier ship being ready and able to carry them to their destination, there can be no doubt, that full freight is due for the whole voyage. I have said, that this is the result of the exceptions so far as they stand upon the ordinary principles of commercial law; and no case has been cited, where any of our courts of common law or equity have held any different doctrine. In the interpretation of commercial contracts, the decisions of these courts are entitled to the fullest consideration and weight; for, in general, they guide, although they do not always control, courts of admiralty in the exercise of their own judgment in the interpretation of such contracts. See The Louisa, 1 Dod. 317, 319; The Isabella Jacobina, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 77. I am aware, that in cases of prize and cases of capture and recapture, courts of admiralty have adopted some doctrines not seemingly in exact accordance with the doctrine above stated. But it is not safe or correct in many cases to reason from the peculiar doctrines arising out of the administration of international law and policy in courts of prize, to the ordinary exigencies of commerce, or the ordinary interpretation of common civil contracts. Courts of prize exercise a very peculiar and extensive jurisdiction sui generis, upon very enlarged views, and a sort of international discretion, which do not belong to the common functions of other courts, or even of courts of admiralty in the exercise of their jurisdiction, as instance courts.

With these principles in view, let us consider the cases cited at the bar on the subject of full freight. The first is the case of the The Racehorse, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 101, where a British ship was freighted from Liverpool in ballast to St. Martin's and Lisbon, to bring a cargo of fruit to Ireland; and was taken on her return voyage by a French privateer off Falmouth, and afterwards recaptured and brought in to Falmouth. Upon the capture the master was taken out; and, owing to that fact, no claim was given into the court of admiralty for the cargo until the 17th of July, the ship having been restored by consent on the 2d of July; and restitution of the cargo was not decreed until the 16th of November. A claim was made for the full freight of the voyage, although the vessel refused to wait until the restitution of the cargo, the owner of the ship being dead, and his administrator declining to interfere. Lord Stowell (then Sir William Scott) allowed the full freight, upon the ground that the ship was not bound to wait. On that occasion he said: "Something is to be conceded by way of accommodation; a reasonable time is to be allowed; and, if it is not allowed, a proportion of the freight is to be deducted. But I cannot say, that a ship shall wait all this time for the mere chance of taking on the cargo, if eventually it shall be restored. It is said, that the contract was totally dissolved; but by whose means happened it that it was so dissolved? It was in no degree owing to the owner of the ship; but that the owner of the cargo was not ready to proceed. Though he acted as discharged from his contract, he is substantially entitled to the benefit of it. Upon these grounds, I am of opinion, that the ship is entitled to the whole freight." But he deducted therefrom the contributory share of the freight for the salvage on the recapture. Now, with all possible respect for this eminent judge, I cannot accede to the doctrine here promulgated, under any of its aspects, at least as applicable to ordinary cases of civil salvage. And I must also say, that the reasoning itself is not quite consistent throughout. In the first place, it is an inadmissible assumption, that the capture dissolved the contract of affreightment. At most, it only suspended it; and it reattached upon the recapture. Recapture confers a title to salvage only, and restores, and does not extinguish, the rights of neutrals, and, a fortiori, not the rights of fellow-subjects upon the admitted principles of the British laws. But if the contract were dissolved by the common calamity of capture and recapture, the voyage being unperformed, how does that give any rights to the ship-owner, beyond those of the owner of the cargo? This dissolution takes place, without any default on either side, by mere operation of law; and then the parties, as it seems to me, are entitled to stand in pari jure upon their contract. If the whole voyage is not performed, the freight is not due. Lord Stowell himself admits, that the ship was bound to wait a reasonable time, after she was restored, or, otherwise, a pro rata freight only would be due. But, if the contract was positively dissolved, and the cargo was not ready to proceed, what ground is there to say, that the ship-owner, being discharged from his contract, is bound to wait an hour? His rights, if any, are complete at the time of the dissolution of the contract. Surely he is not bound to wait to fulfil a duty, from which he is discharged. And, indeed, it does not strike me, that there is the least difference, upon the principle stated by his lordship, whether the cargo was ready to proceed or not. If the ship was ready, and the contract was dissolved, upon what grounds can the master be required to do an act, from which, as a matter of contract, he is released? In the case of The Martha, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 106, note, the same learned judge granted full freight under the following circumstances. An American ship, bound from America to Amsterdam, was captured in the Channel by a British cruiser, and brought in on the 20th of December, 1800; and the ship was restored on the 10th of January, 1801. On the 15th of January, a commission of unlivery passed; and on the 16th, one fourth of the goods composing the cargo was restored. It being necessary, in order to get at these goods, to unliver the rest of the cargo, the whole was accordingly unlivered. The claimant of the goods insisted on the ship's taking them on board again, offering to be at the expense of the reshipment, and to have them carried on to their destination upon the original freight. This was refused by the master; and the question was, whether he was entitled to full freight on these goods or not. Lord Stowell gave the full freight upon the mere dry authority of a decison of Sir James Marriott, which he thought himself bound to follow. For myself, I feel bound to say, that I should have been better pleased if the learned judge had applied his great mind to examine the case upon principle, and instructed us as to the grounds upon which such a doctrine is maintainable. I am unable to perceive any, either of law, or of reason, or even of common justice. Then came the case of The Hoffnung, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 231, before the same learned judge. It was the case of a capture of a neutral ship and cargo in August, 1805, made by a British cruiser. On the 1st of September, a decree of restitution of the ship was passed, and a commission of unlivery of the cargo was on the same day taken out by the captors, and the unlivery was completed on the 26th of September. Notice was given to the master before the unlivery of the whole of the cargo, that he would be required to carry it on the voyage. The claim for the cargo was given in on the 24th of September, and on the 28th of the same month the cargo was restored. The master was then required to take it on board again; but he refused, and made a claim for full freight. Lord Stowell, upon the footing of the case of The Martha, already cited, held the ship entitled to full freight, and said; "The contract between them (the parties) ceased by the act of unlading. At the moment of separation the vessel acquires a right to proceed; and it is by accident only, that she continues here. That accident cannot, I think, have the effect of reviving the contract, which had been before dissolved." To this case, as to the former, the same substantial objection applies. The capture of a neutral ship has never been admitted by the courts of the United States to operate a dissolution of the contract of affreightment. At most it only suspends it; and when restitution takes place, the parties are also restored to their antecedent rights. The vis major having ceased, the jus postliminii operates upon the case. In my humble judgment, it would be a most mischievous doctrine to the great interests of commerce and navigation, that a mere unlivery of cargo by superior force, or by the order of a court of prize, should operate to dissolve a contract made between mere neutrals. How is it in relation to other cases, arising in the common course of navigation? Suppose a ship meets with a calamity in the course of a voyage, and is compelled to put into a port to repair, and there the cargo is required to be unlivered, in order to make the repairs, or to insure its safety, or ascertain and repair the damage done to it; would such an unlivery dissolve the contract for the voyage? Certainly not. And if the contract is dissolved, by operation of law, how happens it, that the ship-owner can entitle himself to assert a right to freight, when he has not performed the voyage; and the owner of the cargo, who has been in no default, and is prevented by the peril or the loss, or by an unlawful capture, from receiving it, is to be treated, as if he had violated his contract? If dissolved, it seems to me, that the contract must be treated, as dissolved by an overwhelming calamity, which absolves both parties from all obligations under it. Neither party has contracted with reference to such a state of circumstances; and the law would seem to be manifestly unjust, if, in such a case, it threw the whole burthen on one side. The case of The Angerona, 1 Dod. 382, on the instance side of the court, requires but a single remark. The full freight was there given, avowedly upon the ground, that the owner of the cargo was in default, and that the sale of a part of the cargo at an intermediate port, for which freight was demanded, was occasioned by that default. Whether the facts of the case, which are very imperfectly stated, justified that conclusion or not, it is not for this court to say. But the decision proceeds upon a very clear principle of law, that the whole freight is due, if the whole would have been earned but for the default of the owner of the cargo. In the case of The Isabella Jacobina, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 77, an application was made, on the part of a Swedish ship, for freight under a charter-party to go from Plymouth to Radstow, there to take in a cargo of pilchards for Venice. The ship had sailed to Radstow, and taken in her cargo there, and had proceeded a few days on her voyage, when she met with bad weather, and returned to Falmouth. A few days afterwards an embargo was laid on Swedish vessels; the cargo was unloaded, and restored to the owners, who were British merchants. Lord Stowell held, that no freight whatever was due, upon the ground, that the ship had performed but a small part of her voyage, and the Swedish embargo having taken place, it rendered the fulfilment of the contract impossible. The cargo could not wait till the embargo might be taken off, and, being British property, it was restored. Now, this case seems to proceed upon true principles. As an unlivery of the cargo had taken place under the authority of the British government, it seems not distinguishable from the cases already cited, except that the ship was not ready to go on, but the cargo was. If the contract was dissolved by the embargo and unlivery, which was of a hostile nature, there might have been room for the suggestion, that the rights of the ship-owner ought not to be affected thereby. In truth, however, if so dissolved, without any default on either side, the true doctrine applicable to such a case would seem to be, that neither party could claim any thing under the contract of affreightment. The case of The Louisa, 1 Dod. 317, approaches somewhat nearer to the present. There, the ship and cargo, bound on a voyage from Quebec to the island of Madeira, was captured in December, 1812, by an American privateer, and recaptured on the 11th of January, 1813, by a British ship of war. At the time of the recapture, the ship was in a distressed state, having had some of her masts carried away in a gale. A prize-master was put on board with orders to proceed to the first port in England; but the ship having twenty-four feet of water in the hold, and the crew being exhausted, it was found impossible to proceed to England; and the ship put into Corunna, where the cargo was disposed of under the authority of the British consul. On a suit for civil salvage in addition to military salvage for the recapture, the court sustained the claim for both; and a claim was made for freight. Lord Stowell refused the claim saying; "With respect to freight I am of opinion, as well upon the equity of the case as upon the authority, which has been cited (Hunter v. Prinsep, 10 East, 378), that none is due, the voyage having been totally defeated by the sale of the goods at Corunna." That is precisely in coincidence with the doctrine, which I have already had occasion to assert in the present opinion. See, also, The Wilelmina Elenora, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 234.

The cases in the admiralty, therefore, do not, in my judgment, in any manner shake the proper doctrine, which is deducible from the common law authorities upon the subject of freight in ordinary commercial adventures. Then, do the circumstances of the present case furnish any distinct ground for the claim of a full freight? It has been suggested, that the owners of the cargo have been guilty of some default in not obtaining a delivery of the cargo at an earlier period, when the ship was restored and repaired, and ready to receive it. It has been said, in reply, that there was no default on any side; but if there was any, it certainly was a prior default of the master and crew of the ship in deserting her, when she struck on the South Shoal, and leaving her to float off as a derelict; and that all the subsequent detention and loss have arisen from that cause. My opinion is, that there has been no default on either side. The striking on the shoal was a peril of the sea, and the desertion of the ship was an act justified by the necessities of the case. I agree, that the subsequent occupation of the ship by the salvors was a common and most valuable service consequent upon the abandonment of her; and that all the detention has arisen from that source. Still, it is but an incident to a common calamity. It is said, that the ship being ready on the 30th of July to receive the cargo, and due notice being given thereof, she was entitled to her full freight, because the cargo was not then ready to go on the voyage. That it was not ready, is admitted. But was this owing to any default of the owners, or was it a natural, if not a necessary, consequence of the common calamity? My opinion is, that it was the latter. What were the circumstances of the case at that time? The owners of the cargo were not upon the spot; but resided in a distant country. The Messrs. Holford and Company had no agent here, authorized to act for them, and to stipulate for their part of the goods on bail, if a delivery could have been obtained of them from the court. In cases of salvage, I do not know, that the owners of either ship or cargo have, as a matter of right, any claim to have either of them delivered on bail at an appraisement. If either of them be perishable, or may sustain injury from the delay of the salvage proceedings, a sale may be, and usually is, authorized by the court. But, unless the salvors assent to a delivery on bail, it is not the usual practice of the court to direct a delivery on appraisement. The salvors have quite as strong a right to insist upon having their claims fixed by a sale. And where the court clearly sees from the nature of the case, that the salvage ought to be, not a gross sum, but a proportion, I think it would be difficult to find any duty of the court to deliver on an appraisement. At least such a case would present a ground for the exercise of sound discretion on the part of the court in refusing it. But here the owners were not only not upon the spot, but one-third of the cargo was abandoned by the agent of Messrs. Cramer to the underwriters on that part of the cargo on the 10th of July, long before the ship was repaired. The agents, therefore, could take no steps for the delivery on bail. The underwriters, if any persons, were bound to make the application. They did make it on the 2d of November, and with the consent of the salvors obtained a delivery on bail of the remaining sugars abandoned to them. But it was certainly then too late to carry them on to St. Petersburg that season. It is said, that they could by an application at an earlier period have obtained a delivery in time to have been sent on that season. I do not know, that there is any proof of that; and if there were, it would still remain to inquire, whether there was any duty on their part to submit to an appraisement and delivery on stipulation. My opinion is, that there was no such duty. It was an affair of discretion to be exercised by them or not at their own pleasure. They were in no default; for the property being brought into a court of admiralty by a claim of salvage, they had a right to wait the regular course of proceedings on such a claim, without being treated as wrong doers or defaulters. If the master and owner of the ship were so solicitous to proceed at once on the voyage, why did they not offer to procure such delivery on bail, and become themselves the stipulators for the underwriters?

But what is most material in this posture of the case, is, that in the intermediate time, between the 30th of July, when the notice was given, and the 2d of November, when the delivery was obtained, the owners of the ship had, in fact, sold her; one half on the 7th September, and the other half on the 26th of September. Now, this sale, in my judgment, was a complete discontinuance of the offer, admitting it to be a continuing offer up to that time, to receive the cargo on board, and carry it to St. Petersburg. They had then parted with their power and control over the ship; and they had no right to substitute any other ship or vehicle of conveyance in her stead. It was not a change of ship required or justified by necessity; but it was a sale from choice. So that it seems to me, that the sale of the ship was a withdrawal of the offer to carry the cargo to St. Petersburg, on the part of the owners of the ship; and the obtaining of the one third from the custody of the court, on stipulation, without any notice or request to carry on that part of the cargo to St. Petersburg, was a voluntary acceptance thereof by the underwriters at Boston, and a dispensation of the ship-owners from the duty of carrying them farther. In respect to the other part of the cargo belonging to Messrs. Holford and Company, there was, as has been stated, no agent here, who was authorized to require a delivery of them from the court; and certainly there was no duty on any party to require it; or if there was any such duty, it was a duty falling on the master of the ship. These goods still remain in the custody of the court. They have never been delivered to any party, and the court has refused to deliver them. But Messrs. Bates and Company, as agents of Messrs. Holford and Company, in February, 1839, gave notice to the ship-owners, that they wished them carried on to St. Petersburg; and the latter then declined to do so. From this period, therefore, there was a relinquishment of all attempts on either side to enforce a strict performance of the original contract. My opinion, upon these circumstances, is, that no claim is made out in law, or in equity, or in general justice, for a full freight. I think, that no party has been in default; and each has stood upon his rights, and has awaited, and had a right to await, the regular determination of the admiralty proceedings. If the ship-owners would have earned their entire freight, they were bound to perform their whole contract. The progress of the voyage was interrupted by a common calamity; and hitherto there has been no opportunity for the ship and cargo to resume the voyage, as the admiralty proceedings have not yet terminated. "Adhuc sub judice lis est." If the ship owners would have entitled themselves to an entire freight on the property saved from the salvage, and capable of being carried on, they should have waited, until the whole adventure could be resumed; and then have required the owners of the cargo to allow them to carry it forward, when it was released from the admiralty proceedings. They have elected a different course; and they are, in my judgment, bound by their election. They ask the court to give them full freight, although it has not been earned by a completion of the voyage, and although the other side has been guilty of no default, and has not freed them from the obligation. They sold their ship within a sort period after she was repaired for the voyage; and yet they ask a compensation, as if they had borne all the expenses, and burthens and perils of the subsequent part of the voyage. I repeat it, I can find no law, or equity, or justice, in such a claim, and therefore I do not hesitate to reject it.

The next question is, whether there is any just claim to a pro rata freight. I think there is. Taking all the circumstances together, I think the farther prosecution of the voyage has been abandoned or waived by both parties. The ship-owners have sold their ship, and can no longer complete it. The underwriters on the one third of the cargo have not asked to have the voyage prosecuted. The owners of the other two thirds have asked it; but under circumstances in which it became impossible for them to ship it. The parties have, therefore, withdrawn from the contest, without having been able to prosecute the voyage, or effectually to seek its prosecution beyond the port of Boston. The just operation of law upon this state of things, in my judgment, is that which I have indicated. The owners of the cargo are content to take their goods here, and the ship-owners to leave them here. It is, if I may so say, a reluctant acquiescence forced upon them by an overruling necessity. I shall, therefore, decree a pro rata freight, leaving the amount to be ascertained by the auditor to be appointed by the court, according to the agreement of the parties. There is another point suggested at the argument, and that is, whether the freight pro rata ought to contribute either to the general average, or to the salvage, or to both. My opinion is, that it ought to contribute to both. To the general average, because it is one of the interests saved by the jettison; to the salvage, because it is an expense incurred, like the general average, for the benefit of all concerned. [2]

After the delivery of the foregoing opinion, another question was presented to the court. One of the salvor vessels was the brig Olive Chamberlain, of which Samuel C. Hunt was owner, and Zacheus Holmes was master. Salvage was awarded to the master and owner of the brig by the decree; and now a claim was interposed by John Dyer for a moiety of the salvage decreed to Hunt, upon the ground, that he was joint-owner of the brig with Hunt for the voyage, under a charter-party executed by Hunt on the one part, and Hunt and Dyer on the other part. He also claimed salvage as joint-owner of the cargo for the voyage with Hunt.

The charter-party was in substance as follows:

"This charter-party, made and concluded upon in the city of Boston, the twenty-fifth day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, between Samuel C. Hunt, owner of the brig Olive Chamberlain, of Boston, of the burthen of two hundred and six tons, or thereabouts, register measurement, now lying in the harbor of Boston, of the first part, and John Dyer and Samuel C. Hunt of the second part, witnesseth, that the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the covenants and agreements hereinafter mentioned, to be kept and performed by the said party of the second part, doth covenant and agree on the freighting and chartering of the said vessel unto the said party of the second part, for a voyage from Boston to the Havana, in the island of Cuba, and back to Boston, on the terms as following, that is to say: First.—The said party of the first part doth engage, that the said vessel in and during the said voyage shall be kept tight, stanch, well fitted, tackled, and provided with every requisite, and with men and provisions necessary for such voyage. Second.—The said party of the first part doth further engage, that the whole of said vessel, (with the exception of the cabin, and the necessary room for the accommodation of the crew, and the stowage of the sails, cables and provisions), shall be at the sole use and disposal of the said party of the second part during the voyage aforesaid; and that no goods or merchandise whatever shall be laden on board, otherwise than from the said party of the second part, or their agent, without their consent, on pain of forfeiture of the amount of freight agreed upon for the same. Third.—The said party of the first part doth further engage to take and receive on board the said vessel during the aforesaid voyage, all such lawful goods and merchandize as the said party of the second part, or their agents, may think proper to ship.

"And the said party of the second part, for and in consideration of the covenants and agreements to be kept and performed by the said party of the first part, doth covenant and agree, with the said party of the first part, to charter and hire the said vessel as aforesaid, on the terms following, that is to say: First.—The said party of the second part doth engage to provide and furnish to the said vessel, cargoes or ballast sufficient to proceed to sea. Second.—The said party of the second part doth further engage to pay to the said party of the first part or his agent for the charter or freight of the said vessel during the voyage aforesaid, in manner following, that is to say: fifteen hundred dollars for the voyage out and home, one half to be considered as earned on arrival in Havana; together with all foreign port charges and pilotage. The remaining half to be earned on delivery of a cargo in the United States; the whole payable in Boston, the port charges in the island of Cuba to be paid there free of commission.

"It is further agreed between the parties to this instrument, that the said party of the second part shall be allowed, for the loading and discharging of the vessel at the respective ports aforesaid, lay days as follows, that is to say: twenty-five running lay days from her entry in Havana, and in case the vessel is longer detained, the said party of the second part agrees to pay to the said party of the first part, demurrage at the rate of twenty Spanish milled dollars per day, for every day so detained, provided such detention shall happen by default of the said party of the second part, or his agent. It is also further understood and agreed, that the cargo or cargoes shall be received and delivered alongside of the vessel within reach of her tackles, or according to the custom and usages at the ports of loading and discharging. It is also further understood and agreed, that this charter shall commence when the vessel is ready to receive cargo at her place of loading, and notice thereof is given to the party of the second part, or his agent. It is further understood and agreed that the party of the second part may send the brig to one or more ports in the island of Cuba, by paying demurrage as aforesaid from and after the twenty-five lay days aforesaid have expired; and should the brig proceed to a southern port of discharge the vessel will receive demurrage from the delivery of her cargo at a southern port until her final discharge in Boston. Should the brig take freight to Europe according to instructions this charter-party to be considered null and void."

["To the true performance of all and every of the foregoing covenants and agreements, the said parties each to the other, do hereby bind themselves, their heirs, executors administrators and assigns, (especially the said party of the first part the said vessel, her freight, tackle, and appurtenances; and the said party of the second part the merchandise to be laden on board,) each to the other, in the penal sum of fifteen hundred dollars.

["In witness whereof, the said parties have hereunto interchangeably set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written. Samuel C. Hunt.

[John Dyer."] [3]

The master's deposition was taken and used in the cause. From that deposition it appeared, that he commanded the brig on the voyage from Boston to the Havana and back again in the summer of 1838, on which the salvage was earned, by bringing the ship Nathaniel Hooper, which was found derelict at sea, into the port of Boston. He sailed the brig under a verbal contract with Hunt, similar to a contract reduced to writing, which had been made between him and Hunt in the next preceding voyage, and of which he annexed a copy as follows—"Boston, January 10, 1838. It is agreed between S. C. Hunt, and Zacheus Holmes, that the said Zacheus Holmes shall receive from S. C. Hunt the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars, being one half the charter for said brig for a voyage from Boston to the Havana and back, with the demurrage for sailing, victualling and manning the brig 'Olive Chamberlain, together with half cabin freight and all passage money, after deducting half port charges in Boston, as is customary. (Signed) Samuel C. Hunt."

He also received orders for the voyage signed by Hunt and Dyer as follows: "Charlestown, April 24, 1838. Capt. Zacheus Holmes. Sir,—You being master of the brig Olive Chamberlain, now loaded for Havana in Cuba, we wish you, on your arrival at that place, to advise with John Morland, Esq. as to the state of that market. We also wish you to dispose of our shipment to the best advantage; first obtaining the assistance of Mr. Morland, if his services can be had to our interests. We further wish you to obtain a cargo of molasses on the account of us or the brig, provided you can, without paying more than 3½ rials for a good sweet article. In case you do not get a cargo, as aforesaid, you are at liberty to take freight for the United States. We also give you further liberty to draw on us at sixty days for an amount sufficient to pay the balance which you may need for a cargo of molasses, after paying in the net proceeds of your outward cargo. In such case, you will sign your bills of lading in favor of Samuel C. Hunt, and draw on the same, which draft we both agree to protect. You will please be particular in stowing your cargo, and have it well fastened under deck. In case of no cargo or freight to the United States, you are at liberty to take freight to Europe, providing one offers at a high rate. We also give liberty to go to Mariel or other places of about equal distance, if for our interests. Wish for you to advise us of your doings as often as convenient. Sam'l C. Hunt. John Dyer."

The brig went on the voyage, and took on board, at Havana, a return cargo for Boston on the joint account of Hunt and Dyer; and the salvage was earned on the return voyage. The master also testified, that his contract to sail and victual and man the brig was wholly with Hunt, and he looked to him alone for pay; and that he acted for Hunt and Dyer only as to the cargo. The return cargo was purchased with funds sent out on the outward voyage.

[3][Upon this state of facts, Betton, of counsel for Dyer, made two points: (1) That Dyer was, under the charter party, joint owner of the brig for the voyage, and entitled to share in the salvage; (2) if not, that he was joint owner of the cargo and was entitled to salvage for that in common with Hunt.

[Betton in support of his points argued as follows: In April, 1838, Samuel C. Hunt was the owner of the brig Olive Chamberlain, of the value of $8,000. Zacheus Holmes was a master mariner, who had sailed her on some occasion previous, at half profits, he victualling and manning. John Dyer was a capitalist, and willing to furnish means to any enterprise, which might aid his neighbors and benefit himself. A voyage was concerted among these three persons and is evidenced by the charter party, the joint letter of instructions, and the deposition of Capt. Holmes. Holmes swears that he made the bargain with Hunt in the presence of Dyer, as to the sum for which he would victual, man and sail her, which was the sum of one half the charter $750, and one half the demurrage. Hunt and Dyer, by the charter party, were to furnish a cargo or ballast to go to sea. The brig, by the letter of instructions of Hunt and Dyer, was to go to Havana, &c., for a cargo, and Captain Holmes, as agent for Hunt and Dyer, was directed to purchase a cargo of molasses, if he could purchase at a certain rate, and to pay for the same in part by the articles sent out by them, as cargo, and in part by bills, which Hunt and Dyer by the aforesaid letter agreed to meet. If he could not purchase a cargo of molasses, then by the charter party and instructions, the captain was to take a freight for the United States. If these both failed, he was at liberty to take a freight for Europe.

[Here were joint orders, in relation to the employment of the brig, the purchase of the cargo and the obtaining of freight, dated April 24, 1838. Another paper was drawn up, called a "charter party," dated April 25, 1838, in which Hunt agrees to become joint charterer with Dyer, and they are to pay for the brig victualled and manned and sailed, for the voyage or voyages, to Havana, &c. and back to the United States, cargo or no cargo, freight or no freight, fifteen hundred dollars; one half of which sum is for the use of the brig; the other half for the victualling, manning and sailing, that is, Hunt was to furnish the brig for $750, and Dyer was to pay for the victualling, manning and sailing, $750. The foreign port charges and demurrage were to be shared equally. The profits of the expedition were to be upon the cargo, or freights obtained, and to be shared equally by the charter party. Hunt and Dyer were, by this agreement, called a "charter party," to have the whole use, benefit and profit of the brig, so far as it could be appropriated to cargo or freight.

[Captain Holmes obtained—

35,850 gallons molasses, value at 32 cts.	$12,472 00
1 Box Sugar 426 lbs. at 13.....	55 38
36,500 Segars, on freight, supposed to be worth 16,—.....	584 38
	$13.111 76

—as stated by Mr. Hunt, and admitted to be correct by Dyer. The molasses and sugar for account of Hunt and Dyer as purchasers, and the segars on freight. Here was a joint undertaking of mercantile adventure by Hunt and Dyer. The vessel was put into common stock, at $750, for the use, and Dyer was to pay for victualling, manning and sailing, $750, and demurrage and port charges to be paid equally. He was to sail on joint account, in their joint employ.

[I submit that the joint letter was the appointment of the captain, who was to victual, man and sail for a round sum, to wit, $750, being one-half the charter, and demurrage, as he states in his deposition. It also makes him supercargo. I submit, then, that the reasonable construction of all the evidence, taken together, is, that Hunt and Dyer were owners for the voyage. That Hunt divested himself of the character, and responsibility of owner and stands in the character and with the responsibility of joint charterer of the vessel, as he is joint owner of the cargo, with Dyer. Holmes was in by special contract, and not as the servant or agent of the owner of the vessel as such—as appears by his deposition—and could not be removed by Hunt.][3]

In the case of Hooe v. Groverman, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 214, the question turned upon the fact, as to the ownership for the time being, that the vessel itself was not let, but only the tonnage. In the present case, there was a letting of the vessel itself by Hunt, or an agreement, that he and Dyer would have the whole use for all beneficial purposes, and Holmes was let in under a special contract; Hunt thereby divesting himself of the character of owner, and assuming the character of joint charterer. Hunt is not in possession as owner. The distinction between letting the vessel and taking the freight will be found in Abb. Shipp. 253; in Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909; and in Cushing's Poth. Cont. art. 1, § 25, pp. 14–16. Lex Mercatoria Americana, 103, remarks on the case of Parish v. Crawford, 2 Strange, 1251. The general rule is, that in a freighting ship, that is, where freight is taken by the ton, or by measurement, or by the piece, the owners of the freight, as such, are not entitled to salvage. One reason is, the owner of the vessel is in possession as owner, with all the responsibilities of owner, and the captain is his servant, put in by him, and liable at any moment to be dismissed by him, and the owner is liable for any deviation or other misconduct of the captain. But such was not the case here. Another reason is, that it might bring, unnecessarily, too many parties before the court. But the court say, that this rule is not absolute, but is in the discretion of the court. In Bond v. The Cora [Case No. 1,621], and here, Hunt and Dyer claim in the libel salvage, as joint charterers of the Olive Chamberlain and joint owners of the cargo. Here, the owner of the vessel would not be liable for supplies furnished the vessel, according to Holmes' deposition and the other papers. Cutler v. Winsor, 6 Pick. 335; Thompson v. Hamilton, 12 Pick. 425. And as to freight taken, there was no privity of contract between Hunt, as owner, and the shippers. The contract was between Hunt and Dyer, as charterers, owners, pro hac vice, by Captain Holmes, their agent and supercargo, and the shippers. James v. Jones, 3 Esp. 27; Abb. Shipp. 27, 28; Jac. Sea Laws, 213, 214. Hunt, therefore, was not in possession as owner; was not liable for supplies as owner, and was not responsible, at least to Dyer, for the misconduct of the captain, as owner. If, then, upon the evidence of the agreement, called a charter-party, and the joint letter of instructions, and Captain Holmes' deposition, Hunt has divested himself of the character and responsibilities of owner, as it respects Dyer, and stands only as joint charterer, the salvage, awarded to the owners of the Olive Chamberlain and cargo, is to be equally divided between Hunt and Dyer.

2d. But if the court should be of the opinion, that, upon the legal construction of the evidence, Hunt remained owner of the vessel, pro hac vice, then the share of the brig, or the ratio which the value of the brig bears to the value of the brig and cargo, will belong exclusively to Hunt. And the next question is, to whom the salvage allowed for the value of the cargo will belong. Of the cargo, Hunt and Dyer are stated in the libel to be joint owners (and this is proved by Holmes), except the cigars, which they carried on freight. Salvage is allowed to the property put at risk. The court never allow the captain salvage for property by him put at risk. They do not allow him to become insurer. They do not encourage him to jeopard his owner's cargo and go a wrecking. His deposition is not evidence for himself, but only between Hunt and Dyer. He is allowed something for personal services, &c. Those positions are so universal in the books, as to need no citation of cases. Here the property was put in imminent hazard. The brig was leaky, and was left very short-handed. It appears by the letter of instructions, and the deposition of Captain Holmes, that in everything relating to cargo and freight he was agent of the charterers, Hunt and Dyer. In navigating, &c., he was his own agent under his contract. In committing the deviation, and saving the Nathaniel Hooper and cargo, and jeoparding the cargo of the Olive Chamberlain, he acted as agent of Hunt and Dyer; and Hunt would not be liable in case of loss, as owner, to Dyer. Mason v. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 240. Holmes held the capacity of supercargo. For his powers, we cite Lawes, Chart. Part. 78, 319; Oliver, Law Summary, 321–343; and the case of Mason v. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 248. The case of The Blaireau goes farther. Salvage was there given to one of the owners of the cargo, because his partner was on board the saving vessel, and assented, or was presumed to have assented to the attempt at salvage, and had thereby discharged the owner of the vessel from liability in case of loss. Now, a partner in a mercantile adventure could not as general copartner, bind his partner in a wrecking adventure without his knowledge and consent, it not being within the scope of the copartnership business; but yet the absent partner, as well as the present one, drew salvage in proportion to the value of his interest in the cargo.

In the case of The Jefferson in New York, cited by Judge Washington in Bond v. The Cora [Case No. 1,621], the owner of the ship was part owner of the cargo, and the captain was owner of the remainder of the cargo. The salvage was distributed in proportion to the value of the property put at risk. Hunt by his several contracts with Dyer and with Holmes took care to divest himself of the liabilities of owner, and why should he claim the exclusive right to the advantages, profits and Godsends of the voyage? Dyer, then, is entitled, if not to half the salvage awarded to the owners of the Olive Chamberlain and cargo, certainly to the ratio of half the value of the cargo, to the value of the brig and cargo.

[Mr. Choate, for Hunt, argued e contra, as follows:

[The question here is as to the right of Dyer to a part of the salvage awarded to the brig Olive Chamberlain, her owners, officers and crew. The facts, upon which it is to be determined, are supplied by the evidence introduced by Dyer, that is to say, the instrument called a charter-party—the letter of instructions, and the deposition of Holmes taken and offered by Dyer. The circumstance that Dyer unites in the libel with the others, is by express agreement, to benefit or prejudice nobody. He claimed—and to avoid expense—he was united in the libel, without prejudice.][3]

We resist the application of Dyer, on the general ground, that, upon the proofs supplied and relied on by him, he is, in point of law, a mere shipper of goods, on board a vessel navigated by Hunt's agent, for whose acts, in the course of navigation, Hunt is responsible to Dyer. In cases, where a party ships goods in another's vessel, and has a claim upon the owner, for the deviation of the captain, if injured by it, he is not entitled to salvage. This never was doubted. Bond v. The Cora [Case No. 1,621]; also, Taylor v. The Cato [Id. 13,786]. The sole question is, therefore, whether, in this case, the captain was so far the agent of Dyer, that Dyer could not claim of Hunt for the deviation of the captain. The general rule, or prevailing practice in the admiralty, seems to have been to hold, as between owners of ships, and those who take them for freight or charter, that the latter are not entitled to salvage. So expressly declared in Taylor v. The Cato, ubi supra. An inspection of what is called the charter-party, in this case, conclusively evinces, that according to settled distinctions upon the subject, Dyer is not owner of the vessel, nor joint owner pro hac vice, and that the captain, in the specific matter of navigating the vessel, is not his agent,—but the general owner's. The general owner, Hunt, is to transport the cargo by his own men, hired, paid, and provisioned by himself. For this, he is to be compensated by the freight, or in freight. In so far as the sale of outward, or purchase of homeward cargo is concerned, he and Dyer are jointly interested. But the matter of transportation and navigation is wholly Hunt's. He furnishes a vessel, keeps her in repair, hires her officers and men, may hire any captain he pleases, and any crew, and pays and provisions them. It is plain, that, on this contract, Hunt is required to hire no particular individual. He may put any body on board, and Dyer cannot interpose.

[If so, Hunt assumes the responsibleness of their behavior.

[The claimant, Dyer, puts in Holmes' deposition, but it is decisive against him. He proves, that so far as navigating the ship is concerned, Holmes is Hunt's sole agent, and that he acts for Dyer also, only in port, in procuring and disposing of cargo. Just so, it may be in the commonest case of a shipment of the smallest quantity of goods in a general ship. There the captain is the agent of the shipper, or may be so, and his agent only, or may be so, in disposing of the adventure. In sailing the ship, he is not. Holmes swears, that Hunt alone contracted with him. He contracted with him, for himself, not for himself and Dyer. He looked to Hunt only for his pay. He sailed the ship for him. It is impossible to maintain, that in the deposition, there is anything to control unfavorably to Hunt, the effect of the charter party. The letter of instructions proves that Dyer does not intermeddle with the sailing of the ship. This is not the appointment of the captain. This is not a contract of hiring the captain. That appointment was made by another contract between Hunt and Holmes, and that fixed the rule and mode of Holmes' compensation. But this letter is addressed to Holmes, only, in his capacity of an agent to dispose of or buy a cargo. It presupposes him captain, by another bargain. It says nothing of his manner of performing the voyage. It does not even admonish him to make dispatch. It begins with him on his arrival.][3]

A comparison of the charter party and the proofs with Marcardier v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 39; McIntyre v. Bowne, 1 Johns. 229; Hallet v. Columbian Ins. Co., 8 Johns. 272; Cheriot v. Barker, 2 Johns. 346; Fletcher v. Braddick, 2 Bos. & P. [N. S.] 182; The Volunteer [Case No. 16,991]; and Certain Logs of Mahogany [Id. 2,559],—seems to leave no doubt, that the general owner remains the owner for the voyage; that the captain is his agent, and that he is responsible for his acts.

[The charter party in Marcardier v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., ut supra, is exactly this charter party. I forbear to comment on that or the other cases. There really seems to be no room for a question. It is said that Hunt, by his contract with Holmes, relieves himself from his responsibilities as owner for this voyage; and the case in 6 Pick. 335, is cited. The truth is that this arrangement between Hunt and Holmes does not, in the slightest degree, affect Dyer's right, on the charter party, to treat Holmes as Hunt's agent. By that instrument, Hunt is to sail the ship. He is to man her. Whomsoever he may put on board, and by whatever contract, as between Dyer and Hunt, they are Hunt's agents when on board. From this responsibility and this relation, Hunt cannot exempt himself, by any species of contract with the men whom he hired.][3]

Even as between Hunt and Holmes, Holmes is not so far owner as to exempt Hunt from responsibleness for his acts, or from his general responsibleness as owner. The case, between those parties, is no more than this; Hunt has made a contract of affeightment with Dyer, by which he is to man, provision, and sail a vessel, on a given voyage, for a given freight. He then hires Holmes for that specific adventure, and agrees to pay him a specific sum for supplying the men and provisions, and taking command. This contract is made subsequently to the charter-party, and the operation is to leave Hunt in possession, and navigating his own vessel by a master hired for the specific enterprise. As to the world, but certainly as to Dyer, Hunt remains the owner, acting by an agent.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The first question, which arises, is, who was owner for the voyage? It has been suggested, that, perhaps, Holmes might, under the special agreement, be deemed owner for the voyage, upon the authority of Cutler v. Winsor, 6 Pick. 335, and Thompson v. Hamilton, 12 Pick. 425, although the point was rather hinted at, than made. Without meaning in the slightest degree to doubt or impugn the decision in these cases, I think, that I may say, that they go to the very verge of the law on this subject. Perhaps they will be found not easily reconcilable with some of the English authorities, where a sharing in the profits, or in the net earnings of the vessel, has been thought to make the voyage a partnership adventure, and the master and owner of the ship to be joint owners thereof for the voyage. See Dry v. Boswell, 1 Camp. 329. But the present case is clearly distinguishable from those cases, as the owner contracted to pay the master a specific sum for the voyage, for sailing, victualling, and manning the brig, with demurrage, and half cabin freight, &c., subject to certain deductions. It was, therefore, a mere mode of compensation of the master, like a contract for a share of the gross earnings of the voyage, the owner retaining the sole control and direction of the voyage for his own purposes. The point, however, is not material to the decision of the claim of Dyer; for, whether the master, or Hunt, were owner for the voyage, unless he, Dyer, was also owner, he could not participate in the salvage awarded to the brig.

The question then arises directly in judgment, whether Dyer was a part owner of the brig for the voyage under the charter-party. It appears to me, clearly, that he was not. In whatever light that instrument is viewed, it is but a contract for freighting and chartering the brig for the voyage to Havana and back again to Boston, to carry cargoes for the joint account of Hunt and Dyer. Hunt was to equip, man, and provision the vessel for the voyage; and the whole of the vessel was not let for the voyage; but the whole, with the exception of the cabin and necessary accommodations for the crew and the stowage of the sails, cables, and provisions, was to be "at the sole use and disposal" of Hunt and Dyer jointly; and Hunt engaged to take and receive on board all lawful goods which Hunt and Dyer, or their agents, should think proper to ship. Hunt and Dyer covenant (and although at law, the covenant, being with Hunt, would be incapable of being enforced, yet in a court of equity it would be held valid and binding), to furnish cargoes, and to pay fifteen hundred dollars for the voyage out and home, with the port charges and pilotage. It seems to me, that the whole structure of the charter-party manifestly contemplates, that, as between Hunt and Dyer, Hunt is to remain sole owner for the voyage, and that all his covenants require that he should be so treated. He is to appoint and pay the master and crew, and provision the vessel; he is to retain possession of her, and to have an exclusive possession and right to her cabin and other parts for the accommodation of the crew and equipage; and he is to receive and deliver the cargoes. The case, therefore, falls entirely within the reasoning of the supreme court of the United States in Hooe v. Groverman, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 224, and Marcardier v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 39, and must be governed by the authority of those cases. I had occasion to consider the bearing of those cases in The Volunteer [Case No. 16,991]; and to that decision I deliberately adhere. I am aware of the decision in the king's bench and the house of lords in Colvin v. Newberry, 8 Barn. & C. 166, and 6 Bligh, [N. S.] 167, 189, which is distinguishable from the present. But, if it were not, I should, upon reason, as well as the authority of the supreme court, follow out the doctrines in 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 214, and 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 39. The mere fact, that the vessel sails under a charter-party, does not divest the absolute owner of his right to salvage, or entitle the charterer to salvage, unless he thereby becomes owner for the voyage. The case of Mason v. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 240, sufficiently establishes this position.

The next question is, whether Dyer, as joint owner of the cargo with Hunt, is entitled to share in the salvage. And here we must meet the case, exactly as if Hunt were a stranger, and had no interest in the cargo. The question, therefore, resolves itself into this, whether the owner of the cargo, whose property is thus put at risk, without his own consent, by a stoppage or deviation from the voyage for the purpose of earning salvage, is entitled to share in that salvage. In the present case, Hunt was not on board of the brig at the time of the stoppage or deviation, or assenting thereto; and, therefore, Dyer cannot claim any title to share in the salvage, upon the ground, that he, by his partner, assented thereto; and so he would be in the same predicament with the joint charterers and owners of cargo (Christie and Young,) in the case of Mason v. The Blaireau. As to Dyer, therefore, the stoppage was a clear deviation, and if the cargo had been subsequently lost, Hunt, in a court of equity, if not at law, would have been responsible, as ship-owner, to Dyer, for the full amount of that loss. Has he, then, any title to share in the salvage? In the case of the ship-owner, we all know, that he is now universally held entitled to share in the salvage, upon the general ground, that, by the stoppage and deviation, the ship and the cargo (whether the cargo belong to the ship-owner or not) are put completely at the risk of the ship-owner; and therefore, as he runs the risk, he ought to share in the salvage. If this were the sole ground of the maritime rule on this subject, it would be difficult to distinguish the case of the owner of the ship from that of the owner of the cargo. In each case the property of the owner is put at his own risk, and (it is said) without his consent. In each case (it is also said) there is a remedy over against the master by the owner of the ship for the deviation; and against both of them by the owner of the cargo for the same wrongful act. If this be true and there be nothing further, the distinction between the owner of ship and the owner of cargo would seem to be almost, if not entirely, evanescent. But I apprehend, that there is a foundation for a distinction, established upon maritime policy, as well as general reasoning. In the first place, it is by no means clear, in the case of a deviation by the master for salvage, that although the underwriters are discharged, yet that the master, if he has acted in good faith, and in the exercise of a sound discretion, is responsible to the ship-owner for any subsequent loss occasioned thereby. It is the universal custom, I believe, of all maritime nations, to encourage salvage services and to give suitable rewards therefor, for the very purpose of protecting commerce and navigation upon the high seas, against the extraordinary perils incident thereto. Every merchant has a deep interest in maintaining this doctrine in its fullest extent, if I may so say, in the language of the admiralty upon another subject, sub mutuae vicissitudinis obtentu. I have not supposed, that the master of a ship was, by the nature and duties of his office, precluded from rendering such services; or that anything short of a positive prohibition of the owner could take away or control his discretion, as to the time, and the manner, and the circumstances, under which such salvage services ought to be undertaken. On the contrary, I have always supposed, that the master had an implied authority, from the nature of his office, to render such services, giving a proportionate share and benefit to his owner, in all cases, where he should deem it to be for the interest of his owner. It is upon this ground, and this ground only, in my judgment, that the owner of the ship can ever entitle himself, in an equitable view, to any salvage whatever, at least, to any salvage beyond the mere compensation for the risk, or the premium of insurance lost. And if ever a case should occur, (which I can hardly suppose) in which a ship-owner should prohibit his master from rendering salvage services, I, for one, should hold him bound to this limited compensation, and leave him to the scanty fruits of his own selfishness, and illiberality. The salvage, ordinarily due to the owner, would, in such a case most properly be awarded to the master, since he would then have borne the whole risk and burthen of the enterprise.

There is, doubtless, another auxiliary ground, upon which the maritime law proceeds, as a matter of policy. It is, that by the owner's becoming entitled to share liberally in the salvage, the master is under no temptation to deviate from his proper duty to his owner by any undue hopes of selfish gain, or by assuming unreasonable or unjustifiable risks. The maritime policy, therefore, which thus links his own interests to those of his owner, is as wise, as it is beneficent. It gives a security to the owner against any abuse of the master's authority, by making the interest of the latter subordinate to that of the former. Now, in respect to both of these considerations, the case of the owner of the ship differs from that of the owner of the cargo. The master is the general agent of the owner of the ship; but he is the special agent only of the owner of the cargo, to carry the same to the port of destination. He has, therefore, no implied authority from the latter to deviate from the voyage for salvage purposes; and the general contract of the ship-owner and master is to deliver the goods at the port of destination, the perils of the seas, and the acts of God, only excepted. The salvage service falls within neither predicament, if it is to save property, and not merely to save life. In the latter case, Christianity imposes a higher duty, the duty of saving life, if practicable, by any reasonable sacrifice. It is impossible, therefore, to infer any consent of the owner of the cargo to the salvage service, which alone would furnish a sufficient ground for him to share in the reward. Neither does the maritime policy, as to temptation of the master to deviate for his own selfish objects, apply to the shipper of goods, as it does to the owner of the ship. The former has the double security of the ship-owner and the master, to compensate him for any unjustifiable deviation; the latter must rely solely on the pecuniary ability of the master, and the just confidence reposed in him, as his security and indemnity. The master is under little temptation to deviate from his duty against the shipper, unless he may thereby promote the interest of the ship-owner, as well as of himself. But, at all events, the shipper is content, from the very nature of his contract for the shipment, to rest satisfied with the ordinary responsibility of the owner and master of the carrier ship, for his indemnity against losses occasioned by the misconduct of either.

Thus far, the point has been considered upon principle. But how stands the case upon practice and authority? In the first place, although the case must be of frequent occurrence in suits for salvage, yet it does not appear that any such general claim has ever been allowed in practice, or by courts of justice. The omission to make any such general claim, under such circumstances, cannot but be very significant, and expressive of the general sense of the community. In the next place, not only is there no authority in favor of such a general claim, but there are authorities directly against it. In the case of Bond v. The Cora [Case No. 1,620], the learned judge of the district court, and afterwards on appeal my late brother, Mr. Justice Washington, whose judgments upon all subjects are entitled to very great weight, from his patience of research, and sound discriminating learning, decreed upon full argument against the claim. In Taylor v. The Cato [Id. 13,786], Judge Peters also rejected the claim of the shippers of goods. I follow his reasoning with an undoubting approbation; and think, that it satisfactorily establishes the doctrine, that in ordinary cases the shipper of cargo is not entitled to share in the salvage, unless indeed, he has expressly assented to the deviation, and thereby released the owner of the ship from his responsibility therefor. My opinion, therefore, is, that Dyer is not in the present case entitled to any share in the salvage, and his claim ought to be dismissed.

The merits of the case having been disposed of by the former decrees of the court, a question arose as to the apportionment of a part of the costs. In the course of the admiralty proceedings all the cargo had been delivered on bail and appraisement to the various claimants, except the sugars claimed on behalf of Messrs. Holford and Company, London, by their agents, Messrs. Bates and Company, of Boston. These goods remained in the custody of the court up to the final decree. All the other costs and charges had been made a charge on the whole property in controversy; and the question now put to the court was, whether the charges of the custody of these goods should be borne exclusively by Messrs. Holford and Company, or should be apportioned, like the other costs and charges, upon the whole property.

The question was briefly spoken to by Blair, for Messrs. Holford and Company, and by Parsons, for the parties having an adverse interest.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I do not think there is any real ground for controversy in the present case. The charges for the custody of these goods ought, like the other costs and charges in the case, to be borne by, and apportioned upon, the whole property saved. In salvage cases, the general rule is that the costs and charges are to be paid out of the property saved, and to be charged and apportioned upon the respective claimants thereof accordingly. The only exceptions, as far as I recollect, which have been admitted, are, where the charges have been occasioned by the gross neglect, or laches, or improper conduct of the claimant himself, in which case they are to be borne be himself alone; or where the right has been forfeited by some gross misconduct of the salvors in the salvage service, in which case the court constantly refuse any allowance to them, and compel the guilty parties to bear their own costs, charges, and expenses, as a suitable punishment ex delicto. This is especially true in all cases of embezzlements and of losses by the gross negligence of salvors. In the present case there is not the slightest ground to impute any negligence, laches, or impropriety to Messrs. Holford and Company, and therefore the general rule must prevail.

Case No. 10,033.

The NATHANIEL KIMBALL.

[4 Adm. Rec. 679.]

District Court, S. D. Florida. Jan., 1853.

SALVAGE — VESSEL ON REEF — PERIL — BAD WEATHER—AMOUNT.

[Cited in Baker v. The Slobodna, 35 Fed. 541, as an instance in which a salvage allowance of thirty per centum was given on the cargo saved dry, and fifty per centum on that saved by diving and working in the water; the vessel having gone ashore nine miles out from Key West, and cargo amounting to $56,093 saved by seven vessels and ninety-nine men.]

[This was a libel by George W. Carey and others against the cargo and materials of the wrecked ship Nathaniel Kimball for salvage compensation.]

The ship Nathaniel Kimball, from New Orleans to Liverpool, laden with cotton, during the night of the 16th of January last, ran ashore on that part of the Florida Reef known as the "Easternmost Dry Rocks," situated nine miles from this town. The weather was very boisterous, and the wind heavy. Soon after striking the reef the ship bilged, fell over on her larboard side, and filled with water. The master cut away the masts, to ease the ship, the sea making a complete breach over her. In the morning, the 17th of January, the libellants, being the masters and crews of the schooners Euphemia, G. L. Browne, Relampago, Champion, Lafayette, H. B. Hawkins, and Larinia,—in all ninety-nine men,—proceeded from Key West to the wreck. With considerable difficulty and danger they succeeded in boarding the wreck and in taking off the master and crew, who, to say the least, were very uncomfortably situated if not exposed to considerable peril. On the 18th, the gale having somewhat abated, the libellants commenced to save the cotton and ship's materials. They saved seven hundred and seventy-three bales of cotton in a dry and undamaged state, and about twelve hundred wet. The value of all the cargo and materials saved is $64,610.79. While the wreckers were employed in this service, the weather was more than commonly boisterous and windy, and the sea was high; so that their labors were often interrupted by the badness of the weather. In consequence of these interruptions their labors ran through a period of more than a month.

O. B. Hart, for libellants.

Wm. McCall, for claimants.

MARVIN, District Judge. Referring to the libel and answer for the more minute particulars of the case, I proceed to award the salvage which I think ought to be allowed. It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that there be allowed and paid to the owners, masters, and crews of the vessels composing the "first consortship," to wit, the Euphemia, G. L. Browne, Schr. Relampago, Champion, Lafayette, H. B. Hawkins, and Larinia, thirty per cent. upon the nett value of the property saved by them, after first deducting therefrom the costs and expenses of this suit, the wharfage, storage, and bills for labor in landing and storing and arranging for sale the cargo and materials; the gross value of the cargo and materials saved by the said first consortship being, according to the marshal's account sales and the appraisement $30,639.78; marshal's sales, $23,040.49; sold by Bowne and Curry, $2,413.62; in all $56,093.89. That there be allowed to the second consortship, composed of the same vessels with some difference in the men, $291.11, being thirty per cent. of the value of the property saved by them. That there be allowed to the third and subsequent consortships as numbered and set forth in the marshal's account sales the one-half of the proceeds of the sales of the property according to said account sales; the property having been saved by diving and working in the water. That there be allowed to the boats Union, Water Witch, and Caroline and Isaac $110.61, being the one-half of the proceeds of the sale of materials saved by them and sold by Bowne and Curry. That there be allowed to the boats Union, Water Witch, and Caroline $150.60, being the one-half of the proceeds of sales of materials saved by them and sold by Bowne and Curry. That the marshal restore that part of the cargo remaining unsold to the master for and on account of whom it may concern. That the clerk pay the costs and expenses of the suit, the wharfage, storage, and bills for labor out of the proceeds of sales in court, and restore the residue to the master for and on account of whom it may concern.

NOTES—BANKRUPTCY OF MAKER—ACTION AGAINST INDORSER.

1. In Illinois, the indorsee of a promissory note, the maker of which has been adjudicated bankrupt, may proceed at once against the indorser.

2. The case is not similar to that of a deceased maker of a note, where the holder must pursue the estate of the maker in the probate court.

Assumpsit against Alfred Booth as indorsee of a promissory note of Barnum, Mason & Co.

BLODGETT, District Judge. Judgment must go against the defendant in this case. Mr. Booth is sued as the indorser of a promissory note made by the firm of Barnum, Mason & Co. He pleads that Barnum, Mason & Co. have been thrown into bankruptcy, and that their assets are in the hands of the assignee and will produce fifty cents on the dollar, and insists that the holders of the note can not proceed against him as indorser until they have exhausted the assets in bankruptcy.

The statute of this state provides that an indorser shall not be liable unless the holder shall have used due diligence by the institution and prosecution of a suit against the maker of a note, except under certain conditions. In this case, the institution and prosecution of a suit against Barnum, Mason & Co. is entirely impossible, they having been by the act of their creditors, declared bankrupts, adjudicated as such, and no suits on their old indebtedness could be maintained against them.

It was contended very strenuously on the part of the defendant in this case, that the case was similar to that of a deceased maker of a note; and there are some adjudications of Indiana and Kentucky to the effect that the holder of the note must first pursue the estate of the deceased in the probate court, and exhaust his remedy against the estate of the deceased in the surrogate or probate courts; but on examination, I find the statute of Illinois is broader than the statutes of Indiana and Kentucky, and it seems to convey the idea that the institution and prosecution of a suit against the maker of the note is the diligence, or kind of diligence, that is required to fix the liability of the indorser. There being no adjudicated case to sustain the position taken by counsel for defendant in this case, I am inclined to hold to the doctrine that sufficient is shown by the declaration in this case,—by the averment of the bankruptcy of the makers of the note,—to dispense with any diligence against them. Judgment for plaintiff.

NOTE. The statute referred to will be found in 1 Gross (1871) p. 461, § 5. For the present statute, see Rev. St. 1874, p. 719, § 7. These provide if "such suit would have been unavailing," when brought against the maker, the indorser shall be immediately liable.

On July 20, 1875, Montgomery Slaughter executed to W. P. Conway a deed, conveying to him certain real estate in Fredericksburg, Virginia, in trust, to secure the payment of four negotiable notes drawn and indorsed by M. Slaughter & Son, a firm of which Montgomery Slaughter was the senior partner, payable at the banking house in Fredericksburg of Conway, Gordon & Garnett, a firm of which W. P. Conway was a member; one of the notes for one thousand dollars, payable on the 25th of September, 1875; another for fifteen hundred dollars, payable on the 15th of October, 1875; another for one thousand dollars, payable the 25th of November, 1875; and the fourth for two thousand dollars, payable on the 23d of December, 1875. This last note was dated July 20, 1875. This deed was acknowledged by the grantor and certified by G. W. Garnett, a member of the firm of Conway, Gordon & Garnett, on the day it was executed. At the time of the execution of the deed, Conway, Gordon & Garnett were holders and owners of the three first-named notes, aggregating three thousand five hundred dollars in amount, and they became owners of the note for two thousand dollars, shortly after the date of the deed. The note due the 25th of September was paid at maturity. That due the 15th of October was not paid but was protested. On the afternoon of this same day, the deed of trust, which had been kept in the safe of his bank, by W. P. Conway, trustee, ever since the 20th of July, was taken out and deposited for record in the office of the clerk of the proper court in Fredericksburg. At the time this deed was recorded the firm of Conway, Gordon & Garnett were holders and owners of the remaining three notes secured by the deed, aggregating four thousand five hundred dollars. On the 27th of October, 1875, a creditors' petition was brought in the district court of the United States, for this district, as a court of bankruptcy, praying that the said Montgomery Slaughter, and his firm, M. Slaughter & Son, and his son W. L. Slaughter might be adjudicated bankrupts; and, without contest, they were afterwards duly so adjudicated, in accordance with the prayer of the creditors' petition. On the 11th of November, 1875, the National Bank of Fredericksburg, a creditor of the bankrupt, brought their bill on the equity side of this court, with the usual allegations and charges, praying that the deed of M. Slaughter to W. P. Conway, of the 20th of July, 1875, might be set aside, as giving a preference to Conway, Gordon & Garnett, in contravention of the provisions of the 35th section of the general bankruptcy act of congress (Rev. St. § 5128 [14 Stat. 534]). To this bill, Conway, Gordon & Garnett have made answer, claiming that the deed was in fact bona fide, that it was legal under the laws of Virginia, and that it was not in contravention of the bankrupt act and its amendments, because it was made more than two months before the petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed, and because, as they allege, M. Slaughter and M. Slaughter & Son, until unexpectedly protested on the 15th of October, 1875, had the confidence of the entire community; were considered entirely solvent; were believed to be gentlemen of extraordinary business qualifications, engaged in an exceedingly profitable business; that their paper rated with the best at the respondent's bank; and that their failure on the 15th of October, 1875, astounded the whole community.

The respondents also allege, in their answer, that their dealings in the paper of the bankrupt firm were always with the senior member, Montgomery Slaughter; that this bankrupt always refused to comply with the rule of their bank requiring a responsible indorser on all paper of the firm, on the ground that as he never indorsed for others he would not ask others to indorse for his house: and that instead of an indorser, the custom of said Slaughter, with the house of Conway, Gordon & Garnett, was always to give deeds of trust on the property of M. Slaughter embraced in the deed of the 20th of July, 1875, to secure the notes discounted for Slaughter & Son by the firm; that in no instance did said Slaughter fail to give such a lien in the previous five or six years, although the transactions were numerous; that in all of these transactions, the custom was to leave the deed of trust in the hands of W. P. Conway, the trustee, to be recorded when he thought proper, or when the holders of the notes discounted by C., G. & G. might require. In a statement of facts, agreed between all parties, it is further alleged, that it had been the usage of Conway, Gordon & Garnett to take these deeds from M. Slaughter, and to destroy them when the notes were paid, never putting any of them on record until this last deed. In a statement of facts by M. Slaughter, accepted by all parties as evidence, by consent, Mr. M. Slaughter alludes to several previous transactions, "similar to that of the 20th of July, 1875, in which the notes had been paid, and the deeds cancelled."

The Code of Virginia (1873, c. 114, § 5, p. 897) provides that "every deed of trust, etc., conveying real estate and goods and chattels, shall be void as to creditors, etc., until and except from the time it is duly admitted to record in the county or corporation wherein the property embraced in the said deed may lie."

HUGHES, District Judge. There is no question here of actual fraud or of moral wrong-doing. The transaction of the 20th of July, 1875, was between men of the highest character, socially and in their pecuniary dealings. There is but one question in the case, which is, whether the writing, signed and acknowledged on the 20th of July, 1875, kept in the iron safe of Conway, Gordon & Garnett until the paper of Slaughter & Son had gone to protest on the 15th of October, 1875, and on the afternoon of that day recorded, is valid under section 5128 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. This statute is not a statute of frauds, but of disabilities. It establishes a policy. It makes it against the policy of the law for men, knowing the insolvency of their debtors, to exact or take deeds of preference from them. State laws permit this, and indeed encourage it. But congress declares a different policy, and places failing debtors in the same condition as to deeds, grants, and conveyances of preference, in which state laws place minors and femes covert as to contracts, and in which state laws place all adults who are in debt, but sui juris, as to deeds of gift. The word "fraud" occurs but once in this section 5128, and then not as implying moral or actual fraud, but only as implying a breach of the policy of the law just mentioned; the phrase in which the word occurs being "in fraud of the provisions of this act." I have nothing to do, therefore, with fraud as a crime, moral or legal. I have only to inquire whether the writing between M. Slaughter and Walter P. Conway, trustee, signed and acknowledged on the 20th of July, 1875, was in violation of the policy of section 5128, Rev. St., and therefore void.

The question whether this writing was properly acknowledged or not, which was so ably and elaborately argued at bar, is only a secondary one in the case. The primary question is, when did this writing become a deed as between the grantor and grantee? The acknowledgment of the writing by the grantor had reference only to its being recorded, and thereby made valid as against his creditors. If the question were only as to acknowledgment, I should decide, without hesitation, that it was properly acknowledged; for the teaching of the cases cited at bar seems to me plainly to be, that an interested person may take the acknowledgment of a deed when the act is merely ministerial; though if the act be judicial, such as taking the acknowledgment, after privy examination, of a married woman, an interested person cannot take it. Harkins v. Forsyth, 11 Leigh, 294; Carper v. McDowell, 5 Grat. 212; Horsley v. Garth, 2 Grat. 471; Taliaferro v. Pryor, 12 Grat. 277; Johnston v. Slater, 11 Grat. 321; Turner v. Stip, 1 Wash. [Va.] 319; Hampton v. Stevens [1871] 10 Am. Law Reg. 107; Boswell v. Flockheart, 8 Leigh, 364; Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal Co., 16 Eng. Law & Eq. 63. Though the acknowledgment of this writing of the 20th of July, 1875, were good, that fact might not invalidate the deed; for it has been recently decided, by the supreme court of the United States, in Sawyer v. Turpin, 91 U. S. 114, that the recording of a deed may be within the period of prohibition imposed by the bankrupt law, and yet the deed itself be good against an assignee in bankruptcy, if executed before the period. Were it necessary, I should hold that that decision does not govern this case. A clear distinction may be drawn between this case (relating to real estate) and that decided in Sawyer v. Turpin (relating to personalty), founded on the distinction between the respective laws of Massachusetts and Virginia relating to fraudulent conveyances. The law of Massachusetts, on which the decision in Sawyer v. Turpin was rendered, declares that mortgages of personal property shall not be valid against any other person than the parties thereto, unless, etc., etc., the mortgage be recorded, etc. Whereas, the law of Virginia declares that every deed of trust, conveying real estate or goods and chattels, shall be void as to creditors, until and except from the time it is duly recorded. The deed of Montgomery Slaughter, signed and acknowledged the 20th of July, 1875 was void as to creditors, and was not a deed at all, until the 15th of October, 1875; and I doubt if the supreme court of the United States would hold that it took effect any earlier as to the assignee in bankruptcy representing the general creditors of the bankrupt. But, assuming that the decision in Sawyer v. Turpin governs this case, as to deeds which have become deeds between the parties to them, previously to the period of two months before bankruptcy, but recorded within that time, the further question is, when did this writing of the 20th of July, 1875, become a deed, good as between M. Slaughter and W. P. Conway, the parties to it? It cannot be claimed that this writing was, in the hands of W. P. Conway, until the 15th of October, 1875, an escrow; for, in strict law, an escrow is a deed delivered to a stranger, which is to become valid on the happening of some definite future contingency. From this writing having been delivered to the grantee by the grantor, and not to a stranger, it cannot be called, with technical accuracy, an escrow.

But was it in truth and in law a deed, so delivered and so accepted, until the day it was recorded in the office of the corporation of Fredericksburg? This I assume, of course, to depend upon the understanding or contract as to it, which was had between M. Slaughter and W. P. Conway, either tacitly or expressly, on the day it was signed. The transaction of the 20th of July, 1875, is stated by Conway, Gordon & Garnett, in their answer, to have been "precisely similar" to numerous others that had preceded it for five or six years. These writings had never been treated as passing title, but as papers which might be treated as nullities after awhile and cancelled. No previous one of these writings had been recorded; no previous one had been treated as a deed of conveyance requiring release. All had been treated as writings that might become deeds in the option of the trustee, or of the holders of the notes of M. Slaughter & Son. All of them had been held privately by W. P. Conway, and by him torn up and cancelled whenever he so elected to do.

Now, the very question in this case is, whether the writing of the 20th of July, 1875, signed and acknowledged by M. Slaughter, and delivered by him to W. P. Conway, with the understanding that it was to be cancelled on the payment of the notes which it secured, was intrusted to him in a way that made it a nullity from the beginning, except in case of default; was intrusted to him in a way to pass no title and requiring no release except on default. I say the very question is, whether such writing was a deed, to be taken and treated, as a deed as of the 20th of July, 1875. Was it a deed at all until the 15th of October, 1875, when W. P. Conway elected to treat it as such? I see no reason and know of no precedent which requires a paper, in form a deed, but delivered upon condition that it is not to be treated as a deed passing title, except on the future election of the holder of it, to be held in law as an absolute deed from its date, contrary to the intention of both grantor and grantee in making it.

In the case before me, the intention of both grantor and grantee was, that the deed was not only not to go upon record, to bind creditors, but was not to be a deed passing title, in such a way as to require a release of title, until the grantee should elect so to treat it. I do not think that a paper in form of a deed, which both parties to it agree is not to be treated as a deed except upon a future contingency, can become a deed until the happening of that contingency. I therefore hold that the paper which was signed and acknowledged by Slaughter, and accepted by Conway on the 20th of July, 1875, did not become a deed until Conway, on the 15th of October, elected to treat it as such, and put it upon record. Section 5128 makes void any conveyance which, directly or indirectly, absolutely or conditionally, creates a preference of one creditor over others within two months before the filing of the petition. As the deed in question was void by law as to creditors until the 15th of October, 1875, and, as between parties, was a private, inchoate, defeasible writing until that date, I think that it did not take the character of a deed of conveyance or pass any title until that date; and, therefore, that it falls within the inhibition of section 5128 of the Revised Statutes. I so decide; and will sign a decree in accordance with the prayer of the bill, declaring the deed of Slaughter to Conway void, and setting it aside.

From that decree an appeal was taken, on the hearing of which the chief justice decided as follows:

WAITE, Circuit Justice. The supreme court of the United States decided at its last term, in Sawyer v. Turpin [91 U. S. 114], that if a mortgage to secure a pre-existing debt was executed more than four months before the filing of a petition for the adjudication of the mortgagor a bankrupt, it would be good as against the assignee in bankruptcy when appointed, if recorded before his rights attached but within the four months. This case arose before the act of June 22, 1874 (18 Stat. 180), changing the time of the prohibited preference to a period within two months next preceding the filing of the petition, instead of four, as it originally stood. Upon the principle established in that case, this deed of trust is not invalid under the provision of section 35 of the bankrupt act as amended and enforced at the time of its execution. The deed was delivered to Conway when it was executed, and held by him as security for the notes it described. The testimony is clear upon this point. The failure to record previous deeds of the same character, their surrender for cancellation without a formal reconveyance after payment of the notes, and their acknowledgment before the defendant Garnett as a notary, are all circumstances proper for consideration when determining what the real character of this transaction was; but, in our opinion, they are not sufficient to overcome the positive testimony of all the parties to the effect that the delivery was complete, that the object on both sides was to secure the debts provided for, and that Conway, the trustee, was fully authorized to cause the record to be made whenever he or his beneficiaries thought it desirable to do so. The deed was good as between the parties without record, but until recorded it was void against creditors. Code Va. 1873, p. 897, c. 114. No deed can be admitted to record until proved or acknowledged in the manner provided for. Id. p. 905, § 117. A record without the requisite proof or acknowledgment does not affect creditors. A deed may be acknowledged by the grantor before a notary public, and, upon the certificate of the notary to that effect in proper form, recorded. The form of the certificate in this case is correct, but it is insisted that because Garnett, the notary, was interested as one of the beneficiaries in the trust, he was incompetent in law to receive and certify the acknowledgment. This presents the principal question in the case for our consideration.

The law provides only for the acknowledgment of a deed before a notary public. It does not require, in express terms certainly, that he shall be disinterested. A notary public is an officer provided for by statute. He must give bond for the faithful performance of his duties. Code Va. 1873, p. 903, c. 116. It has been frequently decided that an acknowledgment before a grantee named in a deed was of no effect. Beaman v. Whitney, 20 Me. 413; Wilson v. Traer, 20 Iowa, 233; Stevens v. Hampton, 46 Mo. 404; Groesbeck v. Seeley, 13 Mich. 345. It has also been held that a party interested in a deed cannot take and certify the acknowledgment of a married woman requiring a privy examination. Withers v. Baird, 7 Watts, 228. The taking of such an acknowledgment is, in some respects, a judicial act, and not ministerial only, but in the case of an ordinary acknowledgment it is purely a ministerial act. Truman v. Lore's Lessee, 14 Ohio St. 144; Lynch v. Livingston, 2 Seld. [6 N. Y.] 434. Upon this principle it was decided in Dussuame v. Burnett, 5 Iowa, 95, that an acknowledgment before one not a grantee named in the deed, but interested in the conveyance, was good. The same distinction was recognized in Stevens v. Hampton, before cited. In October last the judge of the Rockbridge circuit court of Virginia held, in the case of Lady v. Lady [unreported], pending before him, that a grantee named in a deed, though a trustee only, was incompetent to take the acknowledgment of a married woman, the grantor, which required a privy examination. An acknowledgment of that kind, it was said, was of such sanctity as to make it necessary for the officer taking it to be disinterested. The recording acts are intended for the security of titles and the prevention of frauds. They are to be construed liberally to that end. As the record, when made, is constructive notice to all having the legal right to rely upon it for protection, public policy requires that it shall import as near absolute verity as is consistent with a due regard to the rights of the parties interested. A deed acknowledged before one named as grantee, carries upon its face notice of that fact, or, what is equivalent, notice of circumstances sufficient to put a reasonable man upon inquiry. But when the name of the officer taking the acknowledgment does not appear as grantee, or as otherwise interested, no such notice or presumption accompanies the deed or its record. A certificate of acknowledgment is required to perfect a deed for record. The grantor can select such authorized officer for that purpose as he chooses. He has full power to protect himself against frauds by interested parties as certifying officers, for he may refuse to make his acknowledgment before them.

The question we have now before us is not whether as between these parties the certificate can be impeached, but whether it is sufficient in law to authorize the record. It states only facts. The deed was actually acknowledged before a notary public. A recorder receiving it in its present form, and not knowing that the certifying officer was interested in the conveyance, would certainly be justified in putting it on record. The deed itself did not carry notice to him of the supposed disqualification any more than it did to others. It was no part of his duty to detect the secret interest of the certifying officer. If the instrument was apparently sufficient in form, he had nothing to do but to receive and record it. All this the grantor knew, or ought to have known. Every man is held responsible for the necessary consequences of his own voluntary acts. This is a familiar rule, and as old as the principles of common honesty. A grantor acknowledges a deed for the purpose of putting it in a condition for record. The object of the record is to give public notice of what had been done with the property. The public are expected to examine and act upon this evidence. Having voluntarily acknowledged and delivered his deed, the grantor is presumed to have voluntarily consented to its record. He must, therefore, be charged with all the legitimate consequences of such an act. If his deed is found on record, apparently executed according to the forms of law, and without any circumstances of suspicion against it, the plainest principles of equity would hold him estopped from setting up an undisclosed interest of the officer before whom he made his acknowledgment, to defeat his conveyance, as against an innocent purchaser relying upon the record as the evidence of his title. But this defence would be open to him if his acknowledgment were actually void. Void acts are as no acts; they bind no one. Voidable acts are good until avoided, and they cannot be avoided as against rights actually vested under them. As against the grantee, a deed is as much voidable after record as before. So far as he is concerned, the effect of the record is only to change the burden of proof, to some extent, from him to the grantor. After a record duly made, the law presumes that all has been done which is necessary, to give the instrument validity, but this presumption may always be rebutted as against the grantee. And as against third parties, it may be shown that a deed was never signed, sealed, or delivered.

Clearly, therefore, it is against the policy of the recording acts to hold an acknowledgment void because of the secret interest of an officer taking and certifying it. The effort should be to prevent rather than allow hidden defects in the evidence of public records. If voidable only, it is sufficient to authorize the record, if not previously avoided. So, too, as has been seen, it may be avoided at any time after record and before the rights of third parties have attached. This, as it seems to us, furnishes the grantor with all the protection he has the right to demand as against the consequences of his own acts, and at the same time leaves to the recording acts their legitimate power and effect. We conclude, therefore, that the acknowledgment in this case before Garnett was sufficient to authorize the record of the deed to Conway. The acknowledgment may, however, as between these parties, be avoided for fraud if established. But there is no proof of fraud. On the contrary, all parties agree that the acknowledgment was freely and fairly made in the belief that it was in all respects sufficient to vest the title in the trustee for the purposes specified.

The decree of the district court annulling the deed is therefore reversed; but inasmuch as the trustee named in the deed is interested in the debt secured by the trust, the sale advertised by him should be enjoined, and another trustee appointed to execute the trust in that behalf. A decree may be prepared in accordance with this opinion.

Case No. 10,038.

NATIONAL BANK OF MADISON v. DAVIS et al.

[8 Biss. 100; 6 Cent. Law J. 106; 5 Reporter, 258; 1 Thomp. Nat. Bank Cas. 350; 10 Chi. Leg. News, 156.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. Oct., 1877.

USURY—RENEWAL NOTE—AMOUNT RECOVERED—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—NATIONAL BANK.

1. Where a national bank discounts a note, reserving a usurious rate of interest, and the borrower gives a new note in renewal at legal interest, the bank is entitled to recover the amount of the renewal note, with interest, less the amount of the usury reserved on the original discount, credited as of that date.

[Cited in Hill v. National Bank of Barre, 15 Fed. 433.]

2. Usury, paid more than two years before the commencement of the suit, cannot be recovered nor credited upon the principal of the note.

Assumpsit on a promissory note. The plaintiff, on the 19th of May, 1869, for the defendants, Jacob Davis [and others] discounted his note for $3,000 at four months, with two indorsers, at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, paying Davis the proceeds less $128.50, the interest reserved. There were divers renewals of this note, each renewal being for the full amount of the principal, Davis actually paying the interest in advance, the bank reserving nothing out of the proceeds of the discount. The indorsers were accommodation indorsers, and there were different indorsers upon different renewals. In 1873, Davis paid $700 on the principal, thus reducing his loan to $2,300, for which sum four different renewal notes were given. On December 9, 1873, Davis paid on one of these renewals 12 per cent. interest in advance. This was the last usurious interest paid. From that date the plaintiff received only legal interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. On April 1, 1875, Davis renewed his loan by giving his two notes for like amounts, maturing at different dates, and the note sued on was given in renewal of one of these notes.

C. E. Walker and C. L. Holstein, for plaintiff.

Herod & Winter, for defendants.

Before DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge, and GRESHAM, District Judge.

GRESHAM, District Judge. Section 30 of the national bank act (13 Stat. 108), approved June 3, 1864, reads as follows:

"Section 30. And be it further enacted, that every association may take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidence of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state or territory where the bank is located, and no more, except that where, by the laws of any state, a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized in any such state under this act. And when no rate is fixed by the laws of the state or territory, the bank may take, receive, reserve or charge a rate not exceeding seven per centum, and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days for which the note, bill or other evidence of debt has to run.

"And the knowingly taking, receiving, reserving or charging a rate of interest greater than aforesaid shall be held and adjudged a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon. And in case a greater rate of interest has been paid, the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives, may recover back in any action of debt, twice the amount of the interest thus paid, from the association taking or receiving the same: provided, that such action is commenced within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred. But the purchase, discount or sale of a bona fide bill of exchange, payable at any other place than the place of such purchase, discount or sale, at no more than the current rate of exchange for sight drafts, in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or receiving a greater rate of interest."

If a national bank discount a note at a usurious rate of interest, paying the borrower the proceeds less the interest, and suit be brought to recover the loan, and the borrower plead the usury, the bank will recover the face of the note less the entire interest taken out, received or reserved, and no more. It will thus collect the sum of money it actually paid out, being punished for receiving interest in excess of the legal rate by forfeiting all interest. But if the note thus discounted be renewed for the same amount, the borrower paying usurious interest out of his pocket in advance, and suit be brought on the renewed note, the defendant may recoup double the amount of the entire interest actually paid on renewal, or in an independent action of debt he may recover from the bank double the amount of the entire interest thus paid.

In either case the punishment of the bank is the same. In the latter case the bank forfeits double the amount of the interest paid, and yet recovers the amount it actually paid out, for it will be remembered the note sued on includes the amount of interest originally reserved. True, if the note be renewed in the same manner more than once, and the borrower be allowed to recoup, or in an independent action, recover double the amount of usurious interest paid, the bank will lose part of the principal as well as all of the interest. But forfeiture of double the entire interest paid is barred after the lapse of two years.

If, instead of paying the usurious interest at each renewal of the loan, the same be added to the principal and included in the renewal notes, the bank, if the usury be pleaded, will recover the amount it originally paid to the borrower; that is to say, it will recover the amount of the last of the renewal series sued on, less all interest included in it.

Usury forfeited the entire loan or debt under the banking act of February 25, 1863 [12 Stat. 665]. This, congress thought, was too severe, and the act of 1864, with the exception already noticed, limits the forfeiture to the interest only.

In the case of Farmers', etc., Nat. Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S. 29, the court say: "In the act of 1864 the forfeiture of the debt is omitted, and there is substituted for it the forfeiture of the interest stipulated for, if it had only been reserved, and the recovery of twice the amount when the interest had been actually paid."

The only forfeitures visited upon national banks, when they stipulate for or receive illegal interest, are those found in the banking act. They are not subject to any penalties or forfeitures contained in state statutes. Farmers', etc., Nat. Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S. 29.

It is a familiar principle that forfeitures are never favored. All actual payments in excess of the legal rate were made more than two years before the defendant's plea of usury was filed, and, in fact, more than two years before this suit was brought. The plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount of the note in suit with interest, less $128.50, the interest reserved on the original discount, which is to be credited as of the date of the reservation, all other interest having been actually paid.

NATIONAL BANK OF THE REPUBLIC v. BROOKLYN CITY & N. R. CO. et al.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 26, 1877.[2]

NOTES—WRONGFUL TRANSFER TO INNOCENT HOLDER—EQUITIES—ESTOPPEL—JUDGMENT IN FAVOR OF ENDORSER—ACTION AGAINST MAKER.

1. H., having a promissory note made by B., wrongfully diverted it and transferred it to N., as collateral security for a precedent debt due by H. to N., who took it in good faith: Held, that N. could not be affected by any equities between B. and H.

[Cited in Bank of The Metropolis v. First Nat. Bank of Jersey City, 19 Fed. 302; First Nat. Bank of Circleville v. Bank of Monroe, 33 Fed. 410.]

2. N. sued an endorser of the note in a state court, and was defeated, on the ground that the law, as held by the state court, was, that N. having taken the note as security for a precedent debt, took it subject to the equities between the prior parties. Afterwards N. sued the maker on the same note: Held, that the judgment in the suit against the endorser was not a bar in favor of the maker.

WALLACE, District Judge. The diversion of the note in suit by Hutchinson & Ingersoll cannot avail the defendants, the makers, because, within the authority of Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 1, the plaintiff, having taken the note in good faith from Hutchinson & Ingersoll, though only as collateral to a pre-existing debt of the latter, cannot be affected by the equities between the antecedent parties. It is useless to review or discuss the numerous cases which hold that, where a note is thus taken as security, and there is no agreement, express or implied from the circumstances, that the creditor is to forbear or extend the loan, he is not a holder for a valuable consideration, and cannot recover against the maker, when the note has been fraudulently put in circulation or diverted. It suffices to say, that this is the conclusion reached in nearly all the cases in England and in this country where the question has arisen, and is in accord with the doctrine of courts of equity, that he who does not part with some new consideration, or assume some new obligation, is not a purchaser for a valuable consideration, and has no better rights than the party from whom he purchases. Text writers and commentators of very respectable authority have expressed the opinion that no new agreement between the creditor and the party transferring the paper is essential, for the reason that, if such an agreement is not implied, at least there follows a remission of that vigilance which might otherwise have secured satisfaction of the debt, and because the acceptance of the security imposes new obligations on the part of the creditor toward the debtor. Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 829; Byles, Bills, 125, note by Judge Sharswood. Whether this reasoning is satisfactory or not I shall not now stop to inquire. The case of Swift v. Tyson [supra], was one where the bill was taken in payment of a note held by the plaintiff against the person who transferred the bill, but no weight was placed upon the fact that plaintiff accepted the note in payment and thus satisfied the original debt; and it has been generally accepted as committing the supreme court to the broad proposition, that the mere acceptance of negotiable paper as security entitled the holder to all the rights of a purchaser for a valuable consideration. McBride v. Farmers' Bank, 26 N. Y. 450; Atkinson v. Brooks, 26 Vt. 569; Allaire v. Hartshorne, 1 Zab. [21 N. J. Law] 665; Gibson v. Conner, 3 Ga. 47; Fellows v. Harris, 12 Smedes & M. 462; Blanchard v. Stevens, 3 Cush. 162. Until a more decisive expression from that tribunal, I must yield to the accepted import of that decision, and hold adversely to the position of the defendant.

It is insisted for the defendant, that the judgment recovered in the suit brought by the plaintiff against the endorsers of the note in suit is a bar to this action against the maker. That suit was brought in the state court, and decided, not upon any defence peculiar to the endorsers, but in accordance with the rule as held in this state, by which the holder of a note, who has taken it as security for a precedent debt, takes it subject to the equities existing between the prior parties. The simple question, then, is whether a judgment in favor of an endorser, in an action by the holder of the note, is an estoppel in an action brought against the maker, where the defence is upon ground common to both the maker and endorser. It would hardly be contended that a judgment in favor of the creditor against the principal would estop a surety from contesting the same issue when sued by the creditor; and it has been decided, in several cases, that a judgment in favor of the principal, when sued by the creditor, will not preclude a subsequent recovery by the creditor against the surety. Townsend v. Riddle, 2 N. H. 448; Bank of the State v. Robinson, 8 Eng. [13 Ark.] 214; Barker v. Casidy, 16 Barb. 177. Where there is no agreement, express or implied from the nature of the contract, that a surety shall be bound by a suit against the principal, the surety is not affected by the result. He is in the position of a stranger to the controversy. If the surety is not precluded by a judgment against the principal, the creditor is not, because estoppel must equally affect both parties. I entertain no doubt that the former suit is not a bar. To the extent its payment operated as a satisfaction of the plaintiff's debt, the defendant is entitled to be relieved. It has no other effect. The plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the amount of the debt unpaid, for which the note in suit was taken as collateral.

[On appeal to the supreme court the judgment of this court was affirmed. 102 U. S. 14.]

Case No. 10,040.

NATIONAL BANK OF WESTERN ARKANSAS v. SEBASTIAN COUNTY.

[5 Dill. 414.] [1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Arkansas. 1879.

COURTS — FEDERAL JURISDICTION — HOW DERIVED — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — LAWS VIOLATING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS — ACTION AGAINST COUNTY.

1. The jurisdiction of the federal courts is derived from the constitution and laws of the United States, and the same cannot be enlarged, diminished, or affected by state laws. Such jurisdiction over controversies cannot be impaired by the laws of the states which prescribe the modes of redress in their courts, or which regulate the distribution of their judicial power.

2. The constitution of the United States prohibits the states from passing any law which impairs the obligation of contracts. The laws which exist at the time of the making of a contract, and in the place where it is made and to be performed, enter into and make part of it. The constitution embraces those laws alike which affect its validity, construction, discharge, and enforcement.

3. An act of a state legislature which provides that counties are no longer corporations—that they cannot be sued—is void as to obligations legally issued by such counties when the law of the state provided they could be sued, when set up against a party seeking a remedy upon the obligations of a county in a federal court, because the state legislature cannot take away the right of a holder of such county obligations to sue in a federal court when such right is given him by the constitution and laws of the United States, and because such a law impairs the obligation of such contracts.

[Cited in Vincent v. Lincoln County, 30 Fed. 752.]

This is an action brought by plaintiff on several county warrants issued at different times by defendant county. Suit was commenced on the 4th of January, 1879. To the complaint the defendant, by its attorney, on the 5th of May, A. D. 1879, filed an answer, setting up as a defence that since the commencement of this action, to-wit, on the 27th of February, 1879, the legislature of the state of Arkansas passed a law repealing certain sections of the general law of the state providing that the several counties thereof could sue and be sued; the law of the state, in other words, takes away the suable character of the counties. To this answer the plaintiff filed a general demurrer, alleging "that the facts set forth in said answer are not sufficient to constitute a defence to the plaintiff's cause of action;" and upon this demurrer the case was submitted to the court.

Messrs. Clendenning and Sandels, for plaintiff.

R. B. Rutherford, for defendant.

PARKER, District Judge. The plaintiff in this action had a right, at the time suit was brought, to bring its action in a district or circuit court of the United States. Sections 629, 563, Rev. St.; Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 506; Cadle v. Tracy [Case No. 2,279].

The county, at the time of the issue by it of the several warrants in suit in this case, had a right to issue such warrants. Section 605, Gantt, Dig. And when such warrants were issued by the county they were evidences of a promise by the county to pay whoever might be the holder thereof. They were so far negotiable as to pass by delivery, and only lacked that commercial character given by the law merchant to certain kinds of commercial instruments, which, when they are received by a bona fide, innocent holder for value before they are overdue, come to him freed from any equities to be set up by the maker against them.

The bank received these warrants in the course of its business, having paid a valuable consideration for them. This it had a right to do. At the time of the issue of these warrants, when they were received by the bank, and when suit was brought upon them, the defendant, under the laws of the state, was a body corporate and politic, and, by its name, it could sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, defend and be defended, in any court. Section 937, Gantt, Dig., provides "that each county which now exists, or which may hereafter be established, shall be a body corporate and politic." Section 938 provides that "all suits brought by or against a county shall be brought in the name of or against the county by name, and by its name it may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, defend and be defended." This was the law of the contract looking to the remedy at the time it was made.

On the 27th of February, 1879 [Laws 1879, p. 13], the legislature of the state passed a law, the 1st section of which provides for the repeal of certain sections of the general law of the state which gave to counties their corporate character and provided that they might be sued. Section 2 is as follows: "That hereafter all persons having demands against any county shall present the same, duly verified according to law, to the county court of such county, for allowance or rejection." * * *

The suit in this case had been brought, and was pending in the federal court, at the time this law was passed. At that time this court had obtained jurisdiction. This act was evidently passed by the legislature with the intent to take away the right of the holders of obligations issued by the several counties of the state to bring suit on them in the federal courts, although they might have this right under the constitution and laws of the United States. Can this be done? In the case of U. S. v. Drennan [Case No. 14,992], it is held that "the jurisdiction of the federal courts is derived from the constitution and laws of the United States, and cannot be enlarged, diminished, or affected by state laws." This principle is sustained by Livingston v. Jefferson [Id. 8,411]; also by the case of Mason v. Boom Co. (3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 252).

The power to contract with citizens of other states, who have a right to sue in the federal courts, or with a national bank, which has the same right, implies liability to suit by such citizens or such national bank, and no statute limitation of suability can defeat a jurisdiction given by the constitution or laws of the United States. Cowles v. Mercer County, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 118. I think it clear that the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States over controversies cannot be impaired by the laws of the states which prescribe the modes of redress in their courts, or which regulate the distribution of their judicial power. Hyde v. Stone, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 175; Suydam v. Broadnax, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 67; Union Bank v. Jolly's Adm'r, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 503; Payne v. Hook, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 425.

Now, at the time of the passage of this law the county had made its contract; its promise to pay was out; its liability on its promise was clear; the obligation of its contract was in existence. Could the state legislature do anything to impair the obligation of this contract of the county? "No state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts," is the language of the supreme law of the land (article 10, § 1, Const. U. S). What is the obligation of the contract? It consists in the power and efficacy of the law which applies to and imposes performance of the contract or the payment of an equivalent for non-performance. Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 213.

The laws which exist at the time of the making of a contract, and in the place where it is made and to be performed, enter into and make part of it. The constitution embraces those laws alike which affect its validity, construction, discharge, and enforcement. Von Hoffman v. Quincy, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 535; Walker v. Whitehead, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 314; Edwards v. Kearzey, 96 U. S. 595.

In the case of Edwards v. Kearzey, Mr. Justice Swayne says: "The obligation of a contract includes everything within its obligatory scope. Among these elements nothing is more important than the means of enforcement. This is the breath of its vital existence. Without it the contract, as such, in the view of the law, ceases to be, and falls into the class of 'those imperfect obligations,' as they are termed, which depend for their fulfillment upon the will and conscience of those upon whom they rest. The ideas of right and remedy are inseparable." "Want of right and want of remedy are the same thing." 1 Bac. Abr. tit. "Actions in General," letter B. To be in conflict with the constitution, it is not necessary that the act of the legislature should import an actual destruction of the obligation of contracts. It is sufficient that the act imports an impairment of the obligation. If by the legislative act the obligation of contracts is in any degree impaired, or, what is the same thing, if the obligation is weakened or rendered less operative, the constitution is violated, and the act is so far inoperative.

It is a proposition not debatable that the legislature of the state cannot take away the right of the plaintiff to sue in a federal court, as such right is secured by a law of congress, which, with the constitution of the United States, is the supreme law of the land. The demurrer must therefore be sustained. Judgment accordingly.

Case No. 10,041.

NATIONAL EXCH. BANK v. MOORE.

[2 Bond, 170;[1] 1 N. B. R. 470 (Quarto, 123); 1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 74.]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. Feb. Term, 1868.

USURY—NATIONAL BANKING ACT—FORFEITURE OF DOUBLE INTEREST—PRINCIPAL DEBT—VITIATED CONTRACT.

1. Section 30 of the national banking act of June 3, 1864 [13 Stat. 99], restricts banks organized under the act to the rate of interest on loans and discounts authorized by the laws of the state in which a bank is located; and provides, that charging or reserving a higher rate of interest shall subject the bank to the forfeiture of all the interest charged or paid, with a right by the person paying the same to sue for and recover double the amount paid.

[Cited in Darby v. Boatmen's Sav. Inst., Case No. 3,571; Re Pittock, Id. 11,189; Hill v. National Bank of Barre, 15 Fed. 433.]

2. But the statute does not provide for the forfeiture of the principal debt; and although interest has been reserved, by a bank in Ohio, in excess of the rate of interest allowed by the law of the state, the bank has a valid claim against the debtor for the principal debt.

[Cited in Re Pittock, Case No. 11,189.]

3. Although the reservation of an illegal rate of interest is in violation of the statute, there is no provision for the forfeiture of the principal debt; and, the statute having provided for the forfeiture of twice the amount of the illegal interest charged, the fair implication is, that it was the intention of congress that such forfeiture should be the only penalty.

4. The reservation of ten per cent. interest being in excess of the rate prescribed by the state, does not involve such moral turpitude as on the principles of the common law to vitiate the contract.

In bankruptcy.

H. C. Noble, for petitioner.

C. N. Olds, Mr. Baldwin, and Mr. English, for bankrupt.

[1] [Reported by Lewis H. Bond, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

LEAVITT, District Judge. The petition alleges that the National Exchange Bank of Columbus is a creditor of Addison Moore in a sum exceeding three hundred dollars, upon a liability created by his indorsement of a promissory note given to said bank by one W. W. Moore, payable to the order of said Addison Moore three months after June 1, 1867, which was not paid at maturity, though payment was duly demanded, and the indorser notified of the non-payment. The petition then avers several acts of bankruptcy, in making payments and transfers of property to certain creditors, with a knowledge of his insolvency, and with intent to prefer them. The prayer of the petition is, that for these acts the said Moore may be declared a bankrupt, pursuant to the act of congress, approved March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 517]. The alleged bankrupt, having been duly notified of the time and place of hearing, has appeared by counsel and filed his answer to the allegations of the petition charging the acts of bankruptcy, and also averring that the debt claimed as due to the said bank is not a demand provable under the bankrupt act, and that the promissory note indorsed by him is a nullity, for the reason that in its discount by the bank interest was reserved and paid at a higher rate than six per cent. per annum. The legality and provability of the petitioner's debt precedes the question whether the alleged acts of bankruptcy have been committed, and therefore first requires the consideration of the court. The bankrupt act, in terms, makes it necessary that the petitioning creditor should allege and prove a valid and legal demand against the person proceeded against as a bankrupt; and it is obvious, therefore, if this exception is sustained he has no standing in court, and his petition must be dismissed, unless some other creditor shall choose to prosecute as the petitioner.

It is admitted, by the counsel for Moore, that the petitioning creditor, the National Exchange Bank of Columbus, is a banking institution, legally organized and doing business as such, under the authority of the national banking law of June 3, 1864. It is admitted, by the counsel for the bank, that the note described was discounted by that institution, and that interest on the same, charged and reserved, was at the rate of ten per cent. per annum. And it is insisted, that the interest so charged and reserved, being in excess of six per cent. per annum, is usurious, and the discount of the note beyond the corporate power of the bank; and, therefore, that the note indorsed by said Moore is void, and cannot be viewed as creating a valid debt provable under the bankrupt act. The question thus presented involves the construction of the provisions of the national banking act prescribing the rate of interest which banks organized under it may charge and reserve, and the legal effect of charging and reserving a higher rate than that limited by the act. The court has no information that this question has been judicially decided as arising under the bankrupt act of 1867, and is therefore without any precedent to aid it in reaching a conclusion. That it is one of great practical importance, and not free from doubt, may be readily conceded. Regretting that the pressure of other duties has not permitted a more thorough investigation of the point, I will proceed to state the views I entertain.

Section 30 of the national banking act provides, "that any banking association may take, receive, reserve, and charge, on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state or territory where the bank is located, and no more, except that where, by the laws of the state or territory, a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized in any such state under this act. And where no rate is fixed by the laws of the state or territory, the bank may take, receive, reserve, and charge a rate not exceeding seven per centum; and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days for which the note, bill or other evidence of debt has to run. And the knowingly taking, receiving, reserving, or charging a rate of interest greater than aforesaid, shall be held and adjudged to be a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon. And, in case a greater rate of interest has been paid, the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives, may recover back, in any action of debt, twice the amount of interest thus paid, from the association receiving the same."

The question arising under this provision of the banking law of the United States has been fully and ably argued by the counsel on both sides, and numerous authorities have been cited. On the one hand, it is insisted that as by the law of Ohio six per cent. per annum is established as the legal rate of interest, the reservation of a higher rate by a national bank is an excess of its corporate power and usurious in its character; and that the writing or evidence of debt, on which interest is thus reserved or paid, is a nullity and can have no legal force. On the other hand, it is contended that although such reservation of interest is in conflict with the statute and therefore illegal, the statute has affixed, as the penalty of the illegal act, not the forfeiture of the principal debt, but of the entire interest illegally reserved, with the right, to the party paying it, to recover, by suit against the bank, double the sum of the interest paid. The cases cited by the counsel, urging this exception to the demand of the petitioning creditor, are harmonious in holding that a contract or agreement against public policy, or founded upon an immoral consideration, or in conflict with an explicit statutory provision, is invalid and can not be enforced in a court of justice. It is, undoubtedly, a sound legal principle, that courts will not lend their aid to enforce contracts or transactions to which such objections apply. But, it occurs to the court, that the point presented in this case is not fully met by the cases cited. This court is called upon to give a construction to the section of the national banking law, which has been quoted. And the rule of interpretation is, to ascertain, from the whole section, what was the intention of the legislature in enacting it. In prescribing a rate of interest legally chargeable, and declaring an excess of such rate to be illegal, was it intended that the contract should be an entire nullity, and the principal, with twice the amount of interest charged, be forfeited; or, was it intended that the forfeiture of double the interest charged should be the penalty for the illegal act, without invalidating the right of the bank to enforce the payment of the principal debt? It was clearly within the legislative power to have declared that the penalty for charging or receiving illegal interest should be the forfeiture of both principal and twice the amount of interest. But, if this had been intended, would not such an intention have been expressed in explicit language. There is no reason to doubt that if the section referred to had stopped with the prohibition of taking or reserving interest in excess of the rate prescribed, a loan made by a bank in conflict with such prohibition could not be enforced. It would unquestionably be held to be an illegal and void act. But the legislature has chosen to prescribe a specific penalty for the illegal act, namely, the forfeiture of double the sum of the entire interest charged or paid, and have not declared that the principal debt should be forfeited. It is certainly not reasonable to infer that it was the intention of congress to provide a double penalty for the illegal reservation of interest on loans. Yet such would be the effect of the construction of the section referred to, as insisted on by the counsel for the alleged bankrupt. So far as the court is advised, there is no law in any of the states of the Union on the subject of usurious interest, which provides for the forfeiture of the entire debt on which such interest has been charged and paid, together with the interest and a liability on the part of the creditor to pay twice the amount of the interest to the debtor. I am therefore led to the conclusion that by a fair implication, it was not intended by congress, in the enactment of the section referred to, to punish a bank for reserving interest in excess of the statute, by the forfeiture not only of the principal debt, but double the interest charged or received. It was held by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of U. S. v. Babbitt, 1 Black, 61, that "what is implied in a statute, pleading, contract, or will, is as much a part of it as what is expressed." From the provisions of section 30, it would seem to be fairly implied that while the specific forfeiture named is enforceable, the transaction as to the principal debt is not invalidated.

This view, in my judgment, violates no principle of sound morality or of public policy. It was clearly competent for the congress of the United States, in the creation of the national banking system, to visit the banks with a severe penalty for taking excessive interest, without a forfeiture of the debt. In this age of commercial enterprise and activity, many solvent and perfectly responsible persons find that they can make profit by borrowing money at a rate of interest above the legal standard. If the rate charged is not so high as to be unconscionable and oppressive, no wrong is perpetrated on the borrower, and no just reason is perceived for absolving him from his liability to pay the principal debt, unless the legislative will to that effect is clearly expressed. It may be right and expedient that proper guards should be provided by law against extortionate charges for the loan of money. Usury, in its odious sense, is immoral and reprehensible; but if one voluntarily borrows money from a bank or an individual, and in good faith promises payment, with interest beyond the legal rate, there is no justice in visiting upon the lender the forfeiture not only of the debt, but subjecting him to a liability, at the suit of the borrower, to double the amount of interest charged. If there is culpability in such a transaction, both parties are equally implicated; but the construction of the statute insisted upon, places it in the power of the borrower, not only to relieve himself from the entire debt, but to make dishonorable gain by suing for and recovering double the amount of interest reserved. In the absence of any clear statutory provision for this purpose, I am unwilling to sanction such a construction of the section of the law referred to as will lead to the results indicated. There is high judicial authority for the doctrine that an act may be unlawful as within the prohibition of a statute, and yet a debt or obligation growing out of the act be valid, unless it appears by a fair construction of the statute that it was the intention of the legislature that it should be void. The case of Harris v. Runnels, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 79, seems to be directly in point on this proposition. The defendant was sued on a promissory note, the consideration of which was the price of certain slaves taken to the state of Mississippi, in violation of a law of that state. Upon the question whether the note was void, the court held that the intention of the legislature as to the validity of the note, must be decisive of the question. In their opinion, the court say: "Whatever may be the structure of the statute in respect to prohibition and penalty, or penalty alone, it is not to be taken for granted that contracts in contravention of it were to be void, in the sense that they were not to be enforced in a court of justice." And further: "It is true that a statute containing a prohibition and a penalty, makes the act which it punishes unlawful, and the same may be implied from a penalty without a prohibition; but it does not follow that the unlawfulness of the act was meant by the legislature to avoid a contract made in contravention of it. When the statute is silent, and contains nothing from which the contrary can be inferred, a contract in contravention of it is void. It is not necessary, however, that the reverse of that should be expressed in terms to exempt a contract from the rule. The exemption may be inferred from those rules of interpretation, to which, from the nature of legislation, all of it is liable when subjected to judicial scrutiny. That legislators do not think the rule one of universal obligation, or that upon grounds of public policy it should always be applied, is very certain. For in some statutes, it is said in terms that such contracts are void; in others, that they are not so. In one statute there is no prohibition expressed, and only a penalty; in another, there is prohibition and penalty, in some of which, contracts in violation of them are void or not, according to the subject-matter and object of the statute; and there are other statutes in which there are penalties and prohibitions, in which contracts made in contravention of them will not be void, unless one of the parties to them practices a fraud upon the ignorance of the other. It must be obvious from such diversities of legislation, that statutes forbidding or enjoining things to be done, with penalties accordingly, should always be fully examined before courts should refuse to give aid to enforce contracts in contravention of them." The case cited seems strongly to sustain the principle that unless it is clear, from the words of a prohibitory statute, that an agreement in violation of it is void, courts will not so declare it, but will give effect to the agreement. The intention of the legislature is to be made out by referring to the whole statute, and such intention will control the courts in giving it a construction. And, as before remarked, there being nothing in the national banking act from which an intention to invalidate a contract, by which illegal interest is reserved, is fairly implied, and there being ground for the presumption, from the specific penalty provided, that such effect was not intended, I am led to the conclusion that the note in question is not void, and must be recognized as a provable debt under the bankrupt law.

The case of Bank of U. S. v. Owens, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 527, is cited by counsel as sustaining the doctrine that all contracts prohibited by law are unconditionally void, and not to be enforced, even if there is no express provision declaring their nullity. The principle held in that case is, however, explained and modified by the later case of Harris v. Runnells, before referred to. And it may be remarked that the facts in the case in 2 Pet. were of a character requiring the most stringent application of law to secure the ends of justice. There was flagrant and oppressive usury on the part of the bank, as well as a clear violation of its charter. The interest reserved, as stated in the opinion of the court, was equivalent to forty-five per cent. for three years, being about fifteen per cent. per annum in excess of the legal interest. Every instinct of justice required that relief from this hardship should be afforded the injured party. But the case before this court does not present any of the repulsive features of the case referred to. It involves no moral turpitude, vitiating the contract on general principles. It is simply the case of a voluntary indorsement of a promissory note, in the discount of which interest was reserved at the rate of ten per cent. per annum. There is no pretense that any unjust advantage was taken of the necessities of the borrower, or that anything transpired which would shock the conscience of the most upright person. If, therefore, the note in question is void, it must be because the statute makes it so, and not on the general principles of the common law. It is insisted, however, by the counsel for the alleged bankrupt, that the discounting the note in question, with a reservation of illegal interest, was beyond the corporate power of the bank, and imports an excess of authority which invalidates the note. It is doubtless true, as a general principle, that every corporation must adhere strictly to the law of its creation, and can exercise no power not expressly granted or necessarily implied. But the cases are numerous to the effect, that where a banking institution is vested by its charter with authority to make loans by the discount of paper, its legal rights and responsibilities as to such a transaction are the same as those applicable to private persons. The laws of all the states of the Union prescribe the rate of interest which may be charged in the ordinary transactions of life, and affix a penalty for any excess beyond the rates fixed. But the same rule applies to such transactions as applies to corporations deriving their authority from their charters. In this respect there seems to be no difference between natural persons and corporate entities. This principle was fully discussed and settled in two cases to which the attention of the court has been called, after full consideration. The cases referred to are Farmers' Bank v. Burchard, 33 Vt. 346, and Commercial Bank of Manchester v. Nolan, 7 How. (Miss.) 508. These cases, with many others that might be cited, distinctly hold that where a bank reserves illegal interest in its loans, unless its charter expressly declares that the contract of loans shall be void, it is void only as to the excess of interest charged, and not as to the principal. And it may not be inaptly noticed that this is the spirit of nearly all the modern legislation of the states on this subject. With few exceptions, the forfeiture of the illegal interest, or the whole of the interest reserved, is the penalty declared. And can it be reasonably doubted that the congress of the United States, in the enactment of section 30 of the national banking law, intended the same result, but superadding to the forfeiture of the entire interest, and as a further penalty, a liability to pay twice the sum of the entire interest reserved.

The counsel for Moore have referred to sections 9 and 53 of the national banking law, as showing the excess of corporate power of the bank in discounting the note in question at the rate of ten per cent. per annum. Section 9 requires each director of a national bank to take an oath that he will not knowingly violate, or willingly permit to be violated, any of the provisions of the act. And section 53 provides that the knowingly violating, or permitting the violation, of any of the provisions of the act by a director shall be a ground of forfeiture of all the rights and franchises granted, to be adjudged by a court of the United States, in a suit for that purpose, prosecuted by the comptroller of the currency. These are doubtless wise and just provisions to secure the faithful performance of the duties of directors. If complaint is made against them under the provisions of section 53, in the manner prescribed, the corporation is subject to forfeiture of all its rights and franchises, upon a proper adjudication by a court of the United States. But it is not perceived that this provision can affect the construction of section 30, fixing the rate of interest which may be charged, and the penalty for charging a rate in excess of that prescribed. The illegal interest is made a ground for the forfeiture of the charter, but it does not follow that a contract of loan by which illegal interest is reserved shall be void as to the principal debt, or that, as between the parties to the transaction, any other result would follow, beyond the liability of the bank to forfeit twice the sum of interest received. On this subject the remark of Judge Story, in the case of Fleckner v. Bank of U. S., 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 388, seems directly in point. That learned judge, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The taking of interest by the bank beyond the sum authorized by the charter, would doubtless be a violation of its charter, for which a remedy might be applied by the government; but as the act of congress (the charter of the bank) does not declare that it shall avoid the contract, it is not perceived how the original defendant could avail himself of this ground to defeat a recovery."

In closing this opinion, I may remark that the pressure of other duties has prevented me from noticing in detail the several cases cited by the counsel for Moore to sustain the exception to the debt of the petitioning creditor. It did not seem to the court necessary that this should be done. The cases cited from the Ohio Reports, and the Reports of courts in other states, have no direct application to the question before this court. The decisions referred to were based on state statutes, the language of which, in relation to the reservation of illegal interest, was not in terms, or substantially, the same as that used in the national banking act under which the present question arises. In reaching the conclusion indicated, namely, that the debt of the National Exchange Bank of Columbus, so far as the principle is concerned, was not intended to be invalidated by section 30 of the national banking law, and is a debt provable under the bankrupt act, candor requires me to say that I am not altogether free from doubt. The question, as it bears upon the present proceeding, is not important to the parties. Under the bankrupt law, if the debt of the petitioning creditor is not valid, any other creditor may, by leave of the court, be made a party to the proceeding, and the petition may be brought to a final hearing on the merits. But in reference to the banking and commercial interests of the community, the question is one of vast practical importance. And doubtless it will soon be definitely settled by the court of the last resort. The exception to the petition is overruled, and the case will be heard on the facts which it alleges.

NATIONAL FILTERING OIL CO. v. ARCTIC OIL CO. et al.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 4, 1871.

PATENTS — PROCESS OF PURIFYING COAL OIL — FIRST INVENTION—EXPERIMENTS.

1. The letters patent granted to Robert A. Chesebrough, as inventor, August 22d, 1865, for an "improved process for purifying coal oil, &c.," are valid.

2. The claim of the patent is, "the use of bone-black for purifying petroleum or coal oils by filtration." The patentee commenced, in September or October, 1861, to experiment with bone-black, in filtering coal oil. He used the process, with considerable success, in filtering coal oil, in November, 1861. In the winter of 1861, or the early part of 1862, he filtered crude Pennsylvania petroleum, a light oil, through bone-black. Early in 1865 he began experimenting to filter crude West Virginia petroleum, a heavy oil, through bone-black, to obtain an oil for lubricating purposes, without distilling it. He was successful in producing such oil, and, in May, 1865, applied for his patent. Between 1861 and 1865 he made several experiments with bone-black, as well as other substances, to refine oil. One D. used bone-black to filter crude oil in May or June, 1862, and prepared and sold, in June or July, 1862, some one hundred barrels of petroleum, which was first distilled, then treated with chemicals, and then filtered through bone-black. He stopped manufacturing petroleum in July or August, 1862. He did not apply for a patent: Held, that Chesebrough invented the process in 1861; that D. did not invent it until 1862; that Chesebrough never abandoned his invention; and that, in law, Chesebrough was the first inventor.

3. It was impossible to tell, without experiment, whether coal oil or petroleum could be filtered through bone-black at all, much less so as to produce a useful effect, although it was known before that animal charcoal would render filthy water inodorous, and that rancid oils were deprived of their smell and taste by filtration through such charcoal, and that bone-black was a decolorizing agent.

In equity.

George T. Curtis and Francis R. Coudert, for plaintiffs.

Frank Loomis, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The suit is founded on letters patent [No. 49,502] of the United States granted to Robert A. Chesebrough, August 22d, 1865, for an "improved process for purifying coal oil, &c.," and assigned by him to the plaintiffs, who are a corporation. The specification of the patent states the invention to be, "a new and useful method of purifying coal oil and petroleum by filtration." It says: "The nature of my invention consists in the use of bone-black for purifying petroleum or coal oils by filtration, by first distilling the crude oil or petroleum in a still with a condensing worm, such as is commonly used for distilling the same. The products of distillation are benzole, illuminating oil and heavy oil, which I then filter either separately or combined, as follows: The material I use for filtering through is bone-black, made of charred bones. The filter is made of wood or iron, of any suitable form or height. The filter is filled up with the bone-black as high as may be necessary, according to the quality of the oil. The oil is run in on top of the filtering material, and allowed to filter through the perforated bottom of the filter, where it is collected. The operation is continued by feeding the oil into the top of the filter as fast as it runs through the filtering material, until the filtered oil shall begin to assume a dark color, when the operation is suspended, and the filter replenished by fresh material. The coal oil or petroleum refined by this process will be sweet in odor, of a light color, and will need no other treatment. The crude petroleum from the wells may be purified by this process without any previous distillation, either for purpose of illumination or lubrication." The claim is, "the use of bone-black for purifying petroleum or coal oils by filtration."

The defendants sued are the Arctic Oil Company, a corporation, E. H. Woodward, Roswell Haskell and Cornelius V. Deforest. The infringement charged in the bill is the manufacture and sale of lubricating oil made from petroleum oil by filtering the oil in the crude state through bone-black. The answer, which is that of the Arctic Oil Company alone, admits that that company has manufactured lubricating oil from petroleum and other oils by filtering the oil in its crude state through bone-black, but alleges that Chesebrough was not the original and first inventor of what is covered by his patent. It sets up prior knowledge of the invention by Cornelius V. Deforest, William T. Deforest, Cornelius I. Van Wyck, the Arctic Oil Company, J. H. Carrington, James L. Ely, and one Sylvester; that Chesebrough purchased from said William T. Deforest, such oil so made by said Cornelius V. Deforest by filtration through bone-black, for several years before Chesebrough applied for his patent; that Chesebrough obtained from said William T. Deforest the fact that said Cornelius V. Deforest used bone-black, made of charred bones, for purifying petroleum and coal oils; that Chesebrough had full knowledge of the use by said Cornelius V. Deforest of bone-black for purifying coal oil and petroleum at the time he applied for his patent; that the only effect produced upon coal oil or petroleum by filtration through bone-black, as described in the patent, is to decolorize it and remove foreign impurities from it, without regard to its gravity and whether it has been previously subjected to distillation or not; and that the property of bone-black to decolorize and remove foreign impurities from oils and other liquids was, before the invention of Chesebrough, described in certain public works—Blair's Chemistry, Thompson's Cyclopedia of Chemistry, Knight's English Encyclopedia, Chambers' Encyclopedia and Muspratt's Chemistry.

This case was brought to hearing in 1868, before Mr. Justice Nelson, on pleadings and proofs. He delivered an opinion, in October, 1868, arriving at the conclusion that there must be a decree for the defendants, on the ground that the patentee had been anticipated in the invention by Cornelius V. Deforest. Before any decree was entered, and in November, 1868, a motion was made by the plaintiffs that the case be re-opened and they be permitted to introduce further testimony, and that then the case be reheard. The motion was founded on affidavits of Chesebrough and others. The motion was granted, with leave to either party to introduce further testimony, the testimony theretofore taken in the cause to stand.

In his opinion, Judge Nelson says: "The only material question on the proofs, is, whether or not the patentee is the first and original inventor of this process or improvement; and this turns upon another, namely, whether he invented it before 1862. That the process was successfully used by Cornelius V. Deforest in the early part of that year, is not to be doubted, upon the evidence. At this time some three or four hundred barrels of oil were thus purified, some eighty barrels of which were sold to this patentee. The business was not profitable at the time, and was discontinued. The manufacture of this article, by the same process as described in the patent, is proved by Cornelius V. Deforest, the proprietor, Abraham Turner, Alexander McDonald, and Isaac Turner, workmen, and William T. Deforest, at the period above mentioned. It is claimed, however, that the patentee made the discovery prior to this time, and as early as 1861. The proof stands alone on his own testimony, though, if it is not mistaken, and is founded in fact, it could have been corroborated by other witnesses. Indeed, the circumstance that no other persons have been produced to establish the discovery at this early day, and some five years before his application for the patent, casts some suspicion upon his testimony; and besides which, he took out a patent dated June 27th, 1865, for an improved process of purifying, filtering and deodorizing petroleum, by the use of a combination of bone-dust, pulverized oyster shells and cotton cloth. The explanation given is not very satisfactory—that he took out this patent for bone-dust combined with oyster shells, thinking, at the time, that bone-dust was bone-black. The patentee says, that his principal experiments were in the fall of 1861, and the spring of 1865; that, in the fall of 1861, he had a number of filters made, which he took to Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, with a quantity of bone-black; that he there exhibited the process to several gentlemen with whom he was connected in business; and that he was fully persuaded of its value, but his friends objected to it on account of the expense of the process. William T. Deforest was examined as a witness, called to give rebuttal testimony to the complainants' evidence in reply. Some part of this testimony, I think, is exceptionable, in the order in which it was given. But a part of it is proper, as an explanation of the testimony of William H. Chesebrough, a witness in reply to the evidence in defence. This witness (William T. Deforest) had not been examined in the case, nor is he a party to the suit; yet his conversations with the patentee are freely given in evidence, as material, in the reply. It was competent, therefore, to call him to explain or contradict this evidence. It was the first opportunity the defendants had to give the explanation. He states a conversation he had with the patentee in February or March, 1865, and which, if true, shows that, at this time, the patentee had not perfected his improvement, but, on the contrary, had failed to make a marketable article. The witness was almost daily with him in communications on the subject, explaining how the purification, by the use of bone-black, could be effected, and how Cornelius V. Deforest had accomplished it and the process. William H. Chesebrough had stated that this witness was in the habit of coming into the business establishment of his brother, and had detailed several conversations between them. I think, also, that there is evidence tending to show that the patentee got his first ideas of this improvement from Cornelius V. Deforest. Upon the whole, I am satisfied that Cornelius V. Deforest preceded the patentee in this improvement, and must decree for the defendants."

The aspect of the case is, in my judgment, entirely changed by the new proofs taken. It is to be noted, that the patent is for purifying, by filtration through bone-black, either petroleum or coal oil. Coal oil is an artificial oil, made by distilling cannel coal. Petroleum is a natural oil, obtained from the earth, by boring wells. The patent is for so purifying the oil either before it is subjected to distillation, or after it is subjected to distillation. By subjecting it to distillation, there are produced, as the products of such distillation, benzole, illuminating oil and heavy oil. These may then be filtered, either separately or combined, through bone-black.

The proofs show, that the patentee commenced, in September or October, 1861, to experiment with bone-black in filtering oil. The oil he then used was coal oil. By the 9th of November, 1861, he was so far satisfied of the value of the method of refining such oil by filtering it through bone-black, that he procured to be made a series of three tin filters, which fitted successively inside of each other, bone-black being used as a filterer in the upper two filters. These filters he took, with some bone-black, to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. At that place, between the 9th and 16th of November, 1861, he used the filters for filtering through bone-black coal oil which had been subjected to distillation. He exhibited the apparatus, and the process of filtering, and the material subjected to filtering, and the filtering material, and the product, to several persons who testify to the facts as witnesses. The oil, after such filtration, was sweet in odor and of a light straw color, while, before such filtration, it was darker in color and of an unpleasant odor. But the persons to whom the patentee exhibited this mode of refining in Pittsburg, were desirous of producing a purely white oil, and, although the oil then produced by the patentee and shown to them was much improved in color, yet, as it was of a light straw color and not perfectly white, they thought the process would not answer their purpose.

Petroleum was first introduced into market at New York, where the patentee was engaged in business, and conducted his experiments, in 1861, although it did not come generally into use until 1862. After he had filtered coal oil through bone-black, and in the winter of 1861 or the early part of 1862, he filtered petroleum through bone-black. Prior to the spring of 1865 the petroleum he used was the Pennsylvania petroleum. Crude Pennsylvania petroleum is a light oil. In the early spring of 1865 the patentee commenced experimenting on the crude West Virginia oil, which is a heavy, greasy oil, with a view to obtaining an oil suitable for lubricating purposes, by some process other than subjecting the oil to distillation and then treating it with chemicals. He discovered, in those experiments, that, by filtering the crude West Virginia oil through bone-black, without first subjecting it to distillation, it was refined and purified, without any injury to its lubricating qualities, which qualities were seriously impaired by subjecting it to the high heat required in distillation. By May, 1865, he was so satisfied of the value of his process of filtering in respect to the West Virginia oil, that he applied for his patent, which was issued in the following August, a patent having been issued to him in England, for the same invention, July 31st, 1865. His principal experiments with bone-black were made in the fall of 1861 and in the spring of 1865, although he made several experiments with it in the interim, besides using, during such interim, a variety of chemical substances to produce the result of refining the oil.

In regard to the use of bone-black by Cornelius V. Deforest to filter oil, there is no satisfactory evidence that he used it before the very end of May or the beginning of June, 1862. Commencing then, he experimented on a small scale in filtering crude oil through bone-black. He also subjected to the process of distillation a considerable quantity of petroleum, and afterwards treated it with chemicals, and afterwards filtered it through bone-black. He prepared in this way from seventy-five to one hundred barrels of petroleum, and sold them in the market, as illuminating oil, in June, and perhaps July, 1862. He stopped altogether manufacturing petroleum in July or August, 1862. Some seventy-five barrels of the oil so refined were sold, through William T. Deforest, to the patentee, in June, 1862, but the oil carried with it no evidence as to how it was refined, and there is no pretence that the patentee was in any manner informed as to the process by which it had been refined. Cornelius V. Deforest obtained no patent for his invention, and made no attempt to obtain one.

I am satisfied, that, as a question of fact, the patentee invented the process in 1861, and Cornelius V. Deforest did not invent it until 1862. The patentee never abandoned his invention. In taking out his patent of June, 1865, for filtering oil through a combination of bone dust, pulverized oyster shells, and cotton cloth, he meant by bone dust bone-black, as is abundantly shown now by the evidence. He never used bone dust—that is, bones ground to powder without having been previously burned or charred—but he always used the ground product of charred bones; and it is proved that, in common speech, at the time, that article, when ground fine, was called bone dust, to distinguish it from the coarser bone-black.

I am also satisfied, on the present evidence, that there was no communication made by William T. Deforest, or any other person, to the patentee, as to the use of bone-black by Cornelius V. Deforest or William T. Deforest, or any other person, for refining coal oil or petroleum, or as to the capacity or value of the use of bone-black for such purpose, until after the patentee had obtained the patent now sued on; and, therefore, that the patentee did not get his first ideas of the improvement from Cornelius V. Deforest or any other person.

Certain well settled principles of law are applicable to the foregoing state of facts. In Adams v. Edwards [Case No. 53], Judge Woodbury said: "The law means, by invention, not maturity. It must be the idea struck out, the brilliant thought obtained, the great improvement in embryo. He must have that; but, if he has that, he may be years improving it—maturing it. It may require half a life. But, in that time, he must have devoted himself to it as much as circumstances would allow. But the period when he strikes out the plan which he afterwards patents, that is the time of the invention, that is the time when the discovery occurs." Again, in Colt v. Massachusetts Arms Co. [Id. 3,030], the same judge said: "The date of the invention is the date of the discovery of the principle involved, and the attempt to embody that in some machine—not the date of the perfecting of the instrument." In Cox v. Griggs [Id. 3,302], Judge Drummond says: "It is the right and privilege of a party, when an idea enters his mind in the essential form of invention—inasmuch as most inventions are the result of experiment, trial and effort, and few of them are worked out by mere will—to perfect, by experiment and reasonable diligence, his original idea, so as not to be deprived of the fruits of his skill and labor by a prior patent, if he is the first inventor." In White v. Allen [Id. 17,535], Judge Clifford says, that he who invents first has the prior right, if, as is prescribed in section 15 of the patent act [of 1836 (5 Stat. 123)], he is using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same, within the meaning of that provision. See, also, Sayles v. Hapgood [Id. 12,420].

In view of these principles, the patentee was the first inventor of this improvement. He never abandoned the prosecution of the idea which he developed in practice in the fall of 1861, before Cornelius V. Deforest did anything in the premises—that filtering coal oil through bone-black would refine it. He followed this up by operating in the same way on petroleum, but, as he testifies, exclusively, until the spring of 1865, on the Pennsylvania petroleum, and trying to refine that for illuminating purposes. The great value of the use of bone-black for refining oil did not disclose itself till the West Virginia petroleum came to market early in 1865. Between 1861 and 1865, he was trying other substances in addition to bone-black to refine oil, not certain that it was worth while to patent the invention, or that he had perfected it sufficiently to warrant a patent. That this was the case, and that he had not abandoned his invention, is shown by the fact that, when the heavy, greasy West Virginia petroleum came into notice as a good lubricating oil, but one needing to be refined, he recurred at once to his idea of refining petroleum by filtering it through bone-black, and applied the process to this West Virginia oil in its crude state, and with complete success. He then immediately applied for his patent, covering, as he had a right to do, from the use he had made of the process, the employment of it in refining, not only the products resulting from the application of the process of distillation to coal oil and petroleum, but also crude petroleum from the wells, which had not been subjected to any previous distillation, and this whether the result to be obtained was an oil for illumination or an oil for lubrication.

I do not think the various publications adduced by the defendants anticipate the invention on the point of novelty. It is true that they state that animal charcoal, prepared from the bones of animals, will render filthy water inodorous; that rancid oils are deprived of their smell and taste by repeated filtration through a stratum of such charcoal; that bone-black will render colorless water charged with almost any vegetable or animal solution; that bone-black is used as a decoloring agent in various chemical purposes; and that the yellowish tint of oil of olives may be removed by mixing with it animal charcoal, and the oleine be obtained colorless by subsequent filtration. But, notwithstanding all this, it was impossible to tell without experiment whether coal oil or petroleum could be filtered through bone-black at all, much less so as produce a useful effect. The patent is, therefore, valid, and there must be a decree for the plaintiffs for a perpetual injunction and an account of profits, with costs.

Case No. 10,043.

NATIONAL FIRE & MARINE INS. CO. v. LESTER.[1]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. July 16, 1875.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—INSURANCE COMPANIES—GENERAL AGENT—SUBAGENTS—SETTLEMENT OF BALANCES.

[The general agent for New England of an insurance company was to account for all sums due from his subagents, who received from the company powers of attorney to bind it by their acts in the insurance of property. The Boston agent also received a power of attorney for the service of process in Massachusetts, and on the removal of the general agent was instructed that he might remit balances then unpaid directly to the home office. He did so, informing the removed general agent, but some items remained unsettled. The company thereafter demanded payment from the Boston agent for such unsettled claims. Held, that the liability of the general agent was not removed by the acts of the company.]

This action was tried by the court upon a written stipulation of the parties whereby a trial by jury was waived. The facts in the case which are found to have been proved and to be true are as follows:

The National Fire and Marine Insurance Company is a corporation which was incorporated by the legislature of the state of Pennsylvania, and was located in the city of Philadelphia, and was authorized and empowered by its charter to insure buildings and other property against loss by fire. Said corporation is now insolvent, and in March, 1875, made an assignment of all its property and assets, for the benefit of its creditors. Prior to July, 1872, the said company verbally made a contract with the defendant George S. Lester of the city of New Haven in the district of Connecticut to be their general agent and manager for the six New England states. No time was specified when said agency was to terminate. Said Lester was to receive, as compensation for his services, office expenses, clerk hire, and travelling expenses of himself and his clerks or adjusters, a commission of twenty-five per cent. upon all premiums upon policies or renewals of policies in said company issued or contracted to be issued by himself or his subagents within said territory. Said contract was verbal, and its terms are ascertained mainly from the subsequent letters and acts of the parties thereto. Said Lester thereafter selected about forty subagents or employees residing in different towns in said states. These agents received also a commission or power of attorney from the plaintiffs in the form hereunto annexed and marked "A." The monies which were collected by said subagents, they remitted to said Lester, and rendered their accounts to him. They also rendered to him daily reports of the business which they did for said company, and he transmitted these reports to the company, after entering the same, or the substance thereof, upon his own books. He allowed these agents fifteen per cent. commission upon the amount of premiums which they remitted to him, and was primarily accountable and liable to the plaintiff for all monies which were received by his subagents or for which they had given credit. As to the monies which became due to the company for premiums on polices, or renewals of policies issued by said Lester or his subagents, said Lester was indebted to said company, which, as to the transmission or payment of said monies, had no privity with any of his subagents. Preparations for commencing business were made by said Lester, and some business was done for said company prior to July 1, 1872. His agency substantially commenced on that day, when said company issued to him six powers of attorney, one for each of the New England states, which powers were in form and phraseology like Exhibit A. Prior to July 1, 1872, Mr. Lester appointed C. W. Sproat of Boston, Massachusetts, his subagent for the plaintiff's business in that city. Mr. Sproat received from said company a power of attorney like Exhibit A, and also received the power of attorney and appointment, a copy of which is hereto annexed, and marked "B." Mr. Lester was removed from the general agency of said company on December 7, 1872. On the next day an officer of said company went to Boston, and informed Mr. Sproat of said removal, and gave him the letter, a copy of which is hereto annexed, marked "C." Mr. Sproat subsequently paid $12,000 to said company. No monies were received by said Lester from said Sproat, and no accounts were transmitted to said Lester by said Sproat, between Nov. 1, 1872, and Dec. 7, 1872. Said Sproat remitted no money, after Dec. 7, 1872, to said Lester upon account of business which was done for said company after November 1, 1872, but sent to said Lester the daily reports of the business which was done at the Boston agency for said company prior to and until Dec. 7, 1872. Said Sproat is still indebted in about $12,000 for premiums received or credited prior to Dec. 7, 1872. Said Lester received from said Sproat a letter dated Dec. 13, 1872, in which, among other things not pertaining to this case, he says: "I have orders to remit (from Mr. Kauffmann) all premiums due the National direct to their home office. Hoping the arrangement will be satisfactory to you, I remain," &c. On April 4, 1873, the plaintiffs wrote to said Sproat the letter, a copy of which is hereto annexed, marked "D." The plaintiffs also demanded, on April 29, 1873, of said Lester the balance which was unpaid by Sproat.

The bill of particulars and the account of the plaintiffs relate to three classes of items.

1. The first class relates to and includes premiums upon policies issued or contracted for at the agencies in the New England states, other than at Boston, during the defendant's agency.

2. The second class includes and relates to premiums upon policies issued or contracted for at the Boston agency prior to Nov. 1, 1872.

It was admitted by the defendant that if, upon examination of either of these two classes of items, it shall appear that there is any error, omission or mistake in the defendant's account as rendered to the plaintiffs, by reason of which the company have not received the full amount due them, the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment for such deficiency.

3. The third class of items relates to and includes premiums upon policies issued or contracted for at the Boston agency after October 30, 1872. The defendant claimed that he was not liable for any monies which may be due to him or to the company under the third class. The general questions of law and of fact pertaining to the third class were the only questions which were submitted to the court and it was agreed that the questions of fact which might arise under the general principles which should be decided by the court to be applicable to the case, should be heard by a committee or referee to be appointed by the court under the practice of the state courts of Connecticut.

Under the third class of items two questions arise: 1st. Was said Lester ever liable for the payment of those premiums upon policies issued or contracted for by Mr. Sproat, after Oct. 30, which had not been paid to said company? 2nd. If said Lester was ever thus liable, has he been relieved from such liability by the acts of the plaintiffs?

SHIPMAN, District Judge. It has already been found as a matter of fact that Mr. Lester had agreed to be directly and primarily liable to the plaintiffs for all the premiums upon policies issued or contracted for by each one of the agents whom he employed in the New England States. He was appointed the general agent and manager of the plaintiffs' business throughout the territory of New England, receiving a commission of twenty-five per cent. upon all the business which might be done. He was to introduce the company to the people of New England, and to obtain for it position and business. For this purpose he was to select his employees, or subagents, who resided in different towns, and who, from their skill and experience as insurance solicitors or agents, would be likely to make the enterprise remunerative to himself and to his principals. While, as between the public and the company, these persons were the agents of the company, provided with powers of attorney which indicated that the company was bound by their acts in regard to insurance upon property, yet so far as their compensation and the disposition of the premiums which they received, and their accounts were concerned, they were the employees of Mr. Lester. He undertook, not as guarantor or surety, but primarily, to pay the company the premiums which might be payable from all of his subagents, and the company engaged to pay to him twenty-five per cent. of these premiums, as his compensation for the expensive and onerous business which he conducted. These premiums, after deducting the commission, were his own debt to the company. This contract in regard to his liability was a contract entered into in terms between the parties, and its existence is not now, and never has been, seriously denied by Mr. Lester. He has relied, alike before and since the commencement of this litigation, upon the belief that the plaintiff had relieved him from the liability which he assumed when he entered upon the agency.

I cannot perceive from the evidence that this legal liability for the payment of premiums has ever been changed. It is true that the plaintiffs improperly informed Mr. Sproat that he was at liberty to pay his receipts to them; it is also true that Mr. Sproat should have declined to accede to this suggestion, and should have remitted to Mr. Lester. But the legal relations between the contracting parties were not necessarily altered by this intermeddling on the part of the company with Mr. Lester's appropriate business. If he had been injuriously affected by this interference, or if he had been placed thereby pecuniarily in a worse position than he would otherwise have occupied, or if the difficulty of enforcing collections from Mr. Sproat had increased by reason of the acts of the company, then there might have been good ground for the claim that he was no longer liable to pay money, which their conduct had prevented him from receiving. No attempt was made on the trial by the defendant to show that any less money had been paid by Mr. Sproat than would have been paid had the remittances been made directly to Mr. Lester, or that his vigilance and activity in compelling Mr. Sproat to make payment had been relaxed by the acts of the plaintiffs. Mr. Lester was the general agent of the insurance company from July 1, 1872, until December 7, 1872, and was immediately and directly liable to them for the premiums upon the policies of the company which his subagents had agreed to issue prior to the termination of his agency. The company simply informed one of his subagents that he might remit to them the monies which should be collected upon business which had been done by him prior to December 7, 1872. This direction did not change the legal relations between the parties, and was productive of no harm to Mr. Lester, who remains still liable to the plaintiffs for all moneys due from him which they have not received. Let the account be taken upon the principles which have here been indicated.

PLEADING IN EQUITY — PATENTS — BILL FOR INJUNCTION AND DISCOVERY—CORPORATION.

1. Bill not sworn to, praying injunction and discovery under oath, held sufficient on demurrer.

2. Statement of locality or place of business of a corporation not required.

Hearing on bill and demurrer. This was a bill filed by complainants for infringement of certain letters patent praying injunctions, both preliminary and final, and an account of profits and assessment of damages. Interrogatories were appended, to which an answer under oath was required. Defendants demurred because (1) the bill did not state where the corporation complainant was located, nor where it had any place of business; (2) the bill was not sworn to.

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Aug. 13, 1873.

BANKRUPTCY—SALE BY ORDER OF COURT—LIENS —RECORDED MORTGAGES.

When the interests of all parties seem to demand it, the court is authorized to direct the assignee to sell the real estate of a bankrupt corporation free from all liens, except the existing and recorded mortgages.

In the case of the National Iron Company of Danville, Pa., Col. A. K. McClure, on behalf of A. H. Dill, Esq., assignee, presented a petition for an order of sale of the property, consisting of two furnaces, rolling mills and other real estate at Danville. Hon. H. B. Swope, representing creditors unsecured, to the amount of fifty-eight thousand dollars, and the president of the company, moved the court to dismiss the petition that the assignee might go on and sell under his general powers, subject to the encumbrances, there being mortgages to the amount of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, not due for twenty years to come, and it being manifest that a purchaser would give more for the property, if he could avail himself of the long payment on the mortgages than if he had to pay all cash at once on a sale divested of liens. Hon. Samuel Linn, of Williamsport, who represented a mortgage of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, argued in support of the motion to dismiss. Mr. Grier, of Danville, representing unsecured and judgment creditors to the amount of some one hundred and forty thousand dollars, argued against the motion, and argued a sale divested of all liens, &c. John C. Bullett, Esq., of Philadelphia, representing a mortgage of five hundred thousand dollars, and other interests argued in support of the motion to dismiss. Mr. Stoner, of Pittsburgh, who appeared for certain bondholders, urged a sale subject to the existing liens. The argument was concluded by Col. McClure, for the assignee, who stated that the petition had been presented to relieve the assignee from responsibility, but that he was of opinion the property would bring the most money, if sold subject to the encumbrances.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. Although the petition in this case prays for an order of sale, it has been treated at the argument more as advisory of the assignee than an application for the sale of the property. The estate is largely encumbered with both judgments and mortgages, all of the former subsequent in date to the latter. It is moved to dismiss the petition that the property may be sold by the assignee under his general powers, subject to existing legal liens and encumbrances. It is further moved to order a sale discharged of all liens except those given for security of the purchase money. We are not inclined to favor either of these propositions in the shape in which they are presented. The property should be sold for the purpose of paying the debts of the corporation. The proper inquiry for both the assignee and the court is, on what terms will it bring most for the creditors? It is conceded that the lien for the purchase money should be protected. Why should not also the security given for the bond of the company in the hands of innocent holders? The judgment creditors dealt with them on the faith of the corporation, and with recorded mortgages staring them in the face. What equity can they claim over the mortgage creditors? As to the validity of the five hundred thousand dollar mortgage, which has been impugned at the argument, this is not the stage of the case at which to attack it, nor the proper mode of attack. It can be assailed, if it be vulnerable, at another time, and before the proper forum. As presented now it is a valid lien, and entitled to the protection of the court.

Entertaining these views, the motion to dismiss the petition is refused, as also to sell discharged of all liens except the purchase money, and upon application the court will order a sale by the assignee, discharged of all liens and encumbrances, excepting the existing and recorded mortgages.

[Now, August 13, 1873, on motion of H. B. Swope, solicitor of the assignee, it is ordered that the assignee sell at public or private sale, as he may deem most advantageous to the creditors, the property described in his petition, divested of all judgments and liens except the three recorded mortgages (being the mortgages for $250,000, $500,000, and $8,000, respectively); sale to be made on due notice, in accordance with the rules of the court.][2]

District Court, N. D. Illinois. April, 1874.

BANKRUPTCY — CORPORATIONS — RECEIVER APPOINTED BY STATE COURT—AMENDMENT TO BANKRUPT ACT.

1. The amendment of February 13, 1873, to the bankrupt act [17 Stat. 436], does not deprive the bankruptcy courts of jurisdiction over a corporation of which a receiver had been appointed by a state court.

2. This amendment does not oust the federal courts of jurisdiction, but simply saves the acts done by the state court and receiver prior to the filing of the petition.

In bankruptcy. This was an answer to the petition in bankruptcy, in the nature of a plea to the jurisdiction. The answer sets up that the petition was filed on the 14th of February, 1874, alleging non-payment of a death-loss for $1,000; whereas, on the 15th of December, 1873, a bill was filed in the circuit court of Cook county, by the attorney-general, for the purpose of winding up the affairs of the company, and distributing its assets ratably, pursuant to the act of the general assembly of March 11, 1869 (Sess. Laws, 209); that in that suit a decree was subsequently made appointing Kirk Hawes receiver, with authority to take possession of all the assets of the company and divide the same among its creditors and those entitled thereto; that the receiver had taken full possession of the assets and property of the company in pursuance of such decree, and was proceeding to execute the decree and mandate of said court; wherefore respondent submits that this court has no jurisdiction to adjudge respondent a bankrupt.

Clarkson & Van Schaack, for petitioner.
Kirk Hawes, receiver, pro se.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This answer brings before the court for construction the act of congress passed on the 3d of February, 1873, amendatory of the bankrupt act. It is claimed that the state court having acquired jurisdiction of the debtor and its assets, under the laws of this state providing for winding up its affairs and distributing its assets, the amendment in question excepts the debtor from the operations of the bankrupt law, and leaves the debtor in the hands of the state courts.

Prior to the passage of this amendment the federal courts had uniformly held that the pendency of proceedings in the state courts to administer the affairs of an insolvent corporation did not prevent the federal courts from assuming full jurisdiction on a proper case made in bankruptcy. In re Merchants' Ins. Co. [Case No. 9,441.]

The language of the act in question is peculiar. It is as follows: "Be it enacted," etc., whenever a corporation created by the laws of any state, whose business is carried on wholly within the state creating the same, and also any insurance company so created, whether all its business shall be carried on in such state or not, has had proceedings duly commenced against such corporation or company before the courts of such state for the purpose of winding up the affairs of such corporation or company and dividing its assets ratably among its creditors and lawfully among those entitled thereto, prior to proceedings having been commenced against such corporation or company under the bankrupt laws of the United States, any order made, or that shall be made, by such court, agreeably to the state law for the ratable distribution or payment of any dividend of assets to the creditors of such corporation or company, while such state court shall remain actually or constructively in possession or control of the assets of such corporation or company, shall be deemed valid, notwithstanding proceedings in bankruptcy may have been commenced and be pending against such corporation or company." Rev. St. U. S. 1874, § 5123.

[2] [From 30 Leg. Int. 272.]

It will be seen that it does not say that in case of proceedings in state courts the bankrupt court shall not take jurisdiction. It declares that all orders made by the state court agreeably to the state law for the ratable distribution or payment of dividends or assets, while such state court shall remain actually or constructively in possession of assets, shall be deemed valid. The phrase, "while the state court, by its receiver, is in possession of assets," seems to imply that the state court may be divested of possession at some time by the proceeding in bankruptcy, and the language of the act only says that the orders of the state court for the payment of dividends, while so in the possession, shall be valid. That is to say, the court in bankruptcy shall not set aside the orders and decrees of the state court, and begin the administration of the estate de novo, but shall take hold where the state court leaves off, or where it finds the debtor at the time of adjudication.

It seems very clear to me that if congress had intended to divest the bankrupt courts of jurisdiction over this class of debtors it would have said so clearly and unmistakably. The courts had so expounded the bankrupt law at the time this amendment was passed as to hold that jurisdiction was conferred over this class of debtors, notwithstanding the pendency of winding up proceedings, and if it had been the intention to leave these corporations in the hands of the state courts exclusively, congress would have said so.

Another consideration which has great weight with me on this point, is that fraudulent conveyances, gifts and preferences, which are prohibited by the bankrupt law, can only be reached and set aside by attack from the assignee in bankruptcy, after adjudication; and it seems to me congress did not intend to leave the creditors of such corporations remediless as to such transactions. The reasoning would seem to be this: The receiver of a state court can convert into money and divide the tangible assets and property of these corporations, perhaps as well as an assignee in bankruptcy, and what the state courts shall do in that direction, the bankrupt court shall not undo, but the creditors shall also have all the remedies of the bankrupt law for recovering fraudulent gifts and conveyances, and property or money paid by way of preference.

The objections on the ground of jurisdiction raised by the answer are, therefore, overruled. And it having been conceded on the argument that the acts of bankruptcy alleged in the petition are true and well-pleaded an adjudication will be entered according to the prayer of the petition.

As to the effect of possession of property by a receiver appointed by a state court, consult Bump, Bankr. (8th Ed.) 203, 305, and cases there cited.

LIABILITY OF SHARE-HOLDERS.

1. It is the duty of a share-holder in a company to examine his certificate, and ascertain his actual position and liability.

2. Circumstances which make a share-holder liable for previously contracted debts, and effect of misrepresentations by agent.

3. Though a subscription be obtained by fraud, the stockholder may waive it by assuming its advantages.

4. If a share-holder assumes the benefits and advantages of a partner, he cannot, when called upon to respond for the contracts of the corporation, deny his liability.

This was an action at law [by the National Park Bank] [2] to charge the defendants [Joshua R. Nichols, George S. Bowen, J. H. Bowen, C. T. Brown, A. Sturges, B. Sturges, G. Hubbard, G. Carpenter, A. T. Hall, F. C. Smith, A. B. Meeker, J. Y. Scammon, C. M. Smith, A. F. Faucet, G. P. Lee, S. J. Walker, J. V. Farwell, R. M. Hatfield, and H. Martin], nineteen in number, as partners in a joint stock company known as the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company. The cause of action was an indebtedness of this company, accruing at various times in the year 1865. The company was organized in March, 1865, under the laws of New York relating to joint stock companies. It was conceded that the legal effect of such organization was to make the associates co-partners. In July, 1865, an agent of the company made application to the defendants to take stock, stating that the company was organized for the transportation of material across the Western plains under a charter that would exempt the subscribers from personal liability, and that its capital stock was to be $3,000,000, one-half of which was to be paid in cash. The defendants engaged to take stock amounting in the aggregate to $250,000, and paid to the agents of the company fifty per cent. of the sum subscribed. In September, certificates of stock were forwarded to the agent of the company in Chicago, and delivered to the defendants. These certificates referred to the articles of association in general terms, and, it was claimed by the plaintiff, were sufficient to put the defendants upon inquiry as to the mode of organization of the company. On the other hand, it was claimed by the defendants that, supposing that the certificates were in pursuance of the contract of subscription, they did not, in fact, examine them.

It appeared that on November 3d, 1865, all the defendants except Nichols, whose letters were relied on as equivalent, executed a power of attorney, as associates, authorizing the organization of the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company into a corporation, under the laws of Kansas. It was, however, insisted by the defendants that at this time they supposed the company was organized as a corporation.

[It was in evidence, also, that][2] in the spring of 1866, the company failed, owing very large sums of money, and transferred its assets to the Holliday Overland Mail and Express company, and issued circulars to its stockholders announcing that they were legally liable to pay in full, as partners, the debts of the concern, calling an assessment of thirty-three and one-third per cent. on the subscriptions, and giving to the subscribers the alternative of taking stock in the Holliday Overland Mail and Express Company, or paying the assessment. All the defendants except Walker, Faucet, Scammon and Martin subscribed and paid for stock in the Holliday Overland Mail and Express Company, under this circular. All the defendants claimed that they had no knowledge, in fact, of the mode of organization, or that there existed a danger of personal liability, until the receipt of this circular [in the spring of 1866. An assessment was afterwards laid of forty per cent., which all the defendants][2] declined to pay.

It was claimed by the defendants: 1st. That they were induced to subscribe by fraudulent representations. 2d. That their subscription was, in any event, upon condition that the company should be organized under a charter, and with a fixed cash capital. 3d. That they could not be made liable by relation upon contracts made or debts accruing prior to their coming into the association.

On the part of the plaintiff it was insisted that if there was fraud in procuring the subscriptions, or if conditions were attached to them, yet,—1st. The fraud or condition had been waived. 2d. That the defendants, by their acts, were estopped from setting up such fraud or breach of conditions. 3d. That the defendants, in legal effect, became partners by relation to the date of the articles of association.

The facts relied upon as a waiver or estoppel were: 1st. The receipt and retention by the defendants of the certificates with their recitals. 2d. The execution of the power of attorney, with its recitals authorizing the organization of the company under the laws of Kansas. 3d. The receipt of the stock of the Holliday Overland Mail and Express Company. 4th. Various letters from several of the defendants, which, it was claimed, admitted their membership.

S. A. Goodwin and I. N. Arnold, for plaintiff.

Charles Hitchcock, Wirt Dexter, Corydon Beckwith, and Geo. C. Bates, for defendants.

DRUMMOND, District Judge (charging jury). This is an action by the National Park Bank of the city of New York, against the defendants, as partners in a joint stock company called the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company; and the question is, whether as such partners they are liable for the claim of the plaintiff, consisting of moneys advanced to that company during the year 1865. The advances commenced on the 21st of April, and ended in November. It depends upon the fact whether these defendants were members of that company in such a way as to make them liable as partners of the company for the whole or for any part of these advances.

You will remark, that the plaintiff was not a party to many of the transactions which have passed in review before us in the evidence; that has related chiefly to the connection of the defendants with this company, and the manner in which they were induced to give it their names and money. With that it does not appear that the plaintiff as a corporation had anything to do. That was an act, apparently, of some of the members of the company called the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company, and as between them and these defendants it must be admitted that there have been faults on both sides.

The leading fault with those in New York connected with the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company, and one which cannot be excused, was the concealment of the fact that they, on the 20th day of March, 1865, commenced the formation of this joint stock company, and completed it by signing and acknowledging the articles of association, on the 12th day of April, 1865, containing stipulations by which they were bound, and by which it appeared it was an association under the sanction of the laws of New York.

Now it was the duty of all these men, or of any of them, in seeking for associates, to let them know distinctly what had been done, and what was the compact to be entered into by any one who was to become a party to the association called the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company; and if they sought subscribers to their articles of association in

Chicago, it was their duty to make known to these subscribers what their articles of association were. The primary thing to be established was their connection with the association; it was, therefore, indispensable that all who were to be connected with it should know its nature and character. But the various gentlemen who approached these defendants upon the subject of becoming parties to this company, did not communicate to any one of them, so far as we know, that there were articles of association signed, and which became operative by their terms, and which recognized that they were entered into with relation to the laws of New York. These gentlemen, so far as the evidence shows, were Mr. Nichols, Mr. Sturges, and Mr. Butterfield. I believe that no intimation was given by any of them that articles of association had already been subscribed, constituting the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company. On the contrary, the propositions made were entirely inconsistent with this leading fact. If we believe the declaration of the defendants (and they have not been affected by any statements, so far as I know, introduced on the part of the plaintiff), the motives held out to them to induce them to become parties to such an association, were entirely different from those the actual state of facts would warrant.

Here was a company already organized, the parties to which were personally responsible for the debts of the concern, which may have been very large at the time. Of course, the action of the defendants under such a state of facts, if they had been communicated to them, might have been entirely different from what it was.

The first question, therefore, is, whether defendants became parties to this association, as partners, with a knowledge of the circumstances of its existence at the time, and with good faith exercised to them by those who induced them to become parties. If they did, of course they are bound by the position of affairs at the time. But this is not claimed, as I understand, by the plaintiff, for if the testimony which has been given by the defendants can be relied upon, the contract entered into and the money that was paid by these defendants was upon an entirely different supposition from that justified by the actual state of affairs. And, therefore, I think, if this testimony can be relied upon (of course you are to judge of the testimony), there can be no original liability on the part of these defendants on the ground of their knowledge of the condition of the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company at the time that they became parties; and it is certainly a significant fact that Mr. William Sturges, who was the main instrument and agent by which these defendants were induced to subscribe and pay their money, has not been called by the plaintiff to affect in any degree the testimony of the defendants.

If, however, they were not parties in consequence of not understanding the position of affairs, misrepresentations being made to them of facts, it does not follow that they may not have become parties by subsequent acts of their own, with knowledge of the facts. And the next question is, have they so become parties? In order to determine this, you are to take the facts that are applicable to all the defendants, not those applicable to one or more of the defendants less than the whole; because if you find the defendants liable at all, you have to find them all liable, and you have only to apply the facts which have been proved as to all. If there have been facts proved as to some, not as to others, you have only to take those which apply to all, and determine whether they convince you whether the defendants have become parties to the articles of association.

The defendants were applied to, I think most of them, and subscribed and advanced their money in the summer of 1865. As I have already said, if we believe their testimony, they did not know at that time that the company had been organized under the laws of New York, and that there were large liabilities against the company which they might be called upon to assume. Have they done so since by any acts of their own? Have they become liable as partners?

In August, or in the early part of the fall of 1865, certificates of stock were made out and forwarded by the officers of the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company to the subscribers and stockholders here, and they were received, as I understand, by the defendants. These certificates of stock (most of them) have been introduced, and it is admitted that they are all similar in character. Now, the certificate of stock which each of the defendants received, bore on its face that the holder was entitled to a certain number of shares of stock in the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company, and also that the holder was subject in the future to the payment of such assessments as might be made in case of loss or other necessity, and to all the obligations and liabilities of the company, and also entitled to all the privileges of a member as fully as if he had signed the articles of association.

We have spoken of the faults of the gentlemen of New York; we must now refer to what must be considered a fault of the defendants.

Many of the defendants say that they received the certificates of stock without examining them. They certainly knew what they were. They purported to represent their interests in a company or organization, for which they had subscribed or paid their money. It is presumable, I think, that if the company had earned profits they would have claimed the profits under this evidence of their interest in the company.

It certainly was, therefore, their duty to examine the document which they had received, indicating the interest they had in the company and the money they had paid. It may be true that men do not always examine certificates of stock, and yet there never has been known, I believe, an instance of a man who became a member, in this way, of a company, who, if the company realized profits, did not claim them by virtue of such certificate. Then, that being so, there would be a natural inference that, claiming the advantages and profits, he must bear the burdens and losses. But the only effect of this, in this case, is as to the conclusion to be drawn against the defendants by the circumstance that the certificates contained certain language that they were shareholders in the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company, and that they were subject to the payment of assessments for losses or from other necessity, and entitled to all the privileges of the association as if they had actually signed the articles.

Now, if these had been given to the defendants, without any previous representation having been made, the effect of this might have been stronger than it was under the conceded state of facts. Because it is quite possible that those who did look at the certificates of stock might have regarded them under the influence of the representations which had been made by the agents who applied to them for subscriptions and for their money, and therefore they might not draw the same inference or conclusions from them that they would, had they been uninfluenced by such representations; and all that I can say to you, if you believe this testimony, is simply this: that if he examined these certificates of stock, it would seem to have been the duty of every stockholder to make some inquiry as to his relation with this Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company; to know, in other words, where he stood, what his responsibilities were as a member of the company, and if, in point of fact, he found himself in a different position from what he supposed he was from the representations that were made, to repudiate that connection, to disavow it at once, and have nothing more to do with it. That nothing of this kind was done was, I think, a fault on the part of some of the defendants, and, I must say, one not very creditable to their character as business men. But I cannot say that you can disregard, in connection with this aspect of the case, the bearing and effect of the representations that were made as inducements to them to become parties to the company. Because it is indispensable, I think, in order to make out a liability against these defendants, that they should be possessed of full knowledge of the circumstances of their connection with the company which was then organized; and if they accepted this stock with this full knowledge of the circumstances, then they were bound, as prudent and discreet business men, to follow up the intimation given in this certificate of stock, and to ascertain the position in which they stood, and are to be visited with all the consequences of partners in this association, but not otherwise.

Again, if they did become members of this association with the full knowledge of the circumstances connected with the position of the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company, what is the measure, under the facts of the case, of their liability to this plaintiff? That is another and distinct question.

It is conceded that no one of these defendants was a member of the association at the time the contract was made between the company—the Dispatch Company—and the plaintiff for a loan of the money, on the 21st of April, 1865, by which it was agreed that the plaintiff should advance to the company $100,000, in sums as they might be wanted; and, in fact, on that day $10,000 were advanced, and on the 1st of May $55,000, and the 2d of May $20,000, and on the 3d of June $5,000—$90,000, advanced before, as I understand, any of these defendants became connected with this company.

Now, to say nothing of the $20,000 advanced in November, are these defendants responsible for the money which was advanced before they became connected with the company? Of course the only ground upon which they are liable is, that they associated themselves with the company, either by express declaration or by acts which admit of no reasonable doubt that they assumed, as members of the company, all the liabilities of the company at that time. It is only in that way, by relation back of the position of the company at the time they connected themselves with it, if they ever did, that they could become liable for the $90,000 advanced to the company before that connection. Of course, if with full knowledge of the facts they did become parties, either expressly or by implication, to this joint stock company, from the beginning, they are as responsible for the debts of the company as those who were original parties to articles of association, but not otherwise. They must have become parties with full knowledge of the facts, understanding their position and relations to the company.

As to the $20,000 advanced on the 15th of November, that would depend, of course, first, upon the fact whether they were partners, and secondly, whether, as such partners, they reaped the benefit of the advance that was made, and enjoyed its fruit. If they did, then I think they are estopped from asserting they are not liable. If they, at the time the $20,000 were advanced, were partners of the association, and had as such the full benefit of the advance, they would be liable equally with their associates for the advance. You will see, therefore, there are three questions which the court submits to you.

In the first place, whether these defendants became subscribers, and advanced their money to the company with full knowledge of the circumstances of its existence at the time, and with the exercise of good faith, and true statements and representations made to them by the agents of the company when they subscribed their names and advanced their money. If you shall believe they did not become partners by that act, by anything that was done, then the next question the court submits to you is whether with full knowledge of the facts they have become partners since. It may be true that bad faith was used towards them at the time their subscriptions and money were obtained. It may be true that fraud was practiced; but it was competent for them, with knowledge of all the facts, to waive the fraud, and if they did —if they assumed the advantages of members and partners of the association—they cannot, when they are called upon to respond for the contracts of the association, be heard to deny their liability.

Thirdly, if they were partners and members of the association, what is the measure of their liability, and whether for the whole or only a part of the advance made by the plaintiff? It is to be observed that this is not an action by the Overland Dispatch Company against these defendants for assessments made against them, as shareholders, by the company. It is not a bill in equity calling upon the defendants to respond to the creditors of the company for advances which have been made; but it is an action at law against these defendants, as members of the association—partners—liable as partners for the debts of the company, and their liability must be measured by the rules which are applicable to a partnership concern, under which one member of a firm is liable for the debts of the firm; and in this aspect of the case, of course, the whole question turns upon the fact whether they were partners and members of the company.

[2] [A great deal of evidence has been introduced which really has but an insignificant bearing upon the case, viz. as to the conduct of these New York men in keeping their books, selling out to Ben. Holliday, to Brown, etc. All these are material upon this aspect of the case, viz. whether good faith was used by those persons who solicited the defendants to become parties, in the act of making them parties. But inasmuch as that is not seriously relied upon by the plaintiff in the argument which has been made, of course that testimony does not become material.

[I consider that the important testimony bearing upon the case is the subsequent acts of these defendants, by which it is claimed that they were connected with this company. If you shall find, gentlemen, under the facts and law, as it has been now stated to you by the court, that the defendants are liable for the advances that were made, it is for you to say whether, under the law and under the facts, they are liable for the whole; and if they are, then the plaintiff would be entitled to the whole amount advanced, with interest from the time that this money should have been returned under the contract, or, in the absence of any proof upon the subject, from the time the suit was commenced. If you shall find that they were only liable for a part, then you will allow such part, together with interest in the same way. If you find under the facts and under the law that the defendants are not liable at all, then, of course, you must simply say that you find for the defendants.

[I repeat what I said before, that you must apply the evidence only which bears upon all and against all the defendants. You cannot select out that evidence which applies only to some of the defendants, less than all; but you must take the evidence which applies to all, and by this I only mean that the proof must convince you of the liability of all. Because, if you find for the plaintiff, you must find against all or none of the defendants. This is the conceded rule of law in this form of action. I understand that there has been a recent statute of the legislature of this state which has changed this principle of the common law, but it has not yet been adopted by this court, and, of course, is not at present a law of this court.] [2]

NATIONAL PARK BANK v. NICHOLS et al.

[4 Biss. 315.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. March, 1869.

CORPORATION — SUIT OUT OF STATE WHERE CREATED—CITIZENSHIP OF CORPORATIONS.

1. A corporation which has a legal existence in any one state, can sue in the federal courts of any other state. It is not necessary that it be a corporation created by the laws of that state.

2. It is a presumption—which the courts will not allow to be rebutted—that if a corporation has a legal existence in a state, its corporators are citizens of the same state.

Assumpsit to charge the defendants [Joshua R. Nichols and others], as partners in the Butterfield Overland Despatch Company, on indebtedness of the company. The facts are fully stated in the report of the trial before Drummond, J. [Case No. 10,047]. This was a motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction.

Charles Hitchcock, Wirt Dexter, Corydon Beckwith, and Geo. C. Bates, for the motion.

S. A. Goodwin and I. N. Arnold, opposed.

DAVIS, Circuit Justice. It is objected that the Park Bank cannot sue in this court, because it is not a corporation created by the laws of the state of New York. So far as the right to sue is concerned, it can make no difference that the bank is authorized by congress instead of the legislature of New York. If it is created by law, has its lawful place of business in New York and nowhere else, and its corporators are citizens of the state, it can bring a suit in any circuit court of the United States outside of the state of New York. This was substantially decided by Chief Justice Marshall in Bank of U. S. v. Deveaux, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 61, but he held that it was a matter of proof whether all the corporators of the Bank of the United States lived in the state of Pennsylvania. This doctrine has been modified, and it is now held by the supreme court to be a presumption which cannot be rebutted, that if the corporation has a legal existence in the state, its individual members are citizens of the state. Ohio & Mississippi R. Co. v. Wheeler, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 286.

There is no question but the Park Bank was authorized by congress to transact business in New York and nowhere else, and it therefore follows, as a legal presumption, that the shareholders of the bank are citizens of New York. If so, this suit can be maintained. Motion denied.

NOTE. A corporation created by the laws of the state in which a suit is brought in the federal court, must be considered a citizen of that state, whatever its status or citizenship is elsewhere by the laws of other states. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Whiton, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 270.

A corporation created by and transacting business in a state, is to be deemed an inhabitant of that state, capable of being treated as a citizen, for all purposes of suing and being sued in a circuit court. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Letson, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 497; Marshall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 16 How. [57 U. S.] 314; Greeley v. Smith [Case No. 5,747]; New York & E. R. R. v. Shepard [Id. 10,198].

A municipal corporation created by a state within its own limits may be sued in a circuit court, by a citizen of another state. Cowles v. Mercer Co., 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 118. And the state legislature cannot prevent the jurisdiction of the federal courts from attaching. Id.

A national bank organized and located in any state, may sue a citizen of another state in the circuit court thereof. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Baack [Case No. 9,052].

NATIONAL PARK BANK v. PEOPLE'S BANK et al.

[25 Int. Rev. Rec. 169; 8 Reporter, 8; 14 Phila. 405; 36 Leg. Int. 204; 26 Pittsb. Leg. J. 178.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. May 13, 1879.

BANKRUPTCY — COMPOSITION WITH CREDITORS — PAYMENT OF CREDITORS REFUSING TO JOIN.

[A payment, by the debtor, of a creditor who refused to join in the composition agreement, out of funds reserved, and not included in the schedule, does not operate to the injury of creditors signing the composition, so as to give them any right to recover from the creditor paid a proportion of the money thus received.]

The facts of this case, very briefly, are as follows: Landenberger & Co., being in financial difficulties, entered into a composition deed with certain creditors, among whom was the Park Bank, by which the Philadelphia Trust & Safe Deposit Co., of Philadelphia, was designated as trustee. The People's Bank of Philadelphia, another creditor, refused to sign the deed, and commenced suit against Landenberger & Co. upon certain of their notes held by it. Landenberger & Co. instructed Stokes, Caldwell & Co. to take up these notes and charge them with the amount. Stokes, Caldwell & Co., who were indebted to Landenberger & Co., did take up the notes, amounting to $25,000, charged Landenberger & Co. with that sum, and, having handed over the notes to them, took their receipt for $25,000.

W. H. Sharpless and R. C. McMurtrie, for Park Bank.

Hood Gilpin and F. C. Brewster, for People's Bank and William H. Kemble.

William Ernst, for Stokes, Caldwell & Co.

[The People's Bank was not paid out of any of the schedule assets. How then was the trust injured? It was benefited, because the payment left no assets for the rest. The assignment of November 10, 1873, was a new mortgage. Corn Exchange National Bank v. Philadelphia Trust, etc., Co. [Case No. 3,244]. What standing has the Park Bank to ask the relief sought? If the assignment was binding, all the creditors should be parties. Henry v. Patterson, 57 Pa. St. 346. See, also, Lower v. Clement, 25 Pa. St. 63; Lane's Appeal, 82 Pa. St. 289; 2 Beav. 385; 3 Ves. Jr. 456. But even if the bank or Kemble is responsible, Stokes, Caldwell & Co. are not; they surely bought the notes; Kemble concealed his real character when called upon to speak out.] [2]

BUTLER, District Judge. The ground on which the plaintiffs seek to charge the People's Bank is, that by reason of the contract with Landenberger & Co., it sustains such relations to them that the money received on the notes must be treated as received on joint account; assuming that the bank is a party to the contract. The claim against Stokes, Caldwell & Co. rests on a similar basis. Taking the alternative that the bank is not a party to the contract, and not, therefore, responsible; that the notes were purchased by Stokes, Caldwell & Co. (as Mr. Kemble and others testify), and asserting that they, as such creditors of Landenberger & Co., entered into the contract, through the agency of Mr. Kemble; and that they were subsequently paid, the plaintiffs claim that the money so paid must be treated as received on joint account. The ground on which Mr. Kemble is sought to be charged is different. The plaintiffs state it in the original bill as follows: "That William Kemble may be compelled, if it shall appear that the People's Bank is not bound by his acts, to make good the contract, he, by the composition agreement professed to make, as respects their claim." Possibly a similar charge of deceit in procuring the plaintiff's signature to the agreement is intended to be preferred by the plaintiffs against Stokes, Caldwell & Co. If such is intended the purpose is not plainly stated. In the view we take of the case, however, this, as will hereafter be seen, is unimportant.

A careful examination of the evidence has satisfied us that the bank had no interest in the notes when the contract was executed. All the testimony tends to this conclusion. Whether the transaction between it and Stokes, Caldwell & Co. be treated as a sale or a payment, its interest in the debt was gone. It is equally clear that the bank and those representing it had steadfastly resisted all efforts to compromise, and that the payment to them of the $25,000, was unaccompanied by any promise whatever. Being in a position to compel payment, it felt no interest in the proposed scheme of composition. Mr. Kemble was not authorized to enter into the contract for it, either by anything occurring at the time the claim was satisfied or afterwards. Nor in our judgment did he undertake to do so. When induced by Mr. Caldwell to sign the paper, he not only omitted his title as president of the bank, but affixed the term "attorney" to his name, as if to guard against an inference that he was representing that institution. The examination has also satisfied us that Stokes, Caldwell & Co. were not purchasers of the notes; that they paid them simply as agents for Landenberger & Co. About this we believe there can be no room for doubt. All they did was in pursuance of Landenberger & Co.'s instructions, and with their funds; and the notes, when obtained, were immediately handed over as paid. It would not be remarkable, however, that the officers of the bank should have regarded the transaction as a purchase by Stokes, Caldwell & Co. It was spoken of as such by Mr. Landenberger in his communications with the latter gentleman; and very probably in the same way by them in their communications with the bank. Mr. Dixey says, Landenberger, on being informed that Kemble declined to have any connection with the proposed settlement, requested Mr. Caldwell and himself to do the best they could with Kemble; to "buy the paper," if necessary, and charge the amount to him. Nevertheless, the transaction was a payment of the notes. Its substance, we have no doubt, is accurately stated in the following extract from the testimony of Mr. Stokes: "About the first of January, 1874, the paper matured, and Landenberger came to the store. I think he stated there that the paper would be immediately put in execution against the firm of Landenberger & Co. He requested my partner, Mr. Dixey, to take the composition deed to the bank, and see if he could get Kemble to sign it. Dixey returned in a very few minutes and said they declined to sign it. Landenberger then requested Stokes, Caldwell & Co. to take up the notes, and charge the amount to Landenberger & Co. Mr. Caldwell, I think, on that day,—perhaps not until the next or the day after; I know I was present at the time,—paid the paper, took Mr. Landenberger's receipt for $25,000, and surrendered the paper to him." This statement is substantially repeated by both Mr. Dixey and Mr. Caldwell. This view of the facts disposes of the claim made against the People's Bank, and Stokes, Caldwell & Co.; founded on the allegation that they are parties to the contract.

The claim against Mr. Kemble, as we have seen, rests upon different ground. Charging him with fraud in representing the notes as outstanding, while in fact they were paid or to be paid, from the reserved property of the debtor, the plaintiffs, in effect, say they were thus induced to bind themselves to the contract, believing the holder of these notes was taking his chances with them; and they ask, therefore, that this defendant be required to "make good the contract"; in other words, required to compensate them for the injury thus sustained. If a similar charge of deceit was intended to be preferred by the bill against any other of the defendants, what follows will apply to it with as much force as that stated against Mr. Kemble. Passing over all debatable ground, and coming directly to the question of injury, we find no evidence to support a decree in the plaintiffs' favor. It does not appear that their situation would have been improved by declining to unite in the contract; nor that they would have so declined if they had known the notes to be paid. Such payment did not, we think, render the agreement any less desirable; or in any respect injure the plaintiffs. It was not made from funds set apart for them, or over which they had any control. The argument that it withdrew from the debtor property with which he might have successfully conducted business, and earned the means of paying them, is wholly speculative. The money was quite as likely to have been lost, if left in his hands, as the large balance which he retained actually was. The vice of the argument consists in the assumption that the plaintiffs had any direct interest in this property. They certainly had not. It belonged to the debtor alone, who might use it as he pleased—waste it in extravagance, or pay it to any one whom he owed. If he had been defrauded of it, the plaintiffs would have had as good claim against such wrong doer as they have against Mr. Kemble. They had no greater or other interest in the property than every creditor has in the property of his debtor. The application of it, therefore, to the payment of the notes, and the concealment or misrepresentation of this fact, cannot be said to have injured the plaintiffs. On the contrary, as the sequel has shown, this use of it, in relieving the debtor and the assigned estate from a large claim, is more likely to have benefited them than the retention of it in his hands.

And now, May 13, 1879, the above cause having been heard upon the pleadings and proofs, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court, that the complainant take nothing by its bill filed in the above case, and that the said bill of complaint be dismissed as to all the defendants in the above cause, without prejudice. And it is further ordered that the complainants pay the costs of this suit.

NATIONAL SCHOOL FURNITURE CO. v. PATON et al.

[16 Blatchf. 563; 4 Ban. & A. 432.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. August 4, 1879.

PATENTS—INFRINGEMENT—PROCEEDINGS FOR CONTEMPT—MOTION TO DISSOLVE INJUNCTION—WHAT CONSIDERED.

Where a defendant, in opposing a motion for a preliminary injunction to restrain the infringement of a patent, which was granted, and in afterwards opposing a motion to punish him for a contempt in violating such injunction by making and selling a certain form of school desk, neglected to present to the court alleged facts as to his own manufacture and sale of such form of school desk at a date early enough to anticipate the patent, it was held that he ought not to be afterwards allowed to present such alleged facts, on a motion to dissolve such injunction.

[This was a suit by the National School Furniture Company against Robert Paton and others for infringement of patent on desks.]

Frederic H. Betts, for plaintiff.

Francis Forbes, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. An injunction has been granted in this case, on patent No. 115,232. On a motion to punish the defendants for a contempt for violating that injunction, a certain form of desk, called by the defendants, a "normal desk," with a book-rest attachment, was held to be an infringement of said patent, and the defendants were held guilty of a contempt in violating said injunction, by making and selling said "normal desk" with said attachment. They now come in and move to dissolve the injunction for the future, as respects said "normal desk" with such attachment, on affidavits which they claim show that they actually made such form of "normal desk" with such attachment, as early as the year 1866, certainly as early as the year 1869, and before the invention covered by the plaintiff's patent was made, such patent having been issued in 1871. This form of desk, so alleged to have been made by the defendants in 1866 is claimed to have been made by them for Mr. Van Norman. Yet, neither in opposition to the motion for an injunction, nor in opposition to the motion to punish them for contempt in making such form of desk, did they, or either of them, or their foreman, or Mr. Van Norman, or any one else, testify that such form of desk had been made by them as early as the time now alleged. So far from this, in opposing the motion for an injunction, the defendants testified to, and produced a form of desk which they had made for Mr. Van Norman prior to the plaintiff's invention, but which was not the form now in question—the "normal desk" with the book-rest attachment. They had their books, their recollection, that of their foreman, capacity to find Mr. Van Norman, and the testimony as to the desk would have been as useful to them then as now, and they must have so understood it. Still more, in opposition to the contempt motion, the defendant Robert Paton testified, that he had made the "normal desk," with the book-rest attachment, "for several years," but assigned no specific date earlier than July, 1875. Under such circumstances, the defendants ought not to be heard to allege matter claimed to have been then existing, which they thus neglected to present to the court, and have the benefit of it now to dissolve an injunction properly granted. Woolworth v. Rogers [Case No. 18,018]. If this rule ought to be relaxed in any case, this is not one. The excuses offered by the defendants for not sooner bringing in the evidence now offered, are not, on all the facts before the court, satisfactory, and, under all the circumstances, the court cannot but regard it as doubtful whether in fact the defendants made any "normal desk" with the book-rest attachment, at an earlier date than that of the plaintiff's invention. The motion is, therefore, denied.

[In another case, at a later date, this patent was held void. See Peard v. Johnson, 23 Fed. 507.]

NATIONAL SPRING CO. v. UNION CAR SPRING MANUF'G CO.

[12 Blatchf. 80; 1 Ban. & A. 240; 6 O. G. 224; Merw. Pat. Inv. 451.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 20, 1874.

PATENTS—REISSUE—RUBBER AND STEEL SPRING—INTERPOLATION—INVENTION REDUCED TO PRACTICE PRIOR TO FOREIGN PATENT.

1. The reissued letters patent granted to the National Spring Company, as assignees of Erastus T. Bussell, December 13th, 1870, for an "improvement in combined India rubber and steel springs," the original patent having been granted to Bussell, as inventor, November 29th, 1853, and extended for seven years from November 29th, 1867, are valid.

2. The original specification, drawings, and model exhibit fully what the reissue claims, and what the original fails to claim.

3. The original specification contains, on its face, sufficient evidence that there was inadvertence and mistake of some kind in preparing it.

4. The reissued patent is not open to the objection that it is not for the same invention as that embodied in the original patent, or that the specifications of the two patents are repugnant to each other.

5. The original specification states the invention of Bussell to be a combination of vulcanized India rubber with spiral steel, so arranged, with the spiral steel on the outside of the rubber, that each sustains the other, when they are both under longitudinal pressure, the result being independent of any fluting of the rubber. Therefore, although the claim of the original patent was, "The fluting a column of vulcanized India rubber longitudinally, and then so surrounding it with the helical spring, mine being an improvement upon Ray's spring," it was proper to claim, in the reissue, "The combination of a column of rubber, or its equivalent, whether solid or hollow, with a spiral metallic spring, when the said spring is arranged external to and surrounding the rubber, substantially as and for the purposes specified."

6. The original specification shows that Bussell supposed that a patent had been granted to Ray for surrounding a column of vulcanized India rubber with a helical spring; whereas, in fact, Ray had no such patent, and no specification of any patent to Ray disclosed such an arrangement, and all that any patent to Ray disclosed was a column of rubber with a spiral metal spring in its centre, such spring surrounding a bolt extending the length of the column of rubber, and there being detached rings of metal surrounding on the outside the column of rubber.

7. When the specification of the reissue speaks of a "solid" column of rubber, it means one which is not hollow, as distinguished from Ray's arrangement, in which the column of rubber is hollow.

8. The claim of the reissue, in speaking of a column of rubber, "whether solid or hollow," means only, a column of rubber, whether hollow or not hollow.

9. The reissued patent is infringed if the column of rubber is combined with a spiral metallic spring arranged external to and surrounding the rubber, whether there be or be not a longitudinal hole in the centre of the rubber, or whether there be or be not flutes in the rubber, or other provision for the vent of the rubber, under pressure.

10. The language of the specification of the reissue, that "any other material that is, for the purpose of a spring, the equivalent of India rubber, such as compressed animal and vegetable fibre, gutta percha, &c., may be employed in place of the rubber," when the original specification made no mention of such equivalents, is not to be regarded as an interpolation, or as determining that any particular thing is an equivalent, but is to be interpreted only as meaning, that, if the articles named be, for the purposes of a spring, the equivalents of India rubber, they may, when in a condition to be such equivalents, be employed in the place of the rubber.

11. The complete application for the reissue was filed March 12th, 1870, the fee or duty having been previously paid. The petition and specification were not signed by Bussell, although he was living, but were signed by the assignees, to whom the reissue was granted, and the oath was not made by Bussell. These proceedings were in conformity with the statutes in force when the 33d section of Act July 8, 1870 (16 Stat. 202), was enacted, requiring, in case of a reissue to an assignee, that the application be made, and the specification be sworn to by the inventor, if he be living. The 111th section of the latter act, while repealing the prior acts, provides that such repeal shall not take away any right existing under any of the prior laws, and that all applications for patents pending at the time of the passage of the act of 1870, "in cases where the duty has been paid, shall be proceeded with and acted on in the same manner as though filed after the passage thereof:" Held, that the application was to be proceeded with, and acted on, on the merits, in like manner as though filed after the passage of the act of 1870, with the requirements complied with which the 33d section of that act prescribes.

12. Observations on an attempt to impeach, by the testimony of the inventor, the validity of the reissue to his assignees.

13. An invention reduced to practice in the United States, prior to the granting of an English patent, sustained as against such patent.

In equity.

George Gifford and Josiah P. Fitch, for plaintiffs.

Charles H. Woodruff, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is brought on reissued letters patent [No. 4,202], granted to the plaintiffs, December 13th, 1870, as assignees of Erastus T. Bussell, for an "improvement in combined India rubber and steel springs," the original patent [No. 10,280] having been granted to Bussell, as inventor, November 29th, 1853, and extended for seven years from November 29th, 1867. The specification of the reissued patent is signed by the plaintiffs, who are a corporation, by their president, and is not signed by Bussell. It states that Bussell "invented a new and improved combination of vulcanized rubber and steel, forming thereby a spring useful for railroad cars, carriages, buggies, &c., of which the following is a specification:

"Figure 1 represents a column of vulcanized rubber, showing, also, metal caps on each end, such as may be used for bearings.

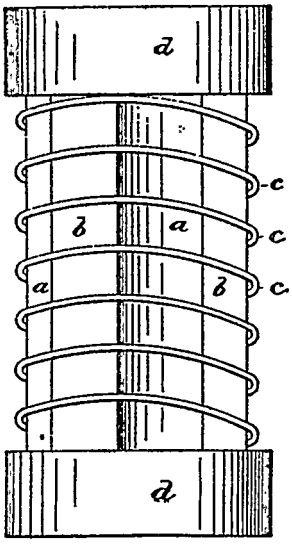

Figure 2 is a cross section of the same. Figure 3 is a view of the column of rubber surrounded by a spiral metal spring, showing, also, the before mentioned caps." The drawing designates the three figures on it as follows: "Fig. 1. Fluted column of vulcanized rubber, with the metallic caps on each end. Fig. 2. Transverse section of rubber column. Fig. 3. Compound vulcanized rubber and steel spring, with the metallic caps on each end." The drawing bears the signature, "Inventor, E. T. Bussell, by J. P. Fitch, his Att'y." The drawings show the column of rubber as being fluted by four flutes or grooves running lengthwise of it and equidistant from each other, the flutes being marked a, and the unfluted spaces being marked b. The specification says: "This invention consists in surrounding a column of India rubber, or its equivalent, by a spiral metallic spring, so arranged that each sustains the other, whereby a more perfect and serviceable spring for the purposes specified is produced than by any combination of rubber and metal hitherto known. A column of vulcanized rubber, A, is surrounded with a spiral metallic spring, c, c, c, Fig. 3, the two springs being of equal length, so as to have the same bearings at the ends, and the relative diameters of the two being such that the steel or metal spring will fit snugly on to the rubber column. The column of rubber may be fluted, as shown in the drawing, by several concavities running longitudinally, a, a, a. This construction is regarded as a desirable one, as it allows the rubber, when pressure is applied to the spring, to expand laterally into the said concavities, thus preventing it, to a degree, from being pressed outward between the coils of the metal spring, where it is liable to be chafed and worn. Any other material that is, for the purpose of a spring, the equivalent of India rubber, such as compressed animal and vegetable fibre, gutta percha, &c., may be employed in place of the rubber. The combination of spiral metallic springs with rubber, or its equivalents, for the purpose here described, is not new. Ray, in the year 1848, obtained a patent for such a combination. But he described and claimed a spiral metallic spring placed within a hollow rubber column or tube, and then supported the rubber externally by detached metal rings. The arrangement and combination of Bussell, here claimed, is distinct and different from, and is thought superior to, Ray's, both for the reason that it permits the use of a solid column of rubber, or its equivalent, which Ray's does not, and because the spring, when placed exterior to the rubber or its equivalent, performs alone the combined offices of both the spiral spring and the detached rings in Ray's, thus rendering Bussell's arrangement much the more simple and cheaper of the two. Another objection to arranging the spiral within the rubber tube is, that either the rubber tube has to be made objectionably large in diameter, or the spiral objectionably small. This difficulty is obviated in Bussell's combination, as is evident. It is not intended here to claim, broadly, the combination of rubber, or its equivalent, with a spiral spring, for the purposes indicated; nor the combination of a spiral spring with a hollow cylinder of rubber, when the spring is placed within the cylinder. Neither is claimed the supporting of a column of rubber, or its equivalent, when used as a spring, by detached metallic rings arranged externally to the rubber." The claim is, "The combination of a column of rubber, or its equivalent, whether solid or hollow, with a spiral metallic spring, when the said spring is arranged external to and surrounding the rubber, substantially as and for the purposes specified."

The drawing annexed to the original patent is, in its three figures, and in the designation of them, and in the lettering of them, the same as the drawing of the reissue. The specification of the original states that Bussell has invented "a new and improved combination of vulcanized India rubber and steel, forming thereby a useful spring for railroad cars, carriages, buggies, &c., &c. * * * Fig. 1 is the fluted column of vulcanized rubber, with the metallic caps on each end; Fig. 2 is a transverse section of this column of rubber; and Fig. 3 is a view of the compound spring with the metallic caps on each end. My invention consists in a combination of vulcanized India rubber with spiral steel, so arranged that each sustains the other, and the good qualities of both are combined, so as to make a most perfect spring for elasticity and durability, which is applicable to railroad cars, carriages, buggies, &c. * * * Owing to many contingencies, that require springs to be of various degrees of stiffness, the diameter of my compound springs must necessarily vary much, but their length is to be graduated by the amount of motion desirable in a spring. For springs for railroad cars I take a fluted column of vulcanized India rubber, A, Fig. 1, about eight inches in diameter, and about eight inches long, these conditions depending upon the desirable strength of the spring and the amount of motion required. The column of rubber is fluted by four semi-concavities running longitudinally at equal distances from each other, a, a, a, a, the concavities leaving each intermediate point, b, b, b, b, equal to the span of each concavity. The depth of each one of these concavities is about one-fifth the diameter of the column of India rubber. For carriage springs the diameter of the rubber is about two inches. I then surround this fluted column of vulcanized rubber with a spiral steel spring, c, c, c, Fig. 3, the diameter of the wire constituting the spiral spring being about one-twentieth that of the column of rubber. I make the spiral spring to touch the points of rubber, b, b, b, b, thus serving as a self-adjusting base upon which the rubber can act centrifugally, each point, b, b, b, b, being a base to each rubber arch, a, a, a, a. By this arrangement and combination of vulcanized India rubber and steel, several important desideratums are filled, that have not hitherto been attained by any other spring, namely, it makes, 1st, a sprightly spring, one that responds quickly to any impression made upon it, steel being much more sprightly, in its movements, than vulcanized India rubber, and this element being incorporated into the compound spring; 2d, a durable spring, capable of sustaining burdens to an indefinite length of time, the rubber, in this shape, maintaining and resuming its normal shape better than in any other, the integrity of the elastic arches, a, a, a, Fig. 2, being most perfect; 3d, a strong spring, one that cannot be crushed by any reasonable weight, the steel effectually guarding the rubber against any such calamity, for, as the external surface of the rubber is shortened under compression, the resisting surface of the spiral steel, in its self-adjusting integrity, gathers and concentrates its coils around the compressed rubber, thus setting up a herculean barrier, circumscribing the bounds of the rubber within it; and, 4th, a sprightly, durable, and strong spring, that will admit of any desirable amount of motion, each concavity, a, a, a, a, serving as a vacuum for its elasticity and contracting volume to find vent in. Vulcanized India rubber being a durable substance, I thus have, in this arrangement, a combination of elements, in such a way as to make a spring possessing all the good qualities that can reasonably be expected. The rubber sustains the steel from any violence to its molecules from severe flexion, whilst the steel affords a self-adjusting base upon which the rubber can act at proper intervals, it yielding its sprightliness to the rubber at the same time, and the points, b, b, b, b, fig. 2, being in constant contact with the steel, serves to equalize the power of the rubber, whilst the concavities, a, a, a, a, give vent to and equalize its elasticity. * * * I do not claim the surrounding of columns of vulcanized India rubber with detached bands of metal at the ends, or any point between the ends, for springs, nor do I claim originality in the combination of metallic springs with vulcanized India rubber, as these are the subjects of patents heretofore granted to Fowler M. Ray, but, as well known forms of such springs and combinations, are liable to the following objections: 1st, an incapacity for great motion, this depending upon their outer surface being regular and surrounded by bands of metal whose diameters are unvarying, together with the incorporating into the centre of said rubber springs, helical or spiral springs of metal, whose diameters increase with their compression, causing them thus to encroach upon the rubber centrifugally; 2d, the liability of such springs losing their elasticity and becoming worthless from the unequal exercise of their different parts, the stretching to their utmost extent the fibres at the circumference, and this at the expense of their vitality, while the centrifugal action of the helical spring within serves further to embarrass it in its movements, so that a large mass of the rubber is rendered partially inert by being confined between the almost lifeless circumferal rubber and the centrifugally acting helical spring—the rubber thus circumstanced may properly be compared to an elastic arch with the burden or force applied to its concave side, without any base upon which to rest that of its own external fibres; and, 3d, their great liability of being crushed by an overload, for the want of a continuous metallic support externally; and, inasmuch as fluting a column of vulcanized India rubber longitudinally on its external surface and surrounding it by a spiral steel spring, substantially as above described, produces a spring susceptible of much greater motion and much greater freedom in all its movements than any of the foregoing forms, the fluted concavities giving vent to the compressed rubber, and the diameter of the spiral spring increasing with its compression, thus yielding to and allowing the greater freedom to the expanding rubber within, the circumference of the rubber mass, being a series of elastic arches, brings the radial points of expansion almost equally near the surface in every direction, and the self-adjusting base afforded to each arch in the spiral spring that surrounds them, gives to them the capacity of multiplying strength in use, and of promptly resuming their normal shape—the rubber thus circumstanced, in contrast with other forms of rubber car springs, is a series of elastic arches, with the force applied to their convex sides, whilst their bases rest upon an accommodating metallic surface, which enables them to endure, without loss of vitality, almost indefinitely; and finally, inasmuch as the continuous coil of steel on the outside of the rubber approximates a solid broad band, when an overload is put upon the springs, thus guarding the rubber effectually against any mishap that other rubber springs are liable to, therefore, what I claim as my invention is not the surrounding a column of vulcanized India rubber with a helical spring, as that is the subject of a patent granted to F. M. Ray, but what I claim and desire to secure by letters patent is, The fluting a column of vulcanized India rubber longitudinally, and then so surrounding it with the helical spring, mine being an improvement upon Ray's spring."

This florid and ambitious original specification contains, on its face, sufficient evidence that there was inadvertence and mistake of some kind in preparing it. In one part of it, it speaks of patents having been theretofore granted to Ray, containing, as subjects, the surrounding of columns of vulcanized India rubber with detached bands of metal at the ends, or any point between the ends, for springs, and the combination of metallic springs with vulcanized India rubber, and says that the resulting springs have bands of metal of unvarying diameters surrounding the outer surfaces of the India rubber and helical or spiral springs of metal in the centre of the India rubber. In another part of it, it speaks of a patent granted to Ray as having for its subject the surrounding a column of vulcanized India rubber with a helical spring. Now, it is shown, that, in point of fact, Ray had no patent for surrounding a column of vulcanized India rubber with a helical metal spring, and that no specification of any patent to Ray disclosed such an arrangement. The only combination of a spiral metal spring with a column of rubber, disclosed in any patent to Ray, was one where the spiral metal spring was in the centre of the column of rubber, and surrounded a bolt extending the length of the column of rubber; and in connection with such arrangement there were detached rings of metal surrounding on the outside the column of rubber. The original specification states the invention of Bussell to be, a combination of vulcanized India rubber with spiral steel, so arranged that each sustains the other. This results from placing the spiral steel on the outside of the rubber. In such position each does sustain the other, when they are both under longitudinal pressure. When the steel is on the inside, they do not sustain each other. Again, in detailing the advantages of the arrangement of a spiral steel spring outside of and surrounding a column of rubber, the original specification sets forth, as an advantage, the strength of the spring, in that the steel prevents the rubber from being crushed, because, as the external surface of the rubber is shortened by compression, the coils of steel form a resisting surface against the rubber. This is independent of any fluting of the rubber, and is in contrast with the effect when the spiral steel is on the inside of the rubber. In another place, the original specification, speaking of the existing springs, with spiral springs of metal in the centre of the rubber, and detached bands of metal surrounding the rubber, in contrast with the arrangement of Bussell, points out, as an objection to the former, their liability to be crushed by an overload, for the want of a continuous metallic support externally. This, too, is a result independent of any fluting of the rubber. Then, as to fluting the column of rubber, the original specification points out that the rubber, when compressed, will find vent in the concavities.

The objection is taken to the reissued patent, that it is not for the same invention as that embodied in the original patent, and is, therefore, void; and, to maintain this, it is contended, that, on their faces, the two specifications are repugnant to each other. The argument is based on the view, that the original specification throughout speaks of the invention of Bussell as being one in which a fluted column of rubber is a constituent, and in which no column of rubber that is not fluted is spoken of as being a constituent, and that the claim is one to fluting a column of vulcanized India rubber longitudinally, and then surrounding it with a helical spring. But, the inference naturally to be drawn from the language of the original specification, that Bussell does not claim, as his invention, "the surrounding a column of vulcanized India rubber with a helical spring, as that is the subject of a patent granted to F. M. Ray," is, that, as such original specification exhibits the surrounding a column of vulcanized India rubber with a helical spring, and points out the advantages of such an arrangement, Bussell would, but for his idea, now shown to have been a mistaken one, in regard to Ray's patent, have claimed, in such original specification, the surrounding a column of vulcanized India rubber with a helical spring. If so, why should it not be claimed in a reissue? It would seem that there could not be found any more proper occasion for the office of a reissue. The original specification, drawings, and model exhibit fully what the reissue claims, and what the original fails to claim.

Much criticism is made on the specification of the reissue, because it makes prominent the column of rubber, merely as a column, without calling it, as the original specification always does, a fluted column, and because it only says that it may be fluted, as a desirable construction, to allow the expansion of the rubber, under pressure, into the concavities. But, when it was to claim, as it lawfully might, the column of rubber, as a column, with the spiral metallic spring arranged external to and surrounding the column, it was entirely proper that it should describe it as a column. It is none the less a column because it is fluted. The fluting introduces provision for vent. The advantages of the columnar structure bound tightly in the grasp of the surrounding helix of metal exist independently of provision for vent. As has been shown, both of these features exist in the arrangement shown in the drawings and specification of the original patent. Bussell, in his original patent, limited his claim to an arrangement combining both features. He might have claimed therein the features of the column and the outside spiral metallic spring, leaving out the feature of the fluting, although his structure contained the fluting. This has now been done by the reissue.

It is also objected, that the specification of the reissue contains an interpolation, in saying that Bussell's arrangement is different from Ray's, because it "permits the use of a solid column of rubber," which Ray's does not. It is undoubtedly true, that Bussell's arrangement does permit the use of a column of rubber which has not a longitudinal hole in its centre, and that Ray's arrangement requires that there shall be a longitudinal hole in the centre of the column of rubber. In the connection in which the specification of the reissue thus speaks of a "solid" column of rubber, it speaks of one which is not hollow, Ray's being hollow. Bussell's drawing shows a column of rubber which has no longitudinal hole in its centre, and, therefore, shows a column which is solid, in the sense intended. To state this self-evident circumstance in the specification of the reissue is no interpolation, when the drawings of the original patent show clearly that the remark is a true one. So, too, the words of the claim, "whether solid or hollow"—"the combination of a column of rubber, or its equivalent, whether solid or hollow, with a spiral metallic spring, &c."—must be read with reference to the previous observation in the specification, that Ray's arrangement does not permit the use of a column of rubber which is not hollow, while Bussell's arrangement does. So read, the claim is one to the combination of a column of rubber, whether hollow or not hollow, with a spiral metallic spring. This claim means nothing different from what it would mean if the words "whether solid or hollow" were entirely omitted from it. The column of rubber, and the advantages resulting from combining it with a spiral metallic spring arranged external to and surrounding the rubber, exist as fully whether there is a longitudinal hole in the centre of the rubber or not. The advantages of a provision for vent, resulting from fluting the column, or from having a longitudinal hole in its centre, or longitudinal holes elsewhere in it, or spiral recesses in it, are a different thing. The reissued patent claims nothing in respect of such latter advantages, and does not claim any provision for vent. Its claim has reference solely to the embrace between the surrounding spiral metallic spring and the interior column of rubber. It may be that such embrace is more or less effective when it is spirally continuous, and not broken by recesses or flutes, and when there is no provision for vent. That is a question of degree of effectiveness of embrace. If, in the use of the embrace, it is made spirally continuous, it is none the less used. If, in the use of the embrace, provision is made for vent, in any of the ways above referred to, the embrace is none the less used. This view disposes of the criticisms, that Bussell did not invent a column of rubber having a spirally continuous embrace between the rubber and the external metallic spring, and did not invent a column of rubber having a longitudinal hole in its centre, or any provision for vent except by means of flutes. He invented what the reissued patent claims, as above explained, and if, in using that, an additional feature is added by the user, still the invention claimed is used.

It is also objected, that the specification of the reissue, in its body and in the claim, not only speaks of rubber "or its equivalent," but contains, in its body, this language, not found in the original specification: "Any other material that is, for the purpose of a spring, the equivalent of India rubber, such as compressed animal and vegetable fibre, gutta percha, &c., may be employed in place of the rubber." It is conceded, that the patent would cover any equivalent for the rubber, even if the words "or its equivalent" were not found in the claim. But, it is objected, that the specification of the reissue undertakes to say what are equivalents, when the original specification made no mention of such equivalents, and that, therefore, the things mentioned are interpolations into the specification of the reissue. Certainly, any other material that is, for the purpose of a spring, the equivalent of India rubber, may be employed in place of the rubber. The employment of such other material would be within the patent, if nothing were said on the subject. Saying so does no harm. The point of the objection is, that it is asserted that the specification of the reissue points out "compressed animal or vegetable fibre, gutta percha, &c.," as being, necessarily, for the purpose of a spring, the equivalent of India rubber; that no such statement is found in the original specification; and that Bussell, when he took out his original patent, did not contemplate the use of compressed animal or vegetable fibre. But, I think the body of the specification of the reissue can fairly be interpreted only as meaning, that if "compressed animal or vegetable fibre, gutta percha, &c.," be, for the purpose of a spring, the equivalent of India rubber, it may, when in a condition to be such equivalent, be employed in place of the rubber. Under the claim, what is an equivalent is left to be determined in each case, as it arises; and the specification cannot properly be construed as determining that any particular thing is an equivalent.

The petition, oath and specification, on the application for the granting of the reissued patent sued on in this case, were filed in the patent office on the 7th of March, 1870. The fee or duty of $30 was paid on that day. A third drawing, completing the application, was filed on the 12th of March, 1870. The petition was not signed by Bussell, but was signed, "National Spring Company, by Rich'd Vose, President." It set forth, that the National Spring Company, who are the plaintiffs in this suit, and the grantees of the reissue, were the owners, by assignment, of the entire interest in the original patent, and stated that the company thereby appointed Josiah P. Fitch its attorney to prosecute the application. The specification was signed, "National Spring Company, by Richard Vose, President." It was not signed by Bussell. The oath to the specification was made on the 5th of March, 1870, by Richard Vose, and no oath thereto was made by Bussell. The 33d section of the act of July 8, 1870 (16 Stat. 202), provides, that "patents may be granted and issued or reissued to the assignee of the inventor or discoverer, the assignment thereof being first entered of record in the patent office, but, in such case, the application for the patent shall be made and the specification sworn to by the inventor or discoverer, and, also, if he be living, in case of an application for reissue." This provision requires that, when an application for a reissue is made, the inventor, if living, shall make the application and swear to the specification, and then the patent may be reissued to the assignee of the inventor, if the assignment be first entered of record in the patent office. The 111th section of the same act provides for the repeal of prior patent acts, including the acts of July 4, 1836, and March 3, 1837 (5 Stat. 117, 191), and then proceeds: "Provided, however, that the repeal hereby enacted shall not affect, impair or take away any right existing under any of said laws; * * * and provided, also, that all applications for patents pending at the time of the passage of this act, in cases where the duty has been paid, shall be proceeded with and acted on in the same manner as though filed after the passage thereof." The 13th section of the act of July 4th, 1836, provided for the reissue of a patent to the assignee of the original patent, but it did not require that the application should be made by the inventor, or that the new specification should be sworn to by him; and, although the 6th section of the act of March 3, 1837, providing for the issuing of a patent to the assignee of the inventor, enacted that the application therefor should be made by the inventor, and the specification should be sworn to by the inventor, yet it was never held by the courts, or by the patent office, that this provision of the act of 1837 applied to the case of the reissue of a patent. Hence, the provision of the 33d section of the act of 1870 was entirely new, so far as it required that, in case of a reissue to an assignee, the application therefor should be made by, and the new specification be sworn to by, the inventor, if living.

In the present case, the new specification was sworn to, and the application for the reissue was made, and the duty was paid, before the 8th of July, 1870. Such application was an application for a patent, within the meaning of the 111th section of the act of 1870, and was pending when that act passed, and the duty had been paid. It was, therefore, to be proceeded with and acted on in the same manner as though filed after the passage thereof. This means, that it was to be regarded as having been filed before the passage of the act, when filed in a complete form, before such passage, so as to be a pending application, with the duty paid, and then it was to be proceeded with and acted on, on the merits, in like manner as though filed after such passage, with the requirements complied with which the 33d section of the act of 1870 prescribes. To say, that the second proviso to the 111th section of the act of 1870 means, as is contended for by the defendants, that a pending application, made in conformity with the previous repealed laws, is to be filed anew and made to conform to the provisions of the new law found in section 33 thereof, and in the other sections relating to applications for patents, is to give no meaning whatever to such proviso, for, without such proviso, section 33 and such other sections would require that the application should be made in conformity with the new law, as a prerequisite to the granting of the patent.

The enactment of the proviso was reasonable and proper, and the spirit and purpose which prompted it were still further carried out by the enactment of the act of March 3, 1871 (16 Stat. 583), providing that that part of section 33 of the act of July 8th, 1870, which requires that, in the case of an application by an assignee for the reissue of a patent, the application shall be made, and the specification be sworn to, by the inventor, if living, shall not be construed to apply to patents issued and assigned prior to July 8th, 1870. The view was, that an assignee who had, before July 8th, 1870, under the laws as they were before that date, purchased a patent, should have his rights in respect to obtaining a reissue measured by the former laws, and not affected by the new law. If he should become assignee on or after July 8th, 1870, he would do so with the knowledge that, in respect to a reissue, he must obtain the inventor, if living, to make and swear to the application for the reissue, and he could take steps, in becoming assignee, to secure that end, or, failing that, could refrain from becoming assignee. On any other view, an assignee who became such before July 8th, 1870, might be deprived practically of a substantial right.

In this connection it is proper to refer to the attempt made by the defendants to impeach the validity of the reissue, on the testimony of Bussell. Much criticism might be made on the degree of reliance which ought to be attached to the evidence of Bussell, in view of the attitude in which he presents himself on the record in this case; and a court would hesitate to allow him, by his evidence, to render valueless a patent which he had assigned and given credit to, with the invention shown by it, and the right of reissue appurtenant to it. But, an examination of his testimony, in view of the observations before made on the original and reissued specifications, will show that he states nothing which can affect the validity of the reissue. The point of his testimony, is that he had not, when he applied for his original patent, designed to use an externally plain cylinder, or a hollow cylinder, in combination with a surrounding metallic spiral spring, and he assumes that the claim of the reissue covers and claims the feature of having the external surface of the column of rubber a plain cylindrical surface, and also covers and claims the feature of having a longitudinal hole or holes in the column of rubber. But, as has been shown, the claim of the reissue does not claim either of these features. It may be an infringement of the claim to use, in combination with an external spiral metallic spring, a column of rubber having either of these features; but that is a totally different question. The infringement would arise from the use of a column of rubber, in the combination, and not from the use of either of the special features referred to. If a patent should be granted claiming the special feature of a longitudinal hole or holes in a column of rubber surrounded by an external spiral metallic spring, such patent would find no anticipation, in respect to such special feature, in the original patent to Bussell or in its reissue.

In regard to the alleged prior invention by Ray, the evidence shows, that whatever he did, in the way of making a structure containing the combination of the plaintiffs' patent, was wholly experimental and fruitless, and was abandoned. The evidence fails to establish that any car spring containing such combination was used before Bussell made his invention, or before the date of his original patent. I refer to the alleged use on the Naugatuck Railroad, the Housatonic Railroad, and the New Jersey Railroad. The temporary arrangement made by Kirtland on cars on the Housatonic Railroad was not the use of an organized combination or structure like the plaintiffs' spring, but was an incomplete and abandoned invention. In regard to the English patent to Asbury, the testimony shows that Bussell invented and reduced to practice the combination covered by the claim of the plaintiffs' patent prior to the granting of the patent to Asbury.

As it is admitted that the defendants have made and sold springs composed of a column of rubber surrounded by a spiral metallic spring, there must be a decree for the plaintiffs.

BANKS AND BANKING—TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

A national bank located in New Jersey for the convenience of persons in Philadelphia, kept a clerk in that city who received deposits. Held, that the bank did not become located in Philadelphia so as to be liable to taxation.

Bill to procure an injunction to restrain the bank assessors of the state of Pennsylvania from returning an assessment upon the capital stock to the auditor-general of the state and to have the assessment declared illegal. It appeared from the bill set forth that the plaintiff was a national bank engaged in business in New Jersey; that for the convenience of persons in Philadelphia desiring to deposit money therein, it kept a clerk in an office in that city, to receive deposits and to deliver them to the bank in Camden, N. J., at the close of each day; that the defendants, who were the bank assessors of the state of Pennsylvania, had served on the plaintiff a notice of an assessment of a tax upon the entire capital stock of the bank; that said assessment, which was made under acts of the assembly of Pennsylvania of April 12, 1867, April 2, 1868, and December 22, 1869, was contrary to law and void; that the plaintiff had taken an appeal from the assessment in due time, but the assessors refused to vacate or alter the assessment. [An injunction was prayed restraining the assessors from returning the assessment to the auditor general of Pennsylvania, and a decree that the assessment was illegal and contrary to law. The answer admitted the facts of the bill so far as within the defendant's knowledge, but claimed that the tax was properly assessed.] [2]

John Goforth (with him, C. S. Carson), for plaintiff.

S. G. Thompson, for defendants. The simple question is, is this a bank located in Pennsylvania? A bank may be either of discount or deposit. If it performs the function of either in a place, it becomes located there. If it does business in two places, it must be taxed in both.

CADWALADER, District Judge. It is a criminal offense to carry on banking business in the way suggested in Pennsylvania without a license obtained in a particular manner, but that does not make the offender a bank located in Pennsylvania. This is not an assessment upon a stockholder as such, but upon the bank.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge (CADWALADER, District Judge, concurring). We have decided, after full discussion, that even when a corporation carries on business in a state, it does not thereby become an inhabitant of it, and we cannot go farther and say that by similar conduct a corporation becomes located therein.

FEDERAL JURISDICTION—CITIZENSHIP—REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

1. Federal jurisdiction is not lost in a suit between citizens of different states, merely because there may be found in it, as necessary parties, one or more defendants of the same state with the plaintiffs or some of the plaintiffs.

2. The 2d section of the act of 1875 [18 Stat. 470], which provides for the removal of all suits in which there is a controversy between citizens of different states, only authorizes "either party" to file the petition, and the uniform construction of the word "party," in this connection, has been that it includes all the plaintiffs, or all the defendants. Congress might have vested, but in fact it did not vest, the power in one of either to do it. The same section only grants the right of removal to one or more of several plaintiffs or defendants, where there is a suit in which there is a controversy that is wholly between citizens of different states, and which can be fully determined as between them.

[This was an action at law by the National Union Bank at Dover against George E. Dodge, Titus B. Meigs, and others. Heard on motion to remand the cause to the state court.]

H. C. Pitney, of counsel with plaintiff.

Ashbel Green and William C. Gulliver, of counsel with defendant Dodge.

NIXON, District Judge. This is a motion to remand a cause which has been removed into this court from the supreme court of the state of New Jersey.

The original action was an ordinary suit at law, brought by a corporation organized under the national banking act, and located in this state, against five defendants, as partners, and makers of divers promissory notes and endorsers of others. The declaration sets out a joint liability on the part of the defendants, only two of whom were served with process,—George E. Dodge, a citizen and resident of the state of New York, and Titus B. Meigs, a citizen and resident of the state of New Jersey. It nowhere appears in the record where the remaining defendants reside. The action is founded upon the 2d section of the act of the legislature of New Jersey entitled "An act concerning obligations" (Rev. St. N. J. 741), which provides that "all persons jointly indebted to any other person or persons, upon any joint contract, obligation, matter or thing for which a remedy might be had at law against such debtors, in case all were taken by process issued out of any court of this state, shall be answerable to their creditors separately for such debts; that is to say, such creditor or creditors may issue process against such joint debtors, and in case any of such joint debtors shall be taken and brought into court by virtue of such process, such of them so taken and brought into court shall answer to the plaintiff or plaintiffs; and if judgment shall pass for the plaintiff or plaintiffs, he, she, or they shall have his, her or their judgment and execution against such of them so brought into court, and against the other joint debtor or debtors named in the process, in the same manner as if they had been all taken and brought into court by virtue of the said process."

[2] [From 24 Int. Rev. Rec. 212.]

The two defendants served with process, Dodge and Meigs, have caused separate appearances to be entered, and have severally pleaded non assumpsit. Immediately after filing his plea, and before the occurrence of any term of court at which the cause could have been tried, the non-resident defendant, George E. Dodge, filed his petition for the removal of the cause into this court, and also a bond with satisfactory security.

The counsel for the plaintiff corporation insists that none of the acts of congress, authorizing removal of suits into the federal courts, embrace the present case.

The counsel for the petitioning defendant, Dodge, claims that it falls within the second clause of the second section of the act of March 3, 1875, which reads as follows: "And when in any suit mentioned in this section there shall be a controversy, which is wholly between citizens of different states, and which can be fully determined as between them, then either one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants actually interested in such controversy may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district."

The single question presented for consideration is, whether there is in the pending suit a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states, and which can be fully determined as between them? If there be, the cause is removable by any one or more of the parties—plaintiffs or defendants—actually interested in such controversy. And if there be not, the right or power of removal does not exist under the law. In order to answer the question intelligently reference must be had to the provisions of the constitution of the United States, and to the legislation of congress thereunder. Much of the confusion and apparent conflict of authority in the cases have doubtless arisen from not more carefully observing the several acts of congress, and their gradual extension to the verge of the constitutional limit of the right of the removal of causes. The first legislation on the subject was the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], and therein the right of removal was limited to suits commenced "by a citizen of the state in which the suit was brought against the citizen of another state," and the removal could be made only by the defendant, who must file his petition for removal at the time of entering his appearance to the action. It has never been thought that by this act the congress exhausted, or attempted to exhaust, the judicial power created by the constitution, but it went only so far as, in the judgment of the legislature, the condition of the country seemed to demand. The next act was that of July 27, 1866 [14 Stat. 306], which made another draft on the constitutional grant of power, and was an enlargement of the jurisdiction of the federal courts. It provided for the removal of a cause in part when one or more of the defendants were citizens of the same state with the plaintiff; and in which a controversy was involved between citizens of different states which could be determined without the presence of the other defendants, respecting whom the suit was to remain in the state court. In order to its removal, it required the suit in the state court to be brought by a plaintiff, who was a citizen of the state in which the suit was brought, and against a citizen of the same state and a citizen of another state as defendants. These conditions existing, and the application for removal being made by the non-resident defendant before the trial or final hearing of the cause in the state court, the cause was removable, so far as related to himself, provided that it was a suit brought for the purpose of restraining or enjoining him, or was a suit in which there could be a final determination of the controversy so far as concerned himself, without the presence of other defendants as parties in the cause. This act was followed by the amendment of March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 558], which was a further extension of the right of removal,—affording it as well to plaintiffs as to defendants, but confining it to such persons as are non-residents of the state in which the suit is brought, and making prejudice and local influence, as well as the citizenship of the parties, a ground of removal. It was held, however, in the Cases of the Sewing Machine Companies, 18 Wall. [85 N. C.] 587, that under the last-named act "all the plaintiffs or all the defendants must join in the petition for removal, and all the parties petitioning must be non-residents." The last act on the subject was passed March 3, 1875, and was apparently passed to exhaust the legislative power, and to confer upon the circuit courts of the United States all the jurisdiction that was warranted by the constitution. To this end the language of the constitution was adopted, both in defining the jurisdiction in the first section, and the right of removal in the second section. Its title is "An act to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States and to regulate the removal of causes from the state courts." The second section treats of removals, designating the causes that are removable and the parties by whom the removal can be made. For the purposes of this case it is only necessary to say that the first clause of the section authorizes either party to remove any suit of a civil nature at law or in equity, brought in any state court, where the matter in dispute exceeds five hundred dollars, * * * in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states; and the second clause confers the same right, when in any suit there shall be a controversy, which is wholly between citizens of different states, and which can be fully determined as between them,—on either one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants actually interested in such controversy.

There is no question but that in the present case the suit is a controversy between citizens of different states. It is that, and something more. It includes within it also a controversy in part between citizens of the same state. Whether this last-mentioned fact is sufficient to defeat the jurisdiction of the federal courts, and take away the right of removal, is a question which the supreme court has never decided; and, being open, I am permitted to follow the suggestions of my own judgment. I am of the opinion that the federal jurisdiction is not lost in a suit between citizens of different states because there may be found in it, as necessary parties, one or more defendants of the same state with the plaintiffs or some of the plaintiffs. Their presence makes it none the less a controversy between citizens of different states. To this effect are the opinions of Judge Dillon, in his Removal of Causes (page 30), of Justice Bradley in Girardey v. Moon [Case No. 5,462], and of Justice Strong in Taylor v. Rockefeller [Id. 13,802]. Judge Dillon says: "Looking at the purpose in the grant of the federal judicial power in the constitution, and the benefits which are felt to flow from the exercise of this jurisdiction, and the embarrassments which would result from a close and rigid construction of the constitution in this regard, we think the supreme court would be justified in holding that a case does not cease to be one between citizens of different states because one or more of the defendants are citizens of the same state with the plaintiffs or some of the plaintiffs, provided the other defendants are citizens of another or other states." Mr. Justice Bradley states his opinion to be "that, whenever the controversy in a suit is between citizens of different states, it is within the judicial power of the United States, though there are other persons in the case citizens of the same state with a person or persons on the opposite side." Mr. Justice Strong plainly indicates his view when he says: "Whether since the act of 1875 the right of removal extends to all cases in which some of the necessary or indispensable defendants are citizens of the same state with the plaintiffs, or some of them, is no doubt a very important question, not yet decided. It does not, if the rule of construction applied to the judiciary act of 1789 and the acts of 1866 and 1867 is applicable to the later act. But the later act for the first time adopts the language of the constitution, and seems to have been intended to confer on the circuit courts all the jurisdiction which, under the constitution, it was in the power of the congress to bestow. Certainly the case mentioned would be a controversy between citizens of different states, and the reasons which induced the framers of the constitution to give jurisdiction to the federal courts of controversies between citizens of different states apply as strongly to it as they do to a case in which all the defendants are citizens of a state other than that in which the plaintiffs are citizens; and, if that instrument is to be construed so as to carry out this intent, it would seem the question is to be answered in the affirmative."

Entertaining this view, if all the defendants had joined in the petition for removal, I should have had no difficulty in holding that the case was removed and properly removable under the first clause of the 2d section of the act of 1875, which provides for the removal of all suits in which there is a controversy between citizens of different states. But it only authorizes "either party" to file the petition, and the uniform construction of the word "party," in this connection, has been that it includes all the plaintiffs, or all the defendants. Congress might have vested, but in fact it did not vest, the power in one of either to do it. But the 2d clause of the same section grants the right of removal to one or more of several plaintiffs or defendants, where there "is a suit in which there is a controversy that is wholly between citizens of different states and which can be fully determined as between them." Is this such a case? The suit is upon an alleged joint contract or liability. For the purposes of this motion, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, we must look to the pleadings for the character of the action. If the contract were several as well as joint, there might be as many controversies within the suit as there are persons charged with liability. A casual glance at the statute of the state regulating the methods of procedure in actions of this sort gives some support to the idea that the joint contractors are to be treated as if severally liable. But upon a closer inspection of the section, and looking at the interpretation which the legislature itself has given within the body of the statute, I incline to the opinion that "separately," as used therein, does not mean "severally," and that the whole intention of the provision is to require the defendants actually served with process in a suit on a joint contract to plead or answer without the other joint contractors against whom process has been issued but not served.

The resident plaintiff corporation insists that, on the proceedings under this statute, all the joint defendants are necessary parties to the action, and that no judgment can be taken, except jointly against all. The case has its peculiarities, and is not without its difficulties; but, upon the whole, I think that the above view of the plaintiff is correct. Upon establishing the joint liability the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment, not against those served with process only, but against all the defendants jointly; and I am not able to find in the suit any controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states, and which can be fully determined, as between them, without the presence of the other joint contractors in the proceedings. Some effect must be given to the words "wholly" and "fully" in the statute respecting removals. The question of the alleged joint liability of the defendants depends upon the fact of the alleged partnership, and I am not able to perceive how that, as the question in the case, can be said to be wholly between the plaintiff and the petitioning defendant, or how it can be fully determined between them without vitally touching the interests of all the other defendants. With this view of the law and of the nature of the suit, the motion to remand must be sustained, and it is ordered accordingly.

APPEAL—OBJECTION TOO LATE—MARITIME LIEN—SUPPLIES IN FOREIGN PORT—NECESSITY FOR CREDIT—PRIOR HYPOTHECATION BY OWNER.

1. It is too late to object to an appeal where both parties have treated it as valid.

2. A maritime lien exists for supplies furnished to a vessel in a foreign port, which were necessary and were furnished on the credit of the vessel, unless the necessity for such credit be disproved by proper evidence.

3. A hypothecation of a vessel by her owner, to secure a pre-existing debt, which, in its origin, gave no lien on the vessel, gives no priority to such hypothecation over a prior maritime lien on the vessel.

In admiralty.

Franklin A. Wilcox, for libellants.
Ira D. Warren, for claimants.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The decree of the district court, dismissing the libel, was entered under date of July 14th, 1857. [Case No. 1,152a.] Notice of appeal was given and filed July 20th, 1857, a petition of appeal, with a proper bond for costs, was filed August 16th, 1858, and the return of the clerk was filed in this court September 19th, 1859. A decree of reversal was taken by default, in favor of the libellants, in April, 1872, which was subsequently waived by the libellants. At the last October term, the claimants, on the cause being moved for hearing, asked to have the appeal dismissed. No steps had ever been taken to set aside the appeal. I think the claimants are too late now to object to the appeal, both parties having treated it as valid.

Upon the merits, it is quite clear that the learned judge who made the decree pursued what was then understood to be the law of the land, as construed by the supreme court of the United States, and announced in Pratt v. Reed, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 359. Since that decision, however, the cases of The Grapeshot, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 129; The James Guy, Id. 758; The Lulu, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 192; and The Kalorama and The Custer, Id. 204, have brought the subject again into discussion, and it is now settled, that a maritime lien exists for supplies furnished in a foreign port, which were necessary and were furnished on the credit of the vessel, unless the necessity for such credit be disproved by proper evidence, as pointed out in the several cases above cited.

The claim of the claimants is based upon an instrument given as security for a debt previously existing against the owner, and not originally incurred on account of the vessel in any respect. It was given by the owner in the port of New York. It engaged the owner absolutely to pay the amount named in it, with interest at seven per cent., in ten days after its date, and by it the owner hypothecates and assigns the vessel, &c., to the claimants, as security for the money named. It declares all risks of the seas, &c., to be for account of the owner, and is in no wise conditioned that any part of the money is put at hazard upon the vessel. For the debt before mentioned, the now claimants, the creditors of Cornelius, sued him in the state court, as a non-resident debtor, and obtained in that suit an attachment against his property; and the hypothecation was given, as the only witness on the subject stated, to satisfy the attachment of the vessel in the common law action. Under the attachment against the owner as non-resident, his interest only in the vessel could be made available for the benefit of the attaching creditor. The earlier maritime lien of the libellants for supplies could not be displaced by such attachment and seizure. The debt on which the attachment was issued was a mere personal demand against the owner. It was, therefore, not in the power of the owner and his creditor, by their mere agreement, to create, without any advance of money or new consideration, a lien which should defeat the existing maritime lien for supplies, by taking precedence over it. Whatever might be the rule in case money had been raised for such a purpose from a third person, the attaching creditor cannot be allowed, by agreement with the owner, to acquire a priority on behalf of a claim which, in its origin, gave no foundation for a lien upon the vessel. The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 96; 1 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 154; Greely v. Smith [Case No. 5,750]. Such a hypothecation cannot carry a greater right than a sale of the vessel, and that obviously would not have cut off the prior lien. There must be a decree for the libellants.

NATTERSTROM v. The HAZARD.

[Bee, 441; [1] 2 Hall, Law J. 359.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. May 31, 1809.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—DEATH OF SEAMAN—SUIT BY LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES.

The law maritime will not sustain a suit for wages, by the legal representatives of a seaman beyond the time of his death, when the engagement was by the month.

John Taylor, on the 18th July, 1805, entered on board the ship Hazard [William Smith, late master] at Boston, as a mariner, for a voyage to the northwest coast of America, from thence to Canton, in China, and back to Boston, at the monthly wages of sixteen dollars, and signed articles in common form. The ship, soon afterwards, sailed on the proposed voyage, and on the 17th day of October, 1805, Taylor, with three other seamen, while manoeuvering the ship, in a gale of wind, were carried overboard by a sea, and drowned. The ship performed the contemplated voyage in safety, and returned to Boston on the 23d June, 1808. It appears that Taylor received thirty-two dollars advance wages, before the ship sailed from Boston, and that disbursements were made to him, on the voyage, by the master, to the amount of thirty-five dollars and fifty cents, exceeding, in the whole, the amount of wages, to the time of his death. The respondents [James and Thomas H. Perkins] allege, and it is not denied by the libellant, that by reason of the death of said Taylor, and of the three other seamen, who perished with him, the master of the ship was obliged to proceed to Rio Janeiro, where he arrived on the 11th November, 1805, there to hire four other seamen, which he accomplished at high and extravagant wages, to replace those who were lost, and to enable him to prosecute the voyage aforesaid; and they further allege, "that it is and ever has been the usage, custom, and practice of the trade, in which said ship was employed, in the voyage aforesaid, for the owner or master of the ship or vessel to pay, and the legal representatives of any mariner belonging to a ship or vessel, who had signed articles of agreement or a shipping paper, and happened to die on the voyage, to receive the wages accruing to such mariner, from the time of his entering on board such ship until his death, at the rate expressed in such articles or shipping paper, in full satisfaction of all claims and demands of such representative against the owner or master of said ship or vessel, for the wages or services of such deceased mariner."

This cause has been amply discussed, and it remains to determine the only question on which it depends; what is the legal effect and operation of the death of the mariner, Taylor, in manner and at the time above stated, on his wages? For the libellant it is contended, that the same amount is by law due, as if he had survived and continued in the service of the ship, during the whole voyage. On the other hand, it is contended for the respondents, that his wages, at the stipulated rate, are only to be reckoned to the time of his decease; and, of course, that the libel ought to be dismissed, as more than the amount of wages, due on that principle of computation, had been paid to the deceased.

The counsel for the libellant rests his claim on the seventh article of the Laws of Oleron, the nineteenth of Wisbuy, and the forty-fifth of the Hanse Towns; and on a late decision in the circuit court of Pennsylvania,—Sims v. Jackson [Case No. 12,890],—affirming a decree of the district judge, by which full wages, for the whole voyage, were given to the legal representative of a seaman who had engaged for a voyage from Philadelphia to Batavia, and back, and who died, in the course of the voyage, at Batavia.

DAVIS, District Judge. In the examination of this subject, I shall first inquire into the genuine meaning and import of the ancient ordinances above mentioned, in reference to the point under consideration. We have, I presume, a correct text of the Laws of Oleron, in the Us et Coustumes de la Mer, by Cleirac. The seventh article prescribes the duties of the master, when a mariner falls sick, in the service of the ship. It directs, that he shall be put on shore, and that suitable humane provision shall be made for him. The closing paragraph, which, alone, has special application to the question now under consideration, runs thus: "Et si la nef estoit preste à s'en partir, elle ne doit point demeurer pour luy; et s'il guarit, il doit avoir son loyer tout comptant, en rabatant les frais, si le maistre luy en a fait; et s'il meurt, sa femme et ses prochains le doivent avoir pour luy." "And if the vessel be ready for her departure, she ought not to stay for the said sick party; but if he recover, he ought to have his full wages, deducting only such charges as the master has been at for him. And if he dies, his wife or next of kin shall have it." I resort to the same author for the correspondent articles in the other ordinances, not having been able to find any copy of the original text.

Ordinances of Wisbuy, Art. 19.

Si le matelot tombe en infirmité de maladie, et qu'il convient le porter à terre, il y sera nourri comme il estoit dans le bord, garde et servy par un valet, et s'il vient en convalescence, sera payé de ses gages; et s'il decede, ses gages et loyers seront payez à sa vefue, ou à ses heretiers.	If a seaman falls ill of any disease, and 'tis convenient to put him ashore, he shall be fed as he was aboard, and have somebody to look after him there; and when he is recovered, be paid his wages; and if he dies, his wages shall be paid to his widow or heirs.

Laws of the Hanse Towns, Art. 45.

Que s'il revient en convalescence, il sera payé de ses gages tout ainsi comme s'il avoit servy, et s'il meurt, ses heretiers les retireront entierement.	If he recovers his health, he shall be paid his wages, as much as if he had served out THE WHOLE VOYAGE; and in case he dies his heirs shall have what was due to him.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Thomas Bee, District Judge.]

I adopt the translation given in the "Sea Laws," first published in England, in the reign of Queen Anne, not from a respect to the translation of those ordinances, in general, as contained in that work, for in several instances it is palpably incorrect, but because, from its long standing in our language, it is entitled to consideration, and in the articles now cited, it gives, to my apprehension, the sense of the text, with sufficient correctness. Stress has been laid, by the respondents' counsel, on a supposed mistranslation of the article from the Laws of Oleron. It is said that the word "comptant" means "money down," and, that the addition of the word "tout," to the word "comptant," only renders the expression more emphatic. However this may be in modern French, and there are certainly respectable authorities in support of the criticism, I am convinced, that something more was intended by the phrase, as used in the article cited, and that it was designed to express not merely the mode of payment, but has reference to the quantum. It is evident from Cleirac's comment, that he so understood it; and I consider the meaning to be the same, as is conveyed by the word "entierement," which he uses in translating the cited article of the Laws of the Hanse Towns. Valin, in his discussions relative to wages, frequently uses the phrases "en entier" and "en plein," which are of equivalent import. But these modes of expression do not, necessarily and universally, imply an absolute payment of the wages for the whole voyage. Such, indeed, is their frequent application; but we also find expressions of this description employed, when a payment of wages, for a less time than the whole voyage, is most evidently intended.

The third article of the Laws of Wisbuy directs, that if a master discharge a seaman without just cause, after the commencement of the voyage, he shall pay him "entierement, tous les gages promis." This passage, in the Sea Laws, is rendered "all his wages as much as if he had performed the voyage." This is a free translation, but it gives the sense of the original; and the regulation corresponds with the principle of the eighteenth article of the Laws of Oleron, by which an offending seaman, if tendering amends, is to be retained, and if discharged after such offer, is entitled to full wages, as if he had continued in the ship. The expression there is "aussi bon loyer comme s'il estoit venu audedans"—"as good hire as if he had come in the ship," equivalent to "entierement, tous les gages promis," in the third article of the laws of Wisbuy, and to "tous leurs loyers," in the twentieth article of the Laws of Oleron, applied to a contract by the run, when the voyage is abridged by the act of the owner or the master, in proceeding, with the ship, to some port nearer to the place of departure and destined return, than was stipulated in the contract. Other instances might be cited, where this meaning must be understood, but there are also many, in which expressions of this description must have a more restrained construction. Valin, in commenting on a royal ordinance of France, framed to determine a question relative to ships ordered to a certain station, and there to wait for convoy, recites it in the following terms: "La solde des gens des équipages seroit payée en plein du jour que les navires auroient mis à la voile, jusqu'au jour qu'ils auroient mouillé dans la rade du convoi; que depuis qu'ils auroient mouillé jusqu'au jour de la flotte, ils n'auroient que la demi-solde, et qu'apres le depart, la solde leur seroit continué en entier, pour le reste du voyage"—"The wages of the crew shall be paid in full from the day of the vessels' sailing to the day of their mooring in the road of the convoy; from the time of their joining the convoy to the departure of the fleet, they shall have only half wages, and after the departure, their wages shall continue in full for the remainder of the voyage." It is here apparent that the phrases "en plein" and "en entier," apply to the rate of wages, and that for the portions of the voyage specified, they shall be without deduction. A similar use of this expression we find, relative to another ordinance, that of 17th October, 1748, respecting vessels waiting for convoy in the colonies. Speaking of the crew, he says: "Seront payés de leur salaries en entier, pendant le sejour que lesdits navires auront fait dans les desdites isles, jusqu'á concurrence du terme de six mois, et seulement de la moitié pour le temps excédent ledit terme"—"They shall be paid their hire in full while said vessels shall remain at the aforesaid islands, for the term of six months, and half wages, only, for the time exceeding said term." Volume 2, 698. The eleventh article of the ordinance of Louis XIV. relative to seamen's wages runs thus: "Le matelot qui sera blessé au service du navire, ou qui tombera malade pendant le voyage, sera payé de ses loyers et pansé aux depens du navire"—"A seaman who shall be wounded in the service of the ship, or who may fall sick during the voyage, shall be paid his wages, and be cured at the expense of the ship." As it relates to the wages of the sick seaman, this corresponds with the seventh article of the Laws of Oleron. The words "tout comptant," or terms equivalent, are not, indeed, inserted; but both Valin and Pothier understand the meaning to be the same as if it included such expressions. The latter writer, in commenting on this article, observes, "Le matelot tombé malade ou blessé au service du navire, gagne en entier son loyer, non seulement lorsqu'il est resté dans le navire, mais même, dans le cas auquel ayant été mis à terre, dans un port, ou le navire a relâché, il y auroit été laissé s'étant trouvé hors d'état d'être rembarqué, lorsque le navire est reparti"—"The seaman who may become sick or wounded, in the service of the ship, is entitled to his wages in full not only while remaining on board the ship, but also if he should be put on shore in a port where the ship may have stopped, and should be there left, on account of his being unable to return on board the ship, at the time of her departure." Louage des Matelots, § 2. It is here apparent that the phrase "en entier," which must be admitted to be equally forcible with the words "tout comptant," is applied, by this very accurate writer, to express nothing more, than that there shall be no deduction for sickness, or for absence from the ship, from that cause. It may be said, that the commentator, in giving this construction to the article, had in view a subsequent article, of the same ordinance, article 13, which directs, that the heirs of a seaman engaged by the month, and who may die during the voyage, shall be paid his wages to the day of his decease. But the eleventh article in general, and its provisions in favour of a sick seaman, apply not merely to those engaged by the month, but to those engaged on other terms. Further, it is evident, from Pothier's comment on the thirteenth article, that his conceptions of the dispositions made by the eleventh article, were formed on distinct grounds, and instead of having a prospective view to the thirteenth article, while discussing the eleventh, he founds the application of the thirteenth article, relative to heirs, on the provisions made by the eleventh article, relative to the sick seaman while alive. The heirs, he says, shall, of course, have the wages accruing during sickness, and the disposition of this article is but an exact consequence of article eleven. "La disposition de cet article n'est qu'une consequence exact de l'article 11me." Louage des Matelots, § 2. In this there is, to my apprehension, a perfect correspondence between Pothier and Valin. The latter writer, commenting on the thirteenth article, which relates wholly to what the heirs shall recover, commences his remarks by stating, what the deceased seaman had acquired. "Le matelot ayant gagné ses loyers jusqu'à son décès arrivé pendant le voyage, et cela, aussi bien durant le temps de la maladie que pendant celui qu'il a rendu un service effectif au navire, il est bien juste qu'ils passent à sa veuve et heretiers." "The seaman having earned his wages to the time of his death, happening, during the voyage, as well during his sickness, as for the time when he rendered actual service on board the ship, it is just that they should go to his widow and heirs." In this passage, Valin evidently has reference to the eleventh article. In his comment, on that article, he denominates the disposition which it makes relative to wages of a sick seaman, as a right to wages en plein; an expression which must be understood, as it is used by Pothier, in this connexion, to intend, merely, that there shall be no diminution of wages on account of sickness.

It is to be understood, that I do not consider the dispositions made by the articles of this ordinance, as an authoritative settlement of the question; though they are most explicit in their terms. I only resort to them and to the commentators above mentioned, with a view to a right understanding of the phraseology employed in the articles of the Laws of Oleron, Wisbuy, and the Hanse Towns, all of which are given in the French language by Cleirac, and from whose work the received English translation appears to have been made. From this examination, I am satisfied, that the terms "tout comptant," "en entier," or "entierement," as applied to wages, do not, necessarily, mean wages for the whole voyage; that they admit of a different and more limited application, according to circumstances, and that the true meaning, in the respective instances, in which they are employed, must be determined from the subject matter and the connexion. "Noscitur ex sociis." I may further add, that it is not unfrequent, where the meaning might be otherwise equivocal, to add expressions, which render the sense perfectly certain, such as "comme s'il avoit servi tout le voyage," or the like. Applying these views of the language of the law, which we are considering, to the seventh article of the Laws of Oleron, and to the correspondent articles in the Laws of Wisbuy and of the Hanse Towns, I cannot find, that those articles either express or intend that the heirs of a seaman dying in the course of the voyage, shall recover wages in his right, as if he had lived and served out the voyage. The object of all those articles is to make suitable dispositions relative to seamen falling sick on a voyage. They direct how they shall be treated, and what shall be the results as respects their wages, in case of recovery, or of death. The expression, "tout comptant," in my apprehension, means nothing more, than that there shall be no deduction on account of sickness, either as against the seaman himself, if he recover and claim his wages, or against his heirs in case of his decease. Two interesting points were established by these articles, both wisely and humanely calculated to sooth the sorrows of the sick, or disabled mariner; that his calamity, if not produced by his own criminality or fault, should not diminish his stipulated wages, during the existence of his disability, or his necessary absence from the service of the ship from that cause; and, that in case of his death, all that was due to him should descend to his heirs. Both these provisions seem so perfectly reasonable, that, it may at first view appear, that a formal article could hardly be necessary to enforce them, and we may, on this ground, be induced to apprehend that something more was intended. But the first point is, even now, occasionally questioned by ship owners and masters, and, we may easily satisfy ourselves, that, it then appeared necessary that both should be declared. The application of the Roman law de locatione et conductione, to which Pothier expressly refers, for a construction of the contract of hiring of labour, in general, and for the hire of seamen, in particular, would exclude a claim for compensation during the disability of the servant or labourer. But, as generous masters, says this esteemed commentator, will not insist on a strict enforcement of their rights, but continue the compensation of a sick servant, notwithstanding his disability to perform his stipulated services, so the law marine in relation to mariners converts into an obligation what, in other instances of hire, is the result of benevolence. The object of the law, he adds, is, for the encouragement of seamen, and as a compensation for the risk which they run of an entire loss of wages, from inevitable accidents occurring to the ship, or from a destruction of the voyage. Louage des Matelots.

Doubts derived from the rules of law relative to entirety of contracts, and perhaps also some principles of the law de societate, might have rendered necessary the express declaration, in favour of heirs, that is made by the articles under consideration. A similar provision was made by the Consolato del Mare, and we learn from Cleirac, that it was the express object of an ancient ordinance of France, to declare such right of succession in favour of the heirs of mariners, dying on the voyage. "Si le marinier meurt à voyage, les ordonances de France conservent ses biens à ses heretiers en termes generaux, sans parler precisement, comme fait ce jugement, des loyers ou gages meritez ou à meriter." "If a mariner die on the voyage, the ordinances of France preserve his property to his heirs, in general terms, without specifying, as this article does, wages earned or to be earned." Cleir. 34, on article 7 of Laws of Oleron. It is not necessary, therefore, in order to satisfy the expressions in the Laws of Oleron, and in the other ancient marine codes, to consider them, as giving to heirs of a mariner, dying on the voyage, the same amount of wages, as the deceased would have received, if he had lived until the termination of the voyage. I admit, indeed, that the phrase "tout comptant," in the Laws of Oleron, is to be understood to apply to the heirs as well as to the seaman, as the word "entierement" is, in the Laws of the Hanse Towns, and, that these terms are well enough rendered by the expression "full wages." Still it remains to be determined, what is the precise import of these expressions, used in this connexion.

The apparent or plausible ground, on which a diminution of wages may be claimed, by a master, against a seaman, being, in any case, suggested, will enable us to determine in what sense, the words "en entier" or "entierement" are to be understood. When a seaman is discharged without good cause, no question could occur to any reasonable mind, relative to his earnings to the time of his discharge. Whatever doubt might arise, in regard to his claim for wages, would respect the remainder of the voyage, from which he was wrongfully expelled. In such a case, therefore, we must understand the term "entierement," in the third article of the Laws of Wisbuy, to intend wages for the whole voyage. But in the cases supposed by the seventh article of the Laws of Oleron, the only ground, which could be suggested for a subtraction of wages, is the sickness and disability of the mariner; and when it is said, he shall, notwithstanding, receive his wages tout comptant, it is apparent, that nothing more is intended, than that no deduction shall be made on that account. An application of this construction to the different cases that might occur will test its solidity. 1st. With regard to the seaman himself. If he recover, says the law, he is to have his wages tout comptant. If, after such recovery, he join the ship, before the completion of the voyage, his right to wages tout comptant, or to full wages, must, in such a case, evidently mean, that no diminution shall be required on account of his non-performance of duty or absence from the ship by reason of sickness. His claim to wages, for the residue of the voyage, will depend on future services and circumstances, and not on the provisions made by the law relative to the operation of his sickness. A like construction of the article must, I apprehend, be given, if a seaman, who may be left abroad sick, should recover and return home before the arrival of the ship, and the ship should afterward arrive in safety. If the sickness be supposed to be of such continuance, that he be not able to return to the ship during the voyage, but he survives the prosperous termination of the voyage and returns home after the arrival of the vessel; he shall in like manner, by the articles cited, have wages tout comptant or entierement, or full wages. The wages in this case, would, indeed, be for the whole voyage; but the force and meaning of those operative expressions are the same as before. He shall receive wages for the whole voyage, not because tout comptant, entierement, or full wages, necessarily and exclusively mean wages for the whole voyage; but because, as in the other case, they protect him from a deduction from his wages on account of sickness, and the sickness or disability, which entitled him to indulgence, is supposed to have continued until the termination of the voyage. 2d. In regard to the heirs of such deceased seaman. I understand the same expressions, by fair implication, to extend to them, but in the same sense. If the sick seaman survive the prosperous termination of the voyage, and afterward die, without having recovered his wages, his heirs shall recover them entierement, or tout comptant. But, in this case, the same remarks are applicable, which have been suggested relative to a demand for wages by the seaman himself, after such conclusion of the voyage; and, for the same reason, the meaning of the terms "entierement" or "tout comptant," remains, in this case, equally unchanged. The right to wages, in such a case, for the whole voyage, results not from the mere force of those terms, but from this concurrent, essential fact, the continuance of the disability or absence from that cause, commensurate with the voyage.

The death of the seaman, before the termination of the voyage, presents a case involving the very point in question. In such case, also, the heirs shall receive the wages entierement or tout comptant. But we ought to understand those terms, in the same sense as they are evidently to be understood, in the preceding cases. If we construe them as giving to the heirs the wages, for the residue of the voyage, we, in fact, change their meaning, or include an idea not implied in those terms, in the other cases supposed. This would appear to me an inadmissible mode of construction, as the subject matter, to which the terms are applicable, is unchanged. In the case of a seaman wrongfully dismissed from a ship, his connexion with the ship is dissolved by the mere injurious act of the master. This act gives to the seaman an immediate right to wages for the whole voyage, subject, indeed to contingencies which may defeat the voyage, and of course his claim. But the object of the provisions relative to disability was not to give a new right to the seaman, in consequence of his falling sick, but to protect him from loss. I am satisfied, therefore, that the expressions referred to, must, in case of death during the voyage, be understood in the same sense as in the other cases, and that they mean nothing more than a security against any diminution of the wages, on account of sickness. In this manner, it appears to me, these articles were understood by the commentators; and I find no intimation, either in Cleirac or Valin, that they considered the heirs entitled to wages by these articles, beyond the death of the seaman, whom they might represent. Cleirac, under the seventh article of the Laws of Oleron, mentions the ordinances of Charles V. giving to the widow or heirs of a seaman, dying on the outward voyage, one half the wages agreed for, and, if dying on the homeward voyage, the whole wages. He remarks the correspondence of this provision with the dispositions made by the Consolato del Mare, which also provides, that the heirs of a seaman, who was engaged by the month, shall be paid according to the time that he may have served. He then proceeds to notice a more favourable provision for widows and heirs of deceased seamen in ships of war, on long voyages; that, if a man should die, on the first day after the commencement of the voyage, his heirs should be paid for the whole voyage. "Ses heretiers seront payés pour tout le long du voyage." If Cleirac intended to compare this generous provision with the disposition made by the Laws of Oleron, he could not denominate it, more favourable, on the construction contended for by the libellant's counsel in this case; for, on such construction, the provision by the seventh article of those laws, would be, in fact, the same as is noted by Cleirac, to have been observed on board ships of war. But if he is to be understood as making a comparison with the regulations of Charles V. and of the Consolato del Mare, previously mentioned in his note, it would still appear unaccountable, why this instance of such generous provision should be alone selected, and that he should be silent as to a like disposition, made by the very article on which he was commenting, according to the construction contended for by the counsel for the libellant. The strongest aspect in Cleirac, in another direction, is in the expression, "loyers ou gages meritéz ou à meriter," in the note above quoted. But I understand the word "meritéz" to refer to the wages earned while the mariner was performing service, and "à meriter," not to have reference to any supposed accruing of wages after death, but to those earned or considered as earned during sickness and disability, or absence from the ship from such causes. Valin, it is well known, is copious and minute; and abounds in references to the Laws of Oleron, Wisbuy, and the Hanse Towns, and to Cleirac's commentary. I cannot find, in his ample and very valuable work, any recognition of the doctrine, that by the Laws of Oleron, Wisbuy, or the Hanse Towns, the heirs of seamen dying on the voyage, should recover wages, as if such seaman had served out the voyage. The fifteenth article of the ordinance of Louis XIV. provides, that the wages of a seaman, killed in defending a ship shall be paid in full as if he had served the whole voyage, provided the ship arrive in safety. We should expect the commentator, under this article, to remark its correspondence with the Laws of Oleron, Wisbuy, and the Hanse Towns, relative to seamen dying from any other cause, if, in his opinion, those laws were to be thus understood. On such extended construction, also, of the seventh article of the Laws of Oleron, we should expect the commentator to notice its repugnancy to the eleventh article of the ordinance of Louis XIV. We find no such intimation; but from a careful inspection of his comments, particularly on articles 11, 13, and 14, I am satisfied, that this able writer did not understand the Laws of Oleron, Wisbuy and the Hanse Towns, as giving a claim to wages beyond the death of the mariner. It should be observed also, that if the seventh article of the Laws of Oleron, did, in true or received construction, give full wages for the whole voyage, in all cases of death on the voyage, without fault on the part of the mariner, there could be no necessity, as those laws constituted a portion of the marine law of France, to make the special and exclusive provision of that nature, for a seaman killed in defending the ship, as is done by the fifteenth article of the ordinance of Louis XIV.

It is material in the next place to inquire, how these ancient marine codes have been generally understood in the countries originating them. I can find no evidence, that they have, in any European country, been applied in the sense contended for, in this case, in support of the libellant's claim. It is well observed by Valin, that next to equity in a law, are its perspicuity and brevity. The seventh article of the Laws of Oleron and the correspondent articles in the other ordinances, are sufficiently brief. They are not remarkable for perspicuity, and on the construction contended for, in support of the present claim, would not be equitable. There would result one fixed, invariable rule, in case of the death of the seaman, during the voyage, whatever might be the nature of the engagement, whether by the month, for the voyage, part-profit, or freight. If there had been no other resource, some tolerable system might, by a course of decisions, have been founded on the basis of this article, relative to the cases of death of mariners during the voyage; but it does not appear that the law upon this subject has been extracted from this source, excepting so far as relates to the operation on wages of sickness, and disability of a seaman. The fact is, that exact and definite provisions, reasonably accommodated to the necessary diversity of occurrences, had before been established by an excellent and venerable code, originating among a very intelligent and highly commercial people. I refer to the Consolato del Mare; the 127th article of which expressly provides, that the heirs of a seaman, engaged by the month, and dying on the voyage, shall be paid his wages for the time of his service. "Se il marinaro è accordato a mesi, et morirà, sia pagato, et dato alli suoi heredi per quello, che havessi servito." The preceding article directs, that if the engagement be by the voyage, half or the whole shall be received by the heirs according to the period of the voyage, in which the death should occur.[2] These articles of the Consolato are quoted by Cleirac; and from the manner in which Valin refers to them, and to Cleirac's quotation, I understand him to mean, that they constituted a portion of the received marine law of France, on this subject. I have no means of information, of the application of the Laws of Wisbuy, in this particular, in the countries, where they may be supposed to have had special influence or authority. In determining on the application of the Laws of the Hanse Towns, it would have been satisfactory, to have consulted Kuricke's commentary on the revised code of those laws, of 1614. This work I have not been able to find; but in "the Ship and Sea Laws of Hamburg" as contained in Herman Langenbeck's treatise, published A. D. 1727, there appears to be an affirmance of the Laws of Oleron, as to the manner in which a seaman, falling sick on a voyage, shall be treated; and, if he dies on the outward passage, the heirs are to have half his wages and privilege, if on the return voyage, the whole; deducting the expenses of interment. In this principal city, therefore, of the Hanseatic confederacy, we find an express partial adoption of the provisions, made by the Consolato, on this subject, with this only difference, that the Hamburg law makes the same provision, whether the contract be for the month or for the voyage, which the Consolato distinguishes. It is observable, that we do not find, in Langenbeck's commentary, any intimation, that, by the Laws of the Hanse Towns, the heirs of a seaman, dying on the voyage, would be entitled to the whole sum, which such seaman would have earned, if he had lived to the end of the voyage. Such a disposition would have been materially different from that made by the thirtieth article of the Hamburg laws, on which he was commenting, and if such diversity, in true construction, really existed, we must suppose it would have been noticed. The Hamburg regulations disregard the distinction that is made by the Consolato del Mare, between an engagement by the month, or for the voyage, as respects the amount of wages to be paid, in case of death of a seaman during a voyage. The discrimination, made by the Consolato, is adopted by the ordinance of Louis XIV. and it is believed, was the previous maritime law of that country, by tacit adoption of that provision in the Consolato. Pothier suggests a reason for the distinction. The seaman, who is engaged by the month, does not sustain the risk of calms, contrary winds and other impediments, which may prolong the voyage: however protracted, if not interrupted, or broken, so as to defeat a claim for wages, they are commensurate with the length of the voyage. Whereas one engaged for the voyage, runs the risk of an inadequate compensation for his services, by an accidental protraction of the voyage, beyond the term contemplated as the measure of his reward, when the contract was made. On this ground, says Pothier, the ordinance proceeds, corresponding in this particular, with the Consolato del Mare, and, as a compensation for the different risks, is the distinction made. Louage des Matelots.

I proceed to inquire, how the law, on this subject, has been considered and received in

[2] There is a diversity, in the different editions of this work, in the numbers of the chapters. The edition here quoted is that of Leyden; printed in 1704. In Cleirac's commentary, the chapter here referred to as the 127th, is quoted as the 130th. Valin cites it by double numbers. The Consolato del Mare contains precise regulations on several topics, not contained, or only incidentally mentioned, in the Laws of Oleron, of Wisbuy, or of the Hanse Towns. It is to be regretted that a work, so comprehensive and valuable, should be so rare, and it appears surprising that an English translation of this venerable code has never yet appeared. A French translation, with commentaries and dissertations of much promise, has recently been announced. Anthology, for February last. It may be hoped, that this example will be duly emulated, and that a long time will not elapse, before our Bibliotheca Legum shall present this valuable work, in our own language.

England; a question, for obvious reasons, of material importance. The rules and proceedings in maritime matters, in that country, became ours, by express adoption, in the first New England colony (Plymouth Colony Laws, 48); and the law on this subject, as understood and practised in that country, before our Revolution, may be considered as making a portion of our law, unless some other express provision, adverse decisions, or contrary received usages, either before or since the Revolution, should have effected an alteration. The foreign ordinances, on maritime affairs, have not the binding force or authority of law in England, not even the Laws of Oleron, to which that nation have long been, and still are, particularly partial. The extent of the adoption of any article of those laws, in that country, and the sense in which they are received, can only be learned from the decisions of their courts, and the approved treatises of their eminent juridical writers. To Godolphin's "View of the Admiral Jurisdiction" there is annexed an appendix containing a translation of the Laws of Oleron, with notes and observations. That part of the seventh article which is relied on in this case is thus rendered: "He ought to have his full wages or competent hire, rebating or deducting only such charges as the master hath been at for him, and, if he dies, his wife or next of kin to have it." To this is added the following note; "Executors of a deceased mariner ought to receive the wages due to him." I would here make the same remark as I have before suggested relative to the translation given in the "Sea Laws." I do not introduce the translation, inserted in that appendix, from a respect to its general correctness, for there are some palpable and some whimsical errors.[3] But the translation, given in the treatise, of the seventh article of the Laws of Oleron, with the note subjoined appears to me to evince, that this learned civilian did not receive the article in a sense, which would support the present claim. Molloy, in referring to the articles of the Laws of Oleron, copies the provisions relative to the seaman's right to wages, if he recover from his sickness, but altogether omits the provision respecting the heirs. He inserts the substance of that article of the Rhodian law, which subjects the master to the payment of a year's hire, to the heirs of a mariner, drowned in consequence of insufficient tackling. In both these instances, if it were part of the marine law, as received in that country, that in case of a seaman dying on the voyage, his heirs were entitled to recover wages as if he had lived and performed the voyage, it was certainly a strange and culpable omission not to insert or to intimate it, in an elaborate treatise "De Jure Maritimo." But my opinion, on this part of the subject, does not altogether rest on omissions of this sort. Later and more accurate English writers than Molloy are very clear and express on this point. Abbot considers the construction of the foreign ordinances as doubtful. In the English law books, he says, there is no general decision on the subject; but refers to a case (Cutter v. Powell, 6 Term R. 320), in which he says, it seems to have been admitted, that the representatives of a seaman, hired by the month, would be entitled to a proportion of wages to the time of the death. In a late respectable work, Abbot's statement is confirmed, by observations altogether similar. Com. Cont. 377. An inspection of authorities on this subject, as well as a respect for the accuracy of the writers of those digests, has satisfied me, that it is not, and never has been, the received law in England, either in the courts of common law or admiralty, that the heirs of a seaman, hired by the month, and who may have died in the course of a voyage, are entitled to recover wages, as if the mariner had lived and served out the voyage. In the case of Chandler v. Grieves, 2 H. Bl. 606, note, on the motion for a new trial, the court obtained a certificate from the admiralty, of the law marine, relative to the right of a disabled seaman to wages. It was certified, that according to the usage of the admiralty, a seaman disabled in the course of his duty, was holden to be entitled to wages for the whole voyage, though he had not performed the whole. The result was, that the rule was discharged. The amount actually recovered in the case, was not to the conclusion of the voyage, though it has been frequently so stated even by English writers; but, the rule being discharged, judgment must have been according to the verdict, which was only for wages to the time of the ship's departure from Philadelphia, where the disabled seaman was left. It is admitted, however, that the principle, certified from the admiralty, and on which, it may be presumed, the court of common pleas proceeded in discharging the rule to shew cause, would authorise and require a recovery of wages, under the circumstances of that case, for the whole voyage; and such I have observed to be the just construction of the Laws of Ole-

[3] A remark of this sort may seem to require verification. Two instances, only, will be mentioned in this place: Art. 14.—"Oster la toüaille trois fois," is understood, in this translation, to mean "three times lifting up the towel," and it is thus copied into Molloy. The true meaning, "a denial of the mess three times," is given in the Sea Laws and in other subsequent compilations. Art. 9—"Les mariniers doivent avoir un tonneau franc, et l'autre doit partir au ject." is thus translated. "The mariners, also, ought to have one tun free and another divided by cast of the dice." This rendering is followed in the Sea Laws, in Postlethwayt's Dictionary of Trade and Commerce, and in some later publications. It is evident from Cleirac's commentary, that the contribution to a jettison, intended here to be directed, is not to be decided by cast of the dice. The seamen are to have one ton free, and the remainder of their privilege is to contribute its proportion. The article, says the commentator, "ordonne pour les mariniers un tonneau franc en la contribution, et veut que la reste participe au jet."

ron and the other foreign ordinances. But we have no opinion from the admiralty, nor in the common law authorities, that wages are recoverable, after the death of a seaman, for the subsequent portion of the voyage; and it is observable, that such a position is not found to be maintained in argument, though, if correct, it would certainly, forcibly apply in several cases reported in the books. "In the case of a mariner's dying in the course of the voyage" says a learned judge of the court of common pleas, "it should seem that he is entitled to a proportionate part of his wages, unless he be excluded by the specific terms of his contract." Justice Heath, Beale v. Thompson, 3 Bos. & P. 425. An observation of this sort, from a learned judge of the court, and the dubious, qualified language of Abbot and Comyns, that a pro rata recovery of wages seems to be admitted in case of a death of a seaman on the voyage, who was hired by the month, indicate their views on this subject, and are inconsistent with the supposition that they considered the law as giving wages for the whole voyage in such case, or that such is the received law in England, on that subject. In our own country, the law and usage appear to have been the same; in Massachusetts I may say, uniformly so. We find, indeed, no decision. A demand of this description does not appear to have been made in legal shape, until since the late decision in Pennsylvania. The libellants' counsel was apprised, that the court would hear evidence, of any usage in support of this claim. None has been offered, and it was frankly admitted, that the contrary usage had prevailed, with the exception above expressed.

The uniform usage, as alleged by the respondents, is satisfactorily maintained. To introduce a different rule, would, in my opinion, be to give a construction of the contract, not contemplated by either of the contracting parties, and not consonant to the law, on the subject, at the time when the contract was made. I perceive, in the report of the case determined in Pennsylvania, it is intimated, that the extreme severity on ship owners, of the operation of the decisions in the district court, has produced a general practice of inserting a covenant in the shipping articles, that wages shall cease on the death of a seaman. The introduction of such provisions may be attended with difficulties, among a class of men, frequently uninstructed, attached to old forms and habits, and who may be jealous of an express stipulation, though, in reality, altogether consonant to a tacit construction, by which they had ever been governed. It would be injurious to require it, unless absolutely necessary. From my view of the law on this question, it does not appear to be requisite, unless it be to avoid controversy, on a subject, on which there is a diversity of sentiment. I regret this collision with opinions which I highly respect. It was incumbent on me, under such circumstances, to weigh, with great deliberation, the grounds of a different persuasion; but such being my opinion, after thorough examination, I consider it a duty to declare it. I ought here to suggest the relief afforded to my mind, in regard to difficulties of this description, by an interlocutory opinion expressed by the Hon. Judge Cushing, at the last circuit court in this district, in the case of Oystead v. The Perseverance [unreported], and by the consideration, that the decision now given, if erroneous, may be revised and corrected in a higher tribunal.

The examination which I have made of this subject, has led me to an affirmative conclusion on the following points. 1st. That, by general principles of law, on a contract of hire, no compensation can be claimed beyond the death of the party hired. 2d. That the Laws of Oleron, of Wisbuy, or of the Hanse Towns, do not provide, that, in case of the death of a seaman on a voyage, wages are recoverable beyond the time of his death. 3d. That the intent of those ancient ordinances, in the articles relied on in this case, was to determine the effect and operation of sickness or disability, incurred in the service of the ship, during the voyage, and to provide for payment of wages, without deduction on that account, either to the seaman, if he recover his health, or to his heirs, in case of his death. 4th. That it does not appear, that those ordinances have, in those countries where they are peculiarly authoritative, been used and applied as entitling the heirs to wages, for any time subsequent to the death of a seaman. 5th. That approved commentators, such as Cleirac and Vaiin, do not establish the construction contended for in support of this claim. 6th. That the Consolato del Mare, a work of approved authority, in case of an engagement by the month, and death on the voyage, expressly limits the wages to be recovered by heirs, to the time of the death of the mariner. 7th. That the law marine has not been otherwise understood and received in England, but in regard to an engagement by the month, and death on the voyage appears to be consonant to the Consolato del Mare. 8th. That in Massachusetts, the usage has uniformly been to make payment of wages, in such case, only to the time of the death of the seaman, and the law has been considered as consonant to the practice.

On these considerations, it is my opinion, that the law maritime, which I am to administer, will not sustain a claim for wages, by the legal representatives of a seaman, beyond the time of his death, when the engagement was by the month. In the present case, advances were made exceeding the amount of wages, due at the time of the seaman's death. I therefore decree, that the administrator take nothing by his libel. It is understood that no costs are claimed.

COLLISION—STEAM AND SAIL—LIGHTS.

On the night of May 21st, 1866, about twenty miles from Carmen Island, the Oregon ran into and sunk the bark Kent, which was becalmed. Hence this libel. The steamer had all lights set required by the act of congress. The bark did not have her red and green lights set, as required by the act of parliament, which is identical with the act of congress. The bark was not discovered until the steamer was close upon her. The bark had a bright white light in her main rigging. Weather clear and sea calm. The captain saw the steamer some two miles off, but had no thought of a collision.

Held, that although the bark was in fault in not displaying the proper lights, still, under the circumstances, would the steamer have seen the bark if she had had the colored lights up? To apply the strict rule would be harsh. I hold, and shall, till otherwise instructed, that under the circumstances of a ship becalmed in a remote sea and in such weather, the damage to both ships must be divided.

Ordered, that the damage to both vessels be found and the libellants recover one-half that amount with costs.

COLLISION—BOTH IN FAULT—DAMAGES BY MOIETIES—DIFFERENCE OF VALUE OF VESSELS—INSCRUTABLE FAULT—FORTUITOUS COLLISION.

1. In cases of collision, occasioned by faults on both sides, the damages are divided between the two vessels by moieties without regard to the difference of their value.

2. The same rule, it seems, prevails when the collision is occasioned by faults, but they are inscrutable, and it cannot be determined whether they are imputable to one party or the other.

3. Where the collision is purely fortuitous, by the law of this country each vessel bears its own loss, but by the maritime law of most European states it is divided between them by moieties.

[4. Cited in The Mary Patten, Case No. 9,223, and in Vanderbilt v. Reynolds, Id. 16,839, to the point that when collision is by fault of both parties, costs will be refused to both.]

This was a libel in a cause of damage by collision. The Nautilus, a steamboat of about one hundred and forty tons burden used as a tow-boat on the waters of the Penobscot, started from Bangor, November 8, 1853, with two vessels in tow, down the river. Leaving one at Frankfort, she proceeded with the other, and arrived at Bucksport Narrows between nine and ten o'clock in the evening. On rounding Fort Point, at the entrance of the Narrows, she saw a steamer coming up the river below Ralph's Point, another projection on the opposite side of the river. It proved to be the Malden, another tow-boat, which, having carried down her tow, was on her return. The Nautilus was descending with the ebb tide at the rate of about eight miles an hour, and the Malden ascending at the rate of four or five, the tide making about three miles difference in the progress of the vessels. There had been in the beginning of the evening a squall of snow, but that was past, and though the sky was overcast, yet the moon being at her second quarter, there was sufficient light for the men on board each boat to see the other at the distance of half a mile or more. The Malden, of about one hundred and five tons burden, had a crew of six hands. As they were ascending, and at the time of the collision, the mate was at the helm, the engineer in the engine-house, and the captain in the cook-house. She had no signal lights to be seen, except lights at two small windows looking forward from the engine room, and these could scarcely answer the purpose of signal lights. The Nautilus had a crew of seven men. From the time she rounded Fort Point and entered the Narrows, the master was at the wheel, the engineer in the engine-house, and Stubbs, one of the hands, forward on the look-out. She bore two signal lights, one on the top of the engine-room, and one hanging on the braces of the smoke pipe. These were the most material facts.

WARE, District Judge. It seems hardly possible that two vessels approaching each other, both moved by steam and thus having the complete control of their own motions, in a river of ample width to allow a safe passage, and in an evening light enough for them to be seen, even without signal lights, at the distance of half a mile, should come in collision without faults on one side or the other, or both. The law in defining the rights and liabilities of vessels, in cases of collision, is quite well settled. If the collision happens by the fault of one of the vessels, she must repair the damage which has been occasioned by her fault. If it was purely fortuitous, or was occasioned vi majore, without fault or negligence in either party, this by the common law is held to be damnum fatale, and each vessel must bear her own loss; and this, in a recent case, has been held by the supreme court to be the rule of the maritime law of this country. But where the collision has not been purely fortuitous or an unavoidable accident, but has been occasioned by faults on both sides,—or it has been occasioned by faults, and they are entirely inscrutable, and it cannot be determined whether they are imputable to one party or the other,—in either of these cases the maritime law, by what has been called a "judicium rusticum," divides the loss between them by moieties, without regard to the comparative value of the vessels, and without undertaking to determine whether the faults were greater on one side or the other. The Scioto [Case No. 12,508]; 3 Kent, Comm. 231; Abb. Shipp. p. 229, where the authorities are collected. The maritime law, on principles of public policy, departs from the principles of natural law, by which no one can be held responsible for an injury until it is shown to be imputable to his fault, and it differs also from the rule of the common law applicable to analogous cases on land, which holds that the complaining party cannot recover for a damage where it appears that it was in part imputable to his own negligence or fault, although the defendant may also have been in fault; that when there are mutual faults, neither party has a remedy against the other. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 473.

Let these principles be applied to the present case. It cannot be pretended that a collision between these two vessels, approaching in plain sight of each other, and each seen from a half to three fourths of a mile distant, was unavoidable; nor is it pretended that the collision was occasioned by any wanton or wilful misconduct of either party. But in the sense of the law, under the term faults, for which a party is held responsible in these cases, is included not only wilful misconduct but the neglect of any proper precaution to avoid a collision, and any want of care, vigilance, or skill in the management of the vessel. In this sense of the word the Malden was in fault in not using the precaution which is required, not only by the general laws of the sea, in the navigation of narrow waters much frequented by vessels, of showing signal lights, to give notice to others of her position and movements, but which is expressly enjoined by the act of congress of July 7, 1838 (5 Stat. 306). It has been held by the supreme court, that this neglect alone is sufficient to throw on a vessel the burden of proving that the accident is not attributable to this omission. Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441. In the second place, my opinion is that there was not at the time of the collision a sufficient watch on deck. In this narrow passage of the river, where the currents are somewhat baffling, the master was below in the cook-room, leaving no one on deck but the man at the helm, and the engineer in the engine-house. When a boat was seen approaching in a part of the river where the navigation is so critical, the master, if not on deck, ought immediately to have been called. Had that been done the collision might perhaps have been avoided. My opinion is that there were faults on the part of the Malden that are a bar to her recovery for the full amount of damage she has sustained, and also for any part of it, unless it is shown that there were such faults on the part of the Nautilus as require, on the principles of law, the loss to be divided between the two.

And here the first fact that meets us in this misadventure is that it took place in the centre of the stream. By a law of the sea, perfectly well understood by all navigators, when two vessels are approaching each other, each party is bound to take the right and pass the other on her larboard. These two vessels were approaching in a narrow and winding part of the river, and each seeing the other at the distance of half or three quarters of a mile before they met. Each was entitled to the side of the stream on her right, and, to avoid the danger of collision, was bound to take it. Neither party had in strictness a right to the centre, and there was nothing in the currents that necessarily prevented either from keeping near his own shore. And yet they met in the centre. From this fact alone, in the absence of all explanation, the inference would be that both were in fault. In such cases neither party is justified in saying, I have as good a right to the centre as the other, and because his vessel is strong, take the risk of collision; because each party is bound, without regard to the course of the other, to employ every effort of vigilance and skill to avoid a collision. But what places the Nautilus under graver difficulties is, that at the time of the collision, she was heading towards the eastern shore, and putting herself directly into waters that belonged to the Malden. The reason given for this is that she was deceived by the movements of the Malden, and supposed that she was intending to pass on the western side. If she was so deceived, it may still be asked, was she necessarily so deceived? The fact is that the Malden was headed towards the eastern shore. In the excitement and confusion of an apprehended collision, it is not surprising that one should misjudge, and this will certainly not be imputed as a crime. But in these cases the master is liable sometimes for errors of judgment. He may be responsible for a mistake which a more cool, vigilant, or skilful man would have avoided. On a consideration of all the evidence in the case, I am not satisfied that the faults were wholly on one side, and when this is the fact, the conclusion, as I understand the law, is that the loss shall be divided between the parties. The prevailing rule of the law of the continental states of Europe, is that the loss shall be divided, where the accident is simply fortuitous without faults in either party; and as a rule of expediency it is vindicated on the plausible, if not satisfactory reason that it tends to make large and strong vessels cautious in avoiding vessels of inferior size and strength, though the danger of injury to themselves may be small, and thus contributes to the general security of navigation. In our law the rule is settled otherwise. But when it is quite certain that the collision was not an inevitable accident, but was preceded and occasioned by errors, mistakes, and faults, and it is not clearly shown that the faults were all on one side, it seems to me to be a salutary rule to divide the loss between them. I am not aware of any case in which this precise point has been decided by our courts; and it may be objected that it is repugnant to the rule of the common law in analogous cases on land; but it appears to me in conformity with the spirit of the maritime law, which generally aims more at practical utility and the interests of navigation, than at a logical and scientific deduction of general and abstract principles. It seems also to have approved itself to the mind of that great jurisconsult and wise judge, Chancellor Kent.

The damages sustained by the Malden, according to a careful and particular estimate of the materials and labor required to repair her, are put at $591. That done to the Nautilus was small. A boat was destroyed, worth $35, and a slight injury to the hull, amounting to about $25; in the whole, $60. This, added to the damage of the Malden, makes the total damage $651, and divided between them gives to each $325.50. It was suggested at the argument, that there should be a deduction as in insurance cases, of one third of the repairs for the difference between new and old. No authority was cited for the application of this rule to cases of damage by collision, and I am not aware that it has ever been extended to these cases. Even if in some cases it might be equitable, I am not satisfied it would be in this. The principle on which the damages were estimated was, what would be the cost of putting the two vessels in as good a plight as they were before the collision, and that is the damage that ought to be repaired.

DECREE: The whole damage to be divided between the two vessels by moieties and each party to pay his own costs.

District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1845.

PLEADING IN ADMIRALTY—PLEAS—FORMALITIES—PRACTICE—CROSS ACTION—FORM OF ACTION.

1. By the rules of admiralty practice, pleas or exceptions must set forth the matter in dispute in perspicuous and definite terms, and it is not necessary that they should embody the formalities required in pleading at common law or in chancery.

2. A cross action cannot be maintained in this court, which seeks a re-trial of matters already adjudicated between the parties.

[Cited in The Dove, 91 U. S. 385.]

3. Nor is this rule varied when the subject matter is the same, although one action be in rem and the other in personam; the thing sued being regarded in admiralty as substituted for its owner, and when subject to his responsibilities, entitled at the same time to his immunities.

In admiralty.

O. Bushnell, for libellant.

B. Benedict, for claimants.

BETTS, District Judge. This is a cross action, in rem, on a charter-party, on which the claimants heretofore brought suit against the libellant, and had a decree in their favor in this court. The vessel was chartered to the libellant on a voyage from La Guyana to a plantation about twenty miles to the windward, from thence to La Guyana and Puerto Cabello, with the privilege of going to Maracaibo for a cargo. The libel charges that the vessel proceeded only to the port of Maracaibo, at the head of the lake, and no sufficient cargo being found for her there, the master was requested to proceed up Lake Maracaibo to other ports, where cargo would be found, which he refused to do; and it avers that the usage in that trade is, for vessels chartered to Maracaibo, to go up the lake for cargo when required, without mention of such obligation in the charter. Damages are demanded against the vessel because of the non-performance of such implied contract by the master.

The claimants, by way of exception, set up the former action and the decree of the court therein in bar of this suit, and aver that the same matters sought to be drawn in controversy in this cause have been adjudicated and decreed by this court between the libellant and the claimants herein, and pray that the libel be dismissed. The libellant, by an exceptive allegation, takes issue in law upon the sufficiency of the bar. The alleged insufficiencies of the bar might, most of them, be grounds of special demurrer at law; such as that the averments are not positive, but are merely by way of recital: the want of certainty as to the identity of the subject matter of the two suits; the want of proper form and verification of the plea, &c., &c. Others are inappropriate to this court, as that the parties are not nominatively the same in the proceedings in both cases, this being in rem, the former in personam; that the issue tendered by the plea is partly en pais and in part to this court (Betts, Adm. 48), and that the particulars of the former action are not alleged in the plea.

The general principle governing pleas or exceptions in admiralty practice is that they must set forth the matter of defence in perspicuous and definite terms, and it is in no way necessary they should embody the formalities which obtain in common law pleas, or even those used in chancery. 2 Browne, Civ. Law, 110; Dunl. Adm. Prac. 196, 197; Betts, Adm. 48. The gist of the plea is, that the present claimants brought their action on this charter-party against the libellant, averring full performance of its engagements on their part; that the libellant contested the action, and the court, on the pleadings and proofs, decreed in favor of the claimants, and that the libellant now seeks to bring the same matters in controversy in this suit.

This defence is sufficient in its material point—the identity of the cause of action in this and the former suit. The substitution in this of the vessel for the owners does not constitute a distinct cause of action. The vessel being chargeable in admiralty with the responsibilities of her owners, takes, also, all their legal privileges and exemptions in respect to the charter-party, and it is substantially sufficient, in its frame, it not being necessary to the validity of the bar that more of the former pleadings be rehearsed than is here set forth. To do so would load the files to no useful end, and the rules of court inhibit all useless prolixities in referring to antecedent pleadings in a cause with a view to bring a point under the consideration of the court which may be material in a new proceeding. Rule 7. The exception to the plea is accordingly overruled, with costs, with leave to the libellant to reply to the plea within ten days.

Ordered and adjudged that the exception filed by the libellant to the plea of the respondents of a former trial and decree upon the subject matter of the suit be overruled, with costs to be taxed, the libel of the libellant be decreed barred and be dismissed, with costs to be taxed, unless the libellant shall elect to reply to said plea; and in that case, that he have leave to file a replication thereto within ten days, on payment of the costs created by such exception, to be taxed.

NAYLOR et al. v. BALTZELL et al.

[Taney, 55.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. Nov. Term, 1841.

CARRIERS—CONTRACT—LEX CONTRACTUS—BILL OF LADING—SHIPPING—POWER OF MASTER TO BIND — BOTTOMRY BOND — SALE OF CARGO.

1. The ancient common law in relation to carriers is, undoubtedly, in force in Maryland, but there is no principle of jurisprudence upon which the court can expound a contract by the laws of that state, if it was not made there, nor was any part of it to be performed there.

2. The law of the domicil of the party does not govern the contract, nor determine his rights or obligation; they depend upon the law of the place where it was made, or where it was to be executed.

[Cited in Balfour v. Wilkins, Case No. 807.]

[Cited in Snashall v. Metropolitan R. Co., 19 D. C. 400. Cited in brief in Talbott v. Merchants' Despatch Transportation Co., 41 Iowa, 248.]

3. The master has a right to contract for the employment of the vessel, under circumstances of necessity, and the owners will be bound by it; but this right is derived from the maritime code, which is founded on the general usages and convenience of trade, and which has been adopted, to a certain extent, by all commercial nations.

[Cited in The Ole Oleson, 20 Fed. 387.]

4. The bill of lading is an instrument founded in the usages of trade, and not connected with any of the peculiar doctrines of the common law.

5. Where a vessel is injured by dangers of the seas, and is obliged to seek a port of distress, where she is found to be unable to proceed on her voyage, and the cargo is landed, the master becomes the agent of the cargo as well as the ship, and in that character, it is his duty to deal with the cargo, as a prudent and discreet owner would have done, if he had been on the spot at the time. He may transship it, and earn freight for his owners. If his own ship can be repaired in a reasonable time, he has a right to retain it until his own ship is ready, and, if necessary, may sell a part of the cargo, or hypothecate the whole, in order to obtain money for the necessary expenses of repairs; or he may abandon the voyage, and notify the owners of the cargo, of the disaster, and await their orders as to its future disposition.

6. As to the ship, the master may, in a foreign port, contract for repairs and supplies, and thereby bind the owners to the value of the ship and freight; or he may hypothecate the ship and freight, and thereby create a direct lien upon them for the security.

7. The authority of the master is limited to objects connected with the voyage, and if he transcends the prescribed limits, his acts become, in legal contemplation, mere nullities: and it is incumbent on the creditor to prove the actual existence of the necessity of those things which give rise to his demand.

8. The owners are not personally responsible for debts contracted by the master for repairs, beyond the value of the ship and freight.

[Cited in Force v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 35 Fed. 778; The Scotia, Id. 912.]

9. Nor can any terms inserted in a bottomry-bond, by the master, make them responsible for a greater amount.

10. A bottomry-bond executed by the master, hypothecating as well the cargo as the ship and freight, will not render the owners of the ship personally responsible to the owners of the cargo, beyond the value of the ship and freight.

[Cited in Miller v. O'Brien, 35 Fed. 782.]

11. The master has the power to pledge the ship and freight, only in cases of necessity—that is to say, where it is necessary for the interest of the owner, or there is reasonable ground to believe it will be for his interest; and the lender on bottomry is bound to show the existence of this necessity, otherwise, he is not entitled to recover, even against the ship and freight.

[Cited in The Scotia, 35 Fed. 912.]

12. And because it may sometimes be for the interest of the cargo to have the vessel repaired, the power is given to the master to sell a part, or hypothecate the whole, if necessary, to raise funds for that purpose; but the lender must show that the necessity existed, otherwise, he is not entitled to recover on his bond.

13. If the owner of the cargo stands by and suffers the cargo to be sold under the bottomry-bond, without requiring evidence of the necessity for the repairs, it will not avail him, in an action against the ship owners, to show that the necessity did not exist.

[14. Cited in brief in Talbott v. Merchants' Despatch Transportation Co., 41 Iowa, 249, to the point that a contract of affreightment is performed by delivery of the goods at the point of destination.]

[This was a suit by Jeremiah T. Naylor and others against Thomas Baltzell and Philip Baltzell to recover damages for the nondelivery of a certain cargo.]

J. Meredith, for plaintiffs.

J. Glenn and R. Johnson, for defendants.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. This action is brought to recover damages for the non-delivery of a cargo of copper ore, shipped in Chili, on board the brig Hope, Frederick Barkman, master, and consigned to the plaintiffs, who are merchants residing in Liverpool. The bill of lading is in the usual form, and was signed by the master on the 1st of July 1836, at Herradura de Carrisal, whereby he engaged to deliver the said cargo to the plaintiffs, at Swansea, in Wales, with the usual exception of the dangers of the seas.

It appears from the evidence, that the defendants, who reside in Baltimore, were the owners of the brig. She sailed from Baltimore, for Montevideo, on the 22d of October 1835, with a cargo of lumber, and was consigned to Carreras, Patrick & Butler, merchants of Montevideo, who were authorized to send her to any foreign port, with directions to remit the freight that might be earned to the defendants; this appears from the letter of Captain Barkman to the owners, written from Montevideo. The vessel arrived safely at Montevideo, and delivered her cargo; and the master, by the orders of the consignees, afterwards proceeded to Buenos Ayres, and signed there a charter party to Dickinson, Price & Co., by which the brig was to go round Cape Horn to Valparaiso, and to two ports in Chili, to take on board a cargo of copper ore, and then proceed to England, where the cargo was to be delivered. She sailed, accordingly, for Valparaiso, in February 1836, consigned to the charterers, and on the passage sprung a leak, which made it necessary to heave her down and make some repairs at that port; the exact amount of repairs and other expenses at Valparaiso, amounted to the sum of $3445, for which bills were drawn on the defendants, and paid by them.

After the repairs were made, the master called on Dickinson, Price & Co., and offered himself ready to proceed on the voyage, according to the charter-party; but they declined fulfilling the contract, alleging that the vessel was too old, and saying that they would have nothing to do with her. The master thereupon advertised her for charter, and after a delay of about fifteen days, succeeded in chartering her to Sewall & Patrickson, of Valparaiso, to proceed from that port to two ports in Chili, to load with copper ore for Swansea, in Wales, where the cargo was to be delivered to the plaintiffs. The cargo was taken on board pursuant to this charter, the master signed the bill of lading in the usual form, and the vessel sailed for her port of destination. In passing round Cape Horn, she was overtaken by severe weather, from which she suffered a great deal of damage in her hull and rigging, and was with difficulty kept from sinking, but succeeded in making the port of Pernambuco, where she arrived in great distress, and altogether unable to proceed on her voyage.

It does not appear that the master attempted to procure another vessel. He landed the cargo, and proceeded to make extensive repairs upon the brig. The whole cost of the repairs and expenses at that port amounted to the sum of £3150 sterling, for which sum with seventy per cent. premium, he hypothecated the ship, freight and cargo to the lender; the whole sum, including the premium, being £3780, for which a bond was executed, payable in ten days after the vessel should arrive at Swansea, in Wales. The brig proceeded to her port of destination, where she arrived safely about the middle of April, 1836. The money for which the hypothecation was given, not being paid, the lender proceeded in the admiralty court against the vessel, freight and cargo, and they were all sold by the decree of the court, no one having appeared on the part of the brig or cargo, to contest the claim of the bond-holder. The proceeds were not sufficient to pay the sum for which they were hypothecated.

It appears also that the portion of the aforesaid sum chargeable to the cargo, for the general and particular average, amounted to £642 8s. 11d., which was paid to the owners of the cargo by the underwriters; the freight amounted to £1189 5s. 1d.; the net proceeds of the cargo, sold under the bottomry, was £3396 19s. 5d.; and this suit was brought to recover from the owners of the ship the amount of the net proceeds of the cargo, after deducting the sum received from the underwriters and the freight.

The ship was charged, in the settlement of the general average, with £181 19s.; so that the repairs put on the ship, and her expenses at Pernambuco, with which she was charged, over and above her portion of the general average, amounted to upwards of ten thousand dollars. She was bought by her owners in Baltimore, shortly before she sailed on her voyage from the port, for $4000, and she was sold under the bottomry for £600 sterling. The repairs at Pernambuco cost more than double as much as she was worth at Baltimore, before she sailed, or in England, after the repairs were put upon her.

It was admitted, that the ship was not insured, and that the owners had received nothing on account of the general average loss incurred as above stated. The ship and freight having thus been appropriated to the payment of the bottomry, and totally lost to the owners, the question raised here is, whether they are personally responsible to the owners of the cargo, for the loss sustained by them? And the first inquiry is, by what rule of law are we to measure the rights of the plaintiffs, and the liabilities of the defendants, under a contract like the one now sued on?

The plaintiffs insist that we must be governed by the rules of the common law; that the defendants, under the charter-party and bill of lading, were common carriers for hire, and as such were liable for any loss of the cargo, unless it happened by the act of God, or a public enemy, provided it did not fall within the exception of the dangers of the seas. But there is no sound reason for applying to this case the principles of the common law in relation to common carriers for hire. In the first place, the master, according to the doctrines of the common law, was not authorized to bind even the brig or her value, by a contract like this. In all of the cases (with the exception of that of Boucher v. Lawson, Lee t. Hardwicke, 194), in which the owner was held responsible as a common carrier, upon contracts made by the master, it appeared that the master was entrusted by the owner, not only to navigate the vessel, but also to make contracts for her employment, or to receive goods for certain ports at the customary freight. Without examining them all separately, it is sufficient to remark, that in the case of Ellis v. Turner, which is comparatively a late one (8 Term R. 531), in order to charge the owner, evidence was offered to show that it was not usual for the master to confer previously with the owners, as to the terms on which he was to take goods on board, he having a general authority or discretion to receive and convey goods for the customary freight between the ports there mentioned. And in the case of Boucher v. Lawson, above referred to, in which the court said that the owner would have been liable for the doubloons taken on board at Lisbon, to be carried to London, if it had appeared that the ship was employed in carrying goods for hire, Lord Hardwicke evidently meant that the owner would have been responsible, if it had appeared that he had given him authority so to employ her and to make such contracts. For the court decided against the liability of the owner, although the contract for the freight was made by the master, upon the ground, that it did not appear that the ship was employed in carrying goods for hire, and for aught that appeared, might have been sent to Lisbon for a special purpose. The office of master, therefore, was not, in that case, supposed to be sufficient authority, of itself, to enable him to bind the owner by a charter-party or a contract of affreightment: and upon that point it does not differ from the case of Ellis v. Turner, before cited, and the other cases upon the same subject. They all agree that in order to render the owner answerable for cargo lost, it is not sufficient to show that the contract for transporting it was made by the master; but the party claiming remuneration must go further, and show that the owner had given authority to the master to make such a contract. His appointment as master, does not, of itself, upon the principles of the common law, confer the authority.

In this case, the brig was consigned to Carreras, Patrick & Butler, at Montevideo, with directions to employ her, if they thought it proper to do so, in a voyage to some other foreign port; and they were instructed, if they did so employ her, to consign her to their friends, and to remit the freight, if any was earned, to the owners at Baltimore. It is in proof, therefore, that no authority was given, or intended to be given, by the owners, to the master, to charter the brig, nor to receive any goods or freight, except under the direction of the consignees or their agents; on the contrary, he was carefully excluded from all such authority by the owners, and confined to the duty of navigating the vessel, as master, upon the voyages determined upon by the proper agents. When Dickinson, Price & Co. refused to execute the contract made with the consignees, it was the duty of the master to notify them of what had happened, and to wait their orders; he had no right, according to the rules of the common law, in relation to principal and agent, or master and servant, to enter into the contract under which the voyage in question was performed; it was not within the scope of the authority conferred on him, and was not binding on the owners or their friends.

But assuming this contract to be obligatory upon the owners, upon common law principles, is there any ground for measuring the extent of their liability by its rules, founded on the ancient customs of England? The contract was made in Chili; the cargo was laden there; it was to be transported on the high seas to England, where it was to be delivered. Now, there can be no pretence for saying, that the principles of the common law, in relation to carriers for hire, prevail in Chili; and it is equally certain, that, upon a contract of this description, these ancient rules are no longer the law of England. Since the statute of 53 Geo. III., it does not bind the owners beyond the value of the ship and freight. The words of the statute are abundantly plain; and the cases of Wilson v. Dickson, 2 Barn. & Ald. 2, and Cannan v. Meaburn, 1 Bing. 465, show how that statute has been expounded and applied in the common law courts. If the master had sold the whole of this cargo at Pernambuco, instead of hypothecating it, the owners would not have been answerable beyond the value of the ship and freight. In the country, therefore, where the contract was made, and in the country where it was to be finally executed, the rights and obligations of the parties did not depend upon the doctrines of the common law, in relation to carriers for hire. Upon what ground, then, can the court apply them here?

The ancient common law, in relation to carriers for hire, is, undoubtedly, in force in Maryland; but there is no principle of jurisprudence upon which the court can expound this contract by the laws of this state. It was not made here; and no part of it was to be performed within our territory. The shipowners, it is true, reside here; but the law of the domicil of the party does not govern the contract, nor determine his rights or obligations; they depend upon the law of the place where it was made, or where it was to be executed. In this case, the law of neither the one nor the other furnishes any ground for charging these defendants, according to the rules of the common law, in relation to carriers for hire; that law, therefore, cannot give the rule by which this court should decide the rights of the parties.

Undoubtedly, the master had a right to make this contract, under the circumstances in which he was placed, and the owners were bound by it; but this right is derived from the maritime code, which is founded in the general usages and convenience of trade, and which has been adopted, to a certain extent, by all commercial nations. The bill of lading (the contract on which this suit is brought) is an instrument founded on the usages of trade, and not connected with any of the peculiar doctrines of the common law. We must look, therefore, to the maritime code, as acknowledged and administered in this country, in order to expound this contract, and to determine the extent of the obligations it imposed upon the owners.

It is stated in Abb. Shipp. (Story's Ed. 1829), 90–93, that a charter-party, made by a master in a foreign port, in the usual course of the ship's employment, and under circumstances which do not afford evidence of fraud, binds the ship and freight; and therefore, to the amount of the value of the ship and freight, the owners are, by the maritime law, bound to the performance; and the same doctrine is laid down in 3 Kent, Comm. (3d Ed.) 162. At the time then that the vessel sailed for Swansea, where the ore had to be delivered, the ship and freight were bound for the performance of the contract into which the master had entered. It is not suggested, that anything happened before the arrival of the vessel at Pernambuco, which would render either the ship, or freight, or owners, answerable for the loss sustained by the cargo. The damage sustained in the voyage round Cape Horn was occasioned by the dangers of the seas, which made it necessary, for the safety and interest of all concerned, that the vessel should put into Pernambuco; and if the ship-owners are responsible for the cargo, their liability must arise from something that was done by the master at this port. Upon the arrival at Pernambuco, it was found, that the vessel was damaged to such an extent, that she was unable to proceed on her voyage, and the cargo was landed; under these circumstances, from the necessity of the case, the master became the agent for the cargo as well as the ship, and in that character, it was his duty to deal with the cargo as a prudent and discreet owner would have done, if he had been on the spot at the time. He might transship it, and earn freight for his owners. If his own ship could be repaired in a reasonable time, he had a right to retain it until his ship was ready; and, if necessary, might sell a part of the cargo, or hypothecate the whole, in order to obtain money for the necessary expenses of repairs; or he might abandon the voyage, and notify the owners of the cargo of the disaster which had happened, and await their orders as to its future disposition—so far as to his power over the cargo.

Now as to the ship—upon this point, the law has been laid down by the supreme court, in the case of The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 102, 106, and it is unnecessary, therefore, to multiply cases upon the subject. The master may, in a foreign port, contract for repairs and supplies, and thereby bind the owners to the value of the ship and freight, or he may hypothecate the ship and freight, and thereby create a direct lien upon them for the security of the creditors. But the authority of the master is limited to objects connected with the voyage, and if he transcends the prescribed limits, his acts become, in legal contemplation, mere nullities; and it is incumbent on the creditor to prove the actual existence of the necessity of those things which give rise to the demand. In the case of The Virgin, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 538, it was held, that the master could not pledge the personal credit of the owners, at the same time that he gave a bottomry on the ship; that if the bottomry-bond contained a clause to that effect, it would be void, and the owners be personally bound only to the extent of the pledged fund which actually came to their hands.

In the case before us, then, the master had a right to pledge the ship and freight, in which case, the owners are answerable no further than the amount of the pledged fund which comes to their hands; or he might have pledged the personal responsibility of the owners to the value of the ship and freight, in which case, if the ship had been lost on the voyage, they would have been responsible to that amount.

This is the extent of the authority which the law gives to the master, in a foreign port, and if he exceeds it, his acts are void. If, therefore, in this case, the master had pledged to the bottomry-lender, the personal responsibility of the owners, to the value of the ship and freight, and cargo also, the pledge, as respects the value of the cargo, would have been void, and without lawful authority, and the owners not responsible. Can he then, by pledging to the bottomry-lender the cargo, enlarge his authority in relation to the personal responsibility of the ship-owner, and indirectly bind him, not only for the value of the ship and freight, but for the value of the cargo also? The limitations upon the power of the master so carefully stated by the supreme court, are utterly nugatory, if by this circuitous mode, he is permitted to do what he cannot do directly; and by hypothecating the cargo, exercise a power over the fortunes of his owners to an unlimited extent. We think it cannot be done; and that the value of the ship and freight only were bound, so far as the ship-owners were concerned; and as no part of that fund has come to their hands, they are not personally responsible, either directly or indirectly, for the repairs at Pernambuco.

We are not aware of any decision in England or in this country, upon the precise point now before the court. But in the case of The Gratitudine, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 257, Lord Stowell strongly intimates an opinion that, in a case like this, the ship-owner would not be responsible to the owner of the cargo; and in The Packet [Case No. 10,654], it appears, from the language of the court, that Judge Story also doubted the liability of the ship-owner.

The justice and sound policy of the rule which restricts the power of the master over the property and fortune of his owner, to the value of the ship intrusted to his command and the freight she may earn, is proved by its deliberate adoption by every commercial nation in Europe; and we should be very unwilling to establish a contrary principle in this country, unless very clear and decisive authorities compelled us to the decision. For it would place the American ship-owner in a far worse condition than his European rival, and compel him to hazard his whole fortune, however large, upon every distant voyage made by one of his ships. And as the evil could be cured only by the legislation of the states, different rules would perhaps be established in different places, and the mischief to commerce increased by conflicting laws in the several states.

The principles stated by Lord Hardwicke, in the case of Boucher v. Lawson, in relation to the liability of the owner, although restricted to much narrower limits than those now contended for, appear to have surprised the commercial community of Great Britain, since they immediately petitioned for, and obtained an act of parliament limiting the responsibility of the owner, in cases like that of Boucher v. Lawson, to the value of the ship and freight. And when it appeared, from the decision of the court of king's bench in the subsequent case of Sutton v. Mitchell, 1 Term R. 18, that the former act of parliament did not cover all cases of the loss of cargo, the ship-owners immediately petitioned for, and procured the passage of an act extending the restriction to other cases; and finally obtained the law 53 Geo. III. c. 159, which, in every case of loss of cargo, without the fault of the owner, limits his liability to the value of the ship and freight. Abb. Shipp. (Story's Ed. 1829) 264–268. The history of these acts of parliament, shows that in the two decisions above mentioned, the principles adopted by the court carried the responsibility of the ship-owner, in England, farther than it had been supposed to extend in the commercial world; and the limitations procured immediately afterwards by act of parliament, show the apprehensions which these decisions excited, and the general sense of the trading community, that the liability should have been restricted to the value of the ship and freight. We are satisfied that, at this day, this is the general understanding of those who are engaged in commerce, and that the contracts are always made by both parties under that impression; and there can be no necessity or propriety in pushing the liability beyond the bounds prescribed by the general usages and understanding of the commercial world.

There is another view of this case, in which it appears to be evidently unjust and inequitable for the plaintiffs, to charge these defendants for the loss of the cargo. The master has the power to pledge the ship and freight only in cases of necessity, that is to say, where it is necessary for the interest of the owner; or there is reasonable ground to believe it to be for his interest; and the lender on bottomry is bound to show the existence of this necessity, otherwise, he is not entitled to recover, even against the ship and freight. Now, it never can be necessary for the interest of the owner of the ship to place upon her repairs, which cost more than double the amount of what she is worth after the repairs are made. There may be cases in which it may be for the interest of the owner of the cargo to do so; because the cargo may be of great value at the port of destination, and of little or no value at the port of necessity; it may be perishable in its nature; it may appear to have been impossible to procure another vessel in time to save it; and it may be the interest of the owner of the cargo to have repairs made upon the ship far beyond her value, in order to enable her to transport his property to its place of destination. If there was any necessity which could have justified the enormous expenditure for repairs in this case, it must have been the necessities of the cargo, and not of the brig; for the repairs unavoidably sacrificed the vessel and freight, and nothing could be gained by them except for the cargo.

It is because it may sometimes be for the interest of the cargo to have the vessel repaired, that the power is given to the master to sell a part, or hypothecate the whole, if necessary, in order to raise funds for that purpose. But his power over the cargo is like his power over the ship in this respect; the lender must show that the necessity existed, otherwise he is not entitled to recover on his bond. Abb. Shipp. (Story's Ed. 1829) 129; 3 Kent, Comm. (1st Ed.) 133. Now in this case, although the cargo was not perishable, and although it does not appear that it could not have been transshipped at the same freight, and although the hypothecation has resulted most disastrously to the cargo as well as to the ship; yet, at Pernambuco, where the cargo must have been of very little value, and where very high calculations may have been formed of its value at Swansea, it may have been supposed that the interest of the owner of the cargo required that these extensive repairs should be made, in order to transport it to its port of destination.

If a discreet and prudent man, placed in the situation of the master, would have supposed so, then the hypothecation was lawful, and within the scope of his authority. Bad faith in this transaction is not imputed to him on either side; if he acted in good faith, and the interests of the cargo justified him in hypothecating the whole of it, there can be no good reason for charging the ship-owner with the unfortunate results of the contract made for the benefit of the owner of the cargo; but if, on the other hand, the interests of the cargo did not authorize the hypothecation, then the lender of the money obtained no lien upon it, since it was his duty to see that the necessity existed before he lent his money, and he was bound to prove its existence, if required to do so, to the satisfaction of the court, before he could enforce his lien. It appears from the evidence in this case, that the present plaintiffs stood by and saw the whole cargo sold, without appearing in the admiralty court to defend it, and without requiring from the lender any proof whatever of the necessity of the case. In either alternative, therefore, whether the necessity did or did not exist, it would be unreasonable and unjust to charge the ship-owner with the loss of the cargo arising from the hypothecation at Pernambuco; if justifiable, it was made for the benefit of the cargo, and at the sacrifice of the interests of the ship-owner; if not justifiable, it was lost by the negligence of the plaintiffs, to whom it was consigned, and who took no measures to protect it.

It is, perhaps, hardly necessary to remark particularly upon the opinion expressed by Mr. Benecke in his book on Average (page 253), that the ship-owner is personally liable for the value of the cargo in a case like the present. It is his inference from the various cases which have been cited in the present argument, and he refers to no case in which the point has been decided, nor even suggested that there is any established usage at Lloyd's upon this subject.

Upon the whole, we think that the master in this case had no right to pledge the ship-owner beyond the value of the ship and freight, and that the plaintiffs, therefore, are not entitled to recover.

NAZRO v. CRAGIN.

[3 Dill. 474.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. June 1, 1874.

COURTS—FEDERAL JURISDICTION—ATTACHMENT—ACT JUNE 1, 1872—MOTIONS—ERROR.

1. The provision in section 11 of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 78] that no civil suit shall be brought by original process in the federal court in any other district than that of which the defendant is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ, is not repealed by the bankrupt act, nor by section 6 of the act of June 1, 1872, in respect to the attachment of property. 17 Stat. 196.

[Cited in Anderson v. Shaffer, 10 Fed. 267; Boston Electric Co. v. Electric Gas-Lighting Co., 23 Fed. 839; Noyes v. Canada, 30 Fed. 666; Harland v. United Lines Tel. Co., 40 Fed. 311; Treadwell v. Seymour, 41 Fed. 581.]

2. Objection to the jurisdiction may be taken by motion, and is not waived by subsequently pleading to the merits.

[Cited in Abernathy v. Moore, 83 Mo. 69.]

3. Under the statute law of the state of Iowa, and the practice of the state courts therein, motions are parts of the record, and rulings thereon may be reviewed on error. Section 5 of the act of June 1, 1872, makes this practice applicable in the federal court on a writ of error to the district court, whose ruling on a motion to the jurisdiction may be reviewed.

[4. Cited in Howard v. American Dairy, etc., Co., Case No. 6,753, and cited in brief in Schollenberger v. 45 Foreign Ins. Cos., 5 Wkly. Notes Cas. 410, to the point that state legislation cannot confer jurisdiction upon the federal courts.]

[Alonzo] Cragin, as assignee in bankruptcy of Field & Field, bankrupts, brought an action at law in the district court of the United States for the district of Iowa (by which he was appointed such assignee), against John

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Nazro, a citizen of Wisconsin, to recover an alleged claim against him. The petition asked the auxiliary process of attachment against the property of the defendant, and contained the necessary averments under the laws of the state for that purpose. An attachment bond was filed and a writ of attachment issued, which was levied upon property of the defendant, found within the district of Iowa. The defendant was not found within the district of Iowa, nor was he a resident or citizen thereof, and no summons was served upon him therein. But the defendant, by his counsel, made a special appearance in the district court and filed a motion therein to dismiss the suit and all proceedings for want of jurisdiction of the court over his person and property. The court overruled the motion, to which the defendant excepted. The defendant thereupon answered the petition, and, subsequently, there was a trial resulting in a judgment in favor of the assignee. The defendant brought the cause into this court by writ of error.

Thos. Updegraff, for plaintiff in errror.

Shiras, Van Duzee & Henderson, for assignee.

MILLER, Circuit Justice (orally). The eleventh section of the judiciary act contains the provision that "no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he may be found at the time of serving the writ."

The jurisdiction of the district court over the defendant, who was neither a citizen of Iowa, nor found therein, cannot therefore be maintained unless by some subsequent act of congress repealing the above restriction. It is urged that jurisdiction in such cases is conferred by the bankrupt act. Undoubtedly this act does, in certain cases, confer jurisdiction by reason of the subject-matter and irrespective of the citizenship of the parties. But I can discover nothing in the act which gives to the assignee in bankruptcy the power to sue in the federal courts a non-resident of the state upon whom no personal service within it can be had. The restriction in the judiciary act, mentioned above, is not repealed by the provisions of the bankrupt act.

It is next urged that the jurisdiction asserted by the district court is conferred by section 6 of the act of June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 196). But in my judgment this is a mistaken notion of the design of this section. It does not repeal the limitation in the judiciary act. Prior to the legislation of 1872, just noticed, the federal courts had, by rule, generally adopted the state laws as respects attachments of property, but it was never supposed that jurisdiction could be exercised without personal service on the defendant, made within the district. The statute of 1872 adopts existing provisions of the state laws in this regard and gives the court power, by rule, to adopt provisions subsequently enacted by the states; but, in my opinion, it was not intended by congress to make the great change for which the assignee's counsel here contends. It would compel citizens of the Pacific coast to go to New York to defend their property which happened to be there and would give the great central cities vast power. I cannot but think that a change so radical would have been expressed by congress in unmistakable language. And this view is strengthened by the consideration that no publication is provided for by the section under consideration, while a subsequent section of the same act does provide for publication in respect to certain suits in equity.

The effect of this section in the act of 1872 is simply this: If the court has or can acquire jurisdiction over the defendant personally this section gives to the plaintiff the right to the auxiliary remedy by attachment, but it does not afford a means of acquiring jurisdiction.

Another question is this: Nazro appeared specially in the district court and by motion, instead of by plea, objected to the jurisdiction of the court. The objection was overruled. By the laws of the state and practice in the state court motions are part of the record. When the motion of the defendant to the jurisdiction was denied, he then answered and defended, and judgment went against him, to reverse which he brings this writ of error.

I am of opinion that, though a plea to the jurisdiction would have been more regular, yet, under section 5, of the act of June 1, 1872, the ruling of the district court on the motion is part of the record and may be reviewed here the same as if a plea to the jurisdiction had been overruled. I am also of opinion that the ruling on the motion to the jurisdiction was not waived by afterwards pleading to the merits, and that it is available to the defendant on error. Accordingly the judgment below must be reversed, and the district court directed to dismiss the proceedings. Judgment accordingly.

Case No. 10,063.

The NEAFFIE.

[1 Abb. U. S. 465.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April, 1870.

TOWAGE—COMMON CARRIER LIABILITY—INJURY TO TOW—FAULT OR NEGLECT OF TUG.

1. The owners of a steam-tug or tow-boat, engaged in the business of towing vessels from point to point, but not receiving the vessels or the property on board of them into their care or custody otherwise than is involved in the mere act of towage, are not liable as common carriers in respect of such employment.

2. To charge them for an injury to the tow, such injury must be shown to have resulted from some neglect or fault in the management of the tug.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.]

In admiralty.

N. H. Armstrong, for libelants.

Carleton Hunt, for claimants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The case was this: On May 28, 1866, the steam-tug Neaffie undertook to tow a flat or barge laden with hay from Jefferson City to the flat-boat wharf in the city of New Orleans—a distance of three or four miles. She made fast to the flat and towed her down the stream to said wharf, the master and crew of the flat remaining aboard of her. As she was about landing the flat, the latter collided with another flat made fast to the wharf. In a short time after the collision, the flat towed by the Neaffie sunk. The damage sustained by the sinking of the flat is agreed to be thirty-one hundred and fifty dollars.

The libelants charge that the sinking of the flat was in consequence of the collision, and that the collision was brought about by the carelessness of Cook, the master of the Neaffie; and in argument they allege that the Neaffie was a common carrier, and responsible for all damages to the flat not occasioned by the act of God or the public enemy.

The claimants answer, that when the Neaffie approached the flat for the purpose of towing down to the flat-boat wharf, they found her in a leaky condition, and refused to take her in tow except at the risk of her owners, to which the captain and part-owner of the flat assented. They deny any carelessness on the part of the master of the Neaffie, and deny that there was any collision whereby the flat was damaged; or that the sinking of the flat was the consequence of any damage received by her collision with the other flat lying at the wharf. They allege that the slight impingement of the one flat against the other was caused by a sudden eddy or boil in that part of the river.

In the view I have taken of this case, these are the only facts alleged on either side which it is necessary to recite. The naked fact that the flat of the libelants, while in tow of the Neaffie, did impinge upon the flat made fast to the wharf, and that in a very short time thereafter she sunk, raises a presumption of mismanagement and negligence on the part of the captain of the steam-tug, and fixes a liability for damages sustained upon her owners, unless contrary proof is adduced showing ordinary care and diligence. I have searched the testimony in this case in vain to find any act of carelessness or negligence on the part of the captain of the Neaffie. On the contrary, the proof shows, to state the result in the mildest form, reasonable care and diligence. No witness speaks of any act done or omitted showing want of skill or care on the part of the Neaffie.

Under this state of facts the Neaffie cannot be held liable for the damage suffered by the flat and cargo, unless she is made responsible as a common carrier. The business of the Neaffie, as the evidence shows, is to tow flats and other water craft from one point to another in and about the harbor of the city of New Orleans. The hire for her services varies according to the bargain made at the time the service is rendered.

A common carrier is often defined to be: "One who undertakes for hire to transport the goods of such as choose to employ him from point to point." This definition is very broad, and in its application to facts is subject to certain limitations. A better and more precise definition is, "One who offers to carry goods for any person between certain termini or on a certain route, and who is bound to carry for all who tender him goods and the price of carriage."

Was the Neaffie a common carrier under either of these definitions? Chief Justice Marshall, in Boyce v. Anderson, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 150, says: "The law applicable to common carriers is one of great rigor. Though to the extent to which it has been carried, and in cases to which it has been applied, we admit its necessity and its policy, we do not think it ought to be carried further or applied to new cases." So unless the case of steam-tugs towing boats and their cargoes can be brought strictly within the definition of common carriers, I am not disposed to apply to them the great rigor of the law applicable to common carriers.

Can it be said that the tug-boats plying in the harbor of New Orleans undertake to transport the goods found on the water craft which they take in tow? It appears to me that it is the boat in which the goods are put that undertakes to transport them. The tug only furnishes the motive power. It is like the case of the owner of a wagon laden with merchandise hiring another to hitch his horses to the wagon to draw it from one point to another, the owner of the wagon riding in it, and having charge of the goods. In such a case, could it be claimed with any show of reason that the owner of the team was a common carrier? The reason of the law which imposes upon the common carrier such rigorous responsibility fails in such a case.

The tug-boats plying in New Orleans harbor do not receive the property into their custody, nor do they exercise any control over it other than such as results from the towing of the boat in which it is laden. They neither employ the master and hands of the boat towed, nor do they exercise any authority over them beyond that of occasionally requiring their aid in governing the flotilla.

The boat, goods and other property remain in charge and care of the master and hands of the boat towed. In case of loss by fire or robbery, without any actual default on the part of the master or crew of the tow-boat, it can be hardly contended they would be answerable, and yet carriers would be answerable for such loss.

That tow-boats are not common carriers has been held in the following cases: Caton v. Rumney, 13 Wend. 387; Alexander v. Greene, 3 Hill, 9; Wells v. Steam Nav. Co., 2 Comst. [2 N. Y.] 204; Pennsylvania, D. & Md. Steam Nav. Co. v. Dandridge, 8 Gill & J. 248; Leonard v. Hendrickson, 18 Pa. St. 40.

In Vanderslice v. The Superior [Case No. 16,843], Mr. Justice Kane held a steam tow-boat liable as a common carrier; but when the case came before the circuit court, Mr. Justice Grier said he could not assent to the doctrine.

I am aware that a contrary doctrine has been applied by the supreme court of Louisiana to steam-tugs towing between the city of New Orleans and the mouth of the Mississippi river. These tow-boats are distinguishable from those plying in the harbor of New Orleans; but if it were otherwise, I think the weight of authority and reason is with those who hold tow-boats not to be common carriers.

Holding, then, that the Neaffie was not a common carrier, and that she was bound only for ordinary diligence and care, and that the testimony shows such diligence and care on the part of the master of the Neaffie, it follows that the libel must be dismissed at the costs of the libelant. The cross libel of claimants, not being supported by any proof, is also dismissed. Libels dismissed.

NEAFIE et al. v. CHEESEBROUGH.

[14 Blatchf. 313.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Sept. 11, 1877.

REFERENCE—CONCLUSIVENESS OF REPORT—JUDGMENT ENTERED—NEW TRIAL.

An order of reference, made on consent, in an action at law, provided that the cause be referred to H. to hear and determine all the issues thereof, and that the report of the referee have the same effect as a judgment of the court, and that, on filing such report with the clerk of the court, judgment be entered in conformity therewith, "the same as if the cause had been tried before the court." On the report, judgment was entered for the defendant, for costs. The plaintiff moved for a stay of proceedings, under section 987 of the Revised Statutes, with a view of applying to the court to grant a new trial: Held, that the court had no power to grant a new trial.

Augustus C. Fransioli, for plaintiffs.

Frank E. Blackwell, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case comes before the court upon a motion for a stay of proceedings, after judgment entered. The case, which is an action at law, was referred by consent, and has been heard and determined by the referee. Upon the referee's report, judgment has been entered in favor of the defendant, for $155.80, costs. The plaintiffs desire to apply to the court to grant a new trial, and, for that purpose, now move for a stay of proceedings, under section 987 of the Revised Statutes. The defendant objects to the stay, upon the ground that the court has no power to grant a new trial after judgment entered upon the report of a referee, made upon such a consent as was given in this case.

The objection of the defendant appears to be well taken. The consent under which the reference was ordered, and to which the order of reference conforms, provides, that the cause be referred to Henry E. Howland, to hear and determine all the issues thereof, and that the report of the referee have the same effect as a judgment of the court. According to this consent and order, the decision of the referee, and not the decision of the judge, is to determine the judgment to be entered. That such a reference may be made has been expressly decided by the supreme court (Heckers v. Fowler, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 123); but I find no authority to grant a new trial after judgment has been duly entered upon the report of a referee authorized to hear and determine the cause.

It is supposed by the counsel for the plaintiffs that section 987 of the Revised Statutes confers upon the court the power to grant a new trial after judgment, in all cases when the trial is by the court, and he contends, that, inasmuch as, in this case, the consent and order of reference provide, that, on filing the report of the referee with the clerk of the court, judgment shall be entered in conformity therewith, "the same as if the cause had been tried before the court," therefore, the power to grant a new trial after judgment exists here, by virtue of section 987. But, this provision in the consent and order merely relates to the action of the clerk in entering judgment as of course, upon the referee's report, without application to the court. It does not change the character of the proceeding, nor make the trial other than a trial before a referee instead of the court. It cannot have the effect to bring the case within the scope of section 987, for, plainly, there has been neither a verdict nor a finding of the court upon the facts.

My conclusion being that the court has no power to grant a new trial, it follows that the stay asked for cannot be granted.

[1 McLean, 18.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Tennessee. June Term, 1829.[2]

COURTS — FEDERAL PRACTICE — FORCE OF STATE DECISIONS—DIFFERENT CONSTRUCTION BY SUPREME COURT.

1. The courts of the United States adopt as a rule of decision, the settled construction of the statutes of the state, by its supreme court.

2. But where the supreme court of the United States have maturely adopted such construction, and the state court afterwards gives a different construction of the same statute, it is deemed more respectful to the supreme court of the Union, for the circuit court to hold their decision as binding, until the question shall be reviewed in that court.

3. The rule adopted, however, requires the courts of the United States to follow, in the construction of statutes, the supreme court of the state.

[This was an action in ejectment by Henry Neal against Asa Green for possession of certain real estate.]

Mr. Washington, for plaintiff.
Craighead & Yerger, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The plaintiff has brought his action of ejectment to recover possession of a certain tract of 640 acres of land; and the defendant sets up the statute of limitations in bar of the action. The lessor of the plaintiff has shown a regular deduction of title from the patentee to himself; and the defendant exhibited a deed for the same land from Andrew Jackson to Dillon, and introduced evidence conducing to prove that persons claiming under and for Dillon, had held possession adverse to the plaintiff more than seven years before the commencement of the suit. To decide this case, a construction of the statute of limitations of 1815, of North Carolina, adopted by Tennessee, and one passed by Tennessee in 1797, must be given. The first statute provides "that no person or persons, or their heirs, which hereafter shall have any right or title to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, shall thereunto enter or make claim, but within seven years thereafter his, her or their right or title shall descend or accrue; and, in default thereof, such person or persons so not entering or making default, shall be utterly excluded and disabled from any entry or claim thereafter to be made." And also that "all possessions held without suing such claim as aforesaid, shall be a perpetual bar against all, and all manner of persons whatever, that the expectation of heirs may not in a short time leave much land unpossessed," &c. The act of 1797 provides that in order to settle the "true construction of the existing laws respecting seven years possession" "that in all cases wherever any person or persons shall have had seven years' peaceable possession of any land by virtue of a grant or deed of conveyance founded upon a grant, and no legal claim by suit in law shall be set up to said land within the above term, that then and in that case the person or persons so holding possession as aforesaid, shall be entitled to hold possession in preference to all other claimants," &c.

The question here is, whether as the defendant has failed to show that the deed under which he holds possession, is connected with a grant, he brings himself within the provisions of the statute. And the counsel for the plaintiff refers to the case of Patton v. Easton, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 446, and the case of Powell v. Harman, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 340, as conclusive of the question. The supreme court in the first case say, "it has been decided that a possession of seven years is a bar only when held under a grant or a deed founded on a grant." The deed must be connected with the grant. This court concurs in that opinion. A deed cannot be "founded on a grant" which gives a title not derived in law or equity from that grant; and the words founded on a grant are too important to be discarded. The decision of the case referred to in 2 Pet. 340, is in accordance with this one; and we think both decisions carry out and give effect to the intention of the legislature. Indeed, the language of the act of 1797, would seem to admit of no other construction. The important words "founded upon a grant," being used in connection with the deed, would seem to require proof of the grant, as well as of the deed, and that they should be connected by intermediate conveyances. But it is insisted that since the decisions of the supreme court under this statute, the supreme court of Tennessee have by several adjudications, settled the construction of these statutes, that it is not necessary to show a grant or a title connected with a grant, by a person who claims the benefit of the statute. That the statute only requires the party who sets up the statute as a bar, to show a deed for the land, and that it has been granted. This appears now to be the settled construction of the statute, and the supreme court of the United States must adopt it, under their rule to follow the construction of a state statute which has been given by the supreme court of the state. And, although in this instance it may require of the supreme court of the Union, to give a different construction of these statutes from what they have given in the cases cited; they must adhere to the rule.

It is important that there should be but one rule of property in a state, and if this rule depends upon the construction of a statute of the state, as in the present case, it must be adhered to by the supreme court of the United States, under all the modifications which may be given to it by the supreme court of the state. But, nowithstanding this view, we think it would be more respectful for this court to consider themselves bound by the construction which has been given to those statutes by the supreme court of the United States, in order that the case may be brought before that tribunal for another adjudication. We, therefore, instruct the jury that according to the present state of decision in the supreme court of the United States we cannot charge that defendant's title is made good by the statute of limitations.

[2] [Reversed in 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 291.]

The jury found the defendant guilty of the trespass and ejectment in the declaration stated, and a judgment was entered on the verdict.

A writ of error was brought on this judgment, and it was reversed on the ground above suggested. 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 291.

District Court, D. North Carolina. 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—REGISTRATION OF DEED OF ASSIGNMENT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Under the grant of power to frame "a uniform system of bankruptcy," congress has full authority to make such regulations in regard to the probate of deeds of assignment as it may deem best for carrying out the purposes of the law, without regard to the state laws regulating the registration of deeds.

2. Under the bankruptcy law of 1867 (section 14, cl. 61), a register of deeds in South Carolina must admit to probate a deed of assignment executed under the bankrupt law, upon a certificate of the clerk of the federal district court that the same is a copy of the assignment on file in his office, without requiring the same to be proved before a clerk of the superior court of the state, as required by the state laws.

[Cited in Taylor v. Irwin, 20 Fed. 617.]

By R. F. LEHMAN, Register:

I, R. F. Lehman, one of the registers of said court in bankruptcy, do hereby certify that in the course of the proceedings in said matter before me the following question arose pertinent to said proceedings, viz.: I had been notified by W. M. Pippin, the assignee of Charles E. Neale, bankrupt, that the probate judge of the county of Edgecombe refuses to admit to probate the assignment executed by me, under the 14th section of the United States bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 522)], to him, as assignee, upon the ground that the register must appear before a judge of probate and acknowledge his signature. This the register declines to do, for the reason that in his opinion this proceding is unnecessary, and the state officer is bound to admit the deed to probate without it. Section 14, general clause 46, provides that the register shall (where there is no opposing interest), by an instrument under his hand, convey to the assignee all the estate, real and personal, of the bankrupt. General clause 61 provides that the assignee shall, within six months, cause the assignment to him to be recorded in every registry of deeds or other office within the United States, where a conveyance of lands owned by the bankrupt ought by law to be recorded. The assignment of bankrupt's effects is an official act, conveying property held by a judicial officer of the United States in trust to an assignee under authority of an act of congress. The mode of assignment is such as to make it a record of the court. It is not the record of a state court requiring to be exemplified, under the act of congress of May 26th, 1790, but of a United States court, which authenticates itself. In the case of Pepoon v. Jenkins, 2 Johns. Cas. 119, a record of a court of the United States was offered in the supreme court of New York, and upon issue joined upon a plea of nul tiel record was held sufficient, though it was merely certified by the clerk as a copy under the seal of the court. In this case the deed is under the hand of the register and the seal of the court. Independently of the common law on the subject, under G. O. 54, even a certified copy under the seal of the court is conclusive,—a portion of the original. The assignment then is a record of the United States district court, is conclusive evidence in the form in which it now stands of the transfer of the bankrupt's assets in all courts, and should be ordered to be registered by the probate judge.

The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure in relation to the probate of deeds is clearly not intended to refer to official deeds of the officers of the courts. Nor, if it were so intended, is it conceived that the state could affect the operation of the bankrupt act. The registration of the assignment is clearly necessary to the proper working of the act. If the state could prescribe the nature of proof of its execution, it might make it so difficult as to practically be impossible. This is evident when it is considered that prior to the late amendments to the Code it would have been, if the view which is taken by the probate judge is correct, necessary for the register, in each case of an assignment which conveyed property in any county in the state, to go personally to that county and acknowledge the deed. I therefore cannot, as register, perform the superfluous act of acknowledging the deed. If the probate judge declines to admit the assignment to probate, his decision can be reviewed by a judge of the supreme court. It is therefore deemed unnecessary to intimate an opinion as to any remedy which may be had in the premises through the United States authorities, but the delay consequent upon a proceeding before the state courts might prevent the due registration of this deed within the six months. It is therefore conceived that an order might issue directly from the district judge to the probate judge of said county, commanding him to do what the law requires.

BROOKS, District Judge. The question presented by the certificate of Mr. Register Lehman in this case is whether the deed of assignment executed to the assignee by the register (there being no opposing interest), and the same duly certified by the clerk under the seal of the court, should be proved before a clerk of the superior court, and be by him certified, and ordered to be registered according to the provisions of the law of North Carolina in relation to deeds executed by private parties, before the same can be registered. I have examined carefully the reasons assigned by the register for the opinion expressed by him, and fully concur in both his reasoning and conclusion. I have no doubt but that congress of the United States has full power, in framing "a uniform system of bankruptcy," to adopt such provisions as it may think proper in regard to the probate of any deed or assignment that may become necessary in carrying out the purposes of the law. Much importance should be attached to that expression "uniform system through the United States." All of the states, I believe, have their bankrupt or insolvent laws; but these are not respected beyond the limits of the state passing such law, and the reason why they are not respected beyond the limits of the state passing them is that there is no uniformity in the system of the state bankrupt laws; many of them resembling each other in many respects, no two alike in every respect, hence no two with the same system. It could not properly be contended that congress, under the power expressly delegated by the constitution, could pass one system of bankruptcy laws to be in force in one state, and altogether another and a different system to be in force in another state. Indeed, if there were any essential differences, it would not conform to that important requirement. It would not be "a uniform system." The contrary might possibly be contended for if the power to pass a bankrupt law by congress was claimed as a constructive or implied right. But, when the power is expressly given, it excludes any implied power, and, when a particular system is prescribed, it effectually excludes any other system than the one provided. Then the only system of bankruptcy laws which congress has the power to pass is a uniform one, —one which requires the same acts and same duties from the officers appointed to execute the law in all the states, and producing the same general results in all the states, without regard to the important differences existing in the laws of the different states.

If, in preparing and passing the present system of bankrupt laws, congress has omited to make any provision in regard to executing and registering the conveyances or assignments required, I would readily hold that the state laws should be conformed to. If I am not altogether wrong in the views I have expressed, then the only question remaining to be considered is whether the bankruptcy act prescribes the forms to be observed in executing and preparing this instrument (the assignment) "to be recorded in every county or registry in the United States in which lands of the bankrupt are situate." I think the act already so provides. The object in requiring the assignment to be recorded is not to vest a title in the assignee, for he has title, though the assignment might never be recorded. The assignee may use it as evidence of his title in the courts, though the same may not have been registered. In this an assignment under the provisions of the bankruptcy act is essentially different from a deed or assignment (though absolute) made under the provisions of the laws of North Carolina. Under the latter, registration is necessary to the perfecting the title, though the deed be absolute. But the purpose in requiring the assignee to "cause the assignment to be recorded in every county or registry in the United States in which lands of the bankrupt are situate" is that every purchaser of land at an assignee's sale may have recourse to a certified copy from such registry, as a link in his claim of title in any suit he may bring for the possession, or in any suit in respect to the property which he, or his heirs, or others claiming under him, may desire to bring thereafter. Registration is necessary for the safety of such purchaser, for there is but one original assignment, which is filed in the district court clerk's office. It might be destroyed or lost, and often most inconvenient to have recourse to. Where this law is observed the loss of the original would work no damage, or work inconvenience to the purchaser or any other claiming under him, for they have recourse to a "certified copy" from the registry convenient, and which the act declares "shall be evidence thereof in all courts." It seems to me that any other conclusion would not be sustained by the language or the clear meaning of the act. In the 1st paragraph of the 14th section, after providing that the assignment shall be made by the judge or register, we find the following: "And thereupon by operation of law the title to all such property and estate, both real and personal, shall vest in the assignee." There is nothing preceding this language in regard to registration. Then what do we find subsequently in the same section to sustain the view that registration is not necessary to perfect the title of the assignee, and also that there is no other probate contemplated as necessary than the attestation of the clerk and affixing his seal of office. That this means the clerk of the district court of the United States there can scarcely be room for doubt. After declaring that the assignee may sue for and recover the estate, prosecute and defend all suits in which the bankrupt may be a party, we find the following: "And a copy duly certified by the clerk of the court under the seal thereof of the assignment made by the judge or the register (as the case may be) to him as assignee, shall be conclusive evidence of his title as such assignee to take, hold, sue for, and recover the property of the bankrupt." And to show further that no other proof or probate of the assignment appears to have been made in this case is necessary, I refer to the language of that paragraph of the 14th section which relates directly to registering the assignment. It is as follows: "And shall within six months cause the assignment to him to be recorded in every registry of deeds," &c. If the law had contemplated proof as required by the state laws, is it not most likely the words proved and recorded would have been used?

My opinion is that such assignment does not require to be proved before a clerk of the superior court, or his certificate, to prepare it for registration, but that registers of deeds must record the same upon a certificate of the clerk of the district court that the same is a copy of the assignment on file in his office, with his seal affixed, upon demand that same shall be recorded, and a tender to him of the fees allowed him for such service by the laws of the state. Let this be certified to Mr. Register Lehman.

Trespass, for assault and battery, and false imprisonment.

Mr. Peacock, for plaintiff, produced Richard Spaulding, to prove that the plaintiff was arrested and confined in prison upon a ca. sa. issued by the defendant as a justice of the peace for Washington county, on the 28th of March, 1801, on a judgment rendered by Amariah Frost, a justice of the peace of Prince George's county, on the 24th of September, 1800. The witness objected to being sworn because he was the constable who served the ca. sa., and also the jailor who kept the plaintiff in confinement, and his testimony would criminate himself.

THE COURT refused to compel him to be sworn.

BANKS AND BANKING — PRIVATE INSTITUTION — LIEN ON STOCK.

The private banking institution, known by the name of the Union Bank of Alexandria, had not, before it obtained its charter, any specific lien on the stock of its stockholders.

This was a special action upon the case, brought by the plaintiffs [Christopher Neale and others] as assignees of Gerrard Plummer, survivor of the firm of Jerome & Gerrard Plummer, against the defendant [John Janney], as president of the Union Bank of Alexandria, for not transferring to the plaintiff 600 shares of the stock of that bank, which J. and G. Plummer had assigned to him in trust to secure payment of 2,000 dollars loaned to them by the bank, the plaintiffs having tendered that sum in full to the defendant as president of the bank, who refused to transfer the stock because the Plummers were indebted upon other notes discounted by the bank for their accommodation. The assignment to the defendant was made on the 31st of May, 1816. The note which was secured by it fell due on the 21st–24th January, 1817. Jerome Plummer died on the 31st of December, 1816. The assignment by Gerrard, the survivor, was made by a deed of trust duly executed, acknowledged, and recorded, dated the 8th of January, 1817. The tender of the 2,000 dollars by the plaintiffs to the defendant was on the 8th of February, 1817, before which day the other notes which had been discounted by the bank for the accommodation of the Plummers, to the amount of 5,500 dollars, had become payable and were unpaid. The charter was granted March 3d, 1817. By the 4th article of the association, it was declared that, "every stockholder may sell and transfer his stock in the said bank, or any part thereof, at his pleasure, not being less than one complete share or shares, the transfer being made in the bank books in the presence and with the approbation of the proprietor or his lawful attorney." The assignment to the plaintiffs was not made on the books of the bank, but was contained in a general deed of assignment of all the effects of the firm of Jerome & Gerrard Plummer. By the 11th section of the act of congress of the 3d of March, 1817 (3 Stat. 383), which incorporated the bank, it is enacted that the shares shall be transferable only on the books of the bank; but all debts actually due and payable to the bank (days of grace for payment being passed), by a stockholder requesting a transfer, must be satisfied before such transfer shall be made, until the president and directors shall direct to the contrary.

These facts being found by a special verdict, the case was argued by Mr. Taylor, for plaintiffs, and Mr. Swann, for defendant.

THE COURT at November term, 1820 (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), rendered judgment on the special verdict for the plaintiff, observing that the rights of all the parties were fixed before the charter, and that until the charter the bank had no general lien on the stock of individual stockholders.

gard the act of limitations, as it was not specially pleaded.

Mr. Simms, for defendant, contended that this act differs from common acts of limitation in that it was imperative to the jury. The seventh section enacts that all actions or suits founded upon any account for goods, wares, and merchandise, "sold and delivered, or for articles charged in any store account, shall be commenced and sued within one year next after the cause of such action or suit, or the delivery of such goods, &c. and not after." The ninth section declares, that "to prevent any doubt in the construction hereof, it is hereby declared, that the before mentioned limitation of one year, shall take place and be computed from the respective dates or times of delivery of the several articles entered or charged in any such account; and that all such articles as shall have been of more than one year's standing when the action or suit was commenced, shall be disallowed and rejected, and verdict shall be given, or judgment rendered for no more than the amount of such articles as appear to have been actually charged or delivered within one year next before the commencement of the suit as aforesaid."

But THE COURT decided that the time was not put in issue by the plea of non assumpsit; and the jury were only to try the issue joined, and so instructed the jury.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF DEBT—HOW AUTHENTICATED—NOTARIAL SEAL—PROOF TAKEN BEFORE ATTORNEY FOR CREDITOR—COSTS—FEES TO NOTARIES.

1. A proof of debt taken before a notary public is not admissible unless authenticated by the official seal as well as the signature of the notary. It must appear from the impression of the seal, that it is the seal of the notary who employs it to authenticate his acts.

[Cited in Re Port Huron Dry Dock Co., Case No. 11,293. Disapproved in Re Phillips, Id. 11,098.]

2. Proofs of debt taken before the attorney of the creditor are not admissible.

3. No fees are taxable as costs in the bankruptcy proceedings and entitled to priority of payment, under section 28 [of the act of 1867 (14 Stat. 530)], to notaries for taking proofs of debt.

[In the matter of Henry Nebe, a bankrupt.]

The register certified that a deposition taken before W. M. Lillibridge, a notary public, was offered as a proof of debt due A. G. Ellair & Co. The form of the jurat is: "Subscribed and sworn before me this 26th day of October, A. D. 1874. W. M. Lillibridge, notary public, Wayne county, Michigan." Below the signature is an impression on the paper, in the usual form of an official seal, containing the words "Notary public, Wayne county, state of Michigan." It not appearing that this was the official seal of the notary, and it being conceded that it was used in common by him and other notaries; and it appearing also that the notary was the attorney of the creditor, the register declined to accept it as satisfactory, and therefore certified the questions arising upon it into court for determination by the district judge.

By HOVEY K. CLARKE, Register: The act amending the bankrupt act of June 22, 1874, § 20 [18 Stat. 186], authorizes notaries public to take proofs of debt against the estate of a bankrupt—"such proof to be certified by the notary, and attested by his signature and official seal." On this provision several questions of practice arise, which ought to receive an authoritative determination.

First. The statute requires the act of the notary to be authenticated by his signature and his official seal. There is nothing from which it can be inferred that one of these is of less importance than the other, and therefore an authentication by either would be imperfect without the other. But what is an "official seal"? A seal at common law was an impression upon wax. By statute in this state, and by statute or usage in many others, a scroll made with a pen will serve the purpose of a private seal. But this, so far as I know, has never been extended to corporate, or official seals. As regards these, it has required no little litigation to settle the question that an impression on wax is unnecessary; but all the cases hold that an impression on paper is indispensable. But an impression of what? Public seals—and a notary's seal is a public seal—are held to prove themselves. Is any stamp which a notary chooses to affix to his signature entitled to recognition as his official seal? Such a construction strikes me as a burlesque upon the provisions of the act of congress, which makes both signature and seal necessary to the authentication of the notary's act. And if as a public seal it proves itself, must it not show on its face what it is that it proves; not only that it is a seal, but that it is the seal of a notary public; and in order to show that it is the seal of the notary who employs it, that it must bear his name. If it be admitted that the seal in this case is the seal of a notary public, it is just as clearly the seal of every other of the notaries public, in number about one thousand, who hold office in the county of Wayne; and what then becomes of the provisions of the law which require the notary's act to be attested by "his official seal"? In the case of Gage v. Dubuque & P. R. Co., 11 Iowa, 314, the court holds "that unless the name of a notary public and the state in which he acts are engraved upon his seal so that an impression can be made therefrom, his seal would not be received as evidence." This was held to render invalid a seal where a part only of it was written and not impressed upon the paper. The court says in addition: "If a portion of the words necessary to be used in the body of the seal may be written, the whole may be." I do not see how this rule can be departed from, without introducing a laxity in practice which will defeat entirely the object contemplated by the statute, which requires a notary's act to be authenticated "by his official seal."

Second. Accompanying the proof of debt in this case, is a letter of attorney addressed by the creditors to the notary who took the deposition, authorizing him to represent them at all creditors' meetings. It thus appears that the creditor made his proof of debt before his own attorney. In many courts, how extensively I am not prepared to say, an affidavit taken before the attorney of the party will not be allowed to be read. Proofs of debt in bankruptcy are something more than mere affidavits; the law requires that such a proof must be "satisfactory" to the officer who takes it (section 22) as well as to the register who receives it. Section 3, Act July 27, 1868 [15 Stat. 228]. When it is remembered how large a proportion of clients swear to whatever they are advised by their attorneys is proper, and how general is the want of information by creditors as to what is necessary to be averred in a proof of debt, it will certainly, I think, be found unwise to allow creditors to prove their claims before their own attorneys. The fact that the power is given by the act to notaries without exception, is no valid reason why the courts should not prescribe such limitations as are obviously proper. A notary, who is a member of a partnership, would not be allowed to take the proof of a debt due to his firm sworn to by his partner; and there is really less objection to this, so far as an intelligent understanding of the act by the creditor and the officer is concerned, than there would be to a proof taken before the attorney of the party.

Third. There is still another question, which has become a practical one, relative to proofs of debts taken before notaries. General order 30 provides that fees paid by creditors in establishing their debts, are entitled to priority of payment under section 28 of the bankrupt act; and the question is, what sum shall be allowed to creditors for fees for taking proofs of debt by notaries. The fees of commissioners for this service are fixed by law; the fees of registers are fixed by law and general order 30. No fee is fixed either by law or the general orders for this service when rendered by a notary. The inference must be that no fee can be allowed to notaries unless some such general principle as this is applicable to the case, namely: that where an officer is authorized to perform a service, and no fee is specifically provided for his compensation, he may charge what he thinks the service worth, or what other officers are allowed to charge for a similar service. It is not to be denied that this view of the law finds many advocates among officers who are required to render service for which no specific compensation is provided; and it has, at least, a plausible show of justice in it. There are many services which a register, for instance, is required to render, and which are strictly clerical in their character—such as keeping dockets and filing papers—for which no fee has ever been allowed to him, with the single exception of filing proofs of debt, and the making of necessary copies of papers to be furnished to assignees, for which no fee has been allowed since the amendment of the general orders at the December term, 1871. To allow a compensation for these at the rate allowed to the clerk for similar services, on the ground that "congress never intended" that they should be performed gratuitously, would greatly increase, it is true, the income of registers; but it would do it at the expense of an abandonment of all definite rules for the taxation of these fees, and leave the compensation for a large class of services to be regulated entirely by the discretion of the officers rendering them. I cannot think that such a principle as this will find favor with the courts; and, therefore, that no fees can be allowed against a bankrupt's estate not expressly authorized by the bankrupt act, or the general orders of the supreme court.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The foregoing conclusions of the register are approved.

BANKRUPTCY—COMPOSITION REFUSED BY CREDITOR—JUDGMENT IN STATE COURT—INJUNCTION TO STAY PROCEEDINGS.

1. N. was adjudged a bankrupt in February, 1875. He was sued for a debt in a state court, in December, 1875. A composition including said debt was confirmed in March, 1876. The creditor proved said debt in the composition proceedings. He claimed that the debt was created by fraud and was not affected by the composition proceedings. The composition was payable in three instalments, the last one in September, 1876. The cash payment, and the notes, under the composition, were tendered to said creditor and refused. On the application of N., the entire amount of the composition for said creditor, in money, was deposited in this court, January 2d, 1877. N. had never obtained from this court any order staying the proceedings in the suit. Judgment was entered in it in December, 1876. After January 2d, 1877, N. applied to the state court for leave to set up the composition as a defence, but the application was refused. N. then applied to this court to enjoin said creditor from interfering with the property of N. for the indebtedness on the judgment: Held, that this court had no power to issue such injunction.

2. The practice of the court of bankruptcy in England, in such a case, considered.

[In the matter of Isaac Nebenzahl and Montague S. Marks, bankrupts.]

James Dunne, for bankrupts.

Thomas M. North, for creditor.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The bankrupts, after the lapse of the full time provided by the terms of a composition confirmed by this court in these proceedings, for it to be carried out, apply to this court to enjoin a creditor from prosecuting a suit against them in a state court, to recover a debt, the amount of which was set forth, with the name and address of such creditor, in the statement filed in the composition proceedings. The creditor claims that the debt was created by fraud, and is not affected by the composition proceedings. The adjudication of bankruptcy was in February, 1875. The suit in the state court was brought in December, 1875. The compensation was fifteen cents on the dollar, and was confirmed in March, 1876. The creditor proved his debt in the composition proceedings. The composition was payable in three equal instalments, the last one in September, 1876. A cash payment of one instalment, and two notes for the other two instalments, according to the resolution of composition, were tendered to the creditor and refused. On the 26th of December, 1876, this court, on the application of the bankrupts, made an order that they deposit with the clerk of this court the amount of the fifteen cents on the dollar, which would be the payment to such creditor according to the terms of the composition. This was due on the 2d of January, 1877. The bankrupts never obtained from this court any order staying proceedings in the suit in the state court. A trial of the suit in the state court was had by default, on the 11th of December, 1876, and judgment therein was entered against the bankrupts, on the 14th of December, 1876, for $1,343.99. Subsequently, and after the 2d of January, 1877, the bankrupts applied to the state court to set aside the judgment, and allow them to file a supplemental answer, setting up as a defence the proceedings in composition, and have a new trial, but the application was refused. Thereupon this application is made by the bankrupts to this court, for an injunction to restrain the creditor perpetually from molesting or interfering with the bankrupts or their property, for or on account of said indebtedness, or said judgment.

The principles properly applicable to a case in the situation of the present one were defined by this court in Re Hinsdale [Case No. 6,526]. Under those principles no injunction can be granted herein.

It is urged, that a different rule ought to be applied to this case, where the bankrupts put in their answer in the suit in the state court before the composition proceedings had assumed such a shape that the composition could be set up in the answer as a defence, and where they were obliged to apply for leave to put in a supplemental answer, setting up the composition and its fulfilment, from that which would be applied to a case where the bankrupt could avail himself of the composition proceedings in his original answer. But, in the present case, the suit was not brought until ten months after the adjudication of bankruptcy, and there was abundant time for the bankrupts to obtain, before putting in an answer in the suit, the injunction of this court staying the suit until the question of their discharge should be determined. Moreover, the composition proceedings were instituted in February, 1876, and the suit did not come up in the state court for trial until December, 1876, and there was abundant time, during those ten months, for the bankrupts to obtain from this court a stay of the suit because of the pendency of the composition proceedings.

The question of the power of this court to issue an injunction in such a case as the present one, under the clause of the composition statute which gives the court power, on motion made in a summary manner, to enforce the provisions of a composition, was discussed in Re Hinsdale [supra], and the conclusion arrived at was that no such power exists. The practice of the English court of bankruptcy is invoked. Section 126 of the English bankruptcy act of August 9, 1869, (32 & 33 Vict., c. 71), contains a like clause with our own statute, as to enforcing the provisions of a composition. But it is not under that clause that the English bankruptcy court enjoins suits after the time for fulfilling a composition has passed. It is under another provision of the English statute. Section 13 of the said act of August 9, 1869, provides, that the bankruptcy court "may, at any time after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against the debtor, restrain further proceedings in any action, suit, execution, or other legal process against the debtor, in respect of any debt provable in bankruptcy, or it may allow such proceedings, whether in progress at the commencement of the bankruptcy, or commenced during its continuance, to proceed upon such terms as the court may think just." Rule 260 of the English bankruptcy rules of 1870 contains the same provision. It is on these provisions that the power of the English bankruptcy court is founded, to enjoin suits in other courts, and not on the power given to it to "enforce" the provisions of a composition. See Ex parte Baum, 9 Ch. App. 673; Ex parte Lopez, 5 Ch. Div. 65. There is no like provision in our own statute. On the contrary, from the restriction imposed by section 5106 on the power of the bankruptcy court to enjoin suits to recover debts, namely, that the stay is to continue until that court shall determine the question of discharge, the conclusion, by analogy, follows, that where there is a stay granted because of, and pending, a composition, it is to continue only until the time when the debtor shall have had a full opportunity to carry out the composition according to its terms, or until the court refuses to confirm it. Of course, after that time no injunction should be granted. In this case the bankrupts have had a full opportunity to carry out their composition, according to its terms, in respect to this creditor. If the state court will not allow them to file a supplemental answer, setting up the composition in defence, the result, if not due to their fault and laches, is a misfortune which this court cannot remedy. The state court was either right or wrong in its decision. If right, no wrong has been done. If wrong, relief must be sought in the way, if any, provided by the state laws. The application is refused.

COLLISION—VESSEL LYING AT PIER.

Where a steamship was coming into pier 37, in the East river, in the harbor of New York, in tow of a tug, and, by the order of the pilot of the steamship, a movement of the tug was made which caused the steamship to swing against a schooner lying at the end of pier 39, so as to crush in a canal boat which lay between the schooner and the end of that pier, held, that it was the duty of the steamship to come in at pier 37 so as to avoid touching the vessels at pier 39, and that she was responsible for the damage.

In admiralty.

Benedict & Benedict, for libellants.

Owen, Nash & Gray, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. These are two actions, which were tried together, brought by the owners of the canal-boat Sarah Ball, and the owners of certain cargo on board that boat, to recover the damages sustained by the respective libellants in a collision which occurred at pier No. 39, in this harbor, on the 20th day of November, 1867. There is little or no dispute as to the facts, which are as follows: The canal-boat lay at the end of pier No. 39, inside of a schooner, being there engaged in delivering her cargo of coal. The place was a proper place for her to lie; she was properly moored, and the evidence fails to show any fault on her part conducing to the accident which ensued. The steamer was bound to pier No. 37, in tow of a tug upon a hawser. When she was turning in the river, and as she was passing the pier at which the canal-boat and schooner lay, the tide being flood, an order was given by the pilot of the steamer to the tug, which had stopped her engine for a short time, to go ahead. Thereupon the tug started up, and by her action hauled the bow of the steamer somewhat into the river, thereby causing the steamer's stern to swing in shore, and thereby the steamer's starboard quarter, as she passed, came down upon the schooner with force enough to crush the canal-boat inside. The only question discussed by the claimant was, whether the tug should not be the party held liable, inasmuch as her action caused the steamer to swing in upon the vessels at the pier. But the evidence fails to show that the tug disobeyed any order given by the persons in charge of the steamer, under whose direction she was, while it does appear that, as the steamer was handled, she would, without the action of the tug, have touched the schooner, although it may be that she would in that case have done no damage. It was the duty of the steamer, having full control of herself and of the tug, to come into her pier, No. 37, in such a way as to avoid touching the vessels at pier No. 39. The evidence fails to show any excuse for not doing so; and it is evident that the master of the steamer did not consider the action of the tug to have been such as to excuse the steamer, from the fact which he himself states, that after the accident occurred, he went round to the schooner, inquired as to the damage done to her, and sent a man to repair it. This fact, together with the further circumstances that the answer does not allude to any fault or action of the tug as a cause of the collision, are decisive of the case. The decree must be for libellants, with an order of reference to ascertain the amount.

[NOTE. Upon the coming in of the commissioner's report, exceptions were filed to the amount of damages allowed the owners of the Sarah Ball. The exceptions were overruled. Case No. 10,076.]

The case is now heard upon exceptions to the commissioners' report as to the amount of damages allowed to the owners of the Sarah Ball.]

Benedict & Benedict, for libellant.

Owen, Nash & Gray, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case comes before the court upon exceptions to the commissioner's report of the amount of damages sustained by the libellant, by reason of the sinking of his canal boat, the "Sarah Ball," in the collision with the Nebraska.

The boat when sunk was lying at the end of a pier in the harbor of New York, and had on board a cargo of coal. Where the vessel sunk the water was about 30 feet deep, and it was not possible to ascertain the extent of her injuries as she lay upon the bottom, but it was manifestly possible to raise her. A contract was accordingly made with a wrecking company to raise her for $500, and she was thereupon raised and placed upon ways and examined. She was then found to be so much injured that the cost of repairing would exceed her value when repaired, whereupon she was sold at auction for $100.

The commissioner allowed the value of the vessel previous to the collision, (as a total loss,) less the proceeds of her sale, and in addition the expenses of raising her and placing her upon the ways.

To this report the only serious objection taken relates to the allowance of the expenses of raising the vessel, and placing her upon the ways, and it is insisted, on the part of the claimant, that the raising of the vessel was at the risk of the party incurring the expense, and was not chargeable against the wrong doer, in addition to the value of the vessel, it having turned out that the vessel was not worth raising. In support of this position, the case of the Metropolis, decided by Judge Betts and affirmed by Mr. Justice Nelson, and also by the supreme court, is relied on as an authority.

The law laid down in the case of the Metropolis [Banks v. The Metropolis, Case No. 962], I do not conceive to be applicable in the present case. In the case of the Metropolis, the vessel was sunk in the middle of the Sound, some sixteen miles wide, and there was no reasonable ground for supposing that efforts to raise her would be attended with success. Here the vessel was sunk at a pier, where it was known that she could be raised at an expense of $500; and when, until she was raised, it was impossible to ascertain whether it would be expedient to repair her or not. Under such circumstances, it seems to me that it was incumbent upon a prudent owner to have the vessel raised. The raising was a necessary proceeding to enable the libellant to determine his course as to her repairs, and to compute his loss, and he is entitled to be repaid the reasonable expense thereby incurred. Such was the ruling in the case of The Engineer, 1 Lush. 138.

Furthermore, this vessel was sunk at a pier where she was an obstruction to the harbor of New York. She could not lawfully be permitted to remain where she was, and, if not raised by the libellant, might be removed by the commissioners of pilots at the expense of the libellant. Laws N. Y. 1860, c. 522, § 1.

The libellant was, therefore, bound to raise her, and the expenses, to which he was put, became a part of the damages caused by the collision. The allowance of the expense of raising seems to me, therefore, to be correct. As to the expense of the ways, I am also of the opinion that it was a necessary expenditure, to enable the libellant to examine his vessel, in order to determine his course as to repairs, and it is, therefore, properly allowed.

The report must be confirmed.

PRIZE—ENEMY'S PROPERTY—ACT JULY 13, 1861—CONSTITUTIONALITY.

Part of vessel condemned, under the sixth section of the act of July 13, 1861 (12 Stat. 257), as belonging to a citizen of the state in insurrection. That act is constitutional.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The libel of information charges that the collector of this port seized the schooner Ned, her tackle, &c., as forfeited to the United States under the provisions of the act of July 13, 1861, section 6, as belonging, in whole or in part, to citizens of the United States in a state of insurrection. The libel was filed September 7, 1861. An amended libel, detailing more specifically the grounds of forfeiture, and alleging the vessel to be the property of Ely Murray, of Wilmington, North Carolina, was filed November 12, 1861.

Elzey S. Powell intervened, September 9, 1861, by sworn claim and answer, for himself, Ely Murray and others, to the original libel, avowing that the persons named and others were in possession of the vessel at the time of the attachment thereof, and that they alone are the true and bona fide owners of the schooner. No further answer was interposed to the amended libel specifically, but all the claimants named in the former claim, of the fifth of November, 1861, filed extended answers and pleas, embodying six specific exceptions, amounting to special demurrer, and also to a general issue to the libel. The after-proceedings in the suit before this court imply that the merits of the case are submitted for decision on the pleadings, with the addition of the exemplification of the register of the vessel offered in evidence by the district attorney. There is a technical incongruity between the language of the amended libel and the exceptions and demurrers, because, from the dates of their presentations to the court the defensive allegations seem to precede the presentation of the information demanding the forfeiture of the property. This was all well known to the counsel for both parties on the argument of the cause and the submission of the points in controversy to the consideration of the court.

Accepting the pleadings as taking effect in their due order, and that the libellants proceed for the forfeiture of the interest of Ely Murray, and remit all demands of condemnation against the interests of other part owners, it appears, from the pleadings and the certified copy of the registry found on board the vessel—

1. That at the time of her seizure she was in possession of Ely Murray and his co-claimants, as owners thereof.

2. It is alleged that she was owned in North Carolina, and that Murray was a resident of that state.

3. The information sets forth as facts all the particulars necessary to bring her within the provisions of the act of July 13, 1861.

4. The act itself, and the public acts of the government in relation to the existing Rebellion within the United States, afford judicial notice that the matter comes within the purview of that statute.

5. In the opinion of the court, the act, if valid in law, authorizes and calls for the condemnation and forfeiture of the interest of the rebel owners in the vessel, unless the statutory provisions are in violation of the constitution.

6. This court, in the case of Mary McRae, held this enactment to be within the legislative competency of congress, and enforced its provisions.

It is ordered that the exceptions to the suit be disallowed and overruled, and that the judgment be entered in favor of the libellants, forfeiting one-fourth part of the said vessel and her tackle to the United States.

The attorney of the United States having discontinued and remitted all claims in this suit for three-fourths of the value of the vessel and tackle, as belonging to loyal citizens of the United States, such amount of the proceeds is ordered to be restored to the claimants thereof.

BILLS AND NOTES — FOREIGN EXCHANGE — SUFFICIENCY OF PROTEST — NOTICE — ACCEPTANCE — STRIKING OUT SUBSEQUENT INDORSEMENTS.

[1. The protest of a foreign bill is sufficient if made in conformity to the law of the place where the dishonor occurred.]

[2. Where the drawer of a bill, after it is drawn, gives the drawee notice not to pay it, presentation for acceptance and payment is waived.]

[3. A payee or indorsee of a bill in possession has a right to strike out subsequent indorsements, and recover against the drawee upon the special count, or give such bill in evidence under the money counts.]

[This was an action by John Neederer against Andrew Barber on a foreign bill of exchange.]

BETTS, District Judge. The declaration is on a foreign bill of exchange, by the payee against the drawer. A verdict was taken for the plaintiff subject to the opinion of the court, on the questions of law arising upon the facts in evidence. The defendant, after the bill was drawn, gave orders to the drawees not to pay it, and it was protested for non-acceptance at Metz in France, by a huissier, in the presence of two witnesses. Two points were taken upon the sufficiency of the protest: (1) That it must be made by a notary public; (2) that to render the protest by a huissier sufficient the laws of France must be proved authorizing that officer to make the protest. The protest of foreign bills is sufficiently proved if made in conformity to the law of the place where the dishonor of the bill occurs. All the writers of authority on the subject concur in this general doctrine (Chit. Bills, Ed. 1833, pp. 362–490; Story, Bills, § 276, note 2), and by the laws of France the officer employed in this case was competent to make the protest (Code of Commerce, Art. 173), if the court can regard that law, without its being proved as a fact before them (3 Wend. 173). The court does not intend to intimate any opinion that the French law may not be received in evidence in commercial questions, as the English is by the books supplying that proof in their own courts. The question of the sufficiency of the protest does not become material in this case, because the drawer by his own act excused the payee from the necessity of presenting for acceptance or payment. The law is clear that if the drawer has no funds in the hands of the drawee, the holder need not present the bill, and accordingly in such case a protest is unnecessary (1 D. S. E. 406–410; 2 D. S. E. 713; Chitty, Bills, 207; 2 Bearkl. 20; Read v. Wilkinson [Case No. 11,611]; Baker v. Gallagher [Id. 768]; Valk v. Simmons [Id. 16,815]; [Skellern v. May] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 141; 20 Johns. 146; 8 Pick. 83; 16 Mass. 116), unless the drawer had reasonable grounds to suppose the bill would be honored. A check on a bank, when the drawer has withdrawn his funds, need not be presented to found an action against him by the holder. 2 Nott & McC. 251; 1 Hill, R. 56; Story, Bills, § 75; Bailey, 192, 193. The want of funds may be shown by direct evidence or may be implied from the declarations or admissions of the party drawing the bill upon the ground of its being a waiver in law, or exonerating the holder from the necessity of presentment and notice. Smith, Merc. Law, 163; Bagley, Bills, 120; 2 Phil. Ev. 34, 37, 39. The fraud that is imputed to a party who draws a bill without funds to cover it becomes direct and positive when he interposes and forbids the drawee to honor it. A presentment to a correspondent under directions not to accept would be idle, and certainly required upon no higher considerations than a presentment, when the holder knew the drawer had no funds with which to discharge the bill. The principle clearly applies, and we are satisfied the verdict ought not to be disturbed for this cause.

A technical question has been raised as to the effect and operation of the full indorsements written on the bill, and it has been strenuously argued that the holder must make his title under such special indorsement in order to maintain his action. The rule applies to those only who must make title to the bill by means of the indorsements, and then, unless the first indorsement be blank, a holder cannot sustain an action without connecting himself with a special indorser. The cases establishing and explaining that rule are stated by Chitty, Kent, and Story. Chitty, Bills, 170; 3 Kent, Comm. 89; Story, Bills, § 201. The holder is always permitted to disembarrass himself of all indorsements subsequent to that conveying the title to him, whether general or special, by striking them off the bill (Story, § 107), and of all anterior ones though several intermediate him and a general indorsement (Ib.; 2 Starkie, Ev. 246; Bailey, 213). This he is prevented doing as to antecedent indorsements only because they are indispensable to communicate title to him. Bailey, 313–315; 4 Starkie, Ev. 246, 248. When the payee is holder, there is no reason why any after-indorsement should not be regarded as in blank in respect to him, for he does not recur to them for his title. He appears on the face of the bill a party in interest, and his possession of the bill gives him the same right in respect to all parties succeeding him that the first or second indorser would have in regard to those posterior to their indorsers. Story, Bills, §§ 207, 208. The subsequent indorsements may be regarded as made by him for the purpose of collection, or his own agents, no proof of interest in any indorser being needed. We therefore hold that the person in possession of the bill had a right to strike out subsequent indorsements, [Morris v. Foreman] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 193), and recover against the drawer upon the special count, or it may be given in evidence against him on the money counts (8 Johns. 79; 3 Johns. Cas. 5; 12 Mass. 172; 12 Johns. 90; 4 Pick. 421; 5 Wend. 491; 2 Phil. Ev. 38, 39). Order judgment on the verdict.

INTERNATIONAL LAW—EXPEDITION AGAINST POWER AT PEACE WITH UNITED STATES—ARREST OF PARTICIPANTS—ACT OF 1794.

1. It is an offence against the act of congress, passed 1794 [1 Stat. 381], to concert an expedition from the United States to commit hostilities against a power at peace with the United States; and it is unimportant that such association originated beyond seas, if the expedition was carried on from hence.

2. It is unimportant, whether the persons engaged in such a purpose engage the whole vessel to themselves, or departed from the United States as passengers.

Habeas corpus. The case appeared shortly to be as follows: The petitioners, ten in number, being foreigners, enlisted or otherwise engaged in Holland to join the revolutionists in South America, and accordingly embarked for the United States with their military equipments, intending to obtain a passage from this country to South America. They arrived here under the command of Needham, who claimed or had in reality the title of colonel, and who exercised in Philadelphia, during the short stay they made here, the authority of commander, ordering them to appear at a certain place of rendezvous where they were drilled and exercised. A passage was taken for them on board the Ellen for the island of St. Thomas, and their baggage was put on board. The Ellen fell down to Gloucester Point to take in the balance of her cargo, consisting of arms and munitions of war, and destined from St. Thomas to some port in the Spanish American provinces, but before she left Gloucester Point she was stopped by admiralty process, and the prisoners were arrested and committed.

THE COURT was of opinion, that upon the ground of an expedition carried on from the United States, with intent to commit hostilities against a power at peace with the United States, enough appeared to the court to justify the remanding of the prisoners. That it is unimportant, whether the association to join the revolutionists originated in the United States or beyond seas. The expedition or enterprise was still carried on from the United States, and it was immaterial whether a company of armed men, proceeding from this with such intentions, took the whole vessel to themselves, or merely departed hence as passengers. If a regiment of foreign soldiers, armed and equipped, should land in the United States and hire a vessel to transport them to South America, with intent to make war upon the Spanish king or his subjects, could it be contended, that this was not an expedition fitted out from the United States, within the clear expressions and meaning of the third section of the act of 1794? If such a case would come within the provisions of that law, it would seem difficult to distinguish it from the present. Prisoners remanded.

BANKRUPTCY—OMISSION OF CERTAIN CREDITORS IN SCHEDULE—DISCHARGE—WAIVER OF CREDITOR'S RIGHTS FOR BENEFIT OF GENERAL CREDITORS.

1. The omission from the bankrupt's schedule of the names of certain creditors with their consent expressed or implied, and for the reason that they did not intend to take dividends in competition with his trade creditors, will not bar the bankrupt's discharge on the objection of the other creditors who show no fraud or injury to their rights.

[Cited in Burpee v. Sparhawk, 108 Mass. 113; Bennett v. Goldthwait, 109 Mass. 495.]

2. Such an omission was wilful in a strict sense; but the oath to the schedule was not wilful false swearing, under [Act of 1867] section 29 [14 Stat. 531], because the bankrupt had reason to believe, and did believe, that these persons did not wish to be considered creditors of his estate. The right to be such creditors they could waive for the benefit of the general creditors.

[Objection was made to the bankrupt's discharge in this case, on the ground, among others, that he had omitted from the schedule the names of three of his creditors. Upon this point the bankrupt's testimony tended to show that he borrowed four thousand dollars of three of his friends to form the larger part of the capital of his business at Pittsburg; that they knew the purpose for which it was borrowed, and when the business turned out badly, did not expect to be paid in competition with his trade creditors, and have not been paid; that he did not put them on his schedule, because he expected to pay them if he ever became able to do so. The bankrupt supposed that his friends would not care to be notified of the proceedings, especially as there were no assets. He did not regard them like other creditors, and, perhaps, thought if their names were not on the schedule, that their debts would not be discharged. There was evidence that these friends understood that their debts were to be paid or not, as might be convenient.][2]

Hull & Childs, for general creditors.
J. H. Whitman, for bankrupt.

LOWELL, District Judge. The only objection now relied on to prevent the bankrupt's discharge is the omission from his schedule of the names of three of his creditors, who have not themselves made objection. The evidence tends to show that these creditors were friends from whom the bankrupt had borrowed the capital for his business, and that they did not expect to be paid in competition with his trade creditors, and have not been paid. No actual fraud or injury to creditors is shown or suggested. Although the omission may have been wilful in one sense, yet it would be unjust to say that the bankrupt's oath to schedule B. was wilful false swearing under section 29; because he had reason to believe and did believe that these persons did not wish to be considered creditors of his estate. It was a privilege they could waive, and their action tended to the advantage of the other creditors by increasing their dividends. The latter cannot object to it under these circumstances. Discharge granted.

BANKRUPTCY — TRUST DEED — SALE BY CREDITOR WITHOUT PERMISSION OF COURT.

1. A creditor of a bankrupt holding the security of a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage with a power of sale, in a third party as trustee, must prove his debt as a creditor holding a security, and obtain the permission of the court to have the security sold. If he directed a sale without this permission, the court, upon application of the assignee, will set aside the sale.

2. If the trustee sell without the authority of the court, does any title pass to the purchaser?

PATENTS — PATENTABLE INVENTION — CASTING WHEELS — PRIOR STATE OF ART — PRACTICE — RESPONDENT CORPORATION SUED AS COPARTNERSHIP—AMENDMENT.

1. Whether, in a suit brought against the respondents as copartners, but in which the proofs fail to show a partnership, but do show that the respondents, with others, were organized into a corporation, with the same name as the alleged copartnership, it would be competent for the court to enter a decree against the corporation, quaere.

[Cited in Brown v. Piper, 91 U. S. 43.]

2. In such case the court will not delay the hearing of the cause; since the defect, if it be one, may be cured by an amendment. Citing Goodyear v. Phelps [Case No. 5,581], and Poppenhusen v. Falke [Id. 11,279].

3. Prior to the complainant's patent for an improvement in casting car wheels, steel tires, previously heated to a required degree of heat, were placed in the mould in which the body of the wheel was to be cast, the flask immediately closed, and the molten iron poured into the mould through one or more openings or sprues in its centre, a suitable flux being employed to promote the welding of the two metals, which, when cool formed one solid mass. The evidence showed, that iron and steel had, from time immemorial, been welded, both with and without a flux: Held, that it was not a patentable invention, but merely the product of ordinary mechanical skill, in the casting of wheels in this method, to pour the molten iron through openings or sprues made just inside the inner edge of the steel tire instead of at the centre of the mould, for the purpose of preventing particles of foreign matter being carried by the flowing metal to the points of union of the two metals, and, thereby, preventing a perfect weld: Held, also, that the state of the art showing that iron and steel had long previously been welded both with and without the medium of a flux, and that mechanics skilled in the art differed in opinion as to the utility of any flux, it was not a patentable subject to cast car wheels in the manner described, but with the omission of a flux previously used.

[This was a bill by Chandler Needham against Nathan Washburn and others to restrain the alleged infringement of letters patent No. 110,779, granted to the complainant January 3, 1871.]

J. B. Robb, for complainant.

A. K. P. Joy, for defendants.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Letters patent may be granted for the invention or discovery of any new and useful art, machine, manufacture or composition of matter, or of any new and useful improvement of the same, upon the conditions specified in the patent act. Unless the thing claimed as the invention is new and useful, the claim is wholly without merit, as that is the primary and indispensable condition annexed to the right to claim the protection which the patent act is intended to secure. Application in writing must be made to the commissioner, and the requirement is, that the applicant shall file in the patent office, a written description of the invention or discovery, and of the manner and process of making, constructing, compounding, and using it, in such full, clear, concise, and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to which it appertains, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make, construct, compound, and use the same. 16 Stat. 201. Patents granted by the commissioner, in pursuance of those conditions, afford a prima facie presumption, when introduced in evidence, that the patentee is the original and first inventor of what is therein described as his invention or discovery. Such a presumption, however, may be controlled by evidence of a prior knowledge or use by others in this country; or that the invention or discovery had been described in any printed publication, before his invention or discovery thereof, in this or any foreign country; or, that it had been in public use, or on sale, for more than two years prior to his application for a patent.

Damages are claimed by the complainant for an alleged infringement by the respondents of certain letters patent, granted to him, in which it is represented, that he is the original and first inventor of a certain new and useful improvement in casting car wheels, as more fully described in the specification of the letters patent. Process was served, and the four persons named as respondents in the bill of complaint appeared, and filed separate answers. They are described in the bill of complaint as copartners, under the name of the N. Washburn Steel Tire Works, and the charge is, that the respondents, without consent, and in violation of the complainant's exclusive rights, have made, sold, and used a large number of said patented car wheels, in infringement of the exclusive rights secured to the complainant by said letters patent. Appearance was entered by each of the respondents, and they severally set up the following defences: 1. That they are not, and never were, copartners doing business at Worcester, as alleged in the bill of complaint. 2. That the complainant is not the original and first inventor of the improvement. 3. That the alleged improvement was well known and in public use, by various persons, and at various places, before the alleged invention thereof by the complainant.

Proof to show that the respondents are copartners is entirely wanting, but, inasmuch as that defect, if it be one, may be removed by a proper amendment, the court is inclined to examine the merits of the controversy. Before doing so, however, it may be well to examine the proposition of the complainant, that he is entitled to a decree against the respondents, as individuals, even though he has utterly failed to prove that they are copartners as alleged. Partnership is certainly not proved. On the contrary, the respondents offer proof, tending to show, that they are a corporation duly established under the laws of the state in which their business is transacted; but the complainant denies that proposition, and insists that, as they were never duly incorporated, he may well maintain the present suit against them as individuals.

Besides the claim for damages, the complainant also prays for an account of gains and profits, and also for an injunction. Having sued the respondents as a partnership, it may be doubtful whether it would be competent for the court to enter a decree against the corporation, but as that defect, if it be one, may be cured by an amendment, the court will proceed to examine the merits of the controversy. Goodyear v. Phelps [Case No. 5,581]; Poppenhusen v. Falke [Id. 11,279].

Taken as a whole, the proofs in the case show, to the satisfaction of the court, that the persons sued as partners were, with others, organized as a corporation, in November, 1869, under the general statutes of the state, by the corporate name set forth in the pleadings, and it appears that all the corporators were made directors, and that the business of the corporation was conducted by the directors. Opposed to this, is the uncontradicted proof that no certificate, setting forth the corporate name and purpose of the association, was ever filed with the secretary of state; but the better opinion is, that the statutes of the state, in force at the time the organization was made, did not contain any such requirement, and, consequently, that the organization is not rendered illegal by that omission. Gen. St. 341. Such a requirement was enacted the next year, but this new provision is not retroactive. Supp. Gen. St. 806.

The principal defences upon the merits, are as follows: 1. That the alleged improvement is not new in the sense of the patent law, because the patentee was not the original and first inventor of it, and because the process was well known and in public use, long before the date of the supposed invention. 2. Because the respondents have never infringed the patent, as alleged. Both of these defences make it necessary to ascertain what the invention is, when the patent, which secures it is properly construed.

Enough may be learned from the description given by the patentee in the specification of the process, which he pursues to manufacture the patented car wheel, when weighed in connection with the claim of the patent, to furnish a satisfactory answer to the inquiry as to the true nature and scope of the alleged improvement. His first step, as pointed out in the specification, is to cast a suitable quantity of steel to form the tire of the wheel, into an annular ingot, about fifteen inches in diameter, with an opening at the center of its diameter, of four inches. He then hammers the ingot upon an anvil, by means of a steam hammer, by which its diameter is extended to eighteen inches; and he gives a description of the anvil which he uses, and of the manner of conducting the hammering. Forming-rolls are then employed, by which the ingot is enlarged to the proper size and shape, to form the tire of the wheel. Having formed the tire, he then places it in a heated furnace, and heats it to a bright cherry red, when it is taken from the furnace, and having removed every foreign substance from its surface, he places it within the mould in which the body of the car wheel is to be cast, said mould having previously been formed and prepared for the purpose. Care, it is said, should be taken, that the heated tire should be properly adjusted in the mould; and when that is accomplished, the direction is, that the flask shall be immediately closed, and the molten iron be poured into the mould, which as it comes in contact with the highly heated steel, fuses the surface of the latter, thereby forming a perfect union between the two, and as the metal cools, the body of the wheel and the tire are welded into one solid mass. Extended remarks upon that part of the described process is unnecessary, as nothing there described is embraced in the claim of the patent, and, if it had been, it would not have benefited the complainant, as every part of the process there described is substantially the same as that set forth in the patent granted to Zadoc Washburn, which was introduced in evidence, and is of prior date.

Two matters are then introduced into the specification of the patent in question, which, it is insisted, distinguish it from the invention of Zadoc Washburn, which, it is admitted, is the older of the two: 1. That the molten iron is introduced into the mould, through a series of openings at the rim of the wheel, just inside the tire, and that it flows from thence to the centre, carrying away from the inner surface of the steel tire all dirt and dust, if any, which might otherwise prevent the welding of the parts. 2. Nothing is expressly set forth, under the second head, as a matter pertaining to the described improvement, but the patentee points out what he represents as a defect in the process of the other patent, which is, that the cast iron, instead of lying still in the mould, and forming a perfect weld, is agitated and caused to bubble, by the gas generated by the molten iron as it comes in contact with the flux used in the process, whereby, as he states, the perfect and desired union of the iron and steel is prevented. Everything described in the patent to Zadoc Washburn, is disclaimed by him in express terms. What he claims is, the described method of introducing the molten cast iron into the mould, through a series of holes, directly upon the inner unfluxed surface of the cast-steel tire, by which a perfect union and weld of the metals are produced.

Car wheels, manufactured by first forming a rim of cast steel, and then heating and placing it in a mould previously prepared for the purpose, and by pouring molten cast iron into the mould to complete the manufacture of the wheel, by the union or weld between the two into one solid mass, are certainly old. Nor is that proposition denied. Nothing, therefore, but a new and useful improvement in the method or process of such a manufacture can be regarded as the proper subject of a patent. Doubtless, it may be true, that the molten iron was formerly poured into the mould at the center of the mould, and, it may be, that it is better to construct the openings in the mould for the purpose—whether they are called by that name, or are called "sprues," or conduits—just inside the inner surface of the heated rim, when placed in the mould; but the court is not satisfied, from an examination of the product, or from any evidence in the case, that such a change, without more, even if new, which is not admitted, is the proper subject of a patent, as it is scarcely possible that it could have required any invention to make it. Changes of the kind are nothing more than common knowledge and experience would suggest, and every workman, whether skilled in the art or not, would know how to apply the suggestion. Nor can it make any difference that the patentee uses a series of such openings or holes in his method or process, as the proofs are full and satisfactory, that a series of holes had been used in making such castings at a much earlier period than the date of the complainant's invention, and on several occasions, as appears by the testimony of an unimpeached witness.

Suppose that is so, still, it is insisted by the complainant, that his method or process is new and useful, because he does not use flux in making the described weld, which, as he insists, distinguishes his method or process from the invention described in the Zadoc Washburn patent, and from all others known at the date of his invention. Much reason exists for holding, that the second feature of the claim is invalid, because not embraced in the description of the method or process used by the complainant, as required by the act of congress; but, inasmuch as the alleged invention consists, merely in omitting an ingredient, often employed in welding steel and iron, or two pieces of iron, the court is not inclined to rest the decision entirely upon that ground.

Nor is it at all necessary to do so, as the court, in view of the facts and circumstances of the case, is of the opinion, that it is matter of common knowledge, that iron, or iron and steel, may be successfully welded with or without the use of flux, and that such knowledge has existed among mechanics accustomed to work at the ordinary forge, for a very long period, whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. Axes, scythes, hoes, and other farming utensils were formerly made on the common anvil; and it is believed, that mechanics, formerly engaged in manufacturing such articles, knew full well that flux was often omitted in effecting a weld of iron, or iron and steel. Horse shoes were made in the same manner, and many larger articles, such as ploughshares and mill cranks. Differences of opinion, it is known, have at times existed among mechanics of that class upon the subject, some maintaining that flux was useful, and even necessary, and others maintaining the opposite opinion, with equal earnestness and confidence. All of these suggestions, it is believed, are supported by common experience and knowledge, but it is not necessary to go out of the record to find convincing proof to the same effect. Even the complainant, in his deposition filed in the patent office, testified in his cross-examination, that he was aware that iron and steel had been so welded; and, when asked if he knew, as a matter of fact, that iron and steel had for a long time been welded with and without flux, stated that it was said to have been so welded for a long time. Support to that view is also derived from one of the respondents' witnesses, who says, that in making four or five car wheels, they used four sprue holes, and that some of them were made with flux, and some without; which statement is also confirmed by other witnesses.

Having come to the conclusion that the alleged infringement is not new or patentable, it is not necessary to examine the question of infringement. Bill of complaint dismissed, with costs.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—SUIT BY ATTORNEY IN FACT FOR BENEFIT OF ESTATE.

An attorney in fact of an executor or administrator cannot maintain suit in his own name for the benefit of the estate.

Appeal from the Arkansas circuit court.

Before SCOTT and SELDEN, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. In this case it would be useless to give an opinion at length, as the law which governs it has been long and uniformly settled. We do not think that the attorney in fact of an executor or administrator can maintain an action for the benefit of the estate in his own name, in any instance, and therefore the demurrer, setting forth this ground to defeat the action, should have been sustained. Circuit Court, D. Oregon. March 9, 1875.[2]

POWER OF A STATE OVER THE PROPERTY OF NON-RESIDENTS—PROOF OF SERVICE IN CASE OF PUBLICATION — JUDGMENT-ROLL NOT THE WHOLE RECORD—EVIDENCE NECESSARY TO AUTHORIZE ORDER FOR PUBLICATION—EVIDENCE OF CAUSE OF ACTION—A VERIFIED COMPLAINT AN AFFIDAVIT—DILIGENCE TO ASCERTAIN THE PLACE OF RESIDENCE OF NON-RESIDENT DEFENDANT—PROOF OF PUBLICATION OF THE SUMMONS—AVERMENT OF SERVICE IN JUDGMENT ENTRY—PRESUMPTION IN FAVOR OF JURISDICTION.

1. A state has the power to subject the property of non-residents, within its territorial limits, to the satisfaction of the claims of her citizens against such non-residents by any mode of procedure which it may deem proper and convenient under the circumstances, and therefore may, for such purpose authorize a judgment to be given against such non-resident prior to seizure of such property, and with or without notice of the proceeding.

[Cited in Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 471; Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 125 U. S. 465, 8 Sup. Ct. 702.]

[Cited in Marsh v. Steele, 9 Neb. 99, 1 N. W. 869.]

2. The proof of service required by section 269 of the Oregon Code to be placed in the judgment-roll includes in the case of service by publication, the affidavit and order for publication as well as the affidavit of the printer to the fact of publication.

[Cited in Gray v. Larrimore, Case No. 5,721.]

[See Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391.]

3. The judgment-roll required by said section 269 is not the exclusive record of the case, but only a collection of papers and entries selected from the record for convenience and economy and sufficient in the opinion of the legislature to show the judgment of the court and its jurisdiction to give it; but the record is a history of all the acts and proceedings in the action from its initiation to final judgment which includes all the papers filed in the case, and upon which the court acted in any step of the proceedings, and this record is of the same verity as the judgment-roll which is made up from it.

[See Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391.]

4. In case of service by publication the record must show that there was evidence presented to the court or judge who made the order for publication by affidavit, sufficient to prove the ultimate facts which bring the case within sections 55 and 56 of the Oregon Code, allowing such service; and it is not enough that the affidavit repeats the mere language of the statute, it must contain facts and circumstances sufficient to prove these ultimate facts; but when a judgment is attacked collaterally it is sufficient if the evidence contained in the affidavits tends to prove such facts.

5. An averment in an affidavit for an order for publication, "that plaintiff has a just cause of action against defendant for a money demand on account," is a mere assertion of the fact of the existence of such cause of action—the opinion of the affiant to that effect, but is no evidence of it, and is therefore insufficient to authorize such order.

6. A verified complaint as to the facts stated therein, is an affidavit, and when it appears from the record that such a complaint, containing evidence of a cause of action against the defendant, was on file at the time of allowing an order for publication, the court will presume that such complaint was used as evidence therefor.

[Cited in U. S. v. Griswold, Case No. 15,266; McDonald v. Cooper, 32 Fed. 751.]

7. Where an order allowing service of a summons by publication, under sections 55 and 56 of the Oregon Code omits to direct that a copy of the complaint and summons be mailed to the defendant, addressed to his place of residence, it must appear from the affidavit that the plaintiff had used reasonable diligence to ascertain such place of residence and that it is unknown to him.

8. Section 69 of the Oregon Code, having provided that in case of publication of the summons "the proof of service" shall be by "the affidavit of the printer or his foreman or his principal clerk," an affidavit to such a publication by one styling himself therein "editor," is not within the statute and therefore no evidence of the facts contained in it.

9. An averment of due publication of a summons in a judgment entry which appears from the whole record to be untrue or is not affirmatively supported by the facts contained in such record, is a nullity and may be disregarded.

[Cited in Gager v. Henry, Case No. 5,192; McDonald v. Cooper, 32 Fed. 748.]

[Cited in De Corvet v. Dolan (Wash.) 35 Pac. 1072.]

10. The common law presumption in favor of the jurisdiction and regularity of the proceedings of courts of record or general jurisdiction had its origin in the fact that at common law no judgment could be given against a defendant until he had appeared in the action, but no such presumption does or ought to apply in cases where the defendant is a non-resident and there was no appearance and only constructive service of the summons by publication.

[2] [Affirmed in 95 U. S. 714.]

DEADY, District Judge. This action is brought to recover the possession of a half section of land situate in Multnomah county, the same being donation claim 57. It is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff is a citizen of California, and the owner, and entitled to the possession of the premises which are worth $15,000; and that the defendant is a citizen of Oregon and wrongfully withholds the possession of the premises from the plaintiff.

The answer of the defendant tacitly admits the citizenship of the parties and the value of the premises as alleged in the complaint, but denies the ownership of the plaintiff and his right to the possession of the premises, and sets up a title thereto in himself. The defense of title in the defendant is controverted by the reply. By consent of parties the cause was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, on September 24 and 25, 1874, and afterwards submitted on briefs.

On the trial the plaintiff proved that a patent to the premises was issued to him by the United States on March 19, 1866, as a settler under the donation act of September 27, 1850, and rested his case.

Thereupon the defendant offered in evidence duly certified copies of the complaint, summons, order for publication of summons, affidavit of service by publication, and judgment in the action of J. H. Mitchell v. Marcus Neff [unreported], in the circuit court of the county of Multnomah, wherein judgment was given against the defendant therein on February 19, 1866, for the sum of $294.98; to the introduction of which papers the plaintiff objected, because: (1) Said judgment is in personam, and appears to have been given without the appearance of the defendant in the action, or personal service of the summons upon him, and while he was a non-resident of the state, and is therefore void. (2) Said judgment is not in rem, and therefore constitutes no basis of title in the defendant. (3) Said copies of complaint, etc., do not show jurisdiction to give the judgment alleged, either in rem or personam; and (4) it appears from said papers that no proof of service, by publication, was ever made, the affidavit thereof being made by the "editor" of the Pacific Christian Advocate, and not by "the printer or his foreman, or his principal clerk." The court admitted the evidence, subject to the objections.

The defendant then offered in evidence a certified copy of an execution issued upon said judgment on July 9, 1866, and the returns thereon, from which it appears that the premises in question were sold upon said execution to satisfy said judgment on August 7, 1866, to J. H. Mitchell for the sum of $341.60, to the introduction of which papers the plaintiff objected, because the judgment in Mitchell v. Neff being given without jurisdiction, the execution was void, and, further, that the notice of sale upon said execution and attached to the return, was no part of either, and therefore should not be admitted. The court admitted the evidence, subject to the objections.

The defendant then offered in evidence three papers purporting to be deeds to the premises to the defendant, the first being signed by Jacob Stitzel, sheriff of Multnomah county, by his deputy, C. B. Upton, on January 14, 1867; the second by said Stitzel, ex-sheriff of said county, on July 24, 1874, and the third by E. J. Jeffery, sheriff of said county, on July 21, 1874. To the introduction of which papers the plaintiff objected, because as to the first one: 1. It was not made to the purchaser at the sheriff's sale. 2. It is not sealed, witnessed or properly acknowledged as a deed. To the second one: 1. There being no valid judgment proved, the instrument is not a link in the chain of title. 2. It was not made to the purchaser at the sheriff's sale; and as to the third one, for the same reasons as in the case of the second one, with the additional one: That it was not executed by the officer making the sale. The court admitted the evidence subject to the objection.

The defendant then offered in evidence an assignment by J. H. Mitchell to the defendant of the certificate of purchase of the premises, dated August 10, 1866, to the introduction of which the plaintiff objected, because: (1) There being no valid judgment, assignment is not evidence of title in the defendant. (2) If there were a valid judgment to support the sale to Mitchell, the assignment would pass a mere equity to the defendant, to enforce a conveyance from the former after he had received one from the sheriff, and therefore it is not evidence of title in the defendant. The court admitted the evidence, subject to the objections.

The defendant having rested, the plaintiff offered in evidence a duly certified copy of the judgment-roll in Mitchell v. Neff, which contained not only the complaint, summons, and other parts of the record of that case already introduced by the defendant, but also a copy of the affidavit of the plaintiff therein, upon which the order for publication was made; to the introduction of which the defendant objected because said affidavit was not properly a part of the judgment-roll. The court admitted the evidence subject to the objections.

Upon this evidence, the right of the plaintiff to recover is admitted, unless by virtue of the sale of the premises upon the judgment in Mitchell v. Neff, and the subsequent assignments of the certificate of purchase and the conveyances to the defendant, the legal title passed from the plaintiff to him.

Admitting that the proceedings in Mitchell v. Neff were duly taken according to the statute of the state in the case of non-resident debtors, what was the effect or force of the judgment as against the person of the defendant or his property? It is admitted on all hands that such a judgment is not binding in personam. Story, Confl. Law, § 539; D'Arcy v. Ketchun, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 174; Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 367. And this rule is expressly declared in the Oregon Code of Civil Procedure (section 506), as follows: "No natural person is subject to the jurisdiction of a court of this state, unless he appear in the court, or be found within the state, or be a resident thereof, or have property therein; and in the last case only to the extent of such property at the time the jurisdiction attached." Neither is it claimed by the defendant that this judgment had any other or greater effect than to enable the plaintiff therein to subject this property to the payment of the debt owed him by Neff.

But the plaintiff maintains that the court, in Mitchell v. Neff could not acquire jurisdiction to reach the property of a non-resident, or subject it to the payment of his debts, owed in this state, except by the actual seizure of such property contemporaneous with the commencement of the proceeding or before the rendition of the judgment therein.

In support of this position, the case of Galpin v. Page [Case No. 5,206], decided by Mr. Justice Field, in the circuit court for the district of California, on August 31, 1874, is cited. In this case the learned judge, after showing that "the tribunals of one state have no jurisdiction, and can have none, over persons and property without its territorial limits," proceeds as follows: "But over property and persons within those limits the authority of the state is supreme, except as restrained by the federal constitution. When, therefore, property thus situated is held by parties resident without the state, or absent from it, and thus beyond the reach of the process of its courts, the admitted jurisdiction of the state over the property would be defeated if a substituted service upon the parties were not permitted. Accordingly, under special circumstances, upon the presentation of particular proofs, substituted service, in lieu of personal service, is allowed by statute in nearly all the states, so as to subject the property of a non-resident or absent party to such disposition by their tribunals as may be necessary to protect the rights of their own citizens. * * * A pure personal judgment, not used as a means of reaching property at the time in the state, or affecting some interest therein, or determining the status of the plaintiff, rendered against a non-resident of the state, not having been personally served within its limits, and not appearing to the action, would not be a judicial determination of the rights of the parties, but an arbitrary declaration by the tribunals of the state as to the liability of a party over whose personal property they have no control. The validity of the statute can only be sustained by restricting its application to cases where, in connection with the process against the person, property in the state is brought under the control of the court and subjected to its judgment, or where the judgment is sought simply as a means of reaching such property or affecting some interest therein, or to cases where the action relates to the personal status of the plaintiff in the state."

But I see nothing in this language or the rule as there laid down, which supports or gives countenance to the position of the plaintiff, unless it be in the statement that the statute giving the right to proceed by publication against non-residents of the state is valid only when restricted "to cases where, in connection with the process against the person, property in the state is brought under the control of the court, and subjected to its judgment."

Now, the property was "brought under the control of the court, and subjected to its judgment" in Mitchell v. Neff, if at all, by the execution which issued upon the judgment. This process against the property of Neff was issued to enforce the judgment given in pursuance of the process against his person. The one was the inception and the other the completion of the proceeding, and so they were connected together as the links in a chain. Certainly, the process against the property could issue in connection with the process against the person without being exactly simultaneous with it. They were related parts of the same proceeding.

Besides, this judgment, though personal in form, was procured, intended and used simply as a means of reaching the property of Neff then within the state, and according to the rule in Galpin v. Page, supra, is so far valid and binding. But the power of the state over the property within its limits, of non-residents, being supreme, and it being admitted on all hands that the state may subject such property "to such disposition by their tribunals as may be necessary to protect the rights of its own citizens," in my judgment, the mode of exercising this power is a matter for the state to determine. In the exercise of this power it may require that the proceedings be strictly in rem and commenced by the seizure of the property, or it may, as provided in this state, upon the proper preliminary showing, permit a suit to be maintained against the non-resident by name—nominally—for the purpose of enabling the plaintiff therein to first judicially establish his right or claim against such non-resident, and then authorize the seizure and disposition of the property so as to satisfy the same. In either case, the result is the same; while the latter mode of proceeding has this to commend it over the former, that it does not permit the seizure or interference with the property of the non-resident until the right or claim of the citizen in or to it is satisfactorily established.

Nor does it appear to me that the state is bound in any case to provide for giving notice to the absent party by publication of the summons or otherwise. That matter pertains to the mode of proceeding over which the state has absolute control. The notice usually given is merely constructive, and in a large number, if not in a majority of cases, gives no information to the absent party. Of course it is the duty of the state to deal justly and considerately with non-residents who have property within her jurisdiction, and therefore it should provide as far as practicable that no proceeding should be taken in her courts to affect such property, without notice to the owner. It being shown that the state has the power to subject the property of non-residents to the payment of debts owing to her citizens by such a proceeding as may by law be provided, including one in which such property is not seized prior to judgment, but thereafter, and then only for the purpose of satisfying said judgment, it remains to be considered whether the judgment in Mitchell v. Neff was given by a court having jurisdiction to do so according to the laws of the state.

The plaintiff maintains that the court acted without jurisdiction, because it appears from the record: (1) That the order of publication was made without evidence that Mitchell had "a cause of action against" Neff; or (2) that any diligence had been used to ascertain his "place of residence." (3) That the service of the summons was not proved as by statute provided.

In consideration of these objections two preliminary questions arise which must first be disposed of, namely: What constitutes a judgment-roll, and it is the only part of the record of the court which may be inspected upon an objection to its jurisdiction? As to what constitutes a judgment-roll in this state there has been no decision by the supreme court of the state, and therefore this court must construe the statute on the subject for itself. The Code of Civil Procedure (section 269) provides that "the clerk shall prepare and file in his office the judgment-roll," "if the complaint has not been answered by any defendant" by attaching "together in the order of their filing, issuing and entry, the complaint, summons and proof of service, and a copy of the entry of judgment." The law of this state at the date of the proceedings in Mitchell v. Neff, provided that whenever personal service cannot be made upon the defendant, and "after due diligence he cannot be found within the state, and when that fact appears by affidavit to the satisfaction of the court or judge thereof, and in like manner it appears that a cause of action exists against the defendant," "such court or judge may grant an order" allowing constructive service to be made in the case, by publication of the summons, "among other cases, when the defendant is not a resident of the state, but has property therein, and the court has jurisdiction of the subject of the action." Code Civ. Proc. § 55.

In the case of Mitchell v. Neff, there was an order granted by the judge allowing service of the summons to be made by publication, under this section. What then constitutes the proof of such constructive service, and is, therefore, a necessary part of the judgment-roll? The question is not altogether free from difficulty, principally because section 69 of the Code, in prescribing what "proof of the service of the summons" shall be, provides, that if served by the sheriff, his certificate thereof; if served by any other person, his affidavit thereof, and "in case of publication, the affidavit of the printer or his foreman or his principal clerk, showing the same."

On behalf of the defendant it is maintained that section 69 limits the effect and scope of the phrase "proof of service," as used in section 269, to the affidavit of the printer touching the mere fact of publication of the summons in the newspaper. But because the effect of the phrase is so limited in section 69 —the printer's relation to and knowledge of the subject beginning and ending with the fact of such publication—it does not follow that the legislature intended it should be so understood and applied when used elsewhere in the Code, particularly when the natural signification of the words and the plain import of the context, as in section 269, require that it should be construed to include other facts than this one.

The judgment-roll of the Code is a mere collection of papers and copies of entries in the case, sufficient, at least, to show a prima facie case of jurisdiction in the court and the exercise thereof until a final determination of the controversy, so far as the particular proceeding is concerned. As its name implies, it is the roll or record of the final determination or judgment, and not of the entire proceedings in the case. Among other things, the proof of service is directed to be placed in such roll, because, without it, it would not appear therefrom that the court had jurisdiction to give the judgment. But how does the mere affidavit of the printer, as to the publication of the summons, show a service of the summons? It cannot appear from such affidavit that any court or judge ever ordered publication of the summons, or, if so, in that particular paper or for that length of time. Such an affidavit may be made and filed in a cause and placed in the roll without any order for publication having been made, or, if there was one, without the publication proved by it being in any essential in accordance with it.

"The proof of service" in a judgment-roll, must, according to the natural signification of the words, and the obvious purpose of section 269, include not only the fact of delivery or publication of the summons, but the authority to do so. In the case of service by a sheriff, his certificate of delivery to the defendant would not be sufficient proof of service, unless it contained evidence of his authority—that is, was done in his official character; and so when the service purports to be by publication, it is not proven—shown, established—until the authority to publish is proven as well as the publication itself.

This proof—proof of service of the summons—the Code directs to be placed in the judgment-roll as part of it. What constitutes such proof depends upon the circumstances of the case. Where the service is by publication, it must include not only proof of the fact of publication in a newspaper, but the authority therefor. Nothing short of the order of the court allowing the publication will suffice for this purpose; and unless such order state that the facts necessary to give jurisdiction appeared by affidavit, it should include the affidavit also. Admitting that an order for publication containing the statements suggested would be prima facie sufficient, yet the full and complete proof of the service should include the affidavit upon which the order was made.

The only authority cited, which differs from this conclusion, is Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 304, in which it was held that neither the affidavit for the order for publication nor the order itself were a part of the judgment-roll, and that the only proof of service of the summons which it need contain is the affidavit of the printer to the fact of publication. The court admitted that "the proof of service by publication" should include the affidavit and order of publication, because "in point of law they constitute a part of the mode" of such service; and this itself is sufficient reason why the statute should not have been so construed as to exclude them. In the same court the previous cases of Braly v. Seaman, 30 Cal. 610, and Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Cal. 342, were considered and decided upon the theory that the affidavit and order for publication were a necessary part of the proof of the service and therefore a constituent of the judgment-roll. "Counsel eminent for learning and ability," who argued these important cases, "assumed and therefore conceded that they were a part of the judgment-roll;" and there can be no doubt that the rule first announced in Hahn v. Kelly was a wide departure from what had been understood and assumed by the bench and bar of that state to be the true construction of this statute.

In Galpin v. Page, supra, Mr. Justice Field held that the proof of service must include the affidavit and order for publication. In considering the question he says: "Now it is evident that the language of the statute in the first title mentioned, declaring what shall be proof of service of the summons, must be limited to the action of the persons making the service of publication, of which the sections immediately preceding in the same title speak; as if the language were as follows: 'Proof of the service of a summons by the sheriff or other person, or by a publisher of a newspaper, as above provided, shall be as follows.' The obvious meaning intended is, that the proof of service which the parties performing the particular duty prescribed must furnish, shall be the certificate or affidavit designated. It does not mean that such certificate or affidavit shall be all that is required on the subject of service, but only all that is required of those particular persons. Any other construction would lead to this absurd result, that an affidavit can be used to establish conclusively, a fact to which it makes no reference. Publication of a summons in a newspaper is not service of the summons, nor is an affidavit of such publication proof of service. The publication to be of any avail, must be in a paper designated and for the period prescribed by the order of the court or judge. The terms of such order must therefore be connected with the affidavit, or the proof will amount to nothing. The affidavit, by itself, is only a portion of the proof, a solitary link in the chain required. The printer is not supposed to know anything of the order, and is not called upon even to refer to it in his affidavit. When therefore the record of the judgment comes to be made up, it must necessarily include the order of the court, or it will disclose no proof of service. And when the statute requires the clerk to attach with other papers the proof of service, it means not merely the affidavit which the publisher may furnish as part of such proof, but the order also, without which the affidavit establishes nothing. It is giving to the provision, declaring the proof which the officer or person making personal service or the printer publishing the summons shall furnish of their acts, the effect of a declaration that no other proof of the service was necessary, that error in our judgment was committed in Hahn v. Kelly. That the ruling in that case left the judgment-roll a defective and imperfect record, seems to have been felt by the court, for it says: 'In our judgment, it would have added to the completeness of the record to have made proof of service by publication, include also the affidavit of the party, and the order of the court directing the publication to be made, for, in point of law, they constitute a part of the mode; but the legislature has not seen proper to do so, and we can no more add to their will than we can take from it.' For the reasons we have stated, we do not admit that the statute sanctions any such defective record; but, on the contrary, we are clear, that properly construed, it requires full proof of the jurisdictional facts to be incorporated into the judgment-roll."

I am not advised what has been the practice in this state in this matter. In the case under consideration the roll does not contain the order for publication, but does contain the affidavit therefor. But the order having been put in evidence by the defendant may be considered, so far as he is concerned, a part of the roll. The roll itself is otherwise made up in utter disregard of the statute, the papers and entries comprising it, being attached together pell mell, without any reference to the order of their issuing, filing or entry; while some of them are motions for orders and judgments and the like, which are out of place.

The ruling in Galpin v. Page, supra, being made by a justice of the supreme court of the United States, is of more direct authority in this court, than that in Hahn v. Kelly, while the reasons for it, to my mind, far outweigh those given in support of the ruling in the latter case. In my judgment there is scarcely a doubt that the judgment-roll, to show "the proof of service," must contain not only the proof of publication of the summons, but also the authority for such publication. But the affidavit and order for publication may be inspected by this court for the purpose of ascertaining whether the court in Mitchell v. Neff had jurisdiction or not, upon another ground. The judgment-roll is not the whole of the record in Mitchell v. Neff. The record of the case comprises "a history of all the acts and proceedings in the action from its initiation to final judgment." Galpin v. Page, supra. A part of this record or history is at least all the papers filed in the case, and upon which the court appears to have acted in any step of the proceedings. So are the entries and files containing the acts and doings of the court in the case. And these are all verities in the same sense, and in the same degree, as the portion of them which by statute constitute the judgment-roll. These are all elements of "the record at common law, which imported absolute verity," and the definition of a record contained in section 719 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is to the same effect: "A judicial record, is the record, official entry or files of the proceedings in a court of justice, or the official acts of a judicial officer, in an action, suit or proceeding."

There is nothing in section 269 prescribing how the judgment-roll shall be made up, which expressly or by implication makes it the record of the case or that imparts to it any more or greater verity, than the rest of the record. As has been already remarked, the judgment-roll is not the whole record of the case, but only a collection of such of the papers and entries as in the opinion of the legislature were necessary or sufficient to show a prima facie case of jurisdiction in the court to pronounce the judgment. The remaining portion of the record which is often voluminous, is omitted from this roll on grounds of convenience and economy. For the same reason, I suppose, the roll is made up in part by attaching the original papers together instead of copying them upon parchment, as was once the case, or in a book, as is still the case in some states, and in this in particular cases. See section 270, Code Civ. Proc. There is really no ground for assuming that the legislature, in providing for this brief judgment-roll, intended to thereby exclude the rest of the papers and entries of the case from the record, and to take from them the force and effect as evidence to which they were otherwise entitled. In the very nature of things, there is just as much reason and convenience in attributing absolute verity to an order for the publication of a summons as to the ex parte judgment given in pursuance of it, in the same case and by the same court or judge; and it is not to be assumed, in the absence of express provisions to that effect, that the legislature would make such an illogical and absurd distinction.

In considering, then, the objections made to the judgment in Mitchell v. Neff, the court will inspect the affidavit and order for publication, as well as the rest of the record, upon the double ground that they are properly a part of the judgment-roll, and also a part of the general record of the case, and therefore, in either case, of equal verity with any part of such roll. If, then, it shall appear from the record in the case that the court in Mitchell v. Neff, never acquired jurisdiction to give the judgment it did, the sale of the premises and subsequent proceedings were void, and the plaintiff must recover. This conclusion would follow upon general principles, and is within the rule expressly declared in section 731 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as follows: "Any judicial record may be impeached, and the presumption arising therefrom overcome, by evidence of a want of jurisdiction in the court or judicial officer * * * in respect to the proceedings."

To proceed, then, with the consideration of the objections: Was the order for publication of the summons made without evidence that Mitchell had "a cause of action" against Neff?

The affidavit of Mitchell upon which this order was made is dated November 13, 1865, and after the title of the cause reads as follows: "I, J. H. Mitchell, plaintiff, being first duly sworn, say the defendant, Marcus Neff, is a non-resident of this state; that he resides somewhere in the state of California, at what place affiant knows not, and he cannot be found in this state. The plaintiff has a just cause of action against defendant for a money demand on account. That this court has jurisdiction of such action. That the defendant has property in this county and state."

The order was granted in open court, on the same date as the affidavit, and reads as follows: "Now at this day comes the plaintiff in his proper person and by his attorneys Mitchell and Dolph, and files affidavit of plaintiff and motion for an order of publication of summons as follows: 'Now comes the plaintiff by his attorneys and upon the affidavit of plaintiff herewith filed moves the court for an order of publication of summons against defendant, as required by law—he being a non-resident;'—and it appearing to the satisfaction of the court that the defendant cannot after due diligence be found in this state and that he is a non-resident thereof; that his place of residence is unknown to plaintiff, and cannot with reasonable diligence be ascertained by him; and that plaintiff has a cause of action against the defendant; and that defendant has property in this county and state, it is ordered and adjudged by the court that service of the summons in this action be made by publication for six weeks successively in the Pacific Christian Advocate, a weekly newspaper published in Multnomah county, Oregon, and this action is continued for such service."

The judgment in Mitchell v. Neff being now attacked or questioned collaterally, not on appeal, if there is any evidence in the affidavit tending to prove or establish the ultimate fact upon which jurisdiction to grant the order depends—the existence of a cause of action against the defendant—it is sufficient to sustain the judgment. But if there is no evidence of such fact, the court acted without authority and the judgment is void. I find the rule upon this subject laid down very fully and clearly by Mr. Justice Sawyer, in Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Cal. 348, as follows: "There is a marked distinction between an affidavit which presents some evidence on a vital point, but clearly of a character too unsatisfactory to justify an order for publication of summons based upon it, and an affidavit which presents no evidence at all tending to prove the essential fact. In the former case the judge might be satisfied upon very slender and inconclusive testimony; but there being some appreciable evidence of a legal character, which calls into action the judgment of the judge, he has jurisdiction to consider and pass upon it. He may be wholly and egregiously wrong in his conclusion upon the weight of the evidence but he has jurisdiction to act upon it, and his action is simply erroneous. His order would in such case be reversed on appeal. But as there was jurisdiction to act, until reversed, or attacked by some direct proceeding to annul it, the order and judgment based upon it would be valid. Such a judgment could not be collaterally attacked. If, however, there is a total want of evidence on any point necessary to be determined, upon which the law requires the mind of the judge to be satisfied as a prerequisite for granting an order of publication, then there is nothing upon which he is authorized to act; the evidence which is the very basis of his jurisdiction and upon which it depends, is wanting, and his action is without authority. His action is not merely erroneous, for there was nothing to call into exercise the judicial mind—there is no jurisdiction to act at all, and the proceeding is void."

There is nothing in the affidavit of Mitchell which tends to show that he had "a cause of action" against Neff. True, he asserts therein that he has a cause of action, but this is not the statement of a fact tending to prove such a proposition, but a general assertion or expression of opinion that the proposition is true. But it is the province of the court to determine that question, upon the facts to be stated in the affidavit. A general statement that the plaintiff has a cause of action against the defendant is not sufficient. It does not make the matter appear to the court. The facts necessary to show that a cause of action exists must be stated. Concerning the material circumstances of time, place and amount, this affidavit is wholly silent, and whether this supposed cause of action arose upon an indebtedness of one mill for "a small measure of moonshine" or a million of dollars for as many miles of land, is left to conjecture. In Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Cal. 354, Mr. Justice Sawyer quotes, with approval, the following ruling upon this subject from Ricketson v. Richardson, 26 Cal. 153: "An affidavit which merely repeats the language or substance of the statute is insufficient. * * * The ultimate facts of the statute must be proved, so to speak, by the affidavit, by showing the probatory facts upon which each ultimate fact depends. These ultimate facts are conclusions drawn from the existence of other facts, to disclose which is the special office of the affidavit. To illustrate: It is not sufficient to state generally that after due diligence the defendant cannot be found within the state, or that the plaintiff has a good cause of action against him, or that he is a necessary party; but the acts constituting due diligence, or the facts showing that he is a necessary party should be stated. To hold that a bald repetition of the statute is sufficient, is to strip the court or judge to whom the application is made of all judicial functions and allow the party himself to determine in his own way the existence of jurisdictional facts—a practice too dangerous to the rights of defendants to admit of judicial toleration. The ultimate facts stated in the statute are to be found, so to speak, by the court or judge, from the probatory facts stated in the affidavit, before the order for publication can be legally entered."

Of course, in stating that the affidavit contains no evidence of the existence of a cause of action against Neff, I consider the sense of the language of that instrument: "Plaintiff has a just cause of action against defendant for a money demand on account"—as in no degree affected by the words which I have italicised. The expression—"a money demand on account"—is, so far as my knowledge goes, sui generis in the literature of the law. What it means is not obvious, and counsel have not been able to enlighten the court upon the subject. If it means anything, it is an allegation that the affiant has a demand against the defendant "for money on account," which at least is a mere obscure amplification of what was already said in the averment that he had a cause of action against him.

So far, then, as the affidavit is concerned, it containing no evidence that the plaintiff had a cause of action against the defendant, the court acted without authority in making the order for publication and the same together with the judgment following it, is simply void.

But it is suggested that it appears from the verified complaint on file in Mitchell v. Neff, when this order for publication was allowed, that a cause of action existed in favor of Mitchell and against Neff. The complaint states, that the plaintiff is an attorney, "and as such, has been practicing in Portland, Oregon, for over five years last past. That between January 1, 1862, and May 15, 1863, plaintiff, at defendant's special instance and request, rendered professional services for defendant, as such attorney, which services were reasonably worth the sum of $209 in legal tender notes; that said amount is long since due and unpaid, except $6.50 paid thereon by defendant, January 24, 1863, wherefore," etc.

While it is questionable whether even the complaint states facts sufficient to prove the existence of a cause of action, and therefore to justify the granting of an order for publication, if the question arose upon an appeal, it doubtless contains some evidence tending to establish that conclusion, and, therefore, is sufficient, when the question arises, as in this case, where the judgment is attacked collaterally.

In Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Cal. 355, the complaint which was not necessarily verified, was not in the record. The court was asked to presume that it was verified, and contained evidence tending to show the existence of a cause of action, and that the court in allowing the order for publication may have acted upon it as well as the insufficient affidavit. But it declined to do so, saying: That "it affirmatively appears by the recitals in the order itself that the order was based upon the affidavits of Green and Brooks."

In Mitchell v. Neff the complaint is in the record, and appears to be verified. It is therefore, as to the facts contained in it and relative to this inquiry, substantially an affidavit. The motion for the order for publication, which is recited therein, asks that it be made "upon the affidavit of plaintiff herewith filed," but the order itself does not state that it was made exclusively upon the affidavit. It states: That "it appearing to the satisfaction of the court," etc., without stating how or why. In a case like this there is no presumption that there was any evidence before the court allowing the order other than appears by the record. But it appears from such record that the complaint was on file in the case when the order for publication was allowed, and was therefore before the court, and might have been used by it in allowing the order as evidence that a cause of action existed against Neff. In U. S. v. Walsh [Case No. 16,635], I held that the complaint in an action for a penalty was an affidavit and sufficient for the allowance of a writ of arrest under section 107 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The point is not free from doubt, but my mind inclines to the conclusion that this court ought to presume, if necessary, that the court in Mitchell v. Neff acted upon the evidence contained in the complaint, as well as the affidavit in allowing the order, and therefore I conclude, that so far as this objection is concerned, the judgment is valid.

The second objection to the judgment is, that it does not appear from the record that any diligence was used by Mitchell to ascertain Neff's place of residence. The fact upon which the objection is based is admitted by counsel for defendant, but they insist that it is not necessary that the affidavit upon which the order of publication was allowed, should contain the evidence of such diligence; that the fact might be proved by oral testimony. The order merely states that it appears to the satisfaction of the court that the place of residence of Neff "is unknown to plaintiff, and cannot, with reasonable diligence, be ascertained by him." Upon what evidence this conclusion was reached by the court does not appear, except in the recital that the motion was made upon the affidavit of the plaintiff.

Sections 55 and 56 of the Code regulate the allowance of service of summons by publication, and ought to be taken and construed together. The latter provides that "in case of publication the court or judge shall also direct a copy of the summons and complaint to be forthwith deposited in the post-office, directed to the defendant at his place of residence, unless it shall appear that such residence is neither known to the party making the application nor can, with reasonable diligence, be ascertained by him."

The fact of diligence can only be shown by affidavit, and this must appear by the record. Cook v. Farran, 11 Abb. Prac. 40; 13 How. Prac. 43; Hallett v. Righters, 13 How. Prac. 43; Titus v. Relyea, 16 How. Prac. 373; Hyatt v. Wagenright, 18 How. Prac. 248.

The exposition of section 798 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by defendant's counsel to show that an affidavit could not have been used to prove "diligence" upon the application for the order is unsound. On the contrary, such section expressly provides that an affidavit may be used on a motion. Indeed, I do not understand that the evidence of a witness can be heard on a motion otherwise than by affidavit. The application for the order for publication of the summons was a motion, and any evidence used in support of it should have been by affidavit, and doubtless such was the case. Besides, sections 55 and 56 taken together, by necessary implication, require that the proof of residence and diligence shall be by affidavit. In construing the corresponding sections in the California Code, the court in Ricketson v. Richardson, 26 Cal. 152, said: "Sections 30 and 31 treat of the same general subject, and they must be read together for the purpose of ascertaining what the affidavit and order should contain in order to satisfy the law and make the service complete. It must appear from the affidavit that the person upon whom service is to be made either resides out of the state or has departed from the state * * *; and also whether his residence is known, and if known, it should be stated. * * * The affidavit must show whether the residence of the person upon whom service is sought is known to the affiant, and if known, the residence must be stated. It is true that this is not required in terms in the thirtieth section, which is more especially devoted to the affidavit; but, as we have already said, the whole statute on the subject of service by publication is to be read together, and section 31 requires that where the residence is known the order shall direct a copy of the summons and complaint to be forthwith deposited in the post-office, directed to the person to be served, at his place of residence. In granting the order, the court or judge acts judicially and can know nothing about the facts upon which the order is to be granted, except from the affidavit presented by the applicant. There is no other way of bringing the fact of residence to the judicial knowledge of the court or judge. That the fact of residence should appear in the affidavit is therefore necessarily implied from the whole tenor and scope of the statute. * * * Where this kind of service is sought the proceedings should be carefully scrutinized and strict compliance with every condition of the law exacted; otherwise its provisions may lead to gross abuse, and the rights of person and property made to depend upon the elastic consciences of interested parties, rather than the enlightened judgment of a court or judge."

The evidence of diligence used to ascertain the residence of the defendant, when it is alleged to be unknown to the party making the application, must appear in the affidavit for the same reason that "the fact of residence" should, if known to such party. The one is the equivalent of the other. Either the place of residence of the defendant must be shown, or it must appear that it is unknown to the party and what diligence he has used to ascertain it. They are in the same category, and the law which requires one to be shown by affidavit equally applies to the other. It was not intended that the law should be a means of spoiling non-residents, and therefore it provides that the defendant shall have personal notice of the proceeding if possible, so that he may take proper measures to protect his rights. The provision requiring a copy of the summons and complaint to be mailed to the address of the defendant is a wise and just one, and well calculated to prevent its abuse. Little chance has a non-resident to be informed of the proceedings against him by the mere publication of the summons, often, as in this case, in a weekly newspaper of denominational circulation within the state, and practically none without it.

The court having omitted to make the order directing a copy of the summons and complaint to be deposited in the post-office, addressed to the defendant at his place of residence, upon the mere allegation in the affidavit, that such place of residence was "somewhere in California," then unknown to the affiant, and without any evidence that the plaintiff had ever used any diligence to ascertain such place of residence, or even that he was not conveniently and intentionally ignorant of the fact, the order allowing service by publication, and the service and judgment following it are necessarily void and of no effect.

The third objection to the judgment is also well founded. There was no legal proof of the service of the summons by publication, and therefore the court had no jurisdiction to give the judgment. As has been stated, section 69 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires that the service of the summons shall be proved, in case of publication by the "affidavit of the printer or his foreman or his principal clerk." As appears from the affidavit to the publication it was made by Henry C. Benson, the "editor" of the paper. The statute is imperative and admits of no proof of service but the affidavit of the printer or his foreman or his principal clerk. The reason is obvious. The persons described are the only ones who, as a rule, are likely to have personal knowledge of the fact, by virtue of their relation to the subject. It may be in some cases that the editor has such knowledge also. So it may have been in Mitchell v. Neff, but if it were so it should have been stated. But as a rule the contrary is probably true. One of the elementary rules of evidence is that a fact shall be proven by the best evidence of which, in its nature, it is susceptible. For very cogent reasons this rule ought to be rigidly applied to the proof of jurisdictional facts where the proceeding is ex parte. An editor does not know by virtue of his employment as such, that a summons has been published in all the numbers of the paper he edits, put in circulation during a certain period of time. But the printer may be reasonably presumed to. Therefore the editor's affidavit is not the best evidence of the matter. True he may inform himself concerning it, and so may any one having no relation whatever to the paper. But speaking from information derived at second-hand in this way, the witness is liable to be mistaken or imposed upon.

For these very sufficient reasons, as it appears to me, the legislature has required that the service by publication shall be proven by the best evidence of which the case is susceptible—the affidavit of the printer, his foreman or principal clerk. This being so, no court is authorized for any reason to assume that the affidavit of an editor or other person, not the printer of a paper, is legal evidence of a publication therein.

But counsel for defendant maintain that due service of the summons appears from the entry of judgment which states "that the defendant had notice of the pendency of the action by publication of the summons for six successive weeks in the Pacific Christian Advocate."

What is meant by the averment "that the defendant had notice of the pendency of the action" is not clear. The averment is without the statute which does not provide that the defendant shall have notice of the pendency of the action by publication, but that constructive service of the summons may be made upon him by that means. Whether he thereby acquires actual notice of the proceeding, the court cannot know and therefore cannot find. The averment should be that the defendant was duly served with the summons by publication of the same in the Advocate, etc. But assuming that this averment is formally sufficient, it does not appear to be true in point of fact. The record not only fails to support it, but actually contradicts it. So far as the record discloses the fact there was no evidence before the court that the defendant had any notice of the pendency of the action by a publication of the summons. The affidavit of the editor of the Advocate was not competent evidence of the fact, and none other appears to have been before the court.

And, finally, it is insisted by counsel for defendant that the court in Mitchell v. Neff was a court of general jurisdiction, and therefore the law presumes its proceedings were regular and in its power, unless the contrary affirmatively appears from the record.

Admitting for the moment that this rule applies in cases of this kind, it is a sufficient answer to say that the contrary does appear here from the record. If the record of a court is silent as to a jurisdictional fact for the purpose of upholding the judgment, it will be presumed that the fact was duly made to appear by the court; but when it appears from the record, that such fact was made to appear by a certain means, it will not be presumed that it was also made to appear otherwise or differently. Here the record shows that the proof of service was made by the affidavit of the editor, and there is no room to presume that it was otherwise or differently made. The record is not silent on the subject. It speaks for itself, and there is no reason or necessity for resorting to presumption. Moreover, in this class of cases, it is not sufficient that an averment of due service of the summons in the judgment-entry should be not in conflict with the facts contained in the record—it must be affirmatively supported by them. If such an averment could be successfully substituted for the proof of the fact which the statute requires, it is reasonable to suppose that the proof would generally be dispensed with. The averment is a nullity.

But I am satisfied, upon both reason and authority, that the rule in regard to presumptions in favor of the regularity of proceedings in courts of general jurisdiction, does not and ought not to apply in cases where there is no appearance or actual service of the summons, and the defendant is a non-resident of the state. This presumption is a rule of the common law. It had its origin and is only applicable to a procedure in which judgment could not be given against a defendant, unless he was not only personally summoned, but was arrested or appeared in the action. If he did not appear, his goods and the profits of his lands might be distrained ad infinitum to compel an appearance; or if he absconded, he might be outlawed, but no judgment could be given against him in the action until he appeared and was heard. 3 Bl. Comm. 280 et seq. See Hess v. Cole, 3 Zab. [23 N. J. Law] 116.

The court being without jurisdiction to proceed in the action until both parties were before it, and each had an opportunity to allege what he might for himself and against his adversary, it might well be presumed that its judgment was regularly and duly given, unless the contrary affirmatively appeared by the record. Such is still the rule in regard to courts of general jurisdiction when proceeding substantially according to the course of the common law.

But the proceeding in Mitchell v. Neff, so far as the acquiring of jurisdiction is concerned, was in fact and theory ex parte. The record was made by the plaintiff without the knowledge or interference of the defendant. He was not present to question the jurisdiction of the court, or point out wherein the facts stated or shown by the plaintiff were insufficient to authorize its action. The action of the court in the premises in such cases is only formal. Technically it gives the judgment, but substantially the proceeding and record are taken, conducted and made up by the plaintiff upon his own judgment. No presumption ought to be allowed in favor of the jurisdiction in such cases. Every fact necessary to sustain the jurisdiction, must appear from the record or the judgment is void. As was said by Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court in Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 368: "Whenever, therefore, it appears from the inspection of the record of a court of general jurisdiction that the defendant, against whom a personal judgment or decree is rendered, was, at the time of the alleged service, without the territorial limits of the court, and thus beyond the reach of its process, and that he never appeared in the action, the presumption of jurisdiction over his person ceases, and the burden of establishing the jurisdiction is cast upon the party who invokes the benefit or protection of the judgment or decree."

In Galpin v. Page, in the circuit court, supra, it was held, citing the same case in 18 Wall. [85 U. S. 367] that "the presumptions which the law implies in support of the judgment of superior courts of general jurisdiction are also limited to jurisdiction over persons within their territorial limits of the courts, persons who could be reached by their process, and also over proceedings which were in accordance with the course of the common law." And again: "When the judgment of such a court" (of general jurisdiction in civil cases) "is produced, relating to a matter falling within the general scope of its powers, the jurisdiction of the court will be presumed, even in the absence of the formal proceedings or steps by which the jurisdiction was obtained; and such jurisdiction cannot ordinarily be assailed except on writ of error or appeal, or by some other direct proceeding. But when the judgment of such a court relates to a matter not falling within the general scope of its powers, and the authority of the court can only be exercised in a prescribed manner not according to the course of the common law; or the judgment is against a party without the territorial limits of the court, who was not served within those limits, and did not appear to the action, no such presumption of jurisdiction can rise. The judgment, being as to its subject-matter or persons, out of its ordinary jurisdiction, authority for its rendition must appear upon the face of its record. In other words, there is no presumption in favor of the judgments of courts of general jurisdiction, except as to matters and persons falling within the scope of that general jurisdiction. When the proceeding is special and outside of that general scope, either as to subjects or persons, the presumption ceases, and the record must show a compliance with the special authority, by which the extraordinary jurisdiction is exercised. This doctrine is an obvious deduction from principle, and is sustained by adjudged cases almost without number in the highest courts of the several states, and in the supreme court of the United States. There is running all through the reports the emphatic declaration of the common law courts, that a special authority, conferred even upon a court of general jurisdiction, which is exercised in a mode different from the course of the common law, must be strictly pursued, and the record must disclose the jurisdiction of the court. On this subject the cases speak a uniform language, with scarcely a dissenting voice."

But I do not understand that a mode of proceedings is "different from the course of the common law," in the sense in which that phrase is here used, because there may be a difference in mere non-essentials or incidents which change with the manners and circumstances of a people and their ideas of utility and convenience. As, for instance, whether a pleading is verified or not, or a denial is special or general, or a defendant shall answer without or after an imparlance, or an issue shall be made by the complaint and answer, or by an indefinite series of pleadings or altercations if necessary, or there shall be many forms of action or but one, or a judgment in ejectment shall be a bar to another action or not, does not in this sense make the mode of proceeding differ from the course of the common law. But as has been shown, the corner-stone of a proceeding at common law was that no judgment could be given against a defendant unless he appeared in the action. Out of this important fact grew the reasonable presumption that the record was absolutely true and the court had jurisdiction to give the judgment. But the law ceases with the reason of it. There is no reason for such a presumption when the proceeding takes place in the absence of the defendant upon a mere constructive service of process upon him. In such case the record must show affirmatively every fact necessary to give the court jurisdiction, and as to such facts it may be even contradicted, when attacked collaterally in the tribunal of another forum. Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 468. This court and the one that gave the judgment in Mitchell v. Neff are tribunals of different sovereignties exercising a distinct and independent jurisdiction, though within the same territorial limits. The judgment of the state court is only entitled to the same faith and credit in this court as it is in the courts of another state. Galpin v. Page, supra.

I cannot better conclude this opinion than by quoting and adopting the language of Mr. Justice Sawyer in a similar case (Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Cal. 355): "We are not insensible to the fact that this decision may affect many judgments obtained upon service by publication of summons in years past, and for that reason we have bestowed upon the question the attention which its great importance demands. We know that there is probably no state in which there have been, and where there is likely to be, so many occasions for procuring service by publication as in California. But while this is true, it is doubtless equally true, that there is no state in which so many have waited and are still waiting for their adversaries to depart in order that suit may be brought and judgment obtained against them on publication without actual notice. It may be important to the interests of those who suppose they have acquired rights under this class of judgments that they should be upheld. But it is equally important that the interests of parties, who have been only constructively served with process, and who, in many instances, have had no actual notice till they have been condemned unheard, should be protected. If a judgment is void for want of jurisdiction, all those who have acquired interests under it have done so in full view of the condition of the record; while, on the other hand, a defendant is liable to have an unjust judgment rendered against him without any knowledge of the pendency of the action till it is too late to protect himself. An appeal is no adequate remedy when a party has no notice, for the time to appeal is very brief, and may expire before actual notice is obtained. In the language of the court in Smith v. Rice, 11 Mass. 512, 'the very grievance complained of is that the party had no notice of the pending of the cause and of course no opportunity to appeal.' "

There must be judgment for the plaintiff and findings of fact and law will be prepared in accordance with this opinion.

[NOTE. This judgment was affirmed upon error in the supreme court, Mr. Justice Field delivering the opinion, and Mr. Justice Hunt dissenting. 95 U. S. 714. This cause was again heard in the circuit court upon appeal by defendant from the clerk's taxation of costs. Case No. 10,084. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant for unlawful cutting of timber and other waste upon the same tract of land. The defendant filed a counterclaim setting up taxes paid and improvements. The case was heard upon plaintiff's motion to strike out counterclaim. Case No. 10,085.]

EXPENSES OF PRINTING BRIEF.

Section 918 of the Revised Statutes gives to the circuit court power to regulate the practice therein, "as may be necessary or convenient for the advancement of justice and the prevention of delay in proceedings," provided such regulation is not inconsistent with any law of the United States or rule of the supreme court: Held, that under this authority the court might by general rule or special order in a particular case require parties to a cause submitted to it for decision to file printed briefs, and might tax the reasonable expense of printing the brief of the prevailing party against the losing party, as a necessary disbursement.

Appeal from taxation of costs by clerk.

John W. Whalley, for plaintiff.

H. Y. Thompson, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. The plaintiff in this action having obtained judgment [Case No. 10,083], filed a statement of costs and disbursements, as provided in section 546 of the Oregon Code of Civil Procedure, amounting to $86.47. The defendant objected to the item of $45 "for printing brief under the direction of the court." The clerk allowed the charge and the defendant appealed to the court. See section 547 of said Code.

In Ethridge v. Jackson [Case No. 4,541], this court held that by force of section 34 of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 92], now section 721 of the Revised Statutes, the law of the state regulating the allowance of costs and disbursements in civil actions at law was applicable to such actions in this court, unless where otherwise provided by congress.

Upon the argument of the appeal it was assumed by counsel that the allowance or rejection of the charge turned upon the construction of section 543 of the Oregon Code of Civil Procedure, which provides, that: "A party entitled to costs shall also be allowed for all necessary disbursements including the fees of officers and witnesses," etc. But this is a mistake. Section 984 of the Revised Statutes (section 20 of the act of 1853; 10 Stat. 161) prescribes what items of disbursement shall be taxed in favor of the prevailing party as follows: "The bill of fees of the clerk, marshal and attorney and the amount paid printers and witnesses * * * in cases where by law costs are recoverable in favor of the prevailing party shall be taxed by a judge or clerk of the court, and be included in and form a portion of a judgment or decree against the losing party."

The Revised Statutes (section 853) prescribe a printer's fee "for publishing any notice or order required by law or the lawful order of any court * * * in any newspaper," but do not provide any compensation for printing briefs.

But section 918 gives the court power to regulate practice therein, "as may be necessary and convenient for the advancement of justice and the prevention of delay in proceedings," provided such regulation is not inconsistent with any law of the United States or rule of the supreme court. The order in this case requiring the parties to file printed briefs was an order regulating the practice in the same, within the purview of this section. The printing and filing of such briefs was deemed "necessary and convenient" for a right understanding of the case, and therefore "the advancement of justice" therein. The supreme court of this state has, by rule 28 (2 Or. 15), required printed briefs to be filed in all cases heard in that court, and it is the practice therein, to tax the costs of such briefs in favor of the prevailing party as a "necessary disbursement," by reason of such rule.

The sum paid the printer by plaintiff for printing his brief is tacitly admitted to be a reasonable one. No objection is made to it on that ground. If the expense was incurred under a lawful order of this court, it is a necessary disbursement and ought to be taxed against the defendants.

The question turns, I think, upon whether the court had power under section 918, supra, to require the plaintiff to incur the expense of printing his brief. If it had, it seems to follow as a matter of course that it can provide that such expense be taxed against the defendant as a proper and necessary disbursement in the case.

Now as to the power of the court to require the printing of the brief, there is hardly room for doubt. The order is not inconsistent with any act of congress or rule of the supreme court. It is such an one as all courts of record, in the exercise of the power inherent in them to regulate the practice before them, are accustomed to make. It rests upon the same ground as the power of the supreme court of the state to make rule 28, supra, as well as rule 24, authorizing the clerk to tax against the losing party, as part of his costs, the sum of three dollars as a compensation for recording the opinion of the court. The taxation of the clerk is affirmed, with costs.

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Oct. 11, 1875.

CUTTING TIMBER—TREBLE DAMAGES—DEFENSE TO CLAIM FOR TREBLE DAMAGES—IRRELEVANT ALLEGATION — COUNTER-CLAIM — TAXES PAID BY PARTY IN POSSESSION — DAMAGES FOR WITHHOLDING POSSESSION AND DEFENSE THERETO—IMPROVEMENTS.

1. In an action for cutting or carrying away timber from the land of another to entitle the plaintiff to recover treble damages, judgment therefor must be demanded in the complaint, so that the defendant may be apprised of the claim, and the facts stated in the complaint must bring the case within the statute. Civ. Code Or. § 385.

2. The defense to a claim for treble damages in such an action must be pleaded, and it may be either: (1) That the trespass was casual or involuntary; (2) or that, at the time of the commission thereof, the defendant had probable cause to believe that the premises were his own, or those of the person under whom he acted; (3) or that the timber was taken from uninclosed woodland for the purpose of repairing a highway or bridge. Civ. Code Or. § 336.

3. An allegation which merely contains facts tending to prove either of said defenses is irrelevant and will be stricken out on motion.

4. A counter-claim is substantially a cross-action and should contain nothing but the facts necessary to constitute it; and if any other defense is inserted therein it may be stricken out.

5. In an action for damages for withholding the possession of real property, if the defendant held under color of title in good faith adversely to the claim of the plaintiff, taxes paid by him upon the property during such withholding are a proper subject of counter-claim.

6. In action to recover damages for wrongfully withholding the possession of real property, the plaintiff may allege and recover for any particular waste or injury committed by the defendant thereon during his possession, or he may omit all claim other than that arising from such waste or injury, but he cannot by so doing preclude the defendant from showing that the alleged waste or injury was committed while he was in the possession of the premises, claiming title thereto, in good faith, adversely to the plaintiff, and thereby prevent him from making any defense to which he may be entitled under these facts.

7. To enable a defendant to maintain a counter-claim for the value of improvements made upon the premises of another, it must appear therefrom that the improvements are affixed to the freehold and still existing, and that they better the condition of the property for the ordinary purposes for which it is used; and that they were made while the defendant, or those under whom he claims, were in possession under color of title, in good faith, adversely to the claim of the plaintiff. Civ. Code Or. § 318.

[Cited in Wythe v. Myers, Case No. 18,119.]

8. A counter-claim not containing these allegations, but only a statement of facts tending to prove them, will be stricken out as irrelevant.

[Cited in Wythe v. Myers, Case No. 18,119.]

[This was an action of Marcus Neff against Sylvester Pennoyer.] Motion to strike out counter-claim.

M. W. Fechheimer, for the motion.
H. Y. Thompson, contra.

DEADY, District Judge. This action is brought by the plaintiff as a citizen of California, against the defendant, a citizen of the state of Oregon, for wrongfully entering the plaintiff's close—a tract of land situated in Multnomah county, Oregon—on May 10, 1869, and on divers other days and times between that day and March 9, 1875, and then and there cutting and carrying away the trees and timber therefrom, and converting the same to his own use, and for then and there pulling down and destroying a certain log dwelling-house thereon; and also for removing and destroying a certain fence inclosing an orchard growing thereon, whereby stock and cattle entered upon said orchard and destroyed the same, to the damage of the plaintiff $4,600.

The answer of the defendant consists of a denial of the material allegations of the complaint, except the one concerning his own citizenship, and a counter-claim styled "a further and separate answer," in which it is alleged that the defendant entered into the peaceable possession of the premises on January 14, 1867, as a purchaser at a sale made upon an execution, issued out of the circuit court for the county and state aforesaid, upon a judgment wherein J. H. Mitchell was plaintiff and the plaintiff herein defendant, and that he occupied them in good faith as such purchaser until 1875, when he was evicted therefrom upon a judgment of this court [Case No. 10,083]; that during such occupation he paid $121.55 of taxes duly levied upon said premises and erected thereon a board cabin which still remains, at a cost of $35; that he removed certain fallen and standing timber from said premises for the purpose of clearing a portion of them for pasture, and that said clearing was a benefit to the premises, and worth the sum of $600.

The plaintiff moves to strike out four separate parts of the counter-claim, which taken together constitute the whole of it, as being irrelevant and redundant. The first allegation asked to be stricken out is the one concerning the circumstances under which the defendant entered and occupied the premises. On the argument it was assumed that this allegation was inserted in the counter-claim to show that the trespass complained of is not within section 385 of the Oregon Civil Code, which provides, that in case of trespass by cutting or carrying away "any tree, timber or shrub on the land of another * * * without lawful authority, * * * if the judgment be given for the plaintiff, it shall be given for treble the amount of damages claimed or assessed therefor as the case may be." Counsel for the plaintiff disclaims the right to recover treble damages in this action, the demand in the complaint being for single damages only.

To entitle the plaintiff to recover treble damages, judgment therefor must be demanded in the complaint, so that the defendant may be apprised of the claim, and the facts stated must bring the case within the statute. Newcomb v. Butterfield, 8 Johns. 345; Chipman v. Emeric, 5 Cal. 239; Mooers v. Allen, 2 Wend. 247.

The case made by the complaint being for single damages the allegation in question is so far irrelevant and ought to go out. But if it had been otherwise the allegation would be irrelevant. Where an action is brought for cutting timber, on the land of another, without authority, the defense against a claim for treble damages must be pleaded, and it may be either: (1) That the trespass was casual or involuntary; (2) or that, at the time of the commission thereof, the defendant had probable cause to believe the premises were his own or those of the person under whom he acted; (3) or that the timber was taken from uninclosed woodland for the purpose of repairing a highway or bridge. Civ. Code Or. § 336.

The second one of the defenses appears to have been in the mind of the pleader when this allegation was drawn, but instead of alleging directly that at the time of cutting the timber the defendant had probable cause to believe the premises were his own, the circumstances of the purchase and entry are detailed, from which it may be inferred that he had such cause so to believe. This is pleading the evidence—the probative facts instead of the ultimate ones. Therefore, as a pleading it is irrelevant. Besides, this allegation considered as a defense to a claim for treble damages, is improperly inserted in a counter-claim. It should have been pleaded separately. This counter-claim for taxes paid and improvements made upon the premises is in no way dependent upon the plaintiff's claim for treble damages or the defendant's defense to it. A counter-claim is substantially a cross-action and should not contain anything but the facts necessary to constitute it. If the defendant has any other defense to the action, either absolutely or as to the demand therein for treble damages, he must plead it separately.

As to the payment of taxes by one who holds the premises under color of title in good faith, adversely to the claim of another, I think, it is a proper subject of counter-claim in an action by the true owner for damages for withholding the possession of the premises. It is a cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint—the occupation of the premises by the defendant. As was said in this court in Stark v. Starr [Case No. 13,307]: "The expenditure was not made voluntarily by the defendant, but in obedience to the law and for the benefit of the property, and consequently its owner. It is the duty of a party in possession of property, claiming title or interest therein to pay all lawful taxes and charges imposed thereon by public authority. If he neglect to do this, and purchase the property at a sale for these taxes, he acquires no right thereby, because his conduct is deemed fraudulent as against the true owner. As it turns out, these taxes were paid by the defendant for the benefit of the plaintiff. If the former had not paid them the latter must, or allowed the property to have been sold as delinquent. Therefore in estimating the damages to which the plaintiff is entitled for being kept out of possession, the amount of the assessment must be deducted from the gross rents, and the remainder is the true profits or damages." Bright v. Boyd [Case No. 1,875]. It is true that the plaintiff in this action has not sued for mesne profits or damages for withholding the premises eo nomine, but for certain trespasses alleged to have been committed thereon by the defendant. But if the fact is, as stated in this counter-claim, that the plaintiff was at the time in the occupation of the premises as a purchaser in good faith at a sale upon an execution against the property of the plaintiff, then this is substantially an action to recover damages for withholding the possession of the premises, in which the plaintiff may also recover for any particular waste or injury committed by the defendant thereon during his occupation. 1 Chit. Pl. 225.

In such action the plaintiff may omit all claim for damages other than those arising from the alleged waste or injury to the premises, but he cannot by so doing preclude the defendant from showing that such waste or injury was committed while he was in possession of the premises claiming the title thereto, in good faith, adversely to the plaintiff, and thereby prevent him from making any defense to which he may be entitled under these facts.

To enable the defendant to maintain a counter-claim for the value of improvements made upon the premises it must appear therefrom that the improvements are permanent—affixed to the freehold and still existing—and that they ameliorate or better the condition of the property for the ordinary purposes for which it is owned and used (Stark v. Starr, supra); and that they were made while the defendant or those under whom he claims were in possession under color of title in good faith, adversely to the claim of the plaintiff.

Here, the allegation in the counter-claim, as to the circumstances under which the defendant entered and held possession of the premises as has been stated, contains facts tending to show that the defendant occupied under color of title in good faith, adversely to the plaintiff, but the proper mode of pleading is to allege such facts directly and not other ones tending to prove them.

From the facts stated concerning the alleged improvements it appears that the clearing of the portion of the land for pasture was and is a benefit to the premises, but it does not appear that the cabin is any benefit to the property or what its present value is.

The motion to strike out is allowed as a whole.

MARINE INSURANCE—DAMAGE BY ACTUAL CONTACT OF SEA WATER—DAMPNESS OF A SHIP'S HOLD.

1. The shipper of a cargo of barley, in sacks, from San Francisco to New York, insured it against perils of the seas. The policy contained a memorandum clause by which grain was to be "free from average unless general," also "free from damage or injury from dampness, change of flavor, or being spotted, discolored, musty or mouldy, except caused by actual contact of sea water with the articles damaged, occasioned by sea perils," also "subject to 20 per cent particular average." The ship met with heavy weather on the voyage and put into Rio, leaking, where, part of her cargo having been discharged, she was repaired and then, having been reloaded, she completed the voyage to New York. On the discharge of the cargo, a portion of the sacks were found to have been wet with sea water, and the barley in them damaged thereby, but the damage on that part of the cargo did not equal 20 per cent of the property insured. But it was found that the malting quality of the rest of the cargo had been destroyed, as it was claimed, by dampness of the hold, arising from the leak, and such damage amounting to more than 20 per cent, a libel was filed against the underwriters to recover the whole loss: Held, that, assuming that the damage to the sacks of barley, which were not reached by the sea water, was caused by damp vapor arising from other sacks that were reached by the sea water which came into the vessel through a peril of the seas, such damage was not caused by actual contact of sea water with the articles damaged, within the meaning of the policy; and that the insurance company was not liable on the policy.

2. The cases of Woodruff v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co. (2 Hilt. 130), and Cory v. Boylston Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 107 Mass. 143, commented on.

BENEDICT, District Judge. In October, 1876, the libellants obtained from the defendant, by open policy and certificates, insurance to the amount of $17,600 upon 21,068 43/48 bushels of barley from San Francisco to New York on the ship Blue Jacket. The policy was in the usual American form against perils of the seas. By the memorandum clause grain of all kinds was warranted by the assured "free from average unless general," and also "free from damage or injury from dampness, change of flavor, or being spotted, discolored, musty or mouldy, except caused by actual contact of sea water with the articles damaged, occasioned by sea perils." The memorandum was qualified by the certificates, which contained the words, "Subject to 20 per cent particular average."

The barley was shipped in sacks, and the bills of lading issued therefor described the property as so many sacks of barley. There was other barley in the ship—also shipped in sacks—and there was some pig lead, wool, rags, borax and other cargo. The barley was stowed in tiers, the lower tier resting upon a grain ceiling over the pig lead, old sails being spread for dunnage between the ceiling and the ground tier of barley. During the voyage and while the ship was in the South Atlantic, she sprung a leak through a peril of the seas, and thereby sea water was taken into the hold, which came in actual contact with those sacks of barley composing the lower tiers, and with some in the wings. In consequence of the leak, the vessel bore up for Rio, where she arrived on the 15th day of January, having experienced heavy weather and having at times had from 22 to 24 inches of water in her hold. Upon arrival in Rio all the cargo except the barley composing the lower tier and some in the after end of the ship was taken out. The ship was then docked and repaired. The barley and other cargo taken out was then restowed in the ship, and on the 18th day of March the ship sailed for New York, where she arrived without further disaster on the 11th day of May. Upon discharging the cargo in New York, certain of the libellants' bags, especially those composing the lower tier, showed marks of sea water, and were caked and badly damaged by actual contact with sea water.

The evidence will not permit the conclusion that of the libellants' bags a greater number than 5,360 were in actual contact with sea water. Indeed, it is quite evident that the number of bags so damaged was less than 5,360. The rest of the barley was bright in color, and to all external appearance merchantable. But by testing samples it was discovered that the malting quality of the barley had been destroyed, and in consequence it was unsaleable as merchantable barley fit for malting. Accordingly all was sold at auction, when it brought a price far less than the market price of barley fit for malting.

This action was then brought by the owners of the barley against the underwriters, to recover for the loss upon the barley insured by them, as ascertained by the auction sale.

In regard to the 5,360 sacks above mentioned, it may, for the purposes of this case, be considered to have been proven that the damage was caused by actual contact of sea water with those sacks. In regard to the damage to the remainder, it may, for the purposes of this case, be considered to have been shown to have been caused by dampness in the ship's hold. The most favorable view for the libellants is to consider the evidence as warranting the inference that the sea water which leaked into the ship prior to her arrival at Rio, by creating a damp atmosphere in the hold caused germination to commence in the barley, which being thereafter checked by heat, left the barley dry, bright, and to all appearances sound, but incapable of further germination.

It is conceded that the loss on the 5,360 sacks is not sufficient to charge the underwriters—that loss not amounting to 20 per cent of the property insured. But if to the loss on the 5,360 sacks there be added the loss on the remainder, arising from the destruction of the malting capacity, then the amount of loss is sufficient to warrant a recovery upon the policy. The question to be determined, therefore, is, whether the underwriter is liable upon the policy for damage to sacks of barley that were never reached by the sea water, assuming it to have been shown that such damage was caused by damp vapor arising from other sacks that were reached by the sea water which came into the vessel through a peril of the seas. Was such damage caused by actual contact of sea water with the articles damaged, within the meaning of the warranty in the policy contained? If so, the libellants are entitled to recover; otherwise, not.

The question thus presented does not appear to have been passed on in the national courts of the United States. It has, however, been considered in the state courts, and the cases there adjudged deserve respectful attention. It will conduce to the understanding of those cases to notice the circumstances under which the warranty in question came to be inserted in policies of insurance, and then to examine in chronological order the adjudications made in regard to the effect produced by the provisions.

In the year 1851 a question arose in the English courts in regard to the liability of an underwriter in a case where hides and tobacco had been shipped together, and the tobacco was injured in flavor by a fetid odor arising from the hides, which had been wet by sea water shipped during the voyage by peril of the seas. The policy contained no limitation of the underwriter's liability other than that contained in the ordinary memoranda, and the plaintiff recovered, upon the ground that the natural and almost inevitable cause of the flavor communicated to the tobacco was the access of sea water to the hides by a peril of the sea. Under such a policy it is not necessary, said Martin, B., "that sea water should be in absolute contact with the injured article." Montoya v. London Assur. Co., 6 Exch. 459.

In the same year the case of Baker v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., 12 Gray, 603, came before the supreme court of Massachusetts when the liability of the underwriter was asserted in respect to damage to delicate French goods arising from an extraordinary formation of steam and gases occasioned by an extraordinary access of sea water to the hold, caused by perils of the seas.

In consequence of these decisions—as it has been supposed, and as the language of the warranty indicates—the warranty under consideration was thereafter inserted in policies, whereby the property insured is "warranted by the assured free from damage or injury from dampness, change of flavor, or being spotted, discolored, musty or mouldy, except caused by actual contact of sea water with the articles damaged occasioned by sea perils."

In 1858 the effect of this warranty came to be considered by the court of common pleas in the city of New York, in the case of Woodruff v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co., 2 Hilt. 130, and upon that case the libellants in this action place their chief reliance. The action was upon a policy similar to the one here sued on, to recover for damage to wheat loaded in sacks. The evidence disclosed three kinds of injury. Some of the sacks were damaged by sea water leaking upon them; other sacks were damaged by dampness arising from the sacks that had been in actual contact with sea water; and there was damage caused by effluvia that arose from hides forming part of the cargo which had been wet by sea water through a peril of the sea. The judgment of the court was that the underwriters were not liable for the damage caused by the effluvia from the hides, but were liable for the other damage.

The ground upon which the court based the distinction drawn between the damage caused by effluvia and that caused by dampness, is to be found in the opinion delivered by Brady, J., where it is said: "If sea water be communicated by absorption, or makes its way upon any other principle of natural philosophy from the articles wet to any part of the same article, the actual contact contemplated by the policy is created." The same idea is conveyed by the language used in the opinion delivered by Judge Ingraham, when, in concurring with Judge Brady, he says: "The dampness referred to in the warranty is dampness to the article when it has come in contact with sea water."

From these expressions it may be inferred that no damage was considered by the court of common pleas to be chargeable to the underwriter, except such as appeared to have been caused by sea water that had been communicated from one bag to another by absorption, or upon some other principle of natural philosophy; and it seems difficult to understand how the court reached its result upon any other ground.

It is not stated in the opinions that the shipment, constituted as it was, of various sacks of wheat, was considered to be a single article; and unless the decision was that the sea water had passed to all the sacks allowed for in the judgment, it would seem that the sacks damaged by effluvia would have been placed in the same category with those damaged by the vapor of the water,—the effluvia, as well as the vapor, being the natural result of the sea water in the ship. If this be the ground of the distinction that was there made between the damp sacks and those damaged by effluvia only, the case affords little support to the libellants here, for in this case the question is in regard to bags of grain to which sea water was never communicated by absorption or otherwise.

But however the case of Woodruff v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co. may be understood, its weight as authority in favor of the libellants is more than counterbalanced by the decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts in the subsequent case of Cory v. Boylston Fire & Marine Ins. Co., decided in 1871, and reported in 107 Mass. 146; also in 9 Am. Rep. 14. This was a case upon a policy of insurance similar to that issued to libellants. The loss sought to be recovered arose from damage to champagne wine packed in cases and valued by the case. The ruling was that under such a warranty "it is not enough to bring a case within this clause that perils of the sea should be the efficient and, within the rule laid down in the previous decisions, the proximate cause by which the sea water was shipped which more or less directly operates upon and injures the goods; or that sea water should come in contact with part of the cargo; but it must come into actual contact with the articles for the damage to which the underwriters are sought to be charged."

The result of this ruling was that the underwriter was absolved from liability upon a state of facts curiously resembling, as the court remarks, those in the former case of Baker v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., where the same tribunal had held the underwriters liable. The difference in result arose simply from the insertion of the warranty under consideration here. The case is directly in point and it is adverse to the claim of these libellants.

I have not overlooked the suggestion made in behalf of the libellants that a distinction between that case and this arises from the fact that there the wine was valued by the case in the policy, while here the policy is open. But this is a distinction without a difference. Inserting in the policy a valuation of the articles by the case does not change the nature of the contract. It is still a policy in gross upon a shipment consisting of different articles (Hernandez v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co. [Case No. 6,415]); and so far as the question under consideration is involved the two policies are alike.

The conclusion reached by the supreme court of Massachusetts commends itself to my judgment. It is certainly in harmony with the letter of the warranty, and as I think with the spirit and intention of the parties; and no arguments have been here presented sufficient to lead me to a different conclusion.

It has been said that the vapor arising from sea water is sea water within the meaning of the warranty. But the difference between a case where damage arises from sea water carried by absorption or capillary attraction, and one where the damage is caused by the vapor evolved from sea water, is palpable. The risk is different in the two cases, not only in degree but in character, because the vapor of water is communicated under different circumstances and in obedience to different laws from those that control the movements of water.

Nor can the position be maintained that the barley shipped by the libellants is to be deemed for the purpose of the insurance to be a single article, and, as in Woodruff v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co., the insurer be held liable upon the ground that all the damage arose from sea water having been communicated by absorption or having made its way upon some other principle of natural philosophy from one part of the article to another part of the same article. For, however the fact may have appeared in Woodruff v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co., in this case the evidence forbids the conclusion that sea water was ever communicated to any sacks except the 5,360 sacks that displayed marks of the contact of sea water. It is, therefore, impossible upon the evidence in this case to hold that the disputed damage was occasioned by the actual contact of sea water with a part of the article insured. Nor can a shipment of grain in bags be deemed to consist of a single article.

In a case of insurance upon hides before the supreme court of the United States (Bias

v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 416) the insurance was described as an "insurance in gross on a cargo consisting of a distinct number of articles." If such be the character of an insurance upon hides, certainly an insurance upon grain in sacks cannot be said to consist of a single article.

But it is said, if this be an insurance of many different articles in gross the different kernels of grain constitute the articles of which it is composed, and inasmuch as it would be absurd to suppose an intention by the warranty to compel the insurer to show actual contact of sea water with each kernel of grain, it must have been the intention to treat the barley as consisting of a single article when applying the provision of the warranty. If this were the intention no advantage would result to the libellants, for, as before stated, the damage in dispute did not result from the contact of sea water, but from the contact of vapor. Besides, policies of insurance are commercial contracts, to be construed and applied in view of the methods pursued by the merchants in their dealings with each other, and among merchants no notice is taken of the possibility that some of the kernels in a sack of grain that is wet may escape contact with the water; but in the absence of evidence to the contrary they act upon the assumption—sufficiently accurate for all practical purposes—that when sea water comes in contact with a sack of grain it will by absorption be brought in contact with all the grain in the sack. And in such case they would, when ascertaining the part damaged, treat each sack as constituting a single article. The more reasonable supposition, therefore, is, that it was the intention of the parties to this contract that in applying the warranty each sack of grain should be deemed a distinct article. So understood, the warranty will read: "This grain is warranted free from damage or injury from dampness, unless such dampness be caused by actual contact of sea water with the damp sack." If the policy had contained a warranty so worded it would scarcely have been claimed that the insurer was liable for any damage outside of the 5,360 bags which showed marks of the actual contact of sea water.

My conclusion, therefore, is that the libellants have failed to show that a loss equal to 20 per cent of the value insured was occasioned by any peril insured against, and their libel must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

LIMITATIONS OF ACTIONS — OFFER OF COMPROMISE—EFFECT.

The offer of terms of compromise is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations.

[See Ash v. Hayman, Case No. 572; Bank of Columbia v. Sweeny, Id. 882.]

To take the case out of the statute of limitations, the plaintiff offered evidence of the acknowledgments of the defendant's intestate, Campbell, when offering a compromise, viz. that Campbell acknowledged the debt to be due by Campbell and Matlock, and offered to pay one-half, although he said he was discharged by the insolvent law of Missouri, if the plaintiff would give him time.

Mr. Key, for defendant, objected to this evidence, and cited Baird v. Rice, 1 Call, 26.

Mr. Marbury, contra, cited 3 Esp. 113.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) decided that the acknowledgment, under those circumstances, could not be given in evidence. Verdict for the defendant.

ARMY AND NAVY—POWER TO DISCHARGE—ACTS OF FEBRUARY 24 AND JULY 4, 1864—SECRETARY OF WAR—STATE COURTS—HABEAS CORPUS—RETURN.

1. Under section 20 of the act of February 24, 1864 (13 Stat. 10), and section 5 of the act of July 4, 1864 (13 Stat. 380), the power of discharging from service in the army of the United States minors under the age of eighteen years, is taken away from the courts and is confided wholly to the secretary of war; and the whole power of discharge is thereby given to the secretary of war in regard to minors, whatever their ages when they enlisted or when they apply for discharge.

2. A state court, judge or officer is without jurisdiction to release a soldier, on habeas corpus, when is appears, prima facie, that he is held to service in the army by an officer acting under the authority of the United States and claiming to hold him as an enlisted soldier.

[Cited in McConologue's Case, 107 Mass. 159.]

3. In return to such writ, such officer is not bound to produce the body of the soldier.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission. 5 Am. Law Rev. 566, contains only a partial report.]

4. Under the statute of New York (2 Rev. St. 566, § 32), a return to a writ of habeas corpus issued by a state judge, need not be verified by oath, when such return is made by an officer of the army of the United States.

5. Where such officer, for not producing the body of the soldier, and for not making a sworn return to the writ, was imprisoned for contempt, by the state court, this court, on a writ of habeas corpus, discharged him from imprisonment. Such power of discharge exists under section 7 of the act of March 2, 1833 (4 Stat. 634), and section 1 of the act of February 5, 1867 (14 Stat. 385).

Noah Davis, Dist. Att'y, and Asa B. Gardner, for the United States and the relator.

Aaron J. Vanderpoel, for the state sheriff.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the 4th of January, 1871, a petition was presented to the Honorable John H. McCunn, a judge of the superior court of the city of New York, by one John Casey. The petition set forth, that the said Casey "is at present restrained of his liberty at Fort Columbus, a military depot, in the port of New York; that said John Casey is a minor and under the age of twenty-one years;" and that "the cause or pretence of such imprisonment and restraint, according to the best knowledge and belief of your petitioner, is, that said John Casey, while such minor as aforesaid, enlisted in the United States army, at the city of New York, on or about the 23d day of December, 1870, without the knowledge or consent of his parents, who are both living." The petition prayed, that a writ of habeas corpus might issue, directed "to the officer in command of said Fort Columbus, in said port of New York, commanding him to produce the body of said John Casey." The judge to whom the petition was presented, acting as an officer authorized to perform the duties of a justice of the supreme court at chambers (2 Rev. St. 564, § 23, subdiv. 2), granted a writ of habeas corpus, on the 4th of January, 1871, directed to "the officer in command of Fort Columbus, a military depot in the port of New York, General Neill," commanding him to produce the body of John Casey, together with the time and cause of his imprisonment and detention, before the said judge, in the said superior court, on the 9th of January, 1871. The writ was issued and duly served.

The time for making return to the writ was extended by the attorney for Casey until the 11th of January, 1871. On that day, General Neill made to the judge who issued the writ a written return, signed by him, but not verified by his oath, in the following words: "Head-Quarters, Principal Depot General Recruiting Service, Fort Columbus, New York Harbor, January 11th, 1871. To the Honorable John H. McCunn, Judge of the Superior Court of the City of New York: Sir. I have the honor to make return to the within writ of habeas corpus, issued in the case of John Casey, a private soldier in the service of the United States, that the said John Casey is a regular enlisted soldier, and held to service in the army of the United States, by virtue of said enlistment; that the said John Casey was regularly enlisted into the service of the United States, according to the laws governing the recruiting service for enlisting recruits, by his signing the proper statement or declaration required for recruits to take, and that the paper here annexed, marked 'A,' is one of the duplicate enlistment papers in the case of the said John Casey; that the oath was regularly administered by an officer authorized to administer oaths, and that the recruit was regularly examined by the surgeon appointed for that purpose; that, under the decisions of the judge advocate general of the army, it is not my duty to produce the body of said John Casey in court; that such declination and denial of the jurisdiction of your honor is a matter of official duty, and not from any disrespect or contempt of your honorable court. Your attention is respectfully invited to the enclosed extract from the Digest of Opinions of the Judge Advocate General of the Army, (published by authority,) and points of law, which constitute the precedents on which this return is based. I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant. Thos. H. Neill, Lt.-Col. 6th U. S. Cavalry, and Bvt.-Brigadier General U. S. A., Commanding Depot."

Annexed to the return were what purported to be copies of the enlistment papers referred to in the return. Among them was an oath of enlistment and allegiance, signed by Casey, and subscribed and sworn to by him, December 23d, 1870, before "F. E. Camp, Captain U. S. Army, Recruiting Officer." This oath was in the following words: "State of New York, Town of New York, ss: I, John Casey, born in Brooklyn, in the state of New York, and by occupation a plumber, do hereby acknowledge to have voluntarily enlisted, this twenty-third day of December, 1870, as a soldier in the army of the United States of America, for the period of five years, unless sooner discharged by proper authority, and do also agree to accept from the United States such bounty, pay, rations and clothing as are or may be established by law. And I do solemnly swear, that I am twenty-one years and eleven months of age, and know of no impedient to my serving honestly and faithfully as a soldier for five years, under this enlistment contract with the United States. And I, John Casey, do also solemnly swear, that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America, and that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against all their enemies or opposers whomsoever, and that I will observe and obey the orders of the president of the United States, and the orders of the officers appointed over me according to the rules and articles of war." Another of the enlistment papers was a certificate signed by Captain Camp, certifying, on honor, that he had carefully examined Casey, agreeably to the general regulations of the army, and that, in his opinion, he was free from all bodily defects and mental infirmity which would in any way disqualify him from performing the duties of a soldier. Another of the enlistment papers was a certificate signed by Captain Camp, certifying, on honor, that he had minutely inspected Casey previously to his enlistment, that he was entirely sober when enlisted, that, to the best of his, Camp's, judgment and belief, Casey was of lawful age, and that he, Camp, had accepted and enlisted him into the service of the United States, under such contract of enlistment, as duly qualified to perform the duties of an able bodied soldier, and, in doing so, had strictly observed the regulations governing the recruiting service. He also certified a description of Casey's person. Another of the enlistment papers was a declaration, signed by Casey, in the presence of a subscribing witness, and dated December 23d, 1870, in the words following: "I, John Casey, desiring to enlist in the army of the United States, for the term of five years, do declare, that I have neither wife nor child, that I have never been discharged from the United States service on account of disability, or by sentence of a court martial, or by order before the expiration of the term of enlistment, and that I am of the legal age to enlist of my own accord, and believe myself to be physically qualified to perform the duties of an able-bodied soldier." Another of the enlistment papers was a paper containing the details of the examination of Casey as to his physical condition. The extract and points of law referred to in the return were annexed thereto in print. The body of Casey was not produced with the return.

On the 12th of January, 1871, Judge McCunn issued, under his hand and seal, a warrant, in the name of the people of the state of New York, directed to the sheriff of the city and county of New York, and in the words following: "It appearing satisfactorily to me, on oath, that Thomas H. Neill, the officer in command at Fort Columbus, in the port of New York, to whom a writ of habeas corpus was directed and delivered, commanding him to bring before me John Casey, in the said writ named, has refused to obey the said writ, according to the command thereof, in not producing the said John Casey before me, and also by not making a full and explicit return to said writ, within the time limited by law, and no sufficient excuse having been shown for such refusal, these are, therefore, to authorize and command you, in the name of the people of the state of New York, forthwith to arrest the said Thomas H. Neill, and to bring him immediately before me, at part one of the superior court of the city of New York, in the said county of New York." Under such warrant, the said sheriff, on the 17th of January, 1871, arrested General Neill, and took him into custody.

At this stage of the proceedings, a petition was presented to me by General Neill, praying that a writ of habeas corpus might be issued to the said sheriff, to inquire into the cause of his imprisonment. A copy of the warrant of attachment was annexed to the petition, and the petition set forth the causes of the issuing of the warrant, in substance, as they are above stated, namely, the issuing of such writ of habeas corpus by Judge McCunn, and the making of such return to it. The petition averred, that the ground for the issuing of the attachment was, that General Neill had not produced Casey before Judge McCunn, on the writ of habeas corpus. The petition also stated, that General Neill had submitted to the service of the process of attachment by the sheriff, at his post of Fort Columbus, relying on this court for relief under the statutes of the United States, and from a belief that, with such remedy, it did not befit him to resist by force such process of attachment; that his action in the premises had been in accordance with the orders of the secretary of war; that the issuing of the attachment was coram non judice; and that he was, under it, restrained of his liberty, for acts done or omitted to be done by him in pursuance of a law of, and under color of the rightful authority of, the United States, he being lieutenant-colonel of the Sixth United States cavalry, and a brevet brigadier-general in the United States army, and commandant of the post of Fort Columbus, a military site of the United States. This petition was acccompanied by an affidavit of the military officer who presented to Judge McCunn the return of General Neill, showing its presentation, and that the judge refused to receive it because Casey was not produced.

On this petition and affidavit, I issued, on the 17th of January, 1871, a writ of habeas corpus to the said sheriff, commanding him to produce General Neill forthwith before this court, together with the time and cause of his imprisonment and detention. The writ was served on the sheriff, and he produced General Neill before this court, and made return, that he held him in custody by virtue of said warrant of attachment, of which a copy was annexed to his return.

This return was traversed by the United States, by its attorney, and by General Neill, as relator, in person, by a traverse averring, that, "while it is true that said sheriff has arrested the said relator by virtue of the said writ of attachment annexed to said return, and holds him in custody thereunder, yet the said arrest and detention are unlawful and in violation of the constitution and laws of the United States, for that the several facts and allegations in the petition of the said relator, in respect to the proceedings before the said, the Hon. John H. McCunn, and in respect to the return to the writ issued by him, and the several facts stated in said return, are, in all things, true, in substance and matter of fact, as alleged and set forth in said petition, and they pray leave to refer to said petition and said return, with the same force and effect as though embodied herein." The sheriff put in a reply to this traverse, denying the same and averring that, "if the same is true, it is not sufficient, and this respondent ought not, by reason of any matter therein contained, to be prevented from executing the attachment held by him."

On the issues thus raised oral testimony was taken before me, which disclosed the state of facts above set forth, and the further fact, that, on the presentation of the return to Judge McCunn, the counsel for Casey objected to it, on the ground that it was not verified by oath, and also that the body of Casey was not produced, and that the judge thereupon refused to receive the return as sufficient, adding that he would receive no return until Casey was produced.

In the case of In re Riley [Case No. 11,834], in September, 1867, it was decided by me, in the district court for this district, following two prior decisions of the same court, made by Judge Betts, that, by virtue of the provisions of the twentieth section of the act of February 24, 1864 (13 Stat. 10), and of the fifth section of the act of July 4, 1864 (13 Stat. 380), the power of discharging from service in the army of the United States minors under the age of eighteen years, (the enlistment of minors above the age of eighteen years, without the consent of their parents or guardians, being lawful,) was taken away from the courts, and was confided wholly to the secretary of war; and that the whole power of discharge was thereby given to the secretary of war in regard to minors, whatever their ages when they enlisted or when they applied for discharge. The general term of the supreme court of New York for this district, in January, 1867, in the case of In re O'Connor, 48 Barb. 258, decided that congress had power to pass an act prohibiting the state judges from interfering with enlistments in the army; that it had done so by the two acts of 1864 and the act of February 13, 1862 (12 Stat. 339); and that the provision made by the acts of 1864 for a discharge by the secretary of war, on certain terms and conditions, of minors enlisted in the army, must be held to forbid other modes of obtaining discharges, and to be an assumption of exclusive jurisdiction, in cases of the kind, by the federal government. This decision was made on a return which was in all essential particulars like the return made to Judge McCunn in the case of Casey, and stated that the officer (General Butterfield) denied the jurisdiction of the state court, and refused to produce the body of the soldier. Such decision of the supreme court has not been overruled by any superior authority, and was binding upon Judge McCunn, who, in issuing the writ of habeas corpus which he issued, acted, as before stated, under the statute of New York, solely as a justice of the supreme court at chambers. The decision does not show that the return made by General Butterfield was verified by oath, and it is understood that it was not. The decision was concurred in by Justices Ingraham and Clerke, and dissented from by Mr. Justice Leonard. But, in July, 1867, the case of James Stokes, Jr., like that of Casey in all its features, came before Judge Leonard, and he dismissed the writ of habeas corpus on the return. The same course was taken by Judge Loew, of the New York common pleas, in the case of Thomas Somers, in December, 1869, and by Mr. Justice Barnard, of the New York supreme court, in the same month, in the case of Herman Hattenhorst. These three cases were subsequent to the decision in the case of O'Connor, and so was the decision in Rielly's Case, 2 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 334, made in March, 1867, by Judge Daly, of the New York common pleas, in which case, which was one like that of Casey, he held that, on the return, the writ must be discharged. The same course had been taken by Mr. Justice Barnard, in October, 1866, in the case of David Clarke, and, in November, 1866, in the case of Isaac Kent. I have before me the original papers in the cases of Stokes, Somers, Hattenhorst, Clarke, and Kent, with the signatures upon them of the several judges referred to, discharging the writs on the returns. In all of them, as well as in the case of Rielly, the officer to whom the writ was directed stated, in his return, that he denied the jurisdiction of the state court, and refused to produce the body of the soldier, and the return was, in substance, the same as that in the case of Casey. In all of them, except that of Rielly, the original papers show that the return of the officer was not verified by oath. I have not before me the original papers in the case of Rielly, but the report of the case does not show that the return was verified by oath, and it is understood that it was not.

These decisions were all made on the ground that the state court, judge or officer is utterly without jurisdiction to release the soldier on habeas corpus, when it appears, prima facie, that he is held to service in the army by an officer acting under the authority of the United States and claiming to hold him as an enlisted soldier; and that the inquiry whether he is an enlisted soldier, or whether he could be lawfully enlisted, is one of which the state tribunal, from that moment, ceases to have jurisdiction. In the case of Casey, not only did this appear from the return made by General Neill, but it also appeared from the petition presented to Judge McCunn for the allowance of the writ. The petition alleged that Casey "was restrained of his liberty at Fort Columbus, a militiary depot, in the port of New York," and that the cause of his restraint was, that he "enlisted in the United States army, at the city of New York, on or about the 23d day of December, 1870," and prayed for a writ to be issued, "directed to the officer in command of said Fort Columbus, in said port of New York." The only allegation in the petition as to any illegality or irregularity in his enlistment was, that he enlisted while a minor, under the age of twenty-one years, without the knowledge or consent of his parents, who were both living. The petition itself, therefore, showed, on its face, that Casey was held to service in the army, by an officer acting under the authority of the United States, and claiming to hold him as an enlisted soldier, and, therefore, showed that Judge McCunn had no jurisdiction to issue the writ. But if, under the statute of New York, it was imperative on the judge to issue the writ, his want of jurisdiction in the case appeared clearly from the return.

It was not necessary that the return should be verified by oath. I must regard the decisions made in the cases I have referred to, where the returns made by the military officers were none of them verified by oath, as authoritative that the oath was not necessary. The statute of New York (2 Rev. St. 566, § 32) provides that, except where the person making the return "shall be a sworn public officer, and shall make his return in an official capacity, it shall be verified by his oath." General Neill was a sworn public officer, within the meaning of this provision, and he made his return in his official capacity. The writ issued by Judge McCunn was addressed to "the officer in command of Fort Columbus, a military depot, in the port of New York, General Neill." The return is headed: "Headquarters Principal Depot, General Recruiting Service, Fort Columbus, New York Harbor," and General Neill's signature to the return is: "Thos. H. Neill, Lt. Col. 6th U. S. Cavalry, and Bvt. Brigadier General U. S. A., Commanding Depot." The writ, based on the petition, treated him as an officer, and as an officer of the United States army, and as a public officer, and as an officer in command of the military depot where Casey was restrained of his liberty, and as the officer who, in his official capacity as such commandant, was restraining Casey of his liberty, and it called upon him to make his return in such official capacity, and he did so. He is an officer of the United States, and a public officer, appointed by the president by and with the advice and consent of the senate, under article 2, section 2, subdivision 2, of the constitution of the United States. He is, also, an executive officer of the United States, under the second article of such constitution, and, as such, required, by article 6, section 3, of such constitution, to take an oath or affirmation to support such constitution. The form of such oath or affirmation is prescribed by section 1 of the act of June 1, 1789 (1 Stat. 23), and by section 4 of the same act, all officers thereafter to be appointed under the authority of the United States are required, before they act in their respective offices, to take the same oath of office. Furthermore, by the eighteenth section of the act of January 11, 1812 (2 Stat. 673), every officer is required to take and subscribe an oath or affirmation that he will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States, and that he will serve them honestly and faithfully against their enemies and opposers whomsoever, and that he will observe and obey the orders of the president of the United States, and the orders of the officers appointed over him, according to the rules and articles of war. Being found acting as such public officer, and being treated as such by the writ issued to him, he must, in such collateral proceeding, be regarded as having taken the required oaths and become a sworn public officer.

In either event, therefore, whether General Neill was or was not required to make a return to the writ, he was not required to make a sworn return. If there was no jurisdiction to issue the writ, no return at all was necessary. If a return was required, he was, by the statute, exempted, as a sworn public officer, from verifying it by oath.

Nor was he bound to produce the body of Casey. It was held by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 506, 523, that, where a state court or judge is without jurisdiction to release on habeas corpus, in a given case, a person held in custody under the authority of the United States, it is the duty of the officer who so holds such person in custody not to take such person, or suffer him to be taken, before the state court or judge, on the habeas corpus, and, also, his duty, if the state court or judge attempts to control him in any respect in his custody of such person, to resist such attempt by force. That case is also an authority to the point, that there was no power in the state judge to issue the writ of habeas corpus in the case of Casey, on the facts set forth in the petition for the writ.

As the state judge had no jurisdiction to proceed in the case of Casey, certainly after the return made by General Neill, and no jurisdiction to require the body of Casey to be produced, or to require any other or further return to the writ, he was without jurisdiction to issue the warrant of attachment against General Neill, which states, on its face, that it is issued solely because General Neill did not produce the body of Casey, and did not make any other return to the writ of habeas corpus than the return which he is shown to have made.

The next question is, whether the court has power, on the writ of habeas corpus issued to the sheriff, to release General Neill from the custody in which he is so held, under the warrant of attachment thus issued without jurisdiction. The seventh section of the act of March 2, 1833 (4 Stat. 634), provides, that "either of the justices of the supreme court or a judge of any district court of the United States, in addition to the authority already conferred by law, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus, in all cases of a prisoner or prisoners in jail or confinement, where he or they shall be committed or confined on or by any authority of law, for any act done or omitted to be done in pursuance of a law of the United States, or any order, process or decree of any judge or court thereof, anything in any act of congress to the contrary notwithstanding; and, if any person or persons to whom such writ of habeas corpus may be directed, shall refuse to obey the same, or shall neglect or refuse to make return, or shall make a false return thereto, in addition to the remedies already given by law, he or they shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by either, according to the nature and aggravation of the case." The first section of the act of February 5, 1867 (14 Stat. 385), provides, "that the several courts of the United States, and the several justices and judges of such courts, within their respective jurisdictions, in addition to the authority already conferred by law, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus, in all cases where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the constitution or of any treaty or law of the United States." The section then goes on to provide as to the application for the writ, its award, its form, the return to it, the joining of issue, the hearing, the penalties for not obeying it, and appeals from the final decision upon it, and concludes as follows: "And, pending such proceedings on appeal, and until final judgment be rendered therein, and after final judgment of discharge in the same, any proceeding against such person so alleged to be restrained of his or her liberty, in any state court, or by or under the authority of any state, for any matter or thing so heard and determined, or in process of being heard and determined, under and by virtue of such writ of habeas corpus, shall be deemed null and void."

By the terms of the warrant of attachment, General Neill is in custody for not producing the body of Casey before the state judge, and for not making any other return than the one he made to the state writ of habeas corpus. Whether the retaining of the body of Casey and the making no different return to the writ be regarded as acts done by General Neill, or omissions by him to do acts, he acted, in retaining the body of Casey, and in refusing to produce him before the state judge, and in denying the jurisdiction of the state judge, and in not making any other return than the one he did make, in pursuance of his duty as an officer of the army of the United States, who, under the laws of the United States, was charged with the custody of Casey, as an enlisted soldier of the army, and was bound to maintain such custody as against the unlawful interference of a state judge. He acted, therefore, "in pursuance of a law of the United States," within the meaning of the seventh section of the act of 1833; and he is restrained of his liberty in violation of a law of the United States, within the meaning of the first section of the act of 1867. This court is, therefore, bound to discharge him from the custody in which he is held by virtue of the warrant of attachment.

The same conclusion I have arrived at was reached by the district judge of the United States for the district of Kentucky, in the case of In re Farrand [Case No. 4,678], in December, 1867. In that case, a state court issued a writ of habeas corpus to an officer of the army of the United States, to produce one Johnson. The officer made a return stating that the man was a duly enlisted soldier in the army of the United States, and annexing copies of his enlistment papers, in substance the same as in the case of Casey, and denying the jurisdiction of the court, and declining to obey the writ. The state court, nevertheless, proceeded and made an order directing that the soldier be discharged. The officer refused to obey such order and continued to hold the soldier by virtue of his enlistment. The state court then proceeded against the officer by process of contempt, and he was taken into custody under such process, and, while in confinement, a writ of habeas corpus was issued by the district judge of the United States for the district of Kentucky, on his application, to the state marshal who had him in custody under such process. The district judge, on these facts, discharged the officer from the custody of the state marshal, holding that the proceedings in the state tribunal were without jurisdiction, and that the federal judge had power to discharge the officer from the state custody. A similar power of discharge was exercised by the federal court in the cases of Ex parte Robinson [Id. 11,935]; Ex parte Jenkins [Id. 7,259]; and Ex parte Sifford [Id. 12,848]. The relator is discharged.

PRACTICE IN BANKRUPTCY—MOTION TO SET ASIDE DEFAULT—WHEN TOO LATE.

A bankrupt moved to set aside his default for not appearing on the return day of the order to show cause why he should not be declared a bankrupt, on the ground that the debt of the petitioning creditor was not provable, as it was based wholly upon the sale of intoxicating liquors and therefore void. Held, that the motion comes too late and without any excuse being offered or pretended for the delay; that the defense when made by the debtor himself founded as it is in a violation of the law, is not to be favored by the courts.

[Cited in Re Meade, Case No. 9,370.]

Motion by the bankrupt [J. Neilson] to set aside his default for not appearing to the order to show cause why he should not be declared a bankrupt, and the adjudication thereon on the grounds: 1. For want of service of the order, and, 2. That the debt of the petitioning creditor is not provable.

Mr. Brownson (Van Dyke & B.), for the motion.

H. M. Duffield (D. B. & H. M. D.), opposed.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The first ground of motion is abandoned and the motion is left to rest entirely on the second. The ground of motion is based upon the following statement in Neilson's affidavit: "That he has a good and substantial defense to the said petition, the claim therein mentioned being wholly based upon the sale of intoxicating liquors, and therefore void." This defense, when made by the debtor himself, founded as it is in a violation of the law by himself, is not one to be favored by the courts, especially when it is considered that except in a few isolated instances the law is practically a dead letter upon the statute book. And hence, while this court holds itself bound to enforce that law in all cases which are brought within its letter, it will insist in all cases that the facts must be laid before it fully and particularly, in order that the court may see that the case comes within the law. All debts or claims founded upon the sale of intoxicating liquors are not void by the statute. Hence, the statement of the simple fact that the claim is founded upon a sale of intoxicating liquors is not sufficient. The facts of the sale must be stated in order that the court may see that the case comes within the statute. This is not done, and hence the affidavit is entirely and fatally defective.

But there is another full and complete answer to this motion, and that is the delay in making it, without any excuse being offered or even pretended therefor. Adjudication passed on the 6th of November, 1872. Neilson had legal personal notice of that fact on the 8th. On the 9th he furnished the messenger the list of his creditors, as required by the act. On the 12th the case was duly referred to the register, and it is not until the 19th that this motion is made. Under these circumstances the motion comes too late, and could in no case be entertained without the most ample and satisfactory excuse for the delay, and especially so in view of the character of the defense proposed to be made as indicated in Neilson's affidavit. The motion is denied.

Case No. 10,091.

NEILSON v. GARZA.

[2 Woods, 287.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Texas. March Term, 1876.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—STATE INSPECTION LAWS—CHARGES—REGULATION OF COMMERCE—REVISION BY CONGRESS.

1. The right to make inspection laws is not granted to congress, but is reserved to the states; nevertheless, it is subject to the paramount right of congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states.

2. If any state, as a means of executing its inspection laws, imposes any duty or impost on imports or exports, such duty or impost is void if it exceeds what is absolutely necessary for executing such inspection laws.

3. As the article of the constitution of the United States which prescribes the limit within which inspection charges shall be kept, goes on to provide that "all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of congress," congress is the proper authority to decide whether a charge or duty is or is not excessive.

[Cited in Turner v. Maryland, 107 U. S. 55, 2 Sup. Ct. 59; Patapsco Guano Co. v. Board of Agriculture, 52 Fed. 694.]

4. Therefore if a law passed by a state is really an inspection law, it must stand until congress sees fit to alter it, even though the fee allowed by it is in effect an impost or duty on imports or exports.

5. The scope of inspection laws is very large and is not confined to articles of domestic produce or manufacture, but applies also to articles imported and to those intended for domestic use.

6. The act of the legislature of Texas, approved October 14, 1871 [Gen. Laws 1871, p. 112], and the further act, approved March 23, 1874 [Laws 1874, p. 33], entitled "for the encouragement of stock-raising and the protection of stock-raisers," are inspection laws and are constitutional.

[This was a bill brought by Henry Neilson against Mariana Trevino Garza, state inpector of hides for Cameron county, Tex., for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of the Texas inspection laws.] Heard upon pleadings and evidence for final decree.

Stephen Powers and Nestor Maxan, for complainant, cited Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 203; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 419; Story, Const. §§ 1004, 1017, 1024; Clintsman v. Northrop, 8 Cow. 46; Hancock v. Sturges, 13 Johns. 331; Ferris v. Ccles, 3 Caines, 212; Shoemaker v. Lansing, 17 Wend. 327.

J. R. Cox, for defendant.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. The complainant in this case resides in Matamoras, Mexico, and is largely engaged in the business of importing hides from that city to Brownsville, in Texas, and sending the same thence via the port of Brazos Santiago, in Texas, to New York.

The defendant is inspector of hides and animals for Cameron county, Texas, at Brownsville, appointed and acting under an act of the legislature of Texas, approved October 14, 1871, and a further act, approved March 23, 1874, entitled for "the encouragement of stock raising and the protection of stock raisers." By virtue of his said office, the defendant claims and exercises the right to inspect the hides imported as aforesaid by the complainant, and to exact and receive and does exact and receive therefor, in accordance with said law, fees at the rate of from six to ten cents per hide, according to the number inspected.

The complainant contends that this exaction is in reality an impost or duty on the imporation or exportation of said hides, and that it is contrary to those clauses of the constitution of the United States which declare that congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states;" and that "no state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws." It is not pretended that congress has granted any consent in the case; and the complainant insists that congress, in making the importation of hides free from duty, has regulated the subject, and no state regulation can have any force or effect, but all such regulations are void.

If the state law of Texas, which is complained of, is really an inspection law, it is valid and binding unless it interferes with the power of congress to regulate commerce, and if it does thus interfere, it may still be valid and binding until revised and altered by congress. The right to make inspection laws is not granted to congress, but is reserved to the states; but it is subject to the paramount right of congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states; and if any state, as a means of carrying out and executing its inspection laws, imposes any duty or impost on imports or exports, such impost or duty is void if it exceeds what is absolutely necessary for executing such inspection laws. How the question, whether a duty is excessive or not, is to be decided, may be doubtful. As that question is passed upon by the state legislature, when the duty is imposed, it would hardly be seemly to submit it to the consideration of a jury in every case that arises. This might give rise to great diversity of judgment, the result of which would be to make the law constitutional one day, and in one case, and unconstitutional another day, in another case. As the article of the constitution which prescribes the limit goes on to provide that "all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of congress," it seems to me that congress is the proper tribunal to decide the question, whether a charge or duty is or is not excessive. If, therefore, the fee allowed in this case by the state law is to be regarded as in effect an impost or duty on imports or exports, still if the law is really an inspection law, the duty must stand until congress shall see fit to alter it.

Then we are brought back to the question whether the law is really an inspection law. If it is, we can not interfere with it on account of supposed excessiveness of fees. If it is not, the exaction is clearly unconstitutional and void, being an unauthorized interference with the free importation of goods. The complainant contends that it is not an inspection law; that inspection laws only apply legitimately to the domestic products of the country, intended for exportation; and that no inspection is actually required in this particular case, but a mere examination to see if the hides are marked, and who imported them, etc., duties which belong to the entry of goods, and not their inspection.

No doubt the primary and most usual object of inspection is to prepare goods for exporation in order to preserve the credit of our exports in foreign markets. Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons v. Ogden, says: "The object of inspection laws is to improve the quality of articles produced by the labor of a country; to fit them for exportation, or it may be, for domestice use." 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 203; Story, Const. § 1017. But in Brown v. Maryland, he adds, speaking of the time when inspection takes place: "Inspection laws, so far as they act upon articles for exportation, are generally executed on land before the article is put on board a vessel; so far as they act upon importations, they are generally executed upon articles which are landed. The tax or duty of inspection is a tax which is frequently, if not always, paid for service performed on land." 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 419; Story, Const. § 1017. So that, according to Chief Justice Marshall, imported as well as exported goods may be subject to inspection; and they may be inspected as well to fit them for domestic use as for exportation. All housekeepers who are consumers of flour know what a protection it is to be able to rely on the inspection mark for a fine or superior article. Bouvier defines inspection as the examination of certain articles made by law subject to such examination, so that they may be declared fit for commerce. Law Dict. verb. "Inspection." The removal or destruction of unsound articles is undoubtedly, says Chief Justice Marshall, an exercise of that power. Brown v. Maryland, supra; Story, Const. § 1024. "The object of the inspection laws," says Justice Sutherland, "is to protect the community, so far as they apply to domestic sales, from frauds and impositions; and in relation to articles designed for exportation, to preserve the character and reputation of the state in foreign markets." Clintsman v. Northrop, 8 Cow. 46. It thus appears that the scope of inspection laws is very large, and is not confined to articles of domestic produce or manufacture, or to articles intended for exporation, but applies to articles imported, and to those intended for domestic use as well.

An examination of some of the actual inspection laws of the different states shows that this is the fact: Thus, in Alabama, the city authorities of Mobile are authorized to appoint inspectors, and to adopt regulations (to be approved by the governor) for the inspection of staves, tobacco, pitch, tar, turpentine, rosin, fish, flour and oil, within the limits of the city. Many of these articles must be articles of import. In Massachusetts, fish intended for exportation are to be inspected, whether inspected previously in another state or not. Pearson v. Purkett, 15 Pick. 264. In Kentucky, under the inspection laws of that state, imported salt cannot be sold in the state until it has been inspected, and three cents inspection fees are chargeable for each barrel inspected. The inspection laws of North Carolina are very full, and, amongst other things, provisions and forage imported from out of the state, such as beef, pork, fish, flour, butter in firkins, cheese in boxes, hay or fodder, bacon in hogsheads, etc., must be inspected before they can be sold, on pain of $100 penalty, and a scale of inspection fees is fixed by law. It is true the constitutionality of these laws has not been tested, but they show what range inspection laws have taken, and what is generally regarded as within their scope.

Now, the law in question is a general law of the state of Texas; it purports to be an inspection law, to encourage stock raising and to protect stock raisers; it makes each county of the state, except certain counties named, an inspector's district, for the inspection of hides and animals; and creates the office of inspector, to be elected by the voters of the county; it requires of him a bond and oath of office; it requires him to keep a book of records of his inspections; it requires him to examine and inspect all hides or animals known or reported to him as sold, or as leaving or going out of the county for sale or shipment; and all animals driven or sold in his district for slaughter to packeries or butcheries; it directs the method of inspecting, branding and recording animals and hides; it requires him to prevent the sale or removal out of the county of hides or animals upon which the brands can not be ascertained, unless identified by proof, etc.; it gives him power to seize and condemn unbranded animals or hides. Various other regulations are imposed in the act. By the sixteenth section, it is provided that any person may ship from any part of the state any hides or animals imported into the state from Mexico, and shall not be required to have the same inspected: provided, he has first obtained the certificate of the inspector or deputy inspector of the county into which the same were imported, certifying the date of the importation thereof, the name of the importer and of the owner, and of the person in charge of the same, the name of the place where the same were imported, together with the number of hides and animals so imported, and a description of their marks and brands (if any there be) by which the same may be identified. By the 17th section, it is declared that inspectors shall be allowed to charge and collect the same fees for the services which they are authorized to perform by the terms of section 16 as are allowed in other cases thereafter provided. The fees referred to are those allowed for inspection, which are, as before stated, from six to ten cents per hide, according to the number inspected.

Now, it is contended that the examination and certificate required by the 16th section, in order to be allowed to export out of the state hides imported from Mexico, is not an inspection, but is expressly denominated otherwise. "Shall not be required to have the same inspected," are the words, it is true. But the thing which is required, though not such an inspection as is usual and customary in other cases, is, nevertheless, an actual inspection. The exporter must obtain the certificate of the inspector, or his deputy, of the county into which the hides were imported, certifying (note what things are to be certified) the date of the importation, the name of the importer and of the owner, and of the person in charge, name of the place where imported, number of hides and animals imported, and description of their marks and brands, if any there be, by which they can be identified. What is this but inspection? The object is to subject the hides or animals to the examination of the official inspector, that he may note everything about them, serving to their identification, ownership, etc.

I do not say that such an inspection as this is necessary or expedient; but it is inspection; and at such a place as Brownsville, it may, for aught I know, be a necessary police regulation to prevent frauds and clandestine removal and exportation of property belonging to the people of Texas. The fee or duty exacted may be excessive; but if so, congress can regulate that. Our only concern with the case is to know whether the acts required by the state law, and performed by the defendant on and about the hides, are fairly characterized as inspection or not. If they are, that ends the case here. We think the law is an inspection law; that the part of it in question is not foreign to that character; and that the acts of the defendant for which the fees exacted by him were charged were fairly performed under said inspection law; and that the fees are valid charges, until they shall be altered by congress.

The bill is therefore dismissed with costs.

NEILSON et al. v. The LAURA.

[2 Sawy. 242.] [1]

District Court, D. California. Sept. 12, 1872.

SICK SEAMAN ENTITLED TO WHOLE WAGES WHEN NO FRAUD—MASTER'S AUTHORITY TO INCREASE WAGES.

1. When a seaman was unable to perform duty during a part of the voyage, by reason of sickness, held, that he was entitled to his whole wages, notwithstanding that the sickness may have begun before he signed the articles, but after he had entered on the service.

[Cited in Longstreet v. The R. R. Springer, 4 Fed. 672; The W. L. White, 25 Fed. 504.]

2. It is no objection to his claim that the sickness may have had its origin in some previous injury or infection, not occasioned by his own fault, provided he has acted in good faith, and without fraudulent misrepresentation or concealment.

3. Although the master's authority in general extends to all matters connected with the hiring of the crew, he cannot, after the contract is made, at his mere will, bind the owners to the payment of increased wages, unless some consideration be given for the advance, or in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, he had the right to suppose he would thereby promote the interests of the adventure; and especially is this the case where the master has not been selected by the owners, but appointed by a consul at a foreign port.

[In admiralty. This was a libel by Jens Neilson and Buckhardt for wages.]

T. B. Mildram, for libellants.

H. C. & C. R. Greathouse, for claimants.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The libellant [Jens] Neilson sues for wages due him as seaman on a voyage in the above vessel, from this port to the Cocos Islands, Punta Arenas, and other Central American ports, and back to San Francisco. His claim is contested on the ground that, owing to physical disability, he failed to render the service contracted for; and that his wages should be reduced to a compensation for the service actually rendered:

The facts appear to be as follows:

On the 18th January, 1872, Neilson, with some others of the crew, went on board the Laura to serve as seamen on the contemplated voyage of the brig to the Cocos Islands, in search of the hidden treasure. The departure of the vessel having been delayed by causes not specially detailed, the men were informed by the master that they would be allowed, during the detention of the vessel, wages at the rate of one dollar per day. The libellant states that he was hired at the rate of thirty dollars per month; but the difference is immaterial, as the men were paid in full up to the time when they signed the articles, and no claim is made for wages earned prior to that date. The articles were signed the nineteenth of February; the vessel sailed on the twenty-sixth of February.

Some time after coming on board, Neilson appears to have hurt his leg while in the performance of his duty. This occurred before the signing of the articles, and it was known to the master and the crew. The injury did not prevent Neilson, so far as appears, from doing his duty, and it seems to have been regarded as slight, and unlikely to produce serious results. Neilson states that he showed his leg to the master, and expressed doubts as to the propriety of his going to sea. The master told him that it would soon get well, and that he didn't wish him to leave.

Some eight or ten days after leaving port, Neilson again hurt his leg while doing some duty aloft. The sore on his leg was examined by the doctor on board, and found to be an ulcer of an aggravated kind. It proved, on treatment, to be obstinate and intractable, and Neilson's leg remained in consequence, during the whole voyage, in a condition which prevented the full performance of his duty. The master estimates roughly that he did able seaman's duty about one third of the time. At other times he worked about the deck, or did no duty whatever.

From its persistency and resistance to treatment, as well as from its appearance, the doctor supposed the ulcer to have been venereal. He states, however, that it was not caused by syphilitic disease, and I understand him to mean that an otherwise trivial injury was aggravated and made obstinate by some ancient venereal taint, which he supposed to have existed in the patient's constitution. Some evidence was offered, tending to show that Neilson admitted that he had hurt his leg while "sky-larking on shore." This Neilson denies. I do not consider the inquiry important, for if the leg was hurt prior to his coming on board, the injury must have been very slight, as he performed his duty during the whole time the vessel lay in port, from the eighteenth of January until the twenty-sixth of February, and for ten days or two weeks thereafter after the vessel had put to sea.

The question thus presented is: Did the disability of the seaman occur while in the service of the vessel, and not through his own fault or misconduct?

The general principle that the seaman is not only entitled to his wages during any sickness or disability occurring to him while in the service, without fault or misconduct on his own part, but also to be cured at the ship's expense, is not disputed. But it is contended that in this case the injury was sustained before the commencement of the voyage, and before, by the signing of articles, he entered into the service of the ship.

In Ex parte Giddings [Case No. 5,404], Mr. Justice Story rejected the claim of a mariner to a share of the prizes of a privateer (which he put on the same footing as a claim for wages), where the disability occurred after the signing of articles, but before the cruise was actually begun. In that case, it appeared that the seaman was discharged at the home port of the vessel with his own consent.

But the same learned judge, in Reed v. Canfield [Case No. 11,641], held that the right to be cured at the ship's expense extends to "all sickness and injuries sustained in the service, and while the party constitutes one of her crew, whether they occur at a home or in a foreign port, at the commencement or at the termination of the voyage. The voyage of the ship must, so far as the seamen are concerned, be deemed to commence when they are to perform service on board, and to terminate when they are discharged from further service."

The fact that the articles have not been signed is immaterial, if the seamen have been engaged for the voyage, and are on board the vessel in the performance of their duty. The articles are required for the protection of the seaman, but his rights are not impaired, or his relations to the vessel affected to his disadvantage by an entire omission to enter into the formal engagement required by law.

If the circumstances of the case required it, I should have little hesitation in deciding that, where a seaman engaged for a voyage sustains an injury while in the service of the ship, but before she sails, and before the articles are signed and without any fraud or concealment on his part he is retained in the service, and performs the voyage, he is entitled to his wages, notwithstanding that he proves unable to discharge his duty, either in whole or in part.

If the injury be such as obviously to disable him for the performance of his duty, he may be discharged, especially with his own consent, as was the case in Ex parte Giddings [supra]. He would then be entitled to compensation for the services already rendered, and probably to be cured at the ship's expense.

But in the case at bar, I think it clear that the disability must be considered to have occurred during the voyage. The original injury, whether Neilson received it after he came on board the vessel or before, must have been slight, for he continued to do duty for some weeks afterwards, and was permitted to ship without objection. He unquestionably sustained a further injury after the voyage commenced, and his subsequent disability was the result of the original hurt, aggravated by the injury received on board, and perhaps by the exposure and other unfavorable conditions incident to his situation. I do not understand the rule to require that the sickness of the seaman should have originated during the voyage; it is only necessary that it occur during the voyage, without fault or misconduct on his part. Were it otherwise, he would be deprived, in great measure, of its benefit.

If, for example, he have a cut on his hand at the time of shipment, and erysipelas supervenes during the voyage, and he is unable to do duty, the sickness that incapacitated him would be deemed to have occurred during the voyage. So, if he have a cold, which is succeeded during the voyage by some pulmonary disease, the disease which disables him would clearly be the pulmonary affection, and not the cold in which it had its origin. So, if after the commencement of the voyage, he fall sick of small-pox or other infectious disorder, his claim to wages, and to be cured at the ship's expense, could hardly be resisted on the ground that the infection was received before he shipped, and that the seeds of the disease were lurking in his system when he entered into the service. The rule should receive a liberal as well as rational construction. It would be infinite to explore the remote causes of disease, or to attempt to assign to each of the various causes which have concurred in producing the result its precise effect. If the seaman, without fraud or concealment, and believing himself able to perform his duty, enters upon the service, his subsequent illness, whether it be due to the development into serious disease of some slight injury, previously received, or ailment previously contracted, whether the unfavorable symptoms be caused by the exposure and hardships of the service, or are to be ascribed to some vice in the patient's constitution, or whether it be the natural and inevitable effect of some previous infection; in none of these cases would the rights of the seaman, under the just, as well as humane rule so universally adopted in all the maritime codes, be impaired.

I think Neilson is entitled to the full amount of his wages, without deduction.

With regard to Buckhardt, there is more room for doubt. His claim is founded on an alleged agreement by the master to pay him $30 in lieu of the nominal sum which by the articles he was to receive.

If it appeared that in consideration of additional services, the master had in the reasonable exercise of his discretion, promoted him, and promised the wages of the station to which he was advanced, there would be no objection to his claim. The master's authority, in general, extends to all matters connected with the employment and hiring of the crew.

But after the contract with the seaman has been made, the master cannot capriciously, and at his mere will, bind the owners to the payment of increased wages, unless it appear that some consideration was rendered for the advance, or that, in the exercise of a fair discretion, he was justified in supposing he would thereby promote the interests of the adventure. In this case, the master, by whom the promise is alleged to have been made, was not the master to whom the owners had entrusted the vessel. He became such by the appointment of the consul at a foreign port. It would even seem that, at the time he agreed to give the additional wages, he had not been formally appointed. The services rendered by the man were in no respect different from, or more valuable than, those he had previously performed, and for which he shipped. No entry of the agreement was made in the articles; and the claim rests on an alleged oral promise of the master to the man.

The master alleges that he hired the man in place of the steward who had left, and that the cook refused to stay unless a new steward was employed. Of the thirty dollars per month additional wages allowed to Buckhardt, ten dollars were to be given to the cook. It is a little singular, if this were the case, that the cook has made no demand for the ten dollars per month which he was to receive.

So far as I can gather from the testimony, the services of a steward seem to have been unnecessary. Five out of the eight passengers had left the vessel, and the testimony shows that after his employment as steward, Buckhardt performed the same duty as he had previously discharged as waiter.

There are some other circumstances indistinctly disclosed by the testimony, which lead me to doubt whether the master, in promising to Buckhardt the additional compensation, was acting in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, and with exclusive regard to the interest of the service. If not, he exceeded his authority, and went beyond the limits of his agency. He had no right to indulge in favoritism or even generosity at the expense of the owners of the vessel.

On the whole, I am of opinion that Buckhardt's claim should be rejected, except for the amount of wages as stipulated in the articles.

COLLISION AT PIER IN EAST RIVER—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A tug, coming up the East river, with an elevator in tow, sought to swing the elevator into the proper position to enter a slip, and in so doing allowed it to touch the stern of a barge moored at the end of the pier and projecting. The tug had full knowledge of the position of the barge: Held, that the tug was responsible for the damages to the barge, and the position of the latter was not contributory negligence, it not being shown that she was not rightfully where she was.

In admiralty.

William J. Haskett, for libellant.

Samuel G. Courtney, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The libellant, as owner of the barge Hudson River, brings this suit against the steamtug Nellie, to recover for the damages sustained by him through a collision, wherein the barge was injured, on the 5th of May, 1873. The barge was lying at the outer end of pier 45, East river, with her stern down, taking in cargo. The tug, with an elevator lashed to her starboard side, came up the river and rounded to, for the purpose of going into the slip next below pier 45, and then proceeded to enter such slip, the tide being flood, and intentionally brought the side of the elevator in contact with the barge, for the purpose of swinging the elevator around with the tide, so that it might be shoved bow forward into the slip. The libel alleges, that the tide swung the tug and the elevator around under the stern of the barge, and that the rudder post and a pintle of the barge were broken.

The answer sets up, as faults in the barge, causing or contributing to the collision, that the barge was improperly berthed at an exposed and dangerous place at the end of the pier; that her stern projected beyond the side of the pier and into the space where the tug and the elevator had a right of way; that the barge was so improperly trimmed, that her rudder and its appurtenances were lifted above the water line, and exposed to danger, and deprived of the protection of the fantail of the barge; and that the barge was not provided with fenders over her stern.

It is satisfactorily established by the evidence, that the elevator, moved by the tug, struck the rudder of the barge and did the damage complained of. If the tug and the elevator were to enter the slip on a strong flood tide, it was, undoubtedly, necessary for them to manoeuvre as they did. But the barge was in full view. If she was down by the head, and her stern was raised, her condition and position were plainly visible. The tug assumed the risk of entering the slip without injuring the barge. If the barge was exposed, by being at the end of the pier and by having her stern projecting into the water space of the slip, such exposure made it incumbent on the tug to exercise the greater caution. The barge was helpless. It is not shown that she was not rightfully where she was. The tug had no such right of way as conferred upon her the right to injure the barge, without being responsible for such injury. It is shown that the barge had in position all customary fenders.

There must be a decree for the libellant, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the damages.

District Court, E. D. New York. Nov., 1875.

TUG-BOAT AND TOW—CONTRACT—DAMAGE FROM ICE.

A contract was made on behalf of a tub-boat to tow a canal-boat from the foot of Fourteenth street, East river, to One Hundred and Thirty-First street North river, and there leave her in a safe and suitable place for the discharge of her cargo. Under this contract the tug-boat towed the canal-boat to the foot of One Hundred and Thirty-First street, North river, where she was placed at the north side of a pier. This was then a safe place, but it was one where on the change of the tide the boat might be injured by ice. Demand was made of the captain of the tug-boat that he should place the canal-boat on the lower side of the pier, but this was not done and the canal-boat moved up to the bulkhead and began to discharge her cargo. About four hours after, on the change of the tide, ice was brought down upon the canal-boat and crushed her. The owners of the canal-boat and of her cargo filed libels to recover for the damage: Held, that no breach of the contract on the part of the tug-boat had been shown and that the libels must be dismissed.

In admiralty.

BENEDICT, District Judge. These two actions which have been tried together, are brought, one by the owner of the canal-boat Waddy, and the other by the owner of her cargo, to recover damages for breach of a towage contract.

The allegation of the libellant, William Nelson, Jr., the owner of the cargo, is, that a contract was entered into whereby the tug-boat "Nellie" was to tow the canal-boat "Waddy" from the foot of Fourteenth street, East river, to 131st street, North river, and there leave her in a safe and suitable place for the discharge of the cargo with which she was laden.

The breach averred is, that the canal-boat was not left in a safe and suitable place, but in the tide-way about 100 feet from the end of the pier, at the foot of 131st street and in an improper and unsafe place, where there was great danger of her being injured or carried away by the tide and floating ice. In the libel of Whipple, the owner of the boat, the averments are somewhat different, but in substance the same. The damages claimed are those resulting from injuries sustained by the canal-boat and her cargo by reason of her having been crushed by ice on the same day, while she lay at the bulkhead on the northerly side of the pier at the foot of 131st street—a place to which it is said she was compelled to go by reason of having being left by the tug in the tide-way.

A careful examination of the libel shows that the contract thus set forth is not, as seems to have been supposed, a contract to take the boat to the lower side of the pier at 131st street, but simply to tow her to 131st street, North river, or to Manhattanville, and there leave her in a safe and suitable place for the discharge of her cargo. Assuming, then, the contract to be that set forth in the libel, my opinion is, that the tug-boat is not responsible for the injuries sustained by the canal-boat from ice, which, it is shown, came down upon her some few hours after she had been left by the tug moored at the pier.

The evidence shows, beyond dispute, that the canal-boat was not left in the tide-way about 100 feet from the end of the pier, as averred in the libels, but that she was placed alongside the upper side of the pier, at a place where she was at once to be made fast, and where she could at once proceed to discharge her cargo.

It is true, demand was made at the time that the boat should be placed at the lower side of the pier, and it is also true that the upper side of the pier was a place where injury might result, if, upon a change of tide, ice should come down the river. But the contract set forth raised no obligation to leave the canal-boat at the lower side of the pier.

The contract set forth was performed when the boat was left at the foot of 131st street, fast to the pier, at a place then safe and suitable for the discharge of her cargo.

A breach of such contract is not made out by showing that some four hours after the termination of the service, and at a different time of tide, the place where the boat was left became dangerous because of ice which then came down the river.

The libels must, therefore, be dismissed and with costs.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—ADDITIONAL PROOF.

In this case, no witnesses having been sent in with the vessel, and no reason being furnished for not producing them, and the commander of the capturing vessel being examined by order of the court, but not furnishing any proof of any violation of the blockade, or that the captured property was enemy property, the court ordered the case to stand over for further proof as to the criminality of the vessel, and in order that the absence of all evidence from on board of her might be accounted for, and allowed six months time for that purpose.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel and cargo were captured at sea, about 25 miles northeast from Port Royal, South Carolina, March 29, 1863, by a United States ship-of-war. The vessel was, by due valuation and course of procedure, taken for the use of the United States at the time, and the cargo was sent to this port for adjudication. Due service and return of the warrant of attachment and of the monition were made; and, no one intervening in defence of the action, judgment of condemnation and forfeiture was regularly entered, by default, against the vessel and cargo.

In the absence of other witnesses in the case, John J. Almy was, by order of the court, examined in preparatorio in the cause. He testifies that he was present at the capture of the Nellie at sea; that she had no papers on board; that she was captured because she was found at sea without papers; that her master acknowledged that he had run the blockade out of Charleston with her, and was bound to Nassau; that the capture was made by the United States ship-of-war under command of the witness; that the vessel carried about 75 bales of cotton; and that her master said he came out of Charleston and was going to Nassau, and knew all about the war. No witnesses were sent in with the captured vessel, nor is any reason furnished for not producing them. No doubt the officer making seizure of a vessel at sea is a competent witness to prove the act of capture, and also circumstances, accompanying the capture, which afford reasonable cause for believing the culpability of the property arrested. No proof is furnished by Captain Almy that the vessel in fact evaded the blockade of Charleston, or that the person who made the declarations testified to has been really master of the Nellie, or that the Nellie or her lading were enemy property. The unseaworthiness of the prize vessel and her appropriation to the use of the United States are, prima facie, adequately authenticated if the prize is shown to have been enemy property at the time or to have violated the blockade.

The case must stand over for further proof as to the criminality of the vessel seized, and in order that the absence of all evidence from on board of her may be accounted for; and it is ordered by the court that the United States be allowed the period of six months from the entry of this decree to produce proof to that end.

COLLISION — DAMAGES RESULTING FROM SUBSEQUENT NECESSARY ACTS OF MASTER — VALUE OF BOAT STOLEN.

1. If the master of a vessel injured by collision through the fault of the other party conducts himself with reasonable skill and diligence after the collision, the damages occurring from a necessary act, such as beaching his ship, will be chargeable to the wrong-doer. Such damages were allowed, though the master was informed that a better place for beaching his vessel was to be found.

[Cited in Cornwall v. New York, 38 Fed. 711.]

2. The value of a boat stolen from the master of the injured vessel was disallowed, there being no necessary or probable connection proved between the collision and the theft.

In admiralty.

J. C. Dodge & F. Dodge, for libellants.

F. Goodwin, for claimants.

LOWELL, District Judge. The claimant contends that the master of the Hulloneon, after the collision had occurred, was negligent and unskilful in beaching his vessel where he did, and again in making the contract which he made for raising her. On the second point the claimants are almost estopped, because they were twice applied to, and asked to make the contract or to give their advice about it, and refused. To be sure, they were not bound to advise, and therefore they are not technically estopped; but they were fully notified and warned; and if they thought at that time that it would be so much better to contract by the day than by the job, they would have run very little risk by saying so. After it has turned out that one mode might probably have been better than the other, it is easy to suppose that this was clear from the beginning; but, if it really was so, why was the light withheld?

The first point is similar in the principle which must govern its decision. As to both points, the following cases are cited: The Linda, Swab. 309; The Flying Fish, Brown. & L. 436; and to these may be added The Catherine, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 170. These cases decide that the vessel which is responsible for the collision is not bound to make good damages which do not fairly and necessarily result from the wrongful act; and that, if the master or owners have been guilty of rash or even negligent conduct, by which the damages are largely increased, the court is to ascertain, by the best means in its power, what the damage was or would have been if the subsequent conduct of the injured party had been prudent and skilful. The editors of Browning and Lushington's Reports, in a note to The Flying Fish, suggest that perhaps even this damage ought to be divided between the parties, on the ground that it was partly caused by the collision. But those learned persons, I fear, may be suspected of a design to cast ridicule upon the rule itself, which they afterwards say is an embarrassment in practice. At all events, no court has ever decided that the damages caused by A.'s negligence were partly due to an antecedent negligence of B.

The evidence in this case falls very far short of that given in the two English cases; and, though The Catherine [supra], is rather briefly reported, it would seem that it resembled them. If so, they were all clear cases of a reckless negligence, almost amounting to the wilful loss of a vessel, which might easily have been, and in the American case actually was, saved and repaired at a comparatively trifling expense; and this was not only obvious at the time, but, in the two cases which are fully reported, was pointed out to the master, and he was urged to save his ship. Here the evidence is that some one advised the master to beach the vessl a few rods higher up the shore than he did, and told him that it was a better place for the purpose. This is a very different state of things from those on which the above-cited cases were decided. I agree with the assessor that there is no such evidence of negligence as should throw upon the Hulloneon the loss, if any, which was incurred by the vessel being beached where the master thought best to put her.

The first objection taken by the libellant illustrates somewhat this matter of remote damage. The assessor has disallowed the value of a boat which was stolen, not from the vessel, but from a wharf in Boston, on the night after the collision. Granting that damages might be recovered for all direct losses, even if one of them should be a plundering which no means within the reach of the injured party could prevent, yet the theft of a boat hours afterwards, at a different place, has no such natural or necessary connection with the collision as to be one of its legal consequences. Indeed, I do not know, and no one can say, that it had any connection whatever with that event. The boat was stolen from a place where boats are often left, and where this master might have left it if he had had occasion, though his vessel were safely riding at anchor in the stream.

COLLISION—RIGHT OF WAY—VESSELS SAILING IN SAME DIRECTION.

Where two sailing vessels are beating in the same direction, the hindmost vessel is bound to know that the leading vessel must come about on running out her course, and to know the time and place when and where the manoeuvre must take place, and to take proper measures to permit the movement without coming into dangerous proximity.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court, by the owners of the schooner Sea Bird, against the schooner Nellie D., to recover damages for a collision which occurred between the two vessels, on the morning of the 21st of November, 1860, while they were beating up through the entrance into the lower bay of New York at Sandy Hook. The wind was northwest, or west by north, and a five or six knot breeze. Both vessels were on the starboard tack, going toward Sandy Hook beach. The Sea Bird was leading, and slightly to the windward, and tacked about, and, on her larboard tack eastward, passed the Nellie D., which vessel, after going some thirty or forty yards, also tacked about, passing the other vessel on her tack eastward. The Sea Bird, after running out her course as far as it was prudent to go, came about, and while her sails were filling on the starboard tack, and before she got under way, the two vessels came in contact, their larboard bows together, doing considerable damage to each.

Charles Donohue, for libellant.

William J. Haskett, for claimants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. I have looked with some care into the pleadings and proofs, with a view to ascertain whether either or both of the vessels committed any fault in navigation, and, as both were sufferers, whether or not the case could be fairly disposed of, on the hypothesis that neither was in fault. But, after the most careful scrutiny, I feel bound to say that I can see no fault in the navigation of the Sea Bird. On the contrary, she ran out her tack, and came about, according to usage and safe seamanship, and could have done nothing more to avoid the disaster. The Nellie D., following her, on the tack eastward, was bound to know that the leading vessel was obliged to come about on running out her course, and about the time and place the manoeuvre must necessarily take place, and should have taken the proper measure to permit the movement without coming into dangerous proximity. This was clearly in her power, and she should have exercised it early enough to avoid coming together.

It is urged that the Nellie D. was to the windward, and that the Sea Bird was in fault in coming about with the two vessels in that relative position. But the answer is, that the Sea Bird had no choice in the manoeuvre adopted. If she had not tacked she would have gone upon the shoals. Besides, I do not agree that the Nellie D. was to the windward. On the contrary, the weight of proof is otherwise; and, indeed, it would be difficult to account for the collision of the two larboard bows at all, on this hypothesis. The decree below is affirmed.

PILOTAGE—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action for pilotage, where the right of action is claimed to be derived from a statute of the state of New York, and to have arisen by reason of a tender of service and a refusal to take any pilot, the libellant must show a tender of service and that no pilot was employed. Slight circumstances will however be sufficient to warrant the inference that no pilot was employed. Such inference may be drawn from the fact that when the libellant presented his bill, the master of the ship said it was all right, no evidence being offered to show that a pilot was employed.

In admiralty.

Barney, Butler & Parsons, for libellant.
Benedict & Benedict, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action to recover pilotage, based upon a tender and refusal of services at such a distance from Sandy Hook light house that it could not be seen from the deck in fair weather. The answer avers that subsequent to the libellant's tender of services a pilot was taken and paid, but no evidence is produced in support of the averment. A tender and refusal is proved by the libellant and that he was the first pilot teudering his services. The question supposed by the defendant to be presented for determination is whether under the law of this state as now construed by the court of appeals in the last case upon the subject Gillespie v. Zittloson, 60 N. Y. 449, and by the circuit court of this circuit in the case of The Nevada [unreported],[2] following the court of appeals (Hunt, J., Aug. 16, 1876, MSS.), a recovery for a pilotage can be had upon proving a tender of services and a refusal thereof, without proving in addition the negative fact that no pilot was taken. Upon this question I incline to the opinion that although prior to the construction lately put upon the statute of the state by the highest court of the state a tender of services was considered sufficient to raise "an implied promise to pay the amount specified in the statute," according to the present understanding of the statute a tender of services and a failure to take a pilot must appear in order to raise such an implied promise. But it does not follow that in this case the libel must be dismissed. As this view of the law casts upon the libellant the burden of showing a negative, justice requires that it be held that slight circumstances are sufficient to warrant the inference that no pilot was taken. In the present case the defendant has taken upon himself to aver that a pilot was taken, but he offers no proof whatever in support of his averment, while the libellant has proved without objection taken, that after the vessel arrived, he made out his bill and presented it to the master of the vessel, who not only made no objection to it, but said it was all right. This admission of the master by implication admits that no pilot was taken, for, if a pilot had been taken, the bill was not right. In the absence of any evidence for the defendant, when proof from him was easy, the admission of the master should be deemed sufficient to warrant the inference that in fact no pilot was taken. If this inference be incorrect, it can be shown to be so by further testimony, on application to this court, or on appeal. I deem it proper to add that the law stated is intended to be confined to a case where as in this instance the liability is claimed to be derived from the state.

There being no dispute as to the tonnage of the vessel, there must accordingly be a decree in favor of the libellant for the amount claimed with interest and costs.

[6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 286.] [1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Feb., 1873.

PATENTS—SUIT FOR INFRINGEMENT OF SEVERAL PATENTS—MULTIFARIOUSNESS.

Where suit is brought for the infringement of several patents for different improvements, not necessarily embodied in the construction and operation of any one machine, the bill must contain an explicit averment that the infringing machines contain all the improvements embraced in the several patents, or it will be bad for multifariousness.

[Cited in Horman Patent Manuf'g Co. v. Brooklyn City R. Co., Case No. 6,703; Gamewell Fire-Alarm Tel. Co. v. Chillicothe, 7 Fed. 355; Hayes v. Dayton, 8 Fed. 704; Pope Manuf'g Co. v. Marqua, 15 Fed. 400; Barney v. Peck, 16 Fed. 413; Griffith v. Segar, 29 Fed. 707.]

Demurrer to bill in equity [by Aaron J. Nellis and John Crawford against A. King McLanahan, William Stone, and William Bailey].

Suit brought upon the following letters patent:

1. Letters patent [No. 44,129] for "improvement in hay-elevators," granted to Edward Walker, September 6, 1864, and reissued December 18, 1866 [No. 2,429].

2. Letters patent [No. 46,027] for "improvement in hay-elevators," granted Seymour Rogers, January 24, 1865, and reissued May 29, 1866 [No. 2,260].

3. Letters patent [No. 53,345] for "improvement in horse hay-rakes," granted Seymour Rogers, March 20, 1866.

The charging part of the bill was as follows:

"And your orators further show unto your honors, as they are informed and believe, that the said defendants herein named, well knowing all the facts hereinbefore set forth,

are now constructing and using, and vending to others to be used, hay-forks, of the kind and description known in the trade as 'harpoon hay-forks,' in some parts thereof substantially the same in construction and operation as in the said several letters patent mentioned, the exclusive right and privilege to make and use which, and vend the same to others to be used, is thus by law vested in your orators.

"And so it is, may it please your honors, that the said defendants, as your orators are informed and believe, without the license of your orators, against their will and in violation of their rights, have made and used, and intend to continue still to make and use the said improvements, within the Western district of Pennsylvania, and refuse to pay to your orators any of the profits which they have made by such unlawful manufacture and use, or to desist from the further infringement of said recited letters patent; all of which acts and doings are in violation of the exclusive rights and privileges so as aforesaid vested in your orators, under and by virtue of said recited several letters patent and assignments, and are contrary to equity and good conscience, and tend to the manifest injury of your orators in the presents."

Then followed special interrogatories as to each of the patents in suit. These were similar in character, and the following will serve as a specimen of all:

"Whether the said defendants, or either, and which of them, have at any time, and when, and during what period of time, made, used, and sold any, and how many, horse hay-forks, or harpoon hay-forks, constructed, in whole or in part, upon the principles and in the manner described in said reissue letters patent, No. ——, granted to said Edward L. Walker, as aforesaid. Describe minutely and in detail their construction and operation."

To this bill the defendants filed a special demurrer, and, for cause, showed, that it appears by the said bill that the same is exhibited against those defendants for three several and distinct matters and causes, to wit, for alleged infringements of three several and distinct letters patent in said bill set forth, which three several letters patent are of different dates, and for separate and distinct alleged improvements, one of said letters patent being for an alleged improvement in hay-elevators, patented to one Edward L. Walker; another of said letters patent being for an alleged improvement in hay-elevators, patented to one Seymour Rogers, and the other being for an alleged improvement in horse hay-forks, patented to one Seymour Rogers, which several alleged improvements, it appears by the said bill, are not necessarily connected together in practical operation or use, nor common to any one hay-fork, or horse hay-fork, or harpoon horse hay-fork, made by these defendants; so that said complainants, by their single bill of complaint aforesaid, charge the infringement of each of said letters patent, and thereby seek to compel these defendants to unite these separate and distinct subject-matters, wholly unconnected with and entirely independent of each other, and calling for three several, separate, and distinct defenses, depending severally upon distinct and different proofs, so as to complicate and embarrass these defendants in their answer to said bill of complaint, by reason whereof said bill of complaint is altogether multifarious.

Bruce & Negley, for complainants.
G. H. Christy, for defendants.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The defendants have demurred to the bill in this case on the ground of multifariousness. The bill sets up three distinct patents, viz.: A reissue to Edward L. Walker for an improvement in hay-elevators, dated December 18, 1866; a reissue to Seymour Rogers for an improvement in hay-elevators, dated May 29, 1866; and an original patent to Seymour Rogers, for an improvement in horse hay-forks, dated March 26, 1866,—the title to all of which is vested in the complainants by various assignments. These improvements are not necessarily embodied in the construction and operation of any one hay-fork, and unless they are identified by the frame of the bill the defendants cannot be subjected to the embarrassment of confounding defenses, which may be severally applicable to each patent. The bill charges that the defendants are now constructing and using, and vending to others to be used, hay-forks of the kind and description known in the trade as "harpoon horse hay-forks," in some parts thereof substantially the same as in the said several letters patent mentioned. There is no explicit averment here that forks, made and sold by the defendants contain all the improvements embraced in the complainants' patents, and the interrogatories clearly indicate that a discovery is sought touching only the several infringements of each patent. The bill, therefore, does not show any reason why the joining of multifarious causes of complaint should be allowed, and the demurrer must be sustained.

LIEN OF EXECUTION CREDITOR — ASSIGNEE AS SHERIFF.

Where an assignee in bankruptcy had possession of goods of the bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy, as sheriff, under a writ of attachment, and various executions obtained by creditors before the filing of the petition, and as assignee had converted the property into money, and the execution creditors were not parties to the bankruptcy proceedings, but agreed in writing that the facts stated in the petition were true, and that the court might make such order as to the disposition of the funds as may be according to law: Held, that the bankruptcy proceedings did not enlarge the judgment liens nor change their place, by the dissolving of the attachment and the vesting the property in the assignee, but left them covering all the property in the hands of the officer not covered by the attachment lien.

[In the matter of M. J. Nelson, a bankrupt.]

Prout & Walker, for assignee.

E. J. Ormsbee, for execution creditors.

WHEELER, District Judge. This proceeding has been commenced by a petition of the assignee, setting forth that at the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, he, as deputy sheriff, had custody of the goods of the bankrupt by virtue, first, of an attachment on an original writ in favor of Keyes & Co., in a suit in their favor against the bankrupt then and at the same time of the petition still pending; second, of other subsequent attachments and executions in suits in favor of other plaintiffs against the bankrupt, in which they had respectively recovered judgment, and placed execution in his hands in season to change the property, and praying for a determination of the rights of the parties in respect to the property at the time of the commencement of the proceedings, and of their rights now in respect to the sum of three hundred and eleven dollars and one cent, into which, as assignee, he has converted the property and still holds in lieu of the property. None of these execution creditors appear to be parties to the bankruptcy proceedings, nor are they claiming in any manner under them, but are claiming in hostility to them, and for that reason this petition could not be maintained against them as an adversary proceeding.

In order to maintain a proceeding in invitum to have the rights of parties so interested adjudicated upon, it would be necessary to proceed by regular writ at law or in equity, according to the nature of the case and the relief sought. But in this case the execution creditors have come in and agreed in writing that the facts stated in the petition are true, and that "the court may upon said petition make such order and decision as to the disposition of the fund" as may be according to law. In section 5011, Rev. St. U. S., it is provided that in any proceedings within the jurisdiction of the court "the parties concerned, or submitting to such jurisdiction, may at any stage of the proceedings, by consent state any question in a special case for the opinion of the court, and the judgment of the court shall be final, unless it is agreed and stated in the special case that either party may appeal if in such case an appeal is allowed," etc. In this special case the parties have submitted to the jurisdiction and stated questions in the case, and so the questions submitted are regularly before the court.

At the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings the goods were the general property of the bankrupt, subject to a first lien by the attachment of Keyes & Co., and to a second and subsequent lien, by virtue of the executions of the attaching creditors. By force of the provisions of section 5044, Rev. St. U. S., the title to the property vested in the assignee, and the attachment of Keyes & Co., having been made within the prescribed time, was dissolved. The liens in favor of the judgment creditors were valid and perfect, the executions having been delivered to the officer within thirty days, according to the provisions of the Vermont statutes (Gen. St. 303, § 94), and he having the actual possession of the property. These judgment liens were not at all affected by the bankruptcy proceedings. Thus far there is no difficulty or real difference between the claims of the counsel of the respective parties. The real question is as to how and where the judgment lien stood when the attachment lien was dissolved, and the property subject to the judgment liens was vested in the assignee. The petitioning creditors and assignee, in behalf of the bankrupt estate, claim that the attachment lien was equal in amount to the ad damnum in the writ, which is four hundred dollars, and, as that was greater than the amount of the property, covered the whole property and left no room for the judgment liens, and that its dissolution created no room for them. The judgment creditors claim that the dissolution of the attachment made room for their liens, and that, as their liens were subject to the attachment only, as soon as that was dissolved their liens took its place and covered the whole. But neither of these claims is thought to be well founded to the full extent. Keyes & Co. had a valid lien by attachment which could not as to damages exceed four hundred dollars, for that was the extent of their claim at that time, although the court where the suit was pending might, if within its jurisdiction, raise the ad damnum so as to permit them to recover more. The ad damnum would not limit the recovery for costs at all, and that recovery might make the whole much beyond four hundred dollars, and extend the lien as far, unless it was limited by the direction in the writ as to the value of the property to be attached, which might be beyond the ad damnum, if the authority issuing it saw fit to make it so.

It is not stated in the special case what the amount directed to be attached was. But whatever it may have been the attachment lien would not be measured by it, but would only be limited by it. The measure of their lien was the amount of their debt or claim sued for and their lawful costs of the suit to that time.

To the extent of that attachment lien the judgment liens were restricted, and as far as that covered the property they did not. The same thing that dissolved the attachment vested the property in the assignee subject to the executions. There was no space of time after the attachment was gone and before the property was vested in which the judgment lien could move, or be moved up to take its place.

The bankruptcy proceedings did not enlarge the judgment liens nor change their place, but left them exactly as and where they were before. Before, they covered all of the property in the custody of the officer not covered by the attachment lien. After, they covered all the same property in the hands of the assignee, not covered by the right, which before was the attachment lien, and was then vested in him. This leaves to the judgment creditors exactly their rights and gives to the other creditors exactly theirs. These conclusions are in accordance with the opinions of Dyer, J., upon similar questions in Eastern district of Wisconsin. In re Steele [Case No. 13,345]. The judgment liens stand valid in the order of their attachments. The amount of the demand of Keyes & Co., and costs to the time of adjudication, does not appear.

The cause is referred to the register having charge of the case to ascertain the amount of the demand of Keyes & Co., with costs to the time of the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings, and when that amount is ascertained the assignee is to hold so much of the sum of three hundred and eleven dollars and one cent as is equal to it for the estate of the bankrupt and to pay over the balance to the execution creditors, so far as the same will go, in the order of their attachments, in satisfaction of their judgments.

NELSON v. BARKER et al.

[3 McLean, 379.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Illinois. June Term, 1844.

PLEADING — AMENDMENTS — WHEN MADE — MISNOMER.

1. By the common law amendments were permitted, if there was any thing to amend by.
[Cited in brief in Turner v. Christy, 50 Mo. 146.]

2. Anciently all amendments were required to be made at the term when the error occurred.
[Cited in Re Wight, 134 U. S. 146, 10 Sup. Ct. 490.]

3. But now they may be made, at any time before judgment, and, in some cases, afterwards.
[Cited in Tufts v. Tufts, Case No. 14,233; Re Wight, 134 U. S. 146, 10 Sup. Ct. 489.]

4. A misnomer may be amended after plea in abatement.

5. The plea gives the matter, by which to amend. But under the act allowing amendments, the declaration may be amended.

[This was an action by Nelson against Barker and Stewart.]

Mr. Hall, for plaintiff.

Mr. Peters, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This was an action of assumpsit to which the defendants filed a plea of misnomer. And the plaintiff moved for leave to amend the writ and declaration. This was objected to on the ground that there was nothing to amend by. At common law the court could give leave to amend only where there was something to amend by. And anciently amendments were required to be made at the term at which the error occurred; but now an amendment may be made at any time before judgment, and, in some cases, after judgment.

In the case of Randolph v. Barret, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 141, the court held where suit was brought against the defendant as administrator, on a plea in abatement being filed, alleging that he was executor and not administrator; that the circuit court had power to allow the writ and declaration to be amended. And they say, "In this case the defendant admitted by his plea that he was the person liable to the suit of the plaintiff; but averred that he was executor and not administrator." "And when the plea was filed it became part of the record, and furnished matter by which the pleadings might be amended." And the court remark, "express authority is given by the 32d section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 91], to the courts of the United States, to permit either of the parties, at any time, to amend any defect in the process or pleadings, upon such conditions as the court shall, in their discretion, and by their rules prescribe." "This amendment is, therefore, not only authorised by the ordinary rules of amendment, but by the statute also."

The case of a misnomer is, in principle, similar to that above cited, as the plea in both cases gives the true name or designation. On the general ground from the above authority, the amendment may be permitted under the act of congress. Leave to amend.

ADMIRALTY PRACTICE—MOTIONS TO VACATE PROCEEDINGS FOR IRREGULARITIES.

[1. A party seeking to set aside the proceedings against him (including an attachment of his property and an arrest of his person) for irregularities in the papers must embody all his objections in one application, and will not be allowed to split them up, and embody in a subsequent motion additional grounds presumptively known to him at the time of the first application.]

[2. A second application to vacate the proceedings cannot be sustained on the ground that the libel was not verified by oath, and that no jurat is annexed thereto, for it will be presumed that these facts were known to counsel, or would have been known to him on the exercise of reasonable diligence at the time of making the first motion.]

[3. Where a motion is made to set aside the proceedings for want of verification of the libel, the fact being that the name of the clerk is not subscribed to the jurat, it may be shown in opposition to the motion by the testimony of the clerk that the oath was in fact regularly administered before the libel was filed.]

[This was a libel by Samuel C. Nelson against Thomas Bell and others. Heard on motion to set aside the proceedings, including an attachment of defendant's property, and an arrest of his person, because of irregularities in the papers. A similar motion was previously made and denied. Case No. 1,257.]

BETTS, District Judge. Notice dated February 5, 1851, was given by the proctor of Bell, one of the respondents, to the proctors of the libellant, of a motion to be made on the 11th of the same month to vacate, set aside and annul the proceedings upon the libel in this cause, and also the order of January 13, 1851, endorsed thereon, to hold the defendant to bail. The notice then proceeds to state five different grounds upon which the motion will be supported: First. That rule 23 of the supreme court has not been complied with. Second. That no affidavit or other proof was produced to the judge making the order to support it. Third. That the libel is not verified by oath or affirmation of the libellant or any person in his behalf. Fourth. That no evidence was given the judge of the verification of the libel by oath. Fifth. That no proof was given the judge that Bell could not be arrested before a mandate was obtained for the attachment of his property. The motion was brought to hearing during the March term. An objection was taken preliminarily by the counsel for the libellant that the essential matters embraced in this notice had been brought before the court in January term, on an application similar in purport to the present, and when all the facts of the present motion were also in possession of the defendant and his proctor, and that it is not now competent for him to divide his application, and ask relief upon grounds then known to him and directly connected with the subject-matter brought before the court. The former application by the same proctor dated January 17, 1851, is upon notice that he will move that the defendant Bell be discharged from arrest in the cause, and that the attachment against his property be dissolved, founded upon the affidavit of Bell and the supreme court rules in admiralty, and upon the libel and order to hold to bail thereon. That motion was made and argued the 22d of January, and after consideration was decided by the court on the 27th against the defendant. [Case No. 1,257.]

No new particular is presented in this case respecting the regularity of the proceedings by the libellant, other than that the proctor for the defendant makes affidavit that he has examined the files of the court, and made inquiries as to the proceedings in this cause, and has discovered that the libel is not verified by oath, and that no jurat is annexed thereto or filed therewith. He does not state when the discovery was made, and as it was a patent fact at the time the former notice was given and motion made, the presumption is it was then known to him, or would have been on the exercise of reasonable diligence.

The rule rests alike upon reason and authority that a party seeking to set aside proceedings against him for any supposed irregularity or want of equity must embody all his objections in his application. He will not be permitted to split them into parcels, and try the effect and sufficiency of one motion thereon after another; and he is bound to be prepared with all those which he could by reasonable diligence procure, as well as those then known to him, or apparent upon the papers. Desmond v. Wolf [1 Code Rep. 49].

If there was a vital deficiency in the libel or its verification, that must be matter open to the notice of the party, on the slightest inquiry, and after hearing the defendant once fully upon the objection that there was no sufficient authority to justify the process issued in the cause, and adjudging the point against him, a court will hardly admit a new application to effect the same end, founded upon a denial that the evidence on which the court acted was not regularly authenticated.

The objection in respect to the verification of the libel is merely technical and formal. The name of the clerk taking the oath is not subscribed to the jurat, but he swears the oath was regularly administered by him to the libellant before he filed the libel, and he so informed the counsel for the defendant before this motion was made. If a motion had been made upon the affidavit, the objection might be taken that it was not verified. Jackson v. Stiles, 3 Caines, 128. But when the motion is aggressive, founded upon the circumstance that no signature is attached to the jurat, it may be repelled by proof that the affidavit was duly sworn to. The supreme court say, the officer's name, but not the date, may be omitted in a jurat. Chase v. Edwards, 2 Wend. 283. Attaching the name of the officer to the jurat does not constitute a verification by oath. It is only evidence that the oath was administered, and I cannot perceive there would be any legal objection to convict a party of perjury in an affidavit sworn before a proper officer, although no jurat is attached to it, provided the officer could, without the jurat, give satisfactory proof that the oath was duly administered.

Upon both grounds this objection must fail to affect the proceedings, and all the other points respecting the regularity of the warrant of attachment were considered and disposed of on the former motion. This motion must accordingly be denied, with costs.

TAXES ILLEGALLY ASSESSED—ACTION FOR MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED.

An action for money had and received is maintainable against a collector of internal revenue, for duties or taxes erroneously or illegally assessed and collected, when the payment has been made under protest, and with notice of an intention to bring a suit to test the validity of the claim.

[Cited in Greer v. Ferguson, 56 Ark. 324, 19 S. W. 967.]

This was an action [by William Nelson] against [George T. Carman] an internal revenue collector, to recover back an income tax alleged to have been illegally imposed upon the plaintiff. The cause was tried before the court without a jury, and, the testimony being closed, the district attorney raised the objection, that the action would not lie against the collector, inasmuch as it appeared that the tax in question had been decided by the assessor, as well as by the commissioner, upon appeal, to be due, and had been inserted in the assessment list as due and payable by the plaintiff, and had been collected in pursuance of the assessment list and paid into the treasury.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The question raised by the district attorney, in this case, has been passed upon by the supreme court, in the case of City of Philadelphia v. Collector, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 720, and it must now be considered as settled, that an action for money had and received is maintainable against a collector, for duties or taxes erroneously or illegally assessed and collected, when, as in the present case, the payment has been made under protest, and with notice of an intention to bring a suit to test the validity of the claim. The objection is, therefore, overruled, and the case must proceed upon the merits.

ARREST — AFFIDAVIT TO HOLD TO BAIL — SUFFICIENCY—STATEMENT OF NECESSARY FACTS—OPINION OR BELIEF—HABEAS CORPUS.

1. An affidavit to hold to bail must be positive as to the indebtment.

2. The opinion or belief of the affiant is insufficient.

3. On a habeas corpus the court will inquire whether the capias was rightfully issued.

W. 364, to the point that, where the affidavit upon which the arrest is based states facts, the legal tendency of which is to make out a case in all its parts, although the proof may be slight, and not entirely satisfactory, the arrest will be valid until set aside by a direct proceeding for that purpose.]

[T. Walker and W. M. Corry, for defendants [Cutter & Tyrrell], claimed a discharge on habeas corpus, on two grounds: First, because the affidavit did not state that the deponent was the authorized agent of plaintiffs [Nelson & Graydon]; and, secondly, because the affidavit was not positive, but only as to deponent's opinion, information, and belief.

[C. Fox and Howard, for plaintiffs, insisted that the court, on habeas corpus, could not go behind the capias, and try the sufficiency of the affidavit. But if this could be done, the present affidavit was sufficient.

[Judge McLEAN held otherwise, and ordered the defendants to be discharged, because the affidavit was not positive. He considered the agency sufficiently set forth.] [2]

Fox & Howard, for plaintiffs.

Walker & Carey, for defendants.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. The defendants were arrested on a capias ad respondendum, founded upon the following affidavit: "The United States of America, District of Ohio. I, William A. Woodward, of the city and state of New York, being duly affirmed, depose and say, that Nelson & Graydon are merchants, residing in the city and state of New York, and that I am informed and verily believe, that the said Amos Cutter and Jacob Tyrrell, partners, trading and doing business under the firm of Cutter & Tyrrell, are citizens of the city of Cincinnati, in the state of Ohio, and that the said Cutter & Tyrrell are justly indebted to the said Nelson & Graydon, in the sum of eleven hundred and twenty-five dollars and four cents, by virtue of a promissory note described in the foregoing precipe, exclusive of all offsets; which said promissory note was given for goods and merchandise, sold by the said Nelson & Graydon to the said Cutter & Tyrrell; and I do further depose and say, that I verily believe said Cutter & Tyrrell are about to convert their property into money for the purpose of placing it beyond the reach of their creditors; that they have property and rights in action, which they fraudulently conceal; and that they have disposed of, and are about to dispose of their property, with intent to defraud their creditors. And I do further depose and say, that my opinion is founded upon statements and information given to me by the said Cutter & Tyrrell, themselves, and on examination of their books and accounts, and information of individuals residing in the neighborhood of the said Cutter & Tyrrell: and I do further depose and say, that I am acting in this matter as the agent of the said Nelson & Graydon." Signed, "W. A. Woodward," which affidavit is duly certified.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

The counsel move for the discharge of the defendants on two grounds: 1. Because the facts are stated by the affiant, from his information and belief. 2. Because he does not state that he was the authorised agent of the plaintiffs.

On the part of the plaintiffs it is insisted, that on the habeas corpus the court cannot go behind the capias and inquire into the sufficiency of the affidavit. If this were a regular term, it would only be necessary to bring the sufficiency of the affidavit before the court, to move for the discharge of the defendants. But, in vacation, the defendants are brought up on the present writ, to enable me to inquire into the cause of their detention. The writ on which the arrest was made is produced by the gaoler, but that writ, unsupported by an affidavit, did not authorise the arrest. Indeed it cannot legally be issued without an affidavit. The affidavit, therefore, is so connected with the writ, as to constitute an essential part of it. Separate it from the writ, and the defendants must be discharged. The personal liberty of the defendants is concerned, and in such a case a presumption does not arise against that liberty.

By the third section of the act of this state, to abolish imprisonment for debt it is provided, that if any creditor, his authorised agent or attorney, shall make oath or affirmation in writing, &c. that there is a debt or demand justly due to such creditor, of one hundred dollars or upwards, specifying, as nearly as may be, the nature and amount thereof, and establishing one or more of the following particulars: 1. That the defendant is about to remove his property out of the jurisdiction of the court, with intent to defraud his creditors: or, 2. That he is about to convert his property into money for the purpose of placing it beyond the reach of his creditors, &c. &c. This affidavit was not intended to be a mere formal matter. The debt must be positively stated to be justly due. Not that it is due in the opinion or belief of the witness from an examination of the account or the written instrument on which the action is founded. If something more than this evidence of indebtment were not required, a capias would have been given without an affidavit. Under an Indiana statute, containing similar provisions to the above, the supreme court held, "in actions on contract, the affidavit, whether made by the plaintiff himself, or by a third person, must show that there is, at the time of suing out the writ, an existing debt actually due, for which an arrest may be lawfully made. It must be positive as to the sum due, and not as the deponent believes, nor as appears by an account stated," &c. Lewis v. Brackenridge, 1 Blackf. 112. A similar decision was made by the circuit court in the district of Illinois. Wright v. Cogswell [Case No. 18,074]. The agency of the affiant is sufficiently shown. The defendants are discharged.

NELSON et al. v. FOSTER et al.

[5 Biss. 44.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Wisconsin. Sept. Term, 1857.

ABATEMENT—ANOTHER ACTION PENDING—STATE COURTS—SUIT IN STATE COURT.

1. Certificate of counsel that, in his opinion, the plea is well founded, need not accompany a plea of abatement in the federal court.

2. The federal court will take cognizance of the constitution and laws of the state on the subject of her courts, and ascertain which are courts of general jurisdiction.

3. A plea of another action pending, in the usual form that the former suit was at the time of the commencement of this suit, and still is pending, is sufficient without alleging that the former suit was not discontinued before the plea was filed.

4. The pendency of a suit in a state court is a good plea in abatement in the federal court.

[This was an action by John G. Nelson and others against Charles S. Foster and others.]

MILLER, District Judge. This is an action of assumpsit upon book account for goods sold and delivered, commenced by writ of attachment. The defendants pleaded in abatement that a suit for the same debt was brought by these plaintiffs against the defendants in the circuit court for Green county in this state, before this suit was commenced; and that the said former suit was, at the time of commencing this suit, and still is, pending in said circuit court. An affidavit of one Francis Emerson is annexed to the plea.

To this plea the plaintiffs demurred, and they set forth for causes of demurrer: 1. That the plea was not accompanied with a certificate of counsel that in his opinion the plea is well founded. 2. That the former suit is in a court of inferior jurisdiction, and the said plea does not aver that the said court had jurisdiction of the parties or the subject matter. 3. That the plea does not allege that the former suit was not discontinued before the plea in abatement was filed. 4. That a suit pending in a court of this state is not the subject of a plea in abatement in this court.

By the rule of court, demurrers or special pleas shall be accompanied with a certificate of the attorney or counsellor that, in his opinion, the demurrer or plea is well founded, otherwise the demurrer or plea may be treated as a nullity. The plea in this case was not so signed, but it has not been the practice to require a plea in abatement to be so signed. The affidavit required to the plea has been considered all that was necessary. When the objection was raised at the argument, the attorney for the defendant was allowed to annex the certificate. This was not a proper manner of making the objection; it should have been done by a motion to strike off the plea as a nullity.

The courts of the United States take judicial cognizance of the constitution and laws of the state on the subject of her courts, and we know that a circuit court for a county is a court of general jurisdiction.

The third point is, that the plea does not allege that the former suit was not discontinued before the plea in abatement was filed. The plea is in the usual form, that the former suit was, at the time of commencing this suit, and still is, pending. This is sufficient. We cannot look out of the record to see how the fact is in regard to the former suit. The plea states that the suit is still pending, which is conceded by the demurrer, and by this we are bound.

The objection that a suit pending in a court of the state is not the subject of a plea in abatement in this court is not tenable. By the eleventh section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States (1 Stat. 78) it is provided that the circuit courts shall have original cognisance concurrent with the courts of the several states of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, when the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars. It is too well settled by the courts of the United States to require citation of authority that in all cases when courts have concurrent jurisdiction, the court which first has possession of the subject must determine it conclusively, and has exclusive jurisdiction. In this case, there were two attachments of the defendant's property, and two writs served on them, and two suits pending against them at the same time. If such a proceeding were sanctioned, it would lead to great oppression, and would be a reproach to the administration of justice. A party has his choice of jurisdictions, but he cannot claim both at the same time. This court has always adhered to the rule not to entertain jurisdiction of a case when we are informed by a plea in abatement that a prior suit in law or equity for the same subject matter, between the same parties, is pending in a court of the state; and such, I have no doubt, is the rule in every court in the United States. Earl v. Raymond [Case No. 4,243]. This court is not a foreign court to the courts of this state. Williams v. Wilkes, 14 Pa. St. 228. The writ will be quashed.

NOTE. This plea cannot be sustained unless the suits be of the same character, and the plaintiff be the same in both. Certain Logs of Mahogany [Case No. 2,559]; Davis v. Hunt, 2 Bailey, 412. Bancroft v. Eastman, 2 Gilman, 259, was a case where two actions had been commenced by same plaintiff for same cause of action. Held, defendant, in second action, must aver pendency of first suit at time of filing his plea in abatement. McConnell v. Stettinius, 2 Gilman, 707. A owed B, for which debt he gave his note in liquidation. B transfers to C., who sues on it, pending which B sues A. on the original debt. Held, the first a good abatement to second suit if properly pleaded. Branigan v. Rose, 3 Gilman, 123. The ground of pleas in abatement (regarding two or more suits) is said to be the abhorrence of law to multiplicity of suits; and that where a party has a complete remedy by an action commenced, another is abatable. But if the remedy of an action commenced is partial or ineffectual, another suit is proper; as where a proceeding in rem (foreign attachment) is pending, that is not cause for plea in abatement to second suit in personam. Hart v. Granger, 1 Conn. 154. In a petition in chancery by A and B against C, praying a contract for the purchase of Ohio lands to be delivered up and canceled as C had not broken it, C pleaded in abatement a bill in chancery brought by him and then pending in Ohio against A and B, praying damages for its breach or other equitable relief, held, good plea in abatement.

It was here contended that the plea of another suit was only applicable where the defendant had been harrassed with two suits for the same cause, and not where defendant has first sued on the contract and afterwards plaintiff has also sued, but the court said, "But as a general principle, if the determination of the first suit commenced will determine the whole controversy, the first is pleadable in abatement of the last; at any rate it is so if the suits be not in the same court. I know not, indeed, that it would make any difference at law if they were both in the same court. It rather strikes me that in chancery, as the court could easily try them both together and settle at once all the controversies between the parties, the suits would stand on the ground of bill and cross-bill," and then goes on to say the first to sue should have the benefit of priority, &c.

In Evans v. Lingle, 55 Ill. 455, an appeal from a justice of the peace was dismissed; appellant filed a bill in chancery to re-instate the appeal pending which appellee sued appellant and his surety on the appeal bond. They plead the chancery suit in abatement. Held, not good, there being no injunction to restrain the suit at law. The pendency of a suit in a court of general jurisdiction in another state, in which property sufficient to satisfy the demand has been attached, is a good bar. Lawrence v. Remington [Case No. 8,141], April, 1874. The rule in some courts that the pendency of an action in a foreign jurisdiction is not pleadable in abatement, does not apply when the plaintiff has secured his debt by attachment in such action.

Case No. 10,106.

NELSON et al. v. The GOLIAH.

[Hoff. Op. 481; 2 Am. Law Rev. 772, note.]

District Court, D. California. March 10, 1868.

NEGLIGENT TOWAGE — LIABILITY OF TUG FOR INJURY TO TOW—COLLISION WITH ANCHORED VESSEL—EXCESSIVE SPEED—LENGTH OF HAWSER.

[1. A steamer engaged in towing is responsible to the tow for at least the same degree of care and diligence as she is bound to exercise to avoid injuring other vessels; and hence, where the tow is injured by being brought into collision with another vessel, the question of the tug's liability is to be determined by the same rules applicable in ordinary cases of collision.]

[2. The use of the terms "ordinary negligence," "gross negligence," etc., are of doubtful utility for the purpose of defining liabilities of different classes of bailees, and often tend to create difficulties and embarrassments in practice; and the question, what constitutes actionable negligence depends, after all, upon the circumstances of the particular case.]

[3. Any violation of the general rules of navigation in respect to the course to be pursued by vessels approaching each other or in respect to lookouts, the display of lights, etc., will ordinarily render the vessel guilty of it liable for the consequences; and, when required by the circumstances, "great caution" and the "utmost vigilance" will be exacted, and "ordinary care" is not sufficient.]

[4. The law exacts the extremest diligence and the highest degree of caution on the part of vessels, especially steamers, navigating frequented waters, where there is danger of collision; nor will it be any excuse that the collision could not have been prevented at the moment it occurred, if measures of precaution have been neglected which would have rendered the accident less probable.]

[5. The rule that, in case of collision between a vessel under way and one at anchor, the burden is upon the moving vessel to show that she was not in fault, applies in its full extent to the case of a tow seeking to recover against her tug damages occasioned by being brought into collision with an anchored vessel, in the course of the towage.]

[6. A tug held in fault, and responsible to the owners of her tow, for collision with an anchored vessel, in that she attempted to run through anchored shipping on a hazy night, with her tow upon a hawser of 50 fathoms, and at a speed of from 7 to 8 miles an hour, when she might have avoided the shipping by taking a different route.]

This was a libel by Charles Nelson and others against the steamtug Goliah for damages sustained in a collision alleged to be caused by negligent towing.

Milton Andros, for libelants.

T. R. Wise, for claimants.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. On the 2d of January the steamtug Goliah was employed by the master of the schooner Eclipse to tow the latter vessel (then at the entrance of the harbor) to a place of mooring. The libel avers that by reason of the negligent and unskilful manner in which this service was performed the schooner was brought into collision with the steamer Ajax, and sustained damage, for which this action is brought. It is not contended by the advocate of the libelants that steamtugs or tow boats, while engaged in their ordinary business, are to be held to the rigid accountability of common carriers. It is urged, however, on the part of the claimants, that they are liable for gross negligence only, and two cases from the New York Reports are cited in support of this position. But neither of these cases will be found on examination to sustain the rule contended for. In Alexander v. Greene, 7 Hill, 533, the decision turned upon the effect to be given to a permit or special contract by which the risks of the transportation were assumed by the tow. The supreme court (per Mr. Justice Bronson) held that by this agreement the tug was exonerated from all liability, even for gross negligence. The court of errors reversed this decision. All the judges except one were of opinion that, notwithstanding the permit, the owners of the steamboat were responsible for injuries caused by the want of ordinary skill and care on the part of their agents. A majority even held that they were liable as common carriers; and Mr. Justice Bronson himself admitted that in the absence of an express agreement the law would make them answerable for the want of ordinary care and skill on the part of their servants. In Wells v. Steam Navigation Company, 4 Seld. [8 N. Y.] 375, the same question arose, and was decided on the authority of the previous case in 7 Hill. The case turned upon the construction of the special contract; and the court expressly declares that "under an ordinary contract to perform the service the defendants would be bound to bestow ordinary care and diligence, and would be liable for any injuries occasioned by the want thereof." Page 379.

Judge Story, in his work on Bailments (section 496), states the owners of steamboats employed in towing are not liable as common carriers, but are responsible only for ordinary diligence and care in the undertaking. To the same effect is Ang. Carr. §§ 668–686. In truth, the only question discussed in the cases is not whether tow boats are liable for gross negligence, but whether they are not subject to the full liability of common carriers. In Louisiana they are so considered. Smith v. Pierce, 1 La. 353; Adams v. New Orleans Steam Towboat Co., 11 La. 46. They were also held to be common carriers by Mr. Justice Kane, in Vanderslice v. The Superior [Case No. 16,843]. The decision of the district court in this case was overruled by Mr. Justice Grier in the circuit court. But it is in none of the text-books intimated that the owners of tow boats, who have made the ordinary contract for the performance of the service, are not liable, like bailees for hire, for the want of the reasonable care and diligence required by the nature of their undertaking, the business they are engaged in, and the circumstances of the particular case. It would be a singular anomaly in the law if the owners of steamtugs, who are confessedly liable for injuries done by their want of skill and diligence to the vessels of strangers with whom they have made no contract, should be held to a less degree of responsibility to the owners of the vessel in tow for the negligent and unskillful performance of a service which they have been paid for undertaking. Whatever difference of opinion may have heretofore existed as to the precise relations between the owners of the tug and those of the tow, whether those of principal and agent, or of master and servant, it is now settled by the supreme court of the United States that the tug is responsible for damages caused to other vessels by want of skill and diligence on the part of her master and crew. And this, though the vessel in tow may, by coming in contact with the other, have been the immediate cause of the damage. Where both vessels are exclusively under the control, direction, and management of the master and crew of the tow, the owners of the tug would not be liable, for the injury could in no sense be said to be caused by the negligence and unskillfulness of themselves or their agents. Where those in charge of the vessels respectively jointly participate in their control and management, both will be liable if the damage was caused by the fault of both, or either, if it arose from his fault alone. Sturgis v. Bowyer, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 110; Cushing v. The John Fraser, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 184; Sproul v. Hemmingway, 14 Pick. 1; The New York v. Rea, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 223; The Express [Case No. 4,596]; The Carolus [Id. 2,424]; The R. B. Forbes [Id. 11,598].

These principles, so agreeable to justice and common sense, must be considered as authoritatively established; and assuming, as we must, that the liability of the tug to the vessel in tow for injuries occasioned by her negligence is at least coextensive with her liability to stranger vessels for injuries similarly caused, the inquiry in this case becomes in no respect distinguishable from the ordinary inquiry in collision cases,—by whose fault did the accident occur? We are thus relieved of the necessity of considering whether the tug has performed the service with ordinary or with slight diligence, or whether she has been guilty of gross or of "ordinary negligence," whatever this last expression may mean. In truth, these terms, borrowed from the civil law, and common in the text-books and judicial opinions, appear to have but doubtful utility for the purposes of defining liabilities of different classes of bailees.

The question in all cases is: Has there been such negligence as will render the party guilty of it responsible? Whether such negligence has occurred will depend on the relations of the parties (e. g. whether a bailment be gratuitous or for pay), the nature of the service, and all the other circumstances of the case. In Wilson v. Brett, 11 Mees. & W. 113, Rolfe, B., observes that "he could see no difference between negligence and gross negligence; that it was the same thing, with the addition of a vituperative epithet." In Wyld v. Pickford, 8 Mees. & W. 460, Parke, B., says: "That a carrier, under certain circumstances, has in many cases been held responsible for gross negligence; but in some of them that term has been defined in such a way as to mean 'ordinary negligence'—that is, the want of such care as a prudent man would take of his own property." The use of the expression "ordinary negligence" to signify the want of ordinary diligence seems not particularly happy; nor does it afford any certain or precise measure of the degree of diligence to be exacted in any class of cases, since that must depend, as before observed, upon all the circumstances of each particular case. The degree of diligence required of a bailee is usually said to depend upon the question whether the bailment was gratuitous or for compensation, and whether for his or the bailor's exclusive benefit. But that this distinction affords no certain test of what shall be deemed "negligence" is shown by the case of Wilson v. Brett already cited. In that case a person known to be skilled in the management of horses was held liable for failing to exercise such skill as he possessed, although the injury occurred while he was riding a horse gratuitously, at the owner's request, to show him for sale. So, too, in the case of The New World v. King, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 469, it was held that a passenger carried gratuitously has the same right of redress as other passengers for injuries caused by the negligence of the carrier. The court, it is true, abstains from declaring that the obligations of a carrier to a gratuitous passenger are "precisely the same in all respects" as to other passengers, but it holds that, even in regard to the former, he is held to the "greatest possible care and diligence." The court further expresses, in very forcible language, its doubt whether the terms "slight," "ordinary," and "gross," used to describe different degrees of negligence, can be usefully applied in practice, and it remarks "that judges have recently expressed their disapprobation of these attempts to fix the degree of diligence by legal definitions, and have complained of the impracticability of applying them." It is added "that some of the ablest commentators on the Roman law, and on the Civil Code of France, have wholly repudiated the theory of three degrees of diligence as unfounded in principles of natural justice, useless in practice, and presenting inextricable embarrassments and difficulties." If a mechanic or professional man undertake a service, he could hardly excuse himself for the want of that skill and diligence which he holds himself out as possessing, on the ground that he was not to be paid for his services. Nor would a bank, which has received gratuitously a special deposit from a customer, be excused by that fact from the duty of taking the same care of it as of its own funds. But perhaps the most striking illustration of the uselessness of the test supposed to be afforded by the gratuitous or non-gratuitous character of the service is furnished by the admitted rule in collision cases. In these cases the parties have no relations to each other growing out of contract, express or implied. Their only relations arise from the reciprocal duty of so using one's own as not to injure another. But the inquiry in these cases is, was the libelled vessel in fault? If so, or if, in other words, she has been guilty of negligence, she is responsible. What constitutes negligence in a particular case depends upon its circumstances. Any violation of the general rules of navigation in respect to the course to be pursued by vessels approaching each other, or in respect to look-outs, the display of lights, etc., etc., will ordinarily render the vessel guilty of it liable for its consequences; where required by the circumstances, "great caution" and the "utmost vigilance" will be exacted; "ordinary care" is not sufficient. Culbertson v. The Southern Belle, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 585; The Scioto [Case No. 12,508]; Rogers v. The St. Charles, 10 How. [60 U. S.] 108; Ward v. The Fashion [Case No. 17,154]; Ang. Carr. § 650. And yet the obligation of the rule, "Sic utere tuo ut non alienum laedas," would generally be stated to be the duty of exercising reasonable and ordinary care in the use of one's own to avoid injury to another. But under special circumstances extraordinary care is only reasonable diligence, the want of which creates the liability. Thus the duty of exercising ordinary care and diligence becomes, in effect, the duty of exercising extraordinary care and "great caution"; and this apparent paradox illustrates the difficulty of attempting to define in advance, by qualifying epithets, what shall constitute that negligence in any particular case for which the guilty party would be responsible.

With respect to the caution and vigilance to be observed by vessels entering a harbor or navigating waters where other vessels are likely to be encountered, the rules established by the decisions are very explicit. "When a steamer is about to enter a harbor, great caution is required. There being no usages to an open way, the vigilance is thrown upon the entering vessel. Ordinary care under such circumstances will not excuse a steamer for a wrong done." Culbertson v. The Southern Belle, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 587. "If they (propellers) take other craft in tow, those in charge of them ought to augment their vigilance in proportion to the embarrassments they have to encounter." New York & B. Transportation Co. v. Philadelphia & Savannah Steam Nav. Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 472. "It may be safely stated as another general rule admitting perhaps of no exception, that a vessel entering a harbor in the night time is put on her utmost vigilance. * * * When there is reason to expect that the harbor may be crowded with vessels the utmost vigilance is required." The Scioto [supra]. "Inasmuch as the schooner was in a place much frequented as a harbor, in stormy weather, and of which the steamer was chargeable with knowledge, it was the duty of the steamer to slacken her speed on such a night, if not to have avoided the place altogether." Rogers v. The St. Charles, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 108. "If a vessel chooses to avail herself of a particular mode of going down the river at a particular time, which renders it difficult to escape collision, if a collision does take place she must bear the consequences of a contingency to which she has exposed herself." The Hope, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 8. "Nothing is better settled in the admiralty than that in dark and foggy nights measures of strict precaution are expected on the part of a master of a vessel in order to avoid chances of collision. However important it may be that voyages should be completed in the most speedy manner, such speed must be combined with safety to other vessels." Ang. Carr. § 648, and cases cited. In The Iron Duke, 9 Jur. 476, it was held that although the vessel injured carried no lights, properly so termed, "the steamer in going at full speed on such a night, in such a locality, and with only one man on the lookout, was improperly navigated, and therefore responsible for the whole damage." "Steam vessels, under such circumstances, are not justified by the English court of admiralty in going at the rate of ten knots an hour." Ang. Carr. § 650.

From these authorities it is manifest that the law exacts the extremest diligence and the highest degree of caution on the part of vessels, especially steamers, navigating frequented waters, where there is danger of collision; nor will it be any excuse that the collision could not have been prevented at the moment it occurred, if measures of precaution, which would have rendered the accident less probable, have been neglected. Ang. Carr. § 650. There can be no doubt that these rules apply with full force to a steamer engaged in towing. The tow has a right to expect of the tug at least as high a degree of diligence to prevent injuries to her, and to safely perform the service, as the steamer is bound to exercise in regard to other vessels. I proceed then to consider whether in this case the steamtug has been guilty of such negligence as will render her liable for the consequences of the collision, applying to the inquiry the same rules as would govern a similar inquiry if the collision had occurred between the tug and a stranger vessel. The tug appears to have taken hold of the schooner about 2 o'clock p. m., and about five miles outside the Heads. The tide was then ebb—but not long after, and probably when the vessels were not far from Fort Point, the flood set in. About 7 o'clock the collision occurred. The schooner was thrown with great violence against the steamer Ajax, then at anchor in the harbor, striking the stern of the latter with her starboard side. If the Ajax had been struck by the tug, there can be no doubt that the latter would have been prima facie liable. "It may be assumed," says Mr. Justice Ware (The Scioto [supra]), "as a general rule, that when a collision takes place between a vessel under sail and one not under sail, the prima facie presumption is that the fault is imputable to the vessel in motion. [Smith v. Coudry] 1 How. [42 U. S.] 29. * * * Undoubtedly the rule must admit exceptions. But the first presumption will place the blame on her, because she has the power of changing her course, and a vessel at anchor is stationary. The vessel under sail must therefore clear herself from the imputation by showing that every practicable effort was made to avoid the collision." The same presumption must arise where the vessel in motion causes the craft she has in tow, and whose movements she controls, to collide with another vessel; nor is the case altered by the circumstance that the principal injury happens to fall upon the tow, and that it is she that is seeking compensation.

The claimants allege that soon after passing Meigg's wharf the master of the tug discovered a bark lying on his course; that the tug proceeded "slowly and cautiously" on her course, but went further into the stream to avoid the bark; that a fog, or haze, had settled on the water, and soon after she came "quite suddenly" upon a schooner without lights; that to avoid her the helm was put to port and the tug made a gentle sheer; that the schooner, in order to follow the tug, also put her helm to port, but did not meet her helm at the proper time; that as soon as the master of the tug discovered that the schooner was passing across his stern, and was going in a straight line, and head on to the Ajax, he ordered the helm of the tow hard a-starboard; that the schooner did not obey her helm readily, and that in consequence thereof she failed to clear the Ajax, and the collision occurred. It is further alleged that the schooner was loaded by the head; that she was short-handed, and her crew weak and worn down; that she was hogged, and steered badly, and that her master did not inform the tug of her condition. The answer also states that "against the ebb tide she steered well, but that in the slack water she steered wildly, sheering badly from side to side, but that it was then dark, and the master of the tug could not see how well or badly the schooner steered and he thought she had changed her man at the wheel." It is denied by the libelants that the schooner's helm was put to port to avoid a vessel without lights, or that she took any sheer whatever; and it is claimed that she was steered with the utmost care and attention, keeping a vigilant watch on the movements of the tug; that the vessel obeyed her helm, and her crew were abundantly able to perform every duty required of them.

The libelants charge that the tug was guilty of negligence in attempting to run through the shipping on a dark night with a vessel in tow by a line of fifty fathoms in length, and at a high and unsafe rate of speed. They also charge negligence on the part of the tug in not sooner taking measures to avoid the Ajax, and in not ordering the tow to starboard her helm until she herself had passed the bows of the Ajax, and was out of danger, while the tow was in a position that rendered the collision unavoidable. It is not easy to arrive at any accurate estimate of the speed of the vessels. The witnesses, of course, vary in their opinions; but from all that can be collected, it would seem to have been from seven to eight miles an hour. Whether this would be an unsafe rate of speed would depend upon the darkness of the night, the length of the hawser, the probability of meeting vessels, and all the circumstances of the case. If the night was as dark as is stated by Captain Neal, and even as may be inferred from the allegations of the answer, both the speed of the tug and the length of the tow line were too great. Captain Neal testifies that "it was very thick; you could hardly see a vessel more than a ship's length." The answer alleges that "it was then dark, and the master of the tug could not see how well or how badly the schooner steered." Captain Wilson, of the tug St. Thomas, states that he "should not consider it safe to run with the flood tide seven or eight miles an hour." Other witnesses express a contrary opinion, and Capt. Harrison ventures to say that "the greater the speed, the safer it is, up to the limit of speed which a tug can reach." In the case of The Rose, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 1, it was held that steamers are not justified in going at the rate of 10 miles an hour, on a dark night, and where other vessels are likely to be met. That the speed of the tug was greater than prudence justified would seem clear from the fact that she passed quite rapidly the tug Look Out, commanded by Capt. Neal, and also towing a vessel into the harbor. Capt. Neal testifies that she was going twice as fast as his own vessel. But the danger from her high rate of speed was greatly enhanced by the length of her tow line, especially if the night was as dark as appears from the answer. If the darkness or fog was so thick that the master of the tug could not see whether the tow steered well or ill, it may be inferred that the tow was at too great a distance to see the movements of the tug, and follow them by shifting her own helm. Both Capts. Neal and Wilson testify that it is unsafe to come up with a long hawser when the night is thick.

Capt. Smith states that he generally tows with a short hawser, 15 or 20 fathoms in length, until he gets below the shipping, and the significant fact appears in this case, and it is not disputed, that Capt. Neal, when he got near the shipping, did back down and shorten his hawser, thus proving by his conduct the sincerity of his opinion that it was a proper measure of precaution. If it were such, the neglect of it will render the tug liable for the consequences.

It may be urged, however, that the preponderance of testimony shows that the night was not so dark as to prevent the movements of the tug being seen from the tow, and that therefore the hawser was not too long. I am inclined to believe (though the answer seems to admit the contrary) that there was no difficulty in seeing the tug's lights from the tow, although the very close proximity of the schooner without lights at the moment she is said to have been discovered would seem to indicate that the night was far from clear. But I see no mode of reconciling with that "extreme caution" and that "utmost care" which the law exacts, the fact that the tug at so high a rate of speed, and with so long a hawser, took her course through, instead of inside or outside of, the shipping. On the inside was a fair way, 500 yards in width, established by harbor regulations; on the outside were the broad waters of the bay, where all danger would have been avoided. Capt. Neal, with his tow, passed outside of the shipping, and he observes, "There is no necessity to run through the shipping; it is dangerous, especially on a flood tide." That the tug in fact passed through the shipping cannot, I think, be doubted. It is not denied that several vessels were passed by the tug so near as barely to avoid them. Mr. Crabtree, first mate of the schooner, says that he passed within twenty, forty, and sixty yards respectively of three vessels. Espegreen, the schooner's helmsman, testifies that he crossed the bows of two other vessels, their jib-booms not more than five or six fathoms off; and Capt. Dresser, master of the schooner, says that after coming near a square-rigged vessel which they passed, he felt apprehensive of a collision. The schooner, without lights, is said to have been anchored somewhat to the outside of the Ajax, and about one-fourth of a mile below her. The master of the tug states that he passed to the inside of this schooner, and not more than fifty feet from her, and then endeavored to pass outside of the Ajax, which he succeeded in doing, clearing her by about forty yards, which the tow was unable to do.

It is evident, therefore, that the course of the tug was directed through the shipping, and under circumstances which required that her speed should be slackened and her hawser shortened, or else, in the language of the court in [Rogers v. St. Charles] 19 How. [60 U. S.] 108, "that the place should have been avoided altogether." The conjecture, for it is nothing more, of the master of the tug, that the tow ported her helm to avoid the schooner without lights, and thus got a sheer to starboard, which she was unable to overcome, is wholly unsupported by the testimony. Both the captain of the schooner and her helmsman deny that her helm was ported, or that she took a sheer to starboard. In fact, those on board the tug failed to see the schooner without lights in the position assigned to her by claimants' witnesses.

The allegations of the answer that the schooner's crew were worn down by labor and privation, that she was hogged, that she was not in trim, that she leaked, etc., seem either unsustained by the proofs or the facts testified to, are immaterial. That the schooner had been out of meat for about a week, and of bread for a few days, is clearly proven. She was also leaky, and perhaps a little out of trim. But when she was taken in tow by the tug she had no need of the services of her crew, except those of a competent helmsman and a vigilant lookout. The master appears to have been at much pains to have his vessel well steered. The helmsman was relieved about half an hour before the collision, because "he did not steer to the captain's satisfaction," and the wheel was taken by the master himself, who soon after resigned it to the second mate, who seems to have been thoroughly competent and attentive. The master then stationed himself as a lookout on the forward part of the deck-load, and maintained this position until the collision. He testifies that he observed the tug had put her helm to starboard, and was on the point of making the corresponding change in his own helm when the order to do so was given by the tug. This statement is corroborated by the testimony of Capt. Pierce, a passenger on the tug, who states that her helm was starboarded some two minutes before the order to do the like was given to the tow. Both the master and the mates testify that they were in full possession of their health and strength, and that they had heard no complaints from, and seen no sign of inability to work, in the crew. The leaky condition of the schooner, her being out of trim, or hogged, etc., are only important as tending to show that she did not steer well, and that she may have taken the sheer supposed by the claimants. But the master, the helmsman, and the mate deny most positively that she took any sheer whatever. If these witnesses are worthy of credit, their testimony as to what occurred on board their own vessel is more reliable than the suppositions of those on board the tug. The Neptune [Case No. 10,120]. The testimony establishes, I think, very clearly, that the schooner steered as well as is usual in vessels of her class. The captain, the first mate, the second mate, and Morse, all testify that she steered well. Some of the other seamen state that she steered badly in heavy weather, but they generally admit that she steered well enough "if her helm was given to her quick, and she was close watched." Captain Pierce, a witness not certainly ill-disposed to the claimants, testifies that he remarked, when coming up to the Heads, that the schooner steered very well. Captain Cameron, her former owner, testifies that her qualities in that respect were rather remarkable—"she was a little hogged, but it made no difference in her steering." Captain Shelly, a pilot who came up in the tug as far as Meiggs' wharf, says: "I paid no particular attention to the steering of the schooner. If she had steered badly I should have noticed it." It is manifest from this testimony that the theory of the claimants that the schooner took a sheer which her helmsman was unable to meet, can derive no support from the defects of the schooner in regard to her steering qualities.

It seems to me not difficult to discover from the allegations of the answer and the admitted facts of the case to whom the fault of the collision should be attributed. The answer admits that the tug came upon the schooner without lights "quite suddenly." She passed her within forty or fifty feet. The Ajax was then nearly dead ahead, and, as claimants aver, one-fourth of a mile distant. The tug having passed inside the schooner, attempted to go on the outside of the Ajax, and for this purpose put her helm to starboard. But she did not communicate the corresponding order to the tow until two minutes afterward, nor until she had herself passed the Ajax's bows. Notwithstanding her own early change in her helm, she passed the Ajax within 200 feet, or, as the captain admits, within forty or fifty yards. The order to the tow was promptly obeyed, but it was too late to avoid the accident. The tow could not then have been much further from the Ajax than the length of the tow line, and this with a flood tide setting her directly upon her. Under favorable circumstances the course taken by the tug in and out among vessels, passing within forty or fifty feet of one and within 200 feet of another, would be attended with danger. But to take this course voluntarily, when she could have assured her own safety and that of her tow by passing either on the outside or the inside of all the shipping, and this on a night admitted to be somewhat hazy, at a considerable rate of speed, and with a tow line some forty-five or fifty fathoms in length, certainly betrays, as the result proved, a want of that "extreme vigilance" and utmost care which the law exacted under the circumstances. I am therefore of opinion that the tug was in fault, and should be held responsible for the damages.

NOTE. In the original opinion at page 483, lines 47–50 from top, the language is: "Culbertson v. The Southern Belle, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 585; The Scioto [Case No. 12,508]; Rogers v. The St. Charles, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 108; Ward v. The Fashion [Case No. 17,154]; Ang. Carr. § 650." This is erroneous, and should be corrected so as to read: "Culbertson v. The Southern Belle, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 585; The Scioto [supra]; Rogers v. The St. Charles, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 108; Newberry's R. 32 [Ward v. The Fashion, supra]; Ang. Carr. § 650."

BOUNDARIES — EVIDENCE — PUBLIC REPUTATION — STATEMENTS OF INDIVIDUALS—CORNERS —COURSES AND DISTANCES.

1. What an individual may have said, as to a certain corner or line, is not evidence.

2. Public reputation may prove boundaries, but it must be the reputation in the neighborhood, and not what A or B may have said.

3. Where the original corners and lines are established, they must control courses and distances. But courses and distances called for must govern where there are no established objects to control them.

[Cited in Hanson v. Township of Red Rock (S. D.) 57 N. W. 14; Yocum v. Haskins, 81 Iowa, 441, 46 N. W. 1067.]

Mr. Fox, for plaintiff.

Williams & Ewing, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a case of disputed boundaries. The lessor of the plaintiff claims by certain lines and corners, and the defendants with the exception of the beginning corner, claim by different lines and corners, and the jury are to determine from the evidence, which are the original boundaries of the lessor of the plaintiff's land. The original survey of Nelson, and other original surveys connected with it, have been given in evidence, and many witnesses have been examined, and blocks cut from trees marked as corners, and from others marked as line trees, showing the annular growths, have been examined by experienced surveyors and others, in the presence of the jury. There are some leading principles which the court will state to the jury, and which will govern them in making up their verdict. As you have heard from the bench, reputation is admissible evidence to prove boundaries. But what an individual may have said respecting certain lines or corners, does not constitute public reputation, and is, therefore, inadmissible to prove a corner or lines. The reputation must be general in the neighborhood. The surveys made subsequently to Nelson's and calling for it, are received as conducing to prove the reputation of the boundaries of such survey. The beginning corner is claimed in common by both parties, and also the first line, except the point where it is to terminate. But there is no agreement in regard to any of the other lines and corners.

The jury will first endeavor to ascertain from the evidence, the original corners of Nelson's survey; and if they shall be able to do this satisfactorily, they will have little difficulty in tracing or running the lines connected with the corners. And this is the general rule as to corners and lines. If the original marked trees, or objects called for shall be proved, the jury will be governed by them, though they may vary materially from the courses and distances called for. The entry and survey of Nelson are prior in date to the entry and survey under which the defendants claim; and, of course, the subsequent entry and survey are controlled, even at law, so far as the survey is concerned, by the prior survey and patent.

But, if the corners claimed by the lessor of the plaintiff, and which are disputed, are not established by the evidence, the jury will locate the lessor of the plaintiff's claim, by beginning at the corner admitted, and running the courses and distances called for. And so, if a part of the disputed corners are established by the proof, in the opinion of the jury, and they can find no lines to control, the boundary must be established by running the courses and distances called for, so as to include the established points. But, no other deviation from the courses and distances called for, can be made, unless controlled by objects called for in the original survey.

With these general principles the jury will take the case, and after looking into the mass of the evidence, will apply the rule stated.

The jury found the lines of Nelson, as originally run established, except one, and they closed the survey by running the courses called for, so as to connect the two courses. Judgment, &c.

JOINDER OF SEAMEN IN SUITS FOR WAGES.

Libel by a seaman for wages on board the ship Hercules. The act of congress of 1790, c. 56, § 6, provides that in suits by seamen for wages, all the seamen (having cause of complaint of the like kind against the same vessel) shall be joined as complainants. In this case, the libellant was the only one of the crew in port, and brought his suit alone.

Mr. Bolles, for respondents, moved the court to add the names of the rest of the crew to the libel, that they might be concluded by the decree, and offered evidence to show that they had the same cause of action, in all respects, with the libellant. This would answer the object of the statute, which was to save the expense and trouble of several suits.

R. H. Dana, Jr., for libellant, contended that the statute applied only to cases where suits were actually commenced, and that absent parties could not be prevented from showing that their cause of action was different, and should not be concluded as to their claims by a trial upon evidence different from that which they might be able to produce.

DAVIS, Judge. The court has no power to make parties to the libel. The statute only requires the consolidating of several suits, when actually brought upon what is evidently the same cause of action.

Stephen D. Law and A. B. Malcomson, Jr., for plaintiff.

Thomas William Clarke and William T. Graff, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. The bill in this case is founded on reissued letters patent of the United States, granted to Nathaniel Jenkins, August 3d, 1869, for an "elastic packing for joints and valves exposed to destructive fluids." The original patent was granted to Jenkins, May 8th, 1866. The specification of the reissued patent describes the new packing as "an elastic packing, of indestructible properties, to a valve, joint or aperture through which a destructive fluid is to pass, such as steam of any kind, hot water, kerosene or other coal oil, hot or cold." The bill alleges, that Jenkins, by an instrument in writing, dated February 1st, 1870, assigned and conveyed to the plaintiff "the exclusive right and license, within the states of New York and New Jersey, to use said elastic packing in the manufacture of any and all manner of valves, cocks and other articles in which said elastic packing could or should be used, and sell for use in said territory and elsewhere in the United States, such valves, cocks, &c., so manufactured." It also alleges, that, under such rights, the plaintiff made and sold "valves, cocks and other articles containing said elastic packing." It also alleges, as an infringement, that the defendants did, in New York and New Jersey, "use and vend to others to be used the aforesaid invention and discovery, and did cause the same to be done, and did make, use, and vend to others to be used, valves, cocks and other articles employing and containing said improved elastic packing."

To this bill the defendants interpose a plea, which sets forth, "that the said Charles Nelson is not, and never has been, the assignee of the said letters patent in said bill set forth, or of any territorial grant under the same, in manner and form as set forth in said bill, and that the said letters patent are now the exclusive property of Thomas William Clarke of Boston, in the county of Suffolk, and state of Massachusetts, under the following claim of title: The said Nathaniel Jenkins died, on or about the twentieth day of May, 1872, leaving a will duly probated in said county of Suffolk, in the probate court thereof, whereof Charles F. Jenkins, Alfred W. Chandler and John Hassam were executors, and came into full possession of said letters patent. The said Charles Jenkins, Alfred W. Chandler and John Hassam, executors as aforesaid, on the —— day of ——, 1874, duly assigned said letters patent to Alfred B. Jenkins, under power contained in said will, and thereby conferred upon them. The said Alfred B. Jenkins, on the fifth day of November, 1874, duly assigned the same to said Thomas William Clarke. * * * Wherefore defendants say, that the title to said letters patent is not in the said Charles Nelson, for the states of New York and New Jersey." The plaintiff takes issue on this plea, by a replication.

Proofs have been taken by both parties, and the case has been brought to a hearing thereon. The real question tried and argued has been, whether the plaintiff has a right to maintain this suit in his own name alone, as it is now brought. The bill does not aver that the plaintiff is or has been the assignee of the patent or of any territorial grant under the same. Therefore, the plea, in denying that, denies what is not averred in the bill. The allegation of the bill as to the right and license conveyed to the plaintiff by Jenkins, by the instrument of February 1st, 1870, is not otherwise denied by the plea. The parties have, however, treated the pleadings and proofs as raising the question, whether the plaintiff has such a title to, or under, the patent as authorizes him to bring this suit in his own name alone; and that is the question which will be considered.

On the 1st of February, 1870, Jenkins owned two other patents which had been granted to him, besides the reissued patent of 1869. That reissue will be called the 1869 patent. The 1869 patent was for a packing composed of refractory earth and vulcanized rubber. Of the other two patents, one, granted October 15th, 1867, was for a packing for joints and valves composed of pulverized mica and vulcanized rubber, or one composed of pulverized wood charcoal and vulcanized rubber. The other patent was granted October 6th, 1868, and was for an "improvement in steam globe valves," of that class in which an elastic or semi-elastic packing could be employed, the packing being in an annular chamber in the valve head. Premising this, the instrument of 1870 was made. It contains these provisions: "Whereas said Jenkins is the proprietor of certain inventions in the construction of stop valves, cocks, &c., and in packing or discs for stop valves, cocks and other purposes; and whereas the said Jenkins has entered into an arrangement with said Nelson to license him to manufacture stop valves, cocks, &c., under his patent dated October 6th, 1868, and also other valves, cocks, &c., of a suitable pattern to employ his said patent packing or discs, and said Nelson does agree to pay to said Jenkins certain royalties on the valves, cocks, &c., so made by him, and to conduct the manufacture and sale of said valves, cocks, &c., in a manner that will insure the best results to the parties herein named: Now, therefore, said Jenkins does hereby authorize, empower and license the said Nelson to manufacture and sell valves, cocks, &c., of any and every kind, name and description, for any and every purpose, according to his said letters patent, dated October 6th, 1868, and does also authorize and empower said Nelson to make any and every other valves, cocks, &c., not constructed according to said letters patent, which can be suitably arranged for employing the Jenkins patent packing or discs, without making the said Jenkins liable for any infringements of letters patent on valves, cocks, &c., taken out by any other party or parties; and said Jenkins does hereby covenant and agree to and with said Nelson, that he will sell and promptly supply all his orders for the patent packing or discs, such as are to be used in the construction of the valves, cocks, &c., so made by him or for him, at a discount of twenty (20) per cent. from the latest list of prices of such packing or discs, advertised or circulated by him, a copy of which said list is hereunto annexed, in order to show the prices at this date;" (here follows the list of prices of packing or discs;) "and the said Jenkins does also covenant and agree, to and with the said Nelson, that he will not hereafter grant any authority or license to any person or persons to manufacture, within the states of New York and New Jersey, any valves, cocks, or any article in which shall be used the Jenkins patent packing or discs, but that said Nelson shall have the exclusive right to manufacture, within the states of New York and New Jersey, any valves, cocks, or any other article, under said letters patent, dated October 6th, 1868, or renewed patents, or patents for improvements thereon; and said Nelson agrees to pay a royalty for any article he may manufacture, not within specified, in which the said packing is used, the royalty to be fixed upon when such article, not specified, is manufactured; and said Nelson shall have the right to sell in any of the United States, valves, cocks, or any other article, manufactured under said letters patent, or renewed patents, or patents for improvements thereon; and, for and in consideration of the same, the said Nelson does hereby agree with the said Jenkins, his executors, administrators, and the assigns of said Jenkins, of said patents for valves and packing, that he will make the business of manufacturing and selling the Jenkins patent compression valves and gauge cocks a specialty, that he will endeavor to introduce them into use in preference to any other valve or gauge cocks, and recommend them as a superior article, and that he will manufacture them of good material, and equal in weight and workmanship to those heretofore manufactured by him; and said Nelson also agrees to thoroughly advertise said valves and cocks, so to be made by him or for him, and bring them thoroughly to the attention of persons using and employing valves and cocks, and that he will purchase all the packings or discs required for such valves and gauge cocks, from said Jenkins or his legal representatives, or those owning said patents, at the aforesaid rates, viz., at a discount of twenty (20) per cent. from the latest list prices, and that he will pay to said Jenkins, his executors, administrators, or those owning said patent of October 6th, 1868, a royalty at the following rates, for each and every valve made and sold;" (here follows a tariff of royalty on each valve, according to its inches of opening, and on every gauge cock sold) "and said Nelson does hereby agree to stamp, or have stamped, each and every valve made by him, or for him, under said letters patent, as follows: 'Patented, Oct. 6th, 1868—May 8th, 1866, reissued Aug. 3d, 1869—Oct. 15th, 1867;' and said Nelson further agrees to account, at the end of each and every month, for the valves and cocks, or any other article sold by him, or for him, since the last account rendered, specifying the sizes, and the number of each size, and articles sold, and to pay to said Jenkins, his executors, administrators or assigns of his said letters patent, the sum of money due under this agreement, and according to such account, forthwith; and it is mutually understood and agreed, that the said Nelson may sell, transfer, or convey this right or license to any member or members of his firm, now or hereafter engaged in the carrying on of business with him, and that, in case of the death of said Nelson, this license or right shall descend to the survivor or survivors, or the administrators of the deceased, who shall possess all the rights and privileges guaranteed to said Nelson by this agreement, and such administrators may sell such right or license to any parties in the said firm, but neither the said Nelson, nor the administrators of said Nelson, nor any member or members of his firm, shall have any right to assign this right or license to any others than those now engaged, or those who may hereafter be engaged, in business with said Nelson, without first obtaining a written consent of said Jenkins, his executors, administrators, or assigns of his said letters patent; and said Jenkins further agrees, that this agreement shall subsist for the term of said letters patent, and that it shall be binding on the lawful possessors of the said letters patent for said packing, dated May 8th, 1866, reissued August 3d, 1869, and dated October 15th, 1867; and the said Nelson agrees that this agreement shall subsist during the term of said letters patent, and shall be binding on him, his executors, administrators and assigns."

The scope and meaning of the provisions of this agreement are very plain. Jenkins had a patent for valves and two patents for packing. The valves were such as could employ the patented packing. The patented packing could also be used in other valves, not covered by the 1868 patent. Jenkins desired to retain in his own hands the manufacture of the packing, and to sell it. He desired to create a market for it. He could do so by promoting the manufacture and sale of valves made according to his 1868 patent, which would require the patented packing, and of other valves which would require it. By licensing the manufacture of valves to be made according to his 1868 patent, he could derive a royalty on each valve, and at the same time obtain a profit on the manufacture and sale by himself of the packing to be used in such valve. He would also be able thus to ensure that the packing should be a satisfactory article. He, therefore, licenses Nelson to make and sell valves under the 1868 patent, and other valves which could employ the packing of the 1867 and 1869 patents, without making him (Jenkins) liable for infringing any patents for such other valves. He agrees to sell to Nelson, for use in such valves, packing made under the 1867 and 1869 patents, at specified prices. He agrees not to license any one to make in New York and New Jersey any article in which the packing of the patents of 1867 or 1869 shall be used. He agrees that Nelson shall have the exclusive right to make in New York and New Jersey any article under the 1868 patent. Nelson agrees to pay a specified royalty on every valve made and sold according to the patent of 1868, and a specified royalty on every gauge-cock sold according to that patent, and on every other article he should make, not specified, in which such packing should be used, a royalty to be thereafter fixed. Nelson is to have the right to sell anywhere in the United States any article he may make under the 1868 patent. He agrees to purchase from Jenkins all the packing required for such valves and gauge-cocks, at the prices specified. He agrees to stamp every valve made by him or for him under the 1868 patent, with the dates of all three of the patents. He agrees to account to Jenkins every month for all articles sold by him under the agreement, and to pay forthwith the money due under the agreement and according to the account. He is authorized to transfer the license to those then engaged, or who might thereafter be engaged, with him in business, but he is forbidden to transfer it to any one else without the written consent of Jenkins. The agreement is to continue during the term of the 1868 patent and is to bind the owners of the patents of 1867 and 1869.

The instrument calls itself a license. It is not necessary in this case to construe its provisions as a license under the patent of 1868, for the suit is not brought on that patent, nor is it proper to do so, as between the present owners of that patent and Nelson, as the former are not parties to this suit. It is plainly a license to some extent to make and sell articles under the patent of 1868. As to the patents of 1867 and 1869, Jenkins owning those patents, and being engaged in making packing under them, agrees to sell such packing to Nelson at specified prices, with a view to having Nelson use it in articles to be made under the 1868 patent and in other articles fitted for it. But, the moment it was bought by Nelson it passed out from under the monopoly of the patents of 1867 and 1869, and it required no license to enable Nelson then to use it for any purpose for which it could be used. The fact of sale carried with it a license to use and a license to sell again. The instrument conveys to Nelson no right to make packing under either of the packing patents. The royalty to be paid is to be paid solely under the patent of 1868 and for a license under it. There is no royalty to be paid under either of the packing patents. The packing is to be bought from Jenkins as an article of merchandise, at a specified price, and Nelson agrees to buy from Jenkins all the packing he, Nelson, is to use. The valves made according to the patent of 1868 are to be stamped with the dates of all three of the patents, because the valves are made by Nelson under the patent of 1868, and the packing in them is made by Jenkins under the packing patents. Whether the instrument gives to Nelson, as against the owners of the packing patents, an exclusive right to use the patented packing in New York and New Jersey, is a question not necessary or proper to be decided in this case. At most, the instrument is, as to the patent sued on, a mere license.

It was provided by section 11 of the act of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 121), which was the statute in force when the 1868 and 1869 patents were granted, and when the instrument of February 1st, 1870, was made, that "every patent shall be assignable in law, either as to the whole interest, or any undivided part thereof, by any instrument in writing, which assignment and also every grant and conveyance of the exclusive right under any patent, to make and use, and to grant to others to make and use, the thing patented, within and throughout any specified part or portion of the United States, shall be recorded in the patent office within three months from the execution thereof." The 14th section of the same act provided, that an action at law for damages for infringement might be brought "in the name or names of the person or persons interested, whether as patentees, assignees, or as grantees of the exclusive right within and throughout a specified part of the United States." The seventeenth section of the same act gave original cognizance "as well in equity as at law" to all the circuit courts of the United States, of "all actions, suits, controversies, and cases" arising under any patent law, and gave power to such courts, "upon bill in equity filed by any party aggrieved, in any such case, to grant injunctions, according to the course and principles of courts of equity," to prevent infringements. Under these provisions it was always held, that no mere licensee could bring a suit for infringement, either at law or in equity, in his own name alone. In Gayler v. Wilder, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 477, 494, it is said, that while, by the fourteenth section of the act of 1836, the patentee may assign his exclusive right within and throughout a specified part of the United States, and the assignee may, upon such an assignment, sue in his own name, for an infringement of his rights, yet, in order to enable him to sue, the assignment must convey to him the entire and unqualified monopoly which the patentee held in the territory specified, excluding the patentee himself as well as others; and that any assignment short of this is a mere license. That was a suit at law. Wilder, the assignee of the whole of the patent, had granted to one Herring the exclusive right to make and vend the patented article, a safe, in the city and county of New York, for a royalty of a cent a pound on each pound the safe might weigh. But Wilder reserved the right to set up a manufactory for making the safes in the state of New York, not within fifty miles of the city, and to sell them in the state of New York, paying to Herring a cent a pound on each safe so sold within the state. The supreme court held that the agreement was "not an assignment of an undivided interest in the whole patent, nor the assignment of an exclusive right to the entire monopoly in the state or city of New York;" that it, was, therefore, "to be regarded as a license only," and did not, under the statute, enable Herring to maintain an action for infringement; that Wilder continued to be the legal owner of the patent; and that the suit was properly brought in the name of Wilder. The same view was held by Mr. Justice Nelson and Judge Ingersoll, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Connecticut, in Potter v. Holland [Case No. 11,329]. If, within the foregoing principles, the plaintiff in this suit is only a licensee, he cannot sue in equity without joining with him as plaintiff the owner of the legal title (Curt. Pat., 3d Ed., § 403); and such owner is, in such case, a proper party. Woodworth v. Wilson, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 712. A suit at law is, in such case, properly brought in the name of such owner, in behalf of the licensee. Goodyear v. McBurney [Case No. 5,574]; Goodyear v. Bishop [Id. 5,558]. These principles are recognized in Littlefield v. Perry, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 205, 219, 223, and there is nothing in that case which favors the right of the plaintiff in this case to sue alone. The court in that case say: "A mere licensee cannot sue strangers who infringe. In such case redress is obtained through, or in the name of the patentee or his assignee."

The thirty-sixth section of the act of July 8, 1870 (16 Stat. 203), provides, that "every patent or any interest therein shall be assignable in law, by an instrument in writing; and the patentee, or his assigns or legal representatives, may, in like manner, grant and convey an exclusive right, under his patent, to the whole or any specified part of the United States." This provision is not different from that found in section 11 of the act of 1836, and is now embodied in section 4898 of the Revised Statutes. The "exclusive right," under a patent, to a specified part of the United States, means an exclusive right to do everything under the patent, in such specified part, which the patentee could do, and is the same thing as the "exclusive right," under the patent, "to make and use, and to grant to others to make and use, the thing patented, within and throughout" such specified part. Section 55 of the act of 1870 contains the same provisions, in substance, which are above cited from section 17 of the act of 1836, and they are now embodied in sections 629, 711, and 4921 of the Revised Statutes. Section 59 of the act of 1870 provides, that an action at law for damages for infringement may be brought "in the name of the party interested, either as patentee, assignee or grantee." This means such a grantee as is referred to in section 36 of the act of 1870, and no other grantee than such as is spoken of in section 14 of the act of 1836. The provision above cited from section 59 of the act of 1870 is now embodied in section 4919 of the Revised Statutes. There is no ground for saying that the scope of the act of 1870 is greater than that of the act of 1836.

Applying the foregoing interpretation of the law to the provisions of the instrument under which the plaintiff claims the right to bring this suit in his own name alone, it is entirely clear that he has no such right, because he has not the title to the patent for any part of New York or New Jersey, which is the defence set up in the plea. Even if the agreement between Jenkins and Nelson gave to Nelson such an exclusive right and license to use the packing of the reissue of 1869 as is alleged in the bill, the plaintiff would have no right to maintain this suit in his own name alone. The plea is allowed and the bill is dismissed, with costs.

Case No. 10,110.

NELSON et al. v. MADISON.

[3 Biss. 244; [1] 4 Chi. Leg. News, 297.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Wisconsin. June Term, 1872.

DEDICATION BY PLATTING—PLAT RECORDED IN WRONG COUNTY—PLAT MUST BE BY OWNER—EVIDENCE OF DEDICATION BY PRESCRIPTION.

1. The owner of land, or his authorized agent, can plat and lay out a town so as to pass to the public the perpetual use of portions of the land for streets and public grounds, and when such plat is made out, acknowledged and recorded in conformity with the statute, it operates as a sufficient conveyance of the streets and public grounds to the public use.

2. A plat made out and recorded in a different county from where the land is situate does not operate as a dedication.

3. The plat must be made by the person who owns the land at the time it is made, or his authorized agent, and in order to divest the title of the proprietor, the formalities prescribed in the statute are essential.

4. Deeds referring to a plat, but given before the grantor acquired title, do not bind him as an act of dedication.

[Cited in Boerner v. McKillip (Kan. Sup.) 35 Pac. 8.]

5. But an unequivocal recognition of the map after purchase would operate as an affirmance of the original intention of dedication and give it full force and effect.

6. Though dedication may be established by user for a period of twenty years, such user, in order to constitute a dedication by prescription, must have been adverse under some real or pretended claim or right, and exclusive. In the absence of proof to the contrary, the presumption is that the user was permissive.

7. Various decisions of the supreme courts of Wisconsin and of the United States cited and commented on, this court following the latter.

8. Circumstances constituting a dedication—effect of user and acquiescence.

[9. Cited in Reid v. Board of Education of Edina, 73 Mo. 297, to the point that counties have no power to purchase or hold land unless it is given to them by statute.]

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

In equity. This was a bill filed by the complainants, claiming to be owners in fee of certain real estate in the city of Madison, to restrain the city from taking possession of or using them. The facts appear in the opinion.

Gregory & Pinney and S. U. Pinney, for complainants.

J. C. Ford and H. S. Orton, for defendant.

HOPKINS, District Judge. The bill in this case is filed to restrain the defendant from proceeding forcibly to remove a fence erected around a piece of ground situated in the city of Madison, and claimed by the complainants as lots one, two, three and four, block 272. It is alleged in the bill that the complainants placed such fence around the lots to enclose them, and that the defendant has ordered its police officers to remove it. The complainants charge that they own the lots in fee, and ask a perpetual injunction to restrain the defendant from intermeddling with the said fence or the possession of the lots.

The defendant in its answer denies that the premises claimed belong to the complainants, but on the contrary sets up and maintains that they have been dedicated to the public use as a landing or "square," for the use of the public, and that as such they are under the control of the city authorities, and admits that it has directed its officers to remove the fence in case the complainants do not do it after five days' notice. The answer further alleges that the common council of the city, on the 5th day of November, 1870, declared the premises in question to be a public square by the name of "Mendota Public Square." It also alleges that the proprietors and owners of this property more than thirty years before the commencement of this suit, duly granted and dedicated the same to the public for their use as a public landing, street, or public way to and on to Lake Mendota, and that it had been used as such for that period by the public, without objection or hindrance from the complainants or others up to the time the complainants erected the fence around it in December, 1870.

It also states that in 1836 the proprietor of the land embraced within the city of Madison laid out and platted it into lots, streets and squares, and duly acknowledged and recorded such plat in the proper county, and that afterwards it was duly recorded in Dane county, in volume 2 of deeds, page 338, and that on that map or plat this property is designated as a "public landing," and defendant insists that it was thereby granted and dedicated to the public for such use.

The bill alleges that for more than twenty years last past the city has assessed and taxed it as private property, and that the complainants and those under whom they claim, have paid the taxes on such lots, and special assessments for sidewalks, which is admitted in the defendant's answer.

The only questions that require much examination are those relating to the validity and effect of the plats, and if they should be found invalid as grants, then as to whether the defendants have shown a dedication or title by prescription. This I say because I think the evidence abundant to show title in the complainants, unless it is avoided by the plats, dedication, or user.

Three plats of the city have been given in evidence. One made by James D. Doty, individually, acknowledged on the 27th day of October, 1836, and recorded in Iowa county on the 5th May, 1837. Upon this, property on Lake Mendota, now known and described as blocks 260, 261 and 262, and portions of the lots in question, are marked "Public Landing." The residue of these lots are a part of what is called on the plat the "Canal Reservation." It is claimed that this shows that the intention of the proprietor was to reserve certain portions of land on the margin of the lake on each side of the proposed canal for a "public landing." If this were all there was upon that question, I should concur with the defendant's counsel; but the case presents other and different questions. The land platted was not in Iowa county, where the plat was recorded, but was in the county of Milwaukee, so that it was not recorded in the county required by the statute. At the same time another plat was made by J. D. Doty, "as agent, trustee and attorney of the Four Lake Company," which was acknowledged by him as such attorney on the 2d day of January, 1837, and recorded in Milwaukee county on the 17th day of January, 1837. Both of these plats appear to have been prepared by John V. Suydam, as surveyor, whose certificate on each bears date on the 27th October, 1836. On this map the property now known as blocks 260, 261 and 262, is not platted or subdivided into lots or blocks, nor designated as a "public landing." The property in question is left the same way, except that part included in the "canal reservation," which is the same as on the other plat. The surveyor's certificate on each is the same, and in neither is this property or any of this property on the lake not subdivided, mentioned as a "public landing" or "square," nor is it particularly described, nor are the dimensions, courses, or boundaries given. In these respects both plats are essentially defective and do not comply with the statute under which they were made (section 2, Act Mich. April 12, 1827, p. 531; Laws Mich. 1833). And as they are not executed, acknowledged and recorded in accordance with the requirements of the statute, they are not valid or operative as grants of the portions designated as streets and public squares.

The complainants further object to their validity on the ground that neither Doty nor "the trustees of the Four Lake Company" owned the land at the time the plat was made and acknowledged. It cannot require the citation of authority to show that no person other than the owner or his authorized agent can plat and lay out a town so as to pass to the public the perpetual use of portions of the land for streets and public grounds; and as the evidence shows that neither Doty, individually, nor "the trustees of the Four Lake Company," for whom he claimed to act as attorney in making one of the maps, owned this land when they were made, they are, on that ground, ineffectual to pass the title to these lots, or any portion of the land, as public grounds. When a town plat is made, acknowledged and recorded in conformity with the statute, it operates, according to the express declaration of the act authorizing it, as "a sufficient conveyance of the streets and public grounds to the public use." But in order to devest the title of the proprietors, the formalities prescribed by the statute are essential. Gardiner v. Tisdale, 2 Wis. 153; People v. Beaubien, 2 Doug. 256.

The counsel for the defendant claim that as Doty, in 1841, after making the plats, acquired the title to all this property, such subsequent purchase operated, under the doctrine of inurement, to affirm the plat and make good all grants and dedications therein contained. Lee v. Lake, 14 Mich. 12. But I do not think that doctrine applies to the case. That only applies to sales with warranty. In such cases, an after-acquired title is held to inure to the benefit of a purchaser to prevent circuity of action. But I think an unequivocal recognition of the map after the subsequent purchase would operate as an affirmance, as will be more fully considered hereafter. Cincinnati v. White's Lessee, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 431.

Another map was made by M. M. Strong, as attorney for Kintzing Pritchette, on the 10th day of October, 1839, which on the same day was acknowledged and recorded in Dane county. On this map, all this property that is marked on the Doty map as a "public landing" (except the lots in controversy) was laid off into blocks as numbers 260, 261 and 262. This property in controversy is not laid off into blocks or designated at all, except by a blank space, but more than three-fourths of what was called in Doty's plat a "public landing," is laid off into blocks, and it was soon thereafter built upon, and has been occupied as private property ever since.

The defendant does not claim to make title to the property as a public square or landing under that plat, for it is not designated as such thereon. The mere omission to divide portions of the property within the limits of a town into lots or blocks, does not operate ipso facto as a grant or dedication of such parts. But it is unnecessary to continue the further consideration of these plats as legal instruments to pass the title, for the counsel of the defendant, on the hearing, did not contend with much confidence that they were executed in compliance with the requirements of the statute, so as to operate as conveyances. But he maintained that they, and particularly the Doty plat first mentioned, constituted very strong, if not conclusive evidence, of a dedication by the proprietor to the public for the use and purpose designated.

But it seems to me that one of the grounds upon which I have held the plats to be inoperative as grants, applies equally to this claim. I have held that as the person laying it out did not own it, he could not legally plat it, and it would seem to follow as a logical conclusion, that if he did not own it he could not dedicate it, for a party cannot give away what he does not own, any more than he can sell it. Bushnell v. Scott, 21 Wis. 451. In the decision of this case, the intention of Mr. Doty, as manifested by the plats, must be laid out of view, unless it shall be found that after he acquired the title in March, 1841, he, by some act, clearly recognized the plat. If he did, I think it would operate against him and those claiming under him as an estoppel in pais; and if he recognized it in such a way, I think it should be held also to be an affirmance of his original intention of dedication as shown by the map; it should be held to be equivalent to a re-execution and acknowledgment of it and give to it its full force and effect, so far as dedicating to the public the right to use the streets and public grounds.

The defendant, for the purpose of showing such recognition, gave in evidence several deeds executed by him, in which he refers to his individual plat as the plat according to which he sells. But I do not find that any deed of that kind was given after he acquired the title. They do not bind him, therefore, any more than the plat itself, so that the case must be determined upon the question of dedication arising by prescription, user, and a peaceful and willing acquiescence by the owners in such use for such a length of time as to presume a grant. Upon this question there is some apparent conflict in the testimony; but I think when carefully examined, such conflict will be found to exist more in the different meaning of the terms used by the witnesses than in any difference in the facts they meant to relate. The defendant's witnesses state that they always understood it to be a "public landing," and that it had been so used up to the time of the building of the fence, since the town was first settled; while the witnesses on the other side say that it has been so used, but they never understood that the city or any one else claimed the right to use it in that way. The defendant's witnesses probably understood it to be such, because it was called the "Landing," while the plaintiff's witnesses did not understand that it was so claimed simply because it was called such. There is no evidence of the exercise of any authority over it on the part of the public authorities. Governor Farwell, who owned it from February, 1847, up to 1859, and Richardson and Van Slyke, who have since acted as the agents of the complainants, testify that they never heard it claimed as public property until about the time it was enclosed by the fence. I think, therefore, that no formal claim of right had ever been made to it on the part of defendant, or any claim sufficient to require a denial of it by the owners, or any action on their part to prevent its being so used in order to protect their interest. It is clearly proven that it had been traveled over ad libitum by persons going to the lake, and that the fire companies of the city had used it on their parade days. This property had remained open and unimproved, although the complainants had granted permission to Manning, Briggs and Hudson to pile wood upon it, and to use it in that way for their private purposes for some portion of the time during the last ten or twelve years. The old pier or steamboat landing built in 1837, spoken of by some of the witnesses, was not opposite this property, but was, according to the testimony, opposite the old mill on block 262, and the pier built more recently is at the end of East Canal street, and not on any of this property. This is a narrow strip between East and West Canal streets; a part of it was, I should infer, reserved or intended to be by the original proprietors of the town, for a canal to connect Lake Mendota and Monona, to be used by them either as a raceway for mills, or for navigation, as the wants and necessities of the country should demand. Long before the place was much settled, I think the idea of using the lakes for purposes of navigation was abandoned, for in 1839 the space originally left as a landing, or for some other purpose, was platted for private uses, as appears by the Pritchette plat hereinbefore mentioned, and only the piece lying between East and West Canal streets, a part of which was designated as the canal reservation, was left, which may still have been considered as valuable for purposes of a water power.

This change of purpose seems to have been generally acquiesced in by both the public and public authorities, for there is no evidence of any objection ever having been made to it, and all of that part then platted has been occupied for a great many years with mills, factories, and dwelling-houses.

The fact that more than three-fourths of the land originally designated as a "landing," has been devoted to private uses, and used as such a great many years, without objection on the part of the city or any one, negatives the idea that it was understood originally that this property was in fact dedicated or intended to be dedicated to public use. For if Doty dedicated any, he dedicated the whole marked on his map, and we have no right to limit or restrict his intention to dedicate only this piece in controversy. It must be borne in mind that at the time of that platting, the town in that vicinity was covered with timber and small bush, and that Gorham street in front of these lots, which is now one of the principal residence streets in the city, was not cut out, as Governor Farwell in his testimony, says, until 1849, when he says he had it cut out and cleared off. Before that he says the travel was not confined to the streets in that part of the town, but wound around in places most available, without reference to the line of the streets, and as he first improved the property in that vicinity, I think his testimony as to its condition at that time and previously, entitled to the most weight of any given in this case. To hold that there had been any such use as the law contemplates as the foundation of a title by prescription, is attaching altogether too much consequence to the irregular travel and trifling use of it by the public before that time. I do not think such a use for any length of time of land in its natural state would devest the owner of his title to it, or any part of it. James Richardson testifies that in 1849 he was employed by Governor Farwell, who then owned this property, to survey and lay it out into lots and blocks, which he did, numbering the lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, block 272; that since that time it has always been claimed as private property, first by Farwell, and since by the Nelsons, and it has since been designated on the maps of the city generally in use, as "Block 272," and he swears that as the agent of the Nelsons, in 1860 and 1861, he permitted it to be occupied by Mr. Briggs, and after that by Manning and Hudson, for piling wood. No objection was made by the city to such use, nor was any claim made that it was public property. The case shows that ever since it was platted by Richardson for Farwell it has been assessed and taxed as private property, and that these claimants, Farwell and Nelsons, have paid the taxes assessed on it; that in 1866 the city passed an ordinance requiring the owners to build a sidewalk across it on Gorham street, which the owners or claimants built in pursuance thereof. These facts establish beyond controversy to my mind that the city in its corporate capacity has never claimed to occupy this property adversely to the owners up to about the time of the commencement of this suit, when they passed the ordinance declaring it a public square, as heretofore stated. Do these facts authorize the court to find that defendant had acquired a right to it by prescription as it claims? I do not think they are sufficient. Dedication may be presumed and established by user for a period of twenty years. But I think such user, in order to constitute a prescription or dedication by prescription from acquiescence in such user, must have been adverse under some real or pretended claim or right, and it must have been exclusive. In the absence of proof to the contrary, I think the presumption is that the user was permissive and not adverse.

This was so laid down by the supreme court of this state in State v. Joyce, 19 Wis. 91; but in the case of Hanson v. Taylor, 23 Wis. 547, a majority of the court overruled that case and held that the use in the absence of proof to the contrary must be presumed adverse. Chief Justice Dixon dissented, and filed an able and exhaustive opinion, in which he collates and reviews the leading authorities on the question, which I think triumphantly sustain his conclusions.

This case was relied upon by defendant as sustaining the doctrine that its right by prescription might be established by the mere user by the public, without any claim on the part of the city authorities, and without showing it to have been adverse in fact, claiming that it must be presumed to have been adverse. I cannot yield my assent to the rule laid down by the majority of the court in that case, and as it is in conflict with the decisions of the United States supreme court. Irwin v. Dixion, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 10; City of Boston v. Lecraw, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 426. And as it relates to a common law question, and is not under the authority of Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 497, binding upon the federal courts, I shall follow the decisions of the United States supreme court as controlling in this case.

In the case of City of Boston v. Lecraw, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 426, the court, in speaking of a right of way attempted to be established by dedication or prescription, say: "Till he reclaimed his land the public needed no grant or dedication by him, in order to their enjoyment of the right of navigation over it. The owner was not bound to exercise his right within a given time or forfeit it. A man cannot lose the title to his lands by leaving them in their natural state without improvement, or forfeit them by non-user. See Batz v. Ihrie, 1 Rawle, 218." In this case as in that, the land has remained in its natural state, and if the use of it under such circumstances, in the manner detailed by the witnesses, constitutes a prescriptive right to it on behalf of the city, then the complainants will have lost the title to it "by leaving it in its natural state," and it will be "forfeited" by reason of the "non-user," which the court, in the opinion above cited, hold cannot be done.

The payment of taxes on vacant or unseated lands, the supreme court of New Hampshire have decided to be an act of ownership. Little v. Downing, 37 N. H. 355; Farrar v. Fessenden, 39 N. H. 268; Carr v. Dodge, 40 N. H. 403; Hodgdon v. Shannon, 44 N. H. 572.

In Kirk v. Smith, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 288, Chief Justice Marshall, in commenting upon the operation of the statute of limitations, and the character of the possession of real estate, in order to make it available as the foundation of a right acquired under such statutes, says: "One of the rules which has been recognized in the courts of England, and in all others where the rules established in those courts have been adopted, is that possession to give title must be adverse. The word is not indeed to be found in the statutes, but the plainest dictates of common justice require that it should be implied. It would shock that sense of right which must be felt equally by legislators and by judges, if a possession which was permissive and entirely consistent with the title of another should silently bar that title. Several cases have been decided in this court in which the principle seems to have been considered as generally acknowledged, and in the state of Pennsylvania, particularly, it has been expressly recognized. To allow a different construction would be to make the statute of limitations a statute for the encouragement of fraud; a statute to enable one man to steal the title of another, by professing to hold under it. No laws admit of such a construction." This expresses the rule in very clear and energetic language; but I think none too much so, when considered in reference to lands in their natural state.

In Irwin v. Dixion, supra, the property had been taxed as in this case, and the owner had paid the taxes as in this case, and that fact is mentioned by the court as a circumstance repelling the idea of dedication or prescription. The court further says, "In order to have a use or occupation accomplish this (prescription), it must have been adverse to the owner. 3 Kent, Comm. 444. It must have also been an exclusive use by the public. It must also have been acquiesced in by the owner, and not contested or denied." This case does not come up to these requirements or to any one of them, but, on the contrary, the evidence clearly establishes that it has been claimed as private property by the owner since 1849, when it was laid out as private property, that it has been taxed by the city as private property ever since that time, and that for a portion of the time it has been occupied by parties under the owners for private purposes.

These acts are inconsistent with the idea of a dedication, either express or by implication. They show, to my satisfaction, that the use of this property by the public was not adverse in its character within the meaning of the law, and was not acquiesced in by the owners in such a manner as to bring it within either the doctrine of dedication or prescription. I therefore find that the defendant has no right, title or claim to said property or the possession thereof, and that they have no right to remove the fence erected around the same by the complainants, and direct that a decree be entered according to the prayer of the bill, with costs to be taxed. The complainants' solicitor will prepare a decree according to this opinion, and present it to the judge to be settled according to the usual practice.

NELSON v. MOON et al.

[3 McLean, 319.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Dec. Term, 1843.

PRACTICE IN CHANCERY—WAIVER OF PROCESS BY APPEARANCE—GUARDIAN AD LITEM—NOTICE TO INFANT—RECORD AS EVIDENCE—PARTITION IN TWO COUNTIES—DECREE—PATENT FOR LAND COVERED BY PARAMOUNT TITLE.

1. Parties in chancery, or at law, may waive process and appear.

2. Regularly a notice should be served on infants, where the court appoints a guardian ad litem, and for this defect a judgment or decree may be reversed by a superior court.

[Cited in O'Hara v. MacConnell, 93 U. S. 152.]

[Cited in McAnear v. Epperson, 54 Tex. 220.]

3. But this objection cannot be taken collaterally.

4. When a record is used as evidence, presumptions are always favorable.

[Cited in Horner v. Doe ex dem. State Bank of Indiana, 1 Ind. 133; Horner v. Doe, Id. 11.]

5. The court of common pleas had power to take jurisdiction of a bill for partition in two counties.

6. But, to affect purchasers, the decree must be recorded in the county where the land lies.

7. Where a tract of land is lost in whole or part, the patent may be cancelled, under the act of congress.

8. The act under which this is done is remedial in its character, and just.

9. It is exerted only on the application of those who have lost land by a paramount title.

10. A patent for land covered by a paramount title does not vest the fee in the patentee.

At law.

Mr. Thompson, for plaintiff.

Mr. Foot, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The facts in this case being admitted, it is submitted to the court without the intervention of a jury. The defendants pleaded the general issue, and under the rule of court have specified by metes and bounds the various tracts of land which they claim, and of which they have possession. A patent issued to Breckenridge for the land in controversy, and other tracts, the fifteenth of February, eighteen hundred and three, in all amounting to seventeen hundred and sixty-six and two-thirds acres. Robert Campbell was the owner of the warrants on which the locations were made by Breckenridge in his own name, and for which he was entitled to a moiety of the land. In 1833, Campbell filed his bill in the court of common pleas for Brown county, against the heirs of Breckenridge, setting up the contract of location, and praying a conveyance of a moiety of the land, and partition. Answers were filed, and a decree for a title and partition was made. In 1831, the patent to Breckenridge was surrendered, and a new patent issued to the heirs of Breckenridge and Robert Campbell, for thirteen hundred and thirty-five and two-thirds acres—to Robert Campbell, in proportion of five hundred and thirty-eight to the whole tract. Prior to the issuing of the new patent, Campbell had conveyed to the defendants all his interest in the land, except one hundred and seventy acres, which he subsequently conveyed to St. Clair. By these conveyances the plaintiff contends, the defendants have acquired possession of more land than Campbell was entitled to, and this is the ground of controversy. Several questions on the foregoing facts have been raised and discussed.

The plaintiff contends, the proceedings before the court of common pleas of Brown county were void, for the following reasons: 1. There was no service of process on the parties. 2. The answers are not sworn to. 3. The land of which partition was made was situated in Brown and Clinton counties, over which the common pleas of either could exercise no jurisdiction.

As to the service of process. George C. Light was appointed guardian ad litem to two of the defendants, who were minors; and Mr. Collins, of counsel for the defendants, filed all the answers. Defendants in chancery, as well as at law, may waive process and appear; and this having been done in good faith, they are as much in court, and as much bound by its proceeding, as if they had been regularly served with process. But it is said that infants cannot waive process. The two infant defendants appeared by guardians ad litem, and it is objected that this was done without a notice having been served on the infants. If it be admitted, that for this defect in the proceeding the supreme court would have reversed the decree, yet it does not follow that the decree, when collaterally used, can be treated as a nullity. There was an appearance by a guardian specially appointed by the court to defend the suit, and the presumption will be in favor of the proceeding and not against it, when used as evidence. A judgment or a decree may be treated as a nullity, if it appear from the record that there was neither a service of process nor a waiver of it. But in the present case there was an appearance according to the forms of law, and that gave jurisdiction to the court. The objection, at most, is to an irregularity, which might be ground of reversal, but does not show a want of jurisdiction in the court. And this must be made clearly to appear, before the decree can be treated as a nullity.

The answers were not sworn to, but they were treated as sworn answers by the complainant in that suit, and an objection cannot now be made on that ground. Had an exception been filed to the answers for this cause, they would have been set aside; but no exception being taken, it was waived, and the decree can in no sense be affected by this omission. No doubt the pleadings were made up by consent.

A part of the land was situated in Brown county, where the bill was filed; and this gave jurisdiction over the land in Clinton county. If the decree of partition were not recorded in Clinton, within the time limited by the statute, the rights of a purchaser were not affected by it. But, as between the parties to the decree, it was valid under the statute. Was the first patent cancelled? This is the great question in the case.

The act of the 13th of May, 1800 [2 Stat. 80], provides: "That in every case of interfering claims, under military warrants, to lands within the Virginia military tract, when either party to such claims shall lose or be evicted from the land, every such party shall have a right, and hereby is authorised, to withdraw his, her or their warrant, respectively, to the amount of such loss or eviction, and to enter, survey and patent the same, on any vacant land within the bounds aforesaid, and in the same manner as other warrants may be entered, surveyed and patented." The surveyor of the district certified, that four hundred and thirty-one acres of the land patented to Breckenridge were lost by a prior entry. That of the land decreed to Campbell, one hundred and eighty-one acres were lost. This certificate bore date the 1st of December, 1830. The original patent was returned to the land office, on which the following indorsement was made: "Cancelled, 431 acres of land lost by a prior claim, as patented on the new survey, No. 3045, will be issued for 1335⅔ acres. The parties, R. Campbell, and the heirs of Breckenridge, claim scrip for the 431 acres lost by prior survey. December, 1831." And lines of the pen were drawn across the patent. The commissioner of the general land office states, "that where a tract of land, which had been patented, was lost in whole or in part, it was the practice of the land office to cancel the patent," as was done in this case. It is objected, that the law does not authorise the cancellation of the patent. It does not in terms, but such is the practice of the department, and it would seem to be a reasonable and proper practice, and one which, if not required by the words of the act, is fully justified by its substance and spirit. This, it is contended, would vest in the treasury department a very dangerous power. How is the power a dangerous one? It is treated as a power exercised against the rights of the original patentee. But such is not the character of the act. It is remedial, and only operates in cases where the person in interest makes special application for relief. Having lost his claim by a paramount title, in whole or in part, he obtains other lands from the government. The government might have withheld this relief. For a person who holds a Virginia land warrant, is bound to select vacant land, and if, through negligence, or want of knowledge, he locates his warrant on lands previously appropriated it is his own fault, and the government, strictly, is not bound to relieve him. But he is relieved by the above act, and it is just, and the act is fraught with no danger to the citizen. But it is said by the patent the fee passes out of the government to the patentee, and that this cannot be divested except by judicial decision. But the fact assumed here as to the fee is not true, and never can be true in an equitable sense. It is in fact only in cases where the patent does not convey the title, as the face of it purports to do, that relief under the act is desired. For it is only where the title, in whole or in part, is inoperative, that relief can be asked. And is it not strange that this should be considered a dangerous power? As the evidence on which the government acts under this law, and the mode by which the power is exercised, seems to be within the executive power to determine, it is not competent for the judiciary to prescribe the forms in which any executive power shall be exercised. It may determine whether such a power has been legally exercised. The action of the executive in the case must be considered prima facie, if not conclusive. If there has been fraud to the injury of third parties, it may be shown, and the proceeding may be held void. But there is no pretence of fraud. The cancellation of the patent must be held to have been for the benefit, as it was at the instance, of the parties interested.

From this view of the case, the lessor of the plaintiff, under the patent, has a legal right of recovery. Whether the defendant may not set up an equitable right under the partition, is not now before us.

NELSON v. NATIONAL STEAMSHIP CO.

[7 Ben. 340.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. May, 1874.

BILL OF LADING—DAMAGE TO CARGO—BREAKAGE—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

1. Casks of plumbago were brought in different ships of a line, under bills of lading which exempted the ship from damages resulting from leakage, or breakage, or from stowage, however such damage might be caused. On some of the bills of lading were memoranda, that the casks were loose when shipped. The consignees brought suit against the owner of the vessels to recover for plumbago lost out of the casks, as they claimed by reason of injury to the casks from careless handling: Held, that the exemption in the bills of lading was not sufficient to exempt the owners from loss arising from their negligence.

[Cited in The Montana, 17 Fed. 379.]

2. In the cases where the memoranda that the casks were loose were on the bills of lad-ing, the presumption would be that any loss which occurred arose from such loose condition of the casks.

[This was a libel by Horatio Nelson against the National Steamship Company to recover damages for injury to goods shipped.]

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for libellants.
John Chetwood, for respondents.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought to recover damages of the National Steamship Company, for loss and injury to certain shipments of plumbago. It is founded upon seven different bills of lading, issued on seven different voyages, made by five different steamers all owned by the defendants.

Owing to the lapse of time and the number of shipments, there is much confusion in the evidence, and it is with difficulty that the facts appertaining to each shipment can be ascertained. It is clear, however, that in every one of the shipments casks of plumbago came out in bad order, and that there was not only a loss of part of the contents, but an injury to the remainder from the admixture of dirt, which occurred in shoveling up from the wharf plumbago which had escaped from the casks.

One of the grounds of defense is that the loss was caused by the fact that the casks were rotten and unable to retain their contents, and parts of staves are produced in court which are clearly unsound. These staves were taken from two casks in one of the shipments. With this exception the evidence as to a bad condition of the casks is general in its character, and insufficient to account for the bad order in which the merchandise arrived. On the other hand, there is evidence equally positive that the casks were good, and the claim is that the loss arose not from insufficiency of the casks but from the breaking of the staves caused by bad stowage.

None of the bills of lading contain any reference to a rotten or weak condition of the casks. The burden of showing that the loss arose from the rotten condition of the staves is therefore upon the defendants, and the general evidence produced to that effect does not enable me to charge this loss to a bad condition of the casks, except in the one instance where it is positively proved that two casks in the shipment were rotten. The main ground of defense is that the bills of lading relieve the defendants from liability for loss or damage arising from leakage or breakage, or resulting from stowage, however such damage may be caused. This exception in the bills of lading is not sufficient to exempt the defendants from loss arising from their negligence. The evidence discloses negligence in the stowage of the shipment by the Denmark, of May 2d (No. 1). A neglect of proper care of this merchandise while on the deck before delivery also appears. Damage from neglect in the stowage of the shipment by the Helvetia, of June 2d (No. 2), is also shown, as well as careless handling of the merchandise in landing, whereby some of the casks were broken and contents lost, together with injury to portions of it by admixture of dirt, &c., &c., while on the ship or on the wharf. The loss on these two shipments is therefore chargeable to the defendants.

The bill of lading, shipment by the Erin (No. 3), contains a memorandum that the casks were loose when shipped, and the presumption that such loss as appears from these casks, of such an article as plumbago, arose from the loose condition of the casks is sufficient to overcome any evidence in the case tending to show the loss to have resulted from bad stowage.

As to shipment by the Denmark (No. 4), it is not claimed that there was bad stowage, and no evidence of other neglect. As to shipment by the Queen (No. 5), the bill of lading contains a memorandum that the casks were loose when shipped, and there can be no recovery for the reasons above stated in respect to No. 3. As to shipment by the Queen (No. 6), it is not claimed that there was any bad stowage, and no evidence of other neglect. In shipment No. 7 were the two casks proved to be rotten, and the deficiency claimed should, upon the evidence, be charged to the bad condition of the casks.

My conclusion, therefore, is that the libellants are limited in their recovery to the loss they have sustained upon the two shipments first above mentioned (No. 1 and No. 2). Any loss of quantity or of value by the admixture of foreign matter upon these two shipments they are entitled to a decree for. A reference will be had to ascertain the amount of the damage in accordance with this opinion.

Case No. 10,113.

NELSON v. PHOENIX CHEMICAL WORKS.

[7 Ben. 37.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. Oct., 1873.

WHARFINGER—DAMAGE TO VESSEL BY GROUNDING AT A WHARF.

1. It is the duty of a shipmaster, before placing his vessel in a berth, to ascertain whether the depth of water in the dock is sufficient for the draught of his vessel.

[Cited in Crossan v. Wood, 44 Fed. 95.]

2. A wharfinger is not bound to maintain a depth of water in the berth at his wharf, sufficient for all vessels at all tides.

[Cited in The Francesca T., Case No. 5,030.]

3. It is the duty of a wharfinger to give information as to inequalities in the surface of the bottom, when that is material to the safety of a vessel about to moor at his wharf.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and B. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

4. A direction by a wharfinger, who is consignee of cargo on board of a vessel, to the master of the vessel, to put his vessel in a certain berth, is not equivalent to a notification that the water is deep enough at all times to float the vessel.

This was a libel by [Christopher Nelson] the owner of the Gen. Lyon, to recover damages for an injury received by her, by grounding while lying in a berth at a dock owned by the respondents. The vessel had brought a cargo consigned to the respondents, who directed the berth at which they wished her to discharge.

Wilcox & Hobbs, for libellant.
G. W. Hoxie, for respondents.

BENEDICT, District Judge. No recovery can be had in this action, except upon proof of negligence on the part of the wharfinger, resulting in damage to the libellant's vessel, while moored at the defendants' wharf. The evidence shows no negligence in the construction of the wharf. As to the condition of the bottom, in the berth to be occupied by vessels when fast to the pier, the evidence is not sufficient to warrant the conclusion that it was not made as level as could be reasonably demanded, and as any obligation on the part of the wharfinger required.

Some variation in the depth of water in the berth is proved, but there is no evidence of the presence of any stones, or any obstructions on the bottom, or that the bottom was such that a sound boat would be liable to be injured by resting upon it at low tide. The water in the berth was not deep enough at low tide to float the libellant's vessel, but this fact is not sufficient to render the wharfinger liable for injury sustained by the vessel when grounded at low tide.

The proposition asserted in behalf of the libellant, that, in the absence of notice to the contrary, every vessel, even of the size of the Great Eastern, has the right to assume that the water in the dock at a public wharf is of sufficient depth to float her at all tides, cannot be sustained. A wharfinger is not bound to maintain a depth of water in the berth at his wharf sufficient for all vessels at all tides.

The proposition, that it is the duty of a wharfinger to give information as to inequalities in the surface of the bottom, when that is material to the safety of a vessel about to moor at his wharf,—Sawyer v. Oakman [Case No. 12,402],—is entirely consistent with the other proposition, that it is the duty of the shipmaster, before placing his vessel in the berth, to ascertain whether the depth of water in the dock is sufficient for the draught of his vessel.

The present is a case of no inequality in the surface of the bottom, but where the injuries to the boat arose simply because of insufficient water in the berth to float the vessel at low tide. But it is insisted that inasmuch as the evidence shows that the wharfinger, who was the consignee of the cargo on board this vessel, directed the master to place his vessel in the berth she took, without informing him that the dock was not deep enough to float the vessel at low tide, this was equivalent to an express notification that the water was deep enough at all times to float the libellant's vessel. To this I cannot agree. Some vessels can safely be permitted to take the ground at a wharf at low tide, and it is a common thing for some vessels to do this; but other vessels are not sufficiently strong to permit such a course; and whether the libellant's vessel could safely do it or not could be known only to the master. The master knew the condition of his vessel and her draught. He had also full means of ascertaining the depth of water in the berth, and was bound to ascertain it. He was bound to know whether she would be compelled, and if so able safely, to take the ground at low water.

The damage he subsequently sustained arose either from a failure to inform himself as to the depth of water, or a failure of judgment as to the strength of his vessel. I either case the fault is his, and not that of the wharfinger. The libel must be dismissed, with costs.

Circuit Court, D. Arkansas. July, 1846.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY — DISSOLUTION OF INJUNCTION ON COMING IN OF ANSWER — DENIAL ON INFORMATION AND BELIEF — DISCRETION OF COURT.

1. Where there is equity on the face of a bill, an injunction will not be dissolved on the coming in of the answer, unless there is a positive denial of all the material facts from which that equity arises, based on the personal knowledge of the defendant.

2. A denial on information and belief is not sufficient for that purpose.

[Cited in Farmer v. Calvert Lithographing Co., Case No. 4,651.]

3. It is in the sound discretion of the court to continue an injunction even after answer, where the nature and circumstances of a case require it, and where justice will be attained by that course.

Bill in equity.

S. H. Hempstead, for complainant.
Daniel Ringo and F. W. Trapnall, for defendant.

JOHNSON, District Judge. This is a motion to dissolve an injunction; and on looking into the case, it appears that some of the specific material and positive allegations in the bill upon which the injunction may well be sustained, are only denied on information and belief, and not on the personal knowledge of the defendant. Where there is equity on the face of the bill, the rule is well settled that an injunction will not be dissolved on the coming in of the answer, unless there is a positive denial of all the material facts which form that equity, and such denial, too, must be based on the personal knowledge of the defendant; and a denial on information and belief is not sufficient. Roberts v. Anderson, 2 Johns. Ch. 202; Apthorpe v. Comstock, Hopk. Ch. 143; Ward v. Van Bokkelen, 1 Paige, 100. And the plain reason of this rule is, that a denial on information cannot be equal in weight with a statement made from personal knowledge; for a defendant may have derived his information from one no better informed than himself on the subject. Id. 160; Id. 426. Although it is doubtless a general rule that an injunction obtained on filing the bill will be dissolved on the coming in of the answer denying all the equity of the bill (2 Madd. Ch. 238; 8 Ves. 35; 9 Ves. 355; 19 Ves. 144; 1 Johns. Ch. 211; Id. 444), yet it is equally well established as an exception to it, that it is in the sound discretion of the court to continue an injunction where the nature and circumstances of a case require it, and where justice will be attained by that course (2 Johns. Ch. 202; 3 P. Wms. 255; 2 Brown, Ch. 88; 3 Brown, Ch. 463; 16 Ves. 49; 19 Ves. 149; 2 Madd. Ch. 366; 1 Newl. Ch. Prac. 227). It does not follow, then, as a necessary consequence, that an injunction will be dissolved on the coming in of the answer; and at all events, to produce that result, the answer must have the requisites above alluded to, and which this, in my opinion, does not possess. Poor v. Carlton [Case No. 11,272]. Motion denied.

April, 1853.—This cause came on for final hearing before DANIEL, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, holding the circuit court. RINGO, District Judge, having been of counsel, did not sit.

S. H. Hempstead, for complainant.

In January or February, 1837, Charles T. Nelson, the complainant, purchased from Theodoric A. Bennett the north-west quarter section three, the south-west quarter of the north-east quarter of section three, in township fourteen, south of range twenty-five west; also the south-west quarter of section thirty-four in township thirteen, south of range twenty-five west, containing altogether 361 $^{57}/_{100}$ acres, at $5 per acre. There was no written contract between the parties, but Bennett was to make Nelson a title, which of course means one in fee-simple; and Nelson gave his obligation for the purchase-money. Nelson took possession of the lands and made valuable and lasting improvements, worth, according to the proof, $1,200 or $1,500, and upon a rescission of the contract, is willing to lose, so the parties can be placed in statu quo without injury to any one, except that Nelson must be loser. Bennett, the vendor, died in August, 1837, without having made title, the purchase-money remaining unpaid, and Henry M. Robinson administered on the estate. Bennett left a widow, who afterwards married Joel J. Robinson, and she is still alive. Bennett left two children, namely, Lucy Ann, who is still alive, and a child born after his death, which child died in minority; and according to our law, the mother inherited from the child. Lucy Ann, the living child, never had a guardian. Henry M. Robinson, the administrator of Bennett, became insolvent and removed from the state without closing the administrationship, and it is not yet closed. The obligation that was given by Nelson for the purchase-money appears to have been split up into small sums, within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, and judgments to have been confessed on these sums. And these judgments were afterwards consolidated by Winslow Robinson, and a note given to him by Nelson and others, on which judgment was obtained, and the collection of it enjoined by this court, on the principal ground that no title could be obtained from Bennett or his representatives. The answer of Winslow Robinson sets up, by way of avoidance, that Nelson, the complainant, was to take title through Norlove Nelson, and was not to obtain any from Bennett at all; that this was the contract between the parties. This is new matter, and it will not be controverted that the defendant must prove it. This he has not done, according to our understanding of the case; and the proof is, that he was to obtain title from Bennett and not that Bennett was to substitute some other person in his place.

The rule of law we take to be clear, that where a person contracts with another for real estate, and the understanding is, that A., the vendor, is make a title, the vendee cannot be required to take a title from B., because that would be to make a new contract. Yeates v. Pryor, 6 Eng. [Ark.] 76. In the case of Taylor v. Porter, 1 Dana, 422, it was said by the court that the vendee had a right to insist on the title he contracted for, and that the vendor could not substitute another person in his place as the maker of the title. And the reason is plain; if he could do that, he might offer one less solvent and able to remunerate the vendor, should the title fail. 6 Eng. [Ark.] 76. It is not an answer to say that the title offered by B. is unexceptionable, and as good or better than a title which A. could make. My contract is to take title from A., and not from B.; and I have a right to stand on my contract. The patents that are produced here we repudiate; we say there was no contract with Norlove Nelson, and we were not to take title through him, because, putting every thing else aside, it is proven that he was a minor, and could not make a binding contract, except for necessaries. He died in minority. The transfers made by him to Charles T. Nelson, on which these patents purport to have issued, were void. The transfers could be of no possible benefit to him; in fact they were prejudicial to him, and hence void, not voidable merely, but absolutely void. [Tucker v. Moreland] 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 70. We do not deny that an infant may be a trustee; but here no trust has been shown, nor any thing equivalent to it. These transfers must be treated as void. There is no proof that the patents ever came to the possession of Charles T. Nelson, or that he ever saw them. This controversy cannot be settled in this court, and the appropriate remedy is to enjoin this judgment perpetually, and let the parties resort to the state courts, where Mrs. Robinson, formerly the wife of Bennett, and Lucy Ann, her child, and the heirs of Norlove Nelson can be made parties, and justice done between them. These persons, on account of citizenship, cannot litigate their rights in this court, for there would be no jurisdiction. There are equitable rights and interests behind these patents vested in others; and Charles T. Nelson could only get an apparent title, with a vast ocean of litigation beyond it. A specific performance against a purchaser should not, it is said, be enforced, unless the title to the estate is free from suspicion. 2 Sugd. Vend. 110.

The inclination of the court is to favor the vendee, and it will always see that he has a good title. Where there is doubt, where there is suspicion, where the court sees that there are difficulties or equities beyond the legal title, a specific performance will not be decreed. In substance, this involves the specific performance of a contract. But the judgment ought to be perpetually enjoined, on the ground that Winslow Robinson has no such interest in this debt as will authorize him to control or collect it. The money belongs to the estate of Theodoric A. Bennett, and this suit would be no protection to Nelson against a claim brought by the heirs of Bennett for it. If he pays it, it is at his peril, and he is liable to pay it again to that estate. According to the showing made by Winslow Robinson, in his answer, this money, or a part of it, will be misapplied; as a part of it is to discharge a private debt of Henry M. Robinson, the administrator of Bennett, to Hendley and Robinson. Surely a court of equity will not stand by and allow such a proceeding, nor remove the restraint by which a party will be enabled to do it. It is no answer to say that we have no concern in this, or in the application of the fund. We have the deepest concern; because, if we ought to pay the purchase-money to any one, it is to the estate of Bennett, and not to Winslow Robinson, who is not connected with that estate in any way, and can make us no title.

F. W. Trapnall, for defendant.

THE COURT, on the whole case, considered that the injunction should be dissolved, the defendant remitted to his remedy at law, and the bill dismissed at the costs of the complainant, but gave no written opinion. Decreed accordingly.

COLLISION—STEAM AND TOW.

Where it appeared that the master of a propeller in attempting to pass on the larboard side of a tow-boat, with barges attached, after the tow had taken a sheer to the larboard on the conjecture that the tow would break her sheer in time to allow of sufficient room in the channel for the propeller to pass on that side, and a collision ensued, by which the outside barge on the larboard side was sunk: Held, that before the master of the propeller could rightfully or prudently act upon such conjecture, if he desired to persist in the course he had adopted in passing the tow, he should have stopped his vessel until he had ascertained the result of the sheer.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.

[These were separate libels by Edward D. Nelson and others, Henry Denny and Enoch Chamberlain, against the propeller Thomas Sparks, to recover damages sustained by the Eagle in a collision between the two vessels. From a decree of the district court in favor of libellants (case unreported), respondent appeals.]

Stoughton & Leveridge, for appellant.
Van Santvoord & Nelson, for libellants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The libels were filed in these cases by the owners of the barge Eagle and the owners of her cargo, against the Thomas Sparks, to recover damages for a collision occurring between the two vessels in the Raritan river, New Jersey, on the 22d of August, 1854. The Eagle was in tow of the New Boston, which was descending the river against the tide, with four barges or boats on each side of her, two abreast, and each having another towed astern. The Eagle was the forward outside barge on the larboard side, and was fastened by a hawser at her stem and stern to the barge next inside of her. The Thomas Sparks was descending the river astern of the New Boston and her tow, and in attempting to pass her on the larboard side, struck the Eagle and sunk her. The channel was some two hundred and fifty feet wide at the place of collision, and both vessels were approaching a very abrupt turn in the river towards the north; that is, towards the left in descending. There were mud-flats on each side of the channel. As the New Boston was approaching this turn, being in about the middle of the channel, she suddenly took a lurch or sheer toward the left or larboard side, without having changed her helm, but from the effect of the head-tide acting upon the tow, which brought her obliquely across the channel, and brought the Eagle, she being the outside barge, and heavily laden, somewhat upon the flats, the draft upon which had the effect to produce a strain on her hawser at the bow, and broke the bolt of the cleet with which it was fastened to the inside boat; and from the advance of the tug swung the head of the Eagle thus broken loose, round at right angles to the line of the other boats, and thus closed up the passage on the larboard side; and in this position she was struck by the Thomas Sparks, while in the act of attempting to pass on that side of the channel. No fault is attributable to the New Boston, or to any of the barges or boats in her tow. And the only question in the case is whether the collision occurred without any fault on the part of the Thomas Sparks. The defence set up by the master is, that if the Eagle had not broken loose from her connection with the tow, and swung across the channel, the collision would not have occurred, as there was room enough for his vessel to pass clear of the tow; and that, when the accident happened to the Eagle, his vessel was so near that no manoeuvre or movement could prevent the blow.

The master was a witness for the respondent. He states that his vessel was about a quarter of a mile astern of the tow, when he made up his mind to pass it on the larboard. As he neared it, the tow sheered across the river toward the larboard side, rather out of the channel. "I calculated," he observes, "it would break the sheer, and still give us room to go on the larboard side. The tow came quartering to the larboard. We had not commenced turning the bend in the river. As we neared the tow, I saw it kept its sheer, and I then slowed my boat, and finally stopped her, and the other boat continued under way. As we stopped our boat, I let her go along until our bow lapped on to the stern of the tow, and I then discovered that the barge was swung out, and I rang to go back, and we backed her." At another place in his testimony the master states that the reason he did not go to the starboard was because he thought the tow would break her sheer, and he thought she would break it because he thought it would keep the channel. No witness on the part of the respondent varies this account of the collision as given by the master.

We are satisfied, upon a very careful examination of the evidence, and especially of that of the master, that if, when he discovered the sheer of the New Boston, he had ported his helm his vessel could have passed the tow on the starboard side without any difficulty; and that it was his persistence in his first determination to pass to the larboard, after the sheer, that occasioned the disaster. There was abundance of room in the channel to have passed to the starboard. But assuming that the Thomas Sparks was too near to have made this manoeuvre at the time of the sheer, then it was the duty of the master to have immediately stopped and backed his boat. Instead of doing so, he admits, as he stopped, he let her go along until his bow lapped on the stern of the tow, before he rung the bell to back her. The excuse given for persisting in passing to the larboard, after the sheer of the New Boston, is that he thought she would break it. But before he could rightfully or prudently act upon this conjecture, if he desired to persist in the course he had adopted in passing the tow, he should have stopped his vessel until he had ascertained the result of the sheer.

Without pursuing the examination of the case further, we are satisfied the decrees of the court below was right, and should be affirmed.

C. J. Ingersoll, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. As there is no claim interposed for the coffee, the sentence of the district court, must of course be affirmed. As to the copper, molasses and sugar, claimed by Joseph E. Tatem, his ownership in the same, is made out by all the ordinary documentary proof, and there is not the slightest evidence in the cause, to induce a suspicion that these articles were the growth or manufacture of Great Britain or of any of her colonies or her possessions. The decree, therefore, as to these articles, must be reversed. The only question, which was seriously contested at the bar, related to the ninety-seven hogsheads of rum, claimed by Abbott, for himself and Nelson. For the United States it was insisted, that this article was manufactured in one of the British West India islands, and on the other it is asserted to be of Spanish origin. To establish the fact, on the one side, and on the other, a number of witnesses have been examined; all or most of whom, professed themselves to be well acquainted with the flavour and strength of rum made in the British islands. The number of witnesses was nearly equally divided, one-half pronouncing the rum to be of British origin, the other half declaring a different opinion; and the latter have relied for their support, not only upon the flavour, but upon the strength of the spirits, and upon the quality and make of the casks containing the same. In aid of the testimony given in favour of the claim, we have the depositions of sundry witnesses, taken at the Havanna, under letters rogatory awarded by this court.[2] These witnesses swear most positively; that the ninety-seven hogsheads of rum, shipped on board the Perseverance, were manufactured at the Havanna, by Solere, one of the witnesses, and sold to Medina, another of the witnesses; and by him sold to Nelson and delivered on board the Perseverance. To these depositions, objections have been made, the chief of which is, that all the interrogatories were not answered. To this it has been answered, that they are all substantially though not formally answered. If this be the case, this court have decided in former cases, that it is sufficient, even where the depositions were taken under commissions, and consequently by persons appointed by and acting under the authority of this court. The reason for dispensing with a strict performance of the duty imposed upon those who take the depositions applies, a fortiori, in a case where a foreign government refuses to suffer a commission to be executed within its jurisdiction, and deputes persons, appointed by itself, to take the depositions. This being the policy of the Spanish government, this court, instead of sending a commission in the present case, was induced to send letters rogatory, which have been executed by persons appointed by the governor of Cuba. In such a case, where the business is taken out of the hands of persons appointed by the court, the ends of justice seem to require a departure, in some degree, from the ordinary rules of evidence. To what extent this departure should go, has never yet been decided in this court, and it is not necessary at present to lay down the limitation; because I am satisfied, that if the cause rested solely upon the testimony of the witnesses examined to prove the origin of the rum; the weight of evidence, to which there can be no exception, is in favour of the point, contended for by the claimant, that it was not manufactured in a British island. But if the evidence to establish this point were much stronger than it is, the case is crowded with circumstances of suspicion, too violent to be overcome. In the first place, there was not on board of this vessel at the time of seizure, any of the ordinary muniments of property, either in Abbott, in Nelson, or any other person. There was no invoice, bill of lading, bill of [2] A commission, in the usual form, had been issued out of the district court to Havanna, but the authorities there prevented its execution. Any attempt to take testimony under it, was deemed an interference with the rights of the judicial tribunals there. Letters rogatory, according to the form and practice of the civil law, were issued, and the testimony was obtained. The following is a copy of the letters rogatory: United States. District of Pennsylvania. Sct. The President of the United States, to Any Judge or Tribunal, Having Jurisdiction of Civil Causes at Havanna, Greeting: Whereas a certain suit is pending before us in which John D. Nelson, Henry Abbott and Joseph E. Tatem, are the claimants of the schooner Perseverance and cargo, and the United States of America are the defendants; and it has been suggested to us, that there are witnesses, residing within your jurisdiction, without whose testimony, justice cannot completely be done between the said parties. We therefore request you, that in furtherance of justice, you will, by the proper and usual process of your court, cause such witness or witnesses, as shall be named or pointed out to you by the said parties, or either of them, to appear before you, or some competent person, by you for that purpose to be appointed and authorised, at a precise time and place by you to be fixed, and there to answer on their oaths and affirmations, to the several interrogatories hereunto annexed; and that you will cause their depositions to be committed to writing, and returned to us under cover, duly closed and sealed up together with these presents. And we shall be ready and willing to do the same for you in a similar case when required. Witness, &c.

parcels, accounts, or paper of any kind; nor has any attempt been made to account for the absence of these documents. It was contended, that the title of Nelson to the rum, was proved by the evidence of Solere and Medina; and that his possession is sufficient to establish his title. Still, however, this does not account for the want of the ordinary documentary proof of property; and consequently does not relieve the case, from the suspicion which this circumstance fixes upon it. If the transaction was fair and legal; if the rum was really manufactured in a Spanish island; what reason can be assigned, for the absence of those papers, which never fail to accompany a legal importation? Besides, the rum is claimed by Abbott, for himself and Nelson, although Nelson himself was in court, and filed a claim for the vessel. Independent of the objection to the claim itself, for this reason, the manner in which it is made, furnishes an additional ground of suspicion against the fairness of the transaction. As to Abbott, he has not produced the slightest evidence of ownership; and Nelson has no other evidence, than that which has been before noticed. Second. Another strong circumstance of suspicion, is the false destination of the vessel, and the consignment of the cargo. The manifest, which was delivered by the master to the custom house officer, states that the destination was to Cadiz, and that the vessel put into this port in distress, for the purpose of repairs. It also states, that the rum was consigned to Abbott of Cadiz. But Abbott resided in Philadelphia; and if, as is now contended, upon the total want of evidence, to prove property in Abbott, Nelson is the owner, what reason can be assigned, for making the consignment to any other than himself? Third. From the time this vessel entered the Delaware Bay, the entries in the log book ceased; and to account for this extraordinary omission, a very extraordinary and absurd reason, is assigned by the mate, viz. that the weather was so cold, as to prevent him from writing. It would have been less a ground of suspicion, if no reason had been assigned, than to offer one, so obviously untrue and ridiculous. Upon the whole, I am clearly of opinion, that the rum and the vessel are liable to forfeiture.

The decree of the district court was affirmed, as to the vessel, rum and coffee; and reversed as to the rest of the cargo.

After the decision was made, in the preceding case, the district attorney moved the court, to enter up judgment on the bond, which had been given by the claimant of the rum, and his security, upon the order of the district court, to deliver the same to the claimants. He referred to 2 [Bior. & D.] 65 [1 Stat. 85]; 3 [Bior. & D.] 221 [1 Stat. 695]; Acts 1789 and 1799,—which he contended, could only apply to the district court, so far as it required the lapse of twenty days, before the judgment is to be rendered. The Alligator [Case No. 248]; McLellan v. U. S. [Id. 8,895]; H. Black. 164.

On the other side, it was contended; that The Alligator [supra], was against the motion; and that, upon the construction of the 89th section of the act of 1799, this court cannot give judgment on the bond, except in open court, and after twenty days, from the day when the sentence of condemnation passed. Besides, it was contended, that the sureties have a real defence to make in this case; the substance of which is, that after the rum was delivered to the claimant, he gave his sureties a lien on it, to induce them to join him on the bond. That the rum was, afterwards taken in execution by the marshal, to satisfy a judgment obtained by the United States, for duties due to them, the amount whereof was satisfied by the sureties; which they claim, as a set off against their bond, the marshal having intimated an opinion, that such a set off would be allowed.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. This defence, could, by no means, avail the sureties, even if the marshal had made the most express promise, that the money paid by them, should be credited against their bond; because that officer has no power to bind the United States, by any promise which he may make. If the fact be, that Nelson pledged the rum to his sureties, to secure them against their undertaking for him, and, if in consequence thereof, they might have contested the right of the United States to levy an execution on it; still, as they voluntarily permitted the execution to be levied on it, and paid the money, they cannot now complain, and off set the money so paid. As to the main question, the 89th section of the act. of 1799, seems to consider the bond, which is directed to be given by the claimant, for the appraised value of the property, in nature of a stipulation, according to the ordinary course of the admiralty; or else, it would hardly have directed judgment to be entered on it, without further delay, after the expiration of the twenty days. But the delay was clearly intended to be confined to the district court, where without further delay, the judgment might be rendered. It is totally inapplicable to the circuit court; because, the whole design of the provision would be defeated, if that court were bound to wait twenty days, after the sentence of condemnation, before judgment could be entered on the bond. I entirely concur in the decision of the court, in the case of The Alligator [Case No. 248]; and shall in conformity with it, direct judgment to be entered on the bond given in this case.

SHIPPING—DAMAGE TO CARGO BY WEATHER.

[A shipper of lard in the summer months takes the risk of damage occasioned by the excessively hot weather, unless some neglect or fault can be charged upon the vessel, contributing to the loss.]

[Appeals from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.

[These were cross actions by William Nelson, Edmund S. Dennis, Sherbourne Sears, Francis Burritt, and Aaron Cohen against John O. Woodruff and Robert M. Henning, survivors of James E. Woodruff, and John O. Woodruff and Robert M. Henning against William Nelson, Edmund S. Dennis, Sherbourne Sears, Francis Burritt, and Aaron Cohen. The district court entered a decree in favor of Nelson and others in the first action, and dismissed the libel in the cross action (case unreported), and an appeal was then taken to this court.]

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The libel was filed in the first case by the libelant to recover freight upon a shipment of 1,099 barrels and 61 tcs. of lard, in the ship Maid of Orleans, from New Orleans to this port, in July and August, 1854. It was filed in the second case by the consignee against the respondent, to recover damages for a loss of part of the lard in the course of the shipment. Both cases depend upon the same evidence, and were heard together in the court below, and in this court. It is not denied but that a very heavy loss of lard occurred on board of the vessel during the voyage, which was discovered upon discharging the cargo at this port—a loss of about 60,000 pounds, worth some $6,000. The bills of lading are in the usual form—shipped in good order, &c., damages of the sea, &c., except to each is added at the foot, "Contents unknown." The weather was excessively hot in New Orleans in the month of July, 1854, when the lard was put on board and delivered by the shipper on the levee, which was done morning and evening to avoid the heat of the day. The delivery, however, was continued in the morning until 10 o'clock, and renewed between 3 and 4 p. m. And according to the weight of the testimony the lard was taken on board the vessel with all reasonable dispatch. When taken on board it was in a liquid state, and a few barrels leaked so badly at the levee that the hoops had to be tightened, and some of the barrels were found to be partially empty. The great deficiency that occurred in the course of the shipment, is attributable to the leakage of the casks which the libelant insists is chargeable alone to the condition and character of the article and to the excessive heat, whether at the time of the shipment or during the voyage. The proofs in the case taken at New Orleans and at this port, are very full and satisfactory that the lard was properly and skilfully stored, both in respect to the place in the hold of the vessel and the manner of the storage. And it is further shown that all due and proper care was taken in the course of the shipment, and I perceive nothing in the evidence, when critically examined and weighed, in the appearance or condition of the packages when discharged at this port, going to impair the proof of the libelant on this head. The barrels and tierces appear to have been well made and with proper material, and to have withstood any substantial injury, with the exception, that the seams were opened, and hence the leakage. But this is accounted for by nearly all the witnesses experienced in the shipment of the article, as resulting from the effect of the hot weather in connection with the tendency of the melted lard to shrink the staves and loosen the hoops. The proof is that the months of July and August were hot beyond those of the preceding years; and that on opening the hatches of the vessel at this port the heat in the hold was so excessive that no person could remain in it. It is well settled that the shipper takes a risk attendant upon the shipment of cargo of this character from the heat of the weather, unless some neglect or fault can be charged upon the vessel contributing to the loss [Clark v. Barnwell] 12 How. [53 U. S.] 272. And I must say, after a very careful examination of the evidence, that in my judgment, no such negligence or fault has been established. The decree of the court below must be affirmed.

[Appeals were then taken to the supreme court, where the decisions of both district and circuit courts were affirmed. 1 Black (66 U. S.) 156.]

SHIPPING—DAMAGE TO CARGO—NEGLIGENCE OF VESSEL—BURDEN OF PROOF—STOWAGE BETWEEN DECKS.

1. Where oil, in casks, was transported, on freight, from Boston to New York, by a steam propeller, and some of the oil was lost on the voyage, and, in a suit in rem, by the owner of the oil against the vessel, to recover for the loss, it appeared that the vessel encountered, on the voyage, an unusually violent storm, which fully accounted for the damage, within an exception in the bill of lading: Held, that the onus was on the shipper, to establish carelessness or negligence on the part of the vessel, leading to the loss.

[Cited in The Pharos, 9 Fed. 914.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

2. The main deck of a steam propeller, bulwarked entirely around and covered by the upper deck, and constructed specially for the purpose of carrying cargo, so that the cargo placed there is as completely protected from the weather and from storms as if it were in the hold, is a proper place in which to stow such cargo.

[Distinguished in The William Gillum, Case No. 17,693. Cited in The William Crane, 50 Fed. 445.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court, against the steam propeller Neptune, by the owners of a quantity of oil in casks, shipped by that vessel, on freight, from Boston to New York, on the 29th of November, 1865, to recover for the loss of some of the oil. The district court dismissed the libel, and the libellants appealed to this court.

George T. Curtis and Smith & Hulse, for libellants.

Erastus C. Benedict, for claimants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The casks of oil, in this case, were of various sizes, containing from eighty to three hundred gallons each. The propeller encountered, on the voyage, an unusually violent storm, which fully accounts for the damage within the exception in the bill of lading, and throws the onus on the shippers, to establish carelessness or negligence on the part of the master or owners of the vessel, leading to the particular loss. This they have attempted to do, by charging, first, that the casks were badly stowed, and, secondly, that they were stowed between decks, when they should have been stowed in the hold.

As appears from the proofs, a large portion of the hold of such a propeller as this one was, is used for her engines, water, boilers, coal, &c., although there is some space left for freight; but much the greater part of the freight is carried between decks, or on the main deck, as it is called. This deck is constructed specially for the purpose of carrying freight. It is bulwarked entirely around, and covered by the upper deck, and is as completely protected from the weather and from storms, as if it were the hold; and freight can be stowed in it as securely as in the hold. It may, perhaps, require more care in the stowage of casks, and of packages of that description, to prevent their rolling in stormy weather, than if they were in the hold, the tendency to disturb the cargo upon this deck being greater than when it is below. I concur, therefore, with the court below, that no fault is chargeable to the vessel, in stowing the oil in the between decks.

There is much conflict of evidence in the case, on the subject of the proper stowage of the casks—much more than should be expected from the intelligent shipmasters, and other experts, who have been examined; but, in this conflict, I am not disposed to overrule the conclusion of the learned judge below, who has examined the case with great care and attention on both of the points to which I have referred. Decree affirmed.

PRIZE—BLOCKADE—CONDEMNATION.

Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy property, and for a violation of the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel was captured, as prize of war, April 19, 1863, on the Atlantic Ocean, off Charleston Harbor, S. C., by the United States sloop-of-war Housatonic. The vessel was, on her capture, appraised at the sum of $150, and left at Port Royal, S. C., by the captors. The cargo was brought to this port for adjudication, and was here libelled, on the 5th of May thereafter. It was on the same day arrested by due process of attachment and monition, returnable May 26, and on that day the writ was duly returned in court, and a decree by default was thereupon rendered in court. The ship's papers show that the vessel was, on the 4th of April, 1863, registered at Charleston, in the Confederate States, in the custom-house of the enemy, as the sole property of Samuel D. Stoney, of that place, and that she there shipped a crew for Nassau, N. P., with a manifest and bills of lading, dated April 11, 1863, of a cargo of cotton and spirits of turpentine, from that port to Nassau, N. P. The master of the vessel deposes, on his preparatory examination, that the vessel sailed from Charleston with the Confederate colors, and had no others on board; that she was captured off Charleston Harbor, April 19, 1863, in the night; that he was a resident of Charleston, and was appointed to the command of the vessel by her owner, in that port; that he, the master, owned part of the cargo, and the owner of the vessel the residue; and that both of them knew that the port was under blockade at the time by the United States forces. No question is earnestly maintained, upon the pleadings and proofs, as to the guilt of the vessel and cargo. A regular default against both has been taken, and a decree of condemnation and forfeiture must be entered against both. Decree accordingly.

WITNESS—PARTY TO THE RECORD—COLLISION—BETWEEN STEAM AND SAIL—PRECAUTIONARY MEASURES—LIGHTS—CONFLICTING TESTIMONY—MASTER AND CREW WITNESSES FOR OWNER.

1. In actions in the federal courts, parties to the record cannot be examined as witnesses.

2. The federal courts will, upon motion and for good cause shown, authorize the name of a party to be stricken from the pleadings; and he can then be examined as a witness, subject to all legal objections.

3. Sailing vessels meeting steamers at sea must use due precautions to avoid coming in collision with them, as for example by taking care not to impede their course or embarrass their navigation.

4. In an action for damages incurred to a sailing vessel through collision with a steamboat, the libellants must prove the sailing vessel clear of all culpable conduct conducing to the collision. Steamers are not bound to guard sailing vessels against their own misconduct. It is the duty of a steamer to take prudential measures in ample season for avoiding a sailing vessel, when the two are approaching.

[Cited in The New Champion, Case No. 10,146; The Rocket, Id. 11,975.]

5. Sailing vessels are not bound to have lights suspended in the night time.

[Cited in The City of Savannah, 41 Fed. 893.]

6. The positive testimony of witnesses to their own acts, at the time of a collision, is entitled to outweigh the opinions and belief of out-numbering witnesses who judged of such acts from the opposite vessel.

[Cited in The Gray Eagle, Case No. 5,734; Nelson v. The Goliah, Id. 10,106; The Fannie, 11 Wall. (78 U. S.) 242.]

7. The master and crew of a vessel are competent witnesses for the owner of the vessel in a cause of collision.

This was a cause of collision. It came before the court upon the following pleadings: The libel and complaint of Zebulon Paine, owner of one-half part of the schooner Iola and owner of part of her cargo; Sarah Sherwood, owner of the other half part of the schooner; John Buchanan and Andrew Bradford, owners of part of the cargo; Joseph Sumner, master of the said schooner; James McCollin, mate; Ambrose Venelan, James Wooster, seamen; Henry Coff, cook; and Augustus Norten, a passenger on board of said schooner, allege that the said schooner Iola, on or about the 7th day of July, 1846, left the port of Eastport, in Maine, with a cargo of lathes, pickets, plaster, fish in barrels, and packages of money, bound for the port of New-York; that the schooner was tight and staunch and strong, and well manned and appointed; that in the evening of the 14th July she had proceeded about a mile to the south of the light-boat stationed off the Middle Ground, a shoal nearly opposite to Stratford Point, and that the schooner passed the light-boat, being about a mile to the southward thereof; that the said schooner was then steering about a west course, the wind being nearly from the north; that the night was clear, and the said vessel could be easily discerned at a considerable distance; that whilst sailing upon her course about west, with a fresh wind, going from six to eight knots an hour, between nine and ten at night she was negligently run against and into by the steamboat Neptune, which was then proceeding down the Sound from the city of New-York, and run and struck against the hull of the said schooner between the fore and main rigging on her larboard side, with such great force and violence as to break and tear open the hull of said schooner, and cut her nearly in two, so that she filled and sunk almost immediately, and the said vessel and her cargo, and the clothes, money and effects of the crew and passengers, were totally lost, and a female named Murphy and her child, were drowned; that Long Island Sound, where the disaster occurred, is very wide, and there was ample room for the steamboat to have passed and avoided the schooner; that the schooner was worth three thousand dollars; that that part of the cargo belonging to the said Paine was of the value of $550: that the value of the cargo belonging to John Buchanan was $117; that the owners of the schooner lost the freight and passage money, &c., and the other libellants set forth their losses as by annexed schedules; they pray for a decree in their favor, for their damages and costs.

The respondent in his answer says, that as to the ownership of the schooner Iola, the cargo and the other subjects of property, he knows nothing, and therefore leaves it to the libellants to make out proof of their allegations. He further alleges that the steamboat Neptune, being in good order, sufficiently equipped and manned, sailed from New-York, 14th July, 1846, bound to Newport and Providence, in Rhode Island, and proceeding upon her passage at her regular rate, about one mile from Stratford light-boat, about nine or ten o'clock in the evening, a vessel was seen about one-half of a quarter of a mile ahead, which vessel was the schooner Iola. That immediately upon seeing the schooner, the course of the steamboat Neptune was changed to windward of the schooner, for the purpose of giving the said schooner the course she was then running. That when the said steamboat was about ten or twelve lengths from said schooner, it was observed that the latter had changed her course, and was luffing up so as to cross the bows of the said steamboat. That when first seen, said schooner was running north by south, from which she changed suddenly to about northwest. That on seeing that said schooner had changed her course, the bell of the steamboat was immediately rung to stop her, and all efforts made to avoid the collision; but the said schooner came directly across the bows of the said steamboat, and the latter having some headway, a collision could not be avoided. That said schooner was struck about midships, and her crew at once jumped from the rigging on board the said steamboat. That hearing that a female and child were left on the schooner, a small boat was immediately lowered from the Neptune, sufficiently manned, and every effort made to save any persons on board said schooner. That the captain of the steamboat, and the men with him who manned the said small boat, continued to row about the place of the disappearance of the schooner for more than half an hour, and finding no person needing their aid, they returned to the Neptune. That the master, pilot and wheelsman of the Neptune were experienced and skilful, and that the crew were not inexperienced, careless and incompetent men; nor was the steamboat carelessly, improperly or unskilfully navigated at the time; nor was the loss of the schooner and cargo, nor the lives of any persons, if any such were lost, occasioned by the fault, carelessness or unskilful management of the steamboat. That the reason why the said schooner was not seen earlier was that a heavy, black cloud shut her out from view, and she had no lights visible on board. That the change of the course of said steamboat threw the broadside of the Neptune to view from the schooner, so that the man at the helm on the schooner saw the head and stern lights of the steamboat, and her course was plainly seen by him. That the wind was blowing fresh, and the "luffing up" of the schooner so as to cross the bows of the steamboat, when the position and course of the latter was evident to those on board, could not have been expected by any person on board the steamboat, and was contrary to all proper and lawful rules of navigation. That the accident aforesaid was occasioned by the great negligence and want of care of the officers and crew of the schooner in not providing proper lights on deck, and in changing the course of the schooner right across the bows of the steamboat, and not by any negligence, want of skill or care of the officers and crew of the steamboat. Wherefore they pray that the libel be dismissed with costs. The matters in controversy under the pleadings relate to damages sustained by the owners of the schooner Iola, who are a portion of the libellants, and also by the owners of the cargo and property on board, who are the other libellants, in consequence of her destruction by collision with the steamboat Neptune. The master and crew of the Iola are co-libellants, who sue for property owned by them which was lost on board the schooner; and they were offered as witnesses on the hearing to prove the damages they had sustained, and the liability of the steamboat therefor. Exceptions to their competency having been taken on the part of the claimants, the court permitted that question to be argued, preliminarily to the hearing of the cause upon the merits.

F. B. Cutting, on the part of the libellants, argued that the witnesses were competent ex necessitate, and also in conformity to the practice of admiralty courts in cases of wages and salvage. He cited 1 Greenl. Ev. 27; 12 Vin. Abr. 24, pl. 34; 12 Johns. 461; 6 Wend. 407, 409; 4 Wend. 483; 11 Wend. 568; 16 Wend. 595, 596; [M'Coul v. Lekamp] 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 111, 117 note; 2 Yeates, 254; [Seagrove v. Redman] 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 153; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 348, 350; Dunl. Adm. Prac. 264; 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 112; Dunl. Adm. L. B. Woodruff and George Wood controverted these positions, and cited [Oliver v. Alexander] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 143; 2 Browne (Pa.) 350; The Henry Ewbank [supra]; 2 Hagg. Adm. 154; Dunl. Adm. Prac. 264, 265; Thompson v. The Philadelphia [Case No. 13,973].

BETTS, District Judge. The rule in equity established in the courts of this state does not disqualify a party named on the record from being a witness in the cause, if he has no certain interest in the event. 1 Johns. 556; 2 Cow. 186–189; 1 Johns. Ch. 550; 6 Johns. Ch. 212. Some of the judges in those cases were indisposed to consider a mere contingent liability to costs as amounting to a disqualifying interest; but the present chancellor seems to hold a party incompetent for that cause. 6 Paige, 565. At law the rule is clearly so, and the parties to the record, who are merely nominal, or who consent to be sworn, are not admissible as witnesses when objected to. 4 Johns. 140; 20 Johns. 142; 1 Wend. 20; 4 Wend. 453; 7 Cow. 650; 19 Wend. 353. The rule of disqualification because of connection with the suit is not so stringent in all the states. The cases upon the subject exhibiting the diversity of the law in this respect are collected in Cowen & Hill's notes to Phil. Ev. pp. 134–145, 1548; Greenl. Ev. § 347; but this court is not called upon to estimate their relative authority, or at liberty to discuss the question made as an open one. The supreme court of the United States has settled the law definitely, for all the national tribunals, that a party to the record is an incompetent witness in the cause. This is placed upon grounds of policy which do not admit of the exceptions recognized by other courts. De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 367, 384; Scott v. Lloyd, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 145; Stein v. Bowman, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 209. A party is held disqualified to testify in such cause, although his interest be nominal, or entirely extinguished, or be protected by a deposit of money, equal to any liability he may become subject to. Proceedings in maritime courts are governed by general rules applicable to cases at law and in equity, where no special course has grown up from long usage in those courts, or has not been appointed by positive law. The Boston [Case No. 1,673]. Prize causes and suits for salvage are prosecuted in the names of all parties interested in the recovery, and the suitors named in the pleadings are admitted as witnesses to sustain the action. This is put upon the ground of necessity; but it is also to be observed that those actions are founded in principles of public policy, and look to other results than the mere rights and rewards of individual suitors. They are equally anomalous in the permission to parties not having a common right and interest—on the contrary, often setting up interests hostile to each other—to unite in the same action, as in the admission of such parties to testify, not for each other alone, but each also for his personal interests. So by Act Cong. July 20, 1796, § 6, seamen are compelled to join in actions for wages earned in a common voyage, brought against the vessel; yet the suits are distinct and several, and have all the properties of actions prosecuted by parties independently of each other,—[Sheppard v. Taylor] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 714,—and the co-libellants, in such actions must accordingly be admissible witnesses for each other, as in separate suits. There is no common interest, even contingently, as to costs. If the decree be against the libel, one libellant is not chargeable with the costs incurred by the respondents on account of his co-libellant, and can only be made liable for those created by his individual claim. Neither the claim of necessity, of long usage and custom, or the appointment of positive law, applies to the position or quality of the witnesses offered in this case. They are not brought forward as indispensable parties in the cause, and who are the only witnesses present, and capable of giving evidence to the facts in question. They stand upon the record as common sufferers for a tort, and in that position are disabled from testifying for their associates. The case of The Catherine of Dover, 2 Hagg. Adm. 145, cited in support of the admissibility of these libellants to testify, stands on a different doctrine. The witnesses admitted in that case were not parties to the action, nor proved to be interested in its event. I think the objection ought to prevail, and that the libellants must be excluded as witnesses in the cause.

A petition being subsequently presented to the court, praying that the names of the master and crew of the schooner might be stricken from the record, an order to that effect was entered, and the testimony of these witnesses and other proofs were then offered in support of the allegations of the libel. The material facts will appear sufficiently in the opinion of the court.

George Wood and L. B. Woodruff, for claimants.

The burden of proof is on the libellants. The Iron Duke, 9 Jur. 477. The vessel complaining must be free from all blame. The Friends, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 485; Id. 488; 3 Car. & P. 531.

F. B. Cutting, in reply, for libellants.

The Neptune was palpably off her course; she must take the burden of accounting for her situation. The Perth, 3 Hagg. Adm. 417; Story, Bailm. §§ 608, 609, 611; 3 Hagg. BETTS, District Judge. The importance which this controversy has assumed on account of the amount of loss incurred by the collision, and of the question of the right navigation of the respective vessels, has caused a more prolonged examination of testimony and a wider discussion at the hearing than would seem demanded by the intrinsic difficulties of the case. A sailing vessel and a steamboat running in opposite directions, came in collision on the Sound, in the night time. The injury was received chiefly by the schooner, which sunk directly after the collision. The libellants charge the act to have been wholly the fault of the steamer, and that they are entitled to full remuneration from her for their losses. The schooner is alleged to be worth $3,000, and the property on board her, totally lost, about $1,000. The particulars on which the action is grounded stated in the libel, are, that the schooner was on her passage from Eastport, Maine, to New-York, and on the night of July 14, 1846, was standing about west, running about six or eight knots the hour, the wind being fresh and nearly north, when, between nine and ten p. m., she was run into by the steamboat Neptune, proceeding down the Sound from the city of New-York. The schooner had passed the light-boat stationed on the middle ground nearly opposite Stratford Point, about one mile south of that boat. The night was clear, and the schooner could be easily discerned at a considerable distance from the steamer. The schooner was cut nearly in two by the collision, and sunk almost immediately; the vessel, cargo, clothes, money and effects of the crew and passengers were totally lost, and two passengers, a woman and her child, were drowned. The libel alleges that the steamboat was carelessly, improperly and unskilfully navigated, and the disaster was occasioned solely thereby. That her crew, and those having her management, were inexperienced and incompetent, or else were careless or negligent; and that the disaster was occasioned without the fault of the schooner and her crew. The libellants are bound to prove their own conduct correct, both in what was done or omitted to be done on board their vessel. If their acts caused the collision, or essentially conduced to it, they must bear the consequences, and cannot call upon the steamer to contribute to their satisfaction, unless it appears she was equally in fault. The Catherine of Dover, 2 Hagg. Adm. 154; Id. 360. They must further show that the schooner was well found, manned and equipped for the navigation in which she was employed; and they have no exemption in any of these particulars because the injury was received from a vessel propelled by steam. The action is for a tort. The complaining vessel must appear clear of blame, and also prove fault or negligence on the part of the other directly leading to the disaster. The Ligo, Id. 356. The law in no way justifies the notion that steam vessels are burthened with the sole risks and responsibilities of encounters with sailing vessels. The rule is reciprocal, placing both classes of vessels under a common liability and privilege; except that steamers are regarded as always possessing the means of avoiding a sailing vessel with a free wind, with the additional advantage of being able to stop their headway or take a retrograde movement. Those means they are bound to employ to avoid a sailing vessel at anchor, or embarrassed in her position or movements, or when keeping her own course. This service is exacted of steam vessels in contribution to the common safety of navigation, and is due as well when a sailing vessel is under difficulties from the improvidence or unskilfulness of those managing her, as if brought upon her by mischance, or without fault on her part. A sailing vessel under way has no right to hold steamers approaching her, responsible under all circumstances, for her security against them. She has also an important duty to perform in preventing a collision. She must keep steadily the course she is running when near a steamer, or if she departs from it, the change must, if practicable, be made in a manner to aid the steamer in avoiding her.

If in this case the defence set up is established, that the schooner, when too near for the steamer by any manoeuvre to escape her, luffed suddenly across the bows of the Neptune, and received the injury in that manner, the action cannot be sustained, and the claimants should be discharged from it with costs. Upon this fact the pleadings and proofs are in direct conflict. That issue embraces the substantial merits of the case. The question upon the competency of the libellants' witnesses to testify in the cause will be afterwards noticed. Witnesses on the different vessels so habitually disagree in their opinions of the immediate or remote causes of a collision at sea, and of the incidents of the occurrence observed on both sides at the same time, that courts can place little confidence in their expressions of opinion, and can rarely feel it prudent to decide causes of collision upon testimony of that character. Receiving with great distrust, the opinions and judgments of witnesses so circumstanced, however intelligent and worthy the individuals may be, the court looks chiefly to facts stated by witnesses to have occurred within their personal knowledge. What a witness asserts he did at the time or did not do on his own vessel, is generally more satisfactory evidence of the fact than the opinions and belief of a dozen others, formed from what they supposed they saw or heard on another vessel.

(The court here analyzed and collected carefully the testimony of the various witnesses; but it is not deemed necessary to the clear apprehension of the principles of this decision to report that part of the opinion.)

The men on the deck and the one at the wheel of the schooner all testify positively that no movement of her helm or change of her course was made when the steamer was coming upon her. The effort of the claimants is to prove that the schooner suddenly luffed after the steamer had starboarded her helm and was going clear of her, and was thus thrown across the bows of the Neptune after it was too late for the latter to take any further measures to avoid her. It is to be remarked that no witness on the steamer says he observed any change of the schooner's course until the wheel of the Neptune had been starboarded, and she began coming up to the wind. This movement, in a moment of alarm and the obscurity of the night, might easily have been attributed to the schooner, so that the latter would seem to the witnesses to be luffing, when her broadside was brought to view only because of a change of direction by the steamer. I hold it is not proved upon this evidence that the schooner was guilty of any fault or neglect in her movements, conducing to the collision.

Only one other fact respecting her conduct need be noticed. It is alleged that the schooner was concealed from the view of the Neptune by a thick black cloud, hanging over the eastern horizon, and that under those circumstances it was a fault on her part to run without exhibiting a light as a warning to vessels approaching her. I shall not discuss the evidence upon this subject for the purpose of determining the degree of darkness occasioned by that state of the atmosphere. The witnesses differ widely in their estimates of that fact; but admitting the sky was in places or wholly overcast, directly before or at the time of the collision, the darkness is not proved to have been so dense as to prevent the schooner being seen far enough from the steamer to afford time to the latter to take precautions for avoiding her. The witnesses on the steamer state facts which afford a strong presumption that the schooner was in plain sight in sufficient time for the pilot to have stopped and backed the engine of the Neptune before the vessels came together; and it was a plain neglect of his duty not to take that precaution. 2 Hagg. Adm. 173; 3 Hagg. Adm. 414. There was, besides, a blameable want of prudence in the pilot in running the steamer at her full speed, if the obscuration of the sky was as great as he represents it to have been; and above all, there was culpable remissness in not placing a competent watch upon the forward deck, in a position giving the best advantage for a thorough look-out ahead. These were acts of gross carelessness, and of a character in themselves to cast upon the steamer the responsibility for the collision. I only add, in respect to the relative positions of the two vessels, that in my judgment the decided weight of evidence is that the Neptune was on a track to the south and leeward of the schooner, when her wheel was starboarded and her head veered to the north. This was a violation of nautical rules, and such want of care and skill as to render the steamer responsible for the consequences which followed. The Friends, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 478. The question of the competency of the master and crew of the schooner to testify for the libellants in the cause was incidentially adverted to in the decision upon the motion to exclude them because parties to the record. The point has been presented again to the attention of the court on this hearing, and after their names had been stricken from the pleadings. Witnesses of this class it would seem were always regarded as admissible in admiralty in causes of collision, although intimations are thrown out that it may be proper to take releases to obviate final objections. 3 Hagg. Adm. 323. I see no necessity for this. The witnesses stand merely in the relation of servants and agents to the owners of the ship and cargo, acting within the plain scope of their authority. That character does not render them incompetent witnesses for their principal when he is a party to the suit. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 416; 1 Phil. Ev. 56, Cowen & Hill's Notes, p. 1525.

The decree in this cause will accordingly be in favor of the libellants for the whole value of the schooner and cargo, with costs.

BOUNDARIES.

See, also, "Party Walls."

Where the original corners and lines are established, they must control courses and distances. But courses and distances called for must govern where there are no established objects to control them.....1324
Public reputation, to prove boundaries, must be the reputation in the neighborhood, and not what particular persons said 1324

BRIDGES.

Congress has power to authorize, as a regulation of commerce, the building of a bridge across a navigable stream..... 341
A bridge constructed across a navigable stream, as authorized by act of congress and the local legislature, cannot be enjoined as a public nuisance..... 341

CARRIERS.

See, also, "Affreightment"; "Average"; "Bills of Lading"; "Charter Parties"; "Demurrage"; "Shipping."

Printed conditions of a ticket inconsistent with a valid oral contract of carriage are not conclusive against the passenger.. 838
Punitive damages are recoverable where a husband and wife who have contracted for the exclusive use of a stateroom are forced to receive another male passenger therein 838
The disappointment and irritation of a husband, and the discomfort and suffering of his invalid wife, resulting from assigning them to separate staterooms, in violation of the contract of carriage, are elements of damage..... 838
Shipping receipts held to constitute through contracts, by which the carrier was liable for the proper transportation of the articles beyond the line of its own road *1131
A forwarding carrier who pays past freight charges, according to usage, may recover the amount from the consignee... 609
Where such forwarding carrier has no connection with the previous carriers, it is not liable for damage to the goods while in its possession..... 609
A shipper of lard in the summer months takes the risk of damage occasioned by the excessively hot weather, unless some neglect or fault can be charged upon the vessel, contributing to the loss.....1343
The fact that cases of goods were in good order when received, and broken when delivered, casts the burden on the carrier to show how the injury occurred.. 725
Evidence showing that the injury would not have resulted in the common course of events, with proper care, in the absence of explanation, proves it to have been caused by negligence..... 725
Shippers of merchandise, of large experience, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, are presumed to use the best method of packing the same for the particular kind of carriage..... 725
The carrier has the burden of showing due diligence and proper care to avoid the accident, and that it was unavoidable, to avail himself of the exceptions of "dangers of navigation" 581
Contracts limiting the common-law liability of the carrier are to be strictly construed in favor of the shipper..... 23
A notice stamped on the bill of lading, "Not responsible for rust, breakage," etc., and a statement by the receiving clerk to the same effect, do not make a specific contract limiting the carrier's liability..... 136
A person employed to construct glass cases and superintend their shipment cannot bind the owner by a contract limiting the carrier's liability for loss from breakage 136
Gross negligence in the stowage of glass cases will render the vessel liable, though liability for breakage was expressly excepted 136
Officers of a vessel, who know the contents of certain boxes to be glass cases, are guilty of gross negligence where they fail to observe every precaution necessary to insure their safe stowage and safe delivery 136
A contract releasing the carrier from damage from "leakage or decay, chafage or breakage, or from any other cause not the result of collision of trains," etc., held not to apply to loss by fire while the goods were stored in the carrier's warehouse.... 23
Carriers of live stock must provide accommodations whereby the stock can be safely and properly kept and cared for until a delivery can be made to the consignee according to the terms of the shipment *1131

CHARITIES.

A religious corporation created under Act Pa. April 6, 1781, takes the title as trustee for the heir at law of the testator, who devised certain lands to it in trust for uses that were void..... 329

CHARTER PARTIES.

See, also, "Admiralty"; "Affreightment"; "Average"; "Bills of Lading"; "Demurrage"; "Shipping."

The master cannot keep the goods shipped, and refuse to sign a bill of lading to the order of the shipper, irrespective of his orders from the charterers, or the contract between the shipper and his vendee 546

Page

Under a charter stipulating that demurrage shall be paid day by day, and that the master shall sign bills of lading, the master must sign bills of lading, though demurrage is due and unpaid..... 477

In an action on the charter party, to compel the master to sign bills of lading, libelant can recover only the actual expenses incurred and rendered necessary by the master's refusal..... 477

The master of a vessel, who charters her for a specific term under an agreement to furnish her with all stores, is alone responsible for supplies furnished by one chargeable with notice of such charter party..... 905

Risk of loss by fire devolves on the charterers, where they covenant to return the vessel in like good condition, ordinary wear and dangers of the sea excepted.... 83

A charterer who assumes risk by fire is liable, in case of loss thereby, only for the excess in value over insurance money received by the owners..... 83

The ship is not liable for damage to cargo by stevedores selected as agents of the shippers under a special clause in the charter party. (Affirming Case No. 17,461.)..... 288

Vessel held not liable for damage to cargo in lower hold from leakage from casks of lard stowed between decks, and shipped in almost a liquid state, where the charterer agreed to pay all damages caused by such leakage..... 890

CHATTEL MORTGAGES.

Quære as to the effect of provisions as to subsequently acquired property, as between incumbrances of different date..... 527

The parties may agree that the possession and use of the mortgaged chattels shall be retained by the mortgagor until condition broken..... 527

In Nevada a chattel mortgage is void as to creditors, unless immediate possession of the mortgaged property is taken and retained by the mortgagee..... 781

A mortgage is fraudulent and void, as to creditors, if the mortgagor is allowed to remain in possession of and sell and traffic with the goods as his own..... 781

A mortgage on a stock of goods can only be prima facie fraudulent as being out of the usual and ordinary course of business, and its validity may be established by proof..... 711

In Indiana an unrecorded chattel mortgage, where the property is not delivered to the mortgagee, is absolutely void, as against the assignee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor..... 711

In New Jersey a chattel mortgage is good against subsequent creditors from the time of filing..... 322

A statement which notifies creditors of the extent of the mortgagee's lien is sufficient to accompany the refiling of the mortgage..... 322

Until March 19, 1839, there was no law in Arkansas requiring chattel mortgages to be recorded. If recorded prior to that time, the record was not notice, but tended to give publicity and repel fraud..... 86

The filing by the mortgagor of a voluntary petition in bankruptcy is "an attempt to sell," within the meaning of the provision giving the right to take possession.. 711

The practice on foreclosure is, by interlocutory decree, to allow until the next term to redeem, and, in default of redemption, to then foreclose by final decree barring redemption..... 86

COLLISION.

See, also, "Admiralty"; "Pleading in Admiralty"; "Practice in Admiralty"; "Towage."

Nature of liability—Contributive fault.

In determining the question of fault, with a view of fixing the liability, the proximate cause of the injury must be regarded 399

Damages for an injury to a vessel moored, by the rubbing by a vessel lying alongside, caused by a collision with a third vessel under way, may be recovered against the colliding vessel..... 940

To recover of the vessel moored alongside, she must be shown to have been in fault..... 940

A tug will not be held in fault for her engine's catching on the center, whereby she drifted towards rocks, and, in trying to get away, collided with a floating bath house..... 951

In case of inevitable accident each vessel bears its own loss.....1251

Where measures of precaution have been neglected which would have rendered the collision less probable, it is no excuse that it could not have been prevented at the moment it occurred.....1319

The tug is not responsible for a collision with the tow, which has gone adrift and is in great peril, while attempting to save her crew, where not guilty of gross negligence..... 126

Rules of navigation.

A rule of supervising inspectors adopted before but not promulgated at the time of a collision held not applicable thereto.....1160

Local inspectors cannot release a vessel from the obligation to carry colored lights. 209

Suction of water from passing vessels is one of the natural incidents of navigation which a tug with a tow must guard against..... 602

Between sail vessels.

Where both vessels are sailing free on different tacks, the one on the port tack must keep out of the way of the one on the starboard tack..... 552

As between a vessel sailing free and one closehauled, the latter must keep her course 555

A vessel closehauled on the privileged tack has the right to suppose that the other is performing her duty in keeping a lookout, and will avoid her..... 758

Where a hail from the vessel on the privileged tack was not heard on board the other, held, that the collision was caused by the absence of a lookout..... 758

Vessels sailing, one within seven points of the wind, and the other two points free, are neither closehauled..... 552

Where neither vessel is closehauled, and are upon different tacks, both must seasonably port their helms, under rule 16, when approaching and in danger of collision..... 552

The vessel which does not seasonably port her helm will be held solely in fault where the other seasonably ported her helm..... 552

Between steam and sail.

The steamer must take all proper precaution for avoiding a sail vessel approaching from a direction involving risk of collision.....1165

Page

In case of a sail vessel beating to windward, the steamer must anticipate her going in stays for another tack when proper to do so..... 170

Between steam vessels.

Supervising inspectors' rule 1 does not authorize one steamer to dictate to another a departure from rule 13, requiring them to pass port to port. But it authorizes and makes binding a signaled agreement to depart from the rule..... 427

A steamer claiming protection, under an alleged agreement to depart from the rule, must show a proposition to that effect by proper signals in time to be acted on with safety, and that it was understood and accepted 427

A steamer will be held in fault for not taking the course indicated on her exchange of signals with another steamer, and the latter will not be held in default for keeping up her speed..... 451

That a steam propeller did not carry her mast light at proper elevation, and had no colored lights, will not prevent recovery, where the colliding steamer was traveling at great speed, and had no lookout, and her pilot would not have seen colored lights, and did see the mast light..... 209

Overtaking vessels.

An overtaking vessel beating in the same direction with the vessel ahead is bound to anticipate the coming about of the latter when she has run out her tack.....1310

An overtaking steamer in the East river, though her stem is ahead of that of the other steamer when they reach Hell Gate, must give way or be liable for a resulting collision 1160, 1164

Overtaking vessel held liable for a collision with a heavy barge towed alongside a steamer which broke her stem line on sheering on meeting a cross tide and grounding 1339

Vessels moored, etc.

A canal boat moored at a dock by order of the harbor master is lawfully there, though it be at a narrow place in the river 602

In case of collision with a vessel moored, the presumption of wrong is against the moving vessel 399

Ordinary care under such circumstances will not protect the boat which commits the injury from responsibility..... 399

There is almost a conclusive presumption of fault in a steamer which runs into a vessel at anchor in a harbor, in a proper place, and with proper lights..... 29

Tugs and tows.

A tug having vessels in tow, when meeting a sailing vessel, is subject to the rules applicable to ordinary steamers.....1136

A tug in swinging an elevator in tow into a slip is charged with the duty of avoiding a barge rightfully moored to the end of the pier with stern projecting.....1307

River and harbor navigation.

A tug working at a vessel aground in the channel of the St. Clair flats must give way to passing vessels, though it requires a temporary suspension of her efforts; and the master of an approaching vessel may rely upon her observance of such duty....1156

A steamboat will be held liable for a collision between two vessels properly secured at a pier, caused by her swells, where she passed unnecessarily near at high speed.. 830

A steamship will be held liable for so coming into her pier as to touch vessels lying at the second pier away.....1271

There is no general obligation requiring vessels navigating rivers to keep to the right of mid-channel. No such custom is proven in respect to the St. Clair flats.... 427

Speed: Fogs.

Risk of collision, requiring reduction of speed, exists whenever vessels are so near that a collision might result from any departure from the rules..... 427

A steamer ascending a channel at 8½ miles an hour, and one descending at 14½ miles an hour, both condemned for excessive speed 427

Seven or eight miles an hour is excessive speed for a steamboat towing barges at a dangerous point on the Mississippi.....426

Steamboats on the Mississippi are in fault for running in a fog without sounding the whistle at intervals not exceeding two minutes 426

A steam tug is not required by the supervising inspectors' rules to sound her fog whistle while running in a fog; but it may be her duty under general principles of admiralty law 773

There is a fog, within the meaning of Act April 29, 1864, requiring sailing vessels to sound a fog horn, whenever the weather is so thick that the horn would be heard further than the ordinary signal lights could be clearly distinguished..... 646

Lights: Signals, etc.

Sailing vessels are not bound to have lights suspended in the nighttime.....1345

Lookouts, officers, etc.

A tug having only a mate and wheelsman on deck is insufficiently manned. A lookout is absolutely necessary.....1136

It is inexcusable negligence for a large passenger steamer on Long Island Sound, at night, to have no lookout save the pilot in the pilot house..... 209

Absence of a pilot from a steamer navigating a narrow channel is prima facie a fault 427

Absence of a lookout is immaterial if the officer of the deck has all the information a lookout could give him..... 427

A custom not to keep a lookout will not be given any weight..... 758

Particular instances of collision.

Between pilot boat and schooner, where the former was held in fault for failure to exhibit a light while lying to, and for want of a competent person on deck..... 168

Between steamer and skiff, where the steamer was held solely at fault..... 363

Between bark becalmed without colored lights and steamer, where both were held in fault 1251

Between steamer and vessel in anchor in fog, where both were held in fault, the former for too great speed, and the latter for absence of bell or fog horn..... 840

Between boat in tow astern and schooner drifting with tide in light wind, where tug was held in fault for not keeping out of the way 928

Between steamer and schooner, where both were held in fault, the former for improper maneuver, and the latter for failure to sound a fog horn..... 646

Between steamer and schooner which had proper lights burning, and did not change her course, where the steamer was held solely in fault..... 206

Between steamers in Hellgate, where the overtaking vessel was held in fault for not giving way when abreast of the other.... 1160

A bark drifting from her anchorage against another anchored vessel held liable, in the absence of sufficient evidence that the drifting was by inevitable accident... 272

Procedure.

A forfeiture incurred by a transfer of an interest in the injured vessel to an alien, but not judicially declared, does not prevent him from joining in the libel.....1136

Page

The fact that the owners of a vessel in possession have placed the title temporarily in another, to secure moneys borrowed to pay her purchase price, will not prevent their maintaining a libel for collision..... 168

A boat licensed as a towboat, and having no license to carry passengers, does not violate the navigation laws by carrying a single passenger, so as to lose her redress for an injury done her in a collision..... 773

It is no defense that the vessel injured was engaged in the coasting business without a license..... 209

The fact that a pilot boat is cruising off her station is no defense to a libel against another pilot vessel for a collision..... 168

The libel must narrate the particular facts and circumstances which caused the disaster 555

Where the answer admits that the vessel and cargo "were sunk and lost," libelant may prove value without showing that she could not be raised..... 208

The ownership of a boat, in making out a prima facie case, may be proved in the same manner as any other chattel..... 984

Libelant must show freedom from contributing fault.....168, 1345

The absence of lights and a lookout puts the party presumptively at fault..... 555

The testimony of one who saw the collision from the land is entitled to greater weight than that of those on the moving vessels 552

Weight and sufficiency of evidence of persons on moving vessels.....1165

Testimony of officers and crew as to the number of whistles blown by their own vessel is to believed as against an equal number of witnesses on the other vessel..... 427

The positive testimony of witnesses to their own acts, at the time of a collision, is entitled to outweigh the opinions and belief of out-numbering witnesses who judged of such acts from the opposite vessel.....1345

The master and crew of a vessel are competent witnesses for the owner of the vessel in a cause of collision.....1345

One party may call as witnesses persons who were on board the vessel of the other party 646

On a libel for collision of a steamer with a small boat, where it was alleged that the steamer was 200 or 300 feet away when seen, held that, as the small boat had time to get out of the way, there could be no recovery 478

A libel against a schooner for collision with a steamer dismissed where it appeared that both were properly manned and carried proper lights, and there was no preponderance of evidence that the schooner changed her course..... 61

In case of mutual fault, costs will be refused both parties.....1251

Rule of damages.

Damages adequate to the full recompense of the injured vessel will be awarded against the vessel in fault.....1169

Where a vessel sunk in a collision is sold as a wreck, the whole amount will not be allowed as a total loss where she is raised and repaired, but only the expenses and repairs and demurrage for loss of time..... 549

Where it appears that the cargo of a sunken vessel was saved, freight money will not be allowed as damages, without actual proof of loss..... 549

That a part owner has received insurance as for a total loss is no reason why the entire value of the vessel should not be awarded, on a libel by the owners..... 208

Page

The owners of the vessel may recover for cargo lost without joining the shippers as libelants 208

The value of a boat stolen from the master of the injured vessel was disallowed, there being no necessary or probable connection proved between the collision and the theft.....1309

Damages suffered by the injured vessel in the course of reasonable and proper efforts to save her are properly chargeable in the action for collision.....1161

The injury or loss of a portion of the cargo after the wreck, by the efforts of a third vessel to save it, does not exonerate the faulty vessel from liability for full damages 1165

Damages caused by beaching the injured vessel are chargeable to the vessel in fault, where the master acted with reasonable skill and diligence after the collision.....1309

The cost of raising a boat and putting her on the ways to be examined is recoverable as an item of damage, though greater than her value when raised.....1271

Salvage expenses and charges necessarily paid in rescuing the vessel and cargo from perils arising out of the collision will be allowed as damages.....1169

A bona fide adjustment by the parties will be accepted by the court as the proper mode of fixing the value of such services..1169

The commissioner's report of the amount of damages will be adopted in the absence of palpable errors or inadvertencies.....1169

Compensation will be made for the loss of the use of the injured vessel while undergoing repairs.....773, 1161, 1169

The highest rate of interest allowed in the state during the time of the detention of the vessel undergoing repairs upon her value allowed as damages for her detention 984

No damages can be recovered for the delay of barges in tow of the injured vessel where the libel does not state to whom they and their cargo belonged..... 773

The expense of putting in a new mast cannot be allowed where the injured mast as repaired stood the remainder of the season, and it did not appear but that it would have continued serviceable..... 602

Interest should be allowed on the damages from the day on which the injury happened until the day when judgment is rendered 773

Revision of damages.

In case of mutual fault, or where the fault cannot be determined, the damages are equally divided between the vessels, without regard to the difference of their values 1251

The rule of mutual contribution is not applied where the collision was the result of physical cause, for which neither vessel is to blame: but in such case each vessel must bear her own loss..... 940

Where a vessel is injured by the joint negligence of two vessels, the damages must be apportioned between them..... 602

Review.

The amount of the allowance, unless strikingly out of proportion to the damage, will not be interfered with where the principle adopted was the correct one....1161

It is doubtful whether state laws relating to weights and measures can have any validity, though congress has never exercised its power of regulation..... 254

The inhibition against laws impairing the obligation of contracts does not apply to federal legislation..... 263

A state legislature has no power, by repealing a municipal charter, to invade the rights of creditors..... 407

The state legislature cannot take away the right of the holder of a county bond, which existed when the bond was made, to sue the county thereon, by prescribing a different remedy for collection of such bond 1209

It is competent for a state legislature to give a right of action on contracts which were prohibited at the time they were made 403

A state law prohibiting a sale on execution unless the property will bring two-thirds of the valuation affixed to it by three householders is void as to contracts made before its passage, but valid as to all others 679

Act N. Y. Feb. 11, 1824, imposing penalties for neglecting to report passengers brought from foreign countries into the port of New York, is within the police power of the state..... 406

The right of the states to make inspection laws is subject to the paramount right of congress to regulate foreign and interstate commerce, and an impost on imports or exports is void, if in excess of what is absolutely necessary for executing such inspection laws.....1302

Congress is the proper authority to decide whether a charge or duty is or is not excessive 1302

A state tax upon locomotives, passenger and freight cars, etc., being an expedient for raising revenue, is unconstitutional, as interfering with commerce between the states 458

Act March 2, 1867, validating punishment of certain offenders, and protecting from civil process persons striving, under executive orders, to suppress the Rebellion, held ex post facto as to the former provision, but valid as to the latter.....1030

The term "ex post facto" does not apply to acts of a civil nature..... 440

CONTEMPT.

The power to discharge or to remit the sentence in the case of a person committed to prison until payment of a fine, imposed as a punishment for contempt in violating an injunction, falls within the pardoning power vested in the president..... 968

The court cannot discharge such person, on the ground that he is unable to pay the fine, until the president has disclaimed the power to relieve by pardon..... 968

The fact that the amount of the fine, in the order imposing it, was directed to be paid to plaintiff in the injunction suit, towards the reimbursement of his expenses in the attachment proceedings for the contempt, does not take the case out of the pardoning power of the president..... 968

CONTINUANCE.

The contract is governed by the law of the place where it was made or is to be performed 1254

A contract made in one state, to be partly performed there, and partly in several others, is governed by the law of the place where it is made..... 754

But conveyances and transfers of property subject to the local law, where required to be made in performance of the contract, must be made in accordance with the lex rei sitæ..... 754

The repeal of a prohibitory act does not validate contracts made while the prohibition was in force..... 403

A contract made by telegraph is completed when an acceptance of the proposition is deposited for transmission in the telegraph office..... 447

A contract for material in "tons," held to call for 2,240 pounds, though the state has attempted to fix a ton at 2,000..... 254

Construction of clause in contract in relation to forfeiture of payment for work done on abandonment of the contract..... 321

A stipulation to pay for building a railroad, partly in stock, one-half to be reserved until the contract was completed, held executory; and, on wrongful interruption of the work, the covenantee was entitled to damages for the value of the stock..1122

A contract will not be set aside upon charges of fraud and misrepresentations in procuring it, where a rescission would disturb many large and important transactions, except upon clear proof..... 754

COPYRIGHT.

The publisher of a newspaper who printed therein a piece of music which has been copyrighted is liable for the statutory penalty for infringement, of one dollar per sheet, although he knew nothing of the copyright, and copied the music from another newspaper..... 374

A preliminary injunction to restrain publication of a work alleged to be an infringement will not be enjoined where defendant is able to meet any damages, and there are grave doubts as to the validity of plaintiff's copyright, and of the infringement complained of..... 333

CORPORATIONS.

But creditors cannot interpose unless the corporation is without other assets to meet its obligations.....1118

The assignee of stock is liable for the amount unpaid thereon, though he relied upon the representations of his assignor and an officer of the company that the stock was fully paid for.....1118

The ownership of stock does not give the stockholder any legal estate in the property of the corporation..... 759

A stockholder cannot sue in equity for relief against an injury done or threatened to the corporation in which he is a stockholder, without averring that the corporation or its officers are derelict in their duties 759

A corporation which has a legal existence in any one state can sue in the federal courts of any other state. It is not necessary that it be a corporation created by the laws of that state.....1228

A corporation cannot be made a party to a civil suit in a circuit or district court, by original process, in any other district than a district of the state by which it was created 1105

A person who has taken a loan from a corporation, made in violation of its charter, or his surety, cannot set up in defense the want of power in the company to make the loan 1081

COSTS.

Comparative authority of federal and state courts: Process.

A federal court will not stay proceedings in a cause of which it has jurisdiction, and in which the complainant is entitled to some relief, although the subject-matter of the controversy is in the hands of a receiver of a state court; but the federal court will do nothing to disturb the receiver's possession 25

Federal courts—Jurisdiction in general.

All federal courts inferior to the supreme court exercise only such jurisdiction as is given by law; but, after the jurisdiction is designated, they take cognizance of all matters within its scope without special appointment of law..... 232

The jurisdiction of the federal courts cannot be enlarged, diminished, or affected by state laws 1209, 1259

A foreign insurance company may sue in a federal court, regardless of state statutes forbidding such companies to resort thereto 218

Original jurisdiction may be conferred by congress upon the federal circuit courts by the removal into them from the state courts of cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States and treaties 1061

A federal court has no jurisdiction to enjoin the erection of a bridge, authorized by a state legislature, over a navigable river wholly within the state..... 412

The federal circuit court may, in a proper case, enjoin agents or officers of the state, though the state is the real party in interest 1017

Unless a party has a right to sue in the local courts, he cannot sue in the federal courts 759

Neither under the bankrupt act of 1867 nor by Act June 1, 1872, § 6, in respect to attachment of property, can a civil suit be brought by original process in the federal court in any other district than that of which defendant is an inhabitant, or in which he is served with process.....1259

Where necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction the federal court will issue the proper process to bring the matter before the court 1061

Objection to the jurisdiction may be taken by motion, and is not waived by subsequently pleading to the merits.....1259

—— Grounds of jurisdiction.

To give jurisdiction on the ground of parties it must appear affirmatively that complainants are not citizens of the same state with defendants 153

The jurisdiction of the circuit courts on the ground of citizenship is confined to cases where the suit is between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought and a citizen of another state. (Act 1789, § 11.) 559

It is conclusively presumed that if a corporation has a legal existence in a state, its corporators are citizens of the same state 1228

The fact that a corporation holds charters from other states will not prevent the circuit court of the state where it was created taking jurisdiction of a suit against it by nonresidents..... 458

Federal jurisdiction is not lost in a suit between citizens of different states, merely because there may be found in it, as necessary parties, one or more defendants of the same state with the plaintiffs or some of the plaintiffs 1239

In a suit by a citizen of another state against a corporation of the state, service of process, within the state, on a joint defendant, who is a citizen of a third state, gives the court jurisdiction over him..... 930

Where the writ is returned non est, etc., as to a defendant whose citizenship is not averred, his joinder will not oust the court of jurisdiction 836

An assignee of a chose in action may sue, if the original holder could have done so, although some intermediate holder was a citizen of the same state with defendant.. 290

A federal court has no jurisdiction merely because one party is a United States consul at a foreign port..... 425

The citizenship of a corporate party need not appear in the caption of the petition. It is sufficient when the facts are averred in the body thereof..... 243

An allegation that plaintiff is a subject of a foreign power does not confer jurisdiction, as he may still be a naturalized citizen .....258; contra, 403

The circuit court has no jurisdiction, on the ground of the subject-matter, of a suit to enforce a license granted under a patent, or a suit to set it aside on the ground that the patent is void..... 153

The circuit courts have jurisdiction of all actions brought by or against national banks without regard to citizenship or the amount involved 522

The damages laid in the declaration give jurisdiction as to the matter in dispute.... 999

The damages laid in the writ, and in the plaintiff's affidavit, are equally conclusive, as to the amount in controversy, for the purposes of jurisdiction..... 999

—— Circuit courts.

The actual jurisdiction of the circuit courts is governed by the judiciary act, and not by the broader terms of the constitution 559

The circuit court in New York has no jurisdiction of a suit by a citizen of New York and a citizen of Georgia against a citizen of Massachusetts..... 559 —— Administration of state laws.

The construction given by the highest court of the state to a state statute is binding on the federal court..... 105

The federal courts are bound to follow the latest decision of the state court, though it renders invalid a contract valid under the decisions of state court when made 503

As to general principles of law the federal courts are not bound by the decisions of the state courts.....567, 1082

The court will follow the construction of a state statute as given by the supreme court of the United States, rather than a later construction given by the highest court of the state.....1263

Local courts.

In actions sounding in damages, those claimed in the declaration, and not those awarded by the jury, give jurisdiction...1036

CRIMINAL LAW.

See, also, "Arrest"; "Bail"; "Extradition"; "Grand Jury"; "Habeas Corpus"; "Witness."

The Great Lakes are not "high seas" within the meaning of act July 29, 1850, punishing the burning of vessels..... 300

CUSTOM AND USAGE.

A usage for wharfingers to accept goods arriving at their wharves, as agents for the consignees, would not be valid..... 273

CUSTOMS DUTIES.

Rates of duty.

Crape veils, made of silk, are presumptively embraced within the term "silk veils," unless commercially known as distinctive articles 833

Linen lusters, camlet lusters, toile du nord and lusters composed of linen and cotton, held dutiable as manufactures of cotton not otherwise provided for (Act July 30, 1846), under the rule of construction provided by Act Aug. 30, 1842, § 20.. 770

Invoice: Entry: Appraisal.

Both "draft" and "tare" are allowable on sugar imported in bags, and subject to duty by weight. (Act March 2, 1799, § 58.) 1149

A separate freight paid from Canton to Manilla, where the cargo was transshipped, cannot be added in ascertaining dutiable value. Contra as to other charges at Manilla 289

Under Act Aug. 30, 1842, § 16, the value of the goods at the time of their purchase, and not that at the time of their exportation, is the dutiable value..... 772

Under Act March 3, 1851, goods are to be appraised as at the time of their exportation 824

The 20 per cent. penalty for undervaluation (Act July 30, 1846, § 8) is not limited to cases where an entry has been made, or where the importer, on entry, has added to the invoice cost or value..... 824

Act March 3, 1851, § 1, varies Act July 30, 1846, § 8, only so far as concerns the period of time for valuing imports..... 824

The rates of commissions to be charged to goods to make up their dutiable value (Act Aug. 30, 1842, § 16) must be ascertained in the same manner as the value of the goods. The collector has no power to charge an arbitrary rate..... 999

Payment: Protest.

To recover back unascertained and estimated duties, which are to be afterwards liquidated, a protest is necessary; but it may be made at the time of final liquidation. (Act 1845.)..... 574

The fact that the collector exacts duties in violation of instructions does not supply the want of a protest..... 574

Violations of law: Forfeiture.

Goods are imported and brought into the United States when brought within the limits of a port of entry with the intention of unlading them there..... 483

In a libel filed against a vessel to recover the penalty imposed by Act March 2, 1799, for failure to enter goods on the ship's manifest, it is not necessary to aver a prior seizure..... 479

It is not an essential preliminary that the ship should have been seized, or that proceedings to recover the penalty should have been instituted against the master or owner personally..... 479

Burden of proof held not shifted to claimants on production of reports on file in the customhouse showing that a certain lot of goods seized were found on the vessel not entered on the manifest..... 483

Where a forfeiture is remitted by the secretary of the treasury, pursuant to the statute authorizing him to do so, the cause of forfeiture is released, and any exactions based thereon are illegal.....1045

Customs officers.

The estate of a collector of customs is not entitled to fees or perquisites of the office accruing, after his death, from the official acts of his deputies..... 68

DAMAGES.

See, also, "Contracts"; "Collision"; "Patents."

Damages may be given in the case of an injury to a child from negligence, where there is no other substantial element than physical suffering..... 749

Where a skiff was sunk in a collision, and libelant personally injured, the court allowed, as damages, the value of repairs to the skiff, and compensation for loss of its use, the cost of libelant's cure, compensation for his sufferings and for loss of time, and compensation for permanent injuries 363

Compensation in damages for a permanent partial disability from personal injuries arrived at by the allowance of a sum equal to the amount of such income as the ordinary labor of the injured person would produce for one-third of his expectancy of life according to the mortality tables 363

Punitive damages are given for a personal injury only where it was the result of willful misconduct, or of that reckless indifference to the rights of the injured person which is equivalent to an intentional violation of them..... 304

In an action of covenant, plaintiff having been wrongfully prevented by defendants from completing the work, the measure of damages is the difference between the price agreed to be paid for the work and what it would have cost plaintiff to complete it.....1122

DEATH.

A person absent seven years without being heard from is presumed to be dead... 628

In such case death will be presumed to have occurred at the end of the seven years 561

DEBT, ACTION OF.

A declaration in debt in an action on a simple contract is bad if it allege that defendant "promised" instead of "agreed" to pay, for the action of debt is founded upon a contract..... 177

DEDICATION.

A plat of lands, made out, acknowledged, and recorded by the owner in conformity with the statute, operates as a sufficient conveyance of the streets and public grounds to the public use.....1329

Page

A plat made out and recorded in a different county from where the land is situate does not operate as a dedication....1329

Deeds referring to a plat, but given before the grantor acquired title, do not bind him, as an act of dedication.....1329

But an unequivocal recognition of the map after purchase would operate as an affirmance of the original intention of dedication, and give it full force and effect....1329

User for 20 years, to constitute a dedication by prescription, must be shown to have been adverse, under some real or pretended claim or right, and exclusive...1329

DEED.

See, also, "Acknowledgment"; "Boundaries"; "Vendor and Purchaser."

Under Act Ill. Jan. 24, 1831, a deed of land in Illinois is valid if executed according to the law of the state where it is made 694

Act Va. Dec. 6, 1786, against conveying pretended titles, does not vacate the deed, as between the parties..... 365

In the description of a tract of land, an omission to state the course in one call held to be supplied and rendered certain by the remainder of the description..... 884

The words of the grant are controlled by the habendum..... 524

A clause against the use, in payment of a husband's debts, of any part of land deeded to him for the sole and separate use of his wife, with limitation over on her death to him and her children, held not to apply after the fee passed to him..1130

If a deed purports to be made "for a valuable consideration," it is competent for a person claiming under it to give evidence of a money consideration..... 997

A deed of bargain and sale only passes such estate as the grantor has, and can rightfully convey..... 440

The issue in tail, with assets, are barred by their ancestor's deed of bargain and sale, with warranty; and where other land descends, liable to a charge, it is assets pro tanto..... 440

DEMURRAGE.

Demurrage is recoverable for unnecessary or improper detention in loading or unloading, without an express stipulation therefor..... 952

The shipowner must await his turn for a reasonable time, to be determined by the ordinary volume and exigencies of trade at the place of discharge, where the custom prevails in the trade to unload in the order of arrival..... 952

DEPOSITION.

No notice is required where the witness resides over 100 miles from the place of trial, and the deposition is taken under the statute. (1 Stat. 88. § 30.)..... 86

Notice to the adverse party or his counsel need not be given where neither is within 100 miles of the place of caption..... 365

Notice of time and place of taking is necessary under a joint commission, but if the opposite party fails to join, and the commission issues ex parte, notice is not necessary 86

Service of notice to take may be made by leaving a copy at the party's dwelling house, with a free white person resident in the family..... 86

The probate court of Mississippi being a court of record, and possessing a seal,

the judge thereof is authorized to take depositions, under the statute..... 86
A joint commission to take a deposition must be executed by all the commissioners, though the commissioner named by the adverse party, after proceeding some length in the examination, withdrew, and refused to complete it..... 993
The magistrate need not certify that he was not of counsel for either of the parties, nor interested in the suit..... 365
A deposition before the mayor of a city, under the act of congress, is sufficiently certified "as taken in pursuance of the act," though it be not stated that the witness was cautioned..... 694
A certificate by the officer taking the deposition, of the residence of the witness, and that it is over 100 miles from the place of trial, is sufficient to authorize the reading of the deposition..... 86
It is sufficient if all the interrogatories which accompany a commission are substantially, although not formally, answered 1340
Under an ex parte commission, any of the interrogatories, except the last general one, may be omitted..... 86
Depositions which do not show, either in the caption or body of them, between what parties they were taken, cannot be received 1059
A deposition will not be excluded because defendant's name is omitted from the caption, where it appears in the commission and proceedings..... 86
A party will not be compelled to produce depositions taken by consent..... 678
The circuit court will issue letters rogatory, for the purpose of obtaining testimony, when the government of the place where the evidence is to be obtained will not permit a commission to be executed...1340

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

An adopted child cannot take as next of kin of the adopting parents in the District of Columbia..... 684

DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

A district attorney in Oregon, by virtue of his office, is the attorney for the several counties in his district; and he must prosecute or defend all actions to which such counties may be a party, without reference to the locality of the court..... 741
The county court may employ counsel to assist, but the district attorney is entitled to control the proceedings..... 741

EJECTMENT.

See, also, "Adverse Possession"; "Real Property."

Proof of prior possession is sufficient to maintain ejectment against a mere trespasser 268
Confirmation of a Mexican land grant by the land commissioners and the district court does not vest legal title so as to bar ejectment by one holding a patent from the United States..... 251
The title of a person under whom both parties claim can be denied by neither.... 268
In ejectment by A. against B., a judgment against A. determines nothing as to the validity of B.'s title; and, in a subsequent ejectment by B. against A., B. must show a good title..... 133
In such case, A. may set up a subsequently acquired title..... 133

Page

Defendant, in defense, may either set up his own title, or rely upon the weakness of plaintiff's title. (Civ. Code Or. § 316.)... 741
Deeds conveying pre-emption rights, though invalid, may be received in evidence to prove outstanding title, where the patent has since actually issued..... 747
Nominal damages only can be recovered where there is no evidence of possession by defendant at any time anterior to the date of commencement of the suit..... 720

EMBARGO AND NONINTERCOURSE.

Condemnation of a vessel, and part of her cargo, for a breach of the nonimportation laws 1340
After affirmance of the sentence of condemnation of the district court for a breach of the revenue or nonimportation laws, the court will forthwith, on motion, give judgment against the claimant and his sureties on the bond given upon the delivery of the cargo to him, at the appraised value..1340

A party who desires to rescind a contract on the ground of fraud must offer to return the thing purchased, whether it be land or personal property.....1038
When a contract has been violated in its essential terms, or made impossible of execution, equity will relieve, if it can do so without prejudice 867
Courts of equity possess concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law in matters of account, and will interpose where a court of law could not give adequate redress... 496
A bill to set aside a deed for duress dismissed where there was a delay of 12 years, and defendant had made valuable improvements 1038

ESCAPE.

Though imprisonment for debt is abolished in Michigan, a sheriff is yet liable for permitting the escape of a debtor arrested for fraud under the state statutes..... 242

EVIDENCE.

See, also, "Appeal"; "Deposition"; "Trial"; "Witness."

Judicial notice.

The federal courts take judicial notice of the state laws..... 86
The federal court will take cognizance of the constitution and laws of the state on the subject of her courts, and ascertain which are courts of general jurisdiction..1317
A prize court will take judicial notice of the notorious course of trade between a certain neutral port and blockaded ports of the enemy.....*155

Best and secondary.

Moneys collected by the government on execution may be proved as a credit in a subsequent action on the same bond, against a different party to the bond, without exhibiting the voucher for such payment to the treasury department.....1120
The receipts of a collector of taxes are not evidence on proof of his handwriting, where he is within the jurisdiction of the court 383

Page

If original entries are lost a copy is admissible 707

Declarations and admissions.

Admissions, such as might be considered the natural effusions of mortified pride or vanity, though clear and distinct against a party's interest, are entitled to but little weight as evidence against him.....1139

Declarations by a grantor impeaching his own deed are inadmissible..... 86

In an action for enticing a servant, declarations of the servant are inadmissible.. 283

The declarations of defendant's agent, by whose orders plaintiff had made insurance for defendant's benefit, are not admissible to prove defendant's liability for the premium..... 375

Documentary.

A book of original entries kept by the master of a tug, who was also part owner, held inadmissible to prove cash payments to seamen, there being no other proof of such payments 375

Parol evidence.

An agreement under seal compromising a suit does not prevent either party from setting up and proving a parol undertaking that one of the parties should pay accrued costs 724

Handwriting.

Proof of the handwriting of a deceased subscribing witness, unaided and unopposed by other evidence, held sufficient to establish execution of the instrument....1013

The signature of the grantor in a deed may be proved without first proving the signature of the subscribing witness, where it is shown that he has left the country, and it does not appear that his handwriting can be proved..... 747

Evidence to prove handwriting commented on in charge to jury.....1005

Weight and sufficiency.

The evidence will be regarded as in favor of the party having the greatest number of witnesses, where there is an irreconcilable conflict, and circumstances of suspicion attach to the credit of both sides.....1157

Testimony of the agent of a party that a certain amount was concluded upon after examination of an account current held prima facie sufficient, without producing the account 583

EXECUTION.

See, also, "Attachment"; "Bankruptcy"; "Garnishment"; "Judgment."

The enforcement of an execution in the federal court is governed by the local law and policy 557

Page

Immunity from imprisonment for debt, granted under the state insolvent law, will apply in the case of executions issued out of the federal courts on prior judgments.. 557

Plaintiff may take out a new execution after the expiration of a year and a day, where he has countermanded the original execution at defendant's request, or has been delayed by injunction..... 983

An execution issued on a judgment which does not authorize it may be quashed on motion, and the money made thereon ordered to be refunded, except where there is only a clerical mistake, in which case the execution will be corrected.....1037

A levy upon land, which is not sold for want of bidders, does not render void a subsequent sale of other land on another execution on the same judgment..... 885

The bona fide assignee of a judment may purchase at a sheriff's sale thereon..... 785

A sale on execution of a partner's interest in the firm passes only the debtor's interest in the chattels actually seized on the execution 699

A sale under an execution issued upon a judgment in an action in which the land sold had not been attached, and where there was no service upon the defendant except by publication, is void.....884, 885

After six years' possession under a sheriff's deed made in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, objections to the process and its execution are not available. (Act Pa. March 26, 1785.)..... 778

A purchaser at execution sale is entitled to show that a prior deed by the debtor was fraudulent, as against the execution creditor 275

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

The executors are personally liable for an overpayment to legatees..... 561

An attorney in fact of an executor or administrator cannot maintain suit in his own name for the benefit of the estate.....1278

Exemptions.

See "Bankruptcy."

EXTRADITION.

The specific applications of the definitions of the crimes named in a treaty are determinable in particular cases by the jurisprudence and legislation of the particular places of arrest..... 975

The law of the state in force at the date of the commission of the offense, and at the time of the hearing under the application, will control..... 975

The laws of France, and not those of the United States, form the basis for the inquiry whether an extraditable offense has been committed, under the treaty of November 9, 1843..... 232

A person against whom a complaint has been made and accepted before a judge of instruction in France is a person accused, within the meaning of the extradition treaty 232

Whether the government is bound, under a treaty, to deliver the fugitive, and whether he is within the description of persons named therein as subject to extradition, are questions for the political, not the judicial, department..... 232

Extradition to a foreign country can only be effected through the courts, which must determine the existence of probable cause, and of sufficient evidence to justify putting the accused to trial..... 232

Testimony of a vice consul that he had received official information from his government in respect to the crime and the fugitive, together with verified depositions in proceedings before a judge of instruction in France, with other evidence, held sufficient to justify detaining the fugitive for trial 232

The application may be renewed after a discharge on a previous application in another state, where the case does not appear to have been fully investigated..... 975

An indictment, or its equivalent, in the foreign country, is not necessary to authorize extradition for a crime committed therein 975

Duly certified or attested depositions taken abroad are admissible here, if they would be admissible in the foreign country, in support of the charge of crime..... 975

FACTORS AND BROKERS.

HIGHWAYS.

Liability of towns in Maine for injuries caused by defective highways, and conditions annexed to the right of recovery.... 105
Where a town is liable, under the statute, for a want of repair, and an injury is caused by the united effect of a want of repair and some other cause, the town is not liable..... 105
Town held not liable where plaintiff was injured by a signboard, on an awning over the sidewalk, struck by a passing vehicle, and falling on him..... 105

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

A married woman, under the Alabama married woman's law, cannot mortgage her separate estate, however acquired or held, for her husband's debts..... 503
Property accumulated by the skill and energy of the husband, in engaging in real estate transactions in her name, with her money, will pass to his assignee in bankruptcy *957
Property belonging to the wife may be recovered for in an action brought by the husband, where it was given to him by her 1098
In Arkansas, in 1828, the wife could not join in an action for an injury to her property, though acquired by her personal labor and exertions, or by gift, though she lived apart from her husband..... 714

INDIANS.

The laws of the state of Kansas have no application to the mode of alienation of lands granted to the Miami Indians, so long as the title remains in the patentees.. 989

INJUNCTION.

See, also, "Equity"; "Patents."

Equity will protect by injunction a statutory right, where the title of complainant is free from doubt..... 465
Where a suit in equity is merely for the enforcement of a legal right, and there is any disputable question upon the merits, it is not a proper case for a preliminary injunction 1065
Where a cause is ready for trial, an injunction will not be granted so as to stay the trial.....1073
A temporary injunction cannot be issued by a federal court, except on reasonable notice to the adverse party..... 930
Where there is equity on the face of a bill, an injunction will not be dissolved on the coming in of the answer, unless there is a positive denial of all the material facts from which that equity arises, based on the personal knowledge of the defendant..1337
A denial on information and belief is not sufficient for that purpose.....1337
It is in the sound discretion of the court to continue an injunction, even after answer, where the nature and circumstances of a case require it, and where justice will be attained by that course.....1337
A preliminary injunction staying proceedings in an action at law, or enforcement of a judgment recovered at law, will be dissolved where the answer denies the whole facts alleged as constituting the equity of the bill, and no irreparable mischief will result from such dissolution.... 539
A party can only be relieved from the operation of an injunction absolutely prohibiting a specific act by the court granting the injunction. Subsequent legislative authority is ineffectual..... 978
The court may imprison for a contempt in violating its injunction.....604, 605
The remedy for enforcement of an injunction bond is an action thereon. A court of equity cannot order the obligors to pay the damages sustained by reason of the injunction..... 144

INNKEEPERS.

The hotel keeper is relieved from his special common-law liability where a commercial traveler uses his room for the display of samples..... 1098

The innkeeper, knowing that valuable goods are thus displayed, should use reasonable diligence to protect them..... 1098

An innkeeper, in order to avail himself of the state statute as a defense, must show that he has literally complied with it....1098

Claim for damages for collision of craft passes to assignee under deed of general assignment for benefit of creditors under the Ohio statute.....1012

Discharge under Act 1774 held not valid, unless a copy of the justice's certificate be affixed at the door of the county clerk's office 928

INSURANCE.

See, also, "Marine Insurance."

The recital in the policy that the agents have no power to waive any of its provisions, one of which is that the policy shall be void on nonpayment of premiums when due, does not refer to the first premium recited in the policy as paid..... 312

The sending of the policy to the insured, with directions as to executing the premium notes, and a statement that the cash premium would be called for, held a waiver of payment as a condition of the policy becoming binding 312

Acknowledgment of receipt of premium does not estop the company from denying payment, as between the company and the party for whose benefit the policy is executed 312

The insured is bound by the representations made in the application signed by him or his agent, though written out by the insurer's agent, unless it appear that the answers were not truthfully written out, and the statements were not assented to..1027

Representations in the application, by the beneficiaries of an estate, that they are absolute owners of the property, will vitiate the policy, when such representations are made warranties.....1027

A tender of the premium to an agent of the company is sufficient to prevent a forfeiture, where he has been in the habit of receiving the premiums without objection of the company, though the policy requires payment at the principal office..... 743

A request for a paid-up policy, made to an agent who had received the premiums, but was not employed by the company, held sufficient, where the company did not at once repudiate his actions..... 832

The company is under no obligation to give notice when a life premium is about falling due, though it has been its practice to give such notice..... 743

A promise by the agent to give such notice is not binding on the company unless he was authorized to make it..... 743

Suicide is not evidence of insanity, and, where exemption from the operation of a provision excepting death by suicide is claimed on the ground of insanity, it must be proved 672

Plaintiff must prove that the insured was moved by an irresistible insane impulse, or that his powers of reason were so far overthrown that he could not exercise them in reference to the act of self-destruction 672

"Die by his own hand," as used in policy, held equivalent to "suicide."..... 672

The policy of insurance is not alone sufficient proof of payment of the first premium 375

The liability of the general agent of a company for balance due from his subagents held not removed by the act of the company in receiving balances from subagents after removal of the general agent.1218

The acceptance of mortgages by life companies in Nebraska in 1872 as security for loans was not illegal..... 703

A company suing to recover back money paid for a loss is presumed to have waived all questions of law and fact as to the validity of the policy which they could have raised on paying the loss, except fraud.... 218

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The internal revenue law of 1866 is constitutional and valid..... 263

A receipt for hogshead staves to be paid at a certain price is "a note for the security of money," within the stamp act of 1797 .....680, 1266

A power to represent a creditor in bankruptcy is not subject to stamp duty after March, 1867 1131

Accumulated profits in the hands of a bank, prior to the act of June 30, 1864, is capital, and not income to be taxed thereunder 46

An insurance company owning bank stock is not liable to be taxed on dividends received therefrom, which have already been taxed in the hands of the bank..... 46

The provisions bringing the income tax to a close with the year 1869 did not apply to a tax on the dividends of a railway company. The latter is an excise, not an income, tax 223

Act July, 1870, § 14, providing for a tax on interest, dividends, etc., of corporations, did not include dividends and earnings for the last half of that year..... 223

The penalty of 100 per cent. on reassessment for fraudulent omissions from the return to the assessor (Act March 2, 1867) is not collectible if a sum not legally taxed is included in the reassessment..... 262

The assessor himself must find a false and fraudulent omission whereby the penalty was incurred. Merely adding the penalty, by order of his superior officer, is illegal 262

Failure of a purchaser of property leased for a distillery, with covenants to be subject to the lien of taxes and penalties, to appeal from an assessment thereon, precludes him, in a subsequent action against the collector, from showing that no tax or penalty was in fact due..... 280

Duties or taxes erroneously or illegally assessed and collected may be recovered back from the collector where paid under protest and with notice of an intention to test the validity of the claim.....1316

JUDGMENT.

Validity.

A personal judgment for money or damages against one not a party is a nullity.. 268

Page

The common-law presumption in favor of judgments of courts of record does not apply in cases where defendant is a nonresident and did not appear, and summons was constructively served by publication..1279

In case of service by publication the record must show the facts which bring the case within the statute allowing such service. (Code Or. §§ 55, 56.).....1279

An averment in an affidavit for an order of publication that plaintiff has a just cause of action against defendant for a money demand on account is not sufficient to authorize such order. (Code Or. §§ 55, 56.) 1279

But a verified complaint on file, if it contain a sufficient statement of facts, will sustain the order.....1279

The omission of the order to direct that a copy of the summons and complaint be mailed to defendant is fatal, unless it appear that plaintiff had used reasonable diligence to ascertain defendant's place of residence, and that it was unknown to him1279

Sufficiency of affidavit of publication, under Code Or. § 69.....1279

An averment of due publication of a summons in a judgment entry which appears from the whole record to be untrue or is not affirmatively supported by the facts contained in such record is a nullity, and may be disregarded.....1279

A state may authorize a judgment to be given against a nonresident owner of property within its jurisdiction for the claim of a citizen prior to seizure of such property, and without notice of the proceedings 1279

Rendition and entry.

Form of judgment roll under Code Or. § 269.....1279

Where a judgment is for sterling money, the exchange is to be settled as of the day when the judgment is confessed....1033

Operation and effect.

The federal courts in New York, under Rev. St. § 967, are not vested with discretionary power (Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. § 282) to order real property bound by the lien of a judgment to be exempted therefrom in certain cases during the pendency of an appeal from such judgment.....1119

A judgment against plaintiff in a suit in a state court against an indorser of a note, on the ground that plaintiff was affected by equities existing between original parties, held not a bar to a suit in the federal court against the maker, where a different rule obtained 1208

A judgment respecting a claim to a life insurance policy as a pledge to secure a debt, on the ground that there had been no delivery, is no bar to a bill to enforce performance of the contract to deliver the pledge and for a recovery of the proceeds of the policy.....1103

A decree against plaintiff in a suit for relief from a judgment obtained on a promissory note, on the ground that it was paid, held a bar to a suit to recover back the amount of the judgment paid..... 616

The estoppel of a judgment is not avoided by the fact that an action has since been brought upon it in which defendant pleaded nul tiel record, and plaintiff took a nonsuit..... 265

A judgment in a suit against the sheriff to recover property wrongfully attached, where the creditor appeared and assumed the defense, is binding on the creditor in a suit for the wrongful attachment.....1052

Relief against: Opening: Vacating.

The fact that any interest, however small, will profit thereby, is not sufficient ground to revoke a decree; the preponderance of equity on the whole case will be looked to.. 785

What fraud will justify enjoining or setting aside a judgment.....1067

Matters, such as fraud, which should be pleaded as a defense, are not sufficient grounds after judgment upon which to apply in equity to enjoin process to collect the judgment.....1067

Where, by defendant's own carelessness, a judgment, by clerical mistake, is rendered for too large a sum, the proper remedy to correct it is by application to the court which rendered it. Injunction against its enforcement will not be granted.....1067

Satisfaction and discharge.

A compromise by complainant with some of several judgment debtors as to their portion of the debt does not release the others 584

In such case the other debtors are entitled to a discovery of the amount paid.... 584

Of different jurisdictions.

Where the jurisdiction of a court of special authority appears upon the record, its judgment is of equal force as that of a court of general jurisdiction..... 567

The certificate of the clerk and the seal of the court are sufficient authentication of a judgment of a state court offered in evidence in a federal court sitting in the same state 242

Actions on judgments.

In an action at law in the federal court, or a judgment of another court, defendant cannot set up equitable defenses..... 610

In a suit on a judgment rendered in another state, the statute of limitations of the state where the suit is brought cannot be pleaded 698

JURY.

The seventh amendment of the constitution, in relation to trial by jury, refers exclusively to cases at common law..... 909

Denial of a jury, by a justice, in a case involving over $10, is an error for which his judgment will be vacated..... 284

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

A justice may have jurisdiction where the title to a chattel comes incidentally in question, as where a bond in suit is to be void if a certain chattel is not the property of a certain person..... 710

A debt of $50 on which interest is due is not recoverable before a justice in the District of Columbia..... 283

Where a debt in an amount above the jurisdiction is settled by giving separate notes within the jurisdiction, separate suits may be maintained thereon after all become due 685

A justice's judgment in an action of debt, for an amount within his jurisdiction, against the surety on a constable's official bond, is not absolutely void, though the proper remedy was by action on the bond, which was for an amount beyond the jurisdiction 272

A justice of the peace in Alexandria county, D. C., has no power to issue a cap. ad resp. or warrant of arrest for a small debt before judgment 457

Upon appeal from the justice's judgment, the cause is to be tried de novo..... 446

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

A stipulation providing for the right of removal at the end of the term of fixtures put in by the lessee on condition only that he has performed all his covenants creates a valid lien for rent on trade fixtures annexed to the freehold, but does not apply to mere furniture 845

A lessee evicted by a third person claiming under the lessor, who fraudulently represented that he had title, may recover damages from him 831

A person who agreed to rent premises and pay the rent for another is liable, though he did not occupy the premises..... 678

LIENS.

See, also, "Admiralty"; "Bankruptcy"; "Maritime Liens"; "Mechanics' Liens"; "Shipping."

The parties may agree that the possession and use of the property may be retained by the debtor until the creditor shall assert his rights against it as a security for the debt..... 527

One having the legal title to land, half of which in equity belongs to another, cannot have a debt against the latter satisfied out of the land in preference of other creditors 699

A lien given by state law for pasturing stock held waived by voluntarily surrendering possession thereof, and allowing a sale without claiming a lien..... 492

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

See, also, "Adverse Possession"; "Ejectment"; "Equity"; "Maritime Liens."

Construction of the California statute of limitations of 1863 in relation to claims to real property under Spanish or Mexican titles 628

At law the Virginia statute of limitations of 20 years is applied only against a grant; but in equity it operates to bar an equitable title by analogy to a case at law 334

The statute of limitations does not run against the government..... 331

A tax deed which shows upon its face that legal notice of the sale was not given is void, and does not set running the statute of limitations..... 668

In the case of fraud the statute begins to run from the time the fraud was discovered 518

A court of equity will not relieve against fraud after 20 years from its discovery; and, when the statute is set up in bar, the bill must show when and how the fraud was discovered 680

An amendment introducing a new title affecting the interests of new parties has the effect of an original bill so far as the statute of limitations is concerned..... 334

The offer of terms of compromise is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations.....1296

The defendant cannot avail himself of the statute of limitations upon the general issue 1267

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

Plaintiff must prove both malice and want of probable cause.....993, 1057

Probable cause is a reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in believing that the accused was guilty 993

It seems that the advice of counsel is not a protection unless the party gave a full and true statement of facts within his knowledge, and acted upon it in good faith for an honest purpose..... 993

Page

The existence of malice is a question of fact for the jury..... 993

Probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact. Whether the circumstances alleged are true is a question of fact. Whether, if true, they amount to probable cause, is a question of law.....993, 1057

The record in the action in which plaintiff was held to bail, where the date of the return of the writ was misstated in the declaration, held not admissible in support of the count for damages, but admissible as evidence of malice on the other counts. 993

Plaintiff cannot set up a claim to punitive damages where he was guilty of gross fraud in the transaction out of which the charge of crime arose..... 993

MARINE INSURANCE.

See, also, "Average."

The insured need not disclose prior insurance 1048

On insurance on goods on a voyage to Charleston, lost or not lost, general knowledge of underwriters of severe gales on the coast of Carolina will not relieve the insured from the duty of communicating a letter giving particulars of a hurricane... 891

Damage to barley caused by vapor arising from other barley which was reached by sea water held not caused by "actual contact with sea water," within the terms of the policy 1293

Under a valued policy made without notice of a prior insurance, containing the usual clause as to prior insurance, the insurer can only be called upon for the portion of such value left uncovered by the prior insurance 1048

Where only a partial loss is claimed, the insurer cannot claim an abandonment....1048

Abandonment to the insurers and satisfaction of the policy vests insurers with all the present rights and remedies of the insured which may be presented or proceeded upon in admiralty in the insurers' names..1082

MARITIME LIENS.

See, also, "Admiralty"; "Affreightment"; "Bottomry and Respondentia"; "Charter Parties"; "Demurrage"; "Salvage"; "Seamen"; "Shipping."

The right to a lien.

A maritime lien is the right which a creditor has in a thing of another, which right consists in the power to cause the thing to be sold in order to have the debt paid out of the price..... 728

Maritime liens cannot be created by state statute 569

An insurance premium is not a maritime lien on the vessel.....1078

The master of a vessel has no maritime lien for his compensation as such..... 604

Furnishing timber for use in building a particular vessel gives a lien on her..... 25

A maritime lien exists for supplies furnished to a vessel in a foreign port, which were necessary and were furnished on the credit of the vessel, unless the necessity for such credit be disproved by proper evidence..1242

A person who furnishes provisions to a vessel not in her home port may have a lien therefor, although he knows that the master has taken her on shares, and is to victual and man her..... 605

The presumption is that necessary supplies are furnished on the credit of the vessel 216

Supplies furnished on the order of an agent known to represent the charterers held not furnished on the credit of the vessel 214

Where the owners permitted a railroad using the vessel to appoint a steward, with authority to procure supplies, held, that they thereby consented that supplies might be procured in a foreign port on the vessel's credit 216
A suit in rem cannot be maintained here for repairs made to a Canadian vessel in Canada, where the local law gives no lien.. 68

Priority and enforcement.
An hypothecation of a vessel by her owner, to secure a pre-existing debt, which, in its origin, gave no lien on the vessel, gives no priority to such hypothecation over a prior maritime lien on the vessel.....1242
The master's claim for advances for board of crew and purchase of supplies may be allowed out of the proceeds in the registry 604

Waiver: Discharge: Extinguishment.
A maritime lien is not waived or extinguished by giving credit for a limited time, nor by the acceptance of a note for the amount due.....1150
The discount of the note by the lienor, which he subsequently takes up, does not extinguish the lien.....1150
The acceptance of a note, indorsed by a third person, where the same is returned on not being paid at maturity, held no waiver of the lien..... 695

Liens under state laws.
The lien on a vessel arising in her home port is regulated exclusively by the local law 1146
Under the Maryland statute, there is a lien, enforceable in the federal courts, for material and labor used in repairing sails and tackle, but not for groceries..... 282
The remedy by proceedings in rem against vessels given by Laws Mich. 1864, p. 107, is an exercise of admiralty jurisdiction, and the act and the liens given thereunder are void..... 569
Liens under the New York statute for supplies held should be paid in the order of the filing of the libels, and not in the order of filing specifications..... 452
The departure of a river steamboat on her daily trip is a "leaving of the port," within Laws N. Y. 1862, c. 482, requiring the filing of specifications of lien within 12 days therefrom..... 601

MASTER AND SERVANT.

The master is liable for injuries to a servant from the negligence of an incompetent fellow servant, in whose employment the master did not use ordinary care..... 304

MECHANICS' LIENS.

A mortgage recorded before the filing of a mechanic's lien is entitled to priority.... 723

MINES.

A broad metalliferous zone having within its limits true fissure veins, plainly bounded, cannot be regarded as a single vein or lode, although such zone may itself have boundaries which can be traced..... 918
Under a location of a certain number of feet along the ledge, without any distinct claim of side ground, held, that the locator was entitled to hold 100 feet on each side of the ledge, under the mining law..... 918
Act May 10, 1872, § 3, confirms prior locations under the act of 1866, as to all lodes which have their apexes within the surface lines of the mining claims..... 918
The owner of contiguous claims may form one general system, adapted and intended to work them all, and work in furtherance of the system is work on all the claims intended to be developed by it.... 918
Work done anywhere within the surface lines on the surface, or below the surface, on any lode within the lines extended vertically, is work on the claim, within Rev. St. § 2324..... 918
Work done outside of a claim, for the purpose of prospecting or developing it, is equally available as work done within the boundaries 918
Forfeitures are odious in law, and must clearly appear before courts will enforce them 918

MORTGAGES.

See, also, "Acknowledgment"; "Chattel Mortgages"; "Shipping."

The mortgagee may sue at law on his bond, and in equity to foreclose, at the same time 836
Where the trustees of a railroad mortgage are in such a position that they cannot alone properly represent the bondholders, the latter may sue to foreclose without showing a refusal by the trustees to do so.. 25
A receiver will not be appointed unless it clearly appears that the security is inadequate, or there is imminent danger of the waste, removal, or destruction of the mortgaged property, or the rents and profits have been expressly pledged..... 836
The exercise of this power depends upon sound discretion, and is governed, to a great extent, by the circumstances of each particular case..... 836

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

See, also, "Railroad Companies."

A by-law of Alexandria, D. C., requiring the master to pay a poll tax for his journeyman, held not repugnant to the general law of the land, and authorized by the charter 761
Construction of the charter of Washington, D. C., in relation to the nomination and confirmation of officers..... 357
A person rejected by the board of aldermen of Washington, D. C., on the mayor's nomination, cannot be reappointed by the mayor, in the recess of the same board, to the same office for which he was rejected by the board..... 357
The mere erection of a railroad bridge in a particular location in a town, after a controversy with the inhabitants, does not amount to a perpetual contract, precluding the company from changing the location of the bridge..... 412
Bonds made payable out of the state, without express authority of law, are not for that reason invalid, but such provision is not enforceable.....1127
The recitals in a municipal bond issued to aid a plank-road company bind the city, in an action by a bona fide holder.....1127
Holders of legal bonds received from a city in exchange for previous illegal obligations given for bona fide debts may recover thereon, if they had no part in the illegal issue, though they had notice of all the facts 48

Navigable Waters.

See "Bridges"; "Constitutional Law."

NEGLIGENCE.

Page

An unguarded railroad tunnel in a street held a nuisance, the continuance of which rendered the receivers of the road liable for damages for an injury of which it was the proximate cause..... 749

A child four years old is, in law, incapable of negligence; and the burden of showing contributory negligence on the part of his parents, imputable to him, is upon the one against whom damages are claimed for an injury caused by negligence..... 749

The mere fact that a child four years of age strayed a distance of more than two blocks from home, at play with other children, is not, of itself, evidence of contributory negligence on the part of its parents.. 749

A boy of eight years, who is permitted to play in the streets, will be deemed capable of contributory negligence..... 285

Where a boy was killed by attempting to jump on an engine moving through a street, held, that there was no liability, unless defendant could have avoided the accident by ordinary care..... 285

NEUTRALITY LAWS.

What equipments in our ports amount to a breach of neutrality..... 651

Equipment for war in a neutral port does not take place merely by alteration of two ports in repairing the waist of a vessel previously armed..... 653

The carrying on from the United States of an expedition against a neutral power is an offense, though the association originated in another country.....1274

It is unimportant whether the persons engaged in such a purpose engage the whole vessel to themselves, or depart from the United States as passengers.....1274

Actual fitting out and arming in the United States is not necessary to subject to forfeiture a vessel in part prepared for hostilities therein.....*178

Proof that the vessel was fitted out and armed, or that there was an attempt to fit and arm her, with the unlawful intent to cruise against a neutral nation, is sufficient, without identifying the persons engaged therein.....*178

A vessel alleged to have been fitted out and armed in violation of the neutrality laws will be condemned, where the government's evidence raises a well-grounded suspicion, which claimants fail to explain....*178

Evidence to acquit or condemn, in the case of a vessel arrested for breach of the neutrality laws, must, in the first instance, come from the vessel taken, the persons on board, and the examination on oath of the officers 651

On a libel for forfeiture of a vessel for a violation of neutrality laws (Act 1818), the question of ownership of the vessel is not material *178

NEW TRIAL.

In detinue, a new trial will not be granted because the damages are excessive, as defendant may discharge the judgment by restoring the property..... 476

Affidavits of jurors cannot be received to show how the instructions of the court were received..... 476

NUISANCE.

The use of a steam railroad lawfully constructed, in the absence of any abuse, is not a public nuisance..... 332

Page

The abuse of the use of a steam railroad, if general and common to all owners of adjacent property, cannot be enjoined at the suit of an individual owner..... 332

OATH.

A witness must be sworn in such a way as is binding on his conscience..... 120

The oath of a Chinaman, taken on the Bible, in the usual way, held sufficient, where, on examination, it appeared that he felt solemnly bound by it..... 120

PARTIES.

That the trustees of a railroad mortgage file a cross bill in a suit to foreclose another mortgage does not make a bondholder under the first mortgage a party to the suit by representation..... 25

One who purchases pendente lite the interest of a defendant in the subject-matter of a suit does not thereby become a necessary party to the suit, and if the court has no jurisdiction of him he cannot be compelled to come in as a party.....1105

Parties, at law, or in equity, may waive process and appear.....1334

PARTITION.

The court of common pleas in Ohio may take jurisdiction of a bill for partition in two counties, but the decree, to bind purchasers, must be recorded where the land lies 1334

PARTNERSHIP.

Persons who advance money for an enterprise run in another's name, with an option to share in the profits, or to receive back their money with interest, are not partners in the business..... 708

Persons assuming to act as a corporation, under a corporate name, without authority of law, are liable, as copartners, for the debts of the association..... 10

To charge a secret partner with debts of the firm, it must be shown that the debts were contracted in the name and business of the firm, or that he had an interest in the contract or profits..... 989

Where the purchaser of a note made by a firm did not know of any secret partners, and the note was made for the individual benefit of those whose names appeared thereon, held, that the secret partners were not liable..... 989

In an attempt to form a limited partnership under the New York statute, the contribution by the special partner of a stock of goods, together with cash, instead of cash alone, results in a general partnership 82

The bill of an unincorporated company should be prosecuted in the names of the original partners, and not in the name of the company..... 171

PARTY WALLS.

It is a condition annexed to the title of lots in the city of Washington, D. C., that the proprietor shall reimburse the adjoining owner a moiety of the charge of such part as he shall use of a partition wall built by him..... 315

The city surveyor must attend, when requested, and adjust the line of the front of the building, and his certificate is binding on the parties..... 315

The value of the half of such part used may be recovered in an action upon the case in assumpsit..... 315

PATENTS.

The commissioner of patents.

The statute, by defining the conditions under which the power conferred to issue patents shall be exercised, necessarily excluded all others 879

Patentability.

Merit or utility, however slight, will entitle the inventor to a patent..... 366

If a device is new, and accomplishes beneficial results, the court will not gauge by any nice standard the degree of inventive genius required 276

A discovery of a new principle, force, or law, operating, or which can be made to operate, on matter, will not entitle the discoverer to a patent 879

The discoverer can only secure exclusive control of such discovery through the means by which he has brought it into practical action, or their equivalent..... 879

Neither the natural functions of an animal upon which, or through which, a new force or principle may be designed to operate, nor any of the useful purposes to which it may be applied, can form any essential part of a patentable combination with it.. 879

New articles of manufacture are not patentable, unless their production involved the exercise of invention or discovery beyond what was necessary to construct the apparatus for their manufacture or production.. 384

A claim to the use of two deflecting plates, one on each side of a saw, sustained, as not being a mere duplication, although a single deflecting plate had before been used.....*1110

A patent for abdominal supporters for well-formed persons held not anticipated on oral testimony of the construction of several supporters "of the same general character" for deformed patients..... 658

Two prior patents, which, taken together, would have made up the invention of the patentee, will not anticipate his invention, where neither of them alone shows the complete invention 1001

The construction of articles as experiments, never made public, and ultimately abandoned and lost, does not affect the right of a subsequent original inventor of substantially the same article to take out a patent therefor 1034

Who may obtain patent.

A patentee cannot take out a new patent for the same invention until his first patent is surrendered, repealed, or declared void 818

A verdict, in a suit on the second patent, in favor of the patentee, does not avoid the first patent 818

Priority of invention is not affected by the fact that a later inventor first perfected machines for manufacturing the patented product 540

The fact that a subsequent equivalent invention makes a more durable product will not affect the question of priority..... 540

Prior public use or sale.

The invention should not be known or used as the invention of any other person than the patentee before the application for a patent. (Act 1793, § 1.)..... 818

The commissioner has authority to examine and decide the question of prior public use or sale. (Act 1836, § 6.)..... 935

Public use while the inventor is practicing upon the invention with a view to improve it before applying for a patent does not invalidate the patent. (Act 1793.)..... 818

Abandonment: Laches. Page

The withdrawal of an application, and receiving back the $20 fee, is an abandonment of the claim; and a new application will not relate back, so as to avoid the effect of a prior public use..... 935

An inventor is not prejudiced by a delay in applying for a patent, where he is diligently experimenting as to other forms of the same invention, and machinery to perfect it, especially as against one having notice of his claims..... 540

Appeals from commissioner's decision.

The commissioner is the sole judge of the circumstances under which he shall furnish information and suitable references to the applicant, to enable him to correct his application. No cause of appeal is furnished by a supposed omission of his duty in this particular 1000

Validity.

A patent wanting in any substantial statutory requisite is a nullity, and confers no right to the patentee..... 563

The patentee may embrace two improvements of the same machine in one patent.. 809

The patentee cannot embrace both the process and the product in the same claim. 113

Extent of claim.

The patentee is not confined to his summary, but the whole specification and the drawings may be referred to, to ascertain the extent of the claim..... 809

Where a patent is for several improvements in a machine, and each is summed up in the patent as the invention of the patentee, he is bound by his summary, and if any one of the improvements is found not to be new his patent is void..... 655

A claim for "the above-described new manufacture of * * *, by treating them substantially as hereinafter described," held to be a claim for the process, and not the product 113

Repeal of patent.

A suit to repeal a patent, except in cases stated in Act 1836, § 16, and Act 1839, § 10, cannot be brought either in a state court, or the federal circuit court..... 153

Reissue: Disclaimer.

The principles governing the awarding and granting of reissues of patents, and the effect of the commissioner's decision, considered 384

Claiming for a new article of manufacture, if by inadvertence and mistake, may be cured by a reissue for a combination and arrangement of parts..... 276

A second reissue may be granted under Act 1836 873

The presumption of law is that the commissioner has done his duty in granting a reissue, and the question is not open for re-examination, except on the ground of fraud 366

In the absence of fraud, the only mode of impeaching a reissue, on the ground that it is for a different invention, is by showing such difference on the face of the instrument 276

In an infringement suit, the question whether a reissue is for the same invention is one for the court, upon a comparison with the original. Matters of fact connected with the surrender and reissue are closed by the granting of the reissue..... 224

The recital in a reissue of a prior assignment, and the granting of the reissue to the assignee, make a prima facie case of title 276

The concurrence of a transferee of an interest for a given territory is not necessary to the validity of a reissue..... 244

The claims in the reissue may be broader than those in the original..... 873

Page

A construction or mode of operating a machine, described or distinctly referred to, but not claimed, in the original, may be claimed in a reissue..... 825
The surrender of a patent for a reissue is a conclusive admission that the original patent has no validity to support an action for an infringement 563

Assignment.
The assignment of a patent, or the right to a patent pending, held not to include the right to an extended term..... 937
A transferee of the patentee's interest for a state is entitled to the benefit of a reissue, if he ratifies the same, though he did not join in the surrender. Acceptance of the reissue, and an assignment of a part interest therein, is a ratification..... 244

Licenses.
The contracts of a patentee to share his invention with third persons are interpreted and enforced in the same manner as other legal engagements..... 867
A license defined, and the instrument in question held to be merely a license.....1325
The mere taking of a license does not estop the licensee denying the validity of the patent 494

Infringement—What constitutes.
There is no infringement where defendant produces the same result by means substantially different from the patented device; otherwise where the contrivances are substantially the same..... 809
Where several improvements are distinctly claimed in a patent, an action lies for the piracy of any one, although defendants have not used the whole of the improvements 655
The manufacture of certain articles capable of being used in making up certain parts of a patented combination, and with the intention that they should be so used, is not an infringement, where they are separately useful for numerous purposes..... 392

—— Who liable.
One who purchases patented articles from a licensee, with knowledge of his having repudiated his contract with the patentee, is liable on a sale of such articles.. 658

—— Remedy generally.
There is no right of action for an infringement occurring under the original and void patent, and before the reissue of a new patent..... 563
Equity will entertain jurisdiction of a suit for infringement of a patent to prevent a multiplicity of suits..... 909

—— Preliminary injunction.
A jury trial of the alleged infringement is not a prerequisite to the granting of an injunction 909
Where the case is clear and without reasonable doubt, the court will grant an injunction without sending plaintiff to law to try his right..... 909
A verbal admission of infringement and a promise to desist is a strong circumstance against defendant 875
In the case of a simple mechanism, a bare inspection is sufficient on the question of infringement..... 875
The grant of a subsequent patent will not prevent the granting of an injunction where the infringement is clear..... 875
Defendants will be estopped by averments in their answer from setting up facts to the contrary by affidavits..... 875
When there is no danger of loss to plaintiff, and great loss will result to defendant, the case must be substantially free from doubt to justify an injunction..... 822

Page

Whether defendant is fully responsible for any profits or damages which may be decreed against him is material..... 822
That defendant does not make or vend the patented machine, but only uses it, is also material..... 822
Where a motion for a new trial or an appeal taken by defendant cannot be considered as intended merely for delay, the court will await the final result before awarding an injunction..... 822
The court cannot ignore the rights of defendant claiming under an adverse patent because of irregularity in its issue, and assume it to be a nullity..... 494
Where the validity of a patent has not been adjudicated, exclusive possession and enjoyment for some time must be shown to entitle plaintiff to a preliminary injunction 494
And in such case the machine or patented thing must have been brought into use 494
Denied in the absence of proof of exclusive possession or public acquiescence, or of a trial at law.....1065
Denied where the construction of the claim alleged by defendant had not been acquiesced in by the public, and the novelty of the device was shown to be doubtful 937
Denied, on defendant's giving security, where he was constructing a single machine only, and the validity of the patent and public acquiescence were denied..... 829
Granted where complainant's possession had been acquiesced in for a long time by the public, and for some time by defendant 871
Granted where the novelty was not disproved by the facts set up in defense, and complainant had been in exclusive possession of the monopoly for years..... 301
On a motion to dissolve an injunction, defendant will not be allowed to present facts showing an anticipation which he might have presented on the motion for the injunction.....1231

—— Procedure.
A mere licensee under a patent cannot sue, in equity, for the infringement of his rights under the patent, without joining with him, as plaintiff, the owner of the legal title.....1325
Where suit is brought for the infringement of several patents for different improvements, not necessarily embodied in the construction and operation of any one machine, the bill must contain an explicit averment that the infringing machines contain all the improvements embraced in the several patents, or it will be bad for multifariousness 1311
A plea setting forth that the alleged selling, if any such was made by defendant, was made solely as agent, etc., of a person not named, held bad 852
Defendants allowed to strike out an admission in their answer of the making of certain articles as to which an injunction was sought..... 728
A licensee who has elected to put an end to his license, and denies the validity of the patent, cannot subsequently set up the license as a defense to a suit for infringement 658
The owner of the entire right in the territory where the infringements had taken place allowed to make a disclaimer after final hearing.....*1110
Costs not allowed to plaintiffs on a recovery where a disclaimer was not filed before suit brought.....*1110

—— Evidence.
Proof showing the prior state of the art cannot be considered for purposes of anticipation when that issue is not raised by the pleadings..... 276

The opinions of experts are admissible to determine questions of mechanical difference 809 — Injunction and its violation.

In a suit to recover the forfeiture and penalty imposed by Act Feb. 21, 1793, § 5, the court will also grant a perpetual injunction 873

Injunction will not be granted where the patent is recent, the specification obscure, and proof of infringement meager and unsatisfactory, but the court will retain the bill and require complainant to bring an action at law.....1065 — Accounting: Damages.

In the case of a patent for an ornamental chain as a new article of manufacture, the patentee is not limited to the advantage derived from the use of the peculiar features of the patented chain over what would have been derived from those open to the public..... 961

Damages cannot be trebled in a suit in equity. (Act July 4, 1836, § 14.)..... 909

Various particular inventions and patents.

Boots and shoes. No. 127,090, for forming heel stiffeners, construed, and held not infringed 565

Braces. No. 35,856 (reissue No. 4,187), and No. 73,279, for improvements in bit stocks and braces, held valid and infringed 370

Braces. Reissue No. 6,350 (original No. 62,232), for improvement in stocks or braces for bits and other tools, held valid and infringed 369

Brush heads. No. 98,787, for improvement, held valid and infringed.....1034, 1036

Car wheels. No. 110,779, for improvement in casting car wheels, construed.....1276

Chains. Reissue No. 5,774 (original No. 147,045), for improvement in chains and chain links for necklaces, etc., held valid and infringed..... 959

Cigar molds. Reissue No. 6,662 (original No. 155,806), for improvement, held valid and infringed..... 366

Circular saws. No. 10,965, for clamps for circular saws, held valid and infringed..1108

Clothes wringers. Reissue No. 2,829 (original No. 21,029), for improvement, construed as limited by prior patents, and held not infringed..... 224

Clothes wringers. Reissue No. 5,223 (original No. 61,680), for improvement, construed, limited, and held not infringed.... 227

Egg beaters. No. 23,694, for improvement, construed, and held not infringed.... 604

Ether. No. 4,820, for an improvement in surgical operations by the use of ether, held invalid..... 879

Gas meter. No. 12,535, for benzole vapor apparatus, held valid and infringed...1001

Glass cutter. No. 91,150, for improved tool for cutting glass, held valid, and infringed.....589; contra, 592

Glue. Reissue No. 4,072, for improvement in manufacture, held invalid for lack of invention..... 384

Hook. Reissue No. 2,166 (original No. 21,879), for an improvement in self-mousing or snap hooks, held valid and infringed.. 276

India rubber shoes. Reissue No. 4,977 (original No. 111,962), for an improvement, construed, and held void for want of novelty 246

Lamps. No. 30,381 (reissue No. 6,844), for improvement, held invalid..... 309

Oils. No. 90,284, for improved manufacture of heavy hydrocarbon oils, construed 113

Padlocks. No. 35,030, for improvement, construed, and held not infringed..... 350

Petroleum. No. 49,502, for improved process for purifying, held valid and infringed 1215

Saw. No. 10,965, for improved machine for sawing thin boards, held valid and infringed *1110

Seed drills. Nos. 30,685 and 31,819, for improvements, construed, and held not infringed 700

Sewing machines. Munson's claim for tucking gauge held anticipated by patent No. 11,615.....1000

Springs. Reissue No. 4,202 (original No. 10,280), for an improvement in combined India rubber and steel springs, held valid and infringed.....1232

Telegraph. Patents to Morse, Nos. 1,647 (reissues Nos. 79 and 117), and 4,453 (reissue No. 118), and 6,420, held to cover both the result and the process, and to be valid and infringed.....871, 873

Whip sockets. Reissue No. 4,071 (original No. 52,439), for an improvement in whip sockets, construed, and held not infringed 72

Whip sockets. Reissue No. 5,713 (original No. 43,858), for attachments for fastening whip sockets to carriages, construed, and held not infringed..... 74

Wood-bending machine. No. 14,405 (reissue No. 1,312), for improvement, construed, and held valid.....809, 825

Wood pulp. No. 21,161, for improvement in reducing wood to paper pulp, held valid and infringed..... 301

PAYMENT.

A receipt of payment by a note is not conclusive, but only prima facie evidence of payment..... 695

The receipt of a bond of a third person "in part pay" of a precedent debt is conclusive evidence of payment to that extent, although the obligor was insolvent when the receipt was given..... 956

The acceptance of a deed of land in payment of a debt bars an action for the debt; and, if the title be defective, the creditor must look to his warranty..... 365

Payment must be presumed as to installments due on a bond after 20 years, and may be presumed after 19 years and 10 months 317

PILOTS.

It is not the mere clearance for a port, but being actually bound into it, that imposes on a vessel the obligation to pay a pilot 1175

Pilots held not entitled to fees on tender and refusal of services to vessels passing through Boston harbor, bound to Lynn and Dorchester. (Rev. St. Mass. c. 32, §§ 15–22.) 1175

The inference that no pilot was employed on board a vessel which refused libelant's offer of services may be drawn from the fact that the master admitted the correctness of libelant's claim, and no evidence of employment was given.....1311

PLEADING AT LAW.

Proper form of declaration in assumpsit...1102

Facts stated in a defense do not amount to an estoppel unless pleaded as such..... 741

Form of plea of estoppel..... 741

A general plea of fraud is not admissible..1033

A plea which argumentatively denies a fact averred in the declaration is demurrable 929

A plea of payment referring to the instrument sued on, as a "supposed writing obligatory," is nevertheless good, and those words may be rejected as surplusage.....1033

A plea in abatement of another suit pending in the usual form need not allege that such suit was not discontinued before the plea was filed.....1317
Certificate of counsel that, in his opinion, the plea is well founded, need not accompany a plea of abatement in the federal court 1317
Defendant may plead the statute of limitations at the first term after office judgment 748
In assault and battery, the plaintiff, being a mulatto, cannot, at the trial upon the general issue, be compelled to prove his freedom 1047
An averment of a contract of hiring "for a certain price" is supported by proof of an agreement to serve in consideration of a payment to a third person..... 283
An amendment making new parties will not be allowed..... 809
The court may refuse to allow an amendment by striking out the name of one of the plaintiffs in the suit..... 714
Amendments may be made at any time before judgment, and in some cases afterwards 1314
A misnomer may be amended after plea in abatement, the plea being the basis thereof 1314
Leave given defendant to amend, on payment of costs of the term, or a continuance, at plaintiff's option..... 284

PLEADING IN ADMIRALTY.

See, also, "Maritime Liens"; "Salvage"; "Seamen."

Claims for wages and for moneys advanced to the use of the ship may be united in an action in rem..... 31
A seaman claiming both wages and moneys advanced to the ship's use may join in a libel in rem with another seaman claiming wages only, but not in a libel in personam 31
Remedies in rem and in personam may ordinarily be sought in one suit, where the vessel and master or owner are conjointly liable; but, by the thirteenth admiralty rule, the supreme court has forbidden the vessel and owner to be joined in a libel for wages.. 31
Pleas or exceptions in admiralty need not embody the formalities required in pleading at common law or in equity, but they must set forth the matter in dispute in perspicuous and definite terms.....1253
The allegations and proofs must coincide. The court cannot hear evidence not in accordance with the issues..... 878
Amendments to libels for forfeitures in admiralty, in substance or in form, are within the discretion of the court at any time....*178
The court will allow amendments upon terms, even upon the hearing of an appeal.. 878

PLEADING IN EQUITY.

Statement of locality or place of business of the corporation complainant held not necessary 1222
Bill not sworn to, praying injunction and discovery under oath, held sufficient on demurrer 1222
Under a prayer for general relief, such relief may be given as the pleadings and proofs warrant, though complainant is not entitled to the relief specifically prayed for.. 692
Where a plaintiff in equity, instead of setting down the defendant's plea for argument, replies to it, he admits its sufficiency as a defense, if the facts it alleges shall be established.....1105

Page

Defendant, in his answer, cannot introduce new matter in the nature of a cross bill, and require plaintiff and others under whom he claims to answer it..... 762
A defect in suing respondents as a partnership, when in fact they are a corporation, may be cured by amendment.....1276

PLEADING UNDER STATE CODES.

A pleading of a county, not subscribed by the proper district attorney, is not duly subscribed, and may be stricken out of the case. (Civ. Code Or. §§ 79, 103)..... 741
The statement of new matter in the answer must be concise, and must constitute a defense to the action. The ultimate facts, and not the evidence of them, must be stated. (Civ. Code Or. § 316.)..... 741

PRACTICE AT LAW.

The court will not enforce the private agreements of counsel..... 678
A bank will not be required, on motion, to produce books and papers, when it does not appear that a subpœna duces tecum, directed to the proper officers of the bank, would not suffice..... 53
A circuit court cannot compel compliance with an order to produce books or writings, but, in case of noncompliance, may give judgment as by default..... 53
Under peculiar circumstances, the court refused to stay proceedings in an action on a stay bond given in a state court, unless defendant instituted a plenary auxiliary suit in equity to restrain the prosecution of the action, so that a review might be had.. 59
The federal circuit courts have no power to grant a peremptory nonsuit, against the will of plaintiff..... 304
Upon a demurrer to evidence, every fact which can be reasonably inferred from the evidence is taken as admitted..... 304

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY.

A cross action cannot be maintained which seeks a retrial of matters already adjudicated between the parties.....1253
A party seeking to set aside proceedings against him must embody all objections presumably known to him at the time in one application.....1314
It may be shown, in opposition to a motion to set aside all proceedings for want of verification of the libel, that the oath was in fact regularly and duly administered, though the clerk's name was not subscribed 1314
On a libel to recover possession of a vessel, where respondent appealed, the court refused leave to bond the vessel, but directed that the decree be executed unless the appeal was perfected in two days..... 954
On a dispute between the master and owners of a British vessel, the court ordered possession to be delivered to the owners on payment of a sum to secure the payment of any sum found due to the master on a suit to be instituted by him within 20 days..... 954
In giving bond to relieve property taken by a clause of foreign attachment, defendant must pay costs of the motion before he can defend on the merits..... 290
Where property is attached in a suit in personam, after return of "Not found," respondents must pay costs of the attachment before they can defend on the merits 290

Proper procedure where cargo is arrested under a claim of a lien on the freight due for its transportation..... 586
Under an order of reference to ascertain the amount, if any, due libelant, entered by consent, after defendant's default, defendant can only contest libelant's claim.. 501
A report of a commissioner as to the amount of libelant's claim is not objectionable, in omitting a detail of the allowances, unless defendant has demanded a specification 501
In a suit upon stale claims, not resting upon express contract, the court, in rendering a decree for libelant, may refuse interest 503

PRACTICE IN EQUITY.

On a motion to send to a jury issues arising on a petition against a receiver for injuries causing death, the court may determine whether the case is one for damages, and, if it finds adversely, may finally dismiss the petition 285
Where a decree is satisfied, the execution thereon will be arrested on motion, without a new bill..... 584

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

See, also, "Factors and Brokers"; "Master and Servant."

Contract of insurance company with agent construed in relation to right to discontinue the agency, and the right of the agent to commissions on future premiums.1073
Persons employed to charter a vessel, according to specific directions, held to be special agents, without power to bind their principal to a different contract..... 62
A merchant, knowing that the supercargo of a vessel is the agent of several shippers, having separate interests, cannot take from him cargo of one shipper in payment of the debt of another..... 78
A merchant in the habit of effecting insurance for another, and neglecting to do so when ordered, is himself liable for the loss, as an insurer, and is entitled to the premium 829

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.

A bond executed in blank by the surety, and subsequently filled in by the principal, is binding in the hands of an obligee without notice 1079
An agent's bond is not invalidated by being left blank in regard to the place of agency 1079
If an agent gives a trust deed to secure payment of a defalcation, the cancellation of the deed upon subsequent payment in full of that defalcation would not affect the agent's surety on a subsequent bond.....1079
If the agent, at the time of the signing of the bond, had moneys in his hands which he ought to have reported as collected, but had not, they would come within the condition of the bond.....1079
In order for the surety to escape liability on the ground of existing irregularities and defalcations of the agent, it must be shown that these were known to the principal 1079
New sureties are not responsible for prior defalcations, unless the conditions of the new bond shall embrace them.....1120
When a question arises between liabilities of sureties on different bonds of different dates, the general doctrine of the application of payment does not apply....1120

Page

The government cannot apply money received by a receiver of public moneys, and paid over, after the date of the bond, in discharge of a previous defalcation, to the prejudice of the new sureties.....1120
The creditor, having separate obligations of the principal and the surety, may pursue separate remedies against them at the same time.....1067
A mortgage pledge or lien received by the surety to secure him may be enforced by the creditors, where both principal and surety are insolvent, and the latter has not been released 783
The surety is absolutely discharged by a change in the terms of the contract without his consent, even though such change be to his advantage..... 352

PRIZE.

The running of a neutral vessel into a blockaded port, of which its owner had due notice, subjects her to forfeiture, regardless of the instructions of the owner, or her intentions 1154
A neutral owner is concluded by the act of his agent in charge, in allowing the vessel to be employed by the enemy....1153, 1154
A transfer of property to a neutral by an enemy in time of war, or in aid of a contemplated war, is illegal, as in violation and fraud of vested belligerent rights....*155
If French privateers, duly commissioned, make lawful captures on the high seas, sales by them in our ports cannot be prevented 650
Admiralty has no jurisdiction of a libel for the restoration of a vessel belonging to a subject of a neutral nation, captured by an armed vessel of another nation within five miles of Port Henry, as taken within our territorial jurisdiction..... 942
Property seized as prize of war under the law of nations is discharged from all latent liens or incumbrances.....1183
No equity of lien or claim, however urgent, held by innocent third parties, is allowed to prevail, in a prize court, against property seized while in use by a belligerent 1153
One-eighth of the vessel being condemnable in any event, the libelants have a right to enforce their remedy against her as an entirety, whether they retain or remit the proceeds.....1154
A claim and answer in a prize suit cannot put in issue anything but the question of prize or no prize.....1153
Collateral subjects can be controverted in prize cases only by means of pleadings and further proofs, specially authorized by the court after a decision on the first issue.1153
Case allowed to stand over for six months for additional proof, where no witnesses were sent in with the vessel, and no proof was made of violation of blockade..1308
The court will take judicial notice that a shipper from a certain neutral port is a person shown by its records to be actively engaged in running the blockade..... 446
The intentional mutilation of a log book is a suspicious circumstance, which cannot be overcome by doubtful evidence...*155
On motion for the sale of a cargo as perishable, the judgment of the prize commissioners will control, unless overborne by evidence produced 1179
Fees in prize causes, under Acts Feb. 26, 1853; March 25, 1862; July 17, 1862..122, 1187
A counsel employed by the captors, not authorized or recognized by the secretary of the navy, is not entitled to his bill of costs out of the prize fund.....1181

An armed merchant vessel, having no commission from the United States, though present at and co-operating in a capture, is not entitled to share in the proceeds. (Acts March 25, 1862; July 17, 1862.)... 121

The proceeds of captured property belong exclusively to the government, and can be distributed or allotted only according to direct and positive authority of law..... 121

Part of vessel condemned, under Act July 13, 1861, § 6, as belonging to a citizen of the state in insurrection.....1272

Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade..... 446

Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy property, and for a violation of the blockade 63, 121, 1344

Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade, and for being engaged in transporting to an enemy port articles contraband of war.....1180

Vessel and cargo captured as enemy property, and for attempt to violate blockade, released. (Reversing 155.) 159

PUBLIC LANDS.

See, also, "Grant"; "Mines."

Land laws of North Carolina, under which Tennessee titles originated..... 518

Act March 2, 1807, which prohibited entries from being made on lands which had been surveyed or patented, does not protect void surveys or patents..... 331

Subsequently to the cession of the Virginia military district, the state of Virginia had no right to issue a patent for land within it..... 331

A settler under the Oregon donation act has a present grant, by force and operation of such act, from the date of his settlement, or from the date of the act, where the settlement was prior thereto..... 543

On the death of the settler, after complying with the act, and before issue of the patent, the remainder vests in his children, by purchase, as donees of the United States 543

Plaintiff, claiming under a warrant and survey of Pennsylvania lands, must prove payment of the purchase money to the proprietors, or to the state, to recover in ejectment 378

QUIETING TITLE — REMOVAL OF CLOUD.

Equity has jurisdiction to remove a cloud upon the title to real estate, where there is no adequate remedy at law..... 884

A void tax deed, which the statute does not make prima facie evidence of the regularity of the assessment and sale, does not cast a cloud upon the title..... 475

RAILROAD COMPANIES.

See, also, "Carriers."

Unless provision is made therefor in the charter, a railroad cannot be consolidated with another, against the objection of a single stockholder 930

The fencing of a railroad in a city with gates at public crossings is a regulation for public safety, and any incidental inconvenience is merged in the superior interest of the public..... 332

The mere fact that a spark from a locomotive enters the window of a building, and sets it on fire, does not render the railroad company liable for the damage, but plaintiffs must prove that the company was negligent in the use of its engine.....1070

Page

The company is liable only in case it fails, in using its engines, to use the diligence which good specialists in this department are accustomed to exercise.....1070

Construction of the charter of the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad Company, as to the taxation of its property..... 684

Act Mo. March 31, 1868, relating to the discharge of the state's mortgage on the Pacific Railroad, held not unconstitutional, as a special law, or as relating to more than one subject.....1017

Railroad mortgage trustees may maintain a bill in equity to enjoin an illegal proceeding which will injure the value of the bonds, or a bill to have settled a claim of priority with another mortgage, under which an irredeemable sale is about to be made 1017

Legislative authority to subscribe to railroad stock, and borrow money therefor, gives power to issue bonds to pay the subscription 407

Mere irregularities in form, in respect to an election on the question of subscribing to aid a railway, does not affect the validity of the bonds issued, in the hands of innocent purchasers..... 64

Bonds issued by a town to aid the Illinois Grand Trunk Railway, under Act Ill. March 25, 1869, held valid, in the hands of innocent purchasers, though issued by the supervisor and clerk, and though the election was held by the ordinary judges of election, instead of a moderator..... 64

Proper proceedings for the issue of railroad aid bonds, where proceedings were commenced under an old act (Laws N. Y. 1869, c. 907), and continued under a new one (Id. 1871, c. 925), passed during their pendency 1002

The objection that the petition for the issue of railroad bonds did not give the court jurisdiction, because of irrelevant conditions therein, held, could not be raised in an action on the bonds issued on the determination of such court.....1002

Where the petition sufficiently conforms to the statute to call for the exercise of judicial judgment, error in the court's determination cannot affect the validity of the bonds 1002

A town, having received and retained stock which was issued in exchange for its bonds, cannot raise the objection that the bonds and coupons were not made payable at the times directed by the statute.....1002

It would seem that when municipal railway aid bonds are delivered to a third person, to be delivered to the company on performance of conditions, the municipality should bear the loss from any premature or irregular delivery thereof by him..... 64

The bona fide purchaser for value, and before maturity, of negotiable railway aid bonds, issued under a special statute by the proper officers, which recite that they were issued pursuant to law, may recover thereon, though the conditions and limitations imposed by the statute were not in fact complied with..... 306

As against bona fide purchasers of railway aid bonds, which recite that they were issued in conformity with law, the city is estopped from showing that only a minority voted for the subscription, and that the question was not properly submitted..... 407 adversely to plaintiff, in an action for damages for withholding possession, are a proper subject of counterclaim.....1291

Sufficiency of a counterclaim for the value of improvements made by defendant, in a suit for wrongfully withholding possession. (Civ. Code Or. § 318).....1291
Defenses in such suit to claim of damages for waste..... 1291

REFERENCE.

The referee may disregard all such formal defects as might be amended if the case were tried in court.....1122
The award must be sufficiently specific to enable the court to separate what was, from what was not, awarded, within the submission 1122
A general award of a specific sum, without specifying the items of which it is composed, is good, in point of form.....1122
The referee, in an action of covenant, is the final judge of the lawful rule of damages 1122
The court has no power to grant a new trial after judgment on a reference, though it was stipulated that judgment should be entered the same as if the cause had been tried by the court.....1262

RELEASE AND DISCHARGE.

A release given to one holding the relation of spiritual adviser held to be of no effect 1139

REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

Right of removal.

In a case of diverse citizenship, all of the plaintiffs or all of the defendants must join in the petition, unless there is a separable controversy. (Act 1875, § 2.).....1239
The removal act of March 2, 1867, although repealed by the Revised Statutes, is substantially re-enacted therein..... 449

Time for removal.

Under the constitution of the United States, causes may be removed to the federal courts from the state courts after as well as before judgment.....1061
Lapse of terms, while a reply is wanting to complete the issues, does not bar removal by the party not in default. (Act 1875.) 261
In determining at what term the cause could first be tried, a term prior to the passage of the law is not to be considered. (Act 1875.)..... 40
The application may be made after a new trial on the merits has been granted, and before the new trial has been commenced 449

Proceedings to obtain.

The president, and perhaps the general manager, of a railroad corporation, is prima facie entitled to make the affidavit for removal 449

Effect of removal: Subsequent proceedings.

The filing of a petition for removal is no waiver of a fraud in procuring service of process 948
Where property was fraudulently decoyed within the jurisdiction of the state court, and seized on a writ of replevin, the service may be set aside on motion, where the case is at once removed..... 948
An action at law removed when at issue proceeds on the same pleadings after removal 40
Page
The questions whether the removal is in violation of the constitution, and whether the case is one arising under the constitution, etc., may be raised at the trial... 1061

REPLEVIN.

Replevin lies against any one in whose possession personal property unlawfully taken may be found, except law officers who have possession by virtue of legal process 1040
Where goods taken in execution are replevied by a third person, the court, upon return of the writ, will order a return of the property upon the usual retorno-habendo bond.....1046
Suit held discontinued by nonappearance of defendant at the return of the writ, through neglect of his attorney, and reinstatement not allowed..... 523
Where the suit is discontinued through operation of law, the goods are no longer in the custody of the law, and defendant is not guilty of contempt in taking possession of them.....523, 524
Possession for 20 years is prima facie evidence of good title..... 524
The nonpayment of the damages found by the jury is a breach of the condition of the replevin bond, upon which an action may be maintained..... 700

RULES OF COURT.

Rules of practice adopted by the court do not control its discretion so as to deprive it of power to secure the trial of causes on their merits, on proper showing..1076
The rules of practice in state courts adopted by legislative act are rules of practice in the federal courts, by force of Rev. St. § 914, and the federal judges are deprived of discretion over them.....1076

SALE.

The title does not pass where a person receives goods to be paid for at the invoice price when sold by him, with the right to return those unsold at their invoice price..... 109
Where the market in certain goods is subject to sudden and great fluctuations, an acceptance of a proposition by telegraph, after a delay of 24 hours, is not within a reasonable time..... 447
A sale of a chattel is void as to creditors unless the possession accompanies and follows the bill of sale..... 698
On the sale of a machine ordered for a particular purpose, a warranty is implied that the machine is fit for such purpose, unless the seller, by express contract, relieves himself of responsibility..... 670
Under an agreement to rescind the contract, where the goods have been delivered, the contract is not completely rescinded until the redelivery of the goods..... 351
Unliquidated damages for breach of warranty of the soundness of a horse cannot be set off against a note given for the purchase price..... 838
In an action for goods sold, defendant may give in evidence, in mitigation of damages, that the goods were of a quality inferior to what they were represented to be at the sale..... 351

SALVAGE.

Right to salvage compensation.

The property must have been in fact saved by the parties who make the claim.. 640

Page

The officers and crew of public armed vessels are entitled to salvage for personal services, but at less rates than other persons 962

No claim for salvage can be maintained by the crew of a vessel upon the ground that by their services she is brought through a storm into port, sound in hull... 326

The passengers on a steamer injured in a collision went aboard the other vessel, but the officers and crew stayed about the wreck, in small boats, and subsequently went aboard, and saved the passengers' effects. Held not a salvage service..... 161

Compensation for extraordinary exertion, for saving passengers' effects, will not be decreed where there is a presumption, against the wrecked vessel, of fault, for the collision..... 161

On the surrender of a vessel in peril to the master and crew of another, the contract with her pilot is dissolved, and he may render salvage services..... 640

Troops carried on a ship under contract with the government, held entitled to salvage for staying by vessel, and assisting in saving her from a total wreck, after they might have escaped on coming near shore.. 117

No salvage will be awarded for saving the United States mails, though the service is in itself meritorious..... 35

No distinction can be made between the boat and cargo..... 640

Salvage compensation may be awarded for services rendered to a vessel in distress, though she is in no imminent peril of loss..... 925

Salvage allowed upon recapture of a ransomed ship, where the ransom bill declared that the sum agreed upon should only be payable upon the arrival of the vessel at her port of destination, and she never arrived there..... 654

Towing an unmanageable vessel into smooth water, and there hanging her rudder, thus making it possible to navigate her, is a salvage service..... 391

The drawing of a boat off when aground is not a salvage service, where there was no peril..... 640

Pilotage services rendered to a vessel flying a signal of distress, whose officers and crew, save one, were sick with fever, held entitled to salvage remuneration..... 669

A corporation organized to perform salvage services, employed by the owners of a vessel which had gone ashore in a fog, to relieve her from peril, held not entitled to salvage compensation, but to a reasonable compensation..... 777

Forfeiture of salvage.

Embezzlement or a fraudulent concealment of any of the goods saved works a forfeiture of the salvage of the guilty party 962

The negligence or misconduct of the crew will not work a forfeiture of the share of the vessel, where the owner is innocent, and valuable salvage service is rendered, except in the case of wrecking vessels 962

Slight negligence in taking care of the property saved diminishes the amount of salvage, while gross negligence works a total forfeiture..... 962

Salvage claimed for saving passengers refused to owner of wrecking vessel because of its leaky condition, and to crew because of their intoxication at the time when their services were needed..... 962

The fraudulent employment by a salvor of an unnecessary number of assistants in order to magnify the importance of the services should cause a forfeiture of all compensation 925

Page

The fraudulent conduct of the masters of both vessels, in appropriating and concealing part of the property saved, will not defeat the claim of the salvor crew..... 484

The owner of a salvor vessel is not liable for loss or damage caused by the unseaworthiness of his vessel, in the absence of fraudulent misrepresentations or concealment, except in the case of vessels engaged in the wrecking business..... 962

Amount.

Rules governing the rate of salvage.... 640

In fixing the amount, the number of salvors necessary to perform the services may be considered, but not a greater number actually employed 925

Other things being equal, the total award of salvage should vary with the degree of peril from which the property was saved.. 925

To constitute a derelict, the thing found must have been deserted or abandoned... 640

The abandonment of a steamboat by the master to the care and protection of the master and crew of another vessel, for the purpose of procuring assistance and safety, is not a case of derelict..... 640

Vessel held derelict where the master and crew, thinking she had sunk, gave up pursuit of her, though, when they first left her in peril, they expected to return.....1184

From 5 to 55 per cent. allowed for saving different portions of cargo of shipwrecked vessel 962

40 per cent. awarded on cargo, 6 per cent. on specie, and 15 per cent. on surveyor's instruments, the specie and surveying instruments having been in no great danger 35

$2,250 allowed for towing to Sandy Hook brig rigged with jury masts, discovered 175 miles from New York, valued, with cargo, at $18,500..... 451

20 per cent. allowed salvors on a gross valuation of $207,000..... 478

30 and 50 per cent. allowed on different portions of cargo valued at $56,093.....1201

30 per cent. allowed on undamaged cargo, and 40 and 50 per cent. on damaged cargo, and all of certain other portions saved by diving..... 478

45 per cent. allowed on a net value of $4,560 1184

One-half allowed where a portion of the crew of the salvor vessel went on board an abandoned vessel and brought her to port after great peril and exertion..... 738

Remedies for recovery.

An action for compensation for salvage services rendered to a vessel cannot be maintained in personam against the master unless it was performed for his benefit.... 326

Several libels filed against the cargo saved will be joined and considered as one suit for the purposes of awarding salvage.. 478

Salvage expenses are to be apportioned among vessel, cargo, and freight, in proportion to their values, where the labor was carried on with a view of saving both vessel and cargo 962

Where the vessel is lost each article of cargo is charged with its own particular expenses of saving..... 962

Costs and charges must be paid by the property saved, and apportioned among the claimants according to their respective interests 1185

The refusal of the salvor vessel to deliver up the towing chain of the salved vessel, on demand, will subject its owners to costs... 451

Apportionment.

Where the consorted vessels are amply sufficient to save the cargo and materials of a stranded vessel, a wrecking vessel subsequently arriving is not entitled to come into the consortship..... 436

Page

Salvors who save life, but no property, will share with those who save property, according to the merits of the service..... 962

Where the owner under a charter party is to equip, victual, man, and sail the ship, he is the owner for the voyage, and entitled to salvage earned by the ship, unless the deviation and delay were authorized by the shipper 1185

The agreement by the master, for a specific sum, to victual, man, and navigate the vessel under the direction of the owner, does not make him owner or part owner during the voyage.....1185

Right to property or proceeds.

Neither party is of right entitled to have a delivery of the property on bail, and the vessel owner is not in default in waiting for the regular termination of the salvage proceedings 1185

The court, after decreeing salvage, may refuse to restore the ship and cargo to the master, if the interests of the owners and consignees seem to call for such refusal... 649

Money given, even in charity, by salvors having salved property in their possession, to officers of the wrecked vessel, may be recovered by the owners and insurers..... 47

SEAL.

The seal of a notary must bear his name and show his official character.....1268

SEAMEN.

Protection and relief.

Hospital money is to be charged on unforfeited wages only pro rata in proportion to the whole voyage..... 21

The contract of shipment.

Act July 20, 1790, relating to the wages of seamen with whom no agreement in writing is made, does not apply to seamen upon tugboats..... 375

The rate of wages for the previous year will be taken to be the measure of wages where the seaman shipped without an agreed rate..... 375

The vessel is liable for the wages and the care and cure of a seaman injured, while in the discharge of his duty, by the neglect or carelessness of an officer of the boat...1117

Where a sickness began after the seaman entered the service, though before he signed articles, he is entitled to his wages.....1305

It is no objection to his claim that the sickness may have had its origin in some previous injury or infection, not occasioned by his own fault, provided he has acted in good faith, and without fraudulent misrepresentation or concealment.....1305

Seamen who ship in a leaky vessel, to help pump on her homeward voyage, cannot rightfully abandon her, even if the leak increases, if she was seaworthy when she left port..... 894

On a voyage of a leaky vessel from Cape Town to New York, held, that sailing for Pernambuco to take advantage of trade winds and smooth seas, and for repairs, was not a deviation..... 894

What deviation from the original voyage will justify seamen in demanding their discharge 721

A second mate, rightfully displaced from heading a boat in the whale fishery, is bound to perform other duty, and, upon his refusal to do so, may be punished for disobedience 814

A seaman shipping "by the run," or "by the voyage," is entitled to subsistence from the vessel while detained in an intermediate port by stress of weather, but he is not entitled to extra compensation..... 326

Conduct of master or mate in respect to seamen.

A second mate who contumaciously refuses to perform duty may be removed from the cabin to the forecastle..... 814

The master may inflict corporal chastisement for insolence or disobedience to his reasonable commands..... 258

A saucy retort of the second mate held no justification for the master's violently assaulting and inflicting an injury upon him. 814

A receipt for 25 cents "for assault and battery in full of all dues and demands," can only operate as a release where it appears that the settlement was fairly made. 516

Wages—Right to.

The master cannot bind the owners by an arbitrary increase of wages.....1305

The law maritime will not sustain a suit for wages, by the legal representatives of a seaman, beyond the time of his death, when the engagement was by the month..1243

A seaman who ships for a voyage, concealing from the master a long-standing disease, which incapacitates him for labor, is not entitled to wages..... 929

The case of a French seaman will be determined by the marine law of France.... 721

Wages will be decreed on a libel by a French seaman against a French vessel which has changed her voyage from that for which he contracted..... 721

Where a seaman, on trial, shows want of fidelity or capacity, he may be disrated, and his wages reduced..... 515

An advancement to a position having a higher rate of pay entitles the seaman to such rate, though he shipped at a less rate. 515

The owner is liable for the two months' wages under Act July 20, 1840, on a discharge by the United States consul in a foreign port without payment of three months' wages or an official entry upon the list of the crew and the shipping articles..... 437

—— Remedies for recovery.

An action will lie against a foreign vessel for wages of an American seaman....1157

Seamen on board a ship of war or vessel belonging to a sovereign independent state cannot libel the vessel for wages due..... 574

A seaman who has not contracted to look to the personal credit of the master has a lien for his wages, though he knew the master sailed her on shares..... 606

A contract to sail a vessel in partnership for a share of the earnings gives no right in rem for wages..... 406

The lien of the crew for wages cannot be affected by the assumption of a third person as master by consent of the owner..... 586

The pledge of freight to a third person cannot displace the seamen's lien for wages 586

The court has no power to require other seamen to come in and join as complainants in a libel for wages by one. (Act 1890, c. 56, § 6.).....1325

Where the master has admitted a balance due, and subsequently pleads payment, he has the burden of establishing it.....1157

Section 6 of the act of 1790, with respect to the recovery of wages, applies only to the classes of vessels enumerated in section 1..1093

The proceedings by summons to the master (section 6) are cumulative and optional, and the party may resort to an attachment in the first instance.....1093

Wages decreed upon the master's certificate that they were due, though the vessel was in port not earning freight..... 457 —— Deductions: Extinguishment, etc.

Wages are not forfeitable for slight neglect or disobedience. There must be either habitual neglect or disobedience, or some act of a heinous and aggravated nature.. 15

Page

A sailor deserting before the voyage is completed, and never attempting to regain the vessel, held to forfeit all wages under the maritime law 120

Disorderly and mutinous conduct in refusing to do duty held not to forfeit previously earned wages..... 894

It is not disorderly or mutinous conduct to apply in a body to the officers to put back to port, where a staunch vessel leaks four inches an hour..... 894

After application to put back to port, where the vessel was leaky, the voyage was continued on the master's promise to sight a certain port and put in, if necessary. Held, that his failure to sight such port did not justify the crew in refusing to do duty.... 894

A staunch vessel, with a full crew, which does not leak to exceed four inches an hour, held not unseaworthy..... 894

A disobedience in refusing to do duty under a claim of deviation, where the seaman was subsequently subdued to the authority of the ship, held no ground of forfeiture... 894

If the shipping articles prohibit traffic by the seamen, under forfeiture of wages, yet the master may remit a forfeiture incurred thereby 15

Thorough repentance, apology, and subsequent exemplary diligence and obedience authorize the court to remit a forfeiture.. 15

Forfeiture by an offense applies only to wages previously earned..... 15

Wages advanced at the commencement of the voyage are not forfeitable by misconduct so as to be chargeable on wages subsequently earned. But money advanced on the voyage for clothes, etc., and not stipulated for, should be a charge on the unforfeited wages..... 21

A pardon by the master is a reinstatement of the right to wages..... 15

SEDUCTION.

An action upon the case will lie for seduction of plaintiff's daughter, whereby he lost her services..... 954

In such action plaintiff may give evidence that defendant promised to marry the daughter, as a means of seduction..... 954

SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM.

Credit for commissions claimed by an insurance agent from the company cannot be allowed a guarantor of the agent's note in a suit at law. Such claim could only be made available in a suit in equity on an accounting 1081

A counterclaim is substantially a cross action, and should contain nothing but the facts necessary to constitute it; and if any other defense is inserted therein it may be stricken out 1291

Public regulation.

A prosecution for a penalty under Act July 4, 1864, § 3, regulating the carriage of passengers on steamships, etc., must be by action of debt, and not a libel in rem...1176

Revenue laws are those laws only whose principal object is the raising of revenue, and not those under which revenue may incidentally arise 1176

The bond given for the return of the crew (Act Feb. 28, 1803) does not apply in the case of a vessel sold abroad which does not return to the United States..... 612

Such bond does not extend to cases where the seaman is lawfully separated from the ship, or is separated without fault of the master or owner..... 612

A forfeiture for obtaining an American register for a foreign vessel under a false and fraudulent statement is not defeated by a subsequent sale to a bona fide purchaser 607

Act July 18, 1866, is not an act relating to the customs, within the meaning of Act March 2, 1867..... 608

The proceeds of a forfeiture under Act July 18, 1866, are to be paid directly by the court, one-half to the collector of the port for the use of the United States, one-fourth to the informer, if any, and one-twelfth each to the collector, surveyor, and naval officer 608

Title to vessel.

An individual part owner of a vessel has no power, because of such relation to the others, to bind them in relation to matters extra the necessary preservation of the property itself..... 615

The master.

Owners of a chartered vessel may dismiss the master before completion of the voyage, without showing cause..... 645

The master may contract for the employment of the vessel under circumstances of necessity 1254

In cases of necessity arising during the voyage, the master's acts are binding upon all parties 490

A master acting as general agent for his wife, who is part owner, has no interest in her share, whereby he may bind the vessel for the premium of a policy of insurance taken out in his own name..... 25

The master is agent of the cargo as well as the ship, where the vessel is found unable to proceed from a port of distress...1254

The master may hypothecate vessel and freight in a foreign port for advances necessary for repairing and provisioning the vessel, if such advances cannot be procured on the credit of the owner.....1049

The taking of a draft on the consignees for the amount of the advances, which was afterwards protested for nonpayment, held a waiver of the lien, if any ever existed..1049

The master may sell a part or hypothecate the whole of cargo to raise funds for repairs 1254

A sale of the cargo in a port of distress to procure funds for repairs is unjustifiable where the master made no effort to procure funds by hypothecation of the vessel or other maritime contract.....1116

In such case the shipper's damages are to be measured by the value of the cargo at the place of shipment, together with all expenses and interest from the time of shipment 1116

The fact that the master of a British vessel claimed a lien on her under the English law is no ground for his refusal to deliver the vessel to her owners..... 954

A draft given for advances for repairs in a foreign port, expressed to be "for value received in disbursements and repairs of the brig H.," with directions to charge the same to her account, is neither an hypothecation of the freight nor an assignment thereof.....1049

The master cannot subject the ship in rem, much less the co-owners, to a responsibility for cargo not actually laden on board for transportation in the lawful employment of the vessel..... 615

Liabilities of vessels or owners.

It need not be shown that supplies furnished on the order of the master in the usual course of business, and appropriated for the voyage, were absolutely necessary, or actually placed on board, in order to bind the owner..... 140

Advances of cash to the master will bind neither vessel nor owners unless shown to have been appropriated to the necessaries of the vessel..... 140

The owners are not personally responsible for debts contracted by the master for repairs, beyond the value of the ship and freight 1254

The recording or nonrecording of a conveyance of a vessel does not affect the question of the personal liability of the owner 905

A master being a part owner in a vessel is liable in damages for issuing a fraudulent bill of lading to the assignee in good faith, which may be recovered against the vessel to the extent of his interest therein 615

SLAVERY.

The presumption of freedom attaches to every resident of a free state, without regard to color; and, on the same principle, in a slave state every colored man is presumed to be a slave..... 335

The presumption of slavery arising from color is rebutted by evidence of general reputation of freedom..... 437

The sale of a runaway slave held not to entitle her to freedom. (Act Md. 1796, c. 67.) 686

Slave imported into Washington, D. C., from Fortress Monroe, and sold within three years, held entitled to freedom..... 658
